In considering the question of the time of commencement of the appropriate periods of limitation (one-year period of former Code Civ. Proc. § 340(3) (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 335.1 (two-year period beginning in 2003)) for the personal injuries and three-year period of former Code Civ. Proc. § 338(3) (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 338(a)) for the property damage), the court of appeal relied on the decisions in Neel v. Magana, Olney, Levy, Cathcart & Gelfand (1971) 6 Cal. 3d 176, 98 Cal. Rptr. 837, 491 P.2d 421 , and Budd v. Nixen (1971) 6 Cal. 3d 195, 98 Cal. Rptr. 849, 491 P.2d 433 , which held that the statute of limitations in actions for legal malpractice, as in other actions for professional negligence, does not start running, and the cause of action in tort does not accrue until the client sustains some damage and discovers, or should discover, his or her cause of action. The court of appeal stated that the same duty of care required of a professional is required where one undertakes to render services in the practice of a trade. The court found that defendant held itself out as qualified and equipped to pack and ship articles of personal property around the world, and that the delayed discovery rule of Neel and Budd applied (45 Cal. App. 3d 984, 989-991) .

In Neel v. Magana, Olney, Levy, Cathcart & Gelfand (1971) 6 Cal. 3d 176, 98 Cal. Rptr. 837, 491 P.2d 421 , the Court discussed several factors leading to the rule postponing the period of limitation until discovery in cases of professional malpractice. The rule is based on the special nature of the relationship between the professional and his or her client. The Court discussed the special obligation of the professional to use the skill, prudence, and diligence commonly exercised by practitioners of the particular profession. Furthermore, the client may fail to recognize negligence when he or she sees it, and often will lack any opportunity. The final factor the Court discussed is that the dealings between a practitioner and client frame a fiduciary duty which embraces the obligation to render a full and fair disclosure to the beneficiary of all facts which materially affect the beneficiary's rights and interests.

In applying the rule of Neel, the court did not consider all of these factors. It discussed the duty of a "professional" and the fact that the court in Neel incidentally pointed out that the same duty applies in a trade. The court, however, did not discuss what effect the other considerations in Neel such as the existence of a fiduciary relationship, would have on its extension of the Court's holding in Neel to a defendant such as Bekins Wide World Van Services.

[a] Statute of Limitations Tolled

In Cain v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. (1976) 62 Cal. App. 3d 310, 132 Cal. Rptr. 860 , the court of appeal cited its decision in Allred v. Bekins Wide World Van Serv. (1975) 45 Cal. App. 3d 984, 120 Cal. Rptr. 312 [see § 33.28[3][a]], as an illustration of the trend applying the discovery rule in respect to the time for accrual of a cause of action for personal injuries. In Cain, the court applied the discovery rule to former Code Civ. Proc. § 340(3) [now see Code Civ. Proc. § 335.1] in an action for damages for violation of the right of privacy and reversed the lower court's judgment for defendant which was based on the bar of the statute of limitations. In giving examples of cases applying the rule that the statute of limitations does not run until the act causing the personal injuries is discovered, or with reasonable diligence should have been discovered, the court described Allred as a case in which the "discovery rule" applied in an action for personal injuries caused by violation of a duty arising under a contract.

IT IS IMPROPER FOR THE COURT TO GRANT A MOTION FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT WHERE THERE ARE FACTS SHOWING THAT _____ [PLAINTIFF or PLAINTIFF'S DECEDENT] MANIFESTED AN INTENTION TO BOARD THE VEHICLE AND THAT DEFENDANT'S AGENT INDICATED AN INTENTION TO ACCEPT _____ [PLAINTIFF or PLAINTIFF'S DECEDENT] AS A PASSENGER.

A. Rules Governing Summary Judgment Procedure. Granting a motion for summary judgment is proper only if the affidavits supporting the motion establish every element necessary to sustain a judgment in favor of the moving party and the opposing party has not presented any facts which give rise to a triable issue. In ruling on the motion, the moving party's affidavits are strictly construed while the opposing party's are liberally construed, and doubts as to the propriety of granting the motion should be resolved in favor of the opposing party (Corwin v. Los Angeles Newspaper Serv. Bureau, Inc. (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 842, 851 n.6, 851-852, 94 Cal. Rptr. 785, 484 P.2d 953).

B. Establishment of Carrier-Passenger Relationship. The relationship of passenger to carrier is established when a person intends to board a vehicle, indicates this intention, and the person in charge of the vehicle indicates the intention to receive the person as a passenger (Hart v. Fresno Traction Co. (1917) 175 Cal. 489, 490-491, 167 P. 885 ; Lagomarsino v. Market S. R. Co. (1945) 69 Cal. App. 2d 388, 395, 158 P.2d 982).

C. Carrier's Duty During Carrier-Passenger Relationship. During the carrier-passenger relationship, a carrier is required by law (Civ. Code § 2100) to use the utmost care and diligence for the safe carriage of a person, to provide everything necessary for that purpose, and to exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill (Lopez v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist. (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 780, 785, 221 Cal. Rptr. 840, 710 P.2d 907 ; Lagomarsino v. Market S. R. Co. (1945) 69 Cal. App. 2d 388, 395-396, 158 P.2d 982).

[Optional] D. Carrier's Duty to Protect Against Assaults by Third Persons. A common carrier is under a duty to exercise the utmost care to protect its passengers from assaults by third persons (Lopez v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist. (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 780, 791, 221 Cal. Rptr. 840, 710 P.2d 907).

[Optional] E. Passenger's Purpose in Purchasing Transportation Does Not Determine Whether Defendant Qualifies as Common Carrier. A passenger's purpose in purchasing transportation does not determine whether the provider of the transportation qualifies as a common carrier. Therefore, even if the purpose of the transportation may be the providing of entertainment or thrills, roller coasters and similar amusement park rides qualify as common carriers (Gomez v. Superior Court (2005) 35 Cal. 4th 1125, 1136, 29 Cal. Rptr. 3d 352, 113 P.3d 41).

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a motion for summary judgment made by a carrier in an action for damages for injuries or wrongful death where defendant asserts in its motion that it did not owe a duty of care to plaintiff (or plaintiff's decedent) because a carrier-passenger relationship did not exist at the time of the accident.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should discussfacts showing that a carrier-passenger relationship had in fact been established, and that the carrier had breached its duty of care. Counsel should also attach affidavits or declarations supporting the factual contentions set forth in the memorandum, as well as a separate statement setting out the matters that the party contends are undisputed [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c(b)(2),(3)].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Rules Governing Summary Judgment Procedure

Plaintiffs in Corwin v. Los Angeles Newspaper Serv. Bureau, Inc. (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 842, 94 Cal. Rptr. 785, 484 P.2d 953 , filed an action against defendants for violations of Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 16720, 16726 (prohibited restraints of trade under Cartwright Act). The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment and plaintiffs appealed from the judgment entered in favor of defendants. The Supreme Court concluded that the trial court had erroneously granted the summary judgment and reversed the judgment. In reviewing the trial court's action, the Court commented that summary judgment is a drastic procedure which is to be used with caution so that it does not become a substitute for the open trial method of determining facts, and repeated its previous summary of the rules governing summary judgment procedure set out in Paragraph A of this form (4 Cal. 3d 842, 851 n.6, 851-852) .

[b] Establishment of Carrier-Passenger Relationship

In Hart v. Fresno Traction Co. (1917) 175 Cal. 489, 167 P. 885 , plaintiff brought an action for injuries against an electric railway. Plaintiff and some coworkers had gone to defendant's station with the intention of boarding one of defendant's cars to Fresno. When it began to rain, they took shelter 125 feet from the place where the car usually stopped at the end of the line. When the trolley arrived plaintiff and the others started toward it, but it did not stop at its customary place at the end of the tracks. It started its reverse course but slowed down allowing plaintiff's companions ahead of him to board. The car slowed to the speed at which plaintiff was walking and plaintiff was injured when the car jerked as he was jumping onto the step while being watched by the conductor and the motorman. Defendant appealed from the judgment for plaintiff following a verdict in plaintiff's favor, contending that there was insufficient evidence to show that plaintiff had become a passenger. Defendant asserted that plaintiff did not come under the rule that one, though not inside the carrier's vehicle, may become a passenger if the surrounding circumstances show an intention on the person's part to become a passenger and an acceptance of the person as a passenger by the carrier [Nilson v. Oakland Traction Co. (1909) 10 Cal. App. 103, 109, 101 P. 413] because there was no communication of plaintiff's intention and no circumstances showing acceptance of plaintiff as a passenger. In sustaining the judgment for plaintiff, the court of appeal stated that the uncontroverted evidence tended to show that plaintiff intended to board the car to be carried as a passenger, that defendant's employees in charge knew of his intention to do so, and indicated their consent to receive him and his companions by reducing the speed of the car, and that the circumstances thus tended to establish the relationship of carrier and passenger (175 Cal. 489, 490-491) .

In Lagomarsino v. Market S. R. Co. (1945) 69 Cal. App. 2d 388, 158 P.2d 982 , plaintiff alighted from one of defendant's streetcars to wait to board another of defendant's streetcars. She was waiting for a gate to open so that she could board the streetcar when a passing streetcar struck her, causing her injuries. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and the trial court denied a motion for new trial after reducing the amount of the judgment. Defendants appealed from the judgment as reduced, contending that there was insufficient evidence to support a finding that a passenger-carrier relationship had been established between plaintiff and defendant. In reviewing the trial court's instructions, the court of appeal stated that if a person intends to board a vehicle and indicates this intention by standing alongside of the vehicle and the person in charge of the vehicle indicates an intention to receive the passenger and, as in this case, stops the car and prepares to immediately receive the person, the relationship of carrier and passenger is established. The court also stated that once the relationship is established the carrier must use the utmost care and diligence, and a reasonable degree of skill must be exercised by its agents or servants on the standing vehicle as well as on a moving vehicle operated by the same carrier. The fact that a fare has not yet been collected is not determinative of the carrier-passenger relationship. The court found that the trial court's use of the words "highest degree of care" in its instructions was correct, and affirmed the judgment on that ground as well as other grounds (69 Cal. App. 2d 388, 395-396) .

[c] Carrier's Duty During Carrier-Passenger Relationship

Lagomarsino v. Market S. R. Co. (1945) 69 Cal. App. 2d 388, 395-396, 158 P.2d 982 , is discussed in § 33.29[3][b].

[d] Carrier's Duty to Protect Against Assaults by Third Persons

In Lopez v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist. (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 780, 221 Cal. Rptr. 840, 710 P.2d 907 , plaintiff bus passengers sued a public common carrier after they were injured when a fight broke out among other passengers on the bus. The trial court dismissed the action on the grounds that the carrier was a public entity and was immune from liability under the facts of the case. The California Supreme Court reversed.

The Court held that under Civ. Code § 2100, a common carrier may be held liable for failing to protect a passenger from assault by a third party. Initially, the Court held that a public entity could be found liable under Civ. Code § 2100, which requires carriers of persons for reward to use the utmost care and diligence for their safe carriage. It found that Civ. Code § 2100 provides the statutory authority necessary to circumvent the general rule of governmental immunity found in Gov. Code § 815 (40 Cal. 3d 780, 785) . The Court then held that the duty of care to protect a passenger from assault by a third person applies when the carrier has, or with the exercise of the utmost care should have, knowledge from which it may reasonably be apprehended that an assault may occur and the carrier, in addition, has the ability, with the exercise of utmost care, to prevent the injury (40 Cal. 3d 780, 791) . While noting that the carriers are not insurers of their passengers' safety (40 Cal. 3d 780, 791) , and are not necessarily under a duty to provide an armed security guard on each vehicle, the Court noted a number of precautionary measures a carrier might take in order to protect its passengers from assault, including such measures as providing radio communication between the bus driver and the local police and equipping the bus with alarm lights (40 Cal. 3d 780, 787-788) .

[e] Passenger's Purpose in Purchasing Transportation Does Not Determine Whether Defendant Qualifies as Common Carrier

In Gomez v. Superior Court (2005) 35 Cal. 4th 1125, 29 Cal. Rptr. 3d 352, 113 P.3d 41 , the plaintiffs were the estate and heirs of a woman who was killed after allegedly suffering brain injuries from riding on a roller coaster at an amusement park. The plaintiffs sued the amusement park, including in the complaint causes of action under Civ. Code §§ 2100 and 2101, which impose heightened duties of care toward passengers on common carriers. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer to those causes of action, concluding that amusement park rides such as roller coasters are not common carriers because the main purpose of the ride is entertainment or thrills and transportation is merely incidental to that purpose. The plaintiffs sought a writ of mandate, which the court of appeal granted, and the defendant appealed.

The California Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the court of appeal. The Court noted the broad statutory definition of common carrier contained in Civ. Code § 2168, which encompasses "[e]very one who offers to the public to carry persons, property, or messages, excepting only telegraphic messages." The Court also noted the expansive application that has been given to this definition by California courts in the past, which have included in the definition of a common carrier such things as elevators, sightseeing airplane rides that begin and end at the same airport, and recreational rides (35 Cal. 4th 1125, 1130-1133) . Consistent with these broad interpretations, the Court held that the operator of a roller coaster or similar type of amusement park ride could be a common carrier for purposes of Civ. Code §§ 2100 and 2101. The Court held that a passenger's purpose in purchasing transportation, whether that purpose is to get from one place to another or to travel for entertainment or sightseeing, does not determine whether the transportation provider is a common carrier. Therefore, the passenger's purpose does not determine whether the carrier will be required to exercise the highest degree of care for the safety of passengers imposed by Civ. Code §§ 2100 and 2101 (35 Cal. 4th 1125, 1136) .

[a] Establishment of Carrier-Passenger Relationship

In USAir Inc. v. United States Dep't of Navy (9th Cir. 1994) 14 F.3d 1410 , a Navy civilian employee, acting within the scope of his employment, boarded an airplane and stowed his briefcase in an overhead compartment in a precarious, unstable position. Prior to takeoff, a flight attendant, who was looking for space to stow a bag, negligently opened the overhead compartment, using only one hand and without looking at the compartment. The unstable briefcase fell out, hitting a passenger in the head and injuring him. The passenger sued the airline in state court and recovered a verdict. The airline sued the Navy in federal court for indemnity or contribution. The federal district court, ruling for the Navy, found that the Navy employee was not negligent, and that even if he were, the flight attendant's negligence was a superseding cause of the injuries. On appeal, the judgment was reversed, and the case was remanded for an apportionment of damages. The court stated that the airline's status as a common carrier created a duty to its passengers of utmost care and the vigilance of a very cautious person. The airline contended that it was not yet under this duty when the accident occurred because the plane had not yet taken off. The court disagreed, stating that the airline's duty to its passengers was in force when the Navy employee went to the site of departure and the airline accepted him as a passenger. The flight attendant's actions breached the carrier's duty of utmost care, as well as the airline's written policy on the duty to secure overhead luggage. However, the Navy employee also was negligent in stowing his briefcase in a precarious position. The flight attendant's negligence was not a superseding cause of the passenger's injuries; both acts of negligence were concurrent or contributing causes under California law (14 F.3d 1410, 1414) .

[b] Carrier's Duty During Carrier-Passenger Relationship

In Rogoff v. Grabowski (1988) 200 Cal. App. 3d 624, 246 Cal. Rptr. 185 , the court of appeal reversed the judgment entered against the plaintiff after sustaining general and special demurrers. The plaintiff had rented the defendant's limousine to take him and his wife to and from a cocktail and swimming party. Both the plaintiff and the defendant understood that the plaintiff and his wife intended to drink alcoholic beverages at the party and did not want to have to worry about driving home. The plaintiff and his wife left their clothes, credit cards, wallets, keys, money, and the wife's medication in the limousine while they attended the party. The defendant was to wait for them, but instead left them inebriated, clad only in bathing clothes, without personal effects or any way to get home. The defendant later refused to return the plaintiff's personal effects. Although the trial court held that the plaintiffs had not stated a cause of action for tortious breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, the court of appeal reversed, holding that they were able to state causes of action for breach of contract (possibly including damages for emotional distress), for conversion, and for breach of statutory obligations imposed by Civ. Code § 2100 and Pub. Util. Code §§ 2106, 2106, 5360, 5382 (200 Cal. App. 3d 624, 633-634) .

In De Vera v. Long Beach Pub. Transp. Co. (1986) 180 Cal. App. 3d 782, 225 Cal. Rptr. 789 , plaintiff, a passenger on a bus owned and operated by defendant, was injured when the bus was involved in an accident with a vehicle owned and operated by a third party. Plaintiff sued defendant, alleging that defendant's driver negligently lost or failed to obtain the identity of the third party. The court of appeal affirmed the judgment entered after a jury verdict in plaintiff's favor, holding that the liability of a common carrier to its passengers is the same whether the carrier is a public or private entity, and that the Civ. Code § 2100 "utmost care" standard was properly applied to the public corporation defendant (180 Cal. App. 3d 782, 792) . Relying on Lopez v. Southern Cal. Rapid Transit Dist. (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 780, 788-790, 221 Cal. Rptr. 840, 710 P.2d 907 , the court also held that, following an accident between a common carrier's vehicle and that of a third party, the common carrier has a duty to collect and preserve information concerning the other vehicle and its driver for use by the passengers in future civil litigation (180 Cal. App. 3d 782, 795) .

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a motion for summary judgment brought by a carrier in an action for damages for injuries or wrongful death where defendant asserts in its motion that it did not owe a duty of care to plaintiff (or plaintiff's decedent) because the carrier-passenger relationship had terminated at the time of the accident.

Where appropriate, counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. In addition, counsel should attach affidavits or declarations which support the memorandum [Code Civ. Proc. § 437c].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Termination of Carrier-Passenger Relationship

McBride v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co. (1955) 44 Cal. 2d 113, 279 P.2d 966 , involved an action to recover damages for personal injuries which resulted when plaintiff, on crutches, fell while alighting from the steps of one of defendant's railroad cars. In reversing the trail court's order granting defendant's motion for nonsuit, the Supreme Court stated that the carriage of a passenger includes the period during which the passenger is disembarking from the common carrier. The relationship between carrier and passenger continues until the passenger has alighted, and the carrier must exercise as high a degree of care in affording passengers a reasonable opportunity to alight in safety as in carrying them safely. The Court held that the question of whether defendant's employee, the porter had breached defendants' duty of utmost care and diligence [see Civ. Code § 2100] when the porter failed to clean the steps of the car was a question for the jury and that the court erred in granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

[b] Duty of Highest Degree of Care Until Opportunity to Alight Safely

In Brandelius v. City & County of San Francisco (1957) 47 Cal. 2d 729, 306 P.2d 432 , decedent was struck by a northbound cable car after he had alighted from a southbound cable car. The trial court granted defendant a new trial on the ground that the jury had not been properly instructed. The Supreme Court upheld the trial court's order on the ground that the court's instruction on last clear chance was incorrect. The Court held that the trial court had properly instructed the jury on the degree of care required on a carrier toward an alighting passenger and had properly left the question of termination of the carrier-passenger relationship to the jury. The Court stated that although the general rule is that the relationship of passenger and carrier terminates when a streetcar passenger alights on a public street and clears the streetcar, there are certain qualifications according to the circumstances of the case. The Court cited Boa v. San Francisco O. T. Railways (1920) 182 Cal. 93, 100-101 , to the effect that the carrier's responsibility continues until the passenger has had a reasonable opportunity of getting away from the car without injury and thus pass beyond the carrier's care and that this is a jury question. These rules apply to streetcar passengers specifically in the case of accidents caused by the carrier's negligent use of its own instrumentalities.

In Parker v. City & County of San Francisco (1958) 158 Cal. App. 2d 597, 323 P.2d 108 , plaintiff was injured when she was struck by a car after alighting from a bus which had stopped approximately 101/2 feet from the curb because a truck was parked in the bus stop. Plaintiff appealed from a judgment for defendant notwithstanding verdict for plaintiff, contending that there was substantial evidence of negligence by defendant proximately contributing to the accident. In reviewing the evidence, the court of appeal stated that a carrier's duty of the highest degree of care for the safety of its passengers generally ends when the passenger safely alights from the bus. However, the duty ends only when thepassenger is discharged into a relatively safe space, not merely when the passenger alights safely from the vehicle if the passenger is discharged into a dangerous area. The court discussed Brandelius v. City & County of San Francisco (1957) 47 Cal. 2d 729, 306 P.2d 432 , and Boa v. San Francisco O. T. Railways (1920) 182 Cal. 93 , in support of this rule and stated that although Brandelius and Boa dealt with injuries received by passengers alighting from a common carrier when the injuries were inflicted by an agency of the common carrier, there is no reason why the exception to the general rule applied in those cases should not also apply in a case such as this one, in which the passenger was discharged into an area of immediate danger.

[c] Application of Rule of Duty of Highest Care

Brandelius v. City & County of San Francisco (1957) 47 Cal. 2d 729, 306 P.2d 432 and Parker v. City & County of San Francisco (1958) 158 Cal. App. 2d 597, 323 P.2d 108 , are discussed in § 33.30[3][b].

[d] Duty Not to Eject Passenger Prior to Intended Destination

In Ingham v. Luxor Cab. Co. (2001) 93 Cal. App. 4th 1045, 113 Cal. Rptr. 2d 587 , the plaintiff was a 57-year-old diabetic woman with a series of health problems who hailed a taxicab to travel to a dental appointment. At the time she entered the cab, the plaintiff was using a cane and had to use an elaborate maneuver to enter the cab. After giving the driver the address of her destination, the driver drove for several blocks before pulling over and stopping, apparently due to frustration over the fact that a power outage had disabled the traffic signals. The driver told the plaintiff to get out of the cab, even though her destination was still two blocks away and the remaining journey would require scaling a steep hill. The plaintiff pleaded with the driver to finish the trip, explaining that she was on dialysis, walked with a cane, and probably could not walk the remaining blocks. The driver continued to insist that the plaintiff get out, however, and she eventually complied. Seeing no alternative transportation, the plaintiff attempted to walk the remaining way, eventually falling backwards while trying to scale the hill, which resulted in a hip fracture and other injuries. The plaintiff sued the cab company for negligence, but summary judgment was granted for the defendant on the grounds that the defendant owed no duty of care under the facts, because any duty that it may have owed was discharged when the plaintiff left the cab at a safe location. The plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The court noted the established rule that if a common carrier contracts to convey a person, this contract gives rise to a duty actionable in tort to deliver the person to his or her destination. Moreover, a common carrier that ejects a passenger at a place other than the designated destination violates a common carrier's affirmative duty to prevent harm to its passengers, if the ejectment subjects the passenger to reasonably foreseeable injury, and ejectment of a passenger by a common carrier may be wrongful and actionable even if the ejectment occurs at an apparently safe place and even if no physical force is used to remove the passenger from the carrier. Thus, even though there was no imminent danger at the spot where the plaintiff was ejected from the cab, the cab company owed a duty of care not to eject her from the cab two blocks downhill from the intended destination, because it was reasonably foreseeable that the obviously infirm plaintiff might suffer an injury as a result of having to walk uphill to her destination (93 Cal. App. 4th 1045, 1050-1054) .

The court noted, however, that the scope of the duty to deliver to the intended destination may vary depending on the nature of the carrier, because cabs contract to deliver to the passenger's ultimate destination, while carriers such as trains carry passengers only to fixed stations that may only be near to the passenger's ultimate destination (93 Cal. App. 4th 1045, 1053) . The court also held that there remained a question of fact as to whether the ejectment was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, or whether the injury was caused instead by the plaintiff's own subsequent conduct (93 Cal. App. 4th 1045, 1054-1058) .

IT IS NOT PROPER FOR THE COURT TO GRANT A MOTION FOR A NEW TRIAL FOR FAILURE TO INSTRUCT THE JURY ON THE DOCTRINE OF RES IPSA LOQUITUR WHEN THE ACCIDENT OCCURRED WHILE THE VEHICLE WAS AT A STANDSTILL.

A. No Error of Law. When the instructions given by the trial court are correct, there is no basis for the exercise of discretion and a contention of improper instruction of the jury is not legal ground on which a new trial may be granted (Conner v. Southern Pac. Co. (1952) 38 Cal. 2d 633, 637, 241 P.2d 535).

B. Conditions for Applicability of Doctrine of Res Ipsa Loquitur. For the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to apply, the following three conditions must be met: (1) the accident or injury must be of a kind which does not occur unless someone is negligent; (2) it must be caused by an agency or instrumentality in the control of the defendant; and (3) it must not have been due to any voluntary action or contribution on the part of the plaintiff (Gray v. City & County of San Francisco (1962) 202 Cal. App. 2d 319, 324, 20 Cal. Rptr. 894).

C. Doctrine as Inapplicable If Evidence of Specific Acts Shows No Negligence as Matter of Law. Plaintiff is deprived of the benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur where facts regarding the cause of the accident and the care exercised by defendant are shown as a matter of law thus eliminating any justification for resort to the inference of negligence (Di Mare v. Cresci (1962) 58 Cal. 2d 292, 299, 23 Cal. Rptr. 772, 373 P.2d 860).

D. Doctrine as Inapplicable When Vehicle at Standstill. The mere fact that the passenger is injured while on a common carrier does not justify the inference of res ipsa loquitur. In an action where the accident has occured while a vehicle is at a standstill and does not arise from any movement or operation of the vehicle, the accident is, as a matter of law, not the kind which ordinarily does not occur unless someone is negligent, and the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur is not applicable (Gray v. City & County of San Francisco (1962) 202 Cal. App. 2d 319, 328, 20 Cal. Rptr. 894).

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a motion for a new trial which was made on the ground that the court should have instructed the jury on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

Where appropriate, counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Where appropriate, counsel for defendant may modify this form for use in support of a motion for a new trial on the ground that the court should not have instructed the jury on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

In an appropriate case, these points and authorities may be used in opposition to a motion supported by the points and authorities in § 33.25.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

For memoranda of points and authorities opposing motions for a new trial, see Ch. 155, Motions After Trial .

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] No Error of Law

Conner v. Southern Pac. Co. (1952) 38 Cal. 2d 633, 241 P.2d 535 , was an action for wrongful death arising out of a collision between a train and an automobile which was being towed by a pickup truck. Defendants appealed from the trial court's order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground that there was error in the instructions. In reversing the order of the trial court, the Supreme Court found that the instructions given were not erroneous in law or misleading in fact, and stated that where the instructions are correct, there is no basis for the exercise of discretion and thus no legal ground on which a motion for a new trial may be granted.

[b] Conditions for Applicability of Doctrine of Res Ipsa Loquitur

In Gray v. City & County of San Francisco (1962) 202 Cal. App. 2d 319, 20 Cal. Rptr. 894 , plaintiff was injured when she slipped while boarding a streetcar which had come into the loading zone and stopped. The defendant made a motion for nonsuit on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence or lack of common care on the part of defendant common carrier, and that the rule of res ipsa loquitur did not apply. The trial court granted the motion for nonsuit, and the court of appeal affirmed the judgment for defendant. In considering the question of whether it was for the jury to determine whether or not the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur was applicable, the court stated that the trial court had apparently concluded, as a matter of law, that one or more conditions requisite for res ipsa loquitur was not present in the case. It listed the conditions for application of the doctrine set out in Paragraph B of this form.

[c] Doctrine as Inapplicable If Evidence of Specific Acts Shows No Negligence as Matter of Law

Di Mare v. Cresci (1962) 58 Cal. 2d 292, 23 Cal. Rptr. 772, 373 P.2d 860 , was an action for damages for personal injuries that plaintiff tenant sustained on an outside common stairway of defendant landlord's building. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff and defendant appealed from the judgment for plaintiff. In affirming the judgment, the Supreme Court found that the trial court properly instructed the jury on the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. The court relied on Leet v. Union P. R. Co. (1944) 25 Cal. 2d 605, 620-622, 155 P.2d 42 , for the proposition that the introduction of evidence of specific acts of negligence does not deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur unless the facts regarding the cause of the accident and the care exercised by defendant are shown as a matter of law, thus eliminating any justification for resort to the inference of negligence.

[d] Doctrine as Inapplicable When Vehicle at Standstill

The facts of Gray v. City & County of San Francisco (1962) 202 Cal. App. 2d 319, 20 Cal. Rptr. 894 , are discussed in § 33.31[3][b]. In analyzing whether the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applied to the case before it, the Supreme Court stated that when the evidence is conflicting or subject to conflicting inferences, it is for the jury, under proper instructions, to decide whether the three conditions necessary for applicability of the doctrine exist; but that where reasonable minds cannot differ, the determination of whether the doctrine applies may be a pure question of law. When a passenger falls down and is injured while boarding or alighting from a carrier which is stationary, it cannot be said that negligence is a more probable explanation than any other. Res ipsa loquitur has been applied against carriers in cases in which the facts have shown that the accident or injury arose from the movement or operation of the carrier, and the probability of negligence is therefore present. Since the accident in the case before the court occurred while the carrier was at a standstill and did not arise out of any movement or operation of the defendant's streetcar, the court found that reasonable minds, viewing the facts on the basis of experience, could not draw a conclusion of negligence as a probable explanation. Therefore the first condition required for the applicability of res ipsa loquitur was not present as a matter of law, and the trial court had properly held that the doctrine did not apply.

[The following may be combined with the point and authorities set forth in § 33.33 and may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities or in a trial appellate brief.]

DEFENDANT CARRIER'S LIABILITY IS NOT LIMITED BY THE PROVISIONS OF A SPECIAL CONTRACT WITHIN THE MEANING OF CIVIL CODE SECTION 2174 BECAUSE THE LOSS WAS CAUSED BY DEFENDANT'S GROSS NEGLIGENCE.

A. No Exoneration for Gross Negligence. A common carrier cannot be exonerated, by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong of the common carrier or its employees (Civ. Code § 2175).

[Optional] B. Tariff Limitation Not Applicable to Member of General Public With No Notice. A member of the general public is not bound by alimitation on liability in a tariff regulation or receipt, when the loss occurs through the carrier's gross negligence, and he or she did not contract with knowledge of the limitation and the existence of an opportunity to purchase higher liability (Muelder v. Western Greyhound Lines (1970) 8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 336-337, 87 Cal. Rptr. 297).

[Optional] C. Knowledge of Terms Is Question of Fact. Whether or not a receipt or other document under Section 2176 of the Civil Code was accepted with actual knowledge, or under circumstances constituting constructive notice or knowledge, is a question of fact for the jury (Allred v. Bekins Wide World Van Serv. (1975) 45 Cal. App. 3d 984, 992, 120 Cal. Rptr. 312).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to the contention that a special contract limits the liability of a common carrier, on the ground that the contract is unenforceable because the loss was caused by the carrier's gross negligence [see Civ. Code § 2175]. The optional paragraphs are for use if the shipper had no actual or constructive knowledge of the limitation, and had no opportunity to purchase higher liability [see Muelder v. Western Greyhound Lines (1970) 8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 336-337, 87 Cal. Rptr. 297] .

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that a purported contract limiting a carrier's liability is unenforceable because of lack of knowledge, lack of opportunity to purchase higher liability, and the carrier's gross negligence. For example, they may be combined with points and authorities submitted in opposition to a defendant carrier's motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c]. They may also be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief.

In an appropriate case, these points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to the contention supported by the points and authorities in § 33.26.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Tariff Limitation Not Applicable to Member of General Public With No Notice

The plaintiff in Muelder v. Western Greyhound Lines (1970) 8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 87 Cal. Rptr. 297 , brought an action to recover damages for the loss of a briefcase and its contents, which defendant had undertaken to transport from Indio to San Bernardino. After a nonjury trial, the court found that the loss had occurred through defendant's gross negligence and entered judgment in the amount of $7,637.70 in plaintiff's favor. Defendant appealed, contending that under the applicable tariff schedule pursuant to Civ. Code §§ 2200 (limitation on liability for valuable property) and 2205 (limitation of liability of carrier over public highway), plaintiff's recovery should have been limited to $50. Plaintiff contended that his knowledge of the tariff rules was an essential condition to his valid assent to the "released value" fixed by the tariff as the limit of the carrier's liability, at least when the loss occurred through gross negligence.

The court of appeal affirmed, concluding that the trial court impliedly found that plaintiff had no notice, actual or constructive, of the tariff rules limiting defendant's liability and that recovery for the actual value of the lost items was proper (8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 337) . Inasmuch as the state of the law regarding the enforceability of tariff limitations under the facts was unclear, the court discussed the relevant history of authority.

In Curtis v. United Transfer Co. (1914) 167 Cal. 112, 138 P. 726 , plaintiff brought an action to recover damages for the loss of a trunk and its contents, which defendant common carrier contracted to transport. The complaint included reference to a receipt given to plaintiff that included a clause limiting defendant's liability to plaintiff for loss through negligence to $50 unless otherwise agreed in writing. Plaintiff alleged that she had not read the receipt and did not know what it contained except for her name, until after the loss of the trunk. The trial court sustained the carrier's demurrer to the complaint on the ground that on the facts pleaded, plaintiff was deemed as a matter of law to have had constructive notice of the conditions of limitation of the contract and was bound by them. Judgment was entered against defendant after she declined to amend the complaint following the trial court's sustaining of the demurrer. The Supreme Court in Curtis reversed, stating that under the facts pleaded in the complaint, the question was one of law for the court. The court stated that under Civ. Code § 2176, a consignor assents to the limitation only by accepting the contract with actual or constructive knowledge of the terms of the limitation. The consignor's mere taking and keeping of a paper concerning the terms of limitation of liability does not of itself amount to assent to them. The question of knowledge is to be determined not merely from acceptance but from consideration of all the circumstances surrounding the transaction (8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 330-331) .

The court noted, however, that in the subsequent decision of Hischemoeller v. National Ice & Cold Storage Co. (1956) 46 Cal. 2d 318, 294 P.2d 433 , the Supreme Court has thrown the holding of Curtis into question. The Court in Hischemoeller held that actual knowledge and understanding by plaintiff of the terms of a warehouse receipt and tariff schedule limiting the liability of a public warehouseman were not essential to the effectiveness of the limitation. The Supreme Court held that the tariff automatically became a part of the storage contract and the parties were deemed to have contracted with its provisions in mind (8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 331-333) . The court in Muelder, however, held that Hischemoeller was not determinative of the rights of the parties before it. Hischemoeller involved a plaintiff who was a knowledgeable business person, and also involved the liability of a public warehouseman rather than a common carrier, which owes a higher degree of care subject to the provisions of Civ. Code § 2175 (prohibiting agreements exonerating them from liability for gross negligence) and Civ. Code § 2176 (requiring knowledge on the part of a consignor of the terms of a ticket, bill of lading, or written contract of carriage limiting the carrier's liability). After considering relevant holdings of various jurisdictions, the court in Muelder concluded that a member of the general public is not bound by a "released value" limitation on liability in a tariff regulation or a receipt, at least when loss occurs through the carrier's gross negligence, unless he or she contracted with knowledge of the limitation and of the existence of an opportunity to purchase higher liability (8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 334-337) . Thus, Hischemoeller did not require the court to hold that plaintiff was, as a matter of law, chargeable with knowledge of the tariff regulations and bound by the released value as a limitation on the carrier's liability (8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 332-335) .

[b] Knowledge of Terms as Question of Fact

Allred v. Bekins Wide World Van Serv. (1975) 45 Cal. App. 3d 984, 120 Cal. Rptr. 312 , is discussed in § 33.28[3][a]. The court also considered the question whether the terms of the bill of lading determined plaintiffs' rights regarding the required notice of a claim and the possible exculpation of defendant carrier from liability. The court relied on Civ. Code § 2176 and Curtis v. United Transfer Co. (1914) 167 Cal. 112, 115, 138 P. 726 , in stating that whether plaintiffs had knowledge of the terms of the bill of lading was a question of fact. The court therefore concluded that the bill of lading did not support the trial court's ruling on defendant carrier's bill of lading (45 Cal. App. 3d 984, 992) .

[1] FORM

[The following may be combined with the point and authorities in § 33.32 and may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities or in a trial appellate brief.]

THE LIABILITY OF DEFENDANT, AS A COMMON CARRIER, IS NOT SUBJECT TO THE LIMITATION ON DAMAGES SET FORTH IN SECTION 2205 OF THE CIVIL CODE BECAUSE THE LOSS TO PLAINTIFF'S BAGGAGE WAS CAUSED BY DEFENDANT'S GROSS NEGLIGENCE.

Loss to Baggage Caused by Carrier's Gross Negligence. The statutory limitation of a common carrier's liability for loss or damage to baggage carried over the public highways, set forth in Section 2205 of the Civil Code, does not apply when the loss occurs because of the carrier's gross negligence (Muelder v. Western Greyhound Lines (1970) 8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 337-338, 87 Cal. Rptr. 297).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to the contention that Civ. Code § 2205 limits the liability of a common carrier for loss of or damage to baggage transported over public highways. The basis of this memorandum is that the loss was caused by the carrier's gross negligence, and therefore is not subject to the statutory provision [see Muelder v. Western Greyhound Lines (1970) 8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 337-338, 87 Cal. Rptr. 297] .

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that the carrier's gross negligence causes plaintiff's loss of or damage to baggage transported over public highways. For example, they may be combined with points and authorities submitted in opposition to a defendant carrier's motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c]. They may also be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief.

In an appropriate case, these points and authorities may be submitted inopposition to the contention supported by the points and authorities in § 33.27.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Loss to Baggage Caused by Carrier's Gross Negligence

The facts of Muelder v. Western Greyhound Lines (1970) 8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 87 Cal. Rptr. 297 , are discussed in § 33.32[3][a]. In reviewing defendant's contention that apart from the tariff regulations, defendant's liability was limited to the amount specified in Civ. Code § 2205, the court stated that it found nothing to indicate that the legislature intended to limit a carrier's liability to the arbitrary nominal amount specified in that statute when a loss occurs through the carrier's gross negligence. The court reasoned that inasmuch as the legislature had expressed a policy against even contractual agreements exonerating a carrier from gross negligence [Civ. Code § 2175], it would not be reasonable for the court to assume that the legislature intended Civ. Code § 2205 to be such a limitation (8 Cal. App. 3d 319, 337-338) .

liability for paying a check in disregard of a stop payment order or order to close an account.

- Points and authorities supporting [see § 34.70] and opposing [see §§ 34.73 -34.75] the drawee's liability to the payee for paying a check on a forged endorsement.

- Points and authorities supporting [see §§ 34.71 -34.72] and opposing [see §§ 34.76, 34.77] the drawee's liability for undue retention of a check presented to it for payment.

- Points and authorities supporting [see §§ 34.90 -34.91] and opposing [see §§ 34.93 -34.96] the collecting bank's liability to the drawer for paying a check on a forged, different, or missing endorsement.

- Points and authorities supporting liability of a collecting bank that is also payee of a check on grounds for allowing improper distribution of the proceeds [see § 34.92].

- Points and authorities opposing imposition of a duty on a collecting bank to determine that the drawer's signature was forged [see §§ 34.97 -34.99].

- Points and authorities supporting [see §§ 34.120 -34.122] and opposing [see §§ 34.124 -34.127] the collecting bank's liability to the payee for paying a check on a forged, missing, or different endorsement.

- A form [see § 34.123] setting forth the provisions imposing liability on a depositary bank for failure to make the proceeds of a deposited item available for withdrawal by its customer in the required time. Note that the actual time requirements themselves are not set forth in that form but are discussed in California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 95, Banks, Deposits, and Checks (Matthew Bender).

- Points and authorities opposing liability on a collecting bank for exercising its right of chargeback and revocation of provisional settlement or for late notice of dishonor or return [see § 34.128].

- Points and authorities opposing liability on a collecting bank for breach of any of its duties of presentment [see § 34.129].

- Points and authorities supporting the contention that a collecting bank is liable for breach of the transfer warranties [see § 34.150].

- Points and authorities supporting [see § 34.151] and opposing [see § 34.153] the drawee's right to recover for breach of the presentment warranties.

- Points and authorities supporting the contention that the encoding or retention warranty has been breached [see § 34.152].

- Points and authorities supporting [see § 34.170] and opposing [see § 34.172] the contention that the bank is liable to the payee for wrongfully refusing to pay a cashier's, teller's, or certified check.

- Points and authorities opposing the contention that a bank is liable to the payee for breaching a restrictive endorsement on a cashier's check [see § 34.173].

- Points and authorities supporting the contention that an issuing or selling bank is liable to the purchaser of a cashier's check or a bank check for paying that check on a forged endorsement [see § 34.171].

[2] Application to Other Financial Institutions

The federal Expedited Funds Availability Act (12 U.S.C. § 4001 et seq.) and Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. Part 229) apply to any organization that accepts transaction or demand deposits. As used in that act and regulation, "bank" includes not only banks but also savings banks, mutual savings banks, credit unions, savings and loan associations, building and loan associations, homestead associations, cooperative banks, insurance companies, trust companies, industrial loan companies, or any other institution in the business of receiving deposits, whether organized under federal or state law [see 12 U.S.C. § 4001(12) (defining "depository institution"); 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(e) (defining "bank")].

Unless a written agreement provides otherwise, the California statutes cited in this chapter with respect to banks and checks also apply to items withdrawn from, transferred to, or otherwise handled by a California credit union [Fin. Code § 14867(c)]. In addition, "bank" is defined broadly in the Commercial Code as a person engaged in the business of banking, including a savings bank, savings and loan association, credit union, or trust company [Com. Code § 4105(1)]. Thus, although no California or Ninth Circuit case has apparently addressed the issue, it appears likely that a nonbank financial institution, such as a savings and loan association, that functions as a drawee, collecting, or depositary bank would be held to have the same Commercial Code duties and responsibilities as a bank [see, e.g., La Vista Cemetery Assn. v. American Sav. & Loan Assn. (1970) 12 Cal. App. 3d 365, 368-369, 90 Cal. Rptr. 722 (discussed in § 34.124[4][a]); see also 12 U.S.C. § 1832 (authority of savings and loan association for accounts subject to negotiable order of withdrawal, referred to as "NOW account"); 12 C.F.R. § 561.29 ("NOW account" defined)].

[3] Exclusions From Coverage

This chapter does not address the Electronic Funds Transfer Act (15 U.S.C. § 1693 et seq.), Regulation E of the Federal Reserve (12 C.F.R. Part 205), or the effect of any particular transaction that has been accomplished by electronic means. For discussion of electronic fund transfers, see California Legal Forms, Ch. 56, Letters of Credit and Electronic Fund Transfers (Matthew Bender); see also Forms and Procedures under the U.C.C., Article 4A, Funds Transfers, P 4A.05 (Matthew Bender).

This chapter also does not address the various laws and regulations establishing the maximum checkhold periods (the period of time within which a depositary financial institution must make proceeds of deposited items available for withdrawal) [see, e.g., Federal Expedited Funds Availability Act (12 U.S.C. § 4001 et seq.)]. Those requirements are discussed in California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 95, Banks, Deposits, and Checks (Matthew Bender).

Although this chapter does not specifically address interbank issues, cases discussed in this chapter include some cases in which both parties to the litigation were banks. Bank counsel may find cases based on the rights of the bank's customer persuasive [see also discussion in § 34.06]. In addition, regulations apply to interbank transactions and liability [see, e.g., 12 C.F.R. § 229.3, discussed in §§ 34.71, 34.76].

CHAPTER 34 CHECKS AND BANKS
PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.02

§ 34.02 Governing Law

Bank deposits and collections are generally governed by Division 4 of the Commercial Code [Com. Code § 4101 et seq.], although many concepts from Division 3 are relevant to checks and banks [see, e.g., Com. Code §§ 3110 (intended payees), 3204 (endorsement and endorser), 3302-3304 (holder in due course), 3401, 3403 (validity of signatures), 3404 (impostors and fictitious payees), 3406 (contributory and comparative negligence), 3418 (payment or acceptance by mistake), 3420 (conversion of instrument)]. Definitions relating to the Uniform Commercial Code are set forth in Com. Code § 1201.

Fin. Code § 14867(c) provides that unless the parties agree otherwise, Divisions 3 and 4 of the Commercial Code apply to items withdrawn from, transferred to, or otherwise handled by a California credit union as if the credit union were a bank.

The federal Expedited Funds Availability Act (12 U.S.C. § 4001 et seq.) authorized the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to enact regulations to expedite the collection and return of checks by banks. Those regulations (12 C.F.R. Parts 210, 229) supersede the Commercial Code as enacted in any state to the extent of any inconsistency [see 12 U.S.C. § 4007 (authority for superseding regulation)]. The preemptive scope of the Act and the relevant portions of Regulation CC, however, is quite narrow. Only state laws that establish different timing or disclosure requirements than the Act or otherwise directly conflict with it face preemption. Congress expressed no desire to preempt state laws or causes of action that supplement, rather than contradict, the Act. Therefore, in a case in which a bank deposited a wire transfer to the wrong account, neither the plaintiff's negligence or intentional and negligent misrepresentation claims were preempted, as those claims involved elements that were beyond the scope of the Act [Mihai Beffa v. Bank of the West (9th Cir. 1998) 152 F.3d 1174, 1177-1178] .

CHAPTER 34 CHECKS AND BANKS
PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.03

§ 34.03 Definitions

[1] Checks and Status of Banks Generally

The definition of "check" in Division 3 of the Commercial Code applies to the provisions governing bank deposits and collections [Com. Code § 4104(c)] "Check" is defined in Division 3 as (1) a draft, other than a documentary draft, payable on demand and drawn on a bank, (2) a cashier's check or teller's check, or (3) a demand draft [Com. Code § 3104(f); see Com. Code § 3104(g), (h), (k) ("cashier's check," "teller's check," and "demand draft" defined)]. For purposes of Division 4, "draft" means a draft as defined in Com. Code § 3104 or an item, other than an instrument, that is an order [Com. Code § 4104(a)(7); see Com. Code §§ 3103(a)(6) ("order" defined), 4104(a)(9) ("item" defined)]. For a discussion of checks in the context of negotiable instruments, see Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments .

A "bank" means a person engaged in the business of banking, including a savings bank, savings and loan association, credit union, or trust company [Com. Code § 4105(1)]. A "clearinghouse" is an association of banks or other payors regularly clearing items [Com. Code § 4104(a)(4); see Com. Code § 4104(a)(9) ("item" defined)]. The term "settle" means to pay in cash by clearinghouse settlement, in a charge or credit or by remittance, or otherwise as agreed. A settlement may be either provisional or final [Com. Code § 4104(a)(11)].

[2] Collecting Bank

A "collecting bank" is a bank handling an item for collection except the payor bank [Com. Code § 4105(5)].

[3] Customer

A "customer" is a person having an account with a bank or for whom a bank has agreed to collect items, including a bank that maintains an account at another bank [Com. Code § 4104(a)(5); see Com. Code § 4104(a)(1) ("account" defined)].

[4] Depositary Bank

"Depositary bank" means the first bank to take an item even though it is also the payor bank, unless the item is presented for immediate payment over the counter [Com. Code § 4105(2)]. In this chapter, depositary banks are generally considered collecting banks unless the two are specifically distinguished by statute [see, e.g., Com. Code § 3420(c) and Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990) (bank's defense against conversion action limited to collecting banks other than depositary bank)].

[5] Drawee and Drawer

A "drawee" is a person ordered in a draft to make payment [Com. Code § 4104(a)(8)] "Drawer" is not defined in Division 4 of the Commercial Code or included in the list of definitions from other divisions that apply to Division 4 [see Com. Code § 4104]. However, "drawer" is defined in Division 3 as a person who signs or is identified in a draft as a person ordering payment [Com. Code § 3103(a)(3)] Com. Code § 3414 sets forth a drawer's obligations.

[6] Payor Bank; Drawee Bank

A "payor bank" is a bank that is the drawee of a draft [Com. Code § 4105(3)]. Throughout this chapter, the term "drawee bank" or "drawee" is generally used to refer to the bank on which a check is drawn.

[7] Paying Bank

Regulation CC uses the term "paying bank" to mean (1) the bank by which a check is payable unless a check is payable at another bank and is sent to the other bank for payment or collection; (2) the bank at which a check is payable and to which it is sent for payment or collection; (3) the Federal Reserve Bank or Federal Home Loan Bank by which a check is payable; (4) the bank through which a check is payable and to which it is sent for payment or collection, if the check is not payable by a bank; or (5) the state or unit of general local government on which a check is drawn and to which it is sent for payment or collection [12 C.F.R. § 229.2(z)]. For purposes of 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30-229.42 and, in connection therewith, 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.1-229.3, paying bank includes the bank through which a check is payable and to which it is sent for payment or collection regardless of whether the check is payable by another bank, and the bank whose routing number appears on a check in fractional or magnetic form and to which the check is sent for payment or collection [12 C.F.R. § 229.2(z)]. The term "paying bank" will be used in this chapter only when discussing rights and duties under the Expedited Funds Availability Act or Regulation CC [see, e.g., §§ 34.71, 34.76].

CHAPTER 34 CHECKS AND BANKS
PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.04

§ 34.04 Bank Processing of Checks

The basic steps and procedures customarily undertaken in processing a check are as follows:

(1) The drawer makes and delivers a check to the payee, drawn against a drawee bank.

(2) The payee may directly present the check to the drawee bank for payment or may deposit the check with the depositary bank with which he or she maintains an account.

(3) The depositary bank takes the check for collection and gives provisional credit to the payee's account. Provisional credit is subject to payment by the drawee bank.

(4) The depositary bank then processes the check and sends it through an intermediary bank or clearinghouse for ultimate presentment to the drawee bank. In this process each bank handling the check "settles" with or pays the prior bank. When the drawee bank is local, the depositary bank will sometimes present the check directly for payment instead of going through the clearinghouse.

(5) When presented for payment, the drawee bank reviews the check and either honors the check by payment to the presenting bank, or dishonors the check if, for example, there are insufficient funds to cover it or there is a stop payment order against it. If the check is dishonored, it is returned, either directly to the depositary bank, or through an intermediary, referred to as a "returning bank." It is not necessary that the returning bank have handled the check in the forward collection process. The depositary bank is required to pay the paying bank or a returning bank [12 C.F.R. § 229.32(b)], and a returning bank is required to settle for the returned check, either with the paying bank or with another returning bank in the same way it would settle for a similar check in forward collection [12 C.F.R. § 229.31(c); see 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(cc) (defining "returning bank" to exclude paying bank and depositary bank; returning bank as collecting bank for purposes of Com. Code § 4202(b))].

(6) When the check is paid the drawee bank posts the check to the drawer's account and files it for subsequent return to the drawer with the bank statement.

§ 34.05 Statute of Limitations

An action to enforce an obligation, duty, or right arising under Division 4 of the Commercial Code must be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrues [Com. Code § 4111; see Edward Fineman Company v. Superior Court (1998) 66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1125-1126, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 478 (statute applied retroactively); see also § 34.51]. This statute of limitations conforms to the limitations period in Com. Code § 3118(g) for actions for breach of warranty and to enforce other obligations, duties, or rights arising under Division 3 of the Commercial Code [Official Comment to U.C.C. § 4-111]. § 34.124 addresses the limitations period in Com. Code § 3118(g) as applied to a conversion action under Com. Code § 3420. For a discussion of other provisions governing limitation of actions under Division 3, see Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments .

PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.06

§ 34.06 How to Use Forms in This Chapter

[1] Page Limits on Points and Authorities

One of the more significant drafting requirements to keep in mind are page limits: supporting and opposing memoranda may not exceed 15 pages. A reply or closing memorandum may not exceed 10 pages. Exhibits, declarations, attachments, the table of contents, the table of authorities, and the proof of service are excluded from these page limits [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 3.1113(d)]. Any party must obtain leave of court to file a longer memorandum [see Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 3.1113(e)]. These and other drafting requirements are discussed in further detail in Ch. 1, Writing Legal Memoranda and Briefs .

[2] Using the Forms to Build a Draft Memorandum

Although the forms in this chapter and the case and statutory authority on which they are based are arranged according to the status of the bank (drawee or collecting) and of the other party to the action (drawer, payee, or purchaser), the contention that a given form or authority supports or opposes may be applicable to someone in a different status. Thus, counsel should look in other parts for authority to explain, interpret, or argue for the applicability of a particular provision. In some instances there is case authority to support the application of a statutory provision phrased in terms of certain status parties to other parties. For instance, although Com. Code § 4406 is phrased in terms of defenses a drawee bank may assert against the drawer [see §§ 34.50, 34.51], case authority has established that the defenses of that section may also be asserted by a collecting bank that is sued by the drawer [see Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 684, 691 n.19, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (construing prior law); Allied Concord etc. Corp. v. Bank of America (1969) 275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 6, 80 Cal. Rptr. 622 (construing prior law)]. There are also cases and forms applying the contributory negligence defense of Com. Code § 3406 to all situations [see §§ 34.52, 34.74, 192].

If no case or form has supported the application of a particular provision to a particular party, counsel may still wish to argue that its application is appropriate. Some statutes are ambiguous, and their application is still evolving. For instance, the statutory and regulatory authorities cited and discussed in § 34.71 [Com. Code § 4302; 12 C.F.R. § 210.9(a)] never specify whether the drawee bank's obligations are owed to the collecting bank or to the payee. The case authorities cited in that form involve banks suing on their own behalf or as assignees of the payee, and even include dicta that drawers and payees may be bound by Federal Reserve Bank clearinghouse rules [see Community Bank v. Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco (9th Cir. 1974) 500 F.2d 282, 286] .

Use of particular authorities in support of an argument for a finding of liability with regard to transactions other than checks, however, may not be successful as against a defendant bank. For example, in Software Design and Application v. Hoefer & Arnett (1996) 49 Cal. App. 4th 472, 56 Cal. Rptr. 2d 756 , a defrauded investor of a faithless financial consultant claimed that the bank handling the accounts of the financial consultant/customer owed the investor/noncustomer a duty of care. The investor relied on cases such as Sun'n Sand v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 which held that a bank owes a limited duty of inquiry when a check presented for deposit bears some objective signs of fraud [see § 34.35[3]]. The court in Software Design, however, found that absent extraordinary and specific facts, a bank does not owe a duty of care to a noncustomer. In this case, although the accounts were held under fictitious names, there was no suspicious activity comparable to an altered check that would create such a duty [Software Design and Application v. Hoefer & Arnett (1996) 49 Cal. App. 4th 472, 479-483, 56 Cal. Rptr. 2d 756 (funds deposited solely by wire transfer)].

Similarly, in Karen Kane Inc. v. Bank of America NT & SA (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 1192, 79 Cal. Rptr. 2d 712 , a clothing manufacturer wrote numerous checks over several years to fictitious vendors for merchandise it never received, based on an employee's submission of fraudulent invoices. The manufacturer brought a negligence action against both the check cashing service that cashed those checks and the bank that deposited the checks into the service's account. Citing Software Design, the court of appeal stated that absent extraordinary and specific facts, a bank does not owe a duty of care to a noncustomer. The court found that because the checks were not forged or improperly endorsed, and did not indicate that maker was being defrauded, neither the check cashing service nor the bank had a duty to inquire of the maker if a valid transaction supported the checks before accepting them. The circumstances were not extraordinary enough to give rise to a duty of inquiry by a bank complying with its statutory duties, when in fact they were not even sufficient to constitute notice of fraud to the maker of the checks [Karen Kane Inc. v. Bank of America NT & SA (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 1192, 1201-1203, 79 Cal. Rptr. 2d 712 ; see also § 34.129].

A. Drawee Bank's Liability To Drawer

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.30

§ 34.30 Supporting Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Unauthorized Payment of Check [Com. Code § 4401]--Check Not Properly Payable

[1] FORM

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK'S CHARGE TO PLAINTIFF'S ACCOUNT FOR CHECK NUMBER _____ IS IMPROPER AND UNAUTHORIZED.

[EITHER]

A. General Duty Under Commercial Code for Any Item. A bank may charge against a customer's account an item that is properly payable from that account [even though the charge creates an overdraft]. An item is properly payable if it is authorized by the customer and is in accordance with any agreement between the customer and the bank (Com. Code § 4401(a)).

[OR]

A. General Duty Under Commercial Code for Postdated Checks. A bank may charge against a customer's account a check that is otherwise properly payable from the account, even though payment was made before the date of the check, unless the customer has given notice to the bank of the postdating, describing the check with reasonable certainty. The notice is effective for the period stated in Commercial Code Section 4403(b) for stop payment orders, and must be received at the time and in the manner as to afford the bank a reasonable opportunity to act on it before the bank takes any action with regard to the check described in Commercial Code Section 4303. If a bank charges against a customer's account a check before the date stated in the notice of postdating, the bank is liable for damages for the loss resulting from its act. The loss may include damages for dishonor of subsequent items under Commercial Code Section 4402 (Com. Code § 4401(c)).

[CONTINUE]

[Optional] B. Customer Defined. A "customer" is a person having an account with a bank or for whom a bank has agreed to collect items, including a bank that maintains an account at another bank (Com. Code § 4104(a)(5)).

[Optional] C. Customer's Liability. A customer is not liable for the amount of an overdraft if the customer neither signed the item nor benefited from the proceeds of the item (Com. Code § 4401(b)).

[Optional] D. Implied Contractual Duty. When a bank receives ordinary deposits, it becomes a debtor of the depositor and its contract with that customer is to discharge the indebtedness thus created by honoring checks drawn by the depositor on the bank. The bank is not entitled to debit the depositor's account for payments not made by his or her order or direction (Glassell Dev. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bk. (1923) 191 Cal. 375, 379, 216 P. 1012 ; Campbell v. Bank of America (1987) 190 Cal. App. 3d 1420, 1427 ; Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 554-555, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443).

[Optional] E. Signature Card Contract. A bank is authorized to honor withdrawals from an account on the signatures authorized by the signature card, which serves as a contract between the depositor and the bank for the handling of the account. The drawee bank is free from liability for honoring a check [drawn in breach of trust if the check is] signed in conformity with the signature card [when the drawee has no knowledge of a misappropriation] (Blackmon v. Hale (1970) 1 Cal. 3d 548, 556, 83 Cal. Rptr. 194, 463 P.2d 418 ; Certified Grocers of California, Ltd. v. San Gabriel Valley Bank (1983) 150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 287, 197 Cal. Rptr. 710).

[Optional] F. Corporate Principal as Depositor. When a corporation maintains a deposit account, the bank's duties may also be owed to the individual principals of the corporation. The determination whether the individual principals are the customers is made on a case-by-case basis and usually involves a situation in which the bank is also lending money and looking to the individuals to repay or guarantee the loan (American Nat. Bank v. Stanfill (1988) 205 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 1098-1101, 252 Cal. Rptr. 861 ; see Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 956, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848).

These points and authorities may be used to support the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging a customer's account to pay a check that is not properly payable. The alternatives in Paragraph A set forth the Commercial Code duties applicable to an item in general, or in particular, a postdated check [see Com. Code § 4401(a), (c); see also Com. Code § 4104(a)(9) ("item" defined)]. Optional Paragraph B sets forth the Commercial Code definition of customer. Optional Paragraph C sets forth the rule established by case authority that if more than one customer can draw on an account, the nonsigning customer is not liable for an overdraft unless he or she benefits from the item's proceeds [see Com. Code § 4401(b); Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 4-401]. Optional Paragraph D sets forth the implied contractual obligation established by case law between a depositor and his or her bank. Optional Paragraph E is for use when the drawee bank paid a check not in accordance with the signature card agreement. Optional Paragraph F is for use when one wishes to argue that the drawee bank is liable to a principal for acts or omissions involving a corporate account.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case; for example, facts describing the account and the check in question and establishing whether or not payment of the check violated the signature card agreement. If the check's payment violated the signature card agreement, counsel should include a copy of the agreement or the relevant particulars. If an overdraft is involved, any particulars of the signature card agreement or any separate overdraft agreement should also be set forth.

This form may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

§§ 34.31-34.35 address particular defects making a check not properly payable. The points and authorities in § 34.53 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable in negligence for improperly charging a check to the drawer's account. §§ 34.36-34.42 support the drawee's liability for improper payment of checks on the grounds that certain defenses are inapplicable. § 34.46-34.52 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of checks.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Implied Contractual Duty

Plaintiff depositor in Glassell Dev. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bk. (1923) 191 Cal. 375, 216 P. 1012 , sued to recover the increased amount of eight altered and raised checks drawn over an 18-month period. Plaintiff and five other corporations maintained a joint office. S was in charge of the joint office and had sole charge of all bookkeeping and auditing for the six companies. All the raised checks were payable to two or more of the other companies in the joint office. The checks were signed by two of plaintiff's officers and were drawn based on vouchers presented them by S. After they were drawn, S altered them. After one of the forgeries was discovered, S admitted to the others. Plaintiff demanded reimbursement from the bank for the amounts embezzled, but the bank refused. Plaintiff then demanded payment of the amount embezzled within the prior year. When that demand was refused, plaintiff commenced suit. Judgment was for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The Supreme Court affirmed. However, the Court first stated the settled rule that when a bank receives ordinary deposits, it becomes a debtor of the depositor and its contract with that customer is to discharge the indebtedness thus created by honoring checks drawn by the depositor on the bank. The bank is not entitled to charge the depositor's account for payments not made by his or her order or direction. As between the bank and its depositor, the bank pays forged or altered checks at its peril. The bank cannot charge them against the depositor's account unless (1) some negligent act or conduct of the depositor has contributed to induce payment, the bank itself being free from negligence, or (2) by his or her subsequent conduct in relation to the matter the depositor is estopped by equitable principles from denying the correctness of the payments (191 Cal. 375, 379) .

The facts and procedural background of Campbell v. Bank of America (1987) 190 Cal. App. 3d 1420 , are discussed in § 34.48[3][a]. Although payment of the check by the drawee bank was ultimately held to have been proper, in considering plaintiff drawer's contention that the drawee bank breached its implied contract, the court of appeal generally discussed the duty of a drawee bank to its customer and the implied contract on which that duty is based. In setting forth the rule, the court quoted from Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 554, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 (discussed below) (190 Cal. App. 3d 1420, 1427) .

The facts and procedural background of Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , are discussed in § 34.53[3][a]. The court of appeal discussed the duty of a drawee bank to its depositor, saying that it has long been settled that when a bank receives deposits, it has an implied contract with the customer to discharge the indebtedness thus created by honoring checks drawn by the depositor on the bank, but that the bank is not entitled to charge the depositor's account for payments not made by his or her order or direction (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 554) .

[b] Signature Card Contract

The facts and procedural background of Blackmon v. Hale (1970) 1 Cal. 3d 548, 83 Cal. Rptr. 194, 463 P.2d 418 , are discussed in § 34.94[3][a]. The payee designation on the check in question was "A and H Trust Account." In discussing the duties of the collecting bank in allowing withdrawals from the trust account, the Supreme Court said that the bank was authorized to honor withdrawals from the account on the signatures authorized by the signature card agreement, which serves as a contract between the depositor and the bank for the handling of the account. If the checks drawn on the account are signed in conformity with the signature card, and absent any knowledge of a misappropriation, the bank is free from liability for honoring a check drawn in breach of trust (1 Cal. 3d 548, 556) .

Certified Grocers of California, Ltd. v. San Gabriel Valley Bank (1983) 150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 197 Cal. Rptr. 710 , was a suit by a corporate drawer's judgment creditor against the drawee bank for conversion and breach of fiduciary duty arising from the bank's allowing unauthorized withdrawals from a corporate payroll account by a corporate officer who converted the funds to his own use. The signature card agreement originally required two officers to sign checks drawn on the account for $500 or more. The original signature card referred to a corporate resolution appointing the officers who were authorized to withdraw. One of those officers had the signature card changed so that he could make withdrawals on only his own signature. The second signature card made no reference to a corporate resolution, but the bank treated it as revoking and superseding the original signature card. The officer drew a series of checks using only his own signature. The trial court entered a judgment of dismissal after sustaining a general demurrer to the second amended complaint without leave to amend. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed regarding punitive damages, but reversed in all other regards. The court cited Glassell Dev. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bk. (1923) 191 Cal. 375, 379, 216 P. 1012 , Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 554, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 (both discussed above), and Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 805 n.7, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , for the proposition that when a bank receives deposits, it becomes a debtor of the depositor and its implied contract with that customer is to discharge the indebtedness thus created by honoring checks drawn by the depositor on the bank. The bank is not entitled to charge the depositor's account for payments not made by his or her order or direction (150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 286) .

The court cited Blackmon v. Hale (1970) 1 Cal. 3d 548, 556, 83 Cal. Rptr. 194, 463 P.2d 418 (discussed above), and Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 811-812, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 , for the proposition that a bank is authorized to honor withdrawals from an account on the signatures authorized by the signature card, which serves as a contract between the depositor and the bank for the handling of the account. When the checks drawn on the account are signed in conformity with the signature card, and absent any knowledge of a misappropriation, the bank is free from liability for honoring a check drawn in breach of trust. The complaint alleged that the bank knew that a substantial portion of the funds withdrawn by the officer was used for his personal use unrelated to the payroll obligations of the debtor, and thus stated a cause of action (150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 287) .

[c] Corporate Principal as Depositor

The bank in American Nat. Bank v. Stanfill (1988) 205 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 252 Cal. Rptr. 861 , loaned money to defendants and cross complainants. The proceeds of the loan were deposited in an account in the name of a nonprofit corporation of which defendants were directors. The note was executed by defendants as individuals and was subject to a special letter of understanding that the bank did not recognize the nonprofit corporation as a bankable source of repayment. Defendants were authorized signatories on the corporate account. All checks required two signatures, one of which had to be of a defendant. Many checks without the requisite signatures were paid, as were checks with forged endorsements. When the bank sued on the note, defendants asserted the defense of setoff based on the unauthorized withdrawals and cross complained. Summary judgment was entered for the bank on its complaint. Defendants and cross complainants appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. First, the court found that it was error to enter summary judgment on the complaint alone because the matters asserted as a defense were the same as those raised by the cross complaint. It amended the judgment to reflect judgment in the bank's favor on the cross complaint and then reversed that judgment because there was a triable issue of fact whether the defendants were the "customers" or "depositors" within the meaning of former Com. Code §§ 4104(1)(e) and 4401 (now see Com. Code §§ 4104(a)(5), 4401) (205 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 1101) . The court cited Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 956, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848 (discussed below), for the proposition that the determination whether the individual shareholder or director has standing to assert claims based on mishandling of a corporate account is to be made on a case-by-case basis by evaluating the relationship of the parties (205 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 1098-1100) . In this case the following factors were significant: (1) defendants were directors of the corporation; (2) they were required to be personally responsible for the loan that funded the corporation; (3) the loan proceeds were directed by defendants to be deposited in the corporate account and withdrawals from that account were required to have the signature of at least one of them; and (4) one defendant had a long history of commercial dealings with the bank as president of another company. Given all this, the court said it was entirely foreseeable that defendants would suffer adverse consequences if the corporate account was not managed according to their instructions (205 Cal. App. 3d 1089, 1100) .

Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848 , is discussed in § 34.43[3][g].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Implied Contractual Duty

See Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 139 P.2d 1 , discussed in § 34.33[3][a].

In LaMonte v. Sanwa Bank, California (1996) 45 Cal. App. 4th 509, 52 Cal. Rptr. 2d 861 , the court cited Blackmon v. Hale (1970) 1 Cal. 3d 548, 83 Cal. Rptr. 194, 463 P.2d 418 , in concluding that a depositary bank was under no duty to inquire as to the disposition of funds withdrawn by appellant's agent and joint account holder, her husband. Therefore, it could not posit any such duty on the part of a drawee bank, which paid royalty checks when presented with a "PEG" warranty and had no knowledge of the disposition of the proceeds from those checks. Accordingly, the court concluded that a drawee bank handling collection and disbursement of royalties did not breach its fiduciary duty by paying checks naming the owner as payee but endorsed by her husband alone, as the bank had not expressly or by implication agreed to supervise or monitor the owner's finances and accounts (45 Cal. App. 4th 509, 522-523) .

The facts and procedural background of Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163 , are discussed in § 34.31[3][c]. In discussing a drawee's duty to its customer, the court of appeal said that their relationship is one of debtor and creditor, being founded on contract, and that the bank is under a duty to pay checks only in strict accordance with the customer's order. The court cited Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 321, 139 P.2d 1 (discussed in § 34.33[3][a]), for the proposition that the bank is without authority to charge a customer's account with an unauthorized order, and payment of such is made out of the bank's own funds (151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 969) .

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK'S CHARGE TO PLAINTIFF'S ACCOUNT FOR CHECK NUMBER _____ IS IMPROPER AND UNAUTHORIZED BECAUSE THAT CHECK HAD AN UNAUTHORIZED DRAWER'S SIGNATURE.

A. General Duty Under Commercial Code for Any Item. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph A.]

C. Signature Card Contract. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph E.]

D. Signature Required for Liability. A person is not liable on an instrument unless (1) the person signed the instrument, or (2) the person is represented by an agent or representative who signed the instrument and the signature is binding on the represented person under Commercial Code Section 3402 [Com. Code § 3401(a); *see Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 969, 199 Cal. [Optional] E. Unauthorized Signature Is Inoperative. An unauthorized signature, which under Commercial Code Section 1201(b)(41) includes one made without actual, implied, or apparent authority, is ineffective [except as the signature of the unauthorized signer in favor of a person who in good faith pays the instrument or takes it for value] [*Com. F. Check With Unauthorized Signature Is Not Properly Payable. [Optional] G. No Ratification. Although an unauthorized signature may generally be ratified, one whose signature is not sufficient to make a check effective in the first place cannot ratify the validity of that check [*see Com. [2] Comments

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging a customer's account to pay a check that had an unauthorized drawer's signature. Paragraph D sets forth the Commercial Code requirement of signature [see Com. Code § 3401(a)]. Optional Paragraph E sets forth the statutory provision regarding the ineffectiveness of an unauthorized signature. The bracketed portion need only be used if a party contends it is a holder in due course [see Com. Code § 3403(a); Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 977-979, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163] . Paragraph F states the rule that a check with an unauthorized signature is not properly payable. Optional Paragraph G states that one who is not authorized to sign a check cannot ratify his or her own or another unauthorized signature.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in §§ 34.32 -34.35 address other defects making a check not properly payable. The points and authorities in § 34.53 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable in negligence for improperly charging a check to the drawer's account. The points and authorities in §§ 34.36 -34.42 support the drawee's liability for improper payment of checks on the grounds that certain defenses are inapplicable. The points and authorities in §§ 34.46 -34.52 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of checks.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Signature Required for Liability

The facts, procedural background, and portion of the opinion in Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163 (disapproved on other grounds in In re Marriage of Arceneaux (1990) 51 Cal. 3d 1130, 1137-1138) , that addresses Com. Code § 3401(a) are discussed in § 34.31[3][c].

[b] Unauthorized Signature Is Inoperative

The facts, procedural background, and portion of the opinion in Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163 (disapproved on other grounds in In re Marriage of Arceneaux (1990) 51 Cal. 3d 1130, 1137-1138) , that addresses Com. Code § 3403(a) are discussed in § 34.31[3][c].

[c] Check With Unauthorized Signature Is Not Properly Payable

In Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163 (disapproved on other grounds in In re Marriage of Arceneaux (1990) 51 Cal. 3d 1130, 1137-1138) , the trustee in bankruptcy of a bankrupt corporation sued the corporation's bank for negligence and breach of contract for charging the corporate account after paying a $250,000 check drawn on the corporate account without the authorized signatures. The signature card agreement noted that all checks over $10,000 drawn on the account required the signatures of either H or M and one other authorized officer. The check in question was signed by G and R. The bank refused to cash the check when it was presented, so the payee endorsed it and deposited it to its account at Camino-California Bank (hereinafter "Camino"). When the check arrived at defendant bank (February 22), the corporate account was charged for it. Later, the irregularity was noted. R informed a bank officer that the check was authorized. On February 26, H refused to authorize the check because he had resigned from the corporation. The bank officer could not reach M, so he credited the corporate account with the amount of the check and returned it to Camino. On February 27, defendant received a federal district court order telling it not to pay any items against the corporate account because a receiver had been appointed for the corporation. Camino, which had already paid the payee, received the check on February 28, refused to accept it because it was a "late return," and returned it to defendant. On March 5, defendant reversed the credit made on February 26. The trial court entered judgment for plaintiff on the complaint and for defendant on its cross complaint against the payee and certain officers of both corporations. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court first discussed a drawee's general duty to its customer. This part of the opinion is discussed in § 34.30[4][a]. The court noted that under former Com. Code § 3401(1) (now see Com. Code § 3401(a)), a person is not liable on an instrument unless his or her signature appears on it. Under former Com. Code § 3401(1), an unauthorized signature, which under former Com. Code § 1201(43) (now see Com. Code § 1201(b)(41)) includes one made without actual, implied, or apparent authority, is wholly inoperative as the signature of the person whose name is signed. By negative implication and pursuant to former Com. Code § 4401(1) (now see Com. Code § 4401(a)), a check with an unauthorized signature is not properly payable, and the bank breaches its agreement with its customer in paying such an item. Because the check was not signed by either H or M, defendant breached the terms of its deposit agreement (151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 969) . This result appears consistent with the 1992 amendment of Com. Code § 4401, which added a definition of "properly payable" as an item that is authorized by the customer and is in accordance with any agreement between the customer and bank [see Com. Code § 4401(a)].

[d] No Ratification

The facts and procedural background of Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163 (disapproved on other grounds in In re Marriage of Arceneaux (1990) 51 Cal. 3d 1130, 1137-1138) , are discussed in § 34.31[3][c]. Defendant drawee contended that payment of the check was orally ratified by R. The court of appeal quickly disposed of that contention, saying it defies logic to assert that one whose signature is not sufficient to make a check effective in the first place could ratify the validity of a check exceeding $10,000 (151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 974) .

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK'S CHARGE TO PLAINTIFF'S ACCOUNT FOR CHECK NUMBER _____ IS IMPROPER AND UNAUTHORIZED BECAUSE THAT CHECK DID NOT HAVE ALL THE REQUIRED DRAWERS' SIGNATURES.

A. Signature Card Contract. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph E.]

B. Multiple Signatures Required. When more than one signature is required on checks by law, by the signature card agreement, or by any applicable banking custom or practice [incorporated into the contract] to make authorized withdrawals from an account, the drawee is liable for charging the account to pay checks drawn with less than all required signatures (Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 809-812, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 ; see Com. Code § 3403(b); Certified Grocers of California, Ltd. v. San Gabriel Valley Bank (1983) 150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 287, 197 Cal. Rptr. 710).

[Optional] C. Exercise or Nonexercise of Ordinary Care. Action or nonaction approved by Division 4 of the Commercial Code, or pursuant to Federal Reserve regulations or operating circulars, is the exercise of ordinary care. In the absence of special instructions, action or nonaction consistent with clearinghouse rules and the like, or with a general banking usage not disapproved of by Division 4, is prima facie the exercise of ordinary care. Conversely, the failure [of a bank] to act in accordance with an accepted banking practice suggests the absence of care (Com. Code § 4103(c); Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 809 n.9, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109).

[Optional] D. Geographic Area to Which General Usage Applies. "General banking usage" should be taken to mean a general usage common to banks in the area concerned. A metropolitan area is sufficient (Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 809 n.9, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109).

[Optional] E. Joint Personal Representatives. When there are two personal representatives, the signatures of both are necessary to make withdrawals from an estate account (Prob. Code § 9630; Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 810, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 (construing former Prob. Code § 570; now see Prob. Code § 9630).

[Optional] F. No Limitation Period. An action for recovery of amounts charged a checking account in payment of checks without all required drawers' signatures is governed by Code of Civil Procedure Section 348, which provides that there is no limitation on the time for initiating an action to recover money deposited with a bank. [That section applies even when the action is not based on breach of the signature card contract] (Code Civ. Proc. § 348; Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 813, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109).

[Optional] G. Drawee's Liability for Drawer's Conversion. A drawee bank that not only pays checks drawn with only one of two required signatures of cofiduciaries, but also knows that the funds are being converted by the disloyal fiduciary in the breach of his or her fiduciary duty, is jointly liable to the depositor for conversion whether or not it participates in the wrongful acts (Certified Grocers of California, Ltd. v. San Gabriel Valley Bank (1983) 150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 289, 197 Cal. Rptr. 710).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging a customer's account to pay a check that did not have all required drawers' signatures. Optional Paragraphs C and D may be applicable if the issue hinges on the bank's exercise of ordinary care or a practice of general usage. Optional Paragraph E applies when the account is that of a decedent's estate with joint personal representatives. Optional Paragraph F addresses the limitation period. The limitation period for recovery under Com. Code § 4401(a) for other types of unauthorized payments is set forth in § 34.51. If the drawee's conduct in allowing the withdrawal goes as far as complicity in conversion, Optional Paragraph G may be used.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in the form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Therefore, counsel should set forth facts describing the account, the check, and the signature card agreement in question, possibly attaching a copy of the signature card agreement or the relevant particulars.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

For points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee may also be liable under a negligence theory for improperly charging a check to its customer's account, see § 34.53. For related points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of checks, see §§ 34.46 -34.52.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Multiple Signatures Required

In Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 , one coexecutor sued the drawee bank for charging the estate account approximately $280,000 for checks drawn with only the signature of the other coexecutor. One coexecutor opened the checking account for the estate. There was no discussion at that time regarding the number of signatures required to make withdrawals, but the letters testamentary, which showed coexecutors, were presented to the bank. The bank sent a signature card to plaintiff coexecutor, who signed it and returned it. Both signature cards provided that the account would be governed by applicable banking laws, customs, and clearinghouse regulations. The bank's operations manual said that if there were two executors for an estate, the signatures of both were ordinarily necessary for any withdrawal. The signature cards for such accounts were to be flagged with a stamp to indicate that more than one signature was needed. If two signatures were not to be required, the bank's legal department was to be consulted. The account card was not flagged, and the legal department was not consulted. After four years, plaintiff coexecutor discovered the withdrawals and commenced the action. During the course of the action, the estate's assets were distributed and the heirs and testamentary trustees substituted as plaintiffs. The trial court found the bank liable on three separate grounds for the loss represented by each withdrawal: (1) failure to require the signatures of both executors was a breach of the bank's common-law duty to use reasonable care in its conduct with its depositor; (2) violation of former Prob. Code § 570 (now see Prob. Code § 9630), which was held to have required both signatures to effect withdrawals; and (3) breach of the deposit contract that incorporated all applicable banking customs, which were found to require he signatures of both coexecutors for withdrawals. Judgment was for the amount of the checks plus interest from the date of each withdrawal. Defendant appealed.

In an opinion that never mentioned former Com. Code § 4401(1) (now see Com. Code § 4401(a)) regarding what a bank may charge against a customer's account, the Supreme Court affirmed. The Court first considered whether the evidence supported the finding that the drawee had breached its common-law duty to act with reasonable care when it permitted withdrawals on only one signature. The standard of care in a particular circumstance may be based on a statute or on the custom and practice in the relevant community (21 Cal. 3d 801, 809) . The evidence supported the finding that the bank deviated from the practice and custom in the banking industry in the Los Angeles area of requiring both signatures for coexecutors to withdraw funds from an estate account, and that the bank deviated from its own written procedures and accepted practice by not flagging the signature cards or consulting its legal department (21 Cal. 3d 801, 809-810). Based on the evidence of the banking industry's custom and defendant's own procedures and practices, the evidence supported the finding that the failure to require the signatures of both coexecutors on withdrawals fell below the standard of care owed to the estate (21 Cal. 3d 801, 811) . Defendant argued that the withdrawals were in accordance with the signature card. The Court stated defendant was negligent in failing to indicate in some effective manner that withdrawals were not to be honored unless signed by both coexecutors and therefore was not insulated from liability (21 Cal. 3d 801, 812) .

Note that the decision in Bullis is consistent with current Com. Code § 3403. That section was amended in 1992 to add Com. Code § 3403(b), which provides that if the signature of more than one person is required to constitute the authorized signature of an organization (which is defined broadly and includes two or more persons with a common interest [see Com. Code § 1201(b)(25)]), the signature of the organization is unauthorized if one of the required signatures is lacking. In Edward Fineman Company v. Superior Court (1998) 66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1119-1125, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 478 , the court examined the history of Com. Code § 3403(b) and concluded that the 1992 amendment was a clarification of existing law with respect to the meaning of "unauthorized" in cases when checks lack all of the required signatures and that it implicitly abrogated the holding in Far West Citrus Inc. v. Bank of America (1979) 91 Cal. App. 3d 913, 917, 154 Cal. Rptr. 464 (in which the same court had previously held that a check signed by only one of the two required signatures was not an item bearing an "unauthorized" signature, the relevant provisions of Com. Code § 4406 were not triggered, and the customer's action against the bank was not precluded by his failure to discover and, within one year, report a check bearing an unauthorized signature) with respect to the inapplicability of the one-year notice period of Com. Code § 4406. For further discussion, see §§ 34.36 and 34.51 [see also Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-403 (1990)].

Certified Grocers of California, Ltd. v. San Gabriel Valley Bank (1983) 150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 197 Cal. Rptr. 710 , is discussed in § 34.30[3][b].

[b] Exercise or Nonexercise of Ordinary Care

The facts and procedural background of Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 , are discussed in § 34.32[3][a]. In considering what was required of the bank in exercising ordinary care, the Supreme Court noted that former Com. Code § 4103(3) (now see Com. Code § 4103(c)) provides that action or nonaction by a bank consistent with a general banking usage not disapproved of by Division 4 of the Commercial Code prima facie constitutes the exercise of ordinary care. Conversely, the bank's failure to act in accordance with an accepted banking practice suggests the absence of due care. "General banking usage" should be taken to mean a general usage common to banks in the area concerned. A metropolitan area is sufficient (21 Cal. 3d 801, 809 n.9).

[c] Geographic Area to Which General Usage Applies

Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 , is discussed in § 34.342[3][a].

[d] Joint Personal Representatives

Former Prob. Code § 570, repealed effective July 1, 1988, provided that one of two coexecutors could act alone only in certain situations. The Supreme Court in Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 (discussed in § 34.32[3][a]), said that by implication, action under any circumstance other than as set forth in Prob. Code § 570 (now see Prob. Code § 9630) must be taken jointly (21 Cal. 3d 801, 810) .

Prob. Code § 9630(a)(1) (operative July 1, 1988) provides that when there are two personal representatives, both must concur to exercise a power. Prob. Code § 9630(a)(2) provides that when there are more than two personal representatives, a majority must concur to exercise a power [see also Prob. Code § 9645 (transition provision)].

[e] No Limitation Period

Code Civ. Proc. § 348 provides that there is no limitation to actions brought to recover money or other property deposited with any bank, banker, trust company, building and loan association, or savings and loan society, or evidenced by a certificate issued by an industrial loan company or credit union, except when those entities have become insolvent and are in the process of liquidation.

The facts and procedural background of Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 , are discussed in § 34.32[3][a]. In discussing the applicable limitation period, the Supreme Court said that an action for recovery of amounts charged a checking account in payment of checks without all required drawers' signatures must be distinguished from one on which the check contained a forged or unauthorized signature. When required signatures are missing, the action is one for recovery of money deposited with a bank and is governed by Code Civ. Proc. § 348. That section applies even when the action is not based on a breach of contract theory (21 Cal. 3d 801, 813) .

[f] Drawee's Liability for Drawer's Conversion

The facts and procedural background of Certified Grocers of California, Ltd. v. San Gabriel Valley Bank (1983) 150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 197 Cal. Rptr. 710 , are discussed in § 34.30[3][b]. In considering defendant drawee bank's liability for conversion, the court of appeal noted that the complaint alleged that the bank knowingly and actively participated with the disloyal officer in the breach of his fiduciary duty by wrongfully permitting him to obtain access to the payroll account and to convert to his own use and benefit the money on deposit in that account. When there is a common plan or design to commit a tort, all who participate are jointly liable whether or not they participate in the wrongful acts. Further, a person who is not a fiduciary may be liable for breach of fiduciary duty as a result of colluding with a disloyal fiduciary. Thus, the complaint stated a cause of action against the bank for breach of fiduciary duty (150 Cal. App. 3d 281, 289) .

A. Drawee Bank's Liability To Drawer

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.33

§ 34.33 Supporting Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Unauthorized Payment of Check [Com. Code § 4401]--Forged Drawer's Signature

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK'S CHARGE TO PLAINTIFF'S ACCOUNT FOR CHECK NUMBER _____ IS IMPROPER AND UNAUTHORIZED BECAUSE THE PURPORTED SIGNATURE OF DRAWER ON THAT CHECK WAS FORGED.

A. General Duty Under Commercial Code for Any Item. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph A.]

[Optional] B. Implied Contractual Duty. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph D.]

D. Unauthorized Signature Is Inoperative. [See § 34.31[1], Paragraph E.]

E. Forged Drawer's Signature. Disregarding certain exceptions, ultimate liability for paying a check bearing a forged drawer's signature rests with the drawee bank. Absent its ratification or negligence, the drawer may demand that the drawee recredit its account on the ground that a check bearing a forged drawer's signature is not properly payable within the meaning of Commercial Code Section 4401(a). Paying such a check is a breach of the drawee's primary contractual obligation and a violation of its duty under Section 4401(a), and no degree of care on the bank's part will excuse it from liability (Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 321, 139 P.2d 1 ; Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 804-805, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (construing prior law)).

F. Duty to Know Drawer's Signature. A drawee bank has a duty to know its depositor's signature. Absent negligence on the drawer's part, a drawee is liable for paying a check with a forged drawer's signature even if payment was made in good faith and in accordance with reasonable commercial standards. No degree of care on the bank's part will excuse it from liability (Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 321, 139 P.2d 1 ; Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 805, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (construing prior law)).

[Optional] G. Drawer's Prima Facie Case. Drawer's prima facie case against the drawee bank is established by showing that forged checks have been paid from his or her account and that the bank has refused demand for reimbursement (Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 333, 139 P.2d 1 ; Sommer v. Bank of Italy etc. Assn. (1930) 109 Cal. App. 370, 376, 293 P. 98).

[Optional] H. Reemployment of Forger Is Not Ratification. The drawer's reemployment of the employee who forged [the drawer's signature on the] checks does not amount to ratification of prior forgeries by that employee (Sommer v. Bank of Italy etc. Assn. (1930) 109 Cal. App. 370, 373, 376-377, 293 P. 98).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging a customer's account to pay a check on which the drawer's signature was forged. Paragraph E sets forth the basic authority that payment of a check with a forged drawer's signature is a violation of both the drawee's statutory and contractual duties. Paragraph F describes the scope of the duty. Optional Paragraph G addresses what is sufficient to establish the drawer's prima facie case. Optional Paragraph H is applicable only if the drawer has reemployed or continues to employ the forger and the drawee contends this amounts to ratification of the forgeries.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Therefore, counsel should set forth facts describing the account, the check, and the signature card agreement in question, possibly attaching a copy of the signature card agreement and the forged checks.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

For points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee may also be liable under a negligence theory for improperly charging a check to its customer's account, see § 34.53. For related points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of checks, see §§ 34.46 -34.52.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Forged Drawer's Signature

Plaintiff in Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 139 P.2d 1 , sued the drawee to recover the amount of 127 checks on which plaintiff's signature as drawer was forged by an employee of plaintiff. The checks were payable to the employee and were made over a 10-month period during which plaintiff never examined his bank statements. When the employee absconded and plaintiff discovered the forgeries, he made demand on defendant for reimbursement.

Defendant refused, and plaintiff sued. Defendant claimed that plaintiff was negligent in failing to examine the statements and report the forgeries and in delegating management of his banking affairs to the employee without having inquired first about the employee's reputation for honesty and integrity. Judgment was entered for plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

The Supreme Court affirmed. The Court repeated the well-settled rule that when a bank receives ordinary deposits it becomes a debtor of the depositor. Its contract with that customer is to discharge this indebtedness by honoring checks drawn by the depositor on the bank. In so doing, the bank is charged with knowledge of its depositor's signature. Consequently, a bank pays a forged check at its peril, and payment of a forged check will be considered to have been made from the bank's own funds. It has no right to charge the depositor's account with amounts disbursed contrary to his or her genuine order, and it will be liable to the depositor for doing so. Although no degree of care on the drawee bank's part will excuse it from liability for paying a forged check, it may justify payment on principles of estoppel, or on the basis of the depositor's negligent or misleading conduct that directly or proximately caused the bank to pay (22 Cal. 2d 316, 321) . The depositor's prima facie case is established by showing that forged checks have been paid from the account and that the bank has refused demand for reimbursement (22 Cal. 2d 316, 333) . The portion of the opinion considering the bank's defenses is discussed in § 34.39[2][b].

Plaintiff in Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , was the drawer's insurer. Plaintiff brought the action in its capacity as subrogee after it paid the drawer the amount of a check on which one of the drawer's employees had forged one of the two required drawers' signatures. The check was drawn on the insured's account at another bank (hereinafter "Banco") and was payable to "Security Pacific National Bank A/C No. 260 049 569 GC Associates." The employee opened account number 260 049 569 at defendant bank in the name of G. C. Associates and deposited the check there with the typewritten endorsement "Deposit Only AC 049 569 G. C. Associates." Then the employee withdrew the funds from the account at defendant. Banco paid defendant and charged the drawer's account. The drawer demanded that Banco recredit its account, but Banco refused. Plaintiff sued only defendant for negligence and breach of warranty. A judgment of dismissal was entered, and plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. In explaining why plaintiff had chosen the wrong defendant, the court said that disregarding certain exceptions, ultimate liability for payment of a check bearing a forged drawer's signature rests with the drawee bank, which in this case was Banco. Former Com. Code § 4401(1) (now see Com. Code § 4401(a)) provides that as between drawee and drawer, losses from a forged or unauthorized signature are borne by the bank since payment not made pursuant to direction of a properly payable order cannot be charged to the depositor's account (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 804) . Absent its ratification or negligence, the drawer may demand that the drawee recredit its account on the ground that a check bearing a forged drawer's signature is not properly payable within the meaning of former Com. Code § 4401(1). The 1992 amendment of Com. Code § 4401 [Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 40] should not alter this holding. The amendment not only maintains the "properly payable" language but also defines "properly payable" as that which is authorized by the customer and is in accordance with any agreement between the customer and bank [see Com. Code § 4401(a)].

The court further stated that under former Com. Code § 3404(1) (now see Com. Code § 3403(a)), the forgery was not operative as the ostensible drawer's signature (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 804-805 n.5). Payment of such a check is a breach of the drawee's primary contractual obligation and a violation of its duty under former Com. Code § 4401(1). The court cited Basch for the propositions that as drawee, Banco had the duty to know the drawer's signature and that absent the drawer's negligence, Banco is liable even if it paid in good faith and in accordance with commercially reasonable standards (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 805) .

[b] Duty to Know Drawer's Signature

Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 139 P.2d 1 , and Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , are discussed in § 34.33[3][a].

[c] Drawer's Prima Facie Case

Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 139 P.2d 1 , is discussed in § 34.33[3][a].

Plaintiffs in Sommer v. Bank of Italy etc. Assn. (1930) 109 Cal. App. 370, 293 P. 98 , were partners who maintained their partnership account with defendant. An employee of plaintiffs forged their signatures to a series of checks during July, August, and September of 1928. The forgeries were discovered and the employee was arrested on September 17. The bank made reimbursement for the checks forged before August, but refused plaintiffs' demand in regard to the August and September checks on the ground that plaintiffs were negligent in failing to inspect the statements and cancelled checks and that they ratified the forgeries by reemploying the employee. After being reemployed by plaintiffs the employee made partial reimbursement. Plaintiffs sued defendant for the unreimbursed balance. Judgment of nonsuit was entered in favor of defendant at the close of plaintiffs' case. Plaintiffs appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. It was not questioned on appeal that plaintiffs established that the bank paid a number of forged checks from plaintiffs' account and refused their demand for reimbursement (109 Cal. App. 370, 372) . The court said that the depositor makes out a prima facie case by showing that the bank has made payment from his or her account on forged checks and refused on demand to pay the sum represented by the forged checks. The burden is not on the depositor to show that he or she is free from negligence. After the prima facie case is shown, the burden is on the bank to show by way of defense that it was free from negligence and that the depositor was negligent (109 Cal. App. 370, 376) . Because plaintiffs had made a prima facie case and no defense had been established as a matter of law at the close of plaintiffs' case, nonsuit was error (109 Cal. App. 370, 377) .

[d] Reemployment of Forger Is Not Ratification

The facts and procedural background of Sommer v. Bank of Italy etc. Assn. (1930) 109 Cal. App. 370, 293 P. 98 , are discussed in § 34.33[3][c]. Defendant contended that plaintiffs ratified the forgeries by reemploying the forger after he was placed on probation and by accepting partial restitution from the forger through the probation office. The court stated there was no authority to sustain the proposition that reemployment or acceptance of partial restitution constitutes ratification precluding a depositor's claim against the bank. In the absence of any authority, the court refused to hold that reemployment or acceptance of partial restitution constituted ratification (109 Cal. App. 370, 376-377) .

PART II. FORMS
A. Drawee Bank's Liability To Drawer

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.34

§ 34.34 Supporting Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Unauthorized Payment of Check [Com. Code § 4401]--Forged, Missing, or Different Endorsement

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK's CHARGE TO PLAINTIFF'S ACCOUNT FOR CHECK NUMBER _____ IS IMPROPER AND UNAUTHORIZED BECAUSE THE _____ [PURPORTED ENDORSEMENT OF _____ (name of payee) WAS FORGED or CHECK WAS NOT ENDORSED or ENDORSEMENT WAS NOT THE SAME AS THE DESIGNATED PAYEE].

A. General Duty Under Commercial Code for Any Item. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph A.]

B. Drawer's Action Against Drawee for Payment of Check With Defect in Endorsement. A check with a forged or missing endorsement or an endorsement that is ineffective because it is different from the designated payee is not properly payable by the drawee bank. Thus, the drawee is liable to the drawer for the amount of any charge made to its account in paying the check (Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 554-555, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 ; see Com. Code § 4401(a)).

[Optional] D. Endorsement Required. Some endorsement is required on a check payable to order, [even if the check is payable to a fictitious payee] (see Com. Code § 3201(b); Wright v. Bank of California (1969) 276 Cal. App. 2d 485, 489-491, 81 Cal. Rptr. 11).

[Optional] E. Joint Payees. If a check is payable to two or more persons alternatively, it is payable to any of them. Payment of the check's entire amount to the payee in possession discharges a bank's obligation on the check. If a check is payable to two or more persons but not alternatively, it is payable to all of them and endorsements of all of them are required for negotiation. If a check payable to two or more persons is ambiguous as to whether it is payable to the persons alternatively, the check is payable to the persons alternatively (Com. Code § 3110(d); Southern Cal. Permanente Medical Group v. Bozinovski (1983) 148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 507-508, 196 Cal. Rptr. 150 ; Feldman Constr. Co. v. Union Bank (1972) 28 Cal. App. 3d 731, 734-735, 104 Cal. Rptr. 912 (both construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

The drawer's cause of action against the drawee for charging his or her account to pay a check on a forged or defective endorsement appears to be extinguished if the designated payee or a person to whom the check was negotiated brings a conversion action against any collecting or depositary bank involved. The rationale is that the payee's action ratifies the collection of the proceeds from the drawee bank [see Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 377, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 (discussed in § 34.73); see also § 34.34[2][b]].

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging a customer's account to pay a check on which the endorsement was forged or missing or not that of the designated payee. Paragraph B sets forth the drawee's general liability to the drawer for paying a check with an improper endorsement. Optional Paragraph D is for use when there was no endorsement, and Optional Paragraph E is for use when there are joint payees, but less than all of them endorsed the check. It should be noted that if the case involves a fraudulent endorsement by an employee (either one made in the employer's name to instruments payable to the employer or one made in the payee's name of instruments issued by the employer), Com. Code § 3405 controls and the points and authorities in this form are generally inapplicable. For forms addressing the case of a fraudulent endorsement by an employee, see §§ 34.90 and 34.96.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Therefore, counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation on the check and the particular defect in the endorsement.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability for paying a check with a defective endorsement.

[b] Drawer Has No Action in Conversion

Com. Code § 3420(a) provides that an action for an instrument's conversion may not be brought by the instrument's issuer. This appears to resolve the split in authority on the issue of whether the drawer of a check with a forged endorsement may assert rights against a depositary bank that took the check. The code takes the position that there is no reason why a drawer should have an action in conversion. The check represents the drawer's obligation rather than the drawer's property. The drawer has an adequate remedy against the payor bank for recredit of the drawer's account for unauthorized payment of the check [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

[c] Related Points and Authorities

For points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee may also be liable under a negligence theory for improperly charging a check to its customer's account, see § 34.53. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.93 and 34.94 address particular payee designations. In addition, Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. §§ 34.47-34.48 and 34.50-34.52 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for paying a check with a forged endorsement. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.70, 34.73-34.75, 34.90-34.92, 34.95, 34.120-34.122, 34.124-34.126, and 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Drawer's Action Against Drawee for Payment of Check With Defect in Endorsement

The facts and procedural background of Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , are discussed in § 34.53[3][a]. The court of appeal discussed the general duty of a drawee to its drawer, which permits the bank to charge its depositor's account only for checks that are otherwise properly payable from that account. Pursuant to both former Com. Code § 4401(1) (now see Com. Code § 4401(a)) and the common law on which it is based, checks with a forged or missing endorsement are not properly payable and that a bank may not charge a customer's account for such items (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 554) . The Commercial Code provides that as between the drawee bank and the depositor, losses from forged or unauthorized signatures are borne by the bank. Defendant contended that the endorsement was effective. There was a question of fact as to whether it had been authorized and effective, but a cause of action for payment on improper endorsement was stated and the sustaining of the demurrer was reversed (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 555) .

[b] Unauthorized Signature Is Inoperative

Com. Code § 3403(a), which provides that an unauthorized signature is ineffective, is applicable to endorsements because Com. Code § 3204(a) provides that a signature and its accompanying words is an endorsement unless the accompanying words, terms of the instrument, place of the signature, or other circumstances unambiguously indicate that the signature was made for a purpose other than endorsement.

[c] Endorsement Required

Com. Code § 3201(b) provides that an instrument payable to an identified person (that is, payable to order) requires both transfer of possession and endorsement by the holder for its negotiation. "Payable to order" and "payable to bearer" are defined in Com. Code § 3109.

Wright v. Bank of California (1969) 276 Cal. App. 2d 485, 81 Cal. Rptr. 11 , involved a joint checking account maintained by two depositors for certain commercial purposes. Both signatures were required on the checks. One depositor fraudulently induced the other to sign a check payable to a creditor, and in collusion with another person, forged the signature of the creditor's agent on the check and exchanged it for a cashier's check of the drawee bank. An agent of the creditor endorsed the cashier's check (purportedly for redeposit in the makers' account), which the defrauding comaker presented to a different bank. That bank issued its own cashier's check, which the defrauding comaker negotiated, later diverting the funds to his own use. The defrauded comaker of the original check brought an action against the other comaker, the colluding forger, the drawee bank, and the bank that issued the ultimate cashier's check for negligence, conversion, and related causes of action. The drawee bank filed a demurrer to the complaint, which the trial court sustained, without leave to amend. Plaintiff appealed.

In discussing whether or not an endorsement was necessary, the court of appeal considered two main factors: applicability of the fictitious payee exception [see Com. Code § 3404] and the difference between instruments payable to bearer and those payable to order. The portion of the opinion considering the applicability of the fictitious payee exception is discussed in § 34.93[3][b]. When that exception applies, any endorsement in the name of the named payee is effective. The court said that a drawee is not liable to the drawer for paying a bearer instrument without an endorsement but cited former Com. Code § 3202 (now see Com. Code § 3201) for the proposition that endorsement is generally required on all negotiable instruments except those payable to bearer (276 Cal. App. 2d 485, 489) . After concluding that the check was within the fictitious payee exception, the court said that some endorsement was still required (276 Cal. App. 2d 485, 490-491) .

These authorities do not address the effect of Com. Code § 3205(b), which provides that an instrument endorsed in blank, which usually means the instrument contains only a signature without other words, becomes payable to bearer and may be negotiated by transfer of possession alone until it is specially endorsed.

[d] Joint Payees

Southern Cal. Permanente Medical Group v. Bozinovski (1983) 148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 196 Cal. Rptr. 150 , is discussed in § 34.47[3][a].

Plaintiff-drawer in Feldman Constr. Co. v. Union Bank (1972) 28 Cal. App. 3d 731, 104 Cal. Rptr. 912 , sued the drawee, which in turn cross complained for indemnity against the collecting bank, for payment of a check with joint payees that had been endorsed by only one of them. The check was payable to a corporate subcontractor and to another company that was the supplier. The two names were on separate lines, one above the other. No additional words such as "and" or "or" appeared on the check's face. The back of the check carried the notation "Endorsement of this check acknowledges payment as of this date all material and labor at ... [specific building site and location]." The subcontractor endorsed the check with its name and the name of its president. Plaintiff reported the missing endorsement to defendant as soon as the check was returned to it. Judgment was for plaintiff and cross plaintiff. Cross defendant (collecting bank) appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. Cross defendant contended that the check was payable to either payee in the alternative. The court disagreed, saying the absence of "and" or "or" was not controlling and that the placement of the names on separate lines and the notation on the back made it clear what type of transaction was in progress, namely the payment of a subcontractor and a materialman. The court set forth the provisions of former Com. Code § 3116(b) (now see Com. Code § 3110(d)) and concluded that the evidence supported the finding that the check was payable jointly and required the endorsements of both payees (28 Cal. App. 3d 731, 734-735) . However, the court may have reached a different result had it been interpreting the current provisions governing joint payees. Former Com. Code § 3116 did not provide guidance when an ambiguity exists regarding whether an instrument is payable alternatively. However, the 1992 repeal and reenactment of Division 3 of the Commercial Code provides that if an instrument payable to two or more persons is ambiguous as to whether it is payable to the persons alternatively, the instrument is payable to the persons alternatively (Com. Code § 3110(d)). Thus, in the case of ambiguity, persons dealing with the instrument should be able to rely on the endorsement of a single payee [Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-110 (1990)].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Drawer's Action Against Drawee for Payment of Check With Defect in Endorsement

Allied Concord etc. Corp. v. Bank of America (1969) 275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 80 Cal. Rptr. 622 , was an action by the check's drawer against the depository and collecting banks for paying the check on a forged endorsement by the payee's brother. Judgment for defendants after sustaining of demurrers without leave to amend was affirmed, mainly on the basis of the statute of limitations. In the course of deciding whether a drawer could bring an action directly against the collecting bank for payment on a forged endorsement, the court said that a drawer is not injured when the drawee pays a check with a forged endorsement, because at that point, the money paid out is the drawee bank's money (275 Cal. App.

2d 1, 7) . Only when the drawee bank charges the drawer's account is the drawer injured. At that point, the drawer has a cause of action against the drawee for conversion (275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 8) . However, this portion of the opinion appears to have been abrogated by Com. Code § 3420(a)(1), which provides that an action for conversion may not be brought by the instrument's issuer. For further discussion regarding the drawer's action for conversion, see § 34.34[2][b].

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging a customer's account to pay an altered check. The drawee is liable for the amount of the charge over the original amount of the check [see Com. Code § 4401(d)(1)]. Optional Paragraph C is for use when the drawer has obtained judgment against someone else relating to the same check.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Therefore, counsel should set forth facts describing the account and the check as originally drawn and as altered.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

For points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee may also be liable under a negligence theory for improperly charging a check to its customer's account, see § 34.53. For related points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of checks, see §§ 34.46 -34.52.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Altered Check

Com. Code § 4401(d) provides that a bank that in good faith makes payment to a holder may charge the indicated account of its customer according to either (1) the original terms of the altered item or (2) the terms of the completed item, even though the bank knows the item has been completed unless the bank has notice that the completion was improper. "Holder," with regard to a negotiable instrument, means the person in possession if the instrument is payable to bearer or, in the case of an instrument payable to an identified person, if the identified person is in possession. "Holder," with regard to a document of title, means the person in possession if the goods are deliverable to bearer or to the order of the person in possession [Com. Code § 1201(b)(21)].

Pac. Coast Cheese, Inc. v. Sec.-First Nat. Bk. (1955) 45 Cal. 2d 75, 286 P.2d 353 , involved a drawee's liability to a drawer for paying raised checks, some or all of which were intercepted and destroyed by the culpable employee of the drawer. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment for defendant drawee. In discussing the general relationship between the drawer and the drawee in relation to the payment of forged or altered checks, the Court said that a drawee bank may not charge a depositor's account with payments made on forged or altered checks unless some conduct of the depositor falling under the principles of negligence or estoppel contributed to the loss and the bank was free from negligence. This rule is applied even when the alteration or forgery is committed by an employee of the depositor (45 Cal. 2d 75, 78) .

Glassell Dev. Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bk. (1923) 191 Cal. 375, 216 P. 1012 , is discussed in § 34.30[3][a].

In Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , the drawer sued the drawee and collecting banks to recover funds embezzled by plaintiff's employee over the course of a three-year period. The named defendant was the collecting bank, and only collecting bank issues were considered on appeal. One of the employee's duties was to prepare checks for signature by a corporate officer. Each of the nine checks at issue was payable to defendant. The employee raised the amount of each check by several thousand dollars after the corporate officer had signed as drawer, believing each check represented a small sum owed to defendant. In fact, plaintiff did not owe defendant anything. The employee opened an account at defendant into which the checks were deposited. Six causes of action were alleged by plaintiff: mistake, fraudulent misrepresentation, negligence, breach of warranty against material alteration, and breach of warranty of good title under former Com. Code §§ 3417 (defendant as payee) and 4207 (defendant as collecting bank). Demurrers were sustained to all causes of action and judgment entered for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The Supreme Court reversed as to the material alteration warranty cause of action for the last (most recent) check and the negligence and mistake causes of action for the last six checks. Although the drawer's complaint named both the drawee and collecting banks, only plaintiff drawer's rights against the collecting bank were considered on appeal. In discussing the measure of damages on the cause of action for breach of warranty against material alteration, the Court said that the wrong for which plaintiff sought recovery was the negotiation of each check in an excessive amount. The proper measure of damages is the difference between the raised amount and the amount for which the checks were originally drawn (21 Cal. 3d 671, 690-691) . The Court, citing former Com. Code § 4401(2)(a) (now see Com. Code § 4401(d)(1)), noted that a drawee bank that has acted in good faith may charge the account of its customer-drawer according to the original tenor of the altered item (21 Cal. 3d 671, 691 n.18).

Because Sun'n Sand was decided under former provisions of the Commercial Code, caution should be used when citing all or portions of the opinion. For example, of primary importance in the Sun'n Sand opinion was the holding that a drawer had standing under former Com. Code §§ 3417 and 4207 to bring an action for breach of warranty (21 Cal. 3d 671, 680-684) . This result has clearly been rejected by the 1992 amendments of these sections [see Com. Code §§ 3417, 4208; Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990) (warranties now made to drawee, not drawer)]. What is not as clear, however, is the continued validity of the Court's decisions with regard to other causes of action raised by the plaintiff. Although the Court's decisions regarding these causes of action may still be applicable, caution should be used when relying on a particular holding or holdings.

[b] No Election of Remedies

Pac. Coast Cheese, Inc. v. Sec.-First Nat. Bk. (1955) 45 Cal. 2d 75, 286 P.2d 353 , is discussed in § 34.35[3][a]. Defendant drawee contended that plaintiff drawer's recovery against it was barred because plaintiff had obtained a civil judgment against its bookkeeper, who raised the checks for the same damages. Nothing had been collected on that judgment, but defendant claimed it amounted to an election of remedies. The Supreme Court disagreed. The Court said that the doctrine of election of remedies is based on estoppel and operates only when the party asserting it has been injured. Defendant was not injured by plaintiff's action against the bookkeeper (45 Cal. 2d 75, 80) .

A drawee bank that has sent statements of account and supporting paid items to an address other than the one designated by the drawer cannot rely on the defense that the drawer failed to examine bank statements and returned checks and report unauthorized signatures or alterations (Far West Citrus, Inc. v. Bank of America (1979) 91 Cal. App. 3d 913, 917, 154 Cal. Rptr. 464).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank may not assert the defense that the drawer failed to examine its bank statements and report irregularities when the bank has sent the statements to the wrong address [see Com. Code § 4406(a), (c)].

Counsel should insert argument in the form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the signature card agreement or other notice designating the address for receipt of bank statements and the other address to which they were sent. Counsel may wish to include a copy of the signature card agreement or the relevant particulars.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that this defense is not available to the drawee.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Statement Sent to Wrong Address

In Far West Citrus, Inc. v. Bank of America (1979) 91 Cal. App. 3d 913, 154 Cal. Rptr. 464 , plaintiff corporate drawer sued the drawee bank to recover amounts paid from its checking account for checks with only the corporate secretary's signature when two drawers' signatures were required by the signature card. Defendant had been sending the statements and canceled checks to an address other than that designated by plaintiff. Defendant demurred on the ground that the action was barred by plaintiff's failure to examine the statements and make its claim within the one-year period described in former Com. Code § 4406(4) (now see Com. Code § 4406(f), discussed in § 34.51). The demurrer was sustained and judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiff appealed and the court of appeal reversed.

Commenting that the bank's reliance on plaintiff's failure to discover the missing signatures was a matter of defense and not a ground of demurrer, the court of appeal said that even as a defense it was without merit because the bank had not sent the statements to the address designated by plaintiff. The fact plaintiff may have been doing business at the address to which the statements were sent was irrelevant; the bank is not free to disregard the depositor's designation and send the statement to another address (91 Cal. App. 3d 913, 917) . The court also said that the defense is not available to a bank that sends the statements to the defaulting employee (91 Cal. App. 3d 913, 917 n.2).

Note that the court's holding in Far West Citrus regarding the inapplicability of Com. Code § 4406 was abrogated by the amendment of Com. Code § 3403(b) in 1992. In Edward Fineman Company v. Superior Court (1998) 66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 478 , the court held that as a result of that amendment, if the signature of more than one person is required to constitute the authorized signature of an organization, the signature of the organization is unauthorized if one of the required signatures is lacking. The court stated that this amendment is directly contrary to the holding of Far West Citrus and unequivocally imposes the obligations of Com. Code § 4406(f) on customers with checking accounts that require more than one signature (66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1119-1125) . For further discussion, see § 34.51.

C. Irregularities Not Apparent From Statements. California Bank (1962) 208 Cal. App. 2d 347, 356, 25 Cal. Rptr. 383* ; see Com. Code § 4406(c)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank may not assert the defense that the drawer failed to examine its bank statements and report irregularities when the loss in question derived from errors or irregularities that were not apparent from the face of the statement [see Com. Code § 4406(c)]. The case cited in the form arose from irregular booking of deposits, and its holding probably cannot be extended to a situation in which the irregularity is apparent on the face or back of a check included with the statement.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe or attach the statements in question and should describe the loss and how it arose from some error or irregularity not shown on the statement.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that this defense is not available to the drawee.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Irregularities Not Apparent From Statements

Although the following case was decided before the initial adoption of Com. Code § 4406, it appears that it is still persuasive for the point discussed. Plaintiff depositor in Barclay Kitchen, Inc. v. California Bank (1962) 208 Cal. App. 2d 347, 25 Cal. Rptr. 383 , sued the bank at which it maintained its commercial account for losses arising from plaintiff's bookkeeper's embezzlement. The bookkeeper was authorized to make deposits to the account and to make cash withdrawals of up to $1,000, and was expected to make cash withdrawals on Fridays to provide the business with weekend cash. The Friday withdrawals were usually in the amount of $900. The cash was supposed to be redeposited on Mondays, but over the course of about a year, the bookkeeper converted some $11,468. To cover these defalcations, on four occasions the bookkeeper combined or divided regular deposit items. For instance, on one occasion a deposit consisting of a $4,261 check payable to plaintiff and $795 in cash was accepted by defendant on four separate deposit tickets of $900 each and one of $1,456. On the bank statement, the bank would show a posting for each deposit ticket. Plaintiff sued the bank for negligent breach of contract on the theory that the bank's processing of deposits facilitated the bookkeeper's scheme and prevented its discovery. Judgment was entered against the bank for the full amount of the loss. Defendant appealed.

There was no finding on the amount of losses that occurred before the bank accepted combined or split deposits, so the court of appeal reversed and remanded to establish the amount embezzled before the first statement showing a split or combined deposit with instructions to reduce the judgment by that amount. In all other regards, the judgment was affirmed (208 Cal. App. 2d 347, 356-357) . The bank contended that plaintiff's delay in failing to discover errors in the statements should bar its action on the ground of laches. The court said that the contract between plaintiff and defendant required defendant to render to plaintiff a true and accurate statement and account of all transactions in connection with the account (208 Cal. App. 2d 347, 353) . That duty included the implied promise to keep accounts and to render statements according to usual customs and procedures (208 Cal. App. 2d 347, 353-354) . The effect of the irregular deposit procedure was to render inaccurate statements of deposits (208 Cal. App. 2d 347, 354) . The provision requiring the depositor to notify the bank of errors did not apply because the error or irregularity could not be ascertained from the face of the statement. The statement carried no intimation of the irregular procedure by the bank (208 Cal. App. 2d 347, 356) .

Com. Code § 4406(c) provides that the customer's duty to notify the bank of the relevant facts concerning a particular error or irregularity depends on whether the customer should "reasonably" have discovered an unauthorized payment "based on the statement or items provided" by the bank. Thus, the statute alone provides a reasonable basis for arguing that the drawer's failure to examine the statement and to notify the drawee is inapplicable if the error or irregularity was not apparent from the material provided by the bank. For further discussion of Com. Code § 4406(c) and for a more specific form applying the drawer's inability to discover unauthorized payments under that section, see § 34.40.

§ 34.38 Supporting Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Unauthorized Payment of Check [Com. Code § 4401]--Defense That Drawer Failed to Examine Statement and Notify Drawee [Com. Code § 4406(a), (c)] Is Inapplicable--Drawee Failed to Pay Item in Good Faith [Com. Code § 4406(e)]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK CANNOT DEFEND ON THE GROUND THAT PLAINTIFF FAILED TO EXAMINE ITS BANK STATEMENTS AND RETURNED CHECKS AND REPORT THE _____ [UNAUTHORIZED SIGNATURE or ALTERATION] BECAUSE DEFENDANT DID NOT PAY THE ITEM IN GOOD FAITH.

A. Failure to Examine Statements Precludes Bank's Liability. [See § 34.50[1], Paragraph C.]

B. Failure to Pay in Good Faith Precludes Defense. If the customer proves that the bank did not pay the item in good faith, the preclusion under Commercial Code Section 4406(d) does not apply (Com. Code § 4406(e)).

C. "Good Faith" Defined. "Good faith" means honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing (Com. Code § 1201(b)(20)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank may not assert the defense that the drawer failed to examine its bank statements and report irregularities when the bank failed to pay the item in good faith [see Com. Code § 4406(e)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the checks and signature card agreement, and set forth facts establishing that the bank did not pay the item in good faith as that term is defined by statute.

[b] "Good Faith" Distinguished From "Ordinary Care"

The definition of "good faith" requires both honesty in fact and observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing [Com. Code § 1201(b)(20)]. Although fair dealing is a broad term that must be defined in context, the term is concerned with the fairness of conduct rather than the care with which an act is performed. Failure to exercise ordinary care in conducting a transaction is an entirely different concept than failure to deal fairly in conducting the transactions. Both fair dealing and ordinary care (which is defined in Com. Code § 3103(a)(7)) are to be judged in light of reasonable commercial standards, but those standards in each case are directed to different aspects of commercial conduct [Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-103 (1990); see Revised California Code Comment 4 to Com. Code § 4406].

[c] Related Points and Authorities

For points and authorities supporting the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of a check on the ground that the drawee's negligence, and not the conduct of the drawer, caused the loss, see § 34.39. For points and authorities opposing the drawee's liability on the ground that the drawer failed to examine the statement and report unauthorized signatures or alterations, see § 34.50.

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE IS LIABLE FOR THE UNAUTHORIZED PAYMENT OF CHECK NO. _____ BECAUSE DEFENDANT DID NOT EXERCISE ORDINARY CARE IN PAYING THE CHECK AND THE LOSS WAS NOT CAUSED BY PLAINTIFF's FAILURE TO REPORT THE _____ [UNAUTHORIZED SIGNATURE or ALTERATION] BUT BY DEFENDANT's NEGLIGENCE.

A. Failure to Examine Statements Precludes Bank's Liability. [See § 34.50[1], Paragraph C.]

B. Bank Required to Exercise Ordinary Care. If the preclusion under Commercial Code Section 4406(d) applies and the customer proves that the bank failed to exercise ordinary care in paying the item and the failure contributed to loss, the loss is allocated between the customer precluded and the bank asserting the preclusion according to the extent to which the customer's failure to comply with Commercial Code Section 4406(c) and the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss (Com. Code § 4406(e); see Commercial Cotton Co. v. United California Bank (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 513-516, 209 Cal. Rptr. 551).

C. Ordinary Care. "Ordinary care" in the case of a person engaged in business means observance of reasonable commercial standards, prevailing in the area in which the person is located, with regard to the business in which the person is engaged. In the case of a bank that takes an instrument for processing for collection or payment by automated means, reasonable commercial standards do not require the bank to examine the instrument if the failure to examine does not violate the bank's prescribed procedures and the bank's procedures do not vary unreasonably from general banking usage not disapproved by either Division 3 or 4 of the Commercial Code (Com. Code § 3103(a)(7)). The definition of "ordinary care" in Commercial Code Section 3103 applies to transactions under Division 4 of the Commercial Code (Com. Code § 4104(c)). The definition of "ordinary care" in Com. Code § 3103 is declaratory of the meaning of "ordinary care" in former Com. Code § 4406 (see Story Road Flea Market, Inc. v. Wells Fargo Bank (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 1733, 1741-1742).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be used to support the contention that a drawee bank is liable for the unauthorized payment of a check when the drawer can prove that the bank failed to exercise ordinary care in paying the checks and there is no causal connection between the bank's payment of the check and the drawer's failure to report the unauthorized signature or alteration [see Com. Code § 4406(c), (e)].

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case; for example, describe the checks and signature card agreement and set forth facts establishing the drawee's negligence in paying the checks and that the drawee's own negligence was in fact the cause of the loss. Because Com. Code § 4406(e) poses a modified comparative negligence test for determining liability [see discussion in § 34.39[2][b]], the drawer must prove that the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care was the major (or sole) factor contributing to the loss and that the drawer's own failure to examine the statement of account did not contribute to the loss.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that this defense is not available to the drawee.

[b] Comparative Negligence Test

Com. Code § 4406, as amended in 1992 [Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 45], poses a modified comparative negligence test for determining liability when a loss results from the payment of an unauthorized or altered check and both the customer and the bank have failed in some regard to fulfill their statutory duties. The loss is to be allocated between the customer and the bank according to the extent to which the customer's failure to examine statements and notify the bank [see Com. Code § 4406(c)] and the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss [see Com. Code § 4406(e)].

The comparative negligence standard may call into question decisions that the drawee's negligence precludes using the defense of the drawer's failure to examine statements and notify the drawee [see, e.g., Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 330-334, 139 P.2d 1 ; Sommer v. Bank of Italy etc. Assn. (1930) 109 Cal. App. 370, 374-376, 293 P. 98] . In Basch (discussed in § 34.33[3][a]), drawee defended on the ground that plaintiff was negligent in entrusting his banking business to a forger without checking the forger's reputation for honesty and in failing to examine the statements and report the forgeries. The Supreme Court held that the drawer's conduct is available as a defense only when the drawee itself is free from negligence in the first instance in paying forged checks. If in the exercise of due care the drawee would have detected the forgeries without the depositor's aid, the drawee cannot escape its contractual liability merely because the drawer is also at fault. When the drawee is negligent in paying the check, it does not pay because previous forgeries were not reported to it, but it pays because on its own negligent inspection it supposed the checks were genuine [Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 330, 139 P.2d 1] . Thus, the Court found that although plaintiff was negligent [Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 323-329, 139 P.2d 1] , the evidence, including the testimony of the teller in charge of plaintiff's account that certain of the checks were obvious forgeries and should not have been passed, supported the judgment in plaintiff's favor [Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 330-334, 139 P.2d 1] . Although the court's reasoning may still be persuasive in arguing under a comparative negligence theory, the holding that a drawee's negligence precludes using the drawer's conduct as a defense appears suspect in light of Co. Code § 4406(e).

[c] Related Memoranda

For memoranda opposing the drawee's liability on the ground that the drawer failed to examine the statement and to report unauthorized signatures or alterations, see § 34.50.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Bank Required to Exercise Ordinary Care

The facts and procedural background of Commercial Cotton Co. v. United California Bank (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 209 Cal. Rptr. 551 , are discussed in § 34.53[3][a]. In Commercial Cotton, the court of appeal held that the drawer's failure to examine his or her bank statement and notify the drawee of an unauthorized payment is after-the-fact conduct that is irrelevant to the issue of comparative negligence. In considering defendant's assertion of comparative negligence, the court further stated that plaintiff's delay in reporting the loss was irrelevant, had nothing to do with the bank's negligent payment of the check, and did not contribute to the transaction (163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 515-516) .

For further discussion of Commercial Cotton and its apparent conflict with other appellate decisions on other matters, see § 34.53. In addition, the holding in Commercial Cotton with regard to the availability of tort damages for bad faith breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is no longer viable [Copesky v. Superior Court (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 678, 681, 694, 280 Cal. Rptr. 338] .

Code § 4406(a), (c)] Is Inapplicable--Drawer Could Not Reasonably Have Discovered Unauthorized Payment [Com. Code § 4406(c)]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK CANNOT DEFEND ON THE GROUND THAT PLAINTIFF FAILED TO EXAMINE ITS BANK STATEMENTS AND RETURNED CHECKS AND REPORT THE _____ [UNAUTHORIZED SIGNATURE or ALTERATION] BECAUSE PLAINTIFF DID NOT HAVE A REASONABLE OPPORTUNITY TO DISCOVER THE UNAUTHORIZED PAYMENT.

Customer's Duty to Examine Statements. If a bank sends or makes available a statement of account or items pursuant to Commercial Code Section 4406(a), the customer must exercise reasonable promptness in examining the statement or the items to determine whether any payment was not authorized because of an alteration of an item or because a purported signature by or on behalf of the customer was not authorized. If, based on the statement or items provided, the customer should reasonably have discovered the unauthorized payment, the customer must promptly notify the bank of the relevant facts (Com. Code § 4406(c)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank may not assert the defense that the drawer failed to examine its bank statements and report irregularities because the drawer did not have a reasonable opportunity to discover the unauthorized payment [see Com. Code § 4406(c)]. This contention will arise when the bank uses the truncation provisions of Com. Code § 4406 by not returning the paid items and by supplying only a statement of account with limited information [see Com. Code § 4406(a)]. It is based on the ground that with check truncation the customer does not receive the actual paid items back, and thus it is not possible to discover certain types of fraud. For example, if a check is altered by a change in the payee's name, the customer could not normally detect the fraud unless the customer is given the paid check or the statement of account discloses the name of the payee of the altered check [Revised Official Comment 2 to Com. Code § 4406]. Thus, the effect of Com. Code § 4406(c) is to limit the customer's duty to discover and report alterations and unauthorized payments to those that can only be discovered by examining the cancelled checks themselves.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the check, establish that the bank did not return the item, and set forth additional facts showing that the customer could not reasonably have discovered the unauthorized payment.

This memorandum may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that this defense is not available to the drawee.

[b] Safe-Harbor Rule Does Not Preclude Customer From Asserting Unauthorized Signature or Alteration

If the bank sends or makes available a statement of account showing payment of items for the account, the statement must provide information "sufficient to allow the customer reasonably to identify the items paid" [Com. Code § 4406(a); but see Com. Code § 4406(h) (requirement that customer must be able to "reasonably" identify items paid is superseded January 1, 2015, by requirement that customer must be able merely to identify items paid)]. Until January 1, 2015, the bank complies with this standard if the "item is described by item number, amount, and date of payment" [see Com. Code § 4406(a), (h)]. This "safe harbor" rule serves to permit a bank, based on the state of existing technology, to trigger the customer's duties under Com. Code § 4406(c). However, the safe harbor does not necessarily preclude a customer under Com. Code § 4406(d) from asserting its unauthorized signature or an alteration against a bank in those circumstances under Com. Code § 4406(c) in which the customer should not "reasonably have discovered the unauthorized payment." Whether the customer has failed to comply with its duties under Com. Code § 4406(c) is determined on a case-by-case basis [Revised Official Comment 2 to Com. Code § 4406].

[c] Related Memoranda

For additional memoranda supporting the contention that the drawer's failure to examine the account statement and to notify the drawee is inapplicable, see §§ 34.36 -34.39. § 34.41 Supporting Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Unauthorized Payment of Check [Com. Code § 4401]--Defense That Drawer Is Entitled to Subrogation to Prevent Unjust Enrichment [Com. Code § 4407] Is Inapplicable

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK CANNOT DEFEND ON THE GROUND THAT IT IS ENTITLED TO BE SUBROGATED TO THE RIGHTS OF PLAINTIFF [OR OF THE PAYEE OR OF THE COLLECTING BANK] BECAUSE THAT DEFENSE IS NOT AVAILABLE IN SITUATIONS LIKE THIS ONE, IN WHICH THERE IS NO DANGER OF UNJUST ENRICHMENT.

A. Drawee's Right of Subrogation. [See § 34.58[1], Paragraph B.]

B. Drawer Not Unjustly Enriched. The drawer is not unjustly enriched by a payment that is a nullity, for instance when the payment is fraudulent, or illegal, or in violation of the priorities for paying its creditors established by the bankruptcy court in the drawer's bankruptcy. A payment that is a nullity does not provide the basis for the drawee's right of subrogation under Commercial Code Section 4407 (Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 976-979, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163).

C. Drawee's Loss Not Shown. A drawee that recovers the amount of an improperly paid check from the payee [on its cross complaint] may not argue, in the drawer's action against it, that it is entitled to be subrogated to the payee's rights, because in that situation the drawee is unable to establish that it will suffer any loss (Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 976-977, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank may not assert the defense that it is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the drawer or the payee or a holder in due course or either of them when there is no threat of unjust enrichment [see Com. Code § 4407].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the check, the transaction out of which it arose, any other cross actions or litigation between the parties on the check or underlying obligation, and should set forth facts negating the drawee's claim of unjust enrichment.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that this defense is not available to the drawee.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in § 34.58 support the contention that subrogation is appropriate although the drawee failed to honor a timely stop payment order. The points and authorities in §§ 34.30 -34.40 support, and those in §§ 34.46-34.53 oppose, the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for improperly charging the drawer's account to pay a check that was not properly payable. For points and authorities supporting and opposing the contention that particular parties are holders in due course, see Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments .

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Drawer Not Unjustly Enriched

The facts and procedural background of Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163 , are set forth in § 34.31[3][c]. Defendant drawee contended that under Com. Code § 4407 it was entitled to be subrogated to rights of the payee and the collecting bank. The court of appeal denied this contention for several reasons. First, the payment to the payee was fraudulent (as found by the bankruptcy court) and violated priorities of the drawer's creditors established by the bankruptcy court. Thus, payment to the payee was a nullity, and the drawer corporation's bankruptcy estate would not be unjustly enriched. Second, defendant made no showing that it would sustain any loss. To the contrary, the drawee bank prevailed on its cross complaint (151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 976-977) .

[b] Drawee's Loss Not Shown

Danning v. Bank of America (1984) 151 Cal. App. 3d 961, 199 Cal. Rptr. 163 , is discussed in § 34.41[3][a].

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK CANNOT DEFEND ON THE GROUND THAT PLAINTIFF IS PRECLUDED FROM ASSERTING THE _____ [ALTERATION or FORGERY] DUE TO PLAINTIFF's FAILURE TO EXERCISE ORDINARY CARE, BECAUSE DEFENDANT FAILED TO EXERCISE ORDINARY CARE IN PAYING THE INSTRUMENT AND THAT FAILURE ALSO CONTRIBUTED TO THE LOSS.

A. Contributory Negligence. A person whose failure to exercise ordinary care contributes to an alteration of an instrument or to the making of a forged signature on an instrument is precluded from asserting the alteration or the forgery against a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection (Com. Code § 3406(a)).

B. Comparative Negligence. Under Commercial Code Section 3406(a), if the person asserting the preclusion fails to exercise ordinary care in paying or taking the instrument and that failure contributes to loss, the loss is allocated between the person precluded and the person asserting the preclusion according to the extent to which the failure of each to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss (Com. Code § 3406(b)).

C. Burden of Proof. Under Commercial Code Section 3406(b), the burden of proving failure to exercise ordinary care is on the person precluded (Com. Code § 3406(c)).

D. Ordinary Care. "Ordinary care" in the case of a person engaged in business means observance of reasonable commercial standards, prevailing in the area in which the person is located, with regard to the business in which the person is engaged (Com. Code § 3103(a)(7)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank may not assert the defense that the drawer was contributorily negligent and is therefore precluded from asserting an alteration or forgery because the drawee was also negligent in paying the instrument, and thus the loss should be allocated between the two parties according to the extent to which the failure of each to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss [see Com. Code § 3406(b)]. The form should be used when both parties to the transaction failed, in some regard, to exercise ordinary care.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the check and the transaction out of which it arose and set forth facts establishing a failure by the bank to exercise ordinary care in paying the check and how that failure contributed to the loss. The extent to which the bank's failure contributed to the loss should also be set forth.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that the defense of the drawer's contributory negligence is not applicable.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in § 34.52 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable to the drawer for the unauthorized payment of a check on the ground that the drawer's negligence contributed to the alteration or unauthorized signature.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Comparative Negligence

If the person precluded under Com. Code § 3406(a) proves that the person asserting the preclusion failed to exercise ordinary care and that failure substantially contributed to the loss, the loss may be allocated between the two parties on a comparative negligence basis [Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-406 (1990)].

A. Drawee Bank's Liability To Drawer

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.43

§ 34.43 Supporting Contention That Drawee Bank Is Liable to Drawer for Wrongful Dishonor [Com. Code §§ 3504(a)(2), 4402]--In General

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF DRAWER FOR WRONGFULLY REFUSING TO PAY PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____.

A. Cause of Action for Wrongful Dishonor. When a genuine check is presented to a drawee by a person entitled to receive the amount of that check, the drawee is obligated to honor the check if funds sufficient to pay it are on deposit in the drawer's account. Except as otherwise provided in Division 4 of the Commercial Code, a drawee bank wrongfully dishonors an item if it dishonors a check that is properly payable (Com. Code § 4402(a); Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 127, 136 P.2d 345).

B. Liability for Wrongful Dishonor. A drawee bank is liable to its customer for damages proximately caused by the wrongful dishonor of a check. Liability is limited to actual damages proved (Com. Code § 4402(b); see Com. Code § 4105(3) (payor bank means bank that is drawee of a draft)).

C. Actual Damages. An action for damages sustained because of wrongful dishonor of a check sounds both in tort and in contract. Damages that the parties contemplated and those that may not have been contemplated but were reasonably foreseeable and proximately caused by the wrongful dishonor are recoverable. Actual damage is a term synonymous with compensatory damage and covers all loss recoverable as a matter of right (Weaver v. Bank of America (1963) 59 Cal. 2d 428, 431-435, 437, 30 Cal. Rptr. 4, 380 P.2d 644 ; Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 127, 136 P.2d 345).

[Optional] D. Damages Arising From Arrest and Other Consequential Damages. Damages in a wrongful dishonor cause of action may include damages for an arrest or prosecution of the customer or other consequential damages. The risk that the payee of a wrongfully dishonored check will cause the drawer's arrest is not a remote contingency or a special circumstance unknown to the drawee. It appears to be an obvious risk against which the drawee undertakes to protect the drawer. The loss of reputation and impairment of health caused by the drawer's arrest are included in the recoverable damages. Whether any consequential damages are proximately caused by the wrongful dishonor is a question of fact to be determined in each case (Com. Code § 4402(b); Weaver v. Bank of America (1963) 59 Cal. 2d 428, 434-435, 437-438, 30 Cal. Rptr. 4, 380 P.2d 644).

[Optional] E. Value of Repossessed Property. When the wrongfully dishonored check is an installment payment under a contract that gives its holder the right to repossess and sell the property in the event of a default under the contract and the property is repossessed and sold, the loss of that property is proximately caused by the wrongful dishonor. The drawer is entitled to recover the market value of the property repossessed as damages for the check's wrongful dishonor (Abramowitz v. Bank of America (1955) 131 Cal. App. 2d Supp. 892, 897-898, 281 P.2d 380).

[Optional] F. Damages for Emotional Distress. Damages for emotional distress caused by a check's wrongful dishonor are recoverable [when events that follow the dishonoring of the check, for example, acts of harassment and vandalism by creditors, would have induced mental suffering in any reasonable person] (Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 957-958, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848).

[Optional] G. Standing of Principal. The principal of an undercapitalized shell corporation that has issued no stock has standing to maintain an action for damages for wrongful dishonor when the drawee has looked to that principal as the financially responsible party (Karsh v. American City Bank (1980) 113 Cal. App. 3d 419, 421-422, 169 Cal. Rptr. 851 ; Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 956, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848).

[Optional] H. Dishonor When Presentment Is Excused. Presentment is excused if the maker or acceptor has repudiated an obligation to pay. Assuming that a check is regular as to signature, name of drawee bank, and is correctly drawn on the proper account, when presentment is excused by the drawee, the drawee's nonacceptance or refusal to pay may be treated as dishonor (Com. Code § 3504(a)(2); see Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 128-129 (construing prior law)).

[Optional] I. Expectation Regarding Payment of Overdrafts. A drawee bank may be liable for wrongful dishonor of checks whose payment would create or increase overdrafts if the drawee has led the drawer to expect that it would pay overdrafts (see Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 954-955, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848).

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank is liable to its drawer for damages proximately caused by its wrongful dishonor of a check [see Com. Code § 4402].

Paragraph A describes what constitutes wrongful dishonor, and Paragraph B sets forth the statutory authority for recovery of damages by the drawer. Paragraph C describes in general terms the theory of damages, while Optional Paragraphs D-F address particular types of damages that are recoverable. Optional Paragraph G is for use only when the drawee has looked to the individual plaintiff as the party responsible for the drawer's obligations to it. Optional Paragraph H is for use only when the drawee has waived presentment and dishonored the check without its being presented. As a general rule, absent an agreement between the parties to the contrary, the drawee is not required to pay a check that would cause an overdraft [see Com. Code § 4402(a); Torrance N. Bank v. Enesco F. Credit Union (1955) 134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 320-321, 285 P.2d 737 ; Bachtel v. Bank of America (1954) 127 Cal. App. 2d 728, 731-732, 274

P.2d 421 (discussed in § 34.54[3][a])]. However, there is dicta that encouragement, promises, and representations by the drawee that lead the drawer to expect that a large number of its overdrafts will be paid is sufficient to require payment by the drawee bank. That dicta is the basis of Optional Paragraph I [see Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 954, 958-959, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848] .

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the check, the account on which it was drawn, and the balance in the account at the time the check was presented. Counsel might also set forth facts negating any reason the drawee claimed, or may be expected to claim, that the check was not properly payable.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability for wrongful dishonor.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.54 -34.56 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor. The points and authorities in § 34.57 may also be used to oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor if the drawer had filed a timely stop payment notice affecting the check in question.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Cause of Action for Wrongful Dishonor

Plaintiff-drawer in Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 136 P.2d 345 , sued the drawee for wrongful dishonor of a $25 check, claiming as damages lost profits from certain business transactions that were not consummated because of the harm done to plaintiff's reputation and good name. The check was never presented. The alleged wrongful dishonor consisted of the drawee's "no account" response to the payee's telegram to it inquiring "Advise if (initials) Allen check $25 good." General and special demurrers were sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The court first discussed the general relationship of the drawer and drawee, saying that the drawee is obligated by presentation of a genuine check in the hands of a person entitled to receive the amount of that check to honor the check if sufficient funds to cover the amount for which it is drawn are on deposit. A cause of action for wrongful dishonor arises whenever the drawee fails to discharge its agreement by dishonoring a duly presented check. The cause of action arises from a contract but, in another sense, it is independent of the contract and sounds in tort, involving an element of wrong or a violation of duty (58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 127) . The portion of the court's opinion relating to waiver of presentment is discussed in § 34.43[3][h]. The portion of the court's opinion relating to the insufficiency of the pleading is discussed in § 34.55[3][a].

[b] Liability for Wrongful Dishonor

Com. Code § 4402 is worded in terms of a payor bank's liability to its customer. Com. Code § 4105(3) defines "payor bank" as a bank that is the drawee of a draft. "Customer" is a person having an account with a bank or for whom a bank has agreed to collect items, including a bank that maintains an account at another bank [Com. Code § 4104(a)(5)].

[c] Actual Damages

Plaintiff-drawer in Weaver v. Bank of America (1963) 59 Cal. 2d 428, 30 Cal. Rptr. 4, 380 P.2d 644 , sued the drawee for $50,000 under former Civ. Code § 3320 (now see Com. Code § 4402) for wrongful dishonor of a $32.68 check. The check was returned to the payee marked "account closed." The payee had plaintiff arrested for petty theft. Defendant demurred on the ground that the only damages sought flowed from the arrest that was the act of a third party and therefore not proximately caused by defendant. The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The Supreme Court reversed. The demurrer was sustained based on Hartford v. All Night & Day Bank (1915) 170 Cal. 538, 150 P. 356 , and Bearden v. Bank of Italy (1922) 57 Cal. App. 377, 207 P. 270 , which held that an arrest is a supervening act of the payee. Thus, the chain of causation is severed and the arrest is not proximately caused by the drawee's dishonor. The Court said that Hartford-Bearden theory of proximate cause had been repudiated (59 Cal. 2d 428, 432-433) . The Court first cited Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 127, 136 P.2d 345 (discussed in § 34.43[3][a]), for the proposition that the cause of action arising from dishonor of a duly presented check sounds in both contract and tort (59 Cal. 2d 428, 431) . The payee's procuring of the drawer's arrest does not constitute a superseding cause that severs the chain of causation (59 Cal. 2d 428, 433-434) . Whether the complaint is viewed as sounding in contract or in tort, the breach of duty and consequential damages were sufficiently alleged to state a cause of action (59 Cal. 2d 428, 435) .

The Court reviewed the history of former Civ. Code § 3320 (now see Com. Code § 4402), noting the common-law presumption that traders or merchants, but not others, suffered substantial damages from wrongful dishonor was abrogated by the adoption of former Civ. Code § 3320 (59 Cal. 2d 428, 435-437) . The Court cited an Ohio case for the interpretations of the uniform law (former Civ. Code § 3320 was part of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law) that actual damages is a term synonymous with compensatory damages and covers all losses recoverable as a matter of right (59 Cal. 2d 428, 437) , and that damages for loss of reputation and impairment of health caused by the arrest of the drawer are recoverable (59 Cal. 2d 428, 437-438) . The Court adopted this interpretation (59 Cal. 2d 428, 438) , which is consistent with the 1992 amendment of Com. Code § 4402 [Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 41], which expressly provides that liability is limited to "actual damages proved and may include damages for an arrest or prosecution of the customer or other consequential damages" [Com. Code § 4402(b)].

Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 136 P.2d 345 , is discussed in § 34.43[3][a].

[d] Damages Arising From Arrest and Other Consequential Damages

Weaver v. Bank of America (1963) 59 Cal. 2d 428, 30 Cal. Rptr. 4, 380 P.2d 644 , is discussed in § 34.43[3][c].

[e] Value of Repossessed Property

Plaintiff-drawer in Abramowitz v. Bank of America (1955) 131 Cal. App. 2d Supp. 892, 281 P.2d 380 , sued the drawee for wrongful dishonor of a check. The payee was the holder of the conditional sales contract on plaintiff's car. As a result of the wrongful dishonor, the car was repossessed and sold in accordance with the contract. The payee sold the car for $1,600. Plaintiff had paid $935 under the contract at the time of the repossession. The deficiency still owing under the contract after the car was sold by the payee was $597. From the sum of those amounts ($935 + $597 = $1532), the trial court subtracted $800, representing the reasonable value of the car's use during the time it was in plaintiff's possession, and awarded plaintiff $732 plus interest. Defendant appealed. The only question on appeal was the propriety of the damage award.

The court of appeal affirmed, although it determined that, under the proper measure of damages, plaintiff was entitled to recover $1,600, which was the market value of the car (131 Cal. App. 2d Supp. 892, 898). The loss of the automobile, the court said, was the proximate result of the check's dishonor (131 Cal. App. 2d Supp. 892, 897).

[f] Damages for Emotional Distress

Plaintiffs in Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848 , were the corporate drawer and a husband and wife who were officers and prospective shareholders of the corporation. The corporation was only a shell, had never issued stock, and was undercapitalized. It built yachts on progress payments. The drawer was in serious financial trouble in September 1970 when defendant-drawee made a $14,000 90-day loan to it to cover operating expenses. All parties expected that the necessary capital would be raised elsewhere within the 90 days. The individual plaintiffs personally guaranteed the loan, only $3,000 of which had been paid at the time the action was commenced.

A customer of the drawer wanted to get out of its contract with the drawer when the price of the yacht rose substantially over the contract price. The drawer agreed to purchase the completed yacht for $25,000 in hopes of reselling it at a profit. Defendant promised to loan $25,000 to the drawer, which loan would be secured by a lien on the completed yacht. To complete that yacht, the drawer stopped or slowed work on its other contracts, exacerbating its cash flow problems.

There was a vague agreement that defendant would honor certain overdrafts. By the end of October 1970, the drawer was $6,000 overdrawn. The drawer executed a new note to the drawee for that amount, clearing the overdraft, and the personal guaranties were increased to $20,000. On November 20, defendant told plaintiffs it would not make the promised loan on the soon-to-be-completed yacht. Later, defendant dishonored the $25,000 check drawn to repurchase that yacht from drawer's customer.

During December, the drawee honored some checks drawn against the corporate accounts and dishonored others. Among those dishonored were payroll checks, checks to suppliers, and a check issued to pay the drawer's workers' compensation policy premium. Over $15,000 of overdraft checks were paid by defendant during October, November, and December. On December 30, the drawee informed the drawer that it would no longer honor its checks. Soon thereafter, the corporation's assets were seized and sold by the IRS for nonpayment of taxes. The corporation's suppliers and employees accused the individual plaintiffs of having milked the corporation, threatened legal action and physical harm, and threatened the husband's subsequent employer. Eggs and oil were thrown at the individual plaintiffs' cars. Administrative proceedings were brought against plaintiffs for dishonored payroll checks and for failure to maintain workers' compensation insurance. Criminal charges for writing checks against insufficient funds were brought against the wife but dropped before trial. The individual plaintiffs suffered marital problems as a result of the stress of the failure of the business.

Plaintiffs sued the bank for compensatory and punitive damages for breach of agreements to loan money to the corporation. Defendant cross complained for the unpaid balances. The trial court found that defendant had wrongfully dishonored checks of the corporation and awarded each individual plaintiff $26,000 as compensatory damages and $10,000 as punitive damages. Defendant was awarded $26,691 plus interest on its cross complaint. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeal reversed as to punitive damages and affirmed in all other regards. Defendant contended that damages for emotional suffering were not recoverable, citing the rule that damages for mental suffering or injury to reputation resulting from breach of contract are not recoverable. The court cited Weaver v. Bank of America (1963) 59 Cal. 2d 428, 431, 30 Cal. Rptr. 4, 380 P.2d 644 (discussed in § 34.43[3][c]), for the proposition that a cause of action for wrongful dishonor sounds in tort as well as in contract (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 957) . The court maintained that if damages for suffering incident to arrest are recoverable, as held in Weaver, there is no reason to bar recovery for the mental distress attending the types of consequences experienced here, which included criminal and administrative investigation and charges, as well as acts of harassment and vandalism (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 957-958) . The individual plaintiffs did not merely allege a subjective state of discomfort at having their checks dishonored. They gave proof of objectively verifiable events that followed the dishonoring of the checks and would have induced mental suffering in any reasonable person (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 958) .

[g] Standing of Principal

In Karsh v. American City Bank (1980) 113 Cal. App. 3d 419, 169 Cal. Rptr. 851 , plaintiff, president and sole owner of a corporation, brought four causes of action against drawee bank and its employees for damages sustained because of the wrongful dishonor of corporate checks. Defendant's demurrer was sustained on the theory that only the corporate depositor had standing to maintain the action. Judgment of dismissal was entered. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. Both parties agreed that under Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 956, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848 (discussed below), there were some circumstances in which an individual, not the nominal depositor, may recover damages under Com. Code § 4402. The parties disagreed concerning whether plaintiff's pleading brought him within the Kendall rule for recovery. Plaintiff alleged that the nominal depositor corporation "had not issued any stock, ... was undercapitalized and was a transparent shell, having no viability as a separate and distinct legal entity, ... all to the knowledge of defendants, and each of them. Plaintiff, alone, controlled the corporation's financial affairs and personally vouched for its fiscal responsibility both to defendant bank, through its employees," including the individual defendants, and to the public at large. Plaintiff also alleged that "[d]efendant [b]ank dealt directly with plaintiff, looked personally to plaintiff and required plaintiff to personally guarantee and satisfy all obligations [of the corporation] to defendant [b]ank as they would arise. Plaintiff did, in fact, personally guarantee and did in fact satisfy said obligations. Plaintiff personally, and not in the capacity of a corporate officer, satisfied corporate debts to defendant [b]ank through the use of plaintiff's own personal monies as defendant [b]ank required and plaintiff guaranteed to do" (113 Cal. App. 3d 419, 421-422) . Defendant attempted to distinguish Kendall on the basis that there was a written guaranty in Kendall. The court of appeal disagreed (113 Cal. App. 3d 419, 422) .

The facts and procedural background of Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848 , are discussed in § 34.43[3][f]. The court of appeal noted that Com. Code § 4402 speaks in terms of the drawee's liability to its customer and that former Com. Code § 4104(1)(e) (now see Com. Code § 4104(a)(5)) defines "customer" as any person having an account with a bank, including a bank that maintains an account at another bank. Com. Code § 1201(b)(27) defines "person" to include individuals and organizations (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 955) .

In deciding that the individual plaintiffs could recover for wrongful dishonor of checks drawn by the corporation, the court of appeal said it was certainly not holding as a general proposition that shareholders and officers of a corporation can recover under Com. Code § 4402 for the wrongful dishonor of a corporate check. Here, however, it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the individual plaintiffs were as much customers of defendant within the contemplation of the statute as the corporation. Defendant looked to them directly to satisfy the corporate obligations and required their guaranties to be increased to cover credit it was extending in the form of honoring overdrafts. The corporation was a shell. The individual plaintiffs were controlling its financial affairs and vouching for its fiscal responsibility. It was entirely foreseeable that dishonoring the corporation's checks would reflect directly on the personal credit and reputation of the individual plaintiffs and that they would suffer the adverse personal consequences that resulted when defendant reneged on its commitment. Under these circumstances, the court concluded, it would elevate form over substance to hold that the wrong defined in Com. Code § 4402 was done only to the corporation and that the individual plaintiffs could not recover (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 956) .

[h] Dishonor When Presentment Is Excused

Com. Code § 3504(a)(2) provides that presentment for payment or acceptance is excused when the maker or acceptor has repudiated an obligation to pay.

The facts and procedural background of Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 136 P.2d 345 , are discussed in § 34.43[3][a]. Defendant contended that no cause of action was stated because there was no allegation that the check was ever presented. The court of appeal disagreed, concluding that presentment had been waived (58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 128-129) . In construing prior law, the court said that defendant was entitled to have the check presented, but under former Civ. Code § 3229 (now see Com. Code §§ 3502 (dishonor), 3503 (notice of dishonor), 3504(a)(2) (presentment excused by reputing obligation to pay)) a check may be treated as dishonored when presentment is waived and acceptance has been refused on some ground other than irregular presentment (58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 128) .

Assuming that in all other regards the check was regular as to signature, name of drawee bank, and was correctly drawn on the proper account, defendant's telegram was tantamount to an absolute refusal to pay the check described in the telegram for the reason stated, which was a reason other than irregular presentment, and amounted to a waiver of presentment. The payee was entitled to treat the check as dishonored (58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 129) . However, these assumptions were not borne out by the pleadings. The demurrer should have been sustained, albeit with leave to amend, because plaintiff neglected to allege where and at which branch of defendant the check was payable and that plaintiff's account was in the same name as that used in the telegram (58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 130) .

[i] Expectation Regarding Payment of Overdrafts

The facts and procedural background of Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848 are discussed in § 34.43[3][f]. Defendant did not contest the trial court's conclusion that its acts constituted wrongful dishonor (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 955) . The findings in support of that conclusion were that defendant encouraged, promised, and represented to plaintiffs that defendant would pay a large number of Kendall Yacht Club checks written by plaintiffs without regard to whether there would be sufficient funds on deposit to cover the checks when they were presented for payment; that plaintiffs wrote numerous checks in reliance on defendant's promises and with the expectation that they would be honored as overdrafts; that some checks, including checks to suppliers, employee payroll checks, and the check for the worker's compensation coverage, were not honored by defendant; and that the individual plaintiffs were induced to incur obligations that would not otherwise have been incurred, to violate criminal law, and to suffer personal distress of varying kinds and damage to their reputations (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 954) . However, defendant's failure to honor all plaintiff's checks did not represent sufficient malice to warrant punitive damages, in part because the agreement to honor them was so vague and did not require it to honor all overdraft checks (50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 958-959) .

It is unclear whether the above dicta in Kendall is still valid in light of the 1992 amendment of Com. Code § 4402 [Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 41], which added the provision that "a bank may dishonor an item that would create an overdraft unless it has agreed to pay the overdraft" [Com. Code § 4402(a)]. For example, it could be argued that the statutory language requires an agreement to pay each overdraft item and that a vague agreement such as the one that existed in Kendall to pay a large number of overdrafts, but not all, is not sufficient.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Damages for Emotional Distress

The court of appeal in Teitel v. First Los Angeles Bank (1991) 231 Cal. App. 3d 1593, 282 Cal. Rptr. 916 , affirmed a judgment for $9,000 in general damages and remanded for determination whether $500,000 in punitive damages was excessive. The issues on appeal were mainly procedural, having to do with the propriety of the trial court's method of reducing the punitive damage award. Plaintiff had signed her employer's name, as drawer, to three checks payable to herself totalling approximately $2,800. The employer signed an affidavit of forgery. Both the employer and plaintiff maintained accounts at defendant. Defendant relied on the affidavit to withdraw the amount of the allegedly forged checks from plaintiff's account and to dishonor checks drawn by plaintiff against the "reversed" deposit. Plaintiff was arrested and charged with forgery, although never prosecuted. The complaint included causes of action for wrongful dishonor, intentional infliction of emotional distress, negligence, conversion, and violations of Fin. Code §§ 857, 952. The court stated that an award of punitive damages was proper, based on evidence, although conflicting, that reversal and dishonor was not standard banking practice (231 Cal. App. 3d 1593, 1599, 1604-1605) .

NOTE:

The holding in Teitel appears to be unaffected by the 1995 repeal and re-enactment of Fin. Code § 857 (prohibiting banks from giving preference to one depositor or creditor over another).

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR WRONGFULLY REFUSING TO PAY PLAINTIFF'S CHECK NUMBER _____.

A. Overdrafts Permitted. Ordinarily, a drawee is not required to honor a check for an amount in excess of the deposit against which it is drawn, but a drawee is permitted to do so. Commercial Code Section 4401(a) specifically authorizes a drawee to pay overdrafts and to charge the customer's account to recover the amount paid, even when payments result in overdrafts on the account. [Ordinarily, the contract between the drawer and drawee does not include a promise by the drawer to refrain from writing checks against an account that does not have sufficient funds to pay them] (*Perdue v. [2] Comments

CAUTION:
The particular signature card or overdraft agreement between the drawer and drawee may render these authorities inapplicable.

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank is liable for wrongful dishonor even when the check's payment would create an overdraft. The authorities themselves only establish that the ordinary signature card and custom do not prohibit either writing of overdraft checks (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "NSF checks") by the depositor or payment of overdraft checks by the drawee bank (Paragraphs A, B) [see Com. Code §§ 4401(a), 4402(a); Shapiro v. United California Bank (1982) 133 Cal. App. 3d 256, 263, 184 Cal. Rptr. 34 ; Hoffman v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1981) 121 Cal. App. 3d 964, 969, 176 Cal. Rptr. 14] . The particular agreement of the parties or other facts giving rise to a reasonable expectation on the drawer's part that the NSF check would be paid will ultimately determine whether the drawee was required to honor the overdraft check (Paragraph C) [see Com. Code § 4402(a); Kendall Yacht Corp. v. United California Bank (1975) 50 Cal. App. 3d 949, 954-955, 123 Cal. Rptr. 848 (discussed in § 34.43[3][i])].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Therefore, counsel should set forth facts describing the account and the check in question and establishing the understanding, prior conduct, or particular agreement of the parties with regard to paying overdraft checks.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.43 support, and points and authorities set out in §§ 34.54 -34.56 oppose, the contention that the drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Overdrafts Permitted

Com. Code § 4402(a) provides that a payor bank wrongfully dishonors an item if it dishonors an item that is properly payable, but a bank may dishonor an item that would create an overdraft unless it has agreed to pay the overdraft.

Perdue v. Crocker National Bank (1985) 38 Cal. 3d 913, 216 Cal. Rptr. 345, 702 P.2d 503 , was a class action by depositors seeking to establish that the service charges imposed for writing NSF checks were illegal on several grounds, including that they constituted unlawful penalties under former Civ. Code §§ 1670 and 1671 (now see Civ. Code § 1671) as those sections existed at the time the action was commenced. Those statutes apply to penalties charged as liquidated damages for breach of contract. In order for those statutes to apply, plaintiffs had to establish that either the signature card agreements governing their accounts or banking custom contained an actual or implied promise by the depositor not to write NSF checks. Plaintiffs could not establish any promise on their part to refrain from writing NSF checks. The trial court sustained demurrers and judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiffs appealed.

The Supreme Court affirmed as to the cause of action alleging that the charges were unlawful penalties. The Court noted that two court of appeal cases had addressed plaintiffs' contention and quoted at length from Hoffman v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1981) 121 Cal. App. 3d 964, 968-969, 176 Cal. Rptr. 14 , and Shapiro v. United California Bank (1982) 133 Cal. App. 3d 256, 263, 184 Cal. Rptr. 34 (both discussed below): "[The] statutes governing the obligations of banks and their depositors, which are incorporated into and become part of the contract between a bank and its depositors [citations], treat an overdraft as an application for advance credit rather than as a breach of an express or implied covenant. California Uniform Commercial Code section 4401 specifically authorizes a bank to pay overdrafts and to charge customers' accounts to recover amounts paid, even when payments result in overdrafts on the account. While a bank has a statutory obligation to honor any check drawn by a depositor for an amount not exceeding the balance in his account, and while the depositor has a contractual obligation to pay a service charge when he presents a NSF check, the depositor has no statutory or contractual obligation to refrain from drawing checks for amounts in excess of the balance in his account" (38 Cal. 3d 913, 931-932) .

The Court did not agree that an overdraft is an application for credit, noting that the contract was silent on the characterization of an overdraft check, but did agree that there was no promise on the part of the depositors to refrain from writing overdraft checks (38 Cal. 3d 913, 932) .

Shapiro v. United California Bank (1982) 133 Cal. App. 3d 256, 184 Cal. Rptr. 34 , and Hoffman v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1981) 121 Cal. App. 3d 964, 176 Cal. Rptr. 14 were class actions by depositors challenging service charges imposed for writing NSF checks on the ground that they constituted unlawful penalties under former Civ. Code §§ 1670 and 1671 (now see Civ. Code § 1671) as those sections existed at the time the actions were commenced. In order for those statutes to apply, plaintiffs had to establish that either the signature card agreements governing their accounts or applicable banking custom contained an actual or implied promise by the depositor not to write NSF checks. Plaintiffs could not establish any promise on their part to refrain from writing NSF checks. The trial court judgments for defendants were affirmed on appeal. The relevant portions of the opinions are quoted above in the discussion of Perdue v. Crocker National Bank (1985) 38 Cal. 3d 913, 931-932, 216 Cal. Rptr. 345, 702 P.2d 503 .

A. Drawee Bank's Liability To Drawer

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.45

§ 34.45 Supporting Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Payment of Check in Disregard of Stop Payment Order or Order to Close Account [Com. Code § 4403]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR PAYING PLAINTIFF'S CHECK NUMBER _____ AND CHARGING PLAINTIFF'S ACCOUNT FOR THAT PAYMENT AFTER HAVING RECEIVED A TIMELY, WRITTEN ORDER TO _____ [STOP PAYMENT or CLOSE THE ACCOUNT].

A. Orders to Stop Payment or Close Account. A customer or any person authorized to draw on the account if there is more than one person may stop payment of any item drawn on the customer's account or close the account by an order to the bank describing the item or account with reasonable certainty received at a time and in a manner that affords the bank a reasonable opportunity to act on it before any action by the bank with regard to the item described in Commercial Code Section 4303. If the signature of more than one person is required to draw on an account, any of these persons may stop payment or close the account (Com. Code § 4403(a); see Grisinger v. Golden State Bank (1928) 92 Cal. App. 443, 445, 268 P. 425 ; Hiroshima v. Bank of Italy (1926) 78 Cal. App. 362, 374, 248 P. 947).

B. Drawee's Liability for Disregarding Customer's Order to Stop Payment or Close Account. A bank that pays an item over a stop payment order or order to close an account is prima facie liable. The burden of establishing the fact and amount of loss resulting from paying an item contrary to a stop payment order or order to close an account is on the customer (Com. Code § 4403(c); Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 4-407; Grisinger v. Golden State Bank (1928) 92 Cal. App. 443, 445, 268 P. 425).

[ADD if payment for item was contrary to stop payment order]

C. Damages Available. The loss from paying an item contrary to a stop payment order may include damages for dishonor of subsequent items under Commercial Code Section 4402 (Com. Code § 4403(c)).

[Optional] D. Mistake or Inadvertence Irrelevant/Effect of Failure to Exercise Ordinary Care. A payment violating an effective direction to stop payment is an improper payment, even though it is made by mistake or inadvertence. Any agreement to the contrary is invalid under Commercial Code Section 4103(a) if in paying the item over the stop payment order the bank failed to exercise ordinary care (Official Comment 7 to U.C.C. § 4-403).

[Optional] E. Expiration of Stop Payment Order. A stop payment order is effective for six months, but it lapses after 14 calendar days if the original order was oral and was not confirmed in writing within that period. A stop payment order may be renewed for additional six-month periods by a writing given to the bank within a period during which the stop payment order is effective (Com. Code § 4403(b)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee bank is liable for paying a check after receiving a stop payment order or order to close an account [see Com. Code § 4403]. Paragraphs C-E are applicable only if the payment was contrary to a stop payment order.

A cashier's check or teller's check purchased by a customer whose account is debited in payment for the check is not a check drawn on the customer's account within the meaning of Com. Code § 4403(a). Thus, a customer purchasing a cashier's check or a teller's check has no right to stop the check's payment [Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 4-403]. In addition, under Com. Code § 4303(a)(1) (set forth in § 34.57), payment cannot be stopped on a certified check or a cashier's check that has been properly issued and delivered to the payee [see Kaufman v. Chase Manhattan Bank, National Ass'n (S.D.N.Y. 1973) 370 F. Supp. 276, 278 (under Com. Code § 3409(a) (set forth in § 34.49), cashier's check is considered accepted when issued); see also Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 4-403].

Even if the check involved is an ordinary check, as a practical matter it may be difficult for the drawer to establish liability on the drawee's part if the drawer would have remained liable to the payee on the underlying debt had the stop payment order been honored [see Com. Code § 4407 (set forth in § 34.58); Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 4-407; Swiss Credit Bank v. Balink (10th Cir. 1980) 614 F.2d 1269, 1271-1272 (drawee recredited drawer's account and recovered from payee under subrogation theory; underlying claim had been compromised/settled); Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp. v. Guaranty Bank & Tr. Co. (D. Mass. 1958) 161 F. Supp. 790, 792, 794-795 (drawer denied recovery from drawee, which was denied recovery from collecting bank on theory drawee was subrogated to collecting bank's right to recover, as holder in due course, from drawer)]. California cases decided before the adoption of Com. Code §§ 4403 and 4407, holding that the drawer may recover notwithstanding his or her remaining liability to the payee on the underlying debt, are discussed in § 34.45[3][b].

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

unenforceable.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.57 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for failing to honor a stop payment order on the ground that the order came too late. The points and authorities set out in § 34.58 may be used to oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for failing to honor a stop payment order on the ground that the drawee is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the payee. The authority in § 34.56 also establishes that the drawee is not liable for stopping payment when one of two authorized signatories on the account orders it to do so.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Orders to Stop Payment or Close Account

The check in Grisinger v. Golden State Bank (1928) 92 Cal. App. 443, 268 P. 425 , was postdated and was a commission payment to the payee for arranging a loan for plaintiff before a specified date. Several days before that date arrived, it became clear to plaintiff that the loan was not going to be forthcoming, so plaintiff, first orally and then in writing, gave stop payment instructions to defendant-drawee. The written instructions were on defendant's form, which recited that the stopping of payment would be a courtesy only and that plaintiff released defendant from any liability in the case of payment or nonpayment. Defendant negligently paid the check after receiving the stop payment order. Plaintiff sued to recover the amount of the check. Judgment was for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The court relied on Hiroshima v. Bank of Italy (1926) 78 Cal. App. 362, 248 P. 947 (discussed below), in invalidating the release clause (92 Cal. App. 443, 445) .

The facts and procedural background of Hiroshima v. Bank of Italy (1926) 78 Cal. App. 362, 248 P. 947 are discussed in § 34.45[3][b]. In discussing the drawee's duty, the court of appeal said that it is the bank's duty when notified to stop payment to use all reasonable efforts to comply with the directions given by its depositor (78 Cal. App. 362, 374) . The stop payment order was on defendant's form, which recited that the stopping of payment was a courtesy only and that plaintiff released defendant from any liability in the case of payment or nonpayment. The court of appeal affirmed the trial court's findings that plaintiff could not read English and did not understand the form, other than to believe it would cause payment to be stopped (78 Cal. App. 362, 372-373) . The court found that the attempted release was invalid as against public policy in general and Civ. Code § 1668 (exculpatory clauses) in particular (78 Cal. App. 362, 373-378) .

[b] Drawee's Liability for Disregarding Customer's Order to Stop Payment or Close Account

Grisinger v. Golden State Bank (1928) 92 Cal. App. 443, 268 P. 425 , is discussed in § 34.45[3][a].

The status of the holding in cases such as Hiroshima v. Bank of Italy (1926) 78 Cal. App. 362, 248 P. 947 that the drawee is liable for payment in disregard of a stop payment order even if the underlying obligation to the payee remains valid or if payee is a holder in due course, appears to have been abrogated by subsequent amendments to Com. Code § 4403(c) (set forth in Paragraph B) and Com. Code § 4407 (set forth in § 34.58).

In Hiroshima v. Bank of Italy (1926) 78 Cal. App. 362, 248 P. 947 , defendant-drawee's demurrer on the ground of the absence of any allegation that plaintiff was damaged was overruled. No evidence was allowed on the issue of any consideration given by the payee to the drawer or of the payee's status as a holder in due course. Judgment for plaintiff-drawer was affirmed.

The court of appeal said that when payment of a sum certain of money is alleged to have been wrongfully made, the amount of damages suffered necessarily appears from the statement of facts thus set forth. Whether or not there was consideration moving between plaintiff and the payee for the issuance of the check is entirely collateral to the issues presented here (78 Cal. App. 362, 368) . The court did acknowledge that the payee would still have the right to sue the drawer on any underlying debt (78 Cal. App. 362, 370) , but concluded that the bank had no interest in the contract between plaintiff and the payee. Its duty is simply to follow the order given by the check's drawer. The doctrine that payment cannot be stopped against a holder in due course is only true in those jurisdictions that hold that a check works an assignment of the funds (78 Cal. App. 362, 371) . However, under Com. Code §§ 4403 and 4407 payment can be stopped against a holder in due course, but the drawer remains liable to the holder in due course and the drawee, if it pays, is subrogated to the rights of the holder in due course against the drawer [Official Comment 7 to U.C.C. § 4-403; Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 4-407].

California Bank (1961) 194 Cal. App. 2d 897, 904-905, 15 Cal. Rptr. 562*).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for unauthorized payment of a check without all required drawers' signatures when payment was made in accordance with the drawer-depositor's oral instructions.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should attach a copy of the check or otherwise describe its particulars and should set forth facts establishing sufficient oral instructions regarding any apparent defect on the check's face. The drawee's liability is more emphatically negated if counsel can also set forth facts establishing that the check was payment for and discharged a debt of the drawer to the payee or holder.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawee is not liable for paying a check in accordance with the drawer-depositor's oral instructions.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

For additional points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.47 -34.53. For points and authorities supporting the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.30 -34.42.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Oral Order Sufficient

Plaintiff-drawer in V of I Productions v. California Bank (1961) 194 Cal. App. 2d 897, 15 Cal. Rptr. 562 , sued the drawee to recover $35,100, the amount of three checks paid from plaintiff's account allegedly without authority. Plaintiff was in the business of selling airplane transportation for tours. The signatures of R and D were required to withdraw money from the account. When R was in New York for two weeks, an airline demanded payment for three flights and refused to make the flights unless prepayment was received. The money then in plaintiff's account consisted mostly of payments made by the passengers booked on those flights. The office manager tried for several days to reach R by phone, but was unable to do so. Before R left, he had told the bookkeeper to do whatever was necessary to see that those flights went. The bookkeeper prepared three checks, one for each flight; D signed them. The airline's representative and the bookkeeper went to the bank and told the manager they needed the checks to be certified, and why, and that R would sign them when he returned from New York. The bank manager charged the three checks to plaintiff's account and issued three cashier's checks to the airline. The trial court judgment was for defendant on the grounds that plaintiff had suffered no damage because the checks were used to discharge an obligation of plaintiff and that plaintiff was estopped to assert that payment without the second signature was improper. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court said that although a bank is entitled to demand written evidence of an order from a depositor to pay out or transfer a deposit, it may pay out on oral instructions. The court cited a Kansas case for the proposition that a verbal direction from the depositor to honor checks signed by another, or to pay a sum or transfer a credit, will justify the bank in doing so, and in complying with the verbal order the bank is relieved from further liability to the depositor (194 Cal. App. 2d 897, 904) . The court stressed that plaintiff was indebted to the airline and that the checks were received by the airline in payment of that debt (194 Cal. App. 2d 897, 904-905) . Also, the bookkeeper was acting in accordance with R's instructions (194 Cal. App. 2d 897, 905-906) .

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for the face amount of a joint-payee check that it paid over a forged endorsement when at least one payee received proceeds in accordance with the drawer's intent. Optional Paragraph D is for use when the court has erred by failing to determine, or allow evidence on the issue of, the actual receipt of the check's proceeds as compared to the allocation of proceeds intended by the drawer.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should attach a copy of the check and endorsements, or otherwise set forth the payee designation and the forged and valid endorsements. Counsel should also describe the actual distribution of the proceeds and the allocation of the proceeds intended by the drawer.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawee's liability should be diminished by the amount of the proceeds that were received by a payee in accordance with the drawer's intention.

Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments, also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.48, 34.70, 34.73-34.75, 34.90-34.92, 34.95, 34.120-34.122, 34.124-34.126, 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Bank's Liability Excludes Amounts Paid Consistent With Drawer's Intentions

Southern Cal. Permanente Medical Group v. Bozinovski (1983) 148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 196 Cal. Rptr. 150 , arose from a drawer's interpleader to determine entitlement to proceeds of a $50,000 check payable to three joint payees. The check was in payment of a settlement in a malpractice case and was payable to defendant and his attorney and an attorney who commenced the malpractice action on defendant's behalf but had since been discharged. The attorney forged the signatures of the other two payees, deposited the check in his trust account, and had his bank transfer $25,000 from his trust account to his office account. When plaintiff learned of the forgeries, it demanded that its account be recredited. The drawee recredited plaintiff's account for the full $50,000. Plaintiff then commenced the interpleader, naming all three payees and the drawee bank as defendants. The drawee bank cross complained against the collecting bank. The forger stipulated that he claimed no part of the interpleaded fund and waived any claim against plaintiff. All parties stipulated that the discharged attorney was entitled to $5,410. The banks claimed that the attorney had the right to endorse the check on behalf of his client under the terms of their retainer agreement. The trial court found that the check was wholly inoperative because at least one of the endorsements was forged, that the former attorney was entitled to $5,410, and that the client was entitled to the remainder ($44,590). Both banks appealed on the ground that the trial court erred in failing to decide what portion of the funds, if any, they were entitled to receive.

The court of appeal reversed and remanded for further proceedings in accordance with its opinion after concluding that a bank's liability for paying a check with a forged endorsement does not require it to duplicate its original payment to a joint payee to the extent the joint payee received payment in accordance with the drawer's intention. The court said the case was one of first impression in California (148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 507) . There was no question that both banks improperly paid the check, as at least one endorsement was forged and proper negotiation of a joint-payee check is precluded under former Com. Code § 3116(b) (now see Com. Code § 3110(d)) by the presence of an unauthorized endorsement (148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 507-508) .

Nevertheless, the court said, this conclusion did not mean that the check was wholly inoperative. The liability of drawee and collecting banks in this situation should be measured by the damage standards applicable under former Com. Code § 3419 (now see Com. Code § 3420, set forth in § 34.70) to the payee's action for conversion when a bank has paid a joint-payee check on a forged endorsement (148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 508) . Although under former Com. Code § 3419(2), damages are presumed to be the face amount of the check, the California code comments to former Com. Code § 3419(2) shed further light on the presumption by acknowledging that the measure of damages is obscure. The court also cited Hensley-Johnson v. Citizens National Bank (1953) 122 Cal. App. 2d 22, 25, 264 P.2d 973 , for the rule that the bank is liable to the payee for the amount that the payee should have received. Thus, there is no indication that the bank's liability is the face amount of the check. The former code comment said that the proposed amendment allows for the possibility that in some circumstances it would be unjust to hold the drawee liable for the face amount of the check, and that under former Com. Code § 3417 (now see Com. Code §§ 3416, 3417, regarding warranties on presentment and transfer) the bank could recover any duplicate payment from the one who received it (148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 509) . The court concluded that the presumption of former Com. Code § 3419(2) may be rebutted by a showing that a payee has received the sum intended by the drawer. This conclusion is supported by Harry H. White Lbr. Co. v. Crocker-Citizens Nat. Bk. (1967) 253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 374-375, 61 Cal. Rptr. 381 , and Indiana Plumbing Supply Co. v. Bank of America (1967) 255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 918, 63 Cal. Rptr. 658 (148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 509-510) . The court considered cases from other states that were more directly on point, and noted that the evidence in this case established that the attorney had received at least 25,000 of the proceeds and that defendant-client may have received something (148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 510-511) . To preclude the banks' duplicate liability and to prevent the payee's unjust enrichment, the court of appeal found that the trial court erred in failing to determine what portion of the check had been received by the payees and whether any amount received exceeded the drawer's intent (148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 511) .

Although the court in Southern Cal. Permanente Medical Group was construing the former measure of liability in conversion actions, the current liability provision appears to be consistent with the court's decision. Com. Code § 3420(b) attempts to clarify the obscurity of former Com. Code § 3419(2) ("measure of liability is presumed to be the face amount of the instrument") by providing that the "measure of liability is presumed to be the amount payable on the instrument," thus allowing recovery for the full amount due under the instrument [see Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)]. The current liability provision also provides that recovery may not exceed the amount of the plaintiff's interest in the instrument [Com. Code § 3420(b)]. This provision addresses the problem of conversion actions in multiple-payee checks. Com. Code § 3110(d) provides that an instrument cannot be enforced unless all payees join in the action. However, Com. Code § 3420(b) recognizes that an action for conversion might be brought by a payee having no interest or a limited interest in the check's proceeds, and thus prevents this type of plaintiff from receiving a windfall by limiting his or her recovery [Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

[b] Bank Entitled to Determination Regarding Payment

Southern Cal. Permanente Medical Group v. Bozinovski (1983) 148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 196 Cal. Rptr. 150 , is discussed in § 34.47[3][a].

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions].

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK's CHARGE TO PLAINTIFF'S ACCOUNT FOR CHECK NUMBER _____ WAS PROPER AND AUTHORIZED IN THAT THE NAMED PAYEE [TRANSFERRED THE CHECK TO AND] AUTHORIZED THE ENDORSEMENT BY _____ [name in which check was endorsed].

A. General Duty Under Commercial Code for Any Item. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph A.]

B. Endorsement by Authorized Third Party. A drawee bank is not liable to its drawer for paying a check that was endorsed by one other than the named payee if the evidence establishes that the designated payee transferred the check to the endorser or otherwise authorized or instructed the proceeds to be paid to or deposited to the endorser's credit (Campbell v. Bank of America (1987) 190 Cal. App. 3d 1420, 1427-1428 (construing prior law)).

This memorandum are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for paying a check endorsed by one other than the named payee when the endorsement by and/or payment to the third party was authorized by the named payee.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal.

Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

This memorandum may be combined with memoranda pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawee is not liable for paying a check in accordance with the payee's instructions.

[b] Related Memoranda

For additional memoranda opposing the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.46, 34.47, and 53- 70. For memoranda supporting the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.30 -34.42. §§ 34.34 and 34.93-34.95 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments, also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47, 34.70, 34.73-34.75, 34.90-34.92, 34.95, 34.120-34.122, 34.124-34.126, 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Endorsement by Authorized Third Party

Plaintiff-drawer in Campbell v. Bank of America (1987) 190 Cal. App. 3d 1420, 235 Cal. Rptr. 905 , sued the drawee bank, which was also the collecting bank of the checks involved, for breach of the endorsement warranties of former Com. Code §§ 3417(1)(a) and 4207(1)(a) (now see Com. Code §§ 3417, 4207) and for negligence in accepting improperly endorsed checks. The checks were payable to MVTL, a consumer loan company in which plaintiff made repeated investments, or thought he did, over a seven-year period, receiving a series of promissory notes in return. Although his checks were payable to MVTL, over the seven-year course of investments from 1975 until 1982, all but the first note plaintiff received to evidence his investment were made by MVTL-North, another real estate investment company controlled by the same principal as MVTL. Plaintiff's checks were endorsed with a stamp "MVTL-North." Plaintiff never noticed that the notes were those of MVTL-North or that the checks were endorsed by MVTL-North. When plaintiff learned that MVTL and MVTL-North were filing for bankruptcy and might not be able to repay all their loans, he discovered that his checks had been endorsed by MVTL-North and that he held MVTL-North notes. After the drawee bank refused his demand for reimbursement, plaintiff sued the bank, also seeking punitive damages. The trial court awarded plaintiff the amounts of the checks plus interest and costs but denied punitive damages. Both parties appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed the denial of punitive damages and reversed in all other regards because the endorsements by MVTL-North and deposit of the proceeds into MVTL-North's account were authorized by the principal of the named payee. The court set forth the substance of former Com. Code § 4207(1)(a), and quoted Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 687, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (discussed in § 34.35[3][a]), that the initial inquiry regarding the warranty of good title of former Com. Code § 4207(1)(a) is whether the check presented contained all necessary endorsements and whether those endorsements were genuine or otherwise deemed effective (190 Cal. App. 3d 1420, 1425) . Plaintiff established his prima facie case of breach of the warranty of good title by proving that the endorsement was missing or not identical to the named payee, but MVTL, as payee, had title to the checks and the right to transfer title or to instruct the bank how the checks were to be deposited. Whether one looks at the case in terms of the bank, as collecting bank, obtaining title or of the bank's obtaining payment on authorization of one who had good title, when the principal of MVTL had the checks transmitted to defendant with instructions to deposit the funds into MVTL-North's account, defendant had the right to charge plaintiff's account for the face value of the checks (190 Cal. App. 3d 1420, 1426-1427) .

In considering the negligence cause of action, the court of appeal did not discuss Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557-558, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , or Commercial Cotton Co. v. United California Bank (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 514-515, 209 Cal. Rptr. 551 (both discussed in § 34.53[3][a]), or the possible preemption of common-law negligence in regard to drawee's duties to drawers by Com. Code § 4401(a). The court in Campbell only cited E. F. Hutton & Co. v. City National Bank (1983) 149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 66, 196 Cal. Rptr. 614 (discussed in § 34.90[3][a]), a collecting bank case, and concluded that plaintiff had established a prima facie case of negligence against defendant as payor bank because it paid the check to one other than the named payee. The court held, however, as with the other causes of action, that payment was authorized by the named payee, and therefore proper (190 Cal. App. 3d 1420, 1428) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Endorsement by Authorized Third Party

Although Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , reversed the sustaining of the drawee's demurrer to the drawer's cause of action for breach of the implied agreement by paying a check that was endorsed other than by the named payee, the court of appeal did acknowledge that there was a question of fact regarding whether the endorsement was authorized and effective (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 555) .

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR _____ [CHARGING HIS/HER/ITS ACCOUNT IN PAYMENT OF or DISHONORING] PLAINTIFF's CHECK _____ [EVEN THOUGH or BECAUSE] THAT CHECK WAS NOT CERTIFIED AND WAS PRESENTED MORE THAN SIX MONTHS AFTER ITS DATE.

A. Stale Checks. A bank is under no obligation to a customer having a checking account to pay a check, other than a certified check, that is presented more than six months after its date, but it may charge its customer's account for payment of such a check in good faith (Com. Code § 4404).

[Optional] B. Certified Check. "Certified check" means a check accepted by the bank on which it is drawn. Acceptance may be made as stated in Commercial Code Section 3409(a) or by a writing on the check that indicates that the check is certified (Com. Code § 3409(d)). [If a draft is accepted by a bank, the drawer is discharged and if acceptance occurs after an endorsement the endorser's liability is discharged (Com. Code §§ 3414(c), 3415(d))]. The effect of certification is to transfer the drawer's claim against the drawee to the payee or holder of the check. This transfer occurs at the time of certification if the check is certified at the request of the payee or holder of the check. If certification is procured at the drawer's instance, the transfer does not occur until the check is delivered to the payee (Umbsen v. Crocker First Nat. Bank (1949) 33 Cal. 2d 599, 601-602, 203 P.2d 752).

[Optional] C. Acceptance. Acceptance means the drawee's signed agreement to pay a draft as presented. It must be written on the draft and may consist of the drawee's signature alone. Acceptance may be made at any time and becomes effective when notification pursuant to instructions is given or the accepted draft is delivered for the purpose of giving rights on the acceptance to any person (Com. Code § 3409(a)).

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for unauthorized payment of a check that was not certified and was presented more than six months after its date [see Com. Code § 4404]. These points and authorities may also be used to oppose the contention that a drawee bank is liable for wrongful dishonor if it refused to pay such a check [see Com. Code § 4404]. Optional Paragraphs B and C are for use when there is some issue as to whether or not the check in question was certified.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

This memorandum may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawee is not liable for either paying or not paying the stale check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Certified Check

The definition of certified check in Com. Code § 3409 applies in Division 4 of the Commercial Code [Com. Code § 4104(c)]. In the absence of an agreement, the drawee of a check has no obligation to certify the check, and refusal to certify is not dishonor of the check [Com. Code § 3409(d); see Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-409 (1990)]. Whenever a bank certifies a check, it must immediately charge the amount of the check against the drawer's account [Fin. Code § 970]. It is unlawful to certify a check unless the drawer has on deposit at the time of certification an amount not less than the amount of the check [Fin. Code § 971].

Plaintiff in Umbsen v. Crocker First Nat. Bank (1949) 33 Cal. 2d 599, 203 P.2d 752 , was the successor in interest of the drawer's assets. The state treasurer was intervening in this action to determine ownership of an unclaimed deposit in drawer's name. The amount in the account was equal to the amount of a check to an unknown payee that had been certified approximately 40 years earlier. The trial court awarded the account to the intervener. Plaintiff appealed.

The Supreme Court first discussed the effect of certification, saying that certification constitutes an acceptance by the bank, and its effect is to impose primary liability on the acceptor to pay the check's amount on demand to the payee or holder. It transfers the drawer's claim against the drawee to the payee or holder of the check (33 Cal. 2d 599, 601) . This transfer occurs at the time of certification if the check is certified at the request of the payee or holder of the check.

If certification is procured at the drawer's instance, the transfer does not occur until the check is delivered to the payee, so that any time before delivery, the drawer may have the check cancelled and his or her account recredited with the amount of the check (33 Cal. 2d 599, 601-602) . The Court said that because there was no evidence about who requested certification or of delivery or nondelivery, the case had to be decided on the basis of inferences that could be drawn from the evidence. Checks are customarily presented. Because this check was never presented, the Court concluded that it was never delivered, so the plaintiff was entitled to the amount remaining on deposit (33 Cal. 2d 599, 602-603) .

§ 34.50 Opposing Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Unauthorized Payment of Check [Com. Code § 4401]--Drawer Failed to Examine Statement and Report Unauthorized Drawer's Signature or Alteration [Com. Code § 4406(a), (c), (d)]

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

PLAINTIFF's ACTION AGAINST DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK FOR CHARGING HIS/HER/ITS ACCOUNT TO PAY PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ IS BARRED BY PLAINTIFF's FAILURE TO EXAMINE HIS/HER/ITS STATEMENTS AND RETURNED ITEMS AND REPORT THE _____ [UNAUTHORIZED SIGNATURE or ALTERATION] TO DEFENDANT.

A. Bank's Duty to Provide Statement of Account. A bank that sends or makes available to a customer a statement of account showing payment of items for the account must either return or make available to the customer the items paid or provide information in the statement of account sufficient to allow the customer [reasonably] to identify the items paid. [The statement of account provides sufficient information if the item is described by item number, amount, and date of payment.] If the bank does not return the items, it must provide in the statement of account the telephone number that the customer may call to request an item, a substitute check, or a legible copy of the item pursuant to Commercial Code Section 4406(b) (Com. Code § 4406(a)).

B. Customer's Duty to Examine Statements. If a bank sends or makes available a statement of account or items pursuant to Commercial Code Section 4406(a), the customer must exercise reasonable promptness in examining the statement or the items to determine whether any payment was not authorized because of an alteration of an item or because a purported signature by or on behalf of the customer was not authorized. If, based on the statement or items provided, the customer should reasonably have discovered the unauthorized payment, the customer must promptly notify the bank of the relevant facts (Com. Code § 4406(c)).

C. Failure to Examine Statements Precludes Bank's Liability. If the bank proves that the customer failed with regard to a check, to comply with the duties imposed on the customer by Commercial Code Section 4406(c), the customer is precluded from asserting against the bank (1) the customer's unauthorized signature or any alteration on the check if the bank also proves that it suffered a loss by reason of the failure, and (2) the customer's unauthorized signature or alteration by the same wrongdoer on any other check paid in good faith by the bank if the payment was made before the bank received notice from the customer of the unauthorized signature or alteration and after the customer has been afforded a reasonable period of time, not exceeding 30 days, in which to examine the item or statement of account and notify the bank (Com. Code § 4406(d); Espresso Roma Corporation v. Bank of America, N.A. (2002) 100 Cal. App. 4th 525, 535, 124 Cal. Rptr. 2d 549).

[Optional] D. Bank Required to Exercise Ordinary Care. [See § 34.39[1], Paragraph B.]

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum may be submitted in opposition to the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging the drawer's account to pay an altered check or a check with a forged drawer's signature when the drawee itself used ordinary care and the drawer's failure to report the forgery or alteration in fact caused the loss [see Com. Code § 4406(d), (e)]. With regard to the burden of proof to assert this defense, the pre-Code cases required the drawee bank to establish its freedom from negligence and that the loss was caused by the drawer's failure to examine the statement and report the unauthorized signature or alteration [see Basch v. Bank of America (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 316, 330-334, 139 P.2d 1 ; Sommer v. Bank of Italy etc. Assn. (1930) 109 Cal. App. 370, 376, 293 P. 98 ; see also § 34.39[2]]. Although Com. Code § 4406(d) explicitly places the burden of proof as to causation on the bank, Com. Code § 4406(e) poses a modified comparative negligence standard and explicitly places the burden of proof as to the bank's lack of ordinary care in paying the check on the drawer-customer in order to preclude the availability of the defense.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should attach a copy of the check and statements and set forth facts establishing that the loss, or at least some portion of it, could have been prevented if the drawer had reported the forgery or alteration in a timely manner. In addition, the customer's duty to examine a statement or returned items and report unauthorized signatures or alterations becomes operative only if the bank sends or makes available a statement of account. Thus, counsel should also set forth facts showing that the bank has sent a statement of account or the paid items to the customer [see Revised California Code Comment 1 to Com. Code § 4406]. Moreover, because Com. Code § 4406 poses a modified comparative negligence test, counsel may also wish to include facts showing that (1) the drawee exercised ordinary care in paying the item or (2) if the bank failed to exercise ordinary care, that failure did not contribute to the loss [see Com. Code § 4406(e)].

This memorandum may be combined with memoranda pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawer's failure to report the forgery or alteration bars its recovery.

[b] Alternative Versions of Commercial Code Section 4406

Paragraph A of this memorandum is based on a version of Com. Code § 4406(a) in effect until January 1, 2015. On that date it is superseded by a verison that is identical, with the following exceptions [see Com. Code § 4406(h)]:

- The requirement that a statement of account must be sufficient to allow the customer "reasonably" to identify the items paid is superseded as of January 1, 2015, by a requirement that the information must be sufficient merely to allow the customer to identify the items paid (that is, the qualifier "reasonably" is deleted).

- The rule that a statement of account provides sufficient information if an item is described by item number, amount, and date of payment is deleted as of January 1, 2015; therefore, compliance with that rule would no longer be deemed sufficient under the statute to allow the customer to identify the items paid.

[c] Related Points and Authorities

For additional memoranda opposing the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.46 -34.49, 34.51 -34.53. §§ 34.36-34.40 set forth memoranda that the defense established by Com. Code § 4406(a), (c), and (d) is inapplicable.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Failure to Examine Statements Precludes Bank's Liability

In Espresso Roma Corporation v. Bank of America, N.A. (2002) 100 Cal. App. 4th 525, 124 Cal. Rptr. 2d 549 , a corporation brought several causes of action against a bank based on its payment of forged checks drawn on plaintiff's account by a former employee. The trial court entered judgment in favor of the bank after it granted the bank's motion for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff was precluded by Com. Code § 4406(d) and (e) from asserting any claims against the bank for unauthorized payment of checks drawn on the corporation's account. The court of appeal affirmed. It first noted that the forged checks were presented for payment between October 1997 and May 1999, but plaintiff did not discover or report them until May 15, 1999. To establish its prima facie case that Com. Code § 4406(d) applied to preclude the customer's claims, the bank presented testimony that it made monthly account statements and canceled checks available to plaintiff shortly after the closing period of each statement. The first forgery, however, was not reported until long after the statutory 30-day period had expired (100 Cal. App. 4th 525, 529-530) . The court of appeal next noted that once a prima facie case is established that the bank had made monthly statements available and that plaintiff failed to notify the bank within 30 days, Com. Code § 4406(d) applies to preclude the claim unless the customer can establish that the bank failed to exercise ordinary care in paying the item and that the failure contributed to the loss. It found that the declaration of the bank's expert, that the bank's practices and procedures were consistent with those of all other large "bulk file bookkeeping" banks in California, was sufficient to establish a prima facie case that the bank exercised ordinary care, thereby shifting the burden to plaintiff to create a triable issue of fact (100 Cal. App. 4th 525, 530-532) . The court of appeal concluded that the court properly granted the bank's motion for summary judgment on the ground that Com. Code § 4406(d) and (e) precluded plaintiff from asserting claims against the bank for unauthorized payment of checks drawn on its checking account, and that plaintiff failed to created a triable issue of fact as to whether the bank failed to exercise ordinary care in paying the items and that the failure contributed to the loss (100 Cal. App. 4th 525, 535) .

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

PLAINTIFF's ACTION AGAINST DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK FOR CHARGING HIS/HER/ITS ACCOUNT TO PAY PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ IS BARRED BY THE APPLICABLE ONE-YEAR STATUTE OF LIMITATION.

A. Commercial Code Limitation. Without regard to care or lack of care of either the customer or the bank, a customer who does not discover and report the customer's unauthorized signature on or any alteration on a check within one year after the statement or the checks are made available to the customer is precluded from asserting the unauthorized signature or alteration against the bank. [This one-year period begins to run with each successive check] (Com. Code § 4406(f); Edward Fineman Company v. Superior Court (1998) 66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1124-1125, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 478 ; see Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 692, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (construing prior law); Kiernan v. Union Bank (1976) 55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 114-116, 127 Cal. Rptr. 441 (construing prior law)).

B. Limitation of Code of Civil Procedure. An action by a depositor against a bank for paying a forged or raised check, or a check that bears a forged or unauthorized endorsement, must be commenced within one year (Code Civ. Proc. § 340(c); Chatsky and Associates et al. v. Superior Court (2004) 117 Cal. App. 4th 873, 877, 880, 12 Cal. Rptr. 3d 154 (Code Civ. Proc § 340(c) was not repealed by Com. Code § 4111, which provides three-year limitation period for actions under Division 4 of Commercial Code); Roy Supply Inc. v. Wells Fargo Bank (1995) 39 Cal. App. 4th 1051, 1074, 46 Cal. Rptr. 2d 309).

[Optional] C. When Statement Is Made Available. The statement is made available so that the limitation period begins to run when the bank sends the statement to the customer accompanied by items paid in good faith. A statement is sent when it is deposited in the mails with appropriate postage. [A finding that the statement was received by the customer is not necessary to support a judgment for the bank based on the running of the limitation period] (Com. Code § 1201(b)(36); Kiernan v. Union Bank (1976) 55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 114-116, 127 Cal. Rptr. 441 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging the drawer's account to pay a raised or forged check, a check with an unauthorized endorsement, or a check with a forged drawer's signature when the action was commenced more than a year after the check or statement was returned to the drawer or otherwise made available to the drawer [see Code Civ. Proc. § 340(c); Com. Code § 4406(f); Chatsky and Associates et al. v. Superior Court (2004) 117 Cal. App. 4th 873, 875, 880, 12 Cal. Rptr. 3d 154] . Case authority has held that this limitation period is not applicable to actions for negligence, but is limited to actions based on breach of an implied contractual or statutory warranty [Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 698-700, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (discussed in § 34.51[3][a]); Commercial Cotton Co. v. United California Bank (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 515, 209 Cal. Rptr. 551 (discussed in § 34.53[3][a])]. However, these holdings appear suspect in light of the 1992 revisions to the Commercial Code, which rejected a drawer's cause of action for breach of warranty [see Com. Code §§ 3417, 4208; Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990); see also § 34.151]. One court has held that the limitation period does apply when the plaintiff alleges negligence. The court rejected the decision in Sun'n Sand, Inc., above, as controlling authority on that issue [Roy Supply, Inc. v. Wells Fargo (1996) 39 Cal. App. 4th 1051, 1069-1070, 46 Cal. Rptr. 2d 309 (see § 34.51[4][a])]. Another court appears to have erased this distinction [Chatsky and Associates et al. v. Superior Court (2004) 117 Cal. App. 4th 873, 875, 880, 12 Cal. Rptr. 3d 154 (claims for conversion, breach of contract, violation of Commercial Code, and unfair business practices are governed by one-year limitation period)].

Note that if the customer fails to examine his or her bank statement and notify the bank of a forged signature or alteration within a reasonable period of time, not exceeding 30 days, the bank is not liable for any unauthorized signature or alteration by the same wrongdoer on any other item paid by the bank in good faith [Com. Code § 4406(d)(2)]. When this rule applies, the customer may be barred from bringing an action even though it is within the one-year period noted above.

An action based on the lack of a required drawer's signature is not subject to any limitation [Code Civ. Proc. § 348; see Bullis v. Security Pac. Nat. Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 801, 813, 148 Cal. Rptr. 22, 582 P.2d 109 (discussed in § 34.32[3][e])].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should attach a copy of the check or statement and set forth facts establishing the date on which it wassent to the customer. Counsel should also establish, if applicable, plaintiff's failure to discover and report his or her unauthorized signature or any alteration on the check within one year after the above date.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawer's action is barred by the one-year limitation.

for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.30 -34.42.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Commercial Code Limitation

The 30-day and one-year issue-preclusion periods set forth in Com. Code § 4406(d)(2) and Com. Code § 4406(f) do not apply to a customer's failure to report unauthorized endorsements, as opposed to the customer's unauthorized signature or any alteration of the check. The current version of Com. Code § 4406 imposes no duty on the drawer to look for unauthorized endorsements [Com. Code § 4406, 1990 Official UCC Comment 5]. However, the one-year limitation period of Code Civ. Proc. § 340(c) does apply to actions on forged or unauthorized endorsements (in addition to actions on forged signatures) [Chatsky and Associates et al. v. Superior Court (2004) 117 Cal. App. 4th 873, 875, 877, 880, 12 Cal. Rptr. 3d 154] .

In Edward Fineman Company v. Superior Court (1998) 66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 478 , the owner of a payroll checking account sued a bank for breach of contract, negligence, and damages under Com. Code § 4103. Between 1991 and 1996, the bank paid 83 checks drawn on plaintiff's account, signed only by plaintiff's accounting manager. Under the terms of the account, withdrawals were authorized only by two signatures when one signature was the accounting manager's. The bank moved for summary adjudication with respect to the 23 checks drawn between 1991 and 1993 on the ground that the claims were barred by Com. Code §§ 4406(f) and 4111. Plaintiff opposed the motion, arguing that those sections were inapplicable because they only became effective in 1993. The trial court granted the summary judgment motion and held that plaintiff's claim for the 23 1991-1993 checks were barred by Com. Code §§ 4406(f) and 4111.

The court of appeal first cited Sun'n Sand, discussed below, for the proposition that each check constitutes a separate cause of action susceptible to a complete disposition if barred by affirmative defenses asserted by the bank. It held that under Code Civ. Proc. § 437c(f), a party may present a motion for summary adjudication challenging a separate and distinct wrongful act even though combined with other wrongful acts alleged in the same cause of action (66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1118) . The court next addressed Com. Code § 4406(f) and its predecessor, former Com. Code § 4406(4), concluding that during all relevant times the substance of Com. Code § 4406 imposed an obligation on the customer to examine monthly statements and canceled checks to discover and report any payment by the bank of any items bearing unauthorized signatures. The court stated that whether that section was applicable, let alone retroactive, depends on whether the manager's sole signature was an "unauthorized signature" pursuant to Com. Code § 3403(b). The court examined the 1993 amendment to that section which added language stating that a signature is unauthorized if one of the required signatures is lacking, and reviewed its legislative history, concluding that the amendment "clarified" existing law and thus operated retroactively. The amendment implicitly abrogated the holding of Far West Citrus Inc. v. Bank of America (1979) 91 Cal. App. 3d 913, 917, 154 Cal. Rptr. 464 , discussed in § 34.36, with respect to the inapplicability of the one-year notice period of Com. Code § 4406. The court held that because the 23 1991-1996 checks lacked a second required signature, they fell within the classification of items that must be discovered and reported pursuant to Com. Code § 4406(f), and thus plaintiff was precluded from pursuing recovery for them from the bank (66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1119-1125) . Similarly, with respect to Com. Code § 4111, which also became effective in 1993, the court held that the three-year statute of limitation applied retroactively to the unauthorized checks drawn on plaintiff's account during the two-year period at issue (66 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1125-1126) .

Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , was a drawer's action against the collecting bank. The facts and procedural background of Sun'n Sand, Inc. are set forth in § 34.35[3][a]. Defendant collecting bank contended that the cause of action for breach of warranty against material alteration was barred by former Com. Code § 4406(4) (now see Com. Code § 4406(f)) (21 Cal. 3d 671, 691) . The Supreme Court held that the limitation of former Com. Code § 4406(4) barred recovery for the first eight checks because each of them was alleged to have been issued sufficiently in advance of the filing of the action to compel the inference that it was negotiated and made available to plaintiff with an accompanying monthly statement more than one year before the commencement of the action (21 Cal. 3d 671, 691-692) . In reaching that conclusion, the Court first had to determine whether in a series of altered checks, a new one-year period begins to run with each successive check, or whether the preclusion extends to all checks, so that once the time bar precludes action on the first altered check, action is barred on the entire series, even those negotiated less than one year before the action is commenced. The Court noted that the preclusions of former Com. Code § 4406(2) are set forth in separate clauses: former Com. Code § 4406(2)(a) refers to unauthorized signatures and alterations on single items, and former Com. Code § 4406(2)(b) sets forth a different rule specifically applicable to repetitive forgeries or alterations. Former Com. Code § 4406(4), however, declares one rule using terms that suggest a series is to be treated no differently from the first item or single items. Because former Com. Code § 4406(4) fails to explicitly differentiate between one-time an repetitive forgeries and alterations, the Court concluded that a new one-year period begins to run with each successive check and that the cause of action for breach of warranty of material alteration based on the ninth (last) check was not barred (21 Cal. 3d 671, 692) .

Because Sun'n Sand was decided under former provisions of the Commercial Code, caution should be used when citing all or portions of the opinion. For example, the Court's holding that a drawer has standing under former Com. Code §§ 3417 and 4207 to bring an action for breach of warranty has been rejected by the 1992 amendments to those sections [see Com. Code §§ 3417, 4208; Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990) (warranties are made to drawee and not to drawer)]. Thus, the Court's ruling that the one-year limitation period of Com. Code § 4406 is limited to actions based on breach of an implied contractual or statutory warranty (21 Cal. 3d 671, 698-700) also appears to have been abrogated. However, the Court's reasoning with regard to its decision that the one-year period of former Com. Code § 4406(4) (now see Com. Code § 4406(f)) begins to run with each successive check appears to remain persuasive. Like its predecessor, the current version of Com. Code § 4406 provides for preclusions in two separate clauses; one for unauthorized signatures or alterations on a single item [compare former Com. Code § 4406(2)(a) with Com. Code § 4406(d)(1)], and another rule for repetitive forgeries or alterations [compare former Com. Code § 4406(2)(b) with Com. Code § 4406(d)(2)]. In addition, Com. Code 4406(f), like former Com. Code § 4406(4), appears to set forth one rule applicable to both one-time and repetitive forgeries or alterations.

Plaintiff drawers in Kiernan v. Union Bank (1976) 55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 127 Cal. Rptr. 441 , sued the drawee to recover the amount of forged checks paid and charged against their account. The checks had been forged by their bookkeeper, who intercepted the statements on their return. Summary judgment was granted for defendant as to all checks paid and returned more than one year before the filing of the action. Plaintiffs appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court quoted portions of former Com. Code § 4406(4) (now see Com. Code § 4406(f)), and said the statement is made available so that the limitation period begins to run when the bank sends it to the customer accompanied by items paid in good faith. The court cited former Com. Code § 1201(38) (now see Com. Code § 1201(b)(36)) for the proposition that a statement is sent when it is deposited in the mails with appropriate postage. Lack of care, or negligence, on the part of either the customer or the bank does not affect the running of the one-year limitation; it is an absolute time limit. However, for the limitation period to run, there remains the requirement that the items were paid in good faith (55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 114) . Here, there was no allegation or any evidence that the bank acted other than in good faith, so the grant of summary judgment was proper (55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 114-115) .

Plaintiffs contended, citing Pac. Coast Cheese, Inc. v. Sec.-First Nat. Bk. (1955) 45 Cal. 2d 75, 78-79, 286 P.2d 353 (discussed in § 34.35[3][a]), that defendant should have been required to prove its freedom from negligence and that plaintiffs were negligent or estopped to deny the correctness of the charges to their account (55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 115) . The court stated that the cited decision predated the adoption of former Com. Code § 4406(4) (now see Com. Code § 4406(f)) and was superseded by it. It appears that it would have been more appropriate for the court to note that there was no statute of limitation issue in Pac. Coast Cheese, but rather the issue of the depositor's negligence as compared with the bank's negligence in circumstances now addressed by Com. Code § 4406(a)-(e).

Plaintiffs argued that the limitation period does not begin to run until the depositor actually receives the statement. The court disagreed, saying the statute runs when the statement is made available to the customer. Former Com. Code § 4406(4) (like the current version of Com. Code § 4406(f)) places the burden on the customer to examine the statements and that responsibility is not obviated by the fact that an employee of the customer has concealed the forgery (55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 115) . The bookkeeper was entrusted with reconciling the bank statements, and thus, notice of the bookkeeper's fraud was imputed to plaintiffs (55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 116-117) .

Plaintiffs also contended that the trial court was not justified in inferring that the May 1, 1970, statement was received by plaintiffs before May 11, 1970. The court of appeal said that inference was not necessary. It was sufficient that defendant's uncontradicted evidence established that the statement was mailed on or before May 6, 1970 (55 Cal. App. 3d 111, 115-116) .

[b] Limitation of Code of Civil Procedure

Chatsky and Associates et al. v. Superior Court (2004) 117 Cal. App. 4th 873, 12 Cal. Rptr. 3d 154 clarified the relationship between the general three-year limitation period of Com. Code § 4111 (actions to enforce an obligation, duty, or right arising under Division 4 of the Commercial Code) and the one-year limitations period of Code Civ. Proc. § 340(c) for an action by a depositor against a bank for the payment of a check with a forged signature or endorsement. Plaintiffs argued that because Com. Code § 4111 was enacted later, it supplanted or implicitly repealed Code Civ. Proc. § 340(c). The court held that as the more specific statute, and consistent with the one-year issue-preclusion period of Com. Code § 4406(f), the one-year limitation period established by Code Civ. Proc. § 340(c) continues to apply to actions on forged checks.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Commercial Code Limitation

In Roy Supply, Inc. v. Wells Fargo (1996) 39 Cal. App. 4th 1051, 46 Cal. Rptr. 2d 309 , bank customers filed a complaint alleging that the bank negligently maintained its records and negligently operated, managed, and controlled its check processing operations to allow checks drawn with a forged signature to be charged against the plantiffs' accounts. The bank successfully demurred on the ground that the plaintiffs' common law negligence remedy was supplanted by the remedies available in the Commercial Code. The trial court dismissed the complaint, effectively terminating the action, and the plaintiffs appealed. Because the action was filed in 1992 with respect to checks paid in 1991 or earlier, the court of appeal examined former Com. Code § 4406(4), the predecessor to Com. Code § 4406(f), which had imposed a duty on a customer to act promptly in discovering and reporting forgeries and alterations. The court found that the Code provision was unambiguous, covered the allegations in the complaint, and displaced common law negligence principles with respect to payment of forged checks by a bank. The court rejected the plaintiffs' assertions that the decision in Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (discussed in § 34.51[3][a].) established that the former section had no application when a plaintiff alleged negligence. The court stated that the lead opinion was not even precedential authority; moreover, it did not involve a dispute between a paying bank and its customer (39 Cal. App. 4th 1051, 1067-1068) . The court declined to disregard the clear and unambiguous language of the former section (39 Cal. App. 4th 1051, 1069-1070) .

§ 34.52 Opposing Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Unauthorized Payment of Check [Com. Code § 4401]--Drawer's Failure to Exercise Ordinary Care Contributed to Alteration or Forgery [Com. Code § 3406]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

PLAINTIFF's OWN FAILURE TO EXERCISE ORDINARY CARE CONTRIBUTED TO THE _____ [ALTERATION or FORGED SIGNATURE] AND PRECLUDES THE IMPOSITION OF LIABILITY ON DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK FOR CHARGING PLAINTIFF's ACCOUNT TO PAY HIS/HER/ITS CHECK NUMBER _____.

A. Contributory Negligence. A person whose failure to exercise ordinary care contributes to an alteration of an instrument or to the making of a forged signature on an instrument is precluded from asserting the alteration or the forgery against a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection. The burden of proving failure to exercise ordinary care is on the person asserting the preclusion (Com. Code § 3406(a), (c)).

B. Ordinary Care. [See § 34.39[1], Paragraph C.]

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for charging the drawer's account to pay an altered check or a check with a forged drawer's signature when the drawee paid in good faith and the drawer's own negligence contributed to the loss. This defense may also be used by a person who takes the instrument for value or collection [see Com. Code § 3406(a)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law

stated. Thus, counsel should describe the checks and the manner in which the drawer's negligence contributed to the loss. Counsel should also set forth reasonable commercial standards in paying checks as this is relevant to whether there has been a failure to exercise ordinary care [see Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-406 (1990)]. In addition, because Com. Code § 3406(b) adopts a comparative negligence test [see § 34.52[2][b]; see also § 34.42], counsel should set forth facts showing that the drawee was not negligent in paying the check.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawer's negligence contributed to the alteration or unauthorized signature.

This form may be used with distinguishing facts to support the contention that the drawee is liable for paying the forged or altered check [see, e.g., Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 (discussed in § 34.91[3][a])].

[b] Comparative Negligence

Com. Code § 3406 differs from prior law in that it adopts a concept of comparative negligence. If the person precluded under Com. Code § 3406(a) proves that the person asserting the preclusion failed to exercise ordinary care in paying or taking the instrument and that failure contributed to the loss, the loss is allocated between the two parties according to the extent to which the failure of each to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss [Com. Code § 3406(b); see Com. Code § 3406(c) (burden of proof on person precluded)].

[c] Related Points and Authorities

For additional points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.46 -34.51, 34.53. For points and authorities supporting the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.30 -34.42. The points and authorities in § 34.42 support the contention that the drawer's contributory negligence is inapplicable because the drawee was also negligent and thus the loss should be allocated based on the comparative negligence of both parties.

For authorities holding related defenses inapplicable either because of the drawee's negligence or because of the lack of causal connection between the drawer's negligence and the loss, see § 34.39.

§ 34.53 Opposing Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer in Negligence for Unauthorized Payment of Check--Com. Code § 4401(a) Displaces Common-Law Negligence

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR NEGLIGENCE FOR CHARGING PLAINTIFF's ACCOUNT TO PAY A CHECK THAT WAS NOT PROPERLY PAYABLE BECAUSE THE STANDARD OF CARE REQUIRED BY COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 4401(a) HAS DISPLACED COMMON-LAW NEGLIGENCE WITH REGARD TO A DRAWEE's LIABILITY FOR IMPROPER OR UNAUTHORIZED CHARGES TO A DRAWER's ACCOUNT.

Negligence Displaced. A drawer may not maintain a negligence cause of action against the drawee based on an improper charge to the account on which the item was drawn because Commercial Code Section 4401(a) has displaced tort principles with regard to a drawee bank's liability to its customer for improper charges to the customer's account (Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557-558, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 ; but see Commercial Cotton Co. v. United California Bank (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 514-515, 209 Cal. Rptr. 551).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

The authority used in this form is directly opposed by Commercial Cotton Co. v. United California Bank (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 209 Cal. Rptr. 551 , which actually only considered the statute of limitations applicable to a drawer's negligence cause of action after the drawee admitted its negligence in paying an unauthorized check.

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable in negligence to the drawer for charging the account to pay a check that was not properly payable.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the defect in the check that renders it not properly payable and thus within the purview of Com. Code § 4401(a).

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that Com. Code § 4401(a) has replaced common law negligence in the drawer-drawee relationship with regard to charges that may properly be made against the drawer's account.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

For additional points and authorities opposing the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.46 -34.52. For additional points and authorities generally supporting the contention that the drawee is liable for unauthorized payment of a check, see §§ 34.30 -34.42.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Negligence Displaced

Plaintiffs in Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , took a check from their savings and loan association, evidencing a withdrawal from their savings account, drawn on the savings association's account at UCB and payable to "Continental Finance Systems--Wells Fargo Escrow Trust Account." The check was deposited at Continental's account at Bank of America with the stamped endorsement "Pay to the order of Bank of America NT and SA For Deposit Only Continental Financial Systems 02137-07857." The savings association-drawer assigned its rights and causes of action to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs sued both banks for negligence, Bank of America for breach of warranty of good title under former Com. Code § 4207(1)(a), and UCB for payment on improper endorsement in breach of its agreement with the savings association to honor only properly endorsed checks. The trial court sustained demurrers to all causes of action against both banks and ordered the actions to be dismissed. Plaintiffs appealed.

The court of appeal reversed the dismissal order for all causes of action except the negligence action against UCB. In regard to that cause of action, the court said that while UCB clearly must abide by the obligations imposed under the common law and under the Commercial Code, the provisions of former Com. Code § 4401(1) (now see Com. Code § 4401(a)) preclude recovery under a negligence theory in this situation. Former Com. Code § 4401(1) (as does the current version in Com. Code § 4401(a)) permits a drawee to charge a depositor's account for "properly payable" items drawn from the account. Thus, if the endorsement was authorized and the check was properly payable, UCB comes within the protection of the statutes. Similarly, if the endorsement was not authorized and the check was not properly payable, plaintiffs may recover under former Com. Code § 4401(1) (now see Com. Code § 4401(a), which also added a definition of "properly payable"). The court observed that the principles of law and equity supplement the Commercial Code unless displaced by the particular provisions of the Code, and concluded that the principles of tort law are displaced by the particular provisions of the Commercial Code in this instance (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557-558) .

It should be noted that the holding in Joffe concerning the displacement of negligence is in apparent conflict with the holding in Commercial Cotton Co. v. United California Bank (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 209 Cal. Rptr. 551 . Plaintiff-drawer in Commercial Cotton Co. maintained a commercial checking account at defendant bank. Its principal was the only authorized signatory on the account. In 1972, the principal's wife reported a series of checks missing and received replacement checks of a different style and color. In 1976, one of the missing checks was presented to and paid by defendant. It was for $4,000 and had two unauthorized signatures. The principal never looked at the statement and did not discover the improper payment until 1978, when he reported it to defendant. Defendant refused reimbursement on the ground that the claim was barred by the one-year limitation of former Code Civ. Proc. § 340(3) (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 335.1, allowing two years) and former Com. Code § 4406(4) (now see Com. Code § 4406(f)). Plaintiff sued for negligence, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing inherent in the contractual relationship of the parties. The trial court awarded plaintiff $4,000 for negligence, $20,000 for intentional infliction of emotional distress, and $100,000 for breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeal reversed the award for intentional infliction of emotional distress and affirmed the remainder of the judgment. Petitions for rehearing and for hearing in the Supreme Court were denied (163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 518) . Defendant admitted its negligence (163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 514, 515 n.1). The opinion did not discuss the standard imposed by Com. Code § 4401 or by Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557-558, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 (discussed above), which held that former Com. Code § 4401(1) (now see Com. Code § 4401(a)) has displaced negligence in regard to the drawee's duty only to charge the drawer's account for checks that are properly payable. The court in Commercial Cotton Co. characterized the action as one for negligence because the customer alleged a breach of duty (163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 515) .

Commenting on an internal memorandum of defendant's staff counsel that suggested that defendant might be able to diminish its liability by proving comparative negligence on the part of plaintiff, the court said that the doctrine was factually inapplicable here. Although the claim that plaintiff was negligent in failing to notify the bank of the defective check was not presented at trial, the court of appeal said any delay was irrelevant to the issue of comparative negligence. The delay in reporting the loss had nothing to do with the bank's negligent payment of the check and did not contribute to the transaction (163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 515) . Plaintiff's after-the-fact conduct did not contribute to defendant's negligence in making the unauthorized payment (163 Cal. App. 3d 511, 516) .

Note that the same court that issued Commercial Cotton Co. has reevaluated its analysis of the bank-depositor relationship and the cause of action for tort damages for bad-faith breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. In Copesky v. Superior Court (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 678, 688-694, 280 Cal. Rptr. 338 , the court determined that the cause of action for bad faith is no longer viable after Foley v. Interactive Data Corp. (1988) 47 Cal. 3d 654, 254 Cal. Rptr. 211, 765 P.2d 373 .

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR WRONGFULLY REFUSING TO PAY PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ BECAUSE PAYMENT OF THAT CHECK WOULD HAVE CREATED AN OVERDRAFT.

A. Drawee Not Required to Pay Overdraft. A bank may dishonor a check that would create an overdraft unless it has agreed to pay the overdraft (Com. Code § 4402(a); see Torrance N. Bank v. Enesco F. Credit Union (1955) 134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 320-321, 285 P.2d 737 ; Bachtel v. Bank of America (1954) 127 Cal. App. 2d 728, 731-732, 274 P.2d 421).

[Optional] B. Officer Had No Authority to Overdraw. A drawee bank is not required to honor overdraft checks of a corporate drawer unless the particular corporate officer signing the checks has authority to overdraw the corporate account or to borrow from the bank (Torrance N. Bank v. Enesco F. Credit Union (1955) 134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 321-328, 285 P.2d 737).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

The conduct of the parties, any oral agreement, or the particular signature card or overdraft agreement between the drawer and drawee may render the authorities mentioned in this form inapplicable [see Com. Code § 4402(a) and §§ 34.43, 34.44]

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for wrongful dishonor when the check's payment would create an overdraft.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Therefore, counsel should set forth facts describing the account, the balance in the account, and the check in question and establishing that no understanding, prior conduct, or particular agreement of the parties required payment of overdraft checks or reasonably could have lead the drawer to believe the overdraft check would be paid.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to address the substantive issue of the drawee's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in §§ 34.55 and 34.56 oppose the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor for reasons other that the fact that the check would create an overdraft. The points and authorities in § 34.49 may be used to oppose the contention that failure to pay a check amounted to wrongful dishonor when the check involved was more than six months old.

The points and authorities in §§ 34.43 and 34.44 support the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor for failure to pay a check, even one that would create an overdraft.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Drawee Not Required to Pay Overdraft

In Torrance N. Bank v. Enesco F. Credit Union (1955) 134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 285 P.2d 737 , the court of appeal reversed the judgment for the drawee bank awarding it the amount of overdrafts paid by it on the ground that the depositor's officer who wrote the overdraft checks was authorized to sign corporate checks, but not to create overdrafts. The court said that ordinarily, a drawee is not required to honor a check for an amount in excess of the deposit against which it is drawn (134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 320-321) . The court reviewed the signature card and corporate resolution that had been provided to the bank and said they were at once an authorization and a limitation (134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 321) . The proceeds of the overdraft checks were used in the signatory officer's own business, but the decision was based on the fact that that officer had no actual or ostensible authority to borrow from the bank or to create overdrafts, although the officer was authorized to draw checks for any amounts less than or up to the amount of the deposit (134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 321-328) .

Plaintiff in Bachtel v. Bank of America (1954) 127 Cal. App. 2d 728, 274 P.2d 421 , sole owner of an automobile dealership, wrote checks for $2,253 and $2,045 against his account on May 10, 1951. They were both payable to the creditor that extended all plaintiff's inventory financing. The checks did not arrive for processing at defendant until 8:30 a.m. on Tuesday, May 15. Around noon that day, plaintiff went to defendant bank and inquired about his account balance. He was told it was slightly in excess of $5,000. He did not inquire whether the two checks in question had been processed, but withdrew $4,300. When the checks were processed that afternoon, defendant called plaintiff and told him the $4,300 would have to be returned if it was going to pay the checks. Plaintiff said he would return the money, but never did. The checks were returned unpaid. The creditor instituted an action against plaintiff in which judgment was entered against plaintiff. In plaintiff's action against the bank based on failure to pay the checks, plaintiff sought damages for loss of the business on the ground that the creditor's suit was a result of the dishonor of the two checks and that the creditor's suit caused him to lose his entire business. The jury returned a $20,000 verdict in plaintiff's favor, but judgment notwithstanding the verdict was entered for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The only issue on appeal was whether there was sufficient evidence to sustain the jury's verdict. The court said there was not, adding that a depositor's own records are supposed to show the status of his or her account and that it was plaintiff's fault that the checks were returned (127 Cal. App. 2d 728, 732) .

[b] Officer Had No Authority to Overdraw

Torrance N. Bank v. Enesco F. Credit Union (1955) 134 Cal. App. 2d 316, 285 P.2d 737 , is discussed in § 34.54[3][a].

[a] Drawee Not Required to Pay Overdraft

Perdue v. Crocker National Bank (1985) 38 Cal. 3d 913, 216 Cal. Rptr. 345, 702 P.2d 503 , Shapiro v. United California Bank (1982) 133 Cal. App. 3d 256, 184 Cal. Rptr. 34 , and Hoffman v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1981) 121 Cal. App. 3d 964, 176 Cal. Rptr. 14 (discussed in § 34.44[3][a]), are also authorities for the contention that ordinarily the drawee is not required to pay checks that would create overdrafts.

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

PLAINTIFF HAS NOT STATED A CAUSE OF ACTION AGAINST DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK FOR WRONGFULLY REFUSING TO PAY PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____.

A. Cause of Action for Wrongful Dishonor. [See § 34.43[1], Paragraph A.]

B. Description of Check Insufficient. In a complaint for damages for wrongful dishonor of a check, when the check is not pleaded verbatim, the complaint must show (1) that the check was drawn in the depositor's name as his or her name appears of record at the drawee bank, (2) the branch on which the check was drawn, and (3) that presentment, or any inquiry that provided the basis for waiver of presentment, was made to the branch at which the plaintiff's account was maintained (Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 130, 136 P.2d 345).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for wrongful dishonor when the pleading has not established all necessary elements of the cause of action or characteristics of the check in question.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should point out the elements or characteristics that were not pleaded.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to address the failure to establish the cause of action against the drawee.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

§ 34.54 opposes the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor when the check's payment would create an overdraft. § 34.56 opposes the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor when the drawee has conflicting instructions from joint signatories. § 34.78 and Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments set forth parts of Com. Code § 3502 relating to dishonor.

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.43 and 34.44 support the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor for failure to pay a check, including an overdraft check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Description of Check Insufficient

The facts and procedural background of Allen v. Bank of America (1943) 58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 136 P.2d 345 , and the portions of the opinion relating to the elements of the cause of action and when presentment may be waived, are discussed in § 34.43[3][a]. After deciding that the failure to allege presentment was not fatal because facts establishing the drawee's waiver of presentment and dishonor were pleaded, the court of appeal held the demurrer should have been sustained, albeit with leave to amend, because plaintiff had neglected to allege where and at which branch of defendant the check was payable and that plaintiff's account was in the same name as that used in the telegram. When the check is not pleaded verbatim, the complaint must show (1) that the check was drawn in the depositor's name as his or her name appears of record at the drawee bank; (2) the branch on which the check was drawn; and (3) that presentment, or any inquiry that provided the basis for waiver of presentment, was made to the branch at which the plaintiff's account was maintained. The court was satisfied that the hotel's status as holder was sufficiently pleaded (58 Cal. App. 2d 124, 130) .

§ 34.56 Opposing Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Wrongful Dishonor of Check [Com. Code § 4402]--Conflicting Instructions From Account Signatories [Fin. Code § 953]

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE FOR REFUSING TO PAY PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ BECAUSE, AT THE TIME THAT CHECK WAS PRESENTED FOR PAYMENT, DEFENDANT HAD RECEIVED CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS FROM THOSE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE WITHDRAWALS FROM THE ACCOUNT ON WHICH IT WAS DRAWN.

A. Signature Card Contract. [See § 34.30[1], Paragraph E.]

B. Cause of Action for Wrongful Dishonor. [See § 34.43[1], Paragraph A.]

[Optional] C. Drawee's Right to Assume Signatory's Authority. When the depositor of a commercial or savings account has authorized any person to make withdrawals from the account, the bank, in the absence of written notice otherwise, may assume that any check, receipt, or order of withdrawal drawn by that person in the authorized form or manner, including checks drawn to his or her personal order and withdrawal orders payable to him or her personally, was drawn for a purpose authorized by the depositor and within the scope of the authority conferred on that person (Fin. Code § 953).

D. Conflicting Instructions. A signature card provision that allows the drawee, if given conflicting demands by the authorized signators on an account, to withhold payment from the account pending joint order or receipt of all parties insulates the drawee from liability for wrongful dishonor at a time when it receives conflicting demands [and the signatories refuse the drawee's offer to release all funds in the account to all signers if they would receive them together] (AARTS Productions, Inc. v. Crocker National Bank (1986) 179 Cal. App. 3d 1061, 1067-1069, 225 Cal. Rptr. 203).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:
The particular signature card agreement between the drawer and drawee may render this authorities inapplicable.

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for wrongful dishonor when the drawee refused to honor the check in reliance on a signature card provision that allowed it to withhold payment when it had received conflicting instructions from authorized signatories on the account.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the relevant signature card provisions and the conflicting demands.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawee is not liable for wrongful dishonor.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.43 and 34.44 support the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor for failure to pay a check, including an overdraft check. § 34.54 opposes the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor when the check's payment would create an overdraft. § 34.55 opposes the contention that a drawee is liable for wrongful dishonor when all elements necessary to establish liability have not been pleaded.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Conflicting Instructions

Plaintiff in AARTS Productions, Inc. v. Crocker National Bank (1986) 179 Cal. App. 3d 1061, 225 Cal. Rptr. 203 , was an unincorporated association. When the checks were dishonored, there were four authorized signatories on the account. The signature card agreement provided in relevant part that defendant "may ..... (c) if given conflicting certifications or demands, either deposit the balance in court or withhold payment from the account pending the joint order or receipt of all parties or an appropriate court order determining those authorized to sign ..... " (179 Cal. App. 3d 1061, 1066) . One of the signatories, plaintiff's treasurer, wrote defendant requesting that no checks be honored because the checkbook had been stolen. The three other signatories told defendant the checkbook had not been stolen and demanded that defendant honor checks drawn on the account. A letter to defendant from the treasurer's attorney repeated the instruction not to honor checks and mentioned pending litigation involving the account. Defendant offered to release all funds to all signers if they would receive them together. All but the treasurer refused this offer. Defendant filed an action in interpleader and deposited the funds with the court. Plaintiff sued for wrongful dishonor, conversion, and breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The trial court entered summary judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The only issue on appeal was whether the dishonor was wrongful. Defendant contended that the signature card agreement authorized it to withhold payment pending a court order or joint order of the signatories. Plaintiff contended that the signature card agreement had to be read in the light of relevant Financial Code provisions, particularly Fin. Code §§ 952 and 953. Plaintiff contended that Fin. Code § 953 (set forth in Paragraph C) allowed it to assume that the checks would be paid and that defendant should have assumed the signatures of the other three were valid. The court agreed with defendant, that the letters defendant had received were "written notice otherwise" and allowed it to question the ostensible authority of the presenter of a check or withdrawal demand (179 Cal. App. 3d 1061, 1067) .

Plaintiff also contended that Fin. Code § 952 required defendant to ignore the letters from the treasurer and the treasurer's attorney. Fin. Code § 952 provides that a bank is required to honor checks notwithstanding its receipt of an adverse claim to a deposit, unless the notice of adverse claim is in the form of an affidavit as provided in Fin. Code § 952(a) or a restraining order procured and served in accordance with Fin. Code § 952(b) (179 Cal. App. 3d 1061, 1067-1068) . The court found no California case, but noted authorities from states with similar statutes that were unanimous in holding that an account holder is not an adverse claimant as to the other signatories (179 Cal. App. 3d 1061, 1068-1069) . The purpose of Fin. Code § 952 is to protect banks from getting caught in a crossfire between its depositors and strangers claiming entitlement to accounts. The court held Fin. Code § 952 was inapplicable because there was no comparable need for a statute to regulate situations of conflicting demands between joint account holders because those could be provided for by the account agreement (179 Cal. App. 3d 1061, 1069) .

The application of Fin. Code § 952 is not limited by any provisions in the Multiple Party Accounts Law [Fin. Code § 952(d); see Prob. Code § 5100 et seq.].

[a] Fin. Code §§ 952, 953

In Chazen v. Centennial Bank (1998) 61 Cal. App. 4th 532, 71 Cal. Rptr. 2d 462 , mortgage purchasers sought to hold a bank liable for the actions of a mortgage loan broker who withdrew funds from trust accounts he opened with the bank for deposit of funds collected on behalf of the purchasers. The court of appeal found that Fin. Code §§ 952, 953 codify the well-established principle that a bank has no duty to monitor trust accounts for breaches of fiduciary duty. Specifically, a bank has no duty to prevent commingling of assets in fiduciary accounts, monitor fiduciary accounts for irregular transactions, prevent improper disbursements from accounts, or conduct investigation of possible misappropriation of funds (61 Cal. App. 4th 532, 541) .

A. Drawee Bank's Liability To Drawer

§ 34.57 Opposing Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Drawer for Payment of Check in Disregard of Stop Payment Order [Com. Code § 4403]--Stop Payment Order Received Too Late [Com. Code §§ 4105(3), 4108, 4302(a), 4303]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR PAYING PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ AND CHARGING PLAINTIFF's ACCOUNT FOR THAT PAYMENT AFTER HAVING RECEIVED A STOP PAYMENT ORDER BECAUSE THE STOP PAYMENT NOTICE ARRIVED TOO LATE.

A. Stop Payment Order. A customer or any person authorized to draw on the account if there is more than one person may stop payment of any item drawn on the customer's account by an order to the bank describing the item or account with reasonable certainty received at a time and in a manner that affords the bank a reasonable opportunity to act on it before any action by the bank with regard to the item described in Commercial Code Section 4303 (Com. Code § 4403(a)).

B. Order Too Late. Any _____ [knowledge received by or notice received by or stop payment order received by or legal process served on or setoff exercised by] a payor bank comes too late to terminate, suspend, or modify the bank's right or duty to pay an item or to charge its customer's account for the item if the _____ [knowledge or notice or stop payment order or legal process] is received or served and a reasonable time for the bank to act on it expires [or the setoff is exercised] after the earliest of the following:

(1) The bank accepts or certifies the item (Com. Code § 4303(a)(1); see Umbsen v. Crocker First Nat. Bank (1949) 33 Cal. 2d 599, 601-602, 203 P.2d 752 (certified check)).

(2) The bank pays the item in cash (Com. Code § 4303(a)(2)).

(3) The bank settles for the item without having a right to revoke the settlement under statute, clearinghouse rule, or agreement (Com. Code § 4303(a)(3)).

(4) The bank becomes accountable for the amount of the item under Commercial Code Section 4302 dealing with the payor bank's responsibility for late return of items (Com. Code § 4303(a)(4)).

(5) With regard to checks, a cutoff hour no earlier than one hour after the opening of the next banking day after the banking day on which the bank received the check and no later than the close of that next banking day or, if no cutoff hour is fixed, the close of the next banking day after the banking day on which the bank received the check (Com. Code § 4303(a)(5)).

[Optional] C. Payor Defined. A "payor bank" is a bank that is the drawee of a draft (Com. Code § 4105(3)).

[Optional] D. Cutoff Hour. For the purpose of allowing time to process items, prove balances, and make the necessary entries on its books to determine its position for the day, a bank may fix an afternoon hour of 2 P.M. or later as a cutoff hour for the handling of money and items and the making of entries on its books. An item or deposit of money received on any day after a cutoff hour or after the close of the banking day may be treated as being received at the opening of the next banking day (Com. Code § 4108).

[Optional] E. Payor Bank's Responsibility for Late Return of Item. If an item is presented to and received by a payor bank, the bank is accountable for the amount of either (Com. Code § 4302(a)):

(1) A demand item, other than a documentary draft, whether properly payable or not, if the bank, in any case in which it is not also the depositary bank, retains the item beyond midnight of the banking day of receipt without settling for it or, whether or not it is also the depositary bank, does not pay or return the item or send notice of dishonor until after its midnight deadline.

(2) Any other properly payable item unless, within the time allowed for acceptance or payment of that item, the bank either accepts or pays the item or returns it and accompanying documents.

[Optional] F. Drawee's Order of Processing. Subject to Commercial Code Section 4303(a), items may be accepted, paid, certified, or charged to the indicated account of its customer in any order (Com. Code § 4303(b)).

[2] Comments

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for failing to honor a stop payment order when the order was received too late [see Com. Code §§ 4303, 4403] Com. Code § 4403, the basic provision setting forth the drawer's right to stop payment (Paragraph A), provides that the stop payment order must be received in time for the drawee to have a reasonable opportunity to act on it before any action by the bank with regard to the item described in Com. Code § 4303 (Paragraph B). Optional Paragraphs C-F set forth other code sections that may be applicable when applying the rules set forth in Com. Code § 4303 and need only be used when that aspect of settlement is at issue.

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the facts establishing the drawee's reasonable efforts and the intervening notice, stop payment order, process, knowledge, or settlement.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawee is not liable for failing to honor the stop payment order.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

Although generally the points and authorities in § 34.45 support the contention that the drawee is liable for failing to honor a stop payment order, Optional Paragraph E in § 34.45 may be used to oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for failing to honor a written stop payment order if the check was paid more than six months after receiving the order and the order was not renewed [see Com. Code § 4403(b)]. The points and authorities in § 34.58 may be used to oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for failure to honor a stop payment order on the ground that the drawee is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of another party to the check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Order Too Late

Both certified checks and cashier's checks that have been properly issued and delivered to the payee fall within the purview of Com. Code § 4303(a)(1). Certified checks are specifically mentioned. Cashier's checks are considered accepted at the time they are issued [see Kaufman v. Chase Manhattan Bank, National Ass'n (S.D.N.Y. 1973) 370 F. Supp. 276, 278 (applying former Com. Code § 3410(1); now see Com. Code § 3409, which is set forth in § 34.49)].

Umbsen v. Crocker First Nat. Bank (1949) 33 Cal. 2d 599, 203 P.2d 752 , is discussed in § 34.49[3][a].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Order Too Late

In Wright v. Bank of America (1959) 176 Cal. App. 2d 176, 1 Cal. Rptr. 202 , drawers sued the drawee bank for wrongfully paying a postdated check. The court of appeal ultimately held that drawers were estopped to assert the drawee's liability because they were negligent in signing blank checks for their officer manager (176 Cal. App. 2d 176, 179-180) . The parties also addressed the validity and effect of an oral stop payment order given on May 9. The court noted that the account statement in evidence showed that the check was paid on May 6, and said further discussion of the validity and consequences of the order was inappropriate (176 Cal. App. 2d 176, 182) .

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR PAYING PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ AND CHARGING PLAINTIFF's ACCOUNT FOR THAT PAYMENT AFTER _____ [HAVING RECEIVED A STOP PAYMENT ORDER or THE ACCOUNT WAS CLOSED] BECAUSE DEFENDANT IS ENTITLED TO BE SUBROGATED TO THE RIGHTS OF _____ [name and status of party to whom defendant claims right to be subrogated].

A. Drawee's Liability for Disregarding Customer's Order to Stop Payment or Close Account. [See § 34.45[1], Paragraph B.]

B. Drawee's Right of Subrogation. If a payor bank has paid a check _____ [over the order of the drawer or maker to stop payment or after an account has been closed] or otherwise under circumstances giving a basis for objection by the drawer or maker, to prevent unjust enrichment and only to the extent necessary to prevent loss to the bank by reason of its payment of the check, the payor bank is subrogated to the rights of all of the following: (1) any holder in due course of the check against the drawer or maker; (2) the payee or any other holder of the item against the drawer or maker either on the check or under the transaction out of which the check arose; and (3) the drawer or maker against the payee or any other holder of the check with regard to the transaction out of which the check arose (Com. Code § 4407).

[2] Comments

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable for failing to honor a stop payment order or paying an item after an account has been closed on the ground that the drawee is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of another party to the check, most likely the payee or the collecting bank [see Com. Code § 4407; see also Bank of Costa Mesa v. Losack (1977) 74 Cal. App. 3d 287, 293-294, 141 Cal. Rptr. 550 (construing prior law)].

Com. Code § 4403(c) (set forth in § 34.45, Paragraph B) requires the drawer to establish the fact and amount of loss as a result of the drawee's failure to honor an order to stop payment or close the account. The difficulty of doing this when the drawer remains liable to some other party on the check has not been the subject of any California cases, but is discussed in Bender's U.C.C. Service, Commercial Paper, § 14.10[4] (Matthew Bender) [see also Swiss Credit Bank v. Balink (10th Cir. 1980) 614 F.2d 1269, 1271-1272 (drawee recredited drawer's account and recovered from payee under subrogation theory; underlying claim had been compromised and settled); Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp. v. Guaranty Bank & Tr. Co. (D. Mass. 1958) 161 F. Supp. 790, 792, 794-795 (drawer denied recovery from drawee, which was denied recovery from collecting bank on theory drawee was subrogated to collecting bank's right to recover, as holder in due course, from drawer)].

In addition, the Official Comments to the U.C.C. provide that in actions against the bank for wrongfully paying over a stop payment order, the bank will often defend on the ground that the drawer suffered no loss because it would have been liable to a holder in due course in any event. Although some cases have held that payment cannot be stopped against a holder in due course, the U.C.C. takes the position that the payment may be stopped but if it is, the drawer is liable and the bank is subrogated to the rights of the holder in due course [see Official Comment 7 to U.C.C. § 4-403; Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 4-407].

To protect personal privacy and other legitimate interests, parties and their attorneys must not include financial account numbers, or must redact such numbers when inclusion is necessary, in all pleadings and other papers filed in the court's public file, whether filed in paper or electronic form, unless otherwise provided by law or ordered by the court [Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 1.20(b)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the facts establishing the drawer's remaining liability to the other party, the equities in the bank's favor, and that the drawer would be unjustly enriched if the drawee were held liable.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to establish that the drawee is not liable for failing to honor the stop payment order or for paying an item after the account has been closed.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

Although generally the points and authorities in § 34.45 support the contention that the drawee is liable for failing to honor an order to stop payment or to close the account, Optional Paragraph E in § 34.45 may be used to oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for failing to honor a written stop payment order if the check was paid more than six months after receiving the order and the order was not renewed [see Com. Code § 4403(b)]. The points and authorities in § 34.57 may be used to oppose the contention that the drawee is liable for failure to honor a stop payment order on the ground that the notice or order came too late.

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.70

§ 34.70 Supporting Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Payee for Amount of Check Paid on Forged Endorsement [Com. Code § 3420]

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE AFTER PLAINTIFF RECEIVED DELIVERY OF THAT CHECK, PLAINTIFF's ENDORSEMENT ON THAT CHECK WAS FORGED AND DEFENDANT PAID THE PROCEEDS OF THE CHECK OTHER THAN TO PLAINTIFF.

A. Conversion. The law applicable to conversion of personal property applies to instruments. An instrument is also converted if it is taken by transfer, other than a negotiation, from a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or a bank makes or obtains payment with regard to the instrument for a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or to receive payment (Com. Code § 3420(a)).

B. Payee's Action Against Drawee for Conversion. Commercial Code Section 3420(a) covers cases in which a depositary or payor bank takes an instrument bearing a forged endorsement. Thus, if the amount of a check is paid on a forged endorsement to any person other than the designated payee [or a person to whom the check was negotiated], the drawee is liable to the designated payee [or other true owner] for converting the amount of the check [unless and until the payee or other true owner ratifies the collection of the check's proceeds by suing the collecting or depositary bank for conversion]. An action for conversion of an instrument may be brought by a payee who received delivery of the instrument either directly or through delivery to an agent or a copayee (see Com. Code § 3420(a)(2); Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990); Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 376-377, 381, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 (construing prior law)).

C. Presumed Damages for Conversion. In an action under Commercial Code Section 3420(a) for conversion, the measure of damages is presumed to be the amount payable on the instrument not exceeding the amount of plaintiff's interest in the instrument (Com. Code § 3420(b); Stenseth v. Wells Fargo (1995) 41 Cal. App. 4th 457, 465-466, 48 Cal. Rptr. 2d 192).

[Optional] D. Defense of Commercial Code Section 3420(c). A representative, other than a depositary bank, who has in good faith dealt with an instrument or its proceeds on behalf of one who was not the person entitled to enforce the instrument is not liable in conversion to that person beyond the amount of any proceeds that it has not paid out (Com. Code § 3420(c)).

[Optional] E. Defense of Commercial Code Section 3420(c) Inapplicable to Drawee. Commercial Code Section 3420(c) is limited to collecting banks other than the depositary bank. If the defense of Section 3420(c) applies to drawee banks, it would not protect them from liability for paying a check on a forged endorsement because the amounts a drawee bank forwards to a collecting bank on a forged endorsement do not constitute the proceeds of the instrument. Thus, the drawee is liable for the full amount of the check notwithstanding Commercial Code Section 3420(c) (see Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990); Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 376-377, 384-385, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

These points and authorities include citations to Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 376-377, 384-385, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 . This case was decided before the 1992 repeal and reenactment of Division 3 of the Commercial Code [Stats. 1992, ch. 914], and thus should be used with caution. Portions of the opinion appear to have been effectively abrogated. For example, Com. Code § 3420(a) clearly eliminates a drawer's cause of action for conversion and takes the position of other authority on this point [see § 34.70[2][d]; see also discussion in § 34.95]. In addition, Cooper may be suspect in that it does not make a distinction in plaintiff/payee conversion cases as to whether the payee took delivery of the check or whether the thief/forger obtained it first. This distinction is now crucial [see § 34.70[2][b]]. The decision, however, appears to remain persuasive in certain other areas and thus has been included in this form [see § 34.120[3][a]].

This form of points and authorities may be used to support the contention that a drawee bank is liable in conversion to the payee or other true owner of a check paid on a forged endorsement [see Com. Code § 3420(a)]. Under Com. Code § 3420, the payee may sue any bank in the collection chain but is of course limited to one recovery [see Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990); see also discussion in § 34.70[2][b]]. Under former Com. Code § 3419, the payee also had causes of action against both the collecting bank and the drawee bank but could only pursue one of them because the payee's commencement of an action against the collecting bank extinguished the drawee's liability. The rationale was that the payee's action against the depositary or collecting bank ratified the collection of the proceeds from the drawee bank [see Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 377, 384, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 ; see also § 34.73].

If there are joint payees, the drawee's liability to any one of them will be limited to the amount the drawer intended to be paid to that particular payee [see §§ 34.47, 34.121]. Paragraph E is for use to rebut any claim of defense under Com. Code § 3420(c), which is set forth in Paragraph D.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case; for example, facts describing the payee designation on the check, whether the check had been negotiated to any third person, the particular defect in the endorsement, and that the payee received delivery of the check but did not receive a replacement check or other duplicate payment from the drawer [see Com. Code § 4407 (set forth in § 34.58, regarding drawee's rights of subrogation)], nor commenced an action against the collecting or depositary bank that processed the check.

This form may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability to the payee for paying a check with a forged or defective endorsement.

[b] Requirement and Effect of Delivery in Payee Conversion Cases

Under Com. Code § 3420 the loss for paying a check on a forged endorsement falls on the one who gave value to the thief/forger. That is usually the depositary bank [see Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)]. However, if the forger stole the check before it was delivered to the payee, the payee never became the check's owner or holder, so the payee has no cause of action for conversion [Com. Code § 3420(a)(2)]. The payee may still enforce the underlying obligation [see Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

Once the payee has taken delivery of the check, however, the payee no longer can enforce the underlying obligation [see Com. Code § 3310(b)(4)], so the payee needs a cause of action for conversion. Thus, if the forger steals a check after it is delivered to the payee and forges the payee's endorsement, the payee has causes of action for conversion against all the banks in the collection chain, including the payor bank. Although the payee may sue any bank in the collection chain, Com. Code § 3420(c) makes it far more efficacious for the payee to sue the depositary bank. Each of the other banks in the collection chain is apt to defend on the ground of having paid the proceeds in good faith to one not entitled to enforce the instrument. However, a payee who sues both depositary and payor banks is entitled to only one recovery [see Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

[c] Measure of Bank's Liability

Under Com. Code § 3420(b), the measure of liability is the amount payable on the instrument and may not exceed the amount of the plaintiff's interest in the instrument. Com. Code § 3420(b), rather than Civ. Code § 3336 (allowing damages for the time and effort spent attempting to recover the converted property), applies to conversion actions involving negotiable instruments [see Stenseth v. Wells Fargo (1995) 41 Cal. App. 4th 457, 465-466, 48 Cal. Rptr. 2d 192] .

[d] Drawer Conversion Cases Under Revised Commercial Code

Under former Division 3 of the U.C.C. the cases were divided on the issue of whether the drawer of a check with a forged endorsement could assert rights against a depositary bank that took the check. Com. Code § 3420(a)(1) resolves the conflict by providing that a drawer has no cause of action in conversion. The reasoning is that the check represents the drawer's obligation rather than his or her property. Thus, the drawer's remedy is under Com. Code § 4401(a), for recredit of any unauthorized charge to his or her account for paying a check on a forged endorsement [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

[e] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94 address particular payee designations. See Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments , for forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.73 -34.75 oppose the contention that the drawee bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement on various grounds. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.120 -34.122 support, and those in §§ 34.124-34.126 oppose, the contention that the collecting bank is also liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47-34.48, 34.90-34.92, 34.95, 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Payee's Action Against Drawee for Conversion

One plaintiff in Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 , was an attorney whose secretary and bookkeeper, over a period of approximately a year and one-half, forged endorsements on 29 checks. The attorney, a joint venture of which the attorney was a member, clients of the attorney, and a company for which the attorney was receiver were payees on the checks. The company and the clients assigned their rights to the attorney. The joint venture partners were also plaintiffs. The secretary cashed some of the checks at defendants Union Bank and Crocker Citizens National Bank (hereinafter "Crocker") and deposited all but one of the remainder to her personal account at Crocker. The entire amount of those deposits was withdrawn before the forgeries were discovered. Plaintiffs sued the collecting and drawee banks for conversion under former Com. Code § 3419 (now see Com. Code § 3420). The trial court entered judgment for defendants in the belief that under former Com. Code § 3419(3) (now see Com. Code § 3420(c), set forth in Paragraph D) a bank that has dealt with an instrument in good faith and in accordance with reasonable commercial standards is not liable to the true owner beyond the amount of any proceeds remaining in its hands. The trial court also found that plaintiffs were negligent in failing to discover the forgeries before April 1, 1966, approximately six months after the first forgery, and that their negligence substantially contributed to the making of the subsequent forgeries. Under former Com. Code § 3406 (now see Com. Code § 3406 as amended by Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 6), the negligence was another basis for denying recovery of the checks presented after April 1, 1966. Plaintiffs appealed.

The Supreme Court reversed the judgment as to the collecting bank's liability on the seven checks presented before April 1, 1966, and in all other regards affirmed. Although the Court affirmed the judgment with regard to the checks cashed at defendant because they were presented after April 1, 1966, the cause of action was otherwise sound, and is discussed below. For a discussion of Cooper with regard to its opinion concerning the collecting bank's liability, see § 34.120.

All but three of the checks were paid by the drawee banks after being transferred for collection to defendant collecting banks. As indicated in the portion of the opinion discussed in § 34.73[3][a], the commencement of the action against the collecting banks ratified the drawees' payment of the proceeds to the collecting banks and provided those drawees with complete defenses. The remaining three checks were all drawn on Crocker; one was presented by a collecting bank that was not sued; and two were cashed at Crocker. First, the Court said that former Com. Code § 3419(3) (now see Com. Code § 3420(c)) was not intended to apply to a nondepositary drawee. The fact that former Com. Code § 3419(3) expressly included depositary and collecting banks but did not mention drawee banks created a strong negative inference in this regard. The Court cited numerous experts in the law of commercial paper and noted that none suggested that the defense of former Com. Code § 3419(3) was available to nondepositary drawee banks (9 Cal. 3d 371, 384-385, 385 n.18). Whether this conclusion is still valid in light of Com. Code § 3420(c), which provides that a representative "other than a depositary bank ..... is not liable in conversion ..... beyond the amount of any proceeds that it has not paid out" is questionable. It is clear that the Com. Code § 3420(c) defense is limited to collecting banks other than the depositary bank [Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)]. However, the Court's additional conclusion as discussed below, that even if the defense did apply to drawee banks it would not protect them, may remain persuasive.

Specifically, the Court said even assuming for argument that former Com. Code § 3419(3) was intended to apply to drawee banks, it would not afford them any protection in a case such as this. The amount a drawee bank transfers to a collecting bank on a forged endorsement does not constitute proceeds of the instrument unless and until the true owner ratifies the collection (9 Cal. 3d 371, 376-377, 384-385) . The amounts forwarded are not proceeds because the debtor-creditor relationship between the drawer and drawee allows the drawee to charge the drawer's account only at the drawer's direction. If the drawee pays any person other than the designated payee or a person to whom the check was negotiated, the drawee's indebtedness to the drawer is not diminished and the full amount of the check remains in the drawer's account. If the drawee does charge the drawer's account for payment on a forged endorsement, the drawer can compel the drawee to recredit the amount of the check. When the drawee pays on a forged endorsement, it does not part with the proceeds of the instrument but merely remits other funds of its own. When the true owner of the check brings an action against the collecting bank for conversion of a check collected on a forged endorsement, he or she is deemed to have ratified the collection of the proceeds from the drawee bank (9 Cal. 3d 371, 377) . It follows that absent such ratification, the proceeds remain in the drawee bank's hands and the drawee is consequently liable for the full amount of the instrument (9 Cal. 3d 371, 385) . In discussing the collecting banks' liability under various theories, the Court stated that a drawee bank is in effect strictly liable to the true owner if it pays an instrument on a forged endorsement (9 Cal. 3d 371, 381) . Nevertheless, the three checks considered were cashed after April 1, 1966, so plaintiffs' negligence barred recovery (9 Cal. 3d 371, 386) . The portion of the opinion considering the negligence defense of the drawee is discussed in § 34.74[2][b].

[b] Measure of Payee's Damages Against Bank

In Stenseth v. Wells Fargo (1995) 41 Cal. App. 4th 457, 48 Cal. Rptr. 2d 192 , the plaintiff's employee wrongfully took checks made payable to the plaintiff, forged his endorsement on them, and presented them to the bank, which paid them. The jury found for the plaintiff, the bank appealed, and the plaintiff cross-appealed on the ground that the trial court erred by excluding evidence of damages attributable to his efforts to determine his losses. He relied on Civ. Code § 3336, which provides that damages for conversion of personal property may include fair compensation for time and money properly expended in pursuit of the money. The court of appeal concluded that Com. Code § 3420(b), which provides that the measure of liability is the amount payable on the instrument and may not exceed the amount of the owner's interest in the instrument, applies to conversion actions involving negotiable instruments. Because no Commercial Code provision allows for the recovery of damages for time and effort spent attempting to recover the converted property, the trial court did not err in excluding that evidence (41 Cal. App. 4th 457, 465-466) .

[c] Defense of Commercial Code Section 3420(c) Inapplicable to Drawee

The facts, procedural background, and portion of the opinion in Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 , considering the application of this defense to the drawee, are discussed in § 34.70[3][a].

B. Drawee Bank's Liability To Payee

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.71

§ 34.71 Supporting Contention That Drawee or Paying Bank Is Liable to Payee for Retention of Check After Deadline and/or Failure to Give Notice of Nonpayment [Com. Code §§ 4104(a)(10), 4302; 12 C.F.R. §§ 210.9, 229.30, 229.33, 229.38]--In General

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT _____ [DRAWEE or PAYING] BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE DEFENDANT _____ [FAILED TO EXPEDITIOUSLY RETURN THAT CHECK AS REQUIRED BY FEDERAL RESERVE REGULATIONS and/or FAILED TO GIVE NOTICE OF NONPAYMENT AS REQUIRED BY FEDERAL RESERVE REGULATIONS and/or RETAINED THAT CHECK BEYOND _____ (THE CLOSE or MIDNIGHT) OF THE BANKING DAY ON WHICH DEFENDANT RECEIVED THAT CHECK WITHOUT _____ (one or more as applicable: SETTLING FOR (OR RETURNING) THE CHECK or GIVING NOTICE OF DISHONOR)].

A. Midnight Deadline (Demand Items). If an item is presented to and received by a payor bank, the bank is accountable for the amount of a demand item other than a documentary draft, whether properly payable or not, if the bank, in any case in which it is not also the depositary bank, retains the item beyond midnight of the banking day of receipt without settling for it or, whether or not it is also the depositary bank, does not pay or return the item or send notice of dishonor until after its midnight deadline (Com. Code § 4302(a)(1); see Bank of America v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1972) 23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 642-643, 100 Cal. Rptr. 438).

[EITHER]

[Optional] B. Federal Reserve Rule (Settlement and Payment). On the day a paying bank receives a cash item directly or indirectly from a Reserve Bank, it must settle for the item such that the proceeds of the settlement are available to its Administrative Reserve Bank by the close of Fedwire on that day, or it must return the item by the later of the close of the paying bank's banking day or the close of Fedwire. If the paying bank fails to settle for or return a cash item in accordance with the above rules, it is accountable for the amount of the item as of the close of its banking day or the close of Fedwire on the day it receives the item, whichever is earlier. [A paying bank is deemed to receive a cash item on its next banking day if it receives the item on a day other than a banking day for it; or on a banking day for it, but after a "cut-off hour" established by it in accordance with state law] (12 C.F.R. § 210.9(b)(1); see Community Bank v. Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco (9th Cir. 1974) 500 F.2d 282, 285-287, 286 n.11 , cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1089).

[OR]

[Optional] B. Federal Reserve Rule (Return). If a paying bank determines not to pay a check, it must return the check in an expeditious manner as provided in Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.30(a)(1) or (a)(2). Subject to the requirement for expeditious return, a paying bank may send a returned check to the depositary bank or to any other bank agreeing to handle the returned check expeditiously under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.31(a). [A paying bank may convert a check to a qualified returned check by encoding the returned check to conform to the requirements of this paragraph.] [This paragraph does not affect a paying bank's responsibility to return a check within the deadline required by the Uniform Commercial Code, Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 210 or Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.30(c)] (12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a)).

[CONTINUE]

[Optional] C. Deadline for Items Other Than Demand Items. If an item is presented to and received by a payor bank, the bank is accountable for the amount of any properly payable item other than a demand item that is not a documentary draft, unless, within the time allowed for acceptance or payment of that item, the bank either accepts or pays the item or returns it and the accompanying documents (Com. Code § 4302(a)(2)).

[Optional] D. Midnight Deadline Defined. "Midnight deadline" with regard to a bank is midnight on its next banking day following the banking day on which it receives the relevant item or notice or from which the time for taking action commences to run, whichever is later (Com. Code § 4104(a)(10)).

[Optional] E. Three-Year Limitation. An action against a drawee bank based on its failure to return an item within the time required by Commercial Code Section 4302 is subject to a three-year limitation period (Bank of America v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1972) 23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 644-646, 100 Cal. Rptr. 438).

[Optional] F. Two-Day/Four-Day Test. A paying bank returns a check in an expeditious manner if it sends the returned check in such a manner that the check would normally be received by the depositary bank not later than 4:00 P.M. (local time of the depositary bank) of the _____ [second business day following the banking day on which the check was presented to the paying bank if the paying bank is or fourth business day following the banking day on which the check was presented to the paying bank if the paying bank is not] located in the same check-processing region as the depositary bank. [If the last business day on which the paying bank may deliver a returned check to the depositary bank is not a banking day for the depositary bank, the paying bank meets the two-day/four-day test if the returned check is received by the depositary bank on or before the depositary bank's next banking day] (12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a)(1)).

[Optional] G. Forward Collection Test. A paying bank returns a check in an expeditious manner if it sends the returned check in a manner that a similarly situated bank would normally handle a check (1) of similar amount as the returned check, (2) drawn on the depositary bank, and (3) deposited for forward collection in the similarly situated bank by noon on the banking day following the banking day on which the check was presented to the paying bank (12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a)(2)).

[Optional] H. Extension of Deadline for Expeditious Delivery. The deadline for return or notice of nonpayment under the Uniform Commercial Code or Regulation J (12 C.F.R. Part 210) or Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.36(f)(2) is extended if a paying bank, in an effort to expedite delivery of a returned check to a bank, uses a means of delivery that ordinarily would result in the returned check being received by the bank to which it is sent on or before the receiving bank's next banking day following the otherwise applicable deadline by the earlier of the close of that banking day or a cutoff hour of 2 p.m. or later set by the receiving bank under Commercial Code Section 4108. The deadline is extended further if a paying bank uses a highly expeditious means of transportation, even if this means of transportation would ordinarily result in delivery after the receiving bank's next banking day (12 C.F.R. § 229.30(c)).

[Optional] I. Identification of Returned Check. A paying bank returning a check must clearly indicate on the check's face that it is a returned check and the reason for return. If the check is a substitute check, the paying bank must place this information within the image of the original check that appears on the front of the substitute check (12 C.F.R. § 229.30(d)).

[Optional] J. Notice in Lieu of Return. If a check is unavailable for return, the paying bank may send in its place a copy of the front and back of the returned check or, if no such copy is available, a written notice of nonpayment containing the information specified in Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.33(b). The copy or notice must clearly state that it constitutes notice in lieu of return. A notice in lieu of return is considered a returned check subject to the expeditious return requirements of this section and to the other requirements of Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) (12 C.F.R. § 229.30(f)).

[Optional] K. Additional Notice of Nonpayment of Large Item. If a paying bank determines not to pay a check in the amount of $2,500 or more, it must provide notice of nonpayment so that the notice is received by the depositary bank by 4:00 P.M. (local time) on the second business day following the banking day on which the check was presented to the paying bank. [If the day the paying bank is required to provide notice is not a banking day for the depositary bank, receipt of notice on the depositary bank's next banking day constitutes timely notice.] [Notice may be provided by any reasonable means, including the returned check, a writing (including a copy of the check), telephone, Fedwire, telex, or other form of telegraph.] The notice must include the name and routing number of the paying bank, the name of the payee(s), the check's amount, the date of the endorsement of the depositary bank, the account number of the depositary bank's customer(s), the branch name or number from the depositary bank's endorsement, the trace number associated with the depositary bank's endorsement, and the reason for nonpayment (12 C.F.R. § 229.33(a), (b)).

[Optional] L. Bank's Liability Under Regulation CC, Subpart C. A bank must exercise ordinary care and act in good faith in complying with Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.). A bank that fails to exercise ordinary care or to act in good faith under Subpart C may be liable to the depositary bank, the depositary bank's customer, the owner of the check, or another party to the check. The measure of damages for failure to exercise ordinary care is the amount of the loss incurred up to the check's amount, reduced by the amount of the loss that the party would have incurred even if the bank had exercised ordinary care. A bank that fails to act in good faith may be liable for other damages, if any, suffered by the party as a proximate consequence. This section does not affect a paying bank's liability to its customer under the Commercial Code or other law (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a)).

[Optional] M. Liability for Late Return. If a paying bank fails both to comply with Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.30(a) and to comply with the deadline for return under the Uniform Commercial Code (see Com. Code §§ 4301, 4302), Regulation J (12 C.F.R. Part 210) or Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section

229.30(c) in connection with a single nonpayment of a check, the paying bank is liable under either Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.30(a) or such other provision, but not both (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(b)).

[Optional] N. Responsibility of Paying Bank or Payable-Through Bank for Check. A paying bank or, in the case of a check payable through the paying bank and payable by another bank, the bank by which the check is payable, is responsible for damages under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.38(a) to the extent that the condition of the check when issued by it or its customer adversely affects the bank's ability to endorse the check legibly in accordance with Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.35. Responsibility under this paragraph is treated as negligence of the paying bank for purposes of Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.38(c) (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(d)(1)).

[Optional] O. Expeditious Return of Payable-Through Check. In the case of a check that is payable by a bank and payable through a paying bank located in a different check-processing region than the bank by which the check is payable, the bank by which the check is payable is responsible for damages under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.38(a) to the extent that the check is not returned to the depositary bank through the payable-through bank as quickly as the check would have been required to be returned under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.30(a) had the bank by which the check is payable (1) received the check as paying bank on the day the payable-through bank received the check and (2) returned the check as paying bank in accordance with Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.30(a)(1) (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(d)(2)).

[Optional] P. One-Year Limitation Under Regulation CC. An action under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.38 must be brought within one year after the date of the occurrence of the violation involved (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(g)).

[Optional] Q. Drawee Is Strictly Liable for Missing Midnight Deadline. A drawee is strictly liable for late return because the Uniform Commercial Code is designed to bar such fact-based theories of defense as negligence, fault, estoppel, intentional tort, or illegality of the underlying transaction in the overriding public interest of promulgating integrity, certainty, and finality of commercial transactions (Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1995) 31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 37 Cal. Rptr. 2d 389 ; Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. California Canadian Bank (1991) 1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 809-812, 2 Cal. Rptr. 2d 422 ; Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 1276-1280, 280 Cal. Rptr. 831).

CAUTION:

The authorities that are the basis of Optional Paragraph Q arose from transactions that occurred before 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(c) (regarding comparative negligence) was applicable [see § 34.76, Paragraph B].

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be used to support the contention that a drawee bank is liable to the payee (or a holder in due course or a collecting bank) for undue retention of a check that was presented to it [see Com. Code § 4302; 12 C.F.R. §§ 210.9(b), 229.30, 229.33]. Although the term "drawee bank" has been used in the title of this form, Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. Part 229) applies to paying banks, which includes not only the drawee, but any bank at which a check is payable and to which it is sent for payment or collection. When the check is not payable by a bank, for instance when the check is drawn on a credit union, the bank through which the check is payable and to which it is sent for payment or collection is considered the paying bank [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(z) (discussed in the § 34.03[7]].

Drawee or paying financial institutions are subject to deadlines in the forward collection process established by Com. Code §§ 4301 and 4302, by Regulation J (12 C.F.R. Part 210), and by Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. Part 229). This form addresses Com. Code § 4302 and Regulations CC and J (12 C.F.R. Parts 210 and 229). Com. Code § 4301 is discussed in § 34.77. Except for the extension permitted by 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(c), 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 (Paragraphs B, F-H, I, and J) does not relieve a paying bank from the obligation to comply with the timely return requirements of Com. Code §§ 4301 and 4302, but 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(b) (Paragraph M) provides that a paying bank is not subject to liability under both the Commercial Code and Regulation CC. Thus, the payee or other bank can only recover under one provision [see 12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to §§ 229.30(a) and 229.36(a) (Com. Code § 4301 not applicable to payable-through or payable-at bank)]. It is noteworthy that there is only a one-year limitation period for an action under Regulation CC, compared to a three-year limitation period for an action based on a violation of Com. Code § 4302 (Paragraphs E, P). Still, at many stages of the litigation, counsel may be concerned to establish liability both for failure to comply with Com. Code § 4302 and for failure to comply with 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30 and*/or 229.33*. Com. Code § 4302(a) (Paragraph A) has been superseded by 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30(d), (f), and 229.33(b) (Paragraphs I-K) with regard to the form of notice of dishonor [see 12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to §§ 229.30(d), (f), 229.33].

Paragraphs A and C-E set forth the Commercial Code rules and definitions. First alternative Paragraph B sets forth the Regulation J rule regarding interbank settlements. The second alternative Paragraph B and Paragraphs F-P address the requirements and definitions of Regulation CC. Paragraph A states the Commercial Code rule for checks and demand items other than documentary drafts [see Valenzuela v. Bank of America (1969) 272 Cal. App. 2d 673, 677, 77 Cal. Rptr. 609 (deadline for documentary drafts)]. Paragraph C sets forth the Commercial Code rule for other items. Paragraph D sets forth the Commercial Code definition of midnight deadline, and Paragraph E sets forth the applicable limitation period for an action against the drawee based on undue retention of an item presented for payment.

Optional Paragraphs B set forth the settlement, or payment, rule under Regulation J and the basic return rule for paying banks under Regulation CC. If the paying bank did neither, counsel for a payee may prefer to assert liability under Regulation CC (second alternative Paragraph B) rather than under Regulation J (first alternative Paragraph B), because there is only dicta that Regulation J (12 C.F.R. § 210) applies to payees and nonmember banks, while Regulation CC specifies that payees (and other parties to the check) can recover for unexpeditious return [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.38]. The second alternative Paragraph B can be used with one or more of optional Paragraphs F-K, N, or O, depending on the particular ways in which the bank's performance failed to conform to the regulatory requirements. Paragraphs L and M are for use when the extent of the bank's liability is at issue. Paragraph P is for use to establish that an action under Regulation CC is timely. Optional Paragraph Q is for use to foreclose relevancy of any fact-based defenses, although it is not clear whether 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(c) [see § 34.76, Paragraph B] dilutes this strict liability rule.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of the case. Thus, counsel should describe the check, the time and channels through which it was presented, whether, and if so, when and how it was returned. Counsel may wish to attach a copy of any notice of return or of the face and back of the check because stamps on the back or face of the check may indicate dates on which various processing steps were taken [see Com. Code § 3505(a)(2); Security Pac. Nat. Bank v. Associated Motor Sales (1980) 106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 177, 165 Cal. Rptr. 38 (presumption created by stamps; construing prior law); see also § 34.78].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability for undue retention of a check.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

A drawee bank's duties regarding a check's return on the second and successive presentments are addressed in § 34.72.

The points and authorities in § 34.76 may be used to oppose those in this form.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Midnight Deadline (Demand Items)

Although Com. Code § 4302(a) is phrased in terms of a payor bank's duties, a payor bank is a drawee bank [see Com. Code § 4105(3) (discussed in § 34.03[6])]. The term "banking day" used in Com. Code § 4302(a)(1) is defined by Com. Code § 4104(a)(3) as the part of a day on which a bank is open to the public for carrying on substantially all of its banking functions.

A payor bank's liability to pay an item under the midnight deadline rule of Com. Code § 4302(a) is subject to defenses based on breach of a presentment warranty (Com. Code § 4208) or proof that the person seeking enforcement of the liability presented or transferred the item for the purpose of defrauding the payor bank [Com. Code § 4302(b)].

Plaintiff in Bank of America v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1972) 23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 100 Cal. Rptr. 438 , was assignee of the payees of seven sight drafts. Plaintiff took the seven sight drafts, which were drawn on defendant, in due course of business without notice of infirmities. The opinion set forth the relevant times of presentment of only one draft, saying it was illustrative. The draft was dated December 12, 1965, was endorsed by the payee and deposited in plaintiff on December 28. On January 3, 1966, plaintiff presented it to defendant for payment as a cash item. Although the drawers had sufficient money in their account to pay the draft, defendant returned it on January 4 without a separate notice of dishonor or any reason for the return. This type of return constitutes sufficient dishonor under former Com. Code § 4301(3) (now see Com. Code § 4301(c)) (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 642) . Plaintiff re-presented the draft on January 4. It was returned unpaid on March 23, 1966. All the drafts involved in the action had been re-presented more than three years and less than four years before the action's commencement. Judgment was entered for defendant after a demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The only issue on appeal was the statute of limitations. Defendant contended that the applicable limitation period was the three-year limitation of former Code Civ. Proc. § 338(1) (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 338(a)) for liability created by statute or the three-year limitation of former Code Civ. Proc. § 338(3) (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 338(c)) for conversion. Plaintiff contended that the action was governed by the four-year limitation of Code Civ. Proc. § 337(1) as an action on a contract or a liability founded on an instrument in writing (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 640) . The court of appeal set forth Com. Code § 4302(a) and said Com. Code § 4301 (set forth in § 34.77) makes clear that the drawee bank has until its midnight deadline to act. The court then set forth the definition of midnight deadline and said that former Com. Code § 3104(2)(a) (now see Com. Code § 3104(e)) brings sight drafts within the definition of demand items for the purpose of Com. Code § 4302(a) (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 642) . The court noted that there were no California cases on point, but cited cases from other states that construed language identical to Com. Code § 4302 to provide a basis for a statutory cause of action for the amount of the demand item involved (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 642-643) . Those courts have construed the word "accountable" in Com. Code § 4302 to be synonymous with "liable," and have imposed liability on the payor (drawee) bank for the amount of an item if it delays return of the item beyond its midnight deadline. The court of appeal also cited California code comments to the effect that Com. Code § 4302 imposes liability on a bank that fails to act by its midnight deadline. The court, saying that it was mindful of the need for uniformity in interpreting the Commercial Code's provision, agreed with the authorities from other states that Com. Code § 4302 creates a liability independent of negligence or conversion for the amount of the item involved. The returns on the first presentment of each item were timely, so they did not give rise to any cause of action (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 643) .

The court then said it did not need to address the issue of whether liability created under Com. Code § 4302 is equally applicable to a second presentment of a previously returned draft [see § 34.72], because even if Com. Code § 4302 was applicable to the second presentment, the cause of action created on the second presentment would be governed by the three-year limitation of former Code Civ. Proc. § 338(1) (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 338(a)) as a liability created by statute (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 643-644) . A drawee is not liable on a draft until it accepts it, and under former Com. Code § 3410 (now see Com. Code § 3409), the drawee's acceptance must be in writing. The court would not allow plaintiff to bootstrap itself around the specific code provisions by using custom to create an oral acceptance and then using that acceptance to convert the cause of action to one on the written instrument, which would be governed by the four-year limitation (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 645-646) . The court concluded that the sustaining of the demurrer was proper on the basis of the three-year statute of limitations (23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 646) .

[b] Federal Reserve Rule (Settlement and Payment)

For purposes of Regulation J, a cash item is a check, other than one classified as a noncash item, or any other item payable on demand and collectible at par that the Reserve Bank in the District in which the item is payable is willing to accept as a cash item [12 C.F.R. § 210.2(g)]. A noncash item is one that the receiving Reserve Bank classifies in its operating circulars as requiring special handling [12 C.F.R. § 210.2(k)] "Banking day" for purposes of Regulation J is a day during which a bank is open to the public for carrying on substantially all its banking functions [12 C.F.R. § 210.2(f)].

Regulation J deadlines are applicable even to banks that are not members of the Federal Reserve system if they process items through Federal Reserve clearinghouse exchanges [Community Bank v. Federal Reserve Bk. of San Francisco (9th Cir. 1974) 500 F.2d 282, 286-287 , cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1089] .

Community Bank v. Federal Reserve Bk. of San Francisco (9th Cir. 1974) 500 F.2d 282 , was an action for injunctive relief by state banks that were not members of the Federal Reserve System, but used checks imprinted with Federal Reserve routing numbers and forwarded checks for collection through the Federal Reserve Clearinghouse. Plaintiffs protested the June 1972 amendments to Regulation J, which required them to process items faster than required by Com. Code §§ 4301 and 4302. The Ninth Circuit held that former Com. Code § 4103(1) (now see Com. Code § 4103(a)) allows Commercial Code provisions to be modified by agreement, that Federal Reserve regulations and operating circulars have the status of agreements, even if not specifically assented to by all parties interested in the items handled [Com. Code § 4103(b)], and that by forwarding items to Federal Reserve banks for collection, nonmember banks are bound by the regulations and circulars (500 F.2d 282, 286-287) . In dicta, the court cited California Commercial Code comments to the effect that under prior law, clearinghouse rules did not govern the rights of a drawer and a payee who were not members of the clearinghouse and who did not contract with express reference to those rules, and opined that the comment's reference to the rights of drawers and payees under prior law suggests that the adoption of the Commercial Code has changed that result (500 F.2d 282, 286) .

[c] Federal Reserve Rule (Return)

As used in the federal Expedited Funds Availability Act (12 U.S.C. § 4001 et seq.) and Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. § 229.1 et seq.), "bank" means just about every conceivable type of organization that accepts deposits: banks, savings banks, mutual savings banks, credit unions, savings and loan associations, building and loan associations, homestead associations, cooperative banks, insurance companies, trust companies, industrial loan companies, or any other institution in the business of receiving deposits, whether organized under federal or state law [see 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.2(e) (defining "bank"), 4001(12) (defining "depository institution")].

For a drawee bank, the requirement of expeditious return under 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 is in addition to the requirement of timely return under Com. Code § 4302 and in addition to the requirements of Regulation J [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a); 12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(a)].

The expeditious return requirement of 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a) does not apply if the paying bank is unable to identify the depositary bank. Then, the paying bank may send the returned check to any bank that handled the check in the forward collection process, as long as the paying bank advises that bank that it is unable to identify the depositary bank [12 C.F.R. § 229.30(b)] 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(b) does not relieve a paying bank from liability for the lack of expeditious return if the paying bank itself is responsible for the inability to identify the depositary bank, for instance when the paying bank's customer has used a check with printing or other material on the back in the areas reserved for the depositary bank's endorsement, making the endorsement unreadable [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(b)]. 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(b) does not relieve a paying bank of the obligations of Com. Code § 4301[12 C.F.R. pt. 229 app. E, commentary to § 229.30(b)].

Under Com. Code §§ 3418(c) and 4215(a), late return constitutes payment and would be final in favor of a holder in due course or a person who has in good faith changed his or her position in reliance on the payment. This requirement is retained to give a paying bank an additional incentive to make a prompt return [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(a)].

[d] Three-Year Limitation

Bank of America v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1972) 23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 100 Cal. Rptr. 438 , is discussed in § 34.71[3][a].

[e] Two-Day/Four-Day Test

"Banking day" under Regulation CC means that part of any business day on which an office of a bank is open to the public for carrying on substantially all of its banking functions [12 C.F.R. § 229.2(f)].

"Business day" under Regulation CC means a calendar day other than a Saturday, Sunday, or legal holiday [12 U.S.C. § 4001(3); 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(g)]. The Federal Reserve holidays, and thus holidays for purposes of the Expedited Funds Availability Act and Regulation CC, are January 1, the third Monday in January, the third Monday in February, the last Monday in May, July 4, the first Monday in September, the second Monday in October, November 11, the fourth Thursday in November, and December 25. If January 1, July 4, November 11, or December 25 fall on a Sunday, the next Monday is not a business day [12 C.F.R. § 229.2(g)].

The two-day/four-day test does not necessarily require actual receipt of the check by the depositary bank within these times. Rather, the paying bank must send the check so that the check would normally be received by the depositary bank within the specified time. Thus, the paying bank is not responsible for unforeseeable delays in the check's return, such as transportation delays [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(a)(1)].

[f] Forward Collection Test

The definition of banking day is set forth in § 34.71[3][e].

A "similarly situated bank" means a bank of similar size, located in the same community, and with similar check-handling activities as the paying bank or returning bank [12 C.F.R. § 229.2(ee)].

[g] Extension of Deadline for Expeditious Delivery

12 C.F.R. § 229.30(c) extends the paying bank's midnight deadline under Com. Code §§ 4301 and 4302 and Regulation J (12 C.F.R. § 210.12). The extension is designed to speed up the overall return of checks; no modification or extension of the expeditious return requirement of 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a) is required [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(c)]. For instance, a paying bank that uses a courier that leaves after midnight to deliver its forward collection checks may send its return checks by the same courier. The extension removes the constraint of the midnight deadline if the returned check reaches the receiving bank on or before the receiving bank's next banking day following the otherwise applicable deadline by the earlier of the close of that banking day or a cutoff hour of 2 p.m. or later set by the receiving bank under Com. Code § 4108. The extension also applies if the check reaches the bank to which it is sent later than the time described in the preceding sentence, if highly expeditious means of transportation are used. For example, a west coast bank may use this further extension to ship a returned check by air directly to an east coast returning bank even if the check arrives after the returning bank's cutoff hour [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(c)].

[h] Identification of Returned Check

The reason for the return must be clearly indicated [12 C.F.R. § 229.30(d)]. A check is identified as a returned check if the front of that check indicates the reason for return, even if it does not specifically state that the check is a returned check. A reason such as "Refer to Maker" is permissible in appropriate cases. If the returned check is a substitute check, the reason for return must be placed within the image of the original check that appears on the front of the substitute check so that the information is retained on any subsequent substitute check. If the paying bank places the returned check in a carrier envelope, the carrier envelope should indicate that it is a returned check but need not repeat the reason for return stated on the check if it in fact appears on the check [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(d)].

[i] Notice in Lieu of Return

The requirements of 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(f) supersede the requirement of Com. Code § 4301(a) as to the form of and information required of a notice of dishonor or nonpayment [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(f)].

12 C.F.R. § 229.30(f) applies when a check is lost or otherwise unavailable for return. If no copy of the check is available, the written notice must contain the information specified in 12 C.F.R. § 229.33(b) (set forth in Paragraph J). The copy or written notice must clearly indicate that it is a substitute for the returned check. Notice by telephone, telegraph, or other electronic transmission other than a legible facsimile or similar image transmission of both sides of the check does not satisfy the requirements of 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(f) [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(f)].

12 C.F.R. § 229.34(a)(4) includes a warranty that the original check has not been and will not be returned if a notice in lieu has been returned [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(f)].

The notice in lieu of return is subject to the provisions of 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 and is treated like a returned check for settlement purposes. If the original check is over $2,500, the notice of nonpayment required by 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 (Paragraph J) is still required, but may be satisfied by the notice in lieu of return if the notice meets the time and information requirements of 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.30(f)].

[j] Additional Notice of Nonpayment of Large Item

The Regulation CC definitions of banking day and business day are set forth in § 34.71[3][e].

The notice of nonpayment required by 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 and written notice in lieu of return as provided in 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(f) serve different functions; however, the two kinds of notice must meet the content requirements of 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.33(a)].

Because the return of the check itself may serve as the required notice of nonpayment, in many cases no notice other than the check's return will be necessary; however, if the returned check would not normally be received within the time limits for the notice, return of the check will not be sufficient [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, Commentary to § 229.33(a)]. Unless the returned check is used to satisfy the notice requirement, the requirement for notice is independent of and does not affect the requirements for timely and expeditious return of the check under Com. Code § 4302 and 12 C.F.R. § 229.30. If a paying bank fails both to comply with 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 and to comply with the requirements for timely and expeditious return of the check under Com. Code § 4302, Regulation J, and 12 C.F.R. § 229.30, it is liable under either 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 or the other requirements, but not both [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to §

A paying bank is not responsible for failure to give notice of nonpayment to a party that has breached a presentment warranty under Com. Code § 4208, notwithstanding that the paying bank may have returned the check [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.33(a)].

If the paying bank cannot identify the depositary bank from the check itself, it may send the notice of nonpayment to the earliest collecting bank it can identify and indicate that the notice is not being sent to the depositary bank. The collecting bank may be able to identify the depositary bank and forward the notice, but it is under no obligation to do so [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.33(b)].

A bank must identify an item of information if the bank is uncertain as to that item's accuracy. A bank may make this identification by setting the item off with question marks, asterisks, or other symbols designated for this purpose by generally applicable industry standards [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.33(b)].

[k] Bank's Liability Under Regulation CC, Subpart C

The standard of care set forth in 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a) applies to a paying bank under 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30 and 229.33. The standard is similar to the standard imposed by Com. Code § 1304 (good faith) and Com. Code § 4103(a). The measure of damages stated derives from Com. Code §§ 4103(e) and 4202(c) [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.38(a)].

However, 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a) does not affect a paying bank's liability to its customer for wrongful dishonor, which is different from failure to exercise ordinary care and has a different measure of damages [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.38(a); for discussion of wrongful dishonor liability, see § 34.43].

Limitations on liability provided in 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a), (c)-(f), (h) are set forth in § 34.76.

12 C.F.R. § 229.38(b) clarifies that a bank could be liable for failure to meet either the Commercial Code standard or the 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 standard, but not for failure to meet both. The regulation intends to preserve the paying bank's "accountability" for missing its midnight deadline or other deadlines under the Commercial Code provisions, such as Com. Code § 4215, that are not incorporated in this regulation, but may be useful in establishing the time of final payment by the paying bank [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.38(b)].

[m] Responsibility of Paying Bank or Payable-Through Bank for Check

A paying bank, or in the case of a check payable through the paying bank and payable by another bank, the bank by which the check is payable, is responsible for the check's condition when it is issued by it or its customer. Thus, the paying bank would be responsible for the adverse effect, if any, of a carbon band or other material placed on the back of the check before issuance [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.38(d)(1)].

[n] Expeditious Return of Payable-Through Check

Under 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(d)(2), a payable-through check must be returned by the payable-through bank within the time necessary to meet the requirements of the two-day/four-day test, as if the bank by which it is payable received the check as paying bank on the day the payable-through bank received it [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.38(d)(2)]. Responsibility under 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(d)(2) does not include responsibility for the time required for the forward collection of a check to the payable-through bank. Generally, liability under 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(d)(2) will be limited in amount. Under 12 C.F.R. § 229.33(a), if a paying bank returns a check in the amount of $2,500 or more and it is not returned through the payable-through bank as quickly as would have been required had the check been received by the bank by which it is payable, the depositary bank would not suffer damages unless it had not received timely notice of nonpayment. Thus, ordinarily the bank by which a payable-through check is payable would be liable under 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a) only for checks in amounts up to $2,500; and the paying bank would be responsible for notice of nonpayment for checks in the amount of $2,500 or more [12 C.F.R. pt. 229, app. E, commentary to § 229.38(d)(2)].

[o] Drawee Is Strictly Liable for Missing Midnight Deadline

Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1995) 31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 37 Cal. Rptr. 2d 389 , was an action by a depository bank against the drawee of 28 checks, deposited in three batches over a period of several days, for failure to return the checks or give notice before the midnight deadline. The court of appeal reversed the summary judgment in defendant's favor, and the matter was remanded to the trial court in a published opinion [see Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 280 Cal. Rptr. 831 , discussed below]. On remand, the trial court entered judgment in favor of the depository bank and defendant again appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed the judgment in favor of the depository bank (31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 729) . Reiterating its reasoning in Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 280 Cal. Rptr. 831 (discussed below), the court held that the payor bank was strictly liable to the depository bank for the amount of the checks (despite the alleged fraud of the depository bank in cashing the checks without first verifying that there were adequate funds in the payor bank's account from which the checks were drawn) because the payor bank missed the statutory deadline (31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 742-744) . Although the Legislature apparently subsequently decided that fraud should not be exempted as a defense and adopted an amendment to that effect [see Com. Code § 4302; Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 38], since the acts in question occurred in 1986 the court held that fraud and the other defenses raised by the payor bank were irrelevant (31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 744) .

The court also held that the statutory midnight deadline begins to run when the Federal Reserve makes the checks available for pickup, rather than when the payor bank actually receives the checks from its courier (31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 739-740) . Quoting from its earlier decision, discussed below, the court reasoned that since the purpose of the midnight deadline rule is to ensure prompt notification, if the deadline did not begin to run until the bank or its agent actually decided to pick up the checks from the Federal Reserve, the bank could "defeat the protection sought to be afforded by imposing strict deadlines for final payment or 'dishonor' " (31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 739) .

Finally, the court held that the statutory midnight deadline was not met when the payor bank's tellers orally informed the teller at the depository bank that the account from which the checks were drawn did not have any funds. For the reasons enunciated in Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 1280, 280 Cal. Rptr. 831 , discussed below, the court concluded that the statute required written notice of dishonor (31 Cal. App. 4th 726, 740-741) .

Plaintiff in Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. California Canadian Bank (1991) 1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 2 Cal. Rptr. 2d 422 , was escrow agent for numerous transactions originated by a mortgage broker for a condominium conversion project. The mortgage broker and the developer engaged in massive check fraud, involving about $300 million over the course of two years. This litigation involved 28 checks, totalling $17 million that were issued to plaintiff as payee and drawn on defendant. Defendant did not pay the checks, but failed to return them before the midnight deadline. Judgment was for plaintiff and defendant appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. Defendant drawee relied on an ambiguous former rule of the California Bankers Clearing House Association to claim that the returns were timely because the items left the branches where the drawer maintained its accounts before the midnight deadline. The court noted that the actual cause of the late returns was the bank's clearing procedure. Furthermore, any interpretation other than one requiring arrival at the clearinghouse or collecting bank before the midnight deadline would have been inconsistent with prior law and banking practice (1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 804-808, 810) .

The checks were apparently part of a "kite," in which one of plaintiff's lower level operatives was allegedly involved. Nevertheless, the court noted that the defendant-drawee knew for months that the checks were apparently not backed by sufficient funds, and did nothing in time to stop the defrauders (1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 812-813) . Defendant drawee raised several defenses, including estoppel, waiver, unclean hands, and restitution. The court relied on Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 1278-1280, 280 Cal. Rptr. 831 (discussed below), and SOS Oil v. Norstar Bank of Long Island (1990) 76 N.Y.2d 561, 561 N.Y.S. 2d 887, 890, 563 N.E.2d 258 , in holding that a drawee is strictly liable for late return (1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 809-810) . Com. Code § 4302 places a heavy burden on paying banks, but that burden serves important commercial purposes: it expedites the collection process by motivating banks to process instruments quickly and firms up the provisional credits received by each bank in the collection chain, thereby supplying a key element of certainty in commercial paper transactions (1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 810) . The court said it was important to bear in mind in this context that the Uniform Commercial Code is designed to banish from the law governing timely return of dishonored checks such fact-based theories of liability and defense as negligence, fault, estoppel, intentional tort, or illegality of the underlying transaction in the overriding public interest of promulgating integrity, certainty, and finality of commercial transactions (1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 811) . The Uniform Commercial Code establishes a more mechanical system based only on facts unlikely to be disputed in litigation, such as the date stamped on a check on its receipt, the date it was returned or dishonored, or whether the check was not readable by a computer or was presented posthumously for payment (1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 811-812) . Mindful of the importance of securing uniformity, the court was loath to disturb the carefully circumscribed, determinate, and articulated system with its own interpretation, especially because the system apparently results from the deliberate intention of its drafters (1 Cal. App. 4th 798, 812) .

Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Bank of Canton (1991) 229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 280 Cal. Rptr. 831 , was an action by a depositary bank against the drawee of 28 checks, deposited in three batches over a period of several days, for failure to return the checks or give notice of dishonor before the midnight deadline. The court of appeal reversed the judgment in defendant's favor, holding as a matter of first impression in California that a drawee may be held strictly liable under Com. Code § 4302(a) for its failure to return checks by the applicable deadline, regardless of whether any actual damages suffered by the other party were solely a result of the drawee's failure to comply with Com. Code § 4302 (229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 1277-1278) . Com. Code § 1103(b) does not serve to incorporate general principles of law, such as the defense that a party's loss was caused by its own negligence, because Com. Code § 1103(b) applies "unless displaced by the particular provisions of this code," and the strict liability rule of Com. Code § 4302 does displace the defense that a party's loss was caused by its own negligence. Here the depositary's employee gave cash exceeding her authorized limit against uncollected deposited items (229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 1278) . For purposes of calculating the midnight deadline, the processor to which the drawee had the Federal Reserve clearinghouse deliver its checks was its agent, and defendant "received" the checks for purposes of its compliance with Com. Code § 4302 when they were delivered to the processor (229 Cal. App. 3d 1267, 1280) .

B. Drawee Bank's Liability To Payee

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.72

§ 34.72 Supporting Contention That Drawee or Paying Bank Is Liable to Payee for Retention of Check After Deadline and/or Failure to Give Notice of Nonpayment [Com. Code §§ 4104(a)(10), 4302; 12 C.F.R. §§ 210.9, 229.30, 229.33, 229.38]--Liability for Undue Retention on Second Presentment of Previously Returned Item

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT _____ [DRAWEE or PAYING] BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE, WHEN THAT CHECK WAS PRESENTED TO DEFENDANT FOR THE _____ [specify, e.g., SECOND] TIME ON _____ [date], DEFENDANT _____ [FAILED TO EXPEDITIOUSLY RETURN THAT CHECK AS REQUIRED BY TITLE 12 OF THE CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS SECTION 229.30 and/or FAILED TO GIVE NOTICE OF NONPAYMENT AS REQUIRED BY TITLE 12 OF THE CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS SECTION 229.33 and/or RETAINED THAT CHECK BEYOND _____ (THE CLOSE or MIDNIGHT) OF THE BANKING DAY ON WHICH DEFENDANT RECEIVED THAT CHECK WITHOUT _____ (one or more as applicable: SETTLING FOR (OR RETURNING) THE CHECK or GIVING NOTICE OF DISHONOR)].

Duties on Re-Presentment. California has adopted the majority and better-reasoned rule that duties and liabilities of a drawee bank the first time a check is presented to it for payment are equally applicable to second and successive presentments of previously returned items. Thus, a _____ [drawee and/or paying] bank that does not pay, expeditiously return, or give notice of dishonor or nonpayment of a re-presented check within the applicable time period is liable for the amount of the check (see Com. Code § 4302; 12 C.F.R. §§ 210.9(b), 229.30, 229.33; Huntmix, Inc. v. Bank of America (1982) 134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 349, 359, 361, 184 Cal. Rptr. 551).

[2] Comments

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a drawee or paying bank is liable to the payee, holder in due course, or collecting bank for undue retention of a previously presented check that, on a second or successive presentment, was retained beyond the applicable deadline without the drawee or paying bank's settling for it, expeditiously returning it, or sending timely notice of dishonor or nonpayment [see Com. Code § 4302; 12 C.F.R. §§ 210.9(b), 229.30, 229.33 (set forth in § 34.71)]. Although the term "drawee bank" has been used in the title of this form, Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. Part 229) applies to paying banks, which includes not only the drawee, but any bank at which a check is payable and to which it is sent for payment or collection. When the check is not payable by a bank, for instance when the check is drawn on a credit union, the bank through which the check is payable and to which it is sent for payment or collection is considered the paying bank [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(z)(4) (discussed in § 34.03[7])].

The case on which this form is based discussed the issue only in terms of Com. Code § 4302(a), because the court of appeal concluded that Regulation J imposed no additional duties on the defendant in that case, and Regulation CC had not yet been promulgated [see Huntmix, Inc. v. Bank of America (1982) 134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 355 n.11, 184 Cal. Rptr. 551] . Regulation CC became effective on September 1, 1988. Still, it appears that the reasoning of the case would apply not only to the Commercial Code obligations, but also to those imposed by Regulations CC and J. The drawee or paying bank's liability to the payee may be more easily established under Regulation CC than under Regulation J because there is only dicta that Regulation J (12 C.F.R. § 210) applies to payees and nonmember banks [see Community Bank v. Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco (9th Cir. 1974) 500 F.2d 282, 285-287, 286 n.11 , cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1089 , discussed in § 34.71[3][b]], while Regulation CC specifies that payees (and other parties to the check) can recover for unexpeditious return or failure to provide timely notice of nonpayment of a large item [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a)]. Furthermore, the drawee would be liable in conversion if it refused on demand to return an item delivered to it for acceptance [see Com. Code §§ 3409(a) ("acceptance" defined, set forth in § 34.49), 3420 (set forth in § 34.70)].

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. Thus, counsel should describe the check, the time and channels through which it was presented and represented, and as to the presentment on which liability is premised, whether, and if so, when and how it was returned. Counsel may wish to attach copies of the face and back of the check because stamps on the back or face of the check may indicate dates on which various processing steps were taken. Counsel may need to rebut the presumption arising from those stamps [see Com. Code § 3505(a)(2); Security Pac. Nat. Bank v. Associated Motor Sales (1980) 106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 177, 165 Cal. Rptr. 38 (discussed in § 34.78[3][a])].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's liability for undue retention of a previously returned check.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The statute of limitations applicable to an action based on undue retention is addressed in § 34.71. The points and authorities set out in § 34.71 support, and those in §§ 34.77-34.78 oppose, the contention that the drawee bank is liable for late return.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Duties on Re-Presentment

Plaintiff in Huntmix, Inc. v. Bank of America (1982) 134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 184 Cal. Rptr. 551 , was payee of a check drawn on defendant. The first time the check was presented to defendant, it was dishonored for lack of sufficient funds.

The second time the check was presented, it was not paid or returned, and no notice of dishonor was given within the time specified by Com. Code § 4302 (set forth in § 34.71). The trial court sustained defendant's demurrer, without leave to amend, on the basis of dicta in Bank of America v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1972) 23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 643-644, 100 Cal. Rptr. 438 (discussed in § 34.71[3][a]), and authorities from Kansas that there is no requirement of dishonor on the second presentment. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed, saying that there was no dispositive California decision, that there was a split of authority in the jurisdictions that had considered the issue, and that the weight of such authority and the better rationale favors treating re-presented checks in the same fashion as checks presented for the first time (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 349, 359) . The court set forth the provisions of Com. Code § 4302(a) and former Com. Code § 4104(1)(h) (now see Com. Code § 4104(a)(10)) (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 349-350) , and noted that the applicability of Com. Code § 4302 to re-presentment of checks previously returned for insufficient funds has been considered by several cases that were decided after Bank of America v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1972) 23 Cal. App. 3d 638, 100 Cal. Rptr. 438 (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 351) .

The rationale for not requiring timely notice of dishonor on the second presentment is that under former Com. Code § 3511(4) (now see Com. Code § 3502(f)), when a draft is dishonored by nonacceptance, later presentment and notice of dishonor are excused. Under that rationale, the reason for the imposition of sanctions under Com. Code § 4302 dissipates once the drawee has timely discharged its duties on the first presentment (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 350-351) . In the case of checks once dishonored for insufficient funds, the rationale only applies to a second presentment while the (drawer's) account remains insufficient. Additionally, this rationale has also been limited to checks dishonored by nonacceptance (i.e., returned unpaid, but without notice of dishonor) (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 353) .

Cases cited by the court of appeal for the rationale that timely notice of dishonor is required on the re-presentment considered the fact that former Com. Code § 3511(4) (now see Com. Code § 3502(f)) does not apply to demand items, but only to time drafts (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 354) ; that a significant number of previously dishonored checks are paid on re-presentment (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 355) ; and that it is necessary for the drawee to be subject to the same duties on re-presentment as on the original presentment in order not to put an undue burden on the depositary and other banks in the collection chain that need to know when their time has expired to revoke provisional settlements (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 356) [see Com. Code § 4301 (set forth in § 34.77, regarding provisional settlement)]. The court found an additional reason to require notice of dishonor or return on the second presentment in the fact that former Com. Code § 4108(1) (now see Com. Code § 4109(a)), which allows good faith extension of time limits imposed or permitted by the Commercial Code, does not apply to drawee banks (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 359) . The court also noted that the limitation of the minority rule to checks that were dishonored by nonacceptance meant that checks dishonored for insufficient funds would not fall within its purview and would require timely notice of dishonor on the second presentment. The court found the most persuasive argument to be the one regarding the practicalities of the situation (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 360) . The court considered other arguments and adopted the majority rule (134 Cal. App. 3d 347, 361) .

B. Drawee Bank's Liability To Payee

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.73

§ 34.73 Opposing Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Payee for Amount of Check Paid on Forged Endorsement [Com. Code 3420(a)]--Payee's Action Against Collecting Bank Bars Action Against Drawee Bank

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

THE LIABILITY OF DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK TO PLAINTIFF FOR PAYING THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF TO ANOTHER PERSON ON A FORGED ENDORSEMENT, HAS BEEN EXTINGUISHED BY PLAINTIFF's COMMENCEMENT OF AN ACTION AGAINST THE COLLECTING BANK FOR CONVERSION RELATED TO THE SAME CHECK.

Extinguishment of Payee's Right of Action Against Drawee. The payee's [or other true owner's] commencement of an action against the collecting bank for conversion based on the bank's payment of a check on a forged endorsement ratifies the collection of the proceeds of the check by the collecting bank and transmutes the remittance of funds by the drawee bank into an authorized act [for which it may debit the drawer's account]. This ratification retroactively validates the drawee bank's remission of proceeds and provides it with a defense to an action for conversion (Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 377, 384-385, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 (construing prior law); see Resh v. Connecticut National Bank (9th Cir. 1996) 89 F.3d 598, 601 (payee ratifies payment made by drawee to depositary when payee sues both depositary and drawee in single suit in state court, precluding conversion, payment by mistake, or negligence)).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

These points and authorities are based on Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 . This case was decided before the 1992 repeal and reenactment of Division 3 of the Commercial Code [Stats. 1992, ch. 914] and thus should be used with caution. Portions of the opinion appear to have been effectively abrogated. For example, Com. Code § 3420(a) clearly eliminates a drawer's cause of action for conversion and takes the position of other authority on this point [see § 34.95]. In addition, Cooper may be suspect in that it does not make a distinction in plaintiff/payee conversion cases as to whether the payee took delivery of the check or whether the thief/forger obtained it first. This distinction is now crucial [see Com. Code § 3420(a)(2)].

It is unclear whether the portion of Cooper that is the basis of this form is still applicable. Under Com. Code § 3420 it appears that the payee may sue any of the banks in the collection chain, but that the payee is entitled to but one recovery [see Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)]. How this affects the court's decision in Cooper that the payee's action against the drawee is extinguished once the payee commences suit against the collecting or depositary bank is unclear.

This form of points and authorities may be used to oppose the contention that a drawee bank is liable in conversion to the payee or other true owner of a check paid on a forged endorsement when the payee or true owner has commenced an action for conversion against the collecting bank based on payment of the same check [see Com. Code § 3420(a)].

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case; for example, a copy of the pleadings in, or request that judicial notice be taken of [Evid. Code §§ 452(d), 453], the payee's action against the collecting bank. Counsel should also describe the check and payment involved with enough particularity so that it is clear that the same payment is the subject of both actions.

This form may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issueof the extinguishment of the drawee's liability to the payee for paying a check with a defective endorsement.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94 address particular payee designations. See Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments , for forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. The points and authorities in § 34.70 support the contention that the drawee bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. The points and authorities in §§ 34.74 and 34.75 oppose the contention that the drawee bank is liable for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement on the grounds that the payee's negligence substantially contributed to the forgery [§ 34.74] and that the drawee's actions did not constitute payment of the check [§ 34.75]. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.120 -34.122 support, and those in §§ 34.124-34.126 oppose, the contention that the collecting bank is also liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47, 34.90-34.95, and 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Extinguishment of Payee's Right of Action Against Drawee

The facts and procedural background of Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 , and the part of the opinion considering the rationale for extinguishing the payee's right of action against the drawee, are discussed in § 34.70[3][a]. The Supreme Court also said that a payee or other true owner, in bringing an action against the collecting bank for conversion of a check collected on a forged endorsement, is deemed to have ratified the collection of the proceeds from the drawee bank. This ratification transmutes the remittance of funds by the drawee bank into an authorized act for which it may debit the drawer's account (9 Cal. 3d 371, 377) . The ratification retroactively validates the drawee bank's remission of proceeds and provides it with a defense to an action for conversion. Therefore, as to all the checks involved that had been transferred for collection through collecting banks that were also parties to the action, no liability existed as to any drawee bank (9 Cal. 3d 371, 384) .

In Resh v. Connecticut National Bank (9th Cir. 1996) 89 F.3d 598 , the payee of a check sued the drawee in federal court for negligence in failing to discover forged endorsements, payment of the checks by mistake, conversion of checks to its own use, and wrongful retention of the proceeds of the checks, which were therefore subject to a constructive trust. The payee had previously also sued the depositary in state court, and the parties had settled. The drawee moved for summary judgment, relying on ratification by the payee. The district court granted summary judgment and the payee appealed, claiming that only its cause of action for conversion was barred by Cooper, above. The Ninth Circuit cited Cooper as established California law that suit by the payee of a check against the depositary or collecting bank ratifies payment made by the drawee or payor bank to the depositary bank. The action for conversion ratified payment by the drawee; therefore, the drawee did not pay by mistake and was not negligent in making payment (89 F.3d 598, 601) .

§ 34.74 Opposing Contention That Drawee Is Liable to Payee for Amount of Check Paid on Forged Endorsement [Com. Code § 3420(a)]--Payee's Negligence Substantially Contributed to Forged Endorsement [Com. Code § 3406]

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR PAYING THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF, TO ANOTHER PERSON ON A FORGED ENDORSEMENT BECAUSE PLAINTIFF's NEGLIGENCE SUBSTANTIALLY CONTRIBUTED TO THE MAKING OF THE FORGERY.

A. Contributory Negligence. A person whose failure to exercise ordinary care contributes to the making of a forged signature on an instrument is precluded from asserting the forgery against a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection (Com. Code § 3406(a)).

B. Ordinary Care. [See § 34.39[1], Paragraph C.]

C. Burden of Proof. The burden of proving failure to exercise ordinary care is on the person asserting the preclusion (Com. Code § 3406(c)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

The points and authorities in [1], above, may be used to oppose the contention that a drawee bank is liable in conversion to the payee or other true owner of a check paid on a forged endorsement. For this defense to apply, the drawee must have paid the check in good faith [see Com. Code § 3406].

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case; for example, facts establishing the drawee's good faith in paying the check and the payee's or true owner's negligence. In addition, because Com. Code § 3406(b) adopts a comparative negligence test [see discussion in § 34.52[2][b]; see also § 34.39], counsel should set forth facts showing that the drawee was not negligent in paying the check.

This form may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's freedom from liability because of the payee's negligence.

[b] Payee's Negligence With Regard to Employee

Com. Code § 3405 governs fraudulent endorsements made by an employee with regard to instruments to which the employer has given "responsibility" to the employee [see Com. Code § 3405(a)(3), (b); Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990)]. Before the 1992 repeal and reenactment of Division 3 of the Commercial Code [Stats. 1992, ch. 914], former Com. Code § 3406 was used in cases in which an employee fraudulently endorsed the employer's name on a check payable to the employer [see, e.g., Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 , discussed in § 34.96[4][a]]. Under former Com. Code § 3406, the employer took the loss only if his or her negligence could be proved. However, under revised Division 3, Com. Code § 3406 need not be used with regard to forgeries of the employer's endorsement. Com. Code § 3405 imposes the loss on the employer without proof of negligence [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990)]. However, if in the employee fraud case the employer did not give "responsibility" to the employee as that term is defined by Com. Code § 3405(a)(3), then the general contributory negligence provisions of Com. Code § 3406 could presumably be used as a defense [see Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990); Case 1 of Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990); Case 1 of Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-406 (1990) (drawer's negligence)]. For points and authorities addressing the employer's responsibilities under Com. Code § 3405, see § 34.96.

[c] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in § 34.70 support the contention that the drawee bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. The points and authorities in §§ 34.73 and 34.75 oppose the contention that the drawee bank is liable for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement on the grounds that the payee commenced action against the collecting bank [§ 34.73] and that the drawee's actions did not constitute payment of the check [§ 34.75]. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -39.94 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. The points and authorities in §§ 34.120 -34.122 support, and those in §§ 34.124 -34.126 oppose, the contention that the collecting bank is also liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47-34.48, 34.90-34.95, and 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Contributory Negligence

Good faith is defined by Com. Code § 1201(b)(20) as honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing.

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF, BECAUSE THE DRAWER's FORGERY OF PLAINTIFF's ENDORSEMENT AND DEPOSIT OF THE CHECK TO THE ACCOUNT ON WHICH IT WAS DRAWN DID NOT RESULT IN ITS PAYMENT.

A. Final Payment by Payor Bank. An item is finally paid by a payor bank when the bank has first done any of the following:

(1) Paid the item in cash.

(2) Settled for the item without having a right to revoke the settlement under statute, clearinghouse rule, or agreement.

(3) Made a provisional settlement for the item and failed to revoke the settlement in the time and manner permitted by statute, clearinghouse rule, or agreement.

If provisional settlement for an item does not become final, the item is not finally paid (Com. Code § 4215(a), (b)).

B. Settle Defined. To "settle" is to pay in cash, by clearinghouse settlement, in a charge or credit or by remittance, or otherwise as agreed. A settlement may be either provisional or final (Com. Code § 4104(a)(11)).

C. Deposit to Account on Which Check Is Drawn Does Not Result in Its Payment. When a drawer steals a check back from the payee, forges the payee's endorsement over his or her own endorsement, and deposits the check to the account on which it is drawn, and the drawee debits and credits that account, the check has not been paid within the meaning of Commercial Code Section 4215(a)(1) or (2) even if the drawee stamped it "Paid." Thus, the payee has no cause of action against the drawee for conversion (see Com. Code § 3420(a); Pupko v. Bank of America (1981) 114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 499-502, 170 Cal. Rptr. 615 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable in conversion to the payee of a check on which the drawer forged the payee's endorsement [see Com. Code § 3420(a)]. The drawee's defense is based on the fact that the deposit, debiting, and crediting of the check to the drawer's account do not constitute payment [see Com. Code § 4215(a)(1), (2)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the processing steps taken by the drawee so that they are distinguishable from the definition of payment contained in Com. Code § 4215(a).

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that the drawee's actions do not constitute payment.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.70 supports the contention that the drawee bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.73 and 34.74 oppose the contention that the drawee bank is liable for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement on the grounds of the payee's commencement of action against the collecting bank § 34.73 and of the payee's negligence § 34.74.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Deposit to Account on Which Check Is Drawn Does Not Result in Its Payment

Plaintiff in Pupko v. Bank of America (1981) 114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 170 Cal. Rptr. 615 , was payee of three checks drawn on defendant and sued defendant for conversion after they were allegedly paid on forged endorsements. The drawer originally delivered the checks to plaintiff for value. Plaintiff tried to cash them, but payment was refused for insufficient funds. Then, the drawer stole the checks from plaintiff's briefcase, forged plaintiff's endorsement on each check, endorsed its company name under the forged endorsement, and deposited the checks to the account at defendant on which they were drawn. Defendant debited and credited the drawer's account for each check and marked each check paid. Drawer's principal departed the area abruptly, abandoning the underlying obligation to plaintiff. Plaintiff and defendant both moved for summary judgment. It was granted, and judgment was entered, for defendant bank. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. Plaintiff contended that the checks had been paid on forged endorsements within the meaning of former Com. Code § 3419(1)(c) (now see Com. Code § 3420(a)). Defendant contended that the checks were never paid as that term is defined in former Com. Code § 4213(1)(a) and (b) (now see Com. Code § 4215(a)(1), (2)), and that drawer's actions amounted to no more than the exercise of its right to stop payment (114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 497) . The court said that a check is paid when the drawee does some act defined by former Com. Code § 4213 (now see Com. Code § 4215) as payment, and quoted portions of former Com. Code § 4213(1)(a) and (b) (now see Com. Code § 4215(a)(1), (2)) to the effect that an item is finally paid when it is paid in cash or settled for without having a right to revoke the settlement under any statute, clearinghouse rule, or agreement. The court set forth the definition of settlement found in former Com. Code § 4104(1)(j) (now see Com. Code § 4104(a)(11)), and said comments to that section establish that the very essence of settlement is the payor bank's parting with value. The transaction in this case did not indicate either a cash or noncash settlement, but represented no more than a completed "wash," only a bookkeeping transaction--simultaneous entries of debit and credit. No cash was paid, no charge or credit or remittance of any sort was involved (114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 499) . Payment as defined in former Com. Code § 4213 (now see Com. Code § 4215) was not accomplished by this bookkeeping transaction (114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 499-500) . The court cited Ocean Park Bank v. Rogers (1907) 6 Cal. App. 678, 681 , a case in which the payee challenged the reversal of a check's provisional payment drawn on insufficient funds, for the proposition that stamping a check "Paid" does not constitute final payment (114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 500) . The court noted comments regarding the failure of California to adopt former Com. Code § 4213(1)(c) (also not adopted in current Com. Code § 4215) because the common practice is for California banks to post items at a centralized bookkeeping location and then to send them to the branches on which they are drawn to check signatures, to search for stop payment orders, and the like. Banks did not want any ambiguity as to the rule that payment is not final until it is not revoked within the time allotted by statute. The court concluded that the rejection of former Com. Code § 4213(1)(c) makes it clear that the California legislative intent was that mere recording or posting activities would not constitute payment (114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 501) . This is consistent with the current final payment provisions in which a similar provision was not adopted [see Com. Code § 4215(a)].

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT PAYING BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____, AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, EVEN THOUGH THE CHECK WAS NOT RETURNED TO THE DEPOSITARY BANK WITHIN THE TIME REQUIRED BY TITLE 12 OF THE CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS SECTION 220.30, BECAUSE _____ [specify reason for limitation of bank's liability, e.g., PLAINTIFF's ENDORSEMENT EXTENDED INTO THE SPACE RESERVED FOR THE ENDORSEMENT OF THE DEPOSITARY BANK AND THE RESULTING ILLEGIBILITY OF THE DEPOSITARY BANK's ENDORSEMENT MADE IT IMPOSSIBLE FOR DEFENDANT TO RETURN THE CHECK TO THE DEPOSITARY BANK WITHIN THE REQUIRED TIME].

A. Bank Is Not Liable for Acts of Others. Subject to a bank's duty to exercise ordinary care or to act in good faith in choosing the means of return or notice of nonpayment, the bank is not liable for the insolvency, neglect, misconduct, mistake, or default of another bank or person, or for loss or destruction of a check or notice of nonpayment in transit or in the possession of others (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a)).

B. Comparative Negligence. If a person, including a bank, fails to exercise ordinary care or to act in good faith under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) in endorsing a check (see 12 C.F.R. § 229.35), accepting a returned check or notice of nonpayment (see 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.32(a), 229.33(c)), or otherwise, the damages incurred by that person must be diminished in proportion to the amount of negligence or bad faith attributable to that person (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(c)).

[Optional] C. Depositary Bank's Responsibility for Back of Check. A depositary bank is responsible for damages under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.38(a) to the extent that the condition of the back of the check arising after the issuance of the check and before acceptance of the check by it adversely affects the ability of a bank to endorse the check legibly in accordance with Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.35. Responsibility under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.38(d)(1) must be treated as negligence of the depositary bank for purposes of Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.38(c) (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(d)(1)).

[Optional] D. Situations Beyond Bank's Control. If a bank is delayed in acting beyond the time limits set forth in Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) because of the interruption of communication or computer facilities, suspension of payments by a bank, war, emergency conditions, failure of equipment, or other circumstances beyond its control, its time for acting is extended for the time necessary to complete the action, if it exercises as much diligence as the circumstances require (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(e)).

[Optional] E. Exclusion. Title 12 of the United States Code Section 4010(a), (b), and (c) and Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.21 do not apply to actions that arise under Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(f)).

[Optional] F. Reliance on Board Ruling. No provision of Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule, regulation, or interpretation of a rule or regulation by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve, regardless of whether the rule, regulation, or interpretation is amended, rescinded, or determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason after the act or omission has occurred (12 C.F.R. § 229.38(h)).

[2] Comments

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee or paying bank is liable under Subpart C of Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) to the payee, holder in due course, or collecting bank for the amount of a check, return of which was untimely under 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 (set forth in § 34.71), or with regard to which it failed to provide timely notice of nonpayment under 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 (set forth in § 34.71). The opposition may be based on one or more of the grounds set forth in 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a), (c)-(f), and (h). The ground used in the example relates to Appendix D of Regulation CC, which reserves the first one and one-half inches from the trailing edge of the reverse of a check for the payee's endorsement [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.35(a) (requiring banks to place their endorsements in accordance with Appendix D); see also 12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.35(a)]. The space between three inches from the leading edge to one and one-half inches from the trailing edge is reserved for the depositary bank's endorsement [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix D].

Although the title and certain other aspects of this form are phrased in terms of a drawee or a paying bank, 12 C.F.R. § 229.38 is equally applicable to banks of any status. Thus, these authorities may be used by a depositary, collecting, or returning bank to oppose the imposition of liability under Subpart C of Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.).

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the exclusion or limitation on a bank's liability under Subpart C of Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.).

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.71 support the contention that the drawee or paying bank is liable for late return or failure to provide timely notice of nonpayment. § 34.78 addresses the presumption of timely return created by certain processing stamps on a check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Depositary Bank's Responsibility for Back of Check

A paying bank is responsible for the check's condition when it is issued by it or its customer. Thus, the paying bank would be responsible for the adverse effect, if any, of a carbon band or other material placed on the back of the check before issuance. The paying bank may contract with its customer with regard to this responsibility [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.38(d)(1)].

The depositary bank is responsible for the check's condition arising after it is issued and before it is accepted by the depositary bank, as well as any condition of the check arising during its handling of the check. The depositary bank would be responsible for the adverse effect, if any, of a stamp placed on the check by its customer or a prior endorser. The depositary bank may refuse to accept a check whose back is unreasonably obscured or contract with its customers with regard to this responsibility [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.38(d)(1)].

[b] Situations Beyond Bank's Control

12 C.F.R. § 229.38(e) excuses certain delays. It adopts the standard of Com. Code § 4109(b) [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.38(e)]

[c] Exclusion

Any depository institution that fails to comply with any requirement imposed by the federal Expedited Funds Availability Act (12 U.S.C. § 4001 et seq.) and regulations promulgated under it (12 C.F.R. Parts 210 and 229), or with any provision of state law that supersedes any provision of Subpart B (12 C.F.R. § 229.10 et seq.), with regard to any person other than another depository institution, is liable to that person in an amount equal to the actual damage sustained by that person as a result of the failure to comply, plus an additional amount between $100 and $1,000 as allowed by the court [12 U.S.C. § 4010(a)(1), (2)(A); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(a)(1), (2)(i)] 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(f) provides that the civil liability and class action provisions, particularly the punitive damage provisions and the bona fide error provisions [see 12 U.S.C. § 4010(a)-(c)], do not apply to regulatory provisions adopted to improve the efficiency of the payments mechanism (i.e., 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.). Allowing punitive damages for delays in the return of checks when no actual damages are incurred would only encourage litigation and provide little or no benefit to the check-collection system. In view of the provisions of 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a), which incorporate traditional bank collection standards based on negligence, the provision on bona fide errors is not included in Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.38(f)].

A. Revocation of Settlement Under Commercial Code. If a payor bank settles for a demand item other than a documentary draft presented otherwise than for immediate payment over the counter before midnight of the banking day of receipt, the payor bank may revoke the settlement and recover the settlement if, before it has made final payment and before its midnight deadline, it either (a) returns the item, or (b) sends written notice of dishonor or nonpayment if the item is unavailable for return (*Com. [a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee or paying bank is liable to the payee, holder in due course, or collecting bank for the amount of a check with regard to which the drawee or paying bank made timely return, or sent timely notice of dishonor or notice of nonpayment or notice in lieu of return [see Com. Code § 4301; 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30, 229.33 (set forth in § 34.71)] Com. Code § 4301 (Paragraphs A and C) have been superseded by the requirements of 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30 and 229.33 (set forth in § 34.71, Paragraphs B, F-K; see also related discussions in § 34.71[3][a]) [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.30(a)] in that the time limits set forth in Com. Code § 4301 may be affected by the additional requirements of expeditious return under 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 and notice of nonpayment of large items under 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to §§ 229.30(a), 229.33; see 12 U.S.C. § 4007(b) (authority for regulations that supersede Commercial Code)] Note, however, that although a bank may miss both deadlines, it can only be held liable for missing one [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(b) (set forth in § 34.71, Paragraph L)]. Also, the concept of revocation of provisional credit has been superseded by Regulation CC (12 C.F.R. § 229) effective September 1, 1988. Under Regulation CC, interbank settlements are final when made, but the paying bank still has the right to recover settlement from a returning bank or depositary bank to which it returns a check [see § 34.77[3][a]]. Thus, in some situations, for instance for purposes of Com. Code §

4215(a)(2) or (3), settlement by a paying bank or drawee is not considered final [12 C.F.R. s. 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.36(d)].

Paragraphs D-G reflect application of Com. Code § 4301 before the promulgation of Regulation CC, and will be superseded by that regulation to the extent they are inconsistent with it [see 12 U.S.C. § 4007(b) (authority for regulations that supersede the Uniform Commercial Code as enacted in any state)]. For instance, the proposition set forth in Paragraph F would not be applicable if the drawee had requested that checks being presented for payment be delivered to its processing center or if the address of the processing center was associated with the routing number on the check [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.36(b) (set forth in Paragraph H)]. Paragraph B incorporates many provisions of 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30 and 229.33. Counsel should use those paragraphs that relate to the defects claimed by the payee or collecting bank.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. Thus, counsel should describe the check, the time and channels through which it was presented, when and if the drawee or paying bank settled for the check, and when and how it attempted to recover that settlement.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's timely return.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.71 support the contention that the drawee bank is liable for late return. § 34.78 addresses the presumption of timely return created by certain processing stamps on a check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Revocation of Settlement Under Commercial Code

Under the Commercial Code, a collecting bank receives settlement for a check when it presents the check to the drawee; this is referred to as provisional settlement. The drawee bank may recover this settlement when it returns the check to the presenting bank. Under Regulations J and CC, the drawee or paying bank must still settle for checks presented to it [see 12 C.F.R. §§ 210.9(b) (set forth in § 34.71, Paragraph B), 229.36(d) (settlement in forward collection process)]. Under Regulation CC, however, the drawee or paying bank may return the check directly to the depositary bank or through returning banks that did not handle the check for forward collection. On these more efficient paths, the paying bank does not recover the settlement made to the presenting bank. Instead the depositary bank is required to pay the drawee or a returning bank [12 C.F.R. § 229.32(b)], and a bank through which the drawee or paying bank returned a check (returning bank) is required to settle for the returned check, either with the paying bank or with another returning bank in the same way it would settle for a similar check in forward collection [12 C.F.R. § 229.31(c); see 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(cc) (defining returning bank to exclude paying bank and depositary bank; returning bank is collecting bank for purposes of Com. Code § 4202(b))]. To achieve uniformity, 12 C.F.R. § 229.31(c) applies even if the returning bank handled the check for forward collection [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.31(c)].

[b] Federal Reserve Rule (Return)

See § 34.71[3][c], [e] -[j].

[c] Revocation of Credit Given

Note that the time requirement in Com. Code § 4301(a), referred to in Com. Code § 4301(b), and the concept of revocation of interbank credits have been superseded, as discussed in § 34.77[2][a] and § 34.77[3][a].

[d] Revocation Timely

Note that the authorities used in this paragraph consider only the midnight deadline under Com. Code § 4301. As discussed in § 34.77[2][a], the drawee or paying bank must also meet the deadlines imposed by 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30 and 229.33 (set forth in § 34.71).

Plaintiff in Nautilus Leasing Services, Inc. v. Crocker National Bank (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 195 Cal. Rptr. 478 , was the payee of a $35,000 check drawn on defendant. The check was dated November 28, 1978, was deposited by plaintiff, was forwarded by plaintiff's bank through the San Francisco Clearinghouse Exchange, and arrived at defendant's operations center at 8:00 A.M. on Friday, December 1, 1978. The operations center sorted the check according to the branch on which it was drawn, stamped it "Paid," and posted the check to the drawer's account, all without checking to see if there were actually sufficient funds in the account to cover the check. Defendant refers to this process as provisional settlement, and it was completed by 2:00 A.M. Saturday morning, December 2. On Monday, December 4, the check arrived at the branch on which it was drawn. Drawer had a demand loan owing to defendant, which both knew could only be paid if certain merger negotiations were successfully concluded. On December 4, the drawer informed defendant that the merger would not occur, and defendant demanded full payment of the loan. Drawer told defendant it could not meet the demand, so defendant exercised its right of setoff against the account on which plaintiff's check was drawn, leaving a negative balance in the account. Plaintiff's check and others like it were returned unpaid. On the afternoon of December 4, the drawer filed a Chapter 11 bankruptcy petition, and on December 12, drawer and defendant filed a stipulation in the bankruptcy court, which that court approved, that the setoff was valid. Plaintiff and defendant each moved for summary judgment on the basis of agreed facts. Judgment was for plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The only issue involved was the construction and application of Com. Code § 4303 (set forth in § 34.57, Paragraph B.). The court said a bank has a right to return a check unpaid provided none of the events listed in Com. Code § 4303 has occurred (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1027-1028) . Plaintiff contended that defendant had accepted the check [see Com. Code § 4303(a)(1)] and retained it beyond the permissible deadline (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1028) . The portion of the opinion considering the acceptance contention is discussed in § 34.77[3][e]. In order to determine if defendant had retained the check too long, the court first had to determine when the check was deemed received, which hinged on whether defendant's computer center was a separate branch [see Com. Code § 4107]. Although that portion of the opinion is likely to have been superseded by 12 C.F.R. § 229.36(b) [set forth in Paragraph H], the discussion of that portion of the opinion has been retained under Computer Center Is Separate Branch, infra. If defendant had requested that checks being presented for payment be delivered to its processing center, or if the address of the processing center was given on the check, the result under 12 C.F.R. § 229.36(b)(1) would be different than in the case, and the check would have been considered received on Friday. Still, defendant's return would have been timely under 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a) and notice of nonpayment under 12 C.F.R. § 229.33 would have been unnecessary [see discussion in § 34.71[3][j]] if the depositary bank received the returned check by 4:00 P.M. on Tuesday [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(a)]. Lastly, the court considered whether defendant had exercised its right of setoff too late under former Com. Code § 4303(1)(c) (no see Com. Code § 4303(a)(3)), which permits a drawee to exercise setoff until it has settled for the item without having a right to revoke the settlement under a statute, clearinghouse rule, or agreement, specifically Com. Code § 4301 [set forth in Paragraph A], Com. Code § 4302 [time for settlement or return, set forth in § 34.71, Paragraphs A, C], and Com. Code § 4104(a)(11) [defining midnight deadline, set forth in § 34.71, Paragraph D]. The court said that defendant's deadline for revocation of provisional settlement or exercise of setoff, whether it received the check on Friday or Saturday, was midnight of the next banking day, or Monday. Exercise of its right of setoff during the day on Monday was therefore proper (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1031-1032) .

[e] Acts Not Amounting to Acceptance or Final Payment

The facts and procedural background of Nautilus Leasing Services, Inc. v. Crocker National Bank (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 195 Cal. Rptr. 478 , are set forth in § 34.77[3][d]. Plaintiff contended that defendant had accepted the check and retained it beyond the permissible deadline (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1028) . Plaintiff's acceptance argument relied on Rosen v. Rosen (1936) 17 Cal. App. 2d 601, 603, 62 P.2d 384 , which the court distinguished as being superseded by the adoption of the Commercial Code (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1028-1029) . The court said that acceptance within the meaning of former Com. Code § 4303(1)(a) (now see Com. Code § 4303(a)(1)) means formal acceptance as defined in former Com. Code § 3410 (now see Com. Code § 3409, set forth in § 34.49, Paragraph C), which requires the drawee to sign the check, and requires the signing to be done intentionally by an authorized bank official. This does not mean that bank officers must sign every check, but acceptance does require a certain degree of formality that was lacking in this case. Plaintiff argued that the signature requirement was satisfied by the affixing of the "Paid" stamp (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1029) , and that defendant must accept the liabilities of machines (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1030) . The court cited Pupko v. Bank of America (1981) 114 Cal. App. 3d 495, 500, 170 Cal. Rptr. 615 (discussed in § 34.75[3][a]), and Ocean Park Bank v. Rogers (1907) 6 Cal. App. 678, 681 , for the proposition that such stamps and other internal processing constitute mere memoranda adopted in aid of convenient dispatch of business, not payment. Nor is the fact that the check was posted to the drawer's account determinative, especially in view of California's refusal to adopt the rule that an item is finally paid when the bank has completed the process of posting the item to the indicated account [see former Com. Code § 4213(1)(c) and Com. Code § 4215(a)] (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1030) .

[f] Computer Center Is Separate Branch

Note that the authorities used in this paragraph will be superseded in many cases by 12 C.F.R. § 229.36(b), set forth in Paragraph H.

The facts and procedural background of Nautilus Leasing Services, Inc. v. Crocker National Bank (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 195 Cal. Rptr. 478 , are set forth in § 34.77[3][d]. Plaintiff contended that defendant, even though it had not accepted the check, was liable because it retained it too long under former Com. Code § 4303(1)(d) (now see Com. Code § 4303(a)(5)). Plaintiff argued that defendant received the check on Friday and was obligated to return it by the end of that day or become liable for payment. Defendant contended it did not receive that check until Saturday, the day the check arrived at the drawer's branch and that because Saturday was not an official banking day, it had until the end of the next banking day (Monday) to exercise setoff and return the check. Plaintiff relied on Farmers & Merchants Bank v. Bank of America (1971) 20 Cal. App. 3d 939, 944, 98 Cal. Rptr. 381 , which was decided under former Fin. Code § 1013 (now see Com. Code § 4301) for the proposition that a drawee's computer center and the branch on which the check is drawn are one and the same for purposes of determining when a check is received. Farmers and Merchants Bank turned on the fact that the bookkeeping functions ordinarily performed at a branch were performed at the computer center and distinguished the functions performed only by the bank's computer, which were essentially the same functions that Crocker's operation's center performed. Applying Farmers and Merchants Bank, the court stated that the check was not received until Saturday, and the setoff and return on Monday were both timely (147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 1030-1031) .

[g] Places for Presentment (Regulation CC)

Physical presentment of the check is not necessary if the paying bank and the depositary or collecting bank have an "electronic presentment agreement." Then, the bank presenting the check to the paying bank may do so by transmission of information describing the check in accordance with their agreement. An electronic presentment agreement may not extend the return times or otherwise vary the requirements of Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart C (12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq.) with regard to the parties interested in the check who are not parties to the electronic presentment agreement (12 C.F.R. § 229.36(c)).

A bank that arranges for checks that are payable by it to be payable through another bank must have imprinted on the front of the check its own name, location, and first four digits of its own routing number, followed by the words "payable through" and the name and location of the payable-through bank [12 C.F.R. § 229.36(e)]. 12 C.F.R. §

229.36(e) does not affect 12 C.F.R. § 229.36(b) [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.36(e)]. If a payable-through check does not meet the requirements of 12 C.F.R. § 229.36(e), the bank by which the check is payable may be liable to the depositary bank or others as provided in 12 C.F.R. § 229.38 [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.36(e)]

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Revocation of Settlement Under Commercial Code

The court of appeal in Lincoln Nat. Bank v. Dworsky (1990) 218 Cal. App. 3d 852, 267 Cal. Rptr. 361 , affirmed a judgment for the drawee bank on a cross complaint by the payees claiming that the bank's return of a photocopy of the check and notice of dishonor, although timely, did not constitute compliance with the midnight deadline. The question presented was whether the check was "otherwise unavailable for return" within the meaning of former Com. Code § 4301(1)(b) (now see Com. Code § 4301(a)(2)). Although there was some evidence that the check was later returned to its maker in a monthly statement, it was clear that the check was unavailable on the day the midnight deadline had to be met. The court said that a check is "otherwise unavailable for return" if it is not "immediately utilizable." The check does not have to be permanently lost or stolen, only unavailable for return at the time the bank must act to meet its midnight deadline. It does not matter if the check subsequently becomes available (218 Cal. App. 3d 852, 857) . This conclusion should not be altered by the 1992 amendment of Com. Code § 4301, which deleted the word "otherwise" [see Com. Code § 4301(a)(2)].

[b] Revocation Timely

City of Long Beach v. Crocker National Bank (1986) 179 Cal. App. 3d 1114, 225 Cal. Rptr. 227 , was a class action by 80 payees of other checks on which provisional settlement was revoked after exercise of the same setoff considered in Nautilus Leasing Services, Inc. v. Crocker National Bank (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 1023, 195 Cal. Rptr. 478 (discussed in § 34.77[3][d]). Summary judgment was entered for defendant on the basis that the matter was finally determined in Nautilus Leasing (179 Cal. App. 3d 1114, 1116) . That judgment was affirmed because plaintiffs' notice of appeal was not timely.

Code §§ 4107, 4301; 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30, 229.33]--Stamps on Returned Check Create Presumption of Timely Revocation of Provisional Settlement [Com. Code §§ 3502(b)(1), 3505(a)(2)]

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DRAWEE BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE PLAINTIFF HAS NOT INTRODUCED ANY EVIDENCE TO REBUT THE PRESUMPTION ARISING FROM THE STAMPS ON THE CHECK THAT _____ [RETURN and/or NOTICE OF DISHONOR and/or NOTICE OF NONPAYMENT and/or REVOCATION OF PROVISIONAL SETTLEMENT] WAS TIMELY.

A. Presumption of Dishonor. A purported stamp or writing of the drawee, payor bank, or presenting bank on or accompanying the instrument stating that acceptance or payment has been refused unless reasons for the refusal are stated and the reasons are not consistent with dishonor are admissible as evidence and create a presumption of dishonor and of any notice of dishonor stated (Com. Code § 3505(a)(2)).

B. Meaning of Dishonor. If a check is duly presented for payment to the payor bank otherwise than for immediate payment over the counter, the check is dishonored if the payor bank makes timely return of the check or sends timely notice of dishonor or nonpayment under Commercial Code Section 4301 or 4302, or becomes accountable for the amount of the check under Commercial Code Section 4302 (Com. Code § 3502(b)(1)).

C. Stamps on Check Create Presumption of Timely Revocation of Provisional Settlement. The presumption of Commercial Code Section 3505(a)(2) is that the instrument has been timely returned by the _____ [drawee or payor] bank in accordance with the provisions of Commercial Code Section 4301, which allows a presumption affecting the burden of producing evidence. [In a motion for summary judgment, when no evidence is offered to contradict the proposition that the checks were seasonably returned by the midnight deadline, it operates to eliminate the existence of a triable issue of fact] (Com. Code § 1206; Security Pac. Nat. Bank v. Associated Motor Sales (1980) 106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 177-178, 179-180, 165 Cal. Rptr. 38).

_____ [drawee or payor] bank to revoke provisional settlements by midnight of the day following the day of receipt. This is a

[2] Comments

CAUTION:
The extent to which 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30-229.42, effective September 1, 1988, may have superseded the authorities in this form is not clear. See the discussion in § 34.78[2][a].

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a drawee bank is liable to the payee, holder in due course, or collecting bank for the amount of a check with regard to which the drawee or paying bank made timely return, or sent timely notice of dishonor or notice of nonpayment or notice in lieu of return [see Com. Code § 4301; 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30, 229.33 (set forth in Form 110)] when the payee has not introduced any evidence to rebut the presumption of timely revocation arising from the stamps on the check.

Note that the terms "provisional settlement" and "revocation of provisional settlement" are no longer applicable between banks [see 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.31(c), 229.32(b), 229.36(d), and discussion in § 34.77[3][a]]. In addition to the deadlines imposed by Com. Code §§ 4301 and 4302, Regulation CC (specifically, 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30 and 229.33) [see § 34.71] imposes additional requirements for timely return and for notice of nonpayment of checks in amounts in excess of $2,500 [see 12 U.S.C. § 4007(b) (authority for regulation that supersedes Commercial Code as enacted in any state)]. The Commentary to Regulation CC, which constitutes an official Federal Reserve Board interpretation of the regulation, specifies that 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.30 and 229.33 affect Com. Code §§ 4301, 4302, and states that they may affect other Commercial Code provisions. The Commentary does not specifically address Com. Code § 3502 or 3505 [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to §§ 229.30, 229.33]. In addition, 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(d) [see § 34.71] requires a degree of specificity in the placement and content of return stamps used by the drawee. It is not clear whether any presumption would arise from a return stamp that did not satisfy the requirements of 12 C.F.R. § 229.30(d).

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the check, the time and channels through which it was presented, when and if the drawee or paying bank settled for the check, and when and how it attempted to recover that settlement.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the drawee's right to rely on this presumption of timely return.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.71 support, and those in § 34.77 oppose, the contention that the drawee bank is liable for late return or revocation of provisional settlement. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments, includes points and authorities regarding dishonor, and in particular, dishonor in the context of an endorser's liability on a promissory note.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Stamps on Check Create Presumption of Timely Revocation of Provisional Settlement

In Security Pac. Nat. Bank v. Associated Motor Sales (1980) 106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 165 Cal. Rptr. 38 , the depositary bank sued the payee of 26 dishonored deposit items to recover a $188,000 overdraft created by the dishonor and to impose endorser's liability of $311,925 in regard to the same checks. Defendant admitted endorsement, deposit, and negotiation of the checks, and pleaded as an affirmative defense that the checks were not timely dishonored. Copies of the checks and plaintiff's written notices to defendant of the dishonors were admitted into evidence. Summary judgment was entered for plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed as to the endorser's liability cause of action and said it was therefore unnecessary to address the overdraft cause of action (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 175-176) . Defendant contended there were triable issues of fact as to whether the checks were timely dishonored by the drawee banks and as to whether plaintiff had given it timely notice of dishonor. Noting the checks were returned for insufficient funds, uncollected funds, or should be referred to maker, plaintiff contended the stamps on the checks were sufficient evidence to support the finding of timely notice of dishonor by the drawee banks because defendant's answer failed to controvert the allegation of dishonor (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 176-177) , and no evidence was introduced to contradict the proposition that the returns were timely (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 180) . The court first set forth the provisions of former Com. Code § 3507(1)(a) (now see Com. Code § 3502) and former Com. Code § 3510(b) (now see Com. Code § 3505(a)(2)). Former Com. Code § 3510(b) (now see Com. Code § 3505(a)(2)) creates a presumption that the instrument has been timely returned by the payor bank in accordance with the provisions of Com. Code § 4301, which allows a payor bank to revoke provisional settlements by midnight of the day following the day of receipt (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 177) . As provided in Com. Code § 1206, the presumption is a presumption affecting the burden of producing evidence (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 178) . Since defendant had not offered any evidence to contradict the presumption that the checks were seasonably returned by the midnight deadline, the presumption operated to eliminate the existence of a triable issue of fact (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 179-180) .

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

IN ALLOWING PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ TO BE NEGOTIATED BY AN UNAUTHORIZED PERSON, DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK BREACHED ITS DUTY OF CARE TO PLAINTIFF AND IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF-DRAWER IN NEGLIGENCE FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK.

A. Negligence of Collecting Bank That Is Not Payee. When a collecting bank is presented with one or more checks of significant amounts by a person [it knows or should know is an employee of the drawer], other than the named payee, who is seeking to negotiate the check for his or her own benefit in circumstances with insufficient indicia of that person's authority to negotiate the check, there is enough inherent danger to give rise to a duty on the collecting bank's part to investigate the authority of the person attempting to negotiate the check (E. F. Hutton & Co. v. City National Bank (1983) 149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 67-68, 196 Cal. Rptr. 614 (construing prior law); Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 555-557, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 (construing prior law); Newman v. Wells Fargo Bank (2001) 87 Cal. App. 4th 73, 83-85, 104 Cal. Rptr. 2d 310 ; see Com. Code § 3405(b)).

[Optional] B. Drawer Not Required to Negate Validity of Endorsements Under Commercial Code Section 3405. A drawer does not have to plead facts sufficient to negate the validity of an endorsement under Commercial Code Section 3405 to state a cause of action in negligence against a collecting bank that was not also payee of a check, but which negotiated the check at the request of a person other than the named payee in obviously suspicious circumstances (E. F. Hutton & Co. v. City National Bank (1983) 149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 68-70, 196 Cal. Rptr. 614 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a collecting bank is liable to a drawer in negligence for having allowed someone other than the named payee to negotiate the check for his or her own benefit in suspicious circumstances. Paragraph A sets forth the situation giving rise to the duty. Optional Paragraph B establishes that the drawer does not have to allege facts negating the validity of the endorsement under Com. Code § 3405 to state a cause of action in negligence.

Counsel should insert argument in the form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation and the manner in which the check was negotiated.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in § 34.96 oppose the contention that the bank is liable to the drawer for paying a check on a forged endorsement when the fraud was committed by an employee of the drawer and the drawer entrusted the employee with responsibility with regard to the check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Negligence of Collecting Bank That Is Not Payee

Under Com. Code § 3405, the risk of loss for fraudulent endorsements by employees (who are entrusted with responsibility with regard to checks) generally falls on the employer rather than on the bank on the theory that the employer is in a better position to avoid the loss by taking steps to prevent fraud. However, when the bank fails to exercise ordinary care in paying or taking the check and that failure contributes to the loss resulting from the fraud, the employer may shift the loss to the bank to the extent the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss [see Com. Code § 3405(b); Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990); see also Com. Code § 3103(a)(7) ("ordinary care" defined)]. Under Com. Code § 3405(b), the failure to exercise ordinary care is to be determined in the context of all the facts relating to the bank's conduct with regard to the bank's collection of the check [Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990)].

In Newman v. Wells Fargo Bank (2001) 87 Cal. App. 4th 73, 104 Cal. Rptr. 2d 310 , a medical corporation hired a bookkeeper and assistant office manager, who subsequently misappropriated funds from the business by two different methods. Checks and drafts made payable to the medical practice were fraudulently indorsed and cashed or deposited into their personal bank accounts, and checks and drafts drawn by the medical practice were fraudulently indorsed with the name of the payee and then cashed or deposited into their personal bank accounts. The fraudulently indorsed checks were delivered to defendant bank for collection. Although each of the checks submitted contained irregularities suggestive of fraud, the bank permitted the bookkeeper and accomplices to deposit the funds into their personal accounts. The medical office sued the bank under theories of common law negligence and conversion under Com. Code § 3420 based on the bank's role as a depositary and collecting bank. The bank filed a demurrer and motion to strike, and the medical corporation filed an opposition. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend and dismissed the action.

The court of appeal reversed. It first held that the Commercial Code precludes a common law negligence action against banks taking checks fraudulently indorsed by dishonest employees. It noted that Com. Code § 3405 adopts the fundamental principle that the risk of loss for fraudulent indorsements by employees entrusted with responsibility for checks should fall on the employer rather than on the bank that takes the check or pays it. That loss allocation principle, however, is tempered by the doctrine of comparative negligence on the part of the party paying the instrument or taking it for collection. Under Com. Code § 3405(b), an employer can recover from a depositary or collecting bank to the extent the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care contributes to the loss. The court then held that the first amended complaint stated a cause of action under Com. Code § 3405(b). It alleged that the bank breached its obligation to exercise ordinary care when it allowed plaintiff's employees to cash or deposit checks in their personal accounts notwithstanding suspicious circumstances indicative of fraud, and gave specific examples of those circumstances (87 Cal. App. 4th 73, 83-85) .

Plaintiff drawer in E. F. Hutton & Co. v. City National Bank (1983) 149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 196 Cal. Rptr. 614 , sued the collecting bank for approximately $650,000, representing 18 checks on which one of its employees had forged endorsements and deposited to the employee's personal account at defendant. The checks ranged in amount from $10,000 to $81,598. Causes of action for negligence, breach of warranty of good title, and a common count were alleged. After demurrers were sustained as to all causes of action, judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed as to the negligence cause of action and the common count. The complaint alleged that each of the checks was properly payable to the named payee, that defendant knew or should have known that the forger was an employee and a fiduciary of plaintiff, that it was foreseeable that plaintiff would be injured, that defendant had a duty to use due care in handling the checks, that defendant and its employees knew or should have known that the negotiation of the checks was irregular, and that further inquiry was required, but that defendant was grossly negligent in failing to follow reasonable commercial banking standards and in failing to make reasonable attempts to verify the endorsements or the forger's authority to deposit the proceeds into his personal account (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 66) . The court set forth the elements of negligence and quoted at length from Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 692-696, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , regarding a collecting bank's duty when presented with one or more checks of significant amounts by a person it knows or should know is an employee of the drawer who is seeking to negotiate the check for his or her own benefit. The court acknowledged that Sun'n Sand limited the collecting bank's duty of inquiry to situations in which the checks of significant amounts were payable to the bank itself, but said that narrowing was merely an application of the Sun'n Sand facts to the general rule that a collecting bank has a general duty based on the foreseeability of the risk to the drawer (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 67) . The court noted that Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 556, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 (discussed below), did not limit the duty as Sun'n Sand did, and chose to follow Joffe (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 67-68) . The pleadings alleged circumstances with insufficient indicia of the forger's authority to negotiate the checks and with sufficient inherent danger signals to give rise to the collecting bank's duty to investigate. In proceeding without investigation, the collecting bank acted at its peril (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 68) .

The facts and procedural background of Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , are discussed in § 34.53[3][a]. The payee designation on the check was "Continental Finance Systems--Wells Fargo Escrow Trust Account." Continental used the stamped endorsement "Pay to the order of Bank of America N T and S A For Deposit Only Continental Financial Systems 02137-07857" and deposited the check into that account at defendant collecting bank. Plaintiffs contended that under the rationale of Sun'n Sand, defendant collecting bank committed actionable negligence by accepting the check for deposit to an account other than that named in the payee designation (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 555) . The court said the most important factor in the Sun'n Sand Court's decision to impose a duty was the foreseeability of harm to plaintiff-drawer (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 555-556) . The duty is activated only when the collecting bank is also the payee. The circumstances alleged in the Joffe complaint were sufficiently suspicious to come within a rule similar to Sun'n Sand's (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 556) . Although Continental may have been an appropriate endorser, the payee was the escrow trust account at another bank, and Continental was not the payee and was not identified as an authorized representative of the payee. Even though Continental may have been an appropriate endorser, the check's face did not provide sufficient objective indicia from which defendant could reasonably conclude that the party presenting the check was authorized to transact in the manner proposed. The facts that the check was for a substantial amount ($25,000), payable to an escrow at another bank, with inadequate indicia on the face of the check regarding the representative authorized to negotiate it amounted to circumstances in which the risk to the drawer was sufficiently foreseeable to impose a duty to the depositary-collecting bank not to ignore the danger signals inherent in an attempted negotiation by a third party (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 556) .

The court of appeal disagreed with defendant's contention that Com. Code § 1103(b) (displacement of principles of law and equity by particular Commercial Code provisions) or former Com. Code §§ 3116 (joint payees; now see Com. Code § 3110(d)) and 3117 (who may negotiate check; now see Com. Code § 3110(c)(2)) created a loss-distributive scheme that precluded plaintiff's action in negligence (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557) .

[b] Drawer Not Required to Negate Validity of Endorsements Under Commercial Code Section 3405

The facts and procedural background of E. F. Hutton & Co. v. City National Bank (1983) 149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 196 Cal. Rptr. 614 , and the portion of the opinion considering the circumstances giving rise to the duty of inquiry are discussed in § 34.90[3][a]. Defendant contended that former Com. Code § 3405(1)(c) (now see Com. Code § 3405) was a necessary element of the negligence action in that if, under that section, the endorsements were deemed effective, no cause of action would be stated. The court discussed the rationale of former Com. Code § 3405(1)(c), that losses resulting from fraudulent employee behavior should be placed on the employer-drawer that is generally in a better position than the bank to detect or prevent these types of fraud or to insure against them (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 68-69) . The court concluded that this rationale was not applicable when a collecting bank is confronted with obviously suspicious circumstances and could have reasonably foreseen the drawer's loss. No provision of the Commercial Code, not even former Com. Code § 3405, has displaced common law negligence recovery (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 69) . Thus a cause of action for negligence had been stated, and former Com. Code § 3405 was not part of that cause of action (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 70) . The situation addressed by the loss-distributive scheme of former Com. Code § 3405 could be raised by defendant as a comparative negligence defense (149 Cal. App. 3d 60, 70 n.6).

It is unclear whether the above conclusion and the reasoning on which it is based is consistent with the 1992 enactment of Com. Code § 3405. Under former Com. Code § 3405(1)(c), the bank's negligence did not shift the loss to the bank as long as the bank acted in good faith. Under Com. Code § 3405 as revised, the loss may be recovered from the bank to the extent the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss [see Com. Code § 3405(b); Official Comment 1 and 2 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990)].

[a] Negligence of Collecting Bank That Is Not Payee

In Sehremelis v. Farmers & Merchants Bank (1992) 6 Cal. App. 4th 767, 7 Cal. Rptr. 2d 903 , plaintiff was a commercial loan borrower. As part of the construction loan agreement, the construction lender, a bank other than defendant, would draw checks on the construction loan disbursement account. The construction loan agreement provided that all checks were to be made payable to the general contractor and the particular subcontractor as copayees. Many checks were made out payable only to the general contractor, who had an account with defendant and for whom defendant negotiated the checks. The court of appeal reversed that portion of the judgment based on the sustaining of a demurrer with regard to a cause of action for negligence. The court said that relevant legal and practical considerations militate in favor of a rather expansive duty of care by collecting banks in dealing with endorsements of checks they negotiate. Although plaintiff was not technically the drawer of the checks, plaintiff occupied a very similar position and were directly within the "danger zone" of loss (6 Cal. App. 4th 767, 775) . Thus, the court held that sufficient facts were pleaded to justify a duty of care between plaintiff and defendant and the demurrer should not have been sustained (6 Cal. App. 4th 767, 776) .

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

AN AMBIGUOUS PAYEE DESIGNATION IS NOT CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE WITHIN THE MEANING OF COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 3406 SUFFICIENT TO BAR RECOVERY BY THE DRAWER FOR DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK's NEGLIGENCE RELATING TO _____ [specify, e.g., NEGOTIATION OF THE CHECK IN SUSPICIOUS CIRCUMSTANCES].

A. Contributory Negligence. [See § 34.52[1], Paragraph A.]

B. Ambiguous Payee Designation Is Not Contributory Negligence. The drawer's use of an ambiguous or confusing payee designation does not constitute contributory negligence within the meaning of Commercial Code Section 3406 sufficient to bar recovery by the drawer based on a [collecting] bank's allowing negotiation of the check by someone other than the intended payee (Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , was decided under the former statutory provision that set forth only a contributory negligence standard [see former Com. Code § 3406]. However, the current statutory scheme as enacted in 1992 also adopts a concept of comparative negligence [see Com. Code § 3406(a), (b); see also Official Comment 1, 3, and 4 to U.C.C. § 3-406 (1990)]. It is not clear whether the court's decision in Joffe that an ambiguous payee designation is not contributory negligence sufficient to bar recovery would still be valid with the addition of a comparative negligence standard.

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a bank cannot invoke the contributory negligence defense of Com. Code § 3406 against a drawer merely because the payee designation was ambiguous or unclear.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation and the manner in which the check was negotiated.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's liability.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

Particular payee designations are considered at §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Ambiguous Payee Designation Is Not Contributory Negligence

The facts and procedural background of Joffe v. United California Bank (1983) 141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 190 Cal. Rptr. 443 , are discussed in § 34.53[3][a]. The portion of the opinion considering plaintiff-drawer's negligence cause of action against the collecting bank is discussed in § 34.90[3][a]. Defendant collecting bank contended that plaintiff was precluded by former Com. Code § 3406 (now see Com. Code § 3406(a)) from asserting defendant's negligence in allowing the check to be negotiated other than as intended by the drawer in suspicious circumstances because plaintiff was negligent in drawing the check. The court said that although the payee line was not a model of clarity, it was not sufficiently ambiguous to preclude recovery at the demurrer stage. Further, plaintiff's actions as alleged in the complaint did not arise as a matter of law to the standard set forth in former Com. Code § 3406 (141 Cal. App. 3d 541, 557) .

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

IN ALLOWING PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ TO BE NEGOTIATED BY AN UNAUTHORIZED PERSON AT A TIME WHEN PLAINTIFF WAS NOT INDEBTED TO DEFENDANT, DEFENDANT AS BOTH PAYEE AND COLLECTING BANK IS LIABLE UNDER A THEORY OF MISTAKE TO REFUND THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK TO PLAINTIFF-DRAWER IN NEGLIGENCE FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK.

A. Payee Bank's Liability for Mistake. A collecting bank that is also the payee of a check is liable to the drawer on a theory of mistake for allowing a mistakenly issued check to be negotiated[, and its proceeds paid to a third person], at a time when the drawer was not indebted to the payee bank (see Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 700-701, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (construing prior law)).

B. No Neglect of Legal Duty by Drawer. A drawer's failure to examine its bank statements and returned items and to thereby discover checks issued by mistake does not constitute a neglect of legal duty sufficient to bar recovery of the amount of the checks on a theory of mistake (Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 700-701, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , was decided under former provisions of Divisions 3 and 4 of the Commercial Code, and thus caution should be used when citing all or portions of the opinion. Those divisions of the Commercial Code were significantly revised in 1992, and some portions of the decision have been abrogated. For example, the Court in Sun'n Sand held that a drawer had standing under former Com. Code §§ 3417 and 4207 to bring an action for breach of warranty (see 21 Cal. 3d 671, 680-684) . This result has been rejected by the 1992 amendments of these sections [see Com. Code §§ 3417, 4208; Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990) (warranties now made to drawee not drawer)]. However, the continued validity of the Court's decision regarding other causes of action raised by the plaintiff, such as negligence [discussed in § 34.90] and mistake [discussed below], is not clear. Caution should be used when relying on these portions of the opinion until courts provide further clarification.

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a payee bank is liable to a drawer under a theory of mistake for allowing a check payable to it to be paid to some third person at a time when the drawer was not indebted to it. Paragraph A sets forth the general theory and Paragraph B applies the rule that ordinary negligence does not bar recovery under the theory of mistake.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should describe the payee designation, the fact that plaintiff was not indebted to defendant at the time the check was negotiated, and the manner in which the check was negotiated.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the payee's liability. These points and authorities are perhaps best used at the demurrer stage, because they do not address what may prove to be the drawer's most difficult hurdle, namely the payee bank's change of position in reliance on the payment and the equities of requiring refund [see Com. Code § 3418; Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 701, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920] .

[b] Related Points and Authorities

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Payee Bank's Liability for Mistake

Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , is discussed in § 34.92[3][b].

[b] No Neglect of Legal Duty by Drawer

The facts and procedural background of Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , are discussed in § 34.35[3][a]. The cause of action for mistake alleged that plaintiff issued the checks in the mistaken belief that it owed defendant-payee collecting bank the amounts for which the checks were drawn. Defendant contended that recovery on a theory of mistake was barred by plaintiff's failure to examine its bank statements and returned items as required by former Com. Code § 4406(1) (now see Com. Code § 4406(a), (c)), and by its failure to carry out its duty allegedly imposed by former Com. Code § 3405 (now see Com. Code § 3405 as enacted by Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 6) to supervise employees in the preparation of checks (21 Cal. 3d 671, 700-701) . Concerning the causes of action for mistake, the Court discussed only defendant collecting bank's contention that the failure to examine the bank statements constituted a neglect of legal duty sufficient to bar recovery. The Court cited the proposition that money paid by mistake may be recovered, however negligent the party paying may have been in making the mistake, unless the payment has caused such a change in the position of the other party that it would be unjust to require a refund (21 Cal. 3d 671, 700) . Ordinary negligence does not constitute neglect of legal duty sufficient to bar recovery for mistake (21 Cal. 3d 671, 700-701) . The Court said it did not need to discuss defendant's contention that former Com. Code § 3405 created a duty on plaintiff's part to supervise employees in the preparation of checks, because even if it did, plaintiff's failure to discharge that duty would not bar its recovery. Defendant was sufficiently protected by the requirement of the change of position. Although a cause of action for mistake was stated, defendant would have the opportunity in further proceedings to defeat recovery by proving that it changed its position to such an extent that requiring it to refund the money would be unjust (21 Cal. 3d 671, 701) .

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR PAYING PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ ON A FORGED ENDORSEMENT BECAUSE THE ENDORSEMENT IS EFFECTIVE UNDER COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 3404.

A. Fictitious Payee. An endorsement by any person in the payee's name is effective as the payee's endorsement in favor of a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection if an impostor, by use of the mails or otherwise, induces an instrument's issuer to issue the instrument to the impostor, or to a person acting in concert with the impostor, by impersonating the instrument's payee or a person authorized to act for the payee (Com. Code § 3404(a)).

[AND/OR]

a person whose intent determines to whom an instrument is payable (*Com. This rule applies until the instrument is negotiated by special endorsement (Com. Code § 3404(b)).

B. When Endorsement Made in Payee's Name. Under Commercial Code Section 3404(a) or (b), an endorsement is made in the payee's name if (1) it is made in a name substantially similar to that of the payee or (2) the instrument, whether or not endorsed, is deposited in a depositary bank to an account in a name substantially similar to that of the payee (Com. Code § 3404(c)).

[Optional] C. Divergent Intent of Joint Drawers. Commercial Code Section 3404 applies [to place the loss on the drawer and make an endorsement in the name of the named payee effective] when there are two drawers' signatures on a check and only one of them intends that the named payee have no interest in the check (see Com. Code § 3404; Wright v. Bank of California (1969) 276 Cal. App. 2d 485, 489, 81 Cal. Rptr. 11 (construing prior law); Tire & R. Co. v. Wells Fargo Bank, etc. (1934) 1 Cal. App. 2d 694, 708-713, 37 P.2d 483 (construing prior law)).

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting bank is liable to the drawer of a check for paying the check on a forged endorsement. The opposition is based on the ground that an endorsement is effective if the situation is within the fictitious payee exception [see Com. Code § 3404]. Paragraph A sets forth the Commercial Code statement of the impostor and fictitious payee doctrines and is applicable to a collecting bank's duties as well as to a drawee bank's. Paragraph B is for use when one of two drawers intended the check to be payable to the fictitious payee, and may be most appropriate in cases involving fraudulent endorsements by employees [see Com. Code § 3404].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts bringing the situation actually or presumptively within the fictitious payee exception. In addition, because Com. Code § 3404 adopts a loss-distributive scheme in that the person who suffers the loss may recover from a bank that failed to exercise ordinary care, counsel should set forth facts establishing that the collecting bank was not negligent in paying the instrument or taking it for value or collection [see Com. Code § 3404(d); Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-404 (1990); Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990)].

This memorandum may be combined with memoranda pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the fictitious payee exception or the special pleading requirements applicable to it.

[b] Related Memoranda

The memoranda set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.94 address particular payee designations. Ch. 92, Duress, Menace, Fraud, Undue Influence, and Mistake, also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g, forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47-34.48, 34.70, 34.73-34.75, 34.90-34.92, 34.94, 34.120-34.122, 34.124-34.126, 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Fictitious Payee

If a check payable to an impostor, fictitious payee, or payee not intended to have an interest in the check is paid, the effect of Com. Code § 3404(a) and (b) is to place the loss on the check's drawer rather than on the drawee or depositary bank that took the check for collection [Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-404 (1990)]. The Official U.C.C. Comment sets forth several examples illustrating the application of the fictitious payee rule under Com. Code § 3404(b) [see Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-404 (1990); see also Unlimited Adjusting Group, Inc. v. Wells Fargo Bank (2009) 174 Cal. App. 4th 883, 894-895, 94 Cal. Rptr. 3d 672 (phrase "person identified as payee" in Com. Code § 3404(b) refers to named payee, not intended payee)].

[b] Divergent Intent of Joint Drawers

The facts and procedural background of Wright v. Bank of California (1969) 276 Cal. App. 2d 485, 81 Cal. Rptr. 11 , are discussed in § 34.34[3][c]. In Wright, one drawer intended the payee to have an interest in the check and the other did not. Defendant contended that the issuance of the cashier's check in exchange for the original check should not result in any liability to it because the situation was governed by the fictitious payee exception of former Com. Code § 3405(1)(c) (now see Com. Code § 3404). The court of appeal agreed, saying that former Com. Code § 3405 continued in effect the rule of Tire & R. Co. v. Wells Fargo Bank, etc. (1934) 1 Cal. App. 2d 694, 37 P.2d 483 (discussed below), regarding divergent intent of joint drawers. That rule places the loss on the drawer by making any endorsement in the name of the named payee effective in all cases in which one joint drawer signs the check on the recommendation of the other. In this case, however, there was no endorsement (276 Cal. App. 2d 485, 488-489) . The portion of the opinion discussing the effect of that lack of endorsement is set forth in § 34.34[3][c].

Tire & R. Co. v. Wells Fargo Bank, etc. (1934) 1 Cal. App. 2d 694, 37 P.2d 483 , decided under former Civ. Code § 3090, was an action by a drawer against the drawee for wrongfully charging its account to pay over $100,000 of checks on forged endorsements. The checks were payable to fictitious (nonexistent) payees and were issued by plaintiff's employee. The employee was authorized to sign checks as drawer, but another signature was also required. The other person who signed as drawer did not know of the culpable employee's scheme. After both signatures were on the checks, the culpable employee stole the checks, endorsed the names of the fictitious payees, and deposited or cashed them. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The court held that for purposes of the fictitious payee exception the intent of one authorized cosigner is sufficient to bring the payee designation within the scope of the exception (276 Cal. App. 2d 485) .

[a] Fictitious Payee

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Johnson (9th Cir. 1979) 596 F.2d 842 , affirmed a conviction for embezzlement of federal funds and embezzlement of union funds. Redevelopment agency funds were disbursed on fraudulent vouchers submitted by defendant, a union official. The union had to submit vouchers for work done and payroll checks would be issued in reliance on the vouchers. Appellant contended that the conviction could not be upheld because, in paying checks on forged endorsements, the bank paid only its own funds, not government funds or the union's funds. The court of appeals disagreed, noting that the fictitious payee exception of former Com. Code § 3405 (now see Com. Code § 3404) applied to make any endorsement effective (596 F.2d 842, 846) .

Plaintiff in Pacific Indemnity Co. v. Security First Nat. Bank (1967) 248 Cal. App. 2d 75, 56 Cal. Rptr. 142 , was the drawer's insurer. Plaintiff sued defendant payee bank in negligence and conversion for the amount of checks payable to defendant that were deposited in the personal account of the insured's employee. In reversing a judgment for defendant payee bank, the court of appeal said the trial court's primary error was in considering the checks to be bearer paper by misapplication of former Com. Code § 3405 (248 Cal. App. 2d 75, 79-93) . The basis of the holding was the fact that the bank was payee of the check and had improperly let it be negotiated by a third party (248 Cal. App. 2d 75, 94) .

Before concluding that the fictitious payee exception had no application, the court described situations in which the exception did apply. It applies when the drawer causes the check to be made payable to a nonexistent person or a real person to whom the check is never to be delivered (248 Cal. App. 2d 75, 88) .

The facts and procedural background of Jerman v. Bank of America (1970) 7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 87 Cal. Rptr. 88 , are set forth in § 34.171[3][a]. Although the borrower and possible forger had supplied plaintiff with the names of the payees, the trial court found that the endorsement on each check purporting to be that of the named payee was not effective under former Com. Code § 3405(1)(c) (now see Com. Code § 3404) (7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 887 n.2). The court of appeal agreed. The court referred to specific findings, for example, that the designated payees were real people who had actual interests in the property and that plaintiff, although she had never met them, intended the proceeds to be paid to the named payees to purchase or clear their interests in the land (7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 888, 888 n.3). A dissenting opinion disagreed, citing Union B. & T. Co. v. Security-First Nat. Bk. (1937) 8 Cal. 2d 303, 307, 65 P.2d 355 , Tire & R. Co. v. Wells Fargo Bank, etc. (1934) 1 Cal. App. 2d 694, 701-702, 37 P.2d 483 (discussed in § 34.93[3][b]), and Pacific Indemnity Co. v. Security First Nat. Bank (1967) 248 Cal. App. 2d 75, 88, 56 Cal. Rptr. 142 (discussed in § 34.93[3][a]), for the proposition that the fictitious payee exception is not made inapplicable merely by reason of the fact that the named payees are real people (7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 893) .

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a bank paid a check on an ineffective or improper endorsement when the payee was designated under a misspelled or other name and the endorsement was by the actual payee. In such a situation, the endorsement is valid in either the misspelled or correctly spelled form or in the payee's name or the name by which the payee was designated [see Com. Code § 3204(d)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation and establishing the adequacy of the endorsement.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the propriety of the endorsement.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in § 34.34, § 34.47-48, § 34.70, § 34.73-75, § 34.90-92, § 34.93, § 34.120-§ 34.122, § 34.124-126, and § 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Payee Designated by Misspelled or Other Name

Plaintiff in Blackmon v. Hale (1970) 1 Cal. 3d 548, 83 Cal. Rptr. 194, 463 P.2d 418 , purchased a cashier's check payable to the trust account of his attorney's law partnership. The payee designation on the cashier's check was "A and H Trust Account." In fact, a third attorney had recently left the firm, and the remaining two partners were still using an account entitled the "A, H, and L Trust Account." Plaintiff's attorney, A, endorsed the cashier's check "A and H Trust Account by A." Below that endorsement was rubber stamped "Pay to the order of California Bank, A, H, and L Trust Account." After the proceeds were deposited in the A, H, and L Trust Account, A and H dissolved their partnership. To settle accounts between them, H signed a check drawn on the A, H, and L Trust Account payable to the "JCA Trust Account." Attorney A used the proceeds of that check to open his solo practice trust account and later diverted the funds from that account for his personal use. Plaintiff sued both the bank on which the cashier's check was drawn and the collecting bank at which it was deposited to recover all but $1,000 of the check's face amount. The trial court ruled in the bank's favor. Plaintiff appealed.

The Supreme Court affirmed. The Court first considered the propriety of the endorsement. Plaintiff argued that under former Civ. Code § 3117 (now see Com. Code §§ 3205, 3206) the endorsement was restrictive so that the endorsee could not negotiate the check contrary to the endorsement. The Court disagreed, saying that the check was deposited to precisely the account for which it was intended at the time it was drawn. Despite the designation given, the check's payee was intended by both plaintiff and A to be the trust account used by A. The incompleteness and irregularity of the payee's name was inconsequential (1 Cal. 3d 548, 555) .

Plaintiff also argued that the endorsement by A alone was ineffective and that both A and H had to endorse it. The Court disagreed, saying the bank's reliance on the stamped endorsement was proper. Although withdrawals from that account could be made by H alone or by A and L together, there was no evidence that a stamped endorsement was not authorized to effect a deposit to the account (1 Cal. 3d 548, 555-556) . The Court did not discuss plaintiff's objection to the trial court's finding that since the cashier's check was a bearer instrument, no endorsement was needed.

PLAINTIFF-DRAWER HAS NO CAUSE OF ACTION AGAINST DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK FOR CONVERSION ARISING FROM DEFENDANT's PAYMENT OF PLAINTIFF's CHECK DATED _____, PAYABLE TO _____ [name of payee] ON A FORGED ENDORSEMENT.

A. Conversion. The law applicable to conversion of personal property applies to instruments. An instrument is also converted if it is taken by transfer, other than a negotiation, from a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or a bank makes or obtains payment with regard to the instrument for a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or receive payment (Com. Code § 3420(a)).

B. Drawer Has No Conversion Action Against Collecting Bank. An action for conversion of an instrument may not be brought by the instrument's issuer. The drawer's actions are restricted to one against the drawee bank for improperly charging his or her account to pay a check on a forged endorsement (Com. Code § 3420(a)(1); Allied Concord etc. Corp. v. Bank of America (1969) 275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 7-8, 80 Cal. Rptr. 622).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting bank is liable to a drawer in conversion for paying the proceeds of a check to someone other than the named payee on a forged endorsement [see Com. Code § 3420(a)]. Paragraph A sets forth the statutory definition of conversion. Paragraph B sets forth the rule establishing the drawer's lack of standing to sue the collecting bank for conversion and that the drawer's adequate remedy is to require the drawee to recredit the account on which the check was drawn.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation and the manner in which the check was negotiated. Counsel may wish to add facts negating any ownership interest in the check on the drawer's part.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's freedom from liability in a conversion action.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.70 support and those in §§ 34.73-34.75 oppose the contention that the drawee is liable in conversion to the payee of a check paid on a forged endorsement. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.120 -34.122 support and those in §§ 34.124-34.126 oppose the contention that a collecting bank is liable in conversion to the payee of check paid on a forged endorsement. The points and authorities in §§ 34.47 and 34.121 address drawee or collecting bank liability for forged endorsement of a joint payee check.

The drawer's action against the drawee for charging the drawer's account to pay a check with a forged endorsement is the subject of §§ 34.34 and 34.48.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Drawer Has No Conversion Action Against Collecting Bank

Allied Concord etc. Corp. v. Bank of America (1969) 275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 80 Cal. Rptr. 622 , was an action by the drawer of a check against the depositary and collecting banks for damages arising from their payment of a check on an endorsement forged by the payee's brother. Plaintiff did not discover the forgery until more than a year after the check had been paid. Plaintiff relied on theories of conversion and breach of warranties. Judgment entered for defendants after sustaining of demurrers without leave to amend was affirmed on the basis that a drawer cannot maintain a conversion action against the collecting bank based on a forged endorsement, and that the breach of warranty causes of action were barred by the one-year statute of limitations.

The court first decided that the drawer could bring an action for breach of warranty directly against the collecting bank for payment on a forged endorsement (275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 3-4) , although this portion of the opinion appears suspect in light of the 1992 amendments to the warranty provisions [see Com. Code §§ 3417, 4208; Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990) (no warranties made to drawer)]. Plaintiff also contended that the drawer, equally with the payee, should be entitled to sue depositary and collecting banks in conversion. The court said plaintiff's argument did not take into account the different ways in which the drawer and the payee are damaged by payment of a check on a forged endorsement. When a depositary bank honors a forged endorsement, it has foreclosed the true payee from presenting and collecting the check and thereby directly and immediately damages the payee. The drawer, however, suffers no loss. Even if the drawee accepts and pays the check, the drawer has not been injured, because at that point, the money paid out is the drawee's money, not the drawer's (275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 7-8) . Only when the drawee charges the drawer's account has the drawer been injured based on the forged endorsement. Even then, the drawer's damage is minimal until the statute of limitations has run on the drawer's right to demand that the drawee reverse the charge. It is true that the collecting bank is liable to the true owner, normally the payee, for the amount of the check. If a drawer can establish a claim to the proceeds as true owner of the check, then the drawer will be able to recover the amount of the check. However, citing Com. Code § 1103 (general principles of law apply unless specifically displaced by code), the court stated that the drawer's claim will be in assumpsit, not in conversion (275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 8) .

It is apparent that when a depositary or collecting bank pays out money on a forged endorsement, it has converted nothing of the drawer's and done no more than part with its own money. The only conversion that adversely affects the drawer occurs when the drawee bank charges his or her account, and the drawer's cause of action runs only against the drawee bank. Thus, while the payee is entitled to sue a depositary bank in conversion for money paid to a third person on a forged endorsement that should have been paid to him or her, a drawer has no such right to sue a depositary or collecting bank for conversion (275 Cal. App. 2d 1, 8) .

The court's decision in Allied with regard to the conversion cause of action appears consistent with the 1992 repeal and reenactment of Division 3 of the Commercial Code. Under former Division 3, the cases were divided on the issue of whether the drawer of a check with a forged instrument was entitled to assert rights against a depositary or collecting bank that took the check. Com. Code § 3420(a)(1), by specifically stating that an action for conversion of an instrument may not be brought by the issuer or acceptor of the instrument, takes the court's position in Allied and rejects other authority that allowed a drawer to state a cause of action for conversion [see Tedesco v. Crocker National Bank (1983) 148 Cal. App. 3d 1211, 1215-1216, 196 Cal. Rptr. 534 ; see also Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 378, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609] . As discussed in Allied, the check represents an obligation of the drawer rather than the drawer's property. The drawer has an adequate remedy against the drawee bank for recredit of the drawer's account for unauthorized payment of the check [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Drawer Has No Conversion Action Against Collecting Bank

The facts and procedural background of Sehremelis v. Farmers & Merchants Bank (1992) 6 Cal. App. 4th 767, 7 Cal. Rptr. 2d 903 , are discussed in § 34.90[4][a]. The court of appeal affirmed that portion of the judgment based on the sustaining of a demurrer with regard to a cause of action for conversion [see Com. Code § 3420(a)], agreeing with Allied (discussed above) that a drawer cannot sue the collecting bank for conversion on account of the collecting bank's payment of a check with invalid or missing endorsements. The court declined to follow Tedesco v. Crocker National Bank (1983) 148 Cal. App. 3d 1211, 1215-1216, 196 Cal. Rptr. 534 , relied on by plaintiff, saying the Tedesco opinion failed to distinguish the rules and relationships respectively applicable to payees and drawers (6 Cal. App. 4th 767, 777) .

§ 34.96 Opposing Contention That Collecting Bank That Paid Check on Forged, Different, or Missing Endorsement Is Liable to Drawer--Drawer Entrusted Employee With Responsibility [Com. Code § 3405]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR PAYING PLAINTIFF's CHECK NUMBER _____ ON A FORGED ENDORSEMENT BECAUSE THE ENDORSEMENT IS EFFECTIVE UNDER COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 3405.

A. Fraudulent Endorsement by Employee. For the purpose of determining the rights and liabilities of a person who, in good faith, pays an instrument or takes it for value or for collection, if an employer entrusted an employee with responsibility with regard to the instrument and the employee or a person acting in concert with the employee makes a fraudulent endorsement of the instrument, the endorsement is effective as the endorsement of the person to whom the instrument is payable if it is made in the name of that person (Com. Code § 3405(b)).

B. Fraudulent Endorsement Defined. "Fraudulent endorsement" means (A) in the case of an instrument payable to the employer, a forged endorsement purporting to be that of the employer, or (B) in the case of an instrument with regard to which the employer is the drawer, a forged endorsement purporting to be that of the person identified as payee (Com. Code § 3405(a)(2)).

C. Responsibility Defined. "Responsibility" with regard to instruments means authority (A) to sign or endorse instruments on the employer's behalf, (B) to process instruments received by the employer for bookkeeping purposes, for deposit to an account, or for other disposition, (C) to prepare or process instruments for issue in the employer's name, (D) to supply information determining the names or addresses of payees of instruments to be issued in the employer's name, (E) to control the disposition of instruments to be issued in the employer's name, or (F) to act otherwise with regard to instruments in a responsible capacity. "Responsibility" does not include authority that merely allows an employee to have access to instruments or blank or incomplete instrument forms that are being stored or transported or are part of incoming or outgoing mail, or similar access (Com. Code § 3405(a)(3)).

D. When Endorsement Made in Name of Person to Whom Check Is Payable. Under Commercial Code Section 3405(b), an endorsement is made in the name of the person to whom an instrument is payable if (1) it is made in a name substantially similar to the name of that person or (2) the instrument, whether or not endorsed, is deposited in a depositary bank to an account in a name substantially similar to the name of that person (Com. Code § 3405(c)).

[2] Comments

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting bank is liable to the drawer of a check for paying the check on a forged endorsement. The opposition is based on the ground that an endorsement is effective if the situation is within the rule governing fraudulent endorsements by an employee. Thus, for the defense to apply (1) the bank must have paid or taken the check for value or collection in good faith, (2) the employer must have entrusted an employee with responsibility as that term is defined by statute, and (3) the (fraudulent) endorsement must have been made in the name of the person to whom the instrument is payable [see Com. Code § 3405].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts bringing the situation within the rule. In addition, because Com. Code § 3405 adopts a loss-distributive scheme in that the employer may shift the loss to the bank to the extent the bank's failure to exercise ordinary care contributed to the loss, counsel should set forth facts establishing that the collecting bank was not negligent in paying the instrument or taking it for value or collection [see Com. Code § 3405(b); Official Comment 1 and 4 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's freedom from liability when the case falls within the fraudulent-endorsement-by-an-employee rule.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.93 -34.95 address other grounds on which the collecting bank may oppose liability to the drawer based on a forged endorsement. § 34.90 supports the contention that the collecting bank is liable to the drawer for paying a check on a forged endorsement on the ground that the bank failed to exercise ordinary care in paying the check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Fraudulent Endorsement by Employee

Com. Code § 3405 governs fraudulent endorsements made by employees with regard to instruments to which the employer has given responsibility to the employee. It covers two categories of fraudulent endorsements: endorsements made in the employer's name to instruments payable to the employer, and endorsements made in the payee's name of instruments issued by the employer. Under former Division 3, the first category of cases, fraudulent endorsements of the employer's name to instruments payable to the employer, were governed by former Com. Code § 3406. Under that section, the employer took the loss only if the employer's negligence could be proved. Under Division 3 as revised in 1992, Com. Code § 3406 need not be used with regard to forgeries of the employer's endorsement. Com. Code § 3405 imposes the loss on the employer without proof of negligence [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990); see Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 386 . 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 (discussed in § 34.96[4][a])]. However, if the case does not fall within the rule of Com. Code § 3405 (for example, the forger was never given "responsibility" with regard to the instrument), then the provisions of Com. Code § 3406 regarding contributory negligence might apply [see Case 1 to Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-405 (1990); Case 1 to Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-406 (1990); see also § 34.74].

[a] Fraudulent Endorsement by Employee

The facts and procedural background of Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 , and the portion of the opinion considering the payee's right of action against the drawee, are discussed in § 34.70[3][a]. The Supreme Court reviewed the facts that were the basis of the holding that, under former version of Com. Code § 3406 (prior to its 1992 amendment), plaintiff's negligence barred recovery on checks presented after April 1, 1966, approximately six months after the bookkeeper forged the first endorsement. The Court noted that the bookkeeper had retained plaintiff as an attorney in 1963 because of the bookkeeper's insolvency and the creditors' suits against her. She told plaintiff at that time that the financial difficulties were due to gambling losses. A short time later, plaintiff hired her as a bookkeeper. Plaintiff exercised practically no supervision, never reviewed the books, and never checked the bank reconciliation of deposits on the accounts that the bookkeeper handled, even after a suspicious absence of an entry was noted during an annual examination made in the course of preparing tax returns (9 Cal. 3d 371 383) . In support of the finding that the drawee (Crocker) had acted in good faith and in accordance with reasonable commercial standards, the Court noted that at the time the bookkeeper's account was opened at Crocker, she had been introduced to that bank by one of its established customers. There was nothing on the face of the checks that would have led the bank to suspect they were irregular in any way (9 Cal. 3d 371 385) . A single branch of a large bank may handle several thousand instruments bearing third-party endorsements in a single day (9 Cal. 3d 371 385-386) . Considering this burden, the Court said it would be commercially unreasonable to expect drawee banks to undertake foolproof efforts to verify ostensibly valid endorsements. With regard to the checks that were received through bank collection channels, all prior endorsements were guaranteed by the collecting banks. Having acted in good faith and in accordance with reasonable commercial standards, Crocker was entitled to invoke the defense of former Com. Code § 3406 (9 Cal. 3d 371 386) .

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting bank is liable to the drawer of a check for paying the proceeds of that check when the purported drawer's signature was forged. The opposition is based on the ground that discovery of a forged drawer's signature is not part of a collecting bank's presentment duties [see Com. Code § 4202].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should show how, when, and by whom the check was received for collection, that it was not also the drawee, and that it did not know the drawer's signature was forged [see Com. Code § 4207(a)(2) (warranty against knowledge of unauthorized drawer's signature, set forth in § 34.150)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's lack of responsibility for discovery of a forged drawer's signature.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.98 and 34.99 address other aspects of a collecting bank's responsibility, or the lack of it, for a forged drawer's signature. §§ 34.31-34.33 address a drawee bank's liability for charging the drawer's account to pay a check with a forged drawer's signature or one lacking all required drawers' signatures.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Discovery of Forged Drawer's Signature Is Not Part of Duty of Presentment

Plaintiff in Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , was the drawer's insurer and brought the action in its capacity as subrogee after it paid the drawer the amount of a check on which one of the drawer's employees had forged one of the two required drawers' signatures. The check was drawn on the insured's account at another bank (hereinafter "Banco") and was payable to "Security Pacific National Bank A/C No. 260 049 569 GC Associates." The employee opened account number 260 049 569 at defendant in the name of GC Associates and deposited the check there with the typewritten endorsement "Deposit Only AC 049 569 GC Associates." Banco paid defendant and charged the drawer's account. Then the employee withdrew the funds from the account at defendant. The drawer demanded that Banco recredit its account, but Banco refused to do so. Plaintiff sued only defendant collecting bank for negligence and breach of warranty. A judgment of dismissal was entered, and plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court considered plaintiff's contention that former Com. Code § 4202(1) (now see Com. Code § 4202(a)) imposes a duty of due care on collecting banks in accepting checks for deposit, and that this duty runs to a noncustomer drawer (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 818, 820) . The court agreed that former Com. Code § 4202(1) imposes a duty on collecting banks; however, that duty relates to presentment, which was not the issue in this case. Presentment is made by a presenting bank at the place where the drawee bank has requested presentment be made [former Com. Code § 4204(2); now see Com. Code § 4204(c)] (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 820) . The court concluded that former Com. Code § 4202(1)(a) (now see Com. Code § 4202(a)(1)) does not impose on a collecting bank the duty of determining whether a check bears a forged drawer's signature (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 820-821) . Even if the receiving and initial processing of a check were viewed as part of the presentment process, the duties imposed on a collecting bank by that section should only be imposed by the owner of the instrument who initiates collection or by a prior collecting bank (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 821) .

[a] Duties of Collecting Bank

In Karen Kane Inc. v. Bank of America NT&SA (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 1192, 79 Cal. Rptr. 2d 712 , the court of appeal held that absent extraordinary circumstances, a collecting bank does not owe a duty of care to a non-customer, particularly when the bank has met its statutory duties as set forth in Com. Code § 4202(a). In that case, a clothing manufacturer wrote numerous checks over several years to fictitious vendors for merchandise it never received, based on an employee's submission of fraudulent invoices. The manufacturer brought a negligence action against both the check cashing service that cashed those checks and the bank that deposited the checks into the service's account. It claimed that the checks bore indicia of wrongdoing, such as unconventional endorsements, which gave respondents notice that it was probable that the manufacturer had unwittingly issued the checks as the result of an unlawful scheme, made harm to the manufacturer foreseeable, and created a duty to inquire as to the validity of the obligation supporting the checks. The court found that because the checks were not forged or improperly endorsed, and did not indicate that maker was being defrauded, neither the check cashing service nor the bank had a duty to inquire of the maker if a valid transaction supported the checks before accepting them. The circumstances were not extraordinary enough to give rise to a duty of inquiry by a bank complying with its statutory duties, when in fact they were not even sufficient to constitute notice of fraud to the maker of the checks (67 Cal. App. 4th 1192, 1202-1203) .

§ 34.98 Opposing Contention That Collecting Bank Is Liable to Drawer for Amount of Check on Which Drawer's Signature Was Forged--Bank in Good Faith Changed Its Position in Reliance on Final Payment From Drawee [Com. Code § 3418]

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT _____ [DEPOSITARY and/or COLLECTING] BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, PAYABLE TO _____ [name of payee], AND ON WHICH PLAINTIFF's SIGNATURE AS DRAWER WAS FORGED BECAUSE DEFENDANT IN GOOD FAITH DID NOT ALLOW THE PROCEEDS OF THAT CHECK TO BE WITHDRAWN UNTIL PAYMENT FROM THE DRAWEE WAS FINAL.

A. Restitution/Payment Final. When an instrument is paid by mistake the payor is generally entitled to restitution of the amount paid. However, restitution is not available when payment becomes final. Payment on a forged check is final in favor of a person who (1) received the proceeds in good faith and for value or (2) in good faith changed his or her position in reliance on the payment (see Com. Code § 3418(a)-(c); Official Comment 1 to § 3-418 (1990)).

B. Collecting Bank Relied. A depositary or collecting bank that allows its customer to withdraw the proceeds of a deposited check after payment from the drawee bank has become final has changed its position in reliance on the payment within the meaning of Commercial Code Section 3418 (Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 822-823, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (construing prior law)).

C. Collecting Bank's Good Faith. A depositary or collecting bank's change of position in reliance on a payment is made in good faith within the meaning of Commercial Code Section 3418 if, from all the facts and circumstances known to it at the time in question, it has no reason to know or suspect that any forgery, alteration, or irregularity exists or that any breach of trust was occurring (Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 823-825, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (construing prior law)).

[Optional] D. Defense Not Precluded by Failure to Adhere to Procedures. A collecting bank's failure to comply with its internal procedures in cashing or allowing withdrawal of proceeds of a deposit item does not amount to negligence or bad faith so as to preclude its defense under Commercial Code Section 3418 (Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 825-827, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting bank is liable to the drawer of a check for paying the proceeds of that check when the purported drawer's signature was forged. The opposition is based on the collecting bank's bringing itself within the final payment defense of Com. Code § 3418, which is set forth in Paragraph A. Paragraph B provides that reliance is established if the bank did not allow withdrawal of the proceeds until payment from the drawee was final. Paragraph C sets forth the criteria for establishing good faith. This element of the defense will probably be negated if there is actual ambiguity in the payee designation, or if the bank is the payee [see Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 688-692, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920] . Paragraph D is for use if there is an issue regarding the bank's nonadherence to its internal procedures.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should show how, when, and by whom the check was received for collection, that nothing in these circumstances was out of the ordinary, and that it did not allow the proceeds to be withdrawn until final payment was received from the drawee [see Com. Code §§ 4215(a), 4301 (regarding final payment, set forth in §§ 34.75 and 34.77, respectively)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's final payment defense.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.97 and 34.99 address a collecting bank's liability for paying a check with a forged drawer's signature. §§ 34.31-34.33 and 34.46-34.53 address a drawee bank's liability for charging the drawer's account to pay a check with a forged drawer's signature or one lacking all required drawers' signatures.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Collecting Bank Relied

The facts and procedural background of Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , and the portion of the opinion holding that defendant collecting bank had no duty under Com. Code § 4202(a)(1) to discover that plaintiff-drawer's signature was forged, are discussed in § 34.97[3][a]. The court of appeal then considered defendant's claim of defense under the former version of Com. Code § 3418 (since amended in 1992). Even plaintiff's allegations conceded that defendant did not allow the forger to withdraw the proceeds until defendant had received final payment from the drawee (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 822) . Concerning the reliance element of the defense, the court said the determinative fact is not that defendant gave value, but that it changed its position only after knowledge of the payment from the drawee. Thus, defendant relied on the payment before changing its position (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 822-823) .

[b] Collecting Bank's Good Faith

Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , is discussed in § 34.98[3][a]. Concerning whether defendant's reliance was in good faith, the court (citing California Uniform Commercial Code Comment 2 to former Com. Code § 3302) noted that good faith as applied to holder in due course status refers to the definition in Com. Code § 1201 of honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned [see Com. Code § 1201(b)(20); see also Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-103 (1990)]). The former Comment provides that the presence of suspicious circumstances sufficient to put a reasonably prudent person on inquiry does not negate the existence of good faith (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 823) . The holder's negligence does not affect the finality of payment or acceptance unless the negligence amounts to lack of good faith or to notice under former Com. Code § 3304 (notice to purchaser) (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 823-824) . Notice as used in former Com. Code § 3304 is defined in Com. Code § 1202(a), which provides that one has notice of a fact when, from all the facts and circumstances known to him or her at the time in question, he or she has reason to know that it exists. The court cited Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 697 n.21, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , for the proposition that "reason to know" suggests an objective notion of notice. Plaintiff contended that the ambiguity in the payee designation and the fact that the check was negotiated by a fiduciary put defendant on notice [see former Com. Code § 3304(1)(a) and current Com. Code § 3302(a)(1); former Com. Code § 3304(4)(e) and current Com. Code § 3307]. The court disagreed, saying the payee designation was not that irregular (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 824) . Plaintiff misconstrued former Com. Code § 3304(4)(e) (now see Com. Code § 3307) (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 824-825) . Even under the most restrictive view of notice, and even if defendant had been aware that the check was being negotiated by a fiduciary, that fact alone would not give it notice unless it took the item with knowledge of a breach of trust or without objective criteria from which it could reasonably conclude that the party presenting the check was authorized to act as it did (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 825) . This argument was made even stronger by the presence of two drawers' signatures on the check. Defendant was entitled to rely on the second signature as an assurance that no misappropriation or fraud was being conducted (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 827) . Thus, defendant had no notice and was both a person who in good faith changed its position in reliance on the payment and a holder in due course (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 825) .

The lack of a comparable section to former Com. Code § 3304 in Division 3 as revised in 1992 should not significantly alter the above decision. Most of the rules in former Com. Code § 3304 are repeated in various other places in Division 3 [see Com. Code §§ 3302, 3304, 3307]. In addition, the basic definition of notice remains [see Com. Code § 1202(a)].

[c] Defense Not Precluded by Failure to Adhere to Procedures

Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , is discussed in § 34.98[3][a]. Plaintiff contended that defendant's failure to adhere to its internal procedures (in the ways set forth in the portion of the opinion discussed in § 34.99[3][b]) barred its reliance on the defense of Com. Code § 3418. The court of appeal considered cases from other jurisdictions that allowed the defense even in the face of failure to adhere to internal procedures (manager approval before cashing corporate checks drawn on another bank) and to prevailing banking practice (requiring corporate resolution of corporate account holder) (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 825-826) . The circumstances here, particularly the facts that there were two drawers' signatures on the check and the payee designation gave a specific account name and number, negated any implication of suspicious circumstances (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 826-827) .

§ 34.99 Opposing Contention That Collecting Bank Is Liable to Drawer for Amount of Check on Which Drawer's Signature Was Forged--Drawer's Negligence Cause of Action Is Displaced by Com. Code § 3418

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT _____ [DEPOSITARY and/or COLLECTING] BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN NEGLIGENCE FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, PAYABLE TO _____ [name of payee] AND ON WHICH PLAINTIFF's SIGNATURE AS DRAWER WAS FORGED, BECAUSE COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 3418 DISPLACES A NEGLIGENCE ACTION IN THIS SITUATION.

A. Commercial Code Section 3418 Displaces Negligence. Commercial Code Section 3418 articulates a loss-distribution scheme applicable to a collecting bank's failure to notice the forgery of a noncustomer-drawer's signature on a deposited check that displaces and precludes the drawer's negligence action against the collecting bank (Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 827-830, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (construing prior law)).

B. Bank Procedures Do Not Create Duty to Noncustomer Drawer. Although a violation of a company rule may be used as evidence of breach of a duty, it cannot be used to establish the existence of such a duty when contrary to both statutory and common law (Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 829, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting bank is liable to the drawer of a check for paying the proceeds of that check when the purported drawer's signature was forged on the ground that Com. Code § 3418 has displaced negligence.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, to bring the situation within the ambit of this rule, counsel should show that the only defect in the check is the forgery of the drawer's signature, that the drawer is not its customer, and that the circumstances of presentment were not so suspicious as to impart notice that would negate the availability of the defense of Com. Code § 3418.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that a collecting bank is not liable in negligence to a noncustomer-drawer whose signature is forged.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.97 and 34.98 oppose a collecting bank's liability for payment of a check with a forged drawer's signature. §§ 34.31-34.33 and 34.46-34.53 address a drawee bank's liability for charging the drawer's account to pay a check with a forged drawer's signature or one lacking all required drawers' signatures.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Commercial Code Section 3418 Displaces Negligence

The facts and procedural background of Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , and the portion of the opinion holding that defendant collecting bank had no duty under Com. Code § 4202(a)(1) to discover that the drawer's signature was forged, are discussed in § 34.97[3][a]. Plaintiff, the drawer's insurer, alleged that defendant was negligent in not discovering that one of the two required drawers' signatures was forged. Plaintiff argued that defendant failed to adhere to reasonable commercial standards in the banking business, and failed to follow procedures set forth in its own operations manual by failing (1) to check the depositor's prior banking connections or employment by its principal, (2) to determine ownership of the partnership that was its account holder, (3) to obtain a credit check on the account holder prior to opening the account, (4) to obtain a certified copy of the account holder's fictitious business name statement, (5) to contact plaintiff regarding disposition of the proceeds when defendant could reasonably be construed to be the payee, or a joint payee, of the check (note that defendant was determined not to be the payee of the check), (6) to have a staff member review the deposit because of its size ($25,000), (7) to contact the drawer although one of the purported drawer's signatures was the same as a signator in the account into which the check was deposited, (8) to inspect the endorsement even though it did not contain the signature of any person signing on behalf of the partnership (endorsement was typewritten), and (9) to ascertain whether defendant was required to endorse the check as joint payee (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 811 ns.29, 30).

The court of appeal discussed the elements of negligence and the fact that Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , had not held all negligence theories under which a drawer might recover from a collecting bank for losses occasioned by the fraudulent action of the drawer's employee to be displaced by the Commercial Code (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 811-813) . The court in Fireman's Fund noted two distinguishing factors between Sun'n Sand and this case: (1) in Sun'n Sand, the collecting bank was the payee, and (2) Sun'n Sand involved material alterations while this case involved a forged drawer's signature (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 813-814) . The court determined that defendant in this case was not the payee (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 814-818) , that defendant's presentment duties under former Com. Code § 4202(1)(a) (now see Com. Code § 4202(a)(1)) did not include the duty to verify the signature as that of the drawer (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 818-821) , and that defendant met the requirements for invoking the defense of former Com. Code § 3418 (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 821-827) . The court noted that the former version of Com. Code § 3418 (since amended in 1992) articulates a loss-distributive scheme that was applicable to the fact pattern as alleged (forged drawer's signature), and found that Com. Code § 3418 displaces an action for common law negligence (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 827) .

Plaintiff contended the defense of Com. Code § 3418 was only available to a collecting bank in an action by the drawee bank, not in an action by the drawer. The court found that contention violated the plain meaning of Com. Code § 3418 (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 827-829) . Plaintiff also contended that violation of defendant's own procedures gave rise to a duty, breach of which was negligence. The court responded by stating that while a violation of a company rule may be used as evidence of breach of a duty, it cannot be used to establish the existence of such a duty when contrary to both statutory and common law (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 829) . The court distinguished between imposing liability on a collecting bank, in the drawer's favor, for paying a check with a forged endorsement and for paying one with a forged drawer's signature, especially in terms of vitiating the final payment policy of Com. Code § 3418 (85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 830) .

[b] Bank Procedures Do Not Create Duty to Noncustomer Drawer

Fireman's Fund Ins Co v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 , is discussed in § 34.99[3][a].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Commercial Code Section 3418 Displaces Negligence

In Gentner v. Wells Fargo Bank (1999) 76 Cal. App. 4th 1165, 90 Cal. Rptr. 2d 904 , a Wells Fargo customer paid a consulting firm for services by check, on which it later stopped payment. When the firm presented the check to Wells Fargo, however, the bank paid it by issuing a cashier's check to the firm. Later, Wells Fargo issued a stop payment on the cashier's check and when the firm tried to deposit it at another bank, the cashier's check was not honored. The firm brought suit against Wells Fargo for wrongful dishonor of the cashier's check. The trial court found that the firm was a holder in due course of the cashier's check and entered judgment in the amount of the check plus interest (76 Cal. App. 4th 1165, 1166-1167) .

The court of appeal affirmed, concluding that as between a bank and a payee who acts in good faith, the Commercial Code clearly requires the bank to suffer the loss occasioned by its error in accepting or paying a check covered by a stop payment order, and the result is the same whether the check is paid in cash or exchanged for a cashier's check. The court first stated that the firm was entitled to holder-in-due-course status under Com. Code § 3302 (76 Cal. App. 4th 1165, 1168-1170) . It then held that the provisions of Com. Code § 3418 precluded the bank from recovering its mistaken payment as long as the payee took the instrument in good faith (76 Cal. App. 4th 1165, 1175-1176) . The court found that when a payee presents a check to the drawee bank, it is entitled to a prompt and accurate answer to the question of whether or not the check is good (76 Cal. App. 4th 1165, 1179-1180) .

§ 34.120 Supporting Contention That Collecting Bank Is Liable to Payee for Amount of Check Paid on Forged Endorsement [Com. Code § 3420]--Conversion Generally

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE PLAINTIFF's ENDORSEMENT ON THAT CHECK WAS FORGED AND DEFENDANT PAID THE PROCEEDS OF THAT CHECK OTHER THAN TO PLAINTIFF.

A. Conversion. [See § 34.70[1], Paragraph A.]

B. Presumed Damages for Conversion. [See § 34.70[1], Paragraph C.]

C. Payee's Action Against Collecting Bank for Conversion. If the amount of a check is paid on a forged endorsement to any person other than the designated payee or a person to whom the check was negotiated, the collecting bank is liable to the designated payee or other true owner for converting the amount of the check (see Com. Code § 3420(a); Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 376-377, 381-383, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 (construing prior law); Fabricon Products v. United Cal. Bank (1968) 264 Cal. App. 2d 113, 116-117, 70 Cal. Rptr. 50).

D. Defense of Commercial Code Section 3420(c). [See § 34.70[1], Paragraph D.]

E. Defense of Commercial Code Section 3420(c) Unavailable to Collecting Bank That Is Also Depositary Bank. The defense provided by Commercial Code Section 3420(c) is limited to collecting banks other than the depositary bank (Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

These points and authorities include a citation to Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 384-385, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 . This case was decided before the 1992 repeal and reenactment of Division 3, and thus should be used with caution. Portions of the opinion appear to have been effectively abrogated. For example, Com. Code § 3420(a) clearly eliminates a drawer's cause of action for conversion [see § 34.70[2]; see also discussion in § 34.95]. In addition, Cooper may be suspect in that it does not make a distinction in plaintiff/payee conversion cases as to whether the payee took delivery of the check or whether the thief/forger obtained it first. This distinction is now crucial [see Com. Code § 3420(a)(2)].

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a collecting bank is liable in conversion to the payee or other true owner of a check paid on a forged endorsement [see Com. Code § 3420]. Although the payee may sue any bank in the collection chain after he or she has taken delivery of the check [see Com. Code § 3420(a)], Com. Code § 3420(c) makes it far more efficacious for the payee to sue the depositary bank. Each of the other banks in the collection chain is apt to defend on the ground of having paid the proceeds in good faith to one not entitled to enforce the instrument [see Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)]. Thus, this form should be used only if the payee can establish that the defense of Com. Code § 3420 is inapplicable because either the collecting bank is also the depositary bank or the collecting bank did not deal with the check in good faith [see Com. Code § 3420(c)].

Although the payee may sue any bank in the collection chain he or she is entitled to but one recovery [Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)]. Under former Com. Code § 3419, the payee had causes of action against both the collecting bank and the drawee bank but could only pursue one of them because the payee's commencement of an action against the collecting bank extinguished the drawee's liability on the theory that the payee's action ratified the collection of the proceeds from the drawee bank [see Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 377-378, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 ; see also § 34.73].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation on the check, whether the check had been negotiated to any third person, the particular defect in the endorsement, and that the payee or true owner has not received any part of the proceeds or any replacement check or other duplicate payment from the drawer. Counsel must also establish that the defense provided by Com. Code § 3420(c) is unavailable to the collecting bank by showing, for example, that the collecting bank is also the depositary bank.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's liability to the payee for paying a check with a defective endorsement.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments, also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. §§ 34.121-34.122 support, and §§ 34.124-34.126 oppose the contention that the collecting bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. § 34.70 supports, and §§ 34.73-34.75 oppose the contention that the drawee bank is also liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47-34.48, 34.90-34.96, 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Payee's Action Against Collecting Bank for Conversion

The facts and procedural background of Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 , are discussed in § 34.70[3][a]. In considering the claims against the collecting banks that had paid the checks after they were deposited to the personal accounts of the forger, plaintiff's employee, the Supreme Court said it was clear, excluding for the moment the issue of plaintiff's negligence, that defendant collecting banks are liable for conversion unless they can establish a defense under former Com. Code § 3419(3) (now see Com. Code § 3420(c)) (9 Cal. 3d 371, 376) . The Court concluded that the defense was not available to the collecting banks (9 Cal. 3d 371, 377-378) , although this portion of the opinion appears to have been abrogated by 1992 legislation that makes the defense applicable to collecting banks other than the depositary bank [see Com. Code § 3420(c); Official Comment 3 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

Plaintiff in Fabricon Products v. United Cal. Bank (1968) 264 Cal. App. 2d 113, 70 Cal. Rptr. 50 , was payee of 20 checks deposited to its employee's personal account at defendant between September 25, 1962, and December 3, 1962. The checks were endorsed by the employee in his name preceded by the words "Fabricon Products Commission Agent." On July 16, 1965, plaintiff filed suit against defendant, setting forth causes of action for conversion and for money had and received. Defendant conceded that a collecting bank is liable to a payee whose endorsement is forged, but contended that the liability could only be asserted by a cause of action for money had and received that was governed by the two-year limitation of Code Civ. Proc. § 339(1). Defendant's demurrer on the ground of the statute of limitations was sustained. Judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. California courts have long recognized that the payee has an action for conversion, as well as for money had and received, against a collecting bank that has paid out on a check bearing the payee's forged endorsement. The principle behind the conversion theory is that because a forged endorsement is inoperative, the collecting bank acquires no right to retain the check or to enforce payment from the drawee. The collecting bank's retention of the check and use of it to obtain payment from the drawee is an exercise of dominion over the check inconsistent with and an interference with plaintiff's right to control and use of its own property (264 Cal. App. 2d 113, 116) . The court cited authorities from banking texts and other states for the proposition that a payee may base recovery on the theory of conversion or on money had and received (264 Cal. App. 2d 113, 117) . The portion of the opinion considering the applicable statute of limitations is discussed in § 34.124[3][a].

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO _____ [name of other payee] AND TO PLAINTIFF AS JOINT PAYEES, BECAUSE PLAINTIFF's ENDORSEMENT ON THAT CHECK WAS FORGED AND DEFENDANT PAID THE ENTIRE PROCEEDS OF THAT CHECK TO THE OTHER PAYEE(S).

B. Presumed Damages for Conversion. [See § 34.70[1], Paragraph C.]

C. Joint Payees. [See § 34.34[1], Paragraph E.]

D. Joint Payee's Action Against Collecting Bank. A collecting bank is liable in conversion to a joint payee whose endorsement was forged by another joint payee when that bank paid a check payable to joint payees to the joint payee who made his or her own endorsement and forged the endorsement of the other joint payee (Indiana Plumbing Supply Co. v. Bank of America (1967) 255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 913-916, 63 Cal. Rptr. 658 ; Harry H. White Lbr. Co. v. Crocker-Citizens Nat. Bk. (1967) 253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 373-374, 61 Cal. Rptr. 381 ; see Com. Code § 3420(a)).

[Optional] E. Delivery to One Joint Payee. The drawer's delivery of a joint payee check to one joint payee is sufficient delivery to permit the other joint payee to bring its action against the collecting bank for payment of the check on his or her forged endorsement (Indiana Plumbing Supply Co. v. Bank of America (1967) 255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 917-918, 63 Cal. Rptr. 658).

CAUTION:

See § 34.47 for discussion of authorities establishing that the bank is liable to the joint payee whose endorsement was forged only to the extent that the payee did not receive the amount of the proceeds intended by the drawer [Southern Cal. Permanente Medical Group v. Bozinovski (1983) 148 Cal. App. 3d 503, 507, 196 Cal. Rptr. 150] .

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a collecting bank is liable in conversion to one joint payee when the entire amount of the check was paid on his or her forged endorsement to the other joint payee [see Com. Code §§ 3110(d), 3420(a)]. For discussion of who the payee may sue in the collection chain and the availability of but one recovery, see the Comments to § 34.120.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation on the check, whether the check had been negotiated to any third person, the forgery, and that plaintiff joint payee has not received any part of the proceeds or any replacement check or other duplicate payment from the drawer.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's liability to the joint payee for payment of a check with a defective endorsement.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see. e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. §§ 34.120 and 34.122 support, and §§ 34.124-34.126 oppose the contention that the collecting bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. § 34.70 supports, and § 34.73-34.75 oppose the contention that the drawee bank is also liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in § 34.34, § 34.47-34.48, § 34.90-34.92, § 34.93-34.96, and § 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Joint Payee's Action Against Collecting Bank

Com. Code § 3420(a) provides that an instrument is converted if it is taken by transfer, other than a negotiation, from a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or a bank makes or obtains payment with regard to the instrument for a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or receive payment. This covers cases in which an instrument is payable to two persons who are not alternative payees. Under Com. Code § 3110(d) the check may be negotiated or enforced only by both persons acting jointly. Thus, neither payee acting without the other's consent is a person entitled to enforce the instrument. If one payee endorses the check but the other does not, and the bank takes the check for deposit to the endorser's account, the bank is liable to the nonendorsing payee for conversion if the nonendorsing payee did not consent to the transaction [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C § 3-420 (1990)].

Plaintiff in Indiana Plumbing Supply Co. v. Bank of America (1967) 255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 63 Cal. Rptr. 658 , was joint payee, with another plumbing company, of three checks totalling $6,060. All of that sum was owed by the other plumbing company to plaintiff, but the drawer delivered the checks to the other joint payee. The president of the other joint payee forged plaintiff's signature and presented the checks to defendant, which paid him the entire amount of the checks. Defendant collected the amount of the checks from the drawee banks. Plaintiff sued defendant collecting bank, and moved for summary judgment. Defendant did not submit any counter declarations. Summary judgment was granted and judgment entered in plaintiff's favor. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court reviewed the facts established by plaintiff's declarations and copies of the checks: the checks were payable to the payees jointly; the other joint payee's endorsement was genuine and that of plaintiff was forged; the other joint payee had no authority to make plaintiff's endorsement; the checks were presented to defendant by the other joint payee; defendant paid the amount of the checks to the other joint payee and collected that sum from the drawee banks; all of the money represented by the checks was owing from the other joint payee to plaintiff; and plaintiff received none of the money represented by the three checks from any source (255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 913-914) . The court said there was no merit to defendant's attack on the sufficiency of the evidence. It has long been held that a collecting bank is liable to a payee when it pays on a forged endorsement. Harry H. White Lbr. Co. v. Crocker-Citizens Nat. Bk. (1967) 253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 373-374, 61 Cal. Rptr. 381 (discussed below), extended this rule to a joint payee on facts almost identical to those involved here (255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 914-915) .

Defendant also contended that there was a triable issue of fact as to what interest, if any, plaintiff had in the checks, and that there was nonjoinder of an indispensable party because the issue of plaintiff's interest could not be determined without joinder of the other joint payee. The court said that, as no opposing declarations were submitted, it was never disputed that the other payee had no interest in the checks. Thus, there was no necessity for joinder (255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 918) .

Plaintiff in Harry H. White Lbr. Co. v. Crocker-Citizens Nat. Bk. (1967) 253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 61 Cal. Rptr. 381 , was joint payee of four checks payable to it and another company. The drawer delivered the checks to the other payee, who forged plaintiff's endorsement, presented them to, and received payment from, defendant as collecting bank. The checks totalled $5,760, and plaintiff claimed an interest of $2,472 on them. The claim represented the amount owing by the other joint payee to plaintiff for lumber sold to it by plaintiff. Three of the checks were dated in 1964 and were governed by the former Negotiable Instruments Law (former Civ. Code §§ 3104, 3122). The last check was drawn in 1965 and was governed by former Com. Code §§ 3116 and 3404 (now see Com. Code §§ 3110(d), 3403). Defendant demurred on the ground that under former Civ. Code § 3200(4) (now see Civ. Code § 1475; Com. Code § 3601(a)), payment to the other joint payee had discharged its obligation. Judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. Former Civ. Code § 3104 (now see Com. Code § 3403) provided that a forged signature was wholly inoperative and no discharge or other right may be acquired under a forged signature. Former Civ. Code § 3122 (now see Com. Code § 3110(d)) provided that the endorsement of all joint payees was required to negotiate a check. The court said that Civ. Code § 1475 and former Civ. Code § 3200(4) did not apply because the collecting bank was not a party to the underlying obligation. Any rights of defendant came only through the check's negotiation, which required endorsements of both payees (253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 372-373) . The court said that construing former Civ. Code §§ 3104 and 3122 together, a collecting bank is liable to a joint payee whose signature has been forged when that bank has paid a negotiable instrument payable to joint payees without the authorized endorsement of both or all of the joint payees (253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 373) . The theory of recovery is conversion (253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 374) . Concerning the last check, the court said that former Com. Code § 3116 (now see Com. Code § 3110(d)) was clear that the requirement that all joint payees must join in endorsing a check made out to them other than in the alternative applies not only to negotiation, but also to discharge (253 Cal. App. 2d 368, 374-375) .

[b] Delivery to One Joint Payee

The facts and procedural background of Indiana Plumbing Supply Co. v. Bank of America (1967) 255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 63 Cal. Rptr. 658 , are discussed in § 34.121[3][a]. Defendant contended that the motion for summary judgment should have been denied under Jones v. Bank of America (1942) 49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 121 P.2d 94 (discussed in § 34.126[3][a]), because there had been no delivery of the checks to plaintiff. In Jones, the checks were delivered to the manager of one of the drawer's offices who was supposed to deliver the checks to the payees, but who forged their endorsements instead. The court distinguished Jones on the basis that there, the checks never left the custody, possession, and control of the drawers (255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 916) . The case of George v. Security Trust & Savings Bank (1928) 91 Cal. App. 708, 267 P. 560 , had been discussed in and distinguished from Jones on the basis that in George the checks were delivered by the drawer to a third person who was not the payee. The court in Indiana Plumbing concluded that, as in George, delivery was sufficient because it had been made by the drawer with the intent and purpose of giving effect to it (255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 916-917) . Delivery also was to the other joint payee as it was in Harry H. White Lbr. The court said that implicit in Harry H. White Lbr. is the ruling that delivery to one joint payee is sufficient to permit the other joint payee to bring its action against the collecting bank (255 Cal. App. 2d 910, 917-918) .

This conclusion appears consistent with the 1992 repeal and reenactment of Division 3 of the Commercial Code. Under the revised Code, an action for conversion may not be brought by a payee who did not receive delivery of the instrument [Com. Code § 3420(a)(2)]. However, if a check is payable to more than one payee, delivery to one of the payees is deemed to be delivery to all of the payees [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C § 3-420, 5th paragraph (1990)].

§ 34.122 Supporting Contention That Collecting Bank Is Liable to Payee for Amount of Check Paid on Forged Endorsement [Com. Code § 3420(a)]--Bank's Negligence Bars Defense Based on Payee's Contributory Negligence [Com. Code § 3406]

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE PLAINTIFF's ENDORSEMENT ON THAT CHECK WAS FORGED AND DEFENDANT WAS NEGLIGENT IN FAILING TO COMPLY WITH REASONABLE COMMERCIAL STANDARDS IN PAYING THE CHECK TO A THIRD PERSON.

A. Contributory Negligence. [See § 34.52[1], Paragraph A.]

B. Collecting Bank's Negligence Precludes Defense Based on Payee's Negligence. A [collecting] bank cannot assert the defense of contributory negligence established by Commercial Code Section 3406, unless it acted in accordance with the reasonable commercial standards of the banking business (Hermetic Refrig. Co., Inc. v. Central Valley Nat. Bank Inc. (9th Cir. 1974) 493 F.2d 476, 477-478 (construing prior law)).

[2] Comments

CAUTION:

Hermetic Refrig. Co. was decided under the former provision of the Commercial Code applicable to contributory negligence. Com. Code § 3406, as enacted by Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 6, adopts a concept of comparative negligence. If the person precluded under Com. Code § 3406(a) proves that the person asserting the preclusion failed to exercise ordinary care and that failure substantially contributed to the loss, the loss may be allocated between the two parties on a comparative negligence basis [Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-406 (1990)]. Although the defense of the payee's negligence is still only available to a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection [see Com. Code § 3406(a); see also Com. Code § 1201(b)(20) ("good faith" defined)], the adoption of a comparative negligence standard may be construed as effectively abrogating the court's decision in Hermetic Refrig. Co. that the bank's negligence precludes a defense based on the payee's negligence.

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a collecting bank is liable in conversion to the payee of a check paid on a forged endorsement and cannot rely on the defense of the payee's contributory negligence under Com. Code § 3406 when the bank did not act in accordance with reasonable commercial standards in paying the check [see Com. Code § 3406]. For discussion of who the payee may sue in the collection chain and the availability of but one recovery, see § 34.120[2].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts describing the payee designation on the check, whether the check had been negotiated to any third person, the forgery, that the plaintiff payee has not received any part of the proceeds or any replacement check or other duplicate payment from the drawer, the reasonable commercial standards applicable, and the collecting bank's deviation from those standards.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's liability based on the unavailability of this defense.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. The points and authorities in § 34.120 -34.121 support, and those in § 34.124-34.126 oppose, the contention that the collecting bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. The points and authorities in § 34.70 support, and those in § 34.73-34.75 oppose, the contention that the drawee bank is liable for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement on various grounds, including the availability of the defense of the payee's contributory negligence under Com. Code § 3406 [§ 34.74].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Collecting Bank's Negligence Precludes Defense Based on Payee's Negligence

Plaintiff in Hermetic Refrig. Co., Inc. v. Central Valley Nat. Bank Inc. (9th Cir. 1974) 493 F.2d 476 , was payee of certain checks. An employee of plaintiff who was in charge of its Oakland office and was authorized to deposit large checks to plaintiff's account at another bank used a stamp with plaintiff's name and address to endorse the checks in question, and then endorsed his own name below the stamp. The employee deposited the checks in his personal checking account at defendant bank. The employee's defalcations were not discovered for six years. The district court refused to accept the collecting bank's defense of the payee's contributory negligence, and entered judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeals affirmed. The court set forth the provisions of the former version of Com. Code § 3406 (since amended in 1992), and said that section does not establish liability, but creates a conditional estoppel. However, citing Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 383, 385-386, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 , the court stated that before a bank can take advantage of the estoppel, it must first show that it acted in accordance with reasonable commercial standards of the banking business. Even assuming that the payee in this case was contributorily negligent, uncontradicted testimony showed that defendant failed to comply with the reasonable commercial standards of the banking business (493 F.2d 476, 477) . Without discussing the evidence or how defendant's actions fell short of reasonable commercial standards of the banking business, the court upheld the district court's ruling that the defense of contributory negligence was unavailable (493 F.2d 476, 477-478) .

D. Collecting Bank's Liability To Payee

3-34 California Points & Authorities § 34.123

§ 34.123 Supporting Contention That Depositary Bank Is Liable to Payee for Failure to Make Proceeds of Deposited Item Available for Withdrawal Within Time Required [12 U.S.C. § 4010; 12 C.F.R. § 229.21]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT DEPOSITARY BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____, PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, AND DEPOSITED TO PLAINTIFF's ACCOUNT AT DEFENDANT BANK ON _____ [date], BECAUSE DEFENDANT FAILED TO MAKE THE PROCEEDS OF THAT CHECK AVAILABLE TO PLAINTIFF BY THE TIME REQUIRED UNDER _____ [specify relevant statute and/or regulation, e.g., TITLE 12 OF THE UNITED STATES CODE SECTION 4002(a)(2)(D), (c)(1)(B)(iii) AND TITLE 12 OF THE CODE OF FEDERAL REGULATIONS SECTION 229.10(c)(1)(vii)].

A. Bank's Liability Under Regulation CC, Subpart B, and Federal Expedited Funds Availability Act--Individual Plaintiff. Any depository institution that fails to comply with any requirement imposed by the federal Expedited Funds Availability Act (12 U.S.C. § 4001 et seq.) and Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Part 229, Subpart B (12 C.F.R. § 229.10 et seq.), or with any provision of state law that supersedes any provision of Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Sections 229.10-229.21, with regard to any person other than another depository institution, is liable to that person in an amount equal to the actual damage sustained by that person as a result of the failure to comply, plus an additional amount between $100 and $1,000 as allowed by the court [except that this section does not apply to actions for wrongful dishonor] (12 U.S.C. § 4010(a)(1), (2)(A); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(a)(1), (2)(i)[, (f)]).

B. Attorney's Fees. In the case of a successful action to enforce liability under Title 12 of the United States Code Section 4010 and Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.21, the prevailing party is entitled to costs and reasonable attorney's fees as determined by the court (12 U.S.C. § 4010(a)(3); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(a)(3)).

[Optional] C. Class Action. In a class action under Title 12 of the United States Code Section 4010 and Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.21, actual damages, costs, and attorney's fees are recoverable as they would be in an individual action, except that with regard to the additional amount allowed by the court, there is no minimum recovery on the amount awarded to each member of the class. [However, the total recovery in any class action or series of class actions arising out of the same failure to comply by the same institution must not exceed the lesser of $500,000 or one percent of the net worth of the depository institution] (12 U.S.C. § 4010(a)(2)(B); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(a)(2)(ii)).

[Optional] D. Considerations Regarding Award in Class Action. In a class action under Title 12 of the United States Code Section 4010 and Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.21, the court, in determining the amount of any award, must consider, along with other relevant factors, the amount of any actual damages awarded, the frequency and persistence of failures of compliance, the depository institution's resources, the number of persons adversely affected, and the extent to which the failure of compliance was intentional (12 U.S.C. § 4010(b); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(b)).

[Optional] E. Statute of Limitation. An action under Title 12 of the United States Code Section 4010 and Title 12 of the Code of Federal Regulations Section 229.21 may be brought within one year after the date of the occurrence of the violation involved (12 U.S.C. § 4010(d); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(d)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a depositary bank or other financial institution governed by the federal Expedited Funds Availability Act is liable to its depositor for failure to make the proceeds of a check [see 12 U.S.C. § 4001(7); 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(k)] deposited in that customer's account [see 12 U.S.C. § 4001(1); 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(a)] available for withdrawal or for writing checks within the time required by 12 U.S.C. §§ 4002 and 4003, 12 C.F.R. §§ 229.10-229.14, or any California regulation that provides a shorter availability requirement than the federal law [see 12 U.S.C. § 4007; 12 C.F.R. § 229.20; see also Fin. Code § 866.5; 10 Cal. Code Reg. §§ 10.190400-10.190402 (banks), 30.101 (credit unions), 40.101 (industrial loan companies), 106.200-106.202 (savings and loan associations)]. Those actual availability deadlines are beyond the scope of this chapter but are discussed in California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 95, Banks, Deposits, and Checks (Matthew Bender), as are the terms "account" and "check."

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case; for example, facts describing the type of check, the date of deposit, and the circumstances regarding the failure or refusal of the depositary to allow withdrawal or use of the proceeds.

This form may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the depositary bank's liability to the payee for failure to make the proceeds available within the time required.

[b] Depository and Depositary

The federal Expedited Funds Availability Act uses the term "depository institution" to describe all financial institutions subject to the act. As defined by that act, "depository institution" means just about every conceivable type of organization that accepts deposits [see 12 U.S.C. § 4001(12)]. Thus, the points and authorities in this form apply to deposits made to demand deposit or transaction accounts in any bank, savings bank, mutual savings bank, credit union, savings and loan association, building and loan association, homestead association, cooperative bank, insurance company, trust company, industrial loan company, or any other institution in the business of receiving deposits, whether organized under federal law or state law [see 12 U.S.C. § 4001(12); 12 C.F.R. § 229.2(e)].

The term "depositary bank" is used in this form in its Commercial Code sense to mean the first depository institution to take the check [see Com. Code § 4105(2)].

Federal court subject matter jurisdiction under 12 U.S.C. § 4010(a), (d), and (f), is not confined to suits by bank customers against banks. The Act also provides for federal court jurisdiction in a suit by one bank against another bank [Bank One Chicago v. Midwest B & T (1996) 516 U.S. 264, 116 S. Ct. 637, 641-643, 133 L. Ed. 2d 635] .

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Bank's Liability Under Regulation CC, Subpart B and Federal Expedited Funds Availability Act

[i] Individual Plaintiff

Title 12 U.S.C. § 4010(a) and 12 C.F.R. § 229.21 do not apply to actions that arise under 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq. (interbank responsibilities regarding collection of checks) [see 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(f)]. For points and authorities regarding liability under 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq., see §§ 34.71 and 34.76.

Title 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(f), but not 12 U.S.C. § 4010(a), excludes liability for wrongful dishonor [12 C.F.R. § 229.21(f)].

A depository institution is not liable for failing to comply with any requirement imposed by the federal Expedited Funds Availability Act or regulations promulgated thereunder if that institution demonstrates by a preponderance of the evidence that the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error [12 U.S.C. § 4010(c)(1); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(c)(1)]. Examples of bona fide errors include clerical errors, calculation errors, computer malfunction and programming errors, and printing errors. However, an error of legal judgment with regard to a depository institution's obligation under 12 U.S.C. § 4001 et seq. is not a bona fide error [12 U.S.C. § 4010(c)(2); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(c)(2)].

As with liability under 12 C.F.R. § 229.30 et seq., an act or omission done in good faith in conformity with any rule, regulation, or interpretation of a rule or regulation by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System is a complete defense [12 C.F.R. § 229.21(e) (which is the same as 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(h), set forth in § 34.76)].

An action under 12 U.S.C. § 4010 and 12 C.F.R. § 229.21 may be brought in United States district court or in any other court of competent jurisdiction [12 U.S.C. § 4010(d); 12 C.F.R. § 229.21(d)].

[a] Statute of Limitations

In Mihai Beffa v. Bank of the West (1998) 152 F.3d 1174 , a bank deposited a foreign wire transfer to the wrong account on December 9, 1993. As a result of his inquiries at the bank and his review of his bank statements, the customer knew by January 1994 that the funds had not been deposited into his account. Using this date, under EFAA, the statute of limitations would have expired in mid-December 1994, but the customer did not file his complaint until November 1995. The bank moved for summary judgment, asserting that the customer's EFAA claim was untimely under 12 U.S.C. § 4010(d). In response, the customer argued that the statute of limitations should be tolled until March 1995, the time at which he allegedly learned that the bank was at fault for the breakdown in the transfer. The district court noted that EFAA does not contain an express notice provision and declined to recognize any implied notice requirement. The court also held that even if notice were required under EFAA, the customer had the requisite notice by January 1994. It granted summary judgment for the bank on the EFAA claim. The Ninth Circuit affirmed, finding that even if the statute of limitations was tolled until plaintiff received notice of the violation, his complaint was untimely because once he knew the foreign wire transfer was not credited to his account, he chose to blame the foreign bank rather than using due diligence to track it through his own bank (152 F.3d 1174, 1176-1177) .

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

PLAINTIFF-PAYEE's ACTION AGAINST DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK FOR CONVERSION ARISING FROM DEFENDANT's PAYMENT OF THE CHECKS DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawers] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE TOTAL AMOUNT OF $_____, IS BARRED BY THE THREE-YEAR LIMITATION OF COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 3118(g).

Limitation Applicable to Conversion Action Based on Forged Endorsement. An action for an instrument's conversion, for money had and received, or like action based on conversion, must be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrues (Com. Code § 3118(g)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting or depositary bank is liable in conversion to the payee or other true owner of a check paid on a forged endorsement when the action is commenced more than three years after the checks were negotiated [see Com. Code § 3118(g)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the dates on which the checks were paid.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the statute of limitations.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. The points and authorities in §§ 34.120 -34.122 support, and those in §§ 34.125-34.126 oppose, the contention that the collecting bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. The points and authorities in §§ 34.70 and 34.73 -34.75 address drawees' conversion liability to payees for paying checks on forged endorsements. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47-34.48, 34.90-34.92, 34.93-34.96, and 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Limitation Applicable to Conversion Action Based on Forged Endorsement

The three-year limitation period runs from the time the cause of action accrues [Com. Code § 3118(g)]. Accrual of a cause of action is stated in other sections of Division 3, such as those that state the various obligations of the parties to the instrument. The only purpose of Com. Code § 3118 is to define the time within which an action to enforce an obligation, duty, or right arising under Division 3 must be commenced [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-118 (1990)].

In addition to the statute of limitations set forth in Com. Code § 3118(g), Division 4 provides a limitations period that conforms to the Division 3 period of limitations; that is, an action to enforce an obligation, duty, or right arising under Division 4 must also be commenced within three years after the cause of action accrues [Com. Code § 4111]. Moreover, the period of limitations set forth in the Code of Civil Procedure for similar actions, which applied before the adoption of the Commercial Code provisions [see § 34.124[4][a]] is consistent with the statutory periods of the Commercial Code [see Code Civ. Proc. § 338(c) (three year limitation for actions for taking, detaining, or injuring any goods or chattels, including actions for specific recovery of personal property)].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Limitation Applicable to Conversion Action Based on Forged Endorsement

Plaintiff-payee in La Vista Cemetery Assn. v. American Sav. & Loan Assn. (1970) 12 Cal. App. 3d 365, 90 Cal. Rptr. 722 , was the payee of three checks totalling $30,000. In August 1964, plaintiff's endorsements were forged by employees who deposited the checks to an account at defendant savings and loan association. That account was in the name of an entity controlled by the employees. Defendant collected the amount of the checks from the drawee banks, and the employees withdrew all funds in the account and absconded. In February 1969, plaintiff sued defendant for recovery of money on deposit and for actual and constructive fraud. In affirming the judgment for defendant, the court of appeal said that a payee's remedies against a collecting bank that collects from the drawee and gives the money to a person who forged the payee's endorsement are conversion or money had and received. The limitation for the cause of action for conversion is three years. Undaunted by these realities, plaintiff found two other theories not barred by the statute of limitations (12 Cal. App. 3d 365, 368) . However, no cause of action was stated under those theories (12 Cal. App. 3d 365, 368-369) .

The facts and procedural background of Fabricon Products v. United Cal. Bank (1968) 264 Cal. App. 2d 113, 70 Cal. Rptr. 50 , are discussed in § 34.120[3][a]. Decided before the enactment of a Commercial Code period of limitations [Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 6], the court of appeal said that the payee's action predicated on a theory of a check's conversion by the collecting bank is governed by the three-year statute of limitations of former Code Civ. Proc. § 338(3) (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 338(c)) (264 Cal. App. 2d 113, 117) . Citing Ponti v. Farrell (1961) 194 Cal. App. 2d 676, 682-683, 15 Cal. Rptr. 500 , the court stated that when a cause of action is pleaded as money had and received, the applicable statute of limitations is the one governing the underlying tort. The three-year limitation period might also apply to the cause of action for money had and received, but the court did not decide that issue. The survival of the conversion causes of action was enough to require reversal (264 Cal. App. 2d 113, 118) . However, Com. Code § 3118(g) now clearly applies a three-year limitation period to a cause of action for money had and received.

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECKS DATED _____, PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE TOTAL AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE PLAINTIFF's NEGLIGENCE IN FAILING TO DISCOVER AND PREVENT THE FORGERIES PRECLUDES HIM/HER FROM ASSERTING THE FORGED SIGNATURES.

A. Unauthorized Signature Is Inoperative. An unauthorized signature, which under Commercial Code Section 1201(b)(41) includes a forgery or one made without actual, implied, or apparent authority, is ineffective except as the signature of the unauthorized signer in favor of a person who in good faith pays the instrument or takes it for value (Com. Code § 3403(a)).

B. Payee's Negligence Precludes Assertion of Forged Signatures. A person whose failure to exercise ordinary care contributes to an alteration of an instrument or to the making of a forged signature on an instrument is precluded from asserting the alteration or the forgery against a person who, in good faith, pays the instrument or takes it for value or for collection (Com. Code § 3406(a)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to the contention that a collecting or depositary bank is liable in conversion to the payee or other true owner of a check paid on a forged endorsement when the forgeries were made under circumstances that indicate that the payee's negligence was a substantial factor in the forgeries. For this defense to apply, the bank must have paid the checks in good faith [see Com. Code § 3406(a)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the facts establishing the payee's or true owner's negligence and the bank's good faith. In addition, because of the adoption of a comparative negligence standard, counsel may also wish to set forth facts establishing that the bank was not negligent in paying the checks or taking them for collection [see Com. Code § 3406(b)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's freedom from liability because of the payee's negligence.

[b] Negligence Preclusion Under Prior Law

Former Com. Code Section 3404(1) stated that an unauthorized signature was inoperative as the signature of the person whose name was signed unless that person was "precluded from denying it." Under former Com. Code § 3406 if negligence by the person whose name was signed contributed to an unauthorized signature, that person was "precluded from asserting the ..... lack of authority." Both of these sections were applied to cases in which a forged signature appeared on an instrument and the person asserting rights on the instrument alleged that the purported signer's negligence contributed to the forgery. Since the standards for liability between the two sections differed, the overlap caused confusion. Com. Code § 3403(a) deals with the problem by removing the preclusion language that appeared in former Com. Code § 3404 [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-403 (1990); see, e.g., Cooper v. Union Bank (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 371, 383-384, 107 Cal. Rptr. 1, 507 P.2d 609 (under former Com. Code § 3404, payee's negligence in failing to discover patent defalcations of employee, which was directly responsible for bank's detrimental change of position in paying employee amount of checks, precluded payee from denying validity of forged endorsements to extent necessary to avoid unconscionable result)]. Thus, the preclusion should now be asserted under Com. Code § 3406.

Com. Code § 3406 refers to a "forged instrument" rather than "unauthorized signature" [compare Com. Code § 3406(a) with former Com. Code § 3406]. Unauthorized signature is a broader concept that includes not only forgery but also the signature of an agent that does not bind the principal under the law of agency. The agency cases are resolved independently under agency law, and Com. Code § 3406 is not necessary in those cases [Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-406 (1990)].

[c] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in § 34.42 support the contention that a drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of a check because the drawee was comparatively negligent. § 34.52 opposes the contention that a drawee is liable to the drawer for unauthorized payment of a check because the drawer's failure to exercise ordinary care contributed to an alteration or forgery of the check. § 34.74 opposes the contention that a drawee is liable to the payee for the amount of a check paid on a forged endorsement because the payee's negligence substantially contributed to the forged endorsement. The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.34 and 34.93 -34.94 address particular payee designations. Ch. 166, Negotiable Instruments also includes forms addressing particular payee designations [see, e.g., forms applying Com. Code § 3109 (instruments payable to bearer or order)]. §§ 34.120-34.122 support, and §§ 34.124 and 34.126 oppose, the contention that the collecting bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. §§ 34.70 and 34.73-34.75 address drawees' conversion liability to payees for paying checks on forged endorsements. Other aspects of the validity and requirements of endorsements, and of liability for payment on an improper endorsement, are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47-34.48, 34.90-34.96, and 34.171.

§ 34.126 Opposing Contention That Collecting Bank Is Liable to Payee for Amount of Check Paid on Forged Endorsement [Com. Code § 3420(a)]--Check Was Never Delivered by Drawer

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE THAT CHECK WAS NEVER DELIVERED BY ITS DRAWER.

No Delivery. When a check is stolen and the payee's endorsement forged before the drawer has parted with custody, possession, or control of the check, or otherwise delivered it to the payee, the payee never acquires any interest in the check and has no cause of action [against the collecting bank] based on payment of the check on a forged endorsement (Jones v. Bank of America (1942) 49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 119-122, 121 P.2d 94 ; see Com. Code § 3420(a)(2); Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a bank is liable in conversion to the payee of a check paid on a forged endorsement when the check was never delivered by the drawer. In such a case, the payee never acquires any interest in the check [see Com. Code § 3420(a)(2); Jones v. Bank of America (1942) 49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 119-122, 121 P.2d 94] .

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the facts establishing the lack of delivery.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the payee's lack of interest in an undelivered check.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities set out in §§ 34.121 and 34.171 support findings of delivery when the drawer delivered the check to one joint payee or to a third party. §§ 34.120 and 34.122 support, and §§ 34.124-34.125 oppose, the contention that the collecting bank is liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. § 34.70 supports, and §§ 34.73-34.75 oppose, the contention that the drawee bank is also liable to the payee for conversion for paying a check on a forged endorsement. Liability of drawee banks for payment on an improper endorsement are addressed in §§ 34.34, 34.47-34.48, 34.90-34.92, 34.93-34.96, and 34.171.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] No Delivery

Com. Code § 3420(a)(2) provides that an action for an instrument's conversion may not be brought by a payee who did not receive delivery of the instrument either directly or through delivery to an agent or a copayee. Until delivery, the payee does not have any interest in the check. The payee never became the check's holder nor a person entitled to enforce the check [see Com. Code § 3301]. Nor is the payee injured by fraud. Normally the check's drawer intends to pay an obligation owed to the payee. If the check is never delivered to the payee, however, the obligation is unaffected and continues after the thief/forger obtains payment. Thus, the payee may still enforce the underlying obligation and there is no reason to give him or her an additional remedy [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-420 (1990)].

Plaintiff in Jones v. Bank of America (1942) 49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 121 P.2d 94 , was the claims manager of drawer's surety, and based his standing on assignments by the payees of their causes of action against defendant collecting bank. The payees were customers of the Long Beach office of the brokerage firm-drawer, and the checks were settlement of securities sales. The checks that are relevant to the issue considered here were drawn by the appropriate officers of the drawer at its main office in Los Angeles and forwarded to its Long Beach office. The manager of the Long Beach office forged the payees' endorsements and deposited the checks in his personal account at defendant. Defendant collected the amount of the checks from the drawee banks and paid that amount in due course to the forger. The drawer paid the payees the amounts owed to each of them for their respective securities sales, and claimed that amount from its surety under an agreement relating to losses occasioned by employee fraud or embezzlement. Defendant answered, denying that the checks were ever issued, and argued that by reason of the nondelivery to the payees, the payees never had any interest in the checks, and therefore were not damaged by defendant collecting bank's payment to the forger. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The court agreed with defendant, that the checks were never in fact issued because they were stolen while still undelivered and in the drawer's hands. The intended payees never became owners of the checks and never had any interest in them (49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 119) . The court relied on former Civ. Code § 3097 (now see Com. Code §§ 3105(b), 3303(b), 3305(a)(2)), which specified that every contract on a negotiable instrument is incomplete and revocable until delivery of the instrument for the purpose of giving effect to it, and on a criminal case for what constituted felonious taking of an undelivered note. If there was no delivery of the checks to the payees, the checks remained the drawer's property (49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 120) . The court distinguished George v. Security Trust & Savings Bank (1928) 91 Cal. App. 708, 267 P. 560 , relied on by plaintiff and in which the checks were delivered by the drawer to a third person who was not the payee. George and the other cases cited by the court were distinguished on the basis of the drawer's release or delivery of the check with the intent to give effect to it (49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 121) . Here, the checks never left the drawer's custody, control, or possession. The forger was the firm's employee and agent; he was not the payee's agent (49 Cal. App. 2d 115, 122) .

The California Supreme Court in Garthwaite v. Bank of Tulare (1901) 134 Cal. 237, 66 P. 326 (discussed in § 34.171[3][a]), held that the payee never acquired any interest in a check that was lost in the mail before it reached the payee (134 Cal. 237, 241) .

The court of appeal in Burke v. Mission Bay Yacht Sales (1963) 214 Cal. App. 2d 723, 29 Cal. Rptr. 685 , affirmed a judgment for a purchaser of a cashier's check and against the payee on the ground that plaintiff had been fraudulently induced to part with the check. But for the fraud, the check never would have been delivered. It would have remained the plaintiff's property, and the payee would not have acquired any interest in it (214 Cal. App. 2d 723, 732) .

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a depositary bank is liable in conversion to the payee of a check paid on a missing endorsement.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, for example, counsel should set forth the dates on which the check was paid.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the depositary bank's liability to the payee for making payment on a check with a missing endorsement.

[b] Related Pleading and Practice Forms

For a complaint for use by a payee whose endorsement was missing, to recover the amount of the check from the depositary bank that paid on the check, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 95, Banks, Deposits, and Checks, § 34.53 (Matthew Bender). For an affirmative defense by a bank asserting that the person who made a deposit had the authority to do so, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 95, Banks, Deposits, and Checks, § 95.462 (Matthew Bender).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Authority to Deposit Without Endorsement

Under Com. Code § 3420(a), an instrument is converted if a bank makes or obtains payment with respect to the instrument for a person not entitled to enforce the instrument or receive payment. Although there is no California case law directly on point regarding the conversion liability of the depositary bank under that section when the payee has not endorsed the check, a Ninth Circuit case has held that a depositary bank's liability for statutory conversion for depositing a check without the payee's endorsement turns on the question of whether the person who deposited the check had the authority to do so.

In In re Bartoni-Corsi Produce, Inc. (9th Cir. [Cal.] 1997) 130 F.3d 857 , a corporation's sole director and shareholder approved the sale of all corporate assets to a corporation formed to purchase its assets, and authorized its agents to deposit checks payable to the selling corporation into a bank account of the purchasing corporation. The president and vice-president of the new corporation deposited a number of checks payable to the first corporation into the new corporation's account, without endorsement of the first corporation. The first corporation's bankruptcy trustee brought a conversion action against the bank which had accepted those checks for deposit, alleging that it improperly accepted for deposit checks payable to the debtor without the debtor's endorsement. The Bankruptcy Court found the bank liable for statutory conversion under California law, and the federal district court affirmed (130 F.3d 857, 860) .

The federal court of appeals held that the bankruptcy court erred in concluding that conversion liability arises without regard to whether the person who deposited the check had the authority to do so when the payee has not endorsed the check. The precise question presented in this matter had not been resolved by a California court in a published opinion. The federal court of appeals, therefore, was required to predict how the highest California court would decide the issue (130 F.3d 857, 861) . It held that the depositary bank's liability for statutory conversion for depositing the check without the payee's endorsement turned on the authority of the person depositing the check, that the persons making the deposits had implied actual authority to deposit the checks payable to the debtor into an account belonging to the business formed to purchase debtor's assets, and that the agents were acting within the scope of implied actual authority as to the bank when they deposited the checks, even though their conduct was detrimental to the debtor (130 F.3d 857, 861-863) .

[b] Burden of Proof

The facts and procedural background of In re Bartoni-Corsi Produce, Inc. (9th Cir. [Cal.] 1997) 130 F.3d 857 , are discussed in § 34.127[3][a]. The federal court of appeals, resolving the parties' disagreement over who has the burden to prove or disprove the existence of corporate authority, stated that once the plaintiff has shown that the necessary endorsement is missing, the burden to prove authority shifts to the defendant (130 F.3d 857, 862 n.8).

§ 34.128 Opposing Contention That Collecting or Depositary Bank Is Liable to Payee for Amount of Deposited Check--Provisional Settlement Properly Reversed; Bank's Right of Chargeback [Com. Code §§ 4105, 4107, 4201, 4214 12 C.F.R. § 229.33(d)]

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT _____ [DEPOSITARY and/or COLLECTING] BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE DEFENDANT's REVOCATION OF PROVISIONAL SETTLEMENT WAS [TIMELY AND] PROPER.

A. Settlement by Collecting Bank Is Provisional. Unless a contrary intent clearly appears, and before the time that a settlement given by a collecting bank for an item is, or becomes, final, the bank, with regard to the item, is an agent or subagent of the owner of the item and any settlement given for the item is provisional. This provision applies regardless of the form of endorsement or lack of endorsement and even though credit given for the item is subject to immediate withdrawal as of right or is in fact withdrawn; but the continuance of ownership of an item by its owner, and any rights of the owner to proceeds of the item, are subject to rights of a collecting bank such as those resulting from outstanding advances on the item and rights of recoupment or setoff. [If an item is handled by banks for purposes of presentment, payment, collection, or return, the relevant provisions of Division 4 of the Commercial Code apply even though action of the parties clearly establishes that a particular bank has purchased the item and is the owner of it] (Com. Code § 4201(a); see Lawrence v. Bank of America (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 435, 209 Cal. Rptr. 541).

B. Collecting Bank's Right of Chargeback or Refund. If a collecting bank has made provisional settlement with its customer for an item and fails by reason of dishonor, suspension of payments by a bank, or otherwise to receive settlement for the item that is or becomes final, the bank may revoke the settlement given by it, charge back the amount of any credit given for the item to its customer's account, or obtain refund from its customer, whether or not it is able to return the item, if by its midnight deadline or within a longer reasonable time after it learns the facts it returns the item or sends notification of the facts. If the return or notice is delayed beyond the bank's midnight deadline or a longer reasonable time after it learns the facts, the bank may revoke the settlement, charge back the credit, or obtain refund from its customer, but it is liable for any loss resulting from the delay. These rights to revoke, charge back, and obtain refund terminate if and when a settlement for the item received by the bank is or becomes final (Com. Code § 4214(a); Lawrence v. Bank of America (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 435-436, 209 Cal. Rptr. 541).

C. When Item Returned. A collecting bank returns an item when it is sent or directed to the bank's customer or transferor or pursuant to its instructions (Com. Code § 4214(b)).

[Optional] D. Midnight Deadline Defined. [See § 34.71[1], Paragraph D.]

[Optional] E. Depositary-Drawee Bank's Right of Chargeback or Refund. A depositary bank that is also the payor may charge back the amount of an item to its customer's account or obtain refund in accordance with Commercial Code Section 4301, governing the return of an item received by a payor bank for credit on its books (Com. Code § 4214(c)).

[Optional] F. Separate Office or Branch. [See § 34.77[1], Paragraph G.]

[Optional] G. Notification Timely Under Regulation CC. If the depositary bank receives a returned check or notice of nonpayment, it must send notice to its customer of the facts by midnight of the banking day following the banking day on which it received the returned check or notice, or within a longer reasonable time (12 C.F.R. § 229.33(d)).

[Optional] H. Payee's Burden of Proof of Causation. [See § 34.129[1], Paragraph E.]

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting or depositary bank is liable to the payee of a check when the bank properly reversed provisional settlement [see Com. Code §§ 4201, 4214] after giving timely notice of return, nonpayment, or dishonor [see Com. Code § 4214; 12 C.F.R. § 229.33(d)]. Optional Paragraphs E and F are only necessary when the check is drawn on the same bank, though not necessarily the same branch, at which it is deposited or cashed. Optional Paragraph G sets forth the requirement under 12 C.F.R. § 229.33(d), which establishes the same deadline derived by applying the definition of midnight deadline in Com. Code § 4104(a)(10) to Com. Code § 4214(a) [see Com. Code § 4104(a)(10)]

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the date and manner of giving provisional credit, whether or not it was given on a banking day, and if not, when the next banking day would be [see Paragraphs B, D; see also Com. Code § 4104(a)(3) (banking day is part of day on which bank is open to public for carrying on substantially all of its banking functions)], when and why the drawee returned or dishonored the check, when the collecting or depositary bank received notice of dishonor or return, when the collecting or depositary bank revoked provisional settlement, and that timely notice of revocation was given to the depositor-payee.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that the collecting bank's revocation of provisional settlement was proper.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in §§ 34.71 and 34.72 support, and those in §§ 34.76, 34.77, and 34.78 oppose, the contention that the drawee or paying bank is liable for failure to make timely settlement or return or to provide timely notice of nonpayment of a check presented to it for collection. § 34.123 sets forth the provisions of the federal Expedited Funds Availability Act and Regulation CC under which a depositary bank is liable to its customer, the payee, for failure to make the proceeds of a deposited item available within the prescribed time.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Settlement by Collecting Bank Is Provisional

Com. Code § 4201(b) has been superseded by 12 C.F.R. § 229.35(c), in such a way that the results in Com. Code § 4201(b) apply to every form of endorsement by a bank. Thus, after a bank has endorsed a check, only a bank may acquire the rights of a holder until the check has been (1) returned to the person initiating collection or (2) specially endorsed by a bank to a person who is not a bank [12 C.F.R. § 229.35(c); see 12 U.S.C. § 4007(b) (authority for regulations that supersede Commercial Code)].

Lawrence v. Bank of America (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 209 Cal. Rptr. 541 , is discussed in § 34.128[3][b]. The court of appeal in Lawrence stated that any settlement given by a collecting bank before the drawee bank has finally settled with it is provisional (163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 435) .

[b] Collecting Bank's Right of Chargeback or Refund

Plaintiff in Lawrence v. Bank of America (1985) 163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 209 Cal. Rptr. 541 , maintained an account at defendant's Shattuck-Vine branch and was payee of two checks drawn on defendant's Watsonville branch. On February 22, 1980, plaintiff cashed the two checks at the Shattuck-Vine branch. Plaintiff alleged that before paying plaintiff the face amount of the checks, defendant verified the balance in the drawer's account and charged the drawer's account for the amount of the two checks. On February 26, defendant informed plaintiff that the checks had been retroactively dishonored because of a subsequently filed stop payment order and demanded that plaintiff reimburse it for the amount of the checks. When plaintiff failed to do so, defendant charged plaintiff's account for the amount of the checks. Plaintiff sued defendant for the amount of the checks, claiming that cashing the checks on February 22 constituted final payment and settlement under former Com. Code § 4213 (now see Com. Code § 4215), which could not be reversed. Defendant's demurrer was sustained without leave to amend. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment entered in defendant's favor.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court first set forth the provisions of former Com. Code §§ 4105 and 4106 (now see Com. Code §§ 4105 (as amended by Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 11), 4107). Under those provisions, each branch was a separate bank. The Watsonville branch was the drawee bank [see Com. Code § 4105(3)] and the Shattuck-Vine branch was both the depositary and the collecting bank [see Com. Code § 4105(2), (5)]. The court acknowledged that under former Com. Code § 4213(1)(a) (now see Com. Code § 4215(a)(1)), payment in cash by the drawee bank is a form of final settlement, but noted that under former Com. Code § 4201(1) (now see Com. Code § 4201(a)), any settlement made by the collecting bank is only provisional until it receives final payment (163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 434-435) . If the collecting bank never receives final settlement, it has the right of chargeback or refund (163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 435-436) . Under former Com. Code § 3414 (now see Com. Code § 3415), plaintiff could be liable as endorser to defendant as holder. On the other hand, the Watsonville branch had a legal obligation to its customer under Com. Code §§ 4303 and 4403 to honor the stop payment order. While the complaint acknowledged the clear statutory authority, it interpreted the authority as if the two branches were one bank by reason of their computer linkage. The single-bank theory flies in the face of California law and is completely without merit (163 Cal. App. 3d 431, 436) .

The opinion never mentioned when the check was received by the Watsonville branch and never discussed Com. Code §

4214(c), which would have required the Watsonville branch to revoke provisional settlement by midnight of the day following the day it received the check [see Com. Code §§ 4104(a)(10), 4301(a), (b)].

[c] Notification Timely Under Regulation CC

The measure of damages for violating 12 C.F.R. § 229.33(d) is set forth in 12 C.F.R. § 229.38(a) [see § 34.71], subject to the exceptions and exclusion set forth in § 34.76. In addition, a depositary bank may be liable for damages incurred by its customer for its failure to give its customer timely notice of nonpayment. This requirement is similar to the requirement under the Commercial Code as interpreted in Appliance Buyers Credit Corp. v. Prospect Nat. Bank (7th Cir. 1983) 708 F.2d 290 [12 C.F.R. § 229, Appendix E, Commentary to § 229.33(d)].

The court in Appliance Buyers rendered judgment for the depositary bank, under former Com. Code §§ 4202 and 4212 (now see Com. Code §§ 4202 (as amended by Stats. 1992, ch. 914, § 19), 4214), because there was no showing that the payee could have recovered any more from the maker than it would have recovered in the maker's bankruptcy even if it had been notified of the return and dishonor in a timely manner (708 F. 2d 290, 291-292, 295) . Former Com. Code § 4212(1) (now see Com. Code § 4214(a)) does not establish a strict liability standard, but states that the payee must prove its loss (708 F. 2d 290, 293-295) . Alioto v. United States (N.D. Cal. 1984) 593 F. Supp. 1402 , discussed in § 34.129[3][b], discussed Appliance Buyers and came to the same conclusion (593 F. Supp. 1402, 1416) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Collecting Bank's Right of Chargeback or Refund

Security Pac. Nat. Bank v. Associated Motor Sales (1980) 106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 165 Cal. Rptr. 38 (discussed in § 34.78[3][a]), stated in dicta that it is arguable that former Com. Code § 4212(1) (now see Com. Code § 4214(a)) requires written notice of dishonor in order for a collecting bank to properly exercise its right of chargeback. Former Com. Code § 4212(1) requires the bank to send notification of the facts, and the Commercial Code comments to that section refer to the definition of "send" in former Com. Code § 1201(38) (now see Com. Code § 1201(b)(36)): "send" in connection with any writing or notice means to deposit in the mail or deliver for transmission by any other usual means of communication with postage or cost of transmission provided for and properly addressed (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 181, n.7). However, the court was only concerned with the issue of the payee-depositor's endorser's liability to the collecting bank. Thus, the court's decision that insufficiency of the notice required under former Com. Code § 4212(1) would not adversely affect the bank's right to impose endorser's liability was based on former Com. Code § 4212(5) (now see Com. Code § 4214(e)). That section provides that a failure to charge back or claim a refund does not affect the other rights of the bank against the customer or any other party (106 Cal. App. 3d 171, 181) .

DEFENDANT _____ [DEPOSITARY and/or COLLECTING] BANK IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, DRAWN BY _____ [name of drawer] AND PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF, BECAUSE DEFENDANT _____ [specify, e.g., PRESENTED THE CHECK IN A TIMELY MANNER].

A. Duties of Collecting Bank. A collecting bank must exercise ordinary care in all of the following (Com. Code § 4202(a)):

(1) Presenting an item or sending it for presentment.

(2) Sending notice of dishonor or nonpayment or returning an item other than a documentary draft to the bank's transferor after learning that the item has not been paid or accepted.

(3) Settling for an item when the bank receives final settlement.

(4) Notifying its transferor of any loss or delay in transit within a reasonable time after discovery thereof.

B. Timing of Collecting Bank's Action. A collecting bank exercises ordinary care under Commercial Code Section 4202(a) by taking proper action before its midnight deadline following receipt of an item, notice, or settlement. Taking proper action within a reasonably longer time may constitute the exercise of ordinary care, but the bank has the burden of establishing timeliness (Com. Code § 4202(b); see Com. Code § 4104(a)(10) ("midnight deadline" defined); Alioto v.

United States (N.D. Cal. 1984) 593 F. Supp. 1402, 1414) .

[Optional] C. Conditions or Acts of Others. Subject to Commercial Code Section 4202(a)(1), a bank is not liable for the insolvency, neglect, misconduct, mistake, or default of another bank or person or for loss or destruction of an item in the possession of others or in transit (Com. Code § 4202(c)).

[Optional] D. Midnight Deadline Defined. [See § 34.71[1], Paragraph D.]

[Optional] E. Payee's Burden of Proof of Causation. In order for a payee to recover damages against a depositary or collecting bank for mishandling of a deposited check, the payee must prove both that the check was mishandled and that he/she/it would have had a reasonable chance of collecting the check's amount if it were not for the bank's mishandling (Alioto v. United States (N.D. Cal. 1984) 593 F. Supp. 1402, 1417) .

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a collecting bank is liable to the payee of a check for failure to timely perform its duties of presentment or settlement [see Com. Code § 4202]. Optional Paragraph C is for use only when the collecting bank contends it is not liable for the default of a third party. Optional Paragraph D defines midnight deadline for use with Paragraph B if appropriate.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the date and manner of negotiation and presentment, whether that occurred on a banking day, and if not, when the next banking day would be [see Paragraphs B, D; see also Com. Code § 4104(a)(3) (banking day as part of day on which bank is open to public for carrying on substantially all of its banking functions)], and any other relevant actions by the drawee or the collecting bank (for example, dishonor, return, loss, delay).

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that the collecting bank's presentment was proper.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in § 34.128 addresses a collecting bank's right of chargeback. The points and authorities in §§ 34.71 -34.72 address a drawee bank's liability for failure to timely make provisional settlement or return a check presented for collection. The points and authorities in §§ 34.77 and 34.78 oppose the contention that the drawee bank is liable for improper or untimely revocation of provisional settlement.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Timing of Collecting Bank's Action

Three cases relating to nonpayment by a bankrupt company of its payroll tax withholdings were consolidated under the title of Alioto v. United States (N.D. Cal. 1984) 593 F. Supp. 1402 . One of those cases was the United States' action against the bank at which a check for withholdings was deposited. The United States, as payee, alleged that the bank failed to make timely presentment of the check to the drawee bank, and that the late presentment resulted in the check's being dishonored for insufficient funds. Both parties moved for summary judgment. Both motions were denied.

With respect to the payee's motion for summary judgment, the district court said that former Com. Code § 4202(1)(a) (now see Com. Code § 4202(a)(1)) requires a collecting bank to use ordinary care in presenting or sending for presentment a check deposited for collection. Under former Com. Code § 4202(2) (now see Com. Code § 4202(b)), the collecting bank exercises ordinary care if it takes proper action on the check before midnight of the day following receipt of the check. If the collecting bank fails to take proper action before that midnight deadline, the collecting bank has the burden of establishing that it exercised ordinary care. There was a triable issue of fact as to when the check was received. It was presented to the drawee on January 30 (Monday). The company officer who signed the check (as drawer) remembered that it was signed on January 25, but the payee only submitted evidence of the drawer's custom to prove that the check was deposited at its tax depository account at defendant bank on January 25. Defendant bank only submitted evidence of its customary practices to prove its contention that the check was not received until January 27, a Friday. If deposited on Friday, action taken before midnight Monday would have been within the midnight deadline (593 F. Supp. 1402, 1414-1415) . Because only inferences could be used to establish either party's case, and inferences could be drawn that the check was received on January 25 and on January 27, summary judgment was not proper. When evidence supports an inference favoring the nonmoving party, summary judgment cannot be granted (593 F. Supp. 1402, 1415) .

[b] Payee's Burden of Proof of Causation

The facts and procedural background of Alioto v. United States (N.D. Cal. 1984) 593 F. Supp. 1402 , are discussed in § 34.129[3][a]. The same inferences relied on to deny the payee's motion for summary judgment required denial of the bank's motion for summary judgment (593 F. Supp. 1402, 1417) . The bank contended that it was entitled to summary judgment because the payee had not presented any evidence to establish that it was damaged by the bank's alleged mishandling of the check. The court agreed that to recover from a collecting bank for the mishandling of a check the payee has to prove both the mishandling of the check and that it would have had a reasonable chance of collecting the amount of the check if it were not for the collecting bank's mishandling. The evidence showed that if the check was presented to the drawee on January 26 or 27, it might or might not have been honored. This was enough to invoke the rule regarding inferences in favor of the nonmoving party, because if the check was deposited on the 25th, there was a reasonable chance it would have been honored (593 F. Supp. 1402, 1416-1417) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Duties of Collecting Bank

In Karen Kane Inc. v. Bank of America NT&SA (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 1192, 79 Cal. Rptr. 2d 712 , the court of appeal held that absent extraordinary circumstances, a collecting bank does not owe a duty of care to a non-customer, particularly when the bank has met its statutory duties as set forth in Com. Code § 4202(a). In that case, a clothing manufacturer wrote numerous checks over several years to fictitious vendors for merchandise it never received, based on an employee's submission of fraudulent invoices. The manufacturer brought a negligence action against both the check cashing service that cashed those checks and the bank that deposited the checks into the service's account. The court found that because the checks were not forged or improperly endorsed, and did not indicate that maker was being defrauded, neither the check cashing service nor the bank had a duty to inquire of the maker if a valid transaction supported the checks before accepting them. The circumstances were not extraordinary enough to give rise to a duty of inquiry by a bank complying with its statutory duties, when in fact they were not even sufficient to constitute notice of fraud to the maker of the checks (67 Cal. App. 4th 1192, 1202-1203) .

Frontier Refining Co. v. Home Bank (1969) 272 Cal. App. 2d 630, 77 Cal. Rptr. 641 , involved a drawer's action against a bank that was alleged to be a collecting bank but that was found to be only an ordinary payee of a check taken in its capacity as collection agent for a lessor. Dicta in Frontier states that the duty of care imposed on a collecting bank by Com. Code § 4202(a)(1) does not include the duty to determine whether a particular check was issued by mistake (272 Cal. App. 2d 630, 636) . This dicta was cited with approval in Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. Security Pacific Nat. Bank (1978) 85 Cal. App. 3d 797, 820-821, 149 Cal. Rptr. 883 (discussed in § 34.97[3][a]), which held that a collecting bank's duty of presentment under Com. Code § 4202(a)(1) does not include the duty to discover a forged drawer's signature. Those situations must be distinguished from the situation considered in Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 (discussed in § 34.92[3][a]), in which a cause of action for mistake was stated by a drawer against a collecting bank that was also payee (21 Cal. 3d 671, 700-701) .

§ 34.150 Supporting Contention That Collecting Bank Is Liable for Breach of Transfer Warranties [Com. Code § 4207]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT COLLECTING BANK IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR THE AMOUNT OF THE CHECK DATED _____, PAYABLE TO PLAINTIFF IN THE AMOUNT OF $_____, BECAUSE DEFENDANT BREACHED THE WARRANTY _____ [specify warranty breached, e.g., THAT THE CHECK HAS NOT BEEN ALTERED].

A. Warranties on Transfer of Item. A customer or collecting bank that transfers an item and receives a settlement or other consideration warrants to the transferee and to any subsequent collecting bank that

[Specify applicable warranty, EITHER]

(1) The warrantor is a person entitled to enforce the item (Com. Code § 4207(a)(1)).

[AND/OR]

(2) All signatures on the item are authentic and authorized (Com. Code § 4207(a)(2)).

[AND/OR]

(3) The item has not been altered (Com. Code § 4207(a)(3)).

[AND/OR]

(4) The item is not subject to a defense or claim in recoupment (Com. Code § 3305(a)) of any party that can be asserted against the warrantor (Com. Code § 4207(a)(4)).

[AND/OR]

(5) The warrantor has no knowledge of any insolvency proceeding commenced with regard to the maker or acceptor or, in the case of an unaccepted draft, the drawer (Com. Code § 4207(a)(5)).

[AND/OR]

(6) If the draft is a demand draft, creation of the item according to the terms on its face was authorized by the person identified as the drawer (Com. Code § 4207(a)(6)).

[CONTINUE]

B. Damages for Breach of Warranty. A person to whom the warranties under Commercial Code Section 4207(a) are made and who took the item in good faith may recover from the warrantor as damages for breach of warranty an amount equal to the loss suffered as a result of the breach, but not more than the amount of the item plus expenses and loss of interest incurred as a result of the breach (Com. Code § 4207(c)).

[Optional] C. Disclaimer Not Permitted. The warranties stated in Commercial Code Section 4207(a) cannot be disclaimed with regard to checks (Com. Code § 4207(d)).

[Optional] D. Accrual of Cause of Action. A cause of action for breach of warranty accrues when the claimant has reason to know of the breach (Com. Code § 4207(e)).

[Optional] E. Conflict of Law Rules. If the warranty in Commercial Code Section 4207(a)(6) is not given by a transferor or collecting bank under applicable conflict of law rules, then the warranty is not given to that transferor when that transferor is a transferee nor to any prior collecting bank of that transferee (Com. Code § 4207(f)).

[Optional] F. Duty to Pay Dishonored Check. If an item is dishonored, a customer or collecting bank transferring the item and receiving settlement or other consideration must pay the amount due on the item (1) according to the terms of the item at the time it was transferred, or (2) if the transfer was of an incomplete item, according to its terms when completed as stated in Commercial Code Sections 3115 and 3407. The transferor's obligation is owed to the transferee and to any subsequent collecting bank that takes the item in good faith. A transferor cannot disclaim its obligation to pay a dishonored check by an endorsement stating that it is made "without recourse" or otherwise disclaiming liability (Com. Code § 4207(b)).

[2] Comments

The points and authorities in [1], above, may be used to support the contention that a collecting bank is liable for breach of one or more warranties once the bank transfers a check and receives a settlement or other consideration for it [see Com. Code § 4207]. Paragraphs C-E are for use only when specific issues are raised such as the item's dishonor [see Paragraph E] or an asserted disclaimer [see Paragraph C].

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case; for example, facts establishing the basis for breach of a particular warranty. In addition, because damages for breach of warranty may be recovered only by a person who took the item in good faith, counsel should set forth the transferee's good faith as that term is defined by statute [see Com. Code § 4207(c); see also Com. Code § 1201(b)(20)].

This form may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the collecting bank's liability for breach of warranty.

[b] Notice Requirement

Unless notice of a claim for breach of warranty is given to the warrantor within 30 days after the claimant has reason to know of the breach and the identity of the warrantor, the warrantor is discharged to the extent of any loss caused by the delay in giving notice of the claim [Com. Code § 4207(d); see 12 C.F.R. § 229.34(g) (same limitation applies under federal law)].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Warranties on Transfer of Item

The warranties under Com. Code § 4207(a) in favor of the immediate transferee apply to all persons who transfer a check for consideration whether or not the transfer is accompanied by endorsement [see Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-416 (1990); Official Comment to U.C.C. § 4-207 (Com. Code § 4207 conforms to warranty provisions regarding instruments and extends coverage to checks)]. Since the purpose of transfer is to give the transferee the right to enforce the check, Com. Code § 4207(a) is a warranty that the transferor is a person entitled to enforce the check [see Com. Code § 3203(a), (b)] Com. Code § 4207(a)(1) is in effect a warranty that there are no unauthorized or missing endorsements that prevent the transferor from making the transferee a person entitled to enforce the check [Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-416 (1990)].

§ 34.151 Supporting Contention That Drawee or Other Person Making Payment on Presentment of Check May Recover for Breach of Warranty [Com. Code § 4208]

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

PLAINTIFF, _____ [specify, e.g., THE DRAWEE OF AN UNACCEPTED DRAFT WHO _____ (PAID or ACCEPTED)] THE DRAFT, IS ENTITLED TO RECOVER DAMAGES FROM DEFENDANT BECAUSE DEFENDANT BREACHED THE WARRANTY _____ [specify, e.g., THAT THE DRAFT HAD NOT BEEN ALTERED] ON PRESENTING THE DRAFT TO PLAINTIFF.

[EITHER, if cause of action is based on warranties under Com. Code § 4208(a) on presentment of unaccepted draft]

A. Warranties on Presentment of Unaccepted Draft. If an unaccepted draft is presented to the drawee for payment or acceptance and the drawee pays or accepts the draft, (i) the person obtaining payment or acceptance, at the time of presentment, and (ii) a previous transferor of the draft, at the time of transfer, warrant to the drawee that pays or accepts the draft in good faith that all of the following apply:

(1) The warrantor is, or was, at the time the warrantor transferred the draft, a person entitled to enforce the draft or authorized to obtain payment or acceptance of the draft on behalf of a person entitled to enforce the draft (Com. Code § 4208(a)(1)).

(2) The draft has not been altered (Com. Code § 4208(a)(2)).

(3) The warrantor has no knowledge that the signature of the purported drawer of the draft is unauthorized (Com. Code § 4208(a)(3)).

(4) If the draft is a demand draft, creation of the demand draft according to the terms on its face was authorized by the person identified as the drawer (Com. Code § 4208(a)(4)).

[OR, if cause of action is based on presentment warranties under Com. Code § 4208(d)]

A. Warranties on Presentment of Dishonored Draft or Item for Payment to Party Obligated to Pay. If (1) a dishonored draft is presented for payment to the drawer or an endorser or (2) any other item is presented for payment to a party obliged to pay the item, and the item is paid, the person obtaining payment and a prior transferor of the item warrant to the person making payment in good faith that the warrantor is, or was, at the time the warrantor transferred the item, a person entitled to enforce the item or authorized to obtain payment on behalf of a person entitled to enforce the item (Com. Code § 4208(d)).

[CONTINUE]

B. Drawee's Remedy for Breach of Warranty.

[EITHER, if drawee of unaccepted draft pays draft]

A drawee making payment may recover from a warrantor damages for breach of warranty equal to the amount paid by the drawee less the amount the drawee received or is entitled to receive from the drawer because of the payment. The drawee is also entitled to compensation for expenses and loss of interest resulting from the breach. The drawee's right to recover damages under this subdivision is not affected by any failure of the drawee to exercise ordinary care in making payment (Com. Code § 4208(b)).

[OR, if drawee of unaccepted draft accepts draft without making payment]

If the drawee accepts the draft, breach of warranty is a defense to the acceptor's obligation (Com. Code § 4208(b)(1)).

[OR, if drawee of unaccepted draft accepts draft and makes payment]

If the drawee accepts the draft and makes payment with regard to the draft, the acceptor is entitled to recover from a warrantor for breach of warranty the amounts stated in Commercial Code Section 4208(b) (Com. Code § 4208(b)(2)).

[OR, if breach of warranty is based on Com. Code § 4208(d)]

The person making payment may recover from any warrantor for breach of warranty an amount equal to the amount paid plus expenses and loss of interest resulting from the breach (Com. Code § 4208(d)).

[CONTINUE]

[Optional] C. Disclaimer Not Permitted. The warranties stated in Commercial Code Section 4208(a) and (d) cannot be disclaimed with regard to checks (Com. Code § 4208(e)).

[Optional] D. Accrual of Cause of Action. A cause of action for breach of warranty accrues when the claimant has reason to know of the breach (Com. Code § 4208(f)).

[Optional] E. Conflict of Law Rules. If the warranty in Commercial Code Section 4208(a)(4) is not given by a transferor or collecting bank under applicable conflict of law rules, then the warranty is not given to that transferor when that transferor is a transferee (Com. Code § 4208(h)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be used to support the contention that a person obtaining payment for an unaccepted draft, dishonored draft, or other item presented for payment to a party obligated to pay is liable to the drawee or other person making payment for breach of warranty [see Com. Code § 4208(a), (d)]. Paragraph A sets forth the statutory warranties on presentment of a draft or other item. The first alternative establishes the warranties applicable when the drawee of an unaccepted draft pays or accepts the draft under Com. Code § 4208(a). The second alternative applies to presentment for payment in all cases not covered by Com. Code § 4208(a) [see Com. Code § 4208(d)]. Paragraphs C and D are for use only when specific issues are raised such as an asserted disclaimer [see Paragraph C].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts establishing the basis for breach of a particular warranty. In addition, because damages for breach of warranty may be recovered only by a person accepting or paying an item in good faith, counsel should set forth the transferee's good faith as that term is defined by statute [see Com. Code § 4208(a), (d); see also Com. Code § 1201(b)(20)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of a warrantor's liability for breach of a presentment warranty.

[b] Drawer's Standing for Breach of Warranty

Com. Code §§ 3417(a) and 4208(a) do not provide a warranty to the drawer when presentment is made to the drawee. Warranty to the drawer is governed by Com. Code §§ 3417(d) and 4208(d); this warranty applies only when presentment for payment is made to the drawer with regard to a dishonored draft. In Sun'n Sand, Inc. v. United California Bank (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 671, 680-683, 148 Cal. Rptr. 329, 582 P.2d 920 , the Supreme Court held that under former Com. Code § 3417(1) a warranty was made to the check's drawer when the check was presented to the drawee for payment. That result is rejected [Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990)].

Despite the rejection of Sun'n Sand under the revised Commercial Code, a drawer is given standing under another warranty provision. The depositary bank warrants to collecting banks, the payor bank or other payor, and the drawer that the amount of the item was paid to the customer or deposited to the customer's account [Com. Code § 4205(b)]. This provision satisfies the need for a receipt of funds by the depositary bank by imposing on that bank a warranty that it paid the customer or deposited the item to the customer's account. This warranty runs not only to collecting banks and to the payor bank or nonbank drawee but also to the drawer, affording protection to these parties that the depositary bank received the item and applied it to the holder's benefit [Official Comment to U.C.C § 4-205].

[c] Notice Requirement

Unless notice of a claim for breach of warranty is given to the warrantor within 30 days after the claimant has reason to know of the breach and the identity of the warrantor, the warrantor is discharged to the extent of any loss caused by the delay in giving notice of the claim [Com. Code § 4208(e); see 12 C.F.R. § 229.34(g) (same limitation applies under federal law)].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Warranties on Presentment of Unaccepted Draft

Presentment warranties made to drawees of uncertified checks and other unaccepted drafts are stated in Com. Code §§ 3417(a) and 4208(a). All other presentment warranties are stated in Com. Code §§ 3417(d) and 4208(d) [see Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990); Official Comment to U.C.C. § 4-208 (Com. Code § 4208 conforms to warranty provisions regarding instruments and extends coverage to checks)].

[b] Warranties on Presentment of Dishonored Draft or Item for Payment to Party Obligated to Pay

Com. Code §§ 3417(d) and 4208(d) apply to presentment for payment in all cases not covered by Com. Code §§ 3417(a) and 4208(a). They apply to presentment of notes and accepted drafts if made to the drawer or an endorser. In cases covered by Com. Code §§ 3417(d) and 4208(d), the warranty is the same as that stated in Com. Code §§ 3417(a)(1) and 4208(a)(1), that there are no unauthorized or missing endorsements [Official Comment 4 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990)].

[c] Drawee's Remedy for Breach of Warranty

There is no express provision for attorney's fees included in the measure of damages for breach of warranty under Com. Code § 3417(a) or 4208(a). However, they could be granted because they fit within the language "expenses ... resulting from the breach" [Official Comment 5 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990)].

§ 34.152 Supporting Contention That Encoder of Information or Retainer of Item Is Liable for Breach of Warranty [Com. Code § 4209]

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT _____ [specify, e.g., DEPOSITARY BANK] IS LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR DAMAGES BECAUSE DEFENDANT BREACHED THE WARRANTY CONTAINED IN COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 4209 THAT _____ [specify, e.g., INFORMATION MUST BE CORRECTLY ENCODED].

[EITHER]

A. Encoding Warranty. A person who encodes information on or with regard to an item after issue warrants to any subsequent collecting bank and to the payor bank or other payor that the information is correctly encoded. If the customer of a depositary bank encodes, that bank also makes the warranty (Com. Code § 4209(a)).

[OR]

A. Retention Warranty. A person who undertakes to retain an item under an agreement for electronic presentment warrants to any subsequent collecting bank and to the payor bank or other payor that retention and presentment of the item comply with the agreement. If the customer of a depositary bank undertakes to retain an item, that bank also makes this warranty (Com. Code § 4209(b); see Com. Code § 4110 ("agreement for electronic presentment" defined)].

[CONTINUE]

B. Damages for Breach of Warranty. A person to whom warranties are made under Commercial Code Section 4209(a) or (b) and who took the item in good faith may recover from the warrantor as damages for breach of warranty an amount equal to the loss suffered as a result of the breach, plus expenses and loss of interest incurred as a result of the breach (Com. Code § 4209(c)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a person who encodes information or undertakes to retain an item under an agreement for electronic presentment is liable for breach of the warranty that the information was correctly encoded or that retention and presentment complied with an agreement for electronic presentment [see Com. Code § 4209].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts establishing that the defendant was the person doing the encoding or retaining the item and that the information encoded was incorrect or that the item's retention and presentment did not comply the agreement for electronic presentment. In addition, because damages for breach of warranty may be recovered only by a person who took the item in good faith, counsel should set forth plaintiff's good faith as that term is defined by statute [see Com. Code § 4209(c); see also Com. Code § 1201(b)(20)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the liability of an encoder or retainer for breach of warranty.

[b] Encoding and Retention Warranties

The measure of damages is the same for breach of the encoding or retention warranty [see Com. Code § 4209(c)]. Encoding and retention warranties are included in Division 4 because they are unique to the bank collection process. These warranties are breached only by the person doing the encoding or retaining the item and not by subsequent banks handling the item. Encoding and check retention may be done by customers who are payees of a large volume of check; hence, warranties are imposed on customers as well as banks. If a customer encodes or retains, the depositary bank is also liable for any breach of this warranty [Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 4-209]. Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 4-209 provides illustrations of the liability attaching to the depositary and payor banks if the depositary bank misencodes the amount of a drawer's check.

§ 34.153 Opposing Contention That Warrantor Is Liable for Breach of Presentment Warranty Based on Unauthorized Endorsement or Alteration--Endorsement Is Effective or Drawer Precluded From Asserting Unauthorized Endorsement or Alteration [Com. Code § 4208(c)]

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

DEFENDANT IS NOT LIABLE TO PLAINTIFF FOR BREACH OF THE WARRANTY UNDER COMMERCIAL SECTION 4208(a) THAT _____ [specify, e.g., THE DRAFT CONTAINED AN UNAUTHORIZED ENDORSEMENT] BECAUSE _____ [specify warrantor's defense, e.g., THE ENDORSEMENT IS EFFECTIVE UNDER COMMERCIAL CODE SECTION 3404].

Warrantor's Defenses. If a drawee asserts a claim for breach of warranty under Commercial Code Section 4208(a) based on an unauthorized endorsement of the draft or an alteration of the draft, the warrantor may defend by proving that the endorsement is effective under Commercial Code Section 3404 or 3405 or the drawer is precluded under Commercial Code Section 3406 or 4406 from asserting against the drawee the unauthorized endorsement or alteration (Com. Code § 4208(c)).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a warrantor is liable for breach of one or more of the presentment warranties based on an unauthorized endorsement or alteration because either (1) the endorsement is effective under another provision of the Commercial Code or (2) the drawer is precluded from asserting the unauthorized endorsement or alteration because of his or her own negligence [see Com. Code § 4208(c)]. Depending on the particular defense being asserted, the points and authorities should also set forth the applicable statutory provision referred to in Com. Code § 4208(c). For example, if the warrantor is defending on the ground that the endorsement is effective under the fictitious payee rule, the provisions of Com. Code § 3404(a) should be set forth.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth facts supporting the warrantor's defense. For example, if applicable, counsel should show by referring to specific aspects of the transactions that plaintiff's own negligence contributed to the making of a forged signature [see Com. Code § 3406(a)].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the warrantor's defense for breach of warranty.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Warrantor's Defenses

Com. Code §§ 3417(c) and 4208(c) apply to checks and other unaccepted drafts. It gives the warrantor the benefit of rights that the drawee has against the drawer under Com. Code § 3404, 3405, 3406, or 4406. If the drawer's conduct contributed to the loss from forgery or alteration, the drawee should not be allowed to shift the loss from the drawer to the warrantor [Official Comment 6 to U.C.C. § 3-417 (1990)].

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or may be adapted for use in a trial or appellate brief or in jury instructions.]

A. Liability for Refusal to Pay. If an obligated bank wrongfully (1) refuses to pay a cashier's check or certified check, (2) stops payment of a teller's check, or (3) refuses to pay a dishonored teller's check, the person asserting the right to enforce the check is entitled to compensation for expenses and loss of interest resulting from the nonpayment and may recover consequential damages if the obligated bank refuses to pay after receiving notice of particular circumstances giving rise to the damages (Com. Code § 3411(b)).

B. "Obligated Bank" Defined. "Obligated bank" means the acceptor of a certified check or the issuer of a cashier's check or teller's check bought from the issuer (Com. Code § 3411(a)).

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a bank that accepted a certified check or issued a cashier's or teller's check is liable to the payee for wrongfully refusing to pay the check [see Com. Code § 3411].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law

stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the date and manner in which the check was issued or accepted, that the bank is both obligated and able to pay, and that the bank has refused to pay. If consequential damages are sought, counsel should establish that the bank has received notice of the particular circumstances giving rise to the damages [see Com. Code § 3411(b)]. In addition, because expenses and consequential damages are not recoverable in certain stated circumstances, counsel should show that these circumstances do not apply. For example, counsel should establish that the bank does not have any claim or defense against plaintiff [see Com. Code § 3411(c)(2); see also § 34.172].

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that a bank is liable for refusing to pay a cashier's, teller's, or certified check.

[b] Damages Recoverable for Wrongful Refusal to Pay

If the obligated bank wrongfully refuses to pay, it is liable to pay for expenses and loss of interest resulting from the refusal to pay. There is no express provision for attorney's fees, but attorney's fees are not meant to be necessarily excluded and could be granted because they fit within the statutory language for recoverable damages. The bank may also be liable to pay consequential damages if it has notice of the particular circumstances giving rise to the damages [Official Comment 2 to U.C.C. § 3-411 (1990)].

[c] Stop Payment Orders on Cashier's, Teller's, and Certified Checks

A customer using a cashier's, teller's, or certified check as a means of payment has no right to stop payment on the item. Nevertheless, some banks will stop payment on these items as an accommodation to their customers. Com. Code § 3411 is designed to discourage this practice by imposing liability that goes beyond the check's face amount and makes the bank liable for loss of interest from nonpayment, expenses of enforcement, and consequential damages [see Official Comment 1 to U.C.C. § 3-411 (1990)].

[d] Related Points and Authorities

§ 34.171 addresses a bank's liability for paying a cashier's check on a forged endorsement. § 34.172 opposes the contention that an obligated bank is liable for refusing to pay a cashier's, teller's, or certified check on the ground that the bank's refusal to pay is permitted by statute.

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in supporting the contention that a bank that issues a cashier's check or sells a bank check is liable to the purchaser or to the payee if the check is paid on a forged endorsement.

and that the payee or true owner has not received any part of the proceeds.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the bank's liability to the payee or the purchaser for the amount of a check paid on a forged endorsement.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

The points and authorities in §§ 34.45 and 34.57 may be used to support or oppose the contention that a bank is liable for disregarding a stop payment order on a cashier's check.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Cashier's Check or Bank Check

Plaintiff in Garthwaite v. Bank of Tulare (1901) 134 Cal. 237, 66 P. 326 , was the executor of the payee, who was also the assignee of the purchaser, of a check purchased from defendant. The check was not a cashier's check in that it was drawn on another bank, but defendant was the check's drawer. The check was lost in the mail between the purchaser and the payee. The drawee cashed the check on an endorsement forged by an unknown person. The payee was shown the endorsement, told the drawee it was forged, and demanded that the drawee either pay him the check's amount or surrender it to him. The drawee refused to do either. Defendant was notified of the demand and refusal. When the drawee finally surrendered the check to plaintiff, plaintiff presented it to the drawee for payment, which was refused. Then plaintiff demanded payment from defendant, and that demand was refused. Plaintiff sued defendant (drawer). Judgment was for plaintiff. Defendant appealed.

The Supreme Court affirmed. The Court said that the check remained the property of the purchaser because it was never received by the payee. Payment of the check on the forged endorsement did not give the drawee any right to retain the check or to demand reimbursement for the amount paid. The drawee's refusal of the payee's first demand for payment amounted to dishonor (134 Cal. 237, 241) . When defendant was notified of this dishonor, it became obligated either to cause the drawee to pay the proceeds to the payee or to refund the amount of the check to the purchaser (134 Cal. 237, 241-242) . Failure to do either constituted breach of its agreement with the purchaser (134 Cal. 237, 242) .

Plaintiff in Jerman v. Bank of America (1970) 7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 87 Cal. Rptr. 88 , purchased five cashier's checks from defendant over a two-month period in 1965. Plaintiff, as lender, had a loan agreement with C. C told plaintiff that the loan proceeds would be used to acquire or clear title to real property that C would then sell, sharing the profits with plaintiff. The cashier's checks ranged in amount from $5,000 to $12,500. C informed plaintiff who should be named as payees. Plaintiff believed the payees had some interest in or lien on the land. Plaintiff, after purchasing the cashier's checks from defendant, delivered them to C for delivery to the payees. The payees' endorsements were forged, apparently by C 's attorney, and the checks were cashed at another bank that was not involved in the action. Plaintiff sued defendant for the amount of the checks. The trial court entered judgment for defendant, on the ground that plaintiff had suffered no damages at the time of trial. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The payees assigned their interests in the checks to plaintiff, but the court considered the assignment immaterial to its decision, possibly because the checks were never delivered to the named payees (7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 887, 887 n.2). Part of a drawee bank's contract with the purchaser of a cashier's check is the promise that the check will be paid to the named payee. If the cashier's check is paid on a forged endorsement, the drawee is liable to either the purchaser or the payee. Here, unless the checks were payable to fictitious payees [see Com. Code § 3404] or unless plaintiff was negligent in delivering the checks to C [see Com. Code § 3406], defendant was liable (7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 887-888) . The trial court found plaintiff was not negligent, and that finding was not contested on appeal (7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 889) .

The trial court based its finding that plaintiff had suffered no damage on the theory that plaintiff's loan agreement was with C and that no breach of the loan agreement was shown by payment of the checks on forged endorsements. The court of appeal agreed that because C had signed receipts for the checks, the proceeds would be considered advances under the loan agreement. However, the court said that did not bar plaintiff's recovery from defendant on its contract with plaintiff that it would not pay the checks on forged endorsements (7 Cal. App. 3d 882, 890) .

[a] Cashier's Check or Bank Check

The court of appeal in Burke v. Mission Bay Yacht Sales (1963) 214 Cal. App. 2d 723, 29 Cal. Rptr. 685 , affirmed a judgment for a purchaser of a cashier's check and against the payee on the ground that plaintiff had been fraudulently induced to part with the check. The court disagreed with defendant's contention that plaintiff-purchaser had no interest in the check. Even though plaintiff was not actually the drawer of the cashier's check, the rights of a purchaser of a cashier's check simulate those of a drawer of an ordinary check (214 Cal. App. 2d 723, 732) .

C. Expenses or Consequential Damages Not Recoverable. Expenses or consequential damages under Commercial Code Section 3411(b) are not recoverable if the obligated bank's refusal to pay occurs because (1) the bank suspends payments, (2) the obligated bank asserts a claim or defense of the bank that it has reasonable grounds to believe is available against the person entitled to enforce the instrument, (3) the obligated bank has a reasonable doubt whether the person demanding payment is the person entitled to enforce the instrument, or (4) payment is prohibited by law (Com. Code § 3411(c)).

[2] Comments

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a bank that accepted a certified check or issued a cashier's or teller's check is liable to the payee for wrongfully refusing to pay the check [see Com. Code § 3411(c)]. Paragraph C sets forth the circumstances under which the bank may refuse to pay without being held liable for expenses and consequential damages that result from the nonpayment.

Counsel should insert argument in the form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated. Thus, counsel should set forth the date and manner in which the check was issued or accepted and the particular circumstances under which nonpayment is permitted even though the bank is obligated to pay. For example, if the bank's reason for nonpayment is because it doubts the identity of the person demanding payment, counsel should set forth facts as to why it has reason to doubt plaintiff's identity, that such doubts are reasonable, and that plaintiff has not offered adequate proof that he or she is in fact the person entitled to enforce the instrument.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue that a bank is not liable for refusing to pay a cashier's, teller's, or certified check.

"For Deposit Only," While Restrictive, Is Blank Endorsement. An endorsement "for deposit only," while restrictive, is also a blank endorsement which permits deposit to any account at any bank. Spencer v. Sterling Bank (1998) 63 Cal. App. 4th 1055, 1059-1060, 74 Cal. Rptr. 2d 576 .

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities are for use in opposing the contention that a bank is liable for breach of the restrictive endorsement "for deposit only" without further limitation.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and points of law stated.

These points and authorities may be combined with points and authorities pertaining to the specific procedural context in which counsel wishes to raise the substantive issue of the bank's liability for breach of a restrictive endorsement.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] "For Deposit Only," While Restrictive, Is Blank Endorsement

In Spencer v. Sterling Bank (1998) 63 Cal. App. 4th 1055, 74 Cal. Rptr. 2d 576 , three cashier's checks purportedly endorsed by decedent "for deposit only" without further limitation were deposited by the lawyer handling the decedent's estate into her client trust account. The executor of the estate sued the lawyer's bank, seeking damages for breach of a restrictive endorsement. The trial court sustained the bank's demurrers without leave to amend and the executor appealed. The court of appeal affirmed the order of dismissal. The court noted that pursuant to Com. Code § 3205(a), an endorsement identifying the person to whom the instrument is payable is a special endorsement which may be negotiated only by the endorsement of that person. Under Com. Code § 3205(b), an endorsement that is not a special endorsement is a blank endorsement which is payable to the bearer and may be negotiated by transfer of possession alone. The court held that under the plain language of this statutory scheme, an endorsement "for deposit only," while restrictive, is also a blank endorsement because it does not specify where or for whose benefit the checks are to be deposited. The court also rejected the executor's argument that under Com. Code § 3206 governing restrictive endorsements, the bank's acceptance of the cashier's checks was inconsistent with the endorsement. The blank endorsement did not use any words indicating that the instrument was to be collected by a bank for a particular account, and thus permitted a deposit to any account at any bank (63 Cal. App. 4th 1055, 1059-1060) .

§ 35.03 Defendants Under the Unruh Civil Rights Act

The points and authorities in this chapter are constructed on the assumption that plaintiff is proceeding against a defendant that either is a business establishment or acts in concert with a business establishment. There is nothing in the Unruh Civil Rights Act, however, that prevents its application to any individual, acting independently, who deprives someone of the services of a business establishment. The law permits an action against anyone who discriminates in regard to rights of accommodation established by the Act, denies these rights, or aids or incites their denial [Civ. Code § 52(a)].

PLAINTIFF'S COMPLAINT FAILS TO STATE A CAUSE OF ACTION UNDER THE UNRUH CIVIL RIGHTS ACT IN THAT IT SHOWS ON ITS FACE THAT DEFENDANT DID NOT COMMIT ANY FORM OF DENIAL OR DISCRIMINATION AS THOSE TERMS ARE USED IN THE ACT.

A. Objection by Demurrer. The party against whom a complaint has been filed may object to the complaint by demurrer on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to state a cause of action when that ground appears on the face of the complaint [or from any matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice] (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 430.10(e), 430.30(a)).

B. Rights of Accommodation. Under the Unruh Civil Rights Act, all persons within the jurisdiction of this state are entitled to the full and equal accommodations, advantages, facilities, privileges, or services in all business establishments of every kind whatsoever (Civ. Code § 51).

C. Denial or Discrimination as Actionable. Under the Unruh Civil Rights Act, an individual only has a cause of action against a business establishment or anyone who denies or aids or incites the denial of the individual's rights of accommodation established by the Act or who makes any discrimination or distinction in these rights on account of sex, color, race, religion, ancestry, national origin, disability, medical condition, marital status, or sexual orientation, or for any arbitrary reason (Civ. Code § 52(a); see In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 216, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992).

D. Failure to Show Denial or Discrimination. A complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act is subject to demurrer for failure to state a cause of action if it fails to allege facts that show the occurrence of a denial or discrimination as those terms are used in the Act (Crowell v. Isaacs (1965) 235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 757, 45 Cal. Rptr. 566).

[Optional] E. Failure to Prove Intentional Discrimination. A plaintiff seeking to establish a case under the Unruh Civil Rights Act must plead and prove intentional discrimination in public accommodations in violation of the terms of the Act (Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1175, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 ; Hankins v. El Torito Restaurants, Inc. (1998) 63 Cal. App. 4th 510, 74 Cal. Rptr. 2d 684). A disparate-impact test does not apply to claims under the Act (Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1175, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873).

[Optional] F. Failure to Allege Proper Standing. Unless the plaintiff comes within the meaning of "aggrieved person" as used in Civil Code Section 52, that plaintiff lacks standing to bring an action for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (see Midpeninsula Citizens for Fair Housing v. Westwood Investors (1990) 221 Cal. App. 3d 1377, 1382-1386, 271 Cal. Rptr. 99).

[Optional] G. Failure to Act Affirmatively. The failure to seek out individuals of a particular race or to advertise that buyers or customers of all races are invited does not constitute a denial or discrimination under the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Crowell v. Isaacs (1965) 235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 757, 45 Cal. Rptr. 566).

[Optional] H. Failure to Complete Real Estate Transaction. The failure to complete a real estate transaction does not constitute unlawful denial or discrimination on the part of a real estate broker when the broker provided those services that are within the power of a broker to provide and the failure to complete the transaction was the result of decisions solely within the power of the principal (Vargas v. Hampson (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 479, 481-482, 20 Cal. Rptr. 618, 370 P.2d 322).

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that regardless of the actual effect of the defendant's action on the plaintiff's rights of accommodation, a discrimination or denial as those terms are used in the Act did not occur [see Civ. Code § 51].

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to support a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] or a petition for writ of mandate to review a decision by the Fair Employment and Housing Commission [see Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5; Gov. Code § 12930(f)(2)] based on the contention that a form of denial or discrimination as those terms are used in the Unruh Civil Rights Act did not occur.

If the complaint alleges a violation of the Unruh Act based on an alleged violation of the right of an individual under the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, these points and authorities may also be appropriately modified to support a motion for summary judgment [Civ. Code § 51; see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 116, Civil Rights: Discrimination in Business Establishments (Matthew Bender)].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Denial or Discrimination as Actionable

In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , involved the enforcement of a local trespassing ordinance that prohibited trespassing on private property or business premises except in situations in which ejecting an individual would violate the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Cox and his associate, a young man who wore long hair and dressed in an unconventional manner, were arrested under this ordinance at a shopping center after refusing to leave the premises. A complaint was filed against Cox and, after he was released on bail, he petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus to test the restraint imposed on him in the form of constructive custody prior to trial. Although the Supreme Court denied the petition because the trial court failed to make any findings of facts, it set out the law to be followed by the trial court in applying the Unruh Act.

At the time of this incident, the Act provided that denial of services by business establishments on account of an individual's race, color, religion, ancestry, or national origin was specifically prohibited. The Court held that these enumerated characteristics were illustrative, rather than restrictive, indicia of the types of exclusions that the statute prohibited. The Court felt that both the history and the language of the statute disclosed a clear legislative design to interdict all arbitrary discrimination by a business enterprise. The Court noted that the first statutory predecessor of the Unruh Act, enacted in 1897, codified the common law rule that requires certain enterprises to serve all customers reasonably without discrimination. Although the Unruh Act, enacted in 1959, replaced the narrow term of "public accommodation and amusement" with "business establishments of every kind whatsoever" and added the enumerated categories of prohibited discrimination, it did not explicitly suggest a legislative intention to modify the prior law's prohibition on all arbitrary discrimination (3 Cal. 3d 205, 212-217) .

Counsel should note, however, that in Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 , which is discussed in § 35.20[3][c], the Court included language that could be construed to indicate the Court's preference to limit the scope of the Act to the groups specified in Civ. Code § 51 (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1159-1161, 1175) . In King v. Hofer (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 678, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 719 , discussed in § 35.21[3][j], the court of appeal cited the cautionary language in Harris, to say that future expansion of prohibited categories should be carefully weighed to ensure a result consistent with legislative intent (42 Cal. App. 4th 678, 681-684) . In Brown v. Smith (1997) 55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 64 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 , discussed in § 35.44[3][c], the court found that courts have been reluctant to extend the scope of protection under the Unruh Act since the decision in Harris, and that the Unruh Act itself does not protect against sexual harassment (55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 786-788) .

In Hessians Motorcycle Club v. J.C. Flanagans (2001) 86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 552 , discussed in § 35.21[3][k], the court of appeal held that although the California Supreme Court concluded in Harris that the Legislature intended to confine the scope of the Act to the types of discrimination specifically identified in Civ. Code § 51, the Court did not overrule the prior cases extending the Unruh Act to certain nonenumerated classifications, but made clear that future expansion of prohibited categories should be carefully weighed to ensure a result consistent with legislative intent. In Hessians, the court found that exclusion from a sports bar of anyone wearing "colors" or a patch indicating membership in a particular motorcycle club was not discrimination based on unconventional appearance, a nonenumerated classification recognized in Cox. Motorcyclists wearing full regalia were welcomed, as well as those with long hair, leather, or tattoos. Since the patch alone kept the plaintiffs out of the bar, it was not discrimination based on unconventional appearance (86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 837) .

Although the Unruh Act prohibits discrimination on the basis of disability, it does not require any construction, alteration, or any other modification to any new or existing establishment, facility, building, or any other structure, beyond construction, alteration, repair, or modification otherwise required by other provisions of law [Civ. Code §§ 51, 52(g)].

[b] Failure to Show Denial or Discrimination

In Crowell v. Isaacs (1965) 235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 45 Cal. Rptr. 566 , plaintiffs, two whites who wished to sell their house to any qualified buyer, sought recovery under the Unruh Civil Rights Act against their real estate agent on the grounds that the agent did not intend to offer the property to any member of the general public regardless of race, did not permit advertising that invited buyers of all races to purchase the property, and did not seek out qualified black buyers. The trial court sustained defendant's general demurrer without leave to amend, and plaintiffs appealed. Although the court of appeal reversed the trial court's action insofar as the complaint stated a cause of action based on breach of contract, it upheld the trial court's interpretation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. It explained that plaintiffs' allegations, standing alone, did not show any denial or discrimination as those terms are used in Civ. Code § 52, which is used to enforce the Act. Although the court conceded that mere quiescence could amount to discrimination in some circumstances, it held that failure to act affirmatively to encourage minority purchasers did not amount to discrimination (235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 757) .

[c] Failure to Prove Intentional Discrimination

In Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 , plaintiffs, female heads of low-income families whose income consisted solely of public-assistance benefits, filed a representative action under the Unruh Act against defendants, real property owners and management of rental properties, based on defendants' policy of requiring that prospective tenants have gross monthly incomes of at least three times the rent to be charged. Although plaintiffs could afford to pay the rent charged, they did not have incomes equal to three times the rent. Plaintiffs alleged the minimum-income policy was both arbitrary economic discrimination and sex discrimination based on its adverse statistical impact on women. The trial court dismissed the action. The court of appeal reversed the economic discrimination claim and affirmed the sex discrimination claim.

The California Supreme Court reversed the court of appeal holding on the economic discrimination claim and affirmed its holding on the sex discrimination on the basis of the disparate-impact claim. Plaintiffs alleged that defendants' minimum-income policy constitutes sex discrimination because it has a disparate impact on women. They explained that a disproportionate number of families receiving public assistance are headed by women, and women generally have lower average incomes than men. Thus, they claimed that defendants' minimum-income policy excludes a disproportionate number of female-headed households from the pool of applicants to whom defendants will rent units, since a statistically greater number of families headed by women are adversely affected by defendants' policies than families headed by men. The Court explained that the disparate-impact test allows a plaintiff in certain contexts to establish a prima facie case of discrimination by showing that a defendant's policies or practices have an adverse impact on a statutorily protected class of persons such as women. It allows a plaintiff to prove that a facially neutral employment practice nonetheless actually discriminates because of its disproportionate negative impact on the particular protected class to which plaintiff belongs (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1170-1171) .

Plaintiffs urged that extension of a disparate-impact test to claims under the Unruh Act is necessary to further the purpose of the Act to combat arbitrary discrimination in public accommodations. The Court disagreed, explaining that the language of the Act suggests that intentional acts of discrimination, not disparate impact, was the object of the legislation. It cited language from Civ. Code §§ 51 and 52, its enforcement provision. The Court found the references to "aiding" and "inciting" denial of access, to making discriminations and restrictions, and to the commission of an "offense" to imply willful, affirmative misconduct on the part of those who violate the Act. Moreover, the damages provision reveals a desire to punish intentional and morally offensive conduct. In contrast, the law under which the disparate-impact test was developed does not allow recovery of compensatory or punitive damages, but confines relief to specified forms of equitable relief. Additionally, the Act explicitly exempts standards that are "applicable alike to persons of every" enumerated characteristic. The Court concluded that if the Legislature had intended to include adverse-impact claims, it would have omitted or at least qualified this language, because, by its nature, an adverse-impact claim challenges a standard that is applicable alike to all persons, on the basis of the premise that, notwithstanding its universal applicability, its actual impact demands scrutiny (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1172-1173) .

Further, the Court observed that the disparate-impact test has not been applied in cases decided under Title II (42 U.S.C. § 2000a(a)), the federal antidiscrimination law most closely analogous to the Unruh Act (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1173-1174) . The general antidiscriminatory objectives of the Unruh Act are much broader than the specific antidiscriminatory principles underlying the federal laws prohibiting employment and housing discrimination, which employ a disparate-impact test. The Unruh Act aims to eliminate arbitrary discrimination in the provision of all business services to all persons. Adoption of the disparate-impact theory to cases under the Unruh Act would expose businesses to new liability and potential court regulation of their day-to-day practices in a manner never intended by the Legislature (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1174) .

Accordingly, the Court held that a plaintiff seeking to establish a case under the Unruh Act must plead and prove intentional discrimination in public accommodations in violation of the terms of the Act. A disparate-impact test does not apply to Unruh Act claims. In so holding, the Court said it did not preclude the admission of relevant evidence of disparate impact in Unruh Act cases on proper foundation and subject to the general rules of evidence. Because the evidence may be probative of intentional discrimination in some cases, a blanket rule of exclusion cannot be justified (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1175) .

In Hankins v. El Torito Restaurants, Inc. (1998) 63 Cal. App. 4th 510, 74 Cal. Rptr. 2d 684 , a disabled restaurant patron sued the restaurant for violations of the Unruh Act after he was forced to relieve himself in the restaurant parking lot because restaurant employees refused to let him use an otherwise accessible employee restroom, even though restrooms for patrons were on the second floor of the restaurant, which had no elevator. The trial court found that, although the defendant restaurant was not in violation of applicable disability laws, it breached its duty to plaintiff as a disabled person and discriminated against plaintiff by refusing to permit him to use the only available restroom facilities on the ground floor of the building.

On appeal, the defendant restaurant contended, among other things, that the plaintiff had failed to plead intentional discrimination by the restaurant, that the trial court did not find intentional discrimination, and that there was insufficient evidence of intentional discrimination (63 Cal. App. 4th 510, 517-518) . The court of appeal found that plaintiff did plead intentional discrimination by alleging a violation of Civ. Code § 51 in one of his causes of action by expressly alleging the defendant had wrongfully and unlawfully denied accessible restroom facilities to physically handicapped persons, that it acted with knowledge of the effect its conduct was having on physically disabled persons, and that plaintiff was discriminated against on the sole basis that he was physically disabled. Thus, the court held the issue of intentional discrimination was before the lower court. Further, although the court agreed that the trial court's statement of decision could have been clearer, it found the trial court's decision included a finding of intentional discrimination in the express statement that it was awarding plaintiff damages for defendant's "discriminatory conduct" and imposing liability under Civ. Code § 51 et seq. (63 Cal. App. 4th 510, 518) .

[d] Failure to Allege Proper Standing

In Midpeninsula Citizens for Fair Housing v. Westwood Investors (1990) 221 Cal. App. 3d 1377, 271 Cal. Rptr. 99 , a nonprofit corporation organized for the purpose of securing equal housing opportunities for all persons, sued the owner and manager of an apartment complex because of their policy of limiting occupancy to one person per bedroom, claiming that policy was discrimination prohibited by the Unruh Act. The trial court found the organization had no standing to sue under the Act and entered judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed and remanded with directions to dismiss the action as moot. Although the court agreed that the organization had no standing under the Unruh Act, it noted that the organization did have standing under the unfair business practices statute (Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204). Moreover, although Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204 provides only for injunctive relief, and the complex had changed its policy, rendering the case moot, the court proceeded to address the issue of standing, noting that it is an issue of continuing public interest (221 Cal. App. 3d 1377, 1380) . (Bus. & Prof. Code § 17204 has since been amended, and its relief provisions are no longer restricted to injunctive relief.) The court said that Civ. Code § 52 sets forth the remedies available for violations of the Unruh Act. It explained that Civ. Code § 52(a) enables the person denied those rights to sue for damages, while Civ. Code § 52(c) permits actions for injunctions by various public attorneys and any person aggrieved. The organization claimed it was an aggrieved party because the complex's policy caused a drain on its limited resources, thereby diverting needed funds from important educational and counseling services (221 Cal. App. 3d 1377, 1382) . The court was not persuaded, and said that the legislative history indicated that Civ. Code § 52(c) was not intended to be given such an expansive interpretation (221 Cal. App. 3d 1377, 1383) . It said that the class of plaintiffs affected by the occupancy policy consisted of prospective tenants with large families who would be disqualified from renting apartments. Assuming that the policy operated in a discriminatory manner in violation of the Unruh Act, the court concluded that the organization was not one of those suffering from the unfair treatment. The court also rejected the organization's attempt to apply federal precedent, saying that the analysis applicable to a provision of the federal Fair Housing Act does not determine the scope of standing under the California statutory scheme (221 Cal. App. 3d 1377, 1385) .

[e] Failure to Act Affirmatively

The factual background of Crowell v. Isaacs (1965) 235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 45 Cal. Rptr. 566 , is discussed under § 35.20[3][b]. In upholding the trial court's decision to sustain a general demurrer without leave to amend for failure to state a cause of action under the Unruh Civil Rights Act, the court of appeal determined that plaintiffs' allegations of defendant's failure affirmatively to seek out buyers who were black and to advertise that buyers of all races were invited to purchase the house did not constitute a denial of equal rights or a discrimination, distinction, or restriction. Further, an offer or attempt to sell did not become discriminatory merely because it omitted a disclaimer of discrimination (235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 757) .

[f] Failure to Complete Real Estate Transaction

In Vargas v. Hampson (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 479, 20 Cal. Rptr. 618, 370 P.2d 322 , plaintiffs, a husband and wife of Mexican ancestry, brought an action under the Unruh Civil Rights Act for injunctive relief against defendant real estate broker who had refused to sell them a home. The trial court sustained general and special demurrers to the complaint with leave to amend. Plaintiffs failed to amend and appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the judgment of the trial court. Plaintiffs' complaint alleged that they had made a cash deposit with defendant broker for purchase of a house and, at defendant's request, signed a purchase and sale agreement. Subsequently, defendant returned the deposit and refused to sell the property to plaintiffs allegedly because they were of Mexican ancestry, and defendant had a policy not to sell real property to persons of Mexican ancestry.

The Court commented that plaintiffs' complaint stated a cause of action against defendant for violation of the Unruh Act and it would have been error to sustain a demurrer without leave to amend. However, under the theory that defendant acted as the agent of a third party in refusing to sell the property, the Court stated that it was proper to sustain the motions for demurrer. The complaint showed that defendant did provide some services to plaintiffs; it did not specify any failure by defendant to render any services within his power as a broker. The allegation that defendant refused to sell the property can be interpreted to charge him with a failure to complete the transaction, but the Court pointed out that it did not allege that he had authority to do so. It may have been the owner who refused to consummate the sale. Further, the allegation that defendant's refusal to sell was in accordance with his policy of discrimination did not necessarily show that the refusal was caused by that policy. Thus, the Court concluded, the decision of the trial court could be upheld under the rule that although in some circumstances both a broker and an owner may be guilty of discrimination, a broker who in good faith does all within his or her power to serve a member of a racial minority is not liable if the broker's failure to complete the transaction is due solely to the owner's refusal to sell (57 Cal. 2d 479, 481-482) .

It does not appear that the principle enunciated in Vargas can be expanded to a general rule that all agents are exonerated for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when they act solely at the direction of a principal. The Court did not cite any precedent for its rule in Vargas and the general rule in California is that one who assumes to act as an agent is responsible to third persons as a principal for wrongful acts committed in the course of an agency and that an agent is always liable for his or her torts regardless of whether the agent was acting according to the principal's directions [Civ. Code § 2343(3); Holman v. California (1975) 53 Cal. App. 3d 317, 336, 124 Cal. Rptr. 773] . Vargas thus appears to be an exception to the general rule of agency liability and may be limited to its own facts.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Denial or Discrimination as Actionable

In Black v. Department of Mental Health (2000) 83 Cal. App. 4th 739, 100 Cal. Rptr. 2d 39 , the administrator of the estate of a long-term mental patient sued the state Department of Mental Health and its director, two state hospitals, and a private facility and its operator, for, inter alia, violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act, Civ. Code § 51, based on the incorporation into the Unruh Act of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 ("ADA"), 42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq. The decedent had been a long-term mental patient at a state hospital that closed in 1997. Decedent's brother and conservator agreed to have decedent transferred to a privately-owned facility operating on the grounds of another state hospital; after the transfer, decedent died. The complaint alleged that decedent's conservator was duped into believing his brother was transferred to the other state hospital, not the private facility, where he received a lower level of care, violating the "integration mandate" of the ADA. The trial court sustained demurrers without leave to amend and entered judgment for defendants. The court of appeal affirmed, holding that while it may have been medically inappropriate to transfer decedent to the private facility, it did not violate the integration mandate of the ADA (83 Cal. App. 4th 739, 754-755) .

[b] Failure to Prove Intentional Discrimination

In Gunther v. Lin (2006) 144 Cal. App. 4th 223, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 317 , plaintiff, who uses a wheelchair, discovered two violations of the Americans With Disabilities Act Architectural Guidelines (ADAAGs) in a restaurant restroom he used just before the completion of remodeling. He sued under Civ. Code § 52 based on an alleged violation of the Unruh Act provision that violations of the ADA constitute violations of the Unruh Act [Civ. Code § 51(f)], based on the two alleged ADAAG violations. The plaintiff could have sued under Civ. Code § 54.3, which does not require intentional discrimination, but he would have received a smaller statutory penalty. There was no question that the defendant never intended to violate the ADA. The trial court granted defendant summary judgment, on the ground that plaintiff failed to show intentional discrimination under § 52. The Court of Appeal affirmed. The court held that Civ. Code § 52 requires proof of intentional discrimination, and that the adoption of the 1992 legislation which added Civ. Code § 51(f) did not change the Harris rule requiring an intentional discrimination to trigger the automatic penalty provisions of § 52. The plaintiff elected to go for the relatively higher minimum penalty provided by § 52 rather than the lower penalty of § 54.3, but his election required a showing of intentional discrimination, which he could not make, so the trial court was correct to grant the summary judgment motion (144 Cal. App. 4th 223, 226-256) .

§ 35.21 Supporting Demurrer to Complaint [Code Civ. Proc. § 430.10(e)] Against Business Establishment for Violation of Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51]--Failure to Show Prohibited Reason for Denial or Discrimination

[Caption. See § 35.20.]

PLAINTIFF'S COMPLAINT FAILS TO STATE A CAUSE OF ACTION UNDER THE UNRUH CIVIL RIGHTS ACT IN THAT IT SHOWS ON ITS FACE THAT DEFENDANT'S ACTION DID NOT DISCRIMINATE IN REGARD TO OR DENY RIGHTS OF ACCOMMODATION ON ACCOUNT OF AN INDIVIDUAL CHARACTERISTIC ENUMERATED IN THE ACT OR FOR ANY ARBITRARY REASON.

A. Objection by Demurrer. [See § 35.20, Paragraph A.]

B. Rights of Accommodation. [See § 35.20, Paragraph B.]

C. Denial or Discrimination as Actionable. [See § 35.20, Paragraph C.]

D. Failure to Show Prohibited Reason for Denial or Discrimination. A complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act is subject to a demurrer for failure to state a cause of action if it fails to allege facts that show that defendant discriminated in regard to or denied rights of accommodation established by the Act on account of an individual characteristic enumerated in the Act or for some arbitrary reason (Archibald v. Cinerama Hawaiian Hotels, Inc. (1977) 73 Cal. App. 3d 152, 159, 140 Cal. Rptr. 599 ; Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 302, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547).

E. Arbitrary Reason Defined. An action that discriminates in regard to or denies rights of accommodation established by the Unruh Civil Rights Act is not arbitrary if it is based on a reason that is rationally related to the services performed and the facilities provided (In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 217, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 ; Howe v. Bank of America, N.A. (2009) 179 Cal. App. 4th 1443, 102 Cal. Rptr. 3d 506 ; Wynn v. Monterey Club (1980) 111 Cal.

App. 3d 789, 796, 168 Cal. Rptr. 878).

[Optional] F. Openness to Public as Criteria. A business establishment that is less open to the public may impose more stringent standards in regard to recommendations than establishments that are more open to the public (Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 300-301, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547).

[Optional] G. Distinction Made on Basis of Financial Criterion Is Not Violation of Unruh Act. A financial criterion of customer selection that applies uniformly and neutrally to all persons regardless of personal characteristics is not a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. For example, a landlord's policy requiring prospective tenants to have a gross monthly income of at least three times the rent to be charged is not unlawful discrimination (Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1169, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873).

[Optional] H. Specialized Institution Designed to Meet Social Need. A specialized institution designed to meet a social need may properly exclude a certain class of persons if its exclusionary policy serves a compelling societal interest (Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 742-743, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 (dictum)).

[Optional] I. Housing Open Only to Senior Citizens Is Not Violation of Unruh Act. When accommodations are designed to meet the physical and social needs of senior citizens, a business establishment may establish and preserve that housing for senior citizens, pursuant to Civil Code Section 51.3 (Civ. Code § 51.2).

[Optional] J. Restriction of Children in Housing Is Not Violation of Unruh Act. Differential treatment towards families with young children may be permissible. For example, a condominium complex that did not totally exclude children, but merely restricted them to one-half the complex, did not arbitrarily discriminate in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Sunrise Country Club Assn. v. Proud (1987) 190 Cal. App. 3d 377, 381-382, 235 Cal. Rptr. 404).

[Optional] K. Age-Based Discounts Are Not Violation of Unruh Act. Price discounts given to children and senior citizens do not constitute a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act, because of public policy considerations as exemplified by the differential treatment of these groups by various statutes, the limited earning capacities of these groups, the fact that such a policy does not perpetuate irrational stereotypes, and the fact that all members of society will be members of both groups (Starkman v. Mann Theatres Corp. (1991) 227 Cal. App. 3d 1491, 1495-1501, 278 Cal. Rptr. 543).

[Optional] L. Distinction Made on Basis of Marital Status Is Violation of Unruh Act. The Unruh Civil Rights Act specifically prohibits discrimination on the basis of marital status (Civ. Code § 51(b), (e)). However, not all forms of discrimination on the basis of marital status constitute violations of the Unruh Civil Rights Act, and the type of marital status discrimination alleged by plaintiff is not cognizable under the Act (see Koebke v. Bernardo Heights Country Club (2005) 36 Cal. 4th 824, 836-855, 31 Cal. Rptr. 3d 565, 115 P.3d 1212).

[Optional] M. Discrimination in Office Leasing Based on Profession Not Violation of Unruh Act. Discrimination in leasing office space based on profession, so long as it is not a strategem designed to disguise prohibited discrimination based on personal characteristics, is not prohibited under the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Roth v. Rhodes (1994) 25 Cal. App. 4th 530, 539, 30 Cal. Rptr. 2d 706).

[Optional] N. Discrimination Against Nonsmokers Not Violation of Unruh Act. Discrimination in public accommodations based on characteristic of being a nonsmoker does not constitute a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (King v. Hofer (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 678, 683-684, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 719).

[Optional] O. Discrimination Against Motorcyclists Wearing Indicia of Membership in Motorcycle Club Not Violation of Unruh Act. Discrimination in public accommodations against motorcyclists based on their wearing indicia of club membership, such as "colors" or patches, does not constitute a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Gatto

v. County of Sonoma (2002) 98 Cal. App. 4th 744, 765-769, 120 Cal. Rptr. 2d 550 ; Hessians Motorcycle Club v. J.C. Flanagans (2001) 86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 837-839, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 552).

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that the complaint fails to allege facts showing that defendant's action discriminated in regard to or denied a right of accommodation established by the Act on account of sex, color, race, religion, ancestry, national origin, disability, or for any arbitrary reason.

Counsel should note that Civ. Code §§ 51.2-51.4, relating to housing specifically set aside for senior citizens, do not apply to the County of Riverside, and are supplanted, with respect to that county only, by Civ. Code §§ 51.10-51.12.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to support a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] or a petition for writ of mandate to review a decision by the Fair Employment and Housing Commission [see Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5; Gov. Code § 12930(f)(2)] based on the contention that an arbitrary restriction did not occur.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Failure to Show Prohibited Reason for Denial or Discrimination

In Archibald v. Cinerama Hawaiian Hotels, Inc. (1977) 73 Cal. App. 3d 152, 140 Cal. Rptr. 599 , plaintiff, a California resident, was charged a rate by a hotel in Hawaii that was higher than the rate that is offered to residents of Hawaii. She brought a class action on behalf of California residents and citizens who had been charged a similarly higher rate by hotels in Hawaii. One of her three causes of action was based on the common-law duty of innkeepers not to discriminate, and another was for violation of some unspecified California law. The trial court sustained a demurrer without leave to amend to all of plaintiff's causes of action, and plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. It held that the common-law duty of innkeepers not to discriminate requires an innkeeper to receive and accommodate all persons at a reasonable rate, but does not prevent an innkeeper from charging rates that are lower than reasonable or from offering discounts to induce patronage from certain groups or classes. The court also responded to plaintiff's claim that the Unruh Civil Rights Act extended the common-law rules applied to innkeepers. It held that the Act was inapplicable in many cases because by its express language it only applies within California. Finally it held that even if it were otherwise, plaintiff could not claim a violation of the Act because she was not arbitrarily excluded from any business establishment nor arbitrarily discriminated against in any way. The court appeared to determine that defendants' action was not arbitrary under the Act because it was not discriminatory under the common-law duty of innkeepers. Since plaintiff did not show an actionable wrong under the statute, the trial court did not err in sustaining defendants' demurrers (73 Cal. App. 3d 152, 159) .

The Supreme Court in Koire v. Metro Car Wash (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 24, 32 n.10, 219 Cal. Rptr. 133, 707 P.2d 195 , disapproved, as conclusional dictum, the finding in Archibald that even if the Unruh Civil Rights Act were to be applied, it did not proscribe the practices about which plaintiff complained.

Archibald states that a plaintiff must always show that discrimination or denial was arbitrary. However, it did not determine if an allegation showing that the basis of an act of discrimination was a characteristic enumerated in the Unruh Act, such as race or sex, sufficiently alleges that the act was arbitrary to state a cause of action. The Supreme Court has not explicitly resolved this issue. Paragraph D of the foregoing memorandum, however, is based on the theory, supported by dictum in Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547 (discussed below), that any form of discrimination on the basis of race, sex, or other enumerated characteristic is arbitrary per se, at least for the purpose of resisting a general demurrer.

In Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547 , plaintiff sought declaratory relief, an injunction, and damages in connection with alleged threats by defendant owners and managers of her apartment house to evict her from her apartment. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the trial court granted defendants a judgment of nonsuit on the jury cause of action and judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 631.8 on the other causes of action, and plaintiff appealed. One of the issues on appeal was whether or not the threatened eviction represented arbitrary discrimination under the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The facts disclosed that plaintiff had participated in a tenants' meeting called to discuss proposed rent increases and had obtained signatures on a petition requesting defendant owner to attend another meeting to discuss the rent increases. Further, the managers of the building were worried about the possibility of a rent strike. Although the court of appeal reversed the judgment of the trial court as to the cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress, it upheld the trial court's interpretation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Plaintiff's case failed in the court's view because an action by a landlord that does not restrict the right of a tenant to habitable living premises and does not discriminate on the basis of an enumerated characteristic is not actionable if it proceeds from a motive of rational self-interest. Thus, the court, assumed that discrimination on the basis of an enumerated characteristic is, by itself, a sufficient showing of arbitrary discrimination (60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 302) .

Although the Legislature subsequently determined in Civ. Code § 1942.5 to protect tenants from retaliatory eviction for advocating tenants' rights and thus, under the rationale adopted by Newby, conferred an Unruh Civil Rights Act action, this change does not affect the validity of the court's analysis of the effect of failure to allege facts sufficient to show a cause of action under the Act.

[b] Arbitrary Reason Defined

The factual background of In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , is discussed in § 35.20[3][a]. Although the Supreme Court determined in that case that the Unruh Civil Rights Act prohibits arbitrary discrimination by business establishments, the Court emphasized that the Act does not deprive business establishments of the ability to establish reasonable patronage regulations that are rationally related to the services performed and the facilities provided (3 Cal. 3d 205, 217) .

In Howe v. Bank of America, N.A. (2009) 179 Cal. App. 4th 1443, 102 Cal. Rptr. 3d 506 , plaintiffs, acting on behalf of a putative class of "individuals of U.S. national origin and/or ancestry, as well as naturalized individuals," sued credit card companies, alleging that, to increase their profits, defendants arbitrarily discriminated against the class and discriminated against the class based on national origin and/or ancestry in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code § 51 et seq.) by requiring that United States citizens provide a Social Security number to open a particular type of credit card account, while allowing foreign nationals to open such accounts with only alternative forms of identification. The complaint alleged that the plaintiff class was harmed in two ways: (1) By not requiring Social Security numbers of foreign nationals, defendants could be jeopardizing the safety of every person in the U.S. because the lack of a Social Security number aided terrorists, provided a gateway to money laundering, encouraged illegal immigration and identity theft, and defied or hinders federal laws, including immigration laws, the Patriot Act, and tax laws. (2) Defendants improperly favored foreign nationals over the plaintiff class, because by not having to provide Social Security numbers, foreign nationals were not as vulnerable to identity theft, did not have a damaging inquiry added to their credit report, and did not have to report to the Internal Revenue Service interest from the accounts, unlike U.S. nationals. The complaint sought monetary damages and an injunction prohibiting further discriminatory practices, but did not specify whether the requested injunction should preclude defendants from allowing foreign nationals to apply for credit cards without providing a Social Security number, or preclude defendants from requiring United States citizens and permanent residents to provide Social Security numbers in applying for credit cards. Defendants demurred to the complaint, arguing that they were required by federal law to obtain Social Security numbers from United States citizens seeking to establish credit card accounts; federal law did not require credit card companies to obtain Social Security numbers from foreign nationals; and requiring Social Security numbers from foreign nationals would effectively preclude those who were not eligible to obtain Social Security numbers from opening accounts. Thus, the policy of allowing foreign nationals, but not United States citizens, to obtain accounts without providing a Social Security number was reasonable and nondiscriminatory. Defendants also argued that plaintiffs had not alleged any cognizable harm to the putative class caused by either its requirement that they produce Social Security numbers to open a credit account, or its failure to require that foreign nationals provide Social Security numbers to open a credit account; and to the extent a cause of action had been stated, the court should decline to consider it under the doctrine of equitable abstention, since adjudicating the credit practices of a federally regulated bank would delve too deeply into issues of economic policy, which is traditionally a legislative function. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, reasoning that to the extent feasible, defendants sought seeking viable useful identification from every credit card applicant, and that having identical standards of identification would leave out vast numbers of people from the credit card program (179 Cal. App. 4th 1443, 1445-1449) .

The Court of Appeal affirmed. The court found first that the Unruh Act generally prohibits discrimination based upon "personal characteristics," and assumed, without deciding that citizenship status would qualify as the type of "personal characteristic" falling within the protection of the Act (179 Cal. App. 4th 1443, 1450 & n.2). However, the Act does not entirely prohibit businesses from drawing distinctions on the basis of the protected classifications or personal characteristics; rather, the objective of the Act is to prohibit businesses from engaging in unreasonable, arbitrary or invidious discrimination. A public policy expressed by statute generally constitutes a reasonable basis for drawing distinctions on the basis of classifications otherwise protected by the Act (179 Cal. App. 4th 1443, 1450-1451) . Moreover, legitimate business interests may justify limitations on consumer access to public accommodations (179 Cal. App. 4th 1443, 1451) . The court then agreed with the trial court's conclusion that defendants did not act "arbitrarily" when requiring United States citizens to provide a Social Security number to open a credit card account, while allowing foreign nationals to open one using an alternative form of identification. Federal regulations, enacted pursuant to "The USA Patriot Act," specifically required defendants to obtain a Social Security number from a United States citizen opening an account but allowed them to obtain either a Social Security number or an alternative identification number from a customer who was not a U.S. citizen [see 31 C.F.R. § 103.121(b)], and defendants had no choice but to do so. Thus, as a matter of law, defendants did not act arbitrarily in requiring Social Security numbers from United States citizen account holders. The distinction between the types of identification numbers required for United States citizens and foreign nationals was created by federal law, not by defendants, and presumably reflected a determination that the alternative identification numbers that could be used by foreign nationals effectively served the same purposes as a Social Security number. For defendant to depart from the required minimums by imposing stricter requirements on foreign nationals, but not on United States citizens, could itself appear discriminatory in the context of the regulatory scheme, and might subject defendants to litigation. Even if that litigation were not successful, defendants had a strong incentive to avoid the expense and controversy associated with defending such a claim. Thus, defendants did not act "arbitrarily" when they simply applied the minimum identification standards imposed by federal law to both foreign nationals and United States citizens seeking to obtain a credit account. Defendants' practice bore a reasonable relationship to their commercial objectives and was consequently valid on its face (179 Cal. App. 4th 1443, 1451-1454) .

In Wynn v. Monterey Club (1980) 111 Cal. App. 3d 789, 168 Cal. Rptr. 878 , plaintiff contracted with two gambling establishments to bar his wife, a compulsive gambler, from entering the premises and cashing checks. Plaintiff agreed to satisfy the debts his wife incurred when she cashed checks with insufficient funds at defendants' clubs. Plaintiff paid the obligation in full during the ensuing year. However, approximately one year later, plaintiff learned that his wife was again gambling and cashing checks at defendants' clubs. Plaintiff brought an action against defendants for breach of contract. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the ground that the contract was illegal and, therefore, unenforceable. The court of appeal reversed and remanded. Defendants claimed that although they could legally justify barring plaintiff's wife based on her past conduct in cashing insufficiently funded checks, they could no longer bar her from access once the debt was satisfied because the Unruh Civil Rights Act prohibits a business establishment from arbitrarily excluding any prospective customer.

However, the court noted that In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 (discussed above), recognized the right of a business establishment to adopt reasonable restrictions when those restrictions are rationally related to business conducted or the facilities and services provided (111 Cal. App. 3d 789, 796) . It stated that there was nothing in Civ. Code § 51 that indicated that its application turned on the narrow question of indebtedness. Furthermore, the reason for excluding plaintiff's wife transcended the satisfaction of the debt, since she would continue to write insufficiently funded checks to fund her gambling, thereby harming herself and her husband. The court felt that these factors were sufficient to justify an ongoing exclusion of plaintiff's wife from the facilities (111 Cal. App. 3d 789, 797) . It analogized the situation to the liquor establishment's justification in refusing access to a habitually intoxicated person who, in the past, had become intoxicated on the premises and had disturbed or harmed other persons. Both cases, the court reasoned, involved recognized mental disorders. Therefore, the court held that the barring of plaintiff's wife would not be arbitrary, but would be rationally related to good business and social practice (111 Cal. App. 3d 789, 798) . It reversed and remanded with directions to the trial court to vacate its order and to enter an order denying the motion for summary judgment.

[c] Openness to Public as Criteria

The factual background of Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547 , is discussed in § 35.21[3][a]. In that case, the trial court determined that plaintiff had not shown a case of arbitrary discrimination under the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The court of appeal affirmed and, in its analysis of what types of restrictions on patrons were permitted by the act, noted that a landlord in exercising controls rationally related to the facilities provided might reasonably impose more stringent standards than an owner of a business establishment more open to the public (60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 302-303) .

The Supreme Court appears to have cast doubt on this decision as it pertains to apartment complexes [see Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 743, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858 ; see also the discussion under § 35.21[3][e]]. Newby seems to recognize that apartment complexes are businesses that are not open to the general public. Thus, under Newby, a landlord is allowed to impose more stringent standards than the owner of a business establishment open to the general public [see Newby v. Alto Riviera Apts. (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 300-301, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547] . The Court, in Marina Point, however, rejected "adult only" apartment complexes, recognizing that apartment complexes are businesses open to the general public [see Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 742-743, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858] .

Although the Newby principle cannot be applied to apartment complexes, it still appears to be viable with regard to other types of businesses. It has been alluded to in the leading case of In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 217, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 (set out in § 35.20[3][a]), in which the Supreme Court explicitly characterized the Unruh Civil Rights Act as forbidding arbitrary exclusion by a business establishment generally open to the public. Cox quoted a statement from Marsh v. Alabama (1946) 326 U.S. 501, 506, 66 S. Ct. 276, 90 L. Ed. 265 , that the more that owners, for their own advantage, open up property for use by the public in general, the more their rights become circumscribed by the statutory and constitutional rights of those who use it.

However, California courts have not decided whether the Unruh Civil Rights Act applies to a business establishment that is not generally open to the public. Gardner v. Vic Tanny Compton, Inc. (1960) 182 Cal. App. 2d 506, 513-514, 6 Cal. Rptr. 490 , was a case involving alleged racial discrimination by a gymnasium under Civ. Code § 51, which required that defendant be a public accommodation or amusement, unlike the Unruh Civil Rights Act, which requires that defendant be a business establishment. At the trial, defendant presented evidence that showed that the facility was open to people on a membership basis and membership requires an application, interview, and evaluation by the manager as to whether the applicants were sincere in their desire to improve themselves physically and would not be detrimental to the business welfare. The trial court found that the premises were open to some but not all members of the general public and rendered judgment for the defendant. On appeal, the court of appeal affirmed. According to the court, the issue turned on whether defendant was a place of public accommodation or amusement. The court decided that the term "public" meant open to common or general use and, thus, did not apply to defendant's operation.

It is doubtful that an enterprise like defendant in Gardner could claim today that it was not subject to the Unruh Civil Rights Act because it screened their customers on the basis of the sincerity of their desire and their contribution to business welfare. Those reasons would only underline the fact that it is a business establishment, thus subjecting it to the standards of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [see § 35.25]. Nevertheless, Gardner should not be ignored. Coupled with the Newby decision permitting more stringent standards for business establishments less open to the public, business establishments such as places of entertainment operated on a membership basis or sales outlets open to a specialized clientele may perhaps even claim exemption from the act. Liability may still exist, however, under Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which prohibits certain forms of discrimination by places of public accommodation or under 42 U.S.C. § 1981 [see, e.g., Runyon v. McCrary (1976) 427 U.S. 160, 167, 96 S. Ct. 2586, 49 L. Ed. 2d 415 (racial discrimination by private school is violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1981); Tillman v. Wheaton-Haven Recreation Ass'n (1973) 410 U.S. 431, 438, 93 S. Ct. 1090, 35 L. Ed. 2d 403 (organization that makes membership more or less automatically available to any defined group is not private club under Title II)].

In a pair of cases involving challenges to the Boy Scouts under the Unruh Act, Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 670, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 ; Randall v. Orange County Council, Boy Scouts of America (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 736, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 453, 952 P.2d 261 , the California Supreme Court discussed the application of the Unruh Act to an organization that makes membership decisions and in that sense is not open generally to the public. The Court held that the Boy Scouts is not subject to the Unruh Act for membership decisions and may exclude homosexuals and atheists without violating the Act, because the Boy Scouts is not a "business establishment" under the Unruh Act for purposes of its membership decisions. The Court held, however, that the Boy Scouts are subject to the Act for business transactions with nonmembers (17 Cal. 4th 670, 696-700 ; 17 Cal. 4th 736, 744) . The factual background of Curran and Randall is discussed in § 35.25[3][e].

[d] Distinction Made on Basis of Financial Criterion Is Not Violation of Unruh Act

The facts and procedural background of Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 , is discussed in § 35.20[3][c]. In Harris, plaintiffs filed a representative action under the Unruh Act against defendants, based on their policy of requiring that prospective tenants have gross monthly incomes of at least three times the rent. Plaintiffs alleged the minimum-income policy was arbitrary economic discrimination. The Supreme Court held there was no cause of action under the Unruh Act on that basis.

Plaintiffs argued that under prior case law, the Unruh Act applies to any distinction among persons judicially determined to be "arbitrary" or "unreasonable." They argued that defendants' policy was arbitrary because it excludes persons who are in fact able to pay rent. The Court observed that plaintiffs' argument was based on the presumption that the Legislature has effectively endorsed the broad language in prior cases by amending the statute without amending the specific language on which those cases were based. The Court was unpersuaded, saying that any presumption of legislative acquiescence in the broad concept of "arbitrary discrimination" is weakened by two factors: (1) the specific facts of the prior cases, which unlike their broad language, were confined to discrimination based on personal characteristics similar to the statutory classifications of race, sex, and religion, and (2) evidence of subsequent legislative action emphasizing the continued importance of those classifications (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1156) . The Court stressed the fact that each category enumerated in Civ. Code §§ 51 and 52 is a personal characteristic as opposed to an economic characteristic, even though the Legislature was aware throughout the history of the Unruh Act that businesses make charges for goods and services and impose financial conditions on access to their establishments (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1160) . The Legislature's decision to enumerate personal characteristics, while omitting financial or economic ones, strongly suggests a limitation on the scope of the Act. Further, when courts have applied the Act to arbitrary discrimination beyond the categories listed in Civ. Code § 51, personal characteristics, not financial status or capability, provided the basis of decision. The Court concluded that there is no support for the contention that economic distinctions are criteria within the scope of the Unruh Act. The Court buttressed its position by noting that case law recognizes that legitimate business interests may justify limitations on consumer access to public accommodations. In each case, the particular business interests of the purveyor in maintaining order, complying with legal requirements, and protecting a business reputation or investment were sufficient to justify distinctions among its customers (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1161-1162) .

Business establishments have an essential interest in obtaining full and timely payment for the goods and services they provide. There is no question that a business may, without violating the Act, charge a stated price for goods or services and demand payment in advance. Civ. Code § 51 expressly provides that the equality called for is subject to the conditions and limitations established by law, and applicable alike to all citizens. Payment for goods and services by all citizens, equally and without discrimination, is one such condition. Businesses are not prohibited from making economic distinctions among customers so long as the criteria used were not based on personal characteristics and could conceivably be met by any customer. Discounts based on quantity, advance reservations, time of purchase, or other conditions that any patron can satisfy are clearly permissible (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1162-1163) . The Court elaborated that a minimum-income policy is no different in its purpose or effect from stated price or payment terms. In pursuit of the objective of securing payment, a landlord has a legitimate and direct economic interest in the income level of prospective tenants, as opposed to their personal characteristics. For nearly all tenants, current income is the source of the monthly rental payment. When a tenant ceases paying rent during the term of the tenancy, the landlord must resort to legal process to obtain possession of the premises and to collect any back rent that may be due (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1163) . An eviction may take several months, during which the tenant remains in possession, enjoying the benefits of the leasehold without paying rent. Thus, the landlord bears the economic burden resulting from (1) loss of income from default to eviction, (2) administrative time and legal and other expenses incurred in the eviction process, and (3) delays and expense of collection of back rent from the tenant, as well as the risk of noncollection (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1163-1164) . To minimize the transaction costs of default, a landlord might adopt one or more approaches such as a minimum-income policy, which assumes that at some ratio of rent to income, the burden of paying rent, along with other living expenses, will impose a hardship on a tenant, increasing the likelihood of default. Although there may be a myriad of individual factors operating in cases of particular prospective tenants that might affect the predictive value of the ratio, it does not thereby become "arbitrary" in the same way that race and sex discrimination are arbitrary. Plaintiffs argued that the concepts of "arbitrary discrimination" and "reasonable" regulations inevitably involve fact-bound determinations requiring trial as opposed to legal issues cognizable on demurrer. The Court said that argument is not supported by the cases decided under the Unruh Act, which have in fact often decided issues as questions of law on demurrer or summary judgment when the policy or practice of a business establishment is valid on its face because it bears a reasonable relation to commercial objectives appropriate to an enterprise serving the public (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1164-1165) .

Plaintiffs maintained that the use of a minimum-income policy is arbitrary because it does not treat them as individuals and "stereotypes" them as being low-income and unable to pay rent. They argued that the act requires landlords to make individualized determinations of each prospective tenant's ability to pay rent without the use of a minimum-income policy that screens out a particular group of persons on the basis of income (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1165) . Once again, the Court was not persuaded and found two significant adverse consequences that would likely follow from such an interpretation. First, it would involve the courts in a multitude of microeconomic decisions they are ill equipped to make; the trial would develop into a battle of economic studies, the outcome of which would be subject to constant change and would not serve as a future predictor. Moreover, plaintiffs' argument is not confined to landlords and tenants, but would extend to the many other businesses, including lending institutions and retail sellers, that are in the position of extending money, goods, or services in exchange for promises to pay or repay in the future. Second, requiring individualized determinations of the kind proposed may have pernicious effects on the antidiscrimination policy of the Act itself. The Act guarantees access to public accommodations on the part of all persons regardless of race, sex, religion, or other characteristics that have no bearing on a person's status as a responsible consumer. A minimum-income policy is neutral with respect to these characteristics. Instead of encouraging landlords and other businesses to rely on criteria that are race and sex neutral in making business decisions, plaintiffs seek to challenge such criteria in court on a case-by-case basis, thereby inducing landlords to abandon such criteria in favor of subjective, individualized decisions. And yet, those evaluations, unguided by neutral criteria announced in advance and applied consistently, may serve to disguise and thereby promote the very kinds of invidious discrimination based on traits that the act prohibits (52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1166-1169) .

[e] Specialized Institution Designed to Meet Social Need

In Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858 , plaintiff, the landlord of a large apartment complex, instituted an unlawful detainer action against tenants who failed to vacate the premises after the expiration of a lease extension. The nonrenewal of defendants' lease rested solely on the landlord's general policy of refusing to rent any apartments to families with children. Defendants contended that the no-children policy violated the Unruh Civil Rights Act, the California Fair Housing Rights Act (Gov. Code § 12955 et seq.) (now known as the California Fair Employment and Housing Act [FEHA], set forth in Gov. Code § 12900 et seq.), and their state and federal constitutional rights of familial privacy and equal protection of the law. The trial court held that the provisions of the Unruh Act were confined to a limited category of protected classes and that the ban on children was outside the scope of the Act. Therefore, the court upheld the exclusionary practice and granted judgment for the landlord.

The Supreme Court reversed the judgment, stating that the blanket exclusion of families with children from an apartment complex violated the Unruh Act (30 Cal. 3d 721, 744-745) . The Court stated that contrary to the lower court's conclusion, the antidiscrimination provisions of the Unruh Act are not confined to a limited category of protected classes, but protect all persons from any arbitrary discrimination by a business establishment (30 Cal. 3d 721, 730-733) . The landlord's ban on children was not permissible even if children as a class were noisier, rowdier, more mischievous, and more boisterous than adults (30 Cal. 3d 721, 736-740) . The Act does not permit a business enterprise to exclude an entire class of individuals on the basis of a generalized prediction that the class as a whole was more likely to commit misconduct than some other class of the public (30 Cal. 3d 721, 739) . Although the Court recognized that entrepreneurs unquestionably possess broad authority to protect their enterprises from improper and disruptive behavior, the Court held that entrepreneurs must generally exercise this legitimate interest directly by excluding those persons who are in fact disruptive (30 Cal. 3d 721, 740) .

In dictum, the Court added that Marina Point was distinguishable from cases involving age-limited policies in retirement communities or housing complexes for older citizens (30 Cal. 3d 721, 742) . In light of public policy reflected by legislative enactments, age qualifications as to a housing facility reserved for older citizens can operate as a reasonable and permissible means under the Unruh Act of establishing and preserving specialized facilities for those particularly in need of those services or environment. A specialized institution designed to meet a social need differs fundamentally from the wholesale exclusion of children from an apartment complex otherwise open to the general public (30 Cal. 3d 721, 742-743) . The Court concluded that the landlord's ban on children did not serve any similarly compelling social interest. Unlike the case of special housing for the elderly, the landlord's exclusion of children exacerbates, rather than alleviates, the state's specialized housing needs (30 Cal. 3d 721, 743) .

After the Marina Point decision, the Legislature enacted Civ. Code § 51.2, which states that housing specifically set aside for senior citizens does not violate the Unruh Civil Rights Act [see Civ. Code § 51.3 (specification of allowed age restrictions on housing for senior citizens)].

[f] Restriction of Children in Housing Is Not Violation of Unruh Act

In Sunrise Country Club Assn. v. Proud (1987) 190 Cal. App. 3d 377, 235 Cal. Rptr. 404 , plaintiff was the condominium homeowners' association of a complex that promulgated rules dividing the complex into separate "adult" or "family" areas. Condominiums in "adult" areas were not allowed to be sold or rented to persons with children under 16 years of age, and children under 16 years of age were not allowed to use "adult" swimming pools. Defendants purchased a condominium in the "adult" area, although there were units available in the "family" area. Shortly thereafter defendant's daughter and her husband adopted two young children and began living in the unit. Plaintiff brought an action against defendants for violation of the rules. The trial court found defendants' use of the condominium unit was a breach of contract and a nuisance, and issued an injunction restraining defendants and their privies from permitting minors under age 16 to reside in the unit and swim in adult swimming pools. Defendants appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed the trial court judgment regarding the exclusion of children. Defendants contended that the rules establishing the separate areas were a violation of the Unruh Act. The court disagreed, and said that the act prohibits only unreasonable, arbitrary, or invidious discrimination, not differential treatment based on actual characteristic differences or differences in need of users (190 Cal. App. 3d 377, 381) . Although the Act proscribes any form of arbitrary discrimination, certain types of discrimination have been denominated reasonable and, therefore, not arbitrary.

In certain situations, the Act has been held inapplicable to discrimination between patrons based on the nature of the business enterprise and of the facilities provided. The division of the complex into adult and family areas with over one-half the living units and swimming pools designated for family use did not constitute an unreasonable or arbitrary age discrimination, since there was no blanket exclusion of children under the age of 16. The court found that the absence of a total exclusion and the reasonable provisions for families with children made the case fundamentally distinguishable from O'Connor v. Village Green Owners Ass'n (1983) 33 Cal. 3d 790, 191 Cal. Rptr. 320, 662 P.2d 427 (discussed in § 35.40[3][i]), and Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858 (discussed in § 35.21[3][e]) (190 Cal. App. 3d 377, 381-382) .

The court specifically refused to apply Civ. Code § 51.2, which prohibits discrimination in housing on the basis of age, because it was enacted after defendants had purchased the unit and was not necessary to resolve the case (190 Cal.

App. 3d 377, 381) .

[g] Age-Based Discounts Are Not Violation of Unruh Act

In Starkman v. Mann Theatres Corp. (1991) 227 Cal. App. 3d 1491, 278 Cal. Rptr. 543 , plaintiff, who paid full price for himself, his wife, and his two teenage children at a movie theater, brought suit against defendant theater, alleging that its policy of offering discount admission prices to children and senior citizens violated the Unruh Act. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Plaintiff appealed the subsequent judgment.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court cited Koire v. Metro Car Wash (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 24, 219 Cal. Rptr. 133, 707 P.2d 195 (discussed in § 35.44[3][b]), in which the Supreme Court found that discounts offered only to female customers on "Ladies Day" violated the Unruh Act, and quoted extensively from its discussion distinguishing between sex-based and age-based discounts. Charging different prices to children and senior citizens is sometimes permissible and socially desirable. The Court said that the public policy considerations applicable to price discounts for children or senior citizens are very different from those applicable to sex-based discounts. Some of the important and distinguishing features of aged-based discounts include the differential treatment of children by numerous state statutes, the state and federal legislation that has been enacted to address the special needs of elderly citizens, and the limited earning capacities of children and elderly persons. The court acknowledged that although women generally earn less than men, the societal remedy for that inequity has been equal employment opportunities, and ameliorative legislation. By contrast, the vast majority of children are incapable of earning as much as adults and are, in fact, prohibited from working except under strict limitations. Similarly, many elderly persons have limited incomes, and are unable to work because of health problems or forced retirement (227 Cal. App. 3d 1491, 1497-1499) . The court agreed with defendant's contentions that the pricing scheme is designed to promote the family-oriented nature of its business and that the promotional scheme benefits disadvantaged groups because seniors and children have less disposable income. Establishing different price rates for seniors and children in an amusement business does not perpetuate irrational stereotypes. Instead, the pricing classification is a recognition that without such incentives these populations may be totally excluded from enjoying some of the pleasures of our society. Moreover, unlike other classifications, all persons benefit from these discounts during their lifetimes, first as children and then as senior citizens (227 Cal. App. 3d 1491, 1499) . The court concluded that all members of society will, in the normal course of events, be members of each class entitled to the discount. This is neither arbitrary, discriminatory, nor unfair (227 Cal. App. 3d 1491, 1501) .

In Sargoy v. Resolution Trust Corp. (1992) 8 Cal. App. 4th 1039, 10 Cal. Rptr. 2d 889 , defendant savings and loan offered a PrimePlus program to persons 55 years and older, which earned a higher interest rate on deposits. When plaintiff, who was under the age of 55, was told she was not qualified for an account, she brought an action alleging violation of the Unruh Act. The court of appeal affirmed the trial court's dismissal of the action.

The Unruh Act prohibits only arbitrary, invidious, or unreasonable discrimination. Discriminatory treatment is reasonable, and nonarbitrary, when a strong public policy exists in favor of the treatment (8 Cal. App. 4th 1039, 1043) . Age-based practices that favor the elderly do not violate civil rights laws. Those practices promote the public policy of assisting the elderly (8 Cal. App. 4th 1039, 1048-1049) . The court concluded that the same policy considerations recognized in justifying senior price discounts apply to defendant's PrimePlus interest rates. No rational distinction can be drawn between senior citizen price discounts and the preferential interest rates offered to seniors. Offering higher interest rates to senior citizens does not constitute the type of arbitrary and invidious discrimination falling within the ambit of the Unruh Act (8 Cal. App. 4th 1039, 1045-1046) .

The court also recognized that should it make any other decision, every discount or preference offered senior citizens would be placed in jeopardy by eliminating the many price discounts and benefits presently given to senior citizens. That result would have a profound impact on the quality of life enjoyed by senior citizens. The fundamental purpose of the Unruh Act is the elimination of antisocial discriminatory practice--not the elimination of socially beneficial ones (8 Cal. App. 4th 1039, 1049) .

[h] Distinction Made on Basis of Marital Status Is Violation of Unruh Act

Under the Civil Rights Act of 2005, the Unruh Act was amended to specifically prohibit discrimination on the basis of marital status [Civ. Code § 51(b), (e)], as a clarification of existing law [see 2005 Stats., ch. 420, § 2(c)]. Earlier case law had held that discrimination on the basis of marital status was not a violation of the Unruh Act. For example, in Beaty v. Truck Ins. Exchange (1992) 6 Cal. App. 4th 1455, 8 Cal. Rptr. 2d 593 , plaintiffs, a homosexual couple who had lived together and shared the common necessities of life for 18 years, applied to defendant insurance company for a joint umbrella liability insurance policy. Defendant refused to issue such a policy because it was issued only to married couples, but offered them separate umbrella policies. After plaintiffs' requested ruling from the Department of Insurance was denied, plaintiffs sued for damages, and injunctive and declaratory relief under the Unruh Act. Defendant's demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and the action was dismissed. Plaintiffs appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court found that there was no discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation because defendant's refusal to issue joint umbrella policies applied to all unmarried couples, not just unmarried homosexual couples (6 Cal. App. 4th 1455, 1460-1461) . Plaintiffs argued that defendant's conduct was arbitrary discrimination based on marital status in violation of the Unruh Act. The court explained that the Act makes no mention of discrimination on the basis of marital status. Although the Act has been extended to include categories not expressly enumerated in Civ. Code § 51, no court has extended it to include marital status. Citing Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV [see § 35.20[3][c]], and its refusal to expand prohibited discrimination beyond the enumerated categories, the court declined to expand the Act to include marital status as an additional category of prohibited discrimination. There is a strong state policy favoring marriage, and that policy would not be furthered, and would actually be thwarted, by including marital status among the prohibited categories. The court concluded that it is for the Legislature, not the courts, to determine whether nonmarital relationships deserve the statutory protections afforded marriage, noting that there are scores of other statutes in which the Legislature has included marital status in anti-discrimination legislation (6 Cal. App. 4th 1455, 1462-1463) .

In Koebke v. Bernardo Heights Country Club (2005) 36 Cal. 4th 824, 31 Cal. Rptr. 3d 565, 115 P.3d 1212 , the California Supreme Court held that marital status claims are cognizable under the Unruh Act, but, for purposes of those claims, there is a distinction between domestic partners registered under the California Domestic Partner Rights and Responsibilities Act of 2003 [Fam. Code § 297 et seq.] and other unmarried couples and individuals. Registered domestic partners are the equivalent of spouses for the purposes of the Unruh Act. A business that extends benefits to spouses it denies to registered domestic partners engages in impermissible marital status discrimination. On the other hand, while the Unruh Act may protect the rights of other unmarried couples and unmarried individuals to equal access to public accommodations under some circumstances, distinctions drawn by businesses between married couples and those unmarried couples and individuals that are supported by legitimate business reasons do not constitute impermissible marital status discrimination under the Act (36 Cal. 4th 824, 836-855) .

In Koebke, the Supreme Court also extensively discussed Beaty v. Truck Ins. Exchange as the only appellate decision that had considered whether marital status discrimination was cognizable under the Unruh Act. The Court found that, unquestionably, there is a strong public policy favoring marriage and there are practical interests served by the policy favoring marriage, but concluded that the policy favoring marriage is not served by denying registered domestic partners protection from discrimination under the Unruh Act. To the contrary, permitting a business to discriminate against registered domestic partners by denying them benefits or services it extends to spouses violates the comparable public policy favoring domestic partnership. The Court in Koebke then found that in Beaty an insurer could reasonably conclude that the relationship of an unmarried couple lacked the assurance of permanence necessary to assess with confidence the risks insured against in a joint umbrella policy. However, these concerns do not apply to registered domestic partners, because registered domestic partners occupy a legal status that, like marital status, is formalized, public, and verifiable. The Court further distinguished Beaty by finding that Beaty concluded that the consequence of allowing plaintiffs to proceed with their marital status discrimination claim would be that all de facto couples would be treated as a married unit in derogation of the strong policy favoring marriage. However, allowing plaintiffs to proceed with their claim in Koebke would not have the same adverse consequence, because the ruling affected only registered domestic partners, not all unmarried couples, and the consequence of interpreting the Unruh Act to prohibit discrimination against domestic partners would have the positive effect of effectuating the Legislature's intent expressed in the Domestic Partner Act to create substantial legal equality between registered domestic partners and spouses (36 Cal. 4th 824, 843-848) .

[i] Discrimination in Office Leasing Based on Profession Not Violation of Unruh Act

In Roth v. Rhodes (1994) 25 Cal. App. 4th 530, 30 Cal. Rptr. 2d 706 , defendant refused to lease office space in its medical office building to plaintiff, a podiatrist, based on defendant's policy to lease only to medical doctors. Plaintiff sued, alleging inter alia that the refusal to rent to non-M.D.'s was arbitrary discrimination prohibited by the Unruh Act. The trial court granted summary judgment to defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed the judgment. The court discussed the cases that have held that the Unruh Act prohibits "all arbitrary discrimination by business establishments," and concluded that in fact those cases prohibit only arbitrary discrimination based on personal, as opposed to economic, characteristics (25 Cal. App. 4th 530, 539) . The court found that the Unruh Act was not intended to prohibit legitimate business decisions, such as those of an operator of a commercial building who wishes to limit tenants to specific categories. As long as discrimination based on profession is not a stratagem designed to disguise discrimination based on personal characteristics, it is not prohibited under the Unruh Act (25 Cal. App. 4th 530, 539) .

[j] Discrimination Against Nonsmokers Not Violation of Unruh Act

In King v. Hofer (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 678, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 719 , following plaintiff's complaint that defendant restaurant was allowing smoking in the bar area during restaurant hours, defendant told plaintiff that if he did not like smoke, he was not welcome in the restaurant and defendant would not serve him. In a motion for summary judgment defendant urged that plaintiff was not a member of any protected class under the Unruh Act. In opposition, plaintiff argued that he had been discriminated against based on the personal characteristic of being a nonsmoker, and sought leave to amend his complaint to clarify that he had been discriminated against as a nonsmoker. The trial court granted summary judgment and denied leave to amend (42 Cal. App. 4th 678, 683-684).

The court of appeal affirmed, finding that nonsmoking is not the type of immutable characteristic traditionally protected by the Unruh Act, and there is no authority or history which suggests that the Act was intended to address health and safety in public accommodations (42 Cal. App. 4th 678, 682) . Moreover, there could be legitimate business needs to discriminate against nonsmokers. For example, if a nonsmoking patron is in the smoking area of a restaurant and refuses to leave that area but insists on having smoke-free air, the business may have no choice but to ask the nonsmoking patron to leave (42 Cal. App. 4th 678, 682-683) .

[k] Discrimination Against Motorcyclists Wearing Indicia of Membership in Motorcycle Club Not Violation of Unruh Act

In Gatto v. County of Sonoma (2002) 98 Cal. App. 4th 744, 120 Cal. Rptr. 2d 550 , the plaintiff, who was attending a county fair wearing a vest carrying the insignia of the Hell's Angels Motorcycle Club, was asked to either remove the vest or leave the fair because he was violating the fair's dress code. The dress code states that no apparel or accessories intended to provoke, offend, or intimidate others would be tolerated, including offensive slogans, insignia, or "gang colors." After leaving, he filed suit for denial of full and free access to accommodations in violation of the Unruh Act, Civ. Code § 51. The trial court did not explicitly determine whether enforcement of the dress code deprived him of full and free access to accommodations in violation of the Unruh Act, but awarded him the minimum amount of damages then specified for violations of the statutes he invoked (98 Cal. App. 4th 744, 750-752) .

The court of appeal reversed. Relying on Hessians Motor Club v. J.C. Flanagans, described below, and finding it as applicable to a county fair as to a private drinking establishment, the court held that the county fair's enforcement of the dress code to require plaintiff to remove his vest did not violate plaintiff's right to full and equal accommodations under the Unruh Act (98 Cal. App. 4th 744, 765-769) .

In Hessians Motorcycle Club v. J.C. Flanagans (2001) 86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 552 , it was stipulated that defendant sports bar, while admitting entry to patrons wearing casual attire including "motorcycle attire," denied admittance to members of two motorcycle clubs when they refused to comply with the bar's policy requiring them to remove their "colors," i.e., the patch on a motorcycle jacket signifying membership in a particular motorcycle club, before entering. In response to plaintiffs' complaint asserting that the bar violated their rights under the Unruh Act, the bar offered the security rationale for the policy, that its management believes allowing colors to be worn would lead to fights between rival motorcycle gangs in the bar. After trial on the stipulated facts, the trial court found no Unruh Act violation.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court found that the bar's policy was not discrimination based on unconventional appearance, a classification recognized in In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 217-218, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 . Plaintiffs had conceded that motorcyclists wearing full motorcycle regalia are welcomed in the bar and management does not blink at long hair, leather, or tattoos. Since the patch signifying allegiance to a particular club was the only part of plaintiffs' outfit considered objectionable, it was not discrimination based on unconventional appearance (86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 837) . The court also refused to recognize a new classification to cover discrimination against motorcycle club members wearing colors. The court found that the "no colors" rule was a policy applicable alike to all persons regardless of race, color, sex, religion, etc., and plaintiffs were not singled out for arbitrary treatment. The court found further that the security concern represented by the policy to prevent barroom brawls is a legitimate business concern, the policy is not irrational, and the bar's perception of the wearing of colors as provocative is not unfounded. Finally, the court found that allowing a discrimination claim of this nature would lead to endless, increasingly frivolous challenges to dress codes and other neutral admission policies common in many restaurants and retail establishments (86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 837-839) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Failure to Show Prohibited Reason for Denial or Discrimination

In Pizarro v. Lamb's Players Theatre (2006) 135 Cal. App. 4th 1171, 37 Cal. Rptr. 3d 859 , a local theater company produced a musical called "Boomers." The company held a "Boomer Night" promotion on Wednesday nights, providing individuals born between 1946 and 1964 with admission at one-half the price they would otherwise pay. Plaintiffs attended the Boomers production on a Wednesday night. Two plaintiffs were minors and received the children's discount. Two plaintiffs were adults not born between 1946 and 1964 who were not given the half-price discount from the regular price admission even though it was requested. Plaintiffs sued the company, alleging violations of the Unruh Act for age discrimination. The trial court sustained the company's demurrer without leave to amend and dismissed the complaint. The Court of Appeal concluded that offering discount admission prices to "baby-boomers" to attend a musical about that generation did not involve an arbitrary class-based generalization protected by the Unruh Act. The court found that the Unruh Act applies not only when businesses exclude individuals altogether, but when treatment is unequal, and unequal treatment includes offering price discounts on an arbitrary basis to certain classes of individuals. Further, age discrimination may violate the Act if used as an arbitrary class-based generalization. However, the courts treat age classification differently from categories enumerated in the Act, and there is no general prohibition against all age-based discrimination or preferential treatment. California courts have allowed private parties to extend or withhold benefits based on age. The court then concluded that the company's offer of a theater ticket discount to a generation to attend a musical about them was permissible as reasonable and not arbitrary. The company provided the discount admission to "baby-boomers" to encourage attendance at a family-based entertainment event. Further, as a result of an age-based lack of job security and a corresponding lack of disposable income, the "baby-boomer" generation would benefit from price discounts on family-oriented pastimes, as do children and seniors. Also, providing discounted theater admissions to "baby-boomers" to attend a musical about that generation does not perpetuate any irrational stereotypes, but, instead, acts to honor a generation of individuals who contributed to the economy and participated in and contributed to meaningful civic, cultural, educational, business, and recreational activities. Finally, the discount was applicable alike to persons of every sex, color, race, etc., instead of being contingent on an arbitrary, class-based generalization (135 Cal. App. 4th 1171, 1174-1176) .

In Frantz v. Blackwell (1987) 189 Cal. App. 3d 91, 234 Cal. Rptr. 178 , a business deal between plaintiff real estate broker and defendant developer resulted in a lawsuit that was dismissed after defendant paid a settlement to plaintiff. After plaintiff's attempts to purchase a lot in defendant's subdivision were rebuffed by defendant, plaintiff sued defendant alleging discrimination violating the Unruh Act because plaintiff was a member of the class of persons who had filed suits against defendant. The trial court sustained defendant's demurrer and dismissed the action. The court of appeal affirmed, concluding that defendant's refusal to do business with plaintiff was not arbitrary discrimination. The list of prohibited discrimination in Civ. Code § 51 is illustrative rather than exhaustive, so the basis of discrimination alleged by plaintiff was not beyond the scope of the Act simply because it was not included within the Act's terms or court precedent (189 Cal. App. 3d 91, 94-95) . However, defendant's belief that plaintiff was a speculator who had previously tried to profit at his expense was not the singling out of an undefined group or making generalizations about a defined group. Defendant's exclusion was personal, directed toward a particular individual based on that individual's conduct. Reasonable regulations rationally related to the services performed are not prohibited. The Unruh Act seeks to remedy arbitrary discrimination and does not apply when the person's conduct, as opposed to his or her status, produced the discrimination (189 Cal. App. 3d 91, 95-96) .

In Cohn v. Corinthian Colleges, Inc. (2008) 169 Cal. App. 4th 523, 86 Cal. Rptr. 3d 401 , a man who attended a professional baseball game alleged that the Unruh Civil Rights Act's prohibition of gender discrimination was violated by the home team's Mother's Day celebration to honor all mothers in attendance by a tote bag giveaway for all mothers in attendance. Due to the difficult logistics of discerning which women were mothers in the heavy traffic of entry to the game, the team generalized "mothers" as females 18 years old and over. The man and two friends went to the game, requested tote bags, and were refused twice, but after his counsel sent a complaint to the team bemoaning the fact he did not receive a tote bag, the team responded by sending four tote bags, one each for the man, his counsel, and his friends. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of the team (169 Cal. App. 4th 523, 526-527). The Court of Appeal affirmed, the man's allegations against the Mother's Day tote bag giveaway were not supported by the interpretation of, or policy behind, the Act. The intended discrimination was not female versus male, but rather mothers versus the rest of the population, and the Act does require the treatment of mothers to be exactly the same as that of nonmothers. The giveaway was based on motherhood, with gender only a secondary consideration, and honored mothers as a group of individuals without promoting any irrational stereotypes, which did not violate the Act. Further, the giveaway was not a gender-based price differential in violation of the Act. Women were charged the same amount for entry as men were on the date in question. The tote bag represented a gift and did not discount the admission price. If the intent is for the item to be a gift, rather than an attempt to circumvent the ban on gender based discounts, the gift is permissible. Intent is not to be determined by the value of the gift, because even a small discount is enough to violate the Act. The tote bag was a gift to be used, and could not be converted nor considered compensatory (169 Cal. App. 4th 523, 527-530) .

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that the alleged denial or discrimination was based on enforcement of laws or regulations applicable to all persons.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Limitation on Unruh Civil Rights Act

The facts and procedural background of Beaty v. Truck Ins. Exchange (1992) 6 Cal. App. 4th 1455, 8 Cal. Rptr. 2d 593 , are discussed in § 35.21[3][h]. In Beaty, plaintiffs, a homosexual couple, unsuccessfully argued that defendant insurance company's refusal to issue them a joint umbrella liability insurance policy was a violation of the Unruh Act. Defendant only issued those policies to married couples. Citing the language of the Act regarding its construction to confer a right applicable alike to all persons, the court said that the Unruh Act was not intended to create a right of insurance access so long as the insurer's policy was applicable to all persons alike regardless of their status in one of the categories listed in Civ. Code § 51. There was no question that defendant's issuance of umbrella policies was uniform and without regard to any of those categories. Plaintiffs were not in a position to claim they had been singled out for arbitrary treatment with regard to their application for a joint umbrella policy (6 Cal. App. 4th 1455, 1463) .

[b] Law Applicable to All Persons Alike

In Marsh v. Edwards Theatres Circuit, Inc. (1976) 64 Cal. App. 3d 881, 134 Cal. Rptr. 844 , one of the issues on appeal was whether plaintiff could obtain relief under the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The court of appeal discussed the third paragraph of the Act, which provides that the Act does not confer any right or privilege on a person which is conditioned or limited by law or which is applicable alike to all persons and comparable language in Civ. Code § 54.1, which protects a disabled person's right of access to places of public accommodation. Although the court stated that plaintiff's case was governed solely by Civ. Code § 54.1 on the theory that a special statute takes precedence over a more general statute, it fully discussed the application of both laws. It determined that enforcement of fire regulations did not constitute actionable discrimination under either law. In particular, the court interpreted the third paragraph of the Unruh Civil Rights Act to create an exception where access is conditioned or limited by law applicable to all persons alike. One of the limitations to which all persons are subject is the requirement that they be able to avail themselves of public accommodations without violating fire regulations.

The phrase "blindness or other physical disability" was added to Civ. Code § 51 in 1987. That phrase was changed to "disability" in 1992 and "disability" was changed to "disability or medical condition" in 2000. Thus, to the extent Marsh holds that Civ. Code § 51 does not apply to an action brought by a person who is disabled or suffers from a medical condition as defined in Gov. Code § 12926(h) [see Civ. Code § 51(e)(2)], it is no longer correct. It is still valid, however, for its discussion of the point that the Unruh Act does not confer rights or privileges that are limited by law or applicable alike to all persons.

In Hessians Motorcycle Club v. J.C. Flanagans (2001) 86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 552 , discussed in § 35.21[3][k], the court held that the policy of a sports bar to refuse entry to those wearing "colors" or other indicia of membership in a particular motorcycle club was a policy applicable alike to all persons regardless of race, color, sex, religion, etc. The court held that the policy did not violate the Unruh Act because it was not discrimination based on unconventional appearance since the bar admitted patrons in full motorcycle regalia and only refused entry to those wearing "colors," the policy was applicable alike to all persons, the bar possessed a legitimate interest in excluding those wearing "colors," i.e., preventing rival motorcycle gangs in the bar, and because allowing a discrimination claim of this nature would lead to endless, increasingly frivolous challenges to dress codes and other neutral admission policies common in many restaurants and retail establishments (86 Cal. App. 4th 833, 837-839) .

In Turner v. Association of American Medical Colleges (2008) 167 Cal. App. 4th 1401, 85 Cal. Rptr. 3d 94 , California residents with reading-related learning disabilities or attention deficit hyperactivity disorder sued the organization responsible for administering the Medical College Admission Test (MCAT) after it denied their requests for more time or a private room in which to take the MCAT, alleging violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The Court of Appeal held that the standards for the administration of the MCAT, including a time limit for each section of the test, were neutral and extended to all applicants regardless of their membership in a particular group. The claim that the policies were discriminatory because they had a disparate impact on those with learning and reading-related disabilities, who have a more difficult time taking tests under standard conditions, could not be the basis for an Unruh Civil Rights Act claim, as disparate impact claims are not cognizable under the Unruh Act. Although under the Unruh Civil Rights Act, in addressing a claim that a facially neutral testing policy has a disparate impact on persons with learning and reading-related disabilities, accommodations are required to the extent they are required under the Americans With Disabilities Act (see Civ. Code § 51(f)), there was no allegation defendant failed to comply with the ADA in considering requests for accommodations on the MCAT, so that plaintiffs failed to establish their entitlement to relief under the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Finally, there was no allegation or evidence defendant applied its facially neutral policy in an intentionally discriminatory manner (167 Cal. App. 4th 1401, 1407-1411) .

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that plaintiff's theory is that defendant discriminated in regard to or denied a right of accommodation for an arbitrary reason, as opposed to denial or discrimination based on an individual characteristic enumerated in the act, and the complaint fails to allege facts showing that defendant's action was arbitrary because defendant's action was taken to protect public safety and welfare, including the prevention of crime on its premises.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Protection of Public Safety

The factual background of In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , is discussed in § 35.20[3][a]. Although the Supreme Court determined in Cox that the Unruh Civil Rights Act prohibits arbitrary discrimination by business establishments, the Court emphasized that this principle does not wholly prevent restrictions on patrons. It cited Orloff v. Los Angeles Turf Club (1951) 36 Cal. 2d 734, 227 P.2d 449 for the rule that a business enterprise need not tolerate customers who damage property, injure others, or otherwise disrupt the business.

In Orloff v. Los Angeles Turf Club (1951) 36 Cal. 2d 734, 227 P.2d 449 , the Supreme Court was required to determine whether an individual who had a reputation as a person of immoral character could be excluded from a race track under the predecessor of Civ. Code § 51, which provided that all citizens were entitled to the full accommodation of places of public accommodation and amusement subject only to limitation applicable alike to all citizens, and former Civ. Code § 53, which permitted the proprietor of a place of public amusement or entertainment including a race-course to deny admittance to a person of lewd or immoral character. Plaintiff, who had been ejected twice from Santa Anita Race Track and thereafter refused admittance, filed an action for injunctive relief to restrain defendant from refusing to admit him. The trial court denied his request, finding that he had a reputation as a man of immoral character, was a known undesirable, and a person guilty of conduct detrimental to racing and to the public welfare. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Although the Court held that, on the facts of the instant case, plaintiff was wrongfully excluded, the Court stated explicitly that it would be reasonable to exclude an individual for committing lewd, immoral, or other acts inimical to the public safety or welfare when applying for or after admittance to the place of accommodation. Moreover, it would be justified to take reasonable precautions to prevent opportunities for the commission of criminal activities at the race course (36 Cal. 2d 734, 740-741) .

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Failure to Show Plaintiff as Victim

The factual background of Crowell v. Isaacs (1965) 235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 45 Cal. Rptr. 566 , is discussed in § 35.20[3][b]. In that case, plaintiffs, who were white and had listed their home for sale with defendant broker, tried to base their claim for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act on defendant's alleged discrimination against persons who were black. The court of appeal held that the version of Civ. Code § 52 then in effect, which is substantially the same as the current Civ. Code § 52(a) and granted a cause of action for damages "suffered by any person denied the rights" established by former Civ. Code § 52, required actual discrimination against the claimant on one of the grounds prohibited by the Act. Plaintiff's complaint, the court noted, was subject to demurrer because it alleged nothing to show discrimination against them and, thus, they were not persons to whom the Act extended a remedy (235 Cal. App. 2d 755, 757) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Failure to Show Plaintiff as Victim

In Long v. Mountain View Cemetery Ass'n (1955) 130 Cal. App. 2d 328, 278 P.2d 945 , plaintiff, a black woman, brought an action for damages under the predecessor of the Unruh Civil Rights Act against defendant, a cemetery association, because it refused to bury her husband in a mausoleum which was set aside for the exclusive use of members of the "Caucasian race." The trial court entered judgment for the defendant, and on appeal, the court of appeal affirmed. In affirming the decision, the three judges of the court wrote three separate opinions. The presiding judge held that a cemetery was not a place of public accommodation, a view apparently repudiated by the Legislature when it enacted the Unruh Civil Rights Act [see Burks v. Poppy Constr. Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 468, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , discussed in § 35.25[3][b]]. One of the concurring opinions also held that plaintiff failed to establish a course of action because she was not denied the right to enter the cemetery which was the only service owed her. The denial of burial services was discrimination against the deceased and only living persons could claim the rights protected by former Civ. Code § 51.

[a] Use of Form

This form may be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Act by a business establishment when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that defendant is not a business establishment.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to support a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] based on the contention that defendant is not a business establishment.

The points and authorities set out in §§ 35.40 and 35.49 may be used in an appropriate case to oppose a demurrer supported by this memorandum.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Failure to Show That Defendant Is Business Establishment

In Hill v. Miller (1966) 64 Cal. 2d 757, 51 Cal. Rptr. 689, 415 P.2d 33 , plaintiff, an African-American, was the tenant of residential property owned by defendant. When defendant attempted to evict plaintiff because of his race, plaintiff filed an action for injunctive relief. Defendant demurred on the ground that plaintiff had failed to state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, and the trial court sustained defendant's demurrer without leave to amend. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed holding that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Rumford Fair Housing Act [Health & Safety Code § 35700 et seq.] which was a predecessor of the current Fair Employment and Housing Act [Gov. Code § 12900 et seq.], and the Unruh Act. The Court pointed out that the Unruh Act prohibits discrimination only when it occurs in business establishments and in this regard, plaintiff failed to allege any facts which would bring him within the provisions of the Act (64 Cal. 2d 757, 759) .

[b] Permanency and Purpose of Livelihood or Gain Is Required

In Burks v. Poppy Construction Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , plaintiffs, who were black, brought an action for damages and injunctive relief under the Unruh Act against a company which developed, built, and sold tract homes based on the company's discrimination with respect to the sale of a house. The trial court sustained a general demurrer without leave to amend, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. In determining whether or not defendant was a "business establishment" as the phrase is used in the Act, the Court stated that the term "business" embraced everything about which one can be employed and was often synonymous with a calling, occupation, or trade engaged in for the purpose of making a livelihood or gain. The Court defined "establishment" as the place where one is permanently fixed for residence or business, or a permanent force, organization, or settled position, thus emphasizing the necessity of an on-going business purpose or plan (57 Cal. 2d 463, 468) . Applying these definitions to the activities of defendant construction company, the Court concluded that it was clear that defendant operated a business establishment within the meaning of the Act.

In Abstract Inv. Co. v. Hutchinson (1962) 204 Cal. App. 2d 242, 22 Cal. Rptr. 309 , plaintiff attempted to evict defendant from his month-to-month tenancy. Defendant attempted to raise the affirmative defense that the real reason for eviction was defendant's race. The trial court refused to admit any evidence in regard to the affirmative defense and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff. The court of appeal reversed. One of the issues considered by the court was whether plaintiff's actions, if the facts alleged in the affirmative defense were true, violated the Unruh Act. The only facts reported about defendant's business activities in the decision were that it was a corporation named Abstract Investment Company and it had leased an apartment to defendant. Applying the definitions of "business establishment" contained in Burks v. Poppy Construction Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 468, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , the court concluded from the record that plaintiff's activity in renting housing accommodations was a business (204 Cal. App. 2d 242, 254) . However, it was impossible to determine without more facts whether or not plaintiff's business activities constituted a business establishment. According to the court, not all persons who rent their property to others can be held to operate business establishments and, plainly, many do not.

[c] Rental of Single Unit

The factual background of Hill v. Miller (1966) 64 Cal. 2d 757, 51 Cal. Rptr. 689, 415 P.2d 33 , is discussed in § 35.25[3][a]. In that case, the facts showed that defendant owned residential property which plaintiff occupied as tenant. The Supreme Court, in upholding the trial court's action sustaining defendant's demurrer, stated that plaintiff failed to allege facts that would bring him within the provisions of the Unruh Act for discrimination by a business establishment. In the Court's analysis, there was nothing in the record to suggest that plaintiff could successfully amend his complaint to state a cause of action under the Act (64 Cal. 2d 757, 759) .

The decision in Hill thus stands for the proposition that the rental of one residential unit does not constitute a business enterprise. Counsel should note that there is no case law specifically determining whether the sale of a single property, the rental of two units, or the acceptance of boarders in a home constitutes a business establishment, although Swann v. Burkett (1962) 209 Cal. App. 2d 685, 695, 26 Cal. Rptr. 286 (set out in § 35.25[4][a]) concluded that the rental of units in a triplex was a business establishment. It is true that under the California Fair Employment and Housing Act [Gov. Code § 12900 et seq.] (successor to the Fair Housing Law enacted in 1977), discrimination in all forms of sale or rental except renting to a single boarder in an owner-occupied house is prohibited if it is based on a protected characteristic enumerated in that law; however, the Fair Employment and Housing Act does not prohibit as many bases for discrimination as the Unruh Act does.

[d] Private Social Club Is Not Necessarily a Business Establishment

Warfield v. Peninsula Golf & Country Club (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 594, 42 Cal. Rptr. 2d 50, 896 P.2d 776 , involved a country club that had a policy of excluding women from proprietary membership. Plaintiff's husband had a proprietary family membership in the defendant club, under which plaintiff was permitted to use the club's facilities. When plaintiff and her husband dissolved their marriage, the family law court awarded the family membership to plaintiff. The defendant then terminated the membership, tendering plaintiff the "redemption value" of the family membership. Plaintiff sued defendant for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code § 51). The trial court granted defendant a directed verdict, in part on the ground that the club was not a "business establishment" within the meaning of the Act. The court of appeal affirmed.

On review, the California Supreme Court noted that in initial drafts of the bill that ultimately added the "business establishment" language to the Unruh Civil Rights Act, the bill had contained language referring specifically to "membership ... in all public or private groups, organizations [and] associations" (10 Cal. 4th 594, 608) . Plaintiff contended that the final version of the bill referring to "all business establishments of every kind whatsoever" was intended to incorporate all the entities (including private groups and associations) contained in the earlier drafts of the bill and that, therefore, private social clubs necessarily constitute business establishments within the meaning of the Act (10 Cal. 4th 594, 614) . The Court rejected this contention as unsupported by the Court's prior opinions (10 Cal. 4th 594, 614-616) and concluded that the Act does not apply to "truly private social clubs" (10 Cal. 4th 594, 618) . However, as further discussed in § 35.40[3][k], the Court held that the defendant club was a "business establishment" under the facts of this case and therefore reversed the judgment (10 Cal. 4th 594, 621-623) .

[e] Private Social Organization May Not Be Business Establishment for Purposes of Membership Decisions

In Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 670, 696-700, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 , plaintiff was a former Eagle Scout who applied to become an assistant scoutmaster and then publicly stated that he is a homosexual and expressed his commitment to communicating to others his view as to the acceptability and morality of homosexuality. Defendant maintained that plaintiff's views conflict with its official position that homosexuality is immoral and rejected the application. Plaintiff sued under the Unruh Act for an injunction prohibiting defendant from rejecting the application. The trial court held that defendant's membership decisions are covered by the Unruh Act, but that application of the Act to prohibit defendant from rejecting plaintiff would violate defendant's members' federal constitutional right of expressive association, and entered judgment for defendant. The court of appeal affirmed the trial court. The California Supreme Court reversed on the issue of the application of the Unruh Act to the Boy Scouts' membership decisions, holding that for the purposes of its membership decisions, the Boy Scouts does not fall within the category of "business establishments" as that language is used in the Unruh Civil Rights Act (17 Cal. 4th 670, 673) . In a related case, Randall v. Orange County Council, Boy Scouts of America (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 736, 744, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 453, 952 P.2d 261 , plaintiffs were twin brothers who joined the Cub Scouts and were later told that they could not participate or advance in scouting activities or be active members of the Boy Scouts because they refused to take part in religious requirements or activities, use the word "God" in the Boy Scout Pledge, worship God in song, prayer, or study, or earn religious medals or emblems. They sued under the Unruh Act for injunctive relief and damages. The trial court granted a permanent injunction against the Boy Scots, preventing it from excluding plaintiffs from membership or advancement in the organization. The court of appeal affirmed. The Supreme Court reversed based on its holding in Curran that the Boy Scouts' attributes and activities render the Unruh Act inapplicable to its membership decisions (17 Cal. 4th 736, 744) .

The Court in Curran held that the circumstance that the Boy Scouts is generally nonselective in its admission policies and affords membership to a large segment of the public is not itself sufficient to demonstrate that it reasonably could be characterized as the functional equivalent of a traditional place of public accommodation or amusement. The Court found that the Boy Scouts is an organization whose primary function is the inculcation of a specific set of values in its youth members, and its recreational facilities and activities are complementary to the organization's primary purpose (17 Cal. 4th 670, 697) . In Isbister v. Boys' Club of Santa Cruz, Inc. (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 72, 219 Cal. Rptr. 150, 707 P.2d 212 , whose procedural and background facts are discussed in § 35.40[3][j], the Court found that the Boys' Club of Santa Cruz violated the Act by refusing to admit girls. The Court found that the Boys' Club possessed the attributes of a traditional place of public amusement so that membership was equivalent to admission to a place of public amusement. The Boy Scouts, however, meet in small groups intended to foster close friendship, trust and loyalty, and scouts are required to participate in a variety of activities, ceremonies, and rituals designed to teach the moral principles to which the organization subscribes (17 Cal. 4th 670, 697-698) .

In Warfield v. Peninsula Golf & Country Club (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 594, 42 Cal. Rptr. 2d 50, 896 P.2d 776 , discussed in §§ 35.25[3][d], 35.40[3][k], the Court had found that a private golf and country club, whose primary functions providing recreational facilities and food and drink to its members in return for dues and fees, subjected it to the Unruh Act because of the business transactions regularly conducted on the club's premises with nonmembers. The Court in Curran distinguished Warfield, on the basis that the Boy Scouts is an expressive social organization whose primary function is the inculcation of values in its youth members, whose small social group structure and activities are not comparable to those of a traditional place of public accommodation or amusement, and whose business transactions with nonmembers do not involve the sale of access to the basic activities or services offered by the organization. The Court had no doubt that the Act would apply to prohibit discrimination by the Boy Scouts in business transactions with nonmembers, but its membership policies or decisions are not within the reach of the Act (17 Cal. 4th 670, 699-700) .

[f] Private Religious School Is Not Necessarily Business Establishment

In Doe v. California Lutheran High School Assn. (2009) 170 Cal. App. 4th 828, 88 Cal. Rptr. 3d 475 , two female high school students sued the private, nonprofit, religious high school they attended under the Unruh Civil Rights Act for expelling them based on their sexual orientation. The school was accredited by a secular accreditation authority and offered a college preparatory curriculum designed to meet University of California entrance requirements, including some classes mandated by the state Education Code. The school required students to pay tuition fees, and failure to pay tuition could result in suspension. The School allowed members of the public to buy tickets to its football games and other sporting events, and, at football games, sold food, beverages, T-shirts, and "spirit items." It sold advertising space in its yearbook to members of its religion and non-members alike. It held fundraising auctions and golf tournaments that were open to the public. It also rented portions of its campus, such as the gymnasium or the football field, to outside organizations for their events. The school had a policy of refusing admission to homosexual students based on its religious values. It had a "Christian Conduct" rule providing that a student could be expelled for engaging in immoral or scandalous conduct on or off campus, including homosexual conduct. The enrollment application, which was supposed to be signed by both the student and a parent, provided that by signing the application, student and parent acknowledged their understanding that admission to the school placed the student under the policies and regulations of the school and obliged student and parent to accept and to cooperate with those policies and regulations." A student at the school reported to a teacher that one unnamed female student said that she loved another unnamed female student. The teacher discovered the identities of the students. The principal of the school called a meeting of the School's disciplinary committee, and the committee agreed that the principal should talk to the students immediately and if the report was true, they should be suspended. According to the principal, both girls admitted they loved each other, they had hugged and kissed each other, and they had told other students that they were lesbians. He therefore suspended them and had their parents come pick them up. Throughout this time, the students were not free to leave, but while they were waiting for their parents to pick them up, they were allowed to go to the restroom and to their lockers. The principal then sent the students' parents letters stating that they had been suspended because they had a bond of intimacy characteristic of a lesbian relationship, in violation of the "Christian Conduct" rule, and, by a unanimous vote of the school's board of directors, the school expelled them for engaging in a homosexual relationship. Because of religious beliefs, only men served on the board of directors, which was responsible for expulsions. The students alleged that, as a result, female students were disciplined more harshly than male students, and their evidence showed that some male students had been involved in incidents of drug or alcohol possession or use that had resulted in, at most, temporary suspensions (170 Cal. App. 4th 828, 831-833) .

The Court of Appeal held that the school was not a business establishment under the Unruh Act for these purposes. As a private nonprofit religious school, the school had as its overall purpose and function the education of children in keeping with its religious beliefs. The inculcation of a specific set of values, with programs designed to teach the moral principles to which the school subscribed, prevented the school from being considered a business establishment whose student admission practices would be subject to the Act. According to its mission statement, as set forth in its student handbook, the school existed "to glorify God by using his inerrant Word to nurture discipleship in Christ, ... equipping them for a lifetime of service to their Savior, their homes, churches, vocations and communities." Further, admission to the School, unlike membership in the Boy Scouts (see Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts, discussed at [e], above), was effectively selective and based on those values. The fact that the school was nonprofit was not controlling, but that did mean that it could not be deemed a business unless it had some significant resemblance to an ordinary for-profit business. The school's non-member transactions with the public did not involve the sale of access to the basic activities or services offered by the school. The allegations of the complaint that the students were expelled because of their sexual orientation went to the very heart of the reason for the existence of the school. Thus, the school could be a business and prohibited from discriminating with respect to its nonmember transactions, yet not be a business and not be prohibited from discriminating, with respect to decisions regarding the suspension or expulsion of students based on violations of the "Christian Conduct" rule. Further, the fact that the school charged students for its educational services did not bring those decisions within the purview of the Unruh Act, because an otherwise private organization can engage in some business transactions with members without the risk of becoming a business enterprise for purposes of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Merely selling a service to like-minded persons for money is not enough to make a nonprofit organization a "business establishment." The fact that the school taught not only religious subjects, but also such garden-variety secular subjects as English, history, mathematics, and physical education also did not bring it within the Act, since the school's religious message was inextricably intertwined with its secular functions. Thus, the school established, beyond a triable issue of fact, that it was not a business establishment within the meaning of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (170 Cal. App. 4th 828, 835-841) .

[g] Organization Is Not Deemed Business Establishment When to Do So Would Infringe on Members' First Amendment Rights

In Hart v. Cult Awareness Network (1993) 13 Cal. App. 4th 777, 16 Cal. Rptr. 2d 705 , after plaintiff, a member of the Church of Scientology, was denied membership in defendant, an organization devoted to informing the public about the harmful effects of mind control and the unethical practices employed by cults, he filed an action for damages and preliminary and permanent injunctive relief alleging that defendant's actions constituted religious discrimination in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. When the trial court denied the application for preliminary injunction, plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed. The court explained that although the term "business establishment" is construed in the broadest sense reasonably possible, and an organization is not excluded from the scope of the Unruh Civil Rights Act simply because it is nonprofit, Civ. Code § 51 does not govern organizations that are truly private (13 Cal. App. 4th 777, 786) . Defendant claimed that it was a private organization, and that defining it as a business establishment would constitute an infringement of its members' rights of freedom of association. It said that admitting members of a group like Scientology, which fits the category of a cult would lead to defendant's destruction. The court examined the effect of applying the Unruh Act to defendant and its members' constitutionally protected freedom of association, concluding that such an application would constitute an infringement (13 Cal. App. 4th 777, 787-792) . (A thorough discussion of this analysis is contained in Ch. 22, Associations and Clubs.) The court then explained that its duty to construe the term "business establishment" in the broadest sense reasonably possible includes the duty to avoid constitutional infirmity. Accordingly, the court held that defendant is not a business establishment within the meaning of the Unruh Act (13 Cal. App. 4th 777, 792-793) .

[h] Unruh Act Does Not Apply to Legislative Action by Governmental Entities

In Burnett v. San Francisco Police Department (1995) 36 Cal. App. 4th 1177, 42 Cal. Rptr. 2d 879 , plaintiffs, who consisted of a group of adults over the age of 18 and under the age of 21 as well as several cabaret owners, brought an action against a city and its police department, challenging their power to enforce a city ordinance that precluded persons under the age of 21 from entering a cabaret. A "cabaret" was defined under the ordinance as an establishment open between the hours of 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. that either serves food or beverages for consumption on the premises or provides entertainment on the premises. The trial court entered judgment for the defendants, and the court of appeal affirmed.

Plaintiffs argued, among other things, that the ordinance violated the Unruh Civil Rights Act because it unlawfully discriminated on the basis of age and that it caused businesses to unlawfully discriminate on the basis of age. In rejecting this argument, the court of appeal noted that, by its plain language, the Act bars discrimination on various bases by business establishments. The court held that there was nothing in the Act that precludes legislative bodies from enacting ordinances that make age distinctions among adults (36 Cal. App. 4th 1177, 1191-1192) . The court further noted that the ordinance did not force the plaintiff cabaret owners to violate the Unruh Act because the Act did not "confer any right or privilege ... which is conditioned or limited by law." Thus, the Act did not hold the plaintiff cabaret owners accountable for following the dictates of the ordinance (36 Cal. App. 4th 1177, 1192) .

[a] Rental of Single Unit

In Swann v. Burkett (1962) 209 Cal. App. 2d 685, 26 Cal. Rptr. 286 , plaintiffs brought suit under the Unruh Civil Rights Act to recover damages for defendant's failure to rent to plaintiffs units in a triplex, which they owned, but in which they did not reside. The trial court granted defendants' motion for a nonsuit on the ground that the activities of defendants in connection with the triplex did not constitute a "business establishment." On appeal, the court of appeal limited the issue to consideration of whether rental of a triplex is a business establishment. The court pointed out that the rental by an owner of small rental units was not regulated by the predecessor of the Unruh Act and did not appear to constitute operation of a business establishment. If the Legislature had intended such a radical change in the law, it should have shown its intention clearly. Nevertheless, noting that the Supreme Court defined "business establishment" in Burks v. Poppy Construction Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , to include engaging in a permanent settled position for gain, the court found that defendants' behavior came within the terms of this definition, particularly since defendants also rented two other properties (209 Cal. App. 2d 685, 695) .

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that the statute of limitations for the claim has run.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case, such as when the alleged act constituting the violation of the Unruh Act occurred and when the complaint was filed, and the points of law stated.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to support a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] based on the contention that the limitations period for a claim under the Unruh Civil Rights Act has run. This memorandum of points and authorities may also be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of Civ. Code § 52.1 or 51.9 when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that the statute of limitations for the claim has run.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Limitations Period for Claim Under Unruh Act Is Two Years

In Gatto v. County of Sonoma (2002) 98 Cal. App. 4th 744, 120 Cal. Rptr. 2d 550 , discussed in § 35.21[3][k], the court of appeal agreed with the court in West Shield, discussed below, that the limitations period for claims under Civ. Code §§ 51, 52.1 was one year (now two years under Code Civ. Proc. § 335.1, effective January 1, 2003). However, the court found that there is a problem created by a lack of clarity as to which provisions of the Civil Code actually comprise the Unruh Act and the Legislature's failure to specify the statute or statutes of limitations applicable to the provisions of the Civil Code commonly thought to be components of the Unruh Act (98 Cal. App. 4th 744, 754-760) .

In West Shield Investigations & Sec. Consultants v. Superior Court (2000) 82 Cal. App. 4th 935, 953, 98 Cal. Rptr. 2d 612 , a minor sued a wilderness program company in New Mexico with whom her parents contracted for a six-week wilderness expedition for her, a security company retained by her parents to transport her to the wilderness program, and several individual defendants, including the owner and employees of the wilderness program, the president, and employees of the security company. After attending the expedition and returning to California, the minor, who was then 17 years old, was emancipated from her parents by court order on May 8, 1995. She turned 18 on September 8, 1995. She filed her complaint on September 9, 1996, and a first amended complaint on September 4, 1997. She alleged 11 causes of action against all defendants, including, inter alia, interference with civil rights under Civ. Code § 52.1 and sexual harassment under Civ. Code § 51.9. The defendants filed motions for summary adjudication on the civil rights claims on the ground that they were barred by the affirmative defense of the one-year statute of limitations for personal injury claims set forth in former Code Civ. Proc. § 340(3) and the one-year statute of limitations was not tolled until plaintiff's majority in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 352, but instead began to run when plaintiff was emancipated by court order on May 8, 1995. The trial court denied the motion. The defendants filed writ petitions seeking extraordinary relief.

The court of appeal issued a writ of mandate directing the trial court to vacate its denial of summary adjudication for defendants on the minor's civil rights causes of action and to enter a new order granting summary adjudication. The court held that the applicable limitations period was the former Code Civ. Proc. § 340(3) one-year statute of limitations for personal injury actions, citing Mitchell v. Sung (N.D. Cal. 1993) 816 F. Supp. 597 . The court noted that three federal courts have held that the statute of limitations for Unruh Act claims is the three year period for actions based on statutory liability provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 338(a), citing Olympic Club v. Underwriters at Lloyd's London (9th Cir. 1993) 991 F.2d 497, 501 (dicta), Kramer v. Regents of the University of California (N.D. Cal. 1999) 81 F. Supp. 2d 972, 977 (district court without analysis followed Olympic Club and Independent Housing Services in stating applicable statute of limitations for Unruh Act claims is three-year limitations period for state statutory claims), and Independent Housing Services v. Fillmore Center Associates (N.D. Cal. 1993) 840 F. Supp. 1328, 1359 . However, the court agreed with the district court in Mitchell v. Sung, that the one-year statute of limitations was applicable because the Unruh Act did not create a new form of liability, but rather, liability for violation of civil rights is derived from common law [Warfield v. Peninsula Golf & Country Club (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 594, 607, 42 Cal. Rptr. 2d 50, 896 P.2d 776 (indicating that common law contains the roots of the Unruh Act)]. Because the Unruh Act as set forth at Civ. Code § 51 et seq. constitutes a refinement and codification of existing common law liability for violation of civil rights, the applicable statute of limitations for Unruh Act claims was former Code Civ. Proc. § 340(3), the one-year limitations period for personal injury actions, rather than Code Civ. Proc. § 338(a), the three-year limitations period for liability created on a statute. The court found its conclusion consistent with the statutory language of former Code Civ. Proc. § 340(3), which provided that the one-year limitations period applies to actions for injury caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, and with rulings in the context of analogous federal civil rights law as set forth in 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (82 Cal. App. 4th 935, 953) . The court then held that application of the one-year statute of limitations to the civil rights causes of action resulted in both causes of action being time-barred as a matter of law, since the complaint was not filed within the one year period following her emancipation (82 Cal. App. 4th 935, 953-954) .

NOTE:

Effective January 1, 2003, the Legislature amended Code Civ. Proc. § 340 and added Code Civ. Proc. § 335.1 to make the statute of limitations in a personal injury action two years.

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum may be submitted in support of a general demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it appears on the face of the complaint, or from a matter of which the court is required to or may take judicial notice, that plaintiff lacks standing to sue for alleged violations of the Unruh Civil Rights Act because plaintiff did not tender to defendant the purchase price of defendant's services or products.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to support a motion for summary judgment [*see Code Civ. [3] Discussion of Authorities

In Surrey v. TrueBeginnings, LLC (2008) 168 Cal. App. 4th 414, 85 Cal. Rptr. 3d 443 , defendant operated an online matchmaking service, which had a disproportionately high percentage of male patrons, which defendant sought to rectify by offering free services to women who joined. Plaintiff, a male, visited the Web site with the intent of utilizing its services, but after discovering the discrepancy in its charges, he did not subscribe to or pay for its services. He then filed an action alleging that defendant's differential pricing for its services violated the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Defendant moved for summary judgment on various grounds, including that plaintiff was not entitled to sue because he was never "denied" the rights protected under the Act. The trial court granted defendant's summary judgment motion on the ground that plaintiff lacked standing to sue under the Unruh Civil Rights Act because he had never requested or paid for defendant's services (168 Cal. App. 4th 414, 416-417) .

The Court of Appeal affirmed. The language of Civil Code § 52(a) bestows standing to sue only on those persons whose rights under the Unruh Civil Rights Act have been "denied." The mere fact that plaintiff became aware defendant was offering a discount policy for women subscribers at the time he accessed its Web site did not constitute a denial of his antidiscrimination rights under the Act. Since he did not attempt to subscribe to defendant's services, his interest in preventing discrimination was arguably no greater than the interest of the public at large (168 Cal. App. 4th 414, 417-420) .

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act by a business establishment when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it fails to allege facts showing that defendant is a business establishment. The grounds for opposing the demurrer are that sufficient facts are alleged to show that defendant carries on an enterprise with some degree of permanence or continuity for the purposes of livelihood or gain. The Optional Paragraphs may be used as appropriate, depending on the facts of the case.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related points and authorities for use in opposing a demurrer on the ground that the complaint fails to allege facts showing that defendant is a business establishment are set out in § 35.49.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in § 35.25.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to oppose a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] based on the contention that defendant is not a business establishment.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Liberal Construction as Necessary

In Winchell v. English (1976) 62 Cal. App. 3d 125, 133 Cal. Rptr. 20 , plaintiff brought an action under the Unruh Act against defendants who operated a mobile home court on the theory that defendants gave permission to plaintiffs to sublet to others and then discriminated against them because plaintiffs let space to, and associated with, persons of the black race. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint with leave to amend and, after plaintiffs failed to amend, dismissed the complaint. On appeal, the court of appeal reversed. The court determined that the only issue in the case was whether or not discrimination by a business establishment against persons on account of their association with others of the black race was actionable under the Act. The court treated the issue as one of statutory interpretation, which in the case of the Unruh Civil Rights Act requires a liberal, and not a strict, construction with a view to effect the object of the Act and to promote justice (62 Cal. App. 3d 125, 128) .

[b] Permanent Activities Carried Out for Livelihood or Gain as Business Establishment

The factual background of Burks v. Poppy Construction Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , is discussed in § 35.25[3][b]. In that decision, the Supreme Court was required to determine whether or not a company engaged in the business of developing, building, and selling a tract of housing accommodations was a business establishment as that term is used in the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The Court noted that because the Legislature added the words "all" and "of every kind whatsoever" to describe business establishments in the Act without any exception and without specification of particular kinds of enterprises, there was no doubt that the term was used in the broadest sense reasonably possible (57 Cal. 2d 463, 468) . This conclusion was buttressed in the Court's view by the fact that the original version of the bill presented to the Legislature referred to specific types of enterprises but that these specific references were deleted in the final version, suggesting that the Legislature conceived these specific references to be mere surplusage which were unnecessary in view of the broad language of the Act as finally passed (57 Cal. 2d 463, 469) . The Court pointed out that the word "business" embraces everything about which one can be employed and is often synonymous with activities engaged in for the purpose of making a livelihood or gain (57 Cal. 2d 463, 468) . The word "establishment," when used broadly, includes such meanings as a fixed location, permanent commercial force or organization, or permanent settled position as in life or business (57 Cal. 2d 463, 468-469) . Counsel will note that other than the decision in Abstract Inv. Co. v. Hutchinson (1962) 204 Cal. App. 2d 242, 255, 22 Cal. Rptr. 309 (set out in § 35.25[3][b]), which ruled that a mere showing of some economic activity is not sufficient to establish a business enterprise, there are no explicit limitations on the types of economic endeavors to which the term may be applied. In particular, Burks does not purport to limit the definition of the term "enterprise"; the decision only provides examples of what the term, when broadly defined, includes.

In Rotary Club of Duarte v. Board of Directors (1986) 178 Cal. App. 3d 1035, 224 Cal. Rptr. 213 , defendant, board of directors of an international organization, revoked the charter of plaintiff, a local chapter, because plaintiff had admitted women as members. Plaintiff and two of the women admitted as members brought an action for injunctive and declaratory relief. The trial court granted judgment for defendant, finding that neither defendant nor plaintiff organization was a "business establishment" that provided "goods, services, and facilities" to members within the meaning of the Unruh Act. Plaintiff appealed.

The court of appeal reversed after a thorough analysis of the Unruh Act and the many reasons why defendant was within its scope. The court noted that the Unruh Act is liberally construed with a view to effectuating the purposes for which it was enacted and to promote justice; it is a declaration of the state's public policy mandate and objective that men and women be treated equally (178 Cal. App. 3d 1035, 1046-1047) . Citing O'Connor v. Village Green Owners Ass'n (1983) 33 Cal. 3d 790, 191 Cal. Rptr. 320, 662 P.2d 427 , and its discussion of earlier cases, the court said that the words "all" and "of every kind whatsoever" indicate without doubt that the phrase "business establishments" was used in the broadest sense reasonably possible. "Business" embraces everything about which one can be employed and is synonymous with calling, occupation, or trade, engaged in for the purpose of making a livelihood or gain. "Establishment" includes not only a fixed location, such as the place where one is permanently fixed for residence or business, but also a permanent commercial force or organization of a permanent settled position (178 Cal. App. 3d 1035, 1048) . The court concluded that defendant was covered by the Unruh Act, even though it is a nonprofit organization, due to the business-like attributes of its organizational structure, financial concerns, commercial interest in form of organizational emblem royalties, probable commercial and business benefits as motivation for membership, and the limitation of membership to business and professional leaders (178 Cal. App. 3d 1035, 1051-1058) .

[c] Business Conducted at Specified Location as Business Establishment

In Lee v. O'Hara (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 476, 20 Cal. Rptr. 617, 370 P.2d 321 , plaintiff, a black man, filed a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act against defendants who were licensed real estate brokers. The complaint alleged that defendants had been retained to rent certain described premises to any member of the public ready, willing, and able to rent the premises on the terms offered, but that defendants refused to rent to plaintiff solely because of his race. The trial court sustained a general demurrer without leave to amend, and plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed. On appeal, defendant real estate brokers contended that even though the Unruh Civil Rights Act applies to real estate transactions, it does not apply to real estate brokers acting as such. To rebut this contention, the Court noted that Bus. & Prof. Code § 10162 required licensed real estate brokers to maintain a definite location as an office for the transaction of business. The Court held that the office which a real estate broker is required to maintain at a specified location and from which business must be transacted is a business establishment within the meaning of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (57 Cal. 2d 476, 478) .

[d] Professional Services as Business Establishment

In Washington v. Blampin (1964) 226 Cal. App. 2d 604, 38 Cal. Rptr. 235 , plaintiffs brought an action under the Unruh Civil Rights Act to recover damages from defendant physician who allegedly refused to furnish them with medical services solely because of their race. The municipal court granted defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings on the ground that the Unruh Civil Rights Act does not apply to the services of physicians. Plaintiffs appealed to the appellate department of the superior court which reversed and certified the case to the court of appeal. The court of appeal reversed the Action of the municipal court. The court noted that prior cases in different areas of law had referred to the practice of medicine as a business, that the Supreme Court in Burks v. Poppy Construction Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 468-469, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , had defined "business" for Unruh Civil Rights Act purposes as an activity engaged in for the purpose of making a livelihood, and that although the Legislature deleted the term "professional services" from the original version of the Unruh Civil Rights Act bill, this deletion indicates that the Legislature considered the specific reference to be mere surplusage. The court concluded that these factors point inevitably to the conclusion that the phrase "business establishments of every kind whatsoever" was intended to embrace professional services (226 Cal. App. 2d 604, 606-608) .

[e] Developing, Building, or Selling Housing Accommodations as Business Establishment

The factual background of Burks v. Poppy Construction Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , is discussed in § 35.25[3][b]. In that case, the Supreme Court held that it was clear that defendants who were in the business of developing, building, and selling a tract of homes operated a "business establishment" as that term is used in the Unruh Civil Rights Act, even though the Legislature, at the time that it passed the Unruh Civil Rights Act, also enacted the Hawkins Act, which was a predecessor of the California Fair Employment and Housing Act [Gov. Code § 12900 et seq.] and which also prohibited discrimination in housing (57 Cal. 2d 463, 469) .

[f] Physician as Business Establishment

Washington v. Blampin (1964) 226 Cal. App. 2d 604, 38 Cal. Rptr. 235 , is discussed in § 35.40[3][d].

Lee v. O'Hara (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 476, 20 Cal. Rptr. 617, 370 P.2d 321 , is discussed in § 35.40[3][c].

[h] Rental of Two Housing Accommodations as Business Establishment

The factual background of Swann v. Burkett (1962) 209 Cal. App. 2d 685, 26 Cal. Rptr. 286 , is discussed in § 35.25[4][a]. In that case, the court of appeal had to decide whether the rental of a triplex by its owner is a "business establishment" as that term is used in the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The court defined the rental of a triplex as the rental of three, or if the building is owner-occupied, two units in a structure consisting of three units or flats, complete in themselves, and rented separately. It pointed out that the rental of these units by their owner did not obviously constitute the operation of a "business establishment" and that such activity was clearly distinguishable from the Activities of developing, building, and selling a tract of houses or acting as a real estate broker who sells real property, which had been held to be business establishments in earlier cases. Nevertheless, as the court pointed out, Burks v. Poppy Construction Co. (1962) 57 Cal. 2d 463, 468-469, 20 Cal. Rptr. 609, 370 P.2d 313 , clearly defined a business establishment as engaging in a permanent, settled position for gain and this definition definitely applied to the owner of the triplex (209 Cal. App. 2d 685, 695) .

[i] Condominium Association as Business Establishment

In O'Connor v. Village Green Owners Ass'n (1983) 33 Cal. 3d 790, 191 Cal. Rptr. 320, 662 P.2d 427 , plaintiffs lived in a condominium development that excluded children by means of an age restriction in the covenants, conditions, and restrictions of the owners' association. After the birth of their son, the association notified plaintiffs that their child's presence violated that restriction. Plaintiffs sought to have the age restriction declared invalid and enjoined from enforcement because it violated the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51]. The association filed a general demurrer, which the trial court granted without leave to amend. The action was dismissed, and plaintiffs appealed. The association then sought and obtained a preliminary injunction against plaintiffs, from which plaintiffs appealed.

The Supreme Court reversed the consolidated appeals. The Court cited Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 736-740, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858 (discussed in § 35.21[3][e]), in holding that arbitrary discrimination against children violates the Unruh Civil Rights Act (33 Cal. 3d 790, 793-794) . The only question left for the Court to decide was whether or not that discriminatory policy was being invoked by a "business establishment," as required by the Act. The Court found that the legislative intent and statutory language of the Unruh Civil Rights Act indicated that the scope of what constitutes a business establishment is broad. The condominium association had sufficient businesslike attributes to fall within the scope of the Act's reference to "business establishments of every kind whatsoever" (33 Cal. 3d 790, 795-796) . The fact that the association was nonprofit did not take it out of the coverage of the Act because nothing in the language or history of the Act calls for excluding nonprofit organizations (33 Cal. 3d 790, 795-796) .

[j] Public, Nonexclusive Club or Organization as Business Establishment

In Isbister v. Boys' Club of Santa Cruz, Inc. (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 72, 219 Cal. Rptr. 150, 707 P.2d 212 , defendant was a private nonprofit corporation that owned and operated a facility offering a variety of recreational activities to its members. Membership was open to all male children in the area on payment of a small annual membership fee. After plaintiff girls were denied membership in defendant and access to its facilities solely on the basis of their sex, they brought an action for injunctive and declaratory relief under the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code § 51). The trial court permanently enjoined defendant from denying membership or access to its facilities to girls. Defendant appealed.

The Supreme Court affirmed. In response to defendant's contention that it was not a "business establishment" covered by the Unruh Act, the Court thoroughly analyzed the history and legislative intent of the Act. The Court cited use of the emphatic words "all" and "of every kind whatsoever," as indicative of the Legislature's intent that the phrase "business establishment" be interpreted in the broadest sense reasonably possible (40 Cal. 3d 72, 78) . It went on to note that "business establishment" included private and public groups or organizations as well as places of public accommodation or amusement (40 Cal. 3d 72, 78-79) . The Court found that defendant was a place of public accommodation or amusement. Defendant was classically public in its operation by opening its doors to the entire young male population in the area without any attempt to select or restrict membership or access on the basis of personal, cultural, or religious affinity, as a private club might. Relations with and among its members were of a kind that take place more or less in public view (40 Cal. 3d 72, 81) . Because defendant was a place of public accommodation or amusement the fact that its purposes and operations were not strictly commercial do not bar a conclusion that it was a "business establishment" to which the Act applies (40 Cal. 3d 72, 83) . The Court also responded to defendant's contention that forcing female participation in its activities would interfere with its current members' rights of association guaranteed by both the federal and state constitutions. Noting that defendant professed to focus on the particular needs of male youth, the Court said that defendant never suggested that it substantially engaged in protected "intimate" or "expressive" views, and that in light of California's special constitutional sensitivity to sexual discrimination, there was no basis to hold that a statutory requirement of equal access to the recreational facilities of a public, nonselective, nonexpressive community service organization offends defendant's rights (40 Cal. 3d 72, 84-86) . In its conclusion the Court included a caveat that its finding was based on the particular circumstances surrounding defendant and that nothing necessarily requires a similar result in case of other single-sex youth organizations (40 Cal. 3d 72, 91) .

However, in Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 670, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 , and in Randall v. Orange County Council, Boy Scouts of America (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 736, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 453, 952 P.2d 261 , whose facts and procedural background are discussed in § 35.25[3][e], the California Supreme Court held that the Unruh Act does not apply to membership decisions of the Boy Scouts of America (17 Cal. 4th 670, 696-700) . The Court distinguished these cases from Isbister on the ground that while the Boys' Club possessed the attributes of a traditional place of public amusement so that membership was equivalent to admission to a place of public amusement, the Boy Scouts meet in small groups intended to foster close friendship, trust and loyalty, and scouts are required to participate in a variety of activities, ceremonies, and rituals designed to teach the moral principles to which the organization subscribes (17 Cal. 4th 670, 697-698) .

[k] Effect of Private Club's Regular Business Transactions With Nonmembers

The facts and procedural background of Warfield v. Peninsula Golf & Country Club (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 594, 42 Cal. Rptr. 2d 50, 896 P.2d 776 , are discussed in § 35.25[3][d]. The plaintiff in that case was challenging the defendant country club's practice of excluding all females from proprietary membership in the club. Although rejecting plaintiff's contention that all private social clubs necessarily constitute business establishments within the meaning of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (10 Cal. 4th 594, 614-618) , the Supreme Court held that the defendant country club was a "business establishment" under the facts of this case and therefore reversed the judgment against plaintiff.

The Court observed that although a major part of the club's operations were financed by fees, dues, and charges paid by club members, the club also obtained direct and indirect financial benefits from regular business transactions with nonmembers. First, the club regularly permitted (on the average of once a week) nonmembers to use its facilities for a fee in connection with sponsored events. In carrying on such activities for a fee, the club operated as the functional equivalent of a commercial caterer or recreational resort and thus competed with those types of business entities (10 Cal. 4th 594, 621) . Second, the club obtained income on a regular basis from fees charged for the use of its facilities, and the purchase of food and beverages on its premises, by nonmember "invited guests" (10 Cal. 4th 594, 621-622) . Finally, the record showed that the club received a significant, albeit indirect, financial benefit from the regular business transactions with nonmembers conducted at the club's golf and tennis pro shops located on the premises. Although the club did not receive a share of the income obtained from the pros' sale of goods and services to members or nonmembers, the existence of these "satellite" public commercial enterprises on the club's premises enabled the club to place golf and tennis professionals on the premises, identified as the club's own professionals and readily available to club members, at a monthly retainer that was much lower than the club would have to pay in the absence of such public commercial enterprises. The court stated that under the circumstances, the golf and tennis pro shops, and the related services they provided, realistically must be viewed as an integral part of the club's overall operations (10 Cal. 4th 594, 622) . The Court held that the business transactions that were regularly conducted on the club's premises with persons who were not members were sufficient in themselves to bring the club within the reah of Civ. Code § 51's broad reference to "all business establishments of every kind whatsoever" (10 Cal. 4th 594, 621, 622-623) .

However, in Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 670, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 , and in Randall v. Orange County Council, Boy Scouts of America (1998) 17 Cal. 4th 736, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 453, 952 P.2d 261 , whose facts and procedural background are discussed in § 35.25[3][e], in holding that the Unruh Act does not apply to membership decisions of the Boy Scouts of America, the California Supreme Court distinguished Warfield, on the basis that the Boy Scouts is an expressive social organization whose primary function is the inculcation of values in its youth members, whose small social group structure and activities are not comparable to those of a traditional place of public accommodation or amusement, and whose business transactions with nonmembers do not involve the sale of access to the basic activities or services offered by the organization. The Court had no doubt (and the Boy Scouts' counsel conceded) that the Act would apply to prohibit discrimination by the Boy Scouts in business transactions with nonmembers (17 Cal. 4th 670, 699-700) .

In Pines v. Tomson (1984) 160 Cal. App. 3d 370, 206 Cal. Rptr. 866 , defendant published a business telephone directory containing advertisements for commercial goods and services, with religious adages and symbols on the pages. It only accepted advertisements placed by a person who affirmed orally and in writing that he or she was a born-again Christian. Included in each directory was an explanation of the purpose of the directory, which was to strengthen and unify the Christian community. Plaintiffs, owners of a ceramic tile business, were Jewish and could not and would not sign or recite the required oath. After they were not allowed to place their advertisements in the directory, plaintiffs brought an action charging religious discrimination. The trial court judgment was for plaintiff and granted them injunctive and monetary relief. Defendant appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed, but reversed a portion of the injunction that restrained statements of editorial opinion prior to publication as a violation of the free speech guarantee. The court found that the publication and distribution of the directory were acts of discriminatory business conduct on the basis of religion and were acts that aid or incite discriminatory business conduct on the basis of religion. Defendants argued that because they did not operate a business establishment their activities were not proscribed by the Unruh Act. They claimed that the directory was published under the formal aegis of a nonprofit religious corporation and their belief that their work was a ministry. The court disagreed, explaining that the term "business establishment" was used in the broadest sense reasonably possible. Business embraces everything about which one can be employed and is synonymous with a calling, occupation, or trade engaged in for the purpose of making a livelihood or gain. Establishment includes not only a fixed location such as the place where one is permanently fixed for residence or business, but also a permanent commercial force or organization or a permanent settled position. The court concluded that the Unruh Act covers even nonprofit organizations, and noncommercial as well as commercial entities. It includes all commercial and noncommercial entities open to and serving the general public. Defendants argued that they were a nonprofit organization and that their activities in connection with the directory were noncommercial. The court disagreed, explaining that the directory fit both the commercial and noncommercial aspects of the meaning of business establishment (160 Cal. App. 3d 370, 383-386) .

[m] Insurance Company Is Business Establishment

The facts and procedural background of Goldman v. Standard Ins. Co. (9th Cir. 2003) 341 F.3d 1023 , are discussed in § 35.53[3][b]. In Goldman, the plaintiff challenged an insurance company's refusal to issue her a disability income policy based on her diagnosis of and treatment for adjustment disorder with anxiety and depressed mood and the company's underwriting policy to deny coverage for applicants with adjustment disorder until at least one year after the cessation of treatment (341 F.3d 1023, 1025) . The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the Unruh Act applies to insurance companies (citing Ins. Code § 1861.03(a)), and an insurance company's refusal to provide coverage on the basis of disability may constitute a denial of full and equal services under the Unruh Act if the discrimination is not reasonable (341 F.3d 1023, 1027) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Liberal Construction as Necessary

The facts and procedural background of Jackson v. Superior Court (1994) 30 Cal. App. 4th 936, 36 Cal. Rptr. 2d 207 , are discussed in § 35.42[3][a]. In holding that plaintiff had stated a cause of action for violation of the Unruh Act, the court noted that the Act is to be given a liberal construction with a view to effectuating its purposes (30 Cal. App. 4th 936, 940) .

[Caption. See § 35.40.]

THE DEMURRER SHOULD BE OVERRULED BECAUSE PLAINTIFF'S COMPLAINT FOR VIOLATION OF THE UNRUH CIVIL RIGHTS ACT SATISFIES THE REQUIREMENTS FOR PLEADING THAT DEFENDANT ARBITRARILY DISCRIMINATED IN REGARD TO OR ARBITRARILY DENIED RIGHTS OF ACCOMMODATION ESTABLISHED BY THE ACT BY ALLEGING FACTS THAT SHOW A DENIAL OR DISCRIMINATION THAT IS ARBITRARY IN THE SENSE THAT ITS RATIONAL RELATIONSHIP TO THE SERVICES PERFORMED AND FACILITIES PROVIDED CANNOT BE JUDGED AS A MATTER OF LAW WITHOUT ADDITIONAL FACTS.

A. Liberal Construction as Necessary. [See § 35.40, Paragraph A.]

B. Deportment Regulations as Lacking Rational Relationship. Although a business establishment may promulgate reasonable deportment regulations to protect the premises from improper and disruptive conduct, the regulations may constitute arbitrary discrimination against potential customers if the regulations are not rationally related to the services performed or the facilities provided (In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 217, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992).

C. Additional Facts Necessary to Determine Whether Denial or Discrimination Reasonable. A complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act sufficiently pleads that defendant arbitrarily discriminated in regard to or arbitrarily denied rights of accommodation if it alleges facts that show a denial or discrimination that is arbitrary in the sense that its rational relationship to the services performed and the facilities provided cannot be judged as a matter of law without additional facts, which cannot be determined on demurrer (Hales v. Ojai Valley Inn & Country Club (1977) 73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 28-29, 140 Cal. Rptr. 555).

[a] Use of Form

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51]. It opposes a demurrer that asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it does not allege facts to show that defendant's denial or discrimination was arbitrary. It may be used when plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to establish a basis for a finding of arbitrary discrimination so that the issue of reasonableness of defendant's action cannot be resolved without further determination of the facts.

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in opposing a demurrer on the ground that the complaint fails to allege facts showing that the restriction was arbitrary are set out in §§ 35.44 -35.47.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in §§ 35.21 -35.23.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to oppose a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] based on the contention that an arbitrary denial or discrimination did not occur.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Deportment Regulations as Lacking Rational Relationship

The factual background of In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , is discussed in § 35.20[3][a]. In that case, the Supreme Court held that a business establishment could not arbitrarily exclude a prospective customer, but was permitted to promulgate reasonable deportment regulations if they were rationally related to the services performed and the facilities provided (3 Cal. 3d 205, 217) .

[b] Additional Facts Necessary to Determine Whether Denial or Discrimination Reasonable

In Hales v. Ojai Valley Inn & Country Club (1977) 73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 140 Cal. Rptr. 555 , plaintiff, a male, sued defendant restaurant for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Plaintiff alleged that when he entered defendant's establishment, he was attired in a "leisure suit," and that even though women who were similarly attired in leisure suits were served with food and drink, defendant refused to serve plaintiff unless he wore a tie. Because of this restriction, plaintiff alleged that he was the victim of sex discrimination. The trial court sustained without leave to amend a general demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appealed to the court of appeal which reversed. The court did not determine whether or not plaintiff was the victim of discrimination on the basis of sex. Instead, it pointed out that under the rule of In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 217, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , the Unruh Civil Rights Act does not prohibit all discrimination, but it does prohibit arbitrary discrimination (73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 28) . It then determined that the pleading was sufficient to withstand a general demurrer because it was sufficient to indicate the nature of plaintiff's contention and given the nature of plaintiff's contention, a determination of whether the reason for the discrimination was arbitrary or reasonable turned, not on the bare facts pleaded, but on other facts that could only be determined on trial and not on demurrer. In that the allegations stated that defendant restaurant differentiated between men and women on the basis of attire, other facts necessary for the determination included the definition of the garment in contention which was a "leisure suit," the nature of defendant's establishment, and local community standards of dress (73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 28-29) .

Significantly, the court did not say that the allegations, if proven, would establish a prima facie case of discrimination. It pointed out that additional facts would have to be shown, but did not say which party had the burden of establishing such factual determinations. Further, it added that although the general demurrer should not have been sustained, plaintiff could well be required in the discretion of the trial court to allege some facts in more detail in response to a special demurrer (73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 29) .

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51] when the defendant contends that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it does not allege facts sufficient to show that the alleged act of discrimination was part of a policy or routine practice of discrimination. The ground of opposition set forth in this form is that such allegations are unnecessary to state a cause of action under the Unruh Act and that a single discriminatory act will support liability under the Act.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, the points and authorities in this form may be modified for use in other procedural contexts in which the substantive points may arise. [3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Single Instance of Discrimination Actionable

In Jackson v. Superior Court (1994) 30 Cal. App. 4th 936, 36 Cal. Rptr. 2d 207 , plaintiff, an African-American investment advisor, had recommended that two of his clients (who were elderly sisters) invest in a particular mutual fund. To facilitate this transaction, plaintiff accompanied his clients to the defendant bank to assist them in obtaining a cashier's check made payable to the fund. An employee of the bank, allegedly because of her prejudice against African Americans, told plaintiff's clients that plaintiff was trying to "pull a scam" on them and urged them not to undertake the transaction. As a result of the employee's statements, the clients left the bank and did not go through with the transaction. Plaintiff sued the defendant bank and its employee, alleging a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code § 51) and various tort causes of action. The trial court sustained defendant's demurrer to the Unruh Act cause of action with leave to amend to allege a common law cause of action. Plaintiff sought a writ of mandate directing the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

The court of appeal granted the writ. In holding that plaintiff had stated a cause of action for violation of the Unruh Act, the court rejected defendant's suggestion that plaintiff's complaint was inadequate because it did not contain allegations that defendant's discriminated as a matter of policy and practice. The court noted that the plain language of Civ. Code § 51 does not prohibit only those acts of discrimination that are routinely committed or are a matter of policy. The court observed that a plaintiff will obviously have an easier burden of persuasion if he or she can provide evidence that the defendant routinely discriminates against the class to which plaintiff belongs. The court concluded, however, that such an allegation is not necessary to plead a violation of Civ. Code § 51. Whether the defendants in this case did discriminate was a factual issue that could not be determined as a question of law from the facts pleaded (30 Cal. App. 4th 936, 942) .

A. Liberal Construction as Necessary. [See § 35.40, Paragraph A.]

B. Facially Neutral Policy Applied in Discriminatory Manner Can Be Proven by Statistics. Introduction of statistics to prove a claim that a facially neutral policy was applied in a discriminatory manner under the Unruh Civil Rights Act is appropriate when based on the proper foundation and subject to the general rules of evidence. Statistical evidence may be probative of intentional discrimination in some cases, and a blanket rule of exclusion cannot be justified (*Everett v. Superior Court (2003) 104 Cal. [3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Facially Neutral Policy Applied in Discriminatory Manner Can Be Proven by Statistics

In Everett v. Superior Court (2003) 104 Cal. App. 4th 388, 128 Cal. Rptr. 2d 418 , an African-American man, his wife, and his sister-in-law sued an amusement park and several of its employees for violation of the Unruh Act after the man was detained by security employees for allegedly violating the park's rule against cutting in line while waiting to board a ride, assaulted, placed under citizen's arrest, chained to a bench, and then ejected from the park. In opposition to defendants' motion for summary adjudication, plaintiff relied on statistical information showing that African-Americans were more than eight times as likely to be held and removed from the park for line cutting than members of other ethnic groups. This statistical information showed that in 1998, 7.5 percent of the park's guests were African-American, but 55.7 percent of the individuals removed from the park for line cutting were African-Americans, while in 1997, African-Americans made up 7.2 percent of the guests and 41.3 percent of the people removed from the park for line cutting. Plaintiff also presented evidence that during the same years, African-Americans were arrested by the park security force at seven times the combined rate for all other racial groups; of all the individuals arrested in the park in 1997 and 1998, 35.4 and 49.3 percent, respectively, were African-Americans. The trial court granted summary adjudication, calling the plaintiffs' evidence "speculative" (104 Cal. App. 4th 388, 390-392) .

The court of appeal reversed. Citing Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1175, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 , the court found that the introduction of statistics to prove a disparate impact claim is appropriate when based on the proper foundation and subject to the general rules of evidence, and that statistical evidence may be probative of intentional discrimination in some cases, so that a blanket rule of exclusion cannot be justified (104 Cal. App. 4th 388, 392-393) . Citing United States Supreme Court cases, the court found that courts regularly have employed statistics to support an inference of intentional discrimination [see Yick Wo v. Hopkins (1886) 118 U.S. 356, 373-374, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220 (200 Chinese individuals denied permits to operate laundry business, but permits granted to 80 of 81 non-Chinese applicants); Castaneda v. Partida (1977) 430 U.S. 482, 495, 97 S. Ct. 1272, 51 L. Ed. 2d 498 (county population of Mexican-Americans (79.1 percent) twice as large as percentage of Mexican-Americans summoned for grand jury service (39 percent)); Turner v. Fouche (1970) 396 U.S. 346, 359, 90 S. Ct. 532, 24 L. Ed. 2d 567 (county population of black citizens (60 percent) far exceeded percentage on grand jury lists (37 percent)); Whitus v. Georgia (1967) 385 U.S. 545, 552, 87 S. Ct. 643, 17 L. Ed. 2d 599 (number of black citizens on tax digest (27.1 percent) at least three times number of blacks on grand jury venire (9.1 percent) and petit jury venire (7.8 percent))]. The court found that although statistical analysis in some cases requires an expert, expert testimony is required only for opinions related to a subject sufficiently beyond common experience that the opinion of an expert would assist the trier of fact [Evid. Code § 801(b)], and a simple comparison of percentages did not exceed the common experience of the trier of fact, and did not mandate use of an expert (104 Cal. App. 4th 388, 393-394) . Thus, the trial court's grant of summary adjudication was improper, because the plaintiff presented evidence sufficient to support an inference that the park's facially neutral line cutting policy is applied in a discriminatory manner (104 Cal. App. 4th 388, 394) .

§ 35.44 Opposing Demurrer to Complaint [Code Civ. Proc. § 430.10(e)] Against Business Establishment for Violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51]--Complaint Satisfies Requirements for Pleading Arbitrary Denial or Discrimination--Denial or Discriminatory Treatment Based on Exclusion or Differential Treatment of Entire Class by Business Establishment

[Caption. See § 35.40.]

THE COURT SHOULD OVERRULE DEFENDANT'S DEMURRER TO PLAINTIFF'S COMPLAINT FOR VIOLATION OF THE UNRUH CIVIL RIGHTS ACT, SINCE IT SATISFIES THE REQUIREMENTS FOR PLEADING THAT DEFENDANT ARBITRARILY DISCRIMINATED AGAINST PLAINTIFF BECAUSE IT ALLEGES FACTS TO SHOW THAT DEFENDANT _____ [EXCLUDED or DIFFERENTIALLY TREATED] AN ENTIRE CLASS OF THE PUBLIC BECAUSE HE/SHE/IT _____ [BELIEVED THAT THE CLASS MIGHT PRESENT GREATER PROBLEMS THAN SOME OTHER CLASS OF THE PUBLIC or BELIEVED THAT DIFFERENTIAL TREATMENT OF AN ENTIRE CLASS SERVED A PUBLIC INTEREST or set forth other alleged justification].

A. Liberal Construction as Necessary. [See § 35.40, Paragraph A.]

B. Deportment Regulations as Lacking Rational Relationship. [See § 35.41, Paragraph B.]

C. Exclusion of Entire Class. Although entrepreneurs unquestionably possess broad authority to protect their enterprises from improper and disruptive behavior, under the Unruh Civil Rights Act, entrepreneurs must generally exercise this legitimate interest directly by excluding those persons who are in fact disruptive; the Unruh Act does not permit a business enterprise to exclude or discriminate against an entire class of individuals on the prediction that the class as a whole is more likely to commit misconduct than some other class of the public (Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 738-741, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111 ; see also O'Connor v. Village Green Owners Ass'n (1983) 33 Cal. 3d 790, 793-794, 191 Cal. Rptr. 320, 662 P.2d 427).

[Optional] D. Differentiation of Men and Women. A business establishment's denial of services or discrimination based on differential treatment of similarly situated men and women may constitute arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Koire v. Metro Car Wash (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 24, 38, 219 Cal. Rptr. 133, 707 P.2d 195 ; see Hales v. Ojai Valley Inn & Country Club (1977) 73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 28-29, 140 Cal. Rptr. 555 ; see also Civ. Code § 51.6(b) (prohibiting business establishment from discriminating in price charged for similar service based on person's gender)).

[Optional] E. Immoral Character. A business establishment's denial of services or discrimination against a class of persons with reputations of immoral character may constitute arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Orloff v. Los Angeles Turf Club (1951) 36 Cal. 2d 734, 741, 227 P.2d 449 ; see also Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 739, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111).

[Optional] F. Sexual Orientation. A business establishment's denial of services or discrimination against a prospective customer based on a policy of excluding gays or lesbians as a class may constitute arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code § 51(b), (e); Stoumen v. Reilly (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 713, 716-717, 234 P.2d 969 ; Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 733, 195 Cal. Rptr. 325 , appeal dismissed, 468 U.S. 1205 (1984) , on review after remand, 17 Cal. 4th 670, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 (1998) ; see also Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 739, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111).

[Optional] G. Unconventional Dress. A business establishment's denial of services or discrimination against a prospective customer based on his or her long hair or unconventional dress may constitute arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act (In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 217-218, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992).

[Optional] H. Organizations or Associations. A business establishment's exclusion of an entire class of the public on the basis of the class's membership in an organization or association may be arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act (In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 217-218, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992).

[Optional] I. Children or Families With Children. The blanket of exclusion of all children or families with children from a business establishment may constitute arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act (O'Connor v. Village Green Owners Ass'n (1983) 33 Cal. 3d 790, 793-794, 191 Cal. Rptr. 320, 662 P.2d 427 (condominiums); Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 741-742, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111 (rental units)).

[Optional] J. Age. A business establishment's exclusion of persons on the basis of age may constitute arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Rights Act (see Park Redlands Covenant Control Committee v. Simon (1986) 181 Cal. App. 3d 87, 93-94).

[Optional] K. Religious Belief. Acts that aid or incite discriminatory business conduct on the basis of religion may constitute arbitrary discrimination, thus violating the Unruh Civil Right Act (Pines v. Tomson (1984) 160 Cal. App. 3d 370, 377, 206 Cal. Rptr. 866).

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51]. It opposes a demurrer that asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it does not allege facts to show that defendant's denial or discriminatory treatment was arbitrary. It may be used when plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to show that defendant's action was based on an arbitrary exclusion or differential treatment of an entire class by the business establishment.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. In particular, counsel should show how the complaint has sufficiently stated facts to allege that defendant exercised an unreasonable or arbitrary discriminatory policy when he or she excluded or differentially treated plaintiff because plaintiff fell within a particular class of persons.

The California Supreme Court has held that the statutorily enumerated bases of discrimination--sex, color, race, religion, ancestry, national origin, disability, medical condition, marital status, and sexual orientation--are illustrative rather than restrictive [Civ. Code § 51; Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 725, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111 ; In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 216, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 ; see also Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 733, 195 Cal. Rptr. 325 , appeal dismissed, 468 U.S. 1205 (1984) , on review after remand, 17 Cal. 4th 670, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 (1998) ; but see Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 1159-1161, 1175, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 (language that could be construed to indicate Court's preference to limit scope of Act to groups specified in Civ. Code § 51), discussed in § 35.20[3][c])].

The Court has emphasized that the Unruh Act protects all classes from arbitrary discrimination and not simply those classes set forth in the statute or that come under the statute by judicial determination [Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 732, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111] . Hence, the optional paragraphs in this form are intended to illustrate possible bases of discrimination and not to limit the scope of the Unruh Act in a manner incompatible with these Supreme Court decisions.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in §§ 35.21 -35.23.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to oppose a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] based on the contention that an arbitrary denial or discrimination did not occur.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Exclusion of Entire Class

The factual and procedural background of Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111 is discussed in § 35.21[3][e]. The Supreme Court reversed judgment for the landlord in an unlawful detainer action, stating that the blanket exclusion of families with children from an apartment complex violated the Unruh Civil Rights Act (30 Cal. 3d 721, 744-745) . The Court said that, contrary to the municipal court's conclusion, the anti-discriminatory provisions of the Unruh Act were not confined to a limited category of protected classes, but protected all persons from arbitrary discrimination by a business establishment (30 Cal. 3d 721, 730-733) . It added that the landlord's ban on children was not permissible even if children as a class were noisier, rowdier, more mischievous, and more boisterous than adults (30 Cal. 3d 721, 736-740) . The Unruh Act, the Court explained, does not permit a business enterprise to exclude an entire class of individuals on the basis of a generalized prediction that the class as a whole was more likely to commit misconduct than some other class of the public (30 Cal. 3d 721, 739) . Although the Court recognized that entrepreneurs unquestionably possess broad authority to protect their enterprises from improper and disruptive behavior, the Court held that entrepreneurs must generally exercise this legitimate interest directly by excluding those persons who are in fact disruptive (30 Cal. 3d 721, 740) .

The factual and procedural background of O'Connor v. Village Green Owners Ass'n (1983) 33 Cal. 3d 790, 191 Cal. Rptr. 320, 662 P.2d 427 , is discussed in § 35.40[3][i]. Citing the holding in Marina Point, the Supreme Court in O'Connor held that a condominium association's exclusion of children was a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act and could not be justified by any claim about generalized characteristics of children (33 Cal. 3d 790, 793-794) . The Court held that the Act protects all persons from arbitrary discrimination in "all business establishments of every kind whatsoever" and concluded that a nonprofit condominium owners' association fell within that category (33 Cal. 3d 790, 795-796) .

[b] Differentiation of Men and Women

In Koire v. Metro Car Wash (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 24, 219 Cal. Rptr. 133, 707 P.2d 195 , after plaintiff's requests for the same discount prices given to women on "Ladies' Day" were turned down by several car washes and bars, he brought an action against those establishments alleging violations of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The trial court found that the sex-based price discounts did not violate the Unruh Act and granted judgment for all defendants. Plaintiff appealed.

The Supreme Court reversed and remanded, finding that the plain language of the Unruh Act mandates equal provision of advantages, privileges, and services in business establishments and that absent a compelling social policy supporting sex-based price differentials, the discounts violate the Unruh Act (40 Cal. 3d 24, 38) . Defendants contended that the Unruh Act prohibits only the exclusion of a member of a protected class from a business establishment and that discrimination based on admission prices and services are allowed. The Court disagreed, noting that the Unruh Act guarantees full and equal accommodations, advantages, facilities, privileges and services; its scope is clearly not limited to exclusionary practices, but is broad enough to include discrimination in the form of sex-based price discounts (40 Cal. 3d 24, 29-30) . In also rejecting defendants' contention that the discounts fell within recognized exceptions to the Act, the Court said that discriminatory practices may be upheld only when there is a strong public policy in favor of the discriminatory treatment based on a compelling societal interest, and that neither substantial business purposes in the form of profits nor social purposes in the form of more interaction between the sexes was a compelling societal interest (40 Cal. 3d 24, 31-33) . It cited sex-segregated restroom facilities as one instance when public policy warrants differential treatment for men and women, based on the constitutional right to personal privacy. The Court ended its decision with a thorough discussion of the public policy reasons mandating equal treatment of men and women as well as those supporting preferential prices for children and the elderly (40 Cal. 3d 24, 37-38) .

The factual and procedural background of Hales v. Ojai Valley Inn & Country Club (1977) 73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 140 Cal. Rptr. 555 , is discussed in § 35.41[3][b]. In that case, the complaint alleged that defendant restaurant differentiated between men and women on the basis of attire because it refused to serve men wearing leisure suits but not ties, while it served women who wore leisure suits. The court of appeal held that whether or not such differentiation was reasonable or arbitrary required the determination of other facts such as local community standards of dress for both sexes (73 Cal. App. 3d 25, 28-29) . Thus, the case appears to support the proposition that any differentiation between two people who happen to be of the opposite sex is arbitrary on its face and allegations describing such differentiation are therefore adequate to withstand attack by general demurrer, even though, as the court pointed out, the allegations in this particular case might not have been adequate to withstand a special demurrer seeking clarification.

In addition to the Unruh Act, the Gender Tax Repeal Act of 1995 [see Civ. Code § 51.6(a)] specifically provides that no business establishment of any kind may discriminate against a person with respect to the price charged for services of a similar kind because of the person's gender [Civ. Code § 51.6(b)]. Like the Unruh Act, the remedies for a violation of Civ. Code § 51.6 are those provided in Civ. Code § 52(a) [Civ. Code § 51.6(d)]. For related jury instructions, see Judicial Council of California Civil Jury Instructions, CACI Nos. 3022, 3026 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender, Official Publisher), also available in LexisNexis Automated Judicial Council of California Civil Jury Instructions.

Civ. Code § 51.6(b) does not prohibit price differences that are based specifically on the amount of time, difficulty, or cost of providing the services [Civ. Code § 51.6(c)]. Furthermore, Civ. Code § 51.6 does not alter or affect the provisions of the Health and Safety Code, the Insurance Code, or other laws that govern health care service plan or insurer underwriting or rating practices [Civ. Code § 51.6(e)].

[c] Sexual Harassment

The factual and procedural background of Brown v. Smith (1997) 55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 64 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 , is discussed in § 35.48[3][c]. In Brown, the court of appeal found that sexual harassment is not included in the scope of protected categories listed in the Unruh Act (Civ. Code §§ 51, 52), citing Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 (55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 787) . The court found that a person is now liable in a cause of action for sexual harassment under Civ. Code § 51.9 where the plaintiff proves the statutory elements of the cause of action; however, the Legislature's intent in enacting Civ. Code § 51.9 was to create a cause of action where none had existed before (55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 787) .

[d] Immoral Character

The factual background of Orloff v. Los Angeles Turf Club (1951) 36 Cal. 2d 734, 227 P.2d 449 , is discussed in § 35.23[3][a]. In that case, the Supreme Court held that under the predecessors of Civ. Code §§ 51-53 it would not be reasonable to deny an individual's right to accommodation in a public place to which the statutes apply. The Court reached this conclusion by reasoning that all laws that govern fundamental rights and duties must be definite and their meaning ascertainable by those whose rights and duties are affected; an uncertain law is repugnant to the due process clause. The use of an unspecific basis like immoral character for denying fundamental rights could thus be constitutionally fatal. Such vagueness can be avoided however by interpreting the statutes with the "governing criteria" of reasonableness. Noting that their general objective is the protection of others on the premises, the Court said that the commission of lewd, immoral, or other acts inimical to the public safety when applying for or after admittance is a reasonable ground for exclusion. But it concluded that mere suspicion based on past conduct and alleged reputed activities outside the race track or on conversations held at the race track with persons considered questionable without disclosure of their substance did not justify ejection or exclusion (36 Cal. 2d 734, 741) . This was true in the case of plaintiff since even though the facts showed that he had several convictions for offenses related to horse racing, there was no evidence that any of his offenses had been committed at a race track. Underlying the Court's reasoning in Orloff is the view that use of the statute to enforce an unreasonable ground for exclusion would violate the guarantees of equal protection and due process. Although the Court was specifically applying Civ. Code § 53, the opinion implies that an unreasonable exclusion under the predecessor of Civ. Code § 51 is also prohibited.

Counsel should also note that the Legislature subsequently amended the Business and Professions Code to permit exclusion from race tracks of known bookmakers or touts or persons convicted of an offense of wagering on horse races [former Bus. & Prof. Code § 19561.5 (now see Bus. & Prof. Code §§ 19572, 19573), upheld in Flores v. Los Angeles Turf Club (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 736, 742-745, 13 Cal. Rptr. 201, 361 P.2d 921] . The decision in Flores, however, does not repudiate Orloff, since it describes a ground for exclusion which is a statutory exception to the Unruh Civil Rights Act created for a particular type of business establishment and which is protected from abuse by the availability of an administrative remedy.

The factual and procedural background of Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858 , is discussed in §§ 35.21[3][e] and 35.44[3][a]. The Supreme Court stated that an individual may forfeit his or her statutory right of access to the services of a business enterprise if he or she conducts himself or herself improperly or disrupts the operations of the enterprise. However, the Unruh Act does not permit a business enterprise to exclude an entire class of individuals on the basis of a generalized prediction that the class as a whole is more likely to commit misconduct than some other class of the public (30 Cal. 3d 721, 738-739) . The Court added that this proposition is clearly demonstrated by Orloff v. Los Angeles Turf Club (1951) 36 Cal. 2d 734, 227 P.2d 449 . Undoubtedly, the Court said, the class of persons with "reputations as to immoral character" was more likely than the general population to engage in illegal activities that a public racetrack legitimately would seek to prevent. However, the case clearly held that an individual could not be excluded from the racetrack on the basis of such classification, but rather had a right to be judged on the basis of his or her own conduct (30 Cal. 3d 721, 739) .

Stoumen v. Reilly (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 713, 234 P.2d 969 , was an appeal from the judgment of a superior court denying a petition for writ of mandate to compel the State Board of Equalization to reinstate petitioner's license to sell alcoholic beverages. The Supreme Court reversed and ordered the lower court to grant a peremptory writ of mandate. The Court noted that the decision of the State Board of Equalization was based on a finding that the licensee permitted the premises to be used as a disorderly house in that persons of "known homosexual tendencies" patronized the premises and used them as a meeting place (37 Cal. 2d 713, 715) . The Court further noted that there was no evidence of any illegal or immoral conduct on the premises or that the patrons resorted to the restaurant for purposes injurious to public morals (37 Cal. 2d 713, 715-717) . Although police officers testified that many of the patrons were homosexuals and that there were a number of arrests, some for vagrancy and some for "homosexual actions," there was no showing that any of those arrested were convicted (37 Cal. 2d 713, 715) .

In the Court's analysis, although former section 58 of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act penalized licensees if they permitted licensed premises to be used as disorderly houses or places to which people resorted for purposes injurious to public morals, the statute did not attempt to regulate mere patronage by any class of persons without regard to their conduct on the premises. Indeed, the Court pointed out, under the predecessors of Civ. Code §§ 51 and 52, which were applicable at that time, all members of the public of lawful age had a right to patronize a public restaurant and bar as long as they acted properly and did not commit illegal and immoral acts since a proprietor could not exclude or eject a patron except for good cause (37 Cal. 2d 713, 716-717) .

The factual and procedural background of Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 195 Cal. Rptr. 325 , appeal dismissed, 468 U.S. 1205 (1984) , on review after remand, 17 Cal. 4th 670, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 (1998) , is discussed in § 35.25[3][e]. The court of appeal stated that, as held in In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 216, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 (discussed in § 35.20[3][a]), the Unruh Act bars all types of arbitrary discrimination, and the Act's reference to particular bases of discrimination (sex, color, race, religion, ancestry, national origin, or disability) is illustrative rather than restrictive. The court also stated that the Act's focus is on the individual and precludes the exclusion of persons based on a generalization about the class to which they belong (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 733) . The court cited Stoumen v. Reilly (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 713, 234 P.2d 969 , discussed above, which held that the Act prohibits the exclusion of a person on the basis of homosexual status, and Gay Law Students Assn. v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. (1979) 24 Cal. 3d 458, 475, 156 Cal. Rptr. 14, 595 P.2d 592 , which held that although homosexuals were not specified in the statutory language, former Pub. Util. Code § 453(a) prohibited arbitrary employment discrimination against homosexuals. The court concluded that the Unruh Act prohibits arbitrary discrimination against homosexuals (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 734) . Pub. Util Code § 453 has been amended to prohibit a public utility from prejudicing or disadvantaging a person because of ancestry, medical condition, marital status or change in marital status, occupation, or any characteristic listed or defined in Gov. Code § 11135, which includes sexual orientation [Pub. Util Code § 453(b)].

The factual and procedural background of Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858, 103 S. Ct. 129, 74 L. Ed. 2d 111 , is discussed in §§ 35.21[3][e], 35.44[3][a] and [d]. The Supreme Court stated that the Unruh Act does not permit a business enterprise to exclude an entire class of individuals on the basis that the class as a whole is more likely to commit misconduct than some other class of the public (30 Cal. 3d 721, 738-739) . The Court said that this proposition is clearly demonstrated by Stoumen v. Reilly (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 713, 234 P.2d 969 , discussed above. The Court explained that although it may have been thought true--at least under the mores of that time--that homosexuals as a class were more likely than heterosexuals to engage in the kind of "immoral conduct" that would justify expulsion from a public restaurant or bar, any such class generalization did not afford a proper basis for exclusion of all gays or lesbians. The Court emphasized that members of the public have a right to patronize a public restaurant and bar so long as they are acting properly and are not committing illegal or immoral acts (30 Cal. 3d 721, 739) .

Note:

The Unruh Civil Rights Act, Civ. Code § 51, was amended by the Civil Rights Act of 2005 [see 2005 Stats., ch. 420 (AB1400)] to include sexual orientation as a prohibited basis of discrimination [see Civ. Code § 51(b), (e)]. The Legislature specifically noted that the amendment was clarifying of existing law and reemphasized that the list of prohibited bases in § 51 is illustrative rather than exclusive [2005 Stats., ch. 420, § 2(c)].

[f] Unconventional Dress

The factual and procedural background of In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , is discussed in § 35.20[3][a]. In that case, petitioner Cox sought a writ of habeas corpus after he was arrested for violating a municipal trespass ordinance. The ordinance provided that no person may remain on any business premises after being asked to leave, but excluded from its application those situations in which an ejection would violate the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51]. Petitioner alleged that he and a friend, who wore long hair and dressed unconventionally, were conversing in a shopping center when a security guard asked them to leave the premises. Although the Court denied the petition, it stated that under the Unruh Civil Rights Act, a shopping center may not exclude individuals who wear long hair and unconventional dress, who are black, or who are members of the John Birch society, merely because of these characteristics or associations (3 Cal. 3d 205, 217-218) .

[g] Organizations or Associations

In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , is discussed in §§ 35.20[3][a] and 35.44[3][f].

[h] Children or Families With Children

The factual and procedural background of O'Connor v. Village Green Owners Ass'n (1983) 33 Cal. 3d 790, 191 Cal. Rptr. 320, 662 P.2d 427 , is discussed in §§ 35.40[3][i], and 35.44[3][a]. The Supreme Court held that a rule in a condominium association's covenants, conditions, and restrictions excluding children from living in the condominiums violated the Unruh Civil Rights Act (33 Cal. 3d 790, 793-794) . The Act applies to business establishments, and the condominium association was held to be a business establishment within the meaning of the Act (33 Cal. 3d 790, 795-796) . The Court cited the holding in Marina Point, below, that a blanket exclusion of children could not be justified by generalized characteristics of children (33 Cal. 3d 790, 794) .

The factual and procedural background of Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858 , is discussed in §§ 35.21[3][e], and 35.44[3][a]. The Supreme Court reversed judgment for the landlord in an unlawful detainer action, stating that the blanket exclusion of families with children from an apartment complex violated the Unruh Civil Rights Act (30 Cal. 3d 721, 744-745) . The Court noted that the landlord's ban on children was not permissible even if children as a class were noisier, rowdier, more mischievous, and more boisterous than adults (30 Cal. 3d 721, 730-733) . The Unruh Act, the Court explained, does not permit a business enterprise to exclude an entire class of individuals on the basis of a generalized prediction that the class as a whole was more likely to commit misconduct than some other class of the public (30 Cal. 3d 721, 739) .

It should be noted that, after Marina Point, the Legislature enacted legislation allowing housing that meets certain criteria to be reserved for senior citizens, notwithstanding the Unruh Act [see Civ. Code §§ 51.2-51.4]. For discussion of these provisions, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 117, Civil Rights: Housing Discrimination (Matthew Bender).

[i] Age

In Park Redlands Covenant Control Committee v. Simon (1986) 181 Cal. App. 3d 87 , plaintiff homeowners' association brought an action against defendants as homeowners to enforce two restrictive covenants applicable to all homeowners in the subdivision. One of the covenants restricted residency to those 45 years of age and older. Defendants violated this covenant by having their two adult children and a grandchild live with them periodically. Defendants cross-complained for declaratory relief, seeking an interpretation of several covenants in the homeowner agreement. The trial court granted an injunction enjoining defendants' children and grandchild from residing with defendants until they were 45 years old and declared the other restrictive covenants valid. Defendants appealed.

The court of appeal reversed the injunction and otherwise affirmed the judgment. The court agreed with defendants' argument that the age-related restrictive covenant violated Civ. Code § 53 in the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Initially the court found that as a tract housing homeowners' association, plaintiff was a business establishment and therefore subject to the Act (181 Cal. App. 3d 87, 93) . Plaintiff attempted to justify the covenant as one in favor of a minority class, individuals over 45 years, and one socially necessary to meet the needs of senior citizens. Citing Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 (discussed in § 35.21[3][e]), the court said that to bring age discrimination within the exception for a specialized institution designed to meet a social need, the discrimination must occur (1) to meet the special needs of senior citizens and (2) it must take place in the context of housing designed especially for the elderly. It found neither factor present and remarked that 45 appeared to be chosen not to facilitate the special needs of the elderly, but solely to engage in impermissible discrimination against children and families with children because 45 is beyond the age that people have children. Moreover, the homes in the subdivision were not designed as specialized facilities for the elderly (181 Cal. App. 3d 87, 93-94) .

For discussion of statutory requirements for the senior housing exemption from the Unruh Act (Civ. Code §§ 51.2-51.4 and §§ 51.10-51.12 (applicable only to County of Riverside)), see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 117, Civil Rights: Housing Discrimination (Matthew Bender).

[j] Religious Belief

The facts and procedural background of Pines v. Tomson (1984) 160 Cal. App. 3d 370, 206 Cal. Rptr. 866 , are discussed in § 35.40[3][l]. The court of appeal affirmed the trial court judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action alleging violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act for religious discrimination. It specifically upheld the finding that the publication and distribution of the directory were acts of discriminatory business conduct on the basis of religion and were acts which aided or incited discriminatory business conduct on the basis of religion. Defendant's refusal to accept advertisements from one refusing to affirm a born-again Christian status was arbitrary and discriminatory business conduct on the basis of religion (160 Cal. App. 3d 370, 377) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Exclusion of Entire Class

In Isbister v. Boys' Club of Santa Cruz, Inc. (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 72, 219 Cal. Rptr. 150, 707 P.2d 212 , the trial court permanently enjoined defendant, a private nonprofit corporation that operated a recreational facility only for boys, from denying membership or access to its facilities to girls. The Supreme Court affirmed. After finding that defendant was a "business establishment" covered by the Unruh Act, the Court addressed the issue of arbitrary discrimination, saying that although a person may be excluded from a business establishment on an individual basis if that individual does not conform to proper standards of conduct, the discrimination is arbitrary, and therefore prohibited by the Unruh Act, if it excludes an entire class on the basis of stereotyped notions (40 Cal. 3d 72, 87) . Defendant was a public accommodation and did not come within the special social need exception to the Unruh Act because it was not a specialized facility established to serve those particularly in need of a service. In addition to its public nature, the facts surrounding defendant's operations that highlighted the arbitrary nature of the female exclusion were: defendant's programs, facilities, and services were suitable for both sexes, the inclusion of both sexes in the programs would not diminish their value or effectiveness, and there was no proof that female membership would cause serious permanent damage to defendant's funding or its relationship with the parent national organization (40 Cal. 3d 72, 88-90) . The Court included a caveat that its finding was based on the particular circumstances surrounding defendant and that nothing necessarily requires a similar result in case of other single-sex youth organizations (40 Cal. 3d 72, 91) .

In Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 195 Cal. Rptr. 325 , appeal dismissed, 468 U.S. 1205 (1984) , on review after remand, 17 Cal. 4th 670, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 (1998) , plaintiff brought suit against the Boy Scouts for unfair procedure and violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51] after he was expelled from the Boy Scouts, and rejected as a "Scouter," on the basis of his status as a homosexual. The court of appeal held that plaintiff had stated a cause of action against the organization under both theories. With regard to plaintiff's cause of action under the Unruh Act, the court stated that the focus of Civ. Code § 51 on the individual precludes the exclusion of persons based on a generalization about the class to which they belong (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 733) . Thus, the court concluded that the Unruh Act prohibits arbitrary discrimination against homosexuals (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 734) . Counsel should note, however, that on review after remand, the California Supreme Court held that the Unruh Act does not apply to membership decisions by the Boy Scouts (17 Cal. 4th 670, 696-700 ; see § 35.25[3][e]).

Hubert v. Williams (1982) 133 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1 , was an Unruh Civil Rights Act action in which the trial court erroneously sustained a demurrer to plaintiffs' complaint for failure to state a cause of action. Plaintiffs, a quadriplegic and his attendant, alleged that they had been evicted from their apartment because the attendant was a lesbian and the quadriplegic tenant associated with persons of "homosexual orientation." In reversing the lower court's order, the appellate department of the superior court stated that gays and lesbians are a class protected by the Unruh Act, and that the right to associate with members of a protected class is likewise protected (133 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1, 15).

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it fails to allege facts showing that the denial or discrimination was arbitrary but when sufficient facts are alleged to show that defendant's action was based on plaintiff tenant's exercise of legal rights concerning the business establishment.

Counsel should insert argument in this showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in §§ 35.21 -35.23.

Proc. § 1094.5*] based on the contention that an arbitrary denial or discrimination did not occur.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Denial or Discrimination Based on Exercise of Legal Rights of Tenant

The factual background of Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547 , is discussed in § 35.21[3][a]. One of the issues on appeal in that case was whether a threatened eviction represented arbitrary discrimination under the Unruh Civil Rights Act. To determine what grounds for eviction might be considered unreasonable, the court of appeal examined prior case and statutory law. It noted that Civ. Code § 1942.5 protects a tenant from retaliation by a landlord because of the exercise of rights granted by Civ. Code §§ 1940-1954 related to tenantability of the premises. Thus, it would be unreasonable for a landlord to retaliate against a tenant for having exercised statutory rights insuring tenantability. The court concluded that an eviction notice is not "rationally related to the facilities provided" if it expels a tenant who demands premises which do not endanger the health and welfare of its occupant and do not violate the housing codes but failed to find a violation of the Act because the case did not involve an eviction for this reason.

It is important to note that Newby does not consider the issue of whether or not the Unruh Civil Rights Act may be used in lieu of or in addition to Civ. Code § 1942.5 as a basis for injunctive relief against retaliatory eviction or damages [see Aweeka v. Bonds (1971) 20 Cal. App. 3d 278, 281-282, 97 Cal. Rptr. 650 (retaliatory eviction was basis for affirmative cause of action for damages or preliminary injunction) and California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 333, Landlord and Tenant: Eviction Actions (Matthew Bender)]. Subsequently, however, the Legislature amended Civ. Code § 1942.5 to provide that its remedies are in addition to any other remedies provided by statutory or decisional law [Civ. Code § 1942.5(h)].

In Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858 , the Supreme Court disapproved some language in Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547 . In ruling on the propriety of a landlord's blanket exclusion of families with children from an apartment complex under the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51], the Court stated that Newby involved the threatened eviction of a tenant on the basis of the tenant's own conduct and was clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. The Court disapproved the language in Newby that stated that "action by a landlord which does not restrict the right of a tenant to insure habitable living premises, and does not discriminate on the basis of race, sex, color, religion, ancestry, or national origin, is not actionable under the [Unruh Act] if it proceeds from a motive of rational self interest, i.e., if it is 'rationally related to the facilities provided' " [see Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 302, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547 ; Marina Point, Ltd. v. Wolfson (1982) 30 Cal. 3d 721, 740-741 n.9, 180 Cal. Rptr. 496, 640 P.2d 115 , cert. denied, 459 U.S. 858] .

[b] Eviction

The factual background of Newby v. Alto Riviera Apartments (1976) 60 Cal. App. 3d 288, 131 Cal. Rptr. 547 , is discussed in § 35.21[3][a].

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51]. It may be used when the plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to show that the defendant's action was based on the plaintiff's having previously exercised his or her legal rights with regard to the defendant.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Denial or Discrimination Done in Retaliation for Exercise of Legal Right

In Vaughn v. Hugo Neu Proler International (1990) 223 Cal. App. 3d 1612, 273 Cal. Rptr. 426 , plaintiff, a woman in the business of procuring and selling scrap metal to scrap-metal processing and distribution centers, brought a sex discrimination action against defendants, owners and operators of a scrap-metal processing and distribution facility, alleging that she and other females were not permitted entry onto defendants' business premises, although no men were denied that access. After that action was settled, defendants again denied only plaintiff and her employees access to their facility, and refused to purchase scrap metal from her. Defendants also prohibited her from entering adjoining property to pick up discarded scrap metal, and when plaintiff was on the adjoining property, called the police and requested that she be arrested for trespassing. Later, one of plaintiff's employees was injured by one defendant as he was procuring unwanted scrap metal from the adjoining property. Plaintiff filed a complaint alleging violation of the Unruh Act, claiming that defendants' actions were taken in retaliation for the earlier sex-discrimination action. Defendants filed special demurrers, and the trial court sustained them. Plaintiff chose not to amend the complaint, stipulated to a dismissal, and appealed.

Division Five of the Second District Court of Appeal reversed the dismissal of the cause of action under the Unruh Act. The court refuted defendants' contention that since plaintiff was not a member of a class when she filed the lawsuit, she had no claim under the Unruh Act. It explained that the Act protects all persons from arbitrary discrimination; it is not limited to a category of "protected classes." The rights afforded by the Act are enjoyed by all persons, as individuals. The Act is to be liberally construed with a view to effecting its object and to promoting justice. The court said allowing defendants to discriminate against plaintiff because she had previously filed a sex-discrimination lawsuit would be contrary to the primary purpose of the Act, which is to compel recognition of the equality of all persons in the right to the particular service offered by an organization or entity covered by the Act (223 Cal. App. 3d 1612, 1617-1618) . Once it concluded that the terms and primary purpose of the Unruh Act were violated by defendant's alleged conduct, the court went on to distinguish the case from those in which the Act was held inapplicable to discriminatory conduct by business enterprises. Those cases involved situations in which the practice was not arbitrary, and was based on the defendant's right to exclude a person because of the plaintiff's conduct, or because a regulation was adopted for a rational reason that was related to services performed or services provided by the defendant, or the Act excluded a particular business from its coverage. A business establishment may place reasonable restrictions on its customers as long as the restrictions are rationally related to the services performed and the facilities provided. In the instant case there was no evidence to establish that defendants were discriminating against plaintiff for any reason other than the fact that she had previously filed a lawsuit against them for sex discrimination. Thus, the court concluded that the exclusion of plaintiff from the premises was not rationally related to the services performed or services provided by defendants. More importantly, exclusion solely on the basis of the previously filed lawsuit was arbitrary and unreasonable pursuant to Civ. Code § 51 (223 Cal. App. 3d 1612, 1618-1619) . Defendants claimed that the Act does not specifically provide for a cause of action for retaliation, and therefore they can exclude plaintiff from the same privileges as the general public. The court responded that courts have not hesitated to prohibit retaliatory exercises of broad private powers when they interfere with public policy, notwithstanding the absence of a statutory cause of action (223 Cal. App. 3d 1612, 1619) . Permitting defendants to discriminate against plaintiff in retaliation for exercising a statutory right would be contrary to public policy. Because plaintiff chose to challenge unlawful discrimination by filing a lawsuit to correct that illegal practice, defendants engaged in discriminatory practices for arbitrary reasons. When a person challenges such practices in a suit filed pursuant to the Unruh Act, the public has an interest in protecting that person from retaliatory conduct by the offending party (223 Cal. App. 3d 1612, 1620) .

In Gayer v. Polk Gulch, Inc. (1991) 231 Cal. App. 3d 515, 282 Cal. Rptr. 556 , plaintiff brought an Unruh Act action against defendant bar in which he alleged that defendant had discriminated against him by refusing to serve him in retaliation for his previously having brought an Unruh Act action against defendant. The trial court sustained defendant's demurrer without leave to amend and dismissed the Action. Plaintiff appealed.

Division Four of the First District Court of Appeal affirmed. The court emphasized that when a demurrer is sustained, the reviewing court must determine whether the complaint states facts sufficient to state a cause of action. Accordingly, the court said the only question before it was whether defendant violated the Act when its employees excluded plaintiff from the bar in retaliation for his having previously filed a discrimination suit against the owner. Plaintiff asserted that he was protected from that retaliation under the Act either as an individual or as a member of a class of civil rights litigants. The court concluded that the Act does not encompass discrimination based on retaliation and, therefore, that plaintiff failed to state a cause of action (231 Cal. App. 3d 515, 519) . The court acknowledged that the case was similar to Vaughn in that both dealt with retaliation, but said it was factually different from Vaughn. Defendant claimed that it refused to serve and then excluded plaintiff from the bar because of his prior rowdy conduct and because the prior discrimination suit between them was pending, and was set for hearing within days of the incident. In Vaughn the previous discrimination suit between the parties had been settled several years before the alleged retaliatory exclusion took place, and defendant could not argue that plaintiff was excluded because tensions between the parties were running high as the result of the pending lawsuit (231 Cal. App. 3d 515, 523) .

However, the dissent pointed out that there was no real difference between this case and Vaughn, and its holding should control. Moreover, the court was ruling on a demurrer, and should look only to the face of the pleading and must assume the truth of the facts therein (231 Cal. App. 3d 515, 526) .

A COMPLAINT FOR VIOLATION OF THE UNRUH CIVIL RIGHTS ACT SATISFIES THE REQUIREMENTS FOR PLEADING THAT DEFENDANT ARBITRARILY DISCRIMINATED IN REGARD TO OR ARBITRARILY DENIED RIGHTS OF ACCOMMODATION ESTABLISHED BY THE ACT IF IT ALLEGES FACTS WHICH SHOW A DENIAL OR DISCRIMINATION BASED ON THE CHARACTERISTICS OF PLAINTIFF'S ASSOCIATES AT THE BUSINESS ESTABLISHMENT IN VIOLATION OF THE ACT.

D. Denial or Discrimination Because of Associates. A complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act sufficiently pleads that defendant arbitrarily discriminated in regard to or arbitrarily denied rights of accommodation established by the Act if it alleges facts which show a denial or discrimination based on the characteristics of plaintiff's associates at the business establishment in violation of the Act (*Winchell v. [a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it fails to allege facts showing that the denial or discrimination was arbitrary, but where sufficient facts are alleged to show that defendant's action was based, in violation of the Act, on the characteristics of plaintiff's associates at the business establishment.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in §§ 35.21 -35.23.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to oppose a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] or a petition for writ of mandate to review a decision by the Fair Employment and Housing Commission [see Gov. Code § 12930(f)(2); Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5] based on the contention that an arbitrary denial or discrimination did not occur.

[c] Related Pleading and Practice Forms

For a general form of complaint against a business establishment alleging denial or discrimination in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 116, Civil Rights: Discrimination in Business Establishments (Matthew Bender).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Denial or Discrimination Because of Associates

The factual background of Winchell v. English (1976) 62 Cal. App. 3d 125, 133 Cal. Rptr. 20 , is discussed in § 35.40[3][a]. In that case, the trial court sustained a demurrer against the complaint apparently on the theory that the Unruh Civil Rights Act did not protect individuals from discrimination directed against them because of the characteristics of their companions at the time of the incident. The court of appeal, in reversing the Action of the trial court, held specifically that discrimination against persons on account of their associations with persons of the black race was actionable under the Unruh Civil Rights Act. The court pointed out that Civ. Code § 52 refers not only to discrimination on account of the color of the person discriminated against, but also to any discrimination on account of color. In this way, Civ. Code § 52 indicates that discrimination by a business establishment against one's right of association on account of the associates' color is a violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act.

Further, the court's reasoning and language make it clear that any arbitrary discrimination based on characteristics of one's associates is actionable. The court emphasized the rule of In re Cox (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 205, 216, 90 Cal. Rptr. 24, 474 P.2d 992 , set out in § 35.20[3][a], that the Act prohibits all arbitrary discrimination and the factual circumstances of that case in which Cox was apparently a victim of discrimination because he associated with another of unusual dress and appearance. The court noted that in other states, statutes comparable to Civ. Code § 52, which defines liability for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act, are not limited in their operation to the color or other feature of the person who was the immediate object of discrimination.

However, one limitation on this decision is the fact that the Winchell court expressly decided not to determine if discrimination because of one's associates is arbitrary where the behavior of the associates creates a reasonable basis for their eviction or other action.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Denial or Discrimination Because of Associates

In Rotary Club of Duarte v. Board of Directors (1986) 178 Cal. App. 3d 1035, 224 Cal. Rptr. 213 , defendant, the board of directors of an international organization, revoked the charter of plaintiff, a local chapter, because plaintiff had admitted women as members. In reversing the trial court's judgment for defendant, the court of appeal thoroughly examined the history and meaning of the terms used in the Unruh Act. After finding that defendant was a business establishment and was within the parameters of the Unruh Act, the court said that the Act proscribes not only direct discrimination against women, but also discrimination against a club because of its association with women (178 Cal. App. 3d 1035, 1061) .

The factual and procedural background of Hubert v. Williams (1982) 133 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1 , 184 Cal. Rptr. 161 , is discussed in § 35.44[4][b]. In reversing the trial court's order sustaining defendant's demurrer to plaintiffs' complaint and dismissing the Action, the appellate department of the superior court stated that because gays and lesbians are protected from arbitrary discrimination in rental housing by the Unruh Act, the right to associate with members of the protected class, as a class, is likewise protected under the Act (133 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1, 5) .

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of Civ. Code § 51.9 for sexual harassment when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it fails to allege facts showing conduct by the defendant that constitutes a cause of action for sexual harassment as prescribed in Civ. Code § 51.9(a).

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should include facts showing that the complaint pleads the elements of a cause of action for sexual harassment as set forth in Civ. Code § 51.9(a) (see § 35.48[3][a]), and that the alleged acts on which the cause of action is based took place after December 31, 1994 (see § 35.48[3][c]).

[b] Related Pleading and Practice Forms

For a general form of complaint against a business establishment alleging discrimination in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act, see Ch. 116, Civil Rights: Discrimination in Business Establishments , in California Forms of Pleading and Practice (Matthew Bender).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Cause of Action for Sexual Harassment

A person is liable in a cause of action for sexual harassment when the plaintiff proves all of the following elements [Civ. Code § 51.9(a); see also Brown v. Smith (1997) 55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 787, 64 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301] :

- A business, service, or professional relationship exists between the plaintiff and defendant.
- The defendant has made sexual advances, solicitations, sexual requests, demands for sexual compliance by the plaintiff, or engaged in other verbal, visual, or physical conduct of a sexual nature or of a hostile nature based on gender, that were unwelcome and persistent or severe.
- The plaintiff is unable to easily terminate the relationship.
- The plaintiff has suffered or will suffer economic loss or disadvantage or personal injury, including, but not limited to, emotional distress or the violation of a statutory or constitutional right, as a result of the defendant's conduct.

In an action pursuant to Civ. Code § 51.9, damages will be awarded as provided by Civ. Code § 52 [Civ. Code § 51.9(b)]. Nothing in Civ. Code § 51.9 may be construed to limit application of any other remedy for sexual harassment provided under law [Civ. Code § 51.9(c)]. The definition of sexual harassment and the standards for determining liability set forth in Civ. Code § 51.9 are limited to determining liability only with regard to a cause of action brought under Civ. Code § 51.9 [Civ. Code § 51.9(d)].

For related jury instructions, see Judicial Council of California Civil Jury Instructions, CACI Nos. 3024, 3027 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender, Official Publisher), also available in LexisNexis Automated Judicial Council of California Civil Jury Instructions.

[b] Business, Service, or Professional Relationships

Civ. Code § 51.9(a)(1) gives as examples of business, service, or professional relationships that may exist between plaintiff and another person as including, but not limited to, relationships with:

- Physicians, psychotherapists (as defined in Bus. & Prof. Code § 728(c)(1)), or dentists [Civ. Code § 51.9(a)(1)(A)];

- Attorneys, holders of master's degrees in social work, real estate agents, real estate appraisers, accountants, bankers, trust officers, financial planners, loan officers, collection services, building contractors, or escrow loan officers [Civ. Code § 51.9(a)(1)(B)];

- Executors, trustees, or administrators [Civ. Code § 51.9(a)(1)(C)];

- Landlords or property managers [Civ. Code § 51.9(a)(1)(D); see also Brown v. Smith (1997) 55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 786-788, 64 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 (landlord)];

- Teachers [Civ. Code § 51.9(a)(1)(E)]; or

- Relationships similar to any of the ones delineated in Civil Code § 51.9(a)(1)(A)-(E) [Civ. Code § 51.9(a)(1)(F)].

[c] No Claim Under Civil Code § 51.9 for Acts Occurring Before January 1, 1995

In Brown v. Smith (1997) 55 Cal. 4th App. 4th 767, 64 Cal. Rptr. 2d 301 , a tenant and her husband brought an action against her landlord and his wife for sexual harassment based on repeated comments and advances toward her of a sexual nature made in 1991. The complaint claimed violations of the Fair Employment & Housing Act (FEHA; Gov. Code § 12900 et seq.), and the Unruh Act (Civ. Code §§ 51, 52). After a jury trial, the plaintiffs were awarded damages under FEHA and the Act. The defendants appealed.

The court of appeal reversed the FEHA verdict on the basis of infirm jury instructions (55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 782-786) , and reversed the verdict under the Unruh Act. The court found that conduct constituting sexual harassment was not within the scope of the Unruh Act (Civ. Code §§ 51, 52) as it existed at the time of the Acts pleaded in the complaint, citing Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1142, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 (55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 787) . The court found that the legislative intent in enacting Civ. Code § 51.9, which was effective January 1, 1995, was to plug the hole in the Unruh Act and create a cause of action for sexual harassment where none had exited before (55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 787) . While recognizing that a female tenant can assert a cognizable cause of action for sexual harassment against her landlord under Civ. Code § 51.9, the court of appeal construed the statute to provide prospective relief only. Because the tenant in Brown complained of conduct occurring prior to January 1, 1995, the effective date of the statute, the court concluded that the tenant could not state a cause of action for sexual harassment remedies under the Unruh Act portion of the plaintiff's sexual harassment complaint (55 Cal. App. 4th 767, 787-788) .

[4] Additional Authorities

In C.R. v. Tenet Healthcare Corp. (2009) 169 Cal. App. 4th 1094, 87 Cal. Rptr. 3d 424 , a patient at a medical center sued the center after she was allegedly molested by one of the center's employees, alleging violation of Civ. Code § 51.9. The center demurred, and the trial court granted the demurrer on the ground that the section 51.9 claim was deficient because there was no allegation that defendant committed the acts of sexual abuse, the sexual assaults were alleged to have been committed by an individual, the statute does not impose liability on a business establishment such as a hospital, and a corporate entity cannot be held vicariously liable for sexual torts (169 Cal. App. 4th 1094, 1097-1101). The Court of Appeal reversed. The court held first that defendant, as a hospital, although not expressly listed in section 51.9(a), fell within the statute's scope. The alleged molester was alleged to be a certified nursing assistant and allegedly had responsibilities substantially similar to those provided by a physician. Moreover, defendant, as an entity providing health care services who hired and supervised a certified nursing assistant to care for patients as alleged in the first amended complaint, was either a service or fell within the ambit of a profession. Further, section 51.9 did not require the defendant have a fiduciary relationship with the plaintiff. The court also held that defendant, as a corporation, could be liable for the sexual abuse of plaintiff, and there were sufficient allegations of ratification to withstand a challenge at the demurrer stage, i.e., that defendant, with knowledge of the alleged molester's misconduct, continued to employ him and destroyed documents (169 Cal. App. 4th 1094, 1105-1112) .

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action against a defendant in that it fails to allege facts showing that defendant is a business establishment or that defendant committed a discrimination in regard to or denial of rights of accommodation but where the allegations show that defendant was party to some form of agreement or concerted action which resulted in a violation of the Act by some other party.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in opposing a demurrer on the ground that the complaint fails to allege facts showing that defendant is a business establishment are set out in § 35.40.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Participation Through Agreement

In Wagner v. O'Bannon (1969) 274 Cal. App. 2d 121, 79 Cal. Rptr. 44 , plaintiffs, a black married couple, sued the owner of a house, the county realty board, and various realtors under the Unruh Civil Rights Act for discrimination on the basis of race in a real estate transaction. The trial court found in favor of all the defendants and entered a judgment denying relief to plaintiffs. Part of the trial court's conclusions were that defendant county realty board was not a business establishment under the Act. In reversing the Action of the trial court, the court of appeal noted that the defendant realty board exercised some supervisory authority over its members' conduct; that blacks were not shown or encouraged to buy homes in nonblack neighborhoods; that one defendant realtor did not follow customary procedures in discussing plaintiffs' offer with the president of the realty board before submitting it to the listing broker; and that two defendant real estate brokers tried to avoid the sale, even though avoidance was contrary to their economic interest. The court concluded that if this evidence justified, on retrial, a conclusion that the realty board was the instrumentality through which discrimination in housing was promoted and maintained, then the board could be held liable under Civ. Code § 52 for aiding or inciting a denial of privileges, whether or not it was a business establishment. Further, if retrial established that the board was a party to an agreement, concerted action, or civil conspiracy to inflict the wrong complained of, the board might be liable under common law rules applicable to joint tortfeasors.

In Holmes v. Bank of America (1963) 216 Cal. App. 2d 529, 30 Cal. Rptr. 917 , plaintiff, a black man, sued two corporations engaged in the business of developing, building, and selling a tract of housing accommodations in San Diego County and a bank that had agreed to finance the sale of the housing accommodations for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Plaintiff complained that defendants had conspired and agreed to deprive plaintiff and all other Negroes of a home in the tract and that the bank as agent and coconspirator maintained and carried out a policy of refusing to finance homes in the tract to persons solely because they were Negroes. The trial court sustained the demurrer to the complaint by defendant bank, and plaintiff appealed. The principal argument of the bank before the court of appeal was that it did not come under the terms of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. It claimed that (1) obtaining a bank loan is not an accommodation, advantage, facility, privilege, or service of a business establishment within the meaning of Civ. Code § 51; (2) Civ. Code § 51 may apply to business establishments but not to every business transaction of a business establishment; and (3) since no person may compel another to enter into a contract without the other's consent, loan contracts were exempted from the Act.

The court of appeal, in reversing the Action of the trial court, stated that it did not have to decide the correctness of the bank's arguments. Even if they were correct, the allegations of conspiracy and oral agreement to discriminate on the basis of race raised factual questions, which could not be determined as a question of law from the facts pleaded, as to whether or not the bank aided or incited a denial or discrimination, thus creating a basis for liability under Civ. Code § 52.

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action against a real estate broker in that it shows that defendant acted as agent of a discriminatory principal but when the allegations show that defendant committed acts of denial or discrimination in areas which were under defendant's own control.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Liability of Real Estate Broker

The factual background of Wagner v. O'Bannon (1969) 274 Cal. App. 2d 121, 79 Cal. Rptr. 44 , is discussed in § 35.49[3][a]. In that case, the trial court determined that the home owner's refusal to sell to the black couple was a complete defense for the real estate brokers. After a court trial, judgment was entered denying plaintiffs' relief, and they appealed. The court of appeal reversed, holding that the facts supported a finding that defendant real estate brokers had failed to give plaintiffs the full benefits of their services as brokers irrespective of their inability to complete the transaction due to the owner's refusal to sell. In this case, the brokers did not merely transmit the plaintiffs' offer to purchase to the owner; instead, they met with the owner, discussed some of the problems of selling to blacks, and then arranged, within 24 hours, a sale of the home on more favorable terms to a white couple.

A COMPLAINT FOR VIOLATION OF THE UNRUH CIVIL RIGHTS ACT SATISFIES THE REQUIREMENTS FOR PLEADING THAT DEFENDANT'S ACTION DISCRIMINATED IN REGARD TO OR DENIED PLAINTIFF'S RIGHTS OF ACCOMMODATION ESTABLISHED BY THE ACT IF IT ALLEGES FACTS WHICH SHOW THAT DEFENDANT'S ACTION VIOLATED A THIRD PARTY'S RIGHTS OF ACCOMMODATION UNDER THE ACT FOR WHICH PLAINTIFF HAD CONTRACTED AS PART OF A LEGAL OBLIGATION TO THE THIRD PARTY.

C. Denial or Discrimination Against Third Party. A complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act sufficiently pleads that plaintiff was discriminated against in regard to or denied rights of accommodation established by the Act if it alleges facts which show that defendant's action discriminated in regard to or denied the rights of a third party in violation of the Act, when defendant had agreed with plaintiff to provide this accommodation which was part of plaintiff's legal obligation to the third party (Washington v. Blampin (1964) 226 Cal. App. 2d 604, 608, 38 Cal. Rptr. 235).

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it fails to allege facts showing that plaintiff was personally restricted by defendant business establishment but where the allegations show a denial or discrimination against a third party, one to whom plaintiff owed a legal obligation to arrange the service which was denied, in violation of an agreement between plaintiff and defendant.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. The facts should describe (1) defendant's agreement with plaintiff to provide a third party with a form of accommodation established by the Act, (2) defendant's violation of the rights of the third party by a discrimination in regard to or denial of this form of accommodation, and (3) the nature of plaintiff's legal obligation to the third party to arrange for this form of accommodation.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in § 35.24.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to support a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] or a petition for writ of mandate to review a decision by the Fair Employment and Housing Commission [see Gov. Code § 12930(f)(2); Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5] based on the contention that a denial or discrimination which occurred did not affect the plaintiff.

[c] Related Pleading and Practice Forms

For forms of allegation for use in a complaint against a physician alleging denial or discrimination in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act for refusal to treat the plaintiff's child, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 116, Civil Rights: Discrimination in Business Establishments, § 116.81 (Matthew Bender).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Denial or Discrimination Against Third Party

The factual background of Washington v. Blampin (1964) 226 Cal. App. 2d 604, 38 Cal. Rptr. 235 , is discussed in § 35.40[3][d]. In that case, the complaint alleged two causes of action, one on behalf of a minor who was denied service, and the second on behalf of the minor's father which alleged that defendant had agreed to render service to plaintiff's child and had then refused to render the service.

The municipal court granted defendant's motion for judgment on the pleadings and entered judgment against plaintiffs who appealed to the appellate department of the superior court which reversed and certified the case to the court of appeal. The court of appeal reversed the Action of the municipal court, sustaining both causes of action. The court stated that it is the legal duty of the father to provide necessary medical care for his child and that the complaint alleged in the father's cause of action that he had entered into an agreement with the defendant whereby the defendant was to render services to plaintiff's minor child. Under these allegations, the services were to be rendered to and for the father although the patient was the child. Thus, the court concluded, the defendant's alleged denial of service was a violation of the father's rights under Civ. Code §§ 51, 52.

Significantly, the factual situation in Washington contained two elements which, together or separately, could have been the basis for a cause of action under Civ. Code § 51. First, defendant had denied plaintiff a form of business accommodation by refusing to perform a third-party beneficiary contract in favor of plaintiff's child which defendant had made with plaintiff. Second, defendant, by refusing a direct service to the child, indirectly refused to provide plaintiff with the additional service of fulfilling his legal obligation to arrange medical care for the child. Although, as the court noted, the presence of both elements was adequate to support a cause of action, the court did not rule out the possibility that either element by itself would have been sufficient.

[b] Plaintiff's Agreement With Physician

The factual background of Washington v. Blampin (1964) 226 Cal. App. 2d 604, 38 Cal. Rptr. 235 , is discussed in § 35.40[3][d].

[a] Use of Form

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51] when the defendant contends that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it does not allege facts sufficient to show that plaintiff was a customer of the defendant at the time of the alleged discriminatory acts. The ground of opposition supported by this form is that plaintiff need not allege such facts if he or she otherwise sufficiently alleges that defendant denied plaintiff full and equal accommodations, advantages, privileges, or services in violation of the Act.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, the points and authorities in this form may be modified for use in other procedural contexts in which the substantive points may arise. For example, in an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a defense motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Plaintiff Need Not Be Customer of Defendant

The facts and procedural background of Jackson v. Superior Court (1994) 30 Cal. App. 4th 936, 36 Cal. Rptr. 2d 207 , are discussed in § 35.42[3][a]. In holding that plaintiff had stated a cause of action for violation of the Unruh Act, the court rejected defendant's contention that plaintiff could not sue under the Act because he himself was not seeking the defendant bank's services as a customer of the bank at the time of the Acts alleged in the complaint. The court noted that the bank accommodated the public in may ways peripheral to its main functions of providing banking services, including allowing persons to accompany its customers and help them pursue their banking business. The court held that when the bank refuses an African American this courtesy because of his or her race, the bank is denying that person the full and equal accommodations, privileges, or services of the bank, in violation of the Unruh Act (30 Cal. App. 4th 936, 940-941) . The court therefore concluded that plaintiff had sufficiently alleged race discrimination in violation of the Act and that the trial court erred in sustaining defendants' demurrer to this cause of action (30 Cal. App. 4th 936, 942) .

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [*Civ. [3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Unruh Civil Rights Act Protects Against Discrimination on Basis of Disability

The Unruh Act provides that all persons within California are entitled to the full and equal accommodations, advantages, facilities, privileges, or services in all business establishments of every kind whatsoever, no matter what their disability (Civ. Code § 51(b)).

[b] Plaintiff Need Not Allege Present Limitation of Major Life Activity

In Goldman v. Standard Ins. Co. (9th Cir. 2003) 341 F.3d 1023 , an attorney applied for a disability income insurance policy through a program approved by the State Bar of California and available only to its members. The insurance company declined to issue the policy because the attorney had been diagnosed as having an "Adjustment Disorder with mixed anxiety and depressed mood, DSM IV (Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders) 309.28," and was participating in weekly therapy sessions with a licensed clinical social worker. The company's underwriting policy was to deny coverage for applicants with adjustment disorder until at least one year after the cessation of treatment. The attorney initially filed suit in federal district court seeking damages and declaratory and injunctive relief for violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act ("ADA") (42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq.), the Unruh Civil Rights Act ("the Act") (Civ. Code § 51), and Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq. Shortly thereafter she dismissed the federal complaint and filed the same claims in California state court. The company removed the case to federal court and the federal district court exercised its jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 based on the ADA claim, and supplemental jurisdiction over the state law claims. The district court then granted summary judgment against the attorney on the grounds that she could not qualify as a disabled person under the ADA, because the company did not regard her as presently substantially limited by her adjustment disorder, but only as a person who may be substantially limited in the future. The court relied on the United States Supreme Court's interpretation of the ADA in Sutton v. United Air Lines (1999) 527 U.S. 471, 482, 119 S. Ct. 2139, 144 L. Ed. 2d 450 , requiring a plaintiff to show she is presently not potentially or hypothetically substantially limited. The district court concluded that the Unruh Act incorporated the ADA definition of disability and thus she also was not covered by the Unruh Act. The court also rejected the claim under Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200. The attorney appealed the entry of summary judgment on her claims under the Unruh Act and § 17200, but did not pursue her ADA claim (341 F.3d 1023, 1025-1026) .

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that, unlike the ADA as interpreted by Sutton, the definition of disability under the Unruh Act does not require a plaintiff to show that he or she is regarded as having a present limitation of a major life activity. As an initial matter, the court was not concerned with whether the Unruh Act requires the limitation to be substantial, because the insurance company regarded her as having a condition that could completely prohibit her from performing her job and thus a condition that could substantially limit her ability to work, which the court assumed was a major life activity under California law (341 F.3d 1023, 1026) . The court then held that the Unruh Act applies to insurance companies, citing Ins. Code § 1861.03(a), and that an insurance company's refusal to provide coverage on the basis of disability may constitute a denial of full and equal services if the discrimination is not reasonable (341 F.3d 1023, 1027) . The court then found that at the time the company refused to issue the policy, the Act did not define "disability," but the California Legislature subsequently amended the Act (see Civ. Code § 51(e)(1)) to define the disability as any mental or physical disability covered by the Fair Employment and Housing Act ("FEHA"), Gov. Code § 12920 et seq. FEHA includes within the definition of "mental disability," inter alia, having a mental or psychological disorder or condition that limits a major life activity or being regarded or treated by the covered entity as having or having had a mental or psychological disorder or condition that has no present disabling effect but may become a mental disability (see Gov. Code § 12926(i)(1), (5)). Because the company believed the attorney might someday be entirely prohibited from working given her diagnosis, which was the basis of its refusal to issue the policy, she was regarded as disabled. The Ninth Circuit did not resolve whether the amendment applied retroactively, but, rather, held that California's disability antidiscrimination law has never required that a plaintiff be regarded as presently limited by her disability. The amendment merely clarified that the definition does not include such a limitation and has never done so (341 F.3d 1023, 1028-1034) . The court then found that the attorney presented a genuine issue of material fact as to the reasonableness of the company to deny her coverage. Viewing the facts most favorably to the attorney as the nonmoving party, the court concluded that the company failed to establish as a matter of law that its decision to refuse coverage was based on sound actuarial principles or related to actual and reasonably anticipated experience (341 F.3d 1023, 1034-1036) .

[A] Use of Form

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it fails to allege facts showing that the denial or discrimination was arbitrary but when sufficient facts are alleged to show that defendant's action was based on marital status discrimination.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in §§ 35.21 -35.25.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to oppose a motion for summary judgment [*see Code Civ. [3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Marital Status Discrimination Is Actionable

In Koebke v. Bernardo Heights Country Club (2005) 36 Cal. 4th 824, 31 Cal. Rptr. 3d 565, 115 P.3d 1212 , plaintiffs, a lesbian couple, sued defendant country club alleging violation of the Unruh Act based on the defendant's refusal to extend to them the same benefits granted to married couples. For at least some of the period in which plaintiffs allege the violation occurred, they were registered with the state as domestic partners. Defendant answered and filed a motion for summary judgment or, alternatively, summary adjudication. The trial court granted defendant's motion without specifically addressing plaintiffs' claims of discrimination, finding that defendant did not provide different privileges to plaintiffs than to other unmarried couples. The court of appeal found that plaintiffs had failed to establish an Unruh Act violation on the basis of marital status discrimination, gender discrimination, or sexual orientation discrimination. However, the court of appeal also concluded that there was a triable issue of material fact as to whether defendant had discriminatorily enforced its spousal benefit policy. Therefore, the court of appeal reversed the summary judgment to the extent that it rejected plaintiffs' claim that defendant's bylaws were applied in a discriminatory manner but, in all other respects, affirmed the judgment (36 Cal. 4th 824, 832-836) .

The California Supreme Court reversed summary judgment in the country club's favor to the extent the marital status discrimination claim implicated the California Domestic Partner Rights and Responsibilities Act of 2003 [Fam. Code § 297 et seq.], but otherwise affirmed and remanded for further proceedings. The Court held that in light of the current version of the domestic partnership law, the Unruh Act requires businesses to treat registered domestic partners the same as spouses (36 Cal. 4th 824, 837-850) . The Court went on to hold that before the enactment of the Domestic Partners Act, denial of the spousal benefit to plaintiffs did not constitute impermissible marital status discrimination under the Unruh Act, because defendant's policy did not, on its face, constitute either impermissible marital discrimination or sexual orientation discrimination under the Unruh Act (36 Cal. 4th 824, 851-854) . However, the Court agreed with the lower court that plaintiffs presented sufficient evidence of discriminatory application of that policy to proceed to trial on that theory (36 Cal. 4th 824, 854-856) .

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Demand for Equal Treatment and Refusal Not Required

In Angelucci v. Century Supper Club (2007) 41 Cal. 4th 160, 59 Cal. Rptr. 3d 142, 158 P.3d 718 , male plaintiffs filed a complaint against defendant club for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act and the Gender Tax Repeal Act of 1995 (Civ. Code § 51.6), alleging that plaintiffs patronized the club and were charged an admission fee higher than that charged to women because they are men. The club moved for judgment on the pleadings, arguing that plaintiffs could not recover under for violations of the Unruh Civil Rights Act or the Gender Tax Repeal Act, because they had not alleged they had asked the club to be charged at the same rate as female patrons. The trial court agreed with defendant and entered judgment in its favor. Plaintiffs appealed and the Court of Appeal affirmed, holding that Civ. Code § 52(a) provides a remedy only to plaintiffs who request nondiscriminatory treatment and are refused, which applied equally to plaintiffs' claims under the Unruh Civil Rights Act and the Gender Tax Repeal Act (41 Cal. 4th 160, 164-166) .

The California Supreme Court held that to state a claim under the Unruh Act, plaintiffs are not required to show that they demanded equal treatment and refused. The Court found first that the Unruh Act does not contain express language requiring that before a legal action may be filed, the victim of the asserted discrimination must have demanded equal treatment and have been refused. Unlike some other remedy statutes, the Act, and specifically section 52(a), does not establish as a condition of instituting a lawsuit that the defendant have been given notice and an opportunity to correct the asserted violation (41 Cal. 4th 160, 168-173) . The Court then held that plaintiffs were injured within the meaning of the Unruh Act when they presented themselves for admission and were charged a higher admission price than women because gender-based price discounts constitute arbitrary discrimination within the meaning of the Act (41 Cal. 4th 160, 173-177) . Finally, the Court found that the trial court's and the Court of Appeal's interpretation of § 52(a) reflected in part defendant's assertion that the plaintiffs were professional plaintiffs who "shake down" business entities on the basis of assertedly technical violations of civil rights laws and similar enactments, and that they and their attorneys engage in this practice simply to make a living-unmotivated by any desire to eliminate discrimination or to redress any actual injury, and the Court shared to some degree these concerns. However, those concerns did not supply a justification for inserting additional elements of proof into the cause of action defined by the Unruh Act. With regard to the extent of the damages that could accrue for repeated unannounced visits to an establishment offering discounts to women, although the question was not before the Court, the Court stated in dictum that equitable principles could apply, and there are constitutional constraints on the accrual of statutory penalties (41 Cal. 4th 160, 178-180) .

This form may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer to a complaint for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act when the demurrer asserts that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because defendants' actions were protected by the constitutional protections for freedom of exercise of religion and speech.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

In an appropriate case, this memorandum may be submitted in opposition to a demurrer supported by the points set out in §§ 35.21 -35.25.

[b] Related Uses

With appropriate modifications, this memorandum may be used to oppose a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] based on the contention that an arbitrary denial or discrimination did not occur.

[a] Constitutional Protections for Religion and Speech Do Not Exempt Business Establishment From Unruh Act's Prohibition of Discrimination Based on Sexual Orientation

In North Coast Women's Care Medical Group, Inc. v. Superior Court (2008) 44 Cal. 4th 1145, 81 Cal. Rptr. 3d 708 , plaintiff, a lesbian, and her partner, wanted plaintiff to become pregnant, and they decided on intravaginal self-insemination, a nonmedical process in which a woman inserts sperm into her own vagina. They used sperm from a sperm bank, but after several unsuccessful efforts at pregnancy through this method, plaintiff was diagnosed with polycystic ovarian syndrome, a disorder characterized by irregular ovulation, and she was referred to defendant medical group for fertility treatment. Plaintiff and her partner first met one defendant, an obstetrician and gynecologist employed by the medical group, and plaintiff mentioned that she was a lesbian. The doctor explained that at some point intrauterine insemination (IUI) might have to be considered, in which a physician threads a catheter through the patient's cervix and inserts semen through the catheter into the patient's uterus. The doctor said that if IUI became necessary, her religious beliefs would preclude her from performing the procedure for plaintiff. The doctor testified that she told plaintiff another doctor at the medical group, also a defendant, shared her religious objection to performing IUI for an unmarried woman, but either of two other physicians at the medical group could do the procedure for plaintiff. According to plaintiff, however, the doctor said that she was the only medical group physician with a religious objection to performing IUI for plaintiff, and all other members of her practice, whom she believed lacked her bias, would be available to do the procedure. The doctor proceeded to treat plaintiff for infertility primarily through an ovulation-inducing medication, followed by plaintiff's use of intravaginal self-insemination with sperm obtained from a sperm bank, as well as other tests and procedures to determine the cause of plaintiff's infertility. Plaintiff then decided, "with the advice and consent" the doctor, to try IUI, but to use a friend's fresh sperm rather than sperm from a sperm bank. When plaintiff told the doctor she wanted to use her friend's donated fresh sperm, the doctor responded that it would pose a problem for the medical group, because its physicians performed IUI either with fresh sperm provided by a patient's husband or sperm from a sperm bank, but never with fresh sperm donated by a patient's friend. To do so might delay the procedure as the medical group would first have to confirm that its protocols pertaining to donated fresh sperm would satisfy the requirements of its state tissue bank license and the federal Clinical Laboratory Improvement Amendments of 1988 (42 U.S.C. § 263). Plaintiff then opted to have the IUI with sperm from a sperm bank. The doctor so noted in plaintiff's medical records and left for an out-of-state vacation. During her absence, her colleague took over plaintiff's medical care. He was unaware of the first doctor's notation of plaintiff's decision not to use her friend's fresh sperm for the IUI, because the secretary who typed that notation in plaintiff's file left it in the first doctor's in-box awaiting her return from vacation. Thus, he mistakenly believed that plaintiff intended to have IUI with fresh sperm donated by a friend, which (even when provided by a patient's husband) requires preparation before it can be used for IUI, and licensure is necessary to do the requisite sperm preparation. Only this doctor was licensed to perform these tasks, but he refused to prepare donated fresh sperm for plaintiff because of his religious objection. He referred plaintiff to a physician outside the medical group's medical practice, who performed an IUI, but plaintiff was unable to conceive until that doctor performed in vitro fertilization. Plaintiff sued the medical group and the two physicians seeking damages and injunctive relief on several theories, including sexual orientation discrimination in violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Defendants' answer asserted a variety of affirmative defenses, including that defendants' alleged misconduct, if any, was protected by the rights of free speech and freedom of religion set forth in the federal and state Constitutions. Plaintiff moved for summary adjudication of the defense. The trial court granted the motion, ruling that neither the federal nor the state Constitution provided a religious defense to a claim of sexual orientation discrimination under the Unruh Civil Rights Act. Defendants challenged that ruling through a petition for writ of mandate in the Court of Appeal, which court granted the petition with respect to the two physician defendants only, thereby allowing them to later assert at trial that their constitutional rights of free speech and religious freedom exempted them from complying with the Unruh Civil Rights Act's prohibition against sexual orientation discrimination (44 Cal. 4th 1145, 1150-1153) .

The California Supreme Court granted plaintiff's petition for review, and set aside the Court of Appeal's decision. The Court found first that a medical group providing medical services to the public is a business establishment for purposes of the Unruh Act. Further, although during the relevant period, the Unruh Act did not list sexual orientation as a prohibited basis for discrimination, California's reviewing courts had, in a variety of contexts, described the Act as prohibiting sexual orientation discrimination (see Harris v. Capital Growth Investors XIV (1991) 52 Cal.3d 1142, 1155, 278 Cal. Rptr. 614, 805 P.2d 873 ; see also Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1998) 17 Cal.4th 670, 703, 72 Cal. Rptr. 2d 410, 952 P.2d 218 (conc. opn. of Mosk, J.); Stoumen v. Reilly (1951) 37 Cal.2d 713, 716, 234 P.2d 969 ; Rolon v. Kulwitzky (1984) 153 Cal. App.3d 289, 292, 200 Cal. Rptr. 217 ; Hubert v. Williams (1982) 133 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1, 5, 184 Cal. Rptr. 161). The Court then held that the First Amendment's right to the free exercise of religion does not relieve an individual of the obligation to comply with a valid and neutral law of general applicability on the ground that the law proscribes or prescribes conduct that the individual's religion prescribes or proscribes (see Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah (1993) 508 U.S. 520, 531, 113 S. Ct. 2217, 124 L. Ed. 2d 472 ; Employment Div., Ore. Dept. of Human Res. v. Smith (1990) 494 U.S. 872, 879, 110 S. Ct. 1595, 108 L. Ed. 2d 876 ; Catholic Charities of Sacramento, Inc. v. Superior Court (2004) 32 Cal.4th 527, 549, 10 Cal. Rptr. 3d 283, 85 P.3d 67), and that the Unruh Act is a valid and neutral law of general applicability because it requires business establishments to provide full and equal accommodations, advantages, facilities, privileges, or services to all persons notwithstanding their sexual orientation, so that the First Amendment's right to the free exercise of religion did not exempt defendant physicians from conforming their conduct to the Act's antidiscrimination requirements even if compliance posed an incidental conflict with their religious beliefs (44 Cal. 4th 1145, 1154-1157) . Defendants did not have a hybrid claim based on their allegation of interference with a combination of their First Amendment rights to free speech and to freely exercise their religion, because the Unruh Act imposes on business establishments certain antidiscrimination obligations, precluding any such establishment or its agents from telling patrons that it will not comply with the Act, and notwithstanding these statutory obligations, defendant physicians remained free to voice their objections, religious or otherwise, to the Act's prohibition against sexual orientation discrimination (44 Cal. 4th 1145, 1157) . Any conduct by plaintiff that impinged on the defendant physicians' First Amendment rights did not fall within the ambit of the First Amendment because plaintiff is a private citizen (44 Cal. 4th 1145, 1157) . Defendants' claim also failed under the California Constitution's protection of religion, because the substantial burden imposed on their religious beliefs by the Unruh Act's prohibition against sexual orientation discrimination was insufficient to allow them to engage in such discrimination. To avoid any conflict between their religious beliefs and the Unruh Act's antidiscrimination provisions, defendant physicians could simply refuse to perform the IUI medical procedure for any patient of the medical group. Or, because they would incur liability under the Act if they infringed upon the right to the full and equal services of the medical practice, they could avoid a conflict by ensuring that every patient requiring IUI received full and equal access to the procedure through a physician employed by the medical group lacking their religious objections (44 Cal. 4th 1145, 1158-1160) .

The Court of Appeal had concluded that summary adjudication of the affirmative defense was improper as to the defendant physicians because it effectively precluded them from presenting any evidence at trial that their refusal to perform IUI for plaintiff was based on their religious beliefs regarding the propriety of performing the procedure for unmarried women, which the Court of Appeal further concluded was not prohibited by the Act at the time of their refusal. However, in granting plaintiff's motion for summary adjudication of the affirmative defense, the trial court did not at all preclude defendant physicians from later offering evidence at trial of their religious grounds for refusing to perform the medical procedure for plaintiff because of her marital status as an unmarried woman rather than her sexual orientation as a lesbian. Thus, the trial court's ruling left defendant physicians free to later offer evidence at trial that their religious objections were to participating in the medical insemination of an unmarried woman and were not based on plaintiff's sexual orientation. The trial court's ruling simply narrowed the issues by disposing of defendants' contention that their constitutional rights to free speech and the free exercise of religion exempt them from complying with the Unruh Act's prohibition against sexual orientation discrimination. In concluding to the contrary, the Court of Appeal erred (44 Cal. 4th 1145, 1160-1161) .

§ 35A.02 Governing Law

The right to equal protection of the law is protected by the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution [U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 1] and the California Constitution [Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a)] from abuse by state action. The guarantee of equal protection in regard to action of the federal government is provided by the due process clause in the Fifth Amendment [U.S. Const., amend. V].

A petition for a writ of mandate is governed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1084 et seq. Causes of action in state or federal court for damages or other forms of relief for certain deprivations of the right to equal protection protected by the United States Constitution are provided in 42 U.S.C. §§ 1983, 1985(3).

Before being amended in 1974 to provide specifically that a person may not be denied equal protection of the laws [Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a)], the California Constitution did not provide a specific guarantee of equal protection under the laws. Instead, equal protection arguments were framed under former Cal. Const., art. I, § 11 (now Cal. Const., art. IV, § 16(a)), providing that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and under former Cal. Const., art. I, § 21 (now Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(b)), providing that no citizen or class of citizens shall be granted privileges or immunities which on the same terms are not granted to all citizens.

3-35A California Points & Authorities § 35A.03

§ 35A.03 Equal Protection Analysis

The United States Supreme Court and the California Supreme Court follow a so-called "two-tier" approach to equal protection challenges. At a minimum, a statutory classification or other form of state action must bear some rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose [In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 232, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931 (1971)] . Statutes that classify and impose differing procedural requirements on litigants are generally valid if the classification is supported by a rational basis [Fitzgerald v. Racing Ass'n of Central Iowa (2003) 539 U.S. 103, 123 S. Ct. 2156, 2159-2161, 156 L. Ed. 2d 97 (difference in state tax rates between slot machines at race tracks and slot machines on riverboats is subject to rational basis review); People v. Health Laboratories of North America, Inc. (2001) 87 Cal. App. 4th 442, 449, 104 Cal. Rptr. 2d 618 (exemption in Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16(d) of public prosecutors' enforcement actions from anti-SLAPP motions bears directly on furthering state's legitimate interest of allowing prosecutors to pursue actions to enforce laws unencumbered by delay, intimidation, or distraction)].

Equal protection claims may be brought by a "class of one" when the plaintiffalleges that he or she was intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment [Village of Willowbrook v. Olech (2000) 528 U.S. 562, 564, 120 S. Ct. 1073, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1060 (per curiam); see Genesis Environmental Services v. San Joaquin Valley Unified Air Pollution Control Dist. (2003) 113 Cal. App. 4th 597, 604-608, 6 Cal. Rptr. 3d 574 (plaintiff sufficiently alleged equal protection claim for class of one by alleging plaintiff was treated differently from similarly situated persons, difference in treatment was intentional, and there was no rational basis for difference in treatment)]. Although the latitude given state economic and social regulation is necessarily broad, when the classifications employed in state action approach sensitive and fundamental personal rights, the courts exercise a stricter scrutiny [Trimble v. Gordon (1977) 430 U.S. 762, 766-767, 97 S. Ct. 1459, 52 L. Ed. 2d 31] . As stated in several cases, if state action classifies individuals on the basis of a suspect category, such as race or ancestry, or infringes a fundamental interest, such as the right to liberty, it is subject to strict judicial scrutiny [see, e.g., Graham v. Richardson (1971) 403 U.S. 365, 371-372, 375-376, 91 S. Ct. 1848, 29 L. Ed. 2d 534 ; Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist., No. 1 (9th Cir. 2004) 377 F.3d 949, 960 ; Hunter v. Regents of the University of California (9th Cir. 1999) 190 F.3d 1061, 1063 (race); In re Marriage Cases (2008) 43 Cal. 4th 757, 783-784, 76 Cal. Rptr. 3d 683 (sexual orientation as suspect class and interest in family relationship as fundamental); People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 243, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375] . If a classification is subject to strict scrutiny, the presumption of constitutionality is abandoned and the defenders of state action have the burden of justification. They must show that the state action serves a compelling state interest and that there are no other reasonable, less intrusive means by which the interest can be served [Examining Bd. v. Flores de Otero (1976) 426 U.S. 572, 602, 605, 96 S. Ct. 2264, 49 L. Ed. 2d 65 ; Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School Dist., No. 1 (9th Cir. 2004) 377 F.3d 949, 960 ; Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 664, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438] .

No matter which tier or test is used, the same test must be applied to similarly situated persons [see Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center (1985) 473 U.S. 432, 439, 105 S. Ct. 3249, 87 L. Ed. 2d 313 (indicating that Equal Protection Clause requires same treatment of "similarly situated" persons); Fajardo v. City of Los Angeles (9th Cir. 1999) 179 F.3d 698, 700 (in determining whether city policy of treating domestic violence 911 calls differently from non-domestic violence calls, critical issue is not whether domestic violence rarely results in death or severe injury, but whether domestic-violence crimes result in severe injury or death less frequently than non-domestic-violence crimes that are considered 911 emergencies)].

CHAPTER 35A CIVIL RIGHTS: EQUAL PROTECTION
PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-35A California Points & Authorities § 35A.04

§ 35A.04 Meaning of Rational Basis

[1] Introduction to "Rational Relationship" Test

Every classification contained in state action must bear some rational relationship to a legitimate state purpose. The "rational relationship" standard generally defers to state action and is usually employed to justify state action [Fitzgerald v. Racing Ass'n of Central Iowa (2003) 539 U.S. 103, 123 S. Ct. 2156, 2159, 156 L. Ed. 2d 97 (rational basis review especially deferential in context of complex tax laws); Nordlinger v. Hahn (1992) 505 U.S. 1, 11, 112 S. Ct. 2326, 120 L. Ed. 2d 1] . Thus, a classification subjected to the rational relationship test does not deny equal protection if any set of facts may reasonably be conceived in its justification [McGowan v. Maryland (1961) 366 U.S. 420, 426, 81 S. Ct. 1101, 6 L. Ed. 2d 393 ; Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438] . A classification is constitutionally infirm only if so unrelated to the achievement of any combination of legitimate purposes that we can only conclude that the legislature's actions were irrational [Conservatorship of Edde (2009) 173 Cal. App. 4th 883, 890-898, 93 Cal. Rptr. 3d 266 (Welf. & Inst. Code § 7275 did not violate equal protection when applied to allow state to seek reimbursement for cost of commitment to state hospital from conservatorship estate of pretrial detainee found not competent to stand trial, even though state could not seek reimbursement for commitment after criminal adjudication, where there was rational basis for distinguishing between them); see also Vance v. Bradley (1979) 440 U.S. 93, 97, 99 S. Ct. 939, 59 L. Ed. 2d 171] .

Even improvident decisions of a political branch will eventually be rectified by the democratic process so that judicial intervention is generally unwarranted, no matter how unwisely the court may think the political branch has acted [Nordlinger v. Hahn (1992) 505 U.S. 1, 17-18, 112 S. Ct. 2326, 120 L. Ed. 2d 1 ; County of San Diego v. Brown (1993) 19 Cal. App. 4th 1054, 1081 n.36, 23 Cal. Rptr. 2d 819] . The courts may not properly strike down a statute simply because they disagree with the wisdom of the law or because they believe there is a fairer method for dealing with the problem [Fein v. Permanente Medical Group (1985) 38 Cal. 3d 137, 163, 211 Cal. Rptr. 368, 695 P.2d 665 , appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892, 106 S. Ct. 214, 88 L. Ed. 2d 215 ; County of San Diego v. Brown (1993) 19 Cal. App. 4th 1054, 1081 n.36, 23 Cal. Rptr. 2d 819 ; see also Schweiker v. Wilson (1981) 450 U.S. 221, 235, 101 S. Ct. 1074, 67 L. Ed. 2d 186 (as long as classificatory scheme chosen by legislative body rationally advances reasonable and identifiable governmental objective, court must disregard existence of other methods of allocation that judges, as individuals, would have preferred)].

On the other hand, both the United States and the California Supreme Courts have stated the rational relationship test in what would appear to be more vigorous ways. Several decisions refer to the language of Royster Guano Co. v. Virginia (1920) 253 U.S. 412, 415, 40 S. Ct. 560, 64 L. Ed. 989 , which held that a classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest on some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation so that all persons similarly circumstanced are treated alike [see, e.g., Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972) 405 U.S. 438, 448, 92 S. Ct. 1029, 31 L. Ed. 2d 349 ; Brown v. Merlo (1973) 8 Cal. 3d 855, 106 Cal. Rptr. 388, 506 P.2d 212] .

While acknowledging that neither California cases nor those of the United States Supreme Court have settled on a particular verbal formula to describe the "restrained" equal protection standard of review, the California Supreme Court has stated that all of the various linguistic formulations of the test require the court to conduct a serious and genuine judicial inquiry into the correspondence between the classification and the legislative goals [Cooper v. Bray (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 841, 848, 148 Cal. Rptr. 148, 582 P.2d 604 , citing Newland v. Board of Governors of Cal. Community Colleges (1977) 19 Cal. 3d 705, 711, 139 Cal. Rptr. 620, 566 P.2d 254 ; Fein v. Permanente Medical Group (1985) 38 Cal. 3d 137, 163, 211 Cal. Rptr. 368, 695 P.2d 665 , appeal dismissed, 474 U.S. 892, 106 S. Ct. 214, 88 L. Ed. 2d 215] .

The United States Supreme Court has also developed a more assertive interpretation of the rational relationship test in cases involving illegitimacy and gender, categories which are similar to a suspect category in terms of immutability and stigma of inferiority; indeed, gender is a suspect category under the California Constitution [see Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 18-20, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529] . When a classification involves illegitimacy, the Court will give equal consideration to both the legitimate interests promoted by the classification and the fundamental personal rights which it endangers, and analyze the state's objectives to see how well they justify the classification under challenge [Trimble v. Gordon (1977) 430 U.S. 762, 773-774, 97 S. Ct. 1459, 52 L. Ed. 2d 31 ; Weber v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. (1972) 406 U.S. 164, 172-173, 92 S. Ct. 1400, 31 L. Ed. 2d 768] . When a classification involves gender, it will not withstand a constitutional challenge unless it serves important governmental objectives and is substantially related to achievement of those objectives [Craig v. Boren (1976) 429 U.S. 190, 197, 97 S. Ct. 451, 50 L. Ed. 2d 397] . It is unclear if the U.S. Supreme Court will expand the cases to which this more assertive standard has been applied. Specifically, the Court has declined to treat age as either a suspect category or one subject to its more assertive interpretation of the rational relationship test [see Massachusetts Bd. of Retirement v. Murgia (1976) 427 U.S. 307, 312-315, 96 S. Ct. 2562, 49 L. Ed. 2d 520] . Similarly, courts have declined to treat homosexuals as a suspect or quasi-suspect class [see Romer v. Evans (1996) 517 U.S. 620, 116 S. Ct. 1620, 1626-1627, 134 L. Ed. 2d 855 (applying rational basis review, without specifically determining which standard was applicable, in upholding challenge to Colorado's Amendment 2, which prohibited state or local legislative, executive, or judicial action designed to protect homosexuals); Holmes v. California Army Nat. Guard (9th Cir. 1997) 124 F.3d 1126, 1132 (applying rational basis review in rejecting challenge under U.S. Const., Amend. V to military's statutory "don't ask/don't tell" policy)].

Existence of these various levels of application of the rational relationship test has led to criticism of the Court's two-tier approach [see § 35A.04[4]].

[2] Effect on Fundamental Interest

In San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 17, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , the U.S. Supreme Court stated that when a classification impinges upon a fundamental interest, it is subject to strict judicial scrutiny. This language makes it clear that strict scrutiny does not require a total deprival of a fundamental right, but does not explain how great the burden must be before strict scrutiny will be invoked. Some decisions show awareness of the question. For example, in Bullock v. Carter (1972) 405 U.S. 134, 144, 92 S. Ct. 849, 31 L. Ed. 2d 92 , the Court noted that not every limitation or incidental burden on the exercise of voting rights would require the more stringent standard of review; a classification must have a real and appreciable impact on the exercise of the franchise. In many decisions, however, the extent of the burden required is not clear from the language used. It is arguable that almost any interference is sufficient since courts have stated that strict scrutiny is appropriate if the classification touches on or affects a fundamental interest or has an impact on the ability to exercise it [see McDonald v. Bd. of Election Com. of Chicago (1969) 394 U.S. 802, 807, 89 S. Ct. 1404, 22 L. Ed. 2d 739 ; People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 243, 251, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375] . However, other decisions would appear to require a greater impact and characterize the classification as one that invades, restricts, infringes on, or intrudes on a fundamental interest [see McDonald v. Bd. of Election Com. of Chicago (1969) 394 U.S. 802, 807, 89 S. Ct. 1404, 22 L. Ed. 2d 739 ; In re Antazo (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 100, 114, 89 Cal. Rptr. 255, 473 P.2d 999] .

The forms of points and authorities in this chapter generally use the word "burden" to describe a significant impact on a fundamental interest which is sufficient to require use of the strict scrutiny test unless the decision clearly suggests more specific language. But to fully determine the degree of interference that is required for strict scrutiny, counsel must examine both the language of the decisions and the factual context in which it is applied.

[3] Based on Suspect Category

For a classification to merit some form of heightened scrutiny because of the way it affects individuals with particular personal characteristics, it must in some sense classify them on the "basis" of such characteristics. Thus, in Califano v. Boles (1979) 443 U.S. 282, 293-295, 99 S. Ct. 2767, 61 L. Ed. 2d 541 , the majority, noting that proper classification for purposes of equal protection analysis is not an exact science, concluded that the challenged legislation did not discriminate against illegitimate children as a class because the legislation's effect was too speculative and incidental to establish that the class would suffer significant deprivation of a benefit or imposition of a substantial burden [Califano v. Boles (1979) 443 U.S. 282, 293-295, 99 S. Ct. 2767, 61 L. Ed. 2d 541] . In contrast, the minority concluded that the classification in question was "based" on illegitimacy because the statute was designed to aid children, yet totally excluded illegitimate children from its benefits [Califano v. Boles (1979) 443 U.S. 282, 303-304, 99 S. Ct. 2767, 61 L. Ed. 2d 541 (Marshall, J., dissenting)].

[4] Criticism of Two-Tier Model

The two-tier model which appears to place equal protection cases into one of two distinct categories that dictate the appropriate standard of review has been criticized as too rigid an approach to equal protection analysis [see San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 98, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1919, 36 L. Ed. 2d 418 (Marshall, J., dissenting)]. The basic criticism is that use of the two-tier test inhibits the growth of the equal protection doctrine and obscures what the United States Supreme Court really does in many equal protection cases. In this view, because the Court by creating a new suspect category or fundamental interest greatly expands the types of state action that are vulnerable to constitutional attack, since strict scrutiny generally leads to invalidation [see Massachusetts Bd. of Retirement v. Murgia (1976) 427 U.S. 307, 319, 96 S. Ct. 2562, 49 L. Ed. 2d 520 (Marshall, J., dissenting)], it has shown a marked inhibition to expand the number of protected categories and interests [see, e.g., San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 34-35, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1919, 36 L. Ed. 2d 418 (education not fundamental interest); Massachusetts Bd. of Retirement v. Murgia (1976) 427 U.S. 307, 324-325, 96 S. Ct. 2562, 49 L. Ed. 2d 520 (state employment not fundamental interest; age not suspect category)]. On the other hand, it has subjected certain classifications to a level of scrutiny that goes beyond the rational relationship test. Thus, illegitimacy is not a suspect category but the analysis given to classifications affecting illegitimate persons more strictly scrutinizes the classifications than would be true under the rational relationship test [Trimble v. Gordon (1977) 430 U.S. 762, 767, 97 S. Ct. 1459, 52 L. Ed. 2d 31 ; see § 35A.04[1]]. Justice Marshall in dissent claimed that the Court focuses its real analysis not on the two-tier test but on the character of the classification in question, the relative importance to individuals in the class discriminated against of the governmental benefits that they do not receive, and the asserted state interestsin support of the classification [see San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 99, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1919, 36 L. Ed. 2d 418 (Marshall, J., dissenting); Massachusetts Bd. of Retirement v. Murgia (1976) 427 U.S. 307, 320, 96 S. Ct. 2562, 49 L. Ed. 2d 520 (Marshall, J., dissenting)].

Although the California Supreme Court has not commented on this critical view of the two-tier test, it does not appear to have inhibited the expansion of equal protection analysis in holding state action unconstitutional, because unlike the United States Supreme Court, the state Supreme Court has indicated a willingness to expand the number of protected interests under the two-tier test [see, e.g., Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 21, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 (gender is suspect category); Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 766, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) (education is fundamental interest); Woods v. Horton (2008) 167 Cal. App. 4th 658, 673-679, 84 Cal. Rptr. 3d 332 (gender is suspect class, holding domestic violence programs that provided services to women but not to men violated men's equal protection rights, but men were not similarly situated to women for the purpose of statutorily-based alternative-sentencing and community treatment programs for inmate mothers)].

CHAPTER 35A CIVIL RIGHTS: EQUAL PROTECTION
PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-35A California Points & Authorities § 35A.05

§ 35A.05 Raising Constitutional Issues by Writ of Mandate

In a proceeding for writ of mandate, the petitioner must be a party beneficially interested in issuance of the writ [Code Civ. Proc. § 1086]. The general rule is that a beneficial interest exists where the writ is necessary to prevent substantial damage to an interest or right of petitioner which is independent of those interests or rights held in common with the public at large [Fuller v. San Bernardino Valley Mun. Wat. Dist. (1966) 242 Cal. App. 2d 52, 56-57, 51 Cal. Rptr. 120] . A separate set of legal principles exists for determining when an individual has standing to challenge the constitutionality of state action for a violation of equal protection. The general rule is that the party attacking the constitutionality of a statute or official action must show an actual or threatened injury, and where a statute discriminates against a class, only a member of the class discriminated against may attack it [Burns v. State Compensation Ins. Fund (1968) 265 Cal. App. 2d 98, 104, 71 Cal. Rptr. 326] . Both these rules have been relaxed in recent years in cases involving public duties and important social consequences [Residents of Beverly Glen, Inc. v. Los Angeles (1973) 34 Cal. App. 3d 117, 121, 109 Cal. Rptr. 724 ; American Friends Serv. Comm. v. Procunier (1973) 33 Cal. App. 3d 252, 256, 109 Cal. Rptr. 22] . Moreover, California courts are not bound by stricter federal standards of justiciability [see, e.g., White v. Davis (1975) 13 Cal. 3d 757, 764, 120 Cal. Rptr. 94, 533 P.2d 222 ; McDonald v. Stockton Metropolitan Transit Dist. (1973) 36 Cal. App. 3d 436, 440 n.4, 111 Cal. Rptr. 637] .

The decisions, however, do not explain the relationship between a beneficial interest sufficient to allow a petition for writ of mandate and an interest sufficient to support standing to raise a constitutional issue. Some decisions have applied the rule governing standing in nonmandate cases to determine both the existence of a beneficial interest and ability to raise a constitutional issue in a petition for mandate [see, e.g., Bozung v. Local Agency Formation Comm'n (1975) 13 Cal. 3d 263, 272, 118 Cal. Rptr. 249, 529 P.2d 1017 (rule of standing under federal Administrative Procedure Act applied in petition for mandate not involving constitutional issue); Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 6 n.1, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 (rule of standing under federal Constitution applied in petition for writ of mandate involving constitutional issue)]. It would thus appear that if a beneficial interest is sufficient to support a petition for writ of mandate, it is sufficient to permit raising the constitutional issue. Mandate is proper to challenge the constitutionality or validity of statutes or official acts [Jolicoeur v. Mihaly (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 565, 570 n.2, 96 Cal. Rptr. 697, 488 P.2d 1] , and it is unlikely that constitutionality can be questioned in some situations where an individual has a beneficial interest entitling him or her to sue for a writ but not in others. On the other hand, in Rubio v. Superior Court (1979) 24 Cal. 3d 93, 101-103, 154 Cal. Rptr. 734, 593 P.2d 595 , the Supreme Court found that a petitioner who was a person beneficially interested in the issuance of a writ of prohibition [see Code Civ. Proc. § 1103] had standing to raise some constitutional issues but not others under the applicable rules of standing to raise constitutional challenges. The import of Rubio is that the Court did not foreclose treating the beneficial interest and standing questions as legally distinct if the petitioner's relationship to the constitutional issue is too remote to warrant a challenge.

The memoranda of points and authorities in this chapter that describe when a petitioner has a beneficial interest to petition for a writ of mandate raising an equal protection issue rely, where possible, on authorities that adjudicate the beneficial interest question and involve a constitutional challenge. If there are none, the memoranda rely on either authorities defining when a beneficial interest exists or authorities that do not involve writs of mandate but define when standing to raise a constitutional issue exists.

PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-35A California Points & Authorities § 35A.06

§ 35A.06 Related Uses

The forms of points and authorities in this chapter may be used with appropriate modification to support claims that equal protection has been denied one who has been restrained or imprisoned in a petition for writ of habeas corpus challenging the constitutionality of the restraint or imprisonment [Penal Code § 1473(a); see, e.g., In re Antazo (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 100, 107-108, 89 Cal. Rptr. 255, 473 P.2d 999 ; In re Young (1973) 32 Cal. App. 3d 68, 70-71, 107 Cal. Rptr. 915] . Although neither the Code of Civil Procedure nor the California Rules of Court expressly authorize or require that points and authorities be filed in support of a petition for awrit of habeas corpus, it is advisable to file the memoranda when time and circumstances permit.

Moreover, the forms of points and authorities in this chapter may be used with appropriate modifications to support a petition for writ of mandate to review an administrative decision [Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5]. A constitutional challenge on equal protection grounds to the validity of an agency's enabling act or its application could be the basis for a claim that an agency has proceeded without, or in excess of, jurisdiction, has committed a prejudicial abuse of discretion by not proceeding in the manner required by law, or has unlawfully precluded the petitioner from the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which the petitioner is entitled [see Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1094.5; see also Walker v. Munro (1960) 178 Cal. App. 2d 67, 74-75, 2 Cal. Rptr. 737 (raising issue of constitutionality of statute enforced by agency to challenge jurisdiction)].

Equal protection claims may also be relevant to actions in state court for declaratory relief [Code Civ. Proc. § 1060] challenging the validity of a statute or ordinance on the ground that it violates the guarantee of equal protection. The points and authorities provided in this chapter could be used with appropriate modifications in such an action to oppose a demurrer or a motion for summary judgment (or comparable motion) arguing that a violation of equal protection has not been shown.

Equal protection may be raised in state court by actions for damages or other forms of relief for deprivation of constitutional rights under two of the post-Civil War civil rights statutes [42 U.S.C. §§ 1983, 1985(3); see Williams v. Horvath (1976) 16 Cal. 3d 834, 837, 129 Cal. Rptr. 453, 548 P.2d 1125] . The points and authorities provided in this chapter which interpret the federal Constitution could be used with appropriate modifications in such proceedings to oppose a demurrer or a motion for summary judgment (or comparable motion), arguing that a violation of equal protection has not been shown.

In federal court, an application for a writ of habeas corpus based on the claim that the applicant is in custody in violation of the United States Constitution may raise an equal protection issue. Support of the application by a memorandum of points and authorities, while not required, would be appropriate [see 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3)]. Furthermore, whenever any civil claim based on a denial of equal protection under the federal Constitution is contested by motions for dismissal for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted, for judgment on the pleadings, or for summary judgment [Fed. R. Civ. P., Rules 12(b)(6), (c), 56], points and authorities in some form opposing such motions are recommended in federal district courts in California [see U.S. Dist. Ct., East Dist. of Cal., Rule 113(e); U.S. Dist. Ct., No. Dist. of Cal., Rule 220-2; U.S. Dist. Ct., Cen. Dist. of Cal., Rule 3(e)(2); U.S. Dist. Ct., So. Dist. of Cal., Rule 3(e)(1)(b) (requiring that such motions be supported by points and authorities)]. The points and authorities provided in this chapter which interpret the federal Constitution could be used with appropriate modifications to oppose any motion which states that a violation of equal protection has not been shown or to support a writ of habeas corpus.

THE COURT SHOULD GRANT THE WRIT OF MANDATE BECAUSE THE STATE'S CLASSIFICATION VIOLATES THE PETITIONER'S RIGHT TO EQUAL PROTECTION IN THAT IT IS _____ [ARBITRARY or, if classification is based on suspect category or infringes a fundamental interest, NOT JUSTIFIED BY A COMPELLING GOVERNMENTAL INTEREST].

A. Availability of Writ of Mandate. A writ of mandate may issue from any court to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person to compel the performance of an act which the law specifically enjoins as a duty from an office, trust, or station or to compel the admission of a party to the use and enjoyment of a right or office to which the party is entitled and from which the party is unlawfully precluded. The writ must be issued in all cases where there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086).

B. Challenging Constitutionality of State Action by Writ of Mandate. State action may be challenged on constitutional grounds in a petition for writ of mandate, and if the state action is found to be unconstitutional, a writ of mandate will issue to compel action in conformity with constitutional requirements (Jolicoeur v. Mihaly (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 565, 570 n.2, 96 Cal. Rptr. 697, 488 P.2d 1 ; Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 7, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 ; Floresta, Inc. v. City Council of San Leandro (1961) 190 Cal. App. 2d 599, 612, 12 Cal. Rptr. 182).

[Memoranda of points and authorities which describe standing to raise constitutional issues by writ of mandate are set out in §§ 35A.22 -35A.25.]

C. Scope of State Action. State action occurs when there is any action by an agency or instrumentality of the state and its political subdivisions including action which is legislative, judicial, executive, or administrative as well as private conduct which is entwined with government involvement, support, or encouragement (Avery v. Midland County (1968) 390 U.S. 474, 479-480, 88 S. Ct. 1114, 20 L. Ed. 2d 45 ; Cooper v. Aaron (1958) 358 U.S. 1, 16-17, 78 S. Ct. 1401, 3 L. Ed. 2d 5 ; Crawford v. Board of Educ. (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 280, 289-292, 130 Cal. Rptr. 724, 551 P.2d 28 ; Murguia v. Municipal Court (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 286, 294, 124 Cal. Rptr. 204, 540 P.2d 44 ; Adams v. Department of Motor Vehicles (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 146, 153-154, 113 Cal. Rptr. 145, 520 P.2d 961).

D. Challenging Constitutionality of State Action on Equal Protection Grounds. State action that classifies individuals is limited by the guarantee of equal protection in the federal Constitution, which provides that no state may deny to any persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws (U.S. Const., Amend. XIV, § 1), and as an independent ground which may provide additional guarantees, the state Constitution, which provides that no person may be denied equal protection of the laws (Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a); Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 764-765, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907, 97 S. Ct. 2951, 53 L. Ed. 2d 1079 (1977)) .

[Memoranda of points and authorities describing types of classifications are set out in §§ 35A.26, 35A.27.]

[EITHER, to emphasize test as basis for judicial analysis]

E. State Action Based on Arbitrary Classification as Violation of Equal Protection. Any state action that classifies individualsviolates the guarantee of equal protection unless the classification is reasonable, not arbitrary, and the differentiation created by the classification has a fair and substantial relation to the purpose of the state action (Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972) 405 U.S. 438, 448, 92 S. Ct. 1029, 31 L. Ed. 2d 349 ; Brown v. Merlo (1973) 8 Cal. 3d 855, 861, 106 Cal. Rptr. 388, 506 P.2d 212).

[OR, to state traditional deferential test]

E. State Action Based on Arbitrary Classification as Violation of Equal Protection. Any state action that classifies individuals violates the guarantee of equal protection unless the classification bears a rational relationship to a legitimate public purpose (D'Amico v. Board of Medical Examiners (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 1, 16, 22-23, 112 Cal. Rptr. 786, 520 P.2d 10 ; In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 232, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931, 91 S. Ct. 2249, 29 L. Ed. 2d 709 (1971)) .

[A memoranda of points and authorities describing a legitimate public purpose is set out in § 35A.28.]

F. State Action Based on Suspect Category or Burdening Fundamental Interest as Subject to Strict Scrutiny. If state action classifies individuals on the basis of a suspect category or burdens a fundamental interest, it is subject to strict judicial scrutiny even though it is not arbitrary (Graham v. Richardson (1971) 403 U.S. 365, 371-372, 375-376, 91 S. Ct. 1848, 29 L. Ed. 2d 534 ; People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 243, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375).

[Memoranda of points and authorities describing suspect categories are set out in §§ 35A.29 -35A.34; memoranda of points and authorities describing fundamental interests are set out in §§ 35A.35 -35A.44.]

G. Nature of Suspect Category. A category is suspect when it is based on a characteristic of individuals which is immutable and bears no relationship to ability to perform or contribute to society, or has been historically identified as subject to the stigma of inferiority and second class citizenship (Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 19-21, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529).

H. Nature of Fundamental Interest. A fundamental interest is a personal right or liberty which is basic to the concept of a free and representative form of government or essential to the individual in economic or human terms (Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 767-768, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907, 97 S. Ct. 2951, 53 L. Ed. 2d 1079 (1977) (interpretation of California Constitution); Bixby v. Pierno (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 130, 144-145, 93 Cal. Rptr. 234, 481 P.2d 242).

I. State Action Subject to Strict Scrutiny as Violation of Equal Protection Unless Justified. If state action is subject to strict judicial scrutiny, it will be held to violate the guarantee of equal protection unless its defenders can establish that the state action serves a compelling state interest and that there are no reasonable, less intrusive means by which its purpose can be achieved (San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 16-17, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959 ; Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 664, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438).

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds.

The form presents an outline of an equal protection argument in terms of five general steps as follows:

- State action is present;
- The state action classifies individuals;
- The classification is arbitrary and therefore violates equal protection;
- Even if the classification is not arbitrary, it is based on a suspect category such as race or infringes a fundamental interest and therefore is subject to strict judicial scrutiny; and
- Because the classification is subject to strict judicial scrutiny, it violates equal protection unless it can be justified by those who defend it.

These steps are intended to be primarily a foundation for the development of equal protection arguments. In any particular instance, there will be some general principles that can be used as they are stated in this form and others that will require augmentation. Thus, the case may clearly involve discrimination because of race or alienage and the main question is whether it can be justified [see, e.g., University of Cal. Regents v. Bakke (1978) 438 U.S. 265, 98 S. Ct. 2733, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750 796 ; Foley v. Connelie (1978) 435 U.S. 291, 295-297, 98 S. Ct. 1067, 55 L. Ed. 2d 287] . Or, the case might present state action that is restrictive and difficult to justify, but the question is whether a suspect category or fundamental interest is present [see, e.g., Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 18-20, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 ; San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 28-29, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959] .

Although the form is intended to be primarily a foundation for the development of more complex equal protection arguments, it may be sufficient by itself in a particular case. Thus, if the main contention is that the classification contained in the state action is arbitrary, Paragraphs A-E may be a sufficient statement of the relevant legal principles since arbitrariness is usually shown by analysis of the facts rather than the law [see, e.g., Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972) 405 U.S. 438, 92 S. Ct. 1029, 31 L. Ed. 2d 349 , discussed in § 35A.20[3][d]; In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 232-233, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931 (1971) , discussed in § 35A.20[3][d]]. Similarly, if the main contention is that the classification contained in state action is based on a suspect category or infringes a fundamental interest that has not yet been defined by case law, Paragraphs A-D and F-I set out the relevant legal principles necessary to hold the classification unconstitutional.

The remaining forms in the chapter permit augmentation of the general principles stated in § 35A.20 on the following issues:

- Does the state action classify individuals [see §§ 35A.26, 35A.27]?
- Is the classification arbitrary [see § 35A.28]?
- Is a category used in a classification a suspect category [see §§ 35A.29 -35A.34]?
- Is an interest affected by a classification a fundamental interest and does the classification infringe it [see §§ 35A.35 -35A.44]?
- Is adequate justification offered for the classification [see §§ 35A.45 -35A.49]?

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Challenging Constitutionality of State Action by Writ of Mandate

In Jolicoeur v. Mihaly (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 565, 96 Cal. Rptr. 697, 488 P.2d 1 , petitioners invoked the original jurisdiction of the California Supreme Court to seek writs of mandate ordering respondent registrars of voters to register petitioners to vote. The Court granted the writ and held that both the U.S. Const., Amend. XXVI and California law required registrars of voters to treat all citizens 18 years of age or older alike for all purposes related to voting. The Court discussed the use of the remedy of mandate and cited several cases for the rule that mandamus is an appropriate method for challenging the constitutionality or validity of statutes or official acts.

In Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 , when the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control attempted to revoke the liquor licenses of bars that employed women bartenders in violation of former Bus. & Prof. Code § 25656, the licensees petitioned the California Supreme Court for a writ of mandate to prevent revocation of their licenses. They contended that former Bus. & Prof. Code § 25656, which prohibited women from tending bar unless they or their husbands held the liquor license but did not place a comparable limitation on male bartenders, violated the equal protection clauses of the federal and state Constitutions. In granting their request for a writ, the Court held in part that mandamus, like certiorari, was an appropriate writ for review, on constitutional grounds, of the exercise of quasi-judicial power by constitutionally authorized statewide agencies.

In Floresta, Inc. v. City Council of San Leandro (1961) 190 Cal. App. 2d 599, 12 Cal. Rptr. 182 , petitioner sought a writ of mandate and declaratory relief after the zoning board denied petitioner's application fora use permit to place a cocktail lounge in a shopping center. Although the court of appeal affirmed the trial court's decision to deny relief, it specifically approved petitioner's use of the remedy of mandamus. While mandamus is traditionally a procedure for reviewing the discretionary action of an administrative agency, it may also be invoked to challenge the constitutionality of ordinances and regulations.

[b] Scope of State Action

Avery v. Midland County (1968) 390 U.S. 474, 88 S. Ct. 1114, 20 L. Ed. 2d 45 , involved a constitutional challenge on equal protection grounds to the method of selecting members of the Commissioner's Court, a general governing body at the county level in Texas. The United States Supreme Court upheld the challenge and held that the Commissioner's Court was subject to the "one man-one vote" rule. The Court analyzed the basic issue as whether the Fourteenth Amendment, which the Court had previously held forbade the election of state legislators from districts of disproportionate population, also applies to the election of local government officials. It concluded that the equal protection clause reached the exercise of state power whether exercised directly or through subdivisions of the state. Although the forms and functions of local government and the relationship among the various units are matters of state concern, the Court held that these political subdivisions must comply with the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Cooper v. Aaron (1958) 358 U.S. 1, 78 S. Ct. 1401, 3 L. Ed. 2d 5, 79 Ohio Law Abs. 452 , a school board attempted to postpone implementation of a school desgregation plan. Although the federal district court granted the board's request, the court of appeals reversed, and the United States Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the court of appeals. One of the school board's arguments for postponement was that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the state government had increased the risk of violence and disorder by their opposition to desegregation. In response, the Court explained that opposition to desegregation also violated U.S. Const., amend. XIV. A state, the Court pointed out, must act through its legislative, executive, and judicial authorities for it can act in no other way. Whoever acts by virtue of a public position under a state government acts in the name of the state and for the state and is clothed with the state's power; thus, their action is that of the state.

In Crawford v. Board of Educ. (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 280, 130 Cal. Rptr. 724, 551 P.2d 28 , plaintiff brought a school desegregation action against defendant board of education. The trial court ordered defendant to prepare and implement a reasonably feasible plan for the desegregation of its schools, and defendant appealed. On appeal, defendant maintained that since the segregation in its schools was de facto in origin, it had no obligation under the equal protection clause to alleviate the racial and ethnic segregation which it conceded to exist. The state Supreme Court rejected this argument, holding that whatever the rule of law under the federal Constitution, the equal protection clause of the California Constitution [Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a)] requires a school board to take reasonably feasible steps to alleviate school segregation whether the segregation is de jure or de facto in nature and even where the segregation is the result of the application of facially neutral policies.

The first step in the Court's analysis was to determine that even if the origin or causes of school segregation could not be attributed to the school board, it was so "significantly involved" in the control, maintenance, and ongoing supervision of the system that the school segregation could be described as state action under the state's equal protection clause. In California, school boards possess plenary authority to determine school assignment policies, establish geographic attendance zones, determine the location, size, and neighborhood served by new schools, create or eliminate transfer options, and establish specialized programs that may attract particular students to particular schools. Given this pervasive control and continuing responsibility over the factors which determine the racial and ethnic school attendance pattern, the school could not claim that the resultant segregation was not the result of state action.

The subsequent amendment of the equal protection clause of the California Constitution in 1979 by Proposition 1 to prohibit school desegregation only where it is prohibited by the United States Constitution affects neither the definition of state action in Crawford nor the general availability of the state constitution as an independent ground for equal protection challenges [see Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 764-765, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) , discussed in § 35A.20[3][c]].

Murguia v. Municipal Court (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 286, 124 Cal. Rptr. 204, 540 P.2d 44 , involved a criminal prosecution in which defendant union members requested a discovery order to obtain information which would support their claim that various provisions of the Penal Code were being discriminatorily enforced against them. The trial court denied defendants's request, and they sought a writ of mandate directing the trial court to vacate its order. The California Supreme Court held that defendants were entitled to a discovery order because discriminatory enforcement of a criminal law by the executive branch of government in violation of the equal protection clause can provide a defense in a criminal prosecution, and traditional principles of criminal discovery require that defendants be permitted to discover information relevant to that defense. At the outset of its analysis, the Court emphasized that the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution did more than place limitations on the legislative branch of government. From the very inception of the Fourteenth Amendment, courts have recognized that the equal protection clause safeguards individuals from all branches ofgovernment, including the executive. The Court cited Ex parte Virginia (1880) 100 U.S. 339, 347, 25 L. Ed. 676 for the same principle adopted in Cooper v. Aaron (1958) 358 U.S. 1, 16-17, 78 S. Ct. 1401, 3 L. Ed. 2d 5 , discussed above, that a state acts by its legislative, executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the state, or of the officers or agents by whom it powers are exerted, can deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

In Adams v. Department of Motor Vehicles (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 146, 113 Cal. Rptr. 145, 520 P.2d 961 , petitioners sought a writ of mandamus ordering the Department of Motor Vehicles not to participate in a garageman's sale or to transfer the interest in any vehicle sold pursuant to a garageman's lien. One petitioner was an automobile owner whose vehicle, after a dispute over the repair bill, was retained and sold pursuant to the garagemen's labor and materials lien provided in former Civ. Code §§ 3068, 3071 [now see Civ. Code §§ 3068, 3071]. Petitioners maintained that the state's failure to provide the owner of such a vehicle with a hearing either when the vehicle was seized or prior to the sale violated the guarantee of due process in the Fourteenth Amendment and former Cal. Const., art. I, § 13 [now see Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(b)]. The Supreme Court agreed, holding in part that the action of automobile repairers in retaining and selling vehicles was notpurely private conduct but state action subject to the due process guarantees. Although many attachment cases found state action in the actual acts of government officials or courts in effectuating seizure, direct government involvement is not essential. Private conduct may become so entwined with government action that it becomes subject to the Fourteenth Amendment and former Cal. Const., art. I, § 13 [now see Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(b)]. In the case before the Court there was significant government involvement. The lien and procedures for its enforcement were created and governed by statute; an agency of the state oversaw the sale and transferred the title; and the statutory plan delegated to a private person the traditional government function of lien enforcement.

Although at issue in Adams was the level of government involvement necessary for state action under the due process clause, its analysis applies equally to the equal protection clause. In fact, the Supreme Court cited leading equal protection cases as its authority in Adams.

[c] Challenging Constitutionality of State Action on Equal Protection Grounds

Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) , was the second appeal of a challenge to a system of public school financing under which money available for schools varied according to the wealth of each school district. In Serrano v. Priest (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 584, 596, 614-615, 96 Cal. Rptr. 601, 487 P.2d 1241 , the Court held the system unconstitutional as alleged by plaintiffs as an infringement on state and federal guarantees of equal protection and remanded the case for trial to determine if plaintiffs could sustain their allegations. During the course of that trial, the Legislature amended the school financing law, and the United States Supreme Court held that a comparable system in Texas did not violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment [San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 1, 6] . Nevertheless, the California trial court found that the revised system of school financing violated the equal protection clause of the California Constitution, and defendants appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the trial court, emphasizing that the system in question required the Court's strict scrutiny and justification by a compelling state interest. In particular the Court held that discrimination in educational opportunity on the basis of district wealth involves a suspect classification which affects the fundamental interest of education. The Court made it clear that the state equal protection provisions, while substantially equivalent to the guarantees contained in the Fourteenth Amendment, possess an independent vitality which in a given case may demand an analysis different from that which would apply if only the federal standard were applicable. Although, in the Court's view, the decisions of the United States Supreme Court defining fundamental rights are persuasive authority and entitled to respectful consideration, they may be followed by courts in California only if they provide no less individual protection than that which is guaranteed by California law and are part of the full panoply of rights which Californians have come to expect as their due.

[d] State Action Based on Arbitrary Classification as Violation of Equal Protection

Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972) 405 U.S. 438, 92 S. Ct. 1029, 31 L. Ed. 2d 349 , was a habeas corpus proceeding in which petitioner challenged his conviction under a Massachusetts law for giving away a contraceptive device. The federal court of appeals instructed the district court to grant the writ, and the county sheriff appealed to the United States Supreme Court which affirmed. The Court noted that the statute in question permitted married persons to obtain contraceptive devices, although only from doctors or druggists on prescription, whereas single persons could not obtain contraceptives to prevent pregnancy from anyone. Thus, the issue was whether or not the statute viewed as a prohibition on contraception per se violated the rights of single persons under the equal protection clause. The Court held that the statute violated the equal protection clause because the differential treatment between married and unmarried persons could not be rationally explained. It stated that although the Fourteenth Amendment does not deny to states the power to treat differentclasses of persons in different ways, it does deny to states the power to legislate differential treatment of persons who are placed into different statutory classes on the basis of criteria wholly unrelated to the objectives of the statute. The Court adopted the standard of Royster Guano Co. v. Virginia (1920) 253 U.S. 412, 415, 40 S. Ct. 560, 64 L. Ed. 989 , that classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference which has a fair and substantial relation to the objectives of the legislation so that all persons similarly circumstanced are treated alike. Since the statute could not be justified on a rational basis, further inquiry into whether it was justified by a compelling state interest was unnecessary.

In Brown v. Merlo (1973) 8 Cal. 3d 855, 106 Cal. Rptr. 388, 506 P.2d 212 , plaintiff brought an action for damages suffered while riding as a nonpaying guest in a vehicle driven by defendant. The trial court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiff's cause of action on the ground that former Veh. Code § 17158 prevented recovery by a nonpaying guest in the absence of intoxication or willful misconduct on the driver's part. On appeal, the California Supreme Court held that the statute was unconstitutional as a denial of equal protection under the federal and state Constitutions because there was no rational basis for the classifications made by the statute. In its analysis of the rational basis standard, the Court pointed out that a statute may single out a class for distinctive treatment only if the classification bears a rational relation to the purpose of the legislation. At a minimum, persons similarly situated with respect to the legitimate purpose of the law must receive like treatment. The Court adopted the standard used by the United States Supreme Court in Eisenstadt, discussed above, that a classification must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest on some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced are treated alike. Thus, the Court concluded, when a statute provides that one class shall receive different treatment from another, constitutional provisions demand more than nondiscriminatory application within the class established, they impose a requirement of some rationality in the nature of the class singled out.

In D'Amico v. Board of Medical Examiners (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 1, 112 Cal. Rptr. 786, 520 P.2d 10 , petitioners petitioned for a writ of mandate to order the state Board of Osteopathic Examiners to license them as physicians and surgeons in order to challenge on equal protection grounds a state law that prohibited osteopathy graduates from practicing as physicians and surgeons in California. The trial court sustained the board's demurrer without leave to amend, but the court of appeals reversed and remanded. On remand, the trial court granted a summary judgment for petitioners, and the board appealed to the Supreme Court which affirmed, holding that the statutory distinction between the allopathic approach to medicine and osteopathy violated the equal protection clause of the federal and state Constitutions because it bore no rational relationship to any conceivable state interest. The Court stated that so long as classification does not permit one to exercise a privilege while refusing it to another of like qualifications, under like conditions and circumstances, it is unobjectionable upon this ground. But, in this case, the state's only legitimate interest was to protect the public from poorly trained and incompetent medical practitioners and the board, by its own admissions, established that there was no rational relationship between an exclusion of all osteopathic graduates and this goal.

In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931 (1971) , was a habeas corpus proceeding in which petitioner successfully challenged former Penal Code § 270, which made it a misdemeanor for a father to willfully fail to provide his minor children with necessities, but raised the offense to a felony if, during the period of nonsupport, the father remained outside the state for 30 days. The California Supreme Court held that basic guarantees of equal protection embodied in U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 1 and former Cal. Const., art. I, §§ 11, 21 [now see Cal. Const., art. I, § 7] protect persons from arbitrary discrimination by the state. Although the state was permitted to draw distinctions between different groups of individuals, equal protection principles require, at a minimum, classifications which bear a rational relationship to a legitimate public purpose. The Court concluded that since the crime of nonsupport does not vary with the place of its commission, an incremental penalty based on location was arbitrary and irrational.

[e] State Action Based on Suspect Category or Burdening Fundamental Interest as Subject to Strict Scrutiny

In Graham v. Richardson (1971) 403 U.S. 365, 91 S. Ct. 1848, 29 L. Ed. 2d 534 , plaintiffs filed class actions in a federal district court challenging the constitutionality of state laws which restricted the ability of aliens to obtain welfare benefits. Plaintiffs prevailed in the trial court, and on appeal the United States Supreme Court affirmed. The Court held that state statutes which either deny welfare benefits to resident aliens or condition such benefits on a specified residence period in the United States violate the equal protection clause. As part of its analysis, the Court pointed out that classifications based on alienage, like those based on nationality and race, are inherently suspect and subject to close judicial scrutiny. Moreover, the fact that the statutes in question also infringe on the right to travel provided an additional reason for a strict scrutiny of the legislation, not because travel is a suspect criterion such as race, nationality, or alienage, but because it is a fundamental right.

In People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375 , defendant challenged his commitment to the California YouthAuthority following conviction for misdemeanor assault on equal protection grounds. The crux of defendant's argument was that as an individual between the ages of 16 and 21, he could be committed to the Youth Authority under former Welf. & Inst. Code § 1731.5 for a misdemeanor conviction and serve a potentially longer term than the maximum jail sentence which could be imposed for the same offense if committed by an individual 21 years of age or older. The California Supreme Court agreed with defendant's contention and declared the statute unconstitutional. It explained that in cases which involve suspect categories or touch on fundamental interests, the courts adopt an attitude of active and critical analysis subjecting the classification to strict scrutiny.

[f] Nature of Suspect Category

The factual background of Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][a]. In that case, the California Supreme Court was required to determine whether or not classifications based on gender were subject to strict scrutiny. The Court applied two tests common to all suspect classifications:

- Whether the characteristic on which the classification is based is an immutable trait that bears no relationship to ability to perform or contribute to society. Under this test the Court distinguished race and lineage from intelligence or physical disability and pointed out that if classifications are permitted that ignore this test, then the whole class of individuals with this characteristic are relegated to an inferior legal status without regard to the capabilities or characteristics of its individual members.

- Identification of all suspect classifications and the stigma of inferiority and second class citizenship associated with them. The Court identified women, blacks, aliens, and the poor as groups that have historically labored under severe legal and social disabilities.

[g] Nature of Fundamental Interest

The factual background of Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][c]. In that case, the California Supreme Court held that a system of public school financing under which money available for schools varied according to the wealth of each school district violated the right to equal protection under the California Constitution because it discriminated on the basis of wealth, a suspect classification, in regard to education, a fundamental interest, and was not justified by a compelling state interest.

The trial court, in its analysis of the issues, had applied the test for determining a fundamental interest established by five members of the Supreme Court in San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 33, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 1 , who adopted the conservative rule that fundamental rights are only those rights that are explicitly or implicitly guaranteed by the Constitution. It concluded that even though education was not a fundamental interest under the federal Constitution, it did meet the Rodriguez definition of fundamental interest under the California Constitution. The California Supreme Court affirmed the conclusion of the trial court, but not its reasoning. The Court stated quite strongly that it was not required by either inclination or authority to determine the importance of rights and interests affected by legislative classifications according to the extent to which they are "explicitly or implicitly guaranteed" by the compendious, comprehensive, and distinctly mutable state Constitution. Although the treatment afforded particular rights and interests by the state Constitution is to be accorded significant consideration in determining what rights are fundamental, the proper test under the state equal protection clause is whether an individual right or liberty lies at the core of our free and representative form of government.

Although the Court did not so state, its view is closer to a minority of justices on the United States Supreme Court who believe that fundamental interests do not require a constitutional basis if they have a close nexus with constitutional interest [see San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 102-103, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 1 (Marshall, J., dissenting)]. Further, the language used by the Court directly opposes its earlier statement in D'Amico v. Board of Medical Examiners (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 1, 18, 112 Cal. Rptr. 786, 520 P.2d 10 , that fundamental interests for the purpose of equal protection analysis are limited to rights which are explicitly or implicitly guaranteed by the Constitution.

In Bixby v. Pierno (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 130, 93 Cal. Rptr. 234, 481 P.2d 242 , two individuals petitioned in superior court for a writ of mandamus to compel the Commissioner of Corporations to set aside a certain decision. The trial court denied the petition, and plaintiffs appealed to the California Supreme Court, contending that the trial court should have exercised its independent judgment in reviewing the commissioner's decision. The Court affirmed and held that the case did not call for the exercise of independent judgment on the evidence since it did not involve a vested, fundamental right. The Court gave considerable attention to explaining the nature of fundamental rights. It stated that in determining whether or not a right is fundamental, the courts do not alone weight the economic aspect of it but the effect of it in human terms and the importance of it to the individual in the life situation.

Although Bixby dealt with the issue of whether a right is fundamental for the purpose of the scope of review of an administrative decision which interferes with it, the Court recognized that it had traditionally utilized asimilar form of analysis in applying the equal protection clause to the area of economic regulations, on the one hand, and to cases involving fundamental interests on the other. Further, for its examples of fundamental interests the Court relied on Meyer v. Nebraska (1923) 262 U.S. 390, 43 S. Ct. 625, 67 L. Ed. 1042 , which described as fundamental interests protected by the due process clause a number of interests, such as the right to engage in a common occupation, marry, establish a home, and bring up children, which were subsequently recognized as safeguarded by the equal protection clause.

[h] State Action Subject to Strict Scrutiny as Violation of Equal Protection Unless Justified

San Antonio Independent Sch. Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959 , was a class action on behalf of certain Texas school children challenging the constitutionality of the state's system for financing public schools. Plaintiffs contended that the system, which was financed by the property tax income within each school district supplemented by state funds, violated the equal protection clause in so far as it resulted in substantial disparities in the amount of money spent per pupil. The federal district court held that since wealth was a suspect classification and education was a fundamental interest, the system would be subject to strict scrutiny. The state failed to show a compelling state interest, and the system was ruled unconstitutional. On direct appeal, the United States Supreme Court reversed on the grounds that the system did not discriminate on the basis of wealth and education was not a fundamental interest. Therefore, it was not an appropriate case for strict scrutiny. The Court duly noted, however, that if strict scrutiny had been applied to the system, it would have been found unconstitutional, for it could not satisfy the three elements of strict scrutiny indicated by previous decisions which require the following:

- That the state action is not entitled to the usual presumption of validity.

- That the defenders of state action must carry a heavy burden of justification.

- That the defenders of state actions must demonstrate that the state action has been structured with precision and is tailored narrowly to serve legitimate objectives and that it uses the less drastic means for effectuating its objectives.

The decision cites, as its principle authority for the strict scrutiny test, Dunn v. Blumstein (1972) 405 U.S. 330, 343, 92 S. Ct. 995, 31 L. Ed. 2d 274 , in which the Court held that statutes affecting constitutional rights must be drawn with precision and must be tailored to serve their legitimate objectives. If there are other, reasonable ways to achieve those goals with a lesser burden on constitutionally protected activity, a state may not choose the way of greater interference; for if it acts at all, it must choose less drastic means.

Counsel should be aware that the Court in some decisions has formulated the strict scrutiny test in ways that appear to permit justification by a government interest that is less than compelling and implementation by a method that is not the least restrictive. Thus, in Examining Bd. v. Flores de Otero (1976) 426 U.S. 572, 602, 96 S. Ct. 2264, 49 L. Ed. 2d 65 , the Court stated that state action could only be upheld if the government which imposed it could demonstrate that its purpose or interest was both constitutionally permissible and substantial and that its use of the classification was necessary to the accomplishment of its purpose or the safeguarding of its interest. However a classification is not considered "necessary" where it is not tailored to the purpose in question and based on the least drastic means of accomplishing it [see § 35A.49].

In Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438 , petitioners, none of whom owned real property, sought an original writ of mandate in the Supreme Court to compel defendant county clerk to accept nominating papers filed by one of the petitioners who wished to be a candidate for director of the Imperial Irrigation District. The basis for the clerk's refusal to accept the papers was Water Code § 21100, which provided that directors of an irrigation district formed under the Irrigation District Law [Water Code §§ 20500 et seq.] must be freeholders of the district they represent. Petitioners challenged Section 21100 on equal protection grounds. The California Supreme Court held Water Code § 21100 unconstitutional as it applied to the Imperial Irrigation District. In reaching its conclusion, the Court determined that the statute in question was subject to the strict scrutiny test. Under it, the state must demonstrate that the statutory classification serves a compelling governmental interest and that there are no reasonable, less intrusive means by which the goals of the state can be achieved.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Scope of State Action

Burton v. Wilmington Parking Auth. (1961) 365 U.S. 715, 81 S. Ct. 856, 6 L. Ed. 2d 45 , is a leading case on the issue of what decree of nexus between private conduct and governmental activity is sufficient to establish the private conduct as state action. In that case, plaintiff was a black man denied service in a restaurant operated by defendant private corporation in space leased from a state owned and operated automobile parking facility. Plaintiff brought an action for declaratory and injunctive relief, claiming that his rights under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment had been violated. The trial court's grant of a summaryjudgment for plaintiff was reversed by the Supreme Court of Delaware which found no state action because defendant was operating in a purely private capacity. The United States Supreme Court reversed. In its opinion, the Court admitted that the Fourteenth Amendment erects no shield against purely private conduct, however discriminatory or wrongful. The amendment only inhibits such action as may fairly be said to be that of the state. Nevertheless, the amendment applies to state action of every kind including state participation through any arrangement, management, funds, or property and reaches private conduct in which the state in any of its manifestations has become to some significant extent involved. The Court added that creation of a precise formula is not possible; only by sifting facts and weighing circumstances can the nonobvious involvement of the state in private conduct be attributed its true significance. In the instant case, the land and building were publicly owned, and the building was dedicated to public use in performance of defendant parking authority's essential governmental functions. Maintenance of commercially leased areas in the facility was a financially integral and indispensable part of the state's plan to operate the facility as a self-sustaining unit. Operation of the restaurant in the parking facility created mutual advantages for both landlord and tenant. Additionally, certain of the state's responsibilities as lessor, like building maintenance, would be paid for from public funds. The Court concluded that the state had so far insinuated itself into a position of interdependence with the private corporation that it must be recognized as a joint participant in the challenged activity; it had thus achieved that degree of participation and involvement in discriminatory behavior which it was the intent of the Fourteenth Amendment to condemn.

Curtis v. Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles County (1972) 7 Cal. 3d 942, 104 Cal. Rptr. 297, 501 P.2d 537 , was a constitutional challenge by original writ of mandate in the California Supreme Court to former Gov. Code § 34311, under which landowners owning at least 51 percent of the land in an area proposed for incorporation had the power to prevent the county board of supervisors from calling an incorporation election. The Supreme Court determined that the statute in question was an unconstitutional violation of the right to equal protection. In reaching this conclusion, the Court was required to decide whether the refusal of the county board of supervisors to proceed with the incorporation election demanded by petitioners was state action. The Court held that former Gov. Code § 34311 and the acts of the board of supervisors pursuant to its mandate unquestionably constituted state action (7 Cal. 3d 942, 951) .

In Reitman v. Mulkey (1967) 387 U.S. 369, 87 S. Ct. 1627, 18 L. Ed. 2d 830 , plaintiffs, a black couple, brought an action for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51] on account of discrimination in housing. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the ground that former Cal. Const., art. I, § 26 (incorporated into the Constitution as a result of the voter's approval of Proposition 14 in 1964) nullified the application of the Act to housing discrimination by prohibiting the state from limiting the right of individuals to dispose of real property in any way they chose. Plaintiffs appealed to the California Supreme Court, which held that Proposition 14 violated the Fourteenth Amendment [Mulkey v. Reitman (1966) 64 Cal. 2d 529, 534-543, 50 Cal. Rptr. 881, 413 P.2d 825] . Defendants appealed to the United States Supreme Court which affirmed on the ground that Proposition 14 unconstitutionally involved the state in racial discrimination and was therefore invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court first pointed out that significant state involvement in private discrimination could amount to unconstitutional state action under the Fourteenth Amendment. Such prohibited state involvement may be found even when the state only encouraged, but did not command, discrimination. The California Supreme Court found that enactment of Proposition 14 significantly encouraged and involved the state in private racial discrimination, and the U.S. Supreme Court deferred to the California court's knowledge of the facts and circumstances concerning the passage and potential impact of Proposition 14 and familiarity with the milieu in which it would operate (387 U.S. 369, 375-379) .

It was significant to the United States Supreme Court that the California court did not base its findings on the view that the mere repeal of laws forbidding racial discrimination constituted forbidden state encouragement. Rather, its finding could be supported by the reasonable theory that the proposition encouraged racial discrimination because the constitutional authorization to discriminate which it created was free from legislative, executive, or judicial regulation. It alleviated individuals from the need to rely on their personal beliefs to justify discrimination and provided an express constitutional authority which was free from censure or interference of any kind from official sources (387 U.S. 369, 376-377) .

[b] State Action Based on Arbitrary Classification as Violation of Equal Protection

In People v. McKee (2010) 47 Cal. 4th 1172, 104 Cal. Rptr. 3d 427, 223 P.3d 566 , the California Supreme Court examined Proposition 83, passed by the voters in November of 2006, which modified the terms by which sexually violent predators (SVP's) could be released from civil commitment under the Sexually Violent Predators Act (Welf. & Inst. Code, § 6600 et seq.), to an indefinite commitment from which the individual could be released if the individual proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the individual no longer was an SVP, in light of a challenge that Proposition 83 violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, because it treated SVP's significantly less favorably than those similarly situated individuals civilly committed under other statutes. The Court concluded that the state had not yet carried its burden of demonstrating why SVP's, but not any other ex-felons subject to civil commitment, such as mentally disordered offenders, were subject to indefinite commitment. The Court held first that mentally disordered offenders (MDO's) and SVP's were similarly situated, and imposing on SVP's an indefinite commitment and the burden of proving they should not be committed, when the MDO's was subject to short-term commitment renewable only if the People proved periodically that continuing commitment was justified beyond a reasonable doubt, raised a substantial equal protection question that calling for justification by the People (47 Cal. 4th 1172, 1203) . Standards and burdens of proof represent societal determinations of who should bear the risk that a court's or jury's judgment will be in error and balance the individual's fundamental liberty interest in not being incarcerated or involuntarily confined with the state's compelling interest in protecting society from dangerous persons, in punishing criminal behavior in the case of criminal defendants, and in treating mental illness in the case of civil committees (47 Cal. 4th 1172, 1203-1204) . The Legislature may make reasonable distinctions between civil commitment statutes based on a showing that those reasonably determined to represent a greater danger may be treated differently from the general population (47 Cal. 4th 1172, 1204) . The differential treatment may result at least initially in imposing a greater burden of proof in order to be released from involuntary commitment. However, both SVP's and MDO's had suffered prior felony convictions and had been determined by mental health experts to suffer from mental disorders that making them a continuing danger, and the reasons for differential treatment were not immediately obvious from the face of the two statutory schemes (47 Cal. 4th 1172, 1204-1205) . Further, individuals found not guilty by reason of insanity (NGI's) and SVP's were also similarly situated, and a comparison of the two commitment regimes raised similar equal protection problems as those related to MDO's, and, as with MDO's, the People had not yet carried their burden of justifying the differences between the SVP and NGI commitment statutes (47 Cal. 4th 1172, 1207). The Court thus remanded to afford the People the opportunity to make the appropriate showing that, notwithstanding the similarities between SVP's and MDO's and NGI's, SVP's as a class bore a substantially greater risk to society, and therefore imposing on them a greater burden before they could be released from commitment was needed to protect society (47 Cal. 4th 1172, 1207-1209). In remanding the case, the Court made clear that different classes of individuals civilly committed need not be treated identically, but the government had not yet shown that special treatment of SVP's was validly based on the degree of danger reasonably perceived as to that group, or whether it arose from any medical or scientific evidence (47 Cal. 4th 1172, 1210).

In People v. Wilkinson (2004) 33 Cal. 4th 821, 16 Cal. Rptr. 3d 420, 94 P.3d 551 , a criminal defendant challenged the statutory provisions relating to battery on a custodial officer as "irrational" and violating the federal and state guarantees of equal protection because one who commits the "lesser" offense of battery on a custodial officer without injury can receive felony punishment under Penal Code § 243.1, while a person committing the "greater" offense of battery on a custodial officer with injury can be convicted of a wobbler offense under Penal Code § 243(c)(1) and can receive a misdemeanor sentence. The California Supreme Court found the rational basis test applicable, because a criminal defendant does not have a fundamental interest in a specific term of imprisonment or in the designation a particular crime receives (33 Cal. 4th 821, 838 , citing People v. Flores(1986)178 Cal. App. 3d 74, 88, 223 Cal. Rptr. 465 ; see People v. Alvarez (2001) 88 Cal. App. 4th 1110, 1116, 106 Cal. Rptr. 2d 447 (finding rational basis test applicable to equal protection challenge involving alleged sentencing disparity)). Application of the strict scrutiny standard would have been incompatible with the broad discretion the Legislature traditionally has been understood to exercise in defining crimes and specifying punishment. The Court then held that the statutory scheme was not irrational because neither the existence of two identical criminal statutes prescribing different levels of punishments nor the exercise of a prosecutor's discretion in charging under one such statute and not the other, violates equal protection principles (33 Cal. 4th 821, 838-839 , citing United States v. Batchelder (1979) 442 U.S. 114, 124-125, 99 S. Ct. 2198, 60 L. Ed. 2d 755). Without a showing that a criminal defendant was singled out deliberately for prosecution on the basis of some invidious criterion which is arbitrary and unjustified because it bears no rational relationship to legitimate law enforcement interests, which the defendant here did not allege, the defendant cannot make out an equal protection violation (33 Cal. 4th 821, 839 , citing Manduley v. Superior Court (2002) 27 Cal. 4th 537, 568-569, 117 Cal. Rptr. 2d 168, 41 P.3d 3).

In Raffaelli v. Committee of Bar Examiners (1972) 7 Cal. 3d 288, 101 Cal. Rptr. 896, 496 P.2d 1264 , petitioner challenged the constitutionality of former Bus. & Prof. Code § 6060, which excluded aliens from the practice of law in California, by applying for an original writ of mandate compelling the respondent Committee of Bar Examiners to certify him for admission to the practice of law. Petitioner was a permanent resident alien who was educated at law school in California and passed the California Bar Examination. The California Supreme Court held that the restriction against aliens expressed in Section 6060 violated both U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 1 and former Cal. Const., art. I, §§ 11, 21 [now see Cal. Const., art. I, § 7]. The Court determined that classifications based on alienage were subject to strict judicial scrutiny. After evaluating the various arguments put forth by the state to explain why the statute was a necessary means of promoting a compelling state interest, the Court concluded that the state could not even show that the challenged classification had a rational connection with the applicant's fitness or capacity to practice law. Therefore, the state could not sustain its burden of showing that the classification was necessary to promote a compelling interest (7 Cal. 3d 288, 292-301) .

[c] Nature of Fundamental Interest

Harlow v. Carleson (1976) 16 Cal. 3d 731, 129 Cal. Rptr. 298, 548 P.2d 698 , was an administrative mandamus action by a welfare recipient challenging the decision of the State Department of Social Welfare to terminate her benefits. The trial court determined that the administrative decision was not supported by substantial evidence, and defendant appealed. The California Supreme Court held that since the administrative decision affected a vested, fundamental interest, it required evaluation by the more rigorous independent judgment test (16 Cal. 3d 731, 733) . However, it affirmed the decision of the trial court on the theory that if the court had properly applied the independent judgment test, instead of the substantial evidence test, it would have nevertheless reached the same result (16 Cal. 3d 731, 738-739) .

In deciding that petitioner's right to continued welfare benefits was a fundamental interest, the Court cited the leading case of Bixby v. Pierno (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 130, 144-145, 93 Cal. Rptr. 234, 481 P.2d 242 , for the rule that to determine whether or not a right is fundamental, the courts should weigh not just its economic aspect but its effect in human terms and its importance to the individual's life (16 Cal. 3d 731, 736) .

[d] State Action Based on Arbitrary Classification as Violation of Equal Protection

In Village of Willowbrook v. Olech (2000) 528 U.S. 562, 120 S. Ct. 1073, 145 L. Ed. 2d 1060 , a homeowner asked the Village to connect her property to the municipal water supply. The Village initially demanded the grant of a 33-foot easement as a condition. On the homeowner's objection that the Village only required a 15-foot easement from other property owners seeking access to the water supply, after a 3-month delay the Village agreed to provide the connection with only a 15-foot easement. The homeowner sued on the ground that the Village's initial demand violated her equal protection rights as wholly irrational and arbitrary, and alleged that the demand was motivated by ill will resulting from a previous unrelated successful lawsuit against the Village, and the Village acted with the intent to deprive the homeowner of her rights or in reckless disregard of those rights. The District Court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals reversed.

The United States Supreme Court affirmed the Seventh Circuit's reversal. The Court held per curiam that the homeowner stated a claim for violation of the Equal Protection clause of the 14th Amendment since the complaint could be construed as alleging that she was intentionally treated differently than others similarly situated and there was no rational basis for the difference in treatment (528 U.S. 562, 564-565).

In Holguin v. Flores (2004) 122 Cal. App. 4th 428, 18 Cal. Rptr. 3d 749 , the surviving partner of an unmarried cohabiting heterosexual couple challenged Fam. Code § 297, a California law affording unmarried cohabiting couples who qualify as domestic partners rights and benefits not afforded to other unmarried couples, including the right of the surviving partner to sue for the wrongful death of the other partner, and Code Civ.Proc. § 377.60, which granted the right to sue for wrongful death to surviving spouses, surviving putative spouses, and surviving domestic partners, but not to surviving members of unmarried couples of opposite sex. Under Fam. Code § 297, an adult couple living together could qualify as a domestic partnership if they were of the same sex or one of them was at least 62 years of age and eligible for benefits under the federal Social Security Act based on age. After his partner was killed in an automobile accident, the surviving partner filed a wrongful death action against the other driver. The trial court dismissed the action on the ground he lacked standing to sue for wrongful death because he and his partner were not married and were not domestic partners as defined by Fam. Code § 297. The court of appeal affirmed, holding that it is not a violation of the right to equal protection to bar the surviving member of an unmarried cohabiting couple of opposite sex from asserting a cause of action for the wrongful death of the other member (122 Cal. App. 4th 428, 438-443). The court held first that a heightened level of scrutiny was not required because the wrongful death statute did not discriminate against the surviving partner on the basis of his gender or age, but on the basis of his marital status, that is, unmarried with the right to wed (122 Cal. App. 4th 428, 439). The court then held that the Legislature rationally could have concluded the survivors of same sex couples and couples with an aged member eligible for Social Security benefits were deserving of solicitude because they were as likely to suffer economic loss from the death of their partners as were spouses but, because of other statutory schemes, they were legally or practically prevented from marrying, but opposite sex younger couples were not entitled to the same solicitude because the law did not prevent them from marrying, and that the failure of opposite sex couples to adopt the responsibility of the marital vows and the legal obligation resulting from a formal marriage ceremony evidenced a lack of permanent commitment which made compensation for loss of monetary support too speculative to calculate (122 Cal. App. 4th 428, 442-443).

In Genesis Environmental Services v. San Joaquin Valley Unified Air Pollution Control Dist. (2003) 113 Cal. App. 4th 597, 6 Cal. Rptr. 3d 574 , a participant in an independent contractor program to test pollutant levels in emissions from stationary sources for an air pollution control district alleged that the negligence of the district prevented it from remaining eligible to pursue testing emissions for companies and other sources subject to mandatory emissions testing and was a violation of the contractor's constitutional right to equal protection as a class of one. The court of appeal held that an equal protection claim based on a class of one contains the following essential elements: (1) Plaintiff was treated differently from other similarly situated persons; (2) the difference in treatment was intentional; and (3) there was no rational basis for the difference in treatment, and that the contractor's allegations and the reasonable inferences drawn from the allegations and documents subject to judicial notice were sufficient to state a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 based on a denial of equal protection (113 Cal. App. 4th 597, 604-608).

In Citizens for Responsible Behavior v. Superior Court (1991) 1 Cal. App. 4th 1013, 2 Cal. Rptr. 2d 648 , a citizens' group sought to place on the ballot an initiative enacting a city ordinance that would have repealed existing ordinances relating to homosexual rights, required voter approval for any future ordinances on the subject, and prohibited funding for AIDS or for the advocacy of homosexual rights. After the city refused to place the initiative on the ballot, the trial court would not force it to do so, ruling that the proposed initiative was constitutionally defective. The court of appeal denied the group's petition for a writ of mandate. The court said the proposed ordinance raised obstacles in the path of persons seeking to have ordinances prohibiting discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or AIDS enacted, but did not raise any such obstacles for other ordinances. There was no rational reason why the city should be permitted to enact an ordinance barring discrimination against persons with any other disease, no matter how serious or communicable, but not one dealing with persons suffering from AIDS. Nor was there any rational basis for the distinctions drawn by the proposed ordinance with respect to the limitations placed on the city's legislative power to enact protective or corrective legislation regarding homosexuals, bisexuals, or those suffering from AIDS. The proposed ordinance thereby failed the rational basis test. The classification would result in a real, substantial, and invidious denial of the equal protection of the laws (1 Cal. App. 4th 1013, 1025-1027).

Torres v. County of Los Angeles (1989) 209 Cal. App. 3d 325, 257 Cal. Rptr. 211 , involved alleged medical malpractice in the delivery and treatment of plaintiff's son at birth. Plaintiff's claim against defendant public hospital was filed when her son was almost five years old. Defendant denied the claim, as well as a petition for relief from late filing. After the trial court denied plaintiff's petition for an order for relief from compliance with the claim filing requirement, plaintiff filed a medical malpractice action. Defendant filed a motion for summary judgment, asserting that the Tort Claims Act barred plaintiff's suit because she failed to file a claim within the time limits of Gov. Code § 911.2, and because she failed to obtain judicial relief from that requirement. The trial court granted defendant's motion.

Although the court of appeal affirmed the judgment based on its finding that plaintiff had at least presumptive notice and knowledge of medical malpractice, rendering her noncompliance with the claim filing requirement fatal, it found that Code Civ. Proc. § 340.5, which sets forth the limitations period in malpractice actions, violated minors' right to the law's equal protection. The court explained that Code Civ. Proc. § 340.5 defines the accrual of a cause of action differently for adults and minors. It perceived no rational basis for placing persons into different classes on the basis of criteria wholly unrelated to the statutory objective. Such a classificationmust be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest on some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced will be treated alike. By defining the actions of adults and minors to accrue differently, the court said that Code Civ. Proc. § 340.5 violated minors' right to the law's equal protection. Code Civ. Proc. § 340.5 provides that an adult's cause of action may accrue either from the date of injury or from the time the plaintiff discovers, or through the use of reasonable diligence should have discovered, the injury, whichever occurs first. The minor's cause of action, by contrast, accrues from the date of the wrongful act rather than the injury, and the statute contains no comparable provision permitting accrual when the plaintiff discovers, or through the use of reasonable diligence should have discovered, the injury. The court found that dating the accrual of a minor's medical malpractice action from the wrongful act penalizes minors insofar as Gov. Code § 901 computes Gov. Code § 911.2 time limits from the Code Civ. Proc. § 340.5 accrual. For example, when harm occurs prenatally or in childbirth, the wrongful act may only be revealed to have caused an injury to the minor months or even years later, as the child grows and develops (209 Cal. App. 3d 325, 334).

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of private action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the action contains a classification which is arbitrary, based on a suspect category, or burdens a fundamental interest and the applicability of equal protection requirements to the action is an issue. It may be used when the challenged private action was undertaken by a private party utilizing monopoly authority conferred by state action.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] State Action Under California Constitution

Gay Law Students Ass'n v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. (1979) 24 Cal. 3d 458, 156 Cal. Rptr. 14, 595 P.2d 592 , is discussed in § 35A.21[3][b].

[b] Private Action Under Monopoly Authority Conferred by State Action

In Gay Law Students Ass'n v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. (1979) 24 Cal. 3d 458, 156 Cal. Rptr. 14, 595 P.2d 592 , plaintiffs filed a class action against defendant seeking declaratory and injunctive relief and damages on account of defendant's employment discrimination against homosexuals. The trial court sustained defendant's demurrer but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the defendant's action was subject to the equal protection clause of the California Constitution, and employment discrimination against homosexuals, if proven, would constitute a violation of that clause. The Court noted that although the state Constitution does not contain an explicit state action requirement, it does not apply broadly to all purely private conduct. On the other hand, the state clause need not be interpreted identically with the federal equal protection clause, and the state action requirement is satisfied when a privately owned public utility, which enjoys a state-protected monopoly or quasi-monopoly, utilizes its authority arbitrarily to exclude a class of individuals from employment opportunities. Not only does the state give the monopolist its power over employment, but due to monopolistic control, rejected employees have no comparable employment opportunities and the general public lacks the power to show disapproval for discriminatory practices by changing to a competitor. Moreover, relevant United States Supreme Court decisions are consistent with the principle that a private entity which, by virtue of state action, is afforded monopolistic control over employment opportunities, is not free to exercise its power without regard to constitutional restraints.

Counsel will note that although the Court limited its discussion to public utilities with monopolistic control over employment, the principle stated in this form apparently applies to discrimination by any private entity in an area where it has a monopoly created by government.

A WRIT OF MANDATE IS PROPER TO CHALLENGE STATE ACTION WHICH VIOLATES PETITIONER'S RIGHT TO EQUAL PROTECTION IF THE PETITIONER POSSESSES A SPECIAL INTEREST, DISTINGUISHABLE FROM THE INTERESTS OF THE PUBLIC AT LARGE, WHICH HAS SUFFERED OR WILL SUFFER SUBSTANTIAL DAMAGE BY A CLASSIFICATION WHICH IS EITHER ARBITRARY OR, IF THE CLASSIFICATION IS BASED ON A SUSPECT CATEGORY OR BURDENS A FUNDAMENTAL INTEREST, NOT JUSTIFIED BY A COMPELLING GOVERNMENTAL INTEREST.

C. Beneficial Interest as Required. A writ of mandate must be issued on the verified petition of the party beneficially interested (Code Civ. Proc. § 1086).

D. Violation of Petitioner's Rights. A petitioner has a beneficial interest in the issuance of a writ of mandate which challenges state action violating petitioner's constitional rights if the petitioner possesses a special interest, distinguishable from the interests of the public at large, which as suffered or will suffer substantial damage (*Fuller v. [a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds because the state action uses a classification which is arbitrary, based on a suspect category, or burdens a fundamental interest, and the sufficiency of petitioner's interest in raising such a challenge is an issue. The memorandum establishes that petitioner has sufficient beneficial interest in issuance of the writ because petitioner possesses a special interest, distinguishable from the interests of the public at large, which has suffered or will suffer substantial damage. Counsel will note that this rule is the most conservative view of standing to petition for mandate and is comparable to the rule in nonmandate cases that a party attacking the constitutionality of a statute must show some actual or threatened injury and where the statute discriminates against a class, only a member of the class discriminated against may attack it [see Burns v. State Compensation Ins. Fund (1968) 265 Cal. App. 2d 98, 104, 71 Cal. Rptr. 326 , set out in § 35A.24[3][a]].

Use Optional Paragraph E if the classification scheme did not disadvantage the plaintiff vis-a-vis others who were actually involved in the state action only because no members of the favored classes chose to participate. Use Optional Paragraph F if the petitioner's special interest is not pecuniary.

[b] Argument

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. Counsel would demonstrate how petitioner has a special interest, distinguishable from those of the public at large, in the issuance of a writ. If the discriminatory governmental action did not treat the petitioner differently from others actually involved (e.g., petitioner was one of several bidders on a contract, all of whom were non-minorities required to show compliance with a minority set-aside program), counsel should show how the petitioner was placed on an unequal footing with other potential competitors (e.g., that at the point it prepared its bid, it had to shoulder the expense of recruiting minority business participation and not work with subcontractors with whom it had an established relationship, unlike any minority-owned contracting firm that could have bid).

of petitioner's beneficial interest is an issue are set out in §§ 35A.23 -35A.25.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Violation of Petitioner's Rights

In Fuller v. San Bernardino Valley Mun. Wat. Dist. (1966) 242 Cal. App. 2d 52, 51 Cal. Rptr. 120 , petitioners, who were proponents of a new water district, sought a peremptory writ of mandate ordering defendant water district to terminate annexation proceedings. The trial court granted the writ and defendants appealed to the court of appeal, which affirmed on the ground that since plaintiffs had filed a valid petition with the board of supervisors for formation of a new district, these formation proceedings had precedence over subsequently initiated annexation proceedings. One of defendants' contentions was that plaintiffs, as proponents of the new district, did not have a sufficient beneficial interest to maintain the action. The court responded by first reviewing the law of beneficial interest. It stated that private individuals may apply for a writ of mandate only if they have some special interest to be subserved or some particular right to be preserved or protected independent of those held in common with the public at large. The writ will be granted only where necessary to protect a substantial right and it is shown that some substantial damage will be suffered if the writ is denied. The court added that the beneficial interest need not be pecuniary. In this case, plaintiffs showed a sufficient beneficial interest in several ways. They were property owners in the proposed new district which would have been affected by the annexation. They were also the moving force in attempting to create the district and because of their efforts, they also had an interest in an early determination of the validity and relative priority of the competing water district actions. Finally, they had a pecuniary interest in that they could only be reimbursed for their formation expenditures if the new district was formed.

Although neither Fuller nor Tustin Heights Ass'n, discussed below, involved a writ of mandate containing a constitutional challenge, the basic test of beneficial interest sufficient to provide standing to petition for a writ of mandate appears to be substantially similar to the basic test of standingto raise a constitutional question. The general rule is that a party attacking the constitutionality of a statute must show some actual or threatened injury and where the statute discriminates against a class, only a member of the class discriminated against may attack it [Burns v. State Compensation Ins. Fund (1968) 265 Cal. App. 2d 98, 104, 71 Cal. Rptr. 326] .

In Tustin Heights Ass'n v. Board of Supervisors (1959) 170 Cal. App. 2d 619, 339 P.2d 914 , petitioners were residents and property owners and an association representing residents and property owners and individual residents and property owners who resided in the immediate vicinity of an area for which defendant board of supervisors had approved establishment of a church and parochial school. They sought a writ of mandate requiring the board of supervisors to vacate and set aside its approval. The trial court sustained defendants' demurrer to the petition without leave to amend and plaintiffs appealed to the court of appeal, which reversed on the ground that the board of supervisors failed to follow the provisions of the zoning ordinance. One of defendants' contentions on appeal was that petitioners had now shown any special interest or damage which would entitle them to petition for a writ of mandate. The court disagreed. It held that since petitioners were owners of real property within the zoned area and thus restricted in their use of their property by the zoning ordinance, they each had individual interests in enforcement of the ordinance and if the ordinance were violated, each would suffer special damages that would be distinguishable from those suffered by the public at large.

[b] Having Burdens Not Faced by Even Potential Competitors as Violation of Rights

Monterey Mechanical Co. v. Wilson (9th Cir. 1997) 125 F.3d 702 , concerned Pub. Contract Code § 10115 et seq., which require state agencies to award contracts to the lowest bidder either meeting, or documenting good-faith efforts to meet, specified percentage goals for the degree of participation of business enterprises operated by minorities, women, and disabled veterans. Two construction contractors, neither of which was itself an enterprise of the types assisted by the statute, submitted bids on a project at a state university, and the contract went to the higher bidder because only it documented good-faith efforts as required by the statute. The losing contractor sued in federal district court, challenging the statute as violating the Equal Protection Clause of the United States Constitution, lost a motion for a preliminary injunction, and appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. First it rejected a contention that the plaintiff lacked standing to make an equal-protection claim because it was situated the same and treated the same as the contractor which had won the bidding. The court found the issue controlled by Northeastern Florida Contractors v. Jacksonville (1993) 508 U.S. 656, 113 S. Ct. 2297 , which it read as establishing that standing exists in a set-aside case when plaintiff is unable to compete on an equal footing with someone else, whether or not it loses a contract to a favored party. Applying that principle to the instant case, the court concluded that plaintiff faced burdens and costs that would not face a minority- or women-owned enterprise, which would not have to subcontract out as much of the work. This injury took place at the point the plaintiff submitted its bid, when it had no way of knowing who else was bidding. The court added that requiring a private party to discriminate is also a form of injury in itself.

The court also found, on the same basis, that the statute did treat different contractors differently on the basis of race and sex. It rejected the possibility that, since the statute only requires outreach in a good-faith effort to meet its goals, there was no discriminatory classification, since a minority or woman-owned firm would not have to do the same outreach.

Approaching the question of whether the classification is justified, the court noted the applicability of the strict-scrutiny standard to both race and sex classifications. Citing City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co. (1989) 488 U.S. 469, 109 S. Ct. 706 for the proposition that racial classifications can survive strict scrutiny only if the governmental entity involved demonstrates that the current program is a remedy for its own active or passive past discrimination, the court found that neither the university nor the state had made any attempt to meet that burden. The court also noted that the statute was overbroad, including ethnic groups that could not possibly have been discriminated against in California in the past. Finding the statute unconstitutional, it remanded for the district court to consider whether preliminary injunctive relief was appropriate.

Note that the analysis pertinent to the contention in the form (summarized above) relates to the effect of the state action on the petitioner in the context of standing, the question considered in the "beneficial-interest" context is virtually the same.

[c] Pecuniary Interest as Unnecessary

Fuller v. San Bernardino Valley Mun. Wat. Dist. (1966) 242 Cal. App. 2d 52, 51 Cal. Rptr. 120 , is discussed in § 35A.22[3][a].

A petitioner has a beneficial interest in the issuance of a writ of mandate which challenges the constitutionality of state action for violating petitioner's constitutional rights when the petitioner possesses an interest, even if that interest is shared by many, which has suffered or will suffer harm and the state action involves broad and long-term effects relating to the social and economic realities of the present-day organization of society (*Bozung v. [Optional] F. Petitioner as Representative. A petitioner has a beneficial interest in the issuance of a writ of mandate that challenges the constitutionality of state action for violating the rights of petitioner's members when the members possess a beneficial interest in issuance of a writ of mandate and petitioner is authorized to represent its members in the lawsuit (*Residents of Beverly Glen, Inc. v. [a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action contains a classification which is arbitrary, based on a suspect category, or burdens a fundamental interest, and the sufficiency of petitioner's interest in raising such a challenge is an issue. The memorandum establishes that petitioner has sufficient beneficial interest in issuance of the writ because petitioner possesses an interest which has suffered or will suffer harm and the state action involves broad social and economic effects.

Use Optional Paragraph E if the classification scheme involves broad social and economic effects. Use Optional Paragraph F if the petitioner is an authorized representative of the affected group.

[b] Argument

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. Counsel would demonstrate how petitioner hasa special interest, distinguishable from those of the public at large, in the issuance of a writ.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Violation of Petitioner's Rights With Broad Effects

Bozung v. Local Agency Formation Comm'n (1975) 13 Cal. 3d 263, 118 Cal. Rptr. 249, 529 P.2d 1017 , involved a challenge by writ of mandate to the validity of an annexation by the City of Camarillo by an individual county resident and taxpayer and the Ventura County Environmental Coalition which was composed of county residents and taxpayers, many of whom lived in Camarillo or in the area of annexation. Plaintiffs contended that the annexation was illegal because the Local Agency Formation Commission did not prepare and certify an environmental impact report prior to approving the annexation. The trial court sustained defendants' demurrers to the complaint without leave to amend, but, on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, adopting the opinion of the court of appeal as its own. One of defendants' contentions was that none of the plaintiffs had standing because each lacked the "beneficial interest" required for a writ of mandamus. The Court disagreed. It found that because plaintiffs alleged that they would be harmed by the environmental effects of the challenged annexation, under the rule of United States v. SCRAP (1973) 412 U.S. 669, 683-685, 93 S. Ct. 2405, 37 L. Ed. 2d 254 , discussed in § 35A.23[3][b], that allegation was sufficient. Furthermore, it did not matter whether plaintiffs lived within or without the annexing city; strict rules of standing that might be appropriate in other contexts have no application where broad and long-term effects are involved.

In Residents of Beverly Glen, Inc. v. Los Angeles (1973) 34 Cal. App. 3d 117, 109 Cal. Rptr. 724 , a civic corporation representing residents of a geographical area sought both a writ of mandate to set aside a conditional use permit granted by the city for a building development and a declaration that a section of the municipal code was unconstitutional. The trial court granted defendant city's motion for summary judgment in part on the ground that plaintiff civic corporation lacked standing to bring the action. On appeal, the Court of Appeal reversed. It stated that the corporation had standing to maintain this action because it was a corporation whose members lived in the affected area and would suffer injury if the challenged project, to be constructed under a permit pursuant to an allegedly unconstitutional ordinance, was allowed to proceed. Significantly, although the interest possessed by plaintiff's members was a special interest--protection of their homes from destruction caused by the necessary widening of a major boulevard--which would have qualified as a beneficial interest under the test of Fuller v. San Bernardino Valley Mun. Wat. Dist. (1966) 242 Cal. App. 2d 52, 56-57, 51 Cal. Rptr. 120 , set out in § 35A.22[3][a], the court made it clear that such a specific injury was not required. Using language comparable to the principle subsequently stated in Bozung, discussed above--that strict rules of standing have no application where broad and long-term effects are involved--the court explained that the sharing of particular environmental interests by the many rather than the few did not make them less deserving of legal protection and noted a trend toward marked accommodation of formerly strict procedural requirements of standing to sue where matters relating to the social and economic realities of the present-day society were concerned. Moreover, although the case involved both a petition or writ of mandate and a request for declaratory relief, the court did not distinguish between these causes of action in reaching its decision on standing. Therefore, the decision is good authority on the specific issue of what interest must be shown to raise a constitutional issue.

[b] Nature of Interest Protected

In United States v. SCRAP (1973) 412 U.S. 669, 93 S. Ct. 2405, 37 L. Ed. 2d 254 , environmental protection groups challenged a railroad freight increase approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. A three-judge district court granted a preliminary injunction forbidding the commission from permitting the railroads to collect the rate increase. On direct appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that although the plaintiffs had standing under the Administrative Procedure Act, the district court lacked jurisdiction to enter a preliminary injunction since only the Interstate Commerce Commission could suspend rates pending its final decision of their lawfulness. In regard to the standing issue, plaintiff SCRAP alleged that each of its members would suffer economic, recreational, and aesthetic harm as a result of the rate increase. Specifically, SCRAP alleged that the increased freight rates would cause higher prices for finished products, adversely affecting the use of natural resources surrounding the Washington Metropolitan area for recreational and aesthetic purposes, increase air pollution, and increase taxes. Defendants claimed that these allegations as they related to standing were vague, unsubstantiated, andinsufficient, but the Court rejected this view. Under the Administrative Procedure Act, standing was available to those who could show, in allegations capable of proof at trial, injury in fact to an interest arguably within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute which the agencies were claimed to have violated. Injury in fact is not confined to economic harm. Aesthetic and environmental harms could also be the basis for standing and the fact that many other persons also suffer the same injury does not prevent standing.

SCRAP was cited in Bozung, discussed in § 35A.23[3][a], for the proposition that strict rules of standing that might be appropriate in other contexts have no application where broad and long-term effects are involved.

Bozung v. Local Agency Formation Comm'n (1975) 13 Cal. 3d 263, 118 Cal. Rptr. 249, 529 P.2d 1017 , is discussed in § 35A.23[3][a].

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds because the state action contains a classification which is arbitrary, based on a suspect category, or burdens a fundamental interest, and the sufficiency of petitioner's interest in raising such a challenge is an issue. The memorandum establishes that petitioner has sufficient beneficial interest in issuance of a writ because petitioner possesses a professional, business, or economic interest which has suffered or will suffer injury as the result of state action which violates the constitutional rights of a third party. Use the optional paragraph if the challenged state action requires or encourages the petitioner to discriminate against others.

[b] Argument

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. Counsel would demonstrate how petitioner has a special interest, distinguishable from those of the public at large, in the issuance of a writ, and in particular how petitioner has such a professional or economic connection with those subject to discrimination that petitioner may challenge the discriminatory action on their behalf (e.g., a doctor would be subject to penalties if he or she treated patients in a non-discriminatory fashion).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Violation of Third Party's Rights

The factual and procedural background of Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][a]. In that case, petitioners who were holders of on-sale liquor licenses sought to challenge, in a writ of mandate proceeding, a section of the Business and Professions Code which prohibited women, except in limited circumstances, from tending bar on the grounds that it violated the rights of women to equal protection of the law under the federal and state Constitutions. The Court noted that petitioners, who were not women, had standing to raise the constitutional rights of those women excluded from bartending because petitioners were also criminally liable under the statute for hiring women and faced possible license revocations. The Court cited as its authority Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) 381 U.S. 479, 481, 85 S. Ct. 1678, 14 L. Ed. 2d 510 , which held that individuals convicted of a crime could raise the constitutional rights of those with whom they had a close professional relationship in challenging their convictions (5 Cal. 3d 1, 6 n.1).

Counsel will note that neither Sail'er Inn nor the other authorities discussed below explicitly limit standing to raise a third party's rights to situations where the petitioner has suffered an injury which is pecuniary in nature. Nevertheless, cases applying this principle generally involve an injury to one's professional practice or business operations, including a criminal conviction for business-related activities, or a monetary expenditure.

In People v. Belous (1969) 71 Cal. 2d 954, 80 Cal. Rptr. 354, 458 P.2d 194 , cert. denied, 397 U.S. 915 (1970) , a physician was convicted for violation of former Pen. Code § 274, which had penalized the procurement of abortions unless they were necessary to save the woman's life. On appeal, he contended that the statute was unconstitutional in its infringement of a woman's fundamental rights under the federal and state Constitutions. One issue concerned whether the physician could raise this issue. The Court responded that his standing to raise this constitutional question was unchallenged. To support this conclusion, the Court cited Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) 381 U.S. 479, 481, 85 S. Ct. 1678, 14 L. Ed. 2d 510 , and Barrows v. Jackson (1952) 346 U.S. 249, 257, 73 S. Ct. 1031 . Griswold held that individuals convicted of a crime could raise the constitutional rights of those with whom they have a close professional relationship in challenging their conviction. In Barrows, the Court held that where an individual is injured by the operation of a statute, the individual may raise the constitutional rights of those affected by the statute, particularly if it would be difficult, if not impossible, for those persons whose rights are asserted to present their grievances to a court. The Court pointed out that this principle is an exception to the rules that ordinarily one may not claim standing in the United States Supreme Court to vindicate the constitutional rights of some third party, even though one will suffer a direct substantial injury from application of the statute which infringes those rights.

In Burns v. State Compensation Ins. Fund (1968) 265 Cal. App. 2d 98, 71 Cal. Rptr. 326 , plaintiff, who suffered a serious industrial injury at his place of employment, brought an action for damages against his company's workers' compensation insurer and a nonprofit, unincorporated association comprised of all workers' compensation insurers licensed to do business in California. The basis for his complaint was that defendants failed to perform carefully their safety inspections at his employer's mill. The trial court sustained the insurance company's demurrer without leave to amend and granted the association's motion for summary judgment because of statutes disallowing both lawsuits. On appeal, plaintiff contended that the California statutes which denied him a cause of action violated the right to equal protection of independent safety engineers because it held them liable for their negligent safety inspections while exonerating entities such as the defendants. The court of appeal determined that plaintiff had the requisite standing to raise this constitutional issue. Generally, a party attacking the constitutionality of a statute must show some actual orthreatened injury, and it is usually stated that only a member of a class discriminated against by a statute can attack it. However, when the complaining party is injured by the legislation, although not a member of the class discriminated against, he or she may raise the question. In this case, plaintiff was injured by the statutes in question because they narrow the group against which he can recover for a negligent inspection of his employer's facility. However, the court failed to find an actual denial of equal protection and affirmed the decision of the trial court (265 Cal. App. 2d 98, 104-105) .

[b] Being Required or Encouraged to Discriminate Against Others

In Monterey Mechanical Co. v. Wilson (9th Cir. 1997) 125 F.3d 702, 714-715 , the court invalidated a statute requiring California agencies to award contracts to the lowest bidder which met or demonstrated a good-faith effort to meet certain goals for participation by minority-, women-, and disabled-veteran-owned business. The facts and procedural background of this case are discussed in § 35A.22[3][b]. As one of the grounds for its decision that a contractor who failed to meet the requirements of the statute had standing to challenge it, the court stated that a person suffers injury if the government requires or encourages as a condition of granting a benefit that he or she discriminate against others on the basis of their race or sex.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Violation of Third Party's Rights

In Quong Ham Wah Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm'n (1920) 184 Cal. 26, 192 P. 1021 , an employer contested an award pursuant to Section 58 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act on the ground that the section was unconstitutional because it violated the privileges and immunities clause of U.S. Const., art. IV, § 2 . Section 58 extended the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission to the injuries of California residents working for California employers when the injury occurred outside California but denied relief to non-California residents who were injured while working for California residents outside the state. The Supreme Court held that the statute was unconstitutional as applied to nonresidents, but could be saved by interpreting the statute to extend its protection to nonresidents as well as residents.

The Court allocated much of its decision to analyzing whether or not the employer had standing to question the constitutionality of Section 58. It noted that generally a statute which denies equal rights and privileges by discriminating against persons and classes of persons may not be raised by one not belonging to the class discriminated against. However, the general rule is not a hard-and-fast rule which must be arbitrarily and inflexibly applied in every situation involving the constitutionality of the statute; it must necessarily be subject to certain well-defined exceptions (184 Cal. 26, 29-30), . In this case, the Act did not give the commission jurisdiction over controversies arising out of injuries sustained outside of California by nonresidents. The Court reasoned that, therefore, a nonresident would have no standing before the commission or any court to make a claim under the Act, and thus neither the commission nor the court could adjudicate the constitutional question involved. In this situation, where no member of a class alleged to be unlawfully discriminated against by a statute is in a position to raise the constitutional question, then any person having a claim to which the constitutional issue is fairly relevant can raise the question. The Court commented that a contrary rule would prevent a court from exercising its function of constitutional review and require it to enforce for all time a statute which might be obviously void (184 Cal. 31-32) . Thus, the Court held that the employer may raise the constitutional question because, although it is not a victim of discrimination, it is injured by reason of the legislation which imposes on it the liability of an insurer for certain classes of its employees and thus deprives it of property. If, for any reason, the legislation is unconstitutional, such deprivation would be without due process of law (184 Cal. 34).

[b] Subsequent Developments

Counsel will note that Quong Ham Wah could have been decided on the narrower rule that standing exists to challenge the violation of a third party's constitutional rights where the challenger has suffered an injury which is pecuniary in nature but the Court chose to render a broader rule which states that where the third party cannot challenge a constitutional violation, then any party injured in some way by the statute may raise the third party's rights. In Barrows v. Jackson (1952) 346 U.S. 249, 257, 73 S. Ct. 1031, 97 L. Ed. 1586 , the United States Supreme Court held, similarly, that a party injured by state action has standing to vindicate the constitutional rights of a third party where the action of a state court might result in a denial of these rights and it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the persons whose rights are asserted to present their grievance before any court. The Supreme Court cited Quong Ham Wah as authority for a principle of law which was different from its own ruling but sufficiently analogous to lend it support.

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action contains a classification which is arbitrary, based on a suspect category, or burdens a fundamental interest, and the sufficiency of petitioner's interest in raising such a challenge is an issue. The memorandum establishes that petitioner has sufficient beneficial interest in issuance of the writ because the petitioner possesses, at a minimum, an interest in enforcement of the law and the state action involves performance of a public duty in compliance with law.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Violation Involving Public Duty

In Board of Social Welfare v. Los Angeles County (1945) 27 Cal. 2d 98, 162 P.2d 627 , the Board of Social Welfare petitioned for an original writ of mandamus to compel the county to comply with its order that it issue duplicate warrants to three recipients of aid for the aged to replace three warrants which had been cancelled. The first issue the court addressed was if the board was a "party beneficially interested" in the issuance of the warrants as those terms are used in Code Civ. Proc. § 1086. The Court concluded that it was, citing the general rule that if a question is one of public right and the object of the mandamus is to procure the enforcement of a public duty, the petitioner need not show any legal or special interest in the result, since it is sufficient if the petitioner is interested as a citizen in having the laws executed and the duty in question enforced. In this case, the court viewed the provision of public aid to the needy aged as a matter of state-wide concern. However, the court denied the petition because the aid recipients had not applied for duplicate warrants as required by statute.

Counsel should note that, despite the broad language of the rule relied on in Board of Social Welfare, it has generally been applied when thecitizens seeking the writ showed some interest in the result beyond their interest as citizens. Thus, in Board of Social Welfare itself the court pointed out that persons who were aged and needy may be financially and physically unable to maintain a law suit on their own behalf and to deny them the assistance of the welfare board would tend to defeat the purposes of the welfare legislation. Further, the board was the only state agency with full power to supervise every phase of the administration of the public assistance plans. In American Friends Serv. Comm., discussed below, plaintiffs had "important, valid, helpful, and legitimate" interests in the welfare of prison inmates which was the subject of the writ. And in Bozung v. Local Agency Formation Comm'n, discussed in § 35A.25[4][a], plaintiffs had alleged that they would be harmed by the environmental effects of the annexation challenged in the petition for a writ.

In American Friends Serv. Comm. v. Procunier (1973) 33 Cal. App. 3d 252, 109 Cal. Rptr. 22 , four nonprofit corporations which were active in the areas of prison reform and prison inmate welfare sought a writ of mandate directing the Department of Corrections and the Adult Authority, in formulating their rules and regulations, to comply with the state Administrative Procedure Act. The trial court granted the writ and defendants appealed. On appeal, defendants argued that plaintiffs lacked standing to sue. The court of appeal disagreed. It relied on Board of Social Welfare, discussed above, for the rule that if the question is one of public, as opposed to private, interest, and the petitioner seeks performance of a public duty, the ordinary requirement that a petitioner must demonstrate the necessity of a writ to enforce or protect a specific legal right that is clear, present, certain, and substantial is relaxed. It concluded that if the petition for mandate alleges that a government department is not complying with the law and seeks a court order compelling such compliance, the object of the mandate sought constitutes enforcement of a public duty under the Board of Social Welfare rule. However, the court reversed the action of the trial court on the ground that the Administrative Procedure Act was not applicable to defendants.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Violation Involving Public Duty

The factual background of Bozung v. Local Agency Formation Comm'n (1975) 13 Cal. 3d 263, 118 Cal. Rptr. 249, 529 P.2d 1017 , is discussed in § 35A.23[3][a]. In that case, the Supreme Court held that a county resident and taxpayer and a coalition of county taxpayers and residents had standing to challenge an annexation by a city, whether or not they resided in the city or the property to be annexed, for the dual reasons that they had alleged harm from the environmental effects of the challenged annexation and because they sought to procure enforcement of a public duty, the preparation of an environmental impact report. On the issue of standing to enforce a public duty, the Court cited Kappadahl v. Alcan Pac. Co. (1963) 222 Cal. App. 2d 626, 643, 35 Cal. Rptr. 354 , which relied on the same principle stated in Board of Social Welfare v. Los Angeles County, discussed above.

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question, while facially neutral, was intentionally administered, applied, or enforced in a way which created classifications that are arbitrary or based on a suspect category. The principle would presumably apply also to the creation of classifications which infringe a fundamental interest, but the authorities relied on in this form do not discuss this issue.

When appropriate, counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Intentional Classification by Application or Administration of Facially Neutral State Action as Sufficient

In Williams v. Illinois (1970) 399 U.S. 235, 90 S. Ct. 2018, 26 L. Ed. 2d 586 , an indigent defendant in a criminal case attempted to void that part of his sentence which required him to "work off" the unpaid part of his fine at the rate of $5 per day. The trial court denied the petition and the Supreme Court of Illinois affirmed. On appeal, the United States Supreme Court vacated the judgment and remanded the case because permitting the aggregate imprisonment of an indigent criminal defendant to exceed the maximum period fixed by statute as the result of involuntary nonpayment of a fine or court cost created an impermissible discrimination which violated the Fourteenth Amendment. In reaching this result, the Court had to address the fact that the Illinois statute did not explicitly distinguish between defendants on the basis of ability to pay fines. On its face, the statute extended to all defendants an apparently equal opportunity for limiting confinement to the statutory maximum simply by satisfying a money judgment. But in fact this was an illusory choice for any indigent. As applied to an indigent defendant, the statute worked an invidious discrimination solely on the basis of inability to pay. A law nondiscriminatory on its face may be grossly discriminatory in its operation.

The factual background of Murguia v. Municipal Court (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 286, 124 Cal. Rptr. 204, 540 P.2d 44 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][b]. In that case, the Supreme Court was required to determine whether discriminatory enforcement of a statute fair on its face could constitute a violation of equal protection. The Supreme Court held that the purposeful and intentional administration or application of a state law, although fair on its face, so that it discriminates between persons in similar circumstances constitutes a violation of equal protection. The Court referred to the landmark decision of Yick Wo v. Hopkins (1866) 118 U.S. 356, 373-374, 6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220 , which stated that when a law which is fair on its face and impartial in its appearance is applied and administered with an evil eye and unequal hand so as to make unjust and illegal discriminations between people in similar circumstances which are material to their rights, the Constitution has been violated. The Court added that this principle is applicable to both penal and nonpenal statutes. In the instant case, if defendants were prosecuted because of their union activities, such a prosecution was as invidious as a prosecution based on racial, religious, ethnic, or any other arbitrary grounds.

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question, while facially neutral or unmotivated by discriminatory bias, has a differential impact on members of a protected group and burdens their fundamental interests. In that the scope of this principle has not been determined, counsel may add the material in brackets to limit the principle to situations expressly discussed in the authority provided [see § 35A.27[3][b]].

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

A related memorandum of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate which describes how state action classifies individuals is set out in § 35A.26.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classification by Differential Impact of Facially Neutral State Action as Sufficient

The factual background of Crawford v. Board of Educ. (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 280, 130 Cal. Rptr. 724, 551 P.2d 28 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][b]. In that case, the Court held that under the equal protection clause of the California Constitution, a school board must take reasonably feasible steps to alleviate school segregation whether such segregation is de jure or de facto in nature and even where it is the result of facially neutral policies. The Court gave substantial attention to the school board's defense that it had not caused the segregation and, therefore, should not be responsible for alleviating it. It emphasized that, under certain circumstances, a government body or official is not free to adopt any facially neutral policy of its choosing oblivious of the policy's actual discriminatory impact (3 Cal. 3d. 861, 864-868) .

The decision in Crawford appears to conflict with the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Washington v. Davis (1976) 426 U.S. 229, 238-239, 96 S. Ct. 2040, 48 L. Ed. 2d 597 , which held that to establish a prima facie case alleging a form of discrimination which is forbidden by the United States Constitution, there must be evidence of discriminatory intent, purpose, or motive. The conflict between Crawford and Washington is expressed explicitly in the context of school segregation. Crawford holds that school boards must take steps to alleviate school segregation, regardless of whether the cause of the segregation was de factor or de jure [Crawford v. Board of Educ. (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 280, 284-285, 130 Cal. Rptr. 724, 551 P.2d 28] . Washington rejected de facto segregation as a constitutional violation. It stated that the essential element of de jure segregation is a current condition of segregation resulting from intentional school action; the differentiating factor between de jure segregation and so-called de facto segregation is purpose or intent to segregate [Washington v. Davis (1976) 426 U.S. 229, 240, 96 S. Ct. 2040, 48 L. Ed. 2d 597] .

[b] Scope of Authority

Whether the California Supreme Court will extend the reasoning in Crawford to other situations of possible unconstitutional discrimination is not clear. It stated that those who compile jury lists and select jury panels have a duty to make sure that their actions do not have discriminatory results. Otherwise, the Court merely added that the obligation to design programs or frame policies so as to avoid discriminatory results exists in some circumstances. It seems important, however, that, as the Court pointed out, school segregation on a racial basis not only classifies individuals on an impermissible basis but it infringes the fundamentalinterest of education. Likewise, the Court might have said that discriminatory jury lists are based on suspect categories and infringe the fundamental interest of liberty [see People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 251-252, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375 , set out in § 35A.42[3][a]]. In this regard, the Court subsequently rejected, without mentioning Crawford, application of the differential impact test to a discriminatory employment examination where it failed to find any infringement of a fundamental right under the California Constitution [Hardy v. Stumph (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 1, 7, 145 Cal. Rptr. 176, 576 P.2d 1342 , set out in § 35A.39[3][a]]. Thus, a broad reading of Crawford would be that any classification which is based on a suspect category and infringes a fundamental interest would violate Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a), even though it is the unintended result of the differential impact of a facially neutral policy. A narrow reading of Crawford would limit its governing principle to the two situations of jury and school segregation which it discusses.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Hostility and Prejudice as Not Legitimate Public Purpose

In Parr v. Municipal Court (1971) 3 Cal. 3d 861, 92 Cal. Rptr. 153, 479 P.2d 353 , the defendant in a criminal proceeding sought a writ of mandate to restrain the trial court from proceeding with the trial. The Supreme Court granted the writ, holding that the municipal ordinance which was the basis for criminal prosecution violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because of its discriminatory purpose. The Court noted that a law which expresses hostility, antagonism, or prejudice toward a particular group violates the Fourteenth Amendment. Not only must a statutory classification bear a rational relationship to the purpose of the statute, but the purpose must be a permissible one. The Court referred to legislation with an impermissible purpose as class legislation designed to punish or treat with severity persons of any unpopular class, sect, creed, or nation. Even if the statute was written in facially neutral language, the public statements of its sponsors and the impact it will have on the community may be examined to determine whether the purpose is impermissible. In the instant case, the purpose of the ordinance, to discourage persons known as "hippies" from congregating in the city, was clear both from the language of the urgency clause which stated that the city was in danger of ruin due to an extraordinary influx of undesirable and unsanitary visitors to the city, sometimes known as hippies, as well as from the failure of the ordinance to confine its language to persons whoengaged in illegal conduct. This discriminatory purpose alone would invalidate the ordinance, even if it did not have a predictable discriminatory impact (3 Cal. 3d 861, 864-868) .

It should be noted that several of the cases cited by the Court for its conclusion that a discriminatory purpose will invalidate a statute concerned discrimination based on race, alienage, or national origin which are established suspect categories. Parr explicitly goes beyond the traditional list of characteristics provided by the Fourteenth Amendment and provides protection to any class that is the victim of hostility and prejudice. The Court stated that it had been consistently vigilant to protect racial groups from the effects of official prejudice and it could be no less concerned when the human beings currently in disfavor were identifiable by dress and attitudes rather than by color (3 Cal. 3d 861, 870) .

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classifications Based on Race as Suspect

In Gratz v. Bollinger (2003) 539 U.S. 244, 123 S. Ct. 2411, 156 L. Ed. 2d 257 , two Caucasian applicants to the University of Michigan who were denied admission filed a class action challenging the undergraduate admissions policy, which utilized race as a consideration, as violating the Equal Protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. The District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan first concluded that the University and amici curiae presented solid evidence that a racially and ethnically diverse student body produces significant educational benefits such that achieving such a student body constitutes a compelling governmental interest. The district court then determined that the admissions program the University began using in 1999, awarding 20 points, or one-fifth of the points needed to guarantee admission, to every single underrepresented minority applicant solely because of race, was a narrowly tailored means of achieving the University's interest in the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse student body, but that the University's prior practice of "protecting" or "reserving" seats for underrepresented minority applicants effectively kept nonprotected applicants from competing for those slots and operated as the functional equivalent of a constitutionally infirm quota. The district court granted the applicants' motion for summary judgment with respect to the admissions programs in existence from 1995 through 1998, and the University's motion with respect to the admissions programs for 1999 and 2000, and denied the applicants' request for injunctive relief. The district court certified two questions for interlocutory appeal to the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals. Both parties appealed aspects of the district court's rulings, and the Court of Appeals heard the case en banc on the same day as Grutter v. Bollinger, in which the University of Michigan's law school's admissions program was challenged as violating equal protection as well. The Sixth Circuit issued an opinion in Grutter, upholding the law school admissions program, and the petitioner in that case sought a writ of certiorari from the United States Supreme Court. The applicants in this case asked the Supreme Court to grant certiorari in this case as well, despite the fact that the Court of Appeals had not yet rendered a judgment, so that the Supreme Court could address the constitutionality of the consideration of race in university admissions in a wider range of circumstances. The Supreme Court granted certiorari in both cases.

The Supreme Court in this case held that the University's policy, automatically distributing points to every single underrepresented minority applicant solely because of race, was not narrowly tailored to achieve the interest in educational diversity that the University claimed justifies the program (123 S. Ct. 2411, 2427-2428). The Court found that the automatic distribution of points has the effect of making the factor of race decisive for virtually every minimally qualified underrepresented minority applicant, instead of considering how the differing backgrounds, experiences, and characteristics of students might benefit the University. The fact that the review committee could look at the applications individually and ignore the points once an application was flagged was of little comfort under the strict scrutiny analysis. Because the University's use of race in its freshman admissions policy was not narrowly tailored to achieve the asserted compelling interest in diversity, the admissions policy violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, as well as Title VI and 42 U.S.C. § 1981 (123 S. Ct. 2411, 2428-2431).

On the other hand, in Grutter v. Bollinger (2003) 539 U.S. 306, 123 S. Ct. 2325, 156 L. Ed. 2d 304 , the University of Michigan Law School admissions policy required admissions officials to evaluate each applicant based on all the information available in the applicant's file, including a personal statement, letters of recommendation, and an essay describing the ways in which the applicant will contribute to the life and diversity of the Law School. The policy aspired to achieve a diversity with the potential to enrich everyone's education and make a law school class stronger than the sum of its parts, but did not restrict the types of diversity contributions eligible for "substantial weight" in the admissions process. The policy did, however, reaffirm the Law School's longstanding commitment to racial and ethnic diversity with special reference to the inclusion of students from groups historically discriminated against, like African-Americans, Hispanics, and Native Americans, and referred to enrolling a "critical mass" of underrepresented minorities. The District Court conducted a bench trial on the extent to which race was a factor in the Law School's admissions decisions and whether the consideration of race constituted a race-based double standard. Applying strict scrutiny, the District Court concluded that the Law School's use of race as a factor in admissions decisions was unlawful. The District Court determined that the Law School's asserted interest in assembling a diverse student body was not compelling, and that even if diversity were compelling, the Law School had not narrowly tailored its use of race to further that interest. Sitting en banc, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed. The Court of Appeals held that Justice Powell's opinion in Regents of University of California v. Bakke (1978) 438 U.S. 265, 98 S. Ct. 2733, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750 (see § 35A.29[3][b]) was binding precedent establishing diversity as a compelling state interest and that the use of race was narrowly tailored because race was merely a "potential plus factor" and because the program was virtually identical to the Harvard admissions program described approvingly by Justice Powell in Bakke. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve disagreement amongthe Courts of Appeals on the question of whether diversity is a compelling interest that can justify the narrowly tailored use of race in selecting applicants for admission to public universities.

The Supreme Court affirmed. The Court first examined Bakke and its aftermath. The Court endorsed Justice Powell's view in Bakke that student body diversity is a compelling state interest that can justify the use of race in university admissions. The Court held that the Law School's use of race is justified by a compelling state interest in student body diversity, deferring to the Law School's educational judgment that diversity is essential to its educational mission (123 S. Ct. 2325, 2337-2338) . The Court then found that the Law School's admissions program was narrowly tailored because the Law School engages in a highly individualized, holistic review of each applicant's file, giving serious consideration to all the ways an applicant might contribute to a diverse educational environment. The Law School gives substantial weight to diversity factors besides race and accepts nonminority applicants with grades and test scores lower than underrepresented minority applicants and other nonminority applicants who are rejected. Finally, the Court held that the Law School adequately considered race-neutral alternatives capable of producing a critical mass without forcing the Law School to abandon the academic selectivity that is the cornerstone of its educational mission, and concluded that the admissions policy does not unduly burden individuals who are not members of the favored racial and ethnic groups. The Court concluded that the Equal Protection Clause does not prohibit the Law School's narrowly tailored use of race in admissions decisions to further a compelling interest in obtaining the educational benefits that flow from a diverse student body and that the statutory claims based on Title VI and 42 U.S.C. § 1981 also fail (123 S. Ct. 2325, 2343-2347) .

Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena (1995) 515 U.S. 200, 115 S. Ct. 2097, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158 , involved a constitutional challenge to a federal government policy of providing general contractors on governmental projects a financial incentive to hire subcontractors controlled by "socially and economically disadvantaged individuals" and in particular the government's use of a presumption that certain racial minorities were socially and economically disadvantaged, thereby qualifying for the incentives. Plaintiff submitted the lowest bid on the guardrail portion of a federally financed highway project, but was not awarded the subcontract. Instead the subcontract went to a company controlled by a racial minority. Plaintiff filed suit against various federal officials in federal district court, claiming that the policy violated its right to equal protection. The district court granted the government's motion for summary judgment, and the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari and reversed.

The Court reviewed its previous decisions and noted that some earlier cases had suggested that racial discrimination by the federal government was subject to a less strict level of scrutiny under the Fifth Amendment than that which applied to state and local governments under the Fourteenth Amendment (132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 173) . However, the Court observed that its later decisions, through Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co. (1989) 488 U.S. 469, 109 S. Ct. 706, 102 L. Ed. 2d 854 , had established three general propositions about governmental racial classifications. First, any prefererence based on racial or ethnic criteria must necessarily receive a most searching examination. Second, the standard of review under the Equal Protection Clause does not depend on the race of the persons burdened or benefited by a particular classification, i.e., all racial classifications reviewable under the Equal Protection Clause must be strictly scrutinized. Third, equal protection analysis under the Fifth Amendment is the same as under the Fourteenth Amendment (132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 179-180) . The Court noted that a subsequent case, Metro Broadcasting v. FCC (1990) 497 U.S. 547, 110 S. Ct. 2997, 111 L. Ed. 2d 445 , had taken a "surprising turn" by holding that "benign" racial classifications by the federal government (as distinguished from the states) need only satisfy "intermediate" scrutiny and that such classifications were constitutional to the extent that they served important governmental objectives within the power of Congress and were substantially related to the achievement of those objectives (132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 180) . The Court in Adarand Contractors concluded, however, that Metro Broadcasting was a significant departure from its previous holdings and that the lesser scrutiny of "benign" classifications did not accord wth the Court's understanding of equal protection. The Court therefore held that all racial classifications, whether imposed by federal, state, or local government actors, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny--i.e., such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests (132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 182-183) . The Court therefore overruled Metro Broadcasting to the extent that it was inconsistent with the Court's holding (132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 182) .

Palmore v. Sidoti (1984) 466 U.S. 429, 104 S. Ct. 1879, 80 L. Ed. 2d 421 , involved a divorced mother whose custody of her daughter was taken away and given to the child's father when the mother, who was white, remarried a black man. The trial court had made findings that both of the child's parents were fit and devoted, as were the new spouses of each of them. However, based on a report by the court counselor, stating that the child would be subject to societal prejudice and pressure because of her mother's intermarriage, the court awarded custody to the father. The Second District Court of Appeal affirmed. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari and reversed.

The Supreme Court stated that a core purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to do away with all governmentally imposed discrimination based on race. The Court, citing McLaughlin v. Florida (1964) 379 U.S. 184, 85 S. Ct. 283, 13 L. Ed. 2d 222 , discussed below, stated that classifications of people according to their race are subject to the most exacting scrutiny, and to pass constitutional muster they must be justified by a compelling governmental interest and must be necessary to the accomplishment of its legitimate purpose (466 U.S. 429, 432-433) . The Court agreed that the best interests of the child is of substantial governmental interest, but the Court stated that it had little difficulty concluding that the risk of racial prejudice against the child is not a sufficient reason to remove a child from the custody of a fit parent. The Court stated that acknowledged racial prejudice cannot justify a racial classification in which constitutionally protected rights are denied (466 U.S. 429, 433-434) .

McLaughlin v. Florida (1964) 379 U.S. 184, 85 S. Ct. 283, 13 L. Ed. 2d 222 , involved a criminal conviction under a Florida statute which made it an offense for a white person and a Negro of opposite sexes who were not married to each other to habitually live in and occupy in the nighttime the same room. Defendants appealed their conviction first to the Florida Supreme Court, which affirmed, and then to the United States Supreme Court, which reversed on the ground that the statute violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In its decision, the Court first determined that the statute presented a classification based on race because no couple other than an interracial couple could be convicted under this statute, and no other statute proscribed the same conduct when committed by couples of the same race. Second, the Court established that classifications based on race must be viewed in light of the historical fact that the central purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to eliminate racial discrimination emanating from official sources in the states. This strong policy renders racial classifications constitutionally suspect and subject to the most rigid scrutiny. They are, in most circumstances, irrelevant to any constitutionally acceptable legislative purpose. Third, the Court then focused its inquiry on whether or not there clearly appeared some overriding statutory purpose requiring the proscription of the specified conduct when engaged in by a white person and a black person but not otherwise. Without such justification, the racial classification would be reduced to an invidious discrimination forbidden by the equal protection clause (379 U.S. 184, 191-192) .

[b] Racial Classifications as Suspect Even Though Benign

Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena (1995) 515 U.S. 200, 115 S. Ct. 2097, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158 , is discussed in § 35A.29[3][a].

In Regents of University of California v. Bakke (1978) 438 U.S. 265, 98 S. Ct. 2733, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750 , plaintiff, a white male who had been denied admission to a state medical school in California, brought an action in state court for declaratory and injunctive relief against defendant university regents claiming, in part, that the medical school's special admissions program for disadvantaged members of minority races violated his right to equal protection. The trial court ruled that the program violated the equal protection clauses of the federal and state constitutions but refused to order plaintiff's admission to medical school because he did not show that he would have been admitted but for existence of the special program favoring minorities. On appeal, the California Supreme Court reversed the part of the trial court's decision that failed to require the medical school to accept plaintiff. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari and affirmed and reversed in part. Justice Powell, who delivered the opinion of the Court, decided that the special admissions program violated equal protection guarantees. On this point, he was not joined by any other justices, but four members of the Court were willing to hold the program invalid as a violation of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 [42 U.S.C. §§ 2000d-2000d-6], which prohibits racial discrimination in any program receiving federal financial assistance (438 U.S. 265, 408-421) . Thus, a majority of justices affirmed the decision of the California Supreme Court in so far as it invalidated the special admissions program and required the admission of plaintiff.

However, a separate majority of justices made up of Justice Powell and four other justices writing their own opinion was willing to examine other equal protection issues in the case. This majority agreed that race was a factor which was permissible to take into consideration under the equal protection clause and reversed the state Supreme Court in so far as it prohibited defendant regents from according any consideration to race in its future admissions process (438 U.S. 265, 320, 379) .

This same majority also supported the view that a classification based on race was subject to strict scrutiny regardless of its purpose. On this point, the university regents argued that the racial classifications should be sustained because they were reasonably related to the university's benign purpose of remedying the effects of past societal discrimination; it contended that strict scrutiny was not appropriate because white males are not a discrete and insular minority such as black persons and do not require extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process. In response, Justice Powell found that racial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are inherently suspect and thus call for the most exacting judicial examination (438 U.S. 265, 291) . Although discreteness and insularity may be relevant in deciding whether to add new types of classifications to the list of "suspect" categories, these qualities are neither necessary nor sufficient to establish that a particular classification is invidious (438 U.S. 265, 290-291) . The justice admitted that school and employment discrimination cases had approved on a rational basis standard the use of remedies which had granted racial preferences, but he distinguished these situations since they had involved proven constitutional or statutory violationsand the remedies had been tailored specifically to address those violations and to compensate identifiable victims (438 U.S. 265, 300-302) . He then tested the medical school's admission program by the strict scrutiny standard--existence of a substantial state interest and a classification necessary to its accomplishment. He concluded that attainment of a diverse student body was a compelling state interest in light of the First Amendment, but that the program in question was not necessary to promote this interest (438 U.S. 265, 314-320) . Instead, the justice endorsed an admissions program at Harvard which takes race into account, along with several other factors, but does not assign a fixed number of places to a minority group (438 U.S. 265, 316-318, 320-324) .

Four other justices also concluded that a racial classification, even if its purpose was benign, should be subject to some form of strict scrutiny (438 U.S. 265, 361-362) . The justices, in their joint opinion, admitted that the school's admissions program did not present an obvious case for application of strict scrutiny since it did not involve a fundamental interest. Furthermore, whites as a class have none of the "traditional indicia" of suspectness, the school's racial purposes were not irrelevant, and it was not promoting racial hatred or inferiority (438 U.S. 265, 357) . Nevertheless, even racial classifications that serve a benign purpose can be misused since they often serve to stereotype and stigmatize those who are politically powerless and represent an immutable characteristic which its possessors are powerless to escape or set aside (438 U.S. 265, 360) . The four parted company with Justice Powell however by concluding that, on the facts of the case, the medical school's articulated purpose of remedying the effects of past societal discrimination was sufficiently important to justify the adoption of its admissions program, since there was a sound basis for concluding that minority underrepresentation was substantial and chronic and that the handicap of past discrimination was impeding access of minorities to the medical school (438 U.S. 265, 362) .

In Monterey Mechanical Co. v. Wilson (9th Cir. 1997) 125 F.3d 702, 710-711 , an unsuccessful bidder for a construction project at a California university brought a federal action against university trustees and the successful bidder asserting that a state statute requiring general contractors to subcontract percentages of work to women-or minority-owned subcontractors, or demonstrate a good faith effort to do so (Pub. Contract Code § 10115 et seq.), violated the equal protection clause. In ruling on the racial portion of the statutory challenge, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that statutes requiring general contractors to subcontract percentages of work to minority-owned subcontractors by imposing a non-rigid system of goals and good-faith efforts, while expressly abjuring quotas, is nevertheless treated as a classification under the equal protection clause. Such provisions are not immunized from scrutiny because they purport to establish goals rather than quotas (125 F.3d 702, 710-711) . The court reiterated that the relevant question is not whether a statute requires the use of such measures, but whether it authorizes or encourages them (125 F.3d 702, 711) . The court went on to hold the statute violated the equal protection clause because there was no evidence the state had engaged in past discrimination against the groups benefitting from the set-asides, and the statute was not narrowly tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest (125 F.3d 702, 712-715) .

[a] Race Subject to Strict Scrutiny

In Richardson v. Runnels (9th Cir. 2010) 594 F.3d 666 , an African-American prison inmate housed in a facility that contained high risk prisoners, a number of whom were African-American, sued prison officials pro se for violation of his equal protection rights based on racial classification as a result of the lockdown of all African-American prisoners in the facility based on incidents involving African-American prisoners, even though all Hispanic or white inmates were not locked down based on incidents involving Hispanic or white prisoners. The district court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment, based on the findings and recommendations of a magistrate. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed. The court found that facts presented by the defendants showed that, in several instances, assaults believed to be perpetrated or planned by prisoners who were African-American led to the lockdown of all African-American inmates in a particular unit of the prison, including plaintiff, and that the defendants apparently believed that without showing any linkage between the perpetrators and the prisoners subjected to the lockdown, it was enough to assume that race alone tied together the perpetrators and the larger group, which was an assumption grounded on race. However, the United States Supreme Court has applied a strict-scrutiny standard for racial classifications in prisons, requiring the government to prove that such measures be narrowly tailored to further a compelling governmental interest (594 F.3d 666, 671 ; see Johnson v. California (2005) 543 U.S. 499, 505-507, 125 S. Ct. 1141, 160 L. Ed. 2d 949). Even under the weaker reasonableness standard, the assertion that it was sufficient for prison officials simply to believe there to be a link between an individual incident perpetrated by one or two inmates, and the risk of violence from all the African-American prisoners in the facility, with no evidentiary basis whatever indicated for that belief, fell short (594 F.3d 666, 671) . Moving for summary judgment, the defendants had the burden of showing that on undisputed facts, they were entitled to prevail (594 F.3d 666, 671 ; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 56). In this case, the defendants had to show that reasonable men and women could not differ regarding the necessity of a racial classification in response to prison disturbances and that the racial classification was the least restrictive alternative (i.e., that any race-based policies are narrowly tailored to legitimate prison goals). They failed to carry this burden on plaintiff's equal protection claim, as they made no evidentiary showing at all concerning the basis for regarding all African-Americans as a security risk when one or a few African-American inmates were responsible for an assault (594 F.3d 666, 671-672) .

In Smith v. University of Washington (9th Cir. 2004) 392 F.3d 367 , the white applicants to law school whose applications were rejected sued the University of Washington on the grounds that the law school's admissions policy impermissibly discriminated on the basis of race. The district court entered judgment in favor of the law school after a bench trial, and the plaintiffs appealed. External events overtook the litigation: The United States Supreme Court ratified the Ninth Circuit's earlier holding in this case that educational diversity constitutes a compelling state interest (392 F.3d 367, 369) [see Smith v. Univ. of Wash. Law School (9th Cir. 2000) 233 F.3d 1188, 1200-1201 ; see also Grutter v. Bollinger (2003) 539 U.S. 306, 325, 123 S. Ct. 2325, 156 L. Ed. 2d 304 ; Gratz v. Bollinger (2003) 539 U.S. 244, 268, 123 S. Ct. 2411, 156 L. Ed. 2d 257] . In 1998, after plaintiffs filed the action, Washington residents approved a voter initiative prohibiting the kind of race-based affirmative action plan at issue, mooting the plaintiffs' injunctive and declaratory claims, which the district court dismissed (392 F.3d 367, 369) [see Smith v. Univ. of Wash. Law School (9th Cir. 2000) 233 F.3d 1188, 1201] . The Ninth Circuit then held that the law school's admissions program was narrowly tailored to meet the compelling interest of educational diversity during the three years in which the plaintiffs applied and that plaintiffs were not entitled to damages under 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981, 1983, 2000d (392 F.3d 367, 371-382) . None of the three aspects cited by plaintiffs in support of their claim that the law school's admissions program was not narrowly tailored undermined the district court's finding that the law school narrowly tailored its consideration of race and ethnicity to meet the compelling interest of obtaining the educational benefits of diversity. These three aspects were: (1) an ethnicity substantiation letter the law school sent only to some minority applicants; (2) the giving of a plus to Asian Americans; and (3) the referral of a large number of white applicants to the Admissions Committee rather than being directly admitted by an administrator (392 F.3d 367, 376-382) .

In Artichoke Joe's Cal. Grand Casino v. Norton (9th Cir. 2003) 353 F.3d 712 , California card clubs and charities prohibited under California state law from offering casino-style gaming challenged the validity of compactsentered into under the federal Indian Gaming Regulatory Act (25 U.S.C. § 2701 et seq.) between the State of California and certain Indian tribes as violating their right to equal protection under the federal Constitution (353 F.3d 712, 714) . The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the distinction between Indian and non-Indian gaming interests was a political not a racial classification, so that the proper level of review was whether the distinction had a rational basis and that legitimate state interests--the regulation of vice activity which lies at the heart of a state's police powers by permitting certain forms of gambling only on the lands of sovereign tribal entities entering into government-to-government compacts with the state and to promote cooperative relationships between the tribes and the state by fostering tribal sovereignty and self-sufficiency--justified the grant to Indian tribes of a monopoly on class III gaming (353 F.3d 712, 731-742) .

In Connerly v. State Personnel Board (2001) 92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 112 Cal. Rptr. 2d 5 , a private citizen continued litigation commenced by a governor challenging five statutory programs falling within the general rubric of "affirmative action," on the ground they impermissibly establish classifications and preferences based on race, ethnicity, and gender. The trial court found invalid a portion of one scheme and all of another, but otherwise rejected the plaintiff's contentions (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 27) . The Court of Appeal reversed and remanded, holding that all of four of the schemes were invalid and as to the fifth, a portion could be severed from the remaining invalid portions and upheld (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 28) . The court found that (1) under the federal and California Constitutions, strict scrutiny applies to racial classifications, (2) under the state Constitution, strict scrutiny applies to gender classifications, and (3) Proposition 209 (Cal. Const., art. I, § 31) imposes additional restrictions against racial and gender preferences and discriminatory actions (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 19-41) . The court found further that insofar as the challenged statutory schemes utilize race and gender classifications, they are invalid (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 28) .

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challengeis that the state action in question contains a classification based on ancestry which is not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classification Based on National Origin as Suspect

In Oyama v. California (1947) 332 U.S. 633, 68 S. Ct. 269, 92 L. Ed. 249 , appellants, an alien of Japanese descent and his minor son, who was an American citizen, challenged the constitutionality of part of Section 9 of California's Alien Land Law [former Stats. 1921, p. lxxxiii, as amended]. This law provided that whenever aliens ineligible for citizenship acquired agricultural property it would escheat to the state and any transfer made to avoid escheat would have the same effect. The statute also created a presumption of intent to avoid escheat whenever an ineligible alien paid the consideration for a transfer of property to another citizen or eligible alien. On two occasions, appellant father had paid for land transferred to his son, and it was this land that the state attempted to escheat. The United States Supreme Court, in reversing the California Supreme Court which upheld the provision, did not reach the question of whether or not the law violated any equal protection guarantees for the father because it discriminated against aliens. Instead, the Court found discrimination against the son on the basis of national origin.

Although the two-tier test for equal protection analysis was not explicitly formulated when Oyama was decided, the Court employed a comparable analysis. It stated that the relevant issue was whether discrimination between citizens on the basis of their racial descent was justifiable and affirmed that only the most exceptional circumstances could excuse discrimination on that basis in the face of the equal protection clause. The state advanced only one justification for the law and the Court found it inadequate.

[b] Relation to Racial Discrimination

It should also be also noted that cases which involve discrimination on the basis of ancestry may involve a national group which is a racial minority. Indeed, the Court in Oyama used the term "racial descent" as if it were synonymous with ancestry or country of origin and the California Supreme Court has commented that the United States Supreme Court has applied the Fourteenth Amendment in several cases to bar state-imposed discrimination based upon ancestry, whether racial or national [see Castro v. California (1970) 2 Cal. 3d 223, 229 n.9, 85 Cal. Rptr. 20, 466 P.2d 244 , set out in § 35A.48[3][a]]. Nevertheless, both Oyama and Fujii v. California (1952) 38 Cal. 2d 718, 242 P.2d 617 , discussed below, are decisions which clearly address discrimination based on national origin although showing an awareness of the related racial discrimination. As its guiding principle, the Court cited Hirabayashi v. United States (1943) 320 U.S. 81, 100, 63 S. Ct. 1375, 87 L. Ed. 1774 , for the rule that distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded on the doctrine of equality. This case creates such distinctions. Whenever the parent of a citizen or eligible alien paid for a conveyance to his or her child, the law presumed that the parent intended a gift. But if the parent was an ineligible alien, the Alien Land Law in effect created a presumption that the conveyance was not a gift. The minor's burden of establishing ownership was far greater than that placed on other minor donees, and the sole basis for this distinction was the fact that the father was Japanese and not, for example, American, Russian, Chinese, or English.

In Fujii v. California (1952) 38 Cal. 2d 718, 242 P.2d 617 , appellant, a Japanese alien who was ineligible for citizenship under federal naturalization law, appealed from a judgment declaring that certain land which he had purchased had escheated to the state under California's former Alien Land Law [former Stats. 1921, p. 1xxxiii, as amended]. The Supreme Court held that the law violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the state law classified persons on the basis of eligibility for citizenship, the underlying federal naturalization law restricted only the Japanese and a few small racial groups from the right to citizenship. Thus, the California law in fact classified on the basis of race or nationality. Although a legislative classification will generally be sustained if it is reasonable and bears a substantial relation to a legitimate objective, classifications on the basis of race are immediately suspect and subjected to the most rigid scrutiny. In the Court's view, discrimination because of nationality was comparable to racial discrimination; it stated that the presumption of constitutional validity was greatly narrowed in scope, if not dispelled entirely, whenever it was shown that legislation actually discriminates against certain persons because of their race or nationality. In response to the argument that a statute might be justified indenying property rights to aliens who could become citizens but chose not to, the Court pointed out that the classification in this case does not withhold property from aliens because of anything they have done or any beliefs they hold, but solely because they are Japanese and not French or Italian. Because the Court found that none of the other reasons proposed to justify the classification were adequate, it declared the law invalid.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classifications Based on Alienage as Suspect

Examining Bd v. Flores de Otero (1976) 426 U.S. 572, 96 S. Ct. 2264, 49 L. Ed. 2d 65 , was a constitutional challenge to a statute of Puerto Rico that required applicants for registration as licensed engineers or architects to be citizens of the United States. The challengers, who were alien legal residents of Puerto Rico, brought actions in a federal district court for declaratory and injunctive relief for violation of their rights under two post-Civil War civil rights statutes [42 U.S.C. §§ 1981, 1983]. They prevailed, and Puerto Rico appealed. The United States Supreme Court first inquired if Puerto Rico's statute restricting aliens in the private practice of engineering deprived them of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The Court noted that it was not clear whether the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment or the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment applied to residents of Puerto Rico, but that it need not resolve that precise question because statutory restriction on theability of aliens to engage in the otherwise lawful practice of civil engineering was plainly unconstitutional under either the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment or the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. Applying relevant principles, the Court confirmed that state classifications based on alienage were subject to strict judicial scrutiny for two reasons:

- Aliens as a class are a prime example of a discrete and insular minority for whom heightened judicial solicitude is appropriate.

- The regulation of aliens is a field of primary federal responsibility because of the federal government's duties in regard to immigration and naturalization.

The Court then cited several cases in which official discrimination against lawfully admitted aliens was struck down and concluded that the statute in question could be nullified as eiher a violation of equal protection or due process.

The factual background of Raffaelli v. Committee of Bar Examiners (1972) 7 Cal. 3d 288, 101 Cal. Rptr. 896, 496 P.2d 1264 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][d]. The California Supreme Court held that a statute that prevented aliens from practicing law in California violated both U.S. Const., amend. XIV, § 1 and former Cal. Const., art. I, §§ 11, 21 [now see

Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a)]. The Court reasoned that both citizens and aliens are entitled to equal protection of the law and that classifications based on alienage, like those based on nationality or race, are inherently suspect and subject to close judicial scrutiny. Judicial protection of aliens is particularly important because they are frequently the victims of prejudice, they lack the means of self-protection through exercise of the right to vote, and frequently the discrimination practiced against them would deny them employment. In the instant case, the state failed to justify the statute by showing how it promoted a compelling state interest. The Court found that, in fact, the state's argument even failed to show that the challenged classification had a rational connection with the applicant's fitness or capacity to practice law.

[b] Subsequent Developments

Subsequent to Otero, the United States Supreme Court has vacillated on the question of whether or not classifications based on alienage are subject to strict judicial scrutiny when a fundamental interest was not also at stake. In Nyquist v. Mauclet (1977) 432 U.S. 1, 12, 97 S. Ct. 2120, 53 L. Ed. 2d 63 , the Court invalidated a New York statute that prevented resident aliens from obtaining state financial assistance for higher education unless they indicated an intent to become American citizens. In a dissent, Chief Justice Burger pointed out that prior cases applied the strict scrutiny standard to alienage only in situations of employment or welfare where the essential means of economic survival were threatened (432 U.S. 1, 13-14) . The majority responded that classifications based on alienage are inherently suspect and therefore subject to strict scrutiny whether or not a fundamental right is impaired. However, in Foley v. Connelie (1978) 435 U.S. 291, 295-297, 98 S. Ct. 1067, 55 L. Ed. 2d 287 , the Court stated that not all limitations on aliens were inherently invalid and upheld a New York statute that prohibited aliens from joining the state police. The rule that emerges from Foley is that restrictions that prevent aliens from participating in functions closely related to democratic political institutions, such as the right to vote or serve on a jury or to participate directly in the formulation, execution, or review of broad public policy, are not subject to strict scrutiny and may be justified by showing some rational relationship between the interest sought to be protected and the limiting classification. Restrictions on those who may exercise the police function come within this principle because, although police officers in the ranks do not formulate policy per se, they are clothed with authority to exercise an almost infinite variety of discretionary powers which can affect members of the public significantly and often in the most sensitive areas of daily life. See also Ambach v. Norwick (1979) 441 U.S. 68, 99 S. Ct. 1589, 60 L. Ed. 2d 49, 59 (applied the Foley rule to uphold a statute excluding aliens from teaching in public schools).

Moreover, restrictions placed on aliens by the federal government in the exercise of its constitutional power over immigration and naturalization are not subject to the strict scrutiny test. Thus, provisions that deny Medicare benefits to certain groups of aliens are valid under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment if they are reasonable [Mathews v. Diaz (1976) 426 U.S. 67, 84-87, 96 S. Ct. 1883, 48 L. Ed. 2d 478] . Similarly, the strict-scrutiny test was not applied by a California appellate court that found that Educ. Code § 68062(h) (determination of student residence) precludes undocumented alien students from qualifying as residents of California for tuition purposes [Regents of University of California v. Superior Court (1990) 225 Cal. App. 3d 972, 978-982, 276 Cal. Rptr. 197] .

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question contains a classification based on gender, a suspect category under the state Constitution, which is not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should insert facts showing the classification based on gender and the lack of justification by a compelling governmental interest.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classifications Based on Gender Are Suspect

The factual background of Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][a]. Petitioners sought a writ of mandate challenging former Bus. & Prof. Code § 25656 on equal protection grounds because it restricted female bartenders but not male bartenders. In granting the petition, the California Supreme Court noted that cases involving suspect classifications or touching on fundamental interests require application of the strict scrutiny test. The Court then explained why gender classifications are properly treated as suspect. It pointed out that gender, like race and lineage, is an immutable trait that bears no relation to ability to perform or contribute to society. Courts must closely examine classifications based on immutable traits lest outdated social stereotypes result in invidious laws or practices. A second characteristic underlying all suspect classifications is the stigma of inferiority and second class citizenship associated with them, and women, like blacks, aliens, and the poor have historically labored under severe legal and social disabilities.

In Woods v. Horton (2008) 167 Cal. App. 4th 658, 84 Cal. Rptr. 3d 332 , four men and the daughter of one filed a complaint for injunctive and declaratory relief and a petition for writ of mandate to challenge, on equal protection grounds, statutes relating to domestic violence programs and programs for inmate mothers. They contended the gender-based classifications in the statutes did not withstand a strict scrutiny analysis under the California Constitution because the classifications were not necessary and gender-neutral alternatives were available. The trial court denied their petition for a writ of mandate, finding they failed to show men were similarly situated to women for purposes of the statutory schemes (167 Cal. App. 4th 658, 662-670) .

The Court of Appeal reversed in part, finding the gender-based classifications in the challenged statutes that provided programs for victims of domestic violence violated equal protection. The court found that male victims of domestic violence were similarly situated to female victims for purposes of the statutory programs and no compelling state interest justified the gender classification. The trial court's reasoning that since more women were victims of domestic violence, and since they suffered more severe injuries, men were not similarly situated for purposes of domestic violence services and improperly viewed equal protection rights as group rights, rather than individual rights, and permitted discrimination simply because fewer men than women were affected. The trial court recognized that plaintiffs established, through declarations and journal articles, that men experienced significant levels of domestic violence as victims, so that these men were similarly situated to women as to the need for domestic violence services (167 Cal. App. 4th 658, 671) . The challenged programs did not survive strict scrutiny analysis because the gender classifications were unnecessary and there were gender-neutral alternatives available. The greater need for services by female victims of domestic violence did not provide a compelling state interest in a gender classification. Even if there were a compelling state interest, defendants did not show the classification was necessary, rather than convenient, and no gender-neutral alternative was available. Most of the government-funded domestic violence programs offered services on a gender-neutral basis, showing the classification was not necessary. There was an alternative; most statutory definitions of domestic violence were gender neutral (167 Cal. App. 4th 658, 674-676) .

However, plaintiffs failed to show men were similarly situated to women for purposes of the prison programs for inmate mothers, which were an alternative sentencing program designed to reduce drug use and recidivism for women prisoners who were pregnant or parents of one or more children under the age of six, and a program providing for a community treatment program for women inmates sentenced to state prison who had one or more children under the age of six. The trial court found the purposes of the alternative sentencing program and the community treatment program were to foster the mother-child bond, the healthy development of children, and the rehabilitation of inmate mothers. Enactment of these programs coincided with a dramatic increase in the number of female inmates, many of whom were imprisoned for nonviolent drug and property offenses, used drugs before incarceration, and were victims of abuse. These characteristics made them suitable for low-security, community-based treatment programs. Government data showed these women prisoners were likely to have been the primary or single caretaker of their young children, who were likely to be displaced to other relatives or foster care. By contrast, children of incarcerated men were likely to continue living with their mothers. Given the absence of a showing of any inmate father who qualified for a program and was denied its benefits, the deference accorded prison officials in developing such programs, the separation of powers concerns in encroaching on executive and legislative determinations, and the differences between male and female inmates, the trial court did not err in finding male and female inmates are not similarly situated for the purposes of the programs for inmate mothers (167 Cal. App. 4th 658, 671-674) .

[i] Related United States Supreme Court Decisions

Only the California Supreme Court has adopted the strict scrutiny test with respect to gender classification. The United States Supreme Court subjected classifications based on gender to considerable scrutiny but refrained from describing sex as a suspect category warranting the application of a compelling interest test. In Reed v. Reed (1971) 404 U.S. 71, 75-76, 92 S. Ct. 251, 30 L. Ed. 2d 225 , the Court indicated that classifications based on sex were definitely subject to scrutiny; they must be reasonable, not arbitrary, and must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the object of the legislation, so that all persons similarly circumstanced are treated alike. In essence, the test proposed was the "rational relationship" test but stated in a rigorous fashion [see §§ 35A.03, 35A.04]. Then, in Frontiero v. Richardson (1973) 411 U.S. 677, 682, 93 S. Ct. 1764, 36 L. Ed. 2d 583 , set out in § 35A.48[3][a], four justices speaking for the Court announced that classifications based on gender are inherently suspect and must be subject to close judicial scrutiny, finding that the decision in Reed provides at least "implicit support" for this approach. However, this view was not sustained in subsequent cases. Craig v. Boren (1976) 429 U.S. 190, 197-198, 97 S. Ct. 451, 50 L. Ed. 2d 397 , reh'g denied, 429 U.S. 1124 (1977) , set out under § 35A.32[3][c], and Orr v. Orr (1979) 440 U.S. 268, 99 S. Ct. 1102, 59 L. Ed. 2d 306, 319 (statute providing for payment of alimony by husbands, but not wives, is violation of equal protection) interpreted with the support of six justices the previous decisions to establish that classifications by gender, to withstand constitutional challenge, must serve important governmental objectives and be substantially related to achievement of those objectives. This test appears to take a middle ground between the "rational relationship" test and the "strict scrutiny" test. As the California Supreme Court commented, the standard for judging gender discrimination cases under the Fourteenth Amendment, as it has evolved in the federal courts, appears to be a hybrid which can be characterized as "strict rationality" or "rational scrutiny" [Arp v. Workers' Compensation Appeals Bd. (1977) 19 Cal. 3d 395, 400, 138 Cal. Rptr. 293, 563 P.2d 849] .

Moreover, the United States Supreme Court may choose to avoid even heightened scrutiny by concluding that a classification is not gender-based for purposes of equal protection analysis on the ground that the men and women differentially classified are not similarly situated and the statutory classification is realistically based upon the differences in their situation [Parham v. Hughes (1979) 441 U.S. 347, 99 S. Ct. 1742, 60 L. Ed. 2d 269, 276-277 (statute precluding fathers, but not mothers, who have not legitimated their children from suing for their wrongful death is not violative of equal protection)].

[b] Gender Discrimination Is Not Justified by Alleged Rehabilitative and Compensatory Purpose

In Arp v. Workers' Compensation Appeals Bd. (1977) 19 Cal. 3d 395, 138 Cal. Rptr. 293, 563 P.2d 849 , a widower sought payment of a death benefit under the Workers' Compensation Law after his wife died. The workers' compensation judge found that a provision of the Workers' Compensation Law that in effect created a conclusive presumption that widows were wholly dependent on their deceased spouses, but did not extend the same presumption in favor of widowers. Rather than attempt to prove actual dependency, the widower petitioned the Workers' Compensation Appeals Board for reconsideration and when the board denied this request, he petitioned the California Supreme Court for review. In essence, he argued that former Lab. Code § 3501(a) violated his right to equal protection because of gender-based discrimination. He proposed that the Court remedy the constitutional defect by extending the statutory benefit to widowers and widows alike. The Court held that, indeed, Section 3501(a) was unconstitutional under both the state and the federal equal protection clauses, but it chose to invalidate the statute rather than remedy the constitutional defect.

[i] Analysis of Ameliorative Purpose

In its decision in Arp, the Court was confronted with a strong argument that a statute using a presumption of dependency to help widows collect death benefits but not extending the same presumption in favor of widowers was not unconstitutional because it was both ameliorative and rehabilitative. This argument was based on cases such as Schlesinger v. Ballard (1975) 419 U.S. 498, 508-509, 95 S. Ct. 572, 42 L. Ed. 2d 610 , in which the United States Supreme Court upheld legislation providing women with benefits not provided to men on the theory that men and women were not similarly situated with respect to matters governed by the challenged statutes and that practices designed to compensate for real disabilities imposed on one gender were constitutionally permissible. However, theCalifornia Supreme Court indicated that it would strongly resist similar attempts to validate statutes that are sexually discriminatory on their face. It admitted that the provision could be upheld on the theory that after centuries of economic discrimination against females, men and women were simply not similarly situated with respect to economic factors. Under these circumstances, a provision designed to mitigate the continuing consequences of past economic abuse might properly be characterized as a compelling state interest, particularly if the act of conferring a benefit on widows does not, per se, deprive widowers of any substantial benefits to which they are otherwise entitled. Nevertheless, the Court decided that it should not accept without historical inquiry the mere recitation of a benign, compensatory purpose; it would examine the legislation to determine if it were based, in fact, on archaic and overbroad role stereotypes. Even if the statute did have an ameliorative purpose, it would reject such a justification if it restricted women or discriminated against some while benefiting others. Applying this reasoning, the Court found Lab. Code § 3501(a) discriminated unjustifiably against employed females. While it gave males the security of knowing their spouses will definitely receive death benefits, it denied working wives the same security. Moreover, while Lab. Code § 3501(a) eliminated red tape and so accelerated benefits to the truly needy widow, it reinforced a role stereotype by treating the employed female as if her contribution to the family income was always insignificant. The Court concluded that when a statute is sexually discriminatory on its face, is unsupported by any clear indication of ameliorative purpose, disadvantages large numbers of the very gender it purports to aid, and accomplishes this by perpetuation of paternalistic notions about the sexes, the statute cannot be said to be necessary to the realization of a compelling state goal.

Counsel will note that the statute in Arp distinguished between genders on its face. In another situation, in which the state action was facially neutral because it concerned the equal application of a physical agility test to men and women, the Court held that the fact that the test disqualified a disproportionate number of women did not, by itself, create a classification based on gender which would be subjected to strict scrutiny [Hardy v. Stumph (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 1, 7, 145 Cal. Rptr. 176, 576 P.2d 1342 , set out in § 35A.39[3][a]].

[c] Gender Discrimination as Not Justified by Overly Broad Stereotypical Assumptions

Craig v. Boren (1976) 429 U.S. 190, 97 S. Ct. 451, 50 L. Ed. 2d 397 , reh'g denied, 429 U.S. 1124 (1977) , was a constitutional attack on the validity of Oklahoma statutes that prohibited the sale of 3.2 percent beer to males under the age of 21 but permitted sale to females over the age of 17. The United States Supreme Court held that the statutory gender-based differential constituted a denial of equal protection in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to males aged 18-20. Its opinion did not describe gender as a suspect category requiring strict scrutiny. Instead, the Court stated that classifications based on gender may survive scrutiny under the federal Constitution only if they serve important governmental objectives and are substantially related to achievement of those objectives. The Court cited several cases in which a sex-based classification was invalidated because gender had been employed as an "inaccurate proxy" for more germane classifications. In these situations, the classification of women on the basis of overbroad generalizations or loose fitting, stereotypical characterizations of their roles or situations resulted in a weak congruence between gender and the characteristic or trait that gender purported to represent to achieve the goal of the legislation. The Court held that the Oklahoma statutes represented such an inaccurate classification. Although protection of public health and safety represents an important function of state and local government, the statistics introduced by the state of Oklahoma on the driving habits of drunken male youth were too general and violated the requirement that a gender-based difference be substantially related to achievement of the statutory objective.

Counsel will note that in Arp v. Workers' Compensation Appeals Bd., discussed above, the California Supreme Court also rejected overly broad, stereotypical assumptions related to gender as a basis for justification under its strict scrutiny approach. In that case, the Court was confronted with attempts to justify a statute which created a conclusive presumption for the purpose of collecting death benefits that widows were wholly dependent on their deceased spouses but did not extend the same presumption in favor of widowers. The Court's analysis made it clear that benefits given to members of one gender cannot be easily justified by overly broad, stereotypical assumptions. The Court reasoned that the purpose of the statute was not ameliorative but simply reflected an archaic and overbroad role stereotype which treated wives as dependent by nature and custom. It described the statute as founded on unexamined role stereotypes and a social and psychological reflex.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Gender Discrimination Is Not Justified by Overly Broad Stereotypical Assumptions

Stanton v. Stanton (1975) 421 U.S. 7, 95 S. Ct. 1373, 43 L. Ed. 2d 688 , involved a Utah statute providing that females attain the age of majority on their 18th birthday but males must wait until they are 21. The trial court and the Utah Supreme Court concluded that a divorced father was not obligated to support a daughter who had reached the age of 18. The mother of the girl appealed to the United States Supreme Court, which reversed. The Court observed that the main justifications offered in supportof the statute were what the Utah Supreme Court referred to as "old notions," such as the idea that since men are primarily responsible for providing a home and its essentials, it is beneficial for them to receive support for education or training whereas women tend to mature and marry earlier so that their period of legal minority need not be extended. The United States Supreme Court concluded that these old notions, based on role stereotypes rather than current reality, could not justify drawing a distinction between children for the purpose of child support. The Court stated that whatever form of equal protection analysis is used--the compelling state interest test, rational basis test, or something in between--the statute denies females who had reached 18 the equal protection of the laws, as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

[b] Gender Subject to Strict Scrutiny

In Connerly v. State Personnel Board (2001) 92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 112 Cal. Rptr. 2d 5 , a private citizen continued litigation commenced by a governor challenging five statutory programs falling within the general rubric of "affirmative action," on the ground they impermissibly establish classifications and preferences based on race, ethnicity, and gender. The trial court found invalid a portion of one scheme and all of another, but otherwise rejected the plaintiff's contentions (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 27) . The Court of Appeal reversed and remanded, holding that all of four of the schemes were invalid and as to the fifth, a portion could be severed from the remaining invalid portions and upheld (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 28) . The court found that (1) under the federal and California Constitutions, strict scrutiny applies to racial classifications, (2) under the state constitution, strict scrutiny applies to gender classifications, and (3) Proposition 209 (Cal. Const., art. I, § 31) imposes additional restrictions against racial and gender preferences and discriminatory actions (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 19-41) . The court found further that insofar as the challenged statutory schemes utilize race and gender classifications, they are invalid (92 Cal. App. 4th 16, 28) .

This form of memorandum may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question contains a classification based on sexual orientation and/or based on family relationships, both of which are suspect categories under the state Constitution, which is not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should insert facts showing the classification based on sexual orientation and/or family relationship and the lack of justification by a compelling governmental interest.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classifications Based on Sexual Orientation and Burdens Placed on Fundamental Right to Marry Are Suspect

In In re Marriage Cases (2008) 43 Cal. 4th 757, 76 Cal. Rptr. 3d 683, 183 P.3d 384 , the Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco (City) sent a letter to the county clerk, directing the clerk to determine what changes should be made to the forms and documents used to apply for and issue marriage licenses, so that licenses could be provided to couples without regard to their gender or sexual orientation. The county clerk designed revised forms for the marriage license application and for the licenseand certificate of marriage, and the City began issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples. The following day, two separate actions were filed seeking an immediate stay as well as writ relief, to prohibit the city's issuance of marriage licenses to same-sex couples. After the superior court declined to grant an immediate stay and the City continued to issue marriage licenses to and solemnize and register marriages of numerous same-sex couples, the California Attorney General and a number of taxpayers filed two separate petitions seeking to have the California Supreme Court issue an original writ of mandate, asserting that the City's actions were unlawful and warranted immediate intervention. The Court issued an order to show cause in those proceedings, and, pending determination of both matters, directed City officials to enforce the existing marriage statutes and refrain from issuing marriage licenses not authorized by those provisions (Fam. Code §§ 300, 308.5). In addition, the Court stayed all proceedings in the two cases then pending in San Francisco Superior Court, but indicated that the stay did not preclude the filing of a separate action in superior court raising a direct challenge to the constitutionality of California's current marriage statutes. The City filed a writ petition and complaint for declaratory relief in superior court, seeking a declaration that Fam. Code § 308.5, which was an initiative statute proposed by Proposition 22 and enacted by the voters, did not apply to marriages solemnized in California, and that in any event, all California statutory provisions limiting marriage to unions between a man and a woman violated the California Constitution. Thereafter, two similar actions challenging the constitutionality of California's current marriage statutes were filed by a number of same-sex couples who maintained either that they were involved in committed relationships but were not permitted to marry in California, or that their out-of-state marriages were not recognized under California law. Several statewide organizations representing many thousands of same-sex couples joined as plaintiffs in these actions. The cases were coordinated by order of a judge appointed by the Chair of the Judicial Council, into a single proceeding entitled In re Marriage Cases. A sixth action filed by a separate group of same-sex couples who similarly challenged the constitutionality of the current marriage statutes was later added to the coordination proceeding. While the coordination proceeding was pending in the superior court, the California Supreme Court rendered its decision concluding that City officials had exceeded their authority in issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples in the absence of a judicial determination that the statutory provisions limiting marriage to the union of a man and a woman were unconstitutional, and further concluding that the approximately 4,000 same-sex marriages performed in San Francisco prior to the earlier Court order staying proceedings were void and of no legal effect. In light of these conclusions, the Court issued a writ of mandate compelling City officials to comply with the requirements and limitations of the current marriage statutes in performing their duties under those statutes, and directing the officials to notify all same-sex couples to whom the officials had issued marriage licenses or registered marriage certificates that those same-sex marriages were void from their inception and a legal nullity. Although the Court concluded that City officials had acted unlawfully and the same-sex marriages they had authorized were void, the opinion made clear that the substantive question of the constitutionality of California's statutory provisions limiting marriage to a man and a woman was not before the Court and that the Court expressed no opinion on that issue. The superior court in the coordination matter proceeded expeditiously to conduct a hearing on the validity, under the California Constitution, of California's statutes limiting marriage to a man and a woman and issued its decision, confining its decision to the challenge based on the state constitutional equal protection clause. The superior court determined that the statutes limiting marriage in California to opposite-sex couples properly had to be evaluated under the strict scrutiny equal protection standard, because they rested on a suspect classification (sex) and impinged upon a fundamental constitutional right (the right to marry). The court considered the various state interests and justifications proffered in support of the enactments, ultimately concluding that the statutory limitation of marriage to the union of a man and a woman not only did not satisfy the strict scrutiny standard, but also did not meet the more deferential rational basis test because the differential treatment mandated by the statute did not further any legitimate state interest. Thus, the court held that California's current marriage statutes were unconstitutional under the state Constitution insofar as they limited marriage to opposite-sex couples and entered judgment in favor of plaintiffs in each of the coordinated cases. On appeal, the Court of Appeal reversed the superior court on the substantive constitutional issue. The Court of Appeal concluded the superior court erred in finding that the statutory provisions at issue impinged on the fundamental constitutional right to marry, determining that this right properly should have been interpreted to encompass only the right to marry a person of the opposite sex and the constitutional right the plaintiffs actually sought to enforce was a right to same-sex marriage, which the Court of Appeal found lacking in any historical or precedential support. The Court of Appeal rejected the superior court's conclusion that the California marriage statutes discriminated on the suspect basis of sex and were subject to strict scrutiny review, relying on the circumstance that the statutes did not discriminate against either men or women or treat either of the genders differently from the other, but rather permitted members of either gender to marry only a person of the opposite gender. Although the Court of Appeal found that California's marriage statutes realistically had to be viewed as providing differential treatment on the basis of sexual orientation, it held that sexual orientation did not constitute a suspect classification for purposes of the state equal protection clause. The Court of Appeal concluded that the marriage statutes were not subject to strict scrutiny review, but, rather had to be evaluated only under the deferential rational basis standard, and that the marriage statutes' limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples survived rational basis review, because the state had a legitimate interest in preserving the traditional definition of marriage and the statute's classifications were rationally related to that interest (43 Cal. 4th 757, 785-789) .

The California Supreme Court granted review and reversed the Court of Appeal. The Court began by examining the relevant California statutory provisions relating to marriage and domestic partnership that lay at the heart of the controversy, finding that although the statutes governing marriage and family relations have undergone very significant changes in a host of areas since the late 19th century, the statutory designation of marriage as a relationship between a man and a woman remaineduncharged. The Court found that Fam. Code § 300 limited marriages that lawfully may be performed in California to marriages of opposite-sex couples, that Fam. Code § 308.5 had to be interpreted to apply both to marriages performed in California and those performed in other jurisdictions, and that Fam. Code § 308.5, which stated both that only a marriage between a man and a woman is "recognized" in California and also that only a marriage between a man and a woman is "valid" in California, was intended to ensure that California would not legitimize or recognize same-sex marriages from other jurisdictions or permit same-sex partners to validly marry within California (43 Cal. 4th 757, 792-801) . The Court then reviewed the history of domestic partnership legislation in California, noting differences between the domestic partnership legislation and marriage characteristics, and holding that the provisions of both the current marriage statutes and the current domestic partnership statutes had to be considered in determining whether the challenged provisions of the marriage statutes violated the constitutional rights of same-sex couples guaranteed by the California Constitution (43 Cal. 4th 757, 801-808) . The Court then held that by limiting marriage to opposite-sex couples, California's marriage statutes violated a same-sex couple's fundamental right to marry as guaranteed by the privacy, free speech, and due process clauses of the California Constitution (Cal. Const., art. I, §§ 1, 2, 7), and violated the equal protection clause of the California Constitution (Cal. Const., art. I, § 7). Although the state Constitution does not contain an explicit reference to a right to marry, the Court found that the right to marry embodied in Cal. Const., art. I, §§ 1 and 7 guaranteed same-sex couples the same substantive constitutional rights as opposite-sex couples to choose one's life partner and enter with that person into a committed, officially recognized, and protected family relationship that enjoys all of the constitutionally based incidents of marriage (43 Cal. 4th 757, 809-829) . The Court then held that despite the rights afforded to same-sex couples by the Domestic Partner Act, the current California statutes violated the right of same-sex couples to marry, because the statutes reserve exclusively to opposite-sex couples the traditional designation of marriage and assign a different designation, i.e., domestic partnership, to the only official family relationship available to same-sex couples. Whether the name "marriage," in the abstract, is considered a core element of the state constitutional right to marry, one of the core elements is the right of same-sex couples to have their official family relationship accorded the same dignity, respect, and stature as that accorded to all other officially recognized family relationships. By drawing a distinction between the name assigned to the family relationship available to opposite-sex couples and the name assigned to the family relationship available to same-sex couples, and by reserving the historic and highly respected designation of marriage exclusively to opposite-sex couples while offering same-sex couples only the new and unfamiliar designation of domestic partnership, the statutes posed a serious risk of denying the official family relationship of same-sex couples the equal dignity and respect that is a core element of the constitutional right to marry (43 Cal. 4th 757, 830-831) .

The Court then held that the statutory assignment of different names for the official family relationships of opposite-sex couples and same-sex couples violated the state constitutional equal protection clause. The Court found first that the standard of review to be applied was strict scrutiny, because the basis for discrimination was sexual orientation, which the Court found to be a suspect class, and the statutes impinged on the fundamental right to marry. The Court rejected gender as the basis for discrimination, because in drawing a distinction between opposite-sex couples and same-sex couples, the challenged marriage statutes did not treat men and women differently, but rather were more properly viewed as instances of differential treatment on the basis of sexual orientation and accordingly should be evaluated on that ground (43 Cal. 4th 757, 833-838) . The Court held first that the statutory provisions restricting marriage to a man and a woman did not merely have a disparate impact on gay persons, but directly classified and prescribed distinct treatment on the basis of sexual orientation by limiting marriage to opposite-sex couples, which operated clearly and directly to impose different treatment on gay individuals because of their sexual orientation (43 Cal. 4th 757, 839-840) . The Court then held that sexual orientation is a suspect classification under the California equal protection clause, so that statutes drawing a distinction on this basis are subject to strict scrutiny (43 Cal. 4th 757, 840-843) . The Court rejected an intermediate scrutiny standard of review comparable to the standard applied by the United States Supreme Court to discriminatory classifications based on sex or illegitimacy, because in enforcing the California Constitution's equal protection clause, however, California cases have not applied an intermediate scrutiny standard of review to classifications involving any suspect (or quasi-suspect) characteristic, and there was no persuasive basis for applying to statutes that classified persons on the basis of the suspect classification of sexual orientation a standard less rigorous than that applied to statutes that classify on the basis of the suspect classifications of gender, race, or religion (43 Cal. 4th 757, 843-844) . The Court also found that the strict scrutiny standard applied because affording same-sex couples access only to the separate institution of domestic partnership and denying them access to the established institution of marriage, impinged on the right of those couples to have their family relationship accorded respect and dignity equal to that accorded the family relationship of opposite-sex couples (43 Cal. 4th 757, 844-847) . The Court first rejected the contention that the separation-of-powers doctrine rendered judicial scrutiny improper because the statutory provisions embodied an integral aspect of the definition of marriage, and that the circumstance that the limitation of marriage to a union between a man and a woman embodied in Fam. Code § 308.5 was enacted as an initiative measure by a vote of the electorate similarly neither exempted it from constitutional scrutiny nor justified a more deferential standard of review (43 Cal. 4th 757, 847-853) . The Court then concluded that the state interest in limiting the designation of marriage exclusively to opposite-sex couples and in excluding same-sex couples from access to that designation could not properly be considered a compelling state interest for equal protection purposes. While retention of the limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples is not needed to preserve the rights and benefits of opposite-sex couples, the exclusion of same-sex couples from the designation of marriage works a real and appreciable harm upon same-sex couples and their children. Further, because of the historic disparagement of gay persons, the retention of a distinction in nomenclature by which the term "marriage" was withheld only from the family relationship ofsame-sex couples was all the more likely to cause the new parallel institution established for same-sex couples to be considered a mark of second-class citizenship. Finally, in addition to the potential harm flowing from the lesser stature likely to be afforded to the family relationships of same-sex couples by designating them domestic partnerships, there was a substantial risk that a judicial decision upholding the differential treatment of opposite-sex and same-sex couples would be understood as validating a more general proposition that California has repudiated, i.e., that it is permissible, under the law, for society to treat gay individuals and same-sex couples differently from, and less favorably than, heterosexual individuals and opposite-sex couples. Thus, insofar as the provisions of Fam. Code §§ 300 and 308.5 draw a distinction between opposite-sex couples and same-sex couples and excluded the latter from access to the designation of marriage, they are unconstitutional (43 Cal. 4th 757, 853-856) . Finally, the Court held that the proper remedy for the state's differential treatment of separate categories of individuals in violation of equal protection principles to be extend the designation of marriage to same-sex couples rather than withhold that designation from both opposite-sex couples and same-sex couples in favor of some other, uniform designation. Thus, the Court found that the language of Fam. Code § 300 limiting the designation of marriage to a union "between a man and a woman" was unconstitutional and had to be stricken from the statute, and that the remaining statutory language had to be understood as making the designation of marriage available both to opposite-sex and same-sex couples. Because the limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples imposed by Fam. Code § 308.5 could have no constitutionally permissible effect, that provision could not stand (43 Cal. 4th 757, 856-857) .

In Strauss v. Horton (2009) 46 Cal. 4th 364, 93 Cal. Rptr. 3d 591, 207 P.3d 48 , the California Supreme Court addressed Proposition 8, an initiative measure approved by a majority of voters in 2008, which added a new section to the California Constitution providing that only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California (Cal. Const., art. I, § 7.5), and concluded that, under the governing provisions of the California Constitution, Proposition 8 constituted a permissible change to the California Constitution, but that it did not invalidate the estimated 18,000 marriages of same-sex couples that were performed before it was adopted (46 Cal. 4th 364, 385-391, 406-412) . Against the backdrop of In re Marriage Cases, the Court found that Proposition 8 had to be understood as carving out an exception to the preexisting scope of the privacy and due process clauses of the California Constitution with respect to the particular subject matter encompassed by Prop 8 (46 Cal. 4th 364, 411-412) . Although Proposition 8 eliminated the ability of same-sex couples to enter into an official relationship designated "marriage," in all other respects same-sex couples continue to possess, under the state constitutional privacy and due process clauses, the core set of basic substantive legal rights and attributes traditionally associated with marriage, including the opportunity of an individual to establish, with the person with whom the individual has chosen to share his or her life, an officially recognized and protected family possessing mutual rights and responsibilities and entitled to the same respect and dignity accorded a union traditionally designated as marriage (46 Cal. 4th 364, 412 , quoting In re Marriage Cases (2008) 43 Cal. 4th 757, 781, 76 Cal. Rptr. 3d 683, 183 P.3d 384). The Court found that, like opposite-sex couples, same-sex couples enjoy this protection not as a matter of legislative grace, but of constitutional right.

The Court also found that Proposition 8 had a similarly limited effect on the holdings of the majority opinion in In re Marriage Cases relating to the state constitutional equal protection clause. The equal protection principles established in that case, i.e., that sexual orientation constitutes a suspect classification for purposes of analysis under the state equal protection clause, and that statutes according differential treatment on the basis of sexual orientation are subject to the strict scrutiny standard of review, were unaffected by the new section added to the California Constitution by Proposition 8. With respect to the specific subject of the designation of the word "marriage," Proposition 8 did change the rule set forth in In re Marriage Cases that limiting access to this designation to opposite-sex couples constituted an impermissible violation of the state equal protection clause by incorporating into the California Constitution a specific provision that expressly restricts the designation of "marriage" to the union of a man and a woman, creating a limited exception to the state equal protection clause as interpreted in In re Marriage Cases (46 Cal. 4th 364, 411) . Although constituting the governing state constitutional rule with regard to the specific matter it addressed, this exception did not alter the general equal protection principles set forth in In re Marriage Cases and in other California decisions interpreting and applying the state constitutional equal protection clause, and those principles continue to apply in all other contexts (46 Cal. 4th 364, 411-412) .

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question contains a classification based on illegitimacy which cannot survive judicial scrutiny beyond the rational relationship standard.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that the classification is based on a suspect category are set out in §§ 35A.29 -35A.32, 35A.34.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classifications Based on Illegitimacy as Subject to Scrutiny

Trimble v. Gordon (1977) 430 U.S. 762, 97 S. Ct. 1459, 52 L. Ed. 2d 31 , was a challenge to the constitutionality of an Illinois statute which permitted legitimate children to inherit by intestate succession from either parent but allowed illegitimate children to inherit only from their mothers. The Supreme Court held that the statute violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In reaching this conclusion, the Court applied a standard of scrutiny that was less than that of strict scrutiny but more than a standard requiring merely a rational link with a legitimate state goal. The Court first rejected the contention that illegitimacy was a suspect category, even though it is analogous in many respects to the personal characteristics, like race or alienage, which are viewed as suspect. However, although the Court declined to adopt a strict scrutiny analysis, the analysis which it used bore a striking resemblance to the compelling state interest approach. Weighing the proposed justifications for the statute against the effect of the statutory differentiation, the Court found that the law could not be justified as an attempt to promote legitimate family relationships because it penalized innocent children for the failures of their parents, contrary to the basic principle that legal burdens should bear some relationship to individual responsibility or wrongdoing. Similarly, the statute could not be justified by the state's interest in establishing a method of disposing of property because its policy of total exclusion discriminated too broadly between legitimate and illegitimate when it should have been carefully tuned to alternative considerations.

[b] State Action Subject to Scrutiny as Violation of Equal Protection Unless Justified

The factual background of Trimble v. Gordon (1977) 430 U.S. 762, 97 S. Ct. 1459, 52 L. Ed. 2d 31 , is discussed in § 35A.33[3][a]. In holding that a statutory classification that regulated the ability of illegitimate children to inherit from their fathers violated the guarantee of equal protection, the Court rejected the concept that illegitimacy was a suspect category but did not declare the statute unconstitutional on the ground that it was arbitrary. Instead, the Court said essentially that the legitimate interests the statute promoted would have to justify the dangers created by the statute to fundamental personal rights. Although the Court did not adopt a specific formulation of the new test, it quoted from Weber v. Aetna Cas. & Sur. Co. (1972) 406 U.S. 164, 172, 92 S. Ct. 1400, 31 L. Ed. 2d 768 , which held that in illegitimacy cases the court must make a dual inquiry into both the legitimate state interest which the classification promotes and the fundamental personal rights the classification endangers, framing the issue as to whether the differentiation created by the statute could be justified by the promotion of recognized state objectives.

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question contains a classification not justified by a compelling governmental interest, which is based on wealth and burdens a fundamental interest of the individual.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that the classification is based on a suspect category are set out in §§ 35A.29 -35A.33.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Classifications Based on Wealth and Burdening Fundamental Interest as Suspect

The factual background of Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][c]. In that case, the Supreme Court held that a system of school financing under which money available for schools varied according to school district wealth constituted a violation of equal protection under the California Constitution. The analysis of the Court makes it clear that classifications based on wealth which affect fundamental interests are highly vulnerable to challenges based on equal protection. The Court stated that because the school financing system has been shown to involve a suspect classification insofar as it draws distinctions on the basis of school district wealth and because that classification affects the fundamental interest of students' education, it would have no difficulty in concluding that the system must be examined with a strict and searching scrutiny.

[i] Absence of Fundamental Interest

Counsel will also note that the earlier decision of In re Antazo (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 100, 112, 89 Cal. Rptr. 255, 473 P.2d 999 [set out in § 35A.46[3][b]] contained language which suggested that wealth was a suspect category, even where it was not the basis for infringing on a fundamental interest. In that decision, the Court characterized a classification which discriminated on the basis of poverty as a suspect classification which must be reviewed and evaluated under the strict scrutiny test. However, the authority of Antazo must be doubted for two reasons. First, the decision relied on Williams v. Illinois (1970) 399 U.S. 235, 239-240, 90 S. Ct. 2018, 26 L. Ed. 2d 586 [set out in § 35A.46[3][b]] for its interpretation of the character of wealth under the Fourteenth Amendment and, as discussed below, the Supreme Court subsequently declined to hold that classifications based solely on wealth were subject to strict scrutiny under the Fourteenth Amendment. Second, as an interpretation of Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a), this language in Antazo appears to have been repudiated in Serrano by the California Supreme Court's statement that whether there should be strict scrutiny review of all governmental classifications based on wealth, thus elevating such classifications to a level of "suspectedness" equivalent to those based on race, was still an open question in California. Moreover, Antazo, in fact, involved the fundamental interest of personal liberty [see § 35A.42] although the Court did not discuss this interest and clearly did not require that wealth be considered a suspect category only in the presence of a fundamental interest.

In the subsequent decision of San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 25 n.60, 29, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1919, 36 L. Ed. 2d 418 , the United States Supreme Court noted that it had never held that discrimination on the basis of wealth alone, without interference with a fundamental right, provides an adequate basis for invoking strict scrutiny. Nevertheless, the language of some decisions does support the view that wealth, by itself, is a suspectcategory. In San Antonio, the Court commented that a system of education made available only to those who could pay tuition would present a far more compelling set of circumstances for judicial assistance. This comment is supported by the dictum in Shapiro v. Thompson (1969) 394 U.S. 618, 633, 89 S. Ct. 1322, 22 L. Ed. 2d 600 , where the Court said that to reduce expenditures for education by barring indigent children from the schools would be an invalid, invidious distinction. Neither of these comments ties the analysis of wealth to the presence of a fundamental interest; indeed, in San Antonio, the Court concluded that education was not a fundamental interest protected by the equal protection clause.

[b] Wealth as Basis for Benefit

The factual background of San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1919, 36 L. Ed. 2d 418 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][h]. In that case, the Supreme Court determined that a school financing law did not discriminate on the basis of wealth. The Court pointed out that even if children from districts having less assessable wealth were receiving a poorer quality education, they were not absolutely deprived of the benefits of education. Individuals or groups of individuals who constituted the class discriminated against on the basis of wealth in prior cases were, because of their impecunity, completely unable to pay for some desired benefit and as a consequence sustained an absolute deprivation of a meaningful opportunity to enjoy that benefit. The Court cited, for example, Griffin v. Illinois (1956) 351 U.S. 12, 19-20, 76 S. Ct. 585, 100 L. Ed. 891 (indigent defendant as denied transcript or adequate substitute for transcript) and Williams v. Illinois (1970) 399 U.S. 235, 239-240, 90 S. Ct. 2018, 26 L. Ed. 2d 586 (incarceration of indigent defendants solely because of their inability to pay fine is unconstitutional). A relative deprivation is not sufficient to constitute discrimination on the basis of wealth since the equal protection clause does not require absolute equality or precisely equal advantages.

The factual background of Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][c]. In that case, the Court concluded that both the previous system of school financing and the one subsequently enacted in response to the first Serrano decision discriminated on the basis of wealth. This discrimination, in the opinion of the Court, possessed two elements--it conditioned the availability of government resources (that is, school revenue) on the wealth of districts, which was disparate, and it resulted in a disparate quality of the service which was sought, namely education.

Counsel will note that the United States Supreme Court appears to have adopted a more restrictive definition of discrimination on the basis of wealth under the Fourteenth Amendment in San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 20, 25, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 .

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question that burdens exercise of the franchise, a fundamental interest of the individual, is not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should present facts that show that the state action has a real and appreciable impact on the right to vote, and that no compelling state interest exists for the restriction.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that the classification infringes a fundamental interest are set out in §§ 35A.34, 35A.36 -35A.45.

[b] Restriction of Franchise Justified in Municipal Annexation

The legislative scheme for the annexation of unincorporated territories into neighboring cities is set out in Gov. Code § 56000 et seq. (Cortese-Knox-Hertzberg Local Government Reorganization Act of 2000). It provides that elections on a proposed annexation approved by the Local Agency Formation Commission will be held only in the affected territory, leaving the affected city with no say as to whether the territory will be annexed to it, when both of the following are true:

- The total assessed value of the land within the affected territory equals less than one half of the total assessed value of land in the affected city; and

- The number of registered voters residing in the affected territory equals less than one half of the number of registered voters residing in the affected city [see Gov. Code § 57075 (former Gov. Code § 35228(b); election in affected territory if conditions met)].

Despite this restriction, the Supreme Court has upheld the legislative scheme. The Court acknowledged that the relevant geographic area for an annexation election includes both the territory to be annexed and the affected city, and that therefore the restriction of the franchise in an annexation election to residents of the territory to be annexed invokes the strict scrutiny standard of review [Citizens Against Forced Annexation v. Local Agency Formation Com. (1982) 32 Cal. 3d 816, 822-824, 187 Cal. Rptr. 423, 654 P.2d 193] . However, the Court held that when the conditions of former Gov. Code § 35231 are met, the probable impact of the annexation on the residents of the city will be smaller than its impact on the residents of the affected territory. In that case, the state has the following two compelling interests which under the strict scrutiny standard justify the state in restricting the franchise [Citizens Against Forced Annexation v. Local Agency Formation Com. (1982) 32 Cal. 3d 816, 825-829, 187 Cal. Rptr. 423, 654 P.2d 193] :

- A compelling interest limiting the election to persons with a substantial interest in the outcome of the election, coupled with an interest in avoiding the cost and burden of an election encompassing the affected city; and

- A compelling interest in promoting logical community development and providing municipal services to newly urbanized areas, and preventing the development of "orphan" islands of unincorporated territory rejected by neighboring cities but lacking the financial resources for self incorporation.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Exercise of Franchise as Fundamental Interest

In Bullock v. Carter (1972) 405 U.S. 134, 92 S. Ct. 849, 31 L. Ed. 2d 92 , individuals who met all the qualifications to be candidates in the Texas Democratic primary for county offices but were unable to pay the large filing fees required by Texas statutes as a condition to having one's name placed on the primary ballot, challenged the validity of the Texas filing-fee system. A three-judge district court held the filing-fee scheme unconstitutional, and on direct appeal, the United States Supreme Court affirmed on the ground that the statutory filing fee denied equal protection of the laws because, without providing a reasonable alternative means of access to the ballot, it utilized the criterion of ability to pay as a condition of being on the ballot and thus excluded some otherwise qualified candidates and denied an undetermined number of voters the opportunity to vote for candidates of their choice. The Court identified the threshold question as whether the filing-fee system could be sustained if it is shown to have somerational basis or whether it must withstand a more rigid standard of review. The Court noted that not every limitation or incidental burden on the exercise of voting rights was subject to a stringent standard of review. In this case, however, close scrutiny is appropriate because the system has a real and appreciable impact on the exercise of the franchise and because this impact is related to the financial resources of the voters supporting a particular candidate.

Bullock should be distinguished from cases in which the United States Supreme Court avoided applying the strict scrutiny test to classifications related to voting by finding the classifications note to be infringements on the right to vote [see, e.g., Holt Civic Club v. Tuscaloosa (1978) 439 U.S. 60, 68-69, 99 S. Ct. 383, 58 L. Ed. 2d 292 (extraterritorial extension of franchise not required by extraterritorial extension of municipal powers); Lockport v. Citizens for Community Action (1977) 430 U.S. 259, 272-273, 97 S. Ct. 1047, 51 L. Ed. 2d 313 (provisions establishing that reallocation of power between city and county governments must be approved separately by county and city voters are constitutional since they reflect substantially differing interests of two groups); Gordon v. Lance (1971) 403 U.S. 1, 7-8, 91 S. Ct. 1889, 29 L. Ed. 2d 273 (referendum voting scheme giving disproportionate power to minority is constitutional when minority is not identifiable class)]. In Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438 , discussed in § 35A.35[3][c], the California Supreme Court was asked to rule that limitations on the electoral process in an irrigation district did not constitute an infringement on the right to vote. The Court rejected this view for the irrigation district in question and held that a denial of the right to vote was an infringement on the electoral process unless the excluded class was substantially less affected by the results of the election than those who were entitled to vote.

Fullerton Joint High School Dist. v. State Bd. of Education (1982) 32 Cal. 3d 779, 187 Cal. Rptr. 398, 654 P.2d 168 , involved a proposed plan approved by the State Board of Education calling for severing a portion of a high school district, which was geographically separated from the main portion of the district, and integrating the severed portion into an independent school district. The plan called for an election on the question of severance to be held only in the portion of the district that was to be severed. The high school district petitioned the superior court for a writ of mandate barring the election, arguing inter alia that the restriction of the election franchise to residents of the portion of the district to be severed denied equal protection to the residents of the remaining portions of the district. The trial court found the plan permissible in part and defective in part, and issued a writ of mandate barring the election. Both parties appealed.

The California Supreme Court reversed the trial court's order that the election be barred completely, but held that the election must include all voters residing in the district. Addressing the issue of the restricted election, the Court restated the traditional rule that the strict standard of review applicable to classifications impinging on a fundamental right applies to legislation that excludes certain potential voters from participation (32 Cal. 3d 779, 799) . The Court further stated that although a classification that has only a minimal, if any, effect on the fundamental right to vote may escape strict scrutiny, the requirement that the state have a compelling interest that makes the classification necessary applies to classifications that have a real and appreciable impact on the equality, fairness, and integrity of the electoral process. The Court held that the classification before it clearly did not involve a mere incidental or marginal effect on the right to vote since it excluded all residents of the high school district outside of the portion to be severed from voting, an exclusion that may affect the outcome of the election (32 Cal. 3d 779, 799) .

The Court rejected two arguments by the board urging that exceptions to the strict scrutiny standard be applied. Regarding the first argument, the Court held that the cases of Lockport v. Citizens for Community Action (1977) 430 U.S. 259, 272-273, 97 S. Ct. 1047, 51 L. Ed. 2d 313 , and Holt Civic Club v. Tuscaloosa (1978) 439 U.S. 60, 68-69, 99 S. Ct. 383, 58 L. Ed. 2d 292 (see above), had not created a general exception permitting a geographical classification of voters that did not serve an impermissible purpose, such as racial discrimination, from escaping strict scrutiny. In particular, the Court held that no exception applied when the geographical classification excluded persons physically residing within the boundaries of the relevant geographical area from voting (32 Cal. 3d 779, 800-803) . The Court held that since the high school district is the existing legal entity with authority over the portion to be severed, and not merely a neighboring district incidentally affected by the secession of the affected portion, the relevant geographical area was the entire district, and not merely the portion to be severed (32 Cal. 3d 779, 803) .

Regarding the second argument, the Court acknowledged the existence of an exception to the strict scrutiny requirement for elections involving special districts of limited powers whose activities disproportionately affect members of a particular group. However, the Court held that a school district does not come under the category of district to which the exception applies (32 Cal. 3d 779, 803-805) .

Applying the standard of strict scrutiny, the Court acknowledged that a classification may permissibly exclude voters who have no interest in the election in order to protect the interest of voters who are vitally concerned with the issue to be voted on. However, the Court concluded that the classification in the case before it was not justified by the fact that the residents of the portion of the district to be severed had interests in the election that were not shared by the residents of the remaining portion of the district, when the residents of the remaining portion had their own separate, substantial interests in the election (32 Cal. 3d 779, 805) .

[b] Restrictions on Eligibility to Vote

In Hill v. Stone (1975) 421 U.S. 289, 95 S. Ct. 1637, 44 L. Ed. 2d 172 , reh'g denied, 422 U.S. 1029 , certain voters in a tax bond election challenged the constitutionality of provisions of the Texas Constitution, state statutes, and a city charter, all of which limited the right to vote in city bond elections to persons who had listed property with local tax authorities. The federal district court held that this restriction violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the state attorney general appealed directly to the United States Supreme Court, which affirmed on the ground that disfranchising persons in bond elections solely because they had not rendered property was impermissible unless justified and the proposed state interests were not compelling. The Court interpreted its prior voting rights decisions to stand for the basic principle that as long as the election in question is not one of special interest, any classification restricting the franchise on grounds other than residence, age, and citizenship cannot stand unless it is demonstrated that the classification serves a compelling state interest.

[c] Barriers on Candidacy

The factual background of Bullock v. Carter (1972) 405 U.S. 134, 92 S. Ct. 849, 31 L. Ed. 2d 92 , is discussed in § 35A.35[3][a]. Bullock required the Court to decide whether barriers on a candidate's access to the primary ballot would compel strict scrutiny as a restriction on the right to vote. It stated that since the existence of barriers, by itself, did not compel close scrutiny, it was essential to examine in a realistic light the extent and nature of their impact on voters. It noted that the Texas system that imposed large filing fees favored those who had personal wealth and affluent backers and thus was patently exclusionary. The effect of this exclusionary mechanism on voters was neither incidental nor remote. Voters were substantially limited in their choice of candidates and denied the opportunity to vote for a candidate of their choosing; further, the impact fell more heavily on the less affluent segment of the community. Because of this real and appreciable impact on the exercise of the franchise and because this impact was related to the resources of voters supporting particular candidates, the barriers on candidacy required strict scrutiny.

The factual background of Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][h]. In that case, the California Supreme Court was required to determine whether a statute conditioning the right to be a candidate for director of the Imperial Irrigation District on owning land within the district should be subject to strict scrutiny. The Court reasoned that the right to be a candidate is subject to strict scrutiny for equal protection purposes when it is affected by a classification with a real and appreciable impact on the right of franchise. The Court reviewed cases in which the strict scrutiny test was applied to laws requiring candidate filing fees, durational residence requirements for candidacy, and placement of incumbents first on the ballot. These laws not only restricted the individual's ability to be a candidate, but restricted the right to vote by denying voters the opportunity to vote for certain candidates. The Court noted that the restriction on nonfreeholders was even more pervasive because it excluded an individual from the ballot entirely, whereas in previous cases, individuals could have obtained the ballot by payment of a fee, fulfillment of a durational residence requirement, or willingness to allow the placement of one's name below that of the incumbent. The Court concluded that the provision challenged had an appreciable impact on the equality and fairness of the electoral process.

[i] Expansion of Principle

Counsel will note that there is language in at least two California Supreme Court cases that goes beyond Choudhry in suggesting that candidacy is an independent fundamental right that has an interlocking relationship with the right to vote but is important enough in its own right that every intrusion, subtle or direct, which impairs or affects the right of candidates to seek the public's suffrage will be subjected to strict scrutiny. These cases appear to reject the conclusion in Bullock v. Carter (1972) 405 U.S. 134, 143, 92 S. Ct. 849, 31 L. Ed. 2d 92 , that a barrier on the right to be a candidate, by itself, may not require strict scrutiny [see Johnson v. Hamilton (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 461, 466-468, 125 Cal. Rptr. 129, 541 P.2d 881 ; Zeilenga v. Nelson (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 716, 719-720, 94 Cal. Rptr. 602, 484 P.2d 578] .

[d] Restrictions on Ballot Initiatives and Referenda

In Lemons v. Bradbury (9th Cir. 2008) 538 F.3d 1098 , Oregon voters who signed a state referendum appealed the district court's denial of permanent injunctive relief against the Oregon Secretary of State. The Secretary had determined that the referendum, which sought a statewide vote on a legislative act establishing same-sex domestic partnerships, did not have enough valid signatures to qualify for the ballot. The district court held that the Secretary's sampling procedures did not violate the plaintiffs' equal protection rights, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed. Oregon statutes required the Secretary to use a statistical sampling method for verifying referendum petition signatures using an elector's voter registration record or other database. The Secretary sampled approximately five percent of the submitted signatures for each referendum, and submitted the sampled signatures to county elections officials. A publication entitled Directive for Signature Verification, issued by the Secretary, specified that county elections officials should compare the signature on the petition and the signature on the voter registration card to identify whether the signature was genuine and must be counted. The Secretary extrapolated the overall number of valid petition signatures using the sampled signature results. Oregon law did not provide procedures by which a voter could introduce extrinsic evidence to rehabilitate a referendum signature after its rejection. In contrast, for non-matching ballot signatures returned during Oregon's vote-by-mail elections, the Secretary's Vote by Mail Procedures Manual required county elections officials to give the voter ten-days' notice and an opportunity to submit an updated voter registration card (538 F.3d 1098, 1100-1101) . The Ninth Circuit held that, although regulations on the referendum process implicated the fundamental right to vote, the state's important interests justified the minimal burden on plaintiffs' rights and that Oregon's signature verification standards were uniform and specific enough to ensure equal treatment of voters (538 F.3d 1098, 1102-1107) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Exercise of Franchise as Fundamental Interest

The factual background of Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][h]. In that case, petitioners challenged on equal protection grounds a statute providing that a candidate for director of a water district must be a freeholder in the district. The California Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional as it applied to the Imperial Irrigation District under the equal protection clauses of both the United States and the California Constitutions. The Court first inquired whether petitioners' claim was to be judged by the compelling interest test or the rational relation test. It noted that because the right of franchise is fundamental in character, the stricter of these standards has often been applied. Although not every classification created by an election law is subject to strict scrutiny, the compelling interest test must be applied if a classification has a real and appreciable impact on the equality, fairness, and integrity of the electoral process.

[b] Restrictions on Eligibility to Vote

In Westbrook v. Mihaly (1970) 2 Cal. 3d 765, 87 Cal. Rptr. 839, 471 P.2d 487 , vacated, 403 U.S. 915 (1971) , petitioners, who were residents and registered voters of a municipality, filed suit for a writ of mandamus to compel municipal authorities to certify that local bond issues were approved by a majority of the voters even though they did not receive the two-thirds vote required by former Cal. Const., art. XIII, § 40 [see now Cal. Const., art. XIV, § 18]. Petitioners claimed that this provision of the California Constitution violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because it substantially diminished the effect of the votes of all persons favoring passage of the bond issue. The California Supreme Court agreed. It first determined that the right to vote belongs in the category of rights that are deemed fundamental and then applied strict judicial scrutiny to hold that the state constitutional provision violated the equal protection clause.

Although respondents argued that a requirement of two-thirds voter approval in a local bond election did not abridge the fundamental right to vote because it did not apply to elections for public office and did not absolutely deny the voting franchise, the Supreme Court rejected both these arguments, holding that the type of election does not determine the parameters of the right and any invasion or restraint on the right is sufficient to invoke the strict scrutiny standard of review.

Westbrook, however, was vacated by the United States Supreme Court on the basis of the holding in Gordon v. Lance (1971) 403 U.S. 1, 7-8, 91 S. Ct. 1889, 29 L. Ed. 2d 273 , that the Fourteenth Amendment does not prevent a state from requiring more than a simple majority on tax and revenue measures.

In Ramirez v. Brown (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 199, 107 Cal. Rptr. 137, 507 P.2d 1345 , rev'd, 418 U.S. 24 (1974) , three ex-felons, all of whom had successfully completed parole, challenged the constitutionality of former Cal. Const., arts. II, XX, § 11 [now see Cal. Const., art. II, § 11], which denied the right to vote to persons convicted of an infamous crime. The California Supreme Court held that these provisions and the statutes implementing them violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court first noted that since its last major pronouncement on the fundamental right to vote in Otsuka v. Hite (1966) 64 Cal. 2d 596, 601, 51 Cal. Rptr. 284, 414 P.2d 412 , the test for judging the constitutionality of a state-imposed limitation on the right to vote had become substantially more strict. A restriction on voting must be necessary to promote a compelling state interest, and to be necessary, it must constitute the "least burdensome" alternative possible. That is, if there are other, reasonable ways to achieve its goals with a lesser burden on constitutionally protected activity, a state may not choose the way of greater interference. For the Court, this principle requiring the least burdensome means available to achieve the goal became the crux of the case. The purpose of disfranchisement of ex-felons was to deter election fraud. However, the state's modern electoral system had undergone repeated reforms which diminished the possibility of election fraud. Further, a broad range of penal sanctions had been enacted to prevent such fraud. Enforcement of the laws governing the voting process and penalizing its misuse--rather than the outright disfranchisement of persons convicted of crime--is the method of preventing election fraud which is least burdensome on the right of suffrage.

Ramirez was reversed by the United States Supreme Court for its interpretation of the scope of the Fourteenth Amendment, but the case is still significant for indicating the highly protective approach of the California Supreme Court in addressing statutes and other forms of regulation that affect the right to vote.

[c] Barriers on Candidacy

In Elections Bd. v. Socialist Workers Party (1979) 440 U.S. 173, 99 S. Ct. 983, 59 L. Ed. 2d 230, 241-243 , a barrier on candidacy was created by an Illinois statute that required a candidate to gather 25,000 voters' signatures for a statewide election but a greater number of signatures to run in a Chicago election; the statute was challenged by prospective candidates for the Chicago mayorality position. The United States Supreme Court, in holding that the statute violated the equal protection clause, pointed out that restrictions on access to the ballot burden two distinct and fundamental rights--the right to associate for the advancement of political beliefs and the right of voters to cast their ballots effectively. Even though the states have a legitimate interest in regulating the number of candidates on a ballot, the signature requirements for Chicago candidates are clearly not the least restrictive means of protecting that interest since a lower requirement is provided for statewide elections.

Gould v. Grubb (1975) 14 Cal. 3d 661, 122 Cal. Rptr. 377, 536 P.2d 1337 , was a mandate proceeding in which two candidates for public office challenged the validity of a city charter provision which effectively required that incumbents' names be placed on the top of the election ballot. The California Supreme Court ruled that the city charter provision constituted a denial of equal protection under the federal and state Constitutions because it imposed a real and appreciable impact on the quality, fairness, and integrity of the electoral process. First, the Court cited the rule that any classification scheme which imposes a real and appreciable impact on the equality, fairness, and integrity of the electoral process would be subjected to strict scrutiny. Second, the Court determined that the city charter provision in question would be subjected to strict scrutiny because of the trial court's determination that the candidate in the top ballot position has a substantial advantage over lower-placed candidates. The charter thus inevitably dilutes the weight of the vote of those electors who cast their ballots for a candidate not included within the advantaged class. The Court distinguished the incumbent-first provision from election provisions detailing the mechanisms of the election process which, because of their minimal effect on the fundamental right to vote, are judged on the "rational basis" standard.

Gould is significant because it probably represents the least restrictive candidacy related provision to which the Court applied the strict scrutiny test; other decisions on the right of candidacy examined laws which, in effect, prevented one from becoming a candidate [see, e.g., Choudhry v. Free (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 660, 664, 131 Cal. Rptr. 654, 552 P.2d 438 (restriction of candidates to property owners is unconstitutional; see § 35A.35[3][c]); Johnson v. Hamilton (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 461, 472, 125 Cal. Rptr. 129, 541 P.2d 881 (prefiling residence requirement greater than 30 days is unconstitutional); Knoll v. Davidson (1974) 12 Cal. 3d 335, 350, 116 Cal. Rptr. 97, 525 P.2d 1273 (filing fee is unconstitutional unless alternative means of access to ballot provided for indigent and nonindigent candidates)].

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question that burdens the right to marry or to have offspring, which are fundamental interests of the individual, is not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should insert facts showing that state action burdens the right to marry or have offspring, not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that the classification infringes a fundamental interest are set out in §§ 35A.34, 35A.35, 35A.37 -35A.45.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Marriage and Procreation Are Fundamental Interests

In Zablocki v. Redhail (1978) 434 U.S. 374, 98 S. Ct. 673, 54 L. Ed. 2d 618 , a father who was obligated to support children not in his custody was denied the right to marry under a Wisconsin statute that provided that a Wisconsin resident in his situation could not marry without proof of compliance with the support obligation and that the children were not at present, or likely to become in the future, public charges. He filed a claim in federal district court challenging the statute on several grounds including the denial of equal protection. A three-judge panel held that strict scrutiny of the statute was required because the classification created by the statute infringed on a fundamental right, the right to marry. Under the strict scrutiny test, the panel declared the statute invalid, and the United States Supreme Court affirmed. Although the Court did not use the term "strict scrutiny," it employed comparable language. The Court stated that since the classification at issue significantly interfered with the exercise of that right, critical examination of the state interests advanced in support of the classification was required. The Court then reviewed prior decisions recognizing the fundamental nature of marriage and its importance as the foundation of the family and society [see, e.g., Loving v. Virginia (1967) 388 U.S. 1, 12, 87 S. Ct. 1817, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1010 ; Meyer v. Nebraska (1923) 262 U.S. 390, 399, 43 S. Ct. 625, 67 L. Ed. 1042] . Further, the decision to marry, like decisions relating to procreation, childbirth, childrearing, and family relationships, is one of the personal decisions protected by the right of privacy.

Counsel should be aware that Zablocki does not stand for the proposition that any state infringement on marriage will be subjected to strict scrutiny. Although the Court suggested that any classification which significantly interferes with the exercise of the right to marry is constitutionally suspect, the Court distinguished Califano v. Jobst (1978) 434 U.S. 47, 53-54, 98 S. Ct. 95, 54 L. Ed. 2d 228 , in which regulations providing for loss of certain disability benefits on marriage were upheld as reasonable regulations that did not significantly interfere with decisions to enter into the marriage relationship even though, on the facts of that case, a disabled person would lose benefits if he or she married a person who was also disabled.

In Perez v. Sharp (1948) 32 Cal. 2d 711, 198 P.2d 17 , a proceeding in mandamus, petitioners challenged the constitutionality of former Civ. Code §§ 60, 69, 69a, which prevented marriage between white persons and Negroes, mulattos, Mongolians, or members of the Malay race. The California Supreme Court held that a statute restricting an individual's right to marry on the basis of race alone was a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court described marriage as a fundamental right that could not be prohibited by law except for an important social objective and by reasonable means. It further referred to marriage and the right to have offspring as fundamental rights that are protected from legislative infringement based on prejudice or oppressive discrimination by the constitutional requirements of due process and equal protection of the laws.

[a] Marriage and Procreation as Fundamental Interests

Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942) 316 U.S. 535, 62 S. Ct. 1110, 86 L. Ed. 1655 , is a leading case for describing marriage and procreation as fundamental interests, defining a fundamental interest, and using the term "strict scrutiny." Skinner was scheduled for a vasectomy under the Oklahoma Habitual Criminal Sterilization Act, which provided that an individual convicted three times for felonies involving moral turpitude could be subjected to a trial on the issue of whether he or she should be rendered sexually sterile. The United States Supreme Court held that the law violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court reasoned that the statute dealt with one of the basic civil rights of people. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the existence and survival of the race, and the power to sterilize may have subtle, far-reaching, and devastating effects, particularly in evil or reckless hands. Therefore, strict scrutiny of the classification contained in a sterilization law is essential. In this case, for example, the law encompassed those who committed larceny by trespass, trick, or fraud, but excluded embezzlers without the slightest indication that the distinction had any significance in the inheritability of criminal traits. The Court stated that the equal protection clause would be a formula of empty words indeed if such conspicuously artificial laws could be drawn.

In In re Marriage Cases (2008) 43 Cal. 4th 757, 76 Cal. Rptr. 3d 683, 183 P.3d 384 , the trial court determined that the statutes limiting marriage in California to opposite-sex couples [see Fam. Code §§ 300, 308.5] had to be evaluated under the strict scrutiny equal protection standard, because they rested upon a suspect classification (sex) and impinged upon a fundamental constitutional right (the right to marry), and concluded that the statutory limitation of marriage to the union of a man and a woman not only did not satisfy the strict scrutiny standard, but also did not meet the more deferential rational basis test because the differential treatment mandated by the statute did not further any legitimate state interest. The court held that California's marriage statutes were unconstitutional under the state Constitution insofar as they limited marriage to opposite-sex couples (43 Cal. 4th 757, 785-788) .

The Court of Appeal reversed on the ground that the superior court erred in finding that the statutory provisions at issue impinge upon the fundamental constitutional right to marry, which properly should have been interpreted to encompass only the right to marry a person of the opposite sex and the constitutional right plaintiffs actually sought to enforce was a right to same-sex marriage, which the Court of Appeal majority found lacking in any historical or precedential support. The Court of Appeal also rejected the superior court's conclusion that the California marriage statutes discriminated on the suspect basis of sex and for this reason were subject to strict scrutiny review, relying upon the circumstance that the statutes did not discriminate against either men or women or treat either of the genders differently from the other, but rather permitted members of either gender to marry only a person of the opposite gender. Although the Court of Appeal found that the marriage statutes realistically had to be viewed as providing differential treatment on the basis of sexual orientation, the court held that sexual orientation did not constitute a suspect classification for purposes of the state equal protection clause. Thus, the marriage statutes were not subject to strict scrutiny review, and applying the deferential rational basis standard, and found that the limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples survived rational basis review, reasoning that the state had a legitimate interest in preserving the traditional definition of marriage and the statute's classifications were rationally related to that interest (43 Cal. 4th 757, 788) .

The California Supreme Court granted review and held that the California Constitution prohibited a statutory distinction between marriage and registered domestic partnerships [see Fam. Code § 297 et seq.], i.e., that the failure to designate the official relationship of same-sex couples as marriage violated the California Constitution based on the constitutionally-based right to marry, and that in view of the substance and significance of the fundamental constitutional right to form a family relationship, the California Constitution properly had to be interpreted to guarantee the basic civil right to marry to all Californians, whether homosexual or heterosexual, and to same-sex couples as well as to opposite-sex couples. The right to marry is a fundamental right under the California Constitution (43 Cal. 4th 757, 809-810) . With regard to equal protection specifically, the Court held that the circumstance that the statutes assigned a different name for the official family relationship of same-sex couples as contrasted with the name for the official family relationship of opposite-sex couples, i.e., marriage, raised constitutional concerns under the state constitutional equal protection clause. In analyzing the validity of this differential treatment, the Court first determined that the strict scrutiny standard of review applied to the statutory classification because the statutes were properly understood as classifying or discriminating on the basis of sexual orientation, which the Court concluded was a constitutionally suspect basis upon which to impose differential treatment, and that the differential treatment at issue impinged upon a same-sex couple's fundamental interest in having their family relationship accorded the same respect and dignity enjoyed by an opposite-sex couple (43 Cal. 4th 757, 782-785 ,). Under the strict scrutiny standard, the Court concluded that the purpose underlying differential treatment of opposite-sex and same-sex couples embodied in California's marriage statutes, i.e., the interest in retaining the traditional and well-established definition of marriage, could not properly be viewed as a compelling state interest for purposes of the equal protection clause or as necessary to serve such an interest. The Court gave the following reasons for that conclusion: The exclusion of same-sex couples from the designation of marriage was not necessary to afford full protection to all of the rights and benefits enjoyed by married opposite-sex couples; permitting same-sex couples access to the designation of marriage would not deprive opposite-sex couples of any rights and would not alter the legal framework of the institution of marriage, because same-sex couples who chose to marry would be subject to the same obligations and duties imposed on married opposite-sex couples. Retaining the traditional definition of marriage and affording same-sex couples only a separate and differently-named family relationship would impose appreciable harm on same-sex couples and their children, because denying such couples access to the familiar and highly favored designation of marriage was likely to cast doubt on whether the official family relationship of same-sex couples enjoyed dignity equal to that of opposite-sex couples. Because of the widespread disparagement gay individuals historically faced, it was more probable that excluding same-sex couples from the legal institution of marriage was likely to be viewed as reflecting an official view that their committed relationships were of lesser stature than the comparable relationships of opposite-sex couples. Finally, retaining the designation of marriage exclusively for opposite-sex couples and providing only a separate and distinct designation for same-sex couples could have the effect of perpetuating a more general premise emphatically rejected by California that gay individuals and same-sex couples were in some respects second-class citizens who could legally be treated differently from, and less favorably than, heterosexual individuals or opposite-sex couples (43 Cal. 4th 757, 782-785, 831-856) . As a remedy, the Court concluded that in light of its conclusions, the language of Fam. Code § 300 limiting the designation of marriage to a union "between a man and a woman" was unconstitutional and had to be stricken from the statute, and that the remaining statutory language had to be understood as making the designation of marriage available both to opposite-sex and same-sex couples. In addition, because the limitation of marriage to opposite-sex couples imposed by Fam. Code § 308.5 could have no constitutionally permissible effect, it could not stand. The Court held further that plaintiffs were entitled to the issuance of a writ of mandate directing the appropriate state officials to take all actions necessary to effectuate its ruling so as to ensure that county clerks and other local officials throughout the state, in performing their duty to enforce the marriage statutes in their jurisdictions, applied those provisions in a manner consistent with its decision (43 Cal. 4th 757, 856-857) .

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question which burdens the right to travel, a fundamental interest of the individual, is not justified by a compelling governmental interest. The principles stated in the memorandum apply only to interstate travel; restrictions on international travel need only satisfy the rational relationship standard [Califano v. Aznavorian (1978) 439 U.S. 170, 99 S. Ct. 471, 58 L. Ed. 2d 435, 441] .

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should insert facts showing state action burdening the right to travel, not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that the classification infringes a fundamental interest are set out in §§ 35A.34 -35A.36, 35A.38 -35A.45.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Right to Travel Is Fundamental Interest

In Memorial Hosp. v. Maricopa County (1974) 415 U.S. 250, 94 S. Ct. 1076, 39 L. Ed. 2d 306 , a county refused to pay for nonemergency hospitalization of or medical care for an indigent who did not meet the one-year county residence requirement created by an Arizona statute. The United States Supreme Court held that this durational residence requirement was an infringement on the right to travel. As such, it could only be justified by a compelling state interest, and in this case, the state could not provide a justification.

The factual background of In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931 (1971) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][d]. Petitioner sought to invalidate a child support statute that placed a higher penalty on nonsupporting fathers who lived outside California. The state argued that the enhanced penalty facilitated its legitimate interest in enforcing child support obligations because it "encouraged" absent fathers to move to and remain in California. The Court responded that even if the statute was rationally related to the state's interest, it violated the individual's constitutional right to travel. The Court noted that even though the right to travel from one state to another is not explicitly mentioned in the United States Constitution, it was firmly established and repeatedly recognized. The Court noted further that it was not necessary to determine whether former Penal Code § 270 as an infringement of the fundamental constitutional right to travel could be justified by a compelling government interest, since the basic objective of the law--to induce nonsupporting fathers to come to California--was not constitutionally legitimate.

The factual background of In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931 (1971) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][d]. Petitioner sought to invalidate a child support statute that placed a higher penalty on nonsupporting fathers who lived outside California. The California Supreme Court, in declaring the statute unconstitutional as a violation of equal protection under the federal Constitution, held that the constitutional right to travel embodies more than merely the right to cross state lines and move about the country; it includes as well the right of the individual freely to choose a state of residence. It thus encompasses a statutory provision which penalizes the decision to reside in a state other than California.

[c] Durational Residence Requirement Is Burden on Right to Travel

The factual background of Memorial Hosp. v. Maricopa County (1974) 415 U.S. 250, 94 S. Ct. 1076, 39 L. Ed. 2d 306 , is discussed in § 35A.37[3][a]. The United States Supreme Court held that durational residence requirements were not, per se, unconstitutional as an infringement on the right to travel, but that a requirement that penalized the exercise of the right to travel by restricting the ability to obtain such necessities of life as medical care, food, or shelter must be justified by a compelling state interest. The Court held that the state could not provide such a justification.

Counsel will note that the Supreme Court has declined to view durational residence requirements in suits for dissolution of marriage as an unconstitutional infringement on the right to travel. The Court stated that a state's interest in the regulation of domestic relations provided a much stronger justification for those requirements than administrative convenience proposed as a justification in Memorial Hosp. [see Sosna v. Iowa (1975) 419 U.S. 393, 416-417, 95 S. Ct. 553, 42 L. Ed. 2d 532] .

In Somers v. Superior Court (2009) 172 Cal. App. 4th 1407, 1414-1416, 92 Cal. Rptr. 3d 116 , an individual who was born in California in 1941, was issued a California birth certificate, which identified her sex as male. In 2005, she underwent gender reassignment surgery. She subsequently obtained an order from a court in Kansas, where she resided, legally changing her name, and then a Kansas driver's license, reflecting her new name, and indicating her sex as female. She also obtained a Medicare card reflecting her new name and gender. She was advised by two Kansas attorneys regarding changing her birth certificate that Kansas law did not permit issuance of a new birth certificate to reflect a change of gender. She filed a petition under Health & Safety Code § 103425 in a California Superior Court for change of gender and issuance of new California birth certificate. She included a declaration from her physician indicating that she had undergone gender reassignment surgery, and a copy of the Kansas order for name change. She also filed her declaration and the declaration of one of her Kansas attorneys, indicating that she could not obtain the relief sought in Kansas. The trial court denied the petition on the basis that she was not a resident of California (172 Cal. App. 4th 1407, 1410-1411) . The Court of Appeal held that the statutory requirement that she file her petition for new California birth certificate under Section 103425 in her county of residence, when she resided outside California, violated her equal protection rights under the Fourteenth Amendment and the California Constitution. The court found first that a birth certificate is a vital, primary source of personal identification, necessary to obtain other forms of identification such as a Social Security card or passport (172 Cal. App. 4th 1407, 1411). The court then found that the trial court had jurisdiction to grant the petition. The court had subject matter jurisdiction to order issuance of a new California birth certificate to reflect the gender reassignment of an individual born in California pursuant to the statutory scheme, and it had personal jurisdiction over the individual, who consented to the court's jurisdiction by voluntarily filing the petition and personally appearing at the hearing (172 Cal. App. 4th 1407, 1411-1412) . The court then held that the statutory requirement that an individual filing a petition under Health & Saf. Code § 103425 for issuance of a new California birth certificate file in the county of his or her residence was a violation of the equal protection and clause as applied to nonresident transgender individuals who were born in California. The court first determined that strict scrutiny was the appropriate standard to apply, given that the classification implicated the constitutionally guaranteed right of interstate travel because it penalizes California-born transgender individuals for moving to a state outside of California (172 Cal. App. 4th 1407, 1413-1415) . Further, on review of the legislative history of Section 103425, the court found no reason for the requirement that individuals seeking issuance of a new California birth certificate file the petition in their county of residence. Thus, the court could discern no compelling state interest in treating California-born transgender individuals who reside out of state differently from California-born transgender individuals who reside in California when either class seeks issuance of a new California birth certificate under § 103425 (172 Cal. App. 4th 1407, 1415) . The court also found that even if constitutional rights were not implicated by the classification, there was no rational basis for the disparate treatment. Accordingly, the requirement that a petitioner under Health & Safety Code § 103425 file the petition in the county of his or her residence denied California-born transgender individuals residing outside California the same rights that California-born transgender individuals residing in California had under Section 103425 (172 Cal. App. 4th 1407, 1415-1416) .

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Right to Travel Is Fundamental Interest

Shapiro v. Thompson (1969) 394 U.S. 618, 89 S. Ct. 1322, 22 L. Ed. 2d 600 , is the seminal decision describing the fundamental right of travel. In Shapiro, the United States Supreme Court held that state statutes requiring one year of residence as a condition precedent for receipt of state welfare funds violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by impinging on the constitutional right to travel freely from state to state. The Court reasoned that the nature of the federal union and the constitutional concepts of personal liberty both require that all citizens be free to travel throughout the nation uninhibited by statutes, rules, or regulations which unreasonably burden or restrict this movement. Even though the right to travel is not explicitly mentioned in the federal Constitution, the Court found no need to locate a particular constitutional provision granting it. It is sustained, instead, as a constitutional right by its obvious necessity to creation of a strong union and its long recognition as a basic right under the federal Constitution. The statutes may not be justified on the ground that they discourage the poor from travel to a state; that kind of discouragement directly chills the assertion of a constitutional right by penalizing those who choose to exercise it.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Education Is Fundamental Interest

The factual background of Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][c]. The California Supreme Court concluded that to determine if the existing state public school financing system complied with the equal protection requirements of the state constitution, its provisions must be subjected to strict judicial scrutiny because the system established and perpetuated a classification based on school district wealth which affected plaintiffs' fundamental interest in education. The Court held unequivocally that education is a fundamental interest. In Butt v. State of California (1992) 4 Cal. 4th 668, 692, 15 Cal. Rptr. 2d 480, 842 P.2d 1240 , the California Supreme Court again held that education is a fundamental interest, and stated that the denial of basic educational equality on the basis of district residence is subject to strict scrutiny analysis.

Serrano's holding that education is a fundamental interest is limited only to an interpretation of the state Constitution. The United States Supreme Court specifically held that education is not a fundamental interest under the federal Constitution in San Antonio School Dist. v. Rodriguez (1973) 411 U.S. 1, 35-38, 93 S. Ct. 1278, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16 , reh'g denied, 411 U.S. 959 , set out in § 35A.20[3][h]. Moreover, even under the California Constitution, some related aspects of public education might not be considered to be a fundamental right [see, e.g., Steffes v. California Interscholastic Federation (1986) 176 Cal. App. 3d 739, 748, 222 Cal. Rptr. 355 (while public education is fundamental right, right to participate in interscholastic athletics is not fundamental right entitled to strict scrutiny review, but is tested by rational basis standard)].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Employment as Fundamental Interest

In Hardy v. Stumph (1978) 21 Cal. 3d 1, 145 Cal. Rptr. 176, 576 P.2d 1342 , plaintiff petitioned for a writ of mandate to challenge the City of Oakland's physical agility test for female police officers which she had failed. The trial court denied the petition and plaintiff appealed to the California Supreme Court which affirmed on the ground that use of the test did not constitute a denial of equal protection or a violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. One of plaintiff's arguments was that the test, which disqualified a disproportionate number of female applicants, abridged the fundamental right of women to pursue employment. The Court rejected this contention because the right to pursue a lawful occupation is fundamental only if the employment sought is a common occupation within the community. It cited a dictim in D'Amico v. Board of Medical Examiners (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 1, 18, 112 Cal. Rptr. 786, 520 P.2d 10 [set out in § 35A.20[3][d]], for the rule that an individual does not possess a fundamental right to pursue an occupation wherein technical complexity and intimate relationship to the public interest and welfare counsel deference to legislative judgment. On these criteria, law enforcement is hardly a common occupation.

The factual background of Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][a]. In that case, petitioners challenged on equal protection grounds a statute which restricted the employment of women bartenders. The Supreme Court in declaring the statute unconstitutional held that application of the strict standard of review was necessary, not only because the statutory classification was based on sex but because the statute limited the fundamental right of one class of persons to pursue the lawful profession of bartending. The Court relied for this conclusion principally on the rule in both Purdy & Fitzpatrick v. California (1969) 71 Cal. 2d 566, 578, 79 Cal. Rptr. 77, 456 P.2d 645 , which held that any limitation on the opportunity for employment impedes the achievement of economic security which is essential for the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness and can only be sustained after careful scrutiny, and Truax v. Raich (1915) 239 U.S. 33, 41, 36 S. Ct. 7, 60 L. Ed. 131 , in which the United States Supreme Court stated that the right to work for a living in the common occupations of the community is of the very essence of the personal freedom and opportunity that it was the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment to secure.

[b] Expansion of Principle

Although there is language in Sail'er Inn which suggests that an individual has a fundamental right to pursue any lawful occupation, the Court disavowed such broad language in Hardy v. Stumph, discussed above. It is not possible to determine whether the decisions of the United States Supreme Court would support the reasoning in Hardy because the Court has not ruled explicitly on employment as a fundamental interest for the purposes of equal protection analysis. In Examining Bd. v. Flores de Otero (1976) 426 U.S. 572, 603-604, 96 S. Ct. 2264, 49 L. Ed. 2d 65 [set out in § 35A.31[3][a]], the Court quoted the rule of Truax that the right to pursue a common occupation of the community was fundamental; but referred repeatedly throughout the opinion to employment in a "lawful occupation" and struck down, as a violation of equal protection, restrictions on the practice of engineering and architecture which conceivably are not common occupations under the standard of Hardy. Nevertheless, the primary reason for the result in Examining Bd. was discrimination against aliens in these occupations. It is also true, however, that one of the cases relied on by Truax describes the right of citizens to earn a livelihood by any lawful calling and to pursue any livelihood or avocation as a liberty interest protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment [Allgeyer v. Louisiana (1896) 165 U.S. 578, 589, 591, 17 S. Ct. 427, 41 L. Ed. 832 , questioned on another point in Lincoln Fed. Labor Union No. 19129, American Fed. of Labor v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co. (1948) 335 U.S. 525, 535, 69 S. Ct. 251, 93 L. Ed. 212] . But this case also refers to the privilege of pursuing an ordinary calling or trade. Arguably, Sail'er Inn is authority for the additional proposition that a classification which burdens the right to pursue any employment--common or not--is subject to strict scrutiny where the basis for the burden is a suspect category such as sex or race.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] First Amendment Guarantees as Fundamental Interests

In Police Dep't v. Mosley (1972) 408 U.S. 92, 92 S. Ct. 2286, 33 L. Ed. 2d 212 , the United States Supreme Court examined the validity of a Chicago ordinance that made it a criminal offense to picket within 150 feet of a school building while school was in session but exempted peaceful picketing of a school involved in a labor dispute. Because the ordinance divided picketing into two classes, the Court analyzed the ordinance in terms of the equal protection clause and held the ordinance unconstitutional because it made an impermissible distinction between labor picketing and other peaceful picketing. The Court's analysis in effect treats First Amendment guarantees like other fundamental interests that are subject to strict judicial scrutiny. It first noted that the equal protection claim was closely intertwined with First Amendment interests. Under the equal protection clause, as well as the First Amendment itself, the government may not grant the use of a forum to people whose views it finds acceptable but deny use to those wishing to express less favored or more controversial views. Selective exclusions from a public forum may not be based on content alone, and may not be justified by reference to content alone. The Court cited Niemotko v. Maryland (1951) 340 U.S. 268, 273, 71 S. Ct. 325, 95 L. Ed. 267 , which held that the completely arbitrary and discriminatory refusal to grant a permit for use of a public park was a denial of equal protection, as its principle authority.

Second, the Court pointed out that it is not the case that all picketing must always be allowed. Under an equal protection analysis, there may be sufficient regulatory interests justifying selective exclusions or distinctions among pickets. And the state may have a legitimate interest in prohibiting some picketing to protect public order. But these justifications for selective exclusions from a public forum must be carefully scrutinized. Because picketing plainly involves expressive conduct within the protection of the First Amendment, discrimination among pickets must be tailored to serve a substantial governmental interest.

Mosley was followed by a California court of appeal in Ghafari v. Municipal Court (1978) 87 Cal. App. 3d 255, 265-266, 150 Cal. Rptr. 813 (statute prohibiting appearance in public with face concealed violated equal protection).

Thereafter, four justices of the United States Supreme Court applied the principles of Mosley in Young v. American Mini Theatres (1976) 427 U.S. 50, 63-73, 96 S. Ct. 2440, 49 L. Ed. 2d 310 . Although the issue was whether a statutory classification in a city zoning ordinance which differentiates between motion picture theaters which exhibited sexually explicit adult movies and those which did not was constitutional, the basis for the opinion's equal protection analysis is not clear. The opinion asserts that even though Mosley said that selective exclusion from a public forum may not be based on content alone, material with an erotic content may be placed in a different classification from nonerotic forms of expression. It then proceeded to determine whether the classification which regulated the geographic localities in which such movies could be exhibited but did not suppress or greatly restrict access to the movies was justified by the city's interest in preserving the character of its neighborhoods, and concluded that because the city's interest in the present and future character of its neighborhoods adequately supports its classification of motion pictures, the ordinance did not violate the equal protection clause.

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question which burdens some aspect of the right of privacy, a fundamental interest of the individual, is not justified by a compelling governmental interest. Counsel should be aware that in addition to equal protection arguments under both the federal and state Constitutions, privacy is a guarantee explicitly provided for in the state Constitution [Cal. Const., art. I, § 1; see also California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 429, Privacy, § 429.10 et seq. (Matthew Bender)].

Counsel should insert argument in the form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Privacy as Fundamental Interest

In Roe v. Wade (1973) 410 U.S. 113, 93 S. Ct. 705, 35 L. Ed. 2d 147 , reh'g denied, 410 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1409, 35 L. Ed. 2d 694 , the Supreme Court examined the constitutionality of a Texas statute that prohibited abortions unless they were undertaken on medical advice for the purpose of saving the mother's life. The Court held that the statute violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The basis for its holding was its view that a right of personal privacy or guarantee of certain zones of privacy exists under the federal Constitution, particularly as part of the concept of liberty guaranteed by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides that no state may deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. This right of privacy, as the Court pointed out, is applicable to activities relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child rearing, and education; but it applies only to personal rights which can be deemed fundamental or "implicit in the concept of ordered liberty." The Court concluded that the right of privacy is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy. Thus, the statute in question could be justified only if it served a compelling state interest and was narrowly drawn to express only the legitimate state interests at stake; and the statute could not satisfy these criteria.

Roe treated privacy as a fundamental interest for purposes of due process analysis rather than equal protection analysis. However, in a subsequent decision, the Court cited Roe without further discussion as an example of classifications subject to strict scrutiny under the equal protection clause because they impermissibly interfered with the exercise of a fundamental right [Massachusetts Bd. of Retirement v. Murgia (1976) 427 U.S. 307, 312, 96 S. Ct. 2562, 49 L. Ed. 2d 520 ; see Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942) 316 U.S. 535, 541-542, 62 S. Ct. 1110, 86 L. Ed. 1655 (set out in § 35A.36[4][a], decided before the right of privacy cases but dealing with one aspect of that right--procreation--as an equal protection issue)].

In Long Beach City Employees Assn. v. City of Long Beach (1986) 41 Cal. 3d 937, 227 Cal. Rptr. 90, 719 P.2d 660 , a subdivision of defendant city began requiring its employees to undergo polygraph examinations after money was stolen from the bureau operations. Plaintiff filed a complaint for a temporary restraining order and injunctive relief to prevent administration of the examinations, claiming that the compulsory polygraph examinations were unconstitutional. The trial court denied the relief. Plaintiff appealed.

The California Supreme Court reversed, based on its finding that the examinations were a violation of the employees' privacy rights. Cal. Const., art. I, § 1, specifies privacy as an inalienable right. The Court observed that if there is a quintessential zone of human privacy it is the mind (41 Cal. 3d 937, 943-944) . Although the Court did not characterize the test as one of "strict scrutiny," its opinion made it clear that strict scrutiny was the appropriate test before interfering with the fundamental right of privacy. Because the Court found that polygraph examinations impinged on the fundamental right of privacy, a rational relationship was not enough. Defendant had the burden of demonstrating that its classifications of which employees were required to take the examination were justified by a compelling governmental interest and that the distinctions drawn were necessary to further that purpose (41 Cal. 3d 937, 948) . The Court noted that public employees are trustees of the public interest and thus owe a special duty of integrity. Nevertheless, the Court found that this duty alone, without more, did not provide a compelling justification for such an inherent intrusion on an ordinary public employee's fundamental right of privacy, particularly when less intrusive means to investigate alleged wrongdoing are available (41 Cal. 3d 937, 952) . The Court found that defendant had failed to meet its burden (41 Cal. 3d 937, 956) .

[b] Elements of Privacy

In Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l (1977) 431 U.S. 678, 97 S. Ct. 2010, 52 L. Ed. 2d 675 , the Supreme Court held that a New York statute which controlled the sale and distribution of contraceptives violated the constitutional right to privacy. The Court affirmed its conclusion in Roe v. Wade (1973) 410 U.S. 113, 152, 93 S. Ct. 705, 35 L. Ed. 2d 147 , reh'g denied, 410 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1409, 35 L. Ed. 2d 694 [set out under § 35A.41[3][a]], that the right of personal privacy is one aspect of the "liberty" protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and it protects personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, child rearing, and education from unjustified governmental interference. The Court noted that the outer limits of this right of privacy had not yet been determined.

The factual background of Roe v. Wade (1973) 410 U.S. 113, 93 S. Ct. 705, 35 L. Ed. 2d 147 , reh'g denied, 410 U.S. 959, 93 S. Ct. 1409, 35 L. Ed. 2d 694 , is discussed in § 35A.41[3][a].

In American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren (1997) 16 Cal. 4th 307, 66 Cal. Rptr. 2d 210, 940 P.2d 797 , after concluding that a statute impinging on the fundamental autonomy privacy right of a minor or an adult must be evaluated under the compelling interest test, the California Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a statute requiring pregnant minors to secure either parental consent or judicial authorization before obtaining an abortion. The Court made clear that statutory intrusion on an autonomy privacy interest of a fundamental nature may not be justified simply by showing that the statute serves a legitimate competing interest sufficient to justify an impingement on a less central privacy interest.Though a statute's relationship to minors is properly employed in the constitutional calculus in determining whether an asserted state purpose or interest is compelling, because the statute's impact on minors is taken into account in assessing the importance of the state interest ostensibly served by the infringement, it is inappropriate additionally to lower the applicable constitutional standard under which the statute is evaluated simply because the privacy interests at stake are those of minors (16 Cal. 4th 307, 341-342) .

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question which burdens personal liberty, a fundamental interest of the individual, is not justified by a compelling governmental interest. In that the individual's interest in a unanimous jury verdict has been described as an interest closely related to personal liberty, this memorandum may also be adapted to support the principle that a unanimous jury verdict is a fundamental interest [see § 35A.42[3][a][i]].

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Personal Liberty as Fundamental Interest

The factual background of People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][e]. The defendant in that case argued that former Welf. & Inst. Code § 1731.5 violated his guarantee of equal protection under the laws because under its provisions an individual between the ages of 16 and 21 could be committed to the youth authority and serve a potentially longer term than the maximum jail sentence imposed for the same offense on persons who were 21 or older. The Supreme Court agreed with defendant's contention and declared the law unconstitutional. The Court determined that the interest involved was personal liberty, an interest which has origins in Anglo-American legalhistory and is reflected in the constitutional guarantee of the right to a fair trial for those accused of a crime. It concluded that personal liberty is a fundamental interest which, in the words of the Court, is second only to life itself as an interest protected under both the state and federal Constitutions.

Olivas is an interesting decision because of the approach taken to determine, for the first time in California, whether personal liberty represented an interest which was fundamental for purposes of equal protection analysis. The Court noted that courts in other states and lower federal courts had reached conflicting conclusions. It then reviewed the legal precedents for the personal liberty concept beginning with the Magna Carta. It examined in particular the various guarantees of due process which exist largely because of a great concern in our system of justice for procedures which may result in deprivations of personal liberty. The fact that the California Constitution requires a unanimous jury verdict manifests an even stronger concern for unwarranted deprivations of personal liberty by the state than can be found in the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court concluded that if the United States and California Constitutions were vigilant through their due process clauses in protecting against the initial deprivation of personal liberty, they could be no less vigilant in protecting through their equal protection clauses against continuing deprivations of liberty.

Counsel will note, however, that the interest in personal liberty is not necessarily infringed by all classifications which affect the possible loss of freedom. Thus, the California Supreme Court declined to apply strict scrutiny in In re Mitchell P. (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 946, 950 n.3, 151 Cal. Rptr. 330, 587 P.2d 1144 , on the ground that disparity in evidentiary rules governing juvenile and criminal proceedings is not a classification directly affecting the liberty interest.

[i] Unanimous Jury Verdict

Counsel will note that in regard to the individual's interest in a unanimous jury verdict, an interest closely related to personal liberty, the California Supreme Court has commented that the individual's right to a unanimous verdict in a criminal case is a fundamental interest for the purposes of equal protection analysis [People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 246, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375 ; People v. Superior Court (1967) 67 Cal. 2d 929, 932, 64 Cal. Rptr. 327, 434 P.2d 623 ; see Cal. Const., art. I, § 16]. Further, the Court has held that the individual's right to a unanimous verdict is also a fundamental interest in civil commitment proceedings [People v. Feagley (1975) 14 Cal. 3d 338, 356, 121 Cal. Rptr. 509, 535 P.2d 373 (denial of unanimous jury verdict requirement to persons committed under the mentally disordered sex offender law while it is provided to persons committed as mentally disordered persons not justified by compelling state interest)]. Nevertheless, the practical necessity for this latter principle is questionable in view of the rulings which interpret Cal. Const., art. I, § 16 to guarantee a unanimous jury verdict not only in criminal cases but also in the civil commitment proceedings for alleged mentally disordered sex offenders and narcotics addicts even though the constitutional provision does not by its terms apply to "civil" actions [see People v. Thomas (1977) 19 Cal. 3d 630, 641-644 fn. 12, 139 Cal. Rptr. 594, 566 P.2d 228] .

[b] Considerable Restraint as Sufficient

The factual background of People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][e]. In that case, the Supreme Court was required to determine whether commitment to a youth authority institution could be viewed as a restraint on personal freedom. The Court admitted that youth authority wards may experience greater freedom than individuals confined in state prisons or mental hospitals but concluded that any institutional process which involved physical restraint of the person was an infringement of personal liberty. In fact, in the Court's view, the types of limitations and controls which accompany an individual's release on parole also exert a comparable restraint on personal liberty because they amount to a considerable limitation on the freedom of action which all other citizens possess.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Personal Liberty as Fundamental Interest

In Humphrey v. Cady (1972) 405 U.S. 504, 92 S. Ct. 1048, 31 L. Ed. 2d 394 , the Supreme Court held that a statute which permitted the "massive curtailment of liberty" involved in compulsory confinement for psychiatric treatment violated the equal protection clause because it denied a jury trial on the issue of whether or not commitment standards had been met even though a different state law permitted a jury trial in essentially equivalent situations. The Court did not discuss the nature of personal liberty as a constitutionally protected interest and had no occasion to invoke the strict scrutiny test since it believed that the differential statutory treatment was arbitrary.

In O'Connor v. Donaldson (1975) 422 U.S. 563, 95 S. Ct. 2486, 45 L. Ed. 2d 396 , the Supreme Court held that a state which confines an individual who is not dangerous and is capable of surviving freely and safely either by himself or with the help of family or friends violates the individual's constitutional right to "freedom." This case was an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for deprival of constitutional rights under color of state law, and the Court did not discuss the right to personal freedom in terms of equal protection analysis.

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action which burdens an individual's right of access to the courts, a fundamental interest of the individual, is not justified by a compelling governmental interest.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that the classification infringes a fundamental interest are set out in §§ 35A.34 -35A.42, 35A.44, 35A.45.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Access to Courts as Fundamental Interest

In Boddie v. Connecticut (1971) 401 U.S. 371, 91 S. Ct. 780, 28 L. Ed. 2d 113 , a group of welfare recipients challenged the constitutionality of certain state procedures for the commencement of divorce proceedings, as the procedures had been applied to them, including the requirement of payment of court fees and costs for service of process. The Supreme Court held that withholding access to the courts on the basis of indigency when the purpose was to obtain a divorce violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the Court framed its views in terms of the due process clause, the test of constitutionality which it used is comparable to the strict scrutiny test in equal protection analysis. The Court stated first that due process requires, at a minimum, that absent a courtervailing state interest of overriding significance, persons forced to settle their claims through the judicial process must be given a meaningful opportunity to be heard. Second, a statute or rule may be constitutionally invalid as applied when it operates to deprive an individual of a protectedright although its general validity is beyond question. The Court added that although it cannot be said that access to the courts for all individuals under all circumstances is guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, such access was required in this case.

In Payne v. Superior Court (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 908, 132 Cal. Rptr. 405, 553 P.2d 565 , an indigent prisoner's request to attend the trial of a civil case in which damages were sought against him was denied by state prison authorities. The Supreme Court held that the dual deprivation of appointed counsel and the right to personal presence is an unconstitutional violation of the prisoner's rights under the due process and equal protection clauses of both the state and federal Constitutions. The Court first noted that none of the constitutionally guaranteed freedoms would be secure if a person could be deprived of possessions without an opportunity to defend them at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner, and that the right of access to the courts included access to all courts, both state and federal, without regard to the type of petition or relief sought. When indigent prisoners are denied access to a court to defend a civil suit while free citizens and prisoners possessing the means to hire counsel possess such a right, the Court found that an equal protection question is raised in addition to that of due process. The Court concluded that since the right of access is one of fundamental constitutional dimension, its denial by the state must be supported by a compelling state interest. In this case, the state could not provide such a justification.

[b] Denial of Indigent's Ability to Obtain Divorce

The factual background of Boddie v. Connecticut (1971) 401 U.S. 371, 91 S. Ct. 780, 28 L. Ed. 2d 113 , is discussed in § 35A.43[3][a]. Prior to rebutting the arguments put forth by the state to support its fee and cost requirements, the Supreme Court pointed out that since access to courts was the only way to obtain a divorce, refusal to admit indigents unless they pay the required costs was equivalent to denying them an opportunity to be heard on their claimed right to dissolution of their marriages, which in the absence of sufficient countervailing justification would be a denial of due process.

Subsequently, in Ortwein v. Schwab (1973) 410 U.S. 656, 658-659, 93 S. Ct. 1172, 35 L. Ed. 2d 572 and United States v. Kras (1973) 409 U.S. 434, 443-444, 93 S. Ct. 631, 34 L. Ed. 2d 626 , the Supreme Court declined to extend the principle of Boddie to attempts by indigents to challenge administrative decisions affecting welfare benefits and to file a petition for bankruptcy, respectively, without payment of filing fees on the ground that the individual's interest in a bankruptcy discharge or increased welfare benefits is not of the same constitutional significance as the individual interest in the marital relationship. In California, however, the courts have an inherent power to waive filing fees for indigents and the California Supreme Court has ruled that whenever a motion to proceed in forma pauperis is supported by an affidavit sufficient on its face to show indigency, the court must grant the motion unless it has good reason to doubt the truthfulness of the factual allegations in the affidavit, or in unusual circumstances, order a hearing for the purpose of inquiring into the matter [Earls v. Superior Court (1971) 6 Cal. 3d 109, 114, 98 Cal. Rptr. 302, 490 P.2d 814] . Although the Court has commented that the rule assists indigents in securing their fundamental rights, the legal basis for the judicial power is common law usage [see Earls v. Superior Court (1971) 6 Cal. 3d 109, 117, 98 Cal. Rptr. 302, 490 P.2d 814 ; Ferguson v. Keays (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 649, 653, 656 fn. 6, 94 Cal. Rptr. 398, 484 P.2d 70] .

[c] Denial of Prisoners' Access to Legal Resources

In Bounds v. Smith (1977) 430 U.S. 817, 97 S. Ct. 1491, 52 L. Ed. 2d 72 , a group of prison inmates filed a law suit alleging that they were denied their rights under the Fourteenth Amendment when the state failed to provide legal research facilities. The district court held that this failure constituted a violation of the prisoners' rights both to access to the courts and to equal protection of the laws. The Supreme Court affirmed. In the course of its opinion, the Court emphasized that the constitutional right of access to the courts for prisoners has been established beyond doubt. The states must insure that such access is adequate, effective, and meaningful. Since prisoners are entitled to a reasonably adequate opportunity to present claims that their fundamental constitutional rights have been violated, the Court reasoned that states may even have to shoulder affirmative obligations to assure all prisoners meaningful access to the courts. It concluded that the fundamental constitutional right of access to the courts requires prison authorities to assist inmates in the preparation and filing of meaningful legal papers by providing prisoners with adequate law libraries or adequate assistance from persons trained in the law.

[d] Denial of Prisoner's Ability to Defend Civil Suit

The factual background of Payne v. Superior Court (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 908, 132 Cal. Rptr. 405, 553 P.2d 565 , is discussed in § 35A.43[3][a].

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question which burdens the fundamental interest of the petitioner's ability to acquire, enjoy, own, or dispose of property is not justified by a compelling governmental interest. Counsel will note that the authorities provided in this memorandum are described as dicta because, even though they both clearly described rights related to property as essential civil rights, neither authority was required to determine whether they were fundamental interests for the purpose of equal protection analysis under the two-tier test.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that the classification infringes a fundamental interest are set out in §§ 35A.34 -35A.43, 35A.45.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Right to Acquire Property as Fundamental Interest

In Shelley v. Kraemer (1947) 334 U.S. 1, 68 S. Ct. 836, 92 L. Ed. 1161 , the petitioners were individuals who had bought a house in Missouri which was subject to a restrictive agreement that no part of the property be occupied by a person not of the "Caucasian race." Other parties to the agreement, who were owners of property in the area, sued to restrain petitioners, who were black, from taking possession. The trial court denied relief, but the Missouri Supreme Court reversed. The United States Supreme Court then granted certiorari and reversed the Missouri Supreme Court on the ground that judicial action enforcing the restrictive agreements was state action for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and discriminated on the basis of color in the enjoyment of property rights. Although the Court was not required to determine whether property rights were fundamental interests for purposes of analysis under the two-tier standard, it stated that, without doubt, the rights to acquire, enjoy, own, and dispose of property were among the civil rights intended to be protected from discriminatory state action by the Fourteenth Amendment. Equality in the enjoyment of property rights was regarded by the framers of the amendment as an essential precondition to the realization of other basic civil rights and liberties which the amendment was intended to guarantee.

The factual background of Fujii v. California (1952) 38 Cal. 2d 718, 242 P.2d 617 , is discussed in § 35A.30[3][a]. In that case, the California Supreme Court held that the state's former Alien Land Law [Stats. 1921, p. 1xxxiii, as amended] violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because it discriminated on the basis of nationality in regard to the right of owning property. The Court pointed out that, unquestionably, the rights to acquire, enjoy, own, and dispose of property are among the civil rights intended to be protected from discriminatory stateaction by the Fourteenth Amendment and that the power of a state to regulate the use and ownership of land must be exercised subject to the controls and limitations of that amendment.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Right to Acquire Property as Fundamental Interest

In Mulkey v. Reitman (1966) 64 Cal. 2d 529, 50 Cal. Rptr. 881, 413 P.2d 825 , aff'd, 387 U.S. 369, 87 S. Ct. 1627, 18 L. Ed. 2d 830 (1967) , plaintiffs, a black couple, brought an action for violation of the Unruh Civil Rights Act [Civ. Code § 51] on account of discrimination in housing. The trial court granted defendants' motion for summary judgment on the ground that former Cal. Const., art. I, § 26, incorporated into the Constitution as a result of the voter's approval of Proposition 14 in 1964, nullified the application of the Act to housing discrimination by prohibiting the state from limiting the right of individuals to dispose of real property in any way they chose. Plaintiffs appealed to the California Supreme Court. The Supreme Court reversed, finding that Proposition 14 violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court held the role of the state in encouraging private discrimination was state action which denied the guarantee of equal protection because it failed to protect the individual's right to acquire, enjoy, own, and dispose of property which is essential to the realization of other basic rights and liberties which the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to guarantee.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Chilling Exercise of Constitutional Rights

The factual background of Shapiro v. Thompson (1969) 394 U.S. 618, 89 S. Ct. 1322, 22 L. Ed. 2d 600 , is discussed in § 35A.37[4][a]. In that case, the Supreme Court held that state statutes which required one year of residence as a condition precedent for receipt of state welfare funds impinged on the constitutional right to travel in violation on the equal protection clause. The Court found that the only purpose of the law was to discourage the poor from travel to a state and held that if a law has no other purpose than to chill the assertion of constitutional rights by penalizing those who choose to exercise them, then it is patently unconstitutional. The Court cited United States v. Jackson (1968) 390 U.S. 570, 581, 88 S. Ct. 1209, 20 L. Ed. 2d 138 , which applied the principle to a provision which had no other purpose or effect than to discourage assertion of the Fifth Amendment.

The factual background of In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931, 91 S. Ct. 2249, 29 L. Ed. 2d 709 (1971) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][d]. In that case, the California Supreme Court declared unconstitutional, as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, a criminal statute which placed a higher penalty on fathers who failed to pay child support while they were living outside California. The state attempted to justify the statute by arguing that it facilitated the enforcement of support obligations. The Court responded that if the purpose was to require individuals to move to or remain in California, it violated the right to travel and, quoting from Shapiro (discussed above), if a law has no other purpose than to chill the assertion of constitutional rights by penalizing those who choose to exercise them, then it is patently unconstitutional. The Court noted further that since the basic objective of the statute was not a constitutionally legitimate one, it would have no occasion to apply the compelling governmental interest test to determine whether the statute could be otherwise justified.

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question is based on a suspect category or burdens a fundamental interest and cannot be justified solely by resort to unsupported generalizations.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that a classification cannot be justified are set out in §§ 35A.45, 35A.47 -35A.49.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Unsupported Justifications as Insufficient

The factual background of Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][a]. In that case, the Supreme Court determined that a statute which limited the ability of women to work as bartenders was subject to strict scrutiny and required the state to justify it by showing a compelling state interest. The state argued first that the class of women restricted by the statute--women who were not bar owners or spouses of owners--would not be sufficiently restrained from committing "improprieties." The Court responded that this unacceptable generalization was arbitrary and unsupported by logic or experience.

Second, the state argued that women bartenders would be an unwholesome influence on the public. The Court answered that this rationale should be rejected because it was based on notions of what is a proper pursuit for a woman in this society rather than any ascertainable evil effects of permitting women to be bartenders.

[b] Established Practices as Not Insulated

In Williams v. Illinois (1970) 399 U.S. 235, 90 S. Ct. 2018, 26 L. Ed. 2d 586 , an indigent who had been convicted of petty theft and who received the maximum sentence plus a fine which, if unpaid, would be worked off at the rate of $5 per day, challenged that part of his sentence which permitted incarceration for nonpayment of the fine. The trial court denied his petition and the Illinois Supreme Court affirmed. On appeal, the United States Supreme Court vacated the judgment and remanded the case, holding that when the aggregate imprisonment exceeds the maximum period fixed by statute because of an involuntary nonpayment of a fine or court costs, imprisonment violates the equal protection clause because it is the result of an impermissible discrimination based on ability to pay. The Court admitted that the custom of imprisoning a convicted defendant for nonpayment of fines dated back to medieval England, has long been practiced in the United States, and was authorized by statute in most states. Nevertheless, the Court must be open to reassessment of ancient practices other than those explicitly mandated by the Constitution. Although such factors should be weighed, neither the antiquity of a practice nor the fact of steadfast legislative and judicial adherence to it through the centuries can insulate it from constitutional attack.

In re Antazo (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 100, 89 Cal. Rptr. 255, 473 P.2d 999 , was a habeas corpus proceeding which raised the issue of whether an invidious discrimination on the basis of wealth had occurred. In the trial court, petitioner and his codefendant were both released on probation on the condition, among others, that they pay a fine and penalty assessment or, in lieu of payment, serve time in the county jail at the rate of one day for each $10 unpaid. Petitioner's codefendant paid the fine and penalty assessment and was set free, but petitioner, who was indigent, went to jail. Before the Supreme Court, petitioner argued that his confinement violated the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution and former Cal. Const., art. I, §§ 6, 13 [now see Cal. Const., art. I, §§ 15, 17]. The Supreme Court agreed and granted the writ. In its decision, the Court observed that the practice of ordering imprisonment for nonpayment of fines was well established in Anglo-American law and had prevailed for some time in the courts of most states; but although the long-standing existence of a practice was a factor to be considered, it could not foreclose reassessment in the light of the continued evolution of fundamental precepts of the constitutional system. The court found an abiding concern for equality in all areas of today's society which did not spare established practices from exposure under the spotlight of equal protection principles.

[c] When Scrutiny Enhanced

McDonald v. Bd. of Election Com. of Chicago (1969) 394 U.S. 802, 89 S. Ct. 1404, 22 L. Ed. 2d 739 , was a challenge on equal protection groundsby a group of jail inmates awaiting trial to an Illinois statute which denied them the ability to obtain an absentee ballot because it limited absentee voting to persons absent from the county or physically incapacitated. The district court granted summary judgment to the board of election commissioners and, on direct appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed because the statutory scheme was not arbitrary. The Court did not apply strict scrutiny to the Illinois statute because the statute was not drawn on the basis of wealth or race and did not impact the prisoner's ability to exercise the fundamental right to vote, since it only affected their right to receive an absentee ballot. Nevertheless, the Court discussed thoroughly the proper rules to be applied if the inmate's assertion that the case involved a basic fundamental right had been sustained. The Court stated that classifications which might invade or restrain voting rights must be closely scrutinized and carefully confined. Moreover, a careful examination by the Court is especially warranted where lines restricting voting rights are drawn on the basis of wealth or race, two factors which would independently render a classification highly suspect and thereby demand a more exacting judicial scrutiny. One of the sources relied on by the Court for this principle was McLaughlin v. Florida (1964) 379 U.S. 184, 192, 85 S. Ct. 283, 13 L. Ed. 2d 222 , discussed below.

Counsel will note that to obtain this more careful scrutiny by showing both a suspect category and a fundamental interest, it is not necessary that the suspect category be a traditionally recognized one such as race or alienage. The Supreme Court has described these well established suspect categories as inherently suspect while recognizing that other categories may become suspect by virtue of their use in burdening a fundamental interest [see Nyquist v. Mauclet (1977) 432 U.S. 1, 8 n.9, 97 S. Ct. 2120, 53 L. Ed. 2d 63] . Wealth, for example, is treated as a suspect category when a fundamental interest is present and illegitimacy is arguably qualified for such treatment [see §§ 35A.33, 35A.34].

The factual background of McLaughlin v. Florida (1964) 379 U.S. 184, 85 S. Ct. 283, 13 L. Ed. 2d 222 , is set out in § 35A.29[3][a]. In that case, two persons were convicted for violating a Florida statute which made it an offense for a white person and a black person of opposite sexes, not married to each other, to habitually live in and occupy the same room at night. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the statute was invalid as a denial of the constitutional guarantee of equal protection. The Court pointed out that a classification based on race was "constitutionally suspect" and subject to the "most rigid scrutiny." Furthermore, the Court emphasized that since the racial classification was embodied in a criminal statute, it would be especially sensitive to the policies of the equal protection clause.

Although the Court did not specifically point it out, McLaughlin involved two protected interests because criminal statutes effect the fundamental interest of personal liberty [see People v. Olivas (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 236, 251-252, 131 Cal. Rptr. 55, 551 P.2d 375 , discussed in § 35A.20[3][e]].

The factual background of Crawford v. Board of Educ. (1976) 17 Cal. 3d 280, 130 Cal. Rptr. 724, 551 P.2d 28 , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][b]. This decision did not call for application of the strict scrutiny doctrine in the ordinary sense, but it did require the Court to determine how far school districts must go to alleviate school segregation. The Court held that the analysis of policies to avoid the racial discrimination in this instance took on "special constitutional significance" because education had been explicitly recognized for equal protection purposes as a fundamental interest.

Counsel will note that other combinations of suspect categories and fundamental interests may receive this specially significant scrutiny, even though the suspect category in question is not a traditional one like race or alienage. Thus, the California Supreme Court had recognized that it may treat wealth as a suspect category without raising it to a level of "suspectedness" equivalent to race when wealth was used to affect the fundamental interest of education [see Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal. 3d 728, 766 n.45, 135 Cal. Rptr. 345, 557 P.2d 929 , cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907, 97 S. Ct. 2951, 53 L. Ed. 2d 1079 (1977) , set out in § 35A.20[3][c]; see also Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 21, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 (treating sexual classification as suspect is particularly proper when classification infringes fundamental interest), set out in §§ 35A.20[3][a] and 35A.32[3][a]].

[a] Unsupported Justifications as Insufficient

The factual background of Westbrook v. Mihaly (1970) 2 Cal. 3d 765, 87 Cal. Rptr. 839, 471 P.2d 487 , vacated, 403 U.S. 915, 91 S. Ct. 2224, 29 L. Ed. 2d 692 (1971) , is discussed in § 35A.35[4][b]. In that case, the respondents in an action for writ of mandamus attempted to justify a requirement to two-thirds voter approval in a local bond election by arguing that it served as a protective device to prevent bonded indebtedness from reaching levels that would necessitate either foreclosure or repudiation. The Supreme Court rejected this argument as unsupported. The Court cited several studies which showed that the special voting requirement did not create fiscal responsibility and could indeed encourage more costly alternative financing measures. It also pointed out that respondents failed to provide data indicating more frequent bond defaults, lower credit ratings, or extravagant public projects in states which do not follow the two-thirds vote rule.

[a] Mere Recitation of Proper State Purpose as Insufficient

The factual background of Trimble v. Gordon (1977) 430 U.S. 762, 97 S. Ct. 1459, 52 L. Ed. 2d 31 , is discussed in § 35A.33[3][a]. In that case, the Court was confronted with a contention that a state statute which permitted legitimate children to inherit by intestate succession from either parent but allowed illegitimate children to inherit only from their mothers could be justified as an attempt to promote legitimate family relationships. The Court rejected this contention because not only did the law penalize innocent children for their parents' failure, contrary to the principle that legal burdens should bear some relationship to individual responsibility or wrongdoing, but the mere incantation of a proper state purpose is insufficient under the equal protection clause.

The factual background of Arp v. Workers' Compensation Appeals Bd. (1977) 19 Cal. 3d 395, 138 Cal. Rptr. 293, 563 P.2d 849 , is discussed in § 35A.32[3][b]. In that case, the state attempted to justify a statute which created a conclusive presumption for the purposes of collecting death benefits that widows were wholly dependent on their deceased spouses but did not extend the same presumption in favor of widowers because it was designed to mitigate the continuing consequences of past economic abuse against women. The Supreme Court responded that it would not accept, without historical inquiry, the mere recitation of a benign, compensatory purpose; instead, it would examine the legislation to determine if, in fact, it was based on a different purpose.

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question is based on a suspect category or burdens a fundamental interest and cannot be justified solely because it creates administrative cost savings for the government.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Administrative Cost Saving as Insufficient

The factual background of Memorial Hosp. v. Maricopa County (1974) 415 U.S. 250, 94 S. Ct. 1076, 39 L. Ed. 2d 306 , is discussed in § 35A.37[3][a]. In that case, the Court rejected several attempts by county authorities to justify a durational residence requirement for county-provided medical services. First, the Court flatly rejected the county's claim that the requirement was necessary to insure the fiscal integrity of its free medical care program by discouraging an influx of indigents. The Court held that a state may not protect the fiscal integrity of a program by drawing an invidious distinction between classes of its citizens. Second, the Court indicated that it would be extremely unlikely to uphold justifications based on other forms of administrative benefit. It rejected the residence requirement as too drastic a means for determining bona fide residence, ill-suited as a means of preventing fraud, and irrelevant for purposes of budget planning.

In Castro v. California (1970) 2 Cal. 3d 223, 85 Cal. Rptr. 20, 466 P.2d 244 , petitioners challenged the constitutionality of former Cal. Const., art. II, § 1 [now see Cal. Const., art. II, § 1], which conditioned the right to vote on the ability to read the English language in an action for declaratory and mandatory relief against the secretary of state and a registrar of voters. The trial court rejected petitioners' argument that individuals who were literate only in Spanish would be able adequately to identify and familiarize themselves with political candidates and issues and rendered judgment for defendants. Petitioners appealed to the Supreme Court which reversed. The Court analyzed the history of equal protection challenges to voting statutes and concluded that the issue was whether the state's restriction of the right to vote to those literate in English was necessary to achievea compelling state interest. One potentially justifying source of state interest was the state's desire to avoid the cost and administrative complexity entailed in providing a bilingual electoral system. The Court avoided concluding that extension of the right to vote to those literate in any language would require such a system; but it emphasized that avoidance or recoupment of administrative costs, while a valid state concern, cannot justify imposition of an otherwise improper classification, especially one which touches on matters close to the core of the constitutional system. It is clear, the Court concluded, that the goal of efficient and inexpensive administration, while praiseworthy, cannot justify depriving citizens of fundamental rights.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Administrative Cost Saving as Insufficient

In Frontiero v. Richardson (1973) 411 U.S. 677, 93 S. Ct. 1764, 36 L. Ed. 2d 583 , several federal statutes were attacked on equal protection grounds because they permitted a military serviceman to claim his wife as a dependent, entitled to certain government benefits, without regard to whether she was in fact financially dependent on him, but refused comparable benefits to spouses of servicewomen unless they could show they were in fact dependent on their wives for over one half of their support. The Court held that the statutes violated the equal protection requirement imposed on the federal government by the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. One of the arguments the government employed to justify the classification was administrative convenience. The government contended that as an empirical matter wives frequently are dependent on their husbands while husbands are rarely dependent on their wives. Thus, Congress could have reasonably concluded that it would be both cheaper and easier simply to create a conclusive presumption of dependency in favor of wives. On this point, four justices writing for the Court found little merit in this argument, stating that although efficacious administration of governmental programs is not without importance, the constitution recognizes higher values than speed and efficiency. Certainly, where strict judicial scrutiny is concerned, the recitation of administrative convenience cannot dictate constitutionality.

The factual background of In re King (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 226, 90 Cal. Rptr. 15, 474 P.2d 983 , cert. denied, 403 U.S. 931, 91 S. Ct. 2249, 29 L. Ed. 2d 709 (1971) , is discussed in § 35A.20[3][d]. In that case, the petitioner in a habeas corpus proceeding successfully challenged on equal protection grounds a criminal statute which more heavily penalized fathers who failed to provide child support if they left California during the period of violation than if they stayed within the state. One of the arguments the state made in its attempt to justify the law was that it facilitated the administration of support obligations since it encouraged obligors to live in California. The Supreme Court apparently did not consider the argument important enough to warrant more than a footnote where it dealt with the claim succinctly. The Court commented that a generalized fiscal purpose like administrative benefit or protecting the public treasury cannot justify an invidious distinction between classes of citizens.

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate to challenge the constitutionality of state action on equal protection grounds when the basis of the challenge is that the state action in question burdens a suspect category or is based on a fundamental interest and is not necessary to support a compelling state interest because it is not narrowly drawn to support only that interest and fails to provide the least burdensome alternative.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

Related memoranda of points and authorities for use in supporting a petition for writ of mandate on the ground that a classification cannot be justified are set out in §§ 35A.45 -35A.48

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Effect of Unnecessary Classifications

In Dunn v. Blumstein (1972) 405 U.S. 330, 92 S. Ct. 995, 31 L. Ed. 2d 274 , a state resident challenged a state statute which excluded him from voting in state elections because of durational residence requirements on equal protection grounds. A federal district court declared that the requirements were unconstitutional and on direct appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The Court held that the requirements violated the equal protection clause because they were unnecessary to promote a compelling interest. In the course of its opinion, the Court elaborated on the equal protection test. It stated that laws subject to the strict equal protection text are unconstitutional unless the state can demonstrate that such laws are necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest (emphasis added by the Court). It is not sufficient for state action to further a very substantial state interest. Statutes affecting constitutional rights must be drawn with precision and must be tailored to serve their legitimate objectives. And if there are other reasonable ways to achieve those goals with a lesser burden on constitutionally protected activity, a state may not choose the way of greater interference. If it acts at all, it must choose less drastic means.

[b] Lack of Substantial Relationship

The factual background of Carey v. Population Serv. Int'l (1977) 431 U.S. 678, 97 S. Ct. 2010, 52 L. Ed. 2d 675 , is discussed in § 35A.41[3][b]. In that case, the Court held that a New York statute which regulated the sale of contraceptives constituted an unjustified invasion of the constitutional right of privacy since the state failed to establish that the law served compelling state interests and was narrowly drawn to express only those interests. Two of the goals suggested by the state were rejeted by the Court because they were not compelling. The analysis suggests that while the interests themselves may have been significant, they did not serve to justify this particular statute because the statute, in the Court's opinion, was neither substantially related to such interests nor was it designed to serve them. For example, the statute limited certain contraceptive sales to pharmacists and the state sought to show that this limitation was justified by the state's interest in preventing people from tampering with the contraceptives prior to sale. The Court pointed out that while other restrictions may well be reasonably related to the objective of quality control, there was no explanation of why pharmacists were better able than others to prevent tampering.

[c] Lack of Precision and Tailoring

In Kramer v. Union Free School Dist. (1969) 395 U.S. 621, 89 S. Ct. 1886, 23 L. Ed. 2d 583 , a bachelor challenged the constitutionality of one section of the New York Education Law which disqualified him from voting in a school district election because he did not either own property or parent children enrolled in a local public school. The federal district court dismissed his complaint, but on appeal the court of appeals remanded onthe basis that a three-judge district court be convened. The three-judge panel then dismissed the complaint, but on direct appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The Court held that the law violated the equal protection clause because it permitted inclusion of many persons having only a remote and indirect interest in school affairs while excluding others having a distinct and direct interest. The Court stated that the issue was whether the exclusion of certain voters was necessary to promote a compelling state interest. It found after examination of the classification that it did not accomplish the purposes put forth by the district with sufficient precision to justify denying the franchise to plaintiff. Whether a classification which limits a particular benefit to some individuals denies equal protection to those excluded depends, inter alia, on whether all those excluded are in fact substantially less interested or affected than those who are included. The classification must be tailored so that the exclusion is necessary to achieve the state's goals, In fact, the classification challenged was overinclusive because it permitted inclusion of many persons who had, at best, a remote and indirect interest in school affairs, and on the other hand, underinclusive because it excluded others who have a distinct and direct interest in school decisions. The Court also noted that since it found that the classification was not necessary to promote the articulated state interest, it was not required to determine whether that interest was a compelling one.

Counsel will note that in Dunn v. Blumstein, discussed in § 35A.49[3][a], the Court employed the same analysis to conclude that Tennessee's durational residence requirement for voting was not necessary to promote the state's goal of having knowledgeable voters. The requirement was insufficiently tailored to achieve this goal because it crudely excluded large numbers of fully qualified voters who could not meet the requirement while providing no assurance that those who had lived in Tennessee longer had an adequate knowledge of the issues.

[d] Availability of Less Drastic Means

The factual background of Dunn v. Blumstein (1972) 405 U.S. 330, 92 S. Ct. 995, 31 L. Ed. 2d 274 , is discussed in § 35A.29[3][a]. In that case, the Court held that Tennessee's durational residence requirement for voting was not necessary to promote the state's goal of preventing voter fraud. There were other means, particularly involving reliance on the state's system of voter registration, which were less restrictive, less burdensome, and far less drastic in their impact on constitutionally protected interests.

The factual background of In re Antazo (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 100, 89 Cal. Rptr. 255, 473 P.2d 999 , is discussed in § 35A.46[3][b]. In that case, petitioner successfully challenged the constitutionality on equal protection grounds of statutes which permitted his incarceration for failure to pay a fine imposed in a criminal case at the rate of one day for each $10 unpaid. In its analysis, the Court asked whether the practice of incarceration in this instance was necessary to promote the state's interest in collection of fines. It concluded that the practice was not necessary in the constitutional sense because there existed alternative and less obtrusive means by which the state could further its interest. Similarly, incarceration for failure to pay fines was not necessary to further the state's interest in rehabilitation and reformation. The suggested alternatives to incarceration for failure to pay fines can simultaneously promote the state's interest in rehabilitating the offenders and by requiring the offender's compliance with onerous conditions, create awareness that one is responsible for criminal conduct, and encourage offenders to become law abiding.

A variation on the rule stated in Antazo may be found in Sail'er Inn, Inc. v. Kirby (1971) 5 Cal. 3d 1, 20-21, 95 Cal. Rptr. 329, 485 P.2d 529 , set out in § 35A.20[3][c], where the Court determined that the state's interest in preventing improprieties in the sale of alcoholic beverages was not justified by a law preventing most women from becoming bartenders. The Court held that where the evil which the Legislature seeks to prevent can be directly prevented through legislation which is nondiscriminatory, and where the class singled out by the Legislature has no necessary connection with the evil to be prevented, the statute must be struck down as an invidious discrimination against the class.

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Effect of Unnecessary Classification

The factual background of Ramirez v. Brown (1973) 9 Cal. 3d 199, 107 Cal. Rptr. 137, 507 P.2d 1345 , rev'd, 418 U.S. 24, 94 S. Ct. 2655, 41 L. Ed. 2d 551 (1974) , is discussed in § 35A.35[4][b]. In that case, the Supreme Court strongly reaffirmed the importance of limiting state action to that which is least intrusive. In dealing with the fundamental right to vote, it said that where there is a restriction on such a fundamental interest, the restriction is constitutionally permissible only if it is necessary to promote that interest. To be necessary, it must constitute, among other things, the "least burdensome" alternative possible. The Court cited several cases where both it and the United States Supreme Court had invalidated classifications which were not necessary to promote a governmental interest. The Court found the cases as a group to represent applications of both the United States and the California Constitutions to classifications which infringe fundamental interests or use suspect categories. They document the several ways in which a classification may fail to provide the least burdensome alternative possible. In its analysis the Court found as examples that the classification may be (1) overinclusive (permit inclusion of persons who should not be affected); (2) underinclusive (exclude others who should be restricted); (3) replaced by more reasonable alternatives;(4) neither drawn with precision nor tailored to serve the legitimate objectives; or (5) an indirect way of reaching a result which can be obtained directly.

CHAPTER 36 CIVIL SERVICE
PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-36 California Points & Authorities § 36.01

§ 36.01 Scope of Chapter

This chapter contains memoranda for use in supporting petitions for writs of mandate for review of final administrative adjudicatory orders or decisions of state or local civil service commissions disciplining a civil service employee [see §§ 36.20 -36.43], including a memorandum for use in urging a court to use an independent judgment test in reviewing a local agency decision [see § 36.44], and a memorandum supporting review by traditional writ of mandate of an agency's disciplinary decision when that decision is not based on an evidentiary hearing and constitutes an abuse of discretion [see § 36.45]. It also contains a memorandum for use in compelling a civil service commission to adopt an ordinance or regulation providing for payment of the prevailing wage [see § 36.46], to permit an applicant to take an examination [see §§ 36.48, 36.49], to certify a petitioner to appointment to an available civil service position [see § 36.50], to fill a vacant position through promotion of a civil service employee [see § 36.51], and to accept withdrawal of an employee's resignation before its effective date [see § 36.52].

This chapter also provides memoranda of a memorandum for use on behalf of a public employer to establish the employer's right to require an employee to use accrued compensatory time [see § 36.47] and to oppose employee petitions seeking to set aside or review disciplinary actions [see §§ 36.22 -36.26, 36.53-36.60].

CHAPTER 36 CIVIL SERVICE
PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-36 California Points & Authorities § 36.02

§ 36.02 Governing Law

The civil service system of California is authorized by Cal. Const., art. VII, § 1, and implemented by the State Civil Service Act, Gov. Code § 18500 et seq. Other provisions governing state officers and employees are found in Gov. Code § 19815 et seq. (personnel administration). State civil service regulations are contained in 2 Cal. Code Reg. § 1 et seq. County civil service systems are authorized by Cal. Const., art. XI, §§ 1, 3, 4, and by the County Civil Service Enabling Law, Gov. Code § 31100 et seq. City civil service is authorized by Cal. Const., art. XI, §§ 2, 3, 5, and by the City Civil Service Enabling Law, Gov. Code § 45000 et seq. Local civil service regulations are contained in local charters and ordinances.

The Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA) [see 29 U.S.C. §§ 201-219], as limited by the Portal-to-Portal Act [see 29 U.S.C. §§ 251-262], is the primary federal statute governing wages and hours of employment. For an overview of the FLSA, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 250, Employment Law: Wage and Hour Disputes (Matthew Bender). For a detailed discussion of the coverage of the FLSA, see Wilcox, California Employment Law, Ch. 1 (Matthew Bender).

PART I. INTRODUCTION

3-36 California Points & Authorities § 36.03

§ 36.03 How to Use Forms in This Chapter

[1] Page Limits on Memoranda

Among the more significant drafting requirements to keep in mind are page limits: supporting and opposing memoranda filed in discovery motion proceedings may not exceed 15 pages. A reply or closing memorandum may not exceed 10 pages. Exhibits, declarations, attachments, the table of contents, the table of authorities, and the proof of service are excluded from these page limits. Any party must obtain leave of court to file a longer memorandum [see Cal. Rules of Ct., Rule 3.1113(d), (e)]. These and other drafting requirements are discussed in further detail in Ch. 1, Writing Legal Memoranda and Briefs .

[2] Using the Forms to Build a Draft Memorandum

Counsel should use the memoranda in this chapter with caution and knowledge that many of the supporting authorities are cases which, in fact, uphold a civil service commission's disciplining of an employee. The cases are useful in that the courts have discussed the general rules governing such actions, but in applying those rules, the courts have often decided in favor of the commission.

A MANDATE PROCEEDING IS THE PROPER MEANS BY WHICH TO JUDICIALLY REVIEW THE ADMINISTRATIVE DISCIPLINE OF A CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEE WHEN THE PROCEDURE REQUIRED TO BE FOLLOWED WITH REGARD TO THE IMPOSITION OF DISCIPLINE WAS NOT STRICTLY COMPLIED WITH.

A. Decisions Reviewable in Mandate Proceeding. A final administrative order or decision is reviewable in a mandate proceeding if it was the result of an administrative proceeding in which by law a hearing was required for the purpose of taking evidence on the basis of which the agency had discretion to determine relevant facts (Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5(a)) or (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1094.5(a), 1094.6(a)).

B. Mandate to Review Discipline of Employee. A final administrative adjudicatory order or decision disciplining a civil service employee is reviewable in a mandate proceeding (Topanga Ass'n for a Scenic Community v. Los Angeles County (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 506, 514, 113 Cal. Rptr. 836, 522 P.2d 12 ; Boren v. State Personnel Bd. (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 634, 637, 234 P.2d 981 ; La Prade v. Department of Water & Power (1945) 27 Cal. 2d 47, 53, 162 P.2d 13).

C. Form and Content of Pleadings. When an application is made for issuance of a writ of mandate to review the validity of a final administrative order or decision upholding the discharge of a civil service employee, the pleading of petitioner need only state facts entitling him or her to some kind of relief, that is, facts stating a cause of action for mandate or certiorari (Boren v. State Personnel Bd. (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 634, 637, 234 P.2d 981).

D. Inquiry in Mandate Proceeding. The inquiry in a mandate proceeding to review a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision extends to the questions of whether the agency has proceeded without, or in excess of, jurisdiction; whether there was a fair trial; and whether there was any prejudicial abuse of discretion established by the agency not proceeding in the manner required by law, the order or decision not being supported by the findings, or the findings not being supported by the evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5(b)).

E. Strict Compliance With Discipline Procedure. Any charter provision, statute, or regulation setting out the procedure to be followed with regard to disciplining a civil service employee must be strictly complied with in order for the discipline to be effective (Shannon v. Los Angeles (1928) 205 Cal. 366, 370-371, 270 P. 682 ; Zeron v. City of Los Angeles (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 639, 643, 79 Cal. Rptr. 2d 130 ; Frates v. Burnett (1970) 9 Cal. App. 3d 63, 71, 87 Cal. Rptr. 731).

[Optional] F. Requirements of Ralph M. Brown Act. The Ralph M. Brown Act, California's open meeting law (Gov. Code § 54950 et seq.), prescribes agenda and notice requirements for a local agency to conduct a meeting at which it considers complaints against, and imposes discipline on, a public employee (see Gov. Code §§ 54945.2, 54956, 54957). In particular, an agency's failure to provide an employee advance notice that it will consider complaints or charges against the employee renders any discipline imposed on the employee null and void (Gov. Code § 54957(b); Moreno v. City of King (2005) 127 Cal. App. 4th 17, 24-29, 25 Cal. Rptr. 3d 29).

[EITHER]

[Optional] G. Reinstatement of Employee. Reinstatement of an employee in his or her former position, with payment of back salary, is the proper procedure following a finding that the employee was dismissed without (1) a required prior hearing, (2) a subsequent hearing at which dismissal was upheld on good grounds, or (3) following a hearing in which the civil service board or commission reached an incorrect decision as a matter of law (Kirkpatrick v. Civil Serv. Comm'n (1978) 77 Cal. App. 3d 940, 945, 144 Cal. Rptr. 51 ; Frates v. Burnett (1970) 9 Cal. App. 3d 63, 72, 87 Cal. Rptr. 731 ; Peters v. Mitchell (1963) 222 Cal. App. 2d 852, 862, 35 Cal. Rptr. 535 ; see Gov. Code § 19143).

[OR]

[Optional] G. Payment of Back Salary. A civil service employee denied pretermination due process is entitled to payment of back salary for the period between termination and institution of due process safeguards (Chang v. Palos Verdes Estates (1979) 98 Cal. App. 3d 557, 564, 159 Cal. Rptr. 630 ; West v. Berkeley (1979) 96 Cal. App. 3d 143, 147-148, 157 Cal. Rptr. 764).

H. Action Remanded to Civil Service Board or Commission. If a hearing has been denied a civil service employee or the evidence is insufficient to sustain the action of the civil service board of commission, but it is still possible for the board or commission to hold a hearing or exercise its discretion, then the matter should be remanded to the board or commission for further consideration (Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 219-220, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 ; La Prade v. Department of Water & Power (1945) 27 Cal. 2d 47, 53, 162 P.2d 13).

I. Punitive Action Generally May Not Be Taken Against Peace Officer More Than One Year After Discovery of Misconduct. Under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3300 et seq.), any punitive action or denial of a promotion on grounds other than merit generally may not be taken for any act, omission, or other allegation of misconduct if the investigation of the allegation is not completed within one year of the public agency's discovery (by a person authorized to initiate an investigation) of the allegation of the act, omission, or other misconduct (Gov. Code § 3304(d)).

This form may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee when the procedure required by law to be followed was not strictly complied with.

Counsel should choose appropriate citations from the alternatives available, depending on whether the State Personnel Board or a local civil service commission is involved. For the form to be complete, counsel should also include a discussion of the administrative regulations involved in reviewing the employee's discipline.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Decisions Reviewable in Mandate Proceeding

Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5(a) provides that when the writ of mandate is issued for the purpose of inquiring into the validity of any final administrative order or decision made as the result of a proceeding in which by law a hearing is required to be given, evidence is required to be taken, and discretion in the determination of facts is vested in the inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or officer, the case shall be heard by the court sitting without a jury. The California Constitution provides that the State Personnel Board "shall ... review disciplinary actions" against state civil service employees [Cal. Const., art. VII, § 3(a)]. Judicial review by administrative mandate, therefore, would ordinarily occur after the State Personnel Board issues its final decision [see Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5(a)]. Former statutory provisions authorizing administrative review by any entity other than the Board (such as a "board of adjustment" created as part of a grievance procedure specified in a memorandum of understanding for a state-employee bargaining unit) were declared unconstitutional [State Personnel Bd. v. Dep't of Personnel Admin. (2005) 37 Cal. 4th 512, 522-527, 36 Cal. Rptr. 3d 142, 149-153, 123 P.3d 169 (holding former Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5(k), former Gov. Code §§ 19175(f), (g), 18670(c)-(e) unconstitutional)].

Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6(a) provides that a writ of mandate may be issued in review of any decision of a local agency, other than a school district, or of any commission, board, officer, or agent thereof. A petition for writ of mandate to review the decision of a local agency must comply with the time limits set forth in Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6 [Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6(a)]. A "decision" of a local agency for purposes of Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6 means a decision subject to review under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5 that (1) suspends, demotes, or dismisses an officer or employee; (2) revokes or denies an application for a permit, license, or other entitlement; (3) imposes a civil or administrative penalty, fine, charge, or cost; or (4) denies an application for any retirement benefit or allowance [Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6(e)].

A petition for administrative mandate must be filed no later than 90 days after the decision becomes final [Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6(b) (§ 36.20[3][a])]. The decision becomes final when it is announced, if no applicable statute, charter, or rule provides for the possibility of reconsideration or requires a written decision or written findings. If there is a possibility of reconsideration, the decision becomes final when the time for reconsideration expires or when a request for reconsideration is denied. If there is a provision for a written decision or written findings, the decision becomes final when it is mailed to the party seeking the writ [Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6(b); see Donnellan v. City of Novato (2001) 86 Cal. App. 4th 1097, 1102-1107, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 882 (employee's 90-day period to petition for writ of mandate will not begin to run until agency mails its decision to employee, together with copy of affidavit or certificate of mailing; omission of affidavit or certificate of mailing means 90-day period will not begin to run); Herman v. Los Angeles County Metro. Transp. Auth. (1999) 71 Cal. App. 4th 819, 824-830, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 144 (written decision must be mailed to employee; mailing decision to employee's attorney will not trigger running of time to file petition for writ of mandate)]. If the petition for administrative mandate is filed in federal court along with a federal civil rights claim and ultimately is dismissed without prejudice, the 90-day period to seek administrative mandate in state court under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.6(b) is tolled pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1367(d) during the pendency of the federal proceedings and for 30 days after dismissal of those proceedings [Guevara v. Ventura County Cmty. Coll. Dist. (2008) 169 Cal. App. 4th 167, 170-173, 87 Cal. Rptr. 3d 50] .

In cases in which administrative mandate is not available to review the disciplinary decision because a hearing was not required by law [see, e.g., Gov. Code § 19576 (suspension of state civil service employee for five days or less)], ordinary mandate may be available under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085(a) if the agency's decision constituted an abuse of discretion [see Coelho v. State Personnel Bd. (1989) 209 Cal. App. 3d 968, 971, 257 Cal. Rptr. 557]. For points and authorities supporting a petition for writ of mandate in such cases, see § 36.44.5.

[b] Mandate to Review Discipline of Employee

Topanga Ass'n for a Scenic Community v. Los Angeles County (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 506, 113 Cal. Rptr. 836, 522 P.2d 12 , was an appeal from a judgment of a trial court denying a writ of mandate in a proceeding for review of an administrative decision. Despite petitioner's protest, the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors upheld the planning commission's grant of a variance on certain acreage, and petitioner then sought relief by means of administrative mandate. The Supreme Court reversed the lower court judgment and remanded the cause to the superior court with directions to issue a writ of mandate requiring the Los Angeles Board of Supervisors to vacate its order awarding a variance. The Supreme Court discussed the propriety of using administrative mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5, noting that the California Judicial Council desired that the section apply to all agencies, regardless of whether they are subject to the Administrative Procedure Act and regardless of their state or local character, and that in the absence of compelling language to the contrary, a statute will be assumed to have been adopted with the intent and meaning expressed by the council in its report (11 Cal. 3d 506, 514 n. 12, 113 Cal. Rptr. 836, 522 P.2d 12). The Court then ruled that under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5 the reviewing court must determine whether substantial evidence supports the agency's findings and whether the findings support the agency's decision (11 Cal. 3d 506, 514-515, 113 Cal. Rptr. 836, 522 P.2d 12). The Court then held that the planning commission's summary of factual data did not include facts sufficient to satisfy the requirements governing the granting of a variance (11 Cal. 3d 506, 520, 113 Cal. Rptr. 836, 522 P.2d 12).

Boren v. State Personnel Bd. (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 634, 234 P.2d 981 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the trial court in a proceeding for review of an order of the State Personnel Board upholding the dismissal of the employee. The superior court had sustained a demurrer to the complaint (which the trial court and Supreme Court treated as a petition for mandate and certiorari) and had dismissed the suit. The Supreme Court, hearing the appeal, affirmed the superior court judgment. After pointing out that mandate and certiorari were available to review a decision of the State Personnel Board, the Supreme Court ruled that plaintiff had not stated any facts establishing a lack or excess of jurisdiction, a denial of a fair trial, or an abuse of discretion, and that a cause of action for mandate or certiorari had therefore not been stated (37 Cal. 2d 634, 637, 644, 234 P.2d 981).

La Prade v. Department of Water & Power (1945) 27 Cal. 2d 47, 162 P.2d 13 , was an appeal by the Board of Civil Service Commissioners from a judgment of the trial court in a mandate proceeding brought by a discharged civil service employee to compel his reinstatement. The trial court had issued the writ of mandate directing the reinstatement of the employee. The Supreme Court, hearing the appeal, acknowledged that the employee had been denied a hearing, but it modified the judgment by remanding the matter to the Board of Civil Service Commissioners since it was still possible for the board to hold a hearing and exercise its discretion (27 Cal. 2d 47, 53, 162 P.2d 13).

[c] Form and Content of Pleadings

The factual background of Boren v. State Personnel Bd. (1951) 37 Cal. 2d 634, 234 P.2d 981 , is discussed in § 36.20[3][b]. Although the Supreme Court sustained the demurrer to the complaint because it failed to allege any facts that would justify granting relief, the Court stated that it was unimportant that plaintiff's pleading was not in the form of a petition for mandate or certiorari, since all that was required was that plaintiff state facts entitling him to some type of relief, and that if a cause of action for mandate or certiorari had been stated, a general demurrer would have been overruled (37 Cal. 2d. 634, 638, 234 P.2d 981).

[d] Strict Compliance With Discipline Procedure

Shannon v. Los Angeles (1928) 205 Cal. 366, 270 P. 682 , was an appeal by a discharged civil service employee from a judgment of the trial court in a mandate proceeding brought by the employee to compel his reinstatement and payment of back pay. The superior court had sustained a general demurrer to the mandate petition on the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for, and it directed judgment to be given, made, and entered in the respondents' favor. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the employee had not been properly served with notice of discharge and was, therefore, not lawfully discharged (205 Cal. 366, 370-371, 270 P. 682). The Court acknowledged an employee's right to invoke a writ of mandate to compel his or her reinstatement to a position until such time as the law relating to the procedure for his or her removal has been strictly obeyed, and the Court directed the trial court to set aside its order sustaining the demurrer and to overrule the demurrer with leave to answer (205 Cal. 366, 372-373, 270 P. 682).

In Zeron v. City of Los Angeles (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 639, 79 Cal. Rptr. 2d 130 , a city police officer who had been discharged without a full hearing petitioned for a writ of mandate to compel his reinstatement. The trial court denied the petition on the ground that the officer was a probationary employee who could be terminated without a full hearing. The court of appeal reversed, however, finding that the city had failed to comply with a city charter provision that automatically granted the officer tenure unless a termination notice was delivered to the civil service commission prior to the expiration of the officer's probationary period. The city had sent a termination notice to the officer, but not to the civil service commission, as required by the charter provision. The court of appeal held that the city's failure to strictly comply with the termination procedure resulted in the officer becoming a permanent employee. Accordingly, the subsequent termination of the officer without a full hearing was improper (67 Cal. App. 4th 639, 643-646, 79 Cal. Rptr. 2d 130).

Frates v. Burnett (1970) 9 Cal. App. 3d 63, 87 Cal. Rptr. 731 , was an appeal by a board of education from a judgment of the trial court in a mandate proceeding brought by an employee of the board to review his dismissal. The trial court had found that the employee was improperly discharged and had issued a peremptory writ of mandate commanding that petitioner be restored to his former position. The court of appeal stated that failure to strictly follow civil service procedures would result in an invalid discharge, and it held that in light of the unlawful discharge of petitioner resulting from failure to provide him with a pretermination hearing, the judgment granting the writ would be affirmed and petitioner would be reinstated to his former position (9 Cal. App. 3d 63, 71-73, 87 Cal. Rptr. 731).

[e] Requirements of Ralph M. Brown Act

In Moreno v. City of King (2005) 127 Cal. App. 4th 17, 25 Cal. Rptr. 3d 29 , the plaintiff sought a writ of mandate after the termination of his employment as finance director for the defendant city. The plaintiff claimed his termination was null and void because the city council had not complied with the requirements of the Ralph M. Brown Act, California's open meeting law (Gov. Code § 54950 et seq.). The trial court granted the writ, and the court of appeal affirmed, finding that the city council had indeed violated the Brown Act (127 Cal. App. 4th 17, 24-29).

The court of appeal first held that the city had violated the applicable agenda requirements. The Brown Act provides that the presiding officer of a local legislative body (such as the city council in this case), or a majority of the members of the body, may call a special meeting by delivering a written notice to each member of the body and to each local newspaper of general circulation and radio or television station requesting notice in writing. The notice must be received at least 24 hours before the time of the meeting, and the notice must "specify the time and place of the special meeting and the business to be transacted or discussed." No other business may be considered at the meeting (Gov. Code § 54956). The court of appeal in this case held that the provision requiring that the notice of a special meeting "specify ... the business to be transacted" imposed substantially the same requirement as the provision governing the posting of an agenda for a regular meeting of a local legislative body. That provision requires that the posted agenda "contain a brief general description of each item of business to be transacted or discussed at the meeting, including items to be discussed in closed session" (Gov. Code § 54954.2(a)). The court of appeal went on to hold that the special meeting notice in this case, which simply stated that the business for the meeting included "Public Employee (employment contract)," was not sufficient to constitute the requisite specification of the business to be conducted, because it gave no clue that the termination of the plaintiff or of any public employee would be considered at the meeting (127 Cal. App. 4th 17, 26-27).

The court of appeal also found that the city council had failed to comply with the Brown Act's requirement that, before the local body holds a closed session on "specific complaints or charges" brought against a public employee, the employee must be given at least 24 hours' written notice of his or her right to have the complaint or charge heard in an open session rather than a closed session. If this notice is not given, any disciplinary or other action taken by the local body against the employee based on the specific complaint or charge in the closed session is null and void (Gov. Code § 54957(b)). The plaintiff in this case was given no advance notice of the meeting at which he was terminated. Therefore, whether the plaintiff's termination violated the notice requirement depended on whether the city council considered "specific complaints or charges" against him, or whether the council simply considered the plaintiff's performance evaluation, a matter that does not trigger a duty to provide advance notice to the employee. The court of appeal concluded that the council had indeed considered "complaints or charges" against the plaintiff, because at the meeting the council reviewed a written report from the city manager that contained the details of five specific accusations of alleged misconduct by the plaintiff. Pointing out that the lack of advance notice had deprived the plaintiff of an opportunity to respond to the accusations, the court of appeal held that the council's action in terminating the plaintiff's employment was null and void under the express provisions of the Brown Act (127 Cal. App. 4th 17, 27-29).

[f] Reinstatement of Employee

Kirkpatrick v. Civil Serv. Comm'n (1978) 77 Cal. App. 3d 940, 144 Cal. Rptr. 51 , was an appeal from a judgment of the trial court granting a writ of mandate and ordering defendant commission to reverse its order sustaining plaintiff's discharge and to reinstate him in his position. Plaintiff, chief probation officer, had been discharged for failure to effectively manage his department. The trial court held that plaintiff had been denied due process, and it therefore ordered his reinstatement. The court of appeal ruled that the procedural errors relied on by the trial court did not justify the order reinstating petitioner in his position, and it therefore reversed the lower court judgment and remanded the cause for examination of the evidence supporting the commission's discharge of plaintiff. The court held that an employee is not entitled to reinstatement if, although denied the preremoval safeguards outlined in Skelly v. State Personnel Bd., he had an opportunity to exercise his due process rights at a subsequent hearing which showed that there were good grounds for dismissal [see Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 , discussed in § 36.20[3][h]]. Under such circumstances, the employee is entitled only to damages for the limited time period in which the discipline was wrongfully imposed, that is, the period from the time discipline was actually imposed to the date the commission filed its decision validating the dismissal (77 Cal. App. 3d 940, 945).

Frates v. Burnett (1970) 9 Cal. App. 3d 63, 87 Cal. Rptr. 731 , is discussed in § 36.20[3][d].

Peters v. Mitchell (1963) 222 Cal. App. 2d 852, 35 Cal. Rptr. 535 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the trial court. The State Personnel Board had upheld the discharge of the employee from her position as a psychiatric technician in a state hospital because of her restraint of several patients. The superior court denied the employee's petition for a writ of mandate and affirmed the action of the board. The court of appeal held that the employee was not guilty of willful disobedience nor inexcusable neglect of duty when the restraint she instituted did not violate a specific command or prohibition of her employer and was not done intentionally, designedly, or without lawful excuse. Based on the fact that the employee restrained the patients under the supervision and direct examination of her superiors, the court of appeal reversed the judgment of the trial court. Based on the fact that the State Personnel Board had reached an incorrect decision as a matter of law, the court instructed the trial court to issue a writ of mandate directing the State Personnel Board to annul the employee's dismissal and to reinstate her to her position with payment of such back salary as was authorized by law (222 Cal. App. 2d 852, 862-863).

Gov. Code § 19143 provides that at the termination of any temporary separation, except termination of a permanent or probationary employee by layoff and termination by displacement (as defined in State Personnel Board regulations), the employee must be reinstated to his or her former position, as defined in Gov. Code § 18522, unless some other reinstatement right is specified in the Civil Service Act or State Personnel Board regulation.

[g] Payment of Back Salary

Chang v. Palos Verdes Estates (1979) 98 Cal. App. 3d 557, 159 Cal. Rptr. 630 , were cross appeals from a judgment which, among other things, directed the issuance of a writ of mandate commanding the city to pay petitioner full back pay from December 11, 1974 to November 11, 1975, the date the city council first sustained his discharge. Petitioner was a tenured civil service employee employed as a fire engineer. On December 11, 1974, following his arrest and a preliminary hearing for possession of marijuana, amphetamine sulfate, and amobarbital, petitioner was discharged by the fire chief. Petitioner had received neither prior notice of the proposed discharge, a copy of the materials on which the discharge was based, nor an opportunity to respond thereto, either orally or in writing. Petitioner appealed his discharge, a hearing was held, and on November 11, 1975, the city council sustained the discharge. The court of appeal found that petitioner was not afforded procedural due process, and it held that because petitioner was not given the opportunity to respond to the grounds for the contemplated discharge, the city was liable to him for the back pay award made by the trial court (98 Cal. App. 3d 557, 563-564). However, the court held that petitioner had no other rights, and it accordingly affirmed the trial court judgment (98 Cal. App. 3d 557, 565-566).

West v. Berkeley (1979) 96 Cal. App. 3d 143, 157 Cal. Rptr. 764 , was an appeal by a discharged police officer from a trial court judgment denying his petition for a writ of mandate. The police officer had been discharged by the city following a notice of termination which set forth various charges against him. This notice was sent out on December 2, 1975; the officer filed a timely notice of appeal with the city's personnel board, and hearings were held on January 24, 1976. The court of appeal upheld the city manager's actions in terminating the officer and the trial court's review of the action. The court then noted the time lapse between the termination notice sent to the officer and the institution of personnel board hearings, and it stated the pretermination procedural safeguards guaranteeing due process of law as outlined in Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 215, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 . The court noted that the city conceded that the officer had not been given the safeguards required by Skelly and that he should therefore receive back pay for the period in question. It then remanded to the trial court for the sole purpose of determining the amount of back pay due the officer for the above period (96 Cal. App. 3d 143, 147-148).

[h] Action Remanded to Civil Service Board or Commission

Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court denying his petition for writ of mandate to compel the State Personnel Board to set aside his dismissal from his position as a medical consultant. Based on the employee's unexcused absences, apparent drinking during these absences, and failure to comply with work-hour requirements, the State Personnel Board had upheld his dismissal under Gov. Code § 19572(j) for inexcusable absence without leave. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the trial court, which refused to issue the writ of mandate, and remanded the cause to the trial court and ordered that court to issue a writ directing the board to set aside its decision and to reconsider petitioner's appeal. The Court stated that the provisions of the State Civil Service Act concerning the taking of punitive action against a permanent civil service employee did not fulfill minimum constitutional demands. The Court ruled that due process mandated that an employee be accorded certain preremoval safeguards including notice of the proposed action, the reasons therefor, a copy of the charges and materials on which the action is based, and the right to respond verbally or in writing to the authority imposing the discipline (15 Cal. 3d 194, 215). In response to the Skelly decision, the State Personnel Board has amended its regulations to establish a disciplinary procedure in compliance with these safeguards [see 2 Cal. Code Reg. § 52.3].

La Prade v. Department of Water & Power (1945) 27 Cal. 2d 47, 162 P.2d 13 , is discussed in § 36.20[3][b].

[a] Mandate to Review Discipline of Employee

Drummey v. State Bd. of Funeral Directors (1939) 13 Cal. 2d 75, 87 P.2d 848 , was an appeal from the judgment of the trial court in a proceeding for review of an administrative decision. The petitioner sought review alternatively by means of writs of review (certiorari), prohibition, and mandate. A demurrer to the petition was sustained as to the alleged cause of action for writs of review and prohibition (on the basis of then recent Supreme Court decisions holding such writs to be unavailable for review of an administrative decision) but was overruled as to the alleged cause of action for writ of mandate. The eventual judgment was in favor of the petitioner and ordered issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate. The Supreme Court, hearing the appeal, affirmed the superior court judgment and established the rule stated in Paragraph A. After pointing out that it had recently (in 1936 and 1937) held the writs of review (i.e., certiorari) and prohibition unavailable in such circumstances, and that there was no statutory procedure for review, the Supreme Court stated that mandate was the only possible remedy available to those aggrieved by administrative adjudicatory decisions. Historically, the writ of mandate was invented to provide a remedy when no other remedy existed. From an early date it has been held that when no other remedy is available, mandamus is the proper remedy for one improperly deprived of a professional license by an administrative board to secure the restoration of such license (13 Cal. 2d 75, 82). Statement of the rule in regard to deprivation of a license merely describes the case that was before the Court and does not limit the application of the general rule. After stating the rule the Court set out principles for guiding the superior court's inquiry on review (13 Cal. 2d 75, 83-86). These principles were later (in 1945) incorporated in Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5.

[b] Strict Compliance With Discipline Procedure

In Cilderman v. City of Los Angeles (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 1466, 80 Cal. Rptr. 2d 20 , a police officer began serving his 18-month probationary period as required by the city charter. The charter provided that the police department could terminate any officer's employment during the probationary period simply by delivering a termination notice to the civil service commission. At the expiration of the probationary period, however, the officer would have tenure and could not be terminated without a full hearing. The police officer in this case had his probationary period extended by 19 days, pursuant to the county's civil service rules, to compensate for sick time and a period of restricted duty because of an injury. More than 18 months after the officer began service, but before the expiration of the additional 19 days, the officer was terminated without a hearing. The officer petitioned for a writ of mandate, claiming that he should have been treated as a tenured officer and therefore should have received a hearing prior to termination. The basis for the officer's contention was that the police department had inconsistently applied the rules governing extensions of probationary periods. The officer presented a statistical record showing that of 125 officers eligible to have their probation extended under the applicable rules, probation was actually extended for only 34 of them. On the basis of this unequal enforcement of the rules, the trial court held that the 19-day extension of probation in this case had been improper. Therefore, the court reasoned, the officer was a tenured employee when the termination occurred. The trial court concluded that the termination was ineffective, because it had not been accomplished in accordance with the rules requiring a hearing for the termination of a tenured officer (67 Cal. App. 4th 1466, 1468-1470).

The court of appeal reversed the trial court's judgment. The court held that the unequal application of a statute or rule does not constitute a denial of equal protection or constitutionally prohibited discriminatory enforcement unless there is an element of intentional or purposeful discrimination. The court found that the record in this case demonstrated no intentional or purposeful discrimination, but merely a laxity of enforcement. Therefore, since the extension of the officer's probation and his termination had been accomplished in accordance with the applicable rules, the trial court had erred in granting the petition for writ of mandate (67 Cal. App. 4th 1466, 1470-1471).

Plaintiff in Shoemaker v. County of Los Angeles (1995) 37 Cal. App. 4th 618, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 774 , was a physician employed at a medical center jointly operated by the University of Southern California (a private institution) and the County of Los Angeles. Plaintiff sued both the university and the county after he was removed from his position as chief of emergency services at the medical center and chairman of emergency medicine department at the university. Plaintiff retained his employment as a physician at the hospital and as a faculty member of the university. Plaintiff argued that his removal from his administrative position was unlawful because he was not afforded any predisciplinary due process hearing as required by county civil service rules. In reversing a trial court judgment granting plaintiff a preliminary injunction, the court of appeal noted that when, as here, a county has adopted a civil service ordinance, it must strictly follow established procedures to dismiss or demote a permanent employee (37 Cal. App. 4th 618, 626). However, the court noted that plaintiff had not been discharged from employment but had only been removed as chief of the department and concluded that the applicable civil service rules did not require the county to follow any predisciplinary procedures before he was removed from his administrative post (37 Cal. App. 4th 618, 627-628).

Jackson v. Pomona (1979) 100 Cal. App. 3d 438, 160 Cal. Rptr. 890 , arose out of a disciplinary action against a police sergeant for failure to exercise adequate supervision and control over subordinate police officers. Pursuant to a city ordinance, a hearing officer had reviewed complaints against the sergeant, and had then recommended that the sergeant not be dismissed, but instead be suspended for a month without compensation. The city council reviewed the hearing officer's findings, and then went beyond them by ordering that the sergeant be demoted. The sergeant filed a petition for a writ of mandate which the trial court denied.

The court of appeal reversed and remanded, holding that a civil service employee is entitled to strict compliance with prescribed disciplinary procedures (100 Cal. App. 3d 438, 449). The absence of strict compliance in Jackson arose from the fact that the city council had failed to follow the procedures set forth in the city ordinance, by failing to make a determination that the decision of the hearing officer was unsupported by substantial evidence.

Lotts v. Board of Park Comm'rs (1936) 13 Cal. App. 2d 625, 57 P.2d 215 , was an appeal by respondent board from a judgment of the superior court declaring that petitioners were entitled to a peremptory writ of mandate ordering their reinstatement to full-time positions in the department of parks at full pay and the payment of back salary to them at the rate applicable for full-time positions. The Los Angeles City Council had passed an ordinance providing for the creation of half-time positions, giving the appointing power in each city department the power to order the employment of persons on a half-time basis and to reduce the compensation of such persons accordingly. The trial court found that placing petitioners on half-time work constituted a removal, suspension, and lay-off and that such action, not having been taken in accordance with civil service regulations, was illegal and void, entitling petitioners to a writ of mandate directing their reinstatement. The court of appeal affirmed this judgment. It ruled that petitioners were, in effect, removed from their positions, and that such removal could be accomplished only in conformity with the charter provisions governing the removal of civil service employees (13 Cal. App. 2d 625, 631).

THE PETITION FOR WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD BE GRANTED ON THE GROUND THAT RESPONDENT'S ACTION IN _____ [specify nature of disciplinary action, e.g., DISMISSING PLAINTIFF] IS UNLAWFUL BECAUSE RESPONDENT DID NOT COMPLY WITH THE REQUIREMENTS OF DUE PROCESS IN THAT _____ [specify nature of failure to comply with due process].

A-E. Propriety of Mandate to Review Discipline of Employee. [See § 36.20, Paragraphs A-E.]

[EITHER]

F. Due Process Requirements for Permanent Civil Service Employee. A permanent civil service employee has been improperly dismissed when he or she has not been given prior notice of the punitive action, the reasons therefor, and a copy of the charges and the materials on which the action is based; a right to respond, orally or in writing, to the authority imposing the discipline before the discipline is imposed; and a full evidentiary hearing before the punitive action becomes final (Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 212, 215, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 ; Bostean v. Los Angeles Unified School Dist. (1998) 63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 113-118, 73 Cal. Rptr. 2d 523 ; Kirkpatrick v. Civil Service Com. (1978) 77 Cal. App. 3d 940, 945, 144 Cal. Rptr. 51).

[OR]

F. Due Process Requirements for Short-Term Suspensions. Minimal concepts of fair play and justice embodied in the concept of due process require that an employee suspended for five days or less be notified of the action and the reasons thereof, be given a copy of the charges filed against him or her, including materials on which the action is based, and be given a right to respond, orally or in writing, to the authority imposing the discipline, either during the suspension or within a reasonable time thereafter (Civil Serv. Ass'n v. City & County of San Francisco (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 552, 564, 150 Cal. Rptr. 129, 586 P.2d 162).

[OR]

F. Due Process Requirements for Probationary and At-Will Employees. A probationary or at-will employee has been deprived of the liberty guaranteed all persons under the Fourteenth Amendment and under Article I, Section 7(a), of the California Constitution if his or her dismissal is based on charges of misconduct that stigmatize his or her reputation, seriously impair his or her opportunity to earn a living, or seriously damage his or her standing or associations in the community, and the employee is not afforded notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case before the termination becomes effective (Katzberg v. Regents of Univ. of Cal. (2002) 29 Cal. 4th 300, 127 Cal. Rptr. 2d 482, 58 P.3d 339 ; Holmes v. Hallinan (1998) 68 Cal. App. 4th 1523, 1530-1534, 81 Cal. Rptr. 2d 174 ; Lubey v. City & County of San Francisco (1979) 98 Cal. App. 3d 340, 346, 159 Cal. Rptr. 440).

[OR]

F. Due Process Requirements for Public Employee Not in Civil Service System. Due process requirements apply to any public employee who can be terminated only for cause. Such an employee has a constitutionally protected property interest in continued employment, even if he or she is not in the civil service system (Townsel v. San Diego Metro. Transit Dev. Board (1998) 65 Cal. App. 4th 940, 949-950, 77 Cal. Rptr. 2d 231).

[OR]

F. No Punitive Action Against Peace Officer Without Opportunity for Administrative Appeal. Under Gov. Code §§ 3303, 3304(b), "punitive action"--any action that may lead to dismissal, demotion, suspension, reduction in salary, written reprimand, or transfer for purposes of punishment--may not be taken against a peace officer without affording the officer a right to an administrative appeal, allowing the officer opportunity to establish a formal record of circumstances surrounding discipline and to attempt to convince the agency to reverse its decision (Brown v. City of Los Angeles (2002) 102 Cal. App. 4th 155, 172-178, 125 Cal. Rptr. 2d 474 ; Hunter v. Los Angeles County Civil Serv. Comm'n (2002) 102 Cal. App. 4th 191, 194-198, 124 Cal. Rptr. 2d 924 ; Otto v. Los Angeles Unified Sch. Dist. (2001) 89 Cal. App. 4th 985, 998-999, 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 664 ; Caloca v. County of San Diego (1999) 72 Cal. App. 4th 1209, 1220-1223, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 660 ; Runyan v. Ellis (1995) 40 Cal. App. 4th 961, 964-967, 47 Cal. Rptr. 2d 356).

[CONTINUE]

[Optional] G. Right to Respond to Authority Imposing Discipline. The mere opportunity to review an unfavorable rating with a person who has signed the rating report or assisted in its making is not the right to respond to charges before a reasonably impartial, noninvolved reviewer, a right which is implied in the due process requirement that an employee be given the right to respond, orally or in writing, to the authority imposing the discipline (Williams v. Los Angeles County (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 731, 735, 150 Cal. Rptr. 475, 586 P.2d 956).

[Optional] H. Posthearing Determination Must Be Based on Review of Evidence. The due process principle of "one who decides must hear" requires that once an administrative body holds a Skelly hearing and recommends an action, the ultimate decisionmaker cannot take a contrary action based on evidence that was not introduced at the hearing or without reviewing the record to a sufficient extent to enable him or her to make an informed judgment (Vollstedt v. City of Stockton (1990) 220 Cal. App. 3d 265, 275-276, 269 Cal. Rptr. 404).

[Optional] I. Seasonal Civil Service Employees. A seasonal civil service employee with justifiable expectations as to reemployment is entitled to the same due process protection as a tenured civil service employee (Williams v. Los Angeles County (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 731, 736-737, 150 Cal. Rptr. 475, 586 P.2d 956).

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee if the procedure used to discipline the employee did not meet the constitutional requirements of due process. This form may be used to protest an employee's discipline effected without proper notice of a prior hearing or a right to respond to the authority imposing the discipline. However, because the State Personnel Board amended its regulations to conform to the due process requirements noted in this form [see 2 Cal. Code Reg. § 52.3], this form is for use primarily in a proceeding brought by a local civil service employee for wrongful discipline.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[b] Limitations on Use of Form

Note that courts have indicated that public employees need not be afforded Skelly procedural safeguards before some types of discipline. For example, in one case, a court of appeal held that a county medical center was not required by due process to afford physician predisciplinary procedures before removing him from his position as chief of the emergency medical services department (but retaining him as a physician with the same salary) because the physician had no property interest in his administrative position [see Shoemaker v. County of Los Angeles (1995) 37 Cal. App. 4th 618, 630-633, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 774]. For full discussion of extent and limits of due process rights under Skelly, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 118, Civil Service (Matthew Bender).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Due Process Requirements for Permanent Civil Service Employee

Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 , is discussed in § 36.20[3][h]. In Skelly, the state statutory scheme regulating civil service employment entitled a permanent employee to an evidentiary hearing after discipline was imposed, but provided for no hearing or other procedural safeguards before the punitive action took effect (15 Cal. 3d 194, 205). The California Supreme Court noted that federal due process requires that a full evidentiary hearing be held at some time before a competitive civil service employee may be finally terminated for misconduct (15 Cal. 3d 194, 212). The Court went on to hold that although due process does not require the state to provide the employee with a full trial-type evidentiary hearing prior to the initial punitive action, the employee has the right, before the discipline becomes effective, to receive notice of the proposed action, the reasons for the action, a copy of the charges and material on which the action is based, and the right to respond, either orally or in writing, to the authority initially imposing discipline (15 Cal. 3d 194, 217).

Bostean v. Los Angeles Unified School Dist. (1998) 63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 73 Cal. Rptr. 2d 523 , concerned a plaintiff who was a permanent, classified employee of a school district. Mr. Bostean had complained to the school district that, while driving the district's van, he had been exposed to hazardous fumes and materials caused by safety violations. The district denied the plaintiff's grievance on this issue as untimely, but the district did conduct an unofficial investigation of the plaintiff's allegations. After requesting and receiving a letter from the plaintiff's physician concerning restrictions on the plaintiff's ability to perform his duties, the district placed the plaintiff on involuntary, unpaid illness leave. The plaintiff never received prior notice that he would be placed on leave, nor was he afforded a hearing on the matter. The plaintiff then initiated a union grievance, claiming that the district's action of placing him on involuntary unpaid leave constituted a disciplinary action in violation of his due process rights. The district then sought additional information and evaluation of the plaintiff's condition from the plaintiff's doctor, who informed the district that he was not qualified to answer the additional matters. Seven months after the leave was imposed, the district reinstated the plaintiff, based on a report from a second physician. The plaintiff's union representative requested back pay for the seven-month period, but the district denied it (63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 100-102).

The plaintiff then filed a complaint for declaratory and injunctive relief against the district and other defendants. His complaint alleged that the district's failure to provide him with written notice of its intended action and an opportunity to respond before the imposition of the involuntary leave violated the due process clause of the United States Constitution. The plaintiff also filed a petition for a writ of mandate making him whole for the wages and benefits he lost during the involuntary leave. The trial court denied the plaintiff's petition and entered judgment for the defendants (63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 103-107).

The court of appeal reversed. Because a permanent, classified employee of a school district cannot be suspended without reasonable cause (see Educ. Code §§ 45302, 45304(a)), the district must comply with procedural due process before imposing a suspension on the employee (63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 112-118). In this case, the seven-month involuntary, unpaid illness leave was effectively a suspension, because of its effect on the plaintiff's receipt of salary and benefits (63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 110). Therefore, procedural due process requirements were applicable. Generally, procedural due process requires that the employee be given a presuspension hearing, although a balancing of the employee's interest, the district's interest, and the risk of an erroneous suspension and probable value of the hearing may justify proceeding without a presuspension hearing in some cases (63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 113).

In this case, the fact that an employee would lose wages during a suspension weighed heavily in favor of a predeprivation hearing. Also, the risk of an erroneous deprivation in the absence of a hearing was great, as demonstrated by the fact that the first doctor, whose letter had been the basis for the suspension, ultimately was not qualified to render an opinion on the matters involved. A hearing probably would have clarified the medical information sooner than seven months. Further, the district had no other procedural safeguards in place to remedy the deprivation of the plaintiff's wages and benefits. Balancing all of these factors, the court found that the district was indeed required to afford a hearing before suspending the plaintiff (63 Cal. App. 4th 95, 113-118).

Kirkpatrick v. Civil Service Com. (1978) 77 Cal. App. 3d 940, 144 Cal. Rptr. 51 , was an appeal by a county civil service commission from the issuance of a writ of mandate ordering the reinstatment of a county employee. The trial court issued the writ on the ground that the employee was not given, prior to his dismissal, notice of the charges against him and an opportunity to respond as required by Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 (discussed above). He did receive a posttermination hearing before the civil service commission, which sustained the dismissal. The court of appeal reversed and remanded to the superior court, holding that the violation of the Skelly pretermination safeguards alone did not justify an order of reinstatement. If, on remand, the trial court were to find that the dismissal was justified, the employee's remedy was limited to backpay from the time the discipline was imposed to the date the commission filed its decision validating the dismissal. The appellate court reasoned that the minimal due process rights required by Skelly before discharge merely anticipate the full rights that are accorded to the employee after discharge, including the right to an evidentiary hearing (77 Cal. App. 3d 940, 945-946, 950).

[b] Due Process Requirements for Short-Term Suspensions

Civil Serv. Ass'n v. City & County of San Francisco (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 552, 150 Cal. Rptr. 129, 586 P.2d 162 , was an appeal by eight permanent civil service employees and two labor unions from a judgment of the trial court denying their petition for a writ of mandate challenging the legality of short-term suspensions of five days or less imposed on the employees for disciplinary reasons. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment as to a police department employee and reversed it as to all others, and it remanded the cause to the trial court for further proceedings. The Court ruled that although the shortness of the suspensions demonstrated that the required Skelly pretermination procedures would not be required here, minimal concepts of fair play and justice embodied in the concept of due process required that an employee suspended for five days or less be notified of the action and the reasons thereof, be given a copy of the charges filed against him or her, including materials on which the action is based, and be given a right to respond orally or in writing to the authority imposing the discipline, either during the suspension or within a reasonable time thereafter [see Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 , discussed in § 36.20[3][h]]. Since the police department employee had an opportunity for a postdisciplinary hearing and complaint alleged neither a demand for a hearing nor a denial of such demand, the Court found that she had not exhausted her administrative remedies and affirmed the judgment against her. Since the other employees did not have an opportunity for any hearing, the Court reversed the judgments against them (Civil Serv. Ass'n v. City & County of San Francisco (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 552, 564, 150 Cal. Rptr. 129, 586 P.2d 162).

[c] Due Process Requirements for Probationary and At-Will Employees

In Katzberg v. Regents of Univ. of Cal. (2002) 29 Cal. 4th 300, 127 Cal. Rptr. 2d 482, 58 P.3d 339 , the plaintiff was a public employee who sued to recover damages from his employer, the University of California. The complaint alleged that the employer's agents had violated the plaintiff's due-process liberty interest, protected under Cal. Const., art. I, § 7(a), by making stigmatizing statements about the plaintiff in the course of removing him from his position as department chairperson. The Supreme Court observed that it is well-established that an at-will public employee is deprived of due-process liberty interests when his or her termination occurs amidst charges that might seriously damage the employee's standing and associations in the community or impose a stigma or other disability that would foreclose the freedom to take advantage of other employment opportunities. When such a liberty deprivation occurs, the employee has a right to a so-called "name-clearing hearing" (29 Cal. 4th 300, 326). The Court went on to point out that if the employer does not provide a name-clearing hearing, the employee's appropriate course of action is to seek a writ of mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085 to compel the public employer to provide the hearing (29 Cal. 4th 300, 326). In addition, the plaintiff may pursue a defamation action to obtain damages for reputational injury caused by an actionable delay in providing the hearing (29 Cal. 4th 300, 327). In part because of the availability of these adequate remedies, the Supreme Court declined to find an implied constitutional tort action seeking damages to remedy the asserted violation of due-process liberty interests (29 Cal. 4th 300, 323-324).

In Holmes v. Hallinan (1998) 68 Cal. App. 4th 1523, 81 Cal. Rptr. 2d 174 , a city had terminated the at-will employment of a district attorney's investigator for falsifying workers' compensation forms and for dishonesty. Before terminating the investigator, the city afforded him a hearing at which he and his attorney could present his side of the story. However, the city did not provide a full evidentiary hearing, at which the investigator could present live witnesses and cross-examine adverse witnesses under oath. Further, the city had denied the investigator's request for discovery prior to the hearing. The trial court granted the investigator's petition for mandamus and ordered his reinstatement, because the investigator had not received a full hearing. The court of appeal reversed. The court acknowledged that, although the investigator was an at-will employee, he did have a right to a hearing because his discharge was accompanied by charges of dishonesty that would affect his liberty interests by damaging his reputation and limiting his ability to obtain future employment. However, an at-will employee whose liberty interests are at stake is entitled only to a hearing at which he or she can personally present his or her side of the story (68 Cal. App. 4th 1523, 1530-1532). There is no requirement that such a hearing include live witnesses or the ability to cross-examine adverse witnesses (68 Cal. App. 4th 1523, 1532-1533). Moreover, the mere fact that the hearing was before a representative of the employer was insufficient to establish the existence of bias that would constitute a denial of due process (68 Cal. App. 4th 1523, 1533). Finally, there is no authority for the proposition that an employee is entitled to conduct discovery prior to the hearing or prior to his or her discharge (68 Cal. App. 4th 1523, 1534).

Lubey v. City & County of San Francisco (1979) 98 Cal. App. 3d 340, 159 Cal. Rptr. 440 , was an appeal by the city of San Francisco from a judgment of the trial court ordering the police chief to reinstate two discharged probationary police officers and award them back wages and benefits. The dismissal of the officers occurred after a citizen made unsworn charges of misconduct against both officers, the police department conducted an investigation, the officers were interrogated and furnished with a statement of charges, and a memorandum reciting those and other charges not made known to the officers was sent to the police chief with a recommendation that the officers be tried for misconduct. Approximately two and a half months after the start of the investigation and on a few hours notice, the officers were summoned to the police chief's office for the opportunity of refuting the charges against them, and they were given written notices of termination of employment at the close of the meeting. Two months after this termination, the officers were advised by the city's civil service commission that they were entitled to no future employment with the City and County of San Francisco. In an action brought by the officers for reinstatement and payment of back wages, the trial court found that the officers (1) were not permitted to call or examine witnesses, (2) did not have an opportunity to perform an independent investigation or to present evidence, (3) were not given prior notice of all the charges or of the purpose of the meeting, and (4) by virtue of the charges and consequent job terminations found it difficult or impossible for the officers to be employed as police officers anywhere.

On appeal, the court of appeal noted that probationary employees may usually be dismissed without a hearing or judicially cognizable good cause, but it went on to discuss the exceptions to the rule. Included among the exceptions was the situation where the probationary employee's job termination was based on charges of misconduct which stigmatize his reputation, seriously impair his opportunity to earn a living, or seriously damage his standing or associations in the community. The court stated that in such circumstances there is a deprivation of the liberty guaranteed all persons by the Fourteenth Amendment. The court found here that the officers' reputations were stigmatized, their chances of future employment in their chosen field and elsewhere seriously impaired, and their standing in the community seriously damaged; and that the termination of the officers did not comport with Fourteenth Amendment requirements. The court of appeal modified the lower court judgment to remove an inconsistency and then affirmed the reinstatement order (98 Cal. App. 3d 340, 346).

[d] Due Process Requirements for Public Employee Not in Civil Service System

Townsel v. San Diego Metro. Transit Dev. Board (1998) 65 Cal. App. 4th 940, 77 Cal. Rptr. 2d 231 , involved a petition by a public employee (an inspector for a metropolitan transit board) for a writ of mandate to vacate his termination, after the employer's board of directors had denied the employee's request for a posttermination evidentiary hearing concerning the alleged rules violation that was the basis for termination. The employee's job was not within the civil service system, but it was undisputed that his employment could be terminated only for cause. The court held that the due-process requirement of an evidentiary hearing applies to any public employee who has a constitutionally protected property interest in continued employment, even if the employee is not in the civil service system or subject to a statutory scheme that specifically provides the required evidentiary hearing. The employee in this case had a property interest in his continued employment, because his job as an inspector for the metropolitan transit board could be terminated only for cause. Therefore, the employee was entitled to a posttermination evidentiary hearing (65 Cal. App. 4th 940, 949-950).

[e] No Punitive Action Against Peace Officer Without Opportunity for Administrative Appeal

In Brown v. City of Los Angeles (2002) 102 Cal. App. 4th 155, 125 Cal. Rptr. 2d 474 , the court of appeal considered whether procedures provided by a city for administrative appeals by police officers under Gov. Code § 3304(b) satisfied the requirements of due process. The court noted that at a minimum, due process requires that an officer be accorded written notice of the grounds for the disciplinary measures, disclosure of the evidence supporting the disciplinary grounds, the right to present witnesses and to confront adverse witnesses, the right to be represented by counsel, a fair and impartial decision-maker, and a written statement from the fact-finder listing the evidence relied upon and the reasons for the determination made. Also, if the administrative appeal hearing is the first evidentiary inquiry into the facts giving rise to the punitive action, the burden of proving the charges must be placed on the employing agency that is making the charges (102 Cal. App. 4th 155, 174-175).

In this case, the court found the city's administrative appeal procedure to be constitutionally inadequate, because (1) it placed no burden of proof on the police department, leaving the presentation of evidence to the discretion of department; (2) it did not require the chief of police, the final decision-maker, to apply any substantive guidelines or principles in making the decision, and the chief was not required to uphold the decision of the hearing officer; and (3) it failed to afford a neutral and impartial decision-maker because the police chief was the person who initially authorized the punitive action that gave rise to this case (102 Cal. App. 4th 155, 176-178).

In Hunter v. Los Angeles County Civil Serv. Comm'n (2002) 102 Cal. App. 4th 191, 124 Cal. Rptr. 2d 924 , a public safety officer sought an administrative appeal under Gov. Code § 3304(b), claiming that he had been denied a promotion on grounds other than merit. Because the county had not established a specific procedure for such appeals, the officer filed an appeal with the county civil service commission. After a hearing officer dismissed the appeal for lack of jurisdiction, the trial court issued a writ of mandate requiring the civil service commission to hear the administrative appeal. The court of appeal, however, reversed the trial court's judgment.

The court of appeal acknowledged that the county clearly had a duty under Gov. Code § 3304(b) to provide the officer with an administrative appeal. However, a civil service commission created by charter has only the special and limited jurisdiction expressly authorized by the charter, and in this case that jurisdiction did not include the power to hear appeals under Gov. Code § 3304(b). Therefore, the trial court erred in issuing a writ to compel the civil service commission to hear the officer's appeal (102 Cal. App. 4th 191, 194-197).

The court of appeal concluded by indicating that the officer was not without a remedy for the county's failure to provide an administrative appeal. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1095, writ relief is available to compel a public agency to perform an act prescribed by law. Thus, if a county has not performed its duty to establish a forum for administrative appeals under Gov. Code § 3304(b) (see Gov. Code §§ 3304.5, 3309.5), writ relief may be available to compel the county to do so. However, since that was not the relief sought or ordered in the trial court in this case, the court of appeal reversed the trial court's judgment (102 Cal. App. 4th 191, 197-198).

Otto v. Los Angeles Unified Sch. Dist. (2001) 89 Cal. App. 4th 985, 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 664 , involved two police officers who were employed by a school district. After "summary of conference" memoranda (memorializing meetings between the officers and their supervisors) were placed in their personnel files, the officers sought mandamus to compel their employer to provide administrative appeals under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (see Gov. Code §§ 3303, 3304). The trial court denied the petitions for mandamus, finding that the "summary of conference" memoranda were not formal reprimands and thus did not trigger the officers' administrative appeal rights.

The court of appeal held that whether a "summary of conference" memorandum constitutes a punitive action that triggers administrative appeal rights depends on the contents of the memorandum. In this particular case, the court of appeal concluded that the memorandum concerning one officer did constitute a sufficiently punitive action, because it stated that "continued failure [to follow a particular departmental policy] could lead to future disciplinary action." Thus, the memorandum contained adverse comments that could lead to punitive action in the future. Therefore, the officer was entitled to an administrative appeal, and the trial court should have granted the officer's petition for mandamus. The other officer's memorandum, however, was not sufficiently punitive to trigger the officer's administrative appeal rights.

The court of appeal found that the tenor and contents of the memorandum indicated that its mention of shortcomings in the officer's performance was not a criticism for fault, but rather an educational reminder. Therefore, the trial court had correctly denied the second officer's petition for mandamus (89 Cal. App. 4th 985, 995-999).

In Caloca v. County of San Diego (1999) 72 Cal. App. 4th 1209, 85 Cal. Rptr. 2d 660 , a county citizens' law enforcement review board issued a report containing findings of serious misconduct on the part of certain deputy sheriffs; the report made no recommendation concerning discipline of the deputies. The sheriff's department made its own investigation of the incidents involved, finding that no misconduct had occurred. The citizens' law enforcement review board had been established by the county charter as an advisory body, with no power to establish policy or impose any disciplinary measures. After the civil service commission denied the deputies' request for an administrative appeal of the board report, they petitioned for mandamus. The trial court denied the petition, ruling that the deputies were not entitled to an administrative appeal because they had suffered no injury.

The court of appeal reversed, holding that the report of the citizens' law enforcement review board itself constituted punitive action within the meaning of Gov. Code §§ 3303 and 3304(b), entitling the deputies to an administrative appeal. Although the deputies had been subjected to no disciplinary measures as a result of the board report or the incidents involved, the testimony of sheriff's department's head of human resources established that the existence of the negative report could have an adverse effect on the deputies' career advancement. Government Code § 3303 defines "punitive action" that triggers a right to an administrative appeal as any action that may lead to dismissal, demotion, or other adverse employment consequences. Therefore, even though the deputies had suffered no immediate punishment from the report, the court of appeal concluded that they were entitled to an administrative appeal because the report could lead to adverse employment consequences in the future (72 Cal. App. 4th 1209, 1220-1223).

Runyan v. Ellis (1995) 40 Cal. App. 4th 961, 47 Cal. Rptr. 2d 356 , involved a police officer, Runyan, who was given a temporary transfer and corresponding pay reduction for alleged deficiencies in performance. Runyan requested an administrative appeal before the Civil Service Commission, which was denied. He filed a petition for writ of mandate to force the Civil Service Commission to provide him with an administrative appeal as the result of his punitive transfer to a lower paying position. The trial court granted the writ; the court of appeal affirmed. The City argued that a meeting with the city manager or his designee, provided for under the provisions of a memorandum of understanding between the city and the Police Officers Association, satisfied the administrative appeal requirement under Gov. Code § 3304; however, the court held this insufficient and that Runyan had a right to an administrative appeal before the Civil Service Commission (Runyan v. Ellis (1995) 40 Cal. App. 4th 961, 964-967, 47 Cal. Rptr. 2d 356).

[f] Right to Respond to Authority Imposing Discipline

Williams v. Los Angeles County (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 731, 150 Cal. Rptr. 475, 586 P.2d 956 , was an appeal from a judgment of the trial court sustaining a demurrer to a complaint alleging discharge of a seasonal civil service employee without just cause and a hearing. Plaintiff, a seasonal employee with justifiable expectations as to reemployment, accepted the county's offer to manage a pool in the summer, and relying on that contract, he rejected alternative employment opportunities. The opening of the pool was delayed, but plaintiff, contrary to instructions, reported for duty to the unopened pool and submitted a time card for such "work." After numerous discussions and counseling with his supervisors regarding this matter, plaintiff received an unsatisfactory performance rating and was released from the recurrent service. The Supreme Court held that the demurrer should not have been sustained as to the causes of action, and it remanded the cause to the trial court for further proceedings. The Court ruled that a recurrent employee with justifiable expectations as to reemployment, when faced with discharge for alleged unsatisfactory service, must be accorded more than a mere opportunity to review his rating with one of the persons who signed the rating report or assisted in making the rating. The Court found that the skimpy review provided plaintiff was not the right to respond before a reasonably impartial, noninvolved reviewer, a right implied in the due process requirement that an employee be given the right to respond, orally or in writing, to the authority imposing the discipline (22 Cal. 3d 731, 735).

[g] Posthearing Determination Must Be Based on Review of Evidence

In Vollstedt v. City of Stockton (1990) 220 Cal. App. 3d 265, 269 Cal. Rptr. 404 , a city employee was demoted for poor performance. Following a hearing, the city's civil service commission found that the evidence was insufficient to support the demotion and recommended to the city manager that the employee be reinstated. Contrary to the procedures set forth in a city ordinance, the commission failed to forward a written statement of facts to the city manager. The city manager rejected the commission's recommendation and upheld the employee's demotion based on a private discussion with the city's personnel director and without reviewing the evidence presented at the hearing. The employee petitioned the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel reinstatement and for damages. When the petition was denied, the employee appealed.

The court of appeal reversed, holding that the employee had not been given a fair hearing. The court reasoned that the city manager's decision to proceed without a statement of facts or a review of the tapes or transcripts of the commission's hearing, coupled with the decision to reject the commission's recommendation based on evidence supplied by the city's personnel director, denied the employee due process and violated the fundamental principle that "one who decides must hear" (220 Cal. App. 3d 265, 269). Under this principle, there has been no "hearing" unless the one who decides considers the evidence, is guided by that alone, and reaches a conclusion uninfluenced by extraneous considerations (220 Cal. App. 3d 265, 275). The ultimate decisionmaker is not required to peruse every exhibit or read every witness' entire testimony but he or she must review the record to a sufficient extent to enable him or her to make an informed judgment (220 Cal. App. 3d 265, 276). Review of a written statement of facts from the commission would have satisfied this requirement, the court explained. The total absence of independent review, the court concluded, coupled with the city manager's rejection of the commission's recommendation based on information supplied by the personnel director, denied petitioner due process (220 Cal. App. 3d 265, 276).

[h] Seasonal Civil Service Employees

Williams v. Los Angeles County (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 731, 150 Cal. Rptr. 475, 586 P.2d 956 , is discussed in § 36.21[3][f].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Due Process Requirements for Permanent Civil Service Employees

Coburn v. State Personnel Bd. (1978) 83 Cal. App. 3d 801, 148 Cal. Rptr. 134 , concerned a psychiatric technician who was charged with committing a sex offense with a male patient, but was not informed of his impending dismissal until just two and one-half hours before it became effective. The dismissal was upheld by the State Personnel Board, and the employee's petition for a writ of mandate was denied in the trial court. The court of appeal reversed the denial of the writ, holding that the Skelly due process requirements were not met in this case, in that the notice given two and one-half hours prior to the imposition of the punitive action did not give the employee an effective opportunity to rebut the charges (83 Cal. App. 3d 801, 806).

[b] Due Process Requirements for Short-Term Suspensions

The United States Supreme Court in Gilbert v. Homar (1997) 520 U.S. 924, 933-935, 117 S. Ct. 1807, 138 L. Ed. 2d 120, 129-130 , reached the same conclusion as the California Supreme Court reached in Civil Service Assn. v. City and County of San Francisco (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 552, 564, 150 Cal. Rptr. 129, 586 P.2d 162 : that is, a public employee's due-process rights require notice and an opportunity to be heard within a reasonable time after a temporary suspension, but not necessarily before it.

A police officer was suspended without pay immediately upon being arrested and charged with a felony in another jurisdiction. He was not given an opportunity to contest the action beforehand, and his only opportunity to do so following notification of the evidence against him took place four weeks later. The district court found no due process violation, but the court of appeal held that a governmental employer may not suspend an employee without pay unless the suspension is preceded by some kind of pre-suspension hearing, providing the employee with notice and an opportunity to be heard.

In reversing, the Supreme Court strongly disapproved of the lower court's categorical reasoning, emphasizing both the flexibility of the Due-Process Clause and the existence of situations where a state agency must act more quickly than a requirement of pre-deprivation notice and hearing would allow (138 L. Ed. 2d 120, 127). The court balanced the employee's interest (relatively minor because of the temporary deprivation), the state's interest (a strong need to protect the perceived and actual integrity of law enforcement agencies), and the risks and benefits of not requiring the safeguard in question. On this last factor, the Court was satisfied that suspensions triggered by felony arrests are already preceded by an independent investigation (that leading to the arrest) which protects against totally arbitrary action by the employer. It also noted that a post-suspension hearing was more likely to give an opportunity for reliable fact-finding, because of the additional time for more information to be gained (138 L. Ed. 2d 120, 128-130).

The Court noted that criminal charges against the suspended employee were dropped 17 days before he was given a meaningful opportunity to be heard and remanded for the lower courts to consider whether this fact amounted to a lack of promptness in providing a post-suspension hearing, in violation of the employee's due--process rights (138 L. Ed. 2d 120, 130).

The court of appeal in Sienkiewicz v. County of Santa Cruz (1987) 195 Cal. App. 3d 134, 240 Cal. Rptr. 451 , affirmed a trial court's denial of a petition for extraordinary relief and dismissal of a complaint for damages by a detention officer against a county. The petitioner had suffered facial and jaw injuries in a motorcycle accident unrelated to work, but feared becoming involved in an altercation at work that could result in his being struck in the face. A psychiatrist diagnosed petitioner as suffering from posttraumatic stress disorder. The sheriff felt that petitioner's mental state rendered him unfit for normal service and presented a danger to petitioner and to other detention officers. Petitioner's suspension was indefinite in that it provided that he should remain away from work until he could demonstrate that his presence in his normal work assignment would not endanger himself or the safety of other employees.

While the court of appeal agreed that a public employee subject to a short-term suspension must be afforded the right to respond either during the suspension or within a reasonable time thereafter, the court said that the administrative appeal to the county civil service commission after suspension by the sheriff was sufficient opportunity for response. The court acknowledged that the suspension was indefinite, but considered it short-term because petitioner had the power to end the suspension quickly by showing that he had overcome his fear (195 Cal. App. 3d 134, 141).

[c] Right to Respond to Authority Imposing Discipline

In Kempland v. Regents of University of California (1984) 155 Cal. App. 3d 644, 202 Cal. Rptr. 275 , a discharged employee petitioned for a writ of mandate for reinstatement with back pay, alleging that he had been discharged without sufficient procedural due process. His employer held the predismissal hearing one day after the employee had received notice of intention to dismiss. The employee did not feel sufficiently prepared for this hearing, and later submitted a written response within five days of his notice, as permitted under established procedure. However, his employer dismissed him immediately without considering this response (155 Cal. App. 3d 644, 647-648). The trial court denied relief, and the court of appeal reversed, holding that the dismissal was void for lack of procedural due process and that the employee was therefore entitled to reinstatement. The court reasoned that the employer had not given the employee a meaningful opportunity to respond to the charges raised in its notice of intention to dismiss (155 Cal. App. 3d 644, 648-650). The employee was entitled to back pay from his dismissal until such time as he was afforded a meaningful opportunity to respond, less any interim wages earned (155 Cal. App. 3d 644, 650-651).

[d] Posthearing Determination Must Be Based on Review of Evidence

In Parker v. City of Fountain Valley (1981) 127 Cal. App. 3d 99, 179 Cal. Rptr. 351 , a tenured city police officer appealed the denial of his petition for a writ of mandate, by which he sought reinstatement to his position in the city police department. The court of appeal reversed the trial court's denial of the writ, stating that the city denied the officer his constitutional right to procedural due process (127 Cal. App. 3d 99, 118). Although the officer was given notice of the charges, a copy of the materials on which the action was based, and the right to respond to the charges in a hearing, the police chief considered new witness statements and written materials that had not been provided to the officer and to which the officer had had no opportunity to respond, thus denying him the minimum safeguards required by due process (127 Cal. App. 3d 99, 107).

§ 36.22 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate to Review Administrative Decision--Discipline of Civil Service Employee--Due Process Requirements--No Property Right to Be Protected When Employment Is at Will

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or in a trial or appellate brief.]

PETITIONER IS NOT ENTITLED TO DUE-PROCESS PROTECTION OF HIS/HER POSITION.

A. No Protected Property Interest When Employment Is at Will. When the statutory scheme creating a public employee's position gives the employee no guarantee of retaining it, there is no property interest implicated when the position is taken away. Therefore the employee is not entitled to due process in the manner of the taking (Campbell v. State Personnel Bd. (1997) 57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 293-295, 66 Cal. Rptr. 2d 722).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a contention that the procedures used to demote or discharge a public employee violated the employee's due process rights, where the position in question was at will or otherwise not one the employee had a legal entitlement to retain. It should be combined with any of the other forms in this chapter that are applicable to the particular case.

[b] Argument

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. Counsel should, for example, explain how the petitioner's position was exempt from normal civil service protections or explicitly made not a permanent position.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] No Protected Property Interest When Employment Is at Will

The facts and procedural background of Campbell v. State Personnel Bd. (1997) 57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 288-290, 66 Cal. Rptr. 2d 722 are discussed in § 36.28[3][a].

In Campbell the state's chief structural engineer was demoted within the Office of the State Architect, losing his "career executive assignment," a special category of state civil service reserved for high-level administrative and policy--influencing positions under Gov. Code § 18547 (57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 284). He argued that procedures for terminating a career executive assignment violated due process because they fail to include a pretermination hearing, citing Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 .

The court observed that before Skelly applies, a property interest must be implicated. Reviewing the statutory scheme regarding career executive assignments, the court showed that the category is one providing the employee very little protection from reassignment. From this it concluded that there is no property right in such an assignment (57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 293-294).

As the court made clear that the issue in Campbell was not whether the petitioner had a property interest in a state job, but whether his property interest extended to the career executive assignment (57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 293), the case would be of limited precedential value in defending against discharge of a permanent employee. On the other hand, a close analogy could be made in termination cases involving probationary or other at--will employees. Cf. § 36.54.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Same Official May Initiate Disciplinary Proceedings and Conduct Skelly Hearing

In Flippin v. Los Angeles City Bd. of Civil Serv. Comm'rs (2007) 148 Cal. App. 4th 272, 55 Cal. Rptr. 3d 458 , the Los Angeles Department of Power and Water (DPW) discharged an employee after he was found sleeping in a hammock beneath a DPW truck on a public street during working hours. After the city's Board of Civil Service Commissioners sustained the penalty, the employee petitioned for administrative mandamus to compel the Board to reinstate his employment. The employee claimed, among other things, that the DPW had denied him due process by not providing an impartial Skelly hearing officer before discharging him. Specifically, the employee contended that, because the hearing officer was the same DPW manager who had initially investigated and recommended discharge, the hearing officer could not serve as a neutral Skelly hearing officer. The trial court found no Skelly violation, but it did find that the penalty was excessive. The court of appeal reversed, finding that the trial court had erred in setting aside the penalty of discharge. The court of appeal agreed with the trial court and the Board, however, that no Skelly violation had occurred.

In examining the employee's claim that he had been denied a proper Skelly hearing, the court of appeal began with a brief historical review. In Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 , discussed in § 36.20[3][h], the California Supreme Court held that in order to satisfy due process, an agency considering disciplinary action against a public employee must accord the employee certain "preremoval safeguards," including notice of the proposed action, the reasons therefor, a copy of the charges and materials on which the action is based, and the right to respond, either orally or in writing, to the authority initially imposing discipline (Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 215, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774). The Supreme Court's directive gave rise to an administrative procedure known as a Skelly hearing, in which an employee has the opportunity to respond to the charges on which the proposed discipline is based (148 Cal. App. 4th 272, 280) .

In this case, the employee's alleged misconduct was investigated by a DWP manager, who concluded that discharge was called for. The manager notified the employee in a written memorandum of the proposed dismissal and the charges on which the dismissal was based. The memorandum also advised the employee of his right to a Skelly hearing and that the manager would serve as the Skelly hearing officer. The court of appeal found that this procedure did not violate the employee's due-process rights. The court observed that there is no authority precluding an officer from recommending discipline and acting as hearing officer in the same case. The court also found it significant that after the Skelly hearing, two more stages of administrative review occurred: (1) a full evidentiary hearing before a neutral hearing examiner appointed by the Board, and (2) a review of the hearing examiner's decision by the Board itself. The court concluded that, at least when these additional levels of administrative review are present, the conduct of the Skelly hearing by the manager who initially recommended discharge does not violate the employee's due-process rights (148 Cal. App. 4th 272, 281-283) .

§ 36.23 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate to Nullify Administrative Decision--Discipline of Civil Service Employee--Open Session of Civil Service Commission or Board Not Required [Gov. Code § 54957]

[The following may be included in a memorandum opposing a petition for mandate, or in a trial or appellate brief.]

THE _____ [CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION or identify board or agency] MAY CONSIDER WHETHER TO DISCIPLINE AN EMPLOYEE IN A CLOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION, AND THE EMPLOYEE'S RIGHT TO REQUEST AN OPEN SESSION DOES NOT APPLY UNLESS THE _____ [COMMISSION or identify board or agency] IS CONDUCTING AN EVIDENTIARY HEARING ON A SPECIFIC COMPLAINT OR CHARGE AGAINST THE EMPLOYEE.

A. Civil Service Commission or Board May Meet in Closed Session to Make Decisions About Employee Discipline and Other Personnel Matters. Although the California Constitution (Cal. Const., art. I, § 3(b)(1)) and the Ralph M. Brown Act (Gov. Code § 54950 et seq.) generally require local legislative bodies (including civil service commissions) to conduct open sessions, that requirement is subject to a "personnel exception" (Gov. Code § 54957; see Cal. Const., art. I, § 3(b)(5)). Under the personnel exception, a commission may hold a closed session to consider or deliberate whether specific complaints or charges against the employee warrant dismissal or discipline. The employee's right to request an open session applies only if the commission conducts an evidentiary hearing on specific complaints or charges against the employee (Bollinger v. San Diego Civil Serv. Comm'n (1999) 71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 574-575, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 27).

B. Evidentiary Hearing Before Single Hearing Officer Satisfies Requirements of Due Process. The employee's due-process right to be heard prior to the imposition of discipline is satisfied by the use of a single hearing officer whose findings and proposed decision are adopted by the civil service commission (see Gov. Code §§ 11517, 19582); the employee does not have a further right to respond to the hearing officer's report or to be heard by the full commission prior to the commission's adoption of the hearing officer's recommendation (Bollinger v. San Diego Civil Serv. Comm'n (1999) 71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 575-578, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 27).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a public employee's contention that a dismissal or disciplinary action against the employee is void because it was imposed by the local civil service commission or relevant governing board without an open hearing before the full commission or board under the Ralph M. Brown Act (see Gov. Code § 54957). Paragraph A sets forth the proposition that the commission or board may meet in closed sessions to consider and deliberate on personnel matters, including discipline and dismissal, unless it conducts an evidentiary hearing about specific charges. Paragraph B sets forth the proposition that the use of a single hearing officer to conduct evidentiary hearings complies with due process.

[b] Argument

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. The argument should, therefore, establish that the commission or board did not conduct an evidentiary hearing, but merely considered and adopted the recommendations of a hearing officer or panel that conducted an evidentiary hearing.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Civil Service Commission or Board May Meet in Closed Session to Make Decisions About Employee Discipline and Other Personnel Matters

In Bollinger v. San Diego Civil Serv. Comm'n (1999) 71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 575-578, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 27 , a demoted police officer petitioned for a writ of mandate to set aside the civil service commission's ratification of a hearing officer's findings of fact and recommendation that the demotion be upheld. The hearing officer's report was submitted after a three-day noticed public hearing, but the commission ratified the report in a closed session without giving the officer a chance to respond to the report. The trial court declared the commission's action void, holding that the Ralph M. Brown Act (Gov. Code § 54950 et seq.) required the commission to notify the officer of his right to request a public hearing. Gov. Code § 54957 provides that when a local legislative body (such as a civil service commission) meets to hear specific complaints or charges against a public employee, it must give the employee 24-hour written notice of the right to request that the complaints or charges be heard in an open session.

The court of appeal reversed, holding that the employee's right to request an open session applies only when the commission is conducting an evidentiary hearing on specific complaints or charges. In contrast, the right to an open session does not apply when the commission meets solely to consider or deliberate whether the complaints or charges warrant disciplinary action. In support of its reading of the statute, the court pointed to the distinction between the words "consider" and "hear" as used in the statute: the right to an open hearing applies only when the commission "hears" charges, but not when it "considers" discipline or dismissal (71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 574-575).

[b] Evidentiary Hearing Before Single Hearing Officer Satisfies Requirements of Due Process

The facts and procedural background of Bollinger v. San Diego Civil Serv. Comm'n (1999) 71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 575-578, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 27 , are discussed in § 36.23[3][a]. The court of appeal acknowledged that the officer, a tenured public employee, was entitled to due process in the disciplinary proceedings. The minimum standards of due process require that, prior to the imposition of discipline, a public employee receive (1) notice of the disciplinary action proposed, (2) the grounds for the discipline, (3) the charges and materials on which the disciplinary action is based, an

(4) the opportunity to respond in opposition to the proposed disciplinary action. The opportunity to respond, however, need not be before the full civil service commission; the use of a single hearing officer, whose findings and recommendation are adopted by the commission, complies with due process (71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 575-576). It is only when the full commission reviews the evidence itself that the employee has a right to an open hearing before the commission. The court pointed out that the Administrative Procedure Act and the Civil Service Act provide for such procedures on the state level, requiring a hearing before the full agency only if the agency does not adopt the hearing officer's recommendation and reviews the evidence itself (71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 576-577 ; see Gov. Code §§ 11517, 19582). Finally, the court noted that, although not required by minimal due-process standards, the better practice would be for the commission to give the employee an opportunity to respond orally or in writing to the hearing officer's report before the commission makes its final decision (71 Cal. App. 4th 568, 577).

§ 36.24 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate to Review Administrative Decision--Layoff of Public Employees--Due Process Requirements--No Predeprivation Hearing Required for Employee Who Accepts Demotion in Lieu of Layoff

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or in a trial or appellate brief.]

DUE PROCESS DOES NOT REQUIRE A PREDEPRIVATION HEARING FOR A PUBLIC EMPLOYEE WHO ACCEPTS A DEMOTION IN LIEU OF A LAYOFF.

Predeprivation Hearing Not Required for Public Employee Who Accepts Demotion in Lieu of Layoff. When a public agency determines that it must lay off employees because of a fiscal crisis and the layoffs based on seniority, a permanent employee who accepts a demotion in lieu of being laid off does not have a due-process right to a predemotion hearing. A postdemotion right to appeal the layoff decision is sufficient to meet the requirements of due process (Duncan v. Department of Personnel Admin. (2000) 77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1175-1183, 92 Cal. Rptr. 2d 257).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a contention that an employee who has accepted a demotion in lieu of a layoff should have been given a predemotion hearing. In an appropriate case, these points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to the contention supported by the points and authorities set forth in § 36.21.

[b] Argument

such as seniority (see Duncan v. Department of Personnel Admin. (2000) 77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1180-1182, 92 Cal. Rptr. 2d 257).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Predeprivation Hearing Not Required for Public Employee Who Accepts Demotion in Lieu of Layoff

In Duncan v. Department of Personnel Admin. (2000) 92 Cal. Rptr. 2d 257 , the plaintiff was an employee of the California Department of Insurance, working for six years as an associate life actuary. In 1996, the Department informed its employees that a budgetary crisis would necessitate layoffs. The Department also obtained the approval from the Department of Personnel Administration for the layoffs, which would be based on seniority.

Subsequently, the Department of Insurance notified the plaintiff that he would be laid off, but that his seniority score gave him the option of accepting a demotion instead of the layoff. The notice also informed the plaintiff of his right to appeal the layoff decision to the Department of Personnel Administration (see Gov. Code § 19997.14).

The plaintiff decided to accept a demotion to the position of senior actuarial statistician, which involved a reduction of his monthly salary by $1,508. He also exercised his right to appeal the layoff/demotion. The Department of Personnel Administration ultimately sustained the demotion, and the plaintiff filed a petition for a writ of mandate, alleging that his layoff was procedurally deficient and substantively wrong. The trial court denied the petition, and the plaintiff appealed.

On appeal, the plaintiff contended that the state had violated his right to due process by not providing a pre-layoff hearing at which he could challenge the layoff decision. The plaintiff also contended that the layoff decision was substantively wrong.

The court of appeal dealt first with the due process issue, noting that it rested on two premises. The first premise was that, as a permanent civil service employee, the plaintiff had a constitutionally protected property interest in his continuing employment as an associate life actuary. The second premise was that the plaintiff had been forced to accept a demotion because the state improperly denied him an opportunity to challenge the layoff decision before it became effective. The court of appeal agreed with the plaintiff's first contention, noting the well-established rule that permanent civil servant has a protectible property interest that the state cannot take away without satisfying due process (77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1175-1178).

However, the court of appeal rejected the plaintiff's contention that due process required a predeprivation hearing in this case. In making its determination of what kind of hearing was required by due process, the court of appeal applied the three-factor balancing test enunciated by the United States Supreme Court in Gilbert v. Homar (1997) 520 U.S. 924, 117 S. Ct. 1807, 138 L. Ed. 2d 120 . Those three factors are (1) the private interest that will be affected by the official action (in this case, the layoff); (2) the risk of an erroneous deprivation of the plaintiff's property interest through the procedure used, and the probable value, if any, of additional or substitute safeguards such as a predeprivation hearing; and (3) the government's interest (77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1179-1180).

On the first factor--the nature of the plaintiff's interest--the court of appeal opined that the plaintiff's interest in retaining employment was of little significance in this case, since the plaintiff remained employed (albeit in a lower-paid position) by virtue of his decision to accept the demotion. The court also noted that a layoff, like a resignation, carries no stigma that would impair a dismissed employee's future job prospects. A layoff, unlike a punitive termination for misconduct, is the result of financial exigency, not the actions of the employee. The court concluded, therefore, that in this case the plaintiff's interests were less of a concern than those of an employee who faces punitive discipline (77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1180-1181).

On the second factor--the risk of an erroneous deprivation through the procedure used, and the probable value of additional safeguards--the court of appeal found that the scale tipped in favor of the state. In contrast to disciplinary matters, which usually focus on the actions of a single employee, a layoff is based on the "big picture," that is, an extensive, time-consuming examination of the department or agency involved. Further, layoffs are generally based on seniority; the use of such objective criteria lessens the chance of an erroneous prehearing decision regarding a particular employee. In this case, given that the layoffs were based on objective criteria (seniority), that the Department of Insurance had expended significant resources in furtherance of the layoff plan, and that a second government entity (the Department of Personnel Administration) had reviewed and approved the layoff plan, it was unlikely that a pre-layoff hearing would have reduced the risk, if any, of error (77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1181-1182).

The court of appeal also found that the third factor--the government's interest--favored the state. The court observed that in a time of financial crisis, the state has a significant interest in taking quick steps to resolve its economic problems. It is one thing to require a predeprivation hearing for a single employee who faces demotion because of misconduct; it is quite another thing to require pre-layoff hearings for a multitude of employees in the midst of a financial crisis. Group hearings would probably not be adequate, since each employee would want to explain why his or her particular position should not be eliminated or why he or she is more deserving of retention than others. The court remarked that the expense of such hearings could worsen the financial crisis and, ironically, increase the number of layoffs (77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1182-1183).

Accordingly, the court of appeal concluded that due process did not require a predeprivation hearing in this case, and the trial court had properly denied the plaintiff's petition for a writ of administrative mandate (77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1183). In an unpublished portion of its opinion, the court went on to reject the plaintiff's contention that the layoff decision was substantively wrong (77 Cal. App. 4th 1166, 1184).

§ 36.25 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate to Review Administrative Decision--Placement of Negative Memorandum in Officer's Personnel File--Due Process Requirements--No Right to Full Evidentiary Hearing

[The following may be included in a memorandum of points and authorities, or in a trial or appellate brief.]

DUE PROCESS DOES NOT REQUIRE THAT THE RESPONDENT PROVIDE THE PETITIONER WITH A FULL EVIDENTIARY HEARING UNDER THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THIS CASE, IN WHICH THE RESPONDENT'S ACTION HAS NOT RESULTED IN ANY DEMOTION, TRANSFER, PAY REDUCTION, OR OTHER ADVERSE CONSEQUENCE FOR THE PETITIONER.

Administrative Appeal Procedures Must be Tailored to Due-Process Need in Particular Case. The placement of a written memorandum in a peace officer's personnel file to be considered in a future performance review is the lowest level of discipline an employer can impose, and it triggers only minimal due-process requirements. Thus, a peace officer need not be afforded the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses during a hearing on a challenge to a memorandum that has not resulted in any demotion, transfer, pay reduction, or other adverse consequence (James v. City of Coronado (2003) 106 Cal. App. 4th 905, 910-913, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 85).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This form of points and authorities may be used to oppose a contention that a peace officer is entitled to a full evidentiary hearing challenging a negative memorandum that has been placed in the officer's personnel file. In an appropriate case, this form of points and authorities may be used in opposition to the points and authorities set forth in § 36.21.

[b] Argument

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should establish that the placement of the memorandum in the officer's personnel file has not resulted in any demotion, transfer, pay reduction, or other adverse consequence to the officer.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Administrative Appeal Procedures Must be Tailored to Due-Process Need in Particular Case

In James v. City of Coronado (2003) 106 Cal. App. 4th 905, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 85 , a police department investigated unrelated complaints against two of its permanent police officers. One officer was determined to have opened a parcel not addressed to him and to have entered and removed property from the locked office of a fellow employee. Based on this information, the police chief issued a memorandum stating that the incidents were "a matter for formal counseling rather than discipline," and that "[a]ny recurrence of this or similar conduct would require severe disciplinary action that could include termination. Therefore, a copy of this memorandum shall be included with the [officer's] counseling documentation and should become a part of the next evaluation of this officer."

The other officer was determined to have submitted a request for overtime pay without the necessary prior authorization for that work. Regarding this officer, the police chief issued a memorandum stating that "[t]here is strong evidence to support making this a matter for discipline. However, ... I will allow it to be handled as a matter for evaluation provided this memorandum is included as a part of the [officer's] next evaluation."

The police department denied the officers' requests for administrative appeals to challenge the memoranda. The officers then filed a petition for a writ of mandamus (see Code Civ. Proc. § 1085) to compel the department to provide an administrative appeal. The superior court granted the petition and ordered the department to provide an evidentiary hearing before a neutral fact finder with the burden of proof on the department. The court ruled, however, that at the hearing the officers would be entitled to introduce evidence (mainly, their own testimony) but not to confront and cross-examine witnesses. The officers appealed, contending that under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3300 et seq.) their administrative appeals necessarily included the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses (Gov. Code § 3304(b)).

The court of appeal affirmed the trial court's judgment. The court acknowledged that the Bill of Rights Act provides that no punitive action or denial of promotion on grounds other than merit may be undertaken by any public agency without providing the officer with an opportunity for administrative appeal (Gov. Code § 3304(b)). To trigger an officer's right to an administrative appeal, it is not necessary that an adverse employment consequence have already occurred or even be likely to occur; a possibility of future adverse consequences is sufficient. Thus, written criticisms of an officer's performance trigger administrative appeal rights if they may hinder advancement or cause other adverse consequences in the future (106 Cal. App. 4th 905, 909).

The court of appeal went on to note that in general, the local employing agency should formulate the procedural details for implementing officers' administrative appeal rights. However, when, as in this case, the scope of the administrative appeal hearing is not prescribed by personnel rules, agency regulations, memoranda of understanding, or customary agency practices, the adequacy of the appeal procedure afforded is measured according to constitutional due-process principles. The court observed that due process--the opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner--does not require a trial-like hearing in every instance. Rather, the requirements of due process vary according to the specific context. Thus, in considering the due-process protections owed under the Public Safety Officers

Procedural Bill of Rights Act, courts make distinctions based on the officers' status and the type of punitive action imposed. For example, in a general fact-finding investigation (as opposed to an adjudicative proceeding that will make a binding determination affecting the rights of individuals), due process does not require that the full panoply of judicial procedures be used (106 Cal. App. 4th 905, 909-911).

Applying these due-process principles in this case, the court of appeal rejected the notion that as a matter of law every administrative appeal under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act requires a formal hearing accompanied by the full rights of confrontation and cross-examination. The court concluded that the officers were not entitled to confront and cross-examine witnesses during the hearings on their administrative appeals. Although the officers were permanent employees, they had suffered no demotion, transfer, pay reduction, or other adverse consequence. Indeed, the placement of written memoranda in the officers' personnel files for consideration in future performance reviews was the lowest level of discipline that could be imposed, and the department had made no binding determination affecting the legal rights of the officers. Therefore, the full panoply of judicial procedures was not required (106 Cal. App. 4th 905, 912-913).

§ 36.25A Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate to Review Discipline of Public Safety Officer--Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act Inapplicable to Criminal Investigation

[The following may be included in a memorandum opposing a petition for mandate or in an appellate brief.]

DUE PROCESS DOES NOT REQUIRE THAT THE RESPONDENT AFFORD THE PETITIONER THE FULL RANGE OF RIGHTS PROVIDED UNDER THE PUBLIC SAFETY OFFICERS PROCEDURAL BILL OF RIGHTS ACT, BECAUSE THE DISCIPLINE IMPOSED ON THE PETITIONER IS BASED ON INFORMATION GAINED IN THE COURSE OF A BONA FIDE CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION OF THE PETITIONER.

Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act Does Not Apply to Criminal Investigations. The Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3300 et seq.) provides procedural protections when a peace officer is interrogated in the course of an administrative investigation that might subject the officer to punitive action (Gov. Code § 3303). However, the Act does not apply to cover an investigation concerned solely and directly with alleged criminal activities (Gov. Code § 3303(i)). Thus, the Act's protections do not apply to officers subject to criminal investigations conducted by their employers (Van Winkle v. County of Ventura (2007) 158 Cal. App. 4th 492, 497-498, 69 Cal. Rptr. 3d 809).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This form may be used to oppose a contention that a peace officer is entitled to the protections of the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3300 et seq.). In an appropriate case, this form may be used in opposition to the form set forth in § 36.21.

[b] Argument

stated. Thus, counsel should establish that the discipline imposed on the officer is the result of information gained through an independent, bona fide criminal investigation of the officer's activity rather than an administrative investigation.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act Does Not Apply to Criminal Investigations

In Van Winkle v. County of Ventura (2007) 158 Cal. App. 4th 492, 69 Cal. Rptr. 3d 809 , the county sheriff's department's internal affairs unit began investigating a citizen complaint that an officer was conducting an extramarital affair while on duty. When the internal affairs unit uncovered evidence that the officer had committed a criminal offense, embezzlement of firearms, the matter was referred to the department's major crimes bureau. The ensuing criminal investigation led to the arrest of the officer, who then waived his Miranda rights and admitted taking home a firearm that had been brought to the sheriff's department for destruction. The district attorney declined to prosecute, but the sheriff's department terminated the officer's employment.

The officer filed a superior court petition for injunctive relief under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act, alleging that the county had violated the Act by (1) obtaining statements from him during the criminal investigation without first giving him the advisements required by that Act (see Gov. Code § 3303), and (2) attempting to use statements he made during the criminal investigation to support the decision to fire him. He sought to enjoin the county from taking any disciplinary action against him or from using statements he made during the criminal investigation in his civil service hearing (see Gov. Code § 3309.5).

The trial court enjoined the county from using the officer's statements made in the custodial interrogation in any administrative proceeding, except for impeachment purposes.

The court of appeal reversed, holding that the protections of the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act were inapplicable to the criminal investigation. The court explained that the Act is a labor relations statute that provides procedural protections for police officers during administrative and disciplinary actions initiated by their employers. The Act does not apply, however, to an investigation concerned solely and directly with alleged criminal activities (Gov. Code § 3303(i)) (158 Cal. App. 4th 492, 497) .

The court of appeal emphasized that the criminal investigation in this case was entirely separate from the administrative investigation of the citizen complaint. Further, the officer made no claim that the criminal investigation was conducted as a sham conducted to further a disciplinary investigation. Also, the sheriff's department's major crimes bureau, which conducted the criminal investigation, had no authority to conduct administrative investigations or to make recommendations regarding discipline (158 Cal. App. 4th 492, 498) .

The court of appeal rejected a contention that the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act's exclusion for criminal investigations applies only to criminal investigations conducted by outside agencies. The language of the exclusion does not support such an interpretation: it simply excludes "an investigation concerned solely and directly with alleged criminal activities" (Gov. Code § 3303(i)) (158 Cal. App. 4th 492, 498-501) .

This form may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a State Personnel Board decision imposing discipline on a state civil service employee. This form is for use if the Board imposes discipline on an employee, but the employee and the relevant state agency have entered into a settlement agreement under which the agency agrees to withdraw its disciplinary action against the employee and the employee agrees to withdraw his or her appeal.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Withdrawal of Adverse Action and Appeal Pursuant to Settlement Deprives Board of Jurisdiction

The petitioner in Larson v. State Personnel Board (1994) 28 Cal. App. 4th 265, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 412 , was employed by the Department of Developmental Services (DDS) as a teacher at a state facility for the developmentally disabled. The DDS terminated petitioner's employment based on his alleged sexual molestation of clients at the facility, and petitioner appealed to the State Personnel Board (Board). On the day that the appeal was to be heard by an administrative law judge (ALJ), petitioner and the DDS entered into a written settlement agreement under which the DDS agreed to withdraw its termination of petitioner's employment and reinstate petitioner's employment under certain conditions. In return, petitioner agreed to withdraw his appeal. The parties informed the ALJ of the settlement, but the ALJ took the position that it was up to the Board to determine whether or not to permit the withdrawal. The ALJ then submitted a proposed decision to the Board (1) disapproving the DDS's attempted withdrawal of its adverse action against petitioner and disapproving petitioner's attempted withdrawal of his appeal; (2) referring the matter to the Board's hearing office for a new hearing on the merits of the appeal, or in the alternative, submission of a settlement agreement to the Board for approval; and (3) maintaining petitioner's status as a dismissed employee pending final disposition of the appeal. The Board adopted the ALJ's decision as its own. Petitioner sought a writ of mandate to compel the Board to set aside its decision. The superior court granted the writ, and the Board appealed.

The court of appeal affirmed the judgment granting the writ. The Board contended that the parties could not withdraw from the proceeding without the Board's approval. The Board relied on Gov. Code § 18681, which provides: "Whenever any matter is pending before the Personnel Board involving a dispute between one or more employees and an appointing power and the parties to such dispute agree upon a settlement or adjustment thereof, the terms of such settlement or adjustment may be submitted to the board, and if approved by the board, the disposition of the matter in accordance with the terms of such adjustment or settlement shall become final and binding upon the parties" (emphasis added). The Board argued that while the word "may" usually implies permissiveness (28 Cal. App. 4th 265, 276), in this case it should be construed to be mandatory because otherwise parties could have a "final and binding agreement" regardless of whether or not they submitted the agreement for approval. No party would ever submit a settlement for approval and risk rejection. The Board argued that this result would undermine the purpose of § 18681, which the Board claimed was to provide Board supervision over settlement agreements to ensure consistency with merit principles (28 Cal. App. 4th 265, 277). The court rejected the Board's contention, noting that it could find no authority conditioning withdrawal of a state agency's adverse action or an appeal on Board approval. The court observed that Gov. Code § 18681 governs the presentation of settlement agreements to the Board and that it is couched in permissive language. Furthermore, Gov. Code § 19579 permits employees, employers, or their representatives to withdraw actions or appeals (simply by failing to proceed at the hearing) and that the statute does not expressly condition such withdrawals on Board approval. Thus, the court concluded, a logical reading and construction of these statutes posed no bar to the procedure proposed by the DDS and the petitioner in this case (28 Cal. App. 4th 265, 279). The court could see no reason why, if both parties reach an agreement or resolution and wish to withdraw from further proceedings before the Board, they should be precluded from doing so (28 Cal. App. 4th 265, 280-281). Thus, the court concluded that the lower court had properly held that the parties could withdraw from the Board hearing and that the Board acted officiously and in excess of its jurisdiction when it rendered its decision in this matter (28 Cal. App. 4th 265, 280).

[Caption. See § 36.20.]

THE COURT SHOULD GRANT A WRIT OF MANDATE DIRECTING _____ [specify relevant public employer or agency] TO SET ASIDE ITS DECISION IMPOSING DISCIPLINE ON PETITIONER BECAUSE (1) THE DISCIPLINE WAS BASED ON PETITIONER'S EXERCISE OF HIS/HER CONSTITUTIONALLY PROTECTED INTEREST, AS A CITIZEN, IN COMMENTING ON MATTERS OF PUBLIC CONCERN, NAMELY _____ [specify matter(s) of public concern]; AND (2) PETITIONER'S INTEREST IS NOT OUTWEIGHED IN THIS CASE BY ANY INTEREST OF _____ [specify relevant public employer or agency], AS PETITIONER'S EMPLOYER, IN PROMOTING THE EFFICIENCY OF THE PUBLIC SERVICES IT PERFORMS THROUGH ITS EMPLOYEES.

A-E. Propriety of Mandate to Review Discipline of Employee. [See § 36.20, Paragraphs A-E.]

F. Protection From Discipline for Exercise of First Amendment Rights. The First Amendment prohibits a public employer from disciplining an employee for commenting on matters of public concern unless the employer establishes that the employee's interest in commenting on matters of public concern is outweighed by the public employer's interest in promoting the efficiency of the services it performs through its employees (see Connick v. Myers (1983) 461 U.S. 138, 142, 103 S. Ct. 1684, 75 L. Ed. 2d 708 ; Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420, 422, 426).

G. What Constitutes Matter of Public Concern. Speech involves a matter of public concern when it can be fairly considered to relate to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community. Misuse of public funds, wastefulness, and inefficiency in managing and operating government entities are examples of matters of inherent public concern (Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420, 422, 425).

[Optional] H. Even Recklessly False Statements May Be Protected. Recklessly false statements are not per se unprotected by the First Amendment when they substantially relate to matters of public concern. Instead, the recklessness of the employee and the falseness of the statements should be considered in light of the public employer's showing of actual injury to its legitimate interests, as part of the balancing required to determine if the employer's interests outweigh the employee's (Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420, 424).

[Optional] I. Mere Disruption Insufficient to Defeat First Amendment Rights. A public employee's interest in commenting on matters of public concern is not outweighed by the mere fact that his or her statements may cause disruption to the workplace (Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420, 427).

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission discharging a civil service employee if the conduct of the employee involves the exercise of his or her First Amendment interest in commenting on matters of public concern and there is no countervailing legitimate interest of the public employer that outweighs the employee's interest.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. For example, counsel should refer to facts in the record establishing that petitioner's conduct consisted of statements about matters of public concern. Counsel should identify the particular public concerns to which the petitioner's statements relate. Furthermore, counsel should set forth argument showing that the public employer has not established any legitimate interest that outweighs the petitioner's interest in commenting on matters of public concern.

[b] Opposing Points and Authorities

In an appropriate case these points and authorities may be adapted and submitted in opposition to the points and authorities set out in § 36.28.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Protection From Discipline for Exercise of First Amendment Rights

In Connick v. Myers (1983) 461 U.S. 138, 142, 103 S. Ct. 1684, 75 L. Ed. 2d 708 , plaintiff, an assistant district attorney, was fired for allegedly refusing to accept a transfer. Plaintiff filed suit against the district attorney's office under federal civil rights laws, claiming that the real reason for the termination of her employment was because she had exercised her constitutional right of free speech by distributing a questionnaire to fellow staff members about various matters pertaining to the district attorney's office (e.g., office transfer policy, employee morale, employee confidence in supervisors, the need for a grievance committee). The district court entered judgment for the plaintiff, finding that the distribution of the questionnaire was the real reason for plaintiff's dismissal, that the questionnaire involved matters of public concern, and that the district attorney had not clearly demonstrated that plaintiff's survey "substantially interfered" with the operation of the district attorney's office. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court's judgment, and the United States Supreme Court granted certiorari to review the Fifth Circuit's decision.

Although it reversed the judgment for plaintiff, the Supreme Court observed the settled rule that a state cannot condition public employment on a basis that infringes the employee's constitutionally protected interest in freedom of expression. Citing Pickering v. Board of Education (1968) 391 U.S. 563, 568, 88 S. Ct. 1731, 20 L. Ed. 2d 811 , the Court in Connick stated that its task in such cases is to seek a balance between the interests of the employee, as a citizen, in commenting on matters of public concern, and the interest of the state, as employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees (461 U.S. 138, 142). After reviewing previous Supreme Court decisions concerning the First Amendment rights of public employees, the Court emphasized that when employee expression cannot fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community, government officials should enjoy wide latitude in managing their offices, without intrusive oversight by the judiciary in the name of the First Amendment (461 U.S. 138, 146). Examining the questionnaire involved in Connick, the Court concluded that one of the questions (whether employees ever felt pressured to work on behalf of office-supported candidates) touched on a matter of public concern (461 U.S. 138, 149). However, after balancing the plaintiff's interest in commenting on this matter of public concern against her employer's legitimate interests, the Court concluded that the First Amendment interest involved in this case did not require that the district attorney tolerate action that he reasonably believed would disrupt the office, undermine his authority, and destroy close working relationships. The Court therefore held that plaintiff's discharge did not offend the First Amendment (461 U.S. 138, 154). In so holding, the Court rejected the test applied by the district court, which required the public employer to clearly demonstrate that the speech involved substantially interfered with official responsibilities. The Court instead held that the government's burden varies depending on the nature of the employee's expression, and that a particularized balancing of competing interests is required (461 U.S. 138, 149-150).

Plaintiff in Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420 , was an administrative assistant to the manager of a county fair. Plaintiff was fired from her position after making various statements to her coworkers and others accusing her supervisor of mismanagement and possible criminal conduct in connection with the fair. Plaintiff then sued the county and others for civil rights violations, alleging she had been terminated in retaliation for her exercise of First Amendment rights. The district court ruled that plaintiff's statements were not protected by the First Amendment and entered summary judgment for defendants.

On appeal, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals vacated the summary judgment and remanded the case. The court initially noted that, to prevail in her First Amendment claim, plaintiff must initially prove that her statements were constitutionally protected. The court observed that plaintiff's speech cannot be constitutionally protected unless it substantially involved matters of public concern. If plaintiff is able to show that the statements were of public concern, then the burden is shifted to the county to show that its legitimate administrative interests outweigh the First Amendment interests in plaintiff's freedom of speech (48 F.3d 420, 422). The court concluded that there were material issues of fact regarding both (1) whether plaintiff's speech involved matters of public concern (48 F.3d 420, 425-426); and (2) whether plaintiff's free speech interests were outweighed by the county's legitimate administrative interests (48 F.3d 420, 426-427). Therefore, the appellate court held that the district court had erred in entering a summary judgment against plaintiff.

[b] What Constitutes Matter of Public Concern

The facts and procedural background of Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420 , are discussed in § 36.27[3][a]. In granting summary judgment for defendants, the district court had held that plaintiff's statements were not protected by the First Amendment because they did not involve matters of public concern. The Ninth Circuit noted that speech involves a matter of public concern when it can fairly be considered to relate to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community. Whether an employee's speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the content, form, and context of a given statement, as revealed by the whole record (48 F.3d 420, 422). The court further observed that its previous decisions have stated that misuse of public funds, wastefulness, and inefficiency in managing and operating government entities are matters of inherent public concern and that the plaintiff's statements were precisely of this type (48 F.3d 420, 425). The appellate court disagreed with the district court's finding that plaintiff's statements were merely about personnel disputes and grievances and therefore were not entitled to First Amendment protection (48 F.3d 420, 425). The court also rejected the county's argument that plaintiff's statements were not protected because they were motivated by plaintiff's private grudge against her boss and not by an intent to protect the public or bring wrongdoing to light. While the court conceded that a plaintiff's motivation may be relevant to whether or not the statements were a matter of public concern, the court noted that the relevant facts concerning plaintiff's motivation in this case were in dispute and therefore held that the district court erred in granting summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff's statements were not of public concern (48 F.3d 420, 425-426).

[c] Even Recklessly False Statements May Be Protected

The facts and procedural background of Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420 , are discussed in § 36.27[3][a]. In reversing a summary judgment for defendants, the Ninth Circuit rejected defendants' contention that plaintiff's statements were per se unprotected by the First Amendment because they were false and made with reckless disregard for the truth and therefore did not qualify as statements relating to matters of public concern (48 F.3d 420, 422). The Ninth Circuit observed that the U.S. Supreme Court had expressly declined to decide what First Amendment protection was to be afforded to recklessly false statements and that the other circuits were split as to whether recklessly false statements are per se unprotected or whether the recklessness is simply one of the factors to be considered in the balancing of interests (48 F.3d 420, 423). The court found the latter cases were more persuasive because of the danger that stripping all First Amendment protection from recklessly false statements would inhibit the flow of accurate information from public employees who are uncertain about whether they have accumulated a legally sufficient factual basis for their statements. The court therefore concluded that recklessly false statements are not per se unprotected by the First Amendment when they substantially relate to matters of public concern. Instead, the recklessness of the employee and the falseness of the statements should be considered in light of the public employer's showing of actual injury to its legitimate interests, as part of the balancing test for determining whether the statements are protected (48 F.3d 420, 424).

[d] Mere Disruption Insufficient to Defeat First Amendment Rights

The facts and procedural background of Johnson v. Multnomah County, Or. (9th Cir. 1995) 48 F.3d 420 , are discussed in § 36.27[3][a]. After holding that the district court had erred in granting summary judgment for defendant county on the ground that plaintiff's statements did not involve matters of public concern, the Ninth Circuit noted that the county could nevertheless be entitled to summary judgment if it showed that the speech so severely damaged office harmony and working relationships that the government's interest in promoting an effective workplace outweighs the employee's First Amendment rights. The court first rejected the county's contention that its interests outweighed plaintiff's because plaintiff's statements were recklessly false and therefore entitled to very little First Amendment protection. The court concluded that summary judgment on this ground was precluded because the record did not establish as a matter of law that plaintiff's statements were either false or reckless (48 F.3d 420, 426-427). The county further argued that even if the statements were of public concern and that plaintiff possessed proof of wrongdoing, her free speech interest would still be outweighed by the county's interest in avoiding disruption in the workplace. The court rejected this argument, holding that the county must do more than show mere disruption; it must show actual injury to its legitimate interests. The court observed that the county does not have a legitimate interest in covering up mismanagement or corruption and cannot justify retaliation against whistleblowers as a legitimate means of avoiding the disruption that necessarily accompanies such exposure. Nor, stated the court, are the county's legitimate interests injured if plaintiff's supervisor was undermined by truthful statements exposing his own wrongdoing. Because the court was required to presume that plaintiff's allegations were true for purposes of summary judgment, the court held that the county's showing of disruption was insufficient to entitle it to summary judgment on the ground that its legitimate administrative interests outweigh the First Amendment interests in plaintiff's freedom of speech (48 F.3d 420, 427).

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Protection From Discipline for Exercise of First Amendment Rights

The petitioner in Gray v. County of Tulare (1995) 32 Cal. App. 4th 1079, 38 Cal. Rptr. 2d 317 , was a captain in the county sheriff's department who was fired after making critical comments about the sheriff in local newspapers. Petitioner sought a writ of mandate from the superior court directing the county to set aside the dismissal. The superior court granted the writ, finding petitioner's comments were protected by the First Amendment, and the county appealed. On appeal, the court of appeal noted the well-established rule that the First Amendment protects speech by public employees that involves matters of public concern. However, the court observed, the government as employer has far broader powers to regulate the speech of its employees than it has as sovereign to regulate the speech of citizens in general (32 Cal. App. 4th 1079, 1089). The court stated that in determining whether a dismissal impermissibly infringed on a public employee's First Amendment rights, the threshold question is whether the employee's speech related to a matter of public concern (32 Cal. App. 4th 1079, 1089-1090). If so, the court must then balance the interests of the employee, as citizen, in commenting on matters of public concern and the interest of the state, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services that it performs through its employees. The court stated that the ultimate issue of whether the employee's speech is protected is a question of law and that both steps in the two-pronged analysis are subject to the court's independent review on appeal (32 Cal. App. 4th 1079, 1090). The court then held that the petitioner's statements did address issues of public concern, namely misuse of public resources to punish public entities (32 Cal. App. 4th 1079, 1090-1091), but that, on balance, the sheriff's interest in maintaining order and discipline within the department outweighed the petitioner's free speech interests. Therefore, the court reversed the judgment in favor of petitioner (32 Cal. App. 4th 1079, 1091-1096).

In Young v. County of Marin (1987) 195 Cal. App. 3d 863, 241 Cal. Rptr. 169 , an appointed county public defender sued the county for wrongful termination and libel, alleging, inter alia, that she was fired for exercising her First Amendment rights of free speech. The court of appeal reversed the trial court's sustaining of the county's demurrer to the complaint with respect to the wrongful termination cause of action. The court held that First Amendment rights protect a public officer, as well as a public employee, pursuant to certain balancing factors, and also protects an at-will officer or employee (195 Cal. App. 3d 863, 868-869). (The court sustained the demurrer with respect to the libel cause of action on grounds of privilege.)

[b] What Constitutes Matter of Public Concern

The plaintiff in Lambert v. Richard (9th Cir. 1995) 59 F.3d 134 , sued a city, its city manager, and the head of its library department (Richard) for federal civil rights violations after plaintiff was fired from her position as a library employee. Plaintiff was fired because of remarks she made at a city council meeting, appearing on behalf of the city employees association, in which she questioned Richard's job performance. In affirming a district court judgment in favor of plaintiff, the Ninth Circuit panel noted that to receive First Amendment protection, a public employee's speech must be on a matter of public concern, and the employee's interest in expressing himself or herself on the matter must not be outweighed by any injury that the speech could cause to the state, as his or her employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees. The court further noted that whether an employee's speech addresses a matter of public concern must be determined by the content, form, and context of a given statement, as revealed by the whole record. Speech that focuses solely on internal policy and personnel grievances does not implicate the First Amendment (59 F.3d 134, 136).

Examining the remarks made by plaintiff, the court noted that there was no question that Richard's management style had become an issue of public concern even before plaintiff spoke to the city council. Given that the library is among the most visible of functions performed by city governments, the court observed that plaintiff had a constitutional right--and perhaps a civic duty--to inform the council if library service was jeopardized by poor management at the top. The court concluded that plaintiff's remarks were clearly protected and that the city officials who fired her were therefore not entitled to qualified immunity from liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (59 F.3d 134, 136-137).

PETITIONER'S EXPRESSION INVOLVING AN INTRAGOVERNMENTAL DISPUTE WAS NOT PROTECTED SPEECH.

A. No Free-Speech Protection When Employee Is Expressing Views As an Employee, Not As a Concerned Citizen. A balancing of governmental interest in effective working relationships and an employee's interest in expression on matters of public concern requires allowing termination of employees who speak principally in their official role, not as concerned citizens, when the manner and content of their speech threatens to disrupt an agency's effectiveness (Garcetti v. Ceballos (2006) 547 U.S. 410, 418-423, 126 S. Ct. 1951, 164 L. Ed. 2d 689 ; *Kaye v. Board of Trs. of San Diego County Pub. Law Library (2009) 179 Cal. App. 4th 48, 56-59, 101 Cal. [2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This form may be submitted in opposition to a contention that a public employee's termination was in violation of the employee's First Amendment freedom of speech, when the employee was speaking less as a concerned citizen and more in his or her professional role. It should be combined with any of the other forms in this chapter that are applicable to the particular case.

[b] Argument

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case. Counsel should, for example, cite evidence or petitioner's allegations showing that the petitioner's expression concerned an intragovernmental dispute, when petitioner was taking his or her own or his or her agency's side, rather than speaking about public policy as a citizen.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] No Free-Speech Protection When Employee Is Expressing Views As an Employee, Not As a Concerned Citizen.

Garcetti v. Ceballos (2006) 547 U.S. 410, 126 S. Ct. 1951, 164 L. Ed. 2d 689 , was a civil-rights action in which a deputy district attorney alleged that his employer had imposed disciplinary measures on him after he had questioned the legality of an affidavit used to obtain a warrant in one of his cases. The plaintiff claimed that the imposition of the disciplinary measures was a violation of his First-Amendment right to speak on matters of public concern (i.e., possible misconduct by the government). The United States Supreme Court acknowledged that the First Amendment protects a public employee's right to speak as a citizen addressing matters of public concern. So long as public employees are speaking as citizens on matters of public concern, they must face only those speech restrictions that are necessary for their employers to operate efficiently and effectively (547 U.S. 410, 418-419) .

In this case, however, the Supreme Court found that the plaintiff's expressions about the affidavit and search warrant were not made as a citizen. Rather, they were made pursuant to the plaintiff's duties as a deputy district attorney. The Court squarely held that when public employees make statements pursuant to their official duties, the employees are not speaking as citizens for First Amendment purposes, and the Constitution does not insulate their communications from employer discipline (547 U.S. 410, 421-423) .

The plaintiff in Kaye v. Board of Trs. of San Diego County Pub. Law Library (2009) 179 Cal. App. 4th 48, 101 Cal. Rptr. 3d 456 , was a law librarian who was discharged from his employment with a public law library after sending an email criticizing his superiors. The plaintiff sued for wrongful termination, asserting several claims, including a claim that his termination violated the free-speech clause of the California Constitution (see Cal. Const. art. I, § 2(a)). The court of appeal affirmed the trial court's summary adjudication in favor of the employer. The appellate court found the plaintiff's claim under the California Constitution to be analogous to the federal First-Amendment claim rejected by the United States Supreme Court in Garcetti v. Ceballos (2006) 547 U.S. 410, 418-423, 126 S. Ct. 1951, 164 L. Ed. 2d 689 , discussed above. The court of appeal explained that, although the California Constitution's free-speech clause is worded more expansively and has in some circumstances been interpreted to be more protective than the First Amendment, there was no cogent reason to depart from Garcetti's holding under the circumstances of this case. The court noted that as to public-employee free-speech matters, California courts have routinely followed U.S. Supreme Court precedents and have not afforded public employees greater protection than is available under the First Amendment (179 Cal. App. 4th 48, 57-59) .

In Campbell v. State Personnel Bd. (1997) 57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 288-290, 66 Cal. Rptr. 2d 722 , the state's chief structural engineer was demoted within the Office of the State Architect after sending a lengthy letter to a regulatory commission which had some interlocking responsibilities with the Architect's office, as well as oversight over that office in certain functions. The letter excoriated a commissioner for his manner of questioning one of the engineer's subordinates at a public meeting and the other commissioners for allowing the behavior. The letter raised a considerable uproar, leading to several expressions of concern directed to the architect's superiors from commissioners and an influential businessman involved in the affairs of both agencies. The termination followed (57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 284-287). The engineer lost an appeal to the State Personnel Board and was denied administrative mandamus in the superior court.

In reviewing the petitioner's claim that his demotion violated his First Amendment rights, the court of appeal cited Pickering v. Board of Education (1968) 391 U.S. 563, 568, 88 S. Ct. 1731, 20 L. Ed. 2d 811 for the proposition that the determination whether discipline of a public employee for speech--related activities is unconstitutional requires a balance between the interests of the employee, as a citizen, in commenting upon matters of public concern and the interest of the State, as an employer, in promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs through its employees (57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 288). In striking the balance on the facts of this case, the court found that the petitioner was not expressing himself as a citizen, but as a representative of one agency opposed to how another agency was dealing with his. The manner in which he did so threatened his agency's legitimate interest in maintaining a good working relationship with the commission, and his superiors were justified in preventing further damage by removing him from the arena (57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 288-290).

After rejecting a contention that the demotion procedures violated due process, the court affirmed the lower-court denial of mandamus (57 Cal. App. 4th 281, 291-295).

[a] Use of Form

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee when the conduct of the employee does not constitute substantial evidence in support of a statutory cause for discipline. Although none of the cases reviewed actually uses the language of Paragraph F, this rule of law forms the basis for court review of the administrative decisions and is implied in the court holdings.

For a form of memorandum of points and authorities supporting a petition for writ of mandate to review an administrative decision where the question of substantial evidence arises, see Ch. 195, Public Administrative Law in this set.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Cause for Discipline

Shepherd v. State Personnel Bd. (1957) 48 Cal. 2d 41, 307 P.2d 4 , was an appeal by both a civil service employee and the State Personnel Board from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding reviewing the discharge of the employee. The board had made detailed findings and had found that certain causes for discipline existed under Gov. Code § 19572. The superior court determined that there was substantial evidence to support only some of the board's findings and conclusions. The Supreme Court stated on appeal that the findings of the board were not to be disturbed if supported by substantial evidence, but it disapproved the trial court's holdings and ruled that two of the findings of the board which the superior court had upheld were, in fact, fatally defective. The Supreme Court therefore reversed the lower court judgment, but, because several of the grounds on which the board had based its discharge of the employee were not supported by substantial evidence, it also remanded the cause to the board for reconsideration of the penalty imposed (48 Cal. 2d 41, 46-51).

The facts of Neely v. California State Personnel Bd. (1965) 237 Cal. App. 2d 487, 47 Cal. Rptr. 64 , are discussed in § 36.36[4][a]. In reviewing the case, the court of appeal stated that factual determinations of the State Personnel Board are to be upheld by a reviewing court if they are supported by substantial evidence (237 Cal. App. 2d 487, 489).

[b] Substantial Evidence

Pennel v. Pond Union School Dist. (1973) 29 Cal. App. 3d 832, 105 Cal. Rptr. 817 , was an appeal from a judgment of the trial court denying a peremptory writ of mandate to compel plaintiff's reinstatement to a teaching position, and denying payment of salary. Plaintiff had been a first grade probationary teacher for 10 years. For the 11th year, she signed, under protest, a contract to teach the fourth grade. Following the signing of the contract, plaintiff wrote a letter to the district superintendent, stating that she signed the contract unwillingly and under pressure. Plaintiff called in sick at the opening of the school year, and the school board held a meeting the next night, decided that plaintiff had abandoned her position, and hired a replacement. The superior court denied plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate, and it also denied her claim for back salary. The court of appeal reversed the judgment and directed respondent board to pay plaintiff her salary for that school year. The court found, among other things, that there was no substantial evidence to support the findings of the trial court. Defining substantial evidence as evidence of ponderable legal significance, that is, evidence which is reasonable in nature, credible, and of solid value, the court concluded that there was no substantial evidence showing that plaintiff intended to abandon her contract for the school year. Although her actions were equivocal, the court stated that plaintiff did, in fact, sign a contract, and did, in fact, assert an excuse for her nonperformance at the opening of the school year, and that she at no time expressly repudiated her contract or refused to comply with its terms (29 Cal. App. 3d 832, 837-838).

[c] Findings Based Solely on Hearsay to Which Objection Timely Made

Gov. Code § 11513(d) provides that hearsay evidence offered "over timely objection" is not sufficient in itself to support a finding unless it would be admissible over objection in a civil action [Gov. Code § 11513(d)]. The statute further provides that an objection is "timely" if made "before submission of the case or on reconsideration" [Gov. Code § 11513(d)].

[a] Use of Form

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee when the conduct of the employee allegedly constituting inefficiency within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(c) or an applicable local rule was based on a small work output or low level of activity established on the basis of statistical compilations that were not a reasonably reliable indicator of the employee's level of efficiency as compared with that of others performing like duties under like circumstances. Counsel should be aware in using this form that courts have, at times, excluded evidence of what others with comparable duties were doing when such evidence was, in effect, offered as an excuse to inefficient conduct [see Wilson v. State Personnel Bd. (1976) 58 Cal. App. 3d 865, 880-881, 130 Cal. Rptr. 292 , discussed in § 36.30[4][a]]. The courts have also found inefficiency on the basis of comparisons with only two other employees when large scale sampling was impossible because of the specialized nature of the work [see Sweeney v. State Personnel Bd. (1966) 245 Cal. App. 2d 246, 248-252, 53 Cal. Rptr. 766 , discussed in § 36.30[4][a]].

For a general form of memorandum of points and authorities supporting a petition for writ of mandate to review the disciplining of a civil service employee, see § 36.29.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Inefficiency Based on Statistical Comparison Cause for Discipline

Bodenschatz v. State Personnel Bd. (1971) 15 Cal. App. 3d 775, 93 Cal. Rptr. 471 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court denying a peremptory writ of mandate to compel the State Personnel Board to set aside its decision sustaining his dismissal from employment as a traffic officer. The State Personnel Board had found that the employee was inefficient within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(c) in failing to meet departmental standards of enforcement activity. The court of appeal ruled that a low level of activity determined on the basis of statistical compilations based on comparisons made over an extended period of time among law enforcement officers performing comparable duties under comparable conditions was a reasonably reliable indicator of employee inefficiency. The court, therefore, affirmed the judgment of the trial court denying the peremptory writ of mandate (15 Cal. App. 3d 775, 781-784).

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] When Inefficiency Based on Statistical Comparison Cause for Discipline

Wilson v. State Personnel Bd. (1976) 58 Cal. App. 3d 865, 130 Cal. Rptr. 292 , was an appeal by the State Personnel Board from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding ordering the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate commanding the board to set aside and reconsider its decision affirming petitioner's dismissal from employment as a fish and game warden. Petitioner's dismissal had been based on inefficiency, inexcusable neglect of duty, dishonesty, and misuse of state property under Gov. Code § 19572. The superior court found, inter alia, that five of the board's findings could not be sustained and that the remaining findings were not sufficient to satisfy the penalty of dismissal. The court of appeal reviewed the many charges against the petitioner, reinstated all the findings of the board, reversed the superior court judgment, and directed the trial court to deny the writ. Among other things, the court found that the petitioner's late filing of citations was conduct constituting inefficiency, within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(c), even though no specific regulation or rule proscribed late citation filings and other officers may have also been making late citation filings. Because petitioner's conduct was clearly inefficient, the court upheld exclusion of the latter evidence as irrelevant (58 Cal. App. 3d 865, 880-881).

Sweeney v. State Personnel Bd. (1966) 245 Cal. App. 2d 246, 53 Cal. Rptr. 766 , was an appeal by the State Personnel Board from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding. The board had found that the employee, an assistant counsel, should have had a substantially greater output of work and that his review of an average of only four articles of incorporation per hour constituted inefficiency within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(c). The trial court ordered the issuance of a writ of mandate directing the employee's return to his position. The court of appeal reversed the trial court. It ruled that when the work output of an attorney within the state civil service system is substantially smaller than that of other attorneys in the office performing similar duties, the employee is inefficient within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(c), and that a comparison with two other workers was sufficient when the legal staff of the office was small, the work was specialized, and large scale sampling was thus not possible (245 Cal. App. 2d 246, 248-252).

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a professional civil service employee where the conduct of the employee allegedly constituting inefficiency within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(c) or an applicable local rule was based on the employee's professional philosophy of examining relevant factors in addition to those stressed by the employer, and the employee had, in fact, given reasonable attention to the factors considered appropriate by the employer.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Inefficiency Based on Professional Philosophy Cause for Discipline

Walker v. State Personnel Bd. (1971) 16 Cal. App. 3d 550, 94 Cal. Rptr. 132 , was an appeal by the State Personnel Board from a judgment of the trial court setting aside the dismissal of a physician from his position as a psychiatric resident. The board had found that the physician had been discourteous to fellow employees and inefficient, within the meanings of Gov. Code § 19572(m), (c). The trial court found insufficient evidence to support these findings, and it set aside the dismissal. The court of appeal reversed the judgment of the trial court, vacated the decision of the board, and remanded the cause to the board with instructions to enter findings and conclusions in accordance with its opinion and to determine the penalty to be imposed. The court found sufficient evidence to support the board's finding that the physician had been discourteous to fellow employees, but it ruled that the record contained no substantial evidence to support the board's finding that the physician was inefficient. The court stated that the employee's dismissal could not be upheld because his views failed to conform to current dogma on the causes of mental illness. Since the record contained nothing to support the conclusion that the physician did not fully consider all relevant factors in treating his patients, or that any patient suffered because of treatment received, the physician could not be found inefficient merely because he was interested in organic aspects of his patients' illnesses in addition to their psychological dynamics.

[a] When Neglect of Duty Cause for Discipline

Peters v. Mitchell (1963) 222 Cal. App. 2d 852, 35 Cal. Rptr. 535 , is discussed in § 36.20[3][f].

Rapaport v. Civil Serv. Comm'n (1933) 134 Cal. App. 319, 25 P.2d 265 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court. The Civil Service Commission had upheld the discharge of petitioner from his position as an assistant physician at a state hospital, which was based on unprofessional conduct, inefficiency, and neglect of duty. The superior court refused petitioner's petition for a writ of certiorari, and he appealed to the court of appeal. The court reversed the order of the superior court, annulled the commission's order, and remanded the cause to the superior court accordingly. It held that the physician's conduct in accepting payment for services did not amount to unprofessional conduct, that inefficiency was not shown, and that the physician's failure to visit a ward, without an allegation that the public service was impaired and without a showing that the failure was willful, intentional, or inexcusable, did not constitute neglect of duty.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Insubordination Cause for Discipline

Coomes v. State Personnel Bd. (1963) 215 Cal. App. 2d 770, 30 Cal. Rptr. 639 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court denying a writ of mandate. Petitioner, a psychiatric technician in a state hospital, and two other employees, had become involved in a struggle with a patient, and all three employees were discharged. The State Personnel Board found that petitioner had violated a departmental rule concerning treatment of patients and that his conduct constituted insubordination and willful disobedience within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(e). Parallel decisions were made as to the other employees, and all three dismissals were confirmed on rehearing by the board. The court of appeal found that the evidence in the case completely failed to establish knowing insubordination or willful misconduct on petitioner's part. The court stated, among other things, that insubordination implies a general course of mutinous, disrespectful, or contumacious conduct, and excludes the notion of accidental or negligent conduct. The court then found that petitioner had acted as he should have in holding the patient and that petitioner was not liable for the excessive force applied by the other employees unless he knowingly held the patient as their target. In light of the lack of evidence showing that petitioner had so acted, that there was an habitual or expected course of improper controls, or that there was a preconceived plan to subject this patient to blows, the court found no support for the findings and reversed the judgment and directed the trial court to issue a writ of mandate directing the board to annul petitioner's dismissal and to reinstate him in his position.

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee where the conduct of the employee allegedly constitutes dishonesty within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(f) or an applicable local rule, but does not involve bad faith. Counsel should note that Hogg v. Real Estate Comm'r (1942) 54 Cal. App. 2d 712, 129 P.2d 709 , one of the cases cited in support of the point of law set out in Paragraph E, is not a civil service case, but rather an action involving the Real Estate Commissioner and a real estate broker. The court's discussion is made in general terms, however, and the definitions of dishonesty which the case puts forth should apply in a civil service setting.

Where appropriate, counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Dishonesty Cause for Discipline

Gee v. California State Personnel Bd. (1970) 5 Cal. App. 3d 713, 85 Cal. Rptr. 762 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding. The State Personnel Board had sustained the dismissal of the employee for dishonesty and other behavior discrediting the agency or employment. This action occurred following findings by the board that the employee, an auditor in the State Department of Justice, had obtained three on-sale liquor licenses with himself named as the owner of the business when, in fact, others owned the business. The superior court refused his mandate petition, and petitioner appealed. The court of appeal noted that dishonesty denotes a disposition to cheat, deceive, or defraud, and an absence of integrity and ruled that appellant's false statements under oath as to the ownership and operation of two bars and the source of their purchase money constituted dishonesty within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(f). The court affirmed the judgment of dismissal.

Hogg v. Real Estate Comm'r (1942) 54 Cal. App. 2d 712, 129 P.2d 709 , was an appeal by a real estate broker from a judgment of the superior court upholding the respondent commissioner's revocation of his license and dismissing the proceeding. Petitioner's real estate broker's license had been revoked following a complaint by potential home buyers that he had refused to return their down payment. Petitioner filed in superior court a petition for a writ of review, which, by stipulation, was treated as one in mandamus. In reviewing the superior court's dismissal of the proceeding, the court of appeal defined dishonesty, the charge laid against appellant, as fraud, deception, betrayal, and faithlessness. It noted that dishonesty includes the element of bad faith, denotes an absence of integrity, and denotes a disposition to cheat, deceive, defraud, or betray. The court held that appellant could not be found guilty of dishonesty for refusing to pay back a sum of money which in good faith he claimed that he was entitled to retain. The court reversed the judgment of the superior court, holding that petitioner's license was improperly revoked.

[Caption. See § 36.20.]

THE PETITION FOR WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD BE GRANTED BECAUSE RESPONDENT'S ACTION IN DISCIPLINING PETITIONER ON THE GROUND OF IMMORALITY [UNDER GOVERNMENT CODE SECTION 19572(l)] IS UNLAWFUL IN THAT THE CONDUCT FOR WHICH PETITIONER WAS DISCIPLINED DOES NOT INDICATE THAT HE/SHE IS UNFIT TO PERFORM HIS/HER JOB.

A-E. Propriety of Mandate to Review Discipline of Employee. [See § 36.20, Paragraphs A-E.]

F. When Immorality Cause for Discipline. An employee's conduct with regard to immorality does not constitute a proper basis for discipline, [a cause or discipline under Government Code Section 19572(l)], unless it indicates the employee is unfit to perform his or her job (Morrison v. State Bd. of Educ. (1969) 1 Cal. 3d 214, 224-228, 82 Cal. Rptr. 175, 461 P.2d 375).

[Optional] G. Homosexual Status. Discipline of an employee on the basis of homosexuality alone violates the employee's right to equal protection under the California Constitution and the employee's right to engage in protected political activity under Labor Code Sections 1101 and 1102 (Cal. Const., Art. I § 7(a); Gay Law Students Assn. v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. (1979) 24 Cal. 3d 458, 467, 486-489, 156 Cal. Rptr. 14, 595 P.2d 592).

[Optional] H. Homosexual Conduct. Homosexual conduct does not constitute a proper basis for disciplining an employee unless there is a rational nexus between the employee's conduct and harm to the employer (see Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 723-725, 195 Cal. Rptr. 325).

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee for conduct allegedly constituting immorality within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(l) or an applicable local rule when the conduct does not indicate unfitness to perform the job. Morrison v. State Bd. of Educ. (1969) 1 Cal. 3d 214, 82 Cal. Rptr. 175, 461 P.2d 375 , the case cited in support of the point of law in Paragraph F, involved the dismissal of a teacher for immorality under the Education Code, rather than dismissal of a civil service employee under the Government Code. Nevertheless, Morrison is the leading case for the requirement that a person cannot be removed from or denied government employment because of factors totally unconnected with the responsibilities of the job (see Hetherington v. State Personnel Bd. (1978) 82 Cal. App. 3d 582, 592, 147 Cal. Rptr. 300). In reaching its conclusion that the Legislature intended the term "immoral" to depend on and relate to the occupation involved, the Morrison Court noted that the term is used in a wide variety of professional contexts, including state civil service employment pursuant to Gov. Code § 19572(l) (1 Cal. 3d 214, 227) .

Optional Paragraphs G and H may be used when the employee asserts that the disciplinary action was based on his or her status as a homosexual, or on homosexual conduct unrelated to his or her fitness for the job, and therefore was arbitrary within the meaning of the state equal protection clause.

When appropriate, counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Immorality Cause for Discipline

Morrison v. State Bd. of Educ. (1969) 1 Cal. 3d 214, 82 Cal. Rptr. 175, 461 P.2d 375 , was an appeal from a judgment of the superior court denying a petition for a writ of mandate. Respondent board had revoked petitioner's life diplomas for teaching in the public secondary schools of California because of immoral and unprofessional conduct and acts involving moral turpitude as authorized by Educ. Code § 13202. The revocation was based on a one-week long, limited, noncriminal physical relationship which petitioner described as being of a homosexual nature and which occurred during a time of severe emotional stress. The Supreme Court reviewed the superior court's denial of the writ of mandate and reversed its judgment. The Supreme Court stated that in using broad terms such as "immoral and unprofessional conduct" or "moral turpitude" the Legislature did not mean to endow the employing agency with the power to dismiss any employee whose personal, private conduct incurred its disapproval. Conduct cannot be characterized as "immoral," "unprofessional," or "involving moral turpitude" unless that conduct effects a person's performance of his or her job, that is, as in this case, unless that conduct indicates that the person is unfit to teach. The Court held that, in determining whether the teacher's conduct indicated unfitness to teach, the board could consider the following factors: (1) the likelihood that the conduct may have adversely affected students or fellow teachers, (2) the proximity or remoteness in time of the conduct, (3) the extenuating or aggravating circumstances, if any, surrounding the conduct, (5) the praiseworthiness or blameworthiness of the motives resulting in the conduct, and (6) the extent to which disciplinary action may inflict an adverse impact on the constitutional rights of the teacher involved or on those of other teachers. The Court concluded that the record contained no evidence as to the significance and implications of petitioner's single, isolated, and limited homosexual contact, and that the board had failed to show that the incident in any manner affected petitioner's performance as a teacher. The Supreme Court therefore reversed the superior court judgment and remanded the cause to the superior court for further proceedings.

Blake v. State Personnel Bd. (1972) 25 Cal. App. 3d 541, 102 Cal. Rptr. 50 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court denying him a peremptory writ of mandate to compel his reinstatement to his former position as supervising deputy labor commissioner. The petitioner had been dismissed from his position following, among other things, a gun-pointing incident during off-duty hours with two male state-employed attorneys escorting female state-employed attorney in whom petitioner was interested. The court of appeal ruled that the dismissal must stand or fall on the sufficiency of the gun-pointing incident to constitute cause for discipline as discourteous treatment of other employees under Gov. Code § 19572(m). It found the evidence sufficient to support the board's finding that petitioner's gun pointing resulted in harm to the public service by causing the two attorneys to be apprehensive of their safety during future contacts with the female attorney while in the performance of their official duties, and it ruled that the fact that the incident occurred during off-duty hours was irrelevant. The court noted that although a public employee may not be disciplined for what he or she does in his or her private life, unless such conduct impairs the public service or causes discredit to the employing agency, such inquiry was not required here where the petitioner was being disciplined not for his private romance, but for his threats to other employees. The court further held, however, that in light of petitioner's age, length of government service, and position, the imposition of the maximum penalty of dismissal was clearly excessive, and it reversed the judgment of the trial court and directed that court to enter judgment commanding the State Personnel Board to set aside its decision of dismissal and to redetermine the proper penalty to be imposed.

[b] Homosexual Status

Gay Law Students Assn. v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. (1979) 24 Cal. 3d 458, 467, 156 Cal. Rptr. 14, 595 P.2d 592 , was an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant in a class action brought against a public utility that allegedly discriminated in hiring, firing, and promoting homosexual employees. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment, holding that the trial court improperly sustained defendants' demurrer. The court held that the complaint stated three causes of action against the public utility: (1) under the equal protection clause of the California Constitution (Cal. Const., Art. I § 7(a)), which prohibits the state, or a privately-owned utility with quasi-monopoly status, from excluding homosexuals as a class from employment opportunities without a showing that an individual's homosexuality renders him or her unfit for the job (24 Cal. 3d 458, 467-475) ; (2) under Pub. Util. Code § 453(a), which bans arbitrary discrimination by public utilities (24 Cal. 3d 458, 477-486) ; (3) and under Lab. Code §§ 1101 and 1102, which protects the rights of employees in general to engage in political activity without interference by employers, and extends to homosexual persons who are open about their sexual preferences and who associate with others in working for equal rights (24 Cal. 3d 458, 486-488) .

[c] Homosexual Conduct

Curran v. Mount Diablo Council of the Boy Scouts (1983) 147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 195 Cal. Rptr. 325 , was an appeal from dismissal of an action brought by a former member of the Boy Scouts who was expelled, without notice or opportunity to respond, on the ground he was a homosexual and so not a good moral example for younger scouts. Plaintiff contended that the expulsion violated the common law right of fair procedure, as well as the Unruh Civil Rights Act (Civ. Code § 51).

The court of appeal agreed and reversed the judgment, holding that the trial court improperly sustained defendants' demurrer. In its discussion of the common-law ground for the decision, the court found that plaintiff's membership in the organization, with its associated privileges, was a valuable interest which could not be arbitrarily withdrawn (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 721) . The court held that using the status of homosexuality as a basis of expulsion from a private association is both capricious and offensive to public policy because the mere status of homosexuality, by itself, does not connote immorality (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 723) . In addition, the allegations of the complaint could reasonably be construed as charging that defendant's action to expel rested on plaintiff's political decision to "come out of the closet" and acknowledge his sexual preference; if so, the expulsion inhibited protected political activity and violated public policy under Gay Law Students Assn. v. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. (1979) 24 Cal. 3d 458, 487-488, 156 Cal. Rptr. 14, 595 P.2d 592 (discussed above) (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 723-724) . On the other hand, the court held, if the expulsion was based on homosexual conduct, the plaintiff's right of freedom of expression was qualified by the association's right of self-preservation. Because the plaintiff's role in the Boy Scouts was analogous to that of a school teacher, the court stated that the factors set out in Morrison (discussed above) should be applied to determine if there was a rational nexus between plaintiff's homosexual conduct, if any, and harm to the Boy Scouts resulting from his continued membership. Before homosexual conduct, whether private or public, criminal or noncriminal, could lawfully be used as a basis to expel plaintiff from the Boy Scouts, the court held, a connection must be demonstrated between his homosexual conduct and any significant danger of harm to the association resulting from his continued membership (147 Cal. App. 3d 712, 724-725) .

[a] When Immorality Cause for Discipline

Fout v. State Personnel Bd. (1982) 136 Cal. App. 3d 817, 186 Cal. Rptr. 452 , was an appeal by a public employer from a judgment of the trial court ordering a peremptory writ to issue and remanding the case back to the State Personnel Board for reconsideration of the penalty of dismissal imposed on a police officer. The police officer had been dismissed for immorality, based on child molestation activities, and for insubordination, based on his refusal to cooperate in the investigation of the molestation charges. The court of appeals found that child molestation was immorality within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(l) (136 Cal. App. 3d 817, 821) . The court held that the grounds for dismissal were not an abuse of discretion, and that the trial court had erred by substituting its discretion for that of the employer and the State Personnel Board (136 Cal. App. 3d 817, 821-822) . Therefore, the judgment of the trial court was reversed and the decision of the State Personnel Board was reinstated (136 Cal. App. 3d 817, 822) .

[a] When Discourteous Treatment of Public and Other Employees Cause for Discipline

Neely v. California State Personnel Bd. (1965) 237 Cal. App. 2d 487, 47 Cal. Rptr. 64 , was an appeal by the State Personnel Board from a superior court judgment setting aside the punitive action taken by the board against a civil service employee. The board had found that a referee of the Industrial Accident Commission had treated a member of the public discourteously, had been inefficient in reassigning case hearings, and had been discourteous and insubordinate to his appointing power, and it therefore ordered the referee suspended for almost three months and his salary reduced one step. The superior court reversed as to the first two causes and that portion of the third relating to insubordination, and it ordered the matter remanded to the board for further hearings and reconsideration of the penalty with respect to the discourteous treatment of the appointing power. The court of appeal reversed the judgment since it did not find substantial evidence to support a finding of insubordination and directed the board to redetermine the penalty to be imposed. The court did hold that there was substantial evidence to support the board's findings of discourteous treatment of the public, of inefficiency, and of discourteous treatment of another employee. In so holding, the court stated that the word "public" used in Gov. Code § 19572(m) includes everyone with whom a civil service employee comes in contact by reason of his or her employment, and that an attorney interested in and rightfully present at a hearing presided over by a state referee was included in the term.

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee where the conduct of the employee allegedly constituting other failure of good behavior within the meaning of Gov. Code § 19572(t) or an applicable local rule would not cause discredit to the public service if known to the public.

Where appropriate, counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

However, counsel should be aware of Parker v. State Personnel Bd. (1981) 120 Cal. App. 3d 84, 174 Cal. Rptr. 333 . In Parker, a mandate proceeding for review of a final administrative adjudicatory decision [Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5], the court upheld the discharge of an employee for possession of a large amount of marijuana when the worker was a group supervisor at a vocational training institution for the rehabilitation of youthful offenders. The petitioner was terminated under Gov. Code § 19572 after discovery of approximately 450 grams of marijuana both growing and in loose form at his residence. At a hearing before the State Personnel Board, petitioner offered no testimony on the discovery of the marijuana, because criminal proceedings were still pending. The hearing officer proposed sustaining the dismissal, finding that petitioner's status as a peace officer and his job functions of guidance and supervision of Youth Authority wards provided a relationship between the possession of marijuana and petitioner's employment. The board adopted the decision and it was upheld by the superior court. In affirming the trial court, the court of appeal noted that in order for the dismissal to be valid, the failure of good behavior must reflect on the employee's job. The court found substantial evidence supporting the board's decision, however, in testimony by petitioner's supervisor that the arrest had a significant adverse effect on petitioner's credibility and on the community to which the wards return. The State Personnel Board and trial court were entitled to rely on the supervisor's opinion in upholding the dismissal.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Other Failure of Good Behavior Cause for Discipline

Vielehr v. State Personnel Bd. (1973) 32 Cal. App. 3d 187, 107 Cal. Rptr. 852 , was an appeal by a discharged civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court denying a petition for a writ of mandate. Petitioner, a tax representative trainee, was convicted on his plea of guilty of possession of marijuana and sentenced to two years probation with 90 days suspended jail sentence. On the basis of this marijuana conviction, petitioner was dismissed from his job, and respondent board sustained the dismissal under Gov. Code § 19572(t). The superior court denied a petition for mandate without opinion, and the court of appeal reversed its decision and remanded the cause to the superior court for further proceedings. The court ruled that Gov. Code § 19572(t), establishing as a cause for discipline other failure of good behavior either during or outside duty hours which is of such a nature that it causes discredit to the employee's agency or employment, must be applied to petitioner in light of the type of employment he was engaged in (enforcing the tax laws) to determine whether or not his alleged failure of good behavior (possession of marijuana) was of such a nature that it caused discredit to his agency or to his employment, and that there must be a rational relationship between the goal which Gov. Code § 19572(t) seeks to achieve and the failure of good behavior. The court then held that conviction of possession of marijuana, standing alone, did not constitute substantial evidence of a failure of good behavior outside duty hours which was of such a nature that it caused discredit to the agency or to petitioner's employment. The court found no obvious relationship between possessing marijuana off the job and the duties of a tax representative trainee, and it concluded that conviction of possession of marijuana off the job did nt, without more, establish a sufficient probative nexus between the failure of good behavior and a finding of discredit to the agency or employment to justify disciplinary action. Since the record contained no findings of specific harms or impairments resulting to the public service, the court noted that further proceedings might be necessary.

[b] Possession of Marijuana

Vielehr v. State Personnel Bd. (1973) 32 Cal. App. 3d 187, 107 Cal. Rptr. 852 , is discussed in § 36.38[2][a].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] When Other Failure of Good Behavior Cause for Discipline

In Ramirez v. State Personnel Bd. (1988) 204 Cal. App. 3d 288, 251 Cal. Rptr. 9 , a Department of Youth Authority counselor appealed from a denial of his petition seeking a writ of mandate to overturn a decision by the State Personnel Board to dismiss him from employment after his arrest for masturbating in a place open to public view. The court of appeal affirmed, holding that there was a sufficient nexus between the counselor's misconduct and his employment as a peace officer to justify termination under Gov. Code § 19572(t). In so holding, the court reached a result opposite to that reached in Yancey [see discussion below]. The court reasoned that when a youth counselor, by disobeying the law, does the very thing he or she is supposed to counsel against, the counselor cannot be said to be acting in the best interest of the Youth Authority or its wards. The court also held that the board did not abuse its discretion under the circumstances of the case by awarding termination, notwithstanding the petitioner's prior discipline-free record of service (204 Cal. App. 3d 288, 293-294) .

Yancey v. State Personnel Bd. (1985) 167 Cal. App. 3d 478, 213 Cal. Rptr. 634 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a denial of his petition for a writ of mandate to compel the State Personnel Board to vacate its decision terminating appellant's employment as an officer at a correctional facility, after he was found off-duty wearing female underclothing. The court of appeal reversed, holding that the evidence was insufficient to support the decision to dismiss under Gov. Code § 19572(t), noting also that if any discipline were warranted the penalty imposed was grossly excessive (167 Cal. App. 3d 478, 487-488) . The court stated that there must be more than a failure of good behavior before the board may discipline an employee under Gov. Code § 19572(t); the misconduct must bear some rational relationship to the employee's job and be of such character that it can easily result in impairment or disruption of the public service (167 Cal. App. 3d 478, 483) . The court then concluded that the evidence was insufficient to justify dismissal under this standard, because appellant did not commit a criminal act, was not willfully disobedient, did not violate any departmental rule, and had an exemplary prior work record. Moreover, the incident appeared to be transitory in nature (167 Cal. App. 3d 478, 487) .

Nightingale v. State Personnel Bd. (1972) 7 Cal. 3d 507, 102 Cal. Rptr. 758, 498 P.2d 1006 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court denying a petition for a writ of mandate. Petitioner, a referee with the Division of Industrial Accidents, had privately contacted the referee in charge of a friend's worker's compensation case and the deputy attorney general representing the injuries fund in an attempt to expedite her friend's case and obtain special treatment for her. On the basis of these actions, petitioner was suspended for 20 days under Gov. Code § 19572(t) for a failure of good behavior during working hours which was of such a nature that it caused discredit to the state agencies involved in worker's injury claims. The State Personnel Board upheld the suspension. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's judgment on appeal and denied the petition for writ of mandate. The Court ruled that it was immaterial that petitioner neither intended to nor did affect the fairness of the proceedings in her friend's case. Since her efforts on behalf of her friend amounted to an unwarranted interference with proceedings scheduled to be held before another officer, the Court held that petitioner violated Gov. Code § 19572(t). The Court stated that a "failure of good behavior" need not be known to some portion of the public before it may be said to have caused discredit to the public service, and that to have a referee working from inside an agency on behalf of a party to a pending action is obviously improper and can reasonably be expected to raise doubts among litigants as to the impartial exercise of discretion by the agency (7 Cal. 3d 507, 513-515) .

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state or local civil service commission disciplining a civil service employee for "conduct unbecoming an employee of the civil service."

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Conduct Unbecoming a Civil Service Employee Is Cause for Discipline

In Cranston v. City of Richmond (1985) 40 Cal. 3d 755, 221 Cal. Rptr. 779, 710 P.2d 845 , petitioner, a Richmond City Police Officer, drove his car while it was mechanically and structurally unsound, in the middle of the night, and led other police and Highway Patrol officers on a wild chase over wet and slippery streets at speeds up to 95 miles per hour. Petitioner was not on duty at the time of the chase, and the chase did not involve duty-related matters. Additionally, petitioner previously had been warned about his driving habits and notified that his conduct was being closely observed. As a result of the chase incident, coupled with prior instances of misconduct, petitioner was discharged from his position under a city personnel rule providing that an employee may be discharged for conduct unbecoming an employee of the city service. The city personnel board sustained the discharge, and the trial court denied petitioner's petition for a writ of administrative mandamus to compel his reinstatement. Petitioner then sought review of the denial in the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's judgment denying the petition (40 Cal. 3d 755, 759) . Among other things, petitioner contended that his discharge denied him due process of law because the city personnel rule under which he was discharged was unconstitutionally vague in that it provided no standard at all under which his conduct could be judged (40 Cal. 3d 755, 765) . The Court held the rule, viewed in the context of other rules and practices pertaining to police service, was not so vague as to preclude discipline for conduct that was so obviously improper for a police officer and so clearly outside the scope of any substantive legal protection as the reckless and unlawful conduct in which petitioner engaged (40 Cal. 3d 755, 759) . The Court reasoned that it was unlikely that the City of Richmond, in enacting the rule, intended to impose on all city employees an identical standard of "unbecoming" conduct. Relying on Morrison v. State Bd. of Educ. (1969) 1 Cal. 3d 214, 227, 82 Cal. Rptr. 175, 461 P.2d 375 (discussed in § 36.35[3][a]), the Court held that the city intended the meaning of "conduct unbecoming an employee of the city service" to depend on, and thus relate to, the occupation involved in a particular case (40 Cal. 3d 755, 768-769) . Thus, in applying the rule to petitioner, the Court construed the rule as if it read "conduct unbecoming a city police officer" (40 Cal. 3d 755, 769) . In finding that petitioner's conduct so clearly fell within the proscription of the rule that the rule's application to him was constitutionally valid, the Court emphasized that its holding was a narrow one. There might well be situations in which the admittedly uncertain language of the rule would fail to provide sufficiently definite notice to a police officer or other city employee that his or her conduct may be cause for discipline (40 Cal. 3d 755, 771) . The Court held only that the rule was not unconstitutionally vague as applied to a police officer who had engaged in the sort of patently unlawful and reckless conduct engaged in by petitioner (40 Cal. 3d 755, 772) .

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate for review of a final administrative adjudicatory order or decision of a state civil service commission disciplining civil service employee when (1) the employee is a manager or a supervisor, (2) the employee allegedly retaliated against a state applicant or employee for the applicant's or employee's disclosure of improper governmental activities, and (3) the employee reasonably believes his or her action or inaction is justified by evidence separate and apart from the fact that the employee or applicant has disclosed improper governmental activities [see Gov. Code § 8457.8(d)].

Counsel should insert argument in this form, showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[b] Retaliation Against State Applicant or Employee as Grounds for Discipline

Gov. Code § 8547.8(b) provides that any state civil service employee who intentionally engages in acts of reprisal, retaliation, threats, coercion, or similar acts against a state employee or applicant for state employment for having disclosed any "improper governmental activity" shall be disciplined by adverse action as provided by Gov. Code § 19572 (causes for discipline). If the particular agency does not take adverse action against the employee, the State Personnel Board may do so [Gov. Code §§ 8547.8(a), (b), 19683(e); see Gov. Code § 19583.5 (procedure for filing charges)]. Similar provisions protect University of California and California State University employees [Gov. Code §§ 8547.10(a), (b), 8547.12(a), (b)].

In addition, Gov. Code § 19572(x) provides that adverse action may be taken against any employee or person whose name appears on any employment list for unlawful retaliation against any other state officer or employee or member of the public who, in good faith, reports, discloses, divulges, or otherwise brings to the attention of the Attorney General, or any other appropriate authority, any facts or information relative to actual or suspected violation of any state or federal law occurring on the job or directly related thereto.

[c] Improper Governmental Activities

"Improper governmental activity" means any activity by a state agency or an employee that is undertaken in the performance of the employee's duties, undertaken inside a state office, or, if undertaken outside a state office by the employee, directly relates to state government, whether or not that activity is within the scope of his or her employment, and that (1) is in violation of any state or federal law or regulation, including, but not limited to, corruption, malfeasance, bribery, theft of government property, fraudulent claims, fraud, coercion, conversion, malicious prosecution, misuse of government property, or willful omission to perform duty, or (2) is economically wasteful, or involves gross misconduct, incompetency, or inefficiency [Gov. Code § 8547.2(b)].

[d] Related Civil Actions

[i] State Civil Service System

Any person who intentionally engages in acts of reprisal, retaliation, threats, coercion, or similar acts against a state employee or applicant for state employment for disclosing improper governmental activities may be held liable in an action for damages brought against him or her by the injured party [Gov. Code § 8547.8(c)]. However, a damages action is not available unless the injured party first files a complaint with the State Personnel Board within the specified time pursuant to Gov. Code § 8547.8(a) and thereafter the board has issued, or failed to issue, findings [Gov. Code § 8547.8(c); see Gov. Code § 19683]. The injured employee's failure to pursue this administrative procedure is a jurisdictional defect that may be raised in the damages action by a party or the court at any time [Hood v. Hacienda La Puente Unified Sch. Dist. (1998) 65 Cal. App. 4th 435, 439-441, 76 Cal. Rptr. 2d 448] . However, as long as the board has issued findings (or the deadline for issuing findings has passed), the injured employee may proceed with a damages action whether the board's findings are favorable or unfavorable to the employee. Moreover, once the board has issued findings, the employee need not pursue additional administrative remedies and need not challenge the findings by way of a petition for a writ of administrative mandate [State Bd. of Chiropractic Examiners v. Superior Court (2009) 45 Cal. 4th 963, 971-978, 89 Cal. Rptr. 3d 576, 201 P.3d 457] .

If the plaintiff is a California State University employee, an action for damages may not be brought unless the state university has failed to reach a decision on the employee's administrative complaint within the time limits established for that purpose by the trustees or has failed to address the complaint to the employee's satisfaction within 18 months [Gov. Code § 8547.12(c) ("Nothing in this section is intended to prohibit the injured party from seeking a remedy if the university has not satisfactorily addressed the complaint within 18 months"); Runyon v. Board of Trs. of Cal. State Univ. (2010) 48 Cal. 4th 760, 767-773, 108 Cal. Rptr. 3d 557, 229 P.3d 985 ("satisfactorily addressed" in Gov. Code § 8547.12(c) refers to satisfaction of complaining employee, rather than satisfaction of good-faith standard for investigation of complaint)]. If the employee has complied with the university's internal complaint and investigation requirements and received an adverse decision from the university, the employee need not seek to overturn the university's decision through a petition for a writ of administrative mandate before filing a civil action [Runyon v. Board of Trs. of Cal. State Univ. (2010) 48 Cal. 4th 760, 773-775, 108 Cal. Rptr. 3d 557, 229 P.3d 985] .

If the injured party is an employee of the University of California, an action for damages may be brought only if the university's administrative remedy failed to result in a timely decision; if the university reached a timely decision, even one in its own favor, the employee has no cause of action for damages [Gov. Code § 8547.10(c); Miklosy v. Regents of Univ. of Cal. (2008) 44 Cal. 4th 876, 888-898, 80 Cal. Rptr. 3d 690, 188 P.3d 629].

In addition, Gov. Code § 8547.3(a) provides that a state employee may not, directly or indirectly, use, or attempt to use, his or her official authority or influence to, or to attempt to, intimidate, threaten, coerce, command any person for the purpose of interfering with that person's right to disclose to the State Auditor the existence of improper governmental activities. A state employee who violates Gov. Code § 8547.3(a) may be held liable in an action for civil damages brought against the employee by the offended party [Gov. Code § 8547.3(c)].

[ii] Local Civil Service Systems

Any local officer, manager, or supervisor who has been found by a court to have taken a reprisal action, with malicious intent, against any local agency employee or applicant for employment who discloses improper local governmental activities will be individually liable for damages in an action brought against him or her by the injured employee [Gov. Code § 53298.5; see also Gov. Code §§ 53296 (definitions), 53297 (right to file administrative complaint alleging improper local government activities), 53298 (prohibiting reprisal actions for disclosure of improper local governmental activities)].

[e] Related Pleading and Practice Forms

For a form of complaint by a state employee or applicant for state employment for use in an action under Gov. Code § 8547.8(c) for damages based on the commission of retaliatory acts against the employee or applicant for his or her disclosure of improper governmental activities, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 118, Civil Service (Matthew Bender).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] When Personnel Action or Inaction Not Cause for Discipline

Gov. Code § 8547.8(d) provides that Gov. Code § 8547.8 (discipline of manager or supervisor for retaliation against state applicant or employee who discloses improper governmental activities) is not intended to prevent a manager or supervisor from taking, directing others to take, recommending, or approving any personnel action or from failing to take a personnel action with respect to any state employee or applicant for state employment if the manager or supervisor reasonably believes any action or inaction is justified on the basis of evidence separate and apart from the fact that the employee or applicant has disclosed improper governmental activities, as defined in Gov. Code § 8547.2(b).

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Excessive Penalty

The factual background of Skelly v. State Personnel Bd. (1975) 15 Cal. 3d 194, 124 Cal. Rptr. 14, 539 P.2d 774 , is discussed in § 36.20[3][h]. In discussing petitioner's contention that the penalty of dismissal was excessive and disproportionate to his alleged wrong, the Supreme Court stated that the overriding concern in disciplining an employee is the extent to which the employee's conduct resulted in, or if repeated is likely to result in, harm to the public service (15 Cal. 3d 194, 217) . Considering the circumstances surrounding petitioner's minor deviations from the prescribed time schedule, the likelihood of petitioner repeating his misconduct, and the lack of proof that the public service was adversely affected, the Court concluded that petitioner's dismissal was improper (15 Cal. 3d 194, 218-219) .

Blake v. State Personnel Bd. (1972) 25 Cal. App. 3d 541, 102 Cal. Rptr. 50 , is discussed in § 36.35[3][a]. In discussing petitioner's contention that the penalty of dismissal was excessive as a matter of law, the court of appeal stated that in determining whether misconduct warrants dismissal, consideration should be given to the circumstances surrounding the misbehavior, the degree to which it affected the public service, and the likelihood of its recurrence (25 Cal. App. 3d 541, 554) . The court then held that the penalty of dismissal was an excessive punishment for petitioner's threatening of two fellow employees with a gun where there was no direct testimony from the employees that their work was affected, the incident occurred after an evening of drinking and petitioner apologized the next morning and gave assurances that the incident would not recur, petitioner had been in the state service since 1949 and had an exemplary employment record replete with commendations for meritorious service, petitioner had been promoted to the position of supervising deputy labor commissioner, and the State Personnel Guide to Employee Discipline suggested the penalty of a warning or letter of reprimand for a first offense under Gov. Code § 19572(m).

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Inadequacy of One of Several Grounds

The factual background of Shepherd v. State Personnel Bd. (1957) 48 Cal. 2d 41, 307 P.2d 4 , is discussed in § 36.29[3][a]. After determining that only one of the several grounds on which the State Personnel Board based its discipline of petitioner was valid, the Supreme Court stated that it was settled in such a situation that orderly procedure would best be preserved by remanding the case to the board so that it may reconsider the penalty to be imposed.

Neely v. California State Personnel Bd. (1965) 237 Cal. App. 2d 487, 47 Cal. Rptr. 64 , was an appeal by respondent board from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding. The board had upheld the suspension of a civil service employee and had reduced his salary. The superior court set aside punitive action, and the board appealed. The court of appeal held that there was substantial evidence to support three of the board's four findings on which the suspension was based. It therefore reversed the judgment of the superior court and directed that court to enter judgment instructing the board to set aside its decision and to determine the penalty to be imposed in light of the opinion of the court of appeal.

This form of memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate seeking review of an administrative decision to discipline or dismiss a civil service employee based upon employee's prior nolo contendere plea in a misdemeanor action. Admission of such evidence in an administrative action is barred under Penal Code § 1016.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Statutory Bar on Use of Nolo Contendere Plea Extends to Administrative Actions

County of Los Angeles v. Civil Service Commission (1995) 39 Cal. App. 4th 620, 46 Cal. Rptr. 2d 256 , involved a disciplinary action against a deputy sheriff who pleaded nolo contendere to the misdemeanor charge of receiving stolen property. This was based upon his purchase of electronic equipment from an associate of his brother in law. Based upon this, the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department fired the deputy. Pursuant to the deputy's request, an administrative hearing was conducted. The hearing officer excluded evidence of the nolo contendere plea and found that the deputy did not know the items in question were stolen. Nonetheless, he recommended a 30 day suspension. That recommendation was adopted by the Civil Service Commission; however, the county initiated the mandamus proceeding to have its original decision to fire the deputy upheld. The trial court denied the petition. The court of appeal affirmed the denial, finding that the evidence of the nolo contendere plea was properly excluded under Penal Code § 1016, which prevents use of a nolo contendere plea in any civil action. The court held that this prohibition extended to administrative actions and that the civil service rule permitting admission of any relevant evidence at an administrative hearing despite common law or statutory rules to the contrary did not override public policy against use of nolo contendere plea or conviction in administrative proceedings (39 Cal. App. 4th 620, 632) .

ON REVIEWING A FINAL ADJUDICATORY ORDER OR DECISION OF A LOCAL ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY, THE COURT IS AUTHORIZED TO EXERCISE ITS INDEPENDENT JUDGMENT ON THE EVIDENCE AND TO DETERMINE WHETHER THE FINDINGS ARE SUPPORTED BY THE WEIGHT OF THE EVIDENCE, WHERE IT IS ALLEGED THAT THE EVIDENCE DOES NOT SUPPORT THE FINDINGS AND THE ORDER OR DECISION SUBSTANTIALLY AFFECTS THE FUNDAMENTAL VESTED RIGHT OF THE PETITIONER'S CONTINUING PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT.

A. Reviewing Weight of Evidence. Where it is claimed that the findings are not supported by the evidence, in cases where the court is authorized by law to exercise its independent judgment on the evidence, abuse of discretion is established if the court determines that the findings are not supported by the weight of the evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5(c)).

B. Authority to Exercise Independent Judgment. A court is authorized to exercise its independent judgment on the evidence where the administrative order or decision attacked substantially affects a fundamental vested right of the petitioner and the respondent agency is not directly authorized by the Constitution to exercise judicial functions (Strumsky v. San Diego County Employees' Retirement Ass'n (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 28, 32, 35, 112 Cal. Rptr. 805, 520 P.2d 29 ; Wences v. City of Los Angeles (2009) 177 Cal. App. 4th 305, 313-318, 99 Cal. Rptr. 3d 199).

C. Fundamental Vested Rights. The right to continue in permanent public employment is a fundamental vested right (Los Angeles County Employees' Assn. v. Sanitation Dist. No. 2 (1979) 89 Cal. App. 3d 294, 299, 152 Cal. Rptr. 415).

D. Duty to Exercise Independent Judgment. Where findings and conclusions of an administrative agency rely on disputed evidence or conflicting witness testimony, a court ruling on a petition for writ of mandate has a duty to make an independent determination regarding the credibility of witnesses and evidence (Barber v. Long Beach Civil Service Commission (1996) 45 Cal. App. 4th 652, 658-659, 53 Cal. Rptr. 2d 4).

E. Constitutional Authority to Exercise Judicial Functions. Local agencies have no authority to exercise judicial functions; their factual determinations are not due the deference and respect usually accorded judicial decisions, and, therefore, a court reviewing such an agency's decisions may exercise its independent judgment on the evidence (see Strumsky v. San Diego County Employees' Retirement Ass'n (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 28, 32, 35-37, 42-44, 112 Cal. Rptr. 805, 520 P.2d 29).

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for a writ of mandate for review of a local civil service commission's final administrative adjudicatory order or decision where the order or decision affected an employee's right to continue in public employment and the employee contended that the commission findings were not supported by the evidence.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

The form's use is limited to review of the proceedings of a local service commission since such an agency is not vested by the Constitution with limited judicial powers [see discussion in § 36.44[3][b]]. By contrast, findings of the State Personnel Board are subject to judicial review under the substantial evidence test even when fundamental vested rights are involved, since the Board has constitutional authority to act as an adjudicatory body [see Coleman v. Department of Personnel Administration (1991) 52 Cal. 3d 1102, 1125, 278 Cal. Rptr. 346, 805 P.2d 300 ; Gonzalez v. State

Personnel Bd. (1995) 33 Cal. App. 4th 422, 428, 39 Cal. Rptr. 2d 282].

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Reviewing Weight of Evidence

Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5(c) provides that in cases where the court is authorized by law to exercise its independent judgment on the evidence and where it is claimed that the findings are not supported by the evidence, abuse of discretion is established if the court determines that the findings are not supported by the weight of the evidence.

[b] Authority to Exercise Independent Judgment

Strumsky v. San Diego County Employees' Retirement Ass'n (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 28, 112 Cal. Rptr. 805, 520 P.2d 29 , involved an appeal from a judgment denying the petitioner a writ of mandate to set aside the decision of the respondent board which denied her certain death benefits. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded to the trial court on the basis that the trial court had erroneously applied the substantial judgment test in reviewing the decision of the board, instead of the independent judgment test. The Court noted that formerly the independent judgment test had been held inapplicable in the case of agencies of constitutional origin which were granted judicial power by the Constitution and local agencies. While this rule is still valid as to the constitutional agencies, the Court held that there is no longer any valid reason to apply the substantial evidence rule to decisions of local agencies. The Court reasoned that the trial court formerly had not been permitted to independently judge the evidence of a state agency of constitutional origin which had been granted limited judicial powers by the Constitution because of the separation of power doctrine. That doctrine contained in Cal. Const., Art. III, § 3, provides that persons charged with the exercise of legislative, executive, or judicial power may not exercise either of the other powers except as the Constitution permits. Because this provision applies only to the state, local agencies are not prevented from exercising judicial power. Turning to the question of whether such power could be exercised, the Court found Article VI of the California Constitution disposes of all judicial power not expressly disposed of elsewhere in the Constitution, and that following its amendment in 1950, it no longer authorized the Legislature, in its granting of power to various local bodies pursuant to Article XI, to grant such agencies judicial powers. Therefore, the factual findings of local agencies are entitled to no greater deference tan those of other agencies lacking judicial powers under the Constitution. The Court then confirmed the holding in Bixby v. Pierno (1971) 4 Cal. 3d 130, 143, 93 Cal. Rptr. 234, 481 P.2d 242 , that when an administrative decision affects a right which has been legitimately acquired or is otherwise vested, and when that right is of a fundamental nature from the standpoint of its economic aspect or its effect in human terms and the importance to the individual, then a full and independent judicial review of the decision is indicated, with the sole exception of agencies of constitutional origin with limited judicial power.

In Wences v. City of Los Angeles (2009) 177 Cal. App. 4th 305, 99 Cal. Rptr. 3d 199 , a police department issued an official reprimand against an officer for using unauthorized tactics and inappropriately drawing his weapon during the course of an off-duty, officer-involved shooting. The trial court denied the officer's writ petition on the ground that there was substantial evidence to support the administrative decision. The officer appealed, contending that the trial court should have exercised its independent judgment to determine whether the weight of the evidence supported the administrative findings, rather than applying the deferential substantial-evidence standard of review.

The court of appeal agreed with the officer and reversed the trial court's judgment. The appellate court explained that if the administrative decision substantially affects a fundamental vested right, the trial court must exercise its independent judgment on the evidence (citing Strumsky v. San Diego County Employees Retirement Assn (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 28, 32, 112 Cal. Rptr. 805, 520 P.2d 29 (discussed above)). Whether an administrative decision substantially affects a fundamental vested right must be determined on a case-by-case basis. A right may be deemed fundamental either because of (1) the character and quality of its economic aspect, or (2) the character and quality of its human aspect (177 Cal. App. 4th 305, 313) .

It is settled that termination of employment sufficiently affects a public employee's vested right in employment to require a trial court to exercise its independent judgment in reviewing the evidence. But this case presented an issue of first impression: whether the independent judgment standard of judicial review should apply in an administrative mandamus proceeding when the challenged discipline is solely a reprimand as opposed to a more severe penalty (177 Cal. App. 4th 305, 314) .

The court of appeal found that, in this case, the reprimand substantially affected a fundamental right, so that the trial court should have exercised its independent judgment. The court of appeal noted that the right at issue in this case was the officer's right to employment as a non-probationary peace officer, a right that is both vested and fundamental. The police department's official reprimand was a part of the officer's employment record as a police officer. The reprimand may be considered by the department in future personnel and disciplinary decisions, and based on its content, it could adversely affect the officer's future opportunities for career advancement. It therefore implicated a right that was important to the officer in his life situation, even in the absence of an immediate economic impact. That the officer had received a promotion after the issuance of the reprimand did not eliminate the possibility that the presence of reprimand could hinder the officer's future career advancement (177 Cal. App. 4th 305, 316-318) .

[c] Fundamental Vested Rights

The factual background of Los Angeles County Employees' Assn. v. Sanitation Dist. No. 2 (1979) 89 Cal. App. 3d 294, 152 Cal. Rptr. 415 , was discussed in § 36.21[3][a]. In discussing the proper application of the independent judgment test by the trial court in determining whether the findings of the commission were supported by the evidence, the court of appeal quoted from Strumsky v. San Diego County Employees' Retirement Ass'n (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 28, 32, 112 Cal. Rptr. 805, 520 P.2d 29 , where the Supreme Court said that if the order or decision of the agency substantially affects a fundamental vested right, the trial court, in determining under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5 whether there has been an abuse of discretion because the findings are not supported by the evidence, must exercise its independent judgment on the evidence and find an abuse of discretion if the findings are not supported by the weight of the evidence. The court of appeal then ruled that it could not be doubted that this employee's right to continue in his permanent public employment was a vested right within the meaning of that rule.

[d] Duty to Exercise Independent Judgment

In Barber v. Long Beach Civil Service Commission (1996) 45 Cal. App. 4th 652, 53 Cal. Rptr. 2d 4 , a discharged police officer filed a petition for writ of administrative mandate against the Long Beach Civil Service Commission, which was denied by the superior court. The officer's discharge had been based upon allegations of mishandling of criminal evidence, filing false information in an arrest report and providing false testimony under oath. The findings and conclusions of the Civil Service Commission were substantially based upon witness testimony, which was disputed by witnesses on behalf of the officer. In ruling on the petition, the superior court declined to exercise its independent judgment and review witness credibility. The court of appeal reversed, holding that the superior court had a duty to make an independent determination regarding the credibility of witnesses and therefore remanded for a new trial (45 Cal. App. 4th 652, 658-659) .

[e] Constitutional Authority to Exercise Judicial Functions

Strumsky v. San Diego County Employees' Retirement Ass'n (1974) 11 Cal. 3d 28, 112 Cal. Rptr. 805, 520 P.2d 29 , was discussed in § 36.44[3][b].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Authority to Exercise Independent Judgment

The court of appeal in Sienkiewicz v. County of Santa Cruz (1987) 240 Cal. Rptr. 451 , affirmed a trial court's denial of a petition for extraordinary relief and dismissal of a complaint for damages by a detention officer against a county. In discussing the respective standards of review, the court said that a trial court reviewing a decision of a local civil service commission to dismiss an employee must exercise independent judgment because a fundamental right is involved. The court of appeal, however, reviews the trial court's decision for substantial evidence to support the trial court's decision (195 Cal. App. 3d 134, 137) .

Parker v. City of Fountain Valley (1981) 127 Cal. App. 3d 99, 179 Cal. Rptr. 351 , was an action in which a tenured city police officer appealed the denial of his petition for a writ of mandate, by which he sought reinstatement to his position in the city police department. The court of appeal reversed the trial court's denial of the writ, stating that it was unclear which standard of review the trial court actually employed. However, the court of appeal noted that the proper standard of review was the independent-judgment test because the case involved a fundamental vested right (127 Cal. App. 3d 99, 118) .

THE COURT MAY REVIEW THE DECISION OF RESPONDENT _____ [specify agency, e.g., STATE PERSONNEL BOARD] TO _____ [specify disciplinary decision, e.g., SUSPEND PETITIONER WITHOUT PAY FOR FOUR DAYS] BY ORDINARY MANDATE BECAUSE THE RESPONDENT'S DECISION IN THIS CASE WAS NOT SUPPORTED BY SUBSTANTIAL EVIDENCE AND THEREFORE CONSTITUTED AN ABUSE OF ITS DISCRETION.

A. Mandate to Compel Performance of Mandatory Duty. A mandate proceeding is the proper means by which a court may compel an inferior tribunal or board to perform an act that the law specially enjoins as a duty arising from an office, trust, or station (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085(a)).

B. Ordinary Mandate Available to Review Agency's Abuse of Discretion. In cases in which administrative mandate under Code of Civil Procedure Section 1094.5 is unavailable because an evidentiary hearing is not required by law, ordinary mandate under Code of Civil Procedure Section 1085(a) is available to correct an agency's abuse of discretion if the petitioner clearly establishes his or her right to have discretion exercised in a particular manner (Coelho v. State Personnel Bd. (1989) 209 Cal. App. 3d 968, 971, 257 Cal. Rptr. 557).

[Optional] C. Ordinary Mandate Available to Review State Agency Decision When State Personnel Board Fails to Render Timely Decision. The State Personnel Board's failure to render a decision within the time periods specified in Government Code Section 18671.1 constitutes an exhaustion of all administrative remedies for the state employee, unless he or she has waived the time limits (Gov. Code § 18671.1). If the employee has not waived those time limits, he or she may bring an ordinary mandate proceeding under Code of Civil Procedure Section 1085 directly against the appointing agency to set aside the adverse action (California Correctional Peace Officers Assn. v. State Personnel Bd. (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1151, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79).

D. Disciplinary Action Not Supported by Substantial Evidence Constitutes Abuse of Discretion. An administrative decision imposing discipline on a civil service employee that is not supported by substantial evidence constitutes an abuse of discretion that may be corrected by ordinary mandate (Coelho v. State Personnel Bd. (1989) 209 Cal. App. 3d 968, 971, 971 n.2, 257 Cal. Rptr. 557).

These points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of ordinary mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085(a), 1086] for review of a decision by the State Personnel Board or a local public entity imposing discipline on a civil service employee in those cases in which an evidentiary hearing is not required by law. An example of such a case would be a suspension of a state civil service employee for five days or less [see Gov. Code § 19576]. The basis for seeking the writ is that the agency's decision constituted an abuse of discretion.

In addition, by using Optional Paragraph C, this form may be used in circumstances in which the State Personnel Board has failed to render a timely decision, as required by Gov. Code § 18671.1, in proceedings to review the state agency's adverse personnel decision, in which case the employee may elect to bring an ordinary mandate proceeding directly against the employing agency to challenge the adverse action. Alternatively, the employee may bring a mandate proceeding against the Board to compel the Board to render a decision within a time period to be set by the court [see California Correctional Peace Officers Assn. v. State Personnel Bd. (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1151, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79 , discussed in § 36.45[3][b]]. Administrative mandate is not available in such a case because there will have been no final administrative adjudicatory decision by the Board [California Correctional Peace Officers Assn. v. State Personnel Bd. (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1150, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79].

In cases in which discipline was imposed after an administrative hearing that was required by law, the employee should seek review by administrative mandate under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1094.5 or 1094.6. For points and authorities for use in support of a petition for administrative mandate, see §§ 36.20 -36.44.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. In particular, counsel should insert argument showing that the agency abused its discretion in imposing discipline because it lacked substantial evidence to support its decision.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Ordinary Mandate Available to Review Agency's Abuse of Discretion

In Coelho v. State Personnel Bd. (1989) 209 Cal. App. 3d 968, 257 Cal. Rptr. 557 , petitioner, a state civil service employee, sought a writ of administrative mandate to review a decision of the State Personnel Board suspending him for four days without pay on grounds of inefficiency, inexcusable neglect of duty, dishonesty, and other misbehavior. Among other things, petitioner alleged that the Board's findings were based on insufficient evidence and that the Board had therefore abused its discretion in suspending petitioner. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the petition on the ground that it lacked jurisdiction, and petitioner appealed.

The court of appeal reversed. The court noted, as petitioner conceded, that administrative mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5 was unavailable in this case because administrative mandate is limited to review of decisions in which an evidentiary hearing is required by law, and the Board was not required to hold a hearing to impose a suspension of five days or less under Gov. Code § 19576 (209 Cal. App. 3d 968, 970-971) . However, the court noted that "ordinary" or "traditional" mandamus under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085 is available to correct an abuse of discretion when a petitioner clearly establishes his or her right to have discretion exercised in a particular way. The court stated that a demurrer to a petition for extraordinary relief should be overruled if the petition alleges facts entitling the petitioner to ordinary mandamus, even if the petition erroneously requests administrative mandamus. Examining the petition in this case, the court noted that the petition alleged that the Board had abused its discretion in imposing discipline because its decision was not supported by substantial evidence. The court held that if the allegations were true, the Board had a legal duty to revoke the adverse action. Therefore, the court concluded that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer and should have considered the merits of the petition (209 Cal. App. 3d 968, 971) .

[b] Ordinary Mandate Available to Review State Agency Decision When State Personnel Board Fails to Render Timely Decision

In California Correctional Peace Officers Assn. v. State Personnel Bd. (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 1133, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79 , the plaintiff, a public employee union, brought an action on behalf of a number of its members who were subject to disciplinary action by the Department of Corrections and Department of Youth Authority against the State Personnel Board seeking to have the disciplinary actions against the members dismissed and the members restored to their positions for backpay, based on the Board's failure to render decisions in their cases within the statutory time limits provided in Gov. Code § 18671.1. The superior court denied the relief sought by the plaintiff and instead merely ordered the Board to hold hearings in the cases in which no hearings had yet been held and to render decisions in those cases in which hearings had been held. Plaintiff appealed.

At the time the court of appeal heard the case, the Board had complied with the superior court's order and rendered decisions in all of the cases. The court of appeal reversed the superior court judgment and remanded for proceedings to determine which employees had waived the statutory time limits. The court of appeal held that those employees could seek review of the Board's decision by administrative mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5; however, for employees who had not waived the time limits, the court held that the Board's action was "ineffective" and that those employees could bring a mandate proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085 (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 1085(a)) to compel the department that employed them to set aside its adverse action and that the employer would have the burden of proof in such proceedings. The California Supreme Court granted review on petitions by both the plaintiff and the Board.

Although not agreeing with the court of appeal's reasoning, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment remanding the case to the superior court. The Court first held that the time limits within which the Board must render a decision under Gov. Code § 18671.1 are directory, rather than mandatory, and that the Board's failure to render a decision within those limits did not deprive the Board of jurisdiction to continue investigating and hearing the case (10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1145-1148, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79). The Court observed that the time limits may be enforced by bringing a mandate proceeding against the Board to compel the Board to hear and decide the case, but the Court rejected the Board's argument that this was the employee's sole remedy in such a case (10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1148, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79). The Court noted that the statute provided that the Board's failure to render a timely decision constitutes an exhaustion of administrative remedies and impliedly authorizes the plaintiff to bring a mandate proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085 (now see Code Civ. Proc. § 1085(a)) against the appointing power to seek judicial relief from the adverse action (10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1148-1150, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79). The Court also rejected the plaintiff's contention that failure to comply with the time limit requires dismissal of both the appeal and the adverse action, reasoning that the Legislature's intent was not to penalize the state agencies and the people of the state by requiring reinstatement of an incompetent or untrustworthy employee merely because the Board failed to render a timely decision in the employee's appeal (10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1150, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79). The Court therefore concluded that if the Board fails to render a decision within the time allowed, the employee may seek a writ of mandate either against the Board to enforce compliance by a date certain or directly against the employing power to compel reversal of the adverse action. The Court further held that if the Board renders a favorable decision while the mandate proceeding is pending, the employee may dismiss that proceeding. If the decision is not favorable, the employee may either proceed with the mandate proceeding, the ruling on which would displace the Board's ruling, or dismiss the mandate proceeding against the employing power and seek review of the board's decision by administrative mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5 (10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1151, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79).

NOTE:

Although the Court's decision allows a state civil service employee to proceed directly against the employing department in an ordinary mandate proceeding if the Board fails to render a timely decision regarding his or her administrative appeal, the Court also ruled that the employee, rather than the employing power, has the burden of proof in such a mandate proceeding [California Correctional Peace Officers Assn. v. State Personnel Bd. (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1153-1155, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79]. By contrast, in proceedings before the Board, the employing power has the burden of proving that the employee engaged in the conduct on which the charge is based and that the conduct is cause for discipline under Gov. Code § 19572 [see California Correctional Peace Officers Assn. v. State Personnel Bd. (1995) 10 Cal. 4th 1133, 1153, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 693, 899 P.2d 79 ; Parker v. City of Fountain Valley (1981) 127 Cal. App. 3d 99, 113, 179 Cal. Rptr. 351]. Thus, although the employee may proceed directly against the appointing power, the employee may be better advised in many instances to waive the time limits and to continue with proceedings before the Board, in which the burden of proof will be on the employer.

[c] Disciplinary Action Not Supported by Substantial Evidence Constitutes Abuse of Discretion

Coelho v. State Personnel Bd. (1989) 209 Cal. App. 3d 968, 257 Cal. Rptr. 557 , is discussed in § 36.45[3][a].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Mandate to Compel Payment of Prevailing Wage

In Union of American Physicians v. Civil Service Com. (1982) 129 Cal. App. 3d 392, 181 Cal. Rptr. 93 , the court of appeal held that a local civil service commission violated a city charter provision requiring the development of salary ranges from midpoints of comparable pay ranges for public employees elsewhere. The commission, instead of selecting the midpoint in a salary range, chose the fourth step in a salary ladder with 18 steps from a comparable job classification in another county. The court of appeal remanded the case, directing the trial court to issue a writ of mandate commanding the civil service commission to recompute the prevailing basic pay rates (129 Cal. App. 3d 392, 397, 181 Cal. Rptr. 93).

[b] Wage Determination an Abuse of Discretion

In California State Police Ass'n v. California (1981) 120 Cal. App. 3d 674, 175 Cal. Rptr. 34 , the State Police Association and others sought relief from the state and the State Personnel Board regarding the board's determination of police salaries. Plaintiffs contended that pursuant to Gov. Code § 18850, the board had a duty to consider the salary rates of, and duties performed by, other state police organizations, in setting plaintiffs' salary rates. The board allegedly violated its duty by refusing to consider these factors, resulting in plaintiffs being paid substantially less than the comparable groups. After their application for relief was denied by the board, plaintiffs filed a complaint for declaratory relief, and petition for writ of mandate in the superior court. The court sustained defendants' demurrer to the complaint on the ground that no cause of action could be stated, and plaintiffs appealed from the resulting judgment of dismissal.

The court of appeal reversed. It held that, because Gov. Code § 18850(a) imposes a mandatory duty on the board to consider prevailing salary rates in other public and private employment, the plaintiffs successfully stated a cause of action by alleging failure to fulfill that duty (120 Cal. App. 3d 674, 680, 175 Cal. Rptr. 34). While the board does have broad discretion in setting salaries, its discretion may be abused by a refusal to consider the applicable comparable rates of other private or public employees (120 Cal. App. 3d 674, 681, 175 Cal. Rptr. 34).

§ 36.46 Supporting Petition for Writ of Mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086] to Compel Payment of Prevailing Wage Rate and Retroactive Salary Increase

[Caption. See § 36.20.]

THIS MANDATE PROCEEDING IS THE PROPER MEANS TO COMPEL RESPONDENT CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION TO PERFORM ITS MANDATORY DUTY TO ASCERTAIN THE PREVAILING WAGE, TO ADOPT AN ORDINANCE OR REGULATION PROVIDING FOR PAYMENT OF SUCH PREVAILING WAGE, AND TO PROVIDE FOR A RETROACTIVE SALARY INCREASE.

A. Mandate to Compel Performance of Mandatory Duty. A mandate proceeding is the proper means by which to compel a tribunal, corporation, board, or person to perform an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085(a)).

[Optional] B. Mandatory Duty to Ascertain Prevailing Wage. The State Department of Personnel Administration (Gov. Code § 19815(a)) is required to establish and adjust salary ranges for each class of position in the state civil service after giving consideration to the prevailing rates for comparable service in other public employment and in private business (Gov. Code § 19826(a)).

C. Mandate to Compel Payment of Prevailing Wage. A mandate proceeding is the proper means by which to compel a civil service commission to perform its mandatory duty to ascertain the prevailing wage and to adopt an ordinance or regulation providing for the payment of such prevailing rate when the rates of compensation adopted by the commission are so palpably unreasonable and arbitrary as to indicate an abuse of discretion as a matter of law (Walker v. County of Los Angeles (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 639, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247 ; City & County of San Francisco v. Boyd (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 685, 690, 140 P.2d 666).

D. Mandate to Compel Arbitration of Wage Dispute. Where an agreement between a governmental agency and a union provides for arbitration of disputes over departmental rules, personnel policies, and working conditions, any doubts as to the arbitrability of particular disputes are to be resolved in favor of coverage (SEIU, Local 347 v. City of Los Angeles (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 1546, 1551-1553, 50 Cal. Rptr. 2d 216).

E. Liberal Construction of Prevailing Wage Statute. A prevailing wage statute or provision must be liberally construed in favor of the worker, and the civil service commission has no right to pay workers less than the prevailing wage (Walker v. County of Los Angeles (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 635, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247 ; Goodrich v. Fresno (1946) 74 Cal. App. 2d 31, 36, 167 P.2d 784).

F. Reasonable Correspondence With Wages Elsewhere. Wages are not in accord with the generally prevailing rates of wages for like service and working conditions in private employment or in other comparable governmental organizations in the state, as required by ordinance, unless there is a reasonable or just correspondence or harmony between the rates established and those prevailing elsewhere (City & County of San Francisco v. Boyd (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 685, 690, 140 P.2d 666).

G. Wage Determination an Abuse of Discretion. The Civil Service Board's determination of rates of compensation was an abuse of discretion when the board failed to ascertain the prevailing wage and adopted a salary ordinance without regard to wages paid elsewhere (Walker v. Los Angeles County (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 637, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247).

H. Mandate to Compel Retroactive Salary Increase. A mandate proceeding is also the proper means by which to compel payment of a retroactive salary increase to civil service employees in line with a prevailing wage doctrine (Walker v. County of Los Angeles (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 640, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247).

[a] Use of Form

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to compel a civil service commission to ascertain the prevailing wage, adopt an ordinance or regulation providing for payment of such prevailing wage, and to provide for a retroactive salary increase. Counsel should include in the form either optional Paragraph B or a paragraph citing appropriate local authority for a mandatory prevailing wage rule.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Mandate to Compel Payment of Prevailing Wage

Walker v. County of Los Angeles (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247 , was an appeal by defendant county from a judgment of the superior court in an action for declaratory relief and a proceeding in mandate to compel the county board of supervisors to ascertain the prevailing wage rate and provide for such salary for civil service employees. In 1958, the annual survey of wage, employment, and other economic conditions was conducted, but the board refused to apply it in fixing salaries for the year, and it continued the wage scale of the preceding year. The board at no time made a formal finding of prevailing wages before adopting this salary ordinance. Later in the year the matter was reconsidered by the chief administrative officer and the board, and an across-the-board wage increase of five and one-half percent was passed. The trial court rendered a declaratory judgment setting forth the rights and duties of the parties, and it ordered the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate requiring the board to ascertain and declare the prevailing rate.

The Supreme Court upheld the trial court's findings and judgment, although it altered the court's interpretation of the charter provision as not including fringe benefits within the definition of salary. Citing case authority, the Court stated that the prevailing wage statute should be liberally construed in favor of the worker, that there must be a reasonable correspondence between the salary rates established and those prevailing elsewhere, and that courts may interfere with a board's determinations when its actions are fraudulent or so palpably unreasonable and arbitrary as to indicate an abuse of discretion as a matter of law (55 Cal. 2d 626, 635-639) . Because the board had not ascertained prevailing wages before adopting the first ordinance, as required by county charter, the Supreme Court upheld the trial court's determination that the salary ordinance was arbitrary, capricious, and an abuse of discretion (55 Cal. 2d 626, 639) . It upheld the order for a writ of mandate, stating that mandate is a proper remedy to compel a city council or city civil service board to perform a mandatory duty when its actions indicate an abuse of discretion, and stating that a writ of mandate properly issued for payment of a retroactive salary increase when the increase resulted from having salaries legally fixed in the manner required by the charter (55 Cal. 2d 626, 639-641) .

City & County of San Francisco v. Boyd (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 685, 140 P.2d 666 , was a proceeding in mandate brought by the petitioner city and county and its Public Utilities Commission to compel its controller to audit and approve wage claims of certain employees at the rates of compensation fixed by ordinance. Respondent controller contended that such claims would constitute an illegal expenditure of public funds since the ordinance was void and contravening the city charter which provided that the civil service commission was to prepare, and the board of supervisors was to adopt, a schedule of compensations in accord with the generally prevailing rates of wages for like service and working conditions in private employment or in other comparable governmental organizations in the state.

The Supreme Court held that the charter provisions did not require that the wage rates be identical with or not higher than the generally prevailing rates, but only that there be a reasonable or just correspondence between the rates. Therefore, even though the rates of wages for certain employees ranged from $.85 to $.971/2 per hour, where the prevailing wage was $.70 to $.931/2 per hour, the Court found the proposed rates to be within the discretion of the rate-making authority. The Court supported its decision by stating the rule that the determination of whether proposed rates of compensation are in accord with generally prevailing rates is within the discretion of the rate-making authority, and the courts will not interfere with that determination unless the rate-setting action was fraudulent or so palpably unreasonable and arbitrary as to indicate an abuse of discretion as a matter of law (22 Cal. 2d 685, 690) . The Supreme Court, therefore, issued a peremptory writ of mandate and ordered that the writ issue on the filing of the decision (22 Cal. 2d 685, 695) .

[b] Mandate to Compel Arbitration of Wage Dispute

In SEIU, Local 347 v. City of Los Angeles (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 1546, 50 Cal. Rptr. 2d 216 , a union representing employees from the Department of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles filed a petition to compel arbitration of employee grievances with the department, claiming entitlement to "premium pay" under the Los Angeles City Administrative Code for city employees working in high-noise areas. The court held the issue was arbitrable under an agreement between the city and the union which provided for arbitration of disputes over departmental rules, personnel policies, and working conditions. The court also held that any doubts as to whether the subject arbitration clause applied were to be resolved in favor of coverage (42 Cal. App. 4th 1546, 1551-1553) .

[c] Liberal Construction of Prevailing Wage Statute

Walker v. County of Los Angeles (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247 , is discussed in § 36.46[3][a].

Goodrich v. Fresno (1946) 74 Cal. App. 2d 31, 167 P.2d 784 , was an appeal by civil service employees from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding brought to compel the city to reclassify employees and pay their demands for additional wages. The petitioners contend that they were wrongfully classified, as a result of which they have been receiving less than the prevailing wage paid in private employment in the city in the trades in which they are working. The superior court found that the employees had not been wrongfully or arbitrarily classified, nor had they been paid less than the prevailing wage in private employment, as referred to in the charter. Each petitioner was found to be entitled to receive a certain amount per hour not anything more than what had already been paid. The court thus denied the petitions for writs of mandate, and the petitioners appealed. The court of appeal stated that although a prevailing wage statute should be liberally construed in favor of the worker, city officials have a certain discretion in the matter of classifying employees and assigning duties to them (74 Cal. App. 2d 31, 36) . The court thoroughly reviewed the wages of the petitioners and those of private employees and concluded that the evidence, with respect to the amounts actually paid, supported the findings and judgment. The court of appeal therefore affirmed the judgment of the lower court (74 Cal. App. 2d 31, 40) .

[d] Reasonable Correspondence With Wages Elsewhere

City & County of San Francisco v. Boyd (1943) 22 Cal. 2d 685, 140 P.2d 666 , is discussed in § 36.46[3][a].

Walker v. County of Los Angeles (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247 , is discussed in § 36.46[3][a].

[f] Mandate to Compel Retroactive Salary Increase

Walker v. County of Los Angeles (1961) 55 Cal. 2d 626, 12 Cal. Rptr. 671, 361 P.2d 247 , is discussed in § 36.46[3][a].

§ 36.47 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086] to Prevent Public Employer From Requiring Employee to Use Accrued Compensatory Time

[1] FORM

[Caption. See § 36.20.]

A WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD NOT ISSUE TO PREVENT THE RESPONDENT FROM REQUIRING THE PETITIONER TO USE ACCRUED COMPENSATORY TIME, BECAUSE THE RESPONDENT IS AUTHORIZED TO DO SO UNDER THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT.

The Fair Labor Standards Act Does Not Prohibit Public Employer From Compelling Employees to Use Accrued Compensatory Time. Although the Act restricts an employer's efforts to prohibit the use of compensatory time (see 29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(5)), it says nothing about restricting an employer's efforts to require employees to use compensatory time (Christensen v. Harris County (2000) 529 U.S. 576, 120 S. Ct. 1655, 1660-1662, 146 L. Ed. 2d 621).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a petition for administrative mandate to prevent a public employer from implementing a policy requiring its employees to use their accrued compensatory time (i.e., time granted by a public employer in lieu of cash payment for overtime work, pursuant to an agreement or understanding with the employees).

[b] Argument

compensatory time.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] The Fair Labor Standards Act Does Not Prohibit Public Employer From Compelling Employees to Use Accrued Compensatory Time

In Christensen v. Harris County (2000) 529 U.S. 576, 120 S. Ct. 1655, 146 L. Ed. 2d 621 , a county adopted a policy of requiring its employees to schedule time off in order to reduce the amount of accrued compensatory time. The county adopted this policy to minimize its potential obligation to pay cash to employees who had reached the statutory cap on accrued compensatory time and to employees who had any unused compensatory time on the termination of their employment (see 29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(3)(A), (4)). The plaintiffs, who were deputy sheriffs employed by the county, sued for a declaration that the policy violated the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA; see 29 U.S.C. § 201 et seq.).

The FLSA provides that, if agreed to by its employees, a public employer may compensate the employees for overtime work by granting them compensatory time at a rate of 1.5 hours for every overtime hour worked (29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(1)). The employer must honor an employee's request to use compensatory time within a reasonable period after the request, so long as the use of compensatory time would not unduly disrupt the employer's operations (29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(5); 29 C.F.R. § 553.25). If an employee accumulates the maximum amount of compensatory time allowed under the FLSA, the employer must pay cash compensation for additional overtime work (29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(3)(A)). Also, the employer must pay an employee cash for any unused compensatory time remaining at the termination of employment (29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(4)).

The plaintiffs conceded that the FLSA did not expressly prohibit a public employer from compelling its employees to use their accrued compensatory time. However, they contended that the compelled use of compensatory time was implicitly prohibited by the FLSA provision requiring an employer to honor employees' reasonable requests to use compensatory time (see 29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(5)). Their argument was based on the canon of statutory interpretation expressio unius est exclusio alterius. That is, the plaintiffs argued that the FLSA's express grant of control to the employee to use compensatory time (subject to the limitation regarding undue disruption of the employer's operations) implies that all other methods of spending compensatory time are excluded. After the district court entered a declaratory judgment that the county's policy violated the FLSA, the Fifth Circuit reversed. The Supreme Court granted certiorari to resolve a conflict among the circuits (120 S. Ct. 1655, 1659-1660) .

The Supreme Court rejected the plaintiffs' argument. The Court did accept the proposition that when a statute limits a thing to be done in a particular mode, it includes a negative of any other mode. However, the Court explained that the "thing to be done" under the FLSA provision pertaining to employees' requests to use compensatory time was not the expenditure of compensatory time, but rather the grounds on which an employer may deny an employee's request to use compensatory time. Thus, the Court read the statute not as setting forth the exclusive method for using compensatory time, but as setting up a safeguard to ensure that an employee will receive timely compensation for overtime work. Put another way, the statute (29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(5)) restricts an employer's efforts to prohibit the use of compensatory time, but it says nothing about restricting an employer's efforts to require employees to use compensatory time (120 S. Ct. 1655, 1660-1661) .

In support of this interpretation, the Court cited other FLSA provisions that reflected a concern for ensuring that employees receive timely compensation for overtime work. For example, the FLSA limits the amount of compensatory time an employee may accrue; additional overtime work must be compensated with cash (29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(3)(A)) (120 S. Ct. 1655, 1661) .

The Court found further support for its interpretation in the fact that under the FLSA an employer is free to decrease the hours that employees work (see Barrentine v. Arkansas-Best Freight Sys., Inc. (1981) 450 U.S. 728, 739, 101 S. Ct. 1437, 67 L. Ed. 2d 641) and to cash out an employee's accumulated compensatory time by paying the employee's regular hourly wage for each hour accrued (29 U.S.C. § 207(o)(3)(B)). The compelled use of compensatory time amounts to doing both of these things at once. Therefore, the Court reasoned, it would make little sense to interpret the FLSA as prohibiting the combination of these steps when each independently is lawful (120 S. Ct. 1655, 1662) .

The Supreme Court then rejected the plaintiffs' contention that the Court should defer to an interpretation of the relevant FLSA provisions that was set forth in an opinion letter issued by the United States Department of Labor. Before adopting its policy that required employees to use their accrued compensatory time, the defendant county had requested advice from the Department of Labor's Wage and Hour Division. In response, the Acting Administrator of the Division issued an opinion letter stating that in the absence of an agreement with the employees, "neither the statute nor the regulations permit an employer to require an employee to use accrued compensatory time." The Supreme Court acknowledged that a court must give effect to an agency's regulation containing a reasonable interpretation of an ambiguous statute. However, such deference is warranted for an interpretation contained in an opinion letter that was not issued after, for example, a formal adjudication or notice-and-comment rulemaking. Instead, interpretations contained in formats such as opinion letters, policy statements, agency manuals, and enforcement guidelines are entitled to "respect," but only to the extent that those interpretations are persuasive. In this case, the Supreme Court found the Division's opinion letter unpersuasive for the reasons discussed above. Moreover, the agency regulation dealing with compensatory time (29 C.F.R. § 553.23(a)(2)) was not owed deference in this case because the regulation did not address the issue of the compelled use of compensatory time; it simply permitted an agreement between employer and employees to specify methods of using compensatory time. Finally, the Division's opinion letter was not owed deference as a interpretation of the regulation, since the regulation had no ambiguity that needed interpretation (120 S. Ct. 1655, 1662-1663) .

Where appropriate, counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Mandate to Compel Civil Service Commission to Permit Applicant to Take Examination

Terry v. Civil Serv. Comm'n (1952) 108 Cal. App. 2d 861, 240 P.2d 691 , is discussed in § 36.49[3][a]. Although the court did not directly discuss the appropriateness of the writ of mandate as a remedy for the civil service commission's enactment of a rule which arbitrarily discriminated among applicants for a civil service examination, it affirmed the lower court judgment granting the writ.

[b] Limited Powers of Commission

Haub v. Tuttle (1926) 80 Cal. App. 561, 251 P. 925 , was an appeal by the members and secretary of a city civil service commission from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding brought by a civil service employee. The commission held a competitive, promotional examination for the position of fire department lieutenant and graded the examination so that merit, efficiency, character, and conduct, as ascertained by a written examination, accounted for 60 points; a physical examination accounted for 10 points; merit, efficiency, character, and conduct, as ascertained by records of the department, accounted for 20 points; and seniority accounted for a maximum of 10 points. The trial court commanded the commission to certify all the applicants for promotion in the fire department on the basis of their records of merit, efficiency, character, conduct, and seniority, and to refrain from compelling applicants to undergo mental or physical tests. The court of appeal reviewed the charter provisions which govern the examination and appointment of employees and determined that the provisions did not authorize the commission to base its determinations of eligibility for promotions on competitive examinations. The court stated that since the charter was entirely void of any language which even inferentially justified the requirement of competitive examinations and the commission derived its power from the charter creating it, the commission has no power to hold competitive examinations. The court ruled, however, that the commission could require applicants for promotion to undergo tests to determine their physical and mental fitness to occupy the position, since physical fitness and mental health are prime requisites for a fireman, whatever his work in the service. The court therefore reversed the judgment of the trial court.

[c] Examination Requirements

Bruce v. Civil Serv. Bd. (1935) 6 Cal. App. 2d 633, 45 P.2d 419 , was an appeal by a city civil service board from a judgment of the superior court in injunction and mandate proceedings brought by a civil service applicant. The applicant had been denied leave to take an examination for the position of patrolman because he had not completed the 12th grade as required. The superior court had issued a writ of mandate ordering the board to permit him to compete and it had enjoined the city from conducting examinations for patrolman until appeals were concluded. The court of appeal reviewed the relevant charter provisions and civil service rules and held that the charter provisions requiring that every civil service applicant be able to read and write the English language and directing that examinations be for the purpose of determining qualifications for a particular position and be practical and fair tests of the applicant's fitness to discharge the duties of the position sought, did not authorize the board to limit the patrolman examination to those who had completed the 12th grade. The court held that a civil service commission derives its powers from the charter creating it and may not exercise any power not directly given or necessarily implied from those conferred. The court found that the board had transgressed its authority by denying an applicant the right to take an examination which would practically and fairly test his fitness to become a police officer, that is, by adopting the standard that he could not compete unless he presented a 12th grade certificate or evidence that his education demonstrates such ability as the certificate would indicate. The court affirmed the judgment of the trial court.

A MANDATE PROCEEDING IS THE PROPER MEANS BY WHICH TO COMPEL A CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION TO PERMIT AN APPLICANT TO TAKE AN EXAMINATON IF THE REQUIREMENTS SET FOR THE EXAMINATION ARE ARBITRARY AND UNREASONABLE.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Denial of Equal Protection

Terry v. Civil Serv. Comm'n (1952) 108 Cal. App. 2d 861, 240 P.2d 691 , was an appeal by a local civil service commission from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding brought to compel the commission to permit five applicants to take an examination for playground director. The day before the examination was to be given the trial court issued an alternative writ of mandate, and the commission was ordered to permit the applicants to take the examination. Several months later, there was a hearing on the writ, and a judgment was entered granting the writ, even though all five applicants had received failing grades on the examination. The commission had attempted to limit applicants to those who were graduates of a university or college accredited by the Association of American Universities or the Northwest Association of Secondary and Higher Schools. The superior court found that this was arbitrary, unreasonable, discriminatory, and a violation of the equal protection guarantees of the state and federal Constitutions, and that its adoption by the civil service commission was an abuse of discretion. The court of appeal held that the commission had no legal power to limit public employment to graduates of colleges accredited by either of only two associations where the evidence established that there was little or no difference in the standards used by the five regional associations, one of which accredited the colleges from which the applicants graduated. The court therefore declared the commission rule arbitrary, discriminatory, an unconstitutional limitation on the right to work, and void. Since the question involved was the applicants' right to take the examination, the court held the point not moot, even though all applicants eventually failed the examination and were thus disqualified from holding the position. Although the court of appeal did not directly discuss the appropriateness of the writ of mandate in such circumstances, it affirmed the lower court judgment granting the writ.

[b] Arbitrary Education Accreditation Requirements

Bruce v. Civil Serv. Bd. (1935) 6 Cal. App. 2d 633, 45 P.2d 419 , is discussed in § 36.48[3][c].

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Denial of Equal Protection

Waters v. Civil Serv. Bd. (1955) 133 Cal. App. 2d 733, 284 P.2d 919 , was an appeal by a city civil service board from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding brought to compel the board to accept the petitioner's application for examination for promotion from lieutenant to captain of police. The board had restricted the examination to those applicants who had served in the rank of lieutenant for two years. The trial court found that the requirement of two years' experience in the grade of lieutenant as a prerequisite to eligibility for the examination was arbitrary and without authority in the city charter. The court of appeal reviewed the various charter provisions and the civil service rule promulgated by the board, and it held that although the charter established a complete system of civil service, under its rule-making authority the board was possessed of broad discretionary powers. The court found the two-year rule to be reasonable and within the authority of the board, and it reversed the lower court judgment granting the peremptory writ of mandate.

Amerio v. City & County of San Francisco (1954) 126 Cal. App. 2d 359, 271 P.2d 996 , was an appeal by the city and county and members of its civil service commission from a judgment of the superior court entered in a proceeding for an injunction and a writ of mandate. The commission had set up an open examination for the position of Maintenance Chief at the San Francisco airport, and as a minimum requirement necessary to take the examination it had included a substantial amount of paid experience in construction work. Petitioners, civil service employees assigned to positions as Crew Chief or Airport Attendant at the airport, could not qualify for the examination under these minimum qualifications. The superior court ordered the commission to abandon its intention of holding an open examination for which petitioners were not qualified and instead to hold a promotional examination. The court of appeal held that the commission had not abused its discretion in fixing the minimum qualifications that must be met to be eligible for the examination and that absent a showing of arbitrary, fraudulent, or capricious conduct, or a clear abuse of discretion, the commission's determination was conclusive. The court therefore reversed the judgment of the lower court.

§ 36.50 Supporting Petition for Writ of Mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086] to Compel Civil Service Commission to Certify Petitioner for Appointment From Eligible List to Civil Service Position

[Caption. See § 36.20.]

A MANDATE PROCEEDING IS THE PROPER MEANS BY WHICH TO COMPEL A CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION TO CERTIFY PETITIONER FOR APPOINTMENT FROM AN ELIGIBLE LIST TO A CIVIL SERVICE POSITION.

A. Mandate to Compel Performance of Mandatory Duty. [See § 36.46, Paragraph A.]

B. Mandate to Review Performance of Discretionary Duty. The fact that a civil service commission is not required to give a disappointed job applicant a hearing does not make the mandate procedure inapplicable; it merely affects the form of mandate that must be invoked. Thus, the commission's discretionary denial of a hearing is reviewable on a petition for a writ of ordinary mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, which is used to review agency decisions when the agency is not required to hold a hearing (DeCuir v. Los Angeles County (1998) 64 Cal. App. 4th 75, 80-83, 75 Cal. Rptr. 2d 102).

C. Mandate to Compel Civil Service Commission to Certify Petitioner. A mandate proceeding is the proper means by which to compel a civil service commission to certify for appointment the name of the person ranking highest on the current list of eligibles for the position to be filled (Ballf v. Civil Serv. Comm'n (1941) 43 Cal. App. 2d 211, 213, 110 P.2d 478).

[Optional] D. Certification of Eligibility. When a vacancy occurs for a civil service position, the State Personnel Board must certify to the appointing power the names of the three persons standing highest on the promotional employment list for the class in which the position belongs (Gov. Code § 19057).

[a] Use of Form

This memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to compel a civil service commission to certify petitioner for appointment to an available civil service position. Counsel should include in the form either optional Paragraph D or a paragraph citing appropriate local authority for civil service appointments.

Counsel should insert argument in this from showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Mandate to Review Performance of Discretionary Duty

DeCuir v. Los Angeles County (1998) 64 Cal. App. 4th 75 , arose from the plaintiff's unsuccessful application for a civil service position with the county. The plaintiff protested to the civil service commission that he had been treated unfairly in the application and interview process. Following the civil service commission's refusal of plaintiff's request for a hearing, the plaintiff filed a damages suit against the county. After the plaintiff obtained a jury verdict for damages, the county appealed, contending that the plaintiff's failure to seek a writ of mandate precluded a civil damages suit. The court of appeal agreed with the county and reversed the judgment. The court held that the only judicial remedy available to an unsuccessful applicant for a civil service position is a petition for a writ of mandate. In such a case, a civil suit challenging the civil service decision is not an available remedy, unless the employee or job applicant is making a claim of unlawful discrimination (for example, under Title VII of the Federal Civil Rights Act or the California Fair Employment and Housing Act). The fact that in this case the civil service commission had not given the plaintiff a hearing did not make mandate inapplicable; the commission's discretionary denial of a hearing would have been reviewable on a petition for a writ of ordinary mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085 (64 Cal. App. 4th 75, 80-83).

[b] Mandate to Compel Civil Service Commission to Certify Petitioner

Ballf v. Civil Serv. Comm'n (1941) 43 Cal. App. 2d 211, 110 P.2d 478 , was an appeal by respondent commission and its members from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding brought to compel the commission to certify plaintiff's name to the board of supervisors as appointee for the position of "General Clerk-Stenographer" in the office of the board. When a position had become available in the clerk-stenographer classification, an employee who had stood ninth on the list of eligibles for such classification was transferred to the position. Plaintiff, who had stood eighth on the list of eligibles for the position, desired the position and had not waived his rights to the position as had the other seven people ranking above him and the transferred employee. The trial court held that the commission had violated the governing charter when it refused to certify the name of the person ranking highest on the current list of eligibles for the position to be filled. The court of appeal agreed with the superior court. Although it agreed that a plaintiff's seniority should date from the time he was entitled to certification, the court modified the lower court judgment by striking the provisions which eliminated the necessity of plaintiff's serving a probationary period. Thus modified, the court affirmed the judgment and ordered that a peremptory writ issue and that plaintiff recover his costs of appeal.

§ 36.51 Supporting Petition for Writ of Mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086] to Compel Civil Service Commission to Fill Vacant Position Through Holding of Promotional Examination

[Caption. See § 36.20.]

A MANDATE PROCEEDING IS THE PROPER MEANS BY WHICH TO COMPEL A CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION TO FILL A VACANT POSITION THROUGH THE HOLDING OF A PROMOTIONAL EXAMINATION AND THE PROMOTION OF A CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEE.

A. Mandate to Compel Performance of Mandatory Duty. [See § 36.46, Paragraph A.]

[Optional] B. Duty to Fill Vacancy Through Promotion. Vacancies in positions should be filled, insofar as it is consistent with the best interests of the state, from among employees holding positions in appropriate classes, and open, nonpromotional examinations must be held only when, in the judgment of the board, open competition will produce eligible lists with more highly skilled qualified candidates and is consistent with the best interests of the state (Gov. Code § 18950).

C. Mandatory Duty. Provisions requiring a civil service board to provide for promotion in the system on the basis of ascertained merit, seniority in service, and standing on competitive exams, and to provide, in all cases when practicable, that vacancies be filled by promotion from among members of the next lower rank are mandatory provisions, and a board acts in excess of its jurisdiction if it fails to give a promotional exam when there are employees who, by reason of their position, possess the prerequisite qualifications and are thus qualified to take the exam (Rhodehamel v. Civil Serv. Bd. (1941) 18 Cal. 2d 709, 711, 712, 117 P.2d 349).

D. Mandate to Compel Civil Service Commission to Fill Vacant Position Through Holding of Promotional Exam. A proceeding in mandate is the proper means by which to compel a civil service commission to fill a vacant position through the holding of a promotional exam and the promotion of a civil service employee (Rhodehamel v.

[a] Use of Form

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to compel a civil service commission to fill a vacant position through the holding of a promotional examination and the promotion of a civil service employee. Counsel should include in the form either optional Paragraph B or a paragraph citing appropriate local authority for a mandatory duty to fill vacant positions through promotion.

Counsel should add argument linking the points in this form with the facts of his or her case.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Mandatory Duty

Rhodehamel v. Civil Serv. Bd. (1941) 18 Cal. 2d 709, 117 P.2d 349 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding brought to compel respondent city board to hold a promotional examination rather than an open examination for the position of Senior Account Clerk. When a vacancy had occurred in that position and there was no existing eligible list from which the position could have been filled, the board had decided to hold an open examination. The superior court upheld the board's decision.

The Supreme Court reversed, adopting the opinion of the court of appeal. The Court held that the city charter provisions requiring the holding of promotional examinations were mandatory and that the board must give a promotional examination whenever there were employees in the service who, by reason of their position, possessed the qualifications established by the board as prerequisites for the position (18 Cal. 2d 709, 712). The Court followed Allen v. McKinley (1941) 18 Cal. 2d 697, 117 P.2d 342 , and ruled that, regardless of the board's opinion as to the relative merits of an open or promotional examination, the board abused its discretion by holding an open examination when the duties of Intermediate Account Clerk were so related to those of Senior Account Clerk as to prepare employees in the former for promotion into the latter position (18 Cal. 2d 709, 712-713, 717) [see Allen v. McKinley (1941) 18 Cal. 2d 697, 117 P.2d 342 , discussed in § 36.51[3][b]].

[b] Mandate to Compel Civil Service Commission to Fill Vacant Position Through Promotion

The facts of Rhodehamel v. Civil Serv. Bd. (1941) 18 Cal. 2d 709, 117 P.2d 349 , are discussed in § 36.51[3][a]. Although the Court did not directly discuss the appropriateness of the writ of mandate as a remedy for the civil service board's holding of an open rather than a promotional examination for a position, the Court heard the case on that basis and reversed the lower court judgment denying the writ (18 Cal. 2d 709, 711, 717).

Allen v. McKinley (1941) 18 Cal. 2d 697, 117 P.2d 342 , was an appeal by a local civil service commission from a judgment of the superior court in a mandate proceeding brought to compel the commission to hold a promotional examination rather than an open one for the purpose of creating an eligible list for positions in the tax collector's office designated as Adjuster, Class G153. The proceeding was instituted by civil service employees in that office after the office gave notice of an open examination. In granting petitioners' motion for judgment on the pleadings, the superior court held that the employees were legally entitled to take a promotional examination for the available position and that the commission had abused its discretion in ordering an open examination.

The Supreme Court held that it was the duty of the commission to hold promotional examinations when practicable. Furthermore, whether a promotional examination was practicable was confided to the commission's limited discretion, and the courts may interfere when that discretion has been abused (18 Cal. 2d 697, 700). The court then found that an abuse of discretion had occurred (18 Cal. 2d 697, 703). The court stated that it was not impracticable to hold a promotional examination when a large group of civil service employees had the qualifications set for an open examination (18 Cal. 2d 697, 704). The court therefore affirmed the judgment of the superior court (18 Cal. 2d 697, 708).

[4] Additional Authorities

[a] Mandate to Compel Civil Service Commission to Fill Vacant Position Through Holding of Promotional Exam

In Santa Monica Mun. Employees Assn. v. City of Santa Monica (1987) 191 Cal. App. 3d 1538, 237 Cal. Rptr. 185 , the court of appeal upheld a trial court ruling granting a petition for writ of mandate to compel a city to comply with provisions of the city charter by filling all vacancies by promotion on competitive examinations unless there was approval by the personnel board of exceptional circumstances. The court stated that while there have been many changes in employment law since Rhodehamel and Allen (see discussion of cases in § 36.51[3]) were decided, until the Legislature decides otherwise or the Supreme Court rejects the determination that city employees can be given preference for vacancies, the court was bound by those decisions (191 Cal. App. 3d 1538, 1546).

Paule v. State Personnel Bd. (1974) 38 Cal. App. 3d 32, 113 Cal. Rptr. 38 , was an appeal by a civil service employee from a judgment of the superior court denying him a peremptory writ of mandate to compel the respondent board to include all state employees in a promotional examination being given for the position of Staff Counsel III in the Department of Water Resources (DWR). Petitioner, an attorney holding the position of Staff Counsel I with the Department of Real Estate, had fulfilled the qualifications for the vacancy and properly applied to take the examination, but he had not been permitted to compete because he had not been employed by the DWR. The court of appeal held that the respondent had the authority to establish classes in state government and to hold examinations either on an open promotional basis or on a restricted promotional basis. In light of the board's determination that department morale could be best maintained and the most qualified candidates secured by promoting those who are already employed by a particular department, the board had properly exercised its discretion in providing for departmental promotional examinations. The court of appeal therefore affirmed the judgment of the lower court (38 Cal. App. 3d 32, 36-37).

A MANDATE PROCEEDING IS THE PROPER MEANS BY WHICH TO COMPEL AN APPOINTING POWER TO PERFORM ITS MANDATORY DUTY TO ACCEPT THE WITHDRAWAL OF A CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEE'S RESIGNATION BEFORE ITS EFFECTIVE DATE.

A. Mandate to Compel Performance of Mandatory Duty. [See § 36.46, Paragraph A.]

B. Withdrawal of Resignation Before Effective Date. [a] Use of Form

This form of points and authorities may be submitted in support of a petition for writ of mandate to compel an appointing power to accept the withdrawal of a civil service employee's resignation where there are no valid rules governing the withdrawal of resignations and the employee attempts to withdraw his or her resignation before its effective date, before it has been accepted, and before the appointing power has acted in reliance on the resignation.

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Withdrawal of Resignation Before Effective Date

Armistead v. State Personnel Bd. (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 198, 149 Cal. Rptr. 1, 583 P.2d 744 , was an appeal from a judgment dismissing a petition for a writ of mandate. Petitioner, a civil service employee, had submitted a written resignation and then, six days later, had attempted to withdraw it. With knowledge of the attempted withdrawal, his resignation was accepted, and respondent board refused to set aside the acceptance. Petitioner sought a writ of mandate, the trial court sustained respondent's demurrer without leave to amend, and petitioner appealed. The Supreme Court reversed the trial court judgment. The Court discussed the rules governing the withdrawal of a resignation and found that the state rule, Personnel Transactions Manual § 525.11, was invalid, since it had not been promulgated or published according to the procedure established by the California Administrative Procedure Act. The Court then held that absent a valid enactment, a civil service employee is entitled to withdraw a resignation if he or she does so before its effective date, before it has been accepted, and before the appointing power acts in reliance on the resignation.

A WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD NOT ISSUE TO SET ASIDE DISCIPLINE IMPOSED BY AGENCY DUE TO ALLEGED HEARING OFFICER BIAS IN ABSENCE OF INDEPENDENT EVIDENCE OF BIAS.

A. Due Process Not Violated if Hearing Officer Not Perfectly Impartial. Without sufficient independent evidence of bias, the mere fact that an officer who presides over a dismissal or discipline hearing is selected and paid by employer, does not constitute a deprivation of due process (*Linney v. [3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Due Process Not Violated if Hearing Officer Not Perfectly Impartial

In Linney v. Turpen (1996) 42 Cal. App. 4th 763, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 813 , a San Francisco Airport police officer filed a petition for a writ of mandate to set aside discipline, after he was suspended for lying to a superior in the course of an investigation involving lost passenger property. The suspended officer had been charged with violating several rules in the airport police manual, which entitled him to a dismissal hearing under the San Francisco Charter. After a hearing, the officer was suspended for six months without pay. The superior court upheld the decision. On appeal, the suspended officer claimed, inter alia, that because the officer who presided over his dismissal hearing was selected and paid by the employer, he was deprived of due process. The court of appeal held that due process did not require a perfectly impartial hearing officer and that without independent evidence of bias, these facts alone did not constitute a deprivation of due process (42 Cal. App. 4th 763, 775-776).

§ 36.54 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086] to Set Aside Discharge of Probationary Peace Officer--No Due Process Requirements

[Caption. See § 36.53.]

A WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD NOT ISSUE TO PERMIT REINSTATEMENT OF TERMINATED PROBATIONARY PEACE OFFICER FOR ALLEGED FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH DUE PROCESS REQUIREMENTS UNDER PEACE OFFICER BILL OF RIGHTS BECAUSE PROBATIONARY PEACE OFFICERS ARE TERMINABLE AT WILL.

A. Peace Officer Bill of Rights Provides Limited Protection to Probationary Employees. The Peace Officer Bill of Rights provides only limited procedural rights to probationary police officers who, unlike tenured police officers, are not entitled to a full and fair pre-termination hearing or to be fired only upon a showing of good cause (Gov. Code § 3300 et seq.; Riveros v. City of Los Angeles (1996) 41 Cal. App. 4th 1342, 1357-1360).

B. Peace Officer Bill of Rights Does Not Affect City's Right to Terminate Employment At Will. Gov. Code § 3300 et seq. does not interfere with California Constitution, article XI, § 5, and charter cities' right to regulate either peace officers' qualifications for employment or the causes for which they may be removed (Binkley v. City of Long Beach (1993) 16 Cal. App. 4th 1795, 1809, 20 Cal. Rptr. 2d 903).

C. Probationary Peace Officers Are Terminable Without Cause. Probationary police officers have no protected property interest in their employment. They are terminable at will and can be fired for any reason, without cause, and only entitled to limited, post-termination "administrative appeal" (Riveros v. City of Los Angeles (1996) 41 Cal. App. 4th 1342, 1357-1360).

[a] Use of Form

This form of memorandum of points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a petition to the superior court for a writ of mandate seeking reinstatement of a terminated probationary police officer, claiming his or her termination failed to comply with procedural requirements in Gov. Code § 3300 et seq., the "Police Officers'Bill of RightsAct." The basis of the opposition is that probationary employees do not have protected property interest in their employment, may be terminated at-will without cause, and have limited rights to post-termination administrative hearings.

[b] Related Points and Authorities

For memoranda of points and authorities opposing petitions for writs of mandate generally, see Ch. 150, Mandate and Prohibition .

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Peace Officer Bill of Rights Provides Limited Protection to Probationary Employees

In Riveros v. City of Los Angeles (1996) 41 Cal. App. 4th 1342 , probationary police officer Riveros was discharged for misconduct for becoming sexually involved with an arrestee, although his record was otherwise free of any discipline or rule violations of any kind. Once the relationship was discovered by the department, Riveros was suspended. Thereafter, the Los Angeles police chief decided to terminate Riveros. Riveros was officially terminated but informed of rights of administrative appeal. The police hearing officer recommended against termination and in favor of suspension of Riveros. However, the chief of police signed the order terminating Riveros notwithstanding the recommendation. Riveros appealed to the Civil Service Commission, which declined to hear the appeal because of Riveros's status as a probationary officer. He then filed a petition for writ of mandate alleging that the department had failed to comply with its own rules and the Police Officers'Bill of Rights. Riveros argued that the department had failed to cite specific reasons for his termination and that he was entitled to an evidentiary hearing at which the department had the burden of proof, was required to produce evidence and to make findings supported by substantial evidence. The trial court declined to issue the writ. The court of appeal affirmed, holding that probationary officers had no protected property interest in their employment and were not entitled to the same pre-termination hearing and other procedural protections given to tenured officers and, further, that probationary officers could be terminated at-will and without cause (41 Cal. App. 4th 1342, 1357-1360).

[b] Peace Officer Bill of Rights Does Not Affect City's Right to Terminate Employment At-Will

In Binkley v. City of Long Beach (1993) 16 Cal. App. 4th 1795, 20 Cal. Rptr. 2d 903 , former Long Beach Police Chief Binkley was removed from office by the city manager. He was granted an administrative appeal, which Binkley argued was biased and unfair. He petitioned for a writ of mandate, which was granted by the superior court on the ground that the city had failed to comply with Gov. Code § 3300 et seq. The city appealed. The court of appeal reversed the trial court's decision, finding that Gov. Code § 3304 only requires that terminated employees be given an "administrative appeal," and that the particulars of the appeal process are left to the local agency. The court also found that § 3300 et seq. did not interfere with a city's right to regulate either peace officers' qualifications for employment or the causes for which they may be removed. The court held that any appeal process afforded by the city had to be measured against constitutional due process principles. At a minimum, this required that Binkley be given an opportunity to refute the charges against him and clear his name. The court found that due process was satisfied by Binkley's administrative appeal and let his termination stand (16 Cal. App. 4th 1795, 1809, 20 Cal. Rptr. 2d 903).

[c] Probationary Peace Officers Are Terminable At-Will

Riveros v. City of Los Angeles (1996) 41 Cal. App. 4th 1342 , is discussed in § 36.54[3][a].

§ 36.55 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086] to Review Discipline of Civil Service Employee--Degree of Punishment Not Subject to Review

[1] FORM

[Caption. See § 36.53.]

A WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD NOT ISSUE TO OVERTURN DISCIPLINARY DECISION OR DISCHARGE OF CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEE BY ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCY IN THE ABSENCE OF AN ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

A. Court Not Free to Review Degree of Punishment Imposed by Agency in Absence of Abuse of Discretion. Although appellate courts conduct a de novo review of possible abuse of discretion by administrative agency, in the absence of such a showing, the court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the agency concerning the degree of punishment imposed in a disciplinary action (Deegan v. City of Mountain View (1999) 72 Cal. App. 4th 37, 45-47, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 690 ; Cummings v. Civil Service Commission (1995) 40 Cal. App. 4th 1643, 1652, 47 Cal. Rptr. 2d 775).

B. Employer Permitted to Impose More Severe Penalty Than That Proposed by Hearing Officer. A public employer can impose a more severe penalty than that recommended by the hearing officer and the employer's decision cannot be disturbed unless a manifest abuse of discretion is shown (Boctor v. Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transit Authority (1996) 48 Cal. App. 4th 560, 574-575, 55 Cal. Rptr. 2d 861).

C. Similar Charges Need Not Result In Identical Penalties. There is no requirement that a public agency impose identical penalties for similar charges; therefore, the mere fact that the agency imposes different punishments in similar cases does not establish an abuse of discretion (Pegues v. Civil Service Comm'n (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 95, 106, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 705).

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Court Not Free to Review Degree of Punishment Imposed by Agency in Absence of Abuse of Discretion

In Deegan v. City of Mountain View (1999) 72 Cal. App. 4th 37, 84 Cal. Rptr. 2d 690 , a city appeals board discharged an employee after a reckless driving incident. The trial court granted the employee's petition for a writ of mandate, after finding that the penalty was excessive. The court of appeal reversed, reinstating the penalty imposed by the city. The court of appeal explained that the standards of review by the trial court differ greatly depending on the issues involved. With respect to culpability (that is, whether the employee in fact committed the misconduct alleged), a trial court has extensive powers to review an administrative agency's determination and may exercise its independent judgment on the evidence (72 Cal. App. 4th 37, 45). With respect to the penalty, however, the trial court's powers of review are limited and are exercised only with great deference to the agency's findings. Thus, the court is required to uphold the penalty imposed by the agency if there is any reasonable basis for it; the penalty will not be disturbed unless a manifest abuse of discretion is shown. An abuse of discretion exists only if reasonable minds cannot disagree that the penalty is excessive (72 Cal. App. 4th 37, 46-47).

In Cummings v. Civil Service Commission (1995) 40 Cal. App. 4th 1643, 47 Cal. Rptr. 2d 775 , the Los Angeles County Probation Department discharged a deputy probation officer for misuse of authority, violating confidential records and lying to his superiors and other government officials. The county Civil Service Commission sustained the discharge. Cummings petitioned for a writ of mandate, which the trial court denied. The court of appeal reviewed the issue of abuse of discretion de novo, holding that in the absence of such a finding on the part of the administrative agency, neither the appellate court nor the trial court is permitted to substitute its discretion for that of administrative agency concerning the degree of punishment imposed on the employee (40 Cal. App. 4th 1643, 1652).

[b] Employer Permitted to Impose More Severe Penalty Than That Proposed by Hearing Officer

Boctor v. Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transit Authority (1996) 48 Cal. App. 4th 560, 55 Cal. Rptr. 2d 861 , involved a vehicle operations manager for the Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transit Authority who engaged in a pattern of sexual harassment. An internal investigation confirmed all the charges against Boctor. Boctor appealed the findings internally before a hearing officer. The hearing officer recommended that Boctor not be demoted but rather suspended for 30 days and made to attend appropriate workplace training courses. The employer rejected the hearing officer's findings and recommendations and demoted Boctor to the position of bus operator. Boctor then appealed for a writ of mandate, contending that his employer lacked authority to reject the hearing officer's recommendations. The trial court denied the petition and the court of appeal affirmed. The court of appeal found that Boctor's employer acted within its proper authority in rejecting the hearing officer's findings and held that a public employer can impose a more severe penalty than that recommended by hearing officer. Furthermore, absent a manifest abuse of discretion, the employer's decision cannot be disturbed by the court (48 Cal. App. 4th 560, 574-575).

[c] Similar Charges Need Not Result In Identical Penalties

In Pegues v. Civil Service Comm'n (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 95, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 705 , a county civil service commission upheld the discharge of a department of social services employee who had provided false information on her application for food stamps. The employee petitioned for a writ of mandate compelling her reinstatement. The employee contended, among other things, that she had been subjected to disparate treatment because other employees who committed similar offenses had not been discharged. The trial court granted the writ, but the court of appeal reversed, observing that the allegedly similar cases adduced by the employee were in fact substantially different from the employee's case (67 Cal. App. 4th 95, 105-106). The court went on to hold that in any event, when it comes to a public agency's imposition of punishment, there is no requirement that charges similar in nature must result in identical penalties. The mere fact that the agency imposed different punishments in similar cases was not a ground for reinstating the employee in this case (67 Cal. App. 4th 95, 106). Thus, since the decision to discharge the employee was within the discretion of the civil service commission, the trial court erred in substituting its own judgment for that of the commission concerning the appropriate penalty for the employee's misconduct (67 Cal. App. 4th 95, 106-108).

§ 36.56 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate [Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086] to Review Discipline of Civil Service Employee--Writ Barred by Laches

[1] FORM

[Caption. See § 36.53.]

A WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD NOT ISSUE BECAUSE THE PETITION IS BARRED BY LACHES.

Laches Bars Administrative Mandate if Employee's Unreasonable Delay in Seeking Writ of Mandate Has Prejudiced Employer. Judicial review of a personnel decision of a public agency must be sought promptly. If the employee has unreasonably delayed seeking that review, either before or after filing a petition for a writ of administrative mandate, and if that delay prejudices the employer, then the petition is barred by laches (Johnson v. City of Loma Linda (2000) 24 Cal. 4th 61, 68-69, 99 Cal. Rptr. 2d 316, 5 P.3d 874).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

These points and authorities may be submitted in opposition to a petition for administrative mandate that has not been filed promptly after the decision that the employee seeks to have reviewed.

[b] Argument

plus the salary of the replacement employee (see Johnson v. City of Loma Linda (2000) 24 Cal. 4th 61, 68-69, 99 Cal. Rptr. 2d 316, 5 P.3d 874).

Any of the other points and authorities for opposing mandamus that are set out in this chapter may be combined with this form.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Laches Bars Administrative Mandate if Employee's Unreasonable Delay in Seeking Writ of Mandate has Prejudiced Employer

In Johnson v. City of Loma Linda (2000) 24 Cal. 4th 61, 99 Cal. Rptr. 2d 316, 5 P.3d 874 , the plaintiff was a terminated city employee who had filed a grievance with the city; the grievance was rejected by the city's personnel board in September 1993 and upheld by the city council in December 1993. The plaintiff then filed an administrative charge with the Department of Fair Employment and Housing, and a year later he was issued a right-to-sue letter. In July 1995, the plaintiff brought suit against the city for violation of the Fair Employment and Housing Act (Gov. Code § 12900 et seq.) and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. § 2000 et seq.). At the same time, the plaintiff petitioned for a writ of administrative mandate, challenging the actions of the city's personnel board and the city council. The trial court granted the city's motion for summary judgment and found that laches barred the plaintiff from pursuing the writ of administrative mandate. The court also found that the plaintiff was bound by the administrative findings against him because he had failed to judicially challenge them. The court of appeal reversed the judgment with respect to the Title VII claim and affirmed the rest of the judgment.

The Supreme Court held that the employee's petition for mandate was indeed barred by laches. The review of a personnel decision of a public agency must be sought promptly. In this case, the employee had delayed both before and after filing the petition for administrative mandate. The plaintiff had waited 18 months after the city council's action to file the petition for mandate; then, after filing the petition, he failed to pursue it for another 18 months. The Court also found that this unreasonable delay would prejudice the employer, since in the interim the employer had divided the plaintiff's former duties among several other employees. Granting the plaintiff's requested relief (reinstatement and back pay) would require the city to significantly alter its new structure and incur double payments: back wages to the plaintiff and salaries to the employees. Accordingly, since the delay was unreasonable and would prejudice the employer, the petition for mandate was barred (24 Cal. 4th 61, 68-69).

§ 36.57 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate to Review Discipline of Public Safety Officer--Statute of Limitations for Imposition of Discipline Was Tolled or Extended

[Insert appropriate opposition caption.]

A WRIT OF MANDATE SHOULD NOT ISSUE TO SET ASIDE THE DISCIPLINE IMPOSED ON THE PETITIONER BECAUSE THE LIMITATIONS PERIOD ESTABLISHED BY THE PUBLIC SAFETY OFFICERS PROCEDURAL BILL OF RIGHTS ACT WAS _____ [TOLLED or REASONABLY EXTENDED] AND HAD NOT EXPIRED AT THE RELEVANT TIME.

Statute of Limitations for Imposition of Discipline on Public Safety Officers Is Subject to Tolling and Extension. The one-year limitations period for the imposition of discipline on public safety officers under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act is subject to tolling or reasonable extension under the circumstances specified in the Act, including _____ [specify, e.g., when criminal prosecution is pending or when the investigation of the underlying incident involves more than one employee and requires a reasonable extension] (Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1); see Parra v. City & County of S.F. (2006) 144 Cal. App. 4th 977, 993-998, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 822).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This form may be used to oppose a petition to the superior court for a writ of mandate asserting that discipline imposed on a peace officer is barred by the one-year statute of limitations established by the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3304(d)). That statute provides that, with specified exceptions, no punitive action or denial of promotion on grounds other than merit may be undertaken for any act, omission, or other allegation of misconduct if the investigation of the allegation is not completed within one year of the public agency's discovery (by a person authorized to initiate an investigation of the allegation) of an act, omission, or other misconduct (Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1)). The exceptions to the one-year period are as follows (Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(A)-(H)):

- If the act, omission, or other allegation of misconduct is also the subject of a criminal investigation or criminal prosecution, the one-year time period is tolled while the criminal investigation or criminal prosecution is pending.

- If the public safety officer waives the one-year time period in writing, the time period is tolled for the period of time specified in the written waiver.

- If the investigation is a multijurisdictional investigation that requires a reasonable extension for coordination of the involved agencies (see Breslin v. City & County of San Francisco (2007) 146 Cal. App. 4th 1064, 1083-1085, 55 Cal. Rptr. 3d 14 (that two city agencies--police department and office of citizen complaints--were investigating incident did not make investigation "multijurisdictional," since city's police commission had power to control and coordinate both agencies' investigative activities)).

- If the investigation involves more than one employee and requires a reasonable extension.

- If the investigation involves an employee who is incapacitated or otherwise unavailable.

- If the investigation involves a matter in civil litigation in which the public safety officer is named as a party defendant, the one-year time period is tolled while that civil action is pending (see Bettencourt v. City & County of San Francisco (2007) 146 Cal. App. 4th 1090, 1098-1101, 53 Cal. Rptr. 3d 402 (civil action against peace officer has tolling effect even if it does not impede public agency's investigation, so long as investigation and civil action involve same incident); Breslin v. City & County of San Francisco (2007) 146 Cal. App. 4th 1064, 1081, 55 Cal. Rptr. 3d 14 (civil action has no tolling effect as to officer who is not named as defendant)).

- If the investigation involves a matter in criminal litigation in which the complainant is a criminal defendant, the one-year time period is tolled during the period of that defendant's criminal investigation and prosecution.

- If the investigation involves an allegation of workers' compensation fraud on the part of the public safety officer.

The one-year period is also tolled during any time that the officer is discharged from service as a public safety officer (Melkonians v. Los Angeles County Civil Serv. Comm'n (2009) 174 Cal. App. 4th 1159, 1174, 95 Cal. Rptr. 3d 415 (officer who had been discharged for previous violation and then reinstated was not entitled to protections of Public Safety Officers Bill or Rights Act while he was not public safety officer, so one-year period under Gov. Code § 3304(d) was tolled during period of his discharge)).

[b] Opposing Memoranda

In an appropriate case, the memorandum set out in § 36.20 may be used to oppose the contention supported by this form.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Statute of Limitations for Imposition of Discipline on Public Safety Officers Is Subject to Tolling

Parra v. City & County of S.F. (2006) 144 Cal. App. 4th 977, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 822 , arose from an investigation of an incident that initially involved three off-duty San Francisco police officers and eventually included several other offers who alleged failed to conduct or cooperate with proper investigation. Ultimately, the fallout from the incident included criminal indictments against 10 officers, a federal civil case, a state civil case, and extensive criminal and administrative investigations by the local police department that employed the officers. The underlying incident occurred on November 20, 2002. Disciplinary charges were eventually filed with the San Francisco Police Commission and served against seven officers on July 26, 2004. Before the commission, the officers moved to dismiss the charges as untimely under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3300 et seq.). The Act provides that, with specified exceptions, "no punitive action, nor denial of promotion on grounds other than merit, shall be undertaken for any act, omission, or other allegation of misconduct if the investigation of the allegation is not completed within one year of the public agency's discovery by a person authorized to initiate an investigation of the allegation of an act, omission, or other misconduct" (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1)).

The police commission denied the officers' motion to dismiss, finding that the one-year limitations period was subject to four of the statutory exceptions. First, the commission concluded that the one-year limitations period had been tolled during the pendency of a criminal investigation of the conduct that was involved in the disciplinary charges (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(A)). The commission also held that the limitations period was tolled by the pendency of a federal civil suit that had been filed as a result of the underlying incident (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(F)). Finally, the commission concluded alternatively that the disciplinary charges were timely, because the multi-jurisdictional nature of the investigation and the fact that multiple officers were under investigation both required reasonable extension of the investigative period (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(C),(D)).

The officers then petitioned for administrative mandamus, which the trial court denied. The court of appeal affirmed, holding that the one-year period was tolled during the criminal investigation and prosecution. The court held that this tolling applied even as to officers who were not prosecuted. The relevant statutory provision provides for tolling "[i]f the act, omission, or other allegation of misconduct is also the subject of a criminal investigation or criminal prosecution, the time during which the criminal investigation or criminal prosecution is pending shall toll the one-year time period" (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(A)). The court of appeal read this language as tolling the one-year period for all of the officers involved, since the criminal investigation included all of the conduct at issue in the disciplinary charges, even though not all of the officers were prosecuted in the criminal proceedings (144 Cal. App. 4th 977, 993-994) .

Because the criminal prosecution concluded in April 2003, and the disciplinary charges were filed more than a year later--in July 2004--the question remained whether another exception to the limitations period was also applicable. Turning to that question, the court of appeal agreed with the police commission that the provision allowing a reasonable extension of the limitations period when multiple officers are investigated was applicable (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(D)). Further, the court concluded that a three-month extension was reasonable under the complex circumstances of this case, which involved numerous officers, including at one point or another the chief of police, the chief's assistant, various deputy chiefs, and many other ranking officers. Also involved were captains, lieutenants, lieutenants supervising sergeants, sergeants supervising line officers, and line officers themselves. The court of appeal found it significant that "[t]he integrity of the San Francisco Police Department, top to bottom, was in focus here, providing abundant evidence supporting an extension of the limitation provision" (144 Cal. App. 4th 977, 997) . Accordingly, the court concluded that the disciplinary charges, which were filed one year and three months after the conclusion of the criminal proceedings, were timely (144 Cal. App. 4th 977, 995-998) .

Because the criminal investigation and multiple officer exceptions (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(A),(D)) were clearly applicable and sufficient to make the disciplinary charges timely in this case, the court of appeal found it unnecessary to consider the applicability of the other exceptions relied on by the police commission (144 Cal. App. 4th 977, 995-998 ; now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(2)(C),(F)).

[1] FORM

[The following may be included in a memorandum or in a trial or appellate brief.]

THE PETITIONER'S FAILURE TO RAISE THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS IN THE ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEEDINGS BELOW PRECLUDES MANDATE REVIEW OF THAT ISSUE BY THIS COURT.

Statute of Limitations Defense Under Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act Must Be Raised in Administrative Hearing Before Mandamus Relief Can Be Sought. The one-year limitations period for imposing discipline on public safety officers under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3300 et seq.) must be asserted by an officer during administrative proceedings. A failure to do so forfeits the statute of limitations defense in subsequent proceedings for a writ of mandate (Moore v. City of Los Angeles (2007) 156 Cal. App. 4th 373, 382-383, 386, 67 Cal. Rptr. 3d 218).

[2] Comments

[a] Use of Form

This form may be used to oppose a contention that a discipline imposed on a peace officer is barred by the one-year statute of limitations established by the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (Gov. Code § 3304(d)). In an appropriate case, this form may be used in opposition to the form set forth in § 36.20.

[b] Argument

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Statute of Limitations Defense Under Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act Must Be Raised in Administrative Hearing Before Mandamus Relief Can Be Sought

In Moore v. City of Los Angeles (2007) 156 Cal. App. 4th 373, 67 Cal. Rptr. 3d 218 , a Los Angeles police officer was terminated after five charges of misconduct were sustained. The officer then sought a writ of mandate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5, arguing that the termination was barred by the one-year statute of limitations under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights (see Gov. Code § 3304(d)). The superior court denied the writ, ruling that the officer had forfeited the statute of limitations defense by failing to raise it in his hearing before the city's board of review.

The court of appeal affirmed, noting that California law has long provided that a statute of limitations defense must be raised at an administrative hearing before relief may be sought on that ground in a mandate proceeding. The reason for the rule is that the review of administrative proceedings provided under Code Civ. Proc. § 1094.5 ordinarily is confined to the issues appearing in the record of the administrative body as made out by the parties to the proceedings (156 Cal. App. 4th 373, 382-383) . Thus, even if it would have been "futile" to assert the statute of limitations in the administrative board hearing, a failure to assert it will result in forfeiture of the issue, because any matter not appearing in the administrative record will not be before the trial court in a subsequent mandate proceeding (156 Cal. App. 4th 373, 386) .

In affirming the superior court's denial of mandate, the court of appeal noted that the officer could have asserted the statute of limitations in an alternative proceeding seeking injunctive relief under Gov. Code § 3309.5(a), which makes it which makes it "unlawful for any public safety department to deny or refuse to any public safety officer the rights and protections guaranteed to him or her by this chapter." Because the superior court would have had initial jurisdiction over a proceeding for injunctive relief under Gov. Code § 3309.5, the court could have granted such relief despite the officer's failure to assert the statute of limitations before the administrative board (Gov. Code § 3309.5(c)). However, the officer in this case had not proceeded under Gov. Code § 3309.5 and never invoked the superior court's initial jurisdiction (156 Cal. App. 4th 373, 383-386) .

§ 36.59 Opposing Petition for Writ of Mandate to Review Discipline of Public Safety Officer--Notice of Disciplinary Action Timely and Sufficient

[The following may be included in a memorandum or in a trial or appellate brief.]

A. Agency Must Provide Written Notice of Disciplinary Action Within One Year of Discovery of Violation. Under the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act, a public agency intending to take disciplinary action against an officer must provide the officer written notice of disciplinary action within one year of the discovery, by a person authorized to initiate an investigation, of the allegation of the act, omission, or misconduct that is the cause of discipline (Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1); Benefield v. Department of Corrections & Rehabilitation (2009) 171 Cal. App. 4th 469, 476-477, 89 Cal. Rptr. 3d 608). Notification of the proposed discipline is given in a Letter of Intent or Notice of Adverse Action articulating the proposed discipline (Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1)). The agency is not required to impose the discipline within the one-year period (Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1)).

[Optional] B. Officer's False Statement During Investigation Constitutes Separate Misconduct That Triggers New One-Year Period. If an officer under investigation for misconduct makes a false statement about that matter during the one-year period for investigating the alleged misconduct, the false statement constitutes a separate offense with its own one-year period for investigation and notification of proposed discipline (Crawford v. City of Los Angeles (2009) 175 Cal. App. 4th 249, 256-258, 95 Cal. Rptr. 3d 550).

[Optional] C. Notice of Disciplinary Action Need Not Identify Person Who Decided to Impose Discipline. The Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act does not require that a public agency's notice of proposed discipline identify the decisionmaker (Benefield v. Department of Corrections & Rehabilitation (2009) 171 Cal. App. 4th 469, 477, 89 Cal. Rptr. 3d 608 ; see Gov. Code § 3304(d)).

This form may be used to oppose a contention that a discipline imposed on a peace officer is barred by the one-year statute of limitations established by the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (*Gov. [b] Argument

Counsel should insert argument in this form showing the relationship between the facts of the case and the points of law stated. Thus, counsel should show that the notice of disciplinary action was provided to the officer within the statutory period (see Gov. Code § 3304(d)), that it specified the alleged misconduct, and that it stated the matter would be adjudicated by an administrative tribunal.

[3] Discussion of Authorities

[a] Agency Must Provide Written Notice of Disciplinary Action Within One Year of Discovery of Violation

Benefield v. Department of Corrections & Rehabilitation (2009) 171 Cal. App. 4th 469, 89 Cal. Rptr. 3d 608 , involved discipline imposed by the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) for misconduct by two correctional officers employed by the CDCR. One issue was whether the CDCR had provided the officers with notice of disciplinary action within the one-year limitation provided by the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1)). Specifically, the question was whether the one-year period began to run when the incident of misconduct occurred and was observed by a fellow correctional officer, or when that fellow officer reported the misconduct to the CDCR. The officer who observed the incident was not herself authorized by the CDRC manual to initiate an investigation of the misconduct, but she testified that she had not immediately reported the misconduct because she believed that a correctional lieutenant also knew about the misconduct and would initiate an investigation. When it became apparent that the lieutenant had not initiated an investigation, the officer who observed the misconduct reported the incident to the CDCR, which then initiated an investigation. The CDCR sent the notice of disciplinary action within one year of the report of the incident to the CDCR, but more than a year after the incident itself. The court of appeal held that the notice was timely, because the Public Safety Officers Procedural Bill of Rights Act specifies that the one-year period begins to run on the "agency's discovery by a person authorized to initiate an investigation of the allegation of an act, omission, or other misconduct" (now see Gov. Code § 3304(d)(1) (emphasis added)). Since the officer who observed the alleged misconduct had not been authorized to initiate an investigation, her knowledge of the incident did not constitute "discovery" by the agency so as to trigger the running of the one-year period. Further, even if that officer was correct that the lieutenant knew of the incident, his knowledge did not constitute "discovery" by the agency, because there was no evidence that he held a position with authority under the CDRC manual to initiate an investigation. Therefore, the one-year period did not begin to run until the report of the incident to the CDCR (171 Cal. App. 4th 469, 476-477) .

[b] Officer's False Statement During Investigation Constitutes Separate Misconduct That Triggers New One-Year Period

One issue in Crawford v. City of Los Angeles (2009) 175 Cal. App. 4th 249, 95 Cal. Rptr. 3d 550 , was how one-year statute of limitations for a police department to investigate and notify an officer of proposed discipline (see Gov. Code § 3304(d)) should be applied to a charge of making a false statement during the official investigation of other alleged misconduct. In this case, the officer's allegedly false statement was made before the limitations period expired on the underlying charge. The department's notice of proposed discipline, which included the charge of making of a false statement, was issued after the limitations period had expired on the underlying charge. However, the notice was well within one year of the allegedly false statement (175 Cal. App. 4th 249, 257) .
