In interpreting federal statutes, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that any unnecessary delay in the arraignment of an arrested suspect will result in suppression of statements obtained from the accused during the delay. McNabb v U.S. (1943) 318 US 332, 87 L Ed 819, 63 S Ct 608. Strictly construing the "without unnecessary delay" requirement of Fed R Crim P 5(a), the Court held that postponing taking an accused before a magistrate to have time to question him or her will result in suppression of any statements obtained. Mallory v U.S. (1957) 354 US 449, 1 L Ed 2d 1479, 77 S Ct 1356. This is commonly known as the McNabb-Mallory rule, and is not the law in California.

California has declined to adopt the stricter federal rule when interpreting similar state statutes dealing with time limitations for arraigning an arrested suspect. A delay in arraignment in California is but one factor to consider in ruling on the admissibility of a statement. People v Morris (1991) 53 C3d 152, 200, 279 CR 720, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394; People v Thompson (1980) 27 C3d 303, 329, 165 CR 289. See Pen C §825 (an accused "shall in all cases be taken before the magistrate without unnecessary delay, and, in any event, within 48 hours after his or her arrest, excluding Sundays and holidays"). If the arrest is on a Wednesday, however, no matter what time it was made, the defendant must be arraigned on Friday (unless it is a court holiday). Pen C §825(a)(2). An arraignment within the 48-hour maximum period, however, does not preclude a finding that there was an unnecessary delay. People v King (1969) 270 CA2d 817, 822, 76 CR 145.

If arraignment delay was solely for the purpose of allowing time to obtain incriminating statements, those statements will likely be suppressed. See People v Powell (1967) 67 C2d 32, 59, 59 CR 817; People v Cook (1982) 135 CA3d 785, 792, 185 CR 576. But if the delay was caused by the need to complete the arrest, book the accused, transport the accused to court, evaluate the evidence for the limited purpose of determining what charge, if any, to file, and complete the necessary clerical and administrative tasks necessary to prepare a formal pleading, then the delay will probably be held permissible. People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 172, 32 CR2d 762; People v Williams (1977) 68 CA3d 36, 43, 137 CR 70.

For discussion of probable cause hearings, see §6.23.

§23.44 XIV. RELATIONSHIP OF RIGHT TO COUNSEL TO DEFENDANT'S STATEMENT

Sixth Amendment right to counsel. When an accused is represented by counsel (whether retained or appointed) and has been formally charged with a crime, police questioning on that case without giving defense counsel the opportunity to speak to the defendant and to be present during questioning, and without a waiver of counsel, will result in suppression of any statements obtained. Minnick v Mississippi (1990) 498 US 146, 112 L Ed 2d 489, 111 S Ct 486; U.S. v Henry (1980) 447 US 264, 273, 65 L Ed 2d 115, 124, 100 S Ct 2183; Spano v New York (1959) 360 US 315, 3 L Ed 2d 1265, 79 S Ct 1202; People v Arguello (1965) 63 C2d 566, 47 CR 485.

The right attaches "after the first formal charging proceeding." Moran v Burbine (1986) 475 US 412, 428, 89 L Ed 2d 410, 425, 106 S Ct 1135. The right to counsel does not attach during extradition proceedings, which are not criminal proceedings, but civil proceedings related to criminal proceedings in another jurisdiction. People v Wheelock (2004) 117 CA4th 561, 566, 11 CR3d 796. The filing of a complaint by a prosecutor in California triggers the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. People v Viray (2005) 134 CA4th 1186, 1205, 36 CR3d 693. A defendant's consent to police-initiated interrogation after the Sixth Amendment right has attached is not presumed involuntary or coerced simply because the defendant has been previously appointed counsel. Montejo v Louisiana (2009) ___ US ___, 173 L Ed 2d 955, 965, 129 S Ct 2079.

The prosecution may use a statement that was obtained in violation of a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to impeach the defendant. Kansas v Ventris (2009) ___ US ___, 173 L Ed 2d 801, 809, 129 S Ct 1841. The California Supreme Court has held that a defendant's statements made during a court-ordered mental competency examination are inadmissible at trial, including for the purpose of impeaching the defendant's testimony. People v Pokovich (2006) 39 C4th 1240, 1253, 48 CR3d 158. The court in Pokovich based its decision on constitutional and policy concerns specific to court-ordered competency evaluations. Undecided by the U.S. Supreme Court and the California Supreme Court is the issue of whether the Oregon v Elstad "tainted product" analysis (see §23.29) applies when a suspect makes incriminating statements after a knowing and voluntary waiver of the right to counsel, despite earlier police questioning in violation of the suspect's Sixth Amendment rights. See Fellers v U.S. (2004) 540 US 519, 157 L Ed 2d 1016, 124 S Ct 1019. Fellers was remanded to the Eighth Circuit with explicit instruction to address this question. On remand, the Eighth Circuit held that the Elstad analysis applied. U.S. v Fellers (8th Cir 2005) 397 F3d 1090, 1095.

In McNeil v Wisconsin (1991) 501 US 171, 175, 115 L Ed 2d 158, 166, 111 S Ct 2204, the U.S. Supreme Court declared that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is "offense specific." In other words, unlike the invocation of a suspect's Miranda rights, which precludes police from discussing any investigation with an accused in custody unless he or she voluntarily approaches the police and initiates a discussion (see §23.23), the Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches only to charged offenses, and does not limit questioning about unrelated, uncharged crimes. See also People v Wader (1993) 5 C4th 610, 636, 20 CR2d 788; People v Avila (1999) 75 CA4th 416, 420, 89 CR2d 320 (attorney representing defendant in one case cannot assert blanket invocation preventing police from questioning defendant about any other case); People v Beltran (1999) 75 CA4th 425, 430, 89 CR2d 267 (same).

Ten years after McNeil, in Texas v Cobb (2001) 532 US 162, 149 L Ed 2d 321, 121 S Ct 1335, the Supreme Court emphasized that it "meant what it said" in McNeil with respect to the offense-specific nature of the right to counsel, holding that there is no exception to the offense-specific rule when the uncharged crimes are "closely related to" or "inextricably intertwined" with charged offenses. 532 US at 172, 149 L Ed 2d at 331. Defining "offense" in the context of the right to counsel, the Cobb Court adopted the test set forth earlier in Blockburger v U.S. (1932) 284 US 299, 304, 76 L Ed 306, 309, 52 S Ct 180: "where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not." Texas v Cobb (2001) 532 US 162, 172, 149 L Ed 2d 321, 331, 121 S Ct 1335. See also People v Slayton (2001) 26 C4th 1076, 1082, 112 CR2d 561.

The defendant can waive the right to have counsel present by initiating contact with the authorities. Minnick v Mississippi, supra; People v Mattson (1990) 50 C3d 826, 859, 268 CR 802. For the waiver to be valid, the defendant must be aware that he or she is under arrest or that charges have been filed against him or her. People v Engert

Ø Note: There are differences between the Fifth Amendment and Sixth Amendment rights to counsel, and between invoking the right to counsel and the right to remain silent in response to Miranda warnings. See §23.23.

There is no federal requirement under Miranda that a suspect who is undergoing interrogation be informed that an attorney is present and wishes to speak to him or her. Moran v Burbine (1986) 475 US 412, 89 L Ed 2d 410, 106 S Ct 1135. If at the time of the interrogation the suspect has not been formally charged, there is likewise no federal requirement under the Sixth Amendment that the suspect be told of the attorney's presence, even if an attorney-client relationship has already been established. This is because the Sixth Amendment right attaches at the time of formal charging, not at the time an attorney-client relationship is formed. Moran v Burbine, supra.

There is a limited right under Cal Const art I, §15 for an attorney who has taken diligent steps to see the defendant in custody, to be given the opportunity to meet with the client before questioning begins or resumes, even though no charges have been filed. People v Mattson, supra.

Massiah* error. Interrogation in violation of the defendant's right to counsel that is improper when conducted by the prosecution is also improper when obtained surreptitiously, through the use of an undercover police agent. U.S. v Henry, supra (federal); People v Arguello, supra (state); Massiah v U.S. (1964) 377 US 201, 12 L Ed 2d 246, 84 S Ct 1199 (undercover or open interrogation). This is commonly called a Massiah violation. Similarly, Massiah error occurs when a co-principal, working at the request of the police, purposely "stimulates" a conversation with the defendant about the charged offenses. This is even true when the defendant knows that the co-principal is supplying information to the police. In re Neely (1993) 6 C4th 901, 909, 26 CR2d 203.

No Massiah violation occurs when spontaneous, voluntary statements are made by an accused to others who pass them on to the police, when the informant makes no attempt to solicit the statements. Such volunteered statements are admissible even when the informant is placed in a cell with the defendant for the purpose of monitoring the defendant's conversations, so long as the government provides no incentive to the informant. People v Hovey (1988) 44 C3d 543, 561, 244 CR 121; People v Whitt (1984) 36 C3d 724, 741, 205 CR 810.

There is no attorney-client privilege when a defendant discusses his or her case with another inmate who is helping the defendant with legal questions. People v Velasquez (1987) 192 CA3d 319, 328, 237 CR 366.

Although there is no Massiah violation if the informant had no prior relationship with the police and first approached the prosecution with the information after having obtained it, when the state has directed an informant to obtain incriminating information, or has created powerful inducements for him or her to do so, the defendant's Sixth Amendment rights may be violated if the informant actively engaged the defendant in conversation, acting as more than a passive listener, even though he or she did not initiate the conversation. People v Howard (1988) 44 C3d 375, 400, 243 CR 842; Kuhlmann v Wilson (1986) 477 US 436, 91 L Ed 2d 364, 106 S Ct 2616; Maine v Moulton (1985) 474 US 159, 88 L Ed 2d 481, 106 S Ct 477. See also People v Pensinger (1991) 52 C3d 1210, 1249, 278 CR 640 (informant not agent of police when he acted as no more than listening post, was told he was not agent of police, and was told he would receive no benefit from information he passed on to police); People v Catelli (1991) 227 CA3d 1434, 1442, 278 CR 452. For an informant to be considered a government agent, there need not be an express agreement by the state to compensate the informant for his or her services. Even if the informant is told not to expect a deal in exchange for testimony, when the state makes a conscious decision to obtain the informant's cooperation and the informant consciously decides to provide that cooperation, the informant then becomes an agent of the state. Randolph v California (9th Cir 2004) 380 F3d 1133, 1144.

In In re Wilson (1992) 3 C4th 945, 13 CR2d 269, while the defendant was incarcerated pending trial, he told another inmate that he wanted to eliminate a potential witness. The inmate contacted the district attorney, and a prosecution investigator posing as a "hit man" spoke with the defendant. A unanimous supreme court held that this violated Massiah, and that defense counsel's failure to object constituted reversible error because of incompetence of counsel. It is important to remember in such cases that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel is offense-specific; it attaches only to the charged crime, even when the facts relating to other offenses are inextricably intertwined or closely related to the charged offense. See Texas v Cobb (2001) 532 US 162, 149 L Ed 2d 321, 121 S Ct 1335. In People v Martin (2002) 98 CA4th 408, 421, 119 CR2d 679, the defendant's girlfriend, a witness in his pending murder case, contacted the police because she felt threatened by him. In investigating a possible charge of witness intimidation, the police secretly recorded her telephone conversations with the defendant. The court found that officers did not knowingly circumvent the defendant's right to counsel, because the girlfriend was not acting as an agent of the police, there was no agreement between the officers and the girlfriend to obtain evidence against the defendant with regard to the charged crime, and the officers did not create a situation likely to induce incriminating statements about the charged crime.

Ø Note: As these cases illustrate, it is incumbent on defense counsel to thoroughly warn clients of the dangers of talking to anyone, including sympathetic cellmates, about their case. This is particularly true in light of Pen C §2600, which the California Supreme Court has interpreted to permit law enforcement officers to monitor and record unprivileged communications between inmates and their visitors as a means of gathering evidence of a crime. People v Loyd (2002) 27 C4th 997, 1007, 119 CR2d 360. See also People v Thornton (2007) 41 C4th 391, 429, 61 CR3d 461 (taped conversation between defendant in custody and visitor); People v Jefferson (2008) 158 CA4th 830, 840, 70 CR3d 451 (secret recording of cellmates was not custodial interrogation).

Generally, the remedy for a Massiah violation is suppression of the statements. See U.S. v Morrison (1981) 449 US 361, 66 L Ed 2d 564, 101 S Ct 665 (usual remedy for prosecution interference with defendant's right to counsel is reversal, not dismissal); People v Benally (1989) 208 CA3d 900, 908, 256 CR 483 (police taped conversation between defense counsel and his investigator; tape suppressed). Dismissal, however, may be an appropriate sanction in some cases. See People v Hayes (1988) 200 CA3d 400, 246 CR 750; People v Lowery (1988) 200 CA3d 1207, 1223, 246 CR 443. Such a situation might exist when the informant or agent has infiltrated the defense camp, learned defense strategies, and otherwise intruded on the attorney-client relationship. See Barber v Municipal Court (1979) 24 C3d 742, 157 CR 658; U.S. v Levy (3d Cir 1978) 577 F2d 200.

In People v Benally, supra, the court based its decision to suppress only the statement (and any evidence derived from it) in part on the fact that the district attorney had not listened to the tape.

Secretly tape recording the accused's conversation with an unwitting codefendant or other third party not acting as a police agent, at least when the subject has no legitimate expectation of privacy, does not violate the accused's right to counsel and is permissible. People v Lucero (1987) 190 CA3d 1065, 235 CR 751 (in a police car); accord, People v Harmon (1992) 7 CA4th 845, 849, 9 CR2d 265. However, if the defendant is "lulled … into believing" that a conversation with someone will be private, it is inadmissible. People v Loyd (2002) 27 C4th 997, 1003, 119 CR2d 360. See North v Superior Court (1972) 8 C3d 301, 311, 104 CR 833 (prisoner in jail and spouse allowed to talk privately; taping violated marital privilege and Fourth Amendment); People v Hammons (1991) 235 CA3d 1710, 5 CR2d 317 (police told jailed codefendants they could have private conversation, then secretly taped it; Fourth Amendment violated). But see People v Edwards (1991) 54 C3d 787, 814, 1 CR2d 696 (during voluntary conversation with jailer, defendant said "off the record, I'm guilty"; court held there was no interrogation and no duty to stop defendant when he said "off the record").

For discussion generally of the right to counsel, see chap 3. For discussion of defense counsel's role in agreeing to have an accused cooperate with the prosecution, see §§51.8-51.12.

XV. USING EXCLUDED STATEMENTS

§23.45 A. Involuntary Statements

Involuntary statements are inadmissible for any purpose. See Brown v Mississippi (1936) 297 US 278, 80 L Ed 682, 56 S Ct 461; People v Haydel (1974) 12 C3d 190, 197, 115 CR 394. The use in a criminal prosecution of involuntary confessions constitutes a denial of due process of law under both the federal and state constitutions. Lego v Twomey (1972) 404 US 477, 483, 30 L Ed 2d 618, 623, 92 S Ct 619; People v Sanchez (1969) 70 C2d 562, 571, 75 CR 642.

© The Regents of the University of California

§23.46 B. Statement Obtained in Violation of Miranda

Inadmissible in prosecution's case-in-chief. A voluntary statement excluded because of Miranda error cannot be used during the prosecution's case-in-chief. Miranda v Arizona (1966) 384 US 436, 16 L Ed 2d 694, 86 S Ct 1602. In Harris v New York (1971) 401 US 222, 28 L Ed 2d 1, 91 S Ct 643, the Court held that, although the prosecution is prohibited from introducing the statement in its case-in-chief, Miranda was not intended to grant the suspect license to lie in his or her testimony at trial. Thus, if a statement obtained in violation of Miranda is voluntary, the statement may nonetheless be admitted to impeach a defendant who testifies differently at trial. See People v May (1988) 44 C3d 309, 243 CR 369; People v Pilster (2006) 138 CA4th 1395, 42 CR3d 301. It is also admissible in rebuttal to the defendant's case. People v Herbst (1986) 186 CA3d 793, 800, 233 CR 123. There is no sua sponte duty, however, for the court to give an instruction limiting the use of the defendant's prior inconsistent statements to purposes of impeachment. People v Torrez (1995) 31 CA4th 1084, 1088, 37 CR2d 712. However, the trial court must give the instruction if defense counsel requests it and if the evidence shows a Miranda violation occurred. People v Pilster (2006) 138 CA4th 1395, 1401, 42 CR3d 301; see Bench Notes to CALCRIM 356.

Voluntary statements obtained in violation of Miranda can be introduced at Pen C §1368 competency hearings (People v Samuel (1981) 29 C3d 489, 174 CR 684) and at parole revocation hearings (In re Martinez (1970) 1 C3d 641, 83 CR 382).

Statements made by a defendant during a court-ordered mental competency examination cannot be used to impeach the defendant at trial. People v Pokovich (2006) 39 C4th 1240, 1253, 48 CR3d 158.

> Ø Note: The good faith exception to the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule (see U.S. v Leon (1984) 468 US 897, 82 L Ed 2d 677, 104 S Ct 3405), does not apply to Miranda violations. People v Smith (1995) 31 CA4th 1185, 1192, 37 CR2d 524.

Effects of deliberate violations of Miranda. As reflected in numerous reported cases, there is a growing trend in some law enforcement agencies to question suspects "outside Miranda," i.e., to deliberately omit Miranda warnings altogether or continue questioning after a suspect has invoked his or her rights with the aim of using the suspect's statements for impeachment purposes at a later trial. When a law enforcement officer deliberately violates Miranda, the officer's misconduct will not alone render Harris v New York, supra, inapplicable. Statements obtained from the defendant remain admissible for impeachment if not otherwise involuntary. People v Peevy (1998) 17 C4th 1184, 73 CR2d 865; Pollard v Galaza (9th Cir 2002) 290 F3d 1030, 1035 (when suspect initially invoked right to remain silent but then initiated further conversation, officer's deliberate violation of Miranda by continuing to talk to suspect did not constitute coercive conduct per se; interaction became more like conversation than interrogation, and officer did not misrepresent nature or purpose of interview, or make promises or threats). However, when a statement is purposely taken in violation of Miranda and other circumstances are present indicating involuntariness of a subsequent confession, the confession will be inadmissible for any purpose. People v Neal (2003) 31 C4th 63, 68, 1 CR3d 650 (confessions considered involuntary in light of surrounding circumstances, including officer's deliberate violation of Miranda, and suspect's youth, inexperience, minimal education and low intelligence, deprivation and isolation imposed during suspect's custodial confinement, and promise and threat made by officer); People v Bey (1993) 21 CA4th 1623, 1628, 27 CR2d 28 (statement considered "coerced and involuntary" and hence inadmissible for any purpose when intentionally taken in violation of Miranda and accompanied by assurances that it would not be used against suspect). In both Peevy and Neal, the California Supreme Court expressly declined to address the question of whether the People may use a voluntary statement to impeach a defendant if the statement was intentionally obtained by a law enforcement officer in deliberate violation of Miranda, when there is a widespread or systematic policy, training, or practice to obtain such statements for purposes of impeachment. People v Neal (2003) 31 C4th 63, 78 n4, 1 CR3d 650; People v Peevy (1998) 17 C4th 1184, 1205, 73 CR2d 865.

In People v Coffman (2004) 34 C4th 1, 17 CR3d 710, investigators continued to question the two defendants, Coffman and Marlow, after their repeated requests for counsel. One officer told Marlow, numerous times, that because he had invoked his Miranda rights whatever he told officers during the interrogation could not be used in court. At trial, the court found that the defendants' statements were made voluntarily and thus could be used for impeachment, despite the officers' noncompliance with Miranda. On appeal, before reaching the issue of voluntariness, the supreme court found that the public safety/rescue doctrines of New York v Quarles (1984) 467 US 649, 81 L Ed 2d 550, 104 S Ct 2626, and People v Modesto (1965) 62 C2d 436, 42 CR 417, applied to the defendants' interrogation because the victim had been missing for a week at the time the defendants were questioned, and because Marlow's sister had told police that he had previously been known to leave individuals bound and stranded alive in rural areas. Coffman, 34 C4th at 57. The court held that, therefore, any statements made before police discovered the victim's body, if voluntarily made, were admissible, either as substantive evidence or as impeachment, despite the officers' noncompliance with Miranda. 34 C4th at 58. Finding the issue of voluntariness to be "close," the court expressed concern over the fact that the officers repeatedly ignored Marlow's requests for an attorney, but found it unlikely that Marlow, who was over 30 years old and a convicted felon, was coerced into speaking to the officers given his maturity and criminal experience. 34 C4th at 58. The court noted that the officers' assurances that any statements Marlow might make could not be used in court also raised the specter of coercion, but observed that Marlow continued to resist disclosing the victim's whereabouts or admitting that he committed the offenses, which suggested that he was still able to calculate his self-interest in choosing whether to disclose or withhold information. 34 C4th at 59. In the court's view, his eventual admissions were voluntary and were the result of his being presented with the evidence against him. 34 C4th at 58.

In Missouri v Seibert (2004) 542 US 600, 159 L Ed 2d 643, 124 S Ct 2601, the Supreme Court considered the voluntariness of a confession when the officer purposefully withheld Miranda warnings as part of a two-step interrogation technique promoted by a national police training agency. Referring to this technique as "question-first," the Court, in a plurality opinion, found that it is more likely that if interrogators question first and warn later, after eliciting a confession, that Miranda warnings would be "ineffective in preparing the suspect for a successive interrogation, close in time and similar in content." 542 US at 610, 159 L Ed 2d at 654. The Court observed that the "manifest purpose" of the question-first practice, i.e., "to get a confession the suspect would not make if he understood his rights at the outset," conflicts with the aim of Miranda, which is to reduce the risk of a coerced confession. 542 US at 611, 159 L Ed 2d at 655. The Court went on to consider whether a postwarning confession obtained through a question-first technique would nonetheless be admissible under Oregon v Elstad (1985) 470 US 298, 84 L Ed 2d 222, 105 S Ct 1285. The Court held that it would not be admissible, distinguishing Elstad's "good-faith Miranda mistake" from the interrogation in Seibert, which was designed to undermine Miranda. 159 L Ed 2d 657. For a comparison of Elstad with Siebert in the context of an impermissible two-step interrogation technique, see U.S. v Williams (9th Cir 2006) 435 F3d 1148, 1152. For further discussion of Miranda violations and the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine, see §23.30.

§23.47 C. Statement Excluded Because of Fourth Amendment Error

Evidence seized in violation of one's Fourth Amendment rights and suppressed as fruit of an illegal search, detention, or arrest is not admissible in the prosecution's case-in-chief. New York v Harris (1990) 495 US 14, 19, 109 L Ed 2d 13, 21, 110 S Ct 1640; People v Williams (1988) 45 C3d 1268, 1299, 248 CR 834; People v Moore (1988) 201 CA3d 877, 885, 247 CR 353. Voluntary statements that are the product of an unlawful search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment may be used to impeach the defendant. U.S. v Havens (1980) 446 US 620, 627, 64 L Ed 2d 559, 566, 100 S Ct 1912; People v Moore (1988) 201 CA3d 877, 883, 247 CR 353 (note written by defendant that was suppressed on Fourth Amendment grounds properly admitted to impeach defendant). See §§23.9-23.10 for further discussion of the admissibility of a statement obtained after a Fourth Amendment violation.

§23.48 D. Statement Excluded Because of Sixth Amendment Error

A defendant's voluntary statement, excluded from the prosecution's case-in-chief because it was taken in violation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, is admissible to impeach the defendant's inconsistent testimony at trial. Kansas v Ventris (2009) ___ US ___, 173 L Ed 2d 801, 808, 129 S Ct 1841; People v Brown (1996) 42 CA4th 461, 471, 49 CR2d 652. For further discussion of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel, see §23.44.

§23.49 E. Prosecution Bound by Defendant's Statement (Toledo Doctrine)

The Toledo doctrine (People v Toledo (1948) 85 CA2d 577, 193 P2d 953) holds that the prosecution is bound by the defendant's extrajudicial statements that are irreconcilable with guilt when the prosecution introduced the statements and there is no other competent and substantial evidence that could establish guilt. People v Acosta (1955) 45 C2d 538, 542, 290 P2d 1.

The Toledo rule, however, was not intended to detract from the more modern rule allowing impeachment of a witness by any party, including the party calling the witness. Rather, it refers only to a principle of judicial review obviating a defendant's burden of proving a defense when the prosecution's proof itself tends to show the defense, and there is no other competent and substantial evidence to the contrary. People v Ross (1979) 92 CA3d 391, 400, 154 CR 783. When there is other "competent and substantial" evidence of guilt, the conflict in the evidence is, in the final analysis, one for the jury to resolve. See People v Burney (2009) 47 C4th 203, 248, 97 CR3d 348; In re George B. (1991) 228 CA3d 1088, 1093, 279 CR 388.

§23.50 F. Counsel Opens Door to Admission of Otherwise Inadmissible Statement

Counsel must consider the ramifications of questions before asking them. If counsel's question elicits information about a topic that the court has ruled the opposition cannot introduce, the court will probably allow opposition rebuttal. For example, in People v Rich (1988) 45 C3d 1036, 248 CR 510, the court upheld the prosecutor's questioning of defense experts about a suppressed confession, because the experts had relied on that statement in reaching their opinion. In this situation, defense counsel is said to have "opened the door" to bringing in the otherwise inadmissible evidence.

Ø Note: When a suppressed confession is raised in this manner, a limiting instruction should be given. 45 C3d at 1095.

See also People v Sakarias (2000) 22 C4th 596, 644, 94 CR2d 17 (after court excluded prosecution's use of defendant's statements taken in violation of Miranda, defense opened door to introduction of statements by cross-examining detective on matters detective learned from defendant's statements).

In contrast to People v Rich, supra, the mention by a defendant that he had been Mirandized but that he declined to make a statement did not allow the prosecution to ask on cross-examination whether the defendant told the police that he had done nothing wrong. See People v Evans (1994) 25 CA4th 358, 31 CR2d 20. Note, however, that when the defendant testifies on direct examination about his or her own un-Mirandized statement, it is proper for the trial court to give an instruction that the jury may draw an inference of guilt from a willfully false or deliberately misleading statement made by a defendant after arrest. People v Williams (2000) 79 CA4th 1157, 1168, 94 CR2d 727 (discussing CALJIC 2.03; now see CALCRIM 362 (addressing consciousness of guilt and a defendant's false statements)).

Statements, whether exculpatory or inculpatory, obtained in violation of a person's right against self-incrimination are not admissible against that person in any criminal case. U.S. v Blue (1966) 384 US 251, 255, 16 L Ed 2d 510, 514, 86 S Ct 1416. The protections under the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and its California constitutional equivalent, Cal Const art I, §15, are included in Evid C §§930 and 940.

Ø Note: The right against self-incrimination is not the same thing as the Miranda rule, which is discussed in §§23.16-23.30.

Evidence Code §930 provides simply that "a defendant in a criminal case has a privilege not to be called as a witness and not to testify." Thus, while a criminal defendant may waive this privilege and testify if he or she so chooses, the prosecution may not call the defendant to the stand to make him or her claim the privilege against self-incrimination in front of jurors. People v Cabrellis (1967) 251 CA2d 681, 685, 59 CR 795. Nor may the prosecution comment to the jury on the defendant's exercise of this privilege (called Griffin error). Griffin v California (1965) 380 US 609, 14 L Ed 2d 106, 85 S Ct 1229; Brecht v Abrahamson (1993) 507 US 619, 123 L Ed 2d 353, 113 S Ct 1710. A trial court is not required to advise a self-represented defendant of the privilege against self-incrimination before he or she testifies, even if the prosecution calls the defendant as a witness. People v Barnum (2003) 29 C4th 1210, 1217, 131 CR2d 499. However, the trial court is not precluded from advising on the privilege in any given case, as long as the court's words "do not stray from neutrality toward favoring any one option over another." 29 C4th at 1226. The California Supreme Court has not considered whether a prosecutor commits misconduct by calling a self-represented defendant as a witness in its case-in-chief.

Although the prosecutor may not comment, either directly or indirectly, on the defendant's failure to take the stand, Griffin v California, supra, does not forbid comments on the state of the evidence or the defense's failure to introduce material evidence or its failure to call logical witnesses. People v Hovey (1988) 44 C3d 543, 572, 244 CR 121. Hovey is a good example of the fine line drawn between proper and improper comment.

The prosecutor also may not comment on or present evidence concerning the defendant's failure to give a postarrest, post-Miranda statement to the police explaining his or her conduct (Doyle v Ohio (1976) 426 US 610, 49 L Ed 2d 91, 96 S Ct 2240), even if it is offered in an attempt to impeach an exculpatory explanation offered at trial (People v Evans (1994) 25 CA4th 358, 367, 31 CR2d 20). This is true regardless of the adoptive admissions rule because silence during a post-Miranda custodial interrogation is generally interpreted to be an assertion of the right to remain silent guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment. People v Medina (1990) 51 C3d 870, 891, 274 CR 849, aff'd on other grounds sub nom Medina v California (1992) 505 US 437, 120 L Ed 2d 353, 112 S Ct 2572; People v Jennings (2003) 112 CA4th 459, 471, 5 CR3d 243 (silence during joint custodial interrogation cannot be used to prove implied adoptive admission). In Fletcher v Weir (1982) 455 US 603, 71 L Ed 2d 490, 102 S Ct 1309 (per curiam), the Court declined to extend Doyle to postarrest, pre-Miranda situations, finding no due process violation in permitting cross-examination of a defendant about his or her postarrest silence when no Miranda warnings have been given. Thus, in California, a prosecutor may comment on the defendant's failure to deny if it occurred before Miranda warnings were given unless the defendant's silence is held by the court to have been an attempt to invoke his or her rights. People v O'Sullivan (1990) 217 CA3d 237, 244, 265 CR 784; U.S. v Lopez (9th Cir 2007) 500 F3d 840, 845 (harmless error for prosecution to comment on defendant's postarrest silence in light of entirety of defendant's testimony, when defendant's pre-Miranda silence was compelling rebuttal of defendant's claim of duress and inference of guilt from silence was not stressed to jury). When, however, a defendant presents evidence to the effect that he or she was prevented from talking to police, the prosecution may rebut the misimpression with evidence of the defendant's refusal to respond to police questioning. People v Champion (2005) 134 CA4th 1440, 37 CR3d 122 (prosecutor may cross-examine defendant concerning officer's postarrest offer to take defendant's statement to rebut defendant's direct testimony that he had not been given an opportunity to tell his side of the story); People v Austin (1994) 23 CA4th 1596, 1611, 28 CR2d 885.

The prosecutor may point out the inconsistencies between a defendant's statement to the police and his or her trial testimony, but it is Doyle error to do so by showing that the defendant did not talk to police again after giving the statement and before trial. People v Belmontes (1988) 45 C3d 744, 786, 248 CR 126.

In a series of federal cases, the Ninth Circuit has extended the postarrest, post-Miranda silence protection of Doyle to the postarrest, pre-Miranda context on grounds that the privilege against self-incrimination prevents the government's use at trial of evidence of a defendant's silence. This protection covers not only the silence itself (U.S. v Whitehead (9th Cir 2000) 200 F3d 634, 639) but also statements by a suspect invoking the right to silence (U.S. v Bushyhead (9th Cir 2001) 270 F3d 905, 912) and evidence of a suspect's demeanor while detained and informed of incriminating evidence. U.S. v Velarde-Gomez (9th Cir 2001) 269 F3d 1023, 1031 (en banc). However, the rationale of Doyle does not apply to mental competency hearings, in which evidence of a defendant's invocation of Miranda is used to show cognition, not guilt. Nguyen v Garcia (9th Cir 2007) 477 F3d 716, 727.

§23.52 XVI. PROSECUTION ADVICE CONCERNING LAW ENFORCEMENT CONTACT WITH REPRESENTED DEFENDANTS

Prosecutors cannot encourage law enforcement contacts with charged criminal defendants on the subject matter of the representation unless defense counsel consents. Cal Rules of Prof Cond 2-100. This is true whether such attempts are part of an investigation of the prosecution's or the defendant's case. Such actions violate state and national ethical standards and may involve constitutional violations. See People v Moore (1976) 57 CA3d 437, 129 CR 279 (case dismissed; district attorney's investigator elicited accused's cooperation in other cases without defense counsel's knowledge or approval).

Communication with a represented party is governed by Cal Rules of Prof Cond 2-100:

> (A) While representing a client, a member shall not communicate directly or indirectly about the subject of the representation with a party the member knows to be represented by another lawyer in the matter, unless the member has the consent of the other lawyer.

Rule 2-100's prohibition against communicating with represented parties without the consent of their counsel tracks the language of ABA Model Rules of Prof Cond 4.2.

California courts have consistently held prosecutors to the rules prohibiting communications with represented parties. In People v Sharp (1983) 150 CA3d 13, 18, 197 CR 436, decided under Rule 2-100's predecessor, the court noted:

> Because the prosecutor's position is unique—he represents authority and the discretion to make decisions affecting the defendant's pending case—his contact carries an implication of leniency for cooperative defendants or harsher treatment for the uncooperative. Such contact intrudes upon the function of defense counsel and impedes his or her ability to negotiate a settlement and properly represent the client, whose interests the rule is designed to protect.

The court thus concluded that, by directing police agents to conduct a lineup without notifying the defendant's attorney, the prosecutor violated his professional ethical responsibilities. 150 CA3d at 19. See also Triple A Mach. Shop, Inc. v State (1989) 213 CA3d 131, 141, 261 CR 493 (assuming Rule 2-100 can apply to prosecutors); People v Manson (1976) 61 CA3d 102, 165, 132 CR 265 (holding prosecutor to ethical rules because he "is no less a member of the State Bar than any other admitted lawyer"); People v Moore, supra.

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has also found that conduct violates Cal Rules of Prof Cond 2-100 and federal court rules even when prosecution contact was purportedly "preauthorized" by the U.S. Attorney General and the trial court. U.S. v Lopez (9th Cir 1993) 4 F3d 1455. Lopez involved postindictment contact with a represented defendant.

The prosecution does have the right to contact a represented defendant without permission before the defendant has been formally charged. Boulas v Superior Court (1986) 188 CA3d 422, 431, 233 CR 487; 75 Ops Cal Atty Gen 223 (1992).

> Ø Note: If the defendant has claimed the right under Miranda to refuse to talk to the prosecution, and to have counsel present, the prosecution may not talk to the defendant about any case. See discussion in §23.23.

For further discussion of contacts with represented parties, see §2.35.

§23.53 XVII. ENSURING COMPLIANCE WITH EXCLUSION ORDERS

When an extrajudicial statement has been ruled inadmissible by the court, it is error to bring that information before the jury. People v Woodberry (1970) 10 CA3d 695, 708, 89 CR 330. Defense counsel can request a mistrial or ask that the inadmissible statement be stricken from the record and the jury admonished to disregard it.

Before giving testimony, witnesses should be admonished by the attorney calling them to refrain from mentioning anything excluded by the court. In addition, prosecution witnesses can be told that mentioning something previously ruled inadmissible may carry with it the further penalty of having to start the case all over before a fresh jury. Most witnesses will comply when told that a mistrial means that the witness will be resubpoenaed and will have to testify again on another day.

Police witnesses should be told that the fact that a defendant refused to waive his or her Miranda rights cannot be mentioned. Some prosecutors prefer, as a matter of tactics, to have the jury informed during testimony that the defendant was advised of these rights. If such testimony is allowed, police witnesses should be warned not to go beyond the simple fact that the defendant received a reading of his or her Miranda rights. Defense counsel, however, should object to such testimony on grounds of prejudice and relevance—advisement testimony without more implies that the defendant refused to speak with the police.

A witness who intentionally, or perhaps continually, violates the court's ruling by mentioning an inadmissible topic is subject to a contempt of court citation by the judge. See chap 58 on contempt. The threat of contempt is often enough to ensure compliance.

Attorneys who intentionally violate a court's rulings are subject themselves to the possibility of a contempt citation as well as possible disciplinary proceedings by the State Bar. See Cal Rules of Prof Cond 3-210.

§23.54 XVIII. REQUESTING JURY INSTRUCTIONS CONCERNING STATEMENTS

Defendant's testimony and statements are covered in CALCRIM 355-362.

The CALCRIM instructions do not distinguish between admissions and confessions, but instruct more generally on "defendant's statements." See CALCRIM 358. Special trial issues surrounding a defendant's statements, including defendant's right to testify (CALCRIM 355), Miranda-defective statements (CALCRIM 356), adoptive admissions (CALCRIM 357), corpus delicti (CALCRIM 359), defendant's statements to experts (CALCRIM 360), failure to explain or deny adverse testimony (CALCRIM 361), and consciousness of guilt (CALCRIM 362) are treated separately. The CALJIC instructions defined confession and admission (CALJIC 2.70), defined adoptive admission (CALJIC 2.71.5), addressed the jury's consideration of a defendant's statement made before the offense was committed (CALJIC 2.71.7), and explained the fact that corpus delicti must be proved independent of the admission or confession (CALJIC 2.72). Other sources of instructions are given in chap 32.

CALCRIM 358 includes the admonition that evidence of an oral statement by the defendant should be viewed with caution. The admonition is meant to apply only to a defendant's inculpatory statements (see Bench Notes to CALCRIM 358), which were referred to as "confessions" or "admissions" in the applicable CALJIC instructions. See CALJIC 2.70-2.71. This admonition must usually be given sua sponte. See Bench Notes to CALCRIM 358; see also People v Beagle (1972) 6 C3d 441, 455, 99 CR 313. However, the admonition to the jury that it should view a defendant's oral statements with caution should not be given when the statements are written or recorded. Bench Notes to CALCRIM 358; see People v Franco (1994) 24 CA4th 1528, 1541, 30 CR2d 478. Nor should such an instruction be given when the statement constitutes the criminal act itself, as in a case charging the making of a criminal threat under Pen C §422. Bench Notes to CALCRIM 358; see People v Zichko (2004) 118 CA4th 1055, 13 CR3d 509. The admonition also need not be given sua sponte in the penalty phase of a criminal trial, but should be given if requested by the defense. Bench Notes to CALCRIM 358; see People v Livaditis (1992) 2 C4th 759, 784, 9 CR2d 72.

Because the trial judge determines as a matter of law whether a defendant received a proper Miranda admonishment, that issue is not subject to redetermination by the jury. People v Schader (1965) 62 C2d 716, 728, 44 CR 193. Nor is it the subject of any instructions to jurors. However, if the judge has determined that a defendant's statement was taken in violation of Miranda, CALCRIM 356 provides a limiting instruction on the use of that statement. There is no sua sponte duty to give this instruction. Bench Notes to CALCRIM 356.

The trial judge also makes the initial ruling on the admissibility of statements that are challenged as involuntary. Unlike the Miranda determination, however, if the judge finds that a statement is voluntary, jurors must still be allowed to decide the "integrity" of the statement, i.e., whether it is reliable under the circumstances. Crane v Kentucky (1986) 476 US 683, 90 L Ed 2d 636, 106 S Ct 2142; People v Carroll (1970) 4 CA3d 52, 59, 84 CR 60.

On the basis of the reasoning in Carroll and Crane, a defense attorney might consider a special instruction explaining the relationship between voluntariness and reliability and that, if the jury decides under the circumstances that the defendant's statements were influenced by, e.g., duress, coercion, or promises of leniency, such factors may be considered when determining the weight to be given to those statements. The prosecution might consider requesting a special instruction that the jury must base its decision on the evidence. See People v Carroll, supra.

If the prosecution uses an un-Mirandized statement for impeachment, defense counsel should ask for CALCRIM 356, an instruction limiting the statement to the issue of the credibility of the defendant's trial testimony. Although there is no sua sponte duty to give CALCRIM 356 (see Harris v New York (1971) 401 US 222, 28 L Ed 2d 1, 91 S Ct 643; People v Coffman (2004) 34 C4th 1, 63, 17 CR3d 710), the court must give the instruction on request. Bench Notes to CALCRIM 356.

§24.1 I. OVERVIEW

Effect of using priors. Prior convictions (usually just called "priors") can be used to enhance a sentence, establish a mandatory minimum sentence, restrict a defendant's license to drive, prohibit the possession of firearms, make otherwise innocent conduct criminal, elevate a misdemeanor to a felony prosecution, make a "wobbler" (defined in §8.40) into a straight felony, and eliminate probation as a sentencing choice. Priors can also be used as evidence to prove identity or an element of the crime, such as intent, or to impeach the defendant if he or she testifies.

Charging priors. Whether a prior must be charged depends on its purpose. Prior convictions used for some purposes must be proved at the preliminary hearing, others only at trial, and still others only at sentencing. See the chart in §24.18. Pleadings can be amended to add a prior. Pen C §§969a, 1009; People v Carson (1941) 45 CA2d 554, 558, 114 P2d 619.

Bifurcating prior for trial. The defendant may be able to keep the jury from learning of a prior by admitting it (Pen C §1025) or by bifurcating the prior from the present offense and having jurors hear evidence on the prior only after they have returned a verdict on the underlying charges. People v Saunders (1993) 5 C4th 580, 588 n4, 20 CR2d 638.

Admitting to prior. Before accepting a defendant's admission to a prior, the court must ensure that the defendant understands the rights being waived by the admission, and the consequences of the admission. In re Yurko (1974) 10 C3d 857, 863, 112 CR 513. The required advisements and waivers are discussed in §§26.10-26.17.

Challenges: Constitutionality and use. Constitutional challenges to a prior and challenges to the use to which a prior can be put during trial are usually made as pretrial motions. See People v Jackson (1991) 1 CA4th 697, 701, 2 CR2d 308. Constitutional legal challenges to a prior conviction are decided by the judge. Burgett v Texas (1967) 389 US 109, 19 L Ed 2d 319, 88 S Ct 258; People v Curl (2009) 46 C4th 339, 350, 93 CR3d 537; Curl v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 1292, 1302, 276 CR 49. Except for priors alleged in murder special circumstances allegations or as an element of an offense, a defendant who challenges the factual validity of a charged prior has only a limited statutory right to a trial by jury. Pen C §1025; see People v Mosby (2004) 33 C4th 353, 360, 15 CR3d 262. Special rules apply to priors involving Veh C §§14601, 14601.1-14601.2, 23103, and 23152-23153. They are set out in Veh C §41403 and discussed in §24.44.

Challenging priors. As a tactical matter, defense counsel must decide whether it is better to admit a prior or to request a court trial on a prior, and whether to preclude its introduction to the jury (if possible), or to contest the prior either before the jury or (if possible) in a bifurcated trial.

The defendant can also attack a prior by appeal from the conviction (Pen C §§1237, 1466(2)), habeas corpus (see People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 919, 206 CR 707), or coram nobis (see People v Wadkins (1965) 63 C2d 110, 45 CR 173).

The prosecution can seek appellate relief from an erroneous adverse order on a motion to strike a prior or from an erroneous grant of a petition for writ of habeas corpus or coram nobis. See In re Walker (1974) 10 C3d 764, 112 CR 177 (prosecution review of habeas corpus); People v Burke (1956) 47 C2d 45, 53, 301 P2d 241 (prosecution appeal of order on motion to strike in felony cases); People v Kirk (1992) 7 CA4th 855, 9 CR2d 270 (prosecution appeal of order on motion to strike in misdemeanor cases); People v Goodspeed (1963) 223 CA2d 146, 35 CR 743 (prosecution appeal of order granting writ of error coram nobis).

Tactics. Prosecutors should review a defendant's record of convictions when charging a case and add all appropriate prior convictions to the complaint. Pen C §969. See also Pen C §§667(f)(1), (g), 1170.12(d)(1), (e). Prosecutors trying cases should review each defendant's conviction record to see whether any convictions unavailable for enhancing the sentence or for making the defendant statutorily ineligible for probation can nonetheless be used to impeach the defendant, or as relevant evidence of another bad act that can be used to prove an element of the offense, such as intent or identity. Records of defense and prosecution witnesses should also be reviewed to see whether any prior convictions can be used to impeach.

Defense counsel should discover whether the client has any prior convictions and the details of those convictions. Because the charge, date, and manner of conviction are of great importance, practitioners should establish these facts through official records. Prosecution and defense witnesses are also vulnerable to impeachment with felony priors, so defense counsel should pursue discovery concerning the records of prosecution witnesses and secure the record of convictions of defense witnesses when it appears necessary.

Priors used to impeach. Prior felony convictions can be used to impeach any witness, including the defendant, when the prior involves moral turpitude. The trial judge must balance the probative value of the prior against its prejudicial effect, under Evid C §352. Evid C §788; People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 211 CR 719. The facts underlying other conduct involving moral turpitude may also be used to impeach, even if the conduct was charged as a misdemeanor or resulted in a misdemeanor conviction. People v Wheeler (1992) 4 C4th 284, 14 CR2d 418.

Evidence of other crimes used for nonimpeachment purposes. The prosecution may use a prior or an uncharged crime in its case-in-chief to prove specified issues like identity and intent. Evid C §1101. See, e.g., People v Whisenhunt (2008) 44 C4th 174, 204, 79 CR3d 125 (prior acts of child abuse admissible to show intent and absence of accident). Similarity of the crimes can result in an inference of guilt. People v Malone (1988) 47 C3d 1, 21, 252 CR 525. But a dissimilar crime may also be relevant when, for instance, the uncharged crime shows a motive. People v Daniels (1991) 52 C3d 815, 856, 277 CR 122. The general statutory prohibition on the use of character evidence to prove conduct on a particular occasion does not preclude such use. Evid C §1101(b). Evidence of similar acts may be used to establish a propensity to commit the charged crime in prosecutions for sex offenses, domestic violence, and abuse of a child or of an elder or dependent person. See Evid C §§1108-1109. See also People v Falsetta (1999) 21 C4th 903, 89 CR2d 847 (Evid C §1108 constitutional); People v Price (2004) 120 CA4th 224, 240, 15 CR3d 229 (Evid C §1109 constitutional).

Action	Deadline	Authority
Charge prior conviction that is element of offense or that elevates misdemeanor to felony.	In accusatory pleading before trial in misdemeanor case, or in felony case proceeding by way of indictment; before preliminary hearing in felony case proceeding by way of information.	See Pen C §§739, 1158; People v Casillas (2001) 92 CA4th 171, 111 CR2d 651.
Charge prior conviction that makes defendant ineligible for probation or that enhances state prison sentence.	When jury trial available, prior must be pleaded and proved before the trier of fact, before jury is discharged.	People v Tindall (2000) 24 C4th 767, 102 CR2d 533.
Prove prior conviction to determine suitability for probation in cases other than statutory ineligibility.	No need to charge prior; evidence introduced at sentencing.	Pen C §969a; see Levy v Superior Court (1973) 31 CA3d 427, 107 CR 384. See also People v Lo Cicero (1969) 71 C2d 1186, 1195 n10, 80 CR 913.
Disclose evidence of uncharged sex offense under Evid C §1108.	At least 30 days before trial absent good cause for disclosure to be denied, restricted, or deferred.	Pen C §1054.7; Evid C §1108(b).
Disclose evidence of uncharged acts of domestic violence or abuse of child or elder or dependent person under Evid C §1109.	At least 30 days before trial absent good cause for disclosure to be denied, restricted, or deferred.	Pen C §1054.7; Evid C §1109(b).
Challenge constitutionality of prior conviction in court where current case pending that charges prior (motion to strike prior).	Usually brought before trial, but can also be raised as in limine motion at trial, or at sentencing, if that right was reserved in trial court when plea was entered to prior.	In re Cortez (1971) 6 C3d 78, 87, 98 CR 307; Gonzalez v Municipal Court (1973) 32 CA3d 706, 710, 108 CR 612.
Challenge constitutionality of prior conviction in rendering court (writ of coram nobis or motion to vacate judgment).	As soon as possible after alleged error is discovered.	People v Hemphill (1968) 265 CA2d 156, 71 CR 397.
Challenge prior conviction used to impeach, or similar act of misconduct.	At trial either by in limine motion or as objection if counsel is surprised by testimony during trial.	See People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 211 CR 719.

III. USING PRIOR TO ELEVATE STATUS OF CRIME OR TO ENHANCE SENTENCE

A. What Qualifies as Prior in Charging and Sentencing

§24.3 1. When Prior Occurred; Effect of Appeal, Pronouncement of Judgment, Pen C §654, and Expungement

When a prior is used as an element of a charged crime to increase the seriousness of the crime or to increase the sentence, reference to the conviction as a prior requires that the "ascertainment of guilt, i.e., the verdict" (People v Johnson (1989) 210 CA3d 316, 324, 258 CR 347) or a guilty plea (People v Rhoads (1990) 221 CA3d 56, 270 CR 266) precede the date of commission of the current offense (see People v Flood (2003) 108 CA4th 504, 507, 133 CR2d 516). It is not necessary, however, that judgment be pronounced before the date of commission of the current offense (People v Kirk (2006) 141 CA4th 715, 721, 46 CR3d 258 (under Pen C §1000); People v Queen (2006) 141 CA4th 838, 46 CR3d 332; People v Milosavljevic (1997) 56 CA4th 811, 817, 65 CR2d 562); that any appeal of the conviction be completed (People v Hurley (1957) 155 CA2d 350, 352, 317 P2d 1003); or, unless the statutory language justifies it, that the prior crime be committed before the current crime (People v Baez (2008) 167 CA4th 197, 83 CR3d 895).

That a prior occurred before enactment of the enhancing statute does not prevent its use in enhancing a sentence as long as the current crime occurred after the enactment of the enhancing statute. People v Rivadeneira (1991) 232 CA3d 1416, 1420, 284 CR 75.

A prior stricken in the interests of justice at sentencing may still be used as an enhancement in a future case (People v Milosavljevic, supra), and although a prior stayed under Pen C §654 ordinarily may not be so used (People v Pearson (1986) 42 C3d 351, 361, 228 CR 509), such a prior may be used if the statutory scheme so provides (People v Benson (1998) 18 C4th 24, 30, 74 CR2d 294 (Three Strikes law)).

Under the statute's plain language, convictions expunged under Pen C §1203.4 qualify as priors in later prosecutions. People v Frawley (2000) 82 CA4th 784, 791, 98 CR2d 555; People v Diaz (1996) 41 CA4th 1424, 1430, 49 CR2d 252. So do convictions expunged under Welf & I C §1772. People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 256, 10 CR2d 636; People v Daniels (1996) 51 CA4th 520, 522, 59 CR2d 395; People v Jacob (1985) 174 CA3d 1166, 1172, 220 CR 520.

A felony conviction reduced at sentencing to a misdemeanor under Pen C §17 cannot thereafter be used as a felony prior. Pen C §§667(d)(1), 1170.12(b)(1) (Three Strikes law); People v Gilbreth (2007) 156 CA4th 53, 67 CR3d 10 (charge of felon with firearm); People v Camarillo (2000) 84 CA4th 1386, 1389, 101 CR2d 618 (DUI). Granting summary probation causes such a reduction. People v Glee (2000) 82 CA4th 99, 105, 97 CR2d 847. However, when a conviction is reduced to a misdemeanor under Pen C §17 at a time later than the initial sentencing, the conviction counts as a prior serious felony for Three Strikes purposes. People v Franklin (1997) 57 CA4th 68, 70, 66 CR2d 742.

A conviction in a case later dismissed under Pen C §1385 cannot be used as a prior. People v Barro (2001) 93 CA4th 62, 66, 112 CR2d 797.

A defendant's avoidance of another conviction (see, e.g., Veh C §23540) or of a conviction and prison incarceration (see, e.g., Pen C §667.5(b)) for a period of time specified by statute (the "wash-out" period) can make a prior unusable for some sentence-enhancing purposes. See, e.g., People v Fielder (2004) 114 CA4th 1221, 8 CR3d 247 (under Pen C §667.5). However, if the Legislature extends the time in which a prior may be used to enhance punishment, due process and ex post facto principles do not prevent the use of a prior suffered during the extension. People v Treadway (2008) 163 CA4th 689, 698, 77 CR3d 786.

Old convictions for some offenses involving marijuana may no longer qualify as priors as a result of Health & S C §§11361.5-11361.7. See, e.g., People v Price (1991) 1 C4th 324, 470, 3 CR2d 106 (inadmissible in aggravation in death penalty case). But see Cal Const art I, §28(f).

§24.4 2. Foreign Priors

Absent express limitations such as those discussed below, prior felony convictions include convictions that are felonies under the laws of the convicting jurisdiction, even if they are classified as misdemeanors in California. People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1038, 264 CR 386. See the following statutes:

- Penal Code §190.2(a)(2) permits the use as a special circumstance of any foreign conviction for an offense that would be murder in California. See People v Trevino (2001) 26 C4th 237, 109 CR2d 567.
- Penal Code §667(a)(1) allows a foreign conviction to be used as a serious felony prior when the record of conviction for the foreign offense shows conduct that qualifies as a serious felony in California. People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 691, 42 CR3d 899.
- Penal Code §§667(d)(2) and 1170.12(b)(2) allow a foreign conviction to be used as a prior respectively under Pen C §667(e) and §1170.12(c) (Three Strikes law is discussed in §§37.33-37.33E), as long as the offense could have been punished by imprisonment in California if committed in California. The record of conviction for the foreign prior must reflect conduct qualifying as a felony listed in either Pen C §667.5(c) or §1192.7(c). See People v McGee, supra; People v Fox (2001) 93 CA4th 394, 399, 112 CR2d 907 (Oregon sex molestation qualified as serious felony prior under Pen C §1192.7(c)(6), regardless of intent).
- Penal Code §667.5 specifies that a prior used under that section (prison prior) from a foreign jurisdiction must have been for a crime punishable by imprisonment in state prison under California law if committed in California. Pen C §667.5(f). The foreign offense must include all the elements of the California felony. Pen C §667.5(f). In addition, the defendant must have served 1 or more years in prison for the foreign offense. Pen C §667.5(f).
- Penal Code §668 limits use of a foreign conviction to enhance punishment (People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1038, 264 CR 386) to one for an offense that includes all the elements of a California crime (In re McVickers (1946) 29 C2d 264, 176 P2d 40) and which, if the crime were committed in California, could have been punished by imprisonment in state prison.

California courts may look to the entire record of the foreign conviction in determining whether the defendant's actual conduct in the foreign offense would constitute a crime under California law. People v Carter (2005) 36 C4th 1114, 1142, 32 CR3d 759 (giving retroactive effect to decision permitting use of entire record); People v Riel (2000) 22 C4th 1153, 1204, 96 CR2d 1. When the record fails to show the facts of the foreign crime, the court presumes the prior "was for the least offense punishable under the foreign law." People v Jenkins (2006) 140 CA4th 805, 810, 44 CR3d 788. But see People v Miles (2008) 43 C4th 1074, 1094 n14, 77 CR3d 270 ("least adjudicated elements" test). When it becomes necessary to establish the elements of a foreign crime, California courts look to the law of the foreign jurisdiction at the time of the foreign conviction (People v Maldonado (1986) 186 CA3d 863, 865 n1, 230 CR 925), and the way the foreign court would interpret that jurisdiction's law (People v Leever (1985) 173 CA3d 853, 873, 219 CR 581, disapproved on other grounds in People v Ervin (2000) 22 C4th 48, 91, 91 CR2d 623).

> Ø Note: Counsel must be careful to ascertain the elements of a foreign prior under the foreign law at the time of the defendant's prior crime. See, e.g., People v Rodriguez (2004) 122 CA4th 121, 130, 18 CR3d 550.

Whether it is a misdemeanor or not, a theft conviction can serve as the prior in a prosecution under Pen C §666 (petty theft with theft-related prior), even when it occurred outside of a California court. People v Perry (1962) 204 CA2d 201, 204, 22 CR 54. Some foreign drunk driving and vehicular manslaughter convictions can be used as priors in drunk driving cases. Veh C §23626. See, e.g., People v Palmer (2006) 142 CA4th 724, 47 CR3d 864 (Nevada priors okay, despite no right to jury trial, rejecting U.S. v Tighe (9th Cir 2001) 266 F3d 1187). But see People v Crane (2006) 142 CA4th 425, 48 CR3d 334 (record failed to qualify Colorado "driving while ability impaired" prior). A foreign felony that serves as the basis of a charge of possession of a firearm by a convicted felon (Pen C §12021(a)) need not be a crime in California. People v Shear (1999) 71 CA4th 278, 282, 83 CR2d 707. However, a foreign felony conviction reduced to a misdemeanor cannot be used as a predicate felony. People v Lewis (2008) 164 CA4th 533, 536, 78 CR3d

Neither state nor federal law requires a jury trial on an allegation of a foreign prior (People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 685, 42 CR3d 899) nor do they bar retrial of the foreign-prior allegation after an appellate court reverses for insufficiency of the evidence (People v Jenkins (2006) 140 CA4th 805, 813, 44 CR3d 788).

§24.5 3. Offenses by Juveniles

Juvenile court findings usually are not considered "convictions." For some purposes, a finding of wardship in the juvenile court, even if it results in incarceration, is not considered a "conviction," and so cannot be used as a prior. See, e.g., People v Lewis (2001) 26 C4th 334, 378, 110 CR2d 272 (prior violent juvenile misconduct cannot be used as a prior under Pen C §190.3(c) but is admissible as an aggravating factor under Pen C §190.3(b)); People v Westbrook (2002) 100 CA4th 378, 383, 122 CR2d 514 (Pen C §1210.1(b)(1) does not include juvenile priors); People v West (1984) 154 CA3d 100, 201 CR 63 (juvenile prior cannot be used under former Pen C §667(a) (now Pen C §667(a)(1)); In re Anthony R. (1984) 154 CA3d 772, 201 CR 299 (juvenile prior cannot be used under Pen C §666).

However, the conviction of a youthful defendant in adult court may be used as a Pen C §667(a)(1) prior even if the defendant was treated as a minor at sentencing and committed to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) (formerly California Youth Authority (CYA) (see Stats 2005, ch 10)). People v Shields (1991) 228 CA3d 1239, 1240, 279 CR 403. See Pen C §667.5(j). See also People v Level (2002) 97 CA4th 1208, 119 CR2d 551 (by failing to assert right to juvenile adjudication at time of prior conviction, defendant waived any right in subsequent prosecution to have prior treated as juvenile adjudication).

Ø Note: An honorable discharge from a DJJ facility under Welf & I C §1772 does not keep a conviction from being used to enhance punishment for a subsequent offense. Welf & I C §1772(b)(4).

Use of juvenile findings under the Three Strikes law. A juvenile adjudication of guilt of a crime can be used as a prior for enhancing a sentence under Pen C §§667(e) and 1170.12(c) in the following circumstances:

- The defendant was at least age 16 at the time of the crime (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(A), 1170.12(b)(3)(A));
- Welfare and Institutions Code §707(b), Pen C §667(d)(1) or (2), or Pen C §1170.12(b)(1) or (2) list the crime (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(B), 1170.12(b)(3)(B); see People v Garcia (1999) 21 C4th 1, 87 CR2d 114);
- In the juvenile court, the defendant was "found to be a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the juvenile court law" (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(C), 1170.12(b)(3)(C); see also People v Davis (1997) 15 C4th 1096, 1100, 64 CR2d 879 (minor need not expressly have been found fit));
- The defendant was adjudged a ward under Welf & I C §602 for a crime listed in Welf & I C §707(b) (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(D), 1170.12(b)(3)(D); see People v Garcia, supra); it is not sufficient that an offense merely included the elements of a listed crime (In re Jensen (2001) 92 CA4th 262, 111 CR2d 751).

Constitutionality. There is no constitutional ban on the use of a juvenile prior to enhance a sentence. People v Bowden (2002) 102 CA4th 387, 391, 125 CR2d 513. A juvenile prior may be used to enhance a sentence even though there is no right to a jury trial in juvenile proceedings. People v Nguyen (2009) 46 C4th 1007, 1014, 95 CR3d 615 (use of juvenile adjudication as prior conviction for strike purposes not precluded by Apprendi); People v Quiles (2009) 177 CA4th 612, 620, 99 CR3d 378.

Used to impeach. A juvenile adjudication, or evidence of prior conduct that involved a juvenile offense, is not admissible for purposes of impeachment if the juvenile adjudication was dismissed and the juvenile was honorably discharged from a DJJ facility under Welf & I C §1772. People v Jackson (1986) 177 CA3d 708, 712, 222 CR 470. If, however, no §1772 relief was obtained, the evidence is admissible for impeachment. People v Lee (1994) 28 CA4th 1724, 1738, 34 CR2d 723. See also discussion in §56.4.

Used as similar bad act. The prosecution may be able to use the defendant's actions in an earlier juvenile case to prove the current charge. See §§24.52-24.55.

Used in capital cases. In a capital murder case, the prosecutor may be able to use conduct underlying a juvenile prior under Pen C §190.3(b) as evidence of criminal activity involving the use, attempted use, or threat to use force or violence. People v Lewis, supra; People v Champion (1995) 9 C4th 879, 936, 39 CR2d 547; People v Frierson (1991) 53 C3d 730, 747, 280 CR 440; People v Burton (1989) 48 C3d 843, 862, 258 CR 184.

When adult committed to DJJ. When an adult is committed to the DJJ from the adult court following conviction of a felony that was a wobbler (see Note in §24.10), and is discharged, the offense is deemed a misdemeanor. Pen C §17(c). Case law has engrafted onto §17(c) the requirement that the DJJ discharge have been honorable. People v Goodner (1990) 226 CA3d 609, 616, 276 CR 542; People v Lassiter (1988) 202 CA3d 352, 355, 248 CR 320.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.6 4. No Jeopardy Attaches to Earlier Rulings on Priors; Pen C §654; Collateral Estoppel; Res Judicata

Double jeopardy. The trial of a prior does not place a defendant in jeopardy. People v Hernandez (1998) 19 C4th 835, 842-843, 80 CR2d 754. See also People v Norris (2002) 95 CA4th 475, 478, 115 CR2d 540 (court cannot "acquit" a defendant of prior). Thus, a prosecutor can allege a prior despite the fact that a jury in a previous case in which the prosecution alleged the same prior returned a finding that it was not true. People v Rice (1988) 200 CA3d 647, 653, 246 CR 177. A trial court can reconsider a decision that a charged prior does not apply. People v Hernandez, supra; People v Norris, supra. An appellate court may remand a case to the trial court for a new trial limited to proving up the prior conviction, even after reversing a true finding on the prior on the ground of insufficient evidence. People v Barragan (2004) 32 C4th 236, 9 CR3d 76; People v Morton (1953) 41 C2d 536, 541, 261 P2d 523; People v Jenkins (2006) 140 CA4th 805, 813, 44 CR3d 788 (foreign prior). On the remand, the prosecutor must adduce additional evidence to avoid the doctrine of law of the case, but the evidence need not be newly discovered. People v Barragan, supra.

Ø Note: The constitutionality of a drunk driving or driving on a suspended license prior as a rule may be litigated only once. Veh C §23624.

Penal Code §654. A conviction for which the sentence was stayed under §654 may not be used to enhance a future sentence unless the legislature explicitly provides for such use. People v Pearson (1986) 42 C3d 351, 361, 228 CR 509. However, the Three Strikes law explicitly provides that a conviction that meets other strike criteria can be charged as a strike despite a "stay of execution of sentence." Pen C §1170.12(b). Thus, a conviction stayed under §654 may be used as a strike. People v Benson (1998) 18 C4th 24, 74 CR2d 294. For further discussion of §654, see §§37.44-37.50.

Collateral estoppel; res judicata. A finding obtained by the defense in a previous prosecution of the unconstitutionality of a prior conviction may collaterally estop the prosecution from using the prior against the defendant in a current prosecution. People v Howie (1995) 41 CA4th 729, 734, 48 CR2d 505. If so, would a finding of the constitutionality of the prior in the previous prosecution collaterally estop the defendant's challenge to the prior in the current prosecution? See Veh C §23624, which provides for this estoppel concerning prior drunk driving convictions.

The court in Gutierrez v Superior Court (1994) 24 CA4th 153, 157, 29 CR2d 376, held that a defendant's right to a fair trial prevents the prosecution from asserting the collateral estoppel effect of a defendant's prior conviction for attempted murder on the issues of identity and intent in a subsequent trial for murder of the same victim. The Gutierrez court distinguished People v Ford (1966) 65 C2d 41, 50, 52 CR 228, which found no error in instructing a jury on felony murder principles, even though the defendant had not been arraigned on that theory, because the felony convictions obtained at the first trial, which were not overturned on appeal, had res judicata effect. Gutierrez v Superior Court (1994) 24 CA4th 153, 168, 29 CR2d 376. As a matter of policy, California courts do not apply res judicata to an appellate reversal of a prior for insufficient evidence. People v Barragan (2004) 32 C4th 236, 252, 9 CR3d 76 (resolving conflict between courts of appeal); In re Jorge G. (2004) 117 CA4th 931, 946, 12 CR3d 193.

B. How Priors May Be Used to Elevate Crime or Enhance Sentence

1. Using Priors in New Misdemeanor Prosecutions

§24.7 a. Enhancing Sentence

Priors in a misdemeanor case may enhance the sentence by lengthening custodial time, increasing monetary punishment, or both. See Pen C §§311.2(a), 311.4(a) (obscenity and pornography), §§374.3, 374.4, 374.7 (illegal dumping and littering), §415.5 (fighting and other proscribed conduct on school grounds), §593e(b) (unauthorized unscrambling of cable TV signals), §§626.6(a), 626.8(b) (disturbance of school peace), §654.3 (nonpermitted highway carriers of persons); Harb & N C §§655, 668 (drunk boating); Health & S C §11357(e)(2) (minor with marijuana at school); and Veh C §§23540, 23546, 23550 (drunk driving with priors).

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.8 b. Mandatory Minimum Jail or Prison Sentences

A finding of the truth of some priors means that the defendant must serve at least a certain amount of time in jail, even if placed on probation. See, e.g., Pen C §243(e)(3) (battery against persons with specified relationships to defendant), §273.5(g) (corporal injury inflicted on spouse or cohabitant), §415.5(b)-(c) (disturbing school peace), §647(b), (l) (prostitution); Veh C §§23542, 23548, 23552 (drunk driving with priors). Generally, the defendant can avoid the mandatory minimum only by persuading the court to strike the prior. These priors can be stricken either as invalid, or, when permitted, in the interests of justice. Pen C §1385, See also Pen C §§243(e)(3), 273.5(g) (court may elect not to impose mandatory minimum on stated crimes on finding of good cause).

Ø Note: On the use of priors that mandate a minimum sentence in driving under the influence cases, see §§55.31-55.35.

Prior convictions of Pen C §302 (disturbing religious meeting) and Pen C §403 (disturbing lawful meeting) require community service on subsequent convictions of Pen C §302. Pen C §302(c)-(d).

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.9 c. Drunk Driving Cases: License Restrictions; Notice to Convicting Court of New Case

In a drunk driving case, a prior conviction may result in restriction, suspension, or revocation of a defendant's driver's license, and mandatory enrollment in a drinking-driver education class. See Veh C §§23540-23552. In addition, on becoming aware through a Department of Motor Vehicles printout or other source that a defendant suffered a prior conviction of Veh C §23152 or §23153 within 10 years of the charged offense, the court of the defendant's current conviction must reveal the current conviction to the court that sentenced the defendant on the prior. Veh C §23622(c). As a result, if the defendant is still on probation on the prior, probation can be revoked or terminated as required by Veh C §23602.

Ø Note: These rules apply to persons with a California driver's license whether the prior occurred in California or out of state. Moomjian v Zolin (1993) 12 CA4th 1606, 1613, 16 CR2d 335.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.10 d. Elevation of Infraction to Misdemeanor; Diversion

Priors can elevate a crime that is ordinarily an infraction to a misdemeanor. For examples, see Pen C §602.8(b) (third trespass offense in certain situations); Pen C §653.1(e) (third offense involving certain lighter-than-air balloons); and Veh C §40000.28 (fourth Vehicle Code infraction within 12 months), discussed in §36.14.

Ø Note: For discussion of offenses that can be either infractions or misdemeanors, see §§6.32, 36.13-36.14. Prior convictions may make a defendant ineligible for diversion. See chap 27.

2. Using Priors in New Felony Prosecutions

§24.11 a. Priors That Make Innocent Acts Into Crimes

A prior can make what would otherwise be innocent activity a criminal act. See, e.g., Pen C §§12021 (ex-convict with gun), 12403.7 (ex-convict with tear gas). Even if the prior is declared unconstitutional, it can support the crime. People v Sanchez (1989) 211 CA3d 477, 479, 259 CR 294 (focus is not on reliability of prior; case involved Pen C §12021.1).

See discussion of the effect of expungement and other forms of relief from disabilities on such crimes in chap 41.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.12 b. Elevation of Misdemeanors to Felonies

Alleging a prior may allow a prosecutor to elevate an offense that would otherwise be a misdemeanor to a felony, with the concomitant possibility of a state prison sentence. Elevation to felony status can also lengthen the statute of limitations. See, e.g., People v Crabtree (2009) 169 CA4th 1293, 1309, 88 CR3d 41. For examples of offenses for which a prior may result in a subsequent felony prosecution, see Bus & P C §§2315, 6153 (cappers and runners), Pen C §§136.1(c)(3) (witness intimidation), 273(e) (illegal adoption payments), 273.6(d) (violation of order re domestic violence), 290.018(b) (failure to register as sex offender) (see People v Gonzalez (2007) 149 CA4th 304, 307, 56 CR3d 909 (straight felony)), 311.2(c), 311.3(d), 311.9, 311.11(b) (pornography), 314 (indecent exposure), 350(b) (counterfeit trademark), 476a(b) (small insufficient funds checks), 498(d) (theft of utility services), 647.6(c) (child molesting), 653f(d) (soliciting narcotics offense), 653h, 653s, 653u, 653w (theft of recorded media), 666 (petty theft) (but see Bradwell v Superior Court (2007) 156 CA4th 265, 67 CR3d 163 (prior Welf & I C §11483 welfare fraud conviction does not fit within Pen C §666)), 12025 (concealed firearm), 12031(a) (loaded gun in public place), 12072, 12101 (sale of firearm to prohibited class), 12304 (fixed ammunition), and Veh C §23550 (drunk driving with three priors).

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.13 c. Elevation of Wobblers to Straight Felonies

At times, a prior conviction may turn an offense that can be charged or punished as either a misdemeanor or a felony (see Pen C §17(b)) into a straight felony. Offenses that can be either felonies or misdemeanors are commonly referred to as "wobblers." See, e.g., People v Wilkinson (2004) 33 C4th 821, 830, 16 CR3d 420. Examples of wobblers are Pen C §§71, 76 (threatening school and public employees, officials, and judges), 311.9(b) (pornography), 314 (indecent exposure), and 337.7 (use of forged racing board credential).

The Three Strikes law does not have the effect of turning wobblers into straight felonies. People v Superior Court (Alvarez) (1997) 14 C4th 968, 979, 60 CR2d 93.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.14 d. Enhancing Sentence

In a felony prosecution, a prior conviction may increase the amount of a fine, lengthen a prison sentence or minimum prison term (see, e.g., People v Jefferson (1999) 21 C4th 86, 86 CR2d 893), or turn a murder into a capital crime (People v Hendricks (1987) 43 C3d 584, 238 CR 66).

Ø Note: A single prior may have multiple uses, although the prosecutor may have to elect a use in certain circumstances. See People v White Eagle (1996) 48 CA4th 1511, 56 CR2d 749. Also see §37.41.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.15 e. Denying Probation

Priors can make a defendant ineligible for probation. Examples are Pen C §§667(c)(2), (4) (any felony combined with one or more of the priors specified in §§667(d)) and 1170.12(a)(2), (4) (same for §1170.12(b)); 1203(k) (serious or violent felony while on felony probation); 1203.055(c) (crimes while on public transit); 1203.06(a)(2) (defendant previously convicted of a crime listed in §1203.06(a)(1), or assault with intent to commit murder under former §217, then convicted of subsequent felony during commission of which defendant was personally armed with firearm or was unlawfully armed at time of arrest for subsequent felony); 1203.08(a) (two or more designated felonies (see §1203.08(c)) within 10 years, exclusive of prison time); 1210.1(b)(1) (serious or violent felony within 5 years of current offense makes defendant ineligible for Proposition 36 probation and drug treatment) (see People v Superior Court (Martinez) (2002) 104 CA4th 692, 699, 128 CR2d 372); and Health & S C §11370 (certain narcotics offenses when defendant has prior narcotics conviction).

Ø Note: Penal Code §1203.07 has limited the trial court's discretion to strike a narcotics prior alleged under Health & S C §11370. Compare People v Neild (2002) 99 CA4th 1223, 1226, 121 CA2d 803, with People v Ruby (1988) 204 CA3d 462, 465, 251 CR 339.

Other priors make a defendant ineligible for probation except in unusual circumstances when the interests of justice would best be served by granting probation. Examples are Pen C §§115(c)(1) (recording forged documents), 1203(e)(4) (twice-convicted felons), 1203(e)(6) (crimes involving weapons or great bodily injury), and 1203.073(b)(8) (drug offenses).

California Rules of Court 4.413 and 4.414 provide criteria for exercising the discretion to grant or deny probation in such cases. When the court grants probation in Pen C §1203(e) cases, the court may have to include in the record a statement of the circumstances justifying probation. Pen C §1203(f) (also requires entry on minute order). In all other cases when the defendant is otherwise eligible for probation, the sentencing court should consider the defendant's priors in exercising its discretion to grant or deny probation. Cal Rules of Ct 4.414(b)(1). See the charts that list these offenses in §§37.52 (priors that make defendant ineligible for probation) and 37.53 (priors that restrict probation eligibility).

§24.16 f. Selecting Prison Term; Consecutive or Concurrent Sentence; Death Penalty

If probation is denied, a defendant's prior convictions are among the circumstances that help the sentencing court choose between low, middle, or high prison terms for the defendant. Cal Rules of Ct 4.421(b)(2) (circumstances in aggravation), 4.423(b)(1) (circumstances in mitigation). See also People v Searle (1989) 213 CA3d 1091, 1099, 261 CR 898 (three priors considered "numerous" within meaning of Rule 4.421(b)(2)). The court can also consider prior convictions in determining whether concurrent or consecutive sentences should be imposed for multiple crimes. Cal Rules of Ct 4.425(b).

The Three Strikes law (Pen C §§667(b)-(i), 1170.12, discussed in §§37.33-37.33E) requires the court to impose consecutive sentences on a defendant convicted of multiple felonies "not committed on the same occasion, and not arising from the same set of operative facts" (Pen C §§667(c)(6), 1170.12(a)(6)), if the defendant has a prior described in Pen C §§667(d), 1170.12(b).

Penal Code §190.3 requires the court to instruct the jury in the penalty phase of a capital murder case to consider, among other things, the presence or absence of (1) the defendant's criminal activity involving violence or the threat of violence (Pen C §190.3(b)) and (2) any prior felony convictions of the defendant (Pen C §190.3(c)), including those for nonviolent felonies (People v Abilez (2007) 41 C4th 472, 535, 61 CR3d 526). A single prior can be used for both purposes. People v DePriest (2007) 42 C4th 1, 59, 63 CR3d 896.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.17 g. Miscellaneous Consequences

A serious or violent felony prior within 5 years of the current crime precludes otherwise mandatory probation and drug treatment under Proposition 36. Pen C §1210.1(b)(1); People v Superior Court (Henkel) (2002) 98 CA4th 78, 119 CR2d 465. The Three Strikes law (see discussion in §§24.16, 37.33-37.33E) forbids commitment to the California Rehabilitation Center. Pen C §§667(c)(4), 1170.12(a)(4). They also limit good behavior and work credits on prison sentences to "one-fifth of the total term of imprisonment imposed" (Pen C §§667(c)(5), 1170.12(a)(5)) if the defendant has a prior described in Pen C §667(d) or §1170.12(b).

§24.18 1. Chart: When Priors Must Be Pleaded and Proved or Admitted in Felony Cases

California statutes generally require that pleading and proof or the defendant's admission of a prior conviction be used for most sentencing purposes in a felony case. See Pen C §§1025, 1158; People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 38 CR2d 347. The following chart indicates when pleading and proof are necessary, and at what stage in the proceedings.

Ø Note: The prosecution is not required to prove the priors when the defendant expressly waives the right to such pleading and proof on being advised of the consequences of the prior. See People v Myers (1984) 157 CA3d 1162, 1165, 204 CR 91.

§24.19 2. Decision on Whether to Charge

Penal Code §969 directs the prosecution to allege all the defendant's known prior convictions if required to be charged "by some other law" (In re Varnell (2003) 30 C4th 1132, 1141 n6, 135 CR2d 619), whether or not they occurred in California. See Pen Code §§667(f)-(g) (prosecutor must charge all serious or violent felonies not stricken or dismissed under Pen C §1385), 1170.12(d)-(e) (same). Practically speaking, if proof of the prior alters the court's sentencing discretion, then, as a rule, the prosecutor must formally plead and prove the prior using the procedures found in Pen C §§969, 969a, 969.5, 1025, 1093, and 1158. In re Varnell, supra; People v Lo Cicero (1969) 71 C2d 1186, 1192, 80 CR 913; see People v Bouzas (1991) 53 C3d 467, 479, 279 CR 847. If the prior does not deprive the court of its sentencing discretion, then the prosecutor need not allege it. People v Dorsch (1992) 3 CA4th 1346, 1351, 5 CR2d 327 (because Pen C §1203(e)(4) removes none of trial judge's options, priors are only "sentencing facts" that need not be pleaded and proved). See the chart in §24.18.

Ø Note: In exercising judicial sentencing discretion, a court should consider prior convictions even if they are not formally charged. See, e.g., People v Warner (1978) 20 C3d 678, 685, 143 CR 885.

Double jeopardy does not prevent a prosecutor from alleging and proving a prior that a jury in another case has found not true. People v Rice (1988) 200 CA3d 647, 653, 246 CR 177.

§24.20 3. How to Plead Prior

When a defendant has only one prior felony conviction, Pen C §969 permits the prosecution to charge it by stating the court in which the conviction occurred; the date of conviction does not need to be given. It is common, however, for the prosecutor to identify the crime of which the defendant was previously convicted, the court in which it occurred, and the date.

The defendant, before committing the offense charged in this _ _[complaint/information/indictment]_ _, was convicted of a _ _[misdemeanor/felony]_ _ _ _[state crime, e.g., motor vehicle theft]_ _, a violation of _ _[specify statute under which convicted]_ _, in _ _[specify court in which conviction was had]_ _, on _ _[date]_ _.

The prosecutor should also include in the charge any other facts that must be proved for effective use of the particular sentencing statute, e.g., in a case involving multiple defendants and an allegation of a prior under Pen C §667(a), the allegation could read as follows:

That the defendant _ _[name]_ _, before the commission of the offense charged herein, a serious felony within the meaning of Penal Code §667(a), namely, _ _[indicate category from list in Pen C §1192.7(c) (see People v Equarte (1986) 42 C3d 456, 466, 229 CR 116)]_ _, was, on or about _ _[date of prior judgment]_ _, in _ _[title of court in which defendant was convicted]_ _, convicted of a serious felony, namely, _ _[specify particular serious felony (see Pen C §1192.7(c))]_ _, under _ _[specify code section under which defendant was convicted, and, if appropriate, other criteria making prior a serious felony under §667(a) (see, e.g., People v Thomas (1986) 41 C3d 837, 843, 226 CR 107; People v Flynn (1995) 31 CA4th 1387, 37 CR2d 765)]_ _.

If, at the time of the initial filing of the pleading, time or circumstances do not allow the prosecutor to determine exactly how or under what charging section a prior should be pleaded, pleading in the simple language of §969 will suffice until the defendant specially demurs, at which time the prosecutor can insert more particulars. See People v Equarte, supra; People v Thomas, supra. A more serious problem arises if the prosecutor alleges the prior under the wrong charging section, misleading the defendant into believing that the consequences would be less than what they would be under a different charging section. See, e.g., People v Haskin (1992) 4 CA4th 1434, 7 CR2d 1 (prior admitted under Pen C §667.5(b), so Pen C §667(a) term unavailable); People v Rivadeneira (1991) 232 CA3d 1416, 1421, 284 CR 75 (§667.5(b) is not lesser included enhancement within Pen C §667(a)).

When the prior conviction is an element of the offense, as in Pen C §12021 (ex-con with a gun), the prosecutor must prove the prior at the preliminary hearing to be able to charge it in the information as an element of that crime. Levy v Superior Court (1973) 31 CA3d 427, 429, 107 CR 384. In addition, the prosecutor can be forced to elect one among several available prior convictions in proving a prior as an element of an offense. See People v Patino (1984) 160 CA3d 986, 993, 206 CR 762. But see U.S. v Lloyd (9th Cir 1992) 981 F2d 1071 (prosecutor need not elect if defendant will not stipulate to prior).

§24.21 4. Amending Pleading to Add Charge of Prior

Priors that must be charged in the accusatory pleading and proved at the preliminary hearing and at trial can be amended in the same way as the primary crime charged. See discussion in chap 7.

Amendments in felony cases can be made before both the magistrate and the superior court judge. See People v Superior Court (Alvarado) (1989) 207 CA3d 464, 255 CR 46 (certified plea from magistrate).

Before the defendant enters a plea, the prosecutor can amend without leave of the court; but after the plea is entered, the prosecutor must obtain leave of court to amend. Pen C §1009; People v Superior Court (Alvarado), supra.

In exercising its discretion on a proposed amendment, the court should not consider the effect of the prior on the sentence. People v Superior Court (Alvarado), supra.

On amendment, the defendant should be promptly arraigned on the new allegation. Pen C §§969a, 969.5, 1025. A jury waiver that is taken before the amendment is ineffective for the new allegation of a prior. People v Luick (1972) 24 CA3d 555, 558, 101 CR 252.

Amendments concerning priors to be used only at sentencing and not after the jury's discharge, when allowed, can be made at any time up to, but not after, the time of sentencing. Pen C §§969a, 969.5, 1025(b). See People v Tindall (2000) 24 C4th 767, 776, 102 CR2d 533; People v Martin (1978) 87 CA3d 573, 579, 151 CR 141.

Generally, prosecutors may move to dismiss prior convictions subject to the restrictions of Pen C §1192.7 (discussed in §8.6). The Three Strikes law (see §§37.33-37.33E), however, allows a prosecutor to move to dismiss or strike a Pen C §667(d) or §1170.12(b) prior only in furtherance of justice, or when the prosecutor does not have enough evidence to prove the prior (Pen C §§667(f)(2), (g), 1170.12(d)(2), (e)).

The Three Strikes law expressly permits the court, if satisfied regarding the lack of proof, or in furtherance of justice (People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 53 CR2d 789), to dismiss or strike the prior (Pen C §§667(f)(2), 1170.12(d)(2)). See People v Wallace (2004) 33 C4th 738, 747, 16 CR3d 96; People v Carmony (2004) 33 C4th 367, 378, 14 CR3d 880; People v Williams (1998) 17 C4th 148, 69 CR2d 917, on limits on "furtherance of justice" power. Compare People v Allan (1996) 49 CA4th 1507, 57 CR2d 269 (judge not allowed to unilaterally dismiss or strike prior on ground that prosecutor had no proof of prior at that time when district attorney expected proof later that day), and People v Ramos (1996) 47 CA4th 432, 55 CR2d 1, disapproved on other grounds in People v Fuhrman (1997) 16 C4th 930, 947 n11, 67 CR2d 1 (trial court abused its discretion by dismissing prior to secure defendant's guilty plea, without prosecutor's consent), with People v Cepeda (1996) 49 CA4th 1235, 57 CR2d 246 (trial court struck four priors as part of plea bargain; plea bargain upheld, but case remanded for trial court to clarify record under either Pen C §1385 or §667(f)). See also People v Strong (2001) 87 CA4th 328, 104 CR2d 490 (abuse of discretion for trial court to dismiss "strike" prior as outside the character of the Three Strikes law when defendant had 22-year criminal record, including several recent felonies).

In furtherance of justice in a multiple count case, dismissal of a prior need not apply to all counts. People v Garcia (1999) 20 C4th 490, 85 CR2d 280. Dismissal of a prior in furtherance of justice does not affect the prior's use in another case. People v Ortega (2000) 84 CA4th 659, 101 CR2d 253.

Ø Note: When the prosecutor can use priors in a plea bargain, an agreement not to charge priors does not imply that they may not be used to aggravate the sentence. People v Haney (1989) 207 CA3d 1034, 255 CR 276.

§24.23 D. Confessing Prior

If a defendant denies a prior, or if the prior is an element of the crime, it must be proved. Otherwise, the court ordinarily cannot inform the jury of the prior. Pen C §1025. See People v Bouzas (1991) 53 C3d 467, 279 CR 847 (petty theft with prior (Pen C §666)); People v Young (1991) 234 CA3d 111, 285 CR 583 (vehicle theft with vehicle theft prior (Pen C §666.5)). An exception arises when the prior is allowed as evidence for some other purpose, such as impeachment of the defendant as a witness (Evid C §788) or to show other misconduct (Evid C §1101(b); Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook §§35.19-35.20 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009). But see People v Vichroy (1999) 76 CA4th 92, 90 CR2d 105 (jury instruction held unconstitutional for allowing jurors to infer guilt in charged offense from evidence of guilt in priors).

The defendant's admission of a prior is conclusive in all subsequent proceedings of the fact that the defendant suffered the conviction, and cannot be withdrawn without the court's consent. Pen C §1025. The defendant can, however, reserve a challenge against the use made of the admitted prior if the prosecutor agrees. People v Calio (1986) 42 C3d 639, 230 CR 137; People v Crowson (1983) 33 C3d 623, 628 n3, 190 CR 165. The defendant can also concede the fact of imprisonment while reserving the question of the legality of the prior for later determination by the trial court in the event of a conviction. People v Trujillo (1984) 154 CA3d 1077, 1091, 202 CR 832.

> Ø Note: Defense counsel must carefully check priors to be sure they are valid before advising a defendant to admit to them. See People v Plager (1987) 196 CA3d 1537, 1542, 242 CR 624 (defense counsel incompetent for advising defendant to admit to priors that prosecution would not have been able to prove were serious felonies).

When a prior results in a sentence enhancement, the trial court can impose or strike the enhancement unless the law limits discretion. People v Harvey (1991) 233 CA3d 1206, 1231, 285 CR 158. The court may not stay imposition of sentence on an enhancement and may not impose only a portion of the sentence on the enhancement. People v Harvey, supra. For further discussion of striking priors, see §§24.42-24.43.

For discussion of what constitutes a valid admission of a prior, see §§26.7-26.22.

E. Trying Prior

§24.24 1. Speedy Trial Rules; Court or Jury Trial

The same speedy trial limits that apply to the underlying charges in a case also apply to trial of a prior conviction required to be proved to a jury. People v Martin (1978) 87 CA3d 573, 151 CR 141; People v Huff (1975) 46 CA3d 361, 120 CR 210.

There is no California or federal constitutional right to a jury trial on a prior (People v Mosby (2004) 33 C4th 353, 360, 15 CR3d 262), including a foreign prior (People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 685, 42 CR3d 899). Although the Sixth Amendment requires jury trials for certain sentence enhancements, this right does not extend to an enhancement based on a prior. People v Jefferson (2007) 154 CA4th 1381, 1386, 65 CR3d 607. See discussion in §§37.1A, 37.11. The sentencing statute establishes whether the defendant is entitled to a jury trial on a prior.

When a defendant has a right to a trial on a prior conviction, including a Pen C §667.5 prison prior (see People v Thomas (2001) 91 CA4th 212, 222, 110 CR2d 571), this right is generally limited to the factual validity (truth) of the prior. Pen C §1025(b)-(c); People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 87 CR2d 674. The statute requires only a court trial on whether the defendant is the same person who suffered the conviction (Pen C §1025(c)), whether a prior conviction of a serious felony under Pen C §667(a)(1) was brought and tried separately (People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 38 CR2d 347), and whether a particular statute authorizes using the prior (People v Kelii, supra (Three Strikes law)). Under Pen C §1025(c), the court tries the issue of the defendant's identity on the prior without the jury, leaving a minimal trial for the jury. See People v Epps (2001) 25 C4th 19, 104 CR2d 572. A jury's single finding of the fact of a conviction can support use of the same prior under multiple alleged enhancement provisions (People v Williams (2002) 99 CA4th 696, 700, 121 CR2d 464) and on multiple counts in a Three Strikes case (People v Morales (2003) 106 CA4th 445, 455, 130 CR2d 800). Challenges to aspects of the prior that do not require a jury trial may be made at any time before sentencing if the prior concerns only sentencing. See §24.18.

A waiver of the right to a jury trial on the prior also waives a jury on whether the current offense is a serious felony for purposes of sentencing under Pen C §667(a). People v Arnett (2006) 139 CA4th 1609, 44 CR3d 206.

2. Unification Versus Bifurcation

§24.25 a. When Priors That Must Be Proved to Jury Can and Cannot Be Tried Separately From Current Offense; Conditional Bifurcation

When a prior is an element of the current offense, the defendant cannot prevent the jury from learning of its existence during the guilt phase of the trial even by stipulating to it. Cal Const art I, §28(f). See People v Valentine (1986) 42 C3d 170, 181, 228 CR 25. A felony prior that is an element of the offense must be presented to the jury. People v Bouzas (1991) 53 C3d 467, 478, 279 CR 847. However, when the defendant stipulates to the prior felony conviction, evidence of the nature of the prior must be withheld from jurors. People v Sapp (2003) 31 C4th 240, 260, 2 CR3d 554; People v Valentine, supra.

Ø Note: In a prosecution for being a convicted felon in possession of a firearm (see Pen C §12021), the prior is an element of the offense. People v Valentine, supra. In a prosecution for petty theft with a prior (see Pen C §666), the prior is not an element of the offense. People v Bouzas, supra. See also People v Ramon (2009) 175 CA4th 843, 96 CR3d 459 (Pen C §12031(a)(2)).

When a prior is not an element of the offense but instead a sentencing matter, the defendant may stipulate to the prior and preclude the jury from learning of the fact of the prior conviction. See People v Calderon (1994) 9 C4th 69, 36 CR2d 333; People v Bouzas, supra. If a defendant denies the allegation of such a prior, the question whether the defendant has suffered the prior conviction must be tried to a jury. Pen C §1025. The trial court has discretion to grant the defendant a bifurcated trial but is not required to do so. Calderon, 9 C4th at 71 (overruling People v Bracamonte (1981) 119 CA3d 644, 174 CR 191, on this issue). The trial court should generally order bifurcation unless the jury will likely learn of the prior sometime before returning a verdict. People v Calderon, supra. An initial ruling in favor of bifurcation can be reconsidered at appropriate stages of the trial. If the prosecution can use the prior to impeach the defendant's testimony (see §§24.45-24.51), the trial court may order conditional bifurcation on the basis of whether or not the defendant testifies in front of the jury. People v Burch (2007) 148 CA4th 862, 866, 55 CR3d 892. The defendant can waive jury for only the prior when the trial is bifurcated. During a bifurcated jury trial, jurors first hear evidence and reach a verdict on the current offense. If the defendant is found guilty, the jurors then hear evidence on the prior. People v Bracamonte, supra.

When the bifurcated procedure is followed, jeopardy does not prevent the prosecution from trying the defendant on the prior if the jury is prematurely discharged before it considers the prior, unless the defendant timely objects to the discharge of the jury. People v Saunders (1993) 5 C4th 580, 20 CR2d 638. A chart showing which priors may be bifurcated and which may not is in §24.26.

When a prior murder conviction is charged as a special circumstance in a capital case, Pen C §190.1(b) requires bifurcation of the trial of the special circumstance from the trial on guilt. See Curl v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 1292, 1301, 276 CR 49.

The prosecution's burden of proof on the fact of conviction of a charged prior is beyond a reasonable doubt. People v Jones (1995) 37 CA4th 1312, 44 CR2d 552 (waiver forms insufficient). In meeting this burden, the prosecution can rely on the defendant's testimony in the trial of the current offense. People v Elmore (1990) 225 CA3d 953, 960, 275 CR 315. The prosecutor must prove each "element" of a prior. People v Winslow (1995) 40 CA4th 680, 46 CR2d 901.

Proof of a prior consists of official documents; witnesses cannot testify about the facts of the prior crimes. People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 87 CR2d 674. In determining the truth of a prior-conviction allegation, the trier of fact may look to the entire record of the conviction (People v Guerrero (1988) 44 C3d 343, 243 CR 688) but no further (People v Trujillo (2006) 40 C4th 165, 180, 51 CR3d 718). The entire record includes all relevant documents in the court file of the prior conviction (People v Castellanos (1990) 219 CA3d 1163, 1172, 269 CR 93), including the trial transcript (People v Bartow (1996) 46 CA4th 1573, 54 CR2d 482), the appellate record, including the defendant's guilty plea (People v Sohal (1997) 53 CA4th 911, 62 CR2d 110), and the appellate court opinion (People v Woodell (1998) 17 C4th 448, 71 CR2d 241; People v Harbolt (1997) 61 CA4th 123, 71 CR2d 459). See also People v Johnson (1991) 233 CA3d 1541, 1545, 285 CR 394 (Nevada prior); People v Reynolds (1989) 211 CA3d 382, 388, 259 CR 352 (Oregon prior). The record also includes the preliminary hearing transcript, but the witness's testimony there must satisfy Evid C §1291. People v Reed (1996) 13 C4th 217, 52 CR2d 106; People v Gonzales (2005) 131 CA4th 767, 32 CR3d 172. The record does not include a defendant's statements, made after the defendant's plea of guilty has been accepted, that appear in a probation officer's report. People v Trujillo (2006) 40 C4th 165, 179, 51 CR3d 718.

The prosecutor can, by supplying sufficient notice and information (Evid C §453), require the court to take judicial notice of certain facts in its own or any other court's records. People v Bowen (1971) 22 CA3d 267, 286, 99 CR 498 (court's own records); Evid C §452(d) (another court's records). When the prior comes from a different jurisdiction, the prosecution can introduce certified copies of the court records. People v Brucker (1983) 148 CA3d 230, 241, 195 CR 808. See Evid C §§1530-1531. Legible (see People v Ruiz (1999) 69 CA4th 1085, 1090, 82 CR2d 139) certified copies of prison records (Pen C §969b), rap sheets (People v Martinez (2000) 22 C4th 106, 91 CR2d 687; People v Morris (2008) 166 CA4th 363, 367, 83 CR3d 253), preliminary hearing transcripts (People v Gonzales (2005) 131 CA4th 767, 775, 32 CR3d 172), and DMV printouts (Veh C §23622(b)) are admissible to prove priors.

> Ø Note: Materials in the record remain subject to the usual evidentiary objections, including hearsay. People v Reed, supra; People v Thoma (2007) 150 CA4th 1096, 58 CR3d 855; In re Cruse (2003) 110 CA4th 1495, 1500, 2 CR3d 548. Constitutional objections may also lie. Shepard v U.S. (2005) 544 US 13, 16, 161 L Ed 2d 205, 125 S Ct 1254, held that in evaluating the nature of a prior under 18 USC §924(e), the sentencing court is limited to the statutory definition of the offense, the charging document, a written plea agreement, a colloquy on the record in which the accused affirmed the factual basis for the plea, and an explicit factual finding by the judge to which the accused has assented. Four justices said that going beyond those materials would create "serious risks of unconstitutionality" (544 US at 25, 161 L Ed 2d at 217), and a fifth justice said it "would give rise to constitutional error" (544 US at 28, 161 L Ed 2d at 219 (Thomas, J., concurring in part and in the judgment)). In rejecting constitutional objections to the use of the transcript of a Nevada preliminary hearing as evidence of the nature of a foreign prior, the supreme court in People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 707, 42 CR3d 899, observed that Shepard was decided on federal statutory rather than constitutional grounds. See also People v Morris, supra (CLETS rap sheet not testimonial hearsay); People v Gonzales (2005) 131 CA4th 767, 772, 32 CR3d 172 (no Confrontation Clause violation for use of preliminary hearing transcript); People v Taulton (2005) 129 CA4th 1218, 1222, 29 CR3d 203 (same for Pen C §969b records).

Evidence of the commission of the crime cannot increase the degree of the prior. People v Maestas (2006) 143 CA4th 247, 48 CR3d 846 (plea to second-degree burglary trumped first-degree evidence).

For some sentence enhancements, the prosecutor must prove that a prior resulted in the defendant's incarceration. For instance, Pen C §667.5 requires proof that the defendant served a "prior separate prison term" (Pen C §667.5(a):

3-year term; Pen C §667.5(b): 1-year term), and Pen C §666 requires proof of incarceration, i.e., actual jail confinement (People v Cortez (1994) 24 CA4th 510, 29 CR2d 445), in connection with the prior conviction in a prosecution for petty theft with a prior. In such cases, Pen C §969b permits the prosecutor to use certified copies of records of the penal institution to establish prima facie evidence of the fact of the conviction and service of the penal term. See People v Haney (1994) 26 CA4th 472, 31 CR2d 547.

Evidence that the defendant was committed to prison on the prior raises a presumption that the defendant completed the prison term (People v Tenner (1993) 6 C4th 559, 24 CR2d 840), but not that the defendant served a specific term (People v Gamble (1996) 48 CA4th 576, 55 CR2d 721).

For purposes of a prior conviction alleged under §667.5, both commitment to the State Department of Health as a mentally disordered sex offender for at least a year following a felony conviction and incarceration in a Division of Juvenile Justice facility qualify as prison terms. Pen C §667.5(i)-(j).

F. Challenging Prior

§24.28 1. Differences Between Challenging Constitutionality and Other Challenges to Use of Prior Conviction

The trial court decides a constitutional challenge to a prior conviction. By contrast, a defendant who challenges the factual validity (truth) of a prior conviction has the right to a jury trial. Pen C §1025.

A defendant, however, does not have either a state or a federal constitutional right to a jury trial on a prior that has been alleged as a sentence enhancement. People v Vera (1997) 15 C4th 269, 277, 62 CR2d 754. Rather, the right to a jury trial to test the factual validity (truth) of a prior conviction is determined by statute. Pen C §§1025, 1158; In re Taylor (2001) 88 CA4th 1100, 1109, 106 CR2d 454. See Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 490, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 455, 120 S Ct 2348 (exempting "fact of a prior conviction" from constitutional right to jury trial). Section 1025 limits the jury's role to determining the authenticity of the documents used to show that the defendant suffered a prior alleged for sentencing purposes. People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 458, 87 CR2d 674. When relevant for purposes of sentencing allegations, the court rather than the jury determines whether priors were "brought and tried separately" (People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 589, 38 CR2d 347) and whether a prior is a "serious felony" (People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 454, 87 CR2d 674).

Challenges to other aspects of the prior, e.g., that the defendant did not serve a separate prison term on the prior or that the prior is not from a specified list, can be made any time before sentencing if the challenge concerns only sentencing. See §24.18.

For further discussion of constitutional challenges to priors, see §§24.30-24.39, 26.10, 26.13-26.17.

§24.29 2. Challenging Truth or Use of Prior Conviction

The truth of a prior conviction used to enhance punishment for a current misdemeanor or felony offense is determined by the trier of fact. Whether a prior constitutes a serious felony for sentencing under the Three Strikes law is to be determined by the court, not the jury. People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 87 CR2d 674. For a discussion of when priors may and must be proved to the jury, see §24.25. When priors listed in the probation report are properly raised only to influence sentencing discretion, the court need make no finding regarding their truth (People v Dorsch (1992) 3 CA4th 1346, 1351, 5 CR2d 327) unless the defendant challenges them.

Defendants can challenge the use of prior convictions on the ground that they do not meet the criteria of the statute under which they are charged. It is the judge, not the jury, who determines whether the statutory requirements have been met. People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 583, 38 CR2d 347. See People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 695, 42 CR3d 899.

Ø Example: The definition of serious felony in Pen C §1192.7(c)(28) does not include a misdemeanor that was punished as a felony under the alternate penalty provision of Pen C §186.22(d). People v Ulloa (2009) 175 CA4th 405, 408, 95 CR3d 905.

Ø Example: A prior conviction charged under Pen C §667.5 must have involved a prior separate prison term, served during the last 5 (any felony) or 10 (violent felony) years. A defendant can challenge a prior felony conviction charged under §667.5 if he or she did not go to prison on the prior or did not serve a separate prison term on that prior.

Ø Example: In People v Deay (1987) 194 CA3d 280, 290, 239 CR 406, two enhancements were reduced to one because the two prior convictions alleged had not been separately brought and tried as required by Pen C §667.

Ø Example: Multiple enhancements under §667.5 for prior prison terms may be challenged if the defendant served only one continuous period of incarceration even if he or she was serving concurrent or consecutive terms in separate prosecutions. People v Smith (1985) 166 CA3d 1003, 1010, 212 CR 737; People v James (1980) 102 CA3d 728, 732, 162 CR 548; People v Burke (1980) 102 CA3d 932, 942, 163 CR 4.

Ø Example: A sentence cannot be enhanced with a prior conviction in which sentence was stayed under Pen C §654. People v Pearson (1986) 42 C3d 351, 361, 228 CR 509. But see People v Haney (1994) 26 CA4th 472, 477, 31 CR2d 547 (merger of priors for sentencing).

Similarly, convictions in other states may be challenged if they do not meet California requirements. See People v Curtis (1969) 70 C2d 347, 359, 74 CR 713; In re McVickers (1946) 29 C2d 264, 279, 176 P2d 40.

A defendant may also challenge a prior conviction on the ground that he or she was not convicted of that prior. See People v Morton (1953) 41 C2d 536, 544, 261 P2d 523; People v Garcia (1970) 4 CA3d 904, 911, 84 CR 624. This challenge puts the prosecution to its proof, and the prosecutor must present admissible evidence to prove the prior. People v Jones (1995) 37 CA4th 1312, 1316, 44 CR2d 552 (waivers on guilty plea forms were insufficient to prove prior convictions; no proof that guilty plea entered). But see People v Martinez (2000) 22 C4th 106, 91 CR2d 687 (uncertified rap sheets admissible to prove prior). For further discussion, see §24.27. The trier of fact must make an express oral finding on the truth of the prior. Pen C §1158. A silent record operates as a finding that the prior was not true. People v Mesa (1975) 14 C3d 466, 471, 121 CR 473; People v Anthony (1986) 185 CA3d 1114, 1125, 230 CR 268.

A prior conviction stayed in the original case because of Pen C §654 cannot be used (People v Pearson (1986) 42 C3d 351, 228 CR 509), but a prior conviction that was stayed in the original case as part of the judge's sentencing discretion, unrelated to §654, can be used (People v Milosavljevic (1997) 56 CA4th 811, 817, 65 CR2d 562). When the defendant has not waived a jury trial, and the jury is discharged before making a finding on the truth of the prior, double jeopardy bars retrial of the defendant on the prior only if the defendant has timely objected to the discharge. People v

Saunders (1993) 5 C4th 580, 590, 20 CR2d 638. See also People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1529, 86 CR2d 134 (prior stricken in plea bargain can be used as enhancement even though never admitted or proved in prior proceeding).

For discussion of unification or bifurcation of trial concerning the allegation of a prior conviction, see §§24.25-24.26.

3. Challenging Constitutionality of Prior Conviction

a. Grounds for Challenging Constitutionality of Prior

§24.30 (1) Summary of Grounds

A defendant may challenge any constitutional defect in a prior conviction. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 918, 206 CR 707. A defendant may collaterally challenge Gideon error in a prior conviction through a motion to strike, usually made before trial. In a noncapital case, the defense has no right to collaterally challenge a prior on the ground of ineffective assistance of counsel. Garcia v Superior Court (1997) 14 C4th 953, 963, 59 CR2d 858 (opinion based on Custis v U.S. (1994) 511 US 485, 128 L Ed 2d 517, 114 S Ct 1732). Garcia did not address collateral attacks on grounds other than ineffective assistance of counsel.

The rule is different in capital cases. If the current prosecution is a capital case, collateral constitutional challenges are allowed to challenge any fundamental constitutional error, and may be made before trial. People v Horton (1995) 11 C4th 1068, 1134, 47 CR2d 516.

The most common grounds for challenging prior convictions under Sumstine are these:

- Inadequate showing that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his or her Boykin-Tahl rights when a plea of guilty or no contest was entered. See §§26.10-26.17.
- Denial of the right to counsel and inadequate assistance of counsel. See People v Sumstine, supra.

Counsel may also consider constitutional challenges based on double jeopardy, prosecutorial misconduct in withholding exculpatory evidence, and extrinsic evidence (such as medication, injury, or coercion) rendering a plea involuntary.

Ø Note: Defense counsel should carefully review the files of convictions that are alleged as priors. One federal court, in Cook v Lynaugh (5th Cir 1987) 821 F2d 1072, 1078, found prejudicial ineffective assistance of counsel because defense counsel failed to investigate whether the defendant was assisted by competent counsel on an enhancing prior. The court found that the facts of the case would have alerted a reasonably competent attorney to the need to investigate.

(2) Boykin-Tahl Challenges to Prior Convictions Based on Guilty Pleas

§24.31 (a) Boykin-Tahl Advisements Required for Both Felony and Misdemeanor Pleas

Defendants in misdemeanor and felony cases (see Mills v Municipal Court (1973) 10 C3d 288, 291, 110 CR 329) must be informed of, understand, and explicitly waive their constitutional privilege against compulsory self-incrimination, right to counsel and to trial by jury, and right to confront accusers before entering a valid plea of guilty. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 914, 206 CR 707; Boykin v Alabama (1969) 395 US 238, 242, 23 L Ed 2d 274, 279, 89 S Ct 1709; In re Tahl (1969) 1 C3d 122, 132, 81 CR 577.

Ø Note: Motions to strike a prior felony conviction based on a failure to advise on Boykin-Tahl rights are limited to guilty pleas that occurred after November 7, 1969. People v Allen (1999) 21 C4th 424, 443, 87 CR2d 682.

For further discussion of advice and waiver on entering a plea of guilty or no contest, see §§26.10-26.17.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.32 (b) Alleging Denial of Boykin-Tahl Rights Sufficient to Challenge Allegation of Prior Conviction

To challenge denial of Boykin-Tahl rights, defense counsel must obtain a copy of the docket or minute order of a plea, and any written waiver of rights signed by the defendant that concerns the prior. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 914, 206 CR 707. Defense counsel must also show that the prior conviction occurred after November 7, 1969. People v Allen (1999) 21 C4th 424, 443, 87 CR2d 682. This must be done in time for the motion to be prepared and heard before trial begins. The trial court is not required to grant a continuance to the defense during trial to obtain the transcripts of prior convictions. People v Vallejo (1991) 1 CA4th 760, 763, 2 CR2d 413.

If the record indicates that the proceedings were reported, counsel must also obtain a copy of the transcript. People v Sumstine, supra. The docket and minute order and written waiver can be obtained from the court in which the prior occurred. In some courts, transcripts of guilty pleas are in the court file, particularly if the conviction was appealed. If not, the court reporter must be personally contacted for a copy of the transcript. Some court reporters will agree to read the tape over the phone so that counsel can decide whether to send for it. Because it may take as long as a month or more to obtain the documents, defense counsel should request them as early as possible so that there is time to notice and hold a hearing before trial.

Actual denial of one or more Boykin-Tahl rights must be alleged to prevail on a motion to strike. The defendant cannot rely solely on a silent record to show a failure to give the Boykin-Tahl advisements. Even if the transcript of the plea to the prior shows no advisements, the defendant must affirmatively allege that he or she was not aware of and did not waive the Boykin-Tahl rights. People v Sumstine, supra.

Placing the burden of proving constitutional error in a prior conviction on the defendant does not violate due process. Parke v Raley (1992) 506 US 20, 121 L Ed 2d 391, 113 S Ct 517. The defendant can meet this burden by testifying or by producing an affidavit or declaration signed under penalty of perjury, regarding the defect.

Either side may introduce a reporter's transcript of the plea; transcripts are the preferred evidence. See Youkhanna v Municipal Court (1978) 86 CA3d 612, 615, 150 CR 380, disapproved on other grounds in People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 923 n9, 206 CR 707; Ganyo v Municipal Court (1978) 80 CA3d 522, 529, 145 CR 636. If no transcript exists, but a minute order might exist, it could be used to demonstrate lack of advisement or waiver. See, e.g., Youkhanna v Municipal Court, supra (docket sheet minute order entries that did not record defendant's express and explicit waivers were inadequate); Stewart v Justice Court (1977) 74 CA3d 607, 611, 141 CR 589 (same). Docket entries by the clerk recording the defendant's answers of yes and no to specific questions from the judge regarding advisement and waiver, however, are sufficient to uphold a prior misdemeanor conviction against a Boykin-Tahl challenge. People v Anderson (1991) 1 CA4th 318, 322, 1 CR2d 676; Ganyo v Municipal Court, supra.

A trial judge's testimony on his or her regular habit and custom of advising defendants of their constitutional rights can be used to establish proper advisement of rights. Curl v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 1292, 1297 n1, 276 CR 49. A judge's habit and custom, however, cannot be used to establish a defendant's waiver of rights. Stewart v Justice Court (1977) 74 CA3d 607, 612, 141 CR 589.

§24.33 (3) Other Constitutional Challenges to Convictions Based on Guilty Pleas

A defendant must be advised of the nature of the charge against him or her before pleading guilty. Henderson v Morgan (1976) 426 US 637, 645, 49 L Ed 2d 108, 114, 96 S Ct 2253. See also In re Tahl (1969) 1 C3d 122, 132, 81 CR 577. When a defendant is represented by counsel, however, unless the record shows otherwise, it may be presumed that defense counsel explained the nature of the offense in sufficient detail to give the accused notice of the charges. Henderson v Morgan (1976) 426 US 637, 647, 49 L Ed 2d 108, 115, 96 S Ct 2253.

The defendant need not be advised of the possible defenses to understand the nature of the charge against him or her. People v Kunkel (1985) 176 CA3d 46, 53, 221 CR 359. Nonetheless, the defendant may be able to mount a constitutional challenge to a prior conviction based on a plea on the ground that he or she was not sufficiently advised of the nature of the offense to which he or she pleaded guilty. Henderson v Morgan, supra. But see People v Weaver (2001) 26 C4th 876, 922, 111 CR2d 2 (Boykin-Tahl rights inapplicable to extrajudicial confession); Murtishaw v Woodford (9th Cir 2001) 255 F3d 926 (Boykin-Tahl inquiry by trial court not required after NGI (not guilty by reason of insanity) plea).

For further discussion, see §§26.10-26.17.

§24.34 (4) Challenges to Prior Convictions Based on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel

In capital cases, defendants can collaterally attack the ineffective assistance of counsel in a prior conviction through a pretrial motion to strike. People v Horton (1995) 11 C4th 1068, 1134, 47 CR2d 516. However, in noncapital cases, a defendant does not have either a federal or state constitutional right to collaterally attack a prior conviction based on ineffective assistance of counsel. Garcia v Superior Court (1997) 14 C4th 953, 963, 59 CR2d 858. See §24.30.

To prove ineffective assistance of counsel, the defendant must show that:

- Counsel failed to act in a manner to be expected of a reasonably competent attorney acting as a diligent advocate; and
- Defendant was prejudiced, i.e., but for counsel's incompetence the result of the proceedings would have been different.

People v Ledesma (1987) 43 C3d 171, 217, 233 CR 404; Strickland v Washington (1984) 466 US 668, 689, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 694, 104 S Ct 2052.

A motion alleging ineffective assistance of counsel should be accompanied by declarations of the defendant, attorney, or whoever is necessary to clearly allege the incompetence and resulting prejudice. See chap 18 for further discussion of preparing pretrial motions. For further discussion of ineffective assistance of counsel, see 5 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law, Criminal Trial §§199-228 (3d ed 2000).

b. Procedures for Challenging Constitutionality of Prior

§24.35 (1) Summary of Procedures

Although the parties have the right to a jury trial on the factual validity or truth of a prior, neither party is entitled to have the jury decide the constitutional validity of a prior. The constitutional validity of a prior is decided by the court as a matter of law. Curl v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 1292, 1301, 276 CR 49; People v Curl (2009) 46 C4th 339, 350, 93 CR3d 537 (neither Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 490, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 455, 120 S Ct 2348, nor Ring v Arizona (2002) 536 US 584, 153 L Ed 2d 556, 122 S Ct 2428, superseded or implicitly overruled Curl v Superior Court).

A defendant can challenge the constitutional validity of a prior conviction by a motion to strike (if in the court in which a pending case alleges that prior conviction), or by a petition for coram nobis or habeas corpus (if in the court in which the prior conviction was originally rendered). See §24.38.

The effect of a ruling is quite different in each situation. If the court in which the prior conviction is currently alleged finds it unconstitutional, the prior must be stricken from the accusatory pleading and cannot be used to enhance or aggravate punishment. Such a ruling does not vacate the underlying judgment of conviction. Cal Const art XIIIA; People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 920, 206 CR 707; Gonzales v State (1977) 68 CA3d 621, 633, 137 CR 681. By contrast, if the rendering court deems the prior unconstitutional, the judgment is vacated and the defendant may be subject to retrial. 68 CA3d at 632. See §24.6 on collateral estoppel.

Ø Note: Drunk driving (Veh C §§23152-23153) and driving on a suspended license (Veh C §§14601-14601.2) priors are an exception; these priors can be challenged only once (with a limited exception for new legal grounds) and, if stricken, cannot be charged in a subsequent proceeding. Veh C §23624. See §24.44.

Before finding an admission defective, a reviewing court should consult the entire record. People v Howard (1992) 1 C4th 1132, 1175, 5 CR2d 268.

A sample motion to strike a prior conviction is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §24.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

(2) Procedure for Motion to Strike Prior in Court in Which Current Case Charging Prior Is Pending

§24.36 (a) Timing of Motion to Strike

A motion to strike is generally the proper vehicle for challenging the constitutionality of a prior conviction alleged in a pending case. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 916, 206 CR 707; People v Coffey (1967) 67 C2d 204, 215, 60 CR 457. There is an exception: A defendant may not collaterally challenge a prior for ineffective assistance of counsel. Garcia v Superior Court (1997) 14 C4th 953, 963, 59 CR2d 858; see discussion in §24.30.

A defendant can move to strike any prior conviction that is charged as a basis for augmenting punishment. In re Woods (1966) 64 C2d 3, 5, 48 CR 689.

The constitutionality of a prior can be challenged even when it was litigated earlier in a court other than the rendering court. People v Coffey (1967) 67 C2d 204, 210 n5, 60 CR 457; see §24.35. The rule is different for driving under the influence priors; they can be challenged only once. Veh C §23624. See §24.44.

There is no statute specifying the time for a motion to strike; it can be made at any time from the date of the plea to the finding or verdict of guilty or the pronouncement of judgment. In re Cortez (1971) 6 C3d 78, 87, 98 CR 307; People v Curtis (1969) 70 C2d 347, 359, 74 CR 713. The better practice, however, is to move to strike as a pretrial motion, complete with a supporting memorandum and the necessary declarations. This practice, if successful, has the advantage of allowing the defense to proceed to trial or negotiate a plea bargain from a more favorable position. See, e.g., Curl v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 1292, 1302, 276 CR 49 (pretrial motion to strike is only way to prevent jury from considering unwarranted special circumstance). If the pretrial motion is unsuccessful, the defendant may want to admit the prior so that the jury will not hear of it (see Pen C §1025; People v Bouzas (1991) 53 C3d 467, 478, 279 CR 847) or request a bifurcated trial (see §§24.25-24.26).

Ø Note: The time for making the motion may be regulated by local court rules.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.37 (b) Conduct of Hearing

At the hearing on a motion to strike a prior, the prosecution must make a prima facie showing of the existence of the prior conviction. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 923, 206 CR 707; People v Coffey (1967) 67 C2d 204, 217, 60 CR 457. The prosecution typically meets its prima facie burden by introducing evidence of the fact of the conviction, such as the original or a certified copy of the docket or minute order entry from the court that rendered the prior judgment of conviction (People v Vienne (1973) 30 CA3d 266, 271, 105 CR 584, disapproved in People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 919 n6, 206 CR 707, to the extent it limits motions to strike to attacks alleging denial of right to counsel), or certified prison records (see Pen C §969b). The defendant must then show constitutional invalidity by a preponderance of the evidence (People v Curl (2009) 46 C4th 339, 350, 93 CR3d 537; Curl v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 1292, 1305, 276 CR 49), through testimony or by production of declarations under penalty of perjury (People v Coffey, supra). The specific facts that constitute an actual denial of rights depend on the specific constitutional violation alleged. See §§24.31-24.34 on the substantive grounds for the motion. The prosecution can present evidence in rebuttal. Curl v Superior Court, supra.

If the court finds the prior unconstitutional, it must strike it from the accusatory pleading. This ruling does not vacate the underlying judgment of conviction, however. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 920, 206 CR 707.

Procedures for certain Vehicle Code violation priors (Veh C §§14601, 14601.1-14601.2, 23103, and 23152-23153) are different. They are discussed in §24.44.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.38 (3) Procedure Concerning Writ of Coram Nobis or Habeas Corpus in Rendering Court

Coram nobis. In consideration of the rulings pronounced in Garcia v Superior Court (1997) 14 C4th 953, 59 CR2d 858, defendants in noncapital cases must use the writ of coram nobis and the writ of habeas corpus to collaterally challenge the ineffective assistance of counsel concerning a prior conviction. If a defendant's prior conviction resulted from a guilty plea induced by misstatements of the judge or prosecutor (duress or fraud), or significant new evidence comes to light after the judgment, the defendant may challenge the prior in the rendering court by a petition for writ of coram nobis. See People v Goodrum (1991) 228 CA3d 397, 279 CR 120. Coram nobis does not lie to vacate a judgment because of ineffective assistance of counsel. 228 CA3d at 400 n4. Most coram nobis cases deal with improperly obtained guilty pleas. See, e.g., People v Esquibel (1975) 44 CA3d 591, 118 CR 748; People v Wiedersperg (1975) 44 CA3d 550, 118 CR 755.

Coram nobis is available only in the rendering court if the prior was never appealed. Pen C §1265; People v Wadkins (1965) 63 C2d 110, 113, 45 CR 173; People v Haynes (1969) 270 CA2d 318, 320, 75 CR 800. If the judgment was affirmed on appeal, a writ of coram nobis will lie only in the appellate court. Pen C §1265; People v Haynes, supra.

A motion to vacate a judgment of conviction is treated as a proceeding for a writ of error coram nobis whether or not it is called by that name. People v Mason (1958) 163 CA2d 630, 329 P2d 614.

Habeas corpus. A prior can be challenged in the rendering court by a petition for writ of habeas corpus if the issue is one that could not have been raised in a timely appeal. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 919, 206 CR 707; In re Ronald E. (1977) 19 C3d 315, 321, 137 CR 781. A habeas petition must show prejudice in addition to the constitutional violation underlying the prior. In re Ronald E., supra. For further discussion of habeas corpus, see chap 42 of this book, and Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chaps 9-10 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007) (state courts).

When prior should be attacked in rendering court. When a defendant is still in custody, on probation, or on parole on a prior conviction, attacking a prior in the rendering court is preferable to a motion to strike in the court in which current charges are pending. A successful writ of coram nobis or habeas corpus in the rendering court (or an appeal if one is still available) can reverse the underlying judgment, while a successful motion to strike in the court in which current charges are pending can, at best, only preclude use of the prior to enhance or impeach in the current case. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 920, 206 CR 707. See §24.35.

For further discussion, see Appeals & Writs, chap 11 (coram nobis) and chaps 9-10 (habeas corpus).

§24.39 (4) Challenging Plea to Prior (Yurko Error)

A defendant must be advised of and waive his or her Boykin-Tahl rights (see §26.11) before entering a plea of guilty or no contest to a prior conviction. In re Yurko (1974) 10 C3d 857, 863, 112 CR 513. (A plea to a prior may occur when a defendant does not want the jury on the primary charges to hear about the prior. See People v Calio (1986) 42 C3d 639, 643, 230 CR 137.)

Error concerning a defendant's plea of guilty or no contest to a prior conviction (called Yurko error) is determined under the federal Constitution. Under that test, a plea to a prior is valid if the record affirmatively shows that the plea is voluntary and intelligent under the totality of the circumstances. People v Howard (1992) 1 C4th 1132, 1175, 5 CR2d 268. This means that the defense must affirmatively allege prejudice through the defendant's declaration or testimony that, had he or she been fully advised of the Boykin-Tahl rights, he or she would not have entered a plea of guilty. See Curl v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 1292, 1303, 276 CR 49.

If Boykin-Tahl error is raised by habeas petition, the defendant must show prejudice by alleging that his or her guilty plea was involuntary for want of the admonitions (In re Ibarra (1983) 34 C3d 277, 283 n1, 193 CR 538), i.e., if the advice had been properly given and adequate waivers elicited, the defendant would not have pleaded guilty (In re Moser (1993) 6 C4th 342, 352, 24 CR2d 723).

The Yurko requirements do not apply to a stipulation that is "not the legal equivalent of a guilty plea or other admission which necessarily would have definite penal consequences." People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1038, 264 CR 386 (stipulation to priors used as circumstance relevant to penalty in capital case); People v Hovey (1988) 44 C3d 543, 567, 244 CR 121 (stipulation to uncharged murder).

G. Effect of Finding Prior Conviction Invalid or Unconstitutional

§24.40 1. Current Court Finds Prior Invalid

When a prior conviction is found invalid (e.g., no prison time served on prior that requires prison time) or unconstitutional (e.g., defendant did not waive right to jury trial) as a result of a motion to strike in the court in which it is charged as a prior conviction, all of the following are true:

- The prior must be stricken from the accusatory pleading (People v Coffey (1967) 67 C2d 204, 217, 60 CR 457);
- The prior cannot be used to enhance or aggravate in the pending case (In re Dabney (1969) 71 C2d 1, 11, 76 CR 636; People v Coffey, supra; see Burgett v Texas (1967) 389 US 109, 19 L Ed 2d 319, 88 S Ct 258);
- The prior cannot be used to impeach the defendant in the pending case under Evid C §788 (People v Coffey, supra; see Loper v Beto (1972) 405 US 473, 483, 31 L Ed 2d 374, 381, 92 S Ct 1014); and
- Neither the rendering court nor future courts are bound by the ruling, except in drunk driving cases (People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 920, 206 CR 707; Quintor v Municipal Court (1982) 133 CA3d 980, 985, 184 CR 313; see §24.44 for drunk driving exception).

A court determination of constitutional invalidity is res judicata for any related administrative proceedings that seek to impose additional sanctions based on the invalid prior. In re Rogers (1980) 28 C3d 429, 434, 169 CR 222. Note, however, that striking a prior conviction does not necessarily reduce a maximum sentence when an indeterminate sentence is imposed, although it may vitiate a mandatory minimum (People v Tenorio (1970) 3 C3d 89, 95 n1, 89 CR 249).

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.41 2. Rendering Court Finds Prior Invalid

If the rendering court finds the prior conviction unconstitutional, it cannot be used for any purpose in the court in which it is alleged as a prior. In the rendering court, however, the defendant may be prosecuted on the underlying charge that is now being alleged as a prior conviction. Gonzales v State (1977) 68 CA3d 621, 634, 137 CR 681; Gonzalez v Municipal Court (1973) 32 CA3d 706, 712, 108 CR 612.

Ø Note: Even though a conviction was found unconstitutional, prosecutors may be able to introduce evidence of the underlying conduct when relevant (as a "similar bad act") because the validity of the judgment is not a prerequisite to Evid C §1101(b) evidence. People v Coffey (1967) 67 C2d 204, 218, 60 CR 457. See discussion of similar acts of misconduct in §§24.52-24.55.

§24.42 H. Court's Authority to Strike Prior Conviction Under Pen C §1385

Judges have discretion to strike prior felony conviction allegations in furtherance of justice (Pen C §1385(a)), unless there is a clear legislative directive to the contrary. People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 518, 53 CR2d 789. This includes the discretion to strike a prior felony conviction that qualifies as a "strike" under the Three Strikes law. 13 C4th at 529. A trial court in a Three Strikes case has discretion under Pen C §1385(a) to dismiss a prior with respect to one count but not another. A sentence that imposes a Three Strikes sentence on one but not all current counts still "applies" the Three Strikes law. People v Garcia (1999) 20 C4th 490, 503, 85 CR2d 280.

Judges also have discretion to strike prior misdemeanor convictions in the furtherance of justice. Pen C §1385(a); People v Tenorio (1970) 3 C3d 89, 89 CR 249. This discretion is also subject to legislative directives to the contrary. For example, the court cannot strike a prior conviction of driving under the influence or alcohol-related reckless driving to avoid the minimum mandatory sentence or to avoid driver's license sanctions. Veh C §23622(a). A court may not strike a prior serious felony conviction under any provision of law. People v Garcia (2008) 167 CA4th 1550, 1560, 85 CR3d 155.

The court, on request by the defendant that it exercise its discretion under §1385 to strike a prior, must consider evidence presented; the defendant bears the burden of producing the evidence. People v Lee (2008) 161 CA4th 124, 129, 73 CR3d 811.

A judge's decision on dismissing or striking a sentencing allegation under §1385 is reviewed under the abuse of discretion standard. People v Carmony (2004) 33 C4th 367, 14 CR3d 880; People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 531, 53 CR2d 789. That discretion is limited, however, and the trial court must consider the interests of society in deciding whether to dismiss. People v Wallace (2004) 33 C4th 738, 16 CR3d 96 (circumstance that magistrate previously declined to hold defendant to answer on charge after preliminary hearing did not provide proper basis for dismissing a prior-strike-conviction allegation); People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 530, 53 CR2d 789. While Pen C §1385(a) requires the court to include its reasons for striking a prior in a minute order, the court need not state reasons for refusing to strike a prior. In re Large (2007) 41 C4th 538, 546, 61 CR3d 2.

For further discussion of the court's authority to strike felony priors, see §§37.41-37.42. See generally §§25.11-25.36 on motions to dismiss.

§24.43 I. Review of Dismissal of Prior-Conviction Allegation

The People have no right to appeal in a criminal case except as expressly provided by statute. People v Smith (1983) 33 C3d 596, 600, 189 CR 862. When the defendant successfully moves to strike a prior-conviction allegation on the ground that the conviction is invalid or unconstitutional, the legislature has authorized the prosecution to appeal directly in both misdemeanor and felony cases. People v Burke (1956) 47 C2d 45, 53, 301 P2d 241 (felonies); People v Kirk (1992) 7 CA4th 855, 860, 9 CR2d 270 (misdemeanors); People v Davis (1979) 94 CA3d 215, 221, 156 CR 395 (misdemeanors). Such an appeal does not implicate the defendant's constitutional guaranty against double jeopardy. People v Goodner (1990) 226 CA3d 609, 613, 276 CR 542. See Pen C §1238(a)(1)-(2), (6), (8), and People v Davis, supra, for a summary of relevant statutes and case law.

If an action is dismissed under Pen C §1385, the prosecution can move to reinstate it under Pen C §871.5 when that is available, instead of appealing. See §§13.32-13.36 on §871.5.

Either the prosecution or the defense can seek preconviction review of a trial court's ruling on a motion to strike by way of petition for writ of mandate. People v Allheim (1975) 48 CA3d Supp 1, 6, 121 CR 448.

> Ø Note: A successful motion to strike, except in driving under the influence cases (see §24.44), will not remove a conviction from the defendant's record; the prior will have to be relitigated if there is a subsequent charge. See People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 920, 206 CR 707.

The defense can appeal the denial of a motion to strike after judgment of conviction. Pen C §§1466(2) (misdemeanor cases), 1237 (felony cases). The defendant must have made a proper objection in the trial court to preserve the issue for appeal. People v Morris (1991) 53 C3d 152, 190, 279 CR 720, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394. A certificate of probable cause is not necessary when the appeal is from a plea of guilty if a sentencing issue is involved. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 915 n3, 206 CR 707.

When a case is reversed for error concerning the trial of a prior conviction, it is proper on remand to have a trial only on the prior. People v Moore (1992) 8 CA4th 411, 421, 10 CR2d 286.

When a magistrate strikes a prior under Veh C §41403 in a drunk driving prosecution brought under Veh C §23550(a), it undermines the basis for the felony charge and results in a ruling by the magistrate that the crime is a misdemeanor and not a felony. The prosecution cannot seek review of this order; the superior court lacks jurisdiction to conduct a hearing under Pen C §871.5, and the prosecution cannot appeal from the order striking the prior. People v Hanley (1992) 4 CA4th 340, 342, 5 CR2d 643, disapproved on other grounds by People v Williams (2005) 35 C4th 817, 824, 28 CR3d 29.

For discussion of writs of mandate and habeas corpus, see chap 42; Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chaps 7-8 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

Procedures to follow for certain Vehicle Code prior convictions are detailed in Veh C §41403. The prior convictions controlled by Veh C §41403 are convictions of Veh C §§14601, 14601.1, 14601.2, 23103, and 23152-23153 as specified in Veh C §23103.5. Veh C §41403(a).

To challenge these priors on constitutional grounds, the defense must state in writing the relevant facts and constitutional rights involved. The defense must file a copy of the statement in the court where the motion will be heard, and serve the court that rendered the judgment and the prosecutor in the present proceedings at least 5 court days before the hearing on the motion. Veh C §41403(a). Absent good cause, if the defense fails to comply with these notice requirements, the court must defer the motion to the time of sentencing; otherwise, the court must continue the trial. Veh C §41403(c). Ordinarily, the hearing on the motion should be before trial, out of the jury's presence. The burden of proof in demonstrating the unconstitutionality of the prior is with the defense, by a preponderance of the evidence. Veh C §41403(b)(2). The prosecution must produce evidence of the separate conviction sufficient to justify a finding that the defendant was convicted of it. Veh C §41403(b)(1). See §24.37 for discussion of the evidence admissible at such hearings. The defendant then has the burden of proving that his or her constitutional rights were infringed. Veh C §41403(b)(2). If the prior was based on a plea of guilty or no contest, the defense must provide evidence of the plea, including the court docket, any written waiver, and a transcript of entry of the plea. Veh C §41403(b)(2).

Ø Note: The public defender and appointed counsel are entitled to these records without cost. Veh C §41403(b)(2).

The prosecution has the right to produce rebuttal evidence. Veh C §41403(b)(3). The court then rules on the constitutional validity of the prior, striking the prior if it is found invalid. Veh C §41403(b)(4).

If the court finds that the prior conviction is constitutionally valid, the defendant cannot make another challenge unless a change in the law provides the basis for a new argument. If the court finds that the prior conviction is constitutionally invalid, the prior conviction cannot be used in any proceeding, and the DMV must delete the prior conviction from its records. Veh C §23624.

V. USE OF PRIOR CONVICTIONS TO IMPEACH WITNESS

§24.45 A. Rules on Admitting Prior Convictions to Impeach

Prior felony or misdemeanor convictions may be used to impeach a testifying witness. Prior felony convictions may be admissible to impeach either the defendant or a witness after he or she testifies. Cal Const art I, §28(f)(4) ("Any prior conviction of any person in any criminal proceeding … shall subsequently be used without limitation for purposes of impeachment or enhancement of sentence in any criminal proceeding"); Evid C §788 (prior felony convictions may be used to impeach witness unless he or she has been pardoned or discharged).

Evidence Code §452.5(b) has been construed as a hearsay exception allowing the record of a prior conviction to be used to prove both the fact of conviction and the occurrence of the underlying act or acts. People v Duran (2002) 97 CA4th 1448, 1460, 119 CR2d 272. This hearsay exception permits using a misdemeanor conviction to impeach a witness. Conduct underlying a misdemeanor conviction involving moral turpitude may also be admissible. People v Wheeler (1992) 4 C4th 284, 14 CR2d 418.

Ø Note: Although Pen C §1054.1(d) does not expressly require the prosecution to disclose prior misdemeanor convictions, federal due process mandates the disclosure of misdemeanor convictions on defense request. People v Santos (1994) 30 CA4th 169, 178, 35 CR2d 719.

Impeachment of exculpatory statement of nontestifying defendant. A defendant's prior felony convictions are admissible under Evid C §§788 and 1202 to attack the defendant's credibility when out-of-court exculpatory statements made by the defendant are admitted into evidence at the defendant's request but the defendant does not testify at trial. People v Jacobs (2000) 78 CA4th 1444, 1446, 93 CR2d 783. However, the prosecution has no right to introduce an exculpatory statement by the defendant that is otherwise irrelevant for the purpose of impeaching it. People v Fritz (2007) 153 CA4th 949, 956, 62 CR3d 885.

To preserve a claim of error, defendant must testify. To preserve a claim of error concerning a defendant's impeachment with a prior conviction, the defendant must testify. People v Collins (1986) 42 C3d 378, 228 CR 899.

There are restrictions on use of prior convictions, and misdemeanor conduct, to impeach. California Constitution article I, §28(f)(4), part of Proposition 8, purported to eliminate all restrictions on impeachment with prior convictions. In People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 211 CR 719, however, the California Supreme Court held that §28(f) does not mandate that the trial court admit all prior felony convictions on request to impeach a defendant or witness. Castro and later cases have placed limits on the use of prior convictions to impeach.

The restrictions that have been placed on using priors for impeachment include the following:

- The prior conviction must involve moral turpitude (People v Collins (1986) 42 C3d 378, 389, 228 CR 899; see discussion in §24.46);
- The risk of undue prejudice from allowing impeachment with the prior must not substantially outweigh its probative value, on the basis of Evid C §352 (People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 211 CR 719; see further discussion in §24.47);
- The use of prior juvenile adjudications is limited (see discussion in §24.5); and
- The prior cannot be constitutionally invalid (Loper v Beto (1972) 405 US 473, 483, 31 L Ed 2d 374, 381, 92 S Ct 1014).

People v Field (1995) 31 CA4th 1778, 1785, 37 CR2d 803, held that Proposition 8 did not abrogate the Evid C §788 limitations on use of felony priors to impeach. The limitations found in §788 forbid use of a prior to impeach in these situations:

- A pardon based on innocence or a certificate of rehabilitation and pardon was granted; and
- With regard to witnesses other than the defendant, the charge was dismissed under Pen C §1203.4, or a similar procedure in another jurisdiction; expunged priors can be used to impeach defendants (Evid C §788(c)-(d); see also People v Field, supra).

The following factors do not necessarily require exclusion of a prior conviction for impeachment, although they might cause the risk of undue prejudice to substantially outweigh the probative value:

- The court is not required to exclude prior convictions because there are too many of them (People v Dillingham (1986) 186 CA3d 688, 695, 231 CR 20; People v Castro (1986) 186 CA3d 1211, 231 CR 269); and
- The court is not required to exclude a prior because it is too similar to the current charge (People v Heishman (1988) 45 C3d 147, 170, 246 CR 673).

Ø Note: The facts underlying a prior conviction may be admissible as a similar act of misconduct. See discussion in §§24.52-24.55.

§24.46 B. Which Priors Involve Moral Turpitude

Prior conviction must have involved moral turpitude. A prior conviction must have involved moral turpitude to be used to impeach a witness, including a defendant. People v Collins (1986) 42 C3d 378, 389, 228 CR 899. The prior does not have to involve dishonesty; moral turpitude means a readiness to do evil. People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 314, 211 CR 719. Castro found justification for requiring that a prior conviction have involved moral turpitude in US Const amend XIV (inferences must "be based on a rational connection between the fact proved and the fact to be inferred" to comport with the Due Process Clause (38 C3d at 313)) and in Justice Holmes's statement that impeachment with a prior felony conviction is relevant only if it gives reason for disbelieving a witness (38 C3d at 314).

Court must use least adjudicated elements test. To decide whether a prior is one of moral turpitude, the court must refer to the least adjudicated elements of the crime. The least adjudicated elements test means that the court must look to the elements of the statute of which the defendant was convicted, and not to the defendant's actual conduct or to information in the charging document on which the prior conviction was based (by analogy to People v Crowson (1983) 33 C3d 623, 632, 190 CR 165). People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 316, 211 CR 719. See People v Campbell (1994) 23 CA4th 1488, 1492, 28 CR2d 716.

Crimes involving moral turpitude. The Castro court cited child molestation, crimes of violence, and torture as crimes demonstrating moral turpitude. People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 315, 211 CR 719. Following Castro, appellate courts have found the following additional crimes to involve moral turpitude:

- Accessory after the fact (Pen C §32; In re Young (1989) 49 C3d 257, 264, 261 CR 59);
- Arson (People v Miles (1985) 172 CA3d 474, 482, 218 CR 378);
- Assault with a deadly weapon (People v Cavazos (1985) 172 CA3d 589, 593, 218 CR 269);
- Assault with deadly weapon or by force likely to produce great bodily injury (Pen C §245(a)(1); People v Elwell (1988) 206 CA3d 171, 253 CR 480; see also People v Thomas (1988) 206 CA3d 689, 254 CR 15, holding that §245(a)(1) involves moral turpitude);
- Assault with intent to commit murder (People v Olmedo (1985) 167 CA3d 1085, 1097, 213 CR 742);
- Assault with intent to commit rape (People v Morris (1991) 53 C3d 152, 217, 279 CR 720, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394; People v Bonilla (1985) 168 CA3d 201, 214 CR 191);
- Auto theft (People v Green (1995) 34 CA4th 165, 40 CR2d 239; People v Zataray (1985) 173 CA3d 390, 399, 219 CR 33);
- Battery by an inmate on a noninmate (People v Williams (1985) 169 CA3d 951, 957, 215 CR 612);
- Battery on a police officer (People v Lindsay (1989) 209 CA3d 849, 857, 257 CR 529; People v Clarida (1987) 197 CA3d 547, 552, 249 CR 363);
- Burglary (People v Muldrow (1988) 202 CA3d 636, 645, 248 CR 891; People v Castro (1986) 186 CA3d 1211, 231 CR 269; People v Almarez (1985) 168 CA3d 262, 214 CR 105; People v Boyd (1985) 167 CA3d 36, 212 CR 873);
- Contributing to delinquency of a minor (see In re Duggan (1976) 17 C3d 416, 130 CR 715);
- Conspiracy to possess an unregistered firearm (18 USC §371; People v White (1992) 4 CA4th 1299, 1305, 6 CR2d 259);
- Corporal injury of a child (People v Brooks (1992) 3 CA4th 669, 672, 4 CR2d 570);
- Discharge of firearm at inhabited dwelling (Pen C §246; People v White, supra);
- Driving under the influence (felony) (Veh C §23152; People v Forster (1994) 29 CA4th 1746, 1757, 35 CR2d 705);
- Escape with or without violence (Pen C §§4530(a), (c), 4532(b); People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1009, 264 CR 386; People v Waldecker (1987) 195 CA3d 1152, 1156, 241 CR 650; People v Lee (1991) 229 CA3d 1504, 1507, 281 CR 9);
- Evading a peace officer (Veh C §2800.2; People v Dewey (1996) 42 CA4th 216, 223, 49 CR2d 537);

- Extortion (see Libarian v State Bar (1952) 38 C2d 328, 330, 239 P2d 865);
- Failing to appear (felony) (see People v Maestas (2005) 132 CA4th 1552, 1556, 34 CR3d 503);
- False imprisonment (felony) (People v Cornelio (1989) 207 CA3d 1580, 1583, 255 CR 775);
- Forgery (People v Parrish (1985) 170 CA3d 336, 349, 217 CR 700; People v Almarez, supra);
- Grand theft (People v Boyd (1985) 167 CA3d 36, 45, 212 CR 873);
- Grand theft auto (Veh C §10851; People v Rodriguez (1986) 177 CA3d 174, 178, 222 CR 809);
- Hit and run (felony) (Veh C §20001; People v Bautista (1990) 217 CA3d 1, 7, 265 CR 661);
- Indecent exposure (felony) (People v Ballard (1993) 13 CA4th 687, 691, 16 CR2d 624);
- Kidnapping (People v Zataray (1985) 173 CA3d 390, 400, 219 CR 33);
- Lewd or lascivious act on a child under Pen C §288(a) (People v Massey (1987) 192 CA3d 819, 823, 237 CR 734);
- Murder (People v Johnson (1991) 233 CA3d 425, 459, 284 CR 579);
- Perjury (Pen C §118; see People v Rollo (1977) 20 C3d 109, 118, 141 CR 177);
- Pimping and pandering (People v Jaimez (1986) 184 CA3d 146, 150, 228 CR 852);
- Possession of a firearm by a felon (People v Littrel (1986) 185 CA3d 699, 703, 230 CR 83);
- Possession for sale of controlled substances (People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 317, 211 CR 719);
- Possession for sale of marijuana (People v Standard (1986) 181 CA3d 431, 435, 226 CR 62);
- Rape (People v Mazza (1985) 175 CA3d 836, 844, 221 CR 640), and attempted rape (People v Morris, supra);
- Receiving/possessing stolen property (People v Rodriguez (1986) 177 CA3d 174, 179, 222 CR 809);
- Resisting an executive officer by force or violence (People v Williams (1999) 72 CA4th 1460, 86 CR2d 62);
- Robbery (People v Stewart (1985) 171 CA3d 59, 66, 215 CR 716);
- Sale of heroin (People v Hunt (1985) 169 CA3d 668, 674, 215 CR 429);
- Spousal abuse (Pen C §273.5; People v Rodriguez (1992) 5 CA4th 1398, 1402, 7 CR2d 495);
- Tax evasion (see In re Hallinan (1954) 43 C2d 243, 248, 272 P2d 768);
- Terrorist threats (Pen C §422; People v Thornton (1992) 3 CA4th 419, 424, 4 CR2d 519);
- Threat to commit crime that will result in death or great bodily injury (People v Thornton (1992) 3 CA4th 419, 4 CR2d 519);
- Transportation of controlled substance (People v Navarez (1985) 169 CA3d 936, 949, 215 CR 519);
- Vandalism (felony) (Pen C §594; People v Campbell (1994) 23 CA4th 1488, 1493, 28 CR2d 716); and
- Voluntary manslaughter (People v Partner (1986) 180 CA3d 178, 187, 225 CR 502).

Crimes not involving moral turpitude. Crimes not involving moral turpitude as a matter of law include the following:

- Battery resulting in serious bodily injury (Pen C §243(d); People v Mansfield (1988) 200 CA3d 82, 89, 245 CR 800);
- Child endangerment (Pen C §273a; People v Sanders (1992) 10 CA4th 1268, 1274, 13 CR2d 205);
- Involuntary manslaughter (People v Solis (1985) 172 CA3d 877, 883, 218 CR 469);
- Marijuana possession (People v Valdez (1986) 177 CA3d 680, 697, 223 CR 149);
- Maintaining a place for narcotics use (People v Vera (1999) 69 CA4th 1100, 82 CR2d 128);
- Simple assault (Pen C §240; People v Cavazos, supra);
- Simple possession of a controlled substance (People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 317, 211 CR 719); and
- Statutory rape conviction suffered before People v Hernandez (1964) 61 C2d 529, 39 CR 361 (which established defense of good faith belief in victim's age) does not necessarily involve moral turpitude and may not be used to impeach. People v Flanagan (1986) 185 CA3d 764, 230 CR 64. Compare People v Fulcher (1987) 194 CA3d 749, 236 CR 845 (conviction occurred after 1964 and Hernandez).

§24.47 C. Trial Court Must Exercise Discretion Under Evid C §352 in Determining Admissibility of Priors to Impeach

Evidence Code §352 applies. A prior should be excluded for impeachment purposes when the risk of undue prejudice substantially outweighs its probative value, based on §352. People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 211 CR 719. Proposition 8 had no effect on this rule. 38 C3d at 309. See also People v Collins (1986) 42 C3d 378, 392, 228 CR 899.

Although Castro held that trial courts err by refusing to exercise discretion under Evid C §352, most appellate courts have found no error or harmless error when the judge simply recites that a ruling was the result of the §352 weighing process, without engaging in an on-the-record analysis of the probative value of the prior versus its prejudicial effect. Compare People v Nguyen (1988) 204 CA3d 181, 187, 251 CR 40 (no error), People v Clarida (1987) 197 CA3d 547, 552, 249 CR 363 (harmless error), and People v Castro (1986) 186 CA3d 1211, 231 CR 269 (harmless error), with People v Flanagan (1986) 185 CA3d 764, 773, 230 CR 64 (reversing and remanding for exercise of trial court discretion under §352 and for determination of prejudice).

Ø Note: If a judge rules on a motion in limine that a prior conviction is inadmissible under Evid C §352, the prosecutor should consider renewing the motion to admit the prior after the defendant testifies, especially if the defendant misleads the trier of fact regarding his or her past.

Four Beagle factors should guide trial court's exercise of discretion under Evid C §352 when defendant involved. Trial courts, in deciding whether to allow a defendant to be impeached with a prior conviction, should be guided by the four factors set out in People v Beagle (1972) 6 C3d 441, 453, 99 CR 313. People v Collins, supra.

(1) Does the prior reflect adversely on the defendant's honesty or veracity (the prior must involve moral turpitude)? See the list in §24.46 of crimes found by courts to involve, or not to involve, moral turpitude.

(2) Is the prior near or remote in time? The court can, but is not required to, exclude a prior because it is too remote in time. People v Collins, supra; People v Burns (1987) 189 CA3d 734, 738, 234 CR 547. In considering remoteness, the court should consider the following four factors (People v Beagle, supra):

- The time that has elapsed since the conviction. See People v Burns, supra (20-year-old conviction not necessarily remote because of subsequent lawlessness); People v DeCosse (1986) 183 CA3d 404, 228 CR 114 (no abuse of discretion to admit 12-year-old burglary conviction).
- The time that defendant was free between offenses. Prison time tolls remoteness. People v Burns, supra. For example, if a defendant was convicted 26 years ago of a felony, but spent 25 years in prison, the 25 years is tolled.
- The defendant's age. If the defendant was very young at the time of the prior conviction and the conviction is old, the court may consider the prior less probative to the defendant's credibility. People v Burns, supra.
- The defendant's subsequent conduct (whether he or she led a generally law-abiding life). The court can consider lawlessness subsequent to the prior conviction, including felony convictions not involving moral turpitude, along with all misdemeanor convictions. People v Campbell (1994) 23 CA4th 1488, 1496, 28 CR2d 716.

(3) Is the prior for conduct substantially similar to that for which the defendant is standing trial? The court is not required to exclude a prior conviction because it is too similar to the current charge. People v Tamborrino (1989) 215 CA3d 575, 590, 263 CR 731. Depending on the facts, a prior similar to the facts of the current offense may be more probative of the defendant's credibility. People v Johnson (1991) 233 CA3d 425, 443, 284 CR 579. Conversely, the danger of prejudice is higher for the same or a similar crime because the jury may be more likely to conclude that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged if the defendant previously committed the same type of crime. People v Beagle, supra.

(4) Will impeachment influence the defendant's decision to testify? The court should consider whether admission of the prior conviction will be likely to cause the defendant not to testify.

Ø Note: To raise on appeal a trial court's ruling that a prior conviction is admissible to impeach, the defendant must testify. An offer of proof by the defendant is insufficient to preserve the matter for appeal. People v Collins, supra, relying on Luce v U.S. (1984) 469 US 38, 83 L Ed 2d 443, 105 S Ct 460.

The Beagle-Collins factors do not rigidly require admission or exclusion of a prior and are not the only factors the trial court can consider. Other relevant circumstances may also be relied on. People v Collins, supra; People v Tamborrino (1989) 215 CA3d 575, 588, 263 CR 731.

Number of prior convictions that may be used to impeach. The court is not required to exclude prior convictions because there are too many of them. Under Evid C §352, however, the court has discretion to limit the number of priors admitted. People v Castro, supra; People v Dillingham (1986) 186 CA3d 688, 695, 231 CR 20. See also People v Muldrow (1988) 202 CA3d 636, 646, 248 CR 891.

Sample motion. A sample motion to preclude impeachment with a prior conviction is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §24.2 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

D. Procedures for Impeaching Witness With Prior and for Challenging Admission of Priors to Impeach

§24.48 1. Impeaching Witness With Prior

Any party can impeach any witness, including the defendant, with a prior conviction (Evid C §788; People v Harris (1989) 47 C3d 1047, 1090 n22, 255 CR 352) or can offer such other evidence of a prior conviction as may be relevant to issues on trial. See Evid C §§210, 352.

In the usual case, the prosecution seeks to impeach the defendant; however, both the prosecution and the defense may impeach witnesses with priors. Evid C §785. The customary practice is for one party to raise the impeachment issue as an in limine motion in the trial court. In this way, the court rules on the admissibility of the impeaching prior outside the jury's presence. When the prejudicial effect cannot be evaluated without judicial knowledge of the contents of the defendant's testimony, the defense can make an offer of proof, or the defendant can testify at an in camera hearing. The trial court is not constitutionally required to make its ruling before the witness testifies and can defer its decision until after the witness has taken the stand. People v Washington (1989) 211 CA3d 207, 213, 259 CR 307. See §30.19 on in limine motions.

A witness can be impeached with the type of prior discussed in §24.45 by eliciting testimony of the witness being impeached on direct or cross-examination, or by introducing a certified record of judgment. Evid C §788; Pen C §969b.

Ø Note: To soften the impact of an impeaching prior for a jury, counsel for the party relying on the witness may wish to elicit an acknowledgment of the prior on direct examination.

If the prior is similar to the offense charged, the trial court can "sanitize" it by allowing impeachment only by a generic reference, e.g., a "felony involving theft." See People v Massey (1987) 192 CA3d 819, 825, 237 CR 734. The Massey court rejected the defense argument that the jury might speculate that the priors were for heinous crimes.

Ø Note: It is important for counsel to warn the witness not to volunteer any information beyond what is necessary concerning the prior. For example, a volunteered statement that the witness did not do it, or that the witness otherwise has a clean record, may allow a damaging cross-examination, or rebuttal evidence, that otherwise would be inadmissible. See People v Rowland (1992) 4 C4th 238, 261, 14 CR2d 377 (stated general rule but found that defense had not preserved issue for appeal because it had obtained no ruling from trial court on issue).

Generally, examination on the details and surrounding circumstances of the crime is forbidden. See, e.g., People v Heckathorne (1988) 202 CA3d 458, 462, 248 CR 399 (murder conviction reversed because prosecutor cross-examined defendant on underlying facts of prior). The witness, however, may be questioned about the details of the prior if he or she "opens the door" (see Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook §29.64 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009)), or if the prior is being used as a similar act of misconduct (People v Allen (1986) 42 C3d 1222, 1271, 232 CR 849). See also People v Freeman (1994) 8 C4th 450, 493, 34 CR2d 558 (alibi witness's admission on cross-examination to two prior felonies allowed prosecutor to elicit testimony that defendant had been crime partner).

If the witness denies the prior, it must be proved before the jury. People v Hayes (1990) 52 C3d 577, 614, 276 CR 874 (although held to be nonprejudicial, defense counsel was incompetent for failing to offer evidence to establish that prosecution witness's priors were felonies after witness replied, when asked if they were felonies, "not that I know of"). The burden is on the party impeaching a witness to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the witness suffered the prior conviction by a court or jury or by plea. Pen C §1158; People v Lo Cicero (1969) 71 C2d 1186, 1192, 80 CR 913.

Counsel who is cross-examining a witness cannot ask whether the witness has a prior felony conviction without some evidence to support a good faith belief that the witness did in fact suffer a prior conviction. People v Williams (1991) 228 CA3d 146, 152, 278 CR 801 (rap sheet is proper basis for establishing good faith belief in existence of prior). Moreover, in the event of a denial, the questioner should be prepared to show by documentary evidence that the witness has a prior. People v Perez (1962) 58 C2d 229, 238, 23 CR 569 (prejudicial prosecutorial misconduct for district attorney to ask defense witness if he had been convicted of felony, receive negative answer, and not offer affirmative proof of prior). See also People v Darcy (1951) 101 CA2d 665, 671, 226 P2d 53 (proof of prior by prison records is improper).

§24.49 2. Stating Objection to Use of Prior to Impeach Witness

Any error in the admission of priors to impeach is waived by a failure to make a timely objection. Evid C §353(a). The opponent of impeaching evidence must specify the ground for his or her objection. People v Lewis (1987) 191 CA3d 1288, 1296, 237 CR 64 (request for "findings" on whether priors involved moral turpitude is not the same as objection under Evid C §352). For example:

I object to this evidence because it is not a felony, it is too old to be relevant—it happened 12 years ago—and any probative value it might have had at one time is far outweighed by the prejudice to the witness of branding her with a conviction she has worked hard to overcome.

Ø Note: If this objection were made in front of a jury, the opponent might object that it is argumentative and argues facts not in evidence.

When the defendant is the one impeached, he or she must testify to preserve an objection for appeal. If the defendant fails to testify, the denial of a motion to exclude a prior for impeachment cannot be reviewed on appeal. People v Collins (1986) 42 C3d 378, 383, 228 CR 899; People v Irvin (1991) 230 CA3d 180, 187, 281 CR 195. Presumably the same rule would apply to witnesses other than the defendant.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.50 3. Instructions on Impeaching Prior

Trial counsel should ask the trial court to instruct the jury that priors used to impeach are admissible for only that limited purpose and cannot be considered for any other purpose. See CALCRIM 303, 316; see also CALJIC 2.09. This instruction does not have to be read to the jury unless counsel requests it. People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1020, 264 CR 386 (discussing CALJIC 2.09; now see CALCRIM 316). See Evid C §355. The trial court has no sua sponte duty to instruct on limited admissibility (see People v Hawkins (1995) 10 C4th 920, 942, 42 CR2d 636), but the instruction must be given on request. Bench Notes to CALCRIM 316.

The People v Watson (1956) 46 C2d 818, 836, 299 P2d 243, standard of review (see Cal Const art VI, §13) applies to trial court error in allowing impeachment of a witness with a prior. People v Castro (1985) 38 C3d 301, 319, 211 CR 719; People v Brown (1985) 169 CA3d 800, 808, 215 CR 494.

Ø Note: The federal courts are increasingly evaluating state evidentiary errors as violations of federal due process. Defense counsel might want to frame the issue, at least in the alternative, as one of federal due process. See McKinney v Rees (9th Cir 1993) 993 F2d 1378, 1385; Kealohapauole v Shimoda (9th Cir 1986) 800 F2d 1463, 1465.

If the hearing on the admissibility of prior convictions was not on the record, the appellate court can remand the case solely for a new hearing on the record on that issue. People v Flanagan (1986) 185 CA3d 764, 773, 230 CR 64.

It is not reversible error for judges simply to state that they have exercised their discretion under Evid C §352, and that the probative value of the prior outweighs its prejudicial effect. People v Nguyen (1988) 204 CA3d 181, 187, 251 CR 40. It is error for a trial court to refuse to exercise its discretion concerning the admissibility of priors for impeachment. See People v Castro (1986) 186 CA3d 1211, 1217, 231 CR 269.

VI. USE OF EVIDENCE OF UNCHARGED MISCONDUCT ("OTHER BAD ACTS")

A. Admissibility of Other Bad Acts

§24.52 1. To Prove Disputed Fact Other Than Defendant's Propensity to Commit Such Acts

Evidence Code §1101(a) prohibits the admission of "evidence of a person's character," whether by opinion or reputation evidence, or evidence of specific instances of conduct to prove his or her conduct on a specified occasion. Evidence Code §1101(b) survived Proposition 8. People v Perkins (1984) 159 CA3d 646, 649, 205 CR 625.

Section 1101(b) permits the admission of evidence that "a person committed a crime, civil wrong, or other act when relevant to prove some fact… other than his or her disposition to commit such an act." Such acts are commonly called "similars" or "bad acts," or referred to as "other crimes evidence." Evidence of other crimes or bad acts is admissible to prove such facts as "motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, absence of mistake or accident," or lack of a good faith belief that the victim consented to a sexual act. Evid C §1101(b). Typically, the prosecutor invokes the §1101(b) exception to permit introduction of the defendant's uncharged misconduct. However, by its terms, §1101(b) makes admissible evidence of acts of misconduct committed by other witnesses if the evidence is relevant to something other than propensity.

Ø Warning: Under Evid C §1108, evidence that the defendant has committed an uncharged sexual offense is admissible for all purposes in a trial in which the defendant is charged with a sexual offense. Evid C §1108(a). Similarly, Evid C §1109 makes evidence of similar misconduct admissible against the defendant in a prosecution for domestic violence or abuse of a child or an elder or dependent person. Evid C §1109(a). These provisions are discussed in §24.52A.

In contrast to impeachment by prior convictions, relevant similar bad acts may be admitted even if the defendant does not testify. See People v Archerd (1970) 3 C3d 615, 639, 91 CR 397; People v Poulin (1972) 27 CA3d 54, 65, 103 CR 623. Moreover, the similar act can have occurred before or after the offense charged. People v Balcom (1994) 7 C4th 414, 425, 27 CR2d 666. The similar act need not be a crime and need not have resulted in conviction. People v Griffin (1967) 66 C2d 459, 464, 58 CR 107; People v St. Andrew (1980) 101 CA3d 450, 462, 161 CR 634.

Evidence of other crimes is admissible under §1101(b) only to prove a material fact such as motive, intent, identity, or common design or plan if that fact is in dispute. People v Thompson (1980) 27 C3d 303, 313, 165 CR 289. But see People v Williams (1988) 44 C3d 883, 907 n7, 245 CR 336 (not guilty plea places every element of offense in dispute). The admission of other crimes evidence cannot be justified by the mere assertion of an admissible purpose—the particular evidence must be relevant to the ultimate fact in dispute. People v Poon (1981) 125 CA3d 55, 71, 178 CR 375, disapproved on other grounds in People v Lopez (1998) 19 C4th 282, 292, 79 CR2d 195.

When other crimes evidence is used to prove identity, the pattern and characteristics of the crimes must be so unusual and distinctive as to be "like a signature." People v Ewoldt (1994) 7 C4th 380, 403, 27 CR2d 646. "Common design or plan" evidence must show sufficient "common features" to support the inference that both charged and uncharged offenses are manifestations of the same design. 7 C4th at 402. See also People v Hovarter (2008) 44 C4th 983, 1002, 81 CR3d 299. The least degree of similarity is required to prove intent; the conduct must be sufficiently similar to support the inference that the defendant harbored the same intent in each instance. Ewoldt, 7 C4th at 402. See also People v Balcom (1994) 7 C4th 414, 27 CR2d 666.

Even though other crimes evidence is relevant under §1101(b), Evid C §352 may require its exclusion. See People v Balcom, supra. When reviewing the admission of evidence of the facts and circumstances of other offenses, a court must consider (1) the materiality of the fact to be proved or disproved, (2) the probative value of the other crimes evidence to prove or disprove the facts, and (3) the existence of any rule or policy requiring exclusion even if the evidence is relevant. A court should also determine whether the jury will consider the evidence for an improper purpose. See People v Ewoldt, supra; People v Balcom, supra.

Remoteness in time has been mentioned as a factor in determining the admissibility of other crimes evidence. People v Kronemyer (1987) 189 CA3d 314, 346, 234 CR 442. Because this evidence is inherently prejudicial, uncharged offenses are admissible only if they have substantial probative value. People v Ewoldt, supra.

When a defendant claims he or she did not commit an act charged as an uncharged bad act or disputes the manner in which the act was committed, the trial court must hold a hearing on that issue. Evid C §403. The burden for admitting the uncharged act is by a preponderance of the evidence. The jury must be instructed to weigh the same preliminary facts again before considering the similar act. People v Simon (1986) 184 CA3d 125, 228 CR 855.

In People v Alvarez (2002) 27 C4th 1161, 119 CR2d 903, the California Supreme Court held that the truth-in-evidence provision of Proposition 8 (former Cal Const art I, §28(d); now see Cal Const art I, §28(f)(2)), abrogated California's corpus delicti rule to the extent that the rule prohibited the introduction of a defendant's otherwise admissible statement without also introducing independent proof that a criminal act was committed. Thus, it appears that the prosecution may use a defendant's admission or confession to prove uncharged misconduct without providing independent proof of the corpus delicti. But see People v Williams (1988) 44 C3d 883, 910, 245 CR 336 (prosecution conceded it must prove corpus delicti of misconduct before introducing defendant's admission).

Ø Note: Similar bad acts should be used only when the points of similarity are numerous and the relevance of the evidence is clear because of the possibility of reversal on appeal.

Cases that upheld admission of evidence of other crimes or bad acts: People v Lewis (2006) 39 C4th 970, 1000, 47 CR3d 467 (uncharged threats and abuse to show motive, opportunity, identity, and "escalating campaign to retaliate" against defendant's ex-wife and family); People v Martinez (2000) 22 C4th 106, 91 CR2d 687 (computer printout "rap sheets"); People v Balcom, supra (subsequent out-of-state crimes to show common design or plan); People v Johnson (1988) 47 C3d 576, 253 CR 710 (cross-linked evidence for rape and murder); People v Robbins (1988) 45 C3d 867, 248 CR 172 (other murder to show intent to kill and intent for special circumstances); People v Heishman (1988) 45 C3d 147, 246 CR 673 (attempted rape to show motive for murder); People v Rodriguez (1986) 42 C3d 730, 230 CR 667 (crime spree as motive for murder); People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1527, 86 CR2d 134 (prior stricken enhancement); People v Feagin (1995) 34 CA4th 1427, 1433, 40 CR2d 918 (attempt to kill witness in murder prosecution).

Cases that found error in admission of evidence of other crimes or bad acts: People v Avitia (2005) 127 CA4th 185, 193, 24 CR3d 887 (evidence of gang graffiti in defendant's bedroom irrelevant and prejudicial when there was no other evidence of gang activity); People v Felix (1993) 14 CA4th 997, 1008, 18 CR2d 113 (admission of prior robbery conviction was reversible error when case against one defendant was weak); People v Bruce (1989) 208 CA3d 1099, 256 CR 647 (defendant's stipulation to identity negates relevance of similar rape); People v Valentine (1988) 207 CA3d 697, 254 CR 822 (intravenous drug use not admissible in marijuana prosecution); People v Harvey (1984) 163 CA3d 90, 101, 208 CR 910 (admission of prior robbery conviction to show intent was reversible error).

Ø Note: Defense counsel may wish to object to similar bad acts (see §§24.52-24.55) on federal due process grounds. See McKinney v Rees (9th Cir 1993) 993 F2d 1378, 1385.

For further discussion of the admissibility of similar acts, see Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook, chap 35 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009); 1 Witkin, California Evidence, Circumstantial Evidence §§74-99 (4th ed 2000); and California Trial Objections §32.7 (Cal CEB Annual).

§24.52A 2. To Prove Propensity

Unlike Evid C §1101(b), Evid C §§1108-1109 permit the prosecution to use evidence of uncharged crimes to prove that the defendant had the propensity to commit the charged offenses.

Under Evid C §1108(a), the prosecution may introduce evidence of uncharged sexual misconduct in a prosecution for a sexual offense. Note that for purposes of Evid C §1108, a defendant accused of first-degree felony murder with rape as the underlying felony is accused of a sexual offense. People v Story (2009) 45 C4th 1282, 91 CR3d 709.

Under Evid C §1109(a)(1), the prosecution may introduce evidence of uncharged acts of domestic violence in a domestic violence prosecution; under Evid C §1109(a)(2), the prosecution may introduce evidence of uncharged acts of elder or dependent person abuse in a prosecution for elder or dependent person abuse; and under Evid C §1109(a)(3), the prosecution may introduce evidence of uncharged acts of child abuse in a prosecution for an offense involving child abuse (see Pen C §273d (acts constituting child abuse)). Note that the admission of prior acts of domestic violence at trial for a murder that took place before the codification of Evid C §1109 has been found not to violate the proscription against the ex post facto application of laws. People v Flores (2009) 176 CA4th 1171, 1176, 98 CR3d 450.

The prosecution must give the defense advance notice of its intention to introduce other crimes evidence under Evid C §1108 or §1109. See Evid C §§1108(b), 1109(b). Both §§1108 and 1109 preserve the trial court's discretion to exclude evidence that is unduly prejudicial under Evid C §352.

> Ø Warning: When the prosecution plans to introduce other crimes evidence under Evid C §1108 or §1109, defense counsel must make a timely and specific Evid C §352 objection, especially when the evidence of the charged crime is weak or insubstantial. Under §352, the trial court can exclude evidence because its admission will cause undue consumption of time, confuse the issues, mislead the jury, or create a substantial danger of undue prejudice.

In People v Falsetta (1999) 21 C4th 903, 89 CR2d 847, the California Supreme Court upheld §1108 against a due process challenge, concluding that the trial court's discretion to exclude unduly prejudicial evidence under Evid C §352 adequately protects the defendant's right to a fair trial.

> Ø Warning: The defense must object to the admission of other crimes evidence to preserve any remaining due process claims arising from its introduction. See U.S. v LeMay (9th Cir 2001) 260 F3d 1018. The court in LeMay upheld Fed R Evid 414, the federal equivalent to Evid C §§1108-1109, against due process challenge but warned that the rule "is not a blank check entitling the government to introduce whatever evidence it wishes, no matter how minimally relevant and potentially devastating to the defendant." 260 F3d at 1022. On objecting to other crimes evidence, see §24.54.

The burden of proof for the other crimes evidence is preponderance of the evidence. People v Durham (1969) 70 C2d 171, 187 n15, 74 CR 262. See also People v Medina (1995) 11 C4th 694, 763, 47 CR2d 165; People v Lisenba (1939) 14 C2d 403, 429, 94 P2d 569. In People v Van Winkle (1999) 75 CA4th 133, 145, 89 CR2d 28, the court of appeal held that there is no constitutional requirement that other crimes evidence be proved beyond a reasonable doubt even when the jury is allowed to use the evidence to infer guilt. Also, in People v Reliford (2003) 29 C4th 1007, 130 CR2d 254, the California Supreme Court held that the 1999 version of CALJIC 2.50.01, instructing that other crimes evidence may be proved by preponderance, did not confuse the jury about the ultimate burden of proof to find guilt. Although Reliford upheld the earlier version of the instruction, CALJIC 2.50.01 was modified to clarify the relationship between proof of the uncharged offense and conviction.

CALCRIM 1191, on evidence of uncharged sex offenses, provides:

> The People presented evidence that the defendant committed the crime[s] of <insert description of offense[s]> that (was/were) not charged in this case. (This/These) crime[s] (is/are) defined for you in these instructions.
> You may consider this evidence only if the People have proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant in fact committed the uncharged offense[s]. Proof by a preponderance of the evidence is a different burden of proof from proof beyond a reasonable doubt. A fact is proved by a preponderance of the evidence if you conclude that it is more likely than not that the fact is true.

If the People have not met this burden of proof, you must disregard this evidence entirely.

If you decide that the defendant committed the uncharged offense[s], you may, but are not required to, conclude from that evidence that the defendant was disposed or inclined to commit sexual offenses, and based on that decision, also conclude that the defendant was likely to commit [and did commit] <insert charged sex offense[s]>, as charged here. If you conclude that the defendant committed the uncharged offense[s], that conclusion is only one factor to consider along with all the other evidence. It is not sufficient by itself to prove that the defendant is guilty of <insert charged sex offense[s]>. The People must still prove (the/each) (charge/ [and] allegation) beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Do not consider this evidence for any other purpose [except for the limited purpose of <insert other permitted purpose, e.g., determining the defendant's credibility>].]

In accord with Reliford, it has been held that CALCRIM 1191 does not violate due process despite semantic differences between it and the former CALJIC 2.50.01. People v Cromp (2007) 153 CA4th 476, 480, 62 CR3d 848. There are virtually identical pattern instructions on evidence of uncharged domestic violence offenses (CALCRIM 852; see also CALJIC 2.50.02) and on evidence of uncharged acts of elder or dependent adult abuse (CALCRIM 853; see also CALJIC 2.50.03). See People v Reyes (2008) 160 CA4th 246, 253, 72 CR3d 586 (CALCRIM 852 does not violate due process).

Ø Warning: Defense counsel who wants the trial court to modify the pattern instruction or to give any other proper instructions on other crimes evidence introduced under Evid C §1108 or §1109 must request them; otherwise, any potential instructional issue will be waived. For example, defense counsel may want to request a limiting instruction when the evidence admitted under §1108 or §1109 is not relevant to all counts charged. See People v Dallas (2008) 165 CA4th 940, 958, 81 CR3d 521.

Evidence of an uncharged sexual offense is admissible under §1108 even if that uncharged offense occurred after the charged offense. People v Medina (2003) 114 CA4th 897, 8 CR3d 158. In a subsequent prosecution, evidence of prior conduct is admissible under §1108 if that conduct constituted a sexual offense, regardless of whether that conduct resulted in a conviction for a crime that is not a sexual offense. People v Lopez (2007) 156 CA4th 1291, 1296, 68 CR3d 376.

§24.53 B. Introducing Evidence of Other Crimes

Evidence of other crimes under Evid C §1101(b) is introduced the same way as any other evidence in the case, in compliance with the Evidence Code. Usually, the victim of the other crime testifies. However, other evidence, including official court records, may be admissible to prove the prior offense. Evid C §452.5(b); People v Wesson (2006) 138 CA4th 959, 967, 41 CR3d 883.

Ø Note: The prosecutor may need to economize to avoid an adverse finding under Evid C §352 that the undue consumption of time or danger of confusing the issues outweighs the probative value of the other crimes evidence.

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.54 C. Procedure for Challenging Evidence of Other Crimes

If the defense does not object at trial, the issue will be waived on appeal. People v Allen (1986) 42 C3d 1222, 1271, 232 CR 849. Although no particular form of objection is required, the objection must alert the trial court to the nature of the anticipated evidence and the basis on which exclusion is sought. A general relevancy objection is inadequate to preserve the issue for appeal. People v Williams (1988) 44 C3d 883, 906, 245 CR 336. Once an objection is made, the prosecution bears the burden of demonstrating admissibility. 44 C3d at 906. The federal courts require the prosecution to "articulate precisely the essential hypothesis" for introducing evidence of the similar crime. See U.S. v Alfonso (9th Cir 1985) 759 F2d 728, 739; U.S. v Mehrmanesh (9th Cir 1982) 689 F2d 822, 830. Defense counsel in state courts may want to request a similar statement from the prosecutor.

Determining the legal admissibility of other crimes evidence is solely a question of law. People v Simon (1986) 184 CA3d 125, 129, 228 CR 855. When a defendant claims that he or she did not commit the uncharged bad act, however, a question of fact is presented that the jury must resolve before any legal inference may be drawn. When a defendant disputes the manner in which the act was committed, that is a preliminary fact that must be resolved before the trial court can evaluate its relevancy and admissibility. 184 CA3d at 130.

> Ø Note: To avoid prejudicing the defendant in front of the jury, the admissibility of other crimes evidence is usually determined out of the jury's presence at an in limine hearing. See §30.19 on how to be sure in limine objections have been preserved.

If the trial court admits evidence that the defendant committed an uncharged sex offense, it must also admit evidence that the defendant was acquitted of that offense. People v Mullens (2004) 119 CA4th 648, 663, 14 CR3d 534 (error reviewed using Watson standard).

© The Regents of the University of California

§24.55 D. Instructions

Defense counsel should request a limiting instruction concerning evidence of other bad acts, modeled on CALCRIM 1191, 375, 852, or 853. See also CALJIC 2.50.01, 2.50.1, and 2.50.02. Although the trial court need not instruct sua sponte on the limited admissibility of other crimes evidence (People v Hawkins (1995) 10 C4th 920, 942, 42 CR2d 636), to diminish the risk of instructional error, a trial court should instruct even in the absence of a request by either party.

Ø Note: Unlike evidence admitted under Evid C §1101(b), there are no limitations on the use the jury may make of evidence admitted under Evid C §§1108-1109.

§25.1 I. INTRODUCTION

There are a number of means by which a criminal prosecution may be terminated, permanently or temporarily, without a conviction or a "not guilty" jury verdict. This chapter will discuss some of them and give an overview of others discussed in greater detail elsewhere; see the chapter outline above.

§25.2 II. CHART: DEADLINES

Action	Deadline	Authority
Motion for probable cause determination for defendant in custody charged with misdemeanor; a second dismissal based on no probable cause is a bar to further prosecution.	In open court, at time of defendant's first appearance.	Pen C §991.
Demurrer.	In open court before plea is entered unless court allows it to be made at later time.	Pen C §§1003-1004.
Plea of former judgment or double jeopardy.	In open court at time of entry of plea, in conjunction with plea of not guilty.	Pen C §§654, 656, 1016, 1017, 1118.2.
Acknowledgment of satisfaction by victim, injured by act constituting misdemeanor, who has civil remedy ("civil compromise").	In open court, when civil compromise has been reached.	Pen C §§1377-1379.
Dismissal of charges after successful diversion.	At end of diversion period.	Pen C §§1000.3, 1001.7, 1001.31, 1001.54, 1001.74.
Dismissal of complaint for defendant in custody if preliminary examination begins:
(1) Beyond 10 court days after date of arraignment, plea, or reinstatement without personal waiver or established good cause; or	(1) In open court on or after 10 court days.	(1) Pen C §859b.
(2) Beyond 60 calendar days after date of arraignment, plea, or reinstatement.	(2) In open court on or after 60 calendar days.	(2) Pen C §859b.
Dismissal of complaint if preliminary hearing is not completed at one session, unless good cause shown by affidavit postpones it.	In open court, at time preliminary hearing reconvenes.	Pen C §861.
Dismissal when not sufficient cause to believe public offense has been committed.	In open court at preliminary hearing.	Pen C §871.
Motion to reduce felony to misdemeanor.	In open court before preliminary hearing magistrate enters order holding defendant to answer.	Pen C §17(b)(5); see Malone v Superior Court (1975) 47 CA3d 313, 317, 120 CR 851.
Dismissal of action if information not filed within 15 days after holding to answer.	In court at time information filed.	Pen C §1382(a)(1).
Dismissal of action if trial begins beyond 30 calendar days for misdemeanors or 60 calendar days for felonies without personal, general waiver.	In open court on or after 30 or 60 calendar days, as relevant.	Pen C §1382(a)(2)-(3).

Motion to set aside indictment for lack of legal commitment or lack of probable cause.	In superior court, on or after arraignment, by Pen C §995 motion.	Pen C §995.
Court discharges jury for lack of jurisdiction of offense, or because facts charged do not constitute offense punishable by law.	No time given in statute.	Pen C §1113.
Request judge dismiss on own motion in furtherance of justice.	At any time before, during, or after trial.	Pen C §1385; People v Superior Court (Howard) (1968) 69 C2d 491, 501, 72 CR 330.
Request judge dismiss after completion of drug treatment.	After successful completion of probation.	Pen C §1210.1; People v Hatch (2000) 22 C4th 260, 268, 92 CR2d 80.
California state prisoner serving sentence sends written request to DA to be brought to trial or to be sentenced on California case.	At any time while serving sentence and another case is pending against prisoner.	Pen C §1381.
Federal prisoner serving sentence in California sends written request to DA to be brought to trial or be sentenced on California case.	At any time while serving sentence and another case is pending against prisoner.	Pen C §1381.5.

For chart of deadlines and discussion of Pen C §1382 dismissals, see chap 19.

III. DISCHARGE

§25.3 A. Discharge for Failure to Initiate Prosecution

If there is no complaint on file at the date and time a defendant has been cited to appear in court, the defendant is entitled to a discharge from custody, bail, or own recognizance obligations for failure to initiate prosecution. Such discharges are not dismissals as defined by Pen C §1387. The statute of limitations continues to run until a complaint or an indictment is filed. See Pen C §§799-805, discussed in §19.14.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.4 B. Discharge for Defendant to Testify for Prosecution or Defense

A defendant in a criminal action is a competent witness for himself or herself or for a codefendant. However, a defendant may not be called as a witness without his or her consent. Evid C §930; People v Haldeen (1968) 267 CA2d 478, 73 CR 102. Before charging, if the prosecution wishes to compel a potential defendant to testify in a codefendant's case, it may refrain from filing a criminal complaint against the defendant either by granting immunity (see chap 49) or by assisting with a civil resolution instead of filing a criminal complaint. CCP §33. When the defendant has been charged, the prosecution may request immunity under Pen C §1324 (felony) or Pen C §1324.1 (misdemeanor), or request discharge of a codefendant during trial before the defense has presented its case (Pen C §1099). The court may discharge a defendant during trial because of insufficient evidence so that the defendant may be a witness for his or her codefendant. Pen C §1100.

A court's action under Pen C §1099 or §1100 is "an acquittal of the defendant discharged, and is a bar to another prosecution for the same offense." Pen C §1101. The "acquittal" achieved under these provisions is not, however, an adjudication that the defendant is not guilty of the crime charged. See People v Hadden (1947) 79 CA2d 635, 637, 180 P2d 371.

Once a defendant is discharged under §1099, the court may not reverse the order discharging him or her, because the court no longer has jurisdiction over the defendant. Bates v Superior Court (1951) 107 CA2d 656, 658, 237 P2d 544. For further discussion of immunity, see chap 49.

IV. CIVIL COMPROMISE

§25.5 A. Misdemeanor Cases

When the victim of a misdemeanor offense has a civil remedy, the court has the discretion to order the prosecution stayed and the defendant discharged by following the procedures outlined in Pen C §§1377-1379. See Hoines v Barney's Club, Inc. (1980) 28 C3d 603, 613, 170 CR 42. A county may be considered the injured party under the civil compromise statutes. People v Strub (1975) 49 CA3d Supp 1, 122 CR 374.

Discharge based on civil compromise is a bar to another prosecution for the same offense. Pen C §1378. The rules on civil compromise are as follows:

- Civil compromise is unavailable for the following violations: offenses committed against a peace officer while executing the duties of his or her office (Pen C §1377(a)), riotously (Pen C §1377(b)), with an intent to commit a felony (Pen C §1377(c)); offenses committed in violation of a court order as described in Pen C §273.6 or §273.65 (Pen C §1377(d); certain exceptions as set out in Pen C §1377); offenses committed in a domestic violence matter by or on a family or household member or another person when the violation involves a person described in Fam C §6211 or Pen C §13700(b) (Pen C §1377(e)), on an elder in violation of Pen C §368 or Welf & I C §15656 (Pen C §1377(f)), or on a child as described in Pen C §647.6 or §11165.6 (Pen C §1377(f)). There is no requirement in Pen C §§1377-1379 that the prosecutor join in a civil compromise.

  Ø Note: There is a division of authority on whether hit-and-run cases (Veh C §§20001-20004) may be compromised under Pen C §§1377-1379. Compare People v McWhinney (1988) 206 CA3d Supp 8, 12, 254 CR 205 (no), with People v Tischman (1995) 35 CA4th 174, 40 CR2d 650 (yes).

- The court may not reduce a felony to a misdemeanor and then order it dismissed under the civil compromise statutes without the prosecution's consent unless the court has found that the defendant had no felonious intent. People v Moulton (1982) 131 CA3d Supp 10, 182 CR 761; People v Strub (1975) 49 CA3d Supp 1, 122 CR 374.
- The victim must appear in court and acknowledge that he or she has received satisfaction for the injury. Pen C §1378. Some judges do not require the victim's presence if there is some proof of the agreement, such as a declaration or affidavit or the prosecutor's representation that he or she has talked with the victim.
- Either the defense or the victim must pay the costs of the prosecution. Pen C §1378.
- The reasons for the compromise must be recorded in a minute order. Pen C §1378. It is insufficient to have the court's explanation only in the reporter's transcript. People v McWhinney (1988) 206 CA3d Supp 8, 11, 254 CR 205.

In People v Moulton (1982) 131 CA3d Supp 10, 21, 182 CR 761, the court recommended that the trial court consider the following issues in deciding whether to exercise its discretion to dismiss after a civil compromise:

- Whether the criminal violation is coextensive with the civil injury;
- Whether the injury to the public is fully vindicated by a private settlement; and
- Whether the victim's agreement to settle is voluntary.

  Ø Note: It is a crime to condition settlement of a civil claim on the nonprosecution of a criminal action. Pen C §153; People v Pic'l (1982) 31 C3d 731, 183 CR 685.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.6 B. Felony Cases

The prosecution may assist in a civil resolution of any crimes against property that could be charged under Pen C §§450-593(g) instead of filing a complaint. Included in these crimes are arson, burglary, forgery, grand theft, embezzlement, extortion, insurance crimes, and several other felonies. CCP §33.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.7 V. DEMURRER

A demurrer is a legal objection to the sufficiency of a pleading, attacking what appears on the face of the document. People v Hale (1965) 232 CA2d 112, 120, 42 CR 533. The demurrer must be made in open court before a plea is entered unless the court allows it to be made at a later time. Pen C §§1003-1004. If a demurrer is sustained, and the defect can be remedied by amending the pleading, the court must give the prosecution an opportunity, not to exceed 10 days, to amend the pleading. See Pen C §1007. Not all defects can be cured by amendment. See, e.g., People v Wright (1938) 26 CA2d 197, 209, 79 P2d 102 (pleading cannot be amended to charge offense for which evidence was not adduced at preliminary hearing).

If a demurrer is sustained without leave to amend, or if a demurrer is sustained with leave to amend but no amendment is made within the time fixed, the action must be dismissed. Pen C §1008. The prosecutor then has the option of filing a new complaint or information or submitting the case to the grand jury. Pen C §1007. The court must permit the prosecutor to amend the charging document if amendment is possible. People v Witt (1975) 53 CA3d 154, 163, 125 CR 653, disapproved on other grounds in People v Posey (2004) 32 C4th 193, 205, 8 CR3d 551.

For further discussion of demurrers, see §§7.19-7.26.

VI. DISMISSAL IN THE INTERESTS OF JUSTICE (PEN C §1385)

A. Procedures

§25.8 1. Motion by Prosecutor or Court

Either a judge or a magistrate may dismiss a case under Pen C §1385. The motion may be made by the prosecutor or by the court. Pen C §1385(a). A Pen C §1385 motion is the only method available to the prosecutor to discontinue a prosecution after an information has been filed or accusation has been found by a grand jury. Pen C §1386 (nolle prosequi abolished); Bradley v Lacy (1997) 53 CA4th 883, 61 CR2d 919.

Ø Note: A prosecutor who moves to dismiss cannot appeal from the dismissal. People v Caserta (1971) 14 CA3d 484, 92 CR 382.

Defense counsel does not have the right to move for dismissal in the interests of justice but may invite the court to consider dismissing a case on its own motion. People v Superior Court (Flores) (1989) 214 CA3d 127, 137, 262 CR 576 (defendant made "motion"; court's dismissal was reversed because record did not reflect that court expressly exercised its authority under §1385); People v Ritchie (1971) 17 CA3d 1098, 1104, 95 CR 462. See also People v Harris (1991) 227 CA3d 1223, 1225, 278 CR 391 (calling suggestion a "Williams motion," after People v Williams (1981) 30 C3d 470, 489, 179 CR 443); People v Lopez (1988) 198 CA3d 135, 140, 243 CR 590, citing People v George (1984) 157 CA3d 1053, 1058, 204 CR 329.

Ø Note: Not only should defense counsel be careful to only suggest a dismissal so that the dismissal is on the court's own motion, but counsel should make sure that the court enters its reasons in the minutes, as required by Pen C §1385(a). For discussion, see §25.12.

There are limits to the court's discretion to dismiss under §1385. For discussion, see §§25.14-25.20; see also §§24.42-24.43. In addition, there are explicit statutory limitations on the court's power to dismiss certain findings under Pen C §1385. For a list of provisions limiting or eliminating the court's §1385 discretion, see §37.41.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.9 2. Time for Motion

A case may be dismissed under Pen C §1385 at any time before, during, or after trial. People v Hatch (2000) 22 C4th 260, 92 CR2d 80 (after jury deadlocked and mistrial declared); People v Superior Court (Howard) (1968) 69 C2d 491, 503, 72 CR 330 (after jury returned verdict of guilty); People v Polk (1964) 61 C2d 217, 228, 37 CR 753 (after defense commenced its case); People v Valenti (1957) 49 C2d 199, 202, 316 P2d 633 (after prosecution commenced its case); People v Bordeaux (1990) 224 CA3d 573, 273 CR 717 (after jury reported deadlock); In re Krieger (1969) 272 CA2d 886, 77 CR 822 (after entry of guilty plea); People v Silva (1965) 236 CA2d 453, 455, 46 CR 87 (before trial).

When the dismissal is part of a negotiated plea, it is advisable that the court take the motion to dismiss under submission until the time of sentencing in order to have full information about the case from the probation report before deciding whether to exercise its discretion to dismiss a felony charge. See People v Beasley (1970) 5 CA3d 617, 636, 85 CR 501. This procedure avoids the problems that may result from a premature dismissal if the defendant later withdraws his or her plea of guilty. See People v Municipal Court (Martinez) (1971) 14 CA3d 362, 366, 92 CR 248.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.10 3. Notice to Prosecutor

When the court, on its own motion, seeks to dismiss an action, it should first give the prosecutor notice and a reasonable opportunity to be present so that he or she may submit additional evidence on the question of whether the interests of justice will be served by the dismissal. People v Gonzales (1965) 235 CA2d Supp 887, 891, 46 CR 301; People v Winters (1959) 171 CA2d Supp 876, 882, 342 P2d 538.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.11 4. Motion May Be Made in Jury's Presence

It is not required that motions to dismiss be made outside the jury's presence. See People v Polk (1964) 61 C2d 217, 229, 37 CR 753. When codefendants are being jointly tried, however, it is better practice for a prosecutor making a motion to dismiss concerning only one defendant to do so outside the jury's presence. People v Alverson (1964) 60 C2d 803, 807, 36 CR 479 (dictum). This prevents prejudice to the codefendants.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.12 5. Entry of Reasons in Minutes and in Disposition Report

If the court orders an action dismissed, the reasons must be set out in an order that is entered in the minutes. Pen C §1385; People v Winters (1959) 171 CA2d Supp 876, 882, 342 P2d 538. This requirement is mandatory. People v Bonnetta (2009) 46 C4th 143, 150, 92 CR3d 370. The statement of reasons must specify the factual basis on which the court has ruled; conclusions are insufficient. People v McAlonan (1972) 22 CA3d 982, 986, 99 CR 733. See People v Fretwell (1970) 8 CA3d Supp 37, 41, 87 CR 356 (statement that court was relying on reported decision that was not itself authority for dismissal at that stage held insufficient).

Failure to state the reasons in the minutes renders a dismissal under Pen C §1385 invalid. People v Orin (1975) 13 C3d 937, 943, 120 CR 65; People v Andrade (1978) 86 CA3d 963, 974, 150 CR 662. An oral statement by the court, even if reduced to writing by a court reporter, does not satisfy the statutory requirement. People v Andrade, supra.

If the trial court's reasons are not set out in an order entered in the minutes, the dismissal is ineffective and the case must be remanded. On remand, the trial court may correct the defect by setting forth its reasons in a written order entered in the minutes. Alternatively, the trial court may revisit its earlier decision and determine that the dismissal was unwarranted or should be ordered for another reason. In such a case, the trial court has the power to take appropriate related action, such as reconvening the sentencing hearing or allowing a defendant to withdraw a plea. People v Bonnetta (2009) 46 C4th 143, 153, 92 CR3d 370.

The court must also state its reasons for dismissing a case under Pen C §1385 in the disposition report that it is required to file with the Department of Justice. Pen C §13151.1(a).

Ø Note: There is no requirement that the trial court's reasons for granting a common law motion to dismiss, not made under Pen C §1385, be entered in the minutes. People v Sims (1982) 32 C3d 468, 474 n3, 186 CR 77 (motion to dismiss based on collateral estoppel and failure to meet request for restitution requirement of Welf & I C §11483).

§25.13 B. All or Part of Case May Be Dismissed

The court may dismiss all or part of a case under Pen C §1385. People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 508, 53 CR2d 789; People v Burke (1956) 47 C2d 45, 51, 301 P2d 241.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.14 C. Court's Discretion Under Pen C §1385

Dismissal in the furtherance of justice is a matter within the court's "exclusive discretion." People v Johnson (1966) 247 CA2d 331, 333, 55 CR 450; People v Parks (1964) 230 CA2d 805, 812, 41 CR 329. Thus, the court may order dismissal over the prosecutor's objection (People v Superior Court (Howard) (1968) 69 C2d 491, 501, 72 CR 330) or may refuse the prosecutor's request for dismissal (People v Parks (1964) 230 CA2d 805, 811, 41 CR 329; People v Smith (1925) 76 CA 105, 111, 243 P 882).

§25.15 D. Limits on Court's Discretion

The court's discretion to dismiss all or part of a prosecution under Pen C §1385 is not absolute. The discretion exercised must be "a valid legal discretion, amounting to more than the substitution of the predilections of a judge for the alleged predilections of the peace officers." People v Winters (1959) 171 CA2d Supp 876, 882, 342 P2d 538. The reason for the dismissal must be that which would motivate a "reasonable judge." People v Curtiss (1970) 4 CA3d 123, 126, 84 CR 106 (abuse of discretion to dismiss on ground that prosecution would render court a "collection agency").

When dismissing a case in furtherance of justice, the court must consider both "the constitutional rights of the defendant and the interests of society." People v Fretwell (1970) 8 CA3d Supp 37, 40, 87 CR 356. This determination involves > a balancing of many factors, including the weighing of the evidence indicative of guilt or innocence, the nature of the crime involved, the fact that the defendant has or has not been incarcerated in prison awaiting trial and the length of such incarceration, the possible harassment and burdens imposed on the defendant by a retrial, and the likelihood, if any, that additional evidence will be presented upon a retrial.

E. Appropriate Grounds for Pen C §1385 Dismissal

§25.16 1. Insufficient Evidence

The prosecutor may move to dismiss a charge or case under Pen C §1385 when he or she determines that there is insufficient evidence to support a conviction. See, e.g., People v Polk (1964) 61 C2d 217, 229, 37 CR 753 (defendant was in jail when crime was committed). A judge may dismiss for legal insufficiency of the evidence. People v Hatch (2000) 22 C4th 260, 267, 92 CR2d 80; People v Salgado (2001) 88 CA4th 5, 105 CR2d 373.

Ø Note: There are other ways for a defendant to seek a dismissal based on insufficient evidence: at a probable cause hearing in misdemeanor cases (Pen C §991; see §6.23); at the preliminary hearing in felony cases (Pen C §871); by a Pen C §995 motion in felony cases (Pen C §1387(a)); at trial through a motion for judgment of acquittal (Pen C §§1118-1118.1)); and when seeking appellate review of the issue after it was raised in the trial court (see Pen C §1259; People v Superior Court (Howard) (1968) 69 C2d 491, 505, 72 CR 330).

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.17 2. Plea Agreement

A common use of Pen C §1385 is for the prosecutor to move to dismiss one or more counts in an accusatory pleading in exchange for the defendant's agreement to plead guilty to the remaining counts, or in exchange for the defendant's promise to testify in the same or another prosecution. See, e.g., People v Superior Court (Mowry) (1971) 20 CA3d 684, 97 CR 886.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.18 3. Enhancement Allegations

The court may dismiss or strike enhancement and prior conviction allegations unless the legislature has clearly limited the court's authority to strike the enhancement. People v Fritz (1985) 40 C3d 227, 219 CR 460. In an appropriate case, the trial court has discretion to dismiss one or more strikes to reduce the length of a defendant's sentence. People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 504, 53 CR2d 789.

§25.19 4. Other Grounds for §1385 Dismissal

There is no statutory list of situations that permit dismissal under Pen C §1385. The following are examples of proper dismissals under §1385:

- Dismissal of a misdemeanor conviction that would make the defendant ineligible for Proposition 36 sentencing. People v Orabuena (2004) 116 CA4th 84, 96, 10 CR3d 99. See §§27.26, 38.3A for discussion of Proposition 36.
- Dismissal of charges to permit prosecutor to add additional defendants or new offenses. See Casey v Superior Court (1989) 207 CA3d 837, 844, 255 CR 81 (dicta).
- Dismissal of charges because prosecution cannot proceed without unavailable witness. See Casey v Superior Court (1989) 207 CA3d 837, 844, 255 CR 81 (dicta).
- Dismissal of charges because prosecution's interference with defendant's right to counsel led to complete breakdown of attorney-client relationship. Boulas v Superior Court (1986) 188 CA3d 422, 233 CR 487. See also §3.29.
- Dismissal of charges because judge believed retrial was brought to harass defendant. People v Superior Court (Howard) (1968) 69 C2d 491, 504, 72 CR 330 (judge dismissed case under §1385 after jury returned guilty verdict).

§25.20 F. Improper Grounds for §1385 Dismissal

The trial court may not dismiss charges, proceedings, or enhancements under Pen C §1385 in the following situations:

- The court may not strike an enhancement or other sentencing allegation when the legislature has eliminated the trial court's discretion. See, e.g., Pen C §1385(b) (trial court may not strike Pen C §667(a) "serious felony" enhancement); Pen C §1385.1 (court may not dismiss special circumstance finding that has been admitted or found true by jury).
- The court may not dismiss sanity proceedings under §1385 to preserve judicial resources. People v Hernandez (2000) 22 C4th 512, 523, 93 CR2d 509.
- The court may not enter into a plea agreement with the defendant over the prosecutor's objection. People v Orin (1975) 13 C3d 937, 943, 120 CR 65. For further discussion of plea bargaining, see §§26.7-26.22.
- The court may not dismiss an action because the prosecutor requests a continuance, even without good cause, if the requested extension would not violate the defendant's statutory or constitutional right to a speedy trial. People v Ferguson (1990) 218 CA3d 1173, 267 CR 528; People v Rubaum (1980) 110 CA3d 930, 168 CR 291; People v Flores (1978) 90 CA3d Supp 1, 152 CR 896.
- The trial court may not dismiss an action in the interest of justice to obtain an appellate ruling. People v Ritchie (1971) 17 CA3d 1098, 1105, 95 CR 462 (trial court dismissed case at Pen C §1538.5 hearing because evidence not physically present in court and judge wanted appellate court to decide whether its presence was required).
- The trial court may not dismiss the case merely because it would be in the defendant's or victim's best interest, if the court has no reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt. People v Superior Court (Long) (1976) 56 CA3d 374, 126 CR 465. See also People v McAlonan (1972) 22 CA3d 982, 987, 99 CR 733 (dismissal provisions of Pen C §1385 cannot be used for rehabilitation purposes); People v Municipal Court (Gelardi) (1978) 84 CA3d 692, 149 CR 30 (court could not, over prosecution's objection, use Pen C §1385 to effect its own form of nonstatutory diversion).
- The trial court may not dismiss because of court congestion, or for judicial convenience, when there is no detriment to the defendant. People v Kessel (1976) 61 CA3d 322, 132 CR 126.
- The illegality of a defendant's arrest is not a proper basis for dismissal of the action. People v Valenti (1957) 49 C2d 199, 203, 316 P2d 633, 635, cited with approval in People v Charles (1967) 66 C2d 330, 332 n1, 57 CR 745. See also U.S. v Alvarez-Machain (1992) 504 US 655, 119 L Ed 2d 441, 112 S Ct 2188. It may be used, however, as a basis for suppressing evidence or a confession obtained as a result of an illegal arrest. See chaps 16 (suppressing evidence) and 23 (confessions).

VII. DISMISSAL ON OTHER GROUNDS

§25.21 A. Diversion (Pen C §§1000-1001.75)

A defendant who is charged with certain specified crimes or who is developmentally disabled may be eligible for diversion under Pen C §§1000-1001.75. For offenses eligible for diversion, see Pen C §§1000-1000.8 (narcotics drug abuse cases), 1000.12, 1001-1001.9 and 1001.50-1001.55 (misdemeanor diversion cases), 1001.20-1001.34 (cases involving defendants with cognitive developmental disabilities), 1001.60-1001.67 (bad-check diversion cases), and 1001.70-1001.75 (parental diversion cases). Depending on the facts of the case, a defendant may be diverted before charges are filed (see Pen C §§1000.12(b), 1001.64), before a plea is entered (preplea diversion) (see Pen C §§1001-1001.9), or after pleading guilty (deferred entry of judgment) (see Pen C §§1000-1000.5, 1000.12, 1000.17). When a defendant successfully completes a diversion program, the trial court must dismiss the charges. Pen C §§1000.3, 1001.7, 1001.31, 1001.54, 1001.74. After successful completion of diversion, (1) the divertee may indicate in response to most questions about his or her prior criminal record that he or she was not arrested or diverted for that offense, and (2) with one exception, the arrest record may not be used to deny the divertee any employment benefit, license, or certificate. Pen C §§1000.4, 1000.5, 1001.9, 1001.33, 1001.55, 1001.75. No statement or information obtained from a defendant in connection with the diversion program is admissible in any action or proceeding. Pen C §§1000.1(c), 1001.5, 1001.24-1001.25, 1001.52(b), 1001.67, and 1001.72(b).

Ø Note: Information on the diversion of police officers and persons who apply to become police officers may be disclosed. Pen C §§1000.4, 1001.9, 1001.33, 1001.55, 1001.75. In addition, if the defendant entered a guilty or nolo contendere plea, the arrest record may be used in deportation proceedings. Paredes-Urrestarazu v U.S. INS (9th Cir 1994) 36 F3d 801.

For further discussion of diversion and deferred entry of judgment, see chap 27. On the immigration consequences of state criminal convictions, see chap 52.

§25.22 B. Alternative Dispute Resolution

Alternative dispute resolution programs may result in charges never being filed. See Pen C §§14150-14156. Even after charges have been filed, the court, with the agreement of the prosecution and the defendant, may refer misdemeanor cases to an established alternative dispute resolution program. Pen C §14154.

For further discussion of alternative dispute resolution, see §27.14.

§25.23 C. Successful Completion of Drug Treatment Probation (Pen C §1210.1)

Penal Code §1210.1 mandates probation and drug treatment for persons convicted of specified nonviolent drug possession offenses. After successful completion of drug treatment, a defendant may petition the sentencing court for dismissal of the charges. Pen C §1210.1(d)(1). If the court finds that the defendant substantially complied with probation conditions and successfully completed treatment, the court must set aside the conviction and dismiss the charges. On the meaning of the term "successfully completed," see People v Hinkel (2005) 125 CA4th 845, 22 CR3d 895. On dismissal, the conviction is deemed never to have occurred, and with certain exceptions (Pen C §1210.1(d)(2)-(3)), the defendant is released from all penalties and disabilities resulting from the conviction. Pen C §1210.1(d)(1). For example, the dismissal does not permit possession of a concealed weapon and does not prevent conviction under Pen C §12021. An order under §1210.1(d)(1) setting aside a conviction does not moot defendant's appeal of the conviction. People v DeLong (2002) 101 CA4th 482, 492, 124 CR2d 293. For further discussion, see §41.17.

§25.24 D. Double Jeopardy and Related Issues

The double jeopardy clauses (US Const amends V, XIV; Cal Const art I, §15) and California statutes (Pen C §§654, 656, 793-794, 1016, 1017(3)-(4)) provide protection against subsequent prosecution for the same offense. Dismissals based on double jeopardy are a bar to further prosecution. For further discussion, see §§26.23-26.28.

© The Regents of the University of California

E. Denial of Speedy Trial Rights

§25.25 1. Delay in Prosecuting Case (Pen C §1382)

Absent a waiver, consent, or good cause, if an action is not brought to trial within the applicable constitutional and statutory time limits, the court must order the action dismissed. Pen C §§1381, 1381.5, 1382. The right to a speedy trial is discussed in chap 19.

© The Regents of the University of California

2. Defendant Sentenced and Imprisoned on Another Charge

§25.26 a. State Imprisonment (Pen C §§1203.2a and 1381)

When a defendant placed on probation with imposition of sentence suspended is sentenced and imprisoned on another charge, the defendant may request imposition of sentence in his or her absence and without representation of counsel. The court must impose sentence and issue its commitment order or make a final order terminating jurisdiction in the case within 30 days of the request or it loses jurisdiction to do so. Pen C §1203.2a; People v Wagner (2009) 45 C4th 1039, 1050, 1051, 90 CR3d 26.

When a sentenced prisoner who is serving more than 90 calendar days in a California state or local correctional facility delivers to the district attorney of a county in which another criminal proceeding is pending a written request to be brought to trial or be sentenced, the district attorney must bring the prisoner to trial or for sentencing within 90 calendar days after the request is received. The remedy for failure to comply with the statute is dismissal. Pen C §1381.

Ø Note: Penal Code §1381 applies to a defendant placed on probation with imposition of sentence suspended who is subsequently imprisoned on another charge. However, the consequence for failure to meet the 90-day limit is only dismissal of the probation revocation proceedings and not dismissal of the conviction underlying the grant of probation. People v Wagner (2009) 45 C4th 1039, 1057, 90 CR3d 26.

The court may dismiss the case on its own motion or on the motion of the prosecution, the defense, or a correctional facility. Pen C §1381. When simultaneous demands are made by more than one jurisdiction, the time limitations of §1381 are tolled for subsequent jurisdictions while the prisoner is unavailable because he or she is facing trial in another county. People v Boggs (1985) 166 CA3d 851, 212 CR 683.

Ø Note: When counsel undertakes to assist a prisoner in filing a request for trial or sentencing under §1381, counsel should be careful to provide for and obtain proof that the request was received by the district attorney's office.

A dismissal under §1381 counts as one dismissal in a felony case. Pen C §1387. On the "two-dismissal" rule of Pen C §1387, see §§13.31, 25.46. A dismissed probation revocation can be refiled. People v Wagner (2009) 45 C4th 1039, 1059, 90 CR3d 26.

For further discussion of Pen C §1381 motions, see §19.30.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.27 b. Federal and Out-of-State Imprisonment (Pen C §§1381.5, 1389)

In federal prison in California (Pen C §1381.5). When a prisoner serving more than 90 calendar days in a federal correctional facility in California sends a written request to be brought to trial or be sentenced on a California state court case to the district attorney of the county in which the other criminal matter is pending, the district attorney must promptly inquire of the federal authority when the prisoner may be released for trial or sentencing. If the federal authority assents to release the prisoner to the state, the district attorney must bring the defendant to trial or sentencing within 90 calendar days after the date the assent is received. If the federal authority sets a release date to the state that is beyond the 90-day limit, the district attorney must bring the prisoner to trial or sentencing at the time specified by federal authorities. Pen C §1381.5.

If the defendant is not brought to trial or for sentencing as provided by §1381.5, the court must dismiss the action on its own motion or on the motion of the prosecution, defense, or correctional facility. Pen C §1381.5. See discussion in §19.31.

Ø Note: As with Pen C §1381 (see §25.26), the consequence for failure to meet the 90-day limit in the case of a defendant placed on probation with imposition of sentence suspended is dismissal only of the probation revocation proceedings. People v Wagner (2009) 45 C4th 1039, 1057, 90 CR3d 26.

In prison in another state. The Interstate Agreement on Detainers (Pen C §§1389-1389.8) provides procedures for federal and state prisoners in other states to resolve untried criminal cases in California. See discussion in §19.32.

Remedy. A dismissal under §1381.5 counts as one dismissal in a felony case. Pen C §1387. On the "two-dismissal" rule of Pen C §1387, see §§13.31, 25.46.

§25.28 c. Nonfelony Vehicle Code Violations Pending When Sentenced to State Prison or Committed to Youth Authority

Vehicle Code §41500 provides for dismissal of most nonfelony offenses arising from the operation of a motor vehicle that are pending when a defendant is sentenced to state prison or committed to the Division of Juvenile Justice. Section 41500 does not apply to violations of Veh C §§23103, 23152, or 23153, violations that require immediate revocation or suspension of the offender's driver's license, or violations committed by a person temporarily released from custody or on parole. Veh C §41500(d)-(f). See People v Minor (1988) 204 CA3d Supp 5, 251 CR 636.

The court must dismiss a case charging violation of any statute or ordinance governing the parking of vehicles after the following conditions are met (Veh C §40210(b)):

- The person charged provides an affidavit of nonliability (Veh C §40208) with evidence that he or she has made a bona fide sale or transfer of the vehicle, and has delivered its possession to the purchaser before the date of the alleged violation; and
- The court obtains verification from the Department of Motor Vehicles that the person charged complied with Veh C §5602 before the date of the alleged violation.

§25.30 G. Treatment of Disabled Defendant

A variety of statutes allow the court to dismiss an action pending against a developmentally disabled, chronically alcoholic, or drug-abusing defendant who has been referred to the appropriate authority for evaluation and treatment. Developmental disability includes mental retardation, cerebral palsy, epilepsy, autism, and closely related handicapping conditions. See Pen C §1370.1. Chronic alcoholics and drug abusers are covered by Welf & I C §§5225, 5226.1, and 5230. See discussion in chap 27 (diversion), §§37.64-37.66 (commitment of narcotics addicts), and 48.71-48.74 (Lanterman-Petris-Short Act).

§25.31 H. Preliminary Hearing Not Completed in Single Session

A preliminary hearing must be completed in one session unless the magistrate postpones it for good cause shown by affidavit (or declaration (see CCP §2015.5)). Pen C §861. The magistrate may interrupt the preliminary hearing to conduct brief court matters without violating the "one session" rule as long as a substantial majority of the court's time is devoted to the preliminary hearing. Pen C §861(b).

The remedy for violation of Pen C §861 is dismissal. People v Bucher (1959) 175 CA2d 343, 346 P2d 202. For further discussion, see §8.18. A dismissal under Pen C §861 counts as one dismissal in a felony case. Pen C §1387. On the "two-dismissal" rule of Pen C §1387, see §§13.31, 25.46.

I. No Probable Cause to Believe Public Offense Has Been Committed

§25.32 1. Dismissal of Felony Complaint at Preliminary Hearing (Pen C §871)

Lack of probable cause. If a magistrate who presides over a preliminary hearing determines that no public offense has been committed or that there is not sufficient cause to believe that the defendant is guilty of the offense, the magistrate must order the complaint dismissed and the defendant released from custody. Pen C §871.

Delay. A magistrate must dismiss a felony complaint of a defendant in custody if the defendant does not waive time, or good cause is not shown for a continuance, and the preliminary hearing is set or continued beyond the 10-court-day period mandated by Pen C §859b. Pen C §1387; Landrum v Superior Court (1981) 30 C3d 1, 6, 177 CR 325. For further discussion, see §8.16.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.33 2. Dismissal of Misdemeanor Complaint (Pen C §991)

If a defendant is in custody when he or she appears for arraignment on a misdemeanor, defense counsel may make a motion for the magistrate to make an immediate determination on whether there is probable cause to believe that a public offense has been committed and that the defendant is guilty of it. Pen C §991(a). In no event should the probable cause hearing occur later than 48 hours after arrest unless the government demonstrates the existence of a bona fide emergency or extraordinary circumstances. County of Riverside v McLaughlin (1991) 500 US 44, 114 L Ed 2d 49, 111 S Ct 1661.

The court must consider any warrant with supporting affidavit, and any documents or reports incorporated by reference in support of the warrant. Pen C §991(c). If the court finds no probable cause, it must dismiss the complaint and discharge the defendant. Pen C §991(d). The district attorney has 15 calendar days within which to refile the complaint. A second dismissal is a bar to reprosecution. Pen C §§991(e), 1387. On the "two-dismissal" rule of Pen C §1387, see §§13.31, 25.46.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.34 3. Pen C §995 Dismissal

The defense may challenge all or part of an indictment or information in the superior court by a Pen C §995 motion if the defendant was not legally committed or was committed without reasonable or probable cause. Pen C §995.

The prosecutor may not recharge, in an information in superior court, charges that were dismissed by a magistrate on the basis of factual findings. People v Luna (1983) 140 CA3d 788, 189 CR 792. If the prosecutor does recharge such charges, the defendant's remedy is a Pen C §995 motion. Jones v Superior Court (1971) 4 C3d 660, 664, 94 CR 289. For discussion of what the prosecutor can do to recharge the offense, see §§13.31-13.38.

A dismissal under §995 counts as one dismissal; two dismissals may be a complete bar to further prosecution of a felony. Pen C §1387(a). There are, however, several exceptions to the "two-dismissal" rule. See Pen C §1387. On the "two-dismissal" rule of Pen C §1387, see §§13.31, 25.46.

For further discussion of §995 motions, see chap 13. For further discussion of grand jury proceedings, see chap 9.

§25.35 J. Adult Who Committed Crime When Juvenile and Cannot Be Tried in Either Adult or Juvenile Court

The juvenile court (which is part of the superior court) has jurisdiction over persons who committed crimes as juveniles. Welf & I C §607. When an accused is not brought before the court until he or she is an adult, a juvenile adjudication may be "a hollow ceremony." In re Pfeiffer (1968) 264 CA2d 470, 477, 70 CR 831. In Pfeiffer, the defendant was found unfit, was sentenced to state prison, escaped, and was recaptured years later. The appellate court's opinion was written when the defendant was 27 years old, beyond the statutory age limit for a juvenile commitment. To return the case to the superior court would result in denying the defendant his statutory and constitutional rights. Accordingly, his indictment for robbery was dismissed. But see In re Harris (1993) 5 C4th 813, 850, 21 CR2d 373 (when adult under 25 successfully petitioned for writ of habeas corpus based on judicial finding of unfitness in excess of trial court's jurisdiction, state supreme court remanded matter to superior court for new disposition by juvenile court).

§25.36 K. Offense No Longer Crime

When a criminal statute is repealed, the legislature retains the authority to preserve criminal sanctions for acts committed before its repeal through a "savings" clause. In the absence of a savings clause, pending criminal proceedings involving the repealed statute are arrested. The court should discharge the defendant and dismiss the proceedings as long as the repeal occurred before the defendant's appeal is final. People v Rossi (1976) 18 C3d 295, 302, 134 CR 64 (interpreting effect on mitigation of punishment because of change in law). See also Govt C §9608.

L. Prosecution Failure to Disclose Material Information

§25.37 1. Refusal to Disclose Informant's Identity

The trial court must dismiss a case if the prosecutor fails to disclose the identity of a confidential informant who is a material witness on the issue of guilt. See Roviaro v U.S. (1957) 353 US 53, 60, 1 L Ed 2d 639, 644, 77 S Ct 623. Similarly, the court must dismiss a case if the government refuses to disclose an informant's whereabouts or fails to make a good faith effort to keep in contact with the informant before trial. Eleazer v Superior Court (1970) 1 C3d 847, 851, 83 CR 586 (disclosure of "all pertinent information" on informant's whereabouts required); Twiggs v Superior Court (1983) 34 C3d 360, 366, 194 CR 152 (prosecution must make reasonable efforts to maintain contact with material witness).

In cases involving multiple counts, the informant may be a material witness on one count but not material on another. In that event, dismissal of only the counts concerning which the informant is a material witness is appropriate. People v Goliday (1973) 8 C3d 771, 783, 106 CR 113. For example, when sale and possession of narcotics are charged, the informant is frequently a material witness only on the sale count.

On motions to disclose the identity of an informant, see chap 17.

§25.38 2. Failure to Provide Discovery

The court has a wide range of sanctions with which to enforce the discovery obligations of Pen C §§1054-1054.7. The sanctions of last resort are prohibition of witness testimony (which may be applied to both the defense and the prosecution), and dismissal of a charge if nondisclosure violates the U.S. Constitution. Pen C §1054.5(b)-(c). For further discussion of constitutional disclosure requirements, see §§11.26-11.29.

There are two limits on the court's ability to sanction noncompliance with discovery. First, the court may prohibit the testimony of a witness only if all other sanctions have been exhausted. Pen C §1054.5(c). Second, the court may not dismiss a charge unless required to do so by the U.S. Constitution. Pen C §1054.5(c).

Ø Note: Evidence lost or destroyed by the prosecution may still be used against a defendant if the prosecution did not act in bad faith in failing to preserve the evidence, even though it might have been exculpatory. See Arizona v Youngblood (1988) 488 US 51, 102 L Ed 2d 281, 109 S Ct 333; California v Trombetta (1984) 467 US 479, 488, 81 L Ed 2d 413, 422, 104 S Ct 2528.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.39 M. Material Witness Unavailable Because of State Action

A defendant is not entitled to a dismissal merely because he or she is unable to obtain a material witness. If state action has made a material witness unavailable, however, dismissal may be required by due process and the defendant's constitutional right to a fair trial.

The prosecution is responsible for keeping in touch with informants. Eleazer v Superior Court (1970) 1 C3d 847, 851, 83 CR 586. This is commonly called the Eleazer, or Mejia (People v Mejia (1976) 57 CA3d 574, 129 CR 192), rule. See discussion in §§17.18 (*Eleaze*r), 52.9 (Mejia).

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.40 N. Discriminatory Law Enforcement

The deliberate discriminatory enforcement of a criminal statute for an invidiously selected class of individuals is a ground for dismissal for violation of the right to equal protection. U.S. v Armstrong (1996) 517 US 456, 464, 134 L Ed 2d 687, 698, 116 S Ct 1480; Murgia v Municipal Court (1975) 15 C3d 286, 290, 124 CR 204. This issue is properly raised by a pretrial motion to dismiss (sometimes called a "Murgia motion"). Treatment that may result from simple laxity of enforcement or the selective enforcement of a statute based on justifiable police procedures is not a denial of equal protection. People v Superior Court (Hartway) (1977) 19 C3d 338, 349, 138 CR 66 (police could enforce prostitution statute only against profiteers (primarily women) and not against customers (primarily men)).

A dismissal based on discriminatory law enforcement is a final dismissal. Yick Wo v Hopkins (1886) 118 US 356, 30 L Ed 220, 6 S Ct 1064.

For further discussion, see §§18.16-18.25.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.41 O. Lesser Included Offense

A defendant cannot be convicted of two offenses if one offense is necessarily included within the other. People v Ortega (1998) 19 C4th 686, 692, 80 CR2d 489; People v Pearson (1986) 42 C3d 351, 355, 228 CR 509. Consequently, a conviction for a necessarily included offense must be dismissed at sentencing. People v Ortiz (2002) 101 CA4th 410, 415, 124 CR2d 92.

Ø Note: A defendant may otherwise be convicted of two offenses arising out of the same act or course of conduct although sentencing for both offenses may be prohibited by Pen C §654. On Pen C §654, see §37.44.

VIII. MOTION FOR MISTRIAL

§25.42 A. Grounds for Mistrial

A motion for mistrial is a request to the court to terminate the trial after the trial has begun but before verdict. A trial ordinarily is deemed to have begun when jeopardy attaches, i.e., when the jury is sworn or, in a court trial, when the first witness is sworn. Rhinehart v Municipal Court (1984) 35 C3d 772, 779 n8, 200 CR 916. See also Perryman v Superior Court (2006) 141 CA4th 767, 775, 46 CR3d 306. The motion should be granted if there is prejudice that cannot be cured by instruction or jury admonition. People v Jenkins (2000) 22 C4th 900, 985, 95 CR2d 377; People v Hines (1997) 15 C4th 997, 1038, 64 CR2d 594.

Grounds for mistrial include prosecutorial misconduct (People v Rodrigues (1994) 8 C4th 1060, 1154, 36 CR2d 235); midtrial substitution of counsel (People v Gibbs (1986) 177 CA3d 763, 766, 223 CR 194); jury misconduct and jury deadlock (see Pen C §1140); jury's inability to reach a verdict because of an accident, illness, or other physical cause beyond the court's control (see Pen C §1141); erroneous admission of incurably prejudicial evidence (People v Harris (1994) 22 CA4th 1575, 1581, 28 CR2d 317); and a witness's improper volunteering of information that the court had excluded in a prior ruling (People v Williams (1997) 16 C4th 153, 211, 66 CR2d 123).

Appellate courts review a trial court's denial of a motion for mistrial under the deferential abuse-of-discretion standard. People v Cox (2003) 30 C4th 916, 953, 135 CR2d 272, disapproved on other grounds in People v Doolin (2009) 45 C4th 390, 421 n22, 87 CR3d 209. For further discussion of mistrials, see California Trial Objections, chap 56 (Cal CEB Annual).

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.43 B. Jeopardy

When a defendant consents to the discharge of the jury before a verdict has been rendered (People v Gibbs (1986) 177 CA3d 763, 765, 223 CR 194) or when a court's mistrial ruling is based on a finding of legal necessity (People v Marshall (1996) 13 C4th 799, 825, 55 CR2d 347; People v McNally (1980) 107 CA3d 387, 390, 165 CR 715), a plea of former jeopardy does not lie and the case may be retried. See Pen C §1140. As a rule, when the defense moves for a mistrial, the defendant affirmatively waives a future claim of once in jeopardy. Gibbs, 177 CA3d at 766. An exception exists when a mistrial is provoked by prosecutorial or judicial misconduct that "goaded" the defendant into making the motion. In that event, the defendant's "consent" may not be deemed a waiver of the double jeopardy protection. See Oregon v Kennedy (1982) 456 US 667, 673, 72 L Ed 2d 416, 423, 102 S Ct 2083. For further discussion of jeopardy, see §§26.23-26.28.

Ø Note: Both the federal and state prohibitions against double jeopardy (see US Const amend V; Cal Const art I, §15) bar retrial when the prosecution intentionally commits misconduct for the purpose of causing a mistrial. In addition, the state double jeopardy ban may bar retrial when the prosecutor, believing that a defendant is likely to be acquitted at trial, knowingly and intentionally commits misconduct in order to thwart the acquittal. People v Batts (2003) 30 C4th 660, 695, 134 CR2d 67. But "'normal' prejudicial prosecutorial misconduct," including the failure to disclose material, exculpatory evidence, does not bar retrial even though it may warrant reversal. Sons v Superior Court (2004) 125 CA4th 110, 117, 22 CR3d 647.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.44 C. Defense Motion for Mistrial

Defense counsel may choose not to move for or consent to a mistrial for many reasons. He or she may be of the opinion that no error in fact occurred or, if it occurred, that it was not prejudicial. Counsel may choose another remedy, such as moving to strike or requesting an admonition, or may attempt to impeach the witness or offer contrary defense evidence. Indeed, even when a palpably prejudicial error has been committed, a defendant may have valid tactical reasons for preferring to proceed to verdict. A defendant may withdraw his or her motion for a mistrial before court action and actual jury discharge. Cardenas v Superior Court (1961) 56 C2d 273, 14 CR 657.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.45 D. Prosecution Motion for Mistrial

A prosecution request for mistrial will not bar retrial of the cause if legal necessity exists for granting the motion. See People v Fields (1996) 13 C4th 289, 311, 52 CR2d 282. When, for example, a jury renders a verdict on a lesser included offense without first acquitting the defendant on the charged offense and then declines to acquit on the greater offense after the court directs reconsideration under Pen C §1161, the prosecution may obtain retrial of the entire matter by moving the court to declare a mistrial. Alternatively, the prosecutor may elect to accept the conviction for the lesser offense and request the court to dismiss the charged offense under Pen C §1385 in the interest of justice. 13 C4th at 311. For further discussion of legal necessity, see §26.27.

IX. DISMISSAL AS BAR TO FURTHER PROSECUTION

§25.46 A. General Rules

When a case is dismissed before jeopardy attaches, whether a dismissal is a bar to further prosecution depends on the nature of the dismissal. On jeopardy, see §§26.23-26.28.

Constitutional grounds. Generally, when a case is dismissed on constitutional grounds, the dismissal is a bar to further prosecution for that offense. See, e.g., Yick Wo v Hopkins (1886) 118 US 356, 30 L Ed 220, 6 S Ct 1064 (discriminatory law enforcement); Strunk v U.S. (1973) 412 US 434, 37 L Ed 2d 56, 93 S Ct 2260 (speedy trial (US Const Amend VI)); Barber v Municipal Court (1979) 24 C3d 742, 760, 157 CR 658 (interference with right to counsel); People v Pinedo (2005) 128 CA4th 968, 27 CR3d 562 (unreasonable preaccusation delay (due process)).

Statutory dismissal in misdemeanor cases. A court's order dismissing an action under Pen C §1385 is a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense if it is a misdemeanor (Marler v Municipal Court (1980) 110 CA3d 155, 162, 167 CR 666), unless it is charged along with a felony. A misdemeanor that is charged together with a felony is treated like the felony for the purpose of determining whether subsequent prosecutions are barred. Pen C §1387. Dismissal of a misdemeanor complaint does not bar further prosecution for the same conduct if it is subsequently charged as a felony. Burris v Superior Court (2005) 34 C4th 1012, 22 CR3d 876.

Dismissal of a misdemeanor not charged with a felony is a bar even if the dismissal order was made inadvertently. In re Krieger (1969) 272 CA2d 886, 890, 77 CR 822.

Statutory dismissal in felony cases. Under Pen C §1387, if the court twice dismisses a felony, or a misdemeanor charged with a felony, on one of the statutory grounds specified in Pen C §1387(a), the order terminating the action for the second time is a bar to a third prosecution for the same offense unless certain exceptions outlined in §1387 apply. These are the specified statutory grounds for dismissal:

- The preliminary hearing was set or continued beyond 10 days after the date of arraignment. Pen C §859b.
- The preliminary hearing was not completed in a single session. Pen C §8619(a).
- The preliminary hearing was postponed without the defendant's consent for more than 60 days from the date on which a motion for postponement was granted. Pen C §861(b).
- The magistrate dismissed the complaint for lack of probable cause. Pen C §871.
- The accusatory pleading was set aside under Pen C §995.
- The prosecution failed to bring the defendant to trial on a pending charge within 90 days of delivery of the defendant's notice under Pen C §1381.
- The interests of justice required dismissal. Pen C §1385.

Ø Note: When Pen C §1387 permits the prosecution to refile the action against the defendant after dismissal, the court may rearraign the defendant on the existing accusatory pleading without entering a formal order terminating the previous action if both the prosecution and the defense consent. Pen C §1387.2. A stipulated termination under Pen Code §1387.2 counts as one dismissal under Pen C §1387. People v Mason (2006) 140 CA4th 1190, 1197, 45 CR3d 256.

If the dismissed felony is a "wobbler," it may be recharged as either a felony or a misdemeanor. Vizcarra v Municipal Court (1972) 27 CA3d 916, 104 CR 177.

The exceptions to Pen C §1387's two-dismissal rule for nonviolent felonies are as follows:

- Substantial new evidence is discovered that was not previously available.
- The action was terminated as a result of the direct intimidation of a material witness.
- The complaining witness in a Pen C §243(e), §262, §273.5, or §273.6 case failed to appear after having been personally subpoenaed. This exception applies only once in a case, and only within 6 months after dismissal of the action.
- The action is dismissed before the preliminary hearing begins so that an indictment based on the same subject matter can be sought.

- An action involving a misdemeanor act of domestic violence (under Pen C §13700(a)-(b)) is terminated because the complaining witness failed to appear. This exception must be invoked within 6 months after termination of the action, and may be invoked only once.
- When the first dismissal was under Pen C §859b, §861, §871, or §995, the second dismissal is not a bar in the following circumstances:
- Good cause is shown why the preliminary examination was not held within 60 calendar days after the date of arraignment or plea.
- The §995 motion was granted for the reasons discussed in §13.31.
- A count of a complaint is first dismissed by a magistrate under Pen C §871, recharged under Pen C §739, then dismissed under Pen C §995. The dismissal under §871 is not counted for purposes of refiling. Pen C §1387(c)(3); People v Superior Court (Martinez) (1993) 19 CA4th 738, 23 CR2d 733. But when a charge is refiled after a §995 motion is granted, and the second magistrate refuses to hold the defendant to answer, that order is a second termination barring further prosecution under §739. See Ramos v Superior Court (1982) 32 C3d 26, 35, 184 CR 622; Bodner v Superior Court (1996) 42 CA4th 1801, 50 CR2d 236. For discussion, see §13.31.

Ø Note: Dismissal for lack of territorial jurisdiction (defined in §15.3) does not count as a dismissal under Pen C §1385 and is thus not a bar to any further prosecution (see Pen C §1387). Casey v Superior Court (1989) 207 CA3d 837, 255 CR 81.

Two dismissals under Pen C §1387 will not bar the filing of different charges arising from the same conduct as long as the new charges could have been committed without engaging in the conduct alleged in the twice-dismissed charges. People v Meza (1991) 231 CA3d 362, 282 CR 366 (drunk driving with injury (Veh C §21353) can be committed without engaging in car theft or robbery (Veh C §10851)). See also People v Traylor (2009) 46 C4th 1205, 96 CR3d 277 (prior dismissal of felony vehicular manslaughter with gross negligence did not bar subsequent prosecution for lesser included misdemeanor of vehicular manslaughter with ordinary negligence). A greater offense may not be filed, however, after two dismissals of a lesser included offense, nor may a charge be filed that is of the same "essence" as the twice-dismissed charges. Dunn v Superior Court (1984) 159 CA3d 1110, 206 CR 242 (kidnapping for robbery is greater offense that includes simple kidnapping, and auto theft is of same essence as robbery).

But when the facts of the incident remain unchanged, the prosecution may not invoke Pen C §1387.1 to charge a violent felony in a third filing when the charged offense in the two prior dismissals was not a violent felony. People v Salcido (2008) 166 CA4th 1303, 1313, 83 CR3d 561.

Additional reasons for allowing refiling of violent felonies. An additional exception to the two-dismissal rule exists for the offenses defined as violent felonies in Pen C §667.5(c). A violent felony may be refiled for a third time after two dismissals under §1387 if either of the prior dismissals was due solely to excusable neglect. Pen C §1387.1(a). Excusable neglect "includes, but is not limited to, error on the part of the court, prosecution, law enforcement agency, or witnesses." Pen C §1387.1(b). See Miller v Superior Court (2002) 101 CA4th 728, 747, 124 CR2d 591 (discussing burden of proof to show "excusable neglect" in response to defendant's motion to dismiss); People v Superior Court (Quinteros) (1993) 13 CA4th 12, 16 CR2d 462 (failure to consider conspiracy theory of liability for murder); People v Woods (1993) 12 CA4th 1139, 15 CR2d 906 (excusable neglect by prosecutor in omitting charge from complaint). People v Mason (2006) 140 CA4th 1190, 45 CR3d 256 (victim's failure to appear was due to excusable neglect; defense had obtained numerous continuances and victim became confused about when to appear).

Ø Note: When a defendant is charged both with violent felonies as defined in Pen C §667.5(c) and with nonviolent felonies, the counts may be subject to different Pen C §1387 exceptions. For example, a third or subsequent prosecution of a nonviolent felony is barred by an earlier dismissal on any of the grounds specified in Pen C §1387 unless one of the statutory exceptions in §1387 applies. See People v Mason (2006) 140 CA4th 1190, 1197, 45 CR3d 256 (trial court's refusal to dismiss carjacking charge proper because it was subject to violent felony exception to two-dismissal rule; gun charge should have been dismissed because it was not violent felony).

Juveniles. The bar to refiling in §1387 does not apply in juvenile court. In re Nan P. (1991) 230 CA3d 751, 281 CR 468.

Court consent is required to recharge as a felony an offense reduced to a misdemeanor under Pen C §17(b)(5) and later dismissed under Pen C §1385. Malone v Superior Court (1975) 47 CA3d 313, 318, 120 CR 851.

X. APPELLATE REVIEW

§25.48 A. Dismissal Under Pen C §1385 and Other Dismissal Statutes

The prosecution may appeal from an order dismissing an action under Pen C §1385:

- Before the defendant is placed in jeopardy or when the defendant has waived jeopardy. Pen C §§1238(a)(8), 1466(1)(B); Bellizzi v Superior Court (1974) 12 C3d 33, 36, 115 CR 52 (Pen C §1238(a)(8)); People v Winters (1959) 171 CA2d Supp 876, 880, 342 P2d 538 (Pen C §1466). See §26.24 on when jeopardy attaches.
- After the trial court grants a motion for mistrial, if the record does not clearly reflect that the trial court dismissed on the ground of insufficient evidence and applied the substantial evidence test. People v Hatch (2000) 22 C4th 260, 273, 92 CR2d 80.
- After a guilty verdict. Pen C §1238(a)(8); People v Craney (2002) 96 CA4th 431, 439, 117 CR2d 147; People v Salgado (2001) 88 CA4th 5, 105 CR2d 373.

The prosecution may also appeal from an order made after judgment that affects the People's substantial rights (Pen C §§1238(a)(5), 1466(1)(F); People v Minjarez (1980) 102 CA3d 309, 162 CR 292), from an order denying a motion to reinstate a complaint under Pen C §871.5 (Pen C §1238(a)(9)), and from a dismissal that follows the granting of a nonstatutory in limine pretrial motion to suppress evidence (Pen C §1238(a)(8); People v Chacon (2007) 40 C4th 558, 564, 53 CR3d 876).

On appeal, the trial court's failure to specify its reasons for a dismissal under §1385 renders the dismissal invalid. People v Orin (1975) 13 C3d 937, 945, 120 CR 65.

The defendant may appeal the trial court's refusal to accept the defendant's invitation to dismiss all or part of the action in the interest of justice. See People v Carmony (2004) 33 C4th 367, 375, 14 CR3d 880. The trial court's ruling is reviewed for abuse of discretion. 33 C4th at 376.

A defendant may not appeal a dismissal. People v Stokes (1894) 102 C 501, 36 P 834.

© The Regents of the University of California

§25.49 B. Writ of Mandate or Prohibition

The prosecution may obtain appellate court review of some dismissals by petition for extraordinary writ, even when there is no statutory authority to do so. The cases are in conflict, however, over which circumstances allow the prosecution to seek a writ. For example, the prosecution was granted extraordinary relief in the following cases: People v Municipal Court (White) (1979) 88 CA3d 206, 151 CR 861 (appellate court upheld superior court writ directing municipal court to reinstate dismissed prior felony and thus vacate its order reducing underlying charge to misdemeanor), People v Municipal Court (Gelardi) (1978) 84 CA3d 692, 149 CR 30 (mandate available; trial court continued case so that it could later dismiss it if defendant's behavior was satisfactory), and People v Superior Court (Brodie) (1975) 48 CA3d 195, 200, 121 CR 732 (mandate available; trial court struck allegation of prior conviction based on erroneous interpretation of law rather than on its view of guilt or innocence). Contrast these cases with People v Superior Court (Howard) (1968) 69 C2d 491, 72 CR 330 (no right for prosecution to appeal or seek writ to review trial court's dismissal of case on its own motion under Pen C §1385 after jury found defendant guilty), and People v Municipal Court (Kong) (1981) 122 CA3d 176, 183, 175 CR 861 (mandate is appropriate vehicle for review only when trial court has acted without jurisdiction of person or of subject matter; reviewing court must balance error complained of against risk of harassment to defendant).

Ø Note: When a dismissal is or will be the result of a trial court continuance of a case beyond the limits of Pen C §1049.5, Pen C §1511 gives the prosecution the authority to file a petition for writ. See People v Municipal Court (Gelardi), supra.

On writ review, see chap 42; Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chaps 7-11 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

§26.1 I. OVERVIEW

There are six kinds of pleas to an indictment, information, or complaint (Pen C §1016):
(1) Guilty,
(2) Not guilty,
(3) No contest (nolo contendere),
(4) Former conviction or acquittal,
(5) Once in jeopardy, and
(6) Not guilty by reason of insanity.

Defendants can enter any plea without the court's consent except a plea of no contest. Pen C §1016(3).

Defense counsel who wants to demur to the pleading should do so before a plea is entered. See Pen C §1004. See also §§7.20-7.26 on demurrers.

Failure to enter a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity results in the conclusive presumption that the defendant was sane at the time of the commission of the charged offense. Pen C §1016. Similarly, if a defendant enters only a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity, that is considered an admission to the charged offense (Pen C §1016), and he or she is tried only on the sanity issue—not on the guilt issue (Pen C §1026(a)). To also receive a trial on the issue of guilt, a defendant must enter a plea of not guilty in addition to a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. Pen C §1016.

Ultimately, the choice of plea is the defendant's personal decision, except in capital cases or when a sentence of life without the possibility of parole (LWOP) is the maximum punishment. People v Chadd (1981) 28 C3d 739, 747, 170 CR 798. See Pen C §1018. In those situations, the defendant must have defense counsel's consent to a guilty plea. Pen C §1018; People v Alfaro (2007) 41 C4th 1277, 1297, 63 CR3d 433.

Action	Deadline	Authority
Enter plea.	At arraignment or shortly thereafter.	See Pen C §§988, 990.
Withdraw plea of guilty.	Any time before judgment or within 6 months after order granting probation.	Pen C §1018; see People v Miranda (2004) 123 CA4th 1124, 20 CR3d 610.

§26.3 III. PRESENCE OF DEFENDANT

Unless otherwise provided by law, every plea must be entered or withdrawn by the defendant personally in open court. Pen C §1018.

In felony cases, the defendant must be personally present to enter a plea. Pen C §977(b). See Mills v Municipal Court (1973) 10 C3d 288, 304, 110 CR 329. In most misdemeanor cases, the defendant may enter any plea through counsel. Pen C §977(a)(1). However, a defendant charged with domestic violence under Fam C §6211 or Pen C §273.6 must be present at arraignment. Pen C §§977(a)(2), 1429. In addition, the court may order a defendant charged with misdemeanor driving under the influence to be present at arraignment or at the taking of any plea. Pen C §977(a)(3). When a defendant enters a guilty plea through counsel, a basis must exist on which the court can conclude that the defendant has knowledge of, and waives, each of the Boykin-Tahl rights (discussed in §§26.10-26.12), and that the defense attorney is authorized to enter the plea. 10 C3d at 305.

A corporation may enter a plea to an indictment or information through counsel. Pen C §1018. For misdemeanors and infractions arising from the operation of motor vehicles, a corporation may appear either by counsel or by its president, vice president, secretary, or managing agent for the purpose of entering a plea of guilty. Pen C §§1396, 1427.

§26.4 IV. REPRESENTATION BY COUNSEL

A defendant charged with a felony or misdemeanor has the right to counsel before entering any plea, and must be told of that right if he or she appears without counsel. Pen C §987. After being advised of the right to counsel, the defendant may waive that right and enter any plea except a plea of guilty to a felony for which the maximum penalty is death or life imprisonment without the possibility of parole (LWOP); in those cases, the defendant must be represented by counsel, and counsel must consent to the plea. Pen C §1018. For further discussion of representation by counsel, see chap 3.

§26.5 V. FORM OF PLEA

As a rule, pleas other than guilty and no contest come in direct response to an inquiry by the court about how the defendant wishes to plead. If a defendant fails to answer the accusatory pleading by demurrer or plea, the court must enter a not guilty plea on the defendant's behalf. Pen C §1024. Similarly, a refusal to admit or deny having suffered an alleged prior conviction should be entered as a denial of the allegation. Pen C §1025. Pleas of guilty or no contest to misdemeanors and felonies may be oral or in writing. Pen C §1017. Special rules apply to these pleas, which are discussed in §§26.7-26.17.

The plea, whether oral or written, should be in substantially the following form (Pen C §1017):

- If the defendant pleads guilty (or no contest): "The defendant pleads that he or she is guilty of (or pleads no contest to) the offense charged." Pen C §1017(1). On the differences between pleas of guilty and no contest, see §26.7.
- If the defendant pleads not guilty: "The defendant pleads that he or she is not guilty of the offense charged." Pen C §1017(2).
- If the defendant pleads a former conviction or acquittal: "The defendant pleads that he or she has already been convicted (or acquitted) of the offense charged, by the judgment of the court of _____ (naming it), rendered at _____ (naming the place), on the ____ day of _____." Pen C §1017(3).
- If the defendant pleads once in jeopardy: "The defendant pleads that he or she has been once in jeopardy for the offense charged (specifying the time, place, and court)." Pen C §1017(4).
- If the defendant pleads not guilty by reason of insanity: "The defendant pleads that he or she is not guilty of the offense charged because he or she was insane at the time that he or she is alleged to have committed the unlawful act." Pen C §1017(5).

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.6 VI. NOT GUILTY PLEA

A plea of not guilty puts in issue every material allegation of the accusatory pleading (Pen C §1019), including the requisite mental elements of intent, deliberation, willfulness, premeditation, and malice aforethought (People v Moon (2005) 37 C4th 1, 28, 32 CR3d 894; People v Steele (2002) 27 C4th 1230, 1243, 120 CR2d 432). All matters of fact tending to establish a defense, other than former conviction or acquittal, once in jeopardy, or not guilty by reason of insanity, may be presented at trial in furtherance of a not guilty plea. Pen C §1020. See People v Perez (1965) 62 C2d 769, 775, 44 CR 326.

Ø Note: A defendant who wishes to demur to the accusatory pleading should do so before a plea is entered. Pen C §1004. See §§7.20-7.26 on demurrers.

VII. GUILTY AND NO CONTEST PLEAS

§26.7 A. Differences Between Guilty and No Contest Pleas

Defendants plead no contest when they are not guilty or do not admit guilt, yet do not wish to go to trial. A plea of no contest has the same legal effect in a criminal court as a plea of guilty. It does differ in some ways from a guilty plea. Unlike pleas of guilty as charged, the court's approval is required before entry of a plea of no contest, even though the plea is to all charges. Pen C §1016(3); People v Hughes (1980) 112 CA3d 452, 460, 169 CR 364. As with a plea of guilty, there is no requirement that the prosecutor consent to a plea of no contest as long as the plea is to all charges. People v Superior Court (Smith) (1978) 82 CA3d 909, 915, 147 CR 554. Arguably, the prosecutor's consent is required to plead no contest to a lesser offense, because the prosecutor's consent is required for the defendant to plead to fewer than all charged offenses. Pen C §1192.5. Such an offense must be reasonably related to the offense charged in the accusatory pleading. People v West (1970) 3 C3d 595, 611, 91 CR 385.

A defendant who pleads no contest must be advised of and waive the same constitutional rights as a defendant who pleads guilty. People v Chagolla (1984) 151 CA3d 1045, 1048, 199 CR 181; Lara v Superior Court (1982) 133 CA3d 436, 440, 183 CR 796. There is an additional requirement: The court must also ascertain that the defendant understands that the plea of no contest is, for purposes of the criminal proceedings, considered the same as a guilty plea. Pen C §1016(3).

A defendant who pleads no contest waives any evidentiary challenge to the truth of the underlying offense in the same manner as a defendant who pleads guilty. People v Padfield (1982) 136 CA3d 218, 227, 185 CR 903. See discussion of appellate rights following a guilty plea in §§44.6-44.16.

A no contest plea to a misdemeanor offense cannot be used as an admission in a civil action. Pen C §1016(3). A no contest plea to a felony offense is admissible as an admission in a civil case growing out of the act on which the criminal prosecution is built. Pen C §1016(3). A guilty plea to either a felony or a misdemeanor may be used as an admission in a civil case. Teitelbaum Furs, Inc. v Dominion Ins. Co. (1962) 58 C2d 601, 25 CR 559. See also §26.22.

§26.8 B. Competence to Enter Guilty or No Contest Plea

Although most cases on competence to enter a plea concern guilty pleas, they apply equally to no contest pleas, because no action may proceed if the defendant is not competent. Pen C §1367(a).

If the court has a good faith doubt about a defendant's competence to plead guilty, it must hold a preplea competency hearing. Darrow v Gunn (9th Cir 1979) 594 F2d 767. See Pen C §1368. At the hearing, the standard for determining the defendant's competence to enter a guilty plea is the same as competence to stand trial: Does the defendant have a rational understanding of the proceedings? Godinez v Moran (1993) 509 US 389, 125 L Ed 2d 321, 113 S Ct 2680. Evidence of antisocial behavior, mental illness, emotional outbursts, narcotics usage, and other factors indicating poor judgment and insight are probative of a defendant's competence to enter a guilty plea. Chavez v U.S. (9th Cir 1981) 656 F2d 512, 519. For further discussion of competency proceedings, see §§48.7-48.22.

The trial court need not make a specific finding that a defendant is competent to plead guilty unless there is evidence that would lead the court to doubt the defendant's competence. People v Wharton (1991) 53 C3d 522, 583, 280 CR 631.

> Ø Note: Many courts now routinely inquire of a defendant entering a plea of guilty or no contest to criminal charges whether he or she has recently ingested any drugs or alcohol that might affect his or her ability to exercise judgment in entering the plea. This recommended procedure minimizes the potential for a future claim that the defendant was under the influence of such a substance and that the plea was therefore improperly entered.

Defendants must be advised of the rights discussed in §§26.11-26.12 before being asked to waive them. Group advisement of rights for those charged with misdemeanors (but not felonies) is acceptable. Mills v Municipal Court (1973) 10 C3d 288, 307, 110 CR 329. Group advisement, however, must be followed by an individual, knowing, and intelligent waiver. Group waiver is specifically prohibited in all cases. 10 C3d at 307.

When a defendant pleads guilty, it must be in response to the court's inquiry as to how the defendant pleads, rather than a spontaneous statement of guilt. People v Sturdy (1965) 235 CA2d 306, 311, 45 CR 203. See Pen C §988. The normal procedure is for the court to ask the defendant how he or she pleads, and for the defendant to personally answer, e.g., "guilty." However, the defendant can expressly authorize or adopt defense counsel's statement of the plea. People v Hofferber (1977) 70 CA3d 265, 268, 137 CR 115.

A guilty plea may be oral or in writing. Pen C §1017. In most courts, a defendant who pleads guilty or no contest completes a written waiver form; however, some courts just put an oral advisement and plea on the record. Written waiver forms were approved for misdemeanors in Mills v Municipal Court (1973) 10 C3d 288, 110 CR 329, and in felony cases not involving unusual circumstances (which might indicate that the plea is otherwise involuntary) in In re Ibarra (1983) 34 C3d 277, 285, 193 CR 538. The written forms commonly have a printed recital of rights, each followed by a box. Defendants initial each box and sign their names at the bottom of the form. In misdemeanor cases, it is common for the judge to then ask the defendant whether he or she has read and understands the rights that are being waived; if the judge is satisfied that the defendant understands those rights, the guilty plea is accepted. In felony cases, the prosecutor or judge usually goes over each right with the defendant on the record and has the defendant waive each right aloud. If a written waiver and plea form are used, the court should obtain an oral acknowledgment from the defendant that he or she has read and understood the form and wishes to plead guilty. See In re Moss (1985) 175 CA3d 913, 221 CR 645. For discussion of rights that must be waived, see §26.12. A felony guilty plea checklist is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §26.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

In misdemeanor cases, a minute order and checklist of rights—including a notation on a docket for arraignment and instructions with a typed notation by the judge that the defendant has waived his or her rights and the reporter's transcript of those waivers—is a sufficient record of expressed and explicit waiver. Stewart v Justice Court (1977) 74 CA3d 607, 141 CR 589. The clerk's docket with a specific recording of the defendant's yes or no answers to the specific advisements and waivers is also a sufficient record of expressed and explicit waiver. Ganyo v Municipal Court (1978) 80 CA3d 522, 145 CR 636.

D. Requirements on Plea of Guilty or No Contest

§26.10 1. Summary of Requirements; Standard on Review

Before accepting a guilty or no contest plea, the trial court record must show on its face that the defendant was made aware of and expressly waived his or her Boykin-Tahl rights, i.e., the constitutional rights required by Boykin v Alabama (1969) 395 US 238, 23 L Ed 2d 274, 89 S Ct 1709, and In re Tahl (1969) 1 C3d 122, 81 CR 577. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 921, 206 CR 707. For a list of these constitutional rights, see §26.11.

Ø Note: When the defendant submits the case on the preliminary hearing transcript, the police report, or on stipulated facts in circumstances that make the submission tantamount to a guilty plea, the record must reflect a knowing and express waiver of Boykin-Tahl rights. Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302. See also §§26.19, 28.19-28.21. A stipulation to evidentiary facts that admits some, but not all, of the elements of a conviction or enhancement does not trigger a defendant's Boykin-Tahl rights. People v Newman (1999) 21 C4th 413, 87 CR2d 474; People v Adams (1993) 6 C4th 570, 577, 24 CR2d 831. See also §28.31.

In reviewing Boykin-Tahl error, the standard of review is governed by federal law, under which a plea is valid if the record affirmatively shows that it is voluntary and intelligent in the totality of the circumstances. People v Mosby (2004) 33 C4th 353, 356, 15 CR3d 262; People v Howard (1992) 1 C4th 1132, 1175, 5 CR2d 268. See, e.g., People v Christian (2005) 125 CA4th 688, 22 CR3d 861 (under totality of circumstances, record was inadequate to allow court of appeal to conclude that defendant entered his plea understandingly and voluntarily).

In felony cases, the court must satisfy itself that a factual basis exists for the plea. Pen C §1192.5. See discussion in §26.13. In all cases, the court must make a finding that the plea was voluntary and was made knowingly and intelligently. In re Johnson (1965) 62 C2d 325, 42 CR 228. See discussion in §26.14. In addition, defendants must be advised of the direct consequences of the plea. Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302. See also Iowa v Tovar (2004) 541 US 77, 158 L Ed 2d 209, 215, 124 S Ct 1379. See discussion in §26.15. For a list of the most common direct consequences, see §26.16.

Either the court or the prosecutor may explain the defendant's rights to him or her on the record. In re Ibarra (1983) 34 C3d 277, 285, 193 CR 538; People v Harty (1985) 173 CA3d 493, 504, 219 CR 85.

Ø Note: Prosecutors may want to ask the court's permission to question a defendant about his or her waiver of rights if it appears that a waiver taken by the court is insufficient. In re Moss (1985) 175 CA3d 913, 931, 221 CR 645.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.11 2. Constitutional Rights That Must Be Included in Advisement and Waiver

Defendants in misdemeanor and felony cases must be informed of and explicitly waive each of the following constitutional rights before entering a valid guilty plea (People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 921, 206 CR 707):

- Right to counsel, if unrepresented by counsel (see discussion in §26.12);
- Privilege against compulsory self-incrimination;
- Right to trial by jury; and
- Right to confront accusers (including right to produce witnesses through court's subpoena processes). It is sufficient advisement of the right to confront witnesses for the court to explain that the defendant has the "right to cross-examine." People v Hayes (1990) 52 C3d 577, 637, 276 CR 874.

Ø Note: The record must also reflect that the defendant is aware that the charge to which he or she is pleading guilty is a constitutionally valid charge. In re Tahl (1969) 1 C3d 122, 81 CR 577. See §26.12.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.12 3. Discussion of Constitutional Rights

Right to counsel. Defendants may plead guilty or no contest without an attorney in all but capital cases and cases in which the defendant may be sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole (LWOP). Pen C §987. An accused unrepresented by counsel must be advised of and waive the right to counsel before entering a plea of guilty or no contest. Cal Const art I, §13. See In re Haro (1969) 71 C2d 1021, 80 CR 588; In re Smiley (1967) 66 C2d 606, 615, 58 CR 579. The court must be satisfied that the defendant understands that he or she has the right to an attorney, and a defendant who does not wish to be represented by counsel must so state in open court. People v Chadd (1981) 28 C3d 739, 747, 170 CR 798.

> Ø Note: The federal Constitution does not require the court to give the defendant detailed advisements on the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation. Iowa v Tovar (2004) 541 US 77, 158 L Ed 2d 209, 222, 124 S Ct 1379.

Some courts use one defense attorney to give a mass advisement and counseling session to defendants at arraignment. This attorney is not required to speak with individual defendants for the record to reflect that the defendants were represented by counsel in deciding whether to enter a guilty plea. This practice is most common in cases involving driving under the influence, and when it occurs, defendants must be advised of and waive their right to have appointed counsel at every stage of the proceedings, including trial, if indigent. People v Howell (1986) 178 CA3d 268, 223 CR 818 (case reversed because of lack of advice and waiver of counsel).

Other Boykin-Tahl rights. Convictions based on a plea of guilty must also be supported by a record of the plea that contains direct evidence that the accused was advised of the right to jury trial, to confront witnesses, and against self-incrimination, and that he or she "knowingly and intelligently" waived each of those three rights. The record must also show that the defendant knew both the nature of the charge and the consequences of entering a plea of guilty. Boykin v Alabama (1969) 395 US 238, 23 L Ed 2d 274, 89 S Ct 1709; In re Tahl (1969) 1 C3d 122, 132, 81 CR 577; People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 206 CR 707.

The Boykin-Tahl rights also apply to any allegations or enhancements admitted at the time of taking the guilty plea. In re Yurko (1974) 10 C3d 857, 864, 112 CR 513. They apply to misdemeanor pleas. Mills v Municipal Court (1973) 10 C3d 288, 308, 110 CR 329, 343 (applied prospectively only). They also apply to juveniles charged under the Juvenile Court Law. In re Ronald E. (1977) 19 C3d 315, 321, 137 CR 781.

For purposes of Boykin-Tahl safeguards, there is no functional difference between a plea of guilty and a plea of no contest. Mills v Municipal Court, supra.

The right to testify on one's own behalf is not a constitutional right about which the defendant must be informed at the time the guilty plea is entered. People v Jackson (1991) 1 CA4th 697, 703, 2 CR2d 308 (rejecting dicta in People v Tran (1984) 152 CA3d 680, 684 n5, 199 CR 539).

Requirements for a "slow plea" are discussed in §§26.19, 28.19-28.21.

Procedure when clerk's docket conflicts with court reporter's transcript. When there is a conflict between the clerk's docket and the court reporter's transcript, the transcript will be held determinative of the issue. See In re Birch (1973) 10 C3d 314, 320, 110 CR 212.

§26.13 4. Factual Basis for Plea in Felony Cases

In felony cases, the court must satisfy itself that there is a factual basis for the plea. Pen C §1192.5. The court may discharge this obligation by asking the defendant to describe the conduct that gave rise to the charge, by questioning the defendant about the factual basis of the complaint (or plea agreement), or by asking counsel to stipulate to a document (e.g., police report, complaint, preliminary hearing transcript) that provides a factual basis for the plea. People v Holmes (2004) 32 C4th 432, 442, 9 CR3d 678. A "bare stipulation" from counsel, without reference to any document in the record, does not provide a sufficient factual basis. People v Willard (2007) 154 CA4th 1329, 1334, 65 CR3d 488. In Holmes, the trial court complied with §1192.5 by asking the defendant whether he had done what was charged in the complaint. This inquiry was adequate because the complaint was sufficient to establish a factual basis for the plea. 32 C4th at 443. Although the trial court's determination that there is a factual basis for a plea is a mixed question of fact and law, it is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Furthermore, any error will be deemed harmless when the record discloses an adequate factual basis for the plea. 32 C4th at 442.

With the consent of the defendant, the trial court may make this finding at the time of sentencing. People v Coulter (2008) 163 CA4th 1117, 1122, 78 CR3d 210.

See §26.45 for discussion of the problems involved, and possible solutions, when a defendant wishes to plead guilty but does not admit guilt.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.14 5. Plea Must Be Knowing, Intelligent, and Voluntary

The rendering court must make a finding that a guilty plea was made voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently. In re Johnson (1965) 62 C2d 325, 42 CR 228; People v Garcia (1979) 98 CA3d Supp 14, 159 CR 487. The judge, however, need not announce his or her finding; it is sufficient if the docket states that the court found the waiver to have been "knowingly, intelligently and understandingly made." 98 CA3d Supp at 17.

A guilty plea cannot be considered voluntary unless the defendant is informed of the charges pending against him or her. People v West (1970) 3 C3d 595, 91 CR 385. There is no requirement, however, that the technical elements of a crime be explained to the defendant before entry of a plea. In re Ronald E. (1977) 19 C3d 315, 324, 137 CR 781. The law does not even require an express statement that the elements of the offense have been discussed with counsel. People v Wharton (1991) 53 C3d 522, 583, 280 CR 631. The record need only "demonstrate" that the defendant understood the nature of the charge in order to foreclose any relief based on a claim that he or she was not expressly advised of the charge. In re Ronald E., supra.

> Ø Note: When counsel has reason to question the defendant's competence to plead guilty, failure to investigate further may constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. See U.S. v Howard (9th Cir 2004) 381 F3d 873, 882.

In multiple-defendant cases, when a defendant pleads guilty as part of a "package deal" arrangement for all codefendants, the trial court has a duty to inquire further into the voluntariness of the plea. Although such a bargain is not per se coercive, it may be so in the totality of the circumstances. In re Ibarra (1983) 34 C3d 277, 286, 193 CR 538. If the court determines that a plea of guilty is being entered into as part of a package deal, the following inquiries should be made: whether the inducement for the plea is proper, the factual basis for the guilty plea, and the nature and degree of coerciveness. 34 C3d at 287. Some factors to consider are the defendant's age, who initiated the plea bargain, whether charges have already been pressed against a third party, and the defendant's relationship to any other charged persons.

§26.15 6. Advisement of Direct Consequences of Plea of Guilty or No Contest

Before accepting a plea of guilty or no contest, the court must advise the defendant of the direct consequences of the plea. Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302. See §26.16 (list of direct consequences about which court must advise defendant before guilty plea may be accepted).

The California Supreme Court has characterized this requirement as a judicially declared rule of criminal procedure, not a rule that is constitutionally compelled. People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1022, 1 CR2d 902. See People v McMillion (1992) 2 CA4th 1363, 1370, 3 CR2d 821 (because failure to advise of consequences not federal constitutional error, reversal not required unless defendant shows reasonable probability that he or she would not have pleaded guilty if advised of consequences). However, in Iowa v Tovar (2004) 541 US 77, 158 L Ed 2d 209, 215, 124 S Ct 1379, the Supreme Court observed that the U.S. Constitution requires the trial court to inform the accused of the "range of allowable punishments." Although the observation was not essential to the holding in the case, it adds support to the opposing view, i.e., that due process does require advice on the direct consequences of a guilty plea. See Brady v U.S. (1970) 397 US 742, 755, 25 L Ed 2d 747, 760, 90 S Ct 1463 (defining knowing and voluntary guilty plea); Torrey v Estelle (9th Cir 1988) 842 F2d 234 (Fifth Amendment requires advice on direct consequences of guilty plea). See also In re Birch (1973) 10 C3d 314, 319, 110 CR 212 (unrepresented defendant unaware of direct consequences of guilty plea cannot reasonably be found to have "knowingly and voluntarily" entered plea).

Defendants need not be advised of collateral consequences, i.e., consequences that do not inexorably flow from a conviction of the offense charged. People v Moore (1998) 69 CA4th 626, 81 CR2d 658 (court not required to advise defendant that plea to sex offense could result in confinement under Sexually Violent Predator Act); People v Crosby (1992) 3 CA4th 1352, 1356, 5 CR2d 159 (trial court not required to advise defendant that subsequent conviction could result in enhanced punishment); People v Martinez (1975) 46 CA3d 736, 745, 120 CR 362 (court not required to advise defendant that conviction will result in revocation of probation).

§26.16 7. Checklist: Most Common Direct Consequences of Which Defendant Must Be Advised

The defendant must be advised of the following direct consequences of a guilty or no contest plea (see §26.15):

- Mandatory revocation of driving privileges on a driving under the influence conviction. Corley v DMV (1990) 222 CA3d 72, 76, 271 CR 406.
- Fines, penalty assessments, and drug and laboratory fees if applicable. Whether the trial court may nonetheless impose certain minimum fines or fees at sentencing appears to turn on whether they are mandatory and a significant deviation from the plea agreement. People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1 CR2d 902; People v Sorenson (2005) 125 CA4th 612, 621, 22 CR3d 854.
- Possible immigration consequences of a conviction, including deportation, exclusion from admission to the United States, or denial of naturalization. Pen C §1016.5(a). The court must warn a noncitizen defendant of these potential consequences. People v Superior Court (Zamudio) (2000) 23 C4th 183, 96 CR2d 463. Penal Code §1016.5 also requires the court to grant additional time to a defendant on request to consider the effect of a plea. The court that takes a plea must have a record of its advisement under Pen C §1016.5; otherwise, a presumption arises that there was no such advisement. If there was no advisement, the conviction must be vacated. Pen C §1016.5(b). For further discussion, see §52.8. Convictions and sentences with adverse immigration consequences are discussed in §§52.25-52.49.
- The maximum parole period that the defendant might have to serve following the completion of any prison term imposed. In re Moser (1993) 6 C4th 342, 357, 24 CR2d 723; People v Avila (1994) 24 CA4th 1455, 30 CR2d 138; In re Carabes (1983) 144 CA3d 927, 193 CR 65.
- The potential maximum sentence in the case. In re Birch (1973) 10 C3d 314, 110 CR 212.
- Absolute or presumptive probation ineligibility. People v Caban (1983) 148 CA3d 706, 196 CR 177.

  Ø Note: The court is not required to advise the defendant that a conviction will revoke an existing probationary grant. People v Martinez (1975) 46 CA3d 736, 745, 120 CR 362; People v Searcie (1974) 37 CA3d 204, 211, 112 CR 267. However, when the original plea agreement guarantees a grant of probation, the permissible future range of the sentence should be explained when the plea is taken. See People v Kunkel (1985) 176 CA3d 46, 221 CR 359.

- Arson offender registration. Pen C §457.1.
- Narcotics offender registration. Health & S C §11590.
- Sex offender registration under Pen C §§290-290.023. In re Birch (1973) 10 C3d 314, 110 CR 212; People v Zaidi (2007) 147 CA4th 1470, 1481, 55 CR3d 566 (court must advise that registration requirement will be for duration of defendant's life).
- Restitution fine. People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1022, 1 CR2d 902; People v Crandell (2007) 40 C4th 1301, 1310, 57 CR3d 349.

Right to appeal. The trial court is required to advise a defendant of his or her right to appeal after imposing sentence on conviction after trial or revocation of probation. Cal Rules of Ct 4.470. No equivalent provision, however, requires advisement after a plea of guilty. In re Ibarra (1983) 34 C3d 277, 283 n1, 193 CR 538. There is as yet no authority requiring that a trial court advise the defendant of the loss of any appeal rights following a guilty plea. See In re Ibarra, supra.

The right to appeal is a statutory right only. An express waiver of the right to appeal made as part of a plea bargain is valid as long as the defendant's waiver is a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary one. People v Castrillon (1991) 227 CA3d 718, 721, 278 CR 121. In fact, one court has gone so far as to explicitly encourage the use of waivers of appeal as part of negotiated dispositions. People v Olson (1989) 216 CA3d 601, 604, 264 CR 817. The scope of the waiver, however, if not explicitly made part of the record, will be determined by the context in which it arises. People v Nguyen (1993) 13 CA4th 114, 120, 16 CR2d 490 (in context of slow plea). Whether the bargain included waiver of appeal may be determined by analogy with contract law. The parties' expressed intent will be followed. If not expressed, the court should seek to carry out their reasonable expectations. People v Nguyen, supra. See also In re Uriah R. (1999) 70 CA4th 1152, 83 CR2d 314 (plea-bargained waiver of appeal does not preclude appeal of errors after plea was entered).

Ø Note: If the defendant enters into a plea bargain that includes the promise that the defendant can appeal the case, and doing so is not possible, the defendant must be allowed to withdraw his or her plea. People v DeVaughn (1977) 18 C3d 889, 135 CR 786.

§26.17 8. Checklist: Miscellaneous Requirements Concerning Plea of Guilty or No Contest

- In plea bargain situations, the court must see that the plea bargain is reflected in the record (People v West (1970) 3 C3d 595, 610, 91 CR 385) and admonish the defendant that approval of the plea is not binding on the sentencing court. The court may, at the time set for hearing on the application for probation or pronouncement of judgment, withdraw its approval in light of further consideration of the matter. In such a situation, the defendant will be permitted to withdraw his or her plea if he or she desires to do so. Pen C §1192.5. Failure to give this required admonition may mean that, if there is a variance between the sentence indicated at the time of the plea and the sentence ultimately pronounced and there is no objection at sentencing, the defendant will not be deemed to have waived the right to appeal. People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1025, 1 CR2d 902; People v Clark (1992) 7 CA4th 1041, 1049, 9 CR2d 726.
- Any conditions imposed with a plea must meet constitutional standards. A defendant's acquiescence to an improper plea agreement does not render the plea valid. Alhusainy v Superior Court (2006) 143 CA4th 385, 391, 48 CR3d 914.
- Unless the prosecutor obtains a waiver as part of a plea agreement, dismissed counts or facts pertaining solely to them may not be considered by the trial court in deciding what sentence to impose. People v Harvey (1979) 25 C3d 754, 159 CR 696.
- If a no contest plea is entered, the defendant must be told that the court will find the defendant guilty. Pen C §1016(3).
- A misdemeanant denied probation must be informed of the relief available under Pen C §1203.4a at the time of sentencing. Pen C §1203.4a(a). See discussion of relief from disabilities under Pen C §1203.4a in §41.16.
- A defendant who enters a plea agreement in a court that has jurisdiction to sentence is entitled to have the same judge impose the sentence, unless the defendant waives that right at the time of the plea. People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 150 CR 778. See discussion in §35.11.

In addition to these advisements and findings, the court may want to satisfy itself of the following and to indicate those inquiries and findings on the record:

- The defendant has not ingested drugs or alcohol. On the defendant's competence to enter a guilty or no contest plea, see §26.8.
- When the defendant has pleaded guilty to a felony before the magistrate, the defendant is aware that he or she is waiving the right to a preliminary hearing. Pen C §859b.

Ø Note: Appellate defense attorneys seldom find errors in the written forms, but they may find errors in the transcript of the oral advisement and waiver of rights, and by talking with the client. See, e.g., People v Howell (1986) 178 CA3d 268, 270, 223 CR 818. Prosecutors who routinely advise defendants of their rights may wish to read those advisements from a written list to make sure nothing is inadvertently omitted.

Because the entire record of a conviction may now be reviewed in determining whether a prior conviction is a "serious felony" for enhancement purposes under Pen C §667 (People v Guerrero (1988) 44 C3d 343, 355, 243 CR 688), it is probably better practice in taking a plea for the court or prosecutor to inform the defendant of the technical elements of the offense to which the defendant pleads.

A guilty plea (1) admits each element of the admitted offense, (2) is itself a conviction, and (3) leaves nothing more than for judgment to be entered and punishment imposed. People v Hill (1974) 12 C3d 731, 767, 117 CR 393, disapproved on other grounds in People v DeVaughn (1977) 18 C3d 889, 896 n5, 135 CR 786. A guilty plea waives all issues except for denial of a motion to suppress evidence, sentencing, or constitutional and jurisdictional issues. Pen C §1237.5. For a list of issues that can be appealed after a plea of guilty, see §44.13. Thus, an accused who wishes to preserve questions of fact for appellate review should not plead guilty but should stand trial (by jury or court) and appeal from the judgment if ultimately convicted (People v Plummer (1963) 222 CA2d 280, 35 CR 53), or should enter a "slow plea" (see §§26.19, 28.19-28.21) and appeal as from a court trial.

In felony cases, even when an issue is appealable following a plea of guilty, for constitutional and jurisdictional issues, a certificate of probable cause must be obtained from the trial court and filed with the notice of appeal. Pen C §1237.5(b). See §§44.8-44.12. There is an exception for appeals of Pen C §1538.5 issues (see §16.37) and sentencing issues. No certificate of probable cause is required to appeal a misdemeanor. People v Woods (1978) 84 CA3d 149, 148 CR 312. See Pen C §1235.

A plea of no contest is the equivalent of a plea of guilty for purposes of appeal rights. People v Padfield (1982) 136 CA3d 218, 227, 185 CR 903.

On appeals from pleas of guilty (and no contest), including the correct court in which to bring both felony and misdemeanor appeals, see §§44.6-44.13.

§26.19 F. Submitting Case on Transcript From Preliminary Hearing or on Police Report ("Slow Plea")

A defendant who submits his or her case for decision on the basis of agreed-on evidence, typically the transcript of the preliminary hearing or a police report, enters what is termed a "slow plea." See Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302. There are several variations of slow plea; they each allow the defendant to preserve appellate rights that would be waived by a guilty plea (see Pen C §1237.5).

Ø Note: It is good practice to make a clear record of what factual or legal issues are being contested for purposes of appeal.

When a submission on agreed-on evidence is tantamount to a guilty plea, the court must inform the defendant of the right to jury trial, the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses, and the privilege against self-incrimination, and must obtain a knowing and intelligent waiver of each of these rights. Bunnell, 13 C3d at 605.

If a case is submitted in exchange for a particular sentence based on a negotiated disposition, counsel should make a record of the disposition and obtain court approval. People v James (1989) 208 CA3d 1155, 1167, 256 CR 661.

For further discussion of slow pleas, see §§28.19-28.21.

§26.20 G. Pleading Guilty Before Holding Order

A defendant can plead guilty at the conclusion of the preliminary hearing before a holding order is made. Pen C §859a(a). This is typically done to avoid the limitations on plea bargaining in Pen C §§667(g) and 1192.7(c). These provisions severely restrict postinformation and postindictment plea bargaining when the defendant is charged with an offense listed in Pen C §1192.7(a) or a prior felony conviction is alleged. On plea bargaining in such cases, see §§26.38-26.39.

After the defendant's plea is taken, the magistrate sets a time for pronouncing sentence and refers the defendant to a probation officer if the defendant is eligible for probation under Pen C §1191. Pen C §859a(b). Sentencing will be before the magistrate who presided at the preliminary hearing.

If an information is filed, the case will be assigned to another superior court judge for sentencing. If the magistrate will not be the sentencing judge, the parties should obtain the trial court's approval before entering a plea. See §8.6. If the plea is entered into with the expectation that a particular judge will sentence, it may be advisable to make this a condition of the plea.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/26 PLEAS AND CASE SETTLEMENT/§26.21 H. Withdrawing Guilty or No Contest Plea

§26.21 H. Withdrawing Guilty or No Contest Plea

At any time before judgment or within 6 months after an order granting probation, and if entry of judgment was suspended, the court may permit the withdrawal of a guilty plea and the entry of a not guilty plea on a showing of good cause. Pen C §1018. See People v Miranda (2004) 123 CA4th 1124, 20 CR3d 610. In such circumstances, if the defendant was not represented by counsel at the time of entering the plea, the court must permit the plea to be withdrawn. Pen C §1018.

The defendant must personally make some expression in open court that authorizes or adopts a motion made on his or her behalf to withdraw a guilty plea; the defendant's silence during a motion to withdraw will not suffice. Pen C §1018; Johnson v Superior Court (1981) 121 CA3d 115, 175 CR 272.

The decision to move to withdraw a guilty plea belongs to the defendant. Counsel may not simply refuse the defendant's request to make the motion. If counsel is not willing to make such a motion, new counsel should be appointed for the defendant. People v McLeod (1989) 210 CA3d 585, 588, 258 CR 496; People v Brown (1986) 179 CA3d 207, 224 CR 476. If the defendant wants to withdraw the guilty plea based on ineffective assistance of trial counsel, the trial court should appoint new counsel to represent the defendant on the motion to withdraw the plea. People v Smith (1993) 6 C4th 684, 25 CR2d 122. Defense counsel's failure to move to withdraw a plea of guilty at the defendant's request when good grounds exist could be considered ineffective assistance of counsel. People v Osorio (1987) 194 CA3d 183, 239 CR 333, disapproved on other grounds in People v Johnson (2009) 47 C4th 668, 681, 101 CR3d 332. See People v Brown (2009) 175 CA4th 1469, 97 CR3d 327 (counsel may decline to bring meritless motion).

"Good cause" to set aside a guilty plea is shown when the defendant demonstrates that the plea was entered as the result of mistake, ignorance, inadvertence, or some other factor that demonstrates overreaching. People v Caban (1983) 148 CA3d 706, 196 CR 177 (defendant allowed to withdraw guilty plea because he was not told that prison was mandatory if he pleaded guilty to robbery with use of gun). See People v Ramirez (2006) 141 CA4th 1501, 47 CR3d 272 (defendant allowed to withdraw plea on evidence that prosecution's withholding of favorable evidence rendered plea involuntary).

Common reasons for withdrawing a plea of guilty or no contest include:

- Failure to advise the defendant of his or her constitutional rights (People v Howard (1992) 1 C4th 1132, 1175, 5 CR2d 268);
- Failure to specify the direct consequences of the plea (People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1023, 1 CR2d 902);
- Violation of plea bargain (People v Mancheno (1982) 32 C3d 855, 860, 187 CR 441);

  Ø Note: The remedy for violation of a plea bargain, depending on the facts, may be enforcement of the plea bargain. See discussion in §26.53.

- Improper inducement to enter plea (People v Bonwit (1985) 173 CA3d 828, 833, 219 CR 297); and
- Illegal sentence contemplated (People v Baries (1989) 209 CA3d 313, 319, 256 CR 920).

The application should be both timely and credible. People v Fick (1980) 107 CA3d 892, 896, 166 CR 106. It is the defendant's burden to produce evidence of good cause by "clear and convincing" evidence. People v Cruz (1974) 12 C3d 562, 566, 116 CR 242. When in doubt, however, the court should grant a prejudgment motion to withdraw a guilty plea. People v Spears (1984) 153 CA3d 79, 88, 199 CR 922.

A defendant who simply pleads guilty as charged without any promise by the judge or prosecutor cannot later set aside the plea because he or she believed the court would impose a lesser sentence than that ultimately imposed. People v Superior Court (Smith) (1978) 82 CA3d 909, 915, 147 CR 554. However, when a defendant's plea is entered under a bargain, the defendant will be allowed to withdraw it if either the prosecution or the court repudiates any term of the negotiated disposition to the defendant's prejudice. People v Kaanehe (1977) 19 C3d 1, 11, 136 CR 409. On remedies for breach of plea bargain, see §26.53.

When a defendant successfully withdraws his or her guilty plea, the case is restored to its status before entry of the plea, including revival of any charges dismissed under the bargain. People v Superior Court (Garcia) (1982) 131 CA3d 256, 182 CR 426.

The order denying a motion to withdraw a guilty plea is not itself appealable, but can be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, with a certificate of probable cause from the trial court. People v Johnson (2009) 47 C4th 668, 101 CR3d 332; People v Ribero (1971) 4 C3d 55, 62, 92 CR 692. On appeal, the trial court's ruling (assuming the right standard of proof was used) is reviewed using the abuse of discretion standard. People v Nance (1991) 1 CA4th 1453, 2 CR2d 670.

Although the court loses its statutory authority to permit a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea after judgment is entered or 6 months after an order is made granting probation, both motions to vacate and petitions in the nature of coram nobis or habeas corpus may be considered by the trial court. See People v Stanworth (1974) 11 C3d 588, 596, 114 CR 250; People v Miranda (2004) 123 CA4th 1124, 20 CR3d 610.

§26.22 I. Admissibility of Guilty or No Contest Plea in Related Civil Case

The following pleas by a defendant are admissible as admissions against him or her in a civil case growing out of the act on which the criminal prosecution was built:

- Guilty plea to a misdemeanor or felony. Teitelbaum Furs, Inc. v Dominion Ins. Co. (1962) 58 C2d 601, 25 CR 559.
- No contest plea to a felony offense. Pen C §1016(3).

A plea of guilty or no contest to a criminal offense has no collateral estoppel effect in a later civil proceeding. Pease v Pease (1988) 201 CA3d 29, 246 CR 762. In contrast, a prior conviction resulting from a trial that thoroughly litigated the same issues will have collateral estoppel effect. Teitelbaum Furs, Inc. v Dominion Ins. Co., supra. For further discussion of collateral estoppel, see §§26.29-26.33.

VIII. ONCE IN JEOPARDY PLEA (DOUBLE JEOPARDY)

§26.23 A. Basis of Plea; Trial of Plea

In California, defendants may rely on the double jeopardy protection of the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, binding on state courts through the Fourteenth Amendment (Arizona v Manypenny (1981) 451 US 232, 68 L Ed 2d 58, 101 S Ct 1657; Richard M. v Superior Court (1971) 4 C3d 370, 377, 93 CR 752) and of Cal Const art I, §15. The Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment establishes several distinct protections (not all of which are raised by a plea of once in jeopardy):

- Protection against a second prosecution for the same offense after an acquittal (Illinois v Vitale (1980) 447 US 410, 415, 65 L Ed 2d 228, 235, 100 S Ct 2260);
- Protection against a second prosecution for the same offense after a conviction (U.S. v Dixon (1993) 509 US 688, 125 L Ed 2d 556, 113 S Ct 2849);
- Protection against multiple prosecutions for the same offense (Illinois v Vitale, supra; U.S. v Brooklier (9th Cir 1981) 637 F2d 620; Gonzalez v Municipal Court (1973) 32 CA3d 706, 714, 108 CR 612); and
- Protection against multiple prosecutions when collateral estoppel or res judicata applies to an issue previously litigated (see Yeager v U.S. (2009) ___ US ___, 174 L Ed 2d 78, 129 S Ct 2360; Ashe v Swenson (1970) 397 US 436, 442, 25 L Ed 2d 469, 90 S Ct 1189; People v Taylor (1974) 12 C3d 686, 117 CR 70).

Ø Note: A state is not precluded from providing greater double jeopardy protection than the U.S. Supreme Court has determined to be available under the Fifth Amendment. Curry v Superior Court (1970) 2 C3d 707, 717, 87 CR 361. In California, statutes provide additional safeguards against potentially duplicative prosecutions. See §26.34 on pleas of former conviction and former acquittal.

A plea of once in jeopardy is entered when a defendant was placed in jeopardy for the same offense but no final verdict resulted, or when the defendant has been prosecuted for the same criminal act or transaction under two criminal statutes. If a verdict resulted on the same exact charge, a plea of former conviction or acquittal is raised. Pen C §1016. See Pen C §1017(3)-(4); §26.34. See §26.24 on when jeopardy attaches. The plea of once in jeopardy is most often raised when a mistrial was declared without the consent of the defense (see, e.g., Larios v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 324, 155 CR 374), or when the case was previously dismissed (see Pen C §1387; see, e.g., People v Davidson (2008) 159 CA4th 205, 212, 70 CR3d 913). See chap 25 on discharge and dismissal.

A plea of once in jeopardy is a bar to a California state court criminal proceeding whether the prior proceeding occurred in California, in another state, a territory of the United States, or in federal court. See Pen C §§656, 793; People v Comingore (1977) 20 C3d 142, 141 CR 542. Double jeopardy protection extends to necessarily lesser included offenses (see In re Dennis B. (1976) 18 C3d 687, 135 CR 82). See also §26.25.

Ø Note: Although double jeopardy protection does not extend to a prosecution under the laws of a foreign country (see Pen C §656), a defendant convicted of a crime based on facts for which he or she has previously been acquitted or convicted in a foreign country is entitled to credit for actual time served in custody in a penal institution in that country for the crime. Pen C §656.5.

The defendant makes the plea of once in jeopardy in open court, either orally or in writing, along with any other relevant plea, such as not guilty. When responding in court to the court's question as to what plea the defendant will enter, he or she should answer "I plead once in jeopardy," and then specify the time, place, and court where jeopardy attached. See Pen C §1017(4).

If the court accepts the defendant's plea of once in jeopardy, that issue is determined by the trier of fact (judge or jury) unless the prior proceeding could not constitute double jeopardy as a matter of law. In that event, the trial court has the power to determine the issue. People v Greer (1947) 30 C2d 589, 595, 184 P2d 512, 516, disapproved on other grounds in People v Fields (1996) 13 C4th 289, 308, 52 CR2d 282. The burden of proof is on the defendant.

People v Ferguson (1982) 129 CA3d 1014, 181 CR 593. Evidence is presented at trial in the order determined by the court. See Pen C §1093.

If the defense presents no evidence to support its plea of once in jeopardy, the judge can strike the plea and not submit it to the jury for a decision. See People v Blau (1956) 140 CA2d 193, 215, 294 P2d 1047.

Failure to enter a plea of once in jeopardy to any particular count constitutes a waiver of the claim as to that count. People v Belcher (1974) 11 C3d 91, 96, 113 CR 1 (court found ineffective assistance of counsel based on counsel's failure to raise defendant's acquittal in federal court until first day of trial); People v Moore (1983) 140 CA3d 508, 189 CR 487.

Ø Note: Prohibition is a proper remedy to prevent retrial when a defendant has been once in jeopardy. Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 119 CR 302; Curry v Superior Court (1970) 2 C3d 707, 87 CR 361. For further discussion of writs of prohibition, see chap 42.

For discussion of Pen C §654, which provides additional protection against multiple punishment, see §§37.44-37.50. See §§26.29-26.33 on res judicata and collateral estoppel. See §49.13 on effect of dismissal under Pen C §§1099-1100.

§26.24 B. When Jeopardy Attaches

A person is in jeopardy for an offense when placed on trial on a valid accusatory pleading before a competent court, either with a jury duly empaneled and sworn if trial is by jury, or when the trial is "entered upon" if a judge is the trier of fact. People v Bryant (1992) 10 CA4th 1584, 1596, 13 CR2d 601. A court trial is usually considered to have been entered on when the judge begins to take evidence. People v Hernandez (1998) 19 C4th 835, 80 CR2d 754. Note, however, that a hearing on the enhancement is not a court trial. People v Hernandez (1998) 19 C4th 835, 80 CR2d 754.

A guilty plea (or plea of no contest) is equivalent to a conviction; jeopardy attaches when the plea is entered. Gonzalez v Municipal Court (1973) 32 CA3d 706, 714, 108 CR 612. See also People v Bivens (1991) 231 CA3d 653, 658, 282 CR 438.

Although jeopardy attaches in a jury trial once the jury has been sworn, discharging the jury before it reaches a verdict does not bar retrial if the defendant consented to the discharge or if legal necessity required it. See 1 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law, Defenses §120 (3d ed 2000).

§26.25 C. Jeopardy Concerning Greater and Lesser Offenses

Charged in accusatory pleading or submitted to jury. A judgment of acquittal of a greater offense does not encompass an acquittal of a lesser included offense if the lesser offense is charged in the accusatory pleading (see People v Webb (1967) 66 C2d 107, 56 CR 902), or if the jury is instructed on it and asked to return a separate verdict on it (Stone v Superior Court (1982) 31 C3d 503, 183 CR 647). People v Garcia (1985) 166 CA3d 1056, 1068, 212 CR 822. Retrial is barred on greater offenses when the defendant is found guilty of a lesser degree or of a lesser included offense. Gomez v Superior Court (1958) 50 C2d 640, 644, 328 P2d 976; People v Fields (1996) 13 C4th 289, 52 CR2d 282. See Pen C §1023. If the jury deadlocks on the lesser offenses but acquits on the greater, a failure to record the verdicts of acquittal forecloses further prosecution on any of the offenses if there was neither consent nor legal necessity. People v Chaney (1988) 202 CA3d 1109, 1124, 249 CR 251.

Not charged, not submitted to jury. When the accusatory pleading charges only the greater offenses and the question of the lesser included offense is not submitted to the jury, an acquittal of the greater offense bars subsequent prosecution and constitutes an acquittal of the lesser included offense. In re Dennis B. (1976) 18 C3d 687, 691, 135 CR 82; People v Garcia, supra.

When a court grants a directed verdict of not guilty under Pen C §1118.1, and no lesser included offense is charged in the accusatory pleading, failure to mention any lesser included offense bars subsequent submission of lesser offense to the jury. People v Garcia, supra. The court, however, can limit its judgment to only the greater offense, leaving the guilt or innocence of a lesser offense to be determined by the jury, without violating the jeopardy clause. People v Garcia, supra.

Conviction on both greater and lesser offenses bars conviction on lesser. Conviction of a lesser included offense cannot stand when the defendant was also found guilty of the greater offense. People v Ward (1986) 188 CA3d 459, 472, 233 CR 477 (defendant found guilty under both Pen C §288(a) and (b) based on same conduct; §288(a) conviction reversed because it is necessarily included offense of §288(b)).

Successive prosecutions. Successive prosecutions for the same criminal act or transaction under two different criminal statutes are forbidden unless each statute "contains an element not contained in the other." U.S. v Dixon (1993) 509 US 688, 696, 125 L Ed 2d 556, 568, 113 S Ct 2849. This is known as the "same-elements" or Blockburger test (after Blockburger v U.S. (1932) 284 US 299, 304, 76 L Ed 306, 309, 52 S Ct 180).

§26.26 D. What Does Not Constitute Violation of Double Jeopardy

Federal and state prosecution for same acts. Prosecution and conviction for the same act by both state and federal governments are not barred by the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. Abbate v U.S. (1959) 359 US 187, 194, 3 L Ed 2d 729, 734, 79 S Ct 666. In practice, this means that the federal government can choose to criminally prosecute persons in the federal court for the same crimes for which they were prosecuted in a state court. California does not allow prosecution of individuals for the same crime for which they were already prosecuted in the federal system. Pen C §§656, 793-794.

Prosecution following civil contempt order. A civil contempt order for failure to comply with a family law court custody order does not operate as a bar to prosecution for felony child stealing under Pen C §278.5. People v Batey (1986) 183 CA3d 1281, 1289, 228 CR 787; People v Derner (1986) 182 CA3d 588, 227 CR 344.

Trial following plea bargain. When a plea bargain is properly withdrawn, double jeopardy does not prevent the defendant from being tried on the original charges. Ricketts v Adamson (1987) 483 US 1, 12, 97 L Ed 2d 1, 13, 107 S Ct 2680.

Trial following reversal for "trial errors." Unlike the situation in which a conviction is reversed because of insufficient evidence (Burks v U.S. (1978) 437 US 1, 57 L Ed 2d 1, 98 S Ct 2141), a reversal for trial errors or for incorrect receipt or rejection of evidence does not bar a retrial under double jeopardy principles. If a case is reversed because the trial court improperly discharged a juror, double jeopardy does not bar a retrial. People v Hernandez (2003) 30 C4th 1, 131 CR2d 514. See U.S. v Lewis (9th Cir 2004) 368 F3d 1102, 1106 (double jeopardy did not bar retrial after reversal because of Brady violation).

Trial of prior convictions following reversal. When a true finding on a prior conviction is reversed on appeal in a noncapital case, double jeopardy principles do not bar retrial, even when insufficient evidence is the basis for the reversal. Monge v California (1998) 524 US 721, 734, 141 L Ed 2d 615, 627, 118 S Ct 2246 (U.S. Constitution); People v Barragan (2004) 32 C4th 236, 9 CR3d 76 (California Constitution).

Dismissal of action under Pen C §1385. Dismissal based on the furtherance of justice does not necessarily bar retrial on double jeopardy grounds unless the trial court uses the substantial evidence standard. People v Hatch (2000) 22 C4th 260, 273, 92 CR2d 80; People v Davidson (2008) 159 CA4th 205, 212, 70 CR3d 913.

Reinstatement of guilty verdict by reversal of trial court's dismissal for insufficiency of evidence. If the jury finds the defendant guilty and the court dismisses the action based on a finding that the evidence was insufficient to support the jury's verdict, the prosecution may appeal the dismissal without violating the Double Jeopardy Clause. In such a case, there is no danger of retrial, because a reversal of the trial court's decision on appeal merely results in reinstatement of the jury's verdict, i.e., entering judgment on the verdict. People v Salgado (2001) 88 CA4th 5, 12, 105 CR2d 373.

The discharge of a jury after jeopardy has attached but before a verdict is entered is the equivalent of an acquittal, and retrial is barred unless there was legal necessity for the discharge or the defendant or defense counsel gave his or her consent. Larios v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 324, 155 CR 374. The defendant's personal consent is not required. People v Moore (1983) 140 CA3d 508, 189 CR 487.

A criminal defendant who successfully moves for a mistrial is usually considered to have consented to a retrial and cannot seek the protection of the double jeopardy proscription. If, however, the prosecutorial or judicial conduct that gave rise to the successful motion was intended to provoke the defendant into moving for a mistrial, the defendant is considered not to have consented to a retrial. Oregon v Kennedy (1982) 456 US 667, 72 L Ed 2d 416, 102 S Ct 2083. Conversely, a defendant has no duty to object to the declaration of a mistrial not sought by him or her; thus his or her silence cannot be deemed consent or invited error that would waive the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. People v Saunders (1993) 5 C4th 580, 592, 20 CR2d 638; People v Upshaw (1974) 13 C3d 29, 117 CR 668.

Circumstances that allow a judge to discharge a jury, called "legal necessity," include:

- The jury is unable to agree (Pen C §1140; Curry v Superior Court (1970) 2 C3d 707, 87 CR 361).
- The judge, a juror, or the defendant absents himself or herself from the proceedings (Curry v Superior Court, supra; see Pen C §1148).

  Ø Note: The prosecutor's absence is not legal necessity for a mistrial without defense consent; a mistrial not concurred in by the defense will bar any future prosecution for that crime. People v McJimson (1982) 135 CA3d 873, 185 CR 605.

- Defense counsel declares a conflict of interest that the court finds may be prejudicial to the defendant (People v McNally (1980) 107 CA3d 387, 165 CR 715; see §§2.8-2.16 for further discussion of conflicts).
- The judge disqualifies himself or herself on the basis that he or she cannot give the defendant a fair and impartial trial (T.P.B. v Superior Court (1977) 66 CA3d 881, 136 CR 311; but see Scott v Municipal Court (1971) 17 CA3d 885, 95 CR 460 (in court trial, judge disqualified himself after case had been submitted because defense counsel interrupted judge's summary of evidence and informed judge another woman arrested at same time had been acquitted; court held there was no legal necessity and defendant could not be retried for that offense)).

Retrial after a jury deadlock is not a violation of double jeopardy, because it is not "another prosecution" within the meaning of Pen C §1023. Stone v Superior Court (1982) 31 C3d 503, 520, 183 CR 647. See People v Anderson (2009) 47 C4th 92, 112, 97 CR3d 77 (retrial on sentencing enhancement after jury deadlock). See also §33.45.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.28 F. Jeopardy in Juvenile Proceedings

Juveniles in delinquency proceedings are entitled to the constitutional protection against being twice placed in jeopardy for the same offense. Jesse W. v Superior Court (1979) 26 C3d 41, 44, 160 CR 700. A juvenile is placed in jeopardy on the proper convening of a jurisdictional hearing in the juvenile court (In re Shanea J. (1984) 150 CA3d 831, 841, 198 CR 228), whether before a juvenile court judge or a referee (Jesse W. v Superior Court, supra).

IX. RES JUDICATA AND COLLATERAL ESTOPPEL

§26.29 A. Definitions of Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel

The doctrine of res judicata means that "a prior judgment is a bar in a new action on the same cause of action." Further, "[i]n a new action on a different cause of action, the former judgment may also have an effect." That effect is based on the doctrine of collateral estoppel (related to res judicata), in which issues actually litigated in the former action are conducive as to most issues in a new action. People v Gephart (1979) 93 CA3d 989, 997, 156 CR 489. "The rule is based on the sound public policy of limiting litigation by preventing a party who has had one fair trial on an issue from again drawing it into controversy." Bernhard v Bank of America (1942) 19 C2d 807, 811, 122 P2d 892.

Collateral estoppel is alleged more often than res judicata in criminal cases because it applies to issues that have previously been decided. See People v Gephart, supra. See discussion of specific requirements in §26.31.

The doctrines of collateral estoppel and res judicata are embodied in the Fifth Amendment guaranty against double jeopardy and they apply to criminal proceedings. Yeager v U.S. (2009) ___ US ___, 174 L Ed 2d 78, 129 S Ct 2360; Ashe v Swenson (1970) 397 US 436, 25 L Ed 2d 469, 90 S Ct 1189; People v Taylor (1974) 12 C3d 686, 692, 117 CR 70. Their applicability is independent of the concept of double jeopardy. People v Beltran (1949) 94 CA2d 197, 202, 210 P2d 238; People v Gephart (1979) 93 CA3d 989, 997, 156 CR 489.

Ø Note: A subsequent final judgment can have res judicata or collateral estoppel effect over an earlier judgment whose appeal is still pending. People v Huston (1989) 210 CA3d 192, 224, 258 CR 393.

§26.30 B. Raising Defense of Res Judicata or Collateral Estoppel by Demurrer or Plea

If a prior prosecution resulted in a verdict, a plea of former judgment of conviction or acquittal is raised. Pen C §§1016(4), 1017(3)-(4). See discussion in §26.34. If defense counsel wishes to raise the defense of res judicata or collateral estoppel, and the former proceeding did not result in either an acquittal or a conviction, the defense is raised by any of the following:

- A demurrer under Pen C §1004(5) if the defense is apparent from the face of the charging document. Pen C §1012.
- A plea of once in jeopardy if the defense comes within the double jeopardy proscription of US Const amends V, XIV, and Cal Const art I, §15, and it is not apparent from the face of the pleading. See People v Taylor (1974) 12 C3d 686, 117 CR 70.
- A plea of not guilty if the defense is not covered by the Double Jeopardy Clause and is not apparent from the face of the pleading, followed by a motion to dismiss. See Lockwood v Superior Court (1984) 160 CA3d 667, 670, 206 CR 785 (collateral estoppel defense raised at preliminary hearing and again in nonstatutory motion to dismiss in superior court).

Ø Note: Because of the case law requirements concerning pleas of former judgment and double jeopardy (see §§26.5, 26.23), it is recommended that defense counsel specify the court, place, date, and offense charged in the former proceeding, whether the plea is once in jeopardy or not guilty. When in doubt about the correct plea, counsel should enter all pleas that may apply.

The doctrine of collateral estoppel applies only if the following threshold requirements are met (Lucido v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 335, 341, 272 CR 767):

- The issue sought to be precluded from relitigation is identical to that decided in a former proceeding;
- The issue was actually litigated in the former proceeding;
- The issue was necessarily decided in the former proceeding;
- The decision of the former proceeding was final and on the merits; and
- The party against whom the preclusion is sought is the same as, or was in privity with, the party to the former proceeding.

Even if all threshold issues are met, however, the courts will still look to public policy considerations before deciding whether to bar the subsequent litigation of an issue. Lucido v Superior Court, supra. The major public policy consideration is to limit litigation by preventing a party who has had one fair trial on an issue from again drawing it into controversy. People v Gephart (1979) 93 CA3d 989, 997, 156 CR 489.

Ordinarily, the acquittal of one accomplice or co-conspirator does not bar conviction of another. Standefer v U.S. (1980) 447 US 10, 64 L Ed 2d 689, 100 S Ct 1999; People v Summersville (1995) 34 CA4th 1062, 40 CR2d 683. See People v Palmer (2001) 24 C4th 856, 103 CR2d 13 (overruling common law rule that acquittal of all other co-conspirators bars conviction of remaining defendant); People v Taylor (1948) 88 CA2d 983, 987, 199 P2d 751. However, in very limited circumstances, collateral estoppel may bar a subsequent conviction. See, e.g., People v Taylor (1974) 12 C3d 686, 690, 117 CR 70.

> Ø Note: Defense attorneys trying to apply collateral estoppel to a subsequent prosecution involving fewer than all codefendants should try to show that the underlying facts and charges involving all codefendants are so closely intertwined that a later prosecution will necessarily entail a grossly absurd and unjust result.

The defendant's right to a fair trial will usually outweigh any policy reasons for applying collateral estoppel to preclude the defense from presenting evidence on behalf of the defendant. Gutierrez v Superior Court (1994) 24 CA4th 153, 29 CR2d 376 (defendant raised defense of mistaken identity in trial in which convicted of attempted murder; defendant should not be precluded from raising same defense in later homicide trial involving same victim).

§26.32 D. Collateral Estoppel Between Criminal and Civil Trials; Effect of Finding at Probation Revocation Hearing

Criminal and civil trials. A jury verdict in a criminal case can have collateral estoppel effect in a civil trial when the traditional elements of collateral estoppel are met. Teitelbaum Furs, Inc. v Dominion Ins. Co. (1962) 58 C2d 601, 25 CR 559.

Similarly, issues determined against a defendant at a Pen C §1538.5 motion to suppress evidence can have collateral estoppel effect on later civil proceedings if traditional collateral estoppel criteria are met. McGowan v City of San Diego (1989) 208 CA3d 890, 256 CR 537.

Probation revocation hearings. Findings at probation violation hearings do not collaterally estop a criminal trial on the same charges. Lucido v Superior Court (1990) 51 C3d 335, 272 CR 767.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.33 E. Collateral Estoppel Between Criminal Trials and Administrative Agency Proceedings

An administrative agency decision favoring a defendant will be given collateral estoppel effect in a criminal court when the agency decision was reached in a judicial-like adversary proceeding that gave both parties the opportunity to fully litigate the issue; the issue was identical, with a final agency decision on the merits; and the party to be estopped was in privity with the administrative party. People v Sims (1982) 32 C3d 468, 186 CR 77 (welfare hearing issue was whether overpayments were because of fraud by defendant; criminal charge was welfare fraud).

Ø Note: Certain decisions of the Department of Motor Vehicles (DMV) concerning driving with excessive blood-alcohol levels or refusing blood-alcohol tests do not have collateral estoppel effect in criminal courts. Veh C §§13558(g), 13559(b).

A court decision favoring a defendant in a criminal case will be given collateral estoppel effect in an administrative agency when the court proceeding must necessarily have decided the identical issue; a final judgment was reached on the merits; and the parties to be estopped were in privity with each other. For example, dismissal of a criminal case can have a collateral estoppel effect on DMV license revocation proceedings. See Zapata v DMV (1991) 2 CA4th 108, 113, 2 CR2d 855; Buttimer v Alexis (1983) 146 CA3d 754, 194 CR 603; Shackelton v DMV (1975) 46 CA3d 327, 119 CR 921.

Privity of parties, i.e., sufficient closeness, was found in People v Sims, supra, because the county Department of Social Services and the county district attorney operated jointly in investigating and controlling welfare fraud. Although Buttimer found privity between the district attorney and the DMV, other cases have refused to find privity between those two parties: Pawlowski v Pierce (1988) 202 CA3d 692, 249 CR 49; Lofthouse v DMV (1981) 124 CA3d 730, 737, 177 CR 601; Skinner v Sillas (1976) 58 CA3d 591, 130 CR 91.

For court rulings that did not find a collateral estoppel effect, see Betyar v Pierce (1988) 205 CA3d 1250, 252 CR 907 (stipulation is not equivalent of issue being litigated, nor was issue necessary to conviction); People v O'Daniel (1987) 194 CA3d 715, 239 CR 790 (collateral estoppel effect was not accorded decision of administrative board at prison disciplinary hearing because "hearing" was not "judicial" in nature); People v Meyer (1986) 183 CA3d 1150, 228 CR 635 (welfare fraud; new evidence discovered by prosecutor after agency hearing); People v Wilson (1985) 169 CA3d 1149, 215 CR 694 (welfare fraud; agency hearing concerned only value of assets at time of hearing, not fraud, perjury, or assets during time of application and receipt of benefits); People v Rodriguez (1984) 160 CA3d 650, 206 CR 79 (welfare fraud; agency hearing concerned only residency of father at time of hearing, not residency during time of application for and receipt of benefits); Reed v DMV (1979) 102 CA3d 662, 164 CR 373 (informal evidentiary ruling that was not binding did not involve issue that was litigated, nor was issue necessary to conviction). See also Skinner v Sillas, supra.

§26.34 X. PLEA OF FORMER CONVICTION OR FORMER ACQUITTAL

No one can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he or she has once been prosecuted and convicted or acquitted. Pen C §687. When an act charged as a public offense is within the jurisdiction of California, another state, a territory of the United States, or federal court, a conviction or acquittal is a bar to the prosecution or indictment of that offense in this state. Pen C §§656, 793. If, however, the offense committed in this state involves an element not present in the prior prosecution, a conviction in California is not barred. People v Belcher (1974) 11 C3d 91, 99, 113 CR 1.

When an offense is within the jurisdiction of two or more California courts, a conviction or acquittal of the offense in one court is a bar to prosecution of that offense in another court. Pen C §794.

When the facts are uncontradicted and different inferences cannot be drawn, the issue of former jeopardy or acquittal is one of law for the trial court to decide. Otherwise, the defense is entitled to a jury trial on the issue. See People v Vigghiany (1960) 181 CA2d 621, 631, 5 CR 501.

The doctrine of former acquittal applies even when the defendant is "convicted" of a nonexistent offense People v Broussard (1977) 76 CA3d 193, 199, 142 CR 664 (attempted voluntary manslaughter)) or an offense erroneously considered a necessarily included offense (People v Tatem (1976) 62 CA3d 655, 658, 133 CR 265 (petty theft when burglary charged)). Thus, a defendant who obtains reversal of a voluntary manslaughter conviction cannot later be retried for murder, because the finding of guilt of voluntary manslaughter operates as an implied acquittal of the greater offense. People v Pena (1984) 151 CA3d 462, 478, 198 CR 819.

It is not an acquittal of the same offense if (Pen C §1021):

- The defendant was formerly acquitted on the ground of variance between the accusatory pleading and the proof, or
- The accusatory pleading was dismissed based on an objection to its form or substance, or in order to hold the defendant for a higher offense, without a judgment of acquittal.

Whenever the defendant is acquitted on the merits, however, he or she is acquitted of the offense charged, despite any defect in form or substance in the accusatory pleading on which the trial was held. Pen C §1022.

When there has previously been an acquittal or conviction, both multiple prosecution and multiple punishment under another criminal statute are prohibited for the same acts or omissions. Pen C §654. See People v Bas (1987) 194 CA3d 878, 883, 241 CR 299. For further discussion of §654, see §§37.44-37.50.

For the form of the plea, see §26.5. For discussion of pleading once in jeopardy, see §§26.23-26.28.

§26.35 XI. NOT GUILTY BY REASON OF INSANITY

The not guilty by reason of insanity (NGI) plea must be entered by the defendant personally and not through counsel alone. This is the rule, even though the present insanity of a defendant may make the validity of such a choice somewhat suspect. People v Lomboy (1981) 116 CA3d 67, 71, 171 CR 812. See Pen C §§1016(6), 1017(5), 1018.

A defendant who fails to join an NGI plea with a not guilty plea admits the offense charged. Pen C §1016(6); In re Fuller (1981) 124 CA3d 251, 177 CR 233. Thus, the defendant, on making such a plea, must be informed by the court of his or her Boykin-Tahl rights (see §§26.10-26.12). People v Rizer (1971) 5 C3d 35, 36, 95 CR 23. However, if the defendant pleads both "not guilty by reason of insanity" and "not guilty," the court does not need to advise the defendant of his or her Boykin-Tahl rights. People v Weaver (2001) 26 C4th 876, 964, 111 CR2d 2.

The insanity defense is discussed in §§48.40-48.58.

XII. CASE SETTLEMENT (PLEA BARGAINING)

§26.36 A. Terminology Surrounding Plea Bargaining

The terms "case settlement" and "plea bargaining" refer to the resolution of a case without a trial through negotiation between the prosecution and the defense. Plea negotiations can take several forms. In the most common form of plea bargaining, the defendant agrees to plead guilty or no contest to one or more of the charged offenses, and the prosecution agrees

- To drop some charges,
- To reduce one or more of the charges to a less serious offense, or
- To recommend a particular sentence or a sentence of no more than an agreed-upon maximum term.

Negotiations concerning the charges are sometimes referred to as charge bargaining, and negotiations concerning the sentence are sometimes referred to as sentence bargaining.

Charge bargaining looks to the accusation and the crimes alleged. In their efforts to reach agreement on the facts, defense counsel and the prosecutor discuss the offenses that are charged or that are reasonably related to a charged offense. These are the only offenses to which a defendant can plead guilty, unless the charging document is amended. See People v West (1970) 3 C3d 595, 611, 91 CR 385. If agreement is reached, the prosecutor modifies the accusation in accord with the agreement and the defendant pleads guilty, thus resolving the factual issues and the need for trial. For example, in exchange for a plea of guilty to one count in a complaint, the prosecutor might agree to dismiss the remaining count, file no additional specified charges, reduce a charged count to a less serious offense, or drop an enhancement provision. Charge bargaining is codified in Pen C §§1192.1-1192.4, 1192.6-1192.7.

Sentence bargaining involves negotiating the sentence that the defendant will receive. Often, negotiations concerning the sentence include discussions of reducing or dismissing one or more charges. In sentence bargaining, the defendant gives up his or her right to a trial and pleads guilty in exchange for a reduced sentence (e.g., a predetermined amount of time in the county jail), no state prison, no physical custody of any kind, or credit for time served (sometimes called "judgment suspended"). An agreed sentence must be approved by the court. Sentence bargaining is codified in Pen C §1192.5.

Defendants can waive any irregularities in sentencing if the sentence is part of the plea bargain. See People v Jones (1989) 210 CA3d 124, 132, 258 CR 294; People v Otterstein (1987) 189 CA3d 1548, 1550, 235 CR 108. See also People v Velasquez (1999) 69 CA4th 503, 81 CR2d 647 (although defendant can waive irregularities, this does not allow court to sentence defendant to term not stipulated in plea agreement).

Most defendants do not exercise their constitutional right to a trial, pleading guilty at or before the trial date. The court's and prosecutor's primary reason for plea bargaining is to save money by eliminating court congestion. Pleading guilty at an early stage eliminates numerous court hearings, saving time for judges and attorneys. Also, in some circumstances the prosecutor may be concerned about potential problems of proof, or protecting victims from having to testify, and would prefer to settle the case rather than go to trial. The defendant usually plea-bargains for a more lenient sentence, a less serious charge, or both.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.37 B. Time of Plea Bargaining

The time when plea bargaining occurs varies, depending on local practice. It may take place on a special day scheduled by the court for a pretrial hearing or conference, or outside court at a time arranged between defense counsel and the prosecutor. It may even take place at arraignment. The trial court has the power to adopt and enforce its own procedures for court-supervised settlement conferences, e.g., whether they are held in open court or in chambers, or on or off the record. Bryce v Superior Court (1988) 205 CA3d 671, 252 CR 443.

Plea bargaining usually takes place before the date the case is set to go to trial. In some counties, however, particularly in misdemeanor cases, plea bargaining does occur on the date set for trial. In larger counties with huge caseloads, "better deals" are sometimes available to the defense at that time.

Ø Warning: Defense counsel must know local practice before relying on the availability of plea bargaining after the prosecutor has made an offer that the defense has refused. And, even in counties where the prosecutor will discuss plea negotiations again before trial, defense counsel should be prepared for such negotiations to be unsuccessful and for the trial to proceed as scheduled.

Once trial has begun, most avenues of case settlement have been exhausted. However, events occasionally occur that cause counsel to reevaluate the case, e.g., a material witness fails to appear or a witness refuses to testify or recants his or her testimony. In such situations, either party may suggest further discussion of a case settlement.

If a mistrial is declared for any reason, both the defense and the prosecution may then be able to reevaluate their previous positions and open the way to case settlement. When a hung jury was weighted in favor of acquittal, the prosecutor is more likely to plea bargain the case to a lesser charge.

C. Limitations on Plea Bargaining

§26.38 1. Felonies Specified in Pen C §1192.7(a)

With limited exceptions, Pen C §1192.7 prohibits both charge and sentence bargaining when any of the following crimes are charged in an indictment or information:

- Serious felonies specified in Pen C §1192.7(c) (Pen C §1192.7(a)(2));
- Felonies in which the defendant personally used a firearm (Pen C §1192.7(a)(2));
- Driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs (Pen C §1192.7(a)(2)); or
- Violent sex offenses listed in Pen C §667.61(c) that could be prosecuted under Pen C §269, §288.7, §667(b)-(i), §667.61, or §667.71 (Pen C §1192.7(a)(3)).

Ø Note: Vehicle Code §23622 prohibits the court from striking prior drunk driving convictions in order to avoid imposing minimum imprisonment time or minimum fines otherwise required.

Under Pen C §1192.7(b), plea bargaining is defined as > any bargaining, negotiation, or discussion between a criminal defendant, or his or her counsel, and a prosecuting attorney or judge, whereby the defendant agrees to plead guilty or nolo contendere, in exchange for any promises, commitments, concessions, assurances, or consideration by the prosecuting attorney or judge relating to any charge against the defendant or to the sentencing of the defendant.

The explicit language of Pen C §1192.7 applies only when an information or indictment has been filed. See Pen C §1192(a)(2)-(3). As a result, attorneys in many counties engage in plea bargaining before a commitment order at the preliminary hearing. On pleading guilty to a felony before the magistrate makes a commitment order, see §§8.6, 26.20.

In addition, there are three specified exceptions to the §1192.7 prohibition against plea bargaining. Plea bargaining is permitted in the following circumstances (Pen C §1192.7(a)(2)-(3)):

- When there is insufficient evidence to prove the prosecution's case;
- When the testimony of a material witness cannot be obtained; or
- When a reduction or dismissal would not result in a substantial change in sentence.

If a plea agreement is reached with respect to a violent sex crime listed in Pen C §667.61(c), the prosecutor must state on the record why the defendant was not prosecuted under Pen C §269, §288.7, §667(b)-(i), §667.61, or §667.71.

The local prosecutor may have policy guidelines on how these exceptions are applied or may apply them in a particular manner. Therefore, it is important to know what a jurisdiction's practices are before entering into any case settlement discussion. For example, what kind of disposition meets the requirement that there will be no substantial change in punishment? Some jurisdictions base the test on what could be expected if the case were to go to trial. Others use the maximum punishment available as the test for substantial change. In People v Arauz (1992) 5 CA4th 663, 665, 7 CR2d 145, the reviewing court concluded that "so long as the sentence a judge imposes as a result of a plea bargain is substantially the same sentence the judge would have imposed had there been no plea bargain, the sentence is proper." The court rejected the prosecution's argument that the maximum available punishment should be used as the "yardstick" to determine whether the plea bargain resulted in a substantial change in punishment, and relied on the trial court's statement on the record that the sentence imposed as a result of the defendant's plea was the one the court would have imposed had the defendant not pleaded guilty. 5 CA4th at 671.

Ø Note: As a rule of thumb, a criminal defense attorney who first practices in a "new" jurisdiction should discuss the local practice with either a public defender or a local defense attorney. Most jurisdictions vary on these kinds of questions.

The Uniform Crime Charging Manual (updated annually), issued by the California District Attorneys Association, is helpful in determining what may be considered insufficient evidence: "Available admissible evidence should be of such convincing force that it would establish the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt by an objective fact finder after hearing all the available admissible evidence."

Ø Note: The prosecutor must state on the record the reasons for a negotiated plea involving any felony. Pen C §1192.6. However, the defendant does not have standing to raise issues of violations of Pen C §§1192.6-1192.7 on appeal. People v Gonzales (1986) 188 CA3d 586, 233 CR 204.

By its terms, Pen C §1192.7(b) does not appear to apply to "slow pleas," submissions of the question of guilt to the trial judge on the preliminary hearing transcript, because the defendant does not plead guilty or no contest. However, an argument can be made that the §1192.7 restrictions on plea bargaining should apply when the slow plea is equivalent to a guilty plea. On slow pleas generally, see Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302; In re Mosley (1970) 1 C3d 913, 83 CR 809; People v Tran (1984) 152 CA3d 680, 199 CR 539. For discussion of slow pleas, see §§26.19, 28.19-28.21.

In addition, Pen C §1192.7(b) may not prohibit the judge from accepting a plea in exchange for a specified or "indicated" sentence under certain situations. On what constitutes an "indicated sentence," see §26.49.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.39 2. Prior Felony Convictions

Under Pen C §667(g), the limitations imposed on plea bargaining in Pen C §1192.7(b) apply to prior felony convictions. Note, however, that the trial court on its own motion may dismiss prior felony convictions, including strikes, in furtherance of justice under Pen C §1385, unless otherwise prohibited. Pen C §667(f); People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 508, 53 CR2d 789.

§26.40 3. Illegal Sentence

The parties may not enter a plea bargain that requires the court to impose an illegal sentence. "A plea bargain that purports to authorize the court to exercise a power it does not have is unlawful and may not be enforced." In re Williams (2000) 83 CA4th 936, 944, 100 CR2d 144. See People v Harvey (1980) 112 CA3d 132, 139, 169 CR 153.

When a material term of a plea bargain is unenforceable because it calls for an illegal sentence, the defendant must be given the opportunity to withdraw the plea, but is not ordinarily entitled to specific enforcement of the agreement. In re Williams, 83 CA4th at 946. But see Buckley v Terhune (9th Cir 2006) 441 F3d 688, 699 (federal court ordered specific enforcement of unlawful sentence because defendant had performed his part of agreement, prosecutor had received benefit of bargain, and consequently rescission would not have repaired the harm caused by the state's breach of the plea agreement).

When a plea bargain calls for an unauthorized sentence, the defendant may be estopped from challenging the sentence on appeal. Ordinarily, either party may appeal the imposition of an unauthorized sentence, even when no objection has been made in the trial court. See, e.g., People v Davis (1981) 29 C3d 814, 827 n5, 176 CR 521 (court may correct unauthorized sentence at any time). However, when a defendant has pleaded guilty in exchange for a specified sentence, the reviewing court "will not find error even though the trial court acted in excess of jurisdiction in reaching that figure, so long as the trial court did not lack fundamental jurisdiction." People v Hester (2000) 22 C4th 290, 295, 92 CR2d 641. See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.412(b) (defendant who agreed to specified sentence may not challenge Pen C §654 violation on appeal absent objection in trial court).

As the court of appeal explained in People v Couch (1996) 48 CA4th 1053, 1057, 56 CR2d 220:

> When a defendant maintains that the trial court's sentence violates rules which would have required the imposition of a more lenient sentence, yet the defendant avoided a potentially harsher sentence by entering into the plea bargain, it may be implied that the defendant waived any rights under such rules by choosing to accept the plea bargain.

But see Alhusainy v Superior Court (2006) 143 CA4th 385, 391, 48 CR3d 914 (probation condition banishing defendant from state set aside on appeal at defendant's request despite defendant's agreement to condition); In re Babak S. (1993) 18 CA4th 1077, 1084, 22 CR2d 893 (probation condition requiring minor to live in Iran for 2 years invalidated on appeal by minor).

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.41 D. Evidence of Failed Plea Bargain May Be Admissible at Trial

Evidence that a defendant offered to plead guilty is inadmissible by the terms of Evid C §§1153-1153.5 and Pen C §1192.4. See People v Crow (1994) 28 CA4th 440, 33 CR2d 624 (inadmissible in prosecution's case-in-chief). However, the "truth-in-evidence" provision of the California Constitution (Cal Const art I, §28(f)(2)) has been interpreted to allow statements made to a probation officer in the preparation of a presentence report to be used for impeachment at trial after the guilty plea was withdrawn. People v Pacchioli (1992) 9 CA4th 1331, 12 CR2d 156. However, a defendant's statements to a probation officer in reliance on a plea bargain could not be used as substantive evidence of guilt after the plea was withdrawn. People v Scheller (2006) 136 CA4th 1143, 39 CR3d 447.

E. Defense Considerations in Plea Bargaining

§26.42 1. Negotiating With Prosecutor

Mutual respect and trust are the key ingredients in any plea bargaining session. If the defense attorney has practiced in the area, his or her reputation will be "well known" in the district attorney's office. If the case is counsel's maiden voyage, friendliness, candor, and an even temper are crucial first ingredients.

The willingness of either party to try the case if a fair disposition is not reached by agreement is an important ingredient in a successful plea bargaining session. Defense counsel (and district attorneys) who are known for a lack of enthusiasm for trial will tend to receive less advantageous offers.

The first thing defense counsel should do when bargaining is to learn the prosecutor's position on the case. Defense counsel may find that the prosecutor does not consider the case to be as serious as counsel thought or that the prosecutor has some problem with the case of which counsel was unaware. As a practical matter, the prosecutor wants to obtain a conviction and is most likely to negotiate when he or she is least likely to obtain a conviction because of a weak case. Therefore, if defense counsel has a strong factual or legal defense, that fact should be stressed at the outset. If the case against the client is strong, however, counsel must rely on other factors, such as a "clean" defendant, or a "cheap" case. (A "clean" defendant has no prior arrests, or at least no prior convictions. A "cheap" case is one involving a minor crime, e.g., theft of a 49-cent pen.)

Ø Note: Defense counsel should avoid disclosing details of the defense in the event a plea bargain is not reached. See §26.41.

If defense counsel is dealing with an inexperienced prosecutor who refuses to accept what defense counsel feels is a realistic settlement, counsel may wish to ask to speak with a senior prosecutor. This request is a delicate one, and should be worded carefully so as not to make an enemy in the district attorney's office. Before talking to a senior deputy, the original deputy should be told of defense counsel's plan to go up the ladder.

A plea bargain must include a plea to an offense charged or to one reasonably related to an offense charged. The trial court lacks jurisdiction over other offenses unless the prosecutor amends the accusatory pleading. See People v West (1970) 3 C3d 595, 611, 91 CR 385.

Once an offer has been made by a prosecutor and accepted by defense counsel in an informal plea-bargaining process, defense counsel should write down the offer in the case file and either write the prosecutor a letter acknowledging acceptance of the offer o ask the prosecutor to write down the offer and acceptance in his or her file so that there is some record. Without such a record, another deputy prosecutor might pick up the file at the time the defendant plans to enter a plea and have no information about the negotiations. Complicated or lengthy terms and conditions should definitely be recorded so that confusion does not arise later when memories are not as clear.

Ø Note: Although the prosecutor may agree not to charge certain enhancements as part of a plea bargain, absent agreement, this does not preclude him or her from arguing for aggravation based on those uncharged enhancements. People v Haney (1989) 207 CA3d 1034, 255 CR 276. Defense counsel should consider including in the plea bargain an agreement that the prosecutor may not argue for aggravation based on any uncharged enhancements.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.43 2. Strategies to Improve Defendant's Plea Bargaining and Sentencing Options; Alternatives to Jail

If possible, defense counsel should help the client get out of jail pending disposition of the case. If the client is not arrested again and can retain or find employment, his or her chances of receiving probation or other lenient disposition are improved. School is a possible alternative to a job. If the client has a drug or alcohol problem and enters an appropriate program, the judge may consider community service as an alternative to jail time, or the defendant may be eligible for diversion under Pen C §§1000-1000.8 (see chap 27). If the defendant is mentally ill and commits himself or herself to a mental hospital, counsel may be able to secure a dismissal under Pen C §1385 (discussed in chap 25). If the defendant has a cognitive developmental disability, he or she may be eligible for diversion under Pen C §§1001.20-1001.34 (discussed in chap 27). Civil compromise can result in dismissal. See Pen C §§1377-1379 (discussed in §§25.5-25.6). Some counties have informal hearings called "citation hearings" that are held instead of filing a complaint or that can be arranged by counsel after a complaint has been filed. At a citation hearing, a prosecutor or law clerk listens to the complaining witness and to the defendant, warns one or both of them, and dismisses the case. These hearings are most common for cases involving neighborhood disputes.

Experts are available, usually former probation officers, who will work with the defendant to plan a sentencing strategy and who will write a sentencing report similar to the one prepared by the probation department.

Despite the advantages just listed, if a defendant will receive some jail or prison time, the difficulty of a plea after the defendant is out of custody should be considered. In particular, a defendant with little experience in the criminal justice system is often reluctant to plead to time in custody. Cases are legion in which an out-of-custody defendant turned down a great deal that included time in custody, went to trial, and received a greater sentence.

§26.44 3. Presenting Plea Bargain to Defendant

Plea bargaining is a crucial stage of the criminal process in which the defendant is entitled to effective assistance of counsel. In re Alvernaz (1992) 2 C4th 924, 935, 8 CR2d 713. Defense counsel has several obligations:

- Counsel must promptly communicate to clients all plea negotiation offers, whether written or oral. Cal Rules of Prof Cond 3-510; ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, Prosecution and Defense Function 4-6.2, cited in In re Alvernaz, supra.
- Before presenting a plea bargain to the defendant, counsel should have interviewed the client, obtained discovery, and investigated the case sufficiently to be aware of all potential defenses of law and fact. See People v Pope (1979) 23 C3d 412, 424, 152 CR 732.
- Counsel should tell the client whether the client's factual version provides a legal or factual defense to the crime charged. Clients sometimes think they have a defense when they do not. If the defendant does not admit guilt, there are special considerations, which are discussed in §26.45.
- Counsel should inform the defendant of the prosecution and defense evidence and assess its value at trial. Counsel should also evaluate the plea bargain for its relative fairness in that court and in that county, and for the risks and probable outcome of trial. See 1 ABA Standards for Criminal Justice, The Defense Function 4-6.2 (defense counsel is obligated to ensure that accused's choice on question of guilty plea is an informed one, made with full awareness of alternatives, including any that arise from proposals made by prosecutor).
- Counsel should tell the client the possible effects of the plea bargain and of being found guilty as charged after a trial. See People v Huynh (1991) 229 CA3d 1067, 281 CR 785 (misadvice regarding effect of guilty plea); In re Alvernaz (1992) 2 C4th 924, 937 n6, 8 CR2d 713 (defense counsel must accurately advise defendant of sentence offered by prosecutor and of possible exposure if defendant goes to trial).
- Once a plea bargain offer is made and accepted by the defendant, defense counsel has the duty to follow through on it. See People v Brown (1986) 177 CA3d 537, 223 CR 66 (defense counsel failed to diligently pursue plea bargain and to correct preplea report).

On appeal, if a defendant can prove that a reasonable probability exists that, but for counsel's deficient performance, the defendant would have accepted a proffered plea bargain and that it would have been approved by the trial court, the defendant has a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel. This type of constitutional violation cannot be remedied by a fair trial; it requires reversal. In re Alvernaz (1992) 2 C4th 924, 8 CR2d 713. Following reversal, the district attorney is given the choice of submitting the previously offered plea bargain to the trial court for its approval, or of announcing that it will retry the defendant. 2 C4th at 944. But see Alvernaz v Ratelle (SD Cal 1993) 831 F Supp 790, which holds that the proper relief is to enforce the plea bargain. Note that this is a federal district court case involving the same defendant as in the California Supreme Court case cited above.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.45 4. Options When Defendant Does Not Admit Guilt

A showing of a factual basis for a guilty plea must be made in felony cases. Pen C §1192.5. There is no such requirement in misdemeanor cases. In re Gross (1983) 33 C3d 561, 189 CR 848. Some attorneys and public defender offices take the position that, as an ethical matter, defense attorneys should not join in guilty pleas in either felony or misdemeanor cases if the defendant denies guilt. Some judges will not accept a defendant's plea of guilty unless the defendant admits in open court that he or she is in truth guilty. A judge is not required to accept an Alford plea (North Carolina v Alford (1970) 400 US 25, 27 L Ed 2d 162, 91 S Ct 160), i.e., one in which the defendant pleads guilty while maintaining his or her innocence so as to gain an advantage in sentence. People v Snyder (1989) 208 CA3d 1141, 256 CR 601.

The purpose of an inquiry concerning guilt is to protect against the situation in which the defendant, although realizing what he or she has done, is not sufficiently skilled in the law to recognize that his or her acts do not constitute the offense that is charged. Such an inquiry also provides the court with a better assessment of the defendant's competency, willingness to plead guilty, and understanding of the charges. People v Watts (1977) 67 CA3d 173, 178, 136 CR 496. If evidence pointing to the defendant's innocence is discovered later, and the defendant seeks to overturn his or her guilty plea, a record will exist to show that the defendant also maintained his or her innocence in the trial court.

Several alternatives are available if the defendant does not admit guilt:

- The parties may stipulate that a police report or a transcript from the preliminary hearing may be considered to supply the requisite factual basis. People v Enright (1982) 132 CA3d 631, 183 CR 249 (factual basis was police report); People v Watts (1977) 67 CA3d 173, 136 CR 496 (factual basis was preliminary hearing transcript). This is called a "slow plea" (discussed in §§28.19-28.21).
- An oral stipulation of a factual basis by defense counsel and the prosecution may be sufficient. See People v McGuire (1991) 1 CA4th 281, 1 CR2d 846 (when judge asked counsel if they stipulated to factual basis for plea, both answered "so stipulated"). But see People v Willard (2007) 154 CA4th 1329, 1335, 65 CR3d 488 (bare stipulation by counsel with no reference to documents containing factual support insufficient). However, the court's conclusionary statement that "there's a factual basis" is insufficient. People v Tigner (1982) 133 CA3d 430, 435, 184 CR 61.
- The defendant may plead no contest (see §§26.7-26.8).
- The parties may agree to a full trial.

Some defense attorneys, as an ethical choice, move to withdraw from the case when the defendant does not admit guilt but wants to plead guilty to take advantage of the plea bargain, and no alternative to a guilty plea is available. If the court refuses to allow counsel to withdraw, the attorney usually does not participate in the taking of the plea.

Defense counsel is not required to refrain completely from joining in a plea bargain when the client maintains that he or she is innocent. If the defendant elects to plead guilty while maintaining factual innocence, defense counsel can participate in the plea. See People v Watts, supra. The better practice, however, is to try to obtain one of the above alternatives or to inform the court that the factual basis for the plea will come from the weight of the evidence, not from the defendant's in-court admission. See People v Watts, supra. When even that is unacceptable to the court, defense counsel may want to ask the defendant whether he or she still wishes to accept the plea bargain and, if so, indicate on the record that the defendant is prepared to say what the court asks.

§26.46 F. Prosecution Considerations in Plea Bargaining

Most prosecutors' offices have a statement of general settlement policies to guide the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Although local policies vary, the objective of any policy should be to achieve a fair, efficient, and effective enforcement of the criminal law.

Just as for defense counsel, a prosecutor's credibility is important in plea negotiations. Without credibility, a prosecutor may have difficulty engaging in pretrial conferences, which can provide valuable information. Frequently, defense attorneys reveal facts not mentioned in police reports or confessions. These "insights" into the defense, e.g., alibis or personal traits of the defendant, allow the prosecution to reassess the case.

The following general guidelines should be followed by prosecutors (see California District Attorneys Association Uniform Crime Charging Manual (updated annually)):

- A memorandum of any plea discussion or negotiation should be placed in the file when an agreement has been made with defense counsel.
- The prosecutor should be certain of the facts and know what facts are legally admissible before discussing a plea disposition.
- The prosecutor should inquire about what the defense will be, and, if the defense presents sound evidence, should consider it fairly and carefully, as if he or she would have to try the case.
- The prosecutor should always investigate the facts of the case that would be relevant in a sentence hearing, e.g., recidivism, past violence, provocation, chances of rehabilitation or threats to the victim.
- Defense counsel should not be misled. Intentionally deceiving opposing counsel is a ground for disciplinary action. Monroe v State Bar (1961) 55 C2d 145, 152, 10 CR 257.
- Whenever possible, the victim should be contacted to verify the impact of the crime. The victim has the right to attend and be heard at the sentencing hearing. People v Zikorus (1983) 150 CA3d 324, 197 CR 509.
- The prosecutor should guard against any injustice when a defendant is wrongfully accused of a crime more serious than the one actually committed, or accused by individuals whom the prosecutor knows through his or her own investigation lack credibility.
- Any plea disposition should attempt to hold the defendant responsible for the essence of the criminal conduct. For example, if the defendant holds up a store with a gun, the essence of the crime is robbery (Pen C §211) with the use of a firearm (Pen C §12022.5), not grand theft person, petty theft, or burglary.

§26.47 G. Preplea Report (Pen C §1203.7(a))

Counsel can ask the court to order a preplea probation report any time after arrest. Pen C §1203.7(a). When the prosecution is reluctant to enter into negotiations because the case falls within the plea bargaining limitations of Pen C §1192.7(a) or §667(g) (see §§26.38-26.39) or is a highly publicized case, this early probation report may be helpful in reaching a disposition. However, many prosecutors oppose preplea reports. For further discussion of preplea reports, see chap 27.

§26.48 H. Limits on Judge's Role in Plea Bargaining

Although no California rule forbids judicial involvement in plea negotiations, strong reservations have been expressed about judicial participation. See People v Weaver (2004) 118 CA4th 131, 148, 12 CR3d 742 (judge abused discretion in refusing to allow defendant to withdraw guilty plea and urging him to accept plea bargain); People v Sandoval (2006) 140 CA4th 111, 126, 43 CR3d 911 (trial judge's communication of belief that defendant should accept bargain supported conclusion that plea was coerced); People v Williams (1969) 269 CA2d 879, 884, 75 CR 348. The ABA Standards for Criminal Justice: Pleas of Guilty, Standard 14-3.3(c), states that a judge should not directly or indirectly communicate to the defendant or defense counsel that a plea agreement should be accepted or that a guilty plea should be entered. Although a judge should not ordinarily participate in plea negotiation discussions, the parties may present the judge with a proposed plea agreement and the judge may indicate whether he or she would accept the proposed terms and, if relevant, what sentence would be imposed. ABA Standards for Criminal Justice: Pleas of Guilty, Standard 14-3.3(d).

"The process of plea bargaining which has received statutory and judicial authorization as an appropriate method of disposing of criminal prosecutions contemplates an agreement negotiated by the People and the defendant and approved by the court." People v Orin (1975) 13 C3d 937, 942, 120 CR 65. The trial court's role should be limited to approving or disapproving the agreement negotiated between the parties. "[T]he court has no authority to substitute itself as the representative of the People in the negotiation process and under the guise of 'plea bargaining' to 'agree' to a disposition of the case over prosecutorial objection." 13 C3d at 943. See People v Segura (2008) 44 C4th 921, 930, 80 CR3d 715. For example, once the court accepts the terms of a negotiated plea, it cannot change the terms of that plea so that it becomes more favorable to the defendant unless the prosecution agrees. People v Segura, supra.

If the probation report contains information suggesting that a higher sentence is more appropriate, the judge may withdraw his or her approval of the bargain. See Pen C §1192.5; People v Superior Court (Smith) (1978) 82 CA3d 909, 914, 147 CR 554. The defendant then has the option of withdrawing his or her plea. Pen C §1192.5; People v Johnson (1974) 10 C3d 868, 872, 112 CR 556.

If the judge who accepts a guilty plea retains sentencing discretion under the agreement, that judge must sentence the defendant; otherwise, the defendant may withdraw his or her guilty plea. People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 756, 150 CR 778. This right may be waived, commonly called an Arbuckle waiver. See People v Ruhl (1985) 168 CA3d 311, 214 CR 93; People v Poole (1985) 168 CA3d 516, 214 CR 502. For discussion of Arbuckle rights, see §35.11.

A judge is not required to accept a plea of guilty if the defendant maintains his or her innocence. People v Snyder (1989) 208 CA3d 1141, 256 CR 601. For discussion of this issue, see §26.45.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.49 I. "Indicated Sentence" Does Not Require Prosecution's Consent

The trial court may not negotiate a specific sentence with the defendant over the prosecution's objection. People v Orin (1975) 13 C3d 937, 943, 120 CR 65. When, however, the defendant pleads guilty to all charges, the court may indicate the sentence it will impose "if a given set of facts is confirmed, irrespective of whether guilt is adjudicated at trial or admitted by plea." People v Superior Court (Smith) (1978) 82 CA3d 909, 916, 147 CR 554. The court may arrive at this "indicated sentence" by dismissing or reducing counts or enhancing allegations. People v Superior Court (Smith), supra. When the sentence itself is not unlawful or in excess of the court's jurisdiction, the court's "statement of intention is not something that can be reviewed or set aside." 82 CA3d at 916. See also People v Superior Court (Ramos) (1991) 235 CA3d 1261, 1 CR2d 333.

As discussed in §26.38, Pen C §1192.7 prohibits plea bargaining in most cases in which the defendant is charged with (1) a serious felony listed in §1192.7(c); (2) any felony for which it is alleged that the defendant personally used a firearm during the commission of the felony; (3) any offense involving driving under the influence; or (4) a violent sex crime listed in Pen C §667.61 that could be prosecuted under Pen C §269, §288.7, §667(b)-(i), §667.61, or §667.71. In addition, Pen C §667(g) prohibits plea bargaining over the dismissal of prior-conviction allegations. See §26.39. However, some judges consider an "indicated sentence" for defendants who plead guilty as charged to be distinct from a plea bargain. The definition of plea bargaining in Pen C §1192.7(b) includes arrangements in which "the defendant agrees to plead guilty or nolo contendere, in exchange for any promises, commitments, concessions, assurances, or consideration by the… judge relating to… sentencing." Thus, if the indicated sentence would be imposed "irrespective of whether guilt is adjudicated at trial or admitted by plea" (People v Superior Court (Smith) (1978) 82 CA3d 909, 916, 147 CR 554), it appears not to be a plea bargain within the meaning of Pen C §1192.7(b). Even when a court does engage in plea bargaining with the defendant as that term is defined in Pen C §1192.7(b), it is permissible if the bargain does not "result in a substantial change in sentence." Pen C §1192.7(a)(2)-(3); People v Arauz (1992) 5 CA4th 663, 671, 7 CR2d 145 (trial court made finding on the record that bargain did not result in substantial change in sentence). The line distinguishing a prohibited "plea bargain" (a violation of §1192.7) from an "indicated sentence" is sometimes a fine one. See People v Superior Court (Ludwig) (1985) 174 CA3d 473, 220 CR 87.

§26.50 J. Recording Plea Bargain

Every aspect of a negotiated settlement approved by the court should be put on the record. This procedure protects the court, the defendant, the defense attorney, and the prosecutor (People v Cardoza (1984) 161 CA3d 40, 207 CR 388) and is essential for meaningful appellate review.

Concerning the method of recording the bargain, the California Supreme Court stated in People v West (1970) 3 C3d 595, 610, 91 CR 385:

> Without limiting [the trial] court to those we set forth, we note four possible methods of incorporation: (1) the bargain could be stated orally and recorded by the court reporter, whose notes then must be preserved or transcribed; (2) the bargain could be set forth by the clerk in the minutes of the court; (3) the parties could file a written stipulation stating the terms of the bargain; (4) finally, counsel or the court itself may find it useful to prepare and utilize forms for the recordation of plea bargains.

§26.51 K. When Judge Fails to Approve Plea Bargain

If the court refuses to approve a plea bargain, the defendant may withdraw it and enter whatever other pleas are available. Although it is within the court's discretion to approve or reject a negotiated plea, it may not arbitrarily refuse to consider a plea negotiation. People v Smith (1971) 22 CA3d 25, 99 CR 171.

When a plea bargain is made, a trial judge may not impose a judgment contrary to the terms of the negotiated plea without giving the defendant an opportunity to withdraw his or her guilty plea. Pen C §1192.5. See People v Delles (1968) 69 C2d 906, 73 CR 389. See also People v Johnson (1974) 10 C3d 868, 112 CR 556 (court must advise defendant of right to withdraw guilty plea under these circumstances); People v Jackson (1980) 103 CA3d 635, 638, 163 CR 115 (defendant understood that imposition of lighter sentence was conditioned on his having no prior record, yet he used alias in attempt to conceal prior record; neither §1192.5 nor plea bargain gave defendant right to withdraw plea).

A court has broad discretion to withdraw its prior approval of a previously negotiated plea bargain that includes a specific sentence (e.g., 3 years in state prison) and may do so at sentencing if the court on further consideration, including hearing objections to the bargain from the victim's family, concludes that the bargain is not in the best interests of society. People v Stringham (1988) 206 CA3d 184, 253 CR 484. The court may not refuse to sentence when the prosecutor and defendant have agreed to the charges that the defendant will plead to and have left sentencing completely up to the judge. People v Mikhail (1993) 13 CA4th 846, 16 CR2d 641. On specific enforcement of plea bargains, see §26.53.

A defendant may withdraw his or her plea-bargained guilty plea and proceed to trial if the trial court disapproves the plea bargain based on the defendant's failure to appear at sentencing. Pen C §1192.5; People v Cruz (1988) 44 C3d 1247, 1250, 246 CR 1.

Ø Note: As part of a plea, a defendant may execute a Cruz waiver pursuant to which the defendant is released from custody in exchange for his or her promise to appear for sentencing and, for example, not commit other crimes. See People v Vargas (2007) 148 CA4th 644, 646, 55 CR3d 837.

In People v Casillas (1997) 60 CA4th 445, 451, 70 CR2d 290, the court outlined a three-pronged approach to the defendant's failure to appear for sentencing on a plea bargain. The court held that > first, when a defendant fails to appear at sentencing after entering a bargained plea with no discussion about a specific sanction for nonappearance, he or she is entitled to withdraw the plea if the court refuses to honor the plea bargain. Second, the same rule applies when during the plea proceedings but after the parties have negotiated the basic plea bargain, the court imposes an additional condition providing a sanction for nonappearance. Third, when the parties themselves agree as part of the plea bargain to a specific sanction for nonappearance, the court need not permit the defendant to withdraw his or her plea but may invoke the bargained-for sanction.

§26.53 M. Remedies for Breach of Plea Bargain

Breach by court or prosecutor. The purpose of a remedy for breach of a plea bargain is to redress the harm caused by the violation without prejudicing either party or curtailing the normal sentencing discretion of the trial judge. People v Mancheno (1982) 32 C3d 855, 860, 187 CR 441. The usual remedies for violation of a plea bargain are to allow the defendant to withdraw the plea and go to trial on the original charges, or to specifically enforce the plea bargain. People v Mancheno, supra.

When the breach consists of the prosecutor's refusal to comply with the agreement, specific enforcement would entail an order directing the prosecutor to fulfill the bargain. When the breach consists of the court's refusal to sentence in accord with the agreed-on recommendation, the usual rule is that the defendant is allowed to withdraw his or her plea of guilty or no contest. See Pen C §1192.5, discussed in §26.51. In unusual circumstances, however, specific enforcement of a sentence agreed to by a judge when the plea was taken might be ordered. See People v Kaanehe (1977) 19 C3d 1, 13, 136 CR 409. See also, e.g., Buckley v Terhune (9th Cir 2006) 441 F3d 688, 699 (specific performance granted; when petitioner had fulfilled his obligations under plea agreement by testifying against his accomplices and serving agreed-on sentence, rescission would not repair harm caused by state's breach of agreement).

The punishment imposed by the court may not significantly exceed that which the parties agreed on. People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1024, 1 CR2d 902. The test for whether a deviation is "significant" is stricter than the test for prejudice on not being advised of the consequences of a guilty plea, i.e., simply deciding whether the defendant would probably not have pleaded guilty had the greater punishment been known. Punishment that is not "prejudicial" can still be considered "significant" if imposed after a negotiated plea. 54 C3d at 1027 n3.

In People v Williams (1988) 45 C3d 1268, 1307, 248 CR 834, the California Supreme Court declined to adopt the rule of Cooper v U.S. (4th Cir 1979) 594 F2d 12 that, when a prosecutor offers a plea bargain and the defendant timely accepts it, the prosecution may not withdraw the offer absent exceptional circumstances. In Mabry v Johnson (1984) 467 US 504, 81 L Ed 2d 437, 104 S Ct 2543, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Cooper rule is not mandated by the U.S. Constitution.

Breach by defendant. Plea bargains can be breached by the defendant as well as other parties. In Ricketts v Adamson (1987) 483 US 1, 97 L Ed 2d 1, 107 S Ct 2680, the defendant breached the plea bargain by not testifying after sentence. The plea was vacated and the defendant was placed on trial for the original charges. In People v Collins (1996) 45 CA4th 849, 53 CR2d 367, the defendant breached a condition of the plea bargain by not telling the truth about a murder. The court of appeal upheld vacating the defendant's sentence on the motion of the prosecution.

© The Regents of the University of California

§26.54 N. Remedy for IAC That Resulted in Rejection of Offered Plea Bargain

The appropriate remedy for ineffective assistance of counsel (IAC) that results in a defendant's decision to reject an offered plea bargain and proceed to trial is for the district attorney to submit the previously offered plea bargain to the trial court for its approval, unless the district attorney within 30 calendar days elects to retry the defendant and resume the plea negotiation process. In re Alvernaz (1992) 2 C4th 924, 944, 8 CR2d 713. But see Alvernaz v Ratelle (SD Cal 1993) 831 F Supp 790, which holds that the proper relief is to endorse the plea bargain. Note the federal district court case involves the same defendant as the California Supreme Court case.

§27.1 I. OVERVIEW

Deferred entry of judgment in narcotics, drug abuse, and child abuse cases. For violations of certain specified drug and child abuse crimes, a defendant may be eligible to participate in a deferred entry of judgment program. See Pen C §§1000-1000.6, 1000.12. Deferred entry of judgment is the suspension of criminal proceedings for a prescribed time with certain conditions after a defendant has entered a guilty plea. If the defendant is denied participation in the program, criminal proceedings resume, and the defendant, having already pleaded guilty, is sentenced. If the defendant is successful in meeting the terms of the program, the criminal charges are dismissed and the defendant may, with certain exceptions, legally answer that he or she has never been arrested for or charged with the diverted offense.

Diversion. For violations of certain specified crimes, a defendant may be eligible to participate in a diversion program. See Pen C §§1001-1001.9. Diversion is the suspension of criminal proceedings for a prescribed time period with certain conditions. If the defendant is unsuccessful, criminal proceedings resume. If diversion is successfully completed, the criminal charges are dismissed and the defendant may, with certain exceptions, legally answer that he or she has never been arrested for or charged with the diverted offense. Pen C §1001.9. A fee to the court and a separate fee to the program are usually required. The benefits and protections of a successful diversion are to be given broad application. B.W. v Board of Med. Quality Assur. (1985) 169 CA3d 219, 215 CR 130.

Preplea probation reports. The court may order preplea probation reports before a defendant enters a plea. Pen C §1203.7. They are sometimes used as the sentencing probation report. See Pen C §1203d. However, as a result of tight county budgets, preplea probation reports are not always available.

Ø Warning: Counsel should consult local rules before relying on this chart. Many counties have specific time requirements not otherwise required by the Penal Code.

III. DEFERRED ENTRY OF JUDGMENT

§27.3 A. Narcotics and Drug Abuse Cases

Unless there is an applicable pre-guilty-plea drug diversion program in the court of jurisdiction (Pen C §1000.5), a defendant found to be eligible for "deferred entry of judgment" must plead guilty to the crime charged and waive time for the entry of judgment (Pen C §1000.1(b)). Entry of judgment on the defendant's plea is then deferred pending successful completion of a drug program. If the defendant successfully completes the program, criminal proceedings are dismissed, and the defendant may legally answer that he or she has never been arrested for, nor charged with, the offense.

If a defendant in a deferred entry of judgment program relapses into drug use or violates other terms of deferred entry of judgment, then deferred entry of judgment can be terminated and the judgment entered. Pen C §1000.3. Because the defendant had already pleaded guilty before obtaining deferred entry of judgment, the prosecution need only show that the defendant failed to successfully complete the drug program. Thereafter, the defendant is sentenced as he or she would be after any conviction. See People v Rodriguez (1990) 51 C3d 437, 445, 272 CR 613; People v Davis (2000) 79 CA4th 251, 257, 93 CR2d 905.

Penal Code §1000.5 authorizes the establishment of a pre-guilty-plea drug court program. Under such a program, criminal proceedings are suspended, without a guilty plea, for designated defendants who receive treatment during that time. Defendants who successfully complete the treatment are entitled to dismissal of their cases. See discussion in §27.10. Defendants who are terminated from the program unsuccessfully will have their criminal charges reinstated. Pen C §1000.5(b).

The drug court program must be consented to in writing by the presiding judge or the judge's designee, the district attorney, and the public defender; otherwise, the program is operated as a deferred entry of judgment program. Pen C §1000.5(a). Counties vary on the establishment of a drug court program.

Ø Example: The Wiley W. Manuel Courthouse branch of the Alameda County Superior Court offers an innovative preplea diversion and deferred entry of judgment option under Pen C §§1000-1000.6, the Mentor Diversion Program. The program is designed for young adult defendants under age 25 charged with nonviolent drug sales offenses who otherwise have no significant criminal history. If eligible, the defendant is placed into an intensive 24-month diversion program supervised by specialized probation officers and monitored by the court. The defendant is required to seek and maintain employment, attend school, dress appropriately for court, agree to be tested for drugs, meet regularly with a probation officer, and satisfy other requirements as ordered by the court. If the defendant is expelled from the program, the felony charges are reinstated, or judgment entered. A defendant who successfully completes the program and stays out of trouble avoids a felony conviction and his or her arrest record is sealed (see Pen C §851.90). Defense counsel with a youthful client may want to explore whether an option like the Mentor Diversion Program is available.

Ø Note: The legislature has authorized the superior courts to create a "Back on Track" deferred entry of judgment reentry program for first-time nonviolent felony drug offenders. See Pen C §§1000.8-1000.10. Defense counsel with such a client may want to explore whether this option is available.

1. Eligibility Requirements

§27.4 a. Deferrable Offense

A defendant who is otherwise eligible may be considered for deferred entry of judgment if charged with one or more of the following offenses (Pen C §1000(a)):

- Possession of controlled substances and/or restricted drugs. Health & S C §11350.
- Possession of marijuana. Health & S C §11357.
- Possession of drug paraphernalia. Health & S C §11364.
- Aiding, assisting, or abetting the unlawful use of controlled substances. Health & S C §11365.
- Possession of nonnarcotic prescription drugs without a prescription. Health & S C §11377.
- Possession of prescription drugs without a prescription. Bus & P C §4060.
- Using or being under the influence of a controlled substance (Health & S C §11550; Pen C §647(f)) or possession of a gluelike substance with the intent to inhale and become intoxicated (Pen C §381).
- Possession of marijuana while driving. Veh C §23222(b).
- Cultivation of marijuana, if the marijuana planted, cultivated, harvested, dried, or processed is for personal use. Health & S C §11358.
- Creation or use of a forged or altered narcotic prescription, if the narcotic drug was secured by a fictitious prescription and is for the defendant's personal use and was not sold or furnished to another. Health & S C §11368.
- Solicitation to commit a felony, if the solicitation was for acts directed to personal use only. Pen C §653f.

An attempt to commit any of these eligible offenses makes a person eligible for diversion on the same basis as someone who has actually committed the eligible offense. See People v Barrajas (1998) 62 CA4th 926, 73 CR2d 123.

Ø Note: Diversion is available under Pen C §1000 for offenses involving small quantities of marijuana. Health and Safety Code §11357(b) provides a separate scheme for deferred entry of judgment for offenses that involve small quantities of marijuana. In addition, Health & S C §11357(b) (possession of less than 28.5 grams of marijuana) provides a separate, mandatory diversion scheme for anyone who has been convicted of violating §11357(b) three or more times within a 2-year period. Diversion under this subdivision does not require an eligibility determination or the concurrence of the district attorney. Health & S C §11357(b). See People v Squier (1993) 15 CA4th 235, 238, 18 CR2d 536.

Ø Note: Defense counsel should check with the district attorney to learn whether the county has a diversion program and whether the defendant is eligible. Such a program may allow for an early and inexpensive resolution of the case. For example, the Wiley W. Manuel Courthouse branch of the Alameda County Superior Court has a diversion program that gives first-time marijuana offenders charged with violating Health & S C §11357(b) an opportunity to undergo a 4-hour drug and alcohol consulting session in lieu of entering a plea. If the defendant attends and completes the session, the charge is dismissed.

Vehicle Code §23222(b) (possession of no more than an ounce of marijuana while driving) also provides for mandatory diversion when an individual has had three or more convictions within a 2-year period.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.5 b. Other Requirements

The prosecutor is charged with the duty of determining whether a defendant meets the eligibility requirements set forth in Pen C §1000(a), unless the defendant comes within the provisions of Health & S C §11357(b) (see §27.4). Pen C §1000(b). The district attorney is statutorily required to "file with the court a declaration in writing or state for the record the grounds upon which the determination is based, and shall make this information available to the defendant and his or her attorney." Pen C §1000(b). Defense attorneys should ensure that the district attorney follows this mandate to preserve the record on appeal. See People v Brackett (1994) 25 CA4th 488, 496, 30 CR2d 557.

For counsel who is retained after an arrest, it is good practice to contact the filing deputy in the prosecutor's office to request screening of the defendant for possible deferred entry of judgment. If charges have been filed, counsel should request a deferred entry of judgment referral as soon as practicable. In some counties, the prosecutor will provide the defense attorney and the court with an initial deferred entry of judgment recommendation at the arraignment. See Pen C §1000(b). To be eligible for deferred entry of judgment, all of the following conditions must be applicable to the defendant:

No prior controlled substance conviction. The defendant cannot have a prior conviction for any offense involving controlled substances before the alleged commission of the charged offense. Pen C §1000(a)(1). See People v Ochoa (2009) 175 CA4th 859, 96 CR3d 376 (court could not consider marijuana possession conviction under Health & S C §11357(b) that occurred more than 2 years before offense, because records of that conviction should have been destroyed). The conviction is deemed complete at the time of the ascertainment of guilt, which occurs when the defendant pleads guilty or there is a jury verdict of guilty, regardless of whether sentencing has occurred. People v Kirk (2006) 141 CA4th 715, 46 CR3d 258.

Case did not involve crime of violence. The offense cannot have involved a crime of violence or threatened violence. Pen C §1000(a)(2); People v Macafee (1980) 109 CA3d 808, 167 CR 495. In Macafee, cocaine found during a booking search was held to be unrelated to the battery and disorderly conduct charge for which the defendant was arrested. The prosecutor charged all three offenses and claimed that the battery charge caused the defendant to be ineligible for diversion. On appeal, the court held that the drug charge was unrelated to the other charges and that the (then) diversion statutes should be liberally construed to promote their general objectives. See People v Superior Court (On Tai Ho) (1974) 11 C3d 59, 62, 113 CR 21, and People v Fulk (1974) 39 CA3d 851, 855, 114 CR 567, for a statement of those objectives.

Only deferrable drug offenses involved. There can be no evidence of narcotic or drug violations other than one of the violations listed in Pen C §1000(a). Pen C §1000(a)(3). For example, a defendant who is charged both with being under the influence of a controlled substance (Health & S C §11550) and driving under the combined influence of alcohol and a controlled substance (Veh C §23152(a), an offense not listed in Pen C §1000) should be denied deferred entry of judgment. People v Duncan (1990) 216 CA3d 1621, 265 CR 612.

When a defendant is charged with various counts in a single complaint but only some of the counts are subject to deferred entry of judgment, he or she can be granted deferred entry of judgment on the eligible offenses and proceed to trial on the ineligible offenses. Harvey v Superior Court (1974) 43 CA3d 66, 117 CR 383; People v Fulk (1974) 39 CA3d 851, 114 CR 567. Alternatively, the prosecutor can dismiss the ineligible offenses on successful completion of the deferred entry of judgment period. If the court is unwilling to permit a defendant to waive time on the ineligible offenses, the prosecutor may be willing to dismiss the ineligible offenses at the time deferred entry of judgment is granted if the defendant agrees to have the original charges reinstated if he or she fails to successfully complete deferred entry of judgment.

Prior probation or parole successfully completed. The defendant's prior probation or parole cannot have been revoked without thereafter being successfully completed. Pen C §1000(a)(4); People v Martinsen (1987) 193 CA3d 843, 238 CR 530. Probation includes both formal probation and conditional sentence (commonly referred to as court or informal probation). People v Bishop (1992) 11 CA4th 1125, 15 CR2d 539.

No deferred entry of judgment or felony conviction for 5 years. The defendant cannot have successfully completed or been terminated from diversion or deferred entry of judgment under Pen C §§1000-1000.6 (Pen C §1000(a)(5)) or suffered a felony conviction within 5 years prior to the commission of the offense charged. Pen C §1000(a)(6); People v Burns (1997) 53 CA4th 1171, 62 CR2d 211. It is unclear whether a felony conviction reduced to a misdemeanor within the 5-year period bars a person from eligibility for deferred entry of judgment. If the prior felony is reduced to a misdemeanor after commission of the offense for which deferred entry of judgment is sought, the defendant is ineligible. See People v Marsh (1982) 132 CA3d 809, 183 CR 455.

An accused otherwise eligible for deferred entry of judgment is not rendered ineligible because a strike prior is alleged under the Three Strikes law if the alleged strike occurred more than 5 years before the current offense. People v Davis (2000) 79 CA4th 251, 93 CR2d 905. The deferred entry of judgment program excludes defendants who have suffered any felony conviction within the preceding 5 years, or are currently charged with a felony that involved violence or the threat of violence. Pen C §1000(a)(2), (a)(6). Accordingly, nothing in the language of the deferred entry of judgment statutes excludes strike defendants. 79 CA4th at 258.

Deferred entry of judgment can occur at any time before trial begins. Morse v Municipal Court (1974) 13 C3d 149, 160, 118 CR 14. After trial, deferred entry of judgment is not an option. People v Wright (1975) 47 CA3d 490, 120 CR 899; People v Reed (1975) 46 CA3d 625, 120 CR 250. See §27.5 for further discussion of when to approach the prosecution about a deferred entry of judgment referral.

The applicant may challenge the evidence by filing a motion to suppress or other pretrial motions before accepting a deferred entry of judgment referral. Morse v Municipal Court, supra. See chap 16 on Pen C §1538.5 motions. If the motion is denied, the defendant cannot appeal after a guilty or no contest plea if he is then granted deferred judgment because there is not yet a "conviction" within the meaning of Pen C §1538.5(m). People v Mazurette (2001) 24 C4th 789, 102 CR2d 555. However, if the defendant does not successfully complete the requirements imposed and judgment is entered, he or she can appeal at that time. Before pleading guilty for deferred judgment, a defendant charged with a felony does have the option to move to suppress evidence at the preliminary hearing (Pen C §1538.5(f)(2)), to renew the motion in a special hearing if denied, and to seek pretrial review by means of an extraordinary writ of mandate or prohibition (Pen C §1538.5(i)). See People v Mazurette, supra.

§27.7 3. Initial Determination by Prosecutor

The prosecutor has a duty to review files to decide on deferred entry of judgment eligibility. Pen C §1000(b). Permitting the prosecutor instead of the court to determine eligibility is not a violation of the separation-of-powers doctrine. See Sledge v Superior Court (1974) 11 C3d 70, 113 CR 28.

Prosecutors do not have untrammeled discretion to overcharge a case in order to keep a defendant from qualifying for deferred entry of judgment. See Davis v Municipal Court (1988) 46 C3d 64, 86, 249 CR 300. Proving that overcharging occurred, however, can be difficult. See People v Cook (1989) 209 CA3d 404, 257 CR 226 (trial court erred in imposing sanctions under CCP §128.5 against prosecutor who admitted that possession-for-sale count was weak but refused to dismiss it so that defendant could be diverted, because §128.5 applies only to civil proceedings).

The prosecutor must state whether the defendant is eligible for deferred entry of judgment either orally on the record or in a written declaration filed with the court and made available to the defendant. Pen C §1000(b). The statement must also state the grounds on which the finding is based (Pen C §1000(b)) and must include the evidentiary basis for the prosecutor's conclusion. Sledge v Superior Court (1974) 11 C3d 70, 76, 113 CR 28. See §27.9 on review of the prosecutor's decision to deny deferred entry of judgment.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.8 4. Deferred Entry of Judgment Hearing

If the prosecutor finds the defendant eligible for deferred entry of judgment, a deferred entry of judgment hearing must be held. Before the hearing, the court may refer the case to the probation department to make a recommendation on deferred entry of judgment. Pen C §1000.1(b). The hearing is usually set about 6 weeks after the referral to the probation officer to allow the probation department sufficient time to adequately investigate the applicant.

At the hearing, the court will consider any relevant information, ascertain whether the defendant consents to deferred entry of judgment, and rule on whether to grant deferred entry of judgment. Pen C §1000.2.

Ø Note: Although illegal alien status is not per se a basis for denying deferred entry of judgment, it may be considered in determining whether a person is a good candidate. People v Cisneros (2000) 84 CA4th 352, 100 CR2d 784. Similarly, when the defendant faces a substantial likelihood of imminent deportation so that probation cannot effectively be conditioned on completing a drug treatment program, Proposition 36 does not preclude the trial court from exercising its discretion to deny probation. People v Espinoza (2003) 107 CA4th 1069, 132 CR2d 670. Representing a noncitizen defendant is discussed in chap 52.

If the court offers deferred entry of judgment, the defendant may accept it by pleading guilty and waiving his or her speedy trial rights. Pen C §1000.1(a)(3). A plea of no contest is also permissible. See People v Mazurette (2001) 24 C4th 789, 102 CR2d 555.

The court cannot condition a grant of deferred entry of judgment on the acceptance of any term or condition not set out in the statutes. Terry v Superior Court (1999) 73 CA4th 661, 86 CR2d 653 (consent to search cannot be imposed as condition of deferred entry of judgment); People v Fleming (1994) 22 CA4th 1566, 28 CR2d 78; Frederick v Justice Court (1975) 47 CA3d 687, 121 CR 118.

Ø Note: A no-alcohol-use condition while in drug court has been upheld as a reasonably related condition based on empirical evidence showing a nexus between drug use and alcohol use. People v Beal (1997) 60 CA4th 84, 87, 70 CR2d 80.

The court may refer participants only to treatment programs certified by the county drug program administrator. Pen C §1000(c). Defendants can be required to undergo urinalysis to test for drug usage, but the results may not be used for a new criminal charge. Pen C §1000(e). Defendants in deferred entry of judgment (or also pre-guilty-plea diversion) may also participate in a licensed methadone or levoalphacetylmethadol (LAAM) program. Pen C §1000.6. At the time deferred entry of judgment is granted, bail, if any, must be exonerated, and the defendant must be released on his or her own recognizance. Pen C §1000.2.

A deferred entry of judgment hearing may also be held to resolve factual issues, e.g., whether marijuana was cultivated for personal use rather than for sale. People v Paz (1990) 217 CA3d 1209, 1217, 266 CR 468; People v Venghiattis (1986) 185 CA3d 326, 229 CR 636; People v Williamson (1982) 137 CA3d 419, 187 CR 107. Otherwise, the prosecutor's deferred entry of judgment determination is binding on the trial court. See Pen C §1000(b); People v Paz (1990) 217 CA3d 1209, 266 CR 468.

If the defendant does not consent to deferred entry of judgment, or the court finds the defendant unsuitable for it, the criminal proceedings continue as in any other case. Pen C §1000.2. If the court denies deferred entry of judgment, defense counsel should make a clear record of the applicant's willingness and motivation to comply with all the terms and conditions of deferred entry of judgment and the probability that the applicant will benefit from such a program. Harvey v Superior Court (1974) 43 CA3d 66, 117 CR 383. See discussion in §27.9 of review of the trial court's decision.

The deferred entry of judgment period lasts at least 18 months and no more than 3 years, with periodic progress reports as directed by the court. Pen C §1000.2.

Ø Note: Some counties do not require an appearance by either the defendant or defense counsel for progress reports unless the defendant is failing to comply with the deferred entry of judgment. Some judges, however, do require court appearances to closely monitor performance, to stress the importance of consistent good performance, and to hold good performers up as examples to newcomers and poor performers in the courtroom. A judge may reward good performance by lengthening the period between progress reports.

§27.9 5. Challenging Denial of Deferred Entry of Judgment

Pretrial review of prosecutor's determination. Generally, a defendant cannot obtain pretrial judicial review of a prosecutor's determination that the defendant is ineligible for deferred entry of judgment. Sledge v Superior Court (1974) 11 C3d 70, 113 CR 28; People v Sturiale (2000) 82 CA4th 1308, 1314, 98 CR2d 865. A defendant may, however, obtain a pretrial judicial hearing to contest the prosecutor's determination when there is a legitimate factual conflict (see People v McAlister (1990) 225 CA3d 941, 275 CR 229; see also People v Paz (1990) 217 CA3d 1209, 1218, 266 CR 468), or a question of statutory interpretation (People v Brackett (1994) 25 CA4th 488, 500, 30 CR2d 557).

The courts have defined what constitutes a "legitimate factual conflict" very narrowly for purposes of challenging the prosecutor's determination of eligibility. The rule developing from current case law appears to be that a trial court has authority to determine an "operative fact" only when the offense with which the defendant is charged does not correspond with the divertible offense. 25 CA4th at 499. For instance, Pen C §1000 authorizes deferred entry of judgment for violations of Health & S C §11358 (cultivating marijuana) only if the marijuana was cultivated for personal use. Accordingly, a pretrial judicial hearing is proper to make the factual determination of whether the marijuana was for personal use. See People v McAlister (1990) 225 CA3d 941, 944, 275 CR 229.

Pretrial review of trial court's order denying deferred entry of judgment. A trial court's denial of deferred entry of judgment is ordinarily not subject to pretrial judicial review. Butler v Superior Court (1998) 63 CA4th 64, 73 CR2d 504; Parra v Municipal Court (1978) 83 CA3d 690, 693, 148 CR 203. However, the court's decision can be challenged by pretrial writ if the denial of deferred entry of judgment involves an issue of widespread concern about the interpretation or constitutionality of a statute. Morse v Municipal Court (1974) 13 C3d 149, 118 CR 14 (writ of mandate permitted for prompt, definitive resolution of constitutional challenge to new diversion program); Parra v Municipal Court, supra (writ of mandate appropriate to review trial court denial of diversion on ground that defendant refused to admit guilt).

Appeal. Following a conviction, the defendant may appeal the prosecutor's deferred entry of judgment ineligibility determination (Sledge v Superior Court, supra) or the trial court's order denying deferred entry of judgment (Parra v Municipal Court, supra). The appeal may be brought whether the defendant is convicted by trial or by guilty plea. People v McAlister, supra. If the defendant successfully challenges the prosecutor's determination of ineligibility, the judgment must be set aside and the case remanded to allow the trial court to exercise its discretion to grant deferred entry of judgment. Sledge v Superior Court, supra.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.10 6. Successful Termination

Once the defendant has successfully completed all the terms and conditions of deferred entry of judgment, the deferred charges are dismissed and the defendant is legally entitled to state that he or she was never arrested for the deferred offense. Pen C §1000.4(a). Before dismissing the charges, however, the court must consider the defendant's ability to pay, and whether the defendant has paid, any diversion restitution fees (see Pen C §1001.90) or probation administration fees, if ordered (Pen C §1000.3).

The arrest record involving the deferred offense cannot be used to deny any employment benefit, license, or certificate (Pen C §1000.4(a)) with one exception. The deferred entry of judgment record of a peace officer (formerly "police officer") or of a person applying to be a peace officer may be disclosed. Pen C §1000.4(b). The legislature intended the benefits and protections of a successful completion of deferred entry of judgment be given the broadest possible application. See B.W. v Board of Med. Quality Assur. (1985) 169 CA3d 219, 215 CR 130. This prohibition, however, applies only after a defendant has successfully completed deferred entry of judgment; an agency or other entity may properly use information in a defendant's arrest record either before or during the period of deferred entry of judgment. Sandoval v State Personnel Bd. (1990) 225 CA3d 1498, 1500, 275 CR 702.

Another potential major consequence of a defendant's participation in deferred entry of judgment exists in the case of an immigrant defendant. Even if an immigrant successfully completes deferred entry of judgment, the arrest record may still be used against her or him in deportation or exclusion proceedings. Paredes-Urrestarazu v U.S. INS (9th Cir 1994) 36 F3d 801.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.11 7. Unsuccessful Termination

The court, the probation department, or the prosecutor may move for entry of judgment under the following circumstances (Pen C §1000.3):

- The defendant is performing unsatisfactorily in the assigned program;
- The defendant is not benefiting from education, treatment, or rehabilitation;
- The defendant is convicted of a misdemeanor that reflects the defendant's propensity for violence;
- The defendant is convicted of a felony; or
- The defendant has engaged in criminal conduct rendering him or her unsuitable for deferred entry of judgment.

After notice to the defendant, the court must hold a hearing to determine whether judgment should be entered. If the court finds the allegations of the motion to be true, the court must render a finding of guilt to the charge or charges pleaded, enter judgment, and schedule a sentencing hearing as otherwise provided in the Penal Code. Pen C §1000.3.

Ø Note: Although the deferred entry of judgment period lasts no more than 3 years (Pen C §1000.2), the mere passage of time will not result in dismissal of the charges if the defendant has not successfully completed a drug treatment program. See People v Popular (2006) 146 CA4th 479, 483, 52 CR3d 708.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.12 B. Child Abuse and Neglect

The legislature's scheme for child abuse and neglect counseling is a "hybrid" of diversion and deferred entry of judgment. If the crime or crimes charged involve child molestation or sexual abuse, the defendant may not obtain deferred entry of judgment or diversion. Pen C §1000.12(c). If the crime does not involve molestation or sexual abuse, the district attorney may move the trial court to defer judgment while the defendant undergoes counseling or psychological treatment. Pen C §1000.12(a)-(c).

Instead of prosecuting a person suspected of committing a crime in which a minor is an alleged victim of physical abuse or neglect, the prosecutor may refer the suspect to the county department in charge of social services or to the probation department for counseling or psychological treatment and for such other services as are deemed necessary. See Pen C §§1000.12, 1000.17. The suspect is responsible for paying the administrative costs of the referral (not exceeding $100 in felony cases and $50 in misdemeanor cases) and the expense of any counseling. Pen C §1000.17. The county department must take into consideration the suspect's ability to pay, and no one may be denied counseling services because of inability to pay. Pen C §1000.17. Although it is unclear what consequences, if any, exist for a defendant who fails to complete counseling or psychological treatment, defense counsel should strongly advise a client to adhere to the treatment program.

Unlike most diversion schemes, this type of diversion is completely discretionary with the prosecutor. Pen C §1000.12(a); see People v Glover (1980) 111 CA3d 914, 169 CR 12 (based on former Pen C §273ab, an identical statutory scheme in effect before the enactment of §1000.12). The requirement of the prosecutor's consent does not violate the separation of powers doctrine. People v Andreotti (2001) 91 CA4th 1263, 1267, 111 CR2d 462.

IV. DIVERSION PROGRAMS

§27.13 A. Generally Applicable Law

Penal Code §§1001-1001.9 apply generally to all diversion programs and set forth the general "scheme" for all diversion programs. Without the prosecutor's approval, the court cannot create such a program. Pen C §1001.2(b); Davis v Municipal Court (1988) 46 C3d 64, 249 CR 300; People v Tapia (1982) 129 CA3d Supp 1, 181 CR 382. The prosecutor's exclusive jurisdiction over the creation of diversion programs, however, does not authorize the prosecutor to determine whether a particular defendant may be diverted. Pen C §1001.2(b). For certain crimes, a defendant may be eligible to participate in a diversion program. Diversion is the suspension of criminal proceedings for a prescribed time period with certain conditions. Pen C §1001.1. A defendant may not be required to admit guilt as a prerequisite for placement in a pretrial diversion program. See, e.g., Pen C §§1001.3, 1001.66. When diversion is granted, any bail posted is exonerated. Pen C §§1000.2, 1001.6, 1001.27, 1001.53, 1001.73.

Statements made by the defendant during the period of diversion, information obtained as a result of those statements, and reports on the defendant's diversion program are admissible at a hearing on termination of diversion; however, such statements, information, and reports are not admissible in any other action or proceeding. Pen C §§1001.5, 1001.24-1001.25, 1001.67. Attorneys should be aware, however, that given the current state of the law regarding impeachment, it is likely that such statements would be admissible to impeach a defendant's testimony. See §27.29.

If diversion is successfully completed, the criminal charges are dismissed (Pen C §§1001.7, 1001.31, 1001.54, 1001.74) and the defendant may legally answer that he or she has never been arrested for or charged with the diverted offense (Pen C §§1001.9, 1001.33, 1001.55, 1001.75), unless he or she is applying for a position as a peace officer.

If the defendant is unsuccessful, criminal proceedings resume; however, the divertee is entitled to a hearing before his or her pretrial diversion may be terminated for cause. Pen C §§1001.4, 1001.54, 1001.74. The waiver of speedy trial required by Pen C §1001.53 is a general time waiver, meaning that if it is withdrawn, the prosecutor then has 30 days to bring the defendant to trial. People v Murphy (1998) 61 CA4th Supp 5, 74 CR2d 116. Presumably, this conclusion applies to other diversion time waivers. See, e.g., Pen C §1000.1(b).

Penal Code §1001.2 specifically prohibits diversion programs for violations of Veh C §§23152, 23153, and former Veh C §23102. Also, a defendant who is charged with a crime that is subject to deferred entry of judgment or diversion for a drug offense under Pen C §§1000-1000.6 may not be diverted. Pen C §1001.2(a).

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.14 B. Misdemeanor Diversion

The legislature has given the prosecutor the ability to approve a local misdemeanor diversion program under Pen C §§1001-1001.9, and 1001.50-1001.55. Pen C §§1001.2(b), 1001.50(b). Offenses covered under other diversion or deferred entry of judgment provisions, or violations of Veh C §23152 or §23153, are ineligible for misdemeanor diversion. Pen C §1001.51(b).

To be eligible for misdemeanor diversion, the following requirements must be satisfied (Pen C §1001.51(a)):

- The defendant's prior probation or parole cannot have been revoked without thereafter being successfully completed;
- The defendant cannot have been granted misdemeanor diversion within 5 years before the current charges were filed;
- The defendant has never been convicted of a felony; and
- The defendant has not been convicted of a misdemeanor within the past 5 years.

Certain misdemeanors are statutorily ineligible for diversion (Pen C §1001.51(c)):

- Misdemeanors for which incarceration is mandatory on conviction;
- Misdemeanors for which registration under Pen C §§290-290.023 is mandatory on conviction;
- "Wobbler" crimes that have been reduced from a felony to a misdemeanor under Pen C §17(b)(5); and
- Misdemeanors involving the use of force or violence against another, unless the charge is a violation of Pen C §241 or §243.

Most counties have taken advantage of these options and enacted a misdemeanor diversion program. It is advisable to consult with the prosecutor's office to learn whether such a program exists and, if so, what its eligibility requirements are.

On the referral of a defendant to a diversion program, the court may examine the defendant's financial condition and require him or her to pay all or part of the actual costs of diversion. Pen C §1001.53.

Additionally, district attorneys and city prosecutors are authorized to set up California Community Dispute Programs, which provide alternative dispute resolution (ADR) services, such as mediation, arbitration, or a combination of both mediation and arbitration in cases involving violations that could be charged as misdemeanors. Pen C §§14150-14156. The consent of both the victim and the perpetrator is required. There are guidelines for both referral and dismissal.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.15 C. Diversion for Persons With Cognitive Developmental Disabilities

The court may divert an individual found by a regional center for the developmentally disabled to have a cognitive developmental disability at any stage in the criminal proceedings when the offense is charged as, or has been reduced to, a misdemeanor. Pen C §§1001.20-1001.34; see §48.70. Persons who have been diverted under these code sections within 2 years of the present criminal proceedings are ineligible for diversion under §§1001.20-1001.34. Pen C §1001.21(b). The court must obtain a report on the defendant from the appropriate regional center. Pen C §1001.22. The center is then asked to evaluate the defendant and decide whether he or she has a cognitive developmental disability. Pen C §1001.22(a). The prosecutor also submits a report to the court as specified in Pen C §1001.22(b).

The diversion period may not last longer than 2 years, and progress reports are required at least every 6 months. Pen C §1001.28.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.16 D. Diversion for Traffic Violators

Counties can divert traffic violators to traffic school. Pen C §1001.40. In place of adjudicating a traffic offense, and with the consent of the defendant, the court may order the defendant to attend traffic school. Veh C §42005(b). Willfully failing to attend traffic school after being so ordered is a misdemeanor. Veh C §42005(i). The court cannot stay a case of driving while under the influence in order to grant diversion. Veh C §23640 (former Veh C §23202; see People v Weatherill (1989) 215 CA3d 1569, 264 CR 298).

On successful completion of traffic school, the court clerk or hearing officer is required to deliver an abstract of the record of the proceedings to the DMV. Veh C §1803.5. The record of the first such proceeding in any 18-month period is confidential and may be disclosed only to a court. Veh C §1808.7.

E. Bad Check Diversion

§27.17 1. Generally

Bad check diversion differs from other diversion schemes in that it is a "precomplaint" diversion scheme; i.e., the prosecutor may refer a person to a bad check diversion program before a complaint is filed. Pen C §1001.61.

The prosecutor can create a diversion program for "persons who write bad checks" if it is authorized by the county board of supervisors. See Pen C §§1001.60-1001.67. "Writing a bad check" is defined as "making, drawing, uttering, or delivering any check or draft upon any bank or depository for the payment of money where there is probable cause to believe there has been a violation of [Penal Code §]476a." Pen C §1001.60. The program may be conducted by either the district attorney or a private entity under contract with the district attorney.

Penal Code §1001.62 states that "the district attorney shall determine if the case is one which is appropriate to be referred to the bad check diversion program." This wording directly conflicts with that of Pen C §1001.2(b), which states that district attorneys do not have the authority to decide whether individual defendants are eligible for diversion. Given that the bad check diversion scheme was enacted after the general diversion statutes and the fact that §1001.62 is a "specific," rather than a "general," statute, §1001.62 most likely controls.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.18 2. Eligibility

In determining whether a defendant is eligible for bad check diversion, the district attorney must consider, but is not limited to considering, the following factors (Pen C §1001.62):

- The amount of the bad check;
- Whether the defendant has a prior criminal record or has been previously diverted;
- The number of bad check grievances against the defendant previously received by the district attorney;
- Whether other bad check grievances are currently pending against the defendant; and
- The strength of the evidence, if any, of intent to defraud the victim.

Although this wording implies that a district attorney may properly refer a defendant to bad check diversion when there is no evidence of intent to defraud, such action would clearly violate a prosecutor's duty to dismiss cases not supported by probable cause. Cal Rules of Prof Cond 5-110.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.19 3. Procedure

If the district attorney refers the defendant to the program, a notice must be mailed to the defendant containing the following information (Pen C §1001.63):

- The date and amount of the bad check;
- The name of the payee;
- The date before which the defendant must contact the district attorney, or the district attorney's designee, concerning the bad check; and
- A statement of the penalty for issuance of a bad check.

If bad check diversion is offered, the district attorney and the suspect enter into a written contract for a period of time not exceeding 6 months, subject to the following conditions (Pen C §1001.64):

- The defendant's completion of a class or classes conducted by the district attorney or the private entity under contract with the district attorney;
- The defendant's payment of full restitution made to the recipient of the bad check; and
- The defendant's full payment of the diversion fees, if any.

§27.20 4. Diversion Fees

The district attorney is entitled to collect a fee if his or her office "collects and processes" a bad check. Pen C §1001.65(a). This fee may not exceed $50 per check, plus the actual amount of bank charges, including the returned check fee, if any, incurred by the recipient of the bad check. Pen C §1001.65(a).

If the defendant fails to successfully complete bad check diversion and is later convicted, the court may impose a bad check processing fee. This fee may not exceed $50 per check, plus the actual amount of bank charges, including the returned check fee, if any, incurred by the recipient; the aggregate fees may not exceed $1200. Pen C §1001.65(b). Also, the court may require the defendant to participate in a check-writing education class as a condition of probation, in which event the court may require the defendant to pay all or part of the expense of that class, based on his or her ability to pay. Pen C §1001.65(b).

Any fee collected by the district attorney for processing a bad check must be used to reimburse the recipient for any bank charges incurred. This reimbursement may not exceed $15 per check. Pen C §1001.65(c).

§27.21 F. Parental Diversion

The legislature has given the prosecutor the ability to approve a local diversion program for parents accused of violating Pen C §272 (contributing to the delinquency of a minor) under Pen C §§1001-1001.9 and 1001.70-1001.75. The alleged victim must be a minor child of the defendant, and the defendant is not eligible if his or her probation or parole was ever revoked without thereafter being completed or if he or she was previously granted parental diversion. Pen C §1001.71.

A defendant who is eligible for parental diversion must waive his or her speedy trial rights to allow time for the probation department to assess whether the defendant is otherwise eligible and suitable for diversion and whether diversion would benefit the defendant. The probation recommendation is filed with the court. Pen C §1001.72(a). The court then holds a hearing to decide whether diversion is proper. If diversion is granted, the court may order the defendant to pay all or part of the costs of diversion, according to the defendant's ability to pay. Pen C §1001.73.

Civil compromise is discussed in §§25.5-25.6. It results in dismissal of the case. See Pen C §§1377-1378.

As an alternative to civil compromise or criminal prosecution, a merchant or library can sue a suspected petty thief in small claims court for the amount of the merchandise plus $50 to $500 plus costs. Pen C §490.5. A settlement agreement made under this section is sometimes more appealing to a merchant than the normal Pen C §1377 civil compromise agreement.

§27.23 H. AIDS Prevention Programs in Drug Abuse and Prostitution Cases

For certain offenses, the court must require the defendant to participate in an AIDS education program as a condition of diversion or probation. Pen C §1001.10(a). AIDS testing must be offered to participants but cannot be required. If the defendant has been granted deferred entry of judgment for a drug offense under Pen C §1001.10, and the deferred entry of judgment program includes an AIDS prevention component, the defendant does not have to participate in an additional AIDS prevention program. Pen C §1001.11(c).

Offenses for which an AIDS education program is mandatory include the following (Pen C §1001.10(b)):

- Possession of controlled substances or restricted drugs (Health & S C §§11350(a), 11377(a));
- Using or being under the influence of a controlled substance (Health & S C §11550); and
- Distribution or sale of hypodermic needles (Bus & P C §§4142, 4149);

Ø Note: Although Pen C §1001.10(b) specifies Bus & P C §4143, that section was renumbered as Bus & P C §4142; section 1001.10(b) was not amended to reflect this change.

- Using or being under the influence of a controlled substance (Pen C §647(f)) if the offense involves the intravenous use of a controlled substance.
- Soliciting or engaging in lewd conduct or prostitution (Pen C §647(a)-(b)).

Although the statute is written in mandatory terms, it has been construed to apply in probation cases only when the person either (1) has been convicted of an offense involving intravenous use of drugs or (2) is at reasonable risk of beginning to use intravenous drugs. People v Patillo (1992) 4 CA4th 1576, 6 CR2d 456, overruled on other grounds in People v Welch (1993) 5 C4th 228, 237, 19 CR2d 520; People v Henson (1991) 231 CA3d 172, 282 CR 222.

§27.24 I. Diversion Fees

As a condition of diversion or deferred entry of judgment, the court may require the defendant to pay an administrative fee to cover the cost of enrollment in a diversion program. Pen C §1001.15. This fee may not exceed $500 in felony cases (Pen C §1001.15(a)) and $300 in misdemeanor cases (Pen C §§1001.15(c), 1001.16) and may not exceed the actual cost of the program.

Additionally, the court must impose a diversion restitution fee on the defendant in all diverted and deferred entry of judgment cases except diversion of developmentally disabled defendants. Pen C §1001.90(a), (i). This fee is set at the court's discretion according to the seriousness of the offense, but it may not be less than $100 or more than $1000. Pen C §1001.90(b). Although imposition of the fee is mandatory regardless of the defendant's ability to pay, the court may waive the fee for "compelling and extraordinary" reasons. Pen C §1001.90(c). In setting the amount of the fee, the court must consider relevant factors such as the defendant's ability to pay, the seriousness and gravity of the offense, any economic gain derived by the defendant as a result of the crime, and the extent to which anyone suffered losses as a result of the defendant's crime. Pen C §1001.90(d).

§27.25 J. Nonstatutory Court Diversion

Trial court diversion in which the court continues a case for a time and then dismisses it under Pen C §1385 over the prosecutor's objection is improper. People v Tapia (1982) 129 CA3d Supp 1, 181 CR 382; People v Municipal Court (Gelardi) (1978) 84 CA3d 692, 149 CR 30. §27.26 V. POSTCONVICTION DRUG TREATMENT UNDER PROPOSITION 36

Ø Practice tip: During the 2005-2006 regular session, the California Legislature adopted SB 1137, which made significant changes to the drug treatment laws enacted under Proposition 36. The legislation, Stats 2006, ch 63, was signed into law on July 12, 2006. Among other things, the amended provisions changed existing law by permitting incarceration of offenders placed on Proposition 36 probation who relapsed during treatment. See Stats 2006, ch 63, §7(e). However, this legislation has been declared invalid in its entirety, and the First District upheld the permanent injunction enjoining enactment of SB 1137. See Gardner v Schwarzenegger (2009) 178 CA4th 1366, 101 CR3d 229. Counsel and the court should be careful to use the preamendment version of Pen C §1210.1 because the amended version still appears "on the books." Citations in this chapter are to the preamendment version of §1210.1.

Proposition 36 mandates probation and drug treatment for a qualified defendant convicted of a "nonviolent drug possession offense." See Pen C §§1210-1210.5. This postconviction program contains elements of deferred entry of judgment (DEJ) and diversion court policies and procedures. For example, under Pen C §1210.1(a), the sentencing court may impose as conditions of probation a regimen of participation in vocational training, educational pursuits, psychological counseling, and family counseling, as well as drug counseling and testing.

Five types of defendants convicted of nonviolent drug possession offenses are ineligible for postconviction drug treatment under Proposition 36. A judge has no discretion to admit a defendant to drug treatment under Proposition 36 when the defendant is otherwise ineligible under Pen C §1210.1(b). In re Varnell (2003) 30 C4th 1132, 1139, 135 CR2d 619. An ineligible defendant is (Pen C §1210.1(b)):

- Any defendant previously convicted of one or more serious or violent felonies under Pen C §667.5(c) or §1192.7, unless the prior conviction was more than 5 years before the current offense and during that 5-year period the defendant has both remained free from prison custody and did not commit certain other specified offenses;
- Any defendant convicted, in the same proceeding as the nonviolent drug offense currently charged, of a separate misdemeanor unrelated to drugs or of any felony;
- Any defendant who refuses drug treatment as a condition of probation;

Ø Note: A defendant who refuses to comply with the terms of drug treatment under a grant of DEJ has been held to fall into this category. People v Strong (2006) 138 CA4th Supp 1, 4, 41 CR3d 867.

- Any defendant with two separate convictions for nonviolent drug offenses who has participated in two separate courses of drug treatment pursuant to the statute and is found by the court to be unamenable to any and all forms of drug treatment; or
- Any defendant who has committed certain specified drug offenses in combination with the use of a firearm.

Under Pen C §1210.5, the results of drug testing cannot be given greater weight than any other aspects of the probationer's individual treatment program. A defendant who refuses drug treatment, or refuses to comply with its terms, under a grant of DEJ (the equivalent of probation) is ineligible for drug treatment under Proposition 36. People v Strong (2006) 138 CA4th Supp 1, 41 CR3d 867.

Ø Note: When dealing with a defendant who has a lengthy history of drug addiction, the argument may be made that "dirty" tests during the early part of the defendant's treatment program should not be the basis of a probation violation.

In addition to providing drug treatment to nonviolent drug possessors, some for the first time in their lives, Proposition 36 provides for comprehensive dismissals of criminal convictions. Under Pen C §1210.1(d)(1), the defendant may petition the court to dismiss all charges and set aside the conviction. Early on, defense counsel should learn what the sentencing court's criteria are for dismissal, e.g., employment, actively seeking work or attending school, payment of or paying on fees and fines, and clean drug test results, so that the client can work on what has to be completed. A Proposition 36 dismissal permits a recovering addict to avoid disclosing both the arrest and the conviction, and achieves an early termination of probation. After a Proposition 36 dismissal, the defendant is still subject to the Pen C §12021 restriction on ownership or possession of a concealable firearm. Pen C §1210(d)(2). Also, the conviction must be disclosed in certain circumstances, such as applying for the position of peace officer. See Pen C §1210.1(d)(3).

Ø Note: In the area of criminal drug use and abuse, three drug court programs are available: DEJ, diversion, and Proposition 36 drug treatment. Depending on the defendant's drug use background, all three programs may be needed to achieve sobriety. Some individuals have abused drugs for decades, and it may take more that one program for the individual to find the road to recovery. Some courts may have concerns, if not policies, as to the multiple use of court resources by individuals who may, for example, fail diversion, and desire another program. Counsel who has similar global concerns must still keep his or her main interest centered on what is best for the client in avoiding criminal penalties and achieving a dismissal of criminal charges. However, counsel must bear in mind that a defendant who has refused to comply with drug treatment terms under a grant of DEJ may be denied the opportunity to participate in Proposition 36 drug treatment. See Pen C §1210.1(b)(4); People v Strong (2006) 138 CA4th Supp 1, 4, 41 CR3d 867.

VI. PREPLEA PROBATION REPORTS

§27.27 A. Procedure

At the time of arrest or at the time of a guilty plea or verdict, the court may direct the county probation officer to investigate a defendant and file a report with the court. Pen C §1203.7. Usually the preplea report is ordered when the defense attorney, prosecutor, and court all agree that it would assist in settling the case. The extent to which courts use preplea reports under §1203.7 varies from county to county. Preplea reports are generally viewed as more beneficial to the defense, but there are cases in which the prosecution may gain as well. See the checklist in §27.28.

Unfortunately, preparing a preplea probation report can be an expensive undertaking. Accordingly, fewer and fewer courts are willing to grant requests for preplea probation reports.

For a discussion of when the defendant's statements to the probation officer are admissible, see §27.29.

© The Regents of the University of California

§27.28 B. Checklist: Reasons for Requesting Preplea Probation Report

A preplea probation report can benefit all concerned, the prosecution, the court, and the defense:

- The report provides the prosecutor and court with information to enhance settlement discussions.
- The report is useful to the prosecutor when he or she wants to avoid trying the case, e.g., because of a child witness, complicated factual or legal issues, an unusual type of case, or out-of-state or very elderly witnesses.
- The report allows the probation officer to analyze the appropriateness of probation in sex offenses, child abuse offenses, narcotics offenses, elder and disabled person abuse offenses, and in cases in which the interests of justice would best be served. Pen C §§1203.055, 1203.065, 1203.073-1203.074, 1203.09, 1203.095.
- The court can use the report to decide whether diversion is appropriate in child abuse cases.
- The court can have a probation officer evaluate the defendant's lack of sophistication in a drug sale case and make a recommendation for or against deferred entry of judgment.
- The report can bring out facts to show that the case involves "unusual circumstances" that allow the court to grant probation to a defendant who is otherwise ineligible for probation. See People v Superior Court (Du) (1992) 5 CA4th 822, 7 CR2d 177 (shopkeeper convicted of using gun in commission of voluntary manslaughter was granted probation).

§27.29 VII. USE OF STATEMENTS MADE BY DEFENDANT DURING DEFERRED ENTRY OF JUDGMENT, DIVERSION, OR PROBATION OFFICER'S INVESTIGATION

Many of the statutory deferred entry of judgment and diversion plans provide that a defendant's statement and any information procured during the investigation of the case, used by the probation officer as part of the information on which to make a recommendation on deferred entry of judgment or diversion, are inadmissible in any action or proceeding brought after the investigation, except at a hearing to terminate the deferral or diversion. Pen C §§1000.1(c), 1001.5, 1001.24-1001.25, 1001.52(b), 1001.67. Information divulged by the applicant is not barred, however, by any of these statutes from being used in prosecutorial investigations. Further, under Cal Const art I, §28(f), statements made by a defendant to a probation officer during a presentence or diversion investigation interview may be used against the defendant in other contexts, absent any evidence that the probation officer threatened the defendant with an unfavorable recommendation if he or she refused to give a statement. See Minnesota v Murphy (1984) 465 US 420, 425, 79 L Ed 2d 409, 418, 104 S Ct 1136; People v Coffman (2004) 34 C4th 1, 118, 17 CR3d 710; People v Pacchioli (1992) 9 CA4th 1331, 12 CR2d 156 (probation interview following guilty plea); People v Goodner (1992) 7 CA4th 1324, 1330, 9 CR2d 543.

Ø Note: Because there is uncertainty in this area of the law, defense counsel may wish to seek a stipulation from the prosecutor that statements made to the probation department cannot be used in any way at trial either for impeachment or as substantive evidence. It is recommended that defense counsel seek such a stipulation.

Probation department diversion questionnaires often ask the defendant to write down the facts of the alleged offense. Defendants are not required to admit guilt or take responsibility before a grant of diversion can be made; an accused can maintain his or her innocence and still take advantage of the diversion program. Pen C §1001.3 (general diversion). See also Pen C §1000.5 (preplea drug diversion) and Pen C §1001.66 (precomplaint diversion). Defense counsel should usually advise the defendant not to relate the facts of the case to the probation officer. One possible approach is for counsel to advise the defendant to state that although he or she is not guilty of the charges, he or she is nonetheless willing to accept diversion rather than suffer the emotional and financial burden of a trial. See Parra v Municipal Court (1978) 83 CA3d 690, 148 CR 203. See also North Carolina v Alford (1970) 400 US 25, 27 L Ed 2d 162, 91 S Ct 160. Alternatively, the client may be advised to make clear his or her willingness to accept on counsel's advice the terms and conditions of a diversion program and that he or she declines to make any statement about the facts of the offense.

Defense counsel may also wish to write directly to the probation officer or provide information about the defendant through other witnesses and evidence.

§28.1 I. OVERVIEW

Right to jury trial. Both the defendant and the prosecution have the right to a trial by jury in felony and misdemeanor cases. Cal Const art I, §16; Pen C §689; US Const amends VI, XIV; People v King (1970) 1 C3d 791, 795, 83 CR 401. The right to trial by jury is discussed in §§28.3-28.5.

Waiver of jury trial. The defendant must personally enter the jury trial waiver (Cal Const art I, §16), and the defendant's counsel and the prosecution must join in the waiver. People v King (1969) 71 C2d 885, 80 CR 26; People v Peace (1980) 107 CA3d 996, 1007, 166 CR 202. Waiver is discussed in §§28.5-28.28. A jury waiver can be withdrawn only with the court's approval. People v Chambers (1972) 7 C3d 666, 670, 102 CR 776. On motion to withdraw a waiver, see §28.29.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.2 II. COURT TRIAL

The parties may agree to waive a jury and allow the court alone to decide the case. Cal Const art I, §16.

Court trials can be identical to jury trials except that no jury is selected, opening statements may be abbreviated or forgone, fewer instructions are chosen and they are not read aloud, and the judge usually takes less time to deliberate than a jury. However, court trials can also be planned to include only specified evidence, e.g., a preliminary hearing transcript and the defendant's testimony.

When the prosecution and the defense have agreed on a plea bargain that includes a jury waiver and submission of the case on specified evidence, a court trial is the equivalent of a "slow plea" of guilty, and the court is required to advise the defendant of certain rights and of the probability that the submission will result in conviction, and to obtain a waiver. Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302. For discussion, see §§28.19-28.21.

The procedure followed during a court trial is discussed in §§28.31-28.38.

III. RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY

§28.3 A. Checklist: Matters on Which Right to Jury Trial Exists in Criminal Cases

The right to a jury trial in criminal cases is controlled by the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution, Cal Const art I, §16 and §24, and various California statutory provisions. See, e.g., Pen C §689.

Defendants and prosecutors in criminal cases in California state courts have the right to a jury trial in the following proceedings:

- Criminal contempt violations. Pen C §166; Mitchell v Superior Court (1989) 49 C3d 1230, 265 CR 144. See §§58.10-58.13.
- Conduct enhancements (also called "specific enhancements"). Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 490, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 455, 120 S Ct 2348 (jury verdict required for every fact, other than prior convictions, that increases penalty beyond statutory maximum for offense); People v Arnett (2006) 139 CA4th 1609, 1613, 44 CR3d 206; People v Bautista (2005) 125 CA4th 646, 655, 22 CR3d 845. See §§37.11, 37.13.
- Prior convictions alleged as enhancements. Pen C §1025; People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 708, 42 CR3d 899; People v Epps (2001) 25 C4th 19, 28, 104 CR2d 572. See §37.31.
- Proceedings to recover hazardous clean-up expenses following conviction of or guilty plea to qualifying controlled substance offense. Health & S C §11470.2(d). See People v Wilen (2008) 165 CA4th 270, 286, 80 CR3d 895.
- Felony and misdemeanor cases. Cal Const art I, §16; Pen C §689.
- Insanity proceedings. People v Jarmon (1992) 2 CA4th 1345, 4 CR2d 9; see Pen C §1026(a). See §§48.45-48.51.
- Proceedings on mental competence to stand trial. Pen C §1369; People v Superior Court (McPeters) (1985) 169 CA3d 796, 215 CR 482. See §§48.7-48.11.
- Misdemeanor possession of marijuana under Health & S C §11357(b), even though it does not carry the possibility of incarceration. Tracy v Municipal Court (1978) 22 C3d 760, 150 CR 785.
- Penalty phase of capital case. People v King (1970) 1 C3d 791, 795, 83 CR 401; Ring v Arizona (2002) 536 US 584, 153 L Ed 2d 556, 122 S Ct 2428. See §§54.34-54.52.
- Mentally Disordered Offender (MDO) commitment hearings. See Pen C §2972(a). See §48.71.
- Sexually Violent Predator commitment proceedings. See Welf & I C §6603. See §§48.62-48.69.

§28.4 B. Checklist: Matters on Which No Right to Jury Trial Exists in Criminal Cases

There is no right to a jury trial on the following matters:

- Civil contempt (CCP §1209; Mitchell v Superior Court (1989) 49 C3d 1230, 265 CR 144), provided the aggregate sentence does not exceed 180 days. See In re Kreitman (1995) 40 CA4th 750, 754, 47 CR2d 595.
- Infractions. Pen C §19.6. If the infraction is charged with a misdemeanor or a felony, the court may order both offenses tried by a jury or may order a separate court trial for the infraction. Pen C §1042.5.
- Violation of Food & A C §5784, which carries a maximum $1000 fine. People v Anderson (1987) 191 CA3d 207, 236 CR 329.
- The issue of whether the defendant is the person who has suffered an alleged prior conviction, unless the prior conviction is alleged under Pen C §190.2 (special circumstances) or as an element of the charged offense (Pen C §1025(c)-(d)).
- The nature of prior offenses as "serious" or "violent." People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 708, 42 CR3d 899; People v Epps (2001) 25 C4th 19, 28, 104 CR2d 572; People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 458, 87 CR2d 674.
- Competency trials under Pen C §1368. People v Masterson (1994) 8 C4th 965, 972, 35 CR2d 679.
- Trials for extended involuntary commitment under Pen C §2970, based on defendant's status as a Mentally Disordered Offender (MDO).
- The issue of territorial jurisdiction in a criminal proceeding. People v Betts (2005) 34 C4th 1039, 1047, 23 CR3d 138.
- The issue of venue in a criminal proceeding. People v Posey (2004) 32 C4th 193, 8 CR3d 551.

§28.5 C. Right to Jury Trial

Both the defendant and the prosecution have the right to a trial by jury in felony and misdemeanor cases. Cal Const art I, §16; Pen C §689; US Const amends VI, XIV; People v King (1970) 1 C3d 791, 795, 83 CR 401. A defendant is entitled to be tried by an impartial jury selected from a representative cross-section of residents of the county in which the charged crime was committed. Hernandez v Municipal Court (1989) 49 C3d 713, 263 CR 513, overruled on other grounds in Price v Superior Court (2001) 25 C4th 1046, 1069 n13, 108 CR2d 409. For further discussion of jury composition, see chap 29. Preparing and presenting a case to a jury is discussed in chap 30.

The jury verdict in a criminal case must be unanimous. People v Thomas (1977) 19 C3d 630, 642, 139 CR 594. The right to a jury trial extends to elements of the offense and allegations in the complaint, information, or indictment that may affect sentencing or enhance the penalty. See Pen C §689; People v Guzman (1988) 45 C3d 915, 248 CR 467, overruled on other grounds in Price v Superior Court (2001) 25 C4th 1046, 1069 n13, 108 CR2d 409. See also Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 412, 124 S Ct 2531; Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348 (Sixth Amendment guarantees right to have jury determine every fact and enhancement, other than prior convictions, that could increase maximum punishment). Jurors must render a verdict on every element of each offense charged, including prior convictions that are part of the offense, e.g., Pen C §12021 (possession of firearm prohibited because of prior conviction or juvenile adjudication). See Pen C §1025. Jurors must also render a verdict on any enhancements and priors in the complaint, information, or indictment that affect sentencing. See People v Garcia (1970) 4 CA3d 904, 907 n2, 84 CR 624 (failure to make finding on charged prior offense is deemed a finding that the allegation is not true).

Penalty. Although the jury is required to find the facts that determine whether offense-related enhancements should be added to the penalty, in noncapital criminal cases the jury does not actually fix the penalty—the court does. Pen C §§12-13. The death penalty can be imposed only by a jury, unless the defendant waives the right to a jury determination. US Const amends VI, XIV; Ring v Arizona (2002) 536 US 584, 153 L Ed 2d 556, 122 S Ct 2428; Pen C §190.3.

Priors. Under California law, a defendant has a statutory right to have a jury determine the truth of a prior-conviction allegation. Pen C §§1025(b), 1158. This statutory right is limited in nature: A defendant has "the right to have the jury determine only whether he or she 'suffered' the alleged prior conviction." People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 589, 38 CR2d 347. See People v Epps (2001) 25 C4th 19, 23, 104 CR2d 572. The court, not the jury, must decide ancillary facts necessary to establish that a prior conviction comes within a particular recidivist statute. People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 708, 42 CR3d 899; People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 458, 87 CR2d 674; People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 592, 38 CR2d 347. The right to jury trial is further limited by Pen C §1025(c), which mandates that the court (not the jury) determine whether the defendant is the person who has suffered the prior conviction. There are exceptions for prior convictions alleged under Pen C §190.2 (special circumstances), or as an element of the charged offense, to which the right to a jury trial on the defendant's identity still extends. Pen C §1025(d). See the chart in §24.18 on priors that must be pleaded and proved.

> Ø Note: In Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 127 S Ct 856, the Supreme Court held that California's Determinate Sentencing Law (DSL), which allows the sentencing judge to use facts not found by the jury to impose an enhanced sentence, violated the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury insofar as it permitted upper-term sentences based on facts found by the sentencing judge by a preponderance of the evidence, rather than on facts found by the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. Cunningham invalidated the inconsistent portions of Pen C §1170(b) and Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(b). The high court left to the state how to remedy the DSL's constitutional defects, and amendments to Pen C §1170(b) and the Rules of Court ensued. For further discussion of the impact of, and response to, Cunningham, see §37.1A.

Number of jurors. The parties are entitled to a jury of 12 persons. Cal Const art I, §16. Because the parties may waive an entire jury, they may also waive the right to have 12 jurors. See People v Trejo (1990) 217 CA3d 1026, 1031, 266 CR 266. However, because of concerns about the reliability and appropriate representation of juries of fewer than six persons, it may constitute ineffective assistance for an attorney to counsel a criminal defendant to agree to such a jury. See 217 CA3d at 1033 n5; Ballew v Georgia (1978) 435 US 223, 239, 55 L Ed 2d 234, 246, 98 S Ct 1029.

IV. WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL

§28.6 A. Right to Waive Jury Trial

A defendant may waive the right to a jury trial with the consent of defense counsel and the prosecutor. Cal Const art I, §16; People v Upshaw (1974) 13 C3d 29, 33, 117 CR 668; People v Peace (1980) 107 CA3d 996, 1007, 166 CR 202 (defense counsel must independently consent to waiver). A defendant has no right to demand a court trial over the objections of defense counsel or the prosecutor. See Cal Const art I, §16. A defendant must expressly and knowingly waive jury in open court. Cal Const art I, §16. The defendant's silence will not be interpreted as consent to a waiver. See People v Ames (1975) 52 CA3d 389, 124 CR 894.

When there is no agreement about the sentence, the trial judge need not concur in the waiver of jury trial nor may he or she overrule the parties' waiver. People v Scott (1997) 15 C4th 1188, 1209, 65 CR2d 240. If there is an agreement about the sentence, however, as is common in "slow pleas" (discussed in §§28.19-28.21), the judge's approval is required and should be on the record. People v James (1989) 208 CA3d 1155, 1169, 256 CR 661.

When the defendant has entered pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity and has waived jury trial, both the guilt and sanity phases are tried by the court. People v Villarreal (1985) 167 CA3d 450, 458, 213 CR 179.

Counsel may waive the right to a jury trial in a proceeding to determine the client's competency to stand trial (Pen C §1368) in a criminal matter even over the client's objection. People v Masterson (1994) 8 C4th 965, 972, 35 CR2d 679. Counsel may also waive the client's right to a jury trial over the client's objection in proceedings to extend an involuntary commitment of a Mentally Disordered Offender (MDO) (Pen C §2970; People v Montoya (2001) 86 CA4th 825, 103 CR2d 579) and in a "not guilty by reason of insanity" commitment extension trial (Pen C §1026.5; People v Powell (2004) 114 CA4th 1153, 8 CR3d 441).

All parties must waive their right to 12 jurors in open court. People v Ames, supra (one juror fell asleep during defense counsel's closing argument; case reversed because defendant did not expressly waive right to be tried by 12 jurors); People v Loving (1977) 67 CA3d Supp 12, 136 CR 851 (neither district attorney nor defendant waived right to 12 jurors after one juror failed to appear; case reversed).

§28.7 B. Defendant's Capacity to Waive Jury Trial

An emotionally disturbed person may have the capacity to waive the right to a jury trial, but the waiver "must be carefully scrutinized to determine that the person making it had the physical and emotional capacity to do so under all the circumstances of the case." People v Miller (1972) 7 C3d 562, 568, 102 CR 841, quoting In re Walker (1969) 71 C2d 54, 57, 77 CR 16. There is no conclusive presumption that a defendant who has pleaded not guilty by reason of insanity is incapable of waiving a trial by jury. People v Miller, supra. Defendants classified as mentally defective to "dull normal" in intelligence may also be capable of waiving a jury trial. People v Lookadoo (1967) 66 C2d 307, 57 CR 608. In accepting a valid jury trial waiver, the court must assure that the waiver is personal, voluntary, and intelligent. People v Miller, supra.

Non-English-speaking defendants aided by interpreters may also waive a jury trial. People v Castaneda (1975) 52 CA3d 334, 125 CR 9.

§28.8 C. Advice and Waiver Required

In a standard court trial, in which the defendant contests guilt and the prosecution and defense make a complete presentation of evidence, the defendant must be told of the existence and nature of the right to a trial by jury, and in order to waive that right, must do so affirmatively. See People v Lookadoo (1967) 66 C2d 307, 311, 57 CR 608. The record must clearly and affirmatively show that the defendant personally and by use of language waived the right to a jury trial; a waiver will not be implied from silence or conduct. People v Holmes (1960) 54 C2d 442, 5 CR 871. Although no specific language is required, the waiver must be expressed in language that leaves no uncertainty about whether the defendant intends to submit the case to the court without a jury. See People v Kranhouse (1968) 265 CA2d 440, 71 CR 223; People v Redwine (1958) 166 CA2d 371, 333 P2d 188. Any ambiguities in the record must be construed in favor of preserving the defendant's right to a jury trial. People v Redwine, supra. Courts indulge every reasonable presumption against a waiver of fundamental constitutional rights when the record is silent. Blair v Pitchess (1971) 5 C3d 258, 274, 96 CR 42; Johnson v Zerbst (1938) 304 US 458, 464, 82 L Ed 1461, 1466, 58 S Ct 1019. The court need not, however, explore the reasons for the waiver (People v Diaz (1992) 3 C4th 495, 571, 11 CR2d 353) nor need it explain all the "ins and outs" of a jury trial (People v Wrest (1992) 3 C4th 1088, 1105, 13 CR2d 511). The court cannot encourage a defendant to waive a jury trial by promising a benefit for the waiver, such as stating that it would consider the waiver as a mitigating factor at sentencing. See People v Dixon (2007) 153 CA4th 985, 993, 63 CR3d 637.

A defendant who pleads guilty in a misdemeanor case can generally do so through counsel by signing the court's waiver of rights statement, which includes waiving the right to a jury trial. Counsel then submits the waiver to the court. See Pen C §977(a); Mills v Municipal Court (1973) 10 C3d 288, 110 CR 329. However, a defendant must personally appear at sentencing in misdemeanor prosecutions involving domestic violence as defined in Fam C §6211 or violation of a restraining order as described in Pen C §273.6. Pen C §977(a)(1)-(2). When a defendant is charged with specified misdemeanor offenses involving driving under the influence, the court may order the defendant to be present at the time of plea and at sentencing. Pen C §977(a)(3). In felony cases, the defendant always must appear in court at the time of plea. Pen C §977(b)(1).

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.9 D. Waiver Must Be in Open Court

In a felony prosecution, the defendant's waiver must be made in open court. Cal Const art I, §16. "Open court" typically is understood to refer to nothing more or less than a hearing or trial held in a courtroom from which the public is not excluded. People v Allegheny Cas. Co. (2007) 41 C4th 704, 709, 61 CR3d 689. See also People v Valenzuela (1968) 259 CA2d 826, 832, 66 CR 825 (waiver made in chambers when court was in session and door to chambers was open may satisfy open court requirement).

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.10 E. Waiver by Pro Per Defendant

An unrepresented defendant acting in pro per may waive jury trial and "no stereotyped" language expressing a waiver need be used. People v Kranhouse (1968) 265 CA2d 440, 449, 71 CR 223. The waiver must be in open court when a felony is charged. Cal Const art I, §16.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.11 F. Time for Waiver

Waiver of 12 jurors. The right to a jury trial, or to a jury of 12 persons, may be waived at any time before submission of the case. People v King (1969) 71 C2d 885, 887, 80 CR 26; People v Medina (1935) 9 CA2d 259, 49 P2d 332. Usually, this type of waiver occurs when a juror becomes ill, there is no alternate, and the defense wishes to proceed with the 11 remaining jurors. See, e.g., People v Evans (1970) 8 CA3d 152, 87 CR 315.

Extension of original waiver to second trial. A jury trial waiver will remain in effect when a retrial is ordered without appellate intervention, e.g., when the trial judge declares a mistrial. After waiving a jury in a first trial, the defendant must make a timely motion to withdraw that prior jury waiver to be entitled to a jury in the second trial. People v Smith (2005) 132 CA4th 924, 936, 33 CR3d 918. However, a jury trial waiver made before a defendant's first trial is no longer effective when the defendant is retried following a reversal of his or her conviction on appeal. People v Solis (1998) 66 CA4th 62, 67, 77 CR2d 570.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.12 G. Renewal of Waiver After Pleadings Amended

A prior jury trial waiver becomes ineffective when the prosecutor amends the charging document to charge a new offense or to add a prior conviction or penalty enhancement. New pleadings require a new waiver. People v Sanders (1987) 191 CA3d 79, 236 CR 197 (prosecutor added lesser included offense of count stricken by prosecutor to obtain defendant's jury waiver; no retrial possible on that count); People v Hopkins (1974) 39 CA3d 107, 113 CR 880 (penalty enhancement added); People v Luick (1972) 24 CA3d 555, 101 CR 252 (prior conviction added); People v Walker (1959) 170 CA2d 159, 338 P2d 536 (new and separate charge added). See also Pen C §§969.5 (amending complaint to charge prior convictions), 1009 (amending accusatory pleadings).

§28.13 H. Consent of Prosecutor and Defense Counsel

A defendant does not have the unilateral right to waive a jury trial and demand a trial before a judge; both the prosecutor and defense counsel must concur. Cal Const art I, §16; People v Upshaw (1974) 13 C3d 29, 33, 117 CR 668 (jury trial waiver requires concurrence of defense counsel); People v Terry (1970) 2 C3d 362, 85 CR 409, disapproved on other grounds in People v Carpenter (1997) 15 C4th 312, 382, 63 CR2d 1 (jury trial waiver requires concurrence of prosecutor). See also People v King (1970) 1 C3d 791, 795, 83 CR 401; People v Peace (1980) 107 CA3d 996, 1007, 166 CR 202.

In Singer v U.S. (1965) 380 US 24, 36, 13 L Ed 2d 630, 638, 85 S Ct 783, the Supreme Court declined to assume that the prosecution would "demand a jury trial for an ignoble purpose." The Court continued, "We need not determine in this case whether there might be some circumstances where a defendant's reasons for wanting to be tried by a judge alone are so compelling that the Government's insistence on trial by jury would result in the denial to a defendant of an impartial trial." 380 US at 37, 13 L Ed 2d at 639. Thus, cases may arise in which the defense brings enough pressure to bear that the prosecution capitulates to a court trial.

Defense counsel's statement that a jury trial waiver is against his or her advice is equivalent to failure to waive a jury trial. People v Peace (1980) 107 CA3d 996, 1008, 166 CR 202. Silence by the prosecutor and defense counsel, however, when the defendant waives jury, will be interpreted as a waiver of jury trial. People v Evanson (1968) 265 CA2d 698, 701, 71 CR 503.

If a trial court mistakenly begins a court trial despite defense counsel's refusal to waive jury and then, after jeopardy has attached, discovers the error and declares a mistrial, the defendant has been placed in jeopardy and cannot be retried. People v Upshaw (1974) 13 C3d 29, 117 CR 668.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.14 I. Judge's Concurrence Not Required for Jury Trial Waiver

Because the California Constitution does not require the judge's consent to a nonjury trial, the trial judge may not overrule the parties' jury trial waiver. People v Scott (1997) 15 C4th 1188, 1209, 65 CR2d 240.

Ø Warning: There can be no valid agreement on the sentence, however, without the trial judge's approval. Any agreement on sentencing should be on the record; otherwise, it may not have to be honored. People v James (1989) 208 CA3d 1155, 1169, 256 CR 661. Plea bargaining and case settlement is discussed in chap 26.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.15 J. Failure to Obtain Waiver

Failure to obtain an express jury trial waiver ordinarily violates the California Constitution and requires automatic reversal of the conviction. People v Holmes (1960) 54 C2d 442, 5 CR 871. It has, however, been held that failure to obtain an express waiver of jury on a special circumstances allegation is subject to harmless error review under the Chapman standard (Chapman v California (1967) 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824). People v Moreno (1991) 228 CA3d 564, 279 CR 140, disapproved on other grounds in People v Wrest (1992) 3 C4th 1088, 1104, 13 CR2d 511.

Moreno's holding was based on the then-valid assumption that the federal Constitution includes no right to jury trial on a special circumstance allegation. 228 CA3d at 573. This assumption is no longer valid after Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 124 S Ct 2531, Ring v Arizona (2002) 536 US 584, 153 L Ed 2d 556, 122 S Ct 2428, and Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348. The redefinition of the Sixth Amendment jury trial right to include special circumstances allegations does not necessarily make the failure to obtain an express waiver from the defendant reversible per se, however. One reason is that the U.S. Supreme Court has never adopted the California requirement that the trial court must obtain an express waiver of each of the constitutional rights the defendant gives up when entering a guilty plea. See North Carolina v Alford (1970) 400 US 25, 31, 27 L Ed 2d 162, 167, 91 S Ct 160. Furthermore, the U.S. Supreme Court has not explicitly included deprivation of the right to jury trial in the list of errors deemed structural and hence automatically reversible. See Neder v U.S. (1999) 527 US 1, 8, 144 L Ed 2d 35, 46, 119 S Ct 1827, for list of errors deemed structural. Deprivation of the right to jury trial has, however, long been presumed to be structural error, and several of the justices have made no secret of their views that the Sixth Amendment forbids conviction by "the wrong entity." See, e.g., Sullivan v Louisiana (1993) 508 US 275, 281, 124 L Ed 2d 182, 190, 113 S Ct 2078 (holding harmless error analysis inapplicable to erroneous reasonable doubt instruction).

§28.16 K. Waiver of Jury Trial on Special Circumstances Allegation in Capital Cases

Both California law and the Sixth Amendment guarantee the right to have a jury decide the truth of alleged special circumstances in a capital case. People v Wrest (1992) 3 C4th 1088, 1103, 13 CR2d 511; Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 124 S Ct 2531; Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348. A waiver of the right to jury trial on a special circumstance allegation does not have to be separate from the waiver of the right to jury trial on the underlying charges if the record is clear that the defendant is waiving both. People v Wrest, supra.

Ø Note: After Blakely and Apprendi, the better practice is to take a separate jury trial waiver on the special circumstance allegation.

In a non-death penalty murder case charging special circumstances, a separate Bunnell (Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302) jury waiver for consideration of the special circumstances allegation is not required, or is harmless error, if it is clear from the record that the defendant was informed of that right and the waiver was taken as part of the overall submission of the case. People v Wrest, supra; People v Simpson (1991) 2 CA4th 228, 2 CR2d 589.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.17 L. Waiver of Jury Trial on Enhancements and Prior Convictions

Unlike the rule pertaining to special circumstances allegations, jury waiver on the underlying charge is deemed a jury waiver on prior convictions as well; no separate waiver is required. People v Berutko (1969) 71 C2d 84, 94, 77 CR 217. It is common practice for defendants to seek bifurcated trials on prior convictions charged as enhancements. A bifurcated trial means that a jury will decide guilt on the underlying charges, but it will not hear of the existence of the prior convictions until after the guilt phase of the trial is concluded, unless they are admissible as character evidence under Evid C §§1101 or 1108-1109, or to impeach the defendant if he or she testifies. If the defendant is found guilty, the same jury then decides the prior conviction issue. Pen C §1158. Without a defense objection, however, the discharge of the guilt jury and the later impaneling of a second jury to try the prior conviction issue is permissible and is not a double jeopardy violation. People v Saunders (1993) 5 C4th 580, 20 CR2d 638. When bifurcation is not permitted, defendants sometimes admit the priors before trial begins. This procedure also may keep the jury from hearing about the prior. Bifurcation is not possible when a prior conviction is an element of the offense and consequently must be determined by the jury during deliberations on guilt. For further discussion, see §§24.18, 24.25-24.26.

Issues such as whether a prior conviction is a serious felony for sentence enhancing purposes, or whether priors were brought and tried separately are considered issues of law rather than issues of fact. There is no right to trial by jury of an issue of law. See Pen C §1126; People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 708, 42 CR3d 899; People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 455, 87 CR2d 674; People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 589, 38 CR2d 347.

§28.18 M. Waiver of Jury at Sanity Phase of Trial

When a defendant has pleaded both not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity (NGI) and has waived a jury trial, that waiver extends to both the guilt and sanity phases. People v Jarmon (1992) 2 CA4th 1345, 1355, 4 CR2d 9. For further discussion of NGI issues, see §§48.40-48.58.

N. Court Trials Involving Submission on Less Than All Evidence; Slow Plea of Guilty

§28.19 1. Description of Shortened Court Trial and of Slow Plea of Guilty

In a shortened court trial, the defendant contests guilt, but counsel agree to submit some of the factual issues on evidence other than live testimony. For example, one attorney may want to submit a witness's testimony through a transcript of former testimony because the witness is unavailable or may make an unfavorable impression on the jury. Opposing counsel may agree to that on the condition that a similar arrangement be made for another witness.

In some situations, counsel may agree to submit the entire case on evidence other than live testimony. Examples of evidence commonly used in stipulated submissions follow:

- All or parts of the preliminary hearing transcript;
- All or parts of various police reports;
- Affidavit or declaration of witness;
- Physical evidence;
- Stipulation of facts or testimony agreed to be submitted to the judge;
- Transcript from a former hearing or trial; and
- Testimony from only specified witnesses.

Usually, a submission on stipulated evidence is presented to the court with the understanding that the defendant is not contesting guilt. Such a submission is called a slow plea of guilty, because it is tantamount to a guilty plea. Often, the parties stipulate to the sentence the defendant will receive if found guilty, and obtain the court's approval of this agreement. See §28.14. A slow plea also occurs when it is agreed that the court will find the defendant guilty but is given a choice of several charges. People v Huynh (1991) 229 CA3d 1067, 281 CR 785 (second degree murder or manslaughter).

Sometimes, a submission on stipulated facts is not a slow plea. When, for example, undisputed facts present a substantial legal issue, such as whether the defendant's undisputed conduct is proscribed by the statute, the submission is not tantamount to a guilty plea and is not considered a slow plea. See People v Wright (1987) 43 C3d 487, 496, 233 CR 69.

Generally, the prosecution offers or agrees to this procedure when its case is weak, but for public policy considerations the prosecutor cannot dismiss the case. By reducing the charge in exchange for a court trial and agreement not to contest guilt, the prosecutor saves taxpayers the expense of a jury trial, eliminating the possibility that the defendant will be acquitted or will have to be retried because of a deadlocked jury. Defense reasons for agreeing to a slow plea of guilty are discussed in §28.23.

The special waiver required for a case submitted on stipulated facts is discussed in §28.20.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.20 2. Waiver Required for Slow Plea of Guilty

When a submission on agreed-on evidence is tantamount to a guilty plea, the defendant must be informed of the following rights and must waive them (Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 605, 119 CR 302):

- The right to jury trial;
- The right to confront and cross-examine witnesses; and
- The right against self-incrimination.

If the submission is a slow plea, the Bunnell advisements and waiver are required even if the defendant is contesting guilt or reserving the right to present additional evidence or legal argument in his or her defense. On the different standards used to review this issue on appeal, see §28.21.

> Ø Note: If the defendant advances a substantial defense, the submission will not be considered tantamount to a plea of guilty. People v Wright (1987) 43 C3d 487, 496, 233 CR 69. See §§28.19, 28.21. However, a submission on less than a full presentation of the evidence furnishes a link in the chain of evidence needed for a conviction and thus involves the privilege against self-incrimination. 43 C3d at 492. See also People v Huynh (1991) 229 CA3d 1067, 1079, 281 CR 785. The better practice is therefore to advise and obtain a waiver from the defendant of the self-incrimination privilege on any such submission.

If the defendant does not reserve the right to present additional evidence and does not tell the court that he or she will contest guilt, the court must also advise the defendant of the probability that the court will find the defendant guilty. People v Lucky (1988) 45 C3d 259, 286, 247 CR 1. In addition, if the defendant does not reserve the right to present evidence, the court must advise the defendant of that right and obtain a waiver. 45 C3d at 285. The court should also advise the defendant of the direct consequences of a guilty finding. On the trial court's duties before accepting a guilty plea, see §§26.10-26.17.

It appears that the plea bargaining involved in a slow plea is not included in Pen C §1192.7 ("'plea bargaining' means any bargaining, negotiation, or discussion … whereby the defendant agrees to plead guilty or nolo contendere"). However, Pen C §1192.6, which requires the judge to provide a statement for the record if he or she dismisses a felony charge, does apply. For discussion of the effect of §1192.7 on plea bargaining in felony cases, see §§8.6, 26.20.

> Ø Note: It is crucial that the terms of a slow plea be made part of the record to avoid enforcement problems later. People v James (1989) 208 CA3d 1155, 1167, 256 CR 661.

§28.21 3. Appellate Standards When Considering Advice and Waiver on Slow Plea

Under Cal Const art I, §16, a defendant must make an affirmative statement waiving his or her right to a jury trial and submitting the case to a judge in a court trial. A conviction obtained after a court trial without a proper jury trial waiver is reversible per se. People v Holmes (1960) 54 C2d 442, 5 CR 871. See discussion in §28.15.

Failure to properly advise a defendant and obtain proper waivers of the remaining Bunnell rights is not reversible per se either in a Bunnell plea or in a contested submission in which the defendant reserves the right to present evidence and contest guilt in argument; People v Wright (1987) 43 C3d 487, 492, 233 CR 69; People v Stone (1994) 27 CA4th 276, 281, 32 CR2d 494.

If the record affirmatively demonstrates that the waiver of rights and the submission of the agreed-on evidence were voluntary and intelligent under the totality of the circumstances, a conviction following a court trial will be affirmed. Reversal is compelled only if failure to advise and obtain express waivers is prejudicial to the defendant, i.e., it is reasonably probable that a result more favorable to the defendant would have been reached if properly advised. People v Watson (1956) 46 C2d 818, 836, 299 P2d 243; People v Stone, supra.

Ø Note: A defendant who has asserted and received the right to a jury trial need not provide an additional waiver of constitutional rights when stipulating to an element of an offense. People v Newman (1999) 21 C4th 413, 422, 87 CR2d 474. Stipulating to an element of the offense charged is a tactical decision not requiring recordation of the defendant's personal consent. People v Fisk (1975) 50 CA3d 364, 371, 123 CR 414. When a defendant is charged with possession of a firearm by an ex-felon, for example, it is often advisable to stipulate to the prior felony conviction to minimize associated prejudice. With a stipulation to the prior conviction, the court "sanitizes" the prior. Although the jury is informed the defendant has a prior felony conviction, the nature of the felony is not specified. People v Sapp (2003) 31 C4th 240, 261, 2 CR3d 554; People v Valentine (1986) 42 C3d 170, 173, 228 CR 25.

Ø Warning: Courts and counsel should be mindful of the Bunnell requirements whenever issues are submitted on the basis of transcripts during a court trial. To avoid extensive appellate litigation, courts should insist on Bunnell advisement and waivers in all cases submitted on transcripts or other documentary evidence. See People v Howard (1992) 1 C4th 1132, 1178, 5 CR2d 268; People v Dakin (1988) 200 CA3d 1026, 248 CR 206.

When a stipulation admits every element of an offense, it is tantamount to a guilty plea and requires Bunnell (Boykin-Tahl) advisements and waiver. People v Little (2004) 115 CA4th 766, 778, 9 CR3d 446. For further discussion of the differences between a submission and a stipulation of fact, see People v Gaul-Alexander (1995) 32 CA4th 735, 749, 38 CR2d 176. Jury waiver for normal court trials is discussed in §§28.6-28.14.

O. Defense Considerations

§28.22 1. Differences Between Judge and Jury

The right to jury trial developed as protection against government oppression. In our present adversary system, the jury trial remains the best arena for challenging criminal charges brought by the government against an individual. In addition, juries better reflect the diversity of attitudes and views within the community in which the crime was allegedly committed. Even in periods of extreme anticrime sentiment, defense counsel and the defendant may choose to trust the wisdom and integrity of jurors, as community representatives, to act justly. Depending on the case, a jury may be more likely than a judge to compromise or nullify the harshness of the law. See People v Dillon (1983) 34 C3d 441, 490, 194 CR 390 (concurring opinion of Kaus, J.).

Numbers play an important role in a jury trial. Even if jurors are homogeneous in race, education, and cultural background, they must unanimously agree on a verdict. To reach a verdict, they must sort out and resolve conflicts in the evidence as well as their personality differences. Defense counsel can expect 12 persons to challenge one another and the evidence before reaching a verdict. This practice often works to the defendant's advantage.

Finally, a jury may hear a sanitized version of the evidence. Evidence may be suppressed, priors may be stricken or their trial bifurcated, and collateral conduct, including similar offenses, may be excluded as too prejudicial. A judge sitting alone as the trier of fact after hearing such evidence might be hard-pressed to ignore it; when excluded, jurors never hear it.

If defense counsel or the defendant wants to waive jury trial, defense counsel should discuss with the defendant the tactical considerations involved. In the event of unresolved disagreement regarding whether to waive a jury, no waiver occurs. People v Peace (1980) 107 CA3d 996, 1007, 166 CR 202 (defendant does not have constitutional right to waive jury trial over his or her counsel's objection).

§28.23 2. Checklist: Defense Reasons for Waiving Jury

Jury waiver can result in one of three different types of court trial: a full court trial in which guilt is contested and all relevant evidence is presented (see §§28.31-28.38); a shortened court trial submitted on stipulated evidence, with guilt contested (see §§28.19-28.21); or a slow plea of guilty in which the case is submitted on specified evidence with the understanding that the defendant will be found guilty of a particular charge (see §§28.19-28.21). Among the reasons for defense counsel to recommend one of these types of court trial are the following:

- The defendant wants to plead guilty but also wants to preserve a particular issue for appeal. See §28.24.
- The defendant does not admit guilt but wants to accept the prosecutor's offer.

  Ø Note: If new evidence of the defendant's innocence is found later, the fact that the defendant continued to maintain his or her innocence, as evidenced by a slow plea rather than a plea of guilty, can help support the defendant's position on a habeas petition.
- A court trial is used as a mitigation hearing.
- A judge is considered less likely to be affected emotionally by prosecution evidence.
- A quick resolution of a case is necessary to avoid delays in sentencing and sentence credits.
- A waiver of jury trial will expedite the case.
- A judge may admit evidence favorable to the defense that would probably have been excluded in a jury trial.

§28.24 a. Preserving Appellate Issues

Some cases present no factual disputes but do raise constitutional or other legal issues. A defendant who pleads guilty or no contest waives all legal or factual issues going to guilt or innocence. See People v Kaanehe (1977) 19 C3d 1, 8, 136 CR 409; Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §1.11 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). Most of the issues that are cognizable on appeal after a guilty plea—issues going to the jurisdiction of the court or the legality of the proceedings—require filing a certificate of probable cause for an appeal. Pen C §1237.5. See also Appeals & Writs §§1.12-1.13. A notable exception is that a defendant may, without a certificate of probable cause, appeal denial of a motion to suppress brought pursuant to Pen C §1538.5 following the entry of a guilty or no contest plea. Pen C §1538.5(m). A trial on a plea of not guilty, even an abbreviated trial on stipulated evidence, does not require a certificate of probable cause and preserves all issues for appeal that were otherwise properly preserved in the trial court. People v Tran (1984) 152 CA3d 680, 685 n7, 199 CR 539. See Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 602, 119 CR 302.

If a substantial federal issue is involved, a plea of guilty also renders the issue moot in federal habeas corpus proceedings. A state certificate of probable cause will not preserve the issue. To preserve an issue for federal review, counsel must protect the client and the legal issue by trying the case before either a jury or a judge. See Mitchell v Superior Court (9th Cir 1980) 632 F2d 767.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.25 b. Court Trial Used as Mitigation Hearing

Sometimes, evidence of a defendant's guilt is so overwhelming that a jury trial does not serve the defendant's interest, yet the defense wants the sentencing judge to hear the witnesses. Mitigating and extenuating circumstances may exist, or the victim of the crime may be so unsavory that they may blunt the impact of the defendant's guilt. A court trial in such a case allows the defendant to present testimony and to cross-examine prosecution witnesses in a way that would not be permitted at a sentencing hearing. See People v Zikorus (1983) 150 CA3d 324, 333, 197 CR 509 (confrontation of witnesses and rules of evidence need not apply at sentencing hearing as long as procedure is fundamentally fair).

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.26 c. Speedy Disposition

A quick resolution of a case may benefit a defendant, especially if he or she faces charges in other jurisdictions or if witnesses crucial to the prosecution are missing. Because judges are often available to try short cases between jury trials, a jury waiver may accelerate trial of the defendant's case.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.27 d. Evidentiary Considerations

In some cases, admission of all the evidence, including hearsay, "self-serving" statements, and collateral matters affecting a witness's or victim's interests, bias, or conduct in the case, benefits the defendant. A judge may be more likely to admit and consider such evidence if a jury trial has been waived. Careful analysis of the facts and Evidence Code determine the weight to be given such factors before defense counsel waives jury trial. Conversely, if highly prejudicial evidence will probably be excluded, a jury trial might be better because the jurors would never hear the excluded evidence, whereas the judge in a court trial would.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.28 P. Prosecution Considerations

Many prosecutors prefer court trials to jury trials. The main reason is that jury attitudes are less known than those of a familiar judge, many of whom are former prosecutors; the risk of an aberrant decision increases with 12 decision-makers. Also, juror errors such as independent investigation make it more likely that a mistrial, new trial, or reversible error will occur. Jury trials also take more time and money—especially when counts or defendants have been severed, causing multiple trials. Finally, courts often find time for a court trial when a jury trial would be delayed.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.29 V. MOTION TO WITHDRAW WAIVER

A party who properly waives the right to a jury trial may withdraw it only with the court's approval. People v Chambers (1972) 7 C3d 666, 670, 102 CR 776. Factors the court considers include the motion's timeliness, the likelihood of an undue delay of trial, and any inconvenience to witnesses. People v Chambers, supra.

When the motion is made sufficiently in advance of trial that it does not interfere with the orderly administration of court business or prejudice other parties to the action, the court should grant it and reinstate the party's right to a jury trial. People v Osmon (1961) 195 CA2d 151, 154, 15 CR 263. A motion made just before trial begins or during trial, however, may properly be denied. People v Chambers, supra (motion made on day of trial); People v Colton (1949) 92 CA2d 704, 207 P2d 890 (same); People v Cowan (1940) 38 CA2d 144, 100 P2d 1079 (motion made after district attorney presented case-in-chief). The judge's decision will be reversed on appeal only for abuse of discretion. People v Chambers, supra.

When a defendant appearing in pro per subsequently retains counsel, who asks in a timely fashion to withdraw the defendant's jury trial waiver and to reinstate his or her right to a jury trial, the court should permit it. This motion may be made by counsel only, if the defendant does not object. See People v Kipnis (1970) 5 CA3d 980, 986, 85 CR 547.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.30 VI. CHOICE OF JUDGE IN COURT TRIAL; USING REFEREE OR COMMISSIONER

It is crucial to know the identity of the judge who will try the case before waiving a jury trial. Some judges excel in homicide cases because they understand and are not repelled by violence. Other judges, who are truly legal scholars and technicians, have the capacity to separate emotion from legal principles. Good practice dictates that defense counsel and the prosecutor agree on a judge acceptable to both sides.

This agreement should be explicit. See People v Marshall (1960) 184 CA2d 535, 7 CR 589 (jury trial waiver before particular judge does not mean that that judge will hear case). Both parties should therefore make the choice of judge a condition of jury waiver.

Ø Warning: It is unclear that such a condition would be deemed effective if the defendant attempted to withdraw the jury trial waiver on the ground that the case was assigned for trial to a different judge and the motion was denied. In People v Terry (1950) 99 CA2d 579, 584, 222 P2d 95, the court of appeal expressed skepticism about the enforceability of such a condition. The California Supreme Court has not ruled on the issue. See People v Langdon (1959) 52 C2d 425, 432, 341 P2d 303. See also People v Jones (1960) 177 CA2d 420, 426, 2 CR 305.

Both the defense and the prosecution can stipulate to having a referee or court commissioner hear a case. No personal waiver is required from the defendant. If the parties proceed through trial without an objection to the referee or commissioner, a de facto stipulation will be found. In re Horton (1991) 54 C3d 82, 91, 284 CR 305 (on appeal, waiver inferred from defense counsel's conduct). See Cal Const art VI, §21; CCP §259(d). See also Foosadas v Superior Court (2005) 130 CA4th 649, 30 CR3d 358 (local rule that deemed lack of objection as equivalent to implied stipulation held invalid); Horton v Mayle (9th Cir 2005) 408 F3d 570, 577.

VII. PROCEDURE DURING COURT TRIAL

§28.31 A. Types of Evidence That May Be Presented

A trial without a jury can be just as formal as a jury trial; a defendant does not waive the right to a trial, only to a jury trial. The evidentiary portion of a court trial can be identical to the evidentiary portion of a jury trial. For discussion of jury trials, see chap 30.

Ø Note: Of course, there are differences, even when counsel elects a full, formal presentation of evidence: No jury is selected, fewer instructions are chosen and they are not read aloud, and the judge usually takes less time to deliberate than a jury.

Alternatively, counsel may stipulate to any combination of transcripts, reports, testimony, recordings, material objects, or other evidence. Stipulating to an element of the offense charged is a tactical decision not requiring recordation of the defendant's personal consent. People v Fisk (1975) 50 CA3d 364, 371, 123 CR 414. See People v Newman (1999) 21 C4th 413, 421, 87 CR2d 474 (Boykin-Tahl waiver not required for defendant's stipulation to previous felony conviction, because not a waiver of constitutional rights); People v Adams (1993) 6 C4th 570, 578, 24 CR2d 831 (recognizing evidentiary stipulation as tactical trial decision); People v Gaul-Alexander (1995) 32 CA4th 735, 38 CR2d 176. For tactical reasons, a trial may be abbreviated to a slow plea. For discussion, see §§28.19-28.21.

A court trial begins with opening statements, first by the prosecution, then by the defense. Both counsel may, and in misdemeanor court trials commonly do, waive opening statement in diplomatic reliance on the judge's ability to assimilate the evidence. The prosecution then offers evidence to support the charge. After the prosecution rests, defense counsel may move for a judgment of acquittal. The court may also consider entering a judgment of acquittal on its own motion. Pen C §1118. If the motion is denied or is not made, the defense may offer evidence. Each party may then offer rebuttal testimony. The court, for good cause and in the interest of justice, may permit either party to offer evidence on its original case after rebuttal, but this is highly unusual. The prosecution may be allowed to reopen and present additional evidence only when the court is convinced that failure to present evidence on an issue, e.g., proof of enhancements or priors, was a result of the prosecutor's inadvertence or mistake and did not result from an attempt to gain a tactical advantage over the defendant. See People v Goss (1992) 7 CA4th 702, 706, 9 CR2d 412. On the other hand, if defense counsel inadvertently fails to present evidence before resting, it appears that a judge in a court trial could allow the defense to reopen and present additional evidence before a verdict has been rendered. See People v Funes (1994) 23 CA4th 1506, 28 CR2d 758. After introduction of all the evidence, the parties rest. Both parties are then permitted to argue their respective cases. Pen C §1093.

There is a significant difference between the trial court's role in ruling on a motion under Pen C §1118.1 (motion for judgment of acquittal in jury case) and its role in ruling on a Pen C §1118 motion. The trial court will grant a §1118.1 motion only if the evidence then before the court is insufficient to sustain a conviction on appeal. Because the judge is the trier of law and fact in a court trial, the court may grant the motion even if the evidence is sufficient if it has a reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt after weighing the evidence then before it. If the court does not grant a judgment of acquittal, the defendant may then offer evidence. Pen C §1118.

§28.32 B. Jeopardy

In a court trial in which witnesses testify, jeopardy attaches when the first witness is sworn. If the court accepts a stipulation to submit the case on documents instead of on the examination and cross-examination of witnesses, jeopardy attaches on acceptance of the stipulation. Bunnell v Superior Court (1975) 13 C3d 592, 602, 119 CR 302.

A judgment of acquittal of the substantive offense for insufficient evidence under Pen C §1118 is not appealable, and the double jeopardy prohibition bars retrial. Pen C §1118.2. When, however, the court enters a judgment of acquittal of an allegation of a prior conviction, the prosecution may produce additional evidence, and the court may subsequently set aside the judgment of acquittal. People v Norris (2002) 95 CA4th 475, 479, 115 CR2d 540. See Monge v California (1998) 524 US 721, 734, 141 L Ed 2d 615, 627, 118 S Ct 2246 (double jeopardy provision of U.S. Constitution does not bar retrial in noncapital prosecution of prior-conviction allegation reversed on appeal for insufficient evidence); People v Barragan (2004) 32 C4th 236, 9 CR3d 76 (same; California Constitution).

§28.33 C. Admissibility of Evidence

Except as otherwise provided in the Penal Code or mandated by other procedural or evidentiary rules, the Evidence Code applies to all criminal actions, including court trials. Pen C §1102; Evid C §300; People v Charles (1967) 66 C2d 330, 338 n12, 57 CR 745; People v Holmes (1993) 12 CA4th 1094, 1097, 16 CR2d 52.

In a jury trial, a hearing on the admission of evidence dependent on a finding of a preliminary fact is held out of the presence or hearing of the jury. Evid C §402. In court trials, however, because judges are considered better able to limit their consideration of evidence to the purpose for which it is admissible, motions to exclude evidence are usually heard by the same judge who will hear the trial. In extreme cases, the trial judge may request another judge to hear pretrial evidentiary matters. People v Charles, supra.

§28.34 D. Order of Proof

In conducting a court trial, courts normally follow Pen C §1093, which sets the order of proceedings in jury trials, but this is not required. For good reasons, including the consent of the parties, and in the sound discretion of the court, changes can be made in the order of proof. Pen C §1094; Evid C 320; People v Gates (1987) 43 C3d 1168, 1184, 240 CR 666; People v Lanphear (1980) 28 C3d 463, 171 CR 505; People v Carter (1957) 48 C2d 737, 754, 312 P2d 665.

The order of proof can be crucial to trial counsel. To prevent an alleged victim who is entitled to be present and seated at trial from hearing and potentially conforming his or her testimony to another witness's or unduly influencing other witnesses' testimony by his or her presence, defense counsel may seek to exclude the alleged victim, provided all the criteria in Pen C §1102.6(b) are met. Alternatively, counsel may object to the order of an alleged victim's testimony and may ask the court to require the alleged victim to testify first.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.35 E. Role of Trial Judge

In a court trial, the judge not only rules on issues of law (Pen C §1124) but is the trier of fact—the final arbiter of whether the prosecution has sustained its burden of proving the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt (Pen C §1167). With a view to the "expeditious and effective ascertainment of the truth regarding the matters involved," the judge controls the introduction of evidence and limits counsels' arguments to relevant matters. Pen C §1044; Evid C §765; People v Garcia (1986) 183 CA3d 335, 345, 228 CR 87; People v Ferguson (1981) 126 CA3d Supp 22, 32 n6-7, 179 CR 437. The judge has a right and a duty to expedite the trial and, if necessary in the interests of fairness and efficiency, to participate by engaging in reasonable supplementary examination of witnesses during the course of trial to elicit or clarify testimony on material points. 126 CA3d Supp at 32 n8. In fact, the judge has a duty to speak up when it seems apparent that a witness's testimony should be clarified. 126 CA3d Supp at 31 n4; People v Bonville (1968) 268 CA2d 107, 116, 73 CR 741; People v Lancellotti (1957) 147 CA2d 723, 730, 305 P2d 926.

However, the judge, under the guise of examining witnesses, must not become an advocate of either party. People v Clark (1992) 3 C4th 41, 143, 10 CR2d 554; People v Rocco (1971) 21 CA3d 96, 108, 98 CR 365; People v Bonville, supra. Judges have a duty to be impartial and to make sure that the defendant in a criminal case is given a fair trial on the facts and not a trial "on the temper or whimsies of the judge who sits in his case." People v Mahoney (1927) 201 C 618, 626, 258 P 607; People v Blackburn (1982) 139 CA3d 761, 765, 189 CR 50. Similarly, the judge is obligated to see that the trial is fair to the prosecution. People v Ferguson (1981) 126 CA3d Supp 22, 32 n7, 179 CR 437.

When it appears to counsel that a judge is taking over the examination of witnesses or otherwise interfering with the presentation of the case, counsel has a duty to speak up at a proper time and in a proper manner to object to the judge's questioning of witnesses or to forestall rulings that counsel considers erroneous and detrimental to the interests of the client. Evid C §775; People v Clark, supra; People v Travis (1954) 129 CA2d 29, 36, 276 P2d 193; People v Rocco (1971) 21 CA3d 96, 108, 98 CR 365. See also Offutt v U.S. (1954) 348 US 11, 16, 99 L Ed 11, 17, 75 S Ct 11. Some examples of judicial conduct that may interfere with counsel's presentation of the case are:

- Asking leading questions. It is usually best to leave these issues to cross-examination by counsel. Evid C §§767, 773(b); see People v Rocco, supra. When counsel is confronted with a judge who insists on cross-examining counsel's witnesses by asking leading questions, counsel should not hesitate to object, especially if the questions intimidate the witnesses or suggest that the judge is no longer impartial.
- Asking questions that call for a narrative response. Narrative answers are more likely to be nonresponsive and may inadvertently include inadmissible evidence. Evid C §766.

For examples of judicial misconduct, see People v Jackson (1955) 44 C2d 511, 282 P2d 898; People v Fatone (1985) 165 CA3d 1164, 1172, 211 CR 288; People v Campbell (1958) 162 CA2d 776, 329 P2d 82; People v Burns (1952) 109 CA2d 524, 542, 241 P2d 308.

Objecting to the judge's conduct of the trial (as opposed to objecting to the judge's rulings on legal issues) is a delicate matter for counsel, especially if the objections are to the judge's questions. But counsel must object for two reasons: First, counsel must protect the client's chances of securing a favorable verdict. A well-made objection may make the judge aware that he or she has already decided the case, even though the evidence is not all in. Second, counsel must protect the client's right to appeal. Evid C §353. See, e.g., People v Fudge (1994) 7 C4th 1075, 1108, 31 CR2d 321 (failure to make timely objection to judge's examination of witness waives any error on appeal). Common sense, courtesy, and knowledge of the Evidence Code will enable counsel to argue objections effectively without offending the judge: "when pertinent argument is presented in a proper manner it is the duty of the court to listen." People v Travis (1954) 129 CA2d 29, 36, 276 P2d 193.

If the judge refuses to listen and arbitrarily overrules counsel's objections, aggrieved counsel, in a professional and courteous manner, should try to make an offer of proof. If the judge will not allow an offer of proof, counsel must be sure that his or her attempts to object are on the record. If they are not, counsel may wish to ask to put them on the record at a break, or may want to submit them in writing to the court (they should be filed).

Whenever prejudice is so severe that a defendant is denied a fair trial, counsel, even in a court trial, may consider assigning judicial misconduct and coupling the assignment of misconduct with a motion for mistrial. See California Trial Objections §§29.21-29.33 (Cal CEB Annual). When a particular judge manifests pervasive prejudicial conduct, counsel may seek an additional judicial remedy by reporting the conduct to the Commission on Judicial Performance (CJP), authorized to oversee California Judicial Officers and designed to uphold public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary. Counsel is well advised to exercise due care and thoroughly document any alleged misconduct before lodging a complaint with the CJP, because a complaint may engender ill will.

§28.36 F. Instructions

Criminal prosecutions encompass broad and varied subject matter, from common law crimes to highly technical, environmental crimes. In complex cases, written instructions of law are particularly useful to instruct the trial judge on elements of the crime and available defenses. Tailored or pinpoint instructions relating particular facts to legal issues clarify for the judge the issues he or she must resolve. Pen C §1124; People v Sears (1970) 2 C3d 180, 190, 84 CR 711. Also, written instructions assist counsel in structuring a logical and concise final argument, which judges prefer in court trials. Proposed instructions must be delivered to the court before commencement of argument. Pen C §1093.5. On instructions, see chap 32.

© The Regents of the University of California

§28.37 G. Argument

Once the evidence has been introduced and the parties have rested, both the prosecution and the defense are entitled to argue the case. Pen C §1093(e). The defendant has a constitutional right to argument in a criminal trial, whether by jury or court trial. People v Rodrigues (1994) 8 C4th 1060, 1184, 36 CR2d 235. There appears to be no reason, however, that in a court trial the court could not require the parties to submit their arguments in writing, as long as they are given a full opportunity to argue the issues. See In re William F. (1974) 11 C3d 249, 255 n5, 113 CR 170, overruled on other grounds in People v Bonin (1988) 46 C3d 659, 695 n4, 250 CR 687.

For further discussion of argument, see §§30.30-30.33.

§28.38 H. Findings

After considering any instructions offered by the parties, the trial judge as trier of fact deliberates before returning a finding (also called a decision). The finding is in substantially the same form as a verdict. Pen C §1167; People v Flores (1974) 12 C3d 85, 94, 115 CR 225. Specific findings are required on the degree of the crime. People v Flores, supra; Pen C §§1097, 1157. The court trial concludes with the trial judge announcing his or her findings on the issues of fact, and entry of the findings in the minutes. Pen C §1167. When enhancements are charged and a court trial held, the trial court must make a finding on the truth of those allegations. That finding must be announced at the conclusion of the trial. People v Jackson (1987) 193 CA3d 393, 404, 238 CR 327 (enhancement stricken because judge neglected to make finding).

The degree of the crime may be established either by a numerical designation or by a sufficiently clear description of the offense. People v Preciado (1991) 233 CA3d 1244, 1250, 285 CR 22; In re Andrew I. (1991) 230 CA3d 572, 581, 281 CR 570; People v Deay (1987) 194 CA3d 280, 285, 239 CR 406. If the verdict refers to a specific count that unequivocally sets out the substantive elements of the greater crime, the crime is properly fixed at the greater degree. People v Deay, supra. If the court fails to set the degree of the crime, it is deemed to be of the lesser degree. Pen C §§1097, 1157. The court is not required to give the facts on which it based its findings. People v Golston (1962) 58 C2d 535, 540, 25 CR 83.

§29.1 I. OVERVIEW

The constitutional right to jury trial includes the right to be tried by an impartial jury selected from a representative cross-section of residents of a county with a reasonable relationship or nexus to the commission of the offense. See Price v Superior Court (2001) 25 C4th 1046, 1050, 1075, 108 CR2d 409. See also §28.5. This chapter discusses the selection of that impartial, representative jury.

Jury selection begins with a panel of prospective jurors. See CCP §194(q). Selection of the panel is discussed in §§29.3-29.6. The composition of the panel may be challenged on representative cross-section or equal protection grounds. It often takes a great deal of effort for counsel to obtain the data necessary to prove that a particular class is underrepresented on a jury panel, and experts are usually needed to testify. See, e.g., Williams v Superior Court (1989) 49 C3d 736, 741, 263 CR 503; People v Burgener (2003) 29 C4th 833, 856, 129 CR2d 747. Because these challenges are complex, expensive, and seldom successful, attorneys usually do not challenge the entire panel. Challenges to the jury panel are discussed in §§29.7-29.11

Selection of the individual jurors, as well as alternate jurors, from the jury panel is accomplished during the process of voir dire, which is intended to expose juror bias, whether express or implied. See CCP §223. The voir dire process is discussed in §§29.12-29.20. During voir dire, both the prosecution and defense are entitled to make two types of challenges to individual jurors: challenges for cause based on the bias of the individual juror (see §§29.21-29.26 for discussion of challenges for cause), and "peremptory" challenges for which counsel need not state a reason (see §§29.27-29.37 for discussion of peremptory challenges).

This chapter also includes a practical analysis of jury selection techniques for the criminal defense attorney. Rhetorical theory germane to jury selection is analyzed, and sample voir dire questions are provided. See §§29.38-29.56. The following books on jury selection provide a more expansive discussion: Levine, Jury Selection Deskbook (2004); Gobert & Jordan, Jury Selection: The Law, Art and Science of Selecting a Jury (2d ed 1980); Wenke, The Art of Selecting a Jury (2d ed 1989); Bennett, Hirschhorn & Dimitrius, Bennett's Guide to Jury Selection and Trial Dynamics: California Criminal Litigation (1994); Donner & Gabriel, Jury Selection, Strategy & Science (3d ed 2000); National Jury Project, Jurywork: Systematic Techniques (2005).

On jury selection issues unique to death penalty cases, see §§54.25-54.29.

III. CHALLENGES TO PANEL

A. Selection of Trial Jury Panel

§29.3 1. Trial Jury Panel Defined

A trial jury panel is a group of prospective jurors assigned to a courtroom for the purpose of voir dire. See CCP §194(q); People v De Rosans (1994) 27 CA4th 611, 616, 32 CR2d 680.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.4 2. Random Selection of Panel Members

Jurors must be selected at random from a fair cross-section of the population of the area served by the court. See CCP §§191, 197. A list of names of potential jurors is prepared from voter registration, driver's license, and Department of Motor Vehicles' identification card records. CCP §197(b). These are called "source lists." Source lists may also include customer mailing lists, telephone directories, and utility company lists. CCP §197(a). Persons are randomly selected from the source lists by the jury commissioner to create a "master list." Individuals on the master list are then examined by the jury commissioner for their qualifications to serve as trial jurors, usually through a questionnaire mailed to them. CCP §§198, 205. Grounds for exemption from jury service are discussed in §29.5; grounds for general disqualification are discussed in §29.22. A "qualified jury list" made up of persons competent to serve is then prepared. CCP §§198, 203. When jurors are needed for service, names are randomly drawn from the qualified jury list, and those jurors are notified when and where to report for service.

Ø Note: If sessions of the superior court are held in a location other than the county seat, the names for master jury lists and qualified jury lists to serve in a session may be selected from the area in which the session is held if a local superior court rule has been enacted that divides the county in a manner that provides all qualified persons in the county an equal opportunity to be considered for jury service. See CCP §198.5.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.5 3. Exemption or Excuse From Jury Service

No eligible person (see CCP §203; see also §29.22 (grounds for general disqualification)) can be made exempt from jury service for any reason. CCP §204(a). An eligible person may be excused from jury service only for undue hardship, on himself or herself, or on the public. CCP §204(b). Undue hardship excuses are heard and decided by the jury commissioner. CCP §218.

Ø Note: Even though the jury commissioner will "prescreen" the panel sent to the trial department, trial judges commonly excuse jurors for hardship. Typical hardships found in trial courts include prepaid vacations, child care difficulties with infants, an employer that will not pay more than 1 or 2 weeks' salary for the trial, and missing 2 weeks or more of class time, which will affect the grade of a college student eligible for jury duty.

§29.6 4. Vicinage Right Does Not Limit Jurors to Residents of County Where Crime Occurred

The Sixth Amendment gives a defendant the right to be tried by a jury drawn from the judicial district (vicinage) in which the crime was committed. Traditionally, defense attorneys assumed that "vicinage" was synonymous with "venue" and that venue was only appropriate in the county in which the crime occurred. However, while venue usually is limited to the county in which the crime occurred (see Pen C §§691(b), 777), for some crimes venue is proper in more than one county. See, e.g., Pen C §790 (in murder prosecution, venue may be in county where fatal wound inflicted, where body found, or where victim died). For discussion of venue, see chap 15. The California Supreme Court has rejected the argument that the vicinage right gives the defendant a right to be tried by a jury selected from residents of the county in which the crime occurred. The court stated that the Sixth Amendment vicinage right is not an attribute of Fourteenth Amendment due process (Price v Superior Court (2001) 25 C4th 1046, 1056, 108 CR2d 409) and pointed out that the only limit Cal Const art I, §16, places on "[t]he Legislature's power to designate the place for trial of a criminal offense" is the "requirement that there be a reasonable relationship or nexus between the place designated for trial and the commission of the offense." Price v Superior Court (2001) 25 C4th 1046, 1075, 108 CR2d 409; see People v Posey (2004) 32 C4th 193, 222, 8 CR3d 551.

The conclusion that the Sixth Amendment vicinage right is not an attribute of Fourteenth Amendment due process affects the appellate test for determining whether a vicinage error is prejudicial. As a state law error, it is reviewable under the standard set forth in People v Watson (1956) 46 C2d 818, 836, 299 P2d 243, rather than under the standard for federal constitutional errors set forth in Chapman v California (1967) 386 US 18, 24, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 710, 87 S Ct 824 (error requires reversal unless prosecution shows it was harmless beyond reasonable doubt).

Ø Note: "Vicinage" has a different meaning from "community," which is used to determine whether a criminal defendant's Sixth Amendment right to be tried by an impartial jury "selected from a fair cross-section of the community" has been violated. People v Coddington (2000) 23 C4th 529, 573, 97 CR2d 528, overruled on other grounds in Price v Superior Court (2001) 25 C4th 1046, 1069 n13, 108 CR2d 409. For discussion of fair cross-section challenges, see §§29.9-29.10.

B. Procedure for Challenging Panel

§29.7 1. Timing; Preparing Motion

A challenge to the jury panel is an objection made to all the jurors on the panel. The challenge must be made before any juror is sworn (CCP §225(a)(1)), i.e., before the jurors are sworn to hear the case after voir dire, not before voir dire. People v Myers (1987) 43 C3d 250, 262, 233 CR 264. Challenges to the jury panel are usually heard as in limine motions.

The challenge must be in writing and must state the facts that support it. CCP §225(a)(1). The facts are usually set out in an affidavit or declaration.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.8 2. Legal Bases for Challenging Panel

The most common jury panel challenges are the following:

- The jury panel does not include a representative cross-section of the community (US Const amend VI; Cal Const art I, §16). See People v Horton (1995) 11 C4th 1068, 1087, 47 CR2d 516; Williams v Superior Court (1989) 49 C3d 736, 741, 263 CR 503; People v De Rosans (1994) 27 CA4th 611, 618, 32 CR2d 680; and
- The selection process denied the defendant equal protection of the laws (US Const amends V, XIV; Cal Const art I, §7);

© The Regents of the University of California

3. Representative Cross-Section Challenge

§29.9 a. Right to Jury Panel That Represents Cross-Section of Community

Although a defendant does not have the right to a jury that mirrors the demographic composition of the population, or that necessarily includes members of his or her own group, or that is composed of any particular group of individuals (People v Crittenden (1994) 9 C4th 83, 119, 36 CR2d 474), a defendant is constitutionally entitled to a jury panel that is as near an approximation of the ideal cross-section of the community as the process of random drawing permits. People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 276, 148 CR 890. Despite this requirement, certain groups can be excluded from that cross-section, including resident aliens, nonresident aliens, persons in prison or on parole for a felony (People v Karis (1988) 46 C3d 612, 631, 250 CR 659; Rubio v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 93, 99, 154 CR 734), and peace officers (CCP §219). In addition, a person with an incapacity that satisfies the court that the challenged person is incapable of performing the duties of a juror in the particular action without prejudice to the substantial rights of the challenging party can be excluded from service as well. CCP §228(b). But see CCP §203(a)(6). General disqualification of a person from jury service is discussed in §29.22.

Cases have held that the "community" for cross-section analysis is the "judicial district" in which the case is tried. *S*ee People v Jenkins (2000) 22 C4th 900, 982, 95 CR2d 377. Since trial court unification, a judicial district is a county. See CCP §38. It is presently unclear when a "judicial district" for cross-section analysis will be a smaller unit than the entire county.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.10 b. Prima Facie Case

To establish a prima facie violation of the fair cross-section requirement, the defendant must satisfy three elements (Duren v Missouri (1979) 439 US 357, 364, 58 L Ed 2d 579, 587, 99 S Ct 664; People v Ramos (1997) 15 C4th 1133, 1154, 64 CR2d 892; People v Horton (1995) 11 C4th 1068, 1087, 47 CR2d 516:

- The group alleged to have been excluded is a "distinctive" group in the community;
- The representation of this group in jury panels is not fair and reasonable in relation to the number of such persons in the community; and
- The underrepresentation is due to systematic exclusion of the group from the jury selection process.

Ø Note: With respect to the various measures of underrepresentation, counsel can consult National Jury Project, Jurywork: Systematic Techniques, chap 5 (2005).

With respect to the second element, the proportion of the distinctive group in the jury pool is to be compared with the proportion of the group in the whole community, not with the proportion of the group in the jury-eligible population. U.S. v Rodriguez-Lara (9th Cir 2005) 421 F3d 932, 941.

The third element, "systematic exclusion," cannot be established if the only evidence presented is statistical evidence of disparity. See People v Horton (1995) 11 C4th 1068, 1088, 47 CR2d 516 (upholding Los Angeles County selection system). There must be proof of deliberate systematic exclusion (see People v Ramos (1997) 15 C4th 1133, 1156, 64 CR2d 892 (upholding Orange County selection system)), which requires a showing that the disparity is the result of an improper feature of the jury selection process. See People v Burgener (2003) 29 C4th 833, 859, 129 CR2d 747 (upholding Riverside County selection system); People v Ochoa (2001) 26 C4th 398, 425, 110 CR2d 324 (upholding intracounty transfer); People v Anderson (2001) 25 C4th 543, 566, 106 CR2d 575.

If constitutionally permissible jury selection criteria are applied in a neutral manner, there can be no "systematic exclusion," even when a defendant establishes that the percentage of the distinctive group in the community represented on jury panels is consistently less than the percentage of that group in the community. People v Bell (1989) 49 C3d 502, 524, 262 CR 1. See also People v Breaux (1991) 1 C4th 281, 298, 3 CR2d 81; People v Currie (2001) 87 CA4th 225, 235, 104 CR2d 430 (upholding Contra Costa County jury venire despite clear underrepresentation of African-Americans). If a county's jury selection criteria are neutral with respect to the distinctive group, the defendant must identify some aspect of the manner in which those criteria are applied that is not only the probable cause of the disparity but also constitutionally impermissible. People v Burgener (2003) 29 C4th 833, 858, 129 CR2d 747. A defendant who makes a particularized showing supporting a reasonable belief that underrepresentation exists as the result of practices of systematic exclusion (a very high hurdle) is entitled to some discovery because the court must make a reasonable effort to accommodate relevant requests for information designed to verify the existence of such underrepresentation and document its nature and extent. People v Jackson (1996) 13 C4th 1164, 1194, 56 CR2d 49. See Roddy v Superior Court (2007) 151 CA4th 1115, 1137, 60 CR3d 307.

Ø Practice tip: If a challenge is planned to a county's jury selection criteria, counsel should advise the defendant that a time waiver will be needed to accommodate the discovery required to determine whether any systemic problems exist in the county's jury selection protocol.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.11 4. Hearing on Motion Challenging Panel

In challenging the jury panel, counsel has the right to present testimony and conduct cross-examination. Expert witnesses are usually required to testify to the demographic evidence and to the selection methodology. It is common for defense counsel to submit census data on the percentage of a particular group in the community, evidence of the percentage of that group who appeared from the summoned jury panel, and evidence of the percentage of that group in the panel assigned to the case. See People v Sanders (1990) 51 C3d 471, 489 n4, 273 CR 537.

If a defendant establishes a prima facie case of underrepresentation (see §29.10), the burden shifts to the prosecution to provide either a more precise statistical showing that no constitutionally significant disparity exists, or a compelling justification for the procedure that has resulted in the disparity in the jury venire. People v Anderson (2001) 25 C4th 543, 566, 106 CR2d 575. See also Duren v Missouri (1979) 439 US 357, 368, 58 L Ed 2d 579, 589, 99 S Ct 664; People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 164, 32 CR2d 762; People v Bell (1989) 49 C3d 502, 530, 262 CR 1.

If the court finds the challenge valid, it must discharge the jury panel. People v Smith (1993) 21 CA4th 342, 344, 25 CR2d 850. If it finds the challenge invalid, it must direct the jury to be impaneled. Pen C §1065.

IV. THE VOIR DIRE PROCESS

§29.12 A. Purpose of Voir Dire

Individual jurors are questioned before a jury is selected and sworn to try a case. The purpose of this process, known as voir dire, is to aid the attorneys in deciding whether to challenge a juror for cause and examination of prospective jurors is limited to matters that will assist counsel in making that determination. See CCP §223. A challenge for cause may be based on the juror's general disqualification, implied bias, or actual bias. CCP §225(b)(1); see §§29.21-29.26 (challenging juror for cause).

The court must conduct the initial examination of the prospective jurors orally or by written questionnaire, or by both methods. Judicial Council Form MC-002, Juror Questionnaire for Criminal Cases, may be used for this purpose. Cal Rules of Ct 4.201. After an initial examination of the prospective jurors by the court, counsel for each party has the right to conduct his or her own voir dire. Judges exercise wide discretion in controlling the jury selection process. CCP §223; Cal Rules of Ct 4.201.

Ø Practice tip: During voir dire, counsel should not tell jurors that the purpose of voir dire is to "get answers from the prospective jurors to select a fair and impartial jury." That statement is not true; jurors know that a jury trial is an adversarial process and that jury selection is part of this process. To preserve trust, the author suggests this approach:

I will be asking some questions so that I can fully represent my client. Some of these questions will relate to some private and sensitive matters. I am not here to embarrass you. I have worked it out with Judge X that we can go into chambers and you can answer a sensitive question outside the presence of everyone except for the judge, attorneys, and court staff. So tell me if you wish to go private. And if I see, from your body language, that you may be apprehensive or anxious because of any question that is asked, then I'll ask you: "Do you want to go private?

Ø Practice tip: The author also recommends that counsel have the defendant, during in limine motions, make a waiver on the record of his or her right to be present during in-chambers voir dire, because experience has taught that jurors feel more comfortable and hence are more predisposed to disclose outside the presence of the defendant.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.13 B. Selection of Prospective Jurors From Master List

When the jury commissioner has provided the court with a listing of the trial jury panel in random order, the court must seat prospective jurors for voir dire in the order provided by the panel list. CCP §222(b). Otherwise, the clerk randomly selects the names of the potential jurors for voir dire until the jury is selected or the panel is exhausted. CCP §222(a).

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.14 C. Number of Jurors

The defense and prosecution are each entitled to a jury composed of 12 persons. See Cal Const art I, §16; CCP §220. If both waive that right, a jury may be composed of as few as six jurors, even in a felony case. See Ballew v Georgia (1978) 435 US 223, 245, 55 L Ed 2d 234, 250, 98 S Ct 1029; People v Trejo (1990) 217 CA3d 1026, 266 CR 266.

§29.15 D. Order of Questioning and Challenges

Order of questioning. There are three methods of initially selecting jurors for questioning: the "jury box" method, the "six-pack" method, and the "struck juror" method. Some California judges use the jury box method of selecting jurors. Under this system, 12 prospective jurors are seated in the jury box, and challenges are made to those 12 in the order described below. As prospective jurors are excused, replacements are called. See People v Wright (1990) 52 C3d 367, 395, 276 CR 731.

The most common method of voir dire in California is the "six-pack" method of jury selection. Under this system, 18 prospective jurors are called. Twelve sit in the jury box, and the remaining six are seated in temporary chairs in front of the jury box. The court and counsel then examine all 18 prospective jurors. When jurors seated in the jury box are excused, they are immediately replaced by the prospective jurors in the six temporary seats, in the sequence they are seated. No additional questioning is permitted. Challenges continue until all six of the temporary seats are vacated. At that point, the clerk calls six additional names from the panel to fill the six seats. These six additional prospective jurors are then examined by court and counsel. If alternates are required, the desired number of prospective jurors remaining in the temporary seats will serve as the alternates, subject to the exercise of peremptory challenges. The six-pack method has the advantage of faster jury selection. Also, when one of the 12 jurors in the jury box is excused, the attorneys know in advance which prospective juror will move from one of the six temporary seats into the jury box. The disadvantage is that it often results in less thorough and individualized voir dire. The six-pack method is frequently modified, according to the size of the trial courtroom, so that the court and counsel voir dire a panel consisting of up to 22 jurors. As someone from positions 1-12 is excused, the next seat in order fills that position until the total number of seats is used. Trial judges find that a "modified six-pack" method saves time in jury selection.

A third, infrequently used manner of jury selection is known as the "struck juror" method, which is permitted with the consent of the parties. See People v Visciotti (1992) 2 C4th 1, 38, 5 CR2d 495. The supreme court has criticized deviation from the statutorily prescribed procedure, but refused to reverse a case in which the struck-juror method was used over defense objection, owing to lack of prejudice shown in that case. People v Wright (1990) 52 C3d 367, 398, 276 CR 731. Despite criticism, the struck-juror system has been held to be constitutional, as long as its actual use meets constitutional standards. JEB v Alabama ex rel TB (1994) 511 US 127, 144, 128 L Ed 2d 89, 114 S Ct 1419.

In the struck system, prospective jurors fill out questionnaires and are individually questioned and challenged for cause. Next, they are randomly assigned numbers establishing the order in which they will be further questioned and called to sit as jurors. They are then questioned in groups and subjected to challenges for cause. Finally, the remaining prospective jurors are seated in the jury box in the previously assigned order, and the parties exercise their peremptory challenges.

> Ø Note: In the struck-juror system, a waiver of a peremptory strike (like the exercise of a peremptory strike in the jury box or six-pack method) may form the basis of a Batson challenge. See U.S. v Esparza-Gonzalez (9th Cir 2005) 422 F3d 897.

Order of challenges. The first challenge for cause to a prospective juror is made by the defense. CCP §226(d). Challenges for cause must be taken in the following order: (1) to the panel, (2) to an individual juror for a general disqualification, (3) to an individual juror for an implied bias, and (4) to an individual juror for an actual bias. CCP §227.

Each party is entitled to have a full panel before exercising any peremptory challenge. Therefore, no peremptory challenges are exercised until after the challenges for cause are heard or passed. Then, the prosecution has the first peremptory challenge and the peremptory challenges are taken by each side alternately. Once a peremptory challenge is exercised, a new prospective juror is seated and is subject to challenge for cause. The seat will continue to be filled by new prospective jurors until no challenge for cause is successful, at which point the peremptory challenges begin anew. A side may pass on exercise of a peremptory challenge without diminishing the number of peremptory challenges remaining with it. When each side passes consecutively, the jury will be sworn unless the court, for good cause, orders otherwise. CCP §231(d)-(e).

Ø Note: Counsel should also be aware of the "70-percent rule." Because most judges use the six-pack method, which may involve up to 22 seats, it is prudent to stop using peremptory challenges after using 70 percent of the available peremptories, particularly when the opposition has used only a few of its peremptory challenges. This is because counsel knows which prospective jurors are next in a six-pack method of voir dire, and the opposition can fill the panel with jurors it perceives as harmful to you.

In multiple-defendant cases, codefendants should exercise joint challenges first, followed by individual challenges. See CCP §231(a).

Ø Note: It is necessary to keep track of information about jurors, and to keep a history of which jurors are excused and for what reason, e.g., in case counsel wishes to make a Batson-Wheeler challenge. A sample jury selection chart for this purpose is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §29.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

§29.16 E. Areas of Examination Concerning Challenges

The following areas are often fertile ground for gleaning information from prospective jurors that may lead to a challenge for cause (see CCP §223):

- Familial or social relationships to law enforcement or criminal justice personnel;
- Attitudes about law enforcement, the police, the courts, or the criminal justice system;
- Attitudes and fears about crime, or about having been a crime victim or a friend or relation of a crime victim;
- Knowledge or opinions about the case, or familiarity with the victim, the victim's family, the defendant, or the defendant's family;
- Whether the juror has formed an opinion about the guilt or innocence of the defendant;
- Whether the juror will be able to follow the judge's instructions, even if the juror may personally disagree with the specific instructions;
- Opinions about alternative lifestyles or organizations;
- Publicity concerning the case;
- Attitudes about the exercise of the right not to testify;
- Knowledge of the defendant's criminal record or other extraneous matters; and
- Any potential health problems or pressing business that might impair the juror's ability to concentrate and deliberate.

Ø Practice tip: When conducting voir dire in a search for grounds to challenge a juror for cause, counsel should "push the envelope" with his or her questions. If opposing counsel objects, or the judge has concerns, counsel should argue that the questioning is relevant to a challenge for cause and not a fishing expedition for peremptory challenges. Although the trial judge has broad discretion in the conduct of voir dire (see CCP §222.5), when counsel specifically articulates the reason why the questions are relevant to an intelligent challenge for cause, making a detailed record, then the likelihood of a favorable result on appeal is enhanced. See People v Rigney (1961) 55 C2d 236, 244, 10 CR 625; People v Hinshaw (1919) 40 CA 672, 674, 182 P 59.

Even when personal problems such as health issues or pressing business are insufficient to justify a challenge for cause, the court has the authority to excuse a person from jury service for undue hardship. CCP §204(b)).

In Three Strikes cases, voir dire about jurors' views regarding the strikes law is not allowed. People v Cardenas (1997) 53 CA4th 240, 246, 61 CR2d 583. Nor is voir dire allowed on any other topic pertaining to possible sentences. Shannon v U.S. (1994) 512 US 573, 579, 129 L Ed 2d 459, 467, 114 S Ct 2419. In death penalty cases, however, jurors will be asked "death qualified" questions. See §§54.25-54.29 on jury selection in death penalty cases.

§29.17 F. Attorney's Right to Examine Jurors; Jury Questionnaires

Right to examine jurors. After an initial examination of the prospective jurors by the court conducted orally, by written questionnaire, or by both methods, counsel for each party has the right to conduct voir dire. CCP §223; Cal Rules of Ct 4.201.

The court, in its discretion, may limit the time for questioning of individual jurors, or the court may specify an aggregate amount of time for each party. In all criminal cases, voir dire of prospective jurors must, when practicable, occur in the presence of other jurors. Examination of prospective jurors must be conducted only in aid of the exercise of challenges for cause. CCP §223.

The trial court has great discretion to control the manner in which voir dire, and the court's exercise of that discretion, is not cause for reversal unless it results in a miscarriage of justice. CCP §223.

Jury questionnaires. The court and counsel may agree to have jurors respond to a questionnaire before voir dire. Judicial Council Form MC-002, Juror Questionnaire for Criminal Cases, may be used for this purpose. Cal Rules of Ct 4.201. Questionnaires can streamline voir dire by eliminating the need to spend time obtaining basic demographic information and by disclosing attitudes that may point to a bias. Questionnaires also provide a written record so that counsel does not have to write down or remember the information in the questionnaire.

Questionnaires are particularly helpful when counsel wishes to learn information about jurors that might be embarrassing if brought out in open court. However, even when a questionnaire is used, the judge must advise the jurors that they may request a hearing in chambers rather than answer a sensitive question in writing. See Advisory Committee Comment to Cal Rules of Ct 4.201.

See the sample jury questionnaires in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §29.2 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005); National Jury Project, Jurywork: Systematic Techniques, chap 3 (2005). The trial court has ultimate authority over the contents of any questionnaires. See People v Navarette (2003) 30 C4th 458, 486, 133 CR2d 89 (trial court did not err in striking portions of 31-page questionnaire; note that oral voir dire was also permitted).

> Ø Practice tip: If defense counsel and the prosecutor cooperate in devising the questionnaire, during in limine motions any areas of disagreement can be highlighted for the trial judge. Ultimately, the trial judge will determine what the final content of the questionnaire will be, and the judge will be happy if this task is not so time-consuming because the attorneys worked together.

A questionnaire may not substitute for voir dire. See, e.g., People v Stewart (2004) 33 C4th 425, 441, 15 CR3d 656 (trial court erred in excusing five prospective jurors for cause (over defense objection) solely on the basis of their checked responses and written answers in a jury questionnaire). It is not necessarily an abuse of discretion, however, to excuse prospective jurors solely on the basis of questionnaire responses when the defense and prosecution mutually agree to do so. See People v Benavides (2005) 35 C4th 69, 88, 24 CR3d 507.

> Ø Practice tip: As a tactical matter, when counsel believes a juror should be disqualified for cause and it is reasonably foreseeable that opposing counsel will also want that juror excused, the mutual agreement of counsel to excuse the juror can prevent wasting a peremptory challenge.

IAC and prosecutorial misconduct during voir dire. Defense attorney errors during voir dire, such as forgetting the number of peremptory challenges left or failing to challenge a juror for cause, should be avoided by trial attorneys, but are generally not considered cause for reversal based on ineffective assistance of counsel (IAC). See, e.g., People v Freeman (1994) 8 C4th 450, 485, 34 CR2d 558 (exercising only 15 of possible 26 peremptory challenges not IAC); People v McPeters (1992) 2 C4th 1148, 1177, 9 CR2d 834, disapproved on other grounds in Verdin v Superior Court (2008) 43 C4th 1096, 1106, 77 CR3d 287 (losing count of peremptory challenges not IAC); People v Lloyd (1992) 4 CA4th 724, 734, 6 CR2d 105 (failure to challenge juror who had been victim of auto theft not prima facie IAC). Prosecutorial misconduct can also occur during voir dire, but the trial court has broad discretion in allowing prosecution voir dire. See People v Ochoa (2001) 26 C4th 398, 428, 110 CR2d 324; People v Muhammad (2003) 108 CA4th 313,

Voir dire must be conducted in the courtroom, in the presence of other jurors, when "practicable." CCP §223. See Press-Enterprise Co. v Superior Court (1984) 464 US 501, 510, 78 L Ed 2d 629, 639, 104 S Ct 819 (disapproving routine exclusion of press and public during voir dire). The court does have discretion to permit individual voir dire or voir dire closed to the press and public ("sequestered" voir dire) in appropriate circumstances. See People v Visciotti (1992) 2 C4th 1, 50, 5 CR2d 495; Advisory Committee Comment to Cal Rules of Ct 4.201. A request for individual or sequestered voir dire should be made by motion. See People v Visciotti, supra. Refusal to grant a motion for sequestered voir dire is subject to reversal only for an abuse of discretion that results in a miscarriage of justice. CCP §223.

On individual and sequestered voir dire in capital cases, see §54.25. On closing voir dire to the press and the public generally, see §§14.14, 14.29.

> Ø Practice tip: Having made the tactical decision not to use "hot-button voir dire" (see §29.47), counsel may move in limine to have the court allow "private" voir dire of prospective jurors who do not wish to answer certain sensitive questions in front of the other jurors. The defendant's waiver of the right to be present during "private" voir dire in chambers results in more disclosure by the prospective juror. Therefore, once the defendant has waived that right, the venire should be told during introductory remarks that counsel will ask some "private" questions to properly represent the defendant, but a juror who doesn't want to answer any question may raise his or her hand. Counsel should then explain that the voir dire then will occur in the judge's chambers outside the presence of the other jurors. Counsel should also advise the venire that if he or she sees any body language consistent with apprehension with any of the questions, he or she will ask, "Do you want to go private?" Over the years, the author has heard much disclosure in chambers relating to jurors' experiences of rape, robbery, torture, child molestation, vicious domestic violence, and other horrific things they—or someone close to them—experienced. Since all of us see the world through the prism of our experience, it is of paramount importance to get prospective jurors to disclose key experiences that could bias them against the defendant.

Using private voir dire permits the juror to disclose with less embarrassment, protects the defendant by achieving the disclosure in terms of counsel's calculus in selecting and de-selecting the jury, and can result in counsel's immediate follow-up questions of the juror in chambers, leading to the granting of a cause challenge. Following disclosure in "private" voir dire, the author frequently feels a consensus has been reached between himself, the trial judge, and prosecutor that a juror should be excused for cause.

Pretrial. Trial judges have discretion to permit the defense access to jury records and reports of juror investigations prepared by the prosecution. People v Murtishaw (1981) 29 C3d 733, 767, 175 CR 738 ("[w]hen courts then deny defendants who cannot afford similar investigations access to the prosecutor's records, the result is that prosecutors in case after case will have substantially more information concerning prospective jurors than do defense counsel"). See also People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 227, 10 CR2d 636 (no relief because inadequate record of what prosecution had).

Ø Note: Counsel may be able to obtain information from the registrar of voters on the political parties of prospective jurors.

Both the defense and the prosecution may obtain indications about the attitudes of prospective jurors about a case by conducting community case analysis interviews, attitudinal surveys, and trial simulations. See National Jury Project, Jurywork: Systematic Techniques, chap 9 (2005). Well-constructed jury questionnaires can also shed light on jurors' attitudes toward a case. See Jurywork, chap 11.

Postconviction. The court must seal juror identifying information following a criminal proceeding, subject to a motion that shows good cause for disclosure. CCP §237. See also §§12.21, 34.5. Providing such information to a defendant is a misdemeanor. Pen C §95.2.

§29.20 I. Selecting Alternates

The number of alternate jurors and the procedure for selecting them will be addressed by the court in the mandatory pre-voir dire conference. Cal Rules of Ct 4.200(a)(7). A trial judge may order selection of one or more alternate jurors if the judge believes the trial will be protracted. Pen C §1089. Selection of alternate jurors takes place immediately after the panel is sworn and is conducted in the same manner as selection of regular jurors. Pen C §1089; see People v Thomas (1994) 26 CA4th 1328, 1333, 32 CR2d 177. On challenges for cause, see §§29.21-29.26; on peremptory challenges, see §§29.27-29.37.

Ø Practice tip: In a lengthy trial, e.g., over 3 weeks, counsel should consider asking the trial judge during pretrial motions for three to five alternate jurors.

Each side is given one peremptory challenge for every alternate to be chosen. When two or more defendants are tried jointly, each defendant is given one peremptory challenge for every alternate to be chosen, to be exercised according to his or her individual discretion. The prosecution is entitled to the total number of peremptory challenges allowed all defendants. These challenges may be accumulated in the same manner as when selecting the first 12 jurors. Pen C §1089. See §29.15.

A trial court does not have the authority to reopen jury selection after a jury has been sworn. People v Cottle (2006) 39 C4th 246, 255, 46 CR3d 86. See CCP §226(a). The trial court is not "without recourse" if a juror becomes "unable" to serve: CCP §§233 and 234 and Pen C §1089 permit removal of a juror for good cause. People v Cottle, supra.

V. CHALLENGING INDIVIDUAL JURORS FOR CAUSE

§29.21 A. No Limit on Number of Challenges for Cause

Although the number of peremptory challenges counsel may exercise is limited by statute (see CCP §231, discussed in §29.28), there is no limit to the number of challenges for cause that counsel can make. Counsel should challenge a juror for cause as soon as counsel believes a basis for challenge has been established.

Challenges to an individual juror for cause are taken first by the defendant, and then by the prosecution. CCP §226(d); see §29.15.

© The Regents of the University of California

B. Grounds for Challenge for Cause

§29.22 1. General Disqualification

A general challenge for cause may be made by either party on the ground that a juror is disqualified from serving in a particular case. CCP §228(a). A prospective juror is subject to a general challenge for cause if he or she (CCP §203):

- Is not a citizen of the United States;
- Is less than 18 years of age;
- Does not live in California (see Elec C §§2020-2035);
- Is not a resident of the jurisdiction in which the case is being tried;
- Does not speak English well enough to understand the proceedings;
- Has a disability (e.g., loss of hearing or sight, or impaired mobility or ability to communicate), if the disability is the sole cause of the disqualification;
- Is simultaneously serving as a grand or trial juror in any court of this state;
- Is the subject of a conservatorship; or
- Has been convicted of a felony or of malfeasance in office, and has not his or her civil rights restored.

The jury commissioner screens prospective jurors for grounds for general disqualification before compiling the qualified-juror list. See CCP §205. Therefore, attorneys usually do not question individual jurors about these requirements.

Although a juror is not subject to general disqualification solely because of a disability (CCP §203(a)(6)), an "incapacity" that makes an individual incapable of performing the duties of a juror without prejudicing the substantial rights of the challenging party provides a ground for a challenge for cause. CCP §228(b).

The court must provide auxiliary services, i.e., a sign language interpreter, oral interpreter, or deaf-blind interpreter, for disabled persons who are not challenged. CCP §224. It might be argued that the Americans with Disabilities Act requires the court to deny a challenge for cause made under CCP §228(b) if the court determines that the disabled prospective juror could adequately perform juror duties if a reasonable accommodation were made for the prospective juror's disability.

Ø Note: Hearing-impaired persons, and probably those with other disabilities, are not a "distinctive" group within the community for purposes of a fair cross-section challenge. People v Fauber (1992) 2 C4th 792, 816, 9 CR2d 24. See discussion in §§29.9-29.10.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.23 2. Implied Bias

Either party may challenge a particular juror for cause on the ground of implied bias. CCP §§225(b)(1)(B), 229. Implied bias exists if a prospective juror falls into any of the categories specified in CCP §229. Under §229, bias will be implied if a prospective juror:

- Is related within the fourth degree to a party, an officer of a corporation that is a party, a witness, or the alleged victim;
- Is a guardian or ward, conservator or conservatee, master or servant, employer or clerk, landlord or tenant, principal or agent, or debtor or creditor of a party, or an officer of a corporation that is a party;
- Is the parent, spouse, or child of a guardian or ward, conservator or conservatee, master or servant, employer or clerk, landlord or tenant, principal or agent, or debtor or creditor of a party, or an officer of a corporation that is a party;
- Is a member of the family of a party;
- Holds bonds or shares of capital stock of a corporation that is a party;
- Within 1 year before the filing of the complaint, has had an attorney-client relationship with a party or with the attorney for a party (see People v Terry (1994) 30 CA4th 97, 100, 35 CR2d 729);
- Has been a trial or grand juror or witness in a previous or pending trial involving the parties to the current action, or the same specific offense or cause of action;
- Has, within 1 year, been a trial or grand juror in any action in which either party to the current action was a party or in which either party to the current action was a criminal defendant;
- Has any interest in the action other than his or her interest as a citizen or taxpayer;
- Has an unqualified opinion or belief on the merits of the action based on knowledge of the facts;
- Is biased for or against either party;
- Is a party to an action pending in the court for which he or she is drawn, that is set for trial before the panel of which the juror is a member; or
- In a death penalty case, has conscientious opinions that would preclude the juror finding the defendant guilty. See People v Crittenden (1994) 9 C4th 83, 120, 36 CR2d 474; People v Rodrigues (1994) 8 C4th 1060, 1146, 36 CR2d 235.

When implied bias is shown, no further proof of prejudice is required; it is inferred as a matter of law. People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 274, 148 CR 890 (decided under former CCP §1074; now see CCP §229).

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.24 3. Actual Bias

Either party may challenge a particular juror for cause on the ground of actual bias. Actual bias is defined as "the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror in reference to the case, or to any of the parties, which will prevent the juror from acting with entire impartiality, and without prejudice to the substantial rights of any party." CCP §225(b)(1)(C).

A juror may be disqualified for actual bias in the following situations:

- The juror states that it would be difficult to keep an open mind because of the nature of the case. People v Compton (1971) 6 C3d 55, 59, 98 CR 217.
- The juror admits bias for or against a group involved in the case. People v Buyle (1937) 22 CA2d 143, 145, 70 P2d 955.
- The juror admits having settled opinions about issues in the case. People v Williams (1988) 199 CA3d 469, 476, 245 CR 61; People v Sullivan (1922) 59 CA 633, 634, 211 P 467.
- The juror cannot assure the court that he or she would decide the case by reference exclusively to the law and the evidence, or admits that there is a significant likelihood that extraneous matters will enter into the decision-making process. People v Hecker (1990) 219 CA3d 1238, 1242, 268 CR 884; see, e.g., Merced v McGrath (2005) 426 F3d 1076 (jury nullification).

Ø Note: The mere fact that a juror does not wish to sit on a particular kind of case because it would be too emotional does not justify excusing the juror for cause on the ground of actual bias. People v Sanchez (1989) 208 CA3d 721, 732, 256 CR 446.

- The juror has an opinion on the defendant's guilt or innocence. People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 265, 148 CR 890.

Ø Note: If a sufficient number of jurors have read or seen prejudicial publicity about a case, counsel may be able to obtain a change of venue. See chap 15.

Ø Practice tip: When making a record of why a particular juror should be excused for cause, it is very important to articulate the body language communicated by that juror, because words alone do not adequately convey the potential juror's bias. For example, a record may be made as follows: "Your Honor, when I asked juror number 3 if she thinks she can give my client a fair trial even though he looks like the man that held her up at gunpoint when she worked at a convenience store in college, you saw her pause about 5 seconds in her response to my question, and you also saw that she was starting to cry and was very uncomfortable. My client is charged with strong armed robbery in facts similar to the experience juror number 3 suffered 21 years ago. Her words mask her actual prejudice, Your Honor, and from the totality of circumstances, she has actual bias and thus must be excused for cause—so my client may receive a fair trial."

§29.25 C. Trial of Challenge to Individual Juror for Cause

Challenges for cause are tried by the court. The juror and anyone else may be examined as a witness. CCP §230. The Evidence Code applies. See Evid C §300. The decision to seat jurors challenged for cause is within the court's discretion and is seldom disturbed on appeal. People v Kelly (1992) 1 C4th 495, 519, 3 CR2d 677; People v Kaurish (1990) 52 C3d 648, 675, 276 CR 788; People v Bittaker (1989) 48 C3d 1046, 1087, 259 CR 630. See §29.26 on how to proceed if a challenge for cause is denied.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.26 D. Preserving Right to Review of Trial Court's Ruling on Challenge for Cause

Review of denial of challenge. If the court disallows counsel's challenge for cause, counsel should exercise a peremptory challenge as to that juror. To preserve the issue of an erroneous denial of a challenge for cause for appeal, counsel must exhaust all his or her peremptory challenges and must express dissatisfaction with the jury as constituted. People v Boyette (2002) 29 C4th 381, 419, 127 CR2d 544; People v Hillhouse (2002) 27 C4th 469, 487, 117 CR2d 45. The same rule applies to alternate jurors—counsel must make a timely motion to excuse an alternate for cause and exhaust all peremptory challenges in order to preserve a claim of error in denying a challenge for cause as to that alternate. People v Ramos (1997) 15 C4th 1133, 1159, 64 CR2d 892.

Ø Note: Although instances may occur when counsel is not required to exhaust peremptory challenges (e.g., when the court precludes counsel from asking questions that are important in determining whether jurors are biased), improper restrictions on voir dire are not per se prejudicial. People v Bittaker (1989) 48 C3d 1046, 1086, 259 CR 630. Therefore, counsel should exhaust peremptories in all instances when appellate review of jury selection issues is needed.

However, appeal on this issue is an uphill battle. The reviewing court will probably find no prejudice if the prospective juror who was the subject of the disallowed challenge for cause was peremptorily challenged. See, e.g., People v Boyette (2002) 29 C4th 381, 127 CR2d 544 (failure to excuse juror biased in favor of death penalty was harmless; removal of juror through peremptory challenge meant jury's impartiality not compromised; dissent by Kennard, J); People v Johnson (1992) 3 C4th 1183, 1210, 14 CR2d 702.

Even when counsel has no peremptory challenges left, the error will likely be held nonprejudicial unless trial counsel requests additional peremptory challenges or otherwise expresses dissatisfaction with the jury as presently constituted. People v Stankewitz (1990) 51 C3d 72, 103, 270 CR 817. The court may refuse to grant additional peremptory challenges unless counsel can show that, without such additional challenges, the defendant is reasonably likely to receive an unfair trial before a partial jury. People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 230, 10 CR2d 636.

Review of sustained challenge for cause. Whether a ruling erroneously sustaining a prosecution challenge for cause requires reversal depends on the circumstances. The defendant will be required to show prejudice, because the defendant is not entitled to a particular juror, but only to an impartial jury. People v Parman (1939) 14 C2d 17, 20, 92 P2d 387.

Ø Note: The challenge in Parman was to an all-male jury in a death penalty case, and the court found such a jury permissible. Parman is no longer valid on this point. See People v Howard (1992) 1 C4th 1132, 1158, 5 CR2d 268; Ballard v U.S. (1946) 329 US 187, 193, 91 L Ed 181, 185, 67 S Ct 261 (federal conviction reversed due to deliberate exclusion of women from jury service). VI. PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES

§29.27 A. Definition

A peremptory challenge may be made by either party and is an objection to a juror for which no reason need be given. The court is required to excuse jurors challenged peremptorily. See CCP §231. The prosecution makes its peremptory challenge first; then the sides alternate in making challenges. If both the prosecution and defense counsel pass consecutively, the jury is sworn by the clerk. See CCP §231(d)-(e); see §29.15. The trial judge cannot reopen jury selection for further challenges after the jury has been sworn, even if alternates have not been sworn. People v Cottle (2006) 39 C4th 246, 46 CR3d 86. If a juror is unable to serve, recourse may be taken under CCP §§233-234 or Pen C §1089.

Ø Note: The right to a public trial requires that peremptory challenges be made in open court; any error in this regard is per se reversible. People v Harris (1992) 10 CA4th 672, 682, 12 CR2d 758.

§29.28 B. Number

Offense punishable by maximum of 90 days. If the charged offense is punishable with a maximum term of imprisonment of 90 days or less, each side is entitled to six peremptory challenges. CCP §231(b).

Offense punishable with death or life imprisonment. If the charged offense is punishable with death or with imprisonment in the state prison for life, each side is entitled to 20 peremptory challenges. CCP §231(a). In a prosecution for first degree murder without special circumstances, imprisonment "for a term of 25 years to life" (Pen C §190) constitutes "imprisonment… for life" within the meaning of §231(a), and thus each side is entitled to 20 peremptory challenges. People v Yates (1983) 34 C3d 644, 646, 194 CR 765.

All other cases. In all other cases, each side is entitled to 10 peremptory challenges. CCP §231(a). See People v Brown (1996) 42 CA4th 461, 474, 49 CR2d 652 (no violation of equal protection to impose peremptory limit of 10 challenges when defendant is charged with 20 counts of forcible lewd conduct).

Ø Note: In a commitment proceeding under the Sexually Violent Predator Act, each side is entitled to six peremptory challenges. People v Calhoun (2004) 118 CA4th 519, 523, 13 CR3d 166; see CCP §231(c).

Multiple defendants. If more than one defendant is tried in a case punishable by 90 days or less, the codefendants are entitled to six joint challenges. In addition, each defendant is entitled to four separate peremptory challenges. The prosecution is entitled to as many peremptory challenges as are allowed all defendants. CCP §231(b).

If multiple defendants are charged with the same offense, other than one punishable by 90 days or less, they receive "joint challenges," which must be exercised by mutual agreement in the amount specified by CCP §231(a) (20 challenges for life-in-prison and death cases and 10 challenges in all others). In addition, each defendant is given 5 additional peremptories to be exercised according to his or her individual discretion. The prosecution is entitled to the total number of peremptory challenges allowed all defendants. CCP §231(a).

Alternate jurors. On the number of peremptory challenges available for alternate jurors, see §29.20.

§29.29 C. Questioning in Aid of Peremptory Challenges

Questioning of jurors can only be conducted for the purpose of assessing challenges for cause. CCP §223. Because peremptory challenges are a creature of statute, and are not required by the U.S. Constitution, it is the state's responsibility to define their purpose, and the manner of their exercise. Ross v Oklahoma (1988) 487 US 81, 89, 101 L Ed 2d 80, 90, 108 S Ct 2273.

Ø Practice tip: Although jurors are not subject to questioning for the purpose of exercising a peremptory challenge, questions aimed at uncovering the basis for a challenge for cause will obviously assist counsel in deciding how to exercise their peremptory challenges. For example, if a prospective juror says she has had several bad experiences with the police, the prosecutor can certainly ask questions about those experiences to determine whether a challenge for cause is appropriate. The juror's responses to those questions may well be relevant to determining whether to make a peremptory challenge even if she says she can put those experiences aside and be impartial.

Recommended questions of prospective jurors in criminal cases are set out in Standards of Judicial Administration Title 4, Standard 4.30, and in Juror Questionnaire for Criminal Cases (Judicial Council Form MC-002).

D. Limitations on Use of Peremptory Challenges Under People v Wheeler and Batson v Kentucky

§29.30 1. Systematic Exclusion of Jurors Because of Membership in "Cognizable Group" Prohibited

Peremptory challenges may not be used to systematically exclude jurors because of membership in a cognizable group distinguished by racial, religious, ethnic, or similar characteristics. People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 276, 148 CR 890 (decision based on California Constitution representative cross-section rule); Batson v Kentucky (1986) 476 US 79, 84, 90 L Ed 2d 69, 79, 106 S Ct 1712 (decision based on Equal Protection Clause of Fourteenth Amendment). See also Purkett v Elem (1995) 514 US 765, 131 L Ed 2d 834, 115 S Ct 1769; Georgia v McCollum (1992) 505 US 42, 120 L Ed 2d 33, 112 S Ct 2348; Trevino v Texas (1992) 503 US 562, 118 L Ed 2d 193, 112 S Ct 1547. This principle has been codified in CCP §231.5, which states:

> A party may not use a peremptory challenge to remove a prospective juror on the basis of an assumption that the prospective juror is biased merely because of his or her race, color, religion, sex, national origin, sexual orientation, or similar grounds.

The following are examples of cognizable groups: gays and lesbians (People v Garcia (2000) 77 CA4th 1269, 92 CR2d 339); African-American men (People v Gray (2001) 87 CA4th 781, 788, 104 CR2d 848); Hispanics (People v Harris (1984) 36 C3d 36, 51, 201 CR 782; People v Gonzales (2008) 165 CA4th 620, 631, 81 CR3d 205); and men (People v Williams (2000) 78 CA4th 1118, 1125, 93 CR2d 356). In contrast, "people of color" (People v Davis (2009) 46 C4th 539, 583, 94 CR3d 322; People v Neuman (2009) 176 CA4th 571, 578, 97 CR3d 715); Caucasians with Spanish surnames (People v Cruz (2008) 44 C4th 636, 656, 80 CR3d 126); persons with "low incomes" (People v Burgener (2003) 29 C4th 833, 856, 129 CR2d 747; People v Johnson (1989) 47 C3d 1194, 1214, 255 CR 569); people over 70 (People v McCoy (1995) 40 CA4th 778, 783, 47 CR2d 599); and "young people" (People v Marbley (1986) 181 CA3d 45, 47, 225 CR 918) are not members of a cognizable group.

> Ø Note: In the struck-juror system, a waiver of a peremptory strike (like the exercise of a peremptory strike in an alternate-juror system) may also not be used to systematically exclude jurors for their membership in one of the aforementioned cognizable groups. U.S. v Esparza-Gonzalez (9th Cir 2005) 422 F3d 897, 902.

The Batson-Wheeler rule applies to both the defense and the prosecution. Georgia v McCollum (1992) 505 US 42, 59, 120 L Ed 2d 33, 51, 112 S Ct 2348; People v Willis (2002) 27 C4th 811, 118 CR2d 301. A party may challenge systematic exclusion of a juror who is a member of a cognizable group even though the party is not a member of that group. People v Farnam (2002) 28 C4th 107, 135, 121 CR2d 106; People v Wheeler, supra; Powers v Ohio (1991) 499 US 400, 402, 113 L Ed 2d 411, 419, 111 S Ct 1364. The judge may initiate Batson-Wheeler proceedings on his or her own motion. People v Lopez (1991) 3 CA4th Supp 11, 15, 5 CR2d 775.

> Ø Warning: The systematic exclusion of members of a cognizable group is error under both state and federal constitutions, and consequently, the prosecutor's unconstitutional use of peremptory challenges presents a claim cognizable on federal habeas corpus. Because of the federal habeas rules on exhaustion of state remedies (see §45.23) and procedural default (see §45.24), when making a motion challenging the prosecutor's improper removal of prospective jurors, defense counsel should state explicitly that it is made under both Batson and Wheeler. See Baldwin v Reese (2004) 541 US 27, 158 L Ed 2d 64, 124 S Ct 1347.

§29.31 2. Procedural Aspects of Batson-Wheeler Motion

The court will address the procedure for making Batson-Wheeler objections as part of the mandatory pre-voir dire conference. Cal Rules of Ct 4.200(a)(8). To be timely, a Batson-Wheeler motion must be made during jury selection. People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 280, 148 CR 890. See People v Perez (1996) 48 CA4th 1310, 1314, 56 CR2d 299 (motion untimely if made after jury sworn).

There are three recognized steps to the motion. First, the side asserting the improper use of peremptory challenges must state a prima facie case of systematic exclusion. Batson v Kentucky (1986) 476 US 79, 93, 90 L Ed 2d 69, 85, 106 S Ct 1712; People v Wheeler, supra. See §29.32. If a prima facie case is made, the burden shifts to the other party to show that there were reasons for exercising the challenges other than the systematic exclusion of members of a cognizable group. Wheeler, 22 C3d at 281; Batson, 476 US at 97, 90 L Ed 2d at 88. See §29.34. In the third step, the trial court decides whether purposeful discrimination has been shown. Snyder v Louisiana (2008) 552 US 472, 170 L Ed 2d 175, 180, 128 S Ct 1203. See §29.35. The ultimate burden of persuasion remains on the party alleging systematic exclusion. Batson, 476 US at 93, 90 L Ed 2d at 85. See also Purkett v Elem (1995) 514 US 765, 768, 131 L Ed 2d 834, 839, 115 S Ct 1769. The burden on that party is to establish purposeful discrimination by a preponderance of the evidence. People v Hutchins (2007) 147 CA4th 992, 998, 55 CR3d 105.

To ensure against undue prejudice to the party unsuccessfully making a peremptory challenge or challenge for cause, the trial court may use a sidebar conference followed by appropriate disclosure in open court as to successful challenges. People v Willis (2002) 27 C4th 811, 821, 118 CR2d 301; see People v Williams (1994) 26 CA4th Supp 1, 7, 31 CR2d 769. Because requiring all challenges to be made at a sidebar may be unduly burdensome, the trial court has the discretion to develop appropriate procedures such as limiting sidebars to situations in which a Wheeler objection has been made to a particular challenge. People v Willis (2002) 27 C4th 811, 821, 118 CR2d 301.

§29.32 a. Making a Prima Facie Case

It is presumed that peremptory challenges are exercised in a constitutional manner. People v Alvarez (1996) 14 C4th 155, 193, 58 CR2d 385. Therefore, the party claiming that the opponent is improperly using peremptory challenges bears the burden at the outset to make a prima facie case of systematic exclusion. To meet this burden, the objecting party must:

- Establish that the persons excluded are members of a cognizable group under the Equal Protection Clause or the representative cross-section rule (on cognizable groups, see §29.30); and
- Point to circumstances supporting a reasonable inference that such persons are being challenged because of their membership in the group, rather than because of any specific bias.

People v Box (2000) 23 C4th 1153, 1188, 99 CR2d 69; People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 167, 32 CR2d 762; Wade v Terhune (9th Cir 2000) 202 F3d 1190, 1195.

Counsel should make as complete a record of the circumstances as is feasible. Simply pointing out that the opposing party has struck several prospective jurors who are members of a cognizable group is seldom sufficient. See People v Walker (1998) 64 CA4th 1062, 1069, 75 CR2d 871, for a list of cases finding no prima facie showing.

Ø Examples: To strengthen the inference of systematic exclusion, it might be possible to show that the party has excused members of a cognizable group who have traits often viewed favorable to that party (e.g., that the prosecutor has struck black jurors who have favorable attitudes toward the police) or that membership in a cognizable group was the only discernible difference between jurors the party excused and jurors the party passed.

Under Batson v Kentucky (1986) 476 US 79, 93, 90 L Ed 2d 69, 85, 106 S Ct 1712, a prima facie showing is one that supports a "reasonable inference" of systematic exclusion of a cognizable group. The U.S. Supreme Court has specifically rejected a requirement that the objecting party show either a "strong likelihood" or that it is "more likely than not" that the other party's peremptory challenges, if unexplained, were based on impermissible group bias. Johnson v California (2005) 545 US 162, 162 L Ed 2d 129, 125 S Ct 2410.

Lay groundwork for comparative analysis. Counsel who suspects that the opponent is systematically excluding prospective jurors who are members of a cognizable group should pay close attention to the similarities and differences between jurors who have been struck and jurors who have been retained. Suppose, for example, the prosecutor uses a peremptory challenge to excuse an African-American woman who said she would get too upset listening to the evidence, but does not excuse a Caucasian woman who asks to be excused for the same reason. Such comparisons may be used to strengthen the inference that the juror who was the member of the cognizable group was excused in violation of Batson-Wheeler. See Miller-El v Cockrell (2003) 537 US 322, 332, 154 L Ed 2d 931, 947, 123 S Ct 1029. Evidence of comparative juror analysis must be considered by the trial court in making its determination at the third step of the motion. People v Lenix (2008) 44 C4th 602, 622, 80 CR3d 98.

Ø Practice tip: To preserve both state and federal issues for appellate purposes, defense counsel should make the record as specific as possible concerning impermissible group bias in the exercise of peremptory challenges by the prosecution. Prosecutorial practices designed to exclude groups of people on the basis of race under the pretense of other legally valid reasons are disdained. See Johnson v California (2005) 545 US 162, 162 L Ed 2d 129, 125 S Ct 2410; Miller-El v Dretke (2005) 545 US 231, 162 L Ed 2d 196, 125 S Ct 2317. Defense counsel's duty is to make a detailed record, outside the presence of the jury, that shows that the reasons given by the prosecution are not valid. When making the record, defense counsel should ask questions of the trial judge if counsel believes that the court may have "glossed over" some issues about why or why not the reasons for the prosecutor's decision to exercise a peremptory challenge are valid. For example, counsel might ask, "Your honor, why does the court conclude X about juror Jones when jurors Smith and Williams had the same response, and the prosecutor didn't excuse them?"

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.33 b. Trial Court's Response

When a defense attorney has made a prima facie case that one particular juror was challenged because of impermissible group bias, the trial court is not required to ask a prosecutor to justify all other challenges to other potential jurors in the same group. People v Avila (2006) 38 C4th 491, 549, 43 CR3d 1. If the trial court concludes that the objecting party has made out a prima facie case of systematic exclusion of members of a cognizable class, the opponent is given the opportunity to rebut the inference. If the trial court concludes that the circumstances do not support the inference, there is no need for the opposing party to respond, but in practice, trial courts often request a response before ruling on the prima facie case. This practice has been endorsed by the appellate courts. People v Howard (2008) 42 C4th 1000, 1020, 71 CR3d 264; People v Bonilla (2007) 41 C4th 313, 343 n13, 60 CR3d 209. For example, in People v Gray (2001) 87 CA4th 781, 788, 104 CR2d 848*,* the court explained:

> Even when it appears to the trial court that the defense has failed to present a prima facie case of prosecutor bias in selection of the jury, the court should hear the prosecutor's explanation for excusing the jurors in question. By permitting the prosecutor to make a record, the trial court enables the Court of Appeal to determine whether the prosecutor possessed any legitimate, nonsuspect reasons for excusing the jurors in question.

When the trial court solicits an explanation of the questioned peremptory challenges without first indicating its views on the prima facie issue, the appellate court may infer that the trial court made an implied prima facie finding. People v Arias (1996) 13 C4th 92, 135, 51 CR2d 770. When, however, the court finds that the movant has not made out a prima facie case but nevertheless asks counsel to justify peremptory challenges, the appellate court is not required to review the adequacy of counsel's justifications. People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 167, 32 CR2d 762.

A trial court's finding of a prima facie showing for one Batson-Wheeler motion does not mean that all subsequent challenges to members of that juror group are to be presumed improper. People v Irvin (1996) 46 CA4th 1340, 1351, 54 CR2d 450.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.34 c. Responding Party

Once a prima facie case has been shown, the burden shifts to the other party to rebut the claim by neutral reasons for the peremptory challenge or challenges. Purkett v Elem (1995) 514 US 765, 768, 131 L Ed 2d 834, 839, 115 S Ct 1769; People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 164, 32 CR2d 762; People v Clair (1992) 2 C4th 629, 652, 7 CR2d 564; People v Johnson (1989) 47 C3d 1194, 1216, 255 CR 569.

These reasons may be subjective. Hunches (see People v Hall (1983) 35 C3d 161, 170, 197 CR 71), the prospective juror's "body language," mode of answering questions, or lack of life experience, as long as they are not pretexts for systematic exclusion for members of a cognizable group, may be acceptable reasons for excusing jurors and can be used to rebut the inference of systematic exclusion. People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 164, 32 CR2d 762; People v Gray (2001) 87 CA4th 781, 788, 104 CR2d 848; People v Perez (1994) 29 CA4th 1313, 1328, 35 CR2d 103.

Ø Note: Counsel must consider that any pretextual reason offered for striking a juror may raise an inference that other proffered rationales are also "make-weight." See, e.g., Ali v Hickman (9th Cir 2009) 584 F3d 1174, 1184.

For example, California appellate courts have found the exercise of a peremptory challenge to be valid when based on the prospective juror's:

- Views about the death penalty in a capital case (People v McDermott (2002) 28 C4th 946, 969, 123 CR2d 654);
- Views that illicit drugs should be legalized combined with ambivalent or noncommittal responses to questions on whether those views might affect the juror's view of the case (People v Adanandus (2007) 157 CA4th 496, 510, 69 CR3d 25);
- Relative with a criminal conviction (People v Cummings (1993) 4 C4th 1233, 1282, 18 CR2d 796; People v Adanandus (2007) 157 CA4th 496, 509, 69 CR3d 25);
- Bad feelings against the police (People v Johnson (1989) 47 C3d 1194, 1215, 255 CR 569);
- Skepticism about the fairness of the criminal justice system (People v Calvin (2008) 159 CA4th 1377, 1386, 72 CR3d 300);
- Apparent agreement with defense counsel's questions, leading prosecutor to conclude he might be skeptical of the People's evidence (People v Johnson, supra);
- Indication that the prospective juror would place undue reliance on expert witness opinion (People v Gutierrez (2002) 28 C4th 1083, 1124, 124 CR2d 373);
- Apparent inability to focus on the evidence (People v Gutierrez, supra);
- Being overwhelmed by outside stress (People v Gutierrez, supra (prospective juror cried twice during voir dire and referred to her "nerves"));
- Bias against a victim or witness (28 C4th at 1125 (prospective juror stated he felt transsexuals were "sick human beings"));
- Hostile looks (People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 275, 148 CR 890);
- Intransigence in refusing to be influenced by anyone else's opinion (People v Davenport (1995) 11 C4th 1171, 1203, 47 CR2d 800);
- Previous service that resulted in a hung jury (People v Farnam (2002) 28 C4th 107, 138, 121 CR2d 106);
- Having visited a relative in prison within the past year (People v Farnam, supra);
- Manner of dress (People v Barber (1988) 200 CA3d 378, 396, 245 CR 895); or
- Poor grasp of the English language or legal principles (People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 169, 32 CR2d 762; People v Barber (1988) 200 CA3d 378, 397, 245 CR 895).

§29.35 d. Trial Court's Determination of Motion

Once a neutral basis for the exercise of a peremptory challenge is offered, the trial court must then determine if purposeful discrimination has been established. Hernandez v New York (1991) 500 US 352, 363, 114 L Ed 2d 395, 111 S Ct 1859.

Before ruling, the trial court will give the moving party an opportunity to respond to the offered justifications.

Ø Practice tip: This is counsel's last and best opportunity to persuade the trial court that opposing counsel is using peremptory challenges to improperly strip the jury of members of a cognizable group. Counsel should carefully evaluate neutral-sounding justifications for indications that they are actually pretextual. Counsel should also keep in mind that the proffered justifications present another opportunity for comparative analysis and should point out to the trial court any instances of jurors who are not members of the cognizable class being retained on the jury even though they shared the allegedly neutral trait used to justify a peremptory challenge.

Distinguishing bona fide reasons for using peremptory challenges from sham excuses is, in essence, a credibility determination; thus, the trial court's decision is given great deference on appeal (People v Reynoso (2003) 31 C4th 903, 928, 3 CR3d 769; People v Ervin (2000) 22 C4th 48, 74, 91 CR2d 623), and must be sustained unless it is clearly erroneous. Snyder v Louisiana (2008) 552 US 472, 170 L Ed 2d 175, 181, 128 S Ct 1203. Nonetheless, its proper focus is the subjective genuineness of the responding party's neutral explanation, not the objective reasonableness of that explanation. People v Reynoso (2003) 31 C4th 903, 924, 3 CR3d 769. See also Purkett v Elem (1995) 514 US 765, 768, 131 L Ed 2d 834, 839, 115 S Ct 1769. The trial court must engage on the record in a "sincere and reasoned inquiry" into counsel's proffered explanations and make findings as to the genuineness of those explanations. People v McDermott (2002) 28 C4th 946, 971, 123 CR2d 654. The court's focus must be on the real reason the juror was stricken, not on nondiscriminatory reasons the party exercising the peremptory challenge might have had. See Paulino v Castro (9th Cir 2004) 371 F3d 1083, 1089 (trial court erred in speculating sua sponte as to why prosecutor may have struck potential jurors in question rather than requiring actual explanation from prosecutor). The trial court must consider evidence of comparative juror analysis. People v Lenix (2008) 44 C4th 602, 622, 80 CR3d 98.

The record should contain sufficient detail so that the issue can be intelligently considered on appeal. People v McDermott (2002) 28 C4th 946, 981, 123 CR2d 654. See Green v LaMarque (9th Cir 2008) 532 F3d 1028, 1030 (habeas relief granted when record failed to demonstrate that trial court's inquiry included required comparative juror analysis).

Ø Practice tip: Trial counsel opposing a Batson-Wheeler motion should point out any jurors who are members of the group allegedly discriminated against. This is an indication of good faith in exercising peremptories, and an objective factor for the trial judge to consider in ruling on the motion. See People v Gutierrez (2002) 28 C4th 1083, 1122, 124 CR2d 373. Counsel need only identify facially valid neutral reasons why prospective jurors were excused; the explanation need not justify a challenge for cause. People v Silva (2001) 25 C4th 345, 384 106 CR2d 93. If a juror is excused on the basis of demeanor, the record should contain the court's observation of that juror's demeanor. See Snyder v Louisiana (2008) 552 US 472, 170 L Ed 2d 175, 182, 128 S Ct 1203.

§29.36 3. Successful Motion Requires New Panel Absent Waiver or Consent

If the objecting party makes a prima facie case of illegal discrimination and if the responding party is unsuccessful in establishing to the court's satisfaction that the prospective juror or jurors were excused for nondiscriminatory reasons, the court must dismiss the jurors selected, excuse any remaining members of the jury panel, and start over with a new panel. People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 283, 148 CR 890; People v Smith (1993) 21 CA4th 342, 345, 25 CR2d 850. Dismissal of the panel is not, however, required when it would reward the party who exercises biased peremptory exclusions, but waiver or consent of the objecting party is required. People v Willis (2002) 27 C4th 811, 818, 118 CR2d 301 (defense counsel persisted in improperly "kicking" Caucasian males); People v Morris (2003) 107 CA4th 402, 131 CR2d 872. The consent required by Willis need not be personally given by the defendant and may be granted by counsel. People v Overby (2004) 124 CA4th 1237, 1243, 22 CR3d 233.

Ø Practice tip: Under People v Willis, supra, if the aggrieved party consents to maintaining the existing panel, the trial court has broad discretion to fashion remedies short of the "traditional" remedy of excusing the entire venire. Among the orders a trial court may issue to remedy a Batson-Wheeler violation (as long as the aggrieved party consents) include assessing sanctions against counsel whose challenges exhibit group bias; reseating any improperly discharged jurors if they are available to serve; and, possibly, allowing the aggrieved party additional peremptory challenges. Some cases tactically require counsel to request a new panel, which is the traditional remedy. However, if keeping the existing panel will benefit the client, counsel should ask for sanctions and for any improperly discharged jurors to be reseated if they are available to serve. The court is likely to prefer this approach in that it promotes judicial economy because another venire does not have to be ordered from the jury commissioner. If the improperly challenged jurors have been excused, counsel should ask for additional peremptory challenges. More "kicks" are better for the client than having opposing counsel pay monetary sanctions. Finally, counsel should consider asking the trial judge to admonish the jury that opposing counsel engaged in illegal selection methods, that he or she was told to stop, that he or she persisted, and that this unprofessional behavior caused the jury selection process to be more time-consuming.

§29.37 4. Review

On appeal, Wheeler error is prejudicial per se; the conviction must be reversed. People v Snow (1987) 44 C3d 216, 226, 242 CR 477; People v Wheeler (1978) 22 C3d 258, 283, 148 CR 890. When the error was in failing to recognize that a prima facie case was made and in not requiring an explanation of challenges, however, the U.S. Supreme Court in Batson v Kentucky (1986) 476 US 79, 100, 90 L Ed 2d 69, 106 S Ct 1712, ordered the case to be remanded to allow the prosecutor to explain his reasons for excluding the prospective jurors in question. The California Supreme Court has not absolutely rejected or endorsed that remedy for an error in failing to require a statement of reasons, but it has declined to adopt it in two cases in which the lapse of time made it unrealistic to expect the prosecution to recall the details of the case, or for the court to assess the manner in which the challenges had been exercised. People v Snow, supra (6-year lapse); People v Hall (1983) 35 C3d 161, 170, 197 CR 71 (3-year lapse). Other courts have applied the Batson remand procedure. People v Williams (2000) 78 CA4th 1118, 1125, 93 CR2d 356; People v Rodriguez (1999) 76 CA4th 1093, 1101, 91 CR2d 308.

When a trial court denies a Batson-Wheeler motion on the ground that no prima facie case of group bias has been established, the reviewing court must consider the entire voir dire record. If the record suggests grounds on which the prosecutor might reasonably have challenged the jurors in question, the court will affirm. People v Box (2000) 23 C4th 1153, 1188, 99 CR2d 69; People v Davenport (1995) 11 C4th 1171, 1200, 47 CR2d 800. Federal courts in habeas corpus proceedings may review de novo a trial court's holding that a purported reason for excusing the juror is neutral and may conclude, despite the trial court's holding, that the proffered reason was merely a pretext for illegal discrimination, inferring motive from the totality of the relevant facts. McClain v Prunty (9th Cir 2000) 217 F3d 1209, 1220.

Counsel appealing an adverse trial court ruling on the issue of bias in the exercise of peremptory challenges has a high hurdle to overcome. The trial court's ruling will be upheld even when the record does not contain detailed findings on the reasons for the exercise of each challenge as long as (1) the trial court was fully apprised of the nature of the defense challenge, (2) the proffered reasons for excusing the juror are neither contradicted by the record nor inherently implausible, and (3) nothing in the record conflicts with either the presumption that all peremptory challenges have been exercised in a constitutional manner or the presumption that the trial court properly made a sincere and reasoned evaluation of the prosecutor's proffered reasons. See, e.g., People v Reynoso (2003) 31 C4th 903, 925, 3 CR3d 769 (prosecutor did not demonstrate purposeful racial discrimination by challenging two Hispanic women, thereby leaving jury of 12 Caucasians). But see U.S. v Alanis (9th Cir 2003) 335 F3d 965, 969 (when prosecutor used all six peremptory challenges to strike men from jury in abusive sexual conduct trial, and did not strike four women who possessed objective characteristics that prosecutor claimed she found objectionable in the men, judge had sua sponte duty to decide whether the prosecutor in fact had gender-neutral explanations). See also Miller-El v Dretke (2005) 545 US 231, 162 L Ed 2d 196, 125 S Ct 2317 (more striking than prosecutors' use of peremptory strikes to exclude 91 percent of eligible African-American venire members was side-by-side comparison of some black venire panelists who were struck and white panelists allowed to serve).

Ø Note: Counsel challenging an adverse state trial court ruling on the issue of bias in the exercise of peremptory challenge with a federal habeas petition has a very high hurdle to overcome. After the prosecution has presented a race-neutral explanation for exercising the challenge, the trial court's determination of credibility will stand as long as it is not unreasonable. See, e.g., Rice v Collins (2006) 546 US 333, 163 L Ed 2d 824, 126 S Ct 969.

Comparative analysis on review. It is important for the party making a Batson-Wheeler motion to bring such comparisons to the trial court's attention. If the trial court denies the defendant's motion at the "first stage," i.e., after concluding the defense has not made a prima facie case, Miller-El v Dretke (2005) 545 US 231, 162 L Ed 2d 196, 125 S Ct 2317, does not mandate that the reviewing court conduct comparative juror analysis for the first time on appeal. People v Bell (2007) 40 C4th 582, 601, 54 CR3d 453; People v Bonilla (2007) 41 C4th 313, 350, 60 CR3d 209. See People v Lenix (2008) 44 C4th 602, 622 n15, 80 CR3d 98. On the other hand, an appellate court is obligated to conduct a comparative juror analysis for the first time in a "third stage" Batson-Wheeler case, i.e., one in which a trial court concluded a prima facie case had been made, solicited an explanation of the peremptory challenges from the prosecutor, and then determined that the defense did not carry its burden of demonstrating group bias. People v Lenix (2008) 44 C4th 602, 622, 80 CR3d 98. In that case, the record must be adequate to permit the argued comparisons. People v Lenix, supra. Therefore, prudent trial counsel will make the comparative analysis record, if applicable, for each and every challenge under Batson-Wheeler to avoid a potential waiver of the issue in subsequent appellate litigation.

VII. TECHNIQUES IN JURY SELECTION

§29.38 A. Aids to Jury Selection

Most juries are selected by the attorneys alone. However, aids to jury selection are occasionally used. The trend in complex criminal cases is to use jury consultants to assist with voir dire or focus group preparation, or with both. Counsel may hire an expert in selecting juries, usually a psychologist or sociologist. This person will help counsel decide what qualities are needed in jurors for the particular case, and may prepare questions to ask panel members that are designed to elicit information that may aid counsel in determining whether particular jurors have the desired qualities. During voir dire, the expert may give counsel information gained from observing jurors' body language and, from listening to their answers, may help the attorney decide whom to challenge.

In capital cases, the court may appoint a jury selection expert at public expense under Pen C §987.9 to assist defense counsel in jury selection. However, a court's refusal to appoint a jury selection expert will be upheld on appeal, absent an abuse of discretion. People v Box (2000) 23 C4th 1153, 1182, 99 CR2d 69.

Counsel may hire specialists to interview persons living in the area from which a jury will be called, and to provide information on what types of people are apt to be more supportive of the prosecution or defense, and why, in order to assist counsel in determining whom to challenge. See National Jury Project, Jurywork: Systematic Techniques, chap 9 (2005). Access to personal information about jurors is governed by CCP §237. See discussion of posttrial interrogation of jurors in §§33.46, 34.5.

Counsel may have a mock jury trial, also called jury simulation, before the actual trial begins. This process serves both to provide experience in trying the case and to discuss with the mock jurors their opinions and reactions to the attorneys and to the evidence.

Counsel may also use a "shadow jury." This means that counsel has several people attend the actual trial and listen to all evidence as if they were jurors. Counsel can then consult with them during trial to find out how they are reacting to the lawyers, the witnesses, and the evidence.

Other books on jury selection are listed at the end of §29.1. General books on body language can be helpful in selecting jurors. See, e.g., Dimitrius & Mazzerella, Reading People: How to Understand People and Predict Their Behavior—Anytime, Anyplace (1998); Dimitrius & Mazzerella, Put Your Best Foot Forward (2002). Books on jury communication may also help counsel in selecting jurors. See, e.g., Simon, The Jury System in America, chaps 2, 4 (1975); Hans & Vidmar, Judging the Jury, chaps 4-6 (2001); Kassin & Wrightsman, The American Jury on Trial: Psychological Perspectives, chaps 1-4 (1989); Hamlin, What Makes Juries Listen, chap 2 (1985).

B. Courtroom Techniques

§29.39 1. Persuasive Communication During Voir Dire

Jury selection is a persuasive process. The first time an attorney speaks to the jury in any meaningful way is during jury selection and there is no second chance to make a first impression. During voir dire, jurors are assessing you. If you effectively use persuasion techniques during jury selection, you will gain credibility and prospective jurors will disclose more about themselves. Establishing credibility during voir dire will lead to increased receptivity to your presentation of evidence during the actual trial. Knowing your audience will help you maximize persuasion by targeting your communication to the needs of the audience. Audience analysis is discussed in §29.40.

Elements of persuasive communication. As Aristotle theorized, there are three elements to persuasion: source credibility (ethos), effective communication (pathos), and logical argument (logos).

An attorney perceived to be credible by the jury during voir dire will obtain more information from jurors and will make them more sympathetic to the client, because juries subconsciously identify counsel and the client as one entity. Jurors pay attention to subsequent information from a source they perceive as credible, and they minimize or ignore information from noncredible sources.

Because body language is often more telling than spoken words alone, active listening is an important medium of communication during voir dire. For example, if a juror reveals that she was violently attacked, counsel should maintain eye contact, nod, soften his or her voice, and slow the rate of his or her speech. Showing concern makes effective use of voir dire and will also increase credibility. The author has observed that other jurors take note of this concern when a particular juror has disclosed something of a sensitive nature. When counsel demonstrates sensitivity and concern about a juror's disclosure of sensitive information, this appears to substantially increase the chance that other members of the venire will disclose something that may be sensitive.

Aristotle observed that discourse that is designed to interest the audience and stimulate them to learn is often persuasive discourse. Jurors want to learn things during voir dire and during a trial. During voir dire, potential jurors will watch you, try to figure you out, assess what type of person your client is, and figure out what the evidence consists of. Therefore, asking intelligent questions can add to counsel's credibility.

§29.40 2. Audience Analysis During Voir Dire

Research shows that jurors find voir dire to be stressful, like a job interview. Jurors are often fearful of the criminal defendant, especially of a gang member. The persuasive communicator pays attention to the important needs of the audience. Experienced trial attorneys know that:

- Jurors value privacy;
- Jurors value anonymity;
- Jurors are anxious because of the courtroom setting; and
- Jurors understand the importance of the jury selection process.

Research also shows that jurors are not predisposed to disclose information in their response to voir dire questions, especially when counsel is asking the questions. This propensity for nondisclosure is exacerbated if the inquiry involves "private" or "sensitive" topics. The goal of voir dire is to persuade potential jurors to open up. If they are persuaded that the attorney is asking intelligent questions to properly benefit the client, jurors are more likely to disclose because they will think: "If I was accused of this crime, I would want my lawyer asking those questions, too."

Potential jurors should be observed both in and out of the courtroom. A jury consultant, paralegal, investigator, co-counsel, or law student can be used to observe potential jurors outside of the courtroom during breaks. The clothing worn by prospective jurors can reveal attitudes and beliefs. The attitude a potential juror manifests in answering voir dire questions from the court and attorneys can be telling. Nonverbal communication by a potential juror, such as giving one side favorable or unfavorable looks or nods, must be incorporated into the decision of whether to exercise a peremptory challenge.

§29.41 3. Juror Profiling

Jurors see the world through the prism of their life experiences. How an individual juror generally processes information is how that juror will process the information and evidence presented in the courtroom. The most important goal of jury selection is to challenge (or deselect) jurors who dislike your client or case. "Deselection" applies when the facts of the case relate to something negative experienced by a juror, or someone close a juror. For example, if the male defendant is accused of raping an adult woman, a prospective juror who was the victim of date rape when she was a junior in college is a candidate for deselection. The following sections discuss broad ways of categorizing prospective jurors that the author has found helpful in the jury selection process.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.42 a. Four Juror Types

On the basis of social science research and trial experience, the author has identified four types of jurors for purposes of profiling: the linear thinker, the salesperson, the helper, and the artist. In the author's experience, linear thinkers are most numerous, followed by salespersons and helpers. Artists are relatively rare.

A "linear thinker" processes information sequentially: A-B-C-D-E. Logic and order are important components in the problem solving process. Examples of occupations held by linear thinkers are engineer, scientist, mathematician, auto mechanic, patent attorney.

A "salesperson" has a target-oriented thinking process: "I'm at A, and I need to get to C." Examples of occupations held by the salesperson personality are sales professional, sales manager, and trial attorney.

A "helper" processes information with more of an emotional emphasis than a linear thinker or a salesperson, i.e., thinks more with his or her heart than head. Examples of occupations held by the helper personality are nurse, teacher, counselor, priest, social worker, and psychologist.

An "artist" is a free-spirited individual who processes information existentially without a particular pattern. An artist is imaginative, very creative, and possesses a higher emotional or moral sense than other juror types. An artist tends to be well educated, having a bachelor's degree or higher. An artist will tend to identify with a criminal defendant. Artists tend to be anticorporate and antigovernment, and they have strongly held beliefs on social issues. They believe in working to effect social change. For example, instead of going to the beach with family on a sunny Saturday afternoon, an artist will take them to march in a demonstration sponsored by a "social change" group.

§29.43 b. Juror Dynamics During Deliberations

Linear thinkers typically disagree with the artists, and juror discussions can get testy. Linear thinkers and salespersons tend to bond and form an informal alliance. Likewise, artists and helpers often tend to agree and will form a coalition. As a general observation, linear thinkers and salespersons make decisions faster than artists and helpers, who can often be more analytical of trial evidence.

In observing actual juries and mock juries in the process of deliberation, the author has found that, many times, two or three of the 12 are "leader" jurors with strong personalities who dominate the deliberation process. Leader jurors tend to have management positions with hiring and firing power. A leader juror will frequently become the presiding juror and may put substantial pressure on hold-outs to yield to the majority opinion. Leader jurors often offend the "silent" jurors. Trial counsel should aim in voir dire to select a leader juror, who has a strong chance of ending up as the presiding juror, favorably disposed to his or her client. Conversely, all things being equal, trial counsel should excuse any leader who is not favorable to his or her case.

Typically, six or seven of the 12 are "follower" jurors who engage in the deliberation process, are respectful and listen to other jurors, and are not adamant in their opinions. Follower jurors will change their opinions because they are open to discussion of the evidence and will frequently adopt the opinions of the "leader" jurors.

Finally, two or three of the 12 are "silent" jurors who say little or nothing unless the presiding juror asks for their input. They tend to agree with the majority with virtually no hesitation, shun conflict and debate, are polite and pleasant, and do not want to hurt anyone's feelings. "Silent" jurors will easily engage in compromise verdicts to end the process quickly.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/29 JURY SELECTION/§29.44 c. Typical Prosecution Juror

§29.44 c. Typical Prosecution Juror

For the prosecution, linear thinkers are best, salespersons are second best, helpers are acceptable, and artists are to be avoided. An artist is often the "one holdout" in an 11-1 hung jury when the majority voted for conviction. In addition to linear thinkers, an "ideal" prosecution panel would incorporate people who:

- Are older;
- Are conservative;
- Are prone to make quick judgments and decisions;
- Have prior favorable experiences with law enforcement or government;
- Have prior military or law enforcement experience or a spouse or significant other with that experience;
- Have served more than twice on a jury;
- Are not very emotive;
- Tend to relate to the world in "black or white" terms;
- Donate money to law enforcement or crime victim causes; and
- Are guarded in their responses to questions.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.45 d. Typical Defense Juror

For the defense, artists are best, helpers tend to be excellent choices, salespersons are acceptable, and linear thinkers are the worst. The artist looks at a criminal case through the eyes of the defendant, feels sympathy for the defendant, and may attempt to send a message to the government with a not guilty verdict. In addition to having at least one artist and two helpers, an "ideal" defense panel would incorporate people who:

- Are younger;
- Are liberal;
- Are prone to asking questions and not making snap decisions;
- Are employed in "helping" professions;
- Belong to "helping" organizations;
- Have prior negative experiences or perceptions of police, prosecutors, or government;
- Are on a jury for the first time;
- Are willing to disclose personal information such as prior drug use or bias against certain crimes;
- Do not view the world or decision-making as a "black or white" process; and
- Have favorable, cooperative body language during questioning.

Specific jury selection techniques for the defense in a criminal trial are discussed in §29.46.

© The Regents of the University of California

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/29 JURY SELECTION/§29.46 4. Criminal Defense Jury Selection Techniques

§29.46 4. Criminal Defense Jury Selection Techniques

The goals during jury selection for a criminal defense attorney are to:

- Excuse the jurors most harmful to your case;
- Select a jury that is oriented to your side of the case; and
- Get the jury to like you by building rapport and establishing your credibility.

Several techniques are available to assist counsel to obtain the information needed to make intelligent challenges during voir dire and to make a good impression on the jurors who will eventually decide the case.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.47 a. Request "Hot Button" Voir Dire

If you represent a criminal defendant in a high-profile or emotionally charged case, your most important goal is to excuse all jurors who have life experiences involving "hot button" issues. Doing so can be accomplished with a motion in limine for hot-button voir dire. In hot-button voir dire, the trial judge asks for a show of hands in response to hot-button questions during the opening voir dire. After the opening voir dire, all potential jurors who did not raise their hands in response to the hot-button questions are told to go on a break. Potential jurors who raised their hands are then taken inside the courtroom, one at a time, to give disclosure germane to the hot-button questions. Both counsel then have the opportunity to voir dire. After the completion of individual voir dire, the panel is returned to the courtroom and jury selection continues. For a list of hot-button questions from a rape case, see §29.58.

The advantages of hot-button voir dire are that it minimizes the opportunity for deception because counsel gets to immediately observe body language, and that a number of jurors can be excused for cause, thus saving peremptory challenges.

> Ø Practice tip: In utilizing "hot button" voir dire in aggravated sex crime and homicide cases, the author has seen instances when over half of the jurors who responded to the "hot button" process were excused by the trial judge for cause. This relieved the author of having to "waste" peremptory challenges on jurors with salient life experiences that could translate into bias against the defendant.

§29.48 b. Get Prospective Jurors to Talk During Voir Dire

The most effective voir dire is one in which the prospective jurors do most of the talking. Counsel should try with questions, active listening techniques, and overall presentation to foster an atmosphere in which juror and lawyer are like friends talking over coffee because calm, relaxed jurors disclose more than anxious, nervous ones. To foster this friendly atmosphere, greet the panel and welcome them to the courtroom. Introduce yourself and client. It may be a good idea to tell the panel that you may not ask each person a question owing to court-imposed time constraints.

Ø Note: Do not touch the defendant. Jurors read that behavior as a staged attempt to curry favor with them. However, interaction with the defendant during the jury selection process is an important way to make the defendant, particularly in a homicide case, appear nonviolent. If you and other members of the defense team talk easily with the defendant and do not appear to fear the defendant, it sends the message to the jury that they need not fear the defendant either.

In your introduction, explain that you are not there to embarrass them or make them nervous as if it were a job interview. You are asking only questions necessary to properly represent your client.

Ø Note: Do not say "I'm here to pick a fair and impartial jury." The panel knows this is false; they are acutely aware that a criminal trial is an adversarial process and a juror who is bad for the defense is most likely good for the prosecution.

Devise a procedure to go private for sensitive questions. This is usually accomplished in one of two ways. First, the jurors are excused and then individuals "that need to go private" are individually brought into the courtroom and questioned with no other jurors listening. The second approach is for a criminal defendant to waive the right to be present for all portions of the trial and consent to counsel's going into chambers with the juror for a private voir dire. Sequestered, individual voir dire of prospective jurors is within the trial court's sound discretion. See CCP §223; People v Box (2000) 23 C4th 1153, 1179, 99 CR2d 69; People v Waidla (2000) 22 C4th 690, 713, 94 CR2d 396. Either way, explain to the panel in your introduction how sensitive or private voir dire will be handled. Tell prospective jurors to raise their hands if they feel uncomfortable about responding to any question. Let them know you will respect their privacy by stopping the inquiry until the discussion can be done in private, consistent with the court's pretrial ruling.

After your introduction, begin with "icebreaker" questions that show the panel that you paid attention to their responses to the court's questions.

Ø Example: Mr. Jones, you told Judge Brown that you were a paralegal for 6 years. What type of cases did you work on? Explain your duties.

Ø Note: It is important to pronounce the juror's names correctly. To help with this, write the names down phonetically when the clerk calls the roll.

Next, go to group questions. Group questions are usually not as stressful as individual questions for each juror. Follow up with jurors who raised their hands. Start with less sensitive questions to encourage participation and progress to more sensitive questions.

Ø Practice tip: Vary the phrasing of questions so that the minority response does not always require a raised hand. This technique keeps the jurors' attention.

Be sure to alternate individual and group questions. Capitalize on jurors' answers by using them as a springboard to compare other jurors' responses and experiences, or to lead into an important area of your voir dire.

Finally, never ask questions by going down the row in order: the other jurors will figure out the response you want to hear and you will not get useful disclosure.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.49 c. Encourage Disclosure With Your Words

For example, "Please raise your hand if you remember something during this jury selection process that you forgot to tell me initially. Thank you very much." Then, encourage disclosure by paying attention.

Ø Example: Mr. Johnson, I saw that you just raised your hand. Sir, what would you like to say?" The other jurors sincerely appreciate that you are aware of what is going on in the courtroom and that you care to allow others who have now remembered something important to have a chance to convey that information.

Reward candor and self-examination by thanking a prospective juror who has revealed an attitude or experience that may be embarrassing.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.50 d. Keep Record-Keeping to a Minimum

The goal is to write less and observe more during voir dire. Your focus should be on active listening and observing nonverbal communication. It is much more important to make eye contact than it is to write down every word that is said. Using the chart provided by the clerk, you can place small Post-Its by each name to jot down a rating of "+," "−," or "?" If co-counsel, a jury consultant, or questionnaire is used, then the rating system can be modified to a "1-2-3-4-5" format.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.51 e. Use Voir Dire as Opportunity to Educate and Desensitize Prospective Jurors

Defense counsel should use voir dire as an opportunity to explain the basics of the case and the defense in a neutral way. For example, "Judge Thomas will instruct you at the end of this trial that it is legal to use force to protect yourself from an attack. Do you agree with that law? If the evidence shows that my client acted in self-defense, could you vote for an acquittal even though Mr. Green was hurt more than my client was?"

Voir dire also presents an opportunity to desensitize jurors to prejudicial evidence that will be admitted at trial. For example, "The evidence will show that Ms. Crane had a pistol in her purse when she was arrested. How do you feel about handguns generally? Does the gun in her purse cause you to have difficulty in objectively listening to other evidence in this case?" By front-ending prejudicial evidence you will steal the prosecutor's thunder and score credibility points. Such items as photographs of wounds and injuries, testimony about sexual acts, etc., should be introduced to the jury as soon as possible. The goal is to reduce juror shock and aversion to harmful evidence before deliberation commences.

© The Regents of the University of California

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/29 JURY SELECTION/§29.52 f. Make Favorable Impression on Jury

§29.52 f. Make Favorable Impression on Jury

Manifest professionalism by never talking down to the jurors. Use short, open-ended voir dire questions in a conversational style. Avoid excessive use of legal terms. Maintain eye contact and a warm and friendly attitude. Combine active listening with positive verbal and nonverbal feedback: Nod as jurors speak to you and show empathy and caring, especially if "sensitive" issues are being discussed. For example, you may ask "Would you feel more comfortable if we talked about this in chambers?"

Ø Note: Never interrupt a juror while he or she answers a question. This suggests that you are not listening and discourages other jurors from disclosing information.

Humor and self-revelation can increase bonding with panel. For example, counsel may reveal, "I have two kids, too, I coach little league, have pets," etc. Revelation often may elicit reciprocity: Jurors tend to disclose to attorneys who have disclosed personal information to them.

© The Regents of the University of California

§29.53 g. Maximize Jurors' Favorable Perception of Your Client

The key here is "Don't ignore the elephant in the room." Remember that jurors walk into the courtroom thinking that the criminal defense attorney is hiding bad information about the client or the case or both. Accordingly, confront potentially prejudicial issues. For example, confront appearance issues by asking questions about your client's shaved head, tattoos, dreadlocks, etc. With respect to race, don't ask "Are you prejudiced against African-Americans?" Rather consider asking questions such as "What does the term "racial prejudice" mean to you? Do you think that African-Americans (or other groups) commit more crimes than whites? Why? What do you think about affirmative action programs? Do you think whites get discriminated against in job hiring or promotions because of affirmative action? Why?"

From the beginning, discuss your client's prior record or bad acts if that evidence will be admitted during trial. Most jurors think your client has a prior criminal record anyway, so showing them that you are "not hiding the ball" will make you and your client's case more credible. "Front-ending" bad facts also minimizes the damage when the prosecutor brings up the information at trial. Finally, it may lead to excusing a juror for cause. To illustrate, "Ms. Jones, if a person has a prior felony conviction, does that fact make it more likely to you that they committed another felony? Why or why not?"

The goal is to have the defendant look and act innocent. The defendant should present as friendly, sincere, nonthreatening, and respectful. Good eye contact with jurors and laughing when appropriate is useful. The defendant should demonstrate appropriate body language by avoiding slouching, sighing, and nervous gestures. Have your client get friendly with the bailiff so jurors can see that both of them talk freely. If the bailiff thinks that the client is "human," i.e., not dangerous, then the jury will think so, too.

§29.54 h. Follow Up on Disclosures That Reveal Experiences That Could Affect Decision-Making

It is widely recognized that a traumatic event, such as rape or other violent crime, can have a profound effect on a person's life, causing the victim to alter his or her behavior to avoid reexperiencing the event. An individual suffering from posttraumatic stress disorder may be an undesirable juror in a criminal trial, especially if the facts of the case are likely to cause the individual to reexperience the trauma. Defense counsel should be aware that more subtle life experiences may also have a profound effect on an individual's life. Sometimes a little probing of a juror's responses to standard voir dire questions will reveal such an experience. Suppose, for example, a prospective juror reveals that her car was burglarized. Follow-up questions that reveal that after the burglary she obtained not just a car alarm but a burglar alarm for her home as well may lead counsel to infer that the car burglary was a traumatic experience for her and question whether she would be an appropriate juror.

When a juror's responses to standard questions suggest the possibility of such an experience, counsel should try to get more information about the experience. The author refers to this as the "Salient Life Experiences Rule." In assessing the experience and its possible impact on the juror's decision-making, it is important for counsel to know:

- What was the salient experience?
- How related and relevant is it to a key issue in the case?
- How did the juror react to the salient experience?
- Did the juror change her behavior as a result of the salient experience?
- How much time has passed since the salient experience?

Counsel should carefully observe the prospective juror's body language during voir dire on the incident. It will often say more than the words the juror uses.

Defense counsel should be wary when a juror's verbal responses and body language suggest that he is presently experiencing aggravated stressors (divorce, job, serious illness, death, and children) in life to a significant degree. Individuals who are depressed or experiencing significant difficulties in their lives can find it easy to be blaming and may not be appropriate jurors from the defense standpoint. The author calls this the "Down on Life Rule."

This information is typically received in response to open-ended questions during voir dire. Watch for demeanor changes as the prospective juror discloses painful perceptions.

> Ø Example: In a possession of controlled substances case, counsel asked: "Have you, or has anyone close to you, had a bad experience with illegal drugs?" An otherwise excellent criminal defense juror revealed that his son, a senior in high school, was in his second live-in drug treatment program for methamphetamine addiction, and that he lost a football scholarship owing to the drug abuse. This juror was excused by defense counsel.

§29.55 i. Stop When You Are Satisfied

Stop asking questions of a particular juror once you are satisfied that you will either keep the juror or excuse her. Why waste valuable time during voir dire? If the juror is favorable and she keeps talking, you risk tipping off the other side, and having your opponent excuse that juror.

Ø Practice tip: To avoid appearing rude or abrupt, counsel may wish to inform the prospective jurors during his opening remarks that court-imposed time limits preclude individual questioning of each prospective juror.

§29.55A 5. Tips for Jury Selection by Prosecution

Prosecutors can benefit from some of the tips and tactics described above for defense counsel to employ during the voir dire process, such as active listening techniques, not interrupting jurors, asking open-ended questions, and not repeating questions that are already covered by the court or defense counsel. Like defense counsel, prosecutors should watch the venire and listen carefully to all questions propounded by the court and the opposition.

Prosecutors should choose questions carefully, bearing in mind that the jurors may be tired and bored by the time the prosecutor gets to speak. For example, questions such as "Have you ever received a traffic ticket that you didn't agree with?" and "Do you have trouble making decisions?" tend to waste time because the responses do not elicit valuable information for the prosecutor. In one of the author's trials, the trial judge and the author, as defense counsel, conducted a thorough voir dire. When the prosecutor stood up, he asked only one question: "Will all of you find the defendant not guilty if I do not prove my case beyond a reasonable doubt? Please raise your hand if you'll find him not guilty." Every prospective juror quickly raised his or her hand. The deputy district attorney responded, "Thank you very much," and sat down. The defendant was convicted of all charges after one of the fastest guilty verdicts rendered for any of the author's clients.

Like defense counsel, prosecutors can make the tactical decision to request during in limine motions that the trial judge ask certain questions during the court's portion of voir dire. The venire will feel more comfortable speaking on relatively private matters when the judge—rather than counsel—asks the questions. Effective questions a prosecutor may wish the trial judge to ask include:

Do you have any negative views about anyone from a prosecutor's office?

Have you, a close family member, or close friend had any unpleasant experiences with law enforcement?

Have you or has someone close to you been affected by drug abuse by a relative?

Have any of you witnessed family or domestic violence?

§29.56 6. Reading Prospective Juror's Body Language

A prospective juror may disclose as much through body language as through verbal response. The following charts, adapted from Frederick, Mastering Voir Dire & Jury Selection: Gaining an Edge in Questioning & Selecting a Jury (ABA 1995), can help you read body language.

Summary of Auditory Cues to Anxiety and Deception With Associated Sample Behaviors

Source	Anxiety Signs
Speech disturbances	Nonfluencies, "ums, ers," and word repetition
Vocal hesitancy	Pauses before and during answers
Pitch of voice	Rising pitch and volume of speech
Type of speech	Unusually short answer to question; evasive answer or irrelevant response
Tone of voice	Cold and condescending
Laughter	Inappropriate laughter or excessive, tense laughter
Word choice	Greater psychological distancing, e.g., "them" instead of "African-Americans"

Summary of Visual Cues of Deception With Associated Sample Behaviors

Source	Anxiety Signs
Body movement	Shifting postures, repetitive movements, wringing of hands, turning neck from side to side, and looking upward
Body posture	Greater rigidity; less head and body movement
Body orientation	Folded arms, crossed legs, or leaning away from the speaker; shrugs involving neck and shoulders
Eye contact	Less eye contact with more blinking and rolling of eyes in response to certain questions; however, juror will make eye contact when feelings of hostility-anxiety are manifest
Facial expression	Frowning, skeptical expression, fixed smile

§29.57 C. Exercising Peremptory Challenges

Counsel will obviously want to kick the least acceptable jurors from the panel first. In addition to removing them, doing so educates the remaining prospective jurors that their suspicions were correct, i.e., that the first few jurors excused by the defense were in fact the worst. Challenges to jurors rated with a "?" should be saved until the end because the prosecution may exercise a peremptory for you. Confer with the client if you are really unsure about exercising a peremptory and advise the client to inform you if any juror has been glaring or unduly staring at him or her. Counsel should apply the "70-percent rule," being aware that the prosecution can stack the venire in a "six-pack" or similar voir dire format when she or he has used only 3 or 4 peremptories and you have used about 70 percent of yours.

Ø Practice tip: Don't assume that a person in recovery will be an appropriate juror for the defense in a drug or DUI case. People in recovery sometimes think: "I got through it, why can't she?" Moreover, a juror in recovery can become an "expert" during deliberations, which misconduct can prove detrimental to the defense. Likewise, if the case involves forensic or scientific experts, a juror with expertise in that field may not be appropriate for the defense, because that juror could also become an expert during deliberations and persuade others against your client.

Challenges for cause. Challenges for cause should never be exercised in the presence of any juror. Counsel must always make a solid record of the reasons for the cause challenge and no prospective juror should ever hear the basis for that challenge. The record should be made at sidebar or in chambers, or in the courtroom outside the presence of the jury. Counsel should endeavor to get the prosecution to stipulate to challenges for cause because it will increase the chances that the trial judge will grant your cause challenge. If the prosecution will not stipulate, and if tactically prudent, immediately make your challenge for cause. If granted, you save a peremptory.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/29 JURY SELECTION/§29.58 D. Sample Voir Dire Questions

§29.58 D. Sample Voir Dire Questions

Some questions are best asked by the trial judge after the initial voir dire because the panel perceives the judge to be a neutral guardian of fairness and justice, while attorneys are perceived as advocates for a position. Having the judge ask sensitive questions communicates to the panel that the information requested is truly important and necessary for a fair trial. Jurors are then more likely to disclose the truth. Counsel should present the judge with the questions you want the court to ask during pretrial motions. If your request is denied, you can make a record for appeal. The following sample questions are adapted from the author's jury trials:

Standard bias questions

Have you ever given a financial contribution to a police, prosecution, crime victims' group, or similar organization? ____ If so, please explain.

Do you or does anyone in your family volunteer at any victim's rights organization, sexual assault victims' organization, battered woman's shelter, etc? ____

Are police officers more believable than civilian witnesses? ____

Why?_____

Standard deselection questions

Do you think that if the police and prosecution have put significant effort in bringing [the defendant] to trial that [he or she] is probably guilty? ____

Why or why not? Please explain._____

Do you think that if the police believe a [specify crime, e.g., rape] victim that you—as a juror—should believe [him or her] too? ____

Why or why not? Please explain._____

Have you written a letter to the editor or your legislative representative, or a similar letter? ____

If so, why did you do it?_____

Did you get a response? ____

Do you have the power to hire and fire at your job? ____

If so, have you ever fired anyone? ____

Why did you do it?_____

Describe the experience(s) please._____

Standard legal questions

[The defendant] is presumed innocent under the law. [Juror name], how do you feel about the presumption of innocence?

Would you change that law?_____

Do you think that if the police and prosecution have put significant effort in bringing [the defendant] to trial that [he or she] is probably guilty? ____

Why? Please explain._____

Why is it so easy to believe that someone is guilty once they've been accused of a crime?

[Juror name], do you think that police sometimes arrest the wrong suspect? ____

How often does this happen?_____

Why does this happen?_____

Is there pressure on police to make arrests? ____

Why or why not?_____

Are there occasions when police officers may lie under oath in order to get a conviction?

Why does it happen? ____

At the end of the trial, Judge [Name] will instruct you that the District Attorney must prove each element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt in order for you to reach a guilty verdict. [Juror name], assume that the crime has four elements and the DA has proved three of the four elements beyond a reasonable doubt, and one element by clear and convincing evidence.

What is your verdict?_____

Why?_____

Ø Warning: Some attorneys, including the author, intentionally omit the "traditional" voir dire on reasonable doubt because of time constraints and because a significant number of jurors believe that the standard is "beyond a shadow of a doubt" and that talking about reasonable doubt during voir dire signals that the defense case is weak.

[The defendant] has the constitutional right not to testify, and that decision cannot be held against [him or her] in any way. [He or She] may choose to testify or not to testify. [He or She] makes that decision.

Would it bother you if [the defendant] didn't take the stand to testify? ____

Why?_____

What are some reasons why a person accused of a crime might not testify in a jury trial?

Speech problem? ____ Nervous-stage fright? ____

Not an effective communicator? ____ Hiding a criminal record? ____

Hiding gang membership? ____ Prior bad experience as a public speaker? ____

Prior bad experience testifying? ____

There are many reasons a person accused of a crime might not testify. Judge [Name] will instruct you that you cannot speculate as to why [the defendant] elects not to testify. Can you follow that instruction as a juror?___

Would you be able to follow the Court's instruction that you cannot hold the defendant's decision not to testify in this trial against [him or her]?

Assume you are the defense attorney in this serious case. Pretend there is a prospective juror—exactly like you—that has truthfully answered all questions asked. What additional information about yourself would you think the defense attorney in this case would like to know that hasn't yet been asked?_____

§29.59 VIII. POSTVERDICT INTERVIEW TIPS

Following the recording of the verdict, the trial judge will advise the jurors that now they are free to discuss the case with anyone, including trial counsel. Since personal juror information is sealed, the only opportunity counsel may have to speak with the jury is immediately after the verdict is recorded—right outside of the courtroom. Postverdict interviews are imperative if defense counsel is contemplating a motion for new trial based on juror misconduct. If there has been a mistrial on one or more counts, getting feedback can be invaluable. Counsel should be open, friendly, calm, and an active listener when communicating with jurors after the verdict or mistrial. The following are suggested open-ended questions that counsel may wish to ask:

What were the two or three key portions of the evidence (witness, exhibit, etc.) that led you to the verdict? or Why did you find [the Defendant] guilty?

Who was the most important witness? Why?

What did you find believable from the defense case? Why?

What was not believable from the defense case? Why?

What evidence could the defense have produced that would have led you to vote not guilty?

What could I have done better as a lawyer in this case?

What was the best thing that the prosecution did in terms of being able to convince you to vote guilty?

Counsel and his or her investigator must be professional at all times because the trial judge will instruct the jurors, right after the verdict is given, that they do not have to speak with you. If, during a postverdict interview, counsel elicits a response consistent with juror misconduct or another ground that would support a motion for new trial, it is important to give jurors a business card so that they can contact you at a later date. Having an investigator present is also important if a juror wishes to immediately speak about any misconduct before leaving the courthouse. In that case, the investigator should conduct the interview outside the presence of the other jurors by, for example, taking the juror down the hallway. The investigator's job is to develop information that will support preparation of a declaration under penalty of perjury for the juror to sign, which declaration will be attached as an exhibit to the motion for a new trial.

§30.1 I. OVERVIEW

The presentation of evidence and argument begins with thorough preparation before the attorney even enters the courtroom. Thorough preparation puts the trial attorney in the best position to adapt to the ever-changing trial dynamic and gives the attorney the best chance of success. A checklist to help prepare for trial is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §30.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

Although the ultimate goals of a prosecutor and a defense attorney differ, the initial aims of preparation should be similar: a thorough knowledge of the case, all the evidence likely to be presented, the strengths and weaknesses of each side, the problems likely to be encountered, and the possible defenses presented by the evidence. It is useful initially both to consider the evidence from a dispassionate, nonpartisan point of view and to attempt an evaluation of the case from the opponent's viewpoint.

This chapter discusses basic concepts that can be applied to cases that have been or will be set for trial. The discussion is separated into (1) preparation for trial (see §§30.2-30.16) and (2) presentation of the case in trial (see §§30.17-30.33).

© The Regents of the University of California

II. PREPARATION FOR TRIAL

§30.2 A. Importance of Early Preparation

Preparation is the key to success and competent representation at trial. (For discussion of the requirement that counsel provide competent representation, see §§2.20-2.21.) Without preparation, the attorney has no idea what witnesses to call, what questions to ask, or what exhibits to use. Without preparation, counsel cannot anticipate what evidence the opposition may introduce. Both physical and testimonial evidence may need to be preserved; they may not otherwise be available at the time of trial. Counsel may need to send for evidence, such as records of prior convictions or medical records, that takes time to obtain. Counsel may need to take steps to minimize the effect of negative evidence such as similar acts of misconduct or prior convictions (see chap 24). An investigator needs time to conduct interviews and follow leads.

Early preparation is crucial for both sides. For example, although the prosecution has the burden of proving every element of the crime charged against the defendant, the defense must present evidence to support affirmative defenses such as self-defense. Martin v Ohio (1987) 480 US 228, 94 L Ed 2d 267, 107 S Ct 1098. Without preparation, defense counsel will not know whether an affirmative defense is available, and if so, what witnesses are needed to support that defense. See the list of defenses in §32.12. Even if no affirmative defense is contemplated, information on the reliability and credibility of prosecution witnesses will likely be central to the defense. Similarly, the prosecution needs to know what information is available to avoid being surprised at court.

Sometimes the circumstances of the crime or the client's demeanor will suggest the possibility that the defendant was suffering from some type of mental or cognitive impairment at the time of the offense. If defense counsel is contemplating any type of mental defense, a mental health professional must be promptly retained, and counsel should gather mental health history and background to supply to the professional in a timely fashion so that the expert does not rely exclusively on the self-reporting of the client, which may be inadequate and ultimately deprive the defendant of a viable defense. See, e.g., Bloom v Calderon (9th Cir 1997) 132 F3d 1267.

> Ø Note: Defense attorneys planning to use a mental defense should be aware that doing so may permit the mental examination of the defendant by a prosecution expert if such an examination is authorized by statute. Verdin v Superior Court (2008) 43 C4th 1096, 1108, 77 CR3d 287. See, e.g., Centeno v Superior Court (2004) 117 CA4th 30, 11 CR3d 533 (prosecution expert permitted to test defendant for mental retardation in capital case). See chap 48 on mental competence and mental defenses.

Prosecutors cannot wait until trial begins to prepare, because they bear the burden of proving the case and they need to know what information is available to avoid being surprised at court. Moreover, because the current statutory scheme contemplates a substantial level of reciprocity in criminal discovery, the schedule for trial preparation must be made with Pen C §§1054-1054.7 in mind. These sections set forth what information each side must disclose to the other, the time within which demands for discovery and disclosure must be made, the mechanism for compelling compliance, and the remedies for failure to comply. For further discussion of discovery, see chap 11.

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.3 B. Reading Reports and Files of Present and Related Cases

The quickest way to obtain the necessary overview of a case is to read all reports, transcripts, and documentation relating to the case. The prosecutor should do this before discussing the case with witnesses. Defense counsel may not have this opportunity before interviewing the defendant but should at least try to read the police report before the first interview with the defendant.

Ø Note: In serious felony cases, defense counsel may want to concentrate on establishing a rapport with the defendant at the first interview and wait until later to discuss the facts of the case.

Interviews with witnesses are more informative if counsel is familiar with the case and with statements the witnesses have already made, than if counsel's first information about the case comes from the witnesses themselves. Furthermore, people have greater confidence in a lawyer who appears to be familiar with the facts of the case than in one who does not know who the significant players are, what occurred, or when it occurred. Familiarity with the case also allows the attorney to better guide the discussion during interviews.

In addition to reading all available information about the pending case, counsel should become familiar with any other cases involving the defendant and any witnesses, both in past and pending cases. Some defendants are creatures of habit; prior criminal activities may provide prosecutors with useful similar acts of misconduct. See Evid C §§1101, 1108-1109. See also §§24.52-24.55. Knowledge of the criminal activities of witnesses may provide character evidence that may help or hurt counsel's case, or establish a motive for the witness to testify favorably for one side or the other. This information is available to prosecutors through law enforcement computer records. The prosecutor must inform defense counsel, in a timely fashion, of the existence of a felony conviction of any material witness whose credibility is likely to be crucial to the outcome of the trial. See Pen C §1054.1(d). Defense counsel should not overlook the possibility of bringing a Pitchess motion concerning police witnesses. Pitchess motions are discussed in chap 11.

It is well worth the effort for both defense counsel and the prosecutor to meet with the officers involved in the arrest or investigation and go over their personal notes, if any, as well the investigator's case file or packet. Sometimes the police have reports, pictures, diagrams, and taped statements that were never sent to the prosecutor. Such finds are not necessarily the product of the officers trying to hide something. More often, this information was not obtained until after the case was charged. When prosecutors learn about this information, they must evaluate it and decide what must be given to defense counsel. The police and district attorney investigators will rarely agree to talk with defense counsel, and usually contend that any personal notes were destroyed once written reports were prepared, but it is worth the effort for defense counsel to attempt an interview. In addition, if officers refuse to talk to defense counsel, that fact may be useful to establish their bias at trial.

Although police officers and other investigators may be reluctant to discuss a case with the defense, the same is not true of most expert witnesses. Pathologists, firearms examiners, serologists, handwriting experts, and many others are often willing to talk to the defense. In addition to providing information about the instant case, these experts can be a valuable source of information on their respective fields. If nothing else, counsel can learn enough to ask intelligent questions in the trial court.

It may be helpful to review documents in the court file and to view any exhibits admitted at an earlier hearing, preliminary examination, or grand jury proceeding. It is particularly important for defense counsel to carefully read all reports to become intimately familiar with the case and to be prepared to deal with any inconsistencies between the reports of different witnesses to the same facts, or between the reports of one witness given at different times. Defense counsel should have a defense investigator interview every prosecution witness and all additional witnesses suggested by this initial interview. Early interviews are strongly recommended in the event follow-up interviews are required.

§30.4 C. Visiting Crime Scene and Viewing Physical Evidence

Actually viewing the crime scene can make a significant difference at trial and should be undertaken in every case, even if things have changed. The authors never cease to be amazed by the difference between their mental images of the crime scene gleaned from reports, pictures, and diagrams, and the real thing.

Counsel should visit the crime scene promptly. Crime scenes change; thus the longer counsel waits to view the scene, the more likely it is that it will have changed. If counsel waits until right before trial, and the key issue in the case is whether a witness could in fact see what he or she claims to have seen, counsel will be hard pressed to argue that pictures taken many months or even several years after the alleged crime corroborate or destroy the witness's testimony. By going to the crime scene as soon as possible, counsel also acquires knowledge that will aid in discussing the location with witnesses. Counsel can then have an investigator or a paralegal take additional pictures and make diagrams that will aid the jury in understanding the case.

After visiting the crime scene, counsel can decide whether and how to preserve and reproduce it for the jury. Pictures and diagrams of the crime scene are generally required, and in some cases, a mock-up of the scene. The miniaturization of videotape cameras and their higher sensitivity to low light levels make videotaping of crime scenes economical and effective. Videotapes provide a full color, comprehensive, and often more dramatic view than still pictures. It is advisable, however, to have some still pictures in addition to the video because they can be used to highlight points during argument. Also, it is easier for a juror to pick up a still picture in the jury room than to have a television brought in so that the video can be viewed. Counsel may decide that it would be advisable to have the jury view the crime scene during the course of the trial. See §33.17 on jury views.

Counsel should go to the crime scene with an investigator so that he or she can testify to any evidence found there. For example, a bullet that was overlooked by police may prove that the defendant was not the killer, the investigator may be able to testify that an eyewitness would have been unable to see what he or she claims to have seen from a particular position, or a witness may be encountered who has important information about the case.

A corollary to viewing the scene is viewing the physical evidence the police and the opposition have collected, e.g., clothing, weapons, wallets, crime scene pictures, and videos. See chap 11 on discovery. Just as with viewing the crime scene, viewing the physical evidence before it is brought into court can make a big difference. It can help support a theory of the case, might lead to additional evidence that was overlooked, or might have a significance to the case that is not understood by the opposition. See §§30.10-30.13 for further discussion of real and demonstrative evidence.

D. Witnesses

§30.5 1. Selecting Witnesses for Trial

Selecting witnesses is often a very different process for prosecutors than it is for defense attorneys. A prosecutor is concerned with establishing all elements of the charged crimes in a direct and comprehensive fashion. If the defendant has an affirmative defense (e.g., alibi, mental state), his or her concerns will be very similar to those of the prosecution. Often, however, the defense will be trying to poke holes in the prosecution's case and draw attention to facts that tend to show the prosecution theory is not solidly based in fact, by, for example, highlighting inconsistencies or showing bias on the part of witnesses.

After investigating the case, counsel may have several potential witnesses and must decide which ones to actually use to prove the prosecution's case-in-chief or an affirmative defense. Counsel's theory of the case plays an important role in witness selection. Counsel needs to decide what function each individual witness will serve if called to testify, e.g., to identify a piece of evidence, to testify to the chain of custody, to serve as a percipient witness, to testify as a victim, to introduce an admission by the defendant, or to substantiate the defendant's alibi. It is frequently helpful to write out why counsel wants each witness to testify and what purpose each witness's testimony serves to check for any duplication. When two or more witnesses are available to testify to the same thing, counsel must decide how many and which witnesses to use.

More does not always mean better. If counsel calls more than one witness to testify to the same events, inconsistencies may be introduced that will weaken the case. Moreover, if counsel calls several witnesses and they all testify exactly alike, the opposition can point out that such an occurrence is contrary to human experience and that they must be testifying from the same script or must have met and reconciled the differences in their stories. The best practice is to call the best available witnesses to establish the point. Two or three witnesses should be sufficient. This practice minimizes inconsistencies, presents the facts in a concise fashion, and does not allow the case to get lost in collateral issues. It also permits counsel to argue that if witnesses who were not called had anything different to say the opposition would have subpoenaed them.

Ø Note: A district attorney making this argument must be careful to avoid Griffin error, discussed in §§23.33, 30.33.

The opposition may then wish to present some of the witnesses who were not called to maximize inconsistencies, prevent facts from being presented concisely, and to confuse the case with collateral issues.

If a witness has given a statement to a police officer or other investigator, and there is even a slight chance that his or her trial testimony will be inconsistent with that statement, then the police or other investigator should be subpoenaed if impeachment testimony is required.

The type of testimony will help establish how many witnesses to call. If several eyewitnesses identify the defendant as the perpetrator, the prosecutor should probably call them all. But if several police officers went to the crime scene and stood by the front door to make sure no one entered until the investigators arrived, only one officer is needed to testify.

The witness who will best communicate the required information to jurors is the one to select when counsel has a choice. That is why interviewing witnesses in person is a significant part of witness selection.

Once the core witnesses have been selected, counsel should consider whether any additional witnesses will enhance the presentation. For example, the prosecutor may want to help the jury experience the terror the victim felt. An effective way of doing this is to call the first person the victim had contact with immediately after the crime to testify to the victim's demeanor and emotional and physical condition at that time ("I woke up to someone pounding on my door.… I was frightened when I looked through the peephole and saw a naked girl, crying hysterically for help, with blood dripping down the side of her head"). Defense counsel with strong evidence that the only alleged eyewitness could not have seen the assailant may want to begin with the defense investigator's testimony and demonstrative evidence.

The selection of witnesses to be called at trial must take into account discovery rights under Pen C §§1054-1054.7. Each side must make pretrial disclosure of the identity of trial witnesses, including experts, together with relevant written or recorded statements or reports of each witness's statement. Pen C §1054.3. Disclosure must be made 30 calendar days before trial. Pen C §1054.7. If material comes into counsel's possession later, it must be disclosed "immediately." Pen C §1054.7. A request for pretrial disclosure is required in order to seek court enforcement of failure to provide this information. Pen C §1054.5(b). Failure to disclose is punishable by various sanctions, with witness preclusion as a last resort. Pen C §1054.5(b). See chap 11 for further discussion of discovery.

§30.6 2. Anticipating Witness Problems

Once it is decided which witnesses to call, counsel must ascertain whether any problems are presented by any of the witnesses. Will the witness have difficulty qualifying as a competent witness because of an inability to understand questions or communicate or because of an inability to understand the duty to tell the truth? See Evid C §701; see, e.g., People v Augustin (2003) 112 CA4th 444, 5 CR3d 171 (witness with cerebral palsy). Are there any legal problems that must be overcome, e.g., hearsay, foundation, privilege, or expertise? Is the witness hostile to counsel's case? Does the witness have communication or language problems that may require an interpreter? Will the witness be available when the case goes to trial? Does the witness need transportation to court? Does the witness have any physical limitations (e.g., is in a wheelchair or is blind) that may make coming to court more difficult and may require special instructions (e.g., where parking or wheelchair access is available).

One way of anticipating witness problems is to avoid creating them. Attorney or investigator discourtesy and poor communication with witnesses can alienate witnesses. It is particularly important to keep witnesses informed of changes in court dates. It is absurd for a witness to lose a day's pay or incur an employer's wrath only to find that the court date has been continued or to find out that his or her testimony is no longer needed. Keeping the witness informed is not only the decent thing to do, it can pay dividends, because a disgruntled witness generally is not a good witness.

The attorney has to engage in a delicate balance of having enough witnesses to fill up the court day, yet not have witnesses needlessly sitting around for days waiting to testify. If possible, counsel should designate an investigator, paralegal, or law clerk as the witness coordinator and assign that person the responsibility of keeping the witnesses informed of when they need to be in court. Effective use of a witness coordinator serves the dual needs of maintaining the requisite flow of witnesses while allowing the attorney to focus on the trial itself. The witness coordinator has enough time to explain the process to witnesses and to decide when witnesses should be told to come to court and when they can be placed on telephone standby. A little courtesy can go a long way in minimizing witness inconvenience and maintaining witness goodwill.

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.7 3. Using Interpreters

If a witness requires an interpreter, counsel should work with the witness and the interpreter before trial to make sure that the interpreter can in fact translate the witness's testimony and to work out any difficulties before the witness testifies. See, e.g., Vasquez v Kirkland (9th Cir 2009) 572 F3d 1029 (deaf and mute witness who communicated through nonstandard sign language testified through American Sign Language interpreter and certified intermediary interpreter). This should be done even if the interpreter is court-certified because the witness may speak a different dialect from the interpreter's, or some cultural interaction might take place between the witness and interpreter that inhibits communication. For example, in some cultures rape victims are shunned, a value judgment that might affect the courtroom interaction between the interpreter and the witness.

Ø Note: In some counties, counsel must notify the court well in advance when an interpreter will be needed for a witness or client.

Counsel should make sure that jurors are not biased against persons who do not speak English fluently, and should ask the court to instruct the jury to look at the witness and not the translator, because the translator will not have the voice inflection and affect of the witness. The witness's body language is evidence that jurors should consider in determining credibility. Jurors who speak the language being interpreted should be instructed to rely only on the interpreter and not on their own language ability. See CALCRIM 120, 121. See also Evid C §§750-755.5.

§30.8 4. Preparing Witnesses to Testify

It is essential that counsel personally talk to all available witnesses before they testify. (See §2.27 on ethical considerations and cautions that apply to interviewing witnesses.) Personal interviews provide the best method an attorney has to anticipate how well a witness will testify. A prosecutor's case-in-chief or an affirmative defense may seem persuasive on paper, but it can be weakened by a key witness's manner of testifying. Counsel who knows about a witness problem well before trial may be able to minimize the problem. If counsel waits until the day the witness is to testify, it is probably too late to work on improving his or her manner of testifying, to plea bargain, to find a replacement witness, or to take the witness's personality and background into account when selecting jurors.

Interviewing a witness will ensure that counsel and the witness are communicating with one another and will allow counsel to evaluate the witness to ascertain how much the witness remembers and the method counsel should use to elicit all information (e.g., simply asking the question, using past recollection recorded, or impeaching the witness). Witnesses also need to be prepared for the courtroom in order to know what to expect and what is expected of them. This includes police officers, for while many people assume they are professional witnesses, frequently nothing can be further from reality, despite training at the police academy on how to testify.

The length of time spent preparing a witness will vary depending on the complexity of the witness's testimony. Some witnesses may require two or three sessions; others may require only enough time to make sure that they can testify to the information counsel plans to introduce.

Counsel must be familiar with a witness's previous statements in order to know what the witness can testify to and whether those statements contain any discrepancies. Statements may be found through conversations with other witnesses or in police reports, signed and taped statements, or previously recorded testimony. Tape-recorded statements and prior testimony are usually reliable; police reports and signed statements, however, are not always accurate or inclusive. Witnesses may sign statements without reading them, may not challenge what the officer wrote down, or, because of the stress under which the statements were made, may not have fully read or understood what was in the documents they signed.

In interviewing witnesses, it is good practice for the attorney to have an investigator present. There are three primary purposes for this:

(1) The investigator hears directly what the witness has to say, so that counsel does not have to repeat it later to the investigator;

(2) The witness knows who the investigator is, so that in subsequent contacts the witness feels at ease; and

(3) If counsel needs to impeach the witness with what the witness said during conversations with counsel, the investigator can be called to testify.

The last reason avoids the awkward and ethical problems of the attorney being a witness in the case. See §2.18 on the attorney as witness.

Counsel should begin preparing the witness by generally describing the experience and purpose of testifying, correct demeanor on the witness stand, clothing to be worn, and, most important, the requirement that the witness tell the truth. Counsel should explain that, if the witness is unsure of an answer, the proper response is to say so rather than to guess.

Counsel should then go over the areas to be covered in the witness's testimony. Preparation need not consist of taking the witness through a question-and-answer script, but counsel should familiarize the witness with the areas to be covered and how the questions may be phrased to make sure the witness understands counsel's approach. Counsel should describe what happens when there is an objection, and what to do if the judge says "sustained" or "overruled."

The witness should be shown any exhibits (or copies of exhibits) that will be used during the course of testimony to ensure that he or she can identify or discuss them accurately. Counsel should explain any questions that must be asked to lay a foundation for the exhibit's admission into evidence, e.g., does this picture fairly reflect the condition of the apartment at the time of the incident? A witness who will be expected to explain or use a diagram or chart during testimony should be familiar with it. If the witness will mark the exhibit in any fashion, counsel should go over the procedure. Spontaneity may be exciting, but it is very difficult to undo the confusion generated by a witness who marks an exhibit in the wrong location because of lack of familiarity with the exhibit or misunderstanding of the procedure to be followed.

Discrepancies between the witness's current memory and prior testimony or statements should be probed in detail. Apparent inconsistencies can often be reconciled. Questions that might be asked include these:

- Did the police officer misquote the witness in his or her report?
- Did the police officer leave anything out or fail to ask a follow-up question?
- What was the context in which the statement was made?
- Did the witness read the statement?
- What was the witness's state of mind (e.g., was he or she under unusual stress)?
- Does the statement clearly contradict an earlier statement, or is it something that was not mentioned before?

Ø Note: Counsel must be careful to avoid any hint that he or she may have influenced the witness's testimony. It is, at best, embarrassing to have a witness explain that his or her current testimony differs from an earlier statement because the district attorney or defense attorney told him or her what to say.

If the witness has any special qualification that adds credence to his or her testimony, counsel should explain how it will be developed through the witness's testimony. For example, the witness's background as a portrait artist with training in observing facial features may help corroborate an identification of the defendant.

After preparing the witness for direct examination, counsel should prepare the witness for cross-examination. Examples of negative issues that may be raised include prior felony convictions, motive to fabricate, and inability to observe what the witness claims to have seen.

Witness preparation includes not only evidence to be elicited during testimony but also matters that are not to be mentioned. This area includes matters that the court has ordered not be raised (e.g., polygraph examinations), statements of codefendants, and topics that counsel wants to avoid so that the door is not opened for the opposition to cross-examine on them (e.g., character evidence of one of counsel's witnesses).

The witness should be assured that it is not improper to meet with counsel to prepare for direct and cross-examination. This may seem obvious, but many witnesses, when confronted on cross-examination with a question about advance preparation, become flustered and fear that because the question is asked there might have been something improper in meeting with counsel and will deny that the meeting occurred.

Counsel should issue or order subpoenas early enough to allow the witnesses to be found and served. If the witness is in court when a trial date is set, counsel can ask the court to order the witness to appear on the date set for trial. Counsel can also have the witness accept service when he or she comes to the office to be interviewed. For further discussion of subpoenas, see §§4.39-4.47.

§30.9 5. Interviewing Opposition Witnesses

Counsel should try to interview all witnesses, particularly those who will testify for the opposition. An investigator should be present during the interview so that he or she can impeach the witness at trial, if necessary, with the witness's statement.

Counsel should not discuss the case with a represented codefendant without the consent of the codefendant's attorney, even if the codefendant plans to testify. Cal Rules of Prof Cond 2-100; see §2.35. Witnesses in a criminal case who testify for the prosecution are not considered to be represented by the prosecutor; defense counsel may approach them directly unless they are represented by another attorney concerning their testimony in that case. See chap 51 on representing witnesses.

Each side is obligated not to interfere with communication by attorneys or investigators from the other side with witnesses who would otherwise be willing to discuss the case. See Walker v Superior Court (1957) 155 CA2d 134, 139, 317 P2d 130; ABA Model Rules of Prof Cond 3.4. See §30.3 for discussion of interviewing police officers and district attorney investigators. On ethical problems in communicating with the opposing party's experts and consultants, see §2.35.

Counsel should try to obtain disclosure of opposition witness statements and reports before interviewing those witnesses. See Pen C §§1054.1, 1054.3, and discussion in chap 11 on discovery of witness statements and reports.

§30.10 E. Evidence in Place of Witnesses

Evidence can take many forms. Attorneys should not overlook stipulations, judicial notice, business records, official records, or prior sworn testimony. The use of these alternatives to live witnesses can greatly reduce the length of the trial and the number of witnesses to be called. Counsel should not, however, use them merely to save time. What must be determined is whether a witness's presence in court enhances the presentation of the evidence. For example, when introducing a business record, counsel might consider asking opposing counsel to stipulate to the foundation to avoid having the custodian of records testify. Of course, the custodian of records might be necessary to explain the significance of the records.

For discussion of these issues, see Effective Introduction of Evidence in California, chaps 13 (business records), 28 (former testimony), 31 (judicial notice), 36 (official records), 51 (stipulations) (2d ed Cal CEB 2000).

§30.11 F. Examining and Testing Physical Evidence; Further Investigation

Physical evidence should be viewed as soon as possible after it is obtained to allow time for any forensic examinations that might be required, e.g., blood or DNA analysis, stain analysis, or bullet analysis.

Ideas for further investigation usually develop from reading all reports, statements, transcripts, and documentation on the case and any ancillary cases; inspecting the crime scene; interviewing significant witnesses; and examining physical evidence such as clothing, pictures, or weapons. Counsel may want to have additional witnesses contacted for statements, pictures taken, videotapes or diagrams prepared, and criminalistics performed, and take steps to see that police radio or telephone tapes are preserved.

The mandated disclosure of defense and prosecution expert witnesses, their reports, and tests performed under Pen C §§1054-1054.7 may suggest additional areas of investigation. See chap 11 for further discussion.

G. Demonstrative Evidence

§30.12 1. Reasons for Using Demonstrative Evidence

People remember what they see longer than what they hear. When the two senses are combined, learning and retention improve even more. Thus, if a trial consists only of the testimony of witnesses, jurors will not recall as much as they would if the testimony were combined with demonstrative evidence. Visual evidence can also help clarify a witness's testimony.

Demonstrative evidence is helpful in re-creating the crime. Words alone are inadequate to take the jury's attention from the sterile environment of the courtroom and focus it on the scene of the crime so they can see, hear, and feel as the witnesses did at the time of the occurrence. This result can be achieved only through demonstrative evidence.

Demonstrative evidence also plays an important role in maintaining the jury's interest in counsel's case. Few people have the ability to verbally describe a scene so that all listeners create the same image in their minds. When a picture is used, however, everyone knows what the witness is talking about.

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.13 2. Selecting and Creating Demonstrative Evidence

Counsel needs to think creatively about which audio and visual aids will help the jury to be more interested and to better understand and remember counsel's case. Photographs, videotapes, diagrams, maps, models, clothing, documents, and charts are common forms of demonstrative evidence. The use of computer-generated graphics and animations is becoming more common. See People v Hood (1997) 53 CA4th 965, 968, 62 CR2d 137 (ordinary rules applicable to demonstrative evidence determine admissibility of computer animation).

To know what items of demonstrative evidence to use at trial, counsel must have a thorough understanding of the case. To have evidence ready when trial begins, counsel must begin preparation at least 1 month before trial. A good place to start in compiling a list of evidence for trial is with evidence seized by the police. It is important for the attorney to view and examine every item of evidence that has been collected, not only to decide what items to use during trial, but to more thoroughly understand the case. For example, whether clothing is damaged and where the damage is located may make or break counsel's case; or if the defendant claims not to have known the victim but has the victim's address in his or her pocket, the attorney certainly needs to know about it.

After deciding what demonstrative evidence to present, counsel must decide on the type of mounting or manner in which the evidence will be displayed to the jury. Demonstrative evidence should be large enough to enable the jury to clearly see all details as the witness or counsel describes their significance. Many types of demonstrative evidence can be created easily and inexpensively on computers with the required graphic capability.

For further discussion of the foundation necessary for admitting demonstrative evidence, see Effective Introduction of Evidence in California, chap 39 (2d ed Cal CEB 2000); California Trial Practice: Civil Procedure During Trial, chap 13 (3d ed Cal CEB 1995).

Computer-generated presentations (e.g., PowerPoint) incorporated into opening statements, direct and cross-examination, and arguments can be very effective in communicating the case to the jury. Such presentations can capture the jury's attention and allow counsel to engage the minds of jury members on multiple levels. During examination of witnesses, the exhibit can be simultaneously presented to the witness and the jury, facilitating the jurors' understanding of the witness's testimony. In argument, counsel can not only outline the major points of the case and do away with the podium and notes, but also can creatively weave various important pieces of the evidence (pictures, charts, video- and audiotapes) into a powerful and compelling presentation that is persuasive and holds the jurors' attention.

Presentations take time and thought to prepare. In addition to creating the presentation, counsel must anticipate legal or procedural objections that may be raised by opposing counsel or the court or both (e.g., publishing exhibits to the jury before a foundation has been fully laid). Anticipation allows counsel to craft the presentation of their case or work through any objections in hearings in advance, outside the jury's presence. Also, there are logistical problems that have to be worked out in advance:

(1) Familiarity with the program to operate it effectively;

(2) Making sure the courtroom has the power outlets necessary for your computer and projector;

(3) Deciding where to set up the equipment and screen in the courtroom;

(4) Assessing whether a technician is needed to set up the equipment;

(5) Making sure the equipment gets to the courtroom; and

(6) Creating a fallback plan if there is an equipment/operator glitch or failure.

§30.14 H. Preparing Motions and Trial Briefs; Trial Notebook

Once counsel is familiar with the case, potential legal issues should be obvious. Some pretrial motions may be necessary to obtain desired evidence or to eliminate undesirable evidence. See the checklist of pretrial motions in §18.4.

As the time for trial nears, counsel should research and write trial memorandums on any important evidentiary issues, e.g., hearsay objections or exceptions, admissibility of photographs, and character evidence.

If the case involves a key legal issue, a trial brief should be prepared on it. Trial briefs impress the court and make counsel more confident through familiarity with the relevant law. If the case turns on the defendant's similar acts of misconduct, admissibility of a hearsay statement, competency of a witness, statement of a defendant, or character evidence, then a trial brief outlining the law and citing cases that are on point may be essential.

Counsel may wish to create a notebook or file for each major witness. At trial, there is nothing worse than fumbling through volumes of transcripts, police reports, notes, and exhibits trying to find the one piece of paper that will allow counsel to destroy the witness. The jury stares; the witness regains his or her composure; the judge's fingers drum on the bench; and counsel grows more frustrated and self-conscious and less able to find the missing document.

Organization is crucial to every case, and the more complex and important the case the more significant the role that organization will play. Jurors are impressed with well-organized lawyers and are put off by those who are not. These impressions will be carried through to the end of the trial when counsel stands before them and argues the case. In the jurors' minds, organization and professionalism go hand in hand. If jurors see that counsel is not well organized, they may not take his or her closing argument as seriously as that of a more organized opponent.

The two most common forms of organization are the notebook system and the file system. Whichever format is used, it should be simple and allow counsel to easily and quickly find reports, statements, testimony, and legal authority for issues that may arise.

In the notebook system, counsel uses one or more three-ring binders with index dividers that are labeled (e.g., jury voir dire questions, police reports) and outlines or checklists for direct testimony and cross-examination, criminalist reports, exhibits, trial memos, argument, experts, and instructions. While we like to think we can remember everything, in the heat of a courtroom battle it is easy to miss an important point. Checklists are thus essential.

The notebook can be further divided into a section for each witness that includes prior statements and transcripts, reports involving the witness, and an outline for examination of the witness. Reports can be photocopied and placed in several sections for ease of retrieval. Counsel should decide in advance whether exhibits will be used to enhance the witness's testimony and should note on the witness sheet the exhibits counsel plans to use with the witness, cross-referenced to counsel's exhibit list. If counsel anticipates any legal problems with a witness's testimony, e.g., competency or hearsay, then notes on the legal requirements needed to lay the appropriate foundation or legal arguments that counter any objection to the testimony's admissibility should be included.

In a file system, counsel uses a box or a file cabinet on rollers with separate files for each topic.

It is now common for attorneys to use computer programs to organize files and make them easily accessible in the courtroom. This practice is particularly advantageous in a large case involving voluminous materials. It is obviously easier to carry a laptop than boxes of files or numerous notebooks. However, there are drawbacks: programs require a certain amount of expertise to operate effectively and counsel may not have time to acquire this expertise; it is more difficult to show a document to a witness for impeachment or other purposes when it is only available as an image on a screen, and use of a computer subjects counsel to the vicissitudes of power outages and computer crashes. Computer use is probably best left to large and complex cases when counsel will have time to master the technology. Whatever system is used, counsel should be thoroughly familiar with it and be able to access documents quickly and accurately.

§30.15 I. Developing Theory of Case

After obtaining a working knowledge of the case, counsel needs to ponder its strengths and weaknesses and develop a theory of the case to present to the jury. A theory of the case provides a sense of continuity and comprehension for jurors. It explains what the case is all about (e.g., self-defense, consent, misidentification, misunderstanding, jealousy, profit, retaliation). It focuses the case and provides a framework that helps jurors understand the case and form an opinion about the defendant's guilt or innocence.

Ø Note: Counsel should be alert to the potential for having to revise the theory of the case in light of developments during trial. Some cases lend themselves to alternative theories.

Even when the defense will not present witnesses or other evidence of its own, defense counsel can make jurors aware of defense themes through the opening statement, cross-examination, instructions, and closing argument.

A review of the chapters Elements of Crime and Defenses in 1 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law (3d ed 2000), of Judicial Council of California Criminal Jury Instructions (CALCRIM), and of Lundy's FORECITE California will often help to identify and refine theories. It can also assist in identifying discovery issues, tactics, evidence issues, and ideas for original jury instructions not found in CALCRIM.

Prosecutors should outline every element of the case, and list next to each one what witnesses or evidence will be used to prove it. Defense attorneys should do the same for defense witnesses. Both sides should list points to be made through cross-examination of opposing witnesses. See the checklist of defenses in §32.12.

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.16 J. Using Jury Instructions to Prepare Case

Once counsel has developed the central theory of the case, the next task is to determine what testimony and evidence must be presented to prove that theory. A common approach is to go through Judicial Council of California Criminal Jury Instructions (CALCRIM) and see which instructions on the elements of the crime or defenses will apply, then outline what must be proved to obtain the jury instructions desired. In addition, other instructions such as those on willful destruction of evidence, the defendant's good character, or flight as evidence of guilt may give counsel ideas about issues that can be raised.

Ø Note: Although the use of CALCRIM instructions is "strongly encouraged" (see Cal Rules of Ct 2.1050(e)), other sources of instructions can be helpful in giving counsel ideas for the case. See particularly Rucker & Overland, California Criminal Practice, Motions, Jury Instructions and Sentencing (3d ed 2004), and Lundy, FORECITE California. See also chap 32.

After deciding what evidence must be introduced or elicited from witnesses, counsel needs to decide how to produce the evidence during trial in the most persuasive fashion. This is the "orchestration" of the case.

III. PRESENTATION OF CASE

§30.17 A. Deciding What Type of Jurors Are Needed

Counsel begins to prepare for jury selection by analyzing the case, examining its strengths and weaknesses, and researching the applicable law. While doing so, counsel should make notes of the types of jurors who will be responsive or adverse to specific aspects of the case. While interviewing witnesses, counsel should constantly ask: What type of juror might be biased against this witness or might empathize with this witness? In examining the law that will be applied to the case, the same questions should run through counsel's mind.

The next step is to compose jury voir dire questions that will reveal prospective jurors' attitudes about the case. Open-ended questions are preferable because they give jurors an opportunity to reveal their true feelings about relevant issues.

Ø Note: The trial judge may require the attorneys to give the judge their requested jury voir dire questions in writing before the pre-voir dire conference begins. This applies both to questions to be asked orally and to questions to be asked by written questionnaire. Judicial Council Form MC-002, Juror Questionnaire for Criminal Cases, may be used. Cal Rules of Ct 4.200(b).

Part of trial preparation should include learning how the various judges who may be assigned to the case approach jury voir dire so that counsel can be properly prepared for the pre-voir dire conference when the case is assigned to a trial court. Counsel needs to know the judge's attitude and approach in jury voir dire to know what to expect and what hurdles counsel will have to leap to get a fair jury. For example, if the court uses a questionnaire, counsel should have already reviewed it and should come to court with any desired modifications.

Although the law again permits attorneys the right to personally voir dire prospective jurors, voir dire is still limited to questions directed at exercising challenges for cause. CCP §223. The court can, and probably will, impose time limits on counsel. Further, there are judges with definite views about what kinds of questions are relevant to challenges for cause. An attorney who is appearing before a judge known to impose strict limits on attorney voir dire should walk into court with an extensive brief focusing on the areas that need to be covered, why these areas go to challenges for cause, and why counsel should be permitted to ask these questions personally. See People v Chapman (1993) 15 CA4th 136, 141, 18 CR2d 738. For further discussion of jury selection, see chap 29.

§30.18 B. Pre-Voir Dire Conference

Pre-voir dire conferences are required in all criminal cases. Cal Rules of Ct 4.200. The rule requires the court and counsel to discuss the nature of the case, the legal issues involved, the witnesses to be called, and the court's jury selection practice. These areas include the court's procedure for dealing with excusing jurors for hardship, areas of inquiry to be covered in voir dire by the judge and permitted to be covered by the attorneys, guidelines and time limits on attorney voir dire, and manner of exercising challenges. See discussion of sequestered voir dire in §§14.14, 14.29, 29.20, 54.25.

Rule 4.200 also requires the court to find out the following from counsel:

- The charges and nature of the case;
- The names of witnesses who will testify;
- The prosecution's theory of the case;
- The defense's theory of the case, unless defense counsel asks to be excused from disclosing it (the court must grant this request);
- The schedule for the trial and its predicted length;
- The number of, and procedure for selecting, alternate jurors; and
- The procedure for making Batson-Wheeler objections.

Counsel may want to ask the court for a general ruling excluding witnesses from the courtroom throughout the trial, except when they are testifying. Evid C §777. This section does not apply to defendants.

§30.19 C. Motions in Limine

An in limine motion is a request by a party to admit or exclude evidence made before the evidence is presented to the trier of fact. It is made outside the jury's presence. People v Morris (1991) 53 C3d 152, 188, 279 CR 720, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394. See also Evid C §402(b).

Most cases involve evidentiary issues that have to be discussed outside the jury's presence. Motions in limine are the ideal tool to handle such issues as photographs that may be too gruesome, impeachment of the defendant or witnesses with prior felony convictions or moral turpitude misconduct, admissibility of uncharged acts of the defendant under Evid C §§1101, 1108, and 1109, and the victim's prior sexual conduct. For a variety of reasons, such matters should be decided before the jury is selected, if the judge consents. An early decision allows counsel to know whether the matter will come before the jury. If it will, counsel may want to cover that subject in jury voir dire because it may affect the type of jurors counsel wants. An early decision also allows counsel to address the issue in opening statement. Another benefit of an early decision is to allow an uninterrupted presentation of the case. If counsel builds the testimony of a witness to a climax, shows the witness photographs, and then the opposition objects, causing the jury to be excused from the courtroom so that the judge can decide whether the photos should be excluded under Evid C §352, then the dramatic moment is broken, the flow of the case is interrupted, and jurors and witness are inconvenienced.

Because in limine rulings are not binding on the trial court (People v Karis (1988) 46 C3d 612, 634 n16, 250 CR 659), if evidence introduced at trial changes the basis for the court's in limine ruling, counsel should feel free to ask the court to reconsider its ruling. Morris, 53 C3d at 189.

Ø Note: Once the court rules on a motion in limine, trial counsel must remember to inform any affected witness that the court, as a result of an in limine motion, has ordered that a specific issue not be mentioned.

Normally, an evidentiary objection made as an in limine motion that is not renewed when the affected evidence is introduced during trial is not preserved for appeal unless counsel obtains a stipulation from opposing counsel and the court that the objection is to be deemed to have been made. This is commonly called the reiteration requirement. An exception arises if a specific objection is directed to an identifiable body of evidence and is advanced when the court can see that evidence in context, i.e., no further evidence is introduced that changes the relevant facts concerning the issue ruled on. People v Morris, supra.

Ø Note: To make sure that appellate rights are preserved, if counsel has made an in limine objection to particular evidence and does not want to object to it again in front of the jury, counsel should obtain a stipulation that the in limine objection is also deemed to have been made when the evidence is introduced at trial.

D. Opening Statements

§30.20 1. Purpose and Style

Counsel for all parties may make an opening statement. Pen C §1093(b). No time limit is set by statute, but local court rules and local practice should be consulted. Occasionally, the trial judge sets time limits on opening statements.

The opening statement gives the trier of fact an overview of the case. It is not an argument, but it can be persuasive without being argumentative. A frequently used analogy is that the opening statement provides a "road map" of the evidence expected to be presented during the trial.

A frequent error of inexperienced attorneys is to list the witnesses to be called and summarize each witness's testimony. It is more effective and informative to act as a storyteller, giving jurors the highlights and introducing the important characters.

Another approach is to make the opening statement like a preview of coming attractions at the movies or a promotional teaser on television. This method gives the jury an understanding of the overall case to aid them in placing each witness's testimony or piece of evidence into the larger picture. It grabs their attention yet it does not take away from the impact of the evidence when it is finally presented to them.

It is not necessary to detail every piece of evidence or every important item. It is often wise to leave a significant piece of evidence out of the opening statement (e.g., evidence that the defendant tried to have the key witness killed to prevent that witness from testifying, or that the key opposition witness has two perjury convictions) so that it will have a greater impact when it emerges during the presentation of evidence.

The attorney may want to use visual aids during the opening statement. Visual aids are especially effective in a complex case in which many incidents or counts are involved. For example, a map or an outline of the charges, broken down into individual incidents, may be helpful. It is proper to use any demonstrative evidence in an opening statement that will be introduced into evidence. People v Green (1956) 47 C2d 209, 215, 302 P2d 307 (prosecution's opening statement); People v Kirk (1974) 43 CA3d 921, 929, 117 CR 345 (same). Counsel should show these aids to the judge and opposing counsel before attempting to use them. It is within the trial court's discretion to allow or not allow demonstrative evidence during opening statement. People v Green, supra.

Ø Note: Opening statements can lead jurors to take sides before any evidence is presented. The persuasiveness of a prosecutor's opening statement was illustrated by a "muffled shout" of "he's guilty" from a juror after the prosecutor's opening statement in U.S. v Armstrong (9th Cir 1990) 909 F2d 1238, 1244 (alleged juror misconduct did not affect defendant's right to fair trial). A prosecutor who uses "deceptive or reprehensible methods" to persuade the jury commits misconduct, but an opening statement outlining what the evidence shows and will show at trial does not give rise to a misconduct claim. People v Cook (2006) 39 C4th 566, 606, 47 CR3d 22.

§30.21 2. Timing

The prosecution has the first opportunity to make an opening statement. Pen C §1093(b). It is the authors' view that, in jury trials, the prosecution should always make an opening statement. It gives the jury the prosecution's overview of the case, focuses the jury's attention on the issues most important to the prosecution, and, if done effectively, creates a favorable impression that makes the jury more receptive to prosecution evidence.

The defense can make an opening statement immediately after the prosecution's opening statement or can wait until before the presentation of the defense case ("reserve it"). Pen C §1093(b). Talented and experienced defense attorneys frequently disagree on which is the better choice.

The main argument in favor of an early opening statement is that first impressions are powerful and lasting. Jurors may decide at the beginning of trial whether the defendant is guilty and, if they hear nothing from the defense, may conclude that the defendant must be guilty. If counsel is confident in its case, and if putting the prosecutor on notice of it does not create a tactical disadvantage, defense counsel can make effective use of an opening statement at the beginning of trial to shoot holes in the prosecution's case and focus the jury's attention at the outset on issues significant to the defense. Yet, by making an early opening statement, the defense may alert the prosecution to the nature of the defense, or to more details than were given to the prosecution during discovery. See discussion of prosecutorial discovery in §§11.9-11.11.

Reserving the opening statement until after the prosecution has presented its case may allow the defense to take full advantage of the prosecution's lack of preparation for the defense case. If defense counsel decides to reserve its opening statement, counsel may wish to ask the court to explain to the jury the options the defense has, remind the jury that the burden of proof is on the prosecution, and point out that counsel is merely following the rules on the presentation of evidence and is not trying to hide something. See Pen C §1093(b).

Waiving an opening statement entirely is also a possibility for the defense, which may be considered when counsel has little or no evidence to offer on the defendant's behalf. See, e.g., People v Carter (2005) 36 C4th 1114, 1189, 1193, 32 CR3d 759 (defense counsel "was placed in the extremely challenging position of representing a defendant clearly linked to the deaths of five women, four of whom died by strangulation within days of each other, as well as to the near fatality by strangulation of a sixth woman"). In general, however, this is the worst alternative because it allows the prosecutor to make an opening statement without rebuttal, and to present the case-in-chief and closing argument before the jury hears anything from defense counsel. Even if the defense can offer only a general denial, this can usually be worked into an opening statement.

E. Direct Examination

§30.22 1. Preparation for Direct Examination

Counsel should use an outline of the evidence to be elicited from each witness whether on direct or cross-examination. The courtroom is a stressful environment; even the most skilled and experienced trial attorney would be foolhardy to rely on memory alone during direct examination. Although the outline should be used as little as possible during the actual examination, counsel can request a moment from the court to review the outline once the questioning is completed to make sure that nothing has been omitted. The outline should include both the testimony to be elicited and the exhibits to be used with each witness, to ensure that exhibits will not be overlooked.

Ø Note: Counsel should avoid interrupting the flow of the examination by having physical evidence marked at a break before examination of the witness begins.

Some attorneys go beyond a simple outline and write out each question to be asked. While this approach may ensure that questions will not be objectionable, it can result in a monotonous and stilted presentation, which presumes that the witness will respond in a predetermined way. This is not only ineffective and unrealistic (assuming that the witness has not been given a script), but it can deprive the attorney of the flexibility of taking advantage of responses that are helpful to the case. There are exceptions, of course; some attorneys are able to use written questions, yet remain flexible and appear spontaneous.

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.23 2. Order of Presentation of Witnesses

Once counsel knows who will testify and what that testimony will be, counsel can concentrate on the order of witnesses to ensure the greatest impact on the jury. Counsel is much like the director of a play, who needs to grab the audience's attention and keep it. There is no single method of presenting evidence. Although most attorneys present cases chronologically, it is sometimes better to start at the end (e.g., finding the body) and then jump to the beginning, and occasionally it may be most effective to start in the middle. If counsel has provided jurors with a memorable road map of the case in the opening statement, the order in which evidence is presented can be varied as needed to have the greatest impact on the jury.

Pacing and timing are important. The case should peak to dramatic moments, but should also have a few valleys to make the peaks noticeable. Key witnesses should be presented when the jury is fresh and alert, while less important witnesses, e.g., chain of custody or exhibit identification witnesses, can be put on late in the day when jurors are more likely to be tired.

Counsel should expect his or her grand design to be interrupted. The pathologist or treating physician may suddenly become unavailable (thus, it is good practice to put physicians on as the first witness in the morning); the investigating officer may be busy investigating a homicide; or the prison system may fail to deliver the star witness. Some of these problems can be anticipated and possibly avoided; others cannot. Counsel should remain flexible and be ready to proceed with a different witness when necessary because many judges will not allow a continuance during trial if other witnesses have been subpoenaed.

Jurors' attention span is limited. It is bad practice to call several technical experts consecutively, e.g., a criminalist, fingerprint expert, doctor, psychiatrist, or crime-scene technician, and expect jurors to concentrate at all times.

Counsel should also keep in mind the attention span of witnesses, especially children. Children need frequent breaks. Like adults, they are most alert at the beginning of the day. If a child cannot testify on the morning planned, it is best to send him or her home and schedule that testimony for the next morning.

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.24 3. Style of Direct Examination

In examining a witness, communication between the witness, the examining attorney, and the jury is of the utmost importance. The lawyer should speak like someone engaged in everyday conversation, not talking down to the witness, and avoiding jargon by using simple words whenever possible (e.g., "before" instead of "prior to," and "after" instead of "subsequent to").

On direct examination, the witness should generally be the focal point of the jury's attention. The attorney serves merely as a conduit to direct the flow of testimony and highlight significant points. The attorney should minimize his or her own presence and not distract the jury's attention from the witness. An exception to the rule occurs when the witness is hostile or the attorney wants to highlight a particular point. To achieve this goal, the attorney may take center stage from the witness.

On direct as on cross-examination, the attorney should rarely ask a question without knowing the answer. The courtroom is not the place to go fishing with new questions involving areas not fully covered with the witness, for this frequently ends in disaster.

On direct examination, see Effective Direct & Cross-Examination (Cal CEB 1986); California Expert Witness Guide, chap 13 (2d ed Cal CEB 1991); Effective Introduction of Evidence in California (2d ed Cal CEB 2000).

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.25 F. Cross-Examination

As a rule, the cross-examiner should aim for one or more of the following goals during cross-examination:

- Impeach the witness with prior inconsistent statements;
- Discredit the witness's direct testimony on substantial issues;
- Corroborate matters that are significant to the cross-examiner's case; and
- Establish bias, interest, or motive for the witness's testimony.

For a more thorough list of the goals of cross-examination, see CALCRIM 105; see also CALJIC 2.20.

Seldom is a witness totally destroyed no matter how clever the cross-examiner appears to be. In fact, a too forceful cross-examination can be harmful if the jury perceives the witness as an underdog who is relentlessly attacked by counsel. Courtesy is a requisite for attorneys during cross-examination as it is throughout the trial. Not every witness to be cross-examined is a liar. As with all rules, however, there are exceptions. Sometimes counsel must be aggressive, and if this is done with an appropriate witness, the jury will understand.

Attorneys should remember that cross-examination is not required. Often, the best cross-examination is counsel's statement "No questions, thank you."

Cross-examination is often perceived as more crucial to the defense than to the prosecution because the defense frequently relies solely on the cross-examination of the prosecution's witnesses to develop its case. However, many a close case has been won or lost on the quality (or its lack) of the prosecutor's cross-examination. Whether the defense or prosecution is doing the cross-examination, the same principles apply. Counsel should anticipate what he or she wants to elicit from each witness and prepare an outline for the cross-examination accordingly. If it will be necessary to impeach the witness, it is particularly important for counsel to have a thorough knowledge of the witness's prior statements and to be able to quickly locate any inconsistencies.

> Ø Note: Although not usually done, the court can limit cross-examination to a "reasonable" time period. People v Ducu (1991) 226 CA3d 1412, 1415, 277 CR 464. In addition, the court can impose other reasonable limits on cross-examination because of concerns such as marginal relevance, repetition, harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, or the witness's safety. See Fowler v Sacramento County Sheriff's Dep't (9th Cir 2005) 421 F3d 1027, 1035.

On cross-examination, see Effective Direct & Cross-Examination (Cal CEB 1986); California Expert Witness Guide, chaps 14-15 (2d ed Cal CEB 1991).

G. Objections

§30.26 1. Trial Strategy

Generally, skilled trial lawyers make few objections during trial—not because the form of the question is usually proper, but because there is often more to lose than to gain from an objection. An objection calls the jury's attention to the question and may make it appear that the attorney is trying to hide information from jurors. Moreover, objections are often ineffective, particularly when made to the form of the question because a skilled lawyer can rephrase the question in a nonobjectionable fashion. Objections should be saved for when they are significant, e.g., when necessary to perfect the record on appeal, or when they are likely to result in the exclusion of evidence.

When counsel does object, the objection should "fairly [apprise] the trial court of the issue it is being called upon to decide." People v Scott (1978) 21 C3d 284, 290, 145 CR 876; see People v Mattson (1990) 50 C3d 826, 854, 268 CR 802. The court must rule on all objections. See Fibreboard Paper Prods. Corp. v East Bay Union of Machinists (1964) 227 CA2d 675, 698, 39 CR 64. See also California Trial Objections §4.20 (Cal CEB Annual).

Ø Note: Some attorneys review the Evidence Code before each trial to refresh their memory of the bases for objections and the grounds for the admissibility of evidence.

Lawyers can avoid most important objections during trial by planning ahead whenever possible. With the broad discovery now available to both prosecution and defense, attorneys should be able to anticipate the issues that are likely to arise. Evidence of questionable admissibility can be dealt with before the witness testifies by motions in limine (discussed in §§30.19, 31.8). Similarly, a competent attorney will obtain court approval of any questionable legal issue out of the jury's presence and before the issue arises during trial to avoid interruptions in the flow of the case and a possible mistrial.

Information on the form and substance of trial objections is in Trial Objections.

© The Regents of the University of California

§30.27 2. Objections to Attorney Misconduct

Counsel should be specific in objecting to misconduct at any stage of the trial, especially during closing argument. Conduct may be found improper by the court on appeal, but the error may be held to have been waived by the failure to object or by an ambiguous objection, on the ground that the effect of the misconduct could have been cured by a timely admonition. See, e.g., People v Bloom (1989) 48 C3d 1194, 1213, 259 CR 669; People v Bittaker (1989) 48 C3d 1046, 1104, 259 CR 630.

A showing of "bad faith" is not required to establish attorney misconduct. The standard is an objective one. "We observe that the term prosecutorial 'misconduct' is somewhat of a misnomer to the extent that it suggests a prosecutor must act with a culpable state of mind. A more apt description of the transgression is prosecutorial error." People v Hill (1998) 17 C4th 800, 823 n1, 72 CR2d 656. In People v Bolton (1979) 23 C3d 208, 212, 152 CR 141, the California Supreme Court eliminated bad faith as a prerequisite for establishing prosecutorial misconduct, explaining: "The emphasis on intentionality is misplaced. 'Injury to the appellant is nonetheless an injury because it was committed inadvertently rather than intentionally.'" (Citation omitted.)

Cases in the last decade generally mention two requirements for objecting to attorney misconduct: an objection and a request for an admonition. See, e.g., People v Bloom, supra; People v Heldenburg (1990) 219 CA3d 468, 268 CR 255; People v Martinez (1987) 191 CA3d 1372, 1384, 237 CR 219. Earlier cases required the objection to be asserted as an assignment of misconduct. See, e.g., People v Hampton (1956) 47 C2d 239, 302 P2d 300. The better practice now seems to be to follow these steps: (1) make a timely objection; (2) describe the misconduct to which objection is made; (3) specify the grounds for the objection; and (4) request specific relief.

The requested relief should be tailored to the harm. The most common types of relief are an admonition to disregard the misconduct and a mistrial. Less common is asking the court to hold opposing counsel in contempt. If the court's corrective action is insufficient, counsel should make a further record establishing with specificity why the relief is insufficient and why the requested relief should be granted. See People v Heldenburg, supra. For a suggested admonition, see People v Bolton (1979) 23 C3d 208, 216 n5, 152 CR 141.

Attorney misconduct applies to both prosecutors and defense attorneys. Although the prosecution may not appeal a trial acquittal, it is important for the court to hold defense counsel accountable because it may affect the outcome of the case. The prosecutor may request an admonishment or an instruction that defense counsel's statement, argument, or line of questioning is improper and should be disregarded.

§30.28 H. Deciding Whether Defendant Should Testify

One of the most difficult decisions for defense counsel in preparing a case is whether to have the defendant testify. Some attorneys believe that the defendant should testify whenever possible because jurors find it difficult to acquit otherwise. In the authors' opinion, however, defense counsel should keep the defendant off the stand unless he or she has an exceptionally good story to tell and can perform well under cross-examination. If the defendant tells an unbelievable story or comes across as less than believable on cross-examination, a jury may well decide that the defendant is lying because he or she is guilty. In other words, reasonable doubt goes out the window and the trial becomes a credibility contest between prosecution witnesses and the defendant. Although the absence of a defendant's testimony may raise questions, the judge will inform the jury that they can draw no inferences from the fact that the defendant did not testify (CALCRIM 355). After hearing that instruction, the jury will be more amenable to concentrating on any weaknesses in the prosecution's case.

In some cases, the defendant should be encouraged to testify—especially when his or her testimony is necessary to provide the factual basis for the defense (e.g., when the defense is consent in a sexual assault case or self-defense in a homicide case). If the defendant is to testify, every effort must be made to enhance the defendant's credibility. Many defendants are not naturally effective witnesses and preparation is essential. Preparation may include practice cross-examination by an attorney not associated with the case. Videotaping may be helpful, particularly when the defendant appears evasive or has an off-putting mannerism of which he or she is not aware. Preparation may also convince a defendant who intended to offer a palpably absurd story not to testify.

The defendant has a constitutional right to testify (People v Robles (1970) 2 C3d 205, 215, 85 CR 166) and to refrain from testifying (US Const amends V, XIV; Cal Const art I, §15; see CALCRIM 355). Whatever decision the defendant makes, the court should advise the defendant on the record and out of the jury's presence of the right to testify or not testify. This procedure avoids any future claim that the defendant was either forced to testify or denied the right to testify. The prosecution wants this on the record to avoid an appealable issue, and defense counsel wants the matter on the record to avoid a later claim of inadequate representation of counsel. This advisement can be an important part of the record on appeal or on habeas. See, e.g., U.S. v Layton (ND Cal 1987) 666 F Supp 1369, 1372, aff'd (9th Cir 1988) 855 F2d 1388, 1416. Layton suggests a variety of ways counsel can contemporaneously memorialize investigation, preparation, and trial decisions to ensure adequate recollection in a later challenge.

Under the reciprocal discovery rules, the defense need not disclose to the prosecution whether the defendant will testify as a witness. Pen C §1054.3(a). The defendant's decision on whether to testify, however, may have an impact on what additional witnesses the defense intends to call; disclosure of those witnesses to the prosecution is required by Pen C §1054.3. The defendant may want to wait until the close of the prosecution's case before deciding.

Defense counsel should document the file to support a late decision by the defendant to testify in the event the prosecutor makes a motion for sanctions for failure to make timely disclosures (see chap 11). Although counsel will sometimes not know whether the defendant will testify, counsel usually knows what additional witnesses to call if the defendant does testify. Thus, the prosecutor can argue that the defense should have reasonably anticipated calling those witnesses and should have revealed the discovery material on those witnesses required by Pen C §1054.3. The defense can argue that discovery concerning defense witnesses is not required until the time the defense reasonably decides to call them.

§30.29 I. Rebuttal and Surrebuttal

Rebuttal evidence is evidence put on by the prosecution after the defense has completed its case (rested). Rebuttal does not include evidence that should have been included in the prosecution's case-in-chief. Rebuttal evidence "is restricted to evidence made necessary by the defendant's case in the sense that he has introduced new evidence or made assertions that were not implicit in his denial of guilt." People v Carter (1957) 48 C2d 737, 753, 312 P2d 665. See also People v Daniels (1991) 52 C3d 815, 859, 277 CR 122 (error to introduce defendant's admission on rebuttal, but harmless); People v Gay (1972) 28 CA3d 661, 672, 104 CR 812, quoting from People v Harrison (1963) 59 C2d 622, 629, 30 CR 841 (no specific objection to rebuttal evidence, and no abuse of discretion). Just because a defendant takes the witness stand and denies guilt does not open the door for the prosecution to introduce evidence that should have been offered in its case-in-chief. People v Carter, supra.

It is proper to introduce evidence in rebuttal if counsel was unaware of the need for such testimony until after the case-in-chief was presented. People v Gates (1987) 43 C3d 1168, 1184, 240 CR 666. Admission of rebuttal evidence is primarily in the court's discretion. People v Gates, supra. The Gates court also pointed out that the trial courts are allowed discretion in setting the order of proof.

Examples of proper rebuttal evidence include the defendant's statements about the crime that are contrary to his or her testimony, evidence to rebut an alibi, and evidence of similar acts of misconduct to prove intent when the defendant has testified that he or she lacked the requisite intent. See People v Haskett (1990) 52 C3d 210, 242, 276 CR 80 (use of psychiatrist during penalty phase of homicide case); People v Gallego (1990) 52 C3d 115, 149, 276 CR 679 (similar acts of misconduct); People v Kelly (1990) 51 C3d 931, 964, 275 CR 160 (evidence of sale of victim's ring to rebut testimony that defendant was honest and hard-working).

> Ø Note: If the trial court decides to permit damaging rebuttal evidence, counsel should consider requesting a continuance to obtain evidence for surrebuttal. See People v Gallego, supra.

After the prosecution has completed its rebuttal, the defense can present surrebuttal. The same restrictions that apply to rebuttal apply to surrebuttal. See People v Remington (1925) 74 CA 371, 376, 240 P 526.

Further rebuttal and surrebuttal are allowed as needed. See Pen C §1093(d).

J. Argument

§30.30 1. Description and Time Limits

After all evidence has been presented, both sides may argue the case to the court and jury. The prosecution starts with its summation, followed by the defense argument, then the prosecution has a closing argument. Pen C §1093(e). If the defense makes no closing argument, the prosecution cannot make a second (closing) argument, because it is supposed to be a rebuttal of the defense argument. See Pen C §1093(e).

Although there are no statutory time restrictions on argument, it is in the trial court's discretion to control proceedings by limiting evidence and argument (Pen C §1044). In some counties, trial judges set limits, e.g., 1 hour for each side, but in other counties, limits are rarely set. In general, the more serious the case the longer the time limit, or the more likely it is that the judge will not set a time limit. Too short a limit on argument, particularly in a serious case, can infringe on the defendant's rights to counsel and to due process. People v Green (1893) 99 C 564, 567, 34 P 231. See also In re William F. (1974) 11 C3d 249, 113 CR 170, overruled on other grounds in People v Bonin (1988) 46 C3d 659, 695 n4, 250 CR 687 (trial court's refusal to permit defense counsel to argue denied defendant effective assistance of counsel).

The trial court has discretion to reopen final argument if the jury reports it is deadlocked and the court determines further action may assist the jury in reaching a verdict. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1036(b)(3). See People v Young (2007) 156 CA4th 1165, 67 CR3d 899.

§30.31 2. Preparing Final Argument

Ideally, final argument should be prepared long before the first witness is called to testify. Although developments do occur during the course of a trial, a properly prepared attorney generally knows what evidence is likely to be presented. Having developed a theory of the case, knowing what must be proved and what the opposition is likely to raise, and knowing what instructions the jury will receive, the attorney is in a good position before trial begins to formulate a closing argument.

As a practical matter, a good closing argument outline should be formulated well before the presentation of evidence because it can aid counsel in knowing what evidence to present during trial and because counsel will not have much time to prepare an argument after the evidence has been presented.

Jury instructions afford a good starting point for the preparation of argument; most arguments revolve around instructions important to the case. Counsel should decode them so they are comprehensible to jurors, and show how the evidence fits into them, thereby establishing the defendant's guilt or innocence. If the attorney has any special instructions that he or she will submit to the court, they will likely play a crucial role in the final argument.

It is good practice for counsel to make notes of things that develop during the trial that can be incorporated into the argument, e.g., a witness's particular phrase ("it was the worst possible nightmare come true"), body language (downcast eyes, curling into a seated fetal position), or any inspirational flashes counsel has. Whatever method of organization counsel uses, there should be a section for "argument ideas" to preserve these thoughts.

What holds true for the jury's ability to remember witnesses' testimony also applies to their ability to recall counsel's argument: The more senses appealed to, the greater the likelihood that jurors will understand and remember counsel's interpretation of the evidence. Thus, demonstrative evidence should be incorporated into the argument. Such evidence includes physical items introduced into evidence, photographic enlargements of key jury instructions, and computer program presentations (e.g., PowerPoint) or charts that demonstrate how certain key pieces of evidence link (or fail to link) together to establish the defendant's guilt or innocence. These visual aids should be prepared as early as possible, particularly if professional preparation is required.

§30.32 3. Argument Techniques

The fundamental purpose of argument is to persuade the jury to the attorney's point of view. Counsel has the right to discuss the merits of the case, the law and facts, and counsel's view of what the evidence shows and what conclusions may fairly be drawn from application of the law to the facts. People v Beivelman (1968) 70 C2d 60, 76, 73 CR 521.

This is the time to review and consolidate the evidence in a logical fashion—bringing it together to form the big picture. The attorney's theory of the case (see §30.15) is again useful, for it allows a point of organization for the evidence produced and an explanation of the significance of that evidence. The testimony and evidence can be tied to the key instructions of law to support counsel's theory of the case. At the same time, the attorney can show the discrepancies and weaknesses of the opposition.

One of the most difficult things attorneys learn about argument is that they must be themselves, without imitating another lawyer's style. Sincerity is important. If an attorney does not appear to believe in what he or she is saying, the jury may not believe it either.

Communication flows through eye contact. Anything that interrupts direct communication with the jury, such as reading to jurors, subtracts from the impact of what is said. Any reading should be limited to one or two very brief, concise items. Counsel should never read an entire argument to the jury; eye contact will be lost, and communication will be impersonal and unconvincing.

Lawyers spend years and a lot of money acquiring a vocabulary that is intelligible only to other lawyers. Even among lawyers, reasonable minds may differ on what particular legal terms mean. Attorneys cannot "talk like a lawyer" to jurors. They must communicate in plain, understandable English. This does not mean talking down to jurors, for a patronizing demeanor will alienate them. The old adage taught in basic public speaking applies: "Know your audience and speak to them accordingly."

One of the fundamental goals of closing argument is to translate the legalese of jury instructions into comprehensible language and concepts. In explaining important jury instructions, it is helpful to reduce each one to common experiences, thereby bridging the gap between the legal definition and its application to everyday affairs. For example, jurors can be told that conspirators or aiders and abettors are "partners in crime."

Communication requires a clear, logical presentation. Reason and logic, however, do not exclude emotion. To help maintain the jury's interest, counsel's tone of voice should vary during the presentation. Using diagrams and charts to illustrate the law or the evidence, or to tie the two together, can be extremely effective. Counsel may also use illustrations from common experience, history, or literature (People v Love (1961) 56 C2d 720, 730, 16 CR 777, overruled on other grounds in People v Morse (1964) 60 C2d 631, 637, 36 CR 201; People v Travis (1954) 129 CA2d 29, 37, 276 P2d 193), and discuss matters of common knowledge (People v Johnson (1950) 99 CA2d 717, 730, 222 P2d 335) to make the presentation more interesting and forceful.

Spontaneity of presentation frequently projects sincerity. Argument should not appear rehearsed or memorized. Further, counsel needs flexibility in the presentation to react to the moment and the audience. This does not mean that counsel should merely improvise. Counsel should always have an outline of the points that must be covered and verify that each point has in fact been addressed.

The presentation should be only as long as necessary to effectively present counsel's argument. Most people have short attention spans for speeches. While charts, models, diagrams, photographs, and voice fluctuations can extend that span, counsel should not bog down in a clutter of detail. Counsel should make the major points, then sit down.

§30.33 4. Improper Argument

Counsel's argument may be vigorous as long as it amounts to fair comment on the evidence. Counsel have wide latitude to draw reasonable inferences or deductions from the evidence presented at trial, to refer to matters of common knowledge (People v Mendoza (2000) 24 C4th 130, 172, 99 CR2d 485), and to use illustrations drawn from common experience, history, or literature (People v Vargas (2001) 91 CA4th 506, 569, 110 CR2d 210). Counsel may not otherwise argue facts that are not in evidence. People v Kirkes (1952) 39 C2d 719, 249 P2d 1; People v Villa (1980) 109 CA3d 360, 167 CR 265. Counsel also have broad discretion in discussing the legal and factual merits of a case; however, it is improper to misstate the law. People v Mendoza (2007) 42 C4th 686, 702, 68 CR3d 274. See, e.g., People v Katzenberger (2009) 178 CA4th 1260, 101 CR3d 122.

It is improper for the prosecution to comment on a defendant's failure to testify. Griffin v California (1965) 380 US 609, 14 L Ed 2d 106, 85 S Ct 1229; People v Modesto (1967) 66 C2d 695, 709, 59 CR 124. It is also generally improper for a prosecutor to comment on a defendant's postarrest silence after he or she was advised of the constitutional right to remain silent. Doyle v Ohio (1976) 426 US 610, 49 L Ed 2d 91, 96 S Ct 2240. See Greer v Miller (1987) 483 US 756, 97 L Ed 2d 618, 107 S Ct 3102, which reviews several Supreme Court decisions following Doyle. However, when defense evidence gives the false impression that a defendant was not given the opportunity to comment or provide his or her "side of the story," a prosecutor's reference to the defendant's refusal to speak to police is permissible as a "fair response" to this claim. People v Champion (2005) 134 CA4th 1440, 1448, 37 CR3d 122. See Anderson v Charles (1980) 447 US 404, 408, 65 L Ed 2d 222, 100 S Ct 2180 ("Griffin and Doyle's protection of the right to remain silent is a 'shield,' not a 'sword' that can be used to cut off the prosecution's 'fair response' to the evidence or argument of the defendant").

A prosecutor's comment on prearrest silence is permissible unless the facts indicate and the court finds that the silence was the accused's invocation of the right to remain silent. People v Free (1982) 131 CA3d 155, 165, 182 CR 259.

It is not misconduct under Griffin to comment on the state of the evidence, the failure of the defense to call logical witnesses, the failure of the defense to present material evidence, or the defendant's tailoring of his or her testimony to conform with that of the witnesses who preceded the defendant to the witness stand. Portuondo v Agard (2000) 529 US 61, 146 L Ed 2d 47, 120 S Ct 1119 (in weighing credibility of victim against that of defendant, permissible for prosecutor to call jury's attention to fact that defendant had opportunity to hear all other witnesses testify and to tailor his own testimony accordingly); People v Miller (1990) 50 C3d 954, 995, 269 CR 492 (DA's comments were response to defense argument that there was no pattern to murders); People v Ratliff (1986) 41 C3d 675, 691, 224 CR 705 (proper for DA to comment, "Now, is there any evidence on the other side? None has been presented to you"); People v Szeto (1981) 29 C3d 20, 34, 171 CR 652 (DA properly commented that defense had produced no alibi witnesses); People v Lewis (2004) 117 CA4th 246, 256, 12 CR3d 1 (DA's comment on defense failure to request live lineup was proper). The courts have drawn a very fine line; counsel should be cautious.

> Ø Note: These rules apply not only to prosecutors but to attorneys for codefendants being jointly tried. People v Hardy (1992) 2 C4th 86, 157, 5 CR2d 796.

It is improper for counsel to state a personal belief about the credibility of witnesses (People v Perez (1962) 58 C2d 229, 245, 23 CR 569) or about the defendant's guilt or innocence (U.S. v Young (1985) 470 US 1, 8, 84 L Ed 2d 1, 8, 105 S Ct 1038; People v Modesto (1967) 66 C2d 695, 714, 59 CR 124) unless it is stated as being based on the evidence (People v Green (1980) 27 C3d 1, 35, 164 CR 1, overruled on other grounds in People v Martinez (1999) 20 C4th 225, 241, 83 CR2d 533). See People v Alvarado (2006) 141 CA4th 1577, 1581, 47 CR3d 289 (prosecutor impermissibly invited jury to convict on the basis of her own opinion and "prestige" of her office by referring to her "duty" and "oath" not to prosecute a case if she had any doubt that a crime occurred).

It is improper for the prosecutor to intentionally and in bad faith argue inconsistent and irreconcilable factual theories in two severed trials that attribute to each defendant acts that could have been committed by only one person. In re

Sakarias (2005) 35 C4th 140, 156, 25 CR3d 265. It is also improper for a prosecutor to misstate the law in closing argument; however, the issue is waived when the defense fails to object. People v Anzalone (2006) 141 CA4th 380, 392, 45 CR3d 876.

See §30.27 on objecting to misconduct, §§33.20-33.21 on jury misconduct, chap 2 on attorney misconduct, and §2.45 on prosecutorial misconduct.

§31.1 I. OVERVIEW

Motions that may be filed in a trial court are limited only by the circumstances of a particular case and counsel's imagination and creativity. See the checklist in §31.3. This chapter discusses general considerations in making trial motions, including timing, format, reporting, and remedies. See §§31.4-31.7. This chapter also examines a variety of evidentiary motions, including motions in limine, and reviews methods of introducing and opposing the introduction of documentary and other demonstrative evidence, bases for motions to exclude or limit evidence, and motions to admit or attack specific types of evidence such as prior testimony and proof of prior convictions. See §§31.8-31.32. Technical evidentiary objections are not discussed in this book. See generally Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009); California Trial Objections (Cal CEB Annual).

Other portions of this chapter explore the requirement that the prosecution select the particular act on which it intends to rely in proving the charged count (see §31.33); sanctions for discovery violations (see §31.34); jury issues (see §§31.35-31.40); control in the courtroom and courthouse (see §§31.41-31.43); an in-custody defendant's appearance and needs (see §31.44); and motions for judgments of acquittal (§§31.45-31.46). Motions for mistrial are discussed in chap 25. Finally, appellate review of trial motions is briefly addressed. See §31.47.

§31.2 II. DEADLINES IMPOSED BY LOCAL RULES AND PRACTICE

No general statute or California rule of court governs the timing of trial motions. Because of the time standards for disposing of criminal cases (see Cal Rules of Ct, Standards of J Admin 2.2(j)-(m)), however, many courts have promulgated unique procedures, some written and some unwritten, to expedite motions and trials. Failure to learn and follow these procedures can cause, at the least, embarrassment and inconvenience and, in some cases, consequences as significant as forfeiture of the right to bring certain motions. The safest course for new and seasoned practitioners alike is to become familiar with the local rules and discuss procedural questions with colleagues who practice before the court and with clerks of the court to which each case is assigned to ensure compliance with applicable local rules and practice. See §1.16. Many California counties, including all the counties with large populations, have posted their local rules on the Judicial Council's website, http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov/rules/localrules.htm.

§31.3 III. CHECKLIST: TRIAL MOTIONS

Defense Motions

Motions to Exclude Evidence

- Prosecution failed to disclose evidence favorable to the defendant on the question of guilt or innocence or failed to disclose evidence in response to a discovery order. See chap 11.
- New prosecution discovery. See chap 11.
- Immunity for defendant or defense witness. See chap 49.
- Confession or admission illegally obtained. See chap 23.
- Prior conviction used to make a misdemeanor a felony, as an element of the crime, or to enhance sentence. See chap 24.
- Evidence of offense or act similar to crime charged. See §§24.52-24.55. See also Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook §§35.18-35.40 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009).
- Witness's prior felony conviction or prior misdemeanor conduct. See chap 24.
- Unnecessarily gruesome and inflammatory photographs. See §31.30. See also California Trial Objections, chap 30 (Cal CEB Annual).
- Identification of defendant tainted. See §22.21.
- Witness's identification of defendant, or other testimony, hypnotically induced. See §22.18.
- Prosecution's improper use of preliminary hearing transcript instead of testimony of witness. See §8.47.
- Witness will incriminate himself or herself if required to testify. See Trial Objections, chap 46.

Other Defense Motions

- Request for hearing on need for a support person's presence during molestation victim's testimony. People v Lord (1994) 30 CA4th 1718, 1722, 36 CR2d 453.
- For judgment of acquittal. Pen C §§1118-1118.1. See §§31.45-31.46.
- Regarding courtroom security, defendant's custody status and appearance. See §§31.41-31.44.
- Allow defendant to show certain of his or her physical characteristics without testifying. U.S. v Bay (9th Cir 1984) 762 F2d 1314, 1315. See People v Perez (1989) 216 CA3d 1346, 1352, 265 CR 400 (display of defendant's tattoo to jury denied for lack of proper foundation).
- Force prosecutor to elect specific incident that supports charge. See §31.33.
- Close trial to press and public during all or part of the trial. See chap 14.
- For an interpreter to interpret for the defendant exclusively. See People v Menchaca (1983) 146 CA3d 1019, 1023, 194 CR 691. See also §52.7.
- Dismiss because immigration authorities deported a witness who would have provided material testimony favorable to the defense. People v Valencia (1990) 218 CA3d 808, 825, 267 CR 257; U.S. v Valenzuela-Bernal (1982) 458 US 858, 873, 73 L Ed 2d 1193, 1206, 102 S Ct 3440. See §52.34.
- Dismiss because of prosecutor's unlawful suppression of exculpatory evidence, e.g., a confession by someone other than defendant. Brady v Maryland (1963) 373 US 83, 87, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 218, 83 S Ct 1194; People v Robinson (1995) 31 CA4th 494, 498, 37 CR2d 183. See §11.26.

Prosecution Motions

- Provide immunity for a witness. See chap 49.
- Continuance because of defense testimony of which prosecutor was unaware. Pen C §1051. See §20.23.

- Exclude defendant from face-to-face view of witness. Maryland v Craig (1990) 497 US 836, 853, 111 L Ed 2d 666, 683, 110 S Ct 3157 (no confrontation right violation by defense attorney's using statutory procedure for closed-circuit television examination of child abuse victim, when witness is unable to see defendant).
- Exclude evidence of victim's sexual conduct in certain sex crime cases. Evid C §1103(c).
- Exclude sex crime victim's address and telephone number. Evid C §352.1.
- Require defendant to display certain physical characteristics to the jury or to provide fingerprints, voice exemplars, or handwriting samples. U.S. v Dionisio (1973) 410 US 1, 14, 35 L Ed 2d 67, 79, 93 S Ct 764.
- Have defendant utter certain words. U.S. v Wade (1967) 388 US 218, 222, 18 L Ed 2d 1149, 1154, 87 S Ct 1926.
- Have defendant wear certain clothing. Holt v U.S. (1910) 218 US 245, 252, 54 L Ed 1021, 1030, 31 S Ct 2.
- Have defendant wear head or facial hair in a particular way. U.S. v Valenzuela (9th Cir 1983) 722 F2d 1431, 1433 (defendant required to shave full beard and mustache).
- Require defendant to be present. See Pen C §§977(b), 1043.

Motions That May Be Brought by Defense or Prosecution

- Witness incompetent to testify because of inability to understand the duty to tell the truth, e.g., because of age, mental illness, or influence of drugs or alcohol. Evid C §701(a)(2). See Trial Objections, chap 18.
- Striking witness's testimony because counsel was deprived of the right to cross-examine witness. See Evidence Benchbook §8.2.
- Admit new or novel scientific evidence. People v Leahy (1994) 8 C4th 587, 598, 34 CR2d 663; People v Kelly (1976) 17 C3d 24, 30, 130 CR 144. See §§31.12-31.15.
- Contempt. See chap 58.
- Continuance motion. See chap 20.
- Discovery motion (when reasons arise during trial). See chap 11.
- Motion for sanctions under Pen C §1054.5(b) for noncompliance with discovery procedures. See chap 11.
- Dismiss. See chap 25.
- Examination of defendant's mental competence (when reasons arise during trial). See chap 48.
- Exclude witnesses from courtroom. Evid C §777.
- Renewed motion to change venue. See chap 15.
- Recuse counsel (when reasons arise during trial). See chap 18.
- Severance motion (when reasons arise during trial). See chap 7.
- Standard evidentiary objections, such as privilege or calls for narrative response.
- Test veracity of testimony concerning witness observations. People v Fudge (1994) 7 C4th 1075, 1104, 31 CR2d 321.
- For jury to view scene. Pen C §1119. See People v Williams (1997) 16 C4th 153, 212, 66 CR2d 123 (standard for reviewing court's decision is abuse of discretion); People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1025, 264 CR 386 (defendant's presence at scene of crime may be waived).
- Admit demonstrative evidence. See §§30.12-30.13.
- Admit reenactment of crime. See §30.13.
- Exclude members of the media from the courtroom. See §§14.8-14.15.
- Allow counsel's in-court use of personal tape recorder for trial notes. Cal Rules of Ct 1.150(d).
- For special security measures, such as metal detector screening and full body pat searches. See Gibson v Superior Court (1982) 135 CA3d 774, 783, 185 CR 741. See also Holbrook v Flynn (1986) 475 US 560, 567, 89 L Ed 2d 525, 533, 106 S Ct 1340 (allowing uniformed state troopers as extra security in front row of spectators' section not error); People v Ainsworth (1988) 45 C3d 984, 1003, 248 CR 568 (guards in courtroom).

- For mistrial. See chap 25.

IV. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS FOR TRIAL MOTION PRACTICE

§31.4 A. Make Motion as Soon as Practicable

The parties should complete discovery as far in advance of the trial as possible. For discussion of discovery, see chap 11. Once discovery is completed, counsel may prepare and make those motions that must, or may, be brought before trial. As a rule, motions should be made as soon as practicable after counsel becomes aware of the need for a ruling. The sooner discovery is completed, the more time will be available to prepare well-developed pretrial motions, motions in limine, and other trial briefs, and to ready the case for trial. Any motion that may be resolved before trial will contribute to an orderly trial with minimum surprises.

Ø Practice tip: Counsel should refer to relevant jury instructions to check the elements of the crimes and defenses before deciding what motions to prepare. It is often helpful for counsel to prepare a checklist including the elements of each crime and defense, and listing the items of evidence that counsel anticipates will be presented by both parties to prove each required element. This approach not only ensures that evidence is organized logically for presentation at trial, it also helps counsel identify evidence that needs to be addressed in pretrial motions.

Pretrial motions are beyond the scope of this chapter. For a list of motions that must be brought before trial, see §18.4.

Ø Note: Even motions that are ordinarily pretrial motions may be made at trial if the grounds for the motion only arise or become known at that time.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.5 B. Deciding Whether Motion Should Be Written or Oral

Whenever possible, motion should be written. Whenever possible, a motion should be made in writing, supported by a memorandum and, when factual matters are at issue, a declaration or affidavit under penalty of perjury. On form and format requirements for a memorandum in support of a motion, see Cal Rules of Ct 3.1113. See also §§18.5-18.7. The motion should be concise, indicating the issues, cases, statutes, and rules that bear on the matter. The memorandum should inform the court of the nature of the relief sought, explain the legal basis for the request, and describe the prejudice that will result if relief is denied. Copies of the motion should be given to opposing counsel and co-counsel in advance of the hearing.

Ø Practice tip: If there is a federal constitutional basis for the motion, the memorandum should cite the specific constitutional provision and any U.S. Supreme Court decisions that support the claim.

Local court rules or practice may make it necessary for counsel to prepare written trial motions and file them before the case is assigned to a trial judge. In that event, counsel may list the "trial court" as the department in which the motion is to be heard and note the date the motion is to be heard as being before voir dire begins.

Articulate grounds for oral motion and have motion recorded. Whenever an oral motion is made, counsel should clearly articulate for the record each objection or ground on which the motion is made to preserve the matter for appellate review. Counsel should be sure that oral motions, including evidentiary objections, are recorded. See §31.6. Issues relating to the admission or exclusion of evidence will not be considered on appeal absent a timely objection or motion in the trial court. People v Crittenden (1994) 9 C4th 83, 126, 36 CR2d 474. See also People v Williams (1997) 16 C4th 635, 661, 66 CR2d 573.

Absent a controlling statute, local rule, or pretrial order, counsel is free to consider strategic factors in determining the appropriate time and method for presenting trial motions and objections. For example, counsel may prefer the informal spontaneity of an oral motion because it affords the opponent less opportunity to analyze issues and organize an effective response. However, most judges are inclined to give a party a reasonable opportunity to prepare a response to points raised orally by an opponent, especially if it appears to the court that the answering party was not given adequate notice or that the answering party could not reasonably have anticipated the motion. When appropriate, counsel can argue, based on the facts, that the opponent should have been aware of the issue long before trial and should have been prepared.

Making an objection before the jury. If counsel first becomes aware of the need for a trial motion when jurors are present, counsel may make a brief, formal objection in front of the jury but should ask to be heard at the bench or in chambers to argue the matter to avoid prejudicing the jury with information that may be excluded after the motion is heard.

§31.6 C. Hearings on Trial Motions Should Be Reported

Record must be created to preserve issues for appeal. To ensure that any issues related to the trial court's ruling are preserved for appeal, whether a motion is made orally or in writing, care should be taken to ensure that all discussions about the motion are on the record and that the arguments in support of the motion are clearly stated. See, e.g., Evid C §353. See also People v Ramos (1997) 15 C4th 1133, 1171, 64 CR2d 892. By the same token, reasons for resisting an opponent's motion must be stated clearly to preserve objections on appeal. See Evid C §354. Although insisting on on-the-record proceedings may not be the most popular position to take, if counsel wishes to preserve an issue for appeal, there must be a record for the appellate courts to review. See, e.g., People v Mendoza Tello (1997) 15 C4th 264, 266, 62 CR2d 437; Steve J. v Superior Court (1995) 35 CA4th 798, 813, 41 CR2d 731 (not appellate court's function "to play guessing games about evidence not in the record").

Record may be created after informal discussion. It is not uncommon for the court and counsel to meet informally in chambers or at sidebar about certain motions or objections. This process can be efficient, but it contains the seeds of disaster for appellate review. Counsel should never accede to a suggestion that a ruling on an objection or motion be "taken care of later," after an informal conference. The motion or objection and the court's ruling must be articulated on the record. Counsel need not request a reporter's presence in the judge's chambers during an initial discussion; however, if a reporter is not present for the chambers conference, counsel should request that the exchange between the court and the parties be memorialized on the record at some point before proceedings resume in front of the jury. In courts to which no court reporter is assigned, counsel should keep in mind that settled statements prepared by counsel not only provide incomplete records of the proceedings, they are far less helpful than a verbatim transcript prepared by a court reporter. Thus, if the court will not make a court reporter available, and the issue before the court is particularly important, counsel should consider hiring a court reporter to record the proceedings independently.

Proceedings are sometimes electronically recorded. See Cal Rules of Ct 2.952. One of the most difficult problems created by electronic recording is that those reviewing the tape often cannot hear the comments made by counsel or the court. If a court reporter is not available and the proceedings must be electronically recorded, counsel should take responsibility for ensuring that the microphones used are placed in locations that will pick up the voices of counsel, the witnesses, and the court. If the recording cannot be made satisfactorily, where the rules permit, counsel should insist that a court reporter be present.

§31.7 D. Remedies

Counsel should not hesitate to be innovative in tailoring a remedy to correct whatever wrong has been done. Some examples follow:

- Requesting sanctions under Pen C §1054.5(b) for failure of opposing party to comply with discovery procedures. See People v Edwards (1993) 17 CA4th 1248, 1262, 22 CR2d 3, for discussion of available sanctions.
- Requesting a continuance, e.g., when counsel was not provided discovery of some information that the court has determined is admissible, or when a witness has unexpectedly become necessary. See Pen C §1050.
- Requesting the exclusion of evidence or testimony, e.g., concerning test results based on destroyed evidence. California v Trombetta (1984) 467 US 479, 489, 81 L Ed 2d 413, 422, 104 S Ct 2528.
- Requesting a limiting instruction when evidence is offered for a limited purpose. Evid C §355; see CALCRIM 303; People v Hood (1997) 53 CA4th 965, 972, 62 CR2d 137; People v Eagles (1982) 133 CA3d 330, 340, 183 CR 784. See also Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook §20.14 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009).
- Moving to dismiss the case, e.g., when defense counsel learns during trial that the prosecutor failed to disclose the existence and identity of a material witness of whom the defense was previously unaware. People v Kiihoa (1960) 53 C2d 748, 752, 3 CR 1.

Counsel opposing the remedy can argue that no error occurred or that the error was not prejudicial to the defendant (e.g., because it came as no surprise), or counsel can argue for a different remedy. For example, in U.S. v Tamura (9th Cir 1982) 694 F2d 591, 599, the trial court offered to remedy the prejudicial effect of surprise testimony either through a limiting instruction or by granting a motion to strike, but it refused to grant a continuance. The appellate court found no abuse of discretion.

V. EVIDENTIARY MOTIONS

A. In Limine Motions

§31.8 1. Advantages of Settling Important Evidentiary Issues Before Trial Begins

Unless a statute, e.g., Pen C §1538.5, or case law provides for a pretrial ruling on an evidentiary issue, whether a particular item of evidence is to be admitted or excluded is usually a question for the judge who presides at trial. See Evid C §§402-405; Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook, chaps 24-26 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009). Although it is not possible to anticipate every possible objection to the admission of evidence in advance, by the time the case is assigned to a judge for trial, counsel should know what evidence is likely to be offered and what potential evidence may be subject to exclusion. It is a good idea to handle these issues on excluding or limiting the effect of the anticipated evidence with a motion requesting an advance ruling on the disputed evidentiary issue. These motions are called "motions in limine." A sample motion in limine to exclude evidence is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §31.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005). For further discussion of in limine motions, see Effective Intro of Evidence, chap 3; California Trial Objections, chap 2 (Cal CEB Annual).

The in limine motion, which can be made any time after the case is assigned to a trial judge, raises technical objections to potentially prejudicial evidence, highlighting foundational inadequacies, lack of relevance or reliability, and any failure to provide discovery or preserve exculpatory evidence. Counsel should usually submit motions in limine before jury selection begins. See Kelly v New W. Fed. Sav. (1996) 49 CA4th 659, 671, 56 CR2d 803. An early in limine determination of admissibility permits the attorneys to deal consistently and confidently with particular items of evidence during voir dire, opening statements, and examination. In limine orders typically direct counsel, the parties, and witnesses not to refer in the presence of the jury to any evidence that the court has rejected. Counsel bringing a motion in limine should ensure that the judge rules on the record on each ground raised. See Evid C §§402-405.

A motion in limine may be brought during trial when unanticipated evidentiary issues emerge. People v Morris (1991) 53 C3d 152, 188, 279 CR 720, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394. When opposing counsel surprises counsel by trying to introduce objectionable evidence during trial, counsel may wish to ask to approach the bench, then either argue the issue quietly at the bench, or ask for a hearing outside the jury's presence. Counsel then has the opportunity to argue the point without the jury hearing the evidence during argument about its admissibility.

Trial attorneys seldom seek advance rulings on the admissibility of their own evidence, but attempt to introduce it in the normal course of trial, inquiring about information or showing items to witnesses on the stand. This approach can pose a significant risk. For instance, if the prosecutor produces sensitive evidence in the jury's presence that is deemed unduly prejudicial, a mistrial may be declared or reversal on appeal may result, even though a defense objection was sustained and any answer was stricken. See, e.g., People v Bentley (1955) 131 CA2d 687, 690, 281 P2d 1, disapproved on other grounds in People v White (1958) 50 C2d 428, 431, 325 P2d 985 (conviction reversed in part because prosecutor failed to warn police officer not to volunteer information about similar sex offense).

§31.9 2. Reiteration Requirement

A motion in limine to exclude evidence is a sufficient manifestation of objection to protect the record on appeal when it complies with these requirements (see Evid C §353):

- A specific legal ground for exclusion is advanced and subsequently raised on appeal;
- The motion is directed to a particular, identifiable body of evidence; and
- The motion is made at a time before or during trial when the trial judge can rule on the evidentiary question in its appropriate context.

If a motion in limine does not satisfy each of these three requirements, a proper objection must be made during trial when opposing counsel attempts to introduce the evidence in question to preserve the evidentiary issue for appeal. This is sometimes referred to as the "reiteration requirement." If the three requirements are not satisfied and the trial judge denies a motion in limine designed to exclude evidence, the party seeking exclusion must ordinarily renew the objection at the time the evidence is actually offered at trial to preserve the issue for appeal. People v Waidla (2000) 22 C4th 690, 717, 94 CR2d 396; People v Benson (1990) 52 C3d 754, 788, 276 CR 827.

A carefully crafted motion in limine objecting to the admission of evidence may meet the requirements of Evid C §353 and preserve objections for appeal. Reiteration may be excused if (1) the proponent of the motion secures an express ruling from the court on the record and (2) the court deems that party's objection to be a continuing one. See People v Ramos (1997) 15 C4th 1133, 1171, 64 CR2d 892; People v Holt (1997) 15 C4th 619, 666, 63 CR2d 782. Repetition of the objection may also be excused if the objecting party obtains a stipulation from opposing counsel that the objection need not be repeated, when repetition of the objection would be futile as a matter of law, or when the objection concerns the use of an involuntary statement or other evidence that might impinge on the defendant's constitutional or statutory rights. See People v Underwood (1964) 61 C2d 113, 126, 37 CR 313; People v Cahill (1994) 22 CA4th 296, 309 n3, 28 CR2d 1. See also §31.24.

Ø Practice tip: Repeat the objection on each occasion the evidence is proffered, so that the record on appeal is clear; or, if counsel prefers not to make fruitless objections in front of the jury, request that the objection be deemed a continuing one.

3. Examples of Evidentiary Issues Commonly Handled in Limine

§31.10 a. Foundational Issues

When the resolution of an objection depends on the establishment of preliminary facts, an evidentiary hearing is required to resolve the preliminary facts. See Evid C §§402-405. Foundational hearings that require extensive testimony are best held as in limine motions before a jury is selected. If the court and parties take the time to sort out the intricacies of foundational issues before selecting a jury, the trial will usually proceed more efficiently, avoiding prolonged recesses that inconvenience witnesses and distress members of the jury. Depending on the court's rulings, pretrial resolution of foundational issues can also serve to narrow or limit the issues presented at trial.

Ø Practice tip: In the interests of efficiency and courtesy, counsel should request pretrial hearings on foundational issues by submitting written, noticed motions with realistic time estimates, to ensure that witnesses can be subpoenaed and sufficient court time can be set aside to dispose of the issues raised. See §§18.5-18.7 for form, service, and filing requirements for pretrial motions.

When counsel moves to exclude evidence because of foundational inadequacies, the court may grant the motion without prejudice in order to allow the proponent of the evidence an opportunity to introduce sufficient foundational facts during trial to obtain a favorable ruling on admissibility. See People v Morris (1991) 53 C3d 152, 187, 279 CR 720, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394.

§31.11 b. Improper Chain of Custody

A writing (see Evid C §250) "is not presumed to be what it purports to be, and it must be authenticated… before it is introduced into evidence." Fakhoury v Magner (1972) 25 CA3d 58, 65, 101 CR 473. Other physical evidence must also be authenticated. "The 'chain of custody' rule is but a variation of the principle that real evidence must be authenticated prior to its admission into evidence." U.S. v Howard-Arias (4th Cir 1982) 679 F2d 363, 366. "The purpose of this threshold requirement is to establish that the item to be introduced… is what it purports to be." Mueller & Kirkpatrick, Evidence Under the Rules, p 957 (2d ed 1993). Consequently, "[c]hain-of-custody issues are present whenever physical evidence capable of submission to the jury is introduced at trial." People v Baldine (2001) 94 CA4th 773, 779, 114 CR2d 570.

The chain of custody is established when the party offering a particular item in evidence shows that it is reasonably certain the evidence has not been altered. See People v Catlin (2001) 26 C4th 81, 134, 109 CR2d 31; People v Lucas (1995) 12 C4th 415, 444, 48 CR2d 525. The "reasonable certainty" standard is, essentially, the equivalent of proof by a preponderance of the evidence. People v Herrera (2000) 83 CA4th 46, 61, 98 CR2d 911. This is a foundational issue: an improper chain of custody precludes testimony or evidence on the issue involved. For example, when the testimony of prosecution witnesses fails to resolve key foundational issues about the chain of custody of a DNA reference sample taken from the defendant, the trial court's overruling of objections to the admission of the reference sample and to the criminalist's comparison of the reference sample with DNA taken from crime scene evidence was an abuse of discretion. Because the erroneous admission of the evidence was not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. People v Jimenez (2008) 165 CA4th 75, 81, 80 CR3d 579.

If the possibility that someone has tampered with the evidence is supported by only bare speculation, then "it is proper to admit the evidence and let what doubt remains go to its weight." People v Williams (1989) 48 C3d 1112, 1134, 259 CR 473 (unexplained anomalies in prosecution handling of latent fingerprint card went to weight of evidence after prosecution had made prima facie showing that card had not been tampered with); In re Ruth H. (1972) 26 CA3d 77, 83, 102 CR 534 (inference that pills placed in envelope by high school security agent were same as those picked up within short time by deputy sheriff was sufficient to deny chain-of-custody objection).

The trial court's exercise of discretion in admitting the evidence over an improper chain-of-custody objection is reviewed on appeal for abuse of discretion. People v Catlin, supra; People v Jimenez, supra.

c. New or Novel Scientific Techniques (Kelly Test)

§31.12 (1) Three-Prong Kelly Test

A party that wants to introduce evidence that is based on a new or novel scientific technique bears the burden of establishing the reliability of that evidence before it is admitted under the rule of People v Kelly (1976) 17 C3d 24, 30, 130 CR 144, and Frye v U.S. (DC Cir 1923) 293 F 1013, 1014.

Ø Note: In Daubert v Merrell Dow Pharms., Inc. (1993) 509 US 579, 587, 125 L Ed 2d 469, 479, 113 S Ct 2786, the Supreme Court found that the standard in Frye no longer applies in federal trials after adoption of the more flexible approach in Fed R Evid 702. California continues to adhere to the Kelly rule; in People v Leahy (1994) 8 C4th 587, 598, 34 CR2d 663, the California Supreme Court declined to adopt the Daubert approach in California. Since Daubert, however, the test for determining the admissibility of evidence based on a new scientific technique is usually referred to as the Kelly test.

The Kelly rule is based on the notion that juries may give undue weight to experimental techniques presented by credentialed experts whose testimony may convey an unjustified aura of scientific certainty. It is an exception for the usual rule, that the weight of the evidence is a question of fact for the jury.

The rule only tests the fundamental validity of the new scientific technique. The degree of professionalism with which the methodology is applied is relegated to the weight of the evidence. See People v Cooper (1991) 53 C3d 771, 814, 281 CR 90; People v Farmer (1989) 47 C3d 888, 913, 254 CR 508, overruled on other grounds in People v Waidla (2000) 22 C4th 690, 724 n6, 94 CR2d 396.

The Kelly standard has three prongs (People v Fierro (1991) 1 C4th 173, 214, 3 CR2d 426; People v Kelly (1976) 17 C3d 24, 30, 130 CR 144):

- The test must be generally accepted in the relevant scientific community; general acceptance means "a consensus drawn from a typical cross-section of the relevant, qualified scientific community" (see People v Leahy (1994) 8 C4th 587, 612, 34 CR2d 663);
- Testimony must be given by properly qualified experts (see People v Jackson (1996) 13 C4th 1164, 1212, 56 CR2d 49); and
- Correct scientific procedures must have been applied in the case before the court (see People v Venegas (1998) 18 C4th 47, 81, 74 CR2d 262).

Because Kelly hearings can be complex, costly, and time-consuming, when discovery reveals the existence of a Kelly issue, the party opposing introduction of the evidence should promptly file a written motion stating the grounds of the objection and requesting a hearing.

Because of considerations such as time consumption, subject matter complexity, and the cost and availability of expert witnesses, courts often allow relevant prior expert testimony elicited in unrelated cases to be received in evidence at pretrial foundational hearings. See People v Fierro (1991) 1 C4th 173, 214 n11, 3 CR2d 426 (stipulated testimony from unrelated cases was relied on); People v Smith (1989) 215 CA3d 19, 25, 263 CR 678 (court took judicial notice of findings made after extensive Kelly hearing in another case in same county).

Failure to specifically challenge the admission of evidence on Kelly grounds waives the issue on appeal. People v Diaz (1992) 3 C4th 495, 528, 11 CR2d 353; People v Kaurish (1990) 52 C3d 648, 688, 276 CR 788. For further discussion of Kelly, see Scientific Evidence in California Criminal Cases, chap 2 (Cal CEB 2008).

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.13 (2) Kelly Applies Only to New or Novel Procedure

The Kelly test does not apply at all when no new scientific test is involved. See, e.g., People v Nelson (2008) 43 C4th 1242, 1263, 78 CR3d 69; People v Jackson (2008) 163 CA4th 313, 323, 77 CR3d 474; People v Bui (2001) 86 CA4th 1187, 1196, 103 CR2d 908. Before beginning a foundational hearing under Kelly, counsel should give careful consideration to the potential issues of what constitutes general acceptance, what comprises the relevant scientific community, and who is qualified to render opinions in that specific community. Note that the court will not require a Kelly showing if the judge does not first find the procedure new or novel. See People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 238, 10 CR2d 636 (hair comparison evidence was not new); People v Nolan (2002) 95 CA4th 1210, 1214, 116 CR2d 331 (enzyme immunoassay technique for detection of drugs in urine not new); People v Bury (1996) 41 CA4th 1194, 1201, 49 CR2d 107 (Preliminary Alcohol Screening (PAS) device was not novel technique).

§31.14 (3) Kelly Test Results

The Kelly test has been applied to a variety of forensic techniques. The following have been found to pass the Kelly test:

- Agglutination-inhibition blood testing. People v Yorba (1989) 209 CA3d 1017, 1024, 257 CR 641.
- Ballistics examinations. People v Trujillo (1948) 32 C2d 105, 111, 194 P2d 681.
- Blood (In re Newbern (1959) 175 CA2d 862, 865, 1 CR 80), breath (People v Adams (1976) 59 CA3d 559, 561, 131 CR 190), and urine tests (Quesada v Orr (1971) 14 CA3d 866, 869, 92 CR 640) for intoxication.
- DNA polymerase chain reaction analysis (PCR) for DQ alpha gene. People v Morganti (1996) 43 CA4th 643, 657, 50 CR2d 837.
- DNA PCR analysis and short tandems repeat (STR) test. People v Allen (1999) 72 CA4th 1093, 1099, 85 CR2d 655.
- DNA profiling or typing for identification using restriction fragment length polymorphism (RFLP) method. People v Soto (1999) 21 C4th 512, 514, 88 CR2d 34; People v Venegas (1998) 18 C4th 47, 84, 74 CR2d 262.
- DNA profiling using Profiler Plus kit and 310 Genetic Analyzer (found to be sophisticated extension of PCR/STR testing methods). People v Hill (2001) 89 CA4th 48, 58, 107 CR2d 110.
- DNA profiling involving multiple mixtures using Profiler Plus and COfiler kits ABI 310 genetic analyzer. People v Smith (2003) 107 CA4th 646, 666, 132 CR2d 230.
- Using unmodified product rule to calculate statistical probabilities in DNA forensic analysis. People v Soto, supra.
- Electrophoretic testing of dried blood stains. People v Fierro (1991) 1 C4th 173, 214, 3 CR2d 426; People v Reilly (1987) 196 CA3d 1127, 1148, 242 CR 496.
- Fingerprint analysis. People v Riser (1956) 47 C2d 566, 589, 305 P2d 1, overruled on other grounds in People v Morse (1964) 60 C2d 631, 637 n2, 36 CR2d 201.
- Handwriting comparison. People v Storke (1900) 128 C 486, 488, 60 P 1090.
- Horizontal gaze nystagmus (HGN) test. People v Joehnk (1995) 35 CA4th 1488, 1505, 42 CR2d 6.
- Odontology. People v Peneda (1995) 32 CA4th 1022, 38 CR2d 312; People v Marx (1975) 54 CA3d 100, 126 CR 350.

New or novel techniques that did not pass the Kelly test include the following:

- Defendant's scent purportedly identified by dog from expended shell casings at crime using scent transfer device and scent identification lineup procedure. People v Mitchell (2003) 110 CA4th 772, 793, 2 CR3d 49. See also People v Willis (2004) 115 CA4th 379, 385, 9 CR3d 235.
- Penile plethysmograph test. In re Mark C. (1992) 7 CA4th 433, 444, 8 CR2d 856.
- Polygraph. See People v Price (1991) 1 C4th 324, 419, 3 CR2d 106. See also People v Wilkinson (2004) 33 C4th 821, 845, 16 CR3d 420 (because Evid C §351.1 makes polygraph evidence inadmissible absent stipulation, party is not entitled to Kelly hearing on reliability of technique).
- Detection of child abuse by reports of abuse and observations of child with anatomically correct dolls. In re Amber B. (1987) 191 CA3d 682, 691, 236 CR 623; In re Christine C. (1987) 191 CA3d 676, 679, 236 CR 630.
- Posthypnotic testimony, except in limited circumstances as set out in Evid C §795; see People v Shirley (1982) 31 C3d 18, 66, 181 CR 243.
- Retrieval of repressed memories of sexual molestation by using sodium amytal. Ramona v Superior Court (1997) 57 CA4th 107, 116, 66 CR2d 766.
- Truth serum. See People v Cullen (1951) 37 C2d 614, 626, 234 P2d 1.
- Voiceprint identification through spectrographic analysis. People v Kelly (1976) 17 C3d 24, 30, 130 CR 144.

§31.15 d. Improper Use of Statistics

Statistical analysis may be applied to the results of a forensic method. For example, courts will admit statistical blood-group evidence based on serological tests that have long been recognized as reliable to show that an accused is included within the class of possible donors. People v Poggi (1988) 45 C3d 306, 324, 246 CR 886. This use of statistical evidence is distinguishable from the prohibited use of statistics to express a likelihood of guilt. See People v Collins (1968) 68 C2d 319, 320, 66 CR 497.

e. Expert Testimony

§31.16 (1) Grounds for Challenging Expert Testimony

An expert is someone who is allowed to state an opinion on a subject beyond the knowledge and experience of ordinary witnesses because the expert has the special skill necessary to give an opinion on that particular subject. Evid C §§720, 801. See People v Gardeley (1996) 14 C4th 605, 617, 59 CR2d 356. An expert's opinion must be based on matters "of a type that reasonably may be relied upon by an expert in forming an opinion" on the subject. An expert may base his or her testimony on reliable information about the case, reliable texts, tests, and on reliable information in the form of a hypothetical question. Evid C §801; People v Bui (2001) 86 CA4th 1187, 1196, 103 CR2d 908.

An expert may be challenged on grounds including (see Evid C §§720, 801):

- The expert is not qualified to give an opinion on the particular topic involved (People v Champion (1995) 9 C4th 879, 924, 39 CR2d 547);
- The subject is not beyond the experience of ordinary witnesses (see People v Fudge (1994) 7 C4th 1075, 1120, 31 CR2d 321);
- The basis for the expert's opinion is improper (see Evid C §§721, 801; People v Sims (1993) 5 C4th 405, 437, 20 CR2d 537);
- Although an expert witness may rely on hearsay in forming an opinion, reliance on prejudicial unreliable hearsay may be objectionable (People v Pollock (2004) 32 C4th 1153, 1171, 13 CR3d 34; People v Montiel (1993) 5 C4th 877, 918, 21 CR2d 705);
- The evidence is too time-consuming, is too prejudicial, will confuse the issues, or will mislead the jury (Evid C §352);
- Improper hypothetical question; or
- Evidence denies the defendant due process (see Estelle v McGuire (1991) 502 US 62, 70, 116 L Ed 2d 385, 397, 112 S Ct 475 (due process challenge made to battered child syndrome; challenge unsuccessful)).

Experts may be challenged by an in limine motion. They may also be challenged twice after they take the stand. When the expert first takes the stand, his or her qualifications must be demonstrated, if challenged, before the expert is allowed to testify. Evid C §720(a). Counsel may request an Evid C §402 hearing on this issue or simply request the court to allow the witness to be taken on voir dire at the outset of the examination. Second challenges to the expert's testimony are usually made at the time objectionable questions are asked, or answers given.

For further discussion of expert testimony, see California Expert Witness Guide (2d ed Cal CEB 1991).

§31.17 (2) Kelly Rule Does Not Usually Apply to Expert Testimony

Absent a unique feature that "effectively blindsides" the jury, expert testimony is not subject to Kelly foundational requirements. See, e.g., People v Rowland (1992) 4 C4th 238, 266, 14 CR2d 377; People v Stoll (1989) 49 C3d 1136, 1157, 265 CR 111; Wilson v Phillips (1999) 73 CA4th 250, 254, 86 CR2d 204; People v Ward (1999) 71 CA4th 368, 372, 83 CR2d 828. Computer animations that are tantamount to drawings by experts, and which are used only to illustrate testimony, are not required to meet the Kelly requirements. People v Hood (1997) 53 CA4th 965, 969, 62 CR2d 137.

If an expert conducts an experiment crucial to his or her opinion on a material fact, the proponent of the expert's opinion must be ready to demonstrate that the experiment was conducted under conditions substantially similar to those existing at the time of the event at issue. Failure to lay an adequate foundation will render the experiment and the expert's opinion inadmissible, on proper objection. Solis v Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist. (1980) 105 CA3d 382, 390, 164 CR 343 (expert's deductions from experiment conducted 2 years after accident, under different weather conditions, held inadmissible); People v Zismer (1969) 275 CA2d 660, 665, 80 CR 184 (photo of imprint of shoes from scene of crime was prejudicial because no testimony that shoe prints were those of defendant).

f. Admissions and Confessions

§31.18 (1) Trial Motions to Exclude Admissions and Confessions

A defendant may move to exclude an admission or confession during trial. Pretrial rulings on admissions and confessions are not binding on the trial court. People v Keenan (1988) 46 C3d 478, 513, 250 CR 550; People v Beasley (1967) 250 CA2d 71, 77, 58 CR 485. If exclusion is unsuccessfully sought by an in limine motion, the party seeking exclusion must usually reiterate his or her objection at the time the admission or confession is actually offered at trial to preserve the issue for appeal. People v Jennings (1988) 46 C3d 963, 975 n3, 251 CR 278. There are several exceptions. Counsel may stipulate or the court may order that counsel's in limine objection is considered to have been made during trial. See §31.9. Reiteration of the objection is also excused if a specific objection has been directed to an identifiable body of evidence and advanced when the court has had an opportunity to consider that evidence in context, i.e., no further evidence is introduced to change the relevant facts that the court has already heard and ruled on. People v Crittenden (1994) 9 C4th 83, 127, 36 CR2d 474.

Ø Practice tip: Repeat the objection each time the evidence is proffered, or request that the initial objection be deemed a continuing one.

When an admission or confession is the product of an unlawful search or seizure, exclusion must be sought by a pretrial motion under Pen C §1538.5. People v Boyer (1989) 48 C3d 247, 270 n13, 256 CR 96, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394. A trial court can hear the issue during trial when it should have been raised before trial only if, before the trial, opportunity for the motion did not exist or the defendant was not aware of the grounds for the motion. Pen C §1538.5(h). See People v Jackson (1996) 13 C4th 1164, 1203, 56 CR2d 49. On motions to suppress evidence based on unlawful searches and seizures, see chap 16; on motions to exclude admissions and confessions, see chap 23.

Issues related to the Miranda rule or to the voluntariness of a confession should be addressed at trial by a motion under Evid C §402, discussed in §23.9. People v Mattson (1990) 50 C3d 826, 851, 268 CR 802; People v Whitfield (1996) 46 CA4th 947, 952, 54 CR2d 370. See also Oregon v Elstad (1985) 470 US 298, 308, 84 L Ed 2d 222, 232, 105 S Ct 1285; U.S. v Gonzalez-Sandoval (9th Cir 1990) 894 F2d 1043, 1048.

§31.19 (2) Corpus Delicti Rule as Basis for Exclusion of Evidence Eliminated

Historically, the corpus delicti rule made a defendant's extrajudicial statements admitting involvement in the offense inadmissible until the prosecution proved that (1) a crime actually occurred and (2) it was caused by a criminal agency. This evidentiary aspect of the corpus delicti rule was eliminated by the truth-in-evidence provision of the California Constitution (Cal Const art I, §28(f)(2)). People v Alvarez (2002) 27 C4th 1161, 1173, 119 CR2d 903. However, the portion of the corpus delicti rule that precludes conviction unless there is independent evidence of (1) the crime and (2) the defendant's involvement in it is not affected by the truth-in-evidence provision. People v Alvarez, supra.

For crimes committed on or after June 6, 1990 (see People v Ray (1996) 13 C4th 313, 341, 52 CR2d 296), Pen C §190.41 eliminates the need for independent proof of the commission of a felony underlying a felony murder special circumstance allegation. Thus, when a felony murder special circumstance is alleged under Pen C §190.2(a)(17), a defendant's uncorroborated extrajudicial statements may be used to prove the commission of the felony on which the allegation is based, even if the felony cannot be shown by other evidence. People v Weaver (2001) 26 C4th 876, 929, 111 CR2d 2.

Ø Note: Counsel should make a Pen C §1118 or §1118.1 motion for judgment of acquittal if the prosecution fails to produce sufficient independent evidence to corroborate a defendant's confession or admission of involvement in a crime. On Pen C §§1118 and 1118.1 motions, see §§25.43-25.44.

g. Prior Testimony

§31.20 (1) When Prior Testimony May Be Admitted

Prior testimony may be admitted when witness is unavailable. When a witness who is unavailable to testify at trial has testified under oath at a prior proceeding, counsel may move to have the prior testimony admitted into evidence. Evid C §§240 (definition of unavailable witness), 1290-1294 (former testimony exception to hearsay rule).

Ø Note: If the prosecution seeks to have relevant prior testimony admitted against the defendant, it must be shown that the defendant has had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness. Crawford v Washington (2004) 541 US 36, 54, 158 L Ed 2d 177, 203, 124 S Ct 1354. Under Crawford, a witness's prior testimony at the defendant's preliminary hearing is potentially admissible at trial, but prior testimony at the separate trial of another defendant would not be admissible.

Counsel must have made a good faith effort and exercised reasonable diligence in attempting to secure the witness's attendance. People v Hovey (1988) 44 C3d 543, 562, 244 CR 121. See also People v Saucedo (1995) 33 CA4th 1230, 40 CR2d 153, disapproved on other grounds in People v Cromer (2001) 24 C4th 889, 901, 103 CR2d 23, for a summary of cases finding reasonable diligence when a search for a witness begins shortly before, or during, trial. The trial court's determination of due diligence is subject to independent review on appeal. People v Cromer (2001) 24 C4th 889, 901, 103 CR2d 23.

Ø Warning: Decisions predating Cromer may provide useful illustrations of steps counsel can take to demonstrate due diligence in attempting to find a witness, but it is important to keep in mind that, in pre-Cromer cases, the reviewing court may have been reviewing the trial court's ruling on the issue under the more deferential abuse-of-discretion standard. See 24 C4th at 899.

An evidentiary hearing is held in the trial court to decide whether the witness's prior testimony should be admitted. People v Alcala (1992) 4 C4th 742, 774, 15 CR2d 432. Credible, competent evidence must support a finding that the witness is unavailable. People v Stritzinger (1983) 34 C3d 505, 515, 194 CR 431. For example, it is proper to use an expert's testimony to establish that a victim suffering from rape-induced posttraumatic stress disorder is "unavailable" as a witness. People v Turner (1990) 219 CA3d 1207, 1216, 268 CR 686, disapproved on other grounds in People v Cromer (2001) 24 C4th 889, 901, 103 CR2d 23 (victim's preliminary examination testimony held admissible).

The prosecution has a more difficult burden to meet before a court will find a witness legally unavailable and allow his or her prior testimony to be introduced at trial, because defendants have federal and state constitutional rights to confront and cross-examine witnesses. US Const amend VI; Cal Const art I, §15; Pen C §686(3); Barber v Page (1968) 390 US 719, 722, 20 L Ed 2d 255, 259, 88 S Ct 1318; Pointer v Texas (1965) 380 US 400, 403, 13 L Ed 2d 923, 926, 85 S Ct 1065 (federal right to confrontation applies to states through Fourteenth Amendment). For an example of an evidentiary showing held to meet this burden, see People v Macioce (1987) 197 CA3d 262, 283, 242 CR 771 (witness's preliminary hearing testimony held admissible after doctor testified at trial that there was a 70-percent chance that further testimony would be detrimental to witness).

When a witness is outside the state, counsel must usually satisfy the Uniform Act to Secure the Attendance of Witnesses From Without the State in Criminal Cases (Pen C §§1334-1334.6). People v Masters (1982) 134 CA3d 509, 520, 185 CR 134 (prosecutor could not use robbery victim's preliminary hearing testimony at trial because prosecutor did not make use of Uniform Act). Compliance may be excused based on the facts of the case. See, e.g., Dres v Campoy (9th Cir 1986) 784 F2d 996, 1001 (lack of compliance with Uniform Act excused because witness's mother promised that witness would attend). A federal subpoena may be required when a U.S. resident is in a foreign country. See People v St. Germain (1982) 138 CA3d 507, 517, 187 CR 915. If a valid California subpoena was served on the witness before he or she left the country, however, it may be possible to show due diligence without serving the witness with a federal subpoena. See People v Watson (1989) 213 CA3d 446, 453, 261 CR 635. A mere showing that a foreign witness has returned to his or her native country may be insufficient to satisfy due diligence. People v Sandoval (2001)

87 CA4th 1425, 1443, 105 CR2d 504. For cases showing due diligence when a foreign witness has left the country, see People v Smith (2003) 30 C4th 581, 609, 134 CR2d 1 (Japanese native returned to Japan); People v Martinez (2007) 154 CA4th 314, 64 CR3d 580 (refugee from India seeking asylum in Canada).

Compliance with a subpoena through the mail or messenger provisions of Pen C §1328d is sufficient diligence to support the introduction of former testimony when the witness fails to appear. People v Perez (1989) 207 CA3d 431, 435, 254 CR 869 (witness acknowledged receipt of subpoena and agreed to be "on call" on specified dates but went on vacation instead).

Ø Note: Under traditional Confrontation Clause analysis, certain prior out-of-court statements, e.g., spontaneous statements, have been held admissible even though the defendant did not have the opportunity to cross-examine the witness. See White v Illinois (1992) 502 US 346, 356, 116 L Ed 2d 848, 859, 112 S Ct 736 (child sex assault victim's out-of-court statements properly admitted even though child did not testify at trial). After Crawford v Washington, supra, the admissibility of such out-of-court statements will turn on whether they are testimonial in nature. For further discussion of Crawford, see Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook, chap 2 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009).

Qualifying testimony. The party against whom former testimony is offered must not only have been a party to the proceeding in which the former testimony was given and have had the right and opportunity to cross-examine the declarant, but the party must also have had an interest in and motive for cross-examining the declarant that is similar to that existing in the present trial. Evid C §1291(a)(1)-(2); People v Samayoa (1997) 15 C4th 795, 849, 64 CR2d 400. See also Evidence Benchbook §8.2. Testimony from an earlier trial of the same case, i.e., after a mistrial was declared or the case was reversed on appeal, meets these criteria. People v Ashford (1968) 265 CA2d 673, 677, 71 CR 619 (witness out of state during second trial); People v Williams (1968) 265 CA2d 888, 896, 71 CR 773 (witness invoked Fifth Amendment at second trial). When such testimony is used, it can be impeached even though the witness who testified at the earlier trial is unavailable for rehabilitation at the subsequent trial. See People v Ashford (1968) 265 CA2d 673, 682, 71 CR 619.

Testimony from the preliminary hearing in the case usually qualifies. See People v Reed (1996) 13 C4th 217, 224, 52 CR2d 106; People v King (1969) 269 CA2d 40, 46, 74 CR 679. But see People v Johnson (1975) 46 CA3d 701, 705, 120 CR 372 (prosecutor's request to introduce preliminary-hearing testimony of victim who was unavailable at trial denied because testimony of Spanish-speaking investigator present at preliminary hearing showed victim's testimony was inaccurately translated, thus denying defense counsel opportunity to effectively cross-examine victim).

Penal Code §872(b) now permits the finding of probable cause to be based on hearsay, i.e., the sworn testimony of a qualified law enforcement officer or honorably retired law enforcement officer relating the statements of declarants made out of court offered for the truth of the matter asserted. A prosecutor concerned about the future availability of a key witness may decide to forgo a hearsay preliminary hearing and instead call the witness to testify at the preliminary hearing to preserve the testimony for potential introduction at trial. See Correa v Superior Court (2002) 27 C4th 444, 452, 117 CR2d 27.

Ø Practice tip: The hearsay preliminary hearing may provide a basis for challenging the testimony of witnesses who testify. Penal Code §866(b) essentially limits defense counsel's cross-examination at the preliminary examination to the existence of probable cause. This limitation may be grounds for opposing the subsequent introduction of the testimony at trial on the basis that the opportunity and motive to cross-examine the witness was not the same as at trial. See Crawford v Washington, supra; People v Robinson, supra. Although the defendant must have had the opportunity to cross-examine the witness at the preliminary hearing, the defendant need not have fully used that right. People v Smith (2003) 30 C4th 581, 611, 134 CR2d 1; People v Zapien (1993) 4 C4th 929, 975, 17 CR2d 122.

Testimony that is not admissible. A probationer's testimony at a hearing to revoke probation is inadmissible against the probationer during subsequent proceedings on related criminal charges, except for impeachment or rebuttal. People v Weaver (1985) 39 C3d 654, 660, 217 CR 245 (immunity created by Coleman survived Proposition 8); People v Coleman (1975) 13 C3d 867, 889, 120 CR 384. Also, a defendant's testimony at a Pen C §1538.5 hearing may not be used at trial except to impeach the defendant. Simmons v U.S. (1968) 390 US 377, 394, 19 L Ed 2d 1247, 1259, 88 S Ct 967.

Conditional examination of witness. Under Pen C §§1335-1345, in any criminal matter, the defendant may have a witness conditionally examined if there is reason to believe the witness will be unavailable at trial. See Pen C §1336. In any noncapital case, the prosecution may also use the conditional examination procedure for witnesses who will be unavailable at trial. Pen C §1335(a). In a case charging a serious felony (i.e., a felony listed in Pen C §1192.7(c) or a drug offense specified in Health & S C §§11351, 11352, 11378, or 11379) or in a case of domestic violence, the prosecution or the defense may use the conditional examination procedures to memorialize testimony if there is evidence that the witness's life is in jeopardy. Pen C §1335(b). Additionally, in a case of domestic violence, a witness may be conditionally examined if there is evidence that the victim or material witness has been or is being dissuaded, by the defendant or any person acting on behalf of the defendant, by intimidation or a physical threat, from cooperating with the prosecutor or testifying at trial. Pen C §1335(d). This testimony is admissible at trial if the witness is unavailable within the meaning of Evid C §240. Pen C §1345. For further discussion, see §11.25A.

Similar rules permit the parties to memorialize the testimony of an out-of-state witness and to introduce the record of that testimony at trial when the witness is unavailable. See Pen C §§1349-1362.

Other uses of prior testimony. Prior testimony can also be introduced to impeach a witness (Evid C §§770, 1235), to support or rehabilitate a witness's credibility after it is attacked by an express or implied charge of recent bias or motive to fabricate (Evid C §§791, 1236), and as substantive testimony if the witness has no present recollection of the matter (Evid C §§1237-1238). See People v Brock (1985) 38 C3d 180, 198, 211 CR 122.

§31.21 (2) Procedure for Introducing Prior Testimony

Counsel seeking to introduce prior (former) testimony (Evid C §§1290-1294) must first provide the court and opposing counsel with a transcript or recording of the testimony. Counsel can either ask opposing counsel to stipulate that the transcript is a correct transcription of testimony taken in a prior proceeding or produce a witness to testify to that fact. Possible witnesses include the court reporter who took down the testimony and the attorney who represented one of the parties. See Evid C §§1400-1402, 1410-1421 for authentication requirements. See also Effective Introduction of Evidence in California, chap 28 (2d ed Cal CEB 2000); Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook, chap 8 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009).

As an alternative, when the prior testimony is in a properly certified reporter's transcript, and that transcript is part of an accessible court file, counsel can simply request the court to take judicial notice of the transcript. See Evid C §§452(d), 1280. A sample request for judicial notice at trial is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §31.3 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

Ø Note: If counsel is using former testimony to impeach a witness, the impeaching documents do not need to be shown to the witness. Evid C §768(a).

§31.22 h. Prior Convictions

When a defendant's prior felony conviction is an element of a charged crime, the prosecution is entitled to prove the conviction in open court; that proof can include both the fact that the defendant was previously convicted of a felony offense as well as the nature of the felony involved, or the defendant can stipulate to having a felony conviction and thereby keep from the jury the nature (but not the fact) of the particular felony. People v Sapp (2003) 31 C4th 240, 261, 2 CR3d 554. But if, as in People v Bouzas (1991) 53 C3d 467, 480, 279 CR 847 (in which defendant was charged with petty theft with prior under Pen C §§484 and 666), the prior conviction is not an element of the charged offense but merely a sentencing enhancement, the defense is entitled to admit the existence of the prior and prevent the jury from learning about it. See Pen C §1025(e).

When a defendant pleads not guilty but admits the truth of an allegation of a prior conviction, and the prior is one that may be kept from the jury, the prior must not be read to the jury or alluded to during trial (Pen C §1025) unless the prior conviction is adjudged admissible for some other legitimate purpose. People v Calderon (1994) 9 C4th 69, 73, 36 CR2d 333.

When a defendant pleads not guilty and denies having an alleged prior conviction, the defendant may move to bifurcate the trial of the prior conviction allegation. The defendant is entitled to have a jury decide the truth of prior conviction allegations except when identity issues are raised. Those issues must generally be tried by the court. Pen C §1025(c). Prior convictions are typically proved by the submission of documentary evidence. See Pen C §969b; People v Reed (1996) 13 C4th 217, 224, 52 CR2d 106 (record of conviction may be used to ascertain nature of felony). For additional discussion, see §24.26.

A trial court need not advise the defendant of his or her rights (Boykin-Tahl advisement) before permitting him or her to stipulate to a prior conviction. People v Newman (1999) 21 C4th 413, 422, 87 CR2d 474. See §§24.31-24.32.

§31.23 B. Stipulations to Admission of Evidence

Counsel for the parties may decide to agree or "stipulate" to the admission of certain evidence at trial. A decision to enter into such a stipulation has long been recognized as being within the range of tactical determinations that counsel is invested with discretion to make without the client's express authority. People v Adams (1993) 6 C4th 570, 578, 24 CR2d 831. Stipulations can be useful to avoid the impact of unduly prejudicial evidence. For example, when the prosecution seeks to introduce a similar act of misconduct to prove identity or modus operandi, the defense can offer a stipulation sanitizing the similar act or precluding its use altogether, as appropriate. People v Perry (1985) 166 CA3d 924, 931, 212 CR 793 (case reversed because of court's refusal to accept defense stipulation to elements of similar act; undue prejudice resulted).

A stipulation can also be useful to simplify proof of undisputed facts or as a strategy to deemphasize certain aspects of an opponent's case. For instance, in a murder prosecution, a stipulation that a decedent was a human being living on a certain date and found dead on another, can obviate the need to admit a picture in evidence showing the victim alive before the homicide occurred. People v Hendricks (1987) 43 C3d 584, 594, 238 CR 66.

Counsel should be aware that the prosecution can be compelled to accept a defendant's offer to stipulate to certain facts only if the evidence that the prosecutor intends to proffer is unduly prejudicial. Examples of when evidence would be too prejudicial are an unnecessarily gruesome photograph that the court concludes would only inflame the jury, or evidence offered on an uncontested issue without some other legitimate purpose, e.g., the evidence only goes to establish the existence of an element of the crime to which the defendant has already admitted. See, e.g., Pen C §1025(e); People v Bouzas (1991) 53 C3d 467, 471, 279 CR 847. If, however, the evidence is relevant and not unduly prejudicial, and the prosecutor can explain why the evidence is relevant, not unduly prejudicial, and serves another legitimate purpose, the prosecution cannot be forced to accept a defendant's proposed stipulation. See, e.g., People v Scheid (1997) 16 C4th 1, 19, 65 CR2d 348; People v Medina (1995) 11 C4th 694, 754, 47 CR2d 165. The general rule is that the prosecution in a criminal case cannot be compelled to accept a stipulation if the effect would be to deprive the state's case of its persuasiveness and forcefulness. People v Scheid (1997) 16 C4th 1, 17, 65 CR2d 348; People v Arias (1996) 13 C4th 92, 131, 51 CR2d 770.

The following situations allow the introduction of evidence despite a stipulation to certain facts:

- The evidence stipulated to retains some probative value;
- The evidence remains relevant to an issue not covered by the stipulation or admission;
- The stipulation would force the prosecution to choose between theories of guilt or would hamper a coherent presentation of the evidence on the remaining issues;
- The stipulation or admission is ambiguous in form or limited in scope; and
- During trial, a party seeks to deprive his or her opponent of the legitimate force and effect of material evidence to which a stipulation was entered.

Ø Note: Conceivably, a trial court could treat a party's offer to stipulate as a judicial admission, with the effect that the disputed facts would no longer be in issue, thereby limiting or excluding under Evid C §352 the evidence the opposing party seeks to introduce to prove those facts.

Typically, stipulations are read to the jury during the trial in place of testimony and are reiterated by the court in connection with the reading of CALCRIM 104. In framing a stipulation, counsel should make sure that a meeting of the minds has occurred concerning the stipulation's meaning and scope. See People v Dyer (1988) 45 C3d 26, 57, 246 CR 209 (court relieved prosecution of burdensome effects of stipulation because it found, despite both counsels' good faith, no meeting of minds had occurred on what stipulation meant). The best way to ensure that a stipulation sets forth precisely what the parties intend is to put it in writing, preferably in advance of trial, and have both attorneys sign it.

§31.24 C. Objecting to Evidence When It Is Introduced; Objections Must Be Specific and Timely

For an objection to the admission of evidence to be reviewable on appeal, the objection must be both timely and specific. Evid C §353(a); People v Waidla (2000) 22 C4th 690, 717, 94 CR2d 396. A defendant cannot argue on appeal that evidence should have been excluded for reasons not set forth at trial; however, he or she may argue that "the asserted error in overruling the trial objection had the legal consequence of violating due process." People v Partida (2005) 37 C4th 428, 431, 35 CR3d 644.

In addition to the basic ground for objection (e.g., hearsay, relevance), it is often advisable to ask the court to weigh the probative value of the evidence against its potential for undue prejudice under Evid C §352. Counsel should apprise the court why admission or exclusion is unduly prejudicial and explain why no remedy can repair the damage that will occur if the jury is exposed to the objectionable evidence or if the proposed evidence is rejected.

It is vital to object to a question asked by opposing counsel before the witness answers the question. If counsel does not object until after the witness has responded, or if only the response was objectionable, counsel must move to strike in addition to objecting, and request that the jury be admonished to disregard the evidence. People v Abbott (1956) 47 C2d 362, 372, 303 P2d 730 (motion to strike is not available unless counsel first makes preliminary objection to elicited inadmissible evidence); People v Brogna (1988) 202 CA3d 700, 710, 248 CR 761 (counsel may draft appropriate limiting instruction to be given by court).

> Ø Note: When existing CALCRIM instructions are insufficient to meet the demands of a given problem, counsel should first try to modify the most nearly applicable instruction, if its content is close to what is required. Historically, courts tended to approve instructions patterned after the approved instructions more readily than instructions independently created by counsel. Given that CALCRIM does not cover everything, counsel should not be dissuaded from preparing pinpoint instructions to deal with objectionable testimony or evidence as the need arises. Jury instructions are discussed in chap 32.

For discussion of motions to strike and requests for admonition, see California Trial Objections, chaps 52-53 (Cal CEB Annual).

D. Introducing and Opposing Introduction of Exhibits and Demonstrative Evidence

§31.25 1. Marking Exhibits for Identification

Exhibits must be marked for identification. See 3 Witkin, California Evidence, Presentation at Trial §149 (4th ed 2000). Although different courts use different procedures, most courts prefer to have exhibits marked by the court clerk during a recess so that trial proceedings are not unnecessarily delayed. If more than four or five exhibits will be proffered, counsel may prepare an exhibit list and give a copy to the court clerk in advance or after all exhibits are marked. Attorneys sometimes prefer to have exhibits marked at the time they are to be identified to avoid giving opposing counsel advance notice. However, opposing counsel should have already learned of most evidence through pretrial discovery (see chap 11), and many trial judges like to have the exhibits premarked. Before or after an exhibit has been marked for identification, counsel should show the exhibit to opposing counsel in order to give counsel an opportunity to object. See 3 Witkin, Evidence, Presentation §147.

When counsel wishes to take a witness by surprise and enhance the impeachment value of an exhibit, counsel may ask the judge to order opposing counsel not to tell the witness about the exhibit before he or she testifies.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.26 2. Exhibit May Be Used Solely for Illustration or Admitted Into Evidence

Models, photographs, and other types of exhibits must accurately reflect something that is relevant to the facts in dispute to be admissible as evidence. See Evid C §350.

If counsel uses an exhibit solely for purposes of illustration, there is no need to move the exhibit into evidence, although it still must be marked for identification. The requirements for using exhibits merely as illustrations are less stringent than those for introducing exhibits into evidence. See, e.g., People v Ham (1970) 7 CA3d 768, 780, 86 CR 906, disapproved on other grounds in People v Compton (1971) 6 C3d 55, 60 n3, 98 CR 217 (gun similar to that used in robbery shown for illustrative purposes). The exhibits, however, must be relevant and cannot be misleading. See, e.g., People v Vaiza (1966) 244 CA2d 121, 125, 52 CR 733 (error to introduce real gun for illustration when issue was whether deadly weapon or toy gun was used).

If counsel wants jurors to consider the exhibit and have it before them during deliberations, counsel must move the court to receive the exhibit in evidence. See Evid C §140; 3 Witkin, California Evidence, Presentation at Trial §149 (4th ed 2000). This step is commonly taken at the conclusion of the evidentiary phase of the trial.

To move an exhibit into evidence, counsel should state:

Your Honor, I _ _[move/ask]_ _ that _ _[defendant's/People's]_ _ Exhibit No. _ _[number]_ _ be _ _[admitted into/received in]_ _ evidence.

Counsel can also add a description of the exhibit, e.g.:

Your Honor, I ask that People's Exhibit No. 22, a 22-caliber handgun, be received in evidence.

The following are some of the primary objections to documentary and demonstrative evidence:

- Not properly authenticated. Evid C §1401.
- Too time-consuming, too prejudicial, will confuse the issues, or will mislead the jury. Evid C §352.
- Unduly gruesome or inflammatory. People v Crittenden (1994) 9 C4th 83, 133, 36 CR2d 474.
- Not substantially similar. See People v Bonin (1989) 47 C3d 808, 847, 254 CR 298.
- Misleading. See California Trial Objections, chap 31 (Cal CEB Annual).

For discussion of the requirements for using various models, exhibits, and demonstrations, see Effective Introduction of Evidence in California, chaps 11 (authentication), 23 (experiments and scientific tests), 39 (physical evidence) (2d ed Cal CEB 2000).

§31.27 3. Juror Access to Exhibits

Ordinarily, jurors are not permitted to view or handle exhibits until after they have been admitted in evidence and jury deliberations have begun. On occasion, counsel may wish the jury to have access to exhibits during the trial so that jurors may refer to the exhibits while the authenticating witness testifies. Such access is available in the court's discretion, even for some materials that may not be moved into evidence, e.g., transcripts of tape recordings. In some counties, it is common practice for counsel to ask permission of the court to "publish" an exhibit. "Publishing" an exhibit means allowing jurors to examine it while it is being discussed by the witness describing it, but before the court has decided whether the exhibit may be admitted into evidence. See Mauet, Trial Techniques (5th ed 2000).

To publish or show an exhibit to the jury, counsel should state:

Your Honor, I ask that _ _[defendant's/People's]_ _ Exhibit No. _ _[number]_ _ be published to the jury at this time.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.28 4. Common Exhibits

Common exhibits, including both real evidence and illustrative evidence, include the following:

- Film or videotape, e.g., showing the crime scene;
- Audio or video recording, e.g., of the defendant's statement to police;
- Demonstrations of the crime;
- Scientific evidence, e.g., slides or photographs of fingerprints;
- X-ray films showing injuries;
- Photographs or slides, e.g., of injuries;
- Maps or diagrams of the crime scene;
- Weapon with which crime was committed;
- Model, e.g., of injured part of body; and
- Fruits of the crime, e.g., burglarized items.

© The Regents of the University of California

5. Demonstrative Evidence

§31.29 a. Preserving Objection

Counsel opposing the introduction of an exhibit may object as soon as he or she is aware of the evidence. The objection should be made even if the item is to be used solely for demonstrative purposes and not admitted into evidence. If opposing counsel has the exhibit marked during a recess, counsel should ask that his or her objection be taken down by the court reporter. If opposing counsel has the exhibit marked during trial and it is prejudicial to counsel's case, counsel may ask to approach the bench and request a hearing outside the jury's presence. To preserve the issue for appeal if the objection is not sustained, counsel must request that the demonstrative exhibit or a facsimile be lodged with the court as part of the trial record.

For further discussion, see §31.3 (checklist of trial motions), §§31.8-31.22 (in limine motions), §§31.25-31.32 (procedure for admission of exhibits in evidence). See generally California Trial Objections (Cal CEB Annual).

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.30 b. Photographs

Counsel may try to introduce photographs into evidence or use them for illustration purposes. See People v Thomas (1992) 2 C4th 489, 524, 7 CR2d 199; People v O'Brien (1976) 61 CA3d 766, 780, 132 CR 616. Opposing counsel can object to autopsy photographs or other photographs of injuries or violent death on grounds that the photos are unduly prejudicial because of their gruesome nature, that they might confuse the issues or mislead the jury, or that explaining them or laying a proper foundation for them would take an undue amount of time. See Evid C §352; People v Crittenden (1994) 9 C4th 83, 133, 36 CR2d 474.

Counsel opposing the admission of photographic evidence should examine the photographs carefully to make sure that they accurately depict what they are supposed to show. For example, a photograph of the crime scene taken in daylight might give a false impression of how much detail eyewitnesses were able to observe and might be subject to exclusion. However, changes in what is photographed since the time of the crime do not necessarily make photographs inadmissible, as long as the photograph is accurate. See People v O'Brien, supra (posed photos allowed into evidence when witness testified that they accurately depicted scene and conditions prevailing at time of burglary); People v Smith (1963) 223 CA2d 394, 407, 36 CR 119 (photo of scene of robbery taken at later date admissible to show witness's view).

§31.31 c. Demonstrations and Experiments

Demonstrations, reenactments, simulations, experiments and the like have long been permitted in trial courts. They are admitted in the trial court's discretion. The proponent of such evidence bears the burden of laying an adequate foundation, showing that (People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 198, 32 CR2d 762; People v Bonin (1989) 47 C3d 808, 847, 254 CR 298):

- The experiment is relevant;
- The experiment was or will be conducted under conditions substantially similar to those existing at the time of the actual event in question;
- The experiment will not consume undue time, confuse the issues, or mislead the jury; and
- Any expert who conducts and testifies about an experiment possesses the proper qualifications.

Examples of the wide variety of experimental evidence that have been held admissible include an anthropomorphic dummy used to measure the force generated by a collision (People v Roehler (1985) 167 CA3d 353, 385, 213 CR 353), an audiotape reenactment used to identify sounds as gunshots (People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 198, 32 CR2d 762), and a videotape reenactment depicting scenes witness saw on the evening of a murder (People v Rodrigues (1994) 8 C4th 1060, 1113, 36 CR2d 235).

In ruling on the admissibility of a reenactment, the court must determine whether it (1) is a reasonable representation of what it purports to portray, and (2) will assist jurors in determining the facts of the case or will instead mislead them. People v Rodrigues (1994) 8 C4th 1060, 1114, 36 CR2d 235. For example, in People v Boyd (1990) 222 CA3d 541, 566, 271 CR 738, the defense retained a cinematographer to create a film that attempted to reproduce the lighting conditions at the crime scene to discredit an eyewitness's identification of the defendant. After viewing the film during a hearing outside the jury' presence, the court concluded that an inadequate foundation had been laid because no witness had established that the film was an accurate representation of the lighting conditions at the time of the incident. The court also noted that the human eye is capable of observing more than the film depicted. Likewise, in People v Gilbert (1992) 5 CA4th 1372, 1388, 7 CR2d 660, an in-court demonstration using live models was not permitted because of significant physical and emotional disparities existing between the models and the individuals they were supposed to represent. The appellate court found that the trial court was well within its discretion in finding that the defense failed to show that the conditions of the proposed demonstration would be the same as those existing at the time of the alleged crime.

For discussion of using experiments and scientific tests, see Effective Introduction of Evidence in California, chap 23 (2d ed Cal CEB 2000). For discussion of physical evidence, see Effective Intro of Evidence, chaps 11, 39.

Ø Note: With technologies such as computer-generated simulations and optical laser systems being introduced to the courtroom, counsel must be aware of the Kelly (see §§31.12-31.14) and Evid C §352 issues presented and must object during trial to preserve the issue of admissibility on appeal. People v Hart (1999) 20 C4th 546, 615, 85 CR2d 132.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.32 d. Similar but Not Identical Evidence

Counsel may attempt to introduce as evidence, or use only for purposes of illustration, objects similar to those connected with the commission of a crime. People v Barnett (1998) 17 C4th 1044, 1135, 74 CR2d 121. If the object is not exactly the same as that which it purports to represent, opposing counsel may object to its admission or use on the grounds that the evidence is irrelevant, lacking in proper foundation, misleading to the jury, and unduly prejudicial. See Evid C §§350, 352, 402-405. Compare People v Vaiza (1966) 244 CA2d 121, 125, 52 CR 733 (error to introduce real gun to illustrate gun that victim claimed he saw, because substitute differed in several meaningful respects; issue was whether deadly weapon was used, and victim might have seen toy gun), with People v Ham (1970) 7 CA3d 768, 780, 86 CR 906, disapproved on other grounds in People v Compton (1971) 6 C3d 55, 60 n3, 98 CR 217 (gun used for illustration only in robbery case to allow defendant's wife to testify that gun was similar to one owned by defendant).

VI. OTHER TRIAL MOTIONS

§31.33 A. Requiring Election by Prosecution

The defense can invoke the doctrine of election when the evidence that the prosecution intends to present at trial tends to show a number of distinct and separate criminal acts, any one of which may constitute the crime charged. At the beginning of trial, the defense may request that the court require the prosecution to select the particular act on which it intends to rely in proving the charged count. People v Burnett (1999) 71 CA4th 151, 165, 83 CR2d 629; People v Salvato (1991) 234 CA3d 872, 879, 285 CR 837.

If there is no request for an election, the court must instruct the jury so as to ensure unanimity. People v Melhado (1998) 60 CA4th 1529, 1534, 70 CR2d 878; People v Salvato, supra. As a rule, when more than one act supports the crime charged, the court must instruct jurors that, to find the defendant guilty, they must unanimously agree that the defendant committed the same act or acts. See People v Russo (2001) 25 C4th 1124, 1132, 108 CR2d 436; People v Castaneda (1997) 55 CA4th 1067, 1070, 64 CR2d 395. See also CALCRIM 3500-3502. Jurors must also unanimously agree that the defendant committed the same specific act constituting the crime within the period alleged. People v Crow (1994) 28 CA4th 440, 445, 33 CR2d 624. See CALCRIM 3410 (statute of limitations).

Election cannot be compelled when the acts alleged are wholly generic in nature or constitute a continuous course of criminal conduct. People v Jones (1990) 51 C3d 294, 321, 270 CR 611; People v Sanchez (2001) 94 CA4th 622, 631, 114 CR2d 437 (continuing offense does not require unanimity). Moreover, jurors need not agree on a specific overt act in a conspiracy case as long as they all agree that a conspirator committed an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy. People v Russo (2001) 25 C4th 1124, 1133, 108 CR2d 436.

§31.34 B. Sanctions for Failing to Comply With Discovery

An evidentiary showing is required to support a motion for sanctions for failure to comply with the statutory discovery provisions. With the possible exception of constitutional discovery violations, counsel must provide evidence that a request for discovery was made before trial, and that the prosecution did not respond as required. See Pen C §§1054(b), 1054.5(b). Subsequent motions to compel disclosure of information are optional. Pen C §1054.5(b); People v Jackson (1993) 15 CA4th 1197, 1202, 19 CR2d 80; People v Superior Court (Sturm) (1992) 9 CA4th 172, 181, 11 CR2d 652.

As possible sanctions for failure to comply with discovery, the court may:

- Issue an order compelling disclosure of information. See In re Littlefield (1993) 5 C4th 122, 137, 19 CR2d 248 (court authorized to order defense to telephone likely witness and obtain address for disclosure to prosecution).
- Hold the noncomplying party, or the party's attorney, in contempt for any violation of a valid discovery order. In re Littlefield, supra.
- Give a jury instruction based on Pen C §1054.5(b) advising the jury that it may consider a party's concealment of evidence or failure to timely disclose evidence. See CALCRIM 306.
- Delay or prohibit a witness from testifying or prohibit evidence from being presented at trial. This sanction is available only when other sanctions have been unsuccessful in motivating a party to disgorge discoverable information. Pen C §1054.5(c); People v Edwards (1993) 17 CA4th 1248, 1264, 22 CR2d 3.
- Dismiss a charge, when required to do so by the U.S. Constitution. Pen C §1054.5(c).
- Issue any other lawful order the court deems appropriate. Pen C §1054.5(b).

For further discussion of discovery, see chap 11.

C. Jury Issues

§31.35 1. Juror's Question for Witness

Although jurors are not selected for the purpose of asking questions of witnesses, the trial court may occasionally permit jurors to venture into this area of counsel's domain. People v Anderson (1990) 52 C3d 453, 481, 276 CR 356; People v McAlister (1985) 167 CA3d 633, 644, 213 CR 271. If the trial court decides to allow a juror to pose a question, counsel should request that the court require the question to be submitted in writing so that both attorneys may examine it, make necessary objections, and obtain a ruling, all out of the jury's presence. People v Majors (1998) 18 C4th 385, 407, 75 CR2d 684. Direct questioning by jurors has been disapproved and should not be permitted. People v Cummings (1993) 4 C4th 1233, 1305, 18 CR2d 796.

Judges may ask questions but cannot align themselves with one side. People v Cummings, supra; People v Swanson (1981) 123 CA3d 1024, 1030, 176 CR 915. Even when the judge asks the question, counsel must make a specific objection in order to preserve the issue for appellate review. See, e.g., People v Ham (1970) 7 CA3d 768, 781, 86 CR 906, disapproved on other grounds in People v Compton (1971) 6 C3d 55, 60 n3, 98 CR 217.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.36 2. Communication Between Judge and Jurors

When jurors have questions about the law or evidence that they want answered during deliberations, those questions should be answered in open court, in the presence of the accused and counsel for the parties, unless the defendant's presence is waived. Pen C §1138. On receiving a jury's question, the trial judge should advise all counsel of the question and give each an opportunity to object to any action by the court or jury that might be deemed irregular. People v Hawthorne (1992) 4 C4th 43, 69, 14 CR2d 133. Failure to object in a timely manner operates as a waiver of the issue on appeal. People v Jennings (1991) 53 C3d 334, 384, 279 CR 780. Failure to follow this procedure can be harmless error. See, e.g., People v Hawthorne (1992) 4 C4th 43, 70, 14 CR2d 133; People v Jennings, supra.

Private communications between the court and the jury are generally improper. People v Delgado (1993) 5 C4th 312, 330, 19 CR2d 529. Ex parte communications between the court and the jury impinge on a defendant's constitutional rights to the assistance of counsel and to be personally present at all trial proceedings. People v Hawthorne (1992) 4 C4th 43, 69, 14 CR2d 133. If the court communicates with the jury during deliberations outside open court and without the defendant's prior consent, defense counsel must object on the record in a timely manner or the issue will be waived on appeal. People v Jennings, supra.

3. Discharge of Juror

§31.37 a. Grounds for Discharging Juror and Seating Alternate

The court may discharge a juror and replace him or her with an alternate juror when (Pen C §1089; CCP §§233-234):

- The juror dies;
- The juror becomes ill;
- Good cause is shown to the court that the juror is unable to perform his or her duty, such as when a juror refuses to deliberate (People v Thomas (1994) 26 CA4th 1328, 1333, 32 CR2d 177; see People v Cleveland (2001) 25 C4th 466, 485, 106 CR2d 313 (what constitutes refusal to deliberate)); or
- The juror requests to be discharged and good cause appears for the discharge.

The appellate courts have also found the following to be good cause for discharging a juror:

- The juror's brother dies (In re Mendes (1979) 23 C3d 847, 852, 153 CR 831);
- The juror has an emotional reaction to the evidence (People v Van Houten (1980) 113 CA3d 280, 286, 170 CR 189);
- The juror is inattentive or sleeps during trial (People v Johnson (1993) 6 C4th 1, 22, 23 CR2d 593);
- The juror conceals a prior criminal charge (People v Price (1991) 1 C4th 324, 399, 3 CR2d 106);
- The juror has family obligations (People v Hall (1979) 95 CA3d 299, 157 CR 107);
- The juror becomes a victim of crime during court recess (People v Manriquez (1976) 59 CA3d 426, 431, 130 CR 585);
- The juror is arrested during trial (People v Farris (1977) 66 CA3d 376, 386, 136 CR 45);
- The juror is inadvertently exposed to outside information about the case, which gives rise to a presumption of prejudice (People v Nesler (1997) 16 C4th 561, 579, 66 CR2d 454; see Caliendo v Warden of Cal. Men's Colony (9th Cir 2004) 365 F3d 691, 696);
- The juror requests to be discharged during deliberations because he or she is too emotionally involved to follow court's instructions (People v Collins (1976) 17 C3d 687, 690, 131 CR 782); and
- Juror misconduct (Larios v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 324, 331, 155 CR 374; People v Guzman (1977) 66 CA3d 549, 559, 136 CR 163).

Ø Warning: The following actions concerning jurors are crimes that may be punished either as misdemeanors or felonies: improper attempts to influence a juror (Pen C §95); threats to a juror after a verdict (Pen C §95.1); and a promise by a juror to give a verdict, or the receipt by a juror of improper communications (Pen C §96).

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.38 b. Hearing on Whether to Discharge Juror

A hearing to determine whether good cause exists to discharge a juror does not have to be a full-scale adversary proceeding in which sworn testimony is taken. It should be summary in nature and scope. People v Manriquez (1976) 59 CA3d 426, 432, 130 CR 585; see §§33.20-33.24 (procedure to learn whether juror misconduct occurred). Although the trial judge's determination of "good cause" calls for the exercise of discretion (People v Farris (1977) 66 CA3d 376, 386, 136 CR 45), the record should be complete enough to show the ground for discharging the juror as a "demonstrable reality" (People v Compton (1971) 6 C3d 55, 60, 98 CR 217; see U.S. v Murillo (9th Cir 2002) 288 F3d 1126, 1137 (incomplete record)). The trial court's decision will be upheld on appeal "unless a manifest and unmistakable abuse of discretion clearly appears." People v Duran (1996) 50 CA4th 103, 113, 57 CR2d 635. An error in discharging a juror is treated no differently from any other trial error leading to reversal on appeal, i.e., retrial is not precluded. People v Hernandez (2003) 30 C4th 1, 10, 131 CR2d 514.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.39 c. Selecting Alternate

If there is more than one alternate juror, the one selected to substitute for a regular juror is to be selected by "drawing" the name according to Pen C §1089. However, the practice of using the first alternate chosen during voir dire as the first alternate used to replace a regular juror was also approved in People v Armendariz (1984) 37 C3d 573, 581 n7, 209 CR 664. The court and counsel may decide during jury selection how alternates will be used.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.40 d. Declaring Mistrial When There Are No Alternates

If there are no alternates, and the trial court discharges a juror for good cause, the judge must declare a mistrial and start the trial anew, or send the case back to the master calendar judge to set a date for retrial, unless the parties stipulate to a smaller number of jurors. See People v Ames (1975) 52 CA3d 389, 392, 124 CR 894.

There must be "legal necessity" to declare a mistrial without the defendant's consent. The death, illness, or absence of a judge or juror constitutes legal necessity. However, evidence that would justify discharging a juror on the statutory grounds of "good cause" does not establish legal necessity to declare a mistrial when no alternate is available to replace the juror. Larios v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 324, 331, 155 CR 374.

If there is good cause to excuse a juror (e.g., bias or family hardship) that does not amount to "legal necessity" (e.g., death or grave illness), the trial must continue with the objectionable juror unless (1) the defendant requests that the juror be discharged and a motion for a mistrial be granted because there is no alternate to replace the juror, or (2) the defendant requests that the juror be discharged and waives his or her right to a jury of 12. See People v Ames, supra. See also §28.5. If a court declares a mistrial after excusing a juror without legal necessity and there are no alternates and the defendant does not consent to the mistrial, further proceedings will be barred because the defendant will have been placed once in jeopardy. Larios v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 324, 332, 155 CR 374.

For discussion of motions for mistrial, see chap 25.

D. Control in Courtroom and Courthouse

§31.41 1. Judge Has Duty to Preserve Order

It is the judge's duty to preserve order in the courtroom and to see that the accused receives a fair and impartial trial as guaranteed by US Const amends VI and XIV, and Cal Const art I, §15, cl 2. This duty includes the responsibility to guard against outbursts by the defendant or others, or any conduct calculated to obstruct justice, including demonstrations in and around the courthouse. People v Slocum (1975) 52 CA3d 867, 883, 125 CR 442. The trial court has broad discretion in the exercise of its duty to maintain an orderly and secure courtroom. People v Hayes (1999) 21 C4th 1211, 1269, 91 CR2d 211. The court is also required to control publicity and press access to the courtroom. See chap 14.

For general discussion of the court's responsibility to provide an atmosphere conducive to a fair trial, see 5 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law, Criminal Trial §§7-21 (3d ed 2000).

§31.42 2. Restraining Defendant or Defense Witnesses; Removing Defendant From Courtroom

A defendant cannot be subjected to physical restraints of any kind in the courtroom while in the jury's presence, unless there is a showing of manifest need for such restraints. People v Hill (1998) 17 C4th 800, 841, 72 CR2d 656; People v Duran (1976) 16 C3d 282, 290, 127 CR 618; People v Miller (2009) 175 CA4th 1109, 1113, 96 CR3d 716. See Deck v Missouri (2005) 544 US 622, 161 L Ed 2d 953, 125 S Ct 2007. Physical restraints cannot be imposed in the absence of a record showing violence, the threat of violence, or other nonconforming conduct by the defendant. People v Mar (2002) 28 C4th 1201, 1217, 124 CR2d 161; People v Jackson (1996) 13 C4th 1164, 1215, 56 CR2d 49. Otherwise, the jury may infer that the defendant is violent, dispelling the presumption of innocence. People v Jenkins (2000) 22 C4th 900, 995, 95 CR2d 377. The same rule applies to defense witnesses (People v Ceniceros (1994) 26 CA4th 266, 277, 31 CR2d 303) and in Mentally Disordered Offender (MDO) proceedings (People v Fisher (2006) 136 CA4th 76, 80, 38 CR3d 540).

Examples of cases approving restraint of a defendant are People v Wallace (2008) 44 C4th 1032, 81 CR3d 651 (shackling in way that could not be seen by jurors approved for defendant who had been cited for many jailhouse rule violations, including five fights and possession of illegal razors); People v Combs (2004) 34 C4th 821, 837, 22 CR3d 61 (leg restraints not visible to jury approved for defendant who told psychologist he was going to "nut up" and set himself up to be shot by deputy); People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 231, 10 CR2d 636 (shackling approved for disruptive defendant); People v Livaditis (1992) 2 C4th 759, 774, 9 CR2d 72 (handcuffs on defendant, invisible to jury, approved to alleviate fear of victim-witness who refused to testify otherwise); People v Sheldon (1989) 48 C3d 935, 945, 258 CR 242 (shackling justified by substantial risk that defendant would make escape attempt in courtroom); People v George (1994) 30 CA4th 262, 268, 35 CR2d 750 (maximum security measures justified for defendant with history of escapes who killed motorist during most recent escape).

The determination of whether a defendant should be restrained must be made by the court, not by its security personnel. The court cannot simply adopt a policy of restraining defendants accused of violent crimes (People v Jackson (1993) 14 CA4th 1818, 1824, 18 CR2d 586) and must determine on the record whether manifest need for restraint exists, considering the facts of each particular case. People v Miller (2009) 175 CA4th 1109, 1114, 96 CR3d 716. A showing of manifest need is required even when the device used to restrain the defendant is one that does not directly restrain physical movement and cannot easily be seen by jurors, such as a stun belt. The trial court must also consider the special risks posed by the use of a device such as a stun belt before authorizing its use. No formal evidentiary hearing need be held; however, the court cannot base its decision to use restraints on mere rumor or innuendo. It must make a record that can be reviewed by the appellate courts that demonstrates that the use of any restraint is legally justified. People v Mar (2002) 28 C4th 1201, 1218, 124 CR2d 161 (improper use of stun belt held prejudicial because of likely effect on demeanor of defendant required to wear belt while testifying).

If restraints are found to be essential, the defendant cannot be subjected to any more restraint than is necessary. See Pen C §688. The restraint selected should be as unobtrusive as possible. People v Duran (1976) 16 C3d 282, 291, 127 CR 618. When visible restraints are required to ensure adequate security, the trial court must instruct the jury sua sponte that restraints should have no bearing on the determination of the defendant's guilt. People v Livaditis, supra; People v Duran, supra. The mere fact that a juror sees a defendant shackled or in jail garb, however, does not, by itself, create a due process problem. Prejudice must be demonstrated. People v Majors (1998) 18 C4th 385, 406, 75 CR2d 684; People v Rodrigues (1994) 8 C4th 1060, 1179, 36 CR2d 235.

> Ø Practice tip: Defense counsel should be aware of the picture that the defendant presents to the jury and quickly bring to the court's attention anything that would tend to prejudice the defendant in the jury's eyes. People v Taylor (1982) 31 C3d 488, 495, 183 CR 64. If the court decides to restrain the defendant, to remove the defendant from the courtroom, or to proceed to trial while the defendant wears prison garb, an objection is required to preserve the right to complain on appeal. Estelle v Williams (1976) 425 US 501, 508, 48 L Ed 2d 126, 133, 96 S Ct 1691; People v Ward (2005) 36 C4th 186, 206, 30 CR3d 464.

Ø Practice tip: Difficult clients should be advised that outbursts, violence, and other disruptive behavior in front of the jury will not provide grounds for a mistrial or reversal on appeal because an accused cannot benefit on appeal from his or her own misconduct before the jury. People v Arias (1996) 13 C4th 92, 148, 51 CR2d 770. A defendant who acts in a disruptive manner, causing jurors to see previously concealed shackles or to become aware of other security measures, is estopped from complaining on appeal. People v Arias, supra; People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 253, 10 CR2d 636.

When a defendant acts disruptively, the court should admonish the jury to disregard the defendant's outburst and to decide the case solely on the trial evidence. People v Arias, supra. If restraints are ineffective to prevent the defendant's disruptive behavior, the defendant may be removed from the courtroom. People v Pena (1992) 7 CA4th 1294, 1308, 9 CR2d 550; People v Hayes (1991) 229 CA3d 1226, 1233, 280 CR 578 (disruptive defendant properly removed from courtroom).

§31.43 3. Security Measures Other Than Restraint of Defendant

Security measures that are not inherently prejudicial to the defendant do not require a showing of manifest need and "reside within the sound discretion of the trial court." People v Jenkins (2000) 22 C4th 900, 995, 95 CR2d 377. For example, the use of metal detectors in courthouses need not be justified by compelling evidence of imminent threats to the security of the court. People v Jenkins (2000) 22 C4th 900, 997, 95 CR2d 377. Similarly, the presence of armed guards in the courtroom requires no on-the-record justification "unless they are present in unreasonable numbers" (People v Ainsworth (1988) 45 C3d 984, 1003, 248 CR 568 (four to six uniformed guards placed strategically throughout courtroom)); likewise, no showing of manifest need is required to station a uniformed, armed deputy beside the defendant during his or her testimony (People v Stevens (2009) 47 C4th 625, 101 CR3d 14; People v Sanchez (2009) 180 CA4th 763, 103 CR3d 334).

When extraordinary security measures are contemplated, e.g., photographing members of the public who attend trial or limiting the number of spectators, the defendant is entitled to advance notice and an opportunity to object, as a matter of procedural due process. A hearing is required on request, and testimony on the need for security measures should be taken. An in camera hearing is permissible to protect confidential information. Gibson v Superior Court (1982) 135 CA3d 774, 783, 185 CR 741. Failure to provide notice to the defense is a variety of "trial error" subject to harmless error analysis, requiring a defendant to demonstrate prejudice. People v Woodward (1992) 4 C4th 376, 387, 14 CR2d 434.

The court also has broad discretion in deciding whether to permit procedures that require security measures when alternatives are available. For example, the court had discretion to deny a defendant's motion for jury view of the scene when in-court review of diagrams was sufficient and would obviate the need for security measures. People v Jenkins, supra. See also People v Fudge (1994) 7 C4th 1075, 1104, 31 CR2d 321.

When a defendant who is a prison inmate is to be brought to the crime scene to be present at a jury view, the trial court may follow California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) rules requiring the defendant to be shackled. See People v Roberts (1992) 2 C4th 271, 306, 6 CR2d 276. The reasons for shackling a defendant outside the courtroom need not meet the test of manifest need (see §31.42); the court can order the defendant shackled if it states reasons on the record indicating that restraint is being imposed on the basis of previous conduct of the defendant or circumstances that make restraint reasonable. People v Roberts, supra.

§31.44 E. Orders Concerning In-Custody Defendant's Appearance and Needs

When a defendant is in custody and law enforcement officers are unwilling to accommodate the reasonable requests of the defense concerning the defendant's need for a haircut, daily showers, telephone calls, medical treatment, civilian clothing for trial, and the like, counsel may bring a motion requesting an order from the court. This type of request may be made orally and off the record. A written order, however, must be prepared to be given to law enforcement officials. A sample motion and order is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §31.4 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

Although courts are generally careful not to interfere with the administration of the jails or jail officials' decisions on issues of security or housing, most motions that concern the personal needs of a particular defendant are granted as long as they appear reasonable. See People v Meredith (2009) 174 CA4th 1257, 1262, 95 CR3d 297 (requiring defendant to go to trial wearing jail clothing violated rights to fair trial, due process, and equal protection); People v Kozel (1982) 133 CA3d 507, 538, 184 CR 208 (prisoner's request to hold papers and notes about approaching trial in his cell denied; however, prisoner allowed to have notes in cell and court during trial); People v Sanchez (1969) 275 CA2d 226, 232, 79 CR 781 (when defendant did not avail himself of opportunity to get haircut, subsequent request denied).

F. Judgment of Acquittal

§31.45 1. Nature of Motion

Because the prosecution bears the burden of proving the defendant's guilt, the defendant is not required to put on evidence if the evidence presented in the prosecution's case-in-chief is insufficient to warrant conviction. See Pen C §§1118 (court trial), 1118.1 (jury trial). The court may enter a judgment of acquittal on its own motion or on the motion of the defendant. Pen C §§1118, 1118.1.

In a court trial, there is only one opportunity for a motion for judgment of acquittal: at the close of the prosecution's case-in-chief. See Pen C §1118. In a jury trial, there are two opportunities for the motion: at the close of the prosecution's case-in-chief and at the close of all the evidence before the case is submitted to the jury. See Pen C §1118.1.

Ø Practice tip: Moving for judgment of acquittal at the close of the prosecution's case-in-chief preserves the defendant's right on appeal to have a reviewing court consider the sufficiency of the evidence as it stood at that time, i.e., before the defendant put on evidence. See People v Trevino (1985) 39 C3d 667, 695, 217 CR 652, overruled on other grounds in People v Johnson (1989) 47 C3d 1194, 1219, 255 CR 569.

A motion for judgment of acquittal is typically made orally at the close of the prosecution's case-in-chief. The motion can challenge the sufficiency of the evidence on any factual matter the prosecution is required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt, e.g., any count, enhancement allegation, or special circumstance. No particular form is required for the motion and the defendant is not required to state the grounds or direct the court's attention to particular counts. See People v Cole (2004) 33 C4th 1158, 1213, 17 CR3d 532; People v Belton (1979) 23 C3d 516, 521, 153 CR 195 (defense counsel's statement that he didn't think there was sufficient evidence to convict defendant held to be sufficient articulation of motion for judgment of acquittal). Thus, a nonspecific motion for acquittal requires the trial court to consider all possible claims of insufficiency of the evidence.

The appellate courts are not, however, in agreement about whether a motion for judgment of acquittal directed to specified grounds or counts encompasses unspecified grounds or counts. Compare People v Ceja (1988) 205 CA3d 1296, 253 CR 132 (motion for acquittal directing court's attention to particular counts does not encompass unspecified counts), with People v Martinez (1982) 132 CA3d 119, 183 CR 256 (trial court was obligated to consider all possible grounds for acquittal, even though defense counsel limited argument to single ground). See also 5 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law, Criminal Trial §§562-564 (3d ed 2000) on judgment of acquittal.

In either a court trial or a jury trial, the court must consider whether the evidence presented is sufficient to sustain a conviction on appeal. See Pen C §§1118, 1118.1; People v Ainsworth (1988) 45 C3d 984, 1022, 248 CR 568 (test to be applied in deciding Pen C §1118.1 motion is "whether from the evidence, including reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, there is any substantial evidence of the existence of each element of the offense charged"). In a court trial, because the judge is the trier of fact, the judge must also weigh the evidence, evaluate the credibility of witnesses, and determine that the case against the defendant is "proved beyond a reasonable doubt before [the defendant] is required to put on a defense." People v Partner (1986) 180 CA3d 178, 183, 225 CR 502.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.46 2. Effect of Judge's Order

An acquittal under Pen C §1118 or §1118.1 operates like any other acquittal. It cannot be appealed and it acts as a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense. Pen C §1118.2. See also Burks v U.S. (1978) 437 US 1, 57 L Ed 2d 1, 98 S Ct 2141 (double jeopardy precludes retrial after reversal for insufficiency of evidence).

In an appropriate case, however, the court may limit the impact of a Pen C §1118.1 acquittal. If the evidence will not sustain a conviction for the charged offense, but is sufficient to sustain a conviction for a necessarily included lesser offense, the trial court may limit its ruling to the greater offense, thereby permitting the prosecution to seek conviction for the lesser offense. See People v Garcia (1985) 166 CA3d 1056, 1066, 212 CR 822; People v Wong (1973) 35 CA3d 812, 828, 111 CR 314. In addition, it may be appropriate to permit amendment of the charging document to charge a closely related offense that is not a lesser included offense, when the defendant has received adequate notice of the new charge. See People v Suk (1990) 220 CA3d 952, 960, 269 CR 676.

However, when a motion for acquittal is granted without any qualification, the prosecution may not subsequently amend the information to charge a lesser included offense. People v McElroy (1989) 208 CA3d 1415, 1424, 256 CR 853, disapproved on other grounds in People v Cromer (2001) 24 C4th 889, 901 n3, 103 CR2d 23 (relying on People v Garcia, supra). Nor may the trial court change its mind and reinstate a count after having dismissed it under Pen C §1118.1. People v Moran (1973) 33 CA3d 724, 728, 109 CR 287. See Smith v Massachusetts (2005) 543 US 462, 160 L Ed 2d 914, 125 S Ct 1129.

© The Regents of the University of California

§31.47 VII. APPELLATE REVIEW OF TRIAL MOTIONS

As a rule, neither a writ of prohibition nor mandate will lie to resolve an issue concerning the admissibility of evidence. People v Municipal Court (Ahnemann) (1974) 12 C3d 658, 660, 117 CR 20; Laurie S. v Superior Court (1994) 26 CA4th 195, 203, 31 CR2d 506; People v Yarbrough (1991) 227 CA3d 1650, 1654, 278 CR 703. It is rare for appellate courts to grant extraordinary review during trial. For an example of an exception, see Tapia v Superior Court (1991) 53 C3d 282, 286, 279 CR 592 (alternative writ of mandate issued to determine applicability of Proposition 115's changes in voir dire procedures to defendant's trial). Most trial issues are raised on appeal from the judgment. See generally Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §§4.5-4.20 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

When a judge denies a Pen C §1118.1 motion for judgment of acquittal, the standard of review is the same as the standard of review on a claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The court must determine whether there is any substantial evidence of the existence of each element of the offense charged. People v Trevino (1985) 39 C3d 667, 695, 217 CR 652, overruled on other grounds in People v Johnson (1989) 47 C3d 1194, 1221, 255 CR 569. On what constitutes substantial evidence, see People v Johnson (1980) 26 C3d 557, 578, 162 CR 431 (court must review entire record to determine whether it discloses substantial evidence from which a reasonable trier of fact could have found defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt). The substantial evidence rule is an aspect of due process. Jackson v Virginia (1979) 443 US 307, 61 L Ed 2d 560, 99 S Ct 2781.

Appellate courts reviewing Pen C §1118 and §1118.1 rulings may consider only evidence presented up to the time the motion was made. People v Trevino, supra (§1118.1 motion); People v Belton (1979) 23 C3d 516, 526, 153 CR 195 (§1118 motion). Failure to make a Pen C §1118 or §1118.1 motion does not preclude the defendant from challenging the sufficiency of the evidence on appeal, but if the defendant did not make a §1118.1 motion at the close of the prosecution's case, the claim will be reviewed on the basis of the entire trial record. People v Smith (1998) 64 CA4th 1458, 76 CR2d 75.

§32.1 I. OVERVIEW

The trial court has a duty to instruct the jury on every principle of law necessary to decide the case, including defenses. People v St. Martin (1970) 1 C3d 524, 531, 83 CR 166; People v Russell (2006) 144 CA4th 1415, 1424, 51 CR3d 263.

Counsel's duties in a criminal case include planning and requesting favorable instructions as well as requesting any necessary amplification or explanation of the instructions given. See People v Maury (2003) 30 C4th 342, 425, 133 CR2d 561; People v Anderson (1966) 64 C2d 633, 639, 51 CR 238. Making sure all instructions necessary to the jury's consideration of the case are requested is the prosecutor's job. Defense counsel has the duty to make sure that the court gives any instruction that could support an argument that the prosecution has not proved the case beyond a reasonable doubt. Despite the central role instructions play in defining the issues to be decided, many criminal trial lawyers devote insufficient time to preparing the charge to the jury. Advocates on both sides of a criminal trial would do well to heed the observation that "nothing results in more cases of reversible error than mistakes in jury instructions." People v Thompkins (1987) 195 CA3d 244, 252, 240 CR 516.

This chapter discusses sua sponte instructions (see §§32.3-32.13); instructions that must be requested (see §§32.14-32.20); CALCRIM instructions (see §§32.21-32.23); stipulating to lesser related offense instructions (see §32.8); preparing and submitting instructions (see §§32.24-32.28); objecting to instructions (see §§32.29-32.34); and instructing the jury (see §§32.35-32.38).

In determining what instructions to request or oppose, most attorneys begin with the Judicial Council of California Criminal Jury Instructions (CALCRIM) (2008). The Mandatory Criminal Jury Instructions Handbook (CJER-CEB Annual) lists required instructions by offense.

§32.2 II. CHART: DEADLINES

Ø Warning: Counsel should consult local rules before relying on this chart. Many counties have specific time requirements not otherwise required by the Penal Code. However, such local rules may not be inconsistent with law. Boyle v CertainTeed Corp. (2006) 137 CA4th 645, 649, 40 CR3d 501.

Action	Deadline	Authority
Time to submit instructions to court.	Proposed instructions must be submitted to judge before argument begins.	Pen C §1093.5.
Trial court to inform counsel of exact instructions to be given, on request of counsel.	Before oral argument.	Pen C §1093.5.

An exception exists when issues are raised during argument that have not been covered by instructions given or refused previously. In that event, the court may, on counsel's request, give additional instructions on those issues. Pen C §1093.5.

III. TYPES OF INSTRUCTIONS

A. Sua Sponte Instructions

§32.3 1. Trial Court Must Instruct on General Principles of Law Relevant to Case

Instructions given on the court's own motion are called sua sponte instructions. The trial court must instruct the jury on the general principles of law relevant to the issues raised by the evidence that are necessary for the jury's understanding of the case, even in the absence of a request. People v Breverman (1998) 19 C4th 142, 154, 77 CR2d 870; People v St. Martin (1970) 1 C3d 524, 531, 83 CR 166; People v Elize (1999) 71 CA4th 605, 615, 84 CR2d 35.

It is the prosecutor's responsibility to request any instructions that the court is required to give sua sponte and to ensure that all instructions the jury needs to decide the case are given.

Ø Warning: Most experienced trial attorneys agree that counsel should request every instruction he or she considers important to the case whether or not the trial court is required to give the instruction sua sponte. The only way to ensure that the court gives instructions counsel considers important is to request them, and then, if the trial court agrees to give a particular instruction, to pay attention to the instructions given to make sure that the trial court actually gives them.

When the prosecutor fails to make certain that the trial court gives all instructions the jury needs to decide the case, the result may be reversal and a new trial for the defendant. See People v Thompkins (1987) 195 CA3d 244, 252, 240 CR 516. This does not mean, however, that defense counsel should try to build in instructional error with a view to obtaining a reversal on appeal: even significant instructional errors are generally subject to harmless error analysis on review. People v Flood (1998) 18 C4th 470, 499, 76 CR2d 180; People v Molina (2000) 82 CA4th 1329, 1334, 98 CR2d 869.

§32.3A 2. Trial Court Must Instruct on Presumption of Innocence and Reasonable Doubt

The trial court has a sua sponte duty under the California Constitution to instruct the jury in every criminal case on the presumption of innocence and the prosecution's burden to prove the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. People v Vann (1974) 12 C3d 220, 225, 115 CR 352; People v Elguera (1992) 8 CA4th 1214, 1219, 10 CR2d 910. See CALCRIM 103, 220. See also Pen C §1096 (defining presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt).

Ø Note: In Judicial Council of California Criminal Jury Instructions (CALCRIM) (2008), there is an error in CALCRIM 220. As originally published, both CALCRIM 103 and 220 stated in pertinent part that the presumption of innocence "requires that the People prove each element of a crime… beyond a reasonable doubt." See Judicial Council of California Criminal Jury Instructions (2006). That language is retained in CALCRIM 103, but the current version of CALCRIM 220 omits the "each element" language, stating only that the presumption of innocence "requires that the People prove a defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." But see People v Zepeda (2008) 167 CA4th 25, 30, 83 CR3d 793 (court approves CALCRIM 220).

Under Cage v Louisiana (1990) 498 US 39, 41, 112 L Ed 2d 339, 342, 111 S Ct 328, an erroneous reasonable doubt instruction violates the federal Constitution if there is a reasonable likelihood that the jury understood the instruction to "allow a finding of guilt based on a degree of proof below that required by the Due Process Clause." The federal Constitution does not require the trial court to define reasonable doubt. Victor v Nebraska (1994) 511 US 1, 5, 127 L Ed 2d 583, 590, 114 S Ct 1239. However, "'taken as a whole, the instructions [must] correctly convey the concept of reasonable doubt to the jury.'" 511 US at 5, 127 L Ed 2d at 590, quoting from Holland v U.S. (1954) 348 US 121, 140, 99 L Ed 150, 167, 75 S Ct 127.

Although the failure to instruct on reasonable doubt is error under California law, whether the error violates the federal Constitution depends on whether the charge as a whole correctly conveyed the concept of reasonable doubt. Thus, in People v Mayo (2006) 140 CA4th 535, 545, 44 CR3d 497, the reviewing court held that the failure to instruct on reasonable doubt was not error under the federal Constitution and was harmless under the California Constitution because the instructions "fully and repeatedly informed the jurors Mayo was entitled to an acquittal unless each element of the crime charged was proved beyond a reasonable doubt." In contrast, in People v Flores (2007) 147 CA4th 199, 219, 54 CR3d 98, federal constitutional error occurred and reversal was required because the instructions, "whether considered individually or together," did not inform the jury that the defendant could not be found guilty unless each element of the charged offenses was proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

§32.4 3. Limits on Trial Court's Duty to Instruct Sua Sponte

The trial court's duty to instruct on its own motion is quite limited. The court is not required to instruct on its own motion on every specific point developed at the trial. People v Hood (1969) 1 C3d 444, 449, 82 CR 618. "[T]he trial court cannot be required to anticipate every possible theory that may fit the facts of the case before it and instruct the jury accordingly." People v Wade (1959) 53 C2d 322, 334, 1 CR 683, disapproved on other grounds in People v Carpenter (1997) 15 C4th 312, 381, 63 CR2d 1; People v Huynh (2002) 99 CA4th 662, 677, 121 CR2d 340. As a result, both prosecutors and defense counsel must propose instructions that support their theories of the case. See People v Kane (1946) 27 C2d 693, 700, 166 P2d 285; People v Cook (1906) 148 C 334, 347, 83 P 43.

Many instructions that are useful to the defense do not fall within the ambit of the trial court's duty to instruct on it own motion. See, e.g., People v Collie (1981) 30 C3d 43, 63, 177 CR 458 (no sua sponte duty to give limiting instruction when other crimes evidence admitted for limited purpose under Evid C §1101(b)); People v Gardner (1969) 71 C2d 843, 852, 79 CR 743 (court has no sua sponte duty to instruct jury not to draw inference of guilt from defendant's failure to testify).

§32.5 4. Examples of Other Instructions Required in Every Case

Because the trial court's duty to instruct the jury on its own motion is an open-ended one that varies from case to case, there is no definitive list of instructions the court must give on its own motion. It is, however, well established that in every criminal case the trial court must give certain instructions sua sponte. See Mandatory Criminal Jury Instructions Handbook (CJER-CEB Annual). These include instructions on:

- The elements of all charged offenses. People v Cummings (1993) 4 C4th 1233, 1311, 18 CR2d 796. This includes instructions on states of mind. People v Ford (1964) 60 C2d 772, 792, 36 CR 620, overruled on other grounds in People v Satchell (1971) 6 C3d 28.36, 98 CR 33 (trial court required to instruct sua sponte on specific intent). See, e.g., CALCRIM 250, 252 (general criminal intent), 251-252 (specific intent), 520 (malice aforethought).
- The believability of witnesses. People v Rincon-Pineda (1975) 14 C3d 864, 883, 123 CR 119. See CALCRIM 105, 226.
- The sufficiency of the testimony of a single witness. People v Rincon-Pineda (1975) 14 C3d 864, 884, 123 CR 119. See CALCRIM 301.
- The conduct of the trial and the jury's duties. See CALCRIM 100-124 (pretrial instructions), 200-207 (posttrial instructions).

§32.6 5. Examples of Instructions Required When Appropriate

Certain instructions must be given by the trial court on its own motion when circumstances warrant it. The Bench Notes to individual CALCRIM instructions often state whether the instruction must be given sua sponte. For a checklist of instructions that must be given sua sponte in criminal cases, see Mandatory Criminal Jury Instructions Handbook, chap 2 (CJER-CEB Annual).

Among the most important of the instructions that must be given sua sponte when the circumstances warrant are instructions on lesser included offenses (People v Kelly (1992) 1 C4th 495, 529, 3 CR2d 677; see §§32.7-32.10) and instructions on defenses that are not inconsistent with the defendant's theory of the case (People v Rubalcava (2000) 23 C4th 322, 334, 96 CR2d 735; see §§32.11-32.13). Other instructions that must be given sua sponte when appropriate include:

- An instruction on the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence must be given when the prosecution relied substantially on circumstantial evidence for proof of the defendant's guilt. People v Marquez (1992) 1 C4th 553, 577, 3 CR2d 710; People v Yrigoyen (1955) 45 C2d 46, 49, 286 P2d 1. See CALCRIM 224.
- An instruction on weighing conflicting testimony must be given in any case in which conflicting testimony has been given. People v Rincon-Pineda (1975) 14 C3d 864, 884, 123 CR 119. See, e.g., People v Reyes (2007) 151 CA4th 1491, 60 CR3d 777. See also CALCRIM 302.
- An instruction that flight after a crime is not sufficient by itself to establish guilt must be given when the prosecution relies on evidence of flight as tending to show guilt. Pen C §1127c. See People v Paysinger (2009) 174 CA4th 26, 93 CR3d 901. See also CALCRIM 372.
- An instruction that the corpus delicti of a crime must be established independently of the defendant's admission or confession must be given when the prosecution relies on the defendant's admission or confession. People v Beagle (1972) 6 C3d 441, 455, 99 CR 313; People v Reyes (2007) 151 CA4th 1491, 1498, 60 CR3d 777. See CALCRIM 359. On the corpus delicti rule generally, see §8.27.
- An instruction on assessing expert testimony must be given when an expert's opinion has been received in evidence. People v Bowens (1964) 229 CA2d 590, 600, 40 CR 435, disapproved on other grounds in People v Mayberry (1975) 15 C3d 143, 158, 125 CR 745. See CALCRIM 332.
- Instructions on aiding and abetting must be given when the defendant's liability for the charged offense is based on aiding and abetting. People v Montoya (1994) 7 C4th 1027, 1047, 31 CR2d 128. See CALCRIM 400-401.
- Instructions defining the "target offense" must be given when the prosecutor relies on the natural and probable consequences theory of aiding and abetting liability. People v Prettyman (1996) 14 C4th 248, 267, 58 CR2d 827. See CALCRIM 402-403.
- Instructions on the need for corroboration of accomplice testimony must be given when there is substantial evidence that a witness is an accomplice. See Pen C §1111. See also CALCRIM 334-335; People v Felton (2004) 122 CA4th 260, 267, 18 CR3d 626 (co-perpetrator is accomplice). The court need only give such an instruction when there is substantial evidence that the witness was an accomplice and not merely an accessory. People v Boyer (2006) 38 C4th 412, 466, 42 CR3d 677 (contrasting definition of "accomplice" and "accessory"); People v Lewis (2001) 26 C4th 334, 369, 110 CR2d 272.
- Instructions defining or clarifying the statutory definition of the crime charged must be given when the terms used in the statute have a technical meaning peculiar to the law. People v Failla (1966) 64 C2d 560, 565, 51 CR 103.
- Cautionary instructions must be given when the prosecution relies on the defendant's oral confession or admission. People v Beagle (1972) 6 C3d 441, 455, 99 CR 313. See CALCRIM 356-358.
- Cautionary instructions must be given when an accomplice's testimony incriminates the defendant. People v Guiuan (1998) 18 C4th 558, 569, 76 CR2d 239. See CALCRIM 334-335.
- A unanimity instruction is required when the evidence discloses more than one act on which a conviction could be based if the acts in question could have been charged as separate offenses. People v Diedrich (1982) 31

C3d 263, 280, 182 CR 354. See CALCRIM 3500. But see People v Flores (2007) 157 CA4th 216, 222, 68 CR3d 472 (unanimity instruction not required when evidence shows multiple acts in continuous course of conduct).

Ø Note: The failure to give a unanimity instruction has been held to be federal constitutional error even though the federal Constitution does not require a unanimous verdict. See People v Smith (2005) 132 CA4th 1537, 1545, 34 CR3d 472. As the court in Smith explained, the requirement that all jurors who vote for guilt agree on the same criminal act is not undermined by the fact that federal due process does not require all members of a jury to agree on the verdict. 132 CA4th at 1545. But see People v Vargas (2001) 91 CA4th 506, 561, 110 CR2d 210.

- If the court conditionally admits evidence dependent upon evidence of a preliminary fact's being admitted later in the trial, a sua sponte instruction to disregard the evidence may be required if the court later determines that a jury could not reasonably find the existence of the preliminary fact. Evid C §403(c)(2). See People v Lucas (1995) 12 C4th 415, 467, 48 CR2d 525.

Ø Note: The trial court does not have a duty to instruct sua sponte that the jury may consider a confession obtained in violation of Miranda solely for purposes of impeachment, and not for the truth of any statements in it. People v Coffman (2004) 34 C4th 1, 63, 17 CR3d 710. See Bench Notes to CALCRIM 356.

6. Sua Sponte Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses

§32.7 a. Court's Sua Sponte Duty to Instruct on Lessers

The court must instruct sua sponte on lesser included offenses when there is evidence "substantial enough to warrant consideration" that the defendant is guilty of the lesser offense. People v Flannel (1979) 25 C3d 668, 684 n12, 160 CR 84. Instructions on lesser included offenses are required when the evidence raises a question as to whether all the elements of the charged offense are present (People v Kelly (1992) 1 C4th 495, 529, 3 CR2d 677) and the jury could conclude that the defendant is guilty of the lesser offense (People v Wickersham (1982) 32 C3d 307, 324, 185 CR 436, overruled on other grounds in People v Barton (1995) 12 C4th 186, 200, 47 CR2d 569). In determining whether the evidence warrants instructions on a lesser included offense, the trial court is not permitted to make credibility determinations. People v Wickersham, supra; People v Strozier (1993) 20 CA4th 55, 63, 24 CR2d 362.

There is no sua sponte duty to instruct on lesser included offenses when there is no evidence that the offense was less than that charged (People v Neely (1993) 6 C4th 877, 897, 26 CR2d 189 (court properly rejected defense request for instructions on second degree murder and voluntary manslaughter)), when the evidence supporting the instructions is speculative or presents no more than a mere possibility the lesser offense was committed, or when the evidence rises only to the level of speculation (People v Sakarias (2000) 22 C4th 596, 620, 94 CR2d 17). In a noncapital case, the failure to instruct on lesser included offenses when the evidence warrants it is subject to harmless error analysis under the standard of People v Watson (1956) 46 C2d 818, 836, 299 P2d 243. People v Breverman (1998) 19 C4th 142, 178, 77 CR2d 870; People v Lacefield (2007) 157 CA4th 249, 261, 68 CR3d 508.

Ø Note: The defendant does not have a unilateral right to instructions on a lesser related offense. However, it is not error to give such instructions if both the defendant and the prosecutor agree that they should be given. People v Birks (1998) 19 C4th 108, 116, 77 CR2d 848. See §32.8.

§32.8 b. Determining Whether Offense Is Lesser Included Offense

As a rule, an offense is necessarily included in the charged offense (often called the greater offense) if (People v Lopez (1998) 19 C4th 282, 288, 79 CR2d 195; People v Lohbauer (1981) 29 C3d 364, 369, 173 CR 453):

- The greater offense cannot be committed without committing the lesser offense; or
- The specific language of the accusatory pleading adequately warns the defendant that the People will seek to prove the elements of the lesser offense.

In the context of the rule proscribing conviction of both a greater and a lesser included offense, the courts have explained the relationship between the greater offense and a necessarily included lesser offense in terms of the statutory elements of the offenses. Thus, a less serious offense is necessarily included in a greater offense only if all its elements are also elements of the greater offense. People v Sanchez (2001) 24 C4th 983, 987, 103 CR2d 698. Under this definition, even an offense that is very closely related to the charged crime may not qualify as a necessarily included offense. Thus, e.g., assault with a deadly weapon is not an offense necessarily included in the crime of murder (People v Benjamin (1975) 52 CA3d 63, 71, 124 CR 799), nor is gross vehicular manslaughter necessarily included in the crime of murder (People v Sanchez (2001) 24 C4th 983, 988, 103 CR2d 698).

It is important to distinguish between lesser included offenses and lesser related offenses because neither party is entitled to instructions on a lesser related offense even if they are requested. People v Birks (1998) 19 C4th 108, 119, 77 CR2d 848. See, e.g., People v Valentine (2006) 143 CA4th 1383, 1386, 49 CR3d 948 (uncharged crime of receiving stolen property not lesser included offense of robbery; defendant not entitled to instruction).

Ø Note: It is permissible for both parties to agree that instructions on lesser related offenses should be given in appropriate cases. Note that a defendant who agrees to or acquiesces in such instructions will not be able to challenge them on appeal. People v Birks (1998) 19 C4th 108, 136 n19, 77 CR2d 848. See also California Jury Instructions Criminal (CALJIC), App D ("The Birth, Life, and Death of Lesser Related Offenses").

The determination of what is a necessarily lesser included offense is a question of law. In making this determination, the trial court should consider the elements of the offenses in the abstract, without reference to the actual evidence introduced at trial. People v Birks (1998) 19 C4th 108, 117, 77 CR2d 848; People v Cheaves (2003) 113 CA4th 445, 454, 6 CR3d 382.

Ø Note: In People v Sanchez (2001) 24 C4th 983, 103 CR2d 698, the supreme court took care to point out it was using this strict definition in the context of the rule against multiple convictions. Different considerations may apply in the context of instructions. Whether an offense is necessarily included within a specific charged crime can be a complex question, and authorities are sometimes contradictory. A good starting point for research is California Jury Instructions Criminal (CALJIC), App C (Lesser Offenses to the Offense Charged).

§32.9 c. Waiving Statute of Limitations as Defense to Lesser

The defendant can affirmatively waive the statute of limitations as a defense to an otherwise time-barred lesser included offense. Cowan v Superior Court (1996) 14 C4th 367, 372, 58 CR2d 458. Such a tactical choice might be appropriately made either to avail the defendant of jury instructions on the lesser offense or to enter a guilty plea to the lesser offense. A defendant who requests or acquiesces in instructions on a time-barred lesser offense forfeits the right to rely on the statute of limitations on appeal (People v Stanfill (1999) 76 CA4th 1137, 1150, 90 CR2d 885), but a finding of a request or acquiescence requires more than a silent record (People v Beasley (2003) 105 CA4th 1078, 1089, 130 CR2d 717). Further, the filing of an information charging the greater offense may toll the statute of limitations for a lesser offense based on the same conduct. See Pen C §803(b); People v Whitfield (1993) 19 CA4th 1652, 1659, 24 CR2d 210.

For jury instructions on the order in which juries may deliberate on lesser offenses, see §33.32 on partial verdicts.

© The Regents of the University of California

§32.10 d. Instruction on Lesser Must Be Given Over Defense Objection

If the evidence warrants instructions on a lesser included offense, they must be given even over a defense objection. People v Breverman (1998) 19 C4th 142, 154, 77 CR2d 870; People v Barton (1995) 12 C4th 186, 194, 47 CR2d 569. Thus, the trial court errs when it fails to give instructions on lesser included offenses when warranted by the evidence, even if it omitted the instructions at defendant's behest. However, the doctrine of invited error will preclude the defendant from complaining of this error on appeal if it clearly appears on the record that the defendant expressly objected, not out of inadvertence or mistake, but for deliberate tactical reasons. 12 C4th at 198. See also People v Green (1995) 34 CA4th 165, 175, 40 CR2d 239 (error for judge not to instruct on lesser included offense when defendant acquiesced; defendant was pro per, and it was unclear from record that it was deliberate tactical decision).

7. Sua Sponte Instructions on Defenses

§32.11 a. Court's Sua Sponte Duty to Instruct on Defenses

The trial court's obligation to instruct sua sponte on the general principles of law necessary to decide the case includes the obligation to instruct on defenses. People v Sedeno (1974) 10 C3d 703, 716, 112 CR 1, overruled on other grounds in People v Breverman (1998) 19 C4th 142, 178 n26, 77 CR2d 870. This obligation is more limited than the obligation to instruct on lesser included offenses. The rule is that the trial court must instruct on a defense that is supported by substantial evidence if the defendant is relying on it or if it is not inconsistent with the defense theory of the case. See People v Flannel (1979) 25 C3d 668, 684, 160 CR 84; People v Sedeno, supra; People v Whitehurst (1992) 9 CA4th 1045, 1049, 12 CR2d 33. In determining whether substantial evidence supports the instruction, the trial court should not weigh credibility. People v Flannel, supra.

§32.12 b. Defenses

As a rule, a defense either (1) disputes the sufficiency of the evidence to establish one or more elements of the offense or (2) affirmatively asserts a state of facts that, if true, defeats the prosecution's allegations. Defenses that fall into the second category are often referred to as affirmative defenses, because they ordinarily require the defendant to produce some evidence of the facts that support their assertion.

When an affirmative defense directly relates to the defendant's guilt or innocence, the defendant has the burden of introducing some evidence of the underlying facts, but the defendant can satisfy that burden by raising a reasonable doubt. People v Figueroa (1986) 41 C3d 714, 721, 224 CR 719; Comment to Evid C §501. The ultimate burden of proof of all facts necessary to establish guilt remains on the prosecution. See Mullaney v Wilbur (1975) 421 US 684, 690, 44 L Ed 2d 508, 514, 95 S Ct 1881 (state may not constitutionally shift burden to defendant to prove any fact essential to offense charged). See, e.g., People v Mower (2002) 28 C4th 457, 479, 122 CR2d 326 (medical marijuana defense negates element of unlawful possession; therefore, defendant required to raise only reasonable doubt about guilt). See also §32.33.

Examples of such defenses include:

- Alibi. People v Costello (1943) 21 C2d 760, 765, 135 P2d 164. See CALCRIM 3400.
- Unconsciousness. People v Babbitt (1988) 45 C3d 660, 689, 248 CR 69. See CALCRIM 3425. For discussion, see §§48.37-48.39
- Duress. People v Graham (1976) 57 CA3d 238, 240, 129 CR 31. See CALCRIM 3402.
- Any defense justifying, excusing, or mitigating a homicide. People v Bushton (1889) 80 C 160, 164, 22 P 127. See CALCRIM 505-512.
- Defense of another. People v Roe (1922) 189 C 548, 560, 209 P 560. See CALCRIM 505 (homicide), 3470 (assault).
- Self-defense. People v Adrian (1982) 135 CA3d 335, 337, 185 CR 506. See CALCRIM 505 (homicide), 3470 (assault), 3471-3474 (general principles of self-defense).
- Mistake of fact. People v Mayberry (1975) 15 C3d 143, 157, 125 CR 745 (reasonable and good faith belief in consent against charges of kidnapping and rape); People v Russell (2006) 144 CA4th 1415, 1430, 51 CR3d 263. See CALCRIM 3406.
- Claim of right. People v Williams (2009) 176 CA4th 1521, 98 CR3d 770; People v Russell (2006) 144 CA4th 1415, 1430, 51 CR3d 263.
- Lawful arrest (against charge of false imprisonment). People v Agnew (1940) 16 C2d 655, 664, 107 P2d 601.

When an affirmative defense relates to a matter that is collateral to the truth of the charges, there is no constitutional impediment to requiring a defendant to prove the facts establishing the defense by a preponderance of the evidence. People v Bolden (1990) 217 CA3d 1591, 1601, 266 CR 724. See also Martin v Ohio (1987) 480 US 228, 233, 94 L Ed 2d 267, 274, 107 S Ct 1098.

Examples of defenses that fall into this category include:

- Insanity. Pen C §25(b); People v Hernandez (2000) 22 C4th 512, 522, 93 CR2d 509. See CALCRIM 3450-3451. For discussion, see §§48.40-48.58.
- Necessity. People v Kearns (1997) 55 CA4th 1128, 1135, 64 CR2d 654. See CALCRIM 3403.
- Entrapment. People v Moran (1970) 1 C3d 755, 760, 83 CR 411. See CALCRIM 3408.
- Accident. People v Gonzales (1999) 74 CA4th 382, 389, 88 CR2d 111. See CALCRIM 3404.

§32.13 c. Distinguishing Between Lessers and Defenses

Because the trial court's obligation to instruct on defenses is more limited than is its obligation to instruct on lesser included offenses, it is important to distinguish between these categories. See People v Barton (1995) 12 C4th 186, 200, 47 CR2d 569. However, drawing that distinction is not always easy. For example, unreasonable or "imperfect" self-defense is closely related to true or "perfect" self-defense. The only difference between the two theories is the reasonableness of the individual's belief in the need to defend against imminent peril. Perfect self-defense is a true defense: a defendant charged with murder who is found to have acted in the reasonable belief in the need for self-defense is not guilty of an unlawful homicide. But imperfect self-defense merely negates malice aforethought, an element of murder—it does not make the homicide lawful. A defendant found to have acted in an unreasonable belief in the need for self-defense is guilty of the lesser included offense of voluntary manslaughter. Thus, unreasonable self-defense is more accurately viewed as a description of one form of voluntary manslaughter, and in a murder prosecution, instructions on unreasonable self-defense are really instructions on the lesser included offense of voluntary manslaughter. 12 C4th at 200.

The trial court is consequently obligated to instruct on unreasonable self-defense whenever substantial evidence exists to support a conviction of voluntary manslaughter on that theory—even if imperfect self-defense is inconsistent with the theory of defense—but it is not obligated to instruct on true self-defense if such a defense is inconsistent with the defendant's theory of the case. 12 C4th at 201.

Ø Example: If the defendant is relying on an alibi, the trial court is probably not required to instruct sua sponte on self-defense, even if the theory is supported by substantial evidence, but it is required to instruct sua sponte on imperfect self-defense if that theory is supported by substantial evidence.

It is important for defense counsel to be aware that many instructions on defense theories are not considered to be instructions on defenses that the trial court must give sua sponte but rather "pinpoint" instructions that the trial court must give only on request. See §32.16. For example, evidence of voluntary intoxication may negate the intent element of a crime that requires a specific intent or other statutorily specified mental state. See Pen C §§22, 28. It might therefore appear to be a defense on which the trial court is required to instruct sua sponte. However, in People v Saille (1991) 54 C3d 1103, 2 CR2d 364, the California Supreme Court held that the abolition of the diminished capacity defense (see Pen C §28(b)) ended the requirement that the trial court instruct sua sponte on voluntary intoxication; a defendant desiring trial court instructions on voluntary intoxication must specifically request them.

B. Instructions That Must Be Requested

§32.14 1. General Requirements for Requested Instructions

As a rule, both prosecutors and defense attorneys are entitled to have the court instruct on legal principles that are relevant to the case. See Pen C §1093(f). A requested instruction should (see Pen C §1127):

- Contain a correct statement of the law.
- Be abstract and not too closely tied to the facts of the case.
- Be supported by substantial evidence; speculation is not enough. See People v Marshall (1997) 15 C4th 1, 39, 61 CR2d 84; People v Ceja (1993) 4 C4th 1134, 1142, 17 CR2d 375.
- Not be argumentative. People v Mincey (1992) 2 C4th 408, 437, 6 CR2d 822.
- Not merely duplicate other instructions. People v Catlin (2001) 26 C4th 81, 152, 109 CR2d 31.

© The Regents of the University of California

§32.15 2. Instruction on Bias or Sympathy

On the request of either party, the court must instruct the jury substantially as follows (Pen C §1127h):

> Do not let bias, sympathy, prejudice, or public opinion influence your decision. Bias includes bias against the victim or victims, witnesses, or defendant based upon his or her disability, gender, nationality, race or ethnicity, religion, gender identity, or sexual orientation.

The statute was enacted out of concern about so-called "panic strategies," which try to explain a defendant's actions or emotional reactions on the basis of the belated discovery of the victim's gender identity or sexual orientation. The emotional reactions of the defendant are, of course, often relevant and material under California's homicide law and in other contexts.

3. Instructions Commonly Requested by Defense

§32.16 a. Pinpoint Instructions

The defense, on proper request, has the right to an instruction "relating particular facts to any legal issue." People v Rincon-Pineda (1975) 14 C3d 864, 885, 123 CR 119, quoting from People v Sears (1970) 2 C3d 180, 190, 84 CR 711; People v Saille (1991) 54 C3d 1103, 1119, 2 CR2d 364. Such instructions may direct the jury's attention to evidence that could raise a reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt or they may "pinpoint" the crux of the defendant's case. People v Saille, supra. See People v Granados (1957) 49 C2d 490, 496, 319 P2d 346 (conviction reversed; trial court refused to give instruction that pinpointed defense); People v Mathews (1994) 25 CA4th 89, 100, 30 CR2d 330 (same); People v Guzman (1975) 47 CA3d 380, 388, 121 CR 69 (error to refuse defense request for instruction relating reasonable doubt to identification).

A pinpoint instruction describes precisely the crux of a defendant's case, usually by relating a legal issue in the case to particular evidence from which a reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt could arise. People v Sears (1970) 2 C3d 180, 190, 84 CR 711. A number of instructions now routinely given in criminal cases originated as defense-requested pinpoint instructions. See People v Wright (1988) 45 C3d 1126, 1137, 248 CR 600.

Examples of pinpoint instructions include:

- An instruction that legally adequate provocation to reduce murder to voluntary manslaughter can occur over a considerable period of time. See People v Wharton (1991) 53 C3d 522, 569, 280 CR 631.
- An instruction that an individual who forms the intent to steal after the application of force is not guilty of robbery. People v Webster (1991) 54 C3d 411, 443, 285 CR 31.
- An instruction that intoxication can negate specific intent or another required mental state. People v Saille (1991) 54 C3d 1103, 1119, 2 CR2d 364.
- An instruction that evidence of provocation may be considered in determining whether a homicide is first or second degree murder. People v Mayfield (1997) 14 C4th 668, 778, 60 CR2d 1. See CALCRIM 522.
- An instruction on the effect of the victim's antecedent threats or assaults against the defendant on the reasonableness of defendant's conduct. People v Moore (1954) 43 C2d 517, 531, 275 P2d 485; People v Garvin (2003) 110 CA4th 484, 488, 1 CR3d 774.

Pinpoint instructions are fact-specific and this list is merely illustrative. In determining whether pinpoint instructions are needed in a given case, there is no substitute for a thorough acquaintance with the statutory formulation of the charged crime and with any pertinent case law interpreting it.

§32.17 b. Clarifying or Amplifying Instructions

Ordinarily, the instructions defining the elements of the crime adequately set forth what the prosecutor needs to prove to establish guilt. Sometimes, however, the facts of the case are such that instruction on legal principles not contained in the definition of the crime will assist the jury in its consideration of the case. In those situations, clarifying or amplifying instructions may be necessary or appropriate. If the clarification or amplification is not a general principle of law governing the case, the trial court is not required to give such instructions sua sponte and the instruction must be requested. People v Estrada (1995) 11 C4th 568, 574, 46 CR2d 586; People v Poggi (1988) 45 C3d 306, 327, 246 CR 886.

Moreover, if the language defining a crime and the instructions as a whole adequately inform the jury about the legal principles governing the case, any error in refusing requested amplifying or clarifying instructions is likely to be harmless. People v Cordero (1989) 216 CA3d 275, 279, 264 CR 774.

Ø Note: Counsel should consider requesting clarifying or amplifying instructions when it appears that a legal principle that is not entirely obvious from the elements of the crime may be an important factor in deciding the case. For example, it is well settled in California that an individual who has been threatened by another is entitled to act more quickly and take harsher measures in repelling an assault than one who has not. See People v Humphrey (1996) 13 C4th 1073, 1095, 56 CR2d 142 (concurring opinion of Brown, J.). In a homicide or assault prosecution, the defendant is entitled on request to support a self-defense claim with an instruction to that effect when there is evidence of antecedent threats by the alleged victim. People v Moore (1954) 43 C2d 517, 528, 275 P2d 485; People v Bush (1978) 84 CA3d 294, 302, 148 CR 430 (contains text of proposed instruction).

Some clarifying and amplifying instructions may also be pinpoint instructions. See §32.16. Examples of clarifying or amplifying instructions that may be required in appropriate cases include:

- An instruction that the victim's fear of immediate bodily injury must be reasonable. People v Maury (2003) 30 C4th 342, 425, 133 CR2d 561 (rape prosecution); People v Anderson (1966) 64 C2d 633, 639, 51 CR 238 (robbery prosecution).
- An instruction defining the phrase "reckless indifference to human life," as used in Pen C §190.2(d). People v Estrada (1995) 11 C4th 568, 574, 46 CR2d 586.
- An instruction that the crime of conviction and attendant special circumstances can be counted only once as an aggravating factor during the penalty phase of a capital trial. People v Melton (1988) 44 C3d 713, 768, 244 CR 867.
- An instruction defining "actual but unreasonable belief" in the need for self-defense. People v Cordero (1989) 216 CA3d 275, 279, 264 CR 774. See CALCRIM 571.

Even when there is no apparent need for clarifying or amplifying instructions in the initial charge to the jury, the situation may change during deliberations if the jury requests clarification of an instruction or otherwise indicates confusion. Thus, in Cordero, for example, the court of appeal found error in the trial court's failure to give defendant's requested clarification of the meaning of the term "deliberation" after a question from the jury indicated that it was confused about its meaning. People v Cordero (1989) 216 CA3d 275, 282, 264 CR 774. See also People v Thompkins (1987) 195 CA3d 244, 257, 240 CR 516.

Ø Note: A party generally may not argue on appeal that a court's legally correct instruction was too general or incomplete unless the complaining party requested the appropriate clarifying or amplifying language. People v Andrews (1989) 49 C3d 200, 218, 260 CR 583. However, this rule does not apply when the trial court gives an instruction that is an incorrect statement of the law. People v Hudson (2006) 38 C4th 1002, 1011, 44 CR3d 632; People v Smithey (1999) 20 C4th 936, 976 n7, 86 CR2d 243.

§32.18 c. Cautionary Instructions

Cautionary instructions may be appropriate in a variety of situations. Cautionary instructions that may be required if requested in an appropriate case include:

- An instruction that the jury may not draw any inferences from the defendant's failure to testify (CALCRIM 355). See Griffin v California (1965) 380 US 609, 614, 14 L Ed 2d 106, 110, 85 S Ct 1229; People v Mendoza (1987) 192 CA3d 667, 677, 238 CR 1.
- Instructions on eyewitness identification (see CALCRIM 315). People v McDonald (1984) 37 C3d 351, 372, 208 CR 236, overruled on other grounds in People v Mendoza (2000) 23 C4th 896, 914, 98 CR2d 431.

  Ø Note: CALCRIM 315 must be given on request when identification is a crucial issue and there is no substantial corroborative evidence. People v Wright (1988) 45 C3d 1126, 1143, 248 CR 600. See Bench Notes to CALCRIM 315.

- An instruction on the effect of coercion on the reliability of a witness's testimony. See People v Ervin (2000) 22 C4th 48, 83, 91 CR2d 623; People v Underwood (1964) 61 C2d 113, 122, 37 CR 313 (cautionary instruction on jury's use of witness's prior inconsistent statements required sua sponte when evidence of coercion was uncontradicted).

Often, the need for a cautionary instruction arises unexpectedly during trial, when, for example, a witness inadvertently testifies about something that the trial court had ruled inadmissible. In this situation, the party objecting to the evidence must request a cautionary instruction admonishing the jury to disregard the testimony.

Ø Note: If the testimony is very prejudicial, its admission may be grounds for a mistrial motion. See chap 25.

When the need for a cautionary instruction is caused by prosecutorial misconduct, the failure to object to the conduct and to request the trial court to caution the jury to disregard the prosecutor's remarks precludes the defendant from raising the issue on appeal unless the prejudicial impact of the prosecutor's conduct was such that it could not be cured by admonition. People v Bell (1989) 49 C3d 502, 535, 262 CR 1; People v Green (1980) 27 C3d 1, 27, 164 CR 1, overruled on other grounds in People v Martinez (1999) 20 C4th 225, 241, 83 CR2d 533.

§32.19 d. Limiting Instructions

Limiting instructions must be requested. Limiting instructions must be given on request when the trial court admits testimony or other evidence for a limited purpose. Evid C §355. Ordinarily, the court has no sua sponte duty to give limiting instructions. See People v Hernandez (2004) 33 C4th 1040, 1051, 16 CR3d 880; People v Brown (1994) 8 C4th 746, 758, 35 CR2d 407. Although the court must give appropriate limiting instructions if they are properly requested, the timing of the instructions is within the trial court's discretion: the trial court does not have to give limiting instructions when the limited evidence is presented or when the request is made and subsequent instructions can suffice in a proper case. People v Dennis (1998) 17 C4th 468, 533, 71 CR2d 680; People v Johnson (1967) 253 CA2d 396, 399, 61 CR 225.

Situations calling for limiting instructions that arise in criminal cases include the introduction of evidence that is admissible against one codefendant but not another (see CALCRIM 304-305), the introduction of evidence of uncharged misconduct under Evid C §1101(b) (see CALCRIM 375), and the introduction for a nonhearsay purpose of an out-of-court statement that is not admissible for the truth of the matter asserted (see CALCRIM 303).

Limiting instruction on evidence of uncharged misconduct. When evidence of the defendant's uncharged misconduct is admitted under Evid C §1101(b), the defendant is entitled on request to an instruction that the jury should not use the misconduct as evidence that the defendant has a predisposition to commit the charged act. See CALCRIM 375. The trial court has no sua sponte duty to instruct on the limited admissibility of uncharged misconduct. People v Collie (1981) 30 C3d 43, 63, 177 CR 458.

> Ø Note: Evidence Code §§1108-1109 make evidence of specified prior offenses admissible in prosecutions for sexual offenses, domestic violence, and abuse of a child or of an elder or dependent person. In such cases, the jury is permitted to infer that the defendant has a disposition to commit the charged offenses. Thus, limiting instructions are not required. See CALCRIM 852 (domestic violence), 853 (abuse of elder or dependent person), 1191 (sex offenses). See People v Falsetta (1999) 21 C4th 903, 915, 89 CR2d 847 (Evid C §1108 is constitutional; court retains discretion to exclude evidence as unduly prejudicial under Evid C §352).

Limiting instruction on evidence admitted for nonhearsay purpose. When an out-of-court statement that would be hearsay if admitted for its truth is admitted for a nonhearsay purpose, the party that would be harmed by the hearsay aspects of the statement is entitled on request to a limiting instruction. Common examples in criminal cases include:

- A statement admissible as circumstantial evidence of state of mind but not admissible under the state of mind exception to the hearsay rule. On the distinction between the state of mind exception to the hearsay rule and circumstantial evidence of state of mind, see People v Ortiz (1995) 38 CA4th 377, 389, 44 CR2d 914. See also Jefferson's California Evidence Benchbook §1.34 (4th ed CJA-CEB 2009).
- A statement admissible as a "fresh complaint" by a sexual assault victim. See People v Brown (1994) 8 C4th 746, 756, 35 CR2d 407.
- The defendant's prior inconsistent statement taken in violation of Miranda v Arizona (1966) 384 US 436, 16 L Ed 2d 694, 86 S Ct 1602, admissible for impeachment but not as substantive evidence of guilt. See CALCRIM 356. See also Bench Notes to CALCRIM 356.
- The defendant's statements to a defense expert (such as statements to a medical expert in the course of an examination), introduced not to be evaluated for their truth, but to show the basis of the expert's opinion. See CALCRIM 360; Bench Notes to CALCRIM 360; People v Boyer (2006) 38 C4th 412, 465, 42 CR3d 677.

§32.20 4. Instructions Commonly Requested by Prosecution

The prosecution has the right to have the judge instruct the jury on the legal principles that relate to facts that it feels are important to its case when its proffered instructions are "correct statements of abstract propositions of law" with evidentiary support. People v Moore (1954) 43 C2d 517, 524, 275 P2d 485. Like the defense, the prosecution may request pinpoint instructions, clarifying or amplifying instructions, cautionary instructions, and limiting instructions.

Examples of instructions that may be requested by the prosecution:

- An amplifying instruction on the limits of self-defense. People v Moore (1954) 43 C2d 517, 526, 275 P2d 485. See CALCRIM 3471-3472.
- An instruction on the use of prior statements as evidence. See CALCRIM 318-319.
- An instruction on distrust of a witness who is willfully false. People v Reyes (1987) 195 CA3d 957, 966, 240 CR 752. See CALCRIM 226.
- An instruction on the defendant's flight after the crime. People v Hernandez Rios (2007) 151 CA4th 1154, 1157, 60 CR3d 591. See CALCRIM 372.

  Ø Note: When there is evidence of flight, the prosecution should request CALCRIM 372 even though the court should give the instruction sua sponte. See Pen C §1127c. See also Bench Notes to CALCRIM 372. An instruction on flight may be appropriate even when the defendant concedes culpability of some crime but contests the degree of the charged offense. People v Moon (2005) 37 C4th 1, 27, 32 CR3d 894.

- An instruction on transferred intent in either a murder or voluntary manslaughter prosecution when specific intent is involved. See CALCRIM 562.
- A limiting instruction that the defendant's statements to a medical expert may be considered only as information on which the expert relied and not for their truth. People v Dennis (1998) 17 C4th 468, 532, 71 CR2d 680. See CALCRIM 360.
- An instruction that insanity cannot be shown by antisocial acts alone. People v Weaver (2001) 26 C4th 876, 968, 111 CR2d 2.
- An instruction that the jury need not unanimously agree on the theory (i.e., felony murder or premeditated and deliberate murder) underlying a unanimous verdict of first degree murder. See People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 249, 10 CR2d 636.
- An instruction that juror unanimity is not required for specific acts constituting the crime when it involves a continuous course of conduct of a series of acts over a period of time, such as child abuse. See People v Napoles (2002) 104 CA4th 108, 117, 127 CR2d 777.

For discussion of objecting to instructions, see §§32.29-32.34.

C. CALCRIM Instructions

§32.21 1. Description and Recommendation for Use

In determining what instructions to request (or oppose), most criminal practitioners begin with Judicial Council of California Criminal Jury Instructions (CALCRIM) (2008). These are the official instructions for use in the state, and their use is strongly encouraged. See Cal Rules of Ct 2.1050(e).

The instructions are organized into 24 series, which reflect broad categories of crime (e.g., homicide) and components of the trial (e.g., evidence). The series and the instructions within each series are presented in the order in which they are likely to be given in an actual trial. Therefore, greater offenses, such as DUI with injury come before lesser offenses, such as simple DUI. Defenses are grouped together at the end of the instructions, rather than dispersed throughout.

The misdemeanors are placed within the category of instructions to which they belong, so simple battery is found with the other battery instructions rather than in a stand-alone misdemeanor section.

CALCRIM is an excellent place to begin when preparing proposed instructions, but they should not be counsel's sole resource. No CALCRIM instruction should be requested without first giving careful attention to the notes that follow it. Bench Notes following the instructions alert counsel to the court's instructional duty and to related instructions, as well as to situations in which the instruction or elements of it must not be given (see, e.g., CALCRIM 720). In addition to authority, commentary, and related issues, the notes may also specify lesser included offenses (see, e.g., Bench Notes to CALCRIM 840). Counsel can easily avoid potential embarrassment at the instruction conference by thoroughly reading the notes that accompany a proposed instruction.

It is important to remember that although CALCRIM instructions are considered authoritative, they do not have the force of law, and may be held incorrect. See, e.g., People v Montoya (1994) 7 C4th 1027, 1047, 31 CR2d 128 (former CALJIC 14.54 incorrect); People v Frye (1994) 28 CA4th 1080, 1090, 34 CR2d 180 (former CALJIC 16.305 incorrect).

The latest CALCRIM revisions are available on the Administrative Office of the Courts' website at http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov. Trial counsel should check that website for recent CALCRIM developments.

Ø Warning: Counsel may want to proceed with caution in requesting CALCRIM 306 (which informs the jury that it may consider in its deliberations a party's failure to timely produce evidence). See Bench Notes to CALCRIM 306. CALJIC 2.28 on the same subject was "recognized as a problematic jury instruction." People v Saucedo (2004) 121 CA4th 937, 942, 17 CR3d 692. See also People v Cabral (2004) 121 CA4th 748, 17 CR3d 456 (CALJIC 2.28 failed to give jury any guidance regarding legitimate inferences that could be drawn; judgment reversed); People v Bell (2004) 118 CA4th 249, 255, 12 CR3d 808 (same).

§32.22 2. Modification May Be Required for CALCRIM Instruction to Fit Facts of Case

Instructions must fit facts of case. Despite Cal Rules of Ct 2.1050 (see §32.21), and the high regard in which CALCRIM instructions are held, trial judges must give the instructions required by the facts of the case on trial. See People v Runnion (1994) 30 CA4th 852, 858, 36 CR2d 203. CALCRIM instructions may need modification given the facts of a particular case. See Cal Rules of Ct 2.1050(e). See also People v Pulido (1997) 15 C4th 713, 729, 63 CR2d 625 (CALJIC 8.27 needed modification in some aider and abettor felony murder cases). Many CALCRIM instructions are designed to be modified to fit the facts of the particular case. For example, CALCRIM 226's laundry list of factors the jury can consider in assessing the believability of witnesses should be tailored to the facts shown by the evidence. Likewise, CALCRIM 315, on eyewitness identification, contains a list similar to the list in CALCRIM 226 and blanks for inserting factors relevant to the particular case.

When there is no CALCRIM instruction on a particular crime, "'[t]he language of a statute defining a crime or defense is generally an appropriate and desirable basis for an instruction.'" People v Estrada (1995) 11 C4th 568, 574, 46 CR2d 586, quoting from People v Poggi (1988) 45 C3d 306, 246 CR 886.

Prepare tailored instructions when no CALCRIM instruction is on point. Because CALCRIM instructions are often rather general, their relevance to specific evidence in a given case may be difficult to discern. When there are no CALCRIM instructions that make the points counsel wishes to emphasize or that state the legal principle on which he or she wishes to rely in closing argument, counsel should prepare tailored instructions that may be more intelligible to jurors and that better fit the case and counsel's argument than those that the court might select from CALCRIM. Jury instructions tailored to the evidence can often be used to add force to a closing argument.

Ø Note: Suggestions for tailored instructions can be found in the references cited in §32.1. Case law is another obvious source for ideas for tailored instructions. On considerations to keep in mind when drafting tailored instructions, see §32.24.

§32.23 3. Checklist: Commonly Requested CALCRIM Instructions

This checklist separates instructions most commonly requested by the prosecution from those most commonly requested by the defense. Some instructions are common to both and, depending on the facts of the case, either side may wish to request a particular instruction.

Subject	CALCRIM
PROSECUTION:
• Defendant lied to arresting officers about offense	362, 371
• Defendant threatened witness	371
• Possible suppression of evidence by defense	371
• Prior inconsistent statement	105, 226, 302, 318-319
• Defendant's prior inconsistent statement obtained in violation of Miranda	356
• Witness testified under influence of intoxicant	105, 226
• defendant committed similar offense	375. See also 852-853, 1191
• Defendant's flight	372
• Preoffense statement by defendant	358
• Expert testimony	332
• Mental defect caused by long use of drugs	3450
• Unanimity as to specific act	3500-3502
• Conspiracy	415-419
• Testimony of co-conspirators	418
• All elements of the crime	520-2996
• Lesser included or related offense	3517-3518. See also CALJIC App C
• Defendant has prior felony conviction	3100, 3103
DEFENSE:
• Circumstantial evidence	223-225
	303, 305, 316, 360, 375

• Limiting instructions	303-305, 316, 360, 375
• Neither side required to call all witnesses	300

IV. PREPARING AND SUBMITTING INSTRUCTIONS

§32.24 A. Drafting Technique in General

Trial courts have broad leeway in determining whether to give any particular requested instruction. Jury instruction preparation requires a thorough knowledge of the legal principles on which the requested instruction is based, taking care not to be too specific about the facts that the instruction is supposed to highlight, and a flexible attitude about the wording. It may be useful to prepare more than one version of a proposed instruction. Then, if the first version is rejected, another version will be available to counter any specific objection. Alternatively, counsel may revise the original instructions in response to a successful objection.

Draft even-handed instructions. Counsel should aim to draft even-handed instructions that will not engender a strenuous objection from the other side and then to persuade the court that the instruction will be helpful to the jury. Counsel should recognize that he or she has the primary responsibility for preparing instructions and should not expect the court to rewrite or edit them substantially.

Ø Note: Published appellate decisions are a good source for special instructions. However, "language in an appellate court decision which may be a good statement of law or of the reasoning of the appellate court does not necessarily make a good jury instruction." People v Adams (1987) 196 CA3d 201, 204, 241 CR 684. See also People v Colantuono (1994) 7 C4th 206, 221 n13, 26 CR2d 908.

Drafting principles. When preparing instructions, counsel should keep in mind the following principles:

- The trial court may refuse an instruction if it is deemed to be incorrect. See Pen C §1127.
- The trial court may refuse an instruction if it is deemed not pertinent, i.e., if there is no evidence to which the requested instruction relates. See Pen C §1127.
- The trial court need not give the exact instructions requested by the party, even if they are pertinent, and may modify requested instructions to make them more appropriate or may replace them with his or her own instructions. People v Dieguez (2001) 89 CA4th 266, 277, 107 CR2d 160; People v Galvan (1962) 208 CA2d 443, 452, 25 CR 128. See People v Musselwhite (1998) 17 C4th 1216, 1247, 74 CR2d 212.
- The trial court will refuse an instruction deemed to be argumentative, i.e., one that analyzes specific evidence on a disputed question of fact to the benefit of one party or another. People v Carter (2003) 30 C4th 1166, 1225 n22, 135 CR2d 553.
- The trial court will refuse an instruction that informs jurors that particular evidence is in fact true. People v Moore (1954) 43 C2d 517, 527, 275 P2d 485.
- The court will refuse a formula instruction, i.e., one that requires the jury to return a verdict in favor of one party (usually the prosecution) if they find certain facts to be true; such an instruction can unconstitutionally lighten the prosecution's burden of proof by requiring the jury to presume material facts from the proof of other facts that do not necessarily support those facts. See, e.g., People v Roder (1983) 33 C3d 491, 498, 189 CR 501. See also §32.32.
- The trial court is not required to give a requested instruction if its subject matter is adequately covered by other instructions. People v Benson (1990) 52 C3d 754, 805 n12, 276 CR 827.

Ø Note: While the trial court is not required to give a duplicative instruction, when the requested instruction is an important one, is supported by the evidence, and makes a point that is obscure or ambiguous in other instructions, counsel should distinguish the requested instruction from the other instructions and argue that it would be error for the trial court to refuse the instruction. See, e.g., People v Cook (1906) 148 C 334, 83 P 43 (instruction actually given was "brief, general, and colorless in comparison with the instruction asked, and had the effect of minimizing the importance of a consideration which could not have been stated with too much emphasis"). See also People v Kane (1946) 27 C2d 693, 700, 166 P2d 285 (quoting Cook); People v Mayo (1961) 194 CA2d 527, 537, 15 CR 366 (same).

Draft instructions that support your argument. Closing argument is the denouement of every trial; it should dictate every tactical decision of counsel that precedes it. Every question asked on cross-examination and each bit of testimonial or documentary evidence offered by the parties should be designed to support an element of defense counsel's plea to the jury that the client is innocent, or the state's argument that guilt has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The preparation of jury instructions should also be governed by the direction of counsel's closing argument. After outlining the closing argument, an attorney should design jury instructions that reflect the evidence and counsel's theory of the case as much as possible.

Defense counsel should establish the theory on which the case will be presented to the jury, considering the following questions:

- What is the prosecution's theory of liability (e.g., felony murder, aiding and abetting)?
- What factual elements will defense counsel claim that the state must prove?
- On what shortcomings in the People's evidence will the defense argument focus? See, e.g., CALCRIM 226.
- Which witnesses for the opposing side will counsel most vigorously attack, and on what grounds?
- What legal defense will be argued, and what evidence will be offered in its support?

The prosecutor can and should attempt a similar assessment of the probable defense case based on the preliminary hearing, cross-examination of prosecution witnesses, and other information in the case. It may be possible to eliminate or restrict certain lines of defense in the prosecution's case-in-chief if they are anticipated early. Familiarity with the instructions that define the elements of the offense will help counsel structure the final argument and ensure that all elements of the crime are proven.

§32.25 B. Drafting Instructions on Elements of the Crime

The prosecutor may have to draft instructions on the elements of the crime if there is no CALCRIM instruction on point. This can happen with obscure or new crimes. As a general rule, the language of a statute defining a crime is usually an appropriate basis for an instruction and will usually be sufficient absent a request for an amplifying instruction. People v Rodriguez (2002) 28 C4th 543, 546, 122 CR2d 348. In drafting such an instruction, the prosecutor should keep in mind that the legislature may not have expressed itself clearly. The prosecutor may need to break the statute down into the component elements, including ascertaining what mental state is required if none is specified.

Ø Note: A new CALCRIM instruction should be examined closely to make sure it does not contain errors and would not benefit from improvement. See, e.g., People v Reliford (2003) 29 C4th 1007, 1016, 130 CR2d 254 (although 1999 version of CALJIC 2.50.01 was not unconstitutional, court recognized that it could be improved, as it was in the 2002 version). Trial attorneys and judges may submit suggestions for improving or modifying CALCRIM instructions, or for new instructions. Suggestions, accompanied with an explanation of any proposed change, should be sent to the Administrative Office of the Courts, Office of the General Counsel, 455 Golden Gate Avenue, San Francisco, CA 94102-3688. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1050(d).

§32.26 C. Time to Prepare and Submit Instructions

Unlike civil cases in which counsel generally submit instructions before trial begins, counsel in criminal cases may be allowed to delay submitting instructions until the close of their case. See Pen C §1093.5 (instructions in criminal cases must be submitted before argument). If ordered to submit instructions earlier, counsel may try arguing that to do so would violate Pen C §1054(e) by constituting a form of discovery not provided for in Pen C §§1054-1054.10. Counsel should also be aware that the need for some instructions may not arise until argument. See, e.g., People v Ponce (1996) 44 CA4th 1380, 1386, 52 CR2d 422 (additional limiting instructions required in response to inappropriate argument by both defense and prosecution).

Because instructions are usually submitted and discussed after presentation of the evidence, many attorneys wait until a trial has almost ended before turning their attention to jury instructions, a fact that helps explain why instructions are so often poorly done. The time to begin thinking about proposed instructions and doing research in support of them is the same time that trial counsel begins preparing his or her closing argument: the day the attorney begins working on the case.

The prosecutor should carefully review CALCRIM instructions on the offense charged to make sure the case is properly charged, and decide what instructions will help support his or her case. Once a defense is selected, defense counsel should work on instructions in support of that defense. If defense counsel decides at some point before trial that he or she will offer character testimony, or if a prosecutor obtains evidence of admissions by a defendant, both should immediately make a note to prepare and request appropriate instructions on these types of testimony.

> Ø Practice tip: When the trial court has questions about the relevance of proffered evidence, submitting a proposed instruction in conjunction with a request for a ruling on its admissibility may help convince the court that the evidence is relevant.

Unlike many tasks, such as the preparation of cross-examination or closing argument, which simply cannot be delegated to anyone other than trial counsel, the task of preparing instructions is "research intensive," and thus one with which a trial assistant or law student can be helpful. In death penalty cases, in which a second defense counsel usually is available (Keenan v Superior Court (1982) 31 C3d 424, 428, 180 CR 489; see §54.9), one attorney should be able to devote considerable attention to jury instructions while the other attorney works on other aspects of the defense. Full and complete reinstruction of the jury will be required for any penalty phase of the trial. People v Moon (2005) 37 C4th 1, 36, 32 CR3d 894.

§32.27 D. Form of Proposed Instructions

The general rules (use of recycled paper, size of paper, etc.) that apply to any papers filed with court apply to proposed instructions. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(b)(1). See Cal Rules of Ct 2.100-2.119 (form and format of papers). Each set of proposed instructions must have a cover page with the case caption and the name of the party proposing the instructions, and should include an index listing all the proposed instructions. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(b)(2). Each set must be bound loosely. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(b)(4). The index must identify CALCRIM instructions by number and must list special instructions numbered consecutively. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(b)(3). "Special instructions" are those specially prepared by a party or approved instructions that have been substantially modified by a party. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(a)(1)(B). The index must also contain a checklist that the court may use to indicate whether the instruction was given as proposed, given as modified, refused, or withdrawn. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(b)(3).

Each proposed instruction must be on a separate page or pages, contain the instruction number and title of the instruction at the top of the first page of the instruction, and be prepared without any blank lines or unused bracketed portions so that it can be read directly to the jury. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(c). Each special instruction must include a citation of authorities that support the instruction at the bottom of the page. No citation is required for CALCRIM instructions. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(d).

No local court form or rule may require that the instructions be submitted in any other manner. Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055(e).

See the sample request forms in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §32.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

Attorneys submitting instructions should serve copies on co-counsel and opposing counsel, unless service is waived.

§32.28 E. Hearing on Instructions

Trial judges generally ask that proposed instructions be submitted as the taking of evidence draws to a close. Discussion of proposed instructions should be held before argument begins. See Pen C §1093.5; People v Terry (1969) 70 C2d 410, 420 n4, 77 CR 460.

Counsel can expect that some judges will not accept a full set of tailored instructions. Every requested instruction raises a possible appellate issue if denied, and the court may be hesitant or unwilling to make numerous instructional decisions outside the framework of CALCRIM. Other judges are delighted to have the lawyers determine the instructions to be given.

Ø Note: It is strongly recommended that a CALCRIM instruction be used when applicable. See Cal Rules of Ct 2.1050(e), discussed in §32.21.

Counsel should expect to hear that his or her tailored instructions are argumentative, invade the province of the jury by deciding issues of fact, are adequately covered by pattern instructions, and improperly emphasize certain principles of law or pieces of evidence by unduly focusing on them. Most of these criticisms can be met by good drafting. See §32.24 for discussion of problems to avoid in drafting original instructions.

The arguments presented in support of or in opposition to jury instructions are useful on appeal. See §32.34. Therefore, counsel should insist that any conference at which jury instructions are discussed be on the record. Arguments for or against instructions should be as detailed as possible and should refer to the specific pieces of evidence that support or undercut a given instruction.

A defendant is not entitled to be present at a jury instruction conference, because it is not a critical stage of the trial. People v Morris (1991) 53 C3d 152, 210, 279 CR 720, disapproved on other grounds in People v Stansbury (1995) 9 C4th 824, 830 n1, 38 CR2d 394. On what constitutes a "critical stage" of the case, see §3.2.

V. OBJECTIONS TO INSTRUCTIONS

A. Grounds for Objecting

§32.29 1. General Grounds

Counsel should carefully examine the list of instructions proposed by opposing counsel as well as those the court intends to give on its own motion. Many of these will be unobjectionable. Others will be contrary to the client's interest, and counsel should attempt to devise an objection to each such instruction. Objections to instructions proposed by opposing counsel should be made in writing when time permits. A sample form of objection to instructions is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §32.2 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

Major grounds for objecting to a proposed instruction include the following:

- Is not supported by the evidence. People v McNeill (1980) 112 CA3d 330, 339, 169 CR 313. See §32.30.
- Does not accurately state the law. People v Beeman (1984) 35 C3d 547, 555, 199 CR 60. See §32.31.
- Lightens the prosecution's burden of proof, or improperly shifts the burden of proof to the defendant. Sandstrom v Montana (1979) 442 US 510, 513, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 44, 99 S Ct 2450. See §32.32.
- Removes an element of the offense from the jury. See U.S. v Gaudin (1995) 515 US 506, 519, 132 L Ed 2d 444, 455, 115 S Ct 2310 (in perjury prosecution, failure to submit question of "materiality" to jury violated Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments); Sullivan v Louisiana (1993) 508 US 275, 277, 124 L Ed 2d 182, 188, 113 S Ct 2078.
- Is argumentative. People v Wright (1988) 45 C3d 1126, 1135, 248 CR 600; People v Ward (1999) 71 CA4th 368, 376, 83 CR2d 828.
- Repeats other instructions. People v Catlin (2001) 26 C4th 81, 152, 109 CR2d 31; People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 203, 32 CR2d 762.
- Conflicts with another instruction. People v Rhoden (1972) 6 C3d 519, 526, 99 CR 751.
- Singles out, even if only by implication, the testimony of a particular witness. People v Harris (1989) 47 C3d 1047, 1099, 255 CR 352 (upholding trial court's refusal to give tailored instruction on effect of witness's intoxication on his ability to perceive and recall).

Many instructional errors are arguably erroneous under both California law and the U.S. Constitution. To present and preserve a federal constitutional claim, the defense should explain how the federal right applies under the particular facts and circumstances of the trial. The consequence of failing to raise a federal claim for adjudication at the proper time is generally forfeiture of the claim. See, e.g., Sanchez-Llamas v Oregon (2006) 548 US 331, 165 L Ed 2d 557, 582, 126 S Ct 2669. The defendant should indicate the federal-law basis for his claim by citing "the federal source of law on which he relies or a case deciding such a claim on federal grounds, or by simply labeling the claim 'federal.'" Baldwin v Reese (2004) 541 US 27, 32, 158 L Ed 2d 64, 71, 124 S Ct 1347. On federalizing generally, see §44.29; Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §4.34 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

© The Regents of the University of California

§32.30 2. Instruction Is Unsupported by Evidence

The trial court must refrain from instructing on principles of law concerning issues unrelated to the evidence at trial, because it may confuse the jury or relieve it from making findings on relevant issues. People v Satchell (1971) 6 C3d 28, 33 n10, 98 CR 33, overruled on other grounds in People v Flood (1998) 18 C4th 470, 490 n12, 76 CR2d 180; People v Andersen (1994) 26 CA4th 1241, 1250, 32 CR2d 442. Instructions on irrelevant issues tend to mislead the jury by injecting matters into the case that the undisputed evidence shows are not involved (People v Jackson (1954) 42 C2d 540, 546, 268 P2d 6; People v Schultz (1987) 192 CA3d 535, 539, 237 CR 513), or by causing the jury to believe that it has missed something during the trial or that the court and counsel had special knowledge of matters that could not be presented because of the technical rules of criminal procedure.

Consequently, before the court agrees to give an instruction, it must find legally sufficient evidence in the record to support the finding or inference that the instruction permits. The trial court must initially decide the question of the legal sufficiency of the evidence to support an instruction; its failure to make such a preliminary finding is error. People v Hannon (1977) 19 C3d 588, 597, 138 CR 885. As with all instructions, those concerning lesser included offenses require some evidence that the offense committed was less than that charged. People v Noah (1971) 5 C3d 469, 478, 96 CR 441. For further discussion of lesser included offenses, see §§32.7-32.10.

If a jury is instructed on alternative theories of guilt, one of which is factually inadequate, the judgment will be affirmed unless a review of the entire record affirmatively demonstrates a reasonable probability that the jury in fact found the defendant guilty solely on the inadequate theory. However, if the jury is instructed on alternative theories, one of which is legally inadequate, the judgment must be reversed if the reviewing court cannot determine on which theory the defendant was convicted. People v Marks (2003) 31 C4th 197, 233, 2 CR3d 252; People v Guiton (1993) 4 C4th 1116, 1126, 17 CR2d 365.

Ø Note: Defense counsel should object to an instruction that reflects any prosecutorial theory of the case (e.g., conspiracy, aiding and abetting, felony murder) that is unsupported by the evidence at trial. See, e.g., People v Anderson (1965) 63 C2d 351, 360, 46 CR 763 (two of prosecution's four possible theories that supported first degree murder were not supported by substantial evidence). Likewise, the prosecutor should object to an instruction requested by defense counsel if there is no legal basis, or if the evidence does not support the defense theory. See, e.g., People v Sinclair (1998) 64 CA4th 1012, 1015, 75 CR2d 626 (instructions on voluntary manslaughter properly refused in absence of any evidence of heat of passion or imperfect self-defense).

© The Regents of the University of California

§32.31 3. Instruction Incorrectly States Law

That an instruction incorrectly states the law is a commonly made attack on attorney-drafted instructions. A CALCRIM instruction may also be vulnerable to attack on that basis because it is only by challenging accepted statements of law as defective that new doctrine is made. For example, the Supreme Court's criticism in Victor v Nebraska (1994) 511 US 1, 13, 127 L Ed 2d 583, 595, 114 S Ct 1239, of the outmoded phrase "moral certainty" led to a revision of CALJIC 2.90. See also People v Gainer (1977) 19 C3d 835, 843, 139 CR 861 (disapproving long-accepted Allen charge urging deadlocked juries to reach verdict); People v Bell (2009) 179 CA4th 428, 102 CR3d 300 (CALCRIM 1215 found misleading).

Ø Note: An instruction that is correct in the abstract may be incorrectly applied to a particular case. For example, an instruction defining implied malice, while correct in the abstract, was erroneously given in a case involving assault with intent to commit murder, because that crime requires an express intent to kill. People v Murtishaw (1981) 29 C3d 733, 764, 175 CR 738. An instruction unsupported by the evidence should not be given. See §32.30.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/32 JURY INSTRUCTIONS/§32.32 4. Instruction Lightens Prosecution's Burden of Proof

§32.32 4. Instruction Lightens Prosecution's Burden of Proof

Under the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, the prosecution must prove every element of a criminal offense beyond a reasonable doubt. See Patterson v New York (1977) 432 US 197, 210, 53 L Ed 2d 281, 292, 97 S Ct 2319; In re Winship (1970) 397 US 358, 364, 25 L Ed 2d 368, 375, 90 S Ct 1068. Under the Sixth Amendment, that determination must be made by the jury, not the judge. See Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 476, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 446, 120 S Ct 2348; Sullivan v Louisiana (1993) 508 US 275, 277, 124 L Ed 2d 182, 188, 113 S Ct 2078. Consequently, instructions that lighten the prosecution's burden of proof violate the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to jury trial.

Examples of instructions that lighten the prosecution's burden of proof:

- Instructions that fail to define every element of the offense. See, e.g., People v Cummings (1993) 4 C4th 1233, 1312, 18 CR2d 796 (instructions failed to define four out of five elements of robbery).
- Instructions that tell the jury that an element of the offense has been proven. See, e.g., U.S. v Gaudin (1995) 515 US 506, 519, 132 L Ed 2d 444, 455, 115 S Ct 2310 (in perjury prosecution, instruction that defendant's misstatements were material removed element of offense); People v Flood (1998) 18 C4th 470, 482, 76 CR2d 180 (in prosecution for evading peace officer, instruction that individuals trying to stop defendant were peace officers removed element of offense); People v Reyes Martinez (1993) 14 CA4th 1412, 1417, 18 CR2d 300 (instruction that forcibly moving victim 500 feet or more was "substantial distance" within meaning of kidnapping statute removed element of offense); People v Lawson (1987) 189 CA3d 741, 747, 234 CR 557 (in prosecution for sale of unqualified securities, instruction that certain accounts were securities removed element of offense).
- Instructions that require the jury to presume an element of the offense from the proof of another fact (Sandstrom error). In criminal cases, a mandatory presumption offends constitutional principles of due process of law because it relieves the prosecutor from having to prove each element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. See, e.g., Sandstrom v Montana (1979) 442 US 510, 513, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 43, 99 S Ct 2450 (in murder prosecution, instruction told jurors that individual is presumed to intend ordinary consequences of voluntary acts); People v Roder (1983) 33 C3d 491, 499, 189 CR 501 (instructions allowed jury to presume that secondhand dealer who receives property in suspicious circumstances has knowledge that it is stolen); People v Vanegas (2004) 115 CA4th 592, 598, 9 CR3d 398 (instructing jury that any violation of basic speed law is inherently dangerous to human life created impermissible mandatory presumption); People v Forrester (1994) 30 CA4th 1697, 1701, 37 CR2d 19 (instruction required jury to presume that person who willfully fails to appear within 14 days after date designated for appearance intended to evade court's process). On the difference between mandatory and permissive presumptions, see People v Roder, supra; People v McCall (2004) 32 C4th 175, 182, 8 CR3d 337.

Ø Note: Although the Evidence Code uses the terms "conclusive presumption" and "rebuttable presumption" (see, e.g., Evid C §§601, 620), only rebuttable presumptions present due process issues because a "conclusive presumption" is not really a rule of evidence but a rule of substantive law. McCall, 32 C4th at 185.

The fact that a statute defines an element of the offense as including specific conduct does not lessen the prosecution's burden of proof. A rule of substantive law may properly define conduct that establishes an element of an offense as a matter of law. In this situation, there is no presumption and there is nothing to rebut. See, e.g., People v Laughlin (2006) 137 CA4th 1020, 1026, 40 CR3d 737 (commission of three or more Vehicle Code violations assigned a traffic point count constitutes willful or wanton disregard for safety of persons or property as a matter of law, without resort to any presumption).

Most errors involving presumptions are subject to harmless error analysis under the Chapman test (Chapman v California (1967) 386 US 18, 24, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 711, 87 S Ct 824 (reversal required for constitutional error unless error is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt)). See Neder v U.S. (1999) 527 US 1, 4, 144 L Ed 2d 35, 44, 119 S Ct 1827 (failure to instruct on element of offense subject to harmless error analysis); Rose v Clark (1986) 478 US 570, 580, 92 L Ed 2d 460, 472, 106 S Ct 3101 (Sandstrom error subject to harmless error analysis); People v Flood (1998) 18 C4th 470, 502, 76 CR2d 180 (instruction that removes element of offense from jury subject to harmless error analysis under Chapman). However, an erroneous reasonable doubt instruction is per se reversible error. Sullivan v Louisiana (1993) 508 US 275, 277, 124 L Ed 2d 182, 188, 113 S Ct 2078; see Rose v Clark, supra (dictum suggests that instruction directing verdict for prosecution is reversible per se).

§32.33 5. Instruction Mischaracterizes Defense Burden

It is permissible to give the defendant the burden of producing evidence that, if believed, would negate proof of an element of the offense; but it is not permissible to require the defendant to do any more than raise a reasonable doubt about its existence. See Mullaney v Wilbur (1975) 421 US 684, 703, 44 L Ed 2d 508, 522, 95 S Ct 1881; People v Mower (2002) 28 C4th 457, 476, 122 CR2d 326. See also People v Fuentes (1990) 224 CA3d 1041, 1044, 274 CR 17 (upholding CALJIC 16.005, which places burden on defendant to raise reasonable doubt about lawful possession of syringe; lists similar cases involving drugs and guns).

The state may constitutionally require the defendant to bear both the burden of production and the burden of persuasion on an affirmative defense, i.e., one that does not negate any element of the offense on which the prosecution bears the burden of proof. Patterson v New York (1977) 432 US 197, 210, 53 L Ed 2d 281, 292, 97 S Ct 2319. An instruction on an affirmative defense must state the burden of proof borne by the defendant; otherwise, jurors might assume that the burden was proof beyond a reasonable doubt. People v Spry (1997) 58 CA4th 1345, 1367, 68 CR2d 691, disapproved in part on other grounds by People v Martin (2001) 25 C4th 1180, 1192, 108 CR2d 599 (reversible error not to instruct that defendant can establish lawful possession of drugs by preponderance of evidence).

§32.34 B. Preserving Instructional Issues for Appeal

Although the general rule is that trial court errors must be brought to the court's attention during trial to be cognizable on appeal (see People v Campos (2007) 156 CA4th 1228, 1236, 67 CR3d 904), defendants are permitted to raise on appeal instructional issues that affect substantial rights even if no objection was made in the trial court (Pen C §1259; see People v Coffman (2004) 34 C4th 1, 103 n34, 17 CR3d 710). The constitutional right to have all elements of a criminal offense proved beyond a reasonable doubt is such a "substantial right." People v Johnson (2004) 119 CA4th 976, 985, 14 CR3d 780; People v Van Winkle (1999) 75 CA4th 133, 139, 89 CR2d 28. Also, an objection is not necessary to preserve the right to appellate review of an instruction if any objection would have been futile. See People v Hill (1998) 17 C4th 800, 822, 72 CR2d 656; People v Johnson (2004) 119 CA4th 976, 984, 14 CR3d 780. Even if a defendant has forfeited the right to raise an issue on appeal by failing to raise the issue below, an appellate court may exercise its discretion to consider the issue. See People v Williams (1998) 17 C4th 148, 161 n6, 69 CR2d 917; People v Johnson (2004) 119 CA4th 976, 984, 14 CR3d 780; People v Marchand (2002) 98 CA4th 1056, 1061, 120 CR2d 687.

Under Cal Rules of Ct 8.320(b), the clerk's transcript on appeal must contain copies of all jury instructions submitted in writing, identifying the requesting party and any written instructions the court gave. Under Cal Rules of Ct 8.320(c), the reporter's transcript on appeal must contain copies of all oral jury instructions. A request for augmentation of the record with written jury instructions may, if appropriate, simply designate "all written instructions given, refused, or withdrawn" (Cal Rules of Ct 8.122(a)(1)).

Ø Note: It is advisable for counsel to ensure that a clear record exists of objections to instructions, and of proposed but rejected instructions, and the bases for them. If instructions are discussed off the record, counsel should summarize for the record the positions taken by counsel and see that the court's rulings are stated. Counsel should not waive reporting of the oral instructions. However, in the event of a discrepancy between written instructions provided for deliberations and the oral instructions read to the jury by the judge, the jury may be presumed to have used the written instructions. People v Osband (1996) 13 C4th 622, 717, 55 CR2d 26. This may be true even if the jury has not been instructed to read the written instructions.

The doctrine of invited error may bar consideration of a claim of instructional error on appeal if defense counsel makes a tactical decision specifically to not object to an instruction (People v Lewis (2001) 25 C4th 610, 676, 106 CR2d 629), to withdraw an objection to an instruction (People v Brown (2003) 31 C4th 518, 560, 3 CR3d 145), or to request an instruction (People v Lucero (2000) 23 C4th 692, 723, 97 CR2d 871; People v Hernandez (1988) 47 C3d 315, 353, 253 CR 199). But see People v Boyette (2002) 29 C4th 381, 438, 127 CR2d 544 (ordinarily defense counsel joining with prosecutor in requesting instruction would be invited error, but here there was no obvious tactical reason defense counsel requested very damaging instruction).

Ø Note: Faulty instructions requested by defense counsel are subject to attack on appeal as ineffective assistance of counsel. People v Oden (1987) 193 CA3d 1675, 1681, 239 CR 232.

VI. INSTRUCTING THE JURY

§32.35 A. When Instructions Are Given

Cautionary and limiting instructions are traditionally requested and given at the time the evidence is introduced. The effectiveness of such instructions often depends on their close temporal proximity to the evidence to which they relate.

Instructions on the general standards by which the credibility of witnesses is to be judged should arguably be read to the jury as a matter of course before testimony begins, because jurors begin to form opinions on credibility long before hearing the formal charges given at the close of trial.

The timing of giving instructions to the jury is within the trial court's discretion. People v Webb (1967) 66 C2d 107, 128, 56 CR 902; People v Chung (1997) 57 CA4th 755, 759, 67 CR2d 337; People v Lamb (1988) 206 CA3d 397, 400, 253 CR 465; see Pen C §1093(f). However, the trial court must determine the exact instructions that it will give and inform counsel of these before oral argument begins. Pen C §1093.5. Judicial alteration of instructions during or after oral argument can constitute reversible error. See People v Sanchez (1978) 83 CA3d Supp 1, 7, 147 CR 850 (material modification and departure from agreed on instructions may deprive defendant of fair trial).

Some trial judges prefer to instruct before argument, and some prefer to instruct after argument. Others instruct on the law applicable to the case before argument and give concluding instructions after argument. One court has called this the "preferable" practice. See People v Murillo (1996) 47 CA4th 1104, 1109, 55 CR2d 21. Counsel may wish to ask the court to give case-specific instructions before argument to better weave the governing law into his or her argument.

Counsel may want to check with the court clerk to be sure that proposed instructions that are refused by the court are made part of the clerk's transcript for appellate purposes. See Cal Rules of Ct 2.1055. Finally, counsel should pay close attention to the instructions as the court reads them. It is not unusual for the court to inadvertently omit an agreed on instruction or, conversely, to read a proposed instruction that the parties have agreed should not be given. See, e.g., Middleton v McNeil (2004) 541 US 433, 158 L Ed 2d 701, 707, 124 S Ct 1830 (in instruction on "unreasonable self-defense," trial judge misspoke, substituting word "reasonable" for "unreasonable" in one instruction).

© The Regents of the University of California

§32.36 B. Maximizing Impact of Instructions

Counsel who has succeeded in obtaining requested instructions can maximize their impact in several ways. Counsel should incorporate the more important favorable instructions into the closing argument, and use the closing argument to defuse unfavorable instructions. Defense attorneys can make the reasonable-doubt instruction the cornerstone of an argument in a particular case, or an instruction on eyewitness identification the center of another. Prosecutors may want to make use of instructions on the defendant's flight after the crime, efforts by the defendant to fabricate evidence, or the effect of a prior felony conviction on a witness's credibility.

The court may allow counsel to use photographic or written enlargements of key instructions to display to the jury during closing argument. Many effective trial lawyers use computer software to aid them in presenting instructions visually to the jury during their arguments.

Also, if the court does not give the jury a written copy of the instructions on its own motion, counsel may want to ask the court to provide the jury with a complete copy of the instructions so that it can refer to the instructions during deliberations. See Pen C §1093(f).

© The Regents of the University of California

§32.37 C. Jury's Request for Supplemental Instructions

The court is required to clear up a jury's confusion over instructions and to consider giving additional explanations. People v Beardslee (1991) 53 C3d 68, 97, 279 CR 276; People v Gonzalez (1990) 51 C3d 1179, 1212, 275 CR 729. This mandatory duty to clear up any confusion expressed by the jury over instructions does not necessarily require the judge to give additional instructions. People v Gonzalez (1990) 51 C3d 1179, 1212, 275 CR 729. The court must notify all parties and give them an opportunity to be heard before giving additional instructions. See Pen C §1138. A criminal defendant has a constitutional right to appear with counsel and present argument at any conference during deliberations concerning additional instructions requested by the jury. People v Hawthorne (1992) 4 C4th 43, 68, 14 CR2d 133; People v Lozano (1987) 192 CA3d 618, 623, 237 CR 612; People v Dagnino (1978) 80 CA3d 981, 985, 146 CR 129. See also §33.24. Counsel should be prepared to demand an examination of the court's supplemental instruction before it is given or, if already given, to record an objection to a damaging instruction. Generally, harmless error analysis applies when an appellate court is considering a claim that the trial court failed to clarify instructions. See Beardslee v Woodford (9th Cir 2004) 358 F3d 560, 575.

© The Regents of the University of California

§32.38 D. Instruction When Alternate Juror Substituted

If a juror is excused during deliberations and an alternate is substituted, the jurors must be informed that they must begin their deliberations anew. People v Collins (1976) 17 C3d 687, 691, 131 CR 782. See Pen C §1089; CALCRIM 3575. The trial court's instructions must make it clear that jurors cannot just bring the alternate "up to speed." People v Odle (1988) 45 C3d 386, 405, 247 CR 137.

§33.1 I. OVERVIEW

After reading the instructions to the jurors, the judge instructs them on how to deliberate and asks the bailiff to take them to the jury room. The judge may sequester jurors, but this is rarely done.

Once jurors retire to the jury room, they select a foreperson. Jurors may ask for testimony to be reread, ask the judge to clarify instructions (Pen C §1138; People v Stewart (1983) 145 CA3d 967, 193 CR 799), and ask to view the scene or an object outside the courtroom (Pen C §1119).

Jurors must confine their deliberations to the evidence. They must not read newspaper accounts of the case, communicate with nonjurors about the case, consult with experts about the case, or conduct an unauthorized view of the scene. See People v Honeycutt (1977) 20 C3d 150, 156, 141 CR 698.

In unusual circumstances, the judge will allow counsel to reopen the case to present new evidence (People v Frohner (1976) 65 CA3d 94, 110, 135 CR 153), but this rarely occurs.

Occasionally, jurors ask to be excused from the case during deliberations for reasons such as illness or serious family problems, or counsel seeks to dismiss a juror for misconduct. If this occurs, the better practice is for the judge to conduct a hearing unless the attorneys stipulate that the juror may be dismissed for good cause. However, a hearing is not always required. In re Mendes (1979) 23 C3d 847, 852, 153 CR 831. If the attorneys do not stipulate to the juror's dismissal, the judge must find "good cause" before excusing the juror. Pen C §1089. If alternate jurors were chosen during jury selection, one of them may replace the excused juror, and the jury must begin deliberations anew. People v Collins (1976) 17 C3d 687, 694, 131 CR 782. If no alternates were selected, the judge must declare a mistrial. CCP §233.

If a judge excuses a juror without the attorneys' stipulation and without good cause, the defendant has been placed in jeopardy and is entitled to a dismissal. Larios v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 324, 333, 155 CR 374.

When jurors have either reached a verdict or believe that they are unable to reach a verdict, they tell the bailiff, who informs the judge. The judge notifies the attorneys and, when they are present in court, has the bailiff bring in the jury.

If jurors state that they are unable to reach a verdict, and there is more than one charge, the judge should ask whether jurors have reached a verdict on any of the counts. If they have, the judge should take that verdict and either declare a mistrial or have jurors continue deliberating on the remaining counts. See Pen C §§1140, 1160. When the judge is satisfied that there is no reasonable possibility that jurors will agree on a verdict, or when the parties consent, he or she must discharge the jury and declare a mistrial. Pen C §1140. The judge must not try to force minority jurors to change their position. People v Gainer (1977) 19 C3d 835, 842, 139 CR 861.

Practice varies concerning preparation of verdict forms. In some counties it is common for the clerk to prepare them. In other counties, the party who seeks a verdict on a particular charge prepares a verdict form for that charge. Verdict forms are given to jurors by the bailiff. Jurors are given the choice of two verdicts for each crime charged (guilty/not guilty), and enhancement (e.g., used a firearm/did not use a firearm). Verdict forms must also be given for lesser included offenses of the crimes charged. See §32.8. When special defenses have been pleaded (e.g., once in jeopardy), jurors are given additional verdict forms to cover those.

The common practice is for the foreperson to give the verdict forms filled out by the jury to the bailiff, who gives them to the judge. The judge looks at them, and then gives them to the court clerk, who reads them aloud.

Verdicts are sometimes inconsistent, e.g., guilty of one count and not another that arose from the same fact situation, or guilty for one codefendant and not another. They are not void, however, if substantial evidence supports them. People v Taylor (1948) 88 CA2d 983, 199 P2d 751.

Irregularity in verdict forms may also occur. For example, jurors may sign both guilty and not guilty forms for the same charge, or they may add a note to the verdict form requesting leniency for the defendant. The court has a great deal of flexibility in handling these problems. If the jury has not been discharged, the court may ask them to correct their error. See Pen C §1161.

If an error is not discovered before the jury is discharged, defense counsel may raise it on appeal. Counsel must show prejudice to secure a reversal. See *People v Bonilla*s (1989) 48 C3d 757, 770, 257 CR 895 (error discovered before jury discharged; judgment affirmed). If the jury found the defendant guilty but neglected to state the degree of the offense, it is deemed to be the lesser degree. Pen C §1157.

§33.3 III. JUDGE'S DIRECTIONS TO JURORS ON HOW TO CONDUCT THEIR DELIBERATIONS

At the close of instructions on the law, the judge reads the jurors general instructions on how to conduct their deliberations. Jurors are instructed that they are impartial judges of the facts. See CALCRIM 3550. Jurors are instructed that each of them must decide the case for himself or herself, but only after they have discussed the evidence together as part of their duty to deliberate. See CALCRIM 3550. Jurors are told to approach deliberations with an open mind, and to refrain from expressing a final opinion too soon. See CALCRIM 3550. Jurors may not conduct any independent investigation concerning the case or discuss the case with others during deliberations. See CALCRIM 3550. Jurors are told to select a foreperson and that in order to reach a verdict, all 12 jurors must agree. See CALCRIM 3550. The judge should admonish jurors, both at the close of instructions on the law and at any adjournment of the court before deliberations begin, not to talk to anyone about the case until they have rendered a verdict. Pen C §1122. See CALCRIM 124, 3550. See §33.5 on admonition to jurors not to discuss the case.

The court must be careful not to place specific time pressures on jurors or to predict how long it should take them to decide an issue or to reach a verdict. People v Anderson (1990) 52 C3d 453, 469, 276 CR 356.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.4 IV. JUDGE'S DIRECTIONS TO BAILIFF

After the jury has been instructed and is about to retire, the bailiff is sworn. The bailiff is to keep jurors together in a private place and not permit anyone to talk to them or communicate with them. Pen C §1128.

It is improper for anyone to communicate or attempt to communicate with jurors (other than the bailiff, in accordance with his or her oath). Pen C §§95, 1121. An improper communication can include the transmission of books or papers, threats, intimidation, persuasion, promises, or assurances. Further, the bailiff is not to communicate with jurors unless ordered to, or to ask them if they have agreed on a verdict. Pen C §1128.

The bailiff is to take charge of any alternate jurors and to keep them available but separate from nonjurors and from regular jurors during deliberations. People v Collins (1976) 17 C3d 687, 694, 131 CR 782. Alternates return to court each time regular jurors do, e.g., to hear rereading of testimony, and go with jurors when they eat meals or are sequestered. People v Collins, supra. However, the judge may instead admonish alternates and allow them to go about their business subject to recall if the parties stipulate to this. Alternate jurors are not discharged until the case is over. Pen C §1089.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.5 V. TIME AND PLACE OF DELIBERATIONS; ADMONISHING JURORS NOT TO DISCUSS CASE

The judge designates the time and place for deliberation. The bailiff takes jurors to a room where they can conduct their deliberations without being overheard. See CALCRIM 3550. The judge can permit jurors to return to their homes each day at the close of deliberations, or can sequester them, ordering a bailiff to keep charge of them at all times during deliberations. Whether to sequester or not is left to the sound discretion of the judge. See People v Manson (1977) 71 CA3d 1, 27, 139 CR 275. Sequestering jurors is not mandatory even in capital cases and is, in fact, rare. People v Morales (1989) 48 C3d 527, 563, 257 CR 64.

At each adjournment, the jurors must be admonished by the court not to converse among themselves or with anyone else on any subject related to the trial. Pen C §1122. The failure to re-admonish a jury is not reversible error, however, unless both an objection was made in the trial court and prejudice is shown on appeal. 48 C3d at 565.

"Adjournment" means the time when the court continues proceedings to another day. Any continuance of a lesser period is a "recess" and does not require the same admonition mentioned in §1122. People v Moore (1971) 15 CA3d 851, 93 CR 447. Often, after the complete admonition is given a few times, counsel will stipulate that the complete admonition need not be given as long as the judge asks jurors to heed the original admonition. People v Zurica (1964) 225 CA2d 25, 34, 37 CR 118.

> Ø Note: CALCRIM 101, which is to be given to the jury after jury selection, includes the admonition that jurors must not "read, listen to, or watch any news report or commentary about the case." See §14.30 on jury instructions for cases with extensive pretrial publicity.

The court usually directs the bailiff to take the jurors to meals during the course of deliberations. If the alternates have not been placed on call, they are to remain with the regular jurors. There should be no deliberations or discussion of the case during this time. Although the trial judge has the discretion to permit jurors to separate at mealtime, some courts provide lunch to jurors. If the bailiff takes jurors to lunch, the bailiff must keep them from separating during mealtime. See Pen C §1181(3) (separation of jury without court's permission after retiring to deliberate is grounds for new trial). Permitting three jurors to go 25 feet away to a bar for drinks during lunch required a new trial in People v Thornton (1888) 74 C 482, 484, 16 P 244.

If the jurors are sequestered and must be lodged overnight, the court must provide separate rooms for male and female jurors. Pen C §1128.

The court may adjourn deliberations (Pen C §1121), but a lengthy adjournment for the judge's personal reasons can be an abuse of discretion (People v Santamaria (1991) 229 CA3d 269, 280 CR 43).

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.6 VI. ALTERNATES EXCLUDED; DELIBERATIONS BEGIN ANEW IF ALTERNATE SEATED

Alternates are not permitted in the jury room during deliberations. People v Adame (1973) 36 CA3d 402, 409, 111 CR 462 (reversible error even though alternate did not participate in deliberations). But see U.S. v Olano (1993) 507 US 725, 123 L Ed 2d 508, 113 S Ct 1770 (reversal on appeal required only if harm resulted). As with many other rules, counsel can waive the objection. People v Valles (1979) 24 C3d 121, 123, 154 CR 543 (defense attorney's stipulation allowing alternate in jury room waived any subsequent objection).

If a juror is excused during deliberations and an alternate is seated, the judge must instruct jurors to begin their deliberations all over again. See CALCRIM 3575. An alternate juror may be seated after a verdict or partial verdict is in as long as the jury is instructed to disregard all deliberations on the remaining counts and begin anew. People v Aikens (1988) 207 CA3d 209, 254 CR 30. See also People v Thomas (1990) 218 CA3d 1477, 1486, 267 CR 865. However, it is not reversible error to instruct the jury to discard the partial verdicts it reached before an alternate juror is seated, particularly if all counsel agree to so proceed. People v Sanborn (2005) 133 CA4th 1462, 1468, 35 CR3d 592.

In a capital case, when an alternate is seated after the guilt phase but before submission of the penalty phase, the alternate juror must accept all the verdicts and findings returned by the jury in the guilt phase. CALCRIM 3576. While it is unclear if CALCRIM 3576 must be given sua sponte, the preferred approach is to give it when relevant. See Bench Notes to CALCRIM 3576.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.7 VII. CHOOSING FOREPERSON

Jurors are instructed to choose a foreperson. See CALCRIM 3550. This is usually the first thing they do after retiring. The judge is not to appoint, order, or designate the person to head the jury. Jurors may change their minds after initially selecting a foreperson and select a new one. People v Perez (1989) 212 CA3d 395, 402, 260 CR 474.

© The Regents of the University of California

VIII. MATERIALS ALLOWED IN JURY ROOM

§33.8 A. In General

The trial judge has discretion to permit jurors to take materials into the jury room that are not prejudicial. People v Potter (1966) 240 CA2d 621, 633, 49 CR 892; People v Walker (1957) 150 CA2d 594, 603, 310 P2d 110. It is better practice for the judge to discuss with counsel what will be sent into the jury room before sending it in. The judge has discretion to refuse to send jurors material they are entitled to have if the request for the material is made only by counsel. People v Horowitz (1945) 70 CA2d 675, 704, 161 P2d 833.

There are limits on what may be brought into the jury room. For example, jurors should not be permitted to bring their cell phones into the jury room because of the danger of violating Pen C §1128. People v Fauber (1992) 2 C4th 792, 837, 9 CR2d 24. See §33.13 on the procedure for answering jurors' requests.

§33.9 B. Papers, Notes, Exhibits, and Pleadings

Jurors are entitled to take with them most papers that were received in evidence and their own notes. Pen C §1137. See CALCRIM 202. The court has a sua sponte duty to instruct jurors that they may take notes. See Bench Notes to CALCRIM 202. On request, the court must give additional adequate instruction on note-taking. People v Guzman (1988) 45 C3d 915, 948, 248 CR 467, overruled on other grounds in Price v Superior Court (2001) 25 C4th 1046, 1069 n13, 108 CR2d 409. Jurors must not take depositions into the jury room (Pen C §1137) and probably may not take transcripts of the trial or preliminary hearing (see §33.11).

The material that may be brought into the jury room has been interpreted to include exhibits, although neither side has a right to have exhibits sent into the deliberation room unless the jury requests them. People v Horowitz (1945) 70 CA2d 675, 704, 161 P2d 833. If the jury requests exhibits after deliberations begin, the court should advise counsel of the request and conduct a hearing in open court, permitting objections by counsel. People v Hogan (1982) 31 C3d 815, 849, 183 CR 817, overruled on other grounds in People v Cooper (1991) 53 C3d 771, 836, 281 CR 90 (jury request for exhibits is critical stage of prosecution; right to counsel applies).

Exhibits marked only for identification must not be sent into the deliberation room. However, prejudice must be shown on appeal; it will not be presumed. See People v Horowitz, supra; People v Herrera (1917) 32 CA 610, 614, 163 P 879.

Diagrams may be sent in to jurors, but the court has discretion to refuse a request from counsel that they be given to jurors. On request, however, diagrams must be given to them. People v Cochran (1882) 61 C 548. The pleadings may also be sent into the deliberation room (People v Rosoto (1962) 58 C2d 304, 356, 23 CR 779; People v Walther (1938) 27 CA2d 583, 593, 81 P2d 452).

§33.10 C. Clothing, Photographs, Tape Recordings, Records, and Books

It is proper to send in items received in evidence (Pen C §1137), such as clothing (People v Hower (1907) 151 C 638, 645, 91 P 507) and photographs (People v Williams (1960) 187 CA2d 355, 366, 9 CR 722). However, discretion must be exercised in determining which photographs may be taken into the jury room. For example, gruesome photographs of a victim's body that might tend to inflame the jury, and that are cumulative of other evidence, should not be allowed in the jury room. People v Smith (1973) 33 CA3d 51, 69, 108 CR 698.

Jurors may listen to tape recordings placed in evidence, such as the defendant's confession (see People v Walker (1957) 150 CA2d 594, 603, 310 P2d 110), recordings of events surrounding police activities (see People v Douglas (1977) 66 CA3d 998, 1006, 136 CR 358), and phonograph records (People v Manson (1976) 61 CA3d 102, 214, 132 CR 265). When only part of a recording is admissible, however, care should be taken that jurors hear only the admissible portion. People v Clair (1992) 2 C4th 629, 7 CR2d 564 (inadmissible portion heard by jury; no prejudice shown). Transcripts of tape-recorded evidence may also be brought into the jury room. People v Fujita (1974) 43 CA3d 454, 473, 117 CR 757.

Dictionaries are not allowed in the jury room. People v Karis (1988) 46 C3d 612, 642 n22, 250 CR 659. Bringing Bible passages into the jury room and passing them around to other jurors is misconduct. People v Danks (2004) 32 C4th 269, 308, 8 CR3d 767.

§33.11 D. Transcripts of Court Proceedings and Instructions

Trial or preliminary hearing transcripts probably cannot be sent into the jury room. See People v Stevenson (1978) 79 CA3d 976, 990, 145 CR 301 (error for jurors to be given edited transcript of preliminary hearing testimony of two prosecution witnesses while it was being read to jurors); People v Manson (1976) 61 CA3d 102, 214, 132 CR 265 (court noted that Pen C §1137 excepts depositions from items that may be sent into jury room and likened trial transcript to deposition).

Instructions given to jurors must be in writing and legible, but it is acceptable to send in deletions and additions, as well as indicating whether the instruction was asked to be given by the prosecution or the defense. The better practice, however, is to give jurors a clean copy with no changes and no indication of who offered them. People v Welborn (1966) 242 CA2d 668, 677, 51 CR 644; People v Fisher (1911) 16 CA 271, 274, 116 P 688.

The court must supply a copy of the written instructions if the jury requests them (Pen C §§1093(f), 1137; People v Blakley (1992) 6 CA4th 1019, 8 CR2d 219), but not if the request comes only from counsel (People v Sheldon (1989) 48 C3d 935, 943, 258 CR 242). If instructions are sent in to jurors, all instructions, not just selected ones, must be provided. People v Wingo (1973) 34 CA3d 974, 984, 110 CR 448.

As a practical matter, the court routinely sends at least one copy of the written instructions to the jury room, and it is increasingly common to provide multiple copies of the instructions to the jury. When jurors request one or more instructions to be reread after their deliberations have begun, the judge must consult with counsel before responding to the request; otherwise, it is constitutional (right to counsel) and statutory (Pen C §1138) error. People v Dagnino (1978) 80 CA3d 981, 990, 146 CR 129 (case reversed because judge gave jurors written instructions without consulting counsel; Chapman standard applied (Chapman v California (1967) 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824)). For further discussion, see §33.13.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.12 E. Experiments

Jurors have been permitted to do experiments in the jury room as long as new evidence does not result and it amounts to no more than a careful examination of the evidence. People v Cooper (1979) 95 CA3d 844, 853, 157 CR 348. For example, jurors may use a magnifying glass to examine photographs (People v Turner (1971) 22 CA3d 174, 182, 99 CR 186) and may insert keys into a lock and safe to see if the keys fit (People v Bogle (1995) 41 CA4th 770, 777, 48 CR2d 739).

IX. QUESTIONS AND REQUESTS DURING DELIBERATIONS

§33.13 A. Procedure for Answering Jurors' Questions and Requests

The court must stay open for every purpose connected with a case until jurors reach a verdict. Pen C §1142. The bailiff is to communicate all questions and requests by jurors to the trial judge without responding to them. Pen C §1138. It is error for the trial court to fail to answer jury questions that are proper legal inquiries. People v Thoi (1989) 213 CA3d 689, 697, 261 CR 789 (error was waived or invited by counsel).

The trial court should not answer questions from the jury, regardless of how insignificant, without first communicating with counsel. The defendant is entitled to counsel's assistance at this stage of the proceedings. Pen C §1138; US Const amend VI; People v Lozano (1987) 192 CA3d 618, 237 CR 612. See Musladin v Lamarque (9th Cir 2009) 555 F3d 830, 842.

Also, it is improper for the judge to have a private communication with a jury. People v Vinson (1981) 121 CA3d 80, 83, 175 CR 123. Any error, however, is judged by the harmless error standard on appeal. People v Mickle (1991) 54 C3d 140, 174, 284 CR 511 (court received note from jury and judge wrote on note that jurors could request reread; harmless error).

It is improper for a judge to enter the jury room without counsel and communicate with jurors. People v Bradford (2007) 154 CA4th 1390, 65 CR3d 548 (judgment reversed; judge entered jury room during deliberations, unaccompanied by counsel and with no court reporter, on four occasions); People v Thompson (1990) 50 C3d 134, 173, 266 CR 309 (error harmless because judge merely gave jurors verdict form for lesser included offense he had forgotten to give them earlier). When the court receives a communication from the jury, the court should notify counsel, communicate the jury's questions to them, and allow counsel to be heard on the record out of the jury's presence. People v Hogan (1982) 31 C3d 815, 848, 183 CR 817, overruled on other grounds in People v Cooper (1991) 53 C3d 771, 836, 281 CR 90. But see People v McCoy (2005) 133 CA4th 974, 35 CR3d 366 (readback of testimony outside presence of defendant and defense counsel was permissible). The judge should then settle on an answer, call in the jury, clarify and restate the problem or question, and answer it. Unless counsel objects, the court can permit deliberations to continue while the answer is drafted. People v McCleod (1997) 55 CA4th 1205, 1220, 64 CR2d 545. The defendant must be in court when the jurors' questions are answered (see Pen C §1138) but need not be there while the judge and counsel are discussing the jury's questions (People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1026, 264 CR 386). If the jury still has questions, the safest approach is to excuse the jury, settle on an answer on the record with counsel, then call back the jury and answer the question.

The defendant's right to be present for jury questions may be waived, even in a capital case. People v Odle (1988) 45 C3d 386, 247 CR 137; People v Ainsworth (1988) 45 C3d 984, 248 CR 568. A written waiver of the defendant's right to be present should be obtained, but on appeal the failure to do so is harmless error if no prejudice is shown. People v Medina (1990) 51 C3d 870, 902, 274 CR 849, aff'd on other grounds sub nom Medina v California (1992) 505 US 437, 120 L Ed 2d 353, 112 S Ct 2572. Similarly, counsel may waive his or her own right to be present. 51 C3d at 904. In contrast, People v McCoy (2005) 133 CA4th 974, 35 CR3d 366, held that despite the objection of defense counsel, the readback of testimony to the jury in the absence of the defendant and defense counsel did not violate defendant's right to counsel or due process, concluding that unlike jury questions, readback is not a critical stage of the proceedings for which the presence of counsel is constitutionally compelled. On what is and is not a critical stage of criminal proceedings, see §3.2.

Ø Note: If the court's communication with the jury exceeds the scope of counsel's waiver or stipulation, the error is of constitutional dimension. People v Rubalcava (1988) 200 CA3d 295, 246 CR 75 (counsel and defendant waived right to be present for jury questions that were neither complex nor required any research; court's explanation of reasonable-doubt instruction in counsel's absence held error).

§33.14 B. Objecting to Improper Communication Between Judge or Bailiff and Jury

Counsel may object to improper communication between the judge or bailiff and jury by assigning the act as misconduct and requesting a mistrial or an admonition. See California Trial Objections, chap 29 (Cal CEB Annual). Counsel may object and request an admonition or move for a mistrial whether or not the court attempts to correct the problem. See People v Woods (1950) 35 C2d 504, 511, 218 P2d 981 (judge; affirmed, no prejudice); People v Weatherford (1945) 27 C2d 401, 418, 164 P2d 753 (bailiff; reversed).

If counsel feels that an acquittal or a favorable verdict is likely, counsel may make a tactical decision not to make the motion. In that event, counsel should at least object and request an admonition to preserve the issue for appellate review. People v House (1970) 12 CA3d 756, 765, 90 CR 831, disapproved on other grounds in People v Beagle (1972) 6 C3d 441, 451, 99 CR 313. If an activity of the trial court was so prejudicial that it could not have been cured by an objection or admonition, the appellate court may consider the claim of error despite failure to object or move for a mistrial. See People v Chagolla (1983) 144 CA3d 422, 432, 193 CR 711 (inadequate objection; rule stated, but error did not require reversal).

Prosecutors seldom move for mistrial, both because of the cost of a retrial and because prosecutors usually achieve guilty verdicts. Therefore, when a judge has communicated privately with jurors, the prosecutor will usually oppose a motion for mistrial and take precautions so that the judge is not reversed on appeal. To reduce the possibility of reversal on appeal, the prosecutor may suggest a strong cautionary instruction or admonition to the court and recommend that the judge make findings to protect the record by explaining the court's activity and reasons for denying the motion for mistrial.

Ø Note: Under Cal Rules of Ct 8.320(b)(5), the record on a defense appeal must include all written communications to and from the jury.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.15 C. Jury's Request for Reread

The trial court must not refuse a reasonable jury request for testimony to be read back if there is a disagreement over the testimony. Pen C §1138; People v Cooks (1983) 141 CA3d 224, 260, 190 CR 211 (affirmed); People v Butler (1975) 47 CA3d 273, 120 CR 647 (reversed). If the jury requests a rereading of particular testimony, it is error not to read all that is requested. People v Ainsworth (1988) 45 C3d 984, 1020, 248 CR 568 (error held harmless).

The trial judge need not be present during rereading unless good cause is shown. Pen C §1138.5. Nor is the defendant required to be present during the rereading. People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 251, 10 CR2d 636; People v Douglas (1990) 50 C3d 468, 517, 268 CR 126; People v Lang (1989) 49 C3d 991, 1028, 264 CR 386. A written waiver of the defendant's right to be present should be obtained, but on appeal any error in procedure is harmless if no prejudice is shown. People v Medina (1990) 51 C3d 870, 902, 274 CR 849, aff'd on other grounds sub nom Medina v California (1992) 505 US 437, 120 L Ed 2d 353, 112 S Ct 2572. Defense counsel has the right to be present but can waive that right. 51 C3d at 904. (There is no discussion of this issue in Medina v California, supra.) But see People v McCoy (2005) 133 CA4th 974, 35 CR3d 366 (Fifth District held that readback of victim testimony to jury when defendant and defense counsel were not present did not violate defendant's right to counsel or due process, despite defense counsel's objection to readback in their absence, citing dicta in People v Cox (2003) 30 C4th 916, 963, 135 CR2d 272, disapproved on other grounds in People v Doolin (2009) 45 C4th 390, 421 n22, 87 CR3d 209, that "the rereading of testimony is not a critical stage of the proceedings").

Ø Note: Defense counsel and the prosecutor should consider being present during the rereading in the event the reporter mistakenly rereads unrequested testimony, or testimony that was ruled inadmissible.

The procedure to be followed for considering the request is the same as that discussed in §33.13.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.16 D. Jury's Request for Clarification of Law

If the jury asks to be informed on a point of law, the court usually rereads instructions relevant to that issue, gives jurors written copies of the instructions already given, or gives additional instructions. Comments that diverge from the instructions in the case are usually risky. See People v Beardslee (1991) 53 C3d 68, 97, 279 CR 276.

Because this is a critical stage of the proceedings, a judge's failure to discuss the jury's request with counsel, and have them present when the judge discusses the law with jurors, requires reversal on appeal if the defendant was prejudiced by the error. People v Rubalcava (1988) 200 CA3d 295, 300, 246 CR 75; People v Stewart (1983) 145 CA3d 967, 972, 193 CR 799. For further discussion of procedure to be followed, see §33.13.

If jurors request a point of law clarification and the trial court does not answer, or answers improperly, the error will be considered harmless on appeal unless prejudice is shown. People v Beardslee (1991) 53 C3d 68, 97, 279 CR 276. But see People v Gonzales (1999) 74 CA4th 382, 390, 88 CR2d 111 (prejudice shown).

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.17 E. Jury's Request to View Scene or Object Outside Courtroom

The court can order the jury transported to view the crime scene or an object that cannot conveniently be brought into court. Pen C §1119. Doing so is a discretionary decision. See People v Keltie (1983) 148 CA3d 773, 782, 196 CR 243 (no error to deny defense motion to view scene, because other means existed to introduce desired evidence); People v Peggese (1980) 102 CA3d 415, 421, 162 CR 510 (denial of jury's request to view scene not abuse of discretion). When a trial court authorizes a jury to view the crime scene during a criminal trial, the defendant and defense counsel have a right to be present during the jury view. People v Bush (1886) 68 C 623, 631. The defendant and defense counsel also have the right to be present if the jury makes a return visit to the crime scene after deliberations have begun. People v Garcia (2005) 36 C4th 777, 782, 31 CR3d 541. The right to be present may be waived by the defendant. See, e.g., People v Moon (2005) 37 C4th 1, 19, 32 CR3d 894.

Although jurors must not make unauthorized visits to the crime scene, error is usually not found when that occurs. See, e.g., People v Tedesco (1934) 1 C2d 211, 221, 34 P2d 467.

In a jury view of the scene, there must be a contemporaneous objection to preserve for appeal any issue, e.g., unauthorized jury questions, demonstrations, and receipt of evidence. People v Wisely (1990) 224 CA3d 939, 274 CR 291.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.18 F. Jury's Consideration of Greater and Lesser Offenses

A jury has the power to return verdicts on some counts and to continue deliberating on others. See Pen C §§1140, 1160; People v Allen (1974) 41 CA3d 821, 116 CR 493. This rule was expanded in Stone v Superior Court (1982) 31 C3d 503, 183 CR 647, to apply to cases in which a jury also considers lesser offenses. Stone held that in this situation the trial court should provide the jury with forms for a verdict of guilty and not guilty for each lesser and charged offense. The greater and lesser verdicts may be placed on a single verdict form. People v Gammage (1992) 2 C4th 693, 7 CR2d 541.

Although the jury may consider and discuss lesser offenses at any time during deliberations, a not guilty verdict on the greater offense must be returned before a verdict on a lesser offense. People v Zapata (1992) 9 CA4th 527, 533, 12 CR2d 118, disapproved on other grounds in People v Fields (1996) 13 C4th 289, 305, 52 CR2d 282. See People v Kurtzman (1988) 46 C3d 322, 250 CR 244; Stone v Superior Court (1982) 31 C3d 503, 519, 183 CR 647. See CALCRIM 3517.

When deliberations appear to be at an impasse, the trial court may ask the jury if it is unable to reach a verdict. If the jury is deadlocked, the court may ask whether jurors were able to eliminate any offense. If the jury states that it is unanimous for acquittal on the greater offense, but hopelessly deadlocked on a lesser offense, the court must accept a partial verdict of not guilty on the greater offense if the court is satisfied that the jury is not merely expressing a tentative vote but has completed its deliberations. Stone v Superior Court (1982) 31 C3d 503, 519, 183 CR 647. If jurors are still deliberating, the court should allow them to continue. People v Dixon (1979) 24 C3d 43, 154 CR 236.

If the jury is discharged without making a finding on the greater charge, but with a finding on the lesser charge, the defendant is deemed acquitted on the greater charge. Pen C §1157; People v Bordeaux (1990) 224 CA3d 573, 273 CR 717. If the jury is discharged after hanging on the greater charge, but with a finding on the lesser charge, the defendant is not deemed acquitted on the greater charge, based on US Const amend V. Retrial is barred nevertheless under Pen C §1023 (conviction of lesser included offense bars subsequent prosecution for greater offense). People v Fields (1996) 13 C4th 289, 305, 52 CR2d 282. See also §33.36 on when jury is discharged; §§8.41, 26.25 on lesser included offenses.

§33.19 X. REQUEST BY COUNSEL TO REOPEN EVIDENCE OR ARGUMENT

During jury deliberations, either counsel may request that the jury be returned to court and the case reopened. This extraordinary measure requires a showing by the proponent that newly discovered evidence will be presented, and that due diligence would not have produced it earlier. People v Frohner (1976) 65 CA3d 94, 110, 135 CR 153. Granting or denying the motion rests within the sound discretion of the court. People v Gaines (1966) 247 CA2d 141, 148, 55 CR 283 (court did not reopen case when jurors asked for additional evidence; no error because defense counsel made no objection or motion); People v Richardson (1961) 192 CA2d 166, 169, 13 CR 321 (People permitted to reopen). It is common for the court to allow each attorney a brief argument on the new testimony.

If additional instructions suggesting a new theory of liability are given during deliberations, defense counsel may waive any due process objection by not seeking leave to reopen argument. People v Bishop (1996) 44 CA4th 220, 235, 51 CR2d 629.

XI. PROCEDURE FOR DETERMINING WHETHER TO EXCUSE JUROR DURING DELIBERATIONS

A. Juror Misconduct

§33.20 1. Checklist: Common Types of Juror Misconduct

- Asserting special expertise in evaluating scientific evidence, based on juror's background. In re Malone (1996) 12 C4th 935, 963, 50 CR2d 281 (harmless error).
- Bias or prejudgment of the case. People v Nesler (1997) 16 C4th 561, 580, 66 CR2d 454 (juror received prejudicial information from defendant's babysitter and repeatedly conveyed such information to other jurors during deliberations).
- Communicating with a third party about the case. People v Lewis (2009) 46 C4th 1255, 1305, 96 CR3d 512; People v Ault (2004) 33 C4th 1250, 1258, 17 CR3d 302 (juror discussed case with her manicurist and then related manicurist's viewpoint during deliberations); People v Danks (2004) 32 C4th 269, 304, 8 CR3d 767 (juror asked her pastor about Bible's stand on death penalty).
- Communicating with witness. People v Pierce (1979) 24 C3d 199, 155 CR 657.
- Conducting unauthorized view of scene. People v Sutter (1982) 134 CA3d 806, 819, 184 CR 829.
- Conducting experiments that produce new evidence on matter on trial. People v Castro (1986) 184 CA3d 849, 229 CR 280 (juror used binoculars outside courtroom to see whether witness was capable of identifying defendant).
- Consulting extraneous materials. People v Danks (2004) 32 C4th 269, 308, 8 CR3d 767 (passage from Bible); People v Ramos (2004) 34 C4th 494, 519, 21 CR3d 575 (newspaper article dealing with case); People v Karis (1988) 46 C3d 612, 250 CR 659 (dictionary definitions of words used in instructions); People v Harper (1986) 186 CA3d 1420, 231 CR 414 (dictionary definition of murder).
- Contradicting court interpreter's translation of witness's statement. People v Cabrera (1991) 230 CA3d 300, 281 CR 238 (one juror told others that particular word should have been interpreted as "push" rather than "touch" in molestation case, but error was harmless).
- Inattentiveness during deliberations. People v Bowers (2001) 87 CA4th 722, 728, 104 CR2d 726 (juror erroneously removed after other jurors mischaracterized his disagreement as inattentiveness).
- Language limitations. People v Elam (2001) 91 CA4th 298, 313, 110 CR2d 185 (juror erroneously removed after other jurors mischaracterized his legitimate disagreement over meaning of instructions as inadequate comprehension of English language).
- Refusing to deliberate. People v Leonard (2007) 40 C4th 1370, 1410, 58 CR3d 368; People v Engelman (2002) 28 C4th 436, 443, 121 CR2d 862.
- Refusing to follow the law. People v Williams (2001) 25 C4th 441, 447, 106 CR2d 295 (juror admitted that he would not follow court's instructions regarding the offense).
- Seeking legal advice from an attorney, even one not connected with the case. People v Honeycutt (1977) 20 C3d 150, 157, 141 CR 698.
- Sleeping. People v Bradford (1997) 15 C4th 1229, 1347, 65 CR2d 145; People v Bonilla (2007) 41 C4th 313, 350, 60 CR3d 209.
- Stating law erroneously to other jurors on the basis of juror's background. People v Marshall (1990) 50 C3d 907, 949, 269 CR 269 (juror was in law enforcement; misconduct, but harmless error).
- Untruthfulness during voir dire. People v Green (1995) 31 CA4th 1001, 38 CR2d 401 (no error in dismissing juror who falsely denied knowing defendant's family); People v Thomas (1990) 218 CA3d 1477, 1485, 267 CR 865 (trial court did not err in dismissing juror who was biased against police officers); People v Blackwell (1987) 191 CA3d 925, 236 CR 803 (reversed because juror's action deliberate).

- Introducing extrinsic material into the juryroom. People v Davis (2009) 46 C4th 539, 624, 94 CR3d 322; People v Mincey (1992) 2 C4th 408, 483, 6 CR2d 822.

§33.21 2. Remedies for Juror Misconduct

Juror misconduct is commonly raised as an issue either during trial, during deliberations, or in a motion for new trial. Possible remedies during trial are to:

- Attempt to cure the misconduct by admonishing jurors (People v Harper (1986) 186 CA3d 1420, 231 CR 414).
- Remove the juror for misconduct (People v Daniels (1991) 52 C3d 815, 863, 277 CR 122); the entire jury does not have to be discharged (People v Medina (1990) 51 C3d 870, 888, 274 CR 849; no discussion of this issue in Medina v California (1992) 505 US 437, 120 L Ed 2d 353, 112 S Ct 2572).
- Declare a mistrial (People v Daniels, supra).
- Order a hearing to determine whether misconduct was prejudicial (People v Bonilla (2007) 41 C4th 313, 350, 60 CR3d 209).
- Order a new trial. On new trial motions, see §§34.3-34.16.

On appeal, the standard for deciding whether juror misconduct requires reversal is whether the jury's impartiality was adversely affected, the burden of proof lightened, or a defense removed. People v Harper (1986) 186 CA3d 1420, 231 CR 414; People v Martinez (1978) 82 CA3d 1, 22, 147 CR 208.

Hearings on the issue of juror misconduct are discussed in §33.23. A checklist of common types of juror misconduct is in §33.20.

§33.22 B. Other Reasons for Excusing Jurors

Jurors may become unavailable or wish to be excused for many reasons other than juror misconduct, including illness, financial hardship, serious family problems, unexplainable absence, or disqualification because of personal information or knowledge (see CCP §233; Pen C §1089). See, e.g., People v Leonard (2007) 40 C4th 1370, 1408, 58 CR3d 368 (death of juror's father-in-law); People v Roberts (1992) 2 C4th 271, 6 CR2d 276 (sick juror); People v Hecker (1990) 219 CA3d 1238, 1244, 268 CR 884 (juror excluded because defendant had recently joined juror's church). Compare People v Delamora (1996) 48 CA4th 1850, 1855, 56 CR2d 382 (jurors erroneously excused after trial exceeded estimate and they asked court to contact their employers about extending paid time off), with People v Earp (1999) 20 C4th 826, 893, 85 CR2d 857 (juror properly excused because she did not wish to use up any more of her vacation leave).

§33.23 C. When Hearing Is Required to Determine Whether to Excuse Juror

The trial court has a duty to look into reports of juror misconduct. People v Burgener (1986) 41 C3d 505, 224 CR 112, overruled on other grounds in People v Reyes (1998) 19 C4th 743, 753, 80 CR2d 734 (court failed to conduct hearing on report of intoxicated juror; error, but not prejudicial). Although courts should promptly investigate allegations of juror misconduct, a court has broad discretion in the conduct of the investigation. People v Prieto (2003) 30 C4th 226, 274, 133 CR2d 18 (decision to postpone inquiry until after verdict was within trial court's discretion). When evidence is presented that indicates "a strong possibility that prejudicial misconduct has occurred," a hearing is required if the trial court determines one is necessary to resolve material, disputed issues of fact. People v Davis (2009) 46 C4th 539, 625, 94 CR3d 322. The hearing must be sufficiently thorough to determine whether good cause exists to discharge the juror. People v Keenan (1988) 46 C3d 478, 537, 250 CR 550.

If it comes to the court's attention during deliberations that a juror has any personal knowledge that could be a factor in the trial, the juror must return to court, be sworn as a witness, and be examined in the presence of counsel and the defendant so that the court can decide whether good cause exists to excuse the juror. Pen C §1120.

In some circumstances, the trial court was not required to conduct a hearing to decide whether good cause exists to excuse a juror. See People v Davis (2009) 46 C4th 539, 625, 94 CR3d 322 (foreman read jury a note sent to him by nonjuror); People v Kaurish (1990) 52 C3d 648, 694, 276 CR 788 (no inquiry required when juror called defense attorney a "son of a bitch"; comment indicated only exasperation at length of proceedings); In re Mendes (1979) 23 C3d 847, 852, 153 CR 831 (death in juror's family; permissible for court to excuse juror for good cause without consulting attorneys). However, the better practice is for the court to conduct a hearing. People v Dell (1991) 232 CA3d 248, 283 CR 361 (juror ill; better practice is to hold hearing before excusing juror).

§33.24 D. Conduct of Hearing to Determine Whether to Excuse Juror; Court's Ruling

Conduct of hearing. When the trial court conducts a hearing on whether to excuse a juror, it should be complete enough to determine whether good cause exists to excuse the juror. People v Manriquez (1976) 59 CA3d 426, 432, 130 CR 585. Informal hearings are common when a juror wishes to be discharged for something like illness or a family emergency. Even in these less formal hearings, however, the court and prosecutor should make sure the record is sufficient to show that the juror cannot function. People v Compton (1971) 6 C3d 55, 60, 98 CR 217. In conducting the hearing, the court should hear and consider evidence supporting each side's position and should avoid delegating the questioning solely to counsel, creating "an adversarial proceeding," putting a "juror on trial," or inquiring into deliberative thoughts. People v Barber (2002) 102 CA4th 145, 150, 124 CR2d 917.

Counsel and the defendant should be present at the hearing. In some circumstances, counsel may be excluded from the hearing, as long as he or she is given a transcript of it. People v Siripongs (1988) 45 C3d 548, 247 CR 729 (defense attorney excluded at defendant's request; no constitutional violation).

The court may take testimony but is not required to unless a juror has personal knowledge about the case (Pen C §1120). People v Keenan (1988) 46 C3d 478, 540, 250 CR 550. See also People v Hedgecock (1990) 51 C3d 395, 414, 272 CR 803 (in hearing on bailiff and jury misconduct, court has discretion to conduct evidentiary session at which jurors may testify). Counsel normally proceed by declaration.

> Ø Note: Declarations based on hearsay are not admissible to impeach a verdict. People v Williams (1988) 45 C3d 1268, 1318, 248 CR 834.

Evidence presented at a hearing on the issue of juror misconduct is limited to statements, conduct, conditions, or events involving a juror. In re Hamilton (1999) 20 C4th 273, 294, 84 CR2d 403; People v Hutchinson (1969) 71 C2d 342, 349, 78 CR 196. See Evid C §1150. No evidence is admissible to show the effect of any statement, conduct, condition, or event on a juror, or to show the mental process used in reaching the verdict. In re Hamilton, supra; U.S. v Dutkel (9th Cir 1999) 192 F3d 893, 899 ("court may not inquire into any juror's mental processes, but rather must focus on conduct"). See also §33.46.

It is often difficult for counsel to develop a complete record at this type of hearing. The discovery of juror misconduct is normally unanticipated, and when the misconduct is discovered during trial there is great pressure to settle the matter quickly. The importance of making a complete record, however, is demonstrated in People v Dyer (1988) 45 C3d 26, 246 CR 209. During voir dire, a juror answered that no member of her family had been a crime victim. Counsel subsequently learned that her brother had been shot and killed. The court held a hearing at which the juror testified that she considered the shooting to be an accident. A motion for mistrial was denied. On appeal, the defendant asked the court to take judicial notice of records that established that the juror's brother had been beaten and then shot in the back of the head. His death had been the subject of a criminal prosecution and a civil suit by the juror. The supreme court would not consider this information, because it had not been presented to the trial court. For further discussion of investigating juror misconduct, see §34.5.

Court's ruling. Proof of jury misconduct raises a presumption of prejudice that can be rebutted by proof that no prejudice actually resulted. People v Dorsey (1995) 34 CA4th 694, 40 CR2d 384 (juror left deliberations to smoke cigarette; alternate substituted for her; presumption rebutted). In removing a juror, the trial court must exercise its discretion with great care. To be upheld on review, a juror's disqualification must appear on the record as a "demonstrable reality." People v Barnwell (2007) 41 C4th 1038, 1052, 63 CR3d 82.

For discussion of when discharge of a jury may prevent a retrial, see §26.27.

XII. TERMINATION OF DELIBERATIONS

§33.25 A. Reasons for Terminating Deliberations

Trial may be terminated for many reasons. The most common is when the jury renders a verdict in open court. See Pen C §1140.

When the jurors cannot agree on a verdict, the judge has discretion to declare a mistrial or to order further deliberations. Pen C §§1140-1141. The decision on whether to discharge the jury because there is no reasonable probability that it can render a verdict is left to the judge's discretion. People v Rojas (1975) 15 C3d 540, 545, 125 CR 357. For further discussion, see §33.36. Limited noncoercive questioning of jurors about the usefulness of further deliberations in reaching a verdict is proper. People v Johnson (1992) 3 C4th 1183, 1252, 14 CR2d 702.

A mistrial may also be declared when the defendant consents to a mistrial by stipulation (see People v Terry (1970) 2 C3d 362, 386, 85 CR 409), or when a juror has been excused for good cause and no alternate is available (CCP §233). For further discussion of mistrials, see §§33.26, 33.45.

§33.26 B. Determining Whether Jurors Are Unable to Reach Verdict; Declaring Mistrial

If a judge suspects that the jury cannot reach a verdict, or if jurors so announce, the judge should direct the bailiff to bring the jury back into court. The judge should then attempt to learn whether there is any reasonable probability that the jury can reach a verdict. Pen C §1140; People v Miller (1990) 50 C3d 954, 993, 269 CR 492. The judge should first ask the foreperson if he or she believes the jury can reach a verdict (see People v Borousk (1972) 24 CA3d 147, 100 CR 867) and then question jurors individually on whether they feel a verdict can be reached.

It is permissible for the judge to ask what the numerical division is, without seeking to discover how many are for acquittal or conviction (e.g., ten to two, or five to seven). People v Rodriguez (1986) 42 C3d 730, 776, 230 CR 667.

> Ø Note: Federal courts do not allow judges to ask the numerical division. Brasfield v U.S. (1926) 272 US 448, 71 L Ed 345, 47 S Ct 135. This rule is not based on the U.S. Constitution and therefore does not need to be followed in California. People v Proctor (1992) 4 C4th 499, 538, 15 CR2d 340.

If the judge inadvertently discovers how many are in favor of conviction or acquittal, he or she must be very careful not to put added pressure on the minority jurors. The judge can only take measures to encourage agreement by advising jurors of their proper role in a manner that may assist them in their deliberations, but cannot admonish minority jurors to consider the preponderance of opinion, numerical division, or the cost or inconvenience of a retrial. People v Gainer (1977) 19 C3d 835, 852, 139 CR 861; People v Hinton (2004) 121 CA4th 655, 17 CR3d 437 (clear and prejudicial error for trial judge to give deadlocked jury a "dynamite" instruction); People v Yarbrow (1978) 86 CA3d 445, 150 CR 324.

The judge must also avoid coercing a verdict by attempting to influence the jury to consider compromise, thus depriving the defendant of the benefit of the jury's full and independent consideration. People v Peters (1982) 128 CA3d 75, 89, 180 CR 76. The court also must not express its belief in the defendant's guilt. People v Cook (1983) 33 C3d 400, 189 CR 159, overruled on other grounds by People v Rodriguez (1986) 42 C3d 730, 766, 230 CR 667. The court may, however, summarize and analyze the law. People v Rodriguez (1986) 42 C3d 730, 766, 230 CR 667.

After a jury reports that it has reached an impasse, the court may, in the presence of counsel, advise the jury of its duty to decide the case on the basis of the evidence while keeping an open mind and talking about the evidence with each other. The judge should ask the jury if it has specific concerns that, if resolved, might assist the jury in reaching a verdict. If the court determines that further action might assist the jury in reaching a verdict, it may give additional instructions, clarify previous instructions, or reopen argument, or any combination thereof. See Cal Rules of Ct 2.1036; People v Young (2007) 156 CA4th 1165, 1171, 67 CR3d 899 (reopening closing argument); People v Moore (2002) 96 CA4th 1105, 1118, 117 CR2d 715 (instruction to deadlocked jury that urges jurors to follow their individual judgments and does not urge them to listen to majority is not coercive).

When a jury is having difficulty reaching a verdict, it is proper to allow the jury to select a new foreperson, even if the person replaced is in the minority. People v Perez (1989) 212 CA3d 395, 402, 260 CR 474.

If jurors are deadlocked, the judge must declare a mistrial. Pen C §§1140-1141. The court, however, is not bound by the jury's determination that it is at an impasse. People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 265, 10 CR2d 636 (inquiry following foreman's note concerning inability to reach verdict not coercive); People v Johnson (1992) 3 C4th 1183, 1252, 14 CR2d 702 (no error in directing jury to continue deliberating after jury sent note saying it was deadlocked; when court questioned individual jurors, several thought verdict might be possible); People v Rodriguez (1986) 42 C3d 730, 775, 230 CR 667 (no mistrial after deliberations and five notes from jurors saying they were deadlocked).

For discussion of partial and incomplete verdicts, see §§33.27-33.28, 33.32.

XIII. GENERAL AND SPECIAL VERDICTS

§33.27 A. Definition of Verdict

A verdict is reached in a criminal case when all 12 jurors impaneled to try the case have agreed on the issues submitted to them. Cal Const art I, §16; People v Superior Court (Thomas) (1967) 67 C2d 929, 64 CR 327. The only other requirement is that on reaching this agreement they must be brought into the courtroom to declare their verdict. See Pen C §§1147, 1149. Thus, the jurors' assent in court is the "true return of the verdict." People v Lankford (1976) 55 CA3d 203, 211, 127 CR 408; see People v Hernandez (1985) 163 CA3d 645, 209 CR 809; People v Mestas (1967) 253 CA2d 780, 786, 61 CR 731.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.28 B. Written Verdict Forms

Although the oral statement of consensus in open court is the true verdict (People v Lankford (1976) 55 CA3d 203, 211, 127 CR 408), the use of written verdict forms is universal and has been the cause of considerable appellate discussion. No specific format is required.

Counsel's failure to object to whatever forms are eventually submitted may preclude a successful attack on them on appeal. See People v Rogers (1931) 112 CA 615, 297 P 924. In view of this, it is advisable for counsel to make any objections to a specific form on the record before the forms are submitted to the jury.

Specific forms of verdict are called for when allegations in the charging document call for enhanced punishment if certain facts are found true, e.g., armed with or use of a deadly weapon or firearm (Pen C §§12022(a), 12022.3, 12022.5, 12022.53).

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.29 C. General Verdict

There are two types of verdict: general and special. The most common form of verdict is the general verdict, which must be given in a misdemeanor case. See Pen C §1150. The statutorily prescribed form for the general verdict is "guilty" or "not guilty." On a plea of "once in jeopardy," the general verdict is "for the People" or "for the defendant."

Aside from these statutory requirements, no particular form of general verdict is required. A verdict will be found sufficient if it clearly shows the jury's intention. See Bigelow v Superior Court (1989) 208 CA3d 1127, 256 CR 528. No great detail is required. A guide to determining the sufficiency of a verdict is whether it can be understood to relate to the allegations of the accusatory pleading. See People v Beltran (1949) 93 CA2d 704, 209 P2d 635. For example, "guilty as charged in Count One of the information" is sufficient. See People v Fisher (1948) 86 CA2d 24, 30, 194 P2d 116.

If the crime is divided into degrees and jurors fail to specify the degree, a finding of guilt will be deemed to be of the lesser degree. Pen C §1157; People v Beamon (1973) 8 C3d 625, 629, 105 CR 681. However, if jurors are instructed only on a felony-murder theory that is first degree murder as a matter of law, their guilty verdict will be deemed a finding of first degree murder. People v Mendoza (2000) 23 C4th 896, 908, 98 CR2d 431. See also §33.40.

For discussion of necessarily lesser included offenses, see §§8.41, 26.25, 32.8.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.30 D. Special Verdict

The special verdict is not often used, but it is dealt with by statute (see, e.g., Pen C §§1152-1156) and by case law (see People v Bratis (1977) 73 CA3d 751, 762, 141 CR 45, and cases cited there). When a special verdict is used, the jury finds the facts only and the judge draws conclusions of law from those facts. A special verdict can be returned in any felony case other than a criminal libel case, but only when a jury is in doubt about the legal effect of the facts proved. Pen C §1150.

The power to render a special verdict is discretionary with the jury, but the court has no duty to tell the jury of this power sua sponte. The court must instruct a jury on special verdicts on request. People v Perry (1972) 7 C3d 756, 103 CR 161; People v Mardian (1975) 47 CA3d 16, 121 CR 269, disapproved on other grounds in People v Anderson (1987) 43 C3d 1104, 1123, 240 CR 585. Special verdict instructions are not required in every case in which they are requested by counsel. For example, in People v Rehman (1967) 253 CA2d 119, 61 CR 65, the court held that, when the jury is properly instructed on the elements of a conspiracy charge, the legal effect of the facts proved cannot be in doubt. Consequently, under §1150, a general verdict is mandatory. People v Rehman, supra.

The trial court should have the clerk enter the verdict in the minutes in the jury's presence after the jury's agreement with it in open court, unless the jury itself has reduced its special verdict to writing or counsel waives such a recording. See Pen C §1153.

§33.31 E. Jury's Verdict on Special Allegations and Prior Convictions

Penal Code §1158a sets out suggested language for the jury's findings that the defendant was armed with a weapon at the time the charged offense was committed, at the time of the arrest, or both. Pen C §1158a(a).

Specific findings that can be made by a jury when charged in the information, e.g., criminal street gang activity (Pen C §186.22), armed with or use of a deadly weapon or firearm (Pen C §§12022, 12022.3, 12022.5, 12022.53), taking property of great value (Pen C §12022.6), and possession of 14.25 grams or more of heroin for sale (Pen C §1203.07(a)(1)), are usually patterned after the suggested language in Pen C §1158a.

Unless the trial is bifurcated, the findings on these issues must be made at the time the jury declares the verdict in court. The jury's failure to make a finding on these matters, followed by the jury's discharge, operates as an acquittal. See People v Saunders (1993) 5 C4th 580, 20 CR2d 638; People v Huffman (1967) 248 CA2d 260, 56 CR 255 (court trial; judge's failure to rule on prior conviction operated as acquittal).

Usually, the trial of the issues of guilt and proof of prior convictions are bifurcated. If the defendant is found guilty, the same jury then proceeds to determine most prior conviction issues. Pen C §§1025, 1158. Examples of such issues regarding priors include whether the defendant was committed to prison, whether he or she has remained free of prison custody, whether a deadly weapon was personally used, and whether great bodily injury was personally inflicted. For further discussion, see §§24.25-24.26.

Absent a defense objection, discharge of the guilt jury and later impaneling of a second jury to try the prior conviction issue is permissible and is not a double jeopardy violation. People v Saunders, supra. This issue does not arise with prior convictions that must be determined by the jury during deliberations on guilt. See §24.25.

§33.32 F. Partial Verdicts

It is permissible to receive partial verdicts as to different defendants in a multidefendant case (see, e.g., People v Gaines (1962) 58 C2d 630, 25 CR 448, overruled on other grounds in People v Morse (1964) 60 C2d 631, 649, 36 CR 201) or as to some counts in a multicount case (see People v Rigney (1961) 55 C2d 236, 10 CR 625).

XIV. DELIVERY OF VERDICT

§33.33 A. Parties to Be Present in Court

When the jury reaches a verdict, the foreperson notifies the bailiff, who informs the judge. The judge has the clerk notify the attorneys, and when the court and parties are in court, the bailiff brings the jurors into the courtroom. When all jurors and parties are present, the judge notes for the record that all jurors are present.

Although there is no specific statutory requirement of counsel's presence at the time of receiving a verdict, it is standard practice for counsel to be present.

A defendant who is charged with a felony must be present when the verdict is received. Pen C §§977(b)(1), 1148. If the court cannot procure the defendant's presence after exercising reasonable diligence, the verdict can be received in the defendant's absence "in the interest of justice." Pen C §1148. Section 1148 does not distinguish between voluntary and involuntary absences. Therefore, it must be assumed that the reason for the defendant's absence is not determinative. The only requirement is that the court exercise reasonable diligence in securing the defendant's presence. See People v Lewis (2006) 39 C4th 970, 1039, 47 CR3d 467 (Pen C §1148 "interest-of-justice" exception permitted reading of verdict in absence of the defendant because he was comatose with uncertain prognosis after jailhouse stabbing).

Misdemeanor cases have no such requirements for the defendant's presence, because counsel generally may appear for the defendant at all stages, including return of the verdict. Pen C §977(a).

B. Method of Taking Verdict

§33.34 1. Oral Declaration

The jury foreperson gives the bailiff or clerk the verdict forms. The clerk reads the verdict, and the court asks if that is the jury's verdict. Alternatively, the court may ask the foreperson to read the verdict. The oral declaration constitutes the verdict. See Pen C §1149; People v Hernandez (1985) 163 CA3d 645, 209 CR 809; People v Lankford (1976) 55 CA3d 203, 127 CR 408.

The court then asks counsel if they would like the jury polled. At either counsel's request, the clerk asks each juror if the verdict given is his or her verdict. See People v Lessard (1962) 58 C2d 447, 25 CR 78. If any do not answer in the affirmative, they must be sent out for further deliberation. See Pen C §1163.

A court usually has wide latitude in determining the meaning to be placed on a juror's response during a poll of individual jurors under §1163. Absent evidence of coercion by the court, procedures such as asking questions to clarify a juror's response have been found reasonable. See People v Burnett (1962) 204 CA2d 453, 22 CR 320. An objection must be made if jury polling is not complete; otherwise, it will be considered waived. See People v Wright (1990) 52 C3d 367, 276 CR 731. See also People v Masajo (1996) 41 CA4th 1335, 1339, 49 CR2d 234 (asking for show of hands was error, but harmless).

At what point attempts at clarification reveal that the jury has not reached a verdict and should return for further deliberations is a matter of judicial discretion. See People v Mestas (1967) 253 CA2d 780, 61 CR 731.

§33.35 2. Delivery of Verdict

A general verdict on a plea of not guilty is either "guilty" or "not guilty." Pen C §1151. However, no specific words are necessary. The verdict is sufficient if it finds the defendant guilty or not guilty by reference to a specific count. People v Fisher (1948) 86 CA2d 24, 31, 194 P2d 116.

When delivered, a special verdict need not be in a specific form. Pen C §1154. Unlike a general verdict, however, it must be put in writing by the jury, or it must be entered in the minutes of the court in the jurors' presence and agreed to by them before they are discharged. Pen C §1153. Failure to comply before discharge could be viewed as a discharge before verdict without legal necessity, thus raising a double jeopardy issue if retrial is sought.

§33.36 C. Trial Ends When Verdict Is Complete or Jury Is Discharged

A verdict is complete once it has been read in court, acknowledged by the jury without dissent during any polling, and recorded by the clerk. People v Bento (1998) 65 CA4th 179, 188, 76 CR2d 412; People v Green (1995) 31 CA4th 1001, 1009, 38 CR2d 401. However, if a complete verdict has not been rendered or if the verdict is otherwise irregular, the court retains jurisdiction to reconvene the jury if the jury has not yet been discharged and the trial court still retains control over the jury. People v Gray (2005) 37 C4th 168, 199, 33 CR3d 451; People v Hendricks (1987) 43 C3d 584, 597, 238 CR 66.

If the verdict is complete and the jury has been discharged, the jury cannot be reconvened, even if the jurors have not yet left the jury box. People v Peavey (1981) 126 CA3d 44, 49, 178 CR 520.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.37 D. Recording Verdict in Minutes

The verdict must be recorded in the minutes and, if requested by any party, read as recorded. See Pen C §1164. Its reading is routinely waived by stipulation. Reversal on this ground is unlikely. See People v Sing Chan (1944) 64 CA2d 167, 174, 148 P2d 81, disapproved on other grounds in People v Mathis (1965) 63 C2d 416, 430, 46 CR 785.

XV. DEFECTIVE VERDICTS

§33.38 A. Inconsistent Verdicts

In a multicount case, a jury may find the defendant guilty of some counts and not guilty of others. See Pen C §954 (acquittal on one count cannot be deemed acquittal on another). When the offenses arise from one fact situation, e.g., repeated sexual intercourse on one occasion, a claim of inconsistency of verdicts may be raised. Although the verdicts may appear inconsistent, guilty verdicts are not void for this reason if substantial evidence supports them. People v York (1992) 11 CA4th 1506, 1510, 15 CR2d 66; People v Matos (1979) 92 CA3d 862, 868, 155 CR 293; People v Edwards (1947) 81 CA2d 655, 185 P2d 74. The same is true when some defendants are found guilty and some are found not guilty (see People v Taylor (1948) 88 CA2d 983, 199 P2d 751), or when codefendants charged with the same crimes and tried jointly are convicted of different degrees of an offense (see People v Abilez (2007) 41 C4th 472, 512, 61 CR3d 526 (jury convicted one defendant of only second degree murder, while it convicted the other defendant of first degree murder with three special circumstances)). This situation should be distinguished from that involving irregularities in the verdict forms themselves. See §33.39 on irregularity in written forms.

The concept of inconsistent verdicts has become intertwined with verdict finality questions. For example, in Bigelow v Superior Court (1989) 208 CA3d 1127, 256 CR 528, the jury returned written verdict forms acquitting the defendant of murder but finding the special circumstance allegation true. To resolve this apparent inconsistency, the trial court refused to enter judgment on the murder acquittal and directed the jury to deliberate further. The jury then came back hung on the murder count. Error was found because the jury had already reached a verdict. See Pen C §1162. Because jurors clearly showed the intent to acquit, the fact that the verdicts were inconsistent could not bar the acquittal from being received and recorded. See also People v Guerra (2009) 176 CA4th 933, 98 CR3d 175; People v Blair (1987) 191 CA3d 832, 236 CR 675.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.38A B. Right to Unanimous Jury

The jury must unanimously agree on the commission of the same specific act or acts that establish the charged crime within the period of time alleged in the charging document. People v Thompson (1995) 36 CA4th 843, 42 CR2d 798 (diversion of construction funds); People v Crow (1994) 28 CA4th 440, 33 CR2d 624 (child molest case); see Cal Const art I, §16; CALCRIM 3500-3502. See also §31.33.

The jury is not, however, required to agree on the same theory of guilt. People v Santamaria (1994) 8 C4th 903, 35 CR2d 624 (jury need not decide whether murder conviction based on defendant's being aider and abettor or direct perpetrator); People v Carey (2007) 41 C4th 109, 132, 59 CR3d 172 (jury need not unanimously agree on theory of first degree murder as either felony murder or murder with premeditation).

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.39 C. Irregularity in Written Forms

Verdict forms do not have to be signed. The custom of having the foreperson sign the verdict is only a method of authentication. See People v Wiley (1931) 111 CA 622, 295 P 1075. The true verdict is the oral declaration of the verdict in court and its confirmation by the jurors. See People v Lankford (1976) 55 CA3d 203, 127 CR 408.

An irregularity in written forms supplied by the jury to the court is not itself enough to void the verdicts; prejudice must be shown. Some examples of irregularity in the forms are incorrectly numbering the counts (People v Harders (1962) 201 CA2d 795, 20 CR 595); adding a note to the court on the verdict form requesting leniency for the defendant (People v Gidney (1937) 10 C2d 138, 73 P2d 1186; People v Bajo (1963) 220 CA2d 741, 33 CR 918); and returning signed guilty and not guilty forms for the same charge (People v Keating (1981) 118 CA3d 172, 173 CR 286). The court has a great deal of flexibility in dealing with these problems. Pen C §1161. For example, in People v Keating, supra, the appellate court held that the trial court properly ordered further deliberations, instructing the jury to make one finding on each count and allegation.

In People v Harders, supra, the trial court was held to have acted properly by changing the record to correct the verdicts to show the proper count. In People v Trotter (1992) 7 CA4th 363, 8 CR2d 648, the jury was mistakenly supplied with verdict forms dealing with the question of whether the defendant was armed with a firearm, rather than being given a form on the use of a firearm. Because the jury was instructed only on the issue of use of a firearm, its affirmative finding that the defendant was armed with a firearm was ruled only a clerical error, correctable by the court.

A factor in showing prejudice on appeal is counsel's reaction to the flawed verdict. Defense counsel's failure to object will weigh against a finding of prejudice. See People v Schroeder (1979) 96 CA3d 730, 158 CR 220; People v Harders (1962) 201 CA2d 795, 798, 20 CR 595.

§33.40 D. Finding on Degree of Offense; Failure to Find Degree; Reconsideration of Verdict

When a crime is divided into degrees and the trier of fact has reasonable doubt about the degree, the defendant can be convicted only of the lesser degree. Pen C §1097. Following from this principle is the rule that, when a trier of fact finds a defendant guilty but neglects to state the degree of the offense, the conviction will be deemed of the lesser degree on appeal. Pen C §1157; People v Superior Court (Marks) (1991) 1 C4th 56, 2 CR2d 389.

There is an exception to this rule, however. When it is possible to conclude, despite the omission, that the greater degree was intended, the conviction will be deemed to be of the greater degree. See, e.g., People v Preciado (1991) 233 CA3d 1244, 285 CR 22 (verdict specified conviction was for "residential burglary" as specified in information, and information unmistakably charged first degree burglary); People v Goodwin (1988) 202 CA3d 940, 249 CR 430 (same).

Furthermore, in People v Mendoza (2000) 23 C4th 896, 908, 98 CR2d 431, a divided California Supreme Court recognized an exception to the rule for first degree felony murder, holding that a killing during the commission of one of the crimes specified in Pen C §189 is not a crime divided into degrees but rather is first degree murder as a matter of law. Consequently, when the prosecution's only theory is that the killing took place during the commission of a robbery or a burglary, the conviction could be fixed at first degree murder, despite the verdict's failure to specify the degree.

If the jury expresses agreement on the crime (e.g., murder) but not on the degree (e.g., first or second) before they have been discharged, jurors can properly be asked to retire and fix the degree of the crime. People v Dixon (1979) 24 C3d 43, 52, 154 CR 236. See also §33.29.

If the jury returns conflicting verdicts, the court may send them back for further deliberations. People v Mestas (1967) 253 CA2d 780, 61 CR 731; People v Crawford (1953) 115 CA2d 838, 252 P2d 963. For example, when the jury foreperson signs both guilty and not guilty verdicts, the court may order the jury to deliberate further, with an instruction to return only a "guilty" or a "not guilty" verdict. People v Keating (1981) 118 CA3d 172, 173 CR 286. Similarly, when a jury returns a verdict finding the defendant guilty of a degree that is inapplicable, the court can order further deliberations. People v Scott (1960) 53 C2d 558, 2 CR 274.

When a verdict clearly indicates the jurors' intention to acquit, however, the judge cannot ask them to reconsider the verdict even though it is defective. People v Romero (1982) 31 C3d 685, 689, 183 CR 663; People v Blair (1987) 191 CA3d 832, 236 CR 675.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.41 E. Failure to Make Finding on Enhancement

The failure of the trier of fact to make a finding on an enhancement operates as an acquittal on that allegation. People v Cole (1979) 94 CA3d 854, 155 CR 892, disapproved on other grounds in People v Kelly (1983) 33 C3d 267, 277, 188 CR 447 (great bodily injury enhancement per Pen C §12022.7). This situation is different from that in which the jury cannot actually agree on a finding. In that event, a mistrial should be declared and the prosecution should be allowed to retry the case on the enhancement based on the analogous situation in People v Ysabel (1938) 28 CA2d 259, 82 P2d 476.

See also §33.31 on the effect of discharge of the jury on the verdict in bifurcated cases.

XVI. ACTION ON VERDICT

§33.42 A. Recording Verdict

After a verdict has been received in open court, the clerk, or the court if there is no clerk, records the verdict in the minutes and reads it to the jury as recorded. Pen C §1164. Counsel usually waive the reading of the verdict as recorded.

If a juror states that the verdict is not his or hers, the jury must be sent out to deliberate further. Pen C §1163. If there is no dissent, the verdict is complete and the jury is discharged.

Ø Note: The trial judge should neither praise nor criticize the verdict or the jury's failure to reach a verdict. Cal Rules of Ct, Standards of J Admin 2.30.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.43 B. Finding for Defendant

When a verdict is returned in the defendant's favor, the court must immediately enter the acquittal in the minutes. Pen C §1164. The jury's finding in the defendant's favor is absolute and cannot be overturned even if it is palpably wrong. People v Gottman (1976) 64 CA3d 775, 134 CR 834.

Once acquitted, the defendant must be discharged, if in custody, unless he or she is being detained on another case. Pen C §1165.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.44 C. Finding Against Defendant

When a verdict of guilty is returned against an in-custody defendant, he or she must be remanded to the sheriff pending sentencing, unless the court concludes that the evidence supports its decision to allow the defendant out on bail. Pen C §1166. See Pen C §§1272 (noncapital defendant seeking probation or to appeal conviction may be admitted to bail), 1270 (judge may release on O.R. any noncapital defendant for whom bail could be set).

If the defendant is out of custody, the court may commit him or her to the sheriff's custody pending sentencing, or allow the defendant to remain on bail or O.R. release. If a defendant on bail is remanded, bail is to be exonerated. Pen C §1166. For discussion of bail on appeal, see §§43.9, 44.18.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.45 XVII. EFFECT OF MISTRIAL DECLARED DURING DELIBERATIONS

When a trial judge declares a mistrial during jury deliberations because not enough jurors remain to return a verdict, the case may be retried if the juror was excused for good cause that amounts to a legal necessity, or with the consent of counsel. Larios v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 324, 332, 155 CR 374; People v Guillen (1994) 25 CA4th 756, 31 CR2d 653. If neither good cause nor consent are present, the defendant is entitled to a dismissal. Larios v Superior Court, supra.

When the attorneys stipulate, and the defendant personally consents, that the judge may discharge the jury because jurors are unable to agree on a verdict, or when the judge finds no reasonable probability that jurors will agree on a verdict, the judge may discharge the jury, declare a mistrial, and the case may be tried again. Pen C §§1140-1141.

© The Regents of the University of California

§33.46 XVIII. POSTTRIAL INTERROGATION OF JURORS

Before discharging the jury, the court must tell jurors they have the absolute right to discuss or not to discuss the case with anyone, including the attorneys in the case. CCP §206(a). See People v Santos (2007) 147 CA4th 965, 972, 55 CR3d 1 (allowing jury to exit secretly through private corridor did not violate substantive due process). The attorneys, and their representatives, may only discuss the case with a juror with the juror's consent and at a reasonable time and place. CCP §206(b). Before any such discussion occurring more than 24 hours after the verdict, the attorneys, and their representatives, must inform the juror of the identity of the case, the identity of the party the attorneys represent, the subject of the interview, the right not to discuss the deliberations or verdict, and the right to review and receive a copy of any declaration that is filed with the court. CCP §206(c). Violation of CCP §206 is a violation of a lawful court order, subjecting the violator to monetary sanctions under CCP §177.5. CCP §206(d).

It is improper for attorneys, after a trial, to ask a juror questions or to make comments "that are intended to harass or embarrass the juror or to influence the juror's actions in future jury service." Cal Rules of Prof Cond 5-320(D). See also Cal Rules of Prof Cond 5-320(E)-(G), and discussion in §2.36. Therefore, to avoid influencing a juror's actions in future jury service, it is advisable for counsel to refrain from initiating disclosure to jurors of excluded evidence.

On the recording of the jury's verdict, personal juror identifying information must be sealed until further court order. CCP §237. The information to be sealed is limited to names, addresses, and telephone numbers, and does not include the other contents of juror questionnaires. Zamudio v Superior Court (1998) 64 CA4th 24, 30, 74 CR2d 765. Trial counsel are entitled to retain redacted copies of juror questionnaires. Bellas v Superior Court (2000) 85 CA4th 636, 651, 102 CR2d 380 (citing Zamudio).

Requests to unseal personal juror-identifying information require notice to the affected juror and a hearing. CCP §237(c); People v Duran (1996) 50 CA4th 103, 115, 57 CR2d 635. A showing of good cause does not automatically entitle the requesting party to juror contact information; the request may be denied if the trial court finds a compelling interest for nondisclosure. Townsel v Superior Court (1999) 20 C4th 1084, 1095, 86 CR2d 602; People v Tuggles (2009) 178 CA4th 1106, 1149, 100 CR3d 820. Denial of such a request is reviewed under the abuse of discretion standard. Townsel, 20 C4th at 1097; People v Santos (2007) 147 CA4th 965, 978, 55 CR3d 1. See also CCP §206(g) and discussion in §§12.21, 29.19.

On contacting jurors after trial to attempt to impeach the verdict, see §34.5.

§34.1 I. OVERVIEW

Prejudgment motions are brought in the trial court before sentence is pronounced. Pen C §§1182 (new trial), 1181(6) (modify verdict), 1185 (arrest of judgment). Unless the court has transferred the case, these motions are heard by the trial judge or by the judge who took the defendant's plea. See People v Tokich (1954) 128 CA2d 515, 517, 275 P2d 816.

Prejudgment motions are often made orally, as are the prosecutor's responses. The trial court may not refuse to hear and decide a motion for new trial made orally. See, e.g., People v Simon (1989) 208 CA3d 841, 847, 256 CR 373.

Ø Note: Under Pen C §1202 on pronouncing judgment, "[i]f the court shall refuse to hear a defendant's motion for a new trial or when made shall neglect to determine such motion before pronouncing judgment or the making of an order granting probation, then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial." When the trial court refuses or neglects to hear a defendant's motion for new trial, a separate motion citing §1202 is not required. However, a defendant may forfeit his or her claim to the remedy provided by §1202 by acquiescing in the trial court's failure to hear the new trial motion. If the court's failure to hear the new trial motion is inadvertent or the result of neglect, the defendant must "press for a ruling." A reviewing court may order a new trial under §1202 only if the trial court's failure to hear the defendant's new trial motion resulted in a miscarriage of justice; the reviewing court may prevent a miscarriage of justice by remanding the matter to the trial court for a belated hearing and ruling on the defendant's new trial motion. People v Braxton (2004) 34 C4th 798, 805, 22 CR3d 46.

When possible, however, it is preferable to make motions and submit responses in writing to be sure the facts and legal support are clearly presented to the court and to ensure a good record in case of appeal.

These are the most common prejudgment motions:

- Motion for new trial (Pen C §1181; discussed in §§34.3-34.16);
- Motion to modify verdict to a lesser offense or degree (Pen C §1181(6); discussed in §34.17);
- Motion to strike enhancement or special findings (Pen C §1385; discussed in §§24.39, 37.41);
- Motion in arrest of judgment (Pen C §1185; discussed in §34.19); and
- Motion to withdraw plea (Pen C §1018; discussed in §26.21).

III. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL

§34.3 A. Purpose; When Available

A motion for new trial allows a criminal defendant to secure a new trial after a verdict has been given. Pen C §1179. The motion may be made after either a jury trial or a court trial. In re Rothrock (1939) 14 C2d 34, 40, 92 P2d 634. The statutory grounds for the motion are set forth in Pen C §1181. A motion for new trial may be granted only on a ground raised in the motion; the court cannot grant the motion on a ground not raised by the moving party. People v Masotti (2008) 163 CA4th 504, 508, 77 CR3d 483.

Ø Note: In People v Masotti, supra, the defense motion for new trial was based solely on the ground that there was insufficient evidence to sustain the verdict. See Pen C §1181(6). Nevertheless, the trial court granted the motion based on inadequate jury instructions. Pen C §1181(5). The court of appeal reversed, finding that the defendant waived his right to a new trial on all grounds not raised in his motion. Masotti creates two practical problems: First, since the instructional error may be one that cannot be waived on appeal (see Pen C §1259), an appeal may ultimately result in a reversal only after the defendant has served a substantial sentence; second, had the trial judge merely advised defense counsel of the instructional error and granted a continuance to allow amendment of the motion for new trial, presumably there would have been no waiver and the motion would have been properly granted. In short, form is elevated over substance.

If the motion is granted, the parties are placed in the same position as if there had been no trial. Pen C §1180. The court has jurisdiction to grant a new trial motion for some but not all counts. People v Drake (1992) 6 CA4th 92, 99, 7 CR2d 790. The court may also reconsider and reverse an earlier ruling granting a motion for new trial to correct an error of law. People v Rose (1996) 46 CA4th 257, 53 CR2d 559.

A motion for new trial can sometimes be a good vehicle for presenting and preserving facts that did not become part of the record during the trial. For example, in People v Thurmond (1985) 175 CA3d 865, 874, 221 CR 292, the appellate court on appeal rejected the defense claim that the trial judge slept through most of the trial. If the defense had made this issue the basis for a Pen C §1181 motion, counsel could have presented evidence in the trial court that would have been subject to review on appeal.

B. Grounds

§34.4 1. Absence of Defendant at Trial

The court may grant a new trial when the trial proceeded in the absence of the defendant except when conducting the trial in the defendant's absence was lawful. Pen C §1181(1). A criminal defendant's right to be present at trial is protected under both the federal and state constitutions. US Const Amends VI, XIV; Cal Const art I, §15. The state constitutional protections are implemented by Pen C §§977 and 1043. Penal Code §977(b)(1) states that the accused in a felony case shall be present at the arraignment, at the time of plea, during the preliminary hearing, during the portions of the trial when evidence is taken, and at the time of sentencing. Penal Code §1043(a) states that, except as otherwise provided in this section, the defendant in a felony case shall be personally present at the trial.

The defendant's right to be present is not absolute, however, and may be lost by consent or misconduct. Section 977(b)(1) allows a defendant to waive in writing the right to be personally present at certain nonfundamental proceedings, and Pen C §1043 allows a trial to continue despite the defendant's absence in any of the following circumstances:

- The court, after warning the defendant, has ordered the defendant removed from the courtroom because of his or her continuing disruptive behavior;
- The defendant in a non-death penalty case is voluntarily absent; and
- The defendant has waived his or her right to be present in favor of appearing through counsel under Pen C §977.

Although §977 specifies certain proceedings in which the defendant's attendance is mandatory, Pen C §1043(b)(2), which allows the trial to continue in the defendant's absence, does not. Despite the mandatory language in §977, it has been interpreted as being subject to §1043. For example, a felony trial may be conducted in the defendant's absence if the defendant is disruptive (People v Welch (1999) 20 C4th 701, 774, 85 CR2d 203) or voluntarily absent (People v Gutierrez (2003) 29 C4th 1196, 1204, 130 CR2d 917).

The §1043 exceptions to the presence requirement are triggered by the defendant's absence "after trial has commenced." Pen C §1043(b)(2). Therefore, a felony trial cannot be held without the defendant ever appearing. A defendant is present when a trial "commences" if he or she is physically present in the courtroom where the trial is to be held, understands that the proceedings against him or her are underway, confronts the judge, and voluntarily declines to participate further in the proceedings. See People v Ruiz (2001) 92 CA4th 162, 111 CR2d 640 (defendant expressed desire not to be present during trial in open court session addressing trial management issues); People v Granderson (1998) 67 CA4th 703, 79 CR2d 268 (noncustodial defendant who was present when jury selection began did not return for second day of voir dire proceedings); People v Lewis (1983) 144 CA3d 267, 277, 192 CR 257 (defendant announced his intention not to participate before voir dire had begun). But see People v Molina (1976) 55 CA3d 173, 176, 127 CR 434 (defendant's absence began after 11 jurors were selected), for a contrary view.

The defendant's presence is not required at misdemeanor trials, proceedings that are preliminary, or those in which the defendant's substantial rights are not affected. People v White (1971) 18 CA3d 44, 51, 95 CR 576 (examples of when defendant's presence not required); People v Cox (1978) 81 CA3d Supp 1, 146 CR 724.

For purposes of a motion for new trial, the defendant's absence may result from either a physical or a mental disability. People v Williams (1961) 194 CA2d 523, 15 CR 191 (new trial granted because defendant insane at trial). See also People v Berling (1953) 115 CA2d 255, 251 P2d 1017 (new trial granted because defendant "mentally absent" after trial began). This rule does not apply if the disability was voluntarily induced. People v Cox (1978) 81 CA3d Supp 1, 146 CR 724 (no new trial when defendant voluntarily took hallucinogenic drugs); People v Rogers (1957) 150 CA2d 403, 415, 309 P2d 949 (self-induced insulin shock did not support motion for new trial). That a defendant is in physical pain does not amount to "absence" if the defendant is coherent, lucid, and able to communicate with his or her attorney. People v Avila (2004) 117 CA4th 771, 778, 11 CR3d 894.

§34.5 2. Jury Misconduct

Standard for obtaining relief. The court may grant a new trial because of jury misconduct. Pen C §1181(2), (4). Perhaps the most common form of jury misconduct is the receipt of extraneous information. See Pen C §1181(2). In this situation, the verdict must be set aside if there is a substantial likelihood of prejudice. The likelihood is established when the material itself is "inherently and substantially likely" to have influenced jurors who were aware of the information or when the nature of the misconduct and the surrounding circumstances demonstrate a substantial likelihood that at least one juror was actually biased against the defendant. In re Carpenter (1995) 9 C4th 634, 653, 38 CR2d 665.

When a defendant appeals the denial of his or her motion for a new trial on the ground of juror misconduct, the appellate court must independently review, as a mixed question of law and fact, the trial court's conclusion that no prejudice arose from the misconduct. People v Nesler (1997) 16 C4th 561, 582 n5, 66 CR2d 454. But when the prosecution appeals the trial court's grant of a defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of juror misconduct, the trial court's finding that the misconduct was prejudicial is reviewed for abuse of discretion. People v Ault (2004) 33 C4th 1250, 17 CR3d 302.

Investigating misconduct. It is common for trial lawyers to discuss a case with any interested jurors immediately after a verdict is received. Jurors often voluntarily remain after the verdict is rendered to discuss matters of common interest. This is the usual time when counsel is told of possible juror misconduct.

Such posttrial contact with interested jurors may well be defense counsel's only opportunity to learn whether misconduct occurred during deliberations because of statutes protecting juror privacy and safety. Before discharging the jury, the judge must inform the jurors that they have an absolute right to discuss or not discuss the deliberations or verdict with anyone. CCP §206(a). Information such as names, addresses, and telephone numbers that could be used to identify individual jurors must be sealed automatically after the verdict is recorded. CCP §237(a)(2). Anyone seeking such information must petition the court and show good cause for disclosure. CCP §237(b). See, e.g., People v Tuggles (2009) 178 CA4th 1106, 100 CR3d 820. A criminal defendant or defense counsel may obtain the information if he or she petitions the court and demonstrates that the information is necessary for a new trial motion or any other lawful purpose. CCP §206(g).

Trial courts have always possessed the inherent power to protect jurors' physical safety and privacy. Townsel v Superior Court (1999) 20 C4th 1084, 1087, 86 CR2d 602, 604. In exercising its discretion, the trial court must balance competing public interests in jury privacy and safety and in ascertaining the truth in judicial proceedings. People v Rhodes (1989) 212 CA3d 541, 261 CR 1; People v Santos (2007) 147 CA4th 965, 55 CR3d 1.

Ø Note: Unreasonable contact without a juror's consent is improper. CCP §206(c).

Although brevity of deliberations does not by itself demonstrate juror misconduct, it may raise a concern requiring investigation to see if something unusual occurred. People v Atkins (1988) 203 CA3d 15, 249 CR 863, disapproved on other grounds in People v Jones (1990) 51 C3d 294, 322, 270 CR 611.

Evidence of jury misconduct. A motion for new trial because of jury misconduct is usually accompanied by affidavits or declarations (usually from jurors) describing the alleged misconduct. The court may grant an evidentiary hearing when there are material, disputed issues of fact. People v Hedgecock (1990) 51 C3d 395, 414, 272 CR 803. Admissible evidence includes statements made, or conduct, conditions, or events occurring either inside or outside the jury room that are likely to have improperly influenced the verdict. Evid C §1150(a). Evidence of the jury discussing a particular topic, such as a defendant's failure to testify, is admissible. People v Perez (1992) 4 CA4th 893, 6 CR2d 141. But evidence that purports to show the effect of statements, conduct, and the like on a juror or evidence of a juror's mental processes is inadmissible. Evid C §1150; People v Hill (1992) 3 CA4th 16, 27, 4 CR2d 258, disapproved on other grounds in People v Nesler (1997) 16 C4th 561, 582 n5, 66 CR2d 454. The proscription against using statements, conduct, conditions, and events that purport to show that they affected a juror was not invalidated by former Cal Const art I, §28(d) (now see Cal Const art I, §28(f)(2)), passed as part of Proposition 8. People v Hill, supra.

For further discussion of jury misconduct, see chap 33.

§34.6 3. Error of Law by Court

A defendant may be granted a new trial if the court has either misdirected the jury on a matter of law or made an erroneous legal ruling. Pen C §1181(5). Virtually any legal ruling made during the course of a trial may support the grant of a new trial. The only limitation is that the ruling must have affected a substantial right of the defendant. People v Honeycutt (1946) 29 C2d 52, 61, 172 P2d 698 (instructional error, but no reversal, because instructions taken together would not have led to misconception of law); People v Forrester (1994) 30 CA4th 1697, 37 CR2d 19 (instructional error, but no reversal, because harmless beyond reasonable doubt).

§34.7 4. Prosecutorial Misconduct; Errors by Other Prosecution Agencies

"Prosecutorial misconduct refers to the use of deceptive or reprehensible methods to influence the jury." People v Strickland (1974) 11 C3d 946, 955, 114 CR 632. Appeals to passion or prejudice, arguments unsupported by the evidence, improper questioning by the prosecutor, expressions of personal opinion on the guilt of the accused by the prosecutor, erroneous comments concerning the law, and name-calling are representative examples of prosecutorial misconduct. Failure to disclose evidence may also support the grant of a new trial. Merrill v Superior Court (1994) 27 CA4th 1586, 33 CR2d 515.

Although prosecutorial misconduct is a ground for a motion for new trial (Pen C §1181(5)), the misconduct must have been prejudicial (People v Prysock (1982) 127 CA3d 972, 998, 180 CR 15). The test for prejudice is whether it is "reasonably probable that a result more favorable to the defendant would have occurred had the district attorney refrained from the comment attacked by the defendant." People v Prysock, supra. There is usually no prejudice if timely objection and prompt admonishment did or would have cured the harm. People v Prysock, supra.

The failure of authorities to timely return a defendant to court for resentencing does not require a new trial. People v Flores (1988) 198 CA3d 1156, 244 CR 322.

© The Regents of the University of California

§34.8 5. Insufficiency of Evidence

A motion for new trial made on the ground that the verdict or finding is contrary to the law or evidence (Pen C §1181(6)) requires the trial judge to independently review the evidence. People v Davis (1995) 10 C4th 463, 523, 41 CR2d 826. Although the trial judge should not ignore the verdict (People v Lopez (1969) 1 CA3d 78, 85, 81 CR 386), and is to be "guided" by a presumption in favor of the correctness of the jury's verdict, this means only that the judge may not arbitrarily reject a verdict that is supported by substantial evidence. People v Dickens (2005) 130 CA4th 1245, 1251, 30 CR3d 845. The trial judge is not bound by the jury's resolution of conflicts in the evidence or determinations regarding witness credibility. People v Robarge (1953) 41 C2d 628, 633, 262 P2d 14; Dickens, 130 CA4th at 1251.

The trial judge has broad discretion in determining whether the evidence has sufficient probative value to sustain the verdict. Robarge, 41 C2d at 633. An order granting a new trial based on insufficiency of evidence will not be reversed on appeal absent a manifest and unmistakable abuse of that discretion. People v Lewis (2001) 26 C4th 334, 364, 110 CR2d 272.

If the court grants the defendant's new trial motion because the evidence was insufficient as a matter of law, the prosecution is barred from retrying the defendant. Hudson v Louisiana (1981) 450 US 40, 67 L Ed 2d 30, 101 S Ct 970; People v Trevino (1985) 39 C3d 667, 699, 217 CR 652, overruled on other grounds in People v Johnson (1989) 47 C3d 1194, 1219, 255 CR 569.

Ø Note: Counsel should seek a new trial in a close case when the issue is the sufficiency of the evidence, rather than first raise the issue on appeal, because at the appellate level the court will uphold a verdict if there is any substantial evidence to support it. People v Serrato (1973) 9 C3d 753, 109 CR 65, overruled on other grounds in People v Fosselman (1983) 33 C3d 572, 583 n1, 189 CR 855; People v Veitch (1982) 128 CA3d 460, 180 CR 412.

§34.9 6. Newly Discovered Evidence

A defendant may secure a new trial based on newly discovered evidence. Pen C §1181(8). The motion must be supported by declarations or affidavits. It is not necessary to produce witnesses at the hearing. Pen C §1181(8); People v Trujillo (1977) 67 CA3d 547, 557, 136 CR 672.

Ø Note: The court bases its decision only on evidence before the court, not on evidence that might be developed. People v Beeler (1995) 9 C4th 953, 1004, 39 CR2d 607.

To entitle the defendant to a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, the defendant must show (People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 212, 32 CR2d 762):

- The evidence itself, not just its materiality, is newly discovered;
- The evidence is not cumulative to that already presented;
- If the evidence were presented at a retrial, a different result would be probable;
- The defendant could not have discovered the evidence earlier using reasonable diligence; and
- These facts are shown by the best evidence that can be obtained under the circumstances.

Ø Note: When counsel's lack of diligence in securing the attendance of a necessary witness at trial is the only requirement not met, and the prosecution's case was very weak, courts may make an exception and grant a new trial. People v Martinez (1984) 36 C3d 816, 205 CR 852 (judgment reversed; trial court erred in denying new trial motion).

© The Regents of the University of California

§34.10 7. Loss of Trial Transcript

If the trial record has been lost or destroyed in whole or in substantial part, a new trial may be granted. See Pen C §1181(9). Not every loss of any part of the reporter's notes requires vacating the judgment. People v Morales (1979) 88 CA3d 259, 266, 151 CR 610. "The test is whether in light of all the circumstances it appears that the lost portion is 'substantial' in that it affects the ability of the reviewing court to conduct a meaningful review and the ability of the defendant to properly perfect his appeal." People v Holloway (1990) 50 C3d 1098, 1116, 269 CR 530; People v Pinholster (1992) 1 C4th 865, 920, 4 CR2d 765.

Except in capital cases, reporting notes may be destroyed on court order after 10 years in criminal proceedings and after 5 years in all other proceedings. No reporting notes in a capital case (including preliminary hearing notes) may be destroyed without express authorization from the supreme court. Govt C §69955. If the defendant flees, and the stenographic notes were properly destroyed under Govt C §69955, the defendant may have lost the right to a verbatim record. People v Everett (1990) 224 CA3d 932, 274 CR 429.

Ø Note: If other methods of reconstructing the trial record are available, the defendant must proceed with those alternatives to obtain review. People v Jones (1981) 125 CA3d 298, 178 CR 44. A settled statement may provide an adequate substitute for a missing transcript. People v Holloway, supra.

For further discussion of the record on appeal, see §§43.12 (use in misdemeanor appeals), and 44.25 (use in felony appeals).

§34.11 8. Nonstatutory Grounds

The trial court's power to grant a new trial is not limited to the specific grounds listed in Pen C §1181. People v Fosselman (1983) 33 C3d 572, 582, 189 CR 855 (issue was ineffective assistance of counsel). Fosselman cited with approval People v Davis (1973) 31 CA3d 106, 110, 106 CR 897, which held that the trial court has broad discretion to grant a new trial whenever an accused is denied a fair and impartial trial. The power to grant a new trial on nonstatutory grounds is derived from the trial court's constitutional duty to ensure an accused a fair trial. People v Davis, supra.

There are two requirements for raising nonstatutory grounds to support a motion for new trial (People v Mayorga (1985) 171 CA3d 929, 940, 218 CR 830): (1) the error denied the defendant a fair trial, and (2) the defendant had no earlier opportunity to raise the issue.

The trial court's finding of prejudice in granting a new trial motion based on ineffective assistance of counsel is subject to the abuse of discretion standard of review, as is the trial court's finding of whether counsel's representation was deficient. People v Callahan (2004) 124 CA4th 198, 209, 21 CR3d 226.

Nonstatutory grounds for granting a motion for new trial include:

- Ineffective assistance of counsel (see People v Cornwell (2005) 37 C4th 50, 98, 33 CR3d 1, disapproved on other grounds in People v Doolin (2009) 45 C4th 390, 421 n22, 87 CR3d 209; People v Smith (1993) 6 C4th 684, 25 CR2d 122; People v Callahan, supra);
- Trial court's failure to grant a continuance (see People v Sherrod (1997) 59 CA4th 1168, 69 CR2d 361);
- Prosecution's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence (see Merrill v Superior Court (1994) 27 CA4th 1586, 33 CR2d 515);
- Erroneous admission of evidence (see, e.g., People v Albarran (2007) 149 CA4th 214, 57 CR3d 92 (admission of extremely inflammatory gang evidence violated defendant's federal constitutional rights to due process and rendered trial fundamentally unfair); and
- Spectator misconduct (see People v Cornwell (2005) 37 C4th 50, 87, 33 CR3d 1, disapproved on other grounds in People v Doolin (2009) 45 C4th 390, 421 n22, 87 CR3d 209), which may include the wearing of buttons or display of placards showing sympathy for an alleged victim (see People v Houston (2005) 130 CA4th 279, 29 CR3d 818).
- Material change in the law (see People v DeLouize (2004) 32 C4th 1223, 1233, 13 CR3d 302).

Ø Note: If no request for mistrial was made at the time the spectator misconduct occurred, counsel would be well advised to raise the issue in a motion for new trial. The court in Cornwell, 37 C4th at 87, observed that normally the judge will be present when the misconduct occurs and will be in the best position to evaluate the impact of the conduct on the fairness of the trial. If counsel never objects to the misconduct, it is likely that the misconduct will be found insignificant.

C. Procedure

§34.12 1. Application by Defendant; Appointment of Counsel; Time for Application

The court cannot on its own motion grant a new trial; defense counsel must move for a new trial. Pen C §1181. On request, trial courts should appoint counsel for defendants who represented themselves at trial unless the defendant is seeking representation for a bad faith purpose such as delay. People v Ngaue (1991) 229 CA3d 1115, 280 CR 757 (harmless error for trial court to fail to rule on appellant's posttrial request for counsel). The court may appoint separate counsel to investigate possible grounds for a motion for new trial; if the separate counsel reports that he or she finds no grounds for a new trial, there is no requirement that an Anders-Wende brief be filed. People v Thurman (2007) 157 CA4th 36, 45, 68 CR3d 425.

The application and hearing on a motion for new trial must be made and determined before any of the following (Pen C §1182):

- Pronouncement of judgment;
- An order granting probation; or
- A commitment adjudging the defendant a narcotics addict or insane.

Once judgment has been entered by the clerk or a commitment has been made, the court has no jurisdiction to hear a motion for new trial (People v Sainz (1967) 253 CA2d 496, 61 CR 196), and the defendant is deemed to have waived the right to so move (People v Pineda (1967) 253 CA2d 443, 449, 62 CR 144). If the judgment is vacated or set aside before its entry, however, the court can entertain a motion for new trial. See People v Hales (1966) 244 CA2d 507, 508, 53 CR 161 (rule stated, but judgment had already been entered before judge vacated it).

When an appellate court affirms a conviction and orders a limited reversal and remand, the trial court does not regain jurisdiction to entertain a motion for new trial. People v Smyers (1969) 2 CA3d 666, 668, 83 CR 3.

© The Regents of the University of California

§34.13 2. Form and Content of Application; Right to Transcript to Support Motion

Defense counsel may make "application" for a new trial. Pen C §1181. The word "application" has been interpreted to mean either an oral or a written motion. People v Braxton (2004) 34 C4th 798, 814, 22 CR3d 46 (written motion not required); People v Simon (1989) 208 CA3d 841, 847, 256 CR 373. Counsel should follow any local rules for form, notice, time, and filing requirements.

The grounds relied on must be specified; failure to properly state the motion may be deemed a waiver of the motion. People v Grake (1964) 227 CA2d 289, 292, 38 CR 666. Certainly, appellate review of the denial of a motion for new trial will not be successful unless the issues were properly raised in the trial court. People v Donovan (1971) 16 CA3d 921, 923, 94 CR 310. A general motion "on all statutory grounds," submitted without argument, does not suffice to raise any issues cognizable on appeal. People v Donovan, supra.

The motion for new trial must be supported by evidence that is admissible under the Evidence Code. See Evid C §300. Whenever possible, the trial transcript should be used. Indigent defendants are entitled to a free transcript if they can show that the transcript is necessary for effective representation on the motion for new trial. People v Bizieff (1991) 226 CA3d 1689, 1702, 277 CR 678.

Ø Note: If copies of the entire transcript are unavailable when counsel is preparing the motion, that portion of the testimony that is crucial to the motion should be transcribed first.

D. Court's Ruling

§34.14 1. Proper Judge to Hear Motion; Discretionary Ruling

The judge who presided at the trial should hear and rule on the motion for new trial. See People v Tokich (1954) 128 CA2d 515, 517, 275 P2d 816. This is, however, a matter of custom. The defendant has no due process right to have the judge who presided at trial rule on the motion for new trial. People v Moreda (2004) 118 CA4th 507, 13 CR3d 154. The court considering a motion for new trial may (1) set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, (2) deny the motion and enter judgment on the verdict, or (3) modify the verdict either to a lesser degree of the crime of which the defendant was convicted or to a lesser included offense of that crime as specified in Pen C §1181(6). People v Lagunas (1994) 8 C4th 1030, 36 CR2d 67.

An order granting or denying a motion for new trial "rests so completely within the court's discretion that its action will not be disturbed unless a manifest and unmistakable abuse of discretion clearly appears." People v Turner (1994) 8 C4th 137, 212, 32 CR2d 762. The court should determine whether there is sufficient credible evidence to sustain the verdict, and if not, the court should grant the motion. People v Robarge (1953) 41 C2d 628, 634, 262 P2d 14.

When the court grants a motion for new trial, it retains jurisdiction to reconsider that order. People v DeLouize (2004) 32 C4th 1223, 13 CR3d 302. The trial court may even reconsider its order granting a new trial after the time for a prosecution appeal has expired when a material change in the law that undercuts the grounds for granting the motion occurs after that date. 32 C4th at 1232. A trial court that has denied a motion for a new trial cannot grant a second or renewed motion. People v Martin (1926) 199 C 240, 248 P 908; People v Fice (1893) 97 C 459, 32 P 531; see People v DeLouize (2004) 32 C4th 1223, 1228, 13 CR3d 302.

© The Regents of the University of California

§34.15 2. Time to Rule

The court must decide a motion for new trial within the same time limits that govern making the motion. That is, it must be done before (1) pronouncement of judgment, (2) a grant of probation, or (3) commitment as a narcotics addict or insane person. Pen C §1182.

If the trial judge fails to pronounce judgment within 20 judicial days after the verdict in felony cases (Pen C §1191; see the statute for exceptions), or if the court fails to decide a motion for new trial before pronouncement of judgment in either a misdemeanor or felony case, the defendant is entitled to a new trial. Pen C §1202. On appeal, however, a trial court's refusal to grant a new trial under §1202 will be reversed only if the defendant can show prejudice. People v Teddie (1981) 120 CA3d 756, 764, 175 CR 49.

© The Regents of the University of California

§34.16 E. Appellate Review

When a motion for new trial is granted, the prosecution has a right to appeal. See Pen C §§1238(a)(3), 1466(1)(D). On denial of the motion, defense counsel can obtain review of the order on appeal from the final judgment. See Pen C §§1237(a), 1466(2)(A). When a motion for new trial is granted, the defendant may move for bail under Pen C §1275. See In re Weiner (1995) 32 CA4th 441, 38 CR2d 172.

When the trial court grants a new-trial order, the standard of review is abuse of discretion. People v Ault (2004) 33 C4th 1250, 1261, 17 CR3d 302; People v Albarran (2007) 149 CA4th 214, 224 n7, 57 CR3d 92. However, review of a trial court's order denying a motion for a new trial is de novo when the case implicates a defendant's federal constitutional rights to due process and concerns the fundamental fairness of the trial. 149 CA4th at 224. See Ault, 33 C4th at 1262.

Ø Note: Counsel should keep in mind the fundamental rule that matters not presented to the trial court will ordinarily not be considered on appeal. People v Webb (1986) 186 CA3d 401, 410, 230 CR 755.

On remand following a successful appeal or writ, the defense is entitled to challenge the trial judge under CCP §170.6(a)(2). Overton v Superior Court (1994) 22 CA4th 112, 27 CR2d 274.

§34.17 IV. MOTION TO MODIFY VERDICT TO LESSER OFFENSE OR LESSER DEGREE

Rather than granting a defense attorney's application for a new trial, the court may modify the verdict to a necessarily lesser included crime or to a lesser degree of the same crime if the evidence shows that the defendant is not guilty of the degree of the crime of which he or she was convicted, and supports the lesser offense. Pen C §1181(6); see People v Lagunas (1994) 8 C4th 1030, 36 CR2d 67. Counsel may wish to request this relief as part of the motion for new trial.

The prosecution can appeal from an order in a felony case that modifies the verdict or finding by reducing the degree of the offense or modifying the offense to a lesser offense. Pen C §1238(a)(6).

§34.18 V. MOTION TO STRIKE ENHANCEMENTS OR SPECIAL FINDINGS

With the advent of determinate sentencing, enhancements and special findings affecting punishment are matters of crucial concern. A motion to strike is usually made orally at the time of sentencing. For discussion of which enhancements and prior convictions may be stricken, see chap 37.

§34.19 VI. MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT

A motion in arrest of judgment is an application by a defendant that no judgment be rendered on a plea, finding, or verdict of guilty, or on a finding or verdict on a plea of former conviction, former acquittal, or once in jeopardy. Pen C §1185.

The motion may be founded on any of the defects appearing on the face of the accusatory pleading stated in Pen C §1004 (grounds for demurrer), unless the objection has been waived by failure to demur. Pen C §1185. The following grounds are not waived by failure to demur and may instead be challenged by a motion in arrest of judgment (Pen C §1012): (1) objection to the court's jurisdiction and (2) objection that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense.

The motion may be made by the defendant (Pen C §1185), or the court on its own motion may arrest judgment (Pen C §1186). The motion must be made and determined before judgment is pronounced. Pen C §§1185-1186.

In a misdemeanor or infraction case, the effect of an order arresting judgment is to place the defendant in the same situation he or she was in before trial. Pen C §1187. In a felony case, the effect is to put the defendant in the same situation he or she was in immediately before the information was filed or indictment found. Pen C §1187.

§34.20 VII. JUDGMENT NOTWITHSTANDING THE VERDICT (JUDGMENT N.O.V.)

Motions for judgment n.o.v. are unavailable in criminal cases. People v Morales (1989) 48 C3d 527, 560, 257 CR 64; People v Morgan (1977) 75 CA3d 32, 141 CR 863. The defendant may move for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law or evidence. Pen C §1181(6). See §34.8.

§35.1 I. OVERVIEW

Judgment is synonymous with the pronouncement of sentence. People v Perez (1979) 23 C3d 545, 549 n2, 153 CR 40; People v Flores (1974) 12 C3d 85, 93 n6, 115 CR 225; People v Chlad (1992) 6 CA4th 1719, 1725, 8 CR2d 610. A judge may sentence a defendant in either misdemeanor or felony cases. Cal Const art VI, §10.

The law establishes time limitations within which sentence must be pronounced after a defendant is convicted of a crime. Pen C §§1191, 1449. A defendant may waive these time limitations. People v Ford (1966) 65 C2d 41, 47, 52 CR 228 (felony). See also In re Elsholz (1964) 228 CA2d 192, 197, 39 CR 356 (misdemeanor; rule stated but court found no waiver). The failure to pronounce judgment within the time limitations of §§1191 and 1449 is not jurisdictional. Such error is procedural and does not require a new trial or reversal unless the delay results in a miscarriage of justice. People v Ford (1966) 65 C2d 41, 52 CR 228; People v Cheffen (1969) 2 CA3d 638, 82 CR 658; Pen C §1202.

The defendant in a criminal case has a right to be present for pronouncement of judgment. Pen C §1193; see Pen C §§686, 977(b); People v Neal (1950) 97 CA2d 668, 218 P2d 556. In felony cases, when the defendant is in custody, the court may require the defendant to be personally present. Pen C §1194. In most misdemeanor cases, the defendant may appear through counsel only. Pen C §§977(a)(1), 1193(b); Olney v Municipal Court (1982) 133 CA3d 455, 184 CR 78. However, if the defendant has been charged with domestic violence under Fam C §6211 or with violating a protective order under Pen C §273.6, the defendant must be present for sentencing. Pen C §977(a)(2). In addition, the court may order a defendant charged with misdemeanor driving under the influence to be present at sentencing. Pen C §977(a)(3).

If the defendant is not present for sentencing, the court must determine whether the defendant's absence is a waiver of the right to be present. See Pen C §§977(a), 1193. Waiver may be found if the defendant, in a felony case, has, with leave of court, executed in open court a written waiver of his or her right to be personally present or, after the exercise of reasonable diligence to procure the presence of the defendant, the court finds that it is in the interest of justice that judgment be pronounced in his or her absence. In a misdemeanor case, a waiver of defendant's presence may be found if he or she is represented by counsel or made a knowing and intelligent waiver of the right to be present at sentencing. People v Kriss (1979) 96 CA3d 913, 158 CR 420.

Whether a defendant will be released on bail between conviction of a felony not punishable with death and pronouncement of judgment is subject to the court's consideration of the factors listed in Pen C §§1166, 1272. If the court sets bail after a guilty verdict, it should state on the record the factors it considered; but such a statement is not required when the conviction is based on a plea of guilty or no contest. People v Seneca Ins. Co. (2003) 29 C4th 954, 129 CR2d 842. Compare §1272, which appears to be in conflict with §1166 when a defendant convicted of a felony has applied for probation. In a misdemeanor case, bail is a matter of right if an application for probation is pending (Pen C §1272), although the trial court may set reasonable bail conditions related to public safety (In re McSherry (2003) 112 CA4th 856, 863, 5 CR3d 497).

The defendant has a constitutional right to counsel at the time judgment is pronounced. Cal Const art I, §15; Mempa v Rhay (1967) 389 US 128, 19 L Ed 2d 336, 88 S Ct 254; In re Roberts (1953) 40 C2d 745, 748, 255 P2d 782. See also In re Cortez (1971) 6 C3d 78, 88, 98 CR 307. If counsel is not present, the court must decide whether there has been an effective waiver of the right to be represented. See In re Johnson (1965) 62 C2d 325, 334, 42 CR 228.

Before pronouncement of judgment in a felony case, the parties are entitled to a hearing to present evidence on factors in aggravation or mitigation affecting the sentence. Pen C §§1170(b), 1204; Cal Rules of Ct 4.421, 4.423. The parties are also entitled to a meaningful opportunity to respond to the court's proposed sentencing choices. People v Gonzalez (2003) 31 C4th 745, 3 CR3d 676; People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 36 CR2d 627. In a misdemeanor case, the defendant has the right to confront witnesses and to present evidence on his or her own behalf. See People v Surplice (1962) 203 CA2d 784, 792, 21 CR 826. The sentence hearing is not governed by the same rules of evidence and procedure that apply at the trial. Williams v New York (1949) 337 US 241, 93 L Ed 1337, 69 S Ct 1079; see People v Peterson (1973) 9 C3d 717, 726, 108 CR 835. Unless waived, the defendant must be arraigned for judgment, which includes being advised of the nature of the charges, the pleas entered, and the verdicts returned on the pleas.

The defendant or counsel must also be asked whether there is any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced. Pen C §1200. This procedure is called the allocution. People v Cross (1963) 213 CA2d 678, 28 CR 918.

If the defendant is sentenced to incarceration, the court must advise the defendant that the law permits the award of conduct and worktime credits. Pen C §1191.3. Credits are discussed in §39.8. In addition to any incarceration term that may be imposed, the court must also set forth probationary conditions if the defendant is placed on probation. If the offense for which the defendant was convicted requires registration with local law enforcement agencies, the court must so advise.

In all felony cases in which the defendant was convicted after trial, or after a hearing on revocation of probation (Cal Rules of Ct 4.305, 4.470), the court must advise the defendant of the term of parole following a commitment to state prison (Pen C §3000), and of the rights concerning appeal of the judgment (People v Serrano (1973) 33 CA3d 331, 109 CR 30).

When a misdemeanor defendant is not represented by counsel, the court must advise the defendant of his or her appeal rights. Cal Rules of Ct 4.306.

Action	Deadline	Authority
Pronouncement of judgment in felony case.	Within 20 judicial days after verdict, finding, or plea of guilty. May extend another 10 calendar days for new trial motion or motion in arrest of judgment. When sanity is in issue, may extend until that issue is heard and determined. When defendant is placed in diagnostic facility under Pen C §1203.03, may extend for period of time equal to time elapsed between §1203.03 order and notice of whether defendant will be accepted in §1203.03 facility, or, when defendant will be accepted, time between notice of acceptance and defendant's return to court.	Pen C §1191.
Pronouncement of judgment in misdemeanor or infraction case.	Not less than 6 hours nor more than 5 calendar days after verdict, finding, or plea. Time may be extended additional days for the following: 10 calendar days for new trial motion or motion in arrest of judgment; 20 calendar days when probation is considered; and 90 calendar days at request of defendant or probation officer when probation considered.	Pen C §1449.
Imposition of sentence when defendant convicted of driving under the influence.	Within reasonable time, including time for receipt of any pre-sentence investigation report per Veh C §23655, or of defendant's driving record from DMV.	Veh C §§23600, 23655.
Recall of commitment to state prison under Pen C §1170(d).	Within 120 calendar days after commitment or at any time on recommendation of Secretary of California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) or Board of Parole Hearings.	Pen C §1170(d).
Recall of commitment under Pen C §1170(e).	Within 10 days after receipt of a positive recommendation by the Secretary of CDCR or the Board of Parole Hearings, or both, based on prisoner's health.	Pen C §1170(e).
Sentencing of defendant serving sentence on another offense, who has requested to be sentenced on pending matter (covers felonies and misdemeanors).	Within 90 calendar days after district attorney's receipt of defendant's request to be sentenced.	Pen C §§1381, 1381.5.
Sentencing of probationer who is committed to state prison for another offense.	Within 60 calendar days after court is notified of confinement if sentence on probation case has been imposed, or within 30 calendar days if sentence on probation case has not been imposed.	Pen C §1203.2a.
Notification to defendant of duty to register as sex, narcotics, or arson offender.	Before defendant is released on probation or discharged on parole.	Pen C §§290-290.023, 457.1; Health & S C §§11590, 11593.

III. TIME TO PRONOUNCE JUDGMENT

§35.3 A. General Rule

In a felony case, after a plea, finding, or verdict of guilty, the court must schedule a time for pronouncing judgment on the defendant. Pen C §1191. See also Pen C §859a(b). See §§8.6, 26.20. The time must be within 20 judicial days after the verdict, finding, or plea of guilty. The court may extend that time for up to 10 days to consider a motion for new trial, or in arrest of judgment, and may further extend the time until the probation officer's report is received, and any proceedings for granting or denying probation have been concluded. Pen C §1191.

In a misdemeanor or infraction case, after a plea, finding, or verdict of guilty, the court must pronounce judgment not less than 6 hours nor more than 5 calendar days after a verdict or plea of guilty, unless the defendant waives the time. Pen C §1449; People v Kriss (1979) 96 CA3d 913, 158 CR 420 (§1449 applies to infractions as well as misdemeanors). The court may extend the time for pronouncing judgment up to 10 calendar days in order to hear or decide any motion for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment. Pen C §1449. The court may also extend the time up to 20 calendar days whenever probation is being considered, except that, on request of the defendant or the probation officer, it may further extend the time up to an additional 90 calendar days. Pen C §1449.

On remedies for violating the Pen C §§1191 and 1449 deadlines, see §35.9.

© The Regents of the University of California

B. Exceptions

§35.4 1. Time Waiver

Defendants may waive time by either requesting or consenting to pronouncement of judgment outside the time limits of Pen C §1191 or §1449. People v Ford (1966) 65 C2d 41, 47, 52 CR 228 (felony); People v Atkins (1988) 203 CA3d 15, 249 CR 863 (felony), disapproved on other grounds in People v Jones (1990) 51 C3d 294, 322, 270 CR 611; In re Elsholz (1964) 228 CA2d 192, 197, 39 CR 356 (misdemeanor). It is common practice for the court to ask counsel whether the client wishes to waive time for pronouncing judgment.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.5 2. Mentally Incompetent Defendant; Combat Veteran

Time for pronouncing judgment may be extended for a mentally incompetent defendant, i.e., one who "is unable to understand the nature of the criminal proceedings or to assist counsel in the conduct of a defense in a rational manner." Pen C §1367.

The procedural route toward a finding of incompetency varies depending on whether the defendant is charged with a felony or a misdemeanor. Penal Code §§1367.1 and 1370.01 apply to misdemeanors only.

For further discussion of incompetency procedures, see §§48.3-48.21.

If a defendant who would otherwise receive a county jail or prison term alleges that he or she committed the offense as a result of post-traumatic stress disorder, substance abuse, or psychological problems stemming from his or her combat service in the U.S. armed forces, the trial court must hold a hearing to determine the truth of the allegation. Pen C §1170.9(b).

If the court concludes that the defendant's allegation is true and the defendant is otherwise eligible for probation, the court may place the defendant on probation and order the defendant into an appropriate treatment program if an appropriate program is available and the defendant agrees to participate. Pen C §1170.9.

This provision is intended to make the opportunity for alternative sentencing available to "all combat veterans" but is not intended to "expand probation eligibility for veterans who commit crimes." Stats 2006, ch 788, §1.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.6 3. Insane Defendant

If, in the court's opinion, whether in a felony or misdemeanor case, reasonable ground exists to believe the defendant is insane (see Pen C §1201(a)), the court may extend the time for pronouncing judgment until the question of the defendant's sanity has been heard and determined (Pen C §§1191 (felony), 1449 (misdemeanor)).

The term "insanity" used in Pen C §1201(a) appears to refer to mental incompetency as that term is defined in Pen C §1367(a). Penal Code §1201(a) provides that the question of "insanity" shall be tried as provided in Pen C §§1367-1375.5, which deal with mental incompetence.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.7 4. Defendant Convicted of Driving Under Influence

Under Veh C §23600, the court must pronounce sentence within a reasonable time, including the time for receipt of any presentence investigation report ordered under Veh C §23655. However, Veh C §13209 provides in part that "[n]otwithstanding the provisions of §1449 of the Penal Code, the time for pronouncement of judgment shall not commence to run until … the court receives the record of prior convictions from the department." Further, §23655 requires the court to obtain from the DMV a copy of the person's driving record to see whether the person is eligible to participate in an approved program as a condition of probation. Despite these seemingly conflicting time constraints, it appears that the "reasonable time" standard of §23600 controls.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.8 5. Defendant Placed in Diagnostic Facility (Felony Cases)

Whenever a defendant is convicted of a felony, the court, if it concludes that a just disposition of the case requires the diagnostic and treatment services that can be provided at a diagnostic facility of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR), may order a defendant placed temporarily in that facility for up to 90 days. Pen C §1203.03. See also Pen C §1191. See §§38.17, 38.19, 38.21. On credit for time served while undergoing the diagnostic study, see §37.55.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.9 C. Effect of Time Limit Violation

Absent a waiver, the pronouncement of judgment in a felony case after expiration of the period prescribed by Pen C §1191 is error. Pen C §1202. Unless the defendant is imprisoned on another conviction (see Pen C §§1381, 1381.5, 1389, discussed in §§19.30-19.32), the defendant's remedy is to move for a new trial. Pen C §1202. However, the failure to pronounce judgment within the time limitations of Pen C §§1191 and 1449 does not require a new trial or reversal unless the delay results in a miscarriage of justice. People v Ford (1966) 65 C2d 41, 52 CR 228; People v Harrison (1970) 5 CA3d 602, 85 CR 302; People v Cheffen (1969) 2 CA3d 638, 82 CR 658.

Penal Code §1191 does not apply to a remand for resentencing after the appellate court has affirmed the conviction. People v Flores (1988) 198 CA3d 1156, 244 CR 322.

The pronouncement of judgment in a misdemeanor case before the period prescribed by §1449 is error that affects the judgment but not the plea or verdict. In re Elsholz (1964) 228 CA2d 192, 198, 39 CR 356. The remedy is to vacate the judgment and rearraign the defendant for sentence. In re Elsholz, supra. The pronouncement of judgment after the period prescribed by §1449 is challenged by a motion for a new trial. Pen C §1202; In re Hemstreet (1912) 18 CA 639, 123 P 984.

If the trial court refuses to hear or neglects to decide a defendant's motion for new trial based on §1202 grounds, the defendant is entitled to a new trial. Pen C §1202. Prejudice must be shown on appeal. People v Teddie (1981) 120 CA3d 756, 175 CR 49. See, generally, People v Braxton (2004) 34 C4th 798, 22 CR3d 46.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/35 PRONOUNCING JUDGMENT/§35.10 D. Recall of Sentence; Correction of Judgment

§35.10 D. Recall of Sentence; Correction of Judgment

On court's motion or recommendation of others. When a defendant has been sentenced to state prison under Pen C §1168(b) or §1170 and committed to the custody of the Secretary of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR), the court may recall the sentence and commitment previously ordered and resentence the defendant in the same manner as if he or she had not previously been sentenced. Pen C §1170(d). The court must hold a hearing to determine whether to recall the sentence of a terminally ill defendant when such recall is recommended by the Secretary of the CDCR or the Board of Parole Hearings, or both. Pen C §1170(e). Defense counsel commonly ask the court to recall its sentence; however, the court's denial of a defense request is not appealable. People v Chlad (1992) 6 CA4th 1719, 8 CR2d 610. A crime victim has no standing to request recall of a defendant's sentence. Dix v Superior Court (1991) 53 C3d 442, 279 CR 834.

Time for recall. The court's recall of a prisoner for resentencing on the recommendation of the Secretary of the CDCR or the Board of Parole Hearings may occur at any time; the 120-day limit does not apply. Pen C §1170(d). If the trial court recalls the sentence on its own motion, it must do so within 120 calendar days after the commitment date. Pen C §1170(d). If the court receives a recommendation to recall the sentence of a terminally ill defendant, the court must hold a hearing within 10 days after receipt of the recommendation to decide whether to recall the sentence. Pen C §1170(e).

120-day limitation. Failure to comply with the 120-day requirement deprives the trial court of jurisdiction to recall the defendant's sentence if the sentence has been entered in the court minutes or the defendant has begun serving the sentence. People v Kirkpatrick (1991) 1 CA4th 538, 542, 3 CR2d 213. The court may not recall or modify a sentence beyond the 120 days provided in §1170(d), even if the defendant has served no time in prison pending appeal and has not physically been delivered to the CDCR. People v Superior Court (Cornelius) (1995) 31 CA4th 343, 37 CR2d 156. Pronouncement of a new sentence, however, need not come within the 120-day period but must come within the "20 judicial days" of the recall. See Pen C §1191; Dix v Superior Court (1991) 53 C3d 442, 465, 279 CR 834 (concurring opinion of Mosk); People v Chlad (1992) 6 CA4th 1719, 1724 n5, 8 CR2d 610.

Ø Note: Both Chlad and Dix refer to 28 days; however, Pen C §1191 was later amended to 20 judicial days.

Effect of power to recall. The trial court has the power to recall a defendant's sentence while the defendant has an appeal pending. People v Nelms (2008) 165 CA4th 1465, 1472, 82 CR3d 32; People v Lockridge (1993) 12 CA4th 1752, 16 CR2d 340. Penal Code §1170(d) represents a limited statutory exception to the rule that a trial court loses jurisdiction to reconsider a denial of probation or to vacate or modify a sentence after a defendant has been committed and execution of sentence has begun. People v Pritchett (1993) 20 CA4th 190, 24 CR2d 391. The defendant's notice of appeal after conviction and sentencing does not toll the 120-day period to recall the sentence under §1170(d). See People v Lockridge, supra; Portillo v Superior Court (1992) 10 CA4th 1829, 13 CR2d 709.

Who decides recall. The original sentencing judge should be assigned a motion for recall and sentencing when that judge is available. See Pen C §1170(e)(8). If that judge is not available for any reason prescribed in Pen C §1053, then another judge may substitute. People v Jasso (1994) 25 CA4th 591, 30 CR2d 572.

Scope of power to recall. Recall of a sentence under Pen C §1170(d) is not limited to correcting errors. The trial court may recall a sentence for any reason rationally related to lawful sentencing and impose any otherwise lawful sentence suggested by the facts available at the time of resentencing. Dix v Superior Court, supra. Section 1170, however, "does not provide the trial court with any broader discretion to impose sentence than the court originally possessed at the initial sentencing." People v Blount (2009) 175 CA4th 992, 998, 96 CR3d 684. Any new sentence imposed cannot be greater than the initial sentence. Pen C §1170(d). The court does not have the power to modify the judgment of conviction, e.g., dismiss a count. People v Nelms, supra. Nor can the court alter the terms of a plea agreement agreed to by the parties and the trial court. Blount, supra. Recall of a sentence under §1170(e) may result in release of the terminally ill defendant under the postrelease plan provided by the director or board. See Pen C §1170(e)(2)-(7). If the court grants the recall and resentencing application, the prisoner must be released within 48 hours of receipt of the court's order, unless the inmate consents to a longer time. Pen C §1170(e)(9). At resentencing, the trial court must state its reasons in compliance with Cal Rules of Ct 4.406 and 4.420. People v Arnold (1988) 206 CA3d 88, 90, 253 CR 468.

One purpose of power to recall. Resentencing under §1170(d) is also intended "to eliminate disparity of sentences and to promote uniformity of sentencing." Pen C §1170(d).

§35.11 IV. AUTHORITY OF SUCCESSOR JUDGE; ARBUCKLE

When a defendant is found guilty at trial, it is better practice to have the same judge who presided over the trial impose sentence, although a different judge may do so. People v Downer (1962) 57 C2d 800, 22 CR 347; People v Jacobs (2007) 156 CA4th 728, 738, 67 CR3d 615. When sentence is imposed by a different judge, it must reflect an independent judgment, based on evidence properly before the court. If the new judge fails to exercise discretion, the sentence imposed is void. People v Downer, supra.

A defendant who pleads guilty has the right to be sentenced by the judge before whom the guilty plea was entered if that judge retained sentencing discretion under the agreement. If sentence is to be imposed by a different judge, the defendant has the right to withdraw the guilty plea. In re Mark L. (1983) 34 C3d 171, 193 CR 165; People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 150 CR 778.

The right to be sentenced by the same judge can be waived (commonly called an Arbuckle waiver). There is a split of authority on whether a defendant waives Arbuckle rights by silence when a different judge imposes sentence. In People v Adams (1990) 224 CA3d 1540, 1544, 274 CR 629, and People v Serrato (1988) 201 CA3d 761, 764, 247 CR 322, the courts held that a defendant waives Arbuckle rights by failing to object to a second judge at the sentencing hearing. In People v Horn (1989) 213 CA3d 701, 705, 261 CR 814, the court held that silence does not constitute a waiver, but failure to object is relevant in determining whether an Arbuckle right was a term of the plea agreement.

The Arbuckle rule does not apply when a judge's unavailability arises from circumstances clearly beyond the court's power, such as the judge's retirement, resignation, illness, or death. People v Jackson (1987) 193 CA3d 393, 403, 238 CR 327 (illness); People v Dunn (1986) 176 CA3d 572, 575, 222 CR 273 (retirement); People v Watson (1982) 129 CA3d 5, 7, 180 CR 759 (death). But see People v McIntosh (2009) 177 CA4th 534, 545, 98 CR3d 901 (right to withdraw plea because of unavailability beyond court's control depends on extent to which judge retained sentencing discretion under plea agreement and whether exercise of that discretion was express or implied part of bargain).

Ø Note: Defense counsel should make certain the record is clear at the time of plea that the same judge who accepted the plea will impose sentence, and object at sentencing if a different judge is present or assigned to sentence the defendant.

V. DEFENDANT'S PRESENCE

§35.12 A. Right to Be Present

Felony cases. In a felony case, the defendant has a statutory (Pen C §§977(b), 1193) and a constitutional (Cal Const art I, §15) right to be present for pronouncement of judgment. That right is of substantial importance because the defendant may be able to show cause why the judgment should not be pronounced or that there are grounds for a new trial or for a motion in arrest of judgment. See Pen C §1201; In re Levi (1952) 39 C2d 41, 45, 244 P2d 403. The defendant's presence also provides an opportunity to refute evidence in aggravation of the sentence (Pen C §§1170(b), 1204; Cal Rules of Ct 4.433(c)(1)), to object to the consideration of improper evidence (see In re Miller (1959) 176 CA2d 75, 78, 1 CR 62), to present mitigating evidence (Pen C §§1170(b), 1204; Cal Rules of Ct 4.433(c)(1)), and to ensure that the defendant has knowledge of the judgment in sufficient time to file an appeal (In re Cortez (1971) 6 C3d 78, 98 CR 307; In re Klein (1961) 197 CA2d 58, 65, 17 CR 71).

If the defendant is not present in a felony case, the court is not authorized to pronounce judgment unless the defendant waives the right to be present (see §35.13) or a diligent effort has been made to procure the defendant's presence and the court finds that it will be in the interest of justice that judgment be pronounced in the defendant's absence. Pen C §1193; People v White (1971) 18 CA3d 44, 95 CR 576. See, generally, People v Pigage (2003) 112 CA4th 1359, 1368, 6 CR3d 88 (same rule applies for appearances at trial). Otherwise, a judgment pronounced in the defendant's absence will be set aside with direction that the defendant be properly arraigned for judgment. People v Brown, supra. One exception to this rule is that judgment may be pronounced in the defendant's absence when the defendant has been sentenced to death and the death penalty has been affirmed on appeal. Pen C §1193(a).

A defendant may lose the right to be present by voluntarily and deliberately failing to appear (People v White (1971) 18 CA3d 44, 95 CR 576) or through misconduct (see, e.g., People v Booker (1977) 69 CA3d 654, 667, 138 CR 347).

Misdemeanor and infraction cases. The defendant has a constitutional right to be present at trial (Cal Const art I, §15; Pen C §686; see also In re Levi, supra) but may waive that right and appear through counsel in most cases. Pen C §977(a)(1). A misdemeanor defendant's appearance may be required in certain situations specified in §977(a)(2)-(3). For discussion, see §35.13.

When the defendant's presence is not statutorily required, the court may sentence a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor or infraction in the defendant's absence. Pen C §1193(b). A waiver requirement has been read into the statute by case law. See, e.g., People v Kriss (1979) 96 CA3d 913, 918, 158 CR 420.

§35.13 B. When Judgment Can Be Rendered in Defendant's Absence

In felony cases. The court may sentence the defendant in absentia under the following conditions:

- The defendant, in open court and on the record, or in a notarized writing, has requested that judgment be pronounced in his or her absence and that he or she be represented by an attorney when judgment is pronounced, and the court has approved the defendant's absence (Pen C §1193(a));
- The pro se defendant has requested that judgment in a noncapital case be pronounced in his or her absence and the court has appointed counsel to represent the defendant at the in absentia sentencing hearing (Pen C §1193(a));
- After the exercise of reasonable diligence to procure the defendant's presence, the court finds that it would be in the interest of justice to pronounce judgment in his or her absence (Pen C §1193(a); see also In re Jimenez (1969) 269 CA2d 621, 75 CR 152);
- The defendant, who is being held in another county (Pen C §1035) or currently on probation (Pen C §1203.2a), executes a written waiver allowing sentencing in absentia. See also §38.44.

In misdemeanor cases. In most instances, a defendant in a misdemeanor case may waive the right to be present at sentencing by having defense counsel appear on the defendant's behalf (see Pen C §977(a)(1)), by knowingly and intelligently waiving the right to be present (People v Kriss (1979) 96 CA3d 913, 919, 158 CR 420), or by voluntarily and deliberately failing to appear (see In re Baird (1957) 150 CA2d 561, 310 P2d 454 (waiver of presence at trial found); In re Klein (1961) 197 CA2d 58, 66, 17 CR 71 (no waiver found)). See Pen C §1193(b), which allows the court to sentence a defendant in his or her absence. Case law has added a waiver requirement. See People v Shelby (1980) 108 CA3d Supp 7, 166 CR 707. A defendant charged with domestic violence under Fam C §6211 or with violating a protective order under Pen C §273.6 must be present for sentencing. Pen C §977(a)(2). The court may order the defendant to appear at any other time during the proceeding in order to inform him or her of the conditions of a protective order issued under Pen C §136.2. Pen C §977(a)(2). In addition, the court may order a defendant charged with misdemeanor driving under the influence to be present at sentencing. Pen C §977(a)(3).

Trial court procedure. When a defendant is absent at the time set for sentencing, the trial court should ascertain whether the defendant's absence is a knowing and voluntary waiver of the right to be present. See People v Connolly (1973) 36 CA3d 379, 111 CR 409. See also People v Shelby (1980) 108 CA3d Supp 7, 166 CR 707 (court may not sentence defendant who fails to appear at sentencing unless court has before it sufficient facts to show that absence is voluntary). The trial court may issue a bench warrant to retain jurisdiction and toll any time limits. See People v Shelby, supra.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.14 C. Requiring Defendant's Presence

Felonies. In a felony case, the court may require the defendant to be personally present for sentencing. Pen C §977(b)(1). If the defendant is in custody, the court may direct the officer having custody to bring the defendant before the court for judgment. Pen C §1194. If the defendant is at liberty and fails to appear as required, bail or own recognizance release may be revoked and a bench warrant issued for the defendant's arrest. See Pen C §§1195, 1305, 1320.

Misdemeanors. In misdemeanor cases, because defendants ordinarily have the right to appear through counsel (Pen C §977(a)(1)), trial courts may not have "blanket policies" requiring the personal appearance of all defendants at sentencing. Olney v Municipal Court (1982) 133 CA3d 455, 184 CR 78 (decision whether to require defendant's presence must be made on case-by-case basis). For situations in which the defendant's presence at sentencing is statutorily required, see §35.13.

VI. DEFENDANT'S RIGHTS

§35.15 A. Bail

Whether to release on bail or allow a defendant to remain at liberty after conviction of a felony and before sentencing is discretionary. There is no absolute right to bail during the period between conviction and imposition of judgment in a felony case. See Pen C §§1166, 1272. The court should state on the record the factors it considered in setting bail under §1166 if the conviction is after trial on a not guilty plea. This statement is not required when the defendant pleads guilty or no contest. People v Seneca Ins. Co. (2003) 29 C4th 954, 129 CR2d 842. When admission to bail is sought after the sentencing hearing, notice of the hearing on the bail motion must be given to the prosecuting attorney at least 5 court days before the hearing. Pen C §1272(3).

In misdemeanor cases, a defendant who has not applied for probation or appealed has no absolute right to bail after conviction and before sentencing; it is discretionary with the court. See Pen C §§1166, 1449, 1458; People v Turner (1974) 39 CA3d 682, 114 CR 372. However, a defendant who has applied for probation or who has appealed is entitled to be released on bail as a matter of right before judgment is pronounced. Pen C §1272. See In re O'Driscoll (1987) 191 CA3d 1356, 236 CR 882. The trial court may set reasonable bail conditions related to public safety. In re McSherry (2003) 112 CA4th 856, 863, 5 CR3d 497.

For further discussion of release from custody, see chap 5.

§35.16 B. Right to Counsel at Sentencing

At the time judgment is pronounced in felony and misdemeanor cases, a defendant has a constitutional right to retained or appointed counsel. Cal Const art I, §15; Mempa v Rhay (1967) 389 US 128, 19 L Ed 2d 336, 88 S Ct 254; In re Cortez (1971) 6 C3d 78, 88, 98 CR 307.

The court is not required to inform a defendant of the right to counsel when the defendant has been advised of and waived that right at an earlier stage of the criminal proceedings. In re Fresquez (1967) 67 C2d 626, 634, 63 CR 271. The previous waiver remains in effect and the burden is on the defendant to take some affirmative action to reinstate the right. People v Norman (1967) 252 CA2d 381, 407, 60 CR 609, disapproved on other grounds in McDermott v Superior Court (1972) 6 C3d 693, 697, 100 CR 297. However, when a significant period of time has elapsed between the initial advisement and sentencing, the court must again inform the defendant of the right to counsel. In re Turrieta (1960) 54 C2d 816, 820, 8 CR 737 (2-year interval); In re Pickett (1972) 25 CA3d 1158, 1166, 102 CR 487 (14-month interval).

When a defendant who was represented by counsel before sentencing appears without explanation in pro per, the court must advise the defendant of the right to counsel, even if the defendant was informed earlier of that right. People v Maldonado (1965) 237 CA2d Supp 902, 904, 47 CR 470. If the defendant desires to proceed without counsel, the court must obtain a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of his or her right to counsel. Faretta v California (1975) 422 US 806, 45 L Ed 2d 562, 95 S Ct 2525; In re Johnson (1965) 62 C2d 325, 334, 42 CR 228. See also In re Perez (1966) 65 C2d 224, 231, 53 CR 414 (waiver of right to be present not waiver of counsel); In re Levi (1952) 39 C2d 41, 244 P2d 403 (no waiver by failure to request counsel).

The defendant's discharge of retained or appointed counsel does not, in itself, constitute a knowing and intelligent waiver of counsel. The court must either find that a waiver is intended and is knowledgeably made or require the attorney of record to continue with the case. In re Luna (1968) 257 CA2d 754, 757, 65 CR 121. See People v Gutkowsky (1963) 219 CA2d 223, 228, 33 CR 79 (court's consent necessary to discharge attorney at time of sentencing). See also People v Munoz (2006) 138 CA4th 860, 41 CR3d 842 (defendant may discharge retained counsel at sentencing without showing of conflict or good cause).

VII. HEARING ON PRONOUNCEMENT OF JUDGMENT

§35.17 A. Meaningful Opportunity to Object

A party may not challenge the court's discretionary sentencing choices on appeal if that party did not object at the time of sentencing. However, counsel must have a "meaningful opportunity to object." This "can occur only if, during the course of the sentencing hearing itself and before objections are made, the parties are clearly apprised of the sentence the court intends to impose, and the reasons that support any discretionary sentencing choices." People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 36 CR2d 627.

The court is not required to issue a tentative decision before the sentencing date and need not describe its proposed sentence as "tentative" as long as it "demonstrates a willingness to consider" objections to the sentence the court indicates it intends to impose and the reasons for the sentence. People v Gonzalez (2003) 31 C4th 745, 3 CR3d 676.

Ø Note: Counsel should consider requesting a brief continuance of the sentencing if the proposed sentence is unexpected, unusual, or particularly complex in order to further research and argue the issues. In complex cases, counsel should consider filing a sentencing brief before the sentencing date to assist the judge in understanding counsels' respective positions.

§35.18 B. Nature of Sentencing Hearing; Matters That Court May Consider at Hearing

The nature of the sentencing hearing is quite different in misdemeanor and in felony cases. See the description of these hearings in §36.4 (misdemeanor cases) and §37.51 (felony cases). See also §38.21 (generally).

Under Pen C §1204, which applies to both felony and misdemeanor cases, the court may hear the testimony of witnesses and consider the deposition of a witness who is too ill or infirm to come to court. Any oral statement by the defendant in mitigation of punishment must be made under oath and subject to cross-examination as authorized by Pen C §1204. People v Evans (2008) 44 C4th 590, 598, 80 CR3d 174. In addition, under Pen C §1204, the defense may introduce a written report presenting information on the defendant's background and personality and suggesting a rehabilitation program. A person who presents to a sentencing court "any … testimony or representation of any kind, verbal or written, in aggravation or mitigation of the punishment to be imposed … , except as provided" in the Penal Code, is guilty of a misdemeanor contempt of court. Pen C §166(a)(8). See Pen C §1204.

Despite the proscription of §1204, case law also permits the sentencing court to consider the following:

- Information included in the probation report, as long as there is "some substantial basis for believing the information is accurate and reliable." People v Peterson (1973) 9 C3d 717, 727, 108 CR 835; People v Calloway (1974) 37 CA3d 905, 908, 112 CR 745. The defendant does not, however, have the right to cross-examine the probation officer who prepared the report. People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 754, 150 CR 778 (Sixth Amendment right of confrontation inapplicable at sentencing stage of criminal proceedings).
- If a misdemeanor case was not referred to the probation department, information that could have been included in the report after telling the defendant of such information and permitting him or her to controvert it. Pen C §1203(d). For discussion of the probation report, see chap 38. See §§27.27-27.28 on preplea probation reports.
- Defense witnesses presented to counteract or correct any portion of the probation officer's report. People v Valdivia (1960) 182 CA2d 145, 148, 5 CR 832. See also Pen C §1204. However, a defendant has no right to court-appointed experts for sentencing. People v Stuckey (2009) 175 CA4th 898, 96 CR3d 477.
- Any reply by the prosecutor or probation officer to a report submitted by the defense suggesting a rehabilitation program. Pen C §1204.
- Information in a report from the Director of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) under Pen C §1203.03. These reports are discussed in §§35.4, 38.17, 38.19, 38.21.
- Any facts supplied by the record of trial, including the existence of prior convictions admitted or proved. People v Vatelli (1971) 15 CA3d 54, 64, 92 CR 763; People v Gillette (1959) 171 CA2d 497, 504, 341 P2d 398; People v Giles (1945) 70 CA2d Supp 872, 884, 161 P2d 623.
- Facts relating to counts or cases dismissed if the facts in the dismissed counts are "transactionally related" to the crimes for which the defendant is being sentenced. People v Harvey (1979) 25 C3d 754, 758, 159 CR 696; People v Lamb (1999) 76 CA4th 664, 672, 90 CR2d 565. Dismissed counts not transactionally related may be considered if the defendant consents. People v Harvey, supra.
- Conduct underlying a charge of which the defendant was acquitted. People v Towne (2008) 44 C4th 63, 85, 78 CR3d 530.
- The defendant's perjury at trial in determining his or her prospects for rehabilitation. People v Redmond (1981) 29 C3d 904, 913, 176 CR 780. See also U.S. v Dunnigan (1993) 507 US 87, 122 L Ed 2d 445, 113 S Ct 1111 (federal judges may enhance sentence of criminal defendants found to have committed perjury on witness stand).
- The views of the victim of a crime, or his or her parent or guardian if the victim is a minor, or the next of kin of the victim if the victim has died. These views may be expressed in person or by counsel, and may relate to the facts of the crime, the person responsible, and the need for restitution. Pen C §1191.1. The court must consider these statements in imposing sentence and state on the record its conclusion concerning whether the defendant would pose a threat to public safety if granted probation. Pen C §1191.1. Instead of or in addition to a personal appearance, the victim, the parent or guardian of a minor victim, or the next of kin of a deceased victim may file with the court a written, audio- or videotaped statement, or a statement stored on a CD-ROM, DVD, or any other recording medium acceptable to the court. Pen C §1191.15.

- Other out-of-court or unsworn statements concerning the circumstances of the crime and the characteristics of the defendant relevant to sentencing as long as the defendant has notice that the statements will be accepted and has an opportunity to respond. People v Mockel (1990) 226 CA3d 581, 586, 276 CR 559 (consideration of letters from friends and family of victim did not violate defendant's due process right to fair hearing). The defendant does not have the right to cross-examine the victim or other source of these statements. People v Huber (1986) 181 CA3d 601, 635, 227 CR 113; People v Zikorus (1983) 150 CA3d 324, 333, 197 CR 509. See People v Sewell (1989) 210 CA3d 1447, 259 CR 34 (use of victim's impact statement—permitted by §1191.1—at sentencing does not impermissibly divert sentencer's attention from relevant issues of defendant's blameworthiness and facts of crime in violation of US Const amend VIII).
- The driving record of the defendant in driving-under-the-influence cases. The court must obtain and consider such a report from the DMV. Veh C §13209.

Ø Note: Vehicle Code §41500 may be invoked on a client's commitment to state prison or to the Division of Juvenile Justice. Section 41500 prohibits prosecution for most nonfelony offenses arising from operation of a motor vehicle that are pending at the time of commitment. The statute does not apply to persons who are temporarily released from custody, on parole, or charged with violating Veh C §23103, §23152, or §23153. Veh C §41500(e)-(f).

The following information should not be included in the probation report or considered by the court:

- Evidence suppressed as a result of an unlawful search and seizure after a Pen C §1538.5 hearing. People v Belleci (1979) 24 C3d 879, 157 CR 503 (sentencing court erred by not striking suppressed evidence from probation report). The validity of the Belleci decision is in doubt, however, with the passage of Proposition 8, which added former art I, §28(d), to the California Constitution (right to truth-in-evidence) (now see Cal Const art I, §28(f)(2)). See People v Moore (1988) 201 CA3d 877, 885, 247 CR 353 (evidence suppressed under §1538.5 is inadmissible only if exclusion is required by Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule). See also People v Brewster (1986) 184 CA3d 921, 928, 229 CR 352 (illegally seized evidence suppressed in unrelated matter is admissible).
- Arrests for charges resulting in successful completion of a diversion or deferred entry of judgment (DEJ) program. On successful completion of a DEJ program, the arrest on which the DEJ was based is deemed never to have occurred. Pen C §§1000.4, 1001.9.
- Arrests not resulting in convictions. Records of arrests that did not result in conviction should not be included in a probation report or considered by the sentencing judge unless supporting factual information is included and the information is not presented in a misleading manner. People v Ratcliffe (1981) 124 CA3d 808, 823, 177 CR 627; People v Calloway (1974) 37 CA3d 905, 909, 112 CR 745.
- Juvenile records sealed under Welf & I C §389.
- Arrest or convictions for marijuana offenses specified in Health & S C §11361.5 that are subject to destruction 2 years after the date of conviction or after the date of arrest if the defendant was not convicted. Health & S C §11361.7(a); People v Boyd (1979) 24 C3d 285, 292, 155 CR 367; People v Fick (1980) 107 CA3d 892, 897, 166 CR 106.

On probation reports, see §§38.4-38.11; on conditions of probation, see §§38.26-38.30; on probation under Proposition 36 (Stats 2001, ch 721), see §38.3A.

§35.19 C. Defendant's Right to Confrontation

At the sentencing hearing, the defendant does not have a right to cross-examine the probation officer who prepared the report. People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 753, 150 CR 778. The defendant does have the right to cross-examine sources of information relied on by the court that were not supplied by the probation officer's report or by the record of the trial. See In re Calhoun (1976) 17 C3d 75, 130 CR 139. "Such facts… should have been obtained from the lips of witnesses called in open court, in the presence of the defendant." People v Giles (1945) 70 CA2d Supp 872, 884, 161 P2d 623.

If the judge relies, even in part, on statements made out of court that the defendant has no opportunity to meet, it is a basis for reversal with directions to rearraign the accused for proper probation and sentence proceedings. Such a defective judgment is subject to being set aside by motion at any time. People v Webster (1983) 143 CA3d 679, 192 CR 86; People v Surplice (1962) 203 CA2d 784, 792, 21 CR 826. See also People v Giles, supra.

§35.19A D. Sentencing Entrapment/Sentencing Manipulation

When the police induce a defendant who was predisposed to commit a lesser offense into committing an offense subject to greater punishment, it is called "sentencing entrapment." Some federal courts, including the Ninth Circuit, have held that when sentence entrapment occurs, the defendant's sentence should be reduced. U.S. v Staufer (9th Cir 1994) 38 F3d 1103. In addition, some federal courts authorize a reduction in a defendant's sentence for "sentencing manipulation," i.e., when law enforcement officials, in order to increase a defendant's sentence, engage in conduct so outrageous as to violate the defendant's right to due process. U.S. v Lacey (10th Cir 1996) 86 F3d 956.

The California Supreme Court rejected the practice of reducing sentences in cases of sentencing entrapment in People v Smith (2003) 31 C4th 1207, 7 CR3d 559. In the same case, however, the court left open the possibility of sentence reduction because of sentencing manipulation, explaining that in a drug case "defendants establish sentence manipulation for purposes of the quantity enhancement when they show the police selected the amount of drugs for no legitimate law enforcement purpose but solely to maximize the defendants' sentence." 31 C4th at 1212.

§35.20 E. Continuance of Hearing

In misdemeanor cases, if the court intends to base its sentence on information that could have been contained in a probation report, but will not refer the defendant to the probation officer for a report before sentencing, the court must advise the defendant of the information to be considered. On request, the court must grant the defendant a continuance to enable him or her to meet or controvert this information. Pen C §1203(d). See also Veh C §40806 (continuance for defendant to answer or rebut police reports considered by court in imposing sentence on guilty plea).

The prosecution or the probation officer may obtain a continuance to enable it to respond if a defense report is submitted. See Pen C §1204.

Sometimes trial courts sentence a defendant, then grant a stay of execution to allow the defendant more time out of custody before beginning to serve the sentence. The court may not condition the stay by advising the defendant that failure to appear to begin serving the sentence will be punished by an additional term of imprisonment. People v Gooch (1995) 33 CA4th 1004, 39 CR2d 518. The court is authorized only to vacate the previously imposed sentence and permit the defendant to withdraw the plea, or to reduce the initial sentence. The court cannot increase the sentence. People v Gooch, supra. However, a defendant may enter a waiver by agreeing to a sanction for nonappearance and disallowing the withdrawal of a plea. People v Cruz (1988) 44 C3d 1247, 1250, 246 CR 1. See, e.g., People v Vargas (1990) 223 CA3d 1107, 273 CR 48 (agreed-on increased sentence if defendant failed to appear at sentencing proper when supported by waivers under Cruz; sometimes referred to as "Vargas" waivers). Other times, a defendant is sentenced to a greater term that will be reduced at the agreed-on appearance date. People v Carr (2006) 143 CA4th 786, 49 CR3d 548.

§35.21 F. Arraignment for Judgment

A defendant appearing for judgment must be informed by the court, or by the clerk under its direction, of the nature of the charge, the pleas entered, the verdict if any, and must be asked whether there is any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced. Pen C §1200; Stenback v Municipal Court (1969) 272 CA2d 27, 31, 76 CR 917 (court may render judgment only if defendant fails to show legal cause why judgment should not be pronounced).

If the court grants probation without pronouncing sentence, no technical arraignment for judgment is necessary (see People v McShane (1954) 126 CA2d Supp 845, 272 P2d 571), but, if sentence is to be imposed, arraignment is mandatory, unless waived (see Pen C §§1200-1201; People v Hawthorne (1944) 63 CA2d 262, 264, 146 P2d 517; People v Swift (1934) 140 CA 7, 34 P2d 1041). However, failure to comply with §1200 is a ground for reversal only when it causes prejudice resulting in a miscarriage of justice. People v Hawthorne, supra; People v Swift, supra.

VIII. ALLOCUTION

§35.22 A. Allocution Defined

Allocution is the formal inquiry by the judge at the arraignment for sentencing about whether the defendant has any legal cause to show why sentence should not be pronounced. Pen C §1200; People v Evans (2008) 44 C4th 590, 592, 80 CR3d 174. "Only if the defendant fails to show legal cause why judgment should not be pronounced at this time may the court render judgment." Stenback v Municipal Court (1969) 272 CA2d 27, 31, 76 CR 917 (misdemeanor case).

Penal Code §1200 does not entitle the defendant, in response to the trial court's allocution, to offer an unsworn personal statement in mitigation of punishment. Any oral statement by the defendant in mitigation of punishment must be made under oath and subject to cross-examination. People v Evans, supra.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.23 B. Causes Against Judgment

In allocution, the defendant may show the following as cause against judgment:

- Present insanity. If the trial court thinks that a reasonable ground exists to believe the defendant insane, the question of insanity must be tried in accordance with Pen C §§1367-1375.5. Pen C §1201(a).
- Cause in arrest of judgment. If the defendant has good cause to offer in arrest of judgment, the court may, in its discretion, order the judgment to be deferred and proceed to decide the motion in arrest of judgment. Pen C §1201(b). See Pen C §§1004, 1185-1186. For discussion of motions in arrest of judgment, see §34.19.
- Cause for new trial. If the defendant has good cause to offer for a new trial, the court may, in its discretion, order the judgment to be deferred and proceed to decide the new trial motion. Pen C §1201(b). See Pen C §§1179-1182. For discussion of motions for new trial, see §§34.3-34.16.
- Invalidity of priors. If the court intends to consider a prior conviction in determining sentence, and that prior is challenged by the defense as factually or constitutionally invalid, the court must decide the validity of the prior. People v Sumstine (1984) 36 C3d 909, 206 CR 707. There are two exceptions: A criminal defendant may not collaterally challenge a prior conviction on the ground of ineffective assistance of counsel in a noncapital case (Garcia v Superior Court (1997) 14 C4th 953, 59 CR2d 858), and a challenge based on a violation of Boykin-Tahl rights can be made only if the prior conviction is post-Tahl, i.e., after November 7, 1969 (People v Allen (1999) 21 C4th 424, 87 CR2d 682). However, Garcia v Superior Court, supra, does not apply to federal habeas jurisdiction over challenges to state prior convictions. Pogue v Ratelle (2001) 532 US 1063, 149 L Ed 2d 1041, 121 S Ct 2209. On challenging the validity of a prior conviction, see §§24.28-24.43.

§35.24 IX. RENDITION AND ENTRY OF JUDGMENT

The rendition of judgment is the oral pronouncement of sentence. People v Moran (1973) 33 CA3d 724, 728, 109 CR 287. The judgment must be pronounced orally and must reflect the court's ruling on the matter. People v Hartsell (1973) 34 CA3d 8, 13, 109 CR 627 (failure to state findings on priors); People v Blackman (1963) 223 CA2d 303, 35 CR 761; In re Bateman (1928) 94 CA 639, 271 P 757. Pen C §§1202, 1445. The court should read any fines, fees, penalties, or surcharges into the record separately at sentencing. See People v High (2004) 119 CA4th 1192, 1200, 15 CR3d 148.

If no sufficient cause against judgment is alleged or appears to the court at the time fixed for pronouncing judgment, judgment should be pronounced, as provided in Pen C §1191. See §35.10 on the effect of failure to render judgment within the time fixed by law or within the time to which the hearing was properly continued.

Once judgment has been rendered, the court clerk must enter in the minutes the judgment as orally pronounced, and a copy of the judgment must be filed with the papers in the case. Pen C §1207. The entry must include a brief statement of the offense and the fact of any prior conviction. Pen C §1207; see In re Candelario (1970) 3 C3d 702, 706, 91 CR 497 (felony judgment silent about priors); People v Hartsell, supra (same). If there later proves to be a discrepancy between the judgment as pronounced and the judgment as entered in the minutes, the judgment as pronounced governs. People v Mesa (1975) 14 C3d 466, 121 CR 473. See also People v Smith (1983) 33 C3d 596, 189 CR 862, on conflicts in the record. But see People v Thompson (2009) 180 CA4th 974, ___ CR3d ___ (when oral pronouncement of sentence was erroneous, correct minute order and abstract of judgment prevailed).

> Ø Note: The minute order may be relied on by a federal district court at sentencing in applying the modified categorical approach to determine career offender status. U.S. v Snellenberger (9th Cir 2008) 548 F3d 699, 701 (en banc). In Snellenberger, the court rejected the defense argument that the minute order should not be relied on because it is not something seen or approved by the parties, noting that it is not "secret" and can be checked to ensure it accurately reflected the proceedings.

When the court's oral judgment on prior convictions is ambiguous, the defendant is entitled to a limited new trial on that issue. People v Meals (1975) 48 CA3d 215, 121 CR 742 (court had found prior "true as admitted" despite defendant's recorded denial).

X. NOTICES TO DEFENDANT

§35.25 A. Duty to Register

If the defendant is convicted of a drug-related offense listed in Health & S C §11590, or of an attempt to commit one of the listed offenses, the court must inform the defendant of the duty to register if the court releases him or her on probation or only imposes a fine. Health & S C §11593.

If the defendant is convicted of an offense listed in Pen C §290(c) or of an attempt or conspiracy to commit one of the listed offenses, the court must inform the defendant of the duty to register if the court conditionally releases the defendant without supervised probation or only imposes a fine. Pen C §290.017(d). Note that equal protection considerations now require the trial court to consider not imposing registration if other similar conduct does not require registration. See People v Hofsheier (2006) 37 C4th 1185, 1198, 39 CR3d 821; People v Cavallaro (2009) 178 CA4th 103, 110, 100 CR3d 139; People v Thompson (2009) 177 CA4th 1424, 1430, 100 CR3d 57; People v Luansing (2009) 176 CA4th 676, 680, 97 CR3d 836; People v Ranscht (2009) 173 CA4th 1369, 1375, 93 CR3d 800; In re J.P. (2009) 170 CA4th 1292, 1299, 89 CR3d 17. See also People v Kennedy (2009) 180 CA4th 403, 409, ___ CR3d ___ (declining to extend Hofsheier to felony violations of Pen C §288.2(b)).

Ø Note: When a defendant who is convicted of an offense for which registration is required is incarcerated, the director of the place of confinement is responsible for informing him or her of the registration requirement. Pen C §290.017(a); Health & S C §11592.

§35.26 B. Duty to Submit to AIDS Testing

The court must inform every person convicted of specified sex offenses of the duty to submit to a blood or saliva test for evidence of antibodies to the probable causative agent of Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS). Pen C §1202.1(d)-(e). Each person tested must be informed of the results of the blood or saliva test. Pen C §1202.1(a).

The duty to inform convicted persons under Pen C §1202.1 applies whether a sentence or fine is imposed or probation is granted. Pen C §1202.1(a).

The results of the test must also be made available to the prosecuting attorney on request for the sole purpose of preparing counts for a subsequent offense under Pen C §647f (prostitution following prior conviction and positive AIDS test) or to enhance a sentence under Pen C §12022.85 (commission of sexual offense with knowledge that defendant carries AIDS virus). Pen C §1202.1(c).

For a first offense of Pen C §647(b) (soliciting or engaging in prostitution), the court must, before sentencing or as a condition of probation, order the defendant to submit to an AIDS test. Pen C §1202.6(a). On a second or subsequent conviction of §647(b), the court must, before sentencing, order the defendant to submit to an AIDS test.

Ø Note: Penal Code §§1202.1 and 1202.6 should be clearly distinguished from Pen C §1524.1 and Health & S C §§121050-121070. The latter code sections permit AIDS testing of charged defendants before conviction in specified circumstances. They are discussed in §18.38.

§35.27 C. Right to Appeal

Felonies. Every defendant convicted of a felony has a right to appeal the judgment. Pen C §§1235-1237.5. The trial court is required to advise a defendant of the right to appeal after imposing sentence on conviction after trial or revocation of probation. Cal Rules of Ct 4.305, 4.470. See also Cal Rules of Ct 5.590 (advisement of right to review in juvenile proceedings), amended effective July 10, 2010. There is no equivalent provision, however, requiring advisement after a plea of guilty. In re Ibarra (1983) 34 C3d 277, 283 n1, 193 CR 538; People v Serrano (1973) 33 CA3d 331, 109 CR 30. There is as yet no authority requiring a trial court to advise the defendant of the loss of any appeal rights following a guilty plea. See In re Ibarra, supra.

In advising a defendant of the right to appeal from the judgment, the court must advise the defendant of the necessary steps and time for taking an appeal, and the right to have counsel appointed by the reviewing court if the defendant is indigent. Specifically, the defendant must be advised of the need to file a written notice of appeal with the clerk of the sentencing court within 60 days after the date of pronouncement of judgment. The defendant must be advised that, if an appeal is taken, and he or she is unable to hire a lawyer, the appellate court will appoint a lawyer to represent the defendant on appeal at no cost. The defendant must be advised of the right to a free transcript and a record of the necessary proceedings in the trial court. Last, the defendant must be advised that the written notice of appeal must be timely filed. Cal Rules of Ct 4.305, 4.470.

Ø Note: There is no right to a transcript of a codefendant's trial. People v Hayden (1994) 22 CA4th 48, 27 CR2d 127.

Failure to advise a defendant of the right to appeal may result in a presumption of prejudice to the defendant. Abels v Kaiser (10th Cir 1990) 913 F2d 821; Estes v U.S. (8th Cir 1989) 883 F2d 645.

On appeals in criminal cases, see Pen C §§1239-1265 and Cal Rules of Ct 8.300-8.482. See also chaps 43-44. See generally Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chaps 1-6 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). On trial counsel's duty to assist defendant in perfecting appeal, see §§41.4-41.7 and Appeals & Writs §§2.3-2.11.

Misdemeanors. After imposing sentence or making an order deemed to be a final judgment in a misdemeanor case, on conviction after trial or following a revocation of probation, the court must orally or in writing advise a defendant not represented by counsel of the following (Cal Rules of Ct 4.306):

- The right to appeal to the superior court appellate division (Pen C §1466);
- The deadline for filing a notice of appeal (30 days; Cal Rules of Ct 8.853); and
- The right of an indigent defendant to have counsel appointed on appeal (see In re Henderson (1964) 61 C2d 541, 39 CR 373 (counsel must be appointed on appeal of misdemeanor, particularly when conviction may result in serious consequences)).

Other situations. Defendants convicted only of an infraction and probationers who have had probation revoked after admitting a probation violation do not have to be advised of the right to appeal. Cal Rules of Ct 4.306.

Waiving right to appeal. The right to appeal is a statutory right only. An express waiver of the right to appeal made under a plea bargain is valid as long as the defendant's waiver is a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary one. People v Castrillon (1991) 227 CA3d 718, 721, 278 CR 121.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.28 D. Period of Parole

Every sentence under Pen C §1168 or §1170 includes a period of parole unless the Board of Parole Hearings, for good cause, waives parole and discharges the inmate from department custody. Pen C §3000(a)-(b). See also In re Carabes (1983) 144 CA3d 927, 193 CR 65. Therefore, every defendant convicted of a felony and sentenced to prison must be told at the time of sentencing that, in addition to the sentence imposed, he or she is also subject to a period of parole under Pen C §§3000 and 3000.1. On parole generally, see chap 47.

A guilty plea is not voluntarily and intelligently made when a trial judge fails to inform a defendant of a mandatory parole term concomitant to the sentence imposed. When a criminal statute imposes a mandatory parole term to be served following completion of the confinement period, the parole term is necessarily a direct consequence of the guilty plea. A plea of guilty can be voluntary only if it is entered by one fully aware of the direct consequences. Carter v McCarthy (9th Cir 1986) 806 F2d 1373. For a list of the most common direct consequences of a guilty plea, see §26.16.

XI. ALTERNATIVES IN CONTROLLED SUBSTANCE CASES

§35.29 A. Commitment to California Rehabilitation Center (CRC)

At the time sentence is imposed in a felony case, if it appears that the defendant is in imminent danger of becoming addicted to or is already addicted to narcotics, the court must sentence the defendant as it would without the addiction consideration, and then suspend execution of the sentence. The court must then order the district attorney to file a petition for determination of whether the defendant is addicted or in imminent danger of becoming addicted to narcotics. Welf & I C §3051; People v Granado (1994) 22 CA4th 194, 27 CR2d 286.

On the filing of the petition, a doctor is appointed to give an opinion on the issue of addiction. Welf & I C §3051. A hearing is held and the court makes its determination. If dissatisfied with the court's decision, the defendant has the right to a jury trial on the issue of whether he or she is addicted to or in imminent danger of becoming addicted to narcotics. Welf & I C §§3051, 3108; People v Thomas (1977) 19 C3d 630, 139 CR 594. If the defendant is found to be addicted or in imminent danger of becoming addicted, the defendant is committed to the California Rehabilitation Center (CRC) at Norco, California, until discharged by that facility. Ordinarily, the defendant may not be incarcerated at CRC beyond the maximum commitment received for the underlying offense(s). Welf & I C §3201(c).

The defendant may be found to be ineligible for CRC in three circumstances: (1) if the defendant has been convicted of certain offenses and/or certain enhancements have been found true (see Welf & I C §3052(a)(1)-(2)); (2) if the sentence imposed on the defendant exceeds 6 years (Welf & I C §3052(a)(2)); or (3) if the defendant's criminal history demonstrates a pattern of excessive criminality (Welf & I C §3053(a); People v Granado, supra; People v Ellers (1980) 108 CA3d 943, 956, 166 CR 888). The court must state its reasons on the record for denying CRC. People v Jeffery (2006) 142 CA4th 192, 47 CR3d 691; People v McLemore (1994) 27 CA4th 601, 32 CR2d 687; People v Granado, supra. For further discussion of §3051 procedures, see §§37.64-37.66.

§35.29A B. Proposition 36 Treatment

Proposition 36, the Substance Abuse and Crime Prevention Act of 2000, was passed by California voters in November 2000 and became effective July 1, 2001. The specific provisions of the Act relating to probation and probation revocation are codified at Pen C §§1210-1210.1. Under Proposition 36, defendants convicted of nonviolent drug possession offenses must be sentenced to probation and drug treatment instead of incarceration. The court may impose additional terms of probation for drug-related probation violations. Pen C §1210.1(a). Note that the judgment enjoining the enforcement of SB 1137, which was signed into law in 2006 and amended the provisions of Proposition 36 to permit, among other things, the incarceration of offenders placed on Proposition 36 probation who relapse during treatment, has been affirmed. See Gardner v Schwarzenegger (2009) 178 CA4th 1366, 101 CR3d 229.

On successful completion of the drug treatment program, the defendant may petition the court to dismiss the charge(s) for which treatment was accorded.

For discussion of Proposition 36, see §§38.3A, 46.36-46.41.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.29B C. Deferred Entry of Judgment

Penal Code §1000 allows for individuals charged with certain offenses involving simple possession of a controlled substance or being under the influence of a controlled substance to be diverted out of the criminal process into a drug program. Successful completion of the program can result in the dismissal of criminal charges. On deferred entry of judgment and diversion generally, see chap 27.

XII. CORRECTING ERRORS IN PRONOUNCING JUDGMENT

§35.30 A. Clerical and Judicial Error Distinguished

The trial court may, without recalling the sentence under Pen C §1170(d) (see §35.5), modify or correct only clerical errors in a judgment. If an error was made in "recording the judgment rendered," it is clerical in nature. In re Candelario (1970) 3 C3d 702, 705, 91 CR 497; People v Schultz (1965) 238 CA2d 804, 807, 48 CR 328. The trial court may not modify or correct judicial errors. In re Candelario, supra. To be characterized as clerical, an error must have been inadvertent and not reasonably attributable to an exercise of discretion. Bowden v Green (1982) 128 CA3d 65, 71, 180 CR 90. For example, the oral pronouncement of judgment is a judicial act, but the entry of the judgment in the minutes is clerical. People v Wilshire Ins. Co. (1977) 67 CA3d 521, 532, 136 CR 693. A void sentence may be corrected at any time. See §35.34.

Some of the decisions distinguishing judicial from clerical error are contradictory and difficult to reconcile. The trial court has a great deal of discretion in this area.

If the record is silent, counsel opposing correction may argue that it leads to the inference that the omission was a willful act and operates as a finding, and may not be presumed to be clerical error. See, e.g., In re Candelario, supra (trial court failed to include prior conviction in judgment); People v Thomas (1978) 84 CA3d 281, 283, 148 CR 532 (trier of fact failed to specify degree of offense when returning verdict).

Counsel (usually the prosecutor) who wishes the record corrected may argue that an omission was an oversight (People v Castellano (1978) 79 CA3d 844, 861, 145 CR 264 (court's omission of first degree robbery finding from oral pronouncement held oversight when jury had found robbery to be first degree); People v Prater (1977) 71 CA3d 695, 703, 139 CR 566 (failure to orally pronounce sentence on enhancement under Pen C §12022.5 deemed oversight; matter remanded for resentencing)), or that some statute, case, or judicial policy requires that the court correct the error (Hoffman v Superior Court (1981) 122 CA3d 715, 177 CR 868 (matter remanded for trial judge to pronounce judgment on one count); People v Williams (1980) 103 CA3d 507, 519, 163 CR 169 (silence will not bar subsequent correction by trial court adding sentence for prior felony enhancement under Pen C §667.5 because Determinate Sentencing Law requires statement of reasons for striking prior)).

When a discrepancy appears between the oral pronouncement or minute order and the abstract of judgment, courts generally resolve it in favor of the oral rendition. People v McGahuey (1981) 121 CA3d 524, 530, 175 CR 479 (sentence pronounced orally could not be later "modified" without defendant's presence when it resulted in substantial change to defendant's detriment); People v Zackery (2007) 147 CA4th 380, 386, 54 CR3d 198 (clerk could not include fines in abstract of judgment that were never orally imposed by judge); People v Bowie (1977) 72 CA3d 143, 157, 140 CR 49 (court's comments showed it was aware of priors and did not intend to sentence defendant as prior offender); People v Hartsell (1973) 34 CA3d 8, 13, 109 CR 627 (reference in abstract of judgment to prior convictions stricken because priors not included in oral pronouncement of judgment or entered in minutes). A court of appeal that has properly assumed jurisdiction of a case may order correction of an abstract of judgment that does not accurately reflect the oral judgment of the sentencing court. People v Mitchell (2001) 26 C4th 181, 185, 109 CR2d 303. See People v Samaniego (2009) 172 CA4th 1148, 1183, 91 CR3d 874 (remand to trial court to correct abstracts of judgments to reflect victim restitution award as joint and several).

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.31 B. Clerical Error

If an error is clerical in nature, the court has the inherent power to correct it so that the record reflects the actual facts. The correction can be made even while the case is on appeal. In re Roberts (1962) 200 CA2d 95, 97, 19 CR 147.

The trial court may correct clerical errors on its own motion or on the motion of any party at any time without notice. People v Flores (1960) 177 CA2d 610, 613, 2 CR 363; In re Roberts, supra.

The following are matters that can be corrected as clerical error:

- A minute entry corrected to reflect the actual number of grand jurors concurring in a true bill (Bogart v Superior Court (1964) 230 CA2d 874, 41 CR 480);
- The number of a subsection of the Penal Code statute under which the defendant was convicted to conform to the jury's actual finding (People v Shirley (1970) 10 CA3d 268, 88 CR 853; People v Schultz (1965) 238 CA2d 804, 48 CR 328);
- The record to reflect a commitment under Pen C §1368 and not §1026 (People v Anderson (1976) 59 CA3d 831, 131 CR 104 (clerical correction made 2 years after commitment order)); and
- An abstract of judgment to reflect the correct sentence of the middle and not the upper term (People v Jackson (1981) 117 CA3d 654, 172 CR 856 (correction made by court of appeal)).

If a correction would substantially modify the original judgment or materially alter the rights of the parties, it may not be considered a clerical error unless the record clearly demonstrates that the error was not the result of the exercise of judicial discretion. In re Candelario (1970) 3 C3d 702, 705, 91 CR 497; Morgan v State Bd. of Equalization (1949) 89 CA2d 674, 682, 201 P2d 859. See People v Kelly (1999) 72 CA4th 842, 85 CR2d 430, which upheld a resentencing to the same number of years based on a previous plea bargain even though the court and counsel erroneously believed that the upper term of 6 years was the middle term.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.32 C. Judicial Error

Judicial error is error that resulted from the exercise of judicial discretion. In re Wimbs (1966) 65 C2d 490, 498, 55 CR 222. The general rule is that judicial error cannot be corrected by amendment. In re Candelario (1970) 3 C3d 702, 705, 91 CR 497 (trial court lacked power to amend judgment to add finding of prior felony conviction); People v Drake (1981) 123 CA3d 59, 63, 176 CR 186 (imposing sentence of 6 years is judicial act and cannot be amended even if 10 years intended). Compare People v Kelly (1999) 72 CA4th 842, 85 CR2d 430, discussed in §35.31, with People v Ferrara (1988) 202 CA3d 201, 208, 248 CR 311 (trial court may not revise factual finding under guise of correcting clerical error).

A dismissal entered through "misapprehension" by the court is a judicial act and may not later be corrected. Smith v Superior Court (1981) 115 CA3d 285, 292, 171 CR 387.

§35.33 D. Correcting Oral Pronouncement of Sentence

The court may modify or correct an oral pronouncement of sentence before the defendant begins serving the sentence and before it is recorded in the minutes. People v Thomas (1959) 52 C2d 521, 530, 342 P2d 889 (prison instead of jail term imposed before end of day); People v Guerrero (1975) 47 CA3d 441, 120 CR 732 (state prison sentence corrected when defendant could be sentenced to county jail only). See also §35.34 on correcting void sentences.

© The Regents of the University of California

§35.34 E. Vacating or Correcting Void Sentence

When a sentence is unauthorized by law, the court may correct it even if it has been entered in the minutes, execution has commenced, and the defendant has appealed. People v Chagolla (1983) 144 CA3d 422, 434, 193 CR 711 (court attached enhancement to wrong count; attached to correct count after defendant filed notice of appeal). See also People v Ross (1994) 28 CA4th 1151, 33 CR2d 894 (court of appeal directed trial court to prepare amended abstract of judgment and forward it to appropriate authorities).

The appellate court has the power to change a sentence that is void for lack of jurisdiction. See, e.g., People v Vasilyan (2009) 174 CA4th 443, 94 CR3d 260 (motion to vacate judgment and withdraw plea granted for lack of subject matter jurisdiction after California Supreme Court subsequently characterized statutory provision under which defendant was convicted and deported as penalty provision rather than substantive offense); In re May (1976) 62 CA3d 165, 168, 133 CR 33 (legislature subsequently declared offense misdemeanor; habeas corpus granted and probationer's conviction reduced in light of trial court's exceeding jurisdiction by imposing greater punishment for greater crime than law allowed).

Ø Note: When an illegal sentence is vacated, the court can substitute the correct sentence even when it is more severe than the original. People v Brown (1987) 193 CA3d 957, 961, 238 CR 697; People v Grimble (1981) 116 CA3d 678, 685, 172 CR 362.

Either a prosecutor or a defendant seeking correction should bring a motion in the trial court to vacate the void portion of the judgment and to impose an authorized sentence. See In re Sandel (1966) 64 C2d 412, 418, 50 CR 462 (prosecution). If the court refuses to correct the illegal sentence, the prosecution may petition the appellate court for a writ of mandate. See People v Superior Court (Oliver) (1933) 135 CA 562, 27 P2d 670. The defendant may file a petition for writ of habeas corpus. In re May, supra. A sentence that is not authorized by law or that is based on an unlawful order can be appealed by the prosecution. Pen C §§1238(a)(10), 1466(1)(G). See also People v Superior Court (Duran) (1978) 84 CA3d 480, 148 CR 698; People v Ventura (1978) 84 CA3d Supp 8, 148 CR 581.

§36.1 I. OVERVIEW

Primary misdemeanor sentencing options. This chapter covers the two primary sentencing options for misdemeanor offenses: fines and incarceration in the county jail. There are sentencing alternatives. Those that are not covered here are found in other chapters: chaps 27 (diversion), 36 (work alternative to fine; serving jail time on weekends), 37 (commitment or transfer to Division of Juvenile Justice), 38 (probation, including under Proposition 36; Harvey waivers for counts or cases dismissed), and 39 (county parole and work furlough). Defense counsel representing a misdemeanor client can do the client a great service by tailoring a sentence to fit the client and the crime. Judges have the authority to try a number of innovative sentences; it is counsel's obligation to present these options to the court, together with persuasive evidence of their usefulness and application to the defendant. Because of jail overcrowding and changes in felony prosecutions, judges are particularly amenable to alternatives to jail.

Prosecutors should give all information relevant to sentencing to the probation officer to ensure that it is discussed in the probation report. Most important are prior convictions, threats against the victim or witnesses, and performance on probation and parole in other cases.

Sentencing issues covered in other chapters. Other issues related to sentencing are covered in other chapters. Counsel should check the index or the case and statute tables in the back of this book to find discussion of particular topics. Some of the more important ones are:

- Prejudgment motions, i.e., motions brought before sentence is pronounced, such as motions for new trial. See chap 34.
- Pen C §654 and the prohibition on multiple punishment. See §§37.44-37.50.
- Pen C §954 and the prohibition on multiple convictions. See §37.50.
- Prohibition on multiple prosecutions. See §§7.35, 26.23-26.34.
- Pronouncement of judgment and sentencing hearings. See chap 35.
- Attorney preparation for sentencing. See §§38.23-38.26.
- Stay of execution and release of defendant on bail or own recognizance pending appeal. See §§41.6-41.7.
- Professional licenses. See chap 53.
- Noncitizen criminal defendants. See chap 52.
- Driving under the influence cases. See chap 55.

Action	Deadline	Authority
Pronouncement of judgment in misdemeanor cases.	Not less than 6 hours nor more than 5 days after verdict, finding, or plea, unless waived by defendant; extended up to 10 calendar days if motion for new trial or in arrest of judgment made, or, if probation is considered, up to 90 additional days at defendant's or probation officer's request.	Pen C §1449.
Correct judgment to indicate whether sentences are to run consecutively or concurrently.	Within 60 days of notice to the court of prior judgment or failure to specify.	Pen C §669.

Ø Note: If the court fails to indicate otherwise, multiple terms run concurrently.

§36.3 III. TIME OF SENTENCING; RIGHT TO COUNSEL

Judgment must be pronounced in misdemeanor cases not less than 6 hours nor more than 5 days after the verdict, finding, or plea, unless time is waived by the defendant or extended by the court. Pen C §1449. The court may extend the time for pronouncing sentence up to 10 days for motions for a new trial or in arrest of judgment. On referral to the probation department, the court may extend the time for sentencing up to 90 days at the request of the defendant or probation officer. Pen C §1449.

The defendant has the right to be represented by counsel when judgment is rendered. Cal Const art I, §15; In re Levi (1952) 39 C2d 41, 244 P2d 403 (decided on basis of Cal Const art I, §13, predecessor to §15).

Defendants in misdemeanor cases may be sentenced in absentia. Pen C §1193(b).

§36.3A IV. REFERRAL TO PROBATION DEPARTMENT

Ordinarily, when a defendant is convicted of a misdemeanor, the trial court is not required to obtain a probation report before sentencing. Pen C §1203(d).

Sex offenders. When the defendant is convicted of a sex offense for which registration is required under Pen C §§290-290.023, or if the probation officer recommends that the court at sentencing order the offender to register as a sex offender under Pen C §290.006, the court must refer the defendant to the probation department for an assessment of the risk the defendant poses to the community. Pen C §1203(d). This assessment is to be performed using the State-Authorized Risk Assessment Tool for Sex Offenders (SARATSO), which is being phased in by Pen C §§290.03-290.08. Pen C §1203(d). The trial court must consider this report in sentencing. Pen C §1203(d). As of July 1, 2008, each county probation department is required to assess each eligible person for whom it prepares a report under Pen C §1203. Pen C §290.06(a)(5).

DNA samples. Misdemeanor defendants required to register under Pen C §290 or Pen C §457.1 must provide DNA samples for identification purposes. Pen C §296(a)(3). Misdemeanants who have been registering pursuant to Pen C §290 for a sex offense, and who have not already done so, must provide DNA samples when they renew their registration regardless of whether their conviction that triggered registration predates Proposition 69 and the amendments to Pen C §296. Good v Superior Court (2008) 158 CA4th 1494, 1510, 71 CR3d 125.

§36.4 V. WHO CAN SENTENCE IN MISDEMEANOR CASES; COURT'S DISCRETION IN SENTENCING

As in felony cases, a superior court judge ordinarily imposes sentence in misdemeanor cases. However, the parties may stipulate to a temporary judge, commissioner, or referee sitting as a judge. Cal Const art VI, §21 (temporary judge).

The defendant may have the right to be sentenced by the same trier of fact who took his or her plea. See discussion of People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 150 CR 778, in §35.11.

Sentencing hearings in misdemeanor cases are generally brief. It is common for the prosecutor and defense counsel to address the court and then for the court to pronounce judgment. The choice of sentence is within the discretion of the judge, acting within prescribed statutory limits. See Pen C §§12-13. When a defendant rejects a plea bargain and proceeds to trial, the court may not impose a more severe sentence than that offered before trial unless based on factors revealed during trial or in the sentencing report following trial. In re Lewallen (1979) 23 C3d 274, 152 CR 528.

The penalty for a given misdemeanor can be ascertained from (1) the statute or ordinance designating the offense or the provisions immediately following the statute; (2) a general punishment provision applicable to a specific group or class of misdemeanors (e.g., Bus & P C §25617; Fish & G C §§12000-12026; Health & S C §11374; Veh C §§42000.1-42002.5); or (3) the general provisions of Pen C §§19 and 672, when no penalty is otherwise provided in the statute or ordinance violated.

Judges may sentence a defendant to serve his or her sentence at intermittent periods. Incarceration on weekends is the common intermittent sentence. See Pen C §1209. A sentence of restitution or community service is also common. See Pen C §1202.4.

VI. PUNISHMENT FOR MISDEMEANORS

§36.5 A. Suspending Execution of Sentence; Suspending Imposition of Sentence

In sentencing a defendant, the trial court may (Pen C §1203.1):

- Impose sentence by selecting and ordering a sentence, e.g., probation with no jail time, probation with 6 months in the county jail, or "judgment suspended" (no probation, no jail time).
- Impose sentence and place the defendant on probation, but suspend execution of sentence. In other words, the judge states a particular sentence, such as 2 months in the county jail, but suspends execution of that portion of the sentence so that the defendant does not have to serve it until ordered. If the defendant completes probation successfully, the jail sentence is never served. If probation is revoked, and the trial court decides not to reinstate probation, it appears that the court must order the defendant to serve the entire suspended sentence. See People v Colado (1995) 32 CA4th 260, 38 CR2d 57 (when court revoked felony probation and imposed prison term, it had no discretion to modify previously imposed but unexecuted sentence). See discussion in §46.30.
- Suspend the imposition of sentence by placing the defendant on probation without stating a sentence. When this procedure is used, the court leaves open the possibility of sentencing the defendant up to the maximum sentence on a revocation of probation. See discussion in §46.29.

Ø Note: Which choice the court makes can be crucial to a noncitizen defendant. A sentence that is imposed counts as a sentence for immigration purposes, even if its execution is stayed. See discussion in §52.10.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.6 B. Judgment of Imprisonment, Fine, or Both

Except when a different punishment is prescribed by statute, a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 6 months, by a fine not exceeding $1000, or both. Pen C §19. If the misdemeanor is punishable by a jail term but no fine is prescribed, the court may impose a fine of up to $1000 in addition to the authorized imprisonment. Pen C §672. See Veh C §42003 on imprisonment and fines in Vehicle Code cases.

© The Regents of the University of California

C. Imprisonment

§36.7 1. Maximum Term; Good Time and Work Time

Maximum term. A judgment of imprisonment cannot exceed the term allowable for the offense charged. In addition, with two exceptions, misdemeanor punishment may not exceed 1 year. Pen C §19.2. The exceptions to this rule that allow more than 1 year to be imposed are these: the judge imposes consecutive misdemeanor sentences, and the defendant waives the §19.2 1-year top. People v Harris (1987) 195 CA3d 717, 240 CR 891, disapproved on other grounds in People v Arnold (2004) 33 C4th 294, 307, 14 CR3d 840. A sentence to consecutive full terms on multiple counts, in the absence of an objection, does not violate equal protection. People v Erdelen (1996) 46 CA4th 86, 53 CR2d 553.

The maximum penalty for violation of a city ordinance is 6 months in jail, a $1000 fine, or both. Govt C §36901.

A defendant cannot be sentenced to more than 1 year in the county jail for a concurrent sentence unless the defendant specifically waives the right to a maximum 1-year sentence, e.g., to avoid a state prison sentence. Pen C §19.2 (former Pen C §19a).

Good-time and work-time (conduct) credits. Misdemeanor defendants serving time in custody may reduce that time through work and good behavior. For each 4-day period the prisoner is in custody, 1 day can be deducted from the period of confinement for work time, and 1 day can be deducted for good behavior. Pen C §4019. If the defendant is required to register as a sex offender or has a prior conviction for a serious or violent felony, then for every 6-day period of confinement, 1 day can be deducted for work time and 1 day can be deducted for good behavior.

On calculating conduct credits, see §37.61.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.8 2. Serving Jail Term on Weekends

The court may permit a jail sentence to be served on weekends or at any other "intermittent periods" the judge finds appropriate. Pen C §1203.1. See also Pen C §1209 (court to decide whether defendant can afford to pay part or all of cost of administering weekend sentence program; procedure for determining ability to pay described).

The court can recommend or refuse to permit the sentence to be served through an electronic monitor/home arrest program. This type of program may be a condition of probation when the program is supervised through the private sector. The court, however, cannot order a defendant into such a program without the concurrence of the probation department or the sheriff's department, depending on which agency administers the program. Pen C §1203.016; People v Superior Court (Hubbard) (1991) 230 CA3d 287, 281 CR 309. For further discussion, see §39.32.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.9 D. Judgment of Fine

Maximum amount and payment. Unless the applicable statute specifically provides otherwise, the maximum fine for a misdemeanor is $1000. Pen C §§19, 672; Govt C §36901.

Ø Note: A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that payment be made within a limited time or in installments on specified dates. Unless this direction is given, the fine is payable immediately. Pen C §1205(a).

Addition of penalty assessments. A penalty assessment of up to $24 must be levied for every $10, or fraction of $10, of every "fine, penalty or forfeiture" imposed, including Vehicle Code violations other than parking. Pen C §1464(a) ($10 penalty assessment for every $10 or part of $10), §1465.7(a) (20-percent surcharge on base fine); Govt C §§76000(a) ($7 additional penalty for every $10 or part of $10), 70372(a), 70375 (up to $5 net state court construction penalty). See also Govt C §69926.5; Pen C §1465.8.

Ø Note: The Pen C §1465.7 surcharge and the Govt C §70372 construction penalty may be imposed only when the crime was committed after their effective dates, September 30, 2002, and January 1, 2003, respectively. See People v High (2004) 119 CA4th 1192, 15 CR3d 148. In contrast, the Pen C §1465.8(a)(1) $30 court security fee is not punitive and may be imposed even when the crime was committed before its effective date. People v Alford (2007) 42 C4th 749, 759, 68 CR3d 310; People v Wallace (2004) 120 CA4th 867, 16 CR3d 152.

When multiple offenses are involved, the assessment is based on the total fine or bail for all offenses. When a fine is suspended in whole or in part, the assessment must be reduced in proportion to the suspension. Pen C §1464. Locally imposed penalty assessments can, and do, push the total amount of the penalty that the defendant must pay even higher. But see People v McHenry (2000) 77 CA4th 730, 91 CR2d 877 (error for trial court to impose §1464 penalty assessment on restitution fines that are governed by other statutes).

The penalty assessment of Pen C §1464(a) is mandatory, except for the waiver allowed by Pen C §1464(d). People v Heisler (1987) 192 CA3d 504, 237 CR 452. Section 1464(d) allows the court to waive all or any part of the applicable penalty assessment payment that would work a hardship on the defendant or his or her immediate family when the defendant has been imprisoned to satisfy the fine. The trial court's failure to impose penalty assessments under Pen C §1464(a) and Govt C §76000(a) is a jurisdictional error that may be raised for the first time on appeal. People v Stewart (2004) 117 CA4th 907, 12 CR3d 171.

Restitution. Restitution is discussed in §§38.19-38.21. Restitution orders are fully enforceable as civil judgments. Pen C §§1202.4(i), 1203(j), 1214(b).

E. Judgment of Imprisonment to Satisfy Fine

§36.10 1. General Rule

If an offense is punishable by imprisonment as well as by fine, a judgment that the defendant pay a fine (with or without other punishment) may also direct that he or she be imprisoned until the fine is satisfied or, in the case of a judgment for payment in installments, that on default he or she be imprisoned either until the defaulted installment is satisfied or until the fine is satisfied in full. Pen C §1205. However, the court cannot imprison the defendant for defaulting unless the court provided at the time of sentencing that, on default of payment, the defendant could be imprisoned. 63 Ops Cal Atty Gen 418 (1980). The judgment may direct that any imprisonment for failure to pay begin at, and continue after, expiration of any imprisonment imposed as part of the punishment, or expiration of any other imprisonment to which the defendant may previously have been sentenced. Pen C §1205(a).

The defendant is entitled to credit toward any fine for any days spent in custody, at the rate of $30 per day or more, in the court's discretion. Pen C §2900.5(a). The term of imprisonment for the fine cannot exceed the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to jail for the offense. Pen C §1205. But if the applicable statute authorizes 6 months, $1000, or both, the defendant can be required to serve more than 6 months in jail. See People v Lein (1928) 204 C 84, 266 P 536; In re Erdmann (1891) 88 C 579, 26 P 372; People v Pera (1918) 36 CA 292, 295, 171 P 1091. The maximum confinement time cannot exceed 1 year. Pen C §19.2.

The sentencing court must set the date of a defendant's admission to and release from custody before sentencing, and the total number of days to be credited to the defendant's sentence, according to statute. The number of days credited must be specified in the abstract of judgment. Pen C §2900.5(d).

If the applicable statute provides for punishment by fine only, the court cannot order the defendant imprisoned on default of payment. See Pen C §1205(a). See also Pen C §19.6 (infractions not punishable by imprisonment) and §36.13 of this book.

Willful failure to pay a fine as a condition of probation may be punished as a violation of probation. Pen C §1214.2.

See Veh C §42003 on imprisonment and fines in Vehicle Code cases.

See §§37.70-37.71 on presentence and other credits for Division of Juvenile Justice confinements; see §36.11 on indigent defendants. Restitution is discussed in §§38.19-38.21.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.11 2. Application to Indigent

The court violates equal protection by imprisoning an indigent defendant for failure to pay a fine and penalty assessment when that failure results solely from indigency. In re Antazo (1970) 3 C3d 100, 115, 89 CR 255. See also In re Siegel (1975) 45 CA3d 843, 120 CR 8, overruled on other grounds in People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 35 CR2d 270 (court order imprisoning indigent attorneys for failure to pay contempt fine reversed because no hearing held on attorneys' claims of indigency). But see People v Lawson (1999) 69 CA4th 29, 37, 81 CR2d 283. In Lawson, a welfare fraud case, the court distinguished Antazo and rejected the defendant's claim of equal protection violation. The defendant, a nonindigent, was sentenced to prison for willful failure to pay $21,226 in restitution as a condition of probation when she had the means to pay.

However, if an indigent is given an option comparable to that offered to an offender who is not indigent (e.g., the opportunity to pay the fine in installments or to do specified work to satisfy the fine), and he or she refuses or fails to meet the conditions of the alternative, his or her indigency "ceases to be dispositive and he may, consistently with the mandate of the equal protection clause, be relegated to 'working out' his fine by imprisonment." In re Antazo (1970) 3 C3d 100, 116, 89 CR 255. See also Tate v Short (1971) 401 US 395, 28 L Ed 2d 130, 91 S Ct 668; Williams v Illinois (1970) 399 US 235, 244 n21, 26 L Ed 2d 586, 595 n21, 90 S Ct 2018; In re Fry (1971) 19 CA3d 177, 181, 96 CR 418 (error, on revocation of probation, to imprison indigent for failure to pay fine without first giving him alternative to imprisonment).

Whether the defendant is indigent is a fact to be determined by the trial judge at a hearing. People v Lewis (1971) 19 CA3d 1019, 97 CR 419. See Veh C §42003 on imprisonment and fines in Vehicle Code cases. A flexible standard should be applied. Examples of items the court may consider are amount of income; bank accounts; ownership of a home, car, or other property; the number of dependents; basic living expenses for the defendant and his or her dependents; and the amount of the fine. 19 CA3d at 1023.

In determining indigence, the court need not allow the defendant to prefer his or her creditors to the obligation to the state for payments of the fine, nor must it allow the defendant the same standard of living to which he or she has become accustomed. If the court finds that the defendant's indigence is partial or temporary, it may order him or her to pay a fine in installments or within a specified period of time. 19 CA3d at 1024.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.12 3. Application to Person Under 21

Under Welf & I C §1735, if a person under age 21 fails to pay a fine, the court may either refrain from imposing the fine in whole or in part or (unless he or she is indigent) commit the defendant to jail for the length of time authorized in the statutes relating to imprisonment to satisfy a fine (e.g., Pen C §1205; Veh C §42003(b)). If the court orders the defendant imprisoned, the place of confinement must be approved by the Division of Juvenile Justice. On Vehicle Code infractions, see §36.14.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.12A F. Civil Assessments

The court may impose a civil assessment of up to $300 against a defendant who fails to appear after notice and without good cause, or who fails to pay all or any portion of a fine ordered by the court or to pay an installment of bail as agreed under Veh C §40510.5. Pen C §1214.1(a). Section 1214.1(e) sets out the procedures to be followed in imposing the assessment.

§36.13 VII. INFRACTIONS

Infractions are not punishable by imprisonment. Pen C §19.6. A defendant may not be imprisoned to satisfy an infraction fine. See Pen C §1205(a) (limits such imprisonment to "the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense"); 63 Ops Cal Atty Gen 418 (1980) (courts can enforce a judgment of fine for an infraction only by same means available for enforcing civil judgments). A defendant charged with an infraction is not entitled to a jury trial (Pen C §19.6) and is not entitled to appointed counsel if he or she is "released on his or her written promise to appear,… own recognizance, or a deposit of bail." Pen C §19.6.

Generally, the maximum fine for any infraction is $250 (Pen C §19.8), with certain exceptions. A conviction of an infraction is not grounds for suspension of "any license, or for the revocation of probation or parole."

Most infraction fines are subject to the penalty assessment provisions of Pen C §1464. See §36.9.

The court can grant probation or suspend sentence in infraction cases. Pen C §1203b.

If the defendant consents, the trial court may reduce the misdemeanors named in §19.8 (see list in §6.32) to infractions. Pen C §17(d). Petty theft, a misdemeanor not listed in §19.8, can also be charged as an infraction (Pen C §490.1) if the property taken is valued at $50 or less. The court can reduce a misdemeanor to an infraction only if the reduction is authorized by the legislature. People v Dibacco (2004) 117 CA4th Supp 1, 4, 12 CR3d 258 (trial court acted in excess of jurisdiction when it reduced reckless driving to infraction). If the prosecutor has charged the offense as a misdemeanor, the trial court cannot convert it to an infraction at sentencing over the prosecutor's objection. People v Campbell (2002) 104 CA4th Supp 1, 129 CR2d 601.

VIII. VEHICLE CODE VIOLATIONS

§36.14 A. Infraction Violations of Vehicle Code

Unless a different penalty is specifically provided (see, e.g., Veh C §§21712, 42001(a)-(d), 42001.19, 42001.25), an infraction violation of the Vehicle Code (or of any local ordinance adopted under the Code) is punishable by a maximum fine of $100 for the first offense, $200 for the second offense within 1 year, and $250 for a third offense. Veh C §42001(a). A Vehicle Code violation that would otherwise be an infraction becomes a misdemeanor if the defendant has been convicted of three or more violations within the year preceding the current offense, and the defendant admits the priors or they are alleged in the accusatory pleading and proved at trial. Veh C §40000.28.

Unless otherwise ordered, a fine is payable immediately. However, the judgment may provide for the fine to be paid within a specified time or in specified installments. A judgment that grants a defendant time to pay must order him or her to appear in court on the due date for further proceedings if he or she fails to pay the fine. Veh C §42003(a). If the defendant fails to pay the fine or any installment or an installment of bail as agreed under Veh C §40510.5, the court may impound or limit his or her driver's license for up to 30 days. Veh C §40508(d).

A willful violation of the order to appear is punishable as contempt (Veh C §42003(a)), and a willful failure to pay the fine is a misdemeanor (Veh C §40508(b)-(c)). Both are punishable by imprisonment in the county jail.

The court has the authority to place a defendant convicted of a Vehicle Code infraction on probation. See Pen C §1203b. In appropriate cases, the court can also require the defendant to attend traffic school (see §36.17) and can suspend his or her driver's license (see Veh C §§13200-13202.8).

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.15 B. Misdemeanor Violations of Vehicle Code

Unless a different penalty is expressly provided, each person convicted of a misdemeanor under the Vehicle Code is punishable by a maximum $1000 fine, a maximum 6 months' jail term, or both. Veh C §42002. A judgment imposing a fine may provide that it be paid within a limited time or in specified installments, but unless that direction is given, the fine is payable immediately. Pen C §1205. If a defendant requests a 24-hour suspension of the execution of a jail sentence, it must be granted unless the judge determines that the defendant would fail to appear to serve the sentence. Veh C §42004.5.

Some Vehicle Code misdemeanors can be reduced to infractions at sentencing, under Pen C §17. Reducible misdemeanors include engaging in a speed exhibition (Veh C §23109(c)); driving without a license (Veh C §12500); driving with suspended or revoked license (Veh C §14601.1); selling nonregulation exhaust systems (Veh C §27150.1); failure to appear (Veh C §40508); and failure to attend traffic school (Veh C §42005). See Pen C §19.8. Offenses that can be charged or sentenced as misdemeanors or infractions are also discussed in §§6.32, 24.10, 36.13-36.14.

§36.16 C. Imprisonment to Satisfy Vehicle Code Fine

If a misdemeanor Vehicle Code violation is punishable by imprisonment as well as by fine, a judgment ordering a convicted defendant to pay a fine may also order that he or she be imprisoned until the fine is satisfied. Veh C §42003(b). The judgment must specify the length of the imprisonment, which cannot exceed 1 day for every $30 of the fine or extend in any case beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced for the offense. Veh C §42003(b). On application of this provision to an indigent, see §36.11.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.17 D. Traffic School

The court may order or permit a person convicted of any traffic violation, whether an infraction or a misdemeanor, to attend a school for traffic violators. Veh C §42005(a). A defendant who willfully fails to comply with this order is guilty of a misdemeanor. Veh C §§40000.25, 42005. See also Fischler v Municipal Court (1965) 233 CA2d 780, 43 CR 882 (state's power to require traffic school attendance does not abridge freedom of speech and assembly).

Persons ordered to attend traffic school can choose the school they wish to attend. Veh C §42005.

IX. CONCURRENT AND CONSECUTIVE SENTENCES

§36.18 A. Judgment Should Specify Whether Terms Are Concurrent or Consecutive

If sentences are concurrent, they run together during the time that the periods overlap. In re Roberts (1953) 40 C2d 745, 255 P2d 782.

When sentences are served consecutively, the later sentence begins on termination of the earlier. Pen C §669; People v Carr (1936) 6 C2d 227, 57 P2d 489.

A separate sentence must be pronounced on each count that results in a conviction. See Pen C §12; People v Morrow (1969) 275 CA2d 507, 514, 80 CR 75. Whenever a defendant is convicted of two or more crimes in the same or different proceedings, the terms of imprisonment on the second or subsequent judgments run concurrently to the first unless the court expressly imposes consecutive sentences. Pen C §669; In re Patton (1964) 225 CA2d 83, 36 CR 864. The court must, in effect, issue a separate order for a consecutive sentence. People v Caudillo (1980) 101 CA3d 122, 161 CR 293. Separate sentences of a fine or a fine with imprisonment to satisfy payment, however, are not concurrent if the judgment fails to specify that they are to be concurrent. 34 Ops Cal Atty Gen 290 (1959).

In sentencing for multiple misdemeanor convictions, the judge can impose consecutive sentences for separate offenses even though the resulting jail term exceeds 1 year. See Pen C §19.2; People v Haendiges (1983) 142 CA3d Supp 9, 191 CR 785 (court affirmed consecutive misdemeanor sentences that totaled 4 years and 3 months, on basis of former Pen C §19a, predecessor to Pen C §19.2). When alternate felony/misdemeanor offenses are charged as misdemeanors, however, consecutive sentences may not exceed the statutory maximum term of confinement for those crimes if charged as felonies. People v Powell (1985) 166 CA3d Supp 12, 212 CR 454.

A ruling that sentences should run consecutively is part of the judgment (see Pen C §669) and must be certified by the clerk or the judge to the officer executing the judgment (Pen C §§1213-1213.5). A rubber-stamped impression on the certificate of judgment designating the sentence as consecutive has no effect if the record does not show that it represents an order or judgment of the court. In re Taube (1947) 78 CA2d 142, 177 P2d 329.

When a defendant is convicted of two (or more) offenses in separate court proceedings, the second court has the authority to decide whether to sentence concurrently or consecutively. Pen C §669. This is not true if execution of sentence was suspended on the first case. The legislature intended to "exclude from consecutive sentence those cases in which defendant is on probation, at the California Rehabilitation Center, or otherwise is not subject to imprisonment if the pronounced judgment is affirmed on appeal or otherwise becomes final." People v Gray (1986) 176 CA3d 520, 523, 222 CR 29; see People v Todd (1994) 22 CA4th 82, 85, 27 CR2d 276.

B. Determining Sentences to Be Consecutive

§36.19 1. Factors to Consider

In determining whether sentences should run consecutively, the judge may properly consider "the nature and circumstances of the offense, the defendant's appreciation of and attitude toward the offense, or his traits of character as evidenced by his behavior and demeanor at the trial." People v Morales (1967) 252 CA2d 537, 547, 60 CR 671. The judge may also take into consideration his or her belief, based on the record, that the defendant committed perjury. People v Redmond (1981) 29 C3d 904, 913, 176 CR 780 (used to support upper term). In addition, the court may impose consecutive sentences following a defendant's refusal of probation. People v Giminez (1975) 14 C3d 68, 120 CR 577 (trial court did not abuse its discretion in imposing consecutive sentences on felony defendant who had been offered, but refused, probation conditioned on warrantless search and seizure). It is improper, however, to impose consecutive sentences as a penalty for pleading not guilty and demanding a jury trial, even though the judge concludes that the defense was frivolous or presented in bad faith. People v Morales (1967) 252 CA2d 537, 545, 60 CR 671.

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.20 2. Receipt of Evidence

If the trial judge decides to receive evidence in determining whether to impose a consecutive or concurrent sentence, Pen C §1204, which requires the testimony of witnesses in open court on the issue of mitigation or aggravation of sentence, applies. See §35.18 for discussion of §1204. See In re Calhoun (1976) 17 C3d 75, 130 CR 139 (prosecutor's letter improper); People v Neal (1950) 97 CA2d 668, 676, 218 P2d 556 (error for court to violate §1204 by considering prosecutor's unsubstantiated remarks relating to defendant's alleged criminal background without receiving evidence on question).

© The Regents of the University of California

§36.21 C. Time Limit on Correction

If the court, either through ignorance of a prior judgment or otherwise, fails at the time of sentence to determine how successive judgments shall run in relation to each other, it may determine in the defendant's absence that they shall run consecutively, as long as (Pen C §669):

- The prior judgment or the court's failure to determine is brought to the court's attention within 60 calendar days after the defendant's imprisonment or second or other subsequent judgment; and
- The court makes the determination within 60 calendar days after receiving notice.

Such a determination then becomes part of the judgment and must be certified as provided in Pen C §§1213-1213.5 (see §36.18). In re Taube (1947) 78 CA2d 142, 177 P2d 329. However, §669 does not authorize the sentencing court to deliberately defer its decision on whether to impose consecutive or concurrent sentences. In re Calhoun (1976) 17 C3d 75, 130 CR 139 (trial court mistakenly reserved jurisdiction at sentencing hearing under §669 to determine whether defendant should be sentenced consecutively or concurrently; defendant's sentences deemed concurrent).

After the applicable 60-day period lapses, the court is without authority to direct that the sentences run consecutively, and the terms must run concurrently. People v Cowan (1941) 44 CA2d 155, 163, 112 P2d 62.

I. OVERVIEW

§37.1 A. Chapter Highlights

This chapter discusses sentencing in felony cases, including those in which sentence is imposed but execution of sentence is suspended and probation is granted. On probation generally, including probation under Proposition 36 for persons convicted of nonviolent drug possession offenses, see chap 38.

Most felonies are punished under the Determinate Sentencing Law (DSL). See Pen C §1170. In Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 127 S Ct 856, the U.S. Supreme Court held California's DSL unconstitutional under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments insofar as it permitted upper-term sentences to be based on facts found by the sentencing judge by a preponderance of the evidence rather than on facts found by the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. Following Cunningham, the legislature amended Pen C §1170(b), and the Judicial Council amended the California Rules of Court. The amendments remove most references to "upper," "middle," and "lower" terms. Rather than considering "facts" to elevate the middle term, the sentencing court is now directed to use its "sound discretion" to select one of the "three authorized terms." Cal Rules of Ct 4.420; Pen C §1170(b). The court must set forth its reasons for imposing any "term selected." Pen C §1170(b). For more discussion of Cunningham and the subsequent amendments, see §37.1A.

> Ø Note: After Cunningham and the amendments to Pen C §1170, defense counsel is strongly advised to object on Sixth Amendment grounds if the court appears to be using "facts" not found true by a jury or admitted by the defendant to increase a sentence above the statutory maximum.

There are two kinds of enhancements: those related to the crime (conduct enhancements, which are attached to specific counts) (see, e.g., Pen C §§12022.5, 12022.7) and those related to recidivism (enhancements for priors, which are attached to the accusatory pleading as a whole) (see, e.g., Pen C §§667(b), 667.5(b)). The court must impose all enhancements that have been pleaded and proved unless it has the authority to strike an enhancement in furtherance of justice under Pen C §1385. The court's authority to strike enhancements is discussed in §37.41. Some enhancements carry only a single term. Others permit the trial court to select one of three terms.

Prior convictions for serious or violent felonies may be alleged as enhancements under the DSL (Pen C §667(a)) and as "strikes" under the Three Strikes law. Pen C §§667(b)-(i), 1170.12. The Three Strikes law is an alternative sentencing scheme applicable when one or more prior serious felonies are alleged as "strikes." For discussion of enhancements for prior convictions, see §§37.31-37.32. Three strikes sentencing is discussed in §§37.33-37.33E.

If the trial court is imposing sentence for more than one offense, the court must select one term as the principal term (see §37.14) and, when concurrent sentencing is an option, must decide whether to sentence concurrently or consecutively. The rules for deciding between concurrent and consecutive sentences are discussed in §§37.16-37.30.

Imprisonment for "life" or for a term of years to life is an indeterminate sentence. Indeterminate sentencing is discussed in §37.4. Rules for combining determinate and indeterminate sentences are discussed in §37.38.

Sentencing hearings are discussed in §37.51. Other topics discussed in this chapter include the ban on using the same fact to support more than one sentencing choice (see §37.43), the limitation on multiple punishment imposed by Pen C §654 (see §§37.44-37.50); custody credits (see §§37.54-37.61); civil commitment for narcotics offenders (see §§37.63-37.66); commitments and transfers to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ; formerly the California Youth Authority) (see §37.67-37.74); and alternative sentencing for pregnant women and mothers (see §37.75). Brief discussions of former sentencing rules are included when appropriate to assist counsel facing sentencing issues in cases involving offenses committed before the current rules were enacted. See, e.g., §§37.3, 37.30. A glossary of common sentencing terms is in §37.5.

Other publications to consult on felony sentencing include the invaluable syllabus from the Sentencing for Felony Prosecutors Seminar, by the California District Attorneys Association. A computer sentencing program, Crime Time, is available from The Placer Group in Auburn, California, at (530) 885-0100. For developments in the Three Strikes law, the Attorney General distributes a regular case digest for its staff. See also Menaster & Ricciardulli, 3 Strikes Manual

(2003); Couzens & Bigelow, California Three Strikes Sentencing (2008).

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/37 FELONY SENTENCING/§37.1A B. Sentencing After Cunningham v California

§37.1A B. Sentencing After Cunningham v California

Under California's Determinate Sentencing Law (DSL) as it existed before March 30, 2007, a sentencing court imposing a determinate prison term was limited to imposition of the middle term prescribed for the offense "unless there [were] circumstances in aggravation or mitigation of the crime." Former Pen C §1170(b). Circumstances in aggravation justifying imposition of the upper term could be found by the sentencing judge by a preponderance of the evidence.

On January 22, 2007, in Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 127 S Ct 856, the U.S. Supreme Court held that California's DSL violated a defendant's constitutional right to a jury trial under the Sixth and Fourteenth Amendments because the DSL's "sentence-elevating factfinding" could be based on facts found by the sentencing judge by a preponderance of the evidence, rather than on facts found by the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. 549 US at 274, 166 L Ed 2d at 864.

Cunningham overruled the California Supreme Court's decision to the contrary in People v Black (2005) 35 C4th 1238, 29 CR3d 740 (Black I), and invalidated the inconsistent portions of Pen C §1170(b) and Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(b). Cunningham left to the state how to remedy the DSL's constitutional defects. 549 US at 293, 166 L Ed 2d at 876.

Ø Note: The right to a jury trial under Cunningham does not apply to a fact admitted by the defendant or to the aggravating fact of a prior conviction. People v Sandoval (2007) 41 C4th 825, 836, 62 CR3d 588. See also Cunningham, 549 US at 274, 166 L Ed 2d at 864; Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 490, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 455, 120 S Ct 2348.

Following Cunningham, the legislature amended Pen C §1170(b), and the Judicial Council amended the California Rules of Court. The amendments eliminate the requirement that the court impose the middle term in the absence of facts in aggravation or mitigation. The statute now directs that when three possible terms of imprisonment are authorized, "the choice of the appropriate term shall rest within the sound discretion of the court." Pen C §1170(b). The court must select the term among the three that, "in the court's discretion, best serves the interests of justice." Pen C §1170(b). The court must set forth its reasons for imposing any "term selected" but is not required to make any findings of fact. Pen C §1170(b).

The California Supreme Court responded to Cunningham and subsequent legislative action in People v Black (2007) 41 C4th 799, 812, 62 CR3d 569 (Black II), and People v Sandoval, supra. In Black II, the supreme court held that the existence of a single factor in aggravation that did not violate the jury trial right (such as a prior conviction) was sufficient to uphold a pre-Cunningham upper-term sentence, even if the sentencing judge relied on other factors that it found true in actually imposing the upper term. Black II, supra. The court reasoned that one valid factor made the defendant eligible for the upper term; once eligibility was established, the sentencing court could consider any factors traditionally used by courts in exercising sentencing discretion to select the appropriate term from the triad.

In People v Sandoval, supra, the supreme court faced a case in which an upper-term sentence had been imposed without any aggravating factor having been found true in compliance with Cunningham. The court concluded that the case had to be remanded to the trial court for resentencing. Exercising its power to reform the sentencing statutes to avoid unconstitutionality, the court directed that sentencing proceedings held in cases remanded for Cunningham error were to be conducted consistent with the post-Cunningham legislative amendments to the DSL. 41 C4th at 846. In other words, the court held, the sentencing court "will be required to specify reasons for its sentencing decision, but will not be required to cite 'facts' that support its decision or to weigh aggravating and mitigating circumstances." 41 C4th at 846. The sentencing decision is subject to review for abuse of discretion. 41 C4th at 847.

For further discussion of Black II and Sandoval, see §37.9.

Ø Practice tip: Defense lawyers may challenge in federal court the application of Sandoval to a case that predates that decision as violating federal due process, since it would in effect be an ex post facto application of law. Note, however, in two recent cases the Ninth Circuit has found that the retroactive application of Sandoval violates neither ex post facto nor due process principles. Butler v Curry (9th Cir 2008) 528 F3d 624, 652 n20; Chioino v Kernan (9th Cir 2009) 581 F3d 1182, 1185.

Ø Note: Because of the large volume of post-Cunningham cases and the rapid rate of developments in this area, attorneys for both sides are strongly advised to keep abreast of cases that may have been decided since this volume went to press.

Felony sentencing after Cunningham remains a fertile ground for litigation. See §37.9. Probably the area of practice that will be least affected by Cunningham is plea bargaining. Since the decision in Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 305, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 415, 124 S Ct 2531, on which Cunningham relies, most courts and prosecutors have been routinely requiring defendants to enter "Blakely waivers" as a part of plea negotiations. Like any other constitutional right, the right to a jury trial on the truth of facts in aggravation can be waived by a defendant to obtain a favorable plea bargain. Cases that are not settled by plea bargain have a number of possible outcomes. In some situations, the defendant admits or the jury necessarily makes findings that can be considered and used as circumstances in aggravation to impose the upper term. See, e.g., People v Calhoun (2007) 40 C4th 398, 53 CR3d 539, in which the California Supreme Court held that it was proper for the trial court to sentence the defendant in a vehicular manslaughter case to two upper terms on the ground that there were multiple victims even though there was only one victim for each count. The supreme court held that by finding the defendant guilty on multiple counts, the jury necessarily found that there were multiple victims. In addition, prior convictions and certain other enhancements that must be pleaded and proved at trial may be used as circumstances in aggravation if the additional punishment for the enhancement is not imposed. Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(c). See §37.43.

Some courts or prosecutors have experimented with alleging possible circumstances in aggravation in the accusatory pleading and requiring the jury to render special verdicts on those allegations.

Ø Practice tip: When proving the circumstances in aggravation requires the jury to hear evidence that ordinarily would be inadmissible at the guilt phase of the trial, this procedure may impinge on the defendant's right to a fair trial. Defense counsel should request bifurcation of the "trial" on the alleged circumstances in aggravation from the trial on the actual crimes with which the defendant is charged. See People v Bracamonte (1981) 119 CA3d 644, 650, 174 CR 191, disapproved on other grounds in People v Calderon (1994) 9 C4th 69, 80, 36 CR2d 333.

Finally, when alleged factors in aggravation have not been admitted by the defendant nor found true beyond a reasonable doubt by the jury, the sentencing court is limited to imposing a sentence no greater than the middle term.

§37.2 II. IMPORTANT FELONY SENTENCING ISSUES

Changes in sentencing law. Sentencing is controlled by the statutes effective on the date of the commission of the crime. US Const art I, §10; Cal Const art I, §9; People v Simpson (1986) 186 CA3d 1125, 1127, 231 CR 200. Consequently, it is often necessary for attorneys to be aware of the effective dates of new sentencing legislation so that they can ascertain what sentencing rules were in effect at the time of the crime.

The DSL, as amended effective March 30, 2007 (see §37.1A), remains the basic sentencing law for most felonies. The Three Strikes law (Pen C §§667(b)-(i) (Stats 1994, ch 12, effective Mar. 12, 1994) and Pen C §1170.12 (Proposition 184, effective Nov. 9, 1994)) established a separate and much harsher sentencing scheme when a defendant convicted of a felony has one or more prior convictions for a serious or violent felony. Other significant changes in sentencing law since the adoption of the DSL include the following:

- Addition of a 5-year sentence enhancement for prior serious felony. Pen C §667(a).
- Limitation on plea bargaining when defendant is charged with serious felony, felony involving personal use of firearm, driving under the influence, or violent sex crime listed in Pen C §667.61(c). Pen C §1192.7(a).
- Limitation on custody credits for individual convicted of violent felony listed in Pen C §667.5(c) to 15 percent of "work time" credit. Pen C §2933.1 (Stats 1994, ch 713, effective Sept. 21, 1994).
- Elimination of the rule limiting the time imposed for enhancements in many cases to double the base term (Stats 1997, ch 750, effective Jan. 1, 1998).
- Abolition of the rule imposing a 5-year limit on subordinate terms for nonviolent offenses (Stats 1998, ch 926, effective Jan. 1, 1999).

This chapter attempts to provide some guidance for practitioners who need to address sentencing questions under superseded sentencing provisions. See, e.g., §37.30. However, determining the answers to specific sentencing questions will still require the attorney to consult original sources of authority.

Case settlement. The prosecutor must be able to calculate minimum and maximum exposures to know how to charge a case or to structure possible settlements. If the defendant rejects a settlement offer, it may be necessary to have the court fully advise the defendant of the possible consequences of proceeding to trial. Failure to advise a defendant can lead to a reduction of sentence or even reversal of a subsequent conviction. See In re Alvernaz (1992) 2 C4th 924, 8 CR2d 713; Alvernaz v Ratelle (SD Cal 1993) 831 F Supp 790. It is equally crucial for defense counsel to determine a client's possible sentencing exposure in order to give the client competent legal advice in plea negotiations. See In re Alvernaz, supra. The most important consideration is usually the number of years involved, but other consequences may be important, e.g., narcotic or sex offender registration requirements (see Pen C §290; Health & S C §11590; chap 35); restrictions on firearm possession (Pen C §12021); driver's license consequences (see Veh C §§23530-23598; chap 55); and the effect of the plea on a professional license (see chap 53) or on a noncitizen's immigration status (see chap 52).

Preparing for sentencing. The prosecutor must ensure that the judge complies with all requirements at the sentencing hearing (see §37.51, chaps 35, 38); sentencing errors are subject to reversal. In a complex case, such as one involving the Three Strikes law or the One Strike sex crime law, a sentencing memorandum can greatly assist the court in imposing a sentence that will survive appeal. Prosecutors should also consider adding a waiver of appeal as a condition of any negotiated settlement. Such waivers should be as detailed as possible. See, e.g., People v Vargas (1993) 13 CA4th 1653, 1660, 17 CR2d 445.

To preserve the defendant's right to appeal a sentencing error, defense counsel must object to any errors in the trial court's statement of reasons. See People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 348, 36 CR2d 627. A sentencing memorandum or statement in mitigation is of great value to the court. In cases in which a life term is mandatory, a sentencing memorandum or statement in mitigation is still important because it will become part of the packet of documents that accompanies the defendant to prison, and it may be the only document available to a future parole board documenting favorable aspects of the defendant.

Ø Note: For sentencing proceedings that took place before Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 305, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 415, 124 S Ct 2531, a claim of sentencing error on Cunningham-Blakely grounds is not forfeited by counsel's failure to object at trial. People v Black (2007) 41 C4th 799, 811, 62 CR3d 569 (Black II). See chap 44.

Although this chapter is devoted to state prison sentencing issues, there are many crimes that permit lesser sentences. Defense counsel's role in pursuing alternatives is crucial. See discussion of alternatives to incarceration in chaps 38-39. When an alternative to state prison is sought, it is important that defense counsel prepare a thorough defense sentencing report.

§37.4 IV. DETERMINATE SENTENCING VERSUS INDETERMINATE SENTENCING

All felons who are committed to state prison are given determinate terms under Pen C §1170, indeterminate terms under Pen C §1168(b), or a combination of determinate and indeterminate terms (see Pen C §669).

Determinate terms are fixed by the sentencing court according to the Determinate Sentencing Law (DSL). The DSL covers (1) felonies for which three specific terms of imprisonment are provided, (2) crimes declared to be felonies without a specified penalty, and (3) crimes simply made punishable by imprisonment in the state prison. The second and third categories of DSL felonies are punishable by 16 months (lower term), 2 years (middle term), or 3 years (upper term) in state prison. Pen C §18. Indeterminate terms, i.e., life sentences with the possibility of parole, are not fixed by the court. Pen C §1168(b). The Board of Parole Hearings (BPH) is the parole authority that sets the parole dates for prisoners serving life sentences. See Pen C §§5075-5081, 3046. The administrative regulations governing parole are found in 15 Cal Code Regs, Div 2, Ch 3. Parole is discussed in chap 47. It is important to note that effective November 5, 2008, subsequent parole hearings for life inmates will normally be set 15 years from the date of the previous hearing. Pen C §3041.5(b)(3). The list of crimes for which an indeterminate life term may be imposed is constantly growing. It includes murder (Pen C §§187, 190, 190.05); attempted willful, deliberate, and premeditated murder (Pen C §§187, 664(a)); certain gang offenses (Pen C §186.22(b)(4)); aggravated mayhem (Pen C §205); torture (Pen C §206); kidnapping for ransom or extortion (Pen C §209(a)); kidnapping for robbery or sex crime (Pen C §209(b)); kidnapping in the commission of a carjacking (Pen C §209.5); attempted murder of a government official (Pen C §217.1(b)); train wrecking (Pen C §219); assault to commit specified sex offense during commission of first-degree burglary (Pen C §220(b)); aggravated sexual assault of a child (see Pen C §269(b)); child molestation under Pen C §288 or §288.5 with specified priors (Pen C §667.51(c)); specified sexual conduct with child under age 10 (Pen C §288.7); certain aggravated sex offenses (Pen C §667.61) (One Strike law); assault by a life prisoner not resulting in death (Pen C §4500); use of a weapon of mass destruction (Pen C §11418(b)(1)); use of a weapon of mass destruction causing death (Pen C §11418(b)(2)); and exploding a destructive device causing mayhem or great bodily injury (Pen C §12310(b)). In addition, count-specific (conduct) enhancements may also result in indeterminate life sentences (see, e.g., Pen C §12022.53(d) (25-year-to-life term for intentional discharge of firearm with great bodily injury)), as may enhancements for prior convictions or prison terms. See Pen C §§667(b)-(i), 1170.12 (indeterminate life term with 25-year minimum for conviction of felony with two or more serious or violent felony priors (Three Strikes)); Pen C §667.7(a), (a)(1) (life imprisonment with 20-year minimum parole ineligibility for conviction of specified offenses with two prior prison terms for specified offenses); Pen C §667.71 (25-year-to-life term for second conviction of specified sex offense); Pen C §667.75 (life imprisonment with 17-year minimum parole ineligibility for conviction of specified drug offenses involving minors with two or more prior prison terms for specified offenses). For discussion of the Three Strikes law, see §§37.33-37.33E.

§37.5 V. TERMINOLOGY

Factors in aggravation. Facts that the court may consider in its "broad discretion in imposing one of three authorized prison terms." Cal Rules of Ct 4.405(4), 4.421.

Aggregate term. The total term of imprisonment, consisting of the sum of the principal term, the subordinate term(s), any term(s) imposed for prior conviction enhancements, and any term(s) for the on bail/O.R. (Pen C §12022.1) enhancement. Pen C §1170.1(a); People v Tassell (1984) 36 C3d 77, 90, 201 CR 567, overruled on other grounds in People v Ewoldt (1994) 7 C4th 380, 401, 27 CR2d 646.

Armed allegation. A conduct enhancement alleging defendant or an accomplice was armed, e.g., Pen C §12022(a).

Base term. "[T]he determinate prison term selected from among the three possible terms prescribed by statute or the determinate prison term prescribed by law if a range of three possible terms is not prescribed" for each felony on which the court imposes sentence. Cal Rules of Ct 4.405(2).

Conduct enhancement. A statutorily designated fact relating to the defendant's conduct during commission of the offense that, if found true, requires or permits a specific additional punishment added to the base term. Examples are armed allegations (Pen C §12022) and great bodily injury enhancements (Pen C §12022.7). Conduct enhancements are count-specific. See Pen C §§1170.1, 1170.11. For discussion, see §§37.11-37.13.

Dual use of facts. Using the same fact to justify more than one sentencing choice. In many situations, dual use of a fact is prohibited. For example, a court may not use an imposed enhancement to justify imposition of an upper base term. However, in other situations, dual (or even triple) use of a fact is permitted. See Pen C §1170(b); Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(c)-(d). See §37.43.

Enhancement. An additional prison term that is added to the base term. Cal Rules of Ct 4.405(3). Enhancements are generally of two types: conduct enhancements, which go to the nature of the offense (e.g., Pen C §12022 series), and prior conviction or prison term enhancements (priors), which go to the nature of the offender's criminal record (e.g., Pen C §667(a)).

Five-year limit on subordinate terms. Now-repealed rule (eliminated for offenses committed on or after January 1, 1999 (Stats 1998, ch 926)) that limited the total subordinate term for nonviolent felonies to a maximum of 5 years.

Full-term consecutive sentence; "full boat"; full-term stacking. A reference to a fully consecutive sentence for a subordinate term, rather than the usual one-third of the middle term. An example is multiple counts of forcible sex crimes, imposed under Pen C §667.6(c) or (d). See §§37.25-37.26.

GBI enhancement. A conduct enhancement alleging that the defendant inflicted great bodily injury, e.g., Pen C §§12022.7-12022.8.

"Factors in mitigation." Factors that the court is permitted to consider in its "broad discretion in imposing one of the three authorized prison terms referred to in section 1170(b)," or factors that may justify the court in striking additional punishment for an enhancement when the court has discretion not to impose it. Cal Rules of Ct 4.405(5), 4.423. See §37.10.

One-third the middle-term rule. The general rule of consecutive felony sentencing that limits each consecutively imposed subordinate term to one-third of the middle term prescribed for the offense and any offense-related enhancements. Pen C §1170.1(a). Exceptions to this rule include full consecutive sentences for sex crimes under Pen C §667.6(c)-(d) and life-term counts subject to the Three Strikes law. See §37.18.

Penal Code §654 stay. A stay under Pen C §654, in which a single act may be punished only once, even if the act violates multiple statutes. See §§37.44-37.50.

Penal Code §1385 dismissal. A dismissal generally authorized under Pen C §1385(a) allowing the trial court, on its own motion, to order an action dismissed in furtherance of justice. The word "action" includes allegations relevant to sentencing. People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 504, 53 CR2d 789. See §37.41. On the court's power to dismiss strikes under §1385, see §37.33D.

Principal term. The longest term (calculated by adding together the base term and any conduct enhancements) imposed for any count when consecutive terms are being imposed. Other counts become subordinate to this term when stacked. Pen C §1170.1(a). On calculating the principal term, see §§37.8-37.14.

Prior (status enhancement). An allegation that the defendant suffered a qualifying prior conviction or prison term before committing the crime charged. Under the DSL, these enhancements attach to the defendant, not to individual counts, and are added only once per judgment. Pen C §1170.1; People v Tassell, supra. See §§37.33-37.34A. This limitation does not apply to multiple indeterminate third- or second-strike sentences imposed under the Three Strikes law. People v Williams (2004) 34 C4th 397, 402, 19 CR3d 619; People v Misa (2006) 140 CA4th 837, 845, 44 CR3d 805 (Pen C §667(a) prior serious felony enhancements must be imposed on every count); People v Garcia (2008) 167 CA4th 1550, 1561, 85 CR3d 155 (Pen C §667.5(b) prior prison term enhancements must be imposed or stricken on every count).

Sentence choice. The selection of any disposition of the case other than a dismissal, acquittal, or grant of a new trial. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.405(6).

Serious felony. A felony listed in Pen C §1192.7(c) or §1192.8. A person convicted of a serious felony receives a 5-year enhancement for each prior conviction of a serious felony that was brought and tried separately. Pen C §667(a). A person convicted of a felony with one or more prior serious felony convictions is subject to the Three Strikes law, discussed in §§37.33-37.33E.

Stack. To make consecutive, as in stacked or consecutive prison terms. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.425.

Statement of reasons. The statement made by the court to comply with the requirement that it "state the reasons for its sentence choice on the record at the time of sentencing." Pen C §1170(c). See Cal Rules of Ct 4.406. One reason for this requirement is to avoid prohibited dual use of facts in choosing punishment. People v Jackson (1987) 196 CA3d 380, 388, 242 CR 1. See also "Dual use of facts," above. Another reason is to ensure that the court has recognized each sentencing option available to it in imposing sentence. See §37.51.

Stay. A temporary suspension in a case until the occurrence of a defined contingency. If sentence on a count must be stayed, any enhancement for that count must also be stayed. People v Santana (1986) 182 CA3d 185, 190, 227 CR 51. Sentences subject to Pen C §654 are stayed. On service of the unstayed term, the stay becomes permanent. See P*eople v Beamon* (1973) 8 C3d 625, 640, 105 CR 681.

"Strike." A prior conviction of a serious felony listed in Pen C §§1192.7(c) and 1192.8 or a violent felony listed in Pen C §667.5(c) that is alleged under Pen C §§667(b)-(i) and 1170.12 (the Three Strikes law). A single strike doubles the base term for the new offense and is referred to as a "second strike" case; two or more strikes result in an indeterminate sentence of at least 25 years to life. Such a case is known as a "third strike" case. See §§37.33-37.33E.

Subordinate term. A count plus its related enhancements that is "stacked" or made consecutive to the principal term.

Suspended sentence. A suspension of either imposition or execution of sentence in which the court chooses to grant probation rather than send the convicted defendant to prison. Generally, the court suspends imposition of sentence and grants probation. This option means no prison term is selected or imposed, and leaves all sentencing options open should the defendant violate probation. A court may impose a prison sentence, suspend the execution of the sentence, and place a defendant on probation. Pen C §1203.1. This usually occurs in cases in which the decision to grant probation was a very close call. An "execution suspended" grant of probation is generally chosen to let the defendant know that he or she is already sentenced to prison, and a probation violation will probably result in the execution of the already imposed sentence. When imposition of sentence is suspended and sentence is therefore not pronounced after a conviction by trial, the trial judge still must identify and state on the record circumstances that would justify imposing one of the three authorized terms if probation is later revoked. Cal Rules of Ct 4.433(b).

Use enhancement. A conduct enhancement alleging that the defendant used a specified weapon. See Pen C §§12022(b), 12022.3, 12022.5, 12022.53.

Violent felony. A felony listed in Pen C §667.5(c). A prior conviction for a violent felony is a "strike" and makes the defendant subject to punishment under the Three Strikes law. Before January 1, 2001, a subordinate term for a felony conviction could be enhanced by one-third of any conduct enhancement only if the subordinate term was for a violent felony. Former Pen C §1170.1(a). Credits are limited to 15 percent for a defendant convicted of a violent felony. Pen C §2933.1.

Ø Note: In nearly all cases, a violent felony is also a "serious felony" under Pen C §§1192.7(c) and 1192.8. See §§37.33-37.33E.

Washout. A provision in, e.g., Pen C §667.5(a)-(b), §667.7(b), or §1210.1(b)(1) that nullifies or "washes out" the punishment effect of a prior when the defendant has been "clean" (free of prison custody and commission of a new felony) for a specified period, e.g., "5-year washout," "10-year washout."

Wobbler. A crime that may be punished as either a misdemeanor or a felony, also known as an "alternative felony/misdemeanor." See Pen C §17(b). On reduction of a felony to a misdemeanor, see §8.40.

VI. DETERMINATE SENTENCING

§37.6 A. Structure of Typical DSL Sentence: Two Formulas

A typical DSL prison sentence calculation involves up to four steps. First, a base term is chosen. The base term is one of three terms specified by the statute for the crime charged. These three terms are commonly called the lower, middle, and upper terms. For further discussion of base term, see §§37.5, 37.8-37.10. Second, any count-specific (conduct) enhancements that were pleaded and found true are added to the base term. An enhancement does not define a crime but provides additional punishment if the crime is committed in specified circumstances. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.405(3). The total of the base term plus any conduct enhancements is the principal term. Third, if the defendant is being sentenced on additional counts, and if the sentencing judge chooses (or is required) to impose one or more additional terms consecutively, all "subordinate" terms, plus any count-specific enhancements that attach to them, are added together. Finally, the terms for enhancements that attach to the judgment as a whole, i.e., enhancements for prior convictions or prison terms (Pen C §§667(b), 667.5(b)), or the "on bail" enhancement (Pen C §12022.1), are added to the principal and subordinate terms to arrive at the aggregate term or final sentence.

If the defendant is convicted of more than one crime, one of them must be chosen for the principal term; the other counts are either made concurrent or figured as subordinate terms, discussed below. If there are multiple counts, the principal term is the count that results in the longest term after the court chooses the appropriate term (mitigated, middle, or aggravated) and adds applicable specific (conduct) enhancements. Pen C §1170.1(a). The court may need to determine the base term and enhancements for each count to see which results in the longest term. That count then becomes the principal term.

If there is more than one count, and all counts are to run consecutively, the "one-third rule" of §1170.1(a) is applied to the counts that are made consecutive to the principal term to produce the subordinate terms. Each subordinate term may be enhanced with applicable specific (conduct) enhancements, also subject to the one-third rule.

B. Formula One: Base Term Plus Conduct Enhancements Equals Principal Term

1. Base Term

§37.8 a. Selecting One of Three Authorized Terms

When prison is imposed for a DSL crime, the judge must select one of three statutorily authorized terms or "time periods" for each count. Pen C §1170(b); Cal Rules of Ct 4.420. Courts and practitioners often refer to these terms or time periods as "lower," "middle," and "upper" terms. The selection of the appropriate term rests within the "sound discretion of the trial court," and the court shall select the term that, in the court's discretion, "best serves the interests of justice." The selected term is called the base term. The parties may agree to use a particular term as the base term, subject to court approval. Pen C §1192.5.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.9 b. Upper Term

Cunningham v California*. As discussed above (see §37.1A), in Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 127 S Ct 856, the U.S. Supreme Court held that California's Determinate Sentencing Law (DSL) violated a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury insofar as it permitted the imposition of sentences above the statutorily prescribed maximum (midterm) based on facts found by the sentencing judge by a preponderance of the evidence rather than on facts found by the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. See also Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 124 S Ct 2531; Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348.

Penal Code §1170(b) now provides that when a statute specifies three possible terms, the selection of the appropriate term rests within the "sound discretion of the trial court," and the court shall select the term that, in its discretion, "best serves the interests of justice." See also People v Pham (2009) 180 CA4th 919, 103 CR3d 366. The trial court must state on the record the reasons for imposing the term selected. Pen C §1170(b); Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(e). Amended rules still provide that the sentencing judge may consider circumstances in aggravation or mitigation and "any other factor reasonably related to the sentencing decision" when determining which term to impose under Pen C §1170(b) (Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(b)); the rules also provide a list of criteria that the court may consider in aggravation (Cal Rules of Ct 4.421). The judge may rely on any number of aggravating circumstances in imposing the upper term so long as the defendant is eligible for the upper term by virtue of facts that have been established according to Sixth Amendment requirements (i.e., either admitted by the defendant or found true by a jury beyond a reasonable doubt). People v Sandoval (2007) 41 C4th 825, 838, 62 CR3d 588. See People v Hamlin (2009) 170 CA4th 1412, 1469, 89 CR3d 402 (prejudicial error to impose upper term, since appellate court could not conclude jury would have found circumstances true beyond a reasonable doubt). For additional discussion, see §37.1A.

Facts admitted by defendant. After Cunningham, a judge may use a fact admitted by the defendant to elevate a sentence above the statutory maximum authorized by a jury's verdict. Sandoval, 41 C4th at 835. Aggravating factors admitted by the defendant need not be tried by a jury. People v Landaverde (2007) 157 CA4th 28, 34, 68 CR3d 261. A plea of no contest and stipulation to a factual basis for the plea with the understanding that the defendant will receive a sentence within an agreed-upon maximum (i.e., pleading "open") does not, per se, constitute an admission to aggravating factors. People v French (2008) 43 C4th 36, 48, 73 CR3d 605 (defendant retains opportunity to litigate court's choice of sentence at sentencing hearing). See In re Jonathan T. (2008) 166 CA4th 474, 483, 82 CR3d 753 (minor's stipulation to police report as basis for plea is not admission to specific facts contained within).

Prior convictions. The right to a jury trial and proof beyond a reasonable doubt does not apply to the "aggravating fact of a prior conviction." Sandoval, 41 C4th at 836. See also Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 274, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 864, 127 S Ct 856; People v Wilson (2008) 164 CA4th 988, 992, 79 CR3d 631. The exception for prior convictions is known as the Almendarez-Torres exception. See People v Towne (2008) 44 C4th 63, 75, 78 CR3d 530. There is a split of authority as to whether the upper term can be imposed on the basis of misdemeanor convictions that were not raised by the court as a ground for imposing the upper term. Compare People v Stuart (2008) 159 CA4th 312, 314, 70 CR3d 920 (defendant's six unmentioned misdemeanor convictions qualified as an aggravating circumstance which justified imposition of upper term), with People v Cardenas (2007) 155 CA4th 1468, 1480, 66 CR3d 821 (reliance on court-found facts of "planning and sophistication" and defendant's unmentioned prior misdemeanor convictions was Cunningham error requiring remand for resentencing). Prior juvenile adjudications, like adult convictions, can be used to increase the term of a sentence without the need for a jury to find the adjudication beyond a reasonable doubt. People v Quiles (2009) 177 CA4th 612, 620, 99 CR3d 378. See also People v Nguyen (2009) 46 C4th 1007, 95 CR3d 615 (no constitutional ban to using juvenile adjudication as strike prior).

Probation, parole, and prior prison term. Prior prison terms, status as a probationer or parolee at the time of the commission of the offense, and poor performance on probation or parole are "recidivism-related" aggravating factors. Cal Rules of Ct 4.421(b). The California Supreme Court has ruled that the federal constitutional right to a jury trial and proof beyond a reasonable doubt on aggravating circumstances do not extend to the circumstance that a defendant was on probation or parole at the time of the offense or has served a prior prison term. People v Towne (2008) 44

C4th 63, 79, 78 CR3d 530. Judicial determination of these factors does not require factfinding on the charged offense. 44 C4th at 81. See also People v Medrano (2008) 161 CA4th 1514, 1520, 74 CR3d 907. The Ninth Circuit, however, holds otherwise. See Butler v Curry (9th Cir 2008) 528 F3d 624, 647 (prior conviction exception does not extend to defendant's probationary status at time of instant offense).

When poor performance on probation or parole can be established only by facts other than that the defendant was convicted of offenses while on probation or parole, the right to a jury trial on those facts applies. Towne, 44 C4th at 83.

One constitutionally valid aggravating fact sufficient to impose upper term. In People v Black (2007) 41 C4th 799, 812, 62 CR3d 569 (Black II), the California Supreme Court held that, after Cunningham, the upper term may be imposed as long as one aggravating circumstance rendering a defendant eligible for the upper term has been established in accordance with Blakely's constitutional jury trial requirements. If this requirement is met, "any additional factfinding engaged in by the trial court in selecting the appropriate sentence among the three available options does not violate the defendant's right to jury trial." See also Rita v U.S. (2007) 551 US 338, 168 L Ed 2d 203, 127 S Ct 2456 ("This Court's Sixth Amendment cases do not automatically forbid a sentencing court to take account of factual matters not determined by a jury and to increase the sentence in consequence"); People v Towne (2008) 44 C4th 63, 86, 78 CR3d 530 (because other aggravating factors rendered defendant eligible for upper term, judge's consideration of conduct underlying offenses for which defendant was acquitted did not implicate constitutional right to jury trial). The Black II court found that two validly imposed aggravating circumstances justified the defendant's upper term: the jury's finding of the defendant's use of force during the charged crime of sexual abuse, and the defendant's criminal history. The court of appeal opined in a later case that as long as the trial court "relied on at least one proper factor, its reliance upon other factors was not error." People v Landaverde (2007) 157 CA4th 28, 34, 68 CR3d 261 (court's reliance on defendant's admission of continuous sexual abuse of a child was not Cunningham error). See §37.1A.

Statements in aggravation. A statement in aggravation must be filed at least 4 days before the sentencing hearing. Pen C §1170(b). A fact that is an element of the crime upon which punishment is being imposed may not be used to impose a "greater term" of imprisonment. Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(d). The court is also prohibited from using a fact charged and proved as a conduct enhancement to impose an upper term. Pen C §1170(b); Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(c). However, if the court has discretion to strike the punishment for such an enhancement and does so, it may still use that fact or conduct to impose the upper term. Such use is an adequate reason for striking the additional term of imprisonment. Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(c).

Error requires remand for new sentence. In People v Sandoval (2007) 41 C4th 825, 836, 62 CR3d 588, the California Supreme Court ruled that the remedy for Sixth Amendment error under Cunningham is remand to the trial court for resentencing under one of the three available terms provided under the post-Cunningham amended sentencing statutes. See People v Lincoln (2007) 157 CA4th 196, 202, 68 CR3d 596; People v Cardenas (2007) 155 CA4th 1468, 1480, 66 CR3d 821. See also Chioino v Kernan (9th Cir 2009) 581 F3d 1182 (district court erred in reducing habeas petitioner's sentence instead of remanding to state court for resentencing). Cunningham applies retroactively to any case in which the judgment was not final at the time the decision in Blakely was issued. In re Gomez (2009) 45 C4th 650, 88 CR3d 177.

§37.10 c. Lower Term

Selection of the lower term is justified if the sentencing judge deems it appropriate in his or her discretion after considering circumstances in aggravation and mitigation. Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(b). See also Pen C §1170(b). California Rules of Court 4.423 provides a list of criteria the sentencing judge may consider in determining which term should be imposed. The judge may apply additional criteria not enumerated in Rule 4.423 if they are reasonably related to the judge's decision. Cal Rules of Ct 4.408(a); People v Covino (1980) 100 CA3d 660, 670, 161 CR 155. The court must state on the record its reasons for imposing the selected term. Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(e).

The "dual use" prohibition discussed in §37.43 does not apply to circumstances in mitigation; thus, the circumstances in mitigation found in Rule 4.423 can be used to impose the mitigated term as the base term and to strike the additional punishment prescribed for an enhancement.

Circumstances in mitigation can be found in the case record, the probation officer's report, other reports and statements properly received, statements in mitigation, and any other evidence introduced at the sentencing hearing. Pen C §1170(b); see Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(b). Defense counsel should seriously consider filing a statement in mitigation to marshal for the court's consideration all facts that could convince the court to impose the lower term. A sentencing court generally knows very little about a defendant and how he or she came to stand before the court convicted of a felony. It is defense counsel's job to tell the court the sympathetic circumstances of the defendant's life to counteract any circumstances in aggravation and possibly convince the court that mitigating circumstances outweigh other circumstances. A statement in mitigation must be filed at least 4 days before the sentencing hearing. Pen C §1170(b).

2. Conduct (Specific) Enhancements

§37.11 a. Description

Penal Code §1170.1(a) provides, in part, "The principal term shall consist of the greatest term of imprisonment imposed by the court for any of the crimes, including any term imposed for applicable specific enhancements." The phrase "specific enhancement," as used in Pen C §1170.1, refers to enhancements that relate to the circumstances of the offense. See Pen C §1170.11.

Ø Note: The phrase "specific enhancement" was apparently used in the DSL to distinguish these types of enhancements, which relate to the circumstances of the charged offense and attach to specific counts of the accusatory pleading, from "general" enhancements, such as enhancements for prior convictions, which relate to the offender and attach to the accusatory pleading as a whole. See People v Lawson (1980) 107 CA3d 748, 753 n6, 165 CR 764. The phrase "conduct enhancement" is also sometimes used to describe these enhancements. When not quoting the statutory language, this chapter will use "conduct enhancements" or "count-specific enhancements" to refer to these enhancements.

All enhancements must be specifically alleged, and proved or admitted. Pen C §1170.1(e). For any conduct enhancement that potentially increases the defendant's punishment beyond the statutory maximum for the crime, due process requires the prosecution to prove the facts on which the enhancement relies beyond a reasonable doubt and entitles the defendant to a jury verdict. Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348. When three possible terms are specified for an enhancement, the court must, in its discretion, impose the term that best serves the interests of justice, unless the court uses the discretion conferred by Pen C §1385 to strike the enhancement. The court must state reasons for its choice of term for the enhancement. Pen C §1170.1(d). The court's choice of sentence for enhancements is independent from its choice for the base term. People v Keeton (1992) 10 CA4th 1125, 1133, 13 CR2d 155 (court properly selected lower term as base term and middle term as enhancement).

Ø Note: Selection of the upper term for an enhancement with a three-point range raises the same issues of Sixth Amendment jury trial right under Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 127 S Ct 856, as does selection of the upper term for the substantive offense. People v Lincoln (2007) 157 CA4th 196, 205, 68 CR3d 596. Although the legislature amended Pen C §1170 after Cunningham, the legislature did not enact similar amendments to §1170.1(d) or any other section providing for an enhancement with three possible terms. See Advisory Committee Comment to Cal Rules of Ct 4.405. For discussion, see §37.1A.

Penal Code §654 may apply to enhancements. See discussion in §37.49. Under Pen C §1385, the court has the power to strike any enhancement unless specifically prohibited by statute. For discussion, see §37.41.

A chart containing a list of conduct enhancements, with their terms, is in §37.13. See also Pen C §1170.11.

§37.12 b. Statutory Limitations on Terms of Conduct Enhancements

Current law. Penal Code §1170.1(a), as amended by Stats 1997, ch 750, (applicable to crimes committed on or after January 1, 1998), provides in part, "The principal term shall consist of the greatest term of imprisonment imposed by the court for any of the crimes, including any term imposed for applicable specific [conduct] enhancements." There is no limitation on the number of conduct enhancements that can be alleged. However, when two or more enhancements for using or being armed with a firearm or deadly weapon in the commission of a single offense are found true, only the greatest can be imposed. Pen C §1170.1(f); People v Rodriguez (2009) 47 C4th 501, 508, 98 CR3d 108 (error to impose both Pen C §§12022.5(a) and 186.22(b)(1) enhancements). When two or more enhancements may be imposed for great bodily injury on the same victim, only the greatest can be imposed. Pen C §1170.1(g); People v Gonzalez (2009) 178 CA4th 1325, 101 CR3d 135 (imposition of both Pen C §§12022.7(a) and 186.22(b)(1)(C) enhancements violates §1170.1(g)).

The number of enhancements that may be imposed for certain specified forcible sex crimes may not be limited, must be full and separately served, and may not be merged with any term or with any other enhancement. Pen C §1170.1(h). Those sex crimes include forcible rape and spousal rape, rape in concert, forcible child molestation, forcible penetration with foreign object, forcible sodomy, and forcible oral copulation. All of these sex crimes are also subject to fully consecutive sentencing under Pen C §667.6(c)-(d). See §§37.25-37.26.

Pre-1998 law. For a discussion of pre-1998 limitations on conduct enhancements attached to the principal term as well as other sentencing limitations that still apply in older cases, see §37.30.

Section	Description	Term
§186.10(c)(1)	Money laundering	1 to 4 years, depending on amount involved
§186.11(a)(1)	White collar crime:
§186.11(a)(2)	Taking or loss of over $500,000	2, 3, or 5 years in addition to any §12022.6 enhancement
§186.11(a)(3)	Taking or loss of $100,000 to $500,000	1 or 2 years, depending on amount, as specified in §12022.6
§186.22(b)	Commission of felony in furtherance of criminal street gang activity:

Notes: Expert testimony about possible reasons for committing a crime is insufficient, alone, to establish that a crime was committed with the specific intent to promote, further, or assist the gang. People v Ramon (2009) 175 CA4th 843, 850, 96 CR3d 459. See also People v Ochoa (2009) 179 CA4th 650, 102 CR3d 108.

There is no requirement that the criminal conduct "to assist the gang" be distinct from the charged offense, or that the evidence establish specific crimes with which the defendant intended to assist the gang. People v Vazquez (2009) 178 CA4th 347, 354, 100 CR3d 351 (disagreeing with Briceno v Scribner (9th Cir 2009) 555 F3d 1069).

§186.22(b)(1)(A)	Any felony	2, 3, or 4 years
§186.22(b)(1)(B)	Serious felony under §1192.7(c)	5 years
§186.22(b)(1)(C)	Violent felony under §667.5(c)	10 years

The enhancements imposed by §186.22(b)(1) are not applicable to crimes punishable by life terms. Instead, such offenses are subject to the 15-year restriction on parole specified in §186.22(b)(5). People v Lopez (2005) 34 C4th 1002, 22 CR3d 869.

§186.22(b)(4)(B)	Home invasion robbery, carjacking, violation of §246 or §12022.55 (Not an enhancement, this section creates a new sentencing scheme, similar to Three Strikes law; see §37.34A)	Life sentence, minimum term set as the greater of 15 years or the term under §1170, including conduct enhancements

Note: A defendant subject to life under Pen C §186.22(b)(4) for a violation of Pen C §246 has committed a "felony punishable by imprisonment for life," triggering application of the 20-year enhancement under Pen C §12022.53(c). People v Jones (2009) 47 C4th 566, 98 CR3d 546.

§186.22(b)(4)(C)	Felony extortion or threats to victims or witnesses (Not an enhancement, this section creates a new sentencing scheme, similar to Three Strikes law; see §37.34A)	Life sentence, minimum term set as the greater of 7 years or the term under §1170, including conduct enhancements

Notes: Pen C §186.22(b)(5) applies only when the felony by its own terms provides for a life sentence. People v Montes (2003) 31 C4th 350, 352, 2 CR3d 621 (crime subject to additional punishment under Pen C §12022.53(d) is not "felony punishable by imprisonment for life" within meaning of §186.22(b)(5)).

Penal Code §1192.7(c)(28), which adds felony violations of §186.22 to the list of serious felonies that can be used as strikes, includes any felony that was enhanced by a criminal street gang enhancement under §186.22(b)(1). People v Briceno (2004) 34 C4th 451, 460, 20 CR3d 418. Although §186.22(b)(1) can elevate any gang-related felony to a "serious" felony (see Pen C §1192.7(c)(28)), it is impermissible bootstrapping to impose a separate 5-year enhancement for the same conduct under §186.22(b)(1)(B). 34 C4th at 465. See also Lopez v Superior Court (2008) 160 CA4th 824, 831, 72 CR3d 929 (applying Briceno, it is impermissible to use same gang-related conduct to both violate court injunction and enhance misdemeanor to wobbler under §186.22(d)). A misdemeanor conviction punished as a felony under §186.22(d) is not a serious felony for the purposes of Pen C §1192.7(c)(28). People v Ulloa (2009) 175 CA4th 405, 413, 95 CR3d 905.

§186.26(d)	Solicitation of a minor to participate in criminal street gang for commission of specified felonies	3 years
§186.33(b)	Commission of specified felony after failure to register as member of criminal street gang	16 months, 2 or 3 years
§192.5(e)	Fleeing scene of vehicular manslaughter involving vessel	5 years
§213(a)(1)(A)	Robbery in concert within an inhabited dwelling house or vessel. See In re Jonathan T. (2008) 166 CA4th 474, 482, 82 CR3d 753	3, 6, or 9 years
§273.4(a)	Felony child abuse consisting of female genital mutilation	1 year
§289.5(d)	Commission of specified sex offense after having fled to this state to avoid prosecution for registrable offense	2 years
§290.4(c)(1)	Use of information about registered sex offender, disclosed under §290.4, to commit any felony	5 years
§290.45(e)	Use of information about registered sex offender, disclosed under §290.45, to commit any felony	5 years
§290.46(j)(2)	Use of information about registered sex offender, disclosed under §290.46, to commit any felony	5 years
§347(a)(2)	Use of poison in committing specified crimes causing GBI	3 years
§368(b)	Elder or dependent adult abuse:
§368(b)(2)(A)	Causing GBI, victim under 70	3 years
§368(b)(2)(B)	Causing GBI, victim 70 or over	5 years
§368(b)(3)(A)	Causing death, victim under 70	5 years
§368(b)(3)(B)	Causing death, victim 70 or over	7 years
§422.75(a)	Felony hate crime, not punished	1, 2, or 3 years

	under §422.7
§422.75(b)	Hate crime in concert, not punished under §422.7 or §422.75(a)	2, 3, or 4 years

Note: Penal Code §422.75 also authorizes imposition of an enhancement for prior hate crime convictions. See Pen C §422.75(d).

§451.1(a)	Arson with any of the following:	3, 4, or 5 years
	Injury to police or firefighter (§451.1(a)(2))
	Causing GBI to more than one victim (§451.1(a)(3))
	Causing multiple structures to burn (§451.1(a)(4))
	Use of accelerant or delayed ignition (§451.1(a)(5))
§452.1(a)	Felony conviction of §452 with any of the following:	1, 2, or 3 years
	Injury to police or firefighter (§452.1(a)(2))
	GBI to more than one victim (§452.1(a)(3))
	Causing multiple structures to burn (§452.1(a)(3))
§550(g)	Staged accident with serious bodily injury to nonaccomplice	2 years per victim
§550(i)	Staged accident in designated auto insurance fraud crisis area	Fines doubled
§593a(b)	Tree spiking with injury to nonaccomplice	3 years
§600(c)	Intentional death or serious injury to police horse or dog	1 year
§600(d)	Intentional GBI to human in course of injury to police horse or dog	2 years
§667.8(a)	Kidnapping for purpose of committing designated sex crime (when defendant convicted of sex crime)	9 years
§667.8(b)	Kidnapping victim under 14 for purpose of committing designated sex crime (when defendant convicted of sex crime)	15 years
§667.85	Kidnapping child under 14 to permanently deprive parent or legal guardian of custody	5 years
§667.9(a)	Specified crimes against elderly, disabled, or victim under age of 14	1 year
§667.15	Exhibiting to minor material showing minor engaged in sexual conduct:
§667.15(a)	In commission or attempted commission of §288	1 year
§667.15(b)	In commission or attempted commission of §288.5	2 years

§667.16(a)	Felony forged check, grand theft, or false pretenses to defraud victim of natural disaster	1 year
§667.17	Impersonating police officer in commission of any felony	1 year
§670(a)	Conviction of violating Bus & P C §§7158-7159, 7161(b)-(e); or Pen C §470, §484, §487, or §532 after natural disaster	Fines doubled
§674(a)	Conviction of primary care provider in day care facility of violating §261, §285, §286, §288, §288a, or §289	2 years
§674(b)	Conviction of primary care provider in day care facility of violating §§261, 285, 286, 288, 288a, 289 in concert	3 years
§675	Conviction of violating §261.5(c) or (d); §286(b)(2) or (c)(1); §288(a) or (c)(1); or §288a(b)(1) or (b)(2) or (c)(1) with minor for money or other consideration	1 year
§12021.5(a)	Individual armed with firearm during street gang crime	1, 2, or 3 years
§12021.5(b)	Individual armed with firearm and specified magazine during street gang crime	2, 3, or 4 years
§12022(a)(1)	Defendant is principal in felony in which any principal is armed with any firearm	1 year
§12022(a)(2)	Defendant is principal in felony in which any principal is armed with assault weapon or machine gun	3 years

Note: Defendant who has firearms and drugs present at the same location is subject to enhancement under §12022(a)(2), even if defendant is not present when those items are discovered. People v Bland (1995) 10 C4th 991, 43 CR2d 77.

§12022(b)(1)	Defendant is principal in felony or attempted felony in which deadly or dangerous weapon is used	1 year
§12022(b)(2)	Defendant is principal in carjacking or attempted carjacking in which deadly or dangerous weapon is used	1, 2, or 3 years
§12022(c)	Defendant is personally armed with firearm in commission of specified Health & S C offenses	3, 4, or 5 years
§12022(d)	Defendant is principal in §12022(c) offense and knows that another principal is armed with firearm	1, 2, or 3 years
§12022.2(a)	Possession of metal-piercing or armor-piercing ammunition while armed with firearm during commission or attempted commission of felony	3, 4, or 10 years
§12022.2(b)	Wearing body vest in commission or attempted commission of violent	1, 2, or 5 years

	offense
§12022.3(a)	Defendant uses firearm or deadly weapon in commission or attempted commission of specified sex crimes	3, 4, or 10 years

Notes: The term "in the commission of" is broadly construed. A Pen C §12022.3(a) enhancement was properly imposed when defendant displayed a knife to the victim after the completion of the sex offense. People v Jones (2001) 25 C4th 98, 107, 104 CR2d 753.

For purposes of a §12022.3 enhancement, "firearm" includes any firearm, whether loaded or unloaded. See People v Steele (1991) 235 CA3d 788, 286 CR 887.

§12022.3(b)	Defendant is armed with firearm or deadly weapon in commission or attempted commission of specified sex crime	1, 2, or 5 years
§12022.4	Furnishing firearm to commit felony	1, 2, or 3 years
§12022.5(a)	Personal use of firearm in commission or attempted commission of felony	3, 4, or 10 years
§12022.5(b)	Personal use of assault weapon or machine gun in commission or attempted commission of felony	5, 6, or 10 years

Notes: Effective January 1, 2003, the court may not strike a §12022.5 allegation or finding. Pen C §12022.5(c). The §12022.5 enhancement must be imposed for any violation of §245 involving a firearm and for specified drive-by shootings when a death is involved, even if the use of a firearm is an element of the offense. Pen C §12022.5(d).

A Pen C §12022.53 enhancement in addition to a greater term of punishment under §186.22(b)(4) is improper unless the defendant personally discharged the firearm in the commission of the offense. People v Brookfield (2009) 47 C4th 583, 590, 98 CR3d 535.

§12022.53(b)	Personal use of firearm in commission or attempted commission of specified violent offenses, whether or not firearm is loaded or operable	10 years
§12022.53(c)	Intentional, personal discharge of firearm in commission or attempted commission of specified violent offenses	20 years
§12022.53(d)	Intentional, personal discharge of firearm in commission or attempted commission of specified violent offenses that proximately causes GBI to or death of nonaccomplice	25 years to life

Notes: After a trial court imposes punishment for the §12022.53 firearm enhancement with the longest term of imprisonment (see §37.12), the remaining §12022.53 firearm enhancements and any §12022.5 firearm enhancements that were found true for the same crime must be imposed and then stayed. People v Gonzalez (2008) 43 C4th 1118, 1130, 77 CR3d 569; People v Warner (2008) 166 CA4th 653, 659, 82 CR3d 911; People v Ybarra (2008) 166 CA4th 1069, 1089, 83 CR3d 340.

Section 12022.53(d) adds two more offenses to the list in §12022.53(a). The §12022.53(d) enhancement is not cruel and unusual punishment. People v Martinez (1999) 76 CA4th 489, 90 CR2d 517. The §12022.53(d) enhancement may be imposed even when the defendant has been sentenced to life without the possibility of parole on the underlying felony. People v Shabazz (2006) 38 C4th 55, 66, 40 CR3d 750. A §12022.53(d) enhancement may be imposed even though the injury is not a bullet wound. People v Zarazua (2008) 162 CA4th 1348, 1361, 77 CR3d 29 (death of child due to car accident with fleeing vehicle); People v Palmer (2005) 133 CA4th 1141, 35 CR3d 373 (injury was broken ankle sustained as result of victim's evasive action). A §12022.53(d) enhancement should not be used both to establish the minimum of a life term under §186.22(b)(4)(A) and as a separate enhancement of that term. People v Sok (2010) 181 CA4th 88, 97, ___ CR3d ___.

With multiple victims, enhancement may be added to counts in which a victim was uninjured. People v Oates (2004) 32 C4th 1048, 12 CR3d 325. However, when there is a single victim and a single crime, only one §12022.53(d) enhancement can be imposed for each defendant even though there are multiple perpetrators. People v Cobb (2004) 124 CA4th 1051, 1056, 21 CR3d 869. When a murder occurs in the course of multiple robberies, all counts are subject to §12022.53(d) enhancements. People v Mason (2002) 96 CA4th 1, 115 CR2d 359.

Section 12022.53 applies to all principals when a §186.22(b) (street gang enhancement) is pleaded and proved and any principal meets specified conditions (Pen C §12022.53(e)(1)) but bars imposition of the parole limitation under §186.22(b)(5) on anyone but the principal who personally used or discharged the firearm (Pen C §12022.53(e)(2)). People v Gonzalez (2010) 180 CA4th 1420, 1425, 103 CR3d 878. When a §186.22(b) enhancement is proved, the actual shooter need not be convicted for this enhancement to be applied to an aider and abettor. People v Garcia (2002) 28 C4th 1166, 1174, 124 CR2d 464.

Whenever an enhancement specified in §12022.53 has been admitted or found true, punishment according to its provisions must be imposed rather than punishment authorized under any other provision of law, unless another enhancement provides for greater punishment. Pen C §12022.53(j); People v Sinclair (2008) 166 CA4th 848, 853, 83 CR3d 128.

Section 12022.53(j) does not permit the court to impose greater punishment by combining enhancement provisions (e.g., Pen C §186.22(b)(1)(C) with §12022(a)(1)). Sinclair, 166 CA4th at 853.

§12022.55	Intentionally causing GBI or death by discharging firearm from motor vehicle during commission or attempted commission of felony	5, 6, or 10 years
§12022.6(a)	Taking, damage to, or destruction of property during commission or attempted commission of felony	1 to 4 years, depending on $ amount of loss
§12022.7(a)	Personal infliction of GBI on nonaccomplice in commission or attempted commission of felony	3 years

Notes: Imposition of the §12022.7 enhancement does not require proof that the defendant intended to cause GBI. See Stats 1995, ch 341, §1 (effective January 1, 1995). The enhancement applies to virtually every felony not specifically listed as an exception. People v Sainz (1999) 74 CA4th 565, 88 CR2d 203 (permitting GBI enhancement for conviction of violating Veh C §23153 (DUI with injury)).

§12022.7(b)	GBI causing coma or permanent paralysis	5 years

§37.16 b. Imposing Consecutive Terms

When the defendant is convicted of more than one count, the sentencing court must first determine whether the proscription in Pen C §654 against multiple punishment for the same act requires a stay of imposition of sentence on any count. Cal Rules of Ct 4.424. See §§37.44-37.50.

For counts not subject to §654, the sentencing judge has discretion to order that the terms be served either concurrently or consecutively unless the legislature has mandated consecutive terms. Pen C §669. But see, e.g., Pen C §667.6(d), mandating consecutive terms for specified sex crimes committed on separate occasions or involving separate victims. The defendant is not entitled to a jury trial on the imposition of consecutive sentences. See Oregon v Ice (2009) ___ US ___, 172 L Ed 2d 517, 526, 129 S Ct 711 (decision whether to impose consecutive sentences not historically within province of jury; instead, specifying scheme for administering multiple sentences is within prerogative of state legislatures); People v Black (2007) 41 C4th 799, 820, 62 CR3d 569 (Black II) (whether to sentence consecutively is decision made by judge after jury has made the factual findings necessary to subject defendant to statutory maximum on each offense and does not implicate Sixth Amendment right to trial on elements of offense.

The criteria the court may consider in deciding whether to impose consecutive or concurrent sentences are listed in Cal Rules of Ct 4.425. These criteria are not exclusive. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.408(a). See, e.g., People v Caesar (2008) 167 CA4th 1050, 1061, 84 CR3d 663, disapproved on other grounds by People v Superior Court (Sparks) (2010) 48 C4th 1, 18, ___ CR3d ___ (naming separate victims in separate counts is circumstance on which court may impose consecutive sentences). The imposition of consecutive sentences, unless it is mandatory, requires a statement of reasons. Pen C §1170(c); Cal Rules of Ct 4.406(b)(5); People v Tillotson (2007) 157 CA4th 517, 545, 69 CR3d 42. The court does not fulfill its obligation to state reasons by simply incorporating by reference aggravating factors listed in the probation report. People v Turner (1978) 87 CA3d 244, 247, 150 CR 807. The court may, however, use the same reason to justify more than one consecutive term. People v Fernandez (1990) 226 CA3d 669, 682 n9, 276 CR 631. California Rules of Court 4.425(b) states that consecutive sentences may not be imposed by the use of:

- A fact used to impose the upper term;
- A fact used to otherwise enhance the defendant's prison sentence; or
- A fact that is an element of the crime.

When a court imposes sentence on a second or subsequent offense without specifying whether the term is to run concurrently with or consecutively to the first judgment, it will run concurrently by operation of law. Pen C §669. On DSL sentencing in multiple cases, whether in the same proceeding or court or in different proceedings or courts, see §37.37.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/37 FELONY SENTENCING/§37.16A c. Calculating Aggregate Term When Consecutive Sentences Imposed

§37.16A c. Calculating Aggregate Term When Consecutive Sentences Imposed

When consecutive sentences for different counts are imposed under Pen C §1170.1(a), the count (including its conduct enhancements) for which the court imposes the greatest punishment is designated the principal term; counts made consecutive to it are subordinate terms. Pen C §1170.1(a). In concurrent sentencing cases, all counts run together. See discussion in §37.16.

When sentencing consecutively, the court is not required to select the count with the greatest available sentencing triad for determining the principal term. Under Pen C §1170.1, the court must designate as the principal term the longest of the terms (base term plus conduct enhancements) that the court actually imposes, not necessarily the longest term available under the applicable sentencing triads. People v Miller (2006) 145 CA4th 206, 215, 51 CR3d 421. For example, if two counts are to be sentenced consecutively, one with a triad of 16 months, 2 years, or 3 years, and the other with a triad of 2 years, 3 years, or 4 years, either count may be selected for determining the principal term depending on the length of the base term of punishment (lower, middle, or upper) actually imposed by the court.

Miller seems to suggest that so long as the base term of a count selected by the court is longer than one-third the middle term of another count, the sentencing is lawful. For example, if the court selected the low term of 16 months from the lower triad as the principal term and imposed 1/3 the middle of 3 years from the higher triad as the subordinate term, this would be lawful because 16 months is longer than 1 year.

In most cases, the one-third of the middle-term rule of Pen C §1170.1(a), discussed in §37.18, requires that subordinate terms for consecutive counts be punished at one-third of the middle term of each count. Conduct enhancements attached to subordinate counts are added at one-third of the term specified for the enhancement. If the enhancement has more than one term (e.g., Pen C §12022.5; 3-4-10 years for use of firearm), the court must choose, in its discretion, the term that best serves the interest of justice. It then imposes one-third of the selected term. Pen C §1170.1(d). See also People v Sandoval (1994) 30 CA4th 1288, 36 CR2d 646.

Ø Note: Special rules in this area, e.g., for multiple kidnappings and forcible sex offenses, are described in detail in §§37.21-37.28.

Pre-2001 law. Sentences for nonviolent felonies committed before January 1, 2001, are still governed by former Pen C §1170.1(a), which provided that additional terms for conduct enhancements were not to be included in the subordinate term for an offense not listed as a violent felony in Pen C §667.5(c) on that date. See §37.30.

Subordinate term example, maximum sentence. Defendant convicted of three separate crimes: robbery with a firearm, residential burglary with over $50,000 taken, and unlawful driving of a vehicle:

(1) Calculation of principal term:

Base term (Count One): Pen C §211	5 years (upper term)
+ Conduct enhancement: Pen C §12022.5	10 years (upper term); the upper term for this enhancement may not be imposed without a jury trial on the aggravating factors or an admission. People v Lincoln (2007) 157 CA4th 196, 205, 68 CR3d 596.
= Principal term:	15 years

(2) Calculation of subordinate terms:

Count Two: Pen C §459 (1/3 × mid term of 4 years) =	1 year, 4 months
Conduct enhancement: Pen C §12022.6 (1/3 × 1 year) =	4 months
Count Three: Veh C §10851

(1/3 × mid term of 2 years) =	8 months
Aggregate term (principal term + subordinate terms):	17 years, 4 months

Ø Note: Although the crime of robbery (Pen C §211, 2-3-5 years) carries a smaller term than does residential burglary (Pen C §459, 2-4-6 years), robbery is chosen as the principal term because robbery plus firearm enhancement results in a greater principal term than does burglary plus excessive taking enhancement. Because count one was designated as the principal term, counts two and three are the subordinate terms. See Pen C §1170.1(a); Cal Rules of Ct 4.425.

§37.17 d. Calculating Consecutive Terms

The law provides three basic consecutive sentence formulas (and their variations). In ascending order of punitive effect, they are the basic one-third subordinate term formula (discussed in §37.18), full middle term stacking (see §§37.21-37.23), and full-term stacking (see §§37.24-37.28).

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.18 (1) One-Third of Middle Term for Crime Plus One-Third of Specific (Conduct) Enhancements

In most situations, the trial court has discretion under Pen C §§669 and 1170.1(a) and Cal Rules of Court 4.425 to sentence multiple counts concurrently or consecutively. If the court chooses consecutive sentences, the sentence for each consecutive term is one-third the middle term plus one-third the term specified for any specific (conduct) enhancements (see Pen C §1170.11) applicable to that count. Exceptions to this rule are discussed in §§37.21 (multiple kidnapping), 37.22 (witness threats), 37.23 (witness intimidation), 37.24 (voluntary manslaughter), 37.25-37.27 (forcible sex offenses), and 37.33-37.33E (strikes). For an enhancement with a triad of terms (e.g., 3-4-10 years), the court is not limited to the middle term. It may impose one-third of any of the terms for an enhancement to a subordinate term. Pen C §1170.1(d). See also People v Sandoval (1994) 30 CA4th 1288, 36 CR2d 646. If the court chooses the upper or lower term for the enhancement, it must state on the record the reasons for its sentence choice. Pen C §1170.1(d). In determining what term to impose for an enhancement, the court is not limited to factors related to that enhancement in selecting the lower, middle, or upper term. People v Hall (1994) 8 C4th 950, 35 CR2d 432. On the impact of Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 127 S Ct 856, on judicial fact-finding in sentence choice, see §37.1A.

Ø Note: If an enhancement is for an indeterminate term (e.g., 25 years to life for Pen C §12022.53(d)), it is not subject to the one-third the middle-term rule of Pen C §1170.1; the enhancement is imposed in full. People v Mason (2002) 96 CA4th 1, 14, 115 CR2d 359.

(4) Full-Term Consecutive Sentences

§37.21 (a) Multiple Kidnappings (Pen C §1170.1(b))

Current law. The subordinate term for multiple kidnapping is the full middle term; the enhancements for any subordinate kidnapping terms are the full term chosen for any of the specific (conduct) enhancements listed in Pen C §1170.11. Pen C §1170.1(b). The "one-third the middle term" rule does not apply.

For offenses committed before 1998, see former Pen C §§1170.1(b) and (g); People v Eddahbi (1988) 199 CA3d 1135, 1142, 245 CR 330.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.22 (b) Witness Threats (Pen C §1170.13)

Current law. Under Pen C §1170.13, the subordinate term for a violation of Pen C §139(b) (threat to victim or witness) must be a full middle term. All the other restrictions in the older law have been eliminated. Presumably, any count-specific enhancements would still be subject to the one-third rule because the statute does not explicitly restrict them. Pen C §1170.1(a).

For offenses committed before 1998, see former Pen C §1170.13.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.23 (c) Witness Intimidation (Pen C §1170.15)

If a person is convicted of a felony and of violating Pen C §136.1 (preventing or dissuading a person from attending or testifying at a trial), §137 (bribery or threatening a witness), or §653f (solicitation to commit a felony to dissuade a witness) with respect to a witness to the felony, the court must impose a consecutive full middle term. Any enhancements for being armed with or using a dangerous or deadly weapon or firearm, or for inflicting great bodily injury, are also imposed at full term. Pen C §1170.15.

For offenses committed before 1998, see former Pen C §1170.15.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.24 (d) Voluntary Manslaughter (Pen C §1170.16)

If a person is convicted of multiple counts of voluntary manslaughter (Pen C §192(a)), the court has discretion to impose a full, separate, consecutive term for each count rather than sentencing the subordinate counts at one-third the middle term under Pen C §1170.1(a). Full-term sentencing for each count is permitted even if the killings were committed in a single transaction. Stacking is not restricted to the middle term, and thus it appears that any of the three terms for the crime may be imposed. The statute is silent about enhancements, so they are probably subject to the one-third rule of Pen C §1170.1(a). Pen C §1170.16.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/37 FELONY SENTENCING/ (e) Full-Term Consecutive Sentences for Forcible Sex Offenses/§37.25 (i) Optional Full-Term Consecutive Sentences (Same Victim, Same Occasion) (Pen C §667.6(c))

(e) Full-Term Consecutive Sentences for Forcible Sex Offenses

§37.25 (i) Optional Full-Term Consecutive Sentences (Same Victim, Same Occasion) (Pen C §667.6(c))

An entirely separate sentencing scheme applies if any of the following sex offenses, listed in Pen C §667.6(e), is perpetrated on a single victim on a single occasion (Pen C §667.6(c), (e)):

- Rape as described in Pen C §261(a)(2)-(3) or (a)(6)-(7);
- Spousal rape as described in Pen C §262(a)(1), (a)(4), or (a)(5);
- Rape, spousal rape, or sexual penetration, in concert, in violation of Pen C §264.1;
- Sodomy as described in Pen C §286(c)(2)-(3), (d), or (k);
- Lewd or lascivious act in violation of Pen C §288(b);
- Continuous sexual abuse of child, in violation of Pen C §288.5;
- Oral copulation as described in Pen C §288a(c)(2)-(3), (d), or (k);
- Sexual penetration as described in Pen C §289(a) or (g); or
- Assault with intent to commit a specified sexual offense in violation of Pen C §220.

Attempts are not included. People v Thomas (1990) 218 CA3d 1477, 1490, 267 CR 865.

Ø Note: Although attempted forcible sex crimes are not subject to this special sentencing scheme (People v Thomas (1990) 218 CA3d 1477, 1490, 267 CR 865; People v Le (1984) 154 CA3d 1, 10, 200 CR 839, disapproved on other grounds in People v Piper (1986) 42 C3d 471, 477 n5, 229 CR 125), they are subject to the special enhancements for weapons and GBI in Pen C §§12022.3 and 12022.8.

Penal Code §667.6(c) allows full-term consecutive sentences, rather than following the usual rule of Pen C §1170.1(a), which limits consecutive terms to one-third of the middle term. Penal Code §667.6(c) applies only if the crimes involve the same victim on the same occasion. People v Goodliffe (2009) 177 CA4th 723, 732, 99 CR3d 385. When Pen C §667.6(c) applies, the trial court has two decisions:

- Whether the terms should be concurrent or consecutive; and
- Whether any consecutive terms for the listed sex crimes should be imposed under §1170.1(a) (one-third of middle term) or §667.6(c) (full consecutive terms).

Ø Example: A defendant is convicted of robbery and two counts of rape. The court has three options: (1) the court may sentence the three terms concurrently; (2) the court may sentence any of the three terms consecutively under Pen C §1170.1(a) (if so, any subordinate term will be limited to one-third of its middle term); or (3) the court may sentence the rapes under Pen C §667.6(c) (if so, the court can impose a full base term for the robbery, and each consecutive rape term will be a full consecutive term of 3, 6, or 8 years at the court's discretion). A reason must be stated if the upper or lower base term is imposed.

With more than one listed sex offense, the court may treat some, but not all, under Pen C §667.6(c). The rest will then be concurrent or consecutive under the normal §1170.1(a) rules. Under §667.6(c), the court may impose full-term consecutive sentences for offenses listed in §667.6(e) that are separate acts committed against the same victim during an indivisible or single transaction. People v Hicks (1993) 6 C4th 784, 791, 25 CR2d 469 (Pen C §654 no bar to imposition of separate consecutive sentence for burglary committed incidental to §667.6(c) forcible sex offenses). A full, consecutive term may be imposed when the defendant is convicted of a single forcible sex crime and another felony. People v Jones (1988) 46 C3d 585, 600, 250 CR 635.

When a full consecutive term is imposed under Pen C §667.6, specific (conduct) enhancements for that term are also imposed in full under Pen C §1170.1(h) and are not subject to the usual one-third rule for subordinate enhancements. People v Garza (2003) 107 CA4th 1081, 132 CR2d 831.

The technique of sentencing some offenses under Pen C §667.6(c) or (d) (see below) and other offenses under §1170.1(a) is commonly called the "box theory." People v Belmontes (1983) 34 C3d 335, 345, 193 CR 882. In the box theory, one box holds the terms for offenses sentenced under §1170.1(a), with the usual structure of a principal term and subordinate term(s) restricted to one-third of the middle term. A second box holds the terms for the offenses sentenced under §667.6. The total sentence is the sum of the total terms in the two boxes. People v Jones, supra (box theory applies even if a box contains only one offense; single qualifying sex offense may be made fully consecutive to other nonsex offenses).

The trial court must, as usual, state the reasons for imposing consecutive terms, but it must also state a reason for choosing §667.6(c) instead of the normal §1170.1(a) scheme. The same reason may be used for both choices, as long as the record reflects the court's awareness that it is making two separate choices. People v Belmontes (1983) 34 C3d 335, 348, 193 CR 882; People v Quintanilla (2009) 170 CA4th 406, 410, 87 CR3d 889; Cal Rules of Ct 4.426.

Sentences imposed under the special provisions of Pen C §667.6(c) and (d) are sometimes called "full-boat" consecutive sentences.

This sentencing scheme may be invoked in situations involving the One Strike sex crime (Pen C §667.61) and habitual sex offender (Pen C §667.71) laws. See §§37.34-37.34A. When fully consecutive sentencing is not mandated under those laws, discretionary full consecutive sentencing may be available to the court under §667.6(c).

§37.26 (ii) Mandatory Full-Term Consecutive Sentences (Separate Victims or Separate Occasions) (Pen C §667.6(d))

Under Pen C §667.6(d), mandatory full-term stacking is required for the sex offenses listed in Pen C §667.6(e) if the crimes involve separate victims or involve the same victim on separate occasions. For a list of these crimes, see §37.25.

Aggravated sexual assault against a child, as defined in Pen C §269(a), is also subject to the terms of Pen C §667.6(d). Pen C §269(c). Note that offenses listed in both Pen C §§269 and former §667.6(d) were subject to the terms of §667.6(d) even before the enactment of §269(c). See People v Figueroa (2008) 162 CA4th 95, 100, 75 CR3d 435 (no ex post facto violation for application of §667.6(d) to conviction for offenses committed before 2006 amendment which merely added express language); People v Jimenez (2000) 80 CA4th 286, 94 CR2d 884.

If the defendant is convicted of a listed sex offense committed against different victims, or against the same victim on different occasions, §667.6(d) requires full consecutive sentences. This means the Pen C §1170.1(a) one-third of the middle-term formula does not apply. The court has the usual discretion to choose between the lower, middle, or upper base term and must state reasons for its choice. People v Reeder (1984) 152 CA3d 900, 200 CR 479. No statement of reasons is necessary for mandatory consecutive terms, for which leniency may be expressed only by imposing consecutive full lower terms.

The second paragraph of §667.6(d) was enacted as a legislative response to People v Craft (1986) 41 C3d 554, 224 CR 626 (narrow construction of "separate occasion"). It provides:

> In determining whether crimes against a single victim were committed on separate occasions under this subdivision, the court shall consider whether, between the commission of one sex crime and another, the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to reflect upon his or her actions and nevertheless resumed sexually assaultive behavior. Neither the duration of time between crimes, nor whether or not the defendant lost or abandoned his or her opportunity to attack, shall be, in and of itself, determinative on the issue of whether the crimes in question occurred on separate occasions.

This language establishes an objective separate-occasion test for determining whether "between the commission of one sex crime and another the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to reflect on his or her actions." People v Pena (1992) 7 CA4th 1294, 1314, 9 CR2d 550. A break in time may be sufficient to indicate separate occasions. People v Magana (1991) 230 CA3d 1117, 1121, 281 CR 338.

The court, not the jury, is charged with determining whether the sex crimes occurred on separate occasions. Cal Rules of Ct 4.426(a). The standard of proof is by a preponderance of the evidence. People v Groves (2003) 107 CA4th 1227, 1230, 132 CR2d 744. In Groves, the court held that Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348, does not mandate a jury trial or proof beyond a reasonable doubt. People v Groves, supra. The rationale of the Groves decision is that the maximum statutory punishment is not increased by finding the offenses occurred on separate occasions, because full consecutive sentences are authorized under §667.6(c) "even if both offenses were committed during a single transaction." 107 CA4th at 1231. The separate-occasions finding merely makes full-term consecutive sentences mandatory rather than permissive. 107 CA4th at 1231.

Completion of a sex offense has been narrowly defined to permit imposition of multiple punishment on a defendant who commits multiple sex offenses against a single victim. Each criminal sexual act, even when one follows another in rapid, uninterrupted succession, may be considered a discrete and segregated crime. People v Harrison (1989) 48 C3d 321, 324, 256 CR 401. Offenses sentenced under Pen C §667.6 are exempt from the proscription of §654. People v Hicks (1993) 6 C4th 784, 25 CR2d 469. Section 667.6(d) applies to principals; the defendant need not have personally committed the sex act to be subject to mandatory consecutive sentencing. People v Farr (1997) 54 CA4th 835, 62 CR2d 892.

When a full consecutive term is imposed under §667.6, conduct enhancements for that term are also imposed fully under Pen C §1170.1(h) and are not subject to the usual one-third rule for subordinate enhancements. People v Garza (2003) 107 CA4th 1081, 132 CR2d 831.

Ø Note: A defendant qualifying for the enhanced sentencing requirements of Pen C §667.6(d) because of crimes committed against more than one victim may also be subject to the One Strike law of Pen C §667.61, for which he or she may be sentenced to a separate, consecutive life term for each victim. See §37.34.

§37.27 (f) Special Rules for Conduct Enhancements in Pen C §667.6 Cases

Penal Code §1170.1(h) provides that the number of conduct enhancements that may be imposed for the crimes listed in Pen C §667.6 may not be limited, whether they are imposed under Pen C §1170.1 or another provision. The crimes listed in §667.6 are forcible rape (Pen C §261(a)(2)-(3), (a)(6)); forcible spousal rape (Pen C §262(a)(1), (a)(4)); rape in concert (Pen C §264.1); sodomy with force or threat (Pen C §286); oral copulation with force or threat (Pen C §288a); child molestation with force (Pen C §288(b)); and rape or sodomy with foreign object with force (Pen C §289(a)). Essentially identical language in former Pen C §1170.1(h) has been held to justify imposition of enhancements for both possession of a knife and use of a firearm during a forcible oral copulation. People v Stiltner (1982) 132 CA3d 216, 182 CR 790.

Each enhancement must be fully consecutive to its base term and any other enhancement. Pen C §1170.1(h). Note that there are two conduct enhancements specific to sex cases: Pen C §§12022.3 (weapons) and 12022.8 (GBI). These enhancements also apply to attempted forcible sex crimes, although other special sex crime sentencing provisions (e.g., §§667.6 and 1170.1(h)) apply only to completed sex crimes. People v Le (1984) 154 CA3d 1, 10, 200 CR 839, disapproved on other grounds in People v Piper (1986) 42 C3d 471, 477 n5, 229 CR 125.

Even if a court chooses not to impose full-term consecutive sentences on a defendant who meets the requirements of Pen C §667.6(c) and instead chooses to sentence under the one-third middle-term scheme of Pen C §1170.1(a), any enhancements to those subordinate terms must be imposed at full term and not at the usual one-third term. Pen C §1170.1(h).

§37.28 (g) Special Rules for Crimes by State Prisoners and Escapees

Felonies committed by state prisoners or state prison escapees, if made consecutive with each other, are calculated according to the standard formula of Pen C §1170.1(a). With multiple counts, one is chosen as the principal term and the others are subordinate, calculated according to the one-third formula. There are, however, several differences:

- The total sentence imposed on the new offenses is not subordinate to the prison term already being served; service of the sentence on the new offenses does not begin until the time the prisoner would have otherwise been released. Pen C §1170.1(c); People v McCart (1982) 32 C3d 338, 340, 185 CR 284. The sentence for a defendant who commits multiple in-prison crimes, even if committed years apart, is computed under §1170.1(a), and that sentence is then run fully consecutive to his original underlying prison term. People v Venegas (1994) 25 CA4th 1731, 31 CR2d 114.
- Priors can be added to the new offenses even though the same priors resulted in the enhancement of the original sentence. People v White (1988) 202 CA3d 862, 870, 249 CR 165.
- The 5-year limit on the subordinate term (for crimes predating January 1, 1999) is not applicable. Former Pen C §1170.1(c); see §37.30.
- The double-the-base-term limit on the sentence (for crimes predating January 1, 1998) is not applicable. Pen C §1170.1(g) (before it was amended in 1997); see §37.30.

§37.30 (h) Limitations on Consecutive Terms for Cases Before 2001

Before January 1, 1998, there were a number of limitations on consecutive sentences for subordinate terms and enhancements. These limitations were phased out between 1998 and 2001. They included the double-the-base-term rule; the 5-year limit on subordinate terms for nonviolent felonies; and limitations on the amount of time that could be added to both the principal term and subordinate terms for specific (conduct) enhancements.

Because sentencing for a crime is controlled by the law in effect when the crime was committed (see People v Mota (1981) 115 CA3d 227, 235, 171 CR 212 (ex post facto violation to apply Pen C §1170.1 amendment to crime committed before amendment took effect)), these rules still apply in cases in which the statute of limitations has been tolled or has not yet expired. On the time for commencing criminal actions generally, see Pen C §§799-805. On tolling, see Pen C §803.

2. Prior Convictions

§37.30A a. Uses of Prior Convictions

Depending on its nature, a prior felony conviction may be used to enhance a sentence imposed under the DSL, as a strike under the Three Strikes law, or as both an enhancement and a strike. This section discusses only the felony sentence enhancing consequences of prior convictions. For discussions of other ramifications of prior convictions, such as making innocent acts crimes, elevating misdemeanors to felonies, making a defendant ineligible for probation, and impeaching the testimony of a witness, see chap 24 and §38.16.

Enhancements for recidivism. Enhancements for recidivism do not attach to a particular count but instead go to the nature of the defendant. People v Tassell (1984) 36 C3d 77, 90, 201 CR 567, overruled on other grounds in People v Ewoldt (1994) 7 C4th 380, 401, 27 CR2d 646. As such, enhancements for priors "are added only once as a step in arriving at the aggregate sentence." Tassell, 36 C3d at 90. Once the prior conviction or prison term is proved, the court must either impose the additional punishment or strike the prior; the court may not simply ignore it. Pen C §12; People v Bradley (1998) 64 CA4th 386, 390, 75 CR2d 244. Note that the court has no discretion to strike a 5-year Pen C §667(a) prior under Pen C §1385. Pen C §1385(b). On striking prior convictions and other sentence "elements," see §37.41.

The basic kinds of priors for sentence enhancement. There are three primary kinds of prior convictions used for sentence enhancement: prior prison terms, serious felony priors, and strike priors.

Prior prison terms. Penal Code §667.5(b) provides for a 1-year sentence enhancement for "each prior separate prison term served for any felony."

The "separate" requirement means that a sentence to prison for multiple cases when the terms are continuous, whether concurrent or consecutive, results in only one prison term enhancement. Pen C §667.5(g).

Certain commitments are not deemed "prison terms." Reimprisonment for violation of parole does not count as a prison prior. Pen C §667.5(g). Commitment to the California Rehabilitation Center (CRC) under Welf & I C §3051 (see §35.29) does not count as a prison term. People v Shoals (1992) 8 CA4th 475, 501, 10 CR2d 296; People v Lara (1979) 95 CA3d 247, 249, 158 CR 847. However, a defendant committed to prison who is housed at CRC does incur a prior prison term. People v Valdez (1994) 24 CA4th 238, 30 CR2d 102.

The prior prison term must be for a "felony." Pen C §667.5(b). This is usually of concern only when the alleged prior prison term was served in a foreign jurisdiction. In that situation, the prior must meet all the elements of the particular felony as defined under California law, and the defendant must have served 1 year or more in prison in the other jurisdiction. Pen C §667.5(f).

There is a "washout" period after which the prior may not be used. Section 667.5(b) priors have a 5-year washout period, which means that the defendant must have been free from both prison custody and the commission of an offense resulting in a felony conviction for that period. Note that the commission of the offense, not the conviction, is the event that ends a washout period. Pen C §667.5(b).

The court may not impose both a §667.5(b) prior prison term and a 5-year serious felony enhancement under Pen C §667(a) for the same offense. People v Jones (1993) 5 C4th 1142, 22 CR2d 753. However, a 5-year prior can be imposed for one count of a multiple-count prior, and a 1-year prior prison term for another count. People v Wiley (1994) 25 CA4th 159, 30 CR2d 701.

A prior prison term enhancement under Pen C §667.5(b) is subject to the court's discretion to strike its imposition under Pen C §1385(c).

Other prior prison term enhancements. In addition to the 1-year enhancement under Pen C §667.5(b), there are other, less often encountered enhancements for prior prison terms. Penal Code §667.5(a) provides for a 3-year enhancement when both the current offense and the prior are "violent felonies" as defined in Pen C §667.5(c). Its washout period is 10 years.

Serious felony priors. When the current offense is also a serious felony under Pen C §1192.7(c), Pen C §667(a)(1) provides for a 5-year sentence enhancement for each prior conviction of a serious felony that was separately brought and tried.

There are substantial differences between serious felony priors and prior prison terms. There is no washout period for any serious felony prior. There is no requirement that the defendant have served time in prison on the prior. Pen C §667(a)(2). A sentencing court does not have discretion to "strike" or stay the punishment for a serious felony prior. Pen C §1385(b).

Serious felony priors must be "brought and tried separately." Pen C §667(a)(1). This means that multiple counts in a single case or separate cases joined for trial result in only one 5-year prior regardless of the number of counts. In re Harris (1989) 49 C3d 131, 136, 260 CR 288 ("underlying proceedings must have been formally distinct, from filing to adjudication of guilt"). See also People v Frausto (2009) 180 CA4th 890, 103 CR3d 231, modified at 2010 Cal App Lexis 31 (error to impose more than one enhancement when three prior convictions were from one case). Thus, in Harris, when two counts were charged in a single complaint and a single preliminary examination was held, but two separate informations were filed, only one §667(a) prior resulted. However, guilty pleas entered at the same time in two completely separate cases that are then sentenced at the same time can result in two 5-year priors. People v Wagner (1994) 21 CA4th 729, 26 CR2d 383. Whether convictions were brought and tried separately is a legal question to be decided by the trial court, not the jury. People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 589, 38 CR2d 347.

Both the prior and the current offense must qualify as serious felonies as defined in Pen C §1192.7(c). Pen C §667(a)(1). The California Supreme Court has held that whether the prior qualifies as a serious felony is a legal question for the court, not an issue for jury determination. People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 87 CR2d 674. In People v McGee (2006) 38 C4th 682, 695, 42 CR3d 899, the California Supreme Court reaffirmed its adherence to the view that a judge, not a jury, is charged with making this determination even in light of Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348, and Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 124 S Ct 2531, because of the "clear legislative intent" that a jury play a "very limited role" in determining allegations of prior offenses.

The Apprendi-Blakely-Cunningham jury trial requirement almost certainly applies to determining whether the current offense is serious or violent, if the determination requires additional proof beyond the elements of the offense. See People v Taylor (2004) 118 CA4th 11, 27, 12 CR3d 693. Note, however, that California courts have held that a jury trial waiver on the prior also acts as a jury waiver on whether the current offense is serious or violent. People v Equarte (1986) 42 C3d 456, 467, 229 CR 116; People v Yarbrough (1997) 57 CA4th 469, 67 CR2d 227; People v Arnett (2006) 139 CA4th 1609, 1614, 44 CR3d 206. But see People v Taylor (2004) 118 CA4th 11, 27 n6, 12 CR3d 693 (jury waiver on priors after jury had started deliberating on current offense not a jury waiver regarding serious felony nature of current offense). Although the court in Taylor distinguished Equarte on its facts (see 118 CA4th at 27 n6), the waiver issue appears to have been something of an afterthought in Equarte; it did not receive in-depth treatment, and it may be ripe for reconsideration in light of Apprendi. See §37.31D.

Ø Note: When a case presents a question about whether the present offense is a serious or violent felony, counsel for the defendant can avoid waiver issues by explicitly stating that any waiver of jury trial on the priors is not intended to waive a jury finding on the nature of the present offense.

Ø Note: All prior serious felony convictions are also strikes. A prior serious felony conviction can be used as an enhancement and a strike in the same proceeding as long as the new offense is a serious or violent felony. Pen C §667(a); People v Williams (2004) 34 C4th 397, 19 CR3d 619.

On the trial and proof of prior convictions for sentence enhancement purposes, see §37.31.

Battery with serious bodily injury, in violation of Pen C §243(d), may be a serious felony. See People v Taylor (2004) 118 CA4th 11, 19, 12 CR3d 693; People v Moore (1992) 10 CA4th 1868, 1871, 13 CR2d 713. Any felony vehicular manslaughter is a serious felony. See Pen C §1192.8. Grand theft of a firearm is a serious felony. Pen C §1192.7(c)(26). Proposition 21 added several crimes to the list of serious felonies in Pen C §1192.7(c), including assault with a deadly weapon or firearm in violation of Pen C §245(a)(1). However, assault by means of force likely to produce GBI, also included in Pen C §245(a)(1), is not a serious felony. See People v Haykel (2002) 96 CA4th 146, 148, 116 CR2d 667; People v Winters (2001) 93 CA4th 273, 276, 113 CR2d 158; Williams v Superior Court (2001) 92 CA4th 612, 111 CR2d 918.

Conduct not charged as an enhancement may be used to establish that a conviction qualifies as a serious felony. People v Brown (1988) 201 CA3d 1296, 1302, 247 CR 683. A conduct enhancement stricken in a plea agreement may still be used to prove a serious felony prior. People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1527, 86 CR2d 134.

Three Strikes. When an individual is charged with any felony, a prior conviction of a serious felony listed in Pen C §§1192.7(c) and 1192.8 or a prior conviction of a violent felony listed in Pen C §667.5(c) can be alleged as a "strike," bringing the defendant within the ambit of the Three Strikes law. Pen C §§667(b)-(i), 1170.12. For discussion, see §§37.33-37.33E.

b. Pleading and Proving Prior Convictions and Prison Terms

§37.31 (1) Charging Priors

Sentence enhancing priors must be charged in the accusatory pleading. Pen C §§667(f)(1), 969, 1170.1(e), 1170.12(d)(1). Penal Code §969a permits amendment of a pending accusatory pleading to charge priors "[w]henever it shall be discovered" that not all prior felonies have been charged. However, Pen C §1025(b) requires the same jury to decide both the issue of guilt and the truth of any prior conviction allegations. Thus, it is an abuse of discretion to permit the adding of priors after the jury is discharged. People v Tindall (2000) 24 C4th 767, 102 CR2d 533.

If the defendant pleads guilty to a "complaint" that does not allege all priors, the complaint can be amended. Pen C §969.5(a). Note that the statute does not say "accusatory pleading" or mention indictment or information. The defendant is entitled to have a jury impaneled to decide the truth of the prior; however, the issue of identity remains one for the court to determine. Pen C §969.5(b). Felony complaints are subject to amendment to add priors after a guilty plea because priors generally do not have to be alleged or proved at the preliminary examination, only in an indictment or information. People v Shaw (1986) 182 CA3d 682, 227 CR 378.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.31A (2) Trial of Priors

Right to jury trial. Under Pen C §§1025(b) and 1158, the defendant has a right to a jury trial on allegations of prior convictions. This right is statutory, not constitutional. In re Taylor (2001) 88 CA4th 1100, 106 CR2d 454; see Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 490, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 455, 120 S Ct 2348 (exempting "fact of a prior conviction" from constitutional right to jury trial).

The right to a jury trial on the truth of alleged priors is severely limited. The trial court determines whether prior serious felonies or strikes were brought and tried separately (People v Wiley (1995) 9 C4th 580, 38 CR2d 347), whether a prior conviction is for a serious felony (People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 87 CR2d 674), and whether the defendant is the person who suffered the prior conviction (Pen C §1025(c)). Thus, when the prior is alleged as either a prior serious felony or a strike, the jury decides only whether a prior conviction was suffered. The court's determination of identification can be implicit and may be inferred from the fact that the court instructed the jury that the defendant was the person referred to in the Pen C §969b prison packet. People v Belmares (2003) 106 CA4th 19, 130 CR2d 400. In People v Epps (2001) 25 C4th 19, 28, 104 CR2d 572, the supreme court strongly suggested that the legislature revise Pen C §1025 "and adopt a rule that makes more sense." Thus far, the legislature has declined to act on the supreme court's suggestion.

Bifurcation of trial on new offense and truth of priors. The trial of prior convictions usually takes place after the trial of the substantive offense. It has long been accepted that the defense may move to bifurcate the trial of the substantive offense and the priors to ensure a fair trial. See People v Bracamonte (1981) 119 CA3d 644, 650, 174 CR 191, disapproved on other grounds in People v Calderon (1994) 9 C4th 69, 80, 36 CR2d 333. In People v Cline (1998) 60 CA4th 1327, 71 CR2d 41, it was held that the court had the discretion to grant a prosecution motion to bifurcate the trial of prior-strike allegations to avoid the possibility of jury nullification.

In a bifurcated trial, when the jury is discharged after the guilty verdict without objection, the court can impanel a new jury for the trial of the priors. People v Saunders (1993) 5 C4th 580, 20 CR2d 638. The trial court's failure to obtain the defendant's express waiver of a jury before conducting a court trial on bifurcated priors is harmless error. People v Vera (1997) 15 C4th 269, 62 CR2d 754. However, additional priors may not be alleged after the jury is discharged. People v Tindall (2000) 24 C4th 767, 102 CR2d 533.

Double jeopardy not applicable to trial of priors. People v Hernandez (1998) 19 C4th 835, 80 CR2d 754, held that a trial court that initially ruled that a present offense was not a serious offense for purposes of Pen C §667(a) could later reconsider and reverse that decision. State and federal prohibitions against double jeopardy do not apply to noncapital sentencing determinations. A prior strike reversed on appeal for insufficient evidence is not subject to double jeopardy and can be retried. Monge v California (1998) 524 US 721, 734, 141 L Ed 2d 615, 627, 118 S Ct 2246; People v Monge (1997) 16 C4th 826, 66 CR2d 853. Additional evidence may be introduced at the second trial. People v Barragan (2004) 32 C4th 236, 9 CR3d 76.

Boykin-Tahl* rights. Absent a specific challenge by the defendant, there is no requirement that the prosecution prove the validity of the waiver of Boykin-Tahl rights (Boykin v Alabama (1969) 395 US 238, 23 L Ed 2d 274, 89 S Ct 1709; In re Tahl (1969) 1 C3d 122, 81 CR 577) in a prior conviction. People v Walker (2001) 89 CA4th 380, 107 CR2d 264. See People v Allen (1999) 21 C4th 424, 87 CR2d 682. For discussion of the law and procedures for such a challenge, see chap 24.

§37.31B (3) Proof of Priors

"Due process requires the prosecution to shoulder the burden of proving each element of a sentence enhancement beyond a reasonable doubt." People v Tenner (1993) 6 C4th 559, 566, 24 CR2d 840. Note, however, that allegations of sentence enhancing priors need not be proven at the preliminary examination. People v Superior Court (Mendella) (1983) 33 C3d 754, 191 CR 1; People v Shaw (1986) 182 CA3d 682, 685-686, 227 CR 378.

Proof of prior convictions is generally simple and straightforward. Certified copies of the records of any penal institution, commonly known as the "prison packet," are admissible in evidence to prove the prior conviction or jail or prison term. Pen C §969b. Also, certified copies of court records are admissible to prove a conviction. Evid C §§452(d), 1280, 1530, 1532, 1550. Even a copy of a certified copy of an official record is admissible, unless there is a genuine dispute concerning its terms and justice requires its exclusion. Evid C §1521(a); People v Skiles (2010) 180 CA4th 1363, 1366, 103 CR3d 873, modified at 2010 Cal App Lexis 74. Identity is generally proved by similarity of name (see People v Luckett (1969) 1 CA3d 248, 252, 81 CR 539) and date of birth, and a comparison of fingerprints or booking photos from the prior case with known originals taken from the defendant in connection with the present proceedings. So, while the prosecution has the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, proof of the actual conviction or prison term is generally not burdensome if the prosecution puts any thought or effort into doing so.

> Ø Note: Often the only dispute regarding a prior is whether it qualifies as a serious felony. Because that decision is made by the court, not the jury, it is perfectly reasonable for a defendant to admit having suffered the prior conviction and merely litigate whether the conviction qualifies as a serious felony. The trial on the issue of whether the prior qualifies is often held in conjunction with the sentencing hearing. For discussion, see §37.31C.

No collateral estoppel effect of previous findings. Previous findings with respect to the truth of a prior conviction allegation have no collateral estoppel effect. People v Rice (1988) 200 CA3d 647, 654, 246 CR 177; see Pen C §667.6(d) (prior must be charged and admitted or found true in prosecution for new offense before additional penalty may be imposed). Similarly, the fact that a defendant may have admitted the prior conviction as part of an earlier plea bargain has no collateral estoppel effect. Pease v Pease (1988) 201 CA3d 29, 33, 246 CR 762; People v Fuentes (1986) 183 CA3d 444, 451, 237 CR 465. Therefore, the prosecution must specifically prove a prior conviction in the present action despite a previous jury's "true" finding, and, by the same token, a previous jury's "not true" finding does not prevent the prosecution from alleging and proving a prior conviction in the current case. 200 CA3d at 654.

§37.31C (4) Proof That Prior Constitutes Serious or Violent Felony

While proof of the fact of a prior conviction or prison sentence is generally quite easy, sometimes proof of the defendant's conduct during the commission of the offense is necessary to establish that the offense qualifies as a serious or violent felony prior within the meaning of Pen C §667(a) or the Three Strikes law. When the prior is from a foreign jurisdiction, it is often necessary to show that the crime of which the defendant was convicted contains all the elements of a California felony.

Proof of the simple fact of a prior conviction is deemed to be proof only that the defendant committed the "least adjudicated elements" of the offense. "[W]hen the record does not disclose any of the facts of the offense actually committed, the court will presume that the prior conviction was for the least offense punishable." People v Guerrero (1988) 44 C3d 343, 355, 243 CR 688. In most cases, proof that a prior conviction was for a "serious" felony also establishes that the conviction qualifies as a 5-year prior or strike prior, because the majority of the serious felonies listed in Pen C §1192.7(c) are "per se" serious felonies, such as murder, mayhem, rape, arson, robbery, kidnapping, and carjacking. People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 456, 87 CR2d 674. Other offenses require proof of additional conduct, such as personal use of a weapon or personal infliction of great bodily injury, to qualify as serious felonies. Still other offenses, such as assault under Pen C §245(a)(1), can be committed in alternative ways, not all of which constitute serious felonies.

In determining whether a prior conviction qualifies as a prior serious felony conviction, the trier of fact may look to the entire record of the conviction but no further. People v Woodell (1998) 17 C4th 448, 450, 71 CR2d 241; People v Myers (1993) 5 C4th 1193, 1195, 22 CR2d 911; Guerrero, 44 C3d at 355. This means the prosecution may not relitigate the circumstances of the prior—evidence is limited to the record of the prior. Woodell, 17 C4th at 450; Myers, 5 C4th at 1198; Guerrero, 44 C3d at 355.

"Record of conviction" was defined by the supreme court in People v Trujillo (2006) 40 C4th 165, 177, 51 CR3d 718, as being limited to documents in the record "reliably reflecting the facts of the offense for which the defendant was convicted." That record appears to be limited to proceedings at and before the adjudication of guilt, whether by plea or verdict. 40 C4th at 179. Trujillo specifically held that defendant's statements in a postplea probation report could not be used to supply the element of personal use of a dangerous or deadly weapon necessary to qualify an offense as a serious felony under Pen C §1192.7(c)(23). 40 C4th at 178.

> Ø Note: The definition adopted in Trujillo is narrower than that used by some courts of appeal. See, e.g., People v Monreal (1997) 52 CA4th 670, 676, 60 CR2d 737, which was overruled by Trujillo. 40 C4th at 178.

A document that is included in the "record of conviction" must still be admissible under the rules of evidence. Myers, 5 C4th at 1201.

Not even all transcripts of testimony from the record of the prior are admissible. A preliminary hearing transcript is admissible when the defendant pleaded guilty after the preliminary hearing and the transcript was relied on for the factual basis of the plea. See People v Reed (1996) 13 C4th 217, 230, 52 CR2d 106. But when the prior was tried to a jury, the preliminary hearing transcript is not admissible, because it "is not reliable as to what evidence was presented to, or relied on by, the jury in reaching its verdict." People v Houck (1998) 66 CA4th 350, 356, 77 CR2d 837.

A prior that resulted from a guilty plea generally has a record limited to the accusatory pleading, the written change of plea form, the transcript of the change of plea colloquy, and any documents considered for the factual basis of the plea.

For further discussion of what constitutes the "record of conviction" that can be used to determine the nature of a prior conviction, see §37.33B.

> Ø Note: Recently, the U.S. Supreme Court questioned the constitutionality of judicial fact-finding to determine the nature of a prior conviction. See Shepard v U.S. (2005) 544 US 13, 161 L Ed 2d 205, 125 S Ct 1254. For discussion, see §24.27.

§37.31D (a) California Offenses That May Require Additional Proof to Qualify as Serious Felony Priors or Strike Priors

California offenses that may require additional proof to qualify as serious-felony or strike priors include the following:

- Penal Code §245(a)(1). Use of a weapon or personal infliction of great bodily injury (GBI) is necessary; aider and abettor liability is sufficient with respect to use of a deadly weapon. See People v Delgado (2008) 43 C4th 1059, 1067, 77 CR3d 259. See also People v Modiri (2006) 39 C4th 481, 497, 46 CR3d 762 (group-beating theory sufficient to satisfy personal-infliction requirement).
- Penal Code §243(d). Personal infliction of the injury must be shown. People v Moore (1992) 10 CA4th 1868, 13 CR2d 713.
- Vehicle Code §23153 (drunk driving with injury). The injury must be great and personally inflicted. Pen C §1192.8.
- Any other felony that is alleged to be serious because of the personal infliction of GBI or because of personal use of a deadly weapon. In such cases, the nature of the injury and the fact that defendant personally used a weapon or inflicted GBI is required.

§37.32 (b) Proving Out-of-State Priors

Determining whether an out-of-state prior constitutes a serious or violent felony under California law can be difficult, but it is imperative when a case involves a prior from another jurisdiction. Internet legal research makes it much easier to obtain the foreign jurisdiction's statutes and case law. The least adjudicated elements of the foreign offense must then be compared to the equivalent California offense. Robbery and burglary priors from foreign jurisdictions are always suspect and must be carefully scrutinized. Here are some of the considerations pertinent to out-of-state priors:

- Robbery must include the element of an intent to permanently deprive the owner of his or her property. In addition, the taking must be from the victim's person or immediate presence. See Pen C §211. Many other states' robbery statutes do not contain these elements.
- Burglary must meet the elements of a California first-degree burglary. See Pen C §§459-460(a), 1192.7(c)(18). The structure must be a dwelling house or statutory equivalent, and it must be inhabited. An uninhabited vacation cabin or fishing shack does not count. Many other states' burglary statutes apply to any building or structure without specifying whether the building is a dwelling or whether it is inhabited. The intent to commit theft or another felony must have been formed at or before entry. Many other states' burglary statutes cover entering or remaining with the requisite intent. The intent must be to commit theft or a felony. Other states often define burglary as entering or remaining with the intent to commit any crime, including misdemeanors. If the intent alleged in the prior is larceny, it is important to check the other state's larceny statute to see if intent to permanently deprive is an element.

Ø Caution: Because most California priors are so easily proven, defense counsel sometimes fails to scrutinize those priors requiring additional proof beyond the least adjudicated elements. Any prior that is not a California conviction for a per se serious felony listed in Pen C §1192.7(c), or a per se violent felony listed in Pen C §667(c), requires a careful and thoughtful review to see if it really qualifies as a serious felony.

c. Three Strikes Law

§37.33 (1) Introduction

The Three Strikes law was initially enacted by the legislature (Stats 1994, ch 12, effective Mar. 12, 1994) and established an alternative sentencing scheme with dramatically increased punishment for recidivists with any prior violent or serious felony convictions. This original Three Strikes law is found in Pen C §667(b)-(i). In the general election of November 8, 1994, the voters enacted Proposition 184, which reenacted essentially similar language. It is codified at Pen C §1170.12. The relationship between these two sections is not specified in any statute. The California Supreme Court has not resolved the relationship between the two statutes, but Justices Mosk and Kennard have expressed the opinion that the passage of §1170.12 did not repeal or supersede §667(b)-(i). People v Hazelton (1996) 14 C4th 101, 58 CR2d 443.

Although known as the Three Strikes law, two separate sentencing schemes are created in this law. The first, accurately called Three Strikes, creates a life term for a defendant who has suffered two or more prior strikes. The second scheme deals with a defendant who has suffered a single prior strike, and doubles his or her sentence. This second scheme is often referred to as a "second strike" sentence. Other limitations, such as mandatory prison sentences and limitations on credits, apply to both schemes.

§37.33A (2) Determining Whether Prior Is a Strike

All prior serious or violent felony convictions can be charged as strikes. When an individual who has at least one prior conviction of a crime defined as a "violent felony" in Pen C §667.5(c) or as a "serious felony" in Pen C §1192.7(c) is charged with any new felony offense, the prior conviction or convictions can be alleged as a strike under the Three Strikes law. If the prior is a serious felony under §1192.7, it can be used as both a strike prior and as a 5-year prior under §667(a). The new felony does not have to be a serious or violent felony for the prior to be used as a strike; however, the new felony must be serious or violent for the prior to be used as a 5-year prior under §667(a).

A conviction of a serious or violent felony is a strike even if it did not result in a prison sentence. See People v Medina (1988) 206 CA3d 986, 254 CR 89. There is no "washout" period. People v Smith (1988) 206 CA3d 599, 253 CR 673.

Convictions predating enactment of the Three Strikes law are strikes if the Three Strikes law defines them as strikes and the currently charged offense took place after the effective date of the Three Strikes law. People v Sipe (1995) 36 CA4th 468, 42 CR2d 266; People v Reed (1995) 33 CA4th 1608, 40 CR2d 47; People v Hatcher (1995) 33 CA4th 1526, 39 CR2d 801.

As originally enacted, the Three Strikes law defined a strike as a felony listed in Pen C §667.5(c) (violent felony) or Pen C §1192.7(c) (serious felony) on June 30, 1993. See Pen C §667(h); Prop 184, §2; People v Nava (1996) 47 CA4th 1732, 1735, 55 CR2d 543. Proposition 21 added a number of additional crimes to the serious and violent felony lists, and explicitly provided that prior convictions for these offenses can be alleged as strikes in prosecutions for offenses committed on or after March 8, 2000. See former Pen C §667.1; Prop 21, §14; People v James (2001) 91 CA4th 1147, 111 CR2d 292. Therefore, in a prosecution for an offense committed between the effective date of the Three Strikes law and March 8, 2000, a prior conviction can be used as a strike only if it was on the serious or violent felony list on June 30, 1993. For a list of such offenses, see Nava, 47 CA4th at 1735 n4. The violent-felony list in Pen C §667.5(c) was amended, effective September 20, 2006, to include certain sex offenses committed against children or in concert. See Stats 2006, ch 337, §§30, 62. Under Pen C §667.1, these amended provisions can be used as the basis of strike allegations in prosecutions for offenses committed on or after September 20, 2006. Stats 2006, ch 337, §29.

The conviction in the prior case must have occurred before the commission of the offense in which the prior conviction is alleged. People v Flood (2003) 108 CA4th 504, 133 CR2d 516. In the Three Strikes context, the date of conviction is the date on which the verdict is reached or the defendant's plea is entered; not the date of entry of judgment. People v Castello (1998) 65 CA4th 1242, 1254, 77 CR2d 314; People v Williams (1996) 49 CA4th 1632, 1637, 57 CR2d 448.

A conviction of a qualifying felony remains a strike even if it is later dismissed or reduced to a misdemeanor, unless a misdemeanor sentence was imposed at the initial sentencing. Pen C §§667(d)(1), 1170.12(b)(1). In other words, if an offense is made a misdemeanor at the initial sentencing, this determination is retroactive to the date guilt was decided, rendering the conviction a nonstrike. People v Queen (2006) 141 CA4th 838, 842, 46 CR3d 332 (wobblers ultimately sentenced as felonies were strikes, though sentencing had not yet occurred when new offense was committed); People v Barkley (2008) 166 CA4th 1590, 1595, 83 CR3d 694 (court intended felony conviction; jail sentence imposed as condition of probation is not misdemeanor sentence). See, e.g., People v Laino (2004) 32 C4th 878, 11 CR3d 723 (Arizona aggravated assault was strike even though charge was dismissed after successful diversion program); People v Franklin (1997) 57 CA4th 68, 66 CR2d 742 (reduction of felony to misdemeanor after successful CYA commitment did not affect its status as strike); People v Daniels (1996) 51 CA4th 520, 59 CR2d 395 (dismissal under Welf & I C §1772 after successful discharge from CYA does not remove strike prior); People v Diaz (1996) 41 CA4th 1424, 49 CR2d 252 (dismissal under Pen C §1203.4 on successful completion of probation did not remove strike prior).

Strike priors need not have been separately brought and tried. They may arise from multiple counts in a single case. People v Fuhrman (1997) 16 C4th 930, 67 CR2d 1.

A qualifying prior conviction stayed under Pen C §654 may be treated as a strike. People v Benson (1998) 18 C4th

24, 74 CR2d 294. In Benson, the supreme court held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it counted as a strike a prior conviction that had been stayed under Pen C §654 on the ground that it arose out of a continuous course of conduct with another conviction that was also alleged as a strike. The court left open the possibility that the trial court would abuse its discretion if it failed to dismiss a strike prior that was stayed under §654 when it and another conviction also alleged as a strike arose from a single act. 18 C4th at 36 n8. In People v Burgos (2004) 117 CA4th 1209, 12 CR3d 566, the court of appeal held that the trial court had abused its discretion when it refused to strike one of two prior strike convictions (carjacking and robbery) that had arisen from a single act. But in People v Scott (2009) 179 CA4th 920, 929, 101 CR3d 875, the court criticized Burgos and found that a §654 stay is but one factor the trial court must consider in conducting a Romero analysis and does not compel striking a strike. Similarly, in People v Ortega (2000) 84 CA4th 659, 101 CR2d 253, the defendant was convicted of two "strike" offenses (attempted voluntary manslaughter and assault with a firearm, both with personal use of a firearm). The court concluded that the offenses were subject to §654 and stayed punishment on the assault. It was held not to be an abuse of discretion for the trial court to refuse to strike the assault offense, even though the offense might in the future constitute an additional strike prior.

The lists of violent and serious felonies in Pen C §§667.5 and 1192.7 include both specific, named offenses, such as murder and arson, and "generic criminal conduct." Nava, 47 CA4th at 1735. See, e.g., Pen C §§667.5(c)(8) ("any felony in which the defendant inflicts great bodily injury on any person other than an accomplice"), 1192.7(c)(8) (same). As a result, some crimes are strikes only under certain circumstances. For example, a violation of Pen C §245(a)(1) is a strike if the defendant or an accomplice used a deadly weapon in the commission or the offense, or if the defendant personally inflicted great bodily injury. A Pen C §245(a)(1) conviction is not a strike, however, if it is based on the use of force likely to produce great bodily injury. See, e.g., People v Banuelos (2005) 130 CA4th 601, 604, 30 CR3d 315. A perhaps more subtle example is a violation of negligent discharge of a firearm under Pen C §246.3. This would be a strike only if the record of conviction shows that the defendant personally used the gun. People v Golde (2008) 163 CA4th 101, 113, 77 CR3d 120.

Qualifying out-of-state convictions can be strikes. A foreign conviction that fits the definition of a strike in California qualifies as a strike. Pen C §§667(d)(2), 1170.12(b)(2). See, e.g., People v Avery (2002) 27 C4th 49, 115 CR2d 403 (specific intent element of theft under Texas law (i.e., intent to take property for long enough to deprive owner of majority of its value) is functional equivalent of California's intent to permanently deprive; therefore, Texas burglary, in which theft was underlying felony, could be California strike); People v Harbolt (1997) 61 CA4th 123, 126, 71 CR2d 459 (federal bank robbery a strike). Ambiguous language in the initiative version (Pen C §1170.12) has been interpreted to mean that foreign priors qualify as strikes for both the "single prior strike" and "multiple prior strike" sentencing schemes. People v Hazelton (1996) 14 C4th 101, 109, 58 CR2d 443. On proof of priors, see §37.31B.

Qualifying juvenile delinquency adjudications can be strikes. Prior juvenile adjudications may be treated as strikes in the following circumstances:

- The juvenile was age 16 or older at the time of the offense (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(A), 1170.12(b)(3)(A));
- The prior offense is listed in Welf & I C §707(b), Pen C §667.5(c) (violent felony), or Pen C §1192.7(c) (serious felony) (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(B), 1170.12(b)(3)(B));
- The juvenile was found to be a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the juvenile law (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(C), 1170.12(b)(3)(C)); and
- The juvenile was made a ward of the court under Welf & I C §602 because he or she committed an offense listed in Welf & I C §707(b) (Pen C §§667(d)(3)(D), 1170.12(b)(3)(D)).

See also Pen C §1170.12(b)(3).

The use of the disjunctive "or" in Pen C §667(d)(3)(B) appears to permit the court to use a Welf & I C §707(b) offense as a strike even if it is not a serious or violent felony. However, in People v Leng (1999) 71 CA4th 1, 83 CR2d 433, the court of appeal ruled that a nonserious, nonviolent juvenile adjudication cannot be a strike. 71 CA4th at 10. The court ruled that to permit the use of a juvenile adjudication as a strike, when an adult conviction for the same offense is not a strike, would violate equal protection. 71 CA4th at 11.

This definition contains another potential ambiguity, which was resolved by the supreme court in People v Garcia (1999) 21 C4th 1, 87 CR2d 114. If both Pen C §§667(d)(3)(B) and 667(d)(3)(D) are read as referring to the offense alleged as a strike, there is an internal conflict in the definition when the alleged strike is a serious felony under Welf &

I C §1192.7 or a violent felony under Pen C §667.5(c) but is not included in the list of offenses in Welf & I C §707(b).

In Garcia, the supreme court reconciled this apparent conflict by construing the fourth paragraph to refer not to the offense alleged as a strike, but to any other offense the minor was found to have committed in the same juvenile proceeding at which he or she was found to have committed the offense alleged to be a strike. 21 C4th at 7. Under Garcia, therefore, a juvenile adjudication for an offense such as residential burglary, a serious felony under Pen C §667.5(c) but not a Welf & I C §707(b) offense, can be alleged as a strike only if, during the same juvenile proceeding, the minor was found to have committed a §707(b) offense.

Ø Practice tip: Determining whether a juvenile adjudication can be used as a strike can be complex. For example, "kidnapping" is both a violent felony under Pen C §667.5(c)(14) and a serious felony under Pen C §1192.7(c)(20). However, only three specified forms of kidnapping—kidnapping for ransom, kidnapping for robbery, and kidnapping with bodily harm—are listed in Welf & I C §707(b). In this situation, determining whether the juvenile adjudication constitutes a strike may require examining the entire juvenile court record to ascertain whether the facts proven at the juvenile proceeding bring the offense within the provisions of Welf & I C §707(b) or whether another offense found at the same juvenile proceeding is included in §707(b). See In re Jensen (2001) 92 CA4th 262, 267, 111 CR2d 751. On what materials may be used to prove the fact and nature of a prior, see §24.27.

California appellate courts historically have held that a juvenile adjudication may be a strike despite the lack of a jury trial. People v Del Rio (2008) 165 CA4th 439, 441, 80 CR3d 615; People v Lee (2003) 111 CA4th 1310, 4 CR3d 642; People v Smith (2003) 110 CA4th 1072, 1 CR3d 901; People v Bowden (2002) 102 CA4th 387, 125 CR2d 513; People v Fowler (1999) 72 CA4th 581, 84 CR2d 874. The California Supreme Court has confirmed that the absence of a jury trial does not, under Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348, preclude the use of a juvenile adjudication as a strike prior. People v Nguyen (2009) 46 C4th 1007, 1028, 95 CR3d 615. But see U.S. v Tighe (9th Cir 2001) 266 F3d 1187 (under Apprendi, lack of jury trial right prevented juvenile adjudication from being prior under federal Armed Career Criminal Act). An express finding of fitness is unnecessary. An implied finding of fitness (i.e., the juvenile was adjudicated in the juvenile court) is sufficient. People v Davis (1997) 15 C4th 1096, 64 CR2d 879.

§37.33B (3) Proof of Prior Strikes

Issues have arisen about how priors may be proved. In some cases, the facts making a prior a strike may be an element of the offense itself. Grand theft of a firearm is a strike. Pen C §1192.7(c)(26); People v Rodola (1998) 66 CA4th 1505, 78 CR2d 735. Hit-and-run driving with great bodily injury is not a strike, unless the GBI was caused by the flight. People v Wood (2000) 83 CA4th 862, 100 CR2d 115.

In some instances, the prior conviction offense itself is insufficient to decide whether it was a serious felony (e.g., Pen C §245(a)(1)—was a deadly weapon used or just "force likely"?). In such cases, the court may look to the entire "record of conviction." People v Woodell (1998) 17 C4th 448, 454, 71 CR2d 241. This also applies to foreign convictions. People v Riel (2000) 22 C4th 1153, 96 CR2d 1. The "record of conviction" may still, however, contain inadmissible hearsay that cannot be considered. People v Stewart (2000) 77 CA4th 785, 91 CR2d 888.

"Record of conviction" was defined by the supreme court in People v Trujillo (2006) 40 C4th 165, 177, 51 CR3d 718, as being limited to documents in the record that reliably reflect the facts of the offense for which the defendant was convicted. That record appears to be limited to proceedings at and before the adjudication of guilt, whether by plea or verdict. 40 C4th at 179. Overruling People v Monreal (1997) 52 CA4th 670, 676, 60 CR2d 737, Trujillo specifically held that the defendant's statements in a postplea probation report could not be used to supply the element of personal use of a dangerous or deadly weapon necessary to qualify an offense as a serious felony under Pen C §1192.7(c)(23). Trujillo, 40 C4th at 178. Nor may other statements in the probation report, including statements by witnesses or the probation officer's summary, be used to establish that the offense was a serious felony. People v Reed (1996) 13 C4th 217, 223, 52 CR2d 106.

Trujillo did not overrule the holding in People v Woodell (1998) 17 C4th 448, 454, 71 CR2d 241, that the record included an appellate opinion, but the court did reiterate its caution that "[w]hether and to what extent an opinion is probative in a specific case must be decided on the facts of that case." Trujillo, 40 C4th at 180.

The following items are included in the record of conviction:

- Charging documents. People v Moenius (1998) 60 CA4th 820, 824, 70 CR2d 579.
- Abstract of judgment. People v Gomez (1990) 219 CA3d 157, 159, 268 CR 50; People v Colbert (1988) 198 CA3d 924, 930, 244 CR 98.
- Clerk's minutes. People v Moenius, supra; People v Harrell (1989) 207 CA3d 1439, 1444, 255 CR 750.
- Change of plea form. People v Smith (1988) 206 CA3d 340, 345, 253 CR 522; People v Carr (1988) 204 CA3d 774, 778, 251 CR 458.
- Transcript of entry of plea. People v Sohal (1997) 53 CA4th 911, 915, 62 CR2d 110 (including factual basis for plea offered by prosecutor without objection by defense); People v Abarca (1991) 233 CA3d 1347, 1351, 285 CR 213.
- Preliminary hearing transcript, if conviction resulted from plea. People v Reed (1996) 13 C4th 217, 223, 52 CR2d 106.

  Ø Note: If the conviction resulted from a trial, the preliminary hearing transcript is not admissible. People v Houck (1998) 66 CA4th 350, 77 CR2d 837.

- Trial transcript. People v Bartow (1996) 46 CA4th 1573, 1580, 54 CR2d 482.
- Penal Code §1203.01 statement by court or prosecutor. People v Johnson (1989) 208 CA3d 19, 26, 256 CR 16.
- Appellate opinion. People v Woodell (1998) 17 C4th 448, 457, 71 CR2d 241 (North Carolina appellate decision used to determine prior conviction was residential burglary); People v Harbolt (1997) 61 CA4th 123, 126, 71 CR2d 459 (U.S. Court of Appeals decision used to establish serious felony nature of federal bank robbery conviction). But see People v Trujillo (2006) 40 C4th 165, 181, 51 CR3d 718 (probative value of statement in appellate decision must be determined case by case).
- Uncertified "rap" sheets. People v Martinez (2000) 22 C4th 106, 91 CR2d 687 (uncertified computer printouts of criminal history information (CLETS) admitted under "official records" exception to hearsay rule to prove fact of prior conviction but not its substance).

For further discussion of what constitutes the "record of conviction" that may be used to determine the nature of a prior conviction, see §37.31C.

In some cases, the record of conviction may be inadequate to show the defendant's actual conduct. In such a case, the court is bound by the "least adjudicated elements" test in its determination. People v Cortez (1999) 73 CA4th 276, 279, 86 CR2d 234 (California prior); People v Jones (1999) 75 CA4th 616, 89 CR2d 485. However, some foreign prior convictions whose elements do not precisely match California's requirements have been found to be strikes. See People v Avery (2002) 27 C4th 49, 115 CR2d 403 (Texas "burglary of a habitation"); People v Mumm (2002) 98 CA4th 812, 120 CR2d 18 (Arizona robbery).

It has been held that neither party can call live witnesses to testify to the facts of a prior conviction. See People v Kelii (1999) 21 C4th 452, 457, 87 CR2d 674 (trier of fact may look to entire record but no further). However, in Gill v Ayers (9th Cir 2003) 342 F3d 911, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that it was a denial of due process to prohibit the defendant from testifying about his prior conviction. In Kelii, the finding that the prior was a strike depended on trial testimony that the defendant personally used a weapon. It is uncertain whether this rule would apply when the strike was proved by the charge itself, e.g., robbery.

Prior strikes do not have to be proved at the preliminary hearing. This remains true even after Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348. Thompson v Superior Court (2001) 91 CA4th 144, 110 CR2d 89. The statutes require the district attorney to plead and prove the prior strikes but do not specify at what stage this must occur. Miranda v Superior Court (1995) 38 CA4th 902, 45 CR2d 498. Strike allegations can be added after the defendant has been convicted or after a guilty plea. People v Valladoli (1996) 13 C4th 590, 54 CR2d 695. Strikes cannot be alleged after the jury has been discharged (People v Tindall (2000) 24 C4th 767, 102 CR2d 533), even if jury trial on the prior strikes was previously waived (People v Gutierrez (2001) 93 CA4th 15, 112 CR2d 568).

For further discussion of proof of priors, see §§37.31-37.32.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/37 FELONY SENTENCING/§37.33C (4) Consequences of One or More Strikes

§37.33C (4) Consequences of One or More Strikes

Both versions of the Three Strikes statute list several mandatory consequences for a defendant with one or more strikes found true. They include the following:

- Commitment to state prison is mandatory. Probation and diversion are prohibited. Pen C §§667(c)(2), (c)(4), 1170.12(a)(2), (a)(4). See People v Superior Court (Roam) (1999) 69 CA4th 1220, 82 CR2d 119 (trial court reversed for deferring sentence and releasing defendant on "supervised own recognizance" to attend rehabilitation).
- The total credits under Pen C §§2930-2934 may not exceed 20 percent and do not accrue until the defendant is physically placed in the state prison. Pen C §§667(c)(5), 1170.12(a)(5). The defendant is entitled to Pen C §4019 presentence credits but does not receive additional day-for-day credits under the amendments to the statute, effective January 25, 2010. See §37.59. The defendant's credits are also subject to the 15-percent limitation of Pen C §2933.1 if the current offense is a violent crime. The language in §2933.1 regarding a life term does not make the 15-percent limitation applicable to all multiple strike cases. People v Thomas (1999) 21 C4th 1122, 90 CR2d 642. The limitation of credits does not violate equal protection. People v Applin (1995) 40 CA4th 404, 46 CR2d 862. A defendant does not need to be advised of the credits limitation that results from a plea to a "strikes" case. People v Barella (1999) 20 C4th 261, 84 CR2d 248. However, a defendant who is misinformed about the credit limitations may have cause to withdraw his or her plea. See People v Goodwillie (2007) 147 CA4th 695, 735, 54 CR3d 601.
- Prior strike convictions may not be used in plea bargaining. Pen C §§667(g), 1170.12(e), 1192.7(b).
- "Dual use" may be made of a strike prior. The same prior can be used to elevate the present offense to a felony and to double the base term. People v Hurtado (1996) 47 CA4th 805, 54 CR2d 853 (same prior burglary used as prior for ex-felon in possession of firearm and as strike). The same prior conviction can be used to (1) elevate present petty theft to felony; (2) double the term as a prior strike; and (3) enhance the sentence as a prior prison term (Pen C §667.5(b)) enhancement. People v White Eagle (1996) 48 CA4th 1511, 56 CR2d 749. The same prior may be used to add 1 year for a prior prison term (Pen C §667.5(b)) and to double the base term. People v Cressy (1996) 47 CA4th 981, 55 CR2d 237 (prior burglary used as prior prison term and as strike). The same prior can be used to double the present term and to add 5 years for the prior under Pen C §667(a). People v Nelson (1996) 42 CA4th 131, 49 CR2d 361 (new residential burglary with prior residential burglary). The same prior can be used as an element of the offense of failure to register under Pen C §290 and to double the present term. People v Tillman (1999) 73 CA4th 771, 774, 86 CR2d 715. The same prior can be used to elevate a sex crime to a 25-year-to-life term under both Pen C §§667.61 and 667.71 (One Strike sex law and habitual sex offender law), double (or triple) it as a prior strike, and add a Pen C §667(a) serious felony enhancement. People v Acosta (2002) 29 C4th 105, 124 CR2d 435; People v Murphy (2001) 25 C4th 136, 105 CR2d 387. See discussion in §§37.34-37.34A.
- Penal Code §1170.1, which permits the court to use "status enhancements" only once in determining the "aggregate term" for a determinate sentence, does not apply to the Three Strikes law. Therefore, recidivist enhancements, like conduct enhancements, are to be applied to each count of conviction under the Three Strikes law. People v Williams (2004) 34 C4th 397, 19 CR3d 619 (Pen C §667(a) prior serious felony enhancements); People v Garcia (2008) 167 CA4th 1550, 1562, 85 CR3d 155 (Pen C §667.5(b) prior prison term enhancements).
- The court must impose consecutive sentences for subordinate terms unless the offenses were committed on the same occasion or arose from the same set of operative facts. People v Casper (2004) 33 C4th 38, 14 CR3d 43; *People v Brione*s (2008) 167 CA4th 524, 526, 84 CR3d 232 (conspiracy to possess drugs for sale and possession of drugs for sale arose from same set of operative facts); People v Hendrix (1997) 16 C4th 508, 66 CR2d 431 (robbery of multiple victims at one location; trial court had discretion to impose consecutive or concurrent sentences). The determination of "same occasion or same set of operative facts" is not the same analysis as that for Pen C §654. People v Deloza (1998) 18 C4th 585, 76 CR2d 255. Nor, when sex crimes are involved, is it the same standard as that for Pen C §667.6(c)-(d). People v Jeffries (2000) 83 CA4th 15, 98 CR2d 903. "Same occasion" is construed narrowly. A theft, followed by flight and then by an assault committed within a few minutes, makes consecutive sentencing mandatory. People v Lawrence (2000) 24 C4th 219, 99 CR2d 570. Consecutive sentences were found to be mandatory when a defendant walking down a street tried and failed to enter two separate residences and then successfully entered a third. People v Durant (1999) 68 CA4th 1393, 81 CR2d 207. When a jury verdict can be based on a number of unlawful acts, and the court cannot determine beyond a reasonable doubt the particular acts selected by the jury, it must assume that the jury based its finding on those acts that give the court the most discretion to impose concurrent terms. People v Coelho (2001) 89 CA4th 861, 107 CR2d 729.

- The sentence for a "second strike" offense (when one prior strike has been found true) must be consecutive to any other sentence. However, it does not run fully consecutively; the "one-third the middle term" rule of Pen C §1170.1 applies. People v Riggs (2001) 86 CA4th 1126, 103 CR2d 890. Any subordinate count to which a prior strike applies is actually served at two-thirds the middle term. The general rule of one-third the middle term applies (Pen C §1170.1(a)), which is then doubled by the strike. People v Nguyen (1999) 21 C4th 197, 87 CR2d 198.

Penal Code §654 applies to sentencing for multiple counts under the Three Strikes law in cases in which consecutive sentencing is not mandated by that law. People v Danowski (1999) 74 CA4th 815, 88 CR2d 471. See People v Carrasco (2008) 163 CA4th 978, 994, 77 CR3d 912 (Three Strikes law does not preclude court from determining whether two convictions were part of same occasion).

One prior strike. If the defendant has one prior strike, the determinate term for the present crime (or minimum term for an indeterminate term) is doubled. In a multiple count case, this applies to both the base term and any subordinate terms. All other sentencing computations remain the same. Applicable enhancements, either specific (conduct) enhancements or other prior enhancements, are still available but are not doubled. Enhancements for prior prison terms (e.g., Pen C §667.5(b)) or for serious felony priors (Pen C §667(a)) are still imposed but are not doubled.

Ø Example: The defendant is convicted of one count of robbery with a knife, with a single prior strike. The base term for robbery (2-3-4 years) is doubled, to a term of 4-6-8 years. The Pen C §12022(b)(1) enhancement for the knife is not doubled—it remains at 1 year. The defendant is additionally punished with a 5-year enhancement if (as in this example) the current offense is a serious felony as defined in Pen C §§667(a) and 1192.7. People v Ramirez (1995) 33 CA4th 559, 39 CR2d 374. In this example, the total maximum punishment would be 14 years, and the defendant's total credits both presentence and postsentence would be limited to a total of 15 percent (Pen C §2933.2, because robbery is a violent crime under Pen C §667.5(c)). If the defendant is convicted of multiple counts, the normal Pen C §1170.1 scheme will apply. This means consecutive terms are calculated as one-third of the middle term, which then is doubled under Pen C §§667(e) and 1170.12(c)(1). People v Nguyen, supra.

A defendant convicted of attempted willful, deliberated, premeditated murder is subject to a sentence of life with the possibility of parole. He is eligible for parole in 7 years. If he has a prior strike, his minimum term is doubled to 14 years. People v Jefferson (1999) 21 C4th 86, 86 CR2d 893. Additionally, a 15-year minimum term before parole established by Pen C §186.22(b)(1) is also subject to doubling. People v Jefferson, supra.

There is a split about whether a sentence of life without possibility of parole, with a prior strike, is doubled to two consecutive terms of life without possibility of parole. People v Smithson (2000) 79 CA4th 480, 94 CR2d 170 (no); People v Hardy (1999) 73 CA4th 1429, 87 CR2d 279 (yes). See also People v Coyle (2009) 178 CA4th 209, 219, 100 CR3d 245 (LWOP cannot be tripled pursuant to Pen C §667(e)(2)).

Two or more prior strikes. If the defendant has two or more qualifying priors, there are additional consequences:

- A defendant with two or more strikes receives no credits against his or her indeterminate life term for good conduct/work conduct in prison. In re Cervera (2001) 24 C4th 1073, 103 CR2d 762. The defendant does receive Pen C §4019 presentence credits (People v Thomas (1999) 21 C4th 1122, 90 CR2d 642) but is not entitled to the one-for-one credits under the amendments to the statute effective January 25, 2010. It also appears from the concurring opinion in In re Cervera (2001) 24 C4th 1073, 1088, 103 CR2d 762, that a Three Strikes defendant does receive credits against any determinate portion of his sentence. It remains unresolved whether this will include credits against a determinate enhancement (e.g., personal use of firearm) to an indeterminate life term.

- The base term for each current conviction is an indeterminate term of life imprisonment with the minimum term calculated as the greatest of:
- (1) Three times the punishment for each current felony conviction;
- (2) 25 years; or
- (3) The term for the underlying conviction, or any period prescribed by Pen C §190 (murder) or Pen C §3046 (punishment for life term).
- In a multiple count case, the court may have to calculate each of the three options for each count, and then impose the greatest for each, even if it means using a different formula for each count. People v Thomas (1997) 56 CA4th 396, 65 CR2d 425. The resulting computations can become very complicated.
- Specific (conduct) enhancements on subordinate counts are served full term; they are not reduced by the one-third scheme of Pen C §1170.1. People v Lyons (1999) 72 CA4th 1224, 85 CR2d 581.
- Prior enhancements (e.g., Pen C §§667(a), 667.5(b)) are then added to arrive at the aggregate sentence. People v Dotson (1997) 16 C4th 547, 66 CR2d 423.

In computing the possible sentence under option (1), the court is not required to use the aggravated term for the crime. It first chooses the term it would impose and then triples it, to see if this option results in the largest term. People v Keelen (1998) 62 CA4th 813, 73 CR2d 250.

Option (3) was discussed in People v Dotson, supra. The entire "nonstrike" sentence, which includes any enhancements, goes into option (3) to set the punishment for the crime itself. Then any enhancements, even though they were included in the computation of the minimum term, are added to the punishment. In Dotson, the defendant was convicted of residential burglary (2-4-6 years) with four separate prior convictions (5-year priors under Pen C §667(a)) for the same offense. Under option (3), his "term for the underlying conviction" would be 6 years (aggravated term) plus 20 years for priors, or a total of 26 years. His term for the crime is therefore 26 years to life. To that are added any enhancements, which include four 5-year §667(a) priors. His total sentence was therefore 46 years to life.

Specific (conduct) enhancements are subject to the same treatment under option (3) and can result in a highly complex sentencing scheme, as seen in People v Byrd (2001) 89 CA4th 1373, 108 CR2d 243. Byrd was convicted of 12 counts of robbery, each with the use of a firearm, and had three §667(a) prior serious felony convictions. For those counts, the option (3) sentencing went as follows: aggravated term of 5 years, plus 10 years for personal use of firearm (Pen C §12022.53), plus 15 years (three prior serious felonies), for a total indeterminate term for the robbery of 30 years to life. Ten years were then added for the firearm use, for a total of 10 plus 30 years to life for each count. The 12 counts resulted in a total of 120 plus 360 years to life, to which were then added another 15 years for the three prior serious felony convictions. With a few other counts, Byrd's total sentence was 115 years plus 444 years to life.

Where does a sentence of life with the possibility of parole ("straight life") with two or more prior strikes fit into this scheme? The court in People v Dozier (2000) 78 CA4th 1195, 93 CR2d 600, disapproved on other grounds in People v Acosta (2002) 29 C4th 105, 118 n4, 124 CR2d 435, held that the correct sentence is 25 years to life.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/37 FELONY SENTENCING/§37.33D (5) Discretion to Strike: Romero and Williams

§37.33D (5) Discretion to Strike: Romero and Williams

The sentencing court must exercise its discretion carefully when sentencing under the Three Strikes law. In some situations the court may have discretion to strike one or more priors and significantly reduce the defendant's sentence. In other situations it may be an abuse of discretion to strike priors.

The court retains the discretion to reduce a "wobbler" offense to a misdemeanor under Pen C §17(b), despite the allegation of one or multiple prior strikes. People v Superior Court (Alvarez) (1997) 14 C4th 968, 60 CR2d 93. A strike offender is still eligible for deferred entry of judgment under Pen C §§1000-1000.8. People v Davis (2000) 79 CA4th 251, 93 CR2d 905.

The prosecuting attorney may move to dismiss or strike a prior felony allegation in the furtherance of justice under Pen C §1385, or the court may dismiss a prior conviction allegation for insufficient evidence. Pen C §§667(f)(2), 1170.12(d)(2).

The trial court has discretion under Pen C §1385 to strike a "strike" in the interest of justice. People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 53 CR2d 789. This decision is fully retroactive. It cannot do so arbitrarily, to reduce calendar congestion, or because the judge just does not like the strikes law. People v Smith (1996) 50 CA4th 1194, 58 CR2d 9; People v Carter (1996) 49 CA4th 567, 56 CR2d 689; People v Ramos (1996) 47 CA4th 432, 55 CR2d 1, disapproved on other grounds in People v Fuhrman (1997) 16 C4th 930, 947 n11, 67 CR2d 1. The court must specifically articulate its reasons for doing so in the court's minutes. People v Superior Court (Romero), supra; Pen C §1385(a). If the record is clear that the court did not recognize its power under §1385, remand for reconsideration is appropriate.

The court may exercise its discretion under Romero to strike priors on some counts but to leave the priors intact on other counts. People v Garcia (1999) 20 C4th 490, 85 CR2d 280. In an unusual case, the information alleged multiple felony counts but alleged a prior strike on only one count. The trial court doubled the sentence for that one count but not the others, in the belief that a strike finding had to be made for each count. The appellate court reversed, saying that the strike had to be applied to all counts unless the trial court complied with People v Superior Court (Romero), supra. People v Morales (2003) 106 CA4th 445, 130 CR2d 800.

Even when a court exercises its discretion to strike a strike, the prior conviction remains in effect as a 5-year prior under Pen C §667(a). People v Turner (1998) 67 CA4th 1258, 79 CR2d 740. The court does not have discretion to strike a 5-year prior. Pen C §1385(b).

As to the court's exercise of discretion, the supreme court has ruled in People v Williams (1998) 17 C4th 148, 161, 69 CR2d 917:

> [T]he court in question must consider whether, in light of the nature and circumstances of his present felonies and prior serious and/or violent felony convictions, and the particulars of his background character, and prospects, the defendant may be deemed outside the scheme's spirit, in whole or in part, and hence should be treated as though he had not previously been convicted of one or more felonies and/or had not previously been convicted of one or more serious and/or violent felonies.

In its review of the exercise of discretion by the lower court, the supreme court held that the standard of review is whether the ruling in question "falls outside the bounds of reason" under the applicable law and the relevant facts.

A number of cases have found an abuse of discretion when priors were stricken. See People v Gaston (1999) 74 CA4th 310, 87 CR2d 829 (auto theft; robbery and kidnapping 15 years earlier; four separate prison terms within the prior decade); People v Thornton (1999) 73 CA4th 42, 86 CR2d 84 (ATM robbery of disabled victim; prior separate prison terms for burglary and robbery with multiple parole violations on each; still on parole when committed present crime); People v McGlothin (1998) 67 CA4th 468, 79 CR2d 83 (robbery of two elderly victims; criminal history since 1972, including juvenile robbery and seven adult felonies, including two robberies, battery on a peace officer, and drugs). The defendant may challenge the trial court's failure to strike a strike under the same abuse of discretion standard. People v Carmony (2004) 33 C4th 367, 374, 14 CR3d 880.

A sentence of 25 years to life for possession of methamphetamine and violation of Pen C §69 (resisting officer) is not cruel and unusual punishment, given an extensive criminal record. People v Martinez (1999) 71 CA4th 1502, 84 CR2d 638.

However, it was held in People v Cluff (2001) 87 CA4th 991, 105 CR2d 80, that the trial court abused its discretion by refusing to strike one or more priors under Romero. Cluff involved a conviction the court viewed as a "technical" violation of Pen C §290 (failure to register as a convicted sex offender). The defendant had failed to update his registration as required on his birthday, although he had not moved from his previously registered address.

§37.33E (6) Eighth Amendment Considerations—"Cruel and Unusual"

The U.S. Supreme Court addressed the constitutionality of the application of the Three Strikes law in Ewing v California (2003) 538 US 11, 155 L Ed 2d 108, 123 S Ct 1179. In Ewing, a 5-4 decision, the defendant was charged with the theft of three golf clubs, worth $400 each. His prior record included strikes for three burglaries and a robbery, for which he was still on parole. While acknowledging that in an "exceedingly rare" case, a prison sentence might be so disproportionate to the crime or to the offender that it would violate the federal constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, the Supreme Court concluded that Ewing's sentence of 25 years to life was not cruel and unusual. 538 US at 20, 155 L Ed 2d at 112.

In Lockyer v Andrade (2003) 538 US 63, 155 L Ed 2d 144, 123 S Ct 1166, another 5-4 decision, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed a Ninth Circuit decision granting the defendant's habeas corpus petition. Andrade, who had multiple nonviolent prior strikes, was convicted of two counts of petty theft with a prior, for stealing videotapes with a total value of approximately $150, and was sentenced to 50 years to life. The U.S. Supreme Court found that the California court's decision upholding the sentence was not contrary to clearly established federal law. 538 US at 77, 155 L Ed 2d at 159.

In Gonzalez v Duncan (9th Cir 2008) 551 F3d 875, 884, the Ninth Circuit applied the analytical model used by the Supreme Court in Lockyer v Andrade, supra, but still struck as cruel and unusual the defendant's 28-year-to-life sentence for failing to update his annual sex offender registration within 5 days of his birthday. Even though the defendant had many prior convictions for serious and violent offenses, the court found the instant offense failed to show any recidivist tendencies and was overall very minimal particularly since the defendant lived at his last registered address, and police knew where he was all the time.

In contrast, the Ninth Circuit held in Taylor v Lewis (9th Cir 2006) 460 F3d 1093, 1110, that a 25-year-to-life sentence was not cruel and unusual punishment for a defendant convicted of possession of 36 milligrams of cocaine. The defendant's history of crimes against the person—his priors included a voluntary manslaughter conviction and a conviction of robbery in which a firearm was used—was an important factor in the court's conclusion.

In People v Carmony (2005) 127 CA4th 1066, 26 CR3d 365, the Third District Court of Appeal held that a 25-year-to-life sentence for failure to update sex offender registration within 5 days of defendant's birthday (the defendant had registered a month previously and the information had not changed) was cruel and unusual punishment. See also Ramirez v Castro (9th Cir 2004) 365 F3d 755 (25-year-to-life sentence for shoplifting, when defendant's strikes were essentially nonviolent shoplifts, was cruel and unusual).

For discussion of attack on the constitutional validity of an alleged prior conviction, see §§24.30-24.39.

§37.34 d. One Strike Sex Crime Law

Separate sentencing scheme. Penal Code §667.61 provides a separate sentencing scheme for sex offenders who meet its criteria. Under this provision, a first time offender who commits one of the offenses specified in subdivision (c) and who meets the statutory criteria set out in subdivisions (d) or (e) is subject to a mandatory sentence of 15 or 25 years to life.

Ø Note: The Sex Offender Punishment, Control, and Containment Act of 2006, effective September 20, 2006, added Pen C §667.61(c)(8)-(9), which make violations of Pen C §§288(a) and 288.5 subject to One Strike sentencing. See Stats 2006, ch 337, §§33, 62. Before this amendment, Pen C §667.61 did not apply to such convictions. See People v Palmer (2001) 86 CA4th 440, 103 CR2d 301. Proposition 83, effective November 8, 2006, eliminated an exception in Pen C §667.61(c)(8), as it was enacted by the legislature, for defendants eligible for probation under Pen C §1203.066.

Facts that bring the defendant within the provisions of Pen C §667.61. The defendant is subject to a sentence of 25 years to life if one or more of the circumstances ("major factors") specified in Pen C §667.61(d) exist, or if two or more circumstances specified in Pen C §667.61(e) ("minor factors") exist. If a single §667.61(e) ("minor factor") circumstance exists, the defendant is subject to a sentence of 15 years to life under Pen C §667.61(b).

Offenses committed before November 30, 1994, are ineligible for sentencing under this scheme. People v Hiscox (2006) 136 CA4th 253, 257, 38 CR3d 781. The effective date of Pen C §667.61(c)(5) and (d)(8), which added new circumstances to the list of circumstances that require sentencing under §667.61, was September 20, 2006. Stats 2006, ch 337, §62.

Pleading and proof requirements. Any fact necessary to invoke this alternative sentencing scheme must be alleged in the accusatory pleading and must be found true by the trier of fact or admitted by the defendant in open court. Pen C §667.61(j); People v Mancebo (2002) 27 C4th 735, 117 CR2d 550. This statutory requirement is mandated by the U.S. Constitution. People v Benitez (2005) 127 CA4th 1274, 1277, 26 CR3d 262. See Cunningham v California (2007) 549 US 270, 166 L Ed 2d 856, 127 S Ct 856; Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 415, 124 S Ct 2531. The trial court must instruct the jury on the factual findings necessary to bring the defendant within this law. People v Estrada (1997) 57 CA4th 1270, 67 CR2d 596.

Ø Note: A finding under Pen C §667.61 that a defendant convicted of violating Pen C §288(a) is not eligible for probation is not an element of the sentencing scheme that must be found by the jury under Blakely v Washington, supra. People v Benitez (2005) 127 CA4th 1274, 1278, 26 CR3d 262.

Use of Pen C §667.61(c) and (d) facts. A fact that is necessary to support the imposition of a Pen C §667.61 sentence must be used for that purpose unless another provision of law provides for a greater penalty, and may not be used again to impose an additional enhancement. Pen C §667.61(f); Mancebo, 27 C4th at 742 (gun use allegation was necessary to imposition of §667.61 term; therefore, it could not be used to impose gun use enhancement). If more than the minimum number of facts necessary to impose a §667.61 sentence have been pleaded and proved, the extra facts must be used to impose additional punishment authorized by other provisions of law. Pen C §667.61(f).

Definition of "single occasion." The 15-year-to-life or 25-year-to-life sentence mandated by this section must be imposed once for each offense committed against a single victim on a single occasion. Pen C §667.61(g). A defendant is not entitled to a jury trial on the issue of whether each offense occurred on a single or separate occasion. People v Martinez (2008) 166 CA4th 1598, 1605, 83 CR3d 738 (judicial determination regarding imposition of indeterminate sentences under §667.61(g) is not functional equivalent of factual determination regarding an element of the crime). In People v Jones (2001) 25 C4th 98, 107, 104 CR2d 753, the California Supreme Court held that, given the harsh punishment under Pen C §667.61(g) and the absence of clear legislative intent to the contrary, for purposes of the statute, sex offenses committed "in close temporal and spatial proximity" occurred on a "single occasion." See also People v Fuller (2006) 135 CA4th 1336, 1342, 38 CR3d 428 (three rapes against the same victim over the course of an hour constituted "a single occasion" punishable by one strike). A 2006 amendment to Pen C §667.61 (see Stats 2006, ch 337, §62) adopted the definition of "separate occasions" found in Pen C §667.6(d). Pen C §667.61(i). Sentencing under Pen C §667.6 is discussed in §§37.25-37.27. If there are multiple victims on a single occasion, a separate consecutive sentence must be imposed for each victim. Pen C §667.61(i). Multiple indeterminate terms must be imposed under Pen C §667.61(e)(5) for offenses against multiple victims on multiple occasions. People v DeSimone (1998) 62 CA4th 693, 696, 73 CR2d 73.

One Strike allegation may not be stricken. The court may not strike a circumstance that brings the defendant within this section. Pen C §667.61(g). People v Estrada (1997) 57 CA4th 1270, 1277, 67 CR2d 596; People v Espino (1997) 53 CA4th 92, 61 CR2d 350.

Constitutionality. Section 667.61 does not impose unconstitutionally cruel and unusual punishment or deprive the defendant of equal protection. People v Crooks (1997) 55 CA4th 797, 64 CR2d 236.

Relationship to Three Strikes law. A defendant can be subject to both this statute and the Three Strikes law. People v Acosta (2002) 29 C4th 105, 124 CR2d 435. In Acosta, the supreme court also concluded that a strike prior can be used to impose a Three Strikes sentence, to bring the defendant within the provisions of the One Strike law, and to enhance the defendant's sentence, despite language in Pen C §667.61(f) that appears to limit the use of §667.61(c) and (d) factors to imposition of one of the terms prescribed in §557.61(a) and (b) when only the minimum number of facts have been pleaded and proved. 29 C4th at 119. See also People v Lopez (2004) 119 CA4th 355, 14 CR3d 202.

> Ø Note: The relationship of Pen C §§667.61 and 667.71 to the Three Strikes law is exceedingly complicated. See, e.g., People v Lopez, supra. Because each law deals with each prior and each present offense in a slightly different fashion, the permutations are endless. The laws may apply in various combinations to a particular case.

Relationship to Pen C §667.71. Penal Code §667.61 and the habitual sex offender statute (Pen C §667.71) are mutually exclusive sentencing schemes. People v Snow (2003) 105 CA4th 271, 129 CR2d 314. When a defendant qualifies for sentencing under both alternatives, there is a split of authority as to whether the correct procedure is to impose but stay or to strike the unused alternative. Compare Snow, 105 CA4th at 283 (strike), with People v McQueen (2008) 160 CA4th 27, 37, 72 CR3d 499 (stay), and People v Lopez (2004) 119 CA4th 355, 364, 14 CR3d 202 (stay).

§37.34A e. Other Alternative Sentencing Schemes

A number of other statutes provide alternative sentencing schemes.

Penal Code §667.51(c). This statute mandates a 15-year-to-life term for an individual convicted of violating Pen C §288 (lewd and lascivious conduct with minor) or §288.5 (continuous sexual abuse of child under 14) who has at least two prior convictions of sex offenses specified in Pen C §667.51(b). See Pen C §667.51.

Ø Note: Few, if any, defendants are currently charged under §667.51(c), because it overlaps with §§667.61 and 667.71.

Penal Code §667.7 (habitual violent offender). Most defendants eligible for sentencing under this provision are also eligible for sentencing under the Three Strikes law. However, §667.7 does include some qualifying priors (e.g., escape or attempt to escape by an inmate with force or violence in violation of Pen C §4530 or §4532) that are not strikes under Pen C §§667(b)-(i) and 1170.12. See Pen C §667.7(a). A defendant convicted of a felony in which the defendant inflicted great bodily injury (GBI), or personally used force that was likely to produce GBI, and who has served two or more prior separate prison terms for listed violent offenses, including murder, forcible sex crimes, kidnapping, carjacking with a deadly weapon, or any felony in which the defendant inflicted GBI as provided in Pen C §12022.7, must be punished under either Pen C §667.7(a)(1) or (a)(2). Section 667.7(a)(1) provides that when a defendant served two prior separate prison terms for listed violent offenses, the new term must be life in prison. In addition, the defendant's minimum parole date will be calculated by the greater of a minimum of 20 years or the term that would have been imposed in the absence of the enhancing statute. This means that, without the statute, if the defendant had received a 15-year term, his or her term under the statute would be 20 years to life. If the term without the statute had been 25 years, the term under the statute would be 25 years to life. People v Skeirik (1991) 229 CA3d 444, 466, 280 CR 175; People v Victor (1991) 227 CA3d 518, 524, 278 CR 7. For a discussion of the applicability of this statute to a defendant convicted of murder, see People v Jenkins (1995) 10 C4th 234, 40 CR2d 903.

Under Pen C §667.7(a)(2), when a defendant has served three or more prior separate prison terms for the listed violent offenses, the punishment is life without possibility of parole. This exceeds the punishment available under the Three Strikes law.

Penal Code §667.71 (habitual sex offender). A person who has previously served at least one prison term for specified sex offenses, and who is again convicted of one of these offenses, is a habitual sex offender. The specified offenses are listed in Pen C §667.71(c)(1)-(13).

The statute applies only if the facts required to prove that the defendant falls within it are alleged in the accusatory pleading and admitted or proved. Pen C §667.71(e).

A defendant convicted under §667.71 is also subject to the Three Strikes law if he or she has one or more qualifying prior convictions. People v Murphy (2001) 25 C4th 136, 105 CR2d 387. In Murphy, the defendant was charged with two counts of lewd and lascivious conduct with a child. He had two prior convictions of similar offenses. His two prior convictions were used three times: to elevate the terms for each of his present crimes to 25 to life under §667.71; to triple each term to 75 to life under the Three Strikes law (these terms were run consecutively to total 150 to life); and as a prior serious felony conviction under Pen C §667(a) to add another 5 years, for a total of 155 years to life.

Ø Note: In Murphy, the same prior was used repeatedly. This same scenario will apply to most cases in which §667.71 is applicable, because it appears that most qualifying priors under this section are also serious felonies and strikes under Pen C §1192.7.

If a qualifying defendant has multiple offenses against a single victim, §667.71 is likely to result in a larger sentence than would §667.61.

This statute and the One Strike sex crime law (Pen C §667.61) are mutually exclusive sentencing schemes. People v Snow (2003) 105 CA4th 271, 129 CR2d 314. When a defendant qualifies for sentencing under both alternatives, there is a split of authority as to whether the correct procedure is to strike or to impose but stay the unused alternative.

Compare Snow, 105 CA4th at 283 (strike), with People v McQueen (2008) 160 CA4th 27, 37, 72 CR3d 499 (stay), and People v Lopez (2004) 119 CA4th 355, 364, 14 CR3d 202 (stay).

Penal Code §667.75 (drug offenses involving minors). A defendant convicted of certain drug offenses involving minors who has previously served two or more prior separate prison terms as defined in Pen C §667.5 for violation of those crimes may be punished by imprisonment for life and will not be eligible for release on parole for 17 years, or for the term determined by the court normally under Pen C §1170.

Penal Code §186.22(b)(4) (life term for criminal street gang crimes). Under Pen C §186.22(b)(4), enacted by Proposition 21, crimes listed in §186.22(b)(4)(B)-(C) committed "for the benefit of, at the direction of, or in association with any criminal street gang, with the specific intent to promote, further, or assist in" criminal activity by gang members, are punishable by an indeterminate life term. The listed crimes include home invasion robbery, carjacking, violation of §246 or §12022.55 (Pen C §186.22(b)(4)(B)), felony extortion, and threatening victims or witnesses (Pen C §186.22(b)(4)(C)). The effective date of Proposition 21 was March 8, 2000.

The minimum term for the indeterminate life sentence is either (1) the term under Pen C §1170 for the underlying conviction, including enhancements, or (2) the term specified for the crime in the following list, whichever is greater. A minimum of 15 years is prescribed for the following crimes: home invasion robbery (Pen C §213(a)(1)(A)); carjacking (Pen C §215); felony violation of Pen C §246; and violation of Pen C §12022.55. The minimum term for extortion (Pen C §519) and threats to victims and witnesses (Pen C §136.1) is 7 years. A person convicted of a crime that carries a life term may not be paroled until he or she has served 15 years. Pen C §186.22(b)(5). The minimum term applies only to the substantive offense; it does not apply to a life term (e.g., Pen C §12022.53(d)) enhancement. People v Montes (2003) 31 C4th 350, 2 CR3d 621.

§37.35 3. Penal Code §12022.1: Felony Committed While on Bail or Own Recognizance

A defendant released on bail or on his or her own recognizance (O.R.) who commits a second offense any time before his or her conviction on the primary offense becomes final may be punished under Pen C §12022.1. Effective January 1, 1999, this definition of "primary offense" was expanded to include a felony offense for which the defendant is out of custody between the pronouncement of judgment and the time the person actually surrenders or is otherwise returned to custody. The terms for the primary offense, the secondary offense, and the 2-year term for the enhancement must be imposed consecutively. Pen C §12022.1; People v Burnes (1990) 224 CA3d 1222, 274 CR 466, overruled on other grounds in People v McClanahan (1992) 3 C4th 860, 872 n6, 12 CR2d 719.

The enhancement is linked to the number of separate prior cases for which the defendant is on bail or O.R. If the defendant commits a crime while released on multiple previous cases, his or her sentence is subject to one enhancement for each such prior. Thus, a defendant on bail in two separate cases who commits a new felony is subject to two enhancements. People v Mackabee (1989) 214 CA3d 1250, 1262, 263 CR 183; People v Warinner (1988) 200 CA3d 1352, 1355, 247 CR 197. However, while the defendant must serve a consecutive term to the first offense for one of the new offenses, the trial court has discretion to sentence concurrently on the remaining new offenses. People v Tillotson (2007) 157 CA4th 517, 544, 69 CR3d 42. The enhancement is not multiplied if the defendant commits multiple felonies while on bail for a single prior offense. People v Nguyen (1988) 204 CA3d 181, 196, 251 CR 40.

For crimes committed before January 1, 1998, §12022.1 enhancements are subject to the double-the-base-term limit. People v McClanahan (1992) 3 C4th 860, 12 CR2d 719. See §37.30.

A §12022.1 enhancement may be stricken by the court under Pen C §1385. People v Meloney (2003) 30 C4th 1145, 135 CR2d 602.

A defendant who has been placed in a diversion program, even though he or she was released on O.R. to enter the program, is not subject to the §12022.1 enhancement. People v Ormiston (2003) 105 CA4th 676, 129 CR2d 567.

The §12022.1 enhancement can be applied to a conviction for Pen C §1320.5 (failure to appear in court when released on bail). People v Walker (2002) 29 C4th 577, 128 CR2d 75. The enhancement can be imposed when the defendant is on bail for an out-of-state offense. People v Griffin (2005) 128 CA4th 1112, 27 CR3d 734.

§37.36 4. Aggregate Term

The aggregate term is the sum of the following (Pen C §1170.1(a); People v Tassell (1984) 36 C3d 77, 90, 201 CR 567, overruled on other grounds in People v Ewoldt (1994) 7 C4th 380, 401, 27 CR2d 646):

Principal term (base term + specific (conduct) enhancements)

+ Subordinate terms (including specific (conduct) enhancement)

+ Enhancement terms for Pen C §12022.1

+ Enhancement terms for priors

Aggregate term =

Ø Example:

The defendant is convicted of attempted murder and robbery with GBI, all of which he did while out on bail for Veh C §10851, for which he was subsequently convicted. He has two prior prison terms (Pen C §667.5(b)).

Principal term (Pen C §§664, 187) =	9 years
+ Subordinate term (for Pen C §211 & GBI) (1/3 mid term) =	2 years
+ Subordinate term (for Veh C §10851) (1/3 mid term) =	8 months
+ (Pen C §12022.1) =	2 years
+ Priors (Pen C §667.5(b)) =	2 years
Aggregate term =	15 years, 8 months

D. Multiple DSL and Combined DSL/ISL Terms

§37.37 1. Multiple Cases That Result in Multiple DSL Terms (Including Misdemeanors)

Under Pen C §1170.1(a), when a defendant is convicted in separate judgments, the judge in the last case must pronounce a single aggregate term. This can occur

- when new charges are brought in the same county after the defendant has been convicted there and is serving a sentence;
- when a defendant is convicted in one county and then on conviction is transported to another county to face pending charges; or
- when a defendant has been committed to state prison and is brought back after making a Pen C §1381 demand.

As long as the defendant has been in continuous custody, the lapse of time does not change the applicability of this rule. All the sentences must be combined as if they were all counts in one judgment. If the last judge intends to impose any terms consecutive to any of the previous terms, the judge must then make a new determination of which count represents the principal term. Discretionary decisions, including imposition of other than the middle term for a count, making counts consecutive or concurrent to each other, or striking punishment for enhancements, made by the judges in the previous cases may not be changed by the current judge. Cal Rules of Ct 4.452. See Pen C §§669, 1170.1(a). The decision to impose a consecutive sentence is generally a sentencing choice that requires a statement of reasons. People v Callahan (1983) 149 CA3d 1183, 1188, 198 CR 12, disapproved on another ground in People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 353, 36 CR2d 627.

If the court in the last case does not specify that some or all terms are consecutive to the earlier ones at sentencing or within 60 calendar days thereafter, the sentences become concurrent by operation of law. Pen C §669.

Misdemeanor terms to be served in a county jail may be sentenced consecutively to a DSL prison term. See In re Eric J. (1979) 25 C3d 522, 538, 159 CR 317. A consecutive misdemeanor term does not require a statement of reasons. People v Fugate (1990) 219 CA3d 1408, 269 CR 37. It is, however, subject to the double-the-base-term limit of Pen C §1170.1(g) if the crime was committed before January 1, 1998. People v Murray (1994) 23 CA4th 1783, 29 CR2d 42.

§37.38 2. Combined Determinate (DSL) and Indeterminate (ISL) Terms

An indeterminate sentence under Pen C §1168 may run concurrently or consecutively to a determinate sentence under Pen C §1170. Pen C §669; Cal Rules of Ct 4.425.

The ISL count cannot be a "principal term" to subordinate DSL counts. People v McGahuey (1981) 121 CA3d 524, 531, 175 CR 479. Both the ISL sentence and the DSL sentence must be considered and calculated independently. One DSL count must be designated the principal term to which any other consecutive DSL counts are subordinate. When a person is committed to prison on an indeterminate sentence that is ordered consecutive to a determinate sentence, the determinate sentence is served first. Pen C §669. The entire DSL aggregate term must be served before the consecutive ISL sentence. People v Reyes (1989) 212 CA3d 852, 858, 260 CR 846. No part of the DSL term may be credited toward parole eligibility on the life term. Pen C §669. Effective January 1, 1998, enhancements to indeterminate terms are served in full and are not subject to any reduction. People v Felix (2000) 22 C4th 651, 94 CR2d 54.

Ø Example: The defendant is convicted of second-degree murder (Pen C §187) with the use of a firearm (Pen C §12022.53(d)) and two separate, unrelated counts of robbery (Pen C §211), each with the use of a knife (Pen C §12022(b)(1)). His maximum sentence is calculated as follows:

Principal term (Pen C §211) (aggravated term) =	5 years
+ enhancement (Pen C §12022(b)(1)) =	1 year
+ subordinate term (Pen C §211) (1/3 mid term) =	1 year
+ enhancement (Pen C §12022(b)(1)) (1/3 mid term) =	4 months
+ indeterminate term (Pen C §187) =	15 years to life
+ enhancement (Pen C §12022.53(d)) =	25 years to life
Aggregate term =	7 years, 4 months + 40 years to life

§37.39 3. Multiple ISL Terms and Enhancements

The trial court has discretion to decide whether to impose multiple ISL terms consecutively or concurrently. Pen C §669; People v Morris (1971) 20 CA3d 659, 667, 97 CR 817, overruled on other grounds in People v Duran (1976) 16 C3d 282, 292, 127 CR 618. For determinate sentences, Cal Rules of Ct 4.403 and 4.406(b)(6) require the court to set forth its reasons for imposing consecutive sentences, but these rules do not apply to multiple indeterminate sentences. People v Arviso (1988) 201 CA3d 1055, 1058, 247 CR 559. The decision to run indeterminate terms consecutively is, however, subject to review under the abuse of discretion standard (201 CA3d at 1058), and thus should be carefully considered and supported by reasons. People v Murray (1990) 225 CA3d 734, 750, 275 CR 498.

If consecutive indeterminate terms are imposed, they are not subject to any of the "one-third" rules, because those rules (and Pen C §1170.1) apply only to determinate sentences. Thus, consecutive indeterminate terms are imposed at full term. Enhancements to consecutive indeterminate terms are also imposed at full term. They are not subject to the one-third rule, even though the enhancement itself carries a determinate term. People v Felix (2000) 22 C4th 651, 94 CR2d 54.

§37.40 4. Out-of-State and California DSL Terms

California courts can sentence concurrently or consecutively to a prior uncompleted term in a foreign jurisdiction (Cal Rules of Ct 4.451(b)), with one exception. When the legislature has expressly provided that the sentence must commence from the time the offender would otherwise have been released from prison, the trial court must sentence consecutively. People v Gulbrandsen (1989) 209 CA3d 1547, 1558, 258 CR 75. When a determinate sentence is imposed to run consecutively to a federal sentence or the sentence of another state, the California sentence must be determined without reference to the foreign judgment, and service of it does not begin until completion of the other sentence. Cal Rules of Ct 4.451(b). This means that the principal/subordinate rules do not include the foreign sentence. The California term is computed as if the foreign sentence did not exist, with the principal term and subordinate terms, if any, computed entirely from the California convictions. Cal Rules of Ct 4.451(b); People v Veasey (1979) 98 CA3d 779, 786, 159 CR 755. A defendant sentenced on a state case ordered to run concurrently with a federal case is not eligible for this benefit unless he or she is in federal custody. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.451(b). Such a defendant may file a writ of habeas corpus to petition the state court for transfer to a federal facility. In re Stoliker (1957) 49 C2d 75, 77, 315 P2d 12.

§37.41 E. Striking Charges and Enhancements Under Pen C §1385

Trial court's discretion to strike or dismiss enhancement or other sentencing element. The trial court may dismiss an action in furtherance of justice either on its own motion or on application of the prosecutor. Pen C §1385. The defendant has no right to make a motion to dismiss under Pen C §1385, but may invite the trial court to dismiss in the interests of justice. People v Carmony (2004) 33 C4th 367, 375, 14 CR3d 880. Such an invitation may be made by an oral or written application. See People v Carmony, supra; Rockwell v Superior Court (1976) 18 C3d 420, 441, 134 CR 650. The §1385 request can be made at a preliminary hearing. People v Konow (2004) 32 C4th 995, 12 CR3d 301. The court's erroneous failure to consider such a request can deny the defendant a substantial right. 32 C4th at 1022. An appellate claim or error premised on the trial court's failure to dismiss under Pen C §1385 is reviewed for abuse of discretion. Carmony, 33 C4th at 376.

Ø Note: By failing to invite the trial court to dismiss a charge or enhancement in furtherance of justice, the defendant forfeits the opportunity for appellate review or any error under People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 352, 36 CR2d 627; Carmony, 33 C4th at 375.

The authority conferred by §1385 permits dismissal in the interest of justice in any situation in which the legislature has not clearly shown a contrary intent. People v Fritz (1985) 40 C3d 227, 219 CR 460. This authority includes the power to strike (or dismiss) enhancements. See, e.g., People v Jones (2007) 157 CA4th 1373, 1379, 69 CR3d 262 (court may strike deadly-weapon-use enhancement under Pen C §12022(b)(1)); People v Meloney (2003) 30 C4th 1145, 1155, 135 CR2d 602 (trial court may strike or dismiss Pen C §12022.1 (on bail) allegation); People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 504, 53 CR2d 789 (trial court has discretion under §1385 to dismiss strike). See also People v Harvey (1991) 233 CA3d 1206, 1231, 285 CR 158; People v Cattaneo (1990) 217 CA3d 1577, 1589, 266 CR 710. In general, the court may, under §1385, strike an enhancement unless the enhancement statute itself or a court decision discussing that statute prohibits it. See, e.g., Pen C §12022.53(h) (court may not strike under §1385).

In exercising its discretion to strike an enhancement, the court may consider various factors, including the defendant's youth, the number of adult priors, the lack of prior prison terms, the current nonviolent crime, the length of the prison sentence that the trial court is imposing, and the "nature and circumstances" of the defendant's past and present convictions which suggest that the prior offenses were mitigated by either being committed in a less serious or violent manner than normal or by the low level of the defendant's participation as, for example, a subordinate. See People v Wallace (2004) 33 C4th 738, 753, 16 CR3d 96. The court has no sua sponte duty to gather and consider evidence potentially in support of a defendant's request to strike an enhancement under Pen C §1385. The burden is on the defendant to provide the facts to the court but when such evidence is presented, the court does have a duty to consider it. People v Lee (2008) 161 CA4th 124, 129, 73 CR3d 811.

Limitations on discretion. By its own terms, §1385 may not be used to strike a prior serious felony alleged under Pen C §667(a). See Pen C §1385(b). Other examples of sentencing provisions for which the legislature has clearly shown an intent to restrict or eliminate the trial court's §1385 discretion include the following:

- Penal Code §1203.06 (barring probation for individual who personally used firearm in commission of specified offenses, and prohibiting court from striking personal-use findings under §1385). See People v Tanner (1979) 24 C3d 514, 519, 156 CR 450.
- Penal Code §1203.066 (prohibiting court from striking findings barring probation for individual convicted of specified sex offenses). See People v Lathrop (1986) 181 CA3d 1217, 1222, 227 CR 34.
- Penal Code §1203.07 (barring probation for individual convicted of specified serious drug-related offenses). See People v McGuire (1993) 14 CA4th 687, 695, 18 CR2d 12.
- Penal Code §12022.5 (enhancement for personal use of firearm in commission of felony or controlled substance offense). See Pen C §12022.5(c) (as amended, Stats 2002, ch 126); People v Herrera (1998) 67 CA4th 987, 79 CR2d 539.
- Penal Code §12022.53 (enhancement for personal use of firearm in commission of specified felonies). See Pen

C §12022.53(h).

- The predicate circumstances for a "one strike" sex offense under Pen C §667.61.

In general, the court may not exercise §1385 discretion to eliminate a historical fact as opposed to an allegation that must be pleaded and proved. In re Varnell (2003) 30 C4th 1132, 1137, 135 CR2d 619 (court could not "strike" fact defendant was convicted of a serious felony in order to make him eligible for Proposition 36). For a chart listing prior-conviction allegations that must be pleaded and proved, see §24.18.

Procedure. The procedure under Pen C §1385 for striking an enhancement is strict. The court must provide a written minute order stating its justification. Pen C §1385(a); People v Bonnetta (2009) 46 C4th 143, 151, 92 CR3d 370 (dismissal order ineffective absent written statement of reasons on minute order); People v Rivadeneira (1985) 176 CA3d 132, 137, 222 CR 548. The sentence element affected must be stricken (i.e., eliminated for all time) as opposed to being stayed. See People v Harvey, supra.

The trial court has discretion either to strike (or dismiss) an enhancement or to strike the punishment. Pen C §1385(c); People v Meloney, supra. Under Cal Rules of Ct 4.428(a), the trial court should not strike the enhancement allegation. To the extent that this directive can be read as a preference for striking the punishment only rather than the enhancement itself, it appears to conflict with Pen C §1385(a). See People v Hall (1994) 8 C4th 950, 35 CR2d 432 (rule of court that conflicts with governing statutes is invalid).

Ø Note: Prosecutors generally encourage the trial court to strike just the punishment under a given section, not the finding. This practice allows later courts to use the finding and its surrounding circumstances. Defense attorneys prefer that the court strike the finding.

On dismissal of prior strike allegations under §1385, see §37.33D. For discussion of §1385 generally, see chap 25.

G. Mandatory Sentencing Limitations

§37.43 1. Dual Use of Facts

Sentencing courts generally may not use one fact as two aggravating factors, but the rules are not completely clear about when using the same fact more than once is prohibited.

Facts relating to the crime or to the defendant are used in several ways under the Determinate Sentencing Law (DSL): as elements of crimes or enhancements, and as sentencing factors. Sentencing factors are used primarily in decisions to grant or deny probation, to aggravate or mitigate a base term, or to choose consecutive sentences. There are two express rules against dual use of a fact:

(1) The court must not impose an upper term by using the fact of an enhancement on which sentence is imposed, nor can it impose an upper term by using a fact used to justify consecutive sentences. Pen Code §1170(b). See People v Coleman (1989) 48 C3d 112, 164, 255 CR 813; People v Jones (2009) 178 CA4th 853, 860, 100 CR3d 780; People v Fernandez (1990) 226 CA3d 669, 680, 276 CR 631.

(2) The court may not impose consecutive rather than concurrent sentences on the basis of a fact used to impose the upper term, a fact used to otherwise enhance the defendant's prison sentence (e.g., a specific (conduct) enhancement), or a fact that is an element of the crime. Cal Rules of Ct 4.425(b). See Coleman, 48 C3d at 163; People v Barker (1986) 182 CA3d 921, 940, 227 CR 578.

Ø Note: The legislature created an exception to this rule by allowing convictions for assault with a firearm under Pen C §245(a)(2) to be enhanced with firearm use under Pen C §12022.5(d).

Theoretically, apart from these express restrictions, repeated use of the same fact should be permitted. See People v Vega (1990) 224 CA3d 506, 513, 273 CR 684, disapproved on other grounds in People v McClanahan (1992) 3 C4th 860, 872 n6, 12 CR2d 719. In practice, the courts of appeal have created the following dual use rules:

- An element of a crime may not be used to impose a greater term of punishment for that crime. Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(d). People v Marshall (1987) 196 CA3d 1253, 1259, 242 CR 319.
- An element of a crime may not be used as a factor in denying probation. People v Parrott (1986) 179 CA3d 1119, 1125, 225 CR 293.

Ø Note: In Lopez v Superior Court (2008) 160 CA4th 824, 831, 72 CR3d 929, the court held that the same gang-related conduct should not be used both to violate an injunction against gang-related activity and to enhance the misdemeanor to a wobbler under Pen C §186.22(d).

Ø Note: In People v Calhoun (2007) 40 C4th 398, 53 CR3d 539, the supreme court held that it was proper for the trial court to sentence the defendant in a vehicular manslaughter case to two upper terms on the ground that there were multiple victims even though there was only one victim per count. The court held that by finding the defendant guilty on multiple counts, the jury necessarily found that there were multiple victims.

The same fact may justify making numerous terms consecutive to each other. People v Coulter (1989) 209 CA3d 506, 516, 257 CR 391. That same fact may also justify making terms consecutive and choosing full consecutive sentences under Pen C §667.6(c). The sentencing court is required to give separate statements of reasons for the two sentencing choices. People v Huber (1986) 181 CA3d 601, 628, 227 CR 113.

Beyond these rules, the issue becomes whether the same fact is really being used twice. Numerous disputes arise in connection with the serious-felony and prison-prior enhancements under Pen C §§667(a) and 667.5(b):

Enhancing under both former Pen C §§667(a) and 667.5(b) for the identical prior conviction was prohibited in People v Jones (1993) 5 C4th 1142, 22 CR2d 753. Both enhancements may be imposed, however, if the prior judgment contains more than one felony conviction leading to a prison sentence. People v Perez (1992) 4 CA4th 893, 6 CR2d 141; People v Medina (1988) 206 CA3d 986, 254 CR 89.

A prior was used to support a Pen C §667.5(a) enhancement, and the defendant's parole status stemming from that term was used as an aggravating factor, in People v Coleman (1991) 53 C3d 949, 281 CR 146.

Courts disagree on whether the prior convictions that support a Pen C §667 enhancement can be used to support a factor in aggravation based on a prior bad record. Cal Rules of Ct 4.421(b). Compare People v Hurley (1983) 144 CA3d 706, 709, 192 CR 805 (yes), and People v Raby (1986) 179 CA3d 577, 582, 224 CR 576 (yes; status as parolee is factor distinct from prior conviction), with People v Fernandez (1990) 226 CA3d 669, 681, 276 CR 631 (no), and People v Barker (1986) 182 CA3d 921, 940, 227 CR 578 (no).

May a fact used as an element be used to aggravate when that fact is more extreme than usual? Is great violence a factor beyond the elements of assault with a deadly weapon? Compare People v Oberreuter (1988) 204 CA3d 884, 887, 251 CR 522 (yes), with People v Fernandez (1990) 226 CA3d 669, 680, 276 CR 631 (no; when age range is an element, vulnerability is not proper aggravating factor). A defendant who was convicted of gross vehicular manslaughter while intoxicated and whose conduct exceeded gross negligence and approached implied malice properly receives the aggravated term. People v Castorena (1996) 51 CA4th 558, 59 CR2d 782. See generally People v Quinones (1988) 202 CA3d 1154, 1159, 249 CR 435, and People v Miranda (1987) 196 CA3d 1000, 1003, 242 CR 267, discussing how certain attributes of a particular element may be used in other ways.

The choice of term for a three-term enhancement need not be limited to the facts applicable to that particular enhancement; subject to the dual use rules discussed above, the defendant's background and probation/parole status may also be considered. People v Hall (1994) 8 C4th 950, 35 CR2d 432. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.428.

Dual use error can be forfeited. In People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 353, 36 CR2d 627, the court held that the failure of trial counsel to object to dual use issues will forfeit the issue on appeal. On the impact of Scott generally, see §37.51. Moreover, even a properly preserved dual use error may be found harmless because any one factor is frequently sufficient to sustain the trial court's decision. Thus, whenever the court relies on more than one aggravating factor, dual use error may be harmless if it is not reasonably probable a more favorable sentence would have been imposed absent the error. See People v Coleman (1989) 48 C3d 112, 166, 255 CR 813.

§37.44 2. Penal Code §654: Limit on Acts or Omissions Made Punishable by Different Provisions

Penal Code §654 states, "[a]n act or omission that is punishable in different ways by different provisions of law shall be punished under the provision that provides for the longest potential term of imprisonment, but in no case shall the act or omission be punished under more than one provision." Case law has expanded the meaning of the section to apply not only when there was only one act, but also when there was a course of conduct that violates more than one statute but nevertheless constitutes an indivisible transaction. Whether a course of conduct is indivisible depends on the actor's intent and objective. If all the offenses were incident to one objective, the defendant may be punished for any one of such offenses but not for more than one. People v Latimer (1993) 5 C4th 1203, 1211, 23 CR2d 144. See, e.g., People v Tarris (2009) 180 CA4th 612, 628, 103 CR3d 278 (fines imposed on two counts constituting single course of action were penal in nature, regardless of whether payment was condition of probation, and therefore should have been stayed on one count); People v Sanchez (2009) 179 CA4th 1297, 101 CR3d 639 (imposition of separate and unstayed sentences violated §654 when defendant had to have same intent and objective in committing the offense of gang participation and the underlying robberies used to satisfy the element of gang participation); People v Kenefick (2009) 170 CA4th 114, 124, 87 CR3d 773 (sentence on forgeries stayed as "part and parcel" of theft and securities fraud); People v Lopez (2004) 119 CA4th 132, 137, 13 CR3d 921 (when defendant convicted on possession of firearm and possession of ammunition (which was loaded in firearm), sentence for possession of ammunition stayed under §654); People v Bradley (2003) 111 CA4th 765, 770, 4 CR3d 166 (defendant convicted of robbery, under straight aiding and abetting theory, and of attempted murder, under natural and probable consequences doctrine could not be punished for both offenses in absence of evidence that she intended to aid and abet murder attempt).

Note that multiple punishment is barred, but multiple convictions may be allowed under Pen C §954, unless one of the offenses is a necessarily included lesser offense of the other. See People v Ortega (1998) 19 C4th 686, 692, 80 CR2d 489. An analysis entirely separate from application of §654 determines whether certain conduct may give rise to several counts or just one. See, e.g., People v Hertzig (2007) 156 CA4th 398, 403, 67 CR3d 312 (regardless of how many images there were on defendant's computer, he committed just one offense of possession of child pornography). By contrast, under §654, a defendant may be convicted of any number of crimes on the basis of the same act or course of conduct, but all but one of the sentences must be stayed. When Pen C §954 allows multiple convictions, but Pen C §654 prohibits multiple punishment, the court must stay execution of sentence on the convictions for which multiple punishment is prohibited. People v Sloan (2007) 42 C4th 110, 116, 64 CR3d 137. This may be of great significance if the crimes of conviction are serious felonies, because a qualifying conviction is a strike, even if punishment was stayed under Pen C §654. People v Benson (1998) 18 C4th 24, 74 CR2d 294. But see People v Burgos (2004) 117 CA4th 1209, 12 CR3d 566 (trial court abused its discretion when it failed to strike one of two strike priors that arose from same act). For further discussion of prior strikes, see §37.33A; on the Three Strikes law generally, see §§37.33-37.33E.

In many cases, such as the (a) and (b) counts of a DUI (see Veh C §§23152(a)-(b), 23153(a)-(b)), application of the §654 bar is straightforward. People v Subramani (1985) 173 CA3d 1106, 1111, 219 CR 644. But some applications are less obvious. The following cases are illustrative:

- A defendant may be convicted of both driving a stolen vehicle under Veh C §10851 and receiving the vehicle as stolen, but may not be punished for both. People v Garza (2005) 35 C4th 866, 28 CR3d 335; People v Jaramillo (1976) 16 C3d 752, 760 n9, 129 CR 306.
- A defendant may be convicted of both burglary (Pen C §459) and concealing the property stolen in the burglary, but may not be punished for both crimes. People v Allen (1999) 21 C4th 846, 89 CR2d 279.
- A defendant cannot be punished for both aggravated sexual assault on a child and forcible lewd conduct based on the same act. People v Alvarez (2009) 178 CA4th 999, 1007, 101 CR3d 169.
- A defendant may be convicted of both robbery and burglary arising from one course of conduct with a single purpose, but punishment for both crimes violates §654. People v Le (2006) 136 CA4th 925, 930, 39 CR3d 146.
- A defendant convicted of two counts of kidnapping, one with intent to commit carjacking and one with intent to commit robbery, was not subject to punishment for both offenses. People v Perez (2000) 84 CA4th 856, 101 CR2d 376.

- When the purpose of a robbery was to obtain cocaine for sale, the court could sentence on only one of the crimes. People v Austin (1994) 23 CA4th 1596, 28 CR2d 885, disapproved on another ground in People v Palmer (2001) 24 C4th 856, 861, 103 CR2d 13.
- A defendant could not be punished separately for substantive crime and conspiracy when object of conspiracy was commission of substantive crime. People v Ramirez (1987) 189 CA3d 603, 616, 236 CR 404.

Exceptions to application of Pen C §654. There are two basic kinds of exceptions to the §654 bar. The first are categorical exclusions set out by case law, usually for policy reasons. The second are factual distinctions that show that two closely related crimes were done for separate reasons.

a. General Legal Exceptions

§37.45 (1) Acts of Violence With Separate Victims

Multiple acts of violence committed against separate victims may be punished separately, even when they are done with the same intent and during the same transaction. People v Perez (1979) 23 C3d 545, 553, 153 CR 40; People v Robinson (1988) 198 CA3d 674, 681, 244 CR 17. Thus, a bank robber who robs multiple tellers may be sentenced for each robbery. See People v James (1977) 19 C3d 99, 119, 137 CR 447. If a gun was used, each count may be enhanced. See §37.49. For purposes of the §654 ban on multiple punishment, Pen C §422 (criminal threats) is a violent crime, and criminal threats against multiple victims are exempt from §654. People v Solis (2001) 90 CA4th 1002, 109 CR2d 464. Similarly, felony resisting arrest under Pen C §69 is a crime of violence to which the §654 bar does not apply. People v Martin (2005) 133 CA4th 776, 35 CR3d 105.

However, brandishing a firearm in the presence of multiple police officers (Pen C §417(c)) is subject to the limitation of §654. People v Hall (2000) 83 CA4th 1084, 100 CR2d 279.

§37.46 (2) Multiple Sex Acts

Multiple penetrations. Multiple forcible sexual penetrations are exempt from Pen C §654. Each successive penetration justifies a separate sentence. People v Harrison (1989) 48 C3d 321, 329, 256 CR 401.

Multiple sex acts under Pen C §288(a). Multiple sex acts under Pen C §288(a) are exempt from §654. People v Kirk (1990) 217 CA3d 1488, 1496, 267 CR 126. Some older opinions attempted to distinguish between "defined" sex acts, such as rape, and "undefined" acts, such as various forms of touching under §288. This distinction appears to have ended with People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 36 CR2d 627.

Penal Code §667.6. The court's discretion under Pen C §667.6(c) to impose full-term consecutive sentences for sex crimes is categorically exempt from §654. People v Hicks (1993) 6 C4th 784, 25 CR2d 469. In Hicks, the California Supreme Court held that a defendant may be consecutively punished for a burglary (done with sexual intent) and for the subsequent sex crime. In contrast, indecent exposure in front of multiple victims is subject to the §654 bar. People v Davey (2005) 133 CA4th 384, 390, 34 CR3d 811.

§37.47 (3) Certain Vehicle Code Violations

Vehicular manslaughter and DUI with injury. Vehicular manslaughter (Pen C §192) and driving under the influence with injury (Veh C §23153) are separate acts of violence, when separate victims are killed and injured, and so may be punished separately. People v McFarland (1989) 47 C3d 798, 803, 254 CR 331. When gross vehicular manslaughter while intoxicated is alleged, both gross vehicular manslaughter and DUI with injury are included offenses and may not be separate convictions. People v Miranda (1994) 21 CA4th 1464, 26 CR2d 610.

Drunk driving with injury. On the basis of legislative intent, not Pen C §654, only one Veh C §23153 violation may be charged per incident of drunk driving with injury. Wilkoff v Superior Court (1985) 38 C3d 345, 211 CR 742. However, a 1-year enhancement under Veh C §23558 may be added for each additional victim, not to exceed a total of three enhancements. Veh C §23558. Alternatively, if the facts warrant it, a Pen C §12022.7 enhancement may be imposed for each victim who suffered great bodily injury in the accident. See People v Guzman (2000) 77 CA4th 761, 91 CR2d 885 (multiple enhancements for multiple victims); People v Arndt (1999) 76 CA4th 387, 90 CR2d 415 (§12022.7 enhancement is instead of, not in addition to, enhancement under former Veh C §23182 (now Veh C §23558)); People v Sainz (1999) 74 CA4th 565, 88 CR2d 203. On Veh C §23153 convictions as strike offenses, see §37.31D.

§37.48 b. Factual Distinctions

Even when a course of criminal conduct is continuous, Pen C §654 does not preclude multiple punishment for offenses that have independent intents or objectives. People v Latimer (1993) 5 C4th 1203, 23 CR2d 144. The following cases are illustrative:

- People v Coleman (1989) 48 C3d 112, 162, 255 CR 813 (separate punishment for assault and robbery proper when victim stabbed after robbery to prevent sounding of alarm);
- People v Hairston (2009) 174 CA4th 231, 238, 94 CR3d 159 (concurrent sentences permissible for multiple counts of Pen C §148 when defendant had separate objective for each violation);
- In re Noelle M. (2008) 169 CA4th 193, 197, 86 CR3d 663 (separate sales of methadone pills by minor during one high school football game constituted independent criminal objectives and could be punished separately);
- People v Garcia (2008) 167 CA4th 1550, 1566, 85 CR3d 155 (concurrent sentence for felon-in-possession could be imposed when defendant's intent in possessing weapon was different at time of arrest from that harbored at time of robbery in which gun was used);
- People v Moseley (2008) 164 CA4th 1598, 1604, 80 CR3d 551 (court not required to stay sentence for either offense when maintaining a place for selling drugs is independent of objective of possessing methamphetamine for sale);
- People v Jones (2002) 103 CA4th 1139, 127 CR2d 319 (shooting at dwelling by ex-felon who arrived at crime scene in possession of gun permitted punishment for both crimes); see also People v Ratcliff (1990) 223 CA3d 1401, 1410, 273 CR 253;
- People v Green (1996) 50 CA4th 1076, 58 CR2d 259 (independent objectives in course of conduct that included robbing, kidnapping, and raping victim and then taking her car by force justified punishment for each charged crime);
- People v Dobson (1988) 205 CA3d 496, 500, 252 CR 423, disapproved on other grounds in People v Jones (2001) 25 C4th 98, 110, 104 CR2d 753 (separate punishment for attempted murder and rape proper when attempt to kill rape victim motivated by intent to avoid identification);
- People v Nguyen (1988) 204 CA3d 181, 190, 251 CR 40 (separate punishment for robbery and attempted murder proper when victim was shot for no apparent reason);
- People v Booth (1988) 201 CA3d 1499, 1502, 248 CR 64 (punishment for both rape and burglary proper when burglary was committed with intent to rob and intent to rape arose after entry);
- People v Goodall (1982) 131 CA3d 129, 147, 182 CR 243 (separate punishment proper for defendant convicted of possession of PCP precursors, manufacture of PCP, and possession of PCP for sale).
- People v Ratcliffe (1981) 124 CA3d 808, 177 CR 627 (separate punishment for kidnapping and rape proper when defendant, who knew victim, kidnapped her to harass her, and later raped her for independent reasons).

§37.49 c. Applicability to Enhancements

There is no dispute that when the base term of an offense is stayed under Pen C §654, the attendant enhancements must also be stayed. People v Guilford (1984) 151 CA3d 406, 411, 198 CR 700. There is, however, a split on whether §654 applies when more than one enhancement may be imposed for conduct arising out of the same set of facts. Some courts have found that enhancements "do not define a crime" and thus lie outside the ambit of Pen C §654. See, e.g., People v Warinner (1988) 200 CA3d 1352, 1355, 247 CR 197. Other courts reason that the enhancement is an "act" for which Pen C §654 proscribes multiple punishment. See, e.g., People v Vaughn (1989) 209 CA3d 398, 400, 257 CR 229; People v Moringlane (1982) 127 CA3d 811, 179 CR 726.

The California Supreme Court has shed imperfect light on this subject. In People v Coronado (1995) 12 C4th 145, 156, 48 CR2d 77, the court recognized but did not resolve this split. In People v Palacios (2007) 41 C4th 720, 726, 62 CR3d 145, the court held that §654 did not preclude imposition of all three gun enhancements under Pen C §12022.53(d) for one shot fired at a single victim, but did not reach the question whether Pen C §654 applied to enhancements in general. In People v Gonzalez (2008) 43 C4th 1118, 1123 n5, 77 CR3d 569, the court noted that the trial court correctly imposed and stayed Pen C §§12022.53 and 12022.5 enhancements but had incorrectly done so under Pen C §654 which "applies only to offenses punishable in different ways, not to prohibited enhancements." In People v Arndt (1999) 76 CA4th 387, 394, 90 CR2d 415, the court of appeal pointed out that the supreme court's analysis of the question in Coronado "suggests the applicability of section 654 depends on the nature of the enhancement at issue." 76 CA4th at 395. The court in Arndt construed the supreme court's analysis as indicating that enhancements going to the offense, such as weapons use or great bodily injury, are subject to Pen C §654, but enhancements going to the offender, such as recidivism statutes, are not. 76 CA4th at 395. See also People v Jones (2009) 178 CA4th 853, 864, 100 CR3d 780 (following Coronado, court did not violate Pen C §654 by adding two different 5-year enhancements based on defendant's status as repeat offender). In People v Rodriguez (2009) 47 C4th 501, 507, 98 CR3d 108, the supreme court confirmed that in Coronado it had identified two types of sentence enhancements and had concluded that Pen C §654 does not apply to those going to the nature of the offender. While the court agreed with the court of appeal that additional punishment for defendant's firearm use could not be imposed under both Pen C §§12022.5 and 186.22(b)(1)(C), it did not adopt the court of appeal's rationale that Pen C §654 precluded the application of multiple enhancements based on the nature of the offense. The court explicitly did not address the issue, finding instead that Pen C §1170.1(f) precluded the application of both enhancements.

Examples of enhancements going to the offense are Pen C §§186.11(a)(3) and 12022.6(a), both of which impose an additional prison sentence for excessive taking. When a defendant is subject to both these enhancements, the court must stay execution of the term imposed under §12022.6. People v Lai (2006) 138 CA4th 1227, 1237, 42 CR3d 444. Penal Code §654 bars sentencing on a GBI enhancement attached to a burglary when the defendant was sentenced on the same enhancement against the same victim for an assault based on the same conduct. People v Reeves (2001) 91 CA4th 14, 56, 109 CR2d 728.

Enhancements exempt from Pen C §654 on factual grounds. Penal Code §654 does not bar sentencing on more than one enhancement in the following situations:

- When a prior judgment consists of more than one felony conviction, both Pen C §667(a) (former Pen C §667) (5-year prior serious felony enhancement) and Pen C §667.5(b) (1-year prior prison term enhancement) may be imposed. People v Perez (1992) 4 CA4th 893, 909, 6 CR2d 141; People v Medina (1988) 206 CA3d 986, 254 CR 89. When the serious felony and prison prior involve the same conviction, only the greater enhancement may be imposed. People v Jones (1993) 5 C4th 1142, 1149, 22 CR2d 753.
- When both §667(a) (former §667) (5-year serious felony enhancement) and Pen C §12022.1 (enhancement for commission of felony while on bail or own recognizance) are charged, both may be imposed because the latter is based on additional facts beyond mere commission of a felony. People v Juarez (1993) 21 CA4th 318, 26 CR2d 697; People v Melchor (1989) 211 CA3d 1485, 1489, 260 CR 174 (appellant also had several prior felonies).

- When a prior conviction is used to elevate petty theft to a felony, it may also be used for enhancement under §667.5(b). People v Darwin (1993) 12 CA4th 1101, 15 CR2d 894; People v Rodriguez (1988) 206 CA3d 517, 253 CR 633; People v Levell (1988) 201 CA3d 749, 247 CR 489.
- When a prior felony conviction is used to establish the ex-felon element of possession of a firearm, it may also be used to enhance a defendant's sentence under §667.5(b). People v Baird (1995) 12 C4th 126, 48 CR2d 65.
- When a felony DUI prior is used to elevate the present DUI to a felony, it may also be used to enhance the sentence as a prior prison term under §667.5(b). People v Coronado (1995) 12 C4th 145, 48 CR2d 77.
- When a prior Veh C §10851 conviction is used to increase the base term for the present offense (Veh C §10851(e)/Pen C §666.5), it may also be used to enhance the sentence under §667.5(b). People v Demara (1995) 41 CA4th 448, 48 CR2d 682.

Ø Note: The California Supreme Court has suggested that the Pen C §666 enhancement does not lie if it is based on Veh C §10851 when the §10851 prior is based on driving, not taking, the vehicle. People v Garza (2005) 35 C4th 866, 882, 28 CR3d 335.

- When a prior sex offense is alleged as a strike prior, it may be used both to require registration under Pen C §290 and to enhance the sentence. People v Garcia (2001) 25 C4th 744, 107 CR2d 355.
- When there are multiple victims, multiple gun use enhancements may be imposed for a single episode. People v King (1993) 5 C4th 59, 19 CR2d 233.
- When a shot is fired at an intended victim but the shot misses and inadvertently injures another victim, thereby committing another assault, both assaults are subject to a separate firearm use enhancement. In re Tameka C. (2000) 22 C4th 190, 91 CR2d 730.

Enhancements exempt from Pen C §654 because of statutory language. The legislature has specifically exempted the following enhancements from Pen C §654's prohibition on multiple punishment:

- Health and Safety Code §11370.2 (3-year enhancement for prior drug conviction) applies in addition to any enhancement under Pen C §667.5. People v Powell (1991) 230 CA3d 438, 281 CR 568.
- On imposition of sentence for in-prison offenses, prior prison term enhancements under §667.5, which had been added to the term being served, may be added again to the new sentence. People v White (1988) 202 CA3d 862, 249 CR 165. See §37.28.
- An enhancement for Pen C §12022.5 (use of a firearm) may be added to any violation of Pen C §245 (assault with a deadly weapon) if a firearm is used, or to murder, if the killing is by means of shooting a firearm from a motor vehicle, intentionally at a person outside the motor vehicle, with the intent to inflict GBI or death. Pen C §12022.5(d).

§37.50 d. Sentencing Procedures When Pen C §654 Applies

General rules. The sentencing court must consider the Pen C §654 issue before determining whether to impose concurrent or consecutive sentences. Cal Rules of Ct 4.424. The issue is a question of fact, but for the court, not the jury. People v Porter (1987) 194 CA3d 34, 38, 239 CR 269. When the trial court is uncertain of the facts, as after a guilty plea, it may hold a §654 hearing. People v Ross (1988) 201 CA3d 1232, 1238, 247 CR 827. Agreement by the defendant to the term abandons all §654 claims. Cal Rules of Ct 4.412(b). See People v Jones (1981) 124 CA3d 749, 754, 177 CR 605. A defendant may waive §654 in a plea agreement, and the waiver need not be express. People v Hester (2000) 22 C4th 290, 92 CR2d 641.

The sentence for all counts must be imposed, then §654-barred counts must be stayed. People v Alford (2010) 180 CA4th 1463, 1466, 103 CR3d 898. On service of the unstayed term, the stay becomes permanent. See People v Beamon (1973) 8 C3d 625, 640, 105 CR 681. A concurrent term is not proper. People v Pearson (1986) 42 C3d 351, 358, 228 CR 509. The barred terms should not be stricken (People v Barker (1986) 182 CA3d 921, 942, 227 CR 578), nor should imposition of the term be suspended (People v Eberhardt (1986) 186 CA3d 1112, 1124, 231 CR 387). The stayed terms are imposed as full terms; they are not subordinate terms, so the one-third rule does not apply. The imposed and stayed term thus is available if the other terms fail on appeal. All specific (conduct) enhancements relating to a stayed term must be stayed. People v Smith (1985) 163 CA3d 908, 911, 210 CR 43. Specific (conduct) enhancements follow their substantive crime.

Generally, a term stayed under §654 may not be used as the basis for a later enhancement. People v Pearson, supra. However, this rule does not apply to subsequent use of stayed counts as priors under the Three Strikes law; stayed counts may be used as prior strikes. People v Benson (1998) 18 C4th 24, 74 CR2d 294. But see People v Burgos (2004) 117 CA4th 1209, 12 CR3d 566 (trial court abused its discretion when it failed to strike one of two strike priors that arose from same act). For discussion, see §37.33A. In addition, transactionally related facts of counts stayed under §654 may be used as factors in aggravation. People v Young (1983) 146 CA3d 729, 194 CR 338.

Court must impose the longest term. Effective January 1, 1998, §654 provides that "[a]n act or omission that is punishable in different ways by different provisions of law shall be punished under the provision that provides for the longest potential term of imprisonment." In simple terms, this means the sentencing court may no longer impose sentence on the lesser of two or more related crimes under §654.

> Ø Example: In People v Bradley (2003) 111 CA4th 765, 770, 4 CR3d 166, the defendant was convicted as an aider and abettor of both robbery and attempted murder. Although she had intended to aid and abet the robbery, and had not intended the attempted murder to occur, §654 required that the punishment for attempted murder, the crime she did not intend, be imposed, while the punishment for robbery, the crime she did intend, was stayed.

Enhancements are included to determine longest term. To determine which term is longest, the court must take into account applicable count-specific enhancements. People v Kramer (2002) 29 C4th 720, 128 CR2d 407. In Kramer, the defendant was convicted of Pen C §§246 (7-year maximum) and 245(a) (4-year maximum, but with 4-year gun enhancement). The defendant argued that the §246 conviction was longer and that the §245(a) count with the gun enhancement should be stayed. The court ruled that the enhancement(s) must be included in the calculation and ordered that the §245(a) sentence, enhanced for the gun use, be imposed. But since subordinate terms run at 1/3 strength, the court may select any term as the principal one so long as it actually exceeds the subordinate terms in length. See §37.16. See also People v Miller (2006) 145 CA4th 206, 51 CR3d 421.

Multiple convictions not prohibited by Pen C §654. Normally, multiple convictions are legal. Exceptions to this rule include the following:

- Theft and receiving stolen property. A defendant cannot be convicted of separate crimes for the theft of property and receiving the property. People v Jaramillo (1976) 16 C3d 752, 757, 129 CR 306. See also People v Magallanes (2009) 173 CA4th 529, 535, 92 CR3d 751 (carjacking of van and receipt of same van); People v Strong (1994) 30 CA4th 366, 35 CR2d 494 (defendant may be convicted of receiving even though defendant was thief, as long as he or she is not also convicted of the theft itself). However, a defendant may be convicted of burglary and receiving the property stolen in that burglary. People v Allen (1999) 21 C4th 846, 89 CR2d 279.

Ø Note: When a defendant is convicted of both theft and receiving, appellate courts are split about whether the court should dismiss the theft or the receiving. Compare People v Recio (2007) 156 CA4th 719, 67 CR3d 600 (dismiss receiving), with People v Ceja (review granted Jan. 16, 2008, S157932; superseded opinion at 155 CA4th 1246, 66 CR3d 697) (dismiss theft).

- Penal Code §32. Conviction as a principal and as an accessory after the fact is improper when both convictions are based on the same predicate facts. People v Prado (1977) 67 CA3d 267, 136 CR 521. See also People v Mouton (1993) 15 CA4th 1313, 19 CR2d 423. But see People v Riley (1993) 20 CA4th 1808, 1813, 25 CR2d 676.
- Lesser included offenses. Conviction of both an offense and a lesser included offense is improper. Pen C §954; People v Ortega (1998) 19 C4th 686, 692, 80 CR2d 489. The test of a lesser included offense is "simply that where an offense cannot be committed without necessarily committing another offense, the latter is a necessarily included offense." People v Pearson (1986) 42 C3d 351, 355, 228 CR 509. See, e.g., People v Ramirez (2009) 45 C4th 980, 89 CR3d 586 (grossly negligent discharge of firearm is necessarily included offense of discharge at inhabited building). To determine whether an offense is lesser included, the court should look to the language of the statute, not to the language of the charging document. People v Miranda (1994) 21 CA4th 1464, 26 CR2d 610. But see People v Rush (1993) 16 CA4th 20, 20 CR2d 15, disapproved on other grounds in People v Montoya (2004) 33 C4th 1031, 1036 n4, 16 CR3d 902 (ruling based on pleading).

Appellate review of Pen C §654 issue. Failure to object does not forfeit the issue on appeal, because Pen C §654 error results in an unauthorized sentence. People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 354 n17, 36 CR2d 627; People v Perez (1979) 23 C3d 545, 549 n3, 153 CR 40. On a silent record, however, a reviewing court will presume that the trial court considered and rejected use of §654. Thus, lack of a §654 stay will be upheld if any substantial evidence supports a finding of separate intents or separate transactions. People v Coleman (1989) 48 C3d 112, 162, 255 CR 813; People v Green (1988) 200 CA3d 538, 544, 246 CR 164.

California Rules of Court 4.412(b), upheld in People v Hester (2000) 22 C4th 290, 92 CR2d 641, provides that a defendant, who with counsel personally agrees to a specific prison term, abandons any claim that the sentence violates §654 unless the defendant objects at the time of sentencing. A defendant who negotiates a plea agreement with a sentencing "lid" may not raise a §654 challenge on appeal unless he or she reserves that right as part of the plea bargain or first obtains a certificate of probable cause under Pen C §1237.5. People v Cuevas (2008) 44 C4th 374, 384, 79 CR3d 303; People v Shelton (2006) 37 C4th 759, 771, 37 CR3d 354.

§37.51 H. Sentencing Hearing, Sentencing Choices, and Statement of Reasons

Sentencing hearing procedure. At the sentencing hearing, the defense and the prosecution have the right to present evidence on their own behalf and to rebut statements in the probation officer's report. Pen C §1204; People v Valdivia (1960) 182 CA2d 145, 5 CR 832. The rules of evidence do not strictly apply to sentencing hearings; the judge has wide discretion in the sources and types of evidence he or she uses to determine the kind and extent of punishment to be imposed within limits fixed by law. Williams v New York (1949) 337 US 241, 246, 93 L Ed 1337, 69 S Ct 1079. The defendant has no right to court-appointed experts for sentencing. People v Stuckey (2009) 175 CA4th 898, 96 CR3d 477. The parties are entitled to a hearing that affords due process, however, and to a sentencing decision based on accurate information. People v Peterson (1973) 9 C3d 717, 726, 108 CR 835. See People v Eckley (2004) 123 CA4th 1072, 20 CR3d 555 (court's reliance on inaccurate information provided by probation department and correctional authorities denied defendant due process and required remand for new probation and sentencing hearing).

Ø Practice tip: Prison authorities rely heavily on the probation report to determine where inmates should be housed and whether special conditions and restrictions should apply. See Pen C §1203(c); Cal Rules of Ct 4.411(d). The trial court may order the report to be corrected. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(e). But if the court refuses to correct the probation report, it is important for trial counsel to object to inaccuracies in the probation report. The issue was preserved for appeal in People v Eckley, supra, because counsel filed a statement in mitigation, which included objections to the errors.

A defendant who is to be sentenced on a felony may waive his or her appearance for pronouncement of judgment with the court's permission. That waiver can be made orally in court or by filing a notarized statement to that effect with the court. Pen C §1193(a). See also §§35.18, 38.28 on sentencing hearing procedure.

Probation. A court may place a defendant convicted of a felony on probation for a period not exceeding the maximum possible term for his or her sentence, or for 5 years, whichever is greater. Pen C §1203.1. In granting probation, the court can order the defendant to serve time in jail or prison as a condition of probation, suspend the imposition of sentence by refraining from stating a sentence, or impose a sentence but suspend its execution. Pen C §1203.1. For discussion of suspending execution or imposition of sentence, see §§36.5, 46.29-46.30. On the difference between suspended imposition and suspended execution of sentence for immigration purposes, see §52.10. When imposition of sentence is suspended and sentence is therefore not pronounced after conviction by trial, the trial judge still must identify and state on the record circumstances that would justify imposing one of the three authorized terms if probation is later revoked. Cal Rules of Ct 4.433(b). A nonexclusive list of reasons for granting or denying probation is in Cal Rules of Ct 4.414. On mandatory and discretionary probation bars, see §§37.52-37.53.

When the initial sentencing court imposes a state prison sentence but stays execution of the sentence pending completion of probation, on a subsequent violation of probation the court does not have discretion to change the sentence previously imposed (People v Howard (1997) 16 C4th 1081, 1088, 68 CR2d 870) unless the sentence was unauthorized. In re Renfrow (2008) 164 CA4th 1251, 1256, 79 CR3d 898. The court may, however, recall this sentence within 120 days of the date of commitment and resentence the defendant under the provisions of Pen C §1170(d). Howard, 16 C4th at 1095. The court also retains discretion to reinstate probation. People v Medina (2001) 89 CA4th 318, 106 CR2d 895.

Statement of reasons. When announcing the sentence, the judge must state on the record the facts and reasons for imposing the upper or lower term, and for any other sentencing choices, including granting probation; imposing a prison sentence; declining to commit an eligible defendant to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) or CRC (California Rehabilitation Center); selecting a base term other than the middle term; imposing consecutive sentences; imposing full consecutive terms under Pen C §667.6(c); striking or staying the punishment for an enhancement; or imposing multiple enhancements under Pen C §1170.1(e) (applicable only to crimes committed before January 1, 1998; see §37.30). Pen C §1170(b)-(c); Cal Rules of Ct 4.406(b).

Sentencing defects are waived unless challenged at sentencing hearing. The requirement of an oral statement of sentencing decisions encourages careful exercise of discretion and decreases risk of error. It also supplies reviewing courts with information needed to assess the merits of sentencing claims, and the prejudicial effect of any error. Defects in the sentencing court's statement of reasons are waived unless challenged at the time of sentencing. People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 36 CR2d 627. The Scott court took pains to point out that a defense attorney who does not properly understand and argue at sentencing is subject to a finding of ineffectiveness. 9 C4th at 351. Under Scott, the court must afford counsel a meaningful opportunity to object to the sentence, which means that, at some time during the sentencing hearing, the trial court must describe the sentence it intends to impose, give its reasons, and consider the parties' objections before pronouncing judgment. Due process does not require the court to give the parties advance notice of its intended sentence, nor is the court required to describe the proposed sentence as "tentative," as long as it demonstrates a willingness to consider objections. People v Gonzalez (2003) 31 C4th 745, 752, 3 CR3d 676.

Ø Note: In Gonzalez, 31 C4th at 754, the supreme court suggested that when the sentence is unexpected or unusually complex, defense counsel should request a continuance to assess whether to make objections, or request permission to submit written objections.

Generally, a fact used as an element of the crime, as an enhancement, or in aggravation may not be used for any other purpose. See Pen C §1170(b); Cal Rules of Ct 4.420(c)-(d). However, the same fact may be used (1) to impose consecutive sentences and (2) to invoke the discretionary full consecutive sentencing scheme of §667.6(c) for forcible sex crimes. See discussion in §37.25.

When the trial court fails to produce a technically correct statement of reasons linking specific reasons to specific sentence choices, the prosecutor may be well advised to bring the requirements to the court's attention.

Ø Note: If the parties have stipulated to a particular sentence, the judge need not state reasons for that sentence, and the defendant is deemed to have waived Pen C §654 limitations. However, the parties cannot stipulate to a sentence not otherwise authorized by law. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.412(a). The court is not required to state reasons for an indeterminate sentence. Cal Rules of Ct 4.403.

When a defendant has been convicted of a felony and is eligible for probation, the sentencing court should normally order the probation officer to investigate the circumstances of the crime and the defendant's history and prepare a probation report. Pen C §1203(b)(1). See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.411(a) (court should permit waiver of probation report only in unusual circumstances), and Cal Rules of Ct 4.411(b) (court should refer matter to probation officer for report even when defendant is ineligible for probation). For further discussion of the probation report, see chap 38.

When probation has been granted and is then revoked, the trial court must generally state a reason for declining to reimpose probation and sentencing the defendant to prison. People v Hawthorne (1991) 226 CA3d 789, 793, 277 CR 85. This rule may not apply when the sentence had previously been imposed, but the execution was suspended. People v Jones (1990) 224 CA3d 1309, 1315, 274 CR 527.

When lifting the suspension of a previously imposed prison sentence, the court has no discretion to alter the term. People v Howard (1997) 16 C4th 1081, 1087, 68 CR2d 870. But when the court that revokes probation also imposes a prison term, the length of the prison sentence is based on circumstances existing at the time probation was granted; events that occurred while the defendant was on probation may not be considered. Cal Rules of Ct 4.435; In re Rodriguez (1975) 14 C3d 639, 652, 122 CR 552.

Johnson* waivers. When a defendant serves a jail term as a condition of probation, and then probation is revoked, if the court wishes to reimpose probation with additional jail time the court may seek a waiver from the defendant of credit for the previous jail time. People v Johnson (1978) 82 CA3d 183, 147 CR 55. See discussion at §37.56.

Resentencing after appeal. Ordinarily, a defendant's sentence cannot be increased on remand after a successful or partially successful appeal. People v Collins (1978) 21 C3d 208, 216, 145 CR 686. This rule applies when a judgment is reversed because of trial error or when a case is remanded because of an erroneous sentence, i.e., the sentence is authorized by statute but the court erred in the manner of sentencing. See People v Brown (1987) 193 CA3d 957, 961, 238 CR 697. The trial court may impose a more severe sentence after appeal if the original sentence was unauthorized by law, i.e., illegal. People v Serrato (1973) 9 C3d 753, 109 CR 65, overruled on other grounds in People v Fosselman (1983) 33 C3d 572, 189 CR 855; People v Craig (1998) 66 CA4th 1444, 78 CR2d 659; People v Brown, supra.

Ø Note: Nothing precludes the court from changing its initial sentencing choices so that the term imposed after resentencing equals the sentence previously imposed. People v Burbine (2003) 106 CA4th 1250, 131 CR2d 628.

§37.52 I. Chart: Persons Ineligible for Probation

Most statutes that bar probation have express pleading requirements. These statutes should be read carefully. As a rule, when a prior conviction results in mandatory denial of probation, the prior conviction must be pleaded and proved. People v Lo Cicero (1969) 71 C2d 1186, 1191, 80 CR 913.

When a no-probation statute is pleaded and proved, counts or allegations that trigger the probation ban may be stricken under Pen C §1385 unless the legislature has specifically eliminated the trial court's §1385 authority. See People v Superior Court (Romero) (1996) 13 C4th 497, 518, 53 CR2d 789; People v Fritz (1985) 40 C3d 227, 229, 219 CR 460. The following phrase in former Pen C §1203.06, "[n]otwithstanding the provisions of section 1203, probation shall not be granted," has been construed as eliminating the trial court's §1385 discretion. People v Tanner (1979) 24 C3d 514, 156 CR 450. See also People v Hesslink (1985) 167 CA3d 781, 793, 213 CR 465 (phrase "notwithstanding any other provision of law" in Pen C §1203.065 eliminates trial court's §1385 discretion).

§37.53 J. Restricted Probation Eligibility

Restricted probation eligibility means that probation may not be granted except in "unusual cases where the interests of justice would best be served." See, e.g., Pen C §§462, 462.5, 1203(e).

It is recommended that facts giving rise to presumptive probation bars be pleaded and proved, even absent an express statutory requirement. Pleading a presumptive ineligibility section may not be mandatory, however. See People v Dorsch (1992) 3 CA4th 1346, 5 CR2d 327. Probation is restricted for specified offenses delineated by Pen C §§115(c), 290(g)(4), 454(c), 462(a), 462.5(a), 1203(e), 1203.045(a), 1203.046(a), 1203.048(a), 1203.049(a), 1203.065(b), 1203.073(b)(1)-(8), 1203.074(a), 1203.09(f), 4532(c)(1).

VII. CREDIT FOR TIME SERVED

§37.54 A. In General

California permits defendants to receive credit against their county jail or state prison sentences for time spent in presentence custody (Pen C §4019), and for performance in work or educational programs during confinement in state prison (Pen C §2933). Certain crimes, including violent crimes and murder, are subject to special restrictions that apply to both presentence and postsentence credits. See §37.61. A defendant convicted under the Three Strikes law is subject to restrictions on postsentence credits. See §37.33C. A defendant who, as a term of probation, is sentenced to local jail time but serves that time in a work release program, is not entitled to work and conduct credits under §4019. People v Wills (1994) 22 CA4th 1810, 27 CR2d 925.

B. Credit for Time Spent in Presentence Custody

1. Actual Time

§37.55 a. When Available

A defendant convicted of a felony is entitled to credit against a state prison term, or against any fine imposed, for actual time spent in custody before commencement of the prison sentence. "In custody" includes, "but [is] not limited to, any time spent in a jail, camp, work furlough facility, halfway house, rehabilitation facility, hospital, prison, juvenile detention facility, or similar residential institution" (Pen C §2900.5(a)), including the California Rehabilitation Center (CRC), or a California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) facility while undergoing a diagnostic study. Pen C §1203.03(g). Presentence credit is not authorized for time spent in home detention with electronic monitoring. People v Anaya (2007) 158 CA4th 608, 612, 70 CR3d 47. Included in the statutory credit allowance are days spent in custody as a condition of probation. Pen C §2900.5(a). Defendants are entitled to time spent in an inpatient rehabilitation even when this is a condition of a Proposition 36 drug diversion. People v Davenport (2007) 148 CA4th 240, 55 CR3d 473. Outpatient drug rehabilitation programs are not residential programs and therefore do not qualify for custody credits. People v Schnaible (1985) 165 CA3d 275, 277, 211 CR 530. Time spent in unlocked outpatient facilities does not count as actual custody time for mentally disordered sex offenders, defendants found not guilty by reason of insanity, and mentally disordered offenders. Pen C §§1600.5, 2972.

Ø Note: For the purposes of calculating presentence credits, "custody" time is defined by the language of the statute, not by the traditional definition of "custody" under Miranda v Arizona (1966) 384 US 436, 16 L Ed 2d 694, 86 S Ct 1602. A defendant is not "in custody" within the meaning of Pen C §2900.5 until he or she is processed into a jail or similar custodial situation as described in Pen C §2900.5(a); time spent arrested or detained by police before booking is not included. People v Ravaux (2006) 142 CA4th 914, 920, 49 CR3d 211. See Anaya, 158 CA4th at 613 n4 (lynchpin of custody credits is "custody").

Defendants are entitled to custody credits for time spent in mandatory work release programs established under Pen C §4024.3. Pen C §4024.3(a). They are not, however, entitled to custody credits for time spent in voluntary work release programs established under Pen C §4024.2. People v Richter (2005) 128 CA4th 575, 27 CR3d 198.

A defendant gets a full day's credit for each partial day served, including the day of arrest, the day of commitment to state prison (People v Smith (1989) 211 CA3d 523, 526, 259 CR 515), and any partial days served as work furlough days on probation-condition jail sentences. People v Browning (1991) 233 CA3d 1410, 1412, 285 CR 216.

§37.56 b. Johnson Waivers

When a defendant serves a jail term as a condition of probation, and probation is then revoked, if the court wishes to restore probation with additional jail time, the court may ask the defendant to waive credit for the previous jail time. People v Johnson (1978) 82 CA3d 183, 147 CR 55. The court may ask the defendant to waive custody credits for one of the following reasons:

(1) To give sentencing courts the flexibility to reinstate probation while having the defendant serve up to 1 year in jail. Pen C §19.2 (1-year limit on jail time that can be served as condition of probation). If the total of the jail time already served by defendant and the jail time the court seeks to impose on reimposition of probation exceeds 1 year, a waiver of this limit is required.

(2) To allow the court to keep prison as a viable option, because the presentence credits are waived not only for the jail sentence but also as credits against a future prison sentence should probation ultimately be terminated. People v Arnold (2004) 33 C4th 294, 14 CR3d 840.

Similarly, a waiver of future custody credits to be earned in a residential drug or alcohol treatment facility applies if the defendant is ultimately sent to prison. People v Jeffrey (2004) 33 C4th 312, 14 CR3d 852. The better practice is for the sentencing court to inform the defendant that he or she will be waiving not only present but also future presentence credits; however, an express waiver of future credits is not required. Arnold, 33 C4th at 309. The concurring opinion in Arnold suggests defendants are entitled to limit the scope of the waiver. 33 C4th at 311.

> Ø Practice tip: As Arnold makes clear, a defendant can make numerous Johnson waivers in a single case and thus exceed the maximum prison sentence. This knowledge should be factored into any discussion about whether to tender such a waiver.

A Johnson waiver must be on the record and knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily made. See People v Correll (1991) 229 CA3d 656, 660, 280 CR 266. The defendant must be personally advised and must personally waive credit; the defendant's attorney may not waive it on the defendant's behalf. People v Harris (1991) 227 CA3d 1223, 1227, 278 CR 391.

A defendant may validly waive credits for time he or she has not yet served in local custody as a condition of a grant of probation, even if the net result is to increase the defendant's potential custody time beyond the statutory maximum punishment. People v Johnson (2002) 28 C4th 1050, 123 CR2d 700.

© The Regents of the University of California

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/37 FELONY SENTENCING/§37.57 c. Multiple Reasons for Presentence Custody

§37.57 c. Multiple Reasons for Presentence Custody

Complex issues arise when a defendant is in presentence custody for more than one reason. For example, if a defendant is in presentence custody in Florida on a California arrest hold, while simultaneously in custody on a Florida hold, he or she does not receive presentence credit against an eventual California prison term. In re Joyner (1989) 48 C3d 487, 256 CR 785. The test is whether the defendant can carry the burden of showing that he or she would have been free from custody but for the California hold. Otherwise, the presentence time was not "attributable to the proceedings related to the same conduct for which the defendant has been convicted." Pen C §2900.5(b).

When a defendant is in presentence custody on one California case, is arrested for a second California case, and eventually receives concurrent terms on both cases, he or she does not receive credit for the presentence incarceration against both concurrent terms. When the defendant cannot show that he or she would have been free but for the second case, credit will apply only to the concurrent term for the first case, meaning that the second concurrent term must be served in full. People v Davis (1986) 187 CA3d 1250, 1256, 232 CR 428. See People v Huff (1990) 223 CA3d 1100, 1106, 273 CR 44. Presentence credit is not intended to equalize term differentials caused by the timing of the prosecutions. People v Adrian (1987) 191 CA3d 868, 884, 236 CR 685. But in cases of unreasonable delay in bringing a prosecution, defendants may argue that the delay resulted in the loss of concurrent time and seek an equitable distribution of credits. Crockett v Superior Court (1975) 14 C3d 433, 441, 121 CR 457. On factors that may be used to show prejudice in speedy trial and due process motions, see §19.10.

When a defendant is serving a term for either a misdemeanor or a felony and is arrested for a second offense, presentence custody is not attributable to the second case and the defendant receives no credit against any term imposed for the second case. Adrian, 191 CA3d at 878; People v Esparza (1986) 185 CA3d 458, 468, 229 CR 739.

Questions about credits may arise when the defendant is on probation, serves a jail sentence, and then is arrested for a new offense. In People v Cooksey (2002) 95 CA4th 1407, 116 CR2d 1, the court addressed this situation. Sentence was imposed on the new offense, in which the defendant received presentence credits from the time of his arrest. The first offense was sentenced consecutively as the subordinate term. The defendant was awarded presentence credits for the first case, up until the date his probation was violated, but those credits applied only against the subordinate portion of his sentence. A defendant who is on probation is not entitled to credit against the probation revocation sentence for time spent in jail between the time of arrest on new charges and the summary revocation of the grant of probation, even when the new charges formed the basis for the violation of probation and are ultimately dismissed. People v Pruitt (2008) 161 CA4th 637, 649, 74 CR3d 368.

> Ø Practice tip: Counsel for defendants who will lose presentence credits on one or more of their cases should seek time-served dispositions on these cases.

It may be that anyone in custody on a parole hold loses all presentence credits for crimes not exclusively and entirely the subject of the parole hold. In People v Shabazz (2003) 107 CA4th 1255, 132 CR2d 708, a defendant with parole warrants was arrested on a new offense. He was awarded no presentence credits on the new case because he could not satisfy the "but for" test of In re Joyner, supra. Presentence credits were also denied a defendant who was held in custody pending trial on a parole hold based on the new drug arrest but also on additional, unrelated grounds. People v Bruner (1995) 9 C4th 1178, 1194, 40 CR2d 534.

The Joyner strict causation test also applies to those who have been found not guilty by reason of insanity (NGI). In People v Callahan (2006) 144 CA4th 678, 50 CR3d 677, the defendant assaulted a hospital guard. The court awarded no credits for the period defendant was in jail awaiting trial on the assault, because he otherwise remained confined on his NGI commitment.

A successful appeal can trigger a recalculation of presentence credits. In In re Marquez (2003) 30 C4th 14, 131 CR2d 911, the defendant was convicted twice, first in Santa Cruz and then in Monterey, and was sentenced in both counties. 30 C4th at 18. His Santa Cruz conviction was reversed on appeal and later dismissed, and he sought presentence credit against the Monterey conviction for time in custody between the original Santa Cruz conviction and the Monterey sentencing. The court ruled that he was entitled to those credits. Because the Santa Cruz conviction was invalid, the Monterey charges became the sole cause for his custody. In re Marquez, supra.

Notwithstanding Joyner's strict "but for" test, a defendant whose actual time in custody exceeds his sentence in one case may apply the excess "dead time" credits to his sentence on an unrelated case. People v Gonzalez (2006) 138 CA4th 246, 251, 41 CR3d 267.

2. Credit for Good Conduct

§37.58 a. Availability of Conduct Credits

In addition to the credit for each day actually spent in presentence custody available under Pen C §2900.5(a), credits are available, with exceptions, for good conduct during presentence confinement. Pen C §4019; People v Sage (1980) 26 C3d 498, 165 CR 280. Beginning January 25, 2010, qualified defendants in presentence custody can earn, for good conduct and assigned work, approximately 1 day of conduct credit for each day of custody. Defendants who have serious or violent felony priors or who must register under Pen C §290 will generally receive 1 day of conduct credit for every 2 days of custody. For a discussion of the new custody-credit legislation, see §37.59.

Defendants are not entitled to conduct credits, under Pen C §4019, for time spent in rehabilitation facilities, hospitals, or similar residential facilities. See, e.g., People v Silva (2003) 114 CA4th 122, 7 CR3d 473 (home detention on county electronic monitoring program); People v Pottorff (1996) 47 CA4th 1709, 55 CR2d 536 (defendant on O.R. ordered to stay at home or at work); People v Moore (1991) 226 CA3d 783, 277 CR 82 (time served in alcohol recovery center as a condition of probation); People v Palazuelos (1986) 180 CA3d 962, 964, 226 CR 31 (time served in residential drug treatment program as condition of probation); People v Smith (1981) 120 CA3d 817, 822, 175 CR 54 (no custody credits for persons committed to hospital after NGI finding).

Ø Note: Penal Code §2900.5 does provide for custody credits for such time. On custody credits, see §§37.55-37.57.

Conduct credits may not be earned by persons confined in state hospitals while recovering competency to stand trial under Pen C §1370. People v Waterman (1986) 42 C3d 565, 229 CR 796. But see People v Bryant (2009) 174 CA4th 175, 182, 94 CR3d 151 (defendant entitled to credits for period of delay between declaration of competency and return from state hospital). A defendant committed on a finding of NGI receives no presentence or postsentence conduct credit. People v Mord (1988) 197 CA3d 1090, 1104, 243 CR 403. A California Rehabilitation Center (CRC) inmate does not receive this credit either. People v Williams (1991) 232 CA3d 1643, 1648, 284 CR 241.

Section 4019 conduct credits are not earned for time served between a defendant's original sentencing and resentencing resulting from the trial court's recall of sentence (see Pen C §1170(d)), even if the defendant is confined in county jail to attend a resentencing hearing. People v Johnson (2004) 32 C4th 260, 8 CR3d 761.

§37.58A b. Limitation on Credits for Violent Felonies

Conduct credits are limited for a defendant who is convicted under certain statutes. Penal Code §2933.1(c) provides that a defendant convicted after September 21, 1994, of any violent felony and sentenced to prison may not receive presentence credits in excess of 15 percent. The underlying conviction must be for a violent felony listed as such in Pen C §667.5(c). Other felonies, including felonies listed as serious felonies in Pen C §1192.7(c), are not subject to the 15-percent limitation on presentence credits. People v Thomas (1999) 21 C4th 1122, 1130, 90 CR2d 642.

Ø Note: Determining whether the current conviction is a violent felony for the purpose of calculating presentence conduct credits is part of the trial court's sentencing function; a jury finding is not required. People v Garcia (2004) 121 CA4th 271, 274, 16 CR3d 833.

This limitation applies only on a prison sentence, so a person convicted of a violent offense who receives probation is still entitled to Pen C §4019 credits. However, if that person subsequently violates probation and is sentenced to prison, the court must recompute the presentence credits and apply the 15-percent limitation. People v Daniels (2003) 106 CA4th 736, 130 CR2d 887. A defendant sentenced under the Three Strikes law (Pen C §§667(b)-(i), 1170.12) is entitled to full presentence credits under §4019, unless the defendant's current conviction is for a violent felony within the meaning of Pen C §667.5(c). People v Thomas, supra. See discussion in §37.33C. However, a defendant sentenced to concurrent time for multiple offenses is subject to the 15-percent limitation for each offense if any offense comes within Pen C §667.5(c). People v Nunez (2008) 167 CA4th 761, 765, 84 CR3d 397. A defendant convicted of any specified violent crime who has two or more prior separate prison terms for specified violent crimes earns no conduct credits at all. Pen C §2933.5. A defendant convicted of murder after June 3, 1998, earns no §4019 credits, on either the indeterminate term for murder or any determinate enhancements. Pen C §2933.2; People v McNamee (2002) 96 CA4th 66, 116 CR2d 625.

§37.59 c. Calculating Days of Conduct Credit

Calculating credits under Pen C §4019. On January 25, 2010, a new method for calculating credits under §4019 went into effect. See Stats 2009, 3d Extra Sess, ch 28, §50. Instead of receiving 1 day of credit for every 2 days of custody, qualifying jail inmates will now receive 1 day of credit for each day of actual custody served. Inmates who are not in jail but who otherwise qualify for conduct credits, such as those assigned to work release, are also entitled to the new one-for-one credits under §4019. See §37.58 for discussion of nonjail sentences that qualify for conduct credits.

Jail inmates not qualifying for the additional credits are those whose instant offense is a serious or violent felony, or who have previously been convicted of a serious or violent felony, or who must register under Pen C §290.

Retroactivity. Whether additional credits should be awarded retroactively to inmates sentenced before January 25, 2010, remains an open question at this writing. It could be argued that previously sentenced inmates, both those who remain in jail and those sent to prison, are entitled to the additional credits. People v Nasalga (1996) 12 C4th 784, 790, 50 CR2d 88 (when amendatory statute mitigates punishment and there is no saving clause, amendment will operate retroactively so that lighter punishment is imposed); People v Doganiere (1978) 86 CA3d 237, 239, 150 CR 61; In re Estrada (1965) 63 C2d 740, 48 CR 172. A conflict has appeared in the courts on the question of whether the legislature intended the amendments to Pen C §4019 to apply retroactively to defendants who were sentenced before January 25, 2010, but whose convictions were not yet final. Compare People v Brown (Mar. 16, 2010, C056510) 2010 Cal App Lexis 344 (section 59 of Senate Bill 18 and overall purpose of legislation suggest legislature intended amendment to be applied retroactively) with People v Rodriguez (Mar. 1, 2010, F057533) 2010 Cal App Lexis 250 (a conduct-credit statute, because of incentive effect, is legally distinguishable from statutes that reduce punishment in other ways).

> Ø Practice Tip: A retroactive award of credits can make a big difference to some inmates. For example, a defendant previously sentenced to 365 days is entitled to almost 60 days of additional conduct credit under newly amended Pen C §4019. In some jurisdictions such as San Diego, the sheriff and the District Attorney's Office are assisting in the recalculation and the implementation of additional credits for these previously sentenced inmates. In other jurisdictions, however, defense attorneys likely will be responsible for getting their clients these additional credits.

Nonqualifying jail inmates. Jail and prison inmates previously convicted of a serious or violent felony and jail inmates required to register as sex offenders will generally receive credits under the old §4019 method, in which 1 day of custody credit is awarded for each 2 days of actual custody served. There are two different and conflicting methods of calculating these "one-for-two" conduct credits. Compare People v Smith (1989) 211 CA3d 523, 526, 259 CR 515, and People v Browning (1991) 233 CA3d 1410, 1412, 285 CR 216, with People v Twine (1982) 135 CA3d 59, 61 n1, 185 CR 85, and People v Collins (1981) 123 CA3d 535, 540, 176 CR 696. The Smith method for calculating one-for-two conduct credits under Pen C §4019 is to grant 2 days of credit for each completed 4-day block of service. This means that the total number of actual custody days should be divided by four, any fractional remainder should be discarded, and the total should then be multiplied by two to determine the conduct credit. See People v Gutierrez (1991) 232 CA3d 1571, 1573, 284 CR 211; People v Magana (1991) 230 CA3d 1117, 1121, 281 CR 338. The Twine method is simply to multiply the actual credits by one-half. This approach was sharply criticized in People v Bravo (1990) 219 CA3d 729, 268 CR 486. To compute credits, the court should first add all days of actual custody before applying the appropriate calculations. People v Culp (2002) 100 CA4th 1278, 122 CR2d 924.

Calculating credits limited by Pen C §2933.1. Jail inmates whose current offense is a violent felony will receive both pre- and postsentence credits in accordance with Pen C §2933.1 (the 15-percent limitation for violent felonies); the credits may not exceed 15 percent. The number of days' credit, if a fraction is included, must be rounded down to the nearest whole number. People v Ramos (1996) 50 CA4th 810, 58 CR2d 24.

§37.60 3. Applying Credits to Confinement Time and Fine

Credits earned for presentence confinement, conduct during presentence custody, and days spent in jail as a condition of probation must be applied first to the state prison term and then to any fine or restitution fine imposed as part of the sentence. Pen C §2900.5(a). Time in custody is credited to a fine at the rate of $30 per day or more, in the discretion of the sentencing judge. Pen C §2900.5(a).

It is the duty of the court imposing sentence to compute the presentence custody credits to which the defendant is entitled. Pen C §2900.5(d). These credits must be reflected in the abstract of judgment. Pen C §2900.5(d). See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.472. The agency to which the person is committed computes credits for the period of time between sentencing and the date the person is delivered to the agency of commitment. Pen C §2900.5(e). The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) must determine postcommitment credit issues; exhaustion of administrative remedies is required before a court will intercede. People v Chew (1985) 172 CA3d 45, 52, 217 CR 805, overruled on other grounds in People v Buckhalter (2001) 26 C4th 20, 40, 108 CR2d 625.

When a defendant who has been serving time in state prison is remanded for resentencing after an appeal, the trial court must recompute the defendant's entire credits for actual time served, from initial custody until resentencing. The presentence conduct credits are computed as of the defendant's initial sentencing to state prison, and presumably remain the same as previously computed. The CDCR will compute the defendant's good-time/work-time credits earned in prison, starting with the defendant's initial commitment. People v Buckhalter (2001) 26 C4th 20, 108 CR2d 625.

When a defendant's conviction is reversed but he or she is subsequently reconvicted, the "pre-reversal" prison time is not calculated as presentence custody. In re Martinez (2003) 30 C4th 29, 131 CR2d 921. Similarly, when a court recalls a state prison sentence under Pen C §1170(d), time spent in prison before recall and resentencing is treated as prison time, not presentence time, for purposes of calculating credits. People v Johnson (2004) 32 C4th 260, 8 CR3d 761.

§37.61 C. Credit for Conduct in State Prison

One-for-one postsentence credits. Prisoners may earn up to 6 months of credit for every 6 months of continuous incarceration. Credit will be awarded according to regulations adopted by the Secretary of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. Pen C §2933, effective January 25, 2010. Inmates may earn up to 6 weeks additional credit per year on the basis of their completion of certain performance objectives for approved rehabilitative programming that will be described in regulations that must be promulgated by late April 2010. Pen C §2933.05, enacted January 25, 2010. Under §2933.05, these performance objectives include academic and vocational programs, anger management, and substance abuse and life skills classes. Unlike the presentence credits in newly amended Pen C §4019 described above in §37.59, the additional credits under §2933.05 will very likely not be applied retroactively, because the programs entitling inmates to these credits have yet to be designated and, in some instances, even created.

Ø Practice tip: In advising prison-bound clients on the actual time they will serve, lawyers routinely subtract the actual time served from the prison sentence and divide the remainder by two—assuming work-time credits will start immediately. A more accurate calculation, particularly for longer sentences, is to subtract the actual time from the sentence, divide the remaining time by three and then multiply that by two. This formula accounts for the time it takes the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) to process inmates and deliver them to a credit-earning site.

Sentence reduction for heroic act. Any inmate may be granted a sentence reduction of up to 12 months for performing a heroic act in a life-threatening situation, or by providing "exceptional assistance in maintaining the safety and security of a prison." Pen C §2935. This sentence reduction is not a Three Strikes "credit" and is not subject to the Three Strikes 20-percent limitation on postsentence credits. In re Young (2004) 32 C4th 900, 12 CR3d 48.

Violent offenses with specified priors—no credits. Penal Code §2933.5 prohibits good-time or work-time credit for defendants convicted of the following offenses committed on or after January 1, 1991: murder, voluntary manslaughter, mayhem, aggravated mayhem, kidnapping for child molestation with GBI, assault with caustic chemical, rape by force, sodomy by force, sodomy in concert, lewd or lascivious acts on a child under the age of 14 years, oral copulation by force, resident child molester, rape by foreign object, exploding a destructive device, or any felony with GBI. This prohibition applies to defendants who have previously been convicted two or more times of any of these offenses, on charges separately brought and tried, and who have previously served two or more separate prior prison terms for any of these offenses. Pen C §2933.5(a). The statute does not address presentence credits under Pen C §4019.

Violent felony—15-percent limit. A defendant convicted of a violent felony under Pen C §667.5(c), committed after September 21, 1994, may use work-time credits to reduce the term for the conviction by no more than 15 percent. Pen C §2933.1(a). The underlying conviction must be for a violent felony. A nonviolent felon, sentenced to a life term because of strike priors, is not subject to this limitation. People v Thomas (1999) 21 C4th 1122, 90 CR2d 642. Nor is this limitation triggered by a conviction of conspiracy to commit a violent felony. In re Mitchell (2000) 81 CA4th 653, 97 CR2d 41. The limitation applies to preconviction as well as postconviction credits. People v Sylvester (1997) 58 CA4th 1493, 68 CR2d 716.

When a defendant is convicted of both violent and nonviolent felonies and is sentenced to concurrent terms for the convictions, time attributable only to the nonviolent felony or felonies is not subject to this limitation. In re Reeves (2005) 35 C4th 765, 779, 28 CR3d 4. In Reeves, the defendant was convicted of a violent offense for which he received a 5-year prison term, and a nonviolent offense for which he received a 10-year term. He was entitled to earn work-time credits at a rate of 15 percent during his first 5 years in prison and at a rate of 50 percent during the second 5-year period. 35 C4th at 780. Similarly, when the court has imposed sentence on a nonviolent felony and stayed the sentence on a violent felony under Pen C §654, none of the defendant's term is attributable to the violent felony and the Pen C §2933.1(a) limitation on credits does not apply. In re Phelon (2005) 132 CA4th 1214, 34 CR3d 276. See also In re

Gomez (2009) 179 CA4th 1272, 102 CR3d 221. A number of courts disagree with the rationale and holding of Phelon. The California Supreme Court may resolve this issue with its opinions in People v Duff (review granted Aug. 29, 2007, S153917; superseded opinion at 151 CA4th 913, 60 CR3d 185) and In re Pope (review granted Apr. 9 2008, S160930; superseded opinion at 158 CA4th 860, 70 CR3d 314).

When, however, a defendant is given a consecutive sentence that includes both violent and nonviolent felonies, the Pen C §2933.1(a) limitation applies to the entire term, because under Pen C §1170.1(a), all the consecutive terms merge into a single aggregate term. In re Reeves, 35 C4th at 772.

The Pen C §2933.1(a) limitation does not apply to a consecutive term imposed for a nonviolent felony committed in prison. In re Tate (2006) 135 CA4th 756, 37 CR3d 710. Under Pen C §1170.1(c), the sentence on the in-prison felony begins to run only after the inmate has served the full sentence on the violent felony, and does not merge with the term for previous offenses. Therefore, an inmate serving time on a violent felony who commits a nonviolent felony while in prison will receive his or her 50-percent good-time credits on the in-prison offense. In re Tate, supra.

Counsel need not specifically advise the defendant of this credit limitation; a plea to an included offense is all that is required. People v Fitzgerald (1997) 59 CA4th 932, 69 CR2d 453.

The limitation on credits of Pen C §2933.1 applies only to defendants sentenced to state prison. A defendant granted probation is not subject to the 15-percent limitation. In re Carr (1998) 65 CA4th 1525, 77 CR2d 500.

Murder—no credits for crime after June 3, 1998. Former Pen C §2933(e) provided that terms for first- and second-degree murder are reduced only by the "one-for-two" scheme of Pen C §2931(a)-(c). In re Monigold (1988) 205 CA3d 1224, 1227, 253 CR 120. Presumably, any murder occurring between September 21, 1994, the effective date of Pen C §2933.1, and June 3, 1998, is subject to the 15-percent credit limitation of §2933.1. A defendant convicted of murder occurring on or after June 3, 1998, accrues no credits on any part of his or her sentence, and is specifically barred from accruing presentence credits under §4019. Pen C §2933.2. When convicted of crimes in addition to murder, the defendant accrues no credits on these additional convictions. People v McNamee (2002) 96 CA4th 66, 69, 116 CR2d 625.

One Strike sex crime and habitual sex offender laws—15-percent limit. The Sex Offender Punishment, Control, and Containment Act of 2006 (Stats 2006, ch 337) eliminated Pen C §§667.61(j) and 667.71(b), which limited custody credits for defendants convicted of enumerated sex offenses to no more than 15 percent of the sentence. Although the "Digest" to the legislation states that the bill eliminates all credits, the author has been unable to find such a provision in the legislation (see Stats 2006, ch 337) or any other statute that eliminates credits for those convicted under §667.61 or §667.71.

Three Strikes law. For a defendant with a single prior "strike," work-time credits are limited to a maximum of 20 percent of the total term of imprisonment and do not accrue until the defendant is physically placed in state prison. Pen C §§667(c)(5), 1170.12(a)(5). But if the one-strike defendant is convicted of a violent offense, his or her presentence credits are subject to the 15-percent credit limitation of Pen C §2933.1. People v Thomas (1999) 21 C4th 1122, 90 CR2d 642. A defendant sentenced with two or more prior strikes receives no good-time or work-time credits at all. In re Cervera (2001) 24 C4th 1073, 103 CR2d 762.

IX. CIVIL COMMITMENT OF NARCOTICS ADDICTS

§37.63 A. Mandatory Petition for Commitment for Drug Abuse Treatment

After an eligible defendant has been convicted and sentenced for a felony or after revocation of a defendant's felony probation, if the judge believes that the defendant may be addicted or is in imminent danger of becoming addicted to narcotics, the judge must, with exceptions, suspend execution of the sentence and order the district attorney to file a petition to have the defendant committed to the California Rehabilitation Center (CRC) for narcotics treatment. Welf & I C §3051. The CRC is a statutorily mandated treatment facility and department within the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR). Welf & I C §3001. Although courts and parties speak of committing a defendant to CRC, in fact the commitment is to the CDCR with an order that the defendant be confined in the treatment facility. See Welf & I C §§3001, 3050.

A narcotics addict, for purposes of the CRC commitment scheme, is "any person, adult or minor, who is addicted to the unlawful use of any narcotic … except marijuana." Welf & I C §3009. A defendant addicted solely to alcohol is not eligible for CRC. People v Chavez (2004) 116 CA4th 1, 10 CR3d 556.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.63A 1. Disqualifying Factors

Excessive criminality. The court must order a commitment petition filed on a person otherwise eligible for treatment unless the defendant's record and probation report indicate such a "pattern of criminality" that he or she "does not constitute a fit subject for commitment." Welf & I C §3051. See People v Flores (1971) 6 C3d 305, 98 CR 822, overruled on another ground in People v Mendez (1999) 19 C4th 1084, 1097, 81 CR2d 301 (refusal to initiate commitment procedures not error when record available to court at sentencing showed criminal history and no indication of addiction); People v McGinnis (2001) 87 CA4th 592, 105 CR2d 1 (court must state adequate reasons relating criminality to unfitness for CRC; record showed addiction motivating factor for criminal activity); People v Jeffery (2006) 142 CA4th 192, 195, 47 CR3d 691 (trial court's statement that it declined to initiate CRC commitment proceedings for "a variety of reasons" inadequate because it left reviewing court guessing); People v Cruz (1990) 217 CA3d 413, 421, 266 CR 29 (court must determine whether defendant's main problem is drug abuse or a criminal orientation as reflected in a pattern of criminality); People v Urdiain (1986) 179 CA3d 330, 332, 225 CR 1 (evidence of heroin trafficking sufficient to show pattern of criminality despite lack of criminal record). As in competency proceedings, CRC defendants are involuntarily committed. Because treatment is ordered and is not a privilege, the defendant's lack of motivation to recover from drug addiction is not a proper basis for the court to discontinue commitment proceedings. People v Madden (1979) 98 CA3d 249, 262, 159 CR 381; People v Leonard (1972) 25 CA3d 1131, 102 CR 435.

Ineligibility under Welf & I C §3052. A person who is convicted of specified offenses, including arson, certain violent crimes, and sex offenses, is not eligible for commitment for narcotics treatment if:

- He or she received a sentence in excess of 6 years;
- The sentence is subject to weapons, property damage, or great bodily injury enhancements, or
- He or she is statutorily ineligible for probation under Pen C §1203.06.

Welf & I C §3052.

"Strikes" conviction. A person convicted under the Three Strikes law with one or more prior "strikes" may not be committed to CRC. Pen C §§667(c)(4), 1170.12(a)(4).

Lack of Beds. Welfare and Institutions Code §3055 allows the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) to limit the number of CRC inmates and to refer otherwise eligible defendants back to court when that number is exceeded. In November 2002, the department reduced the number of CRC beds from 1777 to 954, where it has remained ever since.

Holds. Although not mandated in any statute, CRC memos indicate that it automatically excludes individuals with out-of-state, federal criminal, or INS holds.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.63B 2. Reviewing the Trial Court's Decision to Disqualify

The trial court's decision that the defendant is ineligible for a CRC commitment is appealable. Pen C §1237. When the trial court makes no mention of imminent addiction, the court of appeal will presume that the lower court considered and rejected such evidence, and the implied rejection will be upheld unless (1) the evidence establishes as a matter of law that the defendant was in imminent danger of addiction, or (2) the defendant proves on appeal that the lower court did not consider the issue. People v Sanford (1988) 204 CA3d 1181, 1183, 251 CR 707; People v Perez (1987) 196 CA3d 686, 690, 242 CR 135.

If the trial court makes an express addiction finding, it must act under Welf & I C §3051 or expressly explain its refusal to do so. The only proper reason for such refusal would be the defendant's excessive criminality as shown by his or her record and the probation report. People v Young (1991) 228 CA3d 171, 185, 278 CR 784; People v Sanford, supra. Failure to commit an eligible addict is a sentencing choice that requires a statement of reasons. Cal Rules of Ct 4.406(b)(10); People v Granado (1994) 22 CA4th 194, 201, 27 CR2d 286. If the trial court fails to sentence a defendant before it commits him or her to CRC, the court is considered to have de facto acted under Welf & I C §§3100-3111 and created a direct civil commitment to CRC. People v Froehle (1990) 223 CA3d 1210, 1216, 272 CR 835 (because defendant not sentenced before committed to CRC, he could not be excluded from CRC on basis of what would have been sentence exceeding 6 years).

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.64 B. Procedure for Committing to California Rehabilitation Center (CRC)

When the district attorney files a court-ordered petition for commitment to the CRC, the court must order the defendant to be examined by one physician, or by two physicians if requested by the defense. The defendant may waive that examination, under limited conditions. If the medical report indicates that the defendant is neither an addict nor in danger of becoming an addict, the court may order execution of the sentence, or may modify or suspend the sentence. Welf & I C §3051.

If the doctor finds that the defendant is addicted or in danger of becoming addicted, the defendant must be arraigned and advised of his or her rights to a hearing, counsel, presentation of evidence, and confrontation. Welf & I C §§3051, 3104. The defendant may waive the right to a hearing. Welf & I C §3107. At the hearing, the court must determine whether the person is addicted or in danger of becoming addicted to narcotics. Welf & I C §3106. Absent a stipulation to the admissibility of the medical reports, the doctor who examined the defendant must attend the hearing and testify. Welf & I C §3106.

If the defendant, or any friend on his or her behalf, is dissatisfied with the commitment order after a court hearing, the defendant may demand a jury trial on the sole question of whether he or she is addicted to the use of narcotics or is in imminent danger of addiction because of the repeated use of narcotics. The demand must be in writing and made within 10 calendar days after the making of the order. Welf & I C §3108. The court's prior commitment order may not be read or referred to in the jury trial. Welf & I C §3108.

Although §3108 describes the jury proceeding as a civil trial requiring a verdict by three-fourths of the jury, this provision was invalidated by the California Supreme Court, which found that due process requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt and a unanimous jury on the issue of addiction or danger of addiction. People v Thomas (1977) 19 C3d 630, 139 CR 594. Note that the legislature has not modified §3108 to reflect the Thomas ruling.

A defendant's failure to seek a jury trial does not prevent him or her from raising the issue of addiction in a direct appeal from the court's original commitment order. People v Murphy (1969) 70 C2d 109, 74 CR 65.

§37.64A C. Treatment and Outpatient Release

On commitment, a person is transferred to the CRC facility at Norco, California, for an initial period of observation and treatment. When during treatment a person is considered sufficiently recovered to be released on outpatient status (parole), he or she is certified to the Board of Parole Hearings (BPH) for evaluation for release under the board's supervision. Welf & I C §§3050-3051. A person who is not referred to the BPH for consideration for parole outpatient within 12 months after commitment is to be automatically referred for that purpose. Welf & I C §3201(b).

A person who violates parole conditions imposed by the BPH is subject to being retaken and returned to the CRC under CRC rules or through a new commitment proceeding. Welf & I C §§3151-3152.

§37.65 D. Unfit for Treatment and Return to Court; Credit for Time in CRC

If at any time during the period of commitment the Director of Corrections concludes that the defendant, because of excessive criminality or other relevant reason, is not a fit subject for treatment, the Director must return the person to the court for further criminal proceedings. Welf & I C §3053(a). A defendant may waive the right under Welf & I C §3053(a) to return to court. People v Sanders (2009) 170 CA4th 1236, 1238, 88 CR3d 837. A defendant is not entitled to a hearing before being excluded from the CRC. People v Quintana (1977) 69 CA3d 178, 138 CR 1.

Anyone committed to the CRC who is subsequently committed to prison for another offense under Pen C §1168 or §1170 is deemed, by virtue of the subsequent commitment, an unfit subject for treatment. Welf & I C §3053(b). When the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) notifies the court of this subsequent commitment, the court must automatically terminate the CRC commitment and reinstate criminal proceedings. Welf & I C §3053(b).

If a defendant is excluded from the CRC and returned to court, the sentencing court is not bound by the sentence it imposed before the CRC commitment. The court retains jurisdiction to decrease, but not increase, the sentence. People v Nubla (1999) 74 CA4th 719, 88 CR2d 265.

When computing credits for the time spent in custody at the CRC, the court excludes time in outpatient status. Welf & I C §3201(c). The defendant does not receive work-time credits under Pen C §2933. People v Miller (1991) 233 CA3d 1551, 285 CR 410. Nor does the defendant receive good-time or participation credits under Pen C §2931. People v Jones (1995) 11 C4th 118, 44 CR2d 164.

> Ø Note: It is not uncommon for a person to be at the CRC for nearly a year (the period before mandatory referral for consideration of outpatient status) before the CRC makes a decision to return him or her to court for excessive criminality. Because that person will not receive good-time credits for confinement time before exclusion, a defendant at risk for such exclusion might not be interested in a CRC commitment. Defense counsel can contact the CRC before suggesting a commitment to the court to get an informal opinion on the likelihood the client would be later excluded. Counsel can ask to speak to the classification and parole representative or exclusion coordinator at (951) 737-2683.

§37.66 E. Completion of Term of Commitment; Maximum Period of Commitment

When the Board of Parole Hearings (BPH) and the Director of Corrections and Rehabilitation are satisfied that a person has abstained from narcotics use and complied with his or her terms of parole, the parole authority files with the court a certificate recommending the person be discharged from the CRC and serves a copy on the district attorney. The person is returned to court, which discharges him or her from the CRC. The court may then, unless otherwise prohibited, modify the sentence, dismiss the charges, or suspend further proceedings. A dismissal qualifies as a dismissal under Pen C §1203.4. Welf & I C §3200(b). See §41.19.

If not discharged from the CRC within 12 months, a person under a civil commitment must be returned to court. Welf & I C §3201(b). A person committed after suspension of a felony sentence must be released on parole under BPH supervision if he or she has not been discharged after confinement for a period equal to what he or she would have spent in prison on that sentence (maximum period of commitment). The period of parole is that provided in Pen C §3000. A person who violates parole can be returned to the CRC. When parole is completed, the person is returned to court. In this situation, the court may not dismiss the charges but may suspend or terminate further proceedings in the interest of justice, modify the sentence, or deem the sentence to have been served in full. Welf & I C §3201(c).

For a person with a felony conviction, the maximum period of commitment to the CRC is the term of the sentence that was suspended. Outpatient time is included in calculating whether the maximum commitment has been reached. Welf & I C §3201(c).

X. COMMITMENT AND TRANSFERS TO DIVISION OF JUVENILE JUSTICE (DJJ)

§37.67 A. Defendants Eligible for DJJ Commitment

If a person was under age 18 (a minor) when he or she committed an offense, under age 21 when apprehended for the crime, and convicted in adult court, he or she may be committed to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) rather than to state prison. Welf & I C §1731(a). Juvenile courts are also empowered to commit wards to DJJ. Welf & I C §1736. See §56.45.

There are significant limitations on DJJ commitments. An otherwise eligible individual may not be committed to the DJJ if he or she has been:

- Sentenced to death, life imprisonment, or the payment of a fine. Welf & I C §1731.5(a).
- Convicted of any Pen C §667.5(c) (violent felony) or §1192.7 (serious felony) and sentenced to life, to an indeterminate term to life, or a determinate term for which the maximum period of confinement, added to the minor's age, would exceed 25 years. Welf & I C §1732.6(a).
- Convicted of any Welf & I C §602(b) offense (mandatory direct filing in adult court). Welf & I C §1732.6(b)(1).
- Convicted of any Welf & I C §707(d)(1), (d)(2) or (d)(3) offense (prosecutor's discretion to file directly in adult court), if the facts specified in those paragraphs are found true. Welf & I C §1732.6(b)(2).
- Convicted of any Welf & I C §707(b) offense committed when the minor was age 16 or older. Welf & I C §1732.6(b)(3).

An otherwise eligible defendant convicted of an offense with a maximum penalty of not more than 90 days may not be committed to the DJJ unless he or she has been previously convicted of a public offense or has been a ward of the juvenile court by reason of a public offense, and the court is satisfied that society will best be protected by commitment to the DJJ. Welf & I C §1732.7.

Ø Note: In 1994, Welf & I C §1731 was amended to limit a DJJ commitment to a person who was a minor when a crime was committed; before that amendment, adults under age 21 could be committed to the DJJ. Stats 1994, ch 452, §2. This amendment moots the implications of Welf & I C §§1732 and 1732.5, which continue to retain language implying that a DJJ commitment is available for adults under age 21.

§37.68 B. When Defendant May or Must Be Referred to DJJ Diagnostic and Treatment Center Before Sentencing

Before making an order committing the defendant to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ), the court may continue the proceedings and place a person coming within the terms of Welf & I C §§1731-1731.5 in a DJJ diagnostic and treatment center for up to 90 calendar days if the court concludes that proper disposition of the case requires such observation and diagnosis. Welf & I C §1731.6(a); People v Wells (1983) 149 CA3d 721, 197 CR 163. Persons between the ages of 16 and 18 when they committed a criminal offense and found to be unfit for the juvenile court process may be referred to the DJJ for evaluation. If the court decides not to remand for evaluation, it must make a finding that the evaluation is unnecessary. Welf & I C §707.2(a). For a person under age 16 when he or she committed the offense, the court must refer the person for an evaluation before that person can be sentenced to state prison, unless commitment to the DJJ would be prohibited by Welf & I C §1732.6 (violent or serious felonies; life term, or term that would extend past the person's 25th birthday). Welf & I C §707.2(b). To calculate whether the commitment would extend past the 25th birthday, the sentencing court is not required to use the maximum term that could be imposed. The court can consider the term it actually intends to impose. People v Rangel (1999) 70 CA4th 350, 82 CR2d 589. The DJJ recommendation under Welf & I C §707.2, pertaining to a minor defendant who has been found not fit for treatment as a juvenile, is to focus on amenability to DJJ training and treatment. The court's sentencing decision, however, is to be based on "the need to protect society, the nature and seriousness of the offense, the interests of justice, and the needs of the minor." Welf & I C §707.2(a).

The DJJ must accept an eligible defendant committed to it "if it believes that the person can be materially benefitted by its reformatory and educational discipline, and if it has adequate facilities to provide that care." Welf & I C §1731.5(b). The defendant has no right to a hearing if he or she is rejected by the DJJ. People v Rocha (1982) 135 CA3d 590, 186 CR 132.

A commitment to the DJJ must generally correspond to the normal Determinate Sentencing Law (DSL) rules, with some exceptions. The principal term must be the upper base term. In re Eric J. (1979) 25 C3d 522, 536, 159 CR 317.

The decision to impose terms consecutively or concurrently is in the trial court's discretion, but, unlike DSL terms, the court need not state a reason for a consecutive term. In re Ismael A. (1989) 207 CA3d 911, 920, 255 CR 126. The rule of Pen C §1170.1(a)—one-third the middle term limit on subordinate consecutive terms—applies. In re Claude J. (1990) 217 CA3d 760, 765, 266 CR 99.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.69 C. Stage of Proceedings When Actual Commitment to DJJ Occurs

The court may order the defendant's commitment to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) either before or after pronouncing sentence. In re Ralph (1946) 27 C2d 866, 871, 168 P2d 1 (sentence pronounced, but execution suspended while defendant sent to DJJ for determination of eligibility); People v Stevenson (1969) 275 CA2d 645, 651, 80 CR 392 (commitment before sentence pronounced); People v Woolbert (1965) 232 CA2d 544, 42 CR 919 (same).

Ø Note: When the defendant has been placed on probation and it has been revoked and terminated, the court may order an otherwise eligible defendant committed to the DJJ regardless of whether the imposition of sentence or merely its execution was suspended at the time probation was granted. See Pen C §1203.2(d).

When the court commits a person to the DJJ, the court may order temporary placement in some place of detention approved or established by the DJJ, or it may direct that the defendant be left at liberty until otherwise ordered by the DJJ, under conditions that will ensure the defendant's submission to the DJJ. Welf & I C §1738. See also Welf & I C §1739 (bail pending appeal).

The court must immediately forward to the DJJ a certified copy of the commitment order. Welf & I C §1740. The judge, prosecutor, and probation officer must furnish the DJJ with a written report on the defendant's background including their knowledge of his or her education, character, and disposition. Welf & I C §1741.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.70 D. Proceedings if Defendant Rejected

The Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) has the discretion to accept or reject a defendant referred to it for commitment. See Welf & I C §1737.1. If the DJJ rejects the defendant, either at the time of presentation or during the period of commitment, it returns the defendant to the committing court, which may then sentence him or her to confinement as provided by law for punishment of the offense of which the defendant was convicted. Welf & I C §1737.1. See also People v Stevenson (1969) 275 CA2d 645, 651, 80 CR 392. Once committed to and accepted by the DJJ, however, a ward may be returned to superior court for sentencing to state prison only if the DJJ finds the ward to be "incorrigible" or an "improper person" or "incapable of reformation." Welf & I C §1737.1; 15 Cal Code Regs §4178. In a superior court review on mandamus of such a decision, the trial court must apply an "independent judgment" standard of review. Mardesich v California Youthful Offender Parole Bd. (1999) 69 CA4th 1361, 82 CR2d 294.

If the judge designates an alternative misdemeanor/felony to be a misdemeanor on commitment to the DJJ, the offense is deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes. Pen C §17(b)(2). If the defendant is thereafter returned by the DJJ to the sentencing court, the defendant can only be sentenced as a misdemeanant. See People v Hannon (1971) 5 C3d 330, 96 CR 35 (although Hannon was decided when §17(b)(2) made an alternative misdemeanor/felony a misdemeanor automatically when a defendant was sentenced to DJJ, the principle is the same under the amended statute when the judge actually specifies that the offense is a misdemeanor).

If the defendant is returned for sentencing, he or she has the right to counsel, to a hearing on sentence, and to be arraigned for judgment, as discussed in chap 35. However, if sentence has previously been pronounced and only its execution has been suspended, the court may order the defendant to be directly committed to the appropriate facility in execution of the original sentence. See In re Ralph (1946) 27 C2d 866, 168 P2d 1. The defendant is entitled to actual credits only for time spent in the DJJ against any term subsequently imposed. Welf & I C §1737. He or she is, however, entitled to conduct credits for time spent in custody other than the time he or she was actually committed to the DJJ. People v Acosta (1985) 170 CA3d 1033, 1036, 216 CR 841; In re Edward S. (1982) 133 CA3d 154, 158, 183 CR 733. A youthful offender ultimately sent to prison does receive conduct credits for time spent in the DJJ undergoing diagnostic study. See People v Saldivar (1984) 154 CA3d 111, 116, 201 CR 60. But a youthful offender initially committed to the DJJ, but later rejected and returned to court because of misconduct, is not entitled to receive conduct credits. People v Reynolds (1981) 116 CA3d 141, 171 CR 461.

§37.71 E. Duration if Defendant Accepted

After initial commitment to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ), under certain circumstances the court may recall and resentence the defendant, with credit for the time served in the DJJ. To do so within 120 days after initial commitment, it must be recommended by the diagnostic report and the DJJ director. After 120 days, it may be done at the director's recommendation. Welf & I C §1737.

The DJJ is generally required to retain the defendant under its supervision and control "so long as in its judgment such control is necessary for the protection of the public," and it must discharge the defendant "as soon as in its own opinion there is reasonable probability that he or she can be given full liberty without danger to the public." Welf & I C §1765. See also Welf & I C §1766(f). Despite the open-ended language of the quoted section, however, a DJJ commitment is subject to statutory age limits and case law restrictions.

A person committed to the DJJ after conviction of a felony must be discharged on his or her 25th birthday unless an order extending DJJ commitment (under Welf & I C §1800) or sentencing the person to state prison is made. Welf & I C §1771. In no event may a DJJ commitment after conviction of a felony exceed the maximum term established for the offense in the Penal Code. People v Herron (1976) 62 CA3d 643, 133 CR 287.

A defendant committed to the DJJ by an adult court is entitled to credit for time spent in presentence custody. People v Sandoval (1977) 70 CA3d 73, 138 CR 609.

If a judge commits a defendant to the DJJ on a wobbler offense, the offense is deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes once the defendant is discharged from the DJJ. Pen C §17(c). But an offense constituting a strike under the Three Strikes law remains a strike and is unaffected by that reduction. See §37.33A.

§37.72 F. Housing Youthful State Prison Inmate at DJJ Facility; DJJ's Power to Transfer Such Inmates to Other Institutions

Having ordered a state prison sentence, a sentencing court may promptly transfer anyone under age 18 to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ). The Secretary of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) has the same power. Welf & I C §1731.5(a), (c). The transfer is for housing, participation in DJJ programs, and DJJ parole supervision. However, the person remains subject to the jurisdiction of the CDCR. A transfer ends when the DJJ Chief Deputy Secretary returns the person to the CDCR, when the person is paroled, when the sentence is served, or when the person reaches age 18, whichever occurs first; however, the person may remain at the DJJ, in the Chief Deputy Secretary's discretion, if his or her sentence will be complete before age 21. Welf & I C §1731.5(c).

The DJJ may transfer juveniles to any one of several prisons under the jurisdiction of the CDCR, including the California Rehabilitation Center (CRC). Welf & I C §1755.5. In addition, the DJJ may transfer a mentally disordered or developmentally disabled person to a state hospital if rehabilitation would be expedited by state hospital treatment. Welf & I C §1756.

Anyone committed to the DJJ may be returned to the committing court for further disposition before the date of discharge if the person appears to the Board of Parole Hearings "to be an improper person to be retained by the Youth Authority, or to be so incorrigible or so incapable of reformation … as to render his or her detention detrimental to the interests of the Youth Authority and the other persons committed thereto." Welf & I C §1737.1. The court may commit a person returned from the DJJ to prison or jail for a period equal to the maximum term for the offense involved less the period during which the person was under DJJ control. Welf & I C §1737.1.

A youthful offender has no right to a hearing to test the validity of his or her rejection from the DJJ under §1737.1. People v Ferrel (1972) 25 CA3d 970, 102 CR 372 (no due process violation).

§37.73 G. Extension of DJJ Commitment

The Youthful Offender Parole Board may request the prosecuting attorney to seek an order extending a DJJ commitment if it determines the person is physically dangerous to the public because of a "mental or physical deficiency, disorder, or abnormality which causes the person to have serious difficulty controlling his or her dangerous behavior." Welf & I C §1800; In re Howard N. (2005) 35 C4th 117, 24 CR3d 866; see Kansas v Crane (2002) 534 US 407, 412, 151 L Ed 2d 856, 862, 122 S Ct 867.

Such a request to the prosecutor must be filed with the committing court at least 90 days before the discharge date and must be accompanied by a written statement of facts. If the prosecution declines to proceed, it must promptly notify the board. Welf & I C §1800. If the court agrees that probable cause supports the petition, it must order a hearing. The person involved has the right to a hearing, to the assistance of counsel, and to appear and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence. A probable cause hearing must be held within 10 calendar days after the court's order. Welf & I C §1801(a).

If the court finds no probable cause, it must dismiss the petition and the person must be discharged at the conclusion of his or her commitment. If the court does find probable cause, it must order that a trial be conducted to decide whether the person is physically dangerous to the public because a mental or physical deficiency, disorder, or abnormality causes the person serious difficulty in controlling dangerous behavior. Welf & I C §1801(b). If the cause of the offender's "dangerousness" is not a mental or physical condition, however, or if the offender is not amenable to DJJ treatment, the DJJ's control may not be extended.

At any trial under Welf & I C §1801, the person is entitled to a jury, unless he or she is advised and waives it. In re Gary W. (1971) 5 C3d 296, 96 CR 1. If not waived, the jury must be summoned within 4 to 30 days after the date of the order for a hearing, unless time is waived. Any verdict must be unanimous, and the standard of proof is beyond a reasonable doubt. Welf & I C §1801.5.

A continued DJJ detention terminates 2 years after the continued commitment order was made, unless the Youthful Offender Parole Board files a new application for continued detention. Welf & I C §1802. "Such applications may be repeated at intervals as often as in the opinion of the board may be necessary for the protection of the public." Welf & I C §1802. The Board may order a person over age 21 to be transferred to the Director of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation for appropriate placement in order to protect other persons in DJJ custody. Welf & I C §1802.

© The Regents of the University of California

§37.74 H. State Prison Commitment Instead of Discharge

A person who is otherwise subject to discharge under Welf & I C §1771 (having reached the age of 25) may be committed to state prison instead of being discharged if (Welf & I C §1780):

- The date of discharge precedes the date on which the maximum prison term for the same offense expires; and
- The Youthful Offender Parole Board believes that unrestrained freedom for the person would be dangerous to the public.

Ø Note: A person committed to the Division of Juvenile Justice (DJJ) by the juvenile court is not subject to commitment pursuant to Welf & I C §1780, because that statute expressly requires a "conviction." See In re John R. (1981) 116 CA3d 940, 946, 172 CR 387.

A DJJ commitment may not be extended for a period exceeding what could properly be imposed on a ward originally committed by juvenile court. People v Smith (1971) 5 C3d 313, 319, 96 CR 13. See People v Herron (1976) 62 CA3d 643, 133 CR 287.

When the Board files a petition for state prison commitment, the committing court must notify the defendant, and the parents if the defendant is still a minor. Welf & I C §1781. The defendant has the right to a hearing on the petition, to appointed counsel, and to be afforded the opportunity to appear and compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence. Welf & I C §1781.

If the committing court finds that the defendant would be dangerous to the public if released, the court may order him or her to state prison for the maximum term less the time the person spent under DJJ control. Welf & I C §1782. Such an order is appealable in the same manner as a criminal conviction. Welf & I C §1783.

§37.75 XI. PREGNANT AND PARENTING WOMEN'S ALTERNATIVE SENTENCING

The Pregnant and Parenting Women's Alternative Sentencing Program Act is codified at Pen C §§1174-1174.9. Although enacted in 1994, the first prison program under the law was activated in 1999, administered as the Family Foundations Program of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR). The program is intended for women sentenced to state prison who have an "established history of drug abuse," and are pregnant and/or mothers of children under the age of 6. The program includes a community substance abuse treatment program while allowing mothers to care for their children. Goals include drug relapse prevention and reduced recidivism.

Program requirements. Inmates must voluntarily agree to participate in the program. The program is 12 months long, and is not affected by presentence or postsentence credits, including good-time/work-time credits. An inmate who successfully completes the program is then released to parole for a 12-month period. An inmate removed from the program will serve the remainder of her original sentence, with full credit for her time in the program under Pen C §2933. Pen C §1174.4(i).

Eligibility criteria. An inmate must meet all of the following criteria (Pen C §1174.4):

- Must have an established history of drug abuse;
- Must be pregnant and/or be the mother of one or more children under the age of 6. If a mother, at least one child under age 6 must reside with mother in the facility;
- Must never have served a prison term for, nor be convicted in the present offense for, any of the list of violent and serious felonies specified in Pen C §1174.4(a)(2); and
- Must not be sentenced to a term in excess of 3 years.

Additional CDCR criteria. As part of the Family Foundations Program, the CDCR has (under regulatory authority in Pen C §1174.8) adopted additional restrictions on eligibility. There is a two-child limit, and if applicable there must be no objection from the Department of Social Services to the child's placement with the mother. The mother must not have a potential or active felony hold or INS hold. Misdemeanor holds will not result in exclusion.

Procedure. The court, defense attorney, probation officer, or other officer of the court must determine the defendant's interest in the program and ensure that she meets the above criteria. The Women and Children's Services Unit of the CDCR should be contacted at (916) 323-0125 to determine an applicant's eligibility and the bed availability in the program. The probation department must prepare a written evaluation, which must include (1) whether the defendant is eligible, (2) whether participation by the defendant and her children is in the best interests of the children, (3) whether the defendant is amenable to treatment for substance abuse and would benefit from the program, and (4) a favorable recommendation by the appropriate child welfare services agency if the child is a dependent of the juvenile court under Welf & I C §300. Although the district attorney must make a recommendation whether the defendant would benefit from this program, the court has the power to recommend the defendant's participation without the district attorney's concurrence but must specify its reasons in writing and enter them in the record. Pen C §1174.4(c)-(d).

At sentencing, the court pronounces sentence to state prison, with the recommendation that the defendant participate in the program. The court must notify the CDCR of the recommendation within 48 hours after imposition of sentence. Pen C §1174.4(d). If the defendant is accepted for the program, she must be delivered directly to the program facility selected by the Department, not first to state prison. Pen C §§1174.4(i), 1202a.

> Ø Note: Because it is the intention of this sentencing scheme that the woman be delivered directly to the program, it is important that during the preparation of the probation report the CDCR be contacted to determine her eligibility. Defense counsel should work closely with the probation officer to ensure that all the prerequisites are met and that necessary information is provided to the court to ensure that the client can be sent directly to the program facility.

§38.1 I. OVERVIEW

Probation defined. Probation is the suspension of the imposition or execution of a sentence and the conditional release of a defendant into the community under the direction of a probation officer (commonly called "formal" or "supervised" probation) or the court (commonly called a "conditional sentence," "informal probation," or "court probation"). Pen C §1203(a). "Probation is generally reserved for convicted criminals whose conditional release into society poses minimal risk to public safety and promotes rehabilitation." People v Carbajal (1995) 10 C4th 1114, 1120, 43 CR2d 681. Probation can be conditioned on serving a period of incarceration in county jail (Pen C §1203.1) and on conditions reasonably related to the offense (People v Lent (1975) 15 C3d 481, 124 CR 905), e.g., that the defendant in a driving under the influence case is to refrain from drinking alcoholic beverages or that the defendant in a theft case is to make restitution to the victim. The trial courts have broad discretion to impose conditions that foster the defendant's rehabilitation and protect the public safety. People v Carbajal, supra.

In felony cases, the court has discretion to grant probation for up to 5 years, or no longer than the prison term that can be imposed when the prison term exceeds 5 years. Pen C §1203.1.

In misdemeanor cases, the court may generally grant probation for up to 3 years, or no longer than the consecutive sentence that could be imposed if more than 3 years. Pen C §1203a; People v Powell (1985) 166 CA3d Supp 12, 26, 212 CR 454. Probation can extend for 5 years in misdemeanor cases of driving under the influence (Veh C §23600(b)(1)), being under the influence of a controlled substance (Health & S C §11550(a)), and for contributing to the delinquency of a minor (Pen C §272).

In limited circumstances, probation may be extended beyond the maximum term. See §§38.43, 46.11.

Probation report. A probation report is prepared by a probation officer at the court's direction after a plea or trial to assist the judge in making a sentencing decision. Preplea probation reports are authorized by statute (see Pen C §1203.7) but are rarely available because of budget constraints. See also §§27.27-27.28. Courts often follow the probation officer's recommendation. It is therefore important that counsel give any information to the probation officer that counsel thinks is important, e.g., names of persons to be contacted, psychiatric or medical reports, or a transcript of portions of trial testimony. The probation officer otherwise may not locate these persons or this information.

Defense counsel's role. Competent representation demands that defense counsel be aware of sentencing alternatives and the availability of rehabilitation centers and similar programs in the community, help the client find a suitable program, and advocate that sentencing alternative. People v Scott (1994) 9 C4th 331, 351, 36 CR2d 627. Counsel should begin planning for sentencing when he or she first receives the case. If the client's release from jail can be obtained, counsel should refer the client for needed services, e.g., psychiatry, a substance abuse program, or medical help, and see that he or she obtains a job, if possible, or becomes a full-time student. The court is much more likely to grant probation to a client who is employed or in school than to one who is neither and has no plans for the future.

If a defendant is granted probation, counsel should review with the defendant any conditions of probation, the consequences of a probation revocation, and the possibility of relief from penalties at the end of the probationary period. Some attorneys calendar the date that each client's probation period ends and send the client a letter as a reminder of the relief from penalties procedure.

Most attorneys withdraw from a case when the defendant is sentenced. Court-appointed attorneys must usually withdraw before they can obtain payment for their services. Public defenders withdraw so that financial eligibility can be redetermined if there is a probation revocation. Private attorneys withdraw so that new fee arrangements can be agreed to for any further representation.

Prosecutor's role. The prosecutor should convey to the probation officer all information he or she thinks is important in each case. The prosecutor should particularly inform the probation officer of information of which he or she would not otherwise be aware, e.g., that the defendant has threatened the victim.

Scope of chapter. This chapter does not cover probation in juvenile cases. See chap 56 (juvenile delinquency proceedings).

§38.2 II. CHART: DEADLINES

Action	Deadline	Authority
Request preplea probation investigation and report.	Any time before plea or trial.	See Pen C §1203.7 (not direct authority, but relied on because it allows probation report before plea has been entered).
Pronouncement of judgment when misdemeanant referred for probation report.	Within 20 judicial days after conviction. Time may be extended up to 90 calendar days on request of defendant or probation officer. If court has reasonable ground for believing defendant to be insane, time can be extended until sanity issue is decided.	Pen C §1449.
Pronouncement of judgment when felon referred for probation report.	Within 20 judicial days after conviction; this time may be extended until the probation officer's report is received. If an issue, time may be extended until defendant's sanity is decided. Time is extended if defendant is sent to diagnostic facility under Pen C §1203.03.	Pen C §1191.
Probation report to be made available to court and parties in misdemeanor cases.	At least 2 days before sentencing date or, at defendant's request, 5 days before sentencing date.	Pen C §1203d.
Probation report to be made available to court and parties in felony cases.	At least 5 days before the sentencing date or, at request of defense attorney or prosecutor, 9 days before sentencing date.	Pen C §1203(b)(2)(E).
Counsel to file statement in mitigation or aggravation.	At least 4 days before sentencing date.	Pen C §1170(b); Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(a).

III. ELIGIBILITY FOR PROBATION

§38.3 A. General Rules

Persons convicted of misdemeanors or infractions, and most felonies, are eligible for probation, the sentencing court having discretion to decide their suitability for probation under Pen C §§1203(b)(3) (felons) and 1203a (misdemeanants). See Cal Rules of Ct 4.414 (criteria affecting probation).

In infraction and misdemeanor cases, all courts have the power to suspend the imposition or execution of a sentence and grant a conditional sentence, without referral to the probation officer. The defendant then reports only to the court unless the court orders otherwise. Pen C §1203b. This is commonly called "court probation," "bench probation," or "informal probation."

Certain convicted felons, because of the nature of the offense (e.g., a forcible sex crime), circumstances of the offense (e.g., firearm use), or the nature and number of the defendant's prior convictions, are not eligible for probation. See chart in §37.52 (persons ineligible for probation). Other felons are presumptively ineligible for probation but may be granted probation in an unusual case. See §37.53 (restricted eligibility).

If the defendant's case falls within one of the "presumptively ineligible" statutes, the defendant carries the burden of demonstrating at the sentencing hearing that his or her case is sufficiently distinguishable from others covered by the statute to be identified as "unusual." The criteria affecting when probation should be granted in these cases are set out in Cal Rules of Ct 4.413. See People v Stuart (2007) 156 CA4th 165, 178, 67 CR3d 129; People v Superior Court (Dorsey) (1996) 50 CA4th 1216, 1225, 58 CR2d 165. See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.408 (court may also rely on additional criteria that are reasonably related). The defense attorney, victim, and prosecutor may include any relevant criteria affecting probation in the unusual case in their statements in mitigation or aggravation filed with the court under Pen C §1170(b).

For discussion of when the court may consider evidence of other crimes in determining probation eligibility, see §§38.16-38.18.

When a defendant is convicted of committing a lewd and lascivious act upon a child under the age of 14, Pen C §288.1 requires a report from a reputable mental health professional before a judge can grant probation. See People v Lamb (1999) 76 CA4th 664, 673, 90 CR2d 565. See also Pen C §1203.066 (eligibility in child molestation cases); People v Wills (2008) 160 CA4th 728, 737, 73 CR3d 104 (court may grant probation when defendant meets all criteria of Pen C §1203.066, including that probation is in best interest of child victim; when victim is no longer a child at sentencing, court has no authority to grant probation).

B. Rules Applicable to Nonviolent Drug Possession Offenses (Proposition 36)

§38.4 1. Basic Provisions

The provisions of Proposition 36, the Substance Abuse and Crime Prevention Act of 2000, relating to probation and probation revocation, are codified at Pen C §§1210-1210.1. Other provisions of the Act are codified at Pen C §3063.1 (parole), and Health & S C §§11999.4-11999.13 (funding). On Proposition 36 parole provisions, see §47.30.

Ø Note: The judgment enjoining the enforcement of SB 1137 has been affirmed. See Gardner v Schwarzenegger (2009) 178 CA4th 1366, 1377, 101 CR3d 229. Senate Bill 1137 was signed into law in 2006 and amended the provisions of Proposition 36 to permit, among other things, the incarceration of offenders placed on Proposition 36 probation who relapse during treatment. Counsel and the court should be careful to refer to the pre-amendment version of Pen C §1210.1 because the amended version still appears "on the books."

Proposition 36 mandates probation and drug treatment for defendants convicted of a "nonviolent drug possession offense," prohibits incarceration as a condition of probation, and establishes procedures for violations of probation or parole that involve nonviolent drug offenses.

"Nonviolent drug possession offenses" are defined as unlawful personal use, possession for personal use, or transportation for personal use of any controlled substance identified in Health & S C §§11054 (including heroin, LSD, cocaine base, and marijuana), 11055 (including opium, cocaine, methamphetamine, PCP, methadone, and Khat), 11056, 11057, and 11058. Pen C §1210.

§38.5 2. Statutory Exclusions

Penal Code §1210.1(b)(1)-(5) excludes five categories of defendants:

(1) Any defendant previously convicted of any serious or violent felony listed in Pen C §667.5(c) or §1192.7(c), "unless the nonviolent drug possession offense occurred after a period of 5 years in which the defendant remained free of both prison custody and the commission of an offense that results in (A) a felony conviction other than a nonviolent drug possession offense or (B) a misdemeanor conviction involving physical injury or the threat of physical injury to another person."

Ø Note: The 5-year prison-free, offense-free period is the 5 years immediately before the new crime. People v Superior Court (Martinez) (2002) 104 CA4th 692, 128 CR2d 372; People v Superior Court (Turner) (2002) 97 CA4th 1222, 119 CR2d 170. The washout period starts on the date of commission of a disqualifying offense, not the date of conviction. Pen C §1210.1(b)(1). This means that a conviction of a disqualifying offense within 5 years of the commission of a nonviolent drug possession offense does not necessarily disqualify the defendant from Proposition 36 probation, if the defendant committed the disqualifying offense more than 5 years before the commission of the nonviolent drug possession offense. Moore v Superior Court (2004) 117 CA4th 401, 12 CR3d 383.

(2) Any defendant convicted, in the same case, of any misdemeanor not related to drugs or any other felony that is not a nonviolent drug possession offense.

Ø Note: the following offenses have been held to exclude the defendant from Proposition 36 eligibility: misdemeanor driving under the influence (People v Canty (2004) 32 C4th 1266, 14 CR3d 1 (drugs); People v Eribarne (2004) 124 CA4th 1463, 22 CR3d 417 (alcohol)); forging or passing a forged prescription to obtain drugs (People v Wheeler (2005) 127 CA4th 873, 26 CR3d 138; People v Foreman (2005) 126 CA4th 338, 23 CR3d 714); possession of a controlled substance while in possession of a loaded operable firearm in violation of Health & S C §11370.1 (In re Ogea (2004) 121 CA4th 974, 17 CR3d 698); opening or maintaining a place for the use or sale of methamphetamine in violation of Health & S C §11366 (People v Ferrando (2004) 115 CA4th 917, 9 CR3d 670); concealment of evidence when evidence concealed was drugs (People v Moniz (2006) 140 CA4th 86, 43 CR3d 904); and cultivation of marijuana (People v Sharp (2003) 112 CA4th 1336, 5 CR3d 771).

(3) Any defendant who, while using a firearm, possessed or was under the influence of specified drugs (including cocaine, cocaine base, heroin, and methamphetamine).

(4) Any defendant who refuses drug treatment as a term of probation.

Ø Note: In People v Espinoza (2003) 107 CA4th 1069, 132 CR2d 670, the court rejected the argument that a past refusal to accept drug treatment as a condition of probation was a ground for denying the defendant probation under Proposition 36. However, in People v Guzman (2003) 109 CA4th 341, 349, 134 CR2d 727, when the defendant left the country instead of reporting for treatment and failed to report to his probation officer, to the treatment program, or to the trial court when he returned, the court construed this conduct as a refusal of drug treatment within the meaning of Pen C §1210.1(b)(4). See also People v Johnson (2003) 114 CA4th 284, 293, 7 CR3d 492. But see People v Dagostino (2004) 117 CA4th 974, 992, 12 CR3d 223 (defendant's failure to report to drug treatment "gatekeeper" not grounds for excluding defendant from program under facts of case).

Ø Note: One court has taken note that there is nothing in Proposition 36 that requires a defendant to abstain from all controlled substances, including those for which an established medical need exists and that a physician has prescribed. Therefore, the authorized medical use of marijuana cannot, as a matter of law, render a defendant unamenable to treatment under Proposition 36. People v Beaty (2010) 181 CA4th 644, 649, ___ CR3d ___.

(5) Any repeat drug offender who has participated in two or more separate courses of drug treatment and who is found by the court, by clear and convincing evidence, not to be amenable to drug treatment. If a defendant is excluded for this reason, the court is required to sentence him or her to at least 30 days in jail.

Ø Note: Concurrent treatment for two separate offenses does not constitute two separate courses of drug treatment as contemplated by Pen C §1210.1. People v Castagne (2008) 166 CA4th 727, 732, 83 CR3d 37.

Unlike Pen C §3063.1, which makes drug treatment available to a parolee who commits a nonviolent drug possession offense while on parole for a nonserious, nonviolent offense that is not drug related, Pen C §1210.1 does not make drug treatment available to individuals on probation for non-drug-related offenses who violate that probation as a result of a nonviolent drug possession offense. See People v Superior Court (Edwards) (2007) 146 CA4th 518, 521, 52 CR3d 889; People v Esparza (2003) 107 CA4th 691, 132 CR2d 377. A defendant who is on probation for a drug-related offense but who is not incarcerated at the time of sentencing on a non-drug-related offense is eligible for Proposition 36 treatment. This can happen when the prosecution has not sought to have probation revoked for the prior drug-related offense. People v Superior Court (Edwards), supra.

The discrepancy between Pen C §3063.1 and Pen C §1210.1 does not deprive probationers of equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment. People v Guzman (2005) 35 C4th 577, 25 CR3d 761.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.6 3. Other Exclusions

The First District has recognized a nonstatutory exception to Proposition 36 eligibility when there is a "substantial likelihood" that the defendant will be deported before completing drug treatment. People v Espinoza (2003) 107 CA4th 1069, 132 CR2d 670. But see People v Muldrow (2006) 144 CA4th 1038, 50 CR3d 848 ("substantial likelihood" test in Espinoza applicable to illegal aliens, not applicable to parolees). The First District has also held that a defendant who pleaded guilty to a nonviolent drug possession offense as part of a plea bargain nonetheless was not entitled to Proposition 36 probation, because he received the benefit of his bargain, which included the dismissal of a charge that otherwise would have disqualified him from Proposition 36 probation. People v Chatmon (2005) 129 CA4th 771, 28 CR3d 859.

The Third District has held that a defendant who received a 2-year prison sentence for a felony theft committed while he was awaiting trial for a nonviolent drug possession offense was not entitled to Proposition 36 probation for the drug conviction, even though he did not fit into any exception listed in Pen C §1210.1(b). People v Wandick (2004) 115 CA4th 131, 135, 9 CR3d 167. The defendant was "unamenable" to treatment within the meaning of the statute because his prison commitment made him unavailable to participate in the program. See also People v Esparza (2003) 107 CA4th 691, 699, 132 CR2d 377. Esparza also held that Proposition 36 does not apply to drug-related probation violations for nondrug offenses. 107 CA4th at 697.

§38.7 4. Sentencing Under Proposition 36

Under Pen C §1210.1(a), when a defendant qualifies for sentencing under Proposition 36, the court must grant probation and must order the defendant to participate in and complete a drug treatment program. The court may impose additional terms of probation but may not impose a period of incarceration as a condition of probation. As a rule, this mandate does not permit judicially created nonstatutory exceptions. People v Superior Court (Edwards) (2007) 146 CA4th 518, 521, 52 CR3d 889.

The court may, however, as a condition of Proposition 36 probation, require the defendant to waive custody credits for time to be spent in residential drug treatment. People v Thurman (2005) 125 CA4th 1453, 23 CR3d 659.

A jury's acquittal on possession for sale does not compel a finding that the drugs were possessed for personal use. People v Dove (2004) 124 CA4th 1, 10, 21 CR3d 52. In Dove, the trial court denied the defendant Proposition 36 probation though he had been found not guilty of possession of cocaine base for sale and convicted only of simple possession and transportation. The court of appeal affirmed the sentence, noting that Proposition 36 reduces a sentence that would otherwise apply. Because the decision to deny Proposition 36 probation was not one that raised the sentence beyond the statutory maximum within the meaning of Apprendi v New Jersey (2000) 530 US 466, 147 L Ed 2d 435, 120 S Ct 2348, and Blakely v Washington (2004) 542 US 296, 159 L Ed 2d 403, 415, 124 S Ct 2531, the trial court could make a finding based on a preponderance of the evidence that the cocaine base was not possessed for personal use. Dove, 124 CA4th at 11.

A trial court's finding that the possession or transportation was not for personal use need not be stated on the record but may be implied from the imposition of a prison sentence and will be upheld when supported by substantial evidence. Dove, 124 CA4th at 10. In People v Harris (2009) 171 CA4th 1488, 1496, 91 CR3d 205, however, the appellate court found the trial court had imposed an unauthorized sentence when it sent the defendant to prison for 19 years instead of granting Proposition 36 probation. Given the prosecution's failure at sentencing to challenge the jury's express special finding of personal use, and the sufficiency of the evidence supporting that finding, the court refused to allow the prosecution another opportunity "to make their transportation for sales case by implying the trial court made a finding that it was not asked to make." 171 CA4th at 1498.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.8 5. Violations of Proposition 36 Probation

Proposition 36 entitles a probationer to three distinct periods of treatment, and three distinct revocation motions, before his or her probation can be revoked. Note, however, People v Sizemore (2009) 175 CA4th 864, 96 CR3d 638, in which the defendant "opted out" of Proposition 36 probation after his second violation and agreed to be placed on standard felony probation. The defendant's acknowledgment that he could not comply with Proposition 36 probation, coupled with the trial court's observations that it was not practical for him to continue with the requirements of the program, rendered proper the court's decision to terminate him from the drug treatment program after his second violation.

If multiple drug-related probation revocation petitions are before the court, and if the petitions are filed so closely together that the probationer did not receive notice of one violation before committing the conduct underlying the next, the petitions will not be treated as separately noticed revocation motions. People v Enriquez (2008) 160 CA4th 230, 239, 72 CR3d 718. For further discussion of Proposition 36 probation revocations, see §§46.36-46.41.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.9 6. Successful Completion of Treatment

A defendant who successfully completes the drug treatment program may petition the sentencing court to dismiss all charges. Pen C §1210.1(d)(1). See People v Hartley (2007) 156 CA4th 859, 863, 67 CR3d 667. On the meaning of the term "successful completion of treatment," see People v Hinkel (2005) 125 CA4th 845, 22 CR3d 895. If the court finds that the defendant successfully completed the program and substantially complied with the conditions of probation, the court must set aside and dismiss the indictment or information. The arrest will be deemed never to have occurred. Pen C §1210.1(d)(1). Despite the dismissal, the defendant remains subject to Pen C §12021 (restriction on possession of concealable firearm) and must disclose the arrest and conviction in response to any law enforcement inquiry. The defendant must also disclose the arrest and conviction in any application for public office, peace officer employment, licensing by any state or local agency, contracting with the state lottery, or purposes of serving on a jury. Pen C §1210.1(d)(3). See also §41.17. Note that while under certain circumstances a court may declare an offense a misdemeanor with a grant of probation (see Pen C §17(b)(3)), Health & S C §11350 describes a straight felony, not a wobbler, so the court has no power to reduce the conviction, even after the successful completion of Proposition 36 treatment. People v Myers (2009) 170 CA4th 512, 516, 87 CR3d 916.

IV. PROBATION INVESTIGATION AND REPORT

§38.10 A. Preplea Probation Reports

When available, a preplea probation investigation and report may help ensure a just disposition of the case in certain instances, e.g., when the case involves complex emotional or psychological factors. Although defense counsel may request it at any time before the plea, it is usually requested at the court appearance when plea negotiations occur. For further discussion of preplea reports, see §§27.27-27.28.

B. Court's Discretion to Refer Cases to Probation After Plea or Trial

§38.11 1. Misdemeanor Cases

Persons convicted of misdemeanors may be referred to the probation officer for a probation investigation and report, or the court in its discretion may grant informal or court probation summarily without a probation report. See Pen C §§1203(d), 1203b. The common practice in some counties is for courts to refer all defendants for a probation report unless the plea bargain is for court probation and no jail time, or counsel stipulate that a probation report is waived. In other counties, because of the lack of probation services, referrals are made on misdemeanants only in rare cases when the court is considering formal probation.

Ø Note: If a person is referred to the probation officer for a report, the court may extend the time for sentencing by 20 judicial days. At the request of the probation officer or the defendant, that time may be extended an additional 90 days. Pen C §1449.

The probation report must be made available to the court and the parties at least 2 days before the sentencing date or, at the defendant's request, 5 days before the sentencing date. Pen C §1203d. If the defendant is not represented by counsel, the court must order the probation officer to discuss the contents of the report with the defendant before sentencing. Pen C §1203d.

The prosecution has no right to appeal a trial court's failure to order a probation report before sentencing. People v Eberhardt (1986) 186 CA3d 1112, 231 CR 387.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.12 2. Felony Cases

Felons who are eligible for probation (see §38.3) must be referred for a presentence probation report. See Pen C §§1191, 1203(b). This includes felons who are presumptively ineligible for probation, because they are still technically eligible. People v Bohannon (2000) 82 CA4th 798, 808, 98 CR2d 488, disapproved on other grounds in People v Zambrano (2007) 41 C4th 1082, 1135 n13, 63 CR3d 297. For felons ineligible for probation, a presentence probation report must be prepared to determine the appropriate amount of restitution. The judge may ask the probation officer to investigate facts relevant to the sentencing of the felon. Pen C §1203(g). This is discretionary with the judge, but it is better practice to obtain a presentence report even when the defendant is not eligible for probation. People v Bullock (1994) 26 CA4th 985, 31 CR2d 850; People v Tatlis (1991) 230 CA3d 1266, 282 CR 55; Cal Rules of Ct 4.411(b). In addition, whenever a defendant is committed to state prison, a report on the circumstances of the offense and the defendant's prior record must be prepared and accompany the commitment papers. A presentence report meets this requirement. See Pen C §1203c.

In felony cases, the probation report must be made available to the court and the parties at least 5 days (or 9 days on request) before the sentencing date. Pen C §1203(b)(2)(E); People v Bohannon, supra. The parties, however, may waive time by written stipulation or by oral stipulation in open court. See Pen C §1203(b)(2)(D). This 5-day/9-day requirement applies only to felonies and was enacted to give the parties time to prepare and file statements in mitigation or aggravation. See People v Conners (2008) 168 CA4th 443, 456, 85 CR3d 627 (when parties and court not provided with meaningful probation report and defense counsel requested continuance, court's failure to grant continuance and imposition of sentence without informative report violated purpose of statute). On misdemeanors, see §38.11.

Statements in mitigation or aggravation must be filed with the court at least 4 days before sentencing. Pen C §1170(b). Counsel who needs more time to file this statement should move to continue under Pen C §1050(b) at least 2 days before the hearing.

Ordinarily, judgment must be pronounced within 20 judicial days after conviction. Pen C §1191. However, when a convicted felon is referred for a probation investigation and report, the time may be extended "until the probation officer's report is received." Pen C §1191. See also chap 35 on pronouncing judgment.

§38.13 C. When Supplemental Probation Report Is Required

When the defendant is eligible for probation, the court must order a supplemental probation report for sentencing proceedings that occur "a significant period of time" after the original report was prepared. Cal Rules of Ct 4.411(c). See, e.g., People v Dobbins (2005) 127 CA4th 176, 24 CR3d 882 (8-month interval between first probation report and resentencing was significant period of time); People v Johnson (1999) 70 CA4th 1429, 1432, 83 CR2d 423. See also People v Rojas (1962) 57 C2d 676, 21 CR 564 (supplemental report required on remand for resentencing after appeal).

When the defendant is not eligible for probation, Cal Rules of Ct 4.411(b) recommends but does not require that the trial court refer the case to the probation department. Thus, even when the sentencing proceeding occurs a significant time after the preparation of the original probation report, as is almost invariably true when an appellate court remands a case for resentencing, the trial court is not required to obtain a current probation report if the defendant is ineligible for probation. People v Bullock (1994) 26 CA4th 985, 31 CR2d 850; People v Tatlis (1991) 230 CA3d 1266, 1273, 282 CR 55.

Ø Warning: When a supplemental probation report is required, failure to request a report or to object to proceeding without one can waive the requirement. People v Myers (1999) 69 CA4th 305, 311, 81 CR2d 564. See also People v Welch (1993) 5 C4th 228, 234, 19 CR2d 520 (failure to object to errors in probation report waives claim of error on appeal).

§38.14 D. Purpose of Probation Report; Court's Discretion to Reject Report's Recommendation

The purpose of a probation report is to assist the sentencing court in determining an appropriate disposition. The court must state on the record that it has considered the report before sentencing. Pen C §1203(b)(3). However, the court is presumed to have considered all of the relevant factors in the absence of an affirmative record to the contrary. People v Myers (1999) 69 CA4th 305, 310, 81 CR2d 564.

Although the court must consider the probation report (Pen C §1203(b)(3)), it need not follow it. The court has the discretion to reject part or all of the report. People v Llamas (1998) 67 CA4th 35, 40, 78 CR2d 759. The court must exercise its discretion in sentencing matters; failure to do so is error. People v Tang (1997) 54 CA4th 669, 677, 62 CR2d 876.

E. Contents of Probation Report

§38.15 1. In General; Hearsay; Suppressed Evidence

Hearsay is admissible in the probation report as long as it is sufficiently reliable to provide fundamental fairness. People v Otto (2001) 26 C4th 200, 212, 109 CR2d 327; People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 755, 150 CR 778.

The minimum requirements for the contents of probation reports are given in Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5. Several hearsay statements are listed:

- Victim's statement or a summary of it, including information relevant to restitution (Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(5); Pen C §1203(h); see also People v Mockel (1990) 226 CA3d 581, 588, 276 CR 559);
- Defendant's statement or a summary of it (Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(4));
- Letters submitted on the defendant's behalf (Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(7));

  Ø Note: The court in People v Slater (1989) 215 CA3d 872, 263 CR 867, said it is acceptable for the probation officer to summarize statements submitted on the defendant's behalf even though Rule 4.411.5(a)(7) does not list that option. Defense counsel should therefore submit these statements directly to the court in addition to giving copies to the probation officer.

- Written statements from defense and prosecuting attorneys, police, and probation and parole officers who had previous experience with defendant, and from correctional officers who observed the defendant during presentence incarceration (Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(7)); and
- Relevant facts about the defendant's social history, including education, employment, and social history (Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(6)).

The report must also contain an evaluation and recommendation by the probation officer on the defendant's suitability for probation, the relevant aggravating and mitigating factors considered if the officer recommends a prison sentence, sentencing and enhancements, if any, and the defendant's ability to pay restitution. Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(8)-(9). Penal Code §1203(b)(2)(D) specifically requires the probation officer to include a recommendation on the amount the defendant should pay as restitution and whether the court should require restitution to the victim or to the State Restitution Fund. See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(11). On restitution, see chap 40.

Illegally seized evidence may be considered in determining the appropriate sentence. People v Brewster (1986) 184 CA3d 921, 925, 229 CR 352 (Proposition 8 abrogated rule that evidence suppressed under Pen C §1538.5 is inadmissible in sentencing hearings; even before passage of Proposition 8, evidence suppressed in an unrelated matter was admissible).

§38.16 2. Prior Criminality

The probation report must include a variety of information about the defendant's criminal history (see Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5), such as the following:

Prior convictions. With certain limitations discussed below, all the defendant's prior convictions as an adult must be contained in the probation officer's presentence report (Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(3)) and may be considered by the court in making its sentencing determinations, including a defendant's suitability for probation and the choice of prison terms within the sentencing range.

Ø Note: Uncharged priors mentioned in the probation report may not be used to determine whether a defendant is statutorily eligible for probation. When a statute, such as Health & S C §11370 (barring probation for offenders who have been convicted of certain offenses), precludes the court from even considering probation as an alternative to imprisonment, the prior must be pleaded and proved. People v Lo Cicero (1969) 71 C2d 1186, 1192, 80 CR 913. When, however, a statute, such as Pen C §1203(e)(4), makes a defendant presumptively ineligible, uncharged priors may be used in determining whether to grant probation, because the statute does not restrict the range of dispositions available to the court. People v Dorsch (1992) 3 CA4th 1346, 1350, 5 CR2d 327. See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.413. For discussion of prior convictions, see chap 24.

Delinquency adjudications. Juvenile court adjudications of crimes committed by the defendant must be included in the report unless the records have been sealed. Pen C §1203(b)(2)(B); Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(3); People v Hubbell (1980) 108 CA3d 253, 166 CR 466.

Limitations. The following may not be included in the probation report:

- Sealed records of delinquency adjudications. If the juvenile court record has been sealed under Welf & I C §389, it is deemed "never to have occurred and the person may properly reply accordingly to any inquiry about the events, records of which are ordered sealed." See below for discussion of prior arrests not resulting in conviction for another possible limitation on the use of juvenile records.
- Marijuana convictions. Convictions for marijuana offenses specified in Health & S C §§11361.5 and 11361.7 are subject to destruction 2 years after the conviction, or 2 years after the arrest if the defendant was not convicted, and should not be included in the probation report (see Health & S C §11361.7) or considered for any purpose by the sentencing court. People v Price (1991) 1 C4th 324, 471, 3 CR2d 106.
- Diversion; deferred entry of judgment. Charges that were disposed of under Pen C §§1000-1001.90 ("diversion" or "deferred entry of judgment") should not be included in the probation report or be considered by the sentencing court if the diversion program was successfully completed. See also chap 27.
- Arrests that did not result in convictions. Arrests and police contacts that did not result in convictions may not be included in the probation report or be considered by the court unless supporting factual information is included so that the court will have a basis for making an intelligent judgment on the reliability of the information. Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(3); People v Gragg (1989) 216 CA3d 32, 43, 264 CR 765.

§38.17 3. Risk Assessment for Sex Offenders

When a defendant is convicted of a sex offense for which registration is required under the Sex Offender Registration Act (Pen C §§290-290.023), or if the probation officer recommends that at sentencing the court order the defendant to register as a sex offender under Pen C §290.006, the trial court must refer the defendant to the probation officer for a report on the defendant's performance on the State-Authorized Risk Assessment Tool for Sex Offenders (SARATSO) (see Pen C §§290.04-290.07). Pen C §1203(d). Note that though the trial court is not ordinarily required to obtain a probation report on a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor, it must obtain and consider the SARATSO results for a defendant convicted of a misdemeanor sex offense. For additional discussion of risk assessment for sex offenders, see §38.35.

§38.18 4. Facts Pertaining to Charges in Current Case

Counts or cases dismissed. A probation report may include, and sentencing courts may consider, facts relating to counts or cases that were dismissed as part of a plea bargain as long as the facts in the dismissed counts are "transactionally related" to the crimes for which the defendant is being sentenced. People v Harvey (1979) 25 C3d 754, 758, 159 CR 696. See People v Lamb (1999) 76 CA4th 664, 672, 90 CR2d 565.

Dismissed counts that are not transactionally related to the crimes for which the defendant is being sentenced can be considered if the defendant consents (called a "Harvey waiver"). The dismissed counts can then be used to decide the defendant's suitability for probation and which term to select. People v Harvey, supra. But even when the Harvey requirements are met and the dismissed matters may properly be considered, the court may consider such facts in making its sentencing decisions only if the facts are reliable. People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 150 CR 778.

> Ø Note: The supreme court has granted review in People v Martin (review granted Oct. 22, 2009, S175356; superseded opinion at 175 CA4th 1252, 96 CR3d 616) and may determine whether counts dismissed as part of a plea bargain can be considered in determining probation conditions without a Harvey waiver.

There is an exception to the rule that, without a Harvey waiver, dismissed counts must be transactionally related to the counts on which the defendant is being sentenced. Penal Code §288.1 requires a psychological evaluation of the mental condition of defendants convicted of certain sex crimes involving victims under age 14 who are being considered for probation. That report can properly include information on dismissed counts. People v Lamb, supra.

V. RESTITUTION

§38.19 A. Available to Victim

A person injured by a criminal act in California has three main avenues for seeking restorative relief (Pen C §1191.2): civil remedies (discussed in chap 40); the State Restitution Fund (discussed in §38.21); and a restitution order from the criminal court (discussed in chap 40).

§38.20 B. Fine Paid by Defendant to State Restitution Fund

With few exceptions, a defendant convicted of either a misdemeanor or a felony in California must pay a restitution fine. The fine does not apply to Vehicle Code violations involving bicyclists, pedestrians, parking, or registration. 70 Ops Cal Atty Gen 172 (1987). For other misdemeanor offenses, a convicted defendant must pay a restitution fine of $100-$1000. A defendant convicted of a felony must pay a restitution fine of $200-$10,000. Pen C §1202.4(b); People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1534, 86 CR2d 134. This fine is to be paid into the State Restitution Fund. Pen C §1202.4(e).

Ø Note: In domestic violence cases, the defendant must pay at least $400, which is disbursed to domestic violence funds. Pen C §1203.097(a)(5).

Courts must impose these fines unless they find compelling and extraordinary reasons not to, and must state those reasons on the record. Inability to pay is not a compelling and extraordinary reason. Pen C §1202.4(c). Defendants awaiting sentencing are prohibited from disposing of property to avoid forfeiture or to lessen their ability to make restitution. Pen C §155.5.

The restitution required by former Govt C §13967 (precursor to Pen C §1202.4) was found constitutional in People v Glenn (1985) 164 CA3d 736, 211 CR 547, and People v Long (1985) 164 CA3d 820, 210 CR 745. Penalty assessments are not imposed on restitution fines. Pen C §1202.4(e); People v Allen (2001) 88 CA4th 986, 106 CR2d 253; People v McHenry (2000) 77 CA4th 730, 91 CR2d 877.

Restitution qualifies as punishment and therefore should be considered in plea negotiations. People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1024, 1 CR2d 902. The trial court must inform a defendant pleading guilty about the mandatory restitution fine under Pen C §1202.4(b), because the fine is a direct consequence of that plea. 54 C3d at 1022. However, when the record indicates that the defendant had actual notice that the fine would be imposed, any error will be deemed waived if counsel does not object. 54 C3d at 1023.

In setting a felony restitution fine above the $200 minimum, the court can multiply $200 by the number of years the defendant is ordered to serve, multiplied by the number of felony counts of which the defendant is convicted. Pen C §1202.4(b). The upper limit is $10,000, no matter how many victims or counts there are. People v Ivans (1992) 2 CA4th 1654, 4 CR2d 66.

Ø Note: The supreme court has granted review in People v Soria (review granted Aug. 27, 2008, S164796; superseded opinion at 163 CA4th 247, 77 CR3d 421) and may determine whether a court can impose a restitution fine up to $10,000 in each case resolved by a package plea agreement, or whether the total fine for all unconsolidated cases resolved by such an agreement is limited to $10,000.

Whenever the defendant receives a conditional sentence or a sentence including a period of probation, Pen C §1202.44 requires the court to assess an additional probation revocation restitution fine in the same amount as the restitution fine imposed under Pen C §1202.4(b). The probation revocation restitution fine is suspended unless probation is revoked. People v Taylor (2007) 157 CA4th 433, 438, 68 CR3d 682. See also Pen C §1202.45 (requiring parole revocation fine in same amount as Pen C §1202.4(b) restitution fine whenever sentence includes period of parole; fine suspended unless parole revoked).

The amount paid to the victim is not offset against the restitution fine. People v Vazquez (2009) 178 CA4th 347, 355, 100 CR3d 351; People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1535, 86 CR2d 134. A penalty assessment is not applied to the restitution paid to the victim. People v Dorsey (1999) 75 CA4th 729, 735, 89 CR2d 498.

In setting the amount of the fine beyond the minimums ($100 and $200), the court must consider the defendant's ability to pay the fine, the gravity of the offense, the economic gain to the defendant, the number of victims, and the losses caused by the crime. Pen C §1202.4(d). A formal hearing is not required, however, and the court need not make express findings. Pen C §1202.4(d).

Under §1202.4(d), the defendant has the burden of demonstrating his or her inability to pay. The defendant waives the issue of the amount and ability to pay if he or she fails to object in the trial court. People v Welch (1993) 5 C4th 228, 234, 19 CR2d 520.

Ø Note: Defense counsel should review the probation report regarding the recommendation for probation and raise an objection at the sentencing hearing if the defendant does not have the ability to pay fines exceeding the minimums.

The trial court must state its findings on the record only if it imposes no restitution fine. People v Menius (1994) 25 CA4th 1290, 31 CR2d 15. If the court finds and states on the record compelling and extraordinary reasons not to require restitution or a restitution fine, it must order community service as a condition of probation, unless it also finds reasons for not imposing community service. Pen C §1202.4(n).

When the court has ordered a restitution fine, denied probation, and sent the defendant to prison, the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) may collect the fine by deducting a minimum of 20 percent or the total amount of the fine, whichever is less, up to 50 percent of the prisoner's wages. Pen C §2085.5(a)-(b); People v Rowland (1988) 206 CA3d 119, 124, 253 CR 190. See generally People v Hong (1998) 64 CA4th 1071, 76 CR2d 23. The trial court has no jurisdiction to modify a restitution fine once the defendant has begun serving the sentence. People v Turrin (2009) 176 CA4th 1200, 1204, 98 CR3d 471.

An appellate court can reverse a restitution fine on appeal if the fine is unauthorized. People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1534, 86 CR2d 134. The appellate court, in deciding whether a restitution fine should be reversed, considers three elements: whether the necessary advisements were given; whether the required waivers were made; and whether the parties adhered to the plea bargain. People v Walker (1991) 54 C3d 1013, 1021, 1 CR2d 902. If a restitution fine under Pen C §1202.4 is reversed, the appellate court has the power to reduce it to the minimum fine and otherwise affirm the judgment to avoid the cost of returning the case to the trial court for a further hearing on the issue. People v Walker, supra. The fine cannot be increased after an appeal, because it is punishment, and an increase would violate double jeopardy principles. People v Hanson (2000) 23 C4th 355, 97 CR2d 58; People v Wardell (2008) 162 CA4th 1484, 1496, 77 CR3d 77. Restitution to the victim, however, is not punishment, but is analogous to a civil remedy. Therefore, restitution to the victim can be increased after appeal, if it is warranted. People v Harvest (2000) 84 CA4th 641, 101 CR2d 135. If the trial court fails to impose a restitution fine and the People fail to object, the People have waived the claim and may not raise it on appeal, because the trial court need not impose the restitution fine if there are compelling and extraordinary reasons not to do so. People v Tillman (2000) 22 C4th 300, 303, 92 CR2d 741. However, when the court omits or imposes an erroneous parole revocation fine, this may be corrected on appeal, even if the People did not object at the sentencing hearing, because a parole revocation fine is mandatory in all cases in which the sentence "includes a period of parole." Pen C §1202.45; People v Smith (2001) 24 C4th 849, 102 CR2d 731. If there is no parole eligibility, a parole revocation fine cannot be imposed. People v Samaniego (2009) 172 CA4th 1148, 1183, 91 CR3d 874 (parole revocation fine improperly assessed against defendants sentenced to life without possibility of parole).

Under Pen C §1202.4(l), a county board of supervisors may impose a fee (not to exceed 10 percent of the amount ordered for restitution) to be deposited in the county's general fund to cover the administrative costs of collecting a restitution fine ordered under Pen C §1202.4(b). People v Robertson (2009) 174 CA4th 206, 209, 94 CR3d 179. However, when restitution is ordered as a condition of probation to be paid under Pen C §1203.1(b) either to the victim or to the State Restitution Fund, the court may impose a 15-percent administrative fee only for the collection of restitution payments made to the victim, but not for those made to the State Restitution Fund. Pen C §1203.1(l); People v Eddards (2008) 162 CA4th 712, 715, 75 CR3d 924.

If probation is revoked or if the defendant violates probation, the court may not impose a second restitution fine because the original fine survives the revocation. People v Guiffre (2008) 167 CA4th 430, 434, 84 CR3d 165; People v Arata (2004) 118 CA4th 195, 12 CR3d 757. If probation is revoked, the court has no discretion as to whether to impose the previously stayed probation revocation restitution fine; imposition is mandatory. Pen C §1202.44; People v Guiffre, supra.

§38.21 C. Recovering From State Restitution Fund Through Victim Compensation Program

In addition to notice of the sentencing proceedings given them by the probation officer under Pen C §1191.1, all victims receive information prepared by the Judicial Council on their rights to civil recovery against the defendant and to compensation from the State Restitution Fund. Pen C §1191.2.

Victims must apply to the California Victim Compensation and Government Claims Board (see Govt C §§13950-13966) to obtain reimbursement from the Restitution Fund. If a victim qualifies for the program, this is probably the most reliable method of redress. Claims to the State Restitution Fund must be filed within 1 year after the date of the crime.

To qualify for the program, the victim must have been injured in a qualifying violent crime. The program offers no assistance to victims of nonviolent crimes. Further, even if the victim seeking assistance from the state under this program has been victimized by a qualifying crime, he or she must meet other qualifying requirements. If the victim does qualify, he or she can obtain an award from the program to reimburse or pay for particular losses incurred as a result of the crime.

Victims may be referred to the Victims of Crime Resource Center at McGeorge School of Law. Their toll-free number is 1-800-VICTIMS and their website is http://www.1800victims.org. This resource center is operated in cooperation with the Governor's Office of Criminal Justice Planning. Victims may also find more information about California's Victim Compensation Fund (VCF) at http://www.boc.ca.gov/Victims. For further discussion of restitution, see chap 40.

§38.22 VI. REIMBURSEMENT FOR PROBATION COSTS

A defendant may be required to reimburse the county for the following probation-related costs:

- Presentence investigation and report (Pen C §1203.1b);
- Probation (Pen C §1203.1b);
- Purchasing and installing an ignition lock device (Pen C §1203.1bb; see Veh C §13386);
- Deferred entry of judgment costs (Pen C §§1001.15-1001.16, 1001.90);
- Drug testing (Pen C §1203.1ab);
- Medical or psychological treatment of the victim (Pen C §§1203.1g-1203.1h);
- Costs of polygraph testing (Brown v Superior Court (People) (2002) 101 CA4th 313, 124 CR2d 43);
- Emergency response (Pen C §1203.1*l*);
- County parole supervision (Pen C §1203.1e; see chap 39 on county parole);
- Costs of incarceration in local detention facility (Pen C §1203.1c); and
- Cost of court-appointed attorney (Pen C §987.8).

Ø Note: Payment of probation costs, either as cash or as hours of community service, cannot be made a condition of probation. People v Hall (2002) 103 CA4th 889, 126 CR2d 916; People v Hart (1998) 65 CA4th 902, 907, 76 CR2d 837. An order requiring the defendant to pay probation costs can be enforced only through a civil action. Brown v Superior Court (People) (2002) 101 CA4th 313, 124 CR2d 43.

Ø Warning: Although a waiver of the right to a hearing on the ability to pay must be "knowing and intelligent" (Pen C §1203.1b(a)), the right may be waived if the defendant fails to object at sentencing. People v Valtakis (2003) 105 CA4th 1066, 1070, 130 CR2d 133.

VII. ATTORNEY PREPARATION FOR SENTENCING

§38.23 A. Waiving Presentence Investigation and Report

The court may waive the presentence investigation and report in misdemeanor cases. See Pen C §§1203(d), 1203b. When court probation and no jail time are agreed on as part of a bargain in a misdemeanor case, it is customary to waive the probation report. Defense counsel may wish to avoid another court appearance and the possibility that negative information about the defendant will be revealed, while prosecutors may consider a probation report to be unnecessary.

© The Regents of the University of California

B. Defense Attorney Preparation

§38.24 1. In General; Pen C §1203.03 Evaluation; Statement in Mitigation

Formulate sentencing plan. It is imperative that defense counsel have a sentencing plan. Counsel should know what sentencing options are available and argue for the least restrictive option. When possible, counsel should help the defendant find an acceptable alternative to jail or prison, and present that plan to the probation officer before the officer writes the probation report. Counsel may also wish to try to obtain the prosecutor's agreement to a specific disposition. See Cal Rules of Ct 4.412(a).

Ø Note: Defense counsel should be aware of sentencing options that may be available, such as residential treatment facilities, public service work projects or community service (volunteer work) programs, private work furlough centers, electronic surveillance programs, and home detention. See chap 39.

Obtain diagnostic evaluation in appropriate case. In felony cases, defense counsel may wish to recommend that the defendant be placed in a diagnostic facility of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) under Pen C §1203.03 for a written diagnosis and recommendation on whether the defendant should be sent to prison. The commitment is for a period not to exceed 90 calendar days. Pen C §1203.03(a). For further discussion, see §§35.4, 37.55, 46.29. Defense counsel is not entitled to cross-examine persons who prepare reports under §1203.03. People v Campo (1987) 193 CA3d 1423, 239 CR 44.

Defense counsel may also wish to send the defendant to a psychiatrist or medical doctor, or a professional that the defendant is already seeing, to get a written report for the court on the psychiatric or medical factors that affected the defendant either at the time the crime was committed (see Cal Rules of Ct 4.423(b)(2), 4.425(b)) or at the time of sentencing (see Cal Rules of Ct 4.408).

Prepare defendant for interview with probation officer. Defense counsel should always prepare the defendant for the interview with the probation officer (see §38.25), give the officer all the information counsel thinks will benefit the defendant, and communicate anything unusual about the case personally with the officer. If the defendant is in custody, counsel should check with the probation officer on the defendant's credit for time served. This area of the law is complex, and it is easy to err in calculating these credits, particularly when the defendant is in custody on more than one case. For discussion of credit for time served, see §§37.54-37.61, 46.33.

File written report or statement in mitigation. In misdemeanor cases, defense counsel may file a written report with the court, furnishing information about the defendant's background and personality and suggesting a rehabilitation program. The prosecution and the probation officer must be permitted to reply or to evaluate the program recommended. Pen C §1204.

In felony cases, counsel may file a written statement under §1204 or a statement in mitigation under Pen C §1170(b). See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.437. The statement in mitigation must be served on the prosecution and filed with the court at least 4 days before the date set for sentencing. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(a). It must include a summary of the facts on which the defense relies to justify probation. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(c). Assertions of fact in the statement in mitigation must be supported by competent evidence. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(d). Counsel may rely on information in the probation report or other reports filed in the case or may produce independent evidence. For examples of mitigating circumstances, see Cal Rules of Ct 4.423. If the defendant intends to dispute facts in the probation officer's report or to offer evidence in mitigation at the sentencing hearing, the statement in mitigation must give notice of that intent and must include a summary of any evidence to be introduced, including witnesses' names and the substance of the expected testimony. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(c)(2). If counsel fails to notice his or her intent to present evidence as required by Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(c)(2), the court can refuse to hear that evidence.

Ø Warning: Defense counsel should not rely on oral argument to establish mitigating circumstances or to dispute the accuracy of information in the probation report. Assertions of counsel are not competent evidence. Additionally, Pen C §1204 requires that mitigating circumstances be presented by witness testimony and a defendant wishing to make a statement in mitigation on his or her own behalf must do so through sworn testimony subject to cross-examination. People v Evans (2008) 44 C4th 590, 598, 80 CR3d 174. While a trial court may choose to proceed informally if the parties consent, and may permit the defendant to make an unsworn statement, counsel should not presume the court will proceed in this manner. Evans also holds that if defense counsel intends to present testimony in mitigation, or if a defendant wishes to testify on his or her own behalf, the request to do so must be timely; if the request is too late, such as after the court begins to pronounce sentence, the opportunity will be deemed forfeited. 44 C4th at 600.

§38.25 2. Checklist: Preparing Defendant for Probation Interview

It is important for several reasons to prepare the defendant for the probation interview: trial courts frequently follow the probation officer's recommendation; and any statements by the defendant to the probation officer will probably be included in the probation report.

The following are some of the issues that counsel should cover with the defendant:

- Inform the defendant where and when to report to the probation officer (assuming that defendant is not in custody).
- Tell the defendant to be candid and truthful in answering the officer's questions (a defendant's credibility is often his or her most important asset in a probation interview).
- The defendant will be asked to complete a probation questionnaire and to provide a written statement about the offense and why he or she thinks the court should grant probation. Defense counsel may want to review the defendant's statement before it is given to the probation officer.

Ø Note: Counsel should inform the defendant that any statements he or she makes to the probation officer about the offense will be admissible as impeachment if for some reason there is a trial or retrial of the charges. See, e.g., People v Pacchioli (1992) 9 CA4th 1331, 12 CR2d 156. Such statements may also be admissible in the prosecution's case in chief. See People v Coffman (2004) 34 C4th 1, 16, 17 CR3d 710. But see People v Harrington (1970) 2 C3d 991, 88 CR 161; Ramona R. v Superior Court (1985) 37 C3d 802, 808, 210 CR 204.

- The officer will ask the defendant questions about the items listed in Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5:
- The offense itself and the defendant's part in it.

Ø Note: If the police reports and preliminary hearing transcript do not accurately or adequately describe the facts, the attorney should contact the probation officer before the interview to acquaint him or her with those facts.

- Defendant's prior criminal and juvenile record.
- Defendant's personal and social history, including information about his or her education, employment, marriage, family, and any personal problems that may have contributed to involvement in the offense.
- The subjects of restitution to the victim and to the State Restitution Fund (as required by Pen C §1202.4). The probation officer will consider the defendant's willingness and ability to pay the restitution fine. If defense counsel has questions about the appropriateness or amount of restitution, he or she might wish to discuss those issues with the officer before the report is prepared.
- The court may require the defendant to pay the costs of the investigation and report and, if probation is granted, the costs of probation supervision. See Pen C §1203.1b; Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(11) (discussed in §38.22).

§38.26 C. Prosecution Preparation; Statement in Aggravation

The prosecutor should inform the victim of the sentencing date and inform the court of any special considerations regarding the victim, e.g., the defendant's threats of retaliation or the need for restitution. The prosecutor should make sure that the probation officer has any information the prosecutor considers important that is not included in the police reports or in the preliminary hearing transcript. Although the prosecutor should not try to persuade the probation officer to make a specific recommendation, he or she should make sure that the officer has complete information about the offense and the defendant, particularly information about the defendant that came out for the first time at trial.

In felony cases, the prosecutor can file a statement in aggravation that disputes information in the probation officer's report or in defense counsel's statement in mitigation and can offer evidence in favor of denying probation or imposing an aggravated term. Pen C §1170(b); Cal Rules of Ct 4.437. The prosecutor must include in the statement a summary of the facts on which the argument for aggravation is based and give notice of the intent to dispute facts or offer evidence. The statement should describe the evidence to be offered and give the names of any witnesses and their expected testimony. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(c). See Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5, 4.421 for items and information relevant to aggravation. See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.408, 4.437(d).

Ø Note: The statement must be filed at least 4 days before the date set for sentencing. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(a). The judge may refuse to hear any evidence in aggravation if counsel does not comply with this requirement unless the judge makes an exception "in the interests of justice." Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(c)(2); Pen C §1170(b).

The prosecutor may wish to recommend a Pen C §1203.03 diagnostic study in felony cases when he or she is not sure that time in prison is needed. See §38.24.

VIII. COURT PROCEDURES IN DECIDING WHETHER TO GRANT PROBATION

§38.27 A. Considerations in Granting Probation

The primary considerations in granting probation are the following (Pen C §1202.7): public safety, the nature of the offense, the interests of justice, the victim's loss, and the defendant's needs. See also People v Carbajal (1995) 10 C4th 1114, 1120, 43 CR2d 681.

When the crime is a felony, the court must also consider to the extent they are applicable, the criteria listed in Cal Rules of Ct 4.410 (general objectives in sentencing), 4.414 (criteria affecting probation), and 4.413 (criteria affecting probation in unusual case). See also Cal Rules of Ct 4.408 (significance of factors; additional factors), 4.421 (circumstances in aggravation), 4.423 (circumstances in mitigation).

§38.28 B. Sentencing Hearing

A sentencing hearing is less formal than a trial; the rules of evidence generally do not apply. The defendant is entitled to a hearing that complies with due process, however, and some basis must exist for believing that the information relied on by the court is accurate. People v Arbuckle (1978) 22 C3d 749, 754, 150 CR 778; People v Tang (1997) 54 CA4th 669, 678, 62 CR2d 876.

The court may consider "the testimony of witnesses examined in open court" (Pen C §1204) and any facts supplied by the trial record, including prior convictions, whether admitted or proved (People v Vatelli (1971) 15 CA3d 54, 92 CR 763). If a probation report has been prepared, the court must consider it and state on the record that it has done so. Pen C §1203(b). But see People v Gorley (1988) 203 CA3d 498, 250 CR 15 (judge's failure to state that he had read report was harmless error because it was clear from record that court had read and considered it). Counsel must object to any errors or omissions in the probation report at the sentencing hearing; otherwise, all claims will be waived. People v Welch (1993) 5 C4th 228, 19 CR2d 520.

The defendant has the right to present testimony or other evidence on the defendant's behalf to assist the court in deciding whether to grant probation, to counteract or correct any portion of the probation report, or, if there is no report, to answer or controvert any information on which the court might rely in fixing the sentence. People v Tang, supra. Defendants do not have the right, however, to cross-examine the probation officer who prepared the report. People v Smith (1985) 38 C3d 945, 960, 216 CR 98; In re Romeo C. (1995) 33 CA4th 1838, 1849, 40 CR2d 85. Nor is the defendant entitled to cross-examine persons who have prepared diagnostic reports under Pen C §1203.03. People v Arbuckle, supra; People v Tang, supra. See People v Cain (2000) 82 CA4th 81, 86, 97 CR2d 836. Additionally, note People v Stuckey (2009) 175 CA4th 898, 908, 96 CR3d 477, holding that while Evid C §703 permits a court to appoint experts at public expense for indigent defendants for purposes of trial, no such statutory authority exists for the appointment of experts for purposes of sentencing.

The defendant also has the right to submit an alternative sentencing report suggesting a rehabilitation program (see Pen C §1204) or, in felony cases, a statement in mitigation (see Pen C §1170(b)). The prosecution can submit a statement in aggravation in felony cases. Pen C §1170(b). The statements in mitigation and aggravation must be filed at least 4 days before the hearing date. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437. A statement in aggravation or mitigation must be supported by competent evidence. Cal Rules of Ct 4.437(d).

> Ø Practice tip: It is crucial for defense counsel to assemble and present evidence supporting any request for leniency. Counsel should not rely on argument to persuade the court. Although the evidentiary rules at sentencing are more relaxed than the rules that apply in the guilt phase of the trial, statements of counsel are not competent evidence.

The victim, the victim's attorney, the victim's parents (if the victim is a minor) or the victim's next of kin (if the victim has died) have the right to be notified of the sentencing hearing and to appear and be heard concerning the crime, the defendant, and the need for restitution. Pen C §1191.1. The court must consider statements by the same people when imposing sentence. The statements may be made in person, in writing, or on any recording medium acceptable to the court (e.g., audio- or videotape, CD-ROM, DVD). Pen C §1191.15. See People v Sanders (1990) 221 CA3d 350, 361, 271 CR 534 (court can properly consider victims' statements related in probation reports). Victims who give statements at sentencing need not take an oath, are not subject to cross-examination, and are free to relate hearsay information. People v Birmingham (1990) 217 CA3d 180, 184, 265 CR 780.

When the victim or other interested parties submit letters instead of testimony, due process demands that the defendant be permitted to read them in advance and respond to them at the sentencing hearing. People v Mockel (1990) 226 CA3d 581, 587, 276 CR 559. See generally Pen C §§1191.1-1191.3 (victim's rights at sentencing). See also Pen C §1204 (testimony in aggravation or mitigation must usually be in person).

For further discussion of the sentencing hearing, see §§35.18, 36.4 (misdemeanor sentencing), 37.51 (felony sentencing).

§38.29 C. Form of Probationary Order; Papers Given Defendant

The court may place the defendant on formal probation, ordering the defendant to report to a probation officer (see Pen C §§1203(a), 1203.1), or on court probation, which means that the defendant is on probation to the court and is not required to report to a probation officer (see Pen C §1203b). In misdemeanor cases, probation is usually to the court. Pen C §1203b.

If the defendant is placed on probation, the probation officer or court must furnish the defendant with a written statement of the conditions of probation (Pen C §1203.12) and papers that inform the defendant of the right, on successful completion of probation, to have the conviction set aside and the complaint dismissed, and the possible right to apply for a certificate of rehabilitation and pardon. Pen C §1203.4(a). The procedure for applying for a certificate of rehabilitation is described in Pen C §§4852.01-4852.21. For further discussion of obtaining relief from disabilities, see chap 41.

Even when imposition of sentence is suspended and no abstract of judgment is issued, the court must set forth the statutory basis for all fines, fees, and penalties assessed against the defendant in a commitment document (probation minute order) "bearing the form and content" of an abstract as prescribed by the Judicial Council. People v Eddards (2008) 162 CA4th 712, 718, 75 CR3d 924.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.30 IX. RIGHT TO REJECT PROBATION

The defendant has the right to refuse probation and undergo sentence, e.g., if the defendant feels that the probation terms are harsher than the sentence imposed by law. People v Bravo (1987) 43 C3d 600, 608, 238 CR 282; People v Beal (1997) 60 CA4th 84, 87, 70 CR2d 80. The rejection must be timely (People v Atwood (1963) 221 CA2d 216, 34 CR 361), but the court cannot make the defendant's right to refuse the offered probation conditional on immediate rejection; the defendant may await an appellate decision on the challenged condition (In re Mackey (1983) 142 CA3d 38, 43, 190 CR 716).

X. MODIFICATION OR EARLY TERMINATION OF PROBATION

§38.31 A. Grounds for Modification

The court may modify a probation order by extending the probation period, increasing the confinement period, changing the place of detention, or revising the probation conditions when required by the interests of justice, and when grounds for modification exist. Pen C §§1203.1-1203.3. The court does not need to wait for a violation of probation before it can modify the conditions. People v Cookson (1991) 54 C3d 1091, 1098, 2 CR2d 176. Examples follow:

- The probationer violates any term or condition of the probation order (Pen C §1203.1 (see also Pen C §1203.2(a)-(b));
- The probationer cannot pay full restitution within the probationary period (People v Cookson (1991) 54 C3d 1091, 1097, 2 CR2d 176);
- The probationer deceives the court at the time probation is granted (In re Bine (1957) 47 C2d 814, 817, 306 P2d 445; People v Haskins (1985) 171 CA3d 344, 214 CR 685); or
- New facts appear (People v Allen (1975) 46 CA3d 583, 587, 120 CR 127, disapproved on other grounds in People v Segura (2008) 44 C4th 921, 934, 80 CR3d 715).

Ø Note: The court's decision to modify probation must be based on new facts or changed circumstances. People v Cookson (1991) 54 C3d 1091, 1095, 2 CR2d 176; In re Clark (1959) 51 C2d 838, 840, 337 P2d 67; In re Bine (1957) 47 C2d 814, 816, 306 P2d 445.

The court has the inherent power to change standard probation conditions to favor the probationer at any time. People v Allen (1975) 46 CA3d 583, 120 CR 127, disapproved on other grounds in People v Segura (2008) 44 C4th 921, 934, 80 CR3d 715. However, a court cannot reduce a specified probationary jail term agreed to as part of a plea bargain without the prosecutor's consent (People v Segura, supra), or modify, on the basis of the defendant's good conduct and reform, the amount of restitution owed to the victim without compelling and extraordinary reasons (Pen C §1203.3(b)(4)). Neither can the court, while the defendant is still on probation, reduce the amount of county jail time imposed as a condition of probation, once the term has been served. People v Mendoza (2009) 171 CA4th 1142, 1146, 90 CR3d 315 (defendant could not avoid deportation by reduction in time originally imposed).

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.32 B. Modification Procedures

Formal probation. The court may modify formal probation on its own motion, or the probation officer, the probationer, or the prosecutor may petition for modification. Pen C §1203.2(b). Any modification must take place within the probationary period (Pen C §1203.2(a)), unless that period is extended. For discussion of extending probation, see §§38.43, 46.11.

Notice of the motion or petition must be given to the probationer's attorney, the probationer, the probation officer, and the prosecutor. See Pen C §1203.2(b). In addition, the court must notify the probation officer in writing of its intention to modify or change the probation order. Pen C §1203.3. The probation officer prepares a report for the judge, who must read and consider it. Pen C §1203.2(b).

The probationer may be notified on his or her first court appearance in the modification proceeding. Pen C §1203.2(b). The probationer may waive the right to be present for modification proceedings if he or she agrees with the new conditions. Pen C §1203.2(b). Before any action occurs on the motion or petition, the probationer must be informed that he or she has the right to counsel. Any waiver of the right to counsel must be in writing. Pen C §1203.2(b).

Informal probation. There are no specific statutory procedures for modification of court probation, in which the probationer reports only to the court and is not under a probation officer's supervision. See Pen C §1203b. However, by analogy to Pen C §§1203.2(b) and 1203.3, relating to formal probation, it appears that the court may revoke, modify, or change its order of probation in the same manner.

For discussion of probation revocation, see chap 46.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.33 C. Early Termination of Probation

The court can terminate probation and discharge the probationer "when the ends of justice will be subserved thereby," and the probationer's good conduct and reform warrant it. Pen C §1203.3. Ordinarily, a defendant who has either satisfactorily completed the probationary period or has been discharged before its termination is entitled to have his or her guilty plea expunged and the accusations dismissed. Pen C §1203.4; People v Hawley (1991) 228 CA3d 247, 250, 278 CR 389. To qualify, the defendant must pay both the entire restitution to the victim and the restitution fine. People v Covington (2000) 82 CA4th 1263, 98 CR2d 852. A court's discretion to set aside a defendant's conviction under Pen C §1203.4 in the interest of justice is not limited to conduct during the probation period, but may be based on any relevant information, including postprobation conduct. See People v McLernon (2009) 174 CA4th 569, 571, 94 CR3d 570 (matter remanded for trial court to consider whether defendant's conduct following a 1995 probation violation warranted Pen C §1203.4 relief).

See §41.15 on dismissal after successful completion of probation.

XI. CONDITIONS OF PROBATION

§38.34 A. General Rule for Determining Validity of Probation Conditions

In most counties, standard conditions of probation prohibit the probationer from engaging in criminal activity and require the probationer to report to the probation officer as directed and to inform the probation officer of any change of address or employment.

Courts have broad general discretion to fashion and impose additional probation conditions that are particularized to the defendant. People v Smith (2007) 152 CA4th 1245, 1249, 62 CR3d 316. See, e.g., People v Tarris (2009) 180 CA4th 612, 621, 103 CR3d 278 (payment for Riverside County Department of Environmental Health's investigation and cleanup costs within court's discretion). Under Pen C §1203.1, courts may impose any "reasonable conditions" necessary to secure justice, make amends to society and individuals injured by the defendant's unlawful conduct, and assist the "reformation and rehabilitation of the probationer."

A valid condition must be reasonably related to the offense and aimed at deterring such misconduct in the future. See People v Carbajal (1995) 10 C4th 1114, 1121, 43 CR2d 681; People v Lent (1975) 15 C3d 481, 486, 124 CR 905; People v Balestra (1999) 76 CA4th 57, 65, 90 CR2d 77. These cases have articulated a three-part test for determining the validity of probation conditions. A condition is invalid if it:

(1) Has no relationship to the crime for which the defendant was convicted;

(2) Relates to conduct that is not itself criminal; and

(3) Requires or forbids conduct not reasonably related to future criminality.

For examples of probation conditions held invalid, see §38.38.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.35 B. Sex Offender Registration Requirements

If a sex offender who is required to register under Pen C §290 is granted probation, the probation officer must give the defendant formal notice of the registration requirements. See Pen C §290.017(c).

DNA samples. Misdemeanor sex offenders required to register under Pen C §290 must provide DNA samples when they renew their registration, if they have not already done so, regardless of whether the conviction that triggered registration predates Proposition 69 and the amendments to Pen C §296. Good v Superior Court (2008) 158 CA4th 1494, 1510, 71 CR3d 125.

Electronic monitoring for sex offenders. Under Pen C §§290.04-290.06, the state is required to set up and implement a program for assessing the risk of reoffense posed by individuals convicted of sex offenses, using a State-Authorized Risk Assessment Tool for Sex Offenders (SARATSO). In Pen C §290.04(b)(1), the legislature designated the "STATIC-99," an actuarial instrument for assessing the risk of reoffense of adult male sex offenders, as the authorized risk assessment tool for adult males. For additional information on this instrument, see Harris, Phenix, Hanson & Thornton, STATIC-99 Coding Rules-2003, available on the National Institute of Corrections' website, http://www.nicic.org/Library/018977.

Penal Code §290.04 also establishes a SARATSO Review Committee, which is charged with recommending risk assessment tools for other groups of sex offenders and periodically reviewing existing SARATSOs. See Pen C §290.04. By no later than July 1, 2008, whenever a probation department prepares a presentence report on a person required to register as a sex offender, it must assess that person using the SARATSO applicable to that offender. Beginning on January 1, 2009, every person required to register as a sex offender under the Sex Offender Registration Act (Pen C §§290-290.023) who has been assessed with the SARATSO and who has a high risk of reoffending will be subject to continuous electronic monitoring while he or she is on probation unless the court determines that monitoring is unnecessary in a given case. Pen C §1202.8(b).

§38.36 C. Mandatory Probation Conditions

Mandatory probation conditions are sometimes codified in the sections following Pen C §1203 and sometimes codified in the provisions relating to the substantive offenses to which the mandatory condition attaches. Counsel should carefully check the substantive charging sections and the sections following Pen C §1203 to determine whether the charged offense has any mandatory conditions. For example, mandatory conditions exist for the following offenses:

- Driving under the influence. See Veh C §§23538(a)(1), 23542(a)-(b), 23548(a)(1), 23552(a)(1), 23562(a)-(b), 23568(a)-(b). See also chap 55.
- Driving on a revoked or suspended license. See Veh C §§14601-14601.9.
- Controlled substances. See Pen C §§1001.10, 1203.076, 1203.1ab; Health & S C §11550; Welf & I C §§729.8-729.10 (minors).
- Assault/weapons offenses. See Pen C §§1203.095, 1203.1(g)(2) (minors), 12021.1, 12025, 12031.
- Sex offenses. See Pen C §§290.016, 296.1, 647.6(d)(1), 1202.1, 1202.6, 1203.1g, 1203.067.
- Domestic violence. See Pen C §1203.097.

  Ø Note: The application of Pen C §1203.097 is not limited to defendants charged with specified offenses; it encompasses defendants convicted of any crime of "abuse," provided the victim is a person identified in Fam C §6211. People v Cates (2009) 170 CA4th 545, 549, 87 CA3d 919 (52-week batterer's course mandatory for defendant convicted of assault under Pen C §245(a)(1) against former girlfriend).

- Economic crimes. See Pen C §1203.044.
- Child abuse. See Pen C §§273a, 273d, 1203.1g.
- Computer crimes. See Pen C §1203.047.
- Offenses on public transit. See Pen C §1203.055.

On misdemeanor sentences enhanced by priors, see §§24.7-24.10, 24.12.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/38 PROBATION/§38.37 D. Discretionary Probation Conditions

§38.37 D. Discretionary Probation Conditions

The following are some of the more common discretionary conditions of probation imposed by the courts:

AIDS education program participation. People v Henson (1991) 231 CA3d 172, 282 CR 222. Participation is mandatory for certain crimes; see §35.26.

Alcohol restrictions. The court may order a defendant to abstain from alcohol in a case involving alcohol or in a drug case in which the defendant admits to having an alcohol problem. People v Lindsay (1992) 10 CA4th 1642, 13 CR2d 676. More recent cases recognize a nexus between drug and alcohol use, and permit no-alcohol conditions even when the defendant is convicted of drug offenses and does not admit any alcohol problem. People v Balestra (1999) 76 CA4th 57, 68, 90 CR2d 77; People v Beal (1997) 60 CA4th 84, 70 CR2d 80.

Answer questions from probation officer truthfully. See Minnesota v Murphy (1984) 465 US 420, 79 L Ed 2d 409, 104 S Ct 1136.

Community service. The court may require the defendant to perform a specified amount of community service. See Pen C §1202.4(n).

Counseling. See In re Jason J. (1991) 233 CA3d 710, 284 CR 673, overruled on other grounds in People v Welch (1993) 5 C4th 228, 237, 19 CR2d 520.

Drug testing without warrant. Subject to the three-part test in People v Lent (1975) 15 C3d 481, 124 CR 905, discussed in §38.34, warrantless drug tests are commonly found valid. See, e.g., People v Balestra (1999) 76 CA4th 57, 69, 90 CR2d 77; People v Wardlow (1991) 227 CA3d 360, 366, 278 CR 1. See also Pen C §1203.1ab; Welf & I C §§729.8-729.10 (drug testing required in certain cases); Health & S C §11551 (when court has reason to believe that probationer is or has been user of controlled substances other than marijuana (see Health & S C §11553), it may, as condition of probation, require him or her to submit to periodic tests to determine addiction to controlled substance).

> Ø Note: Because revocation of probation is a criminal sanction, Health & S C §11362.5 (compassionate use of marijuana) may be asserted as a defense. See People v Tilehkooh (2003) 113 CA4th 1433, 7 CR3d 226. The provisions of Health & S C §11362.77, which prescribe specific quantities of marijuana that a qualified patient or caregiver can possess or cultivate, have been found unconstitutional in that they burden a defense otherwise available under Health & S C §11362.5. People v Kelly (2010) 47 C4th 1008, 103 CR3d 733. Note, however, that in People v Moret (2009) 180 CA4th 839, 104 CR3d 1, the appellate court found the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it gave the defendant a choice to accept a probation condition requiring the surrender of his medical marijuana card or to face jail or prison.

Education or work furlough. The counties can enact ordinances providing for the operation of educational programs, work furlough programs, or both. Pen C §1208; see chap 39.

Electronic monitoring. Electronic monitoring is available in some counties as a condition of probation. Pen C §1203.016. (It is available as a condition of parole under Pen C §3004.)

Effective January 1, 2009, electronic monitoring will be a mandatory condition of probation for all individuals convicted of an offense for which registration under the Sex Offender Registration Act (Pen C §§290-290.023) is required, if assessment with the State-Authorized Risk Assessment Tool for Sex Offenders (SARATSO) indicates a high risk of reoffense, unless the court concludes that monitoring is unnecessary for a particular individual. Pen C §1202.8. See Pen C §§290.04-290.06.

Employment and application of earnings. The trial court may mandate as a condition of probation that a defendant seek and maintain gainful employment, but the court must first consider the individual factors set forth in Pen C §1203.1. People v Hodgkin (1987) 194 CA3d 795, 239 CR 831. The court can also require a probationer to pay any fine or restitution condition, pay support to his or her dependents, and apply his or her earnings as the court directs. Pen C §1203.1. The defendant can be ordered to keep an account of his or her earnings and report them to the probation officer. Pen C §1203.1.

Fourth Amendment waivers. A defendant may waive Fourth Amendment protection. People v Reyes (1998) 19

C4th 743, 752, 80 CR2d 734; People v Bravo (1987) 43 C3d 600, 610, 238 CR 282; People v Medina (2007) 158 CA4th 1571, 1577, 70 CR3d 413.

Home detention. Under Pen C §1203.016, the counties may authorize home detention for minimum-security inmates and low-risk offenders. See §39.32 for further discussion of home detention.

Restricted Internet access. When use of the Internet is related to the crime, the court can restrict access to it. People v Harrisson (2005) 134 CA4th 637, 36 CR3d 264.

Jail term, fine, or both. Jail, a fine, or both may be imposed as a condition of probation in misdemeanor and felony cases. In some cases, imprisonment is mandatory. Under Pen C §2900.5, the defendant must be given credit for any custody or fine imposed for all days of presentence custody served that are attributable to the offense. Precustody credit can be expressly waived as a condition of probation. People v Johnson (2002) 28 C4th 1050, 123 CR2d 700.

No association with other criminals, drug users, or gang members. Probationers can be ordered to stay away from persons whom they know to be criminals, gang members, or drug users. In re Spencer S. (2009) 176 CA4th 1315, 1329, 98 CR3d 477; People v Lopez (1998) 66 CA4th 615, 78 CR2d 66; In re Laylah K. (1991) 229 CA3d 1496, 281 CR 6, disapproved on other grounds in In re Sade C. (1996) 13 C4th 952, 962, 55 CR2d 771; People v Wardlow (1991) 227 CA3d 360, 278 CR 1. A condition requiring the defendant to stay away from other drug users does not violate the defendant's freedom of religion even when the use of marijuana is a "sacrament" in the defendant's church. People v Peck (1996) 52 CA4th 351, 362, 61 CR2d 1.

Pet conditions. The court may order a probationer to keep the probation officer informed of all pets and to give 24 hours' notice before any changes. People v Olguin (2008) 45 C4th 375, 380, 87 CR3d 199 (condition was related to future criminality because it informs and protects the probation officer responsible for monitoring probationer's compliance with terms of probation).

Polygraph. Polygraph testing may be a valid condition of probation, but the court should impose restrictions on the questions. Brown v Superior Court (People) (2002) 101 CA4th 313, 124 CR2d 43. See also People v Miller (1989) 208 CA3d 1311, 256 CR 587; Pen C §1203.1b. See §38.22 on costs.

Possession of dangerous or deadly weapon. In a juvenile case, the prohibition on possessing any "dangerous or deadly weapon" has been found not to be unconstitutionally vague. See In re R.P. (2009) 176 CA4th 562, 97 CR3d 822.

Restraint on employment. The court may forbid a defendant from engaging in a specified type of employment as a condition of probation, as long as the condition is reasonably related to the crime of which the defendant was convicted. People v Burden (1988) 205 CA3d 1277, 253 CR 130 (condition not approved); People v Burden (1980) 105 CA3d 917, 166 CR 542 (condition approved).

Road camps or public work. The courts can place probationers in road camps, farms, or other public work, if available (Pen C §1203.1), and may require adult misdemeanor probationers to work pursuant to Govt C §25359.

Stay-away orders. A probation condition that the defendant stay away from places where minor children congregate may be appropriate. People v Delvalle (1994) 26 CA4th 869, 31 CR2d 725 (condition was directly related to defendant's crime of trying to buy children and was reasonably related to deterrence of future criminality). A probation condition that the defendant in a domestic violence case not initiate contact with his wife was reasonable. People v Jungers (2005) 127 CA4th 698, 25 CR3d 873. A requirement that the probationer report the areas he frequents was held to be too vague. People v Sanchez (2003) 105 CA4th 1240, 130 CR2d 219.

> Ø Note: While violation of a criminal protective order imposed under Pen C §136.2 or §1203.097 may be punishable as a separate offense, violation of a stay-away order—by conduct that is not otherwise criminal—imposed as a condition of probation is not. Instead, probation may be revoked. See People v Selga (2008) 162 CA4th 113, 120, 75 CR3d 453. Protective orders made under Pen C §136.2 are operative only during the pendency of a case; the court has no inherent authority to extend the duration. People v Ponce (2009) 173 CA4th 378, 383, 92 CR3d 667.

Suspension of driver's license. People v Gimenez (1995) 36 CA4th 1233, 42 CR2d 681; In re Gaspar D. (1994) 22 CA4th 166, 27 CR2d 152.

Travel restrictions. Conditions of probation that impinge on constitutional rights, such as the right to travel, must be narrowly drawn, be particularized to the individual, and have a reasonable nexus to criminality. People v Smith (2007) 152 CA4th 1245, 1249, 62 CR3d 316; In re Babak S. (1993) 18 CA4th 1077, 1084, 22 CR2d 893.

Waiver of custody credits. The court may require the defendant to waive any custody credits he or she would otherwise receive if probation is revoked and the probationer is sent to prison. People v Johnson (2002) 28 C4th 1050, 123 CR2d 700. Such a waiver is often called a "Johnson" waiver.

§38.38 E. Invalid Probation Conditions

The following probation conditions were found invalid by the courts:

- Condition prohibiting the possession of stolen property or weapons and ammunition (People v Freitas (2009) 179 CA4th 747, 750, 102 CR3d 51 (modified to prohibit the "knowing possession" of each));
- Condition prohibiting defendant from associating with persons under the age of 18 unless accompanied by an unrelated responsible adult (People v Turner (2007) 155 CA4th 1432, 1435, 66 CR3d 803 (condition modified to require that defendant must either know or reasonably should know that persons are under 18));
- Condition prohibiting probationer from frequenting any areas of gang-related activity (In re H.C. (2009) 175 CA4th 1067, 96 CR3d 793 (condition reversed and remanded for trial court to further define "frequent" and forbidden "areas"));
- Condition prohibiting a probationer from being within 500 feet of any court in which he was neither a defendant nor under subpoena (People v Perez (2009) 176 CA4th 380, 97 CR3d 632 (although gang-related, condition overbroad restriction on defendant's right to access courts when there was no assertion that he had loitered near court or intimidated witnesses; remanded for court to consider narrower restriction prohibiting attendance at gang trials and contact with witnesses));
- Condition prohibiting possession of sexually stimulating or oriented material deemed inappropriate by the probation officer (People v Turner (2007) 155 CA4th 1432, 1435, 66 CR3d 803 (condition modified to require that defendant be informed by probation officer that such material is inappropriate));
- Blanket condition prohibiting registered sex offenders from leaving the county (People v Smith (2007) 152 CA4th 1245, 1252, 62 CR3d 316);
- Suspending a defendant's driver's license for a period beyond that authorized by the Vehicle Code (Veh C §13203; People v Williams (1956) 144 CA2d 144, 300 P2d 734);
- Forfeiture of a defendant's property, when intended to punish rather than to rehabilitate the defendant (People v Fritchey (1992) 2 CA4th 829, 3 CR2d 585);
- Directing a probationer not to move to another residence without the probation officer's approval (People v Bauer (1989) 211 CA3d 937, 260 CR 62);
- Banishment (Alhusainy v Superior Court (2006) 143 CA4th 385, 48 CR3d 914; In re Babak S. (1993) 18 CA4th 1077, 22 CR2d 893);
- Imposing an absolute ban on travel to a particular place (In re James C. (2008) 165 CA4th 1198, 1203, 81 CR3d 846; In re Antonio R. (2000) 78 CA4th 937, 93 CR2d 212; In re White (1979) 97 CA3d 141, 158 CR 562);
- Prohibiting a probationer's association with others without an express knowledge requirement (In re Sheena K. (2007) 40 C4th 875, 878, 55 CR3d 716 (prohibiting association with anyone "disapproved of by probation," but rendered valid by inserting qualification that probationer know who was disapproved of); In re H.C. (2009) 175 CA4th 1067, 1069, 96 CR3d 793 (prohibiting association with "any known probationer, parolee, or gang member"; modified to prohibit association with "anyone known to probationer" to be on probation, parole, or member of criminal street gang); In re Vincent G. (2008) 162 CA4th 238, 241, 246, 75 CR3d 526 (prohibiting association with "known gang members"; modified to prohibit association with anyone known by the probationer to be a gang member); People v O'Neil (2008) 165 CA4th 1351, 1354, 81 CR3d 878 (prohibiting association with "any person as designated by probation officer"));
- Prohibiting a particular type of employment when no relationship exists between the crime and employment (People v Burden (1988) 205 CA3d 1277, 253 CR 130);
- Requiring the defendant to wear a T-shirt proclaiming that he is on felony probation for theft (People v Hackler (1993) 13 CA4th 1049, 1060, 16 CR2d 681);
- Requiring a probationer to report the areas he frequents (People v Sanchez (2003) 105 CA4th 1240, 130 CR2d 219);
- Requiring a probationer to waive his or her Fifth Amendment rights (Minnesota v Murphy (1984) 465 US 420, 435, 79 L Ed 2d 409, 104 S Ct 1136);

- Requiring a probationer to pay costs of, e.g., attorney fees, presentence investigation, probation supervision, or polygraph testing (People v Flores (2008) 169 CA4th 568, 578, 86 CR3d 804 (courts statutorily authorized to order payment of such costs, but not as probation condition); Brown v Superior Court (People) (2002) 101 CA4th 313, 124 CR2d 43).

Ø Note: A defendant can waive a constitutional right and agree to an otherwise unconstitutional condition of probation as part of a plea bargain. People v Bravo (1987) 43 C3d 600, 608, 238 CR 282; People v Peck (1996) 52 CA4th 351, 362, 61 CR2d 1.

§38.39 XII. APPELLATE CHALLENGE TO CONDITIONS OF PROBATION

Defense challenge to conditions of probation. If the defendant wishes to challenge a condition that seems unduly harsh or otherwise invalid, he or she may do so by either (1) refusing probation, undergoing the sentence, and challenging the proposed condition on an appeal from the judgment or on habeas corpus, or (2) accepting probation, after objecting to the condition on the record, and challenging the allegedly invalid condition on appeal from the order granting probation or on habeas corpus. People v Welch (1993) 5 C4th 228, 19 CR2d 520.

Ø Warning: As a general rule, if the defendant does not object to the assertedly invalid condition at sentencing, the issue may not be raised on appeal. 5 C4th at 232. However, the failure to object to a condition of probation in the trial court does not forfeit the defendant's right to challenge the condition on appeal as unconstitutionally vague or overbroad when the claim presents "pure questions of law." In re Sheena K. (2007) 40 C4th 875, 888, 55 CR3d 716; People v Turner (2007) 155 CA4th 1432, 1435, 66 CR3d 803.

Prosecution challenge to conditions of probation. The prosecution, too, must object at trial to preserve the right to appeal discretionary probation conditions. People v Tillman (2000) 22 C4th 300, 92 CR2d 741. However, if a condition is mandatory, an appellate court can correct the condition even if there was no objection at the sentencing hearing, because a sentence or order granting probation without a mandatory condition is unauthorized, and the court always retains the power to correct an unauthorized sentence on appeal. People v Smith (2001) 24 C4th 849, 102 CR2d 731. Note, however, that a condition that must be imposed except in unusual circumstances is discretionary and may not be appealed absent objection in the trial court. People v Tillman, supra (because trial court retains discretion not to impose restitution fine in extraordinary circumstances, sentence that failed to include it was not unauthorized and prosecutor's failure to object at trial waived error).

Prosecution challenge to order granting probation. The prosecution cannot appeal an order granting probation, but may seek appellate review of a grant of probation by means of a petition for writ of mandate or prohibition. The petition must be filed within 60 calendar days after the order granting probation. Pen C §1238(d); People v Bailey (1996) 45 CA4th 926, 929, 53 CR2d 198. See also People v Douglas (1999) 20 C4th 85, 92, 82 CR2d 816 (prosecution may appeal from order declaring wobbler offense to be misdemeanor instead of felony, because it was a challenge to a separate judgment entered after the judgment granting probation, and not a challenge to the validity of the probation order).

XIII. TRANSFERS

§38.40 A. Transfer of Supervision to Another County

If the probationer lives in another county in California, or moves to another county during the term of probation, the court may transfer the case to that county as long as the receiving county is first given the opportunity to confirm that the probationer does reside there. Pen C §1203.9(a). The determination of residency must be given precedence over all other actions or proceedings, except those given special precedence by law. Pen C §1203.9(a). After transfer, the receiving county has entire jurisdiction over the case.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.41 B. Transfer of Case to Another State

Interstate probation supervision is governed by the Interstate Compact for Adult Offender Supervision. See Pen C §§11180-11181. For current rules, see http://www.interstatecompact.org. In practice, only persons convicted of felonies and granted formal probation are routinely referred for compact supervision.

The probationer must sign a waiver of extradition and an agreement to accept whatever differences in supervision may exist between the two states. See People v Reed (1994) 23 CA4th 135, 28 CR2d 509 (Nevada probationer who moved to California was subject to same standards of probation supervision as if probation had been granted in California). Jurisdiction over the case remains with the court that granted probation; if a defendant granted probation in California violates probation while residing in the other state, he or she must be returned to the California court to face revocation proceedings.

XIV. DURATION OF PROBATION

§38.42 A. Standard Term

Felony probation may last for up to 5 years if the conviction offense or offenses carry a maximum prison term of 5 years or less. If the maximum term is more than 5 years, the court may make the probationary period longer than 5 years but may not exceed the maximum prison term for the offense. Pen C §1203.1(a).

With two exceptions, misdemeanor probation may last for up to 3 years if the conviction offense or offenses carry a maximum term of incarceration of 3 years or less. If the maximum term is more than 3 years, the probationary period may be longer than 3 years but may not exceed the maximum term for the offense. Pen C §1203a. The exceptions involve misdemeanants convicted of being under the influence of a controlled substance, or of driving under the influence. Probation can extend for 5 years for these probationers. Health & S C §11550(a) (controlled substance); Veh C §23600(b)(1) (driving under the influence).

If the court fails to specify the probation period, it is deemed to be the maximum period of imprisonment for the offense. People v Blakeman (1959) 170 CA2d 596, 339 P2d 202. If the court orders a probationary term that exceeds the statutory limit, the order will be given effect only for the maximum permissible term. See People v Medeiros (1994) 25 CA4th 1260, 31 CR2d 83.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.43 B. Revoking, Modifying, and Extending Probation

A court may revoke or modify probation at any time before the term expires. Pen C §§1203.1-1203.3. This power includes the ability to extend probation up to either the maximum term or 5 years. People v Cookson (1991) 54 C3d 1091, 2 CR2d 176. New information or a change of circumstances is required before the court can modify the terms of probation; a violation of probation is not required. People v Cookson, supra. A court cannot, without the prosecutor's consent, reduce a specified probationary jail term agreed to as part of a plea agreement. People v Segura (2008) 44 C4th 921, 935, 80 CR3d 715. Nor can a court, while the defendant is still on probation, reduce the amount of county jail time imposed as a condition of probation, once the term has been served. People v Mendoza (2009) 171 CA4th 1142, 1149, 90 CR3d 315 (defendant could not avoid deportation by reducing time originally imposed). For discussion of probation revocation, see chap 46.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.44 XV. TERMINATING PROBATION AND IMPOSING PRISON SENTENCE

When a defendant released on probation is committed to prison on another offense and requests through counsel or in writing to the court, signed in the presence of an authorized prison official, that he or she be sentenced in the case in which he or she is on probation, the court must either sentence the prisoner or make a final judgment terminating the case. Pen C §1203.2a. If, after receiving notice, the probation officer fails to timely notify the court, that court loses jurisdiction. In re Hoddinott (1996) 12 C4th 992, 50 CR2d 706.

© The Regents of the University of California

§38.45 XVI. PROFESSIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF COURT, COUNSEL, AND PROBATION OFFICER

When a sentencing judge receives information from an improper source, that information must be revealed to all parties. If the judge intends to disregard the communication, that fact must be stated on the record. If the judge intends to consider the communication, he or she must give the defense and the prosecution an opportunity to respond. People v Shaw (1989) 210 CA3d 859, 867, 258 CR 693.

Counsel should not pressure a probation officer out of court to make a certain recommendation. See, e.g., People v Villarreal (1977) 65 CA3d 938, 135 CR 636 (district attorney's inducement of probation officer to change recommendation from jail to prison "grossly improper" and probation officer's conduct "totally inconsistent" with function of probation department). Probation officers "should evaluate each case on its own merits, unfettered by fixed and inflexible policies adopted to conform with the ideas of prosecuting authorities." 65 CA3d at 945.

Actions taken by a probation officer under his or her statutory duty to provide a presentence report are covered by the judicial immunity doctrine. Demoran v Witt (9th Cir 1985) 781 F2d 155. Similarly, prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity from civil suits seeking monetary damages if the prosecution conduct is "intimately associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process." Imbler v Pachtman (1976) 424 US 409, 47 L Ed 2d 128, 96 S Ct 984. However, if the prosecutor's conduct relates to his or her investigative or administrative role (e.g., giving legal advice to a police officer) rather than to his or her role as an advocate, the prosecutor is entitled only to qualified immunity: "[I]t is incongruous to allow prosecutors to be absolutely immune from liability for giving advice to the police, but to allow police officers only qualified immunity for following the advice." Burns v Reed (1991) 500 US 478, 495, 114 L Ed 2d 547, 564, 111 S Ct 1934.

§39.1 I. OVERVIEW

When it is not possible to obtain a "no-time" disposition, counsel for a criminal defendant may nevertheless serve his or her client well by exploring alternatives to county jail incarceration. Work furlough, alternative work programs, home detention, and county parole ameliorate the impact of a criminal sentence on the families and jobs of those clients sentenced to county jail. The overcrowded condition of jails also makes such alternatives more attractive to some prosecutors and judges. In addition to reasons of rehabilitation and overcrowding, the California Legislature has found that county parole is "in the interest of public safety." Pen C §3074.

The procedures, administration, and even availability of these programs vary widely throughout California. It cannot be emphasized too strongly that defense counsel considering such programs must investigate carefully the regulations that apply in the county where a defendant is to be sentenced. Defense counsel should also be aware that many counties accept out-of-county referrals to some or all of their alternative sentencing programs. For a defendant facing conviction on charges in more than one county, the availability and standards for alternative sentencing programs may determine where to seek disposition.

Alternative sentencing programs include work programs such as the sheriff's work alternative program (SWAP), work furlough (WF), split-time programs involving in-custody time with intervening noncustody periods (weekender programs), electronic monitoring programs or home surveillance programs (EMPs), or county parole (CP). These options vary greatly from county to county. Information regarding those options should be obtained from individual counties. A chart with contact information and descriptions of alternative sentencing programs available in California counties appears in §39.33.

II. WORK FURLOUGH, JOB TRAINING, AND SCHOOL FURLOUGH

§39.2 A. Description and Eligibility

Work furlough, job training, and school furlough are authorized by Pen C §1208. They are referred to collectively in this chapter as work furlough. These programs allow inmates to continue to work and support themselves and their families while completing the jail time ordered served by the court. These programs also allow defendants to continue their education or receive job training while completing their obligations. Employment "includes care of children, including the daytime care of children of the prisoner." Pen C §1208(j)(3). Juveniles may attend school through a work furlough facility. Welf & I C §927.

All persons sentenced to county jail are eligible to apply for furlough programs unless the court stated in its sentencing order that the defendant was not eligible for furlough programs. Pen C §1208(b). Persons convicted of certain types of crimes, however, may find it more difficult to be accepted on work furlough. Areas that are generally carefully screened are sex offenses, heavy narcotics and drug use, psychiatric problems, a history of violent behavior, and a history of escape.

Persons applying for work furlough must be found to be fit subjects by the work furlough administrator. Pen C §1208(b). Although the court cannot order work furlough to accept a particular defendant (see People v Superior Court (Peterson) (1992) 12 CA4th 16, 25, 14 CR2d 685), great weight must be given to a court recommendation that an individual be placed in the program (Pen C §1208(i)). See also People v Superior Court (Hubbard) (1991) 230 CA3d 287, 281 CR 309 (court cannot order defendant to be placed in home monitoring program under analogous Pen C §1203.016).

Wages earned by a prisoner while on work furlough must be "at least as high as the prevailing wage for similar work in the area where the work is performed and in accordance with the prevailing working conditions in that area." Pen C §1208(c). This is usually interpreted to mean the federal minimum wage. (It is usually applied only to defendants who are not already employed, but are allowed to secure employment or job training.)

Some counties have restrictions on the minimum number of days one has to serve to be eligible to apply. Penal Code §1208(c) prohibits a defendant from participating in any employment, job training, or educational program involving any earnings by the defendant if there is a labor dispute in the establishment. Pen C §1208(c).

If arrangements are made early enough, it may help the defendant secure a more favorable plea bargain. Early application may also prevent loss of time on the job or from school. It is not necessary, however, that the defendant have regular employment, regular job training, or an education program to be eligible for entry into a program. The administrator of a program may authorize the defendant to secure employment, job training, or education and may provide assistance to the defendant in securing employment, job training, or education. Pen C §1208(c).

> Ø Note: Clients who are not likely to comply with the strictly enforced rules in these programs may, in the long run, find themselves in greater difficulties and should be discouraged from applying.

§39.3 B. Availability

Availability of work furlough varies throughout the state. Some counties do not offer it while others have a program capacity exceeding two or three hundred. Although most work furlough programs are administered by sheriffs' departments, some are run by county probation departments and some are run by the county's department of corrections. For example, Napa County's Work Furlough Program is administered by its California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR), while county probation departments administer similar programs in Glenn and Imperial counties.

Many counties now provide equivalent work furlough facilities for women. Counsel for female defendants eligible for work furlough should take note of Pen C §1208.5, which provides that two or more counties may agree to house inmates regularly residing or employed in one county but sentenced in another.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.4 C. Monitoring

Many counties use electronic monitoring and allow inmates on furlough programs to remain at home where they are monitored by video and radio transmitters supplemented by home- and worksite visits by staff. Pen C §1203.016. In addition to being preferred by prisoners, this program has helped considerably with the overcrowding that affects virtually every county jail in the state. Monitoring may be by radio frequency (which requires a basic service telephone line) or by GPS, or both.

The California Electronic Monitoring Association (CEMA) is a statewide association of public law enforcement agencies. Its goals are to provide mutual support, share information, meet vendors, and influence public policy through education and networking. The organization meets quarterly, usually in January, April, July, and October, throughout the state and maintains a "Contact Roster" for each county's electronic monitoring program, and a county-by-county list of the requirements and fees for each program. More information on the organization is available through its website at http://thecema.com.

§39.5 D. Transfers to Other Counties

If approved by the board of supervisors of each county, work furlough participants can transfer between counties. Pen C §1208.5. Because of overcrowding, many counties will not accept transfers. Agencies that do allow or take prisoner transfers often require a formal agreement with the transferring county that covers such things as the following:

- The cost of transporting a prisoner to the receiving county;
- The cost of returning the inmate to the sentencing county if the inmate loses his or her job or is removed from the program for cause;
- The cost of medical and dental care incurred by the prisoner; and
- The cost of clothing and food.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.6 E. Fees

Participants in work furlough can be ordered to pay for board, personal expenses, and administrative costs. Pen C §1208(e). Some programs charge a sign-up fee to process the application and a daily participation fee that can range from $4 to $24 or more. Some counties use a sliding scale related to the participant's hourly wage; other counties charge all participants the same fee. Before program fees can be charged, the trial court must find that the defendant has the ability to pay all or part of the cost "without resulting in unnecessary economic hardship to the defendant and his or her dependents." Pen C §1209. Under Pen C §1209, the defendant has a number of procedural rights at the hearing on his or her ability to pay the program fees.

An employer can pay a work furlough participant's wages directly to the work furlough administrator. Pen C §1208(e). That administrator can then pay the inmate's expenses for board and personal expenses both in and out of custody. Pen C §1208(e). In practice, however, most programs do not handle inmate money other than to collect a fee based on the cost of operating the program.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.7 F. Passes

The sheriff may release inmates on work furlough for up to 72 hours for medical, dental, or psychiatric care, family emergencies, and other reasons that the administrator believes may promote a successful return to the community. Pen C §§1208(d), 4018.6. If an inmate is injured during a period of employment, training, or education, the work furlough administrator may release the inmate from the facility for continued medical treatment by a private physician or medical treatment facility at the expense of the employer, workers' compensation, or the inmate. Pen C §1208(d).

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.8 G. Credits

An individual on a work furlough program who is housed in the county jail, a work furlough facility, or a halfway house is eligible for good-time and work-time credits under Pen C §4019. See Pen C §4019(a)(4). A person not housed in a jail or other institution is eligible for custody credits if participating in a mandatory work furlough program. See Pen C §4024.3(a). A person not actually in custody who is participating in a voluntary work furlough program established under Pen C §4024.2 is not eligible for conduct or custody credits. People v Richter (2005) 128 CA4th 575, 27 CR3d 198. See also People v Wills (1994) 22 CA4th 1810, 27 CR2d 925 (prisoner in work release program who was living at girlfriend's house while working at senior citizens' center not entitled to good time and work time, because not "in actual custody").

Note that the defendant may be asked to waive §4019 credits as a condition of participating in a work furlough program. See People v Fares (1993) 16 CA4th 954, 20 CR2d 314.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.9 H. Escapes

Inmates may be charged with escape (Pen C §4532) for willful failure to return to the place of confinement at the authorized time (Pen C §1208(h)). See Yost v Superior Court (1975) 52 CA3d 289, 125 CR 74. As an example, in the Jail Overflow Program operated by Tuolumne County, the inmate reports to the jail each morning and is assigned to work from there. The inmate reports back to the jail at the end of each work day before being released to go home for the night. An inmate's failure to report back to the jail, either in the morning or after the work day, qualifies as an escape, rather than a violation of the terms and conditions of probation.

III. COUNTY PAROLE

§39.10 A. Composition of Parole Board

Penal Code §§3074-3089 provide for county parole programs. The board is composed of three members (Pen C §3075):

- The sheriff or his or her designee, or, in counties with a department of corrections, the director of corrections;
- The probation officer or his or her designee; and
- A member of the public appointed by the presiding judge. The public member is appointed for a 1-year term and cannot serve more than three consecutive terms.

Members of the board may designate deputies to serve in their place when they cannot serve. Pen C §3085.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.11 B. Meetings

The board must have regularly scheduled meetings with at least two members present. Pen C §3076(b). Some counties meet weekly, while others with smaller programs meet monthly, or only when they receive an application.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.12 C. Rules and Regulations

Each county parole board must establish rules and regulations in writing for inmates serving county time to apply for parole. Pen C §3076(b). A copy of those rules and regulations must be supplied to each judge of the county courts. Pen C §3076(c). Copies must also be furnished to the persons in charge of the counties' correctional facilities, and a copy conspicuously posted in each facility or a copy given to each prisoner. Pen C §3076(c).

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.13 D. Eligibility

Most counties require a minimum portion of the sentence, typically one-half of the total sentence, be served before application is made for parole. Practice varies among counties. Some counties count good time and work time under Pen C §4019 when determining eligibility, and others do not. Some counties waive the minimum time requirement in the event of a family emergency; other counties have no such provision. An increasing number of counties are being forced to consider this option because of jail overcrowding.

The sentencing judge can deny county parole eligibility at the time of sentencing if the time to be served is a condition of felony probation. Pen C §3076(b).

Although all those serving time "for any criminal offense" are eligible for county parole (Pen C §3076(b)), parole boards are generally reluctant to consider persons convicted of drug sales, sex crimes, and crimes of violence. Some counties exclude from consideration altogether persons convicted of these types of crimes.

Ø Note: A defendant cannot be denied parole because he or she will not admit guilt. Pen C §3086.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.14 E. Emergency or Limited Paroles

Most counties have regulations allowing paroles of up to 3 days for family emergencies, or other special circumstance, on approval of one parole board commissioner on short notice. See Pen C §3079(a). In addition, the sheriff of each county has the power to authorize the temporary release of an inmate for up to 3 days for family emergencies or for purposes related to his or her return to the community. Pen C §4018.6.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.15 F. Authority to Grant Parole

Only the parole board of the county that sentenced a prisoner has jurisdiction to grant parole. An inmate who has transferred to another county on work furlough must apply for parole to the county where the sentencing took place. Pen C §3077.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.16 G. Right to Counsel

There is no established right to counsel for prisoners requesting county parole. Some counties allow attorneys to appear, and others do not.

A few counties provide for a parolee to be represented by counsel at county parole revocation hearings. Of these, some counties provide counsel at all revocation hearings, while others apply the standards of Gagnon v Scarpelli (1973) 411 US 778, 36 L Ed 2d 656, 93 S Ct 1756, on the need for counsel. For standards of assistance of counsel in state parole revocation proceedings, see 15 Cal Code Regs §§2690-2701. In addition to counties with no formal revocation hearing procedure, a number of counties either expressly forbid counsel at revocation hearings or allow counsel only to assist the parolee to prepare for the hearing.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.17 H. Notification of Application

The board must notify the sentencing judge of the parole application to provide an opportunity for the judge to make a recommendation. Although the judge's recommendation is not binding, the board is required to give it careful consideration. Pen C §3078. Some parole boards have a rule that the district attorney, arresting agency, or the victim, or all of them, must also be notified of a county parole request.

Applications should be submitted well in advance of the expected date of appearance, which allows the board sufficient time for the required notifications and ensures the applicant that the application will be considered as early as possible. A delay could mean waiting as much as a month for the board's next meeting. Most boards require applications to be submitted at least 2 weeks before the hearing.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.18 I. Appearance

An applicant must be allowed to appear and speak on his or her own behalf at the meeting at which the application is considered by the board. Pen C §3079(b). Some counties require a written request from the applicant before they allow an appearance. Other counties allow an attorney or another person to appear only with prior authorization, and then only when the matter being considered is too complicated for the prisoner to adequately explain. Some county parole boards allow no one other than the applicant to appear.

An application for parole cannot be granted or denied except by a vote of the parole board at a meeting at which a quorum of its members are present, unless the applicant is ineligible for parole by order of the superior court or the granting of the parole is in an emergency. Pen C §3079(a).

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.19 J. Admission of Guilt

An admission of guilt cannot be required when setting terms or discharge dates for parole. Pen C §3086.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.20 K. Length of Parole

County parole may be granted for up to 2 years with such rules and regulations as the board deems proper for the defendant's rehabilitation. Pen C §3081(b). Many counties in which parole is available are granting parole once the defendant has served one-half of the time to which he or she was sentenced.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.21 L. Conditions

The county parole board can impose parole conditions (Pen C §3081(b)), which may include such provisions as seem appropriate for the parolee's rehabilitation. Typical conditions of county parole when the defendant's offense was related to substance abuse are to attend alcohol or drug counseling and to submit to breath or urine tests.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.22 M. Parole Denied

Most county parole boards give a prisoner who has applied for parole written notice when parole is denied. The reason for the denial is not usually given. Some boards allow a rehearing when a parole request is denied. There is usually a waiting period of 30 to 60 days before the rehearing.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.23 N. Violation

It is unclear whether the prohibitions set forth in Proposition 36 relating to nonviolent drug possession offenses or for violating a drug-related condition of parole (see Pen C §3063.1, discussed in §47.30) apply to individuals on county parole. With these possible exceptions, when it is believed a person has violated parole, the board's written order is sufficient warrant to authorize the officers named in it to return the paroled prisoner to custody. Pen C §3081(c). A parolee who leaves the county without permission may be arrested as an escaped prisoner. Pen C §3080.

Many counties do not offer a hearing for a parole violation. Others provide a hearing, but only after receiving a written request. Two parole board members must be present at revocation hearings. Pen C §3079(a).

A parolee who violates parole or any rules or regulations governing his or her parole must be returned to custody to complete the unserved portion of the sentence. Pen C §3081(b). No credit is granted for the time the inmate was on county parole. Pen C §3081(d). In addition, some agencies take the inmate before a disciplinary board and request loss of good-time credits because of the violation.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.24 O. Noncitizen Prisoners

The county parole board can release noncitizen prisoners who voluntarily consent to return to their native land. Pen C §3082. The expenses for transportation and supervision may be paid by the county with authorization of the board of supervisors. Pen C §3082. This section is seldom used.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.25 P. Supervision

Prisoners placed on county parole must be supervised by a parole officer of the county board of parole commissioners. Pen C §§3087-3088. The Penal Code does not describe the manner of supervision, or how closely the parolee must be supervised. Once again, the practice varies among counties. In some counties there is close supervision, including frequent personal contact in the home, while in other counties only written or phone reports are required from the parolee.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.26 Q. Fees for County Parole

A defendant may be ordered to reimburse the county for all or part of the reasonable cost of parole supervision. Pen C §1203.1e(a). However, before the court can order reimbursement, it must determine that the defendant has the ability to pay. Pen C §1203.1e(a). Parole cannot be denied or revoked because the defendant cannot or does not pay the costs of parole supervision. Pen C §1203.1e(f).

Some counties require payment of fines assessed as part of the sentence as a prerequisite for parole eligibility. That requirement appears to conflict with at least the spirit of Pen C §1203.1e(g), which prohibits county board of parole commissioners from having access to offender financial data before making any parole decision.

IV. ALTERNATIVE WORK PROGRAMS

A. Work Release Programs

§39.27 1. Description

Work release programs allow a sentenced person the option to substitute for the jail sentence 8 to 10 hours a day at manual labor or in public projects, e.g., manual labor in support of nonprofit organizations, graffiti cleanup, house repairs for senior citizens. Pen C §4024.2(b)(1), (4). The sheriff may also permit prisoners to participate in education, vocational training, or substance abuse programs instead of doing manual labor. Pen C §4024.2(b)(2). One day of participation is given in lieu of 1 day of confinement. Pen C §4024.2(a). Hours spent participating in education, vocational training, and substance abuse programs cannot be counted for more than half of the hours the prisoner has been sentenced to serve on the work release program. The other half of the hours must be spent on manual labor or public projects. Pen C §4024.2(b)(2). The inmate is allowed out of custody with few restrictions when at work, school, or attending a prescribed program. Work release programs are being used more often as counties throughout the state experience continued difficulties with jail overcrowding.

Any county may authorize a voluntary work release program under Pen C §4024.2. In any county in which the average daily inmate population is 90 percent of the county's correctional system's mandated capacity, the board of supervisors may institute a mandatory work release program in which anyone committed to a county facility must participate in the work release program under §4024.2. Pen C §4024.3.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.28 2. Time Limits

Most counties restrict availability of work release programs to persons serving short sentences, typically 30 or 45 days. However, because of increasing demands on jail beds and financial constraints on county budgets, many counties have increased the number of days that may be served through work release or have eliminated restrictions altogether. Some counties, such as Stanislaus County, have established a policy of granting defendants good-time/work-time credits for work alternative programs.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.29 3. Fees

The county can collect a fee from participants in work release programs to pay for costs of its administration, based on the participant's ability to pay. Pen C §4024.2(e). Most programs charge a sign-up or application fee and a daily fee. The amounts charged vary among counties.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.30 4. Failures

Defendants participating in work release programs must sign a promise to appear at the assigned time and place for their work assignments. Pen C §4024.2(c). The court may issue a warrant to retake a person into custody who fails to appear for work release. If a peace officer has reasonable cause to believe that the defendant has failed to appear at the time and place specified for the work release, and the officer has a written order to retake the defendant into custody, the officer may do so without a warrant. Pen C §4024.2(c). The person in charge of the program may also issue a written order to retake the person into custody. Pen C §4024.2(c).

Defendants who fail to appear as promised may be charged with a misdemeanor. Pen C §4024.2(c). Defendants can also be taken before a disciplinary board and lose good-time credits. See Pen C §4019. About 10 percent of those who sign up for work release fail to complete it successfully and are returned to custody.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.31 B. Accelerated Release

The persons responsible for administering the county jail may apply to the presiding judge for general authorization for 30 days to release inmates because of overcrowding. Pen C §4024.1.

© The Regents of the University of California

§39.32 C. Home Detention

It has become common to use the terms "home detention" and "electronic monitoring" interchangeably. While the law does not require that a defendant placed on home detention must also be subject to electronic monitoring, it has become the standard practice in most if not all counties.

Home detention under Pen C §1203.016 is an expanding alternative to jail. Any county's board of supervisors may authorize this program. Home detention means that the participant must remain inside his or her home during the hours designated by the correctional administrator. The participant may be permitted to seek employment, counseling, education, medical or dental assistance, or training classes. Pen C §1203.016(b), (f). Electronic monitor or supervising devices may be required. Pen C §1203.016(b)(3).

Home detention is open only to minimum security inmates and low-risk offenders committed to a county jail or other county correctional facility, and to inmates participating in a work furlough program. An inmate's participation is voluntary. Pen C §1203.016(a).

The court may restrict or deny a defendant's participation in the program, and may recommend placement in the program but has no authority to direct or order such placement. Pen C §1203.016(e); People v Superior Court (Hubbard) (1991) 230 CA3d 287, 298, 281 CR 309.

Days spent in home detention are considered days spent in custody for purposes of giving credit for time served and for good time and work time under Pen C §§2900.5 and 4019. Pen C §2900.5(a).

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/39 WORK FURLOUGH AND OTHER ALTERNATIVE SENTENCES/§39.33 V. CHART: ALTERNATIVE SENTENCING BY COUNTY

§39.33 V. CHART: ALTERNATIVE SENTENCING BY COUNTY

The following chart provides a county-by-county listing of alternative sentencing programs available in California. These are among the most common alternative sentencing programs:

- Sheriff's work alternative program (SWAP), work release program (WR), or alternative work program (AWP). In a SWAP, WR, or AWP, the offender serves his or her sentence by participating in a public service work project, such as cleaning graffiti or removing litter from the highways, during the day. Typically, the offender goes home at night, but some programs require the offender to spend nights in jail.
- Work furlough program (WF). In a WF, the offender is released during the day to work but spends nights in jail. Furlough programs may also be available for school (SF) or job training.
- Electronic monitoring program (EMP). With EMP, the offender is allowed to serve his or her sentence at home and is monitored through either GPS technology or electronic monitoring. For electronic monitoring, the offender must have a basic service telephone line for radio frequency. Activities are severely restricted.
- Weekender program (WKR). In a weekender program, the offender is allowed to serve his or her sentence in increments. The name derives from the typical schedule in which the offender spends weekends in jail, but many programs permit the offender to serve either weekends or weekdays in jail, depending on the offender's schedule. Some weekender programs do not require overnight confinement.
- County parole (CP). See §§39.10-39.26.
- Community Service Work (CSW). Allows offenders to earn credits for specified work in the community, often benefiting charities and nonprofit foundations.

The programs listed above are the most commonly available alternative sentencing schemes, but a wide variety of programs is available. A few counties have unique programs. Eligibility and fee requirements vary widely from county to county. Obtain information from individual counties.

Ø Note: Some counties accept defendants sentenced in other counties into their alternative sentencing programs. Acceptance of out-of-county transfers varies greatly from county to county and is often restricted to counties with reciprocal agreements. Obtain information from individual counties.

Ø Caution: County programs are subject to change due to funding availability, jail population, and other factors. Attorneys are advised to verify the continuing availability of any program listed here.

County	Contact Information	Programs Available
Alameda	(510) 268-7898 (510) 268-2628 (CP)	SWAP when court ordered for minimal criminal and traffic offenders. Sentences served in 30-day increments, with maximum of 6 days and minimum of 2 days per week. No outstanding warrants. No transfers.
	(510) 667-4486 (EMP)	CP on case-by-case basis; must have served ½ sentence with no more than 50 days left to serve; generally no violent offenders, drug sales, or multiple DUIs.
		CSW when court ordered.
		EMP available for juveniles only.
Alpine	(530) 694-2192	SWAP run by Probation Department. Work in county departments, such as county museum and library.
		EMP run by Douglas County (Nevada).
Amador	(209) 223-6387	EMP for 10 days to 180 days. No GT/WT credit. May accept disabled offenders. Transfers accepted.
		WR available. Minimum days per week/per term: 2 days for 45 days; 3 days for 90 or more days; 4 days for 135 or more days; 5 days for 180 or more days or if not employed. May accept sex offenders and some transfers.

Butte	(530) 538-7471 (530) 538-7545 (EMP)	SWAP for nonviolent offenders; maximum of 120 days. EMP for 10 days minimum; no maximum; must contact 1 week before. GT/WT credit. Transfers accepted.
Calaveras	(209) 754-6499 (Jail-SWAP) (209) 754-6471 or (209) 754-6466 (Probation-EMP)	SWAP with no minimum sentence; no violent or sex offenders or weapons charges. Transfers accepted. EMP for adults and juveniles on case-by-case basis particularly for primary-care or financial provider. From 45 days to 1 year. GT/WT credit. No transfers.
Colusa	(530) 458-5871 (WR/SWAP/EMP) (530) 458-0205 (WF only)	WR/SWAP for nonviolent offenders with sentences of less than 120 days; no GT/WT credit; minimum 2 days per week. On violation, offender goes directly back to jail without a hearing. WF on case-by-case basis. Maximum 7 days; minimum 4 days. Must be employed in county. No violent felons. EMP/CSW with work at least 3 days per month; available Mon.-Sun. EMP for juveniles only.
Contra Costa	(925) 313-4261	SWAP available for sentences of less than 30 days. EMP for 30 days to 1 year. CP for county residents only. Also sobriety monitoring.
Del Norte	(707) 464-8718 (707) 464-7215 (Probation-EMP)	WKR available 7 days a week, in no less than 48-hour increments, for offenders serving 20 days or less. WF/CP available if ½ of sentence completed; GT/WT credit; sentence of at least 45 days; maximum travel one-way is 1 hour. For both WF & WKR, no violent, sex, domestic violence, narcotics, or weapons offenders. EMP generally for adults with medical problems; no domestic violence or crimes with bodily injury by weapon, or minor as victim; no drug sales; generally no DUIs; no sex crimes or assaults against officers. Sentences over 90 days preferred. Schooling allowed, generally court-approved.
El Dorado	(530) 621-6070 (SWAP) (530) 621-6011 (WKR) (530) 621-5625 (Probation-EMP)	SWAP for court-approved misdemeanors and felonies with 60 days or less. No stalking, §290, or long history of violence, drugs, or alcohol. WKR not limited to weekends. Court order required; sentence of 20 days or less. EMP for county residents with sentences from 30 to 180 days. No serious or violent felonies, injuries to spouse or domestic partner, or felony DUIs. GT/WT credit. See http://www.co.el-dorado.ca.us/sheriff/alt_sentencing.asp.
Fresno	(559) 455-5127	Adult Offender Work Program for sentences of 90 days or less; minimum 2 8-hour days per week. Must have own transportation. Transfers possible. Generally no serious felons. WF/EMP with court order for sentences of more than 30 days. GT/WT credit. See "probation department" at http://www.co.fresno.ca.us.
Glenn	(530) 934-6428 (530) 934-6116 (EMP)	SWAP for sentences of 60 days or less. Through Caltrans, weekends only; through other county agencies, weekdays available. WF/EMP with no GT/WT credit.
Humboldt	(707) 441-5134 (SWAP) (707) 444-	SWAP for sentences of 180 days or less; may work every day except Thursday. No GT/WT credit. No sex or violent offenders; may accept transfers. EMP available for juveniles. Generally, maximum of 90 days, no violent felons, prior program

	0600 (CSW)	failures, or previous tampering with equipment. No transfers and no credits.
	(707) 268-3320 or (707) 445-7401 (Juvenile EMP)
Imperial	(760) 339-6229 (SWAP & CP)	WF/CP for nonviolent misdemeanants not already on probation. For CP, no violent offenders; participation voids credits; must have served ½ of sentence; no previous parole violations; not currently on probation or parole. For WF, must be employed or enrolled in school; must be court-ordered; employer must approve; generally no transfers.
	(760) 339-6387 (drug & alcohol)	WKR for weekends only with fee; must be court ordered. Inmate Work Program for sentenced inmates; may obtain early release with good behavior. Breaking Free Program offers drug or alcohol treatment in jail two or more times per week; 7-week program with credit at completion; transfers accepted; no residential beds. EMP with no GT/WT credits. §40.1 I. OVERVIEW

The original purpose of victim restitution was to rehabilitate the defendant. People v Richards (1976) 17 C3d 614, 620, 131 CR 537, overruled on other grounds in People v Carbajal (1995) 10 C4th 1114, 1126 n13, 43 CR2d 681. See also Kelly v Robinson (1986) 479 US 36, 52, 93 L Ed 2d 216, 230, 107 S Ct 353. In California, victim restitution has been transformed from a simple sentencing issue into a powerful right of the victim. Now all persons who suffer losses as a result of criminal activity have the right to restitution from those convicted of that crime. Cal Const art I, §28(b); Pen C §1202.4(a)(1); Welf & I C §730.6. A sentence without victim restitution is invalid. People v Rowland (1997) 51 CA4th 1745, 1751, 60 CR2d 351.

Criminal defense counsel should realize that restitution can affect many areas of practice, including the fee agreement, bail, plea bargaining, sentencing, and counsel's postsentencing responsibilities. For prosecutors, restitution presents an opportunity to help victims in a positive way. The district attorney is authorized to provide specific help to victims to aid in the collection of restitution. Pen C §1202.4(h).

The victim's right to restitution cannot be deferred pending civil or administrative remedies. In re Brittany L. (2002) 99 CA4th 1381, 1390, 122 CR2d 376. A release given to the defendant by the victim in a civil case does not bar restitution. People v Bernal (2002) 101 CA4th 155, 123 CR2d 622.

A plea agreement may not fix victim restitution at less than the full amount due, because the prosecution may not negotiate victim restitution. People v Brown (2007) 147 CA4th 1213, 1225, 54 CR3d 887.

Other types of restitution, the restitution fine, and reimbursement from the state Restitution Fund are discussed in §§38.12-38.14.

II. VICTIM'S RIGHT TO RESTITUTION

§40.2 A. Victim Defined

The victim of a crime who has sustained economic loss as a result of that crime is entitled to restitution from the defendant. Cal Const art I, §28(e); Pen C §1202.4.

The term "victim" includes any individual who has suffered direct or threatened physical, psychological, or financial harm as the result of criminal activity (Cal Const art I, §28(e)); the immediate surviving family of the actual victim (Pen C §1202.4(k)(1)); and any person who has sustained economic loss as a result of a crime and who meets any of the following conditions (Pen C §1202.4(k)(3)):

- At the time of the crime was the parent, grandparent, sibling, spouse, child, or grandchild of the victim. See, e.g., People v Giordano (2007) 42 C4th 644, 663, 68 CR3d 51 (spouse); People v O'Neal (2004) 122 CA4th 817, 820, 19 CR3d 202 (brother of child molestation victim entitled to restitution for counseling).
- At the time of the crime was living in the household of the victim.
- At the time of the crime was a person who had previously lived in the household of the victim for at least 2 years in a relationship substantially similar to a relationship listed above.
- Is another family member of the victim, including, but not limited to, the victim's fiancé or fiancée, and who witnessed the crime.
- Is the primary caretaker of a minor victim.

Ø Note: While restitution is generally limited to economic losses, this limitation does not apply to a felony conviction for child molestation. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(F).

A victim of crime does not have to be an individual. The term "victim" includes any corporation, business trust, estate, trust, partnership, association, joint venture, government, governmental agency, and other legal or commercial entity which is the "direct victim" of a crime. Pen C §1202.4(k)(2); People v Slattery (2008) 167 CA4th 1091, 1095, 84 CR3d 672 (hospital that treated victim not direct victim of defendant's crime). See, e.g., People v Crow (1993) 6 C4th 952, 26 CR2d 1 (county social services agency awarded restitution after defendant convicted of welfare fraud); People v Bartell (2009) 170 CA4th 1258, 88 CR3d 844 (bank was direct victim when defendant forged checks drawn on bank); People v Ortiz (1997) 53 CA4th 791, 62 CR2d 66 (trade association representing music labels was direct victim of defendant's scheme to sell counterfeit tapes).

Government agencies carrying out their assigned tasks are not "victims" under Pen C §1202.4. See, e.g., People v Martinez (2005) 36 C4th 384, 30 CR3d 779 (no restitution to state agency for cleanup costs of methamphetamine lab); People v Torres (1997) 59 CA4th 1, 4, 68 CR2d 644 (law enforcement agency cannot recover money expended in investigation); People v Burnett (1978) 86 CA3d 320, 323, 150 CR 126 (no restitution for cost of extradition); People v Baker (1974) 39 CA3d 550, 559, 113 CR 248 (no restitution for cost of prosecution). But see Pen C §1202.4(k)(5) ("victim" may be any governmental entity that is responsible for repairing or replacing private or public property that has been defaced with graffiti and has sustained economic loss as result of violations of certain Penal Code sections).

However, restitution may be available to government agencies through other provisions. For example, when restitution is ordered as a condition of probation under Pen C §1203.1, the court may order the defendant to reimburse a governmental entity for losses "resulting from unusual expenses directly incurred because of defendant's conduct." People v Rugamas (2001) 93 CA4th 518, 113 CR2d 271. Restitution to government agencies has been authorized for:

- Costs associated with investigating violations of the weights and measures law (Bus & P C §§12001-13741). See Bus & P C §12015.5; People v Ozkan (2004) 124 CA4th 1072, 1078, 21 CR3d 854.
- Expenses incurred in putting out fires and responding to emergencies and accidents. See Govt C §53150; Health & S C §13009; Pen C §§422.1, 1203.1(e), 1203.1*l*.
- The cost of medical or psychological treatment for a minor victim of sexual assault. Pen C §1203.1g.
- The cost of a medical examination performed on a minor victim of child abuse or neglect, or sexual assault for evidentiary purposes. Pen C §1203.1h.

- The cost of medical or psychological treatment for an elderly victim of assault or battery. Pen C §1203.1j.
- The cleanup and disposal costs involved in dismantling a drug lab site. Health & S C §§11470.1, 11470.2.
- Costs incurred in locating and returning a child to the custodial parent in child theft cases. Fam C §3134; Pen C §278.6(c).

When an insured incurs the loss and is reimbursed by an insurance company, the company is not entitled to restitution. People v Birkett (1999) 21 C4th 226, 87 CR2d 205. But if the insurance company is the party that initially incurs the loss by paying sums directly to the criminal defendant as the result of a fraud directed at the insurance company, it is entitled to restitution. People v O'Casey (2001) 88 CA4th 967, 106 CR2d 263; People v Moloy (2000) 84 CA4th 257, 100 CR2d 676.

The crime charged can determine what entity the victim is. People v Saint-Amans (2005) 131 CA4th 1076, 32 CR3d 518, involved a commercial burglary from a bank. The account owner was reimbursed by the FDIC. The bank offered proof that it lost $10,000. Since the crime was commercial burglary, the bank was the victim and was entitled to restitution. 131 CA4th at 1086.

§40.3 B. How the Sentencing Determination Affects Victim Restitution

The extent of the trial court's discretion to impose restitution is affected by whether the defendant is sentenced to prison or placed on probation.

Defendant sentenced to prison. Restitution granted in conjunction with a prison sentence without probation is limited to losses caused by the criminal conduct of which the defendant is convicted. People v Lai (2006) 138 CA4th 1227, 1248, 42 CR3d 444. A defendant sentenced to prison cannot ordinarily be required to pay restitution for losses not actually connected to the defendant's crime (People v Scroggins (1987) 191 CA3d 502, 506, 236 CR 569) nor for losses arising out of a charge of which the defendant is acquitted (People v Percelle (2005) 126 CA4th 164, 178, 23 CR3d 731). However, if a defendant sentenced to prison without probation gives a waiver under People v Harvey (1979) 25 C3d 754, 758, 159 CR 696, restitution may extend to victims under counts of which the defendant was not convicted. See People v Beck (1993) 17 CA4th 209, 215, 21 CR2d 250. On Harvey waivers generally, see §38.11; on Harvey waivers and restitution, see §40.4.

Restitution as condition of probation. If a defendant is granted probation, the discretion of the court to order restitution as a condition of probation is quite broad. The court's authority is limited only by the requirement that the restitution condition be reasonably related either to the crime of which the defendant was convicted or to the goal of deterring future criminality. Pen C §1203.1(j); People v Giordano (2007) 42 C4th 644, 663 n7, 68 CR3d 51; People v Carbajal (1995) 10 C4th 1114, 1120, 43 CR2d 681. See also Welf & I C §730(b); In re G.V. (2008) 167 CA4th 1244, 1249, 84 CR3d 809 (juveniles). Under Pen C §1203.1(j), courts can order as a condition of probation restitution to victims of noncriminal conduct related to defendant's crime, victims of dismissed and uncharged counts, and victims of conduct that resulted in acquittal. See Carbajal, 10 C4th at 1120. For further discussion of restitution and probation, see §40.16.

Ø Note: Some of the discussion in this chapter related to victim restitution may not apply to restitution ordered as a condition of probation. For example, the definition of "victim" (see §40.2) and the types of losses covered by victim restitution (see §40.6) do not limit restitution ordered as a condition of probation.

§40.4 C. Victim Restitution May Be Based on Dismissed Counts

A defendant may be required to pay victim restitution to victims in dismissed counts if the conviction on the remaining count(s) is made with a Harvey waiver. Pen C §1192.3; People v Ozkan (2004) 124 CA4th 1072, 1078, 21 CR3d 854. See People v Harvey (1979) 25 C3d 754, 758, 159 CR 696 (when plea bargain includes dismissal of some counts, trial court may not use dismissed counts as basis for imposing punishment without waiver by defendant). With a waiver, the plea agreement need not specifically refer to restitution on the dismissed counts in order for restitution to be imposed. People v Campbell (1994) 21 CA4th 825, 830, 26 CR2d 433.

A Harvey waiver may encompass unfiled charges; when it does, the court may base a restitution order on these uncharged offenses. People v Goulart (1990) 224 CA3d 71, 273 CR 477. When the defendant denies having committed uncharged or dismissed offenses, the prosecution has the burden of proving the defendant's culpability by a preponderance of the evidence. People v Baumann (1985) 176 CA3d 67, 80, 222 CR 32.

> Ø Note: Disputes over culpability can be avoided by having the plea agreement pinpoint the matters on which the court may order restitution. People v Moser (1996) 50 CA4th 130, 133, 57 CR2d 647.

The court may make a valid restitution order under a Harvey waiver even when it does not place the defendant on probation. See People v Beck (1993) 17 CA4th 209, 21 CR2d 250 (defendant sentenced to prison). Note that a juvenile defendant has been ordered as a condition of probation under Welf & I C §730 to pay restitution on dismissed counts even without a Harvey waiver. See In re T.C. (2009) 173 CA4th 837, 843, 93 CR3d 447.

§40.5 D. When Amount of Victim Restitution May Be Determined

The amount of victim restitution may be determined at any time after a conviction. If the amount cannot be determined at the time of sentencing, the court retains jurisdiction to determine and set the amount. Pen C §§1202.4(f), 1202.46; People v Amin (2000) 85 CA4th 58, 101 CR2d 756 (plea bargain). In juvenile delinquency cases, when the amount of loss cannot be ascertained at the time of sentencing, the court can direct the probation officer to determine the amount of restitution. Welf & I C §730.6(h). See In re Karen A. (2004) 115 CA4th 504, 511, 9 CR3d 369.

If a court has ordered restitution in an amount to be determined, neither the passage of several years from initial sentencing nor the defendant's completion of his or her sentence causes the court to lose jurisdiction for the purposes of determining the amount of restitution. People v Bufford (2007) 146 CA4th 966, 53 CR3d 273. Even if the court fails to retain jurisdiction, a restitution order can be modified at the request of the prosecutor, the victim, or the court on its own motion. Pen C §1202.46; People v Moreno (2003) 108 CA4th 1, 9, 132 CR2d 918.

Victim restitution may be subsequently calculated and ordered even if a defendant is not advised of it at the time of sentencing. Pen C §1202.46; Moreno, 108 CA4th at 9 (sentence that fails to impose restitution is invalid sentence that can be corrected any time). In People v Collins (2003) 111 CA4th 726, 3 CR3d 889, the court of appeal held that the trial court's failure to advise the defendant of direct victim restitution, though error, did not entitle him to withdraw his plea when the amount of restitution ordered was within the range of restitution fines that defendant was advised he might have to pay.

Determination of the amount of restitution after remand is not double jeopardy, and the doctrines of estoppel and waiver do not apply to bar the determination. People v Harvest (2000) 84 CA4th 641, 101 CR2d 135.

§40.6 E. Types of Losses for Which Restitution May Be Ordered

Under Pen C §1202.4(f), all types of economic losses are eligible for restitution. Although Welf & I C §730.6(h) lists only certain economic losses for which a juvenile may pay restitution, this list is not exclusive and restitution in juvenile cases is meant to include all economic losses. In re M.W. (2008) 169 CA4th 1, 86 CR3d 545.

Economic losses include the following:

- The value of stolen or damaged property. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(A). "Value" is usually replacement value and may be determined by reference to the cost (People v Foster (1993) 14 CA4th 939, 946, 18 CR2d 1), but if the property (e.g., securities) has appreciated, the appreciated value may be considered (People v Tucker (1995) 37 CA4th 1, 4, 44 CR2d 1).
- Medical expenses (Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(B)), including future medical expenses. People v Phelps (1996) 41 CA4th 946, 48 CR2d 855. See People v Keichler (2005) 129 CA4th 1039, 29 CR3d 120 (defendant properly ordered to reimburse victim for cost of Hmong healing ceremonies, which were Hmong equivalent of Western medical expenses).
- Mental health counseling expenses. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(C).
- Lost wages and profits. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(C)-(D). Examples are wages lost because of attending court proceedings, even when testimony was not required (People v Moore (2009) 177 CA4th 1229, 1231, 99 CR3d 555); lost sick leave (In re K.F. (2009) 173 CA4th 655, 666, 92 CR3d 784); future lost wages (People v Millard (2009) 175 CA4th 7, 30, 95 CR3d 751); attending trial (People v Crisler (2008) 165 CA4th 1503, 1509, 81 CR3d 887); and psychological trauma (People v Brasure (2008) 42 C4th 1037, 1075, 71 CR3d 675); and profits lost because of criminal counterfeiting (People v Ortiz (1997) 53 CA4th 791, 800, 62 CR2d 66). When computing lost profits, the correct measure is gross profits. People v Thygesen (1999) 69 CA4th 988, 994, 81 CR2d 886.
- Relocation and security expenses. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(I)-(J). See People v Mearns (2002) 97 CA4th 493, 501, 118 CR2d 511 (relocation expenses include difference between cost of new residence and sale price of old residence).
- Expenses to retrofit a residence or vehicle, or both, to make the residence accessible to or the vehicle operational by the victim, if the victim is permanently disabled, whether the disability is partial or total, as a direct result of the crime. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(K).
- Child support to the children of a murder victim. Pen C §1203.1(j); People v Clark (1982) 130 CA3d 371, 384, 181 CR 682.
- Loss of future economic support to surviving spouse caused by murder of spouse. People v Giordano (2007) 42 C4th 644, 68 CR3d 51.
- Investigative expenses incurred by the victim related to the criminal case (People v Ortiz (1997) 53 CA4th 791, 797, 62 CR2d 66) or in a civil case between the victim and the defendant based on the same facts as the conviction (People v Maheshwari (2003) 107 CA4th 1406, 1409, 132 CR2d 903).
- Loss of use. People v Thygesen (1999) 69 CA4th 988, 995, 81 CR2d 886.
- Lost employee time (measured by costs of salary and benefits of employees who must spend time dealing with defendant's crime). In re Johnny M. (2002) 100 CA4th 1128, 123 CR2d 316.
- Attorney fees incurred by the victim:
- To establish the victim's right to restitution (Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(H));
- To preserve the defendant's assets so that they may be available to pay restitution (People v Lyon (1996) 49 CA4th 1521, 1525, 57 CR2d 415);
- To collect on a restitution order in a civil action (Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(H); Downen's, Inc. v City of Hawaiian Gardens Redev. Agency (2001) 86 CA4th 856, 103 CR2d 644); and
- To pursue a civil action against the defendant based on the same facts as the crime (People v Fulton (2003) 109 CA4th 876, 135 CR2d 466; People v Maheshwari (2003) 107 CA4th 1406, 132 CR2d 903).

Ø Note: The rule on recovery of attorney fees applies in juvenile cases despite the absence of a statutory provision authorizing recovery of fees in juvenile cases. In re Imran Q. (2008) 158 CA4th 1316, 71 CR3d 121.

Noneconomic losses caused by violation of Pen C §288 (lewd acts with children) are also eligible for restitution under Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(E).

Ø Note: Interest of 10 percent per year accrues on restitution orders made under Pen C §1202.4. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(G). Whether this rate applies to restitution ordered under other provisions is undecided.

Other statutes provide for restitution in specific situations, for example:

- Pen C §243(e)(2)(B) (if probation granted after battery conviction, restitution for victim's counseling costs and other reasonable expenses);
- Pen C §262(d)(2) (if probation granted after rape conviction, restitution for victim's counseling costs and other reasonable expenses);
- Pen C §273.5(h)(2) (if probation granted after specified domestic violence offenses, restitution for victim's counseling costs and other reasonable expenses);
- Pen C §273.6(h)(2) (if probation granted after conviction of violating protective order, restitution for victim's counseling costs and other reasonable expenses);
- Pen C §350(i) (restitution to the trademark owner after conviction for counterfeiting);
- Pen C §416(b) (restitution for damage to property after failure to disperse);
- Pen C §484.1(b) (restitution to pawnbroker for losses caused by false representation);
- Pen C §502(e)(1) (expenditures to determine whether a computer system was damaged by a computer crime) (statute uses term "compensatory damages" instead of "restitution");
- Pen C §1202.4(q) (restitution for victims of human trafficking (see Pen C §236.1));
- Pen C §1202.4(r) (restitution to owner, producer, or trade association in cases of criminal recording of performances);
- Pen C §1203.1j (if probation granted after conviction of assault or battery against elderly victims, restitution for medical or psychological treatment);
- Ins C §1871.4(b) (restitution to insurance carrier for fraudulently obtained workers' compensation benefits; see also People v Amin (2000) 85 CA4th 58, 101 CR2d 756); and
- Bus & P C §7159.14(c) (restitution for fraud in connection with repair of damage to structures caused by natural disaster).

Ø Note: Although not technically binding on a criminal trial court, CC §1431.2(b) contains definitions of economic and noneconomic damages that are helpful. "Economic damages" means objectively verifiable monetary losses, including medical expenses, loss of earnings, burial costs, loss of use of property, costs of repair or replacement, costs of obtaining substitute domestic services, loss of employment, and loss of business or employment opportunities. "Noneconomic damages" means subjective, nonmonetary losses, including but not limited to pain, suffering, inconvenience, mental suffering, emotional distress, loss of society and companionship, loss of consortium, injury to reputation, and humiliation.

§40.7 F. Relation Between Victim Restitution and Fines, Penalties, and Assessments

All monetary payments, monies, and property collected from any defendant ordered to pay victim restitution must be applied to that victim restitution before being used to pay any other fine or penalty. Cal Const art I, §28(b)(13)(C).

There is no penalty assessment on victim restitution. People v Martinez (1999) 73 CA4th 265, 268, 86 CR2d 346. A restitution fine is not reduced by the amount of victim restitution. People v Vazquez (2009) 178 CA4th 347, 355, 100 CR3d 351; People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1534, 86 CR2d 134. Statutory penalties may not be made part of a restitution order. People v Boudames (2006) 146 CA4th 45, 52 CR3d 629.

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.7A G. Prosecutor's Role

Prosecutors have a unique relationship to victims. Victims have a constitutional right to confer with the prosecutor about the arrest of and the charges against the defendant. Cal Const art I, §28(b)(6). Prosecutors are in the best position to advise victims of their constitutional right to representation under Cal Const art I, §28(c)(1), and to ensure that victims are notified of the restitution hearing.

A prosecutor may take positions that support the victim (e.g., in a discovery dispute) without representing the victim because the prosecution may act to protect "its own interest in promoting victim cooperation." People v Superior Court (Humberto S.) (2008) 43 C4th 737, 754, 76 CR3d 276 (no recusal of prosecutor for conflict of interest because alignment of interests of victim and prosecution on particular issue does not mean prosecutor represents victim).

Although the prosecutor must be present at all restitution hearings (People v Dehle (2008) 166 CA4th 1380, 83 CR3d 461), a prosecutor cannot waive or reduce the amount of restitution to which a victim is entitled. "Victim restitution may not be bargained away by the People." People v Brown (2007) 147 CA4th 1213, 1226, 54 CR3d 887.

III. RESTITUTION HEARING

§40.8 A. Notice to Defendant and to Victim

The defendant must be given notice of the restitution hearing. See Pen C §1214(b); Welf & I C §730.6(h) (minor defendant). Notice may be given to the defendant through the probation report. People v Campbell (1994) 21 CA4th 825, 26 CR2d 433. The probation officer is required to notify the victim of sentencing proceedings. Pen C §§679.02(a)(3), 1191.1. Since restitution is a constitutional right, a prudent prosecutor will make sure that the victim is notified of the restitution hearing as well, to avoid risking an invalid hearing.

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.9 B. Restitution and Insurance

The defendant's restitution obligation is the full amount of the victim's economic losses. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3). The trial court may not use reimbursements an insured victim has received from his or her own insurer or the insurer of a third party, such as a relative of the defendant, to reduce the amount of restitution the defendant owes. See Pen C §1202.4(f)(2); People v Hamilton (2003) 114 CA4th 932, 941, 8 CR3d 190 (defendant not entitled to credit for payments made to victim by his mother's insurer); In re Brittany L. (2002) 99 CA4th 1381, 1391, 122 CR2d 376 (defendant not entitled to credit for payments made to victims by their own homeowner's insurer). The trial court may credit the defendant with payments the defendant's insurance company makes to the victim (People v Bernal (2002) 101 CA4th 155, 165, 123 CR2d 622; People v Jennings (2005) 128 CA4th 42, 53, 26 CR3d 709) or payments the defendant's employer's insurance company makes to the victim under a policy covering the defendant. People v Short (2008) 160 CA4th 899, 903, 73 CR3d 154. However, the victim is entitled to restitution for the amount of attorney fees expended in obtaining payment from the defendant's insurer (People v Pinedo (1998) 60 CA4th 1403, 71 CR2d 151). When the insured is the parent or guardian of a minor and the restitution obligation arises out of a crime committed by the minor, the parent's or guardian's joint restitution obligation is reduced by the amount of the insurance payment. In re Michael S. (2007) 147 CA4th 1443, 1450, 54 CR3d 920.

Restitution for medical expenses is limited to the amount paid as distinguished from the amount billed. People v Millard (2009) 175 CA4th 7, 27, 95 CR3d 751 (private medical insurance); In re Anthony M. (2007) 156 CA4th 1010, 1015, 67 CR3d 734 (Medi-Cal). But see Howell v Hamilton Meats (2009) 179 CA4th 686, 690, 101 CR3d 805 (economic losses should be measured by amount billed).

A victim's release of liability to the defendant's insurance company as part of a settlement does not release the defendant from his or her restitution obligation. However, a defendant is entitled to credit for payment of economic damages to a victim through a civil settlement. People v Short (2008) 160 CA4th 899, 73 CR3d 154 (relationship between defendant and insurance company is such that victim is deemed to have received civil settlement "directly from the defendant" under Pen C §1202.4(a)(1)). A release cannot waive the People's right to have a defendant pay restitution. People v Bernal (2002) 101 CA4th 155, 160, 123 CR2d 622. However, a victim's release of the parent or guardian of a minor when a restitution order arises out of a crime committed by the minor releases the parent or guardian. In re Michael S. (2007) 147 CA4th 1443, 1450, 54 CR3d 920. An insurer can sue a defendant to recover losses it incurred as a result of the crime, even though the defendant already paid restitution. Vigilant Ins. Co. v Chiu (2009) 175 CA4th 438, 446, 96 CR3d 54.

Source: Criminal Law/California Criminal Law Procedure and Practice/40 VICTIM RESTITUTION/§40.10 C. Victim's Rights

§40.10 C. Victim's Rights

Crime victims have important rights, including the constitutional right to restitution. Cal Const art I, §28(b)(13). The victim (or the parent or guardian of a minor victim, or the next-of-kin of a deceased victim) has the right to appear, either in person or through counsel, and be heard at each sentencing proceeding. Cal Const art I, §28(b)(8); Pen C §1191.1.

If an order of restitution is made without notice to the victim, the victim may vacate the order. People v Green (2004) 125 CA4th 360, 378, 22 CR3d 736. A victim also has the right to object to the terms of a plea agreement. People v Stringham (1988) 206 CA3d 184, 198, 253 CR 484. However, victims are not parties. Pen C §684; People v Municipal Court (Pellegrino) (1972) 27 CA3d 193, 207, 103 CR 645. See People v Dehle (2008) 166 CA4th 1380, 1386, 83 CR3d 461 (abuse of trial court's discretion to permit restitution hearing to proceed solely with victim's counsel and without district attorney present).

The law enforcement officer assigned to the case must provide a crime victim with a "Marsy Rights" card explaining the rights of crime victims enumerated in Cal Const art I, §28(b). Pen C §679.026(c).

The probation department must notify the victim of all sentencing proceedings. Pen C §1191.1. This notice must include an advisement that the victim can obtain the probation department's sentencing recommendations from the district attorney's office. Pen C §1203d. The probation officer must also provide the victim with information about victim restitution, the responsibility of the victim to provide information about losses, and the right to recovery from the state Restitution Fund. Pen C §1191.2. The victim may also receive police reports and witness statements under the California Public Records Act (Govt C §§6250-6270). Govt C §6254(f).

> Ø Note: Although confidentiality generally applies in cases involving juveniles, a victim may be entitled to information about the juvenile and his or her sentence, even for a related civil case. See Welf & I C §1764.2; R.S. v Superior Court (M.L.) (2009) 172 CA4th 1049, 1056, 91 CR3d 546.

On request, the court must provide the victim with all financial information provided by the defendant in connection with restitution. Pen C §§1202.4(f)(11), 1214(b). The Judicial Council has developed form interrogatories for use by victims who have not received complete payment on a restitution order. See CCP §2033.720(a); Form Interrogatories—Crime Victim Restitution (Judicial Council Form CR-200). The victim may serve these interrogatories on the defendant once a year as long as restitution is incomplete, whether or not the victim initiates a civil action to satisfy the restitution order. CCP §2033.720(b).

> Ø Note: It is crucial that the victim provide information about his or her losses to the probation officer, because the probation report is usually the foundation for the restitution order made by the trial court. Pen C §1203.1k; People v Foster (1993) 14 CA4th 939, 946, 18 CR2d 1.

> Ø Note: Counsel for a victim should file and serve a notice of appearance asking to be heard on and served with all matters involving victim restitution. See People v Green (2004) 125 CA4th 360, 378, 22 CR3d 736.

The county victim-witness assistance program, if one exists, must assist the victim in obtaining restitution if the victim requests it. Pen C §13835.5(a)(14). The court must provide the victim with a certified copy of the restitution order on request. Pen C §1214(b).

Like any other member of the public, a victim may get a copy of the probation report from the date of judgment through 60 days after the date of judgment. Pen C §1203.05(a).

Under Pen C §1202.4(f), a victim who disputes the amount of restitution may move to modify the restitution order. See also Melissa J. v Superior Court (1987) 190 CA3d 476, 478, 237 CR 5 (victim has standing to use procedures available to parties to assert right to restitution, including seeking appellate relief if unsuccessful in trial court).

Victims may have special rights or protections during hearings. In cases of sexual molestation of a minor or a dependent person with a substantial cognitive impairment, the victim's testimony and testimony about the victim may be closed to the public. Pen C §§859.1, 868.7(a)(1). In cases involving minor or disabled victims of sex crimes or domestic violence, the court may take special precautions to comfort, and to prevent intimidation of, the victim. Pen C §§868.8, 1347.5. When the victim of specified crimes is a minor 15 years or younger or is developmentally disabled as a result of mental retardation, a videotape may be used if the court finds that testifying at the trial would traumatize the victim. Pen C §1346. But see Crawford v Washington (2004) 541 US 36, 158 L Ed 2d 177, 124 S Ct 1354. In certain situations, the testimony of a minor victim age 13 or younger may be by closed-circuit television. Pen C §1347. When the general public is excluded at the defendant's request, on motion of the prosecution, the victim's family may be present. Pen C §868. Victims of specified violent crimes are entitled to have support persons accompany them to hearings and trial, and may have a support person accompany them to the stand. Pen C §868.5. The presence of a support person during victim testimony does not violate a defendant's due process rights. People v Ybarra (2008) 166 CA4th 1069, 1076, 83 CR3d 340. Although there must be a showing of need (People v Adams (1993) 19 CA4th 412, 444, 23 CR2d 512), the victim also has the right to appear at parole hearings. Pen C §3043.

Victims have certain rights to confidentiality. Under the California Constitution, victims have the right to prevent disclosure of their addresses and information about medical treatment or counseling. Cal Const art I, §28(b)(4). See also Pen C §964. Defense counsel may not disclose victims' addresses to defendants. Pen C §1054.2. A victim of certain sex crimes or one forced to commit an act of prostitution as a result of being a victim of human trafficking may request that his or her name not become a matter of public record. Pen C §293; Govt C §6254(f)(2). In specified sex crimes, the victim's current address and telephone number may be excluded from evidence. Evid C §352.1. A victim of a sexual assault or domestic violence crime cannot be imprisoned or otherwise confined for contempt for refusing to testify. CCP §1219(b). If a victim receives assistance from the state Restitution Fund, information about the victim is exempt from the California Public Records Act (Govt C §§6250-6270) disclosure requirements. Govt C §6254.17. The prosecution, however, must inform the defense of any criminal convictions of a testifying victim. See People v Santos (1994) 30 CA4th 169, 178, 35 CR2d 719.

A victim of a violent felony (see Pen C §667.5(c)), a serious felony (see Pen C §1192.7(c)), or felony theft or embezzlement—or an immediate family member, registered domestic partner, or child of a registered domestic partner of such a victim—may have time off to attend judicial proceedings related to the crime. To obtain time off, the employer must be given documentation about the proceeding. An employer cannot discharge or threaten to discharge the employee for attending proceedings if the employee has met the statutory requirements. Lab C §230.2.

It is a crime to use force or threaten to use force against a victim or his or her property because the victim cooperated with law enforcement. Pen C §140. It is a crime to prevent or dissuade a victim from testifying. Pen C §136.1. A court may issue restraining and other orders to prevent intimidation of a victim. Pen C §136.2. On the other hand, a sexual assault or sexual crime victim cannot be imprisoned, confined, or placed in custody for contempt for refusing to testify about the crime. CCP §1219(b).

§40.11 D. Victim Entitled to Full Restitution

Penal Code §1202.4(f) provides that when restitution is ordered, it must be sufficient to fully reimburse the victim for every determined economic loss incurred as a result of the defendant's criminal conduct. The trial court must award a victim the entire amount required to make him or her whole. Cal Const art I, §28(b)(13). Penal Code §1202.4(f)(3)(A)-(K) lists factors the court may take into account in computing the amount of the victim's loss, but these factors are not exclusive. People v Thygesen (1999) 69 CA4th 988, 994, 81 CR2d 886. In Thygesen, for example, it was appropriate to consider lost rental income in computing the value of the loss of an equipment rental company's cement mixer. 69 CA4th at 994.

Restitution encompasses losses incurred both at the time of the crime and after the crime. People v Giordano (2007) 42 C4th 644, 68 CR3d 51. Restitution may be adjusted by the comparative negligence of the victim. People v Millard (2009) 175 CA4th 7, 41, 95 CR3d 751.

§40.12 E. Defendant's Obligation to Pay Restitution in Cases of Multiple Defendants

In multiple-defendant cases, each defendant is jointly and severally liable for restitution. See, e.g., People v Madrana (1997) 55 CA4th 1044, 64 CR2d 518; People v Campbell (1994) 21 CA4th 825, 26 CR2d 433. Each defendant is entitled to a credit for payments by the other. People v Blackburn (1999) 72 CA4th 1520, 1535, 86 CR2d 134. However, restitution may not be assessed jointly and severally for crimes committed only by one defendant. People v Leon (2004) 124 CA4th 620, 21 CR3d 394.

§40.13 F. Special Restitution Rules Pertaining to Minors and Domestic Violence Cases

Minors. A minor made a ward of the court under Welf & I C §602 is responsible for restitution for economic losses to the victim sustained as a result of the minor's conduct, including any attorney fees or costs incurred to collect restitution. Welf & I C §730.6(a)(2)(B); In re Imran Q. (2008) 158 CA4th 1316, 1320, 71 CR3d 121 (rule on recovery of attorney fees applies to juveniles). See, e.g., In re Ashlie M. (2009) 173 CA4th 668, 93 CR3d 168 (restitution ordered for burial/cremation expenses on finding that minor's driving without license was substantial factor in pedestrian's death); In re M.W. (2008) 169 CA4th 1, 86 CR3d 545 (minor responsible for cost of victim's mental health services though not specifically enumerated under Welf & I C §730.6(h)). If the amount of restitution cannot be ascertained at the time of sentencing, the court can direct the probation officer to determine the amount; the minor has the right to a hearing to dispute the amount. Welf & I C §730.6(h). See In re Karen A. (2004) 115 CA4th 504, 511, 9 CR3d 369. At least one court has found that a Harvey waiver (see §40.4) is not necessary before imposing, as a condition of probation under Pen C §730, restitution for dismissed counts. See In re T.C. (2009) 173 CA4th 837, 843, 93 CR3d 447. A minor's restitution obligation does not end when the minor becomes an adult or is no longer a ward. In re Michael S. (2007) 147 CA4th 1443, 1456, 54 CR3d 920.

Parents and guardians are presumed to be jointly and severally liable for the minor's restitution obligations, subject to their ability to pay. Welf & I C §730.7. The defendant is a minor if he or she was under age 18 on the date of the offense. In re Jeffrey M. (2006) 141 CA4th 1017, 46 CR3d 533. The liability of parents and guardians is limited to $34,700 for each tort of the minor, unless caused by a firearm. See CC §1714.1(a), (c); Cal Rules of Ct App B. The liability of parents or guardians for injury to one person caused by a firearm is limited to $30,000, and the limit for injury to more than one person caused by a firearm is $60,000. CC §1714.3. In re Michael S. (2007) 147 CA4th 1443, 1450, 54 CR3d 920. The liability of the minor is not so limited. In re Michael S., supra.

If the victim is a minor, economic losses include wages and profits lost by the victim's parents or guardians as a result of the crime. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(D)-(E).

Domestic violence cases. Community property cannot be used as the source of the restitution payment if restitution is ordered as a condition of probation after a spouse is convicted of battery, rape, or corporal injury on the other spouse (Pen C §§243(e)(2)(B), 262(d)(2), 273.5(h)(2)) or of violating a protective order (Pen C §273.6(h)(2)(i)).

§40.14 G. Restitution Hearing

Restitution hearing usually combined with sentencing hearing. The restitution hearing is usually held at sentencing, with the probation officer's report as the primary source of evidence about the amount of the victim's loss. See Pen C §1203(b)(2)(D)(ii) (probation report must state whether restitution should be required as condition of probation). The district attorney usually establishes the amount of the victim's losses, but private counsel representing the victim may participate. See Cal Const art I, §28(c)(1); Pen C §1191.1. The prosecutor must be present at the hearing. People v Dehle (2008) 166 CA4th 1380, 1388, 83 CR3d 461.

Defendant has right to be heard. The defendant has a right to a restitution hearing. Pen C §§1202.4(f)(1), 1203(d), 1203.1k; Welf & I C §730.6(h) (juveniles). Although the court may rely on the probation officer's report, it may not completely delegate to the probation officer its authority to determine the necessity for or the amount of restitution. People v Hartley (1984) 163 CA3d 126, 209 CR 131; People v Cervantes (1984) 154 CA3d 353, 201 CR 187. The defendant has the right to contest the probation officer's decision. Pen C §1203.1k; People v Cain (2000) 82 CA4th 81, 86, 97 CR2d 836 (defendant has due process right to challenge amount of restitution victim seeks). See also In re Brittany L. (2002) 99 CA4th 1381, 1391, 122 CR2d 376 (defendant must be given opportunity to present evidence); People v Sandoval (1989) 206 CA3d 1544, 1550, 254 CR 674 (court must give defendant meaningful opportunity to contest restitution amount). However, the defendant has no right to a jury trial. People v Rivera (1989) 212 CA3d 1153, 1161, 261 CR 93. See also In re Ashlie M. (2009) 173 CA4th 668, 674, 93 CR3d 168.

Ø Note: In all cases, defense counsel should review the probation report carefully with the defendant.

Burden of proof and admissible evidence. The victim must present evidence showing that there were losses and that the losses were caused by the crime committed by the defendant. People v Rivera, supra. The victim must prove that the defendant's conduct was a "substantial factor" in causing the events that harmed the victim; it need not be the sole cause. In re Ashlie M., 173 CA4th at 673, citing jury instruction CALCRIM 240.

The amount of restitution must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence. People v Baumann (1985) 176 CA3d 67, 80, 222 CR 32. Documentary evidence such as bills, business records, and "profits lost" is admissible when offered in support of the amount of the victim's losses. Pen C §1203.1d. A victim's testimony, without supporting documentation, is prima facie evidence of value. People v Gemelli (2008) 161 CA4th 1539, 1544, 74 CR3d 901. Such testimony shifts the burden to the defendant to prove that value is wrong. 161 CA4th at 1543. See also People v Goulart (1990) 224 CA3d 71, 83, 273 CR 477 (defendant has burden of proving inaccuracies in victim's proof). See Evid C §813(a)(2). Professional fees incurred may be proved by declaration, and the victim does not have to make the declarant available for cross-examination. People v Cain (2000) 82 CA4th 81, 97 CR2d 836 (defendant did not have due process right to cross-examine victim's psychotherapist on fees).

If the defendant fails to object to the victim's proof at the hearing, any objection is deemed waived. In re S.S. (1995) 37 CA4th 543, 547, 43 CR2d 768. See also People v Foster (1993) 14 CA4th 939, 947, 18 CR2d 1 (defendant has burden of proving that amount of restitution proposed by the probation report is incorrect).

A victim seeking to recover attorney fees for services toward restitution or in a related civil case must follow the lodestar method. People v Millard (2009) 175 CA4th 7, 32, 95 CR3d 751.

Ø Note: Despite the relative informality of restitution hearings (see People v Foster (1993) 14 CA4th 939, 947, 18 CR2d 1), these hearings are minitrials. Depending on the types of losses and the evidence needed to establish them, the hearing may take a few minutes, a full day, or more. Testimonial evidence, documentary evidence, and even expert testimony may be needed. Defense counsel should consider the possibility of a full restitution hearing when making fee arrangements.

Restitution order. At the conclusion of the restitution hearing, the trial court must specify the exact amount of restitution and identify the victim's losses. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3); People v Frey (1989) 209 CA3d 139, 142, 256 CR 810. A defendant's inability to pay restitution "shall not be considered a compelling and extraordinary reason not to impose a restitution order, nor … be a consideration in determining the amount of a restitution order." Pen C §1202.4(g); People v Draut (1999) 73 CA4th 577, 582, 86 CR2d 469. The court must, however, find that the defendant has the ability to pay before making an order for "income deduction" (garnishment). Pen C §1202.42(a).

Ø Note: There is a conflict between Pen C §1202.4(g), which provides that ability to pay is not a factor in determining restitution, and Pen C §1203.2(a), which provides that restitution "shall be consistent with a person's ability to pay." The conflict may be resolved by keeping in mind that the primary purpose of §1203.2(a) is to decide whether probation should be revoked for failure to pay restitution; in that situation, the court is authorized to consider ability to pay.

Ø Note: In a juvenile case, the restitution order need not specify the amount if it cannot be ascertained at the time of sentencing. The order can provide that the court will decide the amount at any time during the term of commitment or probation. Welf & I C §730.6(h); see In re Karen A. (2004) 115 CA4th 504, 9 CR3d 369.

Ø Note: There is a split of authority on whether victim restitution paid by a defendant's business is tax deductible. Compare Waldman (1987) 88 TC 1384, aff'd (9th Cir 1988) 850 F2d 611 (not deductible) with Stephens v Commissioner (2d Cir 1990) 905 F2d 667 (deductible). Victim restitution paid to a government agency is unlikely to be deductible. See IRC §162(f).

Conditions for enforceable order. If the defendant has a hearing on restitution, stipulates to the amount of restitution, or waives hearing, any restitution order is deemed a money judgment and it is enforceable in the manner provided for any other money judgment. Pen C §1214(b). See also Pen C §1203.1k (defendant may consent to probation report). On collecting money judgments, see CCP §§695.010-709.030. On collecting restitution, see §§40.21A-40.29.

IV. RESTITUTION AND PROBATION

§40.15 A. Probation Department's Responsibilities

When a defendant is convicted of a felony for which probation is available, the court must refer the defendant to the county probation department for a presentence report. Pen C §1203(b)(1). The probation officer's presentence report must include information about the victim's loss and the defendant's ability to make restitution. Cal Rules of Ct 4.411.5(a)(5), (8).

Ø Note: In a county that has a financial evaluation officer, the court may also order the defendant to appear before that officer, who will evaluate the defendant's ability to make restitution and report his or her findings to the probation officer. Pen C §1203(j).

The presentence report should also include recommendations about the following:

- The amount the defendant should be required to pay as a restitution fine (Pen C §1203(b)(2)(D)(i));
- Whether restitution should be ordered as a condition of probation (Pen C §1203(b)(2)(D)(ii)); and
- The amount of restitution (Pen C §1203(b)(2)(D)(ii)).

Within 30 days after entry of a restitution order, the probation officer must establish an account into which payments not deposited into the state Restitution Fund will be made. Pen C §1202.8(c).

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.16 B. Restitution as a Condition of Probation

When restitution is ordered under Pen C §1202.4 or another statutory provision that specifically authorizes restitution, the trial court's discretion is circumscribed by the terms of the applicable statute. When restitution is ordered as a condition of probation under Pen C §1203.1(a)(3), however, the court's discretion is circumscribed only by the purposes of probation: restitution must be reasonably related to the crime of which the defendant was convicted, the goal of deterring future criminality, or the defendant's rehabilitation. See People v Carbajal (1995) 10 C4th 1114, 1121, 43 CR2d 681; People v Rugamas (2001) 93 CA4th 518, 521, 113 CR2d 271. See also In re G.V. (2008) 167 CA4th 1244, 84 CR3d 809 (juvenile cases). Consequently, when ordering restitution as a condition of probation, the court has broad discretion. See, e.g., In re I.M. (2005) 125 CA4th 1195, 23 CR3d 375 (restitution ordered for losses caused by crime related to crime of which defendant convicted, even though defendant did not participate in crime causing loss); People v Rugamas (2001) 93 CA4th 518, 113 CR2d 271 (restitution order requiring defendant to reimburse police department for medical expenses incurred to treat defendant after police shot him with rubber bullets upheld on appeal); People v Miller (1967) 256 CA2d 348, 64 CR 20 (restitution ordered to victims of noncriminal conduct related to defendant's crime).

Ø Note: The California Supreme Court has granted review in People v Anderson (review granted Apr. 29, 2009, S170778; superseded opinion at 170 CA4th 910, 88 CR3d 269), a case in which the appellate court declined to follow People v Slattery (2008) 167 CA4th 1091, 84 CR3d 672 (hospital that treated victim not a direct victim for restitution purposes under Pen C §1202.4), and upheld as a condition of probation the imposition of restitution to the hospital that treated the victim.

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.17 C. Payments During Probation

When the court grants probation and orders the defendant to make restitution, timely payment is a condition of probation. Pen C §§1202.4(m), 1203(j). Willful failure to pay restitution can result in revocation of probation and imprisonment. Bearden v Georgia (1983) 461 US 660, 672, 76 L Ed 2d 221, 103 S Ct 2064. See Pen C §§1203(j), 1205(b); People v Lawson (1999) 69 CA4th 29, 39, 81 CR2d 283. The restitution order will survive revocation of probation. People v Kleinman (2004) 123 CA4th 1476, 1481, 20 CR3d 885.

The court may require the defendant to get a job to pay restitution as a condition of probation. Pen C §1203.1(d). When a defendant is convicted of sexual assault on a minor or of assault or battery against a person 65 years of age or older, the court must order the defendant to seek and maintain legitimate employment to pay the cost of the victim's medical and psychological treatment. Pen C §§1203.1g (minors), 1203.1j (seniors).

The court may order a defendant to make restitution payments to the Probation Department, which will disburse them to the victim. Pen C §1203.1(b). The county may impose an administrative fee of up to 10 percent of the amount ordered for restitution to cover costs of collecting and distributing it. Pen C §1202.4(l).

> Ø Note: This is not mandatory. To speed receipt by the victim and avoid the county's administrative fee, a defendant and victim may agree that payments be made directly to the victim. The statutes do not require that payment be made through the probation department.

The court may modify probation for the purpose of "measuring" the timely payment of restitution. Pen C §1203.3(b)(4).

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.18 D. Modification of Restitution

The amount of restitution may be modified while the defendant is on probation on a motion of the prosecutor, the victim, the defendant, or the court. Pen C §1202.4(f)(1). Although Pen C §1203.3(b)(4) authorizes the reduction of restitution for compelling and extraordinary reasons because of the defendant's good conduct, this provision has been overridden by constitutional amendment. See Cal Const art I, §28(b)(13)(B).

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.19 E. Special Probation Conditions

To be eligible for probation, a defendant convicted of certain specified offenses may have to meet special conditions, some of which relate to victim restitution. See, e.g., Pen C §186.11(i)(1)(B) (special restitution provisions apply to defendant when aggravated white collar crime enhancement found true); Pen C §§1203.1g, 1203.1j (special restitution provisions apply to defendant convicted of sexual assault on minor or designated assaultive crimes on elderly victim); Pen C §1203.044(h)-(q) (special restitution provisions apply to defendant convicted of theft of more than $50,000 in single transaction).

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.20 F. Limits on Time of Probation

Even if victim restitution is not paid, probation cannot ordinarily be extended beyond the initial maximum sentence duration. People v Medeiros (1994) 25 CA4th 1260, 1267, 31 CR2d 83. However, under Pen C §1203.2(e), if probation is revoked based on a violation and the revocation is set aside, probation can be extended. In re Hamm (1982) 133 CA3d 60, 67, 183 CR 626. If the defendant has not completely met his or her restitution obligation by the end of the probationary period, the trial court can convert the remainder of the debt to a civil judgment. Pen C §1203(j); People v Jackson (2005) 134 CA4th 929, 937, 36 CR3d 477. If the defendant has failed to make restitution payments as ordered, the trial court may revoke probation, but it may not extend the probationary period beyond the statutory maximum even with the defendant's consent. People v Jackson, supra. However, if the defendant consents to extending the duration of probation, the defendant will be estopped from complaining of the trial court's error on appeal. 134 CA4th at 932.

© The Regents of the University of California

§40.21 G. Termination of Probation

Termination of probation does not terminate a restitution order. Pen C §1202.4(m); People v Kleinman (2004) 123 CA4th 1476, 1481, 20 CR3d 885.

Ø Note: A defendant who has an unpaid balance on a restitution order or fine 120 days before his or her scheduled release from probation or completion of a conditional sentence must prepare and file a new and updated financial disclosure. Pen C §1202.4(f)(11). On request, the court must give the victim a copy of the disclosure. Pen C §§1202.4(f)(11), 1214(b).

V. COLLECTION OF RESTITUTION

§40.21A A. Payment of Restitution Has Priority

All monetary payments, monies, and property collected from any person who has been ordered to make restitution must be first applied to pay the amounts ordered as restitution to the victim. Cal Const art I, §28(b)(13)(C).

§40.22 B. Preserving Defendant's Assets

Several avenues exist to preserve a defendant's assets, including the defendant's seized assets, to make them available for the payment of restitution:

- If seized property was stolen or embezzled and is in the custody of a magistrate or the police, the victim may recover the property. Pen C §§1409, 1413(b).
- If the fruits of the crime against the victim, such as cash, are seized by law enforcement from the defendant, the victim may commence a civil action and attach the fruits of the crime. Golden Gate Candy Prods. Co. v Superior Court (1934) 1 CA2d 426, 36 P2d 834.
- If funds are confiscated from the defendant at the time of the defendant's arrest, the court may apply those funds to the restitution order if they are not subject to forfeiture under Health & S C §11469. Pen C §1202.4(f). The first $300 of such funds is exempt. CCP §704.090(b).
- The victim may have standing to file a claim under Health & S C §11488.5 on assets subject to forfeiture. On asset forfeiture, see chap 57.
- If the complaint alleges facts to support an "aggravated white collar enhancement," the prosecution may act to preserve the defendant's assets for the payment of restitution. Pen C §186.11. See, e.g., People v Semaan (2007) 42 C4th 79, 64 CR3d 1. The assets of the defendant that may be frozen are not limited to assets involved in the crime with which the defendant is charged, because the obligation to pay restitution is a general obligation. People v Semaan (2007) 42 C4th 79, 86, 64 CR3d 1. A spouse or other third party claiming an interest in the assets has the burden of proving both innocence of the crime and that the assets are not the product of the defendant's criminal activity. 42 C4th at 87. See Q-Soft, Inc. v Superior Court (2007) 157 CA4th 441, 449, 68 CR3d 687.

Before the court may release seized assets to a victim, it must afford the defendant notice and opportunity to be heard in opposition to the victim's claim. See People v Chabeear (1984) 163 CA3d 153, 155, 209 CR 218 (due process violation to deny defendant opportunity to challenge robbery victim's claim to money seized during search of defendant's residence). However, in People v Nystrom (1992) 7 CA4th 1177, 1181, 10 CR2d 94, the court held that a defendant was not entitled to separate notice or hearing before money seized at the time of arrest was released to the victim, because the trial court had already entered a valid restitution order as part of a negotiated plea and thus there was no question that the victim was entitled to the money.

Ø Note: The attorney fees expended by a victim in commencing a civil action, obtaining an attachment, or filing a claim may be recovered as restitution. People v Maheshwari (2003) 107 CA4th 1406, 132 CR2d 903 (attorney fees and private investigator's fees incurred by victim in civil action for conversion properly included in restitution order); People v Lyon (1996) 49 CA4th 1521, 1525, 57 CR2d 415 (attorney fees).

After entry of a restitution order:

- If the defendant has used his or her own money or property to post bail, a victim may collect the ordered restitution from the bail. Pen C §1297.
- A victim may file and serve a judgment lien, which will give the restitution order priority with respect to many types of assets over unsecured creditors of the defendant. CCP §§697.530, 697.590(b)-(c).
- A victim can get a 1-year lien on all the defendant's personal property by obtaining and serving an order to examine the defendant about his or her assets. CCP §708.110(d).

If the prosecution fails to follow the statutory procedure of Pen C §186.11 to preserve the defendant's assets for restitution, the trial court cannot order the proceeds of the property to be distributed as restitution. If the defendant has given counsel a security interest in assets, and no preliminary injunction issued concerning those assets, the attorney will have a security interest in those assets with priority over a victim who will be a mere unsecured creditor. See

People v Green (2004) 125 CA4th 360, 22 CR3d 736.

Transfer of assets to avoid payment of restitution is a crime. Pen C §155.5. It may also give rise to civil remedies. CC §3439.07.

§40.23 C. Requirement That Defendant Disclose Assets

No later than the date of sentencing, the defendant must disclose all assets using Judicial Council Form CR-115 (Defendant's Statement of Assets). Pen C §1202.4(f)(5), (7)-(8). Unreasonable failure to file the form may be considered in sentencing. Pen C §1202.4(f)(9). Financial information filed by the defendant under Pen C §987(c) to help the court assess the defendant's ability to employ counsel may be used instead of the required financial disclosure when the defendant fails to file the disclosure. Pen C §1202.4(f)(6). If this is necessary, the defendant shall be deemed to have waived confidentiality of the information. Pen C §1202.4(f)(6). Welfare and Institutions Code §730.6 does not impose financial disclosure requirements on juvenile offenders.

A defendant who is eligible for probation may be referred to a county financial evaluation officer for an evaluation of the defendant's ability to make restitution. The officer must report the findings to the probation officer. Pen C §1203(j).

The Judicial Council has promulgated interrogatories a victim can use to discover a defendant's assets. See Judicial Council Form CR-200, Form Interrogatories—Crime Victim Restitution; CCP §2033.720(a). The victim may serve the interrogatories once a year when there is an unpaid restitution balance. CCP §2033.720(b). In addition, the prosecutor may conduct a judgment debtor examination of a defendant to find assets. Pen C §1202.4(h). This is a significant exception to the general rule that a prosecutor does not have the right to examine an unwilling criminal defendant.

D. Procedures for Enforcing Restitution Order

§40.24 1. Use of Income Deduction

If the trial court determines that the defendant has the ability to pay restitution, it must enter a separate order for income deduction (sometimes called wage garnishment) once restitution has been determined. Pen C §1202.42. The income deduction order must be stayed when issued and the stay remains in effect as long as the defendant pays restitution as ordered. Pen C §1202.42(b). If the county agency responsible for collecting restitution, usually the probation department, learns that the defendant has failed to make payments as required, it must begin procedures for lifting the stay. Pen C §1202.42(b). The defendant can defend against enforcement of the stay by showing that he or she actually made the required payments or by establishing good cause for the failure. Pen C §1202.42(b). The defendant is entitled to a court hearing on these issues on request. Pen C §1202.42(b). See Pen C §1202.42(f). If the stay is lifted, the defendant's employer will be required to deduct the amount specified in the income deduction order from the defendant's paycheck and send it to the court clerk. Once the employer has received notice of the order, it remains in effect until the employer no longer provides income to the defendant or until further order of the court. Pen C §1202.42(f). Judicial Council Form CR-118, Information Regarding Income Deduction Order, is an optional form that can be used to provide notice to the defendant of the effect of the income deduction order. Judicial Council Form CR-119, Order for Income Deduction, is an optional form that can be used to provide notice to the defendant's employer of its obligations under Pen C §1202.42. These forms are reproduced in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §§40.6-40.7 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

An income deduction order is not required in juvenile cases and when restitution was ordered for losses arising from conduct other than the commission of the crime. These two types of restitution are not based on §1202.4, which is a prerequisite for application of §1202.42.

Despite the court's broad power to enforce a crime victim's right to restitution, it may not order deductions to be made from an income source that is by law exempt from execution or other court process. Board of Retirement v Superior Court (O'Riley) (2002) 101 CA4th 1062, 124 CR2d 850 (Govt C §31452, which exempts retirement benefits of county employees from execution, was not impliedly repealed by restitution provisions; court could not order restitution payments deducted from defendant's pension). Also exempt are Social Security benefits (42 USC §407(a); Montana v Eaton (Mont 2004) 99 P3d 661, 665) and veterans' benefits (38 USC §5301(a)(1); Higgins v Beyer (3d Cir 2002) 293 F3d 683, 692).

Penal Code §1202.42 appears to contradict CCP §706.020, which provides that (except for child support orders) the procedures set forth in CCP §§706.100-706.109 are the only judicial procedures for withholding an employee's earnings. The apparent conflict is avoided by the principle first established by Gonzales v Superior Court (1935) 3 C2d 260, 44 P2d 320, and recently reiterated by People v Superior Court (Laff) (2001) 25 C4th 703, 729 n12, 107 CR2d 323, that certain sections of the Code of Civil Procedure (including Part 2, "Civil Actions," in which CCP §706.020 is located) do not apply in criminal proceedings unless "expressly made applicable thereto."

§40.25 2. Availability of Civil Enforcement Procedures

A restitution order is enforceable as a civil judgment. Pen C §§1202.4(i), 1203(j), 1214(b). See Welf & I C §730.6(r) (juvenile cases). This means that all of the postjudgment tools, such as writs of execution, are available to the victim to collect the restitution. A restitution order is a "money judgment" as defined in CCP §§680.230 and 680.270. A victim granted restitution is a judgment creditor. CCP §680.240. In misdemeanor cases, cases involving violation of a city ordinance, and noncapital cases in which the defendant has pleaded guilty or no contest, after entry of a restitution order and on a motion, a restitution order may be enforced in the same manner as a judgment in a limited civil case. Pen C §1214(c). See CCP §582.5.

Some court clerks will not issue a writ of execution based on a restitution order in a criminal case. In that situation, the victim will need an order from the criminal court judge to the court clerk who issues writs. Such an order can be obtained by motion at the time restitution is ordered, or later. It should direct the clerk to issue any and all orders and writs authorized by CCP §§695.010-709.030, including but not limited to writs of execution, possession of personal property, possession of real property, sale of real property, and sale of personal property for enforcement of the (identified) restitution orders. The order may also direct the clerk to issue a civil case number, which may be necessary for certain enforcement of judgment proceedings. See Debt Collection Practice in California, chap 9 (2d ed Cal CEB 1999).

Because civil steps to collect on a restitution order are a continuation of the victim's rights to restitution and because Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(H) provides that attorney fees are a loss for which restitution must be made, attorney fees incurred by the victim in civil collection efforts may be recovered. See Downen's, Inc. v City of Hawaiian Gardens Redev. Agency (2001) 86 CA4th 856, 863, 103 CR2d 644. See also In re Imran Q. (2008) 158 CA4th 1316, 1320, 71 CR3d 121.

The district attorney or victim's attorney may request an order of examination under CCP §§708.110-708.205 to determine the defendant's assets for purposes of collecting on the restitution order. Pen C §1202.4(h). A victim will get a 1-year lien on all personal property of a defendant by obtaining and serving an order to examine the defendant about his or her assets. CCP §708.110(d).

Defendants convicted of certain theft offenses involving large sums may be subject to pretrial levies or restraining orders (see Pen C §186.11) or special asset reporting requirements (Pen C §1203.044(h)-(q)) that may assist victims in enforcing restitution orders.

After a restitution order is entered, concealment of assets to avoid payment of restitution is a felony if the underlying crime was a felony, and a misdemeanor if the underlying crime was a misdemeanor. Penal Code §155.5.

The victim may file and serve a judgment lien that will give the restitution order priority over the defendant's unsecured creditors. See CCP §§697.530, 697.590(b)-(c). However, a restitution order cannot create a lien on retirement benefits due a defendant under the County Employees Retirement Law. Board of Retirement v Superior Court (O'Riley) (2002) 101 CA4th 1062, 124 CR2d 850.

Generally, the first $1225 of any funds of an inmate (adult or juvenile) in an inmate's trust account is automatically exempt from enforcement of a money judgment, but if the debt is based on a restitution fine or restitution order, only $300 is exempt. CCP §704.090. People v Willie (2005) 133 CA4th 43, 34 CR3d 532.

§40.26 3. Other Procedures

Franchise Tax Board enforcement. If a restitution payment is 90 days late, the court may refer collection to the Franchise Tax Board, which may use the same collection tools used to collect delinquent taxes to collect the restitution. Rev & Tax C §19280.

Bail. If the defendant posted bail with his or her own money, the victim may ask the court to order that money be used to pay restitution. Pen C §1297.

Prisoner's funds. The California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) must deduct between 20 and 50 percent of an inmate's wages and trust account deposits to pay restitution. If there are both a restitution fine and a victim restitution order, the order must be paid first. Pen C §2085.5(b), (g). If a prisoner recovers damages in a civil action against a prison or prison official, after litigation costs and attorney fees the balance must be applied to any outstanding restitution order. Pen C §2085.5(j).

Inmate Joint Venture Program. Twenty percent of the net wages of an inmate participating in this program must go for victim restitution. 15 Cal Code Regs §3483(d)(2).

Impact of restitution on parole. Restitution payment is a mitigating factor to consider when setting a parole date for defendants convicted of property crimes. 15 Cal Code Regs §2317(c)(2)(C). Payment of outstanding restitution orders may be a condition of parole. Pen C §3000(b)(6). If there is an unsatisfied restitution order, a parolee may not be released to another state unless he or she posts a bond. Pen C §11177.2. The CDCR may collect amounts from a parolee to pay a restitution order. If there are both a restitution fine and a victim restitution order, the department may collect for the order first. Pen C §2085.5(e), (h).

§40.27 E. State Agencies That May Provide Restitution

The following state agencies may provide at least partial restitution to victims of crime:

- The state Restitution Fund may provide reimbursement for expenses incurred in treating physical and related emotional injuries of crime victims. Govt C §§13950-13974.7. See also §38.14. More information can be found at http://www.boc.ca.gov/Victims.
- The Victims of Corporate Fraud Compensation Fund may provide compensation to victims of corporate fraud. Corp C §1502.5. See 2 Cal Code Regs §§22500-22519. See also http://www.vcgcb.ca.gov/Victims for more information.
- The Client Security Fund of the State Bar of California may provide compensation for financial losses caused by an attorney's dishonest conduct. Bus & P C §6140.5. Information on this Fund is available on the State Bar website at http://www.calbar.ca.gov/state/calbar/calbar_home.jsp (click on "Public Services," then click on "Reimbursement for attorney misconduct"). A downloadable application for reimbursement is also available at http://www.calbar.ca.gov/calbar/pdfs/CSF/CSF_Application.pdf.
- The Department of Real Estate Recovery Account may provide compensation for financial losses caused by the fraudulent or other dishonest conduct of a licensed real estate agent or broker. Bus & P C §10471. See http://www.dre.ca.gov/cons_recovery_acct.html for more information.
- The Franchise Tax Board may enforce a delinquent restitution obligation as if it were a delinquent tax obligation if requested by a state or county agency. Rev & T C §19280.
- The Travel Consumer Restitution Corporation may reimburse losses caused by fraudulent or dishonest conduct by a registered travel agent. See Bus & P C §§17550.35-17550.58. Claimants can submit their claims online through the State Attorney General's office at http://ag.ca.gov/travel/consumer.htm.

§40.28 F. Relation Between Restitution Obligation and Civil Liability

A crime victim has the right to bring a civil action for damages caused by the defendant's criminal act. See CCP §32 ("When the violation of a right admits of both a civil and criminal remedy the right to prosecute the one is not merged in the other"); Pen C §9 (civil remedies for criminal acts preserved). See also Pen C §§679.02, 1202.4(j); Govt C §13963; Vigilant Ins. Co. v Chiu (2009) 175 CA4th 438, 442, 96 CR3d 54 (Pen C §1202.4 does not preclude victim or assignee from bringing a civil action based on same facts that gave rise to criminal conviction); Shore v Gurnett (2004) 122 CA4th 166, 18 CR3d 583 (no constitutional impediment to punitive damage award in civil suit based on crime of which defendant convicted). A victim may recover attorney fees in a civil action against a defendant convicted of a felony. CCP §1021.4.

However, a victim is not ordinarily entitled to "double dip." In other words, restitution actually collected is credited against any other judgment for the same loss. Pen C §1202.4(j); Vigilant Ins. Co., 175 CA4th at 446. See, e.g., Govt C §13963 (if victim receives payment from state Restitution Fund, state is entitled to lien on subsequent judgment or settlement based on same conduct). In at least one circumstance, however, a civil payment will not be a credit toward restitution and the victim may "double-dip": If a victim is paid by a third party's insurer, the defendant is not entitled to a reduction in the amount of restitution because of that payment. People v Hamilton (2003) 114 CA4th 932, 940, 8 CR3d 190 (adult); In re Tommy A. (2005) 131 CA4th 1580, 1590, 33 CR3d 103 (minor). However, payments that the defendant's employer's insurance company made to the victim under a policy covering the defendant will be a credit toward restitution. People v Short (2008) 160 CA4th 899, 903, 73 CR3d 154.

A civil settlement between a victim and a defendant that covers only part of the victim's losses does not preclude an additional restitution award for the balance of losses, even if the settlement releases the defendant from further civil liability. People v Clifton (1985) 172 CA3d 1165, 1168, 219 CR 904. "Disposing of civil liability cannot be a function of restitution in a criminal case." People v Richards (1976) 17 C3d 614, 620, 131 CR 537, overruled on other grounds in People v Carbajal (1995) 10 C4th 1114, 1126, 43 CR2d 681.

A victim's release of liability to the defendant's insurance company as part of a settlement does not release the defendant from his or her restitution obligation. A release cannot waive the people's right to have a defendant pay restitution. People v Bernal (2002) 101 CA4th 155, 160, 123 CR2d 622 (adult); In re Tommy A., supra (minor).

A prior restitution award does not bar a subsequent civil action for different damages arising from the same events, because civil cases and criminal cases have different purposes. Vigilant Ins. Co. v Chiu, 175 CA4th at 445. Another reason to allow both cases is that a victim is not in privity with the People in a criminal case. U.S. v Barnette (11th Cir 1994) 10 F3d 1553, 1562. See also Victa v Merle Norman Cosmetics, Inc. (1993) 19 CA4th 454, 467, 24 CR2d 117 (prior EEOC claim does not bar subsequent civil action, because there is no privity between victim and agency). Because the claims are not the same in civil and criminal cases, there is no collateral estoppel. U.S. v Barnette (11th Cir 1994) 10 F3d 1553, 1560.

The Penal Code may provide for an award of compensatory damages and attorney fees in a civil suit. See, e.g., Pen C §502(e) (compensatory damages available to reimburse expense of determining whether computer system was damaged by computer crime). Conversely, a civil statute multiplying damages may be used by the sentencing court to determine restitution when probation is ordered. People v Baker (2005) 126 CA4th 463, 23 CR3d 871 (victim restitution ordered in amount four times loss under Food & A C §21855).

§40.29 G. Restitution Not Dischargeable in Bankruptcy

Bankruptcy has no effect on restitution. Restitution is not dischargeable in a liquidation or "straight" bankruptcy under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. 11 USC §523(a)(7); Kelly v Robinson (1986) 479 US 36, 50, 93 L Ed 2d 216, 229, 107 S Ct 353. Nor is restitution a dischargeable debt under Chapter 13 (11 USC §§1301-1330). 11 USC §1328(a)(3). See, e.g., Warfel v City of Saratoga (In re Warfel) (BAP 9th Cir 2001) 268 BR 205 (conversion of restitution order to civil judgment does not make it dischargeable under Chapter 7); People v Washburn (1979) 97 CA3d 621, 158 CR 822 (Bankruptcy Act does not apply to restitution orders).

Because collection of restitution is a continuation of a criminal action, the automatic stay provisions of bankruptcy law do not apply. In re Gruntz (9th Cir 2000) 202 F3d 1074, 1085. 11 USC §362(b)(1).

It has been held that the discharge in bankruptcy of a judgment debt the defendant owed to the victims did not preclude the trial court from ordering restitution when the defendant was subsequently convicted of the theft of the property that was the subject of the judgment. People v Moser (1996) 50 CA4th 130, 57 CR2d 647. In People v Dalvito (1997) 56 CA4th 557, 65 CR2d 679, the court of appeal held that the discharge in bankruptcy of a debt the victim owed on the property the defendant was convicted of stealing did not preclude the trial court from ordering full restitution.

A parent jointly and severally liable for a minor's restitution under Welf & I C §730.7 cannot ordinarily get the restitution order discharged in bankruptcy. However, a bankruptcy court in a Chapter 7 action did discharge the parents' liability for their children's restitution. See Mabey v Ellis (In re Ellis) (Bankr D Idaho 1998) 224 BR 786. The court specifically held that not all restitution awards made against parents of juvenile offenders may be discharged in bankruptcy. 224 BR at 792. Differences between California and Idaho law may lead a bankruptcy court applying California law to a different conclusion.

§40.30 VI. APPEAL

The standard of review for a restitution order is abuse of discretion. People v Mearns (2002) 97 CA4th 493, 498, 118 CR2d 511. When there is a factual and rational basis for an award, there is no abuse of discretion. People v Gemelli (2008) 161 CA4th 1539, 1542, 74 CR3d 901; Mearns, supra. See, e.g., People v Phu (2009) 179 CA4th 280, 101 CR3d 601 (despite lack of evidence establishing when power illegally diverted, reasonable to calculate reimbursement from date utility service started by defendant). When determining restitution, a court does not have to use the methods that a government agency may be required to use under its regulations. People v Akins (2005) 128 CA4th 1376, 1384, 27 CR3d 815. Victim restitution is mandatory; a sentence without restitution is invalid and an abuse of discretion. People v Hudson (2003) 113 CA4th 924, 929, 7 CR3d 114.

A parent or guardian ordered to pay restitution jointly and severally with a minor has an independent right to appeal the restitution order. In re Michael S. (2007) 147 CA4th 1443, 1448, 54 CR3d 920.

When a defendant is ordered to pay victim restitution at sentencing, failure to object forfeits the right to appeal the order. People v Nystrom (1992) 7 CA4th 1177, 10 CR2d 94.

An oral order reducing a defendant's restitution obligation is appealable by the prosecution under Pen C §1238(a)(5). People v Hamilton (2003) 114 CA4th 932, 938, 8 CR3d 190.

An appeal does not automatically stay the execution of a restitution order. Pen C §1243. Because restitution is part of the judgment, it is not automatically stayed. Pen C §1467. Therefore, a defendant must move for a stay of restitution. Because victims have a constitutional right to victim restitution (Cal Const art I, §28(b)), a defendant moving for a stay must demonstrate that his or her right under Pen C §1243 to have a court-ordered stay outweighs the victim's constitutional right. However, a stay of restitution is a stay for financial reasons, which may not be granted. See In re Fishman (1952) 109 CA2d 634, 241 P2d 603. If restitution is a condition of probation, it is not suspended pending appeal. In re Bakke (1986) 42 C3d 84, 88, 227 CR 663.

A victim participating in an appeal of a restitution order may seek attorney fees incurred on the appeal. Pen C §1202.4(f)(3)(H).

§40.31 VII. RESTITUTION AND EXPUNGEMENT

If there is still a balance of restitution owed to a victim after a defendant has made all scheduled monthly payments of victim restitution and probation has terminated, the conviction will not be expunged until the balance of restitution is paid. Pen C §1203.4; People v Covington (2000) 82 CA4th 1263, 98 CR2d 852.

§41.1 I. OVERVIEW

Trial counsel's duties concerning appeal. Defense counsel's duties to (1) advise the client concerning appeal, (2) file a notice of appeal, (3) seek a certificate of probable cause in guilty-plea cases, (4) assist in securing appellate counsel, (5) protect a favorable judgment when the prosecution appeals, and (6) cooperate with appellate counsel are all discussed in §§41.4-41.7.

Release from custody pending defense appeal. A defendant convicted of a misdemeanor is entitled to release on bail as a matter of right while the case is on appeal. Release on bail in a noncapital felony case is discretionary with the court. See §§41.6-41.7.

Trial court's jurisdiction after notice of appeal is filed. Once a notice of appeal is filed, the trial court has no jurisdiction to take action affecting the judgment, but retains certain powers over the parties and incidental aspects of the case. See §41.3.

Payment of appointed counsel fees. Appointed trial counsel must be paid a reasonable sum from the county general fund. The trial court may order an indigent defendant to reimburse the county for the cost of appointed counsel. See discussion in §§41.8-41.9.

Cleansing a criminal record. The methods for cleansing arrest and conviction records vary, depending on the nature of the charge and the case disposition. They may include record sealing or destruction, case dismissal, certificate of rehabilitation, and pardon. Most forms of relief are only partial, leaving in place such penalties as the obligation to disclose a conviction on state or local licensing applications, or to register as a convicted sex offender. See §§41.10-41.21. Charts summarizing the effect of various record-cleansing options are found in §41.24. For cleansing records resulting from diversion and deferred entry of judgment, see chap 27.

Registered sex offenders. Limited opportunities exist to have a registered sex offender's information taken off the Megan's Law website; even more limited opportunities exist for relief from the duty to register. Limited opportunities also exist for ending the registration requirement entirely. See §41.19A.

§41.2 II. CHART: DEADLINES

Ø Warning: Counsel should also consult local rules. Many counties have specific time requirements not otherwise mandated by the Penal Code.

Action	Deadline	Authority
Appointed counsel's request for reimbursement.	Check local rules.	Pen C §987.2.
Time to modify or correct clerical errors in judgment.	Clerical error can be corrected at any time.	See In re Candelario (1970) 3 C3d 702, 705, 91 CR 497.
File notice of appeal.	From infraction or misdemeanor case: 30 calendar days after judgment or appealable order.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.853(a) (misdemeanor), 8.902(a) (infraction); see Pen C §1466.
	From felony case: 60 calendar days after judgment or appealable order.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a); see Pen C §1237.
After guilty or no contest plea in felony case, file petition for certificate of probable cause.	60 calendar days after judgment.	Pen C §1237.5(a); Cal Rules of Ct 8.304(b), 8.308(a).
Trial court files order granting or denying certificate of probable cause.	20 calendar days after petition.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.304(b)(2).
Motion for release on appeal.	In trial court at any time.	Pen C §1272.
	In appellate court at any time after trial court denial.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.312, 8.854.
Hearing on defendant's reimbursement to county.	At end of court proceedings, second discretionary hearing within 6 months.	Pen C §987.8.
Sealing and destroying record of person factually innocent.	Up to 2 years after arrest or pleading; time limit waivable with good cause.	Pen C §851.8(l).
Sealing minor's misdemeanor arrest record.	No deadline.	Pen C §851.7.
Sealing arrest and court files after successful Pen C §1000, §1000.5, or §1000.8 program.	At the hearing when diverted charges are dismissed.	Pen C §851.90.
Sealing minor's adult court misdemeanor conviction.	No deadline.	Pen C §1203.45.
Sealing of juvenile court records.	After age 18, or 5 or more years after end of juvenile court jurisdiction, or other similar 5-year periods listed in statute.	Welf & I C §781.
Release from penalties for persons discharged from DJJ (formerly CYA) control.	No deadline.	Welf & I C §1772.
Dismissal for persons granted	After probation has ended.	Pen C §1203.4.

probation.
Dismissal for misdemeanants not granted probation.	After 1 year since pronouncement of judgment.	Pen C §1203.4a.
Dismissal for narcotics addicts.	After Narcotic Addict Evaluation Authority files certificate.	Welf & I C §3200.
Destruction of records of petty marijuana offenders.	Records not to be kept more than 2 years after arrest or conviction.	Health & S C §11361.5.
Dismissal after treatment for nonviolent drug possession.	After successful completion of drug treatment.	Pen C §1210.1(d).
Certificate of rehabilitation.	Any time after specified rehabilitation period.	Pen C §4852.03(a).
Governor's pardon.	No deadline given.	Pen C §§4800-4813.
Court reduces felony to misdemeanor when no imposition of sentence.	When probation is granted, or on application.	Pen C §17(b)(3).
Petition DOJ for exclusion from Megan's Law website.	Any time.	Pen C §290.46(e).
Petition to end sex offender registration (eligible offense only).	Any time after receipt of certificate of rehabilitation.	Pen C §290.5.

§41.3 III. TRIAL COURT JURISDICTION WHILE CASE IS ON APPEAL

While a case is on appeal, the trial court has no jurisdiction to take action affecting the judgment. CCP §916(a); People v Johnson (1992) 3 C4th 1183, 1257, 14 CR2d 702. The court retains certain powers over the parties and incidental aspects of the case (CCP §916(b)), including the power to do the following:

- Recall a prison sentence and resentence the defendant to no greater time, within 120 days on the court's own motion, or any time on recommendation of the Secretary of the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) or Board of Parole Hearings. People v Superior Court (Cornelius) (1995) 31 CA4th 343, 348, 37 CR2d 156; Pen C §1170(d). Resentencing does not extend to dismissing a count (People v Nelms (2008) 165 CA4th 1465, 1472, 82 CR3d 32) nor to permitting the defendant to withdraw the plea (People v Alanis (2008) 158 CA4th 1467, 71 CR3d 139), even if all parties agree. For more information on recall, see §35.10.
- Take procedural steps concerning the notice of appeal, and preparation and correction of the record. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.360-8.625 (felony appeals), 8.800-8.816, 8.850-8.929 (misdemeanor and infraction appeals); People v Johnson, supra. See also §§41.4-41.5.
- Grant a stay, bail, or O.R. release pending appeal. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.312; see also §§41.6 (bail and O.R. on appeal), 43.9 (release pending misdemeanor appeal), 44.18 (release pending felony appeal); and chap 5 (release procedures in the trial court).
- Grant, deny, modify, or revoke probation. In re Bakke (1986) 42 C3d 84, 88, 227 CR 663; see chaps 38, 46.
- Correct clerical errors, i.e., errors made in recording the judgment, but not judicial errors, i.e., errors made in rendering judgment. In re Candelario (1970) 3 C3d 702, 705, 91 CR 497. See §§35.30-35.33.
- Correct an unauthorized or void sentence. People v Chagolla (1983) 144 CA3d 422, 434, 193 CR 711. See §35.34.
- Hear a petition for a writ of habeas corpus involving matters outside the trial record. In re Baker (1988) 206 CA3d 493, 253 CR 615. See §§42.22-42.34.
- Hold a hearing within 6 months to assess appointed counsel's fees. Pen C §987.8.
- Take action to carry the judgment into effect, including rearrest. People v Superior Court (Cornelius), supra; Pen C §§1265(b), 1310.

The remittitur issued by the appellate court restores jurisdiction to the trial court. People v Saunoa (2006) 139 CA4th 870, 43 CR3d 287; Pen C §1265. For further discussion of the remittitur, see §§43.38-43.40 (misdemeanor cases), 44.67-44.68 (felony cases).

IV. DUTIES OF TRIAL COUNSEL CONCERNING APPELLATE REVIEW

§41.4 A. Prosecution-Initiated Appellate Review

The prosecution can appeal in any of the 11 situations listed in Pen C §1238. Most prosecution appeals are taken from orders granting the defendant's Pen C §995 motion setting aside all or a portion of an indictment or information; the court's dismissal, on its own motion, of a case after granting the defendant's suppression motion; the court's refusal to reinstate a felony complaint under Pen C §871.5; or unauthorized sentences. Pen C §§1238(a)(1), (a)(7), (a)(9)-(10), and 1238(c). Petitions for writ of mandate or prohibition, not appeals, are authorized from orders granting probation. Pen C §1238(d). For further discussion of the prosecution's right of appeal, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §§1.19-1.33 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

The prosecutor files a notice of appeal with the same time limits, and in the same manner, as does the defendant. Pen C §1239; Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a). See also §41.5. If the defendant or the prosecution files a timely appeal, the time for the opposing party to cross-appeal from the same judgment or order is 60 days after the rendition of the judgment or 30 days after the court clerk mails notification of the first appeal, whichever is later. Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(b).

Unlike defense counsel, who must file a notice of appeal when a meritorious ground exists, or when the defendant requests (see §41.5), the prosecutor has no statutory duty to file an appeal.

The clerk of the trial court must serve trial defense counsel with the prosecution's notice of appeal and the prosecutor must serve counsel with the appellate briefs, unless all parties have been notified that the defendant has new counsel on appeal. People v Bouchard (1957) 49 C2d 438, 441, 317 P2d 971. A defense attorney whose client obtains a favorable judgment has the duty and the authority to ensure that it is not reversed on appeal. People v Bouchard, supra. But see People v Bailey (1992) 9 CA4th 1252, 12 CR2d 339 (appellate court disapproved of appointed defense trial counsel handling defendant's appeal from conviction because of potential conflict of counsel's arguing his own inadequacy at trial). Trial counsel who will not handle the client's appeal should advise the court so that counsel is appointed.

In most situations, prosecution and defense have the same time limits in which to appeal. This is not true for a pretrial challenge to the trial court's ruling on a Pen C §995 motion. When the trial court denies the motion, the defendant can seek review of the denial before trial only if the motion was brought within 60 days after arraignment, and the defendant then has only 15 days from the date of the denial to seek review. Pen C §§999a, 1510. The prosecutor has 60 days to appeal from the court's order granting the defendant's §995 motion. Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a). When the trial court grants the motion in part and denies it in part, and the prosecution files an appeal after the defense time limit to appeal has lapsed, the period for the defendant to appeal is reinstated as of the date the notice of appeal was filed. See Pen C §1238.5. See also 6 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law, Criminal Appeal §81, Criminal Writs §90 (3d ed 2000).

§41.5 B. Defense Counsel's Obligations to Help Client Appeal

Duty to advise the client about appeal. After conviction, the trial attorney must advise the defendant on whether there are meritorious grounds for appeal. See Pen C §1240.1(a). The duty to advise is not limited to cases in which counsel thinks the defendant wants to appeal or the defendant has asked for advice, but applies in all cases, including guilty and nolo contendere pleas. See Pen C §1240.1(a).

Ø Warning: Failure to consult with the client about an appeal is constitutionally deficient assistance of counsel when there is reason to believe either (1) that a rational defendant would have wanted to appeal, or (2) that this particular defendant reasonably demonstrated to counsel an interest in appealing. Roe v Flores-Ortega (2000) 528 US 470, 479, 145 L Ed 2d 985, 996, 120 S Ct 1029.

The attorney must also tell the client that he or she cannot give advice about the attorney's own competence but that the client may consult the State Public Defender or another lawyer for that advice. Pen C §1240.1(a). A trial attorney representing a "prospective indigent appellant" may also ask the State Public Defender for advice on whether meritorious grounds for reversal or modification exist. Pen C §1240.1(c).

Ø Note: Although Pen C §1240.1 is still in effect, the current practice of the State Public Defender is to refer these calls to the appellate projects, which administer the appointed counsel programs in each of California's appellate districts. A list of these projects and their telephone numbers is in §1.2.

Cooperation with appellate counsel. Trial counsel should fully and candidly cooperate with appellate counsel, even if this means disclosing trial counsel's ineffectiveness. California State Bar Formal Opinion No. 1992-127.

Duty to file the notice of appeal. Trial counsel representing an indigent defendant must execute and file a notice of appeal on the client's behalf:

- When counsel believes that arguably meritorious grounds exist for a reversal or modification of the judgment on appeal, and that it is in the client's best interests to appeal (Pen C §1240.1(b)); or
- When directed to by a defendant who has a right to appeal (Pen C §1240.1(b); see Roe v Flores-Ortega (2000) 528 US 470, 477, 145 L Ed 2d 985, 996, 120 S Ct 1029 (no showing of merit is needed).

When the client of retained counsel wants to appeal, counsel must file a notice of appeal, instruct the client how to do so, or see that the client has counsel for this task. In re Benoit (1973) 10 C3d 72, 88, 109 CR 785. The notice of appeal must be filed within 60 days of the judgment in felony cases (Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a)) and within 30 days of the judgment in misdemeanor cases (Cal Rules of Ct 8.853(a)).

Importance of timely notice of appeal. The notice of appeal must be filed within 60 days of judgment or appealable order in felony cases (Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a)) and within 30 days of judgment or appealable order in infraction and misdemeanor cases (Cal Rules of Ct 8.852, 8.902). Failure to file a timely notice of appeal is jurisdictional error. See, e.g., People v Chapman (1971) 5 C3d 218, 95 CR 533: The right to appeal is lost if the notice of appeal is not filed on time. See, e.g., In re Chavez (2003) 30 C4th 643, 650, 134 CR2d 54. The court of appeal cannot grant relief from the default of filing the notice of appeal late (Cal Rules of Ct 8.60(d), 8.812), nor can the trial court (People v Lyons (2009) 178 CA4th 1355, 101 CR3d 241).

However, the doctrine of constructive filing may apply to permit the court to review the case if trial counsel promised to file a notice of appeal and the defendant reasonably relied on the promise. In re Benoit (1973) 10 C3d 72, 109 CR 785. In addition, under the "prison-delivery rule," an inmate's notice of appeal is deemed constructively filed when it is delivered to prison officials. Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(e), 8.853(e), 8.902(e). See also In re Jordan (1992) 4 C4th 116, 13 CR2d 878. An attorney's failure to timely file the notice of appeal can result in State Bar discipline. In re Benoit (1973) 10 C3d 72, 88, 109 CR 785. Failure to file a notice of appeal may also constitute ineffective assistance of counsel if meritorious grounds for appeal exist.

Ø Note: It is good practice for defense counsel to have the defendant sign a notice of appeal at sentencing, and file the notice before leaving the courthouse. If an appeal will not be filed, defense counsel should document in the file, and consider stating on the record, the reason an appeal will not be filed, e.g., the defendant asked that there be no appeal.

Judicial Council notice of appeal forms are available for both felony and misdemeanor cases. See Notice of Appeal-Felony (Defendant) (Judicial Council Form CR-120) and Notice of Appeal (Misdemeanor) (Judicial Council Form CR-132). A sample request for appointment of counsel on appeal is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.3 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005) and in Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §2.36 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

Ø Note: Form CR-120, not Form CR-132, should be used when the defendant was charged with a felony, even if convicted of a misdemeanor. Cal Rules of Ct 8.850; Advisory Committee Comment to Cal Rules of Ct 8.850. Felony appeals, including appeals from misdemeanor convictions charged as felonies or tried in conjunction with felony charges, are heard in the court of appeal for the district in which the court that rendered the judgment is located (see Cal Const art VI, §11(a)); misdemeanor appeals are heard in the appellate division of the superior court that rendered the judgment (Pen C §1466).

Completing and filing Form CR-120 (including, if necessary, the petition for a certificate of probable cause; see below) will generally conclude trial counsel's duties to perfect an appeal from a felony conviction. See chap 44.

Applying for, or designating, counsel on appeal. The trial attorney has no obligation to represent the defendant on the appeal. Filing a client's notice of appeal does not commit the attorney to represent the defendant on appeal (Pen C §1240.1(b)), and case law disapproves of allowing appointed trial counsel to be appointed to represent an indigent appellant on appeal. Pen C §1240.1(b); In re Benoit, supra (no obligation); People v Bailey (1992) 9 CA4th 1252, 1254, 12 CR2d 339 (appointed counsel).

Trial counsel must assist the defendant in moving for appointment of counsel on appeal if the defendant was represented by appointed trial counsel or if the defendant, because of indigence, may request appointed appellate counsel. Pen C §1240.1(b). Judicial Council Form CR-120 for felony appeals has a box that can be checked to request appointment of counsel on appeal. Indigent misdemeanor defendants subject to incarceration or a fine of more than $500, or who are likely to suffer significant adverse collateral consequences and who were represented by counsel in the trial court or who establish indigency, are entitled to appointed counsel on appeal and the court may appoint counsel in other cases (see Cal Rules of Ct 8.851(a)). Counsel may use Request for Court-Appointed Lawyer in Misdemeanor Appeal (Judicial Council Form CR-133) for this purpose. A sample request for appointment of counsel on appeal is in Crim Law Forms Man §41.3 and in Appeals & Writs §2.36.

Together with the notice of appeal, the attorney must file a statement of points to be raised on appeal and designate any additions or corrections to the normal record on appeal. Pen C §1240.1(b). However, failure to do so, or to mention any particular point, does not preclude the defendant from doing so later. Pen C §1240.1(b).

Ø Note: Form CR-120 does not require specification of appellate issues.

Obtaining certificate of probable cause. In a felony case, when the appeal is from a guilty or nolo contendere plea or an admission of probation violation, trial counsel, when requested to file a notice of appeal, must also assist the defendant in obtaining a certificate of probable cause when the certificate is necessary to perfect the appeal. People v Hodges (2009) 174 CA4th 1096, 1105, 94 CR3d 862. When the defendant's claim of probable cause to appeal is based on alleged ineffectiveness of counsel, counsel may file the Pen C §1237.5 statement, instruct the defendant how to file it, or secure other counsel for the defendant. People v Johnson (2009) 47 C4th 668, 684 n6, 101 CR3d 332. The application for a certificate of probable cause must be filed with the notice of appeal. Cal Rules of Ct 8.304(b)(1).

The attorney need not make frivolous contentions but need only assist in setting forth the relevant facts. People v Ribero (1971) 4 C3d 55, 66, 92 CR 692. Judicial Council Form CR-120, the felony notice of appeal, has a petition for a certificate of probable cause on the back. For further discussion, see chap 44. See also Appeals & Writs §§1.5-1.15.

Noncertificate grounds. The certificate of probable cause requirement does not apply when the defendant appeals the denial of a motion to suppress evidence under Pen C §1538.5 or an issue arising after the plea that does not go to the plea's validity. But if one of those noncertificate grounds applies, the notice of appeal must state that the basis of the appeal is an issue that does not require a certificate of probable cause and specify the exception to the certificate rule. Pen C §1538.5(m); Cal Rules of Ct 8.304(b)(4).

Ø Note: If the defendant's notice of appeal from a guilty or no contest plea states that is it based on a denial of a suppression motion or other noncertificate ground that does not affect the plea's validity, the reviewing court will not consider any issue affecting the validity of the plea unless a statement for issuance of a certificate of probable cause is also included. Cal Rules of Ct 8.304(b)(5).

Perfecting a misdemeanor appeal. Counsel should review Judicial Council Form CR-131-INFO (Information on Appeal Procedures for Misdemeanors). Perfecting a misdemeanor appeal requires more than completing and filing Judicial Council Form CR-132 (Notice of Appeal (Misdemeanor)). Defense trial counsel must also, if they are aware an indigent defendant intends to appeal, apply for appointment of appellate counsel (Cal Rules of Ct 8.851(b)) and elect the manner of preparing the record. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.860-8.873 (record in misdemeanor appeals). For further discussion of the record on appeal in a misdemeanor case, see chap 43. Trial counsel's duties in connection with a misdemeanor appeal are also discussed in Appeals & Writs §§2.3-2.11.

C. Stay and Release Pending Appeal

§41.6 1. Bail and Own Recognizance

Misdemeanor convictions. A defendant convicted of a misdemeanor is entitled to bail on appeal as a matter of right. Pen C §1272(1)-(2); In re Newbern (1961) 55 C2d 500, 503, 11 CR 547. This includes an appeal from an order modifying but reinstating probation. In re O'Driscoll (1987) 191 CA3d 1356, 236 CR 882. Although Pen C §1272 declares bail to be a matter of right in misdemeanor cases, the amount of bail is within the court's discretion. See In re Newbern, supra. The court may also set reasonable bail conditions related to public safety. See In re McSherry (2003) 112 CA4th 856, 863, 5 CR3d 497. See also Cal Rules of Ct 8.854 (obtaining release on appeal from misdemeanor conviction).

Felony convictions. In noncapital cases, bail pending appeal must be ordered for a convicted felon who demonstrates all the following (Pen C §1272.1):

- By clear and convincing evidence that the defendant is not likely to flee. The court should consider ties to the community, employment, family, property, record of appearances, and severity of sentence.
- By clear and convincing evidence that the defendant does not pose a danger to the safety of any other person or the community. The court should consider whether the crime was a violent felony as defined by Pen C §667.5(c).
- That the appeal is not for purpose of delay and raises a substantial legal question that is likely to result in reversal.

In making its decision, the court must include a statement of reasons supporting the grant or denial of bail that is sufficiently specific to permit meaningful review. Pen C §1272.1(c).

A defendant moving for bail after a sentencing hearing in a felony matter must give at least 5 court days' notice to the prosecutor. Pen C §1272(3).

Ø Note: O.R. release can also be granted pending appeal. In re Robinson (1971) 16 CA3d 539, 94 CR 148; Pen C §1318.

The defendant must first apply for bail or release in the trial court. If that is "unjustifiably" denied, then application can be made to the reviewing court. Cal Rules of Ct 8.312.

When case dismissed after suppression motion granted. When a suppression motion is granted in a misdemeanor case and the prosecution appeals, the court must grant the defendant O.R. release until trial court proceedings resume. Pen C §1538.5(k).

In most noncapital felony cases, when a suppression motion is granted and the prosecution appeals a dismissal or seeks writ review, the court must grant the defendant an O.R. release until trial court proceedings resume. Pen C §1538.5(k). The trial court may require a defendant charged with noncapital homicide to post bail. In capital cases, neither bail nor O.R. release is available when the "proof is evident and the presumption great." Pen C §1538.5(k). See §16.33.

For further discussion, see chap 5; Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §§2.12-2.14 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). Sample motions are in Appeals & Writs §2.37 and California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.10 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

© The Regents of the University of California

§41.7 2. Stay Pending Appeal

In noncapital cases, an appeal does not stay execution of judgment or probation conditions, except on court order. Pen C §1243. A stay without bail in a felony case in which probation was denied means that the defendant will remain in county jail rather than go to prison. Pen C §§1243, 1245. Bail or O.R. release, without a stay, means that, except for imprisonment, all other conditions of the sentence or probation are in effect. A stay may be granted with respect to a jail condition, but not other conditions such as no drugs or weapons. If unstayed conditions are violated while the appeal is pending, probation may be revoked. In re Bakke (1986) 42 C3d 84, 89, 227 CR 663.

The defendant should seek a stay or bail first from the trial court. The court of appeal may grant a stay or release only after the superior court unjustifiably refuses to grant one. Cal Rules of Ct 8.312(b) (felony), 8.854(b) (misdemeanor). The appellate court can grant interim relief pending its ruling on the application. Cal Rules of Ct 8.312(d). For further discussion, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §§2.15-2.17, 2.38 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007); California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.10 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

Ø Note: The court cannot stay the duty to register as a convicted sex offender. Pen C §1243.

V. COMPENSATION OF APPOINTED COUNSEL

§41.8 A. Statutory Authority for County Payment to Appointed Counsel

Private appointed counsel are entitled to be reimbursed a "reasonable sum" from the county general fund, both for compensation and for "necessary expenses." Pen C §987.2. The judge must consider the following (Pen C §987.3):

- The customary fee charged a nonindigent client for similar services;
- The time and labor spent;
- The difficulty of the defense;
- The novelty or uncertainty of the area of law involved;
- The degree of professional ability called for and exercised in performance of the services; and
- The professional character, qualifications, and standing of the attorney.

Many counties have contracts for appointed attorneys. Pen C §987.2. The courts may, in deciding whether to appoint a defendant's requested attorney, consider that attorney's willingness to abide by an appointed counsel's fee schedule. Alexander v Superior Court (1994) 22 CA4th 901, 27 CR2d 732. No matter how the court determines compensation, counsel should learn the rules in advance and keep careful records. Declarations in support of compensation should explain why any extra time was needed (e.g., difficulty or novelty of the issue).

Ø Note: New attorneys should consult an experienced practitioner for billing questions. Generally, judges will not allow inexperienced counsel to charge more simply because it took them longer. Most judges consider "learning time" to be unbillable. In granting compensation, the court may consider whether counsel failed, without good cause, to keep a promise that the case would be ready within the time set. Pen C §987.05.

The trial court may also compensate appointed counsel for pretrial writ petitions filed in the court of appeal. In re Head (1986) 42 C3d 223, 226, 228 CR 184 (habeas challenging prison conditions); Polakovic v Superior Court (1972) 28 CA3d 69, 72, 104 CR 383 (Pen C §§995 and 1538.5 denials).

Ø Note: Appointed counsel should be wary of filing frivolous writ petitions. See Gottlieb v Superior Court (1991) 232 CA3d 804, 283 CR 771 (sanctions imposed).

Appointed counsel's necessary expenses can include the costs of investigators and experts (Pen C §§987.2(a), (f), 987.3), a psychotherapist's consultation (Evid C §1017), or expert witnesses (Evid C §§730-731). The court may require that the need for experts be shown, in camera if necessary. See generally Corenevsky v Superior Court (1984) 36 C3d 307, 204 CR 165; Tran v Superior Court (2001) 92 CA4th 1149, 112 CR2d 506.

Ø Note: Private appointed counsel should generally obtain court authorization in advance of hiring any experts. Some local court rules require court approval before appointed counsel may hire assistants such as investigators and experts.

An attorney who feels that payment is inadequate may petition for a writ of mandate. In such cases, the appellate court possesses the power to "determine the reasonable compensation and order the trial court to fix compensation in that amount." Arnelle v City & County of San Francisco (1983) 141 CA3d 693, 698, 190 CR 490. See Trask v Superior Court (1994) 22 CA4th 346, 27 CR2d 425.

§41.9 B. Reimbursement by Defendants

Reimbursement to county. There are two statutory systems for determining reimbursement by adult defendants: Pen C §§987.8 and 987.81. The §987.8 procedures are effective throughout California, while the §987.81 procedures are effective only if adopted by that county's board of supervisors. Pen C §987.81(c).

Penal Code §987.8 procedures. Before appointing counsel, the trial court must notify the defendant that the court may, after a hearing, rule on the defendant's present ability to pay all or part of the cost of the legal representation. The notice must inform the defendant that an order to pay will have the same effect as a civil judgment. Pen C §987.8(f). The hearing to set the amount of payment is usually held at the conclusion of the case. Pen C §987.8(b). The court may also order the defendant to appear before a county officer to inquire into his or her ability to pay. Pen C §987.8(b). Absent notice and hearing, an order to reimburse legal fees is invalid. People v Flores (2003) 30 C4th 1059, 1068, 135 CR2d 63.

At the hearing, the defendant is entitled (but not limited) to the following rights: to be personally heard; to present witnesses and documents; to have the opportunity for confrontation and cross-examination; to have adverse evidence disclosed; and to have a written statement of findings. Pen C §987.8(e).

"Legal assistance" is defined in Pen C §987.8(g)(1) to include counsel and supportive services such as medical and psychiatric examinations, investigators and experts, and other services. "Ability to pay" is defined in Pen C §987.8(g)(2) as the defendant's "overall capability" to reimburse all or a part of the costs and includes consideration of (1) present financial position, (2) "reasonably discernible future financial position" up to 6 months, or (3) the likelihood of obtaining employment in 6 months, and (4) "any other factor [that] may bear" on this question. Absent unusual circumstances, a person sentenced to state prison must be considered unable to reimburse the county for legal representation. Pen C §987.8(g)(2)(B). Before ordering reimbursement from a person sentenced to prison, the court must make "an express finding of unusual circumstances." People v Lopez (2005) 129 CA4th 1508, 1537, 29 CR3d 586.

If the court finds present ability to repay, the court must set the amount, and order payments to be made in a reasonable manner. Pen C §987.8(e). If the defendant has been ordered to go to a county officer for further inquiry, failure to appear within 20 working days "shall" result in a recommendation to the court that the defendant pay the full cost of the legal assistance. Pen C §987.8(d). The notice must state the cost of legal assistance provided, the defendant's procedural rights, the time for response, and a warning of the consequences for not appearing. The order to pay may be enforced in the manner provided for enforcement of money judgments generally, but may not be enforced by contempt. Pen C §987.8(e). When the defendant was represented by the public defender, the cost of legal services is the pro rata share of the public defender's budget and includes any proven expenses to the county such as investigator's fees and expenses, expert witness fees or expenses, and long-distance telephone expenses. People v Viray (2005) 134 CA4th 1186, 1217, 36 CR3d 693.

A second hearing may be held in the next 6 months. Pen C §§987.8(b), 987.81(a). The 6 months is not tolled by the pendency of an appeal (People v Turner (1993) 15 CA4th 1690, 19 CR2d 736, disapproved on other grounds in People v Flores (2003) 30 C4th 1059, 1067, 135 CR2d 63), but it can be extended if the payment issue was on appeal (People v Flores, supra).

At any time during the pendency of an order to repay under §987.8, the defendant may petition for modification on grounds of change in circumstances. Pen C §987.8(h). (This provision is not included in §987.81, discussed below.)

Section 987.8 was upheld against a number of constitutional challenges in People v Amor (1974) 12 C3d 20, 114 CR 765. See also Fuller v Oregon (1974) 417 US 40, 40 L Ed 2d 642, 94 S Ct 2116 (Oregon statute similar to §987.8 held constitutional).

Penal Code §987.81 procedures. The county board of supervisors may adopt a resolution requiring a defendant who is provided legal assistance by the public defender or appointed counsel to appear before a county officer to inquire into the defendant's ability to pay, and on conclusion of criminal proceedings or withdrawal of the public defender or appointed counsel, the board may hold a hearing to determine present ability to repay. Pen C §987.81. This section appears to supplement rather than replace Pen C §987.

Ø Note: Reimbursement procedures vary widely from county to county. Many courts avoid both procedures in setting the repayment amount by asking the defendant to stipulate to payment of a nominal amount in lieu of a formal inquiry or hearing.

VI. RELIEF FROM THE CONSEQUENCES OF ARREST AND CONVICTION RECORDS

§41.10 A. Overview

Although the past can never be completely eradicated, some relief from the civil consequences of criminal convictions is available in many situations. Most forms of relief require some postjudgment action by the court, such as sealing records, vacating convictions, or granting certificates of rehabilitation. Other forms, such as destruction of minor misdemeanor marijuana records, should occur automatically. See §41.12. A pardon requires gubernatorial action. See §41.20. The Department of Justice determines relief related to the posting of sex offender information on the Megan's Law website. See §41.19A.

Proper handling of a criminal case requires a knowledge of the civil consequences of criminal convictions. Counsel should also be knowledgeable about what relief may ultimately be available and what circumstances may warrant relief. Both sides may want to know, for example, whether a defendant can be relieved of the duty to admit a conviction on employment applications or whether a defendant will receive professional discipline. For discussion of criminal records, see chap 12. Effects on professional licenses are discussed in chap 53. Effects of conviction on immigration status are discussed in chap 52. See the chart on the effect of relief from disabilities in §41.24.

Employers, generally, cannot ask job applicants about arrests or detentions that did not result in conviction, or for information about a referral to, and participation in, any pretrial or posttrial diversion program. Lab C §432.7(a).

Exceptions to these prohibitions include:

- Persons seeking employment, or already employed, as peace officers, or seeking positions with the department of justice or other criminal justice agencies as defined, are not covered. Lab C §432.7(e).
- Employers at health facilities can ask applicants for positions with regular access to patients about arrests for the sex offenses listed in Pen C §290 and can ask applicants for positions with access to drugs or medication about arrests for offenses specified in Health & S C §11590. Lab C §432.7(f).

In addition, unless exempted by law, employers cannot ask about any conviction for which the record has been judicially ordered sealed, expunged, or statutorily eradicated, including records of juveniles and minors (see Welf & I C §389; Pen C §§851.7, 1203.45), and misdemeanor convictions dismissed under Pen C §1203.4. 2 Cal Code Regs §7827.4(d)(1).

The civil consequences of conviction are especially significant in sex offense cases. In particular, counsel should know what offenses will result, under "Megan's Law," in placement of the offender on the California Department of Justice's Internet website, which lists designated registered sex offenders. See http://www.meganslaw.ca.gov. The consequence of that listing can be more important than the jail or prison term. In some cases, a convicted sex offender can apply for an exclusion from the website listing. See §41.19A.

B. Sealing of Records

§41.11 1. Finding of Factual Innocence

Under Pen C §851.8, a factually innocent person arrested for or charged with a crime may be able to have the records sealed by obtaining a declaration of factual innocence. An arrestee is "factually innocent" only if no reasonable cause exists to believe he or she committed the offense. Pen C §851.8(b). The procedure for obtaining a certificate of factual innocence varies, depending on whether an accusatory pleading was filed as a result of the arrest. The relief granted in each situation is the same: All records relating to the arrest and charges must be sealed for 3 years and must subsequently be destroyed. Pen C §851.8(b). The arrest is deemed never to have occurred. Pen C §851.8(f).

If no accusatory pleading was filed, the arrestee begins by petitioning the arresting agency and district attorney for a determination of factual innocence. Pen C §851.8(a). The Department of Justice provides forms for this purpose. Pen C §851.8(g). If the petition is denied, or deemed denied because it is not acted on in 60 days, the arrested person may petition the court for a finding of factual innocence. Pen C §851.8(b).

When charges were filed but the case was dismissed, the court may, if the district attorney concurs, grant the above relief at the time of dismissal. Pen C §851.8(d). Alternatively, the defendant may petition the court that dismissed the charges for a finding of factual innocence. Pen C §851.8(c).

When a trial results in an acquittal, the judge may find the person factually innocent and order relief. Pen C §§851.8(e), 851.85. Although the statute does not explicitly provide that a defendant acquitted after trial may petition for a determination of factual innocence, it has been so construed. See People v Adair (2003) 29 C4th 895, 903, 129 CR2d 799.

The arrestee may file the petition up to 2 years after the date of arrest or accusatory pleading, whichever is later; in the absence of prejudice, the court may permit later filing for good cause. Pen C §851.8(l). See People v Bermudez (2009) 172 CA4th 966, 969, 91 CR3d 510 (2-year time limit applies when charges were dismissed). Relief is not available if a related civil action is pending against the arresting officer or agency. Pen C §851.8(k). Nor is relief available for offenses classified as infractions. Pen C §851.8(n). For a sample petition, see California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.9 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

The trial court may not deny a petition for a determination of factual innocence without an evidentiary hearing (People v Chagoyan (2003) 107 CA4th 810, 132 CR2d 419), but the burden the petitioner must meet to establish entitlement to relief is very high. The evidence must show that "no person of ordinary care and prudence [would] believe or conscientiously entertain any honest and strong suspicion that the person arrested [or acquitted] is guilty." The record must exonerate, not merely raise a substantial question about guilt. People v Adair (2003) 29 C4th 895, 907, 129 CR2d 799. Therefore, an acquittal does not necessarily require a finding of factual innocence. See, e.g., People v Bleich (2009) 178 CA4th 292, 300, 100 CR3d 288 (denial upheld); People v Medlin (2009) 178 CA4th 1092, 1094, 100 CR3d 810 (finding of factual innocence reversed).

On appeal, the reviewing court must review the trial court's determination of the issue by applying the independent review standard, rather than by the substantial evidence test, because a certificate of factual innocence may not be granted if any reading of the facts would establish probable cause. 29 C4th at 907. The arresting agency is not a party to the court proceedings on the petition and thus has no standing to appeal an order granting the petition. People v Punzalan (2003) 112 CA4th 1307, 1310, 6 CR3d 30.

§41.11A 2. Juvenile Misdemeanor Arrest and Citation Records

An individual who, as a minor, was arrested for a misdemeanor may have the arrest record and any juvenile court records sealed if (Pen C §851.7):

- He or she was released for lack of probable cause;
- The juvenile court proceedings were dismissed or any adult proceedings were discharged without a conviction; or
- He or she was acquitted.

This provision applies to minors found unfit for juvenile court when criminal proceedings in adult court terminated without a conviction. Pen C §851.7. It also applies if the person cannot apply for record sealing under Welf & I C §781. Pen C §851.7(d). By its terms, §851.7 does not apply to arrests for registrable sex offenses, drug offenses, or traffic offenses. Pen C §851.7(e). But see People v Pruett (1975) 51 CA3d 329, 124 CR 273 (to extent that §851.7(e) denies relief to minors arrested for misdemeanor drug offenses, it denies equal protection). If the court makes the finding required for relief, the records will be sealed and the proceedings will be deemed not to have occurred. Pen C §851.7(b).

Ø Note: Section 851.7 does not apply to minors who are taken into temporary custody under Welf & I C §625 and subsequently released without further proceedings. Such individuals are not required to state that they have been arrested or detained on applications for jobs or educational opportunities. T.N.G. v Superior Court (1971) 4 C3d 767, 94 CR 813.

Records of juvenile arrests and juvenile court wardship proceedings also may be sealed and destroyed if the individual meets the requirements of Welf & I C §781. For discussion, see §§41.13-41.13A.

© The Regents of the University of California

§41.12 3. Marijuana Arrests and Convictions

Records of marijuana arrests and convictions (except cases concerning concentrated cannabis) are automatically destroyed 2 years after the arrest or conviction when the case involved these charges:

- Simple possession;
- Possession on school grounds; or
- Offering, giving away, or transporting less than 28.5 grams of marijuana.

Health & S C §§11357(b)-(e), 11360(b), 11361.5(a).

Once the records have been destroyed, the person can deny the conviction or arrest. Court records and drug diversion agency records are generally destroyed. They are deemed not accurate or relevant, and no public agency may, because of this, limit or in any way deny the individual any opportunity, privilege, or interest. Health & S C §§11361.5, 11361.7. These provisions are intended to eliminate "in the broadest terms possible" all collateral consequences of these arrests or convictions. People v Boyd (1979) 24 C3d 285, 155 CR 367 (criminal); Governing Bd. v Mann (1977) 18 C3d 819, 135 CR 526 (civil). No case has decided whether the federal government must recognize this relief. For discussion of the federal government's position on state dismissals, see §41.15.

Exempted from the destruction requirement are transcripts of court proceedings, published appellate opinions, and records relevant to a pending lawsuit. Health & S C §11361.5(d). Records will also not be destroyed if the conviction is still reviewable on appeal, a prison or jail term remains to be served, a fine is unpaid, probation has not been completed, or a bench warrant is outstanding. See Younger v Superior Court (Mack) (1978) 21 C3d 102, 145 CR 674 (upholding constitutionality of Health & S C §11361.5).

§41.13 4. Juvenile Court Records

Sealing of records. To seal juvenile court records, a petition must be filed by either the subject of the records or the probation department. Welf & I C §781. The Judicial Council has promulgated mandatory Form JV-590 (Order to Seal Juvenile Records) for the court's order. Application may be made 5 years after the termination of juvenile court jurisdiction or when the subject of the records reaches age 18, whichever is earlier. To be eligible for relief, the individual must not have been convicted (presumably in adult court) of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, and there must be no pending civil litigation concerning the incident.

Under Welf & I C §781(a) and (d), no sealing or destruction is permitted for an offense listed in Welf & I C §707(b) that was committed when the minor was age 14 or older. The age limit on eligibility for record sealing does not violate equal protection. In re Chong K. (2006) 145 CA4th 13, 51 CR3d 350. The age limit applies to persons honorably discharged from the Division of Juvenile Justice, even though Welf & I C §§1172 and 1179 provide that an honorable discharge relieves the individual from "all penalties and disabilities." 145 CA4th at 21. If any offense charged in a juvenile petition is subject to the prohibition on sealing, no charge in the petition can be sealed. In re Jeffrey T. (2006) 140 CA4th 1015, 1019, 44 CR3d 861.

Relief consists of sealing of arrest and other records, papers, and exhibits. Registration as a sex offender will be terminated, and the Department of Justice will be ordered to destroy records. Welf & I C §781(a). Once the records are sealed, "the proceedings … shall be deemed never to have occurred and the person may properly reply accordingly to any inquiry." Welf & I C §781(a). The records are not subject to any inspection, with limited exceptions: inspection by the person involved, for defamation actions, and by insurers concerned with certain Vehicle Code offenses. Welf & I C §781(b)-(c). See also Parmett v Superior Court (Chrystal B.) (1989) 212 CA3d 1261, 1266, 262 CR 387. Sealed records must be destroyed, unless good cause is presented, when a person charged under Welf & I C §602 reaches age 38. Welf & I C §781(d).

Destruction of records. Juvenile court records must be destroyed by court order when the subject reaches age 21 if the subject was alleged or adjudged under Welf & I C §601, or when the subject reaches age 38 if the subject was alleged or adjudged under Welf & I C §602, unless for good cause the court determines that the juvenile record is to be retained or unless it is released to the subject. Welf & I C §826(a). However, a juvenile court record that cannot be sealed under Welf & I C §781(e) must not be destroyed. Welf & I C §826(a).

When records are released or destroyed under this section, the proceedings "shall be deemed never to have occurred, and the person may reply accordingly to any inquiry." Welf & I C §826(a).

© The Regents of the University of California

§41.13A 5. Misdemeanor Convictions of Minors

It is rare for a person under age 18 to be convicted of a misdemeanor in adult court. When it does happen, Pen C §1203.45 provides for the sealing of such records. Relief is granted if the minor has already received, or is eligible for, postconviction dismissal of the case under Pen C §1203.4 or §1203.4a. For discussion, see §§41.15-41.16. Relief under §1203.45 goes beyond the relief available to an adult under §§1203.4 and 1203.4a. Under §1203.45, the records are sealed; the conviction, arrest, or other proceeding is deemed never to have occurred; and the person may answer accordingly to any question. California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.9 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005) has a sample petition for relief.

With exceptions, to receive relief under Pen C §1203.45, the minor can have been convicted of only one charge or count, even in the same case. Pen C §1203.45(d); People v Mgebrov (2008) 166 CA4th 579, 587, 82 CR3d 778. Relief under §1203.45 is not available to minors convicted of offenses requiring sex offender registration or of certain Vehicle Code offenses; nor is it available for most cases involving conviction of more than one offense. However, a provision of §1203.45 prohibiting the sealing of records of misdemeanor drug offenses was declared unconstitutional in People v Ryser (1974) 40 CA3d 1, 114 CR 668.

© The Regents of the University of California

§41.13B 6. Sealing Records After Successful Completion of Pen C §1000 or §1000.5 Program

After a defendant successfully completes a drug diversion program (see Pen C §1000.5) or a deferred entry of judgment program (see Pen C §§1000, 1000.8), the judge, on written or oral motion, or on his or her own motion, may order that the records of the arresting agency and court be sealed. Pen C §851.90(a). The defendant may then, with specified exceptions, state that he or she was not arrested or granted diversion or deferred entry of judgment. Pen C §851.90(a)(4).

§41.14 C. Reduction of Felony to Misdemeanor

When the court grants felony probation on a wobbler, i.e., an offense chargeable either as a felony or a misdemeanor, without the imposition of sentence, the court, on application, may later declare the offense to be a misdemeanor. Pen C §17(b)(3). See, e.g., People v Superior Court (Alvarez) (1997) 14 C4th 968, 976, 60 CR2d 93. See also People v Glee (2000) 82 CA4th 99, 103, 97 CR2d 847 (grant of summary probation with termination to occur on completion of jail term; felony reduced to misdemeanor). The court cannot reduce a felony to a misdemeanor when a prison sentence had been imposed before probation was granted. People v Wood (1998) 62 CA4th 1262, 1266, 73 CR2d 308. The court's discretion to suspend imposition of sentence also does not authorize the court to reduce a nonwobbler to a misdemeanor. People v Mauch (2008) 163 CA4th 669, 674, 77 CR3d 751. Relief under Pen C §17(b) is not available when the court sentences the defendant to a term in state prison and then suspends execution of the sentence. Pen C §17(b)(3).

Ø Note: In deciding whether to reduce a felony to a misdemeanor, the court must give "individualized consideration of the offense, the offender, and the public interest." People v Superior Court (Alvarez) (1997) 14 C4th 968, 978, 60 CR2d 93.

Penal Code §17(b) states that once declared a misdemeanor, the crime is a misdemeanor "for all purposes." See Gebremicael v California Comm'n on Teacher Credentialing (2004) 118 CA4th 1477, 13 CR3d 777. However, there are several exceptions to the rule. The conviction remains a prior strike under the Three Strikes law unless the misdemeanor reduction occurred at the time of initial sentencing. Pen C §§667(d)(1), 1170.12(b)(1); People v Superior Court (Alvarez), supra. The federal government can still consider the conviction a felony for purposes of its gun statutes. U.S. v Tallmadge (9th Cir 1987) 829 F2d 767, 770. See also 18 USC §921(a)(20) (recognizing some state expungements and set-asides). Under Bus & P C §6102, the crime remains a felony for attorney disciplinary purposes. This is also true for several other state-regulated professions. But see Gebremicael v California Comm'n on Teacher Credentialing, supra (plaintiff, whose conviction had been reduced to misdemeanor, improperly denied teaching credential on ground of felony conviction).

Reduction to a misdemeanor under Pen C §17(b) precludes prosecution for a later-arising event requiring a predicate felony conviction, such as a felon-in-possession of a gun under Pen C §12021. People v Gilbreth (2007) 156 CA4th 53, 57, 67 CR3d 10. A person convicted of a wobbler that was designated as a felony should generally seek reduction to a misdemeanor under §17(b)(3) before—or while—seeking postjudgment dismissal under Pen C §1203.4 or Pen C §1203.4a. Note, however, that an offense can be reduced to a misdemeanor even after dismissal. Meyer v Superior Court (1966) 247 CA2d 133, 55 CR 350. Prosecutors may contest such reductions, even though they may not be able to contest the "dismissals" under §§1203.4 and 1203.4a. See also §8.40, chap 37. Judicial Council Form CR-180 (Petition for Dismissal) may be used to request the court to reduce an eligible felony to a misdemeanor. In addition, a sample motion to reduce a felony to a misdemeanor is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.6 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

For a very small number of felonies, the legislature has prescribed a fine as an alternative to state prison. See, e.g., Pen C §148.3(b) (false report of emergency under specified circumstances). For these crimes, Pen C §18 permits the court to sentence the defendant to county jail, thus making the conviction a misdemeanor, even though the statute of conviction itself does not provide for that alternative. See People v Mauch (2008) 163 CA4th 669, 675, 77 CR3d 751.

D. Dismissal of Charges

§41.15 1. Dismissal of Felony or Misdemeanor Charges After Probation (Pen C §1203.4)

Defendants who have successfully completed probation (including early discharge) can petition the court to set aside a guilty verdict or permit withdrawal of the guilty or nolo contendere plea and dismiss the complaint, accusation, or information. Pen C §1203.4. Defendants who have successfully completed a conditional sentence, i.e., "revocable release … without the supervision of a probation officer" (Pen C §1203(a)), are also eligible to petition for dismissal under Pen C §1203.4. People v Bishop (1992) 11 CA4th 1125, 1129, 15 CR2d 539 ("conditional sentence" as defined in Pen C §1203(a) is same as former term "summary probation"). Penal Code §1203.4 provides that the court can also, in furtherance of justice, grant this relief "in any other case." See People v McLernon (2009) 174 CA4th 569, 577, 94 CR3d 570 (denial of prior request for §1203.4 relief will not bar subsequent §1203.4 petition brought under interests-of-justice provision). However, case law indicates that §1203.4 does not apply to someone who was denied probation and is currently on parole. See, e.g., People v Borja (1980) 110 CA3d 378, 167 CR 813. The petition can also be filed before probation ends when the court finds that it is in the interests of justice. Pen C §1203.4.

Section 1203.4 relief is not available for convictions of the offenses specified in Pen C §1203.4(b). These include most felony child molestation offenses, certain other sex offenses, a few traffic offenses, and infractions. However, when a defendant has been convicted of multiple counts, some of which qualify for §1203.4 dismissal, the guilty verdicts on the individual qualifying counts may be dismissed. See People v Mgebrov (2008) 166 CA4th 579, 591, 82 CR3d 778 (two of defendant's three convictions eligible for §1203.4 relief).

The probationer must be informed in the probation papers of the right to petition under §1203.4. The probationer may make a §1203.4 application in person, by attorney, or by the probation officer if authorized in writing. Reimbursement to the county of up to $150 for services related to the petition may be assessed, subject to waiver for indigency. Pen C §1203.4(d). The §1203.4 fee can be imposed only after the court determines the defendant's ability to pay, and, accordingly, the clerk cannot impose this as a filing fee. The court need not determine the actual cost of services but can impose all or part of a fee set by the board of supervisors, and no oral hearing on ability to pay is required. Lewis v Clarke (2003) 108 CA4th 563, 568, 133 CR2d 749.

The prosecuting attorney must be given 15 calendar days' notice of the petition for relief. If the prosecutor fails to appear and object, the prosecutor may not move to set aside or appeal the grant of the petition. Failure of the trial court to grant the petition is appealable under Pen C §1237 as an order made after judgment affecting the defendant's substantial rights. People v Chandler (1988) 203 CA3d 782, 789, 250 CR 730.

Ø Note: Judicial Council Form CR-180 (Petition for Dismissal) may be used to petition for dismissal under Pen C §1203.4. An attorney-drafted sample application to dismiss under Pen C §1203.4 is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.7 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

The defendant's court record is not expunged or sealed when Pen C §1203.4 relief is granted. Instead, an extra entry, "dismissed," is made on the record. It remains a fully public document.

If probation has been successfully completed or terminated early, and the defendant is not then serving a sentence, on probation, or charged with any offense, relief must be granted. People v Hawley (1991) 228 CA3d 247, 249, 278 CR 389; People v Lewis (2006) 146 CA4th 294, 297, 53 CR3d 40. But relief need not be granted when probation has expired without successful completion. People v Covington (2000) 82 CA4th 1263, 98 CR2d 852 (failure to make full restitution). In considering whether to grant a petition when probation has not been successfully completed, the court can consider postprobation conduct. In addition, after a first denial, the court can consider a subsequent petition when circumstances have changed. People v McLernon (2009) 174 CA4th 569, 572, 94 CR3d 570. The court can dismiss some counts of a multicount complaint even if other counts cannot be dismissed. People v Mgebrov (2008) 166 CA4th 579, 586, 82 CR3d 778.

If the petition is granted, the petitioner must be released from all "penalties and disabilities" resulting from the conviction. However, the limitations on relief available under §1203.4 are numerous and substantial. People v Vasquez (2001) 25 C4th 1225, 1230, 108 CR2d 610. The Vasquez court defined the terms in the statute, saying, "As used in section 1203.4 of the Penal Code the words 'penalties and disabilities' have reference to criminal penalties and disabilities or to matters of a kindred nature." 25 C4th at 1231 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Under Pen C §1203.4(a), the order dismissing the charges

- Does not prevent the conviction from being pleaded and proved just like any other prior in any subsequent prosecution. See People v Diaz (1996) 41 CA4th 1424, 49 CR2d 252 (dismissed charge used as strike under Three Strikes law);
- Does not relieve the defendant of the obligation to disclose the conviction in response to any direct question in any questionnaire or application for public office or licensure by any state or local agency, or for contracting with the state lottery;
- Does not permit a person prohibited from holding public office as a result of the charges to hold public office;

Ø Note: By regulation, a private employer may not ask a job applicant about any misdemeanor conviction dismissed under §1203.4. 2 Cal Code Regs §7287.4(d). However, whether a private employer can ask about a felony conviction dismissed under this provision is an unanswered question. Perhaps the best advice an attorney could give a client faced with this question would be that it is certainly proper to disclose both the conviction and the dismissal.

- Does not permit a person to own, possess, or have in his or her custody or control any firearm; nor does dismissal prevent a person from being convicted as an ex-offender in possession of a gun under Pen C §12021; and
- Does not relieve a defendant required to register as a sex offender under the Sex Offender Registration Act (Pen C §§290-290.023) of the obligation to register or exempt a defendant from inclusion on the Megan's Law Internet website (Doe v Brown (2009) 177 CA4th 408, 412, 99 CR3d 209).

Ø Note: A person required to register as a sex offender who receives §1203.4 relief may apply for a certificate of rehabilitation and pardon. Pen C §4852.01(c). If the offense is not listed in Pen C §290.5(a)(2), a pardon will end the duty to register. Pen C §290.5(a)(1). For further discussion, see §41.20.

Other statutes and court decisions impose additional limitations on the scope of a §1203.4 dismissal. For example:

- Dismissal does not affect any revocation or suspension of the defendant's driver's license, and a conviction may be considered a conviction for the purpose of revoking, suspending, or limiting the privilege because of prior convictions. Veh C §13555.
- Dismissal does not preclude the use of the conviction to impeach a testifying defendant. Evid C §788(c).
- Dismissal does not make the conviction records unavailable to the public. People v Field (1995) 31 CA4th 1778, 1787, 37 CR2d 803.
- Dismissal does not prevent state licensing agencies from using the conviction in their licensing decisions. See, e.g., Bus & P C §§475, 480, 490; Educ C §44009; Adams v County of Sacramento (1991) 235 CA3d 872, 885, 1 CR2d 138 (denying peace officer status). See also People v Vasquez (2001) 25 C4th 1225, 1230, 108 CR2d 610, and cases cited there. On the effect of criminal conviction on professional licenses, see chap 53.
- Dismissal does not prevent a conviction from disqualifying an individual from obtaining a foster care license if the original offense is one for which an exemption for disqualification cannot be granted under Health & S C §1522(g). Department of Children & Family Servs. v Superior Court (Cheryl M.) (2003) 112 CA4th 509, 5 CR3d 182.

Furthermore, the federal government has no general obligation to recognize Pen C §1203.4 relief. See, e.g., Dickerson v New Banner Inst. (1983) 460 US 103, 74 L Ed 2d 845, 103 S Ct 986. However, the federal government does give limited recognition to state court dismissals. See 18 USC §921(a)(20) (recognizing state dismissal for firearms purposes, if dismissal permits the person to possess a firearm). See also Lujan-Armendariz v INS (9th Cir 2000) 222 F3d 728, 749 (narcotics offenses that could have been prosecuted federally and expunged under Federal First Offender Act but were prosecuted by the state and expunged in state court are expunged for purposes of deportation).

Other circuits have declined to follow Lujan-Armendariz, and the Bureau of Immigration and Citizenship Services has refused to apply it outside of the Ninth Circuit. See Acosta v Ashcroft (3d Cir 2003) 341 F3d 218, 225; Gill v Ashcroft (7th Cir 2003) 335 F3d 574, 577.

§41.16 2. Dismissal of Misdemeanor Charges When Probation Not Granted (Pen C §1203.4a)

Dismissal under Pen C §1203.4a is available to a person convicted of a misdemeanor and not granted probation. Relief is similar to dismissal under Pen C §1203.4, discussed in §41.15. To be eligible, the misdemeanant must have fully complied with and performed the sentence of the court, must not be serving any other sentence nor be charged with a crime, and must have, since judgment, "lived an honest and upright life," obeying the laws. Such a person must be permitted to withdraw the plea of guilty or nolo contendere and enter a not guilty plea. A jury verdict of guilty must be set aside and the case dismissed. The defendant is thereafter "released from all penalties and disabilities resulting" from the conviction, except as provided by law.

Penal Code §1203.4a, unlike Pen C §1203.4, does not explicitly require the person to disclose the conviction in an application for a state license, public office, or to contract with the state lottery. Both the statute and case law are silent on whether the person should disclose the conviction in response to a private employer's questions. Most private employers are prohibited by 2 Cal Code Regs §7287.4(d)(1)(B) from asking about misdemeanor convictions dismissed under §1203.4, but the regulation does not mention §1203.4a. Relief under §1203.4a does not end the requirement to register as a convicted sex offender under Pen C §290. Other differences between the relief available under §§1203.4a and 1203.4 are described in the chart in §41.24.

Judicial Council Form CR-180 (Petition for Dismissal) may be used to petition for dismissal under Pen C §1203.4a. An attorney-drafted application to dismiss under §1203.4a is in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §41.8 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

§41.17 3. Dismissal After Completion of Treatment for Nonviolent Drug Possession Offense (Proposition 36)

Ø Note: During the 2005-2006 regular session, the California Legislature adopted SB 1137 (see Stats 2006, ch 63, §7), which made significant changes to the drug treatment laws enacted under Proposition 36. Among other things, the amended provisions change existing law by permitting incarceration of offenders placed on Proposition 36 probation who relapse during treatment. This legislation has been declared invalid in its entirety. See Gardner v Schwarzenegger (2009) 178 CA4th 1366, 101 CR3d 229. Even though the SB 1137 amendments have been declared invalid, they remain on the books. The bench and bar should be careful to use a pre-amendment version of the statute. The discussion in this section cites to the pre-amendment version of Pen C §1210.1.

A defendant who has completed drug treatment imposed under Pen C §1210.1 (Proposition 36) may petition the court under Pen C §1210.1(d) to dismiss the charges. The court must dismiss the charges if it finds that the defendant has (1) successfully completed drug treatment and (2) substantially complied with the conditions of probation. Pen C §1210.1(d). The term "successful completion of treatment" is defined in Pen C §1210(c) to mean "that a defendant who has had drug treatment imposed as a condition of probation has completed the prescribed course of drug treatment and, as a result, there is reasonable cause to believe that the defendant will not abuse controlled substances in the future." See People v Hinkel (2005) 125 CA4th 845, 22 CR3d 895.

Ø Practice tip: As construed in Hinkel, dismissal after completion of Proposition 36 probation is not automatic. The burden of demonstrating the existence of reasonable cause to believe that the defendant will not abuse controlled substances in the future is on the defendant (125 CA4th at 853), and the mere fact that the defendant has completed the required treatment program may not persuade the court that the defendant will be able to stay clean after the treatment program has ended. If the defendant's performance in the treatment program was not exemplary, defense counsel might suggest that the client wait to file the dismissal petition until after establishing a record of not abusing controlled substances following completion of treatment. Note, however, that some courts hold the dismissal hearing automatically at the end of probation.

Like a §1203.4 dismissal, a §1210.1(d) dismissal is not a dismissal for all purposes. Even after dismissal, the defendant is barred (see Pen C §12021) from owning, possessing, or controlling a concealable firearm. Pen C §1210(d)(2). See People v DeLong (2002) 101 CA4th 482, 124 CR2d 293 (§1210.1(d) dismissal does not protect defendant from all disadvantageous consequences, including a "besmirched reputation" and use of the conviction as a prior felony for purposes of Pen C §12021).

Unlike §1203.4, however, §1210.1(d) explicitly states that except as provided in the subdivision, "the arrest and conviction shall be deemed never to have occurred." Pen C §1210(d)(1). After a §1210.1 dismissal, except in the situations listed in §1210.1(d)(3),

(1) The defendant may state in response to criminal history questions that he or she has never been arrested or convicted of the offense (Pen C §1210.1(d)(3)); and

(2) The arrest and conviction record cannot be used in any way that could result in the denial of any employment, benefit, license, or certificate without the defendant's consent.

The defendant must disclose the arrest and conviction in response to a direct question on any questionnaire or application for occupying public office, becoming a peace officer, contracting with the California State Lottery, being licensed by any state or local agency, or performing jury service. In addition, the Department of Justice may keep a record of the arrest and conviction and may disclose it in response to a law enforcement inquiry or a question about a peace officer application. Pen C §1210.1(d)(3).

Ø Warning: A §1210.1(d) dismissal does not necessarily eliminate the conviction under federal law. See, e.g., Dickerson v New Banner Inst. (1983) 460 US 103, 74 L Ed 2d 845, 103 S Ct 986 (meaning of term "convicted," as used in federal statute requiring disclosure of conviction, is question of federal, not state, law). One corollary of this is that if the conviction makes a noncitizen defendant inadmissible or removable, a dismissal under §1210.1 may not affect the defendant's immigration status. For discussion, see §§52.12-52.16.

§41.18 E. Commitments to Division of Juvenile Justice; Completion of Juvenile Parole

When a criminal defendant is committed to the DJJ for a crime punishable as either a felony or a misdemeanor, the offense is deemed a misdemeanor when the defendant is honorably discharged. Pen C §17(c); People v Marshall (1991) 227 CA3d 502, 277 CR 846; People v Lassiter (1988) 202 CA3d 352, 248 CR 320 (relief denied when discharge is dishonorable). For discussion of eligibility for commitment to a juvenile facility, see §37.67.

Every person honorably discharged from parole after commitment to the DJJ who was not placed in state prison must be released from the penalties and disabilities resulting from the crime for which the person was committed. Welf & I C §1772(a). Persons dishonorably discharged may petition the court of commitment to set aside the verdict of guilty and dismiss the accusation or information, thereby releasing the person from penalties and disabilities. Relief is discretionary. Welf & I C §1772(a); People v Navarro (1972) 7 C3d 248, 278, 102 CR 137.

When a person is honorably discharged from a juvenile facility, the DJJ must notify the committing court, which must dismiss the action. Welf & I C §1179(c). The person must be informed of this right when discharged. Welf & I C §1772(c).

The person remains subject to the weapon possession restrictions of Pen C §§12021 and 12021.1. Welf & I C §1772(b)(2). Evidence of the adjudication is admissible in a criminal, juvenile, or civil action if the person is over 18, or was 16 or 17 at the time the crime was committed, or was convicted of a Welf & I C §707(b) offense in adult court. Welf & I C §1772(b)(3), (5). The conviction may be used as an enhancement in subsequent offenses. Welf & I C §1772(b)(4). See, e.g., People v Pride (1992) 3 C4th 195, 256, 10 CR2d 636 (aggravating factor in death penalty case); People v Daniels (1996) 51 CA4th 520, 59 CR2d 395 (Three Strikes law). In addition, a minor who was sent to the DJJ because of commission, when age 14 or over, of an offense listed in Welf & I C §707(b) is not entitled to have the record sealed under Welf & I C §781. In re Chong K. (2006) 145 CA4th 13, 51 CR3d 350.

§41.19 F. Discharge of Narcotic Addicts

If a drug addict successfully completes the inpatient and outpatient components of the California Rehabilitation Center (CRC) (see §§37.63-37.66) and is discharged by the Narcotic Addict Evaluation Authority (Welf & I C §3200), the trial court may modify the sentence, suspend further proceedings, and dismiss the charges. A person discharged from CRC because the term expired without successful completion (Welf & I C §3201) or the person was excluded from CRC as unsuitable (Welf & I C §3109) may also apply for a modification of the sentence. People v Nubla (1999) 74 CA4th 719, 88 CR2d 265.

A dismissal has the same force and effect as a dismissal under Pen C §1203.4. However, dismissal following a CRC commitment allows the defendant to become a peace officer. Boyll v State Personnel Bd. (1983) 146 CA3d 1070, 194 CR 717. As with §1203.4, the conviction may be used to enhance a sentence. People v McCuiston (1966) 246 CA2d 799, 55 CR 482. The conviction counts as a prior conviction for purposes of future drug criminal actions. Welf & I C §3200(b).

§41.19A G. Exclusion From Megan's Law Website, and Relief From Registration for Pen C §290 Registrants

Exclusion from Megan's Law website. In addition to being required to register as a sex offender under the Sex Offender Registration Act (Pen C §§290-290.023), a person who has been convicted of committing or attempting to commit any of the sex offenses listed in Pen C §290.46(b)(2), (c)(2), or (d)(2) is subject to Megan's Law, which established a website that makes information about sex offenders available to the public. The Megan's Law website (http://www.meganslaw.ca.gov) makes the following information about convicted sex offenders available to the public: name and known aliases; a photograph; a physical description including sex, race, date of birth, and criminal history; and "any other information that the Department of Justice deems relevant." Pen C §290.46(b)(1), (c)(1), (d)(1). Certain additional information about the person's criminal record is to be added by July 1, 2010. Pen C §290.46(a)(2). Depending on the offense of conviction, the website lists either the offender's address or the offender's community and zip code.

Under Pen C §290.46(e), an individual with no other convictions of offenses that require registration under Pen C §290 can petition the Department of Justice (DOJ) for exclusion from the Megan's Law website if he or she

- Was convicted of sexual battery (Pen C §243.4(a));
- Was convicted of misdemeanor annoying or molesting a child (Pen C §647.6);
- Was convicted of a felony violation of certain listed obscenity offenses, if the person shows, as specified, that all victims were at least 16 years of age or older; or
- Is on probation or has successfully completed probation for the offense, and
- He or she is the victim's parent, stepparent, sibling, or grandparent, and
- The offense did not involve oral copulation or sexual penetration.

Commission of a new offense or a probation violation resulting in incarceration will terminate the person's eligibility for exclusion.

Ø Note: The criteria for exclusion under Pen C §290.46(e) were narrowed by amendment, effective September 30, 2006. See Stats 2006, ch 886. Under the amended provisions, the DOJ must rescind the exclusion for people who were excluded under the former version who would not qualify for an exclusion under the current version. Pen C §290.46(e)(3). This retroactive rescission of exclusions has been upheld against ex post facto and other challenges. Doe v California Dep't of Justice (2009) 173 CA4th 1095, 1109, 93 CR3d 736.

Beginning January 1, 2012, no person can be excluded from the website unless that person has a "risk level of low or moderate-low" on the State-Authorized Risk Assessment Tool for Sex Offenders (SARATSO) being phased in by Pen C §§290.03-290.08. Pen C §290.46(e)(4).

The DOJ must grant the petition for exclusion if the defendant is eligible. Pen C §290.46(e)(1).

Relief from duty to register. A person required to register as a sex offender for an offense not listed in Pen C §290.5(a)(2) may be relieved of any further duty to register on obtaining a certificate of rehabilitation under Pen C §§4852.01-4852.21. This relief is available only if the person is not in custody, on parole, or on probation. Pen C §290.5(a)(1).

Ø Note: In People v Hofsheier (2006) 37 C4th 1185, 39 CR3d 821, the supreme court found an equal protection violation in the requirement of mandatory registration for violation of Pen C §288a(b)(1) (voluntary oral copulation with minor aged 16) when mandatory registration was not required for violation of Pen C §261.5 (unlawful sexual intercourse with minor aged 16). The court remanded the case to the trial court to determine if discretionary registration should be ordered (see Pen C §290.006). In the wake of Hofsheier, courts of appeal have divided on extending the ruling to such cases as those involving a minor who is 14 or 15 years old. See, e.g., People v Cavallaro (2009) 178 CA4th 103, 100 CR3d 139 (no violation); People v Garcia (2008) 161 CA4th 475, 74 CR3d 681 (violation). Pending further supreme court decisions in this area, postconviction defense counsel should consider similar equal protection challenges.

H. Certificate of Rehabilitation; Pardon

§41.20 1. Description and Procedures

There are two types of Governor's pardons: a "direct" pardon (Pen C §§4800-4813), and a pardon based on a certificate of rehabilitation (Pen C §§4852.01-4852.21). Direct pardons are requests for pardon made directly to the Governor. Certificates of rehabilitation are first sought from the trial court. If a certificate issues, it is deemed to be a recommendation that the Governor grant a pardon. Pen C §4852.13. The Governor has discretion to grant or deny a pardon. Pen C §4852.16. The pardon may be granted without further investigation, except that a person twice convicted of felonies must also have the recommendation of a majority of the supreme court. Pen C §4852.16. The differences in availability and effect are set out below and in the chart in §41.21. A direct pardon is usually sought by persons who are not eligible for a certificate of rehabilitation, such as nonresidents and misdemeanants.

A full pardon, whether direct or through rehabilitation proceedings, restores all the "rights, privileges, and franchises" of which the person was deprived by reason of the conviction, with some exceptions. Pen C §4853. A pardon does not restore any license, permit, or certificate. Pen C §4852.15.

The Governor may provide that the person is entitled to exercise the right to own or possess and keep any type of firearm, unless the person was convicted of a felony involving use of a dangerous weapon. In the latter event, the provisions prohibiting ex-convicts from owning guns still apply. Pen C §4854.

Direct pardon. When seeking a direct pardon, at least 10 days' notice must be given to the district attorney of the county of conviction (except in unusual specified cases). Pen C §§4804, 4806. The Governor may require reports by the court of conviction. Pen C §4803. The Board of Parole Hearings may, on its own or at the Governor's request, investigate the case. See Pen C §§4803, 4812.

Certificate of rehabilitation. An individual who has been convicted of a felony and has been discharged from custody after the completion of the term to which he or she was sentenced may apply for a certificate of rehabilitation. The applicant must not have been incarcerated in any other state penal institution since his or her release and must present evidence that he or she has been a resident of California for the 3 years immediately preceding the application. Pen C §4852.01(a). An individual who was placed on probation for a felony or for a misdemeanor violation of one of the sex offenses listed in Pen C §290 may also apply for a certificate of rehabilitation if he or she has had the charges dismissed under Pen C §1203.4; has not been incarcerated in another penal institution, jail, or detention facility; is not currently on probation; and has been a resident of California for the 5 years immediately preceding the application. Pen C §4852.01(c).

The only effect of a certificate of rehabilitation stated in the statute is that it makes the person eligible for a gubernatorial pardon. Pen C §4852.16. Beyond this, the effect of a certificate is unclear. However, many government agencies do consider the granting of the certificate in particular circumstances. See, e.g., In re Esperanza C. (2008) 165 CA4th 1042, 1056, 81 CR3d 556 (county agency considers certificate of rehabilitation in deciding whether to grant criminal-record exemption in placing dependent child with relatives).

The following persons are not eligible for a certificate of rehabilitation: life parolees; individuals sentenced to death; individuals convicted of the sex offenses proscribed by Pen C §286(c), §288(c), §288a(c), §288.5(c), or §289(j); or individuals serving in the military. Pen C §4852.01(c)-(d). The Governor may, however, pardon individuals convicted of the sex offenses proscribed by Pen C §286(c), §288(c), §288a(c), §288.5(c), or §289(j) in extraordinary circumstances. Pen C §4852.01(e).

Special rules applicable to sex offenders. A sex offender required to register under the Sex Offender Registration Act (Pen C §§290-290.023) can obtain a certificate of rehabilitation only if (1) he or she is eligible to apply for one under Pen C §4852.01, and (2) the court finds that he or she is not a continuing threat to minors. Pen C §4852.13(b). Under Pen C §290.5(a)(1), the certificate of rehabilitation relieves the person of any further duty to register if:

- The offense requiring registration is not listed in Pen C §290.5(a)(2); and

- The individual is not in custody, on parole, or on probation.

Moreover, the district attorney can petition to revoke the certificate for any offense listed in §290. Pen C §4852.13(c).

Certificate seekers may retain counsel or have counsel appointed. Pen C §4852.08. They are also entitled to assistance from the probation or parole officer and, for persons under 30, from the Division of Juvenile Justice (formerly the California Youth Authority). Pen C §4852.04. There are no filing or court fees. Pen C §§4852.09, 4852.1.

See generally "How to Apply for a Pardon," available from the Office of the Governor, State Capitol, Sacramento, CA 95814, Attention: Legal Unit. An electronic copy is available at http://www.cdcr.ca.gov/BOPH/docs/apply_for_pardon.pdf. §41.22 I. EXPUNGEMENT OF DNA PROFILES AND SAMPLES

When a person's DNA profile was included in the DNA data bank after a felony arrest, the person may request that the DNA specimen and sample be destroyed and the database profile expunged if the person has no past or present offense or pending charge that qualifies that person for inclusion within the DNA Database and Data Bank Program and there otherwise is no legal basis for retaining the specimen or sample or searchable profile. Pen C §299(a). If the specified conditions for the request are satisfied (see Pen C §299(b)), the trial court of the county where the arrest occurred, or the court that entered the conviction or rendered disposition in the case, has the discretion to grant or deny the request. Pen C §299(c)(1). The Petition for Expungement of DNA Profiles and Samples (Judicial Council Form CR-185/JV-796) may be used for the request.

§41.23 VII. RETENTION POLICIES FOR RECORDS OF THE COURT AND DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The courts must retain records of conviction and other criminal records for the times specified in Govt C §68152. For most felonies, this is 75 years. The California Department of Justice (DOJ) retains almost all criminal records until the subject reaches the age of 100. The only records that the DOJ does not retain are criminal records that have been sealed or that contain certain marijuana charges as specified in Health & S C §11361.5.

Anyone arrested or convicted for any charge specified in Health & S C §11361.5 can petition the DOJ to destroy the record. Form BCH 8033, Application to Destroy Arrest/Conviction Records, is available from the Records Management Unit.

The DOJ will notify the FBI when specific arrests or entire records are purged from DOJ files.

§41.24 VIII. CHARTS: EFFECT OF RELIEF FROM DISABILITIES

Ø Warning: These charts do not include federal law. Because statements are short for purposes of the chart, they do not state all details and nuances. For discussion of the effect of these statutes on immigration status, see §§52.12-52.16.

Ø Note: Only persons in state prison or on parole as a result of a felony conviction are disenfranchised from voting. Cal Const art II, §4. See League of Women Voters v McPherson (2006) 145 CA4th 1469, 1480, 52 CR3d 585. Once a person is no longer imprisoned or on parole, the right to vote is automatically restored.

§41.25 IX. PETITION FOR WRIT OF ERROR CORAM NOBIS; MOTION TO VACATE JUDGMENT

Writ of error coram nobis. It if often said that a writ of coram nobis is, in effect, a motion to vacate the judgment, and it can be so designated. See, e.g., 6 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law (3d ed 2000) chap XV, §189. It is more accurate to say that coram nobis is one type of motion to vacate the judgment.

The traditional grounds of a common law petition for a writ of error coram nobis are that (1) some fact existed that, without any fault or negligence by the defendant, was not presented to the court at or before the trial, and that if presented would have prevented the rendition of the judgment; (2) this newly discovered fact must not go to the merits of the issues tried; and (3) this fact must be one that could not in the exercise of due diligence have been discovered earlier. People v Shipman (1965) 62 C2d 226, 230, 42 CR 1. See also People v Vasilyan (2009) 174 CA4th 443, 453, 94 CR3d 260; People v Cortez (1970) 13 CA3d 317, 332, 91 CR 660 (district attorney erroneously promised that defendant would get mental health treatment after his guilty plea). If the judgment has been affirmed on appeal, a writ of error coram nobis must be filed in the appellate court (and is traditionally called coram vobis). Pen C §1265(a).

A petition for a writ of error coram nobis may lie after the time for a new trial motion or a motion to withdraw the plea, or an appeal has lapsed. See, e.g., People v Gallardo (2000) 77 CA4th 971, 92 CR2d 161; People v Cortez (1970) 13 CA3d 317, 91 CR 660. See §§24.38, 26.21. See generally Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 11 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007); 6 Witkin & Epstein, California Criminal Law, Criminal Judgment §§182-193, Criminal Writs §99 (3d ed 2000). The petition may be denied for undue delay in bringing it after knowing of the need and for delay in developing the facts. People v Kim (2009) 45 C4th 1078, 1098, 90 CR3d 355.

Motion to vacate judgment. Motions to vacate the judgment are not limited to motions that could also be writs of error coram nobis. For example, a motion to vacate the judgment is appropriate when the judgment of conviction is void for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. People v Vasilyan (2009) 174 CA4th 443, 453, 94 CR3d 260. Recent years have seen motions to vacate brought by noncitizens who contended that the court did not give them proper admonishments, as required by Pen C §1016.5, of the possible immigration consequences of their plea. See, e.g., People v Superior Court (Zamudio) (2000) 23 C4th 183, 203, 96 CR2d 463.

In addition, under Pen C §1473.6, a person who is no longer in custody or restrained can, in specified circumstances, prosecute a motion to vacate a judgment that was obtained by government fraud or misconduct. Pen C §1473.6. This provision is intended to respond to the fact that habeas corpus relief is generally not available to those whose sentence is served before that misconduct comes to light. To make out a prima facie case for relief under this provision, the moving party must show that the misconduct or fraud took place in his or her case; evidence of misconduct by officials involved in movant's case that took place in other cases is not sufficient. People v Germany (2005) 133 CA4th 784, 35 CR3d 110.

§42.1 I. OVERVIEW

Writs are orders from higher courts to lower courts, agencies, or persons. See CCP §§§1068, 1085, 1102. They are requested through a petition filed in the court being asked to issue the writ. Counsel should attempt to request the proper writ, but the court may grant any writ as long as it has the jurisdiction to do so. See, e.g., Loska v Superior Court (1986) 188 CA3d 569, 574, 233 CR 213 (petitioner sought habeas; court issued writ of review).

Writs of mandate and prohibition. A writ of mandate orders a lower court to perform a duty; a writ of prohibition orders it to refrain from an action that exceeds its authority. See §42.3.

California Constitution article VI, §10, confers concurrent jurisdiction on superior courts, courts of appeal, and the state supreme court to correct lower court actions. See CCP §§1085, 1103. There is a strong judicial preference, however, for filing writ petitions in the lowest court that can issue the writ. Thus, a petition for writ of mandate or prohibition should be filed in the lowest court that is higher than the court to which the proposed writ would be directed. See §42.4. The appellate divisions of superior courts, the courts of appeal, and the supreme court use the same writ procedure. See §42.12A. Superior courts, considering writ requests directed to a magistrate, may also use the same procedure or they may use a notice of motion or order to show cause or some combination of these procedures. See §42.12.

Writs of habeas corpus. Habeas is generally used to challenge the lawfulness of imprisonment, conditions of confinement, or other actual or potential restraint on personal liberty. Pen C §1473 (primary grounds for seeking habeas). It is typically used to challenge the validity of the petitioner's conviction or sentence when facts supporting the claim are not apparent from the trial record. Pen C §1484; In re Bell (1942) 19 C2d 488, 501, 122 P2d 22 (habeas petitioner not confined to record to prove conviction violated constitution). Habeas is usually unavailable as a substitute for ordinary remedies at law such as direct appeal. In re Crow (1971) 4 C3d 613, 622 n9, 94 CR 254. But see In re Crockett (2008) 159 CA4th 751, 759, 71 CR3d 632 (when committing court exceeded its jurisdiction, failure to appeal did not prevent review of habeas petition). It may be used in conjunction with appeal when appellate counsel wishes to challenge an issue that requires evidentiary support from outside the record. See §42.34.

A habeas corpus petition may be filed in the superior court, the court of appeal, or the supreme court, but a petition filed in a reviewing court must state the petitioner's reasons for not filing in the superior court. See §42.26.

Other writs. Writs of supersedeas, coram nobis, coram vobis, and certiorari are not discussed in this chapter. On supersedeas, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 7 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). On coram nobis and coram vobis, see Appeals & Writs, chap 11, and §24.38 of this book. On certiorari, see Appeals & Writs, chap 7.

§42.2 II. CHART: DEADLINES

Action	Court	Deadline	Authority
(1) Writs of Mandate and Prohibition:
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging judgment or order in misdemeanor or infraction case.	Appellate division of superior court. See §42.4.	30 calendar days after court order, unless court permits later filing.	People v Municipal Court (Mercer) (1979) 99 CA3d 749, 752, 160 CR 455 (writ petition must usually be filed within period prescribed for appeals); see Cal Rules of Ct 8.853(a), 8.902(a).
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging order of magistrate in felony case.	Appellate division of superior court. See §42.4.	60 calendar days after court order; however, court can exercise discretion to hear later-filed petition.	See People v Superior Court (Clements) (1988) 200 CA3d 491, 496, 246 CR 122 (noting courts' reluctance to entertain writ petitions filed beyond deadline for appeal); People v Municipal Court (Mercer), supra.
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging action of trial court in felony case after indictment or information.	Court of appeal. See §42.4.	60 calendar days after judgment or order; however, court can exercise discretion to hear later-filed petition. (See different time limits below for writ petitions reviewing Pen C §§995, 1538.5 decisions.)	See People v Municipal Court (Mercer), supra; People v Superior Court (Clements), supra; People v Superior Court (Duran) (1978) 84 CA3d 480, 489, 148 CR 698 (court considered petition filed nearly 3 months after challenged sentence imposed); Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a).
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging superior court's grant or denial of writ petition challenging action of trial judge (misdemeanor or infraction) or magistrate (felony).	Court of appeal. See §42.19.	60 calendar days after superior court judgment or order; however, court can exercise discretion to hear later-filed petition.	People v Superior Court (Clements) (1988) 200 CA3d 491, 495, 246 CR 122 (court entertained petition filed about 2½ months after superior court's challenged denial of mandate petitions).
File petition for writ of prohibition challenging denial of Pen C §995 motion. (Review available only if defendant made motion within 60 days after arraignment in superior court, except in limited circumstances. Pen C §1510. See discussion in §13.40.)	Court of appeal.	15 calendar days after Pen C §995 motion is denied, if basis for petition is that information or indictment lacked reasonable or probable cause. If petition is not based on alleged lack of reasonable or probable cause, 15-day rule does not apply.	Pen C §999a; Ondarza v Superior Court (1980) 106 CA3d 195, 200, 164 CR 892 (claim of illegal commitment by magistrate; time limit inapplicable); Penney v Superior Court (1972) 28 CA3d 941, 944, 105 CR 162 (challenge to denial of motion to dismiss indictment for due process violation; time limit inapplicable).

mandate or prohibition challenging grant of Pen C §995 motion.		should be filed no later than deadline for filing appeal. (Appeal is usual avenue of review.)
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging denial of Pen C §1538.5(i) motion. (Review available only if defendant made motion within 60 calendar days after arraignment in superior court, except in limited circumstances. Pen C §1510.)	Court of appeal.	30 calendar days after order denying motion.	Pen C §1538.5(i).
File notice of intention to file petition challenging grant of defendant's Pen C §1538.5(i) motion. (Required if trial is set for less than 30 days after grant of motion. Pen C §1538.5(o).)	Superior court. Pen C §1538.5(o).	Trial date or 10 calendar days after Pen C §1538.5(i) special hearing at which motion is granted, "whichever occurs last." (Conflicting authority on what this means.)	Pen C §1538.5(o). Compare People v Superior Court (Sandoval) (1972) 29 CA3d 135, 138, 105 CR 268 (prosecution must file notice of intention within 10 days after grant of motion or, if trial date is sooner, on or before trial date), with People v Superior Court (Abrahms) (1976) 55 CA3d 759, 765, 127 CR 672 (Sandoval statement is dictum contrary to statutory language).
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging grant of Pen C §1538.5(i) motion.	Court of appeal. Pen C §1538.5(o).	30 calendar days after motion is granted at special hearing.	Pen C §1538.5(o).
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging grant of probation in misdemeanor or infraction case (prosecution only).	Appellate division of superior court.	60 calendar days after probation is granted.	Pen C §1466(1)(H).
File petition for writ of mandate or prohibition challenging grant of probation in felony case (prosecution only).	Court of appeal.	60 calendar days after probation is granted.	Pen C §1238(d).
File preliminary ("informal") opposition.	Court in which writ petition filed.	Within 10 days after petition filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(a)(1), 8.933(a)(1).
File reply to preliminary opposition.	Court in which writ petition filed.	Within 10 days after opposition filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(a)(3), 8.933(a)(3).
File opposition to issuance of peremptory writ in first instance.	Court in which writ petition filed.	Within 30 days after court notifies parties that it is considering issuing peremptory writ (unless court orders otherwise).	Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(2), 8.933(b)(2).
File return (by real party in interest or respondent) after court issues alternative writ.	Court that issued alternative writ.	30 days after court issues alternative writ (unless court orders otherwise).	Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(2), 8.933(b)(2).
File reply to opposition or return.	Court in which writ petition filed.	Within 15 days after opposition or return filed	Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(3), 8.933(b)(3).

		(unless court orders otherwise).
File petition for rehearing after appellate division issues judgment.	Appellate division of superior court.	15 calendar days after decision is filed, publication order restarting finality period, or modification order changing appellate judgment.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.889(b).
File petition for rehearing after court of appeal issues judgment. Note: Not available if court denied writ petition without issuing alternative writ or order to show cause. Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)(1), 8.490(b)(1).	Court of appeal.	15 calendar days after decision is filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(b)(1).
File petition for rehearing after supreme court issues judgment. (Not available if court denied review or denied writ petition without issuing alternative writ or order to show cause. Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)(1), 8.532(b)(2), 8.536(a).)	Supreme court.	15 calendar days after decision is filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)-(b), 8.536(a)-(b).
File answer to petition for rehearing (only if requested by court).	Court in which petition for rehearing was filed.	8 calendar days after court's order requesting answer is served and filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(b)(2), 8.536(b), 8.889(b)(2).
File petition for review after court of appeal issues judgment.	Supreme court.	10 calendar days after summary denial by court of appeal, or within 40 days after filing by court of appeal of decision other than summary denial.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.490(b)(1)-(2), 8.500(e).
File answer to petition for review.	Supreme court.	20 calendar days after petition for review is filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.500(e)(4).
File reply to answer to petition for review.	Supreme court.	10 calendar days after answer to petition for review is filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.500(e)(5).
(2) Writs of Habeas Corpus:
File petition for writ of habeas corpus.	Superior court, court of appeal, or supreme court. See §42.26.	No statutory time limit; however, passage of time may be deemed procedural default.	See In re Sanders (1999) 21 C4th 697, 703, 87 CR2d 899 (habeas petitions in both death penalty and noncapital cases must be filed "reasonably promptly"); In re C*lark* (1993) 5 C4th 750, 785, 21 CR2d 509 (unjustified delay barred consideration of merits).
(a) Time Limits in Superior Court:
Grant, deny, request informal response, or issue order to show cause.	Superior court.	60 calendar days after filing or receipt of habeas petition.	Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(3)(A).
Request for ruling.	Superior court.	After 60 calendar days have passed without ruling.	Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(3)(B).
Informal response.	Superior court.	Within 15 calendar days of	Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(b)(2).

		request by court.
Reply to informal response.	Superior court.	Within 15 calendar days after service of response upon petitioner.	Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(b)(2).
File return.	Superior court.	30 calendar days after issuance of order to show cause.	Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(d).
File denial following service of return.	Superior court.	30 calendar days after service and filing of return.	Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(e).
Evidentiary hearing.	Superior court.	30 calendar days after filing of denial or expiration of time for filing denial.	Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(f).
(b) Time Limits in Court of Appeal:
File prosecution's appeal from superior court's order granting all or part of relief sought by defendant.	Court of appeal.	60 calendar days after the making of the order.	Pen C §1506; Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a).
File return and traverse as part of habeas proceedings initiated in court of appeal.	Court of appeal.	Time limits set by court.	None.
File petition for rehearing after court of appeal issues judgment. Note: Available only if court issued order to show cause or filed decision in related appeal on same day. Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)(1), 8.387(b)(2).)	Court of appeal.	15 calendar days after decision is filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(b)(1).
File answer to petition for rehearing (only if requested by court).	Court of appeal.	8 calendar days after court's order requesting answer is served and filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(b)(2).
(c) Time Limits in California Supreme Court:
File petition for review after court of appeal issues judgment.	Supreme court.	10 calendar days after court of appeal decision becomes final. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.264(b),(finality of decision).	Cal Rules of Ct 8.500(e)(1).
File return and traverse as part of habeas proceedings initiated in supreme court.	Supreme court.	Time limits set by court.	None.
File petition for rehearing after supreme court issues judgment. (Not available if court denied review or summarily denied writ petition. Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)(1), 8.532(b)(2), 8.536(a).)	Supreme court.	15 calendar days after decision is filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)-(b), 8.536(a)-(b).
File answer to petition for rehearing.	Supreme court.	8 calendar days after petition is filed.	Cal Rules of Ct 8.536(b).

III. WRITS OF MANDATE AND PROHIBITION

§42.3 A. Comparison and Mechanics of Mandate and Prohibition; Statutes Providing for Writ Review

A writ of mandate, also called a writ of mandamus (CCP §1084), is used to compel a court, officer, or agency to perform a duty required by law or to compel a court to assume jurisdiction and exercise its discretion after its refusal to act. Robbins v Superior Court (1985) 38 C3d 199, 205, 211 CR 398. See also CCP §1085. A writ of prohibition is used to restrain or prevent a judicial act that is without jurisdiction or is in excess of the court's jurisdiction. CCP §1102.

Ø Note: Requests for relief by mandate and prohibition are frequently used interchangeably by attorneys. Writ attorneys working for the courts, however, distinguish between the two writs, and may look more favorably on a petition that requests the correct relief.

If counsel is unsure of the correct designation, or if both mandate and prohibition are desired, the petition may request a writ of mandate and/or prohibition. See, e.g., Owens v Superior Court (1980) 28 C3d 238, 243, 168 CR 466. When a petition has been misnamed, the court will grant the correct writ if it has the power to decide the case and there is a writ that is the proper procedural vehicle. See, e.g., People v Superior Court (Manuel G.) (2002) 104 CA4th 915, 924, 128 CR2d 794 (prosecution appeal treated as mandate petition); People v Payne (1988) 202 CA3d 933, 935, 249 CR 67 (appeal from nonappealable proceeding treated as petition for writ of mandate).

Statutes governing mandate are found in CCP §§1084-1097 and 1107-1108. Statutes governing prohibition are in CCP §§1102-1108.

Sometimes a statute will specify the type of writ required. For example, Pen C §999a requires a writ of prohibition to compel the trial court to set aside an information or indictment. Penal Code §1538.5(i) and (o) permit either mandate or prohibition to correct suppression rulings.

The most common issues in criminal cases for which statutes or rules provide writ review are the following:

- Denial of disqualification motion under CCP §§170.1 and 170.6 (CCP §170.3(d)).
- Denial of Pen C §995 motion (Pen C §999a; see also Pen C §1510).

Ø Note: A defendant who alleges that he or she was committed without reasonable or probable cause also may challenge the denial of a Pen C §995 motion in a petition for writ of habeas corpus. Pen C §1487(7).

- Finding of unfitness under Welf & I C §707 (Cal Rules of Ct 5.772(j)).
- Motion to return property under forfeiture statutes granted (Health & S C §11488.4(h)).
- Order granting severance or discovery (Pen C §1512).
- Probation granted (Pen C §§1238(d), 1466(1)(H)). See also People v Bailey (1996) 45 CA4th 926, 932, 53 CR2d 198 (prosecution cannot appeal from order granting probation; request to treat opening brief as mandate petition denied as untimely).
- Prosecution's motion to reinstate complaint under Pen C §871.5 granted (Pen C §871.5(f)).
- Preliminary hearing set beyond time specified in Pen C §859b, or preliminary hearing continued without good cause (Pen C §871.6).
- Search and seizure ruling (Pen C §1538.5(i), (o); see also Pen C §1510).

Ø Note: The Penal Code provides for pretrial writ review of suppression motions only in felony cases. In a misdemeanor case, either the prosecution or the defendant may take an appeal to the superior court's appellate division after the trial court rules on a suppression motion. Pen C §1538.5(j). The notice of appeal must be filed within 30 days after the trial court grants or denies the motion. Pen C §1538.5(i); Cal Rules of Ct 8.853(a). Except in limited circumstances, the defendant may seek pretrial review only if the suppression motion was made within 45 days after the defendant's arraignment on the complaint. Pen C §1510.

- Setting of felony trial beyond time specified in Pen C §1049.5, or continuing matter without good cause (Pen C §1511).

§42.4 B. Court in Which to File Petition

Petitions for writ of mandate and/or prohibition may be filed in the first instance in the superior court, court of appeal, or the California Supreme Court. Cal Const art VI, §10; CCP §§1085, 1103. As a practical matter, however, higher courts seldom grant relief when a petition could have been filed in a lower court. If the petitioner bypasses a court, the petition must explain why this was done. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(a)(1). When a petition is originally filed in the California Supreme Court, the court will in almost every instance transfer the petition to the appropriate lower court for initial determination, unless all parties and the court agree that the issue is of statewide importance and requires a conclusive answer. See, e.g., People v Seijas (2005) 36 C4th 291, 307, 30 CR3d 493 (habeas petition filed in supreme court after that court-granted review was transferred to court of appeal after remand to that court); Raven v Deukmejian (1990) 52 C3d 336, 276 CR 326. See Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 7 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

In misdemeanor and infraction cases, superior court appellate divisions have jurisdiction to entertain mandate and prohibition petitions. CCP §§1085(b), 1103(b). See Brant v Superior Court (City of Los Angeles) (2003) 108 CA4th 100, 132 CR2d 783 (after trial court in misdemeanor case denied discovery motion, appellate division entertained mandate petition).

In felony cases pending before magistrates, superior courts have jurisdiction over mandate and prohibition petitions. People v Superior Court (Jimenez) (2002) 28 C4th 798, 123 CR2d 31 (superior court is appropriate forum for mandate petition concerning peremptory challenge to magistrate). Review of a magistrate's decision may not be conducted by the same judge who conducted the preliminary hearing acting as a magistrate. Cal Const art VI, §23; Pen C §859c.

Courts of appeal have jurisdiction over mandate and prohibition petitions in felony cases after arraignment on the information. See Cal Const art VI, §§10-11.

On filing a writ petition that challenges a lower court's grant or denial of a petition for writ of mandate or prohibition, see §42.19.

C. General Requirements for Issuance of Writ

§42.5 1. Trial Court Has Acted Beyond Its Jurisdiction or Abused Its Discretion

A writ issues when an inferior court or agency has acted without or in excess of its jurisdiction (prohibition) or has failed to act as prescribed by law (mandate). CCP §§1102 (prohibition), 1084, 1985 (mandate). Some cases suggest that a writ is not available to compel a court or agency to perform a "discretionary" act. See, e.g., People v Superior Court (Maldonado) (2006) 137 CA4th 353, 364, 40 CR3d 365 (denial of Kelly-Frye hearing not in excess of jurisdiction; prosecution could not seek writ); Tirapelle v Davis (1993) 20 CA4th 1317, 1328, 26 CR2d 666 (ministerial, but not discretionary, duty of state controller may be directed by writ of mandate); People v Municipal Court (Kong) (1981) 122 CA3d 176, 180, 175 CR 861 (mandate not available to prosecution to review magistrate's reduction of felony to misdemeanor); Taliaferro v Locke (1960) 182 CA2d 752, 755, 6 CR 813 (mandate will issue "only where a court has refused to perform a clear duty, unmixed with discretionary power or the exercise of judgment"). Other cases, however, hold that writ review is available to correct an abuse of discretion. See, e.g., Rhyne v Municipal Court (1980) 113 CA3d 807, 819, 170 CR 312 (mandate may issue to compel performance of "duty not to abuse discretion"). A pretrial writ generally will not lie to resolve a question about the admissibility of evidence, because the challenged pretrial ruling will not be binding on the trial court and may be reconsidered. People v Municipal Court (Ahnemann) (1974) 12 C3d 658, 660, 117 CR 20.

For further discussion of what kinds of trial court error are reviewable by writ of mandate or prohibition, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 7 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.6 2. No Plain, Speedy, and Adequate Remedy at Law

Writ relief is available only when the petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. CCP §1086; Phelan v Superior Court (1950) 35 C2d 363, 370, 217 P2d 951 (mandate); Lewis v Superior Court (2008) 169 CA4th 70, 77, 86 CR3d 565 (mandate); CCP §1103; Duke v Justice Court (1940) 42 CA2d 178, 180, 108 P2d 707 (prohibition). The petition must inform the court why extraordinary relief is necessary and why an ordinary appeal is insufficient. CCP §§1086, 1103. See Schlick v Superior Court (1992) 4 C4th 310, 14 CR2d 406.

Even when a remedy by appeal exists, it may be inadequate. See, e.g., People v Superior Court (Bolden) (1989) 209 CA3d 1109, 257 CR 678 (appeal inadequate to challenge order dismissing special circumstance allegation because trial might take place in meantime); People v Phillips (1985) 169 CA3d 632, 215 CR 394 (defendant should have filed writ petition before trial on speedy trial claim because prejudice would have been presumed then).

> Ø Note: Some statutes specifically provide for writ relief. See §42.3. That a statute specifically provides for writ relief, however, does not mean that the writ will necessarily issue; relief is discretionary. See CCP §§1085, 1103. Counsel may wish to argue, however, that if a statute specifically provides for writ relief, the legislature has determined that appeal does not provide speedy and adequate redress.

For further discussion of the requirement to show the inadequacy of appeal, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 7 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.6A 3. Beneficial Interest

The petitioner must have a beneficial interest in the outcome. See CCP §1086 (mandate); Wells v Municipal Court (1981) 126 CA3d 808, 812, 179 CR 128 (prohibition). Thus, for example, a public defender "may not proceed in his official capacity, on his own initiative, to raise issues detached from the representation of a particular defendant." 126 CA3d at 813 (public defender lacked authority to seek writ review of sentencing guidelines). If the challenged action affects the public defender directly, however, the petition may be in that official's name. Mowrer v Appellate Dep't (1990) 226 CA3d 264, 276 CR 38 (appointment of public defender to represent indigent misdemeanor appellants).

A lower court is deemed to have no "beneficial interest" in seeking a writ directed to a reviewing court. Municipal Court v Superior Court (Swenson) (1988) 202 CA3d 957, 960, 249 CR 182 (municipal court lacked standing to seek mandate against superior court; "if no individual party finds it worth his or her while to champion the cause and seek judicial review, then review will not occur"). On a lower court's standing to oppose a writ petition in a reviewing court, see §42.16.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.7 4. Objection Made in Trial Court

The petitioner must usually object in some way in the trial court in order to obtain writ review. People v Superior Court (Dorsey) (1996) 50 CA4th 1216, 58 CR2d 165 (prosecutor had no opportunity to object but had argued issue). The requirement may be waived by the court when a constitutional question appears on the face of the record. Preston v Municipal Court (1961) 188 CA2d 76, 10 CR 301. Nevertheless, because the granting of an extraordinary writ is discretionary (see Castaneda v Municipal Court (1972) 25 CA3d 588, 102 CR 230), counsel should always try to make a strong record in the trial court.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.8 5. Timely Filing of Writ Petition

Some statutes specify a time period within which to file a writ petition. See, e.g., Pen C §§999a, 1538.5(i). These statutory time limits are jurisdictional. People v Superior Court (Brent) (1992) 2 CA4th 675, 683, 3 CR2d 375 (review of motion to return property under Health & S C §11488.4(h)); People v Superior Court (Sandoval) (1972) 29 CA3d 135, 137, 105 CR 268 (Pen C §1538.5(o) review).

When there is no statutory deadline, the petition should be filed within the same time period designated for filing a notice of appeal; i.e., 30 calendar days when challenging an action in a misdemeanor case (Cal Rules of Ct 8.853(a)), and 60 calendar days when the challenge is to an action in a felony case (Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a)). An unexplained or unjustified delay is a ground for denying the writ. People v Municipal Court (Mercer) (1979) 99 CA3d 749, 752, 160 CR 455. The court does have jurisdiction, however, to consider a petition filed after the analogous appeal deadline has expired. People v Superior Court (Clements) (1988) 200 CA3d 491, 246 CR 122. If extraordinary circumstances exist that satisfactorily explain the delay, the petitioner should allege them. See People v Municipal Court (Mercer), supra.

> Ø Note: In Lewis v Superior Court (2008) 169 CA4th 70, 77, 86 CR3d 565, the defendant appealed the trial court's denial of his motion to set aside a lifetime sex offender registration requirement brought 20 years after the order had been made. Because the defendant had made an adequate showing of his right to relief and no plain, speedy, alternative remedy at law (see §42.6) existed, and because neither the prosecutor nor the attorney general objected to consideration on the merits, the court treated defendant's appeal as a petition for a writ of mandate directing the trial court to strike the registration order.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.9 6. Sufficient Record Must Accompany Writ Petition

The petition to the reviewing court must include a record sufficient to permit review of the challenged ruling. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(b), 8.931(b); Sherwood v Superior Court (1979) 24 C3d 183, 186, 154 CR 917. The record must, if possible, be lodged with the reviewing court at the time the original petition is filed. If the record is unavailable at the time of filing, counsel must submit a declaration with the petition that explains the petition's urgency and the unavailability of the record and fairly summarizes the proceedings below. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(b)(2), 8.931(b)(2). If only the reporter's transcript is unavailable, Rule 8.486(b)(3) details what to do. Counsel should meet these same requirements when filing in the superior court unless local court rules have different requirements. The items that must be filed in the appellate courts, and their format, are set out in Rules 8.486(b)-(c), 8.931(b)(3). Each item in the record must be legible. Sherwood v Superior Court, supra.

In the superior court, an adequate record ordinarily includes any written motion and opposition, relevant pleadings, reporter's transcripts (if ready), written orders, and copies of any exhibits necessary for a complete understanding of the case.

The petitioner must make a formal motion to obtain a complete record if it cannot be obtained informally. Herrera v Superior Court (1985) 172 CA3d 1159, 1164, 218 CR 742.

Ø Note: Failing to file an available transcript with the writ petition can result in sanctions against counsel if it appears that the main purpose was to delay trial. See Gottlieb v Superior Court (1991) 232 CA3d 804, 814, 283 CR 771 (counsel fined $5000).

§42.10 7. Verification

A petition filed on behalf of an individual (or a corporation) must be verified. CCP §§1086, 1103; Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(a)(4), 8.932(b)(4). Although this requirement may not apply to a petition filed by a state or public agency (see CCP §446), it is better practice for the attorney filing the petition on behalf of a public entity to verify the petition. The courts of appeal are divided on whether §446 applies to writ petitions. Compare People v Superior Court (Alvarado) (1989) 207 CA3d 464, 470, 255 CR 46 (prosecutor's writ petition must be verified), and Municipal Court v Superior Court (Sinclair) (1988) 199 CA3d 19, 25 n1, 244 CR 591 (same), with Verzi v Superior Court (1986) 183 CA3d 382, 228 CR 299 (prosecutor does not have to verify).

There is an additional danger in unverified pleadings: Even if otherwise authorized, they do not establish facts. Star Motor Imports, Inc. v Superior Court (1979) 88 CA3d 201, 151 CR 721. Counsel may file exhibits and declarations that fill this gap (People v Superior Court (Alvarado), supra; Perlman v Municipal Court (1979) 99 CA3d 568, 574, 160 CR 567) or amend the verification (99 CA3d at 575).

The attorney may verify the petition when the facts are within the attorney's knowledge or when a party is unable to do so. CCP §446; Perlman v Municipal Court, supra. The attorney must state why the verification was not made by the party. CCP §446.

The verification should not be made on information and belief. A verification made on information and belief is insufficient to prove the facts stated in the petition. North Shuttle Serv. v PUC (1998) 67 CA4th 386, 392 n4, 79 CR2d 46. See People v McCarthy (1986) 176 CA3d 593, 597, 222 CR 291 (attorney's verification of habeas petition stating "I believe [the contents] to be true" was hearsay and insufficient to verify facts stated in petition); Star Motor Imports, Inc. v Superior Court (1979) 88 CA3d 201, 204, 151 CR 721 (affidavit made on information and belief was hearsay and should have been disregarded). See the sample verification in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §42.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.11 8. Effect of Fugitive Defendant

An appellate court may refuse to hear an appeal when the defendant has fled custody. People v Buffalo (1975) 49 CA3d 838, 123 CR 308. The court has the same option in a writ proceeding when the petitioner escapes. See Cooper v Superior Court (1981) 118 CA3d 499, 173 CR 520 (court exercises discretion not to dismiss mandate petition by escaped prisoner, now in custody in another state, who is one of three co-petitioners).

D. Procedure After Writ Petition Is Filed

§42.12 1. Superior Court

Writ petitions concerning preliminary matters handled by a magistrate may be filed in superior court. See, e.g., People v Toney (2004) 32 C4th 228, 230 n2, 8 CR3d 577 (superior court judge sitting as magistrate has jurisdiction and powers of magistrate, not superior court judge); People v Superior Court (Jimenez) (2002) 28 C4th 798, 803, 123 CR2d 31 (writ regarding magistrate properly filed in superior court). Procedures vary in the superior courts for writs of mandate/prohibition. Some courts use the procedures employed in the appellate division of the superior court, courts of appeal, and supreme court (discussed in §42.12A). Other superior courts use a notice of motion procedure, and still others follow an order to show cause format.

In a court that follows the notice of motion procedure, counsel notices the petition as if it were a motion, setting it for a hearing. If the petitioner is successful, the court issues a peremptory writ following the hearing. See discussion of procedures applicable to writs in superior court in Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 8 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). See also chap 18 in this book (pretrial motion practice).

When the court uses the order to show cause procedure, the petitioner initiates the procedure by making an ex parte application for an order requiring the opposing party to attend a hearing and show cause why the court should not issue a peremptory writ. See discussion of order to show cause procedures used for writs in superior court in Appeals & Writs, chap 8. For discussion of ex parte and order to show cause procedures generally, see California Civil Procedure Before Trial, chap 13 (4th ed Cal CEB 2004).

Ø Note: Counsel must determine, either from local rules or (if there are none) from local practitioners or court personnel, what procedures are used.

§42.12A 2. Appellate Division of Superior Court, Courts of Appeal, and Supreme Court

Appellate division of superior court. As of January 1, 2009, the appellate division of the superior court generally follows the same procedure as the courts of appeal and supreme court. After a petition is filed, the appellate division of the superior court may (Cal Rules of Ct 8.933(a)(4)):

- Deny the petition;
- Issue an alternative writ or order to show cause; or
- Notify the parties that it is considering issuing a peremptory writ in the first instance.

Courts of appeal and supreme court. The courts of appeal and supreme court follow the same procedure. After the petitioner files a petition, the court may (Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(a)(4)):

- Deny the petition without opinion or argument (see Calhoun v Vallejo City Unified Sch. Dist. (1993) 20 CA4th 39, 24 CR2d 337);
- Issue an alternative writ or order to show cause ordering the respondent or real party in interest either to:
- Act as the petitioner has requested, or
- Show cause in the appellate court, at a date and time specified, why it should not be ordered to do so; or
- Notify the parties that it is considering issuing a peremptory writ in the first instance.

For further discussion of circumstances warranting issuance of a peremptory writ in the first instance, see §42.18.

§42.13 E. Filing Fee Not Required

The county clerk may not charge a fee for services rendered in a criminal action, except for making or certifying copies of documents or other records in the court file. Govt C §70633(b). Because a petition for an extraordinary writ arising from a criminal case is considered to be part of the same proceeding, the court may not impose a filing fee on the petitioner. Bravo v Cabell (1974) 11 C3d 834, 838, 114 CR 618 (construing former Govt C §26857; now see Govt C §70633(b)).

§42.14 F. Stay of Proceedings in Trial Court

The granting of an alternative writ of mandate or order to show cause does not automatically stay proceedings in the trial court. The reviewing court must issue a stay. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(a)(7), 8.932(b)(7). Although it can be argued that the granting of an alternative writ of prohibition does operate as a stay of proceedings, it is safer for counsel to simply request a stay when needed. Failure to obtain a stay could result in the trial court's going forward on the case and rendering moot the issue raised by the petition.

Counsel should apply first to the trial court for a continuance or stay. If the trial court denies the motion, or in the case of a prosecution petition, when a continuance may not be available because of speedy trial problems (Pen C §1382), the petitioner should apply to the reviewing court for a stay of proceedings. For discussion of requesting stays when the superior court is the reviewing court, see California Civil Writ Practice, chap 6 (4th ed Cal CEB 2008). When the court of appeal is the reviewing court, and a stay is sought, a statement to that effect ("STAY REQUESTED") must be placed on the front cover of the petition or opposition. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(a)(7)(B). See discussion of requesting stays from the court of appeal in Civ Writ Prac, chap 19.

The respondent or real party in interest may file a memorandum in opposition to the stay. See Civ Writ Prac, chaps 6, 19. For further discussion of stays, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 7 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

§42.15 G. Form of Petition

Superior court. In the superior court, the civil law and motion rules (Cal Rules of Ct 3.1100-3.1804) apply to proceedings on a petition for writ of mandate or prohibition. Cal Rules of Ct 3.1103(a)(2). In addition, Cal Rules of Ct 2.100-2.119 govern the form and format of all documents filed in the superior court. The document first filed by the petitioner in the superior court will depend on whether the court uses an alternative/peremptory writ, notice of motion, or order to show cause procedure. See §42.12. A petition is filed when the alternative/peremptory writ procedure is used, and is commonly used in the order to show cause procedure as well. A standard pretrial motion format is common for the notice of motion procedure. See Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 8 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

Counsel should consult with the court's writ clerk or local counsel to learn whether there are any unwritten local practices in writ proceedings.

Service and filing requirements are discussed in §42.15A.

Appellate division of superior court. California Rules of Court 8.930-8.936 apply to writs taken in the appellate division of the superior court. Unrepresented parties must use Petition for Writ (Misdemeanor, Infraction, or Limited Civil Case) (Judicial Council Form APP-151) to file a writ petition in the appellate division of superior court, unless the court permits otherwise. Cal Rules of Ct 8.931(a). This form may be used by counsel. Cal Rules of Ct 8.932(b)(1). The form and content of a petition and required supporting documents are set forth in Cal Rules of Ct 8.883 and 8.930-8.932. In addition, the civil law and motion rules (Cal Rules of Ct 3.1100-3.1312) apply to proceedings on a petition for writ of mandate or prohibition in the superior court. Cal Rules of Ct 3.1103(a)(2).

Service and filing requirements are discussed in §42.15A.

Courts of appeal. The form and content requirements for a petition for writ of mandate and/or prohibition in the courts of appeal are set forth in Cal Rules of Ct 8.486, among other rules. The petition should have a red cover. Cal Rules of Ct 8.40(b). The cover must display the name, address, telephone number, and State Bar number of the attorney filing the petition. Cal Rules of Ct 8.40(c), 8.204(b). The petition must be accompanied by a memorandum (Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(a)(5)) and by proof of service (Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(e)). The rules on the form of briefs in the court of appeal, primarily Cal Rules of Ct 8.204, generally apply to papers filed in writ proceedings in the court of appeal. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.485(a). See §42.15A.

Exhibits may be attached to the end of the petition or may be in a separate volume. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(c). The exhibits must be index-tabbed and consecutively paginated. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(c). A table of contents must preface the exhibits, listing each document by title and its index tab number or letter. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(c).

For detailed discussion and sample forms and clauses, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 8 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). See also the sample form in California Criminal Law Forms Manual §42.1 (2d ed Cal CEB 2005).

Supreme court. The form and content requirements for petitions for writs of mandate and prohibition in the California Supreme Court are the same as in the courts of appeal. Cal Rules of Ct 8.40, 8.486.

§42.15A H. Filing and Service Requirements

Superior court. In the superior court, one copy of a petition is usually filed, with attached or lodged exhibits, unless local rules require more copies. The petition must be served on each respondent and real party in interest named in it. CCP §1107. Some courts require proof of service to accompany the petition when it is filed. In other courts, the practice is for alternative writs to issue without prior service of the petition. This practice is allowed in the court's "discretion and for good cause." CCP §1107. The petition is then served with the alternative writ. It may be necessary to conform extra copies of the petition if the court requires that a copy be served again along with the alternative writ (when one issues).

When the notice of motion or order to show cause procedures discussed in §42.12 are used, proof of service is usually not required to be filed with the motion or petition. See CCP §§1088.5, 1107. However, proof of service must be filed before any hearing or action by the court on the petition. CCP §1088.5.

Appellate division of superior court. In the appellate division of the superior court, the court may allow the petition to be filed without a proof of service, but it may also insist that the proof of service be amended to correct any defects within 5 days of the clerk's notice of a defect. If the defect is not corrected, the court may strike the petition or impose a lesser sanction. Cal Rules of Ct 8.931(d)(4)-(5).

Courts of appeal. The original petition, opposition or return, and four copies must be filed in the court of appeal. Cal Rules of Ct 8.44(b)(3), 8.486(c)(3).

The petition must be accompanied by proof of service on the respondent, any real party in interest named in the petition, the attorney for each party separately represented, and each unrepresented party. Cal Rules of Ct 8.25(a)(1)-(2), 8.486(e)(3). A preliminary opposition or return by the respondent or real party must be served on all other parties, and proof of service must be filed with the opposition. Cal Rules of Ct 8.25(a), 8.487(a)(1), 8.487(b)(2). The proof of service must name each party represented by each attorney served. Cal Rules of Ct 8.25(a)(2).

The real party in interest must be served with both the petition and one set of supporting documents. If the respondent is not the superior court or a judge of that court, the respondent must also be served with both the petition and one set of supporting documents. If the respondent is the superior court or a judge of that court, only the petition (not the supporting documents) must be served on it. Cal Rules of Ct 8.486(e)(1)-(2). The petition must also be served on the Attorney General. Cal Rules of Ct 8.29(c), 8.486(e)(4).

Supreme court. The California Supreme Court requires an original and ten copies of a petition, opposition, or return. Cal Rules of Ct 8.44(a)(2), 8.486(c)(3). Service requirements are the same as in the courts of appeal.

I. Response to Writ Petition

§42.16 1. Right to Respond to Writ Petition

A party who would be adversely affected by a proposed writ must be given an opportunity to respond to the petition. A writ petition may not be granted by default. CCP §1088. See Kernes v Superior Court (2000) 77 CA4th 525, 91 CR2d 765 (due process requires reviewing court to give real party in interest opportunity to file opposition, unless exceptional circumstances require immediate issuance of writ).

The respondent court generally may not defend itself or hire counsel to defend it, because it is presumed to be disinterested in the outcome. See Ng v Superior Court (1997) 52 CA4th 1010, 1016, 61 CR2d 49, disapproved on other grounds in Curle v Superior Court (2001) 24 C4th 1057, 1069 n6, 103 CR2d 751 (trial judge lacks standing to oppose writ petition, even though trial court is nominal respondent, if issue does not involve court's operating procedures or budget). But see James G. v Superior Court (2000) 80 CA4th 275, 95 CR2d 135 (trial court allowed to file opposition to writ petition when real party could not meaningfully oppose petition because both petition and underlying motion were filed under seal).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.16A 2. Types of Response

The types of response to a writ petition that may be filed by an opposing party are preliminary opposition (sometimes referred to as an "informal" opposition), return, and opposition (when available).

Preliminary opposition. A preliminary opposition is filed as soon as possible after the petition to persuade the court not to issue an alternative writ. The court may request a preliminary opposition and give a deadline in its request. Otherwise, a preliminary opposition is optional.

Return. A return is the formal response to the court's issuance of an alternative writ or an order to show cause; it is the vehicle the respondent or real party in interest uses to dispute the factual or legal allegations set out in the petition. If the respondent or real party in interest fails to deny material allegations, the court deems them admitted. Rodriguez v Municipal Court (1972) 25 CA3d 521, 526, 102 CR 45.

Opposition. If the court notifies the parties that it is considering issuing a peremptory writ in the first instance (frequently called Palma notice after Palma v U.S. Indus. Fasteners, Inc. (1984) 36 C3d 171, 203 CR 626), the respondent or any real party in interest may file an opposition.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.17 3. Procedures for Responding

Superior court. Responses are served on the petitioner, on other parties, and on the court. CCP §465. The type of response depends on which of the three procedures is used to file the petition. When the alternative/peremptory writ procedure is used, the same responses can be filed as in the courts of appeal: preliminary opposition, return, and opposition (when available). When the noticed motion procedure is used, the return is commonly in the same format as a response to a motion in a civil case. When the order to show cause procedure is used, the practice varies.

When an alternative writ is requested, the return must be filed at least 5 court days before the time appointed for the hearing. Cal Rules of Ct 3.1300(a) (states rule for law and motion); Cal Rules of Ct 3.1103(a) (defines law and motion as including writs of review, mandate, and prohibition); CCP §1089 (Judicial Council rules to be followed to determine date for filing of return in mandate proceedings); CCP §1105 (relevant mandate rules apply to prohibition).

If no alternative writ is sought (i.e., when the notice of motion or order to show cause procedures are used), the time for filing the return depends on the record. If the record was filed with the petition, or if no record is required, the return must be filed within 30 calendar days after service of the petition. CCP §1089.5. When the record has been ordered, the return is required to be filed within 30 calendar days following receipt of a copy of the record. CCP §1089.5.

If the court's order does not specify a filing date or a format for the return, counsel should consult local rules or the clerk's office to ascertain local practice.

For discussion of procedures for filing the return when Palma notice has been given, see §42.18.

The formats of the preliminary opposition and the return are governed by Cal Rules of Ct 2.100-2.119, 3.1110-3.1113, local rules, and local practice. In counties with a writ clerk, counsel may be able to call with questions. For further discussion of responsive pleadings in the superior court, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 8 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

Appellate division of superior court, courts of appeal, and supreme court. On receipt of a writ petition, the respondent or real party in interest should consider filing a written preliminary opposition. A preliminary opposition is optional and may be filed within 10 days after the petition is filed. CCP §1107; Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(a)(1) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(a)(1) (appellate division of superior court).

> Ø Note: If the petition requests issuance of a peremptory writ in the first instance, the real party in interest should file a complete preliminary opposition because this may be the only opportunity to file any opposition to the petition. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(a)(4) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(a)(4) (appellate division of superior court). See also Palma v U.S. Indus. Fasteners, Inc. (1984) 36 C3d 171, 203 CR 626.

The preliminary opposition must include a memorandum, and a statement of any material fact that was missing from the petition. Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(a)(2) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(a)(2) (appellate division of superior court). In the court of appeal and supreme court, unless the court specifies otherwise, the preliminary opposition should adhere to the form requirements discussed in §42.15. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.40(b) (opposition to writ petition should have red cover); Cal Rules of Ct 8.4 (indicating that Title 8, Division 1, of Cal Rules of Ct applies to original proceedings in reviewing courts).

Once an alternative writ or order to show cause issues, the opposing party may file a return. The return consists of a verified answer, a demurrer, or both. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(1) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(b)(1) (appellate division of superior court).

> Ø Note: If the return is by demurrer alone and the demurrer is overruled, the court may issue the peremptory writ without granting leave to answer. Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(4) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(b)(4) (appellate division of superior court).

An answer may consist of admissions, denials, and affirmative defenses. CCP §431.30. An answer filed by a public official need not be verified if it is used "merely to join the issues raised in the petition." Hall v Superior Court (2005) 133 CA4th 908, 914 n9, 35 CR3d 206.

The respondent or real party should admit only the allegations conceded to be true. The return must deny contested allegations and should affirmatively allege the points necessary to apprise the court of factual or legal reasons for denying the petition. Failure to deny a material allegation in the petition admits its truth (Rice v Superior Court (1975) 49 CA3d 200, 202, 122 CR 389; Rodriguez v Municipal Court (1972) 25 CA3d 521, 526, 102 CR 45), as does failure to answer the petition at all (Block v Superior Court (Downey) (1998) 62 CA4th 363, 72 CR2d 610).

Unless another date is specified by the court, the return should be filed within 30 days after the court issues the alternative writ or order to show cause. Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(2) (courts of appeal and superior court), 8.933(b)(2) (appellate division of superior court). The rules on the form of papers in the courts of appeal and supreme court discussed in §42.15 apply as well to opposition papers filed in writ proceedings. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.40.

If the court notifies the parties that it is considering issuing a peremptory writ in the first instance, the respondent or real party in interest may serve and file an opposition. Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(1) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(b)(1) (appellate division of superior court). Unless the court orders otherwise, the opposition must be filed within 30 days after the court issues its notification. Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(2) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(b)(2) (appellate division of superior court).

Service and filing are discussed in §42.15A.

For further discussion of procedures in the courts of appeal, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 8 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

§42.17A J. Replication or Reply

The petitioner may file a responsive pleading replying to the allegations set out in the respondent's return. This pleading is known as a "replication." Scott v Superior Court (1927) 83 CA 25, 256 P 603. See People v Superior Court (Maury) (2006) 145 CA4th 473, 485, 51 CR3d 670. Factual matters alleged by the respondent in the return that are not controverted in the replication or by proof presented by the petitioner are deemed true. Miller v Eisenhower Med. Ctr. (1980) 27 C3d 614, 625 n10, 166 CR 826; see CCP §1091.

The petitioner may not, however, raise a new challenge to the trial court's orders in the replication unless there is good cause for the failure to raise the issue in the petition. People v Superior Court (Maury), supra.

In the appellate division of the superior court, the replication is called a reply and may be served and filed within 15 days after the return or opposition is filed, unless ordered otherwise. Cal Rules of Ct 8.933(b)(3).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.17B K. Oral Argument

Oral argument may be available following issuance of an alternative writ or order to show cause. See Kowis v Howard (1992) 3 C4th 888, 899, 12 CR2d 728. However, there is no oral argument when the court issues a peremptory writ in the first instance. Lewis v Superior Court (1999) 19 C4th 1232, 1242, 82 CR2d 85. On issuance of a peremptory writ without issuance of an alternative writ or order to show cause, see §42.18. There is no right to oral argument when the court summarily denies a writ petition. Calhoun v Vallejo City Unified Sch. Dist. (1993) 20 CA4th 39, 45, 24 CR2d 337.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.18 L. Procedures When Peremptory Writ May Issue in First Instance

A reviewing court may issue a peremptory writ in the first instance; i.e., without issuing an alternative writ first. CCP §§1088, 1107. However, the California Supreme Court has cautioned that this procedure should be used only when the petitioner's right to relief is obvious or unusual urgency justifies expediting the writ application. Lewis v Superior Court (1999) 19 C4th 1232, 1241, 82 CR2d 85; Palma v U.S. Indus. Fasteners, Inc. (1984) 36 C3d 171, 203 CR 626; Campbell v Superior Court (2008) 159 CA4th 635, 71 CR3d 594. When the petitioner seeks a peremptory writ in the first instance, the petition must give notice to the opposing party and to the court. This is usually done by requesting a peremptory writ in the first instance in the prayer of the petition. See CCP §§1088, 1107; Palma v U.S. Indus. Fasteners, Inc., supra. When the court initiates Palma procedures, it sends notice to all parties. Palma notice must be received by the opposing party at least 10 calendar days before a peremptory writ may issue. CCP §1088; 36 C3d at 178. For further discussion of Palma procedures, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 8 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

Opposition to the writ petition must be filed within 30 days after the court notified the parties that it is considering issuing a peremptory writ. Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(b)(2) (courts of appeal and supreme court), 8.933(b)(2) (appellate division of superior court). See Palma, 36 C3d at 179. The respondent should file a complete, not just a preliminary, opposition following such a notice; otherwise, it may lose its only opportunity to be heard in the proceeding.

When the Palma procedure is used in the court of appeal, a peremptory writ should issue only when the decision becomes final as to both the court of appeal and the California Supreme Court. Ng v Superior Court (1992) 4 C4th 29, 13 CR2d 856.

The court does not have to hear oral argument before it issues a peremptory writ, but it must at least solicit opposition. Cal Rules of Ct 8.487(a)(4), 8.933(a)(4); see Lewis v Superior Court (1999) 19 C4th 1232, 1242, 82 CR2d 85; Kernes v Superior Court (2000) 77 CA4th 525, 91 CR2d 765. The court does not consider evidence that was not submitted to the trial court. However, the court may consider new evidence to the extent necessary to determine whether, in the interests of justice, further proceedings before the trial court are necessary on an issue previously submitted to it. Campbell v Superior Court (2008) 159 CA4th 635, 647, 71 CR3d 594.

> Ø Note: While an appellate court may, without first having solicited opposition, issue a "suggestive Palma notice," encouraging the trial court to grant the relief sought in the petition, the trial court must allow the parties to be heard before following the suggestion. Brown, Winfield & Canzoneri, Inc. v Superior Court (2010) 47 C4th 1233, 104 CR3d 145.

§42.19 M. Appellate Remedies Following Grant or Denial of Writ of Mandate or Prohibition

If a party is unhappy with the court's disposition of the writ petition, there are two possibilities for judicial relief: (1) a petition for rehearing, which is authorized only in limited situations (see §42.20); and (2) review by a higher court.

After the superior court grants or denies a petition for writ of mandate, if either side wishes further review, an appeal should be filed in the court of appeal. CCP §904.1(a)(1). After the appellate division of the superior court grants or denies a writ in a misdemeanor case, a party wishing review should petition for a writ in the court of appeal. CCP §904.3.

The losing party in the court of appeal may file a petition for review in the California Supreme Court. Cal Rules of Ct 8.500. Review is preferable to an original writ petition. See Hagan v Superior Court (1962) 57 C2d 767, 769, 22 CR 206. The grounds on which the California Supreme Court will grant review are set out in Cal Rules of Ct 8.500(b), and the petition for review must allege one or more of those grounds.

If the court of appeal denies a petition and the petitioner files for review in the California Supreme Court, that court may (1) summarily deny review; (2) grant review, decide one or more issues, and transfer the rest back to the court of appeal (Cal Rules of Ct 8.528(c)); (3) grant review and transfer the case to the court of appeal without decision but with instructions (Cal Rules of Ct 8.528(d)); or (4) grant review and decide the matter itself (Cal Rules of Ct 8.528(a)).

For additional discussion of petitions for review, see §§44.69-44.76; Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §§5.41-5.46 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). A sample petition for review appears in Appeals & Writs §5.54.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.20 N. Rehearings

The losing party should consider whether a petition for rehearing is in order, especially if the court files a written opinion rather than a summary denial. In any appellate court and in the appellate division of the superior court, a party is entitled to rehearing if the opinion decides the case on the basis of an issue not briefed by the parties. Govt C §68081. In the court of appeal, the losing party should review the opinion carefully to ensure that it reflects the material facts and addresses all the issues. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.500(c)(2) (the supreme court "normally will accept the Court of Appeal opinion's statement of the issues and facts" unless the party has filed a petition for rehearing that called to the court of appeal's attention any issues or facts that were omitted or misunderstood by the court of appeal).

Often, however, the rules do not authorize a petition for rehearing. In the court of appeal, if no order to show cause or alternative writ is issued, the court's order denying the writ petition becomes final immediately, and no petition for rehearing is permitted. Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)(1), 8.490(b)(1). The same is true when the supreme court denies a writ petition without issuing an order to show cause or an alternative writ. Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)(1), 8.532(b)(2), 8.536(a). Similarly, in the appellate division of the superior court, a judgment denying a writ petition becomes immediately final when filed (Cal Rules of Ct 8.935(a)(2)) and a petition for rehearing is not permitted (see Cal Rules of Ct 8.889(a) (order of rehearing must be made before decision is final)).

There are no rule provisions for rehearing after a single superior court judge grants or denies a writ petition.

On the time limit for filing or responding to a petition for rehearing, see chart in §42.2. On petitions for rehearing in the court of appeal, see also Cal Rules of Ct 8.40(b). On petitions for rehearing in the supreme court, see Cal Rules of Ct 8.40(a), 8.536. On petitions for rehearing in the appellate division of the superior court, see Cal Rules of Ct 8.889.

For further discussion of petitions for rehearing, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §§5.39-5.40 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

§42.21 O. Res Judicata Effect of Denial of Petition for Writ of Mandate or Prohibition

If the reviewing court summarily denies the petition, it is not res judicata. People v Durrett (1985) 164 CA3d 947, 210 CR 874. This is also true when the court summarily denies with a brief supporting statement but without an alternative writ, oral argument, or a full written opinion. See Kowis v Howard (1992) 3 C4th 888, 12 CR2d 728. But if the court issues an opinion, that opinion becomes the law of the case. People v Veitch (1982) 128 CA3d 460, 465, 180 CR 412.

IV. WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS

A. Nature and Function of Writ of Habeas Corpus

§42.22 1. Purpose of Habeas; Statutory Authorities

The right to petition for a writ of habeas corpus antedates the federal Constitution. See Bushnell's Case (1677) 124 Eng Rep 1006. Habeas corpus is explicitly recognized in the federal Constitution (US Const art I, §9) and the California Constitution (Cal Const art VI, §10; art I, §11). The historic function of the writ of habeas corpus (Latin for "you have the body"; also called the Great Writ) is to compel one having custody of a person to bring that person before the issuing court. Habeas corpus proceedings are directed at determining the lawfulness of imprisonment, conditions of confinement, or other actual or potential restraints on personal liberty. Pen C §1473 (sets out primary grounds for seeking habeas). See also Pen C §1473.5 (availability of writ of habeas corpus when expert testimony relating to intimate partner battering not introduced at trial court proceedings). Habeas is usually unavailable as a substitute for ordinary remedies at law such as direct appeal. In re Walker (1974) 10 C3d 764, 773, 112 CR 177. But see In re Crockett (2008) 159 CA4th 751, 759, 71 CR3d 632 (when committing court exceeded its jurisdiction, failure to appeal did not prevent review of habeas petition).

A crucial difference between a writ of habeas corpus and a writ of mandate and/or prohibition is that a writ of habeas corpus is not the ultimate relief sought by the petitioner; rather, it is an interim step in determining whether the petitioner is entitled to relief. If the habeas petition is sufficient on its face, the court must issue a writ of habeas corpus (or its functional equivalent, an order to show cause). Then the parties litigate the merits. People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 737, 35 CR2d 270.

Some of the common uses of habeas by persons convicted or accused of crimes are the following:

- Reaching issues that cannot be raised on direct appeal (or cannot be argued as effectively on direct appeal), because the supporting facts are outside the appellate record (see People v Pope (1979) 23 C3d 412, 428, 152 CR 732 (ineffective assistance of counsel); People v Bautista (2004) 115 CA4th 229, 237, 8 CR3d 862 (same)).
- Permitting the late filing of a notice of appeal that defendant had relied on trial counsel to file (People v Knauer (1988) 206 CA3d 1124, 253 CR 910). See also People v Byron (2009) 170 CA4th 657, 664, 88 CR3d 386 (given possible ineffective-assistance claim for counsel's failure to timely file, untimely notice of appeal construed as petition for writ of habeas corpus).
- Challenging false evidence "that is substantially material or probative on the issue of guilt or punishment" and was introduced against the petitioner at a hearing or trial (Pen C §1473(b)(1)). See also In re Pratt (1999) 69 CA4th 1294, 82 CR2d 260.
- Challenging false physical evidence that was a material factor leading the defendant to plead guilty (Pen C §1473(b)(2)).
- Asserting actual innocence based on newly discovered evidence or proof of false evidence introduced at trial. See, e.g., In re Lawley (2008) 42 C4th 1231, 1238, 74 CR3d 92; In re Bell (2007) 42 C4th 630, 637, 67 CR3d 781; In re Hardy (2007) 41 C4th 977, 1016, 63 CR3d 845.

Other common applications for habeas corpus include review of bail, extradition, and contempt orders, denial of fundamental procedural rights, invalid probation orders, and illegal conditions of prison confinement. Habeas corpus is available to collaterally attack criminal convictions in order to avoid deportation. See People v Kim (2009) 45 C4th 1078, 1099, 90 CR3d 355.

Habeas corpus also is available in some contexts unrelated to crime. For example, it may be used to challenge civil commitment proceedings under the Lanterman-Petris-Short Act (Welf & I C §§5000-5550) and related statutory proceedings. See Welf & I C §§5254.1, 5275-5278. It may also be used in various types of child custody matters. See, e.g., Adoption of Alexander S. (1988) 44 C3d 857, 866, 245 CR 1; In re Darlice C. (2003) 105 CA4th 459, 129 CR2d

For a more exhaustive treatment of the Great Writ, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chaps 9-10 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). Statutory provisions are in Pen C §§1473-1508 and Cal Rules of Ct 4.550-4.552, 8.380.

Federal habeas corpus proceedings are beyond the scope of this chapter. For discussion of federal habeas, see chap 45. See also Appeals & Writs, chaps 12-18.

§42.23 2. Required Allegations in Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus

Generally, a habeas corpus petition must allege all of the following:

- The petitioner is suffering from actual or constructive custody or some other restraint of liberty. Pen C §1473(a); In re Wessley W. (1981) 125 CA3d 240, 246, 181 CR 401 (writ not available when probationary period had ended). "Restraint" and "constructive custody" are broadly construed. See, e.g., Maleng v Cook (1989) 490 US 488, 104 L Ed 2d 540, 109 S Ct 1923 (defendant "in custody" because authorities placed detainer on him); In re Catalano (1981) 29 C3d 1, 8, 171 CR 667 (among those who may apply for habeas writ are prisoner released on bail, prisoner released on own recognizance, parolee, and defendant sentenced to pay fine or face arrest). However, collateral consequences of a criminal conviction do not of themselves constitute constructive custody of a person. People v Villa (2009) 45 C4th 1063, 1070, 90 CR3d 344 (petitioner in federal immigration detention who had completed sentence and was no longer in actual California custody was not in state's constructive custody for habeas purposes). In addition, a petition that raises a recurring issue of substantial public importance may proceed even if it is moot with respect to the petitioner. In re Lois M. (1989) 214 CA3d 1036, 263 CR 100.

Ø Note: Actual or constructive custody is a jurisdictional requirement that cannot be waived. In re Stier (2007) 152 CA4th 63, 81, 61 CR3d 181 (collateral consequence of conviction, i.e., sex offender registration, did not render petitioner "in custody").

- The restraint suffered by petitioner is unlawful. Pen C §1473(a).
- Appeal is unavailable or otherwise is not an adequate remedy under the circumstances. See In re Duran (1974) 38 CA3d 632, 635, 113 CR 442. Habeas corpus is not a mere substitute for an appeal (In re Terry (1971) 4 C3d 911, 95 CR 31), but it may lie when appeal is an inadequate remedy in a variety of situations. See Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 9 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). When an appellate remedy exists, the petitioner's failure to seek it in a timely manner may bar habeas corpus relief. See In re Ronald E. (1977) 19 C3d 315, 137 CR 781 (minor's failure to appeal previous detention orders barred constitutional challenge by habeas corpus); In re Brown (1973) 9 C3d 679, 108 CR 801, overruled on another ground in People v Mendez (1999) 19 C4th 1084, 81 CR2d 301 (defendant failed to perfect appeal by not filing certificate of probable cause; habeas relief denied). But see People v Byron (2009) 170 CA4th 657, 88 CR3d 386 (given possible ineffective-assistance claim, untimely notice of appeal construed as petition for writ of habeas corpus). However, "a prisoner may claim on habeas corpus that he was sentenced to a term in excess of that permitted by the Constitution, even if his claim was previously rejected on direct appeal." In re Huffman (1986) 42 C3d 552, 555, 229 CR 789.
- If relevant, the petition should state how administrative remedies have been exhausted. In re Muszalski (1975) 52 CA3d 500, 503, 125 CR 286.

B. Outline of Pleading and Procedure

§42.24 1. Three Pleadings

There are three habeas corpus pleadings:

- The petition, alleging that the confinement or other restriction is unlawful (see Pen C §1474);
- The return, filed on behalf of the confining authority when the court does not deny the petition at the outset (see Pen C §1480); and
- The traverse, which is the petitioner's response to the return. Pen C §1484. It is called a denial in superior court. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(e).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.25 2. Court Responses

On receipt of a petition for writ of habeas corpus, the court may summarily deny the petition, issue an order to show cause (or grant the writ), or request an informal response.

Summary denial. The court may summarily deny a habeas petition when the petition does not state a prima facie case for relief or when the claims in the petition are procedurally barred. People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 737, 35 CR2d 270; see Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(3)-(4). In the superior court, an order denying a habeas petition must be accompanied by a brief recital of the reasons. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(g).

Order to show cause. If the petition alleges facts that, if true, would entitle the petitioner to relief, and there is no facial procedural bar to relief, the court will ordinarily issue an order to show cause. See People v Romero, supra; Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(4)(A), (c)-(d). Issuance of an order to show cause represents a preliminary determination that the petitioner would be entitled to relief if his or her factual allegations were proved. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(c). The issuance of an order to show cause on a specific issue is an implicit determination that a prima facie case has not been made on the other issues presented. People v Bloyd (1987) 43 C3d 333, 363, 233 CR 368.

The order to show cause has evolved as a substitute for the statutory procedure, issuance of the writ, which requires the petitioner's custodian to produce the petitioner. Pen C §§1477, 1480, 1483; see Romero, 8 C4th at 738. The order to show cause is the functional equivalent of the writ but does not require the custodian to produce the petitioner. See In re Hochberg (1970) 2 C3d 870, 873 n2, 87 CR 681.

In considering a petition for writ of habeas corpus, the court has the authority to restate an inartfully phrased claim or to invite the petitioner to file a supplemental or amended petition. Board of Prison Terms v Superior Court (Ngo) (2005) 130 CA4th 1212, 1239, 31 CR3d 70. The court, however, does not have the authority to issue an order to show cause on the basis of claims not explicitly stated in the petition. 130 CA4th at 1236.

Informal response. Before denying the writ or issuing an order to show cause, the court can request informal opposition to the petition. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(b)(1), 8.385(b)(1). A copy of the request for an informal response must be served on petitioner, as must the informal response itself. The response must be in writing and served and filed within 15 days, or within the time specified by the court in its request. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(b)(2), 8.385(b)(2). The court must then inform the petitioner that he or she has the right to reply within 15 days of service of the response on the petitioner. The court may not deny the petition until the petitioner has filed a reply or the time for filing the reply has expired. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(b)(2)-(3), 8.835(b)(3). After the informal response and reply have been filed (or the time for filing them has expired), the court may deny the petition, issue an order to show cause, or grant the writ. It may not, however, order the relief requested in the petition without first allowing the respondent to file a formal return. People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 744, 35 CR2d 270; In re Olson (2007) 149 CA4th 790, 800, 57 CR3d 284. Habeas corpus litigation has no procedure analogous to the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate in the first instance (discussed in §42.18). Romero, 8 C4th at 742.

> Ø Note: In the rare event that the confining authority does not wish to contest the habeas petition, it may stipulate to the truth of the petition's allegations and to the requested relief. In such a case, the court may grant relief without issuing a writ of habeas corpus or an order to show cause. 8 C4th at 740 n7.

C. Preparation, Filing, and Service of Petition

1. Court in Which to File Petition

§42.26 a. Subject Matter Jurisdiction

A habeas corpus petition may legally be filed in the superior court, the court of appeal, or the supreme court. Cal Const art VI, §10.

The appellate division of the superior court does not have jurisdiction over habeas petitions. In re Ramirez (2001) 89 CA4th 1312, 108 CR2d 229. A single judge of the superior court must decide the petition. Cal Rules of Ct 4.552(d). Unless the parties agree, a habeas petition filed in the superior court cannot be assigned to the judge who made the ruling or order being challenged by the petition. Pen C §859c; Fuller v Superior Court (2004) 125 CA4th 623, 23 CR3d 204.

Although the superior court loses jurisdiction over most aspects of a case while the direct appeal is pending, it retains jurisdiction over habeas corpus matters. In re Carpenter (1995) 9 C4th 634, 38 CR2d 665. The court must not, however, exercise its habeas corpus jurisdiction in a way that interferes with the appellate jurisdiction of the reviewing court. Compare People v Mayfield (1993) 5 C4th 220, 19 CR2d 877 (superior court lacked authority to grant habeas relief on claim that could have been decided in pending direct appeal), with In re Carpenter, 9 C4th at 646 (superior court properly entertained habeas petition raising juror misconduct claim that did not appear of record in pending appeal). See also People v Superior Court (Gregory) (2005) 129 CA4th 324, 28 CR3d 276 (superior court lost jurisdiction over habeas corpus petition while appeal from grant of petition was pending in court of appeal).

Although both the court of appeal and the supreme court have original jurisdiction in habeas corpus cases, the appellate courts have discretion to deny a petition for writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the petitioner has not applied for a writ in a lower court. In re Ramirez, supra; In re Hillery (1962) 202 CA2d 293, 294, 20 CR 759 (same). A habeas petition filed in the first instance in the reviewing court must explain why the petitioner has not sought relief in the superior court.

When a habeas corpus petition is related to a direct appeal that is pending in the court of appeal or the supreme court, it is common practice to file the petition in the reviewing court, but even in this situation the reviewing court is not required to entertain a habeas claim that has not been presented to the lower court. See In re Baker (1988) 206 CA3d 493, 253 CR 615. Even if the reviewing court issues an order to show cause, it may make the order returnable in the superior court. In re Hochberg (1970) 2 C3d 870, 873, 87 CR 681. For further discussion, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §§9.36, 10.5-10.6 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).

Ø Note: If the petitioner does not expect the California courts to grant relief but is filing a state habeas petition merely to "exhaust" federal issues so that they can be presented in federal court, the better practice may be to save time by filing the state habeas petition in the California Supreme Court in the first instance. For detailed discussion of exhaustion, see Appeals & Writs, chap 14.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.26A b. Territorial Jurisdiction

Under the California Constitution, every California court has territorial jurisdiction over habeas corpus petitions filed by California petitioners. Cal Const art VI, §10; Griggs v Superior Court (1976) 16 C3d 341, 344, 128 CR 223. The existence of territorial jurisdiction does not, however, mean the court should exercise that jurisdiction in every case. 16 C3d at 346.

Petitions challenging judgment or sentence or conditions of confinement. As a general rule, the superior court that rendered judgment in a criminal case should hear and decide a habeas petition challenging the judgment or sentence. 16 C3d at 347. When conditions of confinement are challenged, the superior court located in the county in which the petitioner is incarcerated should hear the petition. 16 C3d at 347.

If a petition challenging the judgment or sentence is filed in a superior court in a county other than the county where the judgment was rendered, or if a petition challenging conditions of confinement is filed in a superior court in a county other than the county in which the petitioner is incarcerated, the court may, but is not required to, transfer the petition to the appropriate court. Cal Rules of Ct 4.552(b). The court is not required to determine whether the petition states a prima facie case before transferring the petition. Cal Rules of Ct 4.552(b)(2).

Similarly, when a petition is filed in the court of appeal challenging the judgment or sentence imposed by a trial court located outside the appellate court's judicial district, or challenging the conditions of confinement or conduct of correctional officers outside the appellate court's district, the court may, but is not required to, deny the petition without prejudice. Cal Rules of Ct 8.385(c)(1).

Petitions challenging parole decisions. A habeas corpus petition that challenges a determination that a prisoner is unsuitable for parole or challenges a denial of parole must be heard and decided by a court in the county that rendered the judgment of conviction. In re Roberts (2005) 36 C4th 575, 587, 31 CR3d 458.

When a petition challenging a parole denial or unsuitability determination is filed in a superior court in a county other than the one in which the underlying judgment was rendered, the court must transfer the petition to the superior court in the county that rendered judgment. Cal Rules of Ct 4.552(c). When a petition challenging a parole determination is filed in a court of appeal, the court must deny the petition without prejudice if the issue was not first adjudicated by the court that rendered the underlying judgment. Cal Rules of Ct 8.385(c)(2).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.26B 2. Form and Contents of Petition

A pro se petitioner ordinarily must use the official Judicial Council form Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus (Judicial Council Form MC-275). Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(1), 8.380(a). The court may accept a petition that is not on the approved form if there is good cause. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(2), 8.380(a)(1). A petition submitted by an attorney need not be on the Judicial Council form, but it must meet the requirements of Pen C §1474 and contain the information specified in the official form. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(2), 8.384(a)(1).

If an attorney files a petition in a reviewing court, the petition must also comply with the content and form requirements of Cal Rules of Ct 8.40(b)-(c) and 8.204(a)-(b). Cal Rules of Ct 8.384(a)(1). The petition must have a red cover. Cal Rules of Ct 8.40(b). The cover must display (Cal Rules of Ct 8.204(b)(10)(D), 8.384(a)(1)):

- The title of the petition;
- The title, trial court number, and court of appeal number of the case;
- The names of the trial court and each participating trial judge; and
- The name, address, State Bar number, and telephone number of each attorney filing or joining in the petition.

Ø Practice Tip: It is strongly recommended that attorneys draft their own habeas petitions, because the Judicial Council form is confining.

The petition must state whether any prior applications for a writ concerning the same issue have been made, and briefly describe them, including any rulings. Pen C §1475. The petition must be verified by oath or affirmation and signed either by the person seeking relief or by someone on that person's behalf. Pen C §1474.

The title of a petition for writ of habeas corpus proceeding is "In re [petitioner's name]," not the "Petitioner v. Respondent; Real Party in Interest" format used in mandate/prohibition proceedings. All the necessary parties, who otherwise would be identified as respondents or real parties in interest, are described and identified in the paragraphed allegations. There are usually three interested parties: the People, the trial court, and the custodial authority. In re Scott (1994) 27 CA4th 946, 33 CR2d 27 (person having custody of petitioner is entitled to notice and opportunity to be heard).

Before preparing a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, counsel should decide whether it is necessary or desirable to have the petitioner personally brought into the courtroom for the hearing. In a court that uses the statutory writ procedure, counsel or the court will need to prepare a formal writ if the petitioner is to be brought into court. See Pen C §§1476-1479, 1481-1482. Counsel should check local court rules or practice to learn whether counsel or the court prepares forms such as the writ. When proceeding by order to show cause instead of by writ, the petitioner's presence can be secured by an ancillary order if it later becomes necessary. See Pen C §2620.

A petition for writ of habeas corpus must be given priority by the court to which it is presented. See Pen C §1476. To make sure that this occurs in fact, counsel should note on the face of the petition that immediate action is requested and ask the clerk to bring the case to the judge's immediate attention.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.27 3. Filing and Service Requirements

When to file. There are no statutory or other specific time limits for filing a petition for writ of habeas corpus. As a rule, however, it should be filed as soon as is practicable after discovery of the claim. The court may decline to consider a petition if it finds any unreasonable delay in seeking relief. See In re Sanders (1999) 21 C4th 697, 703, 87 CR2d 899 (habeas petitions in both death penalty and noncapital cases must be filed "reasonably promptly"); In re Clark (1993) 5 C4th 750, 21 CR2d 509 (unjustified delay barred consideration of merits). In addition, the passage of time may render the issue moot. See, e.g., In re Mehdizadeh (2003) 105 CA4th 995, 997, 130 CR2d 98 (petitioner's case "technically moot" after his release from custody, but court issued order to show cause because petition raised important questions that otherwise would escape review).

Preserving right of federal review. Because of the 1-year statute of limitations imposed by the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 (AEDPA) (28 USC §2244(d)), if the petition raises federal issues that the petitioner may wish to renew in federal court after "exhausting" them in state court, it is especially important to file the petition promptly and to proceed through the state collateral review process in good time. See Carey v Saffold (2002) 536 US 214, 222, 153 L Ed 2d 260, 269, 122 S Ct 2134 (AEDPA limitations period tolled for one full round of state collateral review process); Evans v Chavis (2006) 546 US 189, 163 L Ed 2d 684, 126 S Ct 846 (even when state court does not deny petition as untimely, federal court cannot permit statutory tolling if it finds unreasonable delay at any stage of state collateral review process). On statutory tolling under AEDPA, see §45.13. For a detailed discussion of the AEDPA limitations period, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases, chap 15 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007). On exhaustion of state remedies, see §45.23; Appeals & Writs, chap 14.

Other filing considerations. No filing fee may be charged. See Govt C §6101. In the superior court, unless local practice or rule imposes a different requirement, only the original petition need be filed, but it is a good idea to file at least one copy with the original. The court may accept a single original petition from an unrepresented prisoner and direct its clerk to make and serve copies. In the court of appeal, a petitioner must file an original petition and four copies. Cal Rules of Ct 8.44(b)(1). When a petition is filed in the court of appeal by an unrepresented petitioner, only the original need be filed. Cal Rules of Ct 8.44(b)(2). The California Supreme Court requires an original and ten copies, but this requirement can be waived by court order. Cal Rules of Ct 8.44(a)(2).

Service. The petition must be served on the district attorney of the county in which the defendant is held (and on the city attorney, if the confinement is based on a city ordinance). Pen C §1475. No application for a writ may be heard without proof that the petition was served on the district attorney. Pen C §1475. Although no statute requires service on anyone else, if the petitioner is in state custody, the petition should be served on the Attorney General, who represents the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR). See Govt C §12511 (Attorney General has charge "of all legal matters in which the State is interested").

> Ø Note: When filing a habeas petition in an appellate court, the better practice is to serve the petition as if it were an appellant's brief in a direct appeal (in addition to the service required by Pen C §1475) and to reflect such service in the proof of service filed with the petition. On service of an appellant's brief, see §44.44.

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.28 D. Preparation, Filing, and Service of Return

If the court issues an order to show cause or a writ, the confining authority may dispute facts in the petition by filing a return. Pen C §1480. In the superior court, any material allegation in the petition that is not controverted by the return is deemed admitted. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(d). The objective of the return is to justify the imprisonment or other restraint of which the petitioner complains. People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 738, 35 CR2d 270.

In certain respects, the return in a habeas corpus proceeding is analogous to a complaint in a civil case. Once filed, the return becomes the principal pleading. People v Romero, supra; In re Lawler (1979) 23 C3d 190, 194, 151 CR 833. The return is unlike a civil complaint, however, in other respects. It must be responsive to the petition's allegations, whereas a complaint is not a response to any other document. The return seeks to defend the status quo and avoid judicial relief, whereas a complaint usually seeks relief to alter the current state of affairs. People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 739 n6, 35 CR2d 270.

Contents. The return must allege facts that establish the legality of the petitioner's detention. In re Lewallen (1979) 23 C3d 274, 277, 152 CR 528. It may include matters outside the trial record. In re Lewallen, supra.

The return cannot simply deny the petitioner's allegations; it must recite the facts on which denial is founded and provide supporting evidence when appropriate. In re Lewallen, supra. The rule that the return must state facts, however, must be tempered when such facts are not readily available to the respondent, and the respondent alleges that (1) it has acted diligently; (2) crucial information is not readily available; and (3) there is good reason to dispute facts or question witness credibility. People v Duvall (1995) 9 C4th 464, 37 CR2d 259.

The return must also include the following information (Pen C §1480):

- Whether the person on whom the writ was served has custody of the petitioner;
- If the petitioner is in custody, the authority and causes for imprisonment or restraint; and
- Whether the petitioner is being detained by written authority (a copy of the writing must be attached to the return).

If the person on whom the writ is served has transferred custody of the petitioner to another, the person served must state to whom, when, where, why, and the authority for the transfer.

The return must be signed by the person who made it, and verified, unless made by a sworn public officer in his or her official capacity. Pen C §1480(5); see Hall v Superior Court (2005) 133 CA4th 908, 914 n9, 35 CR3d 206 (return to writ of mandate).

Form of papers, filing, and service. The form of the return is similar to that of the petition (see §42.26A), except that there is no official Judicial Council form for a return.

In the court of appeal and the supreme court, the court customarily sets a due date for the return when it issues a writ of habeas corpus or an order to show cause. In the superior court, the return should be filed within 30 days after the court issues an order to show cause.

> Ø Note: If the superior court does not rule on a petition for writ of habeas corpus within 60 days after it is filed, the petitioner may file a notice and request for ruling. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(a)(3). The respondent must file the return within 30 days after an order to show cause issues. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(d).

The petitioner must be served (Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(d)), and an original return with proof of service must be filed in the court in which the petition is pending. In the court of appeal, the respondent must file an original and four copies (Cal Rules of Ct 8.44(b)(1)); in the supreme court, an original and ten copies (Cal Rules of Ct 8.44(a)(2)).

© The Regents of the University of California

§42.29 E. Preparation, Filing, and Service of Traverse

Once the return is filed, the petitioner has an opportunity to controvert it by filing an additional document, traditionally called a traverse. See Pen C §1484; People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 739, 35 CR2d 270. The superior court rules also refer to it as a denial. Cal Rules of Ct 4.550(b)(4), 4.551(e). In the superior court, the traverse must be filed within 30 calendar days after service and filing of the return. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(e). In the court of appeal and the supreme court, the deadline for filing a traverse is set by the court.

In a habeas corpus proceeding, the return is "the central pleading in the action, to which another pleading must respond." People v Romero (1994) 8 C4th 728, 739 n6, 35 CR2d 270. In that sense, the traverse is analogous to the answer in a civil case. Any allegations in the return that are not controverted by the traverse are deemed admitted. 8 C4th at 739; In re Lawler (1979) 23 C3d 190, 194, 151 CR 833. Thus, in nearly every case in which a return is filed, the petitioner should respond with a traverse or denial.

Ø Note: By stipulation of the parties, the petition may be deemed the traverse. See People v Jackson (1980) 28 C3d 264, 288, 168 CR 603, overruled on other grounds in People v Cromer (2001) 24 C4th 889, 901 n3, 103 CR2d 23. See also In re Stafford (1958) 160 CA2d 110, 113, 324 P2d 967 (no stipulation, but "at the argument the parties treated the matter as if the petition was a traverse to the return and we shall do the same").

§42.30 F. Petitioner's Custody Status

When the court issues the order to show cause, it generally has three options concerning the petitioner's custodial status (see Pen C §§1476, 1491-1492, 1494):

- Do nothing;
- Direct the release of the petitioner on his own recognizance pending final disposition of the habeas petition (see, e.g., In re Hall (1981) 30 C3d 408, 416, 179 CR 223; In re Kreitman (1995) 40 CA4th 750, 752, 47 CR2d 595); or
- Set bail (see, e.g., In re Dean (1970) 12 CA3d 264, 266, 90 CR 473).

Ø Note: In some circumstances, release on bail or on the petitioner's own recognizance is not legally available. See, e.g., In re Walton (2002) 99 CA4th 934, 947, 122 CR2d 87 (Pen C §1550.1 makes prisoner challenging extradition ineligible for release on bail).

A proposed order to show cause should always contain a section concerning the release of the petitioner that gives the court the option of releasing the petitioner with or without bail, unless the subject matter of the petition does not challenge the petitioner's current custody.

Ø Note: Occasionally, the superior court judge to whom habeas corpus petitions are normally assigned has established a particular order to show cause form that has appropriate blanks to be filled in. Counsel should ask the judge's clerk and use the judge's form, if one exists.

§42.30A G. Discovery

Filing a habeas corpus petition does not institute a cause of action. The court institutes the cause of action by issuing an order to show cause, which represents a preliminary determination that the facts set forth in the petition state a prima facie case for relief. People v Gonzalez (1990) 51 C3d 1179, 1258, 275 CR 729. Without a specific legislative grant of jurisdiction, the court has no authority to order discovery when no matter is pending before it. 51 C3d at 1256.

Ø Note: When the defendant has received the death penalty or a sentence of life in prison without the possibility of parole, the legislature has authorized courts to grant limited discovery, even when no cause of action is pending. See Pen C §1054.9. For further discussion, see §11.31.

No such legislative grant of jurisdiction exists in habeas matters involving a petitioner who has not received a sentence of death or life without the possibility of parole. Consequently, the court is without jurisdiction to order discovery in a habeas corpus proceeding before issuing an order to show cause. Board of Prison Terms v Superior Court (Ngo) (2005) 130 CA4th 1212, 1239, 31 CR3d 70. The court may, however, include a discovery order in the order to show cause. 130 CA4th at 1242. See also In re Scott (2003) 29 C4th 783, 814, 129 CR2d 605 (discovery available after court has issued order to show cause); In re Avena (1996) 12 C4th 694, 730, 49 CR2d 413 (same). The court may order discovery at the request of the petitioner, at the request of the respondent, or on its own motion. Ngo, 130 CA4th at 1242.

Ø Note: Although Pen C §§1054-1054.10 do not apply in habeas corpus proceedings, both the petitioner and the respondent are entitled to discovery. In re Scott, supra. It is reasonable for a court to look at the reciprocal discovery law to determine the scope of discovery on habeas corpus. In re Scott, supra.

§42.31 H. Evidentiary Hearing

After the pleadings have been filed, if factual issues are in dispute, the court may order an evidentiary hearing. See In re Lawler (1979) 23 C3d 190, 194, 151 CR 833. A superior court entertaining a habeas petition is required to conduct an evidentiary hearing if a reasonable likelihood exists that the petitioner is entitled to relief and the entitlement depends on resolving a factual issue. Cal Rules of Ct 4.551(f).

Because neither the court of appeal nor the supreme court can take testimony directly, an order to show cause issued by either tribunal calling for an evidentiary hearing is generally made returnable before a superior court. Pen C §1508; In re Hochberg (1970) 2 C3d 870, 873, 87 CR 681. The issuance of an order to show cause by an appellate court is a determination that the allegations stated a prima facie case for relief. Afterward, the petition may not be summarily denied by a trial court. Rose v Superior Court (2000) 81 CA4th 564, 96 CR2d 843.

Alternatively, the reviewing court may appoint a referee to determine facts necessary for adjudication of the petition. See In re Weber (1974) 11 C3d 703, 114 CR 429. See also, e.g., In re Bell (2007) 42 C4th 630, 67 CR3d 781. A referee's findings of fact are not binding on the court but are entitled to great weight when supported by substantial evidence (In re Miranda (2008) 43 C4th 541, 554, 76 CR3d 172), especially those findings involving credibility determinations. In re Bell (2007) 42 C4th 630, 639, 67 CR3d 781.

When the return denies the allegations of the petition but does not refute the accuracy of any documentary evidence submitted by the petitioner, it is deemed that there are no disputed issues of fact. In re Lewallen (1979) 23 C3d 274, 278, 152 CR 528; In re Lawler, supra. The respondent does, however, have the right to examine the declarants on request. See In re Fields (1990) 51 C3d 1063, 1073, 275 CR 384.

At the evidentiary hearing, the petitioner carries the burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence. In re Merkle (1960) 182 CA2d 46, 5 CR 745. Ordinarily, the petitioner calls witnesses first, followed by the opposing party (normally the confining authority, represented by a prosecutor). The conduct of argument is subject to the court's control. The usual practice is to allow the petitioner to argue first, the opposing party to argue second, and the petitioner to close. The hearing must be conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence. Evid C §300; In re Fields, supra. Out-of-court declarations are not admissible unless they come within a hearsay exception. Evid C §1200; In re Fields, supra. The referee's conclusions of law, as well as resolutions of mixed questions of law and fact, are subject to independent review by the appellate court. In re Williams (1994) 7 C4th 572, 29 CR2d 64.

§42.32 I. Relief Granted

The court entertaining a petition for writ of habeas corpus has broad powers to fashion almost any relief. See, e.g., In re Miranda (2008) 43 C4th 541, 582, 76 CR3d 172 (vacation of death sentence); In re Marquez (2003) 30 C4th 14, 131 CR2d 911 (award of custody credits); In re Hall (1981) 30 C3d 408, 435, 179 CR 223 (vacation of criminal conviction); In re Underwood (1973) 9 C3d 345, 351, 107 CR 401 (order that petitioner be afforded opportunity to post reasonable bail); In re Harrell (1970) 2 C3d 675, 706, 87 CR 504 (modification of conditions of prison confinement); In re Lopez (1970) 2 C3d 141, 151, 84 CR 361 (discharge from custody); In re Estrada (1965) 63 C2d 740, 750, 48 CR 172 (order that prison officials consider petitioner's eligibility for parole under correct statute).

The court may grant all or part of the relief requested without ever formally granting the writ of habeas corpus itself. See, e.g., In re Frye (1983) 150 CA3d 407, 197 CR 755 (challenge to commissioner's contempt jurisdiction resulted in release of defendant, but petition treated as one for certiorari in annulling contempt order).

Habeas may be used to grant relief to a class. In re Arias (1986) 42 C3d 667, 700, 230 CR 505.

§42.33 J. Appellate Remedies Following Grant or Denial of Habeas Corpus Relief

After superior court disposition of habeas petition. The prosecution may appeal after the superior court grants habeas corpus relief. Pen C §§1506-1507. See Cal Rules of Ct 8.388. The defendant is presumptively entitled to bail or own recognizance release on the prosecution's appeal if the relief granted was that he or she be discharged or released. Pen C §1506. See also People v Huff (1975) 46 CA3d 361, 120 CR 210. Generally, the time limit for filing the notice of appeal is 60 calendar days from the judgment or order challenged. Pen C §1506; Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(a), 8.388. However, when the People or the defendant timely appeals from a judgment or appealable order, the time for the opposing party to appeal from the same judgment or order is 30 days after the court clerk mails notification of the first party's appeal. Cal Rules of Ct 8.308(b).

A losing petitioner may not appeal but must file another habeas corpus petition in the court of appeal. In re C*lark* (1993) 5 C4th 750, 767 n7, 21 CR2d 509.

After court of appeal disposition of habeas petition. When the court of appeal issues its judgment in a habeas proceeding, it may be possible to file a petition for rehearing (see §42.20), depending on how the court responded to the habeas petition. If the court of appeal issued an order to show cause, its subsequent judgment does not become final for 30 days, and a petition for rehearing is permissible. Cal Rules of Ct 8.268(a)(1), 8.387(b)(1). If the court summarily denies the habeas petition, the judgment generally becomes final on filing and then there is no right to seek rehearing. Cal Rules of Ct 8.387(b)(2)(A). There is an exception, however: when a related appeal is decided on the same day, the date of finality is the same for both proceedings. Cal Rules of Ct 8.387(b)(2)(B). See §42.34.

On deadlines for filing a petition for rehearing and an answer to a petition for rehearing, see chart in §42.2. For discussion of when a petition for rehearing should be filed to preserve the client's issues for further review, see §42.20. For further discussion of petitions for rehearing, see Appeals and Writs in Criminal Cases §5.39 (3d ed Cal CEB 2007).
