1 of 199 DOCUMENTS

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Author(s)

Author(s)

THOMPSON ON REAL PROPERTY
SECOND THOMAS EDITION

DAVID A. THOMAS Editor-in-Chief Volume 1
2010

2 of 199 DOCUMENTS

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Questions?

Questions?

Technical Questions?

Phone: (800) 223-5297
Fax: (800) 533-1645 or (518) 487-3191
E-Mail: technical.support@lexisnexis.com
Visit Our Web Site: http://www.lexis.com

Editorial Questions?

For questions about the Editorial Content appearing in these volumes or reprint permission, please call: Real Estate
Nancy Greening, J.D. nancy.h.greening@lexisnexis.com at 1-800-252-9257 Ext. 2593
Kelly Prichett, J.D. kelly.a.prichett@lexisnexis.com at 1-800-424-0651 Ext. 3361
For assistance with replacement pages, shipments, billing or other customer service matters, please call:
Customer Services Department at(800) 833-9844
Outside the United States and Canada, please call (518) 487-3000
Fax Number(518) 487-3584
Customer Service Websitehttp://www.lexisnexis.com/custserv/
For information on other Matthew Bender publications, please call
Your account manager or (800) 223-1940
Outside the United States and Canada, please call(518) 487-3000

3 of 199 DOCUMENTS

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Cite As

Cite As

For volumes 1 through 12, cite this treatise as [Volume #] Thompson on Real Property, Second Thomas Edition (David A. Thomas, ed. LexisNexis).
For volume 13, cite this treatise as 13 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Edition (David A. Thomas, ed. LexisNexis).

4 of 199 DOCUMENTS

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Copyright

Copyright

This publication is designed to provide accurate and authoritative information in regard to the subject matter covered. It is sold with the understanding that the publisher is not engaged in rendering legal, accounting, or other professional services. If legal advice or other expert assistance is required, the services of a competent professional should be sought.

LexisNexis, the knowledge burst logo, and Michie are trademarks of Reed Elsevier Properties Inc, used under license. Matthew Bender is a registered trademark of Matthew Bender Properties Inc.

Copyright © 2010 Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.
All Rights Reserved.

No copyright is claimed in the text of statutes, regulations, and excerpts from court opinions quoted within this work. Permission to copy material exceeding fair use, 17 U.S.C. § 107, may be licensed for a fee of 25cent(s) per page per copy from the Copyright Clearance Center, 222 Rosewood Drive, Danvers, Mass. 01923, telephone (978) 750-8400.
ISBN 978-1-5583-4156-2
Library of Congress Card Number: 98-85590

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

PROFESSOR JAMES H. BACKMAN
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University
Chapter 39

PROFESSOR JAMES L. BROSS
College of Law
Georgia State University
Chapter 62

PROFESSOR RICHARD B. COLLINS
School of Law
University of Colorado
Chapter 57

PROFESSOR MARK W. CORDES
College of Law
Northern Illinois University
Chapters 42 and 43

PROFESSOR RICHARD B. CUNNINGHAM
Hastings College of the Law
University of California
Chapters 53 and 66

PROFESSOR JEROME J. CURTIS, JR.
McGeorge School of Law
University of the Pacific
Chapter 101

PROFESSOR MICHAEL J. DAVIS
School of Law
University of Kansas
Chapter 81

PROFESSOR RAY JAY DAVIS (1927-2000)
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University
Chapter 71

PROFESSOR DOUGLAS R. HADDOCK
School of Law
St. Mary's University of San Antonio
Chapter 37

PROFESSOR BUDDY O. H. HERRING
School of Law
Wake Forest University
Chapters 89 and 100

PROFESSOR GEORGE LEFCOE
The Law Center
University of Southern California
Chapters 12, 85, 94, 95, 97, 98, 102 and 104

PROFESSOR LEONARD LEVIN (1924-1993)
School of Law
Villanova University
Chapter 86

PROFESSOR OLAN LOWREY
School of Law
Temple University
Chapter 87

DEAN RICHARDSON R. LYNN
Pepperdine Law School
Pepperdine University
Chapter 78

DEAN JOHN MAKDISI
College of Law
University of Tulsa
Chapter 30

PROFESSOR MARLA E. MANSFIELD
College of Law
University of Tulsa
Chapters 48 and 49

PROFESSOR VICTORIA MIKESELL MATHER
School of Law
St. Mary's University of San Antonio
Chapter 88

PROFESSOR JOHN L. MCCORMACK
School of Law
Loyola University, Chicago
Chapters 92 and 93

PROFESSOR JOHN V. ORTH
School of Law
University of North Carolina
Chapters 31-33

PROFESSOR JOHN H. PEARSON
Notre Dame Law School
University of Notre Dame
Chapter 60

PROFESSOR RONALD W. POLSTON
School of Law
Indiana University, Indianapolis
Chapters 46, 64-65

PROFESSOR PATRICIA YOUNGBLOOD REYHAN
Albany Law School
Union University
Chapter 38

PROFESSOR N. GREGORY SMITH
Law Center
Louisiana State University
Chapters 40, 41, and 45

PROFESSOR DAVID A. THOMAS
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University
Chapters 1-9, 12, 13, 15-26, 28, 29, 51, 54, 55, 59, 67-70, 72, 74, 75, 76, 78-81, 84, 85, 91, 95, 96, 103, 105 and 106

PROFESSOR PATSY W. THOMLEY
Cumberland School of Law
Samford University
Chapter 35

PROFESSOR RONALD R. VOLKMER
School of Law
Creighton University
Chapters 82 and 83

PROFESSOR JAMES B. WADLEY
School of Law
Washburn University
Chapters 47, 50 and 79

PROFESSOR ALAN M. WEINBERGER
School of Law
Saint Louis University
Chapters 34, 44 and 99

PROFESSOR JOHN C. WELSH
Albany Law School
Union University
Chapter 52

PROFESSOR FREDERIC WHITE
Cleveland-Marshall College of Law
Cleveland State University
Chapter 36

PROFESSOR CARYL A. YZENBAARD
Salmon P. Chase College of Law
Northern Kentucky University
Chapters 56 and 58

6 of 199 DOCUMENTS

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions CONTRIBUTOR TO VOLUME 1

CONTRIBUTOR TO VOLUME 1

PROFESSOR DAVID A. THOMAS
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University
Chapters 1-7

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions AUTHOR BIOGRAPHIES

AUTHOR BIOGRAPHIES

David A. Thomas

David A. Thomas is the Rex E. Lee Endowed Chair and Professor of Law at Brigham Young University's J. Reuben Clark Law School, where he has taught since 1974. He was born in Los Angeles, California, in 1944, and was educated in Utah schools after 1950. He earned his B.A. and M.L.S. degrees at Brigham Young University (1967, 1977) and his J.D. at Duke University Law School (1972), after an interruption for military service in Vietnam. Following law school graduation, he completed a federal judicial clerkship and practiced law in Salt Lake City, before joining the law school faculty at Brigham Young University. As a teacher and author in both property and civil procedure areas, he has effectively combined theory and practice in conducting real property transactions, dispute resolution, and expert witness assignments. He proposed and drafted Utah first statutory changes in common law easement rules, which were enacted as the state's enabling legislation for historic preservation easement; he also drafted Utah's long range highway corridor preservation legislation. Professor Thomas has been admitted to practice before the Utah Supreme Court, the U.S. District Court for the District of Utah, the U.S. Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, and the United States Supreme Court. He has been a bar examiner for Utah and has prepared bar examination questions for Utah and several other states. He has also served on numerous law school accreditation site inspection teams. He is a member of the real property section of the American Bar Association, where he has held numerous leadership positions. He is also a founding member of the Real Estate Transactions Section of the Association of American Law Schools.

Professor Thomas has published extensively on real property, civil procedure and common law legal history topics, including chapters in several treatises and articles in professional journals. He is the author (with Backman) of A Practical Guide to Disputes Between Adjoining Landowners, Utah Civil Practice, Utah Civil Procedure, and (with Backman) Utah Real Property Law. He is fluent in German and has been active in research and scholarly affairs in the United Kingdom and continental Europe.

James H. Backman

James H. Backman, J. Reuben Clark Law School, Brigham Young University, 1974-present. Graduate of Harvard College in 1969 magna cum laude in German Literature, and the University of Utah College of Law in 1972. He clerked for Judge Ozell Trask on the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals from 1972-1973.

Professor Backman teaches courses in the real estate law area, including Property, Real Estate Finance, Public Lands and Natural Resources, and Banking Law. He also is coordinator of LawHelp -- a series of externship projects at the law school.

Professor Backman served as European Area Legal Counsel for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints in Frankfurt, Germany from 1982-1984.

He has been a Visiting Professor of Law at Louisiana State University and the University of Illinois.

He has written and revised numerous chapters in Powell on Real Property; Zoning and Land Use and Real Estate Transactions: Financing for Matthew Bender. In 1989, he was co-author of a book with David A. Thomas, A Practical Guide to Disputes Between Adjoining Landowners -- Easements (Matthew Bender).

Professor Backman is the father of five sons and a daughter.

James L. Bross

James L. Bross has been a professor at Georgia State University College of Law since 1982, A.B., 1966, Catholic University; J.D., 1969, Catholic University School of Law; LL.M., 1971, University of Pennsylvania Law School, Prof., Lewis & Clark, 1971-1977; Assoc. Prof., Chicago-Kent, 1977-1981. Teaches Future Interests, Land Use, Local Government Law, Personal Property, Real Property and Water Rights. Associate editor of Probate and Property, 1987-1992.

Richard B. Collins

Richard B. Collins, Professor of Law, University of Colorado. B.A. in chemistry, Yale, 1960; LL.B. Harvard, 1966; Law clerk to U. S. Circuit Judge Charles M. Merrill, San Francisco; attorney with California Rural Legal Assistance and California Indian Legal Services, Santa Rosa, California; Director of Litigation with Dinebeiina Nahiilna Be Agditahe, Window Rock, Arizona; attorney with the Native American Rights Fund, Boulder, Colorado; Joined the Colorado law faculty in 1982.

Jayne L. Wallingford and William C. Hugenberg, both Colorado J.D. 1993, and John Tayer, Colorado J.D. 1993, provided research assistance for Chapter 57.

Mark W. Cordes

Mark W. Cordes, Professor of Law, Northern Illinois University College of Law, since 1983. B.S., Portland State, 1975; M.A., Fuller Theological Seminary, 1977; J.D., Willamette, 1980; J.S.M., Stanford, 1983. Teaches Environmental Law, Land Use Planning, Real Estate Transactions, and Real Property.

Richard B. Cunningham

Richard B. Cunningham, Professor of Law, University of California, Hastings College of the Law. B.S., University of California, Berkeley, 1966; J.D., University of California, Davis, 1969; LL.M., The George Washington University, 1971. Member, California Bar. Attorney, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, Office of the Chief of Engineers, Washington, D.C., 1969-1972. Wrote and managed federal regulations governing water pollution, wetlands management, and related resource and environmental matters. Member of the adjunct faculty at George Washington University, Washington, D.C., 1971-1972; faculty member at the University of California, Hastings, since 1973. Served in city government as a planning commissioner and city council member in Larkspur, California, from 1974-1981. Teaches courses in Property, Land Use Regulation, State and Local Government and Archaeology. Other publications include The California State Constitution: A Reference Guide (with Joseph Grodin and Calvin Massey, 1993).

Jerome J. Curtis, Jr.

Jerome J. Curtis, Jr., is Professor of Law at the McGeorge School of Law, University of the Pacific. B.A., University of California, Santa Barbara; J.D., Hastings College of Law, University of California; LL.M., University of Virginia; member, American Law Institute.

Michael J. Davis

Michael J. Davis has been on the University of Kansas School of Law faculty since 1971. He was Dean of the Law School from 1980-1989 and General Counsel of the University from 1974-1980. He was a member of the Lawrence/Douglas County Planning Commission for four years, the last two as Chair.

In addition to his university responsibilities, Davis is of counsel to the law firm of Stinson, Mag & Fizzell, which has offices in Kansas City, Missouri, St. Louis, Missouri and Overland Park, Kansas.

Ray Jay Davis (1927-2000)

Ray Jay Davis was a Professor of Law at the J. Reuben Clark Law School, Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah. Previously, he had been on the faculties of the law schools of the University of Arizona, Temple University, the University of Arkansas, and West Virginia University. He taught liability law courses, Water Law, and Law and Technology. He was a graduate of Idaho State University, Harvard Law School, and Columbia Law School. Professor Davis was born and raised in Idaho. He had been admitted to the bars of Idaho and Arizona.

In the natural resources law area, Davis wrote extensively about weather resources management law, the legal implications of the urban heat island effect, and law and climate change. He was the author of articles on flood law and water law. He chaired the Model State Water Code Project of the American Society of Civil Engineers.

Professor Davis was president of the Weather Modification Association, the international professional organization of physical and social scientists who work with atmospheric water resources management. He chaired several committees of the Weather Modification Association and the American Society of Civil Engineers dealing with the legal and other societal ramifications of cloud seeding. He was the vice-chairman of the Utah Water Resources Research Center advisory council. Professor Davis was a delegate from the United States to the United Nations Environment Program/World Meteorological Organization session which developed recommended guidelines for countries to adopt concerning weather resources management. He has conducted research projects for the World Meteorological Organization, the Department of the Interior and the Bureau of Reclamation, the National Science Foundation, and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. He has prepared legislation and administrative regulations for Illinois, North Dakota, Minnesota, Utah, and Arizona. He had academic sabbaticals in Australia, New Zealand, and England where he studied their laws relating to climate and weather change.

Douglas R. Haddock

Douglas R. Haddock is a Professor of Law at St. Mary's University. He received his Bachelor of Arts degree and his Juris Doctor degree at the University of Utah, and, as a student, was elected to Phi Beta Kappa and the Order of the Coif. Upon graduation from law school, Professor Haddock served as a law clerk for Justice W. F. Rogosheske of the Minnesota Supreme Court.

After four years of practice with the St. Paul law firm of Briggs and Morgan, he became a member of the faculty of Hamline University School of Law for five years. During his years with Briggs and Morgan, he spent six months (on leave from the law firm) working for the Minnesota Revisor of Statutes, drafting proposed legislation. Since leaving Hamline in 1980, he has been a permanent member of the faulty at St. Mary's University School of Law in San Antonio, Texas. He has also served as a Visiting Professor at Washington and Lee University, Hastings College of the Law, and the University of Utah, and has been a special master for a federal district court and a member of an expedited arbitration panel.

During his teaching career, Professor Haddock has taught numerous courses, including Property, Community Property (in Texas and California), Conflict of Laws, Civil Procedure, Professional Responsibility, and Estates and Trusts. He gratefully acknowledges all of his students for the many things they have taught him, and especially recognizes the research assistance of Joan Ely, Lisa Rocheleau, Julie Wommack, Bryan McDaniel, John D. Love, Jon T. Koenig and Jodylyn Moss.

Buddy O. H. Herring

Buddy O. H. Herring has been Professor of Law, Wake Forest University School of Law, since 1975. B.A., Wake Forest, 1968; J.D., Wake Forest, 1971. Private practice, 1971-1973. Placement Director (1971-1972), Assistant Dean (1974-1978), Wake Forest University School of Law.

George Lefcoe

Professor George Lefcoe has been a Professor of Law at the University of Southern California since 1962, and is currently the Florine and Ervin Yoder Professor of Real Estate Law. He has also taught at Yale University Law School, Boston University Law School, and the University of Utah College of Law. He has served on Los Angeles city and county commissions: the county Regional Planning Commission, the county High Technology Council, and the city's Board of Convention Center Commissioners. As a land use and real estate finance consultant he has worked with federal, state and local governments, and with firms and foundations in the United States, the United Kingdom and Japan. His most recent publication is the text from which the material in this treatise was adapted, Real Estate Transactions (Michie Company, 1993).

Appreciation is expressed to Kadi Kurgpold, administrative assistant and accomplice.

Leonard Levin (1924-1993)

Leonard Levin, Professor of Law, Villanova University School of Law. Taught Future Interests, Probate Administration, Property, Trusts and Estates, and Will Drafting. Author (with Robert Levin and Russell Levin) of

Summary of Pennsylvania Jurisprudence, 1952-70; author (with Rothman) of Probate Law and Taxation of Transfers, Trusts and Estates, 1980.

Olan B. Lowrey

Olan B. Lowrey, Professor of Law, Temple University School of Law, since 1967. B.S., S.W.T.S.C., 1950; M.A., State University of Iowa, 1951; LL.B., Baylor University, 1956. Teaches Land Use and Real Property.

Richardson R. Lynn

Richardson R. Lynn, Associate Dean and Professor, Pepperdine University School of Law, 1980-1985, and since 1990. B.A., Abilene Christian University, 1973; J.D., Vanderbilt, 1976. Professor of Business Law & Ethics, Jack C. Massey Graduate School of Business, Nashville, 1986-1990. Teaches Appellate Advocacy, Civil Procedure, Conflict of Laws, and Intellectual Property.

John Makdisi

Dr. John Makdisi was Dean and Professor of Law at The University of Tulsa College of Law. In 1991 he came to Tulsa from Cleveland State University, where he was a law professor for ten years. Professor Makdisi is a specialist in property law as well as Islamic law. In addition to writing several books and articles in these areas, he has lectured extensively throughout the United States. Dr. Makdisi received his B.A. degree from Harvard College, his J.D. degree from the University of Pennsylvania Law School and his S.J.D. from Harvard Law School. In the process of completing his S.J.D. dissertation, he spent two years at the University of Paris and one year at the American Research Center in Cairo, Egypt.

Marla E. Mansfield

Marla E. Mansfield, Associate Professor of Law and Associate Director, National Energy Law and Policy Institute, The University of Tulsa College of Law. Professor Mansfield entered academia after practicing with the Department of Interior and obtaining her J.D. with honors from the University of Wyoming and B.A., summa cum laude, from Yale University. She writes and teaches in areas of oil and gas, public lands, environmental, energy, and administrative law.

She wishes to thank her husband, Larry Hill, for his love and patience, and to acknowledge the research assistance of Randal G. Buckendorff, Julianne Clay, and Terri S. Roberts.

Victoria Mikesell Mather

Victoria Mikesell Mather is a Professor of Law at St. Mary's University School of Law in San Antonio, Texas. She received her J.D. and LL.M. degrees from the University of Illinois College of Law. After practicing law in Illinois, she joined the St. Mary's faculty in 1985. Her teaching and writing interests include property, wills and trusts, land-use planning and family law.

Professor Mather would like to thank her research assistants, Barbara Hughes, Arabia Pick, Whitney Reilly, Nina Sanchez, Sharon Shumway, Michael Walker, Ralph Wilcoxson, Blake Zuber, and especially David Gipson, for all of their help in research and writing. She is particularly grateful to Kathleen Worthington for secretarial assistance above and beyond the call of duty.

John L. McCormack

John L. McCormack. B.A., 1964, J.D., 1968, University of Wisconsin; Law Clerk, Hon. Thomas E. Fairchild, U.S. Court of Appeals, 7th Circuit, Chicago, Illinois, 1968-1969; Associate, Sidley & Austin, Chicago, Illinois, 1969-1971; Member of the Faculty, Loyola University School of Law, Chicago since 1971.

The author acknowledges the valuable assistance of Ms. Linda J. Haynes and Mr. Michael M. Moore.

John V. Orth

John V. Orth. William Rand Kenan, Jr., Professor of Law. The University of North Carolina School of Law. A.B. 1969, Oberlin College; J.D. 1974, M.A. 1975, Ph.D. 1977, Harvard University.

Since 1978 Professor Orth has taught Property Law and Legal History at the University of North Carolina School of Law. From 1977 to 1978 he clerked for Judge John J. Gibbons of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. He is the author of annual articles in the series "Reappraisals in the Law of Property," published in The Green Bag as well as How Many Judges Does It Take to Make a Supreme Court, and Other Essays on Law and the Constitution (2006); Due Process of Law: A Brief History (2003); The North Carolina State Constitution with History and Commentary (1993); Combination and Conspiracy: The Legal History of Trade Unionism, 1721-1906 (1991); and The Judicial Power of the United States: The Eleventh Amendment in American History (1987). Professor Orth has published numerous law review articles on constitutional law, property law, and legal history. His publications have been cited by federal and state courts, including the United States Supreme Court and the North Carolina Supreme Court. He is an associate editor (for Law) of the multi-volume American National Biography, to be published by Oxford University Press, and a contributor to the Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States (1992). He is a member of the editorial board of the Law and History Review. In addition, he is the author of numerous scholarly articles and book reviews. In 1990-1991 he assisted the North Carolina General Assembly in revising the state's law on joint tenancy.

John H. Pearson

Rev. John H. Pearson, C.S.C., was Assistant Professor at the Notre Dame Law School, Notre Dame, Indiana. He holds a Bachelor of Arts degree, magna cum laude, in Psychology (1968) and a Master of Theology degree (1971) from the University of Notre Dame and is a member of Phi Beta Kappa. He received his J.D. degree in 1985 from the Boalt Hall School of Law, University of California at Berkeley, where he was a Note and Comment Editor on the California Law Review. He served as clerk for Judge Robert S. Vance of the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, and was an attorney at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Los Angeles, California.

Special acknowledgment for all their assistance in this project belongs to Stacy Gerber, Domenique Camacho and Andy Curoe, 1993 graduates of the Notre Dame Law School, to Ron Miller of the Notre Dame Law School Class of 1995 and to Professor Lucy Payne of the Notre Dame Law Library. It would have been impossible without them.

Ronald W. Polston

Ronald W. Polston, Professor of Law, Indiana University School of Law, Indianapolis, B.S., 1953, Eastern Illinois University; LL.B., 1958, University of Illinois. He has been a visiting professor at Monash University, Melbourne, Australia; East China University of Politics and Law, Shanghai, China; University of Political Science and Law, Beijing; and Northwest China Institute of Politics and Law, Xian, People's Republic of China. He is a member of the Bars of Illinois, Indiana and the United States Supreme Court, and has practiced as a partner in the law firm of Craig & Craig (now Campbell, Black, Carnine & Hedin) in Mount Vernon, Illinois.

Patricia Youngblood Reyhan

Patricia Youngblood Reyhan, Professor of Law, Albany Law School; B.A., Washington State University, 1975; J.D., Willamette University, 1978; LL.M., Harvard University, 1980. Professor Reyhan has authored numerous articles and books on property, international law and conflicts of law.

N. Gregory Smith

N. Gregory Smith is the G. Frank & Winston Purvis Professor of Law at Louisiana State University. Professor Smith received his B.A. in 1975 from Yale and his J.D. in 1978 from Brigham Young University, where he was an article editor of the Brigham Young University Law Review. Following law school graduation, Professor Smith served as a law clerk to Judge Monroe G. McKay of the United States Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals. He practiced law with the Phoenix. Arizona firm of Streich, Lang, Weeks & Cardon from 1980 until 1990, and was a lawyer for Security Pacific Bank of Arizona from 1990 until 1991. He joined the Louisiana State University Law Center faculty in 1991.

Professor Smith wishes to thank his colleagues James W. Bowers and John M. Church for their assistance, respectively, with bankruptcy and environmental matters. He also wishes to acknowledge the research assistance of Henry Gerald Louviere, Jr., Greg Anthony Pellegrine, Barry Casey, Laure Ashley Culbertson, Cynthia Voorhies Traylor, and Beau Gustin Blank.

Patsy W. Thomley

Patsy W. Thomley is Professor of Law at Cumberland School of Law at Samford University in Birmingham, Alabama. She received her B.S. degree from Auburn University, her M.A. degree from Samford University and her J.D. from Cumberland School of Law. She is a member of the American Bar Association, the Alabama Bar Association, and the Birmingham Bar Association. Her teaching and writing interests include property, land use, and real estate law.

Ronald R. Volkmer

Ronald R. Volkmer is Professor of Law at Creighton University School of Law, Omaha, Nebraska. Professor Volkmer received his Bachelor of Arts, magna cum laude, and Juris Doctor degrees from Creighton University. While a student, Professor Volkmer was chosen as the first editor-in-chief of the Creighton Law Review, Upon graduation from law school, Professor Volkmer served as a teaching assistant for the University of Illinois College of Law, receiving his LL.M. degree in 1973. Since 1969, Professor Volkmer has taught courses in Property, Trusts and Estates, and Alternative Dispute Resolution at Creighton University School of Law. During the 1975-1976 school year, he was a Cook Fellow at the University of Michigan Law School.

Professor Volkmer has published numerous law review articles, primarily in the areas of property and trusts and estates. Since 1991 he has authored a column on recent fiduciary decisions for Estate Planning magazine. Included among Professor Volkmer's professional, civic and charitable activities are: member, House of Delegates, Nebraska State Bar Association; member, Board of Directors, Nebraska State Bar Foundation; Chair-elect, Section on Donative Transfers, Fiduciaries and Estate Planning, Association of American Law Schools. He is consulting attorney to the Omaha firm of McGill, Gotsdiner, Workman & Lepp., P.C.

Professor Volkmer acknowledges the support of Dean Lawrence Raful and a grant from the Creighton University Faculty Research Fund. He thanks as well, his student research assistants, Kathleen Weber, Steven Sunde, Patrick Runge and David Thorpe, for their help.

James B. Wadley

James B. Wadley is Professor of Law at Washburn University School of Law. He received his law degree from Tulane University in New Orleans (1972) and holds Bachelor and Master Degrees from Utah State University (1969). He has formerly been the director of the Land Use Law Center and of the Eastern Water Rights Center at the University of Florida, and is presently director of The Rural Law Center at Washburn. Professor Wadley currently teaches a variety of courses on Agricultural Law and Land Use Law at Washburn University School of Law, and has written numerous articles and co-authored a number of treatises in those areas, including Agricultural Law, Kansas Agricultural Law (1st and 2nd Editions); Florida Land Use Restrictions; Zoning, the Law in Florida; and Agricultural Law: A Lawyer's Guide to Representing Farm Clients.

Alan M. Weinberger

Professor Alan M. Weinberger graduated from the University of Michigan Law School in 1975. Before joining the faculty of Saint Louis University School of Law in 1987, Professor Weinberger practiced for 12 years with law firms in Detroit and Washington, D.C., specializing in real estate transfer, finance and development. He has published articles in the fields of property, partnership, real estate finance, and corporate compliance programs against insider trading. He teaches Property, Real Estate Transactions, Business Associations and Securities Regulation.

John C. Welsh

Professor John C. Welsh has been a faculty member at Albany Law School since 1959, and is currently serving in his third assignment as Acting Dean of the law school. He teaches courses in Property, Trusts and Estates, and Federal Taxation of Estates, Trusts, and Gifts. He earned his B.A. at the University of Notre Dame in 1952 and his LL.B. at Albany Law School in 1955.

He has served on the Board of Directors of the Law School Admission Services, as a member of Law School Admission Council committees, on the New York State Bar Association Committee on Legal Education to the Bar, and on various law school accreditation site inspection teams. He is a former president of the Greene County Bar Association.

He and his wife, the former Josephine Daley, have four children.

Frederic White

Frederic White was Professor of Law at Cleveland-Marshall College of Law, Cleveland State University, where he has been a member of the faculty since 1978. His subjects include Property, Land Use Control, Local Government Law, and Wills and Trusts. Prior to coming to Cleveland-Marshall, Professor White was an associate attorney in the Public Law Department in the Cleveland office of the law firm of Squire, Sanders & Dempsey. He has also served as a Public Member of the Foreign Service Selection Board of the United States Department of State.

Professor White received his B.A. degree from Columbia College, New York, New York, He received his J.D. degree from Columbia University School of Law.

He is the author of law review articles on the Ohio Open Meetings Law and the Cleveland Housing Court, and treatise chapters on various aspects of property and local government law. He has lectured extensively in the area of landlord tenant relations. He is also the author of Ohio Landlord Tenant Law, soon to be in its third edition. Besides serving as a reviewer for the "Renting Residential Property" chapter of You and the Law, published by the American Bar Association, he is also a member of the Residential Landlord and Tenant Committee of the Real Property, Probate and Trust Section of the ABA. He is a former member of the Board of the Trustees of the Legal Aid Society of Cleveland.

Caryl A. Yzenbaard

Caryl A. Yzenbaard is Professor of Law at Salmon P. Chase College of Law of Northern Kentucky University. She has been at Chase since 1975, teaching primarily in the area of property, wills, and trusts. She has won the Outstanding Teaching Award several times. Her other writings include Residential Real Estate Transactions (Clark Boardman Callaghan 1991) and Kentucky Real Estate Sales Contracts with Forms (The Harrison Company 1985) as well as articles in the property area. At the University, she has chaired and served on numerous university and law school committees. She received her J.D. degree from the University of Michigan School of Law in 1970 and her A.B. degree from Hope College in 1967.

She is married to Timothy E. Hoberg (a 1970 University of Virginia Law School graduate) and they have one daughter, Emily Ruth, born in 1977, as well as numerous cats. Professor Yzenbaard enjoys travel, reading, swimming and playing table tennis.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Publication Information

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Preface to Second Thomas Edition

Preface to Second Thomas Edition

A century ago, the body of scholarly writing on American property law was found more in substantial property law treatises than in law review articles. Even the law review articles of the time tended to be authoritative discourses on mainstream doctrines, rather than proposals for reform or abstract explorations of novel issues on the doctrinal fringe. During this age of the treatise, the works on property law abounded and found their ways into the daily work of both courts and law offices. For half a century spanning the late 19th and early 20th century, these omnibus works were as common as property law casebooks are today. Authors' names were widely familiar: Burdick, Hawley & McGregor, Hilliard, Hopkins, Jones, Kerr, Minor & Wurtz, Powell, Thompson, Tiedeman, Tiffany, Washburn, Walsh, and Williams, among others.

Prominent among these property law treatises was the monumental work of George Washington Thompson, first published in seven thick volumes by the Bobbs-Merrill Company of Indianapolis in 1924. The approach of this multi-volume treatise, typical for its era, was comprehensive coverage of detailed doctrinal points and heavy case documentation for each individual point in the treatise text. This had the effect of revealing and preserving the emerging American common law on these subjects, comprised of an ever-growing rush of case decisions. The first Thompson on Real Property included in its voluminous footnotes many case citations found in the fledging National Reporter System published by West Publishing Company, along with citations to a wealth of state decisions that pre-dated the National Reporter System. It was a truly encyclopedic snapshot of the American law of property that was unique and important for its time.

Fast-forwarding to the present and looking back over the fate of these numerous property law treatises, one sees that (with one exception), they one by one fell out of favor and went out of print. Thompson on Real Property hung on for longer than most, with supplements or reissues in 1929, 1939, 1964 and finally in 1980. After a brief period of annual supplementation for the 1980 edition, this work, too, quietly slipped out of print, leaving only one extant multi-volume American property law treatise.

In 1990, the Michie Company acquired the rights to the publication and engaged a general editor to work out a plan for reviving Thompson. The key question was whether to refurbish and update the most recent version, or to create an entirely new treatise. The Michie Company later became part of LexisNexis.

On the general editor's recommendation, an entirely new treatise was created, using the talents of about thirty seasoned property law professors from around the country. The general editor was the principal author and ultimately contributed about 70% of the content. All of the 106 chapters were new. Some of the chapters dealing with core doctrinal topics were based on Thompson's work, especially on his wealth of older case law citations from all American jurisdictions. Those chapters were reorganized, clarified, updated and rewritten. With the issuance of Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Edition in 1994, this treatise became one of only two multi-volume treatises on American property law currently in print.

Although a variety of intellectual and philosophical approaches is found in the various chapters, in general the authors chose to treat their topics in a rational, comprehensive and pragmatic way. Scholarly speculations and reform statements are occasionally included, but not as the principal focus of any of the chapters.

As has been typical of property law treatises of the past, the chapters are arranged in an orderly general sequence of major subject areas. That is probably less important to most users of the treatise, whose typical need for the treatise is for research on individual topics. Some of the chapters are surveys of topics covered in more detailed fashion specialty publications. Some of the chapters are the definitive published scholarly works in their field. Altogether, the treatise contains in accessible format the explanations and source references most property law researchers will need in most of their research tasks. The treatise will always be a good place to begin the research, and will often also be a good place to complete the research. The treatise is comprehensively updated annually, and individual volumes are revised and reissued in new editions on a regular schedule.

David A. Thomas
General Editor and Principal Author
Rex E. Lee Endowed Chair and Professor of Law
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University
Provo, Utah

February, 2009

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

What's New

1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Scope

Scope

HIGHLIGHTS

Release 2010S1 September 2010

Updates
Updates throughout the treatise include analysis of new case law and statutes of national and international importance.
10 NEW CHAPTERS
The treatise now contains 14 volumes in the Second Thomas Edition: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 15.

EXPANDED COVERAGE INCLUDES NEW CHAPTERS ON REAL PROPERTY LAW IN THE FOLLOWING COUNTRIES

- Canada (main volume 13);
- Kazakhstan (main volume 13);
- Korea (main volume 13);
- India (main volume 13);
- Italy (volume 13 cumulative supplement).
- Poland (main volume 13);
- Philippines (main volume 13); and
- Romania (main volume 13).

- South Africa (volume 13 cumulative supplement);
- Spain (volume 13 cumulative supplement).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions 1.syn

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.syn Synopsis to Chapter 1: PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

§ 1.01 Introduction.

§ 1.02 Property as Perceived in the State of Nature.

§ 1.03 The Importance of the Community in Cultures.

§ 1.04 Anthropologists' View of "Property."

§ 1.05 Recognition of Individual Rights in Personal Property.

§ 1.05(a) Private Property Rights in Food.

§ 1.05(a)(1) Private Rights in Food Subject to a Duty to Share.

§ 1.05(a)(2) Private Rights in Food Corresponding to the Effort Expended in Obtaining the Food Items.

§ 1.05(b) Private Property Rights in Non-Food Items.

§ 1.05(c) Private Property Rights in Intangibles.

§ 1.05(d) Whether Personal Property in Early Cultures Was Predominantly Privately or Communally Held.

§ 1.06 Property Rights in Land Among Early Cultures.

§ 1.06(a) The Importance of Private Property Rights in Land Relative to the Economy of an Early Culture.

§ 1.06(b) Property Rights in Land Among Hunter-Gatherer Cultures.

§ 1.06(c) Property Rights in Land Among Pastoral Cultures.

§ 1.06(d) Property Rights in Land Among Farming Cultures.

§ 1.07 Summary of Property Rights Recognized in Primitive Cultures.

§ 1.08 Bibliography.

Professor David A. Thomas
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.01

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.01 Introduction.

This chapter explains how peoples in less developed cultures of the past or the present have conceived of ownership or property rights. Unfortunately, the language used to describe this subject, though well-intended and seemingly innocuous, does present some possible controversy: differing notions abound about what constitutes "ownership," "property," or "property rights"; adjectives describing cultures as "less developed" or "early" or "primitive" may be seen by some as pejorative terms of disparagement rather than simply an objective description of a stage of cultural development. Even an early culture's emerging or incipient notions about property may not indicate the true origins of property.

The purpose of this opening chapter is not wholly academic. There is arguably some value in learning how humankind, in the beginning phases of social development, assigned value to the things of everyday life and how those values were institutionalized, preserved, and protected. Such inquiries sometimes reveal that certain cherished and stoutly defended contemporary notions of property rights are not necessarily natural, evolutionary offshoots of human need and instinct, and indeed, may even be cultural aberrations. Such inquiries also present an opportunity to re-examine and perhaps reform the values nourished in modern societies, so many of which are tied to property as humankind's greatest material resource.

Such a reassessment is beyond the scope of this chapter. Here it suffices to show how people in the formative societal stages have perceived and managed their material resources. That the examples cited may be somewhat disconnected in time and space helps to show the variety in property customs. Also within the variety of examples may be found certain generalities about the development of property concepts as they are linked to material and cultural progress.

In the world of cultural and social anthropology, which forms the basic environment of this chapter, evidence tends to be serendipitous, and conclusions are generalizations in search of exceptions. In this discipline, experts routinely refute other experts who have generalized on favorite issues, because interpretation and speculation are so often essential to the conclusions reached. Reliance on any one set of views, therefore, is to expose one's credibility to risk of easy impeachment by those holding other, equally sound views. In this chapter, the principal positions and responsible opposing viewpoints are presented.

This chapter introduces concepts of property in the state of nature, the importance of the community for early humans, and anthropologists' definitions of property. Specific examples and general conclusions are cited concerning property rights recognized in early hunting, herding, and farming cultures.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.02

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.02 Property as Perceived in the State of Nature.

Even the earliest examples of property holding in emerging cultures cannot reveal how property concepts actually originated. With the information available, it simply is not possible to determine how humans in the "state of nature" first began to recognize some sort of property characteristics, either of possession or ownership. This lack of evidence has left the "state of nature" field wide open to the learned speculations of several disciplines, each promoting its own perceived rationality and none subject to final dismissal by the others. Whether the earliest humans were by nature peaceful or warlike, whether property was originally perceived as an individual or as a community asset, and whether property could be either tangible or intangible, are still matters beyond our knowledge.

What is clearly recognized is that property, however defined, has played a crucial role in the progression of human society to greater complexity. Thus, nomadic hunter-gatherers were likely less interested in claiming and marking off an individual plot of ground for a season than in ensuring that their prospects for hunting success in a larger, less specifically defined territory were not threatened. n1 Later, the long-term rights in specific land attained greater importance when agriculture took over as the main means of subsistence and prosperity. Further sophistication appeared out of necessity when resources became not only valued but scarce.

So, while knowledge about people and their property in the state of nature remains elusive, certain patterns of progression appear from what information is available about early or emerging cultures.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. See 1 William Graham Sumner, The Science of Society 287-302 (1927).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.03

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.03 The Importance of the Community in Cultures.

It requires only rudimentary knowledge of early humankind to realize that lifestyles and survival were centered around one's immediate group, usually a group based on kinship. Even the persons most physically capable of providing for themselves needed the presence of the group to perpetuate the race, to help in times of disability, and in myriad other circumstances. Both common sense and abundant evidence suggest that the integrity and survival of the group were paramount, indeed, even more important than the survival of any individual member of the group. Submerging individuality within the group identity produced several important consequences. For instance, if the group was threatened by circumstance of hostility, all members would help to meet and overcome the threat. A threat or injury to any member of the group was considered a threat to the entire group, and a group response was necessary. Even minor threats, slights, or offenses, whether to the group or to a member, necessarily elicited a response, because to acquiesce would show weakness and vulnerability. If a group member committed an offense against a member of another group, atonement was from the offender's group to the victim's group, perhaps without directly involving either of the original individual parties.

Because recompense for injury was mostly a matter of satisfying group integrity and demonstrating that the group could not be attacked with impunity, the rightness or wrongness of harmful conduct might not be at issue. Thus a perpetual feud could easily develop when one group avenged itself for an injury, and the offender's group felt compelled to respond to the vengeful conduct, followed by a response to the response, and so on. Numerous examples of such conduct abound even in relatively modern times in rural areas of the United States, of which the famous feud between the Hatfields and the McCoys of the Appalachian mountains, beginning in the 1860s, is only a typical and well-known example. n2 In early cultures, mutually acceptable arrangements for ending the perpetual and suicidal violence of the feud were eventually developed.

With the group so all-important, individual identity and individual accountability with respect to those outside the group remained rudimentary. And yet norms and customs relating to individual members emerged within the group to regulate internal affairs, identifying and disciplining aberrational conduct, allocating resources, and recognizing property and inheritance rights, among other matters. So, despite the group mentality so evident among lesser developed cultures, and despite the obvious need of early peoples to share many tasks and resources in order to survive, individuality within the early communities seems to have flourished, and this is somewhat evident even in matters of property.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 2. See Otis K. Rice, The Hatfields and the Mccoys (1978).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.04

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.04 Anthropologists' View of "Property."

Anthropologists have generally accepted a definition or conception of property rights that blends both the object and the relationships pertaining to the object:

> The anthropologist must perforce agree with the Hohfeldian view that the object is of less significance in "property" than is the network of legal relations which determine and prescribe permissible behavior with respect to that object. Property in its full sense is a web of social relations with respect to the utilization of some object (material or nonmaterial) in which a person or group is tacitly or explicitly recognized as holding quasi-exclusive and limiting demand-rights, privilege-rights, powers, and immunities in relation to that object.
>
> Thus there are two essential aspects of property: (1) the object and (2) the web of social relations, which establishes a limiting and defined relationship between persons and the object. n3

This same author in a later publication illustrated this view with an appropriate prehistoric scenario:

> As an illustration, a stone conveniently shaped for use as an axhead lies unnoticed and unused for years on the surface of the ground. It is not property. It is, in legal terminology, a res nullius: a nothing. A wandering tribesman finds it, takes it, and uses it as a hand ax. This in itself makes the stone merely an object of possession. If the social practices of the possessor's tribe are such that any other person could appropriate this tool at will, it would still be a mere matter of possession. But if the custom is such that his fellow tribesmen recognize that he has special rights in possessing that piece of rock and that all others have a duty to desist from using or taking it, then it is an object of property. The stone has not changed, but the social pattern with respect to it has. It is the special and peculiar set of social relations which has transformed the rock into an object of property. n4

If, for purposes of discussion, property in early cultures can be generally characterized as recognized rights of possession or ownership, then property rights in both personal chattels and in land would seem to have been widespread in such cultures. As will be shown in the following sections, however, individual rights in property were less commonly recognized than in modern society; group or communal rights were more common, especially in land.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 3. E. Adamson Hoebel, The Law of Primitive Man: A Study in Comparative Legal Dynamics 58 (1954). For a fascinating example of how complex this relationship can be, see also D.P. Crandall, The Role of Time in Himba Valuations of Cattle, The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute, March 1, 1998, at 1 (chronicling the central role of cattle in the Himba culture).

(n2)Footnote 4. E. Adamson Hoebel & Everett L. Frost, Cultural and Social Anthropology 248 (1976).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.05

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.05 Recognition of Individual Rights in Personal Property.

§ 1.05(a) Private Property Rights in Food.

§ 1.05(a)(1) Private Rights in Food Subject to a Duty to Share.

In lesser developed cultures, private property rights in food warrant special mention, because food was so closely identified with survival, and the right and instinct to claim food as one's own was frequently counterbalanced by a customary and concomitant duty to share the food items with others. n5 This duty to share has been seen by some as a form of communal ownership, but that viewpoint has been criticized as overlooking the essentially private nature of the original possessory right. n6

Recognition of private property rights in food probably arose from the effort expended in the hunting, gathering, or growing of food. But customs of compelled sharing may have been based on a recognized interdependence. Thus, in studies of Baffin Land Eskimos n7 and of Comanches of the American plains, n8 it has been shown that the hunter who actually bagged the game was required by custom to share with other hunters in the area, or even with other tribespeople, once the kill was returned to camp. This pattern was so widespread that, > sharing of food, even though the food is privately owned, is the basic virtue of almost all American Indian tribes and of most of the primitive hunters of the world. n9

Yet it has been pointed out that such sharing, even if dictated by custom, was not necessarily an altruistic concession by the individual person to communal ownership and necessity, because the private owner who shared readily obtained recognition for prowess and generosity. n10 In some cultures, food pooling occurred, again not as a form of communal ownership, but to enhance the leader's resources for impressive entertaining, for providing emergency relief when the group fell on hard times, or for aiding destitute members of the community. n11 If the owner or procurer of the food was in extreme hardship, sharing might be declined. n12

A contrary point of view maintains that such sharing was inconsistent with any notion of private property rights. n13 Nevertheless, underlying the customary sharing and pooling of food items could usually be found a pronounced private property right, n14 probably in recognition of the effort expended in obtaining or producing the item. n15

§ 1.05(a)(2) Private Rights in Food Corresponding to the Effort Expended in Obtaining the Food Items.

The attribution of private rights to things produced by private effort has been seen as less pronounced with respect to game and plants simply taken from the wild, n16 and more distinct as to cultivated food items and as to fabricated items such as tools and weapons. n17 Garden produce grown under individual effort on a plot of land subject to individual ownership or use would normally be considered private property; however, a number of cultures have been noted in which garden produce was either grown or distributed communally. n18

With a conspicuous exception in the state-owned llamas among the Incas, n19 most domesticated animals were privately owned in early cultures, even if their grazing land was considered common property. This was probably stimulated in part by the ease with which relationships of genuine affection could arise between a person and an individual animal. n20 The private property attributes of livestock undoubtedly strengthened notions of private property generally and led directly to early disparities of wealth among persons in the same community, inasmuch as cattle and other livestock were almost universally accepted as the hallmarks of affluence in early societies.

§ 1.05(b) Private Property Rights in Non-Food Items.

Anthropologists readily acknowledge the close relationship between an object or artifact that has been made by human effort and the rights of the person who made it or uses it. But disagreement has arisen over whether this relationship is really a recognition of private property rights in the thing. Perhaps the spear or axe was not so much the property of but only an extension of the personality of its maker.

> Indeed it is true to say that the savage has a more jealous regard for objects of personal use than a civilized child has for its toys. The relation between person and thing is deemed so intimate that the chattel is in a very real sense hardly more than an extension of the person. Objects of personal use are the subject of so many tabus that it is often considered perilous to drink from another's utensil. Especially under circumstances in which the claim to personal property may come into doubt, property marks are in wide use. Even children are considered to have rights in their own possessions.
>
> But is this attitude towards personal objects "ownership"? ... The "property" sense is apparently so little developed that there is among primitive peoples a widespread practice of destroying personal objects on the death of the owner, and these usually include even his hut. The concept of "possession" rather than ownership is far more suitable in describing the primitive institution... Until the creation of legal obligations becomes habitual there is no need for any claim of ownership. n21

The question of whether private property rights were recognized in personal artifacts is highlighted by the peculiar style of canoe "ownership" among the Trobriand Islanders in the southwestern Pacific. n22 "Ownership" of each canoe reposes in one person, but each crew-member has a right of use. At community fishing times, the canoe owner must join the fishing with his canoe, or let someone else take it, and the crew members must fulfill their tasks. One viewpoint proclaims this arrangement as a form of private ownership with reciprocal obligations to form the users into a team. n23 Another viewpoint questions whether any private ownership exists, if the "owner" cannot refuse the use of the canoe. n24 That latter viewpoint perhaps arises out of an overly rigorous and narrow conception of property rights, especially in the context of a less developed culture. Whatever the precise mix of private rights and duties customarily attributed to an "owner" of an object, it seems clear that those rights and duties were more than would have been recognized for possession or ownership on a merely communal basis.

§ 1.05(c) Private Property Rights in Intangibles.

Indeed, whether private ownership of an object was absolute, or was heavily burdened by rights in other members of the community, or partook of some arrangement in between, it seems clear that some pre-eminent private property or ownership rights were everywhere recognized in the person who found, captured, cultivated, made, or used the item of property.

This pattern extended even to intangible, or incorporeal, things. Rituals, songs, charms, dances, names, legends, and the rights to perform certain tasks of labor are a few of the things in which private property rights seem to have been recognized. Inasmuch as rights in such intangible items would occasionally be transferred for consideration, it is apparent that both parties to the transfer acted on the premise that private proprietary rights were changing hands. Again, a dissenting voice maintains that such rights were held communally, rather than privately, that consideration was merely part of validating the ritual, and that private rights, if any, gained cognizance only if and when the culture progressed from its less developed stage. n25 Most likely, both private and communal ownership of intangibles occurred, and it has been observed that, "as a rule, the more specialized the intangible, the more likely it will be individually owned." n26

§ 1.05(d) Whether Personal Property in Early Cultures Was Predominantly Privately or Communally Held.

For purposes of the inquiry conducted in this chapter, the debate over whether early cultures commonly recognized private as opposed to communal property rights in things other than land is interesting, but not especially important. For even a right communally held by a kinship group some other limited community implies some concept of property rights beyond the notion of common property indiscriminately available to all. Moreover, the evidence is strong that individual property rights attained widespread recognition among primitive cultures.

To some extent, the debate over whether early peoples held property privately or communally has been stimulated by the desire or need of some to show that people's innate or instinctive notions about property favor private ownership, rather than communal or communistic ownership. Somehow, goes the reasoning, if property concepts in the "state of nature" can be established, that will be a guide for finding the most suitable property regimes in modern legal systems. Or, expressed even more simplistically, if humans instinctively favor notions of private property rights, even without the materialistic overlay of modern society, then the most appropriate contemporary political systems are democracies emphasizing individual agency and private property rights. Conversely, if the impulse of early innocence is to the shared rights of communal resources, then perhaps that defines the ideal of the future.

Several flaws in such syllogisms suggest that the debate over private versus communal property in primitive cultures really is not that important. The available evidence fails to show that either private or communal systems were the exclusive expression of property rights in emerging cultures. None of the peoples studied reveal humankind in the state of nature; the property notions of even the most unsophisticated cultures are shaped to some extent by time, place, and other circumstances. Even if the nature of property holding in the "state of nature" could be revealed, or even if a primeval preference for private over communal, or vice-versa, were shown, that is no sure guide to a suitable system of property laws today, when the extremes of material excess and resource scarcity present unprecedented challenges.

Yet, the examination of property right notions in emerging cultures can be instructive. If the impulse of early peoples was to accord special privileges of possession or ownership to the person who captures, finds, makes, or productively uses a thing, perhaps that is an inherently sensible philosophical foundation for modern property law. Similarly, if property rights in some primitive cultures were shared because they affected things essential to common subsistence or survival, that too, may be a good guide for modern humankind. n27

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 5. For a discussion of theories on the evolution of food production, see C.C. Lamberg-Karlovsky & Jeremy A. Sabloff, Ancient Civilizations: The Near East and Mesoamerica 43 (2d ed. 1995).

(n2)Footnote 6. See Patrick J. Dubbs & Daniel D. Whitney, Cultural Contexts: Making Anthropology Personal 187 (1980).

(n3)Footnote 7. Franz Boas, The Eskimo of Baffinland and Hudson Bay, 15 Bull. Am. Museum Nat. Hist. 116 (1907).

(n4)Footnote 8. E. Adamson Hoebel, The Political Organization and Law-Ways of the Comanche Indians 119 (1940).

(n5)Footnote 9. E. Adamson Hoebel & Everett L. Frost, Cultural and Social Anthropology 251 (1976).

(n6)Footnote 10. Elizabeth Marshall Thomas, The Harmless People 182 (1959); R. Lowie, Primitive Society 207-10 (1947). See also Foundations of Social Inequality (T. Douglas Price & Gary M. Feinan, eds. 1995).

Another hypothesis of why hunter-gatherers share is "favorable attention from other group members [so] those who provide public goods are listened to and watched more closely than others and have a larger, readier pool of potential allies and mates." Kristen Hawkes, Why Hunter-Gatherers Work: An Ancient Version of the Problem of Public Goods, 34 Current Anthro. 341, 341-359 (1993); Cf. Barbara Thiel, Further Thoughts on Why Men Share Meat, 35 Current Anthro. 44041 (1994). But see Kim Hill and Hillard Kaplan, On Why Male Foragers Hunt and Share Food, 34 Current Anthro. 70110 (1993); H. Dieter Heinen and Danny Yee, More on Why Hunter-Gatherers Work, 35 Current Anthro. 28789 (1994); Duran Bell, On the Nature of Sharing: Beyond the Range of Methodological Individualism, 36 Current Anthro. 82630 (1995). However, other foraging models based on evolutionary and population ecology provide a different framework to explain routine sharing. See Bruce Winterhalder, Work, Resources and Population in Foraging Societies, 28 Man V. 32140 (1993).

See also Robert L. Kelly, The Foraging Spectrum: Diversity in Hunter-Gatherer Lifeways 291, 292 (1995). Kelly observes:

> Although there is no intrinsic reason why women should not hunt as much as men do, gathering is an interruptible activity and is more compatible with taking care of a child than hunting. We might expect women's status to be high where they bring in the most food, but this does not appear to be the case. Instead, by bringing in meat from large game that is shared, men have the potential to acquire the prestige that accompanies sharing, and the potential advantage to compete. Women are rarely in this position, and this may establish a basic inequality between men and women in perceived status and any advantage of one over the other in decisions about the couple's group membership.

(n7)Footnote 11. E. Adamson Hoebel & Everett L. Frost, Cultural and Social Anthropology 251 (1976).

(n8)Footnote 12. Mervyn J. Meggitt, Desert People: A Study of the Walbiri Aborigines Of Central Australia 120 (1965); E. Adamson Hoebel, The Political Organization and Law-Ways of the Comanche Indians 119 (1940).

(n9)Footnote 13. John Beattie, Other Cultures 194 (1964); William Seagle, A History of Law 56 (1946).

(n10)Footnote 14. As to private property rights in game, see, e.g., Ruth Landes, The Ojibwa of Canada, in Cooperation and Competition Among Primitive Peoples 90-91 (Margaret Mead ed. 1937).

(n11)Footnote 15. Patrick J. Dubbs & Daniel D. Whitney, Cultural Contexts 187 (1980).

(n12)Footnote 16. It was common, however, for a finder to mark as private property a beehive, an eagle's nest, a wild fruit tree, a hibernating bear's den, and similar discoveries. See E. Adamson Hoebel & Everett L. Frost, Cultural and Social Anthropology 252 (1976).

(n13)Footnote 17. Robert Anderson, The Cultural Context 220 (1976).

(n14)Footnote 18. E. Adamson Hoebel & Everett L. Frost, Cultural and Social Anthropology 252 (1976).

(n15)Footnote 19. John Howland Rowe, Inca Culture at the Time of the Spanish Conquest, in 2 Handbook of South American Indians 219 (Julian Haynes Steward ed. 1946-59).

(n16)Footnote 20. See E. Evans-Pritchard, The Nuer: A Description of the Modes of Livelihood and Political Institutions of Nilotic People 16-50 (1940).

(n17)Footnote 21. William Seagle, A History of Law 51-52 (1946).

(n18)Footnote 22. Bronislaw Malinowski, Crime and Custom in Savage Society 17-21 (1967).

(n19)Footnote 23. Bronislaw Malinowski, Crime and Custom in Savage Society 18 (1967).

(n20)Footnote 24. William Seagle, A History of Law 53 (1946).

(n21)Footnote 25. William Seagle, A History of Law 52 (1946).

(n22)Footnote 26. Patrick J. Dubbs & Daniel D. Whitney, Cultural Contexts 187 (1980).

(n23)Footnote 27. See also Eric T. Freyfogle, Ethics, Community, and Private Land, 23 Ecology L.Q. 631, 632-638 (1993). David Schmidz & Elizabeth Willott, 2003 Symposium: Environmental Ethics and Policy: Bringing Philosophy Down to Earth Reinventing the Commons: An African Case Study, U.C. Davis Law Review (2003) (essay explores incentives that led communities to switch from private to communal management).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.06

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.06 Property Rights in Land Among Early Cultures.

§ 1.06(a) The Importance of Private Property Rights in Land Relative to the Economy of an Early Culture.

All societies are territorially based, and most sustenance is drawn from the soil, either directly or indirectly. n28

While the land itself is important to humankind at every stage of cultural development, the significance of establishing property rights in land varies profoundly with each stage of progress achieved by a particular culture or society. If a culture is at the so-called hunter-gatherer, or forager, stage of development, it is important to have access to enough land that an adequate supply of game and other edibles can be obtained. But other rights typically associated with property or ownership, such as the right to occupy or to transfer to someone else, are less irrelevant. If the people are transient or nomadic, then again, only the momentary adequacy of any given territorial expanse is at issue, for the means of subsistence or survival are not dependent upon having permanent possession of a particular, specific parcel of land. When those means can no longer be found, the particular land being occupied is abandoned and other, more fruitful land is sought and just as summarily occupied. The attachment or proprietary impulse is to what can be found on the land, not to the land itself. Of course, in case of great disparity in the abundance of yield between one parcel and another, then eagerness for particular land intensifies, but when that abundance is exhausted, the once desirable tract is easily forsaken.

This casual attitude toward land as property is forever forgotten once the culture has adopted any other economy, whether pastoral, agricultural, or industrial. In a pastoral culture, the keeping of flocks and herds may require large tracts of land, but not so much as required by the predecessor hunter-gatherer culture. Land is desirable essentially for its browse and water only, so, from that perspective, the particular tract of land used is not especially important. However, the land must be occupied in order to be exploited, even by the herdsman, and some grazing lands are more conveniently located than others; hence, interest in particular tracts of land intensifies. Nevertheless, interest in particular tracts of land is mostly at the group level, because "the necessity to rove makes individual ownership impractical." n29 Herders use land resources because they are members of a group, not because they have obtained private rights to the land. Therefore, they "tend to hold pasture and water resources in common." n30

Even greater interest in land is found in the cultures characterized by the so-called "shifting horticulturalist." That economy has progressed from herding to farming, so smaller tracts of land are more intensively used, but not permanently. n31

> No one plot of land will support a household permanently; the farmer clears a plot, works it for several years, and moves on. During the years he cultivates it, however, he invests considerable time and labor in it. Groups following this system tend to favor a combination of private and communal landholding. The social group as a whole formally owns the land. The individual who works it has rights to the use and produce of a plot as long as he keeps it under cultivation. After the plot is abandoned, however, it reverts to the group as a whole, to be given to some other cultivator at a later date. n32

Anthropologists see this so-called "usufruct tenure" -- the right to enjoy the use and product of the land, but not to alienate it -- as a source of frequent misunderstanding and conflict in clashes between cultures. Europeans who thought they were buying land outright from African chiefs, with rights to alienate the land, were only getting allotments for temporary use, from the natives' perspective. n33 The same misunderstanding arose on the American frontier. n34

Finally, in developed societies with permanent, intensive agriculture and many other valuable land uses, private ownership of land is most pronounced, but many limitations are imposed by governments in behalf of communal interests. In summary:

> To the hunter ... land laws are really game laws. It is only among settled agricultural peoples who practise rotation of crops that individual appropriation of land begins. This is particularly true where intensive methods prevail, as in the cultivation of vines, trees, or gardens, or where irrigation has to be employed. n35

In less developed cultures, when land is "owned," it is almost always owned collectively, rather than individually, and the ownership is shared by members of a kinship or territorial group, but not by strangers. n36

§ 1.06(b) Property Rights in Land Among Hunter-Gatherer Cultures.

"In egalitarian hunting-gathering cultures, basic resources of land and water, plants and animals, and human labor are available and accessible to everyone." n37 The land is valuable only for its resources, which fluctuate with climate, seasons, and intensity of use. n38 A few examples of limited private land ownership in hunter-gatherer cultures have been found, such as among the Algonkian Indians of the American Northeast n39 or the Veddas of Sri Lanka. n40 In general, however, "common ownership of hunting territories by kin groups is commonplace," and even non-owners may have a right to use the land for hunting, an accommodation accorded in anticipation of reciprocity when survival is at stake. n41 In these cultures, private rights may be recognized in certain sites, such as a water hole, or for certain uses. The Pomo Indians of California recognized private rights in certain lands for the specific purpose of gathering of acorns. n42

The territoriality practiced by hunter-gatherer groups is not necessarily exclusive. n43 A Dobe Bushman group uses a territory within about a six-mile radius from a water hole where it temporarily camps, but the group makes no attempt to defend the territory against incursion by others. n44 The Hadza of Tanzania do not claim exclusive rights in lands where they hunt. n45 Australian aborigine clans develop emotional ties to particular land, but other clans have access to those lands. n46 However, Paiute Indians in the American Great Basin did claim and defend against others a hunting territory used by inhabitants of a particular group of villages. Possibly this was because the plant and animal resources were more abundant and predictable in certain areas. n47

In a society such as that of the Andaman Islanders in the Indian Ocean, in which the harvest of a particular tree or group of trees was assigned to one family, what appeared to be a form of ownership may in reality have been only a type of division of labor, especially since the harvest was then shared with others. n48 And the groups themselves may fluctuate in their composition with the variation in resources accessible to the group, as among the !Kung in Africa. n49

§ 1.06(c) Property Rights in Land Among Pastoral Cultures.

It is clear that acquiring certain defined rights in particular land is of higher importance to pastoral people, who must watch over and provide feed for flocks and herds, than such land rights would be to peoples who rely only on hunting and foraging. Pastoral use of land is more intense and the need to obtain use of land with adequate grazing and water resources is more critical to survival. Although both hunters and herders can move on when the land no longer provides the sustenance they seek, and indeed, many pastoral peoples are nomadic, such moves are less desirable and more threatening for the herders. More commonly, pastoral peoples will locate more or less permanently in areas that provide the land that can be relied upon to meet the needs of their animals. n50

In general, "among pastoral peoples stock is owned by individual families, [and] pastures are held in common." n51 Thus, the property right interests of pastoralists lie in possession of animals, pastures, water rights and migration rights, rather than in ownership of the land. n52 In pastoral cultures, because of animals' need to rove, the boundaries of the grazing land in use, whether held individually or in common, would not be rigid, and in any event, individual ownership of grazing land would be impractical under some circumstances. n53

For some pastoralists, land rights are seasonal. Several nomadic herding groups in Persia hold grazing lands in common, but actually use the pastures sequentially, according to their schedules of migration. n54 The Kirghiz in Asia recognized particular rights in pasture lands only in the winter, when good lands were scarce; in the other seasons, all was common property. n55 And some herders have agreements with farmers for the use of newly harvested fields. n56

In modern times, pastoralists naturally seek to secure needed rights in land, usually by acquiring grazing rights in public lands or outright private ownership of the needed land. This is a natural development in economies where the land is recognized as a finite resource and where different users compete for the same land. Also, the communal way of life for many modern pastoralists has given way to private, individual ownership of both the animals and the land they use.

§ 1.06(d) Property Rights in Land Among Farming Cultures.

If culture, in accordance with the traditional view, becomes more sophisticated as peoples progress from hunting and foraging to pastoral pursuits, and from herding to farming, then it may also be said that interest in individual land rights also intensifies along the way. The herder makes more intense use of the land than the hunter, but the farmer exceeds them both in the need for a more permanent, private plot of ground.

Early farming techniques lead to soil exhaustion and require that farming peoples move on to other land from time to time. Thus, it is less likely that the form of property rights recognized will be permanent or will apply to land that is not actually occupied. n57

Land distribution among farmers in less developed economies typically is in the form of a temporary allocation by a chieftain, but the recipient family has exclusive use of the allocated land for the duration of occupancy. Ordinarily, the occupants would have no right to sell the land or transfer its use to someone outside their group. Tacitus reported of the ancient Germanic tribes of his day that they allocated land to families or similar kinship groups, and that periodic reallocations occurred, in order to maintain the land's fertility. n58

A Truk Islander who cultivates a plot of land or plants a breadfruit tree may use the land or tree exclusively for his lifetime, and may assign those rights to his children. However, he may not sell the land or the tree, and if he has not assigned their use to his children, the use rights revert to the larger kinship group. n59

From the Anglo-American legal perspective, viewing property as a varying collection of rights, several dimensions of property might be recognized in a less developed farming society: property rights are held by the chief who allocates the land, by the family head who holds the allocated right of occupancy, and by the family member who actually cultivates the land. None of those "owners," however, assumes the right to sell the land, or to use it for other than agricultural purposes.

In some cultures, hunting, herding, and farming occurs. Among the Tsembaga in New Guineau, the people have access for hunting, foraging, or herding anywhere in the tribal territory, but the hunter's family garden may be located only within the area assigned to the particular clan or subclan. n60 In a mixed pastoral and farming culture, similar arrangements may prevail. Among the Nuer in Africa, however, individual persons hold the cattle; pastures and water are held by sections of the tribes; and garden plots may be planted wherever land is available. n61

Another tribe, the Kofyar, assigns all land to individual owners, so that the land will be fully used and exploited, but only the lineage group may transfer the land. n62 This same tribe recognizes personal property rights in movable structures, but considers permanent structures as part of the land. Various other multi-faceted systems of land ownership among less developed farming cultures have been noted by anthropologists. n63

The general pattern of land tenure in less developed farming cultures allocation by collective authority for use by individual families prevails all over the world, albeit with innumerable glosses. n64 Among some Indonesian peoples, any individual clan member may claim for cultivation any of the land held communally by the clan or village. The claimant may not sell the land, but may pledge it as security (although creditor foreclosure rights are limited), and the land is inheritable within the family line. If the line dies out, the land reverts to communal ownership. The clan or village may transfer use of the land to outsiders, but only for one year at a time with annual renewals. If the individual farmer later fails to cultivate the land, it either reverts to the group or it may be claimed by someone else who wishes to work it. n65

Among the Ifugao in the Philippines, social organization is based on individual families, with no village hierarchies. A cultivator's exclusive right of use continues even after a field is abandoned because of soil exhaustion. Another person could, without permission, cultivate an unused field for a period of time equal to the time the field had theretofore been unused, but then the right of the original cultivator was revived. Otherwise, abandoned land returned to the communal domain only when it fell back into the condition it was in when originally claimed for cultivation. Rice fields were held by families and were subject to inheritance rights. n66

Among American Pueblo Indians, fallow land could not be used by another without the consent of the person to whom the land was allocated. Grazing land was communal. All rights of land use, however, were dependent upon performance of certain civic duties related to the maintenance of the community. Upon failure to meet these conditions, land use rights could be revoked. n67

Similarly, the land allocation systems in effect among several African tribes required performance of civic duties, such as labor on public projects, payment of taxes, and military service. Land use rights could be inherited within the family. n68 This level of sophistication among less developed farming cultures bears some resemblance to the incipiently feudalistic land practices among the Anglo-Saxons n69 and continental Normans. n70

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 28. E. Adamson Hoebel & Everett L. Frost, Cultural and Social Anthropology 249 (1976). These authors note that an entirely sea-based community of Malayan sea gypsies may be an exception to this statement.

(n2)Footnote 29. Id.

(n3)Footnote 30. Beryl Lieff Benderly et al., Discovering Culture: An Introduction to Anthropology 106 (1977).

(n4)Footnote 31. According to historian Chris Wickham, "Pastoralism used to be thought of as the first prehistoric development away from hunter-gathering, with agriculture as a further advance from that. Increasingly, however, it is being thought by prehistorians that agriculture must have preceded it, and that it was cultivators who first domesticated animals." Chris Wickham, Land and Power: Studies in Italian and European Social History, 4001200 124 (1994).

(n5)Footnote 32. Id.

(n6)Footnote 33. John Beattie, Other Cultures: Aims, Methods, and Achievements in Social Anthropology 193 (1964).

(n7)Footnote 34. Beryl Lieff Benderly et al., Discovering Culture: An Introduction to Anthropology 106 (1977).

(n8)Footnote 35. William Seagle, A History of Law 53-54 (1946).

(n9)Footnote 36. Carol R. Ember & Melvin Ember, Cultural Anthropology 99 (4th ed. 1985).

(n10)Footnote 37. Robert Anderson, The Cultural Context: An Introduction to Cultural Anthropology 220 (1976).

(n11)Footnote 38. Id. See S. James Anaya, Maya Aboriginal Land and Resource Rights and the Conflict Over Logging in Southern Belize, 1 Yale H.R. & Dev. L.J. 17 (1998) ; Nico Schrijver, Sovereignty Over Natural Resources: Balancing Rights & Duties (1997).

(n12)Footnote 39. Frank G. Speck, The Family Hunting Band As the Basis of Algonkian Social Organization, 17 Am. Anthropologist (n.s.) 289-305 (1915).

(n13)Footnote 40. Charles Gabriel Seligmann & Brenda Z. Seligmann, The Veddas 106-121 (1915).

(n14)Footnote 41. Joseph B. Aceves & H. Gill King, Cultural Anthropology 152 (1978).

(n15)Footnote 42. Id.

(n16)Footnote 43. See generally Robert L. Kelly, The Foraging Spectrum: Diversity in Hunter-Gatherer Lifeways (1995).

(n17)Footnote 44. Richard B. Lee, What Hunters Do for a Living, or, How to Make Out on Scarce Resources, in Man the Hunter 31 (Richard B. Lee & Irven DeVore eds. 1968).

(n18)Footnote 45. James Woodburn, An Introduction to Hadza Ecology, in Man the Hunter 49-55 (Richard B. Lee & Irven DeVore eds. 1968).

(n19)Footnote 46. L. R. Hiatt, Ownership and Use of Land Among Australian Aborigines, in Man the Hunter 99-102 (Richard B. Lee & Irven DeVore eds. 1968).

(n20)Footnote 47. Rada Dyson-Hudson & Eric Alden Smith, Human Territoriality: An Ecological Reassessment, 80 Am. Anthropologist 21-41 (1978).

(n21)Footnote 48. A. R. Radcliffe-Brown, The Andaman Islanders 41 (1922).

(n22)Footnote 49. Lorna Marshall, The !Kung of Nyae Nyae 251 (1965).

(n23)Footnote 50. See B. Erdenebaatar, The Pastoral Environment and the Economy, in Culture and Environment in Inner Asia 61 (Caroline Humphrey & David Sneath, eds., vol. 1, 1996) ("Pastoral migration is made in order to optimize grazing pressure and to avoid the unpleasant consequences of long-term intensive and uncontrolled grazing over the grazing area.").

(n24)Footnote 51. William Seagle, A History of Law 55 (1946). Among the Nama Khoikhoi (so-called Hottentots), a stable pastoral culture, land is held communally, but there is also a "tremendous emphasis on private property ... irrespective of the sex, age, and status of individual ... ." Peter Carstens, The Inheritance of Private Property Among the Nama of Southern Africa Reconsidered, 53 Africa 58, 68 (1983).

(n25)Footnote 52. Patrick J. Dubbs & Daniel D. Whitney, Cultural Contexts: Making Anthropology Personal 186 (1980). In a discussion of specific "house rights in cattle within the extended family" among some eastern and southern African societies, it was noted that such arrangements > make it possible for the family head to manage his affairs and pursue his interests while acknowledging the interests of the house members. In decentralized systems the family head has no right to alienate cattle already allocated, but he has the right to use part of the incoming bridewealth for his own purposes. These complementary rights ensure that his own desire to marry several wives is not jeopardized, while at the same time house members' rights to cattle are respected. Conflicts between houses over cattle are minimized through this system.

Thomas Hakansson, Family Structure, Bridewealth, and Environment in Eastern Africa: A Comparative Study of House-Property Systems, 28 Ethnology 117, 132 (1989).

(n26)Footnote 53. E. Adamson Hoebel & Everett L. Frost, Cultural and Social Anthropology 249 (1976). For the Pastoral Maasai of Kenya, "Concepts of individual property boundaries are alien and, therefore, a hindrance to the enjoyment of [a] God-given right. Soil is important only as long as vegetation for their livestock is present." Joy K. Asiema & Francis D.P. Situma, Indigenous Peoples and the Environment: The Case of the Pastoral Maasai of Kenya, 5 Colo. J. Int'l Envtl. L. & Pol'y 149, 149 (1994).

(n27)Footnote 54. Fredrik Barth, Nomads of South Persia: The Basseri Tribe of the Khamish Confederacy 4-6, 54-55, 104-105 (1964). Cf. Property, Poverty and People: Changing Rights in Property and Problems of Pastoral Development (P.T.W. Baxter & Richard Hogg, eds. 1990).

(n28)Footnote 55. V. V. Radlov, Aus Siberien 414 (2d ed. 1968).

(n29)Footnote 56. Joseph B. Aceves & H. Gill King, Cultural Anthropology 152 (1978).

(n30)Footnote 57. See generally Richard F. Salisbury, From Stone To Steel: Economic Consequences of Technological Change In New Guinea (1962).

(n31)Footnote 58. Cornelius Tacitus, Germania 169-171 (Loeb ed. 1963).

(n32)Footnote 59. See Ward Hunt Goodenough, Property, Kin, and Community on Truk (1951). In Eastern Melanesia, land tenures are transferred based on given names at birth and social status. When the death occurs, the land is "handed back at death to the person bearing anew the same name or title, by choice or inheritance, and not to any landowning social unit." When a certain plot is thought to have significant mythological importance to the group as a whole, the location is controlled by a "master" or "servant" appointed by the social unit. Jean Guiart, Land Tenure and Hierarchies in Eastern Melanesia, 19 Pac. Studies 1, 67 (1996).

(n33)Footnote 60. Roy A. Rappaport, Pigs for the Ancestors 19-21 (1984).

(n34)Footnote 61. E. Evans-Pritchard, The Nuer: A Description of The Modes of Livelihood and Political Institutions of a Nilotic People 17, 77 (1940).

(n35)Footnote 62. Robert Mcc. Netting, Hill Farmers of Nigeria: Cultural Ecology of the Kofyar of the Jos Plateau

159 (1968).

(n36)Footnote 63. Joseph B. Aceves & H. Gill King, Cultural Anthropology 152 (1978).

(n37)Footnote 64. See Johannes M. Renger, Institutional, Communal, and Individual Ownership or Possession of Arable Land in Ancient Mesopotamia from the End of the Fourth to the End of the First Millennium B.C., 71 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 269, 269 (1995) (arguing that specific land tenure regimes in ancient Mesopotamia were not only determined by ecological or natural factors, but were also profoundly shaped by social forces).

(n38)Footnote 65. Barend Ter Haar, Adat Law in Indonesia 81-127 (1948). Swazi tradition required that land be held by the king for the benefit of the nation. Land was not considered a commodity. Land could be transferred, but the transfers were gratis under the notion that land belonged to the nation. Land use in this culture is allocated by a chief based upon the household size of the homesteads comprising the tribe, with priority given to production of food for consumption rather than production of cash crops. Allocation was flexible in that the size of the plot could be increased or decreased depending upon the fluctuation in the number of homesteads. Bonginkosi A.B. Sikhondze, Swazi Traditional Land Tenure Systems and Their Obstacles To Economic Development, 23 Transafr. J. Hist. 69, (1994).

(n39)Footnote 66. Roy Franklin Barton, Ifugao Law 40-44 (1919).

(n40)Footnote 67. Mischa Titiev, Old Oraibi 181 (1944).

(n41)Footnote 68. Max Gluckman, Custom and Conflict in Africa 16-17 (1956). Middle Jubba villagers customarily acquired and owned land through "inheritance, purchase, gifting, and village council grants of unclaimed land." These land transfers were primarily to men with the intention that the land would be used to support their families first, and production for profit second. Land was also allocated based on the size of the family. Women, however, have begun to control land by forming partnerships with their sons who have acquired the land from their fathers. Thus, while traditional land transfers excluded women from control, these "mother-son" partnerships have allowed women to participate in control and ownership of land. Catherine Besteman, Polygyny, Women's Land Tenure, and the "Mother-Son Partnership" In Somalia, 51 J. Anthro. Res. 193 (1995).

(n42)Footnote 69. David A. Thomas, Anglo-Saxon Antecedents of the Common Law, 1985 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 453, 497-501.

(n43)Footnote 70. David A. Thomas, Common Law Under the Early Normans, 1986 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 109, 116, 118-120.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.07

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.07 Summary of Property Rights Recognized in Primitive Cultures.

Despite the enormous variation in practice among the individual less developed cultures worldwide that have been studied, some general features emerge:

1. Practices and customs relating to property rights in less developed cultures are closely related to the means of survival. Because affiliation with some kind of group is essential to survival, the rights to determine and allocate many forms of property, especially land, are held ultimately by the group.

2. Individual rights in non-land property, such as artifacts, are recognized insofar as the items are essential to survival or are viewed as extensions of the person, such as a spear, but often the resources or goods produced by their use must be shared within the group or even with strangers.

3. Individual rights in land are usually only use -- or usufruct -- rights, with "reversionary" rights retained by the communal group. Rights of allocation may be exercised by the communal chief, perhaps through several levels of hierarchy, but the allocations, once made and properly maintained, usually may be inherited only within family lines.

4. Rights to alienate land outside the group usually rest, if they exist at all, only with the group, and not with any individual occupant of the land.

These conclusions should discourage any attempt to find in the property practices of early or less developed societies the foundation for value judgments about individual versus communal property rights. The adoption of any particular regime of communal or individual property rights by a particular people seems more closely related to economic conditions and personal convenience rather than to any primeval, intuitive notions about property in a perfect world.

A more intriguing question lies in evaluating the property practices associated with the supposed hierarchy of civilized development. If human society really does progress from hunting to herding to farming and highly commercial and technological economies, are the property rights recognized in the more advanced cultures superior to those of the less advanced cultures? If such rights are indeed superior, are they inherently superior (or at least morally superior), or do they attain superiority merely because the cultures in which they arise are stronger? United States Chief Justice John Marshall briefly acknowledged the issue in affirming that, by virtue of conquest and of transmission of title from the British, the American government held title to land superior to the land rights of the native inhabitants then in occupancy:

> We will not enter into the controversy, whether agriculturists, merchants, and manufacturers, have a right, on abstract principles, to expel hunters from the territory they possess, or to contract their limits. n71

As a practical matter, of course, a system of government that asserts sovereignty over land also establishes the qualifications for and limitations upon property rights available to its individual citizens and inhabitants. Typically, the range of individual property rights is reduced as the land comes under more intense pressure from increasing population or becomes more valuable for more and diverse purposes. Value judgments about the desirability of retaining particular private rights under such circumstances may vary. On the one hand, recognition of private property rights may encourage and reward individual agency, ambition, and initiative. On the other hand, proper administration of property as a common source of wealth -- indeed, a commonwealth -- may help eliminate the worst forms of individual deprivation and raise the welfare of society generally. From this chapter perhaps it can be perceived that these same general considerations ultimately motivated the property practices among less developed societies.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 71. Johnson v. M'Intosh, 21 U.S. (8 Wheat.) 543 (1823) .

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 1.08

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 1.08 Bibliography.

[Go To Supp]

Books

Aceves, Joseph B. & H. Gill King. Cultural Anthropology 152 (1978).

Alston, Lee J., Gary D. Libecap, & Bernardo Mueller. Titles, Conflict, and Land Use: the Development of Property Rights and Land Reform on the Brazilian Amazon Frontier (University of Michigan Press 1999).

Anderson, Robert. The Cultural Context 220 (1976).

Barth, Fredrik. Nomads of South Persia: The Basseri Tribe of the Khamish Confederacy 46, 5455, 104105 (1964).

Barton, Roy Franklin. Ifugao Law 4044 (1919).

Beattie, John. Other Cultures 194 (1964).

Benderly, Berly Lieff et al. Discovering Culture: An Introduction to Anthropology (1977).

Bernhardt, Kathryn. Women and Property in China: 960-1949 (Stanford University Press 1999).

Diamond, Jared M. Collapse: How Societies Choose to Fail or Succeed (2005).

Diamond, Jared M. Guns, Germs, and Steel : The Fates of Human Societies (1997).

Digby, Kenelm Edward, An Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property (Oxford University Press 1897).

Diosdi, Gyorgy. Ownership in Ancient and Preclassical Roman Law (Budapest 1970). This book talks about Roman concepts of property and ownership.

Dubbs, Patrick J. & Daniel D. Whitney. Cultural Contexts (1980).

Ember, Carol R. & Melvin Ember. Cultural Anthropology 99 (4th ed. 1985).

Engels, Frederick, The Origin of the Family, Private Properly, and the State: In Light of the Researches of Lewis H. Morgan (Int'l Publishers 1972) (1884).

Erdenebaatar, B. The Pastoral Environment and the Economy, in Culture and Environment in Inner Asia 61 (Caroline Humphrey & David Sneath, Eds., Vol. 1, 1996).

Evans-Pritchard, E. The Nuer: A Description of the Modes of Livelihood and Political Institutions of Nilotic People 1650 (1940).

Fales, Mario, A Survey of Neo-Assyrian Land Sales, in Land Tenure and Social Transformation in the Middle East (Tarif Khalidi ed., 1984).

Finley, M.I., Studies in Roman Property (Cambridge University Press 1976).

Finley, M.I., Economy and Society in Ancient Greece (Brent D. Shaw & Richard P. Sailer eds., 1982).

Fischer, David Hackett. Albion's Seed: Four British Folkways in America (1989).

Foster, Benjamin R., Administration and Use of Institutional Land in Sargonic Mesopotamia (1982).

Gelb, Ignace J., et al, Earliest Land Tenure Systems in the Near East: Ancient Kudurrus (1991).

Gluckman, Max. Custom and Conflict in Africa (1956).

Goodenough, Ward Hunt. Property, Kin, and Community on Turk (1951).

Hiatt, L. R. Ownership and Use of Land Among Australian Aboriginies, in Man the Hunter 99102 (Richard B. Lee & Irven Devore Eds. 1968).

Hoebel, E. Adamson. The Law of Primitive Man: A Study in Comparative Legal Dynamics 58 (1954).

Hoebel, E. Adamson. The Political Organization and Law-Ways of the Comanche Indians 119 (1940).

Hoebel, E. Adamson & Everett L. Frost. Cultural and Social Anthropology (1976).

Hudson, Michael & Baruch A. Levine. Privatization in the Ancient Near East and Classical World: a Colloquium Held at New York University, November 17-18, 1994 (Peabody Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology 1996).

Knauft, Bruce M. From Primitive to Postcolonial in Melanesia and Anthropology (1999).

Kuper, Adam, The Reinvention of Primitive Society: Transformations of a Myth (2005)

Landes, Ruth. The Ojibwa of Canada, In Cooperation and Competition Among Primitive Peoples 9091 (Margaret Mead Ed. 1937).

Lee, Richard B. What Hunters Do for a Living, Or How to Make Out on Scarce Resources, in Man the Hunter 31 (Richard B. Lee & Irven Devore Eds. 1968).

LeFevre, Robert. The Philosophy of Ownership (Rampart College 1966). See chapter 3, "Earliest Property Concepts" pp. 12 - 22.

Lowie, R. Primitive Society 20710 (1947).

Malinowshi, Bronislaw. Crime and Custom in Savage Society (1967).

Mann, Charles C. 1491: New Revelations of the Americas Before Columbus (2005).

Marshall, Lorna. The Kung of Nyae Nyae 251 (1965).

Mass, Jeffrey P. Family, Law, and Property in Japan, 1200-1350 (Harvard University, Edwin O. Reischauer Institute Of Japanese Studies 2000).

Meggitt, Mervyn J. Desert People: A Study of the Walbiri Aborigines of Central Australia 1 20 (1965).

Netting, Robert Mcc. Hill Farmers of Nigeria: Cultural Ecology of the Kofyar of the Jos Plateau 159 (1968).

Noyes, C. Reinold. The Institution of Property: A Study of the Development, Substance and Arrangement of the System of Property in Modern Anglo-American Law (Longmans, Green & Co. 1936).

P.W. Pestman, The Law of Succession in Ancient Egypt, in Essays on Oriental Laws of Succession (J. Brugman et al. eds., 1969).

Rose, Carol M. Property and Persuasion: Essays on the History, Theory, and Rhetoric of Ownership (Westview Press 1994).

Radcliffe-Brown, A. R. The Andaman Islanders 41 (1922).

Radlov, V. V. Aus Siberien 414 (2d ed. 1968).

Rappaport, Roy A. Pigs for the Ancestors 1921 (1984).

Rice, Otis K. The Hatfields and the Mccoys (1978).

Rowe, John Howland. Inca Culture At the Time of the Spanish Conquest, in 2 Handbook of South American Indians 219 (Julian Haynes Steward Ed. 194659).

Salisbury, Richard F. From Stone to Steel: Economic Consequences of Technological Change in New Guinea (1962).

Schrijver, Nico. Sovereignty Over Natural Resources: Balancing Rights & Duties (1997).

Seagle, William. A History of Law (1946).

Seligmann, Charles Gabriel & Brenda Z. Seligmann. The Veddas 106-121 (1915).

Siegan, Bernard H. Property Rights: from Magna Carta to the Fourteenth Amendment (Transaction Publishers 2001).

Sumner, William Graham. The Science of Society 287-302 (1927).

Tacitus, Cornelius. Germania 169-171 (Loeb Ed. 1963).

Ter Haar, Barend. Adat Law in Indonesia 81127 (1948).

Thiel, J.H. Studies in Ancient History (J.C. Greben, Amsterdam 1994) (See chapter 4, entitled "On Solon's System of Property-Classes" pp. 33-43).

Titiev, Mischa. Old Oraibi 181 (1944).

Thomas, Elizabeth Marshall. The Harmless People 182 (1959).

Ward, William A., Some Aspects of Private Land Ownership and Inheritance in Ancient Egypt, ca. 2500-1000 b.c., in Land Tenure and Social Transformation in the Middle East (Tarif Khalidi ed., 1984).

Weber, Max, The Agrarian Sociology of Ancient Civilizations (R.I. Frank trans., NLB 1976) (1909) 69-77.

Westbrook, Raymond. Property and the Family in Biblical Law (1994).

Wickham, Chris. Land and Power: Studies in Italian and European Social History, 400-1200 124 (1994).

Woodburn, James. An Introduction to Hadza Ecology, in Man the Hunter 49-55 (Richard B. Lee & Irven DeVorde eds. 1968).

Articles

Anaya, S. James. "Maya Aboriginal Land and Resource Rights and the Conflict Over Logging in Southern Belize," 1 Yale H.R. & Dev. L.J. 17 (1998).

Arrunada, Benito. "Property Enforcement as Organized Consent," 19 J.L. Econ. & Org. 401 (Oct. 2003).

Baer, Klaus, "The Low Price of Land in Ancient Egypt," 1 J. Am. Res. Center in Egypt 25 (1962).

Banner, Stuart. "Two Properties, One Land: Land and Space in Nineteenth-Century New Zealand," 24 Law and Social Inquiry 807 (1999).

Banner, Stuart. "Why Terra Nullis? Anthropology and Early Property Law in Early Australia," 23 Law & Hist. Rev. 95 (Spring 2005).

Benson, Bruce L. "Property Rights in Primitive Societies: Law Without Government," 26 Harv. J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 923 (Summer 2003).

Boas, Franz. "The Eskimo of Baffinland and Hudson Bay," 15 Bull. Am. Museum Nat. Hist. 116 (1907).

Carstens, Peter. "The Inheritance of Private Property Among the Nama of Southern Africa Reconsidered," 53 Africa 58, 68 (1983).

Dyson-Hudson, Rada & Eric Alden Smith. "Human Territoriality: An Ecological Reassessment," 80 Am. Anthropologist (1978).

Epstein, Richard A., "Possession as the Root of Title," 13 Ga. L. Rev. 1221 (1979).

Epstein, Richard A. "Property Rights Claims of Indigenous Populations: The View from the Common Law," 31 University of Toledo Law Review 1 (Fall 1999).

Field, Barry C, "The Evolution of Property Rights," 42 Kyklos 319 (1989).

Foster, Benjamin R., "Early Mesopotamian Land Sales," 114 J. Am. Oriental Soc'y 440, 444 (1994).

Freyfogle, Eric T., "Ethics, Community, and Private Land," 23 Ecology L.Q. 631, 632-638 (1993) .

Freyfogle, Eric T., "Land Use and the Study of Early American History," 91 Yale LJ. 717 (1985).

Green, Shelbey D., "Specific Relief for Ancient Deprivations of Property, 36 Akron L. Rev. 245 (2003).

Gunawardana, R.A.L.H. "Necessary Evil, The Growth of A System of Judicial Courts and the Response It Evoked Among the Buddhist Monastic Community iIn Ancient Sri Lanka," 55 Buffalo Law Review 685 (July 2007).

Mann, Charles C., "America, Found & Lost," 211 National Geographic 32 (May 2007).

Powell, M.A., "Elusive Eden: Private Property at the Dawn of History," Journal of Cuneiform Studies 46 (1994).

Renger, Johannes M., "Institutional, Communal, and Individual Ownership or Possession of Arable Land in Ancient Mesopotamia from the End of the Fourth to the End of the First Millennium B.C.," 71 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 269 (1995).

Seielstad, Andrea M., "The Recognition and Evolution of Tribal Sovereign Immunity under Federal Law: Legal, Historical, and Normative Reflections on a Fundamental Aspect of American Indian Sovereignty," 37 Tulsa L. Rev. 661 (Spring 2002).

Riley, Angela R. "Recovering Collectivity: Group Rights to Intellectual Property in Indigenous Communities," 18 Cardozo Arts & Entertainment Law Journal 175 (Spring 2000).

Schmidtz, David & Elizabeth Willott. "Reinventing the Commons: An African Case Study," 37 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 203 (Nov. 2003).

Speck, Frank G. "The Family Hunting Band As the Basis of Algonkian Social Organization," 17 Am. Anthropologist (n.s.) 289-305 (1915).

Thomas, David A. "Anglo-Saxon Antecedents of the Common Law," 1985 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 453, 497-501.

Thomas, David A. "Common Law Under the Early Normans," 1986 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 109, 116, 118-120.

Thorland, Charles D., "Ancient Land Law: Mesopotamia, Egypt, Israel," 71 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 321 (1995).

Ward, Kathleen. A. Before and After the White Man: Indian Women, Property, Progress, and Power, 6 Conn. Pub. Int. L. J. 245-267 (2007).

Wiersma, Lindsey. "Indigenous Lands as Cultural Property: A New Approach to Indigenous Land Claims" 54 Duke L.J. 1061 (February, 2005).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Supp. To CHAPTER 1 PROPERTY CONCEPTS AMONG LESS DEVELOPED CULTURES

1-1 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Supp. to § 1.08

Supp. to § 1.08 Bibliography

[Go To Main]

Articles

add:

Malagrino, Dylan Oliver. "Applying Communal Theories to Urban Property: An Anthropological Look at Using the Elaboration of Common Property Regimes to Reduce Social Exclusion from Housing Markets," 10 U.C. Davis Bus. L.J. 33 (Fall 2009) .

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions 2.syn

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 2.syn Synopsis to Chapter 2: LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

§ 2.01 Purpose of the Chapter.

§ 2.02 Patterns of Landholding Among Britain's Earliest Peoples.

§ 2.02(a) Habitation of Britain After the Last Glacial Age.

§ 2.02(b) The Shift from Hunting and Gathering to Farming.

§ 2.02(c) Landholding Patterns in the Early Farming Cultures.

§ 2.03 Patterns of Landholding Among the British Celts.

§ 2.03(a) The Rise of the Celts.

§ 2.03(b) Sequence of the Celtic Hallstatt and La Tene Cultures.

§ 2.03(c) Theories on the Emergence of Iron Age Culture in Britain.

§ 2.03(d) Landholding Patterns in Britain During the Time of Celtic Domination.

§ 2.03(e) Changes Introduced by the Belgic Celts.

§ 2.03(f) Landholding Patterns Inferred from Ancient Celtic Laws.

§ 2.03(g) Summary of Landholding Patterns Among the British Celts.

§ 2.04 Patterns of Landholding Among the Romano-Britons.

§ 2.04(a) Summary of the Roman Conquest and Occupation of Britain.

§ 2.04(a)(1) The Early Course of Conquest and Pacification.

§ 2.04(a)(2) The Beginnings of Romanization.

§ 2.04(a)(3) Early Changes in Landholding Practices Introduced by the Romans.

§ 2.04(b) The Impact of Roman Law on Britain.

§ 2.04(c) Summary of Roman Land Law Concepts to A.D. 400.

§ 2.04(d) Extent of Roman Land Law Imposition on Celtic Britain.

§ 2.04(d)(1) Private Property in Towns.

§ 2.04(d)(2) Villas and Farms in the Countryside.

§ 2.04(d)(3) Changes in Agricultural Landholding.

§ 2.04(e) Reversion to Celtic Tribalism in Britain after A.D. 400.

§ 2.05 Modern Vestiges of Ancient Landholding Patterns.

§ 2.06 Bibliography.

Professor David A. Thomas
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 2.01

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 2.01 Purpose of the Chapter.

The principal focus of this work is the property rights recognized within the American legal system, and the objective of the initial chapters is to show the historical evolution of those property rights. Inasmuch as the American legal principles rest upon a historical foundation of English law, an exposition of the origin of property rights under that legal system is relevant and instructive.

Of somewhat less relevance is a discussion of property rights recognized in Britain in the centuries before the common law began to flower. Britain's earliest prehistoric inhabitants were displaced by successive invasions of Celtic peoples, who were, in turn, harassed and displaced by Roman, Pictish, and Germanic invaders. Except for some written accounts from the Romans, only archaeological evidence remains from these centuries of habitation before the Anglo-Saxons arrived, and one discerns virtually no impact of those prehistoric cultures on the present Anglo-American legal systems.

It is useful, nevertheless, to devote a brief introductory chapter to summarizing available knowledge of these cultures and their property practices. Some subtle manifestations of their once pervasive acceptance remain even today, especially in farming practices of some parts of the British Isles. More importantly, a fuller understanding of ancient property practices in the direct ancestry of our own civilization, and of the circumstances producing those practices, enlightens us as to the merits and motives of modern practices.

In this chapter, then, will be summarized the available information concerning the property rights recognized in the mostly Celtic cultures that prevailed in Britain before the Roman invasions and conquest, the extent to which four centuries of Roman presence altered those customs, and how property practices may have been altered when clashes with Anglo-Saxons became widespread. In conclusion, the chapter contains some brief descriptive comments about modern survivals of these practices.

Numerous technical publications concerning the investigations of this era are available for consideration. In this chapter, cited sources are generally those that reliably and readably summarize and interpret the field work and original scholarly work that have made the primary contributions to the understanding of this largely non-documentary subject. Bibliographies in those cited sources make ample reference to the publications of original work in studies of ancient Britain.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 2.02

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 2.02 Patterns of Landholding Among Britain's Earliest Peoples.

§ 2.02(a) Habitation of Britain After the Last Glacial Age.

According to the weight of expert opinion, Britain's last glacial period drew to a close about 8300 B.C. n1 Despite the hardships imposed until then by the long epochs of arctic and subarctic conditions, human occupation of Britain in the form of hunter-gatherer societies is in evidence for many millennia preceding that time. n2 By 6000 B.C., the meltwater from receding glaciers had rendered Britain an island, accessible from mainland Europe only by boat, and forcing cultural change into more insular patterns.

In anthropological terms, inhabitants of Britain after it became an island continued in a Mesolithic culture, with hunting and gathering of food resources as the primary means of subsistence.

§ 2.02(b) The Shift from Hunting and Gathering to Farming.

After 4000 B.C., archaeological evidence indicates that the Mesolithic culture gradually disappeared, replaced by a Neolithic culture introduced by settlers arriving from the mainland, and distinguished from the Mesolithic in its emphasis on farming n3 as the main means of subsistence. n4 It has been observed that this cultural change had implications for customs regarding both personal and real property:

> In the carefree days of the hunter and gatherer, people travelled light, for they were constantly on the move to fresh hunting and cropping grounds. Personal property was a hindrance, and travel gear would have been confined to a tent or a canoe and essential tools and weapons. Once men had achieved the distinction of a fixed address, they had to accumulate property. There were livestock to guard, field systems to tend, houses to build and repair. Even if it is assumed that property was held in common by the community (which is far from certain) there would have been outsiders from neighbouring villages eager to avail themselves of stock or possessions. n5

Evidence and sites for the earliest or pioneering farming groups fall within the period 3500-3000 B.C. Thereafter, the expansion of farming was rapid and the archaeological evidence for continuation of old hunter-gatherer groups all but disappears. n6 No doubt hunting and gathering continued, as evidence for those activities exists at sites of prehistoric farming communities. n7 More noteworthy, however, is the evidence that the farming communities also practiced animal husbandry on a very wide scale, with cattle more abundantly manifest than sheep and pigs. n8

§ 2.02(c) Landholding Patterns in the Early Farming Cultures.

In these early centuries of farming culture, the predominant form of economic organization appears to have been the single homestead rather than a group of homesteads in a village. n9 Such farmstead settlements would most likely have been surrounded by fields and pastures, but no complete sites from the third millennium B.C. have yet been identified. In the southern and middle regions of England occasionally large ditched enclosures, sometimes called causewayed camps or causewayed enclosures, have been identified next to single farmsteads. Views vary as to the possible functions of these formations, but it is likely that they were part of the settlement and agriculture activities of the farmsteads. n10 From this period has also come isolated but intriguing evidence of communities fortified against aggression, and of larger structures suggesting the emergence of powerful chiefdoms. n11

At about 1500 B.C., a dramatic re-ordering of agricultural land appears to have occurred in several large areas throughout Britain:

> In Wessex [for example] very large field systems were laid out on the downland, sometimes incorporating barrows in the existing landscape... The main characteristics of these systems were their considerable size and their complex internal structure. They were evidently imposed on the landscape in a single operation, and for the most part they conform to clearly defined baselines, which can run across the country for several kilometres, ignoring the subtleties of local topography. n12

These field systems were laid out by means of stone banks, or hedges or ditches, which effectively enclosed the fields. The little circular houses of stone or wood, or of both, were either scattered among the fields or grouped together, sometimes within ditched areas; settlements and fields were connected by droveways. n13

> The unitary structure of these large areas of the landscape is remarkably clear, and the field systems are on a scale hardly equalled before the Roman period. They may be thought of as "cohesive" systems, as distinct from "aggregate" systems which form by piecemeal addition. This terminology suggests analogies with the planning of settlements and their internal buildings... The size and shape of some of the larger land blocks suggest that they should be considered as whole "territories", and not simply as internal land divisions of particular farms. n14

Throughout all the regional and local variations in such field systems runs the consistent inference that territorial privileges were important to these prehistoric peoples, and that the same extended families or communities remained on the same land more or less permanently.

Shortly after 1000 B.C., these individual field systems appear to have been abandoned, and in their place appeared large, open fields marked off by somewhat irregular earthworks, often referred to by archaeologists as ranch boundaries. n15

At this point in any discussion of British prehistory, it is easy to become mired in the still unsettled issues about when and in what sequence the various advances in civilization occurred. Introduction of some indicia of Bronze Age culture appears coincident with or immediately subsequent to the arrival of Beaker artifacts in Britain during the second millennium B.C. But evidence of Beaker culture does not suggest that these immigrants were numerous or that they absorbed the indigenous peoples. Nor can it be determined if the rise of Bronze Age culture occurred naturally among established inhabitants or was introduced by immigrants.

Further disagreement extends to the attempts to interpret the various waves or stages of immigration or invasion by Celtic peoples from the mainland. n16 Again, such invasions as may have occurred seem coincident or connected with the appearance of Iron Age cultural characteristics, but it cannot be determined if these technological advances were introduced by the invaders, or independently developed by the established peoples building on Bronze Age foundations, or both. Moreover, it is also uncertain whether the various invaders simply arrived and integrated themselves into the existing populace, or actually conquered major parts of the British island. These questions may be passed over in the context of this chapter, because the Celtic landholding practices to be described in the next section are reasonably consistent throughout the period of Celtic presence in Britain; also, most of the reliable information on such customs and practices is derived from the later Celtic period, after any invasions had already occurred, so that the sequence and impact of the invasions are not especially important to an understanding of this topic.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 1. See, e.g., J. V. S. Megaw & D. A. Simpson, Introduction to British Prehistory 6-8 (1979); John G. Evans, The Environment of Early Man in the British Isles 55 (1975).

(n2)Footnote 2. T. C. Darvill, Prehistoric Britain 28-38 (1987).

(n3)Footnote 3. It has also been suggested that the shift to a farming economy was at least partly indigenous. T. C. Darvill, Prehistoric Britain 48-49 (1987).

(n4)Footnote 4. Lloyd Laing & Jennifer Laing, The Origins of Britain 77-86 (1980); Richard Bradley, The Social Foundations of Prehistoric Britain 7 (1984). See also Francis Pryor, Farmers in Prehistoric Britain (1998).

(n5)Footnote 5. Lloyd Laing & Jennifer Laing, The Origins of Britain 80 (1980).

(n6)Footnote 6. T. C. Darvill, Prehistoric Britain 50-51 (1987).

(n7)Footnote 7. T. C. Darvill, Prehistoric Britain 53-54 (1987).

(n8)Footnote 8. T. C. Darvill, Prehistoric Britain 51 (1987); Peter G. Reynolds, Ancient Farming 38-44 (1987).

(n9)Footnote 9. I. H. Longworth, Prehistoric Britain 11 (1985). The beginning of heavy immigration by so-called Beaker people, about 2500 B.C., did not disturb this pattern; they apparently lived in widely scattered single houses. See James L. Forde-Johnston, Prehistoric Britain and Ireland 18, 36-38 (1976). The Beaker culture, however, may have consisted mostly of an infusion of artifacts.

(n10)Footnote 10. T. C. Darvill, Prehistoric Britain 57-63 (1987).

(n11)Footnote 11. Lloyd Laing & Jennifer Laing, The Origins of Britain 98-99 (1980).

(n12)Footnote 12. Richard Bradley, The Prehistoric Settlement of Britain 116 (1978); see Collin Bowen, Pattern and Interpretation: A View of the Wessex Landscape from Neolithic to Roman Times, in Recent Work in Rural Archaeology 44-55 (P. J. Fowler ed. 1975). See also Janet Bord & Colin Bord, Prehistoric Britain from The Air (1997).

(n13)Footnote 13. T. C. Darvill, Prehistoric Britain 108 (1987). In Wessex, the field systems described in the text are sometimes referred to as Celtic fields, even though they arose long before invasions of Celtic peoples commenced. Agriculture based on "small, rectangular "Celtic" fields ... is a striking feature of the Roman period...." P. Salway, Roman Britain 8 (1981).

(n14)Footnote 14. Richard Bradley, The Prehistoric Settlement of Britain 116-117 (1978).

(n15)Footnote 15. Susan Bowen, Celtic Fields and Ranch Boundaries in Wessex, in Susan Limbrey & John G. Evans, The Effect of Man on the Landscape: The Lowland Zone 115-121 (Council for British Archaeology Research Report No. 21, 1978).

(n16)Footnote 16. Some of the principal evidence for the waves of migration derives from the interpretation of "waves" of imported coins as representing movements of peoples. Obviously, such evidence reveals little about the motives or consequences connected with such migrations.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 2.03

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 2.03 Patterns of Landholding Among the British Celts.

§ 2.03(a) The Rise of the Celts.

Archaeologists have identified various cultural traits of prehistoric peoples inhabiting Europe that gave rise to elements of Celtic culture, but the early culture that seems to be the direct ancestor of the Celts is known as the Urnfield culture. n17 After the collapse of Minoan and Mycenaean cultures and Aegean civilization generally around 1200 B.C., the so-called Urnfield culture arose in the area of modern Hungary and spread rapidly in all directions, eventually covering most of eastern and southern Europe. Some elements of Urnfield culture, best characterized as a Late Bronze Age culture, even appeared in areas of Spain, France, the Low Countries, and Britain. n18 Around 700 B.C., it is believed that Celtic peoples and the earliest phases of the European Iron Age emerged from the Urnfield culture; these Celtic peoples have been assigned a common identity because of shared language and cultural traits, but their political allegiances almost never extended beyond their individual tribes.

§ 2.03(b) Sequence of the Celtic Hallstatt and La Tene Cultures.

Discoveries and excavations of prehistoric Celtic communities at Lake Hallstatt in Austria, beginning in 1846, and at La Tene on the banks of Lake Neuchatel in Switzerland, beginning in 1858, have led to elaborate studies and theories of the progressive development of Celtic culture. Both sites have given their names as cultural labels for Celts. The earlier Hallstatt culture, which belongs to the Bronze Age, is assigned to the period 1100-700 B.C., while the later Hallstatt culture, an Iron Age culture, extended from the seventh century into the fifth century B.C. The La Tene culture began in the fifth century B.C., and continued until the Celts were expelled by Germanic tribes or overcome by the Romans at various times and places throughout Europe, but culminating with the Roman conquest of British Celts in the first century A.D.

§ 2.03(c) Theories on the Emergence of Iron Age Culture in Britain.

The traditional invasion hypothesis for Britain is that Celts of the Hallstatt culture invaded Britain beginning in the sixth century B.C., with heaviest settlement in the south and east. In the fourth and third centuries B.C., more aggressive Celts of the La Tene culture invaded the south, and clashes between these immigrants and the earlier Celtic settlers are thought to have stimulated much of the hillfort construction still so evident in England. A late La Tene culture was then carried in by a third wave of Celtic invasion in the second and first centuries B.C., in the southeast of Britain. n19 These latest invaders were identified by Julius Caesar as of the Belgae tribe, n20 although evidence also exists for the presence of other tribes during this period. n21 This hypothesis accounts for the occurrence of La Tene characteristics in the south and east of Britain and of Hallstatt characteristics in the north and west.

The invasion hypothesis has been challenged by alternative explanations suggesting that the Iron Age culture traits were indigenous developments "immediately based on Bronze Age antecedents"; n22 moreover, the British hillfort tradition has been shown to predate the time assigned by the invasion hypothesis. The result of this archaeological debate has been to raise questions about whether the British Celts, who opposed Roman invasions in the first centuries B.C. and A.D., were relatively new arrivals or long-time settlers. From at least one perspective, that of language, the question is perhaps moot, because it is generally agreed that by the time of the Roman invasions, Celtic was the language spoken throughout Britain. n23

§ 2.03(d) Landholding Patterns in Britain During the Time of Celtic Domination.

Despite the common language, the peoples of Britain were at different stages in development of material culture at the time of the initial Roman invasions in the first century B.C. Inasmuch as British Celtic civilization of this time, whether Hallstatt or La Tene, can be generally characterized as of the Late Bronze Age, then the following description of landholding patterns is appropriate:

> Its people lived either in isolated farms or in hut-villages, situated for the most part on the gravel or river-banks or the light upland soils such as the chalk downs or oolite plateaux, which by that time had been to a great extent cleared of their native scrub; each settlement was surrounded by small fields, tilled either with a foot-plough of the type still used not long ago by Hebridean crofters, or else at best with a light ox-drawn plough which scratched the soil without turning the sod. Thus the land was inhabited by a stable and industrious peasant population, living by agriculture and the keeping of live stock, augmented no doubt by hunting and fishing... Judging by the absence of towns and the scarcity of anything like true fortification, these people were little organized for warfare, though there was certainly a distinction between rich and poor... n24

The pronounced variation in stages of cultural development at different locations throughout Britain may have meant little difference in landholding patterns, except to the extent that cultural development determined the form of social organization. This is because even the rudimentary information available today shows that differences in land settlement patterns seem to correspond to types of social organization, and, of course, to topography. n25 By 150 B.C., several distinct zones exhibiting different settlement patterns were in evidence in Britain. In the north, mostly homesteads surrounded by enclosures were to be found. The east and midlands were characterized by villages and open settlements. The southeast, south, and Welsh borderlands comprised the area dominated by hillforts and associated settlements. In Cornwall and west Wales were to be found strongly defended homesteads. n26 In certain areas, hillforts became very prominent in the political life of the people. Some of these became permanently occupied towns with pit dwellings; in general, they apparently arose in response to development of tribal organizations and tribal wars. n27

§ 2.03(e) Changes Introduced by the Belgic Celts.

Only with the invasion of the so-called Belgae tribe of Celts, in the decades before Julius Caesar arrived in Britain in the middle of the first century B.C., did the arrival of an intruder result in dramatic changes in land use patterns. Before invading Britain, the Belgae may have had significant contact with or even have become racially mixed with Germanic peoples on the mainland. In common with Germanic practice, the Belgic tribes had implements enabling them to work the heavier soils of woodland valleys and to thus spread out from the upland areas occupied by other Celts:

> Hence, for the first time in British history, the Belgae began to clear forests, and to exploit the heavier soils on which they grew; they covered the country with isolated farm-houses and stocked it with > cattle; they settled in valleys and appropriated river-crossings ... they abandoned the hill-tops and built their towns in valley-sites which have been inhabited ever since... They also introduced into Britain a practice which we know to have been current among the early Germans: that of delimiting their territory by means of a continuous rampart or ditch. n28

§ 2.03(f) Landholding Patterns Inferred from Ancient Celtic Laws.

From such archaeological evidence it is difficult to discern the finer points of social organization and patterns of landholding. Indeed, the most reliable and detailed information seems to be that exhibited in written collections of Irish and Welsh laws, which collections date from several centuries later but are apparently of ancient origin. Such ancient laws of the Celts as are in our possession date from periods subsequent to the Roman occupation of Britain and depict a more elaborate social hierarchy than can be discerned for the pre-Roman period from archaeological evidence alone, but it is reasonable to believe that some similar social organization and laws existed in pre-Roman Celtic society.

These laws confirm that the tribe was the main unit of social organization among the Celts, that a tribe consisted of a number of related kinship groups or families, and that a family was typically composed of a man and wife or wives and up to four generations of direct descendants. A common variation of this family unit would be an expanded version, including the father and brothers of the family head, and two generations of the brothers' direct descendants. It is this expanded family group that typically shared inherited goods or participated in the paying of fines.

The ancient laws also reveal that land was held in common at the level of the kinship group, and was distributed for use among individual families. n29 If the kinship group was headed by a king, the king's power derived largely from the number of clients whose allegiance the king had secured. Clients were prominent members of the noble, warrior class. In return for the clients' loyalty and services, the king dispensed the use of property to the clients. More important clients could themselves have warriors of lesser social status as their own clients; a client was, in effect, a tenant farmer. n30

According to the laws, a client who was a freeman typically held numbers of livestock, certain essential farming implements and rights to certain grazing land. Under a contractual arrangement with the overlord for a definite period of time, usually set at seven years, the client rented stock from the overlord and, in return, rendered personal service in the overlord's household and paid a portion -- usually about one-third -- of his personal income in the form of finished goods. At the end of the rental period, the rented stock became the client's property and the client was free to enter into another contract with any overlord. n31

Clients who were lower on the social scale had less advantageous terms. Usually such clients performed field labor rather than personal household service, and they did not keep their stock at the end of the contract period. Furthermore, such clients each received at the outset of the contract a form of loan from the overlord, in the amount of a portion of the client's honor price, n32 but were seldom able to repay the loan at the end of the contract period; a form of serfdom developed as the inability to repay the loan left the client in more or less permanent bondage. n33

Other evidence also suggests that land was held in common by the tribe in Celtic areas. One tribe of Celts on the Iberian peninsula, the Vaccaei, are reported as having divided up the land among tribesmen each year and shared the harvest among the entire tribe. n34 Julius Caesar's writings did not mention the subject of land ownership among the Celts, and there is no evidence that such ownership in the chief was recognized in native Celtic custom. Only when the Romans imposed their more sophisticated legal system upon Celtic communities were tribal chieftains registered as the owners or at least the possessors of the land. n35

§ 2.03(g) Summary of Landholding Patterns Among the British Celts.

It appears that whether the British Celts lived in individual, isolated homesteads or in small village clusters, the farming patterns were basically the same and had indeed been established among the indigenous inhabitants even before the time of Celtic domination. Where farming, rather than the keeping of herds and flocks, was practiced, the most common pattern was the cultivation of small, rectangular fields, marked off by low banks of earth or rocks or some similarly conspicuous boundary markers. Such land, and probably grazing land, too, was held by family groups, so that clusters of fields would have been worked by farmers connected through blood ties, and the rights to use these fields would quite likely have been passed on to kinship descendants. There is no evidence, however, that such land was alienable outside the family, so that it could have been sold, exchanged, or otherwise transferred to a stranger. n36 The property right of the occupants was apparently a usufruct, or use right only, in addition to limited inheritability. If, as may be inferred from sources on Celtic culture generally, the rights to land were ultimately held by the tribe as communal property, then alienability of land was a right resting with the tribe or with a kinship clan of the tribe. Property rights so held would have been quite consistent with landholding patterns among other cultures in similar stages of development. n37

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 17. "With their vanity, their joy in eating and drinking and their precocity in the crafting of weapons and ornaments, the Urnfield people foreshadowed many of the qualities of their Celtic descendants. The Europe they inhabited was the one in which the Celts were soon to emerge." Duncan Norton-Taylor, The Celts 22 (1974).

(n2)Footnote 18. Barry W. Cunliffe, The Celtic World 15 (1979). See also Barry W. Cunliffe, The Ancient Celts (1997); Homer W. Sykes, Celtic Britain (1998).

(n3)Footnote 19. R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 21-29 (2d ed. 1937).

(n4)Footnote 20. Julius Caesar, 12 De Bello Gallico (Moses Hadas trans. 1957).

(n5)Footnote 21. Peter Salway, Roman Britain 9-10 (1981).

(n6)Footnote 22. Peter Salway, Roman Britain 9-10 (1981). Neither migrations nor kinship relationships fully explain the cultural changes that occurred in Britain during the Later Pre-Roman Iron Age, which have too readily been dated by association with the movements of the Belgae.

(n7)Footnote 23. See Kenneth Hurlstone Jackson, Language and History in Early Britain 76 et seq. (1953). "The widespread occurrence of Celtic place-names in Romanized forms and the virtual absence of place-names obviously deriving from another language strongly support the hypothesis that by the time of the Roman conquest most of Britain was speaking Celtic." Peter Salway, Roman Britain 17 (1981).

> In language, all the various British tribes with whom the Romans came into contact, and probably all the inhabitants of the British Isles without exception, were by the beginning of the Roman period Celtic...
>
> It is not known when the Celtic language was introduced into Britain... One thing is clear: it was sufficiently early for pre-Celtic speech to have left no recognizable trace upon the British names of people or places which, from the time of Caesar onwards, Roman authors committed to writing.

R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 18-19 (2d ed. 1937).

(n8)Footnote 24. R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 20 (2d ed. 1937).

(n9)Footnote 25. "It is certain that a more detailed analysis of settlement types could define a clearer regional patterning and suggest more sensitive correlations with social organization than are possible at present." Martin Millett,

The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 16 (1990).

(n10)Footnote 26. Barry W. Cunliffe, Iron Age Communities in Britain 332-335 (1978).

(n11)Footnote 27. R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 23, 25 (2d ed. 1937).

(n12)Footnote 28. R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 28 (2d ed. 1937).

(n13)Footnote 29. Barry W. Cunliffe, The Celtic World 49 (1979). See also New Directions in Archaeology: Celtic Chiefdom, Celtic State: The Evolution of Complex Social Systems in Prehistoric Europe (Bettina Arnold & D. Blair Gibson, eds. 1995); The Celtic World (Miranda J. Green, ed. 1995).

(n14)Footnote 30. Nora K. Chadwick, The Celts 116-117 (1970).

(n15)Footnote 31. Duncan Norton-Taylor, The Celts 70-73 (1974).

(n16)Footnote 32. The honor price was very similar to the Germanic wergild, the economic value attached to a person's life, based mostly on the person's social status. See Nora K. Chadwick, The Celts 117 (1970).

(n17)Footnote 33. Duncan Norton-Taylor, The Celts 72-73 (1974).

(n18)Footnote 34. Diodorus Siculus, 5:34.

(n19)Footnote 35. H. D. Rankin, Celts and The Classical World 130, 170 (1987).

(n20)Footnote 36. One emerging viewpoint among students of this topic is that the division of land by boundaries and the definition of settlements by ditched enclosures signify that "effective private control over land" had begun to be recognized even before the Roman conquest. See Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 96-97 (1990).

(n21)Footnote 37. See supra Chapter 1, Property Concepts Among Primitive Cultures.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 2.04

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 2.04 Patterns of Landholding Among the Romano-Britons.

In describing how land was held in Britain before common law traditions began to develop, the period of Roman occupation presents an intriguing anomaly: despite almost four centuries of Roman domination in Britain and the sophistication of Roman property law, no lasting changes in British landholding practices occurred. This section will explain why that was so and also describe the profound distinctions between the rudimentary property customs of British Celts and the refined property law of their Roman overlords.

§ 2.04(a) Summary of the Roman Conquest and Occupation of Britain.

§ 2.04(a)(1) The Early Course of Conquest and Pacification.

Rome's interest in Britain as a potential province culminated in conquest only after many decades spent in resolving civil disorder in Rome itself. The first Roman move toward Britain occurred in the late summer of 55 B.C., n38 when Julius Caesar led two legions across the Channel in a somewhat abortive reconnaissance-in-force. Probably the main motive for this attack was to begin neutralizing Britain as a source of support for still rebellious Gauls. The legions fought only one major battle before a large part of the transport fleet was destroyed by stormy conditions while it lay at anchor. Thereafter, the Romans foraged and skirmished, using the time to repair the ships remaining afloat, and then returned across the Channel to Gaul as soon as possible.

Almost a year later, in the early summer of 54 B.C., Caesar again invaded, with a much larger force, and again lost part of his anchored fleet because of rough weather. After a sharp but brief campaign in the area between Dover and London, the Romans obtained submission of the Belgic Britons opposing them. Caesar and his legions, with many hostages and prisoners, returned to Gaul in September of that year, leaving heads of several British tribes nominally in fealty to Rome.

The subsequent civil disorders in Rome, including Caesar's assassination, the rule by the Triumvirate, and the ascension of Octavian as Augustus Caesar, are well documented and give adequate explanation for the failure of Roman forces to return to Britain for nearly a century. Finally, in A.D. 40, preparations for another invasion were made, and only at the point of embarkation from Boulogne was the project suddenly stopped, all under the direction of the unstable emperor Gaius, better known to modern readers as Caligula.

Shortly after the demise of Gaius and the ascension of Claudius as emperor in A.D. 43, a Roman expedition actually landed in Britain, at the site presently known as Richborough, and carried out a methodical campaign to reduce the resistance of the Britons. Following a Roman victory in a major battle at the crossing of the River Medway near Rochester, no substantial opposition was raised against their further advance:

> After advancing to the Thames, the legions halted to await the arrival of the emperor Claudius, who was making the six-week journey from Rome personally to participate in the now set-piece conquest of the native tribes. Undoubtedly, Plautius [the Roman military commander] made as many advance arrangements for peaceful tribal submission as possible. Crossing the Thames as soon as Claudius arrived, the army proceeded to Colchester, to which the Britons had retreated, and there Claudius received the submission of eleven tribes...
>
> Pursuing his policy of pacifying Britain through submission rather than conquest, Claudius set up several "client kings" to secure border areas: Cogidubnus at Chichester, Prasutagus in East Anglia, and shortly thereafter Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes, who dominated a huge area of middle and northern Britain. After a sojourn of only sixteen days, Claudius returned to Rome... n39

Under the leadership of the future emperor Vespasian, other Roman forces swiftly overcame the hillfort-based resistance of tribes in the British southwest, including the Isle of Wight. These areas were also placed under the administrations of native leaders who promised loyalty to Rome. The ostensibly pacified area yielded by these early Roman triumphs in Britain included the territory to the south and east of a line from Exeter in the southwest to Lincoln and north to the River Humber. Whereas a process of Romanization in such pacified areas would normally have begun immediately after the conquest, this process was seriously impeded for two decades or more as Roman administrative blunders and insensitivities continued to incite revolt among the Britons. The most serious of these was the violent uprising led by Queen Boudicca in A.D. 60-61, the suppressing of which left much of southern Britain under some form of military rule until about A.D. 69.

On the frontier, intense military activity continued, with campaigns against Brigantes in the Midlands (A.D. 71-74), the Welsh in the West (A.D. 74-78), and the Caledonians in the North (A.D. 78-85). The northern limits of the Roman presence were never fully settled or stabilized, as best revealed by the construction of Hadrian's Wall, ca. A.D. 122-133, and of the Antonine Wall, beginning ca. A.D. 138, and by the several shifts of Roman defenses back and forth between those barriers.

§ 2.04(a)(2) The Beginnings of Romanization.

Even though the intensity of military activity varied from time to time and place to place in Roman Britain, inexorably the forces intended to Romanize the British Celts were set in motion:

> ... Rome's early approach to pacification was to leave loyal client rulers largely in charge, presumably prompting little initial change in social organization. Nevertheless, Roman life drew its essence from towns and town life, and the impulse to create and embellish urban centers in Britain is unmistakable. The economic base for urbanization consisted of developing trade and opening up markets for surplus goods. Although tribes beyond the Roman pale were not attuned to capitalism and production of surplus goods, it appears that some areas of southern and southeastern Britain rather quickly adapted to such urban Roman ways. The beginnings of the main towns [however] do not appear until near the end of the first century... n40

In his caustic commentary on Roman influence upon the Britons, Tacitus reveals some of the means used to further Romanization:

> In order that a population scattered and uncivilised, and proportionately ready for war, might be habituated by comfort to peace and quiet, he [Agricola] would exhort individuals, assist communities, to erect temples, market-places, houses: he praised the energetic, rebuked the indolent, and the rivalry for his compliments took the place of coercion. Moreover he began to train the sons of the chieftains in a liberal education, and to give a preference to the native talents of the Briton as against the plodding Gaul. As a result, the nation which used to reject the Latin language began to aspire to rhetoric: further, the wearing of [Roman] dress became a distinction, and the toga came into fashion, and little by little the Britons were seduced into alluring vices: to the lounge, the bath, the well-appointed dinner table. The simple "natives" gave the name of "culture" to this factor of their slavery. n41

An important element of Romanization was the settling of retiring legionary veterans in communities or "coloniae" of their own, and the founding of completely Romanized municipalities, with the special status of "municipia." Legionary "coloniae" were established at Colchester sometime before A.D. 60, and at Lincoln and Gloucester during the reign of Domitian, A.D. 81-96. The only known "municipium" was at Verulamium, near the modern St. Albans, north of London. n42

§ 2.04(a)(3) Early Changes in Landholding Practices Introduced by the Romans.

Implicit in the investiture of British tribal chiefs with administrative duties, and in the establishment of legionary colonies and a Roman municipality, were important changes in landholding practices in Britain. However, throughout the following discussion of those changes, and of Roman property law in effect during the period of Roman occupancy, it should be remembered that little is known about how extensively these changes were adopted in Britain. Most likely, the emergence of Roman property practices was confined to a few highly Romanized urban areas of Britain, and the old Celtic property arrangements in the vast majority of the countryside remained unchanged.

It has been previously shown in this chapter n43 that property ownership among the British Celts was probably communal in form, with ownership rights administered by the head of a tribe or other large kinship group. The individual farmers who were the actual occupants of the land probably held only a right to use the land and possibly to extend the use right to their descendants. The notion that the actual occupant of the land also had other ownership rights, such as the right to alienate, was probably unfamiliar to pre-Roman Britons. n44

These customs were probably interrupted first in the Colchester area, when the first colony of discharged legionaries was established. Ordinarily, the veterans would have been given parcels of land from territory that had belonged to and been forfeited by the now deposed native leader. On this occasion, however, the veterans forcibly took much additional land, dispossessing native farmers. Once in occupancy of such land, the soldiers were able, under Roman law, to exercise the full range of property rights pertaining to persons of their class of citizenship, which were much more extensive than the rights held by the native farmers.

Similarly, in the establishment of Verulamium as a Roman "municipium" with certain rights of self-government, property rights held by Roman citizens within this urban center would have been much more extensive than the property rights held by most Britons. In other tribal centers that the Romans turned into administrative centers, or "civitates," similar changes in property rights probably occurred. While it cannot be known whether comparisons of Roman and British property rights received much attention among the Britons, it can be assumed that the Roman presence alerted the native Britons to new ways of landholding. A summary of Roman property law in effect during the period of Roman occupation of Britain can help in understanding the changes in landholding patterns introduced by the Romans. n45

§ 2.04(b) The Impact of Roman Law on Britain.

The direct evidence for the presence of Roman law in Roman Britain is rather sparse. It consists of documentary references both to persons known to have been active in legal affairs and to legal procedures. From such evidence one must make the best judgments possible about how deeply Roman law penetrated into the British populace, the classes of Romano-British society likely to have used or encountered Roman law, and Roman law's impact on Romano-British society as a whole.

Probably the original conquest of Britain during the reign of Claudius was formalized by a practice from republican times: the province was given a set of statutes, the lex provinciae. n46 The governor of the province assumed the office of legati Augusti and was directly accountable to the emperor, who was nominally and officially the governor or proconsul of all the frontier provinces. n47 As chief justice of his province, the governor headed the judicial service, heard legal petitions, and presided at trials, both in the capital and elsewhere in the province. He exercised primary jurisdiction in cases involving Roman citizens, capital punishment, condemnation to the mines or salt works, and amounts over a certain sum; his appellate jurisdiction extended to all other cases arising in the province. His judgment in cases between noncitizens was final.

Because the native noncitizens still lived under local laws to the extent they differed from Roman law, the governor's adjudicatory tasks were complicated by the variety of local Celtic laws that might be invoked in a legal controversy.

Extension of Roman influence and laws normally meant an increase of private litigation, and Roman legal terms have been found on tablets excavated in London, dating from the period of Roman territorial expansion late in the first century A.D. n48 Beginning with Vespasian's reign in A.D. 69, a special judicial officer, the legatus iuridicus, was sometimes appointed to assist the governor in legal matters. Six of these important legal officers in Britain are known, five by name. Two noted legal authorities among them were C. Salvius Liberalis Nonius Bassus, who was probably appointed during Agricola's governorship in A.D. 79, n49 and his successor L. Iavolenus Priscus. n50 The other legati were C. Sabucius Maior Caecilianus, who served during the reign of Marcus Aurelius, n51 M. Vettius Valens, n52 and M. Antius Crescens Calpurnianus, who served under Septimius Severus. n53 In addition, an anonymous legatus iuridicus in Britain set up an inscription celebrating one of Trajan's victories. n54

Only fragments of Romano-British litigation records have survived. A case described in Justinian's Digest tells of a slave-woman condemned to labor at the saltworks, but who was then kidnapped and later repurchased by her original owner, who sued the state to recover the purchase money. n55 In the Theodosian Code, one British case concerns tax revenues to be paid by decurions on behalf of their tenants. n56 Writing scratched on a wooden tablet found in the well of a Romano-British villa refers to the sale of real estate and uses Roman legal terms. n57

Other records are concerned with wills. In one case considered by the legatus iuridicus Iavolenus Priscus, the petitioner sought approval for an alternative disposition of property set in trust for a beneficiary who did not survive minority. n58 In another will case concerning the estate of a legionary who committed suicide, the decedent's will was held valid unless it could be shown that the suicide was to avoid punishment. n59 A will was usually written on tablets by someone with legal training. n60 It is not known how extensively British Celts practiced Roman law, but Juvenal refers to Gauls teaching to Britons the techniques of pleading. n61

Tacitus records Agricola's encouraging Britons to build courts of justice. n62 In one such court at York, the great Roman jurist Aemilius Papinian, who accompanied the emperor Septimius Severus to Britain in A.D. 208, administered justice while his emperor fought barbarian Picts and Scots on the British north border. n63

These fragmentary references to Roman law in Britain show that Roman law was perhaps an active factor in the lives of the Romano-British elite, but it is not known whether it had any impact at all on the large majority of the populace. n64

§ 2.04(c) Summary of Roman Land Law Concepts to A.D. 400. n65

Roman law accorded to land, as something tangible that could be perceived by the senses (res corporalis), the right to be possessed and owned. In the early stage of Roman legal development, ownership of land fell into two categories: the land of Italy or land that enjoyed Italic rights (res mancipi), and all other land (res nec mancipi). The Italic lands could be transferred only by following certain formalities, whereas informal transfers sufficed for the other lands. Later, the distinction broke down and all transfers followed the less formal mode.

Also in the early stages of legal development, land in Italy was the only land that could be privately owned. All other land in the provinces was deemed the property of the people or -- at a later stage -- of the emperor, and concerning which a private party could obtain only certain use and possession rights, for which taxes were paid in return. Eventually, the rights associated with holding such provincial land became quite extensive, and included the rights to hold and enjoy the property, to transmit the holder's rights to heirs upon death, and to transfer possessory rights to others, along with protections for present possessory rights.

Although land could be transferred or acquired by several different methods, the usual method was by actual physical "delivery," which meant putting the transferee in possession and control of the property. In later stages of Roman legal development, delivery could be achieved symbolically, by delivery of a dirt clod or a brick for land or a building, or ownership could even be transferred merely by agreement, especially if actual possession did not change, as in a sale-leaseback arrangement. A form of adverse possession was recognized in permitting a good faith but mistaken possessor of land to acquire ownership of the land after two years of uninterrupted possession. Joint ownership and leaseholds were also recognized.

Land could also be burdened by servitudes. The earliest recognized servitudes included the right to cross the land of another with a right of way, for cattle, for a road, or for an aqueduct. Servitudes generally could not require affirmative action by the owner of the burdened land, but could prohibit certain activities on the burdened land or permit certain activities by the owner of the dominant land. Certain servitudes were recognized as attached to the land, and others were deemed personal, such as a right to make certain use of or take the fruits of the burdened land during one's lifetime.

Land could be used as security for a debt. At first, the debtor simply transferred ownership and possession to the creditor, and had to obtain a transfer back when the debt was paid. Later, transfer of possession without transfer of ownership was used as security. Finally, the land could be hypothecated: neither ownership nor possession was transferred to the creditor, but the creditor could satisfy the unpaid debt by taking over the pledged land.

§ 2.04(d) Extent of Roman Land Law Imposition on Celtic Britain.

§ 2.04(d)(1) Private Property in Towns.

Perhaps the most remarkable form of Roman influence on British landholding practices arose out of the practice of forming Roman provincial administrative centers, called "civitates," out of tribal centers. If the basic pattern established in other provinces was followed, the civitas was organized around a senate n66 controlled by the landowning class, which elected the council and magistrates. It is likely that several tribal areas would have been consolidated into the territory of one civitas, or that more than one civitas would have been formed in the area of a single tribe, each perhaps conforming to the area of a major clan within the tribe. Once the tribal aristocrats were stabilized in their power, prestige, and wealth, they were expected to contribute heavily to the construction and introduction of Roman municipal amenities:

> Power within the new structure brought its burdens. Municipal government was strongly paternalistic so some of the wealth controlled by the aristocracy was redistributed through private patronage and civic benefactions. n67

§ 2.04(d)(2) Villas and Farms in the Countryside.

The elite and leading members of the tribes obtained outright ownership of what had been tribal property. This enabled them to serve in public office, because of a property qualification imposed on those who would be public officials. The construction of villas in the regions around the civitas also attests to the private property holdings of the native municipal leaders as well as of the Roman themselves. Archaeological evidence also shows, however, that many native farms alongside the villas continued to operate in the ways they had before the Roman invasion. n68 Indeed,

> The bulk of the countryside nevertheless still shows a strong continuity from the [Late Pre-Roman Iron Age], with even the major planned field systems of South Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire ... now shown to be Iron Age in origin and not the result of significant landscape alterations under Roman influence. n69

By the middle of the third century, economic conditions in the Roman empire had worsened to the point that the local aristocracy "became less and less willing to serve their communities and endow them with gifts and buildings." n70 Also in the later Roman period, it is possible to detect signs that landholdings were being consolidated, even among peasant farmers in the rural areas, possibly to accommodate multiple occupancy. n71

Another development in Romano-British landholding patterns revealed by archaeology is a form of dual residency in some of the villas. In these villas are found two or more self-contained residential units; possible interpretive explanations include a proprietor and heir maintaining an estate jointly, or two or more family members holding the power over the land, or a steward managing the estate during prolonged absences of the owner. n72 Other villas show structural forms which suggest housing for a single extended family, and thus a continuation of housing and social patterns from the pre-Roman era. n73

Even with all of this information, the housing patterns and social organization for the majority of the population, who did not live in stone villas, is unknown, although more work in this area is now underway. n74 With respect to rural settlements, it has been safer to assume that settlement patterns were more likely to remain unchanged from pre-Roman times in those areas where Romanization was least conspicuous. One writer has concluded:

> Roman manners and customs had less impact on the north and west of Britain... From Cornwall to Northumberland Romano-British hut clusters are found, with or without associated enclosures, singly or in groups, on open or defended sites...
>
> Throughout the north and west of England and Wales, round stone-built huts surrounded by oval, round or polygonal enclosure walls were a basic form for several centuries. These seem to be family settlements, single farms, but during the Roman period not only did their numbers multiply, but also homesteads which started as a single nucleus can be seen growing into hamlets or sizeable family settlements, made up of a series of such nuclear groups...
>
> Almost all of these upland homesteads and settlements were surrounded by walls or ditches, but these clearly had no military significance, being designed to keep cattle, sheep and children in, and thieves, wolves, and perhaps rodents out... n75

In the "coloniae," the towns for retired legionary veterans, land grants in place of cash gratuities were the rule, n76 especially if the settlement could be on sites of former military camps in the provinces. Roman soldiers often obtained Roman citizenship upon retirement from active duty, so undoubtedly a tradition of independent farmers was established early in the development of these communities. In the later stages of the Roman occupation, the agricultural landholding patterns of the areas surrounding the coloniae became indistinguishable from patterns in other nearby areas.

With the granting of universal Roman citizenship in A.D. 212, the possibility arises that resort to Roman law to determine property rights became more widespread. n77 Only one document relating to the sale of land from the period of Roman occupation of Britain has been found, and that document is based on Roman civil law. n78 As noted in the following paragraphs, however, no evidence has yet emerged to show that landholding patterns for most of Roman Britain differed from those that prevailed in the pre-Roman time.

§ 2.04(d)(3) Changes in Agricultural Landholding.

Agricultural organization and landholding patterns were not entirely unaffected by evolution within the Roman empire. As occurred elsewhere in the empire, the size of Romano-British landholdings increased, a result of the initial concession of private property rights to tribal leaders and the unprogressive system of Roman taxation, with its broad exemptions for the wealthiest landowners. Throughout the empire,

> This concentration of land led to the development of the colonate system, whereby a landowner ... whose estate was sufficiently large to need cultivation by others used tenants rather than slaves as labourers. These tenants (coloni) became tied to the land, and even to particular estates, both by custom and by the law, which required them to remain on the land for taxation purposes. The system developed into a form of heredity service which became de facto feudal, at least in provinces where, unlike Britain, there were severe pressures on agricultural production. n79

An entry in the Theodosian Code, dating from A.D. 319, n80 defining the tax liability of British landowners has been interpreted to indicate that the colonate system existed in Britain, n81 but there remains the possibility that some or even most of the peasant farmers remained free rather than under tenure. It is known that some coloni in Britain's tax jurisdiction were registered for taxation in their own villages rather than with the estates of other landowners, n82 which would indicate free rather than tenured status.

§ 2.04(e) Reversion to Celtic Tribalism in Britain after A.D. 400.

Whatever the impact of Roman property law and practice on landholding in Roman Britain, it seems to have been ground out of existence by the hard fighting against the Anglo-Saxons during the fifth and sixth centuries A.D. Concurrent with the breakdown of Roman authority in Britain at the end of the fourth century A.D. was the increase of hostilities from Germanic incursions along the south and east coasts and Pictish raids along the north border. It is now accepted that the protracted British resistance to these assaults, rather than accommodations such as were reached with the Franks in Gaul, led to the invaders destroying rather than subsuming and integrating Romano-British society. Abundant archaeological evidence attests that what was left of Romano-British society reverted rather swiftly to the old tribal ways of pre-Roman Celticism. n83 Indeed, this evidence shows that, as cities and towns declined, many Celtic Iron Age hillforts were renovated; Celtic warlords returned to the hills to occupy those defended sites that had been abandoned when the Romans conquered Britain.

The death throes of Roman civilization were wrenching and poignant throughout the empire, and Britain did not escape the anguish, aptly described by Collingwood and Myres:

> From 455, ... we hear of no more cultural and spiritual contacts between Britain and the Mediterranean world. The culture of the romanized upper classes has sunk into discredit and fades away, now that its owners have confessed their inability to control the political situation, and abdicated in favour of what today would be called a dictatorship. Roman Britain is now rapidly dying, and we are reaching the "sub-Roman" period when men lived on the relics of Romanity diluted in a pervading medium of Celticism.
>
> Thus from the middle of the [fifth] century onwards, the general tone of Romano-British society became more and more barbarized. As the Saxon settlements grew in strength, the Roman civilization of the lowland zone was declining into a Celto-Roman civilization where Celtic elements were more and more prevailing over Roman. Latin must have been less and less used. Rome was becoming a memory. n84

Archaeology further suggests that an almost complete interruption, or discontinuity, between Romano-Britons and Anglo-Saxons occurred among the landowning elite. No villa has yet been investigated that continued to be occupied into Saxon times. n85 Yet it is possible that, with the replacement of one elite by another, the life of the rural peasant did carry on much as before, "that many Romano-British peasants remained to become Anglo-Saxon peasants." n86

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 38. The outline of the Roman military campaigns in Britain is drawn in part from the fuller accounts found in R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 32-119 (2d ed. 1937), and sources cited therein. The only ancient account of the conquest under the emperor Claudius is in Cassius Dio, Historia Romana. Other helpful modern discussions of the campaigns are found in Sheppard Sunderland Frere, Britannia (3d ed. 1987); John Peddie, Invasion: The Roman Conquest of Britain (1987); Peter Salway, Roman Britain (1981); Malcolm Todd, Roman Britain (1981); Graham Webster, The Roman Invasion of Britain (1980); H. H. Scullard, Roman Britain: Outpost of The Empire (1978); John Wacher, Roman Britain (1978); and Joan Liversidge, Britain In The Roman Empire (1968). See also John Peddie, Conquest: Roman Invasion of Britain (1997); D.C.A. Shotter, Roman Britain (1998); John Wacher, Roman Britain (1998).

(n2)Footnote 39. David A. Thomas, The Disappearance of Roman Law from Dark Age Britain, 1984 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 563, 566-567.

(n3)Footnote 40. Id. at 579-580.

(n4)Footnote 41. Cornelius Tacitus, The Life of Julius Agricola 21 (Loeb ed. 1963).

(n5)Footnote 42. At the beginning of the occupation, Rome claimed much of the land for the emperor. It is likely that these confiscated lands became part of ihe patrimonium Caesaris, or later of the resprivata. Scholars assume the lands became imperial estates which were either farmed by slave labor or created into tenancies supervised by an imperial procurator. For instance, much of East Anglia was likely confiscated after the Boudican Revolt forming a large imperial estate. See Birley, Anthony Richard. Life in Roman Britain (London: B. T. Batsford, 1964) 79-80; Birley, Anthony. The People of Roman Britain (BT Batsford: London 1979) 137-38; Faulkner, Neil. The Decline and Fall of Roman Britain (Tempus 2001) 56-57.

(n6)Footnote 43. See supra § 2.03(g).

(n7)Footnote 44. One emerging theory is that the Britons may have been moving to some forms of private land ownership even before the Roman conquest: It is more likely that effective private control over land had begun to emerge well before the conquest with the division of land by boundaries and the definition of settlements by ditched enclosures. Villas may not have been possible without the existence of private property, but this probably existed before villas emerged. Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 96-97 (1990).

(n8)Footnote 45. Successive landholding patterns apparently emerged among the ancient British Celts. First, entire clans, typically an extended family including up to four generations, would occupy and claim land. There was no concept of absolute ownership of land, which included concepts of alienation. The ruler of the community would divide all land into usable individual portions as well as sections which provided for the cornmunity-at-large and the disabled and aged. The clan as a whole had an interest in any proceeds of the land. The male members of this "clan" would retain their interest in the land following the death of any of its members. While some data is lacking, it seems that clan-chiefs or tribal leaders did not hold lands on behalf of the clan; the land was "owned" by the entire community. But with the Roman-occupation, Celtic lands began to be characterized as in the tribal chiefs' possession. A system developed which was less akin to free property ownership and more like an aristocracy, tenant-farmer, or servile tenant relationship. The aristocracy covenanted with its tenants; in exchange for protecting their dependants, the lords could expect an ample supply of livestock and produce. See Arnold, Bettina and D. Blair Gibson. Celtic Chiefdom, Celtic State (Cambridge University Press: 1995) 130-133; Audouze, Francoise and Olivier Buchsenschtitz, trans, by Henry Cleere. Towns, Villages, and Countryside of Celtic Europe- from the Beginning of the Second Millennium to the End of the First Century BC (Indiana University Press 1992) 171-175; Ellis, Peter Berresford. Caesar's Invasion of Britain (New York University Press: 1978) 26-27; Green, Miranda J., ed. The Celtic World (Routledge, N.Y.: 1995) 89,169; Hubert, Henri, trans, by M.R. Dobie. Celtes Depuis I'epoque de la Tene et la Civilisation Celtique. (The Greatness and Decline of the Celts) (London: Constable 1987) 211-216; James, Simon. The World of the Celts (Thames & Hudson: London 1993) 70; Powell, T.G.E. The Celts (Thames & Hudson: London 1959) 76; Rankin, H.D. Celts and the Classical World (Areopagitica Press: 1987) 130, 133,170.

(n9)Footnote 46. See Peter Salway, Roman Britain 87 (1981). There is no conclusive evidence that the imposition of lex provinciae on stabilized provinces continued on into imperial times. See also Peter Salway, A History of Roman Britain (1997).

(n10)Footnote 47. The arrangement pertained to the "imperial" provinces under the direct charge of the emperor, but not to the "senatorial" provinces left to the supervision of the Senate.

(n11)Footnote 48. Sheppard Sunderland Frere, Britannia: A History of Roman Britain 184 (3d. ed. 1987).

(n12)Footnote 49. Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae, No. 1011 (Hermann Dessau ed. 1962).

(n13)Footnote 50. Id. No. 1015. Priscus later became a highly respected teacher and head of one of the two principal schools of Roman jurisprudence.

(n14)Footnote 51. Id. No. 1123.

(n15)Footnote 52. Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum, No. 11.383 (Eugen Bormann ed. 1888). Valens was also appointed patron of the province, a post associated with the province council and an honor of high distinction.

(n16)Footnote 53. Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae, No. 1151 (Hermann Dessau ed. 1962). Calpurnianus was briefly in charge of all provincial affairs during one of the governor's absences.

(n17)Footnote 54. 1 R. G. Collingwood & R. P. Wright, The Roman Inscriptions of Britain Items 627, 1337, at 210, 442 (1965).

(n18)Footnote 55. Digesta Iustiniana 49.15.6, translated and reprinted in IX S. Scott, Corpus Juris Civilis The Civil Law (1973).

(n19)Footnote 56. The Theodosian Code 11.7.2 (Clyde Pharr trans. 1952), dated November 20, A.D. 319. See C. E. Stevens, A Possible Conflict of Laws in Roman Britain, 37 J. Roman Stud. 132-134 (1947).

(n20)Footnote 57. See Eric G. Turner, A Roman Writing Tablet from Somerset, 46 J. Roman Stud. 115-118 (1956).

(n21)Footnote 58. Digesta Iustiniana 36.1.48, translated and reprinted in IX Samuel P. Scott, Corpus Juris Civilis The Civil Law (1973).

(n22)Footnote 59. Digesta Iustiniana at 28.3.6.7, 28.6.2.4.

(n23)Footnote 60. Romano-British examples are discussed in Joan Liversidge, Britain in the Roman Empire 304 (1968).

(n24)Footnote 61. Juvenal, Satires 15.111-15.112 (Rolfe Humphries trans. 1958).

(n25)Footnote 62. Cornelius Tacitus, The Life of Julius Agricola 21 (Loeb ed. 1963).

(n26)Footnote 63. IX Dio's Roman History 76.14 (Loeb ed. 1927). Papinian was at the time praetorian prefect, the officer with general jurisdiction over all civil and criminal cases in the empire outside of Rome itself. One rescript (a written statement of the Roman emperor on a question of law) of British origin survives from this time, dated May 5, A.D. 210, and is discussed in Eric Birley, Roman Britain and the Roman Army 52 (1953).

(n27)Footnote 64. Most important historians of English law believe that early Anglo-Saxon legal customs and laws were not affected in any discernible or significant way by contemporary Roman law. See, e.g., John Hamilton Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History 2 (2d Ed. 1979); 2 William Searle Holdsworth, A History of English Law 1214 (4th Ed. 1936); 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I xxxixxxii (2d Ed. 1909); John Selden, Ad Fletam Dissertatio 103105 (David Ogg Trans. 1647 Reprint 1925); William Stubbs, The Constitutional History of England 5864 (2d Ed. 1875); Paul Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor 119120 (3d ed. 1920); William Francis Walsh, A History of Anglo-American Law 12 (2d ed. 1932); Robert Warden Lee, The Interaction of Roman and Anglo-Saxon Law, 61 S. Afr. L.J. 155, 158 (1944); W. Senior, Roman Law in England Before Vacarius, 46 Law Q. Rev. 191, 192 (1930). However, several writers have argued the other point of view, albeit with little evidence or persuasiveness. See, e.g., Fustel De Coulanges, The Origin of Property in Land xxivxxxiii (William James Ashley trans. 2d ed. 1927); John Earle, A Hand-Book to the Land-Charters, and Other Saxonic Documents lixlxii (1888); 1 William Francis Finlason, Reeves History of the English Law xxxciii (1880) (Reeves himself did not accept the continuity theory); John Reeves, History of the English Law 23 (2d ed. 1787); Percy Henry Winfield, The Chief Sources of English Legal History 54-55 (1925) (doubting that Dark Age Britain escaped the influence of Roman law, but admitting that there is no "satisfactory evidence of any very appreciable or lasting transmission."); Edward D. Re, The Roman Contribution to the Common Law, 29 Fordham L. Rev. 447, 455-460 (1961). Re's statements favoring continuity in early Anglo-Saxon times, mostly conclusory or based on incorrectly analyzed sources, were renewed and reiterated in Edward D. Re, The Roman Contribution to the Common Law, 39 Loy. L. Rev. 295 (1993).

(n28)Footnote 65. While there is no dearth of written descriptions of Roman law, writings that organize and summarize the points of Roman law on particular subjects are not so abundant. The discussion in this section is drawn from two sources that are appropriate for the degree of detail provided in this section: Paul Van Warmelo, An Introduction to the Principles of Roman Civil Law 61-120 (1976); and Alan Watson, The Law of the Ancient Romans 49-57 (1970).

(n29)Footnote 66. Such a regional senate traditionally consisted of 100 members, but it cannot be determined how consistently this practice was followed in Britain. Frank Frost Abbott & Allan Chester Johnson, Municipal Administration in the Roman Empire (1926).

(n30)Footnote 67. Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 66 (1990). See also John Wacher, Towns of Roman Britain (1997).

(n31)Footnote 68. Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 92-93, 96-98 (1990).

(n32)Footnote 69. Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 120 (1990) (citing New Approaches to Ancient Fields, in Prehistoric Communities in Northern England 105-118 (Graeme Barker ed. 1981); D. N. Riley, Early Landscape from the Air (1980)).

(n33)Footnote 70. The Burden of Roman Grandeur: Aspects of Public Building in the Cities of Asia and Achaea, in The Roman West in the Third Century 189-198 (Anthony King & Martin Henog eds. 1981).

(n34)Footnote 71. J. T. Smith, Villas as a Key to Social Structure, in Studies in the Romano-British Villa 149, 170 (Malcolm Todd ed. 1978). See also J. T. Smith, Roman Villas: A Study in Social Structure (1997); David Keys, The Independent Archive: Roman "Villas" May Have Been Religious Centres, The Independent, 22 September 1998, p. 7.

(n35)Footnote 72. Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 198-199

(1990); J. T. Smith, Villas as a Key to Social Structure, in Studies in the Romano-British Villa 149, 170 (Malcolm Todd ed. 1978).

(n36)Footnote 73. See, e.g., John Hadman, Aisled Buildings in Roman Britain, in Studies in the Romano-British Villa 187-195 (Malcolm Todd ed. 1978).

(n37)Footnote 74. See, e.g., Richard Hingley, Rural Settlement in Roman Britain 1-12 (1989).

(n38)Footnote 75. Brian K. Roberts, Rural Settlement in Britain 50-51 (1977).

(n39)Footnote 76. G. R. Watson, The Roman Soldier 147-148 (1969).

(n40)Footnote 77. For the view that local Celtic law remained very widespread even after the grant of universal citizenship, see A.L.F. Rivet, Social and Economic Aspects, in The Roman Villa in Britain 173-216 (A.L.F. Rivet ed. 1969).

(n41)Footnote 78. Eric G. Turner, A Writing Tablet from Somerset, 46 J. Roman Stud. 115-118 (1956).

(n42)Footnote 79. Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 203 (1990); see A. H. M. Jones, The Later Roman Empire A.D. 284-602: A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey 769-808 (2d ed. 1973).

(n43)Footnote 80. Theodosian Code 11.7.2 (Clyde. Pharr trans. 1952) dated November 20, A.D. 319.

(n44)Footnote 81. F. Haverfield, The Romanization of Roman Britain 45 (1912).

(n45)Footnote 82. A. H. M. Jones, The Later Roman Empire Ad 284-602: A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey 797 (2d ed. 1973). See also K. R. Dark, External Contacts & The Economy of Late-Roman & Post-Roman Britain (1996).

(n46)Footnote 83. See David A. Thomas, The Disappearance of Roman Law from Dark Age Britain, 1984 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 563, 590-595. See Nicholas Higham, Rome, Britain and the Anglo-Saxons 263 (1992).

(n47)Footnote 84. R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 315-316 (2d ed. 1937). Roman law was remembered "with loathing as an instrument of oppression, a burden and a yoke." Michael E. Jones, The End of Roman Britain 142-143 (1996).

(n48)Footnote 85. R. G. Collingwood & J. N. L. Myres, Roman Britain and the English Settlements 317 (2d ed. 1937).

(n49)Footnote 86. Martin Millett, The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaeological Interpretation 224 (1990). See also Lapidge, The Blackwell Encyclopedia of Anglo-Saxon England (1998).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 2.05

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 2.05 Modern Vestiges of Ancient Landholding Patterns.

Strewn all over England and Wales are ghostly remains of the land's prehistoric and Romano-British past. Ceremonial sites at Stonehenge and Avebury, the West Kennet long barrow, the White Horse at Uffington, the Maiden Castle hillfort, the isolated legionary camps on wild Welsh hilltops, the baths at Bath, the theater at St. Alban's Verulamium, the deserted brick warehouse at Roman Wroxeter, the Saxon Shore forts, the villas at Chichester, Hadrian's Wall, and a thousand other sites, all bespeak centuries and millennia of human habitation. None of it, however, seems to have had much overt impact on the attitudes and lifestyles of today.

As to the land itself, and the numberless anonymous generations who have lifted their livelihood from it, even fewer reminders of the past catch the eye. Perhaps the so-called "Celtic fields" -- actually a field system pre-dating the Celts -- of Smacam Down, Cerne Abbas, and Dorset, will suffice as a reminder. Here one may find the little, rectangular fields formed up like so many ranks and files in a grid, still lined by low earthen borders, linear lumps under modern fields. These ancient field formations remind us that, then as now, land was important enough to be the substance of someone's individual stewardship, and that well-regulated relations among landholders will yield the maximum value from the land.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 2.06

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 2.06 Bibliography.

[Go To Supp]

Books

Abbott, Frank Frost & Allan Chester Johnson. Municipal Administration in the Roman Empire. 1926.

Aedeen, Cremin. The Celts. 1998.

Arnold, Bettina and D. Blair Gibson. Celtic Chiefdom, Celtic State (Cambridge University Press: 1995).

Audouze, Francoise and Olivier Buchsenschiitz, trans, by Henry Cleere. Towns, Villages, and Countryside of Celtic Europe: from the Beginning of the Second Millennium to the End of the First Century BC (Indiana University Press 1992).

Bennett, Julian. Towns in Roman Britain (3d ed. Princes Risborough: Shire 2001).

Bidwell, Paul. English Heritage Book of Roman Forts in Britain. 1997.

Birley, Anthony Richard. Life in Roman Britain (London: B. T. Batsford, 1964).

Birley, Anthony. The People of Roman Britain (BT Batsford: London 1979)

Birley, Eric. Roman Britain and the Roman Army. 1953.

Blair, Peter Hunter. Roman Britain and Early England: 55 B.C. - A.D. 871 (1963).

Blundell, N. Ancient England. 1997.

Bord, Janet & Colin Bord. Prehistoric Britain from the Air. 1997.

Bowen, Collin. "Pattern and Interpretation: A View of the Wessex Landscape from Neolithic to Roman Times," in Recent Work in Rural Archaeology. P. J. Fowler ed. 1975.

Bowen, Susan. "Celtic Fields and Ranch Boundaries in Wessex," in Susan Limbrey & John G. Evans. The Effect of Man on the Landscape: The Lowland Zone. Council for British Archaeology Research Report No. 21. 1978.

Burke, John Frederick. Life in the Villa in Roman Britain (London: Batsford, 1978).

Burnham, Barry C. The "Small Towns" of Roman Britain (London: Batsford 1990).

Bradley, Richard. The Prehistoric Settlement of Britain. 1978.

Bradley, Richard. The Social Foundations of Prehistoric Britain. 1984.

Brown, A.E., ed. Roman Small Towns in Eastern England and Beyond (Oxford, England: Oxbow Books 1995).

Brown, Warren. Unjust Seizure: Conflict, Interest, and Authority in an Early Medieval Society (Cornell University Press 2001).

Buisseret, David. Rural Images: Estate Maps in the Old and New Worlds (University of Chicago Press 1996).

"The Burden of Roman Grandeur: Aspects of Public Building in the Cities of Asia and Achaea," in The Roman West in the Third Century. (Anthony King & Martin Henog eds. 1981).

Caesar, Julius. 12 De Bello Gallico. Moses Hadas trans. 1957.

The Celtic World. Miranda J. Green ed. 1995.

Chadwick, Nora K. The Celts. 1970.

Champion, T.C. Settlement and Society: Aspects of West European Prehistory in the First Millennium B.C. (New York: St. Martin's Press 1985).

Chapman, Malcolm K. The Celts: the Construction of a Myth (New York: St. Martin's Press 1992).

Clark, J.G.D. The Mesolithic Settlement of Northern Europe; a Study of the Food-gathering Peoples of Northern Europe During the Early Post-glacial Period (New York, Greenwood Press 1970)

Cleary, Simon Esmonde. The Ending of Roman Britain (London: Batsford, 1989).

Collingwood, R.G. & J.N.L. Myres. Roman Britain and the English Settlements. 2d ed. 1937.

Collingwood, R. G. & R. P. Wright. The Roman Inscriptions of Britain. 1965

Corpus Inscriptionum Latinarum. Eugene Bormann ed. 1888.

Coulanges, Fustel De. The Origin of Property in Land. William James Ashley trans. 2d ed. 1927.

Cunliffe, Barry W. The Ancient Celts. 1997.

Cunliffe, Barry W. The Celtic World. 1979.

Cunliffe, Barry W. Iron Age Communities in Britain. 1978.

Dark, K. R. External Contacts & the Economy of Late-Roman & Post-Roman Britain. 1996.

Dark, K. R. The Landscape of Roman Britain (Stroud, Gloucestershire: Sutton 1997).

Darvill, Timothy and Julian Thomas, eds.. Neolithic Houses in Northwest Europe and Beyond (Oxford: Oxbow Books 1996).

Darvill, T. C. Prehistoric Britain. 1987.

Davies, R. R. (ed.). Welsh Society and Nationhood: Historical Essays (Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1984).

Davies, Wendy & Paul Fouracre. Property and Power in the Early Middle Ages (Cambridge University Press 1995).

Delaney, Frank. The Celts (Hodder and Stoughton 1986).

Diepeveen-Jansen, Marian, translated by Christine Jefferis. People, Ideas and Goods: New Perspectives on 'Celtic Barbarians' in Western and Central Europe (500-250 BC). (Amsterdam University Press 2001).

Digby, Kenelm Edward. An Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property (Oxford: Clarendon Press 1897).

Digesta Iustiniana. translated and reprinted in IX Samuel P. Scott, Corpus Juris Civilis The Civil Law. 1973.

Dio, Cassius. Historia Romana.

Diodorus Siculus. 5:34.

Dio's Roman History. Loeb ed. 1927.

Duffy, Patrick J., David Edwards, & Elizabeth FitzPatrick, eds. Gaelic Ireland, C.1250-C.1650: Land, Lordship, and Settlement (Four Courts Press for the Group for the Study of Irish Historic Settlement 2001).

Dyer, James. Ancient Britain. 1997.

Earle, John. A Hand-Book to the Land-Charters, and Other Saxonic Documents. 1888.

Ellis, Peter Berresford. Caesar's Invasion of Britain (New York University Press: 1978)

Ellis, Peter Berresford. The Celtic Empire: the First Millennium of Celtic History, c. 1000 BC-51 AD (London: Constable 1990).

Enright, Michael J. Lady with a Mead Cup: Ritual, Prophecy and Lordship in the European Warband from La Tene to the Viking Age (Blackrock, Co. Dublin: Four Courts Press 1996).

Evans, John G. The Environment of Early Man in the British Isles. 1975.

Faulkner, Neil. The Decline and Fall of Roman Britain (Tempus: 2001).

Finlason, 1 William Francis. Reeves History of the English Law. 1880.

Forde-Johnston, James L. Prehistoric Britain and Ireland. 1976.

Frere, Sheppard Sunderland. Britannia: A History of Roman Britain. 3d ed. 1987.

Green, Miranda J., ed. The Celtic World (Routledge, N.Y.: 1995).

Hubert, Henri, trans, by M.R. Dobie. Celtes Depuis I'epoque de la Tene et la Civilisation Celtique. (The Greatness and Decline of the Celts) (London: Constable 1987).

Hadman, John. "Aisled Buildings in Roman Britain" in Studies in the Romano-British Villa. Malcolm Todd ed. 1978.

Haverfield, F. The Romanization of Roman Britain. 1912.

Henig, Martin. The Heirs of King Verica: Culture & Politics in Roman Britain (Charleston, SC: Tempus 2002).

Higham, Nicholas. Roman, Britain and the Anglo-Saxons. 1992.

Hingley, Richard. Rural Settlement in Roman Britain. 1989.

Hogain, Daithi O. Celtic Warriors: The Armies of One of the First Great Peoples in Europe. 1999.

Holdsworth, 2 William Searle. A History of English Law. 4th ed. 1936.

Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae. Hermann Dessau ed. 1962.

Jackson, Kenneth Hurlstone. Language and History in Early Britain. 1953.

James, Simon. The World of the Celts (Thames & Hudson: London 1993)

Johnston, David E. Roman Villas (Aylesbury, Bucks, UK: Shire Publications, 1988).

Jones, A. H. M. The Later Roman Empire A.D. 284-602: A Social, Economic and Administrative Survey. 2d ed. 1973.

Jones, Michael E. The End of Roman Britain. 1996.

Juvenal. Satires. Rolfe Humphries trans. 1958.

Kirby, D.P. The Making of Early England. 1967.

Koch, John T. (ed). Celtic Culture: A Historical Encyclopedia (Santa Barbara, Calif., ABC-CLIO, 2006).

Koch, John T. (ed.). The Celtic Heroic Age: Literary Sources for Ancient Celtic Europe & Early Ireland & Wales (Aberystwyth: Celtic Studies Publications, 2003).

Kushnareva, Karin Khristoforovna, trans. H.N. Michael. The Southern Caucasus in Prehistory: Stages of Cultural and Socioeconomic Development from the Eighth to the Second Millennium B.C. (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Museum, 1997).

Laing, Lloyd & Jennifer Laing. The Origins of Britain. 1980.

Lapidge. The Blackwell Encyclopedia of Anglo-Saxon England. 1998.

Lavin, Patrick & Patrick Lavino. The Celtic World: An Illustrated History 700 B. C. to the Present. 1999.

Litton, Helen. Celts: An Illustrated History. 1997.

Liversidge, Joan. Britain in the Roman Empire. 1968.

Longsworth, I. H. Prehistoric Britain. 1985.

Macaulay, Anne. Megalithic Measures and Rhythms: Sacred Knowledge of the Ancient Britons (2006).

Manley, John. A.D. 43: The Roman Invasion of Britain (Stroud: Tempus 2002).

Mann, J. C. Britain and the Roman Empire (Brookfield, Vt.: Variorum 1996).

Mariboe, Knud. Encyclopedia of the Celts. 1997.

Megaw, J. V. S. & D. A. Simpson. Introduction to British Prehistory. 1979.

Mercer, R. J. Farming Practice in British Prehistory (Edinburgh: University Press 1981).

Mikalachki, Jodi. The Legacy of Boadicea: Gender and Nation in Early Modern England. 1998.

Millett, Martin. The Romanization of Britain: An Essay in Archaelogical Interpretation. 1990.

Mitchell, Donald Grant. English Lands, Letters and Kings (C. Scribner's Sons 1889-97).

Morrison, Alex. Early Man in Britain and Ireland: an Introduction to Palaeolithic and Mesolithic Cultures (London: Croom Helm 1980).

Mountain, Harry. The Celtic Encyclopedia. 1998.

"New Approaches to Ancient Fields," in Prehistoric Communities in Northen England. Graeme Barker ed. 1981.

New Directions in Archaeology: Celtic Chiefdom, Celtic State: The Evolution of Complex Social Systems in Prehistoric Europe. Bettina Arnold & D. Blair Gibson, eds. 1995.

Norton-Taylor, Duncan. The Celts. 1974.)

Noyes, C. Reinold. The Institution of Property: A Study of the Development, Substance and Arrangement of the System of Property in Modern Anglo-American Law (Longmans, Green & Co. 1936).

Palmer, Susann. Mesolithic Cultures of Britain (Poole: Dolphin Press 1977).

Patterson, Nerys Thomas. Cattle-lords and Clansmen: the Social Structure of Early Ireland (University of Notre Dame Press 1994).

Peddie, John. Conquest: Roman Invasion of Britain. 1996.

Peddie, John. Invasion: The Roman Conquest of Britain. 1987.

Perring, Dominic. The Roman House in Britain (New York: Routledge 2002).

Piggott, Stuart. The Neolithic Cultures of the British Isles; a Study of the Stone-using Agricultural Communities of Britain in the Second Millennium B.C. (Cambridge University Press 1954).

Pollock, Frederick and Frederic William Maitland. The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I. 2d ed. 1909.

Potter, T. W. Roman Britain (Berkeley: University of California Press 1993).

Powell, T.G.E. The Celts (Thames & Hudson: London 1959).

Pryor, Francis. Farmers in Prehistoric Britain. 1998.

Rankin, H. D. Celts and the Classical World. 1987.

Reeves, John. History of the English Law. 2d ed. 1787.

Reynolds, Peter G. Ancient Farming. 1987.

Riley, D.N. Early Landscape from the Air. 1980.

Rivet, A.L.F. "Social and Economic Aspects," in The Roman Villa in Britain. A. L. F. Rivet ed. 1969.

Roberts, Brian K. Rural Settlement in Britain. 1977.

Salway, Peter. A History of Roman Britain. 1997.

Salway, Peter. The Oxford Illustrated History of Roman Britain (Oxford University Press 1993).

Salway, Peter, ed. The Roman Era: The British Isles, 55 BC-AD 410 (Oxford University Press 2002).

Salway, Peter. Roman Britain. 1981.

Sawyer, P. H. From Roman Britain to Norman England (London: Methuen, 1978).

Scullard, H.H. Roman Britain: Outpost of the Empire. 1978.

Scrutton, Thomas Edward, Sir. The Influence of the Roman Law on the Law of England (Littleton, Colo.: F.B. Rothman, 1985).

Selden, John. Ad Fletam Dissertatio. David Ogg trans. 1647. Reprint. 1925.

Shotter, D.C.A. Roman Britain. (2nd ed. 2004).

Smith, Christopher. Late Stone Age Hunters of the British Isles (London; New York: Routledge 1992).

Smith, J. T. Roman Villas: A Study in Social Structure. 1997.

Smith, J. T. "Villas as a Key to Social Structure," in Studies in the Romano-British Villa. Malcolm Todd ed. 1978.

Spikins, Penny. Mesolithic Northern England: Environment, Population and Settlement (Oxford: Archaeopress, 1999).

Stead, I. M. The La Tene Cultures of Eastern Yorkshire (York, Yorkshire Philosophical Society, 1965).

Stubbs, William. The Constitutional History of England. 2d ed. 1875.

Sykes, Homer. Celtic Britain. 1998.

Tacitus, Cornelius. The Life of Julius Agricola. Loeb ed. 1963.

The Theodosian Code. Clyde Pharr trans. 1952.

Thomas, Charles. Celtic Britain (Thames and Hudson 1986).

Thomas, Julian. Understanding the Neolithic, revised 2d ed. (New York: Routledge 1999).

Thorpe, I. J. The Origins of Agriculture in Europe (New York: Routlege, 1996).

Todd, Malcolm, ed. Studies in the Romano-British Villa (Humanities Press, 1978), Baker, John Hamilton. An Introduction to English Legal History. 2d ed. 1979.

Todd, Malcolm. Roman Britain. 1981.

Turner, Sam (ed.). Medieval Devon and Cornwall: Shaping an Ancient Countryside (2006).

Uti Possidetis: Is Possession Really Nine-Tenths of the Law? The Acquisition of Territory by the United States: Why, How, and Should We?" 38 McGeorge L. Rev. 513 (2007).

Van Warmelo, Paul. An Introduction to the Principles of Roman Civil Law. 1976.

Vinogradoff, Paul. The Growth of the Manor. 3d ed. 1920.

Vinogradoff, Paul. Roman Law in Medieval Europe. 3d ed. 1929.

Wacher, J. S. A Portrait of Roman Britain (New York: Routledge 2000).

Wacher, John. Roman Britain. 1998.

Wacher, John. Towns of Roman Britain. 1997.

Walsh, William Francis. A History of Anglo-American Law. 2d ed. 1932.

Watson, Alan. The Law of the Ancient Romans. 1970.

Watson, G. R. The Roman Soldier. 1969.

Webster, Graham. The Roman Invasion of Britain. 1980.

Wells, Peter S. Beyond Celts, Germans and Scythians: Archaeology and Identity in Iron Age Europe (London: Duckworth Academic 2001).

Winfield, Percy Henry. The Chief Sources of English Legal History. 1925.

Zvelebil, Marek, ed. Hunters in Transition: Mesolithic Societies of Temperate Eurasia and Their Transition to Farming (New York: Cambridge University Press 1986).

Articles

Bryan, Bradley. "Property as Ontology: On Aboriginal and English Understandings of Ownership," 13 Canadian Journal of Law and Jurisprudence 3 (Jan. 2000).

Donihue, Donald. "Ancient Method of Farming Preserved," Natural History, May 1985, Vol. 94 Issue 5, p.42.

Gierstorfer, Carl. "Saxon Hordes Ousted Celts," 175 New Scientist 20 (Issue 2350) (July 6, 2002).

Green, Shelby D., "Specific Relief for Ancient Deprivations of Property," 36 Akron L. Rev. 245 (2003).

Jett, Allison Carter. "Domestic, Supranational and International Historic Preservation Legislation: Does It Protect Our Cultural Heritage or Restrict Development? Exploring Its Impact on Ancient Roman Monuments," Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. Vol. 31 (Spring 2003) 649.

Kakan, Amir Aaron, "Evolution of American Law, From Its Roman Origin to the Present, 48 Orange County Law 31 (February 2006).

Keys, David. "The Independent Archive: Roman 'Villas' May Have Been Religious Centres." The Independent, 22 September, 1998. p. 7.

Lee, Robert Warden. "The Interaction of Roman and Anglo-Saxon Law." S. Afr. L.J. Vol. 61 (1944) 155.

Lindgren, James, Lurent Mayali and Geoffrey P. Miller, "Why Ancient Law?" 70 Chicago-Kent L. Rev. 1465 (1995).

Pacia, Richard A. and Raymond A. Pacia. "Roman Contributions to American Civil Jurisprudence," R.I. B.J. Vol. 49 (May 2001) 49.

Re, Edward D. "The Roman Contribution to the Common Law." Loy. L. Rev. Vol. 39 (1993) 295.

Re, Edward D. "The Roman Contribution to the Common Law." Fordham L. Rev. Vol. 29 (1961) 447.

Senior, W. "Roman Law in England Before Vacarius." Law Q. Rev. Vol. 46 (1930) 191.

Stevens, C. E. "A Possible Conflict of Laws in Roman Britain." J. Roman Stud. Vol 37 (1947) 132.

Thomas, David A. "Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History." Part I: "The Shared History," 34 Real Property, Probate and Trust Journal 143 (Spring 1999); Part II: "How Anglo-American Land Law Diverged after American Colonization and Independence," 34 Real Property, Probate and Trust Journal 295 (Summer 1999); Part III, British and American Real Property Law and Practice--A Contemporary Comparison," 34 Real Property, Probate and Trust Journal 443 (Fall 1999).

Thomas, David A. "The Disappearance of Roman Law from Dark Age Britain." BYU L. Rev. Vol. 1984 (1984) 563.

Thomas, David A. "Is the Right to Property a Fundamental or an Economic Right?" SMOO6 ALI-ABA 33, American Law Institute-American Bar Association Continuing Legal Education January 4-6, 2007, Eminent Domain and Land Valuation Litigation.

Thomas, David A. "Why the Public Plundering of Private Property Rights is Still a Very Bad Idea," 41 Real Property, Probate and Trust Journal 25 (Spring, 2006).

Turner, Eric G. "A Roman Writing Tablet from Somerset." J. Roman Stud. Vol. 46 (1956) 115.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Supp. To CHAPTER 2 LANDHOLDING IN ANCIENT BRITAIN

1-2 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Supp. to § 2.06

Supp. to § 2.06 Bibliography

[Go To Main]

Articles

add:

Byrnes, William H. "Ancient Roman Munificence: The Development of the Practice and Law of Charity," 57 Rutgers L. Rev. 1043 (Spring 2005).

Kroger, John. R. "The Philosophical Foundations of Roman Law: Aristotle, the Stoics, and Roman Theories of Natural Law," 2004 Wis. L. Rev. 905.

Straumann, Benjamin. "Is Modern Liberty Ancient? Roman Remedies and Natural Rights in Hugo Grotius's Early Works on Natural Law," 27 Law & Hist. Rev. 55 (Spring, 2009).

LexisNexis®

28 of 199 DOCUMENTS

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions 3.syn

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.syn Synopsis to Chapter 3: PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

§ 3.01 Introduction.

§ 3.02 Origins of the Anglo-Saxons.

§ 3.02(a) The Traditional Origins Reported by Bede.

§ 3.02(b) Ancient Literary References to the Anglo-Saxon Tribes.

§ 3.03 Germanic Legal Customs Relating to Property.

§ 3.03(a) Observations by Ancient Writers.

§ 3.03(b) Germanic Property Rights in the "Barbarian Laws."

§ 3.04 Anglo-Saxon Landholding Practices Arising from the Invasion and Settlement of Britain.

§ 3.04(a) How the Anglo-Saxons Organized for and Conducted the Invasion and Settlement of Britain.

§ 3.04(a)(1) The Earliest Stages of the Anglo-Saxon Conquest.

§ 3.04(a)(1)(i) Kent.

§ 3.04(a)(1)(ii) Essex, Middlesex, and Surrey.

§ 3.04(a)(1)(iii) Sussex.

§ 3.04(a)(1)(iv) Wessex.

§ 3.04(a)(1)(v) East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria.

§ 3.04(a)(2) The Second Phase of the Anglo-Saxon Conquest.

§ 3.04(a)(2)(i) Wessex.

§ 3.04(a)(2)(ii) Northumbria.

§ 3.04(a)(2)(iii) Mercia.

§ 3.04(a)(2)(iv) The Heptarchy.

§ 3.04(b) Reorganization of Tribal Structure for Invasion and Conquest.

§ 3.04(b)(1) Pre-Invasion Social Structure.

§ 3.04(b)(2) Formation of New War Bands for Invasion and Settlement.

§ 3.04(c) Development of Early Anglo-Saxon Landholding Practices After Invasion and Settlement.

§ 3.04(c)(1) Romano-British Influence on Early Anglo-Saxon Landholding Practices.

§ 3.04(c)(2) Absence of Stratification in Early Anglo-Saxon Landholding Rights.

§ 3.04(c)(3) Possible Transfer of Contemporary Continental Landholding Practices.

§ 3.04(c)(4) Property Rights Probably Recognized in Early Anglo-Saxon Times.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(i) Absence of Direct Evidence.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(ii) Communal Holdings Apportioned by Lot.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(iii) Holdings for Life Tenure Only.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(iv) Land for Services or Payments.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(v) The Beginning of Stratification in Property Rights.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(vi) Summary of Early Anglo-Saxon Property Rights.

§ 3.05 Development of Anglo-Saxon Laws and Customs Relating to Property after ca. A.D. 600.

§ 3.05(a) The "Dooms" of Kings Who Ruled Over Individual Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms.

§ 3.05(a)(1) Kent.

§ 3.05(a)(2) Wessex.

§ 3.05(b) How Consolidation of Anglo-Saxon Monarchical Power Affected Property Rights.

§ 3.05(c) "Dooms" Issued by Kings of England.

§ 3.05(c)(1) Dooms of Alfred the Great.

§ 3.05(c)(2) Dooms of Other English Kings.

§ 3.05(d) Customary Law Generally.

§ 3.05(e) Customary Law Regarding Real Property.

§ 3.05(e)(1) Bookland.

§ 3.05(e)(2) Folkland.

§ 3.05(e)(3) Laenland.

§ 3.05(f) Rights of Women Under Anglo-Saxon Property Law.

§ 3.06 Impact of the Viking Invasions on Property Rights in Anglo-Saxon England.

§ 3.07 Bibliography.

Professor David A. Thomas
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 3.01

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.01 Introduction.

When William the Conqueror felt secure in his sovereignty over Anglo-Saxon England, he issued a decree assuring the English people that their English property rights remained essentially intact. "This also I command and will, that all shall have and hold the law of King Edward in respect of their lands and all their possessions, with the addition of those decrees I have ordained for the welfare of the English people." n1

During the subsequent reigns of Norman and Angevin monarchs, many profound changes in the property law of England took place, but it was all on a foundation of the property rights developed during the period of Anglo-Saxon hegemony in England from the 5th to the 11th centuries A.D. It is therefore instructive to consider how Anglo-Saxon property law developed and what factors in society influenced the emphasis of certain rights over others. To some extent these priorities remain imbedded in the Anglo-American common law of property.

One function of this chapter is to trace, as fully as possible, the transformation of Anglo-Saxon property rights from the purely Germanic legal customs of the invasion period to the rather complex arrangements that formed the foundation of the common law of property. To this end, the chapter describes the available information about the continental origins and legal customs of the Anglo-Saxons, the changes in their social organization that occurred following their invasion and settlement of large parts of Britain, the rise of law and legal institutions during six centuries of Anglo-Saxon dominance, the impact of Viking invasions and settlement, and the emergence of early forms of feudalism in late Anglo-Saxon times.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. "The Laws of William the Conqueror," in 2 English Historical Documents 399-400 (David C. Douglas ed. 1953). The King Edward referred to was the so-called "Confessor," acknowledged by William as the last legitimate Anglo-Saxon king of England.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 3.02

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.02 Origins of the Anglo-Saxons.

§ 3.02(a) The Traditional Origins Reported by Bede.

Much uncertainty still prevails about the identities and origins of the earliest peoples to inhabit the areas of modern Denmark and north Germany that were the homelands of Britain's 5th century invaders. n2 It is generally believed that Germanic peoples moved southward from Scandinavia into central Europe and in time displaced Celtic tribes that had previously moved into what is now middle and western Germany. By the time the various Germanic peoples had largely subdued or displaced the continental Celts in the 3rd century, B.C., they were arranged in three main tribal groups: (1) the northern tribes eventually became the Norse, Danes and Swedes; (2) the eastern tribes occupied lands between the Oder and Vistula rivers and would become known as Goths, Vandals, Burgundians and Lombards; and (3) the western tribes were found in areas now known as the Jutland peninsula, Schleswig-Holstein, north central Germany and the Rhine valley. The Germanic invaders of Britain would have been members of the western group of tribes.

Some of the western tribes came into armed conflict with Roman forces working their way along the Rhine in the late 2nd century B.C., and Roman influence along the left, or west, bank of the Rhine became pronounced after the pacification of Gaul about 51 B.C. Nevertheless, many of the western tribes had little or no contact with the Romans throughout the period of Roman hegemony. The tribes that invaded Britain are among those tribes that seem to have accepted no Roman influence into their way of life.

The traditional identification of Britain's invaders as Angles, Saxons and Jutes rests mostly on the writings of Bede in the early 8th century A.D. n3 Cloistered in a north English monastery, and dependent on visiting wayfarers for much information about ancient and distant occurrences, Bede's account still reflects the beliefs that prevailed at his time. He reported that the Anglo-Saxons actually consisted of three principal tribes, the Jutes from the Jutland n4 peninsula (modern Denmark and north Germany), the Angles from modern Schleswig-Holstein north of Hamburg, Germany, and the Saxons from the area south of the Angles. More modern archaeological research injected doubt into this account, because substantial evidence of other Germanic tribes was found in British sites of the invasion era, notably of the Frisians and Franks, and the Jutes remained a mysterious people, not subject to positive identification either in England or on the continent.

Currently, Bede's description has regained credibility, although the distinctions between the invading tribes are considered more blurred:

> The most plausible current reconciliation of all the evidence suggests that: (1) the Jutes, though obscure, were a distinct tribe inhabiting part of the Jutland peninsula; (2) by the fifth century A.D. the populous and mobile north German tribes may have undergone considerable intermixing, so that artifacts of other tribes, such as Frisians and Franks, would be among those of the Anglo-Saxons; (3) Angles, Saxons, and Jutes embarking for Britain would have moved down the Frisian coastline, perhaps with lengthy periods of settlement among both the Frisians and Franks, and would have brought with them objects that archaeologists would later identify as Frisian and Frankish; (4) in any event, some Frisians and Franks probably settled in Britain along with the other tribes. n5

Probably the most telling evidence in support of this traditional thesis is the strong stylistic correlations between artifacts, such as brooches and pottery, found in the invaders' continental homelands and first areas of settlement. n6

§ 3.02(b) Ancient Literary References to the Anglo-Saxon Tribes.

The first ancient writer to mention the Germanic tribes was Pytheas of Massilia (or Marseilles), who visited Britain and the coast of the North Sea in the 3rd or 4th century B.C. n7 During the Gallic wars in the 1st century B.C., Julius Caesar had contact with the Germans and provided some written description. n8 Written in the 2nd century A.D., Claudius Ptolemy's Geography mentions Angles and Frisians briefly, and provides some description of the Saxons. n9 Procopius, a Byzantine historian writing in the 6th century, also briefly refers to the Frisians. n10 The fullest account of Germanic culture as it existed in the 1st century A.D., is found in the writings of Cornelius Tacitus. n11

Tacitus mentions only one of the invading peoples, the Angles, which he describes as one of seven small tribes who worshipped the goddess Nertha at an island sanctuary near their North Sea or Baltic Sea coastline. n12 Probably this obscure tribe is therefore included in the general descriptions of Germanic customs and culture given by Tacitus. Because Tacitus was writing nearly four centuries before the invasions of Britain took place, it is possible that such a small tribe could have become more prominent and powerful in the ensuing centuries.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 2. For a summary of the various theories, see David A. Thomas, "Anglo-Saxon Antecedents of the Common Law," 1985 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 453, 455-456.

(n2)Footnote 3. Bede, Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum i.15.

(n3)Footnote 4. Some scholars maintain that the names for the tribe of Jutes and for the Jutland peninsula are of different origin. D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 25-27 (1973).

(n4)Footnote 5. David A. Thomas, Anglo-Saxon Antecedents of the Common Law, 1985 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 453, 457. See James Campbell, "The Lost Centuries: 400-600," in The Anglo-Saxons 30-31 (James Campbell ed., 1982); D. P. Kirby, The Making of Early England 27-28 (1967); F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 5-8, 56 (1943). The most recent authoritative statement of the modern accuracy and equivalencies of Bede's descriptions of Anglo-Saxon continental origins is by J. N. L. Myres:

> [Bede] goes on to locate the continental Saxons in the lands known in his day as those still inhabited by the Old Saxons, the Angles in a region known to him as Angulus which had been left empty by their migration, and the Jutes in a less well defined area situated somewhere beyond the Angles ...
>
> In deriving the Saxons from the districts occupied in his time by the Old Saxons, Bede is certainly pointing to the coastlands between the Elbe and the Weser valleys ... By Angulus, the region that lay > between the Saxons and the Jutes, Bede certainly meant Schleswig, where the name is still found on modern maps as the district of Angeln. There has been much difference of opinion over the location of Bede's Jutes. But if, as he implies, they lay somewhere beyond the Angles, he must have thought of them either to the north of Schleswig, in Jutland, or to the east in modern Holstein, where again there is a suggestive district name, Eutin, which may indicate the home of some part of the tribe at one time. J. N. L. Myres, The English Settlements 46-47 (1986).

See also N.J. Higham, An English Empire: Bede and the Early Anglo-Saxon Kings (1995).

(n5)Footnote 6. J. N. L. Myres, The English Settlements 56-73 (1986). See also C.J. Arnold, An Archaeology of the Early Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms 190-191 (new ed. 1997) (concurring with the notion of ethnic blurring after arrival in England, but showing how some distinction may be made among ethnic groups by clothing styles as evidenced by burial sites).

(n6)Footnote 7. Pytheas was a navigator and also the author of a geography treatise, which is now lost. He is believed to have flourished sometime before 285 B.C. References to his work appear in the writings of the Greek geographer and traveler Strabo, who wrote during the last half of the first century B.C. See 8 The Geography of Strabo 453 (Loeb ed. 1939) (H. Jones trans.) (translator's description); 1 id. at 1.4.2-.3, 2.4.1-.2, 2.5.8 (Loeb ed. 1939); 2 id. at 4.2.1, 4.5.4 (Loeb ed. 1949).

(n7)Footnote 8. Julius Caesar, De Bello Gallico 4.1-.3; 6.21-.24 (M. Hadas trans. 1957).

(n8)Footnote 9. Claudius Ptolemy, Geography II.xi.7.

(n9)Footnote 10. Procopius, The Gothic War 4.20.7.

(n10)Footnote 11. Cornelius Tacitus, The Agricola and Germany of Tacitus (A. Church & W. Brodribb trans. 1885).

(n11)Footnote 12. Id. ch. 40.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 3.03

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.03 Germanic Legal Customs Relating to Property.

§ 3.03(a) Observations by Ancient Writers.

The only written descriptions of Germanic social and legal customs from ancient times are from Julius Caesar in the 1st century B.C., Tacitus in the 1st century A.D., and from some collections of Germanic laws dating from about five centuries or more later. The half millennium in between is truly the dark age of Germanic law.

In connection with his military campaigns in western Europe during the middle of the 1st century B.C., Julius Caesar recorded a few observations about the Germanic tribes he encountered, including comments on their customs regarding property. The Germanic people appeared to rely mostly on flocks and herds as their form of wealth. They held their flocks and herds privately, while their land was held in communal ownership. Differences in wealth between individual German families were not large, and growth in such differences was inhibited by the practice of annually reallocating parcels of land to different kindreds or clan. n13

By the time Tacitus wrote in the late 1st century A.D., some changes in Germanic land customs had occurred, or else the particular tribes he described followed different customs. n14 He thus commented on landholding:

> Land proportioned to the number of inhabitants is occupied by the whole community in turn, and afterwards divided among them according to rank. A wide expanse of plains makes the partition easy. They till fresh fields every year, and they have still more land than enough; with the richness and extent of their soil, they do not laboriously exert themselves in planting orchards, inclosing meadows, and watering gardens. n15

According to Tacitus, therefore, the amounts and locations of land distributions were influenced by social standing, and were made to individual persons rather than to kindred groups. Wealth disparities thus widened as certain persons were able to accumulate wealth faster. It has been hypothesized that this change occurred after the Germanic tribes had been exposed to Roman goods and the Roman monetary system, which stimulated their desire for private property; the land allocation system was then modified to favor private holdings and production. n16 Tacitus also noted an abundance of arable land, an observation at odds with modern theories that Germanic migrations were prompted, at least in part, by population pressures.

Within this regime of land regulation, it does not appear that any system of estates in land was recognized.

Succession to ownership of personal property was also the subject of Germanic legal custom, according to Tacitus:

> [E]very man's own children are his heirs and successors, and there are no wills. Should there be no issue, the next in succession to the property are his brothers and his uncles on either side. The more relatives he has, the more numerous his connections, the more honoured is his old age; nor are there any advantages in childlessness. n17

The Germanic social characteristics mentioned by Tacitus are relevant in a general way to the eventual recognition of private property rights and may be summarized as follows:

a) tribal organization based on kinship relationships;

b) governance by both kings (or perhaps chieftains) and councils; chiefs elected by councils and responsible for administering law in the settlements;

c) blood feuds and composition by payments of fines;

d) requirements that fines or penalties be paid to the king as well as to the victim's family;

e) heavy powers of family regulation held by the husband;

f) laws or legal customs governing succession in ownership of personal property; and

g) regulated land holding, although probably no system of estates in land.

§ 3.03(b) Germanic Property Rights in the "Barbarian Laws."

Aside from the observations recorded by ancient observers of Germanic peoples, the only other literary evidence on how Germanic peoples perceived property rights is in the so-called "Barbarian Laws."

As the Roman Empire disintegrated and surrendered its western provinces to Germanic invaders, an official collection of imperial statutes gathered under Theodosius II, the Theodosian Code, was issued by consent of the emperor Valentinian III in A.D. 438. This code seems to have influenced various continental Germanic rulers who issued their own law codes in the decades that followed. These collections of laws exhibit varying degrees of influence from Roman and Christian sources, and some were intended to apply different legal rules to Germanic and Roman people living in the same area. Collectively these codes are known as the laws of the barbarians, or Leges Barbarorum. The earliest of these laws, which are contemporary with the Anglo-Saxon invasions and settlement of Britain, include law codes from several large Germanic tribes, including the Visigoths, Franks, Burgundians, Bavarians, Lombards, and the continental Angles and Saxons of the later Carolingian age.

The Visigothic laws, and more particularly the Code of Euric, are believed to have directly or indirectly influenced most Germanic law codes thereafter. The Code of Euric, from ca. A.D. 476, shows some Roman influence. The Lex Romana Visigothorum was promulgated by the Visigothic King Alaric II in A.D. 506, to govern Romans living in Visigothic territories. This collection is also known as the Breviarium Alaricianum (Breviary of Alaric). The Leges Visigothorum is a collection of laws that had been issued by Euric's successors, applying to both Gothic and Hispano-Roman subjects. The collection was promulgated in A.D. 654, and replaced the Lex Romana Visigothorum.

Euric's code seems to have been the immediate source for the early codes of both the Salian Franks n18 and the Burgundians, n19 and the Bavarian n20 and Lombard n21 codes also show Visigothic influence. Another early Frankish code, the Lex Ribuaria, n22 was based on the Salian Code, and it in turn influenced the codes of the continental Angles and Saxons of the Carolingian age.

Thus the best known of these early Germanic codes -- indeed the oldest Germanic code that is completely preserved -- is the code of the Salian Franks, or the Lex Salica. As a Germanic code that was in its origins contemporary with the Anglo-Saxon invasions, and one that is fairly free of Roman influence, it might be expected to reveal some information about Germanic customs relating to property rights.

In fact, the Lex Salica and other early Germanic codes do not fulfill this expectation. Consisting of both individual "statutes" and precedential judicial sentences (Weisthuemer), these codes do not refer to most customs of daily living, such as occupancy of land, personal property, commercial dealings, inheritance, family relationships, and class privileges. Instead, the Lex Salica has been accurately described as "primarily a penal law ... concerned with the redress of crimes (murder, theft, mutilation, exploitation of women) by monetary means." n23 The only references to land law in the Lex Salica are provisions requiring money payment for damage to agricultural fields, n24 blocking the way of another, n25 and improper fencing and enclosing. n26 From such provisions one may infer that real property was important and some individual possessory rights were recognized and protected, but any further enlightenment is not available in the documentary sources relating to the Anglo-Saxons or other contemporary Germanic tribes.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 13. Julius Caesar, De Bello Gallico 6.22 (M. Hadas trans. 1957).

(n2)Footnote 14. Tacitus is the single best source of information on ancient Germanic social and legal customs, but some consider his credibility compromised by his manifest anti-Roman and pro-German moralizing. Also, it is unlikely that he ever directly observed a Germanic people in their native habitat. See Cornelius Tacitus, De Origine et Situ Germanorum xix (J. Anderson ed. 1938) (editor's introduction).

(n3)Footnote 15. Cornelius Tacitus, The Agricola and Germany of Tacitus ch. 26 (Alfred J. Church & William J. Brodribb trans. 1885).

(n4)Footnote 16. E. A. Thompson, The Early Germans 7 (1965).

(n5)Footnote 17. Cornelius Tacitus, The Agricola and Germany of Tacitus ch. 20 (Alfred J. Church & William J. Brodribb trans. 1885).

(n6)Footnote 18. The code of the Salian Franks, or Lex Salica, is attributed to Clovis, A.D. 481-511.

(n7)Footnote 19. The Burgundian code was compiled between A.D. 483 and A.D. 532. The Lex Romana Burgundionum was issued ca. A.D. 500, for application to Roman citizens living in the Burgundian kingdom.

(n8)Footnote 20. The Lex Baiuvariorum is dated from about A.D. 744-748.

(n9)Footnote 21. The Leges Langobardorum were promulgated between A.D. 643 and 755.

(n10)Footnote 22. The Lex Ribuaria is believed to have been promulgated after A.D. 596, for the Ribuarian or western Franks.

(n11)Footnote 23. Laws of the Alamans and Bavarians 19 (Theodore John Rivers trans. 1977).

(n12)Footnote 24. Lex Salica tit. 9.

(n13)Footnote 25. Id. tit. 31.

(n14)Footnote 26. Id. tit. 34.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 3.04

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.04 Anglo-Saxon Landholding Practices Arising from the Invasion and Settlement of Britain.

Even if it were possible to identify the landholding practices current among the Angles, Saxons, Jutes, Frisians and Franks who invaded Britain in the 5th century A.D., perhaps that would not provide much insight into the landholding practices that emerged from the period of invasion and settlement. Some evidence suggests that the circumstances of invasion and settlement may have been so unprecedented and unique as to upset the traditional Germanic loyalties and relationships prevailing up to that time. This evidence, however, is so tenuous that any statements about property practices of the early Anglo-Saxon settlers must remain highly speculative and hypothetical. However, if that evidence is used to construct even a general outline of invasion and early settlement history, it is possible to raise plausible theories about how property practices changed as Britain became Angle-land, or England.

§ 3.04(a) How the Anglo-Saxons Organized for and Conducted the Invasion and Settlement of Britain.

Archaeological evidence suggests that not later than the 3rd century A.D., Saxons began a general southwestward movement, replacing or subduing the Chauci and crowding the Frisians along the North Sea coastline between the Elbe and Rhine estuaries. This unstable situation may have "stimulated the more adventurous elements in all these peoples to seek fame and fortune through plunder, piracy, and even perhaps through settlement overseas." n27

In response, Roman imperial authority established a series of major naval stations on both sides of the English Channel, the bases on Britain's eastern and southern coasts being known as the forts of the "Saxon Shore." n28 One commander of the British naval force, a German from the Rhine estuary known as Carausius, himself resorted to piracy late in the 3rd century, and established a short-lived government of his own. In A.D. 367, Britain nearly fell to a combined assault of Picts, Scots, and Saxons.

As Roman authority in Britain weakened, attacks of varied intensity continued to issue from the north and west by Picts and Scots, and from the east and south by seaborne Germanic pirates, usually referred to as Saxons. In response, British leaders apparently hired Germanic mercenaries, and abundant archaeological evidence reveals that numerous Saxon settlements arose in southern and eastern Britain, often in areas near the Saxon shore forts. A plausible but unverifiable version of events during the mid-5th century A.D., depicts discontented mercenaries turning on their British masters, and then shifting from rebellion to conquest. The cross-channel raiders, meanwhile, turned to invasion and settlement.

In the first stage of the Anglo-Saxon conquest, from roughly A.D. 450 to 500, the British resisted the invaders but steadily lost ground near the east coast river estuaries, where no natural obstacles impeded the barbarian thrusts. By A.D. 500, the Anglo-Saxons occupied most of the coastal areas of southeast and eastern England and far inland up some rivers, territory that encompassed, in more modern geographical designations, Kent, Sussex, southern Hampshire, Essex, East Anglia, Lindsey, the East Riding of Yorkshire, and thence to the Cambridgeshire fens. n29

If one were to accept as generally accurate the accounts of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, which for this period relies only on very old traditions, and were to make allowance for much approximation in the dates, the sequence of invasion may be sketched in outline form.

§ 3.04(a)(1) The Earliest Stages of the Anglo-Saxon Conquest. n30

§ 3.04(a)(1)(i) Kent.

It appears that Kent n31 was the first to come under Germanic domination, under the leadership of an early mercenary settler and warrior named Hengest. Hengest fought the Britons in A.D. 455 and again with his son Aesc (or Oisc) in A.D. 457, after which the British fled Kent and retreated to London. Following battles in A.D. 465 and 473, Aesc became king in A.D. 488 and ruled Kent until A.D. 512. n32

§ 3.04(a)(1)(ii) Essex, Middlesex, and Surrey.

The early history of Essex (territory of the East Saxons) is locked in obscurity. The scant archaeological evidence reveals that Germanic settlement dates from early times, but no East Saxon king became important outside of Essex. Sometimes included in Essex were London and a separate area called Middlesex (territory of the Middle Saxons), although Middlesex, if not a separate kingdom, was probably autonomous for some time after the conquest. As an organized people, neither the folk of Middlesex nor of nearby Surrey (the "southern district") have an independent history. n33

§ 3.04(a)(1)(iii) Sussex.

Conquest of Sussex (the area of the South Saxons) began by seaborne invasion, rather than by rebellion of settled mercenaries. In A.D. 477, Aelle and his sons Cymen, Wlencing, and Cissa landed with three ships at a site identified as near Selsey Bill and drove the Britons into the Sussex Weald (an extensive forested tract). Aelle fought further battles in A.D. 485 and 491 and in the later conflict he and Cissa led forces that massacred all Britons gathered in the old Roman fort near Pevensey. n34 Aelle was identified by Bede as the first of the Anglo-Saxon bretwaldas, king not only of the south Saxons but of all people south of the River Humber. n35

§ 3.04(a)(1)(iv) Wessex.

The area known as Wessex (land of the West Saxons) was invaded about A.D. 494 by Cerdic and his grandson Cynric with five ships. They apparently completed the conquest in six years. n36

Some portion of the conquered territory may have been left under the rule of Stuf and Wihtgar, possible Jutish relatives of Cerdic, while Cerdic himself ruled a West Saxon kingdom located immediately south and west of the middle Thames. Cerdic came to be regarded as the founder of the West Saxon dynasty which eventually would rule all of England. n37

§ 3.04(a)(1)(v) East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria.

In East Anglia (territory of the East Angles), fifth century Germanic settlements were located along the waterways and often close to Roman sites, suggesting peaceful immigration prior to the Saxon revolt. No kingdom arose in this area until well into the 6th century A.D., when a new wave of invaders struck, possibly from the northern Jutland peninsula or Danish islands.

Evidence shows that the kingdom of Mercia (the land of the marches or border areas) arose during the same time, as people from East Anglia advanced inland. The southern part of Northumbria (the land north of the River Humber), known as the kingdom of Deira, was settled in the 5th century A.D., probably by pre-revolt mercenaries, but Aelle, the earliest known king, has only been dated to about A.D. 558. North Northumbria, eventually the kingdom of Bernicia, was invaded by Ida about the same time as Aelle ruled Deira. n38

§ 3.04(a)(2) The Second Phase of the Anglo-Saxon Conquest.

§ 3.04(a)(2)(i) Wessex.

In a series of battles fought, according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, in A.D. 552, 568, 571, 577, and 586, the Wiltshire Saxons and the Thames Valley Saxons united into the historic kingdom of Wessex. n39 Through the end of the 8th century A.D., further expansion was sporadic, and British resistance at times very effective. Complete dominance was not established until the Britons of Cornwall were defeated by Egbert in A.D. 838. n40

§ 3.04(a)(2)(ii) Northumbria.

In Northumbria, the separate kingdoms of Deira and Bernicia made painfully slow progress against powerful British rulers. The Germanic kingdoms were ultimately united under the Bernician King Aethelfrith about A.D. 593. n41 Despite subsequent dynastic struggles, the unified kingdom made major territorial gains through the seventh century A.D. Then, as the kingdom met stiffer resistance from both the Picts and the neighboring Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, its territory stabilized during the middle of the 8th century A.D. n42

§ 3.04(a)(2)(iii) Mercia.

The kingdom of Mercia originated in the thickly settled midland shires, with the Trent valley settlers overcoming other Germanic pioneers. This kingdom absorbed the lands known as Middle Anglia and the small kingdom of the Hwicce, and appeared in the middle of the 7th century as a powerful force among the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms. n43

§ 3.04(a)(2)(iv) The Heptarchy.

The kingdoms of East Anglia, Essex, Kent, and Sussex were not able to extend their territories during this second phase of hostilities, because of the activities of the more powerful neighboring kingdoms, but they did consolidate their conquests. n44 All seven of the kingdoms discussed in this section have been artificially grouped together by some historians and called the Heptarchy. n45 The kingdoms of the Heptarchy never acted in concert, but were dominated in turn by Northumbria, Mercia, and Wessex. The process of absorption and amalgamation which produced these seven kingdoms continued throughout the period of the Heptarchy, and was halted only by the Viking invasions of the 9th century:

> Kent after Aethelberht [died in A.D. 616], East Anglia after Raedwald [died between A.D. 616 and 627], and Essex and Sussex from an even earlier date, were never comparable in strength with the larger and later kingdoms created by the second phase of the conquest. Even before 600 the territory of the Middle Saxons had been taken over by the East Saxons, whose kings were themselves by then clients of the kings of Kent and later of the kings of the East Angles and of the West Saxons. From the middle of the seventh century Essex was little more than a dependency of Mercia and when, a century later, Aethelbald incorporated London and Middlesex into Mercia nothing politically significant was left ... The expansion of the Mercian kingdom resulted in the subordination of the kingdoms of the Hwicce ...

> and the Magonsaetan ... and of the Middle Angles in the east. The South Saxons, threatened by Wessex, sought to secure their independence by alliance with the rulers of Mercia; ... but the Mercian supremacy ultimately resulted in the relegation of the South Saxon kings first to the status of sub-kings, then of ealdormen of the Mercian kingdom; they never recovered their independence and in the ninth century Sussex was incorporated into Wessex ... In the [eighth] century Kent was subjected to Mercia and ultimately accepted the lordship of the kings of Wessex as the only alternative. n46

§ 3.04(b) Reorganization of Tribal Structure for Invasion and Conquest.

§ 3.04(b)(1) Pre-Invasion Social Structure.

In this period of the 5th and 6th centuries A.D., an era of almost universal illiteracy among the Anglo-Saxons, it is impossible to know precise details about their social organization in their continental homelands, or how they reorganized for invasion. However, it is reasonable to assume that the pre-invasion Germanic tribes and sub-tribal groups were divided essentially along kinship lines and that the warrior class placed greatest value on subordination and loyalty to the leader and on valor in battle. If land arrangements were still being conducted in the 5th century as Tacitus had described them in the 1st century A.D., then to be the leader of such a kinship group was also a sure means to material wealth. According to Tacitus, land was divided among the Germanic inhabitants according to rank.

§ 3.04(b)(2) Formation of New War Bands for Invasion and Settlement.

If, as evidence suggests, land occupied by continental Germanic tribes was becoming crowded under pressures of growing population and approaching invaders from the east, changes in social organization were inevitable. The opportunity presented by the vulnerability of Britain to seaborne raids, which was surely communicated back across the channel to the crowds on the Frisian shores, was for new leaders to rise up, forsaking old loyalties and forging new ones. Ambition and adventurism undoubtedly played their parts as both established and emerging leaders formed war bands and struck out in their boats:

> Any ambitious German chieftain inured to fighting and marked out for leadership by the prestige of noble birth had only to enlist a few hundred warriors, attracted by the hope of booty or conquest, and stake everything on the chance of carving out a kingdom for himself ...
>
> The land, the subject of the great struggle between Celt and Saxon, offered opportunities in plenty for newcomers either to take over such British estates as were still in working order or to tackle the vast areas not yet exploited. n47

War bands would have been recruited not only for the seaborne invasions, but for new conquests by those invaders already settled. Even the earliest Germanic settlers, the mercenaries hired to protect the Romano-British centers, were possibly outcasts and fugitives, eligible and willing to form new bands and loyalties:

> Hengist, the traditional founder of the Kentish royal family ... is portrayed as a man of noble stock from among the Jutish neighbors of the continental Angles who was in exile in Frisia, where he had taken part in activities which apparently breached the heroic code of conduct of the time and made his return home impossible or at least unwise.
>
> ...There may well have been many foot-loose chieftains from Jutland or southern Scandinavia like Hengist, or indeed like Beowulf later on. Such men could find plenty of good or bad reasons for leading a mixed band of followers in search of fame or fortune overseas in the fifth century. n48

The warbands, if successful, would have formed new settlements or taken over old ones. At first, perhaps unrelated by blood to comrades and enjoying the fruits of conquest, each surviving and successful warrior would have assumed a measure of independence as he turned from fighting to farming. Only later, as family relationships re-emerged and local political authority developed, would stratification of land rights have become pronounced.

This absence of central authority during the period of invasion and conquest was a significant factor in the apparent absence of stratification in early Anglo-Saxon land rights. While kingship was probably not unknown to the continental Angles, Saxons, and Jutes, n49 apparently it did not play a role in the settlement of Britain. At least the earliest phases of the conquest were carried out by war bands that functioned independently under their own leaders. When successful war bands eventually combined, and migration and conquest in the 5th and 6th centuries A.D. compelled resort to stronger central rule, kingship then arose. An early example of such a king was the West Saxon Cerdic, who took the title of king several years after beginning the conquest of Wessex. n50

§ 3.04(c) Development of Early Anglo-Saxon Landholding Practices After Invasion and Settlement.

§ 3.04(c)(1) Romano-British Influence on Early Anglo-Saxon Landholding Practices.

While such central authority was coalescing, the new settlers probably occupied their territories under a wide variety of property arrangements. A simplistic traditional perception of Anglo-Saxon settlers pictured land being sectioned off to individual families, eventually to be grouped into hundreds n51 and shires. Now research is revealing that few such generalizations can be sustained. In areas where the first Germanic settlers were probably invited mercenaries, earliest landholding patterns may have followed closely the forms still found in the Romano-British communities to which the mercenaries were attached. An outstanding example is the system of "lathes" or provinces in Kent, recorded in the Domesday Book survey issued in A.D. 1086, and which "may well retain the outline of the Romano-British system, within which Hengist and his Jutes were permitted by such sub-Roman rulers as Vortigern to make their federate settlements." n52

A related but distinct pattern arose in parts of Northumbria, where the > peculiarities of the later Northumbrian agricultural system have also been claimed as due to direct Celtic influence. There are strong traces of a system of local organization which probably goes back to British times... Such survivals clearly indicate that in much of Bernicia [a kingdom of Northumbria] a substantial quantity of the native lands was probably left in the occupation of tributary British subjects under the new military aristocracy. The situation was thus quite different from what happened in those parts of Britain where the invaders were rather seeking habitable lands for their own exploitation than to live on rents extracted from a dependent native population. n53

§ 3.04(c)(2) Absence of Stratification in Early Anglo-Saxon Landholding Rights.

One generalization that does appear valid is the absence of social stratification in the early Anglo-Saxon settlements and, by implication, in the land rights held by their inhabitants, described as "a striking feature of the period." n54 "Early Anglo-Saxon England is notable for the egalitarian quality of its modest farmsteads." n55 In archaeological terms, the adherence of initial Anglo-Saxon landholding practices to native traditions already in place has been suggested in that "the vernacular architecture of the Early Anglo-Saxon farm may be an expression of a peasant family/household unit which withstood the long depopulation of the countryside, the decline of the state and the demise of classical antiquity." n56

Similarly, analysis of artifacts found in graves of 5th and 6th century Anglo-Saxon cemeteries attests to lack of social ranking and the absence of great differences in material wealth during this period. n57

§ 3.04(c)(3) Possible Transfer of Contemporary Continental Landholding Practices.

From examination of Dark Age farmsteads of north Germany and Holland during the period of Anglo-Saxon migration, it is possible to determine forms of agricultural organization with which the Anglo-Saxons were familiar. This information, however, sheds only limited light on Anglo-Saxon social organization of that period.

Despite some evidence for continuity of Romano-British field systems, as suggested in § 3.04(c)(1), supra, in most areas of Britain subject to Anglo-Saxon invasion "the Roman system of agriculture failed to survive through into the late Anglo-Saxon period." n58 Instead, the Anglo-Saxons may have brought with them the field systems best known to them from their continental homelands:

> In all probability the "Anglo-Saxons" who came to Britain during the fifth and sixth centuries were familiar with two types of settlement. On the one hand, there were the small dispersed settlements, many of which will have been no larger than individual farm complexes, each with its own small fields. On the other hand, there were also the varied mound settlements, the Wurten/Terpen [man-made mounds used in response to periodic flooding], some of which were individual in nature and others of which included several farms. n59

Only limited evidence shows that either of these systems was introduced into Britain by Anglo-Saxon settlers. Also, if the Anglo-Saxons had traditions of both individual farmsteads and small villages, it would be hard to distinguish these Germanic settlements from their previously existing Romano-British counterparts. In any event, it seems likely that most Anglo-Saxon settlement occurred before any type of communal open-field strip farming had developed on the continent or in Britain. n60

§ 3.04(c)(4) Property Rights Probably Recognized in Early Anglo-Saxon Times.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(i) Absence of Direct Evidence.

Any statement about land tenures or systems of ownership rights in the early Anglo-Saxon period must be considered almost entirely speculative. Contemporary evidence of any sort is wholly absent, and even intelligent guesses can be contrived only by extension back from the first written sources, the Anglo-Saxon charters of the 7th century A.D., or extension forward from the contemporary Romanized practices on the continent. The subject has been addressed by almost none of the recognized Anglo-Saxon scholars.

In hypothesizing about property rights during this early Anglo-Saxon period, A.D. 400-600, it can reasonably be assumed that land was the resource of greatest importance to the Anglo-Saxons then as it continued to be into modern times. The rights associated with possession of land must have varied, and inevitably those rights attained the power to define one's personal status as free or unfree. n61

If the first Anglo-Saxons in England were indeed composed essentially of free persons, members of war bands owing allegiance to a free-booting leader, or farmers and their families coming for land, eventually settlement of individual families on fixed parcels of land would have occurred.

The possession of land was an essential affirmation of one's status and right as a participant in the political and economic life of the group. Kemble believed that the Germanic aversion to city life or even to dwellings in close proximity to each other signified that "the Germanic community is in some sense ... bound to the soil: its members share in the arable, the forest and marsh, the waters and pastures: their bond of union is a partnership in the advantages to be derived from possession of the land, and individual interest in a common benefit." n62

§ 3.04(c)(4)(ii) Communal Holdings Apportioned by Lot.

According to Kemble, who attributed to Anglo-Saxons the traits of their Germanic contemporaries on the continent, "the district occupied by a body of new settlers was divided by lot in various proportions." n63 Some land would have been held in surplus for future apportionments, and other portions "remained in undivided possession as commons" and as marches to define borders or defensive buffer lands with other settlements. n64 A share sufficient for the support of an individual family would eventually become known as a hide. n65

§ 3.04(c)(4)(iii) Holdings for Life Tenure Only.

It is also reasonable to assume that the possessory right held by the occupant of a hide of land could be best described in common law terms as a life estate. On the continent, such an interest arose originally out of Roman land law and survived into Europe's dark age. Known in that context as a precarium, it signified the practice of one party possessing and using another party's land, for whatever consideration seemed appropriate. The possessor of the land, or beneficium, was vulnerable to the bonds of patronage, and at some time might find it necessary to seek the protection of and yield to the power of the owner. Once written documentation of Anglo-Saxon land transactions began to appear in the 7th century A.D., there was some evidence that many landholders had rights of tenants rather than of absolute owners, n66 as if the custom of the continent had carried over to England. n67

The common usage of some form of life estate as a form of landholding rights is also shown in the Domesday Book of A.D. 1086. Although subsequent to the Norman Conquest, the Domesday Book reflects property rights of the late Anglo-Saxon period. It shows that some of the Anglo-Saxon aristocracy held land that they could not transfer without leave of their lords; others held their land with a right of alienation. Stenton believed that holdings without right of alienation had been obtained by gift from the lord; holdings with the right had come to the owner in the owner's own right. It cannot be known whether these distinctions had their antecedents in the early Anglo-Saxon period, but it seems likely that both forms of land acquisition would have occurred as soon as settlement began.

Use of some form of life tenancy also appears from the earliest extant Anglo-Saxon charters describing transfers of rights in land, dating from the 7th century A.D. These charters show that a three-fold division of landholding rights had already developed. One of these, the so-called "laenland," consisted of land loaned to individual tenants, usually by the English church, which had received many grants from kings and others. Possession of these lands was usually loaned out to members of the nobility, and sometimes even to the king, for the span of one or more lives, but never more than three lives. n68 Lump sum payments, or rent, or services would be required in return. n69

Even after the Norman Conquest, the life tenancy continued to be the usual form of landholding; an ordinary gift of land to a person was considered to convey only a life estate. n70

§ 3.04(c)(4)(iv) Land for Services or Payments.

> It seems well established in Germanic custom that the lord was expected to provide his follower with an endowment in land when he reached a certain age. In Bede's time [eighth century A.D.] it must have been customary for the sons of nobles to enter the service of the king, or other members of the royal family, at quite an early age; for the endowment in land was granted to them when they were about twenty-four or twenty-five years old, and enabled them to marry ...
>
> It is to be observed that these estates are described [in the poems] not as though they had passed from father to son in due course of inheritance, but as grants received as a mark of favour from the king. Whether there were at this time any lands which were inheritable in ordinary course is a question that we have no means of deciding. In later times there is a certain amount of evidence which suggests that tenure of land for three generations may have constituted a claim to permanent possession. But even if so we cannot tell how far such a custom goes back. n71

It cannot be shown by what arrangements the earliest Anglo-Saxon settlers held their land; however, a system of land rights can be shown relatively early in the Anglo-Saxon era by analysis of the written charters that began to be used in the 7th century A.D. Apparently the spread of Christianity led to the spread of literacy, especially in transactions involving the church, and these charters show that distinctive property rights had already developed, even if their earliest form cannot be known.

These charters suggest that the land rights worked out after the Anglo-Saxon settlement must have always had some sort of service or payment obligations attached to the holding of the land. Rights of inheritability or alienability would have been extraordinary rights, perhaps also available from time to time by agreeing to render additional services or payments.

§ 3.04(c)(4)(v) The Beginning of Stratification in Property Rights.

The charters also show the beginnings of the close correlation between one's property rights and social status, and the developing stratification in types of property rights. Stenton promoted the thesis that "the general drift of English peasant life in these centuries was from freedom towards servitude:"

> The central course of Old English social development may be described as the process by which a peasantry, at first composed essentially of free men, acknowledging no lord below the king, gradually lost economic and personal independence From the moment when the kings of the migration age began to plant their companions upon the soil there must have existed communities in which expropriated Britons, and Englishmen too poor to be welcomed in settlements of their own people, were working for a lord in return for his protection...
>
> This depression was the result of several factors, of which the economic insecurity of the primitive ceorl was the most important. n72

While conceding that this thesis could not be supported fully by direct evidence, he described the process in persuasive terms, quoted at length below:

> There is no direct evidence to show the stages by which, within any single village, a community composed essentially of independent peasants developed into a community composed essentially of serfs. But the main features of the process seem fairly clear. In what appears to have been the normal case, it began with a grant from the king setting an ealdorman, a gesith, a bishop, or an abbot in his own place as the immediate lord of a village, and, in particular, as the recipient of the dues and services which its inhabitants had been accustomed to render to the king himself. The independence of the village group was not threatened at first. But the narrowness of an average ceorl's resources, and the many forms of disaster to which he was exposed, made it almost inevitable that sooner or later the village community would find itself unable to provide the food-rent which its lord had a right to demand. It was generally easier for the head of a peasant household to supply labour than to keep up a regular contribution to a communal food-rent. Most lords had need of labour on the "demesnes" which they had been acquiring through co-operation with the village community in the extension of the cultivated area, or by the creation of home farms within a ring fence. It seems that, within most villages, the duty of supporting the lord by a communal render in kind gave way, in time, more or less completely, to a system by which each of the regular holdings in the open fields -- hides, half-hides, and yardlands -- supplied labour for the lord's demesnes on a definite number of days in every week. In itself, the change was merely a matter of economic reorganization, which need have had no legal consequences. But in most cases it seems to have formed part of a wider revolution in which the individual peasants surrendered their holdings to the lord of the village and received them back from his hands, acknowledging themselves to be his men, and placing themselves under this protection. When this step had been taken by the whole or the greater part of a village community, the manorial economy of the middle ages was brought within sight. n73

§ 3.04(c)(4)(vi) Summary of Early Anglo-Saxon Property Rights.

If all of these surmises are correct, then the earliest Anglo-Saxon settlers would typically have obtained individual farmsteads assigned to them by the leader of their war band. These settlers would also have received certain rights in common lands to be shared with other members or the group of community. These possessory rights probably would have carried with them certain communal obligations similar to those known to be customary in later generations, such as road and bridge repairs and maintenance of defensive works. If they settled in still functioning Romano-British farmsteads or communities, they probably adopted the customary rights and duties recognized by the native inhabitants. With improving stability in these early decades came centralization of political power and stratification of property rights. War band leaders became kings, who assigned land to their chief warriors, who allotted portions to farmers and their families, each grantor retaining rights relative to subsequent grantees. Rights of inheritability and alienation were probably rare and probably required acquiescence by or payment to lord or community. At the end of this process, the actual occupants of the land would eventually suffer a nearly complete loss of economic and personal independence. n74

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 27. J. N. L. Myres, The English Settlements 53 (1986).

(n2)Footnote 28. "[A]lready in the late third century Saxon pirates had become such a menace to the Channel and North Sea coasts that the Romans built a series of forts from the Wash to the Isle of Wight, which were known as the forts of the Saxon Shore." Dorothy Whitelock, The Beginnings of English Society 13 (1974). The forts were mostly built between A.D. 270 and 285.

(n3)Footnote 29. See, e.g., James Campbell, "The First Christian Kings," in The Anglo-Saxons 52 (James Campbell ed. 1982); H. Munro Chadwick, The Origin of the English Nation 9-10 (1924).

(n4)Footnote 30. See generally The Origins of Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms (Steven Bassett ed. 1989); Martyn J. Whittock, The Origins of England 410-600 161-251 (1986).

(n5)Footnote 31. Kent, as a name, has its origin in the name of the Celtic tribe Cantiaci, conquered by the Romans in A.D. 43. Later Jutish conquerors called themselves Cantware. James Campbell, "The Lost Centuries: 400-600," in The Anglo-Saxons 38-39 (James Campbell ed. 1982).

(n6)Footnote 32. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 16-17 (1943).

(n7)Footnote 33. Id. at 53. See also John Blair, Early Medieval Surrey: Landholding, Church and Settlement Before 1300 (1991).

(n8)Footnote 34. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (E) 13 annal 491.

(n9)Footnote 35. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 17-19 (1943).

(n10)Footnote 36. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (Parker) (genealogical preface).

(n11)Footnote 37. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 19-27 (1943).

(n12)Footnote 38. D. P. Kirby, The Making of Early England 21-23 (1967).

(n13)Footnote 39. D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 32-35 (1973). See also Barbara Yorke, Wessex in the Early Middle Ages (1995).

(n14)Footnote 40. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (E) 61 annal 835.

(n15)Footnote 41. Id. at 21 annal 593.

(n16)Footnote 42. D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 41-43 (1973).

(n17)Footnote 43. Id. at 43-44. See Della Hooke, The Anglo-Saxon Landscape (1985).

(n18)Footnote 44. D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 108-109 (1973).

(n19)Footnote 45. The Heptarchy is a modern designation and refers to the kingdoms of Wessex, Sussex, Kent, Essex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria. See D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 110 (1973).

(n20)Footnote 46. D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 110-112 (1973).

(n21)Footnote 47. H. P. R. Finberg, The Formation of England 550-1042, 18 (1974).

(n22)Footnote 48. J. N. L. Myres, The English Settlements 109 (1986).

(n23)Footnote 49. Tacitus, writing in the 1st century A.D., remarked that the Germanic tribes sometimes elected kings in times of war. Anglo-Saxon literature gives other evidence that kingship was known at an early time, through tales of Offa, a 4th-century king of continental Angles, Widsith lines 35-44, and of Beowulf, a Swedish prince who dealt with kings of other peoples. Beowulf lines 11-21.

(n24)Footnote 50. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (E) 15 annal 495.

(n25)Footnote 51. In the earliest Anglo-Saxon settlements a hundred may have been theoretically the land required to sustain a hundred fighting men and their families. David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History, Part I: The Shared History, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 143 (1999).

(n26)Footnote 52. J. N. L. Myres, The English Settlements 124 (1986).

(n27)Footnote 53. Id. at 200-201.

(n28)Footnote 54. Richard Hodges, The Anglo-Saxon Achievement: Archaeology and the Beginnings of English Society 34 (1989).

(n29)Footnote 55. Id.

(n30)Footnote 56. Id. at 36.

(n31)Footnote 57. Id. at 38-42. These conclusions are based on the assumption that grave goods more or less faithfully reflect the decedents' relative status in life.

(n32)Footnote 58. Id. at 85.

(n33)Footnote 59. Id. at 88.

(n34)Footnote 60. Id.

(n35)Footnote 61. While very little evidence exists regarding Anglo-Saxon transfers of land prior to 700 A.D., scholars have confidently asserted that land was bought and sold as we recognize it in a modern sense by the late seventh-, eighth-, and ninth-century in England. James Campbell, The Anglo-Saxon State 231-34 (2000); Peter J. Fowler, Farming in Early Medieval England: Some Fields for Thought. from The Anglo-Saxons from the Migration Period to the Eighth Century: An Ethnographic Perspective, v. 2, at 247 (1997). Campbell believes this sudden change may have resulted from an evolution among how Anglo-Saxons valued property. He explains that prior to 700, A.D., personal property and treasure were valued more than real property. For whatever reason, Anglo-Saxons shifted and began to more highly value the worth of land. Campbell, 239-45. Others maintain that this change was merely a result of records and that land had no hereditary tenure among the Anglo-Saxons until tenure by book was introduced. Eric

John, Land Tenure in Early England, a Discussion of Some Problems 24-79 (1960).

(n36)Footnote 62. John Mitchell Kemble, The Saxons in England 89-90 (1876). As to some of what Kemble wrote on this subject, Pollock and Maitland's later assessment should be recalled: "It is now prudent rather than necessary to remind the reader that Kemble's brilliant conjectures [particularly on Anglo-Saxon folkland] were premature and largely unwarranted." Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Before the Time of Edward I. 62 (2d ed. 1909);.Patrick Wormald, Frederic William Maitland and the Earliest English Law, 16 L. and Hist. Rev. 1 (Spring 1998).

(n37)Footnote 63. Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History Of English Before The Time Of Edward I. 90 (2d Ed. 1909). See especially examples of land division by lot set forth in note 1 on his page 90.

(n38)Footnote 64. Id. at 90.

(n39)Footnote 65. Id. at 91-92. The definition of "hide" has been somewhat in dispute, mostly because it fails to inform historians of the measuring standard: no one knows either what type and size of "family" or how much land was used to "support a single family." In attempting to specifically define the hide, Maitland postulated an average of 120 acres (though a hide could be as small as 40 acres). F.W. Maitland, Doomsday Book and Beyond 475-490 (1921). But most scholars agree that a hide measured quality rather than quantity, particularly that the hide was a measurement for taxes or food-rent tributes owed to the lord from his holding. Erich J. Richter, Transitions: English Feudal Development, 1016-1135 (Reed College: 1993); Richard Phillip Abels, Lordship and Military Obligation in Anglo-Saxon England 101 (1988). Hide assessments were often independent of the numbers of families present. Id. at 101-03.

(n40)Footnote 66. 2 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 71 (reprint 1971).

(n41)Footnote 67. In cases where laenland was created by express agreement, "it may be compared with the Gallo-Frankish precarium, from which indeed it was perhaps derived." Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I. 61 (2d ed. 1909).

(n42)Footnote 68. Three lives did not mean the life spans of three persons living at the time of the loan, but meant the recipient of the loan and "two successive heirs." Frederic Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond 309 (1897).

(n43)Footnote 69. Paul Vinogradoff, English Society in the Eleventh Century 292-332 (1925); 2 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 70-71 (reprint 1971). The concept of laenland has no modern counterpart, but is perhaps best thought of as "loan land." The king could lend or loan his land to his subjects, usually as a return for some service rendered by the subject, and usually to secure loyalty to the king. These landholders could profit from the cultivation of the land by the lower classes, but did not truly "own" the land; the king always had the power to recall the grant. Also, if the landowner died, the property reverted back to the hands of the king, who could then grant the land to someone else. Erich J. Richter. Transitions: English Feudal Development, 1016-1135 (Reed College: 1993). Sons often attempted to prove their loyalty to the king in order to maintain control over the land: "Since the early Anglo-Saxon kings granted merely the enjoyment of land rather than hereditary title to these possessions, each generation had to win its land (and hence rank) anew. Land tenure, then, was hereditable, but not hereditary. Only through service to his father's lord could a warrior hope to win his paternal estate." Abels, Lordship and Military Obligation in Anglo-Saxon England 44 (1988).

(n44)Footnote 70. Bracton, n. 27; Y.B. 15 Edw. 3 (R.S.) 322.

(n45)Footnote 71. H. Munroe Chadwick, The Origin of the English Nation 159-160 (1924).

(n46)Footnote 72. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 463 (1943).

(n47)Footnote 73. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 464-465 (1943).

(n48)Footnote 74. See Della Hooke, Anglo-Saxon Settlements (1988).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 3.05

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.05 Development of Anglo-Saxon Laws and Customs Relating to Property after ca. A.D. 600.

By the time the Anglo-Saxons emerged from their dark age of illiteracy early in the 7th century A.D., their property rights had already undergone much sophisticated elaboration, complete with seeds of full-blown feudalism ready to flower when conditions became right. Many historians see as a key event in this emergence the arrival of the monk Augustine and other clerics in Kent at about A.D. 597. Sent from Rome as an emissary of Pope Gregory, Augustine was to persuade the Kentish King Aethelberht to formally accept Christianity and urge his people to do likewise. Aethelberht had been married for nearly forty years to Bertha, a Christian Frankish princess who maintained a spiritual adviser in her household. n75

Aethelberht's conversion, along with subsequent successful proselyting in Northumbria, began the long, halting process of establishing the Roman church in England and achieving at least a partial reconciliation with the British Christians in the north and west. The other important consequence of these changes was to increase interest in literacy and to bring into governing circles churchmen and others who could read and write. Newly Christianized kings were urged to order written collections of their laws, not only in imitation of great rulers of the ancient past, but also to formalize royal protections for the church and its officials; thus the laws or "dooms" of Anglo-Saxon kings began to be issued. Church officials also sought to secure rights of land tenure in some written form, and this led to the common use of written instruments called charters in conveying property rights to the church; use of charters eventually spread to some purely secular conveyances.

Thus, with respect to law and property rights, the emergence of the Anglo-Saxons from the dark age of illiteracy is characterized principally by the appearance of codes of written laws called "dooms," and the increasing use of written documents called "charters" to evidence conveyances of tenurial property rights. Although most of the charters deal directly with only one type of property, called "bookland" or "bocland," they provide insights into "laenland" and "folkland," the other forms of Anglo-Saxon landholding. n76

§ 3.05(a) The "Dooms" n77 of Kings Who Ruled Over Individual Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms.

§ 3.05(a)(1) Kent.

The most conspicuous legal activity of early Anglo-Saxon kings was the issuance of written law codes, known as dooms. n78 The earliest of these was issued by Aethelberht of Kent, n79 and, because it was written in Anglo-Saxon, has the distinction of being the first set of Germanic laws written in the vernacular. n80 Indeed, dating from ca. A.D. 601-605, this code is the earliest Anglo-Saxon writing of any kind. n81

All of the Anglo-Saxon "codes" were codes only in the sense that they were organized somewhat systematically or logically, not because they were comprehensive statements of law. They probably reflected some customary law of the time, but in fact did not include the vast bulk of customary law. n82 Most of the codes were preoccupied with schedules of "composition" payments for specified offenses, and only incidentally give glimpses into the kings' other legal concerns. n83

It could be questioned why Aethelberht wrote a code at all. His people and surely most of his council were illiterate. n84 The traditional explanation that the code was prompted by his conversion to Christianity during Augustine's mission has been challenged, n85 but Christian influence is a certainty both in Aethelberht's and in all subsequent Anglo-Saxon codes. n86 The laws probably consisted of a set of judgments pronounced by the king and his witan (council), concerning both abstract propositions (similar to legislation) and concrete cases (similar to adjudications). n87

A brief topical summary of these 90 dooms suffices to show some of the king's legal concerns during this period:

> One doom establishes a compensation multiplier for offenses against the church its clerics, curiously and quite incongruously greater even than for offenses against the king. n88
>
> Eleven dooms establish a compensation multiplier and compensation amounts for offenses against the king and his servants or representatives and imply that in Kent, even at this early time, the king is the personal lord of every freeman. n89
>
> Two dooms establish compensation amounts for certain offenses against noblemen. n90
>
> Two dooms establish compensation amounts for certain offenses against non-noble freemen (and clauses 11 and 16 indicate that three classes of freedmen -- possibly referring to manumitted slaves or other subject people, including Britons -- are recognized). n91
>
> Five dooms deal with forcible entry into and theft from dwellings and fenced enclosures. n92
>
> Three dooms set fines for those supplying weapons by which offenses are committed. n93
>
> Six dooms deal with wergilds (the price of a person's life, varied according to social rank) for killing. n94
>
> One doom deals with false imprisonment. n95
>
> Fourteen dooms deal with women -- injuries, marital and family relations, and misconduct. n96
>
> Forty dooms list various personal injuries and their required compensation amounts. n97
>
> Five dooms deal with various offenses by and against servants and slaves. n98

The dooms of Aethelberht are not as varied in subject matter as the Lex Salica, the important early law code of the Salian Franks, but they are better organized. n99 If subject matter choice truly reflects the controversies with which the king was most often engaged, then these laws reveal the most difficult social problems confronting an emerging Anglo-Saxon society. It should also be noted that only five of the ninety dooms deal with offenses against rights in land (in the nature of trespass) and that the entire subject of ownership or possessory rights in land is apparently left to unwritten custom.

A second Kentish code, usually called the Laws of Hlothhere and Eadric, appeared near the end of the 7th century A.D. The two kings probably did not rule jointly; Hlothhere reigned ca. A.D. 673 to 685, and was succeeded by his nephew and rival Eadric, who reigned only a year and a half. n100 Their decrees are introduced: "Hlothhere and Eadric, Kings of Kent, extended the laws which their predecessors had made, by the decrees which are stated below." n101 The 16 dooms in their laws are summarized as follows:

Four dooms assign additional wergild amounts for killings by servants. n102

One doom requires kidnapping to be adjudicated by oath. n103

One doom designates the custodian and guardian of a child whose father has died. n104

One doom regulates the recovery of stolen property. n105

Three dooms require certain accusations to be adjudicated by arbitration, compensation, or oath. n106

One doom assigns penalties for defamation. n107

Four dooms deal with offenses committed within the dwellings of others. n108

One doom calls for witnesses to certify purchases of property in London (which may have been part of Kentish territory at the time). n109

As with Aethelberht's code, these laws governed property only with respect to matters of misconduct on property and to certain conveyances, while leaving the vast subject matter of tenurial rights to still unwritten custom.

The third and final Kentish code is that of Wihtred, whose rule began about A.D. 690, during a period of considerable disturbance in southeast England. He issued these dooms in about A.D. 695, shortly after making peace with the Wessex King Ine. n110 One of his laws is identical to a contemporary doom of Ine. n111 These laws declare that they were drawn up by a council of "notables," including several church officials, and that they added to the Kentish legal usages. n112 The 28 dooms of Wihtred may be summarized as follows:

Two dooms grant the church immunity from taxation and establish its penalty entitlement as equal to the king's. n113

Four dooms define the consequences for entering into or aiding illicit unions and not repenting of the same. n114

One doom limits the hospitality to be granted to a wandering cleric not part of an order. n115

One doom regulates manumission of persons at the altar. n116

Three dooms prohibit work and travel on the Sabbath. n117

Two dooms penalize offerings to devils. n118

Two dooms penalize violations of fasting times. n119

Nine dooms regulate affirming by oath the statements and accusations of a bishop, king, abbot, priest, deacon, clerk, stranger at the altar, king's thegn (member of the aristocracy), commoner at the altar, servant of the bishop or king, servant of a lord's company, lay servant, and ecclesiastical servant. n120

Three dooms establish alternative penalties for thieves caught in the act. n121

One doom requires that a man who leaves the road without giving warning is assumed to be a thief, to be slain or put to ransom. n122

Of these 28 dooms, 24 have a distinctly ecclesiastical flavor, reflecting the special interest of the important church officials on the council that drew up the decrees. Wihtred's dooms shed no light on property laws and customs of the time and added little to the customary law then being observed in the Kentish kingdom.

§ 3.05(a)(2) Wessex.

Although references exist to other codes -- now lost, only one other Anglo-Saxon law code survives from the era prior to when Alfred the Great and his successors began legislating for all of England. n123 This pre-Alfredian code is from Ine, one of Alfred's predecessors on the throne of Wessex, and is contemporary with the Code of Wihtred in Kent, dating to ca. A.D. 688-694. Ine, too, exhibited strong religious impulses and even abdicated in A.D. 725, to make a pilgrimage to Rome, where he died. n124 His laws proclaim that they were drawn up with the advice of his father, two of his bishops, his chief nobles, counselors, and many "servants of God." n125 Its 76 dooms may be summarized as follows:

One doom requires that clerics observe the rules of their respective orders. n126

One doom requires a child to be baptized within thirty days of birth. n127

One doom imposes penalties for working on the Sabbath. n128

Two dooms order payment of church dues. n129

On doom regulates the sanctuary of churches. n130

One doom penalizes fighting in the king's house, a monastery, a nobleman's house, and elsewhere. n131

Twenty-two dooms deal with theft, thieves, stolen property and unreturned borrowed property. n132

Ten dooms regulate adjudicatory procedure, including pledges, oaths, obtaining justice, and false witness. n133

One doom prohibits selling an Englishmen into slavery overseas. n134

Two dooms require a traveler to sound a warning when he leaves the road and permits him to be killed if he fails to warn. n135

Eight dooms deal with various circumstances of killing and the wergild amounts therefor. n136

Three dooms require maintenance for foundlings and for fatherless and illegitimate children. n137

One doom requires return of double the bridal price if a man buys a wife and the marriage does not take place. n138

Six dooms regulate moving without permission, eviction, and failure to enter into possession. n139

Inasmuch as they cast light on land tenures, they are quoted in their English translation:

39. If anyone moves away without permission from his lord and steals into another district, if he is discovered he shall return to where was before, and give his lord 60 shillings.

63. If a nobleman moves his residence he may take with him his reeve, his smith, and his children's nurse.

64. He who has [a holding of] 20 hides shall sow 12 hides of land under cultivation when he means to leave.

65. He who has [a holding of] 10 hides shall sow 6 hides of land under cultivation when he means to leave.

66. He who has [a holding of] 3 hides shall sow one hide and a half of land under cultivation when he means to leave.

68. If a nobleman is evicted, he may be expelled from his house, but not from the cultivated land.

Three dooms impose penalties for damage by stray animals. n140

Two dooms penalize destruction of trees. n141

Two dooms discuss penalties for breaking into fortified premises and for depredations by a lord's men. n142

Two dooms deal with obligations accompanying land use, including military service and rents. n143 These dooms, too, are quoted in full for what they reveal about Anglo-Saxon land tenures:

51. If a nobleman who holds land neglects military service, he shall pay 120 shillings and forfeit his land; a nobleman who holds no land shall pay 60 shillings; a commoner shall pay a fine of 30 shillings for neglecting military service.

67. If a man takes a yard [a quarter hide] of land or more, at a fixed rent, and ploughs it, [and] if the lord requires service as well as rent, he [the tenant] need not take the land if the lord does not give him a dwelling; but [in that case he must forfeit the crops]. n144

One doom penalizes illicit compacts. n145

Five dooms deal with transactions in animals, animal parts, and animal labor. n146

One doom sets a penalty for the early shearing of sheep. n147

Ine's code represents a departure from the dreary catalogs of wergild arithmetic found in the earlier Kentish codes; it is instead an attempt to deal with conspicuous social problems:

For its date it is a lengthy document, covering a wide range of human relationships, entering much more fully than any other early code into the details of the agrarian system on which society rested, and marked by a definite purpose of advancing Christianity. It is not a tariff of offences, but the result of a more serious attempt to bring together a body of rules governing the more complicated of the questions with which the king and his officers might have to deal. It is the work of a responsible statesman, capable of bringing his clergy and nobles into deliberation on the blending of ancient custom and new enactment in an elaborate body of law. It stands for a new conception of kingship, destined in time to replace the simple motives which had satisfied the men of an earlier age. n148

§ 3.05(b) How Consolidation of Anglo-Saxon Monarchical Power Affected Property Rights.

The earliest Anglo-Saxon kings ruled people, not territories. n149 Only with consolidation of conquests and increasing stability did specific areas become identified as kingdoms. The earliest kingdoms have been depicted as rather simple organizations with law in a primitive state:

> Certainly [the early Anglo-Saxon kingdoms] were small and required little in the way of institutions. Their law was customary not royal, transmitted orally rather than in writing, and knowledge of it reposed in the body of the folk and was declared in the assembly of the folk by men specially learned in it. No sophisticated arrangements were needed to provide for the maintenance of the king and his retinue: they lived on the renders of their own estates and on the food farms [rent] paid by their subjects. The principal function of kings was to lead their people in war. n150

In the approximately 100 years from the time of the earliest Anglo-Saxon kings until Aethelberht issued his dooms, important changes occurred in the roles and conduct of the kings. These changes are illustrated by what is known of Aethelberht's reign. Known as a progressive monarch, his pattern of kingship presaged the styles of subsequent kings.

Aethelberht maintained contacts with "foreign courts" both in England and on the continent. He assumed personal responsibility for dealing with Augustine's mission, regulating preaching, and later legislating for protection of ecclesiastical interests. n151 His laws show that the "king's peace" was gaining recognition; offenses committed in the king's presence or in gatherings called by the king were assigned extra penalties. Personal offenses normally resolved by payments to the kindred also resulted in fines paid to the king, who now assumed the role of protector of the people in civil affairs. His dooms reveal a king who accepted responsibility for the development and enforcement of customary law and who exhibited considerable interest in the internal affairs of his kingdom. One could infer from his dooms that Aethelberht even had officials to collect fines and arrange compositions between kindred groups. n152

The king's most substantial resource was large tracts of land from which he rewarded his followers. While the land was technically the property of the entire people, the king had rights to rents, services, or other returns from occupancy of the land, which rights he could grant or release in return for faithful service. n153 Such grants and releases were made by royal diploma or charter and land affected by such written documents was called "bookland" or "bocland." n154 In Mercia, even a grant of land as "bookland" did not relieve the property of the customary duties of military service, bridge building, and fortress maintenance. n155 Elsewhere, "bookland" was exempt from the king's proprietary right to tax the land, known as feorm. n156 Revenue and tribute were also exacted from subject territories. n157 It may be concluded that royal grants of interests in land defined and refined property interests, generally.

In later times the king could also order extraordinary national taxation, as shown by the danegeld and heregeld assessments of the Viking era, n158 and he took a percentage of the fines imposed by courts. n159 The national tax levies, in particular, suggest considerable administrative machinery at the king's disposal, used to calculate and collect land assessments. National taxation based on land holdings promoted the assertion of comprehensive royal power over all the lands of the kingdom. n160

Ravages of the Danish Vikings during the 9th century A.D. disrupted every aspect of Anglo-Saxon society. Only Wessex under Alfred the Great survived the invasions. Alfred was able to stop the Danish advance, unify the proud and disparate peoples of other conquered Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, and begin recovering territory and ruling power from the Danes. From the time of Alfred, English laws would be issued by kings whose rule extended over all of England. n161

§ 3.05(c) "Dooms" Issued by Kings of England.

The laws, or "dooms," issued by Alfred and his successors are important because they applied to the entire English nation. However, in content the English dooms added little to the types of decrees found in earlier Anglo-Saxon codes.

§ 3.05(c)(1) Dooms of Alfred the Great.

Alfred reigned from A.D. 871 until his death in about A.D. 899. The date of his code is uncertain, estimated at A.D. 892-893, by one scholar n162 and prior to A.D. 889, by another. n163 A lengthy introduction contains a translation of the Ten Commandments and other passages from the book of Exodus, a brief apostolic history (quoting from the book of Acts of the Apostles), a description of the growth of church law, and a statement that schedules of compensations were decreed and written by many councils. The king then declared:

> Now, I, King Alfred, have collected these laws, and have given orders for copies to be made of many of those which our predecessors observed and which I myself approved of. But many of those I did not approve of I have annulled, by the advice of my councillors, while [in other cases] I have ordered changes to be introduced. For I have not dared to presume to set down in writing many of my own, for I cannot tell what [innovations of mine] will meet with the approval of our successors. But those which were the most just of the laws I found -- whether they dated from the time of Ine my kinsman, or of Offa, king of the Mercians, or of Aethelberht, who was the first [king] to be baptized in England -- these I have collected while rejecting the others.
>
> I, then, Alfred, King of the West Saxons, have shewn these to all my councillors, and they have declared that it met with the approval of all, that they should be observed. n164

These laws provide protection for ecclesiastical interests and assign penalties for various types of offenses, with greater punishments for misdeeds that threaten the king's peace. Thirty-four of the 77 clauses describe money penalties for various personal injuries. n165

Alfred's dooms contain a singular reference to land held by title deed or charter, called "bookland" ("boclande" in Anglo-Saxon), which was inheritable and could be limited by the transferor to alienation only within the kindred:

> We have further established that a man who holds land by title-deed ["bookland"], which his kinsmen have left him, shall not be allowed to give it out of his kindred, if there is documentary or [other] evidence that the power to do so is forbidden him by the men who first acquired it, or by those who gave it to him. [And he who contests such an alienation] shall make a declaration to this effect in the presence of his kindred, with the king and bishop as witnesses. n166

After Alfred's defeat of the Danish King Guthrum in A.D. 878, the so-called "Treaty of Alfred and Guthrum" was drawn up sometime between A.D. 880, and Guthrum's death in A.D. 890. The treaty set out procedures and penalties for certain offenses and also described the boundaries between the English and Danish areas. n167

§ 3.05(c)(2) Dooms of Other English Kings.

The so-called "Laws of Edward and Guthrum" are described in their introduction as those laws enacted first by Alfred and Guthrum and other laws enacted later by Edward the Elder and Guthrum. Because Guthrum died in A.D. 890, and Edward the Elder reigned from A.D. 899-924, this liaison is suspect. n168 In any event, the decrees draw further distinctions between penalties imposed in English and Danish districts, respectively. n169

Edward the Elder issued two other sets of laws. The first, consisting of only three clauses, makes reference to "folkland" ("folclande" in Anglo-Saxon) and "bookland." "Folkland" is of uncertain meaning, but may possibly refer to the land held communally by all the people, or to land held according to customary rights and duties:

> Further, we have declared what [penalty] he is liable to, who withholds from another his rights either in "bookland" or "folkland," And with regard to the "folkland" [we have declared] that he [the plaintiff] shall appoint a day when he [the defendant] shall do him justice in the presence of the reeve.
>
> § 1. If, however, he [the plaintiff] does not obtain his rights either in "bookland" or "folkland," he [the defendant] who withholds the rights shall forfeit a fine of 30 shillings to the king, and 30 shillings also on the second occasion, and on the third occasion the fine for insubordination to the king, that is 120 shillings, unless he has already desisted [from his wrong-doing]. n170

In the second set of laws of Edward the Elder, one of the eight clauses refers to the "domboc," probably the "doombook" n171 of laws of Ine and Alfred, which indicates that those laws had not been superseded. n172

Six series of laws, of uncertain dates, were issued by Aethelstan, who reigned from ca. A.D. 924-939. Their subjects and probable order of issuance are I (ecclesiastical matters), II (administration of justice), V (administration of justice from a council at Exeter), III (reiteration of the substance of series I, II and V in the form of a letter to the king from officials and people of Kent), IV (administration of justice), and VI (an ordinance governing guilds, drawn up by bishops and reeves from London). n173 Perhaps the most interesting of these provisions is found in clause 2 of the second series: "With regard to lordless men from whom no [legal] satisfaction can be obtained, we have declared that their relatives shall be commanded to settle them in a fixed residence where they will become amenable to public law, and find them a lord at a public meeting." n174

This statement illustrates the official distaste for "lordless men," and likely indicates that lordship had been significantly extended during the centuries of Anglo-Saxon rule.

Other aspects of Anglo-Saxon law appear in the laws of the English kings Edmund I (issued A.D. 942-946), Edgar (issued A.D. 946-963), and Aethelred II (issued A.D. 980-1016); in the laws of the Anglo-Danish king Cnut (issued A.D. 1027-1034); and in the various writings from and after the time of the Norman Conquest purporting to describe Anglo-Saxon law under Edward the Confessor and that were in effect at the time of the conquest in A.D. 1066.

§ 3.05(d) Customary Law Generally. n175

No direct evidence has yet appeared as to matters of customary government and law observed by the early Anglo-Saxon invaders of Britain. However, much evidence suggests that the earliest invading folk-groups were identified by the name of the original successful leader, and that name attached to the leader's body of followers wherever they happened to go. n176 By the 7th century A.D., as Anglo-Saxon society was becoming more territorial, some old folk-groups had stabilized into administrative districts, sometimes called provinces, or certain localities eventually called shires and hundreds. This terminology originated in Wessex and spread to most of the rest of England by A.D. 1016, primarily because of the West Saxon hegemony during the Viking conflicts. n177

Some shire boundaries probably conformed to the boundaries of the old folk-groups; others did not. Many shires were administered by important officials of the king, called ealdormen, some of whom were possibly the successors of the older folk-group leaders. Each of these officials had considerable legal power. Shires came to be divided into hundreds (or wapentakes in predominantly Danish areas), usually administered by an officer of the king called a reeve. The reeve's duties were to administer the king's lands and to preside over the hundred courts, as the ealdorman presided over the shire courts. Certain high reeves became the chief administrative officials over shires and were known as shire reeves, or more familiarly, sheriffs. n178

The main responsibilities of the reeves, and ultimately of the ealdormen, were to maintain law and order, punish criminals, collect royal dues, conduct courts, supervise tolls, exchanges and mints and -- especially in the case of ealdormen -- conduct military operations.

There is unfortunately little information about town life under the Anglo-Saxons. n179 Possibly the free inhabitants of towns formed themselves into gylds of uncertain nature, and they may have corporately enjoyed certain privileges. London, in particular, seems to have enjoyed substantial independence. n180

The property most commonly exchanged was probably cattle, and the mode of transfer was actual delivery. A bargain was probably bound by pledges and earnest money, although there is no direct evidence on any of these points. Written contracts were not in use. n181

Acceptance of Christianity influenced the development of Anglo-Saxon legislation and customary law in many ways, often too subtle and complex to be identified with precision. n182

In general, Christianity provided an impetus for kings to make laws to "protect churchmen and their property." n183 It also stressed legitimacy in determining heirs, but changes in the law and its application came slowly. n184

§ 3.05(e) Customary Law Regarding Real Property.

The rules for landholding at various times during the Anglo-Saxon age are best described in terms of the prevailing social structure, because the most distinctive feature of social classes was their respective relationships to the land. All land seems to have had impressed upon it certain public burdens: the obligations of military service, of bridge construction, and of fortress maintenance. n185

The kings reserved for themselves great tracts of land in subjugated territories. Some of this land was granted to their chief warrior companions who formed the noble class, and after Christian conversion, kings and others frequently made grants to the church. The grantees were supported by the rents and services of the humble agrarian folk who actually occupied and tilled much of the land. n186 These royal grants to private persons were probably only life interests; if a father wished to pass a holding on to a son, he probably had to seek the king's acquiescence. A younger son might serve in personal attendance on the king in anticipation of being favored with his own grant of land. n187

At some time, probably beginning shortly after conversion to Christianity occurred, the need for church endowments not limited to the life of one grantee became obvious. Anglo-Saxon rulers began granting land to the church by means of royal charters, giving virtually full possessory and hereditary rights. This land was always referred to as "boclande" or bookland. Obtaining such charters was at first the exclusive privilege of the church, but transparent subterfuges arose. A lay person could secure a grant of bookland by founding a church or a monastery and then bequeathing it to his descendants, who would have to take orders or the veil. The bequest was always in jeopardy if heirs died out or wished to remain lay persons, so commonly the local bishop was named the ultimate grantee. Also widespread was a practice, condemned by Bede, whereby many important persons had themselves tonsured and called their institutions monasteries, but whose commitment to orders was superficial. So much land was consumed by this practice in Northumbria that there was allegedly not enough land left for grants to young warriors, who often left the region. n188

While all land was normally subject to certain secular burdens -- taxation, military service, purveyance, labor, and judicial duties -- Ine of Wessex went so far in A.D. 704, as to declare church lands perpetually exempt from taxation, n189 and Wihtred of Kent exempted churches from all secular burdens, n190 an act ratified by a church council in A.D. 742. But in A.D. 749, the powerful Mercian monarch Aethelbald declared church lands would not be exempt from the secular burdens of bridge building and fortress work, although other exemptions would remain in effect. n191 A few years later his successor Offa added the requirement that holders of bookland, mostly ecclesiastical foundations, must meet quotas for military service. n192 Wessex followed, and by A.D. 842, Wessex land charters show that all three "common dues" were being imposed on bookland in Wessex. n193 This removed any barriers to extending bookland outright to lay persons, which in fact occurred during Offa's reign. n194

Although incidents of particular forms of landholding must have varied widely, apparently bookland usually carried the rights of alienation or devise. n195 The decree in Alfred's laws prohibiting holders of bookland from alienating it if ancestors had entailed it in the family was probably an aberration. n196

An English king might even grant part of his own demesne as bookland. As bookland rights were extended, they sometimes included the right to hold court, or at least to keep part of the fines assessed by courts held within the territory of the grant. n197

Land not granted by charter might have been held under a more precarious form of tenure called laenland, or, for convenience, loan land:

> In the later Anglo-Saxon period, land held of a superior, whether much or little, is called laen-land. It is not clear whether this term extended to customary tenures (those for example which would result from a grant of book-land as between the new lord and the occupiers) or was limited to interests created by an express agreement. In the latter case it may be compared with the Gallo-Frankish precarium, from which indeed it was perhaps derived. n198

Although it must be understood that any generalizations about laenland are derived from isolated references in the charters, some broad characteristics of this form of landholding seem evident. Laenland could not be alienated or inherited without the king's permission or charter. If permission or charter were granted, the land became bookland, but would revert to the king if the holder died without heirs. Such a holding could be described as a lease for a term of lives, usually up to three lives, followed by a reversion. n199 Laenland was subject to normal secular dues and it, like bookland, could be forfeited for failure to fulfill those dues.

The tracts of land granted by loan or book were usually very large, and the grantees were often members of the lay nobility or higher clergy. Substantial portions of their holdings were occupied by tillers of the soil from several other classes, with the social class generally corresponding to the terms of their tenures.

Again remembering that Anglo-Saxon society was not static, some broad generalizations about social class and property tenures may be made. Just below the nobility on the social scale was a class of free farmers, discussed at some length in the laws of Aethelberht, n200 and sometimes apparently labeled geneats or radcnihts. However, other than this source there is very little direct information about this class. Their land, even if free of rent obligation and freely alienable, would still have been subject to the secular dues owed to a lord or the king. Depictions of early Anglo-Saxon society as consisting mostly of such free farmers cannot be substantiated and, in fact, the Domesday Book shows that by the 11th century A.D. the free class had become surprisingly small, except in the heavily Danish areas. By this time it is possible that some of these freemen had become mounted retainers for their lords or the king, thus receiving a holding and being expected in return to pay rent, perform labor, and attend and ride on errands. n201 It is possible to see in this yeoman farmer-mounted servant a forerunner of the medieval knight, already in place before the Normans came. n202

In England a person could be economically dependent, and thus unfree, but still be personally free, especially in legal standing. Freemen are known to have been tenants in varying degrees of servitude. Other classes of free persons arose during the Anglo-Saxon age. n203 One of these classes, the so-called geburs, held much smaller tracts of land than the geneats, paid rent in kind and money, and performed labor for their lord. The lord, who had originally provided both the land and the livestock, reclaimed them when the gebur died. Still lower on the social scale, the class of kotsetlan, or cottagers, held land of the lord also, and performed heavy labor. Economically unfree, the kotsetlan probably could not move from their land, but were still personally free. n204 Even this nominal personal freedom would be lost if the kotsetlan were captured during civil strife or sold themselves into slavery during times of hardship. n205 It has been stated that "serfdom was much more of a personal bondage and less involved with the occupation of particular land before the Norman Conquest than after." n206

It may also be questioned whether kindred relationships continued to influence landholdings as the Anglo-Saxon age advanced through the centuries:

> As to the influence of the tie of kindred on the tenure and inheritance of land, the pre-Conquest evidence, though fairly copious, is unsatisfactory. Most of it refers to the estates of wealthy persons, who can deal with their properties by devises and testaments. Many of the documents which bear on this subject relate to land held under a royal charter, and therefore exempt from the ordinary rules of inheritance. Little information has been preserved about the customs which regulated the descent of land among the peasantry, and there are questions of great importance, such as the conditions under which a daughter might claim a share in her father's land, on which Old English authorities throw no direct light. Medieval practice suggests very strongly that the holding of the pre-Conquest ceorl had been partible among his sons, or among his daughters if he had no son, and that the conception of the holding as "family land" was so firmly established that its possessor had no right to alienate any part of it to the disadvantage of his expectant heirs. It seems reasonable to assume that the heirs of a ceorl whose holding was too small for profitable division remained on their father's land, and cultivated it jointly after his death. But it is clear that the house community of land-owning kinsmen to which such arrangements must often have given rise was in law a mere group of individuals which could at any time be dissolved by the action of its members. No text of Old English law ever attributes the ownership of land to a family. n207

The overall picture of Anglo-Saxon landholding, especially as related to social status, is one with little known consistency throughout England, and one that was in constant fluctuation throughout the Anglo-Saxon age. Certainly it appears that at several levels of social status landholding rights were granted in return for commitments to render services and agricultural products. At the very lowest levels, a lord who established a peasant family on a farm, with not only the land and agricultural seed, but with livestock, implements, and furniture, was considered entitled to the return of all the peasant's possessions upon the peasant's death. n208 Free peasant classes at various levels may have been made up of persons both descending and ascending the social scale, depending upon the economic fortune or vicissitudes they had encountered. And the presence of slaves in Anglo-Saxon England was pervasive:

> At the time of the Norman conquest personal servitude was widespread in England. More than 25,000 slaves (servi) were enumerated in Domesday Book. Men had been enslaved through war, capture in raids, sale by their families in time of need, and as a punishment for serious crimes ... How far manumissions kept pace with fresh enslavements is uncertain; it may be true that slavery was declining by the middle of the eleventh century, under pressure from economic change no less than ecclesiastical opposition. Even so, the Norman conquest was the first conquest that did not lead to an increase in the number of slaves. n209

These Anglo-Saxon arrangements for landholding, for the most part acknowledged only by immemorial custom, persisted through the Norman Conquest and into the period of common law development. They were the background and the foundation for the common law of property. Because bookland, laenland, and folkland are the only manifestations of a systematic approach to land law in Anglo-Saxon times, the next paragraphs will review what additional detail is known about these forms of property interests.

§ 3.05(e)(1) Bookland.

Anglo-Saxon bookland was entirely a creature of written instruments, called charters, that were eventually kept together in bound groups called books. The earliest charters were used for grants of land by the king either directly to the church or to a lay person for church-related purposes.

The practice of using charters was likely ecclesiastical in origin as well as impetus, probably having been introduced by the Roman missionaries sent to the pagan Anglo-Saxons. The earliest charters were written in the same script and in the same language (Latin) as other monastic documents, on the same type of material (vellum), with phrases threatening violators of charter covenants with religious rather than secular punishments, and whose uses were almost exclusively to convey land interests from a king to or for a religious institution. The "formulas" (standard phrasing of the operative provisions) were very similar to those used by the Roman Pope Gregory I, who sent the first Roman missionaries to the Anglo-Saxon King Aethelberht; this suggests that the very idea of using charters may have been introduced by the Italian missionaries sent to England. n210 As to the actual writing of the charters, "[u]ntil the tenth century, at least, it seems in fact that the writing of charters was the responsibility of the local bishop, the local abbot or their scribes [rather than the king's own clerks] (the important proviso being that such men were often in attendance on the king)." n211

While several scholars have been tempted to interpret charter conveyances under a uniform and consistent set of rules, it is likely impossible to ascribe a standard set of property rights as subject to conveyance by charter. Often the terminology in the charters is ambiguous and inconsistent. Under the assumption that by the 8th century A.D., when the earliest extant charters are dated, all occupied lands were subject to certain types of service (such as military service, road building, and fortress maintenance), it has been theorized that charters normally gave relief or immunity from such burdens. In fact, wording conferring such immunity does appear in later charters, but is absent from the earlier charters. This suggests that the earliest charters did nothing more than affirmatively convey the food-rent of an estate, known as the feorm.

The tenurial character of bookland also cannot be identified with certainty. The charter may have been used at first to ensure the ecclesiastical grantee that the grant would not be revoked. If early Anglo-Saxon land practices conformed to traditional Germanic practices, then certain lands -- held by kinship groups -- could be transferred only by inheritance within the group, but could not be alienated outside the group without group assent. Thus land granted to the church would have come from other, alienable lands held by the king, but there is some evidence that such acquired property interests could be later revoked by the royal grantor. n212 By use of the charter, the grantee's interest in such acquired property could be made perpetual, with documentary evidence against any presumed royal right to revoke. Such permanent transfers inevitably meant that kings drew upon a diminishing reserve of land with which to reward faithful followers; according to earlier practice, kings could withdraw previous conveyances and reconvey those lands to others.

Even these conveyances out of the royal demesne might sometimes find their way back into the holdings of inheritable kinship property. It appears that on occasion a grantee of bookland, perhaps an abbot who obtained the land for ecclesiastical purposes, passed the land on to his son who also succeeded him as abbot, whereupon the land began to be treated as inheritable kinship property with rights of the kindred attached. n213 Some evidence suggests that it was common practice for a prominent family to use the charter as a means of enhancing its land holdings by using bookland to found a monastery and then retaining governance of the monastery within the family:

> Bede's last work, a letter to Bishop Egbert written in the year before the pallium was sent to York, is heavy with foreboding. He deplored the profusion of land-grants which had left the kings without a reserve from which to maintain the class on which the safety of the realm depended, and he denounced in strong terms the connivance of church and state which permitted local magnates to turn their establishments into sham monasteries and thus to evade their public liabilities. n214

Apparently it later became acceptable to limit a conveyance by bookland to inheritability only with the kin. Thus a 9th century A.D. law of Alfred the Great prohibits a landholder from alienating bookland that was obtained under such a limitation. n215

Because most of the land "conveyed" by a charter would already be occupied by others, the effect of the charter might be better characterized as simply a surrender of royal rights:

> [T]hese charters always take the form of a simple conveyance of land, and ignore the fact that the gifts which they record mean, in effect, the alienation of rights by a king for the benefit of a subject. The rights themselves are expressed in the vaguest of words, which often amount to nothing more than a statement that the land at issue is to be free from all earthly service, qualified by certain reservations in the king's interest... For the rest, the king makes no attempt to intervene between the lord and the men who are to be under his authority ... The exaction of the ancient food-rents and services by which a new lord will henceforward profit can safely be left to the control of a custom which is none the less valid because it has never been reduced to writing ...
>
> Charters of this type generally include a clause stating that the recipient of the estate may alienate or bequeath it in his will. n216

It has been stated that "nothing but a royal charter could free land from the king's dues and services, and defeat the claims of expectant heirs." n217 In one surviving charter the king grants land to himself for the express purpose of removing certain secular burdens from the land, so the king can thereafter convey the land to another free of such obligations. n218

By the end of the eighth century A.D., charters were beginning to be used for purely secular grants. Sometimes the terms of the charter indicate that money has been paid, and presumably money may have been paid even in many cases where payment was not mentioned in the charter:

> The advantage to the receiver of having land which he could alienate at will and which was free from royal dues is obvious, and he was willing to pay for it. Moreover, to the king who made it, a grant of bookland may have afforded a means of rewarding his thanes and others for services rendered, or of raising ready money. The king always retained the jurisdiction over those men who held bookland, which meant that if any of them committed a deed which involved forfeiture, the land came into the king's hands. n219

Keeping in mind that conveyancing practices involving bookland and probably even the incidents of bookland changed over the centuries of the Anglo-Saxon age, it may still be helpful to make a general statement about the property rights associated with bookland. n220 Probably the estates created by bookland were allodial, which is to say that the owner did not hold the estate of any superior owner. Bookland was probably conveyed by delivery of the book and perhaps some additional ceremony signifying corporeal delivery of the land. Such a ceremony may have been similar to the later livery of seisin, during which the parties went on to the land and in the sight of witnesses exchanged possession of a dirt clod or similar object. No new book or deed would be required. Bookland probably carried with it the rights to alienate or devise, but subject to certain customary protections for heirs. However, if the charter specifically conferred rights of alienation and devise, as many but not all did, then transfer could occur without restraint from heirs. If a bookland owner died intestate, the bookland would pass to heirs, usually but not always to sons in equal shares. Rights of Anglo-Saxon women in land generally are discussed elsewhere. n221

The charters and incidents of bookland continued after the Norman Conquest, but not for long:

> The system of making grants by written instruments went on unchecked until, with the advent of the Normans and the system of feudal tenures, the old significance of the Anglo-Saxon book, as well as the name, almost disappeared. The importance of the book primarily lay in its opposition to the old Germanic customs and principles, and in the protection it afforded against the claims recognized by that system. When each and every estate formed but one link in the great feudal chain, there was no longer any use in the book as the Anglo-Saxons conceived it. The only characteristic it retained was as an evidence of title. Charters and deeds went on accumulating in great abundance, but the old Saxon book perished with the Conquest. In all Domesday, there is but one estate of boc-land mentioned... There was > but one object left for a written instrument, to evidence title; and the Norman charters fulfilled that object. n222

§ 3.05(e)(2) Folkland.

Folkland, or "folcland," is of uncertain status in Anglo-Saxon property law. It may have been virtually any land not considered bookland, and thus still subject to alienation restrictions and to customary obligations and dues. n223

The documentary references to folkland are few and inde-terminative. The most authoritative statement on folkland is in a passage from the laws of Edward the Elder, issued ca. A.D. 900-925:

> 2. Further, we have declared what [penalty] he is liable to, who withholds from another his rights either in "bookland" or "folkland," And with regard to the "folkland" [we have declared] that he [the plaintiff] shall appoint a day when he [the defendant] shall do him justice in the presence of the reeve.
>
> > § 1. If, however, he [the plaintiff] does not obtain his rights either in "bookland" or "folkland," he [the defendant] who withholds the rights shall forfeit a fine of 30 shillings to the king, and 30 shillings also on the second occasion, and on the third occasion the fine for insubordination to the king, that is 120 shillings, unless he has already desisted [from his wrong-doing]. n224

A second reference is in the will of a 9th century A.D., ealdorman named Alfred, who bequeathed bookland to his son, expecting that the king would make an additional grant of folkland to the son. If the king were not forthcoming, the son would receive additional bookland from the testator's wife. n225 As viewed by Stenton:

> These terms show that a nobleman might hold both bookland and folkland, and suggest that while he was free to dispose of his bookland by will, he had no such power over his folkland... [T]his famous reference to folkland and bookland does little more than emphasize the contrast between these terms which is generalized in the laws of Edward the Elder. n226

As related by another charter, the king of Kent in A.D. 858, gave land to his minister Wulflaf in exchange for other land. The land that the king received in exchange was turned into folkland by the king for himself. n227 Again, according to Stenton:

> The whole tenor of the document shows that this transaction meant the imposition of public burdens on land which had previously been exempt from them, and that the king was compensating himself for the loss of feorm [food rents] and service from Wassingwell [the land given in the exchange] by imposing these burdens on the land at Mersham [the land received in the exchange]... To the man who wrote this endorsement, folkland meant land from which the king drew food-rents and customary services. n228

Pollock and Maitland pointed out that several gratuitous assumptions about folkland and been advanced and refuted during the 19th century, and concluded:

> Folk-land is a term which occurs only in a few documents, and then without any decisive explanation. In the most authoritative of these, a law of Edward the Elder, it is contrasted with book-land as if it included all land that was not book-land. Spelman, so reading the passage, defined folk-land as land held by common, that is customary law, without written title... Folk-land, then, appears to have been, as Spelman said, land held without written title under customary law. We have no right to assume that there were not varieties of tenure within this general description, or that custom was uniform even in > the same kingdom. It is probable that the alienation of folk-land was difficult, and we do not know to what extent, if to any considerable extent, power to dispose of it by will had been introduced. n229

Another historian was of the view that folkland generally was alienable but subject to rights of heirs, and speculated that at least some folkland was held as "freehold allodial estates under the customary law": n230

> Folkland is the term applied to all land held in these ways under the customary law. By far the greater part of it was land held by village freemen subject to the common-field method of agriculture; and, to that extent, its ownership was limited by the customary rights of the community. That it descended to the heirs of the owner, his sons, on his death in equal shares, there can be no doubt. We have little or no direct evidence of the rules of law which determined the incidents of ownership of folkland; but in view of what we find existing after the Conquest, the inference is unavoidable that the freeholder could convey his land subject to restrictions, concerning the details of which we know nothing definitely, to his heirs ... [T]he general power of alienation which we find existing after the Conquest, subject to these restrictions in favor of heirs only, leads strongly ... to the conclusion that folkland could be conveyed, probably with some sort of ceremony involving formal renunciation by the donor and formal taking of possession by the donee, in the presence of neighbors through whom the transaction could subsequently be proved. n231

Whatever were the precise incidents of folkland, it surely made up the largest portion of occupied English lands, and was likely the direct source of the landholding rights that prevailed in most areas during the decades immediately following the Norman Conquest.

§ 3.05(e)(3) Laenland.

Late in the Anglo-Saxon era, documentary references to a type of landholding known as "laenland" occur. "Laen" is related to the modern German Lehn, or loan, and this type of property interest may be accurately described as "loaned" land. Laenland was a "grant of land for temporary use, made usually by the church or other holder of bookland, just as the book, or charter, creating bookland estates was usually made by the king." n232

The most explicit reference to laenland in Anglo-Saxon charters is an account by Bishop Oswald of Worcester, explaining how the church planned to lease or lend some of its lands to private parties. n233 Another charter refers to laenland descending to the cathedrals at Canterbury and Rochester. n234 From these documents it has been generalized that laenland was given in imitation of bookland charters, creating subordinate interests in prominent persons who themselves were not the actual occupants of the land. The grants varied in duration from one to three lives, and drew either periodic rent, a lump sum payment, or rendering of services. n235 It has also been theorized that the laenland device could have been widely used by all types of landholders to let out their lands on short terms under oral leases, especially since producing writings of any kind would have been difficult in that era. n236 Because these land loans were not always coincident with customary tenurial incidents "it must have been possible for a peasant to acknowledge one man as his lord and to rent land from two or three other landlords." n237

As far as the documentary evidence is concerned, in the terminology of later medieval times, bookland could be described generally as the land received from the king by tenants-in-chief, while laenland would be the land held of tenants-in-chief by lesser lords. n238 However, there is virtually no evidence in Domesday Book or any other early post-Conquest source that laenland holding was widespread or that it carried over into post-Conquest landholding practices in some modified form. The scarcity of direct evidence and the speculative nature of theories about laenland has opened and left unresolved a scholarly debate over whether laenland represented an incipient form of Anglo-Saxon feudalism, well-entrenched in the generations before the Norman Conquest. If one limits the concept of feudal tenures to fee interests requiring military or other knightly service, then these laenland tenures were probably not feudal: they do not appear to be fee interests, and the consideration given for the grants was usually something other than a commitment for military service. n239 However, whether or not denominated as feudal, and whether commonly or rarely occurring, laenland appears clearly as a form of landholding based on services and other consideration in addition to or other than customary tenurial incidents. If laenland was not proto-feudalism, it might well have been the beginnings of landlord-tenant law.

§ 3.05(f) Rights of Women Under Anglo-Saxon Property Law.

As would have been true in the warrior societies of Dark Age Europe generally, Anglo-Saxon women were in most respects subordinate to men. However, as the rule of law emerged in Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, a certain evenhandedness regarding gender was a characteristic feature of the English legal codes and customs. This is perhaps no more clearly manifest than in matters of property rights.

Much information about rights of women under Anglo-Saxon property law can be gleaned from the charters. It is possible that the property rights of women apparent in these charters applied only to women of the social class that would normally use such charters, but there is in fact no evidence that the rough parity of gender before the law manifest in these documents was not a characteristic of Anglo-Saxon society generally. n240

In these instruments women appear in the capacities of grantor, n241 grantee, n242 vendor, n243 vendee, n244 plaintiff, n245 defendant, n246 testatrix, n247 and devisee n248 with no apparent distinctions in substance, form or procedure made on account of gender. In Anglo-Saxon legal proceedings, a woman was qualified to be a witness n249 or an oath-helper n250 in the same way as was a man.

In most respects this status of apparent equality prevailed even for married women. A husband could convey bookland to his wife. n251 Husband and wife could join as vendors, n252 grantors, n253 devisors, n254 and be joined as vendees, n255 grantees, n256 and devisees. n257

Less, however, is known about a married woman's rights in lands received as dowry, morning-gift or in some form of marriage settlement. Germanic custom concerning the commitment for marriage is a necessary background for understanding of this subject. Several references to marriage as a sale appear in various Anglo-Saxon dooms, n258 but it may be doubted that the transaction was as crass as sale of a chattel; perhaps it should be viewed more as a transfer of the rights of guardianship.

Guardianship in Germanic law was one respect in which women were categorically subordinated to men. It was axiomatic that a woman should be under the guardianship of a male, and the time of marriage marked the transfer of guardianship responsibilities and rights from the father to the new husband. That the references to Anglo-Saxon marriage or betrothal as a "sale" are really references to transfer of guardianship finds support in the fact that, in Germanic custom generally, the price paid was not derived from bargaining, but was simply the wergild of the bride, as fixed by her social status. The marriage price would be paid on the occasion of betrothal, and a woman who was untrue to her betrothal would owe a sum equal to her marriage price. Also, the guardian of the bride could not be compelled to specific performance, as it were, but only to pay damages in breach of contract n259 if he failed to complete the transaction. n260

The betrothal customs described in the preceding paragraph, which prevailed among Germanic tribes generally, had been altered slightly among the Anglo-Saxons as early as the 8th century A.D. n261 The Anglo-Saxon dooms show that, at least in some cases, the price was no longer paid at the betrothal, but only promised; instead a nominal sum of earnest money was paid to the guardian at the time of betrothal. n262 Also, when the full price was eventually paid, it was given directly to the bride rather than to the guardian. n263 Thus, over many generations, the characteristics of a sale that had previously attached to arrangements of marriage had been transformed into the characteristics of a contract.

The price of the betrothal, which custom eventually directed to be paid at the time of marriage, was only one endowment for the bride. It became, by comparison, of little importance in relation to the other bridal endowment, the so-called Morgengabe or morning-gift. The morning-gift was originally a free-will gift by the husband to the bride on the morning after the bridal night. n264 Consisting at first of chattels, it later came to be considered as a form of widow's maintenance, and thus was necessarily property of sufficient value to sustain the wife if she survived her husband. The morning-gift, therefore, came to be almost always a gift of land, normally granted at the time of betrothal by means of a written document (to prove ownership after the husband's death); alternatively, if a specific morning-gift were not granted at the betrothal or beginning of the marriage, then a certain portion of the husband's property, usually one-half, was assigned by law for maintenance of the bride if she became a widow.

Among the Germanic tribes on the continent, the bridal price and morning-gift, both promised at the time of betrothal, eventually merged and, on the continent, became the dower. In Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, the two gifts did not merge, but the morning-gift was clearly the more important of the endowments. By law and custom the morning-gift, usually one-half of the husband's property, was assured to the widow from a childless marriage. Approximately the same division of property was observed even if both husband and wife remained alive and married: if one or more live children were born to the marriage, then the couple held their real property as community property. Personal property was also held in community, even if no children were born. n265

Although the wife was considered under the guardianship of the husband, she was quite independent as to the household, as may be inferred from the following provisions of Cnut's laws regarding liability for stolen property brought into the house by the husband:

> 76. Concerning stolen goods.
>
> If anyone carries stolen goods home to his cottage and is detected, the law is that (the owner) shall have what he has tracked.
>
> § 1. And unless the goods had been put under the wife's lock and key, she shall be clear [of any danger of complicity].
>
> § 1a. But it is her duty to guard the keys of the following -- her storeroom and her chest and her cupboard. If the goods have been put in any of these, she shall be held guilty ... n266

Upon the husband's death, the widow became the owner of all property she had obtained by inheritance or gift as well as the morning-gift, either as described by charter, or, in the absence of charter, usually one-half of the husband's property. n267 Unless the wife's ownership rights in the morning-gift had been limited when given by the husband, the wife had full ownership, with power to dispose of it by conveyance n268 or devise. n269 However, a widow was required to remain chaste and unmarried for at least a year after her husband's death, and for violation of this restriction, all her property would be forfeited to her husband's next of kin; n270 accordingly, if she did not violate that restriction, the property was fully hers to take into her next marriage. n271 According to the laws of Cnut, if the wife was unfaithful to the husband, all her property was forfeited to her husband. n272 If the couple divorced by mutual consent and the children remained with the wife, she took half the property; if the children remained with the husband, the wife took only a child's portion of the property. n273

Apart from the above minutiae of Anglo-Saxon custom and law regarding women's property rights, one may conclude generally that women enjoyed a higher status and stronger property rights during the Anglo-Saxon centuries than during the high Middle Ages following the Norman Conquest in A.D. 1066. n274

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 75. Peter Hunter Blair, The World of Bede 49-67 (1971).

(n2)Footnote 76. See also Daniel R. Coquillette, The Lessons of Anglo-Saxon "Justice," 2 Green Bag 2d 251 (Spring 1999).

(n3)Footnote 77. While the precise derivation and contemporary meaning of "doom" cannot be ascertained, it appears that the term is of purely Germanic origin and in general refers to a thing that is set up or established. See 3 Oxford English Dictionary 600-601 (1933).

(n4)Footnote 78. A. W. B. Simpson, "The Laws of Aethelberht," in On the Laws and Customs of England: Essays in Honor of Samuel E. Thorne 5 (Morris S. Arnold et al. eds., 1981). Daniel R. Coquillette, The Lessons of Anglo-Saxon "Justice," 2 Green Bag 2d 251, Spring 1999.

(n5)Footnote 79. According to Bede, Aethelberht had his code drawn up "according to the example of the Romans." Bede, Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum ii.5.

> [I]t is possible to detect parallels, between his code and seventh-century Continental laws; yet it and the others are in the vernacular. They give the impression of a sophisticated and wide-ranging approach to the establishment of custom and royal right; Aethelbert's code is well-organized, and some of its gaps are filled by his successors in Kent ... But gaps remain (for example on land tenure) ... In the end these codes, like their Continental counterparts, seem to be attempts to civilize the image of Germanic kings by giving them a role for which Roman emperors were famous; it was thus more important to write something of a people's custom or a king's judgements down, than to organize the material in a comprehensive way.

Patrick Wormald, "The Age of Bede and Aethelbald," in The Anglo-Saxons 98 (James Campbell ed. 1982).

(n6)Footnote 80. Id. at 4. The Barbarian Laws discussed in § 3.03(b), supra, are known only through Latin manuscripts.

(n7)Footnote 81. The Laws of Aethelberht are of special interest as being the earliest document written in the English language. Some poems indeed, such as Beowulf, may have a longer history behind them, but it is highly improbable that they were committed to writing till a much later period. No other Teutonic language possesses any original records of equal antiquity, apart from short inscriptions. The remains of Gothic literature are indeed much older, but they consist entirely of translations, while the laws of the Continental Teutonic peoples, though they begin more than a century before Aethelberht's reign, are written in Latin down to comparatively late times.

The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 3 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n8)Footnote 82. Cf. Mary P. Richards, Anglo-Saxonism in the Old English Laws, in Anglo-Saxonism & The Construction of Social Identity 40 (Allen J. Frantzen & John D. Niles eds., 1997) (using the laws given by the Kentish kings to examine the Anglo-Saxon culture from which those laws sprang).

(n9)Footnote 83. Patrick Wormald, "The Age of Bede and Aethelbald," in The Anglo-Saxons 98-99 (James Campbell ed. 1982):

> The greatest difficulty posed by early codes (and one on which the texts themselves lend no assistance) is to decide whether what they describe is traditional custom or governmental innovation. Historians have therefore seen them either as evidence of the persistence of the society described by Tacitus, or as evidence of increasing royal power ...

> ... Ultimately, it does seem probable that being made solemnly and permanently responsible for the statement of the law enhanced a king's power. Law was issued in the king's name and became the king's, in a way it may not have been before and was never to be in Scandinavia. If the early laws are most important as evidence for a stage in the history of English society, they are also a powerful symbol of the post-conversion transformation of English kingship.

(n10)Footnote 84. A. W. B. Simpson, "The Laws of Aethelberht," in On the Laws and Customs of England: Essays in Honor of Samuel E. Thorne 15 (Morris S. Arnold et al. eds. 1981).

(n11)Footnote 85. H. G. Richardson & G. O. Sayles, Law and Legislation from Aethelberht to Magna Carta 1-13, 157-169 (1966).

(n12)Footnote 86. Clause 1 of the Laws of Aethelberht, while probably a later addition to the original dooms, gives extraordinary legal status to ecclesiastical persons and property and is included in the oldest surviving text of this code. See The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 5, Aethelberht cl. 10 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922). See also Charters of St. Augustine's Abbey, Canterbury and Minster-in-Thanet (Susan E. Kelly, Ed. 1995); N.J. Higham, The Convert Kings, Power and Religious Affiliation in Early Anglo-Saxon England (1997) (discussing the Christian influence on Anglo-Saxon law givers).

(n13)Footnote 87. A. W. B. Simpson, "The Laws of Aethelberht," in On the Laws and Customs of England: Essays in Honor of Samuel E. Thorne 5 (Morris S. Arnold et al. eds. 1981).

(n14)Footnote 88. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 5, Aethelberht cl. 1 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n15)Footnote 89. Id. at 5-7, cls. 2-12.

(n16)Footnote 90. Id. at 7, cls. 13-14.

(n17)Footnote 91. Id. at 7, cls. 15-16.

(n18)Footnote 92. Id. at 7-9, cls. 17, 27-29, 32.

(n19)Footnote 93. Id. at 7, cls. 18-20.

(n20)Footnote 94. Id. at 7-9, cls. 21-23, 25-26, 30.

(n21)Footnote 95. Id. at 7, cl. 24.

(n22)Footnote 96. Id. at 9, cl. 31; at 15, cls. 73-85.

(n23)Footnote 97. Id. at 9-15, cls. 33-72.

(n24)Footnote 98. Id. at 17, cls. 86-90.

(n25)Footnote 99. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 60 (1943):

> [D]espite Bede's statement that Aethelberht composed his dooms 'after the Roman manner', they shown no sign of Roman influence. It is unlikely that they owed anything definite to any model, and their general affinities lie, not with any law-book of the Western Empire, but with the Lex Salica, the great code which Clovis had issued for the Salian Franks. Even so, the affinities are in subject-matter and not in form; the Salic law is a far longer text than the ninety brief sections into which Aethelberht compressed his laws, and primitive as is the content of the Salic law, it was written in Latin. The Laws of Aethelberht were written in English, and are of unique interest as by far the earliest body of law expressed in any Germanic language.

(n26)Footnote 100. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 2 (F. M. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n27)Footnote 101. Id. at 19, Hlothhere and Eadric (introductory passage).

(n28)Footnote 102. Id. at 19, Hlothhere and Eadric cls. 1-4.

(n29)Footnote 103. Id. at 19, cl. 5.

(n30)Footnote 104. Id. at 19, cl. 6.

(n31)Footnote 105. Id. at 19, cl. 7.

(n32)Footnote 106. Id. at 21, cls. 8-10.

(n33)Footnote 107. Id. at 21, cl. 11.

(n34)Footnote 108. Id. at 21, cls. 12-15.

(n35)Footnote 109. Id. at 23, cl. 16.

(n36)Footnote 110. Id. at 2-3.

(n37)Footnote 111. Id. at 31, Wihtred cl. 28, and at 43, Ine cls. 20-21 (requiring a traveler to sound a warning when leaving the road).

(n38)Footnote 112. Id. at 25, Wihtred (introductory passage).

(n39)Footnote 113. Id. at 25, Wihtred cls. 1-2.

(n40)Footnote 114. Id. at 25-27, cls. 3-6.

(n41)Footnote 115. Id. at 27, cl. 7.

(n42)Footnote 116. Id. at 27, cl. 8.

(n43)Footnote 117. Id. at 27, cls. 9-11.

(n44)Footnote 118. Id. at 27, cls. 12-13.

(n45)Footnote 119. Id. at 27, cls. 14-15.

(n46)Footnote 120. Id. at 27-29, cls. 16-24.

(n47)Footnote 121. Id. at 29-31, cls. 25-27.

(n48)Footnote 122. Id. at 31, cl. 28.

(n49)Footnote 123. The most significant lost code is undoubtedly that of the great Mercian king Offa, which code Alfred included in the description of laws he relied on for his own code as among "the most just of the laws I have found...." The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 63 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n50)Footnote 124. Id. at 34.

(n51)Footnote 125. Id. at 37, Ine (introductory passage).

(n52)Footnote 126. Id. at 37, Ine cl. 1.

(n53)Footnote 127. Id. at 37, cl. 2

(n54)Footnote 128. Id. at 37, cl. 3.

(n55)Footnote 129. Id. at 37, cl. 4 at 57, cl. 61.

(n56)Footnote 130. Id. at 39, cl. 5.

(n57)Footnote 131. Id. at 39, cl. 6.

(n58)Footnote 132. Id. at 39-61, cls. 7, 10, 12, 14-18, 22, 24-25, 28-29, 36, 46-48, 53, 57, 72-73, 75. As if to confirm a continental genealogy for Anglo-Saxon laws, cl. 29 of Ine's Dooms, dealing with failure to return borrowed property, is very similar to cl. 52 of the Lex Salica, issued two centuries earlier. The need to issue positive law on this matter hints at the profound importance of possession in Germanic law.

(n59)Footnote 133. Id. at 39-57, cls. 8-9, 13, 19, 30, 35, 37, 41, 54, 62.

(n60)Footnote 134. Id. at 41, cl. 11.

(n61)Footnote 135. Id. at 43, cls. 20-21 (compare with cl. 28 of the dooms of Wihtred, id. at 31, cl. 28).

(n62)Footnote 136. Id. at 43-61, cls. 23, 32-34, 70-71, 74, 76.

(n63)Footnote 137. Id. at 45, cls. 26-27; at 49, cl. 38.

(n64)Footnote 138. Id. at 47, cl. 31.

(n65)Footnote 139. Id. at 49, cl. 39; at 57-59, cls. 63-66, 68.

(n66)Footnote 140. Id. at 49, cls. 40, 42, 49.

(n67)Footnote 141. Id. at 51, cls. 43-44.

(n68)Footnote 142. Id. at 51-52, cls. 45, 50.

(n69)Footnote 143. Id. at 53, cl. 51; at 59, cl. 67.

(n70)Footnote 144. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 309-310:

> According to Stenton, this passage implies that the tenant is clearly a freeman, for the conditions on which he takes his holding have been determined by agreement between him and his lord. But the land is plainly regarded as the lord's; he has planted the tenant upon it, and expects it to yield rent or labour at his discretion... The fact that the tenant must abandon the crops if he refuses the lord's claim to service strongly suggests that his yardland ... had originally been sown with this Lord's seed... In any case, the passage is of outstanding important as the first recorded example of a type of relationship between lord and man which during the next three centuries was to change the whole character of English rural society.

(n71)Footnote 145. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 53, Ine cl. 52 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans., 1922).

(n72)Footnote 146. Id. at 55, cls. 55-56 at 57, cls. 58-60.

(n73)Footnote 147. Id. at 59, cl. 69.

(n74)Footnote 148. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 71 (1943).

(n75)Footnote 149. D. P. Kirby, The Making of Early England 163 (1967).

(n76)Footnote 150. D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 133 (1973). See also Steven Bassett, The Origins of Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms (1989).

(n77)Footnote 151. See especially cl. 1 of the laws of Aethelberht, The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 5, Aethelberht cl. 1 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n78)Footnote 152. D. J. V. Fisher, The Anglo-Saxon Age c. 400-1042, 134 (1973). Another example of a king's use of royal officials to aid in public affairs is found in the laws of Ine, from which it may be inferred that ealdormen preside over courts, and that their verdicts must be obtained before redress can be sought. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 37, Ine cl. 1 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922). Valerie A. Sanchez, Towards a History of ADR: The Dispute Processing Continuum in Anglo-Saxon England and Today, 11 Ohio St. J. on Disp. Res. 1 (1996).

(n79)Footnote 153. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 302-303 (1943).

(n80)Footnote 154. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England," in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 458-462 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n81)Footnote 155. Id. at 459.

(n82)Footnote 156. 1 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 143, no. 99 (1885) (grant by Wihtred, King of Kent, on April 8, 699, A.D.); id. at 157, no. 108 (grant of privileges by King Ini [or Ine] on May 6, 704, A.D.).

(n83)Footnote 157. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England," in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 413 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n84)Footnote 158. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 406-407 (1943).

(n85)Footnote 159. 2 John Mitchell Kemble, The Saxons in England 53-55 (1876).

(n86)Footnote 160. See F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 262 (1943) (especially with respect to the so-called "Burghal Hidage"); Rutherford Aris and Bernard S. Bachrach, Military Technology and Garrison Organization: Some Observations on Anglo-Saxon Military Thinking in Light of the Burghal Hidage, 31 Tech. & Culture 1 (1990).

(n87)Footnote 161. Alfred's achievement in unifying English government and law was probably aided by the earlier unification of the English church. See H. P. R. Finberg, The Formation of England 550-1042, 51 (1974).

(n88)Footnote 162. 3 F. Felix Liebermann, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen 34 (1916).

(n89)Footnote 163. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 35 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n90)Footnote 164. Id. at 63, Alfred (introductory passage).

(n91)Footnote 165. Id. at 87-93, Alfred cls. 44-77.

(n92)Footnote 166. Id. at 83, cl. 41.

(n93)Footnote 167. Id. at 96-97, 99-101.

(n94)Footnote 168. The authenticity of the entire introduction is challenged in 3 F. Felix Liebermann, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen 87 (1916).

(n95)Footnote 169. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 97, 102-109 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n96)Footnote 170. Id. at 117, 1 Edw. cl. 2.

(n97)Footnote 171. Id. at 120, 2 Edw. cl. 5.

(n98)Footnote 172. Id. at 112.

(n99)Footnote 173. Id. at 112-113, 122-173.

(n100)Footnote 174. Id. at 129, II Aethelstan cl. 2.

(n101)Footnote 175. In addition to the more general works on Anglo-Saxons and on Anglo-Saxon law cited in this chapter, the problems of Anglo-Saxon property law have been addressed in Eric John, Land Tenure in Early England: A Discussion of Some Problems (2d ed. 1964).

(n102)Footnote 176. J. N. L. Myres, The English Settlements 36-40 (1986); F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 314, n. 1 (1943).

(n103)Footnote 177. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 289-290 (1943).

(n104)Footnote 178. D. P. Kirby, The Making of Early England 175-179 (1967).

(n105)Footnote 179. However, in recent years more attention has been given to Anglo-Saxon town studies generally. See, e.g., David Hill, "Towns as Structures and Functioning Communities through Time: The Development of Central Places from 600 to 1066," and Tim Tatton-Brown, "The Anglo-Saxon Towns of Kent," in Anglo-Saxon Settlements 197-212, 213-232 (Della Hooke ed. 1988).

(n106)Footnote 180. 1 F. Felix Liebermann, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen 232-237 (1903).

(n107)Footnote 181. Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 57-58 (2d ed. 1909).

(n108)Footnote 182. See, e.g., Erika Nagy, Fault in the Law: The Influence of the Penitentials on the Anglo-Saxon Legal System, 31 Cath. Law. 264 (1987).

(n109)Footnote 183. N.J. Higham, The Convert Kings, Power and Religious Affiliation in Early Anglo-Saxon England 34 (1997).

(n110)Footnote 184. Id.

(n111)Footnote 185. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England" in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 458 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n112)Footnote 186. Id. at 446.

(n113)Footnote 187. Id. at 444-445.

(n114)Footnote 188. H. P. R. Finberg, The Formation of England 550-1042, 92 (1974).

(n115)Footnote 189. 1 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 157, no. 108 (grant of May 26, 704, A.D.).

(n116)Footnote 190. Id. at 143, no. 99 (grant of April 8, 699, A.D.).

(n117)Footnote 191. Id. at 254, no. 178.

(n118)Footnote 192. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England" in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 459 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n119)Footnote 193. See, e.g., 1 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 390, no. 282 (grant by Brihtric, King of Wessex, in A.D. 801) (1885); 2 W. Birch, id. at 13, no. 438 (grant by Aethelwulf, King of the West Saxons, in A.D. 842) (1887).

(n120)Footnote 194. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England," in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 459 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972). See Della Hooke, The Landscape of Anglo-Saxon Staffordshire: The Charter Evidence (1983).

(n121)Footnote 195. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England," in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 461 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n122)Footnote 196. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 83, cl. 41 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n123)Footnote 197. Frederic William Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond 258-292 (1897); H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England," in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 464 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n124)Footnote 198. Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 61 (2d ed. 1909); see also 4(c)(4)(iii), supra.

(n125)Footnote 199. 3 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 321, no. 1091 (1893) (grant for life made by Bishop Oswald of Worcester in A.D. 962); id. at 382, no. 1136 (letter of Oswald, Bishop of Worcester, in A.D. 964). See also H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England," in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 521 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n126)Footnote 200. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 5-9, Aethelberht cls. 4, 6, 9, 24, 27, 29, 31 (all referring to a "freeman" or friman) (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n127)Footnote 201. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England," in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 514-515 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n128)Footnote 202. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 301-311 (1974).

(n129)Footnote 203. See generally F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 463-479 (1943).

(n130)Footnote 204. See, e.g., 3 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 111, no. 935 (1893) (grant by King Eadwig to Aelfwine in A.D. 956).

(n131)Footnote 205. H. P. R. Finberg, "King Alfred's England" in The Agrarian History of England and Wales A.D. 43-1042, 509-510 (H. P. R. Finberg ed. 1972).

(n132)Footnote 206. Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 37 (2d ed. 1909).

(n133)Footnote 207. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 313-314 (1943).

(n134)Footnote 208. In an eleventh-century treatise for reeves on estate management called "Rectitudines Singularum Personarum," it is stated that such a peasant should have received from his lord two oxen, a cow, six sheep, seven acres already sown upon his yardland, implements for his husbandry, and furniture for his house. 1 F. Felix Liebermann, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen 444-453 (1903); F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 467-468 (1943).

(n135)Footnote 209. Marjorie Chibnall, Anglo-Norman England 1066-1166 187-188 (1986).

(n136)Footnote 210. "[The charters] are an ecclesiastical importation, modelled on the late Roman private deed, and they show us that the consent of the king's council was obtained for the act of creating bookland." Dorothy Whitelock, The Beginnings of English Society 153 (1974).

(n137)Footnote 211. Patrick Wormald, "The Age of Bede and Aethelbald," in The Anglo-Saxons 97 (James Campbell ed. 1982). See also Daniel R. Coquillette, The Lessons of Anglo-Saxon "Justice," 2 Green Bag 2d 251, 252-253 (Spring 1999).

(n138)Footnote 212. Patrick Wormald, "The Age of Bede and Aethelbald," in The Anglo-Saxons 97 (James Campbell ed. 1982).

(n139)Footnote 213. See, e.g., 1 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 308, no. 220 (1885) (grant by Abbot Ceolfrith, A.D. 757).

(n140)Footnote 214. H. P. R. Finberg, The Formation of England 550-1042, 92 (1974).

(n141)Footnote 215. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 83, Alfred cl. 41 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n142)Footnote 216. See, e.g., 1 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 314, (1885) (grant by King Cynewulf to Earl Bica, A.D. 778); F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 303-304 (1943).

(n143)Footnote 217. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 304 (1943).

(n144)Footnote 218. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 33, no. 451 (1887) (grant by King Aethelwulf to himself, Dec. 26, A.D. 847).

(n145)Footnote 219. Dorothy Whitelock, The Beginnings of English Society 154 (1974).

(n146)Footnote 220. A model and the sources for the convenient but somewhat speculative summary in the text are cited in William F. Walsh, A History of Anglo-American Law 16-17 (2d. ed. 1950).

(n147)Footnote 221. See § 3.05(f), infra.

(n148)Footnote 222. H. Cabot Lodge, "The Anglo-Saxon Land Law," in Essays in Anglo-Saxon Law 112 (1905).

(n149)Footnote 223. Dorothy Whitelock, The Beginnings of English Society 154 (1974).

(n150)Footnote 224. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 117, I Edward cl. 2 (F. L. Attenborough, ed. & trans. 1922).

(n151)Footnote 225. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 195, no. 558 (1887) (will of Duke Alfred, A.D. 781).

(n152)Footnote 226. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 307 (1943).

(n153)Footnote 227. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 100, no. 496 (1887).

(n154)Footnote 228. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 307-308 (1943).

(n155)Footnote 229. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 61-62 (2d ed. 1909).

(n156)Footnote 230. William W. Walsh, A History of Anglo-American Law 33-34 (2d ed. 1932).

(n157)Footnote 231. Id. at 14-15.

(n158)Footnote 232. Id. at 18.

(n159)Footnote 233. 3 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 382, no. 1136 (1893) (letter of Oswald, Bishop of Worcester, to King Eadgar, describing the leasehold tenures of certain church lands, ca. A.D. 964).

(n160)Footnote 234. Id. at 328, no. 1097 (1893) (record of the descent of land to the Canterbury and Rochester cathedrals, ca. A.D. 965).

(n161)Footnote 235. William W. Walsh, A History of Anglo-American Law 19 (2d ed. 1932).

(n162)Footnote 236. Id. at 19-20. See discussion of Worcester laenland grants to women, priests, deacons, and clerks, in R. Allen Brown, Origins of English Feudalism 55-56 (1973).

(n163)Footnote 237. D. P. Kirby, The Making of Early England 228 (1967).

(n164)Footnote 238. Frederic William Maitland, Domesday Book and Beyond 314 (reprint 1966).

(n165)Footnote 239. R. Allen Brown, Origins of English Feudalism 54-64 (1973).

(n166)Footnote 240. Although the discussion in the text is drawn as much as possible from primary sources, or at least the English translations of primary sources, this topic has been the subject of recent writing. See, e.g., Christine E. Fell, Women in Anglo-Saxon England (1984); The Women of England: From Anglo-Saxon Times to the Present: Interpretive Bibliographic Essays (Barbara Kanner ed. 1979). See also Christine G. Clark, Women's Rights in Early England, 1995 Byu L. Rev. 207 ; C.M.A. McCauliffe, The Medieval Origin of the Doctrine of Estates in Land: Substantive Property Law, Family Considerations, and the Interests of Women, 66 Tulane L. Rev. 919 (March 1992).

(n167)Footnote 241. 1 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 552, No. 396 (1885) (grant of land by King Egbert, A.D. 830).

(n168)Footnote 242. Id. Two grants of laenland to women are discussed and documented in R. Allen Brown, Origins of English Feudalism 55-56 (1973).

(n169)Footnote 243. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, id. at 534, No. 789 (1887) (grant by King Edmund, A.D. 943); 4 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 789 (1846).

(n170)Footnote 244. Id.

(n171)Footnote 245. 3 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici Nos. 693, 704 (1845).

(n172)Footnote 246. Id.

(n173)Footnote 247. 1 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 575, No. 412 (1885) (will of the Reeve Abba, ca. A.D. 833); 3 Walter de Gray Birch, id. at 600, No. 1288 (1893) (will of Queen Aethelflaed); id. at 602, No.

1289 (will of Aelflaed).

(n174)Footnote 248. Id.

(n175)Footnote 249. 3 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici Nos. 693, 704 (1845).

(n176)Footnote 250. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 155, No. 537 (1887) (grant by King Athelred to Cuthulf, the thegn, A.D. 872); 3 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 693 (1845).

(n177)Footnote 251. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 86, No. 486 (1887) (grant by King Aethelwulf to his thegn Dunn; Dunn's devise of the land to his wife).

(n178)Footnote 252. Id. at 119, No. 509 (grant by King Burhred and Queen Aethelswyth, A.D. July 25, 864); id. at 141, No. 524 (grant by King Burgred and Queen Aethelsuith, A.D. 869).

(n179)Footnote 253. 4 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 796 (1846); 6 John M. Kemble, id. at No. 1340 (1848).

(n180)Footnote 254. 3 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 373, No. 1132 (1893) (will of Byrhtric and his wife Aelfswyth bequeathing real and personal property, A.D. 964); 4 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 971 (1846).

(n181)Footnote 255. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 92, No. 490 (grant by Alhwine to Aethelwulf and his wife Wulfthryth, A.D. 855).

(n182)Footnote 256. Id. at 465, No. 745 (grant by King Athelstan, ca. A.D. 929); 3 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 637 (1845).

(n183)Footnote 257. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 176, No. 553 (1887) (will of King Alfred, A.D. 880).

(n184)Footnote 258. See, e.g., The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 46-47 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922), Ine cl. 31 ("If anyone buys a wife and the marriage does not take place."); id. at 14-15, Aethelberht cl. 83 ("If she is betrothed, at a price, to another man."); id. at 8-9, Aethelberht cl. 31 ("If [one] freeman lies with the wife of [another] freeman, he shall pay [the husband] his [or her] wergeld, and procure a second wife with his own money, and bring her to the other man's home.).

(n185)Footnote 259. The price plus one third.

(n186)Footnote 260. Ernest Young, "The Anglo-Saxon Family Law," in Essays in Anglo-Saxon Law 164-165 (1905).

(n187)Footnote 261. See generally, Document 51 "Concerning the Betrothal of a Woman," (c. A.D. 975-1030), in 1 English Historical Documents 431 (David C. Douglas, gen. ed., Dorothy Whitelock ed. 1955). See also Mary Murray, The Law of The Father?: Patriarchy in the Transition from Feudalism to Capitalism (1994).

(n188)Footnote 262. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 46-47 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922), Ine cl. 31; 72-73, Alfred cl. 18 1 (1922).

(n189)Footnote 263. Alfred Eccl. Laws 12.

(n190)Footnote 264. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 225, No. 582 (1887) (settlement of land by Bishop Werferth on Eadnoth, A.D. 872); 4 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 867 (1846).

(n191)Footnote 265. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 54-57 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922), Ine cl. 57; 156-157, VI Aethelstan cl. 1, 1 (1922).

(n192)Footnote 266. The Laws of the Kings of England from Edmund to Henry I 213-215 (Agnes Jane Robertson ed. & trans. 1925), II Cnut cl. 76.

(n193)Footnote 267. The Laws of the Earliest Kings 14-15, Aethelberht cls. 78-81 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n194)Footnote 268. 2 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 236, No. 591 (1887) (letter to King Edward setting forth events connected with the tenure of land, ca. A.D. 901); 3 Walter de Gray Birch, id. at 653, No. 1318 (1893) (three-year lease of land); 3 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 704 (1845).

(n195)Footnote 269. 3 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 600, No. 1288 (1893) (will of Aethelflaed, queen of Edmund I); id. at 602, No. 1289 (will of Aelflaed, sister of Queen Aethelflaed); 6 John M. Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus Aevi Saxonici No. 1290 (1848).

(n196)Footnote 270. The Laws of the Kings of England from Edmund to Henry I 210-213, II Cnut cls. 73 and 73a (Agnes Jane Robertson ed. & trans. 1925).

(n197)Footnote 271. 3 Walter de Gray Birch, Cartularium Saxonicum 328, No. 1097 (1893) (record of the descent of land and related litigation).

(n198)Footnote 272. The Laws of the Kings of England from Edmund to Henry I 202-203, II Cnut cl. 53 (Agnes Jane Robertson ed. & trans. 1925).

(n199)Footnote 273. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings 14-15, Aethelberht cls. 79-80 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n200)Footnote 274. See Barbara Kanner, The Women of England: From Anglo-Saxon Times to the Present: Interpretive Bibliographical Essays (1980)."Women were judged differently from men in West Saxon lawcodes and generally not to their advantage." Barbara Yorke, Wessex in the Early Middle Ages 280-285 (1995). See also, Amy Louise Erickson, Women and Property in Early Modern England (1993).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 3.06

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.06 Impact of the Viking Invasions on Property Rights in Anglo-Saxon England.

Raids of Vikings in Anglo-Saxon England began sporadically as early as A.D. 787, n275 but the sack of the church foundations on the island of Lindisfarne in A.D. 793, n276 was the most stunning announcement of the new danger. These early raids, mostly by Norwegians, continued to be sporadic until about A.D. 835, whereafter regular accounts appear in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. The new raiders were mostly Danish and continued to be essentially small and highly mobile warbands, each of which was capable of ranging widely over Europe in a single season.

The raiding parties remained relatively small, n277 were seeking portable wealth, and did not come to settle. Not until A.D. 850-851, was a band of Danish Vikings reported as having wintered over in England. n278 Thereafter, the scale of Viking attacks increased, so that fleets of 150-250270 n279 ships became common, and the "great" Viking armies of A.D. 865271 n280 and 871,272 n281 divided up the land they conquered in Northumbria, n282 Mercia, n283 and East Anglia. n284

Of the great Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, only Wessex survived, and was itself subjected to several bloody battles in A.D. 871. Then in A.D. 878, the Danish King Guthrum launched a surprise attack against Alfred's forces that drove Alfred and a few supporters into hiding in the marshes of Somerset. Their guerrilla campaign begun at that time and ultimate triumph over Guthrum is justly celebrated, and Guthrum eventually withdrew to his secure eastern territories and accepted Christian baptism. Thus, during Alfred's lifetime, Wessex and part of Mercia were left intact as Anglo-Saxon domains, but Northumbria, East Anglia, and the rest of Mercia came under total Danish domination, known as the Danelaw. However, debate continues to this day over the density of Danish settlement in the Danelaw and the extent of Danish influence over property and other legal customs.

As to the Danish influence on Anglo-Saxon law, little change seems to have occurred. Even into the 11th century, when Cnut, a great Danish King of England, issued a law code, it was "in the full stream of English legal achievement," exhibiting no Danish idiosyncracies. n285 This characteristic has been explained by the fact that Danish traditions of kindred organizations, wergilds, and public assemblies were very similar to those of the English. Moreover, when the Danes who settled in eastern and northern England accepted Christianity, they implicitly accepted the body of law associated with the church and were exposed to English clergy, who were usually responsible for written legal records. n286

Nevertheless, a doom of Edgar declares "that secular rights be in force among the Danes according to as good laws as they can best decide on," n287 and Aethelred issued parallel codes for Englishmen and Danes. n288 Several distinctively Danish legal practices emerged in Anglo-Danish England. In land law, terminology was Danish, and there was heavy reliance on independent sureties for land transactions. Land measurement and assessment in the Danelaw were altered, and received a new vocabulary.

In procedure, a public prosecutor may have been utilized in Anglo-Danish areas. Twelve leading thegns (members of the aristocracy) in each borough went from the court and swore on relics that they would neither accuse any innocent person nor protect any guilty one. A majority of eight determined the presentments of this body. Differences in assessing fines and difficulties in reconciling disparate monetary units existed in the Danelaw. Compensation paid to a slain man's lord was based on the victim's status, whereas in English areas that amount was determined by the lord's rank. A greater penalty was assigned for breach of the king's peace in the Danelaw, suggesting it was more highly valued (or more readily broken).

Most significantly, the Danes in England appear to have had a much greater proportion of free peasants in the areas they dominated. Historians are divided over whether this social difference was directly related to Scandinavian settlement or arose from regional peculiarities in place before the Danes arrived. It is appealing to attribute this freedom to "the infusion of large numbers of Scandinavian farmer warriors with their traditions of independence, reinforced by their nature as colonists." n289 Danes also made significant contributions to urban growth in England, particularly in York. n290

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 275. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 53 annal 787.

(n2)Footnote 276. Id. at 54 annal 793.

(n3)Footnote 277. The evidence suggests that the early raiding parties seldom consisted of more than fifty ships, and such ships would carry hardly more than thirty warriors, even without horses, slaves or other cargo.

(n4)Footnote 278. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 62-63 annal 850.

(n5)Footnote 279. The raid of A.D. 893, is reported to have been conducted with 330 ships.

(n6)Footnote 280. So described in The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle 66-67 annal 865.

(n7)Footnote 281. See Id. at 68-69 annal 871.

(n8)Footnote 282. Id. at 72-73 annal 876.

(n9)Footnote 283. Id. at annal 877.

(n10)Footnote 284. Id. at 74-75 annal 879.

(n11)Footnote 285. Henry Royston Loyn, The Vikings in Britain 125 (1977). See Charlotte Neff, Scandinavian Elements in the Wantage Code of Aethelred II, 10 J. Legal Hist. 285 (1989). Loyn has written a subsequent book to include significant advances in the knowledge of the Viking world from the time his first book was published. Henry Royston Loyn, The Vikings in Britain 128 (1994).

(n12)Footnote 286. Henry Royston Loyn, The Vikings in Britain 125-127 (1977). See also Scandinavian Settlement in Northern Britain (Barbara E. Crawford, ed. 1995); David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History, Part I: The Shared History, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J 143 (1999).

(n13)Footnote 287. "Edgar's Code Issued at 'Wihtbordesstan,' " in 1 English Historical Documents 399, cl. 2.1 (David C. Douglas ed. 1955); 1 F. Felix Liebermann, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen 211 (1903).

(n14)Footnote 288. See, e.g., "King Ethelred's Code Issued at Wantage," in 1 English Historical Documents 402-405 (David C. Douglas ed. 1955); 1 F. Felix Liebermann, Die Gesetze der Angelsachsen 228-233 (1903).

(n15)Footnote 289. Henry Royston Loyn, The Vikings in Britain 132 (1977).

(n16)Footnote 290. Id. at 135-137.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 3.07

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 3.07 Bibliography.

[Go To Supp]

Books

Ables, Richard Phillip. Alfred the Great: War, Kingship, and Culture in Anglo-Saxon England (London: Longman, 1998).

Appleby, John C. Government, Religion, and Society in Northern England, 1000-1700 (1997).

Aslam, Jeremy. Anglo-Saxon Towns in Southern England (1984).

Barrell, Harry Ferdinand. An Outline of Anglo-Saxon Law (1999).

Blair, Peter Hunter. Roman Britain and Early England: 55 B.C. - A.D. 871 (1963).

Blair, W. John. The Anglo-Saxon Age: a Very Short Introduction (2000).

Bonser, W. Anglo-Saxon and Celtic Bibliography (450-1087) (1957).

Brower, Adrienne. Over Countless Waves upon England's Shore: a Look at the Legal Progress from Britain's First Peoples to the Norman Conquest, and Why Anglo-Saxon Law Is the True Root of England's Common Law (1999).

Brown, Michelle. Mercia, An Anglo-Saxon Kingdom in Europe (2001).

Campbell, James. The Anglo-Saxon State (2000).

Charles-Edwards, T.M., P. Sawyer, ed. The Distinction between Land and Moveable Wealth in Anglo-Saxon England's Medieval Settlement (1976).

Collingwood, R. G. (Robin George). Roman Britain and the English Settlements (1937).

Cramp, Rosemary (ed.). Corpus of Anglo-Saxon Stone Sculpture in England (1984).

Diamond, Jared M. Collapse: How Societies Choose to Fail or Succeed (2005).

Diamond, Jared M. Guns, Germs, and Steel : The Fates of Human Societies (1997).

Essays in Anglo-Saxon Law (1905).

Dos Passos, John R. The Anglo-Saxon Century and the Unification of the English-Speaking People. (1903).

Fisher, D. J. V. The Anglo-Saxon Age, c. 400-1042 (1973).

Fletcher, Richard A. Bloodfeud: Murder and Revenge in Anglo-Saxon England (2003).

Frantzen, Allen J. Anglo-Saxonism and the Construction of Social Identity (1997).

Hayashi, Hiroshi. Essays in Anglo-Saxon Law (1989).

Heywood, Samuel. A Dissertation upon the Distinctions in Society, and Ranks of the People, under the Anglo-Saxon Governments (1818).

Hill, Paul. The Road to Hastings: The Politics of Power in Anglo-Saxon England (Stroud, Gloucestershire: Tempus, 2005).

Hines, John, ed. The Anglo-Saxons From the Migration Period to the Eighth Century: an Ethnographic Perspective (1997).

Hooke, Della. The Landscape of Anglo-Saxon England (1998).

Hooke, Della. Anglo-Saxon Settlements (1988).

Hunter Blair, Peter. An Introduction to Anglo-Saxon England (1977).

John, Eric. Land Tenure in Early England, a Discussion of Some Problems (1960).

Kelly, S. E. (ed.). Charters of Shaftesbury Abbey 1996).

Kerr, Mary. Anglo-Saxon Architecture (1983).

Kynell, Kurt von S. Saxon and Medieval Antecedents of the English Common Law (2000).

Laing, Lloyd Robert. Anglo-Saxon England (1979).

Lapidge, Michael (ed.). The Blackwell Encyclopedia of Anglo-Saxon England (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 1999).

Loyn, H. R. (Henry Royston). Anglo-Saxon England and the Norman Conquest (1991).

Loyn, H. R. (Henry Royston). The Governance of Anglo-Saxon England, 500-1087 (1984).

Loyn, H.R. The Vikings in Britain (London: Batsford, 1977).

Lees, Clare A. and Gillian R. Overing (eds). A Place to Believe In: Locating Medieval Landscapes (2006).

Mann, Charles C. 1491 : New Revelations of the Americas Before Columbus (2005).

Michelet, Fabienne L. Creation, Migration, and Conquest: Imaginary Geography and Sense of Space in Old English Literature (2006).

Oliver, Lisa, The Beginnings of English Law (2002).

Pipes, Richard. Property and Freedom (1999).

Reed, M., ed. "Anglo-Saxon Charter Boundaries", Discovering Past Landscapes (1984).

Rumble, Alexander (ed.). Writing and Texts in Anglo-Saxon England (2006).

Seebohm, Frederic. Tribal Custom in Anglo-Saxon Law; Being an Essay Supplemental To: (1) the English Village Community, (2) the Tribal System in Wales (1972).

Simon, Edith. The Anglo-Saxon Manner: the English Contribution to Civilization (1972).

Smith, Henry E. "Exclusion Versus Governance: Two Strategies for Delineating Property Rights," 31 J. Legal Stud. 453 (June, 2002).

Stenton, F.M. Anglo-Saxon England (1971).

Stenton, F.M. The Latin Charters of the Anglo-Saxon Period (1955).

Szarmach, Paul E. (ed.). Sources of Anglo-Saxon Culture (1986).

Tapp, Sidney Calhoun. The Story of Anglo-Saxon Institutions; or, the Development of Constitutional Government (1904).

Walsh, William Francis. A History of Anglo-American Law (1950). Book 2. Origins and Development of the Law of Property.

Welch, Martin G. Discovering Anglo-Saxon England (1992).

Whitelock, Dorothy. History, Law and Literature in 10th-11th Century England (1981).

Wormald, Patrick. "Charters, Law and the Settlement of Disputes in Anglo-Saxon England," in Wendy Davies and Paul Fouracre (eds.), The Settlement of Disputes in Early Medieval Europe (1986).

Articles

Bosselman, Fred P. "Limitations Inherent in the Title to Wetlands at Common Law," 15 Stan. Envtl. L. J. 247 (June 1996).

Campbell, James. "The Sale of Land and the Economics of Power in Early England: Problems and Possibilities." The Haskins Society Journal: Studies in Medieval History 1 (1989).

Coquillette, Daniel R. The Lessons of Anglo-Saxon Justice, 2 Green Bag 251 (Spring 1999).

Lefroy, A. H. F. "The Anglo-Saxon Period of English Law," 26 Yale L.J. 291 (Feb. 1917).

Lefroy, A. H. F. "The Anglo-Saxon Period of English Law," 26 Yale L.J. 388 (Mar. 1917).

Sanchez, Valerie A. "Towards a History of ADR: The Dispute Processing Continuum in Anglo-Saxon England and Today, " 11 Ohio St. J. on Disp. Resol. 1 (1996).

Senn, Mark A. "Reflections on Some Forgotten Terms of Land Measurement," 16 Probate & Property 8 (Mar./Apr. 2002).

Thomas, David A. "Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History Part I: The Shared History, " 34 Real Prop., Prob. and Trust J. 143 (Spring, 1999).

Thomas, David A. "Why the Public Plundering of Private Property Rights Is Still a Very Bad Idea," 41 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 25 (Spring, 2006).

Zaher, Claudia.. "When a Woman's Marital Status Determined Her Legal Status: A Research Guide on the Common Law Doctrine of Coverture," 94 Law Libr. J. 459 (Summer, 2002).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Supp. To CHAPTER 3 PROPERTY RIGHTS IN ANGLO-SAXON ENGLAND

1-3 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Supp. to § 3.07

Supp. to § 3.07 Bibliography

[Go To Main]

Books

add:

Bonfield, Lloyd (ed). Marriage, Property and Succession (1992) (see especially chapter by Lloyd Bonfield, "Property Settlements on Marriage in England from the Anglo-Saxons to the Mid-Eighteenth Century").

Cross, Lord, or Chelsea and G. J. Hands (eds.). The English Legal System (5th ed., 1971), describing Anglo-Saxon property law, beginning at p. 5).

Lee, F. N. King Alfred the Great and Our Common Law (2000).

Articles

add:

Clark, Christine G. "Women's Rights in Early England," 1995 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 207.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions 4.syn

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.syn Synopsis to Chapter 4: THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

§ 4.01 Introduction.

§ 4.02 Summary of Property Rights in Late Anglo-Saxon England.

§ 4.02(a) Egalitarian Quality of Early Settlements and Land Rights.

§ 4.02(b) Specialization of Property Interests.

§ 4.02(c) Stratified Society and Property Rights.

§ 4.02(d) Anglo-Saxon Property Rights as the Foundation for the Common Law of Property.

§ 4.03 Summary of Property Rights Among the Pre-Conquest Normans.

§ 4.03(a) Origins of the Normans.

§ 4.03(b) Sketch of Scandinavian Law.

§ 4.03(c) Changes in Norman Legal Customs After the Settlement of Normandy.

§ 4.04 Impact of the Norman Conquest on the Development of English Law.

§ 4.04(a) The Course of the Conquest.

§ 4.04(a)(1) Norman Influence in England Before 1066.

§ 4.04(a)(2) William's Claim to and Conquest of the English Throne.

§ 4.04(a)(3) Norman Settlement of England After the Conquest.

§ 4.04(b) Norman Legal and Administrative Activities.

§ 4.04(b)(1) Local Government and Administration.

§ 4.04(b)(2) The Royal Court.

§ 4.04(b)(3) Early Norman Judicial Activity.

§ 4.04(b)(4) Early Norman Law-making Activity.

§ 4.05 English Land Tenures and Feudalism After the Conquest.

§ 4.05(a) William the Conqueror's Claim to All English Land.

§ 4.05(b) Feudal Relationships in the Eleventh Century.

§ 4.05(b)(1) Characteristics of Feudalism.

§ 4.05(b)(2) Possible Sources of Feudalism.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(i) The Comitatus.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(ii) Patronage.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(iii) The Precarium and the Precaria.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(iv) Conditional Grants by Merovingian Monarchs.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(v) Use of Precariae by Carolingian Monarchs.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(vi) Military Service as a Condition of Grants in Precarium.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(vii) Landholding and Jurisdictional Independence.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(viii) Summary.

§ 4.05(b)(3) Description of Typical Feudal Tenures and Incidents.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(i) Military Tenure.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(ii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Homage.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(iii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Wardship.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(iv) Incidents of Military Tenure: Marriage.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(v) Incidents of Military Tenure: Aids.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(vi) Incidents of Military Tenure: Relief.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(vii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Escheat.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(viii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Forfeiture.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(ix) Serjeanty Tenures and Their Incidents.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(x) Free Socage Tenures and Their Incidents.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(xi) Tenure in Burgage.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(xii) Tenure in Free Alms (Frankalmoign).

§ 4.05(b)(3)(xiii) The Unfree "Tenure" of Villeinage.

§ 4.05(b)(4) Early Rules on the Inheritability of Tenures.

§ 4.05(b)(5) Early Rules on the Alienability of Tenures.

§ 4.05(b)(6) Primogeniture.

§ 4.05(b)(7) Mortmain.

§ 4.05(c) The Domesday Survey and Its Influence.

§ 4.06 The Rise of the Common Law of Real Property.

§ 4.06(a) The Fee Simple.

§ 4.06(b) Forms of Conditional Fees.

§ 4.06(c) The Life Tenancy.

§ 4.06(c)(1) Dower.

§ 4.06(c)(2) Curtesy.

§ 4.06(d) The Term of Years.

§ 4.06(e) Reversions.

§ 4.06(f) Remainders.

§ 4.06(f)(1) In General.

§ 4.06(f)(2) Contingent Remainders.

§ 4.06(g) Concurrent Estates.

§ 4.06(g)(1) Tenancy in Coparcenary.

§ 4.06(g)(2) Joint Tenancy.

§ 4.06(g)(3) Tenancy in Common.

§ 4.06(g)(4) Tenancy by the Entirety.

§ 4.06(h) The Gage and the Mortgage.

§ 4.06(h)(1) The Gage During Glanvill's Time.

§ 4.06(h)(2) The Gage During Bracton's Time.

§ 4.06(h)(3) Rise of the Classical Common Law Mortgage.

§ 4.06(h)(4) Other Security Devices.

§ 4.06(i) Conveyancing.

§ 4.06(i)(1) Early Conveyances by Charter Only.

§ 4.06(i)(2) Early Conveyances by Livery of Seisin.

§ 4.06(i)(3) Quitclaim Without Livery of Seisin.

§ 4.06(i)(4) Surrender Without Livery of Seisin.

§ 4.06(i)(5) Transfers to Change the Type of Tenancy.

§ 4.06(i)(6) Transfers Between Freeholders with Villeins in Occupancy.

§ 4.06(i)(7) Transfers Between Freeholders with Freeholders in Occupancy; Attornment to the Grantee.

§ 4.06(i)(8) Elements of the Charter or Deed.

§ 4.06(i)(8)(i) Recitals in the Deed.

§ 4.06(i)(8)(ii) Warranties in the Deed.

§ 4.06(i)(8)(iii) Physical Form of the Deed.

§ 4.06(i)(9) The Fine or Final Concord.

§ 4.07 Uses.

§ 4.07(a) Origins of Uses.

§ 4.07(b) Advantages and Disadvantages of Uses.

§ 4.07(c) Equitable Intervention in the Development of Uses.

§ 4.07(d) Early Statutory Reform of Uses.

§ 4.07(e) Conveyancing of Uses.

§ 4.07(f) Enactment and Effects of the Statute of Uses (1536).

§ 4.07(f)(1) Circumstances Leading to the Enactment of the Statute of Uses.

§ 4.07(f)(2) The Operating Principle of the Statute of Uses.

§ 4.07(f)(3) The Impact of the Statute of Uses on Conveyancing.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(i) Feoffment to Uses.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(ii) Resulting Uses.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(iii) Bargain and Sale.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(iv) Lease and Release.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(v) Covenant to Stand Seised.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(vi) Executory Interests.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(vii) Devises.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(viii) Contingent Remainders.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(ix) Uses Not Executed by the Statute of Uses.

§ 4.08 Bibliography.

Professor David A. Thomas
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.01

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.01 Introduction.

This chapter demonstrates how the Norman Conquest, beginning in 1066, and all the changes that flowed from it, affected the development of property law in England. Although Anglo-Saxon landholding practices are not well-known and were probably not uniform, it can be shown that the eventual effect of the Norman Conquest was to achieve a considerable elaboration and uniformity of the real property laws governing the English and their Norman overlords. The movement toward uniformity or consistency in all areas of the law eventually produced the common law, i.e. the law common to all of England.

This chapter will also show that foundational principles of English real property law were Anglo-Saxon and that the Normans introduced few novel substantive concepts. However, the techniques of government and administration developed by the Normans and their Angevin successors directly stimulated the growth of the common law and enabled it eventually to dominate the huge variety of ancient local customs. In the context of rights in land, the rise of common law was at first inseparably bound up with the institutions of feudalism, but as social conditions grew out of the feudal framework, the common law rules and institutions adjusted and also transcended many of their old feudal anachronisms.

While legal developments during the English Middle Ages were continuous and many-faceted, the 16th century represents a watershed of sorts for property law. The Statute of Uses in 1536 and Statute of Wills in 1540, worked out in brittle confrontation between King Henry VIII and Parliament, and the subsequent reinterpretation of those enactments in the common law courts, struck the last feudal shackles from the English system of property rights; in so doing they opened the way toward many key developments in modern Anglo-American property law. Therefore, this chapter will conclude its discussion of property law growth with the developments of the 16th century. n1

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. See generally David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History Part I: The Shared History, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 143 (1999); David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History, Part II: How Anglo-American Land Law Diverged After American Colonization and Independence, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 295 (1999). See generally David A. Thomas, Finding More Pieces for the Takings Puzzle: How Correcting History Can Clarify Doctrine, 75 U. Colo. L. Rev. 497 (Spring, 2004).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.02

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.02 Summary of Property Rights in Late Anglo-Saxon England.

§ 4.02(a) Egalitarian Quality of Early Settlements and Land Rights.

As was shown in Chapter 3, "Property Rights in Anglo-Saxon England," a lengthy and continuing elaboration of property rights took place during the entire period of Anglo-Saxon dominance in England. Most likely the first Germanic settlers were either raiding war bands or disgruntled mercenaries who turned on their British employers, and when they did begin to establish farms and villages, it was probably as independent yeomen and warriors. n2 The old custom of the continental Germanic tribes by which the tribal chief or council of leaders periodically reallocated arable land to family groups may have carried over, but would have swiftly become irrelevant as soon as settlement and stability were achieved.

What may be inferred from modern archaeological investigations is that early Anglo-Saxon society had a certain egalitarian quality that affected landholding practices. As long as pronounced social stratification was absent from the early Anglo-Saxon settlements, stratification was not apparent in the modest farmsteads or other forms of property. n3

Perhaps it was the ancient egalitarian tradition that enabled King Alfred to exercise a form of public land use planning during the ninth century, as part of his overall defensive scheme against the Danes. Alfred created a system of fortified towns, called burhs, whose fortifications were to be paid for by an assessment system -- a kind of public property tax and labor assessment -- based on the amount of land associated with the burh. A unique record of the burhs and their associated lands was compiled in what is known as the "Burgal Hidage":

> The burhs of Wessex are among the most impressive administrative achievements of Anglo-Saxon government... [They] were so distributed that nowhere was more than about 20 miles (or a day's march) away from one... [I]n nearly all cases the length of the fortification corresponds to what the formula in the burgal hidage would lead one to expect.
>
> But it now seems clear that the burhs represented more than places of temporary refuge for the entire population of Wessex. Excavations at Winchester and elsewhere have shown that they share a common town-plan, with back streets running parallel to the main street, other streets at right angles to them, and a street around the inside of the wall ... [so that] many burhs were also planned as places of permanent habitation and trade ... n4

§ 4.02(b) Specialization of Property Interests.

No definite information about Anglo-Saxon landholding practices is available until a full two centuries after the age of Conquest, and then the evidence pertains only to the more prominent persons of Anglo-Saxon society who were accustomed to conducting land transactions and making written records, or charters, of what they had done. The earliest charters, dating from the 7th century, show that elaboration of property rights had already begun, even though the common form of landholding was still what would today be termed a life estate. It is also apparent that most occupied land was subject to requirements of military service, road building and fortress maintenance.

Whatever the usual form of Anglo-Saxon landholding, the charters mention several specialized property interests. One of these is "bookland," a form of landholding created only by written charter that may have been used to obtain relief from some or all of such service requirements and to permit alienation of the land without leave of the king. "Laenland" also is mentioned in some charters, apparently referring to land that was loaned or rented to another either for a short term or for a period of up to three lives, meaning the grantee and two successive heirs. The remaining lands might have been included in the elusive term "folkland," land still subject to alienation restrictions and to customary obligations and dues.

§ 4.02(c) Stratified Society and Property Rights.

In addition to the possessory rights and restrictions recognized as pertaining to the immediate occupants of the land, a system of shared ownership rights was developing in Anglo-Saxon England. These rights were stratified, with some rights of ownership subordinated to and derived from ownership rights of a socially superior person, and were possibly a direct product of developing stratification in Anglo-Saxon society generally:

> With improving stability ... came centralization of political power and stratification of property rights. War band leaders became kings, who assigned land to their chief warriors, who allotted portions to farmers and their families, each grantor retaining rights relative to subsequent grantees. Rights of inheritability and alienation were probably rare and probably required acquiescence of or payment to lord or community. At the end of this process, the actual occupants of the land would eventually suffer a nearly complete loss of economic and personal independence. n5

By the time of the Norman Conquest, English society had suffered enormously from what Stenton called "the general drift of English peasant life from freedom towards servitude." Little direct evidence exists for how this occurred, but it is the most conspicuous aspect of Anglo-Saxon property rights in the generation before the Conquest. The inferences about this process that may be drawn from the available evidence were best expressed by Stenton:

> From the moment when the kings of the migration age began to plant their companions upon the soil there must have existed communities in which expropriated Britons, and Englishmen too poor to be welcomed in settlements of their own people, were working for a lord in return for his protection...
>
> There is no direct evidence to show the stages by which, within any single village, a community composed essentially of independent peasants developed into a community composed essentially of serfs, but the main features of the process seem fairly clear. In what appears to have been the normal case, it began with a grant from the king settling an ealdorman, a gesith, a bishop, or an abbot in his own place as the immediate lord of a village, and, in particular, as the recipient of the dues and services which its inhabitants had been accustomed to render to the king himself. The independence of the village group was not threatened at first. But the narrowness of the average ceorl's resources, and the many forms of disaster to which he was exposed, made it almost inevitable that sooner or later the village community would find itself unable to provide the food-rent which its lord had a right to demand. It was generally > easier for the head of a peasant household to supply labour than to keep up a regular contribution to a communal food-rent. Most lords had need of labour on the "demesnes" which they had been acquiring through co-operation with the village community in the extension of cultivated area, or by the creation of home farms within a ring fence. It seems that, within most villages, the duty of supporting the lord by a communal render in kind gave way, in time, more or less completely, to a system by which each of the regular holdings in the open fields -- hides, half-hides, and yardlands -- supplied labour for the lord's demesnes on a definite number of days in every week. In itself, the change was merely a matter of economic reorganization, which need have had no legal consequences. But in most cases it seems to have formed part of a wider revolution in which the individual peasants surrendered their holdings to the lord of the village and received them back from his hands, acknowledging themselves to be his men, and placing themselves under his protection. When this step had been taken by the whole or the greater part of a village community, the manorial economy of the middle ages was brought within sight. n6

In Anglo-Saxon England it was still possible to be economically dependent but personally free in legal standing. Freemen are known to have been tenants in varying degrees of servitude, and it has been stated that Anglo-Saxon "serfdom was much more of a personal bondage less involved with the occupation of particular land before the Norman Conquest than after." n7

§ 4.02(d) Anglo-Saxon Property Rights as the Foundation for the Common Law of Property.

Anglo-Saxon landholding practices, and their correlation with social status, had little known consistency throughout England, and they must have been in constant fluctuation throughout the Anglo-Saxon age. For the most part, they were acknowledged only by immemorial custom, and persisted through the Norman Conquest and into the period of common law development. They were the foundation for the common law of property:

> It is in the greater landlords who hold by book or laen -- the future lords of manors -- that we can see not only the beginnings of individualistic ownership of the land, but also the germs of the idea of tenure. The grantees by book stand ... in close relation to the crown. They are, in fact, a class of great tenants-in-chief. Under them the cultivators of the soil occupy their holdings. The rise of laenland interposed another class between the great man and the peasant. Between the peasant and the crown there might be the thegn who holds laenland of the church and the church to whom it has been booked by the king. In many cases we can see the germs of what will be in later law the various classes of tenure. The land booked to the church for the salvation of the donor's soul was an out-and-out gift; no services were reserved. But the donor will expect the donee to remember him in his prayers. This is not unlike tenure by frank-almoin. If the king books land to a thegn, he books it in consideration of past faithful services, probably of a military sort; but he will sometimes stipulate for continued faithful service; and the amount of military service required is sometimes specified. All free men are obliged to serve in the fyrd; but this liability to serve in the fryd is coming to be attached to certain definite tracts of land -- to certain five-hide units... We have here various elements which may develop into tenure by military service... [W]e can see the germs not only of military and socage tenure, but also of tenure by serjeanty and even of villein tenure... n8 n9

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 2. After examining the property-related provisions of the old continental Germanic law codes contemporary with the Anglo-Saxon invasions, the only conclusion that could be drawn in Chapter 3 was an inference > that real property was important and some individual possessory rights were recognized and protected, but any further enlightenment is not available in the documentary sources relating to the Anglo-Saxons or other contemporary Germanic tribes.

Supra § 3.03(b).

(n2)Footnote 3. Supra § 3.03(b).

(n3)Footnote 4. Patrick Wormald, The Burhs, in The Anglo-Saxons 152-153 (James Campbell ed. 1982).

(n4)Footnote 5. Supra § 3.04(c)(4)(vi).

(n5)Footnote 6. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 463-465 (1943).

(n6)Footnote 7. Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 37 (2d ed. 1909). But see Patrick Wormald, Frederic William Maitland and the Earliest English Law, 16 L. & Hist. Rev. 1 (Spring 1998) (contending that Maitland underrated the part played by the earliest Kings of England in shaping a distinctive English legal tradition).

(n7)Footnote 8. 2 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 73-74 (reprint 1971).

(n8)Footnote 9. See also Ann Williams, The English and the Norman Conquest (1995).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.03

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.03 Summary of Property Rights Among the Pre-Conquest Normans.

§ 4.03(a) Origins of the Normans.

Even school children are taught that Normans were "Northmen," but little else is commonly known about these medieval marauders who conquered England and other European kingdoms. The Norman invasions fit squarely within the mainstream of Viking aggressions that afflicted Europe during the 8th through the 11th centuries; the Norman Conquest of England has been called "the last great Viking expansion." n10

The founder of the Norman dynasty is believed to have been an adventurer named Rolf or Hrolf in the Scandinavian sagas. n11 In the later continental chronicles, this same figure is referred to as Rollo. n12 Rolf was apparently a Norwegian Viking pirate n13 who operated in the Baltic during his early years. He was outlawed by the Norwegian King when, desperate for food, he raided for cattle in Norway. n14

Rolf was active during the early years of the 10th century, a time of violent unrest, but details are very sketchy. After a stay in the Hebrides, he probably took part in raids on what is now western France, n15 and he may also have visited the Danish King Guthrum in England at about this time. n16

During the second decade of the 10th century, Rolf helped lead several attacks in the area of modern Normandy and conducted an unsuccessful siege of Paris. It was possible that he also directed colonization by Norse settlers in territories brought under his control. In 911, the Frankish King Charles III (the Simple), struggling to hold together remnants of the Carolingian Empire, entered into a pact with Rolf, even after defeating Rolf in a battle at Chartres. n17 Reportedly Rolf agreed to be baptized, to marry Charles' daughter, and to give homage to Charles; in return he obtained formal control over the areas of Rouen, Lisieux, Evreux, and some minor additional territory, all later known as Upper Normandy. n18 With these arrangements in place, Rolf expanded his territories with grim efficiency. By taking over the districts of Bayeux and Sees, he extended his control into the west, and after 924 his son moved into the Avranches and Coutances districts, which added Lower Normandy to the territory effectively under his dominion. n19

The population thus brought within Norse control was probably Celtic, but had become considerably Romanized by the time the Saxons and Franks began invading in the fourth century. The Germanic invaders mingled with the people, but did not impose their language upon the conquered. Thus a form of French was spoken when the early Viking raiders struck in the area. The Viking raiding parties themselves were possibly of mixed origins. In Rolf's case, his early commanders and raiders were probably Norwegian, but most of the Scandinavians who actually settled in Normandy were Danish. n20 The Viking intruders adopted French language and customs, but remained a separate ruling class.

In their role as overlords, the Normans continued consolidating their control during the tenth century, and were generally successful in maintaining independence from the aggressive Frankish and Breton princes who surrounded Normandy.

Rolf died sometime between 925 and 927 n21 and was succeeded by his son William I (Longsword). William I was murdered in 943, but in the year prior to his death had arranged for the succession of Richard I (the Fearless), his son by a Breton concubine. n22 Richard was bilingual, like his Father William and his grandfather Rolf, and he maintained his Scandinavian connections and culture, but under his rule the Norman state began to play a more active role in the Frankish politics of the region. n23 When Richard I's long reign ended with his death in 996, his oldest son Richard II, also illegitimate, succeeded him and began to rule in 998. During Richard II's reign, the conflicts between Christians and pagans within his dominions generally were resolved in favor of Christians, and feudal rules and relationships were significantly refined. n24

Richard II reigned until 1026, and was succeeded by his illegitimate son Richard III, who died that same year after falling ill at a feast. n25 Richard III's brother Robert took over in 1027 and soon thereafter sired a son by a Falaise peasant girl. In 1034 Robert made his vassals do homage to this illegitimate son, who was then only six years old, and then turned Normandy over to the boy and left on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. When Robert died during the return journey from Jerusalem, the boy became William II, seventh duke of Normandy and eventually "the Conqueror" and King of England. n26

William was born only little more than a century after his Viking great-great-grandfather Rolf formalized the Norman presence in France. Even his grandfather Richard I had still maintained Norse language and customs. Thus the Norman contribution to English law after the Conquest is best understood in the context of its Scandinavian origins.

§ 4.03(b) Sketch of Scandinavian Law.

As was common in all Germanic cultures, Viking society was divided into classes of nobility, freemen, and slaves. n27 In early Viking times, before feudal tendencies were manifest, land held by persons in the classes of nobility or freemen was held communally by the family, albeit under the father's control. Upon the father's death, the oldest son succeeded to the entire holding, but he had to compensate the younger brothers and sisters for their shares. n28 Thus financed, younger sons were able to colonize new areas or to strike out on voyages of trade or piracy. n29

The land itself was free from obligations to overlords, but a landholder might assume the burdens of personal dues or services in return for protection or support from a lord. Such lordship arrangements were strictly personal and could be transferred to other lords without affecting the rights in land. One could obtain land by becoming the follower of a lord or chief; the chief was responsible to administer justice, give support in disputes, and distribute shares of spoils. n30 Women also could own and inherit land. n31

Divorce was easily obtained by either spouse, and illegitimacy was common. n32 Indeed, blurred distinctions between marriage and concubinage sometimes led to succession by illegitimate sons, as abundantly manifested in the Norman ducal genealogy. Of the seven Norman rulers between Rolf and William II (the Conqueror), three (Richard I, Richard II, and William II) are known to have been illegitimate.

Assemblies of free men were called Things and were common in all Nordic societies. These gatherings in each province pronounced judgments and administered the law in the area. Although the rulers dominated the Things, they were still bound by custom to consult their constituents thus assembled. n33

Other traits common to Germanic societies, such as the responsibility of an entire kindred for individual offenses by its members, and compensations for such offenses based on wergild, were in full force in Scandinavia. As elsewhere in northern and western Europe, rulers attempted to restrict blood feud vengeance and to regulate assessment and payment of wergild fines for offenses. Generally, this regulation by the rules tended to fix responsibility for offenses more fully on the individual offender than on the entire kindred. This might have been achieved by requiring the offender personally to pay a portion of the wergild or by restricting the extent of family relationship included in the kindred. n34

The environment and way of life had a natural influence on local legal customs. For example, farm implements were left in the fields overnight to save time during the short harvest seasons, and laws imposed severe penalties for their theft. Other laws firmly obligated neighbors to assist those who otherwise could not get their harvests in on time. n35 Similarly, when wintering ships were pulled up into sheds for storing and repairs, laws defined the rights associated with such laying-up and required neighboring farmers to help pull under some circumstances. n36 Presumably, extensive Norse trading led to many legal customs regulating mercantile activities.

§ 4.03(c) Changes in Norman Legal Customs After the Settlement of Normandy.

After Norman settlement rights in Normandy were formalized in 911, fundamental changes in Norman legal customs began to occur. At first, Rolf's followers insisted on maintaining their egalitarian social status. Until the early years of Richard II's reign, which began about 998, widespread non-feudal landholding, peasant independence, and loyalty to pagan creeds persisted. n37 However, the Normans' need to fit into emerging French society changed these cultural characteristics. They gradually adopted a new language and diminished their pirate activity. Constant threats from aggressive neighbors in adjacent lands, not restrained by any natural barriers of topography, created pressures to feudalize -- that is, for landholders to seek security in submitting lands and lives to powerful warrior lords in return for physical protection. Many Normans, recognizing these inexorable forces, readily accepted feudal landholding, the French language, and even Christianity. This resulted in a substantial split from more traditional Normans, particularly from peasants who were losing their independence. n38

Richard I (942-996), apprehensive of French hostility, took the first halting steps toward feudalism. Military service began to be organized on the basis of feudal duties, replacing the traditional method of calling up all freemen. As a result, some allodial (non-feudal) tenures were changed to feudal tenures, and many free peasants lost their independent status. n39 A serious but unsuccessful revolt of free peasants under the subsequent reign of Richard II was probably a protest against these changes and undoubtedly slowed the spread of feudal practices into the lower classes. The eventual result was a Norman style of feudalism with a highly organized military structure, but with servile status in the lower class less pervasive than elsewhere in France.

It is estimated that 100 to 120 feudal baronies existed in Normandy under Richard I. n40 A vassal of one of these barons would have held his land as a sort of tenant at will, a tenure known in Roman law as a precarium. n41 By the time of Richard II (998-1026), a vassal who swore fealty to a lord would receive an interest in land known as a beneficium under Roman law, which granted the right to hold the property for life. As developments that had already taken place during the dominance of the Carolingian empire were imitated in Normandy, the vassal's interest evolved into the hereditary fief, or feudum, which could descend from father to son. n42 In return for giving up the right to revoke the land grant, the lord eventually gained the rights of wardship, to a succession duty upon inheritance, and to choose a husband for a vassal's heiress. n43 These changes occurred in no orderly or consistent fashion within the duchy, but were gradual and uneven.

Vassals' duties were only gradually defined or clarified, n44 but the more powerful lay magnates and churchmen, probably the most important landholders before the Conquest, held their land by some sort of military tenure, that is, subject to the duty to provide the services of a specific number of fully-equipped knights. n45 Because such military tenures are hardly evident prior to 1047, they were probably developed in large measure by William after he assumed power as duke in Normandy; he may have seen such arrangements as an effective response to the serious internal and external threats against his early rule. n46

Indeed the fief -- land tenure derived from obligatory military service -- played an important part in William's military resources. Under some conditions, he could summon every man holding at least a knight's fee; on less serious occasions he might call up only some men holding military tenures, and then only for forty days' service. Under the worst circumstances, he could call out all free tenants. n47 The system in Normandy was still being shaped at the time of the Conquest, although apparently William did much to spread the principle of a fixed rate of knight service. n48 Subinfeudation occurred in Normandy and further complicated the military tenures: a vassal owing the service of five knights might let his land out to others for ten; or, more commonly, a tenant might hold land from several lords or might hold a mere fraction of a knight's fee. Vassals who made grants in subinfeudation held a relationship to their tenants similar to the duke's relation to themselves. n49

Over all these baronies and vassals, Duke Richard I and his successors administered certain functions through viscounts. Viscounts, on behalf of the duke, exercised control over troops, revenue, administration of justice, castles, and bishoprics (especially after the church was weakened during widespread civil strife). n50 Usually only leading barons would be appointed viscounts, and the office gradually came to be considered a hereditary right of certain feudal families. Viscounts paid a form of rent for their appointments, and then, with responsibility for tax collection, kept any revenue they could obtain. n51

The Norman dukes took other actions to improve order and stability within Norman society. For example:

> [p]rivate war could not be outlawed, but was strictly limited. It needed a ducal licence; the duke set its rules and claimed the right to supervise campaigns. Devastation of opponents' property in land disputes was forbidden, as were assaults and ambushes in ducal forests. Arms, horses or property of a man captured in a bloodfeud might not be retained. A licence was needed for the building of a castle. We do not know the exact date at which many of these regulations came in, but they formed the system that was steadily extended from Richard II to William II. n52

Information on other aspects of Norman law during this time is also scant. Rights of barons to hold local courts were firmly controlled by the duke, but otherwise no details are known. As there was no written law before the Conquest, the Norman dukes administered customary law. They did not issue writs or charters, as the Anglo-Saxons had been doing for four centuries, and the documents that were drawn up simply recorded gifts that had already been made. The most serious cases of misconduct -- murder, assault, arson, and rape -- were heard by the duke, although sometimes he appointed others to hear particular cases. By 1091 baronial jurisdiction in Normandy had been granted over assault, rape, and arson, but not over murder cases. It is believed that criminal justice followed the system of compurgation by oath that was common to Germanic societies, but no firm evidence of this has appeared for Normandy. It is also not known whether juries -- that is, bodies of inquest -- were used among the pre-Conquest Normans. However, the ordeal, including ordeal by battle, was used. n53

Ordeals were a conspicuous feature at the baronial councils convened by the dukes at festival times. Such councils, in addition to conducting trials by ordeal, resolved high-level disputes, decided whether to wage war, and occasionally proclaimed a ducal heir. n54 In 1047, William was instrumental in having a provincial council of ecclesiastical and lay magnates adopt the so-called "Truce of God," which restricted private warfare. This revealed William's penchant for involving the church, and controlling the church's involvement, in his administrative affairs. n55

Despite these known features of Norman legal practices, any comprehensive picture of Norman law remains obscure:

> Of the law of Normandy as it was on the eve of William's expedition, little is known for certain. To > illustrate the period which had elapsed since the settlement of the Northmen in Neustria, there are no written laws, no books on law and very few charters, while the chroniclers have not much to tell about the legal structure of the duchy, and what they tell is not always trustworthy... Even in later days, after the duke of the Normans had become king of the English, the duchy was slow to follow the kingdom in the production of abiding memorials of its law... [W]e have every reason to believe that the conquerors of England had little, if any, written law to bring with them. n56

Such written laws and unwritten legal customs as had developed in Normandy were probably more French than Scandinavian:

> But not only had the Normans no written law of their own making; there was none that they could readily borrow from their French neighbors. Their invasions occurred in the very midnight of the legal history of France; indeed they brought the midnight with them. n57

Yet the question persists as to whether Norman law was mainly Frankish or Scandinavian:

> It is now generally admitted that for at least half a century before the battle of Hastings, the Normans were Frenchmen, French in their language, French in their law, proud indeed of their past history, very ready to fight against other Frenchmen if Norman home-rule was endangered, but still Frenchmen ... Their spoken language was French, their written Language was Latin, but the Latin of France; the style of their legal documents was the style of the French chancery; very few of the technical terms of their law were of Scandinavian origin. n58

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 10. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 4 (1974).

(n2)Footnote 11. 1 Snorri Sturluson, The Heimskringla: A History of the Norse Kings 38-39 (Samuel Laing trans. 1907).

(n3)Footnote 12. See Dudo, De Moribus et Actis Primorum Normanniae Ducum, in Historiae Normannorum Scriptores Antiqui 70 (Andreas Duchesnius ed. 1619). A brief but helpful discussion of the source chronicles and of Dudo's occasional unreliability is found in R. Allen Brown, The Normans and the Norman Conquest 24-25 and n.18 (1969).

(n4)Footnote 13. Rolf's Norwegian origin is not certain, but seems probable. D. C. Douglas, Rollo of Normandy, 57 Eng. Hist. Rev. 417, 423 (1942).

(n5)Footnote 14. 1 Snorri Sturluson, The Heimskringla: A History of the Norse Kings 38-39 (Samuel Laing trans. 1907); Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 18 (1974). See generally William H. Goetzman, The Atlas of North American Exploration: From the Norse Voyages to the Race to the Pole (1998).

(n6)Footnote 15. 1 Snorri Sturluson, The Heimskringla: A History of the Norse Kings 39 (Samuel Laing trans. 1907); Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 19 (1974).

(n7)Footnote 16. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 18 (1974).

(n8)Footnote 17. Id. at 15.

(n9)Footnote 18. Id.; Dudo, De Moribus et Actis Primorum Normanniae Ducum, in Historiae Normannorum Scriptores Antiqui 79-84 (Andreas Duchesnius ed. 1619). The generous detail Dudo provides for the agreement and its attendant circumstances was probably partially fabricated. See D. C. Douglas, Rollo of Normandy, 57 Eng. Hist. Rev. 417, 428-429 (1942). However, the occurrence of these events generally is not disputed.

(n10)Footnote 19. John Le Patourel, The Norman Empire 5-11 (1976); Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 17 (1974).

(n11)Footnote 20. D. C. Douglas, Rollo of Normandy, 57 Eng. Hist. Rev. 417, 423-424 (1942).

(n12)Footnote 21. Id. at 434-35.

(n13)Footnote 22. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 53-55 (1974).

(n14)Footnote 23. D. C. Douglas, The Rise of Normandy, 57 Proc. Brit. Acad. 101, 107-108, 112 (1971).

(n15)Footnote 24. D. C. Douglas, The Norman Achievement: 1050-1100 24-25 (1969); D. C. Douglas, The Rise of Normandy, 57 Proc. Brit. Acad. 101, 114-115 (1971).

(n16)Footnote 25. D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 31-32 (1964).

(n17)Footnote 26. Id. at 15, 35-37.

(n18)Footnote 27. Johannes Brondsted, The Vikings 238-242 (Kalle Skov trans. 1965). See generally P.H. Sawyer, The Oxford Illustrated History of the Vikings (1998).

(n19)Footnote 28. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 26 (1974). In addition to the compensatory payments for their shares of the family estate, the younger brothers also received their shares of other assets.

(n20)Footnote 29. Johannes Brondsted, The Vikings 24-25 (Kalle Skov trans. 1965). See generally P.H. Sawyer, The Oxford Illustrated History of the Vikings (1998).

(n21)Footnote 30. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 26 (1974).

(n22)Footnote 31. Land inheritance and ownership by women is in the tale told by a runic inscription found at Hillersjo, Uppland, Sweden:

> Germund married Gerlog, when she was a maiden. Later they had a son, before Germund was drowned. The son died later. Then she married Gudrik. They had children. Of these only a girl lived; she was called Inga. Ragnfast of Snottsta married her. Afterwards he died, and their son after him. And the mother inherited from her son. Inga afterwards married Erik. Then she died. Then Gerlog inherited from Inga, her daughter.

Ole Klindt-Jensen, The World of the Vikings 138 (1970).

(n23)Footnote 32. Johannes Brondsted, The Vikings 42 (Kalle Skov trans. 1965).

(n24)Footnote 33. Ole Klindt-Jensen, The World of the Vikings 178-183; Johannes Brondsted, The Vikings 242-243 (Kalle Skov trans. 1965). See generally P.H. Sawyer, The Oxford Illustrated History of the Vikings (1998).

(n25)Footnote 34. Ole Klindt-Jensen, The World of the Vikings 178 (1970). A description of similar customs in contemporary England is contained in the second set of the laws of Edmund, an Anglo-Saxon king. See 3 F. Felix Liebermann, Die Gesetze Der Angelsachsen 186-191 (1906). See generally P.H. Sawyer, The Oxford Illustrated History of the Vikings (1998).

(n26)Footnote 35. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 27 (1965).

(n27)Footnote 36. Haakon Shetelig & Hjalma Falk, Scandinavian Archaeology 352 (Eric V. Gordon trans. 1937).

(n28)Footnote 37. D. C. Douglas, The Rise of Normandy, 57 Proc. Brit. Acad. 101, 111-115, 118-119 (1971).

(n29)Footnote 38. R. Allen Brown, The Normans and the Norman Conquest 39-40 (1969); John Le Patourel, The Norman Empire 286-290 (1976).

(n30)Footnote 39. R. Allen Brown, The Normans and the Norman Conquest 40 (1969). Douglas has cautioned against assuming a wholesale adoption of feudal tenures during this time. D. C. Douglas, The Rise of Normandy, 57 Proc. Brit. Acad. 101, 118-119 (1971).

(n31)Footnote 40. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 59-60 (1974). See generally D. C. Douglas, The Earliest Norman Counts, 61 Eng. Hist. Rev. 129-156 (1946), explaining that, despite civil unrest, the cohesion of the Norman counts greatly contributed to the Norman achievements.

(n32)Footnote 41. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 67-72 (2d ed. 1909); Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 69 (1974). See generally Anthony Musson, The Evolution of English Justice: Law, Politics and Society in the 14th Century (1999); Frederic William Maitland, A Sketch of English Legal History (1998).

(n33)Footnote 42. By 1075 Norman magnates were routinely inheriting their land.

(n34)Footnote 43. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 325-329 (2d ed. 1909).

(n35)Footnote 44. R. Allen Brown, The Normans And The Norman Conquest 39, 41 (1969).

(n36)Footnote 45. D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 101-103 (1964).

(n37)Footnote 46. Id. at 98-103.

(n38)Footnote 47. F. M. Stenton, The First Century of English Feudalism: 1066-1166 at 13-14 (1961).

(n39)Footnote 48. D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 31-32 (1964).

(n40)Footnote 49. John Le Patourel, The Norman Empire 289-290 (1976).

(n41)Footnote 50. D. C. Douglas, The Earliest Norman Counts, 61 Eng. Hist. Rev. 152-153 (1946); D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 139-144 (1964); John Le Patourel, The Norman Empire 258-260 (1976).

(n42)Footnote 51. Timothy Baker, The Normans 25 (1966); D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 139 (1964); R. Allen Brown, The Normans and the Norman Conquest 54 (1969). The tax collection system described in the text is usually referred to as "farming," and had a long tradition extending back to Roman times and beyond. This arrangement obligated the viscount to pay a fixed sum to the duke, which the viscount was then entitled to collect from the people in his jurisdiction. As a rule, the amount of the viscount's collections exceeded the required payment to the duke.

(n43)Footnote 52. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 69 (1974).

(n44)Footnote 53. Id. at 136-138.

(n45)Footnote 54. Id. at 136-137; R. Allen Brown, The Normans And The Norman Conquest 54, 145-146 (1969).

(n46)Footnote 55. D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 44, 51-52 (1964).

(n47)Footnote 56. Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 64-65 (2d ed. 1909).

(n48)Footnote 57. Id. at 65.

(n49)Footnote 58. Id. at 66.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.04

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.04 Impact of the Norman Conquest on the Development of English Law.

§ 4.04(a) The Course of the Conquest.

Duke William II of Normandy would have angrily objected to being known as the "Conqueror" of England. No one of his time gave more attention to assuring the legitimacy of his claim to the English throne and to the notion that the Norman invasion and settlement of England was simply the necessary effort to reclaim the English throne from a usurper.

§ 4.04(a)(1) Norman Influence in England Before 1066.

Norman influence in England began no later than 1002, when the Anglo-Saxon King Ethelred II of England married Emma of Normandy, daughter of Duke Richard I and therefore William's aunt. Ethelred and Emma's son, known as Edward "the Confessor" when he was later King of England, was therefore William's first cousin. Ethnic ties with Normandy were even stronger and older, inasmuch as both Normandy and England were attacked, conquered and partially resettled by Scandinavian Vikings during roughly the same era.

During the marriage of Ethelred II and Emma, many Normans came to England as part of Emma's household. In 1013, Edward and his brother Alfred were sent by their father to Normandy, to join their mother who had preceded them, due to the growing menace of Viking assaults on England. Ethelred joined them briefly in 1013, but returned to England in 1014. When Ethelred died in 1016, Cnut of Denmark, by a combination of negotiation and battle, became King of England, and about the same time succeeded his own brother as King of Denmark. n59

In the very year he obtained the English throne, Cnut married Ethelred's widow, Emma of Normandy, so that, from 1016, once again some Norman influence was felt in England. Indeed, Cnut's Danish followers and Emma's Norman retainers shared a common homeland, culture, and ancestry less than a century in the past. Shortly after Cnut's death in about 1035, Ethelred's two sons Edward and Alfred, still in Norman exile, made short-lived expeditions to England, probably with Norman aid. However, the new King of England, Harold Harefoot, had Alfred murdered, with the complicity of Earl Godwin, father of the Harold who would oppose William at Hastings. King Harold Harefoot was Cnut's son by his first marriage, so Cnut's widow Emma had gone into exile in Flanders. After Harold Harefoot died in 1040, however, he was succeeded by Harthacnut, son of Cnut and Emma, who invited Edward, son of Emma and Ethelred, to share the English kingship. Harthacnut died only a year later, so Edward became sole King of England in 1042. In that year Edward was 37 years old and had spent 28 of those years in Normandy, succored by Norman magnates. n60

When Edward assumed the throne of England, Norman influence grew stronger than ever. As stated by an anonymous contemporary biographer of Edward:

> When King Edward of holy memory returned from Francia, quite a number of men of that nation, and they not base born, accompanied him. And these, since he was master of the whole kingdom, he kept with him, enriched them with many honours, and made them his privy counsellors and administrators of the royal palace. n61

§ 4.04(a)(2) William's Claim to and Conquest of the English Throne.

Although the next events are attested only by Norman sources, there is no reason to doubt their reliability and mutual confirmation. In about 1051, Edward decreed that William of Normandy should be his successor, secured the agreement upon oath of the leading English nobility, and sent notification of the matter by messenger and hostages to William. William then came to England and was received and honored by Edward. In 1064, according to the same sources, Harold Godwin was sent to William in Normandy to confirm the succession and formally recognize William as Edward's heir.

But conflict was not to be avoided. Edward died on January 5, 1066, Harold Godwin was elected king by the Witan and crowned on January 6, 1066, and the succession was thrown into wide open dispute. Once the news reached Normandy, massive invasion preparations began, and William had a monk deliver a formal statement of William's claim to the English throne to Harold. Meanwhile, invasion preparations also had been undertaken in Norway, whose King Harald Hardrada raised a claim to the English throne. The same wind that kept William from crossing the English Channel in September 1066 enabled Harald Hardrada's forces to land near York, where they were totally defeated by Harold Godwin's Anglo-Saxons in the battle of Stamford Bridge. However, the Anglo-Saxon forces had arrived only after a forced march of 190 miles from London and withdrawing the fleet from guarding the southern coast against a Norman invasion. When the wind then suddenly changed and William crossed over to Pevensy and Hastings, Harold swiftly returned, gathered what forces were available, and gave battle more or less at a time and place of William's choosing. The outcome at Hastings was in doubt during the entire day of battle, but at the end the field lay strewn with "the flower of English nobility and youth." n62 Once the English had been defeated, with their king and other principal leaders slain, they seemed incapable of regrouping and offering any more resistance than an occasional regional revolt.

> Nevertheless, the Norman Conquest of England is not to be explained away by the luck of Fortune's favourites, for in these matters we may see the characteristic Norman gift for seizing opportunities and bending circumstances to their will. We must also surely see more weakness in the Old English kingdom than modern English historians are often ready to admit ... Conquered by Swein Forkbeard and Cnut only 50 years before Hastings, far from united (especially between north and south), presided over by a weak king and an over-mighty earl representing the Anglo-Scandinavian ascendancy whose dominance was resented by the surviving Old English ..., old fashioned in its organization and not least its military system, England on the eve of the Norman Conquest presents to the neutral historian plenty of internal reasons to explain a Norman victory in what was in effect one more disputed succession to the throne. n63

The contrast between the culturally superior Anglo-Saxon state and the politically stronger Norman state has been aptly expressed by Stenton:

> The Normans who entered into the English inheritance were a harsh and violent race. They were the closest of all western peoples to the barbarian strain in the continental order. They had produced little in > art or learning, and nothing in literature, that could be set beside the work of Englishmen. But politically, they were the masters of their world. n64

§ 4.04(a)(3) Norman Settlement of England After the Conquest.

The Norman Conquest itself was not substantially finished until 1071. The Norman "settlement" of England began immediately in 1066 and was essentially completed with the Domesday Survey in 1086. William was crowned in London on Christmas day, 1066, but withdrew to Essex while three London castles (that afforded protection against the unruly London population) were completed. He returned in triumph to Normandy in March 1067, but was required back in England in December 1067, to conduct a winter campaign to subdue Exeter. William's wife Mathilda was brought to London to be crowned queen in the spring of 1068, but then William had to go pacify Northumbria and York, planting castles along the way. The next year, a rebellion broke out in York, and then prominent English leaders united with invading Danes to create a major uprising in Northumbria. To check simultaneous uprisings in Cheshire, Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, and Somerset, William dispatched trusted companions, and then personally led the forces to Northumbria. He rather quickly dealt with the military threat, but then, in the winter of 1069-1070, sought a permanent solution "by a deliberate attempt to ruin the population of the affected districts": n65

> Then in his anger he commanded that all crops and herds, chattels and goods of every kind should be brought together and burned to ashes with consuming fire, so that the whole region north of Humber might be stripped of all means of sustenance. n66

The effects of this effort became legendary:

> From the eleventh century onwards historians have noted the sustained ferocity with which the king set his men to destroy the means of life in northern England. Their generalities are abundantly borne out by the evidence of Domesday Book, which shows that within the country ravaged at this time vast areas were still derelict after seventeen years ... It was the most terrible visitation that had ever fallen on any large part of England since the Danish wars of Alfred's time. n67

Entering into legend were the resistance, escape from the Isle of Ely, and further adventures of Hereward the Wake during 1070-1071.

As to settlement, as opposed to conquest, William may at one time have intended to simply rule England as the legitimate heir of Edward. Redistribution of lands to his followers, however, as tenants in chief began immediately after Hastings, and continued with renewed pace after each revolt, so that by the time of the Domesday Survey in 1086 only two Anglo-Saxon lords of high rank were left in the realm:

> The extinction and disappearance, in death, in exile and by social suppression, of the Old English aristocracy is one of the few non-controversial results of the Norman Conquest which, sociologically, is the imposition of a new and alien ruling class upon the land ... So sweeping a change of personnel at the top was crucial in an age of personal kingship and personal lordship ... For a start the very nature of society changed to become what we call feudal, as the new lords and their new king naturally and automatically transplanted to England those forms of social organization, custom, tenure, military organization and tactics which were prevalent in Normandy and northern France. The law changed in consequence, not least the land law, and so did the dispensation of justice to accommodate feudal notions of jurisdiction... n68

Norman settlement, consisting of immigration from the continent, continued even after the death of William in 1087. Penetration of Scotland in the north and of Wales in the west proceeded until well into the twelfth century.

It is difficult for us, viewing the Norman Conquest after the passage of nearly a millennium, to appreciate the monumentality of the Norman achievement or the disastrous consequences it held for the English. The stronger central rule that eventually arose from the Norman intrusion tends to obscure the decades of uncontrolled murder, oppression, rapine, humiliation, famine, and fear that the Norman invaders brought to much of England. Often, when the Norman barons could no longer find affluent Englishmen to plunder, they quarreled and fought among themselves, usually scourging the lands, manors, and peasants belonging to their opponents. Small wonder, then, that after numerous unsuccessful regional rebellions, the English, seeking relief from civil unrest, gave their allegiance to the Norman king rather than to discontented local magnates. This fitful and frightful struggle between the forces of chaos and control inexorably influenced English law and government.

From a different and perhaps grander perspective, the Norman Conquest has been depicted as a profound renewal of Old English society and culture:

> At the same time, through the agency of the new Norman prelates above all, England was brought culturally and intellectually into the mainstream of the new learning of northern France ... [Both] the Old English Church, [and] Old English society as a whole, ... were old fashioned by the standards of northern France, features of a surviving Carolingian-type realm still in full working order in spite of the Danes. It is not unfair to say that in England at Hastings in 1066 the Old World went down before the New ...
>
> [T]he most important single result of the Norman Conquest of England must be that it broke this country's close but barren ties with Scandinavia, and replaced both them and the affiliation with the increasingly obsolete German world by the closest bonds of absolute integration with northern France. n69

§ 4.04(b) Norman Legal and Administrative Activities.

§ 4.04(b)(1) Local Government and Administration.

No more typical example of the interplay between English and Norman impulses can be found than in the changes in royal administrative practices introduced after the Conquest. William took over English governmental institutions intact, but by 1071 he had brought local administration entirely into Norman hands. He achieved this primarily by strengthening the office of sheriff, so that it functioned much like the Norman viscount, although it was much more subordinate to the king. Anglo-Norman sheriffs were less independent than Norman viscounts, because those who obtained the offices were usually from the lesser nobility, were changed often, and did not inherit their positions.

Although the Anglo-Norman sheriffs' traditional enforcement duties increased naturally with the growth of feudal dues and forest laws, the most important growth in the office's power was in the expanded scope of its judicial functions. Royal writs could command a sheriff to bring a case to the royal court or, in the days before rounds by royal justices were common, could order the sheriff himself to hear and decide the case in its own locality. n70

§ 4.04(b)(2) The Royal Court.

The Norman administrative practice that had the most direct effect on the common law's growth was the royal court. Although it is difficult to find precise information on this institution, it appears that in the early years the court usually consisted of servants who performed judicial, financial and other administrative functions, and who usually witnessed royal writs. n71 Occasionally added to this ministerial group would have been some members of the most powerful nobility, companions and confidants of the king, with whom he discussed issues of the realm. Such groups would not have been a formal court of law, but collectively, as a royal court, they did from time to time issue writs and judgments. Writs extant from this time are brief and cite no rules or guidelines, only commands. However:

> we can be sure that the king often discussed with the barons such matters as the disposal of > escheated fiefs, the settlement of conflicting claims to estates, and the marriage of heiresses; the decisions thus taken in the end determined the lines on which feudal practice was to develop. n72

At the three great annual church festivals, the king also assembled his great court, consisting of all his principal tenants in chief. This council, a natural extension of the Anglo-Saxon Witan, also heard important cases and is the direct ancestor of the English Parliament. n73

§ 4.04(b)(3) Early Norman Judicial Activity.

Inevitably, a routine of judicial administration more methodical than the impromptu gatherings of nearby Norman nobles became necessary. At the time of the Conquest, the monarch's representative in the various localities was the sheriff, who had some judicial powers. It was in the king's interest to hold the sheriff's powers in check; the best control achieved by the Normans, albeit inadvertently, was in connection with steps taken to deal with financial matters. The king's agent or deputy over financial matters came to be called the chief justiciar, or Justiciar of All England. He often presided over royal court gatherings at Easter and Michaelmas that accepted and audited money returns from sheriffs and other officers. The justiciar also resolved disputes arising from these accounts before the barons of the exchequer. By the time of William II (of England, 1087-1100), justiciars had been appointed over shires to perform comparable judicial and fiscal functions. n74

In addition, because the king had to resolve disputes between tenants in chief, a judge, or justiciar -- appointed as the king's agent, but still acting within the old Anglo-Saxon framework -- tried such cases, which were commenced by royal writ:

> The hearings were held at the full meetings of the shire courts where local men, including Englishmen, could pronounce on the custom of the country. Thus native tradition and feudal law were able to some extent to merge. There was not always time to examine the many witnesses closely. So the method used was of a sworn verdict being given by a group of men whom the court appointed. We cannot find a definite precedent in Normandy, though the Franks were familiar with the idea of a collective verdict, as also were the most populated parts of the Danelaw [in England]. The origins of the jury are lost in obscurity, but the wide use of it certainly goes back to William; Domesday Book was compiled from the verdicts of juries all over England. n75

Eventually, Henry II (1154-1189) removed local justiciars and replaced them with itinerant or traveling justices, who were regular judicial officers. n76 In the 13th and 14th centuries these justices sometimes exercised a sweeping jurisdiction referred to as the General Eyre. It has been observed that "there was much important legislation effected by means of instructions to the justices as they set out upon their Eyre," n77 and it should be noted that this was a crucial process in the formation of the common law. Centralization of judicial power continued, and eventually pleas concerning land were placed exclusively in royal jurisdiction.

Henry II also greatly increased the use of writs and sworn juries. n78 Writs, of course, had been a prominent feature of Anglo-Saxon administration. For the first four years of his reign in England, William retained Edward's Anglo-Saxon clerks, who assisted both the king and his justiciars. These clerks and their successors functioned under the direction of the chancellor, who was in charge of religious services and of writing activities. One of William's administrative improvements was to expand the issuance of writs, using them as a method of quickly sending commands throughout England. Writs were actually sent only after being authenticated by the seal of the chancellor. n79

Except for these rather subtle changes of practice at the highest administrative levels, the Anglo-Norman kings made no significant changes in the court system or procedures that had existed under the Anglo-Saxons. Even William's most important judicial innovation, establishing separate bishop's courts to enforce canon law as he had in Normandy, was aimed at reforming the church, not at improving the secular legal system. n80

Complaints against the aggressive and somewhat rapacious activities of the justices in Eyre led to yet another reform by Henry II: he chose five officials of his personal household to constitute a permanent court that would not depart from the King's Court, n81 and also would not have the financial functions that made the justices in Eyre so unpopular. This group of five justices was to remain with the king, and so was expected to travel with the king. Eventually known as the Court of Common Pleas, this court was eventually required by the Magna Carta to be in one place, n82 which place was naturally Westminster. Frequently the more important matters before the Court of Common Pleas were referred to the important counselors closest to the king, who eventually developed their own procedure for handling such referred matters and became a new court, the Court of King's Bench. The Court of King's Bench did not become an institution separate from the royal council until the reign of Edward I (1239-1307).

Maitland identified six ways in which the royal judicial institutions stimulated the development of the common law. These are, as summarized and paraphrased by Plucknett: n83

> (1) Under the Norman kings the Crown by its writ of right supplied the real or imaginary defects of justice in the feudal courts.
>
> (2) Under Henry II it was established that no man need answer for his freehold without a royal writ unless he cared to. n84
>
> (3) Henry II also ordained that a defendant in certain pleas of land in the King's Court could have a jury trial (grand assize) instead of battle if he chose.
>
> (4) The possessory assizes established by Henry deliberately ignored the feudal courts and by their swiftness immediately became very popular.
>
> (5) The idea of contempt was used very effectively. The King would issue a writ ordering a subject to do right and justice, and if he refused, he was guilty of contempt of the King's writ. The defendant in a writ of debt, for example, not only denies his liability, but also denies tort and force in resisting the King's command.
>
> (6) The idea of the King's peace was not only the basis of criminal jurisdiction, but could also be used to enlarge the civil jurisdiction of the King's Court. This was effected through the action of trespass, which although criminal in form was constantly becoming more and more a civil action.

§ 4.04(b)(4) Early Norman Law-making Activity.

Although much of early Norman law-making activity in England is lost from history, perhaps more has been preserved than is the case for other European governments of that period. William was keenly aware of the legal issues affecting his claim to the English throne and was eager to promote the continuity of life and law that only a legitimate successor could provide. At his coronation ceremony in Westminster Abbey, he swore "he would rule justly and with kingly care the whole people placed under him, that he would make and keep right law, and that he would utterly prohibit all spoliation and unrighteous judgments." n85

Only a few charters, writs, and legal decrees are known to have been issued during William I's reign. n86 At an early date, the decrees were compiled into a single document, known as "The Laws of William the Conqueror." The decrees effected no noteworthy change in English legal tradition. Indeed, their most important provision, Clause 7, quoted in full below, secures to the people their ancient legal customs. These decrees may be summarized as follows:

> 1. A wish for reverence for God, faith in Christ, and peace between English and Normans.
>
> 2. All freemen will affirm by oath their loyalty to William.

3. Special protection is given against murder of Normans, including fines to be paid by the entire hundred where the killing occurred.

4. Normans are to pay "scot and lot" according to English law.

5. Cattle sales are to be in towns before witnesses.

6. Trial by battle is an available procedure in disputes between English and Normans.

7. "This also I command and will, that all shall have and hold the law of King Edward in respect of their lands and all their possessions, with the addition of those decrees I have ordained for the welfare of the English people."

8. The frankpledge system is imposed, securing court appearances when summoned.

9. Slaves are not to be sold outside the country.

10. Punishment is to be by blinding or mutilation rather than by execution. n87

One other very important early Anglo-Norman legal document is the "Coronation Charter" of Henry I, believed to have influenced the Magna Carta. This document, summarized below, also preserves the old English laws, especially in Clause 13, which is quoted in full:

1. The Church is to be free of certain abuses and oppressions to which it was formerly subject.

2. Only just reliefs are to be charged for redemption of a decedent's land.

3. The king will not require payment for his counsel in marriage matters; widows will not be given in marriage without their consent.

4. Widows with minor children shall retain dowry and marriage portion, and will not be given in marriage without their consent.

5. Special taxes to compensate for depreciated coinage will no longer be levied.

6. Many pleas and debts owed to his brother the late king are forgiven.

7. Disposition of movable property belonging to a baron who dies intestate is explained.

8. Forfeitures by barons need to be covered by movable property only to the amount of the forfeiture.

9. All murder-fines incurred before the coronation are remitted; all future murder-fines are to be paid according to the law of King Edward.

10. The forests of William I are retained.

11. Men holding land in military tenure for knight service are exempted from taxes and other services, so that they may properly equip themselves.

12. "I establish a firm peace in all my kingdom, and I order that this peace shall henceforth be kept."

13. "I restore to you the law of King Edward together with such emendations to it as my father made with the counsel of his barons."

14. Property seized since the death of William II shall be returned. n88

Both of the above documents demonstrate the dearth of original Norman contribution to English law. These documents, as well as the low level of legislative activity by these Norman rulers, who were preoccupied with self-preservation, confirm that much of the legal foundation of the Old English state is the principal source of common law. The Normans excelled at adopting and adapting cultures of the people they dominated. Despite the fact that the transition from their rough Viking traditions and tongue to Gallo-Frankish ways was still relatively recent, they were able to assimilate the old English ways basically intact. This trait is well illustrated by the introduction of feudal military tenures into continental Norman landholding, the systematic use of such tenures by William to create a stable military force for Normandy, and William's further refinements of uniformity in applying these military tenures to an existing set of English tenures. n89

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 59. Cnut eventually conquered Norway in 1028, adding it to his Anglo-Danish empire. But see Patrick Wormald, Frederic William Maitland and the Earliest English Law, 16 L. & Hist. Rev. 1 (Spring 1998) (contending that Maitland underrated the part played by the earliest Kings of England in shaping a distinctive English legal tradition).

(n2)Footnote 60. See generally Frank Barlow, Edward The Confessor (1970).

(n3)Footnote 61. Vita Aedwardi Regis, The Life of King Edward 17 (Frank Barlow ed. and trans. 1962).

(n4)Footnote 62. William of Poitiers, Gesta Guillelmi Ducis Normannorum Et Regis Anglorum 204 (R. Foreville ed. 1952).

(n5)Footnote 63. R. Allen Brown, The Normans 61-63 (1984).

(n6)Footnote 64. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 678 (1943).

(n7)Footnote 65. Id. at 596.

(n8)Footnote 66. 2 Orderic Vitalis, The Ecclesiastical History of Orderic Vitalis 232 (Marjorie Chibnall ed. 1969).

(n9)Footnote 67. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 596-697 (1943).

(n10)Footnote 68. R. Allen Brown, The Normans 71-73 (1984).

(n11)Footnote 69. Id. at 75, 77.

(n12)Footnote 70. D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 305-306 (1964).

(n13)Footnote 71. John Le Patourel, The Norman Empire 138 n.1, 139, 155-157 (1976).

(n14)Footnote 72. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 324-325 (1974).

(n15)Footnote 73. The early developments which eventually led to formation of a parliamentary body in England are described in 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 198-200 (2d ed. 1909).

(n16)Footnote 74. Francis James West, The Justiciarship in England 1066-1232 10-13 (1966); John Le Patourel, The Norman Empire 143-145, 274 (1976); 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 156-159 (2d ed. 1909).

(n17)Footnote 75. Jack Lindsay, The Normans and Their World 328-329 (1974).

(n18)Footnote 76. John Le Patourel, The Norman Empire 260 (1976). See Ralph V. Turner, Judges, Administrators and the Common Law in Angevin England, ch. 1 (1994).

(n19)Footnote 77. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 145 (5th ed. 1956).

(n20)Footnote 78. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 138-153 (2d ed. 1909).

(n21)Footnote 79. D. C. Douglas, William The Conqueror 147-148, 292-293 (1964).

(n22)Footnote 80. Writ of William I concerning spiritual and temporal courts (1072-1076, and probably April 1072), in 2 English Historical Documents 604-605 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953)."Although dramatically quickening the pace of change, the legal reforms of Henry II were to some extent a reflectionof a society that was already changing." Paul Dalton, Conquest, Anarchy And Lordship 275, ch. 7 (1994). See also John Hudson, The Formation of the English Common Law, ch. 7 (1996).

(n23)Footnote 81. Select Charters and Other Illustrations of English Constitutional History 131 (William Stubbs ed., 1881).

(n24)Footnote 82. Magna Carta, c. 17 (1215); c. 11 (1225).

(n25)Footnote 83. Frederic William Maitland, The Constitutional History of England 111-114 (1968), summarized In Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 156 (5th ed. 1956).

(n26)Footnote 84. Glanvill, XII, 25.

(n27)Footnote 85. Select passages from the annals ascribed to Florence of Worcester, in 2 English Historical Documents 204, 214 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n28)Footnote 86. See editor's introduction to 'The Laws of William the Conqueror,' in 2 English Historical Documents 399 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n29)Footnote 87. "The Laws of William the Conqueror,' in 2 English Historical Documents 399-400 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n30)Footnote 88. The 'Coronation Charter' of Henry I in (5 August 1100), 2 English Historical Documents 400-402 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n31)Footnote 89. See generally John Hudson, "Anglo-Norman Land Law and the Origins of Property," in Law And Government In Medieval England And Normandy 198-222. (George Garnett and John Hudson eds., Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.05

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.05 English Land Tenures and Feudalism After the Conquest.

§ 4.05(a) William the Conqueror's Claim to All English Land.

> England belonged to [William] in a sense in which it had never belonged to any previous king. All landholders, lay and ecclesiastical, were his tenants and held of him; moreover, all who held land of the greater tenants were also the King's men and owed him allegiance. Thus there was nothing comparable to freehold tenure in post-Conquest England. n90

It is clear that William assumed tenurial lordship over all English land, but it is unclear on what theory this claim was based. If William was the legitimate successor to Edward the Confessor, then he would have simply stepped into that king's prerogatives over English land, much of which (especially bookland) would perhaps have been held as freehold, without obligation to the king except for the occupants' customary duties of military service, road building and fortress repairs. n91 He also could claim ultimate ownership of lands forfeited by those English lords who had opposed him in 1066 and after. However, any claim to ownership over all English land would more logically be based on the right and result of conquest, a position objectionable to William in his striving for legitimacy in his rule of England. Not until 1086, 20 years after Hastings, did William require an oath of fealty from all free men, which would be consistent with his claim to ultimate ownership of all English land: "All free men will affirm by oath their loyalty to William." n92

It appears that William's earlier intention was to rule over a genuine Anglo-Norman state, with Norman barons replacing only those English who actively opposed William. Until 1069, this was still a realistic possibility, because, despite the forfeitures resulting from Hastings, in 1069 more than two-thirds of England was still held under English earls, and the king's writs were still written in English and being sent to mostly English sheriffs. n93 This changed after William overcame the series of rebellions that commenced in 1069, so that by the time of the Domesday Survey in 1086, only two Englishmen held lands directly of the king:

> William gave almost one-fourth of England to ten of his principal followers and made grants to lesser barons of the smaller fiefs or holdings of English earls and thegns. Normally, the grants were not of a compact territorial unit but consisted of manors scattered through several counties. n94

These grants to relatives and leading followers of the king were under a form of military tenure by which the recipient of the land was required to swear fealty to the king and agree to provide a specific number of battle-ready knights when required by the king. Such requirements of knight service, considered to burden the land itself, were even imposed upon holders of church lands, whose quotas of knights amounted to about 800 of the 5,000 knights' services obtained by William through military tenures. The barons on whom these requirements were imposed directly probably did not number more than 180. n95 With such heavy reliance on military tenure, William was undoubtedly reluctant to depend on Englishmen who had not yet adopted the military tactics and organization used by William with such success at Hastings.

§ 4.05(b) Feudal Relationships in the Eleventh Century.

§ 4.05(b)(1) Characteristics of Feudalism.

Land held by military tenure was known as an honor or a fief, and was the main component of a social system that would be described as feudal. In a very general sense, feudalism can be said to have arisen as a necessary response to Viking aggressions throughout Europe:

> Consequently in all fields of life the military expert was predominant, and for a time even overshadowed his great mediaeval rival, the religious expert. Between the two of them, the military and the clergy, there was little room for anything else. So grave was the crisis that populations willingly (and wisely) accepted the domination of the knights and the clergy as the only means of saving Europe and its culture from barbarian invaders, and both of them did their duty. But the social consequences of this were serious and showed how high a price had to be paid for such precarious security as feudalism could afford. Towns and city life were hard put to find a place in the feudal system, while the peasantry had no alternative but to accept serfdom. n96

While no firm consensus can be established on the precise meaning or elements of feudalism, the feudal relationships that evolved on the continent and formed part of the Norman experience can be described in a general sense, with the cautionary reminder that change was constantly occurring and wide variations existed at any point in time:

> Feudal relationships and customs were based on the mutual obligations of lord and man (vassal), obligations which go back so far into the common Germanic past of northern Europe that their origins cannot be discerned. The tie between lord and vassal was established by the act of homage and oath of fealty. In the act of homage, the vassal knelt before his lord, offering his clasped hands which the lord enclosed in his own, and promised service and fidelity in return for protection. He then swore an oath, the oath of fealty, to the same effect, with his hands upon a relic or a gospel-book. The bond thus established was perhaps the most important social tie in northern Europe (including England) throughout the Dark Ages and the medieval period. n97

Despite such solemnity, the feudal relationship could be dissolved and was "decidedly weak; it was only while the religious and social sanctity attaching to homage endured that a lord could have any reasonable dependence upon the armed assistance of his vassals." n98

The attachment of feudal obligations to the land meant that, with the exception of those at the top of the "feudal pyramid," no lands in a feudal society were owned, they were held, and the holdings could be revoked for breach of feudal obligations. In societies just emerging into feudalism, the holdings extended only for the tenant's life, with regrants of the land to the landholder's descendants dependent upon the lord's discretion and favor.

The military nature of the most feudal obligations at the top of the system determined the organizational structure for feudal landholding. A land holding called a knight's fee was by definition required to provide one knight. The size of the holding might differ from place to place, but, especially in Norman England, the lands and the extent of their obligations for knights, were expressed with great specificity. After knights lost their preeminence in military activities, such service was often commuted to money payments, and knights' fees continued to play an important role in the fiscal system of England.

Feudalism was also characterized by a remarkable decentralization of governing powers. Most defensive activity was carried out by local leaders exercising powers of government in their localities. n99 Especially prominent among the non-military powers was the exercise of legal jurisdiction, and the associated requirement of court attendance, over a lord's tenants.

§ 4.05(b)(2) Possible Sources of Feudalism.

While feudalism may have arisen in response to the Viking crises, its elements may have derived from several institutions extant in Europe during Roman and post-Roman times. These several streams of influence are summarized as individual elements and discussed in the following subsections: n100

§ 4.05(b)(2)(i) The Comitatus.

The comitatus in prehistoric Germany was the warrior band that resulted from an early Germanic custom by which a chief would surround himself with warrior companions and enter into a personal bond with them. n101 A comparable late Roman institution encountered by encroaching Germanic invaders would have been the band of soldiers retained by the emperor or general for his personal service. The leader provided each soldier with a military outfit, but upon the soldier's death, the outfit would be returned to the leader. From these arrangements feudalism may have derived the oath of fealty and the custom of returning military equipment upon the death of the knight/tenant.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(ii) Patronage.

A Roman institution, albeit extra-legal, that may have contributed to feudal traits, was patronage. In the old Roman practice, clients would "commend" themselves to the "faith" of a more wealthy and powerful patron. In practical terms, the clients gave service and counsel to the patron, who in turn defended the clients in litigation and in other ways. When the 5th-century Theodosian Code declaimed clients' attempts to commend their lands as well as themselves, that certainly revealed that land commendation had been introduced and somewhat abused. Land commendation to a patron may have been driven somewhat by Roman taxation, which fell heaviest on smaller landholders and left in place huge exemptions for the larger and more powerful owners. Thus, through patronage practices, smaller landholders may have gradually slipped into the status of dependant tenants.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(iii) The Precarium and the Precaria.

A property interest that had only a tentative existence in Roman property law, the precarium may also have contributed to the development of feudal property interests. If a person petitioned a landowner for possession of some of the land, the petitioner might be granted a precarium the right to occupy and use a parcel of land, revocable at will or at the death of either party. Though fragile, this possessory interest was protected against third parties. In Roman practice, a debtor might surrender land to a creditor, receiving the land back as a precarium, until the debt was paid and the original property interests restored. When, under the patronage practices, commendation of land began to occur, the precarium would have facilitated the process: the client would turn over land to the patron, and receive back a possessory interest in the same land in the form of a precarium. By the 6th century, the Christian church had become a major landholder and very frequently granted precaria to its donors and others. Changes in custom occurred, so that some grants in precarium were for life, or for several generations, and others for a specific number of years. The grants for years would sometimes be renewable upon payment of rent, and came to be called a precaria, rather than a precarium. Little certain information about the origins and history of these interests is available, but there can be little doubt that they eventually contributed to the rise of feudal interests in land. n102

§ 4.05(b)(2)(iv) Conditional Grants by Merovingian Monarchs.

In their attempts to establish order and a semblance of stable government during the 6th and 7th centuries, Merovingian rulers made to their faithful followers large grants of land that were in theory allodial, or in more modern terminology, in freehold. Without other significant sources of revenue, however, these royal grantors came to expect some form of payment for their approval of succession to the lands by the donees' heirs. In any event, the grant was considered revocable, and might even be conditioned on the donee rendering future services. These developments, too, contributed to the rise of feudal practices.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(v) Use of Precariae by Carolingian Monarchs.

The Carolingian successors of the Merovingians concentrated their efforts on gaining control of the huge landholdings of the church. As an alternative to outright confiscation, the church agreed to grant precariae to donees designated by the monarch, with the donees expected to pay nominal rents to the church and render services to the monarch. Even without royal prodding, the church extensively used precariae (that is, a form of precarium under which some rent was given in exchange for the property interest), to secure tenants to work smaller, scattered holdings. These grants came to be called "benefices." n103

§ 4.05(b)(2)(vi) Military Service as a Condition of Grants in Precarium.

The grants of precariae given in response to royal recommendation had come, by circa 750, to be conditioned on the donee's rendering military service to the monarch (not necessarily to the grantor). By the time of Charlemagne's reign, all who held such interests were required to give some type of military service, not just those who held land directly from the monarch. Because many who held precarium interests were smallholders, they were permitted to combine their efforts to meet obligations of military service. This led to more definite notions of the extent of land that would support a knight, so that on the eve of the Norman Conquest, Normandy had recognized and regularized the so-called knight's fee.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(vii) Landholding and Jurisdictional Independence.

Deep in both German and Roman customs were impulses to recognize some degree of legal independence associated with landholding. The legal power of the landholder over his own household recognized by Germanic custom found its more extreme counterpart in Roman practice, which frequently accorded to the largest landowners the rights and profits of exercising legal jurisdiction in their domains. Within these rights of jurisdiction arose institutions that would eventually become feudal courts. Two streams of tradition are possible origins of the such courts. The old Germanic relationship of lord and vassal may have been the predecessor of the feudal jurisdiction and courts; on the other hand, there may have been a customary court conducted by the community of freemen, a type of public court, which came to be dominated by one or more large landholders. Some evidence suggests that French feudal courts derived from the old public courts that were taken over by private landowners. In such communal courts, judgment was given by landholders who were obligated to function in their court role because of their landholdings, and whose successors were therefore sometimes hereditary. When the fulfilling of these judicial functions became too burdensome for individual landholders, the local lord, drawing from the other stream of tradition, could compel designated vassals to perform the obligations of court.

§ 4.05(b)(2)(viii) Summary.

The rise of European feudalism was a complicated and attenuated process whose causes can only be guessed at from great distances of time and space. Moreover, devotees of the subject still disagree over feudalism's distinguishing features. Yet, the preceding paragraphs suggest several characteristics of medieval European society that evolved into a distinctive form of social organization that could be called feudal. Among these are: (1) the loyalty to a lord implicit in the comitatus and explicit in patronage; (2) the expression of that loyalty by relinquishing of land to a superior party, the lord, in return for protection and other benefits, and the return of that land with possessory rights only, and those much burdened by conditions and obligations increasingly denoting relatively servile and dependent status; (3) the eventual prominence of military service as the condition of greatest importance, attached to the landholdings of those in the upper tiers of the social hierarchy; and (4) consistent with government decentralization forced by the social disintegration of the Dark Ages, a relinquishing of judicial and other public functions to the larger feudal landholders.

§ 4.05(b)(3) Description of Typical Feudal Tenures and Incidents.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(i) Military Tenure.

As with other feudal tenures, it is impossible to take a snapshot of English military tenure that accurately portrays this form of landholding for any other period and place:

> In some of our modern books military tenure has a definiteness and a stability which it never had elsewhere. Any army is settled on the land, is rooted in the land. The grades in "the service" correspond to, and indeed are, the grades of landholdership; the supreme landlord is commander-in-chief; each of his immediate tenants is the general of an army corps; the regiments, squadrons, companies, answer to honours and manors or knight's fees ... When, however, we look at the facts, all this definiteness, all this stability, vanish. n104

The viability of the military tenure as a tool of national defense in England extended for about a century after the Conquest. Military tenure itself had a much longer existence, however, being adapted to serve national needs in less direct ways. While military tenure had become somewhat characteristic of upper level Norman society, in fact the Conquest of England afforded the Normans both the opportunity and necessity of refining military tenures to hold fast their English gains. However, this process was not commenced by command, but was evolutionary:

> Soon after the Conquest a process begins whereby the duty of service in the army becomes rooted in the tenure of the land. This goes on for a century; but before it is finished, before the system of knight's fees has been well ordered and arranged, the kings are already discovering that the force thus created is not what they want, or is not all that they want. n105

In theory, at least, the tenant under obligation of military service provided the requisite number of battle-ready knights for a period of up to forty days, and for service only within the realm. The leading lords were bound to provide knights in multiples of fives or tens, but the actual number seemed to bear no relation to the richness of the tenant's property resources; rather, "political and personal considerations seem to have been uppermost." n106 The tenants in chief remained ready to meet this requirement either by retaining the knights in the lord's own household, or by granting parcels of land to others who would agree to supply part of the quota -- the process of subinfeudation -- or a combination of both methods. Not until about 1070 were the quotas for William's tenants in chief fixed, but there is some evidence that the process of subinfeudation was leaky, and that the leading lords' obligations were not fully supplied by their tenants.

As knight service became obsolete, or some of the great landholders deemed themselves ill-prepared to provide warriors, a substitute for knight service arose, called scutage, which was nothing more than a money payment in lieu of providing men. When scutage first appears in the available historical evidence at about 1100, it was being applied to landholdings of the church, but not many decades later it was being applied to all other kinds of tenants. Scutage also was paid by those who held by subinfeudation. Indeed, the obligation of scutage was typically imposed on the full hierarchy of subtenants.

Two forces combined to shorten the life of scutage. The cost of equipping a knight increased, making the burdens fixed in 1070 too great for some to bear; apparently by negotiations some quotas were reduced, and those tenants often preferred to send the reduced number of knights rather than the scutage substitute for the original higher number of knights. At the same time, when the scutage for a particular tenant became a fixed sum, the value of that sum steadily declined in the face of inflation, and it became less attractive and effective for the monarchy to rely on scutage arrangements. By the end of the second century after the Conquest, scutage had become solely a source of revenue and in this role it served as an irritant to landowners until formally abolished in 1660.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(ii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Homage.

Besides the principal duty of military assistance, knight service carried several significant auxiliary conditions, or incidents. The most ancient of these was homage. Homage has been described as the "ceremony by which the tenant became the lord's man." n107 It consisted of a type of "bond" between tenant and lord, by which the tenant sought the lord's honor in all things. It has been said that by the bond of homage the tenant should "love whom his lord loves, [and] hate whom he hates." n108 The early felony arose when the tenant breached this duty of faithful service. Homage retained a vitality well beyond that of a merely traditional formality. Glanvill, in the 12th century, was concerned about the dilemma of owing homage to two lords who disputed with one another. n109 Even in the 13th century, Bracton's treatise provided a lengthy explanation of the reciprocal obligations implicit in homage and the precise wording of the oath of fealty that declared the homage relationship between lord and tenant. n110 A case from the Eyre Rolls tells of a tenant who surrendered his land and his homage to his lord, "when he felt himself aggrieved by the harsh lordship," on condition that he give it to an abbey. n111

Though homage was an incident of knight service, it, too, had incidents of its own:

> The effect of homage is this, that if one has done homage to another, his true lord or a non-lord, he cannot withdraw from such lord or his homage without judgment, as long as he holds the tenement, either in demesne or in service, by which he is bound to homage. Because of the bond of homage the tenant may do nothing to the disherison of his lord or his severe injury, nor conversely, may the lord so act toward the tenant. If either so acts homage is completely dissolved and extinguished, and the nexus and obligation of homage, since they act contrary to homage and the oath of fealty, and it will be a just judgment that they be punished with respect to that in which they offend, that is, if it is the lord, that he lose his lordship; if the tenant, his tenement... n112

In a particular case known to Bracton, a lord lost his lordship over land by exercising undue influence over a ward and wrongfully colluding with another to deprive the ward of her land. n113

§ 4.05(b)(3)(iii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Wardship.

Apparently connected with the incident of homage was the incident of wardship, the right of the lord to custody of a minor tenant's land until the tenant came of age. n114 In Normandy of the late twelfth century, it was declared that the wardship should not be exercised by the mother or kinsmen, because of possible conflict of interest, but only by the lord, because he was bound to the ward's late father through the tie of homage:

> A fatherless heir must be in ward to some one. Who shall be his guardian? His mother? No. Why not? She will take another husband and have sons by him, and they, greedy of the heritage, will slay their firstborn brother, or the step-father will slay his step-son. Who then shall be the guardian? The child's blood kinsmen? No. Why not? Lest, thirsting for his heritage, they destroy him. For the prevention of such faithless cruelty, it is established that the boy be in ward to one who was bound to his father by the tie of homage. And who is such an one? The lord of the land who never can inherit that land in demesne; for heirs of a noble race always have many heirs. Besides they should be brought up in good houses and honourably educated. Those who are brought up in their lords' houses are the apter to serve their lords faithfully and love them in truth; and the lords cannot look with hatred on those whom they have reared, but will love them and faithfully guard their woods and tenements and apply the profits of their land to their advancement. n115

However, recognizing the right of wardship in the lord may have been a Norman innovation following the Conquest. Apparently the Anglo-Saxon tradition had conferred the right of wardship on the widow and mother, n116 and this was still the practice at the beginning of the 12th century in England, as recognized in the so-called Coronation Charter of Henry I. n117 The first documentary evidence for a right of wardship in the lord does not appear until the Assize of Northhampton in 1176. n118

In some of the medieval documents a distinction is drawn between the right to have possession of the ward's lands and a comparable right to have custody and care of the ward's person. That such questions should even be raised probably means that rights of land occupants had advanced since the age when possessory prerogatives ended upon the tenant's death, and all power over the land reverted to the lord. n119 Additionally, the lord could treat the wardship as an assignable right and, quite frequently, wardships were bought and sold as rather lucrative investments.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(iv) Incidents of Military Tenure: Marriage.

Associated with wardship issues was the incident of marriage. If one underlying concern for proper supervision of a minor's lands was the fulfillment of feudal obligations, the same concern arose with respect to the widow of a landholder. Even in Anglo-Saxon times, remarriage of tenants' widows and daughters sometimes took place as directed by the tenants' lords. The Normans actively extended this practice. By 1100 a lord was required to consult with the king when marriage of the lord's daughter was proposed, and if the lord was dead, the king was entitled to determine the daughter's marriage and the disposition of her lands. n120 This practice persisted into the reign of Henry II in the latter part of the 12th century. n121 In 1193, however, is the first documentary evidence for the king directing the marriage of sons as well as daughters, and, of course, these decisions were made a matter of sale. Selling of wardships and marriages of widows and daughters by the king is shown by evidence a century older. n122 It has been observed that if the king was gradually losing prerogatives over tenants' lands as inheritability and alienability rights advanced, it was not without price, as "in England feudalism itself becomes commercial." n123

§ 4.05(b)(3)(v) Incidents of Military Tenure: Aids.

If any incident of knight service invited unrestrained caprice, it was the incident of aids. Theoretically, the obligation of aid owed by the knight tenant to the lord could be required for any one of numerous circumstances that were neither regular nor well-defined. Custom eventually settled on just three occasions when aid could be required: to ransom the lord, to knight the lord's oldest son, and to conclude the marriage of the lord's oldest daughter. As with scutage, the obligation to pay an aid would be passed on to the full hierarchy of subtenants. n124

§ 4.05(b)(3)(vi) Incidents of Military Tenure: Relief.

The incident of knight tenure called relief emerged from the times when a military tenant's holding was not automatically passed to the heir. When the military tenant died, the relief was the amount paid to the tenant's lord for permission for the tenant's heir to continue the tenancy. The amount of the relief payment was at first arbitrary, and thus subject to abuse, but later came to be regulated by charter n125 and statute, n126 varying in amount according to the extent of the tenant's holdings. When relief payments were stabilized, the inheritability of the knight's tenancy was secured. If the decedent was a tenant in chief of the monarch, the monarch had the right to require relief payments for all the decedent's holdings, whether or not held directly of the king.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(vii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Escheat.

Escheat, the reverting of land possession and ownership to the lord or the monarch, was another incident associated with knight tenancy, and could occur either upon the tenant's death without an heir or upon the tenant's commission of a felony. Although lands often escheated to the monarch, they would escheat to an intervening lord if the lordship could be shown. n127 Escheat could also occur when the tenant committed a felony, and the frequency with which such escheats occurred depended almost entirely on what acts were regarded as felonies. In the immediate decades after the Conquest, refusing to render services due to the lord was one of the few felonies then recognized, but even that was soon removed from the list of felonies. Another restraint on the incidence of felony escheat was that eventually the monarch claimed a right to hold such escheated land for a year and a day and to commit waste on it during that time, before relinquishing possession to the lord.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(viii) Incidents of Military Tenure: Forfeiture.

Forfeiture was a related incident of knight tenure similarly limited in value to the lord:

> In the case of treason the whole of the traitor's lands, of whomsoever they were held, were forfeited to the Crown and the lord got nothing unless the Crown granted the escheated land away; in that case the mesne tenancies revived. n128

§ 4.05(b)(3)(ix) Serjeanty Tenures and Their Incidents.

Serjeanty tenures apparently arose in the thirteenth century, and so were not part of the feudal characteristics introduced by the earliest Anglo-Norman monarchs. Serjeanties that would be later identified as grand serjeanties were typically rendered by tenants in chief and, in earlier times, were scarcely distinguishable from knights' tenancies. The so-called "grand serjeanties" of the 13th century included such duties as carrying the banner of the king, carrying the lance of the king, leading the king's army, being the king's marshal, and carrying the king's sword at his coronation, among others. n129 It was also possible for tenants of lords other than the king to hold by serjeanty tenure, either to serve the lord or to serve the monarch.

Serjeanty tenures covered a huge variety of serving relationships, and perhaps that is why the incident of relief that applied to this tenure was still not fixed in amount even long after reliefs for other tenures were stabilized. Also, because so many of the serjeanty tenures were intended to render personal service directly to the king, royal permission to alienate such a tenure was consistently required, even after the king no longer insisted on being consulted to alienate other tenures. Because of the types of service required of a serjeanty tenure, it was considered not subject to partition among co-heiresses, but instead was taken in entirety by the oldest sister. Incidents common to other tenures also applied to serjeanty:

> As to wardship and marriage of tenants by serjeanty there was much dispute, and in course of time a line was drawn between what were called "grand" and what were called "petty" serjeanties. n130

§ 4.05(b)(3)(x) Free Socage Tenures and Their Incidents.

"Any tenure that on the one hand is free and on the other hand is not spiritual, nor military, nor 'serviential,' is called tenure in free socage." n131 Tenure in free socage eventually developed as the one great residual tenancy for almost every arrangement that was not military tenure. It also was free of the most burdensome incidents of military tenure, so that it became the tenancy of choice, even if holding it inferred a relatively lower social status.

The very wide variety of socage tenures arose from several types of circumstances. For instance, a tenant might be bound to render only nominal services or rents to the lord, either because the conveyance might be between related persons, or the grantee had actually purchased the land: "to have put the purchaser in the vendor's place might have been difficult, perhaps impossible [given the restrictions on alienability at the time]; so the purchaser is made tenant to the vendor at an insignificant rent." n132 For some socage tenures a more substantial rent in money or goods or produce was demanded, possibly the result of some bargaining by lords and tenants trying to strike the best deals that economic circumstances would allow. Other socage tenures imposed requirements of ordinary agricultural labor, even if the tenant was an important aristocrat. These duties would have been fulfilled by the socage tenant's undertenants and "seem to be the channel by which the term socage gradually spreads itself." n133 At times it might have been quite natural for a villein able to supply some needed labor services to step up into a socage tenure that was ordinarily open only to free persons. Indeed, some socage tenants were barely distinguishable from the unfree villeins. n134

§ 4.05(b)(3)(xi) Tenure in Burgage.

Tenancy in burgage was an anomaly in the tenurial system. It was a tenure found only in the towns and boroughs and extended only to a burgess, a free member of the medieval commune or town. Burgage was similar to free socage in that the tenant, whose tenancy usually consisted of a house in the town, was required only to pay a small rent, with no other services required except for occasional light agricultural services. Burgage, like free socage, was free of the majority of tenurial incidents, including homage, aids, and marriage, although relief was occasionally required and wardship usually applied. In place of the absent incidents, burgage was subject to the local customs pertaining to the borough or town. If a town had obtained from its lord control over its courts and profits, then burgage actions would be tried in those courts. Most questions of private law pertaining to burgage tenure, such as inheritability and dower, were determined by the customs of the town or borough, rather than by common law rules; burgage was often inheritable, devisable, and alienable. When a manor attained the status of a borough, the change could be signified by abolition of labor services, with burgage tenures in their place.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(xii) Tenure in Free Alms (Frankalmoign).

Frequently lands would be given to the church under one of the ordinary tenures described above. Other gifts of land would require the donee to perform some specific spiritual service, and were called tenure by divine service. Such tenure might also carry a requirement of fealty to the lord. Still other gifts of land to the church might exact no precise spiritual service, but were given for general spiritual benefit, and for which no fealty was required; these tenures were known as frankalmoign, or free alms. Gradually, such tenures came to be recognized in perpetuity and to be free of requirement for any secular services. More importantly, frankalmoign tenures came to be free of secular jurisdiction, being instead subject to the ecclesiastical courts, except that any preliminary question of the actual existence of frankalmoign tenure could be decided in the secular court.

§ 4.05(b)(3)(xiii) The Unfree "Tenure" of Villeinage.

The very large majority of the English population in the eleventh century consisted of peasants who were considered unfree, and whose landholding was in the unfree tenure known as villeinage. Although there was a close correlation between personal status and land tenure, it was possible for a free man to hold a parcel of land by villein tenure. Other unfree tenures, such as tenancies at will and for years, came to be widely held by free persons. Villein tenure could be distinguished from other tenures on the basis of the services villeins were required to render, that "consist chiefly of the duty of cultivating the lord's demense." n135 While the extent of such services was precisely defined by custom, the particular work to be done from day to day remained uncertain under villein tenure, and this may be seen as a distinction from comparable agricultural services sometimes required of free tenures:

> This then seems to have been the test usually applied by the king's court. If the labour services are "uncertain," the tenure is unfree; and it is a test which condemns as unfree the great bulk of the tenures which obliged men to perform any considerable amount of agricultural labour for their lord, because, however minutely some particulars of those services may be defined, there is generally a spacious room left for the play of the lord's will. Thus the test roughly coincides with another: -- labour service is not necessarily unfree, but a service which consists of much labour, of labour to be done all year round, is almost of necessity unfree; for almost of necessity the tenant will be bound to obey, within wide limits, whatever commands the lord or the lord's bailiff may give him. n136

Villeins, who were in effect serfs, were also distinct in that they were required to pay the merchet, a payment for the lord's leave for such activities as to give a daughter in marriage outside the manor, or send a son to school, or have a son ordained, or sell livestock. Villein tenants were also subject to a tax on their persons called tallage. The details of all these characteristics of villeinage differed widely from case to case and were in fact defined by ancient custom. Perhaps this necessary reliance on local custom was one factor prompting the judges of the royal courts to reject any jurisdiction of villein tenure. Instead, villein tenants had to seek protection and justice in the manor courts.

It is neither possible nor appropriate in this chapter to try recounting the long process by which villeinage, and indeed serfdom, came to dominate English society and economy. By the time of the Conquest, the process was no longer relevant because villeinage had become established, and the masses of villeins were perpetuated by birth. From a modern perspective it is easy to wince at the enormous restrictions on the personal liberties of villeins, but it should be acknowledged that these masses were nevertheless protected in their customary rights and not completely subject to the whims and caprice of their lords. n137

§ 4.05(b)(4) Early Rules on the Inheritability of Tenures.

The property law of post-Conquest England was characterized not only by a system of tenures and appurtenant incidents and burdens, but also consisted of rules for transferring these tenurial interests to others. In the period of the Conquest and ensuing settlement of England by the Normans, inheritability of free tenures had not yet been accepted and there was, in fact, much uncertainty about the duration of grants even to tenants in chief. Typically, the charters describing grants in the early post-Conquest years do not state whether the grant is for life, or whether the grantee's heirs have any claim on the tenancy. Thus the heir would usually have to obtain a regrant of the tenancy from the lord and to pay the lord a sum of money for that favor. Gradually, but in a relatively short time, the right of the heir to succeed to the tenancy came to be recognized, but the necessity to pay for the realization of that right also became a fixed custom, even if the amount of payment sometimes remained arbitrary. By 1100, the landholdings of tenants in chief were recognized as heritable, if the proper relief were paid, as affirmed in a charter of Henry I:

> If any of my barons, earls or other tenants-in-chief has died, his heir shall not redeem his land as he did in the time of my brother, but he shall pay the just and lawful relief for it.
>
> Similarly, the vassals of my barons shall pay the just and lawful relief for their lands to their lords. n138

Once the heritability of the highest tenures was recognized, it probably spread to the other tenures in the English feudal system. To the extent Anglo-Saxon bookland still influenced the customs by which land was held, such land could have been heritable, devisable, and alienable. n139

§ 4.05(b)(5) Early Rules on the Alienability of Tenures.

Alienation of land was a less urgent question in the 11th century, because the buying and selling of land was a rare occurrence. More commonly, land would be given to the church, and such alienation raised questions about the residual or latent rights of the donor's prospective heirs. To secure its title, the donee would obtain consents from the prospective heirs.

Quite likely the alienation of tenures occurred frequently from the time William I made the major grants to his chief followers after the Conquest. Those tenants in chief were permitted to transfer certain rights to portions of their lands to others in return for services or payments that would assist the tenant in chief to carry out the main feudal dues to the king, a process known as subinfeudation. Land so alienated by subinfeudation could be further alienated by the subtenants in the same way. Subinfeudation was widely practiced until prohibited by the Statute Quia Emptores in 1290; although it probably required the lord's consent, the consent would not be withheld if the customary sum of money was paid. That this was fixed by custom seems likely, because subinfeudation held potentially major disadvantages for the lord. While the services attached to the tenant's land could always be required, and forfeiture applied in case of default, subinfeudation threatened the potential value of the tenurial incidents to the lord. If, for instance, a tenant holding by knight service conveyed all or a part of the land to the church in frankalmoign and then died without heirs, the monetary value of the escheat to the lord would be insignificant.

Another form of alienation was substitution. This process simply replaced the old tenant with a new tenant, rather than creating a subtenancy. If subinfeudation may be likened to a sublease in modern landlord/tenant law, then substitution may be likened to an assignment. As with a modern assignment of a tenancy, the landlord could suffer some disadvantage if the new tenant was not as able or conscientious as the old, but the landlord's rights with respect to the tenancy were not harmed. Thus a substitution, while also subject to the customary requirement of consent and payment, was more freely permitted. Indeed, the same Statute Quia Emptores that prohibited subinfeudation in 1290, extended to all landholders but tenants in chief the right of substitution without payment of money to the overlord.

This discussion of alienation practices in the first generations after the Conquest must necessarily remain general, because there is very little direct and contemporary evidence of what actually occurred. By gathering inferences from statutes, legal writers and legal documents from later times, it is possible to make intelligent guesses about the practices of the 11th and 12th centuries. It must also be remembered that nowhere in England and at no time were such practices uniform; what is true for one locality at one point in time may not have been true for a neighboring area until 20 years later. Only with the emergence of a truly common law after the Conquest does it become more feasible to find principles of property law with general application. n140

§ 4.05(b)(6) Primogeniture.

If it is understood how a lord could object to subinfeudation because it threatened the value of tenurial incidents, or in some cases even the rendering of required services, then it is easier to understand why primogeniture had such a powerful appeal in a feudal system. Under primogeniture, the oldest assumes the tenancy upon the death of the father, and the younger sons take nothing. As applied to military tenures at times when the actual rendering of knight service was still important, primogeniture may have been somewhat of a necessity. Nevertheless, primogeniture persisted and even spread to other types of tenures long after the actual rendering of military services had lost its early importance. This is probably explained by the other attractions of keeping tenancies intact, as well as by the simple enduring power of custom.

While it has been surmised that English primogeniture was imported from Normandy, it is not clear that at the time of the Conquest Normandy had settled on a custom of primogeniture. A competing custom in Normandy divided the tenancy among all the surviving sons, but the shares of the younger brothers were all held feudally of the oldest. That primogeniture in England evolved at first as a matter of custom is shown by the fact that it was not universal. n141 While it was consistently applied at first only to the military tenures, it spread to the other tenures and even eventually to some of the villein tenures. These latter holdings most often descended in ultimogeniture, to the youngest son, as a means of keeping the holding intact, but it has also been suggested "that from a remote time many villein tenements have descended in a primogenitary course." n142

At the same time descent by primogeniture was spreading, customs were becoming more pronounced which prohibited a father from alienating land in ways inimical to expectant heirs. Thus, by Gla nvill's time at the end of the twelfth century, conveyances typically recited that the grantor's heirs apparent had consented to the transaction. n143 Even in the preceding century it was common in some areas for presumptive heirs to join in conveyances. n144 With the rise of primogeniture, however, it was no longer necessary to protect rights of children who would not inherit in any event, so the father's right of inter vivos alienation became less restrained. In fact, the father became free to alienate land in favor of younger sons, without the consent of the oldest son as expectant heir, and the oldest son would simply inherit whatever property was left when the father died. These changes were evolutionary, but they demonstrate the way in which the spread of primogeniture helped relax family restraints on alienation of land. Indeed, an oldest son could even be completely disinherited. If the grant were given with warranty, in which the grantor for himself and heirs ensured the grantee against other claims upon the grant, the oldest son had no rights in the land, even though he still had a burden of military service. n145

§ 4.05(b)(7) Mortmain.

Grants of land to churches and other institutional or corporate grantees effectively destroyed the value of some feudal incidents. These grants were referred to as grants in mortmain (dead hand), because the grantees were usually ecclesiastical corporations whose members, through their religious vows, were dead persons before the law.

Elimination or avoidance of feudal burdens had such a strong appeal that many landholders collusively granted lands to churches, but resumed possession as tenants of the grantee church. This abuse had reached such serious proportions by early in the thirteenth century that it was explicitly forbidden in the Magna Carta, upon penalty of forfeiture. n146 The prohibition was reiterated in the Statute of Mortmain in 1279, but by that time it was the practice to alienate in mortmain by first obtaining a license from the monarch. Great numbers of licenses were granted soon after passage of the statute, apparently for the immediate revenue they generated, and without regard for the losses in land such alienations might occasion for either the Crown or intermediate lords. n147

§ 4.05(c) The Domesday Survey and Its Influence.

The Domesday Survey is one of the most significant events in English and European medieval history. Representing, as it does, a record of the most thorough and methodical feudal state in medieval Europe, it is appropriate that its inception was explicitly and precisely noted in the contemporary record of The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle:

> The king spent Christmas with his councillors at Gloucester, and held his court there for five days, which was followed by a three-day synod held by the archbishop and the clergy....
>
> After this the king had important deliberations and exhaustive discussions with his council about this land, how it was peopled, and with what sort of men. Then he sent his men all over England into every shire to ascertain how many hundreds of "hides" of land there were in each shire, and how much land and live-stock the king himself owned in the country, and what annual dues were lawfully his from each shire. He also had it recorded how much land his archbishops had, and his diocesan bishops, his abbots and his earls, and -- though I may be going into too great detail -- and what or how much each man who was a landholder here in England had in land or in live-stock, and how much money it was worth. So very thoroughly did he have the inquiry carried out that there was not a single "hide," not one virgate of land, not even -- it is shameful to record it, but it did not seem shameful to him to do it -- not even one ox, nor one cow, nor one pig which escaped notice in his survey. And all the surveys were subsequently brought to him. n148

The project took about 18 months to complete. The principal focus of interest in the survey was the system of landholding and the customary conditions and services attached to the holdings, most of which pre-dated the Conquest. From ancient times the hide designated the amount of land needed to support a family of free persons. Although the acreage varied from place to place, often depending on the quality of the agricultural land, for revenue purposes the acreage was standardized at about 120. Comparable designations were the sulung in Kent and the carucate in East Anglia, Yorkshire, and the east Midlands. A quarter of a hide was a yardland, and an eighth of a carucate was a bovate.

The main purpose of the Domesday Survey cannot be determined with certainty. Traditionally, it was believed that the survey was intended to identify the Danegeld assessments. The Danegeld had originated in Viking times as an Anglo-Saxon device for raising money to buy off marauding Danish Vikings. A land tax, it was assessed according to the number of hides in a holding. William the Conqueror had already used the Danegeld assessments even before the Domesday Survey; it was an almost annual tax, imposed at a very high rate and based on detailed taxation records already in existence. The Domesday Survey did, however, gather data that was highly relevant to the Danegeld assessments and could have been used to update tax liabilities, some of which had not been reviewed since the eighth century. Also, because of a renewed threat of Danish invasion in 1085, William maintained a large force of foreign mercenaries in England during that year and may have sensed how keenly necessary an updated tax assessment schedule would be.

Another obvious purpose of the Domesday project was to create a record of who held what lands after the massive changes in manorial lordships over the two prior decades of Norman dominance. n149 While the survey gave great detail on the terms by which most free tenancies were held, it did not record the terms by which tenants in chief or their principal undertenants held.

The inquest was commenced in January 1086, and completed later that same year, probably by August 1. The compilation of information into the two-volume set, still known today and preserved in the original as the Domesday Book, was probably completed by September 1087. With England divided into circuits, information for each circuit was compiled probably from the accumulated returns of several sources, including original returns by landholders, statements of hundreds of juries made in county courts, county geld accounts and hidage schedules. The instructions for the survey have been preserved for one of the circuits and are probably typical:

> Here follows the inquiry concerning lands which the King's barons made according to the oaths of the sheriff of the county and of all the barons and their Frenchmen, and of the whole hundred court -- the priest, the reeve, and six villagers from each village. They inquired what the manor was called; who held it in 1066; who holds it now; how many hides there are; how many ploughteams in demesne and how many belonging to the men; how many villagers; how many cottagers; how many slaves; how many freemen; how many sokemen; how much woodland; how much meadow; how much pasture; how many mills; how many fisheries; how much has been added to or taken away from the manor; what it was worth and what it is worth now; and how much each freeman and sokeman had and has. All this to be recorded thrice; as it was in 1066, when King William granted the manor, and now. And it was also noted whether more could be taken from the manor than is now being taken. n150

Scholarly work using Domesday information is ongoing, and important socio-economic data from the survey will continue to be mined for many years to come. For casting light on the history of Anglo-American property law, the Domesday survey is most valuable as a confirmation that the landholding rights and duties of most Englishmen remained unchanged after the Conquest; the relationship of people to property that emerged during the centuries of Anglo-Saxon society persisted through the Norman settlement and was the foundation on which the common law of property was built. n151

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 90. Ann Williams, The Land of the Conqueror, in Domesday: 900 Years of England's Norman Heritage 47-48 (1986).

(n2)Footnote 91. It must be acknowledged, however, that even by his claim to "the entire range of powers that had belonged to any Old English sovereign," William held certain powers over all English land: "Private transactions in land were insecure until he had confirmed them, and he had a right to be consulted before a man of any position commended himself to a new lord." F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 614 (1943).

(n3)Footnote 92. 'The Laws of William the Conqueror,' in 2 English Historical Documents (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953); the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (E or Laud version) confirms the requirement of the oath with this entry for 1086.

> Thereafter he journeyed around the country so that he came to Salisbury by Lammas, where he was met by his council and all the landholders who were of any account throughout England, no matter whose vassals they might be. All did him homage and became his men, and swore him oaths of allegiance that they would be faithful to him against all other men.

(n4)Footnote 93. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 616 (1943). See generally P.H. Sawyer, From Roman Britain To Norman England (1999).

(n5)Footnote 94. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 2 (4th ed. 2005).

(n6)Footnote 95. F. M. Stenton, Anglo-Saxon England 626 (1943).

(n7)Footnote 96. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 508-509 (5th ed. 1956). David J. Seipp, The Concept of Property in the Early Common Law, 12 L. & Hist. Rev. 29 (Spring 1994).

(n8)Footnote 97. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 508-509 (5th ed. 1956).

(n9)Footnote 98. Id. at 507. For a slightly different view, see A. W. B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 3-4 (2d ed. 1986). Simpson argues that the invasion of England necessitated some method for persuading the military aristocracy to remain on the conquered land. William opted to reward his followers, and thus preserve his military strength, by dividing the land among the military leaders as tenants, who held the land by his grant. "In return he bargained for services; and most of his tenants were bound to serve in the royal army and bring with them a specified number of knights. The tenure thus created was knight-service" Id. at 4.

(n10)Footnote 99. Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996).

(n11)Footnote 100. The summary that follows in the text is based on Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 510-515 (5th ed. 1956).

(n12)Footnote 101. See generally Stephen S. Evans, The Lords of Battle: Image and Reality of the Comitatus in Dark Age Britain (1998).

(n13)Footnote 102. See Shael Herman, Trusts Sacred and Profane: Clerical, Secular, and Commercial Uses of the Medieval Commendatio, 71 Tul. L. Rev. 869, n.16 (1997) (the precarious nature of land held in precaria).

(n14)Footnote 103. See Shael Herman, Trusts Sacred and Profane: Clerical, Secular, and Commercial Uses of the Medieval Commendatio, 71 Tul. L. Rev. 869, 886 (1997).

(n15)Footnote 104. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 252 (2d ed. 1909).

(n16)Footnote 105. Id.

(n17)Footnote 106. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 532 (5th ed. 1956).

(n18)Footnote 107. A.W.B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 15 (2d ed. 1986).

(n19)Footnote 108. John Hudson, Land, Law, and Lordship in Anglo-Norman England 16 (1994).

(n20)Footnote 109. Glanvill, VII, 1.

(n21)Footnote 110. Bracton, fol. 80. See also John Hudson, Land, Law And Lordship In Anglo-Norman England (1994).

(n22)Footnote 111. Rolls of the Justices in Eyre for Gloucestershire, Warwickshire and Staffordshire 1221-1222, 607-608, No. 1450 (Selden Society vol. 59, 1940).

(n23)Footnote 112. Bracton, fol. 80b.

(n24)Footnote 113. Bracton's Note Book, no. 1840. Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996).

(n25)Footnote 114. Typically, the lord had the custody of the lands until a male heir became twenty-one. With respect to female heirs, the lord had custody until age fourteen (if the female was married) or age sixteen (if the female was unmarried). A.W.B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 18 (2d ed. 1986).

(n26)Footnote 115. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 326 (2d ed. 1909) (translating a custumal of Normandy dated c. 1200).

(n27)Footnote 116. See Dorothy Whitelock, The Beginnings of English Society 94 (1974).

(n28)Footnote 117. "And the guardian of the land and the children shall be either the wife or some other relative who has a better right." The Coronation Charter of Henry I, cl. 4, § 1, in The Laws of the Kings of England From Edmund To Henry I 278-79 (Agnes Jane Robertson ed. and trans. 1925); see also The 'Coronation Charter' of Henry I (5 August 1100) cl. 4, in 2 English Historical Documents 400-02 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n29)Footnote 118. William Stubbs, Select Charters And Other Illustrations of English Constitutional History 150, cl. 4 (1881).

(n30)Footnote 119. Shael Herman, Trusts Sacred and Profane: Clerical, Secular, and Commercial Uses of the Medieval Commendation, 71 Tul. L. Rev. 869, n. 71 (1997) (enfeoffment to child, then land to bailiff to avoid wardship). A.W.B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 18 (2d ed. 1986).

(n31)Footnote 120. The 'Coronation Charter' of Henry I (5 August 1100) cl. 3, in 2 English Historical Documents 400-402 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n32)Footnote 121. Glanvill, VII, 9 and 10; IX, 4.

(n33)Footnote 122. See 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 324-325 (2d ed. 1909). Indeed the evidence, a Pipe Roll, shows Henry I as the seller, despite the proclamation in his Coronation Charter that he would not accept consideration for granting permission to marry:

> If any of my barons or other men wishes to give his daughter, or sister, or niece, or cousin in marriage, let him speak with me; but I will neither take anything of his for the licence, nor will I forbid him to give her away, unless it be to an enemy of mine.

Pollock and Maitland simply commented, "That Henry [I] made these promises is certain, that he broke them is equally certain." Id. at 325. What is uncertain is whether the declaration in the Coronation Charter represents the old law and customs that the Normans subsequently altered, or whether the charter represents relaxation of the old law in order to gain political advantage among the barons.

(n34)Footnote 123. Id. at 328-329.

(n35)Footnote 124. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 536 (5th ed. 1956). The three occasions were defined by the Magna Carta in 1215 and by statute in 1275. 3 Edw. I, st.1, c. 36, 25 Edw. III, st. 5, c. 11.

(n36)Footnote 125. "Similarly, the vassals of my barons shall pay the juste and lawful relief for their lands to the lords." The Coronation Charter of Henry I, cl. 2, § 1, in The Laws of the Kings of England From Edmund To Henry I 276-77 (Agnes Jane Robertson ed. and trans. 1925); see also The 'Coronation Charter' of Henry I (5 August 1100) cl. 2 in 2 English Historical Documents 400-402 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n37)Footnote 126. Magna Carta, cl. 2, dating from 1215.

(n38)Footnote 127. In England, the old rules of escheat were officially abolished in 1925, and heirless property now all goes to the Crown.

(n39)Footnote 128. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 536 (5th ed. 1956). Forfeiture was limited to cases of high treason, particularly to an offense against the king. There were attempts to extend forfeiture to the commission of a felony which were defeated. A.W.B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 20 (2d ed. 1986).

(n40)Footnote 129. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 282-283 (2d ed. 1909). See also John Hudson, The Formation of the English Common Law 92-93 (1996).

(n41)Footnote 130. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 290 (2d ed. 1909).

(n42)Footnote 131. Id. at 291. See also John Hudson, The Formation of the English Common Law 91-92 (1996); Charles J. Reid, Jr., The Seventeenth-Century Revolution in the English Land Law, 43 Clev. St. L. Rev. 232240 (1995); See also Christine Steibstickler, In re S.G.: Parens Patriae and Wardship Proceedings Exactly who in the State Should Determine the Best Interest of the Child? 7 Widener J. Pub. L. 377, fn 17 (1998) (indicating there is no satisfactory definition of socage tenure and that it can only be defined in terms of what it was not; it was not tenure arising from service or military duty to the lord of the fee). Sarah Abramowicz, Note: English Child Custody Law, 1660-1839; The Origins of Judicial Intervention in Paternal Custody, 99 Colum. L. Rev. 1344 (June, 1999) (explaining that the custody of infant heirs could be controlled through guardianship in socage).

(n43)Footnote 132. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 291 (2d ed. 1909).

(n44)Footnote 133. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 292 (2d ed. 1909).

(n45)Footnote 134. Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996).

(n46)Footnote 135. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 365 (2d ed. 1909).

(n47)Footnote 136. Id. at 372.

(n48)Footnote 137. Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996).

(n49)Footnote 138. The Coronation Charter of Henry I, in The Laws of the Kings of England from Edmund to Henry I 276-277 (Agnes Jane Robertson ed. and trans. 1925).

(n50)Footnote 139. See L. Bonfield & L. R. Poos, The Development of the Deathbed Transfer in Medieval English Manor Courts, 47 Cambridge L.J. 403 (1988). See also Ralph V. Turner, Judges, Administrators and the Common Law in Angevin England, ch. 15 (1994).

(n51)Footnote 140. See also John Hudson, Land, Law and Lordship in Anglo-Norman England (1994); Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996).

(n52)Footnote 141. In 1255 Simon de Montfort imposed primogeniture upon his holdings in Leicester upon request of the people, who preferred it to the ultimogeniture (descent to the youngest son) that had prevailed until then. XIII. Earl Simon's Charter introducing the law of Primogeniture into Leicester, instead of inheritance by the youngest son. [Oct. 22, 1255.], in 1 Records of the Borough of Leicester 49-50 (Mary Bateson ed. 1899). See generally Frederic William Maitland, A Sketch of English Legal History., ch. 4 (1998).

(n53)Footnote 142. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 279 (2d ed. 1909).

(n54)Footnote 143. Glanvill, VII, 1.

(n55)Footnote 144. Paul Vinogradoff, The Transfer of Land, in 1 Collected Papers 148-167, esp. 157 (1928). The examples of presumptive heirs joining in conveyances come from Anglo-Danish districts, where a stronger tradition of free alienation prevailed. Paul Vinogradoff, English Society In The Eleventh Century 9 (1908).

(n56)Footnote 145. Bracton's Note Book, no. 1054 (1225). Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996). (Ultimogeniture.)

(n57)Footnote 146. Magna Carta, c. 31.

(n58)Footnote 147. See Sandra Raban, Mortmain Legislation and the English Church, 1279-1500 (1982) for an extensive treatment of the Statute of Mortmain and its effects on the church and English society.

(n59)Footnote 148. Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (E or Laud version) ann. 1086. Robin Fleming, Domesday Book & The Law: Society & Legal Custom In Early Medieval England (1998).

(n60)Footnote 149. See also Ann Williams, The English and the Norman Conquest (1995). See generally Melville M. Bigelow, M. Placita Anglo Normannica: Cases from William I To Richard I (1984); John Hudson, The Formation of English Common Law: Law and Society in England from The Norman Conquest to Magna Carta (1996); Emily Z. Tabuteau, Transfers of Property In Eleventh- Century Norman Law (1988).

(n61)Footnote 150. This passage is from the Ely Inquest, which preserves the instructions for Circuit III. Robin Fleming, Domesday Book & The Law: Society & Legal Custom In Early Medieval England (1998).

(n62)Footnote 151. The Domesday Book: England's Heritage, Then and Now (Thomas Hinde, Ed., 1985); Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996); Pauline Stafford, Queen Emma and Queen Edith: Queenship and Women's Power in Eleventh-Century England (Blackwell Publishers, Oxford 1997).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.06

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.06 The Rise of the Common Law of Real Property.

The framework of feudal tenures did much to define the extent of and intricate relationships between rights held simultaneously by several persons in the same land. Within this framework, and surviving the eventual disappearance of the framework, was a system of land rights known as estates, that defined interests mostly in terms of duration. It must also be conceded that durational considerations did not exist in a vacuum, so that some substantive rights as to use and enjoyment of land were dependent upon the duration of one's ownership interest.

This section examines the system of estates in land that arose in England after the Conquest, and shows how the features of those estates underwent important changes until the Tudor era in English history. At that time, specifically in 1536 when the Statute of Uses was adopted, and 1540, when the Statute of Wills was adopted, a major change in the development of estates in land occurred, and discussion of these statutes and the ensuing changes is assigned to the following section. n152

§ 4.06(a) The Fee Simple.

Students of the common law are told that the fee simple absolute is the greatest estate in land known to the common law, and that its two chief characteristics are inheritability and alienability. The precise etymology of the term "fee" is uncertain, but it is obviously related to other terms signifying the feudal relationship, such as enfeoffment. In the medieval era, a holding in fee was a feudal holding, that is, subject to the rights and restrictions of feudal tenures; under the terms of these tenures enjoyment of land was conditioned upon rendering various services and payments to a superior owner. Thus ownership in fee could be contrasted with "allodial" ownership, by which one held free of any other owner's restrictions or concurrent rights, except the sovereignty of the state.

If the word "fee" signified property ownership within a feudal system, then the term "fee simple" came to describe a property interest, an estate, held by the grantee and the grantee's "heirs," that was actually a somewhat confusing way of stating that the interest was capable of descending by inheritance. It is believed that the use of the term "fee simple" to describe an inheritable estate, i.e., an estate granted to a man "and his heirs," became common at the end of the thirteenth century. Bracton's work discusses the characteristics of a fee simple in describing the operation of a charter of enfeoffment, by which land could be given to another to hold by specified services. n153 Land thus conveyed to the grantee and "heirs," and thus inheritable, was the maximum estate known. The fee thus conveyed was "simple," because it was free of restrictions. In contrast to the fee simple was the conditional fee, a fee interest whose heritability was limited or restricted unless certain family conditions occurred.

Heritability of some land rights had already been recognized in Anglo-Saxon times, and thus was not necessarily a product of the Norman Conquest. However, heritability was not initially a part of the framework of Norman feudal tenures, and only gradually came to be accepted through an evolutionary process whose details remain completely obscure.

Some forms of Anglo-Saxon property rights, especially bookland, were both heritable and devisable, even as early as King Alfred's time in the 9th century. n154 Even the Anglo-Saxon laenland holding (that is, land loaned or rented out for a finite time) might be extended for as much as three generations after the original conveyance. These pre-Conquest forms of landholding, along with the endlessly varied arrangements for agricultural and other services pertaining to peasants' lands, remained in effect after the Conquest, as was amply demonstrated by the Domesday Survey. The dramatic result of the Conquest was to replace the great Anglo-Saxon lords with great Norman lords and to systematize their land rights with respect to the king and to their immediate undertenants. These tenures at the top of the newly organized Anglo-Norman feudal hierarchy were initially neither heritable nor alienable. Only with permission of the king could the property be secured for an heir, and the permission came only with a price, and often an arbitrary price at that. Only later could the availability of permission at a fixed and non-arbitrary price be assured by custom and then by royal decree. Meanwhile, the rights and duties of the actual occupants of the land remained as before, and some of those holdings were probably heritable or alienable or both. Thus the combination of intact Anglo-Saxon property customs at the bottom of the feudal ladder, and constant pressure to extend heritability and alienability at the top of the feudal ladder, probably led to the emergence of the heritable estate that came to be known as the fee simple. The fee simple of the thirteenth century was unlike the modern fee simple, mostly because the medieval estate consisted only of a set of feudal dues and responsibilities (all related to and burdening the land, of course), whereas the modern fee is simply full ownership subject to a less onerous set of sovereign prerogatives.

A conveyance to a grantee and heirs sufficed to create a heritable estate, but Bracton and others apparently had doubts about whether such an estate was also alienable. To provide assurance on this point, conveyances were drawn in favor of the grantee and the grantee's heirs and assigns. Charters making such conveyances began to appear about 1200, at the same time the practice of having the grantor's expectant heirs join in the conveyance ceased. This latter development signified advancing notions of alienability. Within the next century, the use of the word "assigns" was no longer necessary to indicate alienability. n155

In summary, then:

> [A] fee simple was inheritable by primogeniture since about 1200; ... it was alienable without the consent of presumptive heirs since about the same date; and ... nearly a century later it became freely alienable without the lord's consent as a result of the Statute Quia Emptores of 1290. The first two of these advances had already been made by the time of Bracton (early in the thirteenth century), and from his day, too, we have a large number of surviving charters which attest the frequency with which land was transferred. n156

§ 4.06(b) Forms of Conditional Fees.

Several types of fee interests could not be classed as fee simple estates, because some condition or limitation deferred or rendered contingent the heritability of the interest. In England, once heritability of an interest was accepted, it was not limited to inheritance by descendants of the original grantee, but could also extend to collateral heirs. Limitation of heritability to direct descendants, or conditional heritability upon the birth of children required specific expression of intent by the grantor.

Recognition of such interests was much older than Norman times, and even appears in one of Alfred's laws of the ninth century, describing bookland that was heritable but that could be limited by the transferor to alienation only within the kindred:

> We have further established that a man who holds land by title-deed [bookland], which his kinsmen have left him, shall not be allowed to give it out of his kindred, if there is documentary or [other] evidence that the power to do so is forbidden by the men who first acquired it, or by those who gave it to him. n157

While there is no evidence that this Anglo-Saxon practice was widespread or survived into post-Conquest times, circumstances did arise that prompted conveyances conditioned on the perpetuation of the family. If a well-to-do landholder wished to settle land on a younger son, as an additional branch of the family, or to endow a daughter, a natural impulse would be to require a reversion of the property if the new family did not materialize or stopped short because no heirs were born. The earliest example of this to arise after the Conquest was the maritagium, or gift in free marriage. Allusions to this interest appear in The Domesday Book, although in the Coronation Charter of Henry I, of 1100, there is a suggestion that the widow without children keeps property received from her own family at the time of her marriage. n158 In its 12th-century form, a father would give lands and his daughter to the daughter's new husband, usually by subinfeudation and free of feudal services until the third heir is born. n159 The third heir, meaning the third generation after the original grantee, would postpone the revival of feudal services for approximately 100 years, when the establishment of the new family and its ability to perform feudal obligations would be assured. n160 Also, homage would not be required until the third generation, but would be required from each heir thereafter. n161 If the third generation was not forthcoming, the tenancy would revert to the grantor.

With the maritagium as precedent and example, many varieties of conditional grants began to appear in the late twelfth century. Not only were variations of the maritagium spelled out in the conveyances, such as gifts to either husband or wife or to both jointly, and limitations to heirs of the body of either or both, but attempts were made to save reversions in conveyances for circumstances other than pending marriage. Considerable confusion enveloped the whole subject of conditional grants, and Bracton tried to draw some distinctions between the conditional grants in maritagium and other conditional grants. As to the maritagium grants, Bracton declared that the grant was a life estate until the birth of the prescribed heir; nevertheless, the grantee in maritagium could alienate the grant even before the heir was born, and the heir would be bound by the alienation. n162 Moreover, the alienation would also destroy the reversion held by the grantor, that would otherwise materialize if, after the alienation, in fact no heir was born. This statement upholding the alienation in direct contradiction to the grantor's intent and reversion was a serious irritant to landholders throughout the thirteenth century, and was finally addressed in 1285 in the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus, the first part of the Statute of Westminster II:

> [F]eofees have so far had the power of alienating the tenement so given and disinheriting thereof their issue against the will of the donors and against the express form of the gift; and moreover whereas on failure of issue of such feofees a tenement so given ought to revert to the donor or his heir according to the expressed form in the charter of the gift, nevertheless donors have thus far been excluded from the reversion of their tenements on account of the deed and feoffment of the donees of the conditional gift, although the issue (if there were such) had died -- which was manifestly against the form of the gift.
>
> Wherefore our lord the King perceiving how necessary and useful it is to appoint a remedy in the aforesaid case, has established that the will of the donor according to the form manifestly expressed in the charter shall henceforth be observed, in such wise that those to whom a tenement is thus given upon condition shall not have power of alienating it and preventing it from remaining to their issue after their death, or else to the donor or his heir if issue shall fail, either by reason that there was no issue at all or if there were, that the heir of such issue had failed. n163

The statute unified the rules for all conditional gifts, whether in maritagium or otherwise, and required that no alienation could defeat the inheritance rights of issue or the reversions of grantors if issue failed. Most importantly, it rather arbitrarily limited the meaning of "issue" to the first generation, rather than "an indefinitely long line of descendants of the prescribed class." n164 Despite this literal meaning of the statute, famous Year Book reports of 1312 reveal that the judges had reinterpreted the statute to extend protected issue to the third generation, and to do so for both maritagium grants and all other types of conditional grants. n165 So, the two forms of conveyance of less than a fee simple, that could now be called the maritagium and the fee tail, would be treated uniformly under judicial interpretation of the Statute De Donis. Ironically, this judicial reinterpretation did not stabilize the matter of how long an entail would endure. In a Year Book report of 1410, it is revealed for both the fee tail and the maritagium the entail will last as long as there are heirs, the so-called indefinite failure of issue. n166

It then came to be debated in the fourteenth century whether the grantee in tail had only a form of life estate and the issue had a remainder in fee, subject to some sort of reversion in the grantor. n167 This doctrine, too, failed to be accepted, so the fee tail suffered through another century of legal uncertainty:

> From the middle of the fourteenth century onwards we can clearly see the growth of the dogmas which are to be fixed in the middle of the fifteenth century in the great treatise of Littleton where we find the classical doctrine ... Attempts to identify [to make identical] the fee tail and the fee simple had failed, ... and the inevitable conclusion was at last reached that an entail in fact divides the fee among different people. n168

The history of the conditional fee and fee tail suggest some observations that perhaps enlighten the course of development for the whole common law. That grants in "marriage" and to the grantee and heirs of his or her body were both treated as conditional fees probably resulted from a pronounced bias in favor of free alienability among the royal justices. With a conditional fee, the grantee could alienate the interest as soon as a child was born, and the alienation remained valid even after issue failed, thus defeating any claims by the grantor to a reversion, or by any surviving issue to the property by descent. While this vastly enlarged alienability, it largely struck down the intentions of grantors. The Statute De Donis Conditionalibus in 1285 responded to the grantors' concerns, transforming the conditional fee of the law courts into a fee tail, a fee that had been cut down or "carved" or "tailored" to the grantor's desires; this fee tail protected interests of grantors and issue against alienation of anything more than the grantee's immediate possessory interest, and it assured descent only within the family line. Thus the large landholdings of great family dynasties could be held intact; they could not be defeated either by alienation or by forfeiture of anything more than the land occupant's present possessory interest. This state of legal affairs strengthened the ruling families against the monarch. Finally, in 1472 a royal court approved a method of overcoming the entail through a process known as common recovery, that turned the fee tail into a fee simple absolute. Even later, in the 19th century, the common recovery procedure was passed over in favor of giving power to the fee tail holder to accomplish the same thing simply by conveying a fee simple to another by deed.

Thus, in the struggle between the landed aristocracy seeking to perpetuate and strengthen dynastic landholdings, and the monarchy and merchant class seeking to weaken the nobility by freer land alienability, the common law doctrines of fee tail suffered an ambivalent course of development until finally the entire estate became obsolete. n169

§ 4.06(c) The Life Tenancy.

A person who held land in fee, whether fee simple or a conditional fee, usually had possession or "seisin" of the land and had a heritable interest. That a person might also hold land for his or her life only had also long been recognized in English law. The life tenancy was distinguishable from the fee, because it was not heritable; but it was a possessory interest, and if the life tenant was in possession, he or she was considered seised of a free tenement and entitled to all the legal protections connected with seisin. For all land held by life tenancy, there was also an owner or tenant in fee.

When the life tenant died, the land reverted to the fee tenant, even if no reversion was mentioned in the grant to the life tenant. Such a life tenant was considered to hold the land of the grantor, the fee tenant, and could be required to give an oath of fealty and render rent or services. If the grantor of the life tenancy directed that after the life tenant's death the land "remain" to another, then both the life tenant and the "remainderman" would hold of the grantor.

Some life estates arose by operation of law, such as the dower interest of a widow and the curtesy interest of a widower. Under curtesy, the widower held a life tenancy in the lands of his wife, while her heirs held the fee. Under dower, the widow held a life tenancy in a third of her late husband's lands, and his heirs held the fee. As a freeholder with seisin, the life tenant was able to enjoy the land much as a tenant in fee. n170 Concerns for the rights of reversioners and remaindermen led to a series of 13th-century statutes laying heavy penalties for waste, that is damage to the inheritance committed by a temporary occupant, such as a life tenant. n171

The life tenancy, and its relationship to the fee, could be said to have prompted the concepts of estates in the common law. If estates are viewed as forms of ownership on a plane of time, the temporary ownership represented by a life estate, or even a series of successive life estates, simply emphasizes that the ultimate and infinite ownership still rests with the owner in fee.

§ 4.06(c)(1) Dower.

The dower of English common law seems to have at least some of its antecedents in ancient Anglo-Saxon practices. Charters as early as the 8th century show that the marriage price was promised, with perhaps a nominal sum as earnest money, at the time of betrothal, and, when paid, was given directly to the bride rather than to a guardian. Of more importance was the morning-gift, originally a free-will gift by the husband to the bride on the morning after the bridal night:

> Consisting at first of chattels, it later came to be considered as a form of widow's maintenance, and thus was necessarily property of sufficient value to sustain the wife if she survived her husband. The morning-gift, therefore, came to be almost always a gift of land, normally granted at the time of betrothal by means of a written document (to prove ownership after the husband's death); alternatively, if a specific morning-gift were not granted at the betrothal or beginning of the marriage, then a certain portion of the husband's property, usually one-half, was assigned by law for maintenance of the bride if she became a widow. n172

By Glanvill's time in the late 12th century, dower was theoretically a gift made by the husband to the bride at the church door and was required by both spiritual and secular law. n173 Bracton also recognized this requirement. n174

Although the dower eventually arrived at a standard meaning of a life estate in one-third of the lands held by the husband during the marriage, it had not yet reached that point by the 13th century. In that period, a husband could either endow the bride with specific lands, not to exceed one-third of his holdings, or could make no specific endowment, in which case it was understood that she had an endowment of one-third of the lands of which he was then seised. There was no dower right in lands that came to the husband during the marriage. The dower right was gradually enlarged. Even in the Magna Carta that is, the 1217 version -- the dower is described as one-third of the lands held by the husband during his lifetime, unless the wife had accepted a lesser specific endowment "at the church door." n175 Later, it was possible for the wife to reject the lesser specific endowment in order to claim the legal maximum of one-third. However, in the 13th century:

> a third of the husband's land is the maximum dower that can be claimed in lands held by military service, and from the frequency with which a [specific endowment] is mentioned, we should gather that many widows of high station had to be content with less. n176

For a time, the typical dower for socage tenure was one-half, based on the notion that a widow had fully shared ownership rights with her husband in socage land, n177 but with the emergence of a common doctrine on this point, the one-third share relating to military tenures prevailed.

The life tenancy of dower could be alienated. However, under at least some local practices, the widow would forfeit her dower if she remarried or was unchaste, a rule also contained in the 11th-century pre-Conquest laws of Cnut. n178 If the specific lands of the endowment had been previously assigned, the widow could enter into possession immediately upon her husband's death. If not, then the husband's heir or the heir's guardian was required to assign her portion within forty days after the husband's death. During that period, the widow was entitled to remain and to be maintained in the principal house. n179

Dower was obviously an impediment to alienation of the husband's land. If the husband alienated after the marriage, without the wife's consent, she could recover the land or a portion of the land from the grantee after the husband's death. Of course, if the wife consented to the conveyance, it would be freed from any dower claim. In the first years after the Conquest, if the husband's lands were forfeited because of treason, the dower interest sometimes survived; however, by the thirteenth century it was settled that the dower was always lost in forfeiture or escheat. n180 Even such a development did not much dilute the strength of dower, that had progressed from a voluntary gift to an estate arising by operation of law.

But dower was an anomaly in the feudal scheme: "the widow's right in a very common case comes into conflict with the claim of a lord who is entitled to wardship." n181 The changing law eventually operated against dower, "partly perhaps in the interest of expectant heirs, partly in the interest of a militant state, that regarded the land as a fund for the support of warriors." n182 As the Middle Ages progressed, it became easier for husbands to surmount dower interests, and dower was excluded from certain popular forms of landholding, such as joint estates, uses and trusts. n183 In England, dower was no longer significant after passage of the Dower Act of 1833; however, in the American colonies dower law was usually received as part of the common law. n184

§ 4.06(c)(2) Curtesy.

Curtesy, too, has an obscure origin, but in its full medieval development came to signify the widower's life estate in all his wife's lands, if issue had been born alive. Whereas dower was contrary to the feudal impulse, interfering with alienability and assuring property to women who might be incapable of carrying out the commitments of military tenure, curtesy was consistent with feudal concepts. The surviving husband could render the military service; also, the widower with curtesy retained the guardianship of his children, whereas the dowager lost the guardianship right to the lord. Perhaps this factor of guardianship is one of the reasons for the rise of curtesy rights, which were wholly dependent upon the birth of live issue. Another tradition concerning the origin of curtesy suggests that it was a rule created to help poor Normans who married English heiresses, and were left with nothing when the wife died and her lands descended to her heirs. n185

The customs of Kent departed from this discrimination, and there the right of "free bench" conferred on either surviving spouse, as long as he or she remained single, a life estate in one-half of the land of the decedent spouse, whether or not a child was born. Furthermore, in Kent the surviving spouse could possibly obtain a guardianship over the other half of the land, and so could ultimately enjoy possession of the decedent's entire holdings.

In general, however, not only did the surviving husbands have the stronger right, as compared with dower, and fewer difficulties in integrating the curtesy rights into the feudal system, but they also often exceeded the generous rights already accorded them. Two thirteenth-century statutes sought to curb abuses of curtesy rights, n186 and Year Book cases also show husbands trying to deal with the lands of their late wives in ways beyond the life estate granted them by curtesy. Curtesy, like dower, was eventually abolished.

§ 4.06(d) The Term of Years.

The term of years, although ostensibly similar to the life estate in many ways, did not play an important role in English landholding until several generations after the Conquest, and was accorded vastly different treatment under the common law. In Anglo-Saxon times, the few references to "laenland," land that was loaned out in return for lump sum or periodic rent payments, were more similar to a life estate than a term of years, because the duration of the laenland conveyance was measured usually by one or more lives. Leases for shorter terms were rare but not unknown, possibly because they are naturally reflective of vigorous commercial activity that hardly existed in Dark Ages economies. The more common motive for seeking out land would have been to create a home and farm, and for those purposes, finite terms would not do. Thus the few leases for term that do appear in the records soon after the Conquest are almost never used for establishing households. n187 Instead, such leases were part of the process of raising revenue, especially by means of the gage. The surviving records suggest that forty years was viewed as the maximum duration of a term of years, possibly because after that time it would be difficult to find witnesses to the conveyance, but leases for much longer terms, even exceeding a lifetime, were acceptable. n188

The key historical question regarding the term for years is why it was at first given so little legal protection when compared with tenancies in fee or for life. In the twelfth century the term was regarded by some as not even an interest in land; the tenant threatened in occupancy had only a personal action against the lessor for breach of covenant. n189 If the termor also had a warranty and was ejected by a third person, an action could be brought against the lessor for compensatory relief. Otherwise, the termor had little or no protection against intrusion from third parties, until the trespass action became available about the middle of the 13th century.

Because the termor was not considered to have a right in the land, actions against the land were brought against the lessor. If the lessor wanted to destroy the termor's occupancy, the lessor could collude with another to default in an action against the land that was directed against the lessor and bypassed the termor. In 1278, the Statute of Gloucester gave the termor the right to intervene in such action. n190

All of these disabilities in legal remedies resulted from the position taken by common law judges that the tenancy for a term was not a "free" tenancy. This meant that the most important legal remedy for recovery and protection of the tenancy, the petty assize, was not available. The decision to consider the tenancy for a term as unfree appears to have been arbitrary, although different explanations have been offered. The term for years had some of the most important feudal attributes: it was considered a tenement; the termor was ostensibly seised of the land (although the termor is considered to have "possession" rather than seisin); the termor even did fealty in some instances. Also, termors were grouped together with tenants for life, all of whom were called "farmers," people who pay full rent.

Yet Pollock and Maitland suggested that in crucial decisions certain English judges were momentarily enamored of Roman law doctrine suggesting the termor had only a servitude to enjoy the fruits of possession, a usufruct, or a quasi-possession. n191 Another theory reminds the modern reader that the tenancy for a term was at first most often used to obtain loans of money and avoid the ecclesiastical prohibitions against usury. The borrower simply turned over to the lender a parcel of land for a long enough time that the principle and some profit could be recovered from the revenues of the land (keeping in mind that the land was already occupied by peasants and others owing various rents and services). By comparison, then, with other forms of landholding considered to be free tenements, the tenancy for a term was not a form of fairly permanent family property used to produce revenue for livelihood:

> The essence of the free tenement is that it should be the permanent and normal economic basis of the family. Herein lies the importance of giving it full and speedy protection, and for this purpose the petty assizes were invented. Contrasted with the free tenements the estate of the termor is merely a speculative arrangement, calculated to evade the law against usury, made between a grasping money-lender on the one hand, and on the other a man whose difficulties temporarily compel him to part with his patrimony -- and it must be remembered that during the middle ages a comparatively wealthy landowner would > usually find it difficult to produce a small sum of money at short notice. There was, therefore, no reason whatever for protecting the termor by those assizes whose object was to fortify the family and its means of subsistence against wrongdoers of another type. n192

However accurate this picture of leases for usurious money-lending may have been in the earlier feudal times, it gradually gave way to another scene, in which the so-called husbandry leases, leases for agricultural purposes, became more prominent. Not until after the Black Death did husbandry leases become common, and by then other devices for using land as debt security had been created, so such disparagement of the term as there may have been in the fourteenth century was unjustified.

It is also not accurate to ascribe the unfree nature of the term to its being held by persons of unfree status, because persons from all social classes held tenancies for terms. However, the classification of a tenancy for a term as an unfree tenure was permanently cast, so new means of legal protection also had to be devised. Eventually the very serviceable trespass action, with a specialized writ for termors, gave the termor rights against anyone who came onto the property, at first for damages, and then later for possession, too. In these developments it seemed necessary to distinguish between the seisen of a freeholder and the possession of the unfree tenancy for a term; it was concluded that the freeholder lessor was seised, while the termor was possessed, of the leased land. This gratuitous distinction between possession and seisin is a persistent irritant to some modern students of the law, who can think of no better synonym for seisin than possession.

§ 4.06(e) Reversions.

From the very beginning of its history in the common law, the term "reversion" has had technical and popular meanings that have been somewhat at odds with each other. On the one hand, reversion connoted a coming back of the land to the grantor. Even in Anglo-Saxon times, a form of the term reversion was used to describe how the land "came back" to the grantor upon the expiration of the lease. The "coming back" was in pointed contrast to the remainder, by which the land "remained out" from the grantor and reposed with some third person.

On the other hand, it was easily shown that the reversion never left the grantor, that it was rather the residue the estate left in the grantor after a conveyance of less than the fee simple. This characteristic was to be most heavily emphasized later in connection with the rule against perpetuities, but even earlier it was a concept that was important in feudal relationships. For feudal purposes, a reversion was a present estate, seised in service if not in occupancy, and the reversioner had the relationship of lord over tenants for life and in tail. This permitted the reversioner to invoke the protective remedies of the common law, so that the reversion was virtually indestructible. Moreover, the statute De Donis Conditionalibus assured the reversioner that alienation by the grantee would not affect the reversion.

§ 4.06(f) Remainders.

§ 4.06(f)(1) In General.

In modern understanding, a grantor who grants an estate less than a fee simple to one grantee, and the balance of the interest to another grantee, has created a remainder in the second grantee. The remainder is similar to the reversion, but is taken by a third party rather than being retained by the grantor. It was possible to give a remainder for life, or remainders for successive lives, as well as a remainder in fee.

By the thirteenth century, terminology for both reversions and remainders was in use, although with occasional confusion. n193 Perhaps the earliest examples of remainders are from grants in maritagium. In Bracton's Note Book is recorded a grant in maritagium to Beatrice and Reginald, but if Beatrice died without issue, or if her issue died without issue, the land would go to Beatrice's sister Matilda and Matilda's heirs. n194 According to Bracton, a remainderman took by substitution rather than subinfeudation. n195 The remainder was from the beginning a less secure interest than the reversion, because it was not possible to show that the remainderman had ever been seised. Therefore, some of the remedies derived from seisin were not available to protect the remainder interest. Several cases show vigorous challenges to the enforcement of a remainder. n196 Consequently, it was more secure to obtain the remainder through a judicial process known as a fine, than by deed. Through the fine process, the parties would appear in court with a prearranged settlement of their controversy, called a fine or final approval, and then obtain court approval for the compromise. The three-part written document containing the terms of the compromise, including one part for the public records, was regarded as an especially solemn form of conveyance and virtually unimpeachable. n197

§ 4.06(f)(2) Contingent Remainders.

The fine process was used with success even to create contingent remainders, despite the real difficulties such interests caused in feudal arrangements. In a 1304 case, a tenement created by fine granted to a man and his wife and "to the heirs of their bodies begotten," was granted to the man's heirs in remainder if the couple should die without heirs of their bodies. With only the mildest skepticism, the court observed, "This, however, is strange seeing that the remainder was not granted to any certain person." n198 A few years later, another grant by fine was to Robert for life, and upon Robert's death to C and the heirs of his body, but if C died without such heirs, to the heirs of Robert. All grantees were to hold their interests "of the chief lord of the fee," but Justice Bereford was compelled to ask who was to do homage. n199 Both cases illustrate the danger that a contingent remainder in fee could leave a lord uncertain about who was to perform feudal services. If a remainder was contingent at the time it was granted, but had vested by the time it was subject to litigation, it could be upheld. n200

As for seisin, sometimes it was attributed to the life tenant, but held to benefit the remainderman. However, if the life estate terminated prematurely, the remainder, being dependent upon the life estate, was also deemed terminated.

Common law contingent remainders were subject to destruction if the supporting freehold estate were forfeited through tortious alienation. If the holder of the life estate attempted to convey a fee simple, the attempted alienation would be deemed tortious and the life estate would be forfeited before the contingent remainder vested; the contingent remainder was deemed destroyed. n201

§ 4.06(g) Concurrent Estates.

§ 4.06(g)(1) Tenancy in Coparcenary.

Tenancy in coparcenary arose when two or more heirs obtained a tenancy by descent, rather than by inter vivos conveyance. Coparcenary was thus distinguishable from the other concurrent estates of joint tenancy and tenancy in common, which could be created only by inter vivos conveyance, until the Statute of Wills was enacted in 1540. Coparcenary was, like a joint tenancy, characterized by the "unities" of time, title, interest, and possession; however, like the tenancy in common, it carried no right of survivorship. n202 Coparcenary was further distinct from the other co-ownerships in that each coparcener had the right to compel partition of the estate. n203 The right of partition was not conferred upon joint and common tenants until 1539 and 1540. n204

The origins of the tenancy in coparcenary are very obscure, but it is reasonable to assume that it was a useful and needed form of landholding in a society that had adopted primogeniture, either for when no son existed to inherit, or the local custom did not follow primogeniture. Most likely coparcenary would arise in the former circumstance, and coparceners would usually be sisters. The most direct early source of information about coparcenary is Bracton, who, in addition to the relatively succinct statement quoted below, wrote at great length about the process of partition, a serious event in feudal times:

> Where partition ought to be made among co-heirs
>
> When there are several heirs having one right and the inheritance ought to be divided among them, > either because of the nature of the thing inherited or of the persons inheriting, let a division [or] partition of the inheritance be made among them immediately after homage has been taken. In the writ de partitione facienda there ought to be no action between co-heirs acknowledged as heirs, even though there is disagreement among them, [for example], that one of them has a greater share than he ought to have, because the writ provides nothing except that (an extent having been made) each have his rightful portion. But if before such disagreement is settled he who has the larger portion dies seised, his heir, whether of age or a minor, shall not answer without writ, because of his ancestor's seisin, right or wrongful ... But since a partition cannot be made among co-heirs without an extent and valuation, and an extent and valuation cannot be made without knights who, with the sheriff, make the extent, who sometimes are called justices, when they are appointed by the king, sometimes chosen by the parties by common consent, we must first see who they are appointed by the king and by what writ... n205

Although isolated references to parceners occur in the statutes of many American states, it is a property interest of almost complete obscurity in modern times. Thus it is interesting to see the detail devoted to it by Bracton, not only in the introductory comments quoted above, but in the very elaborate procedural instructions, occupying almost 20 printed pages in modern editions. A sampling of these issues, and an intriguing insight into the kinds of property issues that preoccupied the medieval landholder, is contained in headings for the rest of the material on parceners' partition found in Bracton:

Writ for appointing justices to make a partition.

Writ appointing justices to be present at a partition.

Writ when the parties by common consent choose others to make the partition.

Writs in another form but of the same kind, where partition was improperly made by others.

Writ to deliver seisin to co-heirs when they have agreed among themselves as to the partition.

Another writ of the same kind: where a tenant parcener has acknowledged his share to his parcener; that an extent be made.

Writ that one be present to take the oath of the extenders if the extent is to be made outside the county.

Writ where the extenders have done nothing in response to the first order.

Writ where the knights appear but the sheriff is negligent.

Writ where an extent has been improperly made.

Forms of interlaced writs, where knights of two counties must come together to make an extent.

Writ on the complaint of an eldest daughter and parcener who does not have her rightful share nor her seniority; of making a reasonable partition by knights.

Writ to produce bodies of extenders so they may certify.

The duty of extenders.

Writ to the sheriff for giving seisin to co-heirs after partition. n206

§ 4.06(g)(2) Joint Tenancy.

During Bracton's time, the only form of concurrent ownership other than tenancy in coparcenary was joint tenancy. The joint tenancy is a property interest held by two or more persons simultaneously, with the survivor of them to retain the entire interest. The right of survivorship distinguishes the joint tenancy from the tenancy in common. Each joint tenant's right to compel partition, secured by statute in 1539, n207 distinguishes the joint tenancy from the tenancy by the entirety. The joint tenancy is also distinct from the tenancy by the entirety because of the dual nature of the joint tenancy, expressed by Bracton with the famous phrase "per my et per tout": each joint tenant possesses the entire tenancy ("per tout"), and each also possesses an equal fractional undivided share of the tenancy ("per my"). The fractional shares are called moieties. A tenancy by the entirety, on the other hand, is considered to be only a single ownership of the entire tenancy, with ownership held by both spouses considered as one person.

The singular ownership attribute of a joint tenancy was especially compatible with feudal values, which discouraged any splitting of tenancies that threatened performance of feudal obligations. This unified ownership was promoted by the doctrine that joint tenants took their interest all together under identical circumstances, the so-called "unities" of time, title, interest, and possession. At first, the requirement of maintaining the unities meant that a joint tenancy could be created only by inter vivos conveyance. It was held that heirs could not take a joint estate by descent, because the individuality of their status as heirs was inconsistent with the unity theoreticallly required for a joint tenancy. This was usually not a problem, because under primogeniture usually only the oldest son would inherit the property. When only daughters survived the landholder, they obtained the property by descent in a form of joint ownership called tenancy in coparcenary. However, the impact of heirs' individuality was shown in the rule that no right of survivorship applied to tenancies in coparcenary.

Inasmuch as Bracton is the only early documentary source for the common law origin of joint tenancies, his cryptic comments are quoted as follows:

> We have explained in the preceding portion who may give [a gift of land] and who may not. Now we must show to whom a gift may be made. It is clear that it may be made ... to a woman or to a man, a wife as well as a husband, to them together or separately to each ... Also not only to one but to several, to all together and at the same time or successively, by the modus of gift, as will be explained below ... Since all were enfeoffed together and hold in common, the children do not succeed one the other, and if one of them dies without heirs his portion will accrue by the jus accrescendi to the survivors and their heirs, from several such to one, and will not revert to the donor as long as one survivor remains or one has heirs. But if all die without heirs, the whole will revert to the donor. n208

The aspects of survivorship rules that smack of tenancy in common in the above passage from Bracton are somewhat accounted for by feudal tenurial relationships: if the children in Bracton's illustration were considered tenants in common and then died without heirs, their portions would escheat. Instead, Bracton described a rudimentary form of survivorship that not only avoided the escheat, but postponed any reversion to the grantor until all of the joint tenants had died without heirs.

Although joint tenancy enjoyed early favor in the Middle Ages, because it inhibited the splitting of tenures, it could also be used to avoid some feudal incidents and obligations. For instance, if land were granted in joint tenancy to a father, a mother, a son, and the son's heirs, it could defeat a lord's claim to wardship of a minor heir or a relief from an adult heir, because the estate had already passed at the time of the original conveyance. A statutory response to the conveyancers' creativity was soon forthcoming:

> As touching them that use to infeoff their eldest sons and heirs, being within age, of their heritage, for to defraud the lords of the fee of their wardships, it is provided, accorded, and agreed, that by occasion of any such feoffment no chief lord shall lose his ward. n209

Even a joint tenancy to a husband and wife could cost the lord a wardship. If a man, married and with an infant son, conveyed in fee to another, then took back a conveyance in fee to himself and his wife, as joint tenants, the estate would belong to the wife if he predeceased her, and the lord would not have an occasion to claim a wardship. Despite these occasional problems, joint tenancies had much appeal, and during the Middle Ages any conveyance in fee or for life to two or more persons was presumed to create a joint tenancy.

A joint tenancy could be partitioned, but only with the consent of all the cotenants; in this respect it differed from tenancy in coparcenary, under which any one coparcener could compel partition. n210

§ 4.06(g)(3) Tenancy in Common.

Even though the early common law evinced a strong preference for construing joint conveyances as joint tenancies, alternative constructions became necessary, because one of the four unities might be missing. In that event, during the fourteenth century, a concurrent conveyance to separate persons began to be recognized as a tenancy in common, and royal courts of that era were able to distinguish between tenancies in common and joint tenancies. n211 The tenancy in common had no right of survivorship and, until 1540, could be created only by inter vivos conveyance; after 1540 the Statute of Wills permitted a tenancy in common to be devised. Without a right of survivorship, tenants in common were not able to enter into collusive conveyances designed to cut off feudal incidents. As with early joint tenancies, partition of tenancies in common during medieval times could be made only upon the consent of all the cotenants.

§ 4.06(g)(4) Tenancy by the Entirety.

The tenancy by the entirety resembles a joint tenancy as between husband and wife, because it can exist only if the four unities are present and also holds the right of survivorship. However, it is distinct in also requiring the condition of a valid marriage between the tenants and in not recognizing a right in either individual tenant to compel partition.

The origin of tenancy by the entirety is unknown, but Bracton acknowledged some form of concurrent ownership between husband and wife:

> Some tenements are privately owned, the property of an individual by himself, without a parcener or one joined to him, others are not held alone but with another joined to him or a parcener: with one conjoined, as where a man holds with his wife, or conversely, who are not called parceners because their rights and the property do not admit of division, for they are one flesh though different souls... n212

§ 4.06(h) The Gage and the Mortgage.

> The development of the mortgage is an interesting example of the interplay between legal doctrine and conveyancing custom. The gage, which is the root idea of the transaction, is really a relic of the days when credit was not yet in existence. It has been conjectured that in its oldest form the gage (in Latin vadium, and in modern English "pledge") was payment, subject only to the option of the purchaser to substitute at a later time payment in a different kind. Under this arrangement the handing over of the gage settled the debt; the creditor could not demand the substitution of a different kind of payment, and the debtor had no way of recovering any excess value in the gage over the price which he could substitute later. n213

The gage, or something like it that made land available as security for a loan of money, appears in transactions described in Anglo-Saxon land charters. In one of its forms, land would be turned over to a lender of money, who would satisfy the loan obligation out of the returns from the land, and then convey the land back to the borrower. Three entries in Domesday Book reveal land in the possession of persons to whom it was gaged. n214

§ 4.06(h)(1) The Gage During Glanvill's Time.

In Glanvill's work, of the late 12th century, one may read lengthy provisions about the gage, but little is known of these gages outside those passages. The following excerpts are typical:

> The loan for consumption may, however, be accompanied by the deposit of a gage; when this happens, sometimes movables such as chattels are deposited as gage, sometimes immovables such as lands and tenements and rents (which may consist of money or other things). When creditor and debtor agree to the deposit of a gage, whatever the nature of the gage, then the debtor, after he has received the loan, either immediately gives the creditor seisen of his gage or does not. Moreover, the gage may be for a fixed term, or with no fixed term. Furthermore, sometimes the gage is a dead gage (mortgage) and sometimes not; it is called mortgage when the fruits and rents accruing during its continuance do not count towards repayment of the loan...
>
> Furthermore, when anything is deposited as a gage for a fixed term, creditor and debtor either agree that if the debtor does not redeem his gage at the end of the term the gage shall become the property of the creditor who may deal with it as with his own property, or else there is no such agreement. n215

Because under a mortgage the fruits and rents of the land, while held by the creditor, were not to be applied toward reducing the principle of debt, n216 these fruits and rents were effectively a form of interest for the creditor, that under the religious doctrine of the time, constituted a usurious transaction forbidden to Christians:

> Such a bargain is a kind of usury; but apparently it is a valid bargain, even though the creditor be a Christian. He sins by making it, and, if he dies in his sin, his chattels will be forfeited to the king; but to all seeming the debtor is bound by his contract. As to the Jew, he was not prohibited from taking usury from Christians; he took it openly. Even the Christian, if we are not much mistaken, was very willing to run such risk of sin and punishment as was involved in the covert usury of the mortgage. The plea rolls of the thirteenth century often show us a Christian gagee in possession of the gaged land, but we have come upon no instance in which he was called upon to account for the profits that he had received. We infer that the gagee was usually a mortgagee in Glanvill's sense of that term. n217

The gage as outlined in Glanvill could result from an explicit agreement or bargain that was either reduced to a fixed term or left open-ended. If it was based on a fixed term, and the parties had agreed that the gagee could keep the property if the debt were not paid, then if the debt were not repaid by the end of the term, the gagee would simply keep the land without further action. If the gage were on a fixed term, but without an explicit agreement for the gagee to keep the property upon default, then at the end of the term, the gagee could obtain a judgment against the debtor, ordering payment of the debt within a reasonable time and declaring ownership of the gaged property in the gagee if the debt were not paid. If the gage was given without a specific term, then the gagee could call the loan at any time, obtain a judgment requiring payment within a reasonable time, and be declared the owner if payment were not made. n218 The resemblance to later equity courts' foreclosure decrees is unmistakable.

The utility of the procedure outlined in Glanvill was restricted by obstacles rooted in feudal relationships. First, the gagee had to be put in possession of the land, or protective remedies of the royal courts would not be available. Once in possession, the gagee had a form of seisin, but, again, an unconventional seisin that was not protected by the usual remedies available to those with seisin. For instance, if the gagee were ejected, only the gagor had the right to seek recovery of the land. Even if the gagor ousted the gagee, the gagee could not recover the land, only the debt. n219 Thus neither the gagor nor the gagee had protected possession of the premises. Moreover, if the mortgagee died while the mortgage was still in effect, thus while still engaged in the sin of usury, the property could be forfeited to the monarch. These procedural limitations on the gagee's interest existed, because that interest did not fit neatly into the feudal tenurial system. Only if the gagee could be treated as a tenant for years, for life, or in fee could the available remedies be invoked.

§ 4.06(h)(2) The Gage During Bracton's Time.

By the time Bracton wrote a couple of generations later, the gagee's interest had been adjusted to the feudal tenurial system. The gagee lent the money and took from the gagor a term of years and a conditional fee in the land to be used a security. If the debt were timely paid, the term of years expired, and the condition for retaining the fee would not materialize, and the fee and seisin returned to the gagor. During the term of the gage, the gagee had a termor's seisin, while the gagor had the seisin in fee, all of which was in harmony with feudal rules and capable of being spelled out in the single document creating the gage. n220 Even this feudally consistent formula was eventually simplified to the conditional feoffment mortgage of the classical common law: an enfeoffment from the gagor/debtor to the gagee/creditor and heirs upon condition that, if the debt is timely paid, the feoffer and heirs may re-enter and resume ownership of the land. n221

During this time, various arrangements for possession of the gaged property were made. Most gagees probably took possession of the property. Sometimes the gagor conveyed the land to the gagee without rent, and the gagee reconveyed to the gagor with a rent, with a covenant that the gage would terminate when enough rent had been received to pay back the loan. While the Christian gagees most often took possession of the gaged properties, the Jewish gagees were often able to make arrangements to leave the debtors in possession of the property, prompting Pollock and Maitland to comment:

> We may guess that, if the Jews had not been expelled from England, the clumsy mortgage by way of conditional conveyance would have given way before a simple method of securing debts, and would not still be incumbering our modern law. n222

With the expulsion of the Jews, the tendency of royal courts was to construe common law mortgages literally and strictly; such mortgages:

> suffered from the incurable defect that they employed formulas which contradicted the true nature of the operation -- they spoke of feoffments in fee, and leases for years, when the transaction was really neither -- and such forms inevitably attracted several doctrines of seisin and the derivation of estates, which tended to defeat their purpose. n223

§ 4.06(h)(3) Rise of the Classical Common Law Mortgage.

At some time during the 15th or 16th century, the form of mortgage shifted from an enfeoffment on condition of defeasance or of re-entry to an enfeoffment with a covenant for reconveyance. The covenant was more readily enforceable through the device of a writ of covenant, and both common law and equity courts during this period were willing to order reconveyance, if the payment conditions had been met. Eventually even the power of sale was developed, so the mortgagees no longer needed to proceed in court to satisfy their rights. Despite the additional protections afforded mortgagees by these changes, mortgagees were still frequently taking possession of the property, even into the middle of the 17th century.

But protections for the mortgagors also began to develop. Equity courts became reluctant to enforce penalties, and, near the end of the 16th century, began to develop doctrines on the equity of redemption. The equity of redemption was the right of a mortgagor, even after default, to cure the default and satisfy the obligation within a reasonable time, and rescue the property from forfeiture. Implicit in this doctrine was the recognition that the mortgage was really a security, not a conveyance.

§ 4.06(h)(4) Other Security Devices.

In the towns, an alternative to gages and mortgages was afforded by the Statute of Merchants and the Statute of Staples. The Statute of Merchants n224 enabled creation of a creditor's estate as tenant by statute merchant until the debt was discharged. This security interest was created by a procedure that took place by the parties appearing before the chief magistrate of a trading town. These procedures were termed "recognizances" or "statutes," because they were entered into under the Statute of Merchants. It is worthy of note that this statute permitted executions that would today be considered drastic, apparently in response to complaints by merchants who experienced difficulty in debt collection under traditional common law remedies. Execution actually began with the imprisonment of the debtor, who then had three months to sell property to satisfy the debt; if the debtor was unsuccessful in thus satisfying the debt, the property would be turned over for sale by the creditor. If the security was in land, then it applied to all lands held by the debtor at the time of entering into the statute, even if the lands were later alienated.

The later legislation, called the Statute of Staples, n225 similarly enabled creation of a creditor's estate or tenancy by statute staple until the debt was discharged. The estate was created in a procedure carried out before the mayor of the staple. n226

Under both of these procedures, if a creditor obtained a judgment and then obtained the land in execution of the judgment, the creditor's possession was considered a freehold; the statutes authorized protection of such possession by the assize of novel disseisin.

§ 4.06(i) Conveyancing.

§ 4.06(i)(1) Early Conveyances by Charter Only.

The principal issue in the early history of English conveyancing is whether any of the various documentary forms in use were actually effective to convey real property interests, or merely memorialized a conveyance accomplished by other means. Transfers of Anglo-Saxon bookland and laenland were recorded in written charters, but it is not known whether some other ceremony was also a necessary part of the conveyance. As to Anglo-Saxon folkland, apparently not even written documents were used. The early charters, and the hundreds of county court ceremonies used with them in transfers, were elaborate. Simpler documents took their place at the close of the Anglo-Saxon period. The only direct evidence of Anglo-Saxon conveyancing comes from bookland and laenland charters, and the wording of these charters suggests that the execution and delivery of those documents themselves effected the conveyances. To deliver the original deed to land that had once been booked seems to have been sufficient to transfer the property. It is not known what significance may have attached to the occasional reports of a turf being placed upon an altar in connection with a bookland transfer.

The charters used in England after the Norman Conquest invariably used such phrases as "I give and grant," suggesting that the charter itself was the effective instrument of transfer. Gradually, however, the phrasing "I have given and granted," was adopted, suggesting that the charter was not the conveyance, but was only recording an act that had already occurred. Often, delivery of these charters was accompanied by other tangible symbols, such as a knife, rod, or helmet, and the delivery took place usually in a church or a court. What is unclear in these early Anglo-Norman conveyances is whether the charter with its symbol constituted the actual conveyance, i.e., delivery of seisin, or some other conveyancing procedure was necessary to complete the transaction. Even in the latter event, the symbolic ceremony probably gave rise to a right to have the conveyance made. n227

§ 4.06(i)(2) Early Conveyances by Livery of Seisin.

Eventually, however, the confusion was resolved and the judges began imposing strict requirements that transfer of ownership be accomplished by ceremonies taking place on the land itself, if possible. This notion was aided by the availability of juries to give witness to such public ceremonies. However, there was undoubtedly a time of transition and confusion, when delivery of a document sufficed to transfer, or when parties performed ceremonies on the land and execution of documents and other pertinent acts:

> As a matter of fact, in the first half of the thirteenth century it was still common for the feoffor and the feoffee to attend the county or hundred courts, to have their charter read there and to procure its attestation by the sheriff and the leading men of the district. In addition to this, if the gift was to be made to a monastery, the charter would be read in the chapter house and then it would be carried into the church and offered upon the altar along with knife or rod. Beside this there would be a ceremony on the land, including sometimes a perambulation of boundaries in the presence of witnesses; and this was the more necessary because the charter rarely described the many small strips of land which made up that hide or virgate which had been bestowed. One could not be too careful; one could not have too many ceremonies. But what the king's court demanded was a real delivery of a real possession. n228

The strict distinction being drawn between charter and seisin was well illustrated by the conveyancing practices of the king: not only was a charter sent out, but the monarch also sent a writ to the local sheriff ordering him to make livery of seisin. Priority between conflicting charters was resolved on the basis of the earlier seisin. n229

However, in all of these conveyances, whether by king or subject, it is not enough to speak only of livery of seisin. The grant of land consisted of two elements, the feoffment and the livery of seisin. The feoffment was the gift of a freehold estate, such as the fee or a life estate. The enfeoffment could be expressed either by a written document or orally. n230 Even into the thirteenth century, conveyances of freeholds without charter were common. n231 By that time and for some time earlier, however, when the charters were used, their language suggested only that they recorded a conveyance that had already occurred, not that they were the instrument of conveyance.

The instrument of conveyance was the livery of seisin:

> The donor and the donee in person or by attorney must come upon the land. There the words of gift will be said or the charter, if there be one, will be read. It is usual, though perhaps not necessary, that there should be some further ceremony. If the subject of the gift is a house, the donor will put the hasp or ring of the door into the donee's hand...; if there is no house, a rod will be transferred ... or perhaps a glove. Such is the common and the safe practice; but it is not indispensable that the parties should actually stand on the land that is to be given. If that land was within their view when the ceremony was performed, and if the feoffee made an actual entry on it while the feoffer was yet alive, this was a sufficient feoffment. But a livery of seisin either on the land or "within the view" was necessary. n232

Some of the more colorful elaborations of livery of seisin, often popularly ascribed to the English common law, were in fact practices of the continental Germanic tribes of an age before the Norman Conquest of England:

> The two men each with his witnesses appear upon the land. A knife is produced, a sod of turf is cut, the twig of a tree is broken off; the turf and twig are handed by the donor to the donee; they are the land in miniature, and thus the land passes from hand to hand. Along with them the knife may also be delivered, and it may be kept by the donee as material evidence of the transaction; perhaps its point will be broken off or its blade twisted in order that it may differ from other knives. But before this the donor has taken off from his hand the war glove, gauntlet or thong, which would protect that hand in battle. The donee has assumed it; his hand is vested or invested; it is the vestita manus that will fight in defence of this land against all comers; with that hand he grasps the turf and twig ... Even this is not enough; the donor must solemnly forsake the land. May be, he is expected to leap over the encircling hedge; may be, some queer renunciatory gesture with his fingers ... is demanded of him; may be, he will have to pass or throw to the donee the mysterious rod ... which, be its origin what it may, has great contractual efficacy ... When under Roman influence, the written document comes into use this also can be treated as a symbol; it is delivered in the name of the land ... Just as of old the sod was taken up from the ground in > order that it might be delivered, so now the charter is laid on the earth and thence it is solemnly lifted up or "levied" (levatio cartae) ... And lastly there are ... advantages to be gained by a conveyance made before a court of law after some simulated litigation; and part of the original ceremony can be performed there; the donor or vendor can in court go through the solemnity of surrendering or renouncing the land; the rod or festuca can be passed from hand to hand in witness of this surrender. n233

If, as is believed, the livery of seisin practices on the continent had so far progressed that it was no longer necessary to go onto the land, and merely ceremonial passing of the symbols sufficed for the conveyance, then it is all the more surprising that in England of the thirteenth century the courts began to insist upon the literal elements of livery seisin, the handing over of some part of the land, while on the land or within view of the land. n234

§ 4.06(i)(3) Quitclaim Without Livery of Seisin.

For two types of transfers the livery of seisin was not required. One type of transfer occurred when one party held as tenant for years or life, with the fee in another party, or one party held adversely to another, and the out-of-possession party wished to yield the property rights to the party in possession. This could be done by a document; no ceremony of enfeoffment was necessary. n235 No standard terminology applied to such a document at first, although a quitclaim was commonly used to yield adverse rights. n236 Later the document terminology became standardized with various kinds of releases.

§ 4.06(i)(4) Surrender Without Livery of Seisin.

The second type of transfer for which livery of seisin was not required arose when a tenant wished to surrender the tenancy to the lord. Because the lord was already seised -- either in fee if the tenancy were for a term, or in service if the tenancy were for life or in fee -- probably neither deed nor livery was necessary. Quite frequently, however, a deed of surrender was used.

§ 4.06(i)(5) Transfers to Change the Type of Tenancy.

For those who wished to change the nature of their tenancy -- for instance, from fee simple to fee tail -- usually two enfeoffments were required: the first to a disinterested grantee, and the second from that grantee back to the original grantor with the proper tenancy incorporated into the second enfeoffment. Probably the grantee would have to take seisin before making the second enfeoffment.

§ 4.06(i)(6) Transfers Between Freeholders with Villeins in Occupancy.

Yet another procedure for conveyancing was required when neither party to the conveyance was in actual occupancy, although the occupant was a tenant of the grantor. Of course, the occupancy rights would have to be taken into account when making the conveyance, but the method of doing that depended on whether the occupant was a freeholder or held in villeinage. If the tenancy was in villeinage, the grantor simply enfeoffed the grantee with livery of seisin. However, the parties could also direct that the villeins involved acknowledge the transfer of lordship. When Richard de Turville conveyed to the Abbot of Missenden, he sent letters patent to the villeins, and after the villeins had gathered, Richard delivered seisin of them and their tenements to the abbot. The abbot took their fealty and demanded rent; because no rent was due, the abbot lent some pennies to the villeins, who then each paid a penny for the right to remain in occupancy. n237

§ 4.06(i)(7) Transfers Between Freeholders with Freeholders in Occupancy; Attornment to the Grantee.

If, on the other hand, a freeholder was in occupancy, a different procedure took place. The grantor was perceived as granting the incorporeal lordship (seignory) or reversion rather than the corporeal land itself, although there must still be some symbolic transfer of the land. The incorporeal right thus was conveyed by a document that came to be called a deed of grant, and in addition the occupant was required to attorn to the grantee. n238 To attorn meant to "turn over" the tenant to the new lord, the grantee. If the tenant in occupancy would not agree to attorn himself or herself to the new grantee, then resort to the court was possible; the court could compel the tenant to make an acknowledgement that the tenancy was held of the new lord. The court could hold that the new lord was seised of the tenant's service, but would not require the tenant to do homage to the new lord. n239

§ 4.06(i)(8) Elements of the Charter or Deed. n240

Even though the written charter or deed came to be merely evidence of a conveyance, rather than effecting the conveyance itself, and even though much land was transferred without deed, there were still advantages to using a deed. In addition to its use for a grant, the deed form could be used for a release and a surrender. Moreover, after it became settled that certain interests, such as reversions, rents and other incorporeal interests, could be granted even though livery of seisin was not possible, then a deed was necessary to transfer those interests.

§ 4.06(i)(8)(i) Recitals in the Deed.

The early deeds were quite simple and uniform in format, and almost always were unilateral in the sense that they were given in the name of the grantor. As innovations in the form arose, such as inclusion of the word "assigns" or of a warranty clause, their widespread adoption rapidly followed. The standard form first recited that the grantor had given, and by charter confirmed to the grantee and heirs and assigns forever, certain land, the boundaries to which the deed would describe with particularity. Then followed the habendum clause describing the nature of the interest taken by the grantee. Because subinfeudation was no longer possible after the Statute Quia Emptores, deeds thereafter had to recite that the grantee held of the grantor's lord by the services customarily due. Any rights reserved by the grantor (such as rent), or created for others (such as remainders), would also be described in the deed.

In early times the deed usually concluded with a clause stating that the deed was sealed, in order that the grant "may remain forever good and valid." However, even though a seal remained a requirement for validity, by the fourteenth century a recital of seal was often omitted, and then statements of sealing and of witnesses were replaced by a clause stating the time and place of the deed. A recital that livery of seisin had taken place was endorsed on deeds beginning in the fifteenth century, and signatures were placed on deeds beginning only in the sixteenth century, although not to become common until after the Statute of Frauds was enacted in the seventeenth century.

§ 4.06(i)(8)(ii) Warranties in the Deed.

Perhaps the most important benefit of a deed in fee simple was the clause of warranty it typically included, by which the grantor and heirs and assigns warranted the land to the grantee and heirs and assigns "against all men forever." The warranty had a twofold purpose: to compel a response from the grantor if the grantee's title was challenged (and to obtain compensation or equivalent land from the grantor, if the challenge was successful), and to bar the grantor and grantor's heirs from later challenging the conveyance. The warranty undoubtedly helped establish the alienability of fee simple interests, even overcoming family restraints.

In transfers of interests other than in fee simple, the warranty was more troublesome. When a person holding a dower or curtesy interest enfeoffed another (tortiously) with warranty, even though the feoffor had a child, the warranty would usually bar the child as heir from claiming what would normally be the inheritance. This bar by warranty was partially removed by statute in 1278. n241 The statutory relief expressly applied only to warranties created by tenants in curtesy, but in 1306 was judicially extended to tenants in tail who had received no assets by descent. n242 Before this an enfeoffment or fine by a tenant in tail, with warranty, could bar the feoffer's heir, to whom the estate in tail was limited by descent. Attempts to bar claims by heir through use of warranties continued for several centuries more. The trend generally was to recognize that warranties accomplished the bar, although the bar of certain "collateral" warranties was abolished in 1706. n243

Frequently, however, the bar of a warranty affected only the inheritance right, and not reversions and remainders. Such interests were more effectively barred by fines, and in the case of fee simple interests a fine barred all claims after a year and a day. In 1361, the bar effect of the fine was completely abolished by statute. n244 Unhappiness with that state of affairs prompted a partial reversal in the next century, so that a fine could be a bar after five years and after fulfilling certain procedural requirements. n245 However, even with this change, the fine would only bar issue in tail, but not most remainders and reversions. Only in a later century would the barring of remainders and reversions be facilitated by the procedure known as common recovery.

§ 4.06(i)(8)(iii) Physical Form of the Deed.

If a deed contained especially elaborate provisions, it might be made in two copies on one page, with the page then divided by an indented cut that angled through the word "Chyrographum." The deed thus became an indenture or indented writing.

Many deeds were also enrolled in the courts, especially if the transfer itself took place in court. For a small charge a person could have a deed entered on the pipe roll (a treasury account kept in the Exchequer), and later such deeds were frequently enrolled on the backs of the close rolls (closed records of sealed letters or grants from the monarch to particular parties).

§ 4.06(i)(9) The Fine or Final Concord.

The impulse to improve the authority and security of deeds by invoking court proceedings, and by making multiple copies, came together in the important procedure called the fine, or final concord, that was practiced from 1195 to 1833.

Much experimentation had taken place before 1195. Charters had been copied onto the pipe roll and the close rolls. If a court case dealing with a conveyance was brought to conclusion, charters from the court and parties confirming the outcome might be obtained. Seisin determined by legal action could be especially secure. It was acceptable for parties to embark on a procedure of trial by battle and, at a prearranged moment, the exchange was stopped by friends, a peaceful accord was presented and approved by the court, and the effect was the same as if the battle had been carried to conclusion. n246 Not only was the contest between the immediate parties concluded with finality, but any others who might have an interest or claim in the matter would be barred if they did not quickly come forward. n247 Most importantly, the terms of the concord could be enforced by further court action. A form for such agreements was developed, and once adopted by the royal court, soon spread to lesser courts. n248

The royal court then developed a form for recording the agreements on parchment, and some of the early chirographs, or indented writings, are these so called "final concords." n249 One such document dated July 15, 1195, proclaims itself to be the first chirographic final concord that was made in three parts, one of which was to remain as a record in the royal treasury.

The action to have a fine "levied" began with a writ, usually either a form of writ of covenant or writ of warranty. In imitation of the simulated battle trials, the parties would carry the litigation to some length before presenting their concord. Later, they would present the concord as soon as all parties had joined the action and were before the court. Leave of court to compromise the action was required and had to be requested, of course with a fee attached.

Court involvement was not merely cosmetic. The most important supervisory function exercised by the judges was to examine married women appearing before them as grantors, to be assured that the women understood what they were doing, that is, surrendering dower and other rights. Indeed, even by Bracton's time, the fine had become the conveyance of choice for married women. n250

The fine was also advantageous for other kinds of conveyances. If a non-possessory interest such as a lordship (seignory) or a reversion was to be conveyed, and it was uncertain whether the tenant would willingly attorn to the grantee, the fine action included a regular procedure for compelling the grantee's attornment or accomplishing attornment by the court. The types of conveyances often involved in family settlements also were often best accomplished by fine. If a landholder wished to settle property on family members, that meant changing the grantor's own form of tenancy, normally accomplished by a two-step conveyance to a third person and then back to the family members, the risks of that procedure could be avoided by the fine. By the fine, the entire settlement could be achieved in one step, with court sanction.

These features of the fine did not come fully formed. Transfer of seisin and the land were at first still necessary, and could only be compelled when the fine was submitted to execution. In the typical family settlement, the fine recorded that the third party had been enfeoffed before granting back to various family members the specified interests, when in fact no enfeoffment had occurred. (The fine, after all, could be termed a collusive action and a feigned compromise.) The settlor's heir was not bound by that fine n251 until the heir's plea was taken away by statute in 1299. n252 Indeed, that statute went far toward making all aspects of the fine truly final.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 152. See David J. Seipp, The Concept of Property in the Early Common Law, 12 L. & Hist. Rev. 29 (1994) (discussing the concepts and vocabulary of "property" during the formative stages of the common law).

(n2)Footnote 153. Bracton, fol. 17.

(n3)Footnote 154. The laws or dooms of King Alfred contain a single reference to bookland, which was heritable but, when transferred, might be limited by the transferor to future alienation only within the kindred. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings, Alfred cl. 41 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n4)Footnote 155. This is the opinion expressed in 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 14 (2d ed. 1909).

(n5)Footnote 156. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 558 (5th ed. 1956). Pollock and Maitland asserted that most alienations of that time were by way of subinfeudation, which was not prohibited until enactment of the Statute Quia Emptores in 1290. See Roger Virgoe, Inheritance and Litigation in the Fifteenth Century: The Buckenham Disputes, 15 J. Legal Hist. 23 (1994).

(n6)Footnote 157. The Laws of the Earliest English Kings Alfred cl. 41 (F. L. Attenborough ed. & trans. 1922).

(n7)Footnote 158. The 'Coronation Charter' of Henry I (5 August 1100), c. 3, § 2, in 2 English Historical Documents 400-02 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n8)Footnote 159. It should also be noted that the father could provide this property for his daughter and her husband even without the consent of sons who were the expectant heirs, and this during a period when such consent was usually required for alienation.

(n9)Footnote 160. In some cases the grantor remained in possession until the reversion was removed by arrival of the third generation, although Glanvill considered this no completed gift, only the promise of a gift. Glanvill, VII, 1.

(n10)Footnote 161. GlanvilL, VII, 18.

(n11)Footnote 162. Bracton, fol. 17b.

(n12)Footnote 163. Statute of Westminster II (Statute De Donis Conditionalibus), 13 Edw., c. 1 (1285).

(n13)Footnote 164. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 552 (5th ed. 1956).

(n14)Footnote 165. Belyng v. Anon., Y.B. 5 Edw. 2, Easter Term, No. 2 (1312) (Year Books of Edward Ii, 5 Edward IL 176 (Selden Society Vol. 31, Vol. 11 Year Book Series, 1915)); Anon., Y.B. 5 Edw. 2, Trinity Term, No. 25 (1312) (Year Books of Edward II, 5 Edward II 22 (Selden Society Vol. 33, Vol. 12 Year Book Series, 1916)). The explanation for the striking departure from the express wording of the statute was that the drafter had been careless and had actually intended to draft the statute to cover the third generation of issue rather than just the first.

(n15)Footnote 166. Y.B. 12 Henry 4, Michaelmas Term, No. 9 (1410).

(n16)Footnote 167. The argument was pressed most vigorously in Y.B. 20 & 21 Edw. (Rolls Series), 58 (1292); see also Anon., Y.B. 5 Edw. 2, No. 78 (1311) (Year Books of Edward Il, 5 Edward Il 269 (Selden Society Vol. 63, Vol. 10 Year Book Series, 1947)).

(n17)Footnote 168. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 556 (5th ed. 1956).

(n18)Footnote 169. See C.M.A. McCauliff, The Medieval Origin of the Doctrine of Estates in Land: Substantive Property Law, Family Considerations, and the Interests of Women, 66 Tul. L. Rev. 919 (1992).

(n19)Footnote 170. According to Bracton, doweresses had fairly extensive rights on their lands to commit what would normally be considered waste. Bracton, fols. 315, 316.

(n20)Footnote 171. See Ch. 70, infra.

(n21)Footnote 172. § 3.05(f), supra.

(n22)Footnote 173. Glanvill, Vi, 1. C.M.A. McCauliff, The Medieval Origin of the Doctrine of Estates in Land: Substantive Property Law, Family Considerations, and the Interests of Women, 66 Tul. L. Rev. 919, 925 (1992).

(n23)Footnote 174. Bracton, fol. 92.

(n24)Footnote 175. Magna Carta, c. 7 (1217).

(n25)Footnote 176. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 421 (2d ed. 1909).

(n26)Footnote 177. Bracton, fol. 93. Borough tenancies were also frequently one-half, and villein widows usually obtained the entire tenement in dower.

(n27)Footnote 178. The Laws of the Kings of England From Edmund To Henry I 202-03, II Cnut cl. 53 (Agnes Jane Robertson ed. & trans. 1925).

(n28)Footnote 179. Bracton, fol. 96, 97.

(n29)Footnote 180. Bracton's Note Book, no. 1334 (1217).

(n30)Footnote 181. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 426 (2d ed. 1909).

(n31)Footnote 182. Id.

(n32)Footnote 183. See Jennifer Drobac, The Perfect Jointure: Its Formulation After the Statute of Uses, 19 Cambrian L. Rev. 26 (1988).

(n33)Footnote 184. See Joseph Biancalana, The Writs of Dower and Chapter 49 of Westminster I, 49 Cambridge L.J. 91 (1990). See generally Medieval Society and the Manor Court (Zvi Razi & Richard Smith, eds., Clarendon Press, Oxford 1996); Pauline Stafford, Queen Emma and Queen Edith: Queenship and Women's Power in Eleventh-Century England (Blackwell Publishers, Oxford 1997).

(n34)Footnote 185. C.M.A. McCauliff, The Medieval Origin of the Doctrine of Estates in Land: Substantive Property Law, Family Considerations, and the Interests of Women, 66 Tul. L. Rev. 919, 984 (1992).

(n35)Footnote 186. The Statutes of Gloucester, 6 Edw., c. 3 (1278); Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edw., c. 3 (1285).

(n36)Footnote 187. The discussion of early tenancies for term is based on 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 106-117 (2d ed. 1909).

(n37)Footnote 188. See, e.g., Bracton, fol. 27.

(n38)Footnote 189. The termor's occupancy could be disturbed, for example, by a guardian in chivalry, by a doweress, or by an assignee of the lessor.

(n39)Footnote 190. The Statutes of Gloucester, 6 Edw., c. 11 (1278).

(n40)Footnote 191. In an evil hour the English judges, who were controlling a new possessory action, which had been suggested by foreign models, adopted this theory at the expense of the termor. He must be the conductor who does not possess, or he must be the usufructary who does not possess the land but has "quasi-possession" of a servitude.2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 114-15 (2d ed. 1909).

(n41)Footnote 192. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 573 (5th ed. 1956).

(n42)Footnote 193. See, e.g., Bracton, fol. 18.

(n43)Footnote 194. Bracton's Note Book, no. 86 (1220).

(n44)Footnote 195. Bracton, fol. 68b.

(n45)Footnote 196. See, e.g., Neuton v. Staynford, Y.B. 5 Edw. 2, Michaelmas Term, No. 24 (1311) (Year Books of Edward Ii, 5 Edward 2, 98 (Selden Society, Vol. 63, Vol. 10 Year Book Series, 1947)); Y.B. 18 & 19 Edw. 2 (Rolls Series), 378 (1345).

(n46)Footnote 197. In Y.B. 18 & 19 Edw. 2 (Rolls Series), 378 (1345), reference is made to the practices of two prominent royal judges who accepted as parties before them remaindermen who held by fine, but not remaindermen who held by deed.

(n47)Footnote 198. Y.B. 32 & 33 Edw. (Rolls Series), 328 (1304).

(n48)Footnote 199. Y.B. 2 Edw. 2, 4 (1309).

(n49)Footnote 200. Y.B. 10 Edw. 3, Michaelmas Term, No. 8 (1336); Y.B. 11 Rich. 2, 283-288 (1388). J. H. Baker, Sir John Melton's Case (1535): Cockermouth Castle and the Three Silver Luces, 55 Cambridge L.J. 249 (1996) (example of treatment of contingent remainders under common law).

(n50)Footnote 201. See, e.g., Archer's Case, 1 Co .Rep. 66b, 76 Eng. Rep. 146 (1597).

(n51)Footnote 202. Some dispute existed about whether coparceners had a right of survivorship, but the courts ultimately and consistently held that they did not. Y.B. 14 & 15 Edw. 3 (Rolls Series), 34 (1341); Y.B. 17 & 18 Edw. 3 (Rolls Series), 174 (1343).

(n52)Footnote 203. Bracton, fol. 72-77b.

(n53)Footnote 204. 31 Hen. 8, c. 1 (1539); 32 Hen. 8, c. 32 (1540).

(n54)Footnote 205. Bracton, fol. 72.

(n55)Footnote 206. Bracton, fols. 72-77b.

(n56)Footnote 207. 31 Hen. 8, c. 1 (1539).

(n57)Footnote 208. Bracton, fol. 13.

(n58)Footnote 209. Statutes of Marlborough, 52 Hen. 3, c. 6 (1267).

(n59)Footnote 210. Bracton, fol. 72.

(n60)Footnote 211. Y.B. 14 Edw. 3 (Rolls Series), 198, 200 (1341); Y.B. 38 Edw. 3, Michaelmas Term, 26b (1364).

(n61)Footnote 212. Bracton, fol. 208. John V. Orth, Tenancy by the Entirety: The Strange Career of the Common-law Marital Estate, 1997 BYU L. Rev. 35, n. 51 (effect of a joint estate between a husband and wife and a third person). U.S. v. Craft, 535 US 274 (2002) (tax lien on husband's share of property held in tenancy by the entirety attached to the couple's joint interest in the property).

(n62)Footnote 213. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 603 (5th ed. 1956). In a footnote to the quote in the text, Plucknett added, "Remember that the mediaeval 'pledge' (plegius) is almost always a person, not a thing. The Teutonic wed has come down to us by various routes as 'gage', 'engagement', 'wage', 'wager', and 'wedding'. Charles J. Reid, Jr., The Seventeenth-Century Revolution in the English Land Law, 43 Clev. St. L. Rev. 293, 299 (1995).

(n63)Footnote 214. 2 Domesday Book 137, 141, 217.

(n64)Footnote 215. Glanvill, X, 6.

(n65)Footnote 216. An alternative explanation for the "dead" gage is that if the debt is not paid, the land is dead as to the debtor; if the debt is paid, the land is dead to the creditor. The payment arrangement of a gage could also be gradually killing or "amortizing" the debt.

(n66)Footnote 217. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 119 (2d ed. 1909).

(n67)Footnote 218. Glanvill, X, 8.

(n68)Footnote 219. Glanvill, X, 11.

(n69)Footnote 220. Bracton, fols. 20, 268-269.

(n70)Footnote 221. See, e.g., Rye v. Tumby, Y.B. 8 Edw. 2, Michaelmas Term, No. 9 (1314) (Year Books of Edward Ii, 8 Edward II 36 (Selden Society vol. 37, Vol. 18 Year Book Series, 1920)); Walsham v. Walsham, Y.B. 8 Edw. 2, Michaelmas Term, No. 10 (1314) (Year Books of Edward Ii, 8 Edward II 52 (Selden Society Vol. 37, Vol. 18 Year Book Series, 1920)).

(n71)Footnote 222. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 124 (2d ed. 1909).

(n72)Footnote 223. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 606 (5th ed. 1956).

(n73)Footnote 224. De Mercatoribus, 13 Edw. (1285).

(n74)Footnote 225. Statute of Staples, 27 Edw. 3, c. 9 (1353).

(n75)Footnote 226. The mayor of the staple was the chief officer of the staple or great market at Westminster who took acknowledgements of estates created under statutes staple as security for debts.

(n76)Footnote 227. See also John Hudson, Land, Law and Lordship in Anglo-Norman England (1994).

(n77)Footnote 228. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 90 (2d ed. 1909). See also Bracton's Note Book pl. 375 (1230), pl. 754 (1233).

(n78)Footnote 229. Bracton, fol. 56b.

(n79)Footnote 230. Bracton, fol. 33b.

(n80)Footnote 231. See, e.g., Y.B. 20 & 21 Edw. 1 (Rolls Series), 32 (1292); Statutes at Marlborough, 52 HEN. 3, c. 9 (1267).

(n81)Footnote 232. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 83 (2d ed. 1909). See Bracton, fols. 40, 41; Y.B. 20 & 21 Edw. 1 (Rolls Series), 256 (1292).

(n82)Footnote 233. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 85-86 (2d ed. 1909)..

(n83)Footnote 234. See also John Hudson, Land, Law and Lordship in Anglo-Norman England (1994).

(n84)Footnote 235. See Bracton fol. 41.

(n85)Footnote 236. "Quit-claim" derives from quietum clamare, to "cry quits."

(n86)Footnote 237. Bracton's Note Book, pl. 524 (1231).

(n87)Footnote 238. Throughout this chapter the terms grantor and grantee, rather than donor and donee, are used because of their meaning for the modern reader; however, as is explained in the text, the only proper medieval usage for the grant terminology is when transfer of lordship occurs while a freehold tenant is in occupancy.

(n88)Footnote 239. Bracton, fols. 80b, 81b; Y.B. 32 & 33 Edw. 1 (Rolls Series), 43 (1304).

(n89)Footnote 240. This section is based on Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 610-613 (5th ed. 1956).

(n90)Footnote 241. Statutes of Gloucester, 6 Edw., c. 3 (1278).

(n91)Footnote 242. Y.B. 33 & 35 Edw. (Rolls Series), 388 (1306).

(n92)Footnote 243. 4 & 5 Anne, c. 3, s. 21 (1706).

(n93)Footnote 244. 34 Edw. 3, c. 16 (1361).

(n94)Footnote 245. 1 Rich. 3, c. 7 (1484) ; 4 Hen. 7, c. 24 (1489).

(n95)Footnote 246. Bracton's Note Book, pl. 101 (1220), 147 (1222), 168 (1222), 316 (1229), 363 (1229), 815 (1233), 851 (1234), 1035 (1225), 1619 (1223).

(n96)Footnote 247. Bracton declared the bar to be effective as soon as the chirograph was delivered to the parties, not less than fifteen days after the agreement was struck in court. Bracton, fol. 436. At other times the period may have been a year and a day.

(n97)Footnote 248. See Bracton's Note Book, pl. 992 (1224), 1223 (1238), 1616 (1223), 1619 (1223).

(n98)Footnote 249. See Glanvill, VIII.

(n99)Footnote 250. Bracton, fol. 321b.

(n100)Footnote 251. Bracton, fols. 242b, 262, 270; Bracton's Note Book, pl. 125 (1222), 778 (1233), 853 (1234); Y.B. 33 & 35 Edw. 1 (Rolls Series), 201, 435 (1306).

(n101)Footnote 252. Statute de Finibus Levatis, 27 Edw., Stat. I (1299).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.07

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.07 Uses.

§ 4.07(a) Origins of Uses.

The term "use" in English law derives from the Latin "opus," signifying a benefit or "on behalf of." One person could give land or chattels to another, for the use or benefit of a third person. Uses were employed by knights embarking on crusades, by one wishing to confer the benefit of land on a religious order not authorized to hold land, and by villeins who could convey their land only by yielding it to the lord "for the use of" the intended grantee. n253 When a wardship was taken from an unfaithful guardian and given to another, the new guardian held "to the use of" the ward. n254

Uses had apparently become quite common during the fourteenth century, because several statutes of the latter part of that century deal with uses. One statute made lands held to the use of defrauding debtors subject to execution for their debts. n255 Another statute made uses for the benefit of religious houses and other corporations subject to the Statute of Mortmain, n256 meaning that no uses could be created for the benefit of such institutions, upon pain of forfeiture (except that mortmain practice permitted such conveyances after first obtaining a royal license). n257 By statute uses became forfeitable for treason, as were other real property interests. n258

§ 4.07(b) Advantages and Disadvantages of Uses.

The beneficiary of the use, the "cestui que use," was frequently the party benefiting from a collusive or fraudulent arrangement, and perhaps just as frequently the party victimized by an unfaithful feoffee who would not honor the terms of the use. Certainly much mischief could be accomplished by wrongful employment of the use:

> The purpose of such conveyances frequently was to enable the landowners to deal with their lands in a manner not countenanced by the common law or to evade the liabilities incident to legal ownership, such as the rule of destructibility. Thus suppose O, the owner of Blackacre in fee simple absolute, wished to dispose of Blackacre by will at a time when disposition by will was not recognized by the law courts, i.e., prior to 1540. To accomplish this goal, O would be enfeoff Bin fee simple absolute to hold to O's use during O's lifetime and after his death to transfer the land according to O's will. Upon O's death, B, the owner of Blackacre in fee simple absoulte, would then carry out the terms of O's will and transfer Blackacre to O's intended beneficiaries. Likewise, a dying land owner could by a conveyance to several > feoffees to use (who would take a joint tenants) deprieve the lord of the fee of the important incidents of wardship, marriage or relief. n259

It was also the rule that dower and curtesy would not attach to uses, which significantly aided the free alienability of uses.

Succumbing to the attractive features of the use, however, the landowner became very vulnerable to a false feoffee:

> It is obvious that the success of a feoffor's attempt to put the legal ownership of his land in someone else and retain the beneficial ownership in himself depended on the feoffee keeping his promise to deal with the land according to the agreement made at the time of the feoffment. Unless some way could be found to enforce the feoffee's promise the feoffor's position was indeed precarious. In law the feoffee was the true owner; the cestui que use in possession was only a tenant at will. Seisin had vested in the feoffee by virtue of the feoffment and the law was not at all concerned with the feoffee's promise to deal with the land for the benefit of the feoffor or his nominees. n260

§ 4.07(c) Equitable Intervention in the Development of Uses.

The situation was a natural setting for intervention by the Chancellor, acting on equitable principles to provide relief unavailable under the common law. So, early in the fifteenth century, the Court of Chancery began accepting cases in which feoffees were accused of not honoring their instructions on behalf of a cestui que use. The Chancery Court did not interfere with the feoffees' legal title, but did impose fines and imprisonment for misconduct of feoffees. n261

§ 4.07(d) Early Statutory Reform of Uses.

Legitimizing uses under equity jurisdiction did not necessarily quell the abuses, and movements for statutory reform continued to gain momentum. One statute permitting a remedy against a person receiving the profits of land, n262 and another statute enabling a cestui que use to convey a legal estate, n263 reflected a policy position that the cestui que use should be treated as a legal owner of the property, not merely as an equitable owner. Based on this same position, other statutes declared void certain trusts and uses of chattels to the use of a settlor (similar to a modern grantor trust), n264 declared that wardship and reliefs would be due from the cestui que use of military land, n265 and decreed that execution could be had against land held under a use, with the cestui que use permitted the same defenses available to the legal owner. n266 When Richard III became king, after he had been enfeoffed to use by several of his associates, a statute required that such lands of which he was seised for the use of others were to be vested in the cestui que use, n267 another example of treating the owner of the use as the legal owner. This long-emerging legislative policy of treating the equitable interest of the cestui que use as a legal interest culminated in the great Statute of Uses of 1536.

§ 4.07(e) Conveyancing of Uses.

Before the Statute of Uses, however, an extensive conveyancing practice involving uses had developed. At the time of an enfeoffment to use, the uses could be included in a written document, stated orally, or declared to be the uses included in the grantor's will. If uses were not made known at the time of the enfeoffment, the grant was presumed to be for the use of the feoffer.

> While a use was typically created or raised by a feoffment to uses, it could also be created in connection with any other common-law type of conveyance, such as a fine, common recovery, lease, release or grant. Generally, a use could be created wiht or without a transfer of possession. A use was raised with a transfer of the possession where it was created upon an actual transfer of the seisin as in the case of a feoffment to uses. No technical words were necessary to create a use, and the declaration of the use could be oral or written. The word "use" was frequently employed but it was not essential. Any words expressing the feoffer's intention that the legal estate should be held for the benefit of another > person were sufficient. A declaration that the feoffee should hold land upon trust or confidence for C and his heirs, or that he should permit C and his heirs to take the profits, was sufficient to raise a use. n268

Eventually, uses become so common that when a fee simple enfeoffment occurred and no use was declared, but the transaction was without consideration, a use was presumed in the feoffor. This implied use in the feoffer was termed a "resulting use."

Uses were often conveyed to several persons as joint tenants; this arrangement offered some security against simultaneous dishonesty by all the feoffees and through operation of survivorship avoided questions of dower or feudal incidents when any of the joint tenants died.

A use was also frequently raised by a bargain and sale. By a bargain and sale agreement, oral or written, an owner accepted monetary consideration in return for a promise to sell the land to the buyer. The promise alone effected no conveyance of the legal title, but the bargainee would be treated in equity as the beneficial owner and, by a suit in equity, the bargainee could compel the bargainor to convey legal title. This arrangement was also a natural vehicle for raising a use. By bargain and sale the owner could agree to hold the land for use or benefit of the buyer and the buyer's heirs. Again, the buyer could compel the seller to permit the buyer's use of the land, including its rents and profits. As early as the fifteenth century, a bargain and sale that had not proceeded to conveyance of the legal title was deemed to have raised a use in the bargainee. For those who actually wanted no more than the use, the bargain and sale arrangement would thus be left in this suspended, uncompleted state, with the purchasers holding only equitable title in the form of a use. From the point of view of feudal tenurial doctrine, this circumstance was significant, because it meant, as mentioned above, that a use could be raised without a transfer of seisin. Parties also found appealing the confidentiality of the transaction, because without conveyance of the legal title, there was no occasion to make a public record of the transaction. n269

§ 4.07(f) Enactment and Effects of the Statute of Uses (1536).

§ 4.07(f)(1) Circumstances Leading to the Enactment of the Statute of Uses.

Conveying land to uses became extremely widespread and resulted in much abuse, complication, and fraud. Most of this was peremptorily wiped away with the enactment of perhaps the most famous and significant English property law statute, the Statute of Uses, that became effective in 1536. The circumstances that finally prompted the monarchy to act against uses and force restrictive legislation through Parliament have been well-summarized by Moynihan:

> This statute is probably the most important piece of legislation dealing with English land law, and its far-reaching consequences are still felt in our own times. The causes which led to its enactment are to be found in an English King's need of money. The Statute was primarily designed to restore to the Crown the feudal revenues which were being lost by means of the conveyance of lands to uses. In the sixteenth century the incidents of tenure, such as wardship, marriage, relief, primer seisin and escheat, were burdensome exactions on the tenant and, correspondingly, a profitable source of revenue for the lord of the fee. Since the king "alone was always lord and never tenant" he lost heavily when landowners by conveyances to joint feoffees to uses rid themselves of the incidents of tenure by retaining only the beneficial ownership. Henry VIII by means of the Statute of Uses sought to put an end to this drainage of the royal revenues ... The abolition of uses was not looked upon with favor by the land owning class who feared the loss of power to devise their lands, but Henry was able to enlist the support of the common law lawyers in Parliament in putting through the Statute because of their deep-rooted jealousy of the Court of Chancery. As Maitland well puts it, the Statute "was forced upon an extremely unwilling Parliament by an extremely strong-willed king." n270

§ 4.07(f)(2) The Operating Principle of the Statute of Uses.

The method of the Statute of Uses was simple: it simply declared that whoever held the use would now also be deemed the holder of the legal title. Its essential but arcane language was paraphrased by Maitland:

> Where any person or persons shall be seised of any lands or other hereditaments to the use, confidence, trust of any other person or persons, in every such case such person and persons that shall have any such use, confidence or trust in fee simple, fee tail, for term of life or for years or otherwise shall stand and be seised deemed and adjudged in lawful seisin, estate and possession of and in the same lands and hereditaments in such like estates as they had or shall have in use. n271

§ 4.07(f)(3) The Impact of the Statute of Uses on Conveyancing.

The Statute of Uses did not alter the traditional common law methods of conveying interests. Livery of seisin was effective to convey a freehold estate, a grant conveyed a vested remainder or a reversion, and an agreement and entry sufficed to convey a term of years. The common law rule that a freehold to commence at some time in the future could not be created by conveyance remained in effect. The important impact of the Statute of Uses was to add several new possibilities for conveyancing. n272

§ 4.07(f)(3)(i) Feoffment to Uses.

The feoffment to use as practiced prior to the Statute of Uses was still a legitimate vehicle for conveyancing, but the interests conveyed previously as uses were converted by the Statute of Uses into legal interests. This had its advantages. By a feoffment to uses before the Statute a man could convey a use directly to himself and his wife, a conveyance that, if applied to legal interests, was not permitted under common law. After the Statute of Uses, a man could convey a legal estate directly to himself and his wife by means of a feoffment to uses, which use was converted by the Statute into the equivalent legal interest.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(ii) Resulting Uses.

Before the Statute of Uses, a resulting use in a grantor arose when a landowner conveyed to another with no consideration and no use declared. Such a resulting use in the grantor was converted into the equivalent legal interest by the Statute of Uses, so the conveyance became circular and meaningless. Conveyancers countered this result by including in conveyances an express declaration of use in the grantee, so no executed use in the grantor would be inferred.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(iii) Bargain and Sale.

Before the Statute of Uses, a bargain and sale was used to raise a use. Inasmuch as this use was converted to a legal interest after the Statute, the bargain and sale became an appropriate method of creating a legal estate. Indeed, the Statute vested the seller's seisin in the buyer by operation of law. Because no livery of seisin was necessary after the Statute, and no writing was required for a bargain and sale, the possibility arose that oral, unrecorded, and therefore secret conveyances of freeholds could take place by bargain and sale. Such secret conveyances were deemed undesirable. Therefore, in the same year as the Statute of Uses Parliament also enacted the Statute of Enrolments, n273 requiring freehold conveyances by bargain and sale to be in writing, under seal, and to be entered or enrolled in certain public offices.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(iv) Lease and Release.

To evade the public writing requirement of the Statute of Enrolments, conveyancers devised the lease and release. An owner of land would by bargain and sale convey the land to the grantee for a term of years (the lease), not required to be in writing or to be enrolled under the Statute of Enrolments, because it was not a conveyance of a freehold estate. The grantor's reversion would then be "released" by common law release to the termor, who thus obtained the entire estate.

The release was also not required to be in writing or enrolled, because the Statute of Enrolments applied only to bargain and sale transactions. Because the term for years was created by bargain and sale, the grantee obtained the term without entering into possession, and the interest was vested by operation of the Statute of Uses. Having not entered into possession, the grantee was eligible to accept the release of the reversion:

> From approximately 1620 until 1845 the conveyance by lease and release was the most commonly used method of conveying land in England. It had the advantage (from the viewpoint of the parties) of transferring the title by means of a secret conveyance that involved none of the inconveniences of the common law methods. It was not necessary for the parties to go upon the land as in the case of a transfer by feoffment, nor was it necessary for the conveyee to make an actual entry as in the case of a transfer of an estate for years by agreement and entry. Moreover, the requirement of recording and payment of a fee therefor under the Terms of the Statute of Enrolments was circumvented... Another advantage of conveyance by lease and release was that it could be used to effectuate family settlements of land by declaring uses on the release... All of the uses would be executed by the Statute of Uses into legal estates or interests. n274

§ 4.07(f)(3)(v) Covenant to Stand Seised.

Even after the Statute of Uses, a mere agreement by one person to hold land for the use of another did not create an enforceable use. Lacking was the element of consideration, which is why a bargain and sale or a feoffment to uses were enforced as raising uses that were "executed" or converted into legal interests by operation of the Statute of Uses. However, not long after enactment of the Statute, it was held that such an agreement, or covenant, to hold to the use of another, even without the traditional consideration, could be enforced as raising a use. Such a covenant to stand seised was required to be written, to be under seal, and to be supported by the consideration of natural love and affection (if to the use of a relative) or of marriage. n275 Once it was conceded that such a covenant to stand seised raised a use, the use was executed, or converted into the legal estate, by the Statute of Uses.

The covenant to stand seised was used mostly to effect family settlements, or distributions, of land to other family members, because -- under its particular consideration requirements -- it was valid only as to parties who were related by blood or marriage. The covenant to stand seised could remain secret, because it, too, was not required to be enrolled under the Statute of Enrolments.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(vi) Executory Interests.

A major effect of the Statute of Uses was the introduction of several new types of future interests. Before the statute's enactment, the only future interests recognized in the common law were reversions and remainders, and these --especially the remainders -- were hedged about by limits linked to the logic of tenures and estates. n276 It was not permissible, for instance, for a legal freehold estate to be granted at one moment in time, but not actually commence as an interest until some time thereafter. Under the practice of uses prior to the Statute of Uses, however, such a conveyance was common: an owner might enfeoff land to a feoffee to the use of another, such use to not commence until the occurrence of some event in the future. The transaction was called a springing use, but when such a use was "executed" into a legal interest by the Statute of Uses, the springing use became a springing "executory" interest, such as was formerly forbidden under the common law. The feoffer, making such a conveyance after the Statute of Uses, would still hold the estate in fee simple (because the conveyance to a feoffee to use would have been ineffective), but the estate would be subject to an executory interest in the party that would formerly have held the springing use. After the Statute of Uses and upon the occurrence of the event that would have commenced the use, the executory interest would have become the fee simple interest, with no interest left in the feoffor. This conveyance could be created by means of a bargain and sale, an enfeoffment, or a covenant to stand seised.

Another future interest not possible under the common law was a conveyance of successive future interests with a gap in time between the end of one and the beginning of the next. Such a conveyance to use, however, was another variety of springing use and was possible before the Statute of Uses. An enfeoffment to the feoffee for the use of another for life, with the permanent use to go over to yet another party one year after the use for life ended, was valid. Such uses would have been "executed" by the Statute of Uses, so that the holder of the use for life would have a life estate, the feoffor would have a reversion for a year, and the holder of the permanent use would have an executory interest, to become a fee simple one year after the life estate ended. This conveyance could be created by means of a bargain and sale, an enfeoffment, or a covenant to stand seised.

Yet a third variety of springing use became a valid legal interest after the Statute of Uses. A conveyance in use, such as a bargain and sale, to one for a term of years and then to the heirs of another who was then living, created a contingent interest following a term of years. This is because the remaindermen could not be vested until the death of the ancestor and determination of heirship, which might be long after the end of the preceding term. Again, the Statute of Uses "executed" such springing uses into valid legal estates, so that the conveyance became an estate for years, a reversion in the grantor if necessary until heirship of another was determined, and then an executory interest in the nature of a springing use in those prospective heirs. This conveyance could be created by a bargain and sale or a covenant to stand seised.

In addition to the varieties of springing use described in the preceding paragraphs, the Statute of Uses also executed a type of "shifting" use into a valid executory interest. A conveyance to one, in use, with the use to go over to another upon the happening of a certain event, such as making a particular forbidden use of the property, was not possible under the common law. When the Statute of Uses executed the use, then the conveyance to the grantee became an estate in fee simple, subject to a shifting executory interest in another, that would ripen into a fee simple if the property were used in the forbidden way. This conveyance could be created by a bargain and sale, a covenant to stand seised, or an enfeoffment.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(vii) Devises.

Before the Statute of Uses it had not been possible to devise a legal estate, except in some areas by local custom, but a feoffment to uses declared in a will was upheld. When the feoffee's interest was "executed" by the Statute of Uses into a legal interest, it suddenly was no longer able to be devised. The strong opposition to this state of affairs was placated by enactment of the Statute of Wills in 1540, n277 which gave limited powers of devise. Under these limitations, a landowner could devise any lands held under socage tenure, and up to two-thirds of lands held by knight tenure. Devisees were made liable for feudal obligations as if they had taken by descent. Because livery of seisin was not required for an effective devise, the common law restrictions on certain types of future interests were deemed inapplicable; therefore, it was possible to devise springing and shifting future interests that would have been inappropriate as inter vivos conveyances of legal future interests. Such devises are executory devises and are included with inter vivos shifting and springing interests as executory interests.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(viii) Contingent Remainders.

It has already been mentioned that common law contingent remainders were subject to destruction, if the supporting freehold estate were forfeited through tortious alienation. Under this rule of destructibility, if the holder of the life estate attempted to convey a fee simple, the attempted alienation would be deemed tortious and the life estate would be forfeited before the contingent remainder vested. Thereupon the contingent remainder was deemed destroyed. n278 When executory interests were first recognized, they were considered subject to the same rule of destructibility, but that position was later reversed in the courts. n279 Common law contingent remainders, however, were still destructible, and the rule of destructibility was even extended to contingent remainders created by use and by devise.

§ 4.07(f)(3)(ix) Uses Not Executed by the Statute of Uses.

Several kinds of uses were not converted into legal estates by the Statute of Uses. According to the wording of the statute, only uses derived from one who was seised of the land were to be executed into legal interests. Because seisin applied only to freehold estates, if one held a non-freehold estate to the use of another, that use was not executed. Uses raised on an estate held for a term of years, or on personal property such as chattels or a chose in action, were unexecuted.

If a person was seised to the use of another, who held to the use of yet another -- a so-called use limited on a use -- the second use was held void before the Statute of Uses was enacted. After the Statute of Uses, the second use was at law deemed unexecuted, and in equity was still treated as void, so no interest at all passed under the second use. Sometime in the late seventeenth century, n280 after enactment of the statute abolishing tenures in 1660, n281 a use upon a use came to be upheld in equity. n282 This in turn once again enabled landholders to split their interests between legal and equitable titles, and the second use came to be commonly referred to as a trust. The holders of the first uses, executed into legal interests, became the trustees, not only holders of the legal title but bound to act in the interests of the trust owners or beneficiaries.

A few years after enactment of the Statute of Uses, still another category of uses were held exempt from execution into legal interests. These were the so-called active uses, created by a conveyance to use with the grantee to perform affirmative duties on behalf of the cestui que use. Typically, such affirmative duties might consist of collecting and paying to the cestui que use the rents and profits from the property, or conveying the property at the direction of the cestui que use. This exemption for active uses is not in the wording of the Statute of Uses, but was invoked by judicial decision.

The equitable estates arising out of unexecuted active uses tended to merge with the unexecuted uses upon use and emerged in the 18th century as early forms of the modern trust.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 253. Several reasons have been given for the origin of "uses" in the Middle Ages. Because of the Crusades, many landowners needed to keep someone in control of their lands. Additionally, friars would often "use" others' lands in order to achieve complete poverty. Avoidance of forfeiture by treason was another reason. Simpson gives four main reasons for the creation of uses: 1) to assist in simple fraud; 2) to avoid feudal dues; 3) to gain power of devise over land; and 4) to facilitate the creation of settlements of land. A.W.B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 174-175 (2d ed. 1986).

(n2)Footnote 254. Statute of Westminster I, 3 Edw., c. 48 (1275).

(n3)Footnote 255. 50 Edw. 3, c. 6 (1376).

(n4)Footnote 256. 7 Edw., Stat. 2 (1279).

(n5)Footnote 257. 15 Rich. 2, c. 5(4) (1391).

(n6)Footnote 258. 21 Rich. 2, c. 3 (1397):

> And he for him and his heirs shall forfeit all the lands, tenements, and possessions, liberties and all other hereditaments, which he hath or any other hath to his use, or had the day of the treason done as well in fee tail as in fee simple to the King and his heirs, as well such lands holden of other as of himself forever; and also such possession as other have to his use. (Emphasis added.)

(n7)Footnote 259. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 229 (4th ed. 2005).

(n8)Footnote 260. Id.

(n9)Footnote 261. It has been suggested that one purpose of the Statute of Uses was to curtail sharply the role of the Chancellor in giving equitable relief to disappointed or cheated holders of uses. In this function, the Chancellor was perhaps seen as the "ecclesiastical conscience of the State" in carrying on enforcement mechanisms formerly wielded by the Roman church in England in connection with testamentary instructions. To limit the Chancellor's power of enforcement was therefore also to reduce the power of religious institutions within the state. See Stephen W. DeVine, Ecclesiastical Antecedents to Secular Jurisdiction Over the Feoffment to Uses to be Declared in Testamentary Instructions, 30 Am. J. Legal Hist. 295 (1986).

(n10)Footnote 262. 1 Hen. 7, c. 1 (1485).

(n11)Footnote 263. 1 Rich. 3, c. 1 (1484) .

(n12)Footnote 264. 3 Hen. 7, c. 4 (1487).

(n13)Footnote 265. 4 Hen. 7, c. 17 (1489).

(n14)Footnote 266. 19 Hen. 7, c. 15 (1504).

(n15)Footnote 267. 1 Rich. 3 , c. 5 (1484).

(n16)Footnote 268. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 233-234 (4th ed. 2005).

(n17)Footnote 269. See Stephen W. DeVine, The Franciscan Friars, the Feoffment to Uses, and Canonical Theories of Property Enjoyment Before 1535, 10 J. Legal Hist. 1 (May 1989); Stephen W. DeVine, The Concept of Epieikeia in the Chancellor of England's Enforcement of the Feoffment to Uses Before 1535, 21 U. Br. Colum. L. Rev. 323 (1987).

(n18)Footnote 270. Cornelius J. Moynihan, An Introduction To The Law of Real Property 178-179 (2d ed. 1988). Similar language is found in Sheldon F. Kurtz, Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 236-237 (4th ed. 2005). A detailed discussion of the political causes leading to the Statute of Uses is in 4 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 450-461 (3d ed. 1945). The quoted passage of Maitland is from Frederic William Maitland, Equity, Also The Forms of Action At Common Law 35 (1909), who added:

> It [the Statute of Uses] was very unpopular and was one of the excuses, if not one of the causes, of the great Catholic Rebellion known as the Pilgrimage of Grace. It at once seemed that it would deprive men of that testamentary power, that power of purchasing the repose of their souls, which they had long enjoyed. The king was the one person who had all to gain and nothing to lose by the abolition of uses.

(n19)Footnote 271. Frederic William Maitland, Equity, Also The Forms of Action At Common Law 35 (1909).

(n20)Footnote 272. See, e.g., Jennifer Drobac, The Perfect Jointure: Its Formulation After the Statute of Uses, 19 Cambrian L. Rev. 26 (1988).

(n21)Footnote 273. 27 Hen. 8, c. 16 (1536).

(n22)Footnote 274. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 243-244 (4th ed. 2005).

(n23)Footnote 275. Sharrington v. Strotton, Plowden 298 (1566).

(n24)Footnote 276. See Roe ex dem. Wilkinson v. Tranmer, 2 Wils. 75, 95 Eng. Rep. 694 (1757).

(n25)Footnote 277. 32 Hen. 8, c. 1 (1540).

(n26)Footnote 278. See, e.g., Archer's Case, 1 Co. Rep. 66b, 76 Eng. Rep. 146 (1597).

(n27)Footnote 279. Pells v. Brown, Cro. Jac. 590 (1620).

(n28)Footnote 280. The earliest case acknowledging the validity of the second use is the 1676 case of Grubb v. Gwillim, 1 Lord Nottingham's Chancery Cases 347, No. 487 (Selden Society, Vol. 73, 1957).

(n29)Footnote 281. Tenures Abolition Act, 12 Car. 2, c. 24 (1660).

(n30)Footnote 282. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 198-207 (2d Ed. 1986).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 4.08

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 4.08 Bibliography.

[Go To Supp]

Books

Adams, George Burton. The Origin of the English Courts of Common Law (1921).

Anderson, J. Stuart. Lawyers and the Making of English Land Law (Oxford University Press, 1992).

Barlow, Frank. The Feudal Kingdom of England, 1042-1216 (1999).

Barrow, G. W. S. The Kingdom of the Scots: Government, Church, and Society from the Eleventh to the Fourteenth Century (1973).

Bartlett, Robert. England Under the Norman and Angevin Kings, 1075-1225 (2000).

Bean, J. M. W. (John Malcolm William). From Lord to Patron: Lordship in Late Medieval England (1989).

Biancalana, Joseph. The Fee Tail and Common Recovery in Medieval England (Cambridge University Press, 2001).

Blair, John (W. John). Early Medieval Surrey: Landholding, Church, and Settlement Before 1300 (1991).

Brower, Adrienne. Over Countless Waves upon England's Shore: a Look at the Legal Progress from Britain's First Peoples to the Norman Conquest, and Why Anglo-Saxon Law Is the True Root of England's Common Law (1999).

Cairn, John W. and Grant McLeod (eds.). The Dearest Birth Right of the People of England: The Jury in the History of the Common Law (2002).

Cantor, Norman F. Imagining the Law: Common Law and the Foundations of the American Legal System (1997).

Coss, Peter R. Lordship, Knighthood, and Locality: a Study in English Society, c. 1180-c. 1280 (1991).

Crouch, David. The Normans: the History of a Dynasty (2002).

Davies, Wendy. Property and Power in the Early Middle Ages (1995).

DeGregorio, Scott (ed.). Innovation and Tradition in the Writing of the Venerable Bede (2006).

Doe, Norman. Fundamental Authority in Late Medieval English Law (2000).

Ellis, Henry, Sir. A General Introduction to Domesday Book; Accompanied by Indexes of the Tenants-in-Chief, and Under-Tenants, at the Time of the Survey: as Well as of the Holders of Lands Mentioned in Domesday Anterior to the Formation of That Record: with an Abstract of the Population of England at the Close of the Reign of William the Conqueror, So Far as the Same Is Actually Entered. Illustrated by Numerous Notes and Comments (1971).

Evans, Stephen S. The Lords of Battle: Image and Reality of the Comitatus in Dark Age Britain (1997).

Farley, Abraham, J. Morris et al., ed. Domesday Book (1975).

Galbraith, V.H. The Making of Domesday Book (1961).

Galbraith, V.H. Domesday Book: Its Place in Administrative History (1974).

Golding, Brian. Conquest and Colonisation: the Normans in Britain, 1066-1100 (2001).

Helmholz, R. H. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England (1974).

Hudson, John. The Formation of the English Common Law: Law and Society in England from the Norman Conquest to Magna Carta (1996).

Hudson, John. Land, Law, and Lordship in Anglo-Norman England (1994).

Hyams, Paul R. King, Lords and Peasants in Medieval England: the Common Law of Villeinage in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries (1980).

Jewell, Helen M. Women in Dark Age and Early Medieval Europe, c. 500-1200 (2007).

Keeton, George W. The Norman Conquest and the Common Law (1966).

Leyser, Karl. Communications and Power in Medieval Europe: the Carolingian and Ottonian Centuries (1994).

Lomas, Richard. North-East England in the Middle Ages.

Loyn, H.R. Anglo-Saxon England and the Norman Conquest (1991).

Matthew, D.J.A. The Norman Conquest (1966).

Menuge, Noel James. Medieval English Wardship in Romance and Law (2001).

Mulder-Bakker and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne (eds.). Household, Women, and Christianities In Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages (2006).

Page, T.W. The End of Villainage in England (1900).

Phythian-Adams, Charles. Land of the Cumbrians: a Study in British Provincial Origins, A.D. 400-1120 (1996).

Poly, Jean-Pierre. The Feudal Transformation: 900-1200 (1991).

Raban, Sandra. Mortmain Legislation and the English Church, 1279-1500 (1982).

Reppy, Alison. The Ordinance of William the Conqueror (1072) Its Implications in the Modern Law of Succession (1954).

Simpson, A.W.B. A History of Land Law (2d ed. 1986).

Tabuteau, Emily Zack. Transfers of Property in Eleventh-Century Norman Law (1988).

Turner, Sam. Making a Christian Landscape: The Countryside in Early Medieval Cornwall, Devon and Essex (2006).

Van Caenegam, R.C. The Birth of the English Common Law (1973).

Vinogradoff, Paul, Sir. Villainage in England; Essays in English Mediaeval History (1892).

West, Francis James. The Justiciarship in England, 1066-1232 (1966).

Articles

Biancalana, Joseph. "Actions of Covenant," 1200-1330. 20 Law & Hist. Rev. 1 (2002).

Brooks, N.P., "The Unidentified Forts of the Burghal Hidage," Medieval Archaeology 8 (1964).

Carrozzo, Peter M. "Tenancies in Antiquity: a Transformation of Concurrent Ownership for Modern Relationships." 85 Marq. L. Rev. 423 (2001).

Hill, D., "The Burghal Hidage," Medieval Archaeology 13 (1969).

Haddock, David D. "The Black Death and Property Rights." 31 J. Legal Stud. 545 (2002).

Holt, J.C. "Politics and Property in Early Medieval England." 57 Past and Present 3-52 (1972).

Gierstorfer, Carl. "Saxon Hordes Ousted Celts," 175 New Scientist 20 (issue 2350, July 6, 2002).

Lund, Thomas. "Some Interesting Medieval Dower Cases," 37 U. Tol. L. Rev. 659 (Spring 2006).

Maddicott, J.R. "Responses to the Threat of Invasion, 1085. (England faces threat of invasion by Danish people)," 122 The English Historical Review 986 (Sept. 2007).

McCauliff, C.M.A. "The Medieval Origin of the Doctrine of Estates in Land: Substantive Property Law, Family Considerations, and the Interests of Women." 66 Tul. L. Rev. 919 (1992).

Miles, Maria Funk. "The Value of a Woman: A Comparison of the Laws and the Traditions of Divorce in Medieval Europe and Modern America," 15 UCLA Women's L.J. 139 (Fall 2006).

Moser, Jack. "The Secularization of Equity: Ancient Religious Origins, Feudal Christian Influences, and Medieval Authoritarian Impacts on the Evolution of Legal Equitable Remedies." 26 Cap. U. L. Rev. 483 (1997).

Prestwich, J.O. Anglo-Norman Feudalism and the Problem of Continuity. Past and Present (1963).

Senn, Mark A. "English Life and Law in the Time of the Black Death," 38 Real Prop., Prob. and Trust J. 507 (Fall, 2003).

Silberbogen, Rebecca E. "Does the Dissolution of Covenant Marriages Mirror Common Law England's Subordination of Women?" 5 Wm. & Mary J. Women & L. 207 (Winter, 1998).

Stephenson, C. "Feudalism and its Antecedents in England." American Historical Review, xlviii (1943).

Thomas, David A. "Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History Part I: The Shared History," 34 Real Prop., Prob. and Trust J. 143 (Spring, 1999).

David A. Thomas, "Common Law Under the Early Normans," 1986 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 109 (Part III in the series Origins of the Common Law).

Thorne, S.E. "English Feudalism and Estates in Land." Cambridge L. J. 193-209 (1953).

Zaher, Claudia.. "When a Woman's Marital Status Determined Her Legal Status: A Research Guide on the Common Law Doctrine of Coverture," 94 Law Libr. J. 459 (Summer, 2002).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Supp. To CHAPTER 4 THE GROWTH OF THE ENGLISH COMMON LAW OF REAL PROPERTY

1-4 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Supp. to § 4.08

Supp. to § 4.08 Bibliography

[Go To Main]

Books

add

Bonfield, Lloyd (ed). Marriage, Property and Succession (1992) (see especially chapter by Lloyd Bonfield, "Property Settlements on Marriage in England from the Anglo-Saxons to the Mid-Eighteenth Century").

Cross, Lord, or Chelsea and G. J. Hands (eds.). The English Legal System (5th ed. 1971).

Griffin, Emma. Blood Sport: Hunting in Britain Since 1066 6 (2007).

Pocock, J. G. A. The Ancient Constitution and Feudal Law (rev. ed. 1987).

Thomas, Hugh M. The Norman Conquest: England After William the Conqueror (2008).

Articles

add:

Clark, Christine G. "Women's Rights in Early England," 1995 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 207.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions 5.syn

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 5.syn Synopsis to Chapter 5: ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

§ 5.01 Introduction.

§ 5.02 Summary of Early Developments in the Common Law of Property.

§ 5.02(a) Early Norman Influence on English Legal Developments.

§ 5.02(b) Introduction of Feudal Tenures.

§ 5.02(c) Incidents or Characteristics of Tenure.

§ 5.02(d) Duration of Tenures Under the System of Estates.

§ 5.02(d)(1) Duration Extended by Inheritability.

§ 5.02(d)(2) Tension Between Inheritability and Alienability.

§ 5.02(e) Types of Estates.

§ 5.02(f) Other Forms of Property Interests Within the System of Estates.

§ 5.02(g) Uses.

§ 5.03 The Impact of Changing Social Conditions on the Common Law of Property.

§ 5.03(a) The Rise and Decline of the Manorial System.

§ 5.03(a)(1) General Description of English Manors.

§ 5.03(a)(2) Origins of English Manors.

§ 5.03(a)(3) Decline of English Manors.

§ 5.03(b) Changes in the Law of Property Coincident with the Decline of the Manorial System.

§ 5.03(b)(1) Copyhold Tenure and Judicial Recognition of Villeins' Property Rights.

§ 5.03(b)(2) The Black Death and Emancipation of the Villeins.

§ 5.03(b)(3) The Consequences of Enclosures.

§ 5.04 Major Developments in English Property Law Before 1926.

§ 5.04(a) Abolition of Tenures.

§ 5.04(b) Leaseholds.

§ 5.04(c) Changes in Future Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(1) Reversions and Remainders.

§ 5.04(c)(1)(i) Reversions.

§ 5.04(c)(1)(ii) Remainders.

§ 5.04(c)(1)(iii) Contingent Remainders.

§ 5.04(c)(1)(iv) The Rule in Shelley's Case.

§ 5.04(c)(1)(v) The Doctrine of Worthier Title.

§ 5.04(c)(2) Reversionary Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(2)(i) Possibilities of Reverter.

§ 5.04(c)(2)(ii) Rights of Entry or Powers of Termination.

§ 5.04(c)(3) Executory Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(3)(i) Springing Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(3)(ii) Shifting Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(4) Fees Tail.

§ 5.04(d) Family Settlements or Succession.

§ 5.04(e) The Rule Against Perpetuities.

§ 5.04(f) Emergence of Trusts.

§ 5.04(g) Servitudes.

§ 5.04(g)(1) Relationship to Incorporeal Hereditaments.

§ 5.04(g)(2) Profits.

§ 5.04(g)(3) Easements.

§ 5.04(g)(4) Licenses.

§ 5.04(g)(5) Covenants.

§ 5.04(g)(5)(i) Real Covenants.

§ 5.04(g)(5)(ii) Equitable Servitudes.

§ 5.04(h) Mortgages.

§ 5.04(i) Statutory Reforms.

§ 5.05 Twentieth-Century Reforms in English Land Law.

§ 5.06 Bibliography.

Professor David A. Thomas
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 5.01

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 5.01 Introduction.

This chapter resumes the discussion of developments in English property law commenced in Chapter 4. In that chapter, those developments were described through the latter half of the 16th century, after the principal effects of the Statute of Uses (1536) had been made manifest. This chapter describes how, throughout the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, landowners, lawyers and legislators struggled with the task of fitting the feudal framework of property law to the many new features of the emerging modern English state. The adaptations were piecemeal and tended to obscure and only partially cover the archaic aspects of land law, rather than reform or remove them. By the time of the really meaningful statutory reforms in the 19th century, property law, like other aspects of English law, had become exceedingly and unnecessarily complex, trying to respond to new elements in English society while perpetuating traditional rules from the ancient and honored past. This chapter will conclude by relating how those 19th and 20th-century statutory reforms effectively transformed property law, eradicating most vestiges of medievalism and creating a modern and model regime of property law for the original common law state. n1

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. See generally David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History, Part I: The Shared History, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J 143 (1999) and David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments form a Shared History, Part II: How Anglo-American Land Law Diverged After American Colonization and Independence, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 295 (1999).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 5.02

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 5.02 Summary of Early Developments in the Common Law of Property.

Although the elements of property law in England after the Norman Conquest were generally Anglo-Saxon in substance, the extent to which those elements entered into the common law was almost entirely a result of Norman activity. The Normans are sometimes credited with introducing feudalism into England, yet feudal characteristics of property were present among the Anglo-Saxons, at least in incipient form. Likewise, the administration of law and custom regarding property was largely left to the local institutions of government, including the local courts.

§ 5.02(a) Early Norman Influence on English Legal Developments.

The Norman impact, by contrast, was imposed at the apex of the feudal structure. William the Conqueror assumed the position as the only allodial landowner in England, the only holder of land who did not hold of any superior lord, and simultaneously he was the ultimate lord of all other landholders in England. Although he carefully followed feudal strictures and observances, essential to his claim of royal legitimacy, during his lifetime he exercised the lord's power over the large majority of English land, often by declaring forfeiture of lands held by those Anglo-Saxon aristocrats who had unsuccessfully opposed him. n2 Near the end of his reign he reinforced his position at the peak of English feudalism by obtaining an oath of fealty from all landholders, whether or not they held directly of him.

The Norman monarchy early and directly asserted itself into local legal machinery through the office of the sheriff. The Anglo-Norman sheriff, more subordinate and responsive to the king than his Anglo-Saxon predecessor had been, acquired expanded judicial functions, both in bringing cases before royal courts and in sometimes even hearing and deciding cases.

In addition to influencing legal activity in the shires and villages through the sheriffs, the Norman monarchs also gradually developed legal functions for the royal court. Initially the royal court was simply a group of servants who occasionally performed ministerial functions of a judicial nature and sometimes witnessed royal writs. This group was augmented from time to time by the king's closest or most powerful tenants-in-chief, who would discuss important issues and, acting collectively, sometimes issue writs and judgments. At the three annual religious festivals all the principal tenants-in-chief came together in the royal council to hear important cases.

Also, at the Easter and Michaelmas gatherings, financial returns from local officers were audited by the king's chief justiciar, who also resolved disputes connected with those accounts. During the reign of William II (1087-1100) other justiciars were appointed to perform similar financial and judicial duties in the shires. These same local justiciars could also try cases in the shires between tenants-in-chief. A century after the conquest, during the reign of Henry II (1154-1189), local justiciars were replaced with itinerant or traveling justices sent out by the monarch. With their broad jurisdiction and sometimes explicit instructions, these justices enlarged the influence of the monarchy in legal matters, and at the same time brought more consistency to the rules of law being applied in various localities.

Complaints about lack of restraint in some traveling justices exercising their broad jurisdiction led to the appointment of five judges to sit as a permanent royal court. At first this royal court was expected to travel with the king, but by the time of Magna Carta in 1215 it was required to remain at Westminster, and was eventually known as the Court of Common Pleas. When some matters were considered too weighty for this court, they were referred to a group of counselors close to the king, which group became a separate court known as the Court of King's Bench. During the reign of Edward I (1239-1307), the Court of King's Bench officially separated from the king's council.

The centralizing of judicial power in the monarchy and the consequent reduction of particularized local legal customs to broader, more uniform principles were key factors in the formation of the common law.

From the beginning the Normans, through a decree from William the Conqueror, promised the English that they could "have and hold the law of King Edward in respect of their lands and all their possessions, with the addition of those decrees I have ordained for the welfare of the English people." n3 After a time of disorder following the Conqueror's death, Henry I again promised to restore to the people "the law of King Edward together with such emendations to it as my father made with the counsel of his barons." n4

But even this foundation of Anglo-Saxon law and William's persistence in his claim to be the legitimate successor of Edward, the last Anglo-Saxon king, could not mask the profound changes the Normans imposed on English landholding practices. Under Edward, no doubt much land, especially bookland, was held free of obligation to the monarch, subject only to the customary duties of military service, road building and fortress repair. At first William asserted ownership only over the lands of those Anglo-Saxons who had actively opposed him, but after suppressing a series of rebellions beginning in 1069, he took huge additional tracts of land and asserted ownership over all English land; eventually he replaced almost all of the principal English landholders with Norman barons owing fealty directly to the monarch.

§ 5.02(b) Introduction of Feudal Tenures.

Those who held land directly of the king almost always owed some sort of military service, so that the rights of landholding they enjoyed could be referred to as military tenure. The characteristics of military tenure endured in Anglo-Norman land law long after this type of military service ceased to serve the monarch's needs. Leading landholders parceled out their obligations of knight service to others through subinfeudation, and basic units of land parcels sufficient to support a mounted warrior were referred to as knight's fees. The resulting hierarchy of landowners, under military and other forms of tenure, placed all landholders other than the king either in the relation of tenant to a lord, or lord to a tenant, or most commonly in both relationships simultaneously, and often in multiple dual relationships. These tenurial relationships imposed on both parties several rights and duties called incidents, and these feudal incidents eventually became the rights and duties attached to the land itself. n5

As the land became the means of securing loyalty, protection and services between landholders, it also continued in its ancient role as the principal source of wealth. Land was the "glue" holding together family dynasties and political and social relationships, so landholding needed to be stabilized, assuring that feudal obligations would be met and that future generations of great families could continue their high status. However, as the main source of prosperity in an active economy, land also needed to be freely transferable if its full value were to be realized, even though such transferability could jeopardize feudal and family resources.

These conflicting impulses were the driving forces behind development of English land law in the Middle Ages. Feudal incidents institutionalized in the early law were constantly challenged by innovative conveyancing practices and new forms of landholding that threatened or even overtly evaded the most onerous feudal obligations. Many, if not most, of the feudal incidents represented sources of income and thus continued as part of the property law long after the society that spawned them had been succeeded by other relationships and values. Even after the most persistent feudal incidents were finally abolished by statute, many of their underlying philosophical values and presumptions carried on into elements of modern property law that remained essentially feudal in origin and purpose.

§ 5.02(c) Incidents or Characteristics of Tenure.

In military tenures, the most important feudal incidents may be summarized as follows:

Homage: A tenant under homage was bound to do nothing that would injure the lord or the land, and likewise the lord was so obligated toward the tenant.

Wardship: In a Norman change from Anglo-Saxon practice, the lord, and not the mother, took custody of a minor tenant's land (a lucrative privilege, in most cases) until the ward came of age. The change was prompted by feudal values: the lord was bound by homage to act fairly; the mother could presumably remarry and shift loyalty from the minor to the new husband.

Marriage: The lord had a right to grant or withhold approval for the remarriage of a widow or the marriage of a daughter. In practice, this approval was available for a price and also became a source of revenue.

Aids: A lord could require financial or other aid of a tenant on important or exigent occasions, typically to ransom the lord, to knight the lord's oldest son, or to celebrate the marriage of the lord's oldest daughter. The incident of aids invited abuse as a source of revenue.

Relief: The lord's permission for the heir of a deceased tenant to continue the tenancy was called relief, was obtained by payment, and was also an important source of revenue. When the amount of relief payments became fixed by custom, inheritability of the tenancy was effectively assured.

From this brief summary it can be seen that feudal incidents of military tenures were economically significant and would not be lightly surrendered by their claimants, even if their original purposes no longer pertained. Conversely, those upon whom the incidents were imposed became all the more eager to escape them when the incidents became mere money charges without contemporary purpose or function.

Other types of "free" tenures developed their own lists of incidents, frequently quite similar to the incidents of military tenure. These other tenures included the serjeanty tenures, usually involving a form of personal service to the royal court, tenure in burgage for some lands in the towns and boroughs, and tenure in free alms or frankalmoign, for some lands given to the church.

All lands not held under these tenures or military tenure were considered to be held in free socage tenure. Freed of the most burdensome incidents of military tenure, free socage tenure eventually became the great residual free tenancy and the tenancy of choice; usually the socage tenants were bound only to pay rent or perform labor services. If a substantial lord held in socage tenure, required labor services would be performed by the lord's own tenants on the land.

The large majority of the medieval English population consisted of "unfree" agricultural peasants, or villeins, who were more or less bound to their land and rendered agricultural labor services in return for their small landholdings. Their obligations were generally fixed by custom, but the precise work they would do from day to day remained uncertain, so these villein tenures were termed "unfree." n6 No strict correlation existed between unfree tenure and unfree social status. As marks of unfree status many villein tenants were required to pay the merchet, the lord's leave for various activities, and the tallage, a form of tax on persons, in amounts and on occasions as defined variously by local custom, but also many villeins were not under those obligations.

§ 5.02(d) Duration of Tenures Under the System of Estates.

§ 5.02(d)(1) Duration Extended by Inheritability.

These free and unfree tenures, with their respective incidents and privileges, could be held under various arrangements as to duration, known as estates. The development of various estates derived from emerging rules about whether any of the tenures could be freely inherited or alienated. Inheritability of certain tenures was established earliest, based on payment of a fixed sum relief to obtain the lord's permission for a deceased tenant's heir to continue in the tenancy. Once it was recognized for military tenures, inheritability spread to other tenures.

§ 5.02(d)(2) Tension Between Inheritability and Alienability.

Recognition of inheritability necessarily implied rights in the heirs of a landholder, and such rights posed some obstacle to the free alienability of land. While land was not frequently bought and sold during the early Middle Ages, gift transfers to the church were common and often raised questions about residual rights in the donor's heirs. Consequently, consents for such transfers would often be obtained from the donor's prospective heirs, before the gifts were made.

Eventually, the risks to fulfillment of feudal obligations posed by sharing of tenancies among multiple heirs were resolved by the spread of primogeniture, the rule that only the oldest son would inherit the patrimonial tenancy. This in turn obviated the need to obtain consents for inter vivos transfers from other prospective heirs. Eventually, it even became no longer necessary to obtain consent from the oldest son as prospective heir, and through inter vivos alienations any prospective heirs could be completely disinherited by the father.

Another common form of transfer was subinfeudation, by which holders of military tenures transferred portions of their holdings to others in return for commitments to fulfill some part of the transferor's original feudal obligations. Until subinfeudation was prohibited by the Statute Quia Emptores in 1290, it was widely practiced and probably required the lord's consent, readily obtainable upon payment of a customary sum of money.

In some instances, a tenant desired to leave the tenancy altogether, and so would seek the lord's permission to turn the tenancy over to a substitute. This transfer, too, could be achieved by obtaining the lord's permission upon payment of a sum of money. The same Statute Quia Emptores that in 1290 prohibited subinfeudation also gave to all landholders but tenants in chief the right to substitution of tenants without any payment of money to the lord.

One type of transfer that was very inimical to the feudal system was a grant in mortmain (signifying dead hand). These were transfers to the church or to other institutional or corporate donees whose members, because of their religious vows, were considered dead persons before the law and therefore incapable of fulfilling feudal obligations. Because such grants effectively nullified feudal obligations, some landholders would make grants in mortmain and then continue to occupy the land as tenants. So widespread was this abuse that it was specifically prohibited by the Magna Carta in 1215 and by the Statute of Mortmain in 1279. n7 Even then, a grant in mortmain could be made after obtaining a royal license, which often was readily granted upon payment of a sum of money.

§ 5.02(e) Types of Estates.

The property interest of an English landholder was thus partly defined by the type of tenancy under which the land was held, and the type of tenancy was characterized by whatever rights of inheritability and alienability were customary for that tenancy at any given time and place. The other major component of a landholder's property interest was the estate by which the tenancy was held. In its most simplistic form, the estate could be described as the duration of the tenancy. In time, the duration of the tenancy became the most important determinant of the various property rights associated with the tenancy; as the early distinctions between tenancies or tenures tended to meld and finally disappear, the estates became the chief distinguishing characteristics between different types of landholding.

The various types of estates that developed in medieval England may be summarized as follows:

Fee simple: The term "fee" signified an interest in land, and the term "simple" came to mean fully inheritable, that is, inheritable without restrictions, and therefore potentially endless in duration. A property interest granted to a person "and heirs" came to mean an inheritable estate and thus the estate of maximum duration. In addition to inheritability, after about 1200 the fee simple also came to be alienable without the consent of presumptive heirs; after the Statute Quia Emptores in 1290 it became alienable even without the consent of the lord. The fee simple estate has endured in the common law system of property rights, even though the various property rights to which it pertains have altered over time. As stated in an earlier chapter:

> The fee simple of the thirteenth century was unlike the modern fee simple, mostly because the medieval estate consisted only of a set of feudal dues and responsibilities (all related to and burdening the land, of course), whereas the modern fee is simply full ownership subject to a less onerous set of sovereign prerogatives. n8

Conditional fee and fee tail: Conditional fees were fee interests that were not necessarily fully inheritable. The most common conditions imposed upon these fee interests were that inheritability would arise only upon the birth of a live child, or that only direct descendants could inherit from the landholder, or that a conveyance would be irrevocable only upon the birth of an heir of the third generation after the original grantor. Such conditions were considered important for keeping landholdings in the family, but they were also obstacles to alienability. When customs and court decisions affirming alienability despite such conditions prevailed, the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus in 1285 decreed that fees limited to inheritability by the heirs of the grantee's body, the so-called fee tail, would remain conditional, with a reversion in the grantor, as long as the possibility existed that the line of natural descendants would expire. This meant that the present holder of such an interest could effectively convey only the present possessory interest, and that the interests of prospective heirs were protected from disinheritance by alienation of property. In a later century it became possible rather easily to convert the fee tail into a fee simple.

Life estate: The life estate was not inheritable, and was limited in duration to the life of a specified person; upon the expiration of that life, the possession of the land reverted or went over to the fee tenant. Life estates could either be created through conveyance or arise by operation of law, such as dower and curtesy interests. While a life tenant enjoyed broad rights of possession, a significant restriction was that the "inheritance" could not be damaged by depletion, destruction or change, according to the law of waste.

Term of years: While the fee estates and life estates were considered "free" or "freeholds" because of the judicial protections available to such estates, the term of years struggled for recognition. One who held land as a lessee for a specified period of time, a so-called term of years, was at first regarded as not even having an interest in the land; legal actions concerning the land were brought by or against the lessor, until in 1278 the Statute of Gloucester gave the lessee the right to intervene in such actions. n9 For one or more of several possible reasons, including the fact that tenancies for term were held by either free or unfree persons, the estate of term of years was deemed an "unfree" tenure and was given little legal protection until the trespass action became available about the middle of the 13th century.

§ 5.02(f) Other Forms of Property Interests Within the System of Estates.

Whenever land was held by any estate other than a fee simple, then some other person necessarily held the balance of the total property interest, usually either a reversion or a remainder. When more than one person held an estate concurrently, such a concurrent estate would be a joint tenancy, tenancy in common, tenancy in coparcenary or tenancy by the entirety. If a person intended to make only a provisional conveyance in order to provide security for a loan, then the lender would hold the land by gage or mortgage. Other creditor's estates or tenancies were created by the Statute of Merchants n10 and the Statute of Staples. n11

§ 5.02(g) Uses.

By the fourteenth century it had become common for a landholder to grant land to a grantee, to be held for the use of a third person. The third person was the intended beneficiary of the possessory rights in the land and was said to hold a "use," a term derived from the Latin "opus," signifying a benefit. The purpose of such an arrangement frequently was to avoid feudal incidents; n12 however, the beneficiary of the use, or "cestui que use," who enjoyed possession of the land without its attendant feudal obligations, also risked being victimized by an unfaithful grantee who might deal with the land adversely to the rights of the use. The common law courts, wedded to the technicalities of seisin, were sometimes unable to protect such a victim, so early in the 15th century the Court of Chancery began to intervene in cases accusing unfaithful grantees and, under equity rules, imposed fines and imprisonment for misconduct. Even with this assistance from equity, abuses of feudal obligations by grantors to use were still left unchecked. Several statutes attempted to declare the cestui que use as the legal owner of the land, and therefore obligated to render the feudal dues, but not until the Statute of Uses n13 became effective in 1536 was such a policy position instituted for all uses.

By declaring that any person who held a use would be deemed the holder of the legal title, the Statute of Uses peremptorily eliminated the worst problems associated with uses. However, in the years and decades after 1536, a series of other significant impacts flowed from the Statute of Uses, impacts which, when fully felt, permanently transformed the law of property. For instance:

(1) Several methods of conveyancing unique to uses became available for conveying legal title, including enfeoffment directly to the grantor and spouse, bargain and sale (which under the Statute of Enrolments was required to be in writing and to be enrolled in a public office), lease and release, and the covenant to stand seised used for effecting family settlements;

(2) new future interests were created when shifting and springing uses were "executed" or transformed into legal executory interests; and

(3) a use on a use was at first held unexecuted under the statute and void in equity, but after the abolition of tenures in 1660 it gained recognition in equity as a trust; even earlier, judges had held "active" uses exempt from execution under the Statute of Uses, and the equitable interests of such unexecuted uses emerged in the 18th century as the early forms of the modern trust. n14

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 2. By the time of the Domesday Survey in 1086 only two Anglo-Saxon lords of high rank were left in England.

(n2)Footnote 3. 'The Laws of William the Conqueror,' 2 English Historical Documents 399-400 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n3)Footnote 4. The 'Coronation Charter' of Henry I (5 August 1100), 2 English Historical Documents 400-02 (D. C. Douglas ed. 1953).

(n4)Footnote 5. See generally Paul Dalton, Conquest, Anarchy And Lordship: Yorkshire, 1066-1154 (1994); John Hudson, Land, Law And Lordship In Anglo-Norman England (1994).

(n5)Footnote 6. The relationship of unfree tenure to uncertainty of daily labor was explained by Pollock and

Maitland as follows:

> If the labour services are "uncertain," the tenure is unfree; and it is a test which condemns as unfree the great bulk of the tenures which obliged men to perform any considerable amount of agricultural labour for their lord, because, however minutely some particulars of those services may be defined, there is generally a spacious room left for the play of the lord's will. Thus the test roughly coincides with another:--labour service is not necessarily unfree, but a service which consists of much labour, of labour to be done all year round, is almost of necessity unfree; for almost of necessity the tenant will be bound to obey, within wide limits, whatever commands the lord or the lord's bailiff may give him.

1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 372 (2d ed. 1909).

(n6)Footnote 7. 7 Edw. 1 (1279).

(n7)Footnote 8. Ch. 4, at § 4.06(a), supra.

(n8)Footnote 9. 6 Edw., c. 11 (1278).

(n9)Footnote 10. 13 Edw. (1285).

(n10)Footnote 11. 27 Edw. 3, c. 9 (1353).

(n11)Footnote 12. The avoidance was achieved because the grantee who was technically bound to perform the feudal obligations did not have seisin or possession of the land and thus theoretically did not have the means to fulfill the obligations.

(n12)Footnote 13. 27 Hen. 8, c. 10 (1535).

(n13)Footnote 14. See David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History, Part I: The Shared History, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 143 (1999).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 5.03

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 5.03 The Impact of Changing Social Conditions on the Common Law of Property.

§ 5.03(a) The Rise and Decline of the Manorial System.

§ 5.03(a)(1) General Description of English Manors.

Pollock and Maitland ventured a very generalized description of medieval manors in England:

> Now speaking very generally we may say that a man who holds a manor has in the first place a house or homestead which is occupied by himself, his bailiffs or servants. Along with this he holds cultivable land, which is in the fullest sense (so far as feudal theory permits) his own; it is his demesne land. Then also, as part of the same complex of rights, he holds land which is holden of him by tenants, some of whom, it may be, are freeholders, holding in socage or by military service, while the remainder of them, usually the large majority of them, hold in villeinage, by a merely customary tenure. n15

The physical and legal organization of the manor was inextricably bound up with the economic and agricultural practices of the period, especially the common field system:

> We have usually therefore in the manor lands of three kinds, (1) the demesne strictly so called, (2) the land of the lord's freehold tenants, (3) the villenagium, the land holden of the lord by villein or customary tenure. Now in the common case all these lands are bound together into a single whole by two economic bonds. In the first place, the demesne lands are cultivated wholly or in part by the labour of the tenants of the other lands, labour which they are bound to supply by reason of their tenure. A little labour in the way of ploughing and reaping is got out of the freehold tenants; much labour of many various kinds is obtained from the tenants in villeinage, so much in many cases that the lord has but small, if any, need to hire labourers. Then in the second place, these various tenements lie intermingled; neither the lord's demesne nor the tenant's tenement can be surrounded by one ring-fence. The lord has his house and homestead; each tenant has his house with more or less curtilage surrounding it; but the arable portions of the demesne and of the various other tenements lie mixed up together in the great open fields. There will be two or three or perhaps more great fields, and each tenament will consist of a number of small strips, of an acre or half-acre apiece, dissipated about in each of these fields. These fields are subjected to > a common course of agriculture, a two-field system or a three-field system, so that a whole field will lie idle at one time, or be sown with winter seed or, as the case may be, with spring seed. After harvest and until the time for tilling comes, the lord and the tenants turn their beasts to graze over the whole field. n16

§ 5.03(a)(2) Origins of English Manors.

According to Vinogradoff, the manorial system in England originated in two developments that occurred during the period of Anglo-Saxon dominance. One was the practice of voluntary patronage or commendation by which a person would enter into a formal and subservient but protective relationship with a socially and materially superior person. Although the relationships were voluntary, they were stabilized and prolonged, if satisfactory, and eventually expanded into numerous additional material obligations, such as loans, gifts, endowments, rents, and tenancies. Some commendations became involuntary: "a householder commended to a great man had usually to stick to his patron, or to put it another way, patronage had a tendency to strike roots and to develop into a lasting lordship over free men and their land." n17

Concurrent with the highly individualized relationships that grew out of commendation were frequent grants of private judicial jurisdiction, defined by territorial boundaries, made by Anglo-Saxon monarchs to their important allies among the landholding aristocracy:

> Fines had to be imposed and levied, local means provided for the easy discharge of petty causes, and great men were considered the best local agents for enforcing obedience and taking up the settlement of local disputes. Small people were freed, on their side, from costly peregrinations and processes, while great people obtained new sources of income and influence. Many interests worked together in this way for the institution of aristocratic franchises on a territorial basis. n18

As the royal courts arose and defined their function, they determined that questions of villein tenure, as distinct from villein or unfree status, would be outside their powers and more appropriate for consideration by the manorial customary courts.

Jurisdictional subjection eventually led to economic subjection: the freeman who was required to appear and pay fines at a lord's court "came to be considered as a paying dependent, and indeed as a rent-paying tenant of the lord." n19 The powers over territorial districts granted with estates acted in concert with the powers over individual persons created by commendation, shifting society into a system of subjection to local lords that was the essence of manorial economy. The lords themselves grew out of an increasingly important military class which, while not formalized until the Norman period, was quite fully formed before the Conquest:

> [The thane's] estate was tending to become a unit of police and jurisdiction on the basis of governmental claims. In this way the political changes which followed the rise of the military class and the extension of commendation and franchise led in a considerable degree to the formation of a lordship as a superstructure of the township. n20

Even in areas where the lord had not reserved certain lands for personal use and cultivation, the ancient tradition of progressive travel by lord or monarch through tenants' lands, with pauses to receive in kind tribute and rents and therewith to be hosted and feasted, eventually led to domainal holdings, surrounded by dependent holdings. The rise of these holdings required "a number of officers, servants and labourers, who have to take care of the lord's interests, to perform the special work of the demesne, supervise the services and to exact the dues from the peasant population." n21

More widespread, however, was the rise of requirements for services to be rendered for the lord's domain by the peasant population. Initially, the specific nature and extent of the work were not prescribed with precision, but customs formed to fix these firmly in tradition.

As to factors fostering the Anglo-Saxon origins of the manorial system, Vinogradoff thus concludes:

> On the whole we are, perhaps, warranted to conclude, firstly, that the manorial system arises at the end of the Old English period mainly in consequence of the subjection of a labouring class, and, secondly, that the personal authority of the lord of the manor is gradually gaining the mastery over a rural economy of ancient and independent growth. n22

It seems clear enough that by the time of the Conquest, a large majority of the English population lived and worked under some sort of manorial arrangement, although the individual details varied enormously. After the Conquest the Normans "found little difficulty in expressing the situation in tenurial terms," so that in a short time "the humble peasant class of cultivators had been fitted neatly into the universal tenurial system." n23

The economic subservience of the manorial relationship was not always coincident with personal subservience. And even if a person were unfree in the relationship with the lord of the manner, such a person would still enjoy the rights of a free person with respect to the world outside the manor territory. One who was personally free could still hold the tenure characteristic of a person who was not free, the so-called villein tenure.

As has been pointed out earlier in this chapter, villein tenures were under obligations fixed by custom, but the precise work to be done from day to day remained uncertain until the call actually went out from the reeve or bailiff. n24 The duty to respond with personal service under such circumstances of uncertainty, subordinating even the need to pursue one's own crucial agricultural tasks of the moment, was what characterized a tenure as "unfree," and distinguished it from free tenures, for which often similar work was required, but whose type and extent were firmly fixed and limited by custom.

§ 5.03(a)(3) Decline of English Manors.

Villeinage as a matter of personal status steadily declined in England throughout the Middle Ages and had entirely disappeared by early in the 17th century. During the peasant revolt of 1381, one of whose underlying causes was the Black Death beginning in 1348-1349, many peasants sought out and destroyed manorial records in attempts to eliminate any evidence of servile status. As more and more villeins became personally free, they continued to hold their lands in unfree or villein tenure. This in turn prompted the common law courts finally to take cognizance of some cases dealing with the unfree tenures, but this did not occur until the end of the 15th century. Meanwhile, equity was available in many cases of villein tenures.

Beginning in the 14th century, an even more significant development was underway, the commuting of services in kind for money payments. With the money from such payments the lord of the manor would hire laborers, rather than rely on the work of the villein tenants. The process began with a succession of famines and then was dramatically accelerated after 1348-1349 by the Black Death and a series of subsequent plagues; so many villein tenants died that the survivors could rather easily hire out for wages driven up by manpower shortages, despite statutory attempts to thwart such competition. n25 A century later, most villein tenants were paying a fixed sum of money in place of their tenurial services, and the natural progress of inflation made such monetary obligations ever lighter.

The breakdown in villeinage occasioned by judicial recognition of villein property rights and by gradual but massive personal emancipation of serfs combined with a third factor to destroy the medieval manorial system; this was the series of great enclosure movements in the 16th through the 18th centuries. Enclosures were encouraged and carried out by landowners to reform the old strip-farming system and to enclose and allot portions of common land. By the time most of the enclosures were completed, the village community of the English Middle Ages, and the manorial system to which it was tied, had been completely transformed.

§ 5.03(b) Changes in the Law of Property Coincident with the Decline of the Manorial System.

§ 5.03(b)(1) Copyhold Tenure and Judicial Recognition of Villeins' Property Rights.

Although originally a strong correlation existed between villein status and villein, or unfree, tenure, the determination of what constituted villein tenure derived only from characteristics of the tenure itself, without regard to the personal status of one who held such tenure. While the work owed by one in villein tenure might be very similar to the work owed by a free tenant, if the timing or precise nature of the work was uncertain, left somewhat in the discretion of the lord of the manor, then the tenure would usually be considered unfree. The royal common law courts took the position that legal issues within such tenures should be left to the jurisdiction of the manorial lords whose interests such tenures most closely served. Even if a free person held land under unfree tenure, the common law courts considered their jurisdiction determined by the nature of the tenure rather than by the status of the person.

This dichotomy between personal status and tenure among villeins had two consequences for legal developments. One was that the natural tendency of villeins to seek and obtain free status carried on without the need to transform the property interests they already held. This must have left the emancipation processes less restrained than they might otherwise have been, and the same royal courts that declined jurisdiction of villein tenures adopted legal rules that encouraged villein emancipation.

The other consequence of royal court rejection of jurisdiction over villein tenures was the way in which such tenures did finally achieve recognition in the law. The villein tenures did indeed have a certain characteristic of uncertainty about them, but their aspects that could be specified came to be firmly defined by local custom, considered to be binding on both lord and laborer. The manorial court, in its role as a court of custom, took cognizance of such local customs to confer a measure of protection on villeins who had no status in the royal courts.

The customs in some manors were reduced to writing, both because court rolls were kept for some manorial courts and because some manors were systematically surveyed as to tenurial obligations and the survey results were recorded:

> In practice the villein tenant could be as well off as the tenant who held by free tenure. His services were fixed and recorded, and so were the various incidents of his tenure. Furthermore, manorial courts often modelled their procedure upon that of the royal courts, so that actions imitating novel disseisin and the other real actions were allowed in them. Some manors even went so far as to copy statutory law, the most notable instance of this being the recognition of a custom allowing entails in some manors, in imitation of the Statute De Donis. n26

Perhaps the most common reason for making a written record of villeinage rights and obligations was to facilitate transfers of those tenures. Because the lord of the manor was theoretically all-powerful with respect to villein tenures, any transfer from one villein to another first required a grant or surrender of the tenure from the transferor villein to the lord (upon payment of the customary fee or fine, of course); then the lord re-granted the tenure to the transferee villein and admitted the transferee to the land. A written record of the transaction would be entered in the manorial court rolls. Thus the court roll eventually became a record of villein "title," and a copy of the court roll was prepared to help resolve disputes over villein tenures without having to look up the information in the court rolls. The copy itself became authoritative evidence of title, so that it could be said a villein held "by copy of the court roll." Not all villein tenants were copyholders, but enough of them were that there developed an assumption that one who held by copy held in unfree tenure.

Late in the 15th century the common law courts began to extend some legal protection to copyholders. Up to this time, the common law courts only recognized the lords' rights in villein tenures, and the lord was considered as holding the freehold and seisin in those tenures. A villein tenant wishing to resolve some question over the tenancy that did not involve the lord could request that the lord pursue an action in one of the royal common law courts. An action between the tenant and the lord was relegated to the manorial court, which was obviously subject to some influence by the manorial lord. For at least those villeins who were copyholders, however, common law protection in disputes against the lords began to emerge. In one 1467 case a judge stated that a lord had no right to eject a copyholder who had defaulted in his services (even though the lord had a common law right to eject a tenant at will). n27 In another case from 1481 a judge declared that a lord who breached the manorial custom by ejecting a copyhold tenant could be sued in trespass and subjected to a judgment for damages. n28 These views were included in a 1530 edition of Littleton's famous work on tenures.

If the copyholder were ejected by a third person, however, the common law courts still afforded no relief. The copyholder could either pursue the matter in the manorial court or ask the lord to take up the action in a law court. Late in the 16th century, first the Court of King's Bench n29 and then the Court of Common Pleas n30 permitted a copyholder to sue in ejectment for recovery of lands.

Equity protection for copyholders was slowly developing during this same period, and the steady stream of petitions to the Chancellor during the 15th century n31 may eventually have influenced the law courts to recognize some copyholder rights. By the first half of the 16th century it was established that the copyholder could have the Chancellor's assistance against various forms of misconduct by the lord of the manor:

> ... and therefore if the lord will put out his copyholder that payeth his customs and services, or will not admit him to whose use a surrender is made, or will not hold his court for the benefit of his copyholder, or will exact fines arbitrary when they be customary and certain, the copyholder shall have a subpoena to restrain or compel him as the case shall require. n32

The action in ejectment to recover land was permitted in the Exchequer court in 1596. n33

When the common law courts did extend jurisdiction to copyholders, it was under the theory that they were simply enforcing the custom of the manor, which, of course, varied widely from place to place and was not part of the common law. Copyholders, therefore, came into court with interests defined by local manorial custom rather than a set of standard legal rules. Thus a common law of copyholds never did develop; however, because copyholders' entry into common law courts was by means of an action in ejectment, copyholds obtained protection similar to that afforded freeholds and leaseholds, so some common rules did emerge. Also, courts tended to form uniform procedures for determining and applying the varied manorial customs:

> Thus the main principles of the modern law as to copyholds were constructed by the judges out of manorial customs which they censored, interpreted, and, when necessary, supplemented, by the doctrines of the common law ... [T]hey harmonized the rules of manorial custom and the principles of the common law, so in the construction of that part of the law which regulated the relations of lord and tenant, they aimed at harmonizing and giving due recognition both to the custom of the manor and to the will of the lord. n34

The old theoretical notion that copyholders had no estate but were merely tenants at will was, as a practical matter, readily refuted by establishing the custom of the manor. However, the concept of tenancy at will was not completely surrendered, and the lord and copyholder were recognized as having concurrent rights in the property. The lord's rights in copyhold tenures included a limited right to exploit mines, minerals, and timber, the right to prohibit the tenant's waste, the right to prohibit leases longer than one year, and the right to collect old feudal exactions, such as heriot, rents and fines. n35

Copyholders could hold essentially the same estates and interests as could freeholders, including entailed estates. Common recoveries to bar entails were also used with copyholds until 1833, when the Fines and Recoveries Act n36 went into effect.

Despite the facts that copyholds remained mostly outside the common law, and that copyholders were drawn from the humblest class of the English landholding population, Sir Edward Coke declared as early as 1584 that the "great part of the land within the realm is in grant by copy." n37 Copyhold tenure was born and nurtured within the manorial system and proved flexible in adapting to new circumstances when that system became obsolete. It was a tenure that was held by large numbers of English landowners until formally abolished and converted into free and common socage on January 1, 1926, by the 1922 Law of Property Act. n38

§ 5.03(b)(2) The Black Death and Emancipation of the Villeins.

The impact of the Black Death on the manorial system and unfree tenures has been succinctly summarized by Plucknett:

> The nation was already weakened by a series of famines when the arrival of the Black Death (1348-1349) from the East wrought a revolution in social and economic conditions. The terrible mortality from this plague completely disorganized the manorial system, which had hitherto depended upon a plentiful supply of labour born and bred within the manor. The plague accelerated and intensified forces which were already at work, and the result was a very serious depletion of the labour supply. Consequently lords began to compete among themselves for such free labour as was available. This tempted servile inhabitants of manors to leave their holdings and become hired labourers. n39

It would be easy to overestimate the effect of the Black Death on villeins' status, because that effect was so dramatic. Less conspicuous but equally effective were the general economic conditions that impelled manorial lords to commute their villeins' service dues into monetary obligations. n40

Perhaps more revealing than the generalizations for the English nation as a whole are the anecdotal and local studies of conditions at these times. The tiny village of Landbeach, north of Cambridge, is likely typical of thousands of English villages in its experience, but is more fortunate in the richness of documentation available to modern researchers. In the following lengthy excerpt from The Domesday Inheritance, a history of Landbeach, it is possible to grasp the profound stresses of the 14th century, with famines, floods and pestilence, the looting and lawlessness that followed, and the new opportunities for personal and economic freedom:

> The great flooding and disease of the farm animals were followed by what was probably the worst natural catastrophe to strike these islands in recorded history, the Pestilence as all the contemporary documents called it ... In 1349 it swept through Landbeach and adjoining villages ...
>
> After the shock of the pestilence, we can glimpse a little of the aftermath. In 1350 an investigation was ordered to list the names of all those who had appropriated and carried away window shutters, doors and other timber from divers houses currently in the lord's hand. For a moment there is a glimpse of a half-ghost village, with looting where the plague had passed on. The court rolls tell more. Walls and fences had become ruinous from failure to make essential repairs. Animals were straying in the hay and growing corn. Bands of villeins failed to turn up for their harvest works. The lord did not find it possible to replace all his dead villein landholders with men prepared to accept the old conditions. Five tenements were let for life at a small cash rent with an obligation to provide one man for one day in hay harvest for lifting the crop. This was practically giving the land for nothing compared with the heavy labour services under the pre-plague terms. Too much had been lost through failure to cope with getting the harvest home to miss even one man's work for a single day. In any case, he was taking land that no one seemed to want.
>
> Of nine cattle caught wandering and impounded as strays, not one was claimed.
>
> Leases changed, and the main clauses of many were the obligation to inhabit and maintain the > tenement. Desperate times called for desperate remedies. Peasants helped themselves to the lord's corn and turf for sale. At one court in 1356, nine peasants were presented for stealing the lord's corn and a further 32 for trespass in the lord's crops. By 1357 things were getting even more out of hand. John Emme went out into the fen by night, stealing the turves of several of his neighbours to sell in Cambridge. A woman and her daughter raided a villein's house for timber. Stealing from the lord had been one thing, although before the Pestilence it was not frequent, and stealing from fellow villagers very rare. Now the villeins seem to have learnt the habit of looting, and are prepared to steal from their fellows quite flagrantly ...

>
> In 1365 the most dramatic change in the manor of Chamberlains [the most prominent landholding in Landbeach] began. The demesne arable, all two hundred and six acres of it, was let to sixteen villeins in varying amounts for thirteen years at 18d. an acre ...
>
> Some of the old disabilities of villeinage were beginning to soften. In practice it was becoming harder to prevent a villein from leaving the manor. After the Second Pestilence flight becomes more frequent as the chances of escape seem to improve. In the old days, the need of a licence from the lord to marry a daughter had enabled the lord to charge what the traffic would bear; in the last quarter of the fourteenth century it would no longer bear very much. n41

One can surmise that villein emancipation and the breakdown of manorial tenures would have eventually occurred even without the devastation of the Black Death. But there must be little doubt that the massive mortality among the land's laborers hastened and made irreversible the movement to modern conditions. In terms of property law, the decline of villein tenures infused with new importance the free tenures and leaseholds and contributed to the eventual demise and abolition of tenures altogether. n42

§ 5.03(b)(3) The Consequences of Enclosures.

As has been previously described, the common field or open field strip system characterized English agriculture from Anglo-Saxon times almost to the modern era. It was the system of agricultural organization out of which the common law of property and the manorial system arose. Despite the persistence of this system, discontent with it was of long standing:

> This system of agriculture came to appear more and more anomalous with the lapse of time. It was impossible to do anything without the consent of a large number of persons who were not likely to agree; and any attempts to carry through improvements were met by the decided opposition of what was in those days the most ignorant and conservative class in the community. We are not surprised, therefore, to hear that it was denounced by all writers on agriculture from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century. n43

The obvious but profoundly difficult solution was to implement what was referred to as the process of enclosure. Enclosure, or inclosure, actually consisted of two quite distinct activities, even the most benign of which could mean a traumatic adjustment for the inhabitants of a village or manor. This least offensive aspect of enclosure consisted simply of combining the individual field strips into contiguous plots of land which were then reassigned to individual ownership:

> Enclosure was the replacement of two or three large open fields round a village, whose strips were owned individually but whose crops and stock were controlled by the community of owners, according to ancient rights and practices, by smaller, individually owned fields whose cropping and stocking could be controlled by the owner. Such a change affected the whole structure of rural society. n44

The other type of enclosure was far more odious, disruptive and unfair to the small farmer. These enclosures took over the areas of commons or waste, extinguishing the ancient and essential peasant rights in such lands and their resources; they also converted lands long used for tillage into huge pasture areas, evicting the farmers and razing or forcing abandonment of their farmhouses and buildings. Even though enclosures generally meant important improvements in agricultural techniques and yields, much of this enclosure activity was illegal and utterly devastating to smaller landholders. n45

Some enclosures took place in the 16th and 17th centuries, but most of the land remained unenclosed during that period; open field agriculture was still common enough then that it was transplanted to British colonies in New England. n46

Beginning early in the Tudor period, enclosures become the subject of frequent Parliamentary enactment, with varying motives. One motive was to legitimize some enclosures in the face of unrest and disruption among the villein class. Another motive was to afford some protection to such small landholders against overly rapacious lords. Yet another was to give expression to official preferences for particular types of land use after enclosure became an accomplished fact. For instance, apparently the Tudor governments believed that enclosures to enhance productivity of tilled land was commendable: labor demand was not diminished and land yields increased. Enclosures in order to turn tilled land into pastures were condemned: families were evicted, buildings fell into ruin, and large tracts of land were left without any persons to provide a modicum of defense and security.

The first general act resulting from enclosures in 1489 operated to penalize large aggregations of pasture land; lessees with farms of twenty acres or more were required to maintain buildings serving tillage activities on that land or else pay half their profits to the Crown until the buildings were repaired. n47 A similar act was passed a quarter-century later. n48 Two decades later an act prohibited and penalized keeping more than 2,000 sheep; n49 and still later a requirement issued that as much land should remain in tillage as was tilled at the beginning of Henry VIII's reign. n50

The litany of complaints against these early enclosures was aptly expressed in the preamble to the act of 1533-1534:

> Forasmuch as divers and sundry persons of the King's subjects of this realm, to whom God of his goodness hath disposed great plenty and abundance of moveable substance, now of late within few years have daily studied, practised, and invented ways and means how they might accumulate and gather together into few hands, as well great multitude of farms as great plenty of cattle, and in especial sheep, putting such lands as they can get to pasture, and not to tillage, (2) whereby they have not only pulled down churches and towns, and inhanced the old rates of the rents of the possessions of this realm, or else brought it to such excessive fines that no poor man is able to meddle with it, but also have raised and enhanced the prices of all manner of corn, cattle, wool, pigs, geese, hens, chickens, eggs, and such other, almost double above the prices which have been accustomed; (3) by reason whereof a marvellous multitude and number of the people of this realm be not able to provide meat, drink and clothes necessary for themselves, their wives and children, but be so discouraged with misery and poverty, they fall daily to theft, robbery and other inconveniences, or pitifully die for hunger and cold; (4) and as it is thought by the King's most humble and loving subjects, that one of the greatest occasions that moveth and provoketh those greedy and covetous people so to accumulate and keep in their hands such great portions and parts of the grounds and lands of this realm from the occupying of the poor husbandmen, and so to use in pasture, and not in tillage, is only the great profit that cometh of sheep; ... (7) which things, thus used, be principally to the high displeasure of Almighty God, to the decay of the hospitality of this realm, to the diminishing of the King's people, and to the let of the cloth-making, whereby many poor people have been accustomed to be set on work; and in conclusion, if remedy be not found, it may turn to the utter destruction and desolation of this realm, which God defend... n51

The complexity of these acts, with their various exceptions and difficulties of enforcement, led in 1624 to the repeal of all of them, except the 1533-1534 act quoted above. None of this early Tudor legislation, however, directly prohibited enclosures generally, but was intended mostly to prevent an imbalance from developing between land in tillage and land in pasturage. By the time enclosure acts were formally repealed in 1624, much enclosure had occurred, especially for tillage. Not only did enclosures other than for pasturage proceed essentially unhindered, n52 but even some statutory assistance was given. n53

On the one hand, during the 16th and 17th centuries, many defenseless folk were dispossessed and enclosure riots did occur. Some lords applied improper pressure on their tenants and without compassion exercised rights to evict or to not renew leaseholds. On the other hand, many enclosures were consensually and equitably carried out. The Council and the Star Chamber gave special attention to redressing complaints from the dispossessed. But the government and the more ambitious, enterprising farmers could hardly ignore the economic reality that enclosures were immensely beneficial. With new wealth from commercial enterprises, and new land entering the market from forfeiture of church holdings, it was only natural that individual, self-contained farms let to individual, enterprising yeoman farmers would be by far the most sensible method of landholding and conducting agriculture.

By the end of the 17th century, the outcry against enclosures had somewhat diminished and no comprehensive legislation was attempted for a century thereafter. Some acts tried to make consensual enclosures easier to achieve, n54 while others attempted to improve administration of the remaining open field operations. The failure of the act attempting to improve administration of open field farms probably led to the popularity of private legislation as the primary method of advancing enclosures during the 18th century.

The private acts were the source of much mischief in the progress of enclosures:

> No doubt these Acts did make for the greater efficiency of all branches of the agricultural industry. But there is also no doubt that they were passed with too little regard for the rights of small owners and commoners; and that the elimination of their rights had grave social and economic effects, which ... "left behind it a permanent legacy of bitterness." n55

The problem was not so much that the poor were directly dispossessed; usually the private legislation provided for division of the enclosed areas but also that each landholder bear a proportionate part of the heavy expenses incurred in obtaining the legislation and fencing the land. Such burdens were impossible for numerous small landholders and left them indebted and landless. Parliament remained unaware of and insensitive to these injustices, and was in any event favorably disposed toward the larger landholders who made up a large share of its membership, and so failed to cure these defects with comprehensive legislation.

The heavy dominance of private enclosure acts at the end of this era may be seen in the numbers of private enclosure acts passed during successive monarchies of the 17th and 18th centuries:

Reign	Number of private enclosure acts
James I	1 n56
William and Mar	1 n57

y
Ann e	2
Geor ge I	16
Geor ge II	276
Geor ge III	336 0 n58

Statistics, of course, tell nothing of the individual lives disrupted or enriched by enclosures and their consequences. Turning again to the village of Landbeach, near Cambridge, as described with its rich historical documentation in The Domesday Inheritance, n59 readers in modern times are able to glimpse a moment or two of the medieval milieu in which enclosures operated. First, before enclosure became an issue, villein tenures slowly turned into copyhold:

> Gradually the customary tenements or bondage holdings of the villeins turned into copyhold, customary tenure proved by copy of the court roll, with labour services replaced by cash rents, usually fixed by custom, and all taint of personal unfreedom gone. Where custom fixed the cash rent the inflations of the sixteenth century would reduce its value until it remained a mere nuisance and the peasants felt themselves full owners. Heriot [a requirement that upon the tenant's death the decedent's best beast or some equivalent thing be given over to the lord] often remained, but as a slighter nuisance. n60

Already the lord of the principal manor in Landbeach had turned the entire manor into a cash enterprise. As early as 1352, just three years after the first attack of the Pestilence, no demesne was retained by this manor, but all such land had been rented to others for cash rents. All labor services had been converted or commuted to cash:

> It followed hard on the heels of the great Pestilence, a very early example of a lord responding to that disaster by giving up cultivation, with all the problems of a desperate labour shortage, and attempting to live from rents. n61

The manor then came into the ownership of Corpus Christi College in Cambridge, whose records for 1467-68 show that rent-paying peasants could take odd jobs with the lord in Cambridge and thus earn cash with which to pay their rents.

A century later, during the reign of Elizabeth I, the tenants of this manor had to unite in resisting the aggressions of Richard Kirby, lord of another manor in Landbeach, who seemed consumed by insatiable greed, and who found enclosures and associated legal procedures as convenient means to serve his covetousness. When Kirby came into his lordship in 1521, rapid inflation was occurring in the English economy, and much blame for this was laid on enclosures that were converting tilled land into pasture land, especially for sheep. The Corpus Christi manor already had ample grasslands available and remained quite stable with respect to enclosures. But Kirby exemplified almost every abuse criticized in the anti-enclosure legislation of Henry VIII's reign, including having let his copyholder's houses fall into ruin, so that almost none were left. With empty houses and untilled arable lands, Kirby designed to turn those lands into pasture, especially suitable for lambing and winter care, because they were near the manor, rather than some distance out in the fens. He eventually enclosed 22 acres of arable land.

Once this conversion was accomplished, he encroached on and took over some of the field ways n62 and sought to further consolidate some contiguous holdings by exchanging some tenements with another owner. He then sought to take over the commons, but not by direct enclosure. Instead:

> He tried to use his power as lord to impound strays, in a move to drive the peasants from the commons. For such animals as were straying on land belonging to his manor, and lawfully impounded, could be regained by their owners only on payment of a sum, called a 'replevin', which the lord could fix, although it was supposed to be at a reasonable amount... He needled the peasants by impounding their oxen straight from the ploughing when they were manifestly not straying, and so held up urgent work. n63

He brought vexatious but groundless lawsuits, used and wore out animals falsely impounded, and hired thugs to physically ambush and attack men and women on their way to the commons with their cattle. One peasant was wounded with a sword while Kirby's men were illegally enclosing a part of the commons. When the peasants finally collectively resisted, Kirby brought a petition in the Star Chamber, whose decision is not known, but after which the conflicts and violence in Landbeach apparently ceased.

Contemporaries of Kirby were also actively acquiring grazing lands in the nearby village of Cottenham. A man who eventually became the sheriff of Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire had, in 1488, let a house in Cottenham fall into ruin in order to claim the commons rights pertaining to the house. In the same area, another prominent person in 1560 claimed as his own 5,000 acres of fenland, including two large enclosures, but two men had broken into the enclosures and destroyed the fences. This enclosure activity was governed somewhat by private agreement:

> There had been agreements in the 1560s and 1580s giving the lord some right to enclose, but the final agreement came in 1596. This described in detail the enclosures in Longhill, Marehill and Tilling which the lord could keep for himself, yielding up in turn all his common rights. It listed all the tenants with common rights, detailing these. Most important of all in the long run, it was agreed that no more regulations of the fields should be made by the manor court. The commoners' meetings, with their ordermakers, fen reeves and other officers, took over power. Two of the orderbooks survive, recording variations made from time to time on the Articles, the statutes of a village parliament, one might say. On occasions even the voting for and against any change is recorded.
>
> Some of the lists of ordermakers suggest that the ordermakers were chosen as freeholders and copyholders, manor by manor
>
> The Articles of Agreement of 1596 were of the greatest practical value to the peasants and farmers of Cottenham right up to enclosure in 1846, and many copies survive, both printed and in manuscript. n64

In Landbeach itself, the commoners did not begin to act in concert until much later, when in 1735 they reached an agreement on control of the open field agriculture and management of the fens. Later in that century a concerted propaganda effort by the national Board of Agriculture tried to promote enclosure and discourage continuation of open fields, in order to improve agricultural productivity. Reports on the status of agriculture and productivity were provided to the Board on a county-by-county basis. In 1794 the report on Landbeach proclaimed:

> The enclosures in severalty contain about 150 acre and are rented at twenty shillings per acre. The commons contain about one thousand acres, all of which, except about sixty acres, are high and dry... The common husbandry of two crops and a fallow is here the usual practice. An enclosure is greatly desired, under the encouragement of which very considerable improvements in the stock and husbandry of the parish would immediately take place... n65

A contemporaneous description by one Robert Masters, an enclosure enthusiast and the author of a description of the nearby village of Waterbeach, adopts a similar tone and was also given to one of the Board Commissioners:

> Landbeach is of a good natural soil: yet although cultivated by judicious farmers, its produce is unequal to that of some neighbouring parishes. The quantity of arable land is less than 1,000 acres, whilst that of the enclosed pastures does not greatly exceed 100. There is a fine common nearly equal in quantity to the arable fields, which enclosed and well cultivated would be superior to them in quality, and not less profitable than in its present state... An enclosure of a very considerable part at the least of these commons would be highly beneficial, and will, I should hope, be soon adopted by those who are wise enough to discover their own true interest therein. n66

Because the expense of buying out commons rights was prohibitive, the private enclosure act covering Landbeach was not enacted until 1807, and the Award was not signed until 1813. In time the allocations were made, the old common was taken from the villagers, n67 the old boundaries obliterated, and the new borders established:

> Slowly, especially by steam ploughing between the two World Wars, the patched corduroy pattern of ridge and furrow in the furlongs was smoothed out. Straight fences, ditches, paths and roads replaced the organic pattern of the old field ways: access to the countryside began to be lost to all but the farmers...
>
> The complicated pattern of the ploughman's ridge and furrow began to disappear in time: the lawyers' tangle of strips in divers hands was disentangled. n68

The mass of private enclosure acts waned in the 19th century; at the same time a series of public acts n69 promoted enclosures until 1876:

> In 1835 an Act was passed to facilitate the exchange of lands in the common fields; and in 1836 it was provided that such lands should be enclosed if two-thirds in the number and value of the persons having an interest in these lands consented ... in 1845 an elaborate Act was passed under which, and its amending Acts, most of the remaining common fields were enclosed, and rights of common which prevented the profitable use of the land were got rid of.
>
> These Inclosure Acts did not eliminate the small holders, but they did materially diminish their number. n70

In 1876 a concern over diminishing open spaces prompted passage of the Commons Act of 1876, n71 which imposed the present strict limits on enclosure. By the time the progress of enclosure was thus halted, the manorial structure of the villages had been almost completely altered. Today common rights remain significant only in those mountainous areas of the country used for grazing flocks of sheep. n72 n73

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 15. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 363 (2d ed. 1909).

(n2)Footnote 16. Id. at 364. The authors cite one illustrative instance in which a holding of only five acres was scattered about in fourteen noncontiguous strips. See generally Henry Stanley Bennett, Life on The English Manor (1974).

(n3)Footnote 17. Paul Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor 213 (3d. ed. 1920).

(n4)Footnote 18. Id. at 214. See John S. Beckerman, Procedural Innovation and Institutional Change in Medieval English Manorial Courts, 10 L. & Hist. Rev. 197 (1992); L. Bonfield and L. R. Poos, The Development of the Deathbed Transfer in Medieval English Manor Courts, 47 Cambridge L.J. 403 (1988).

(n5)Footnote 19. Paul Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor 215 (3d. ed. 1920).

(n6)Footnote 20. Id. at 221. See John S. Beckerman, Procedural Innovation and Institutional Change in Medieval English Manorial Courts, 10 L. & Hist. Rev. 197 (1992).

(n7)Footnote 21. Paul Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor 227 (3d. ed. 1920).

(n8)Footnote 22. Paul Vinogradoff, The Growth of the Manor 235 (3d. ed. 1920).

(n9)Footnote 23. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 156-57 (2d ed. 1986).

(n10)Footnote 24. See § 5.02(c), supra.

(n11)Footnote 25. This process is more fully described in the following section, § 5.03(b).

(n12)Footnote 26. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 159-60 (2d ed. 1986).

(n13)Footnote 27. Y.B. 7 Edw. 4, Michaelmas Term, f. 19, pl. 16 (1467).

(n14)Footnote 28. Y.B. 21 Edw. 4, Michaelmas Term, f. 80, pl. 27 (1481).

(n15)Footnote 29. See, e.g., Melwich v. Luter, 4 Co. Rep. 26a, 76 Eng. Rep. 935 (1588); Rumney v. Eves, 1 Leon. 100, 74 Eng. Rep. 93 (1588).

(n16)Footnote 30. See, e.g., Petty v. Evans, 2 Brownl. 40, 123 Eng. Rep. 652 (1610); Ever v. Aston, Moo. K. B. 271, 72 Eng. Rep. 575 (1599); Stephens v. Eliot, Cro. Eliz. 484, 78 Eng. Rep. 735 (1596).

(n17)Footnote 31. 2 The Reports of Sir John Spelman 187-192 (J. H. Baker ed., Selden Society, vol. 94, 1977); Select Cases in Chancery xxxix (William Paley Baildon ed., Selden Society, vol. 10, 1896) ("1465-1467; case 146. The plaintiff, a villein, had agreed with his lord, the defendant, for manumission, the deed of which was to be kept by A until the money was paid. This having been done, A has of malice given the deed back to the defendant, who refuses to deliver it to the plaintiff.").

(n18)Footnote 32. Cary 3 (1557).

(n19)Footnote 33. Goodwin v. Longhurst, Cro. Eliz. 535, 78 Eng. Rep. 782 (1596).

(n20)Footnote 34. 7 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 304 (2d ed. 1937).

(n21)Footnote 35. A.W.B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 168-69 (2d ed. 1986).

(n22)Footnote 36. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74 (1833).

(n23)Footnote 37. Heydon's Case, 3 Co. Rep. 8b, 76 Eng. Rep. 640 (1584).

(n24)Footnote 38. Certain incidents of copyhold tenure were expressly preserved, unless the parties agreed to their abolition:

(a) Any commonable rights to which the tenant is entitled.
(b) Any right of the lord or the tenant to mines, minerals, gravel, pits or quarries, whether in or under the land.

(c) Any rights of the lord in respect of fairs, markets or sporting.
(d) Any liability for the construction, maintenance, cleansing or repair of any dykes, ditches, canals, sea or river walls, bridges, levels, ways, etc.

E. H. Burn, Cheshire and Burn's Modern Law of Real Property 84-85 (13 ed. 1982).

(n25)Footnote 39. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 32 (5th ed. 1956).

(n26)Footnote 40. See H. S. Bennett, Life on the English Manor 280 (1937) (see especially the sources cited in n.1).

(n27)Footnote 41. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 56-60 (1986).

(n28)Footnote 42. See L. Bonfield & L. R. Poos, The Development of the Deathbed Transfer in Medieval English Manor Courts, 47 Cambridge L.J. 403 (1988). See also Lewis C. Vollmar, Jr., M.D., The Effects of Epidemics on the Development of English Law from the Black Death through the Industrial Revolution, 15 J. Legal Med. 385 (1994); Michael Bennett, The Impact of the Black Death on English Legal History, 11 Austl. J. L. & Soc'y 191 (1995); David J. Seipp, The Concept of Property in the Early Common Law, 12 L. & Hist. Rev. 29 (1994). See also Phillip R. Schofield, Tenurial Developments and the Availability of Customary Land in a Later Medieval Community, 49 Econ. Hist. Rev. 250267 (May 1996). See Senn, M.A, English life and law in the time of the Black Death, 38 Real Property, Probate and Trust Journal 3, 507-88 (Fall 2003).

(n29)Footnote 43. 2 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 60 (4th ed. 1936).

(n30)Footnote 44. J. H. Plumb, England in the Eighteenth Century 18 (1963).

(n31)Footnote 45. 4 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 364 (3d ed. 1945).

> Consequently the old cultivating community was broken up, many of the smaller owners were evicted from the land, and rights of common either in the open fields or in the waste disappeared ... if by agreement, purchase, or eviction a whole manor was enclosed, existing rights of common disappeared with disappearance of those entitled to exercise them. That these enclosures raised the value of the property is clear. Id.

(n32)Footnote 46. 2 W. Cunningham, The Growth of English Industry and Commerce 548 (4th ed. 1907) (see especially n.1, p. 548, noting examples of New England open field survivals described in 1 William B. Weeden, Economic and Social History of New England, 1620-1789 58-62 (1890)).

(n33)Footnote 47. 4 Hen. 8, c. 19 (1489).

(n34)Footnote 48. 6 Hen. 8, c. 5 (1514-1515).

(n35)Footnote 49. 25 Hen. 8., c. 13 (1533-1534).

(n36)Footnote 50. 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 5 (1551-1552).

(n37)Footnote 51. 25 Hen. 8, c. 13 (preamble) (1533-1534).

(n38)Footnote 52. "No statute made it unlawful for a man to buy out his neighbours, or for all the inhabitants to agree to inclose their common fields." 4 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 369 (3d ed. 1945).

(n39)Footnote 53. In 35 Hen. 8, c. 17, § 6 (1543), was enacted a procedure by which justices of the peace could assist in enclosing and dividing wooded land, in which several persons had rights, when those persons could not reach agreement privately.

(n40)Footnote 54. For example, in 29 Geo. 2 , c. 36 (1754), lords and tenants of common land were given a consensual procedure to enable them to plant timber on the land; in 13 Geo. 3 , c. 81 (1773), three-fourths of the occupants of a common field system were empowered to make rules for the entire holding (an act that proved to be ineffective probably because it was still very difficult to achieve even a three-fourths majority consent on many issues).

(n41)Footnote 55. 11 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 455 (1938).

(n42)Footnote 56. 4 Jam., c. 11 (1606-1607).

(n43)Footnote 57. 3 & 4 W. & M., c. 31 (1693).

(n44)Footnote 58. 11 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 624-625 (1938).

(n45)Footnote 59. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 65-88 (1986).

(n46)Footnote 60. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance at 65.

(n47)Footnote 61. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 65 (1986).

(n48)Footnote 62. Field ways were peasant paths through commons and waste, out to the common fields.

(n49)Footnote 63. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 72 (1986).

(n50)Footnote 64. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 80-81 (1986).

(n51)Footnote 65. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 153-54 (1986).

(n52)Footnote 66. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 154 (1986)..

(n53)Footnote 67. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 64 (1986).

(n54)Footnote 68. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 155 (1986).

(n55)Footnote 69. The first nineteenth-century public act facilitating enclosure was enacted in 1801, 41 Geo. 3, c. 109 (1801), and an act in 1845, 8 & 9 Vict., c. 118 (1845), established a Board of Inclosure Commissioners to regulate enclosure proposals presented to them; this act effectively eliminated the need for any further private enclosure acts.

(n56)Footnote 70. 13 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 353 (1952).

(n57)Footnote 71. 39 & 40 Vict., c. 56 (1876).

(n58)Footnote 72. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 261-62 (2d ed. 1986).

(n59)Footnote 73. See Robert C. Allen, Enclosure And The Yeomen, part I (1992); Charles J. Reid, Jr., The Seventeenth-Century Revolution in the English Land Law, 43 Clev. St. L. Rev. 243 -259 (1995). Lisa Thurau-Gray, Symposium: Children and Education: Tensions within the Parent-Child-State Triad: The Trend towards Turning Public Education into A Gated Community, 11 Cornell J.L. & Pub. Pol'y 665 (Summer, 2002) (author compares trends in public education to the Enclosure Acts in England).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 5.04

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 5.04 Major Developments in English Property Law Before 1926.

§ 5.04(a) Abolition of Tenures.

The establishment of tenures during the Middle Ages n74 and their reinforcement by the Statute of Uses in 1536 n75 have been described in the preceding chapter. For the most part, tenures had long ceased to be a useful means of providing the services for which they were originally intended. As with the scutage payments substituted for knight service, many other services were commuted into money payments; when the amounts became fixed by custom, they were driven into insignificance by continuing inflation. Homage and fealty also lapsed into unimportant formalities. Only a few generations after the Conquest, tenures were desirable principally for the income they generated through incidents of marriage, wardship, aids, reliefs and fines. These impositions, however, remained burdensome irritants, the more so because in time they lost all relevance. The society which spawned such incidents was one in which less powerful persons relied heavily on the warrior class for protection and civil stability. The feudal tenurial incidents could be justified as a form of individualized taxation for provisions of civil services and order. After the feudal order was replaced by a strong central government in England, the tenurial incidents became merely means of obtaining revenue, either for private landholders or for the government itself, as the greatest of feudal lords.

Quite naturally, landholders and their lawyers exhibited great ingenuity in evading the exactions of tenurial incidents. Perhaps the most conspicuous of these devices to escape tenurial impositions was the use. Through a conveyance to use, one person could give land to another, but specify that the land was to be only nominally held by the grantee, while it was actually used by or for the benefit of a third person, the so-called "cestui que use."

Early conveyances to uses were intended to strengthen tenurial relationships: a knight embarking on a crusade might convey land to another who could be responsible for feudal obligations, but would actually hold the land for the benefit of the knight's family; through a use, the benefit of landholding could be conferred on a religious order not authorized to actually hold land; a villein, not ordinarily authorized to convey land, could accomplish the purpose by conveying to the lord "for the use of" the intended grantee; and when a guardianship was transferred, the new guardian would hold "to the use of" the ward.

However, the potential for uses as means to avoid feudal obligations was not overlooked:

> The purpose of such conveyances frequently was to enable the landowners to deal with their lands in a manner not countenanced by the common law or to evade the liabilities incident to legal ownership, such as the rule of destructibility. Thus suppose O, the owner of the Blackacre in fee simple absolute, wished to dispose of Blackacre by will at a time when disposition by will was not recognized by the law courts, i.e., prior to 1540. To accomplish this goal, O would enfeoff B in fee simple absolute to hold to O's use during O's lifetime and after his death to transfer the land according to O's will. Upon O's death, B, the owner of Blackacre in fee simple absolute, would then carry out the terms of O's will and transfer Blackacre to O's intended beneficiaries. Likewise, a dying land owner could by a conveyance to several feoffees to use (who would take as joint tenants) deprive the lord of the fee of the important incidents of wardship, marriage or relief. n76

The reaction of the government and major landholders to such developments was to protect and enforce the incidents, often by means of statute. Beginning late in the 15th century, a series of statutes initiated piecemeal reforms by declaring the cestui que use as holder of the legal title (and therefore the one responsible for performing feudal tenurial obligations) in certain, specific situations. However, comprehensive reform did not occur until the Statute of Uses in 1536, and that was prompted by the interests of the English government, as the greatest of feudal lords and the entity with the most to gain by preserving tenurial incidents. By the simple tactic of declaring holders of uses to be the holders of the legal title, the Statute of Uses was able to solve a major problem in the feudal system and give new life to the feudal tenures, which were actually otherwise no longer relevant in English society:

> The causes which led to its enactment are to be found in the King's need of money. The Statute was primarily designed to restore to the Crown the feudal revenues which were being lost because of the conveyance of land to uses. In the sixteenth century the incidents of tenure, such as wardship, marriage, relief, primer seisin and escheat, were burdensome exactions on the tenant and, correspondingly, a profitable source of revenue for the lord of the fee. Because the king "alone was always lord and never tenant" he lost heavily when landowners by conveyances to joint feoffees to uses rid themselves of the incidents of tenure by retaining only the beneficial ownership. Henry VIII by means of the Statute of Uses sought to put an end to this drainage of the royal revenues. n77

Thus the Statute of Uses at bottom was a device to resuscitate tenurial incidents and give new life to a system that was already terminally ill. In the end, the Statute of Uses did little to revive the failing tenurial system, but it did lead to an enormous elaboration of property law in England. For instance, methods previously used to convey uses, not bound by common law conveyancing restrictions, became available to convey legal estates. These new conveyancing methods included a feoffment to uses, resulting use, bargain and sale, lease and release, and covenant to stand seised. Also, several uses incorporating future interests outside the common law rules, such as shifting and springing uses, were "executed" into legal interests and, as executory interests, became "new" future interests with new legal rules. The ability to transfer property interests by devise was expanded as a result of the Statute of Uses. When the courts began to treat certain uses as outside of and unexecuted by the Statute of Uses, new rules and new applications for such uses began to develop, including the entire law of trusts.

At first, the Statute of Uses achieved its avowed purpose of preserving and recovering tenurial revenues for the Crown and other major landholders. In 1540, four years after the Statute of Uses, the Court of Wards and Liveries was established to oversee the collection of such tenurial charges. n78 The court was effective, and landowners chafed under the renewed exactions. The monarch even became dependent upon such revenues, especially in the struggle between Crown and Parliament in the 17th century, when that income enabled the king for a time to function without Parliament and its taxing power. When the Long Parliament was finally summoned by King Charles I, both the Commons and the Lords passed resolutions in 1645 calling for abolition of feudal dues, mostly as a means of weakening the monarch. The resolutions were confirmed by an act of Parliament in 1656, which act, after the Restoration, was itself confirmed by the Tenures Abolition Act of 1660. In connection with this legislation, the Crown received some compensatory revenue for the loss of feudal income: n79

> The effect of the Act of 1660, which is extraordinarily ill-drawn, was to abolish knight-service and grand serjeanty, and convert these tenures into free and common socage, that is into socage tenure where no services were due and no special customs applied. The statute expressly abolishes all the burdensome incidents of military tenure which mattered in practice, except forfeiture and escheat. The honorary incidents of grand serjeanty were preserved, frankalmoin was not affected at all, and existing socage tenures were largely unaffected. The Act did not in any way affect copyhold tenure. An incidental and important effect of this statute was that land held before in knight-service, of which only two-thirds had previously been devisable, could now all be devised by will, apart only from entailed property, it being impossible to bar an entail by will...
>
> In effect, therefore, from 1645 onwards the only free tenure of any importance which remained was socage, and the preservation of the feudal revenues had ceased to be of any importance. The economic purpose of the Statute of Uses had disappeared. n80

Tenures have had a fundamental impact on English land law in the sense that they stand in the place of outright ownership. Because of tenure, any occupier of land other than the monarch always "held" of someone else; absolute ownership rested only and completely with the sovereign. And it could perhaps be said that tenures, especially military tenures, were functionally important with respect to shaping property law for only the first one or two centuries of their 600-year existence; thereafter their effects were financial, and their chief influence on the law issued from the conflicts between those who wished to preserve tenures and those who sought to avoid them. By the time the major tenures were formally abolished in 1660, property law had moved on and remained essentially unaffected; the abolition merely removed a fiscal irritant.

Nevertheless, the doctrine of tenure still infuses the land law, in that even today one only holds the land, but does not own it outright. In their modern form tenures have undergone profound changes: English landholders now, for the most part, hold directly of the Crown, with all intermediate lordships having disappeared; feudal burdens attached to tenures have also been eliminated; all tenures except leasehold tenure have been converted into the single tenure of free and common socage:

> [T]he first thing to teach a student of land law is the doctrine of tenure, the second is that it has no importance. Unfortunately, it cannot be ignored completely because the ghost of tenure has left its imprint on the language of modern law. The language of possession is still used. Today, the student will find sometimes the language of possession, sometimes that of ownership. He will find both the expressions "freehold owner" and "freehold tenant." He will read both that a freeholder owns the land and that he holds it as tenant. Again a life tenant may be described as a limited owner. Theoretically, the language of possession is more correct; in practice the language of ownership is more apt. n81

§ 5.04(b) Leaseholds.

The concept of tenure is still of significance in leaseholds. Because early feudal leaseholds were distinguished from freehold tenures, they were technically outside the laws governing real property and were treated as chattels, or personal property. Today leaseholds in English law are still technically chattels, although there is, of course, a tenurial relationship between the landlord and tenant.

It was pointed out in the preceding chapter that leaseholds, that is, tenancies for a term, may have been treated differently under the law because they performed a different function in medieval English society. If the land's main value was as a source of livelihood and sustenance for the population, then more or less permanent settlement and cultivation of the land were to be encouraged by legal doctrines. Thus the rules regarding estates in land and the tenures by which landholding was governed were all oriented to the interests of the long-term occupant; they held the so-called "free tenements." The finite term for years, or leasehold, on the other hand, was often simply a device for raising revenue, land turned over to a money-lender until the debt was repaid:

> The essence of the free tenement is that it should be the permanent and normal economic basis of the family. Herein lies the importance of giving it full and speedy protection, and for this purpose the petty assizes were invented. Contrasted with the free tenements the estate of the termor [the leasehold] is merely a speculative arrangement, calculated to evade the law against usury, made between a grasping money-lender on the one hand, and on the other a man whose difficulties temporarily compel him to part with his patrimony... There was, therefore, no reason whatever for protecting the termor by those assizes whose object was to fortify the family and its means of subsistence against wrongdoers of another type. n82

So the position of the leasehold tenant was indeed precarious under early English land law. A tenant disturbed in occupancy by someone other than the lessor could only bring an action for breach of covenant against the lessor. Not until a trespass action was made available in the mid-13th century could a lessee bring an action directly against such a third party.

By defaulting in an action against the land brought by a colluding third party, a lessor could extinguish the lessee's right of occupancy; not until 1278 did the Statute of Gloucester give the lessee the right to intervene in such an action. n83 By being excluded from the "free tenements," leaseholds were held not entitled to the protection of the petty assizes, a form of action for recovery and protection of the tenancy.

This deficiency was overcome when the trespass action was made available to lessees, including even a specialized writ. With this action, a lessee could achieve direct protection against any person who disturbed occupancy, with a remedy either in damages, or much later, at the end of the 15th century, for actual recovery of possession. n84

The need for greater protection arose from changes in the way leaseholds were used. Especially after the Black Death in the mid-14th century, leases for farming purposes, so-called husbandry leases, became common as lords sought new arrangements to bring workers back onto their manorial lands. Indeed, rather than being used as security for a disingenuous moneylending scheme, the lease was entered into "regularly by a freeman whose capital is insufficient to purchase much land, although he is active and enterprising enough to work the land of other owners." n85

This process at a very local level is well-illustrated from the post-Pestilence accounts for the medieval village of Landbeach, north of Cambridge:

> The lord did not find it possible to replace all his dead villein landholders with men prepared to accept the old conditions. Five tenements were let for life at a small cash rent with an obligation to provide one man for one day in hay harvest for lifting the crop. This was practically giving the land for nothing compared with the heavy labour services under pre-plague terms...
>
> Leases changed, and the main clauses of many were the obligation to inhabit and maintain the tenement. n86
>
> In 1365 the most dramatic change in the manor of Chamberlains [one of the two manors in the village] began. The demesne arable, all two hundred and six acres of it, was let to sixteen villeins in varying amounts for thirteen years at 18d. an acre... n87
>
> We have less information about the manor of Brays [the other manor in Landbeach], but by 1401 at least they had a farmer (lessee)... n88

After it became possible for the lessee through the trespass action to obtain actual recovery of the leasehold, additional legal protections arose. In the early 16th century, the old feudal rule permitting a lord as guardian to oust the lessee during the minority of the lessor was changed. n89 Then a statute in 1529 prohibited the practice by which a lessor could recover the leasehold by defaulting in a collusive action by a third party against the leasehold. n90 In 1540 lessees were given some statutory protection against ousters by landlords' successors. n91

Improving security for the lessee's interest did not resolve the questions concerning what kind of interest the leasehold was in legal terms. Through the confusion of conflicting court decisions, it appeared that a leasehold was real property for purposes of tenures, but was not for purposes of estates. Because a lease was not real property in terms of estates, and chattels could not be the subjects of estates, the lessee could not create remainders in or entail the leasehold. Eventually, this restriction was held applicable only to inter vivos transfers, and remainders and entails were permitted by devise. n92 But even though estates in leaseholds could be devised, they could not be created or limited through intestate inheritance. This was because chattels passed to executors or administrators, rather than to heirs. And because of the dual nature of a leasehold, part real property and part personal property, it came to be called a chattel real.

The length of lease terms was determined to be not limited, but it became common for some agricultural leases to be limited to 21 years and some building leases to 99 years. In the 15th century, a leasehold without a fixed duration left most lessees as tenants at will. At first, periodic tenancies were also treated as tenancies at will, n93 but after two centuries of judicial conflict, the courts finally agreed that a periodic lease created a tenancy for the initial term, followed by successive tenancies for each term during which the lease was continued. n94 Thereafter, tenancies whose nature was unclear were usually construed as periodic tenancies rather than as tenancies at will. n95

The law of leaseholds also intersected with the law of covenants. By the seventeenth century, lessors were including covenant obligations of right to demise, of quiet enjoyment, of freedom from encumbrances, and of further assurances. The lessee covenanted to pay rent. By analogy from earlier authority on restrictive covenants, n96 both the benefits and burdens of these covenants ran with the lease, and by statute the grantees of reversions were empowered to enforce lease covenants. n97

With these changes, leaseholds came to cover a large portion of English lands:

> The landed gentry retained freehold interests, commonly under settlement, and exploited the land at one remove, and left a class of tenant farmers in actual occupation of the soil... The landlord and tenant divided between them the burden of providing capital for agriculture, and a progressive landlord could do a great deal to encourage, and indeed insist upon, good husbandry... In the course of time the legislature has found it necessary to intervene to protect tenants against the abuses which rapacious landlords could readily perpetrate under the common law... With the exception of the statute of 1540, of restricted scope, these interventions begin in the nineteenth century with the series of statutes dealing with settled land. n98

After the massive English property reform legislation of 1925, leases became estates and remained the only tenures of any significance. According to these acts, an estate is an interest in land of defined duration, and the only two types of legal estates now recognized are the fee simple absolute in possession and the term of years absolute. The term of years absolute is the right to possess land for a period of fixed and certain duration, even for less than a year, and can include periodic tenancies. It need not be a presently possessory interest, and can be created to commence at some time in the future less than 21 years from the time the lease was created.

Because of flexibility in duration, leases have achieved a unique utility in English land law. For instance, leases may be used to provide a form of security in certain conveyances. Typically, a mortgagor will give a long-term lease of 3,000 years to the mortgagee, with the term of years to cease when the loan is repaid. A building lease may also be exceptionally long:

> Under a building lease, for example, the land is let for a long term at a ground rent, the tenant puts > up a building at his own expense, and at the end of the term this becomes the landlord's property; such a lease is therefore a valuable long-term investment for the landlord. Leases of anything up to 999 years, or even more, are sometimes granted for similar purposes; here the reversion is too remote to have any value, but the advantage to the landlord is that he can control the use of the land by means of covenants in the lease, and a greater variety of covenants are enforceable under a lease than under an outright conveyance of the fee simple. Such very long term leases may therefore be useful when a landlord is developing an estate and wishes to keep control over its appearance and character. n99

In addition to its function as a security device in a mortgage, the lease may also serve to secure trust payments to minor beneficiaries. Under such a trust settlement, the trustee would grant a long-term lease to the settlor, but neither the settlor nor the mortgagee lessee typically would take possession of the land.

Piecemeal legislation since the 19th century has brought much of leasehold law under statute. Reforms introduced by the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act of 1875, the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1923, the Agriculture Act of 1947, the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1948, and the Agriculture Act of 1958 have made agricultural tenancies more secure, requiring a year's notice to terminate in every instance, even after expiration of the regular term. Even those terminations operate in only narrowly specified circumstances. Otherwise, agricultural tenancies continue indefinitely until terminated according to the provisions of the applicable statute. More recent changes in these laws were made by the Agriculture Act of 1976 and the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1977.

Business tenants were made more secure in their tenancies after the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1927. Tenants in occupancy for more than five years who could prove that business goodwill had become attached to the premises had a right to renew the lease. These rights were expanded and strengthened by the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1954.

Tenants of furnished dwellings first obtained statutory protection in 1920 and have since received the attention of numerous items of legislation. n100 Tenant rights, both as to security of tenure and as to rent limits, in both private and public housing, are protected under current legislation. n101

§ 5.04(c) Changes in Future Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(1) Reversions and Remainders.

§ 5.04(c)(1)(i) Reversions.

The early common law often interchanged the terminology of reversions and escheats, but after the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus in 1285, it became more clear that the interest of a fee simple holder who died without heirs would "escheat" to the lord; after the death of a life tenant, however, the land could "revert" to the grantor as holder of the fee.

§ 5.04(c)(1)(ii) Remainders.

If the land did not revert upon the death of the life tenant, it might "remain" to some person other than the grantor who held the fee. Not all the features of these remainders were fully defined during this period. There is some evidence, for instance, that even in the late twelfth century remainders were created following conditional fees, a conveyance that would be impermissible under modern law even if conditional fees were still recognized. n102

§ 5.04(c)(1)(iii) Contingent Remainders.

A contingent remainder was hesitatingly upheld in a case as early as 1304, n103 but, conscious of the feudal order, judges were troubled over who would do homage. n104 Common law contingent remainders were fragile interests, subject to destruction upon forfeiture for tortious alienation (an attempt by a life tenant to convey a fee simple was considered a tortious alienation). The rule of destructibility had enough vitality to extend even to contingent remainders created by use or devise. Cases beginning as early as 1336 suggest that contingent remainders could be upheld if the remainders subsequently vested, n105 and that the death of a living person was the only contingency recognized at law. But in a 1550 case n106 it was stated as settled law that a remainder could be based on any condition that was not illegal or repugnant. n107 Contingent remainders were also then destructible and were destroyed if they could not take effect upon termination of the precedent estate, such as a contingent remainder to a posthumous son. n108 As noted before, an attempt by a life tenant to convey a fee (the so-called tortious alienation), as well as disseisin of the life tenant, also resulted in destruction of a contingent remainder. n109

Despite destructibility, contingent remainders had an alluring role to play in achieving disposition of family lands, so-called family settlements, in a way that would inhibit alienability by individual family members. In the 17th century, conveyancers who wished to create a life tenancy with contingent remainder as part of a family settlement began to insert a remainder in trust for the life of the life tenant, in case the life estate terminated prematurely, threatening the contingent remainder with destructibility. The vested nature of the remainder in trust was upheld in 1740. n110

§ 5.04(c)(1)(iv) The Rule in Shelley's Case.

An important early gloss on the normal rules for creating and conveying remainders came to be known as the Rule in Shelley's Case, although that case in 1581 was only the culmination of more than two centuries of judicial development. The foundation of the rule, though obscure, was apparently deeply anchored in feudal formalism. Simply stated, this formalism required that if the heir of a certain landholder succeed by inheritance to the seisin of the land, then the usual feudal payments would be due to the lord. No such feudal dues would be owed by a successor who entered by way of purchase, that is, by means other than inheritance. Thus early attempts were made to convey a life estate to one with remainder in the life tenant's heirs, so that those heirs would come into their interest by means of the conveyance rather than by normal inheritance from the life tenant. Accordingly, as early as 1350 n111 and 1366 n112 courts were agreeing that a remainder in fee to a life tenant's heirs should be treated as a fee in the life tenant; therefore, the life tenant's heirs would take, if at all, through inheritance and be liable for the usual feudal dues.

The rule has been labeled by the decision in Shelley's Case probably because it was given relatively succinct expression in that case, even though by that time much of the feudal justification for the rule had dissipated:

> [I]t is a rule in law, when the ancestor by any gift or conveyance takes an estate of freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance an estate is limited either mediately or immediately to his heirs in fee or in tail; that always in such cases, "the heirs" are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase. n113

Thus a remainder to the life tenant's heirs was simply a remainder in fee, so indicated by the use of the word "heirs," and this remainder in fee was considered to belong to the life tenant and not to the heirs. Through operation of the principle of merger, the life tenant who obtained the remainder in fee pertaining to the land held in life tenancy, would have the fee simple absolute, if there was no intervening estate.

> The Rule had such vitality that it survived in full force for many centuries after the conditions which gave it birth were only dimly discernible in history. It became "part and parcel of the law of England." When feudal conditions could no longer justify its existence, its continuance was assured by the inertia of precedent and the fact that it tended to increase the alienability of land. It was extended in scope so as to include equitable interests in land. But the Rule did not have a peaceful existence. A mass of literature grew up on the subject and a legion of cases, containing many fine distinctions, filled the reports. n114

The Rule in Shelley's Case was not abolished in England until enactment of the Law of Property Act in 1925. n115

§ 5.04(c)(1)(v) The Doctrine of Worthier Title.

A rule of law less well known but born of the same impulse is the doctrine of worthier title. According to the doctrine of worthier title, a landholder could not convey or devise a remainder to his or her own heirs. The remainder would be considered void, leaving the fee in the grantor. The heirs who therefore could not obtain the fee by conveyance or devise were presumed to ultimately receive it by inheritance and, just as under the Rule in Shelley's Case, would also be liable for the payment of feudal dues. It was therefore "worthier" (and, it might be added, "worth" more to the feudal lord) for the heir to receive the ancestor's land by inheritance (as distinguished from devise) than by gift or purchase. Despite this feudal explanation for the expressions of this rule, the label of worthier title is American in origin. n116

The first documentary manifestation of this rule was in the 13th-century Statute of Fraudulent Feoffments, n117 which voided a landholder's conveyance to his heir apparent. The earliest cases applying the rule did not appear in the reports until the 16th century. n118

As with the Rule in Shelley's Case, the doctrine of worthier title was applied long after its feudal justifications had disappeared. As applied to devises the rule had to be frequently taken into account on behalf of certain creditors, who could reach assets held by a decedent's heirs, but not by the decedent's devisees. The rule was applied as a rule of law rather than as a discretionary rule of construction. While the rule lives on in American jurisprudence, it was statutorily abolished in England in 1833. n119

§ 5.04(c)(2) Reversionary Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(2)(i) Possibilities of Reverter.

Even more obscure are the origins of the reversionary interests associated with defeasible fees. One of these types of defeasible fees, the determinable fee, was the subject of considerable controversy among legal scholars a century ago. The controversy concerned whether the Statute Quia Emptores in 1290 operated to prohibit the creation of determinable fee simple estates. Implicit in this controversy was the notion that interests like determinable fees had been possible before 1290, n120 and that interests like possibilities of reverter that were derived from such limited fees and had likewise existed before 1290. The better view seems to be that the Statute Quia Emptores operated only on fee simple absolute interests, and that the determinable fees, while not especially common, were acceptable interests both before and after 1290. Some evidence for the existence and acceptability of determinable fees (and, by inference, for possibilities of reverter) emerges from case reports during the reign of Elizabeth I and from the writings of Littleton and Coke. Except for the interest one might have in completing the historical record, the question has been mooted by modern developments:

> But whatever one may think about historical arguments as to the existence of fees determinable, the short answer to the whole question is that there are no decisions denying their existence, and that one recent English case [1944] and numerous American cases have recognized them. It is too late now, in view of these numerous decisions, to say that there is no such thing as a determinable fee. n121

§ 5.04(c)(2)(ii) Rights of Entry or Powers of Termination.

Another defeasible fee simple interest known in modern terminology as a fee simple subject to a condition subsequent also was connected to a reversionary interest, known either as a right of entry or a power of termination. Its origins, too, are obscure, but from early cases it seems certain that this type of estate and its accompanying future interest were being created and recognized perhaps as early as the 12th century. n122 In 1220 the grantor of such a fee on condition obtained a royal writ to recover the land following occurrence of the condition. n123 However, in the less certain terminology of the time, the future interest following a conditional fee was often called a remainder.

The rules regarding rights of entry for breach of condition were settled by the time of Littleton in the 15th century, and by the time of the Tudors the right of entry was held to arise implicitly in the creation of the condition, and did not need to be expressly included in the conveyance. n124 Also, "under the early common law, an actual entry was generally necessary to effect a forfeiture of a condition subsequent annexed to a freehold estate," n125 probably so the grantor could once again obtain the seisin. In modern times no formal entry is necessary to recover the estate, and as actual entry is infrequent, some prefer the more technically correct term of "power of termination" as the proper name for this future interest.

§ 5.04(c)(3) Executory Interests.

§ 5.04(c)(3)(i) Springing Interests.

In the preceding chapter it was described how the Statute of Uses gave rise to new forms of future interests. n126 Certain uses were given as future interests in forms that were prohibited for legal interests under the common law. When the Statute of Uses in 1536 converted most use interests into legal interests, the future interest uses also became legal interests, but not subject to the traditional common law restrictions. For instance, a so-called springing use was created when one enfeoffed land to a feoffee to the use of another, such use to not commence until some time in the future. When "executed" by the Statute of Uses this springing use became a legal springing executory interest: the feoffor held the estate in fee simple (the grant to the feoffee having been invalidated by the Statute of Uses), but the fee simple estate was subject to the executory interest. Other springing executory interests resulted from conveyances of successive uses with gaps of time in between. Also, a conveyance to one in use with remainder in use to the heirs of a person then living would create yet another variety of springing executory interest, because a gap of time might be required to determine heirship.

§ 5.04(c)(3)(ii) Shifting Interests.

A shifting use resulted from a conveyance to one, in use, with the use to go over to another upon the occurrence of a specified event, a conveyancing sequence also forbidden for legal interests under the common law. After execution by the Statute of Uses, such shifting uses became legal shifting executory interests.

After passage of the Statute of Wills in 1540, it was also possible to devise springing and shifting interests, and these devises became known as executory devises.

§ 5.04(c)(4) Fees Tail.

With respect to all of these future interests, once their formative period was past, little change occurred in their inherent characteristics until modern times. However, several significant changes did occur in the availability and utility of these interests and their underlying estates. The career of the fee tail presents perhaps the most interesting example.

When in the 12th century it became common for landholders to give land to a grantee and the heirs of his or her body, the grantor was commonly considered to have a reversion if the grantee had no issue. By the mid-13th century it was common for holders of such conditional fee interests to transfer them to others free of the conditions. This practice was prohibited by the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus in 1285, which required that the land be inherited by the grantee's issue, if there be any, or if not, that it revert to the grantor. With these new characteristics, the interest called the fee tail arose out of the statute.

While the statute on its face applied only to the first generation of issue, leaving such issue to alienate freely after they acquired the estate, some court decisions shortly after Quia Emptores insisted that the restrictions as to issue be observed until the fourth generation of issue. Even that extension of the statutory restriction was not stable, and by early in the 15th century the restriction of the fee tail to possession by descendant issue, with reversion to the grantor if such descendants should fail, was held to be of indefinite duration. Parliament resisted petitions to ameliorate these restrictions, because of the fee tail's other advantages: after the tenant's lifetime the fee tail was not subject to attainder for felony or forfeiture for treason, nor could it be reached to satisfy debts of former tenants in tail. Not until Littleton's treatise at the end of the 15th century were some of these rules stabilized.

Meanwhile, persons who promoted such rules as aids to maintaining family dynastic landholdings were opposed by those who sought to realize the market value of their landholdings and therefore to lift or lighten the restrictions. This latter interest was most often aided by the courts. In a 1472 case, n127 the court acknowledged that the rights of issue could be barred by a collusive procedure known as a common recovery.

> The collusive common recovery worked in the following way. Suppose Smith to be tenant in tail in possession of Blackacre, which he wishes to sell for a fee simple to Jones. A collusive real action is brought by Jones against Smith on a feigned title, Jones having already paid or agreed to pay Smith for the land. In this action Jones claims a fee simple in the land. Smith appears in court and vouches one Brown to warranty. Brown does not dispute his obligation to warrant Smith's title, and the action then proceeds between Jones and Brown. Instead of putting up a defence Brown asks for 'leave to imparl,' that is, he asks the court for an adjournment whilst he talks the matter over with Jones in the hope of reaching a settlement, and he and Jones leave court to have their imparlance. Brown promptly disappears. This is a contempt of court, and when Jones arrives back before the Justices and tells them that Brown has absconded, they at once give judgment in favour of Jones. The judgment is that Jones recovers the land, and that Brown is to convey to Smith lands of equal value to those recovered. Unfortunately Brown, who has been carefully selected for this reason (and paid for his trouble), has no land, so that the judgment can never [be] satisfied. If it ever was satisfied, then the land conveyed would be held on the same terms as that lost to Jones; it would be subject to the entail and to any interest in remainder or reversion after Smith's estate... A blind eye is turned to the fact that the whole procedure is an obvious fraud, and neither the issue nor the remaindermen are allowed to do anything about it.
>
> Around the common recovery hangs a great mystery. In the first place we do not really know when it was evolved, and in the second place there is no full understanding of the theoretical justification which allowed its entrance into the law. n128

The common recovery was probably practiced before Taltarum's Case in 1472, but probably was not fully developed until sometime afterward; indeed it seems that the judge in Taltarum's Case allowed the recovery only on the assumption that the vouchee really would provide lands of equal value. When Littleton was writing his treatise on tenures at about that same time, he did not consider the fee tail a barrable estate. Later judges did not rest on that optimistic assumption, and by the middle of the 16th century it is clear that any expectation that the vouchee could satisfy a judgment had been abandoned: the court crier became the standard vouchee. n129 Still later in that century it was decided that the common recovery would bar not only the issue but also any reversioners or remaindermen. n130

Much mystery surrounds the courts' motives for acceding to such devices:

> It is commonly said that the real reason was the desire of the judges to permit the breaking of entails, and encourage free alienation. This all suggests a judicial enthusiasm for free trade in land which is quite anachronistic, though judges might well have favoured a policy of allowing heads of families to reorganise their land holdings as family needs changed...
>
> It is much more likely that judges were not so much influenced by a desire to establish a free market in land, or a commitment to the landowner's freedom to alienate the family patrimony, as by the difficulty of finding any technical flaws in a very ingenious device which was principally employed to resettle family lands. n131

During the reign of Henry VIII the notion that entails could be barred had been accepted and the common recovery procedure, sometimes involving more than one vouchee, apparently came to be considered too cumbersome; an already established procedure known as the fine, or final accord, was also allowed to bar entails. According to the fine procedure, participating parties would engage in litigation over rights in land, pause to ostensibly reach a compromise, and then have the court accept and record the terms of the compromise, which were actually the terms of the intended original conveyance. In its collusive aspects it was similar to the common recovery and no doubt seemed an appropriate alternative procedure for barring entails. The availability of the fine for this purpose was suggested by a statute of 1490, n132 judicially accepted in 1527, n133 and the decision was reinforced by a statute in 1536. n134 The fine procedure was used to convert the entailed estate into a fee simple until both fines and recoveries were abolished by the Fines and Recoveries Act of 1833. n135 Thereafter the entailed estate could be "barred" or "docked" by means of a deed recorded with the Chancery Court.

§ 5.04(d) Family Settlements or Succession.

Estates in tail were a major factor in English family settlements. Land, as the principal form of wealth, was often "settled" on family members, especially younger siblings perhaps starting out with their own new family units. When trusts began to be fashionable for family settlements, the grantor of the trust was and still is frequently referred to as the settlor. From a modern perspective, the family settlement was simply a means of conferring on the children of a family their respective inheritances. Probably the main concern during the Middle Ages was to provide each new generation with appropriate lands, yet to keep the lands "within the family," so that large, dynastic landholdings could be maintained. Thus a primary purpose in family settlements was to restrict grantees' abilities to alienate their lands outside the family, and no form of landholding more closely fit this purpose than the fee tail.

On the other hand, a younger family member in possession of settled lands frequently needed cash, or the more flexible wealth represented by land, so that the restrictions on alienation imposed through family settlements were obstructive and generally undesirable. Those who held entailed lands were the persons most likely to seek out some way to bar the entail, either through common recovery or fine or some other device.

In response, settlors as early as the 14th century began using combinations of a life estate with entailed fee in remainder to the life tenant's oldest son and successive remainders to younger sons. If the oldest or other sons were not yet born, the remainder in fee tail would be simply conferred on the life tenant's heir, in an age before the Rule in Shelley's Case turned such a conveyance into a fee simple absolute for the erstwhile life tenant. The entailed remainders became less functional as settlement devices as the courts removed obstacles to their alienability.

During the 16th century, settlors acquired new tools for working out family settlements. The Statute of Uses in 1536 and the Statute of Wills in 1540 provided broad new means for both inter vivos and testamentary dispositions of landed interests. Powers of appointment were created by the Statute of Uses: before the Statute of Uses a grantor could convey to a feoffee to such uses as the feoffee would declare; after the Statute of Uses, such a declaration resulted in a legal estate being conferred on the person named in the declaration.

> The 16th century saw the rise of a new aristocracy and a new landed gentry, which seems to have been obsessed with a desire to entrench its position in society. The landowners, many of whom were lawyers themselves, aided by their conveyancers, attempted expedient after expedient to give permanence to their families; the confused state of the land law and the passion for litigation gave rise to case after case in which this or that form of settlement came under review, to be upheld or struck down for reasons which appeared incomprehensible at times to lawyers, let alone to their clients. Towards the end of the seventeenth century, however, the activities of a number of eminent conveyancers ... produced some order by designing model conveyances which satisfied the desires of the landowners and kept within reasonably well settled doctrines of the law; there arose a conveyancing tradition, and in the courts a respect for that tradition, which has continued to this day. n136

Out of this era of ingenuity came the so-called strict settlement, based on the notion that in family settlements only a life tenant should ever be in actual possession of the land, and that entailed interests should always be remainder interests. If the entailed remainderman ever came into actual possession, then the entailment could be barred by fine or common recovery and become freely alienable. In a typical strict settlement, usually worked out at the time of the child's marriage, the owner in fee would settle the land on his son for life, with remainder in tail to the son's unborn oldest son, and successive remainders to any other unborn younger grandsons, all such remainders being contingent. The settlement would be in trust with the trustee instructed to preserve the contingent remainders of the unborn younger grandsons, and whose legal interest effectively blocked the settlor's son from destroying his own life estate. This made the life tenancy secure and this security is what made the settlement "strict" or inviolable. n137

Before the entailed remainderman took steps to bar the entail, the tenant in possession would agree to provide an attractive income based on the lands in return for the remainderman's agreement to resettle the lands on the same terms for another generation. Income provisions for the wife and the younger children would be secured by the land and raised by trustees accumulating profits from the land. Sometimes these so-called "portions" were paid in advance by the oldest son, in order to clear the charges against his land title. Through use of powers of appointment, a child more able than the oldest son might occasionally be chosen for the first remainder. By enlarging the normal rights of life tenants, those in possession could be protected against claims for waste, encouraged to invest in improving the land, and even empowered to lease, sell or exchange the land. This arcane procedure was in common use from the end of the 17th century to very modern times, made unpopular only by various forms of 20th-century taxation, especially death duties.

The strict settlement was particularly well-suited to meet the uncertainties of marriages involving two wealthy families:

> In the negotiations, the bride's family offered their daughter and a financial contribution for the endowment of the new family; the groom's family, in turn, their son and their part of the endowment. Granted the legal subservience of women, it was essential, if the bride and her children were to be protected from the risk that the groom might prove unreliable, and her family's status protected, that the groom's power of disposition over the family landed endowment be restricted. The mechanism for achieving this result was the strict settlement, whose function it was to ensure that the lady and her future offspring were kept in the manner in which they were accustomed, or entitled. For the groom's point of view the settlement was the price that had to be paid to make a good marriage. The pressure to settle property is thus explicable. But marriages take place every generation, and if the next round of matchmaking was to be handled satisfactorily, there must be new treaties and new prices to pay. In the dynastic world therefore, there needs to be a chance to readjust matters each generation, and the system of settlement and resettlement achieved just that. In substance the strict settlement functioned as an entail of unlimited duration, subject to revision by family conference at appropriate intervals. n138

With large tracts of settled land held in life tenancy, and not all such life tenants enjoying broadened powers of use and disposition, the prevalence of strict settlement came to be viewed as harmful, hindering the full utilization of land.

§ 5.04(e) The Rule Against Perpetuities.

That, through the connivance of the law, large portions of land would be held unalienable and not fully utilized was a constant apprehension of many judges and lawyers who shaped English land law. The rule against perpetuities and various other rules favoring alienability of land are expressions of this perspective, which, however, was always tempered by desires of those who obtained land to secure their holdings:

> The lawyers and judges who moulded the more modern rules upon perpetuities in the period between 1450 and 1700 were themselves great purchasers and settlors of land; it could thus be that the rules worked out in the courts represent an attempt to balance the conflicting desires of their authors, and produce a body of law which indulged to some extent both the desire for an active land market and the desire to retain land in the family. n139

Land whose alienability remained restricted indefinitely was a great irritant to many in English society, and the issue of perpetuities in family settlements and other contexts had troubled judges, landowners and conveyancers for centuries. The archetype of such restricted land was land held in fee tail, with the entailment not subject to being barred. Thus devices were created to enable barring of the fee tail estate in some circumstances, making of it in essence a fee simple absolute.

The modern rule against perpetuities went considerably beyond concerns for barring entailed land and has its genesis in The Duke of Norfolk's Case in 1681. n140 The judge in that case had to determine if vesting was too remote in a devise of leasehold property. Specifically, a leasehold was devised to trustees for the benefit of the settlor's second son, in tail, but if the oldest son were to die without male issue during the lifetime of the second son, or if the settlor's patrimony descended to the second son, then the leaseholds would go over to the third son. The interests were upheld on the conclusion that they would have to vest in the third son, if at all, not later than during the lifetime of the second son. On this occasion the judge also announced a new rule of remoteness, superseding previous perpetuities rules, that an interest, to be valid, must vest, if at all, during the lifetime of a person in being at the time of the settlement. Judges in subsequent decisions extended the time slightly to a period of a life in being plus twenty-one years. The rule against perpetuities remains an active element in English land law today.

§ 5.04(f) Emergence of Trusts.

Even though the 1536 Statute of Uses applied to conveyances of "use, confidence or trust," the term "trust" eventually came to signify those uses that were not considered to be executed by the Statute. Among those unexecuted uses were uses declared on a term of years, which term, of course, was not a freehold estate. While some equity courts were at first reluctant to enforce such uses, because they could be viewed as attempts to evade the effects of the Statute of Uses, the Statute of Uses itself lost its practical vitality after abolition of tenures in 1660 and leasehold uses, known as trusts, became common after that time.

Certain freehold uses were also treated as unexecuted by the Statute of Uses. If a use was active, such as a use requiring the feoffee to make a further conveyance or to collect rents and pay debts, the judges ruled them unexecuted by the Statute, and they, too, were termed trusts.

A use on a use was also not executed, although before the eighteenth century such conveyances were probably the result of mistake and inadvertence. In 1668 a court seemed to suggest that the first cestui que use would hold in trust for the second, n141 and in 1700 a trust was recognized in a use deliberately created on a use. n142 Gradually, and with much hesitation, courts began consistently to regard a use on a use as not executed, not recognized by the common law courts, and enforceable only as a trust in equity:

> The general recognition of trusts was followed by the intricate process of working out the details of the system of equitable ownership. In essence the new trust was the old use in a new guise, but the Chancery did not follow precisely their ancient model ... [T]here came to be important differences between the old equitable ownership of the use and the new equitable ownership of the trust. Trusts were not so restricted in their enforceability ... The trust bound the land into whosoever's hands it came, excepting only the purchaser for value without notice ... Trusts could arise although no personal confidence had ever been reposed by one person in another, an impossibility with the use... n143

Trusts, labeled by one and considered by many to be "a brilliant invention of English jurisprudence," n144 play a huge role in the practical aspects of modern English and American property law.

§ 5.04(g) Servitudes.

§ 5.04(g)(1) Relationship to Incorporeal Hereditaments.

The English law of servitudes has arisen from that branch of property law dealing with incorporeal hereditaments, by which term is meant rights that are treated as property. Corporeal hereditaments are the physical objects such as land, buildings and fixtures that are governed by property law. Incorporeal hereditaments, on the other hand, consist of a wide variety of rights considered to be property and governed by property law. Bracton recognized the distinction between corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments, but questioned whether one could have seisin of incorporeal things. n145 In the almost contemporary treatise known as Britton, it was conceded that livery of seisin was not possible for incorporeal hereditaments, which must instead be conveyed by a grant in deed: n146

> In Britton's day the correct method of grant was delivery of a charter in view of the lands to which they related, which was about as near to livery of seisin as one could get. But the grantee, if he wanted to alienate, must acquire seisin by enjoying the right before he alienated, and until he did so his title was imperfect. n147

For Bracton, all incorporeal hereditaments were servitudes. n148 Of the incorporeal hereditaments listed later by Blackstone, all were either then accepted as servitudes or were analogous to servitudes. Today, easements and profits, as the incorporeal hereditaments that are still of some importance, are also considered servitudes.

The following lengthy excerpt from an authoritative modern English property treatise best depicts the variety and, with the exception of easements and profits, the essential anachronism of incorporeal hereditaments:

> 4. Principal incorporeal hereditaments. The following may be listed as incorporeal hereditaments.
>
> (i) Rentcharges. A rentcharge is an annuity secured on some specified land.
>
> (ii) Annuities and corodies. These differ from rentcharges in not being secured upon or connected with land. An annuity, e.g., £ 100 a year, could be granted or devised to a person and his heirs and would then devolve as an hereditament, like land. A corody was paid in kind, and was a grant, usually by a religious house, to some person of board and lodging, and sometimes of clothing, of a certain kind for a certain period. In early times corodies were popular as a form of salary or pension, but they have long been obsolete.
>
> (iii) Advowsons. An advowson is the right of presentation to an ecclesiastical living.
>
> (iv) Tithes. A rather similar right was "multure" of a mill, being the right of the owner to take a certain proportion of the corn ground.
>
> (v) Easements. An example of an easement is a private right of way. It is only in modern times that easements have been recognised as incorporeal hereditaments.
>
> (vi) Profits a prendre, for example, rights of common or of shooting or fishing.
>
> (vii) Titles of honour, e.g., peerages. A baronetcy has been held to be "land," and also a "tenement" capable of being entailed.
>
> (viii) Offices. Offices, like titles of honour, were in early times governed by land law, since an office holder was commonly remunerated by a grant of land. When this feudal practice died out offices were still thought of as property; they could be granted in fee simple, or for life, or in tail, and an aspirant to an office might obtain a grant of the reversion to it. Thus the office of Marshal of England could be entailed, as could also those of Chamberlain of the Exchequer, steward of a manor, or forester. Other offices of inheritance mentioned by Coke are those of constable, bedell, parker (i.e., keeper of a park), falconer and master of hounds. Indeed, any office properly granted can probably be made inheritable, but the only inherited offices now to be found are probably ancient. Even in early times the grant of an office for a term longer than a life was a rarity. But grants for life or for a term of years were common.

> (ix) Franchises. These were royal rights or privileges granted by the Crown to a subject. In the early Middle Ages they were of many kinds. Examples are fairs, markets, the right to wrecks and treasure trove, and free fisheries. Lords of manor, also, were often given special rights of jurisdiction, such as the right to hang thieves, or the right to the chattels of condemned felons which normally belonged to the Crown...
>
> Reversions and remainders have been called incorporeal hereditaments by most modern authorities; but this is thought to be wrong ... reversions and remainders cannot themselves be hereditaments; they describe merely the nature of the estate for which some hereditament is held. n149

From the preceding list, it is seen that easements and profits are the servitudes currently considered incorporeal hereditaments. Easements, however, were not considered incorporeal hereditaments before the 18th century, because the only easements then recognized were appurtenant to a dominant tenement, so the easement was merely a "right" appurtenant to a corporeal hereditament, that is, to the dominant tenement. Profits, too, were often appurtenant, but they could also exist in gross, and to that extent were always considered incorporeal hereditaments. Since the 18th century, English land law no longer draws the distinction between incorporeal hereditaments and those rights considered to be merely appurtenances to other land, so now, all easements and profits, whether appurtenant or in gross, are treated as incorporeal hereditaments. Restrictive covenants are later and strictly equitable interests, and so are a variety of servitude outside the doctrines of incorporeal hereditaments.

§ 5.04(g)(2) Profits.

In Bracton's time in the 13th century, profits were more prominent than easements. Profits and easements were included in Britton's description of servitudes, "granting that another who has nothing therein, shall have a right of pasturing or mowing or fishing or of driving cattle or of way or of carrying therein or by other servitudes, which may be infinite and numberless...." n150 Profits were distinguished as being rights to take something of value away from the servient land.

The most numerous types of profits in the Middle Ages were rights to common, either created by grant from the lord to one of his freeholders, or arising by custom.

> These common rights were a necessary part of that common or open field system upon which most of the land of England was cultivated for many centuries. Thus we find commons of turbary, or the right to cut turf for fuel; common of estovers, or the right to cut timber, underwood, furze, etc., for fuel or litter; common of piscary, or the right to fish in another's water; and, by far the most important of all, the right to common of pasture. n151

Profits that were not appurtenant to lands within the manor, that benefited persons outside the manor and were therefore in gross, were created or acquired by grant, reservation or long use. n152

The long use required to establish a profit was described by Bracton as:

> user for a long time with peaceful, continuous and uninterrupted enjoyment of the right, the lord knowing of it and neglecting to interfere; for this is regarded as equivalent to a legal transfer, provided that the enjoyment has not been by violence, or clandestinely or by request and permission... n153

The time requirement for long use became one of the most ludicrous fictions of the common law:

> The long user became the common law's 'time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary', and until after the time of Littleton there were lawyers who were prepared to take this phrase sensibly and literally. Unhappily, the view which prevailed, and which is to be found in the early year books, required user to be shown since 1189, with the absurd results all know. The date was selected by > analogy with the period of limitation fixed in 1275 for the writ of right; until the Prescription Act (1833) the only attempt to mitigate the resulting injustices was the judicial invention of the fiction of the lost grant. n154

Frequently a freehold tenant would claim a common of pasture profit in waste land of the manor as an incident of the freehold tenure. Rather than proving long use, the tenant was required only to prove the tenure and show that the tenure was created before the Statute Quia Emptores of 1290. This right of common pasture was the most common and most essential of the profits claimed by manorial tenants and even in the early common law are found suggestions that such appurtenant, appended or annexed rights arose by long use or ancient custom. n155

In the 15th century it was held that all freeholders had a right of common pasture by operation of law, and this freeholder right was labeled appendant. n156 Appendant rights were limited to freeholders and to their animals considered commonable, such as cattle and horses.

Rights of common pasture available to both free and villein tenants were categorized as appurtenant, in gross, "pur cause de vicinage," and common of shack. Appurtenant rights were other profits attached to a dominant tenement that arose by prescription or grant, and pertained to animals not considered commonable, such as pigs, donkeys, goats and geese, or pertained to land not anciently arable, such as land recently drained or reclaimed from waste. Common of pasture in gross was not connected with any dominant tenement, common "pur cause de viciniage" occurred when two waste land areas from adjoining manors ran against each other and tenants from either manor were permitted to use both areas. A common of shack existed in some areas over lands between the time of harvest and re-sowing.

Rights of common in waste lands were among the earliest victims of enclosures. Lords of manors were considered to have rights of approvement, the right to approve enclosure of manorial waste lands, subject to the limitation that adequate land was left to serve common rights. n157 The approvement right applied only to waste lands and only against freehold tenants and against appendant and appurtenant common rights.

The law as to profits was stabilized by a series of cases in the late 16th and early 17th centuries, n158 and conceptually remains essentially unchanged today. n159 Creation and acquisition of profits by grant, reservation or prescription has been much affected by statutory reform. Problems arising from the ancient and varied natures of profits prompted passage of the Commons Registration Act of 1965, to ascertain what commons rights are still claimed and to extinguish the others.

§ 5.04(g)(3) Easements.

When the law of profits was being clarified four centuries ago, the law of easements was still very new and was able to benefit from emerging rules for profits:

> The definition of these various classes of incorporeal things helped to bring out into clearer relief the nature of easements, and customary rights in the nature of easements. We have seen that the nature of the classes of incorporeal things which have just been described, was fairly well ascertained in the Middle Ages; but that the law relating to easements was still in a very uncertain state. We shall see that, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, their nature began to be better understood. But it is significant that Blackstone does not describe easements in general, and that the only easements which he mentions in his list of incorporeal things are various rights of way. As we shall now see, it is not till after Blackstone wrote, that the rules as to easements, which had been evolved during this period, were elaborated and combined into a definite body of legal doctrine, which defined the incidents, both of easements in general, and of particular kinds of easements. n160

Social conditions furthered the development of easement law. Urbanization and progressive enclosure of agricultural land required more precise identification of landowners' respective holdings and rights: "In the days of common fields there was for example no need for many of the rights of way which exist today, for the local population could wander where they wished through the unfenced countryside without causing annoyance or injury, and the modern desire for privacy was hardly known." n161

However, Holdsworth was quick to assure that more law on easements existed than was revealed in Blackstone. n162 It is generally believed that easement law remained in a rudimentary state until early in the 19th century, Charles James Gale wrote his Treatise on the Law of Easements. His depiction of the state of the law of easements has been accepted:

> The difficulties which arise from the abstruseness and refinements incident to the subject, have been increased by the comparatively small number of decided cases affording matter for defining and systematizing this branch of the law. Upon some points, indeed, there is no authority at all in the English law; of the decisions some depend upon the circumstances of the particular case, and some are irreconcilable with each other.
>
> Water-courses are the only class of Easements with regard to which the law has been settled with any degree of precision ...
>
> As in many other branches of the Law of England, the earlier authorities upon the Law of Easements appear to be based upon the Civil Law, modified, in some degree, probably, by a recognition of customs which existed among our Norman ancestors. n163

Before Gale's treatise, easement law was largely reflective of the law of profits. That an easement was the right to use the land of another and a profit the right to take something of value from the land of another required few distinctions in applying the pertinent rules of law. But during the 19th century some important principles of easement law were settled. In 1868 it was declared that no easement could be in gross. n164 It had earlier been held that an appurtenant easement could be used only for purposes connected with the dominant tenement. n165 Easements were considered perpetual, n166 but inasmuch as the rules against perpetuities were being refined in the 19th century, easements as perpetual charges or encumbrances on the land came to be sharply limited. Thus in 1833 an English judge announced that "incidents of a novel kind cannot be devised, and attached to property, at the fancy and caprice of the owner...." n167

This well-known reluctance of English judges to approve new kinds of easements was not directed at affirmative easements. In addition to rights of way, the most common of the affirmative easements, Gale's treatise lists 28 other varieties of affirmative easements that have been judicially approved. n168

As to negative easements, however, he wrote only the following:

> The principal negative easements are:
>
> Right to receive light by ancient apertures.
>
> Right to receive air by a defined channel.
>
> Right to support for buildings from land; or from buildings.
>
> Right to receive a flow of water in an artificial stream. n169

During the 19th century, English courts approved no new types of negative easements, and, indeed it is commonly believed that "the English courts in the nineteenth century called a halt to the creation of negative easements other than the four traditional kinds." n170 A modern English property treatise proclaims that "the list of easements is not closed." n171 However, it also asserts that there are limits, expressed in > the overriding principle that the various kinds of proprietary interests are fixed by law, and finite in number. Even though the list of easements is not closed, it is not open to interests which do not conform to the rules about the general nature of easements. For example, a right to an unspoilt view or a right to put out pleasure boats on a lake cannot exist as an easement. Nor can the right to have the wall of a house protected from weather by an adjoining house, as contrasted with a right of support which is a well-recognised easement and which often exists in favor of semi-detached houses. n172

Indirectly, this passage of commentary on modern law suggests that no new negative easements are likely to be approved in English jurisprudence.

§ 5.04(g)(4) Licenses.

A license is by definition not a right in property n173 and was early defined as a revocable permission to commit some act that would otherwise be considered unlawful. n174 When, in the 19th century, the revocability of a license coupled with the grant of an interest was contested, n175 some licenses were held to be irrevocable. Irrevocable licenses were then in some cases elevated into property rights, binding not only on the immediate parties to the license, but also on their successors in interest. n176

§ 5.04(g)(5) Covenants.

§ 5.04(g)(5)(i) Real Covenants.

A covenant has been traditionally distinguished from an easement as binding only the actual parties to the covenant, whereas an easement pertains to whoever owns the dominant and servient tenements. However, even in the Middle Ages it was recognized that some covenants were so annexed to the land that they could be enforced by anyone who held that estate in land, although the enforcing party had to hold the same estate as the original covenantee. These covenants, therefore, ran with the estate, and not with the land. n177

Early covenants probably arose in connection with express warranties attached to medieval conveyances. A feoffee would include in the deed warranties that no claim would be made by heirs or others; such warranties were in effect covenants attached to the estate in land being conveyed. In the 16th and 17th centuries the warranties were transformed into covenants for title, and rules as to the running of covenant benefits and burdens were worked out:

> [A]s early as 1401 it was recognized that the assign [of the benefit] must, to enable him to sue, have the land to which the covenant was annexed ... Hence we get the modern rule that the benefit of covenants made with the purchaser of land will, if they relate to land, run with that purchaser's estate in the land, that is they can be enforced by successive tenants of that estate. It was partly this settlement of modern rule as to the conditions under which the benefit of covenants will run with the estate in the land, and partly the convenience of the procedure available to enforce a warranty, which has led to the substitution of the modern covenants for title for the old warranties express or implied. In the course of the 16th and 17th centuries covenants for seisin, for the right to convey, for quiet enjoyment, for freedom from incumbrances, and for further assurance, became usual covenants on a conveyance of land. They are at the present day by far the commonest class of covenants, the benefit of which runs with the estate in land. n178

As to the running of covenant burdens, Bracton expressed the view that the burden of a warranty could pass to the grantee of the land, n179 but in fact the matter remained unsettled until almost modern times. In a 13th-century case it was stated that "No one can bind his assigns to warranty, because the burden of warranty always extends only to heirs who claim by succession, and not to those who claim by assignment." n180 Coke noted that covenant benefits could be annexed to land, but said nothing about covenant burdens being annexed to land. Finally, in 1885 the matter was settled in a decision that the burden of covenants relating to the land could not run with the land:

> I am not prepared to say that any covenant which imposes a burden upon land does run with the land, unless the covenant does, upon the true construction of the deed containing the covenant, amount to either a grant of an easement, or a rent charge, or some estate or interest in the land. n181

One additional aspect of the question about whether covenant burdens would run with the land was whether covenant burdens would run to a reversioner. Very little medieval authority on the question is known, but what there is suggests that neither benefits nor burdens of covenants would run with the reversion. A statute of 1540 dealing with reversions following gifts for life or for years contained a preamble reciting an apparent common law prohibition against covenant benefits and burdens running: n182 "no stranger to any covenant ... shall take any advantage or benefit of the same...." n183 The effect of the statute itself, however, was to permit both benefits and burdens to run with respect to reversions of leases for life or years arising from royal grants. Subsequent case authority was deeply split on the larger question of covenants running. n184

Not until Spencer's Case in 1583 n185 was it clarified as to which covenants the statute should apply:

> If the covenant touched or concerned the estate in the land demised or something actually on it, not only the benefit, but also the burden of it, ran with that estate. Probably the rule that the burden ran with the estate in land as well as the benefit, was due to considerations of convenience, and was perhaps new law ... If, however, the covenant related to something to be newly done on the land demised there was nothing in being to which the covenant could be annexed ... the benefit and burden of such covenants would only run with the estate in the land if assigns were named; and, though this rule has been criticized, it is still the law ... The same principles as were applied to covenants running with the land were applied to covenants running with the reversion, by the resolution that the statute of 1540 extended "to covenants which touch or concern the thing demised and not to collateral covenants." n186

As subsequent cases continued to work out covenant law, it was held that the original lessee and covenantor would continue to be liable on the covenant even after assignment, n187 and that the liability of an assignee of the land is not personal, but ends when tenure of the land ends. n188

§ 5.04(g)(5)(ii) Equitable Servitudes.

The running of covenants in equity did not occur until the famous decision in the 1848 case of Tulk v. Moxhay. n189 By the time of that case it had been well established in English law that the running of covenants related to land ("real covenants") was significantly restricted and that burdens did not run at all in covenants that were part of a conveyance in fee. In just such a conveyance, the court in Tulk held that the burden of a covenant therefore unenforceable against an assignee at law could be enforced against the assignee in equity if the assignee had notice of the covenant. Eventually most English courts accepted the notion that such a covenant imposed an equitable servitude on the land itself, rather than merely on an owner with notice, under a contract theory. n190

§ 5.04(h) Mortgages.

It was pointed out in the preceding chapter n191 that during the 15th or 16th century, the form of mortgage shifted from an enfeoffment on condition of defeasance or of re-entry to an enfeoffment with a covenant for reconveyance upon timely repayment of the debt, the so-called classical common law mortgage. This form of mortgage increased greatly in popularity during the 16th century, when the Chancellor began specifically enforcing the covenant of reconveyance rather than just granting money damages for breach. In time, a power of sale was recognized in the mortgagee who had not been paid, but even with this and other protections, mortgagees even into the mid-17th century were still frequently taking possession of the property.

An alternative to the classical common law mortgage, that eventually overtook it in popularity, was the grant of a long-term lease to the mortgagee. These long-term leaseholds had several variants. A mortgagor might grant a leasehold of 500 years with a provision that the mortgagor could retain possession until default occurred, if at all. The lease would become void upon repayment. Or the mortgagee might grant a sublease back to the mortgagor with a provision that the sublease would be void if default occurred. During the 17th and 18th centuries mortgages by lease were perhaps more popular than the classical form of mortgage. Besides being applicable to both freeholds and leaseholds, they created a chattel interest in the mortgagee which upon death passed to the mortgagee's heirs, the persons most likely entitled to the debt repayment. However, the fee simple reversion left in the mortgagor, even after default, was inconvenient and this form of mortgage was little used after the 18th century. n192

Protections for mortgagors also emerged. At the beginning of the 17th century, equity courts began intervening to provide relief against remedies in the nature of a penalty and against terms that were usurious. If a mortgagee had been effectively repaid from the rents and profits of possession, the mortgagor was given an equitable remedy. n193 Equity intervened if the mortgagor repaid the debt on time but the mortgagee refused to reconvey. n194 The equity of redemption, allowing mortgagors who defaulted an opportunity to redeem the land upon payment of the debt and expenses, was allowed as early as 1594 n195 and is mentioned in a case in 1612. n196 These early cases developed the rule that redemption could be granted upon special hardship, but even this requirement was dropped by 1625. n197 The relief of equity of redemption produced a countering remedy of foreclosure for mortgagees, first mentioned in a case in 1629. n198 The equity of redemption eventually took on a life of its own and became a separate species of property, subject even to being entailed in equity. n199

> An equity of redemption is considered an estate in land; it will descend, may be granted, devised, entailed, and that equitable estate may be barred by a common recovery. This proves that it is not considered as a mere right, but as such an estate whereof, in the consideration of this court, there may be a seisin, for without such a seisin, a devise could not be good. n200

This was part of a larger movement to perceive the mortgage transaction in land as one for security rather than strictly as a conveyance:

> By the end of the seventeenth century this new conception of the mortgage had become established, and a long line of cases begins, some defending it against attempts to "clog the equity", and others settling the rights of successive mortgagees, a complication which now became possible under the new view of the mortgage. We already find early seventeenth-century cases on consolidation and tacking, subjects whose elaboration was the special mission of the eighteenth-century Chancellors. n201

Now mortgagors customarily remained in possession of the land until default, n202 and mortgagees in possession became strictly accountable for profits of the land during their possession. Mortgages began to include express powers of sale in order to free land from the equity of redemption. n203 These arrangements for mortgagors and mortgagees remained in effect until the reforms introduced by the massive property legislation of 1925.

§ 5.04(i) Statutory Reforms.

Statutory reform of archaic common law property doctrines was not significant until the 19th century. In the 17th century, the only two important pieces of legislation were the Statute of Tenures in 1660 n204 and the Statute of Frauds in 1677. n205 The Statute of Frauds, as it related to real property, required writings for conveyances of freeholds, for leaseholds of longer than three years, for devises of real property, for trusts of land, and for contracts to convey interests in land. n206

In the 18th century several attempts were made to establish registries for conveyances, either general or local. Only a few local registries resulted: the West Riding of Yorkshire in 1703, n207 the East Riding of Yorkshire and Kingston-upon-Hull in 1707, Middlesex in 1708, n208 and the North Riding of Yorkshire in 1735. Some defects in common recoveries procedure were corrected in a statute of 1741. n209

The reluctance to embark on the more urgent matters of reform has been attributed to a combination of vested interests in and ignorance of the English property law in effect during the 18th century:

> The resistance to reform arose from a number of factors. There was amongst laymen a reluctance to suggest interference with so incomprehensible a mystery as the law of property, which they could not understand. Until the Commentaries of Blackstone appeared in the 1760s there was no way of acquiring the elements of the law of property, unless one was prepared to become a practitioner. Even amongst the practitioners only a few possessed an extensive grasp of the law, which was essential to any intelligent proposals for reform. Those who did understand the system encouraged the view that it was dangerous or even beyond the wit of man to meddle with so elaborate a structure, upon which the sacred property rights of the people were based. The property-owning classes saw that the system could be made to work, at a price, and realized that the system of primogeniture enshrined in the strict settlement was the very basis of their whole way of life. Even if they were sympathetic to schemes to reduce the expense and delay involved, they were not anxious to interfere with the fundamentals of the law.
>
> In the expense and delay the common run of lawyers had, of course, a vested interest: simple cheap conveyancing and certainty of title do not increase the emoluments of attorneys. n210

In the early 19th century lawyers obtained a legislative monopoly over conveyancing for gain and thus intensified their special interest in maintaining the complex system of conveyances.

Reform momentum did increase in the 19th century, however, and in 1829 Real Property Commissioners were appointed to conduct studies and make recommendations. Their extremely significant reports generated a series of profoundly important legislative reforms. Their first report in 1829 covered inheritance, dower, curtesy, fines, recoveries, prescription, and limitation. The second, in 1830, covered proposals to establish a general registry of deeds and other instruments dealing with land. The third, in 1832, included recommendations for tenures, contingent remainders, future interests, perpetuities, covenants, and limitation of ecclesiastical land rights. The fourth report, in 1833, dealt with will and probate proceedings.

From these reports resulted the Inheritance Act of 1833, n211 the Fines and Recoveries Act of 1833, n212 the Real Property Limitation Act of 1833, n213 abolishing all but three of the real actions, the Dower Act of 1833, n214 the Wills Act of 1837, n215 and the Prescription Act of 1832. n216 The Real Property Act of 1845 n217 enacted some of the reform proposals omitted from legislation of the 1830s. Some procedural aspects of property-related actions were altered by the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 n218 and some minor and incomplete reforms were embodied in the Contingent Remainders Act of 1877. n219

Agitation continued for a system of registration of deeds or titles. A system for voluntary registration of indefeasibly vested titles after examination was introduced by Lord Westbury's Act of 1862, n220 but volunteers were not forthcoming. Then in 1875, Lord Cairns' Act n221 permitted registration for mere possessory titles, but this act, too, was voluntary and generated little interest. Finally the Land Transfer Act of 1897 n222 introduced compulsory registration, but made it immediately applicable only to the County of London and, in 1902, to the City of London. Other localities could request extension of the system to their areas, but none did before legislation in 1925 set up a new but similar system. Compulsory title registration was consistently opposed by the solicitors.

Because so many land occupants were only life tenants of lands held under strict settlement, it became important to expand the freedom of such tenants to deal with their land. A series of enactments made the position of such life tenants more comparable to that of a fee simple owner, "whilst providing that for the purposes of beneficial enjoyment the life tenant remained a limited owner, entitled only to the income of the settled estate, not the capital, and unable freely to alter the beneficial provisions of the settlement." n223 These acts included drainage acts, n224 the Improvement of Land Act in 1864, n225 the Settled Estates Act of 1858, n226 the Settled Land Act of 1877, n227 and the Settled Land Act of 1882. n228

The common law disabilities of married women in dealing with their property, which effectively required the husband's concurrence to make dispositions of the property, were removed by a series of statutes beginning with the Married Women's Property Act of 1882, n229 and continuing with the Married Women's Property Act of 1907, the n230 Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act of 1935 n231 and the Married Women (Restraint upon Anticipation) Act of 1949. n232

> If one excepts the Married Woman's Property Act of 1882, which belongs to the special history of family law, one cannot but be struck by the air of caution which characterizes the nineteenth-century reforming legislation. The legislation was indeed very tender to the rights of property, and there are only a few instances where anything which could be viewed as expropriation, or as direct attacks on freedom of contract, took place. n233

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 74. § 4.05(b)(3)-(7), supra.

(n2)Footnote 75. § 4.07, supra.

(n3)Footnote 76. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 228-229 (4th ed. 2005).

(n4)Footnote 77. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan, Introduction to the Law of Real Property 236 (4th ed. 2005). See also Richard J. Ross, The Memorial Culture of Early Modern English Lawyers: Memory as Keyword, Shelter, and Identity, 1560-1640, 10 Yale J.L. & Human. 229 (1998).

(n5)Footnote 78. 32 Hen. 8, c. 46 (1540).

(n6)Footnote 79. 12 Car. 2, c. 24 (1660).

(n7)Footnote 80. A. W. B. Simpson, A History Of The Land Law 199 (2d Ed. 1986).

(n8)Footnote 81. Michael Harwood, Modern English Land Law 7-8 (2d ed. 1982).

(n9)Footnote 82. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 573 (5th ed. 1956). See Susan Staves, Chattel Property Rules and the Construction of Englishness, 1660-1800, 12 L. & Hist. Rev. 123 (Spring 1994).

(n10)Footnote 83. 6 Edw., c. 11 (1278).

(n11)Footnote 84. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 574 (5th ed. 1956).

(n12)Footnote 85. Id.

(n13)Footnote 86. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 57 (1986).

(n14)Footnote 87. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 60 (1986).

(n15)Footnote 88. Jack Ravensdale, The Domesday Inheritance 62 (1986).

(n16)Footnote 89. 2 The Reports of Sir John Spelman 182 (J. H. Baker ed., Selden Society, vol. 94, 1977).

(n17)Footnote 90. 21 Hen. 8 , c. 15 (1529).

(n18)Footnote 91. 32 Hen. 8 , c. 28 (1540).

(n19)Footnote 92. Lampet's Case, 10 Co. Rep. 46b, 77 Eng. Rep. 994 (1612) ; Manning's Case, 8 Co. Rep. 94b, 77 Eng. Rep. 618 (1609) .

(n20)Footnote 93. See, e.g., Y.B. 21 Hen. 7 , Michaelmas Term, f. 38, pl. 47 (1506).

(n21)Footnote 94. Leighton v. Theed, 1 Ld. Raym. 707 (1702).

(n22)Footnote 95. 2 William Blackstone, Commentaries Ch. 9, Sec. II. 145.

(n23)Footnote 96. Spencer's Case, 5 Co. Rep. 16a, 77 Eng. Rep. 72 (1583) .

(n24)Footnote 97. 32 Hen. 8 , c. 34 (1540).

(n25)Footnote 98. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 251 (2d ed. 1986).

(n26)Footnote 99. R. E. Megarry and H. W. R. Wade, The Law of Real Property 620 (3d ed. 1966).

(n27)Footnote 100. These include the Rent and Mortgage Restrictions Acts of 1920-1939, the Furnished Houses Act of 1946, the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1949, the Housing Repairs and Rents Act of 1954, the Rent Act of 1957, the Rent Act of 1965, the Rent Act of 1968, the Housing Act of 1969, the Housing Finance Act of 1972, the Counter-Inflation Act of 1973, the Rent Act of 1974, the Rent Act of 1977, and the Housing Act of 1980.

(n28)Footnote 101. See Peter Sparkes, Certainty of Leasehold Terms, 109 Law Q. Rev. 93 (1993).

(n29)Footnote 102. Under modern law, a remainder typically may follow only an interest that is less than a fee.

(n30)Footnote 103. Y.B. 32 & 33 Edw. (Rolls Series), 328 (1304).

(n31)Footnote 104. Y.B. 2 Edw. 2, 4 (1390).

(n32)Footnote 105. Y.B. 10 Edw. 3, Michaelmas Term, No. 8 (1336).

(n33)Footnote 106. Colthirst v. Bejushin, 1 Plowden 20, 75 Eng. Rep. 33 (1550) .

(n34)Footnote 107. An example of a repugnant condition would be a series of successive remainders with forfeiture by any remainderman who attempted to alienate the interest, but with the alienee also being the next or only remainderman.

(n35)Footnote 108. Reeve v. Long, 3 Lev. 408 , 1 Salk. 227, 4 Mod. 282, 87 Eng. Rep. 395 (1695) .

(n36)Footnote 109. Saltmarsh v. Redeness, Y.B. 11 Edw. 2, Michaelmas Term, pl. 8 (1317) in Year Books 11 Edward II 1317-18 12 (John P. Collas & William S. Holdsworth eds., Selden Society Vol. 61, Year Book Series vol. 22, 1942). For a discussion on some of the objections to contingent remainders, see A.W.B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 95-96 (2d ed. 1986).

(n37)Footnote 110. Dormer v. Packhurst, 6 Bro. P. C. 351 (1740), upholding Duncomb v. Duncomb, 3 Lev. 437, 83 Eng. Rep. 770 (1697) .

(n38)Footnote 111. Y.B. 24 Edw. 3, 70 no. 9 (1350).

(n39)Footnote 112. Y.B. 40 Edw. 3, f. 9 no. 18 (1366).

(n40)Footnote 113. Shelley's Case, 1 Co. Rep. 88b, 93b, 76 Eng. Rep. 199, 206 (1581) . Simpson has a good discussion of three various applications of the rule, the reasoning behind these applications, and their uses. A.W.B. Simpson, A History of Land Law 96-102 (2d ed. 1986).

(n41)Footnote 114. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 189 (4th ed. 2005).

(n42)Footnote 115. 15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20, § 131 (1925).

(n43)Footnote 116. See, e.g., Ellis v. Page, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 161 (1851) .

(n44)Footnote 117. 52 Hen. 3 , c. 6 (1267).

(n45)Footnote 118. These cases are cited and summarized in Joseph W. Morris, "The Inter Vivos Branch of the Worthier Title Doctrine," 2 Okla. L. Rev. 133, 135-138 (1949).

(n46)Footnote 119. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, § 3 (1833).

(n47)Footnote 120. See examples cited in Richard R. B. Powell, "Determinable Fees," 23 Colum. L. Rev. 207, 212 (1923).

(n48)Footnote 121. 1 Lewis F. Simes & Allan F. Smith, The Law of Future Interests 283, pp. 332-35 (1956).

(n49)Footnote 122. 2 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 17-19, 23-29 (2d ed. 1909).

(n50)Footnote 123. Bracton's Note Book, Nos. 61, 86 (1220).

(n51)Footnote 124. Mary Partington's Case, 10 Co. Rep. 35b (1613). "But in the United States it is generally necessary to include an express provision giving the grantor a right of entry or power to terminate upon breach of the condition in order to create an estate on condition subsequent." Roger A. Cunningham et al., The Law of Property § 3.5, p. 100 (2d. ed. 1993).

(n52)Footnote 125. 1 Lewis M. Simes & Allan F. Smith, The Law of Future Interests § 254, p. 294 (2d ed. 1956).

(n53)Footnote 126. § 4.07(f)(3), supra.

(n54)Footnote 127. Taltarum's Case, Y.B. 12 Edw. 4, Michaelmas Term, f. 14, pl. 16, f. 19, pl. 25, 13 Edw. 4, Michaelmas Term, f. 1, pl. 1 (1472).

(n55)Footnote 128. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 130 (2d ed. 1986).

(n56)Footnote 129. The first reported case in which the court crier appears as the common vouchee is Anon (1538).

(n57)Footnote 130. Capell's Case, 1 Co. Rep. 54a, 61a, 76 Eng. Rep. 121, 134 (1581) .

(n58)Footnote 131. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 134-35 (2d ed. 1986).

(n59)Footnote 132. 4 Hen. 7, c. 24 (1490).

(n60)Footnote 133. Anon, Dyer 2b, 73 Eng. Rep. 7 (1527) .

(n61)Footnote 134. 28 Hen. 8, c. 36 (1536).

(n62)Footnote 135. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, 15, 40 (1833).

(n63)Footnote 136. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 235 (2d ed. 1986).

(n64)Footnote 137. Cf. Stanley Hooper, Peter Thelluson's Will, 147 New L.J. 1046 (1997) (discussing an unusual variation of this concept and the nineteenth century legislation it engendered).

(n65)Footnote 138. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 238 (2d ed. 1986).

(n66)Footnote 139. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 209 (2d ed. 1986).

(n67)Footnote 140. Howard v. Henry Duke of Norfolk, 3 Cas. in Chan. 1, 2 Swans. 454, 36 Eng. Rep. 690 (1681) . Charles J. Reid, Jr., The Seventeenth-Century Revolution in the English Land Law, 43 Clev. St. L. Rev. 261, 268 (1995).

(n68)Footnote 141. Ash v. Gallen, 1 Ch. Cases 114, 22 Eng. Rep. 720 (1668) .

(n69)Footnote 142. Sympson v. Turner, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 383 (1700) .

(n70)Footnote 143. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 206 (2d ed. 1986). Charles J. Reid, Jr., The Seventeenth-Century Revolution in the English Land Law, 43 Clev. St. L. Rev. 281, 288 (1995).

(n71)Footnote 144. Jesse Dukeminier & James E. Krier, Property 233 (2d ed. 1988).

(n72)Footnote 145. Bracton, f. 7.

(n73)Footnote 146. Britton, II, 8 and 9.

(n74)Footnote 147. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 106 (2d ed. 1986).

(n75)Footnote 148. Bracton, f. 53.

(n76)Footnote 149. R. E. Megarry & H. W. R. Wade, The Law of Real Property 786-787 (3d ed. 1966).

(n77)Footnote 150. Britton, II, 23, 3.

(n78)Footnote 151. 3 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 143 (5th ed. 1942).

(n79)Footnote 152. Bracton, f. 222.

(n80)Footnote 153. Bracton, f. 222.

(n81)Footnote 154. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 109-110 (2d ed. 1986).

(n82)Footnote 155. See Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edw. 1, st. 1, c. 46 (1285); Solers v. Parson of Dorstone, Y.B. 11 Edw. 2, Michaelmas Term, pl. 8 (1317), in Year Books 11 Edward II 1317-18 91 (John P. Collas & William S. Holdsworth eds., Selden Society Vol. 61, Year Book Series vol. 22, 1942); Y.B. 27 Edw. 3 (Rolls Series), 353 (1343).

(n83)Footnote 156. Y.B. 22 Hen. 6 , Michaelmas Term, pl. 13, f. 9, at f. 10 (1462).

(n84)Footnote 157. Statute of Merton, 20 Hen. 3 , c. 4 (1235); Statute of Westminster II, 13 Edw., c. 46 (1285).

(n85)Footnote 158. Tyrringham's Case, 4 Co. Rep. 36b, 76 Eng. Rep. 973 (1584) ; Gateward's Case, 6 Co. Rep. 59b, 77 Eng. Rep. 344 (1607) ; Wyat Wyld's Case, 8 Co. Rep. 78b, 77 Eng. Rep. 593 (1610) ; Mellor v. Spateman, 1 Wms. Saund. 339, 343, 85 Eng. Rep. 489, 495 (1669) ; Weekly v. Wildman, 1 Ld. Raym. 405, 91 Eng. Rep. 1169 (1699) .

(n86)Footnote 159. See R. E. Megarry & H. W. R. Wade, The Law of Real Property 818-23 (3d ed. 1966).

(n87)Footnote 160. 7 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 321 (2d ed. 1937).

(n88)Footnote 161. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 262 (2d ed. 1986).

(n89)Footnote 162. Id. at 322, citing Peers v. Lucy, 4 Mod. 355, 362, 87 Eng. Rep. 441, 444 (1695) .

(n90)Footnote 163. Charles James Gale, A Treatise on the Law of Easements vii (Preface to the First Edition) (11th ed. by F. Graham Glover, 1931).

(n91)Footnote 164. Rangeley v. Midland Ry. Co., L. R. 3 Ch., App. 306 (1868).

(n92)Footnote 165. Ackroyd v. Smith, 10 C. B. 164, 138 Eng. Rep. 68 (1850).

(n93)Footnote 166. This principle was suggested as early as the 13th century, Bracton, f. 233a.

(n94)Footnote 167. Keppel v. Bailey, 3 My. & K. 517, 39 Eng. Rep. 1042 (1833) .

(n95)Footnote 168. Charles James Gale, A Treatise on the Law of Easements 28-31 (11th ed. by F. Graham Glover, 1931).

(n96)Footnote 169. Charles James Gale, A Treatise on the Law of Easements 31 (11th ed. by F. Graham Glover, 1931).

(n97)Footnote 170. Jesse Dukeminier & James E. Krier, Property 871-72 (2d ed. 1988).

(n98)Footnote 171. R. E. Megarry & H. W. R. Wade, The Law of Real Property 807 (3d ed. 1966).

(n99)Footnote 172. R. E. Megarry & H. W. R. Wade, The Law of Real Property 807-08 (3d ed. 1966).

(n100)Footnote 173. Y.B. 20 Edw. 4, Trinity Term, pl. 2, f. 4.

(n101)Footnote 174. Thomas v. Sorrel, Vaughan 330, 124 Eng. Rep. 1098 (1674) .

(n102)Footnote 175. Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 M. & W. 838, 153 Eng. Rep. 351 (1845) .

(n103)Footnote 176. See, e.g., Errington v. Errington, 1 K. B. 290 (1952).

(n104)Footnote 177. 3 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 158 (5th ed. 1942).

(n105)Footnote 178. 3 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 162-63 (5th ed. 1942).

(n106)Footnote 179. Bracton, ff. 382, 382b.

(n107)Footnote 180. Y.B. 32, 33 Ed. 1 (R.S.) 516.

(n108)Footnote 181. Lindley, L.J., in Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham, 29 C. D. 750, 781 (1885).

(n109)Footnote 182. The statute was passed on the occasion of the dissolution of the monasteries, which resulted in transfers of many reversionary interests. The words prohibiting running of covenants are found in the preamble, concerning which Holdsworth remarked, > it is clear that some of the statements in the preamble are too wide, as they would negative the possibility of any covenant running, not only with the reversion, but also with the land; and, as we have seen from the preamble to the statute of Uses, we cannot place very much reliance on the preambles to the Tudor statutes.

7 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 288 (2d ed. 1937).

(n110)Footnote 183. 32 Hen. 8 , c. 34, preamble:

Where before this time divers, as well temporal as ecclesiastical and religious persons, have made sundry leases, demises and grants to divers other persons, of sundry manors, lordships, ferms, meases, lands, tenements, meadows, pastures, or other hereditaments, for term of life or lives, or for term of years, by writing under their seal or seals, containing certain conditions, covenants and agreements to be performed, as well on the part and behalf of the said lessees and grantees, their executors and assigns, as on the behalf of the said lessors and grantors, their heirs and successors; (2) and forasmuch as by the common law of this realm, no stranger to any covenant, action or condition, shall take any advantage or benefit of the same, by any means or ways in the law, but only such as be parties or privies thereunto, by the reason whereof, as well all grantees of reversions ... be excluded to have any entry or action against the said lessees and grantees, their executors or assigns, which the lessors before that time might by the law have had against the same lessees for the breach of any condition, covenant or agreement comprised in the indenture of their said leases, demises and grants...

(n111)Footnote 184. Holding that covenants did not run with reversions, see Barker v. Damer, 3 Mod. 336, 338, 87 Eng. Rep. 223, 224 (1691) ; Thursby v. Plant, 1 Wms. Saund. 230, 237, 85 Eng. Rep. 254, 268 (1669) . To the contrary, see Attoe v. Mennings, 2 Bulstr. 281, 80 Eng. Rep. 1123 (1613) ; Harper v. Burgh, 2 Lev. 206, 83 Eng. Rep. 521 (1677) ; Vyvyan v. Arthur, 1 B. & C. 410, 107 Eng. Rep. 152 (1823) .

(n112)Footnote 185. Spencer's Case, 5 Co. Rep. 16a, 77 Eng. Rep. 72 (1583) .

(n113)Footnote 186. 7 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 289-90 (2d ed. 1937).

(n114)Footnote 187. Walker's Case, 3 Co. Rep. 22a, 76 Eng. Rep. 676 (1587); Thursby v. Plant, 1 Wms. Saund. 230, 237, 85 Eng. Rep. 254, 268 (1669) ; Barnard v. Goodschall, Cro. Jac. 309, 79 Eng. Rep. 264 (1613) ; Bachelour v. Gage, Cro. Car. 188, 79 Eng. Rep. 765 (1631) ; Brett v. Cumberland, Cro. Jac. 521, 79 Eng. Rep. 446 (1617) .

(n115)Footnote 188. Pitcher v. Tovey, 1 Salk. 81, 91 Eng. Rep. 76 (1693) .

(n116)Footnote 189. Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774, 41 Eng. Rep. 1143 (1848) .

(n117)Footnote 190. London County Council v. Allen, 3 K. B. 642 (C.A.) (1914); David J. Hayton, "Restrictive Covenants as Property Interests," 87 Law Q. Rev. 539 (1971).

(n118)Footnote 191. At § 4.06(h)(3), supra.

(n119)Footnote 192. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 242-43 (2d ed. 1986).

(n120)Footnote 193. Holman v. Vaux, Tothill 133 (c. 1616); Bodenham v. Halle (1456), in Select Cases in Chancery A.D. 1364-1471 137 (William Paley Baildon ed., Selden Society, Vol. 10 (1896)).

(n121)Footnote 194. Y.B. 9 Edw. 4, Trinity Term, f. 25, pl. 34.

(n122)Footnote 195. Langford v. Barnard, Tothill 134 (1594).

(n123)Footnote 196. Hanmer v. Lochard, Tothill 132 (1612).

(n124)Footnote 197. Emmanuel College v. Evans, 1 Ch. Rep. 18 (1625).

(n125)Footnote 198. How v. Vigures, 1 Ch. Rep. 32, 21 Eng. Rep. 499 (1629).

(n126)Footnote 199. Roscarrick v. Barton, 1 Ch. Cas. 217, 22 Eng. Rep. 767 (1673) .

(n127)Footnote 200. Casborne v. Scarfe, 1 Atk. 598, 26 Eng. Rep. 377 (1737) .

(n128)Footnote 201. Theodore F. T. Plucknett, A Concise History of the Common Law 690 (5th ed. 1956).

(n129)Footnote 202. Stone v. Grubham, 2 Bulstrode 225, 80 Eng. Rep. 1079 (1615) .

(n130)Footnote 203. Tucker v. Wilson, 1 P. Wms. 261, 24 Eng. Rep. 379 (1714) .

(n131)Footnote 204. 12 Car. 2, c. 24 (1660).

(n132)Footnote 205. 29 Car. 2, c. 23 (1677).

(n133)Footnote 206. The requirement of a writing for real estate contracts was countered by the emergence of the equitable doctrine that part performance of the contract could overcome the absence of a writing.

(n134)Footnote 207. 2 & 3 Anne, c. 4 (1703).

(n135)Footnote 208. 7 Anne, c. 20 (1708).

(n136)Footnote 209. 14 Geo. 2 , c. 20 (1741).

(n137)Footnote 210. A. W. B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 272-73 (2d ed. 1986).

(n138)Footnote 211. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106 (1833).

(n139)Footnote 212. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 714 (1833).

(n140)Footnote 213. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27 (1833).

(n141)Footnote 214. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 105 (1833).

(n142)Footnote 215. 7 Will. 4 and 1 Vict., c. 26 (1837).

(n143)Footnote 216. 2 & 3. Will. 4, c. 71 (1832).

(n144)Footnote 217. 8 & 9 Vict., c. 106 (1845).

(n145)Footnote 218. 15 & 16 Vict., c. 76 (1852).

(n146)Footnote 219. 40 & 41 Vict., c. 33 (1877).

(n147)Footnote 220. 25 & 26 Vict., c. 53 (1862).

(n148)Footnote 221. 38 & 39 Vict., c. 87 (1875).

(n149)Footnote 222. 60 & 61 Vict., c. 65 (1897).

(n150)Footnote 223. A.W.B. Simpson, A History of the Land Law 284 (2d ed. 1986).

(n151)Footnote 224. Settled Lands Act, 3 & 4 Vict., c. 55 (1840); Settled Estates Act, 8 & 9 Vict., c. 56 (1845).

(n152)Footnote 225. 27 & 28 Vict., c. 114 (1864).

(n153)Footnote 226. 21 & 22 Vict., c. 77 (1858).

(n154)Footnote 227. 40 & 41 Vict., c. 18 (1877).

(n155)Footnote 228. 45 & 46 Vict., c. 38 (1882).

(n156)Footnote 229. 45 & 46 Vict., c. 75 (1882).

(n157)Footnote 230. 7 Edw. 7, c. 18 (1907).

(n158)Footnote 231. 25 & 26 Geo. 6 , c. 30 (1935).

(n159)Footnote 232. 12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6 , c. 78 (1949).

(n160)Footnote 233. See also 15 William Holdsworth, A History of English Law 176-192 (1965).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 5.05

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 5.05 Twentieth-Century Reforms in English Land Law.

The spirit of reform mildly but persistently in evidence during the 19th century carried into and gained momentum during the 20th century. During the first quarter of the 20th century the English Parliament culminated an extensive period of law reform by enactment of the Property Acts of 1925, consisting of several statutory components: the unrepealed portions of earlier reform acts, especially of the Law of Property Act of 1922 n234 and the Law of Property (Amendment) Act of 1924; n235 the Settled Land Act of 1925; n236 the Trustee Act of 1925; n237 the Law of Property Act of 1925; n238 the Land Registration Act of 1925; n239 the Land Charges Act of 1925; n240 and the Administration of Estates Act of 1925. n241 Since 1925, specific areas of property law have also been subject to reform statutes, including, among others, the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act, n242 the Law of Property (Joint Tenants) Act, n243 the Matrimonial Homes Act, n244 the Leasehold Reform Act, n245 another Law of Property Act, n246 the Charging Orders Act, n247 and the Limitation Act. n248 Particularly during the twentieth century, English land law reforms have been characterized by increasing governmental regulation to achieve public benefits or protections at the expense of purely private interests. n249

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 234. 12 & 13 Geo. 5 , c. 16; Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 5.

(n2)Footnote 235. 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 5.

(n3)Footnote 236. 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 18.

(n4)Footnote 237. 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 19.

(n5)Footnote 238. 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 20.

(n6)Footnote 239. 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 21.

(n7)Footnote 240. 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 22, later replaced by the Land Charges Act of 1972, c. 61.

(n8)Footnote 241. 15 & 16 Geo. 5 , c. 23.

(n9)Footnote 242. 1964, c. 55.

(n10)Footnote 243. 1964, c. 63.

(n11)Footnote 244. 1967, c. 75.

(n12)Footnote 245. 1967, c. 88.

(n13)Footnote 246. 1969, c. 59.

(n14)Footnote 247. 1979, c. 53.

(n15)Footnote 248. 1980, c. 24

(n16)Footnote 249. See David A. Thomas, British and American Real Property Law and Practice: A Contemporary Comparison, 34 Real Property, Probate And Trust Journal 443 (Fall 1999) (Part III of the series Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 5.06

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 5.06 Bibliography.

[Go To Supp]

Books

J. Stuart Anderson. Lawyers and the Making of English Land Law, 1832-1940. (Oxford University Press, 1992).

Bean, J.M.W., The Decline of English Feudalism 1215-1540 (1968).

Bennett, Henry Stanley. Life on the English Manor: a Study of Peasant Conditions, 1150-1400 (1971).

Biancalana, Joseph. The Fee Tail and Common Recovery in Medieval England. (Cambridge University Press, 2001).

Blair, John. Early Medieval Surrey: Landholding, Church and Settlement Before 1300 (1991).

Blount, T. Tenures of Land and Customs of Manors (1679).

Brown, R. Allen. Origins of English Feudalism.

Byrne, Joseph Patrick. Daily Life During the Black Death (2006).

Cairn, John W. and Grant McLeod (eds.). The Dearest Birth Right of the People of England: The Jury in the History of the Common Law (2002).

Dalrymple, John, Sir. An Essay Towards a General History of Feudal Property in Great Britain (1758).

Digby, K.E. An Introduction to the History of the Law of Real Property with Original Authorities (1897).

Fleming, Robin. Domesday Book and the Law: Society and Legal Custom in Early Medieval England (Cambridge University Press, 1998).

Fustel de Coulanges. The Origin of Property in Land (1927).

Helmholz, R. H. Marriage Litigation in Medieval England (1974).

Hudson, John. Land, Law and Lordship in Anglo-Norman England. (Oxford University Press, 1997).

Hudson, John. The Formation of the English Common Law: Law and Society in England from the Norman Conquest to Magna Carta (1996).

Jessel, Christopher. The Law of the Manor (1998).

Jewell, Helen. M. Women in Late Medieval and Reformation Europe, 1200-1550 (2007).

John, E. Land Tenure in Early England (1960).

Keeton, George W. The Norman Conquest and the Common Law (1966).

Larson, P. L. Conflict and Compromise in the Late Medieval Countryside: Lords and Peasants in Durham, 1349-1400 (2006).

Littleton, Thomas, Sir. Lyttleton, His Treatise of Tenures (1841).

Lobban, Michael. The Common Law and English Jurisprudence, 1760-1850 (1991).

Marvin, William Perry. Hunting Law and Ritual in Medieval English Literature (2006).

MsSheffrey, Shannon. Marriage, Sex, and Civil Culture in Late Medieval London (2006).

Milsom, S. F. C. A Natural History of the Common Law (2003).

Milsom, S. F. C. The Legal Framework of English Feudalism: the Maitland Lectures Given in 1972 (1976).

Mulder-Bakker and Jocelyn Wogan-Browne (eds.). Household, Women, and Christianities In Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages (2006).

Nelson, William. Lex Maneriorum: Or, the Law and Customs of England, Relating to Manors and Lords of Manors, Their Stewards, Deputies, Tenants, and Others the Whole Being a Methodical Collection of the Cases Dispersed in the Several Volumes of the Law Relating to Copyhold Estates, and to Every Thing Depending on That Tenure. To Which Is Added, an Appendix of All the Modern Entries of Declarations, Pleas Demurrers, Issues, Special Verdicts, Writs of Recordari, Certiorari, C., Relating to the Said Cases. (1726).

Noy, William. The Principal Grounds and Maxims: with an Analysis; and a Dialogue and Treatise of the Laws of England; and on Tenures, Estates, Heridataments, and Chattels, Real and Personal; and in What Manner They May Be Recovered and Conveyed (1821).

Petersen, Craig A. The Evolution of Tenures in England (1983).

Raftis, J. A. Peasant Economic Development Within the English Manorial System (1996).

Razi, Zvi. Medieval Society and the Manor Court (1996).

Simpson, A. W. B. (Alfred William Brian). A History of the Land Law (2d ed. 1986).

Simpson, Stanhope Rowton. Land Law and Registration (1976).

Tabuteau, Emily Zack. Ralph v. Turner, Judges, Administrators and the Common Law in Angevin England (1994).

Thomas, David A. "Common Law Under the Early Normans," 1986 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 109 (Part III in the series Origins of the Common Law).

Vinogradoff, Paul, Sir. The Growth of the Manor (1920).

Webb, Sidney. The Manor and the Borough (1963).

Wright, Nancy E., Margaret W. Ferguson and A.R. Buck (eds.). Women, Property, and the Letters of the Law in Early Modern England (2004).

Articles

Becker, David M. "Eroding the Common Law Paradigm for Creation of Property Interests and the Hidden Cost of Law Reform," 83 Wash. U. L.Q. 773 (2005).

Boyle, James. The Second Enclosure Movement and the Construction of the Public Domain, 6 Law & Contemp. Probs. 33 (Winter/Spring 2003).

Briggs, Chris. "Manor Court Procedures, Debt Litigation Levels, and Rural Credit Provision in England, C. 1290-1380," 24 Law & Hist. Rev. 519 (Fall, 2006).

Gallanis, T. P. The Future of Future Interests, 60 Wash. & Lee L. Rev. 513 (Spring, 2003).

Hulsebosch, Daniel J. The Ancient Constitution and the Expanding Empire: Sir Edward Coke's British Jurisprudence, 21 Law & Hist. Rev. 439 (Fall, 2003).

Lund, Thomas. "Some Interesting Medieval Dower Cases," 37 U. Tol. L. Rev. 659 (Spring 2006).

Miles, Maria Funk. "The Value of a Woman: A Comparison of the Laws and the Traditions of Divorce in Medieval Europe and Modern America," 15 UCLA Women's L.J. 139 (Fall 2006).

Orth, John V. The Mystery of the Rule in Shelley's Case, 7 Green Bag 2d 45 (Autumn, 2003).

Senn, Mark A. English Life and Law in the Time of the Black Death, 38 Real Prop., Prob. and Trust J. 507 (Fall, 2003).

Siedel, George J. For Sale: The Manorial System, 68 A.B.A. J. 442 (1982).

Silberbogen, Rebecca E. "Does the Dissolution of Covenant Marriages Mirror Common Law England's Subordination of Women?" 5 Wm. & Mary J. Women & L. 207 (Winter, 1998).

Thomas, David A. Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History--Part I: The Shared

History, 34 Real Prop., Prob. and Trust J. 143 (Spring, 1999).

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Supp. To CHAPTER 5 ENGLISH PROPERTY LAW AFTER THE MIDDLE AGES

1-5 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Supp. to § 5.06

Supp. to § 5.06 Bibliography

[Go To Main]

Books

add

Bonfield, Lloyd (ed). Marriage, Property and Succession (1992) (see especially chapter by Lloyd Bonfield, "Property Settlements on Marriage in England from the Anglo-Saxons to the Mid-Eighteenth Century").

Cross, Lord, or Chelsea and G. J. Hands (eds.). The English Legal System (5th ed. 1971).

Griffin, Emma. Blood Sport: Hunting in Britain Since 1066 6 (2007).

Pocock, J. G. A. The Ancient Constitution and Feudal Law (rev. ed. 1987).

Thomas, Hugh M. The Norman Conquest: England After William the Conqueror (2008).

Articles

add:

Clark, Christine G. "Women's Rights in Early England," 1995 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 207.

Crosswhite, Anastasia. "Women and Land: Aristocratic Ownership of Property in Early Modern England," 77 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1119 (October, 2002).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions 6.syn

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.syn Synopsis to Chapter 6: DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

§ 6.01 Introduction to the Chapter.

§ 6.02 Development of Property Law in Virginia (from 1607).

§ 6.02(a) The Charter of 1606.

§ 6.02(b) The Charter of 1609.

§ 6.02(c) The Charter of 1612.

§ 6.02(d) Introduction of Private Landholding.

§ 6.02(e) The Spread of Private Landholding.

§ 6.02(f) Tenancy in Land.

§ 6.02(g) Land Grants to Private Societies.

§ 6.02(h) Summary of How Private Landholding Progressed.

§ 6.02(i) Changes in Governance Affecting Private Landholding.

§ 6.02(j) The Influence of English Common Law on Landholding.

§ 6.02(j)(1) Adoption of English Common Law in Virginia.

§ 6.02(j)(2) Regulation of Attorneys.

§ 6.02(k) Virginia Landholding During the Later Colonial Period.

§ 6.02(k)(1) Early Legislative Provisions Concerning Land.

§ 6.02(k)(2) Quit rents in Virginia.

§ 6.02(k)(3) Impact of Landholding Practices on Virginia Society.

§ 6.03 Development of Property Law in Massachusetts (from 1620).

§ 6.03(a) The Plymouth Colony.

§ 6.03(a)(1) Origins of the Pilgrims.

§ 6.03(a)(2) The Legal Beginnings of Plymouth Colony.

§ 6.03(a)(3) Early Landholding in Plymouth.

§ 6.03(a)(4) The Foundation of English Land Law in Plymouth.

§ 6.03(b) The Massachusetts Bay Colony.

§ 6.03(b)(1) Events Leading to the First Charter.

§ 6.03(b)(2) Early Landholding in Massachusetts Bay.

§ 6.03(b)(3) The Role of Towns in New England Private Landholding.

§ 6.03(b)(4) Property Regulation and Codification of Laws in Massachusetts Bay.

§ 6.04 Development of Property Law in New Hampshire (from 1623).

§ 6.04(a) Legal Origins of the Earliest Settlements.

§ 6.04(b) Landholding Rights in the Earliest Settlements.

§ 6.04(c) Landholding Rights After Massachusetts Assumed Control.

§ 6.04(d) Landholding Rights After Becoming a Royal Province.

§ 6.04(e) Land Distribution Practices in the Local Communities.

§ 6.04(f) New Hampshire's Earliest Published Laws.

§ 6.05 Development of Property Law in New York (from 1624).

§ 6.05(a) The Dutch West India Company Charter of 1623.

§ 6.05(b) The Charter of Privileges to Patroons of 1629.

§ 6.05(c) Conflicts Between Company and Patroon Landholding.

§ 6.05(d) Early Incursions by English Settlers.

§ 6.05(e) Landholding After the English Takeover in 1664.

§ 6.05(e)(1) The 1664 Patent to the Duke of York.

§ 6.05(e)(2) The "Duke's Law" of 1665.

§ 6.05(e)(3) The Second Grant to the Duke of York in 1674.

§ 6.05(e)(4) Additional Land Legislation After 1691.

§ 6.05(f) Summary of Landholding Arrangements in Colonial New York.

§ 6.05(f)(1) Land Grants.

§ 6.05(f)(2) Leases and Quit Rents.

§ 6.06 Development of Property Law in Connecticut (from 1633).

§ 6.06(a) The Founding of the Connecticut River Towns.

§ 6.06(a)(1) Settlement from Massachusetts.

§ 6.06(a)(2) Warwick Patent of 1631.

§ 6.06(a)(3) Confrontation with the Dutch.

§ 6.06(a)(4) Migration Under Massachusetts' Jurisdiction.

§ 6.06(a)(5) Self-government Under the 1639 Fundamental Orders.

§ 6.06(b) The Founding of the New Haven Colony.

§ 6.06(c) Property-related Legislation in Early Connecticut.

§ 6.06(c)(1) Connecticut Code of 1650.

§ 6.06(c)(2) New Haven Laws of 1656.

§ 6.06(c)(3) The Royal Charter of 1662 and Unification of Connecticut and New Haven Colonies.

§ 6.06(c)(4) Connecticut Laws of 1673.

§ 6.06(d) Land Distribution and Management in Connecticut.

§ 6.07 Development of Property Law in Maryland (from 1634).

§ 6.07(a) The Charter of 1632.

§ 6.07(b) The Proprietor's "Conditions of Plantation."

§ 6.07(c) Later Land Distribution.

§ 6.07(d) Creation and Administration of Manors.

§ 6.07(e) Restriction of Church Rights in Land.

§ 6.07(f) Local Legislative Regulation of Provincial Land Law.

§ 6.07(f)(1) Achievement of Legislative Initiative.

§ 6.07(f)(2) Reception of English Law.

§ 6.07(f)(3) Compilation of Legislative Enactments.

§ 6.07(g) Land Management in Colonial Maryland.

§ 6.08 Development of Property Law in Rhode Island (from 1636).

§ 6.08(a) The Settlement at Providence.

§ 6.08(b) The Settlement at Portsmouth.

§ 6.08(c) The Settlement at Newport.

§ 6.08(d) Newport and Portsmouth United.

§ 6.08(e) The Settlement at Warwick.

§ 6.08(f) The First Charter for the Rhode Island Settlements in 1644.

§ 6.08(g) The Code of 1647.

§ 6.08(h) The Royal Charter of 1663.

§ 6.08(i) Land-related Legislation of the Rhode Island Assembly.

§ 6.08(j) Summary of Land Rights in Colonial Rhode Island.

§ 6.09 Development of Property Law in Delaware (from 1638).

§ 6.09(a) Land Rights in Early Dutch Settlements.

§ 6.09(b) Land Rights in Early Swedish Settlements.

§ 6.09(c) Land Rights in Delaware After the English Conquest of 1664.

§ 6.09(d) Land Rights in Delaware After Coming Under the Governance of Pennsylvania.

§ 6.09(d)(1) Land Grants and Sales.

§ 6.09(d)(2) Quit Rents.

§ 6.09(d)(3) Administration of Land Affairs.

§ 6.09(d)(4) Legislation Relating to Landholding.

§ 6.09(d)(4)(i) Penn's Frame of Government of 1682.

§ 6.09(d)(4)(ii) Laws for the Colony Agreed upon in England.

§ 6.09(d)(4)(iii) The Charter of Privileges of 1683 and 1701.

§ 6.09(d)(4)(iv) Delaware Legislation After 1704.

§ 6.10 Development of Property Law in New Jersey (from 1638).

§ 6.10(a) Early English Grants of New Jersey Land.

§ 6.10(b) First Settlements by the Dutch.

§ 6.10(c) Attempted Colonization by Swedes.

§ 6.10(d) English Take-over in 1664.

§ 6.10(e) Landholding Rights Under the English Proprietors.

§ 6.10(e)(1) Application of The Duke's Law in 1665.

§ 6.10(e)(2) Berkeley and Carteret's 1665 "Concessions and Agreement."

§ 6.10(e)(3) Clarification of Land Rights in 1672.

§ 6.10(f) Division of the Province into East New Jersey and West New Jersey.

§ 6.10(f)(1) Landholding in East New Jersey.

§ 6.10(f)(2) Landholding in West New Jersey.

§ 6.10(f)(2)(i) The 1677 "Concessions and Agreements" for West New Jersey.

§ 6.10(f)(2)(ii) The Ten "Fundamentals" of 1681.

§ 6.10(f)(2)(iii) Later Land Regulations.

§ 6.10(g) Transforming the Proprietary Colonies into a Royal Province.

§ 6.10(h) Instructions to the Royal Governor Pertaining to Land.

§ 6.11 Development of Property Law in Pennsylvania (from 1643).

§ 6.11(a) Early Settlement Activity.

§ 6.11(b) The Commencement of English Rule in 1664.

§ 6.11(b)(1) Application of The Duke's Law in 1665.

§ 6.11(b)(2) Landholding in Pennsylvania Settlements Incident to Growth in Other Colonies.

§ 6.11(c) The Proprietorship of William Penn.

§ 6.11(c)(1) Charter Provisions Relating to Property.

§ 6.11(c)(2) Land Distribution Practices.

§ 6.11(c)(3) Quit Rents.

§ 6.11(c)(4) Administration of Land Affairs.

§ 6.11(c)(5) Legislation Relating to Landholding.

§ 6.11(c)(5)(i) Penn's Frame of Government of 1682.

§ 6.11(c)(5)(ii) Laws for the Colony Agreed upon in England.

§ 6.11(c)(5)(iii) The Charter of Privileges of 1683 and 1701.

§ 6.11(c)(5)(iv) Pennsylvania Landholding Legislation After Circa 1700.

§ 6.11(d) Summary of Landholding Practices in Colonial Pennsylvania.

§ 6.12 Development of Property Law in North Carolina (from 1650).

§ 6.12(a) Property Rights in the Early Colonization Efforts.

§ 6.12(a)(1) Sir Humphrey Gilbert's Charter of 1578.

§ 6.12(a)(2) Sir Walter Raleigh's Charter and the "Lost Colony" at Roanoke Island.

§ 6.12(a)(3) The Early Influence of Virginia.

§ 6.12(b) Property Rights under the Heath Charter of 1629.

§ 6.12(c) Assertion of Virginia Authority in 1662.

§ 6.12(d) The Royal Grant of 1663.

§ 6.12(e) The Proprietors' Concessions and Agreements of 1665.

§ 6.12(e)(1) Introduction of the Concessions into the Settlements.

§ 6.12(e)(2) The Effect of the Concessions on Landholding.

§ 6.12(e)(3) The Great Deed of Grant.

§ 6.12(f) The Charter of 1665.

§ 6.12(g) The Fundamental Constitutions of 1669.

§ 6.12(g)(1) The Feudal Scheme of the Fundamental Constitutions.

§ 6.12(g)(2) Landholding Under the Fundamental Constitutions.

§ 6.12(g)(3) The Demise of the Fundamental Constitutions.

§ 6.12(h) Other Laws of Colonial North Carolina Related to Landholding.

§ 6.13 Development of Property Law in South Carolina (from 1670).

§ 6.13(a) Summary of South Carolina's Early Settlement History Shared with North Carolina.

§ 6.13(b) The Earliest Settlements in South Carolina.

§ 6.13(c) Political Turmoil Centered on Land Issues.

§ 6.13(d) Landholding Issues in the Later Colonial Period.

§ 6.13(e) Colonial Statutes Relating to Landholding.

§ 6.14 Development of Property Law in Georgia (from 1732).

§ 6.14(a) The Charter of 1732.

§ 6.14(b) The Character of the Earliest Georgia Settlers.

§ 6.14(c) The First Settlement at Savannah.

§ 6.14(c)(1) Securing Land Rights from the Indians.

§ 6.14(c)(2) Laying Out the Town.

§ 6.14(d) Conflict Over the Tenure of Early Land Grants.

§ 6.14(e) Controversy Over Quitrents.

§ 6.14(f) Changes in Landholding Patterns.

§ 6.14(g) Landholding in Colonial Georgia Under Royal Administration.

§ 6.14(h) Georgia Colonial Statutes Related to Landholding.

§ 6.15 Bibliography.

Professor David A. Thomas
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.01

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.01 Introduction to the Chapter.

In strict chronological sequence this chapter should fall between Chapter 4 and Chapter 5. In Chapter 4 the progress of English property law is traced to roughly the end of the 16th century, by which time most of the effects of the 1536 Statute of Uses had revealed themselves. Chapter 5 is a discussion of the significant subsequent changes in English property law up to modern times. At about the same time as the chronological division between these two chapters, the English exploration and colonization of North America was just getting underway, and early in the 17th century, the first permanent English settlements began to be established. Therefore, the state of affairs in English property law as described in Chapter 4 provides an appropriate background for understanding the beginnings of property rights in England's earliest American colonies.

In this Chapter, the property law developments in each of the 13 English colonies are examined, up to the time of national independence. Basic American property law developments thereafter, including developments in each of the states, are covered in Chapter 7.

The content of Chapter 6 consists of an independent section for each of the 13 colonies, beginning with the earliest to have permanent European settlements. The transformation of property law described in Chapters 6 and 7 parallels, and may be usefully compared with, the contemporary property law changes in England, as described in Chapter 5. It will, of course, be abundantly evident that developments unique to one country were prompted by forces and circumstances peculiar to that country, despite the shared origins of English and American law.

It is also noteworthy that in the earliest of England's North American colonies, the acclaimed common law of England had little specific influence when the colonists actually had to form rules to govern their everyday affairs, such as working out rights in land. Property arrangements were often a combination of what the colonists had learned from limited firsthand experience in their homelands and of their aspirations for a better society. Only later in the colonial era would the common law of England be routinely held up as the protective shield for English citizens' most important personal and civic rights. n1

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. See Chapter 1, Property Rights in the Colonial Era and Early Republic, in James W. Ely (ed.), Property Rights In American History (Levittown, Penn: Garland Publishing, 1997).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.02

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.02 Development of Property Law in Virginia (from 1607).

§ 6.02(a) The Charter of 1606.

The royal charter that led directly to establishment of Jamestown, Virginia, as the first permanent English settlement in North America was probably drafted in 1606 by the Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir John Popham. Popham's group, which included prominent merchants and other men from London, Bristol and Plymouth, then petitioned King James I for a patent to validate the charter, and letters patent were granted by the king on April 10, 1606.

The charter asserted English sovereignty over a huge area of North America, between 34 and 45 degrees north latitude from coast to coast and one hundred miles into each ocean, all called Virginia. The land granted included all land:

> along the sea coasts, between four and thirty degrees of Northerly latitude from the Equinoctial line, and five and forty degrees of the same latitude, and in the main land between the same four and thirty and five and forty degrees, and the Islands thereunto adjacent, or within one hundred miles of the coasts thereof. n2

With our modern knowledge of North American geography, it is hard to take seriously the magnanimous extent of this grant:

> This tremendous tract included, in addition to the area of the present state of Virginia, in part the states of Maine, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, South Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Oregon, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona; and in their entirety or very nearly their entirety, the states of Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, and California. In short, this vast virginal tract included all or part of each of forty-two of the present fifty states. The territory embraced as well Lake Ontario and Lake Erie and much of Lakes Huron and Michigan. In addition, its boundaries encompassed part of what is today the Canadian province of Ontario. This transcontinental grant stretched approximately two thousand five hundred miles in an eight hundred mile wide belt from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It also extended one > hundred miles into each of those oceans ... n3

This swath, then, ran from Passamaquoddy Bay in Maine to Cape Fear River in North Carolina, and extended from coast to coast. Even contemporaries realized it was a vast tract; witness the comment of Captain John Smith:

> This Virginia is a country in America between the degrees of 34 and 45, of the North latitude. The bounds thereof on the East side are the great Ocean: on the South lyeth Florida: on the North nova Francia: as for the West thereof, the limits are unknowne. n4

The patentees who were from London were authorized to establish a privately funded joint stock company in order to set up a colony anywhere on the coast between 34 and 41 degrees latitude, and to take jurisdiction of a tract 50 miles north and 50 miles south of the settlement and one hundred miles out to sea and one hundred miles inland. This London group was designated the "first colony," while the group from Plymouth and Bristol, called the "second colony," was given similar instructions pertaining to a second joint stock company and a colony in the territory between the 38th and 45th parallels. n5

In each colony a council of thirteen persons was to govern "according to such laws, ordinances, and instructions, as shall be in that behalf, given and signed with our hand or sign manual, and pass under the privy seal of our realm of England." n6 These two colonial councils were made subject to the direction of another council of thirteen, sitting in England, called the Council of Virginia. n7

The charter secured to all persons dwelling or born within the colonies the right of English citizens to "have and enjoy all liberties, franchises, and immunities, within any of our other dominions, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born, within this our realm of England, or any other of our said dominions." n8 Supplemental instructions drafted in November 1606, proclaimed that,:

> for the good government of the people to be planted in those parts, and for the good ordering and disposing of all causes happening within the same, and the same to be done for the substance thereof, as neer to the common lawes of England, and the equity thereof, as may be ... n9

Thus was expressed from the outset a fundamental commitment to a rule of law based on the rules of common law and equity in the English jurisprudence of the time.

The provision for two colonies with potentially overlapping territories (between 38 and 41 degrees latitude), with the injunction that the colonial seats should be at least 100 miles apart, meant that the territory in the middle could be jointly settled, but that the "first colony" would effectively determine the land of joint occupation by selecting its colonial seat first.

For the power over the land itself, the 1606 letters patent, in which James I as grantor assumed the tone of the royal "We," proclaimed with respect to both colonies,:

> And do therefore, for us, our heirs, and successors, grant and agree ... that the patentees shall have all the lands, woods, soil, grounds, havens, ports, rivers, mines, minerals, marshes, waters, fishings, commodities, and hereditaments, whatsoever, [within the boundaries of the colony] ... and that no other of our subjects shall be permitted, or suffered to plant or inhabit behind, or on the backside of them, towards the main land, without the express licence or consent of the council of that colony, thereunto in writing first had and obtained. n10 The grants included several orders for the new settlers. "They shall order the search for gold, silver and copper, giving to us our heirs and successors the one-fifth part of such gold and silver, and one-fifteenth part of all copper found. Authority is granted to capture any persons, ships or goods which shall be trafficking without license within the limits of said plantations.

> Upon petition, we shall grant unto such persons and their heirs and assigns, as either council shall nominate, all the lands and tenaments which shall be within that colony." Alfred N. Chandler, Land Title Origins: A Tale of Force and Fraud 49 (1945).

The patentees were not, however, empowered to make outright grants of land to their settlers. Instead, the colonial council would petition the king for letters patent to individual settlers:

> And finally, we do, for us, our heirs, and successors, grant and agree, to and with the [patentees] ... that we, our heirs, and successors, upon petition in that behalf to be made, shall, by letters, patent under the great seal of England, give and grant unto such persons, their heirs, and assigns, as the council of that colony, or the most part of them, shall, for the purpose nominate and assign, all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which shall be within the precincts limited for that colony, as is aforesaid, to be holden of us, our heirs, and successors as of our manor of East-Greenwich in the county of Kent, in free and common socage only, and not in capite ...
>
> All which lands, tenements, and hereditaments, so to be passed by the said several letters patent, shall be sufficient assurance from the said patentees ... n11

In this language the invoking of and reliance upon the English common law of property is obvious. Nominees for land patents received them directly from the monarch, not as tenants in chief, or in capite, but in the tenure known as free and common socage (with the manorial holding of East Greenwich in Kent as a model). This tenure, evolved from earlier feudalism, has been described earlier in this work as follows: n12

> Any tenure that on the one hand is free and on the other hand is not spiritual, nor military, nor 'serviential,' is called tenure in free socage. n13

Tenure in free socage eventually developed as the one great residual tenancy for almost every arrangement that was not military tenure. It also was free of the most burdensome incidents of military tenure, so that it became the tenancy of choice, even if holding it inferred a relatively lower social status.

The very wide variety of socage tenures arose from several types of circumstances. For instance, a tenant might be bound to render only nominal services or rents to the lord, either because the conveyance might be between related persons, or the grantee had actually purchased the land: "to have put the purchaser in the vendor's place might have been difficult, perhaps impossible [given the restrictions on alienability at the time]; so the purchaser is made tenant to the vendor at an insignificant rent." n14

For some socage tenures a more substantial rent in money or goods or produce was demanded, possibly the result of some bargaining by lords and tenants trying to strike the best deals that economic circumstances would allow. Other socage tenures imposed requirements of ordinary agricultural labor, even if the tenant was an important aristocrat. These duties would have been fulfilled by the socage tenant's undertenants and "seem to be the channel by which the term socage gradually spreads itself." n15

At times it might have been quite natural for a villein able to supply some needed labor services to step up into a socage tenure that was ordinarily open only to free persons. Indeed, some socage tenants were barely distinguishable from the unfree villeins.

At the time of the Virginia patents, the tenure of free and common socage was simply the almost universal "tenure" by which land was held. By this time most tenures themselves were unimportant; only certain revenue-producing tenurial incidents were still protected by their beneficiaries. Half a century later, tenures would be officially abolished in England by legislation. n16

The supplemental instructions of November 20, 1606, added further confirmation that property rights rested on the established rights under the laws of England:

> ... [A]nd moreover wee doe hereby ordaine and establish for us, our heires and successors, that all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments to be had and enjoyed by any of our subjects within the precincts aforesaid, shall be had and inherited and enjoyed, according as in the like estates they be had and enjoyed by the lawes within this realme of England ... n17 n18

The instructions of November 1606, not only contained no express prohibition of private property in land, but indeed suggested that private land grants would be made in the future. However, the joint trading regulations and overall communal rules for the colony were not conducive to private property holdings. For persons other than the patentees, private property rights in Virginia lands did not appear until several years after the initial settlements.

As leaders of a proprietary form of colony, the Virginia patentees had control of the economic and commercial activities of their colonies, and the powers of government rested with the two resident councils subject to the overall direction of the Council of Virginia sitting in London. When the three vessels bearing the first, or London, company's complement of settlers arrived in Virginia in May 1607, the Jamestown site was selected and work began immediately on clearing land and constructing a protective fort and dwellings. The settlers of the second, or Plymouth, company did not arrive until the end of August 1607, and selected a site they called Sagadahoc near the mouth of the Kennebec River, at a latitude of 431/2 degrees. The corporate management of both settlements was identical:

> The colonies which were founded at Sagadahoc and Jamestown were both plantations, owned, officered, and managed by the proprietors or company. The colonists were servants of the company. They were freely transported to Virginia in its vessels, and there worked for the company under prescribed regulations. They were fed and housed out of the products of the total labor of the colony, supplemented by cargoes of provisions received from home. When, if ever, the colony became able to furnish a surplus product, -- lumber, furs, tobacco, --- it was sent home in the vessels of the company and sold for the benefit of the adventurers. n19

The settlement at Sagadahoc started badly and was abandoned a year later. The severe threats to Jamestown's existence, both from internal dissension and from external calamities, are well known and documented. Preoccupation with survival ensured that neither colony, especially under the governance arrangements of the 1606 charter, would expand its affairs beyond the enterprise of a single settlement. n20 Despite the charter's assurance that English rights would be preserved, the corporate management form soon deteriorated into autocratic rule by a few or even by one, and individual property rights were not yet in existence.

§ 6.02(b) The Charter of 1609. n21

Early in 1609 the patentees drafted a new charter, which was approved by James I on May 23, 1609. The main objective of the new charter was to replace the old unworkable system of resident and London-based councils with a hierarchy of individual officers, such as governor and lieutenant governor. Most importantly, under the 1609 charter the king released all but nominal control over the Virginia colonies, leaving governing powers with the patentees of the company. The day-to-day rule was conducted by the resident governor, although he would exercise his powers only "according to such directions" as he received from the company in London.

The charter of 1609 required continuation of the plantation system, by which the colonists worked in groups under various officials as overseers. The workers were to live in common quarters and take their meals all together.

With respect to property rights, the 1609 charter reconfirmed that the patentees were authorized to acquire such rights after first obtaining royal permission:

> And that [the patentees] and their successors, shall be, from henceforth, forever enabled to take, acquire and purchase, by the name aforesaid (license for the same, from us, our heirs or successors, first had and obtained) any manner of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, goods and chattels, within our realm of England, and dominion of Wales. n22

The 1609 charter also confirmed that such property rights were the rights recognized under existing English law, although this time an additional form of consideration was exacted, one-fifth of the yield of any gold and silver mines:

> [The patentees] are to have and to hold, possess and enjoy, all and singular the said lands, countries and territories, with all and singular other premises, heretofore by these presents granted, or mentioned to be granted ...; to the sole and proper use of [the patentees], their successors and assigns for ever; to be holden of us, our heirs, and successors, as of our manour of East Greenwich, in free and common socage, and not in capite; yielding and paying, therefore, to us, our heirs, and successors, the fifth part only of all ore of gold and silver, that from time to time, and at all times hereafter, shall be there gotten, had, or obtained for all manner of services. n23

Property rights previously granted were ratified, except that the northern boundary of the territory open to Virginia Company colonization was shifted back from the 41st to the 40th parallel. n24

The new charter stimulated a new interest in Jamestown, and more colonists and supplies were shipped to succor the struggling settlement. By the time these arrived in the summer of 1609, however, Jamestown was nearly dead; fewer than one-third of all previous colonists there were still alive. Conditions grew even worse. The 100 survivors and 400 new arrivals were wracked by starvation and disease throughout the next winter, so that only about 60 of the 500 survived to the summer of 1610. On June 17, 1610, they had abandoned Jamestown and boarded ship back to England when they met the new governor upon his arrival, who had them disembark and start anew.

The new governing arrangements authorized by the 1609 charter were more fully installed in 1610. The following year, in 1611, even a law code was prepared, the "Lawes and Orders, Divine, Politique, and Martiall, for the Colony of Virginia," n25 for up to this time no written laws had existed in the colony:

> According to this code, freedom of action within the colony was to be reduced to a minimum. The colony was to be regarded and treated as an absolute unit. The traditional forces of military discipline, several penal enactments, and strict religious observance were brought to bear, to repress disorder and direct the productive energies of the settlement. n26

Under such a regimen, probably necessary for the colony's survival, the leaders hoped that their farmers could be soldiers too, with military obedience and diligence characterizing their efforts to conquer the land. The colony now had not only a governor, but also a marshal, who -- according to a familiar model -- was responsible for directing the activities and maintaining the discipline of the colonists. Sir Thomas Dale arrived at Jamestown on May 19, 1611, and assumed duties as deputy governor but was referred to as, and functioned as, marshal.

Under Dale the colonists quickly founded a new settlement, called Henrico, about 40 miles upriver from Jamestown, and in 1613 secured the entire peninsula from Indian attacks. Much of Jamestown's population relocated to the new site, and an unprecedented measure of health and prosperity began to emerge.

This success was marred by the severity of discipline imposed by Dale, especially after he became acting governor in 1614. During this time it could be said of the Virginia settlements that:

> a planned economy was placed in operation for the first time in American history. Supervision of > crop production was the very least of the economic controls imposed ...

>
> Virginia's economy was essentially communistic. To the colony accrued the products of its lands. To the government fell the task of distribution. n27

§ 6.02(c) The Charter of 1612.

In the meantime, the patentees had sought and on March 12, 1612, the king had approved a third charter. This charter reaffirmed the grants of the earlier charters and extended the Virginia boundaries to include islands lying within 300 leagues (900 miles) of the continent between 30 and 41 degrees latitude, and it accepted numerous additional subscribers. n28 No subscribers were permitted to join the company for less than £12 10s:

> This amount finally entitled the payer to a share of not less than 100 acres in Virginia. Of those who paid their subscriptions and took therefor bills of adventure, it may be stated, as approximately correct, that about one third came to Virginia themselves and settled on their lands; about one third sent over their agents, or finally their heirs, to occupy theirs; while the remaining third sold their shares to others, who generally settled on the lands. These classes were the landed gentry, and they brought, or sent, over another class as servants, etc. n29

The charter of 1612 reiterated the language of the two previous charters concerning the holding of lands in free and common socage, and of the 1609 charter concerning payment of one-fifth of the yield from any gold and silver mines. n30 It also confirmed interests previously granted n31 and declared that questions in construing or interpreting any of the charter provisions should be resolved in favor of the company. n32

§ 6.02(d) Introduction of Private Landholding.

Under the desperate circumstances of Jamestown's early years, of course, there could be little thought of private property interests in land for the individual colonists, yet the land was there in such unimaginable abundance:

> The sheer quantity of land was a powerful attraction. So far as anyone knew in 1607 the amount was boundless, and for the English, whose homeland was a small island, that thought was mind-boggling. Owning ground was what made gentlemen back home. In Virginia a man could take of it as he desired and do with it as he pleased. Very quickly, that realization bred a belief that Virginia was a place without limits; and, over the long run, that conviction had profound consequences for the colony's future. n33

But the dream of possessing one's own land was not yet the lot of the Virginia colonists because of the militaristic plantation system enforced with renewed vigor again after 1610, and especially after the introduction of the severe code of military rules in 1611. Human nature soon asserted itself against the new communalism, as described in a contemporary account:

> When our people were fed out of the common store, and labored jointly together, glad was he who could slip from his labor, or slumber over his task he cared not how, nay, the most honest among them would hardly take so much true pains in a week, as now they themselves will do in a day: neither cared they for the increase, presuming that howsoever the harvest prospered, the general store must maintain them. n34

Dale was not oblivious to those sentiments, and as early as 1611 he had consulted the Council about allotting to each colonist a private garden. It was not until 1614, however, that he actually introduced a form of private property into the colonial economy. At that time, a large number of colonists were assigned private plots of three acres each, which they held under lease. The lessees, called farmers in accordance with contemporary English land terminology, n35 were to pay two and one half barrels of corn annually as rent and were declared exempt from community labor during eleven months of the year. Other arrangements were soon introduced to attract new settlers:

> In order further to encourage the development of tenant right, and the cultivation of commodities which were useful as food, Dale assured to every man with a family who came into the colony a house with four rooms, which he was permitted to occupy for at least a year without the payment of rent. Twelve acres fenced and adjacent to the house assigned for cultivation. With this went tools, live stock, and provisions adequate to the support of the family during a twelvemonth. After that time the newcomer was expected to maintain himself. n36

By the time Dale left in 1616, four settlements in addition to Jamestown and Henrico had been established, and the 381 surviving settlers appeared acclimated and fit to further the colony's development.

§ 6.02(e) The Spread of Private Landholding.

According to company regulations, the system of joint land management was to expire in 1616, and dividends on the stock issued in 1609 fell due. Because no profits had accumulated during the subsequent seven years, the company was able to pay the dividend only in land. The stockholders were therefore promised fifty acres for each share and told that an additional two hundred acres per share might be later given, but that in order to cover the costs of surveying, each was invited to contribute an additional £12 10s, in return for an additional fifty acres. The results of all of these promotions were inadequate, so:

> the Company in 1617 offered fifty acres for each person going to settle in Virginia, the land assigned to the one paying expenses. This was the beginning of the headright system of land grants which was the chief method of distributing land in Virginia throughout most of the seventeenth century, and, in a modified form, for many years later. n37

In the colony itself, other preparations were made for division of the land near the settlements. In 1617 some indentured laborers, who in 1614 had been promised their freedom after three years' work, were actually emancipated and probably joined the ranks of the tenant farmers. In addition, some lands were most likely held in fee simple, having been so granted by former governors to some of the earlier colonists. n38 When a new governor arrived in 1617, however, the land distributions ceased, and a new requirement was imposed on each tenant to plant at least two acres in grain, a hedge against the temptation to plant nothing but tobacco.

A new charter was issued in 1618 but was never delivered, because the new governor bringing it with him died while making the ocean crossing. Later that year, on November 18, 1618, the Virginia Company in London issued instructions that transferred governmental power to the colony in Virginia and mandated that the colony be governed by both appointed officers and an assembly consisting of colonists' representatives. These instructions, the so-called "Great Charter" of Virginia, were of greatest importance because they led to the swift assembling of the earliest representative legislative body in North America. The General Assembly, consisting of the governor, six councilors and twenty-two burgesses elected by the colonists, first met at Jamestown on July 30, 1619. n39

In addition, a large part of the company instructions dealt with major changes in the management of land:

> These instructions provided that no land patents should be granted until after thorough consideration and approval by the Company. [The governor] was to secure corn and cattle for new settlers by restoring to cultivation the public lands, which had been largely abandoned ... [and to] "lay out a convenient portion of public lands for the maintenance and support, as well of magistracy and officers, as of other public charges ...." n40

Three thousand acres were set aside as land and residence for the governor, to be cultivated by the governor's guard and fifty tenants; an additional three thousand acres at each of the principal settlements were assigned to pay the expenses and salaries of councilors and public officers of the colony, and some of the later arriving settlers were placed on these under seven-year tenancies:

> There were also provisions in these instructions ... for the granting of one hundred acres of land (and more later) to each individual adventurer or planter who had already bought a share of £12 10s. in the Company's stock, or who had come over at his own expense and had died or had remained in the Colony for at least three years, or who had come over at the Company's expense before [the former governor] Dale's departure in 1616 and who had completed his term of service to the Company. But because Dale's able administration had brought greater "ease and security," only fifty acres each were given to those coming over at their own expense after Dale's departure. The headright system of granting land to those who brought in settlers was continued, and the system of granting lands for particular plantations, or subsidiary colonies, was greatly extended. n41

Embodied in these rules, therefore, was a liberal right to acquire fee simple in land. Even common laborers were able to become landholders under the farmers' tenure:

> Far more powerful was the influence of a fee simple title upon those who received this invaluable gift on account of their long connection with the Colony; it is stated [by Captain John Smith, Works, p. 542] that a strong rivalry at once sprang up among them as to which one should excel in building and planting. n42

As to the lands assigned for the support of public offices, it was necessary to also provide the means for making the lands productive:

> The apportionments of land would have been worthless if no provision had been made for their cultivation. A system of leases in consequence was adopted. To the Governor one hundred tenants were allowed; to the Treasurer and Marshal, fifty each; to the superintendent of the Company's lands, forty; to the Secretary and Physician, twenty apiece; and to the Vice-admiral, twelve. Each one of these public officials, when his tenure ceased, was required to transmit to his successor the whole number of tenants who were by law attached to his office. It was the intention of the Company that each one should receive such an area of land and such a number of servants as would be sufficient to afford him an ample support as well as to sustain the dignity of his position. The plan was in large measure carried into practical effect. n43

§ 6.02(f) Tenancy in Land.

The tenancy attached to such lands at that time was a form of landholding resting somewhere in the middle of the progression from the medieval unfree villein tenure and the modern agriculture tenancy known today. The Jamestown tenants were not indefinitely bound to the soil and subject to the needs and directions of the lords of the manor, as their peasant forebears may have been; still, the farmer's seven year term was a form of servitude, requiring payment of half the annual crops and labor services for the entire seven years n44:

> [It was] openly asserted that the officers of the Company made an improper use both of their tenants and the tenants' servants. The servants were taken away from their masters and removed by the officers to their private estates, while the tenants themselves were kept so constantly engaged in rowing the officers to and fro between Jamestown and the lands assigned to the different official positions ... that it was not in their power to pay the rent expected of them ... The amount of rent exacted of the tenants was undoubtedly too large, being very much in excess of that which was required of the farmers during the administration of [former governor] Dale. n45

Not more than three years after this system went into effect, the tenants obtained a change in the arrangements favorable to their situation. The rent was changed from one-half the crop (no rent if the crop failed) to 20 bushels of grain, sixty pounds of tobacco, and one pound of silk, plus six days' labor on public works. To ensure performance, no fewer than three tenants were required to live together, each being bound for the rent requirements.

§ 6.02(g) Land Grants to Private Societies.

Yet another form of land grant commenced in 1618, a type of sub-patent issued to private societies. Under this arrangement several prominent colonists banded together, combining their own shares and sometimes purchasing additional shares, and offered to form a plantation at their own expense. The result was the assigning of very large tracts of Virginia land for private plantations, which tended to quickly use up the available land:

> The first private plantation thus granted was Southampton or Smith's Hundred, consisting of two hundred thousand acres ... Within this some three hundred tenants were settled. Shortly after other grants were made to "Argall and his associates," "Hamor and his associates," "Martin and his associates." Of these the last, known as Martin's Plantation or Hundred, n46 [was] the only one of the three to be developed ... The grantee was Captain John Martin, who had been connected with the fortunes of the colony from the outset. The grant contained eighty thousand acres. n47

Among the terms of the private plantation grants or patents was that the grantees could regulate their servants and business in ways not repugnant to the laws of England. This was tested when, at the time the first assembly met, John Martin claimed the privileges of an English manorial lord over his plantation, but he was directed instead to submit to usual company regulations. Nevertheless, the grantees of private plantations were called commanders and seem to have had some semi-military powers of governance. When the company was eventually dissolved and Virginia became a royal province, the characteristics of local government that had grown up with private plantation settlements were preserved.

§ 6.02(h) Summary of How Private Landholding Progressed.

Thus, by several devices the vast lands of tidewater Virginia began to shift into private ownership. Farmers completing their tenancies might be in position to buy land outright; settlers could receive land for their work, and if they properly exploited their first grant, they could receive a second grant of equal size without further investment; likewise, investors received grants in recognition of their stock, with further grants to follow if the first were profitably developed; private societies obtained large "plantation" tracts; large tracts were reserved for public institutions and officials, which were worked by soldiers, servants and tenants; and under the headright system, those who sponsored and sent colonists received grants of land for every person they sent.

The significance of the headright system cannot be over-emphasized:

> The system of head rights played a prominent part in the settlement of Virginia, and of the other provinces as well, for generations to come, and by it the supply of the colonies with a due proportion of servants was insured. As an additional inducement to private settlers it was ordered that those who received their bills of adventure before midsummer 1625, should be free from the payment of quitrents. Those issued later than this date were subject to that obligation. As the result of successive divisions and the multiplication of private grants, large and small, the unoccupied land of the province gradually became the property of the individual freeholders. Those who possessed the smaller estates worked them themselves with the aid of a few laborers or servants. The larger grantees employed many servants, -- or later, slaves, -- and in some cases leased their estates partly or wholly to tenants ...
>
> General indolence, of which John Smith and Dale complained, disappeared with the advent of the system of individual estates. n48

§ 6.02(i) Changes in Governance Affecting Private Landholding.

The deaths of Pocahontas in 1617 in England and of her father, Powhatan, in Virginia the next year eventually led to changed relations with the natives. On March 22, 1622, Powhatan's successor was able to coordinate widespread surprise attack on numerous Virginia settlements, resulting in the massacre of about 350 men, women and children -- a quarter of the colony's population at the time. An attack of plague only a few months earlier had been even more devastating.

The discouragement following these disasters prompted King James I, later in 1622, to involve himself more directly in the affairs of the company, fearing the conditions in the colony were fomenting too much independence and possible sedition. He submitted names of his own candidates in elections of company officers, but when they were rejected, he began planning for the destruction of the company. Following the contrived work of a royal investigative commission, James offered the company a guarantee that their property interests would be preserved if they would surrender their charter to royal control, which proposition was also rejected. Then James had his attorney general issue a quo warranto against the company; when the matter came before the King's Bench on June 26, 1624, the company's charter was revoked on a technicality -- an alleged error in pleading.

With the return of the colony to royal governance, a commission was appointed with the objective of reinstating the plan of government described in the 1606 charter. James died, however, before the commission could finish its work. His successor, Charles I, then officially proclaimed Virginia a royal colony, and in the end no major changes were made to the form of government that was in place in 1624. The Virginia assembly did not meet officially between 1624 and 1628; but following this hiatus, they resumed meeting and legislating, albeit without formal sanction from the king. Finally, in January 1639, Charles gave formal consent to the restoration of the assembly as a permanent institution of the colony. This was the first representative assembly in an English royal colony. During this period the settlement of land continued, impeded only by the presence of large abandoned tracts owned by those who had died or returned to England. In 1648:

> by authority of his instructions Governor Berkeley allowed colonists to settle in the James River Valley on lands previously granted to others but which either had been abandoned or never settled. Former owners who protested were given lands in unsettled regions elsewhere. This doubtless marked the end of many particular plantations on paper. n49

For defensive purposes, commanders were authorized to build forts at designated locations and to keep the forts and the property belonging to them so long as they maintained the garrison. Similarly, to encourage exploration, a 1652 act of the assembly authorized exploration projects under which the explorers could choose for themselves a portion of the land discovered. In 1653 the assembly established reservations for certain Indian tribes and required colonists within those areas to move. In 1656 the Indians were prohibited from selling or trading their land without assembly consent.

The huge territory of the colony was also destined for division. The issuance of the Maryland charter in 1632 hemmed in Virginia on the north. In 1663 eight persons received from King Charles II proprietary rights to the region between Virginia and Spanish Florida on the south. When Charles seized New Netherlands in 1664, he granted it to his brother, the Duke of York. Even before coming to power, Charles had made direct grants of Virginia land to several of his friends, although eventually they fully submitted to the authority of the colonial government. When Charles II in 1673 granted almost all of Virginia to two of his favorites, in disregard of established grants and governments already in place, the Virginians were able to undo most of his mischief. Thereupon they petitioned for a completely new charter, but the charter they received did little more than confirm titles to lands.

§ 6.02(j) The Influence of English Common Law on Landholding.

§ 6.02(j)(1) Adoption of English Common Law in Virginia.

The adoption of English common law, as modified by local circumstances, appeared in early Virginia patents almost as an afterthought. When the Stuart monarch was restored to the throne in 1660, however, it seemed appropriate to the assembly to confirm their allegiance to that rule of law. Thus, the assembly proclaimed that Virginians "have also endeavoured in all things (as neere as the capacity and constitution of this country would admitt) to addhere to those excellent and often refined laws of England, to which we profess and acknowledge all due obedience and reverence ...." n50

The underlying assumption that the laws of England applied in colonial Virginia, except where local circumstances dictated otherwise, was made more explicit after the Stuart Restoration in 1660. The Virginia assembly sorted through its past enactments, and those to be kept were compiled in a new code of laws adopted by the assembly in March 1662:

> By the statutes of 1661-1662, procedure in the courts was regulated. At the time of the Restoration, Virginia seems to have been especially anxious to show herself loyal to England, and these enactments breathe a deep respect for the common law. In the preamble it is stated that the legislature has endeavored in all things to adhere to these "excellent and refined laws of England to which we profess to acknowledge all due obedience and reverence." As a reason for enacting laws at all they assign the vast volume of the English law from which courts would be unable to collect the necessary principles without the aid of such codification. The former laws are repealed and a new code is enacted. As some former laws restrained the trial by jury quite contrary to the laws of England, the law of juries is restated with special carefulness and precision. It is interesting to note in this connection that the colonists express their regret that they are unable to comply with the requirement of the English jury system that the jurors shall come from the immediate neighborhood of the place where the fact was committed; but they state that they desire to approach as near as possible to compliance by enacting that six men of the ablest and nearest of the inhabitants of the county shall be on the jury ... In this code the period of prescription for land is limited to five years. n51

In 1666 the assembly appropriated money to purchase law books, in order to more faithfully adhere to English common law:

> Whereas for the better conformity of the proceedings of the courts of this country to the lawes of England, as appeares necessary for their better direction therein, all the former statutes at large and those made since the beginning of the raigne of his sacred majestie that now is and a few other approved books of law should be purchased, It is therefore by this grand assembly and the authority thereof enacted accordingly that all the aforesaid statute books, and Daltons justice of the peace, and office of a sherriffe, and Swinburnes book of Wills and Testaments may be sent for by the auditor for the use of the general courts and assembly, ... and the like books be sent for by some of the commissioners of the severall county courts for the use of the respective counties, and paid for out of the county levy. n52

Given the background of colonial Virginia's early leaders, reliance on English common law was only natural:

> Throughout the nearly two decades that the London Company managed Virginia, it recruited the colony's leaders from England's ruling classes. Those men were well schooled in English law and custom. They had been educated at the universities or Inns of Court; some knew martial law, and they all enjoyed ties to the court and Parliament. Despite such qualifications these men were to leave only a slight impression on colonial law. Few survived or stayed in Virginia long enough to make much of a mark. Furthermore, there was little agreement before 1625 as to which of England's legal traditions were most suitable to a struggling colony. The question of what law should prevail was only vaguely addressed before formulation of The Lawes Divine, Morall and Martiall [the very severe code adopted for Jamestown in 1611, and sometimes enforced]. The Charter of 1618 supplanted The Lawes, but that > change merely introduced the possibility of adopting a more familiar form of law. Thus it was the members of the post-1625 general assemblies, together with their counterparts in local government, who assumed the greater role in grafting English common law to colonial needs. n53

§ 6.02(j)(2) Regulation of Attorneys.

While the English legal system of the 17th century may have been implicitly accepted as the rule of law in Virginia, the colonists seemed eager to act against defects in the system. Prominent among the defects was the conduct of attorneys, that is, of persons acting on behalf of others in litigation. In 1642 the Virginia Assembly commenced an amazing series of enactments regulating attorneys that knows no parallel for legislative schizophrenic paranoia.

The 1642 act provided for licensing attorneys and limiting their fees; n54 in 1645 the assembly prohibited attorneys from collecting fees, labelling those who did as mercenary attorneys and, in effect, expelling them from office. n55 In the session of 1645-1646, the 1642 act (for licensing attorneys) was repealed and the 1645 act (expelling attorneys) was confirmed in perpetuity. n56 In 1647, the assembly further prohibited even any indirect compensation to those who functioned as attorneys but empowered the courts to chose from among the people someone who could help weaker litigants. n57 In 1656, all acts against mercenary attorneys were repealed, and a licensing provision was once again put into place:

> And be it enacted that the Governour and Councill shall appoint and allow such as they shall find fitt and able to be attornies in the quarter courts, and the commissioners to do the like by nominateing attornies for the county courts, Provided that no attorney be admitted to practice or plead, before he have taken this oath following: [The oath is omitted from the extant manuscripts.]
>
> And if any controversies arise between attornie and his client about their fee, it shall be determined in the court where the cause is pleaded, Provided allwaies that those onely be called councellors at law, who have allreadie been qualified thereunter by the lawes of England, and those so qualified to enjoy all priviledges those lawes give them. n58

Nevertheless, the assembly of 1657-1658 reversed itself again and reinstated the expulsion of attorneys. n59

§ 6.02(k) Virginia Landholding During the Later Colonial Period.

§ 6.02(k)(1) Early Legislative Provisions Concerning Land.

Title to lands and numerous other rules regulating interests in real property were implicitly drawn from the common law of England. As to the management of lands, little changed after the form of government stabilized. During the 1620's and 1630's, the Virginia Assembly typically enacted provisions regulating the surveys of land, the settling of new lands, and the disposing of abandoned lands, and required homesteads to be palisaded in defense against Indian attacks, but in general, the typical English property law invoked by the earliest charters remained intact.

The occasional minor land regulation that was enacted gives a glimpse into everyday early colonial life, when land transactions were an ordinary activity. For instance, a provision enacted by the Assembly of 1639-40 declared that "A deed or mortgage made without delivery of possession [is] to be adjudged fraudulent unless entered in some court." n60 Other examples of legislative provisions indicating that private land transactions were being conducted frequently include:

> a requirement that mortgages be registered in quarter or monthly courts, or be deemed fraudulent as to creditors; n61
>
> assignment of abandoned lots in Jamestown to others; n62 prohibiting alienation of orphans' lands during their minority; n63

resolving settlers' rival claims to the same land; n64 confirming all former surveys of land; n65

the evidence and surveys required to claim patents by head rights; n66 prohibiting desertion of plantations that had already been seated; n67 granting proprietary forts and adjoining land, on condition that proprietors keep the forts garrisoned and supplied; n68

a five-year limitation on actions for claims and titles to land; n69 requiring fencing of cleared ground; n70

regulating surveyors; n71

abolishing property taxes in favor of taxes only upon persons; n72 prohibiting alienation of Indian lands without assembly approval; n73

a holding in litigation that a devise not using the words of fee simple, or heirs and assigns forever, passed only a life estate; n74

a holding in litigation describing how to assign dower lands (division into thirds, with the widow having first choice of the divided portions); n75

confirmation of Statute of frauds provisions enacted in 1642 and 1643; n76 regulating the form of land patents; n77 confirmation of former patent rights, even if not recorded or indexed in the records; n78 condemnation of land; n79 validating conveyances by husband and wife, if the wife conveyed freely, even though not done by fine and recovery; n80 and validating a large entailed conveyance in trust with provisions for settlement upon family members. n81

In 1670, the franchise was restricted to freeholders who held at least fifty acres. The Council that assisted in the ministerial functions of government had the responsibility for "making grants, and passing all the patents for land," according to a report of 1705. The colonial secretary, chosen from the Council, was:

> to keep the public records of the [colony], and to take care that they be regularly and fairly made up; namely, all judgments of the General Court, as likewise all deeds and other writings there proved; and further to issue all writs, both ministerial and judicial, relating thereto; to make out and record all patents for land, to file the rights by which they issued, and to take the return of all inquests of escheat. n82

§ 6.02(k)(2) Quit rents in Virginia.

In the assembly session of 1639-40, the issue of quitrents first appeared as a matter of legislative concern: "Seven years after date of patents, 2s. per hundred acres quit rents to be paid yearly, at some convenient place to be appointed in each county." n83 Quitrents are of more than passing interest because they are an unequivocal indication that landholding was still considered tenurial rather than allodial. Enforcement, or even recognition, of quit rents was only patchy in the British colonies as a whole, but in Virginia, quitrents were more successfully collected than in any of the other colonies.

Quitrents were usually associated with the tenure of free and common socage and consisted of a typically small service or sum rendered to the grantor in recognition of a persisting but nominal tenurial relationship.

> There can be no doubt that lands in the original American colonies were held in tenure. Some of the early royal grants of lands specified that the lands should be held in free and common socage [a form of tenure] and reserved nominal services, such as the annual render of "two beaver skins" stipulated in the grant to William Penn. Since [the Statute] Quia Emptores [in 1290] did not bind the king he could grant to his tenants in chief the right to sub-infeudate [and thus impose tenures reserving services in return] and this power was expressly given to some of the proprietaries. The Penns, for example, made grants of lands to be held of them in free and common socage. The service reserved was usually the payment of a small sum of money annually and was called a quit rent. In New England, quit rents were exceptional and long before the Revolution land was held completely free of any feudal service or incidents. After the Revolution, lands were deemed to be held in tenure of the state as sovereign in place of the Crown. Several states passed statutes, or enacted constitutional provisions, declaring lands to be owned allodially [owned outright rather than under some form of tenure] and abolishing tenure. In the remaining states it would seem that lands are still held in tenure of the state as overlord. In those states in which tenure exists Quia Emptores is in force, except in South Carolina and, perhaps, in Pennsylvania.
>
> From the practical standpoint it is not important today whether lands are owned allodially or are held in tenure. If tenure exists in a particular state and Quia Emptores is deemed to be in force there can be no sub-infeudation. If tenure exists and Quia Emptores is not in force a rare question might conceivably arise as to the nature of the rent reserved on a conveyance in fee. n84

As to quitrents during colonial times and beyond,

> In the charters granted to Lord Baltimore and to Penn they were given the right to erect manors and to hold therein courts-baron and courts-leet. Perhaps the closest approach to a successful attempt to set up a manorial system took place in New York. Some of the grants made by Colonial governors to the great proprietors purported to confer manorial privileges. The proprietors in turn made to settlers numerous conveyances in fee reserving in the deeds a perpetual rent payable in wheat, "fat hens" and a day's service "with carriage and horses" and a fine for alienation. These perpetual rents resulted in the 1840s in resentment, rioting, litigation and legislation. n85

Quitrents were not mentioned in the early Virginia charters, but the charter of 1609 was interpreted as reserving the right to reserve a quitrent. n86 The quitrents in force in Virginia, subject to the provisions enacted during the 1639-40 Assembly, were not required to be paid until seven years after the patent was granted, and then they were in the standardized sum of 2s. per hundred acres. Additional early legislative enactments concerning quitrents were issued by the assemblies of 1642-1643, n87 of 1645, n88 of 1647, n89 of 1660-1661, n90 and of 1661-1662. n91

Quitrents were more successfully collected and applied to various public works in Virginia than in any other American colony. However, Virginians resisted when quitrent rights were granted to individual proprietors, rather than being exercised by the crown, because they feared the revenue would not be applied for public purposes. n92

In the colonies generally:

> there is no doubt that the quit-rent as a source of revenue influenced the nobility of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries in seeking lands in America ... For more than a century and a half, lords and gentlemen of rank tried to obtain a footing on American soil and to introduce there the feudal rights and privileges which they exercised upon their own franchises at home. Had they succeeded they might have fastened upon the colonies feudal obligations that the New World would have found it difficult to shake off, as was the case with Canada under the French regime. In England these seigniorial rights continued to exist because they had a financial value; and it was apparently easy for the manorial lord at home to believe that he could recoup his failing resources in a similar manner from lands granted to him in America.
>
> Of all the seigniorial rights the collecting of a quit-rent was the most important ...
>
> ...The quit-rent in the domain of real property, like the royal prerogative in the field of government and the navigation acts in the field of commerce, was an obstacle to complete colonial independence, and a check upon the ability of people to utilize its own resources for its own benefit and advantage. n93

§ 6.02(k)(3) Impact of Landholding Practices on Virginia Society.

The continuing availability of land ownership exercised a powerful effect on Virginia and, eventually, on American society:

> [A] blurring of customary [social] distinctions occurred. For one thing, landownership was not restricted to a few. Land existed in abundance, and anyone could become a landowner; at least that was the promise if not always the practice. Primogeniture, the legal device Englishmen employed to keep real estate in the hands of the few by requiring that it descend to the eldest son, never worked either. Even though possession of land helped to fix an immigrant's status, its mere acquisition did not assure a high place in Virginia society. For another, settlers unaccustomed to work stood little chance of survival. That truth had been evident since the days when John Smith bemoaned the presence of too many gentlemen among the first immigrants. In contrast to English society, in Virginia the fundamental social division was between bondsmen and planters.
>
> Indentured servants and slaves constituted the lowest of Virginia's social groups ...
>
> ... Like an apprentice, servants contracted with masters to work for specified periods of time, usually four to seven years. Masters generally agreed to pay the costs of transporting servants to Virginia, to maintain them for the duration of their terms, and to give them freedom dues -- corn, tools, and clothing -- when their contracts expired. They sometimes promised to provide a piece of land or other goods as well. n94

Right on through the colonial period in Virginia, land distribution continued to be a central issue. Abuse of headrights was rife: ships' crews claimed headrights every time they entered Virginia, and captains claimed headrights for the same crews each time; no one followed up on whether the minimum improvements were installed on the acreage thus claimed, and unimproved land never reverted back to the government. Headrights were also claimed for imported slaves. This latter abuse was corrected in 1699, but none of the others was changed.

This laxness perhaps led more readily to a change in land distribution that was intended to encourage settlement of western lands. Beginning in the 1690's, settlers were granted their acreage before they actually arrived, under the assumption that they would achieve the "seating" of their lands within a specified period of time, but no reversions ever occurred for non-compliance. As part of this system, however, land speculators were able to amass huge holdings in the West, and eventually the plantation system of the tidewater country worked its way west.

By the end of the American Revolution, tax lists showed that half of adult white males in Virginia owned land, about a third were agricultural laborers, and the rest were tenants. Although the "bulk of the land was not widely held ... most white Virginians in the eighteenth century were small farmers ...," and "[l]andholding was more widely distributed in Virginia than in the mother country, and two to three times as many persons by percentage of the population had the vote in the colony as in contemporary Britain." n95

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 2. Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, art. I, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 57-58 (1823). Finbarr McCarthy, Participatory Government and Communal Property: Two Radical Concepts in the Virginia Charter of 1606, 29 U. Rich. L. Rev. 327 (March 1995).

(n2)Footnote 3. Alf J. Mapp, Jr., The Virginia Experiment 11 (3d ed. 1987).

(n3)Footnote 4. 1 John Smith, The General Historie of Virginia 43 (1624).

(n4)Footnote 5. Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, arts. IV and V, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 58-60 (1823).

(n5)Footnote 6. Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, art. VII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 60-61 (1823).

(n6)Footnote 7. Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, art. VIII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 61 (1823).

(n7)Footnote 8. Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, art. XV, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 64 (1823).

(n8)Footnote 9. "Articles, Instructions and Orders," etc., Nov. 20, 1606, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 68 (1823).

(n9)Footnote 10. Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, arts. IV and V, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 58-60 (1823).

(n10)Footnote 11. Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, arts. XVIII, XIX and XX, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 65-66 (1823).

(n11)Footnote 12. See § 4.05(b)(3)(x) in ch. 4, supra.

(n12)Footnote 13. 1 Frederick Pollock & Frederic William Maitland, The History of English Law Before the Time of Edward I 291 (2d ed. 1909).

(n13)Footnote 14. Id.

(n14)Footnote 15. Id. at 292.

(n15)Footnote 16. Tenures Abolition Act, 12 Car. 2, c. 24 (1660).

(n16)Footnote 17. "Articles, Instructions and Orders," etc., Nov. 20, 1606, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 69 (1823).

(n17)Footnote 18. Lynda L. Butler, The Commons Concept: An Historical Concept with Modern Relevance, 23 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 835, 868 (Summer 1982).

(n18)Footnote 19. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 34 (1904).

(n19)Footnote 20. See Christopher Tomlins, The Legal Cartography of Colonization, The Legal Polyphony of Settlement: English Intrusions on The American Mainland in the Seventeenth Century, 26 Law & Soc. Inquiry 315 (Spring 2001).

(n20)Footnote 21. In 1612 King James I issued a third charter for the Virginia Company, which extended the Virginia boundaries to include islands lying within 300 leagues of the continent between the 30th and 41st latitudes, and accepted numerous additional subscribers. See 2 Alexander Brown, The Genesis of the United States 540-553 (1890). See § 6.02(c), infra.

(n21)Footnote 22. The Second Charter to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, art. IV, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 88 (1823). The King increased the number of grantees from the original four in the Charter of 1606 (Sir Thomas Gates and three others), by including eight earls, twelve lords, 106 knights, one bishop, one divine, three ministers, fifty-seven captains, the mayor of London, twenty-eight esquires, four doctors, and fifty-six trade guilds. Among these grantees, over one-hundred were former members of parliament. Alfred N. Chandler, Land Title Origins: A Tale of Force and Fraud 50-51 (1945).

(n22)Footnote 23. The Second Charter to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, art. VI, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 89 (1823).

(n23)Footnote 24. The Second Charter to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, art. XXVII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 97 (1823). The second charter designated the London (Virginia) Company as "The Treasurer and Company of Adventures and Planters of the City of London for the First Colony in Virginia." The original grant of ten thousand square miles was expanded to around one million square miles. "Its bounds were to run two hundred miles north and two hundred miles south of Point Comfort (approximately between Wilmington, Delaware and Wilmington, North Carolina), and in depth all the land from sea to sea, north and northwest (which became the basis for Virginia's claim to the land north of the Ohio River) and all the islands within a hundred miles along the coast of both seas, together with all soils, ports and mines. This territory was made over to the sole use of the company and their assigns for ever, with authority to distribute and assign the lands therein granted." This charter did not affect the Plymouth Company. Alfred N. Chandler, Land Title Origins: A Tale of Force and Fraud 50 (1945).

(n24)Footnote 25. This code was prepared in 1611 and codified and published in 1612.

(n25)Footnote 26. Id. at 70.

(n26)Footnote 27. Alf J. Mapp, Jr., The Virginia Experiment 34 (1987).

(n27)Footnote 28. 2 Alexander Brown, The Genesis of the United States 540-553 (1890). The patentees' principal reason for seeking a third charter was the discovery of the Bermudas (or Somers Islands) which were located far too distant to be included in the 1609 Charter. Marshall Harris, Origin of the Land Tenure System in the United States 86-87 (1953).

(n28)Footnote 29. 2 Alexander Brown, The Genesis of the United States 549-550 (1890).

(n29)Footnote 30. A Third Charter of K. James I. to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, art. IV, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 101 (1823).

(n30)Footnote 31. A Third Charter of K. James I. to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, art. XXI, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 109 (1823).

(n31)Footnote 32. A Third Charter of K. James I. to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, art. XX, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 109 (1823).

(n32)Footnote 33. Warren M. Billings, John E. Selby & Thad W. Tate, Colonial Virginia a History 25 (1986).

(n33)Footnote 34. Reported in 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 72 (1904).

(n34)Footnote 35. A farmer was a person who paid rent as a condition of his tenure.

(n35)Footnote 36. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 76 (1904). In exchange for these benefits, each tenant was to grow exclusively wheat, corn, roots and herbs. Alfred N. Chandler, Land Title Origins: A Tale of Force and Fraud 53 (1945). Additionally, the company bore all charges of maintaining the plantation and obtaining supplies until 1618 (when the land was supposed to be divided). No private goods were to be sold until that time. The company was to supply food, clothing, and home-building material. The colonists had to trade together and purchase all of their needs from the same places. Marshall Harris, Origin of the Land Tenure System in the United States 87 (1953).

(n36)Footnote 37. Richard L. Morton, Colonial Virginia 46 (1960); 2 Alexander Brown, The Genesis of the United States 774-780 (1890).

(n37)Footnote 38. 1 Philip Alexander Bruce, Economic History of Virginia in the Seventeenth Century 221 (1896)."Surveyors were sent to Virginia to make maps and allotments to the shareholders, such allotments to be capable of transfer as an estate of inheritance. To prevent fraud, deeds were not valid until ratified by the quarter-court, a committee of the board of directors of the company in London." Alfred N. Chandler, Land Title Origins: A Tale of Force and Fraud 53-54 (1945).

(n38)Footnote 39. Alf J. Mapp, Jr., The Virginia Experiment 44 (1987). According to the modern calendar, the date would have been designated August 9, 1619; according to older authority, the assembly was first called together near the end of June, 1619. 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 119-121 (1823).

(n39)Footnote 40. Richard L. Morton, Colonial Virginia 52-53 (1960).

(n40)Footnote 41. Id. at 54.

(n41)Footnote 42. 1 Philip Alexander Bruce, Economic History of Virginia in the Seventeenth Century 227-228 (1896).

(n42)Footnote 43. Id. at 229-30.

(n43)Footnote 44. Lynda L. Butler, The Commons Concept: An Historical Concept with Modern Relevance, 23 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 835, 870 (Summer 1982).

(n44)Footnote 45. 1 Philip Alexander Bruce, Economic History of Virginia in the Seventeenth Century 232-233 (1896).

(n45)Footnote 46. A hundred was one of the political divisions in Virginia on which representation in the assembly was based and, as a territorial division, originated in England:

> In England a hundred was a county division sufficiently large to have its own court or hundred moot. The word comes to use from the Anglo-Saxons. Some philologists think that the term was originally used to designate an area comprising one hundred hides. In old Saxon nomenclature, a hide was enough > land to support a family. Other etymologists think that "hundred" was used to designate a territory which could be counted on to furnish a hundred warriors. The term, as has been suggested, was particularly appropriate because of the plan of 1616 under which "Particular Plantations" were granted to stockholders who bore the cost of sending one hundred settlers to Virginia. It was natural that Englishmen, faced with the necessity of describing sparsely-settled tracts not designated as cities, should appropriate the time-honored and familiar English name for a division of a county.

Alf J. Mapp, Jr., The Virginia Experiment 43 (1987).

(n46)Footnote 47. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 84-85 (1904). A later writer distinguishes between Martin's Brandon (on the west bank of the James River) and Martin's Hundred or Plantation (on the peninsula, on the east bank of the James River), indicating that Martin's Hundred was settled by Richard Martin. Richard L. Morton, Colonial Virginia 62-65 (1960). Curiously, even Osgood, at page 91, recognized that the two settlements were in two different locations.

(n47)Footnote 48. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 87 (1904).

(n48)Footnote 49. Richard L. Morton, Colonial Virginia 150 (1960).

(n49)Footnote 50. Virginia Assembly of 1660-61, Preamble, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 43 (1823).

(n50)Footnote 51. Paul Samuel Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 367, 405-406 (1907) Association of American Law Schools.

(n51)Footnote 52. Virginia Assembly of 1666, Act XX in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 246 (1823).

(n52)Footnote 53. Warren M. Billings, John E. Selby, Thad W. Tate, Colonial Virginia 75 (1986).

(n53)Footnote 54. Virginia Assembly of 1642-1643, Act LXI, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 275 (1823).

(n54)Footnote 55. Virginia Assembly of 1645, Act VII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 302 (1823).

(n55)Footnote 56. Virginia Assembly of 1645-1646, Act VIII, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 313 (1823).

(n56)Footnote 57. Virginia Assembly of 1647, Act XVI, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 349 (1823).

(n57)Footnote 58. Virginia Assembly of 1656, Act VI, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 419 (1823).

(n58)Footnote 59. Virginia Assembly of 1657-1658, Act CXII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 482-483 (1823).

(n59)Footnote 60. Virginia Assembly of 1639-1640, Act XVI, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 227 (1823).

(n60)Footnote 61. Virginia Assembly of 1642-1643, Act XII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large,

Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 248-249 (1823).

(n61)Footnote 62. Virginia Assembly of 1642-1643, Act XIX, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 252 (1823).

(n62)Footnote 63. Virginia Assembly of 1642-1643, Act XXXII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 260 (1823).

(n63)Footnote 64. Virginia Assembly of 1642-1643, Act XXXIII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 260 (1823).

(n64)Footnote 65. Virginia Assembly of 1642-1643, Act XXXVIII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 262-263 (1823).

(n65)Footnote 66. Virginia Assembly of 1642-1643, Act LVIII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 274 (1823).

(n66)Footnote 67. Virginia Assembly of 1644-1645, Act VII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 291 (1823).

(n67)Footnote 68. Virginia Assembly of 1646, Act II, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 326-327 (1823).

(n68)Footnote 69. Virginia Assembly of 1646, Act XIII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 331 (1823).

(n69)Footnote 70. Virginia Assembly of 1646, Act XV, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 332 (1823).

(n70)Footnote 71. Virginia Assembly of 1646, Act XXIV, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 335 (1823).

(n71)Footnote 72. Virginia Assembly of 1648, Act VI, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 356 (1823).

(n72)Footnote 73. Virginia Assembly of 1655-1656, Act I, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 396 (1823).

(n73)Footnote 74. Bromfeild v. Crumpe, Virginia Assembly of 1655-56, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 405 (1823).

(n74)Footnote 75. In the matter of Burbage, Virginia Assembly of 1655-1656, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 405 (1823).

(n75)Footnote 76. Virginia Assembly of 1656, Act IV, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 417-418 (1823).

(n76)Footnote 77. Virginia Assembly of 1657-1658, Act LXXXVII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 472 (1823).

(n77)Footnote 78. Virginia Assembly of 1666, Act XIX, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 245 (1823).

(n78)Footnote 79. Virginia Assembly of 1667, Act I, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 256 (1823).

(n79)Footnote 80. Virginia Assembly of 1674, Act VII, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 374 (1823).

(n80)Footnote 81. Virginia Assembly of 1674, Act X, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 321-325 (1823).

(n81)Footnote 82. Alf J. Mapp, Jr., The Virginia Experiment 212 (1987).

(n82)Footnote 83. Virginia Assembly of 1939-40, Acts XXIV, V in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 228 (1823).

(n83)Footnote 84. Kurtz, Sheldon F., Moynihan's Introduction to the Law of Real Property 24-25 (4th ed. 2005).

(n84)Footnote 85. Id. at 23, n.1.

(n85)Footnote 86. Beverly W. Bond, Jr., The Quit-Rent System in the American Colonies 32 (1919, reprint 1965).

(n86)Footnote 87. Virginia Assembly 1642-43, Act LXXII, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 280 (1823). (reiterating that quit rents need not be paid until seven years after the grant).

(n87)Footnote 88. Virginia Assembly of 1645, Act XIV, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 316 (1823).(quitrents could be paid in tobacco at three pennies per pound).

(n88)Footnote 89. Virginia Assembly of 1647, Act XX, in 1 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 351 (1823) (distraint upon the land available as a remedy for delinquency in payment of quitrents).

(n89)Footnote 90. Virginia Assembly of 1660-1661 , Act XXXVI, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 31 (1823) (quitrents payable in tobacco at two pennies per pound).

(n90)Footnote 91. Virginia Assembly of 1661-1662, Act LXXIV, in 2 William Waller Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of All the Laws of Virginia 99 (1823) (quitrents payable in tobacco at two pennies per pound).

(n91)Footnote 92. See generally Beverly W. Bond, Jr., The Quit-Rent System in the American Colonies (1919, reprint 1965).

(n92)Footnote 93. Charles M. Andrews, Introduction to Beverly W. Bond, Jr., The Quit-Rent System in the American Colonies 18-19, 21-22 (1919, reprint 1965). F. Thornton Miller, John Marshall in Spencer Roane's Virginia: The Southern Constitutional Opposition to the Marshall Court, 33 J. Marshall L. Rev. 1131 (Summer 2000).

(n93)Footnote 94. Warren M. Billings, John E. Selby, & Thad W. Tate, Colonial Virginia 56 (1986).

(n94)Footnote 95. Id. at 209-212.

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.03

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.03 Development of Property Law in Massachusetts (from 1620).

§ 6.03(a) The Plymouth Colony.

§ 6.03(a)(1) Origins of the Pilgrims.

Massachusetts' first settlers were Puritans, and the first Puritans in Massachusetts included a particular variety called Separatists, later referred to as "Pilgrims" in William Bradford's history, written many years later. The Puritans in England were a faction, or movement, within the Church of England, that sought to purify doctrine and practice by returning to the original teachings, simplicity and, indeed, austerity of the Christian church. The Separatists agreed but believed that a complete separation from the Anglican church was essential. Though they were in congregations widely scattered throughout England, the Separatists were heavily persecuted by the English government. The congregation in Scrooby, Nottinghamshire, with which William Brewster and William Bradford affiliated, moved to Holland in 1608, settling first in Amsterdam and then in Leiden. Although enjoying religious freedom, they did not have citizenship and were thus limited in occupational possibilities; this kept their economic circumstances depressed. In addition, they felt that their children were being drawn from the faith by their worldly surroundings. n96 The Separatists who came to Massachusetts in 1620 were made up of a portion of the Leiden congregation and additional Separatists from England; about sixty percent of this first group also consisted of those who were not Separatists but were called "Strangers."

§ 6.03(a)(2) The Legal Beginnings of Plymouth Colony.

The legal origin of the Plymouth colony lies in the original Virginia charter of 1606, which extended from 34 to 45 degrees latitude. The group obtaining that first charter consisted of prominent merchants and others from London, Bristol and Plymouth. The London patentees were then authorized to establish the "first colony" in the southern sector of that grant, while the group from Plymouth and Bristol was also authorized to form a joint stock company and establish a "second colony" in the northern sector. Accordingly, the Jamestown settlers of the first group landed in May 1607, and a second group of settlers attempted to found a northern colony in August 1607. Their site, which they named Sagadahoc, was located near the mouth of the Kennebec River in present-day Maine, but they abandoned it a year later:

> After the failure of the experiment at Sagadahoc, the Plymouth patentees limited their efforts to fishing voyages and to the detailed exploration of the coast of northern Virginia. The number of > patentees was small and their resources were limited. They slumbered on while the London merchants procured two new charters, by which the extent of their domain was made more definite, and under the authority of which they successfully founded a colony on the James River. n97

In 1620 the Plymouth patentees successfully petitioned the king for a new charter for northern Virginia, now named New England, seeking rights to the territory between the 40th and 48th parallels from sea to sea. The charter was granted November 3, 1620 -- after the first group of settlers was already well on their way -- and created a new corporation called The Council Established at Plymouth in the County of Devon for the Planting, Ruling, Ordering and Governing of New-England in America, better known as the Council for New England. After reciting the granting of the Virginia charter of 1606 and the separation of the London and Plymouth companies under the Virginia charter of 1609, the provisions of this 1620 New England patent, which are important for the history of colonial property law, are as follows:

> [Various named persons] to be the first Councill ..., [to receive, hold, and dispose of real and personal property] ...
>
> And Wee do further grant that it shall be lawfull for the said Councill, in their discretions to admitt such Persons ... to have any Lands or Hereditaments in New-England, as they shall think fitt, according to the Laws, Orders, Constitutions, and Ordinances, by the said Councill and their Successors from time to time to be made and established by Virtue of, and according to the true Intent of these Presents, ... and also to make all Manner of Orders, Laws, Directions, Instructions, Forms, and Ceremonies of Government and Magistracy fitt and necessary for any concerning the Government of said Collony and Plantation, so always as the same be not contrary to the Laws and Statutes of this our Realme of England ... And Wee do further absolutely give, grant, and confirm unto the said Councill all the aforesaid Lands together also, with the Firme Lands, Soyles, Grounds, to be holden of Us as of our Manor of East-Greenwich, in our County of Kent, in free and common socage and not in Capite nor by Knight's Service... [English settlers, and their children born in the colony, are to have the rights of natural-born Englishmen. Rights granted in previous charters are confirmed, except those altered by this charter]. n98

Meanwhile, in February 1620, the London Company granted a patent to a group of private adventurers, and one member of that group attempted to recruit the Separatists of the Leiden congregation as settlers. Articles of agreement were drawn up between the adventurers (those who were investing funds in the enterprise) and the settlers (principally, the Separatist congregation of Leiden) but, in fact, were never signed because of a dispute over some changes introduced to secure more investors. Specifically, one of the changes deleted provisions securing to the settlers the right to separate houses and home lots for themselves and their families, as well as the right to two days a week in which to work for themselves. Otherwise, the articles established a venture patterned after the arrangements in Virginia: the plantation would be managed as a joint stock company for seven years, with contributions to and withdrawals from a common stock, and with shareholders entitled to a division of land at the end of that time. In the end, the settlers from the Leiden congregation refused to sign the agreement without restoration of desired provisions.

The Mayflower sailed apparently without specific instructions as to where to land, but the colonists probably intended to settle near present-day Manhattan. When they did ultimately land, they were without any rights regarding the region they proposed to settle. They had not formally concluded an agreement with their sponsoring adventurers (who were acting on authority granted to the London Company), and in any event, during their sea crossing, a new royal patent had been issued giving authority over this area to the Plymouth Company. Realizing their ambivalent situation, they undertook the first steps toward self-government:

> I shall a litle returne backe and begine with a combination [the Mayflower Compact] made by them before they came ashore, being the first foundation of their governmente in this place; ... That when they came a shore they would use their own libertie; for none had power to command them, the patente they > had being for Virginia, and not for New-england, which belong to an other Government, with which the Virginia Company had nothing to doe. And partly that such an acte by them done (this their condition considered) might be as firme as any patent, and in some respects more sure. n99

In this agreement they made no mention of government according to the laws of England, but instead agreed to enact such laws as they thought best for the general good of the colony:

> We ... covenant and combine our selves togeather into a civill body politick, for our better ordering and preservation and furtherance of the ends aforesaid; and by vertue hearof to enacte, constitute, and frame such just and equall lawes, ordinances, acts, constitutions, and offices, from time to time, as shall be thought most meete and convenient for the generall good of the Colonie, unto which we promise all due submission and obedience. n100

§ 6.03(a)(3) Early Landholding in Plymouth.

Because the settlers had not signed the articles of agreement that omitted their right to establish separate houses and lots, they quickly created separate homesteads:

> We divided by lot the plot of ground whereon to build our town, after the proportion formerly allotted. We agreed that every man should build his own house, thinking by that course men would make more haste than working in common. n101

Of course, after the brutal hardships of that first winter of 1620-1621, when about half of the 102 original Pilgrims died of disease and exposure, common fields were established adjacent to the settlement and were worked by the common labor of the colonists. Indeed, late in 1621 the articles of agreement were finally signed, without the provisions for individual homesteads, so it is likely that no private labor occurred except around the private dwellings and garden plots already established.

In 1623, well before the division of land scheduled for 1627, the settlers introduced a serious departure from the system of common labor:

> So they began to thinke how they might raise as much corne as they could, and obtaine a beter crope then they had done, that they might not still thus languish in miserie. At length, after much debate of things, the Gov'r (with the advise of the cheefest amongest them) gave way that they should set corne every man for his own perticuler, and in that regard trust to them selves; in all other things to goe on in the general way as before. And so assigned to every family a parcell of land, according to the proportion of their number for that end, only for present use (but made no devission for inheritance), ranged all boys and youth under some familie. This had very good success; for it made all hands very industrious, so as much more corne was planted then other waise would have bene by any means the Gov'r or any other could use, and saved him a great deall of trouble and gave far better contente. n102

Governor Bradford devoted a lengthy comment in his history to the implications of this move toward private property:

> The experience that was had in this commone course and condition, tried sundrie years, and that amongst godly and sober men, may well evince the vanitie of that conceite of Platos and other ancients, applauded by some of later times; -- that the taking away of propertie, and bring in communitie into a comone wealth, would make them happy and florishing; as if they were wiser then God. For this comunities (so far as it was) was found to breed much confusion and discontent, and retard much imployment that would have been to their benefite and comforte. For the yong-men that were most able and fitt for labour and service did repine that they would spend their time and streingth to worke for other mens wives and children, with out any recompence. The strong, or man of parts, had not more in > devission of victails and cloaths, then he that was weake and not able to doe a quarter the other could; this was thought injuestice. The aged and graver men to be ranke and equalised in labours, and victails, cloaths, etc., with the meaner and yonger sort, thought it some indignite and disrespect unto them. And for mens wives to be commanded to doe servise for other men, as dresing their meat, washing their cloaths, etc., they deemd it a kind of slaverie, neither could many husbands well brooke it. Upon the poynte all being to have alike, and all to doe alike, they thought themselves in the like condition, and one as good as another; and so, if it did not cut of those relations that God hath set amongest men, yet it did at least much diminish and take of the mutuall respects that should be preserved amongst them. And would have bene worse if they had been men of another condition. Let none object this is men's corruption, and nothing to the course it selfe. I answer, seeing all men have this corruption in them, God in his wisdome saw another course fiter for them. n103

Later that year additional colonists arrived, including a group known as the "Perticulers," accompanied by instructions that they should receive separate allotments of land but should remain under the colonial government. Their allotments were assigned within the town itself, and because they did not participate in the common labor, they were taxed.

Because of the success realized from the experiment of letting the settlers plant corn for themselves, the settlers each received in perpetuity an acre of land near the town.

By this time, the colony's "chain of title" problems had been partially resolved. As soon as it was realized that the colony was north of the 40th parallel, and therefore subject to the New England Council, the group that in 1620 had obtained a grant for New England lands from the London Company in June 1621, obtained a deed of grant from the New England Council. The grantees' original London grant had been rendered obsolete by the patent given the Plymouth Company in November 1620, and the June 1621 grant from the New England Council was based on the authority of that patent. The new grant > contained simply a grant of land, in amount proportional to the number of permanent settlers ... No attempt was made to bound the grant or to specify its location otherwise than by the statement that the land taken up should not lie within ten miles of any other English settlement, unless the two were on opposite sides of some large navigable river. Provision was made for the payment to the council of a quitrent of two shillings per hundred acres. The patentees were temporarily granted the power to issue such ordinances as were necessary "for their better government," and to put them into execution through elected officers. They were also promised that, if after seven years the request was presented, the grantees should be incorporated with some fit name and received additional powers of government ... n104

Notwithstanding these provisions, in 1627 the settlers and their sponsoring adventurers/investors decided to part company. The settlers agreed to buy-out the adventurers' interests for a specified sum of money, with eight of the most prosperous planters acting as sureties. About the time this agreement was reached, the period of required joint land tenure expired, and the heads of families and young men assembled to work out a division of the tillable land. A division of arable land near the town was worked out by lot, with the more remote land and meadow being left as common. In 1633 the meadow was also divided because of increasing numbers of livestock and the need for more hay. To pay off the debt, the trade of the colony continued to be carried out on a joint basis. The planters also obtained patents for other settlements, but only the satellite settlement on the Kennebec River continued for very long. When the colony's last debts were finally paid in 1646, it completed the process of change from a proprietary plantation to a corporate colony.

The Plymouth colony received another patent in 1629, the so-called "Warwick Patent," issued in the name of William Bradford, who, as governor, held the grant as trustee for the colony. The political development of the colony was unaffected by the patent. Eventually, settlements were commenced, which became towns with their own local officials and the power to grant land. The first of these was Scituate in 1636, followed by Duxbury in 1637, and others in close succession. These towns remained a part of Plymouth colony and were subject to colonial supervision in several important respects. In 1641 Bradford surrendered his trusteeship and assigned the patent to the freemen of the colony.

§ 6.03(a)(4) The Foundation of English Land Law in Plymouth.

In addition to patents and charters, the colony also issued numerous decisions in legal disputes, as well as legislative pronouncements on specific issues. Periodically, the laws in force were gathered into "codes," or compilations, that revealed the colonists' attitudes towards sources of law, and the efficacy of English law in general. Four compilations of Plymouth's colonial laws were issued during the 17th century, in 1636, 1658, 1671, and 1684. The significance of the 1636 code has been characterized as follows:

> The compilation of 1636 has been variously described as the first comprehensive body of law to be enacted in North America, as the first American code of laws, and as a simple model upon which subsequent bodies of American law were patterned. All of those claims can easily be defended, but from the point of view of the framers the compilation was regarded as the "ordering of a body politick" agreeable to the Mayflower Compact and the Warwick patent [issued in 1629]. Some of its clauses were based upon English law and custom, such as the regulation of inheritances according to the custom of East Greenwich, and the requirement that jury trials be conducted as nearly as possible to English practice. In other instances, such as the provision for civil marriage, equality of descent, liberal provisions for women and widows, and the institution of a recording system, all unknown in England, we find partly an attempt to fill the needs of a frontier society and partly the Puritan predilection to enact laws based upon scriptural authority. The discretionary power of Magistrates, for example, was based upon Romans 13, the division of lands upon Deuteronomy 21, civil marriage upon Ruth 4, and capital offenses upon various admonitions.
>
> Two months after the compilation of 1636 was enacted, the General Court met in legislative session and passed six additional miscellaneous measures; it marked the beginning of a regular legislative process that was to continue unabated until the demise of the colony. n105

Several passages of the 1636 code suggest that a comprehensive basis of English law existed even in Plymouth. In Act 1 the drafters declare:

> And finding that as freeborne subjects of the State of England we hither came indewed with all and singular the priviledges belonging to such, in the first place we think good that it be established for an act. That according to the ... due priviledge of the subject aforesaid no imposicon of law or ordnance be made or imposed upon us by ourselves [or others at] present or to come but such as shall be made [or] imposed by consent according to the free liberties [of the] State and Kingdome of England and no otherwise. n106

Other provisions relating to reliance on English law or, specifically, to regulation of real property rights are as follows:

> That all trialls whether Capitall or between man and man be tryed by Jewryes according to the presidents of the law of England as neer as may be. n107
>
> That all sales exchanges gifts and morgages leases or other Conveyances of howses and land and the sale to be acknowledged before the Gov'r or any one of the Assistants and committed to publick Record and the fees to be payd. n108
>
> That Inheritance to descend according to the commendable custome of England and hold of East Greenwich. n109

> That If the husband died the wife shal have a third pt of his land during her life and a 3d of his goods to be at her owne disposing. n110

In 1658 a new compilation replaced that of 1636 and subsequent legislation. A lengthy preamble contained:

> a succinct summary of the puritan philosophy of law, which held essentially that the only true law was the law of God as revealed in His Holy Scriptures, and that laws made by man must be derived from them and conformable to them in all respects. The puritans found the divine origins of all civil authority in the thirteenth part of Romans, and the introduction to the 1658 compilation stressed that God had endowed man with right judgment and true laws (Scripture) as well as with a capacity to be guided by "good and wholesome lawes" derived from and agreeable to the "Ancient platforme of God's Lawe." The framers then went on to proclaim that they had been guided accordingly in the preparation of the new revision of the laws. n111

The code also declared that its drafters:

> "the Associates of New Plymouth coming hether as freeborne Subjects of the State of England [this impersonal reference to the government was used during the Commonwealth] Indowed with all and singular priviledges belong to such [do enact that law] which is according to the free liberties of the State of England." n112

The 1658 code served until a new code was produced in 1671, which included an entire chapter (Chapter X) of five sections, devoted to "Lands, Inheritances, and Wills." These sections covered the tenure of landholding, acknowledgement of conveyances, lands held in partnership, escheat of estates, and a statute of limitations. The chapter concludes with the statement, "It having been the usual manner and custome of this Court, as much as may be to have recourse to the commendable Laws of England in such case wherein there is no other Law by this Court provided more suitable to our condition." n113

A final code of the colony was drawn up in 1684 and published in 1685. It, too, devoted a chapter (Chapter XII) to "Lands and Inheritances," that was substantially similar to the counterpart provisions of the 1671 code. One detail was added to specifically invoke English law in a matter of real property: "It is Ordered and Declared by this Court and the Authority thereof; That all Lands heretofore Intailed, and that shall be Intailed hereafter, shall descend and enure as by the Law of England the same ought to do." n114

However, signaling that no wholesale reception of English property law should be presumed, the very next section made an original modification of primogeniture:

> It is Ordered and Declared, etc. That all the Sons of any Person, having Lands in fee simple, shall be Heirs (paying and satisfying in case as is by Law provided) the Eldest Son shall have double to any of his Brethren; and all the younger equal Shares of the Land of their Ancestors; and where there is but one Sone, he shall be sole Heir, paying and satisfying, as aforesaid; And where there is no Son, all the Daughters shall Inherit alike." n115

Even taking full account of the Plymouth settlers' religious motivation, it must still be conceded that the availability of land was a powerful inducement for immigration, and that English land law was still the foundation of property rights. Eventually, the attraction of seemingly unlimited acreage helped weaken the cohesion of Plymouth colony:

> Bradford, to whom Plymouth was a Zion, deplored the trend of his friends, colleagues, and fellow settlers to desert Plymouth in favor of greater acres elsewhere. "But yet seeking to keep the people together as much as might be," Bradford wrote, they agreed that the owners of the near acres would share their land with the owners of the far acres, and thus Plymouth could be kept as a compact community...

> In his account of the year 1632, Bradford laments that "there was no longer holding them together, and they must of necessity go to their great lots...." Still trying to keep Plymouth together as much as possible, Bradford records that "to prevent any further scattering from this place and weakening of the same, it was thought best to give out some good farms to special persons that would promise to live at Plymouth ...." These favored people would keep their cattle and farms there, maintained by servants, but would themselves continue living in Plymouth. "But, alas," cried Bradford, with the benefit of hindsight, "this remedy proved worse than the disease."
>
> ... [T]he promise of land grants was an important inducement in attracting servants to Plymouth Colony, and some of these servants eventually acquired considerable land holdings... In fact, a perusal of court records shows the court handing out grants [to servants and free persons] as if land were one of the world's cheaper commodities, a procedure which could not continue indefinitely... The abandonment of primogeniture from the beginning guaranteed that holdings would on the average get smaller as a number of sons inherited from a father. n116

The development of land law in Plymouth was inevitably similar to, and eventually was merged with, the counterpart land history in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. As the Massachusetts Colony resisted imposition of English trade controls, its charter was revoked by King Charles II in 1684. King James II began his rule in 1685 and established a royal government in Massachusetts in 1686, but he was overthrown in 1688. William and Mary granted the colony a new charter in 1691, which combined the Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay colonies. n117

§ 6.03(b) The Massachusetts Bay Colony.

§ 6.03(b)(1) Events Leading to the First Charter.

The Plymouth colony's parent governing authority, the New England Council in England, made an attempt to recruit more investors by specifying the land they would receive for their investors' shares. The colony was divided on paper into vast tracts proposed for grants under feudal tenures, but no effective efforts to take possession of or colonize such grants were made by the council or any of the investors-adventurers:

> Since ... no steps were taken by those adventurers who had received allotments in 1623 to improve them or even to take out patents for them, all that could be done by the council was to grant its domain in parcels to such as would undertake to found private or subordinate public plantations. It was too weak to directly colonize or govern... It was ... proposed that all patents should be called for, perused, and confirmed, if the council saw fit; that a surveyor should be sent over to set the bounds of every grant that had been made, and that other steps should be taken to uphold the monopoly of the council, and to regulate affairs within its domain. But no effective measures were taken to execute these plans. n118

Several of these individual grants were made over the years, but few were perfected and of even fewer was seisin actually taken. The grants were not carefully drawn and often overlapped, conflicted with, or superseded other grants, even occasionally grants that were being actively settled. When the council made grants for private plantations, it specified that the tenants or freeholders should not alienate without prior council approval and that a certain number of people should be settled, with livestock and other possessions, within five years after the grant was issued. The product of the land and of related trade would typically be managed in common between the grantee who actually settled the land and the partners in England who helped underwrite the grant. At the end of the five-year period, the land and accumulated profits would be divided between the settler and the other partners, and the partnership would be dissolved. This pattern was typical of many smaller settlements in the area.

The New England Council also planned to make grants with governmental institutions in the nature of sub-fiefs. Conferred on these public plantations were the powers to call assemblies, make laws, and appoint magistrates. The council actually had no right to grant such powers without first obtaining the sanction of the monarch.

Although the number of grants that materialized into settlements was relatively small, development was steady. In 1623 a group of adventurers from Dorchester, England, founded a fishing station at Cape Ann, after first securing a permit from Plymouth settlers who also occupied the area under an indenture from an English nobleman. The enterprise struggled, prompting the adventurers to abandon the enterprise in 1626, and thereafter the Dorchester settlers moved a short distance west to the area of modern Salem. Obtaining a patent from the New England Council for their new territory in 1628, the grantees, who were not incorporated, were granted the land for themselves, their heirs and their assigns, with no governmental powers. They became direct tenants of the monarch, because subinfeudation had not been permitted since the Statute Quia Emptores of 1290. In March 1629, after adding new associates, the group obtained a royal charter confirming the territorial grant and adding full powers of incorporation and of government, thus creating the company of Massachusetts Bay.

§ 6.03(b)(2) Early Landholding in Massachusetts Bay.

The charter of the Massachusetts Bay Company was patterned after the charter of the London Company from two decades earlier. Quarter courts, elections, a governor and other officials, and associated powers were all provided for in the charter. By way of difference, the Massachusetts charter called for a quorum of six in order to conduct business and permitted its membership to be enlarged by the addition of "freemen." The plantation was instructed to acquire and extinguish Indian claims by purchase. While fishing was conducted as a joint enterprise, joint landholding was never practiced at Salem:

> The planters were under no contract which required it, and in the summer of 1629 an instruction was sent to [Governor] Endicott to allot to the adventurers in the proportion of two acres for each sum of 50, or fraction or multiple thereof, which was invested in the enterprise. The grantees were given the liberty to build and improve where they pleased, except that a tract should be reserved for a town. A town lot one-half acre in extent should also be granted to each adventurer who desired it. Planters who had also purchased shares in the common stock should receive fifty acres for each person in their families, while persons other than adventurers who brought families at their own expense into the colony should receive fifty acres for the master of the family and such additional allotments as, "according to their charge and quality," might be provided through special agreement with the company or by the magistrates in the colony. Those who brought or at their own charge sent servants into the colony should receive fifty acres for each of them. No mention is made in the records of the requirement of a quitrent on any of the grants to adventurers, but those who were not such must annually render suit or service... Provision was made in the scheme for private plantations... [T]he company also had its plantations, which were cultivated by servants and managed by the governor under instructions from England. It thus appears that, before it had been in existence a year, the colony at Salem reached the stage of development which was inaugurated in Virginia by Governor Dale. n119

Of special significance in this early history of the Massachusetts Bay Colony is the omission from the charter of the usual clause requiring election of the governor and officers in England. The omission was probably intentional from the colonists' perspective; from the royal ministers' perspective, the omission was probably inadvertent, or at least undesired. Even without the English residency requirement, the colony's corporation still conducted its business in England for several months after the charter was granted. The removal to New England was effected in the spring of 1630, as virtually all the officers, and several patentees, together with their charter, made the Atlantic crossing. With this transfer, the company's direct involvement in colonial trading ceased; trade was carried on as private enterprise, subject to the regulations of the colonial government.

At this same time, the corporation, now resident in New England, no longer functioned as a land company and did not seek to profit from land transactions. Indeed, the company was not even able to cultivate its own lands because there was so much sickness when the immigrants of 1630 arrived that even the company's servants had to be released to engage in agriculture in their own behalf. The newcomers soon established seven small settlements around the bay. The seat of government was moved from Salem to Charlestown, and then to Boston. These settlements became towns, which as communities were the grantees of the company land. The towns' proprietors held the lands within their boundaries either in common or conveyed the lands to individual grantees. Monetary gain seemed to play no role in these grants: no quitrents were established, the land was seldom sold or leased, and rent was a rarity. It is also significant that as numerous persons applied as "freemen" for membership in the corporation later in 1630, an additional qualification was added, that they must be "members of some of the churches within the lymitts [of the body politic]."

The fundamental form of land regulation in effect in the Massachusetts Bay Colony was, in most respects, identical to that of Plymouth:

> The form of group settlement which we have seen developing in Plymouth was reproduced throughout New England, and wherever New Englanders settled. The joint action of the settlers in locating dwellings and home lots, in laying out village streets, in subdividing the adjacent arable land, in subjecting the meadow and forest for a time to common management, resulted in the founding of the town of Plymouth...
>
> That which occurred at Plymouth happened also at Salem, in each of the settlements about Massachusetts bay, in the towns of Plymouth colony, as one after another they came into existence, among the settlements of northern New England, in the towns which were founded on the shores of Narrangansett bay and along the course of the Connecticut river. On Long Island, too, and wherever in New Jersey New Englanders found their abode, the same form of settlement was reproduced. n120

In none of the New England colonies were land sales intended to be a primary source of public profit. No colony established a land office; land was not sold directly by a colony and was rarely rented. Most land grants were to towns, which then re-granted to individual settlers, acting with delegated authority from the colony. Quite a high degree of regulation was imposed in both the founding and development of towns. As to those fields held in common, an 1643 act of Massachusetts colony gave typical direction:

> Whereas it is found by experience that there hath bene much trouble and difference in severall townes about the manner of planting, sowing, and feeding of common corne fields, & that upon serious consideration wee finde no generall order can provide for the best improvement of every such common field, by reason that some consists onely of plowing ground, some haveing a great part fit only for planting, some of meadowe & feeding ground; also so that such an order a may bee very wholesome and good for one field may be exceeding priudiciall & inconvenient for another, -- it is therefore ordered, that, where the commoners cannot agree about the manner of improvement of their field, either concerning the kind of graine that shall be sowen or set therein, or concerning the time or manner of feeding the herbage thereof, that three such persons in the several townes that are deputed to order the prudential affairs thereof, shall order the same, or in case where no such are, then the maior part of the freemen, who are hereby enioyned with what convenient speed they may to determine any such difference as may arise upon any information given them by said commissioners.

Thus, throughout New England there was substantial similarity in the > system followed by those colonies in the establishment of plantations, the recognition of them as towns, the fixing and maintenance of their bounds, the regulation of the granting of lands, of common fields, fences, herds, the punishment of trespass, the admission of inhabitants and freeholders, the requirement that fence-viewers and pound-keepers should be appointed, [and] that records of land titles should be kept... n121

§ 6.03(b)(3) The Role of Towns in New England Private Landholding.

The conspicuous role of the New England towns in bringing about a broad base of private landownership has been well summarized by Osgood:

> The most prominent feature of the New England land system was the town grant, which in every case became the territorial basis of a group settlement. Though grants were made by the general court to individuals, they were the exception rather than the rule. The result was that the landed estate of nearly every individual in New England was located in one or more towns, and was subject to the regulations which were made by town for the management of land. The territorial affairs of the colony were largely administered through the towns as agencies. Land passed from joint control to individual ownership chiefly by means of town allotments. The towns came nearer to performing the function of proprietors than did any other administrative bodies in New England.
>
> In the corporate colonies, moreover, the characteristic elements of the fief were lacking. The quitrent does not appear as a distinct form of income, and land was not extensively leased. The result was that the tenement or holding, which was so characteristic of English land law, was practically obliterated, and an allodial system was substituted. Had the New England governments sought revenue from the land in the form of rents, this result could not have followed. A system of tenure would have been perpetuated, and the general court would have acted as proprietor. As it was, the court avoided the private legal attitude toward land, and kept itself well within the range of public law. The only revenue which it sought from land was in the form of taxes. This is one of the most notable consequences which resulted from the founding of the corporate colonies of New England. n122

§ 6.03(b)(4) Property Regulation and Codification of Laws in Massachusetts Bay.

A more general influence on the development of property law in the Massachusetts Bay Colony was the adoption of a code of laws. The drafting process actually began in 1635, but the long delay in accepting a draft resulted from the colonists' reluctance to frame laws in anticipation of conditions that might require imposition of those laws. There was also resistance to limiting colonial laws to those that were consistent with laws of England, as required by the charter. Nevertheless, in 1641 a code was accepted by the colony's General Court, and styled "A Coppie of the Liberties of the Massachusets Collonie in New England." This original code was never printed, but it was officially adopted in 1644, so manuscript copies could be made. Revisions were cumulated into a collection published in 1648 as the famous Book of the General Lauues and Libertyes Concerning the Inhabitants of the Massachusets. Provisions relating to real property are as follows:

> It is therfore ordered by this Court, & Authority therof, That no mans life shall be taken away; no mans honour or good name shall be stayned; no mans person shall be arrested, restrained, bannished, dismembred nor any wayes punished; no man shall be deprived of his wife or children; no mans goods or estate shall be taken away from him; nor any wayes indammaged under colour of Law or countenance of Authoritie unles it be by the vertue or equity or some expresse of law of the Country warranting the same established by a General Court & sufficiently published; or in case of the defect of a law in any particular case by the word of God. And in capital cases, or in cases concerning dismembring or banishment, according to that word to be judged by the General Court.
>
> Abilitie. All persons the age of twenty-one years, and of right understanding & meamorie whether excommunicate, condemned or other, shall have full power and libertie to make their Wills & Testaments & other lawfull Alienations of their lands and estates. n123
>
> Age. It is ordered by this Court & the Authoritie therof, that the age for passing away of lands, or such kinde of hereditaments, or for giving of votes, verdicts or sentences in any civil courts or causes, shall be twenty and one years: but in case of chusing of Guardions, fourteen years.

Conveyances fraudulent. It is ordered by this Court and the Authoritie therof, That all covenons or fraudulent alienations or conveyances of lands, tenements or any hereditaments shall be of no validitie to defeat any man from due debts or legacyes, or from any just title, claim or possession of that which is so fraudulently conveyed.

For avoiding all fraudulent conveyances and that every man may know that estate or interest other man have in any houses, lands or other hereditaments they are to deal in, it is therefore ordered by the authoritie of this Court;

That after the end of October 1640 no morgage, bargain, sale, or graunt made of any houses, lands, rents or other hereditaments where the Graunter remains in possession, shall be of force against other persons except the Graunter and his Heirs, unles the same be acknowledged before some Magistrate & recorded as is heerafter expressed: and that no such bargain, sale or graunt already made, in way of morgage, where the Graunter remains in possession shall be of force against other but the Graunter or his Heirs, except the same shall be entred as is heerafter expressed within one month after the date aforementioned: if the partie be within this Jurisdiction or else within three months after he shal return...

Deeds and writings. It is ordered by this court and Authoritie thereof; That no conveyance, deed or promise whatsoever shall be of validitie, if it be gotten by illegal violance, imprisonment, threatening or any kinde of forcible compulson, called Dures.

Dowries. Forasmuch as no provision have yet been made for any certain maintainance for Wives after the death of their Husbands, be it ordered and enacted by this present Court and Authoritie therof;

That every married Woman (living with her Husband in this Jurisdiction or other where absent from him with his consent or through his meer default, or inevitable providence, or in case of divorce where she is the innocent partie) that shall not before marriage be estated by way of joynture in some houses, lands, tenements or other hereditaments for term of her life, shall immediately after the death of her Husband have right and interest by way of dower, in, and to one third part of all such houses, lands, tenements, rents and hereditaments as her said Husband was seized of, to his own use, either in possession, reversion or remainder in any estate of inheritance ... at any time during the marriage to have and injoy for term of her natural life according to the estate of such Husband free, and freely discharged of and from al titles, debts, rents, charges, judgements, executions and other incumbrances...

Escheats. It is ordered by this Court and Authoritie therof, That where no Heir or Owner of houses, lands, tenements, goods or chattels can be found: they shall be seized to the publick Treasurie till such Heirs or owner shall make due claim therto, unto whom they shall be restored upon just and reasonable terms.

Indians. It is ordered by Authoritie of this Court; that no person whatsoever shall henceforth buy land of any Indian, without licence first had & obtained of the General Court: and if any shall offend heerin, such land so bought shall be forfeited to the Countrie.

Lands, Free lands. It is ordered, and by this Court declared; that all our Lands and Heritages shall be free from all Fines and Licenses upon alienations, and from all Hariots, Wardships, Liveries, Primerseizins, year, day and wast, Escheats and forfeitures, upon the death of Parents or Ancesters, be they natural, unnatural, casual, or judicial and that for ever.

Liberties Common. It is ordered by this Court, decreed and declared...

Every Inhabitant who is an hous-holder shall have free fishing and fowling, in any great Ponds, Bayes, Coves and Rivers so far as the Sea ebs and flows, within the precincts of the town where they > dwell, unles the Free-men of the same town, or the General Court have otherwise appropriated them. Provided that no town shall appropriate to any particular person or persons, any great Pond conteining more then ten acres of land: and that no man shall come upon anothers proprietie without their leave otherwise then as heerafter expressed; the which clearly to determin, it is declared that in all creeks, coves and other places, about and upon salt water where the Sea ebs and flows, the Proprietor of the land adjoyning shall have proprietie to the low water mark where the Sea doeth not ebb above a hundred rods, and not more wheresoever it ebs farther...

>
> Wills intestate. It is ordered, and by this Court declared; that when Parents dye intestate, the eldest son shall have a double portion of his whole estate, reall, and personall unles the General Court upon just cause alledged shall Judge otherwise. And when parents dye intestate, having no Heirs males of their bodyes, their daughters shall inherit as copartners, unles the General Court upon just reason shall judge otherwise. n124

Additional compilations of Massachusetts laws were issued in 1660 and 1672. A revision begun in 1679 became moot when the colony's charter was revoked in 1684. In 1692 Massachusetts was merged with Plymouth, Maine, Nova Scotia, Nantucket, Martha's Vineyard and the Elizabeth Islands into the Royal Province of Massachusetts Bay in New-England, and legislative activity resumed. A new compilation of laws was then issued in 1699. Occupying 158 printed pages in its published form, this 1699 code provided much more detailed enactments for the various activities relating to land, but it introduced no matters that would have been unfamiliar to one schooled in English law of the time. n125

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 96. William Bradford, Of Plymouth Plantation 25 (Samuel Eliot Morison ed. 1959).

(n2)Footnote 97. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 98 (1904).

(n3)Footnote 98. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History 1606-1775) 24-33 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n4)Footnote 99. Bradford's History of Plymouth Plantation 106 (William T. Davis ed. 1908).

(n5)Footnote 100. Id. at 107.

(n6)Footnote 101. As reported in 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 110 (1904).

(n7)Footnote 102. Bradford's History of Plymouth Plantation 146 (William T. Davis ed. 1908).

(n8)Footnote 103. Id. at 146-147.

(n9)Footnote 104. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 116 (1904).

(n10)Footnote 105. The Laws of the Pilgrims xiv (John D. Cushing ed. 1977) (a facsimile edition of The Book of the General Laws of the Inhabitants of the Jurisdiction of New-Plimouth 1672 & 1685, introduction by John D. Cushing).

(n11)Footnote 106. 11 Records of the Colony of New Plymouth in New England 6 (David Pulsifer ed. 1861).

(n12)Footnote 107. Id. at 12.

(n13)Footnote 108. Id.

(n14)Footnote 109. Id.

(n15)Footnote 110. Id. at 13.

(n16)Footnote 111. The Laws of the Pilgrims xv (John D. Cushing ed. 1977) (a facsimile edition of The Book of the General Laws of the Inhabitants of the Jurisdiction of New-Plimouth 1672 & 1685, introduction by John D. Cushing).

(n17)Footnote 112. 11 Records of the Colony of New Plymouth in New England 78 (David Pulsifer ed. 1861).

(n18)Footnote 113. Id., 1671 Code at 34-35.

(n19)Footnote 114. Id., 1685 Code at 42.

(n20)Footnote 115. Id.

(n21)Footnote 116. Eugene Aubrey Stratton, Plymouth Colony, Its History & People 1620-1691 at 169-170, 176-177 (1986).

(n22)Footnote 117. David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from A Shared History Part II: How Anglo-American Land Law Diverged After American Colonization and Independence, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 295 (Summer 1999).

(n23)Footnote 118. Eugene Aubrey Stratton, Plymouth Colony, Its History & People 1620-1691 at 122-123 (1986).

(n24)Footnote 119. Id. at 135-136.

(n25)Footnote 120. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 424 (1904).

(n26)Footnote 121. Id. at 435.

(n27)Footnote 122. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 16 (1904).

(n28)Footnote 123. In the 1641 laws, a disability status was attached to married women, but this had apparently been repealed by the time of the 1648 code:

> 14. Any Conveyance or Alienation of land or other estaite what so ever, made by any woman that is married, any childe under age, Ideott, or distracted person, shall be good, if it be passed and ratified by the consent of a generall Court.

Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History 1606-1775 at 72, 75 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n29)Footnote 124. 1 The Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts 1641-1691, 3-61 (John D. Cushing ed. 1976).

(n30)Footnote 125. See Massachusetts Province Laws 1692-1699, 17-178 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.04

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.04 Development of Property Law in New Hampshire (from 1623).

§ 6.04(a) Legal Origins of the Earliest Settlements.

The territory of present-day New Hampshire was explored by Englishmen perhaps as early as 1583. In 1614 Captain John Smith sailed north from Virginia and perused the coast, reporting his pleasure at the prospect of fine land free of feudal restraints and available in abundance:

> Here should be no hard landlords to rack us with high rents, or extorted fines to consume us; here every man may be master and owner of his own labor and land in a short time...." n126

He would have been disappointed that the two English aristocrats principally responsible for New Hampshire's earliest settlements had a different view of land rights:

> Smith's dream of a colony where landlords and quitrents should be unknown was far enough from the plans of [Captain John] Mason or [Sir Ferdinando] Gorges. They believed fully in the patents and monopolies which excited popular and parliamentary hostility in the Stuart reigns, and they aimed at baronies and lordships in New England similar to those of England and Scotland. They were ready to spend money in colonizing, but the colonists were to be their tenants, governed by their kindred and friends as a ruling class...
>
> Mason and Gorges preferred a colony resembling what Virginia soon became, -- an aristocracy closely depended on the crown, and supplied with a loyal clergy selected by careful English bishops, who should preach passive obedience, so far as the turbulence of new colonies would permit that servile doctrine. n127

In what is now the state of New Hampshire, the first permanent European settlements were not coincident with status as a separate colony. Two of the first four New Hampshire settlements, Dover and Portsmouth, had their legal origins in the 1620 charter that created the corporation known as the Council for New England and which was given jurisdiction over all of New England.

By a grant in 1621 the council had validated the settlement at Plymouth and later would authorize the grants for the Massachusetts Bay Colony. To boost its flagging efforts in recruiting investors for colonization, the council began to grant its domain to individual "adventurers" who would undertake to settle and cultivate the land. Only a few of these grants ever materialized into settlements or private plantations, but two of them were in New Hampshire, at Hilton's Point, later known as Dover, and at Strawbery Banke, later known as Portsmouth. Edward Hilton received an informal council grant for Dover and built up the settlement between 1623 and 1628. The grant was formalized in March of 1630. Of these grants, it was stated earlier in this chapter that:

> The grants were not carefully drawn and often overlapped, conflicted with, or superseded other grants, even occasionally grants that were being actively settled. When the council made grants for private plantations, it specified that the tenants or freeholders should not alienate without prior council approval and that a certain number of people should be settled, with livestock and other possessions, within five years after the grant was issued. The product of the land and of related trade would typically be managed in common between the grantee who actually settled the land and the partners in England who helped underwrite the grant. At the end of the five year period, the land and accumulated profits would be divided between the settler and the other partners, and the partnership would be dissolved. This pattern was typical of many smaller settlements in the area. n128

Among the other individual grants made by the New England Council was a patent issued in March 1622, to Captain John Mason for lands lying between the Salem and Merrimac Rivers in present-day northern Massachusetts. In August 1622, Mason and Gorges obtained a joint grant of lands between the Merrimac and Kennebec Rivers, covering part of present-day New Hampshire and southern Maine, and designated the province of Maine.

Then on November 7, 1629, the part of the joint grant to Mason and Gorges lying between the Piscataqua and Merrimac Rivers was re-granted by the council to John Mason, individually, to be called New Hampshire. Ten days later, a group styling itself the "Laconia Company" -- including Mason, Gorges and others -- obtained a large, vague grant of land in the region, for the exploiting of which the group established settlements on both sides of the mouth of the Piscataqua River, the southern settlement being known as Strawbery Banke. A patent to the Piscataqua lands being settled was obtained by the Laconia Company in November 1631. In 1634 Mason and Gorges, the two principal investors, purchased the lands of the Laconia Company on the northeast bank of the Piscataqua River from others who withdrew from the company, while other company lands southwest of the river remained in common ownership. In 1635, however, Mason obtained from the New England Council a grant, called New Hampshire, confirming all his previous grants, but he died before that latest grant could be confirmed.

§ 6.04(b) Landholding Rights in the Earliest Settlements.

The language of this unconfirmed charter tells much about the assumptions underlying landholding rights in these colonial ventures: Mason was to have "power over the land and water, forests, mines, and fisheries, according to the right and powers 'had, used and enjoyed by the now or any former Bishop of Duresme within the County Palatine of Duresme.' " n129 The people of New Hampshire and their descendants > were to be "holden, reputed and had as the faithful liege people of Us [the crown], our heirs and successors, originally springing up within our Realm of England." And they were to take by descent or purchase, and freely possess, property in the three kingdoms, as if living therein; and to have "all the liberties, franchises and privileges of this our realm of England, without any impediment whatsoever, -- any statute to the contrary notwithstanding...

>
> ... Power also was given to Mason and his heirs, "lest the way to honor and renown might seem difficult and hard to find in so remote and far distant a country," to create and bestow titles, "so they be such as in England now are in use," and "to create villages and into boroughs, and boroughs into cities... We do declare and ordain, that the said Province of New Hampshire shall be immediately subject to our > Crown of England, and dependent upon the same for ever." n130

These provisions were never confirmed and thus remained only expressions of intent and assumption. After Mason's death the Laconia Company went bankrupt, and the New England Council also dissolved, leaving the Hilton and Stawbery Banke settlers without governing authority. The various grants just described could be, and occasionally were, interpreted to overlap, and there was also a competing claim of the Massachusetts Bay Company to the entire area, so the potential for conflict over governance and over land titles was great.

As to landholding itself, the patents were quite consistent in conferring full ownership on the patentees. According to the 1622 grant of "Maine" from the New England Council to Gorges and Mason:

> Now this Indenture witnesseth that the said President and Councill ... doe give grant ... and confirme unto the said Sir Ferdinando Gorges & Captain John Mason their heirs and assignes all that part of the maine land in New England ... n131

Likewise, the grant to Mason called "New Hampshire" in 1629 was in terms of full ownership: " ... the said President and Council ... do give, grant ... and confirm unto the said Captain John Mason, his Heires and Assigns, all that Part of the main Land in New-England [description of grant] ... which said Portions of Lands with the Appurtenances, the said Captain John Mason, with the Consent of the President and Council intends to name New-Hampshire:...." n132 Both the 1622 and 1629 grants cited the 1620 grants to the New England Council as the source of their rights to make grants.

A third source of New Hampshire settlement emerged in 1638, when religious dissenter John Wheelwright, under sentence of banishment from Massachusetts, purchased lands in the Piscataqua region from the Indians. In 1639 the 35 families in this settlement entered into a civil compact that acknowledged loyalty to the English monarch, but only "according to the libertys of our English Colony of Massachusetts." n133

A fourth area of settlement in New Hampshire was opened directly by Massachusetts, which in 1636 directed the establishment of a plantation at Hampton. The settlement was granted town status in 1639, so that:

> by 1640, there were four separate and unrelated settlements in New Hampshire, each originating from England (Dover and Strawbery Banke, or Portsmouth) or Massachusetts (Exeter and Hampton). All faced a generally similar frontier environment but reacted to it according to their own needs and interests as they interpreted them. n134

At this key point in the history of New Hampshire colony, it could be said that:

> The confusion of patents and grants, whether made by the king, by the New England Council, by the towns of Massachusetts before 1642, or by Massachusetts afterwards, was very great at first, and continued to be a source of litigation for nearly a century and a half. The patents of the Hiltons on the Piscataqua, and of Thomas Wiggin in what is now Stratham, though conflicting with the general grants made to Mason and Gorges, were sustained by the local courts; and in Wiggin's case he was finally taxed in the town of Hampton, though never residing within its proper limits. The Hiltons, opposing the claim of Mrs. Mason to the ownership of their land, which at one time was allotted to her, finally recovered it... n135

§ 6.04(c) Landholding Rights After Massachusetts Assumed Control.

In 1640 the Dover settlers, fearing a takeover by Massachusetts, entered into a civil compact known as the Dover Combination, by which they pledged loyalty to the laws of England "together with all such orders as shall be concluded by a major part of the freemen of our Society." n136 However, for various reasons the inhabitants of all four early New Hampshire settlements by 1643 had acquiesced in Massachusett's assertion of jurisdiction over their territories.

Massachusetts hegemony in New Hampshire prevailed until 1679, when the crown ordered Massachusetts to withdraw from the New Hampshire communities and appointed a royal governor. Throughout this period and extending until 1746, land titles and incidents were in a constant state of tension because heirs and successors of the Mason grants persisted in asserting their claims against the colonial occupants of the land. From time to time, these claims were instrumental in the long effort to bring about the withdrawal of Massachusetts from New Hampshire.

> [Mason's] grandiose plans for founding a hereditary principality in American might even then have been realized had he not suddenly died in 1635... The validity of Mason's claims to his vast holdings, and their subsequent disposition, were to be the source of endless altercation and political confusion, typing up hundreds of acres of land for almost 125 years. The litigations, changes of ownership, sales, claims, counterclaims, comings and goings of Mason descendants trying to secure their inheritance -- and the boundary and border disputes that resulted -- are an inextricable part of New Hampshire history. n137

§ 6.04(d) Landholding Rights After Becoming a Royal Province.

After appointment of the royal governor in 1679, events moved quickly. Shortly before his death in 1684, King Charles II revoked Massachusett's charter and proposed to unite Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut into one province. James II took the throne in 1685 and carried out this plan by creating the Dominion of New England. Governor Edmund Andros arrived in Boston in December 1685, and soon began to exercise his powers of government, including the power to inject further confusion into already turbulent landholding arrangements:

> By this commission, the governor with his council, five of whom were a quorum, were impowered to make such laws, impose such taxes, and apply them to such purposes as they should think proper. They were also empowered to grant lands on such terms and subject to such quitrents, as should be appointed by the king. Invested with such powers, these men were capable of the most extravagant actions. Though Androsse, like his master, began his administration with the fairest professions, yet like him, he soon violated them, and proved himself a fit instrument for accomplishing the most execrable designs... Let it suffice to observe that the press was restrained; liberty of conscience infringed; exorbitant fees and taxes demanded, without the voice or consent of the people, who had no privilege of representation. The charter being vacated, it was pretended that all titles to land were annulled; and as to Indian deeds, Androsse declared them no better than "the scratch of a bear's paw." Landholders were obliged to take out patents for their estates which they had possessed forty or fifty years; for these patents extravagant fees were exacted, and those who would not submit to this imposition had writs of intrusion brought against them, and their land was patented to others. n138

These oppressions ended suddenly in 1688 when James II was overthrown, but the turbulent times had made it impossible for a stable government to form in New Hampshire. Therefore, the colony rejoined Massachusetts for a short time, until it was designated a royal province by William and Mary in 1691.

§ 6.04(e) Land Distribution Practices in the Local Communities.

The preceding discussion has shown on what basis the rule of law and the laws for landholding took form in colonial New Hampshire. To a certain extent, these foundational legal features remained theoretical and not quite consonant with landholding practices actually in force within the early settlements of New Hampshire. Moreover, the presumptive application of English land law implied in the charters was at best a generality and gave no instruction about specific practices of land distribution. For such information, one may look to the histories of individual early communities in New Hampshire.

Regular land distribution in New Hampshire occurred more frequently after the colony came under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts in the 1640's. Following Massachusetts' well-established pattern for setting up towns whose governments' primary function was to distribute land, orderly settlement proceeded much more rapidly. n139 Generally, the original settlers received generous grants of land and then imposed some restrictions on those who came later. During the 1650's such restrictions were relaxed as the settlements competed for recruits. In the 1660's usable land became scarce, and grants of land were ended; newcomers were required to purchase lands in established communities. Where grants were given, their size often depended on the means and abilities of the grantees to offer needed assistance to the community.

By way of example, Hampton's first land grants to its founders varied from 80 to 300 acres. In the second land grant, in 1640, grants of 10 acres each for house lots were made to numerous non-freemen, and one grant of 100 acres was made to a freeman. In 1645, 200 acres of land was set aside as a cow commons to be shared in various proportions by 58 people.

In Exeter,

> all meadows were divided into four equal parts, with the first three parts apportioned according to the number of cattle owned by each inhabitant and the fourth part divided into equal lots for those who had no cattle; the "upland lots for planting" were given on the basis of the number of persons and cattle in each family; and the marshes were divided among all the inhabitants, with those owning cattle receiving proportionately larger shares. Family size and herd size -- the practical needs and agricultural potential of each family -- guided Exeter's approach to land policy.
>
> Other values also entered into Exeter land policy. When new marsh lands were found in 1643, the town rewarded individual initiative by voting that marshes of less than twenty acres belonged to the finder "forever," but marshlands of twenty acres or more became town property with the finder receiving a double portion.
>
> ... The town exemplified its strong community cohesiveness by granting the sons of inhabitants at least thirty acres of land within the town when they were ready to set up for themselves.
>
> When it came to granting the common lands or new areas to the town inhabitants, the principal basis for division was the proportion of tax each individual paid in support of the minister; this proportion was in turn based upon his taxable property or "ratable estate." n140

In Dover, the earliest recorded land grants, in 1642, were of twenty-acre lots to twenty-three persons. Between 1642 and 1655, 42 grants were given, ranging between 3 and 500 acres in size.

The New Hampshire government also granted townships, which, in turn, had authority to make local land grants. The townships were similar to those of Massachusetts, with one twist:

> The New Hampshire government required the payment of a nominal quitrent from each new township: an ear of Indian corn, a pound of hemp, a pint of turpentine, a pound of flax, or a peck of potatoes served this function. Although these quitrents were payable only if demanded by the government, an action which seldom if ever occurred, nevertheless, the inclusion of quitrents in New Hampshire land grants originated from the colony's royal status and from the uncertain legality of the Masonian proprietary claims to the land of the colony. n141

After New Hampshire became a royal colony it typically imposed requirements on individual proprietors in its township grants, usually requiring of each proprietor certain minimum land improvements, a certain number of acres under cultivation, and assistance in obtaining and supporting a minister. Proprietors who failed to meet the requirements forfeited their shares to the others. Once the township was officially established, however, its proprietors assumed all power over land grants within their jurisdiction.

§ 6.04(f) New Hampshire's Earliest Published Laws.

Despite the early date of its first settlement (1623), New Hampshire was very late in developing its own law:

> In contrast to Massachusetts and Plymouth, New Hampshire was settled by a number of commercial companies, each operating under the terms of its own charter, and interested primarily in extracting profits from the natural resources of the area. Most of the settlers were nothing more than employees of the proprietors; they clustered near the site of their operations and those settlements soon became towns. They appear to have had no strong desire to establish a well-ordered state governed according to precepts derived from scriptural law, as was the case in Massachusetts. Moreover, there was no clear-cut charter authority to establish a system of civil government and thus the earliest laws of the area were orders of the proprietors' agents and the self-generated regulatory measures adopted by the people assembled in town meeting. In short, for many years each town was an entity unto itself. n142

While New Hampshire was officially under the governance of Massachusetts Bay, between approximately 1641 and 1679, the laws of Massachusetts applied in New Hampshire. Under independent New Hampshire's first president, John Cutt, a code of laws was compiled, based largely on laws of Plymouth and Massachusetts, and the colony also made some use of a compilation of English statutes that had been sent. In this Cutt Code, the laws of England were invoked to decide questions of real property. The president and council were established as a "constant and setled Court of record," to hear pleas in civil suits and actions:

> whether ye same do concern ye realty, and relate to a right of freehold and inheritance, or whether ye same do concern ye personalty, and relate to some matter of debt, contract, damage, or other person, iniury, and also in all mixt actions wch may concern both realty and person... : so always yt ye forms of proceeding in such cases and ye judgment thereupon to be given, be as consonant and agreeable to ye Laws and Statutes of this Our Realm of Engd, as ye prent state and condition of our subjects inhabiting within ye limits aforesaid, and ye circumstances of ye place will admit. n143

The Cutt Code confirmed existing land rights and made provisions for the continued adjudication of the claims of Mason heirs. Its sparse provisions relating to landholding are adequately summarized by recitation of the headings: forcible detaining possession; burning fences; breaking down fences; defacing landmarks; townships, & c, confirmed; controversies of land to be tried by a jury; former laws to stand; n144 province rate [of tax, upon persons and estates]; and age to make a valid act [21]. n145

A short code was also issued in 1682 under the brief and unpopular regime of the second president, Edward Cranfield. The few land-related provisions of this code also deal with burning fences, defacing landmarks, and property tax rates. n146 After Cranfield's departure in 1685, New Hampshire was part of the Dominion of New England until the dominion fell and New Hampshire temporarily reunited with Massachusetts. In 1691 New Hampshire resumed status as an individual colony with its own governor, and in 1699 a short compilation of laws was printed. No provisions of this compilation deal directly with land.

A printing of a comprehensive compilation of New Hampshire laws was authorized in 1701 but was not completed until 1716. This much more extensive collection contains numerous provisions dealing with real property: prohibition of unfettered horses on the commons; prohibition against fencing the commons; recording deeds and conveyances, and validating all former deeds and conveyances; property tax collection; preventing trespass; regulating cutting of mast trees; preventing encroachments on highways; dealing with property interests of persons under disability; regulating dower; proceeding against forcible entry and detainer; partition of lands; regulating executors and administrators; regulating bankrupts and insolvent estates; preventing common nuisances; repairing highways; preventing trespass of cutting down trees on unfenced land; regulating strays and lost goods; regulating mills; making lands and tenements liable for payment of debts; preventing concealment of estates from assessors; settling and distributing estates of intestate decedents; enabling towns, villages and proprietors in common and undivided lands to sue and be sued; regulating powers of towns; preventing illegal purchase of Indian lands; preventing encroachments and encumbrances on highways; enacting a statute of frauds; redeeming mortgaged land; and prohibiting trespassing on the town commons.

Compared with contemporary colonial laws, this 1716 compilation from New Hampshire promulgates one of the most extensive regimes of real property regulation during the colonial period.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 126. Frank B. Sanborn, New Hampshire, An Epitome Of Popular Government 7 (1904).

(n2)Footnote 127. Id. at 8-9.

(n3)Footnote 128. § 6.03(b), supra.

(n4)Footnote 129. Frank B. Sanborn, New Hampshire, An Epitome Of Popular Government 13 (1904).

(n5)Footnote 130. Id. at 14-15.

(n6)Footnote 131. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History 1606-1775 at 36-37 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n7)Footnote 132. Id. at 50-51.

(n8)Footnote 133. David E. Van Deventer, The Emergence of Provincial New Hampshire 1623-1741 at 8 (1976).

(n9)Footnote 134. Id. at 9.

(n10)Footnote 135. Frank B. Sanborn, New Hampshire, An Epitome Of Popular Government at 24-25 (1904).

(n11)Footnote 136. David E. Van Deventer, The Emergence of Provincial New Hampshire 1623-1741 13 (1976).

(n12)Footnote 137. Elizabeth Forbes Morison and Elting E. Morison, New Hampshire, A Bicentennial History 11-12 (1976).

(n13)Footnote 138. 1 Jeremy Belknap, The History of New-Hampshire 232-234 (1792).

(n14)Footnote 139. See § 6.03(b)(3), describing the role of New England towns in bringing about the private ownership of land.

(n15)Footnote 140. David E. Van Deventer, The Emergence of Provincial New Hampshire 1623-1741 23-24 (1976).

(n16)Footnote 141. Id. at 39.

(n17)Footnote 142. Acts and Laws of New Hampshire 1680-1726 vii (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n18)Footnote 143. Id. at 197-198.

(n19)Footnote 144. "soe far as they will sute our constitution and be not repugnante to ye Laws of England." Id. at 219.

(n20)Footnote 145. Id. at 195-229.

(n21)Footnote 146. Id. at 231-248.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.05

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.05 Development of Property Law in New York (from 1624).

§ 6.05(a) The Dutch West India Company Charter of 1623.

In the service of the Dutch in 1609, Henry Hudson sailed up the river which now bears his name almost as far as Albany. Although disappointed in his objective of finding the mythical Northwest Passage, he passed on to his employers descriptions of a fruitful land. The Dutch eventually formed a new venture, called the West India Company, to colonize the territory which they claimed and named "New Netherland." The company's charter from the Dutch government was issued in 1621. In 1623 New Netherland was officially designated as a province of the Company, and in 1624 the first settlers arrived.

§ 6.05(b) The Charter of Privileges to Patroons of 1629.

The charter of June 3, 1621, conferred on the company a monopoly over trade and traffic to the New World for a period of 24 years. Conspicuously absent from the charter is any mention of power in the company to deal with land. n147 Nevertheless, the company exercised such power, and no stronger example of that may be found than in the Charter of Privileges to Patroons, adopted in 1629. The background and significance of this charter has been explained as follows:

> The government of the Dutch West India Company, chartered in 1621, was vested in five chambers, or boards, established in as many Dutch cities, with a board of nineteen for the exercise of general executive powers. Of the chambers, that of Amsterdam was the most important. The region known as New Netherland was not named in the charter, but was included within the jurisdiction of the Company. On the final organization of the Company under the charter, in 1623, New Netherland was made a province, and placed under the immediate control of the Amsterdam chamber. The continued unprofitableness, however, of the trade of New Netherland, except for the fur trade, led to a change of policy; and the Charter of Privileges to patroons, drafted in March, 1628, but not adopted by the board of nineteen until June, 1629, was intended to encourage private individuals to establish settlements at various points on the Hudson and Delaware, or North and South, rivers. Numerous grievances, occasioned by friction between the patroons and the Company, were partially allayed by a new charter in 1640, restricting the area of the grants, and encouraging independent settlement; but the feudal privileges of the patroons were not interfered with. "Many of the old patroon estates long remained undivided, and > the heirs of the founders claimed some semi-feudal privileges well into the nineteenth century." n148

The somewhat vague boundaries of the province supposedly extended from the Delaware River to the Connecticut River. The first settlers were mostly Walloons, the French-speaking Hugeunots who had fled France into what is now part of Belgium. Of the four settlements commenced by this first group, one was located a little south of Albany, another on Governor's Island off the southern tip of Manhattan, a third just south of present-day Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and the fourth near present-day Hartford, Connecticut.

The policy of encouraging settlement by patroons imparted significant consequences for landholding in New Netherlands. Patroons can be best described as the Dutch equivalents of English manorial lords. A patroon who held land held it according to a feudal system of land rights, which included the rights to require services as well as rents from tenants who were occupying the patroon's lands, and the right to exercise judicial and other governmental powers over the patroon's holdings. Only the patroon held the land outright; others could only be tenants of the patroon. The patroons of New Netherlands obligated themselves to commence a colony with at least 50 persons during a four-year period of time, in return for which each patroon received manorial and proprietary rights to sixteen miles of Hudson River shoreline and the lands behind the shoreline.

The following excerpts from the 1629 Charter of Privileges to Patroons amply illustrate this explicit introduction of feudalism into North America:

> III. All such [members of said Company as may be inclined to settle a Colonie in New Netherland] shall be acknowledged Patroons of New Netherland who shall, within the space of four years next after they have given notice to any of the Chambers of the Company here, or to the Commander or Council there, undertake to plant a Colonie there of fifty souls, upwards of fifteen years old; one-fourth part within one year, and within three years after the sending of the first, making together four years, the remainder, to the full number of fifty persons, to be shipped from hence, on pain, in case of wilful neglect, of being deprived of the privileges obtained...
>
> IV. They shall, from the time they make known the situation of the places where they propose to settle Colonies, have the preference to all others of the absolute property of such lands as they have there chosen ...
>
> VI. They shall forever possess and enjoy all the lands lying within the aforesaid limits, together with the fruits, rights, minerals, rivers and fountains thereof; as also the chief command and lower jurisdictions, fishing, fowling and grinding, to the exclusion of all others, to be holden from the Company as a perpetual inheritance, without it ever devolving again to the Company ...; and further, no person or persons whatsoever shall be privileged to fish and hunt but the Patroons and such as they shall permit. And in case any one should in time prospere so much as to found one or more cities, he shall have power and authority to establish officers and magistrates there, and to make use of the title of his Colonie, according to his pleasure and to the quality of the persons.
>
> VII. There shall likewise be granted to all Patroons who shall desire the same, ... liberty to dispose of their aforesaid heritage by testament.
>
> VIII. The Patroons may, if they think proper, make use of all lands, rivers and woods lying contiguous to them, for and during so long a time as this Company shall grant them to other Patroons or private persons...
>
> XIX. [The Company] will not take from the service of the Patroons any of their colonists, either man or woman, son or daughter, manservant or maid-servant; and, though any of these should desire the same, they will not receive them, much less permit them to leave their Patroons, and enter into the > service of another, unless on consent obtained from their Patroons in writing, and this for and during so many years as they are bound to their Patroons...

>
> XX. From all judgments given by the Courts of the Patroons for upwards of fifty guilders, there may be an appeal to the Company's Commander and Council in New Netherland.
>
> XXI. In regard to such private persons as on their own account, or others in the service of their masters here (not enjoying the same privileges as the Patroons), shall be inclined to go thither and settle, they shall, with the approbation of the Director and Council there, be at liberty to take up and take possession of as much land as they shall be able properly to improve, and shall enjoy the same in full property either for themselves or masters. n149

In the end, only one patroonship ever succeeded, that of Kiliaen Van Rensselaer. Over lands covering present-day Albany and Columbia and Rensselaer counties in New York, he established a feudal tenant system that persisted until tenants rebelled early in the 19th century. The patent to Van Rensselaer, dated August 13, 1630, contained the following language describing the property rights conveyed:

> We, the Director and Council of New England, ... [do hereby convey and make over] to the Mr. Kiliaen van Rensselaer ... the respective parcels of land hereinbefore specified, with the timber, appendencies and dependencies thereof, together with all the action, right and jurisdiction to them the grantors conjointly or severally belonging, real and actual possession thereof, and at the same time giving him full, absolute and irrevocable power, authority and special command to hold, in quiet possession, cultivation, occupancy and use, ... the land aforesaid. n150

A nearly contemporary patent of land, dated July 15, 1630, used similar language in the grant, conveying the lands "with all the action, right and jurisdiction to them" and giving "full and irrevocable authority, power and special command, to hold in quiet possession, occupancy and use...." n151

As a feudal lord, the patroon enjoyed several traditional privileges relating to the land and labor of the patroonship's tenants:

> At the close of the harvest, the farmer was bound to hand in a return of the amount of grain which he had for sale, after deducting what was due to the landlord by the lease, and offer to him or his commissary the preemption of such produce. In case he refused to buy it, then the farmer was at liberty to sell the same elsewhere. The like rule obtained in regard to cattle. When these were to be sold, the first offer was also to be made to the Patroon, in order, we presume, that he should have an opportunity of retaining the stock within the colonie. Every settler was, likewise, obligated to grind his corn at the Patroon's mill, and the latter was equally obligated to erect, and keep such mill in repair, at his own expense, for the accommodation of his colonists. No person could hunt or fish within the limits of the colonie, without license from the Patroon, who, on the exchange, sale, and purchase of real estate within his jurisdiction, was entitled to the first offer of such property; or if he declined to resume it, to a certain portion of the purchase money, except such mutation occurred in the natural line of descent. Finally, it was his right, as "lord of the manor," to succeed to the estate and property of all persons who might die intestate within his colonie. n152

Leaseholds were also granted, and typical provisions of leaseholds are the following from a lease dated September 7, 1646:

> This day ... the presiding officers of the Colonie Rensselhaerswyck on one side, and Thomas Chamber on the other, have agreed and consented about a certain parcel of land ... [described], which land he, Thomas aforesaid, shall occupy as a bouwerie [farm] for the term of five successive years, commencing the 15th of November, anno 1647, on the following conditions:

[The lessee agreed to build houses, barns and fences, and turn the improvements over to the lessor at the end of five years; "the said houses, barns, and fences, shall be the Patroon's rent for the aforesaid five years]." n153

§ 6.05(c) Conflicts Between Company and Patroon Landholding.

Inevitably, the institutions of colonial government clashed from time to time with the feudalistic independence of the patroons. The monopolistic powers exercised by the Dutch West India Company as colonial proprietor were very extensive. Even when its monopoly was abolished in 1640, its director and council remained the principal organs of government in the province:

Few formal instructions [from the company] appear, but orders were transmitted in the letters concerning grants of land, recall of grants, duties and all the minutia of trade relations, claims and suits against the company, dealings with the Indians, relations with the English on the north and the south and with the Swedes, the appointment and removal of officials, and the claims of patroons. n154

The director and council exercised legislative power, especially in the absence of any popular legislative assembly similar to those appearing in contemporary English colonies. Their power over management of the land was almost total:

By ordinances concerning land, provisions were made for the extinguishment of Indian claims, for issue of patents, for the annulment of extravagant and unimproved grants, for the fencing of land, for the levying of tenths and other taxes upon it, for the collection of rents, and the prevention of trespass. Courts were established under the authority of these ordinances; their jurisdiction was prescribed, and provision was made for their officials. Provisions for land grants and for courts, when combined, led to the origin of local government within New Netherland. n155

When the company revised its rules of settlement in 1640, under a grant entitled Freedoms and Exemptions for New Netherland, n156 its colonial monopoly was surrendered, and the possibility of colonies being founded by private persons was opened. If settlements in such private colonies grew into towns or villages, the company was required to grant to such villages powers of local government; eventually, village magistrates exercised authority to pass ordinances regulating land, fences, highways, schools, and churches. Even during the Dutch era, a large proportion of the villages were populated by English settlers, so it is not surprising that the first bestowal of village rights was on English towns within Dutch territory on Long Island in 1644. Other bestowals of village rights on Dutch communities followed quickly and continued right up to the time of the English takeover in 1664. In addition to these developments, officials in the patroonships sought to exclude completely any exercise of provincial government within the patroon holdings; these conflicts also continued unresolved right up to the end of Dutch rule in New Netherland.

§ 6.05(d) Early Incursions by English Settlers.

The English formed another fertile source of conflict. It may be recalled that the original grant of Virginia land to the London Company included coastal and inland territory extending northward to and including most of New England. Indeed, the Plymouth Company that had been organized in connection with the London Company had planted a settlement at Sagadahoc, near present-day Salem, Massachusetts, in August 1607, only to abandon the project a year later. Clearly, the Dutch colony of New Netherland was a technical intrusion into lands already claimed by the English, although not settled or in any way occupied by the English. The first overt outbreak of strife occurred in the spring of 1632, when a Dutch ship returning to Holland was forced by weather to put into Plymouth, where the vessel and its passengers were detained while the governments at home bickered over their respective claims. The ship was released in May, but the English asserted the release was "without any prejudice to his majesty's rights." n157

Further contentions followed in 1633. English trading with the Indians was obstructed; colonists from Plymouth began a settlement in territory along the Connecticut River claimed by the Dutch, and by 1635 numerous families from Massachusetts Bay had followed. By 1639 migration into New Netherlands was originating from both New England and Virginia. From as many English settlers as possible, the Dutch colonial government obtained an oath of fidelity:

> to their High Mightinesses the Lords States General, his Highness of Orange, and the Noble Director and Council of New Netherland; to follow the Director or any of his Council, wherever they shall lead; faithfully to give instant warning of any treason, or other detriment to this country that shall come to their knowledge; to assist to the utmost of their power in defending and protecting with their blood and treasure, the inhabitants thereof against all its enemies. n158

The English soon commenced a settlement at New Haven and purchased Indian land in all the surrounding areas. As for Long Island, "the Plymouth Company had taken upon itself to grant, at the request of Charles I, in 1635, the whole of Long Island to William Alexander, Earl of Stirling, who, in the early part of the following year, appointed an agent to dispose of the lands thus conveyed to him, to all who were desirous to purchase and settle them." n159 While the English were settling the eastern end of Long Island, the Dutch were purchasing and settling the western lands of the island. A series of isolated confrontations led, in 1641, to negotiations between the Dutch and English, which resulted in an agreement that the English could settle in territory claimed by the Dutch according to the provisions of the 1640 charter revising the Freedoms and Exemptions for New Netherland. Several families which had been considering a move from Massachusetts to Long Island then declined to do so, for the new arrangement tacitly conceded the Dutch rights to colonize.

Nevertheless, the provisions of the 1640 charter "formed the basis of all future grants from the Dutch to the English." n160 According to those provisions, English settling in Dutch territory:

> were to take the oath of allegiance to their High Mightinesses the States General and the West India Company, and in return, to enjoy free exercise of religion, and if they desired to have a magistracy from among themselves, they were to be allowed to nominate three or more persons from the most respectable among them, from which the Director-general would select one or more schepens, or magistrates... In criminal cases, they might proceed to, but not inflict capital punishment. They were empowered to erect towns, but could not construct forts except by special leave. Lands were to be shown to them free of expense, and whatever ground they might select, they were to hold free of rent or taxes for ten years; at the expiration of which time, they should be holden to pay the tenths of the produce. They were, in addition, to enjoy free hunting and fishing, and unshackled commerce, conformably to the privileges granted to New Netherland, but they were bound, in return, to make use of the weights and measures of the country. n161

In March 1642, several families from Massachusetts, under the leadership of the Rev. Francis Doughty, a dissenting minister, obtained a patent for 13,342 acres on Long Island and resettled there. Families from Lynn had obtained a similar patent in June 1641. Under both patents, the English settlers had the usual privileges of free manors, including free exercise of religion and powers to establish towns, churches, and systems of civil and criminal justice, all according to the charter of 1640. The patent to Francis Doughty and associates, dated March 28, 1642, used the following language to confer these land rights and privileges:

> We, [the Director-general and the council of New Netherland] ... do give and grant, unto Francis Doughty and associates, their heirs and assigns, in real, actual, and perpetual possession, all and every parcel of land situate on Long Island [boundaries described] ...
>
> With power to establish, in the aforesaid tract, a town or towns; to erect a church or churches; to exercise the Reformed Christian Religion and church discipline, which they profess; also, to administer, > of right, high, low, and middle jurisdiction; to decide civil suits not exceeding fifty Dutch florins; to impose definitively and without appeal in criminal matters, fines to an equal amount; to pronounce the first sentence in other criminal actions of greater moment, and to execute the same ...: together with the right of hunting, fowling, fishing, and of trading, according to the immunities granted, and to be granted to the colonists of this province, without any exception: --

>
> Wherefore the aforesaid F. Doughty and his associates, their heirs and assigns, shall be obligated, so long as they are in possession of the above-mentioned lands, to acknowledge the aforesaid lords for their sovereign Lords and Patroons; to pay, after the lapse of ten years, the tenth part of the produce of the land, whether cultivated with the plough, hoe, or otherwise, orchards and kitchen-gardens, not exceeding one Dutch acre, excepted. n162

§ 6.05(e) Landholding After the English Takeover in 1664.

§ 6.05(e)(1) The 1664 Patent to the Duke of York.

The English, who had never officially acknowledged Dutch claims to the territory of New Netherlands, took over the colonial government by force, but without much violence, in 1664. By means of a royal charter dated March 12, 1664, and despite King James I having included the same lands in the 1606 patent for the Virginia colony, the English King Charles II granted full rights over the province to his brother the Duke of York -- the future King James II. The patent was expressed in terms of the fullest property rights consistent with the feudal incidents still connected with the tenure of free and common socage, including a nominal annual rent of 40 beaver skins:

> And by these presents for us our heires and Successors Doe give and Graunt unto our dearest Brother James Duke of Yorke his heires and Assignes [boundaries described], Together with all the lands Islands Soyles Rivers Harbours Mynes Mineralls Quarries Woods Marishes Waters Lakes fishings hawking hunting and fowleing and all other Royalities proffitts Comodities and hereditaments to the said several Island lands and premises belonging and appertaineing with their and every of their apurtennes AND all our Estate right title interest benefitt advantage Clayme and demaund of in or (to) the said lands and premises together with the yearely and other the Rents Revenues and proffitts of all and singuler the said premisses and of every part and parcell thereof to HAVE AND TO HOLD ALL and singuler the said lands Islands hereditaments and premisses with their and every of their appurtenncs hereby given and Graunted (or hereinbefore menconed to bee given and granted) unto our said dearest Brother James Duke of Yorke his heirs and Assignes for ever To the only proper use and behoofe of the said James Duke of Yorke his heires and Assignes for ever To bee holden of us our Heires and Successors as of our Manor of East Greenwich in our County of Kent in ffree and Comon Soccage and not in Capite or by Knights Service YEILDING AND RENDERING And the same James Duke of Yorke Doth for himselfe his heirs and Assignes covenant and promise to yeild and Render unto us our heires and Successors of and for the same yearely and every yeare ffortie Beaver Skynns when they shall be demanded or within Nynety days after... n163

The grantee, as a feudal lord, was given extensive powers of government and court jurisdiction. The laws to be administered in the granted lands were to be not contrary to and as near "as conveniently may bee" to the laws of England, and judicial judgments and sentences were subject to a right of appeal in England:

> AND WE DOE FURTHER of our speciall grace certaine knowledge and meere mocon for us our heires and Successors give and Graunt unto our said dearest Brother James Duke of Yorke his heires Deputyes Agents Commissioners and Assignes by these presents full and absolute power and authority to Correct punish Pardon Governe and Rule all such the Subjects of us our heires and Successors as shall from tyme to tyme Adventure themselves into any the parts or Places aforesaid ... according to such Lawes Orders Ordinances direccons and Instruments as by our said dearest Brother or his Assignes shall > bee established ... as well in all Causes and matters Capitall and Criminall as Civill both Marine and others SOE ALLWAYES as the said Statutes Ordinances and Proceedings bee not contrary to but as neare as conveniently may bee agreeable to the Lawes Statutes and Governement of this our Realme of England AND SAVEING and reserveing to us our heirs and Successors the receiving heareing and determineing of the Appeale and Appeales of all or any Person or Persons of in or belonging to the Territories or Islands aforesaid in or touching any Judgment or Sentence to bee there made or given... n164

The terms of this patent appear to have been designed to expressly supersede any previous and conflicting grants of the same lands:

> AND LASTLY OUR WILL and pleasure is and wee doe hereby declare and Graunt that these our Letters Pattents or the Inrollment thereof shall bee good and effectuall in the Law to all intents and purposes whatsoever NOTWITHSTANDING the not reciteing or menconing of the premisses or any part thereof or the Meets or Bounds thereof or of any former or other Letters Patents or Graunts heretofore made or Graunted of the premisses or of any part thereof by us or of any of our Progenitors unto any other Person or Persons whatsoever Bodyes Politique or Corporate or any Act Lawe or other Restraint incertainty or ymperfeccon whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding... n165

§ 6.05(e)(2) The "Duke's Law" of 1665.

These powers were implemented in 1665, when the Duke appointed a governor who promulgated a simple code known as the "Duke's Law." This law eventually governed the Duke's vast American grant, which included (along with New York) Delaware, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. With the exception of New York City, the settlers in the Dutch areas were permitted to be governed by their traditional laws, especially as to landholding. A brief of revival of Dutch rule in 1673 and 1674 resulted in the Duke's Law replacing even these traditional Dutch laws after English rule was restored in 1674.

The Duke's Law has been described as rudimentary, probably because it was patched together from laws of other English colonies in America. Nevertheless, it is a lengthy code, occupying almost 100 pages in its most recent printing:

> The Duke of York's Laws for the government of the Colony of New York were compiled from the statutes for the government of the other English colonies in America, under the direction of Nicolls, the first English Governor. They were promulgated at Hempstead, on Long Island, March 1, 1665, and copies were transmitted to the several ridings, constituting the shire of Yorkshire. n166

The provisions of the Duke's Laws dealing with property matters cover the following topics, in terms typical of English laws adapted to the frontier environment:

> Bounds (of towns, requiring marks to be renewed every three years)
>
> Cattle, corn, fields, fences
>
> Conveyances, deeds and writings
>
> Dowries
>
> Purchase of Indian lands
>
> Laws (to be "not Contrary to the known Lawes of England")
>
> Orphans

Possession (persons holding for the past four years without interruption, shall be confirmed in their holdings.)

Records (of bargain and sale or other conveyances)

Townships

Lands, affirming rights of present occupants, and quoted in full as follows (and probably reflecting the statutory abolition of feudal tenures that had been enacted in England only five years earlier):

All Lands and heritages within this Goverment shall be free from all fines and Licenses, upon Alienation and from all Heriotts, Wardships liveryes Primier Seizins year day and wast, Escheats, and forfeitures upon the Death of Parents or Auncestors Natural, unnatural, Casuall, or judiciall, and that for ever (Cases of high treason only Excepted.)

To the end all former Purchasers may be ascertained to the present possessor or right owner They shall bring in their former Grants, and take our new pattents for the same from the present Gouvernoure in the behalfe of his Royall Highness the Duke of Yorke.

All Purchaseres of implanted Lands shall of their Cost and Charge, Cause a Survey and Draught thereof to be made within one yeare after such Purchases and deliver the same into the Office of Records, whereby the bounds and Limits thereof may bee justly distinguished, and if the purchasors shall not within three years after the Survey plant Seat or Inhabit upon the said purchasse they shall forfeit their Right, Title, and Interest therein.

Every Purchasor in acknowledgment of the propriety of such Lands belonging to his Royal Highness James Duke of Yorke, shall upon Sealing of the Pattent Pay unto the Governoure So much as they shall agree upon; Not exceeding for every hundred Acres.

And upon the Seating of a Towne two Towne Lotts shall be reserved by the Purchaser to the use of the Gouvernoure (Gratis) to dispose of to such as he shall thinke fitt. n167

§ 6.05(e)(3) The Second Grant to the Duke of York in 1674.

When the English retook the lands from the Dutch in 1674, Charles II issued a second grant to the Duke of York, specifying certain territories in addition to those described in the first grant, but describing the rights in those lands in terms essentially identical to the wording of the first grant. n168 These grants and laws remained formally in effect even after the "Glorious Revolution" in England in 1688, when the Stuart monarchy was ejected. A provincial assembly met in 1690, which temporarily kept in force the existing laws:

With the "Duke's Law" still in effect, the earliest work of the new legislature was directed toward proclaiming and defining the new political authority, establishing courts, adjusting municipal boundaries, establishing a body of liberties, repairing the damage done by the [Leisler] rebellion, and establishing the law of England as the basis of all provincial legislation. Thereafter, as in all other jurisdictions, the assembly confined itself to meeting the current and ever-changing needs of the province, and its enactments eventually became sufficiently extensive to replace the "Duke's Law." n169

§ 6.05(e)(4) Additional Land Legislation After 1691.

In 1693 a legislative committee began reviewing all legislation enacted since 1691 and preparing it for printing. It became the first printed collection of laws for New York.

The enactments relating to land included in this collection are as follows:

> An Act for the Settling, Quieting and Confirming unto the Cities, Towns, Mannours and Freeholders within this Province, their several Grants, Patents and Rights respectively ("Rights and Priviledges formerly held by and granted should be now ratified and confirmed...")
>
> An Act for the Regulating the Buildings, Streets, Lanes, Wharffs, Docks and Alleys of the City of New-York
>
> An Act for the supervising Intestates Estates, and Regulating the Probate of Wills, & granting Letters of Administration
>
> An Act declaring what are the Rights & Priviledges of Their Majesties Subjects inhabiting within Their Province of New-York.

Pertinent land law provisions of this important "body of liberties" enactment are quoted in full, revealing their heavy reliance on Magna Carta, among other sources:

> That no Free-man shall be taken or imprisoned, or be deprived of his Free-hold or Liberty, or free Customs, or Out-Lawed, or Exiled, or any other wayes destroyed; nor shall be passed upon, adjudged or condemned, but by the lawful Judgment of his Peers, and by the Law of this Province.
>
> Justice nor Right shall be neither Sold, Denyed or Delayed to any Person within this Province.
>
> That no Aid, Tax, Talliage or Custom, Loan, Benevolence, Gift, Excise, Duty or Imposition whatsoever shall be laid, assessed, imposed, levied or required of or on any of Their Majesties Subjects within this Province, &c. or their Estates, upon any manner of Colour or Pretence whatsoever, but by the Act and Consent of the Governour and Council, and Representatives of the People in General Assembly met and convened.
>
> That no Man, of what Estate or Condition soever, shall be put out of his Lands, Tenements, nor taken, imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor banished, nor any ways destroyed or molested, without first being brought to answer by due court of Law.
>
> That a Free-man shall not be amerced for a small Fault, but after the manner of his Fault, and for a great Fault after the greatness thereof, saving to him his Free-hold; and a Husband-man, saving to him his Wainage and none of these Amercements shall be assessed, but by the Oath of Twelve Honest and Lawful men of the Vicinage ...
>
> That no Free-man shall be compelled to receive any Souldiers or Marriners, except Inholders, and other Houses of publick Entertainment, who are to quarter for ready Money into his House, and there suffer them to sojourn again their Wills; provided it be not in time of actual War within this Province ...
>
> That all the Lands within this Province shall be esteemed and accounted Lands of Free-hold, and Inheritance in free and common Soccage, according to the Tenor of East-Greenwich in their Majesties Realm of England.
>
> That no Estate of a Feme-Covert shall be sold or conveyed, but by Deed acknowledged by her in some Court of Record, the Woman being secretly examined, if she doth it freely, without threats or compulsion of her Husband ...
>
> That all Lands and Heritages within this Province and Dependencies shall be free from all Fines,

> Lisences upon Alienations, and from all Heriots, Wardships, Liveries, Primiers, Seizins, Year and Day, and Waste, Escheat and Forfeiture upon the Death of Parents and Ancestors, Natural, Unnatural, Casual or Judicial, and that forever, Cases of High-Treason only excepted ... n170

The thoroughness of common law adoption in New York after 1700 can be illustrated by the fact that it was only in 1782, after the Revolution and after adoption of a state constitution, that the state legislature acted to abolish primogeniture, reestablish partible inheritance, and eliminate further entails. n171

§ 6.05(f) Summary of Landholding Arrangements in Colonial New York.

§ 6.05(f)(1) Land Grants.

At the top of the landholding hierarchy in colonial New York were those who received their proprietary grants directly from the European government, whether Dutch or English. These grants were estates of inheritance, descending to heirs, and the grantees were landlords. Because they also obtained powers of government, they in effect functioned as territorial lords in the feudal sense. They could sell, mortgage, lease, devise or convey in trust any portion of their holding. Because the prohibitions of the English Statute Quia Emptores forbidding subinfeudation were not enforced in New York, a proprietor could make further grants "on such conditions as he chose -- limited by the nature of his own patent, -- to erect or permit the erection of manors, to devise the machinery necessary for surveying, issuing, and recording grants and collecting rents." n172

When the proprietors were preparing for colonization, they issued documents containing "concessions," "conditions of plantation," or "instructions" that stated the terms under which the land would be granted to the colonists. Although this was the model among the English provinces, the pattern of Dutch administration over New Netherland did not significantly differ. The patroonships and other settlements were commenced under the authority of the 1629 charter of Freedoms and Exemptions, which charter constituted a sort of "conditions of plantation." When the English administration was substituted for the Dutch in 1664, and again in 1674, Dutch titles were confirmed, and there was a general renewal of patents, accompanied by the requirement of an oath of allegiance to the English monarch.

Since the English had taken the entire estate of the Dutch West India Company, unoccupied land in New York became subject to their administration. The English governor in New York prescribed regulations for the settlement of those lands, including making purchases from the Indians, extending temporary exemptions from taxes, and establishing towns. In New York, many such rules were drawn from well-established regulations in both New England and Maryland. The size of individual holdings was also affected by this system:

> In general, estates were much larger in the provinces [such as New York] than they were in the corporate colonies. The few scores of acres which, as the result of a series of town allotments, ordinarily came into the possession of a New England farmer, were almost insignificant when compared with the princely estates of the Dutch patroons ... n173

Among all the English colonies in America, only in New York did any fully developed manors come into existence, and these originated in the patroonship system introduced by the Dutch, exhibiting many features of continental feudalism. Ultimately, however, only the patroonship of the Van Rensselaer family survived the vicissitudes of frontier life to become an enduring fixture in New York landholding arrangements.

> Owing to these events, toward the close of the period of Dutch rule the manorial influence declined and ceased practically to exist in the southern part of the province. From time to time, however, both by Stuyvesant and by the early English governors, grants of considerable size were made. Some of these, notably Fordham, Pelham, and Phillipsburg in Westchester, assumed the name and to an extent the organization of manors. Toward the close of the Dutch period the Van Cortlandt family began to build up its large estate. During the administration of Governor Dongan the first grants were made which resulted > in the development of the Livingston manor. By these events the manorial system began again to assume a prominence in New York like that from which, since the dissolution of the early association of patroons, it had declined. The social and political development of New York has been deeply affected by the family alliances and the system of tenant right which, as the result of these grants, extended so widely within its borders. n174

Small grants, most under 1,000 acres in size, were also made under the Dutch charter of Freedoms and Exemptions of 1629, and these were encouraged even more under the amended version of the charter issued in 1640. These smaller grants were nominally organized as manors, with regulations for leases and rents, but were often left unsettled and neglected. Because land was so frequently in need of settlers, usually it was simply granted under conditions of settlement and, in New York, only rarely sold for money, except at the highest proprietary level.

Certain English settlements in which the grant was made collectively to a group arose during the period of Dutch rule, especially on Long Island and in the area of Westchester County, and these settlements shared characteristics with New England towns, from whence their founders had migrated.

Throughout the period of Dutch rule, as an alternative to settlement under manorial patroonships, individual settlers ventured into unoccupied land, purchased rights from the Indians, and had their purchases confirmed by the colonial government. Eventually, these settlements or groups of them received patents as towns and thereby obtained rights of local governments. After issuance of the town patent, the town itself made grants of land to individual persons. Common rights also arose within the towns:

> Within towns thus organized unoccupied land was treated as commons, and the system of common fields, pastures and woods, with town herds and common fences, appears, much as in New England. As time progressed the towns divided their commons by lot, as they did in New England. A genuine village community system existed among the Dutch, as it did among the New Englanders, but in the two sections it come into existence in a somewhat different way. In New England, as a rule, the group of settlers was original, and secured the town grant and managed it from the first. Among the Dutch, as a rule, the villages originated from aggregations of farms, and attained their corporate life in consequence of such preexistent aggregation. When the Dutch village community had once been formed, it exhibited most of the characteristics of the New England village, though it was always subject to certain limitations which did not attach to the latter. Moreover, in New Netherland the village was by no means the only form of settlement, and it did not determine the form of society to the extent which was true of the villages in New England. n175

With the eventual elimination of all but one patroonship, the towns and villages played a large role in establishing the patterns of landholding in New York. n176

§ 6.05(f)(2) Leases and Quit Rents.

The quitrents that figured prominently in some of the proprietary provinces were not a consistent part of the Dutch landholding arrangements in New Netherland:

> In the Dutch ground briefs no definite provision was made for the payment of a rent. In some of the patents the payment of a tenth of the products of the soil was required. In many only the general obligation of submission and allegiance was enforced, with some special duty, such as that of fencing the land. The West India company owned six boweries, which were situated on the east side of Manhattan island outside the limits of the Dutch town. They were furnished with buildings and with cattle, and were leased for short periods, with the stock and other outfit, on such terms as were customary throughout the province. The farms of the colony of Rennselaerswyck were managed according to the same system of > stock leases. Some were let at a fixed rent, payable in grain, beaver, or wampum, while others were let at halves or thirds, including one-half of the increase of the stock and a few pounds of butter as a recognition. The tenant was bound to keep the buildings and tools in good repair.

>
> The English Conquest in 1664 resulted in no immediate change in the land law of the province. n177

The articles of capitulation guaranteed that the Dutch could "enjoy their own customs concerning their inheritances" and that land records would be preserved. The oath of allegiance required by the English effectively broke the tenure of landholding under the Dutch and re-established it under the English tenure of free and common socage.

Those who held land rights under the Dutch were directed by the Duke's Law of 1665 to turn in their old grants and receive new patents from the English; in most of these confirmations no mention was made of a quitrent, especially with respect to lots in New York City. However, the confirmation of Indian deeds and the bestowal of new grants were usually conditioned on payment of the customary rent for new plantations; this nominal rent was usually in kind, such as a bushel of wheat, a lamb, or a barrel of fish. When English rule was interrupted and then re-established in 1673-1674, and old grants were again asked to be renewed, quitrents were more prominent, but hardly universal:

> In 1686 Governor Dongan reported that the quitrents, at his arrival in the province, were very inconsiderable, the larger part coming from the Delaware region under the terms of the patents granted by Andros. But Andros even had renewed Indian purchases and township grants with the former reservation of a lamb only as a quitrent. Dongan, however, insisted that all patents or deeds which were recorded during his administration should contain provision for a quitrent. No exception was made even in the case of city lots.
>
> Rent in the city was made payable in money, but in the country it was payable in wheat, fish, or other commodities. Albany was made the place of payment for the northern part, and New York for the southern part, of the province. At first rents were payable to the duke, but later, after his accession, to the king. Dongan himself explains how he succeeded in increasing the quitrent in some of the towns. He found that certain tracts of land within their limits had not been purchased from the Indians and were at the disposal of the government. By threatening to grant them to outside parties, he induced the proprietors of the town to submit to an increase of rent. By these measures the system of quitrents was extended throughout New York, and its practice in this respect was brought into conformity with that of the other English provinces. n178

Even the inhabitants of the English towns that arose during the period of Dutch rule eventually became subject to quitrents, even though quit rents were completely absent from the New England traditions from which the settlers of these communities had issued.

No separate land office existed in New York, so the chief provincial officials were responsible for making surveys, issuing patents, and collecting rents. New York laws provided that a registry be established for leases, mortgages, conveyances, and wills.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 147. 1 E.B. O'Callaghan, History of New Netherland 399-407 (1846).

(n2)Footnote 148. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History 1606-1775 43 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n3)Footnote 149. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History 1606-1775 43-50 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n4)Footnote 150. 1 Documents Relative to The Colonial History of the State of New York 44 (E.B. O'Callaghan ed. 1856).

(n5)Footnote 151. Id. at 43.

(n6)Footnote 152. 1 E. B. O'Callaghan, History of New Netherland 325-326 (1846).

(n7)Footnote 153. Id. at 473-474.

(n8)Footnote 154. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 99 (1904).

(n9)Footnote 155. Id. at 104.

(n10)Footnote 156. 1 Documents Relative to the Colonial History of The State of New-York 118-123 (E.B. O'Callaghan ed. 1856).

(n11)Footnote 157. 1 E. B. O'Callaghan, History of New Netherland, or New York Under the Dutch 130-136 (1845).

(n12)Footnote 158. Id. at 298.

(n13)Footnote 159. Id. at 209-210.

(n14)Footnote 160. Id. at 237.

(n15)Footnote 161. Id.

(n16)Footnote 162. 2 E. B. O'Callaghan, History of New Netherland 425-426 (1845).

(n17)Footnote 163. The Earliest Printed Laws of New York 1665-1693 at 103-104 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n18)Footnote 164. Id. at 104-105.

(n19)Footnote 165. Id. at 106-107.

(n20)Footnote 166. Id. at 110.

(n21)Footnote 167. Id. at 148.

(n22)Footnote 168. Id. at 109.

(n23)Footnote 169. Id. at viii.

(n24)Footnote 170. Id. at 19-23.

(n25)Footnote 171. New York Laws of 1782, ch. 2.

(n26)Footnote 172. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 20 (1904).

(n27)Footnote 173. Id. at 24.

(n28)Footnote 174. Id. at 31-32.

(n29)Footnote 175. Id. at 50.

(n30)Footnote 176. Christine A. Desan, Remaking Constitutional Tradition At The Margin Of The Empire: The Creation Of Legislative Adjudication In Colonial New York, 16 Law & Hist. Rev. 257 (Summer 1998).

(n31)Footnote 177. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 39-40 (1904).

(n32)Footnote 178. Id. at 41-42.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.06

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.06 Development of Property Law in Connecticut (from 1633).

§ 6.06(a) The Founding of the Connecticut River Towns.

§ 6.06(a)(1) Settlement from Massachusetts.

A congregation of Puritans under the leadership of the Rev. John Warham immigrated to the Massachusetts colony in 1630 and eventually began a settlement that became the town of Dorchester. A few years later they moved to the Connecticut River and founded the town of Windsor. Another congregation, under the Rev. George Phillips and a magistrate named Sir Richard Saltonstall, settled at Watertown, and also later moved to the Connecticut River to found the town of Weathersfield. The Rev. Thomas Hooker, a well-known but persecuted non-conformist minister from Chelmsford, England, fled to Holland in 1632 and thence to Boston in 1633. Many of his followers had settled earlier in Weymouth and in Newtown (Cambridge). Upon Hooker's arrival, they congregated in Newtown. This congregation later founded a third settlement on the Connecticut River: Hartford. All three of these first Connecticut settlements, Weathersfield, Windsor, and Hartford, were founded between 1634 and 1635.

§ 6.06(a)(2) Warwick Patent of 1631.

Meanwhile, in 1630 the Plymouth Company in England granted to Robert, Earl of Warwick, an aristocratic friend of Hooker and president of the Council of Plymouth, a large tract of land including most of present-day Connecticut. The grant was confirmed by a patent from King Charles I. On March 19, 1631, Warwick granted the same Connecticut territory to eleven persons, including Sir Richard Saltonstall, whose subsequent patentees were the settlers of the Connecticut River and New Haven colonies. The validity of the grant to Warwick was questioned, especially after the Plymouth Company re-granted the same lands to the Marquis of Hamilton in 1635, but Hamilton's claim was later held barred by prescription. n179

§ 6.06(a)(3) Confrontation with the Dutch.

In 1632 members of the Plymouth Colony selected a site for a trading post at Windsor, which they began to construct in earnest in 1633, after purchasing the land from the Indians. Meanwhile, the Dutch were asserting a claim to Connecticut by commencing a settlement at the site of Hartford, a few acres of which they also purchased from Indians. The Dutch even launched a military assault on the Plymouth trading house, but they were repulsed; afterwards, the settlement groups lived in uneasy peace.

§ 6.06(a)(4) Migration Under Massachusetts' Jurisdiction.

In 1634 settlers at Newtown with their pastor Thomas Hooker, complaining about unavailability of land, petitioned the Massachusetts General Court for permission to migrate to Connecticut, but they were denied. In 1635, however, people from Watertown, Dorchester and Roxbury were permitted to migrate on the condition that they agreed to continue to be governed by Massachusetts. It is believed that Newtown settlers were allowed to leave under the same condition later in the year. Because the Connecticut River settlements were outside the Massachusetts territory, this condition was quite unusual and could not be a permanent arrangement for governmental organization. At first, the Massachusetts General Court in 1636 appointed a commission of eight persons to regulate affairs in the Connecticut settlements for a period of one year. The commission was empowered to control trade, grant land lots, and regulate building, military discipline, defensive war, and the conduct of judicial proceedings. Undoubtedly, distribution of land took place, and landholding arrangements were fashioned, exactly as was then occurring in the Massachusetts settlement, and has been described in this chapter, §§ 6.03(a)(3) and 6.03(b)(2), supra.

§ 6.06(a)(5) Self-government Under the 1639 Fundamental Orders.

When the year's term expired in 1637, a general court of Connecticut settlers met in Hartford and began to function as an independent, indigenous colonial government. Conferences with Massachusetts leaders about uniting the colonies were conducted in 1638 but broke down. So, late in 1638 Connecticut leaders drafted a frame of government, the Fundamental Orders, which was adopted in January 1639. This document has been described as "the first written constitution known to history that created a government." n180 The Fundamental Orders included detailed provisions for the establishment of a general assembly or court and the appointment or election of various public officials. In the general court reposed the basic governing power:

> In which said Generall Courts shall consist the supreme power of the Commonwelth, and they only shall have power to make lawes or repeale them, to graunt levys, to admitt of Freemen, dispose of lands undisposed of, to severall Townes or persons, and also shall have power to call ether Courte or Magestrate or any or any other person whatsoever into question for any misdemeanour, and may for just causes displace or deale otherwise according to the nature of the offence; and also may deale in any other matter that concerns the good of this commonwelth, excepte election of Magestrats, which shall be done by the whole boddy of Freemen. n181

The legislative powers of this Connecticut General Court were essentially the same as in Massachusetts.

More than the substantive provisions, the preamble of the Fundamental Orders has attracted attention:

> If marked originality is to be found anywhere in the Fundamental Orders, it must appear in the preamble. This is, in fact, the part of the document which has chiefly attracted the attention and awakened the imagination of historians. The frank declaration of independence which is there made, and the announcement of the fact that in the opinion of the framers an original compact was being formed, has given to this document most of its interest. The preamble has been dwelt on at greater length and with much greater enthusiasm than have the provisions of the constitution concerning government. It has been made to signify much more than the Mayflower Compact, and its adoption has been regarded as the initial act in the development of American democracy. But really there is nothing in the preamble, or in the body of the Fundamental Orders, to indicate that, if the settlers of Connecticut had possessed a royal charter, they would have proceeded in a manner essentially different from that of the colonists of Massachusetts. n182

Among its other extensive powers, the general court had comprehensive control over land distribution and management:

> The business of the general court was very extensive. Besides its two regular sessions, many extra sessions were held. In 1645 it met seven times; in 1658 it met twice in March and once in May, in August and in October; in many years it met as often as in these. As in the other corporate colonies, its work was legislative, administrative, and judicial; while the character and volume of its product in each of these lines were not materially different from that which appears elsewhere in New England. Its most important legislation ... had reference to towns, military affairs, moral and ecclesiastical relations, the levy of rates, Indian relations, crimes and their penalties. Not only did the general court legislate comprehensively, as in October, 1639, for the establishment and regulation of towns, but by special orders it provided for the enforcement of this legislation, and controlled the action of towns in many ways. As a result of these acts and a series of land grants, a town system similar to that of Massachusetts and Plymouth was developed; and by means of this system the territory of the colony was extended eastward to include the Pequot country, southward to the mouth of the river, and westward till it was met by the counter claims of the Dutch. n183

This colony of Connecticut River towns thus proceeded to develop in an orderly way, even though it had no royal charter. In a short time it expanded by absorbing two other colonies. One was the settlement that had been founded at Saybrook by settlers acting under the terms of the Warwick patent, although that patent did not extend to the area they had settled. This colony was added to the river towns by purchase in 1644. The second colony, New Haven, had been settled by strict Puritans who had first landed in Boston, remained for only a few months, and then chose New Haven as a permanent location.

§ 6.06(b) The Founding of the New Haven Colony.

This New Haven group was remarkably independent from colonial regulation imposed either by English or by Massachusetts authorities. Consistent with the efforts to form a government that had occurred in Hartford, the New Haven settlers held a "general meeting" in June 1639, and reached agreement upon the fundamental rules for self-government, called the Fundamental Articles of New Haven. n184 The first public assembly or court held thereafter, of which there is record, took place in October 1639, and at that meeting the colonists:

> sought by a single resolution, not only to exclude English statute and common law from their settlement, but to forestall the necessity of important legislation on their own part. They resolved "thatt the worde of God shall be the onely rule to be attended unto in ordering the affayres of government in this plantation." n185

Several other plantations and settlements grew up in the general vicinity of New Haven, and some of these were as independent of New Haven as New Haven was of England or Massachusetts; others, such as Stamford and Branford, for instance, were settled by seceders from Weathersfield, one of the river towns, and obtained land grants directly from New Haven. In 1643 New Haven -- along with the colonies in Connecticut, Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay -- formed the United Colonies of New England in order to achieve concerted action in matters of warfare, boundary dispute resolutions, division of conquered Indian territory, and taxation of goods moving between colonies. n186

§ 6.06(c) Property-related Legislation in Early Connecticut.

§ 6.06(c)(1) Connecticut Code of 1650.

Both New Haven and Connecticut colonies were active in legislating. Connecticut produced a code in 1650, the third code produced in New England (after Plymouth in 1636 and Massachusetts in 1648), but the code was not printed, being instead distributed in manuscript form to various settlements in the colony. Provisions of the 1650 Connecticut code relating to land are quoted or summarized as follows:

> ... no mans goods or estate shall bee taken away from him, nor any wayes indamages, under colour of Law or countenance of Authority, unless it bee by the vertue or equity of some express Law of the Country warranting the same, established by a Generall Courte, and sufficiently published, or in case of the defect of a Law in any perticular case, by the word of God.

Ability

Age

Bounds of Townes and Perticular Lands

Cattle, Cornefeilds, Fences

Common Fields

Caveats Entred (recording of creditors' claims against debtors' lands)

Conveyances Fraudulent

Escheats

Fences

Forgerie

Highe Wayes

> Lands; Free Lands: It is ordered, and by this Courte declared, that oure Lands and Heritages shall bee free from all fynes and lycenses uppon Alienations, and from all Harriots, Wardships, Liveries, Primer seizins, yeare, day and waste, escheats and forfeitures uppon the death of parents or ancestors, bee they naturall, unnaturall, casuall or juditiall, and that for ever.

Rates [of property taxation]

Records

Timber

Trespasses

> Home Lotts: Whereas there is creeping in, in severall Townes and plantations within this Jurissdiction, a great abuse of buying and purchasing Home Lotts and laying them together, by meanes whereof great depopulations are like to follow. It is ordered that all dwelling or mansion houwses that are or shall bee allowed in any plantation or Towne within this Jurissdiction, shall bee upheld, repaired and meinteined sufficiently in a comely way: As allso, whosoever shall possess and injoye any homelotts within any such plantation or Towne, that is not yet built uppon, shall, within twelve months after the making of this order, erect and build a howse there, fitt for an inhabitant to dwell in, unless the Courte, uppon knowledge of the case, finde cause to abate, give longer time for building. n187

§ 6.06(c)(2) New Haven Laws of 1656.

New Haven Colony actually preceded the Connecticut river towns in producing a printed compilation of its legislation in force. A work entitled New Haven's Settling in New England, published in London in 1656, "included the text of the New England Confederation, the fundamental agreement of 1639, and a remarkably sophisticated code of laws based upon the Massachusetts code of 1648, and presumably the supplements of 1650 and 1654 as well." n188 Provisions of this compilation relating to land are quoted or summarized as follows:

> ... no mans goods, or estate shall be taken from him, under colour of Law, or Countenance of authority, unlesse it be by vertue, or equity of some expresse Law of this Jurisdiction, established by the Generall Court, and sufficiently published, or for want of a Law in any particular case, by the word of God...

Age

Cattell, Corn, Fields, Fences

Charges publick (taxes on property)

Conveyances fraudulent

Distresse

Dowryes

Escheates

Forgery, or Falsifying

Plantations

Records

Wills, Inventories, and the Estates of such as dye intestate

No provisions relate to the public authority or private power to convey lands in this compilation, undoubtedly because these practices had been well-established and orderly, on the Massachusetts model, from the beginning.

§ 6.06(c)(3) The Royal Charter of 1662 and Unification of Connecticut and New Haven Colonies.

The Stuart Restoration in England, in 1660, once again exposed the Connecticut colonies' lack of charter or patent, so colonial governor John Winthrop was delegated to go to England and seek a charter. He succeeded in obtaining a very favorable charter, dated April 23, 1662, which also included the New Haven settlements, and over much objection by some New Haven colonists, that colony was absorbed into Connecticut during the two years following issuance of the charter. This charter of 1662 remained of fundamental importance for Connecticut until well after statehood:

> The delay [of New Haven] in proclaiming Charles II, and its tender treatment of the regicides, had brought it into disfavor with the king; and it now ... resisted annexation, and appealed to the Commissioners of the United Colonies. But the conquest of New Netherland by the English, in 1664, and the grant to the Duke of York of territory as far east as the Connecticut River, hastened submission; and in December of the latter year a committee was appointed to arrange for the union. A quo warranto was > issued against the Connecticut charter in 1684, but judgment was not entered. When Andros demanded the charter, in 1687, it was secreted, and remained hidden until 1689, when, upon the deposition of Andros, government under the charter was resumed. The State constitution of 1776 continued the charter in force, with a few changes, and it remained the fundamental law of Connecticut until the adoption of a new constitution in 1818. n189

Important excerpts from this charter establishing the rule of English law and the power of the colonial government over land affairs are as follows:

> [The Colony of Connecticut] to have, take, possess, acquire, and purchase lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any goods, or chattles, and the same to lease, grant, demise, alien, bargain, sell, and dispose of, as other our liege people of this our realm of England...
>
> ... that all, and every the subjects of us, our heirs, or successors, which shall go to inhabit within the said colony, and every of their children which shall happen to be born there, or on the sea in going thither, or returning from thence, shall have and enjoy all liberties, and immunities of free, and natural subjects within any the dominions of us, our heirs, or successors, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever, as if they, and every of them were born within the realm of England...
>
> ... and also from time to time to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome, and reasonable laws, statutes, ordinances, directions, and instructions, not contrary to the laws of this realm, of England...
>
> ... And know ye further, that we of our abundant grace, certain knowledge, and meer motion, have given, granted, and confirmed, and by these presents for us, our heirs, and successors, do give, grant, and confirm unto the said governour, and company, and their successors, all that part of our dominions in New England [boundaries described], with the islands thereunto adjoyning, together with all firm lands, soyles, grounds, havens, ports, rivers, waters, fishings, mines, minerals, precious stones, quarreys, & all & singular other commodities, jurisdictions, royalties, privileges, franchises, prehiminences, and hereditaments whatsoever, within the said tract, bounds, lands, and island aforesaid, or to them, or any of them belonging. To have and to hold the same unto the said Governour & Company, their successors, and assigns for ever, upon trust, and for the use, and benefit of themselves, and their associates, freemen of the said colony, their heirs, and assigns, to be holden of us, our heirs, and successors, as of our mannor of East-Greenwich, in free, and common socacage, and not in capite, nor by knights service, yielding, and paying therefore to us, our heirs, and successors, only the fifth part of all the oar of gold, and silver, which from time to time, and at all times hereafter, shall be there gotten, had, or obtained, in lieu of all services, duties, and demands whatsoever, to be to us, our heirs, or successors therefore, or thereout rendered, made, or paid... n190

§ 6.06(c)(4) Connecticut Laws of 1673.

After the charter was obtained, the 1650 code of Connecticut colony was replaced by a new, printed compilation in 1673. Provisions of the 1673 Connecticut code relating to land are quoted or summarized as follows:

> ... no mans Goods or Estate shall be taken from him, nor any wayes indamaged under colour of Law, or countenance of Authority, unless it be by the vertue or equity of some express Law of this Colony warranting the same, established by the General Court, and sufficiently published; or in case of the defects of a Law in any particular case by some clear and plain Rule of the word of God, in which the whole Court shall concurre.

Ability

Age

Bounds of Towns and particular Lands

Cattle, Corn-fields

Caveats Entred

Common-Fields and Fences

Commons to be cleared

Conveyance fraudulent

Distresse

Dowries

Escheats

Farms (militia manpower requirements for farms remote from towns)

Fences

Forgery

Gates, Bars, and Fences

High-Wayes

> Home Lotts: Whereas there hath been a great abuse in several Towns, and Plantations in this Colony, of buying and purchasing Home lots, and laying them together, by means whereof great depopulation may follow, for the prevention whereof: It is Ordered by the Authority of this Court; That all dwelling or mansion houses, that are or shall be allowed in any Plantation or Town within this Jurisdiction, shall be upheld, repaired and maintained sufficiently in a comely way, as also, whosoever shall possess and enjoy any Home-lots within any such Plantation or Town that is not yet built upon, he shall within twelve months after the publication hereof, erect and build a house there fit for an Inhabitant to dwell in, if his Lot be one Acre and half, unless the Court upon knowledge of the case, find cause to abate or give longer time for building, upon the penalty of twenty shillings per year, for every breach of this order, to be paid to the Town Treasury.

Houses and Lands to be tendered to the Town before sold

Houses and Lands to be Secured for Heirs.

Housing to be kept in repair for Legatees.

> Lands the tenour [tenure] of our Lands: It is Ordered by the Authority of this Court; that whatsoever Lands have or shall be granted by the Court to the respective Townships, or to any particular persons > either by the Court or particular Town ships, shall be held to them, their Heirs, Successors and Assignes for ever, according to the most free Tenour of East Green-wich in the County of Kent in the Realm of England, according to our Charter Grant.

Lands not to be purchased by particular persons of the Indians

Mines and Minerals

Possession [confirming titles based on long possession]

Rates [of property taxation]

Records

Timber

Town-ships

Trespass

Trespasses

§ 6.06(d) Land Distribution and Management in Connecticut.

The methods for distribution and management of land were similar throughout New England:

> The form of group settlement which we have seen developing in Plymouth was reproduced throughout New England and wherever New Englanders settled. The joint action of the settlers in locating dwellings and home lots, in laying out village streets, in subdividing the adjacent arable land, in subjecting the meadow and forest for a time to common management, resulted in the founding of the town of Plymouth. The agrarian policy of the settlers constituted the most characteristic element in the town organization.
>
> That which occurred at Plymouth happened also at Salem, in each of the settlements about Massachusetts bay, in the towns of Plymouth colony, as one after another they came into existence, among the settlements of northern New England, in the towns which were founded on the shores of Narrangansett bay and along the course of the Connecticut river...
>
> ... The town has been likened to the manor, and the analogy to an extent is justified... The manor, especially in its later and customary form, was a democratic group with a monarchical head. The New England town was a democratic group without a monarchical head. n191

The huge role of the towns in land distribution and management produced a land system among New England settlers that differed fundamentally from the land systems in the private proprietary colonies:

> The Puritan colonies as such did not seek to profit from their land, but granted it freely to actual settlers and in such amounts as suited their immediate and prospective needs. No distinct land office was established by any New England colony. Land was not sold by the colony; neither, except in the case of certain islands and very rarely of some other tract, was it leased. Rent formed no appreciable part of the colony revenue... By far the greater part of the land in the New England colonies was granted to towns, that is, to groups or communities of settlers by whom it was allotted to individuals. The grants to towns > were made in large tracts, six miles square or more, the grant often being described in the most general terms, without even a specification of its bounds.

>
> ... From the existing hive swarms might be sent off in any direction, and might establish a new hive at any point... It is clear that circumstances of climate and soil were more favorable to the extension of settlement in the northern than in the southern colonies. But the process of settlement itself was more effective and vital in New England than was that which obtained under the proprietary regime in the south. n192

Because the founding of towns and allotment of land was usually a group process at the beginning, the transformation of landholding to individual interests was evolutionary:

> The settlement of a town normally began with the laying out of the village plot and the assignment of home lots. The idea of a home lot was a plot of ground for a dwelling-house and outbuildings, for a dooryard and garden, and usually also an enclosure for feeding cattle and raising corn... At Hartford some contained two acres and others only half an acre each...
>
> The assignment of the first home lots was accompanied or immediately followed by the earliest allotments of arable land and meadow. This process steadily progressed with the increase of population in the towns and with the clearing of forests. By means of it the settlers secured planting land, and the process advanced through various stages until the available land of the towns was approximately or entirely occupied. When the process was completed the township had been entirely laid out, and settlement within it had assumed a relatively permanent form. This was accomplished in part by the granting of lots to individuals and in part by the laying out of common fields. The common fields, too, in their turn were later subdivided among their proprietors. As the result of this process a system of individual ownership gradually took the place of a system of joint ownership and management... n193

As has been noted with respect to other New England colonies, quitrents were only rarely imposed and collected. n194

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 179. 1 Benjamin Trumbull, A Complete History of Connecticut 10 (1898).

(n2)Footnote 180. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 60 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n3)Footnote 181. Id. at 64-65.

(n4)Footnote 182. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 312 (1904).

(n5)Footnote 183. Id. at 317.

(n6)Footnote 184. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 67-72 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n7)Footnote 185. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 323 (1904).

(n8)Footnote 186. See the "Articles of Confederation betwixt the Plantations" printed as part of New Haven colony's first printed compilation of laws in The Earliest Laws of the New Haven and Connecticut Colonies, 1639-1673, 4-8 (John D. Cushing ed. 1977).

(n9)Footnote 187. 1 J. Hammond Trumbull, The Public Records of the Colony of Connecticut 509-563 (1950).

(n10)Footnote 188. John D. Cushing, The Earliest Laws of the New Haven and Connecticut Colonies, 1639-1673 viii (1977).

(n11)Footnote 189. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 116 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n12)Footnote 190. John D. Cushing, The Earliest Laws of the New Haven and Connecticut Colonies, 1639-1673 65-70 (1977).William Michael Treanor, Note, The Origins and the Original Significance of the Just Compensation Clause of the Fifth Amendment , 94 Yale L.J. 694 (1985). Mary Moers Wenig, The Marital Property Law of Connecticut: Past, Present, and Future, 1990 Wis. L. Rev. 807 (1990). Adam Mossoff, Article: What is Property? Putting The Pieces Back Together, 45 Ariz. L. Rev. 371 (Summer, 2003) (Article offers overview of the development of property law during the American Colonial period); David A. Thomas, Finding More Pieces for the Takings Puzzle: How Correcting History Can Clarify Doctrine, 75 U. Colo. L. Rev. 497 (Spring 2004) (challenges some conclusions of Treanor and others).

(n13)Footnote 191. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 424-426 (1904).

(n14)Footnote 192. Id. at 428-432.

(n15)Footnote 193. Id. at 438-440. More detailed descriptions for allotments of individual land parcels in Connecticut settlements are found in id. at 445-447, 449-450, 453-454, 463-465.

(n16)Footnote 194. See §§ 6.03(b)(2) and 6.03(b)(3), supra.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.07

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.07 Development of Property Law in Maryland (from 1634).

§ 6.07(a) The Charter of 1632.

After much importuning, George Calvert -- who had seven years earlier been raised to the peerage as the first Baron of Baltimore -- obtained in 1632 the king's assent for a grant of the land known as Maryland. This first Lord Baltimore died on April 15, 1632, so the charter for Maryland issued on June 20, 1632, named as grantee George's son Cecilius, the second Baron of Baltimore. The Maryland grant included lands that had been earlier granted to the Virginia Company in their charter of 1609, but, according to one legal theory, unoccupied parts of Virginia became subject to re-grants when the Virginia province changed from proprietary to royal status in 1624.

The Maryland charter was distinctly feudal in tone and has been described as conferring "on the grantee probably the most extensive political privileges ever enjoyed by an English subject, since the great houses had bowed before the successive oppression of Yorkist and Tudor rule." n195 These extensive rights applied both to powers of government and to rights of holding and granting land:

> IV. ... We do Grant, and likewise confirm unto the said Baron of Baltimore, [the lands previously described] with all, and singular such, and as ample Rights, Jurisdictions, Privileges, Prerogatives, Royalties, Liberties, Immunities, and royal Rights, and temporal Franchises whatsoever, as well by Sea as by Land, within the Region ... aforesaid, to be had, exercised, used, and enjoyed, as any Bishop of Durham, within the Bishoprick or County Palatine of Durham, in our Kingdom of England, ever heretofore hath had, held, used, or enjoyed, or of Right could, or ought to have, hold, use, or enjoy.
>
> V. And WE do by these Presents ... Make, create and constitute Him, the now Baron of Baltimore, and his Heirs, the True and Absolute Lords and Proprietaries of the Region aforesaid, and of all other the Premises ...; to hold of us ... as of our Castle of Windsor, in our County of Berks, in free and common Soccage, by Fealty only for all Services, and not in capite, nor by Knight's Service, Yielding therefore unto Us ... two Indian arrows of those Parts, to be delivered at the said Castle of Windsor, every Year...: And also the fifth Part of all Gold and Silver Ore, which shall happen from Time to Time, to be found within the aforesaid limits...

> VII... We ... do grant unto the said now Baron, ... and to his Heirs, for the good and happy Government of the said province, free, full, and absolute Power, by the tenor of these Presents, to Ordain, Make, and Enact Laws, of what kind soever, according to their sound Discretions, whether relating to the Public State of the said Province, or the private Utility of Individuals, of and with the Advice, Assent, and Approbation of the Free-Men of the same Province... So Nevertheless, that the Laws aforesaid be consonant to Reason and be not repugnant or contrary, but (so far as conveniently may be) agreeable to the Laws, Statutes, Customs and Rights of this Our Kingdom of England...
>
> XVIII... We ... do give ... unto the aforesaid now Baron of Baltimore, his Heirs and Assigns, full and absolute Licence, Power, and Authority ... [to] assign, alien, grant, demise, or enfeoff so many, such, and proportionate Parts and Parcels of the Premises, to any Person or Persons willing to purchase the same, as they shall think convenient, to have and to hold ... in Fee-Simple, or Fee-tail, or for Term of Life, Lives, or Years; to hold of the aforesaid now Baron of Baltimore, his Heirs and Assigns, by ... such ... Services, Customs and Rents of this kind, as to the same now Baron of Baltimore, his Heirs and Assigns, shall seem fit and agreeable, and not immediately of Us ...

It has been pointed out that the charter not only secured feudal rights and jurisdictions to the proprietors, but also guaranteed to the settlers the rights of Englishmen:

> In other words, Baltimore was to exercise the rights of an absolute lord in this vast new land, with the King called Maryland, after his wife Henrietta Maria. But at the same time, each settler was to be "held, treated, reputed, and esteemed as the faithful Liege-Men of US and our Heirs and Successors, born within our Kingdom of England...." and since the rights of true-born Englishmen of the seventeenth century were quite different from those of the feudal vassals of the fifteenth century Bishops of Durham, a seed of conflict between the Lord Proprietor and the freemen of his colony was planted. And this conflict was destined to grow and develop and never to be ended until the Revolution eliminated the property system. n196

The feudalistic powers of Lord Baltimore were far-ranging indeed, and their significance was long felt in Maryland:

> As Lord Proprietor, Baltimore answered only to the king for his government of Maryland; while the settlers were to enjoy the rights of Englishmen, Calvert owned all the territory within the boundaries of this grant, expected to receive traditional rents, taxes, and fees, appointed all officials necessary to enforce the law, and exercised final political and judicial authority in his domain. He received full power to build fortifications and wage defensive war, to confer honors and titles, incorporate boroughs and towns, and license trade. As head of the church, he had authority to erect and consecrate chapels and churches. Like a baron of old, Baltimore also enjoyed the right of subinfeudation, the power to grant lands within his realm just as the king had bestowed Maryland on him. All these "ample rights, liberties, immunities, and temporal franchises" belonged as an inheritance to the lords Baltimore for all time. n197

§ 6.07(b) The Proprietor's "Conditions of Plantation."

As the actual process of land distribution was about to begin, Lord Baltimore issued "conditions of plantation" describing the terms on which land would be granted to colonists. Such statements were issued in 1633, 1636, 1642 and 1648. n198 The earliest of these, issued even before the settlers left England, became a contract between the individual colonists and the proprietor, providing:

> that each free planter should pay the cost of his outfit and transportation, which amounted to about £20. To every married man who thus provided for the voyage, and for that of his family, the proprietor promised one hundred acres of land for himself, and one hundred for his wife, if she accompanied him; one hundred acres also for each adult servant, and fifty for each child under sixteen years of age. Two > thousand acres of land should also be given to each adventurer who, in the year 1633, should take into the province, for the purpose of settlement, five men between the ages of sixteen and fifty... By each new issue [of conditions of plantation] former conditions were amended or revoked... The conditions of 1648 were especially elaborate, and provided at length for the erection of manors, the reserve of one-sixth of each manor as demesne, and the grant of the remainder by the lord to tenants under such terms as should not infringe on the jurisdiction of the proprietor or prevent his collecting the rents reserved in the original patents. These privileges were to obtain in every grant of two thousand acres, though under earlier conditions grants of one thousand acres might carry with them manorial rights. n199

§ 6.07(c) Later Land Distribution.

This method of land distribution, an example of the headright system intended to encourage colonists, was abolished in 1683, and thereafter land was obtained only by purchase or other conveyance from someone who already held land. A settler who obtained land under the headright system was issued a warrant which authorized the services of a surveyor to lay out the specified acreage wherever vacant land was available. When the certificate of the surveyor was returned, showing metes and bounds of the parcel, a patent under the provincial seal conveyed title, subject to a usually modest quitrent. n200 Because lands were selected according to the subjective choice of individual settlers, a haphazard pattern of settlement resulted:

> Lands from which grants were made according to the conditions of plantation became known as vacant land, and was left uncultivated. A considerable quantity of this remained in nearly all parts of the province down to the final overthrow of the proprietary government. But it had been the practice to locate under land warrants by selecting the most rich and fertile land without regard to the regularity of its area or making it in any way coincide with the boundary of land previously granted. Therefore, especially in the older counties, the most of what came to be left of this vacant land was not only the poorest in quality, but it lay in such small irregular parcels as to be of but little value. n201

For persons who could not afford passage or outfit, those costs could be exchanged for service. A servant might accompany his or her master, or an aspiring colonist might enter into an obligation with the sea captain, who would sell the rights to the services upon arrival. Upon completion of the term of service, usually four or five years, the master was obligated to provide the servant with a set of clothes, a year's provision of corn, and the right to fifty acres of land. n202

§ 6.07(d) Creation and Administration of Manors.

In addition to such individual grants, it was possible for manorial holdings to be conveyed:

> It is clear that Lord Baltimore desired to establish as a support for his palatine dominion a landholding aristocracy after the pattern of feudal England. He offered the courts leet and baron to regulate the numerous tenantry that was expected to settle as retainers of the manorial lords. Some few manors were actually laid out, and from two of these records of the feudal courts have survived as an indication that the manorial system was tried in colonial Maryland. But feudalism never flourished on new world soil. The land holding pattern from the earliest years was characterized by the small plantation unit. When settlers could acquire land in their own right, they were reluctant to accept the status of manorial tenants. Thus family plantations of 250 acres or less dominated the tidewater. n203

Indeed, after 1670, possession of a 50-acre freehold (or a tangible estate of £40) was added to "free" personal status as a qualification for voting, so colonists had even more incentive to avoid the manorial tenancies. Ultimately, only a few manors with feudal institutions of courts leet and baron succeeded in functioning for even a few years:

> [F]our-fifths of the proprietary grants between 1660 and 1700 were for plantations of less than 350 acres. When in 1683 the Lord Proprietor changed the basis of land grants from head rights to ordinary > purchase, any freeman who could find the caution money might become a landowner. Those unable to command the purchase price were often able to buy from larger landowners or from speculators. The trend, already evident in the earliest years, continued to carry Maryland in the direction of a province of yeoman freeholders, instead of a feudal palatinate. n204

While some aristocratic landowners with very large holdings appeared in early colonial Maryland, it is clear that the majority of land was held by small freeholders. By 1676 about 60 manors had been established in Maryland, averaging about 3,000 acres each, n205 but only on a few of those manors were the feudalistic proprietary rights exercised, so most "manors" were, in reality, simply very large freeholds. Of the ordinary freeholds granted before 1663, 60 were of 1,000 acres or more, 241 of between 500 and 1,000 acres, 778 of between 200 and 400 acres, and 389 grants were of less than 200 acres each.

While the Maryland manors did not achieve the importance in the colony the proprietors had hoped for, they represented the most intriguing and anomalous throwback to English feudalism to be practiced in the American colonies. An earlier historian has given the following summary of the manorial practices in early Maryland:

> A manor differed from a mere freehold in that it was given a name, and in that the grantee was allowed to hold court-baron and court-leet, and have all fines and profits belonging thereto. Further, the early grants of manor gave the grantee the advowsons of churches and unrestricted privileges of hunting for any game. The court-baron was given jurisdiction over civil cases in which the damages did not exceed a fine of forty shillings, while the court-leet took cognizance of criminal offenses committed within the precincts of the manor. To what extent such courts were held, there remains no evidence except the records of a court-baron held on St. Gabriel's Manor in the year 1656, and the records of a few sessions of both court-baron and court-leet held on St. Clement's Manor between the years 1659-72. The records of the latter manor show that it had its steward, constable, and bailiff, and that a jury of twelve men, after hearing the charges or complaints, made its presentments, often fixing the fines, and occasionally referring the matter to the governor of the province. If the fine imposed by the jury was thought to be too excessive, it might be revised by affeerors sworn for that purpose.
>
> Only in the grants of the first three manors was any portion of the land set apart as demesne land, that is, land which was not to be granted out in tenancy nor in any way severed or aliened from the said manor. The grant of a manor, like that of a freehold, subjected the grantee to the payment to the proprietor of the annual rent, and the fine for every alienation.
>
> In 1665 the proprietor issued instructions directing that in every county at least two manors, containing not less than six thousand acres each, be surveyed and set apart for his private use. Each of these proprietary manors was placed in charge of a steward, who leased it in parcels to tenants usually for three lives, or for a long term of years, at a rent seldom exceeding ten shillings per hundred acres. Owing to failure to preserve the bounds of them, these manors much dwindled in size or, in some cases, entirely vanished; while such portions of them as were preserved suffered from shameful neglect by poorly paid and incompetent stewards. As a consequence, the bounds between tenements could not be found, leases were lost, and the rents not paid.
>
> In addition to the proprietary manors, the proprietor made several other reserves for the purpose of confining surveys and settlements to those parts of the province in which it was desired that they should be made, or because of the appearance of copper or other ore, the extraordinary fertility of the soil, or the contiguity to towns. Although portions of such reserves were leased, yet none of them were surveyed, laid out, and named as the manors were.
>
> In 1766 the proprietor appointed a commission to sell his manors and reserves; and although the sale of them was somewhat slow, yet nearly fifty thousand acres were sold in seven years, and this meant that > the proprietary lands corresponding to those of the lord's demesne in the medieval fief were to disappear. n206

In at least one respect, landholding according to fundamental precepts of English law had a substantial impact, and that was in the matter of escheat. Because all land was held by the tenure of free and common socage, it was subject to escheat, which under the broad interpretation adhered to by the proprietor -- could occur in several ways. The most common circumstances for escheat were death of the landholder with no surviving heirs or nonpayment of the quitrent. In the early years of the province history, a person who suspected land was subject to escheat could petition for a legal action, always with a jury, to make that determination. If it was decided that the land was escheated, the successful petitioner could apply for a resurvey and eventually obtain the land.

By the early 18th century, the feudalistic proprietary claims had all been fatally weakened:

> The proprietor was unable, after 1738, to enforce his claim to surplus land, while his benefit from the disputed right to escheated land was doubtful. The attempt to erect manors for the largest tenants, and thereby to create a nobility on which he might rely for support, was given up before the close of the seventeenth century. Everything was, therefore, nearly levelled to the simple freehold from which the proprietor continued to receive his rents and some alienation fines. n207

§ 6.07(e) Restriction of Church Rights in Land.

The strong representation of Catholics among Maryland's settlers led to another unique element of Maryland land law. The presence and activity of Catholic priests, especially Jesuits, created situations in which it was possible to obtain grants of land rights from Indians and other sources for the Roman church. But a proclamation from the proprietor in 1648 forbade any person from alienating lands to a church or other society for uses forbidden by the statutes of mortmain, without permission from the proprietor. The mortmain statutes of England generally operated against conveyances to charitable organizations, which were deemed uneconomic uses of the land. "In no other British-American colony was such a precaution necessary, but it kept the land law of Maryland in harmony with that of the mother country and of the other colonies." n208

§ 6.07(f) Local Legislative Regulation of Provincial Land Law.

§ 6.07(f)(1) Achievement of Legislative Initiative.

The activities of Maryland's legislative body, or Assembly, also played a role in shaping early land law. At the outset of this colony's history, the proprietor assumed, with the support of the charter, that all legislation would be initiated with the proprietor and that the representative assembly's function was simply to confirm or deny the propositions. This was stoutly resisted by the legislators, however, and in 1638, after four years and two sessions of the Assembly, the Lord Proprietor conceded that the colonists themselves could initiate legislation.

This concession resulted partly from the Assembly's refusal to approve several propositions that would have vastly strengthened the feudal and medieval character of the province:

> Had the freemen acknowledged that right [of the Proprietor alone to initiate legislation] to be vested solely in him, it is highly probable that the sale of manors would have been forbidden by law. It is equally probable that the laws of the province would have required that on every manor there should be at least twenty freemen, that fifteen of them should be trained as soldiers and kept ready for the service of the country, and that the lord of the manor should maintain them in time of such service. But instead of succeeding in thus providing the land system with the military features of a fief, the bills containing those requirements failed to become laws, and in August, 1638, the lord proprietor conceded to the Assembly the right of initiating legislation. n209

§ 6.07(f)(2) Reception of English Law.

This early legislative deadlock left in doubt just how fully the law of England applied in the colony. In the opinion of one scholar, "The common law of England seems here rather to be looked upon as a system useful for illustration and guidance than a subsidiary law; equity and good conscience was considered to afford proper rules to fill the omissions of the positive law." n210

In 1662 the Assembly enacted a provision declaring that in the absence of provincial law, justice would be sought according to the laws and statutes of England and "that all courts shall judge of the right pleading and the inconsistency of the said laws with the good of the province according to the best of their judgment." n211 Though in force for only a short time, this Maryland provision has been described as "the first definite recognition in America of the power of the courts to apply the common law of England to colonial conditions, and to reject provisions deemed unsuitable." n212 Still unsettled for many decades thereafter was the extent to which English statutes were considered adopted in the colony. Not until an enactment in 1732 was the controversy neutralized by the equivocal provisions that the colony could call upon "the laws and statutes and reasonable customs of England, as used and practiced within the province." n213

§ 6.07(f)(3) Compilation of Legislative Enactments.

The earliest Maryland legislation was not printed, but kept in manuscript form and circulated as needed. Even when Maryland became a royal province in 1692, shortly after the accession of William and Mary, no printed version of the laws appeared until 1700. A second compilation was issued in 1707 and a third in 1718, in the midst of the controversy over how extensively English statutes were received into the colony's jurisprudence. The topics relating to property law found in the 1718 compilation are summarized below, illustrating the extent to which the Assembly had attempted to regulate landholding, even though it was fundamentally based on English common law:

Changing communities designated as towns into ports and towns

Marking highways and making waterways passable

Confirming titles of land given to churches

Conferring right of action of trespass on those with lands lying within Indian land

Ascertaining boundaries of Indian land

Preserving harbors and landing places

Empowering justices to regulate parish boundaries

Ascertaining the height of fences

Quieting possessions, enrolling conveyances and securing the estates of purchasers

Securing person's rights to town lands

For better administration of justice in testamentary affairs, granting administrations, recovery of legacies, securing filial portions, and distribution of intestates' estates

Encouraging settlements by ascertaining the manner of paying alienation fines and quit-rents

Ascertaining land boundaries n214

§ 6.07(g) Land Management in Colonial Maryland.

The management of land in Maryland was shaped by its character as a proprietary colony. During the colony's early years, the issuing of patents for lands claimed by headrights, and the collecting of rents and other land-based income were carried out by the governor, council and secretary. Rents were collected by sheriffs as agents of the colonial government. In 1680 a land office was organized, and in 1684 the proprietor commissioned a land council consisting of four members from the council of state to take over most ministerial duties relating to land:

> Thus the business of granting land, collecting revenue therefrom, and keeping the land records was organized under one distinct office, which continued in existence until 1689, and after a suspension of five years was reopened and remained in activity, with certain administrative changes, as long as Maryland was a province. n215

Land arrangements were also effected from time to time with various Indian tribes, but eventually, the encroaching white settlement rendered most of these agreements unworkable. A treaty would typically be concluded by throwing open Indian lands for white settlement and inviting Indians to submit claims of wrongs n216 to certain designated colonial officials. Weaker tribes sought the protection of the colonists against more aggressive tribes and would be given lands as a permanent refuge, within which white settlement would be prohibited. Such was the arrangement extended to the Pascataway Indians in 1668.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 195. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 53 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n2)Footnote 196. Morris L. Radoff, The Settlement, in The Old Line State, A History of Maryland 4 (Morris L. Radoff ed. 1971).

(n3)Footnote 197. Robert J. Brugger, Maryland, A Middle Temperament, 1634-1980 12 (1988).

(n4)Footnote 198. According to one authority, new statements of conditions of plantation, superseding all previous statements of conditions, were issued in 1641, 1648, 1649, and 1658. Newton D. Mereness, Maryland as a Proprietary Province 50 (1901).

(n5)Footnote 199. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 20-21 (1904). The possible text of a version of "conditions" from 1636 is published in 2 John Leeds Bozman, The History of Maryland 35-38 (1837).

(n6)Footnote 200. Quit rents in Maryland were not formally abolished until 1780.

(n7)Footnote 201. Newton D. Mereness, Maryland as a Proprietary Province 54-55 (1901).

(n8)Footnote 202. Robert J. Brugger, Maryland, A Middle Temperament, 1634-1980 16 (1988).

(n9)Footnote 203. Aubrey C. Land, The Colonial Period, in The Old Line State, A History of Maryland 14 (Morris L. Radoff ed. 1971).

(n10)Footnote 204. Id. at 17.

(n11)Footnote 205. Newton D. Mereness, Maryland as a Proprietary Province 52 (1901).

(n12)Footnote 206. Id. at 53-54.

(n13)Footnote 207. Id. at 58.

(n14)Footnote 208. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 33 (1904).

(n15)Footnote 209. Id. at 96-97. Robert L. McLaughlin, Theories of Land Tenure and the Charismatic Line in Mason & Dixon, 24 Okla. City U. L. Rev. 799 (Fall 1999).

(n16)Footnote 210. Paul Samuel Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in Association of American Law Schools, Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 401 (1907).

(n17)Footnote 211. Id.

(n18)Footnote 212. Id. at 402.

(n19)Footnote 213. Id. at 402-403.

(n20)Footnote 214. According to Osgood, "fines on alienation were actually enforced only in Maryland." In the conditions of plantation issued in 1658, the alienation fine was set at the equivalent of one year's rent, due within one month after sale. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 34 (1904).

(n21)Footnote 215. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 44 (1904). See generally John F. Hart, The Maryland Mill Act, 16691766: Economic Policy and the Confiscatory Redistribution of Private Property, 39 Am. J. Legal Hist. 1 (Jan. 1995).

(n22)Footnote 216. A typical trespass might be caused by livestock of white settlers breaking through fences and trampling Indians' cornfields.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.08

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.08 Development of Property Law in Rhode Island (from 1636).

Unlike the other New England colonies of Plymouth, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, the colony of Rhode Island did not originate as a conscious project of settlement. The colony's genesis lay in three settlements -- Providence, Portsmouth and Newport -- founded independently of one another and of any of the other colonies between 1636 and 1639. Later, the town of Warwick joined with the other three. In 1647, acting with the authority of a charter obtained from a revolutionary English government, they combined into a colony. Before that time, Rhode Island had been independent of any superior government authority or authorization:

> More than any other American colony, the settlement of Rhode Island was the result of unforeseen conditions, for which immediate provision had to be made. No man was its founder; that appellation belongs to no single group of men. It was settled by bands of fugitives, who came from different quarters and at different times. Their movement was not the result of concerted action, though they removed thither to escape oppression in the strictly Puritan colonies or conditions there which to them had become intolerable. With the exception of the few who came from Salem, none were disciples of Roger Williams, nor did they go into exile in order to testify to the truth of his beliefs, or to their loyalty to him as a man. And yet common opposition to Massachusetts and the policy of which it was the leading representative, brought them into practical harmony with him. As time passed and the dangers which continued to surround them became evident, this was generalized into a principle, that of the exclusively secular community. It was declared first among the orders of Providence, later among those of the plantations on Aquedneck and in the legislation of the colony. But this action was occasioned by the relations that existed between the inhabitants of all those settlements and by the struggle in which they were all engaged, rather than by the personality or direct influence of Roger Williams. n217

§ 6.08(a) The Settlement at Providence.

Roger Williams, a refugee from Massachusetts Bay Colony, with a few companions, settled the area that is now Providence and, as was his practice, procured a "deed" to the land from local Indian chiefs. The grant extended from the Pawtuxet River on the west to the Pawtucket River on the east, although the inland extent of the grant was left indefinite.

Whether Williams actually obtained a document of gift at the time of first settlement is not known; however, about two years later a "memorandum" describing the grant was signed by the two chiefs, Miantunnomi and Cannonnicus. The memorandum described the terms of the original deed and, in a separate paragraph, extended the grant to the "grass and meadows" along the Pawtuxet River, which was well beyond the original grant. Thus, the settlers were given the right to graze their livestock as far up the river as they wished:

> Memorandum, that we Cannaunicus and Miantonomi, the two chief sachems of Nanhiggansick, having two yeares since sold unto Roger Williams, ye lands and meadows upon the two fresh rivers, called Mooshausick and Wanasqutucket, doe now by these presents, establish and confirme ye bounds of those lands, from ye river and fields at Pautuckqut, ye great hill of Notquonckanet, on ye northwest, and the two of Maushapogue on ye west.
>
> As also, in consideration of the many kindnesses and services he hath continually done for us, both with our friends at Massachusetts, as also at Quinickicutt and Apaum or Plymouth, we doe freely give unto him all that land from those rivers reaching to Pawtuxet river; as also the grass and meadows upon ye said Pawtuxet river. n218

Although this "deed" has been characterized as Williams' attempt "to extinguish the claims of the Indians to the land of the plantation," n219 in fact the Indians -- about 5,000 Narragansetts and about 1,500 Wampanoags -- continued to roam in the granted area as before. The more limited grant of grazing and water privileges along the full extent of the named streams was "understood by Williams to concede to the English by 'courtesy,' joint use of the lands with the Indians." n220

Williams and those who accompanied him began holding town meetings in 1636, under a form a government that was memorialized the next year in a written covenant:

> We whose names are hereunder, desirous to inhabit in the town of Providence, do promise to subject ourselves in active and passive obedience to all such orders or agreements as shall be made for public good of the body in an orderly way, by the major consent of the present inhabitants, masters of families -- incorporated together in a Towne fellowship, and others whom they shall admit unto them only in civil things. n221

With this form of government in place -- theoretically able to promulgate all laws thought necessary by the settlers, including those related to landholding -- these first Providence folk then determined the qualifications for one to become an inhabitant of the town. As stated later by Roger Williams:

> it was agreed between us, that every person that should be admitted into the fellowship of injoying landes and disposing of the purchase, should pay thirtye shillinges into the public stock; and ffirst about thirtye poundes should be paid unto myselfe by thirty shillings a person, as they were admitted. n222

Thereafter, Williams apparently obtained his thirty pounds, so in 1638 he made out a deed to himself and twelve associates. A memorandum of the deed recited:

> Memorandum, that I Roger Williams having formerly purchased of Conanicus and Miantonomi, this our situation or Plantation of New Providence, ... in consideration of thirty pounds, received from the inhabitants of the said place, do freely and fully pass grant and make over equal right and power of enjoying and disposing the same ground and lands unto my loving friends and neighbors ... and such others as the major part of us shall admit unto the same fellowship with of vote us. n223

"The effect of the document was to transfer the land to the thirteen -- of whom Williams was one -- as an association or quasi-corporation, to be held temporarily in trust by them for the rising town." n224 Also in 1638, Williams and the others entered in an agreement dividing up certain meadowlands:

> ... all the meadow ground at Pawtuxet, bounding upon the fresh river upon both sides, is to be impropriated unto these thirteen persons, ... and to be equally divided among them, and every man to pay an equal proportion to raise up the sum of twenty pounds for the same, and if it shall come to pass, that some or any of these thirteen persons abovesaid do not pay or give satisfaction ... that they or he, shall leave their or his proportion of meadow ground unto the rest of those thirteen persons. n225

Even before these documents were executed, apparently the town government had exercised the power of distributing land to the inhabitants. Minutes of a town meeting held on June 10, 1637, record that "portions of grass and meadow ... were confirmed [to several named persons] as their proper right and inheritance to them and theirs...." n226

After the agreement and declaration of 1638, differences between Williams and some of the other twelve began to develop. Apparently Williams conceived of an ever expanding democratic community, with inhabitants admitted to town membership and granted land ownership on an equal footing with the original thirteen. Some of the other twelve, however, were striving to establish a narrow, exclusive town proprietorship, with themselves and their designated successors as the perpetual proprietors. For a time, this group succeeded in conducting the affairs of Providence according to their proprietary notions. "They consolidated the board of proprietors, controlled the town meeting, and through that the granting of land and the admission of freemen." n227

Despite this control, controversies over land increased. In 1640, a "board of five arbitrators or 'disposers' was chosen by the town meeting, not only to settle disputes, but to dispose of town lands, fix their bounds, and act as an executive board for the town." n228 A major controversy developed around one Samuel Gorton, who twice tried unsuccessfully to be admitted to town privileges, and who then joined other disaffected persons who also had not been admitted to the town or given access to the common land. They were aware that Providence had no proper authority from England to conduct itself as a colony. The tumult caused by these dissidents was such that some of the proprietors appealed to neighboring Massachusetts for protection. The immediate problem dissolved when Gorton moved, but the need for a colony charter was made clear.

§ 6.08(b) The Settlement at Portsmouth.

The island of Aquedneck was settled by other refugees banished from Massachusetts because of religious nonconformance. Through Roger Williams' assistance, a deed to the land was obtained from the Indian chiefs Cannonicus and Miantunnomu, the same two who had made the Providence grant, and the chiefs also secured the removal of twenty Narragensett Indians from the island in preparation for the immigration of the English settlers. The deed recited

> That we Cannonnicus and Miantunnomu ... have sold unto Mr. Coddington and his friends ... the great Island of Acquednecke...; allso the grasse upon the rivers ... for the full payment of forty fathom of white beads...
>
> That by giveinge by Miantunnomus' ten coates and twenty howes to the present inhabitants, they shall remove themselves from off the Island before next winter... n229

Even before the deed was obtained, eighteen of the prospective original proprietors of this settlement and one other person met at Providence in March 1638, and entered into a plantation covenant. The covenant stated nothing specific about land, but it declared that the covenantors "incorporate ourselves into a Bodie Politick and submit our persons ...to all those perfect and most absolute laws of [Jesus Christ] given us in his holy word of truth, to be guided and judged thereby." n230 Coddington was chosen as judge, and he covenanted "to do justice and Judgment impartially according to the lawes of God, and to maintaine the Fundamentall Rights and Privileges of this Bodie Poliltick...." n231 The town assembly also was an incipient colony, with those at the town meetings "passing orders like that at Providence or elsewhere, about the laying out and sale of lots, care of the unimproved land, locating the meeting-house, repairing highways, building a mill, local police, and other similar affairs. It controlled its own membership under an order reserving to 'the body' the right to receive inhabitants or freemen." n232 According to minutes of a general meeting on May 13, 1638, persons were to be admitted as "inhabitants or Freemen, to build or plant upon the Island" upon the consent of the proprietors and agreeing to submit to the island's government. n233

The land distribution and landholding practices in Portsmouth differed markedly from those at Providence:

> Unlike Williams's group, who tried to give equal plots of land to all respectable settlers, Coddington's government allocated land in proportion to the wealth and social rank of each settler. "Gentlemen" received larger grants than millers or coopers; and they, in turn, had larger shares than common laborers. Moreover, land was given sparingly to newcomers, at first; hence, only a minority of the inhabitants were entitled to vote. n234

Whether because of or in spite of these land distribution patterns, the island settlement of Portsmouth prospered and grew faster than Providence:

> The community at Portsmouth took shape ... as an agricultural one, with a common field or pasture at the north end of the island just beyond the cluster of houses. Allocation of land, and soon the placement of dwellings, spread around the coast, drawn by the need for water transportation. Apart from lingering preference for living in a compact village, only the ferry to the mainland and the original common field preserved a geographical focal point. n235

When several of the leading men of Portsmouth moved to a better site, now known as Newport, the remaining members adopted a new covenant on April 30, 1639. A striking change from the first covenant is that the signers departed from their earlier position of recognizing no earthly superior governing authority. They agreed that they "[doe acknowledge] ourselves the legall subjects of [his Majestie] King Charles, and in his name [doe hereby binde] ourselves into a civill body politicke, unto his lawes according to matters of justice." n236 Seven men were designated to "lay out lands as they shall be disposed." n237

§ 6.08(c) The Settlement at Newport.

Only four months after settling at Portsmouth, Coddington and others removed to a better harbor at the southwest end of the island, the site of the present-day Newport. Ten men who embodied a definite aristocratic spirit, including Coddington as judge, entered into a compact, dated April 28, 1639:

> [We] doe engage ourselves to bear equall charges, answerable to our strength and estates in common; and that our determinations shall be by major voice of judge and elders; the Judge to have a double voice. n238

In Newport, land distribution patterns followed closely those of Portsmouth:

> [T]he apportionment of land provided many farms of middling size and gave the leading men enormous estates which they generally put in the hands of tenants for development... The new town from the start had its center around the brook running into the harbor, with buildings slowly extending south by the water's edge and northeast inland. The first settlers gave themselves allotments of various sizes, but each man's grant ordinarily included a house lot by the harbor, a meadow lot, and a much larger tract of arable land. n239

§ 6.08(d) Newport and Portsmouth United.

The Newport colonists in 1640 acknowledged King Charles as their sovereign and made overtures of union toward Portsmouth. The union was amicably achieved; five men were chosen for laying out Portsmouth lands, and three men were selected for laying out Newport lands. n240 Further, as to land distribution:

> It is ordered, that Libertie is granted for the Major parte of the Freemen of each Towne to select certaine men from among themselves to proportion forth to each man his propriety of Land, and then having it layd forth orderly, it shall be recorded at the General Court. n241

A general court, or assembly, held at Newport on May 6, 1640, gave further instructions for land management:

> It is ordered, that all such who shall have a Howse lott granted unto them within any of our Townes, shall build a Howse thereon within a yeare after the Grant thereof, or else it shall be forfeited to the Towns use. Repealed...
>
> It is ordered, that Commission be directed to the Treasurers to make demands of all such monies as are due to the Treasury for the Lands assigned forth to particular men, and to make returns of all such who shall be therein remiss, at the next particular Courte who are to be ordered thereby according to Law ... n242

Another general court of March 16-19, 1641, attempted once again to identify and confirm the source of governmental authority:

> It is ordered and unanimously agreed upon, that the Government which this Bodie Politick doth attend unto in this Island, and the Jurisdiction thereof, in favour of our Prince is a Democracie, or Popular Government; that is to say, It is in the Powre of the Body of Freemen orderly assembled, or the major part of them, to make or constitute Just Lawes, by which they will be regulated, and to depute from among themselves such Ministers as shall see them faithfully executed between Man and Man. n243

At this same assembly, an order to establish systematic land records was also given:

> It is ordered, that each Towne shall provide a Towne Book, wherein they shall Record the Evidences of the Lands by them impropriated; and shall also have Powre to give forth a Coppie thereof, which shall be a clear evidence for them and theirs, to whom it is so granted. n244

A form of land tenure conferring nearly absolute ownership was declared for the two settlements:

> It is ordered, Established and Decreed, unanimouslie, that all men's Properties in their Lands of the Island, and the Jurisdiction thereof, shall be such, and soe free, that neyther the State nor any Person or Persons shall intrude into it, molest him in it, to deprive him of anything whatsoever that is, or shall be within that, or any of the bounds thereof; and this Tenure and Propriety of his therein shall be continued to him, or his; or to whomsoever he shall assign it for Ever. n245

In a general court held September 19, 1642, the power of town freemen to appoint juries was described, affirming "that they shall have powre as well to appoint the Inhabitants, as Freemen for that service, by virtue of the Tenure and grant of their lands which is freehold...." n246 Also, all persons were prohibited from making "any sale of his lands (in or belonging to our Jurisdiction) to any other Jurisdiction, or person therein, unless that Jurisdiction or person shall be subject to the Government here established, upon paine of forfeiture of the said lands so proferred." n247

At a general court held on March 13, 1644, it was acknowledged that many land transactions had occurred without being recorded, so persons holding such lands were invited to come forward with documentary or testimonial evidence so that a proper recording could be made. When the transaction was thereupon recorded by the secretary, the record would be "authentick to [the landholder] or them, their Heirs, Executors or Assigns, as if the said Lands had been originally granted, and according to that Tract in all points observed." n248

§ 6.08(e) The Settlement at Warwick.

During this period one Samuel Gorton achieved notoriety throughout the Massachusetts and Rhode Island settlements for his refusal to submit to most forms of government (except as properly authorized by England) and to most exercises of governmental authority. The misadventures of him and his associates led him to purchase from the Indians a large tract of land running twenty miles west from Narragansett Bay, south of Providence. Local Indians and other settlers objected to the colonization and sought the aid of Massachusetts in bringing it to a halt. Meanwhile, the settlers conceded that they had no authority to govern themselves but denied that any of the other Rhode Island towns had any such authority. They did not combine together as a corporation or attempt to exercise any powers of government. Massachusetts then acted to claim power over the Warwick tract, arrested Gorton and others, and eventually sentenced them to hard labor and banishment from the Warwick area.

While political machinations proceeded, the settlement grew slowly, with landholding practices similar to those of its sister settlements:

> The little town there grew slowly, requiring two or three decades to reach fifty families. The house lots at the head of the Cove made a town center. Newcomers who did not acquire a stake in the Shawomet Purchase [the original tract purchased from the Indians] lived on the west side on the edge of a large tract. Warwick Neck to the east of the Cove was for the purchasers and their successors. There they created common fields and pastures, taking advantage of the many geographical features that facilitated fencing out predators and closing in livestock, and set about providing themselves with the necessities of life. n249

§ 6.08(f) The First Charter for the Rhode Island Settlements in 1644.

All four settlements in the Rhode Island area shared the common characteristic of being utterly without a superior governing authority; they were, therefore, necessarily without any authority to colonize or conduct governmental activities, except such authority as they agreed to exercise among themselves. That this left the settlements vulnerable to larger, more legitimate and acquisitive neighbor colonies was punctuated in 1643, when Massachusetts, Plymouth, Connecticut and New Haven formed a federation specifically excluding the Rhode Island settlements. The federation not only belabored lack of legal title in the Rhode Island settlers, but they asserted their own claims, based on conquests of and treaties and alliances with the Indians. In addition, settlers in Providence had submitted to Massachusetts' authority in an attempt to obtain assistance.

Roger Williams therefore traveled to England and obtained a patent in 1644. The timing of his arrival was fortunate, inasmuch as King Charles had fled from London in 1642, and governmental power was in the hands of the Puritans, giving Williams early access to persons with power. While the patent ostensibly applied to all the Rhode Island settlements, it was not readily accepted because the Newport and Portsmouth settlers had not requested Williams to obtain a patent, and the Warwick settlers decided to seek their own patent. On behalf of this latter group, Gorton obtained a confirmation of the original purchase from the Indians in 1646, but by the time he returned to Rhode Island in 1648, delegates from all four colonies had met to establish laws for a centralized government.

The patent of 1644, obtained by Roger Williams, declared the basic authority for law and governance, and confirmed the rights to the land: The Earl of Warwick, as governor in chief of the plantations, and a majority of commissioners by the authority of Parliament:

> do .. give, grant, and confirm, to the aforesaid Inhabitants of the Towns of Providence, Portsmouth, > and Newport, a free and absolute Charter of Incorporation ... Together with full Power and Authority to rule themselves, and such others as shall hereafter inhabit within any Part of the said Tract of land, by such a Form of Civil Government, as by voluntary consent of all, or the greater Part of them, they shall find most suitable to their Estate and Condition ... Provided, nevertheless, that the said Laws, Constitutions, and Punishments, for the Civil Government of the said Plantations, be conformable to the Laws of England, so far as the Nature and Constitution of the place will admit. n250

§ 6.08(g) The Code of 1647.

The meetings with representatives from all four colonies culminated in May, 1647, with the "Code of Laws" adopted by the First General Assembly of "The Incorporation of Providence Plantations." This legislation has been described as the "first body of American law to permit absolute and unqualified religious freedom throughout the colony." n251

The provisions of the 1647 Code relating to governance of landholding are summarized as follows:

> 6. The delegates consent to be governed by the laws of England, "together with the way of the Administration of them, soe far as the nature and constitution of this Plantation will admit...."

For the Province of Providence:

> ... the form of Government established in Providence Plantations is Democraticall; that is to say, a Government held by ye free and voluntarie consent of all, or the greater parte of the free Inhabitants.

Touching Laws:

> 1. That no person, in this Colonie, shall be taken or imprisoned, or be disseized of his Lands or Liberties, or be Exiled, or any other otherwise molested or destroyed, but by the Lawfull judgment of his Peeres, or by some known Law, and according to the Letter of it, Ratified and confirmed by the major part of the Generall Assembly lawfully met and orderly managed.
>
> Burning of houses is prohibited.
>
> Forcible entry and detainer is defined, described, and penalized.
>
> Various trespasses are prohibited, and punished with double damages.
>
> Fraudulent Dealing:
>
> Various transactions are to be in writing.
>
> Fraudulent, Deceitfull and Fained Deeds, Bonds and Gifts made by Debtors to avoid their Creditors ... shall be void ... And the parties to such fraudulent Deeds, not made in good faith and upon good consideration, shall forfeit one yeare's rent of the Lands and Tenements; the whole value of the Goods and Chattells, and so much money as shall be conteyned in the Bond, the one moytie wherof is the King's Custome, the other goes to the party grieved.
>
> [N]o Lands, Tenements, or other Hereditaments, shall pass, alter or change from one to another, whereby any state of inheritance or Freehold shall be made or take effect in any person or persons, or any use thereof to be made by reasons only of any bargaine and sale thereof, except the same bargaine and sale be made by writing, indented, sealed and enrolled in a Meeting of the Towne, where such Lands, or Tenements soe bargained doth lye ...

> Forging of deeds and records is prohibited and remedies are prescribed.
>
> Probate of wills is provided for and regulated in detail.
>
> Provision is made for a general recorder.
>
> In court actions, a person may plead his or her own case, may use an attorney, or may use one of the two attorneys assigned to the court. n252

This prescriptions of this "code" remained the basic laws of the Rhode Island settlements for some decades to come, even though the colony remained entangled in political controversy for many years to come. A brief review of the contending interests has been expressed as follows:

> Internal squabbles broke out in the towns and sometimes pitted the local authority against that of the colony. Several of the Pawtuxet men still claimed to be in Massachusetts, and Warwick feared another military expedition from Boston. Suddenly Coddington returned with a document from the Council of State in England naming him governor of Aquidneck for life, with complete judicial powers. Thereupon three of his former friends rushed to London to get the grant annulled. Then the mainland towns, believing that the island towns were reestablishing their separate commonwealth, installed Samuel Gorton in place of Nicholas Easton, the Newport man who had been elected president, and sent Roger Williams off to England to seek reconfirmation of the patent of 1644. Easton had no notion of stepping down or joining Coddington, so there were three governments instead of one -- two claiming jurisdiction on Aquidneck, one of them based on the same patent of 1644 that the mainland government thought it was using. n253

§ 6.08(h) The Royal Charter of 1663.

A reconfirmation of the original patent was obtained and brought back to the colony in 1652, but it was not until 1658 that the various factional interests receded and a single government exercised authority over all four settlements. With the restoration of the Stuart monarchy in England in 1660, a new peril arose, for the 1644 patent had not been issued as a royal grant. Rhode Island as a colony thus quickly professed allegiance to Charles II and acted to obtain a royal charter, which was finally issued in 1663. n254

The charter finally gave authoritative guarantees of fundamental rights:

> Unlike the first patent, the royal charter of 1663 prescribed a form of government. It differed from the constitution worked out in 1647 and 1648 primarily by enhancing the powers of magistrates. The rights to operate a government and dispose of the colony's land were given to the governor and company as a corporation -- that is, to the freemen...
>
> Under the charter, Rhode Islanders received welcome assurances of good standing among the English Americans. They were guaranteed rights to travel and carry on business in the other English colonies, regardless of old sentences of banishment. They were given rights to fish off New England. They could engage in commerce with other ports in the king's dominions. The monarch declared that the territory of Rhode Island should not be invaded by armed men from neighboring colonies without consent of local officials... n255

In the matter of land rights, the charter offered the same specifics that applied in the other New England colonies:

> The charter also laid down a few fundamentals of law for Rhode Island. Existing statutes and practices were to continue in force until changed. As before, any new colonial legislation was required to conform to English law as nearly as circumstances would permit. The terms of land ownership were to be the same as in the king's manor of East Greenwich, thus providing the colony with the most attractive variety of land tenure in English law attractive because it was the kind with fewest medieval features. Somewhat loosely, it was said that Rhode Island land was held in "fee simple" -- that is, full ownership subject only to paying taxes. n256

In the royal charter, the named patentees and others thereafter admitted to their number, were constituted "a Body Corporate and Politick in Fact and Name" and "They and their Successors, shall and may have Perpetual Succession ... And also to have, Take, Possess, Acquire, and Purchase Lands, Tenaments and Hereditaments, or any Goods or Chattels; and the same to Lease, Grant, Demise, Aliene, Bargain, Sell and dispose of, at their own will and Pleasures, as other our Leige People of this Our Realm of England ...." n257

§ 6.08(i) Land-related Legislation of the Rhode Island Assembly.

Both before and after the royal charter of 1663, the various colonial assemblies of Rhode Island met and enacted various statutes related to landholding and land rights. The subjects of these provisions may be summarized as follows:

No person to be disseised of lands except by the lawful judgment of peers or by some known law.

Burning of dwellings or of barns

Forcible entry and detainer

Trespass

Fraudulent deeds

Forged records and writs

Probate of wills and granting of administrations

Laying out the township of East Greenwich

Intruders on lands

Regulating fences

Prohibiting the recorder from being an attorney

Assembly consent for land purchases from Indians

Requirement of a writing for certain bargains and deeds

Regulating execution proceedings and distraints on goods and chattels

Preventing inhabitants from subjecting their lands to any other government

Preventing excessive riding [speeding] on streets and highways

Establishing townships

Confirming land grants made in Newport, Providence, Portsmouth, Warwick and Westerly prior to the royal charter of 1663:

Be it therefore Enacted ... That all the Lands Lying and being, with the Limits of each and every of the aforesaid Towns, ... Be and hereby is Allowed of, Ratified and Confirmed, to the Proprietors of each of the aforesaid Towns ... their Heirs and Assigns for ever ...; and whereas there is within several of the Towns within this Colony, considerable of Lands, Lying yet Uncommon or Undivided; And for the more orderly way and manner of the several proprietors ... and that the Exact Boundaries of each and every Mans Allotments, when Laid to him may be kept in perpetuam ...That it shall and may be lawful for the Proprietors, to chuse and appoint a Clerk, and a Surveyor ... as they shall judge needful and convenient, for the orderly carrying on and management of the whole affairs on such Community ...

Regulating ferries

Preventing unauthorized settlements

Invoking the law of England where no law of the colony provides a remedy

Regulation assessments for and collecting of taxes

Preventing forest fires

Regulating deer hunting

Quieting possession (confirming old grants and confirming title upon twenty years' possession)

Whereas at the first settling of this Colony, and for sundry Years afterwards, Lands were of little or no Value, and Skilful Men in the Law were much wanted, whereby many Deeds, Grants and Conveyances were weakly made, which may Occasion Great Contests in Law, if not timely prevented.

Be it therefore Enacted ... That all Grants, Charters, Profits, Rights and Priviledges, heretofore Granted and Given by the General Assembly ... hereby are Ratified and Confirmed to be Good and Effectual ... to the Persons therein Mentioned, and their Heirs and Assigns for ever.

... where any Person ... shall by the space of Twenty Years, be in the Uninterrupted, Quiet, Peacable and Actual Seisin and Possession of any Land or Hereditaments within this Colony, for and during the said time, Claiming the same as his, her or their proper, sole and Rightful Estate in Fee Simple, such Actual Seisin and Possession, shall be allowed to give and make a Good and Rightful Title to such person or persons, their Heirs and Assigns for ever...

Preventing purchase of Indian lands without governmental consent

Recording deeds and conveyances

Laying out highways and roads in the towns

Appointing overseers to lease out lands in behalf of Ninigret the Indian chief

Distributing and settling intestates' estates. n258

§ 6.08(j) Summary of Land Rights in Colonial Rhode Island.

One of the most distinctive features of Rhode Island's early colonial history is the absence of any effective jurisdiction exercised by a superior governmental authority. The first settlers were entirely on their own, utterly without authority or restraint from any other English colony or, indeed, from England itself. Their very immigration to the Rhode Island area was an attempt to escape or avoid such authority. This absolute independence of action, coupled with their own background of New England colonial experience in which land was held virtually free of any feudal burdens, led directly to landholding in the form of absolute ownership. At first, the absolute ownership rested with the original proprietors of each township, but their rights to individual land parcels were eventually sold or given to others. Rights retained by the proprietors consisted mostly of the usual rights of government, while the conveyance and possession of land carried full rights of seisin. What controversies did surround landholding in Rhode Island were usually associated with disputed rights of government, apportioning the size of land grants to the grantees' social status, and difficulties in tracing title:

> In the Narragansett [Rhode Island] settlements the towns were always much more independent of colony action than they were elsewhere... The colony laws make no important reference either to that, or to the regulation of town lands and herds... [I]n the management of their lands, as in everything else, the towns of Rhode Island pursued a more independent course than did those in the other New England colonies. A comparison, however, of their internal history with that of the towns in the adjacent colonies will show that in all essential particulars they conformed to the New England model. The original Narragansett towns were themselves offshoots of Salem, Boston, and other pre-existing towns, and their founders remained true to the polity with which they were familiar...
>
> ... [I]n those colonies there was no land system apart from the towns... The management of land throughout those colonies was left to the towns...
>
> In nearly all cases the settlements which were made prior to 1660 were located on arms of the sea or on the banks of streams within the tide-water area. The land which was subject of grant, when cleared, consisted of upland, meadow, salt marsh, and fresh marsh or swamp. In many cases the upland which was first utilized was an Indian corn-field or clearing...
>
> The settlers made use of the upland for home lots and planting fields. The meadow was generally utilized for hay and pasturage. From the marshes and swamps hay and thatch were also procured. In the remote uncleared or only partially cleared tracts, swine, sheep, and young cattle were pastured. Oxen, horses, and milch cows were pastured upon land nearer the village...
>
> Several of the towns which later formed the colony of Rhode Island were established by the spontaneous act of their settlers and upon land which they had occupied in most cases after the extinguishment of Indian claims...
>
> The settlement of a town normally began with the laying out of the village plot and the assignment of home lots. This to an extent determined the location of highways, of the village common, and of some of the outlying fields. On or near the common the church was built, and in not a few cases the site that was chosen for this building went far toward determining the entire lay-out of the town. The ideal of a home lot was a plot of ground for a dwelling house and outbuildings, for a dooryard and garden, and usually also an enclosure for feeding cattle and raising corn... In Providence [home lots] contained five acres.
>
> The assignment of the first home lots was accompanied or immediately followed by the earliest allotments of arable land and meadow. The process steadily progressed with the increase of population in the towns and with the clearing of the forests. By means of it the settlers secured planting land, and the process advanced through various stages until the available land of the towns was approximately or entirely occupied. When the process was completed the township had been entirely laid out, and settlement within it had assumed a relatively permanent form. This was accomplished in part by the granting of lots to individuals and in part by the laying out of common fields. The common fields, too, in their turn were later subdivided among their proprietors. As the result of this process a system of > individual ownership gradually took the place of a system of joint ownership and management; a settled and cultivated township came to exist where previously there had been only an unappropriated forest and waste. n259

Osgood's excellent work also provides specific commentary on the evolution of individual landholdings through the early decades of Rhode Island settlement and of New England colonization, in general:

> A necessary consequence of the method of allotting land ... was, that the estate of each individual would consist of a number of small tracts located in different parts of the town plot...
>
> ... But before the towns had long been settled, a tendency toward consolidation of estates appears. Many exchanges of land were effected which had this as their object. Purchases and sales often had a similar effect. So did intermarriages and inheritance. The result of this process, operating through generations, has been to substitute for the early system of parcelled estates the consolidated farms of the present day.
>
> Common fences and herds were characteristic accompaniments of the system of common fields and joint cultivation which were the basis of the town economy... As a rule, instead of fencing off by itself the allotment of each individual in a field or meadow, the entire field was surrounded by a common fence, and this was furnished with gates and approached by paths or highways. All grants of land were made subject to the right of the community to open highways through them ... Of the common fences, each shareholder was bound to build and keep in repair the part which was adjacent to his lot or lots...
>
> In Warwick, Rhode Island, the "front fence" which separated the homesteads from the large common that lay west of the village marked a most important line of division. Orders for its repair continually recur, and it was maintained both summer and winter...
>
> In the assignment of town lots and the drafting of regulations for the use of common lands a rigid numerical equality was occasionally maintained; each individual received just so many acres and just as much accommodation as any other, no more and no less. But in most instances an effort is discernible to make the grants proportional to what might be called the investment of the individual settler in the enterprise of founding the town. This assumed two forms, that of the expense or cost to which he was subjected and that of the ability which he contributed to the undertaking. In the case of the early towns ... on Narragensett Bay (Rhode Island), the cost, small though it was, of extinguishing the claims of the Indians had to be borne by the towns rather than the colony... Those who met those [and other expenses, such as surveying and building a common house] were proprietors and received their dividends in the form of lands...
>
> The original contribution to the founding of a town by a natural transition developed into the town rate...
>
> The colonists possessed the elements [for making contributions] in varying proportion. Some had served out their indentures as servants, and in consequence of a small grant from their former masters or from the town had found a place among the class of cottagers. On the outskirts of the settlement, in the tracts which had early lain common as pasture, provision was usually made for families of this class ...
>
> ... In 1652 Warwick, in Rhode Island, laid out its meadow near the town, for the inhabitants who, as yet, had not been provided for...
>
> ... Town records also abound in references to grants, the purpose of which was to equalize inequalities which had resulted from earlier allotments. Individual allotments were frequently eked out and inconveniences of location were removed in this way...

> ... The land of the towns, their herds and fences, were subject to joint management. But the question arises, To what extent did this originate with the town meetings or how far did it proceed from distinct boards of proprietors?
>
> ... The town meeting was at the same time a meeting of proprietors, or might easily become such. In the early history of towns a very important part of the business of the town meetings consisted in making grants of land ...
>
> ... In Rhode Island ... boards of proprietors of common lands appear at an early date in the towns of Providence and Warwick, though in Portsmouth the town lands were directly controlled by the town meeting.
>
> But in all towns, even from the outset, there were certain grantees of land who were not admitted to the body of proprietors. They might become freemen of the town and thus have a voice in town meeting, or even be freemen of the colony, and yet not find admission with the circle of proprietors. The idea of freemanship was political in its nature, that of proprietorship was territorial...
>
> In every towne there were also certain cottagers who, in the language of the Hartford records, "were granted lotts to have onely at the towne's courtesie, with liberty to fetch woode and keepe swine or cowes on the Common." These were not even freemen, and their admission to the town was safeguarded in such as, if possible, to prevent their adding to the number of the town poor. They were simply inhabitants...
>
> ... As the supply from which allotments could be made grew less, land became an increased object of desire, both to those who controlled it and to those who were seeking to possess it... [I]n towns where the number of non-commoners came to equal that of the proprietors, struggles over the management of the town lands were very likely to occur...
>
> ... [T]he earliest controversy of this kind developed in Providence... n260

Not only in Providence, but in other Rhode Island towns the controversies over land distribution flared up persistently:

> On Aquidneck (Portsmouth and Newport) the founders planned communities with traditional gradations from gentleman to servant. The levels were initially marked out by the amounts of land given to the various settlers -- from several hundred acres to none at all. Those in the upper half of the spectrum were to have political rights, the rest would not. The levels were assigned roughly in accord with rank held previously in other places, but a few men, selected mainly on the basis of wealth, were to be lifted to the status of gentlemen and rulers. There were no settlers of genuinely high birth to begin with... In Portsmouth some of the men given little land and no political rights clamored for higher positions and brazenly set up their own meeting to seek their goals...
>
> In Providence, by contrast, the conflict seemed to begin over religious liberty, but came to rest on land. Williams wanted to keep the town open for victims of religious persecution. To do this he espoused an egalitarian social policy: let everyone who was admitted have the same shares of land -- a package of allocations including a house lot, meadow, crop land, and privileges to use the commons. His earliest companions, however, wanted special consideration. After heated exchanges with them, Williams agreed that part of the town should be set aside for them (and himself), leaving the rest to be divided up among the first settlers plus a growing number of other people. Still the townsfolk were not satisfied. Some newcomers were admitted only to quarter-share rights; ultimately admissions with full land allocations were stopped after about one hundred had been made. n261

Shortly after Williams' death in 1683, Providence began granting small lots, 400 to 600 square feet, along the waterfront for use as wharves or warehouses, and at that time began the town's rise to commercial prominence. n262

In the early years of the 18th century, the colonial government became much more assertive in resolving long-standing land disputes based on the perceived inequities in early allotments. To end disputes over common land -- in the few places where any remained after 1715 -- it was generally parcelled out entirely to individual grantees. The power of proprietors, especially of the Narragansett proprietors, was gradually weakened, and more of their lands were opened for settlement, with consequent economic progress for the colony. Also, with new lands more freely available, some were able to add to their already large holdings.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 217. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 334 (1904).

(n2)Footnote 218. 1 Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 18 (John Russell Bartlett ed. 1856).

(n3)Footnote 219. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 335 (1904).

(n4)Footnote 220. Id. at 336.

(n5)Footnote 221. 1 Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 14 (John Russell Bartlett ed. 1856).

(n6)Footnote 222. Id. at 23.

(n7)Footnote 223. Id. at 19-20.

(n8)Footnote 224. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 338 (1904).

(n9)Footnote 225. Id. at 20-21.

(n10)Footnote 226. Id. at 17.

(n11)Footnote 227. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 339 (1904).

(n12)Footnote 228. Id. at 340. Osgood further noted, "This cumbersome machinery furnished a weak substitute for government in a plantation of squatters, that was rent by internal strife and was adjacent to two colonies which were ready to absorb it." Id.

(n13)Footnote 229. 1 Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 45-46 (John Russell Bartlett ed. 1856).

(n14)Footnote 230. Id. at 52.

(n15)Footnote 231. Id. at 53.

(n16)Footnote 232. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 342 (1904).

(n17)Footnote 233. Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 53 (John Russell Bartlett ed. 1856).

(n18)Footnote 234. William C. Mcloughlin, Rhode Island, A Bicentennial History 21 (1978).

(n19)Footnote 235. Sydney V. James, Colonial Rhode Island, A History 26 (1975).

(n20)Footnote 236. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 70 (1904).

(n21)Footnote 237. Id. at 71.

(n22)Footnote 238. 1 Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 87 (John Russell Bartlett ed. 1856).

(n23)Footnote 239. Sydney V. James, Colonial Rhode Island, A History 27-28 (1975).

(n24)Footnote 240. 1 Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 100-102 (John Russell Bartlett ed. 1856).

(n25)Footnote 241. Id. at 102.

(n26)Footnote 242. Id. at 103.

(n27)Footnote 243. Id. at 112.

(n28)Footnote 244. Id. at 114.

(n29)Footnote 245. Id. at 116.

(n30)Footnote 246. Id. at 124.

(n31)Footnote 247. Id. at 126.

(n32)Footnote 248. Id. at 128.

(n33)Footnote 249. Sydney V. James, Colonial Rhode Island, A History 31-32 (1975).

(n34)Footnote 250. John Russell Bartlett, Records of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 143-146 (1856).

(n35)Footnote 251. The Earliest Acts and Laws of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, 1647-1719 vii (John D. Cushing ed. 1977).

(n36)Footnote 252. Id. at 3-56.

(n37)Footnote 253. Sydney V. James, Colonial Rhode Island, A History 63 (1975).

(n38)Footnote 254. Patrick T. Conley, Separation of Powers in Rhode Island, 44 R.I. B.J. 9 (Oct. 1995).

(n39)Footnote 255. Id. at 68-69.

(n40)Footnote 256. Id. at 69.

(n41)Footnote 257. The Earliest Acts and Laws of the Colony of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations 1647-1719 128 (John D. Cushing ed. 1977).

(n42)Footnote 258. Id. at 57-120, 135-236.

(n43)Footnote 259. 1 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 435-440 (1904).

(n44)Footnote 260. Id. at 448-467.

(n45)Footnote 261. Sydney V. James, Colonial Rhode Island, A History 78-79 (1975). See also Charles Wyman Hopkins, The Home Lots of the Early Settlers of the Providence Plantations (1886).

(n46)Footnote 262. Id. at 262.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.09

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.09 Development of Property Law in Delaware (from 1638).

§ 6.09(a) Land Rights in Early Dutch Settlements.

European exploration of the territory that was to become the colony of Delaware commenced in August 1609, when Henry Hudson, in the employ of the Dutch, entered Delaware Bay and later reported his observations to his Dutch employers. As a result of his reports, Dutch trading vessels made frequent visits to both the Hudson and Delaware Rivers in attempts to develop a profitable fur trade. In 1610 the English sailor Samuel Argall entered Delaware Bay seeking protection from a storm while on a voyage from Virginia, and named the area for the then governor of Virginia, Lord de la Warr. The English later extended the name to the entire bay, the river, and the land on the western shore.

As early as 1624, the Dutch settled a few Walloon families along the Delaware River, but they were removed to Manhattan in 1628, and the Dutch maintained only a small vessel at the site to facilitate the fur trade. Then in 1629, some of the wealthy members of the company's Amsterdam chamber secured the Charter of Exemptions and Privileges, authorizing creation of the feudalistic patroonships in New Netherland. Two persons who were among the first to act under this Charter, Samuel Blommaert and Samuel Godwyn, in 1629 sent two agents to buy lands from the Indians. The purchases, the first within the area of modern Delaware, were recognized by the company by means of a "deed" issued on the island of Manhattan and dated July 15, 1630, with granting language as follows:

> We, the Directors and Council of New Netherlands ... hereby acknowledge and declare, that on this day, the date underwritten, came and appeared before us in their proper persons, Queskacous and Entquet, Siconesius and the inhabitants of the village, situate at the South Cape of the bay of South [Delaware] River, and freely and voluntarily declared by special authority of the rulers, and consent of the commonality there, that they already on the first day of June, of the past year 1629, for, and on account of certain parcels of cargoes, have transferred, ceded, given over, and conveyed, in just, true, and free property, as they hereby transport, cede, give over, and convey to, and for the behoof of Messrs. Samuel Godwyn and Samuel Blommaert absent... n263

Although it was typical -- indeed, even essential -- to secure a surrender of native rights in land already obtained under a grant from a European authority, the patroons and others undoubtedly realized that the Indian "deeds" had only limited value:

> The European concept of land-holding was unknown to the Indians, ... and incompatible with their culture. It did not occur to the natives that the Europeans might demand that the Indians quit some or all of their lands along the river and move elsewhere; they understood that the "purchase" conferred on the [European purchasers] the right to share the land with them -- to hunt, fish, plant crops, and build houses, but not to own it in the sense that a man owned his bows and arrows. In the Indians' way of thinking, land was comparable to water and air -- it was free for the use of all. That concept, an important part of the Indians' belief that man was part of nature, led to numerous misunderstandings between natives and newcomers, especially when the wily Dutch, more used to dealing with the natives, made haste to "buy" the same land for themselves to undermine [the] tenuous claim [of Sweden's earlier purchasers]. The Indians, of course, understood only that they had agreed, for the price of some foreign artifacts, to share their land with yet another European nation. To the Swedes, the Indians' action was proof of a despicable lack of integrity. n264

The first Dutch settlers for this land arrived in April 1631, and founded Zwaanendael. Thus, the first European settlement in Delaware was one of the first patroonships authorized under the 1629 Charter and was, therefore, under the same regime of property rights as described for the New Netherland patroonships in § 6.05(b), supra. However, even before the next supply ship arrived in 1632, a misunderstanding with the Indians resulted in the massacre of the entire Zwaanendael settlement in Delaware.

§ 6.09(b) Land Rights in Early Swedish Settlements.

No further European settlement was attempted in Delaware until Swedish and Finnish settlers arrived near the site of present-day Wilmington in 1638 and founded a colony they called New Sweden. Unable to base claims to land on rights of discovery or conquest, the Swedes "purchased" lands from the Indians. The purchaser was nominally the Swedish South Sea Company, which had received its first letters patent from King Gustavus Adolphus in 1624, and an essentially similar second charter in 1626. No settlement activity occurred at that time because Sweden became distracted by a long war with Spain, but by 1637, the Swedes were once again ready to consider colonization in America.

In 1640 the Swedish West India Company granted to certain Dutch investors a charter effectively creating a patroonship so that they could found another settlement in New Sweden. The grantees held their land under the protection of Sweden as hereditary property, with the feudalistic high and low jurisdiction. Meanwhile, contention over concurrent Swedish and Dutch claims to the same land in Delaware continued, and even an English settlement had arisen nearby. For those who agreed to recognize Swedish jurisdiction in the colony and were not bound as servants, "they were at liberty to build and settle themselves where they thought proper and to return home when they pleased." n265 For his zeal in protecting Swedish interests in the colony the governor Johan Printz in about 1645 was awarded a grant of land as a perpetual possession for himself and his heirs forever. n266 For the most part, however, the rival Dutch and Swedish colonies competed in "purchasing" lands from the Indians. The rivalry erupted into open hostilities, resulting in a surrender of the Swedish settlements to Dutch jurisdiction in 1655. The Dutch agreed to respect the customs, religion, and private property claims of Swedish settlers who wished to remain. When the Dutch took up possession of this territory, their land management practices were also introduced:

> In the settlement of the country, the colonists were to concentrate themselves in families of sixteen to twenty in number, and were to pay annually for their lands twelve stivers a morgen [approximately two acres] in lieu of tenths. The town lots [in what is today's New Castle] were forty feet by fifty, and the streets from four to five rods in breadth. The Swedes were to be closely watched, and if any should be found disaffected, they were to be sent away ... and, if possible, induced to come to Manhattan. n267

§ 6.09(c) Land Rights in Delaware After the English Conquest of 1664.

Events elsewhere in America soon overtook the struggling Delaware settlements. In 1664 the English king Charles II granted to his brother the Duke of York lands that included much of what the Dutch claimed in America; this led directly to the English takeover of New Amsterdam, quickly renamed New York. An English fleet then approached the Delaware settlements and obtained the acquiescence of the Swedish colonists and, after a brief battle, the surrender of the Dutch. The English also took some territory of the Dutch that was not included in the grant to the Duke of York, but had, in fact, been included in the 1632 grant of Maryland to Lord Baltimore.

From 1664 to 1682, Delaware was ruled as part of New York, so that New York laws pertaining to land also applied in Delaware. n268 For one brief interlude, the Dutch reconquered New Netherland in 1673 and reoccupied Delaware without resistance, but they lost it all again in 1674. The "Duke's Law" of 1665 was supposedly in effect in Delaware, but over a decade passed before even a copy of the laws reached the Delaware settlements. Meanwhile, a brisk land business was carried on:

> New lands were being taken up in a rather haphazard fashion, with the government seeking an income from land, both by fees to confirm possession and by quitrents, modest annual charges upon landowners (usually one bushel of wheat per hundred acres) in lieu, theoretically, of services that might have been demanded of them.

Some of the new lands were taken up by old Swedish, Finnish, and Dutch settlers moving westward up the Christina [River] or southward from New Castle. Of the English settlers, some came from Maryland, bringing slaves with them. The government sought to attract settlers on terms as favorable as in neighboring Maryland or in New England. In theory, a tract of fifty acres was assigned to each member of a family, but in actuality the grants seem to have been larger, varying from under two hundred to over one thousand acres.

As central Delaware was gradually settled, farmers on the St. Jones River appealed to the governor for a court of their own so they would not need to go to Lewes or New Castle to register deeds, probate wills, or settle disputes over land... [I]n 1680 the governor approved their request, appointing justices of the peace and thereby creating the third Delaware county, called St. Jones. n269

§ 6.09(d) Land Rights in Delaware After Coming Under the Governance of Pennsylvania.

§ 6.09(d)(1) Land Grants and Sales.

Delaware's relative isolation permitted localities to develop their own customs and practices with respect to landholding, but important changes began to take place in the 1680's. By a royal patent dated March 4, 1680, William Penn received a patent for lands and governmental authority in the province of Pennsylvania from King Charles II. By deed of feoffment dated August 4, 1682, the Duke of York granted to Penn all the lands in the New York provincial territory covered by the royal patent to Penn, which meant conveyance of title to the Delaware lands. n270 In contrast to the previous colonial practice of simply giving land to settlers willing to come and stay, Penn began selling land:

> In New Netherland and New York ... during the [early] period..., a price seems never to have been put upon the land. Land was sold in Pennsylvania from the very first. As soon as he had secured his title, Penn offered for sale shares of five thousand acres at £100 each. After 1684 this land was also to be liable to a quitrent. The practice of selling land was steadily continued, the prices varying with the period of time which had elapsed since the settlement of the province, with the character and location of the land, and with such other conditions as might affect a bargain. After 1732 prices become more permanent. For thirty years from that date the price was £15, 10s. per hundred acres. Prices were always fixed by the proprietor and his officials ...
>
> ... Escheated land, with such improvements as had been made upon it, was sold at auction, and the larger part of the purchase money went to the proprietor. It was a requirement in all the provinces that > land should be settled within a brief period -- often designated as three years -- after the issue of the patent. Squatters' rights, as evidenced by "improvment," were as a rule generously enforced. n271

Landholdings in at least two of Delaware's counties tended to be quite large. According to surviving rent rolls, "55 percent of the landowners in Kent and Sussex owned five hundred acres or more." n272 This was three times larger than the average holding in contemporary Pennsylvania counties.

§ 6.09(d)(2) Quit Rents.

In the matter of quitrents, the experience in Delaware was typical of most American colonies and, indeed, after 1684, was identical to Pennsylvania's experience. In Delaware's early colonial history under the Dutch, however, quitrent was seldom a factor, and this changed only gradually after the English took over in 1664:

> In the Dutch ground briefs no definite provision was made for the payment of a rent. In some of the patents the payment of a tenth of the products of the soil was required. In many only the general obligation of submission and allegiance was enforced, with some special duty, such as that of fencing the land...
>
> The English conquest in 1664 resulted in no immediate change in the land law of the province...
>
> Dutch ground briefs and transports were very generally submitted to the English officials for confirmation, and in most of the English patents or deeds which were granted in their stead no express mention was made of a quitrent. This is emphatically true in the case of confirmation of city lots. Confirmation of Indian deeds and new grants were made subject to "the accustomed rent of new Plantations in this country," or to such payment and conditions as should be designated by the Duke of York and his officers. In some cases the annual payment of a lamb, or of a barrel of codfish or a bushel of winter wheat, was demanded. Confirmations of patents on the Delaware and the issue of new grants in that region were always accompanied by the condition that a quitrent should be paid in wheat.
>
> At the close, in 1674, of the Dutch reoccupation there was another renewal of patents. But even then the system of quitrents was not fully introduced. In 1686 Governor Dongan reported that the quitrents, at his arrival in the province, were very inconsiderable, the larger part coming from the Delaware region under the terms of the patents granted by Andros. But Andros even had renewed Indian purchases and township grants with the former reservation of a lamb only as a quitrent. Dongan, however, insisted that all patents or deeds which were recorded during his administration should contain provision for a quitrent. No exception was made even in the case of city lots.
>
> Rent in the city was made payable in money, but in the country it was payable in wheat, fish, or other commodities. n273

By the time Governor Dongan of New York was reporting quitrent payments from Delaware, the colony had passed over to the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. In Pennsylvania and its territories, including Delaware, quitrents were actively pursued, and so the various issues and controversies surrounding colonial quit rents became important in Delaware:

> The most characteristic form of territorial revenue was the quitrent, paid annually at a rate prescribed by the proprietor and received in lieu of all services. It appears in all the provinces...
>
> In all transactions, and in all the colonies, the form of payment was a matter of importance to the people. So scanty was their supply of money, that payment in kind was always strongly their preference. The proprietors, and afterward the crown, always found their interest in securing money payments whenever it was possible. This in many cases gave rise to controversies over quitrents, which in turn > occasioned the interference of the assembly in a matter which the proprietors claimed as exclusively their own ...

>
> In all the provinces quitrents were an object of aversion. They were continually falling into arrears. Payment was avoided whenever it was possible; and it was not infrequently resisted. In the last resort payment could be enforced by distress, the assistance of the sheriff being called in for the purpose. In Pennsylvania, as in other provinces, these conditions were ever and anon recurring ... n274

§ 6.09(d)(3) Administration of Land Affairs.

Both the sales of land and the administration of quitrents under the rule of Delaware by Pennsylvania required the creation of a rudimentary bureaucracy:

> ... Pennsylvania had a land office, though until after 1732 its affairs were very much in confusion... The long absences of Penn from his province made it impossible for him to attend in person to the details of selling and letting land and collecting rents. Not until 1741 was the care of these matters intrusted to the governors. Instead, a commission or board of property was from time to time designated, which acted as the special agent of the proprietor. The board consisted of a secretary, -- who was at the same time secretary of the province, -- the surveyor-general, and from three to five special commissioners. Closely associated with the board was the receiver-general, the keeper of the seal, and master of the rolls. The special duties of the commissioners related to the granting of lands, but, as their powers developed, they also became concerned with the collection of rents. After 1741 the governors became members of this board, but their authority to act with it was conveyed through a special commission... n275

In the view of one important historian, the land systems in the proprietary colonies were kept strictly within the control of the executive and away from legislative regulation:

> In all the provinces the land system was kept as free as possible from the control of the legislature. It was organized and regulated under instructions and proclamations of the proprietors and their appointees. Any attempt to regulate it by legislation was resented and opposed. It was regarded as the private concern of the proprietor and its administration as distinctly as an executive function ...
>
> ... In the absence of a legislature [such as in New Netherland and proprietary New York] such an issue could not arise. But in the Carolinas, the Jerseys, and Pennsylvania it arose, and the occasion which usually brought it to the front was some dispute over the payment of quitrents. It was at this point that the territorial regulations of the proprietor touched the pocket of the colonist. Like a tax, the rent was a constantly recurring burden. Over its amount and the form of its payment the individual desired in some way to secure such control as had been effected in the case of taxation. Efforts to secure this helped to initiate the process of legislation related to territorial affairs. n276

As will be shown in the next section, however, legislation in matters touching land was both common and comprehensive in Delaware under Pennsylvania administration.

§ 6.09(d)(4) Legislation Relating to Landholding.

Soon after the 1682 conveyance from the Duke of York, Penn issued the Frame of Government of the Province of Pennsylvania, consisting of a bill of rights and other laws that would become effective when ratified by the colonists in the province, including Delaware. In 1683, Penn issued a Charter of Privileges, which was revised in 1701, and which added further governing provisions applicable to Delaware as well as to Pennsylvania and Penn's other territories. Meanwhile, the Duke's Law also remained in force in Delaware. For Delaware then, the Duke's Law of 1665, and Penn's 1682 Frame of Government and 1683 Charter of Privileges were all potential sources of laws governing landholding. The fundamental legal rules for property were lodged in the Duke's Law and are described in the context of colonial New York in §§ 6.05(e) and 6.05(f), supra. The property provisions of the 1682 Frame of Government and the Charter of Privileges of 1683 and 1701 are summarized in the following paragraphs.

§ 6.09(d)(4)(i) Penn's Frame of Government of 1682.

In his 1682 Frame of Government, Penn granted to "the freemen, planters and adventurers, of ... the ... province, these liberties, franchises, and properties [as granted to Penn], to be held, enjoyed and kept by the freemen, planters and inhabitants of the said province of Pennsylvania for ever." n277 In addition to this conferral of rights, the other singular feature of the Frame of Government was the establishment of representative government in the form of the Provincial Council and General Assembly. The Provincial Council was directed to divide itself into four standing committees, the first of which would be "a committee of plantations, to situate and settle cities, ports, market-towns and high-ways, and to hear and decide all suits and controversies relating to plantations." n278 Laws proposed by the Provincial Council were subject to rejection or ratification by the General Assembly. In April 1683, a new frame of government was drawn up, taking into account the incorporation of the Delaware settlements and providing for a reorganization of the council and general assembly. n279

§ 6.09(d)(4)(ii) Laws for the Colony Agreed upon in England.

Even before the earliest legislative assembly met, certain laws for Pennsylvania were proposed and agreed to by the colonial leaders while they were still in England, subject to ratification by the colonists in America. Those provisions pertaining for landholding are as follows:

> First. That the charter of liberties [Frame of Government] ... is hereby declared and approved, and shall be for ever held for fundamental in the government thereof, according to the limitations mentioned in the said charter.
>
> Second. That every Inhabitant in the said province, that is or shall be a purchaser of one hundred acres of land or upwards, his heirs and assigns, and every person who shall have paid his passage, and taken up one hundred acres of land, at a penny an acre, and have cultivated ten acres thereof, and every person that hath been a servant or bondsman, and is free by his service, that shall have taken up his fifty acres of land, and cultivated twenty thereof, and every inhabitant, artificer, or other resident in the said province, that pays scot and lot n280 to the government, shall be deemed and accounted a freeman of the said province...
>
> Fourteenth. That all lands and goods shall be liable to pay debts, except where there is legal issue, and then all the goods, and one third of the land only.
>
> Fifteenth. That all wills and writing attested by two witnesses, shall be of the same force, as to lands and other conveyances, being legally proved within forty days, either within or without the said province.
>
> Sixteenth. That seven years quiet possession shall give an unquestionable right, except in cases of infants, lunaticks, married women, or persons beyond the seas...
>
> Twentieth. And to prevent frauds and vexatious suits within the said province, that all charters, gifts, grants and conveyances of land, (except leases for a year or under) and all bills, bonds, and specialties have five pounds, and not under three months, made in the said province, shall be enrolled or registered in the public enrolment office of the said province within the space of two months next after the making thereof, else to be void in law. And all deeds, grants, and conveyances of land (except as aforesaid) within the said province, and made out of the said province, shall be inrolled or registered as aforesaid, within six months next after the making thereof, and settling and constituting an enrolment office or registry within the said province, else to be void in law against all persons whatsoever...

Thirty-first. That for the encouragement of the plants and traders in this province, who are incorporated into a society, the patent granted to them by William Penn, Governor of the said province, is hereby ratified and confirmed... n281

§ 6.09(d)(4)(iii) The Charter of Privileges of 1683 and 1701.

The Charter of Privileges, issued in 1683 and revised in 1701, gave specific instructions for choosing members of the General Assembly but contained only one additional provision touching upon property rights:

Eighthly: If any person, through Temptation or melancholly, shall Destroy himself, his Estate, Real & Personal, shall, notwithstanding, Descend to his wife and Children or Relations as if he had Died a natural Death; and if any person shall be Destroyed or kill'd by Casualty or accident, there shall be no forfeiture to the Governour by Reason thereof... n282

§ 6.09(d)(4)(iv) Delaware Legislation After 1704.

When the legislature established by William Penn first met, colonists in the Delaware region, known as the Three Lower Counties, had the same number of representatives as colonists in the Pennsylvania region. As Pennsylvania thereafter embarked on much more rapid growth, the Delaware colonists soon feared becoming outnumbered in the legislature. Thus, in 1701 they refused to meet with the Pennsylvania legislators and requested from William Penn the privilege of establishing their own legislature, which was granted. As a result, from 1704 Delaware had its separate legislature, although the region was still under the jurisdiction of the Pennsylvania governor, who had the power to approve or disallow all enactments of the Delaware legislature. This arrangement continued until 1777, when Delaware voters elected their own chief executive.

The earliest compilation and arrangement of these Delaware legislative enactments was not completed and printed until 1741 or 1742. The topics of those provisions dealing with property rights are noted as follows:

Orphans' courts

Settling intestates' estates

Building mills

Establishing courts of law and equity (to "hear and determine all actions real, personal and mixt, according to the Laws and Constitutions of this Government, as fully and amply to all Intents and Purposes, as the Justices of the King's-Bench, Common-Pleas and Exchequer in England, or any of them may or can do.")

Taking lands in execution for payment of debts

Against removing landmarks

For better confirmation of the owners of lands and their just rights and possessions

Regulating fences

Against unseasonable firing of woodlands and marshes

For preventing accidental fires in towns and villages

Partitioning land into 200-acre lots for sale to the public

Constructing roads, bridges, highways and causeways

Against forcible entry, barratry, maintenance, champerty and embracery

Acknowledging and recording deeds

Preventing destruction of timber and other trees

Limitations of actions

Probate of estates. n283

From this review of Delaware's colonial history, it is clear that despite early settlements from several European nations, the colony eventually adopted English law as the basis of its legal system and regime of property rights.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 263. 1 J. Thomas Scharf, History of Delaware 1609-1888 31 (1888).

(n2)Footnote 264. Carol E. Hoffecker, Delaware, A Bicentennial History 14 (1977).

(n3)Footnote 265. 1 J. Thomas Scharf, History of Delaware 1609-1888 48 (1888).

(n4)Footnote 266. Id. at 49.

(n5)Footnote 267. 1 J. Thomas Scharf, History of Delaware 1609-1888 62 (1888).

(n6)Footnote 268. See § 6.05(e), supra.

(n7)Footnote 269. John A. Munroe, History of Delaware 33-34 (2d ed. 1984). See also John A. Munroe, Colonial Delaware, A History 74-75 (1978).

(n8)Footnote 270. The interesting peculiarities of this conveyance, with strong overtones of medieval English land law, have been explained as follows:

> There were actually four legal documents involved in these grants, an absolute deed (called a "deed of feoffment") and a lease for ten thousand years for New Castle and the circle around it, and another deed and a similar lease for the land from twelve miles south of New Castle to Cape Henlopen ... Probably the division is explained by the duke's desire to get some revenue from these territories ... but not to interfere with Penn's use of New Castle or with his revenues from it ... Perhaps both deed and lease were used because of the uncertainty of the duke's legal rights to Delaware ...
>
> Then on October 28 [the day after Penn's arrival on October 27, 1682], in a ceremony called "livery of seisin," Penn formally took possession of New Castle and the territory within twelve miles about it, except on the east side of the Delaware. After the deeds from the Duke of York were read, Penn took the key to the New Castle fort, entered and locked himself in alone, then came out and received a piece of turf with a twig upon it and a porringer with river water and soil as symbols of his new possession. John A. Munroe, Colonial Delaware, A History 83-84 (1978).

(n9)Footnote 271. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 34-35 (1904).

(n10)Footnote 272. John A. Munroe, Colonial Delaware, A History 94 (1978).

(n11)Footnote 273. Id. at 39-42.

(n12)Footnote 274. Id. at 36-37.

(n13)Footnote 275. Id. at 46.

(n14)Footnote 276. Id. at 46-47.

(n15)Footnote 277. The Earliest Printed Laws of Pennsylvania 1681-1713 200 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n16)Footnote 278. Id. at 196.

(n17)Footnote 279. See No. 41. Pennsylvania and Delaware Frame, in Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 199-204 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n18)Footnote 280. In English law scot was a form of tax on one's share of a customary contribution. Scot and lot was a particular customary contribution imposed upon subjects according to their ability to pay. In certain English boroughs, persons retained their franchise only by paying the scot and lot. A reference to scot and lot in Delaware appears in Frieszleben v. Shallcross, 19 A. 576 (1890) , and is defined as "customary contribution laid upon all subjects according to their ability." 19 A. at 578 .

(n19)Footnote 281. The Earliest Printed Laws of Pennsylvania 1681-1713 201-205 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n20)Footnote 282. The Earliest Printed Laws of Delaware 1704-1741 1-8 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n21)Footnote 283. Id. at 9-290.

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.10

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.10 Development of Property Law in New Jersey (from 1638).

§ 6.10(a) Early English Grants of New Jersey Land.

The land that ultimately became the colony of New Jersey was first the subject of English land grants in late 16th century conveyances to Sir Humphrey Gilbert and to Sir Walter Raleigh. Next, the land was included in the letters patent granted on April 10, 1607, by King James I for the colonization of Virginia. Patentees from London were authorized to establish a privately funded joint stock company to colonize the southern half of the territory included in the patent, between the 34th and 41st parallels, roughly from southern North Carolina to southern Pennsylvania. Other patentees, principally from Plymouth, were authorized to similarly found a second colony somewhere in the northern part of the patent, between the 38th and 45th parallels, extending from northern Virginia to the middle of Maine.

The area in the middle of the patented territory, between 38 and 41 degrees latitude, which could be settled by either the Virginia Company or the Plymouth Company, included most of present-day New Jersey. When the Virginia Company obtained a second patent in 1609, this overlapping area was reduced by being shifted back to 40 degrees latitude, and thus, most of New Jersey was assigned unequivocally to the Plymouth Company's northern part of the Virginia patent. While haphazard exploration by the English occurred after this time, no meaningful attempt at colonization took place until the Dutch began to arrive several years later.

§ 6.10(b) First Settlements by the Dutch.

In the absence of English settlers during the early years of the 17th century, Dutch colonists founded the first permanent European settlement in New Jersey. The precursors of Dutch settlers on New Jersey land were members of Henry Hudson's Half Moon crew in 1609, and these may indeed have been the first white men to set foot on New Jersey soil. No further Dutch activity occurred until 1610, when Amsterdam merchants sent a ship to the area to open trade with the Indians. In 1611 the Dutch government licensed two ships to proceed to the Bay of New York.

In 1614 the Dutch government issued an edict by which Dutch citizens were invited to explore the territory and thus obtain exclusive privileges of settlement. Pursuant to the edict, explorers for the newly formed United Netherland Company reached the American coast, made extensive investigations, and returned and reported. In October 1614, this United New Netherland Company obtained an exclusive right to visit and navigate in New Netherland, lying between the 40th and 45th parallels. During the years to follow, the company began to form a small trading settlement on Manhattan Island and undoubtedly explored the lands west of the Hudson River.

Their first settlement, on an island in the Hudson called Fort Orange (near Albany), was abandoned for the more favorable Fort Amsterdam site on Manhattan Island. In 1615, a small fortification was established opposite the Manhattan settlement on New Jersey territory. Sometime between 1617 and 1620, another settlement may have been established at Bergen. n284 It is believed that sometime in 1614, the Dutch at Manhattan were visited by a Captain Argall of the English colony at Jamestown, who forced them to submit themselves and their settlement to the English monarch. Then in November 1620, the old Plymouth Company was revived with a grant of all lands between 40 and 48 degrees latitude (roughly between southern Pennsylvania and northern Maine) to Sir Ferdinando Gorges and others, naturally in complete disregard of any Dutch claims.

While the Dutch settlers were threatened with conflicting claims from the English, their original company license expired. In 1621 the Dutch government granted a new charter to the West India Company with much broader powers of government and stronger participation by the government. As stated earlier in this chapter, n285 the 1621 charter gave the company a monopoly over trade and traffic to the New World for a period of twenty-four years but contained no mention of any company power to deal with land. Nevertheless, the company did exercise power over land transactions.

In 1624 the first Dutch settlers in New Jersey, consisting of two families and eight single men, took up residence on what is now called Burlington Island, in the Delaware River, but it was abandoned by 1630. A small trading post at Fort Nassau, in the present city of Gloucester, was set up in 1626, but was occupied only intermittently. No permanent settlement in New Jersey arose until after the Charter of Privileges to Patroons was announced in 1629.

The patroonships constituted an attempt by the company to completely delegate responsibility for colonization to affluent and interested adventurers. The owner of a patroonship was vested with certain manorial rights, as described earlier in this chapter: n286

> The policy of encouraging settlement by patroons imparted significant consequences for landholding in New Netherlands. Patroons can be best described as the Dutch equivalents of English manorial lords. A patroon who held land held it according to a feudal system of land rights, which included the rights to require services as well as rents from tenants who were occupying the patroon's lands, and the right to exercise judicial and other governmental powers over the patroon's holdings. Only the patroon held the land outright; others could only be tenants of the patroon. The patroons of New Netherlands obligated themselves to commence a colony with at least 50 persons during a four-year period of time, in return for which each patroon received manorial and proprietary rights to sixteen miles of Hudson River shoreline and the lands behind the shoreline.

The following excerpts from the 1629 Charter of Privileges to Patroons amply illustrate this explicit introduction of feudalism to North America:

> III. All such [members of said Company as may be inclined to settle a Colonie in New Netherland] shall be acknowledged Patroons of New Netherland who shall, within the space of four years next after they have given notice to any of the Chambers of the Company here, or to the Commander or Council there, undertake to plant a Colonie there of fifty souls, upwards of fifteen years old; one-fourth part within one year, and within three years after the sending of the first, making together four years, the remainder, to the full number of fifty persons, to be shipped from hence, on pain, in case of wilful neglect, of being deprived of the privileges obtained ...
>
> IV. They shall, from the time they make known the situation of the places where they propose to settle Colonies, have the preference to all others of the absolute property of such lands as they have there chosen ...

VI. They shall forever possess and enjoy all the lands lying within the aforesaid limits, together with the fruits, rights, minerals, rivers and fountains thereof; as also the chief command and lower jurisdictions, fishing, fowling and grinding, to the exclusion of all others, to be holden from the Company as a perpetual inheritance, without it ever devolving again to the Company; and further, no person or persons whatsoever shall be privileged to fish and hunt but the Patroons and such as they shall permit. And in case any one should in time prospere so much as to found one or more cities, he shall have power and authority to establish officers and magistrates there, and to make use of the title of his Colonie, according to his pleasure and to the quality of the persons.

VII. There shall likewise be granted to all Patroons who shall desire the same, ... liberty to dispose of their aforesaid heritage by testament.

VIII. The Patroons may, if they think proper, make use of all lands, rivers and woods lying contiguous to them, for and during so long a time as this Company shall grant them to other Patroons or private persons ...

XIX. [The Company] will not take from the service of the Patroons any of their colonists, either man or woman, son or daughter, manservant or maid-servant; and, though any of these should desire the same, they will not receive them, much less permit them to leave their Patroons, and enter into the service of another, unless on consent obtained from their Patroons in writing, and this for and during so many years as they are bound to their Patroons...

XX. From all judgments given by the Courts of the Patroons for upwards of fifty guilders, there may be an appeal to the Company's Commander and Council in New Netherland.

XXI. In regard to such private persons as on their own account, or others in the service of their masters here (not enjoying the same privileges as the Patroons), shall be inclined to go thither and settle, they shall, with the approbation of the Director and Council there, be at liberty to take up and take possession of as much land as they shall be able properly to improve, and shall enjoy the same in full property either for themselves or masters. n287

None of the patroonships in New Jersey were ultimately successful. Patroonship rights were either never claimed by actual settlement or were abandoned or were sold back to the company. However, even without official patroonship administration, some of the lands designated as patroonships remained undivided and at least nominally under feudal obligations:

... the Charter of Privileges to patroons was intended to encourage private individuals to establish settlements at various points on the Hudson and Delaware, or North and South, rivers. Numerous grievances, occasioned by friction between patroons and the Company, were partially allayed by a new charter in 1640, restricting the area of the grants, and encouraging independent settlement; but the feudal privileges of the patroons were not interfered with. "Many of the old patroon estates long remained undivided, and the heirs of the founders claimed some semi-feudal privileges well into the nineteenth century." n288

The first permanent settlement in New Jersey originated with a patroonship, the Manor of Pavonia, which was registered in 1630 and included most of the modern shoreline of Jersey City and Hoboken. The settlement struggled, and by about 1634, the patroonship rights had been sold back to the company. By 1638, however, the settlement had become permanent.

Even though the patroonships failed, the principles announced in the patroonship charter remained as permanent characteristics of Dutch governance and land arrangements:

> This charter formed the principal basis upon which the civil institutions of New Netherland came to be placed... The principal directors of the plan were ready to seize for themselves the advantages offered; in the character as Patroons, they secured acquisitions in the province which almost gave them a monopoly in land, and thus they were able to retain, in their own hands, some of the most important privileges yielded in the charter. To the mass of actual settlers nothing whatever was given. The charter contemplated or allowed, the establishment of a kind of feudal or manorial rule, by which the colonists would be held in a state of complete independence. No provision was made for the division of lands, either present or prospective. The people to be sent by the Patroons, were regarded, and were to be controlled by the owners of the soil, as a servile class. They were to become American serfs ...
>
> By a wiser provision, the charter gave liberty to private adventurers to make a selection of lands and to enjoy the same by personal right. n289

When Willem Kieft arrived as the new governor of New Netherland in 1638, there were only one bowery and four plantations in the New Jersey portion of the province. n290 Upon Kieft's arrival, settlements were begun at present-day Hoboken, Ridgefield Park (Old Hackensack), and Old Tappan. n291 Typical of them all was the landholding arrangement at Hoboken, where on January 1, 1641, a settler named Aert Teunissen leased a bowery within the bounds of the old Pavonia patroonship for a term of ten years, during which time he cleared the land, fenced the fields, and built a house. n292 The Pavonia settlements were devastated by Indian attacks in 1643-1645 and 1655-1658. Finally, in 1660 the Town of Bergen, New Jersey's first town, was founded on the site, families were allotted town plots, and the town was permitted to have a court and local government powers. The nearby settlement of Communipaw was also strengthened. By 1664, after half a century of Dutch colonizing, Bergen and Communipaw were the only two villages in New Jersey.

§ 6.10(c) Attempted Colonization by Swedes.

Meanwhile, a feeble Swedish attempt at colonization began with a settlement at Wilmington, on the Delaware side of the Delaware River, in 1638, followed by a settlement on the New Jersey side in 1643. The latter site was abandoned after a few years, but the Swedes sought to extend their control of the river all the way to Trenton, building forts and blockhouses along the way. A show of Dutch force in 1655 convinced the Swedes to retreat. While some Swedish settlers left the area, others remained, but without the auspices of their government.

§ 6.10(d) English Take-over in 1664.

During none of these decades did the English show any sign of relinquishing their claims to New Jersey land, which ultimately rested on John Cabot's 1497 discovery voyage. New Jersey land had been included in the Elizabethan grant to Raleigh and Humphries, King James I's Virginia grants in 1606 and 1609, the Argall visit of 1614, and the Plymouth Company grant of 1620; nevertheless, in 1634 King Charles I granted New Jersey land to Sir Edmund Plowden and his associates, who called their grant New Albion. n293 Beginning in 1642 and continuing thereafter, English colonists from New Haven made short-lived attempts to claim New Jersey lands along the Delaware River near present-day Salem. Finally, in 1664 King Charles II made his famous grant to his brother, the Duke of York (the future King James II), of the lands which encompassed the future states of New York, New Jersey, Delaware and Pennsylvania.

The royal charter of 1664 is discussed in detail in § 6.05(e)(1), supra. Here it is necessary only to reiterate that "the patent was expressed in terms of the fullest property rights consistent with the feudal incidents still connected with the tenure of free and common socage"; that "the grantee, as a feudal lord, was given extensive powers of government and court jurisdiction"; that "the laws to be administered in the granted lands were to be not contrary to and as near 'as conveniently may bee' to the laws of England, [with] judicial judgments and sentences subject to a right of appeal in England"; and that "the terms of this patent appeared designed to expressly supersede any previous and conflicting grants of the same lands." n294

§ 6.10(e) Landholding Rights Under the English Proprietors.

§ 6.10(e)(1) Application of The Duke's Law in 1665.

The powers of the 1664 charter were implemented by the "Duke's Law" of 1665, although, at first, settlers in the former Dutch areas were permitted to be governed by their traditional laws. Even this changed when English rule resumed after a brief Dutch interlude in 1673-1674. The provisions of the "Duke's Law" related to landholding, typical of English laws adapted to the frontier environment, are summarized in § 6.05(e)(2), supra.

§ 6.10(e)(2) Berkeley and Carteret's 1665 "Concessions and Agreement."

The Duke of York was also had to subdue the Dutch of New Amsterdam in order to make good his claim to his vast American grant, but so sure was he of success, that even while his fleet was underway to attempt the task, by deed of lease and release he re-granted a large portion of his land, an area encompassing most of New Jersey, to John Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret.

Because the Duke of York had been granted governmental rights over his grant, Berkeley and Carteret assumed that their grant from the Duke also included rights of government, as if it were a feudal fief. In fact, the New Jersey patent of 1664 included only rights to the soil, for only the king could grant directly rights of government. These nearly feudal proprietorships typically included features annoying to individual colonists, such as requiring an oath of loyalty to the proprietor and the payment of quitrents.

To offset such objections, in 1665 the proprietors Berkeley and Carteret issued a set of "Concessions and Agreement of the Lords Proprietors of the Province of New Caesarea or New-Jersey" to induce settlers into New Jersey. This document was the first explicit expression of fundamental law in New Jersey:

> This instrument of government possessed the nature of a constitution even though, being handed down by a superior claiming both the right of territory and the right of government, it differs from the modern concept of an organic law as one created by the sovereign power residing in the people. It provided for a governor representing the proprietors, a council appointed by him and other officials designated by the proprietors or by him, and a general assembly consisting of the governor, members of the council, and elected representatives. The franchise was limited to freeholders and annual elections for the twelve representatives of the lower house were authorized. The legislature had authority to create courts of law, to levy taxes, to raise a militia, to establish local units of government, and to enact all other necessary laws provided they were "consonant to reason and, as neare as may be conveniently agreeable to the Lawes and Customes of his Majesties Kingdom of England" and not against the interest of the proprietors or their heirs. The proprietors reserved the right to give their assent or refusal to such legislation. Certain private rights were assured, among them the guarantee of liberty of conscience. No taxes were to be levied without the consent of the representatives. Possession of land for seven years operated as a proscription against review or resurvey. n295

The specific provisions of the "Concessions" relating to land rights may be summarized as follows:

> General Provisions:
>
> Item 3: The chief secretary shall record all grants, conveyances, leases (of more than one year) of land and houses, which shall be witnessed, acknowledged, and attested.

Item 4: A surveyor general shall be appointed to lay out and bound all lands granted within the province.

Item 6: All persons who swear allegiance to the King of England shall be admitted to plant and become freemen of the province.

Powers of the Assembly:

2. To make necessary laws "as neere as may be conveniently agreeable to the Lawes and Customes of this Majesties Kingdom of England."

4. To lay equal taxes and assessments upon lands.

5. To create as many manors in the province as seems "meet and convenient."

9. To prescribe the quantities of land to be allotted to each person, to make rules for casting of lots for land.

10. To make provision for collecting quitrents.

Powers of the Governor and Council:

vii. To make warrants and to seal grants of land.

For the Security of the Proprietors and Inhabitants:

2. Lands quietly held, planted and possessed for seven years after survey shall not be subject to review or survey or alteration of bounds.

3. No one whose cattle stray on public land within the province is liable for trespass, provided custom of commons is not claimed nor any person hindered from taking up and appropriating land so grazed upon, and the cattle are not intentionally grazed upon such lands.

For More Speedily Settling the Province [the following head rights apply]:

1. Persons already in the province before January 1, 1665

Freemen with arms and provisions -- 150 acres

For servants with arms and provision -- 150 acres

For weaker servants, slaves over 14 years of age -- 75 acres

For Christian servants, upon completion of service -- 75 acres

2. Persons who shall go to the province before January 1, 1665

Masters and mistresses -- 120 acres

Masters and mistresses -- 120 acres

For able-bodied male servants -- 120 acres

For weaker servants or for slaves over 14 years of age -- 60 acres

Christian servants, for their own use -- 60 acres

3 & 4. Persons who arrive during 1665

90 acres for each free person and able-bodied servant

45 acres for each weaker servant, slave over 14, Christian servant

5. Persons who arrive during 1666

60 acres for each free person and able-bodied servant

30 acres for each weaker servant, slave over 14, Christian servant

6. Various occupancy requirements

To Provide that Lands be More Regularly Laid Out and Titles and Possession Better Ascertained:

i. Lands shall be divided into lots of not less than 2,100 acres nor more than 21,000 acres.

ii & iii. The Governor or his deputy shall sign and seal warrants, and other provisions to survey, certify and record conveyances, with grants of land to be in approximately the following form:

> The Lords Propriators of the Province of New Cesaria or New Jersey doe hereby Grannt unto A B of the Province aforesaid A plantation conteyning acres English measure bounding (as in the Certificates) To hold to him (or her) his (or her) heires and assignes for ever, Yeilding and payeing yearely to the said Lord Propriators their heires or assignes every 25th day of March according to the English account, One halfe penny or One penny of lawfull money of England for every of the said acres To be holden of the Manor of in free and common Soccage, the first payment of which Rent to begin the 25th day of March which shall be in the yeare of our Lord according to the English account 1670 ...

iv. Convenient portions of lands are granted for highways and streets not more than 100 feet wide, and 200 acres for parish churches.

v. Lands laid out for streets and churches are exempt from rents and taxes.

vi. Quitrent of one half penny per acre paid yearly.

vii. Inhabitants have "free passage through or by any Seas, bounds creeks rivers rivuletts &c. in the said Province through or by which they must necessarilie passe to come from the maine Ocean to any part of the Province aforesaid." n296

Meanwhile, even before the 1665 "Concessions and Agreement," the governor of New York in 1664 purchased large tracts of New Jersey lands from Indians and made grants of those lands to settlers from Long Island wishing to establish a town. The grants conferred the usual rights and required the payment of quitrents, but they remitted the quitrent payments until 1670. These settlers moved in under the New York grants and then took the oath of loyalty to the proprietary governor of New Jersey. The New York governor subsequently made another large grant of New Jersey land in 1665, this one deferring quitrent payments until 1672. Again the settlers swore loyalty to the New Jersey governor, who issued confirmatory deeds of subsequent grants and, when he issued a town charter, required that town quitrent be paid.

The towns founded during this period were each planned before settlement. The typical town settler obtained by purchase a home lot with some meadow and upland acreage as well, distributed either by assignment or by lot. The town quitrents were also accorded a period of grace, but when that period ended, the towns objected to the quitrents; their objections rested on the theory that their land rights actually derived from the earlier grant to Berkeley and Carteret (with no quitrent specified, because the grant preceded the "Concessions and Agreement") rather than from the New York governor's grant. One town even based nonpayment on the theory that its land was obtained from the Indians.

Finally, in 1672 in England, the Duke of York responded angrily to the situation by revoking all grants from the New York governor and requiring obedience from all. To follow up with this retrenchment, on December 6, 1672, the proprietor Carteret issued changes in the government and land rules in a document styled "A Declaration of the True Intent and Meaning of the Concessions and Agreement."

§ 6.10(e)(3) Clarification of Land Rights in 1672.

The 1672 order of the proprietors called "A Declaration of the True Intent and Meaning of us Lords Proprietors, and Explanation of their Concessions made to the Adventurers and Planters of New-Caesarea or New-Jersey," among other provisions, required that no person could be considered a freeholder and able to vote unless already holding lands by patent, that is, by proprietary title: n297

> All landowners must obtain proprietary patents lest their lands be forfeited, and the constables were ordered to collect quitrents by action of distraint ... Henceforth the governor and council alone would qualify freemen, establish courts, charter town corporations, appoint provincial officers, and allot lands. They alone would decide what measures would be introduced in the assembly. Those participating in the rebellion must yield submission, and all individuals and towns must pay their quitrent arrears immediately. Though the revolt was put down, the grievances that were engendered festered until the end of the proprietary period in 1702. n298

§ 6.10(f) Division of the Province into East New Jersey and West New Jersey.

Berkeley sold his interest in New Jersey in 1674, but the buyer went bankrupt in 1676. One of the trustees managing his affairs was William Penn, and in 1676, Penn and the other trustees persuaded Carteret to permit a division of New Jersey into East New Jersey (3,000 square miles) and West New Jersey (4,600 square miles), with the western portion coming under the stewardship of Penn and the other trustees. This division of New Jersey would last until 1702.

§ 6.10(f)(1) Landholding in East New Jersey.

In East New Jersey, the basic law that had been adopted earlier by the first assembly of the whole province, in a five-day session held at Elizabethtown in 1668, was continued in force. After the division, the East New Jersey assembly met sporadically and adopted, with minor modifications, portions of the "Duke's Law."

The pattern of landholding differed between East and West Jersey:

> In the eastern division the holdings were smaller, except probably among the Dutch, the land being more intensely cultivated. This was due somewhat to the nature of the soil, and the fact that a commercial spirit was more prevalent than in West Jersey. n299

In East New Jersey the discontent among the settlers continued over the issue of how much power rested with the proprietors. Finally, in 1682 the Carteret heirs sold their proprietorship over East New Jersey to a group headed by William Penn (who was already immersed in the affairs of West New Jersey). The conveyance was accomplished by a deed of lease and release, dated February 1-2, 1682, reciting that the purchasers had bought the soil, all arrears of quitrents, and the right of government. These new proprietors, along with others added to their number shortly thereafter, drew up "Fundamental Constitutions" for East New Jersey, revealing the proprietors' strong feudal orientation, but the provisions were never adopted by the assembly.

Upon the arrival of a new deputy governor (the chief official in residence in the province) in 1684, the proprietors instructed him to continue land purchases from the Indians, to resurvey patents in dispute, to collect quitrents in arrears, and to review the validity of disputed land titles. In 1685 the proprietors created the Board of Proprietors of the Eastern Division of New Jersey with broad powers. The Board:

> could approve acts of the assembly until reviewed by the British proprietors; it could settle matters at issue between the proprietors and the inhabitants, especially pretenses to land, arrears of quitrents, and the validity of titles; it could lease proprietors' lands, purchase land from the Indians, and determine the boundary lines with West New Jersey and New York ...

Because East New Jersey land was held by twenty-four proprietors, conveyances were expressed as fractional shares of a proprietorship:

> By now the system of land conveyancing was causing untold confusion in both Jerseys. For instance, the transfer of 1/32 of 1/16 of 1/2 share (of 24) by Nicholas Brown of Shrewsbury to Stephen West of New England is a prime example of the process in East Jersey... n300

Therefore, the Board was instructed to refine the land distribution procedures:

> As instructed, the board strove to perfect the orderly laying out of the proprietors' lands. They would be sold at not less than £10 per acre. To prevent engrossing, no one might buy or lease more than 1,000 acres on one site. On individual holdings the quitrent was reduced to 1d. per acre. When huge tracts were purchased from the Indians, such as the 24,000-acre holding at Barnegat, they would be divided into twenty-four parts, and small purchases would be assigned in rotation to a few proprietors in turn. Assessments of £5 and £10 were levied from time to time for land development on all proprietors. n301

A dispute over quitrent payments was finally settled by a test case in the provincial court, following which the towns capitulated and paid their quitrents.

§ 6.10(f)(2) Landholding in West New Jersey.

In West New Jersey, Penn and his associates prepared the famous "Concessions and Agreements of the Proprietors, Freeholders, and Inhabitants of the Province of West New Jersey," written in 1676 (probably by Edward Byllynge, the chief proprietor) and issued in 1677. The substantial rights of self-government and liberal land provisions of this document have been summarized as follows:

> The Concessions of 1677 provided for an elected assembly with power to enact laws providing they were in conformity with the laws of England and the Concessions themselves. All adult males, with few exceptions, were entitled to vote on measures of the assembly. The first duty of an assemblyman was to present the recommendations or grievances of his constituents, and should he fail to do so he could be challenged by the other members of his district. All bills could be amended, and a two-thirds vote was required for passage. Until the assembly met -- the first meeting was scheduled for March 25, 1681, the beginning of the year, old style -- the province would be governed by appointed commissioners who would also serve as magistrates. The Concessions also contained a carefully prepared code of law, embodying Quaker notions of justice which were adopted with little change.
>
> Since the trustees expected to dispose of all 100 shares, there could be no proprietary system of overlordship. The commissioners were instructed to purchase large tracts of land from the Indians and to > divide each purchase into 100 parts. The first dividend of land was stipulated at 5,000 acres per full share, with the fractioner receiving land in proportion [by 1714 each full proprietary share had yielded its owner 16,500 acres in four dividends]. The quitrent system did not take root in West Jersey, because the shareholder imposing quitrents would have had little chance of selling his lands. The unit of settlement became a medium-sized farm cultivated by the owner and his family. The Concessions provided a headright system, and liberal terms 50 acres and freedom dues were offered indentured servants at the expiration of a three or four-year term. n302

Over time the "medium-sized farm" evolved into a larger holding in West Jersey:

> In the western division the settlers took up large tracts, and through the consolidation of estates, owing to intermarriages of members of the Society of Friends and a general observance of the rule of primogeniture, acre was laid to acre, until West Jersey passed under the control of comparatively few families. Consequently the growth of a landed aristocracy was a logical conclusion. While many of West Jersey's landed proprietors, by their interests in timber and in trade, were enabled to maintain their estates, others were plunged hopelessly in debt, as the result of improvident and expensive methods of cultivation. This condition became apparent long before the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, and caused young men in such families to "clear" less desirable but cheaper land in the "Pines," or to engage in business in Philadelphia. n303

§ 6.10(f)(2)(i) The 1677 "Concessions and Agreements" for West New Jersey.

The provisions of the 1677 "Concessions and Agreements of the Proprietors Freeholders and Inhabitants of the Province of West New Jersey in America" relating to landholding are listed or summarized as follows:

> Chapter 1: Commissioners to be appointed to obtain land and distribute it to shareholders, and to keep a registry; commissioners also to set out towns and establish boundaries.
>
> Chapter 2: Commissioners to ensure that lands are properly surveyed and registered.
>
> Chapter 4: Headright system established: during the first year, 70 acres per able-bodied person and 50 acres for each younger or weaker person; small acreages in subsequent years. Quitrents set at one penny per acre for town land and one-half penny per acre for other land, with declining amounts for land acquired later. Conditions of settlement and improvements set out for maintaining land grants; upon failure of an owner to meet the conditions, the commissioners may lease the land for a term of up to twenty years.
>
> Chapter 5: Regulations for surveying and registering the land.
>
> Chapter 6: Lands allotted for public facilities such as highways and streets, harbors and public houses. Rights in public lands described:
>
> That all inhabitants within the said Province of West Jersey have the Liberty of Fishing in Delaware River or on the sea coast and the Liberty of Hunting and Killing any Deer or other wild beasts the Liberty to Shoot or Take any wild Fowles within the said Province provided alwaies that they doe not Hunt Kill Shoot or Take any such Deer wild Beasts or Fowles upon the Lands that is or shall be surveyed taken up inclosed sowen and planted except the owners of the sd lands or their assignes.
>
> Chapter 7: Title to lands held at least seven years after survey and registration shall be secure.
>
> Chapter 8: Custom of commons affirmed, and the owner of stray cattle on such land shall not be liable to trespass.

Chapter 11: No tax to be imposed on the inhabitants without their consent.

Chapter 17: No freeholder or inhabitant "shall be deprived or condemned of Life limb Liberty estate Property or any wayes hurt in his or their Priveledges Freedoms or Franchises without a due tryall and Judgement passed by twelve good and Lawfull men of his neighborhood first had ...."

Chapter 24: Registers of "all deeds evidences and conveyances of land" to be kept both in England and in the province of West Jersey. Instructions for execution and registration given for such documents, including leases and mortgages.

Chapter 26: Grants of Indian lands to be made in writing.

Chapter 29: Administration of decedents' estates and care of orphans.

Chapter 43: Taxes and assessments levied on lands shall be imposed equally. n304

§ 6.10(f)(2)(ii) The Ten "Fundamentals" of 1681.

The commissioners governed until the assembly first met in 1681. When the assembly did meet, its first act was to adopt ten "fundamentals" whose purpose was to keep governing power in the hands of the inhabitants. None of the ten "fundamentals" dealt directly with land rights, except number six, prohibiting the levying of any tax without authority of the assembly. n305

§ 6.10(f)(2)(iii) Later Land Regulations.

During the ensuing years, other laws and regulations dealing with land were adopted:

Commissioners for the Settling and Regulation of Lands were appointed and given broad powers. Inter alia they were instructed to mark the bounds of the several tenths and to lay out 64,000 acres in each for ultimate distribution to the proprietors or their assigns. Actually, with the creation of the Gloucester Court in May 1686, a typical county court, the system of tenths was gradually abandoned in favor of the county system, and by 1693 the county system of local government was fully established. Beginning with Burlington and Salem, township governments were instituted, with power to adopt local ordinances, assess local rates, and elect town officials. The commissioners also adopted regulations to forestall the creation of large estates and the accumulation of choice tracts by speculators. Except for Dr. Coxe's later feeble efforts at Coxe's Hall on Delaware Bay, there were no mesne lords following John Fenwick. Since most Quakers came as fractional owners or with some funds, the number of nonowners was small. Land was plentiful and relatively inexpensive. n306

As in East New Jersey, the system of conveyancing had become complex and confusing. With the proprietor Fenwick holding 10 of the 100 shares and disposing of them independently, a typical West New Jersey conveyance would be the "sale of 1/32 of 3/90 of 90/100 shares by George Hutcheson to Anthony Woodhouse." n307

Among the West New Jersey proprietors, a Dr. Daniel Coxe purchased the holdings of the Byllynge heirs in 1687. In that same year, the West New Jersey assembly:

requested the resident proprietors to assume management of all proprietary lands. A group of fifty-nine resident proprietors, each owning a 1/32 share, organized as the Council of Proprietors of West Jersey in September 1688. From their number they elected nine commissioners, five from Burlington and four from Gloucester County. The principal responsibilities of the council were to record all proprietary rights, supervise the distribution of dividends of land, issue warrants of survey, and administer unappropriated lands. The resident proprietors now felt in a position to safeguard their property interests vis-a-vis Coxe and the other English proprietors. With the establishment of the West Jersey Council on September 1, 1688 and the East Jersey Board of April 19, 1685, the two colonies, in matters of land management, were running a parallel course. n308

As a sop to Coxe, the West Jersey Council refrained from enforcing its restriction on the formation of great estates. Coxe's agents proceeded to buy up huge tracts, so that by 1692 Coxe owned probably twenty proprieties amounting to more than one million acres. He even attempted to establish a manor, called Coxe's Hall, with servants, feudal services, and quitrents. Worried about interference with the province by Governor Andros of New York, however, Coxe sold his holdings in 1693.

§ 6.10(g) Transforming the Proprietary Colonies into a Royal Province.

Proprietors of both New Jersey divisions were ready to transfer rights of government to the English crown in 1701. King William III approved the commission and instructions to the royal governor in November, 1702, but his death delayed the approval and execution of the Act of Surrender by Queen Anne until April 1703. The commission and instructions to the royal governor, with occasional enlargements and renewals, comprised the basic law of New Jersey until 1776.

§ 6.10(h) Instructions to the Royal Governor Pertaining to Land.

The provisions of the first royal governor's commission and instructions that related to landholding in the reunified New Jersey colony are listed or summarized as follows:

14. One general assembly for both East New Jersey and West New Jersey should be formed and called.

15. An assembly member must have a freehold interest in at least 1,000 acres situated in the division for which the member is elected; voters must have a freehold estate of at least 100 acres.

16. The governor is to collect, revise, correct and enact all previous laws of New Jersey as "shall be judged proper, and conducive to Our service and the Welfare of Our said Province, that they may be transmitted unto Us in Authentick Form, for our Approbation or Disallowance.

36. Our Will and Pleasure is that for the better quieting the minds of Our Good Subjects Inhabitants of Our said Province, and for settling the Properties and Possessions of all Persons concerned therein, either as General Proprietors of the Soyle under the first Original Grant of the said Province made by the late King Charles the Second to the late Duke of Yorke, Or as particular Purchasers of any Parcells of Land from the said General Proprietors, You shall propose to the General Assembly of Our Said Province the passing of such Act, or Acts, whereby the Right and Property of the said General Proprietors, to the Soyle of Our said Province may be confirmed to them according to their respective Rights and Titles; together with all such Quit-Rents as have been reserved or are or shall become due to the said General Proprietors from the Inhabitants of our said Province, and all such Priviledges as are exprest in the Conveyances made by the said Duke of Yorke; Excepting only the Right of Government, which remains in Us; And You are further to take care that by the said Act or Acts so to be passed the particular Titles and Estates of all the Inhabitants of that Province and other Purchasers claiming under the said General Proprietors be confirmed and Settled as of Right does appertain, under such obligations as shall tend to the best and speediest Improvement or Cultivation of the same. Provided always that you do not consent to any Act or Acts to lay any Tax upon Lands that lye unprofitable.

37. You shall not permit any other Person or Persons, beside the said General Proprietors, or their Agents to purchase any land whatsoever from the Indians within the Limits of their Grant.

38. You are to permit the Surveyors and other Person appointed by the aforementioned General Proprietors of the Soile of that Province, for Surveying and recording the Surveys of Land granted by, and held of them, to Execute accordingly their respective Trusts, And You are likewise to permit and, if need be, aid and Assist such other Agent or Agents, as shall be appointed by the said Proprietors for that End, To Collect and Receive the Quit-Rents which are or shall be due unto them, from the particular Possessors of any parcells or Tracts of Land from time to time ...

49. You are to take care that no Mans life, Member, Freehold or Goods be taken away or harmed in Our said Province, otherwise than by Established and known Laws, not repugnant to, but as much as may be agreeable to the Laws of England.

[P 34 of instructions following the numbered paragraphs]:

You are for the better Administration of Justice to Endeavour to get a Law passed (if not already done) wherein shall be set the Value of Mens Estates either in Good or Lands, under which they shall not be capable of Serving as Jurors. n309

The assembly of the now united province of New Jersey began to sit on a regular basis in 1703, issuing its session laws in printed form a few pages at a time. A collection of laws passed between 1703-1717 was published in 1717, with supplemented versions reprinted up through 1722. The laws relating to landholding in that legislation is listed or summarized as follows:

Ch. I (1703): Regulating the purchasing of land from the Indians.

Ch. XII (1709): Explaining grants and patents for land executed by Phillip Cartert and Council in the Eastern Division, "according to the true intent and meaning of the Grantor and Grantee."

Ch. XXIII (1709): Dividing and ascertaining the boundaries of all the counties of the province.

Ch. XXXIX (1713): Preventing waste of timber, pine and cedar trees and poles within the province.

Ch. XLVI (1713): Confirming letters of administration granted within the province.

Ch. XLVIII (1713): Regulating fences.

Ch. LI (1713): "An Act for Confirming of Conveyances of Lands made and to be made by Wills and Powers of Attorney, and declaring what Exemplifications of Records and other Things shall be holden and received for good Evidence of Estates of Inheritance, and for Transfering Uses into Possession." Included within this legislation is an intriguing section essentially reenacting the Statute of Uses, which had been in effect in England for 177 years and for 71 years before the first permanent English settlement in North America:

And be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That all and every Person or Persons to whom the use or uses of any Tract or Tracts of Land within this Province have been Sold, Given, Limited, Granted, Released or Conveyed by Deed, Grant or any other Legal Conveyance whatsoever, or that shall hereafter be granted by any Deed or Conveyance whatsoever, such Grantees, their Heirs and Assigns shall be Deemed, Taken and Esteemed to be in as Full and Ample Possession of such Lands, Tenements and Hereditaments, to all Intents, Constructions and Purposes as if such Grantees, their Heirs and Assigns were possessed thereof by solemn Livery of Seisin and Possession, and Usage or Custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

Ch. LII (1713): Shortening of law suits, and regulating the practice of law.

Ch. LV (1713): Acknowledging and recording of deeds and conveyances of land within each county.

Ch. LXVI (1713): Enforcing the observation of the ordinance for establishing fees within the province [including a schedule of attorney's fees for drafting of specific documents].

Among the private acts from this 1713 session of the assembly were several relating to testamentary conveyances of land and authorizing owners of meadow and marshland to take measures on both their own lands and adjoining lands to stop tides from overflowing their lands.

An act of 1716 establishing a fee schedule for documents concerning titles to land.

An act of 1718 "for Running and Ascertaining the Line of Partition or Division between the Eastern and Western Divisions of the Province of New-Jersey, and for preventing Disputes for the Future concerning the same; and for securing to the general Proprietors of the Soil of each of the Divisions, and Persons claiming under them their several and respective Possessions, Rights and Just Claims."

An act of 1720 to prevent the multiplicity of lawsuits. n310

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 284. Isaac S. Mulford, A Civic and Political History of New Jersey 41 (1851).

(n2)Footnote 285. See § 6.05(b), supra.

(n3)Footnote 286. Id.

(n4)Footnote 287. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History 1606-1775 43-50 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n5)Footnote 288. Id. at 43.

(n6)Footnote 289. Isaac S. Mulford, A Civic and Political History of New Jersey 57 (1851).

(n7)Footnote 290. If the farmer and family resided at the site, the site was called a bowery; if they resided elsewhere, the site was called a plantation.

(n8)Footnote 291. Adrian C. Leiby, The Early Dutch and Swedish Settlers of New Jersey 14-17 (1964).

(n9)Footnote 292. Id. at 17.

(n10)Footnote 293. Plowden visited New Jersey settlements on the Delaware River in 1642, but had no success in establishing his right to conduct government, so he eventually returned to England. Richard P. Mccormick, New Jersey From Colony to State 14 (1964).

(n11)Footnote 294. See § 6.05(e)(1), supra.

(n12)Footnote 295. Fundamental Laws and Constitutions of New Jersey 1664-1964 9-10 (Julian P. Boyd ed. 1964).

(n13)Footnote 296. Id. at 51-66.

(n14)Footnote 297. Id. at 67-70.

(n15)Footnote 298. John E. Pomfret, Colonial New Jersey, A History 31 (1973).

(n16)Footnote 299. Francis Bazley Lee, New Jersey as a Colony and as a State 193-194 (1902).

(n17)Footnote 300. Id. at 58.

(n18)Footnote 301. John E. Pomfret, Colonial New Jersey, A History 58-59 (1973).

(n19)Footnote 302. Id. at 41-42 (1973).

(n20)Footnote 303. Francis Bazley Lee, New Jersey as a Colony and as a State 193-194 (1902).

(n21)Footnote 304. Fundamental Laws and Constitutions of New Jersey, 1664-1964 71-104 (Julian P. Boyd ed. 1964).

(n22)Footnote 305. The Fundamental Agreements of the Governor, Proprietors, Freeholders, and Inhabitants of the Province of West New Jersey, November 25, 1681; Fundamental Laws and Constitutions of New Jersey, 1664-1964 at 104-108 (Julian P. Boyd ed. 1964).

(n23)Footnote 306. John E. Pomfret, Colonial New Jersey, A History 47-48 (1973).

(n24)Footnote 307. Id. at 58.

(n25)Footnote 308. Id. at 48.

(n26)Footnote 309. The Instructions from the Queen in Council to the Governor of the Province of New Jersey, November 16, 1702, in Fundamental Laws and Constitutions of New Jersey, 1664-1964, 126-154 (Julian P. Boyd ed. 1964).

(n27)Footnote 310. The Earliest Printed Laws of New Jersey, 1703-1722 1-145 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.11

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.11 Development of Property Law in Pennsylvania (from 1643).

§ 6.11(a) Early Settlement Activity.

Entry of Europeans into the region that is now Pennsylvania began in 1609, when Henry Hudson sailed into Delaware Bay, soon to be followed by other Dutch parties exploring the Delaware River. In 1633 an employee of the Dutch West India Company purchased from the Indians a parcel of land near the Schuylkill River, to be used for establishing a trading post. Because the predominant Dutch interest was fur trading, large real estate holdings were not important.

In 1638 Swedish and Finnish settlers, under the leadership of the Dutchman Peter Minuit and the auspices of the New Sweden Company, purchased more land on the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware River, below the Schuylkill River, which they then divided into farms. As in their concurrent settlement activity in Delaware, the Swedes were unable to base claims to land on rights of discovery or conquest, so they "purchased" lands from the Indians. The purchaser was nominally the Swedish South Sea Company, which had received its first letters patent from King Gustavus Adolphus in 1624, and an essentially similar second charter in 1626.

In 1640 the Swedish West India Company granted to certain Dutch investors a charter effectively creating a patroonship, in order that they could found another settlement in New Sweden. The grantees held their land under the protection of Sweden as hereditary property, with the feudalistic high and low jurisdiction. For the most part, however, the rival Dutch and Swedish colonies competed in "purchasing" lands from the Indians.

§ 6.11(b) The Commencement of English Rule in 1664.

In 1664 the English King Charles II granted to his brother, the Duke of York, lands that included much of what the Dutch claimed in America; this led directly to the English takeover of New Amsterdam, which they quickly renamed New York. An English fleet then approached the Delaware settlements, obtaining the acquiescence of the Swedish colonists and the surrender of the Dutch after a brief battle. The lands included in this famous grant encompassed the future states of New York, New Jersey, Delaware and Pennsylvania. The English also took some territory of the Dutch that was not included in the grant to the Duke of York but had, in fact, been included in the 1632 grant of Maryland to Lord Baltimore.

The royal charter of 1664 is discussed in detail in § 6.05(e)(1), supra, and here it is necessary only to reiterate that "the patent was expressed in terms of the fullest property rights consistent with the feudal incidents still connected with the tenure of free and common socage"; that "the grantee, as a feudal lord, was given extensive powers of government and court jurisdiction"; that "the laws to be administered in the granted lands were to be not contrary to and as near 'as conveniently may bee' to the laws of England, [with] judicial judgments and sentences ... subject to a right of appeal in England"; and that "the terms of this patent appeared designed to expressly supersede any previous and conflicting grants of the same lands." n311

§ 6.11(b)(1) Application of The Duke's Law in 1665.

The powers of the 1664 charter were implemented by the "Duke's Law"of 1665 , although at first, settlers in the former Dutch areas were permitted to be governed by their traditional laws. Even this changed, however, when English rule resumed after a brief Dutch interlude in 1673-1674. The provisions of the "Duke's Law" relating to landholding, typical of English laws adapted to the frontier environment, are summarized in § 6.05(e)(2), supra. n312

§ 6.11(b)(2) Landholding in Pennsylvania Settlements Incident to Growth in Other Colonies.

In addition to the handful of Swedish, Finnish and Dutch settlers who remained on Pennsylvania soil after the English took over in 1664, a few English settlers moved in because the Pennsylvania land was near to settlement activity taking place in adjacent English provinces. For instance, while most of the English in the lower Delaware Valley were establishing themselves in West New Jersey by 1680, a few took up land across the river in Pennsylvania. Likewise, farther south, some settlers with land patents obtained from the Duke of York during the 1670's, moved in from Maryland; these Marylanders were tobacco farmers who brought slaves with them.

Virtually all of this settlement activity was confined to the Delaware Valley, or the valley of the Delaware River. While the east bank of the river was clearly in New Jersey Territory, the west bank, the so-called Three Lower Counties, was rather tenuously claimed by Maryland. In fact, this area had been included in the 1632 grant to Maryland's proprietor, Lord Baltimore, but the actual settlers had been mostly Dutch, initially under the governance of New Netherland and then under New York, but not under Maryland.

Landholding practices among these early settlers followed various patterns. In the Dutch communities, the basic assumptions underlying the patroonship system prevailed, even though patroonships themselves were not successful. Some lands designated as patroonships, even without official patroonship administration, remained undivided and at least nominally under feudal obligations:

> the Charter of Privileges to patroons ... was intended to encourage private individuals to establish settlements at various points on the Hudson and Delaware, or North and South, rivers. Numerous grievances, occasioned by friction between patroons and the Company, were partially allayed by a new charter in 1640, restricting the area of the grants, and encouraging independent settlement; but the feudal privileges of the patroons were not interfered with. "Many of the old patroon estates long remained undivided, and the heirs of the founders claimed some semi-feudal privileges well into the nineteenth century." n313

Even though the patroonships failed, the principles announced in the patroonship charter remained as permanent characteristics of Dutch governance and land arrangements:

> This charter formed the principal basis upon which the civil institutions of New Netherland came to be placed... The principal directors of the plan were ready to seize for themselves the advantages offered; in the character as Patroons, they secured acquisitions in the province which almost gave them a monopoly in land, and thus they were able to retain, in their own hands, some of the most important privileges yielded in the charter. To the mass of actual settlers nothing whatever was given. The charter > contemplated or allowed, the establishment of a kind of feudal or manorial rule, by which the colonists would be held in a state of complete dependence. No provision was made for the division of lands, either present or prospective. The people to be sent by the Patroons, were regarded, and were to be controlled by the owners of the soil, as a servile class. They were to become American serfs ...

>
> By a wiser provision, the charter gave liberty to private adventurers, to make a selection of lands, and to enjoy the same by personal right. n314

After the Dutch assumed nominal control of the Swedish settlements in 1655, they agreed to respect the customs, religion, and private property claims of Swedish settlers who wished to remain. When the Dutch took up possession of this territory, their land management practices were also introduced:

> In the settlement of the country, the colonists were to concentrate themselves in families of sixteen to twenty in number, and were to pay annually for their lands twelve stivers a morgen [approximately two acres] in lieu of tenths. The town lots were forty feet by fifty, and the streets from four to five rods in breadth. The Swedes were to be closely watched, and if any should be found disaffected, they were to be sent away ... and, if possible, induced to come to Manhattan. n315

At the same time, a few English colonists from the New England settlements were migrating into the Pennsylvania region, bringing with them their notions of essentially democratic towns and absolute ownership of land. When England "conquered" the Dutch in 1664, assuming control over all Dutch territory in North America, little immediate increase of English immigration into the area occurred.

§ 6.11(c) The Proprietorship of William Penn.

By a royal patent dated March 4, 1680, William Penn received from King Charles II a patent for lands and a grant of governmental authority in the province of Pennsylvania. By deed of feoffment dated August 4, 1682, the Duke of York granted to Penn all the lands in the New York provincial territory covered by the royal patent to Penn from the king, which meant conveyance of title to the Pennsylvania lands. n316

§ 6.11(c)(1) Charter Provisions Relating to Property.

The charter of January 26, 1682, from King Charles II to William Penn came late enough in the English experience with North American colonies that provisions could be included for virtually every major source of concern that had arisen in the previous 75 years. It is a long and detailed document, exhibiting thoughtfulness toward both Penn's desire to conduct a benevolent experiment in Pennsylvania and England's greater assertiveness on matters of empire. The charter formed the basic law of the colony, and its provisions relating to land (excerpted below) were of fundamental importance:

The grant:

> ... [W]ee ... Have given and granted ... unto the said William Penn, his heires and assignes all that tract or parte of land in America, with all the Islands therein conteyned [boundaries and hereditaments described]...

The statement of proprietary ownership and the requirement of allegiance to England:

> Wee Doe ... make, create and constitute the true and absolute proprietaries of the Countrey aforesaid, and of all other, the premises, saving alwayes to us, our heires and successors, the faith and allegiance of the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, and of all other, the proprietaries, tenants and Inhabitants that are, or shall be within the precincts aforesaid...

The habendum, to the "use and behoofe" of Penn, and declaration of tenure in free and common socage, with annual payment of two beaver skins:

> To Have, hold and possesse and enjoy the said tract of Land ... unto the said William Penn, his heires and assigns, to the only proper use and behoofe of the said William Penn, his heires and assignes forever. To be holden of us, our heires and successors, Kings of England, as of our Castle of Windsor, in our County of Berks, in free and common socage by fealty only for all services, and not in Capite or by Knights service, Yeelding and paying therfore to us, our heires and Successors, two Beaver skins to bee delivered att our said Castle of Windsor, on the first day of January, in every yeare...

The declaration that the province is a seignory, or lordship:

> ... [W]ee do hereby Erect the aforesaid Country and Islands, into a province and Seigniorie, and doe call it Pensilvania and we have already made and ordeyned the aforesaid William Penn, his heires and assignes, the true and absolute Proprietaries of all the Lands and Dominions aforesaid.

The grant of governmental powers, consistent with the laws of England:

> ... [W]ee ... doe grant free, full and absolute power, by vertue of these presents to him and his heirs ... for the good and happy government of the said Countrey, to ordeyne, make, enact and under his and their Seals to publish any Lawes whatsoever ... by and with the advice, assent and approbacon of the freemen of the said Countrey, or the greater part of them ... Provided; Nevertheless, that the said Lawes bee consonant to reason, and bee not repugnant or contrarie, but as neere as conveniently may bee agreeable to the Lawes, statutes and rights of this our Kingdome of England...

The continuation of previously-established property rights:

> ... [A]nd our further will and pleasure is, that the Lawes for regulateing and governing of propertie, within the said Province, as well for the descent and enioyment of lands, shall be and continue the same as shall bee for the time being...

The power to create municipalities:

> ... And Wee Doe further ... give and grant unto the said William Penn ...free and absolute power to Divide the said Countrey, and Islands, into Townes, Hundreds and Counties, and to erect and incorporate Townes into Borroughs, and Borroughs into Citties...

The power to sell and grant real property interests, by any estate, and suspending the operation of the Statute Quia Emptores with respect to conveyances from Penn:

> ... Wee have given and granted ... unto the said William Penn full and absolute power, licence and authoritie, That he ... from time to time hereafter forever, att his ... will or pleasure, may assigne, alien, grant, demis or infeoffe of the premises, soe many, and such partes and parcells to him or them, that shall be willing to purchase the same, as they shall think fitt. To Have And To Hold to them, the said person and persons willing to take or purchase ... in fee simple or feetaile, or for the term of life, or liues, or yeares, to be held of the said William Penn ... as of the seigniory of Windsor, by such services, customes and rents, as shall seeme fitt to the said William Penn, and not imediately of us ... the Statute Quia Emptores terrarum ... in any wise notwithstanding...

The power to create manors, hold a court baron, and to hold view of frankpledge, and reinstating the operation of Quia Emptores with respect to conveyances from Penn's successors in interest:

> ... Wee give and grant licence unto the said William Penn to erect any parcells of Land ... into mannors, ... to have and to hold a Court Baron and to have and to hold view of frankpledge...; and Wee doe further grant licence and authoritie that every such person ...who shall erect any such mannor ... shall or may grant all or any parte of his said lands to any person ... in fee simple or any other estate of inheritance, to be held of the said mannors respectively, soe as noe further tenures shall be created, but that upon all further and other alienacons thereafter, to be made the said lands so aliened, shall be held of the same Lord and his heires, of whom the alien did then before hold, and by the like rents and services, which were before due and accustomed. n317

The overall effect of these charter provisions was to give Penn the full extent of feudal powers still recognized in his day, while still preserving all the prerogatives of the monarchy:

> By the charter Penn became the proprietor of a vast but loosely bounded domain... Of this vast area Penn was made the true and absolute proprietor, to hold the land in free and common socage, as of the royal castle of Windsor, paying therefor fealty and allegiance and two beaver skins on the first of January in each year. Though all reference to the palatinate of Durham was carefully omitted, Penn was given almost equivalent authority in the complete control he could exercise over the soil, in his right to determine the form of government, in his extensive privileges of local appointment, and in his ability to issue ordinances of his own in time of need. He could initiate and promulgate laws, but only with the advice, assent, and approbation of the freemen in assembly, that is, as later shown, by the freeholders. In all its main features the charter followed the standard type, differing, however, from the charters of the earlier period in that it reduced considerably the proprietary prerogatives, toned down the strictly feudal aspects so as to render them as innocuous as possible, and reserved to the king all his sovereign powers. In this respect Penn's charter, compared with that of Lord Baltimore, issued fifty years before, or even with that of the Duke of York, issued in 1664, represents the changes which had come over the mind of the English government since the king had been restored to his throne. n318

§ 6.11(c)(2) Land Distribution Practices.

In contrast to the previous colonial practice of simply giving land to settlers willing to come and stay, Penn began selling land:

> In New Netherland and New York ... during the [early] period..., a price seems never to have been put upon the land. Land was sold in Pennsylvania from the very first. As soon as he had secured his title, Penn offered for sale shares of five thousand acres at 100 each. After 1684 this land was also to be liable to a quitrent. The practice of selling land was steadily continued, the prices varying with the period of time which had elapsed since the settlement of the province, with the character and location of the land, and with such other conditions as might affect a bargain. After 1732 prices become more permanent. For thirty years from that date the price was 15, 10s. per hundred acres. Prices were always fixed by the proprietor and his officials ...
>
> ... Escheated land, with such improvements as had been made upon it, was sold at auction, and the larger part of the purchase money went to the proprietor. It was a requirement in all the provinces that land should be settled within a brief period -- often designated as three years -- after the issue of the patent. Squatters' rights, as evidenced by "improvment," were as a rule generously enforced. n319

§ 6.11(c)(3) Quit Rents.

In Pennsylvania quitrents were actively pursued, and, therefore, the various issues and controversies surrounding colonial quitrents became important:

> The most characteristic form of territorial revenue was the quitrent, paid annually at a rate prescribed by the proprietor and received in lieu of all services. It appears in all the provinces ...
>
> In all transactions, and in all the colonies, the form of payment was a matter of importance to the people. So scanty was their supply of money, that payment in kind was always strongly their preference. The proprietors, and afterward the crown, always found their interest in securing money payments whenever it was possible. This in many cases gave rise to controversies over quitrents, which in turn occasioned the interference of the assembly in a matter which the proprietors claimed as exclusively their own...
>
> In all the provinces quitrents were an object of aversion. They were continually falling into arrears. Payment was avoided whenever it was possible; and it was not infrequently resisted. In the last resort payment could be enforced by distress, the assistance of the sheriff being called in for the purpose. In Pennsylvania, as in other provinces, these conditions were ever and anon recurring... n320

§ 6.11(c)(4) Administration of Land Affairs.

Both the sales of land and the administration of quitrents in Pennsylvania required the creation of a rudimentary bureaucracy:

> ... Pennsylvania had a land office, though until after 1732 its affairs were very much in confusion. The long absences of Penn from his province made it impossible for him to attend in person to the details of selling and letting land and collecting rents. Not until 1741 was the care of these matters intrusted to the governors. Instead, a commission or board of property was from time to time designated, which acted as the special agent of the proprietor. The board consisted of a secretary, -- who was at the same time secretary of the province, -- the surveyor-general, and from three to five special commissioners. Closely associated with the board was the receiver-general, the keeper of the seal, and master of the rolls. The special duties of the commissioners related to the granting of lands, but, as their powers developed, they also became concerned with the collection of rents. After 1741 the governors became members of this board, but their authority to act with it was conveyed through a special commission... n321

In the view of one important historian, the land systems in the proprietary colonies were kept strictly within the control of the executive, away from legislative regulation:

> In all the provinces the land system was kept as free as possible from the control of the legislature. It was organized and regulated under instructions and proclamations of the proprietors and their appointees. Any attempt to regulate it by legislation was resented and opposed. It was regarded as the private concern of the proprietor and its administration as distinctly as an executive function...
>
> ... In the absence of a legislature [such as in New Netherland and proprietary New York] such an issue could not arise. But in the Carolinas, the Jerseys, and Pennsylvania it arose, and the occasion which usually brought it to the front was some dispute over the payment of quitrents. It was at this point that the territorial regulations of the proprietor touched the pocket of the colonist. Like a tax, the rent was a constantly recurring burden. Over its amount and the form of its payment the individual desired in some way to secure such control as had been effected in the case of taxation. Efforts to secure this helped to initiate the process of legislation related to territorial affairs. n322

As will be shown in the next section, however, legislation in matters touching land was both common and comprehensive in Pennsylvania.

§ 6.11(c)(5) Legislation Relating to Landholding.

Soon after the 1682 conveyance from the Duke of York, Penn issued the Frame of Government of the Province of Pennsylvania, consisting of a bill of rights and other laws that would become effective when ratified by the colonists in the province. In 1683, Penn issued a Charter of Privileges, which was revised in 1701, and which added further governing provisions applicable to Pennsylvania and Penn's other territories. Meanwhile, the Duke's Law also remained in force in Pennsylvania. Therefore, the Duke's Law of 1665, and Penn's 1682 Frame of Government and 1683 Charter of Privileges were all potential sources of laws governing landholding.

The fundamental legal rules for property were lodged in the Duke's Law and are described in the context of colonial New York in §§ 6.05(e) and 6.05(f), supra. The property provisions of the 1682 Frame of Government and the Charter of Privileges of 1683 and 1701 are summarized in the following paragraphs.

§ 6.11(c)(5)(i) Penn's Frame of Government of 1682.

In his 1682 Frame of Government, Penn granted to "the freemen, planters and adventurers, of ... the ...province, these liberties, franchises, and properties [as granted to Penn], to be held, enjoyed and kept by the freemen, planters and inhabitants of the said province of Pennsylvania for ever." n323 In addition to this conferral of rights, the other singular feature of the Frame of Government was the establishment of representative government, in the form of the Provincial Council and General Assembly. The Provincial Council was directed to divide itself into four standing committees, the first of which would be "a committee of plantations, to situate and settle cities, ports, market-towns and high-ways, and to hear and decide all suits and controversies relating to plantations." n324 Laws proposed by the Provincial Council were subject to rejection or ratification by the General Assembly. In April 1683, a new frame of government was drawn up, taking into account the incorporation of the Delaware settlements and providing for a reorganization of the council and general assembly. n325

§ 6.11(c)(5)(ii) Laws for the Colony Agreed upon in England.

Even before the earliest legislative assembly met, certain laws for Pennsylvania were proposed and agreed to by the colonial leaders while they were still in England, subject to ratification by the colonists in America. Those provisions pertaining for landholding are as follows:

> First. That the charter of liberties [Frame of Government] ... is hereby declared and approved, and shall be for ever held for fundamental in the government thereof, according to the limitations mentioned in the said charter.
>
> Second. That every Inhabitant in the said province, that is or shall be a purchaser of one hundred acres of land or upwards, his heirs and assigns, and every person who shall have paid his passage, and taken up one hundred acres of land, at a penny an acre, and have cultivated ten acres thereof, and every person that hath been a servant or bondsman, and is free by his service, that shall have taken up his fifty acres of land, and cultivated twenty thereof, and every inhabitant, artificer, or other resident in the said province, that pays scot and lot n326 to the government, shall be deemed and accounted a freeman of the said province...
>
> Fourteenth. That all lands and goods shall be liable to pay debts, except where there is legal issue, and then all the goods, and one third of the land only.
>
> Fifteenth. That all wills and writing attested by two witnesses, shall be of the same force, as to lands and other conveyances, being legally proved within forty days, either within or without the said province.
>
> Sixteenth. That seven years quiet possession shall give an unquestionable right, except in cases of infants, lunaticks, married women, or persons beyond the seas ...

> Twentieth. And to prevent frauds and vexatious suits within the said province, that all charters, gifts, grants and conveyances of land, (except leases for a year or under) and all bills, bonds, and specialties have five pounds, and not under three months, made in the said province, shall be enrolled or registered in the public enrolment office of the said province within the space of two months next after the making thereof, else to be void in law. And all deeds, grants, and conveyances of land (except as aforesaid) within the said province, and made out of the said province, shall be inrolled or registered as aforesaid, within six months next after the making thereof, and settling and constituting an enrolment office or registry within the said province, else to be void in law against all persons whatsoever...
>
> Thirty-first. That for the encouragement of the plants and traders in this province, who are incorporated into a society, the patent granted to them by William Penn, Governor of the said province, is hereby ratified and confirmed... n327

§ 6.11(c)(5)(iii) The Charter of Privileges of 1683 and 1701.

The Charter of Privileges, issued in 1683 and revised in 1701, gave specific instructions for choosing members of the General Assembly but contained only one additional provision touching upon property rights:

> Eighthly: If any person, through Temptation or melancholly, shall Destroy himself, his Estate, Real & Personal, shall, notwithstanding, Descend to his wife and Children or Relations as if he had Died a natural Death; and if any person shall be Destroyed or kill'd by Casualty or accident, there shall be no forfeiture to the Governour by Reason thereof... n328

§ 6.11(c)(5)(iv) Pennsylvania Landholding Legislation After Circa 1700.

Penn's long absences from England and the persisting conflict between the Pennsylvania governors and assemblies hampered the development of constructive legislation, even though the "Duke's Law" remained as a foundation. Thus, before 1700 there was no systematic and comprehensive compilation of provincial legislation, and no printed compilation until 1714. The 1714 printing "was the first compilation of Pennsylvania laws and purported to contain the text of all laws then in force, with repealed or obsolete statutes reported by title only." Summarized below are the provisions related to landholding found in the 1714 compilation:

Forcible entry

Removing of landmarks

Defacers of charters

Buying land of the natives

Taking lands in execution for the payment of debts

Regulating and maintaining of fences

Erecting of bridges and maintaining highways

Cutting timber

Burning of houses

Better confirmation of the owners of lands, in their just rights and possessions

Probates of wills and confirming devises of lands

Settling of intestates' estates

Collecting of quit rents

Attachments

Seven years' quiet possession

Confirming sales of lands by attorneys or agents, and ascertaining the proof of instruments or writings

Better enabling inhabitants of the province to hold and enjoy lands, tenements and plantations

Acknowledging and recording of deeds

Privileges to a freeman:

[N]o Free-man of this Province shall be taken or imprisoned, disseised of his Free-hold or Liberties, or to be Outlawed or Exiled, or any other ways hurt, damnified or destroyed, nor be tryed nor condemned but by the Lawful Judgement of his Twelve Equals, or by the Laws of this Province.

Preventing disputes that may arise about the dates of conveyances and other instruments and writings (affirming that March is considered the first month)

Regulating party walls and buildings in Philadelphia

Confirming patents and grants

Empowering religious societies to buy, hold and enjoy lands, tenements and hereditaments

Limitation of actions. n329

§ 6.11(d) Summary of Landholding Practices in Colonial Pennsylvania.

The grant to Penn was a proprietary grant, an estate of inheritance with as many feudal prerogatives as were still extant in that era. The province was literally Penn's private estate, and he was both owner and landlord. A proprietor such as William Penn might be an idealist, but he and the other proprietors were also an investors in land, and:

this, when combined with powers of government, made them territorial lords, and in order to collect their quitrents and fines on alienation, they had to institute a system of territorial administration. n330

Despite these extensive feudal prerogatives, the management of land in Pennsylvania was little affected by them:

Before Penn left England he disposed of large tracts of land to those known later as "first purchasers," a part of whose land was to lie in the "country" and a part in the city that he was planning to build. But when he found that in order to carry out the terms of such sales -- the allotment of ten acres in the city for every five hundred in the country -- he would have to enlarge his city beyond the capacity of any available site, he ordered an area to be set off adjoining the city proper to be known as the "liberties," for the purpose of taking up the excess. Thus the lands of the province fell into three disproportionate parts: the common land in city and country -- the largest portion of the territory -- from which allotments could be made by grants of one kind or another; the proprietary reserves of a certain number of acres out of every one thousand assigned, selected by lot and all in one piece; and the proprietary manors, of which there must have been over a hundred, some of them indistinguishable from the reserves and others in the > form of sub-manors within the proprietary manors, none of which were manors in the legal acceptance of the word. Though there is no doubt that Penn expected courts leet and baron to be erected, there is nothing to show that manorial jurisdiction, properly so called, was ever introduced into Pennsylvania. During the earlier years land conditions were in great confusion. Grants were made very carelessly. Quarrels arose between the "first purchasers" and later arrivals, and claims were bandied about that were difficult of settlement because the original deeds were rarely recorded and the loose management of the land office gave ample opportunities for fraud. Not until the arrival of Penn's son Thomas in 1732 was the land system adequately organized and the tangle of claims straightened out. n331

Penn's seigniorial rights are well illustrated by his financial dealings with the rights in his provincial land during the years before his death. In 1708 he mortgaged Pennsylvania to nine persons in England. n332 He died ten years later, and in his will, he had devised the governmental powers to three named aristocrats, in trust, to dispose of to the queen or to any other person, as they determined. His lands, rents and profits in Pennsylvania were devised to his widow and eleven others, in trust, with instructions to pay off his debts. Other dispositions were made of Pennsylvania lands entirely, as if they were his private estate, as they legally were.

In most of the proprietary colonies, land was usually granted gratis, rather than sold, in order to draw in the maximum number of settlers. Pennsylvania was an exception:

> Land was sold in Pennsylvania from the very first. As soon as he had secured his title, Penn offered for sale shares of five thousand acres at £100 each. After 1684 this land was also to be liable to a quitrent. The practice of selling land was steadily continued, the prices varying with the period of time which had elapsed since the settlement of the province, with the character and location of the land, and with such other conditions as might affect a bargain. After 1732 prices became more permanent. For thirty years from that date the price was £15, 10s. per hundred acres. Prices were always fixed by the proprietor and his officials. n333

Contrasted with the enormous importance of the towns in governing the New England colonies, villages and towns had less involvement in Pennsylvania affairs. The more common form of settlement was the isolated farm or plantation.

Whether land allotments were made in the country, in the towns, or in the city of Philadelphia, quitrents were reserved, payable directly to Penn. While Philadelphia allotments were made to individual grantees, Germantown arose as a group settlement.

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 311. See § 6.05(e)(1), supra.

(n2)Footnote 312. The Duke of York's Laws of 1665 were only slightly influenced by the New England legal codes. George L. Haskins, Influences of New England Law on the Middle Colonies, 4 L. & Hist. Rev. 238 (1983).

(n3)Footnote 313. WILLIAM MACDONALD, Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History 1606-1775 43 (1914).

(n4)Footnote 314. Isaac S. Mulford, A Civic and Political History of New Jersey 57 (1851).

(n5)Footnote 315. 1 J. Thomas Scharf, History of Delaware 1609-1888 62 (1888).

(n6)Footnote 316. The interesting peculiarities of this conveyance, with strong overtones of medieval English land law, have been explained as follows, in connection with Penn's assumption of title to land in Delaware:

> There were actually four legal documents involved in these grants, an absolute deed (called a "deed of feoffment") and a lease for ten thousand years for New Castle and the circle around it, and another deed and a similar lease for the land from twelve miles south of New Castle to Cape Henlopen ... Probably the division is explained by the duke's desire to get some revenue from these territories ... but not to interfere with Penn's use of New Castle or with his revenues from it ... Perhaps both deed and lease were used because of the uncertainty of the duke's legal rights to Delaware ... .

Then on October 28 [the day after Penn's arrival on October 27, 1682], in a ceremony called "livery of seisin," Penn formally took possession of New Castle and the territory within twelve miles about it, except on the east side of the Delaware. After the deeds from the Duke of York were read, Penn took the key to the New Castle fort, entered and locked himself in alone, then came out and received a piece of turf with a twig upon it and a porringer with river water and soil as symbols of his new possession. John A. Munroe, Colonial Delaware, A History 83-84 (1978).

(n7)Footnote 317. The Earliest Printed Laws of Pennsylvania 1681-1713 181-190 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n8)Footnote 318. 3 Charles M. Andrews, The Colonial Period of American History 282 (1937).

(n9)Footnote 319. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 34-35 (1904).

(n10)Footnote 320. Id. at 36-37.

(n11)Footnote 321. Id. at 46.

(n12)Footnote 322. Id. at 46-47.

(n13)Footnote 323. The Earliest Printed Laws of Pennsylvania 1681-1713 200 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n14)Footnote 324. Id. at 196.

(n15)Footnote 325. See No. 41. Pennsylvania and Delaware Frame in Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 199-204 (William MacDonald ed. 1914). See Alfred L. Brophy, For the Preservation of the King's Peace and Justice: Community and English Law in Sussex County, Pennsylvania, 1682-1696,. 40 Am. J. Legal Hist. 167 (1996).

(n16)Footnote 326. In English law scot was a form of tax of one's share of a customary contribution. Scot and lot was a particular customary contribution imposed upon subjects according to their ability to pay. In certain English boroughs, persons retained their franchise only by paying the scot and lot.

(n17)Footnote 327. The Earliest Printed Laws of Pennsylvania 1681-1713 201-205 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978). Albert W. Alschuler, Rediscovering Blackstone, 145 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1 (1996). David Schultz, Political Theory and Legal Theory History: Conflicting Depictions of Property in the American Political Founding, 37 Am. J. Legal Hist. 464 (1993).

(n18)Footnote 328. The Earliest Printed Laws of Delaware 1704-1741 1-8 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n19)Footnote 329. The Earliest Printed Laws of Pennsylvania 1681-1713 1-178 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n20)Footnote 330. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 17 (1904).

(n21)Footnote 331. 3 Charles M. Andrews, The Colonial Period of American History 291 (1937).

(n22)Footnote 332. When he died ten years later, the mortgage was still not fully paid off.

(n23)Footnote 333. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 34 (1904).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.12

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.12 Development of Property Law in North Carolina (from 1650).

§ 6.12(a) Property Rights in the Early Colonization Efforts.

§ 6.12(a)(1) Sir Humphrey Gilbert's Charter of 1578.

It has been rightly declared that almost nothing is known about the earliest settlers of North Carolina and that no regular government existed there until sometime after the first proprietary charter for the region was granted in 1663. n334 n335

Most well-known of the early North Carolina settlement efforts is Sir Walter Raleigh's "lost colony" of the late 16th century. This settlement project actually had its genesis in a charter granted by Queen Elizabeth I to Sir Humphrey Gilbert on June 11, 1578, which, by its terms, gave rights to colonize virtually any unoccupied lands in the New World. On the condition that a settlement be commenced within six years after the granting of the charter, the charter conferred on Sir Humphrey, and his heirs and assigns forever, the right to discover "such remote heathen and barbarous lands, Countries, and territories, not actually possessed of any Christian Prince or people":

> And the same to have, hold, occupy, and enjoy, to him, his heirs and Assigns, forever, with all commodities, jurisdictions, and royalties, both by sea and land. n336

Gilbert was given the rights to "all the soil of all such lands ... to be had or used with full power to dispose thereof, and of every part thereof, in fee simple or otherwise, according to the laws of England, as near as the same conveniently may be," reserving to the crown "for all services, duties, and demands, the fifth part of all the ore of gold and silver" discovered in those lands. n337 To Gilbert and all his fellow colonists was granted that they "shall and may have and enjoy all the privileges of free denizens n338 and persons native of England and within our allegiance...." n339 Powers of government, including the administration of justice, were also included in the charter, "so always, that the said statutes, laws, and ordinances may be, as near as conveniently may, agreeable to the form of the laws and policy of England...." n340

§ 6.12(a)(2) Sir Walter Raleigh's Charter and the "Lost Colony" at Roanoke Island.

Gilbert's short-lived 1583 settlement in Newfoundland and his death during the voyage back to England resulted in the renewal of Gilbert's charter in Raleigh's name, on March 25, 1584. Issued shortly before Gilbert's charter was to expire, Raleigh's charter was, in effect, a six-year extension and was virtually identical to Gilbert's charter in its grants of property rights and governing power. Raleigh's unsuccessful efforts to commence a colony in North Carolina, and their significance for all subsequent British American colonies, have been described as follows:

> In 1585, Raleigh sent out a colony ... which settled on Roanoke Island. This was the first English colony to settle in America. About a year later, the colonists returned to England, for they had not received needed supplies and reinforcements. A supply ship arrived only a few weeks after the colonists' departure, and soon afterward a relief expedition under Richard Grenville arrived. Grenville left a small garrison to hold possession and retain Raleigh's rights, but the garrison left the island and disappeared, after an attack by Indians.
>
> In late July, 1587, another colony sent by Raleigh arrived off Hatteras and settled on Roanoke Island. [They] had expected to settle in the Chesapeake region, ... but they were forced to remain at Roanoke Island, for Simon Fernandez, master of the largest ship in the expedition, refused to take them farther...
>
> At the urging of the other colonists, [Governor] White returned to England in late August to expedite the shipping of supplies, with the understanding that the colonists would move to the mainland and would leave at Roanoke Island directions for finding them. War with Spain prevented White's return until 1590, when he found Roanoke Island deserted; the only clues to the colonists' location were the letters CRO carved on a tree and the word CROATOAN carved at the entrance to the colonists' fort. Further search by White was prevented by damage to the ships in the expedition and by an unfavorable wind. No other immediate effort to find the lost colony is recorded, and later attempts, which appear to have been desultory, were unsuccessful. The fate of the colonists has never been learned. For many years, however, the colony was presumed in England to be in existence, and Raleigh's rights in "Virginia" were considered established. n341

Thereafter Raleigh's activities in the New World reflected only commercial interest. In 1602 he sent ships to trade with the Indians and obtain a cargo of timber and medicinal plants. In 1603 he sent ships to the Chesapeake region. Even before these ships returned, Raleigh had been imprisoned on charges of high treason. Upon his conviction, his charter rights were forfeited to the crown. Thus, "Virginia" became available for re-granting by King James I.

It is not known what property rights individual settlers in Raleigh's colonies enjoyed during their time of occupancy. If the pattern of the later Jamestown colony in Virginia was used, then these first North Carolina settlers commenced their colony by holding and working their lands as a community. Once stability had been achieved, then a plan for conveying some type of individual landholdings would have been formed. n342

§ 6.12(a)(3) The Early Influence of Virginia.

When King James I took the throne after Queen Elizabeth's death in 1603, several influential and wealthy men were still interested in colonizing ventures. Hoping to resume what Raleigh had not finished, they approached James about another charter, and this was granted to the Virginia Company on April 10, 1606. The Virginia Company charter, obtained only three years after the last of Raleigh's expeditions, was a continuation of the Gilbert and Raleigh projects and included among its principals several men who had participated in those earlier enterprises. The charter was divided into northern and southern sectors which were assigned to two different groups within the company; the charter's southern territory encompassed most of the coastal sector of North Carolina. Nevertheless, this charter was not as generous as the earlier charters given to Gilbert and Raleigh:

> The territory involved in the new charter was restricted to a prescribed region. The company was not > given the right to own land, although it could parcel out land among settlers, to be granted to them by patents from the king. Governmental authority over colonies was reserved by the crown, to be exercised by a council resident in London, appointed and instructed by the king. The authority of the company chiefly consisted of recruiting, transporting, and supplying colonists, conducting trade, and handling other financial matters. Colonists were guaranteed the rights of Englishmen at home, such as trial by jury, habeas corpus, and the right to own and inherit property, but they were not given right to participate in government. n343

This charter is discussed in greater detail in connection with the Virginia Colony, in § 6.02(a), supra. The charter of 1606, of course, laid the foundation for the colony at Jamestown, the first permanent English settlement in North America. Members of the Jamestown colony explored the area of North Carolina and tried to locate the missing members of Raleigh's colonies. About 50 years after Jamestown was settled, colonists from there and other Virginia settlements moved into the region near Raleigh's original colonies and became the first permanent settlers in North Carolina.

As explained in § 6.02(b), supra, unsatisfactory aspects of the 1606 charter led to requests for a new charter, which was granted on May 23, 1609:

> The new charter granted additional territory and conferred upon the company rights of ownership over this and the territory formerly assigned to the London [southern] group; it also gave the company the right to sub-grant land to settlers and shareholders. n344

Driven principally by the desire to extend jurisdiction over the Bermuda Islands, the company obtained yet another charter on March 12, 1612, described in detail in § 6.02(c), supra:

> The democratic element introduced into the control of the company was the most significant provision of the new charter. The organization of the company as thus established appears to have served as a model when the government of the Virginia colony was reorganized in 1618. An important feature of the reorganization of the colony was the establishment of a popular assembly, which held its first meeting on July 30, 1619. This assembly became a precedent for other English colonies in America, and provision for such a body was included in all the later charters involving the North Carolina area. n345

Because of factional disputes within the colony, this charter was revoked by court decision in 1624, and the land and rights of the Virginia Company reverted to the crown. No permanent settlement had yet been established in North Carolina, so that land was available for re-granting by the crown.

§ 6.12(b) Property Rights under the Heath Charter of 1629.

Such a re-grant occurred five years later, when King Charles I granted most of present-day North Carolina to his attorney general, Sir Robert Heath. Heath was unable to assemble the resources needed to commence colonization, so in the 1630's he disposed of his interest in the tract. Several of Heath's assignees continued to promote a colony in North Carolina, but no settlement materialized. Eventually, the crown considered the grant lapsed because no colonies had been established, and because of this, King Charles II re-granted the Heath tract to eight other persons in 1663.

The Heath Charter, however, did not remain a dead letter. First, despite the royal grant of 1663, persons holding rights under the Heath Charter of 1629 began to press their claims to North Carolina territory. Those claims were rejected by an order in council of August 12, 1663, but the claimants and their heirs and successors persisted, finally obtaining a court judgment in 1668 that awarded them a settlement of 100,000 acres in New York. Second, the Heath Charter of 1629 was the model for the new royal charter of 1663, and the essential provisions of 1629 reappeared in the proprietors' charters of 1663 and beyond. It is useful, therefore, to examine the provisions of the 1629 Heath Charter relating to colonial property rights in North Carolina.

The charter states that "we ... have Given, Granted, and confirmed ... to the said Sir Robert Heath, Knight, his heirs and assigns, for ever, ... all the lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments [in the described tract]...." n346 This grant of land was accompanied by a very broad grant of governmental authority that was as thoroughly feudal as was consistent with the times:

> Together with all ... Rights, Jurisdictions, privileges, prerogatives, Royalties, liberties, and immunities ...
>
> To have, exercise, use, and enjoy, in like manner as any Bishop of Durham within the Bishopric, or County Palatine, of Durham, in our Kingdom of England, ever heretofore had, held, used, or enjoyed, or of right ought or could have, hold, use, or enjoy.
>
> And, by these presents, we make, create, and constitute the same Sir Robert Heath, his Heirs and assigns, true and absolute Lords and Proprietors of the Region and Territory aforesaid, and all other the premises, for us, our heirs and successors;
>
> Saving always, the faith and allegiance due to us, our heirs and Successors... n347

The feudal nature of this proprietary grant was emphasized in the provision that described tenure as knight's service of a tenant-in-chief:

> To be held of Us, our Heirs and Successors, Kings of England, in chief, by Knight's service; and by paying for it, to us, our Heirs and successors, one Circle of Gold, formed in the fashion of a crown, of the weight of twenty Ounces, with this inscription engraved upon it, DEUS CORONET OPUS SUUM ["God crowns His work"], whensoever, and as often as it shall happen, that we, Our Heirs or Successors, shall enter the said Region. n348

The proprietor Heath was granted a very broad lawmaking power, but with provision for a legislative body, and as consistently as possible with English law:

> ... [W]e ... do give Power to the said Sir Robert ... and to his Heirs and assigns, for the good and happy Government of the said Province, to form, make, and enact, and Publish under the Seal of the said Sir Robert ... what Laws soever may concern the public state of the said province, or the private profit of all, according to the wholesome directions of and with the counsel, assent, and approbation of the Freeholders of the same Province, or the Major part of them...
>
> Yet, so that the foresaid laws and ordinances be consonant to Reason, and not repugnant or contrary but, as conveniently as may be done, consonant to the Laws, Statutes, Customs, and rights of our Realm of England. n349

Any person born into or coming into the colony would be considered an English subject or citizen, and their property rights would be the same as those of English subjects:

> And also, that they shall possess lands, Tenements, Rents, services, and Hereditaments whatsoever with our Kingdom of England and of our Dominions, to purchase, receive, take, have, hold, buy, and possess, and them to use and enjoy, and also, them to give, sell, alienate, and bequeath; and also, all liberties, franchises, and privileges of this our Realm to have and possess freely, quietly, and peacably; and that they may use and enjoy them as our lieges born or to be born within our Kingdom of England... n350

The charter also contained a somewhat unique provision giving the proprietor the right to create titles of nobility:

> Furthermore, lest the way to Honours and Dignities may seem to be shut and altogether barred up to men honestly born, and who are willing to undertake this present expedition, ... [we] Give full and free power to the aforesaid Sir Robert Heath, Knight, his heirs and assigns, to confer favours, graces, and honours upon those well-deserving Citizens that inhabit within the foresaid province, and the same with whatever Titles and dignities, provided they be not the same as are now used in England, to adorn at his pleasure... n351

Explicit power was also given to the proprietor to create local municipalities, "with privileges and befitting immunities to be erected and incorporated...." n352

Thus, the 1629 charter differed from earlier charters in that it conferred the extensive "bishop-of-Durham" feudal powers on the proprietors, authorized the proprietors to create a local nobility, and required that a representative lawmaking body have a role in the legislative process.

§ 6.12(c) Assertion of Virginia Authority in 1662.

Beginning in the early 1650's, settlers from Virginia began moving into lands located south of the present southern boundary of Virginia. By 1653, a trader named Nathaniel Batts had built a house and started to carry on trade with the Indians. He was still there in 1672 and was locally referred to as the "governor" of Roan-oak; "Roanoke" or "Old Virginia" were early labels sometimes attached to North Carolina territory to distinguish it from the territory of colonial Virginia. Other settlers from Virginia followed Batts, but without any regulation of landholding rights except for those with which they had become familiar in Virginia. Accordingly, they purchased land from the Indians and, out of caution, recorded these purchases and further conveyances in Virginia. Deeds as early as 1660 have been discovered. n353

As a result of these settlement activities, the council of Virginia decided to assert governmental authority. On October 9, 1662, the council appointed one Samuel Stephens as "commander of the southern plantation" and authorized him to appoint a sheriff, who would keep order and collect taxes. Although this is the beginning of governmental authority over settlers in North Carolina, nothing further is known about the activities of either commander or sheriff. n354

§ 6.12(d) The Royal Grant of 1663.

On March 24, 1663, shortly after Virginia appointed its "commander," King Charles II granted the old Heath tract to eight prominent men who had given important support toward the restoration of the Stuart monarchy. The tract did not actually include the area settled by the Virginians, but the omission was not immediately realized. In time, the eight new North Carolina proprietors authorized William Berkeley, one of their number who was also then governor of Virginia, to exercise governmental authority over the settlement of Virginians. North Carolina's legal authority over the settlement and other omitted territory was finally established in 1665, when a secondNorth Carolina charter was issued expanding on the original grant.

The 1663 charter followed the 1629 Heath charter in important particulars, especially in its provision for representative government, the feudal powers resting in the proprietors, and the right of the proprietors to create a colonial nobility.

As in the 1629 charter, the feudal powers of the proprietors were expressed in the "bishop-of-Durham" clause, "To have, use, exercise, and enjoy, and in as ample manner as any Bishop of Durham, in our Kingdom of England, ever heretofore have held, used, or enjoyed, or of right ought or could have, use, or enjoy." n355 This 1663 charter departed from the 1629 charter, however, in declaring the tenure by which the proprietors held. The earlier document had described Heath's tenure as "in chief, by Knight's service," with a somewhat nominal payment obligation (a gold crown to be given over each time the monarch visited the province). The new charter abandoned this outmoded formula and adopted the new tenurial language commonly found in other colonies' charters: the free and common socage of East Greenwich royal manor: "To be held of us, our heirs and successors, as of our Manor of East Greenwich, in our County of Kent, in Free and Common Soccage, and not in Capite nor by knight's Service. n356

Again, the lawmaking power was subject to the requirement "that the said laws be consonant to reason and, as near as may be convenient, agreeable to the laws and Customs of this our Kingdom of England," and that ordinances "do not extend to the binding, charging, or taking away of the right or interest of any Person or Persons in their freehold, goods, or Chattels whatsoever." n357

Of course, like all colonial charters, the central feature of this 1663 charter was the right to make grants of land. The proprietors were given "full and absolute licence, power, and authority [to] Assign, Alien, Grant, Demise, or enfeoff the premises, or any part or parcels thereof, to him or them that shall be willing to purchase the same, and to such Person or Persons as they shall think fit." n358 In making such grants, the proprietors and, indeed, any grantors, could convey "in Fee simple or fee tail, or for term of life or years," to be held of the proprietors under feudal conditions, if they desired, "by such Rents, Services, and Customs as shall seem meet to [them]." Landholders could grant or hold by any estate that seemed expedient to the proprietors, even in ways contrary to the Statute Quia Emptores and other important property statutes:

> We do give and Grant Licence, ... authority, and power That such Person or Persons may have or take the premises, or any parcel thereof, of [any of the proprietors]...; and the same to hold to themselves, their heirs and Assigns; in what estate of Inheritance soever, in Fee simple or Fee tail or otherwise..; The Statute made in the Parliament of Edward, Son of King Henry, heretofore King of England, our Predecessor, commonly called the Statute of Quia Emptores Terrarum, or any other Statute, Act, or Ordinance, use, Law, Custom, or any other matter, Cause, or thing heretofore published or provided to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. n359

As in the 1629 Heath charter, the 1663 charter continued the unusual provision permitting the proprietors to give titles of nobility:

> .. We do ... Give and Grant unto the [proprietors] full Power and Authority to give and Confer, unto and upon such of the Inhabitants of the said Province as they shall think do or shall merit the same, such marks of favour and Titles of Honour as they shall think fit; so as those Titles or honours be not the same as are enjoyed by or Conferred upon any the Subjects of this our Kingdom of England. n360

As if to ensure that there would be no mistake about the extent of feudal powers granted to the proprietors (though this was made clear in other provisions), the charter also gave specific authority to establish manors and to conduct the uniquely manorial courts baron and leet:

> ... We do ... give and grant Licence to [the proprietors ...
>
> ... to Erect and make in the Province ... so many Manors as to them shall seem meet and convenient; and in every of the same Manors to have and to hold a Court Baron, with all things whatsoever which to a Court Baron do belong; And to have and to hold Views of Frankpledge and Courts Leet ... n361

Appearing for the first time in the 1663 charter was a religious toleration provision, giving the proprietors "Licence, liberty, and Authority" to grant "Indulgencies and Dispensations" to those who in good conscience could not conform to the ceremonies and tenets of the Church of England. This may be instructively contrasted with practice in the early New England colonies, in which admission to a town and obtaining a town lot often required the grantee to be a member of the dominant church in the area.

§ 6.12(e) The Proprietors' Concessions and Agreements of 1665.

§ 6.12(e)(1) Introduction of the Concessions into the Settlements.

A few months after receiving the 1663 charter, the proprietors authorized one of their number, William Berkeley, who was then serving as governor of Virginia, to exercise governmental authority over the only settlers then in the North Carolina territory, who had almost all come from Virginia. In October 1664, Berkeley selected William Drummond as governor. Both before and after this appointment, however, exercise of governmental authority in North Carolina consisted only of the proprietors' provisional instructions and authorizations.

Earlier, in 1663, the proprietors had approved a formal document of governmental regulations, called "A Declaration and Proposals to All That Will Plant in Carolina," but the document applied only to new settlements, and none were ever established while the document remained in effect.

On January 7, 1665, the proprietors adopted another, more formal, plan of government, known as the "Concessions and Agreement between the Lords Proprietors and Major William Yeamans and Others", and this was the first constitution or frame of government actually used in North Carolina. These "Concessions" were made applicable not only to new settlements, but also to any existing settlements, such as that of the Virginians. It is not known when the "Concessions" were actually introduced into the Virginia settlement, but they were in effect by October 1667.

Also, in the spring of 1665, acting under of the 1663 charters, the proprietors convened a legislative assembly. This assembly had been specifically authorized by the charter of 1663, and was given broad powers under the 1665 "Concessions and Agreement," but its powers were later reduced.

§ 6.12(e)(2) The Effect of the Concessions on Landholding.

The provisions of the 1665 "Concessions and Agreement" relating to property rights and landholding may be summarized as follows:

> Certain settlers from Barbados were to have granted to them 500 acres of land for every 1,000 pounds of sugar they paid, the land to be taken up and settled within five years of the grant. To the leader was given a "head right" of 150 acres of land for himself, and between 150 and 50 acres for servants he would bring with him, with a quitrent of one half penny per acre annually, payable to the proprietors.
>
> Grants and conveyances of land to be recorded, and certain conveyances and leases must be in writing and in a certain prescribed format.
>
> A surveyor shall lay out and bound all lands granted.
>
> Procedures and powers of the legislative assembly are detailed. Among the assemblies' powers and duties are to establish and collect taxes on all lands and goods, to lay out rules for granting lands by "head right" (except on the unsettled lands of the proprietors), and to establish the standard quitrent at one half penny per acre.
>
> The governor is empowered to issue warrants for land entries and to seal grants of land.
>
> Land held and planted for seven years after being surveyed may be claimed without objection from the government.
>
> No trespass liability for cattle straying on unappropriated land; no "custom of commons" prevents any person from claiming and appropriating "any Lands so grazed upon."

Headrights are announced for persons already in the colony.

Counties are to be between 40 and 1,600 square miles.

Lots other than in or near cities are to be from 200 to 20,000 acres in size.

Detailed instructions for issuing land grants are given, including a form providing for payment of quitrent and tenure in free and common socage.

A register or record of instruments and grants is to be kept. n362

It appears that these arrangements were actually implemented among the Virginia settlers and that their assembly and court began meeting in 1665. These settlers suffered many natural calamities and burdens in their attempts to work the land, such as yearly hurricanes, excessive rain alternating with frequent droughts, sickness among the animals and people, and depredations of wild animals. Perhaps even worse than these, however, were the unnecessarily burdensome land policies pursued by the proprietors over these earliest settlers:

> Before issuance of the charter of 1663, settlers had obtained land by purchase from Indians or by patent from the Virginia government. Some held a thousand acres or more. The first Carolina charter contained a saving clause to protect such settlers, but the proprietors ignored the clause. In their instructions to Berkeley, in September, 1663, the London proprietors directed Berkeley to "persuade and compell" settlers with large holdings to give up the large tracts and be content "with such proportions as we allot to others." Those proportions, as directed in 1665, were eighty acres or less for each person brought into the colony. The second charter contained no clause protecting the titles of early settlers. In addition to reducing the amounts of land allowed, the proprietors increased the quitrent and introduced other policies which worked hardship on Albemarle [early Virginia] inhabitants. Thus the colonists of the 1660's had reason for discouragement despite their achievements. n363

The land distribution system was also complicated. The so-called "General Lots" of 2,200 to 22,000 acres in size were divided so that one-eleventh of each lot was assigned to the proprietors, and settlers' parcels were determined by time of arrival and casting of lots. The rent of one half penny per acre was double that charged in Virginia or earlier in Albemarle. For each 100 acres held by a colonist in excess of the original allotment, one servant had to be kept on the land, with forfeiture of the land as the penalty for failure to do so. No allotments for children of settlers were provided. n364

§ 6.12(e)(3) The Great Deed of Grant.

In about 1666, Albemarle allotments were increased, and in 1668 the proprietors directed the settlement's governor to grant land on the same terms as in Virginia and to abandon the system of land division and lot allocation. These proprietors' instructions came to be known as the "Great Deed of Grant." The key provision of the Great Deed stated:

> [W]e have appointed, to such Persons as shall come into our said County to plant or inhabit; to be held of us, our Heirs and Assigns, upon the same Terms and Conditions, that Land is at present usually Granted in Virginia; any thing in our Instructions and Concessions aforesaid to the contrary, notwithstanding." n365

Unfortunately, the proprietors simultaneously directed the governor to obtain action from the Albemarle assembly that would reinstate some of the objectionable land policies ostensibly abandoned by the Great Deed.

> By some means [the governor] induced the Albemarle Assembly to enact laws designed to achieve the proprietors' objectives. One act prohibited for five years the issuance of grants of more than 660 acres > to anyone but a proprietor, a landgrave, or a cacique without express permission from the proprietors. It further limited the amount of land allowed in one warrant to that set forth in the proprietors' instructions of "forme of government." Another act provided that land on which improvements had been made but which was not lived on was to escheat to the proprietors if the grantee did not move to the land and live on it within six months after publication of the act. A third law prohibited sale of headrights by any person who had not lived in the county at least two years. Thus, by legislation of the Albemarle Assembly, some of the concessions made in the Great Deed of Grant were nullified. The chief concession left was the reduction in quitrent. n366

In 1672, after the government had been reorganized under the Fundamental Constitutions, the odious policies were still in effect, and additional objectionable policies had indeed been introduced by the Fundamental Constitutions; therefore, the governor, council and assembly petitioned the proprietors for changes.

Despite the detailed provisions for exercising power and organizing the government, no clause of charter or concessions suggested any means for resolving differences between the people and the proprietors. The Virginia settlers resented the impositions of the proprietors. Nevertheless, Berkeley began issuing land grants. Then the proprietors in London directed the establishment of three counties, to be named after proprietors. Albemarle took in the already established Virginia settlers. Clarendon County was settled briefly between 1662 and 1663 by New Englanders, and from 1664 to 1667 by Barbadians, but they all eventually abandoned the enterprise. Craven County eventually became part of South Carolina.

Meanwhile, in 1665, the Albemarle settlers had been "given" an appointed governor, an elected assembly, and courts. A quitrent on their lands had been announced, but deferred for several years to encourage more settlers to come in.

§ 6.12(f) The Charter of 1665.

The proprietors sought and obtained a new charter on June 30, 1665, ostensibly to correct the potential problem resulting from the 1663 charter having been granted before the Heath charter of 1629 had been declared void by an order in council. The new charter was very similar to the 1663 charter, but it did include a few amendments. These changes included a slightly different wording for the religious toleration provision and a new clause in which the proprietors were given "full power and authority to erect, Constitute, and make several Counties, Baronies and Colonies" and to make for them "laws and Constitutions ... according to their best discretion...." n367

§ 6.12(g) The Fundamental Constitutions of 1669.

§ 6.12(g)(1) The Feudal Scheme of the Fundamental Constitutions.

In 1669 the proprietors were ready to implement a plan of government that more nearly reflected the enormous feudal powers they had obtained through their charters, even though it meant reducing the rights of the settlers. On July 21, 1669, they adopted their "Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina," which they often referred to as their Grand Model:

> The Fundamental Constitutions were never implemented in their entirety, but they shaped the early history of the North Carolina colony. For two decades the government of the colony was a modified form of the system provided in the Grand Model. For many decades the governmental institutions of the colony bore the imprint of the Constitutions. In fact, certain features of North Carolina courts today, such as the method of selecting jurors, were provided in the Fundamental Constitutions. Furthermore, events in the colony, such as the so-called rebellions, were due in part to the way in which the colony was governed. n368

Even though never fully implemented, the scheme of the Fundamental Constitutions as it related to landholding should be described:

> The Fundamental Constitutions provided for the entire province of Carolina, instead of each county, to be a palatinate. The counties were to be the chief divisions of the province. Members of an hereditary nobility, who were to be feudal lords, were to be distributed equally among the counties. Land in each county was to be distributed systematically among feudal lords and freeholders, and governmental power was to be allocated according to modes of land tenure. By those means the proprietors undertook to establish and maintain in Carolina a "balance of Government" which would institute and perpetuate a feudal society and aristocratic control. n369

According to the arrangement linking governmental power with one's land tenure, the proprietors and hereditary nobility were to have control of the provincial government, with only limited participation by freeholders; in the local agencies of government, on the other hand, the freeholders were to be dominant; "serfs" or "leetmen" had no governmental role but were to be completely within the jurisdiction of the manorial courts, in accordance with their medieval models; slaves were to be entirely within the control of their masters.

Even from the beginning, the system of government described in the Fundamental Constitutions was not implemented. The proprietors apparently realized that differing circumstances in individual settlements required modification, so the plan of a centralized provincial government was abandoned at the very outset. Instead, the scheme of the Fundamental Constitutions was "temporarily" customized for each colony, first for the Virginia settlement in Albemarle County, and then for another settlement that had arisen at Port Royal, in territory that was to become part of South Carolina.

§ 6.12(g)(2) Landholding Under the Fundamental Constitutions.

Sometime in 1670 the Albemarle government was reorganized along the lines of the Fundamental Constitutions, but scarcity of early records makes it difficult to determine whether these changes had any important impact on the settlement or its landholding practices. In 1671 the colony's governor complained to the proprietors that a revised version of the Constitutions reinstated certain land policies offensive to the settlers that the proprietors had earlier agreed to withdraw. The proprietors made no response to any of the complaints and questions raised by the settlers over the next several years. Disorder arose over uncertainty about the legitimacy and competency of officials exercising governmental authority. As already mentioned, a central source of discontent and disorder in Albemarle was the land policy of the proprietors:

> The disturbances in Albemarle expressed a constant dissatisfaction which at times became desperation. The causes of discontent were many. Not only were the colonists confused regarding the legality of their government, dissatisfied with the form and conduct of the government, and frustrated by the seeming indifference of the proprietors, but they also were burdened with discouragement due to policies and conditions that made it impossible for them to prosper financially.
>
> One obstacle to prosperity was the land policy of the proprietors. Albemarle settlers sought large tracts of good land, for they wanted plantations similar to those in Virginia. The proprietors, on the other hand, visualized a province composed in large measure of compact settlements; they reserved large land-holdings for themselves, the nobility, and a few lords of manors. Consequently, their policies were designed to prevent colonists from obtaining large plantations. Furthermore, to attain their ideal of a systematically distributed population, the proprietors developed a method of land distribution that took no account of geographical realities, and they imposed conditions for retaining land which kept the colonists in perpetual danger of forfeiture. Under the proprietors' early policies, a settler could not be certain that even his small allotment would consist of good land; he might find that most or all of it was swamp. If he did get good land, he was in constant danger of losing it because of inability to meet the proprietors' conditions for retaining it. n370

It thus appears that the proprietors were relentless in pursuing their objective to create a feudal colony in North Carolina. Their instructions to the Albemarle governor in 1667, the offensive Albemarle legislation in 1668 and 1669, and the Fundamental Constitutions sent to Albemarle in 1670 all tended to negate land rights which the settlers had obtained in the past (land titles obtained from the Virginia Council or from Indians were nullified) and to abandon the policies of the Great Deed of Grant that had been favorable to the small settlers. Moreover, the proprietors almost never responded to the written petitions and protests, and they failed to reconstitute or reorganize the government as appointments expired or vacancies arose.

A long period of violence and disorder followed, with various local settlers vying for political leadership positions and with the proprietors refusing to take any action at all. At length, in 1679, a new governor was appointed, and he was given instructions and a formal document containing a plan for reinstituting stable government in Albemarle. The instructions for Albemarle were contained in a document called "Temporary Laws," adopted on February 5, 1679; they remained in effect until the plan of the Fundamental Constitutions as a whole was suspended in 1691. In these instructions the proprietors apparently tried to adopt land policies more acceptable to the settlers: the governor and the council issued patents confirming pre-1663 land grants from Virginia at a quitrent of one farthing per acre; new grants were issued for land obtained after 1663 at a quitrent of a half penny per acre. For new arrivals, however, the quitrent on their allotments remained at one penny per acre. n371

In 1680, Virginia, which had reasserted a claim to the Albemarle region, sent tax collectors to the settlements there in attempts to collect taxes and quitrents.

Even though the land policies embodied in the Fundamental Constitutions were occasionally modified to meet settlers' objections, the basic land regulations and practices embodied in that document remained in effect until the government was reorganized in 1691. The provisions of the Fundamental Constitutions of 1669 dealing with land management practices or property rights not previously discussed in this section may be summarized as follows:

> 63. Only a freeholder with at least 50 acres could be a juror in a precinct court.
>
> 64. "It shall be a base and vile thing to Plead for money or Reward ..."
>
> 73. "Since multiplicity of Comments, as well as of laws, have great inconveniences, and Serve only to obscure and perplex, all manner of comments and expositions on any part of these fundamental constitutions, or on any part of the Common or Statute law of Carolina, are absolutely prohibited."
>
> 74. A registrar in every precinct shall enroll deeds, leases and judgments.
>
> 91. "No person above seventeen years of Age shall have any benefit or protection of the law, or be capable of any place of profit or honor, who is not a member of Some church or profession, having his name recorded in Some one, and but one Religion Record at once."
>
> 103. Whoever possesses a freehold shall, after 1689, pay an annual rent of one penny per acre.

§ 6.12(g)(3) The Demise of the Fundamental Constitutions.

As disorder and dissent under the Fundamental Constitutions continued, the proprietors attempted to make adjustments. Two revisions in 1682 were intended to meet objections from groups proposing to settle in the colony. Finally, in 1691 the proprietors informally and in 1693 officially suspended the Fundamental Constitutions. A new version in 1698 was never fully implemented. For all the controversy, it should be said that neither a landed nobility nor serfdom ever developed in North Carolina. Many of the large grants were never located or surveyed, and their legality was later denied; the feudal seigniories usually declined into ordinary proprietary holdings and eventually into plantations. n372 The rough and disorderly early history of this colony can be traced to not only the unrealistic land and other policies, but also to gross neglect and mismanagement by the proprietors and their appointees.

Despite the inadequacies and anachronisms of the Fundamental Constitutions, they did help to establish a system of representative government that eventually led to the demise of the proprietary system in North Carolina. Between 1689 and 1713, the administration of Carolina was formally divided between North Carolina and South Carolina; thereafter, the crown took over the colonies and in 1729 created the royal provinces of North and South Carolina.

§ 6.12(h) Other Laws of Colonial North Carolina Related to Landholding.

Until 1751, the laws of the colony were prepared and circulated only in manuscript form. The first printing in 1751 gave the full text of only the laws then in force, while obsolete or repealed acts were indicated by title only. The property-related legislation from the 1751 edition of North Carolina laws is summarized below, to help indicate that the North Carolina colonists were dealing with the same everyday real property issues as their contemporaries in other colonies:

1715:

Ch. XX: disposal of goods taken for execution; and for better regulation of distresses, for levies and quitrents.

Ch. XXVII: old titles of lands; limitation of actions.

Ch. XXVIII: passing of lands when the estate is in a feme covert.

Ch. XXIX: preventing disputes concerning lands already surveyed.

Ch. XXX: escheat lands and escheators.

Ch. XXXIII: regulating abuses in taking up lands; the method of taking up and surveying lands.

Ch. XXXVI: roads and ferries.

Ch. XXXVIII: appointment of public registers; method for conveying lands, goods, and chattels and for preventing fraudulent deeds and mortgages.

Ch. XLV: fences.

Ch. XLVIII: proving wills, granting letters of administration, and managing intestates' estates.

Ch. XLIX: orphans.

Ch. LIX: securing to Indians the right and property of their own lands.

Ch. LXIV [an example of private legislation related to landholding]: "An Act, impowering Johanna Peterson, Widow of Thomas Peterson, late of Albemarle County, Esq; to make Sale of Certain Lands, late belonging to the said Thomas Peterson; and to make other Provision for Ann, the Daughter of the said Thomas Peterson, to whom the said Lands do descend."

Ch. LXV [another example of private legislation related to landholding]: "An Act, Confirming the Titles of sundry Persons who have, or hereafter may, purchase Lands of Col. Thomas Cary, in Bath County."1723:

Ch. IV: settling titles and bounds of lands.

Ch. X: additional act on proving wills, granting letters of administration, and preventing fraud in managing intestates' estates.

1729:

Ch. II: for more quiet settling the bounds of certain Indian lands.

Ch. VI: for more effectual and speedy administration of the act for settling the titles and bounds of lands.

Ch. VII: confirming the Bath-Town common.

1740:

Ch. I [an example of granting municipal privileges]: "An Act, for Confirming Titles to the Town Lands of Edenton, for securing the Privileges heretofore granted to the said Town, and for further Encouragement and better Regulation thereof."

Ch. IX: exempting inhabitants of Bath from working on the public roads, and obliging them to clear and keep the town streets clear and in good order.

Ch. X: quitrents payable to the crown.

1741:

Ch. XXI: for relief of persons who have suffered from official neglect in recording deeds or who through ignorance have not had their deeds or conveyances acknowledged or recorded.

1743:

Ch. IV: regulating attorney fees.

1748 [second session]:

Ch. III: ascertaining bounds of certain Indian lands, and preventing settling or taking of such lands, by purchase or otherwise, so long as they are occupied by the Indians.

Ch. IV: forming a rent-roll of all lands in the province; quieting possession, and directing payment of quitrents.

1749:

Ch. IV: directing the method for cutting or docking entails of small estates.

1749 [second session]:

Ch. I: putting in force in the province certain enumerated statutes of England.

1749 [third session]:

Ch. IV: enabling justices to obtain law books for county courts.

1751:

Ch. III: additional act on feme coverts conveying their estates in land. n373

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 334. 1 Editorial Note in The Earliest Printed Laws of North Carolina (John D. Cushing ed. 1977). Paul Finkelman, Exploring Southern Legal History, 64 N.C.L. Rev. 77 (1985).

(n2)Footnote 335. Stephen T. Newcomb, The Native American Struggle: Conquering the Rule of Law: A Colloquium; The Evidence of Christian Nationalism in Federal Indian Law: The Doctrine of Discovery, Johnson v. Mcintosh, and Plenary Power, 20 N.Y.U. Rev. L. & Soc. Change 303, 326 (1993).

(n3)Footnote 336. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 5 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n4)Footnote 337. Id. at 6.

(n5)Footnote 338. "Denizen" ordinarily means an inhabitant or resident, although in British usage it may also mean a foreigner who is permitted certain rights of citizenship.

(n6)Footnote 339. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 7 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n7)Footnote 340. Id. at 8.

(n8)Footnote 341. Id. at 11-12.

(n9)Footnote 342. David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from A Shared History Part II: How Anglo-American Land Law Diverged After American Colonization and Independence, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 295 (Summer, 1999).

(n10)Footnote 343. Id. at 19-20.

(n11)Footnote 344. Id. at 30.

(n12)Footnote 345. Id. at 48.

(n13)Footnote 346. Id. at 64-65.

(n14)Footnote 347. Id. at 65. The "Bishop of Durham" clause refers to the traditional expectation held of the bishop of Durham, located on the Scottish border, to help protect English land from foreign enemies who intruded on English land. To fulfill these expectations, the bishop enjoyed almost regal powers, including rights to enact laws, impose taxes, prepare for and conduct warfare, among others.

(n15)Footnote 348. Id. at 66.

(n16)Footnote 349. Id. at 66-67.

(n17)Footnote 350. Id. at 68-69.

(n18)Footnote 351. Id. at 70.

(n19)Footnote 352. Id.

(n20)Footnote 353. William S. Powell, North Carolina, A Bicentennial History 21-22 (1977).

(n21)Footnote 354. Id. at 22; 1 "Introduction," in North Carolina Higher-Court Records 1670-1696 xv (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1968).

(n22)Footnote 355. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 77 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n23)Footnote 356. Id. at 78.

(n24)Footnote 357. Id. at 80.

(n25)Footnote 358. Id. at 84.

(n26)Footnote 359. Id. at 84-85.

(n27)Footnote 360. Id. at 85.

(n28)Footnote 361. Id. at 86.

(n29)Footnote 362. Id. at 107-127.

(n30)Footnote 363. "Introduction" in North Carolina Higher-Court Records , 1670-1696 xx-xxi (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1968).

(n31)Footnote 364. Id. at xxxiii-xxxiv.

(n32)Footnote 365. 1 The Earliest Printed Laws of North Carolina, 1669-1751 following p. 353 (John D. Cushing ed. 1977).

(n33)Footnote 366. North Carolina Higher-Court Records , 1670-1696 xxxvi (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1968).

(n34)Footnote 367. Id. at 94.

(n35)Footnote 368. Id. at xxiii.

(n36)Footnote 369. Id.

(n37)Footnote 370. Id. at xxxi-xxxii.

(n38)Footnote 371. Id. at lv.

(n39)Footnote 372. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 26 (1904).

(n40)Footnote 373. 1 The Earliest Printed Laws of North Carolina, 1669-1751 1-353 (John D. Cushing ed. 1977).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.13

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.13 Development of Property Law in South Carolina (from 1670).

§ 6.13(a) Summary of South Carolina's Early Settlement History Shared with North Carolina.

South Carolina holds most of its earliest colonial history, and the foundation of its property rights, in common with North Carolina. These shared beginnings are discussed in detail in § 6.12(a)-(d), supra. The beginnings lie late in the 16th century, as a charter was granted to Sir Humphrey Gilbert in 1578, giving property and governmental rights to unoccupied North American lands, on condition that settlement be commenced within six years. A settlement was commenced within that time but survived only a few months, so a similar grant was conferred on Sir Walter Raleigh in 1584. Raleigh's ill-fated colony on Roanoke Island had entirely disappeared by the time a delayed supply ship was able to reach the site in 1590. Landholding was probably exercised communally during these colonizing ventures.

South Carolina territory next came under the jurisdiction of the Virginia Company according to its charter of 1606, discussed in detail in § 6.02(a), supra. The focal point of this company's colonial efforts in Jamestown did not have any direct effect on the Carolina territory until about 50 years after Jamestown was founded, when Virginia settlers moved into what is now northeastern North Carolina. The Virginia colonial regulations were revised by a new charter in 1609, discussed in § 6.02(b), supra, and again by a third charter in 1612, discussed in § 6.02(c), supra. All the charters were revoked in 1624, when Virginia Colony reverted to the English crown. By that time, still no permanent colony had arisen in Carolina territory.

With rights to the territory back in the hands of the monarch, King Charles I granted to his attorney general Robert Heath a huge tract that included virtually all of North and South Carolina. The grant extended from Virginia to Spanish Florida, and from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, and is discussed in connection with North Carolina settlement in § 6.12(b), supra. Neither Heath nor any of his assignees were able to commence a colonization effort, so eventually the crown considered the grant lapsed and re-granted the territory in 1663. Claimants and their successors in interest under the Heath tract, after a long battle, were later able to establish their rights to some land and were awarded a compensatory tract in New York. More pertinent to South Carolina, however, was the fact that the 1629 charter set the pattern for the 1663 charter in defining the property rights of the Carolina colonists. The most noteworthy features of the 1663 charter, as explained in § 6.12(d), supra, were its provisions for representative government, for broad feudal powers resting in the private proprietors, and for authority in the proprietors to create a colonial nobility. The grant under the 1663 charter was revised and expanded under an additional charter in 1665 to extend north to southern Virginia and south to St. Augustine, in present-day Florida.

§ 6.13(b) The Earliest Settlements in South Carolina.

Early in 1663 a group of colonists from Massachusetts tried to establish a settlement in South Carolina territory, but they abandoned the attempt after only a few months. Then, in 1665, Barbadians settled at the same site and planned a second community, but they had abandoned both the actual and the planned settlements by 1667. A short time later, in 1669, a detailed set of rules for colonial government and property rights called the Fundamental Constitutions was announced by the Carolina proprietors, and this is discussed in detail in § 6.12(g), supra. It was under the auspices of this frame of government and of a separate governor appointed for South Carolina in 1669 that the founders of the first permanent settlement in South Carolina established their site in March 1670, at the site of present-day Charleston. More precisely, the Fundamental Constitutions were actually suspended until the new colony obtained a greater population. In their place, the proprietors directed that executive and judicial powers be exercised by a Grand Council, composed of proprietors' deputies, freemen, and the governor.

Dissent arose over this form of government, and two dissenters protested that their land rights could not be secured until a regular parliamentary assembly was chosen, which would then confirm their past land grants. A parliament was held in July 1670. In August 1671, the proprietors issued a set of temporary laws for this first South Carolina colony:

> These [temporary laws] reveal anew the fact that the board intended to force upon the province the most important provisions of the [Fundamental] Constitutions. These temporary laws provided for an elaborate official system like that of England, for the development as rapidly as possible of the provincial nobility and its incorporation with the council, and for the exercise by the council of the right of initiation and the other powers prescribed for the grand council in the Constitutions. Parliaments were to be called biennially. The creation of landgraves also began at this time, and the governor and council were ordered to have their baronies surveyed when any of the provincial nobility should desire it. n374

The colony failed to progress satisfactorily, and the proprietors were required to make additional investments; they had also agreed to forego quitrents for a period of twenty years (1669-1689). A systematic survey of lands proved too difficult because of the numerous inland waterways and the irregular coastline; and "after the very early days the settlers refused to establish themselves in compact townships, but spread out in isolated plantations along the rivers." n375

> Only the city of Charles Town itself, to which the settlers moved in 1680, met some of the proprietors' expectations. Laid out on the neck of land between the Ashley and Cooper rivers with streets intersecting at right angles according to their instructions, it was one of the first planned cities in North America. Contemporaries were convinced that these arrangements would enable them to "avoid the undecent and incommodious irregularities which other Inglish Collonies are fallen into for want of any early care in laying out the Townes." n376

In 1682 several hundred English Presbyterians and other dissenters and a smaller body of Scottish Presbyterians immigrated to the province. The Scots induced by the prospect of an extended quitrent exemption but also bound to swear submission to the Fundamental Constitution as a condition of receiving land allotments settled at Port Royal, which was wiped out by the Spanish only three years later.

§ 6.13(c) Political Turmoil Centered on Land Issues.

Before the Spanish massacre, a division into three counties was ordered, but at first only one of them, Berkeley County, was even partially organized for its local government functions. The proprietors directed that future land grants must include a re-entry clause enabling the proprietors to recover the property if quitrents were not timely paid, and requiring payment in coin. Meanwhile, the proprietors also stepped up their efforts to have the Fundamental Constitutions fully accepted by the colonists. The 1669 version was repudiated for the 1682 version, but the legislators rejected that, too, with a unanimous declaration that the province should be governed solley by the terms of its charter. No new laws were passed, and the temporary laws expired in 1690; by that time, no statute at all was in force in South Carolina.

A five-year period of persistent political disturbance followed, unrelieved by any generally accepted source of law for the colony. When a new governor was appointed in 1695, he carried new powers from the proprietors that were used to reach accords. Because most of the unrest was over land issues, settlement of those issues was also essential in stabilizing the government:

> [The legislature] immediately tackled the increasingly thorny issue of land titles and quitrents. The latter had been due since 1690 and, though the proprietors had reluctantly agreed to accept them in commodities appropriate for the English market as well as in coin, South Carolinians had not been paying. [Governor] Archdale and the assembly worked out a compromise. Speaking for the proprietors, he refused to give up the reentry clause previously incorporated into recent land grants but agreed to make no similar changes in the future without giving prior notice; he arranged for the outright sale of lands by the proprietors at a price considerably lower than what they had hitherto asked; he approved the payment of quitrents in purely local commodities, and he remitted part of the currently overdue rents. In return, he asked that the assembly make provision to repay the funds advanced by the proprietors over the last twenty-five years, to enforce the payment of quitrents, and to build a fort at Charles Town. The assembly agreed to the last and, in lieu of the first, arranged to pay the back salary of several proprietary governors. More important, the house also passed a strict law designed to ensure the payment of quitrents (though some individuals still managed to evade them). Finally, because this reasonably comprehensive settlement was supposed to be perpetual, Archdale permitted the assembly to stipulate that these laws could not be changed without its consent. This was more than the other proprietors could bring themselves explicitly to approve, and they never formally ratified these acts. But their failure to exercise a veto permitted the laws to remain in force for more than twenty years, during which the assembly came to regard them as establishing its right to enact legislation with which the proprietors could not subsequently tamper. Later in the decade, the house also demanded the right to repeal acts which the proprietors had approved. n377

The province nevertheless failed to produce more benefits than problems for the proprietors. A formal separation of South Carolina from North Carolina was effected in 1710; the proprietors, however, managed to retain actual title to the land and it was not until 1729 that the title was changed by purchase, the land reverted to the crown, and the royal provinces of North and South Carolina were established.

§ 6.13(d) Landholding Issues in the Later Colonial Period.

After takeover of the colony by the crown, governing officials in the 1730s promoted township arrangements similar to those that were so common in New England. In the South Carolina scheme, townships of 20,000 acres, or a square approximately six miles in each dimension, were reserved for new settlers who would agree to locate in close proximity to one another. Each family would be allotted a town lot, fifty acres of outlying land, and an attractive package of other benefits: exemption from quitrents for ten years; cost of conveyance and surveying paid by the government; and public assistance with costs of tools, food and transportation. These so-called land bounties were available not only to new immigrants but also to indentured servants who were finishing their time. By the 1760's thirteen such townships had been established, and by 1770 these inducements had led to a population with three-quarters of the inhabitants living outside the older settlements.

By holding out hope of better frontier security, the township scheme was one of several factors that dramatically increased the demand for South Carolina land in the 1730's. Also, since the proprietors had closed the land office more than a decade earlier, much demand had become pent up during that time. Improved market conditions for rice also increased interest in acquiring acreage for rice lands. Before new grants of land could be made to meet this demand, however, a long and serious controversy over quit rents had to be resolved:

> There was no difficulty in working out the basic terms of a new [1731] quitrent act with the legislature: in return for remission of arrears in payment, all who held land from the proprietors would be required to register it with the appropriate officials and receive new grants. Thus the crown would presumably have an accurate roll of all lands on which it would be collecting quitrents. n378

Many speculators and planters resorted to unscrupulous devices to obtain grants to large tracts of land, despite the authority of the 1731 Quit Rent Act and the official policy encouraging smallholders. Moreover, the act did not require registration of lands acquired by private conveyance or by royal grant in the future. Even though these omissions were corrected by legislation in 1744, the collection of quitrents was lax, amounting to less than 20% of the total due by the time of the Revolution.

The initial acquisition of land in South Carolina was remarkably easy, especially for those induced to come "under the bounty":

> All an individual had to do was to petition the governor and council, who then issued a warrant authorizing the surveyor to stake out a tract of so many acres (during most of the colonial period, fifty or 100 for each member of the petitioner's family). The recipient or his surveyor chose an unoccupied site, made a survey, and returned the surveyor's map or plat to the proper office. In turn, a grant was issued in the name of the proprietors or the crown. [F]or most of the colonial period, grants provided a way for men and women of modest means to acquire land, and most grants were in fact made to them. n379

Eventually, it became clear that most of the low land fell into the hands of large landholders, while small farmers concentrated in the back country on farms averaging about 175 acres in size.

§ 6.13(e) Colonial Statutes Relating to Landholding.

In 1736, a mere seven years after South Carolina became a royal province, a retrospective collection of South Carolina laws was published, covering the period from the time of the earliest settlement to when the crown took over the province. A review of the laws then in force relating to landholding gives additional insight into the real property issues faced by South Carolina colonists. Following is a summary of the subjects of that early legislation relating to property rights and landholding, with the year of enactment indicated:

> Prevention of nuisances (1692).
>
> Escheat for nonpayment of quitrents (1694).
>
> Fences (1694).
>
> Payment of arrears in rents (1695).
>
> Forms of purchase grants (1696).
>
> Prevention of double mortgages and conveyances (1698).
>
> Encouraging immigration (1712).
>
> "An Act to put in Force in this Province the several Statutes of the kingdom of England, or South-Britain" (1712).

Limitation of actions (1712).

Collecting back taxes (1721).

Quitrents (1731).

Making effectual wills (1734). n380

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 374. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 215 (1904).

(n2)Footnote 375. Robert M. Weir, Colonial South Carolina, A History 61 (1983).

(n3)Footnote 376. Id. at 61-62.

(n4)Footnote 377. Id. at 69-70.

(n5)Footnote 378. Id. at 113.

(n6)Footnote 379. Id. at 148.

(n7)Footnote 380. The Earliest Printed Laws of South Carolina, 1692-1734 vol. 1, 67-541; vol. II, 23-141 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.14

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.14 Development of Property Law in Georgia (from 1732).

§ 6.14(a) The Charter of 1732.

Georgia was the last of the thirteen English colonies in America to be formed and the only colony of the thirteen to be governed by trustees. England's desire to bring more settlers into the frontier areas of its South Carolina colony came together with the philanthropic motives of James Oglethorpe to produce the youngest of the American colonies:

> The plan for the colony originated with James Edward Oglethorpe, an English gentleman of good family, who had served with distinction under Prince Eugene of Savoy, and later had entered the House of Commons. Oglethorpe's sympathies having been enlisted on behalf of imprisoned debtors and discharged prisoners, he conceived the idea of establishing in America a colony where worthy persons of those classes could get a new start in life. The charter granted to trustees certain territory south of the Savannah river, which had originally formed part of South Carolina, but had been retained by the Crown when the Carolinas were surrendered by the proprietors in 1729. To this was added the one-eighth interest retained by Carteret at the time of the surrender, and which he now conveyed to the trustees. The charter was surrendered in 1752, and Georgia became a royal province. n381

The provisions of the 1732 Charter from George II to Oglethorpe and the other trustees relating to property rights and landholding are as follows:

> Reasons for the Charter:
>
> Whereas we are credibly informed, that many of our poor subjects are, through misfortunes and want of employment, reduced to great necessity, insomuch as by their labor they are not able to provide a maintenance for themselves and families; and if they had means to defray their charges of passage, and other expences, incident to new settlements, they would be glad to settle in any of our provinces in America where by cultivating the lands, at present waste and desolate, they might not only gain a comfortable subsistence for themselves and families, but also strengthen our colonies and increase the trade, navigation and wealth of these our realms.

The Grant:

[W]e have ... willed, ordained, constituted and appointed ... for us, our heirs and successors, that our right trusty and well-beloved [trustees] ... be, and shall be one body politic and corporate ... and that they and their successors ... shall and may forever hereafter, be persons able and capable in the law, to purchase, have, take, receive [etc.] ... any manors, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, advowsons, liberties, privileges, jurisdictions, franchises, and other hereditaments ... in fee and in perpetuity, ... also estates for lives, and for years ...

The Tenure and the Quit rent:

[T]o be holden of us, our heirs and successors as of our honour of Hampton-court, in our county of Middlesex in free and common soccage, and not in capite, yielding, and paying therefor to us, our heirs and successors yearly forever, the sum of four shillings for every hundred acres of said lands, which the corporation shall grant, demise, plant, or settle ...

Legislative Power:

And we do hereby ordain ... that for and during the term of twenty-one years, to commence from the date of these our letters patent, the said corporation assembled for that purpose, shall and may form and prepare, laws, statutes and ordinances, fit and necessary for and concerning the government of the said colony, and not repugnant to the laws and statutes of England ...

*

[I]t shall and may be lawful for the said common council ... to distribute, convey, assign and set over such particular portions of lands, tenements and hereditaments ... unto such of our ... subjects ... upon such terms, and for such estates, and upon such rents, reservations and conditions as the same may be lawfully granted ...

No Land Grants for Trustees:

Provided always that no grants shall be made of any part of the said lands unto any person, being a member of said corporation, or to any other person in trust, for the benefit of any member of said corporation; and that no person having any estate or interest, in law or equity, in any part of the said lands, shall be capable of being a member of the said corporation, during the continuance of such estate or interest.

Land Grants Limited to 500 Acres:

Provided also, that no greater quantity of lands be granted, either entirely or in parcels, to or for the use, or in trust for any one person, than five hundred acres; and that all grants made contrary to the true intent and meaning hereof, shall be absolutely null and void.

Corporate Duration of 21 Years:

And we do ... ordain ... that the said corporation and their successors, shall have full power and authority, for and during the term of twenty-one years...

Requirement to Register Property Interests:

And our further will and pleasure is, that the said corporation and their successors, do from time to time, and at all times hereafter, register or cause to be registered, all such leases, grants, plantings, > conveyances, settlements, and improvements whatsoever, as shall at any time hereafter be made by, or in the name of said corporation, of any lands, tenements or hereditaments within the said province; and shall yearly send and transmit, or cause to be sent or transmitted, authentic accounts of such leases, grants, conveyances, settlements and improvements respectively, unto the auditor of the plantations for the time being, and also to our surveyor for the time being of our said province of South-Carolina ...

>
> Provided always ..., that all leases, grants and conveyances made by or in the name of said corporation, of any lands within the said province, or a memorial containing the substance and effect thereof, shall be registered with the auditor of the said plantations within the space of one year, to be computed from the date thereof, otherwise the same shall be void...
>
> Survey and Inspection for Quit rents:
>
> [To the auditor and surveyor] we do hereby grant full power and authority from time to time, as often as need shall require, to inspect and survey, such of the said lands and premises, as shall be demised, granted and settled as aforesaid: which said survey and inspection, we do hereby declare, to be intended to ascertain the quit rents which shall from time to time become due to us ... n382

§ 6.14(b) The Character of the Earliest Georgia Settlers.

Although it has long been the popular belief that Georgia was populated principally by paupers and imprisoned debtors, more recent research has yielded other information. Debtors were not sought from the prisons, and probably fewer than a dozen convicted debtors ever came to Georgia during the settlement period. Instead, the trustees sought out poor people from the English towns, who, as charity colonists, were then enabled to travel to Georgia at the expense of the trustees. Most were small tradespersons and artisans; sailors and soldiers were considered unfit; farmers were generally considered to be productive and therefore needed in England.

§ 6.14(c) The First Settlement at Savannah.

§ 6.14(c)(1) Securing Land Rights from the Indians.

When Oglethorpe selected the site for the first settlement, he conferred with the Indians there and received their permission for settlement. This led to more extensive negotiations with other tribes of the Creek Confederacy; in May 1733, they entered into a treaty ceding lands they were no longer using. n383

§ 6.14(c)(2) Laying Out the Town.

After an uneventful crossing, the site of modern Savannah was chosen for the first settlement. In a letter of February 10, 1733, to the trustees back in London, Oglethorpe described the first steps toward land allotment and distribution:

> Upon the River-side, in the Centre of this Plain, I have laid out the Town, opposite to which is an Island of very rich Pasturage, which I think should be kept for the Trustees Cattle ... I have marked out the Town and Common; half of the former is already cleared, and the first House was begun Yesterday in the Afternoon. A little Indian Nation, the only one within Fifty Miles, is not only at Amity, but desirous to be Subjects to his Majesty King George, to have Lands given them among us, and to breed their Children at our Schools. n384

The town layout at Savannah set the pattern for other Georgia towns during the trustee period and was itself probably derived from South Carolina's 1730 township plan. Each block, called a tithing, consisted of ten house lots sixty by ninety feet. Four tithings made up a ward, and each ward had a public square in the middle. Trustee lots were reserved for churches, markets and stores. Eventually, the Savannah township consisted of 24 square miles, or 15,360 acres.

Twelve thousand of those acres were intended for private grants (240 grants of 50 acres each), with the balance reserved for roads, streets, commons, and other trustee reserves:

> Immediately beyond the area of the town were the triangular shaped garden lots, which with the building lots, made up five acres to each grantee. Here settlers were supposed to raise vegetables and other garden truck for their tables. Beyond the garden lots were the forty-five acre farm lots where mulberry trees, corn, and other crops were to be planted. Beyond these farm lots, and outside the planned township area, were to be the larger grants of adventurers. The location of adventurer grants was never so rigidly controlled as were those of charity settlers. There were always settlements outside this basic plan, such as the outsettlements around Savannah. n385

The main motivation for this plan was to keep the settlers in fairly close proximity with one another, as a defense against aggression by the Spanish or French. The contiguous settlement pattern did not, however, take into account the varying quality of farm land in the outlying grants. Many settlers complained bitterly about the poor quality of the farm land grants assigned to them in such systematic fashion and a few were allowed to exchange lands, but only after months of struggle on the unfit farmland. Another difficulty with land grants in the townships was that the colony's surveyor could not keep up with the needs of the settlers.

§ 6.14(d) Conflict Over the Tenure of Early Land Grants.

Formal land grant regulations were not announced by the trustees until 1735, but even before that time the land grants probably conformed to the pattern expressed in the regulations. The regulations included:

> A limited grant of fifty acres for each head of a family,
>
> A restriction against alienation except by special permission from the trustees,
>
> A requirement that granted land be cleared and cultivated within ten years from the grant, or else the grant would revert,
>
> In order to commence silk production, a requirement that 100 mulberry trees be planted for every ten acres cleared, and
>
> Inheritance, or tenure, by fee tail-male only.

This latter limitation gave the most significant cause for colonists' concerns. From the beginning the colonists complained that the grants were not in fee simple, but rather in fee tail-male, meaning that the land could descend only to male heirs and only so long as the line of male heirs continued:

> The tail-male provision applied to charity and adventurer grants and was designed to insure a soldier upon each fifty acres. This provision undoubtedly kept many prospective settlers from coming to Georgia, but it was never rigidly enforced. If there was no male heir, women were freely allowed to inherit land upon special application of the Trustees. Tail-male was intended to aid in defense, to control the settlers coming into Georgia, to prevent the unfortunate charity settlers from losing their land, and to prevent individuals from acquiring more than the prescribed five hundred acres. Georgia was intended for unfortunates who would labor upon small land grants, not for economic opportunists to achieve wealth. n386

The restriction on alienation of lands held by the charity settlers was intended effectively to prevent them from divesting their landholdings in return for some more temporary or ephemeral form of wealth, or to prevent their lands from falling into the hands of creditors. More realistic, however, were the complaints from the colonists that tail-male tenure was of questionable validity under current English law, and that they were unable to lease, mortgage or sell their lands, unless they obtained special permission from the trustees.

In 1738, three years after the 1735 trustee regulations were announced, 119 freeholders of Savannah petitioned the trustees to allow fee simple grants. After an investigation, the trustees denied the petition. Thereupon, Georgia settlers sent an even broader petition the next year:

> asking that land might be granted where it was convenient to the settlers, that excessive quitrents be relaxed, that constables and tithingmen be under the order of the Trustees and the magistrates only, and that the people be allowed to choose their own bailiffs. n387

Eventually, beginning in 1739, the trustees worked out extensive revisions in the land grant policies and included them in a complete land regulation which was adopted by Parliament in 1742 (but never given royal approval):

> Inheritance of land was now allowed to wives, daughters, other relatives, and any heirs at law when there was no member of the immediate family to inherit. Widows were guaranteed all the rights of inheritance they had in England. Colonists could now acquire through inheritance or marriage up to two thousand acres and could lease their lands for not over twenty-one years. White mulberry planting for cleared land was reduced to a hundred trees for every fifty acres, and land did not need to be cleared and cultivated on as rapid a schedule as originally specified. These changes did not affect the basic land policy of the trustees, which required colonists to hold land in tail-male, except that adequate inheritance provisions were made where there was no male heir. Lands still could not be bought and sold freely. n388

In 1750 the trustees abolished tail-male, some quit rents, and limitations on land ownership. n389

§ 6.14(e) Controversy Over Quitrents.

Under the 1732 charter, quitrents were set at four schillings per hundred acres, would not be payable until ten years after the land grants were made, and -- although paid to the trustees -- were ultimately to be given to the crown. In 1735 the trustees introduced a five-fold increase on grants to adventurers. At the time, this new rate was the highest quitrent anywhere in the American colonies. The trustees suggested various reforms in 1741 and 1742, but none were approved by the Privy Council. Thus, in 1745 the trustees directed that rent rolls be prepared so collection could begin; in the end, however, no rent rolls were prepared, and no collection took place during the trustee period, which ended in 1752.

§ 6.14(f) Changes in Landholding Patterns.

Not all landholding was controlled by the trustees and their officials. Some grants were abandoned and then taken up by others, without any form of permission or legality. Some ungranted lands were simply taken over, especially by those who entered the colony in some capacity other than settlers under the trustees. By 1742 the process of consolidating small landholdings into larger plantations had already begun. The earliest consolidations probably resulted from remarriages of widows, who obtained trustee permission to join their landholdings with those of their new husbands.

§ 6.14(g) Landholding in Colonial Georgia Under Royal Administration.

Once the trusteeship of George reverted to the crown in 1752, most landholding arrangements remained as they were, but several important changes in official land policy took place. Land was still granted free of charge, with the exception of surveying and land office fees. Headright grants were still available, at the rate of 100 acres for the head of the family and fifty acres for each other family member, and additional land for new family members. Larger headright grants could be obtained if the grantee could show an ability to use the additional land.

Coastal lands, of course, were the first to be granted, and by 1760 almost all good coastal land up to the boundary of Indian lands had been taken up. By the Treaty of Augusta of November 10, 1763, the Creeks ceded an additional 2,400,000 acres of land, which opened significant new territory and high quality land to Georgians. By 1772, most of the desirable land from this Indian cession had been granted. Another Indian cession occurred in 1773, but this time it was agreed that the Indians would be paid, so the land was sold (for sixpence an acre) rather than given to settlers, and sale proceeds were to be given to the Indians.

Consolidation of holdings, well under way during the trusteeship, accelerated during the crown colony years, but with the earlier emphasis on small holdings, never reached the extent of large holdings in neighboring South Carolina.

To meet the growing problem of abandoned lands, the new royal governor was instructed to make records for all trustee grants that were inadequately documented and then to issue new grants. Later, a local rule gave absentee owners three years to either record their trustee grant or forfeit it to the colony.

The rather onerous clearing and cultivating requirements were originally set at 5% annually, but in 1758 this was relaxed in several ways. Although records are inconclusive, quit rents were probably never collected even during the crown colony period. Nevertheless, a protest against quit rents was raised by some Georgians on the eve of the Revolution. n390

§ 6.14(h) Georgia Colonial Statutes Related to Landholding.

In 1762 a printer was commissioned to print Georgia colonial legislation then in force which, in published form, amounted to 35 separate acts passed between 1755 and 1763. The provisions of those laws and of subsequent legislation that relate to property rights and landholding in colonial Georgia are summarized below:

Confirming sales of land by attorneys or agents, and ascertaining the proof of instruments or writings (1757).

Preventing private persons from purchasing lands from the Indians (1758, 1765).

Limiting the time for persons claiming lands by virtue of warrants of surveys, allotments, nominal titles, or possession, derived from the late trustees or from others acting under their authority (1758).

Regulating fences (1759).

Preventing the building of wooden chimneys in Savannah; providing against accidental fires (1759, 1763).

Enabling feme coverts (married women) to convey their estates and validating prior conveyances and acknowledgements (1760).

Subjecting to attachment real and personal estates of debtors (1761).

Ascertaining the commons land of Savannah (1761, 1766, 1770).

Preventing fraudulent mortgages and conveyances, and validating prior deeds and conveyances (1763, 1768).

Preventing the throwing of ballast, rubbish or falling trees into rivers and creeks (1763, 1765).

Empowering the General Court of Pleas to grant writs of partition of lands and tenements held in coparcenary, joint tenancy and tenancy in common, and prescribing procedures (1763, 1767).

Preventing damage from dams or banks used to reserve or stop water (1763).

Empowering surveyors to lay out public roads (1764, 1766, 1767).

Preventing trespass on lands of the crown or on Indian lands (1764).

Directing executors and administrators in returning inventories and accounts of estates, and permitting commissions therefor (1764).

Preventing frauds and abuses in laying out crown lands (1765).

Cultivating and improving lands; regulating surveying and marking of lines (1765).

Raising quitrent rates (1765).

Encouraging settlers [by granting township lots] (1766).

Limitation of actions (1767).

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 381. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 235 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n2)Footnote 382. Id. at 236-248. By-laws of the trustee corporation are published in 1 Allen D. Candler, The Colonial Records of the State of Georgia 31-42 (1904). Albert R. Saye, ed. Georgia's Charter of 1732 (1942).

(n3)Footnote 383. Kenneth Coleman, (ed.), A History Of Georgia, 18-19 (2d. ed. 1991).

(n4)Footnote 384. Id. at 27.

(n5)Footnote 385. Id. at 123.

(n6)Footnote 386. Id. at 122-123.

(n7)Footnote 387. Id. at 99.

(n8)Footnote 388. Id. at 124-125.

(n9)Footnote 389. Harold H. Martin, Georgia, A Bicentennial History 24-25 (1977).

(n10)Footnote 390. A History of Georgia 64 (2d ed. Kenneth Coleman ed. 1991).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 6.15

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 6.15 Bibliography.

[Go To Supp]

Books

Andrews, Charles McLean. The River Towns of Connecticut; a Study of Wethersfield, Hartford, and Windsor (1973).

Arnold, Samuel Greene. History of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations (1970).

Bachman, Van Cleaf. Peltries or Plantations; the Economic Policies of the Dutch West India Company in New Netherland, 1623-1639 (1969).

Bangs, Jeremy Dupertuis. Indian Deeds: Land Transactions in Plymouth Colony, 1620-1691 (2002).

Barbour, Philip L. The Jamestown Voyages under the First Charter, 1606-1609: Documents Relating to the Foundation of Jamestown and the History of the Jamestown Colony up to the Departure of Captain John Smith, Last President of the Council in Virginia under the First Charter, Early in October 1609 (1969).

Boyd, Julian P. Fundamental Laws and Constitutions of New Jersey, 1664-1964 (1964).

Cawthon, Elisabeth A. and David E. Narrett (eds.). Essays on English Law and the American Experience (Texas A & M University Press, 1994).

Chandler, Alfred N. Land Title Origins: A Tale of Force and Fraud (1945).

Coquillette, Daniel R. The Anglo-American Legal Heritage: Introductory Materials (Carolina Academic Press, 2004).

Elting, Irving. Dutch Village Communities on the Hudson River (1973).

Firey, Walter Irving. Land Use in Central Boston (1947).

Fischer, David Hackett. Albion's Seed: Four British Folkways in America (1989).

Gosling, William Gilbert. The Life of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, England's First Empire Builder (1970).

Harris, Marshall. Origin of the Land Tenure System in the United States (1953).

Hoffer, Peter C. Law and People in Colonial America (Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998).

Hogan, Charles John. Puritans and Meadows: the Interplay of English Culture and the American Environment in the Massachusetts Bay Colony, 1630-1660 (1986).

McConville, Brendan. These Daring Disturbers of the Public Peace: the Struggle for Property and Power in Early New Jersey (1999).

Mitchell, John Hanson. Trespassing: an Inquiry into the Private Ownership of Land (1998). Discusses history of land ownership in Massachusetts.

Munger, Donna B. Pennsylvania Land Records: a History and Guide for Research (1991).

Proud, Robert. The History of Pennsylvania, in North America, from the Original Institution and Settlement of That Province, under the First Proprietor and Governor, William Penn, in 1681, till after the Year 1742; with an Introduction Respecting the Life of W. Penn, Prior to the Grant of the Province, and the Religious Society of the People Called Quakers, with the First Rise of the Neighbouring Colonies, More Particularly of West-New-Jersey and the Settlement of the Dutch and Swedes on Delaware. To Which Is Added a Brief Description of the Said Province, and the General State in Which it Flourished, Principally Between the Years 1760-1770 with an Appendix. Written Principally Between the Years 1776 and 1780 (1967).

Offutt, William M., Jr. Of "Good Laws" and "Good Men": Law and Society in the Delaware Valley, 16801710. (Urbana and Chicago, IL.: University of Illinois Press, 1995).

Robertson, Lindsay G. Conquest by Law: How the Discovery of America Dispossessed Indigenous Peoples of Their Lands (Oxford University Press, 2005).

Salmon, Marylynn. Women and the Law of Property in Early America. (Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina Press, 1986).

Wilson, James G. The Court and the Empire. The Imperial Republic: A Structural History of American Constitutionalism from the Colonial Era to the Beginning of the Twentieth Century (2002).

Articles

Baker, Karl P. and Dwight H. Merriam. "Indelible Public Interests in Property: The Public Trust and Public Forum," 32 B.C. Envtl. Aff. L. Rev. 275 (2005).

Butler, Lynda L. "The Commons Concept: An Historical Concept with Modern Relevance." Wm. & Mary L. Rev. Vol. 23 (1982) 835.

Cohen, Charles E. "Eminent Domain After Kelo v. City of New London: An Argument for Banning Economic Development Takings," 29 Harv. J.L. Pub. Pol'y 491 (Spring, 2006).

di Bonaventura, Allegra. "Beating the Bounds: Property and Perambulation in Early New England," 19 Yale J.L. & Human. 115 (Summer 2007).

Ellickson, Robert C. "Unpacking the Household: Informal Property Rights Around the Hearth," 116 Yale L.J. 226 (November 2006).

Fritz, Christian G. "Recovering the Lost Worlds of America' Written Constitutions," 68 Albany L. Rev. 261 (2005).

Goble, Dale D. "Three Cases/Four Tales: Commons, Capture, the Public Trust, and Property in Land," 35 Envtl. L. 807 (Fall 2005).

Hart, John F. "Colonial Land Use Law and Its Significance for Modern Takings Doctrine." Harv. L. Rev. Vol. 109 (1996) 1252.

Hart, John F. "Land Use Law In The Early Republic and the Original Meaning of the Takings Clause." 94 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1099 (Summer 2000).

Leeds, Stacy L. "By Eminent Domain or Some Other Name: A Tribal Perspective on Taking Land," 41 Tulsa L. Rev. 51 (Fall 2005).

Legarre, Santiago. "The Historical Background of the Police Power," 9 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 745 (February, 2007).

Liebesman, Yvette Joy. "No Guarantees: Lessons from the Property Rights Gained and Lost by Married Women in Two American Colonies," 27 Women's Rts. L. Rep. 181 (2006).

Mann, Charles C. "America, Found & Lost," 211 National Geographic 32 (May 2007).

Nichols, Joel H. "Religious Liberty in the Thirteenth Colony: Church-State Relations in Colonial and Early National Georgia," 80 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 693 (December, 2005).

Priest, Claire. "Creating an American Property Law: Alienability and Its Limits in American History," 120 Harv. L. Rev. 385 (December, 2006).

Purdy, Jedediah. "A Freedom-Promoting Approach to Property: A Renewed Tradition for New Debates," 72 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1237 (Fall, 2005).

Purdy, Jedediah. "Property and Empire: The Law of Imperialism in Johnson v. M'Intosh," 75 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 329 (February, 2007).

Sax, Joseph L. "Why America Has a Property Rights Movement," 2006 U. Ill. L. Rev. 513.

Springer, James Warren. "American Indians and the Law of Real Property in Colonial New England." Am. J. Legal Hist. Vol. 30 (1986) 25.

Thomas, David A. "Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from a Shared History Part II: How Anglo-American Land Law Diverged After American Colonization and Independence," 34 Real Property, Probate and Trust J., 295-361 (Summer 1999).

Thomas, David A. "Is the Right to Private Property a Fundamental or an Economic Right?" ALI-ABA Course of Study on Eminent Domain and Land Value Litigation, SM006 ALI-ABA 33 (January 4-6, 2007).

Tomlins, Christopher. "In a Wilderness of Tigers: Violence, the Discourse of English Colonizing, and the Refusals of American History." Theoretical Inquiries L. Vol. 4 (July, 2003) 451.

Ward, Kathleen A. "Before and After the White Man: Indian Women, Property, Progress, and Power," 6 Conn. Pub. Int. L.J. 245267 (2007).vvvvv

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

Supp. To CHAPTER 6 DEVELOPMENT OF PROPERTY LAW IN ENGLAND'S AMERICAN COLONIES

1-6 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions Supp. to § 6.15

Supp. to § 6.15 Bibliography

[Go To Main]

Books

add:

Plane, Ann Marie. Colonial Intimacies: Indian Marriage in Early New England (2000).

Articles

add:

Banks, Taunya Lovell. "Dangerous Woman: Elizabeth Key's Freedom Suit-Subjecthood and Racialized Identity in Seventeenth Century Colonial Virginia," 41 Akron L. Rev. 799 (2008).

Brophy, Alfred L. "The Law Book in Colonial America: A History of the Book in America: The Colonial Book in the Atlantic World," 51 Buff. L. Rev. 1119 (Fall 2003).

Davenport, Erin P. "Idealized into Powerlessness: How a Judicial Order in Nebraska v. Safi Could Send Women's Rights Back to Colonial America," 12 U. Pa. J. L. & Soc. Change 1 (2008-2009).

Fernandez, Angela. "Record-Keeping and Other Troublemaking: Thomas Lechford and Law Reform in Colonial Massachusetts," 23 Law & Hist. Rev. 235 (Summer, 2005).

Lanier, E. R. "Love, Law, and Litigation in Colonial Georgia: The Trial and Tribulation of John Wesley in Savannah," 13 J. S. Legal Hist. 31 (2005).

Martin, Thomas C. "Haunted by History: Colonial Land Trusts Pose National Threat," 48 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 303 (October, 2006).

Nelson, William E. "Government by Judiciary: The Growth of Judicial Power in Colonial Pennsylvania," 59 SMU L. Rev. 3 (Winter 2006).

Nichols, Joel A. "Religious Liberty in the Thirteenth Colony: Church-State Relations in Colonial and Early National Georgia," 80 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1693 (December, 2005).

Priest, Claire. "Currency Policies and Legal Development in Colonial New England," 110 Yale L.J. 1303 (June, 2001).

Thomas, George C. III. "Colonial Criminal Law and Procedure: The Royal Colony of New Jersey 1749-57," 1 N.Y.U. J. L. & Liberty 671 (2005) .

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 7 DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN PROPERTY LAW AFTER INDEPENDENCE

1-7 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions 7.syn

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 7.syn Synopsis to Chapter 7: DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN PROPERTY LAW AFTER INDEPENDENCE

§ 7.01 Introduction to the Chapter.

§ 7.02 Reception of the English Common Law of Property in the American States and the District of Columbia.

§ 7.02(a) Alabama.

§ 7.02(b) Alaska.

§ 7.02(c) Arizona.

§ 7.02(d) Arkansas.

§ 7.02(e) California.

§ 7.02(f) Colorado.

§ 7.02(g) Connecticut.

§ 7.02(h) Delaware.

§ 7.02(I) District of Columbia.

§ 7.02(j) Florida.

§ 7.02(k) Georgia.

§ 7.02(l) Hawaii.

§ 7.02(m) Idaho.

§ 7.02(n) Illinois.

§ 7.02(o) Indiana.

§ 7.02(p) Iowa.

§ 7.02(q) Kansas.

§ 7.02(r) Kentucky.

§ 7.02(s) Louisiana.

§ 7.02(t) Maine.

§ 7.02(u) Maryland.

§ 7.02(v) Massachusetts.

§ 7.02(w) Michigan.

§ 7.02(x) Minnesota.

§ 7.02(y) Mississippi.

§ 7.02(z) Missouri.

§ 7.02(aa) Montana.

§ 7.02(bb) Nebraska.

§ 7.02(cc) Nevada.

§ 7.02(dd) New Hampshire.

§ 7.02(ee) New Jersey.

§ 7.02(ff) New Mexico.

§ 7.02(gg) New York.

§ 7.02(hh) North Carolina.

§ 7.02(ii) North Dakota.

§ 7.02(jj) Ohio.

§ 7.02(kk) Oklahoma.

§ 7.02(ll) Oregon.

§ 7.02(mm) Pennsylvania.

§ 7.02(nn) Rhode Island.

§ 7.02(oo) South Carolina.

§ 7.02(pp) South Dakota.

§ 7.02(qq) Tennessee.

§ 7.02(rr) Texas.

§ 7.02(ss) Utah.

§ 7.02(tt) Vermont.

§ 7.02(uu) Virginia.

§ 7.02(vv) Washington.

§ 7.02(ww) West Virginia.

§ 7.02(xx) Wisconsin.

§ 7.02(yy) Wyoming.

§ 7.03 Patterns of Change in American Property Law.

§ 7.04 Bibliography.

Professor David A. Thomas
J. Reuben Clark Law School
Brigham Young University

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 7 DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN PROPERTY LAW AFTER INDEPENDENCE

1-7 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 7.01

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 7.01 Introduction to the Chapter.

One of the persisting realities of American legal life is the existence of a separate and lively jurisprudence in each of the states, lying beneath a thin and often deceptive veneer of common law uniformity. Also, next to and sometimes transcending the state laws and legal systems is a burgeoning body of American federal law.

In the first part of this chapter is a review of the extent to which each state has received the common law and the older statutory law of England as a foundational part of its general and property jurisprudence. n1 In the concluding section, major developments in state property law from a national perspective will be described.

FOOTNOTES:
(n1)Footnote 1. Norman F. Cantor, Imagining the Law-Common Law and the Foundation of the American Legal System (1998); Russell Benedict, Acts& Laws of the Thirteen Colonies & States: Constituting the Extraordinary Collection of Hon. Russell Benedict, Justice of the Supreme Court of New York (1922); Robin Cooke, Turning Points of the Common Law (1997); Richard B. Cappalli, American Common Law Method (1997); John Hudson, The Formation of the English Common Law: Law and Society in England from the Norman Conquest to the Magna Carta (1996); Roscoe Pound, The Spirit of the Common Law (1921); James M. Walker, The Theory of the Common Law (1852); Gregory S. Alexander, Commodity & Propriety: Competing Visions of Property in American Legal Thought 1776-1970 (1997); John A. Makdisi, "The Islamic Origins of the Common Law," 77 N.C. L. Rev. 1635 (1999).

LexisNexis®

Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions

Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group.

CHAPTER 7 DEVELOPMENT OF AMERICAN PROPERTY LAW AFTER INDEPENDENCE

1-7 Thompson on Real Property, Thomas Editions § 7.02

AUTHOR: Professor David A. Thomas J. Reuben Clark Law School Brigham Young University

§ 7.02 Reception of the English Common Law of Property in the American States and the District of Columbia.

In this section the objective is to describe the events by which each state determined whether and to what extent it received the common and statutory law of England into its jurisprudence, either generally or for property. The emphasis is on chronological description and exposition of the primary documents in these developments, rather than on interpretive commentary. The result should be an enduring reference collection of primary materials relevant to foundational property jurisprudence in the American states.

The progression of most state areas from unexplored region, to federal territory, to statehood was often not along a straight line, and some states were affiliated with as many eight different territories before becoming a separate territory and then a state. Some states share a common history with one or more other states during most or all of their territorial history prior to statehood. In this chapter, some of the material describing pre-statehood governing arrangements is duplicated in the sections for such states. That duplication helps readers avoid taking one or more side trips into the historical background material for several other states. Therefore, the information provided for each state in its own section is sufficient by itself, and does not rely on reference to information provided for other states with partially common historical foundations.

§ 7.02(a) Alabama.

The area of the present state of Alabama was originally incorporated into the Territory of Mississippi in 1798. A separate territorial government for the Alabama portion of the territory was enacted in 1817, but the older territorial provisions continued to govern until Alabama attained statehood in 1819. n2 In the Mississippi territorial legislation of 1798, which in 1817 was continued in effect in Alabama Territory, no provision for reception of the common law is included, although the document does incorporate the rights granted under the Northwest Ordinance of 1787:

> That from and after the establishment of the said government, the people of the aforesaid territory, shall be entitled to and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted to the people of the territory of the United States, northwest of the river Ohio, in and by the aforesaid ordinance of the thirteenth day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, in as full and ample a manner as the same are possessed and enjoyed by the people of the said last mentioned territory. n3

The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n4

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district...." n5 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n6

Thus, while Alabama was a separate territory and on the threshold of statehood between 1817 and 1819, it was governed under a territorial law that incorporated the fundamental law described in the Northwest Ordinance of 1787, which was, for judicial proceedings, the "common law," and otherwise drawn from laws of established states. That law, as will be amply demonstrated throughout this chapter, was fundamentally English common law modified for American conditions.

The organizing and defining of Mississippi, Georgia and Alabama territories was complicated by the Yazoo land fraud engineered by the Georgia legislature in 1795. As part of the effort to settle land claims arising from that activity, Georgia ceded to the United States its claims to territory lying within the areas claimed by Mississippi and Alabama. The 1802 deed of cession from Georgia confirmed both British and Spanish land grants given before October 22, 1795, and stipulated that provisions of the Northwest Ordinance should extend to the lands being ceded. In 1845 the United States Supreme Court held that this provision extended the English common law even to those parts of the territory formerly held by Spain. n7

The question of reception of English statutes in Mississippi Territory (including Alabama) law was simplified after a digest of territorial laws was completed and compiled into one volume in 1807. The Mississippi territorial legislature adopted the volume as law in the territory with the proviso that "all statutes of England and Great Britain not contained in said volume of statutes, shall cease to have any force or validity in this Territory." n8

With this background of implied common law validity, in the enabling act for statehood, Alabamans were authorized to "form a constitution and state government for the people within said territory ... not repugnant to the principles of the [Northwest Ordinance]...." n9

Thus in Alabama's first constitution, of 1819, a provision continuing laws then in effect was included:

> All laws and parts of laws, now in force in the Alabama territory, which are not repugnant to the provisions of this constitution, shall continue and remain in force as the laws of this state, until they expire by their own limitation, or shall be altered, or repealed, by the legislature thereof. n10

This provision, after an absence from intervening constitutions, has reappeared in Alabama's present constitution, of 1901, in a slightly altered form:

> That all laws in force at the ratification of this Constitution and not inconsistent therewith, shall remain in full force until altered or repealed by the legislature; and all rights, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts of the state, counties, municipal corporations, individuals, or bodies corporate, not inconsistent with this Constitution, shall continue to be valid as if this Constitution had not been ratified.

After numerous judicial decisions invoking various aspects of English common and statute law, the Alabama legislature enacted a reception statute in 1907, and such a provision continues verbatim in the current code:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not inconsistent with the Constitution, laws and institutions of this state, shall, together with such institutions and laws, be the rule of decisions, and shall continue in force, except as from time to time it may be altered or repealed by the legislature. n11

That Alabama is a common law state continues to be affirmed by contemporary court decisions. n12 Before the statutory reception provision was enacted, Alabama courts had held that English statutes adopted before "the emigration of our ancestors" can constitute part of the common law, n13 and that the Alabama Supreme Court should follow the common law on subjects not changed by the legislature. n14 Additionally, the legislature presumably does not intend to make a change in the common law, unless its intent is shown expressly or by unmistakable implication. n15 A modern example of enduring common law doctrine in Alabama is a decision that a lease for years is personal property, a chattel real, for venue purposes. n16

§ 7.02(b) Alaska.

Alaska was obtained from Russia under a treaty dated June 20, 1867, and possession was formally transferred on October 18, 1868. For sixteen years thereafter Congress made no serious effort to provide a basic form of government or foundation of law for the territory. Military forces were withdrawn in 1877 and what little local government there was had receded into inactivity. Most of the laws relating to U.S. territories generally had no application to conditions in Alaska. n17 Finally, in 1884, Congress produced the first general statute on Alaska, the Civil Government Act, which declared the laws of Oregon applicable to Alaska:

> Sec. 7. That the general laws of the State of Oregon now in force are hereby declared to be the law in said district, so far as the same may be applicable and not in conflict with the provisions of this act or the laws of the United States ... n18

When a comprehensive civil code for Alaska was enacted in 1900, the common law was officially received:

> Sec. 367. So much of the common law as is applicable and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or with any law passed or to be passed by the Congress is adopted and declared to be the law within the district of Alaska. n19

And when Alaska was organized as a territory, laws previously passed were continued in effect:

> Sec. 3. Constitution and Laws of United States extended ... except as herein provided all laws now in force in Alaska shall continue in full force and effect until altered, amended, or repealed by Congress or by the legislature ... n20

A statute specifically receiving the common law was enacted before statehood, and now continues in the current state code:

> So much of the common law not inconsistent with the Constitution of the State of Alaska or the Constitution of the United States or with any law passed by the legislature of the State of Alaska is the rule of decision in this state. n21

Shortly after the Civil Government Act of 1900 and before the reception statute just cited, an Alaska court had occasion to describe its concept of the common law:

> Ordinarily we mean by the "common law" the unwritten law, or the English common law, as sometimes stated, comprising the immemorial custom declared by the courts and particular local customs, the law merchant, or that part not defined by statute, and the canon and ecclesiastical law ... In Doe ex dem. Patterson v. Winn, , 30 U.S. 233, 8 L. Ed. 108 , it is said, "The term 'common law' means both the common law of England, as opposed to written or statute law, and the statutes passed before the immigration of the first settlers to America." n22

A more recent opinion of the Alaska Supreme Court expressed an expanded concept of the common law, noting that Alaska also adopts the common law of the United States, some of which is over 300 years old, and that the common law of England is not controlling over the American common law. n23

§ 7.02(c) Arizona.

Land that is now in Arizona was first occupied by the United States in 1846 during the war with Mexico. A code of laws drawn up in 1846, during the American military governorship, continued in effect the earlier Spanish and Mexican laws. When territorial status was granted in 1850 for this area, then designated as New Mexico Territory, no provision was made either for continuing or discontinuing the effect of prior laws; apparently only applicable federal laws were received:

> And be it further enacted, That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of New Mexico as elsewhere within the United States. n24

Also, the "Supreme and District Courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction." n25 This uncertain mix of Anglo-American and Spanish-Mexican elements in territorial law was noted in state courts, where the provision for common law jurisdiction was restricted to procedural matters only, and substantive rights were determined according to Mexican law. n26

When the Arizona area was split off and formed into its own territory in 1863, the territorial act declared that "all legislative enactments of the Territory of New Mexico not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby extended to and continued in force in the said Territory of Arizona, until repealed or amended by future legislation...." n27

In anticipation of statehood, Arizonans in 1891 drafted and approved a constitution declaring that "All laws now in force in the Territory of Arizona, which are not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or shall be altered or repealed by the Legislation." n28 Statehood was delayed for two decades, but the new constitution of 1912 drafted after statehood was attained contained essentially the same continuation provision:

"All laws of the Territory of Arizona now in force, not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain in force as laws of the State of Arizona until they expire by their own limitations or are altered or repealed by law...." n29

Meanwhile, soon after territorial status had been attained, a code of laws for the territory was prepared which included a wholesale reception of the common law and simultaneously and entirely "repealed" the Hispanic elements of the territory's legal history. n30 Subsequent legislation reincorporated individual elements of the old Mexican and Spanish laws, especially the community property approach to marital property, but a general common law reception statute is in the current Arizona statutes:

> The common law only so far as it is consistent with and adapted to the natural and physical conditions of this state and the necessities of the people thereof, and not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States or the constitution or laws of this state, or established customs of the people of this state, is adopted and shall be the rule of decision in all courts of this state. n31

State statutes also provide for application of common law in trial court procedure and in exercise of inherent judicial powers: "The superior court, in addition to the powers conferred by constitution, rule or statute, may proceed according to the common law." n32

Perhaps the most detailed exposition of Arizona's reception of the common law was provided by the Arizona Supreme Court in 1937:

> The question arises, though, as to what principles of English law are, within the meaning of our statute, "common law" and what are not. The large majority of our states have statutes which, in substance, recognize the English common law as part of the law of America, but the meaning of these words "common law" is by no means uniform in the various states. The reason for this lack of uniformity is that the Legislatures of many of the states have fixed the date at which the common law of England became crystallized, so far as its application to the particular state is concerned, at a time named in the statute of adoption. In most of the original thirteen states, where the Legislatures have not specifically fixed the date at which the common law of England is presumed to have crystallized, the courts have generally held it to be the lex non scripta [unwritten law] and the general statutes of Great Britain in amendment thereof which were in force at the time of the first immigration of our English ancestors to the continent ... On the other hand, many of the states take a different view. The matter is ably discussed in the case of Browning v. Browning's Estate, 3 N.M. 659, 9 P. 677, 683 , where the court says:
>
> From the authorities cited, it is clear that there are three classes of 'common law as recognized in the United States of America': First, in those states which were a part of the original colonies, and which have not by legislation adopted statutes passed prior to a particular date, the unwritten law, and such general British statutes, applicable to their condition, as were in force at the time of the formation of the colonial governments, and such as were afterwards adopted, expressly or tacitly, constituted the common law; second, in those states which have adopted the common law, and the British statutes passed and in force prior to the dated fixed in the act of adoption, and were of a general nature, and suitable to their situation, such common law and statutes constitute their common law; and, third, in those states and territories which were not of the original colonies, and which have not in terms adopted any English statutes, but have adopted the common law, the unwritten or common law of England, and the acts of parliament of a general nature, not local to Great Britain, which had been passed and were in force at the date of the war of the Revolution, and not in conflict with the constitution or laws of the United States, nor of the state or territory, and which were suitable to the wants and condition of the people, are the common law of such states and territories.
>
> This territory belongs to the last class. It was not a part of the original colonies, but was acquired in 1848. The legislature has not in terms adopted any British statutes, nor has it undertaken to define what is > embraced in the words 'common law,' or lex non scripta, and such British statutes of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, nor in conflict with the constitution or laws of the United States, nor of this territory, which are applicable to our condition and circumstances, and which were in force at the time of our separation from the mother country.

>
> We agree that the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of New Mexico is the one applicable to Arizona.
>
> "Common law" means the unwritten or common law of England, together with acts of parliament of a general nature, not local to Great Britain, which had been passed and were enforced at the time of separation of colonies from the mother country so far as they are suitable to wants, conditions, and circumstances in Arizona. n33

The interaction of the common law with Spanish law, and both with statutory law, is best illustrated in the area of Arizona's community property approach toward marital property. The Arizona Supreme Court's most authoritative statement on this matter was given in 1923:

> Much argument and citation are indulged in by counsel on both sides upon the question as to whether or not the principles of the common or the Spanish law should interpret the community property statutes. The terms in which the Legislature has adopted the common law do not necessarily exclude the application of all principles of the Spanish law, provided they are applicable to customs or enactments adopted from that law, and which are not inconsistent with the laws and customs of this state...; but the rule which appellants would have us adopt is inconsistent with both the laws and customs of this state. The statutes of this state make the adultery and abandonment of the wife, when judicially determined, work a forfeiture of all subsequent marital rights, including both status and property. It does not, however, impose as a penalty the loss of all property rights already gained. The exaction of the penalty which appellants urge upon us as authorized by the Spanish law is directly in conflict with the laws of this state, however it might be affected by the principles of the common law. Community property grows out of and depends upon the marriage relation. The regulation therefore of the marriage relation by statute, by common law, and by decision of court, necessarily and inevitably, indirectly at least, regulates community property rights. The marital institution in this jurisdiction is quite a different institution in some respects from the marital relation under the Spanish law. The premises upon which the Spanish courts reached their decisions are not the same premises upon which the courts of this state must decide community property rights, and the determinations of those courts are, therefore, not reliable precedents in a case of this sort. The institution of marriage and the consequences following a violation of marital rights are governed and controlled by the principles of the common law, the statutory law of this state which has been inspired by those principles, and judicial interpretation of those laws. n34

Similarly, the common law doctrine of riparian water rights was not included in the general adoption of the common law, because the streams qualified for use in irrigation had already been taken up as public property and subjected to various statutes regulating rights to divert for irrigation. n35 Moreover, the common law water rights doctrines were also abrogated by state statute. n36

§ 7.02(d) Arkansas.

As part of the territory in the Louisiana Purchase, Arkansas shares in the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to the early settlement history of that area. As far as permanent settlement and government are concerned, Spanish exploration in the 16th century, and French probes in the 17th and 18th centuries ultimately resulted only in the settlements in and around New Orleans and a tiny community at St. Louis. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n37

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n38 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n39

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad reception statute for the English common law:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n40

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n41

Just three years after enactment of this reception statute, in 1819, the Territory of Arkansas was created, n42 with the Missouri Territory laws then in effect adopted as its laws for the moment:

> And be it further enacted, That all the laws which shall be in force in the territory of Missouri, on the fourth day of July next, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and which shall be applicable to the territory of Arkansaw, shall, and continue, in force in the latter territory, until modified or repealed by the legislative authority thereof. n43

Leaders of Arkansas in 1836 drafted a constitution in anticipation of statehood, most of which document was effectively ratified when statehood was granted later that year. The new constitution provided "That all laws now in force in the Territory of Arkansas, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations, or be altered or repealed by the general assembly." n44 An essentially similar provision is also in the present

Arkansas Constitution. n45

More specifically, a common law reception statute was enacted shortly after statehood and a modern counterpart is in the current Arkansas code:

> The common law of England, so far as it is applicable and of a general nature, and all statutes of the British Parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the common law made prior to March 24, 1606, which are applicable to our own form of government, of a general nature and not local to that kingdom, and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States or the Constitution and laws of this state, shall be the rule of decision in this state unless altered or repealed by the General Assembly of this state. n46

In addition, state statute requires that judicial jurisdiction and procedure not otherwise regulated are had and conducted according to the common law:

> Where [circuit court] actions and proceedings are not expressly provided for by statute, the actions and proceedings may be had and conducted by the circuit courts and judges, in accordance with the course, rules, and jurisdiction of the common law. n47

Another Arkansas statute touching on the real property common law regulates the legal status of time-share estates:

> A time-share estate is an estate in real property and has the character and incidents of an estate in fee simple at common law. It may include an estate for years with a remainder over in fee simple or an estate for years with no remainder if a leasehold. The foregoing shall supersede any contrary rule at common law. n48

The reception statute has been cited in support of the continuing effect of the rule in Shelley's Case, n49 the requirements and incidents of the tenancy by the entireties, n50 and for other matters. n51

§ 7.02(e) California.

Spanish outposts at San Diego and Monterey in California had been established by the beginning of the 19th century, but little governmental control was exercised, especially from Mexico after Mexican independence was achieved in 1821. Americans obtained control of California almost as soon as war with Mexico broke out in 1845. In the years between withdrawal of Mexican control in 1845-1846 and commencement of official American governance in 1850, existing law continued in force by military directive, and when Californians adopted a constitution in 1849, in anticipation of statehood, existing laws were again continued in force:

> All rights, prosecutions, claims and contracts, as well of individuals as of bodies corporate, and all laws in force at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, and not inconsistent therewith, until altered or repealed by the legislature, shall continue as if the same had not been adopted. n52

A provision similar in substance was included in the California constitution of 1879, n53 which is still the current provision on California laws in force.

When the California legislature convened in 1850, it enacted, over some opposition, a rather cryptic English common law reception statute:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, or with the Constitution or laws of California, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state. n54

A virtually identical provision is in effect in the current California Civil Code. n55 California courts have held that this reception provision adopts not only the common law but also the common law procedure of the courts. n56 The adoption of the common law also signaled the rejection of laws derived from other legal regimes, such as the civil law, Roman law, and Mexican law. n57 The year 1850 is the key date in this reception, with laws preceding that year being superseded by the common law reception, n58 and with common law judicial powers being defined as of 1850. n59 An early California decision declared that English statutes were not included in the common law reception, n60 but later courts included in the received common law English statutes that influenced the common law, n61 as well as equity jurisprudence. n62

While it has been held that common law rules governing real estate titles n63 and riparian rights n64 were received, the English Statute of Enrollments, n65 the Statute of Uses, n66 and common law rules as to percolating waters n67 and that an illegitimate child could not inherit from its natural father n68 have all been held not in force in California. California's community property approach toward marital property is an example of common law reception having been superseded by state statute.

§ 7.02(f) Colorado.

Most of the area that is now in the state of Colorado was originally included in the Territory of Kansas that was established in 1854. The Territory of Kansas had been part of the Louisiana Purchase and theoretically shared in the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to the early settlement history of that area. As far as permanent settlement and government are concerned, Spanish exploration in the 16th century, and French probes in the 17th and 18th centuries ultimately resulted in no permanent settlements in Kansas. French governance over the region was effectively confined to the settlements at New Orleans and St. Louis and ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769; Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n69

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n70 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said District of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n71

Such a provision was hardly meaningful in the region of Kansas, where no permanent settlements were established until 1820. However, in 1806, a ceremony had been conducted at an Indian village in Kansas to remove the Spanish flag and replace it with the American flag. Moreover, because it was anticipated that Kansas would be a prime location for resettlement of Indians, other settlements were not encouraged. This began to change when a military outpost was established in 1842 and emigrant trails were pushed through Kansas, spawning still more settlements. Settlement dramatically increased after passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854, attempting to resolve the slavery question in new states and establishing the Territory of Kansas, which, as mentioned, included most of Colorado.

The lands in the Territory of Kansas had technically been under the legal rules enacted by the Indiana territorial government from the time of the Louisiana Purchase. This government enacted certain laws for the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area of the Louisiana Purchase outside New Orleans, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted for this territory after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri.

A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, which, of course, did not affect the Kansas area, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad reception statute for the English common law:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n72

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n73

No changes in the laws applicable to the Kansas and Colorado areas occurred thereafter until the Kansas Territory was created in 1854 and the first legislature met in 1854. In the territorial enabling act, no explicit common law reception was mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n74 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n75

In 1855 the new Kansas territorial legislature enacted a general reception statute, providing that both English common law and pertinent English statutes were adopted:

> The common law of England and all statutes and acts of parliament made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, and not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, and the act entitled "An act to organize the territory of Nebraska and Kansas," or any statute law which may from time [to] time be made or passed by this or any subsequent legislative assembly of the territory of Kansas, shall be the rule of action and decision in this territory, and law, custom or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. n76

Colorado achieved its own territorial status, with the same boundaries as the eventual state of Colorado, when Kansas became a state in 1861. Colorado's legislature that same year enacted a different common law reception provision:

> That the common law of England, so far as the same is applicable and of a general nature, and all acts and statutes of the British parliament, made in aid of or to supply the defects of the common law prior to the 4th year of James the First (excepting the 2nd section of the 6th Chapter of 43rd Elizabeth, the 8th Chapter of 13th Elizabeth, and 9th Chapter of 37th Henry Eighth), and which are of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as of full force until repealed by legislative authority. n77

This territorial provision, with only minor punctuation changes, is continued verbatim as the state's reception statute in the current Colorado code. n78

When, after several abortive attempts at statehood and constitution making, Colorado attained statehood in 1876, its first constitution contained a provision continuing in force previous laws:

> That all laws in force at the adoption of this constitution shall, so far as not inconsistent therewith, remain of the same force as if this constitution had not been adopted until they expire by their own limitation, or are altered or repealed by the general assembly; and all rights, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts of the Territory of Colorado, counties, individuals, or bodies-corporate, (not inconsistent therewith,) shall continue as if the form of government had not been changed and this constitution adopted. n79

The 1876 constitution remains the fundamental constitution for Colorado today, and the current constitutional provision continuing previous laws in force has been modified only slightly from the original section. n80

The Colorado Supreme Court has drawn a contrast between the thirteen original states, whose common law adoption came by "inheritance" from previous practice, and Colorado, whose common law adoption was by legislative act, the court thus characterizing itself as a constitutional court with common law powers. n81 Modern Colorado decisions continue to recognize the viability of English common law in such matters as restraints on alienation. n82

§ 7.02(g) Connecticut.

Even though the first permanent settlers in Connecticut began occupancy as early as 1633, none of the charters or other fundamental documents for any of the Connecticut colonies contain provisions about governing law until the royal charter of 1662. Thus, as is shown in § 6.06(a), § 6.06(b), and § 6.06(c), provisions for the foundational law are absent from the Warwick Patent of 1631, the Fundamental Orders (of Connecticut) of 1639, the Fundamental Articles of New Haven of 1639, the 1643 Articles of Confederation for the United Colonies of New England, the Connecticut Code of 1650 n83, and from New Haven's "Settling in" compilation of 1656. A single provision in New Haven's laws suggests that fundamental law in this colony was God's law:

> [N]o mans goods, or estate shall be taken from him, under colour of Law, or Countenance of authority, unlesse it be by vertue, or equity of some expresse Law of this Jurisdiction, established by the Generall Court, and sufficiently published, or for want of a Law in any particular case, by the word of God... n84

In 1662 a royal charter was obtained for all the Connecticut settlements, and several provisions of this charter establish a foundation of English law in matters of property rights:

> [The Colony of Connecticut] to have, take, possess, acquire, and purchase lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any goods, or chattels, and the same to lease, grant, demise, alien, bargain, sell, and dispose of, as other our liege people of this our realm of England ...
>
> * * *
>
> that all, and every the subjects of us, our heirs, or successors, which shall go to inhabit within the said colony, and every of their children which shall happen to be born there, or on the sea in going thither, or returning from thence, shall have and enjoy all liberties, and immunities of free, and natural subjects within any the dominions of us, our heirs, or successors, to all intents, constructions, and purposes whatsoever, as if they, and every one of them were born within the realm of England...

> and also from time to time to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome, and reasonable laws, statutes, ordinances, directions, and instructions, not contrary to the laws of this realm, of England...
>
> * * *
>
> to be holden of Us, Our Heirs, and Successors, as of Our Mannor of East-Greenwich, in Free, and Common Soccage, and not in Capite, nor by Knights Service... n85

After the 1662 charter was obtained, the 1650 code of laws was replaced with a new code in 1673, but this new code did not make any explicit reference to the colony's fundamental law, but rather generally reiterated the earlier code's reliance on God's law:

> [N]o mans Goods or Estate shall be taken from him, nor any wayes indamaged under colour of Law, or countenance of Authority, unless it be by the vertue or equity of some express Law of this Colony warranting the same, established by the General Court, and sufficiently published; or in case of the defects of a Law in any particular case by some clear and plain Rule of the word of God, in which the whole Court shall concurre. n86

In addition, the 1673 code contains one reference to land laws as derived from English law and as based on the 1662 charter:

> Lands the tenour [tenure] of our Lands: It is Ordered by the Authority of this Court; that whatsoever Lands have or shall be granted by the Court to the respective Townships, or to any particular persons either by the Court or particular Town ships, shall be held to them, their Heirs, Successors and Assignes for ever, according to the most free Tenour of East Green-wich in the County of Kent in the Realm of England, according to our Charter Grant. n87

When national independence was achieved, Connecticut did not immediately adopt a new constitution, but continued to be governed by the 1662 charter until 1818. The affection for this 1662 charter was perhaps explained in part by the struggle endured by Connecticut colonists in maintaining it:

> The feudal terms of the grant made by the charter, as it turned out, gave the tenants in Connecticut considerably more freedom from the crown than their counterparts in other colonies, or even in England. Many tenurial rights in the mother country had fallen into disuse, and in fact had been flouted under the Commonwealth and would be formally repealed by Parliament within the decade; but for the colonial grantees, their continuation was an assurance of the firm control of the theocracy over the government of Connecticut. Because the rights were virtually self-perpetuating, the government in London soon was repenting of the liberality of the grant. James II, indeed, proposed at his accession to call in all of the colonial charters as part of a reorganization of imperial administration which would resume the traditional controls over the New World possessions. n88

The various writs to accomplish this surrender of the old charter were rejected by the colonial officials (including the traditional incident during which the charter was hidden in a hollow oak), and when James II lost his throne in 1689, the colonial authorities proclaimed a full restoration of the 1662 charter, "in ye full and free enjoyment of all our properties, priveledges and liberties both civill and sacred as therein granted to us...." n89

In 1776, Connecticut officials considered adopting a constitution, but decided to continue reliance on the 1662 grant, which decision was embodied in a legislative declaration. This declaration rather conspicuously invoked only the state's own indigenous law as its fundamental law:

> ...No Man's Goods or Estate shall be taken away from him, nor any Ways indamaged under the Colour of Law, or Countenance of Authority; unless clearly warranted by the Laws of this State...
>
> ...That all the free Inhabitants of this or any other of the United States of America, and Foreigners in Amity with this State, shall enjoy the same justice and Law within this State, which is general for the State... n90

When a constitution finally was adopted in 1818, and replaced in 1955 and again in 1965, no provision for reception of common law was included in any of the documents. Nevertheless, from time to time, Connecticut courts have considered the extent to which English common law is considered adopted in Connecticut:

> We have not yet adopted it [the common law], either by judicial recognition, or legislative enactment. Many of our sister states have, by constitutional or legislative provisions, recognized the common law of England as a part of their codes of law. We have not. We have, in our judicial practice, adopted so much of the common law as was operative as law, in the father-land, when our ancestors left it, and which was adapted to the new state of things here, under our colonial condition. This was our inheritance. But no abrogation or repealed law of England was considered as existing or binding here: the colonists brought no such law with them; they inherited no such law. n91

This view was reiterated generally in a 1932 Connecticut Supreme Court opinion:

> While Connecticut has not formally adopted the common law of England by constitutional or legislative provisions, we have made it our own by 'practical adoption' with such exceptions as diversity of circumstances and customs require. n92

§ 7.02(h) Delaware.

Although Delaware's first permanent settlement dates from 1638, English rule commenced only in 1664, and in 1665 the so-called "Duke's Law" was in effect in Delaware as in other middle Atlantic areas. Land law was explicitly English and probably reflected the statutory abolition of feudal tenures that had been enacted in England only five years earlier:

> All Lands and heritages within this Government shall be free from all fines and licenses, upon Alienation and from all Heriotts, Wardships liveryes Primier Seizins year day and wast, Escheats, and forfeitures upon the Death of Parents or Auncestors Natural, unnatural, Casuall, or judiciall, and that for ever... n93

Also, laws generally were to be "not Contrary to the known Lawes of England." n94

However, no copy of the "Duke's Law" was even brought to Delaware until 1675, and by 1682 William Penn had received a patent and a deed for lands in Delaware. Neither Penn's Frame of Government in 1682 nor the concurrent laws for the colony agreed upon in England specified that English common law governed in the colony. Nevertheless, when settlers in Delaware merged their government with that of Pennsylvania under the 1682 Act of Union, the provisions for the legislative assemblies declared that they "shall have all other Powers and Privileges of an Assembly, according to the Rights of the free-born Subjects of England, and as is usual in any of the King's Plantations in America." n95

In a compilation of 18th-century Delaware legislation dated at 1741-1742, colonial courts were directed > to hear and determine all ... actions ... according to the Laws and Constitutions of this Government, as fully and amply to all Intents and Purposes, as the Justices of the King's-Bench, Common-Pleas and Exchequer in England, or any of them may or can do. n96

The first Delaware constitution, promulgated in 1776, was explicit on the matter of reception:

> The common law of England, as well as so much of the statute law as has been heretofore adopted in practice in this State, shall remain in force, unless they shall be altered by a future law of the legislature; such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and privileges contained in this constitution, and the declaration of the rights, etc., agreed to by this convention. n97

The 1792 Constitution reincorporated and continued this common law reception by declaring that "All the laws of this State, existing at the time of making this constitution, and not inconsistent with it, shall remain in force, unless they shall be altered by future laws...." n98 Almost identical language appeared in the constitutions of 1831 n99 and 1897, the most recent constitution. The latter provision, currently in effect, is as follows:

> All the laws of this State existing at the time this Constitution shall take effect, and not inconsistent with it shall remain in force, except so far as they shall be altered by future laws. n100

Therefore, the common law of England (and English statutes) adopted in the 1776 Constitution continues in effect, except where altered by or inconsistent with state law.

§ 7.02(I) District of Columbia.

The question of the status of common law reception in the District of Columbia is best introduced by quoting a portion of the "History of the D.C. Code," published in Volume 1 of the District of Columbia Code Annotated:

> All of the many efforts to compile the laws relating to the District of Columbia were balked by the difficulty of determining and setting forth the laws of Great Britain and the early laws of the State of Maryland still in force in the District by virtue of the Acts of February 27, 1801, and March 3, 1901 (2 Stat. L. 103, ch. 15, 2, and 31 Stat. L. 1189, respectively). Yet these laws, access to which is through a labyrinth of toil and uncertainty, have been found pertinent by the courts of the District on no less than 127 reported occasions. The task was further complicated by the fact that much of the legislation affecting the District of Columbia was buried in appropriation acts. A summary of the situation was made by an eminent member of the District Bar, Mr. James S. Easby-Smith, before the Committee at a hearing on July 12, 1926. An excerpt from his statement is quoted:
>
>> The District of Columbia was created and became a federal district in the year 1800 (1 Stat. L. 130 and 2 Stat. L. 103). The District of Columbia, as created by the 1st Congress, was composed of a portion of Virginia and a portion of Maryland, the same being 10 miles square. That portion of the District of Columbia which was ceded by the State of Maryland was known as the County of Washington, District of Columbia; that portion which was ceded by the State of Virginia was known as the County of Alexandria, District of Columbia. At first there was a city organized and laid out called the City of Washington, while the remaining portion of that part of Maryland which had been ceded was called the County of Washington. The portion included the city also.
>
> Now the organic act (2 Stat. L. 103), provided that the laws governing that portion of the District of Columbia ceded by Virginia should be the Virginia statute not locally inapplicable, the acts of Congress, and the acts of the Virginia Legislature. That applied in and for the County of Alexandria, and the organic act provided that the laws in force in the County of Washington, District of Columbia, which was that portion taken from Maryland, were, first, the principles and maxims of equity as they existed in England, and in the colonies in the year 1776, the common law of England, and the statutes of the British Parliament which were in effect in the colonies in 1776, and which were not locally inapplicable. I think > that the last British statute which is applicable to the District of Columbia was passed about 1771. I think that there were no statutes which were locally applicable after that year.

>
> Therefore,
>
> First, we have the maxims and principles of equity as developed in the court of chancery.
>
> Second, the common law as it existed in 1776.
>
> Third, the British statutes in effect in 1776.
>
> Fourth, all the laws of the legislature, not only of the State of Maryland, from 1776 to 1800, but the laws of the colonial Maryland government up to the year 1800, together with such acts of Congress as had been passed, or might thereafter be passed, for the District of Columbia, or that were applicable to the District of Columbia.
>
> We have that great body of law here. In other words, in the State of Virginia and the State of Maryland, the State courts administer the state laws, while the federal courts administer the federal laws, but all of those laws are embraced in the jurisdiction of the courts here...
>
> Alexandria County Having Been Re-Ceded to Virginia, that Feature of the Complication No Longer Exists. n101

The first code prepared for the District of Columbia was intended for enactment by Congress, but no action was ever taken on it. The contents of that code were drawn from > the different statutes of Virginia and Maryland and the English statutes supposed to have been in force in Maryland, which [the compiler] supposed would be properly applicable to the whole District, with all their antiquated phraseology and long-since obsolete remedial provisions... n102

Much later, in June 1866, Congress appointed commissioners to revise and compile all federal statutes then in force, and the commissioners on their own initiative also made a separate revision and compilation for the District of Columbia. Both compilations were enacted into law, as the body of statute law then in force in the United States, effective June 22, 1874, and since known as the "Revised Statutes" of 1874. n103

The laws relating to the District of Columbia in this compilation begin with the act of February 21, 1871, establishing the territorial government in the district. n104 However, the "code" is neither complete nor systematic, and omits the old British statutes that were in force in Maryland at the time the district was ceded and the Maryland statutes that were in force at that time and were expressly continued in force by the 1801 act of Congress assuming jurisdiction over the district. Moreover, the "code" concluded with a general repealer:

> All acts of Congress passed prior to the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, relating to the District of Columbia, any portion of which is embraced in the foregoing revision are hereby repealed; and the section applicable thereto shall be in force in lieu thereof... n105

The prior laws which survived this repeal provision are expressed in the following terms of the 1874 "code":

> Sec. 91. All laws and ordinances of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, respectively, and of the levy court of the District of Columbia, not inconsistent with this chapter, and except as modified or repealed by Congress or the legislative assembly of the District since the first day of June, eighteen hundred and seventy-one, or until so modified or repealed, remain in full force.

> Sec. 92. The laws of the State of Maryland not inconsistent with this Title, as the same existed on the twenty-seventh day of February, eighteen hundred and one, except as since modified or repealed by Congress or by authority thereof, or until so modified or repealed, continue in force within the District. n106

In 1894, at the direction of Congress an effort was made to identify and compile the statutes in force in the District of Columbia. The compiler > included in his compilation the old English statutes in force in the Colonies, including Maryland, or supposed by him to be so, from Magna Charta to the 13th of George III, in the year 1773, and all the statutes of Maryland from the year 1704 to February 27, 1801, which had not been repealed and were declared to be in force in the District by the act of Congress of the last date, and the revised acts of Congress before referred to, reenacted in 1874, and also the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the District passed during its brief existence from June 2, 1871, to June 26, 1873, which were supposed to continue in force ...

>
> The old English statutes and some of the old Maryland statutes abound in antiquated English and redundant verbiage, which it was unnecessary to reenact, and many provisions in them are now inapplicable and obsolete by reason of changes in the practice of the courts and social and political conditions... n107

This elaborate codification effort of 1894 was approved by the District of Columbia Court, but never approved by Congress.

However, in 1901, Congress enacted a code for the district containing a common law reception statute, which provision continues in the current code:

> The common law, all British statutes in force in Maryland on February 27, 1801, the principles of equity and admiralty, all general acts of Congress not locally inapplicable in the District of Columbia, and all acts of Congress by their terms applicable to the District of Columbia and to other places under the jurisdiction of the United States, in force in the District of Columbia on March 3, 1901, shall remain in force except insofar as the same are inconsistent with, or are replaced by, some provision of the 1901 Code. n108

In applying this body of common law and English statutes to issues related to real property, n109 District of Columbia Courts over the years have invoked common law rules for will and probate matters, n110 for the descent of property, n111 and for regulation of surface waters. n112

§ 7.02(j) Florida.

Although Spain maintained a form of military occupation in Florida from 1565 to 1763, upon ceding the area to England in 1763 Spain removed almost all military and civilian personnel as soon as possible. The English colonization efforts of the next two decades were therefore entirely uninfluenced by Spanish law or legal custom. These in turn were voided by England's re-ceding Florida to Spain in 1783, and the English were consequently required to remove all English inhabitants and remove or abandon all English property from Florida within a few months. Spanish influence in Florida thereafter was much more intense, contacts with the United States -- both commercial and military -- more pervasive, and the force of Spanish law there did not formally end until Florida was ceded to the United States by treaty ratified in February, 1821.

Despite the end of Spanish government in Florida, the land grants and rights created thereunder were confirmed by the treaty:

> All the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by his Catholic Majesty, or by his lawful authorities, in the said territories ceded by his Majesty to the United States, shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands, to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the territories had remained under the dominion of his Catholic Majesty. But the owners in possession of such lands, who, by reason of the recent circumstances of the Spanish nation, and the revolution in Europe, have been prevented from fulfilling all the conditions of their grants, shall complete them within the terms limited in the same, respectively, from the date of this treaty; in default of which, the said grants shall be null and void. All grants made since the said 24th of January, 1818, when the first proposal on the part of his Catholic Majesty, for the cession of the Floridas, was made, are hereby declared, and agreed to be, null and void. n113

Florida, then divided into East Florida and West Florida, was transferred in 1821, with Andrew Jackson assigned as governor to organize a government. He was only partially successful in obtaining records of land grants, to be used in determining the titles of American settlers. While governor he issued executive orders invoking both common law and Spanish law. When the territory of Florida was established in 1822, n114 with legislative power exercised by the governor and a council, some subsequent enactments were based on Spanish law and civil law. The territorial enabling act also continued in force "the laws in force in the said territory, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with the provisions thereof ...." n115 In 1828 the legislative council of the territory enacted a provision continuing in force a list of 82 prior laws and repealing all other prior public laws. Only 2 of those 82 continued acts related to property and were based on old Spanish law. n116 At the same time, a series of acts passed between October 31, 1828, and November 21, 1828, added many explicit common law provisions to Florida's property law. n117 A year later, by an act dated November 6, 1829, the Florida legislature committed the territory to wholesale reception of the English common law and procedure, both in civil and criminal matters:

> Sec. 1. . . . That the common and statute laws of England, which are of a general and not of a local nature, with the exception hereinafter mentioned, down to the 4th day of July, 1776, be, and the same are hereby declared to be of force in this Territory: Provided, the said statutes and common law be not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States, and the acts of the Legislative Council of this Territory: And provided, also, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and misdemeanors shall be in force in this Territory, except statutes declaratory of and in aid of the common law; nor shall any person be punished by the said common law, when there is an existing provision by the statutes of this Territory on the subject; but, when there exists no such provision by statute of the Territory, then the several courts of this Territory shall proceed to punish such offence by fine and imprisonment: Provided, that in no case the fine shall exceed five hundred dollars, or the imprisonment twelve months.
>
> Sec. 2. . . . That all the laws and ordinances in force in this Territory to the 22nd day of July, 1822, be, and the same are hereby repealed: Provided, nevertheless, that all causes of action arising under, and founded on, any of said laws and ordinances, shall be judicially determined according to principles and rules of said laws and ordinances, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding. n118

A constitution drafted in 1838, in anticipation of statehood, and finally adopted when statehood was attained in 1845, acknowledged in two separate provisions that both common law and Spanish law could continue in force in the state:

> The general assembly shall declare by law what parts of the common law and what parts of the civil law, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall be in force in this State. n119
>
> That all laws or parts of laws not in force, or which may be hereafter passed by the governor and legislative council of the Territory of Florida, not repugnant to the provisions of this constitution, shall continue in force until, by operation of their provisions or limitations, the same shall cease to be in force, or until the general assembly of this State shall alter or repeal the same... n120

Essentially the same provisions were included in the state constitution of 1865. n121 Provisions continuing prior law in force were also in the 1868 constitution n122 and the 1885 constitution. n123 In the current Florida constitution is a substantively similar but somewhat simplified provision: "All laws in effect upon the adoption of this revision, to the extent not inconsistent with it, shall remain in force until they expire by their terms or are repealed." n124

Meanwhile, the reception of the common law continues in Florida statutes, with reception in civil matters currently expressed as follows and almost identically to the terms of the 1829 reception:

> The common and statute laws of England which are of a general nature and not a local nature, with the exception hereinafter mentioned, down to the fourth day of July, 1776, are declared to be of force in this state; provided, the said statutes and common law be not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States and the acts of the legislature of this state. n125

In property matters, common law has been invoked in Florida to adjudicate tenancies by the entireties, n126 restraints on alienation, n127 and use of the word "heirs" to create an estate of inheritance, n128 among other matters.

Also included in the current Florida statutory compilation is a listing of British statutes currently in force in Florida, as determined by a commission that convened in 1845. n129 This lengthy list includes portions of 273 old British statutes; property-related subjects represented in this list include charitable uses, distress, dower and jointure, estates for life, execution, executors and administrators, fines and recoveries, fraudulent conveyances, guardians, land measure, leases and terms for years, limitations of actions, maintenance and buying and selling pretended titles, mortgage, mortmain, real actions, n130 uses, waste, and wills. n131

§ 7.02(k) Georgia.

The land that is included in the modern state of Georgia was originally part of the Carolina territory granted in the 1663 royal charter and in the 1665 grant to the Carolina proprietors. The 1663 charter conferred upon the proprietors the most extensive feudal powers then recognized, using the so-called "Bishop of Durham" clause: "To have, use, exercise, and enjoy, and in as ample manner as any Bishop of Durham, in our Kingdom of England, ever heretofore have held, used or enjoyed, or of right ought or could have, use, or enjoy." n132 Land tenure was also based squarely on English law, with land "To be held of us, our heirs and successors, as of our Manor of East Greenwich, in our County of Kent, in Free and Common Soccage, and not in Capite nor by knight's service." n133 The legislative power in this colonial charter was subject to the requirement "that the said laws be consonant to reason and, as near as may be conveniently agreeable to the laws and Customs of this our Kingdom of England...." n134 The second charter in 1665 corrected minor technical problems but essentially continued in force the provisions of the 1663 charter. No permanent settlements arose in Georgia during the time these charters remained in effect.

Beginning in 1729 the English monarch began re-acquiring the interests of Carolina's proprietors in Georgia territory, and in 1732 made a re-grant of the land, under a new proprietary charter, to James Oglethorpe and several associates. In the 1732 charter the tenure was updated but, of course, still very much a matter of English common law: "[T]o be holden of us, our heirs and successors as of our honour of Hampton-court, in our county of Middlesex in free and common soccage, and not in capite ...." n135 Also, the legislative power was granted in the context of English law: "[T]he said corporation, formed for that purpose, shall and may form and prepare, laws, statutes and ordinances, fit and necessary for and concerning the government of the said colony, and not repugnant to the laws and statutes of England...." n136 The trusteeship of the proprietors reverted to the crown in 1752, and the foundation of English common law continued in force.

With the onset of the Revolution, Georgia only gradually overcame divided loyalties among its people and in 1777 adopted a constitution containing "rules and regulations ... for the future adoption of this State." n137 The legislative power defined in this constitution made no mention of the English common law as a foundation:

> The house of assembly shall have power to make such laws and regulations as may be conducive to the good order and well-being of the State; provided such laws and regulations be not repugnant to the true intent and meaning of any rule or regulation contained in this constitution. n138

At the end of the war and before a new constitution had been prepared, the Georgia legislature declared the common law of England to be in full force, "so far as it is not contrary to the constitution, laws and forms of government" of Georgia. n139

After ratification of the United States Constitution, a new constitution for Georgia was prepared in 1789. Again the legislative power was defined as the "power to make all laws and ordinances which [the general assembly] shall deem necessary and proper for the good of the State, which shall not be repugnant to this constitution." n140 However, no provision of that constitution made reference to the common law of England. The same provision for legislative power and absence of explicit reference to the English common law were also true of the 1798 constitution. n141

At the end of the Civil War in 1865, a Reconstruction constitution contained a slightly expanded definition of legislative power and a provision explicitly receiving the common law of England:

> The general assembly shall have power to make all laws and ordinances consistent with this constitution, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, which they shall deem necessary and proper for the welfare of the State. n142
>
> Laws of general operation now of force in this State, are, 1st, as the supreme law, the Constitution of the United States; 2d, as next in authority thereto, this constitution; 3d, in subordination to the aforegoing [certain codes and legislation ratified during 1860-1862] and also so much of the common and statute law of England, and of the statute laws of the State of force in Georgia in the year eighteen hundred and sixty, as is not expressly superseded by nor inconsistent with said codes, though not embodied therein. . . . n143

When Congress found the 1865 Georgia constitution unacceptable, Georgians adopted a new constitution in 1868, which continued in force the two provisions on legislative power n144 and common law reception just quoted. n145

In reaction to the Reconstruction constitution of 1868, yet another constitution was adopted in 1877. This document also contained the provision on legislative power, n146 but in the section describing the laws of general operation in the state, omitted specific mention of the common law. Nevertheless, the provision continued in force previous laws:

> The laws of general operation in this State are [the U.S. and state constitutions]...
>
> * * *
>
> In subordination to the foregoing: All laws now of force in this State, not inconsistent with this Constitution, and the ordinances of this Convention shall remain of force until the same are modified or repealed by the General Assembly ... n147

In the current 1945 Constitution, the provision defining legislative power is omitted, and the perpetuation of laws in force is declared, again, without specific reference to the common law of England:

> In subordination to the foregoing: All laws now of force in this State, not inconsistent with this Constitution shall remain of force until the same are modified or repealed by the General Assembly. n148

These constitutional provisions must be considered in light of state legislation. In 1784, the Georgia legislature enacted

"An Act for reviving and enforcing certain laws therein mentioned and adopting the common laws of England as they existed on May 14, 1776." This act has survived all subsequent Georgia recodifications and continues in force today in O.C.G.A. 1-1-10(c)(1). Georgia courts have accordingly recognized the reception of the English common law. In an 1831 opinion of the United States Supreme Court it was said:

> The common law is the law of Georgia; and the rules of evidence belonging to it are in force there, unless so far as they have been modified by statute, or controlled by a settled course of judicial decisions and usage [Two English statutes of 1550 and 1571] being passed before the emigration of our ancestors, being applicable to our situation, and in amendment of the law, constitute part of our common law. n149

The Georgia Supreme Court in 1854 gave an even more specific explanation of received common law:

> [W]e have recognized ... that we should look to that Law as it stood before the 14th day of May, 1776; and so of those principles of Equity, which are regarded as forming part of the Common Law. We have also recognized the rule, with a proper qualification, that in the effort to determine what was the Common Law at that period, we should consult the decisions of Courts in England, previously made; and that such decisions are to be regarded as the proper exponents of the Common Law, as it was adopted by our Legislature. The qualification upon which we insist is this: These decisions are to be received as evidence of the Law, and not the Law itself; and hence, to be conclusive on any question they should be clear and well settled. A mere preponderance, or even a strong current of decisions upon a given point, at that period, is not decisive, if, notwithstanding, in the opinion of the Court, the question was still lis sub judice. In such event, a Court in our state is free to adopt a different view, if it believes the Law was otherwise at that time. n150

§ 7.02(l) Hawaii.

In the era before Hawaii was officially annexed to the United States in 1898, common law principles had already attained a significant influence in Hawaiian land law. n151 At first, the influence of New England missionaries prompted the legislators in this so-called constitutional monarchy to accept a form of "God's law" as the legislative standard, n152 and this concept was included in Hawaii's first constitution, promulgated in 1840 under King Kamehameha III:

> It is therefore our fixed decree,
>
> I. That no law shall be enacted which is at variance with the word of the Lord Jehovah, or at variance with the general spirit of His word. All laws of the Islands shall be in consistency with the general spirit of God's law. n153

No similar provision is found in the 1852 constitution, but that instrument did continue prior laws in force:

> All laws now in force in this Kingdom shall continue and remain in full effect until altered or repealed by the Legislature; such parts only excepted as are repugnant to this Constitution. All laws now enacted or that may hereafter be enacted, contrary to this Constitution, shall be null and void. n154

Similar provisions were included in the constitution of 1864 n155 and in the constitution of 1887. n156

However, despite this idealistic guide, practical legislation on matters of real property in the mid-19th century relied on common law principles generally and statutes of Massachusetts specifically. n157 An 1847 statute authorized courts to follow either common or civil law as rules of decision, n158 and an enactment of the kingdom in 1892 officially received the common law:

> The common law of England, as ascertained by English and American decisions, is hereby declared to be the common law of the Hawaiian Islands in all cases, except as otherwise expressly provided by the Hawaiian Constitution or laws, or fixed by Hawaiian judicial precedent, or established by Hawaiian national usage, provided, however, that no person shall be subject to criminal proceedings except as provided by the Hawaiian laws. n159

A nearly identical common law reception provision continues in the current Hawaiian laws. n160

A few years before annexation, the monarchy was overthrown and replaced in 1894 by a republic with a new constitution; the new document also continued prior law in force. n161 When annexation occurred in 1898, the Congressional Resolution of Annexation continued prior land laws in force, except for public lands:

> The existing laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands; but the Congress of the United States shall enact special laws for their management and disposition ...
>
> * * *
>
> The municipal legislation of the Hawaiian Islands, not enacted for the fulfillment of the treaties so extinguished, and not inconsistent with this joint resolution nor contrary to the Constitution of the United States nor to any existing treaty of the United States, shall remain in force until the Congress of the United States shall otherwise determine. n162

In the act creating the Territory of Hawaii, most laws were continued in force, but the Constitution of the Republic of Hawaii and many specific enactments were explicitly repealed, although the substance of their provisions were in many instances largely re-enacted in the new territorial law:

> Sec. 6. That the laws of Hawaii not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the United States or the provisions of this Act shall continue in force, subject to repeal or amendment by the legislature of Hawaii or the Congress of the United States.
>
> Sec. 7. That the constitution of the Republic of Hawaii and the laws of Hawaii, as set forth in the followings acts, chapter, and sections of the civil laws, penal laws, and session laws, and relating to the following subjects, are hereby repealed ... n163

Among the repealed laws were acts dealing with government lands, board of commissioners of public lands, bureau of agriculture and forestry, and water rights. Laws relating to court procedure were specifically continued in force: "That all laws of Hawaii relative to the judicial department, including civil and criminal procedure, except as modified by this Act, are continued in force, subject to modification by Congress, or the legislature." n164

Even after attaining annexation and territorial status, and despite reception of the common law, Hawaiians still faced the prospect of major land reform, because of the feudal land practices under the monarchy. An attempt to deal with this problem was made with the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act of 1921, whose overall purpose and effect have been described as follows:

> A comprehensive revision of the 1900 territorial act was effected in 1921 with passage of the Hawaiian Homes Commission Act, a statute which combined some of the features of a homestead law with reclamation and resource development and a government policy aimed at encouraging limitations upon large landholding by absentee owners in favor of native Hawaiians.
>
> The problem of land ownership -- a problem which was to continue into statehood nearly forty years > later -- dated from the declaration in the Constitution of 1840 that "Kamehameha I was the founder of the Kingdom, and to him belonged all the land from one end of the Islands to the other." This feudal tenurial concept was modified only in degree in the Constitution of 1852, under which Kamehameha III promulgated the so-called Great Mahele (division), which separated crown lands from general government-owned lands and assigned about 40 percent of all the land to the leading chiefs. Only about 30,000 acres were left for commoners to own, and this proportion of landholding continued largely unchanged through succeeding constitutions, including the 1894 instrument which exchanged the monarchy for a republic. The property qualifications for electors and officeholders were explained by the continuation of this system, and in practice if not in terms it was continued in the territorial statute of 1900 (contrast Sections 34 and 40 of the act of 1900 with the Constitution of 1894, Articles 56 and 58).

>
> Even after the 1921 statute, the tenacious grip of the great landholders was still strong. At the time of statehood in 1959, studies indicated that nearly 75 percent of the privately-owned land in the Islands was in the hands of holders of 5,000 acres or more apiece. It was not until statehood, and a legislature -- elected on promises to make new efforts at land division -- that the problem [began] to abate. n165

This 1921 Act, which has been treated as an element of the Hawaiian constitution rather than a separate act of Congress, must be considered along with Hawaii's statutory common law reception statute in determining the source of Hawaii's land law. Courts construing Hawaii's reception statute have held that the common law includes English statutes enacted before the first settlers came to America. n166 On this basis the rule against perpetuities n167 and the Statute of Uses n168 have been included in the Hawaiian reception of common law, while for other reasons such common law precepts as the rule in Shelley's Case, n169 estates tail and fees simple conditional, n170 and the requirement that the word "heirs" be used to convey a fee simple estate n171 have been rejected.

§ 7.02(m) Idaho.

The area of the present state of Idaho was adjacent to the northwestern extremity of, but not included within, the territory of the Louisiana Purchase. Only after the beginning of the 19th century did settlement activity commence, and then for several decades it consisted only of explorations, trading posts and religious missions. Idaho was originally part of the Oregon Territory, but even before Oregon became a territory its inhabitants began to form a provisional government in 1841. In 1843 they prepared Articles of Provisional Government which were adopted in 1845. According to this document, laws of Iowa Territory and principles of common law and equity would be the laws in force in Oregon (including Idaho):

> The Laws of Iowa Territory shall be the Law of this Territory in Civil, Military and Criminal cases (where not otherwise provided for) and where no Statute of Iowa Territory applies, the principles of common Law and Equity shall govern. n172

Iowa had attained territorial status in 1838, n173 and by its territorial enabling act had adopted "the existing laws of the Territory of Wisconsin." n174 Wisconsin had become a territory in 1836, n175 and had as its law in force the laws imposed by the Northwest Ordinance and the laws of the Territory of Michigan. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular > services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n176

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district ...." n177 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n178

Michigan Territory had been established in 1805, n179 and, even though the territory had a legal heritage of both English common law and elements of French law, it, too, was brought under the legal regime of the Northwest Ordinance. Michigan became a state in 1837, and was thus no longer a territory when Oregon and Idaho territories were established.

Therefore, the initial laws in force in the area of Idaho were the laws of Oregon territory, which were the laws of Iowa territory, which were the common law and the laws of Wisconsin. The laws of Wisconsin were the laws of the Northwest Ordinance and the laws of Michigan territory. The Northwest Ordinance, which was also extended to the Michigan territory, imposed a common law system over its jurisdictions.

After the United States and Great Britain began, by a treaty of 1846, to resolve their jurisdictional claims to what is now the Pacific Northwest area of the United States, the Oregon Territory was established in 1848. n180

The territorial enabling act for Oregon contained no provisions for common law reception or even for continuing prior laws in force. Instead, it declared that "all such laws, or any law or laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be utterly null and void," n181 and also voided prior land grants:

> [A]ll laws heretofore passed in said Territory making grants of land, or otherwise affecting or incumbering the title to lands, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void; and the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and declared to be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provision thereof, may be applicable. n182

One provision continuing prior law in force pertained to judicial proceedings pending at the time the territory was created, which were transferred to the territorial district court; also "penalties, forfeitures, actions, and causes of action" were made recoverable "in like manner as they would have been under the laws in force within the limits composing said Territory at the time this act shall go into operation." n183

In 1853 the Washington Territory was created out of the Oregon Territory, including within its boundaries the northern portion of Idaho. n184 As in the Oregon Territory enabling act, "all such laws, or any law or laws, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be utterly null and void," n185 but the Washington act did explicitly continue prior laws in force:

> And be it further enacted, That the laws now in force in said Territory of Washington, by virtue of the legislation of Congress in reference to the Territory of Oregon, which have been enacted and passed subsequent to the first day of September, eighteen hundred and forty-eight, applicable to the said Territory of Washington, together with the legislative enactments of the Territory of Oregon, enacted and passed prior to the passage of, and not inconsistent with, the provisions of this act, and applicable to the said Territory of Washington, be, and they are hereby, continued in force in said Territory of Washington until they shall be repealed or amended by future legislation. n186

In 1859 the southern portion of Idaho was reunited to the northern portion as part of the Washington territory. In January, 1863, the Washington territorial legislature enacted a simple common law reception provision:

> That the common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the organic act, and laws of Washington territory, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this territory. n187

In Idaho, meanwhile, territorial status was attained in March, 1863, n188 but the enabling act had no provision continuing previous laws in force or explicitly receiving the common law. The only provision in this organic act pertinent to reception was the declaration that "the said supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction." n189 With no organic provision for reception, the Idaho legislature the next year enacted a statutory common law reception provision, very similar to Washington's, and which continues in the current Idaho code:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the constitution or laws of the United States, in all cases not provided for in these compiled laws, is the rule of decision in all courts of this state. n190

Idaho's authorization for statehood was enacted in 1890, n191 with a provision continuing prior laws in force: "... all laws in force made by said Territory, at the time of its admission into the Union, shall be in force in said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State." n192 Accordingly, Idaho's constitution of 1889, and still its current constitution decrees, "All laws now in force in the territory of Idaho which are not repugnant to this Constitution shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation or be altered or repealed by the legislature." n193

The reception of several common law doctrines relating to real property has been tested in Idaho courts. Because of a statutory substitution, the common law rule against perpetuities has been held to be not in force in Idaho. n194 The common law of marital property has been replaced by a community property regime. n195 The common law riparian water rights were at first considered received in Idaho, n196 and then later held not applicable to navigable streams in the state. n197 The court so holding stated:

> [T]his state did not adopt the common law of England when such common law was inapplicable to the conditions of the state. The territory and state of Idaho, following the lead of other states having similar statutory provisions, only adopted such provisions of the common law as were applicable to the conditions of the state. The English doctrine of riparian rights has been repeatedly held not applicable to this country, especially as to navigable, non-tidal rivers and lakes, since such rivers and lakes did not exist in England. n198

No element of Idaho jurisprudence has yet addressed the question of whether English statutes are included in the received common law.

§ 7.02(n) Illinois.

French exploring and fort-building activity in the late 17th century consolidated their control over the area now in the state of Illinois. The British assumed control after the French and Indian War, and in 1778, when George Rogers Clark captured Kaskaskia, that area became a county of Virginia known as Illinois County. n199 Although presumably the law in force in Virginia also applied to its new county, the Virginia act establishing the county also directed the civil officers to "exercise their several jurisdictions, and conduct themselves agreeable to the laws which the present settlers are now accustomed to." n200 In Virginia itself, a provision for reception of the English common and statutory law was never included in Virginia's various constitutions, the first of which was adopted in 1776. However, Virginia's legislature in that same year did enact a statutory reception provision:

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n201

The area that is now Illinois became part of the United States under the Treaty of Paris in 1783 when, in that same year, Virginia agreed to cede the area and its other western territories to the national government. Not until 1787, however, was national legal authority asserted under the Northwest Ordinance. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n202

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district ...." n203 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n204

In 1800 substantial population growth led to formation of the Territory of Indiana, which included Illinois within its boundaries. n205 The Indiana territorial enactment called for "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n206 In 1807 the Indiana territorial legislature enacted its own reception statute:

> The common law of England, all statutes and acts of the British Parliament, made in aid of the common law, prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first (excepting the second section of the sixth Chapter of forty-third Elizabeth [costs in certain cases], the 8th Chapter, thirteenth Elizabeth [usury] and 9th Chapter, thirty-seventh Henry eighth [usury] and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom; and also the several laws in force in this Territory, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered, as of full force, until repealed by legislative authority. n207

By 1809, Illinois was ready for separate territorial status, but only because some major issues relating to land issues had been resolved:

> One of the major issues with which Congress also had to deal concerned the confusion of land titles in the territory. Grantees could trace their titles to a number of equally legitimate sources -- the pre-Revolutionary colonies, particularly Virginia, the French and British authorities, the Commonwealth of Virginia through its Illinois County, and various land companies of which the most ambitious had been the Ohio Company. Indian claims, as in all new territorial jurisdictions, also had to be disposed of, although the Treaty of Greenville in 1795 purported to limit Indian lands and ratify and confirm the titles of various settlers already in the territory. A Congressional enactment in 1796 had confirmed the arrangements under the Treaty of Greenville and renewed a surveying system of sections and townships originated in 1785.
>
> Under Governor [William Henry] Harrison a series of complementary treaties began, extinguishing Indian titles or moving tribes to areas presumably distant from the growing settlements. The most important of these, the Treaty of Vincennes in 1803, opened large areas west of the Wabash and encouraged a rapid influx of new settlers. The next year Congress passed an Act for the Disposal of Lands in the Indiana Territory (2 Stat. 277), which among other things established a land office in Kaskaskia [in Illinois] and authorized the sale of lands in tracts as small as a quarter section (160 acres). With this further encouragement to newcomers, it was not surprising that by 1808 the Illinois country should have more than 10,000 settlers -- a factor encouraging Congress to redivide the "Old Northwest" again the following year. n208

As in the Indiana territorial enabling act nine years earlier, the Illinois territorial enabling act of 1809 n209 called for "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n210 Swift population growth moved the territory quickly toward statehood, and the statehood enabling act in 1818 n211 required the state government to be "not repugnant to [the Northwest Ordinance]." n212 The new state constitution approved in that same year maintained prior laws in force:

> That no inconveniences may arise from the change of a territorial to a permanent State government, it is declared by the convention that all rights, suits, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts, both as it respects individuals and bodies-corporate, shall continue as if no change had taken place in this government in virtue of the laws now in force. n213

Thus, at the moment of attaining statehood, Illinois jurisprudence had thoroughly received the common law of England and associated statutes. Fittingly, the first enactment of the new state legislature was to adopt Indiana's 1807 reception statute, quoted above, and which appears in the current Illinois statutes in only slightly altered form:

> The common law of England, so far as the same is applicable and of a general nature, and all statutes or acts of the British parliament made in aid of, and to supply the defects of the common law, prior to the > fourth year of James the First, excepting the second section of the sixth chapter of 43d Elizabeth, the eighth chapter of 13th Elizabeth, and ninth chapter of 37th Henry Eighth, and which are of a general nature and not local to that kingdom, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as of full force until repealed by legislative authority. n214

The reported decisions of Illinois courts, as shown in the annotations to Illinois statutes, reveal several dozen cases giving almost literal application of the English common law to various issues of property rights. Property-related litigation has dealt with descent and distribution, wills, pecuniary legacies, administration of estates, charitable uses, conveyances, fraudulent conveyances, dedication, landlord and tenant, light and air, waters and water courses, nuisance, and married women's property rights. n215 In relatively recent examples of such cases, Illinois courts have insisted on strict adherence to common law requirements for joint tenancies n216 and declared that Illinois should not deviate from the English rule on percolating waters. n217 Nevertheless, statutory modification or supersession of the common law also occurs, as typified by the detailed Illinois legislation modifying application of the rule against perpetuities. n218

§ 7.02(o) Indiana.

As in Illinois, in the area of Indiana competing French and British forces were responsible for most of the 17th-century exploring activity. The British assumed control after the French and Indian War, but before the Revolution the only substantial settlement in the area of Indiana was Vincennes, and this was captured by George Rogers Clark on behalf of Virginia in 1778-1779. Vincennes was included with Kaskaskia (in Illinois) in the area that became a county of Virginia known as Illinois County. Illinois County of Virginia became part of the United States under the Treaty of Paris in 1783 and when, in that same year, Virginia agreed to cede the area and its other western territories to the national government. Not until 1787, however, was national legal authority asserted under the Northwest Ordinance. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n219

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district." n220 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had, in 1792, repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n221

In 1800 substantial population growth led to formation of the Territory of Indiana. n222 The Indiana territorial enactment called for "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n223 In 1807 the Indiana territorial legislature enacted its own reception statute:

> The common law of England, all statutes and acts of the British Parliament, made in aid of the common law, prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first (excepting the second section of the sixth Chapter of forty-third Elizabeth [costs in certain cases], the 8th Chapter, thirteenth Elizabeth [usury] and 9th Chapter, thirty-seventh Henry eighth [usury], and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom; and also the several laws in force in this Territory, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered, as of full force, until repealed by legislative authority. n224

Meanwhile, a series of Indian treaties -- notably the Treaty of Vincennes in 1803 -- opened up new lands for settlement, and federal land policy authorized disposal of land in smaller parcels, n225 thus encouraging a rush of new settlers.

The Indiana statehood enabling act, approved in 1816, n226 required a form of government not repugnant to the Northwest Ordinance. n227 Indiana's constitution of 1816 provided that "All laws and parts of laws now in force in this Territory, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall continue and remain in full force and effect until they expire or be repealed." n228 The same provision appeared in Indiana's 1851 constitution, n229 but has not been retained in the current version of that constitution.

However, state legislation of 1852 re-enacted the old territorial common law reception statute and this provision, with some elaboration, is still in the current Indiana statutes:

> The law governing this state is declared to be:
>
> First. The Constitution of the United States and of this state.
>
> Second. All statutes of general assembly of the state in force, and not inconsistent with such constitutions.
>
> Third. All statutes of the United States, in force, and relating to subjects over which Congress has power to legislate for the states, and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States.
>
> Fourth. The common law of England, and statutes of the British Parliament made in aid thereof prior to the fourth year of the reign of James the First (except the second section of the sixth chapter of forty-third Elizabeth, the eighth chapter of thirteenth Elizabeth, and the ninth chapter of thirty-seventh Henry the Eighth), which are of the general nature, not local to that kingdom, and not inconsistent with the first, second and third specifications of this section. n230

Indiana courts have been willing to turn away from common law rules when the rules appear outmoded, contrary to public policy, or otherwise without basis in state law. n231 In 1916 the Indiana Supreme Court delivered a lengthy but enlightening exposition on why a rigid view of early 17th-century English common law should not be applied in the state. This court represented the common law more as a system of jurisprudence based on certain general principles and adaptable to a variety of circumstances, rather than a regime of rigid and immutable rules:

> As viewed by this court, it was not the purpose of the Legislature by this [Fourth section of the reception] statute to adopt the rules of the common law as announced and applied by the courts of England prior to 1607, but that the purpose was to adopt the general principles of the common law which underlie and control all rules of decision throughout all time, as the same were affected by the acts of the British Parliament passed in aid thereof prior to the time mentioned. The statute was declaratory in its nature, Indiana being carved out of that portion of America settled by the English colonists, who brought with them the common law at the time the settlement was established, and the statutes of Parliament in aid of the common law were to be distinguished from those passed in derogation of it. Such acts were to be distinguished also from the acts of the British Parliament passed after the physical separation from the mother country, after which time courts were to look particularly to American legislation and to the reports of American courts for improvements and modifications of the rules of the common law.

The common law of England was derived from the universal usage and custom of the early English people, and is a system of jurisprudence founded upon principles of justice as it was conceived and administered by the English courts of law in contradistinction to the methods of administering justice employed by the courts of equity, and that system of jurisprudence which formed the basis of the Roman or Civil Law. For this common-law system, and from the usages, customs, and maxims upon which it is founded, innumerable rules and principles emanated, as the courts from time to time declared what they understood to be the correct law applicable to the matter before them, and such law was determined by a system of reasoning and of administering justice consistent with the universal usages, customs, and institutions of the English people. The common law grew to be a system of applying to litigated instances just, reasonable, and consistent rules of decision, suitable to the genius of the people and to their social, political, and economic conditions and the system once established has never changed. The rules deduced from this system, however, were continually changing and expanding with the progress of society in the application of this system to more diversified circumstances and under more advanced periods. The common law by its own principles adapted itself to varying conditions and modified its own rules so as to serve the ends of justice as prompted by a course of reasoning which was guided by these generally accepted truths. One of its oldest maxims was that where the reason of a rule ceased the rule also ceased, and it logically followed that when it occurred to the courts that a particular rule had never been founded upon reason, and that no reason existed in support thereof, that rule likewise ceased, and perhaps another sprang up in its place which was based upon reason and justice as then conceived. No rule of the common law could survive the reason on which it was founded. It needed no statute to change it but abrogated itself...

The principles of the English common-law system, as its theory assumes and its history proves, were not applicable or suited to one country or condition of society only, but, on the contrary, by reason of their properties of expansibility and flexibility, their application to many became practicable. The adoption of the common law in the most general terms by the government of any country did not necessarily require or admit of an unqualified application of all its rules, without regard to local circumstances and the then present enlightened conception of reason and justice. This system of jurisprudence had been adopted by virtue of statutory enactment by most of the states of the Union; but, according to the prevailing decisions, the rules as declared by the English courts at one period or another have been controlling only so far as they were suited to and in harmony with the genius, spirit, and objects of American institutions. Whether so-called common-law rules have been followed strictly in the several states has depended upon the extent to which they have seemed reasonable, and for this reason what are considered proper rules of the common law in one state are not necessarily so considered in another, and likewise rules considered proper dictations of the common law in the eighteenth century are not now so considered in the twentieth. Since courts have had an existence in America they have never hesitated to take upon themselves the responsibility of saying what are the proper rules of the common law. While courts may properly refer to well-known repositories of legal learning, to ascertain and arrive at the correct rules applicable, and may look to American as well as English books, neither precedents nor opinions of judges can be said with strict propriety to be the law. Although they are to be regarded as proper exponents of the law as adopted, they are to be received merely as evidence of the law rather than > as the law itself...

>
> We cannot believe, then, that our Legislature intended to petrify the rules of the common law as declared by judicial decisions at any one time or period, and to set them in such inflexible form as to make them absolute rules of decision throughout all time. The theory of our adopted system is that the law consists, not in the actual rules enforced by the decisions of the courts, but consists only in the principles from which these rules flow. Under the section of the statute relied on, where there are no governing enactments of the Legislature, the courts of this state are, in all matters coming before them, to endeavor to administer justice according to the promptings of reason and common sense, which are the cardinal principles of the common law, and they are not to accept blindly the decisions of the English courts of any particular time or period without inquiring as to the reasons upon which they rest. To do so would be to adopt a practice which would be in direct violation of the theory of that common law which the statute prescribes we are to follow... n232

A more dogmatic position on old common law doctrines was taken in a 1937 Indiana case, n233 but the view of that later case has not been adopted by any subsequent Indiana court.

§ 7.02(p) Iowa.

The entire area now forming the state of Iowa was originally made a part of the United States territory by inclusion within the Louisiana Purchase. Even though until the 1830's there were almost no Iowa inhabitants other than Indians, a legal regime still applied to the area as a result of Congressional legislation in connection with the Louisiana Purchase. French and Spanish governance over the territory of the Louisiana Purchase was meaningful only in the areas of settlement, essentially confined to New Orleans and St. Louis. French governance ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n234

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, called the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n235 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n236

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad reception statute for the English common law:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor > shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n237

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n238

When the State of Missouri was formed in 1821, no actual governmental authority applied to the Louisiana Purchase territory north of Missouri, including Iowa, until 1834, when Congress attached Iowa to the Territory of Michigan. n239 The Michigan Territory was subject to the prior law of the Northwest Ordinance, which imposed a common law system over its jurisdictions. In 1836, Wisconsin Territory was created with the land from the Territory of Michigan, except the portion designated as the state of Michigan, so Iowa was thus attached to the Wisconsin Territory. n240 According to its territorial enabling statute, Wisconsin law included the laws issued under the Northwest Ordinance generally, and the laws of Michigan Territory specifically:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to, and enjoy, all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the articles of the [Northwest Ordinance]; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of the said Territory. The said inhabitants shall also be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Michigan, and to its inhabitants, and the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Wisconsin; and further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof may be applicable. n241

Just two years after this shift, Iowa itself attained territorial status. n242 The territorial enabling act for Iowa continued in force the prior law of Wisconsin Territory, which, as mentioned above, continued in force the prior law of Michigan Territory and of the Northwest Ordinance:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Wisconsin and to its inhabitants; and the existing laws of the Territory of Wisconsin shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same be not incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Iowa; and further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof, may be applicable. n243

The enabling act also declared that "the said supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess a chancery as well as common law jurisdiction. n244

In 1840 the territorial legislature summarily repealed "all the acts of the Territory of Michigan and the Territory of Wisconsin which were in force in the Territory of Iowa" on July 4, 1838, and decreed that "None of the statutes of Great Britain shall be considered as law in this Territory." n245 This act was still in effect when Iowa's admission to statehood was authorized in 1845, n246 and the new constitution of 1846 was adopted, continuing prior laws in force: "All laws now in force and not inconsistent with this constitution, shall remain in force until they shall expire or be repealed." n247 The same provision was continued in the 1857 constitution. n248 In that same year the Iowa Supreme Court held that common law dower was still the law in Iowa and issued a very restrictive reading of the legislation rejecting British statutes and the common law, declining to give it "any greater effect than is necessary":

> In the first place, according to our recollection of history, the common law was substituted for the civil law by the Missouri territory, of which this state was once a part. In the next place, so many rights and titles -- so great interests have grown up, as if by and under the common law, and not by and under the civil -- that it would be the duty of a court to hold that the people brought it with them. The territory has, from the beginning, including all private rights and titles, been administered upon the basis of the common law, and to hold that the civil, and not the common law, is the law of this state, would produce startling and revolutionary effects. The extent and magnitude of the interests involved, would require a court to hold to the common law, if there was no other reason.
>
> But, besides this, all our laws, back to the beginning of the territory, recognize -- assume the common law. They would many of them, be unmeaning, senseless, without it. All the proceedings of the courts would be so, and not a judgment heretofore recovered would be valid, nor a title under it. But the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, made it the law of that country; and that was extended over Wisconsin, and then the laws of Wisconsin, over Iowa. And although the statutes of Michigan and Wisconsin were repealed in 1840, the ordinance of 1787 was not affected, but remained in full vigor as before. That ordinance made the law of dower one of the fundamental laws. . . .
>
> * * *
>
> By the original common law, the doweress could not recover damages for the detention of her dower. This was remedied by the statute of Merton, 20 Hen. III, A.D. 1236...
>
> It becomes, in some measure important, then, to inquire what effect, if any, the statute of Merton has in this State. Experience, and the dictates of justice, produced the enactment of that statute, and they have lost none of their force in the periods which have passed since that time. It is urged that this ancient statute can have no effect here, because of the enactment of the sixth section of the act of July 30, 1840 (Special Session, 1840, chap. 29, p. 20), which is, that "none of the statutes of Great Britain shall be considered as law of this territory." The enactment of this chapter, containing a repeal of the laws of Michigan and Wisconsin, as well as the above declaration in reference to the statutes of Great Britain, was then, and has ever since been considered of very doubtful wisdom, and of no less doubtful effect. It seemed to be taking a step in the dark. That act did not receive the approval of the governor of the territory. He was a man of age, experience, and of careful forethought, and his approval was withheld through doubts and fears of the consequences of such a step. The lawyer can readily perceive that there was much reason for hesitation. The statutes of England, from time to time, modified and meliorated the common law to a considerable extent. Some of them were necessary to deliver the nation and the law from feudal principles, and some were requisite to adapt the law to an improved state of society emerging from feudal semi-barbarism, and to suit an increasing spirit of commercial enterprise. In this view of them, these statutes were as much required by the people of America, as by those of the mother country. Many of them of a general character, and an enabling or remedial nature, have been adopted by the different states (even by the new western ones), either by express statute provision, or by re-enactment, or by judicial construction; the latter sometimes declaring them adopted, and sometimes considering them as become the common law of the state. Sufficient has probably been said to recall to our minds the importance of some of these acts, and the necessity that we should, in some manner, > receive the benefit of the leading and most important of them. And these remarks will justify us in saying, that we are not disposed to give the above named section, relating to the statutes of Great Britain, any greater effect than is necessary.

>
> Then the question is, whether the declaration of that section extends to the statutes of England. Great Britain is not the same with England, although it includes it. The greater part, if not all of those beneficial acts, which have been adopted into the laws of the American States, were enacted before the union with Scotland. The periods at which the English statutes have been held to cease operating upon American law, have been different in different states.
>
> Some have stopped at the fourth year of James I, which was about the period of the first emigration to this country; some have fixed the epoch of our revolution; and some, if we mistake not, that of the revolution of 1688. The above act of 1840 may reasonably be considered as having prescribed the event of the union of the crown of England with that of Scotland, which was nearly contemporaneous with that of the English revolution, it having taken place in the year 1707. This is more reasonable than to regard that declaration as to the statutes of Great Britain, as synonymous with a like declaration in relation to the statutes of England, which would receive support from neither history, language, nor the principles of interpretation. We conclude, therefore, that the statute of Merton is not deprived of any effect by the foregoing declaration of the act of 1840... n249

Subsequent Iowa courts have considered the common law not repealed, either accepting it as applicable to a question of state law, n250 or rejecting it for reasons other than repeal. n251

§ 7.02(q) Kansas.

The area that is now in the state of Kansas was originally included in the Territory of Kansas that was established in 1854. The Territory of Kansas had been part of the Louisiana Purchase and theoretically shared in the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to the early settlement history of that area n252. As far as permanent settlement and government are concerned, Spanish exploration in the 16th century and French probes in the 17th and 18th centuries ultimately produced no permanent settlements in Kansas. French governance over the region was effectively confined to the settlements at New Orleans and St. Louis and ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n253

Spanish authority ended in 1803, and when the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n254 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n255

Such a provision was hardly meaningful in the region of Kansas, where no permanent settlements were established until 1820. However, in 1806, a ceremony had been conducted at an Indian village in Kansas to remove the Spanish flag and replace it with the American flag. Moreover, because it was anticipated that Kansas would be a prime location for resettlement of Indians, other settlements were not encouraged. This began to change when a military outpost was established in 1842 and emigrant trails were pushed through Kansas, spawning still more settlements along the trails. Settlement dramatically increased after passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854, attempting to resolve the slavery question in new states and establishing the Territory of Kansas, which also included most of Colorado.

The lands in the Territory of Kansas had technically been under the legal rules enacted by the Indiana territorial government from the time of the Louisiana Purchase. This government enacted certain laws for the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area of the Louisiana Purchase outside New Orleans, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted for this territory after this change also dealt with familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, which, of course, did not affect the Kansas area, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad reception statute for the English common law:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n256

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n257

No changes in the laws applicable to the Kansas area occurred thereafter until the Kansas Territory was created in 1854 and the first legislature met in 1854. In the territorial enabling act, no explicit common law reception was mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n258 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n259

In 1855 the new Kansas territorial legislature enacted a general common law reception statute, providing that both English common law and pertinent English statutes were adopted:

> The common law of England and all statutes and acts of parliament made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, and not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, and the act entitled "An act to organize the territory of Nebraska and Kansas," or any statute law which may from time [to] time be made or passed by this or any subsequent legislative assembly of the territory of Kansas, shall be the rule of action and decision in this territory, and law, custom or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. n260

In 1862 this territorial provision was enacted without change by the Kansas state legislature, one year after statehood was achieved. n261

The 1861 Act of Admission n262 contained no reception provision, nor did the first Kansas constitution, which had been drafted in 1859. However, the constitution did maintain previous laws in force: "All laws and parts of laws in force in the Territory at the time of the acceptance of this constitution by Congress, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall continue and remain in full force until they expire or shall be repealed." n263

In 1868 the reception statute of 1862 was modified to the language that appears in the current Kansas statutes:

> The common law as modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions, and the conditions and wants of the people, shall remain in force in aid of the General Statutes of this state; but the rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof shall be strictly construed, shall not be applicable to any general statute of this state, but all such statutes shall be liberally construed to promote their object. n264

In addition to the reception statute, other Kansas statutes relating to the common law specifically reject several older real property doctrines, such as certain rules governing concurrent tenancies, the rule in Shelley's Case, estates in tail, the indefinite failure of issue, certain grants for life, the doctrine of worthier title, and the rule in Wyld's Case. n265 The Kansas courts appear not to have addressed the matters of whether or to what extent English statutes are considered received with the common law, or at what point in time common law doctrines are considered fixed.

§ 7.02(r) Kentucky.

Kentucky was first explored by the French in the second half of the 17th century, and the first French trading post was established in 1756. In 1748, however, the English Virginia colony had made a grant of Kentucky land to an exploring party, English exploration had commenced in 1750, and the first English settlement followed soon after. Settlements under Daniel Boone and others were founded in 1775. Virginia, which claimed Kentucky land as part of Virginia's indefinite western boundary extension, had designated the area as Fincastle County in 1772; the western part of this county was made into a separate county, named Kentucky, in 1776. n266

Common law reception in early Kentucky is thus bound up with the matter of colonial Virginia's common law reception. Virginia's long colonial history, in turn, demonstrates at every stage a heavy reliance on English law. The royal charter that led directly to establishment of Jamestown in Virginia required that the supervising council govern "according to such laws, ordinances, and instructions, as shall be in that behalf, given and signed with our hand or sign manuel, and pass under the privy seal of our realm of England." n267 This charter secured to all persons dwelling or born within the colonies the right of English citizens, to "have and enjoy all liberties, franchises, and immunities, within any of our other dominions, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born, within this our realm of England, or any other of our said dominions." n268 Supplemental instructions drafted in November, 1606, proclaimed that:

> for the good government of the people to be planted in those parts, and for the good ordering and disposing of all causes happening within the same, and the same to be done for the substance thereof, as neer to the common lawes of England, and the equity thereof, as may be... n269

Land grants in colonial Virginia were likewise governed by common law, as stated in the supplemental instructions to the colony of November 20, 1606:

> [A]nd moreover wee doe hereby ordaine and establish for us, our heires and successors, that all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments to be had and enjoyed by any of our subjects within the precincts aforesaid, shall be had and inherited and enjoyed, according as in the like estates they be had and enjoyed by the lawes within this realme of England... n270

Early in 1609 the patentees drafted a new charter, which was approved by James I on May 23, 1609. With respect to property rights, the 1609 charter reconfirmed that the patentees were authorized to acquire such rights, after first obtaining royal permission:

> And that [the patentees] and their successors, shall be, from henceforth, forever enabled to take, acquire and purchase, by the name aforesaid (license for the same, from us, our heirs or successors, first had and obtained) any manner of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, goods and chattels, within our realm of England, and dominion of Wales. n271

The 1609 charter also confirmed that such property rights were the rights recognized under existing English law:

> [The patentees] are to have and to hold, possess and enjoy, all and singular the said lands, countries and territories, with all and singular other premises, heretofore by these presents granted, or mentioned to be granted; to the sole and proper use of [the patentees], their successors and assigns for ever; to be holden of us, our heirs, and successors, as of our manour of East Greenwich, in free and common socage, and not in capite... n272

Property rights previously granted were ratified, except that the northern boundary of the territory open to Virginia Company colonization was shifted back from the forty-first to the fortieth latitude. n273

Soon Virginia patentees sought and obtained from the king a third charter on March 12, 1612. This charter reaffirmed the grants of the earlier charters and reiterated the language of the two previous charters concerning the holding of lands in free and common socage. n274 It also confirmed interests previously granted n275 and declared that questions in construing or interpreting any of the charter provisions should be resolved in favor of the company. n276

When the Stuart monarch was restored to the English throne in 1660, it seemed appropriate to the Virginia assembly to confirm their allegiance to English law. Thus the assembly proclaimed that Virginians "have also endeavoured in all things (as neere as the capacity and constitution of this country would admitt) to addhere to those excellent and often refined laws of England, to which we profess and acknowledge all due obedience and reverence ...." n277 In 1666 the assembly appropriated money to purchase law books, in order to more faithfully follow English common law. n278

A provision for explicit reception of the English common and statutory law was never included in Virginia's various constitutions, the first of which was adopted in 1776. However, in that same year, the year Kentucky was created as a separate administrative unit of Virginia, Virginia's legislature did enact a statutory reception provision:

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n279

Kentuckians' remoteness from the seat of their government led to early pressure for separate and independent status. The Virginia legislature obliged in 1785 by passing an enabling act, authorizing separate status upon certain conditions. n280 Among the conditions was that land rights prior to separation would remain valid and governed by the law of Virginia:

> That all private rights and interests in lands within the said district, derived from the laws of Virginia, prior to such separation, shall remain valid and secure under the laws of the proposed state, and shall be determined by the laws existing in this state. n281

No action was taken under that enabling act before a new enabling act issued from the Virginia legislature, but without most of the conditions in the prior act. n282 Kentuckians met in July, 1788, pursuant to this second enabling act, but adjourned in September and reconvened in November, uncertain about what to do in face of the new federal constitution then going through the ratification process, or the newly enacted Northwest Ordinance, soon to be followed by a "Southwest Ordinance" applicable to Kentucky. Later in 1788, while the reconvened Kentucky meetings were still in session, Virginia passed a third enabling act in conformance with requirements of the new federal constitution. n283 This new act contained the same provision regarding Virginia laws and prior land rights as found in the first enabling act, n284 but other conditions were objectionable. A fourth and final enabling act ensued, n285 with the same clause for prior land rights and the applicability of Virginia laws, n286 and the Kentuckians once again convened in June, 1790. Meanwhile, Congress had enacted the so-called "Southwest Ordinance" on May 26, 1790, imposing a temporary government over the area south of the Ohio River, including Kentucky, and declaring that the inhabitants of the territory "shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits and advantages set forth in the [Northwest Ordinance]" and that "the government of the said territory south of the Ohio, shall be similar to that which is now exercised in the territory northwest of the Ohio...." n287 The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law. However, Kentucky was technically still part of Virginia, and therefore not under the jurisdiction of the Southwest Ordinance.

In February, 1791, Congress authorized admission of Kentucky into the union as a separate state (the 15th), n288 and by April, 1792, Kentuckians had prepared a new constitution and were formally admitted as a state in June, 1792. The new constitution continued prior Virginia laws in force:

> All laws now in force in the State of Virginia, not inconsistent with this constitution, which are of a general nature, and not local to the eastern part of that State, shall be in force in this State, until they shall be altered or repealed by the legislature. n289

In June, 1792, Virginia's original common law reception statute was still in force, although later in 1792 Virginia would repeal the portion of the statute receiving English statutes.

Kentucky's constitution of 1799 contained a similar provision, fixing the borrowing of Virginia's common law reception as June 1, 1792:

> All laws which, on the first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, were in force in the State of Virginia, and which are of a general nature, and not local to that State, and not repugnant to this constitution, nor to the laws which have been enacted by the legislature of this commonwealth, shall be in force within this State, until they shall be altered or repealed by the general assembly. n290

The identical provisions appeared in the 1850 constitution, n291 and in the 1890 constitution 1, n292 which is the current provision. Whatever common law has been received under this statute borrowed from Virginia laws has been modified by the current Kentucky statute declaring that "The decisions of the courts of Great Britain rendered since July 4, 1776, shall not be of binding authority in the courts of Kentucky." n293

Only in a few cases have Kentucky courts been asked to explain the extent of common law reception in the state, and those judicial pronouncements have only restated the constitutional and statutory provisions. Perhaps the most recent statement was issued in a 1953 opinion, in which the Kentucky Court of Appeals stated simply, "The common law is in force in Kentucky except as it has been modified by the Constitution, a statute or by judicial decisions or public policy." n294 An earlier court gave a more detailed explanation:

> The principles and rules constituting a part of the common law prior to the time stated, which was

> March 24, 1607, that were of a general nature and not local to the kingdom are and have ever been in force in Kentucky except as they have been modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions and the conditions and wants of the people, or which are not repugnant to the spirit of our laws or the public policy of the state. The common law is of equal authority and binding force with the statute law. n295

In another court opinion:

> The history of the adoption is given as follows: "By an ordinance of 1776, Virginia adopted 'the common law of England, and all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of James I., and which [were] of a general nature and not local to that kingdom.' And the eighth section of the sixth article of the constitution of Kentucky adopted, with certain qualifications, all laws which were in force in the state of Virginia ..." "... To declare that the common law and statutes enacted prior to that time should be in force was equivalent to declaring that no rule of common law not then recognized and in force in England should be recognized and enforced here. James I. ascended the throne of England in 1603 (March 24th), and the fourth year of his reign commenced March 24, 1607 [in fact, the fourth year commenced in 1606]; and when it is sought to enforce in this state any rule of English common law, as such, independently of its soundness in principle, it ought to appear that it was established and recognized as the law of England prior to the latter date." n296

§ 7.02(s) Louisiana.

The area of Louisiana was first explored by the Spanish in the 16th century and then by the French in the 17th century. In 1682 Lasalle formally claimed Louisiana territory, and indeed the entire Mississippi Valley for France, and serious settlement efforts were underway two decades later. King Louis XIV granted a private charter to Antoine Crozat in 1712, n297 in order to begin developing the resources of the area. In this Crozat charter it was specified that "Our Edicts, Ordinances and Customs, and the Usages of the Mayoralty and Shreevalty of Paris, shall be observed for Laws and Customs in said Country of Louisiana." n298

When this endeavor failed to progress, a new charter was granted in 1717 to the so-called Company of the West. n299 This Company, too, failed to prosper and was taken over by the French crown in 1731. The Company's charter had authorized it to "grant land, even allodially, to erect forts, and levy troops and recruits even in the kingdom, procuring the King's commission for this purpose." n300 No change in legal regime occurred thereafter until the French secretly ceded the territory west of the Mississippi River to the Spanish, whereupon the French and other inhabitants rebelled and were suppressed by Spanish authority. When the Spanish governor thereafter assumed office in 1769, he apparently first issued a proclamation maintaining French law in force and then a few weeks later issued a code of ordinances that placed Spanish law in force. As explained a few years later by the Louisiana State Supreme Court:

> [I]t is said, that ... the French law, called the code noir, ... was in force in this country. To establish this, a proclamation is produced, issued by Don Alessandro de O'Reilly [the Spanish governor], of the 27th of August, 1769, whereby it is continued in force. How far the Spanish officer, who took possession of Louisiana, was authorized to maintain the former laws or introduce the laws of Spain, is a subject on which vain inquiries have often been made here. It is probable he did not deposit among the archives of the province any copy of his instructions, or that, if he did, it has disappeared before the country was delivered to the government of the United States. We are therefore left to take it for granted that he did not act without authorisation. Admitting then that he had a discretionary power to preserve such of the existing laws as should be deemed fit, it appears that he thought proper on the 27th of August, 1769, that is to say, about a week after he had taken possession, to declare that the French code noir should continue in force. But that this was a measure resorted to on the spur of the moment, in the midst of the storm which then agitated the country, is evident from his subsequent conduct. We see him three months > after, when tranquillity was restored, and when he could give the necessary attention to the business of legislation, publishing in the French language an extract from the whole body of the Spanish law, with references to the books in which they are contained, purporting to be intended for an elementary instruction to the inhabitants of the province; meanwhile the knowledge of the Spanish language should diffuse itself and enable them to read the laws in their original idiom. This publication, followed from that moment by an uninterrupted observance of the Spanish law, has been received as an introduction of the Spanish code in all its parts, and must be considered as having repealed the laws formerly prevailing in Louisiana, whether they had continued in force by the tacit or express consent of government. The observation made by counsel of the appellant that the French code noir, ordered by O'Reilly to continue in force, could co-exist with the Spanish laws afterward published, because it contains certain regulations for which the Spanish laws have made no provision, is probably correct. When a law is not absolutely and generally repealed, such of its provisions as are not repugnant with the subsequent laws, do not cease to have effect. n301

The code referred to in the Beard opinion, promulgated by the new Spanish governor in 1769, signaled the change in legal regime to Spanish law, as noted in the code's preamble:

> [I]t is indispensable to ... establish in [the stead of the council] that form of political government and administration of justice prescribed by our wise laws, and by which all the states of his majesty in America have been maintained in the most perfect tranquility, content, and subordination ... And as the want of advocates in this country, and the little knowledge which his new subjects possess of the Spanish laws, might render a strict observance of them difficult, ... we have thought it useful, and even necessary to form an abstract or regulation drawn from the said laws, which may serve for instruction and elementary formulary in the administration of justice and in the economical government of this city, until a more general knowledge of Spanish language may enable every one, by the perusal of the aforesaid laws, to extend his information to every point thereof. n302

Under the treaty of cession by which the United States purchased the Louisiana Territory in 1803 n303 the inhabitants were to maintain their rights under prior law:

> The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess. n304

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, called the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n305 This same legislation also created a federal district court for the Territory of Orleans, with the judge having the same jurisdiction and powers "which are by law given to, or may be exercised by the judge of Kentucky district ...." n306

Existing law was continued in force for the Territory of Orleans: "The laws in force in the said territory [of Louisiana], at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with the provisions thereof, shall continue in force, until altered, modified, or repealed by the legislature." n307 A parallel provision for the District of Louisiana was also included: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n308

Land grants made under Spanish authority were also recognized:

> That all grants for lands within the territories ceded by the French Republic to the United States, by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, the title whereof was, at the date of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, in the crown, government or nation of Spain, and every act and proceeding subsequent thereto, of whatsoever nature, towards the obtaining any grant, title, or claim to such lands, and under whatsoever authority transacted, or pretended, be, and the same are, hereby declared to be, and to have been from the beginning, null, void, and of no effect in law or equity. (a) Provided nevertheless, that any thing in this section contained shall not be construed to make null and void any bona fide grant, made agreeably to the laws, usages and customs of the Spanish government to an actual settler on the lands so granted, for himself, and for his wife and family; or to make null and void any bona fide act or proceeding done by an actual settler agreeably to the laws, usages and customs of the Spanish government, to obtain a grant for lands actually settled on by the person or persons claiming title thereto, if such settlement in either case was actually made prior to the twentieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and three: And provided further, that such grant shall not secure to the grantee or his assigns more than one square mile of land, together with such other and further quantity as heretofore hath been allowed for the wife and family of such actual settler, agreeably to the laws, usages and customs of the Spanish government. n309

As the United States Congress thereafter sought to refine the governmental arrangements, it approved "An act for ascertaining and adjusting titles and claims to land, within the Territory of Orleans, and the district of Louisiana," which confirmed prior titles under both French and Spanish governments:

> [A]ny person or persons, and the legal representative of any person or persons, who on the first day of October, in the year one thousand eight hundred, were resident within the territories ceded by the French Republic to the United States, by the treaty of the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, and who had prior to the said first day of October, one thousand eight hundred, obtained from the French or Spanish governments respectively, during the time either of the said governments had the actual possession of said territories, any duly registered warrant, or order for survey for lands lying within the said territories to which the Indian title had been extinguished, and which were on that day actually inhabited and cultivated by such person or persons, or for his or their use, shall be confirmed in their claims to such lands in the same manner as if their titles had been completed ... n310

In 1805 the District of Louisiana was redesignated the Territory of Louisiana and its prior laws were continued in force; n311 legislative and judicial powers were vested in a governor and three judges, and the judges were given "the same jurisdiction which is possessed by the judges of the Indiana Territory...." n312

The legislature of the Territory of Orleans created a new code for the Territory in 1808, combining elements of colonial French and Spanish laws with the Napoleonic Code that had been published in France in 1805. In adopting this new code the territorial legislature declared the abrogation of whatever prior law was "contrary to the dispositions in said digest, or irreconcilable with them...." n313 Louisiana judges treated this provision as leaving prior Spanish law in force, unless it was directly contrary to or irreconcilable with new code. n314

This Territory of Orleans was authorized to prepare for statehood in 1811 n315 and was admitted in 1812. n316 The new constitution of 1812 was modeled after the Kentucky constitution of 1799, and in more than one provision continued prior law in force:

> That no inconvenience may arise from a change of a territorial to a permanent State government, it is declared by the convention that all rights, suits, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts, both as it respects individuals and bodies-corporate, shall continue as if no change had taken place in this government, in virtue of the laws now in force. n317
>
> All laws now in force in this Territory, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall continue and remain in full effect until repealed by the legislature. n318

However, in the judiciary article was a special provision for continuing prior law in force and preventing wholesale incorporation or reception of English common law:

> The existing laws in this Territory, when this constitution goes into effect, shall continue to be in force until altered or abolished by the legislature: Provided, however, That the legislature shall never adopt any system or code of laws by a general reference to the said system or code, but in all cases shall specify the several provisions of the laws it may enact. n319

In this same spirit resistant to common law reception an early Louisiana court denied that the use of a common law procedural term necessarily invoked the associated common law practices and procedures. n320

A new code was promulgated in 1825, which made an attempt to completely abolish received prior law of Spanish, French or Roman origin:

> From and after the promulgation of this Code, the Spanish, Roman and French laws, which were in force in this State when Louisiana was ceded to the United States, and the acts of the Legislative Council, of the legislature of the Territory of Orleans, and of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, be and are hereby repealed in every case, for which it has been especially provided in this Code, and they shall not be invoked as laws, even under the pretense that their provisions are not contrary or repugnant to those of this Code. n321

Nevertheless, soon thereafter a Louisiana court recognized as valid certain provisions in the 1808 code that had not been expressly continued in the 1825 code. n322 In response, the Louisiana legislature enacted statutes expressly repealing virtually all provisions of the 1808 code that had not been reprinted in the 1825 code, n323 and abrogating "all the civil laws which were in force before the promulgation of the civil code lately promulgated [with one enumerated exception]." n324

A Louisiana court in 1836 held that this provision repealed "the whole body of Spanish law," n325 but three years later another court decided that the legislature could only repeal laws that it had enacted, leaving older civil law principles intact; n326 this reasoning has been followed by subsequent Louisiana courts. n327

In the new state constitution of 1845, the provisions maintaining prior laws and actions in force n328 and preventing wholesale reception of older laws n329 were continued. Indeed, they have continued through the numerous intervening state constitutions n330 and remain essentially unchanged in Louisiana's present constitution. n331 A Louisiana court has explained the scope of the provision prohibiting the adoption of a system of laws by mere general reference:

> We are inclined to think that the words "any system or code of laws," as used in the article, means systems of law, codes of law in vogue in other countries or jurisdictions; that these are not to be adopted by merely a general reference to the same, but that such systems or codes, or the several provisions of the same, wanted to be adopted or enacted here, are to be recited at length in the adopting act. n332

As if to emphasize that no reception of common law may be presumed for rules of decision, a Louisiana statute deals with cases lacking expressly applicable law:

> In all civil matters, where there is no express law, the judge is bound to proceed and decide according to equity. To decide equitably, an appeal is to be made to natural law and reason, or received usages, where positive law is silent. n333

§ 7.02(t) Maine.

The area of Maine was first visited by John and Sebastian Cabot, in the service of the English, at the end of the 15th century, and then a few years later by explorers for France and Spain. In 1602 an English adventurer landed on the coast of Maine and returned to England with timber and furs. In 1603 another English probe was sent out and, in that same year, the French King Henry IV issued a charter for settlement of the area. The French colony begun there in 1604 was abandoned in 1607.

An English charter was issued in 1607, and a colony on the Maine coast was founded in 1608, but the settlers returned to England in 1608. After the French set up Indian missions in 1611, the English expelled them in 1613. James I's patent for New England in 1620 covered the Maine area, and the Maine portion was conveyed to the English adventurer Sir William Alexander in 1621; meanwhile, an overlapping grant also covering Maine was issued in 1622 to Sir Ferdinando Gorges and Captain John Mason.

Each of these documents attempted to establish a basic law for the region. In the 1603 charter from the French King Henry IV, the grantees were "to ordaine, decide and cause to be executed all that which you shall judge fitt and necessary to bee done, for to maintaine, keepe and conserve the said places under our power & authority by the formes, waies and meanes prescribed by our laws." n334

The English grant to Sir Ferdinando Gorges and Captain John Mason sought to impose English law on the area:

> And the said Sr. Ferdinando Gorges and Capt. John Mason doe further covenant for them their heyres and assignes, that they will establish such government in the said porcons of lands and islands granted unto them, and the same will from time to time continue, as shall be agreeable, as neere as may be to the laws and customs of the realme of England. n335

The English presence continued to dominate, even though characterized by conflicting and overlapping claims. The underlying New England grant of 1620 was surrendered to the crown in 1635, and a new patent issued to Gorges in 1639. Again the grantee was given:

> power and authority with the assent of the greater parte of the Freeholders of the said Province and Premisses for the tyme being (when there shalbee any) whoe arae to bee called thereunto from tyme to tyme when and as often as it shalbee requisite to make ordeyne and publish Lawes Ordinances and Constitucons reasonable and not repugnant or contrary but agreeable (as neere as conveniently may bee) to the Lawes of England for the publique good of the said Province and Premisses and of the Inhabitants thereof ... n336

The Gorges patent was revoked in 1647, whereupon the Massachusetts Bay colony extended its jurisdiction over the Province of Maine.

Massachusetts colony was also founded on a firm footing of English law. Massachusetts had been incorporated by a group of English Puritans as "The Company for Massachusetts Bay," purchased nearby land from the New England Council in 1628, and the next year obtained a royal charter confirming the purchase and conferring legislative power on the corporation. This 1629 charter, too, recited the usual statement of English land tenure, "To be houlden ... as of [the king's] Mannor of East Greenewich in the County of Kent, in free and comon Soccage, and not in Capite nor by Knight's Service ...." n337 Also, the grant of legislative power was limited "soe as such Lawes and Ordinances be not contrarie or repugnant to the Lawes and Statuts of this our Realme of England." n338

Following a lengthy drafting process a code of laws for the Massachusetts Bay colony was produced in 1641. Neither in this code nor in its famous published successor, the 1648 Book of the General Lauues and Libertyes Concerning the Inhabitants of Massachusetts, is there any explicit reference to a foundation of English law. Nevertheless, while departing from English law in individual details, the form and substance of these codes reveal a strong influence of English law. n339

In 1664 a successor and heir to Gorges secured another patent to the Maine area, again with authority to rule "according to such lawes orders ordinances direccons and instruments soe always as the said statutes ordinances and proceedings be not contrary to but as neare as conveniently may be agreeable to the lawes statutes and government of this our realme of England ... n340

There followed in 1674 a new grant of Maine land from England's King Charles II to his brother, the Duke of York, again with power to govern with laws that "bee not contrary to but as neare as may bee agreeable to the Lawes Statutes and Government of this our realm of England ...." n341 The Gorges interest was transferred by deed to Massachusetts in 1678, and Maine remained a district within Massachusetts until 1820.

During this period of joint governance over Maine, Massachusetts law continued be thoroughly English, with some unorthodox elements. Throughout the 17th century, various attempts by English officials to require that Massachusetts legislation be modified to conform to English law on individual points were strongly resisted. Ironically, a by-product of the resistance was that the colonists proclaimed infringement on their rights as Englishmen. n342 The assertion of royal power culminated with the union of Plymouth, Massachusetts, Maine and Nova Scotia colonies under a royal charter in 1691. This charter reiterated the tenure of free and common socage "as of our Manor of East Greenwich in the County of Kent," n343 and confirmed the legislative power:

> to make ordaine and establish all manner of wholsome and reasonable Orders Laws Statutes and Ordinances Directions and Instructions either with penalties or without (soe as the same be not repugnant or contrary to the Lawes of this our Realme of England) as they shall Judge to be for the good and welfare of our said Province or Territory ... n344

It may fairly be said, therefore, that as Massachusetts progressed toward statehood, its jurisprudence had a foundation that was inescapably based on the settlers' almost universal background of English law (however slight one's explicit acquaintance with the common law) mixed with a more conspicuous element of indigenous law derived from religious sources.

In the first Massachusetts Constitution, in 1780, the legislative power was not restricted or related in any way to an English common-law foundation; only the constitution itself was the legislative guide:

> And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said general court from time to time, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this commonwealth ... n345

To the extent English common law influenced Massachusetts colonial legislation and judicial decisions prior to statehood and was still recognized, it was received under the following provision of the 1780 Constitution:

> All the laws which have heretofore been adopted, used, and approved in the province, colony, or State of Massachusetts Bay, and usually practised on in the courts of law, shall still remain and be in full > force, until altered or repealed by the legislature, such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this constitution. n346

This 1780 constitution has been the subject of several subsequent state constitutional conventions, but despite the changes and attempted changes, it remains the current constitution of Massachusetts:

> The Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 is the oldest state constitution in the United States, and its unique history is at once simple and complicated for a collection such as this. Conventions in 1820, 1853, and 1917 considered a variety of amendments, and revisions, of the original document; but the fact remains that in each instance the recognizable contents and outline of the original document continued. n347

Eventually the provision for reception of prior colonial law in Massachusetts's 1780 constitution opened the way for judicial reception of the English common law. Shortly after Maine was separated from Massachusetts, the Massachusetts Supreme Court construed the phrase "laws which have heretofore been adopted" as:

> the great body of common law with those statutes made before the emigration of our ancestors, which were made in amendment of the common law, so far as these rules and principles were applicable to our condition and form of government ...
>
> Taking it then as well established that the rules and maxims of the common law, referred to in the constitution, were those which our ancestors brought with them, and which had been, to some extent, modified and adapted to our condition by the legislative jurisprudence of the colonial and provincial governments, it follows that these rules and principles were regarded as binding both upon legislators and judges in their respective departments. n348

The Massachusetts court had also held that an English statute amending the common law before the settlement of America was part of the common law received in America. As to the application of common law after American settlement:

> [Our ancestors] ... came to this country, bringing with them, as all agree, the rights and privileges of Englishmen, and the common law of that country, so far it should be found applicable to their new state and condition. They brought with them also a charter, containing power to make such new laws as their exigencies might require. They could live under the old law or make new ones. Whenever they legislated upon any subject, their own law regulated them; when they did not legislate, the law they brought with them was the rule of conduct. n349

Although these judicial pronouncements from Massachusetts courts occurred shortly after the separation of Maine, presumably they reflect assumptions about the reception of the common law that were current in Maine, too.

Finally in June, 1819, the Massachusetts General Court agreed to recommend the separation of Maine, stipulating:

> That all the laws which shall be in force within said District of Maine, upon the fifteenth day of March next, shall still remain and be in force, within the said proposed State, until altered or repealed by the government thereof, such part only excepted as may be inconsistent with the situation and condition of said new State, or repugnant to the Constitution thereof. n350

The constitution drafted in 1819 in anticipation of statehood also continued prior law in force: "All laws now in force in this State, and not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain and be in force until altered or repealed by the legislature or shall expire by their own limitation." n351 This provision remains in the present state constitution. n352

Massachusetts formally ceded Maine on February 25, 1820, n353 and Congress admitted Maine as a state approximately one week later on March 3, 1820. n354

In some respects Maine courts have been more forthright about their state's adoption of the common law than have Massachusetts courts, even though Maine's reception is derived from Massachusetts' reception. A Maine court in 1910 declared,

> When it is said that the early colonists brought over with them the English common law, adopting so much of it as they chose, it is not meant that they brought it over as a body of law, and recognized it as law because it was the law of England. Such a statement would be historically inaccurate. It would even be contrary to the truth, so far at least as the Massachusetts Bay Colony was concerned. While the founders of that colony recognized their political dependence upon England, they came to these shores with a fixed purpose to found a commonwealth with laws of their own...
>
> But the early colonists were Englishmen. And necessarily they brought over with them conceptions of personal and property rights which were based upon the common law. In that sense they brought over the common law. Such of these rights as they found suitable to their situation they adopted by usage and custom. And those usages and customs were judicially recognized and enforced. And thus it came about that much of the common law of England became the common law of the colonists and those who have succeeded them ...
>
> But in Maine, it must be conceded, the general situation differed from that of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. The early inhabitants did not come over with such independent and lofty ideas of government as were possessed by their Massachusetts brethren.
>
> ... The early settlers, ... like those of Massachusetts, brought with them conceptions of law, of the rights of property. Those conceptions, so far as they found them convenient and useful, they put into practice, and to that extent they adopted the common law. To that extent it was their law, because they used it. And except so far as they so adopted and used the common law, it was not in force here. It is on this ground that the courts have many times declared that various laws of England have never been laws here. n355

The Maine Supreme Court in 1953 was more firmly persuaded of Massachusetts' general reception of the common law and of Maine's derived reception. It characterized Massachusetts' reception (and, by inference, Maine's reception) as follows:

> In Commonwealth v. Churchill, 2 Metc., Mass., 118, 123, speaking of the Massachusetts Constitution as originally adopted, the court, speaking through Chief Justice Shaw, said:
>
> > By that constitution, it was declared that 'all the laws, which have heretofore been adopted, used and approved in the colony, province, or state of Massachusetts Bay, and usually practised on in the courts of law, shall still remain and be in full force, until altered or repealed by the legislature; such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this constitution.' This constitution has been construed as adopting the great body of the common law, with those statutes made before the emigration of our ancestors, which were made in amendment of the common law, so far as these rules and principles were applicable to our condition and form of government. Commonwealth v. Leach, 1 Mass. 59 ; Commonwealth v. Knowlton, 2 Mass. [530] 534 .
>
> Although this case was subsequent to the separation, in a Kennebec County case decided by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts at the June Term 1807, that court had said in the case of Commonwealth v. Knowlton, 2 Mass. 530, at page 534 :

> Our ancestors, when they came into this new world, claimed the common law as their birth right, and brought it with them except such parts as were judged inapplicable to their new state and condition. The common law, thus claimed, was the common law of their native country, as it was amended or altered by English statutes in force at the time of their emigration. Those statutes were never re-enacted in this country, but were considered as incorporated into the common law. Some few other English statutes, passed since the emigration, were adopted by our courts, and now have the authority of law derived from long practice. To these may be added some ancient usages, originating probably from laws passed by the legislature of the colony of the Massachusetts Bay, which were annulled by the repeal of the first charter, and from the former practice of the colonial courts, accommodated to the habits and manners of the people.

So much therefore of the common law of England as our ancestors brought with them, and of the statutes then in force, amending or altering it; such of the more recent statutes as have been since adopted in practice; and the ancient usages aforesaid, may be considered as forming the body of the common law of Massachusetts, which has submitted to some alterations by the acts of the provincial and state legislatures, and by the provisions of our constitution.

This quotation was cited in extenso and with approval by this court in State v. Temple, 12 Me. 214, at page 219 .

Interpreting the above quoted portion of the Massachusetts Constitution, the Massachusetts court in Commonwealth v. Churchill, supra, said:

> But it was contended, at the argument, that under this provision no principle or rule of the common law could be regarded as adopted, unless it could be shown affirmatively that it had been adjudicated before the revolution, but we apprehend this would be much too narrow a construction. Before the revolution, we had no regular reports of judicial decisions; and the most familiar rules and principles of law -- those which lie at the foundation of our civil and social rights -- could not be so proved. No: We rely on usage and tradition, and the well known repositories of legal learning, works of approved authority, to learn what are the rules of common law; and we have no doubt that these were the great sources to which the above pregnant provision of our constitution refers.

If there be language in the opinion in State v. Knight, 43 Me. 11, 116 et seq., that would seem to place a different construction on the Massachusetts Constitution, Commonwealth v. Churchill being a decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of that Commonwealth is conclusive upon the construction of its Constitution.

It is upon the foregoing provisions of the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the Act of Separation and the Constitution of Maine, and the foregoing decisions that we hold that the Statute of 21 Hen. VIII, ca. 4, is a part of the common law of this State. Although we have found no express holding by the Massachusetts court that said statute was a part of the common law of Massachusetts, it, together with an English case interpreting it, was cited with approval in the case of Sheldon v. Homer, 5 Metc., Mass., 462, 465. n356

§ 7.02(u) Maryland.

Colonial Maryland was unquestionably subject to English common law. Not only did the 1632 charter issued to Lord

Baltimore contain a "Bishop of Durham" clause granting extensive feudal privileges according to English land law, n357 but it also described the legislative power in the proprietors in terms of English law:

> VII ... We ... do grant unto the said now Baron, ... and to his Heirs, for the good and happy Government of the said province, free, full, and absolute Power, by the tenor of these Presents, to Ordain, Make, and Enact Laws, of what kind soever, according to their sound Discretions, whether relating to the Public State of the said Province, or the private Utility of Individuals, of and with the Advice, Assent, and Approbation of the Free-Men of the same Province So Nevertheless, that the Laws aforesaid be consonant to Reason and be not repugnant or contrary, but (so far as conveniently may be) agreeable to the Laws, Statutes, Customs and Rights of this Our Kingdom of England ... n358

Under this remarkably feudal grant, a controversy arose early between proprietors and settlers about whether the settlers could initiate legislation, which in turn left doubt about how fully the law of England was being applied in Maryland n359. One scholar noted:

> The common law of England seems here rather to be looked upon as a system useful for illustration and guidance than a subsidiary law; equity and good conscience was considered to afford proper rules to fill the omissions of the positive law. n360

In 1662 the Assembly enacted a provision declaring that in the absence of provincial law, justice would be sought according to the laws and statutes of England and "that all courts shall judge of the right pleading and the inconsistency of the said laws with the good of the province according to the best of their judgment." n361 This provision, even though in force for only a short time, has been described as "the first definite recognition in America of the power of the courts to apply the common law of England to colonial conditions, and to reject provisions deemed unsuitable." n362 Remaining unsettled for many decades thereafter was the extent to which English statutes -- in addition to common law decisions -- were considered adopted in the colony. Not until a Maryland legislative enactment in 1732 was the controversy neutralized, the provision authorizing the colony to call upon "the laws and statutes and reasonable customs of England, as used and practiced within the province." n363

Maryland's first constitution, adopted in 1776, opened with a Declaration of Rights which plainly declared the reception of English common law and of local laws enacted during the colonial period:

> [We, the delegates of Maryland ... declare] That the inhabitants of Maryland are entitled to the common law of England and the trial by jury, according to the course of that law, and to the benefit of such of the English statutes, as existed at the time of their first emigration, and which, by experience, have been found applicable to their local and other circumstances, and of such others as have been since made in England, or Great Britain, and have been introduced, used and practised by the courts of law or equity; and also to acts of Assembly, in force on the first of June seventeen hundred and seventy-four, except such as may have since expired, or have been or may be altered by acts of Convention, or this Declaration of Rights -- subject, nevertheless, to the revision of, and amendment or repeal by, the Legislature of this State: and the inhabitants of Maryland are also entitled to all property, derived to them, from or under the Charter, granted by his Majesty Charles I. to Caecilius Calvert, Baron of Baltimore. n364

A nearly identical provision appeared in the Declaration of Rights that introduced the 1851 Maryland constitution, n365 and again in the 1864 constitution n366 and 1867 constitution. n367 With the state's failure to approve a new draft constitution in 1968 (which would have eliminated specific reference to the English common law in its declaration of rights), the 1867 constitution contains the current statement of common law reception in Maryland.

Maryland courts have attempted to identify, as to individual points of law, the English common law at various specific times. One decision was based on a finding of what was English common law at the time of the 1632 Maryland charter:

> I consider it established by the decision in the [cited English case] that it was the common law of England, at the colonization of Maryland, or the grant of the charter to Maryland, and long antecedent to that time ...
>
> Although the common law did undergo some change in England, by imperceptible degrees, as to [one issue in this case], yet the time and manner of such change cannot be defined with any precision, or in a satisfactory way. It is certain, beyond a doubt, that no change ever took place in the common law, as to [the other issue in the case] before the colonization of Maryland. n368

In another case a Maryland court rejected the English judicial construction of a 1585 English statute, because, among other considerations, the English judicial position was not established until 1807. n369 A Maryland court in 1912 adopted a minority English view. n370

§ 7.02(v) Massachusetts.

The earliest Massachusetts settlement, the separate colony of Plymouth, was authorized by a charter granted November 3, 1620, issued well after the group on the Mayflower was well under way. This charter authorized the colonial council:

> to make all Manner of Orders, Laws, Directions, Instructions, Forms, and Ceremonies of Government and Magistracy fitt and necessary for any concerning the Government of said Collony and Plantation, so always as the same be not contrary to the Laws and Statutes of this our Realme of England... n371

The grant of lands was given in the English tenure of free and common socage, "to be holden of Us as of our Manor of East-Greenwich, in our County of Kent, in free and common socage and not in Capite nor by Knight's Service...." n372 It was further declared that "English subjects settling in the colony, and their children there born, shall have all the rights of natural born Englishmen." n373

When the Mayflower landed, it was outside the jurisdiction to which the charter pertained, prompting the colonists to create their own rules by means of the so-called Mayflower Compact. In this agreement they made no mention of government according to the laws of England, but instead agreed to enact such laws as they thought best for the general good of the colony:

> We ... covenant and combine our selves togeather into a civill body politick, for our better ordering and preservation and furtherance of the ends aforesaid; and by vertue hearof to enacte, constitute, and frame such just and equall laws, ordinances, acts, constitutions, and offices, from time to time, as shall be thought most meete and convenient for the generall good of the Colonie, unto which we promise all due submission and obedience. n374

In 1629 the Plymouth colony obtained another charter, the so-called Warwick patent, that actually pertained to the land the settlers occupied; at first the patent was given in the name of William Bradford as trustee, but in 1641 he surrendered his trusteeship to the freemen of the colony. This patent, too, clearly rested on English common law. The lands were "To be holden of his Matie., his heirs and successors as of his mannor of East Greenwiche in the county of Kent in free and common soccage and not in capite nor by Knight's service...." n375 The legislative power granted to the colony was subject to the restriction "that the said lawes and orders be not repugnante to the lawes of Englande, or the frame of governmente by the said presidente and councill hereafter to be established." n376

The English common law foundation of Plymouth colony was evident not only in its patents and charters, but also in the decisions in legal disputes and in the legislative pronouncements that issued from the colony. Periodically, the laws currently in force were gathered into "codes," or compilations, that reveal the colonists' attitudes towards sources of law and the efficacy of English law, generally. Four compilations of Plymouth's colonial laws were issued during the 17th century, in 1636, 1658, 1671, and 1684. The significance of the 1636 code has been characterized as follows:

> The compilation of 1636 has been variously described as the first comprehensive body of law to be enacted in North America, as the first American code of laws, and as a simple model upon which subsequent bodies of American law were patterned. All of those claims can easily be defended, but from the point of view of the framers the compilation was regarded as the "ordering of a body politick" agreeable to the Mayflower Compact and the Warwick patent [issued in 1629]. Some of its clauses were based upon English law and custom, such as the regulation of inheritances according to the custom of East Greenwich, and the requirement that jury trials be conducted as nearly as possible to English practice. In other instances, such as the provision for civil marriage, equality of descent, liberal provisions for women and widows, and the institution of a recording system, all unknown in England, we find partly an attempt to fill the needs of a frontier society and partly the Puritan predilection to enact laws based upon scriptural authority. The discretionary power of Magistrates, for example, was based upon Romans 13, the division of lands upon Deuteronomy 21, civil marriage upon Ruth 4, and capital offenses upon various admonitions.
>
> Two months after the compilation of 1636 was enacted, the General Court met in legislative session and passed six additional miscellaneous measures; it marked the beginning of a regular legislative process that was to continue unabated until the demise of the colony. n377

Several passages of the 1636 code suggest that even in Plymouth a comprehensive basis of English law existed. In Act 1 the drafters declare:

> And finding that as freeborne subjects of the State of England we hither came indewed with all and singular the priviledges belonging to such, in the first place we think good that it be established for an act That according to the ... due priviledge of the subject aforesaid no imposicon of law or ordnance be made or imposed upon us by ourselves [or others at] present or to come but such as shall be made [or] imposed by consent according to the free liberties [of the] State and Kingdome of England and no otherwise. n378

Other provisions relating to reliance on English law or specifically to regulation of real property rights are as follows:

> That all trialls whether Capitall or between man and man be tryed by Jewryes according to the presidents of the law of England as neer as may be. n379
>
> That Inheritance to descend according to the commendable custome of England and hold of East Greenwich. n380
>
> That If the husband died the wife shal have a third pt of his land during her life and a 3d of his goods to be at her owne disposing. n381
>
> In 1658 a new compilation replaced the 1636 code and subsequent legislation. A lengthy preamble contained a succinct summary of the puritan philosophy of law, which held essentially that the only true law was the law of God as revealed in His Holy Scriptures, and that laws made by man must be derived from them and conformable to them in all respects. The puritans found the divine origins of all civil authority in the thirteenth part of Romans, and the introduction to the 1658 compilation stressed that God had endowed man with right judgment and true laws (Scripture) as well as with a capacity to be guided by "good and wholesome lawes" derived from and agreeable to the "Ancient platforme of God's Lawe." The framers then went on to proclaim that they had been guided accordingly in the preparation of the new revision of the laws. n382

> The code also declared that its drafters, the Associates of New Plymouth coming hether as freeborne Subjects of the State of England [this impersonal reference to the government was typically used during the English Commonwealth period] Indowed with all and singular priviledges belong to such [do enact that law] which is according to the free liberties of the State of England. n383

The 1658 code served until a new code was produced in 1671, which included an entire chapter of five sections, Chapter X, devoted to "Lands, Inheritances, and Wills." These sections covered the tenure of landholding, acknowledgement of conveyances, lands held in partnership, escheat of estates, and a statute of limitations. The chapter concludes with the statement, "It having been the usual manner and custome of this Court, as much as may be to have recourse to the commendable Laws of England in such case wherein there is no other Law by this Court provided more suitable to our condition." n384

A final code of the colony was drawn up in 1684 and published in 1685. It, too, devoted a chapter, Chapter XII, to "Lands and Inheritances," that was substantially similar to the counterpart provisions of the 1671 code. One detail was added to specifically invoke English law in a matter of real property:

> It is Ordered and Declared by this Court and the Authority thereof; That all Lands heretofore Intailed, and that shall be Intailed hereafter, shall descend and enure as by the Law of England the same ought to do. n385

However, signaling that no wholesale reception of English property law should be presumed, the very next section made an original modification of primogeniture:

> It is Ordered and Declared, etc. That all the Sons of any Person, having Lands in fee simple, shall be Heirs (paying and satisfying in case as is by Law provided) the Eldest Son shall have double to any of his Brethren; and all the younger equal Shares of the Land of their Ancestors; and where there is but one Son, he shall be sole Heir, paying and satisfying, as aforesaid; And where there is no Son, all the Daughters shall Inherit alike. n386

Even taking full account of the Plymouth settlers' religious motivation, it must still be conceded that the availability of land was a powerful inducement for immigration, and that English land law was still the foundation of property rights.

A different group of Puritans, incorporated as "The Company for Massachusetts Bay," purchased nearby land from the New England Council in 1628, and the next year obtained a royal charter confirming the purchase and conferring legislative power on the corporation. This 1629 charter, too, recited the usual statement of English land tenure, "To be houlden ... as of [the king's] Mannor of East Greenewich in the County of Kent, in free and comon Soccage, and not in Capite nor by Knight's Service...." n387 Also, the grant of legislative power was limited "soe as such Lawes and Ordinances be not contrarie or repugnant to the Lawes and Statuts of this our Realme of England." n388

Following a lengthy drafting process a code of laws for the Massachusetts Bay colony was produced in 1641. Neither in this code nor in its famous published successor, the 1648 Book of the General Lauues and Libertyes Concerning the Inhabitants of Massachusetts, is there any explicit reference to a foundation of English law. Not only was there resistance among colonial leaders to limiting colonial laws to those that were consistent with the laws of England, as required by the charter, but there appears also in the codes a desire to rely on religious principles and scriptures as an important source of legal principle. Nevertheless, while departing from English law in individual details, the form and substance of these codes reveal a strong influence of English law. n389

Throughout the 17th century, various attempts by English officials to require that Massachusetts legislation be modified to conform to English law on individual points were strongly resisted. Ironically, a by-product of the resistance was that the colonists proclaimed infringement on their rights as Englishmen. n390 The assertion of royal power culminated with the union of Plymouth, Massachusetts, Maine and Nova Scotia colonies under a royal charter in 1691. This charter reiterated the tenure of free and common socage "as of our Manor of East Greenwich in the County of Kent," n391 and confirmed the legislative power > to make ordaine and establish all manner of wholsome and reasonable Orders Laws Statutes and Ordinances Directions and Instructions either with penalties or without (soe as the same be not repugnant or contrary to the Lawes of this our Realme of England) as they shall Judge to be for the good and welfare of our said Province or Territory... n392

It may fairly be said, therefore, that as Massachusetts progressed toward statehood, its jurisprudence had a foundation that was inescapably based on the settlers' almost universal background of English law (however slight one's explicit acquaintance with the common law) mixed with a more conspicuous element of indigenous law derived from religious sources.

In the first Massachusetts Constitution, in 1780, the legislative power was not restricted or related in any way to an English common law foundation; only the constitution itself was the legislative guide:

> And further, full power and authority are hereby given and granted to the said general court from time to time, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without, so as the same be not repugnant or contrary to this constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this commonwealth... n393

To the extent English common law influenced Massachusetts colonial legislation and judicial decisions prior to statehood and was still recognized, it was received under the following provision of the 1780 Constitution:

> All the laws which have heretofore been adopted, used, and approved in the province, colony, or State of Massachusetts Bay, and usually practised on in the courts of law, shall still remain and be in full force, until altered or repealed by the legislature, such parts only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this constitution. n394

This 1780 Constitution has been the subject of several subsequent state constitutional conventions, but despite the changes and attempted changes, it remains the current constitution of Massachusetts:

> The Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 is the oldest state constitution in the United States, and its unique history is at once simple and complicated for a collection such as this. Conventions in 1820, 1853, and 1917 considered a variety of amendments, and revisions, of the original document; but the fact remains that in each instance the recognizable contents and outline of the original document continued. n395

The provision for reception of prior colonial law in the 1780 Constitution has opened the way for judicial reception of the English common law. The Massachusetts Supreme Court has construed "laws which have heretofore been adopted" as:

> the great body of common law with those statutes made before the emigration of our ancestors, which were made in amendment of the common law, so far as these rules and principles were applicable to our condition and form of government. Commonwealth v. Leach, 1 Mass. 59 ; Commonwealth v. Knowlton, 2 Mass. [530] 534 .
>
> But it was contended, at the argument, that under this provision no principle or rule of the common law could be regarded as adopted, unless it could be shown affirmatively that it had been adjudicated > before the revolution, but we apprehend this would be much too narrow a construction. Before the revolution, we had no regular reports of judicial decisions; and the most familiar rules and principles of law -- those which lie at the foundation of our civil and social rights -- could not be so proved. No: We rely on usage and tradition, and the well known repositories of legal learning, works of approved authority, to learn what are the rules of common law; and we have no doubt that these were the great sources to which the above pregnant provision of our constitution refers.

>
> Taking it then as well established that the rules and maxims of the common law, referred to in the constitution, were those which our ancestors brought with them, and which had been, to some extent, modified and adapted to our condition by the legislative jurisprudence of the colonial and provincial governments, it follows that these rules and principles were regarded as binding both upon legislators and judges in their respective departments. n396

In an earlier Massachusetts case the court had also declared the reception of common law:

> Our ancestors, when they came into this new world, claimed the common law as their birth right, and brought it with them except such parts as were judged inapplicable to their new state and condition. The common law, thus claimed, was the common law of their native country, as it was amended or altered by English statutes in force at the time of their emigration. Those statutes were never re-enacted in this country, but were considered as incorporated into the common law. Some few other English statutes, passed since the emigration, were adopted by our courts, and now have the authority of law derived from long practice. To these may be added some ancient usages, orginating probably from laws passed by the legislature of the colony of the Massachusetts Bay, which were annulled by the repeal of the first charter, and from the former practice of the colonial courts, accommodated to the habits and manners of the people.
>
> So much therefore of the common law of England as our ancestors brought with them, and of the statutes then in force, amending or altering it; such of the more recent statutes as have been since adopted in practice; and the ancient usages aforesaid, may be considered as forming the body of the common law of Massachusetts, which has submitted to some alterations by the acts of the provincial and state legislatures, and by the provisions of our constitution. n397

The Massachusetts Court has also held that an English statute amending the common law before the settlement of America is part of the common law received in America. As to the application of common law after American settlement:

> [Our ancestors] ... came to this country, bringing with them, as all agree, the rights and privileges of Englishmen, and the common law of that country, so far as it should be found applicable to their new state and condition. They brought with them also a charter, containing power to make such new laws as their exigencies might require. They could live under the old law or make new ones. Whenever they legislated upon any subject, their own law regulated them; when they did not legislate, the law they brought with them was the rule of conduct. n398

§ 7.02(w) Michigan.

In 1671 the French formally claimed the area that is now the state of Michigan, and Detroit, as the first settlement, had been established by 1701. After the French and Indian War, the British governed the area, legislating for it as part of their Canadian domain by means of the 1774 Quebec Act. n399 This act continued in force both French and English rights and titles:

> Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing in this Act contained shall extend or be construed > to extend, to make void, or to vary or alter any Right, Title, or Possession, derived under any Grant, Conveyance, or otherwise, however, of or to any Lands within the said Province, or the Provinces thereto adjoining; but that the same shall remain and be in Force, and have Effect, as if this Act had never been made. n400

Even after the American Revolution was formally concluded by the Treaty of Paris in 1783, the British continued to occupy Detroit and other forts in the region. In 1792 Detroit sent three representatives to the parliament of Upper Canada. Meanwhile, the Northwest Ordinance was enacted in 1787, American administrators were appointed in 1796, and in 1799 inhabitants of Michigan sent their first representative to the territorial legislature in Cincinnati. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n401

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district...." n402 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n403

In 1803 Michigan became a part of Indiana Territory, which, when it was created in 1800, n404 had been required to create "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n405 A separate Michigan Territory was established in 1805, n406 and the enabling act required the new territory to form a government in conformance with the Northwest Ordinance. n407

The territorial legislature apparently wished to start afresh with fundamental law, however, because legislation in 1810 purported to repeal all prior English statutes, French law and custom, and laws of the Northwest Territory and of the Indiana Territory, leaving only common law decisions in effect, by virtue of the Northwest Ordinance. This position was summarized in 1886 by the Michigan Supreme Court:

> The relations of this commonwealth to the common law are not altogether conformed to the holdings of some other states. In many of the states, statutes of parliament passed before or during the early days > of the American colonies, as well as old colonial statutes and usages, have been recognized as part of the local common law, and have been construed and applied by the courts. Though Michigan was never a common-law colony, and while we have recognized the common law as adopted into our jurisprudence, it is the English common law, unaffected by statute. In 1810 an act was passed putting an end to all the written law of England, France, Canada, and the Northwest and Indiana territories, as well as the French and Canadian customs, leaving no statute or code law in force except that of Michigan territory and the United States. 1 Terr. Laws, 900. n408

Even earlier the Michigan Supreme Court acknowledged heavy dependence on common law for the fundamental law of the state:

> It is undoubtedly true that at one time the custom of Paris was in force here. It was expressly abrogated by the territorial legislature in 1810, and probably applied to a very few cases then, if to any. Practically the common law has prevailed here, in ordinary matters, since our government took possession; and the country has grown up under it. How, or by what particular means, it originated, would open an inquiry more curious than useful. A custom which is as old as the American settlements, and has been universally recognized by every department of government, has made it the law of the land, if not made so otherwise. Our statutes, without this substratum, would not only fail to provide for the great mass of affairs, but would lack the means of safe construction. We are of opinion that questions of property, not clearly excepted from it, must be determined by the common law, modified only by such circumstances as render it inapplicable to our local affairs ...
>
> The cases cited from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, as well as from some of the older states, show, as we think, that the common law rule is the most desirable one, as far as fresh streams are concerned. n409

Michigan statehood was attained in 1837, n410 and a constitution drafted in 1835 went into effect, providing for continuation of prior laws: "All laws now in force in the Territory of Michigan, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations, or be altered or repealed by the legislature." n411 Michigan's 1850 constitution contained an essentially similar provision, but one that also made explicit reference to common law then in force: "The common law and the statute law now in force, not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations or are altered or repealed by the legislature." n412 This identical provision continued in the 1908 constitution n413 and is also in Michigan's present constitution. n414

The common law has been held to be the law of the state under this constitutional provision, n415 although the common law under -- Michigan's flexible characterization of it -- is seen as merely the accumulated expressions of various judicial tribunals in their efforts to ascertain what is right and just between individuals in respect to private disputes. n416 It has even been held that the common law in effect in Michigan during the territorial period included English statutes. n417

§ 7.02(x) Minnesota.

Minnesota was explored by the French as early as 1654 and regularly traveled by them for a century. At the end of the French and Indian War, however, the area east and north of the Mississippi River was ceded to Great Britain, and the area west and south of the river to Spain. Few settlements had emerged by the time the British area was turned over to the United States by the Treaty of Paris in 1783, and, indeed, British traders continued on as before. Likewise, the Spanish portion had also not been developed by the time it was transferred to the French and then to the United States as part of the Louisiana Purchase in 1803.

As part of the territory in the Louisiana Purchase, Minnesota shares in the common French and Spanish legal heritage of the area, even though only a few forts and trading posts had been established on Minnesota land. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n418

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n419 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n420

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad reception statute for the English common law:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n421

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n422

This portion of Minnesota that was included in the Missouri Territory was left without a territorial government structure, when Missouri was made a state in 1821. Although this deficiency was not significant, because virtually no settlement activity was taking place, it was not corrected until 1834, when this part of Minnesota was made part of the Michigan Territory.

Meanwhile, the portion of Minnesota not included within the Louisiana Purchase was in the Northwest Territory and thus subject to the Northwest Ordinance of 1787. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n423

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district." n424 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n425

The Michigan Territory to which Minnesota was added, part in 1818 and part in 1834, had originally been part of Indiana Territory, which, when it was created in 1800, n426 had been required to create "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n427 A separate Michigan Territory was established in 1805, n428 and the enabling act required the new territory to form a government in conformance with the Northwest Ordinance. n429

The Michigan territorial legislature apparently wished to start afresh with fundamental law, however, because legislation in 1810 purported to repeal all prior English statutes, French law and custom, and laws of the Northwest Territory and of the Indiana Territory, leaving only common law decisions in effect, by virtue of the Northwest Ordinance. This, then, would have been the status of common-law reception in Minnesota when that region was part of Michigan Territory. Michigan courts later modified this position to include reception of some older English statutes.

When Wisconsin Territory was established in 1836, Minnesota became part of that territory until Wisconsin attained statehood in 1848.

Wisconsin's territorial enabling act n430 in 1836 authorized the formation of a government in conformance with the Northwest Ordinance and specifically continued in force the Michigan territorial laws in effect at the time:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to, and enjoy, all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the [Northwest Ordinance]; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of > the said Territory. The said inhabitants shall also be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Michigan, and to its inhabitants, and the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Wisconsin; and further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof may be applicable. n431

The enabling act also declared that "the said supreme court and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction." n432

In 1838, while Minnesota was still part of Wisconsin Territory, the Wisconsin territorial legislature followed Michigan's example and declared that statutes of Great Britain would not be considered law in the territory; that same legislature also repealed prior acts of Michigan Territory, and then enacted a large compilation of laws borrowed mostly from Michigan, which in turn had been borrowed from New York, Ohio and Massachusetts. n433 However, much later and long after Minnesota was no longer part of Wisconsin, the Wisconsin Supreme Court followed the courts of Michigan and Iowa in reinvigorating the common law reception long after the legislative attacks. n434

Wisconsin was authorized for statehood in 1846, n435 and formally admitted in 1848. n436 From that time until 1849, Minnesota was once again without membership in an established territorial government. In 1849 Congress created the Territory of Minnesota, n437 with the laws of Wisconsin Territory in effect when Wisconsin was admitted as a state continuing in force:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Wisconsin and to its inhabitants; and the laws in force in the Territory of Wisconsin at the date of the admission of the State of Wisconsin shall continue to be valid and operative therein, so far as the same be not incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the governor and legislative assembly of the said Territory of Minnesota; and the laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory, so far as the same, or any provision thereof, may be applicable. n438

In addition, the territorial enabling act declared that "the said Supreme and District Courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction." n439

Authorization for statehood preparations followed in 1857, n440 with statehood itself authorized in 1858. n441 The constitution for the new state, drafted in 1857, continued in force the laws of the Minnesota Territory: "All laws now in force in the Territory of Minnesota, not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or be altered or repealed by the legislature." n442

This provision was later dropped from the 1857 constitution and was not included in the present restructured constitution of 1974. A provision relating to certain common law real property rights was included in the 1857 constitution and continues in the present state constitution, restructured in 1974:

> All the lands within the state are allodial and feudal tenures of every description with all their incidents are prohibited. Leases and grants of agricultural land for a longer period than 21 years reserving rent or service of any kind shall be void. n443

With no explicit common law reception provision, or even a provision continuing prior law in force, it has been left to the judiciary to declare the position of common law in Minnesota jurisprudence. The most definitive statement on this point was issued by the Minnesota Supreme Court in 1924:

> [W]e recognize that no legislative adoption is necessary to affirm the existence of the common law, but that statutory enactment is essential to repeal, abrogate, or change the rules or doctrine of the common law. The rules of common law are not to be changed doubtful implication ... But where the implication is obvious it cannot be ignored. No statute is to be construed as altering the common law farther than its words and circumstances import We must recognize that it is the province of the Legislature, and not of the court, to modify the rules of the common law. In re Hulett's Estate, 66 Minn. 327, 69 N.W. 31, 34 L. R. A. 384, 61 Am. St. Rep. 419 . The court has no more right to abrogate the common law than it has to repeal the statutory law. Francis v. W. U. Tel. Co., 58 Minn. 252, 59 N.W. 1078, 49 Am. St. Rep. 507, 25 L. R. A. 406 . Of course, the common law applies to our state. State v. Pulle, 12 Minn. 164 (Gil. 99) . Whether we came under the common law at a heroic period or under a heroic leader, as indicated in respondent's brief in Dutcher v. Culver, 23 Minn. 584, 612, 616 , is not of special importance (though interesting) here, because, for the purpose of this case, it is the same whether the common law of England which became of force in this country may be said to be the common law the time of the Revolution, or whether it was the common law of England in force at the time of the Ordinance of 1787. Either is sufficient here. We cannot, however, say that the inquiry as to how the common law became the law of the region comprising the Northwest Territory is "more curious than useful." n444

§ 7.02(y) Mississippi.

Mississippi Territory was formed in 1798. In the territorial legislation no provision for reception of the common law was included, although the document incorporated the rights granted under the Northwest Ordinance of 1787:

> That from and after the establishment of the said government, the people of the aforesaid territory, shall be entitled to and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted to the people of the territory of the United States, northwest of the river Ohio, in and by the aforesaid ordinance of the thirteenth day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, in as full and ample a manner as the same are possessed and enjoyed by the people of the said last mentioned territory. n445

The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n446

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district...." n447 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n448

The organizing and defining of Mississippi, Georgia and Alabama territories was complicated by the Yazoo land fraud engineered by the Georgia legislature in 1795. As part of the effort to settle land claims arising from that activity, Georgia ceded to the United States its claims to territory lying within the areas claimed by Mississippi and Alabama. The 1802 deed of cession confirmed both British and Spanish land grants given before October 22, 1795, and stipulated that provisions of the Northwest Ordinance should extend to the lands being ceded. In 1845 the United States Supreme Court held that this provision extended the English common law even to those parts of the territory formerly held by Spain. n449

The question of reception of English statute law was simplified after a digest of territorial laws was completed and compiled into one volume in 1807. The Mississippi territorial legislature adopted the volume as law in the territory with the proviso that "all statutes of English and Great Britain not contained in said volume of statutes, shall cease to have any force or validity in this Territory." n450

When Mississippi became a state in 1817, its first constitution included a provision continuing in force its prior laws:

> All laws and parts of laws now in force in the Mississippi Territory, and not repugnant to the provisions of this constitution, shall continue and remain in force as the laws of this State, until they expire by their own limitation, or shall be altered or repealed by the legislature thereof. n451

Similar versions of this continuation section were included in the constitutions of 1832 n452 and 1868. n453 The current constitution, dating from 1890, also provides for continuance of former laws:

> The laws of this state now in force, not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain in force until amended or repealed by the legislature, or until they expire by limitation. All statute laws of this state repugnant to the provisions of this Constitution, except as provided in the next three sections [laws repealed by the constitution, election laws, and apportionment laws], shall continue and remain in force until the first day of April, A.D. 1892, unless sooner repealed by the legislature. n454

Without an explicit reception statute, a Mississippi court has held that Mississippi law includes "only the common law, and statutes of our own government, for the determination of the rights of the citizen"; English statutes are excluded. n455 Another state court expressed reluctance to introduce changes into the common law judicially, preferring to defer to the legislative power:

> The argument has frequently been urged, by those who assign a feudal origin to the rule [in Shelley's Case], that inasmuch as the feudal system has been abolished, the reason for the rule has ceased; and, therefore, the rule itself should be abrogated. However cogent this argument may be when addressed to the legislature, yet courts of justice cannot so far recognize its potency as to make it the basis of their decisions. Whenever a principle of the common law has been once clearly and unquestionably recognized and established, the courts of the country must enforce it, until it be repealed by the legislature, as long as there is a subject matter for the principle to operate upon; and this, too, although the reason, in the opinion of the court, which induced its original establishment, may have ceased to exist. This we conceive to be the established doctrine of the courts of this country, in every State where the principles of the common law prevail. Were it otherwise, the rules of law would be as fluctuating and > unsettled as the opinions of the different judges administering them might happen to differ in relation to the existence of sufficient and valid reasons for maintaining and upholding them. n456

An inference of common law reception appears in identical Mississippi constitutional and statutory provisions governing property litigation:

> In suits to try title, to cancel deeds and other clouds upon title, and to confirm title to real estate, the chancery court shall have jurisdiction to decree possession and to displace possession, to decree rents and compensation for improvements and taxes. In all cases where said courts heretofore exercised jurisdiction auxiliary to courts of common law, it may exercise such jurisdiction to grant the relief sought, although the legal remedy may not have been exhausted or the legal title established by a suit at law. n457

§ 7.02(z) Missouri.

As part of the territory in the Louisiana Purchase, Missouri shares in the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to the early settlement history of that area. As far as permanent settlement and government are concerned, Spanish exploration in the 16th century, and French probes in the 17th and 18th centuries ultimately resulted only in the settlements in and around New Orleans and a tiny community at St. Louis. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n458

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana Territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n459 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n460

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad common law reception statute:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n461

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n462

When Missouri attained statehood in 1821, its new constitution provided for continuing existing laws in force: "All laws now in force in the Territory of Missouri, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations, or be altered or repealed by the general assembly." n463 A similar provision continues in the current constitution. n464

The current statutory common law reception provision in Missouri has been modified only slightly from its original 19th-century form:

> The common law of England and all statutes and acts of parliament made prior to the fourth year of the reign of James the First, of a general nature, which are not local to that kingdom and not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of this state, or the statute laws in force for the time being, are the rule of action and decision in this state, any custom or usage to the contrary notwithstanding, but no act of the general assembly or law of this state shall be held to be invalid, or limited in its scope or effect by the courts of this state, for the reason that it is in derogation of, or in conflict with, the common law, or with such statutes or acts of parliament; but all acts of the general assembly, or laws, shall be liberally construed, so as to effectuate the true intent and meaning thereof. n465

The Missouri Supreme Court gave a lengthy explanation of its view of common law reception in Missouri in rejecting a claim based on primogeniture:

> The doctrine of primogeniture is contrary to the theory upon which this and other commonwealths were built. This fact is conceded in the opinion of the commissioner cited by the appellant Lucas R. Gillilan ... All that the commissioner stated in that case with reference to the underlined clause above, is that it might furnish "a verbal reason" for a claim that the statute had adopted primogeniture in this state. He, however, immediately added that no such doctrine could exist in this country, citing in support of his conclusion Tiedeman on Real Property ...
>
> No part of the common law which was "repugnent to" or "inconsistent with" our federal Constitution or state laws was ever adopted as a part of the jurisprudence of this state ...The doctrine of primogeniture is radically opposed to the spirit, if not the letter, of both, and what the learned commissioner meant by the term "verbal reason" was probably a satirical or derisive allusion to an argument which might be made a verbal play on the language of the statute, but which had no real substance. The idea that any such preference in the descent of real property could coexist in the laws of any of the states, with the axioms of the federal Constitution guaranteeing equal protection of the laws to all persons and a republican form of government for each state, or with the social and political life modeled on these fundamental principles, is an unthinkable absurdity. Any intimations of a different import in any of other decisions of this court are hereby expressly disapproved. n466

Missouri courts are willing to make independent judgments about common law reception, such as in a case noting that joint tenancy, an important concurrent estate in English common law, is not so favored in the United States. n467

§ 7.02(aa) Montana.

The area of Montana was first explored by French Canadians in the mid-18th century, but was released from French claims in 1763 at the end of the French and Indian War. Most of Montana was included in the Louisiana Purchase and was traversed twice by the Lewis and Clark expedition during 1804-1806. The first trading posts were established in 1807 and 1809.

The part of Montana that was part of the Louisiana Purchase shares only nominally in the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to that area, inasmuch as no permanent settlements existed in Montana before the Louisiana Purchase. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n468

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, called the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana Territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n469 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n470

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad common law reception statute:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n471

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common-law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n472

When the State of Missouri was formed in 1821, no actual governmental authority applied to the Louisiana Purchase territory north of Missouri, including Montana, until 1834, when Congress attached Montana to the Territory of Michigan. n473 The Michigan Territory was subject to the prior law of the Northwest Ordinance, which imposed a common law system over its jurisdictions. In 1836, Wisconsin Territory was created with the land from the Territory of Michigan, except the portion designated as the state of Michigan, so Montana was thus attached to the Wisconsin Territory. n474 According to its territorial enabling statute, Wisconsin law included the laws issued under the Northwest Ordinance generally, and the laws of Michigan Territory specifically:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to, and enjoy, all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the articles of the [Northwest Ordinance]; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of the said Territory. The said inhabitants shall also be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Michigan, and to its inhabitants, and the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Wisconsin; and further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof may be applicable. n475

In 1854 this part of Montana that had originally been part of the Louisiana Purchase was included in the newly designated Nebraska Territory. In the territorial enabling act, n476 no explicit common law reception was mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n477 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n478 Thereafter, in its first session, the Nebraska territorial legislature enacted a common law reception provision:

> That so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this Territory, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this Territory be and the same is adopted and declared to be law within said Territory. n479

This part of Montana remained in Nebraska Territory until 1861, when it was included in the newly formed Dakota Territory. n480 In 1863 this Montana land was joined with other land that is now in the present state of Montana as part of the Idaho Territory.

That other part of the present state of Montana was adjacent to the northwestern extremity of but not included within the territory of the Louisiana Purchase. Instead, it was within the area referred to as the Oregon Territory, although even before territorial status was attained, settlers began to form a provisional government in 1841. In 1843 they prepared Articles of Provisional Government, which were adopted in 1845. According to this document, laws of Iowa Territory and principles of common law and equity would be the laws in force in Oregon (including the pertinent portion of modern Montana):

> The Laws of Iowa Territory shall be the Law of this Territory in Civil, Military and Criminal cases (where not otherwise provided for) and where no Statute of Iowa Territory applies, the principles of common Law and Equity shall govern. n481

Iowa had attained territorial status in 1838, n482 and by its territorial enabling act had adopted "the existing laws of the Territory of Wisconsin...." n483 Wisconsin had become a territory in 1836, n484 and had as its law in force the laws imposed by the Northwest Ordinance and the laws of the Territory of Michigan. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted

while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n485

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district...." n486 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n487

Michigan Territory had been established in 1805, n488 and, even though the territory had a legal heritage of both English common law and elements of French law, it, too, was brought under the legal regime of the Northwest Ordinance. Michigan became a state in 1837, and was thus no longer a territory when Oregon and Idaho territories were established.

Therefore, the initial laws in force in this area of Montana that was not part of the Louisiana Purchase were the laws of Oregon territory, which were the laws of Iowa territory, which were the common law and the laws of Wisconsin. The laws of Wisconsin were the laws of the Northwest Ordinance and the laws of Michigan Territory. The Northwest Ordinance, which was also extended to the Michigan Territory, imposed a common law system over its jurisdictions.

After the United States and Great Britain began, by a treaty of 1846, to resolve their jurisdictional claims to what is now the Pacific Northwest area of the United States, the Oregon Territory was established in 1848. n489

The territorial enabling act for Oregon contained no provisions for common law reception or even for continuing prior laws in force. Instead, it declared that "all such laws, or any law or laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be utterly null and void," n490 and also voided prior land grants:

> [A]ll laws heretofore passed in said Territory making grants of land, or otherwise affecting or incumbering the title to lands, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void; and the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and declared to be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, > or any provision thereof, may be applicable. n491

One provision continuing prior law in force pertained to judicial proceedings pending at the time the territory was created, which were transferred to the territorial district court; also "penalties, forfeitures, actions, and causes of action" were made recoverable "in like manner as they would have been under the laws in force within the limits composing said Territory at the time this act shall go into operation." n492

In 1853 the Washington Territory was created out of the Oregon Territory, including within its boundaries the portion of Montana not included in the Louisiana Purchase. n493 As in the Oregon Territory enabling act, "all such laws, or any law or laws, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be utterly null and void," n494 but the Washington act did explicitly continue prior laws in force:

> And be it further enacted, That the laws now in force in said Territory of Washington, by virtue of the legislation of Congress in reference to the Territory of Oregon, which have been enacted and passed subsequent to the first day of September, eighteen hundred and forty-eight, applicable to the said Territory of Washington, together with the legislative enactments of the Territory of Oregon, enacted and passed prior to the passage of, and not inconsistent with, the provisions of this act, and applicable to the said Territory of Washington, be, and they are hereby, continued in force in said Territory of Washington until they shall be repealed or amended by future legislation. n495

In January, 1863, the Washington territorial legislature enacted a simple common law reception provision:

> That the common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the organic act, and laws of Washington territory, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this territory. n496

In March, 1863, the Idaho Territory was created n497 and included both parts of Montana, that which had been in the Washington Territory, and that portion which was originally in the Louisiana Purchase and until 1863 was part of the Nebraska Territory and then of the Dakota Territory. Idaho's territorial enabling act (and Dakota Territory's before Idaho's) had no provision continuing previous laws in force or explicitly receiving the common law. The only provision in this organic act pertinent to reception was the declaration that "the said supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction." n498 With no organic provision for reception, the Idaho legislature the next year enacted a statutory common law reception provision, very similar to the provision that had been in effect for the Washington Territory:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the constitution or laws of the United States, in all cases not provided for in these compiled laws, is the rule of decision in all courts of this state. n499

Later in that same year the Territory of Montana was created, n500 but the enabling act contained no common law reception statute and no provision continuing prior law in force, only a provision declaring that the territory's "supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction." n501 However, the first session of the territorial legislature did enact a reception provision the next year:

> That the common law of England, so far as the same is applicable and of a general nature, and not in conflict with special enactments of this Territory, shall be the law and rule of decision, and shall be considered as of full force until repealed by legislative authority. n502

When Montana was authorized for statehood in 1889, n503 the enabling act continued prior territorial law in force: "all laws in force made by said Territories, at the time of their admission into the Union, shall be in force in said States, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitutions of the States, respectively." n504

The new state constitution of that same year also continued in force the prior territorial law, again limited to "laws enacted by" the territorial legislature:

> All laws enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana and in force at the time the State shall be admitted into the Union and not inconsistent with the constitution or the constitution or laws of the United States of America, shall be and remain in full force as the laws of the State until altered or repealed, or until they expire by their own limitation... n505

No comparable provision is in Montana's present constitution, which was adopted in 1972.

In the present Montana code, the reception provision has been somewhat elaborated from the statute adopted in 1865:

> 1-1-107. Unwritten law defined. Unwritten law is the law not promulgated and recorded, as mentioned in 1-1-104, but which is, nevertheless, observed and administered in the courts of the country. It has no certain repository but is collected from the reports of decisions of the courts and treatises of learned men.
>
> 1-1-108. Common law -- applicability of. In this state there is no common law in any case where the law is declared by statute. But where not declared, if the same is applicable and of a general nature and not in conflict with the statutes, the common law shall be the law and rule of decision.
>
> 1-1-109. Common law of England -- when rule of decision. The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution of the United States or the constitution or laws of this state, is the rule of decision in all the courts of this state. n506

According to a federal court interpreting Montana law:

> The "common law of England" as used in the statute "means that body of jurisprudence as applied and modified by the courts of this country up to the time it became a rule of decision in this commonwealth," and "that time began with our first territorial Legislature." n507

State courts have agreed that "the common law has been a part of our jurisprudence from the organization of Montana territory to the present day" n508 and that the common law of England "means that body of jurisprudence as applied and modified by the courts of this country up to the time it became a rule of decision in this commonwealth." n509

§ 7.02(bb) Nebraska.

Nebraska's first settlements were French outposts along the Missouri in the late 18th century. Nebraska land was wholly included in the area of the Louisiana Purchase, which had previously been at least nominally subject to the influence of Spanish and French law. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n510

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, called the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana Territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n511 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid."

n512

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad common law reception statute:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars.

n513

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n514

When the State of Missouri was formed in 1821, no actual governmental authority applied to Nebraska until 1854, when Nebraska was made a Territory, because the area was maintained as Indian country and officially closed to settlement (although the great emigration trails passed through the state). In the territorial enabling act, n515 no explicit common law reception was mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n516 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n517 Thereafter, in its first session, the territorial legislature enacted a common law reception provision:

> That so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this Territory, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this Territory be and the same is adopted and declared to be law within said Territory. n518

Nebraska was authorized for admission to statehood in 1864, n519 and became a state in 1867. n520 Its first constitution of 1866 had no reception provision but provided that "all laws now in force shall remain in force until altered, amended, or repealed by the legislature." n521 Nebraska's present constitution has no provision continuing present laws in force. However, current Nebraska statutes have carried forward the territorial common law reception statute:

> Common law; applicability. So much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this state, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this state, is adopted and declared to be law within the State of Nebraska. n522

Nebraska courts have held that by this statute Nebraska "adopted the common law of England and not the statutory law of England." n523 They also accord a large flexibility to the concept of the common law:

> What is the meaning of the term "common law of England"...? Does it mean the common law as it stood at the time of the Declaration of Independence, or as it stood when our statute was enacted, or are we to understand the common-law system, in its entirety, including all judicial improvements and modifications in this country and in England, to the present time, so far as applicable to our conditions? We cannot think, and we do not believe this court has ever understood, that the Legislature intended to petrify the common law, as embodied in judicial decisions at any one time, and set it up in such inflexible form as a rule of decision. The theory of our system is that the law consists, not in the actual rules enforced by decisions of the courts at any one time, but the principles from which those rules flow; that old principles are applied to new cases, and the rules resulting from such application are modified from time to time as changed conditions and new states of fact require "We may look to American as well as English books, and to American as well as English jurists, to ascertain what this law is, for neither the opinions nor the precedents of judges can be said, with strict propriety, to be the law. They are only evidence of law." Forbes v. Scannell, 13 Cal. 242, 286 . On this ground it was held in Sayward v. Carlson, 1 Wash. St. 29, 33 Pac. 830 , that a statutory provision in Washington making the common law of England the rule of decision in all the courts did not confine the courts to the decisions of the English courts, and of those American courts which have followed them closely, for the interpretation of the law. Such has been the understanding of this court from the beginning. What Sir Frederick Pollock has called "the immemorial and yet freshly growing fabric of the common law" is to be our guide, not the decisions of any particular courts at any particular period. The term "common law of England," as used in the statute, refers to that general system of law which prevails in England, and in most of the United States by derivation from England, as distinguished from the Roman or civil law system, which was in force in this territory prior to the Louisiana purchase. Hence the statute does not require adherence to the decisions of the English common-law courts prior to the Revolution, in case this court considers subsequent decisions, either in England or America, better expositions of the general principles of that system. n524

§ 7.02(cc) Nevada.

Nevada was part of the huge western portion of the United States that was nominally under Spanish and Mexican sovereignty until the mid-19th century. No permanent settlements were established in Nevada until after settlers arrived in what is now the state of Utah in July, 1847. Those settlers, members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints ("Mormons") began arriving in huge numbers fleeing religious persecution in the Midwest and by 1851 had founded small communities in Carson Valley and elsewhere.

Until 1848, the region was nominally under Spanish governance, although this governance was never effective beyond California. Spanish outposts at San Diego and Monterey in California had been established by the beginning of the 19th century, but little governmental control was exercised, especially from Mexico after Mexican independence was achieved in 1821. From the time that American settlers arrived in Utah until effective American governmental control was asserted in both Utah and Nevada a few years later, church officials established governmental institutions and commenced a vigorous effort of widespread settlement throughout the intermountain area.

While the church organizations dealt effectively with local problems, a larger government movement was underway by the founding of the State of "Deseret" (a religious term) in 1849, a huge entity extending from Nebraska to California, and from Oregon to and including Arizona. The constitution for the State of Deseret made no explicit references to the common law, but the governmental institutions established by the document were familiar in most American common law jurisdictions. n525

In 1850, the authorization for the Territory of Utah was enacted by Congress, n526 with boundaries including the present states of Utah, Nevada, the southwest corner of Wyoming, and a large part of western Colorado. According to this act, the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n527 and federal law was extended over the area, but no prior laws were declared to be in force. n528

When Nevada was authorized for its own territorial status in 1861, n529 that act, too, declared that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction," n530 and federal law was extended over the area, but no prior laws were declared to be in force. n531

At the first meeting of the territorial legislature in 1861, a common law reception statute was enacted:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution or Laws of the United States, or the Laws of the Territory of Nevada, shall be the rule of decision in all Courts of this Territory. n532

In 1864 Nevada Territory was authorized to form a state, n533 and, although the enabling act contained no provision for continuing prior laws in force, the first Nevada constitution, which became effective when statehood was attained that same year, n534 did have such a provision:

> All laws of the Territory of Nevada, in force at the time of the admission of this State, not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations or be altered or repealed by the legislature. n535

This remains the current provision on prior laws in force in the Nevada constitution. In 1872, this provision was held by the Nevada Supreme Court to have continued in force the 1861 common law reception statute:

> The first legislature of the territory of Nevada (Stat. 1861, Page 1), declared that, "the common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution or laws of the United States, or the laws of the territory of Nevada, shall be the rule of decision in all courts of this territory.["] Our state constitution adopted this, like all other laws of the territory, by section two of the schedule [of the state constitution], which declares that all laws of the territory of Nevada in force at the time of the admission of the state, not repugnant to the constitution should remain in force until repealed by the legislature; hence, although the common law might, in the opinion of the judges, be inapplicable, still, if not in conflict with the constitution or laws of the United States, or the constitution or laws of Nevada, it must nevertheless be enforced. n536

Nevada's present common law reception statute differs little from the 1861 version:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to or in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or the constitution and laws of this state, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state. n537

An early judicial explanation of common law reception in Nevada still applies today:

> [I]n adopting the common law of England in this country, it seems to be the established doctrine that it is adopted as amended or altered by English statutes in force at the time of the emigration of our > colonial ancestors ...

>
> * * *
>
> When the common law of England, consisting in part of statutes, as we have shown, has been adopted in the United States, why may not Americans, like the adventurous emigrants of other nationalities, carry with them the common law of their country into the Territories acquired since the Revolution?
>
> And whenever that law, without exception, is declared, as it has been here, to be the rule of decision, why shall it not prevail? In Norris v. Harris (15 Cal. 226), Chief Justice Field, after stating that the common law of England was repeatedly presumed to exist in the original States, and in those carved out of them, adds: "A similar presumption must prevail as to the existence of the common law in those States which have been established in Territories acquired since the Revolution, where such Territory was not, at the time of its acquisition, occupied as an organized and civilized community, when in fact the population of the new State upon the establishment of government, was formed of the emigration from the original State." This language possesses peculiar force in this State. n538

In addition to developing its own mining and water law n539, Nevada also followed California's example and adopted the community property system of marital property. n540

§ 7.02(dd) New Hampshire.

The earliest New Hampshire settlements arose under widely varied auspices and equally varied sources of law. The two earliest settlements, at Dover and Portsmouth, had their legal origins in the 1620 charter that created the Council for New England and which was given jurisdiction over all of New England. It was under this charter that the Mayflower sailed, and it authorized the colonial council:

> to make all Manner of Orders, Laws, Directions, Instructions, Forms, and Ceremonies of Government and Magistracy fitt and necessary for any concerning the Government of said Collony and Plantation, so always as the same be not contrary to the Laws and Statutes of this our Realme of England... n541

The grant of lands under this charter was given in the English tenure of free and common socage, "to be holden of Us as of our Manor of East-Greenwich, in our County of Kent, in free and common socage and not in Capite nor by Knight's Service...." n542 It was further declared that "English subjects settling in the colony, and their children there born, shall have all the rights of natural born Englishmen." n543

The "adventurers" who founded Dover and Portsmouth obtained individual grants under the authority of the 1620 charter. John Mason, the Portsmouth grantee, obtained a new grant from the New England Council in 1635, confirming his various previous grants, and even though this latest grant was not confirmed before Mason died, its language reveals much about the English law foundation of New Hampshire settlers' property rights. Mason was to have "power over the land and water, forests, mines, and fisheries, according to the right and powers 'had, used and enjoyed by the now or any former Bishop of Duresme within the County Palatine of Duresme.' " n544 The people of New Hampshire and their descendants:

> were to be "holden, reputed and had as the faithful liege people of Us [the crown], our heirs and successors, originally springing up within our Realm of England." And they were to take by descent or purchase, and freely possess, property in the three kingdoms, as if living therein; and to have "all the liberties, franchises and privileges of this our realm of England, without any impediment whatsoever, -- any statute to the contrary notwithstanding ...."

> * * *
>
> ....Power also was given to Mason and his heirs, "lest the way to honor and renown might seem difficult and hard to find in so remote and far distant a country," to create and bestow titles, "so they be such as in England now are in use," and "to create villages and into boroughs, and boroughs into cities...." "We do declare and ordain, that the said Province of New Hampshire shall be immediately subject to our Crown of England, and dependent upon the same for ever." n545

These provisions were never confirmed and thus remained only expressions of intent and assumption.

A third source of New Hampshire settlement emerged in 1638, when religious dissenter John Wheelwright under sentence of banishment from Massachusetts, purchased from the Indians lands in the Piscataqua region. In 1639 the 35 families in this settlement entered into a civil compact that acknowledged loyalty to the English monarch but only "according to the libertys of our English Colony of Massachusetts." n546

A fourth area of settlement in New Hampshire was opened directly by Massachusetts, which in 1636 directed the establishment of a plantation at Hampton, all presumably under the laws adopted and received in Massachusetts. n547 In 1640 the Dover settlers, fearing a takeover by Massachusetts, entered into a civil compact known as the Dover Combination, by which they pledged loyalty to the laws of England "together with all such orders as shall be concluded by a major part of the freemen of our Society." n548 However, by 1643 the Massachusetts influence became pervasive as, for various reasons, the inhabitants of all four early New Hampshire settlements by 1643 had acquiesced in Massachusetts' assertion of jurisdiction over their territories. Massachusetts hegemony in New Hampshire prevailed until 1679, when the crown ordered Massachusetts to withdraw from the New Hampshire communities and appointed a royal governor.

After appointment of the royal governor in 1679, events moved quickly. Shortly before his death in 1684, King Charles II revoked Massachusetts' charter and proposed to unite Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island and Connecticut into one province. James II took the throne in 1685 and carried out this plan by creating the Dominion of New England. Governor Edmund Andros arrived in Boston in December, 1685, and soon began to exercise his powers of government, including power to inject further confusion into already turbulent landholding arrangements. This mischief ended suddenly in 1688 when James II was overthrown, but the turbulent times had made it impossible for a stable government to form in New Hampshire. Therefore, the colony rejoined Massachusetts for a short time until designated a royal province by William and Mary in 1691.

The supposed foundation of English common law in New Hampshire, whether indigenously developed or derived from Massachusetts, remained somewhat theoretical inasmuch as actual practices in the colony were somewhat at variance with the common law, both in property rights and other respects.

While New Hampshire was officially under the governance of Massachusetts Bay, between approximately 1641 and 1679, the laws of Massachusetts applied in New Hampshire. Under independent New Hampshire's first president, John Cutt, a code of laws was compiled based largely on laws of Plymouth and Massachusetts, and the colony also made some use of a compilation of English statutes that had been sent. In the Cutt Code, the laws of England were invoked to decide questions of real property. The president and council were established as a "constant and setled Court of record," to hear pleas in civil suits and actions, > whether ye same do concern ye realty, and relate to a right of freehold and inheritance, or whether ye same do concern ye personalty, and relate to some matter of debt, contract, damage, or other person, iniury, and also in all mixt actions wch may concern both realty and person...: so always yt ye forms of proceeding in such cases and ye judgment thereupon to be given, be as consonant and agreeable to ye Laws and Statutes of this Our Realm of Engd, as ye prent state and condition of our subjects inhabiting > within ye limits aforesaid, and ye circumstances of ye place will admit. n549

After 1685, New Hampshire was part of the Dominion of New England until the dominion fell and New Hampshire temporarily reunited with Massachusetts. In 1691 New Hampshire resumed status as an individual colony, with its own governor, and from 1699 to 1741 New Hampshire and Massachusetts had separate governmental organizations but a common governor.

While the Cutt Code was in effect the governors made vigorous efforts to discourage or reject legislation that was considered repugnant to English law, and the settlers persisted in promoting their local laws, especially those relating to land:

> It was quite natural, also, that complicated and cumbersome English laws should be replaced by others which were simpler and more direct. The laws relating to inheritances, the ownership and occupation of real estate and the transfer of rights in the same were very different from and simpler than those in England. Instead of the intricate and artificial system of English conveyancing there was a simple, yet comprehensive system. Instead of the doctrine of primogeniture in cases of descent, there was the doctrine of equality, except that the oldest son received a double portion as under the Jewish law. Real estate was made liable for debts, and all estates were allodial. n550

With independence came the need to replace the government structure, which New Hampshire did on a makeshift basis with its brief constitution of 1776. This cryptic document made no reference to the common law or the nature of the legislative power, but proclaimed "that we never sought to throw off our dependance upon Great Britain, but felt ourselves happy under her protection, while we could enjoy our constitutional rights and privileges." n551 The more comprehensive constitution of 1784 has remained the state's basic constitution. The legislative power under this document is not based on any express reliance on English common law, but rather is:

> to make, ordain and establish, all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, ordinances, directions and instructions, either with penalties or without; so as the same be not repugnant, or contrary to this constitution, as they may judge for the benefit and welfare of this state... n552

However, another provision made a broad reception of previous laws still in force:

> All the laws which have heretofore been adopted, used and approved, in the province, colony, or state of New-Hampshire, and usually practiced on in the courts of law, shall remain and be in full force, until altered and repealed by the legislature; such parts thereof only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this constitution... n553

In the current constitution, which is the 1784 document as amended, both the provisions defining the legislative power n554 and receiving prior laws n555 remain in their original wording.

§ 7.02(ee) New Jersey.

New Jersey was originally the subject of 16th century English grants, then the Virginia patents of 1606 and 1609, and still other grants of 1620 and 1634, but no English settlement occurred there for many years. Meanwhile, Dutch and Swedish colonists moved into the area. English claims were dramatically renewed in 1664 when King Charles II made his famous grant to his brother, the Duke of York and future King James II, of the lands included in the future states of New York, New Jersey, Delaware and Pennsylvania.

The 1664 patent was expressed in terms of the fullest property rights consistent with the feudal incidents still connected with the tenure of free and common socage, "To bee holden of us our Heires and Successors as of our Manor of East Greenwich in our County of Kent in ffree and Comon Soccage and not in Capite or by Knights Service." n556

The laws to be administered in the granted lands were to be not contrary to and as near "as conveniently may bee" to the laws of England, and judicial judgments and sentences were subject to a right of appeal in England:

> AND WE DOE FURTHER ... give and Graunt unto our said dearest Brother James Duke of Yorke his heires Deputyes Agents Commissioners and Assignes by these presents full and absolute power and authority to Correct punish Pardon Governe and Rule all such the Subjects of us our heires and Successors as shall from tyme to tyme Adventure themselves into any the parts or Places aforesaid according to such Lawes Orders Ordinances direccons and Instruments as by our said dearest Brother or his Assignes shall bee established as well in all Causes and matters Capitall and Criminall as Civill both Marine and others SOE ALLWAYES as the said Statutes Ordinances and Proceedings bee not contrary to but as neare as conveniently may bee agreeable to the Lawes Statutes and Governement of this our Realme of England AND SAVEING and reserveing to us our heirs and Successors the receiving heareing and determineing of the Appeale and Appeales of all or any Person or Persons of in or belonging to the Territories or Islands aforesaid in or touching any Judgment or Sentence to bee there made or given... n557

The terms of this patent appeared designed to expressly supersede any previous and conflicting grants of the same lands:

> AND LASTLY OUR WILL and pleasure is and wee doe hereby declare and Graunt that these our Letters Pattents or the Inrollment thereof shall bee good and effectuall in the Law to all intents and purposes whatsoever NOTWITHSTANDING the not reciteing or menconing of the premisses or any part thereof or the Meets or Bounds thereof or of any former or other Letters Patents or Graunts heretofore made or Graunted of the premisses or of any part thereof by us or of any of our Progenitors unto any other Person or Persons whatsoever Bodyes Politique or Corporate or any Act Lawe or other Restraint incertainty or ymperfeccon whatsoever to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding... n558

These powers were implemented in 1665, when the Duke appointed a governor, who promulgated a simple code known as the "Duke's Law." This law eventually governed the Duke's vast American grant, which included, along with New York, Delaware, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. In the Dutch areas, except for New York City itself, the settlers were permitted to be governed by their traditional laws, especially as to landholding. A brief revival of Dutch rule in 1673 and 1674 resulted in the Duke's Law replacing even these traditional Dutch laws after English rule was restored in 1674.

The "Duke's Law" has been described as rudimentary, probably because it was patched together from laws of other English colonies in America. It, too, contained a provision that laws adopted in the Duke's colonies were to be "not Contrary to the known Lawes of England." n559 At first, under the "Duke's Law" the Dutch settlers were permitted to be governed by their traditional laws, but this changed when English rule resumed after a brief Dutch interlude in 1673-1674. When the English retook the lands from the Dutch in 1674, Charles II issued a second grant to the Duke of York, specifying certain territories in addition to those described in the first grant, but describing the rights in those lands in terms essentially identical to the wording of the first grant. n560 These grants and laws remained formally in effect even after the "Glorious Revolution" in England in 1688, when the Stuart monarchy was rejected.

Even before the "Duke's Law" took effect in New Jersey, the Duke in 1664 granted most of New Jersey to John Berkeley and George Carteret, who in 1665 issued governmental provisions called "Concessions and Agreement" to attract settlers. Described as the first explicit expression of fundamental law in New Jersey, the Concessions authorized a legislature with authority to enact necessary laws that were "consonant to reason and, as neare as may be conveniently agreeable to the Lawes and Customes of his Majesties Kingdom of England...." n561 In guaranteeing religious toleration the Concessions gave assurance of such freedom "any law, statute or clause contained or to be contained, usage or custom of this realm of England to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding." n562 Later conflict over the issue of quitrents would develop between towns that received grants under the "Duke's Law" and before the "Concessions and Agreement" and those that received their grants later, indicating a split over what was the source of fundamental law in the province.

When New Jersey became divided into East and West portions in 1676, separate legislation emerged from the two sectors. William Penn became heavily involved in West Jersey affairs in 1676, and in 1682 he and some associates assumed the proprietorship of East New Jersey. In the West, they had issued "Concessions and Agreements" in 1677, which contained no explicit reference to English common law. In East Jersey, Penn and the other proprietors drew up "Fundamental Constitutions" which presented a strongly feudal scheme of government, but made no mention of English common law. When the portions were combined into one royal province in 1702, the governor was instructed, among other things:

> to take care that no Mans life, Member, Freehold or Goods be taken away or harmed in Our Said Province, otherwise than by Established and known Laws, not repugnant to, but as much as may be agreeable to the Laws of England. n563

If English common law was resisted in favor of local legislation throughout New Jersey's colonial history, it is also true that English common law was always present, even if in the background, and formed the foundation for rule of law in New Jersey.

New Jersey's first constitution, in 1776, not only received the previously accumulated statutory law then in force, but also adopted English common law:

> XXI. That all the laws of this Province, contained in the edition lately published by Mr. Allinson, shall be and remain in full force, until altered by the Legislature of this Colony (such only excepted, as are incompatible with this Charter) and shall be, according as heretofore, regarded in all respects, by all civil officers, and others, the good people of this Province.
>
> XXII. That the common law of England, as well as so much of the statute law, as have been heretofore practised in this Colony, shall still remain in force, until they shall be altered by a future law of the Legislature; such parts only excepted, as are repugnant to the rights and privileges contained in this Charter; and that the inestimable right of trial by jury shall remain confirmed as a part of the law of this Colony, without repeal, forever. n564

A single provision that effectively combines both sections of the 1776 constitution was included in the New Jersey Constitution of 1844:

> The common law and statute laws now in force not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or be altered or repealed by the legislature; ...The several courts of law and equity, except as herein otherwise provided, shall continue with the like powers and jurisdiction as if this constitution had not been adopted. n565

In the current constitution of 1947, an equivalent provision carries on former law, but has dropped the specific mention of common law:

> All law, statutory and otherwise, all rules and regulations of administrative bodies and all rules of courts in force at the time this Constitution or any Article thereof takes effect shall remain in full force until they expire or are superseded, altered or repealed by this Constitution or otherwise. n566

The New Jersey courts have been appropriately selective about adoption of English legal sources. In a 1941 case a New Jersey court refused to adopt as binding a statement from an 1844 English case; n567 but the next year the English common law was invoked as the rule of law on a matter of land ownership. n568

§ 7.02(ff) New Mexico.

Land that is now in New Mexico was first occupied by the United States in 1846 during the war with Mexico. A code of laws drawn up in 1846, during the American military governorship, continued in effect the earlier Spanish and Mexican laws. When territorial status was granted for New Mexico Territory in 1850, no provision was made either for continuing or discontinuing the effect of prior laws; apparently only applicable federal laws were received:

> And be it further enacted, That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of New Mexico as elsewhere within the United States. n569

Also, the "Supreme and District Courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction." n570

This uncertain mix of Anglo-American and Spanish-Mexican elements in territorial law was noted in state courts, where the provision for common law jurisdiction was restricted to procedural matters only, and substantive rights were determined according to Mexican law. n571 Matters were clarified somewhat in 1876, when the territorial legislature enacted a general reception provision: "In all courts in this territory the common law as recognized in the United States of America shall be the rule of practice and decision." n572 This provision has been continued verbatim into the current New Mexico code, n573 along with a companion provision accepting the rules of equity. n574 Other statutes reaffirm common law principles in specified subject areas despite interposition of some state statutory regulation. n575

Because the reception provision's "common law as recognized in the United States" was different in each state, the territorial supreme court held that what was received was > the unwritten or common law of England, and the acts of parliament of a general nature, not local to Great Britain, which had been passed and were in force at the date of the war of the Revolution, and not in conflict with the constitution or laws of the United States, nor of the state or territory, and which were suitable to the wants and conditions of the people. n576

The reception statute was also held to have continued in force the law in the prior territorial statutes, including those elements of the law that were Spanish and Mexican, n577 which was in contrast to the explicit repeal of Hispanic law that occurred in Arizona Territory. n578

New Mexico's view of the common law elements thus incorporated into state law was ably described by its Supreme Court in 1886:

> From the authorities cited, it is clear that there are three classes of "common law as recognized in the United States of America": First, in those states which were a part of the original colonies, and which have not by legislation adopted statutes passed prior to a particular date, the unwritten law, and such general British statutes, applicable to their condition, as were in force at the time of the formation of the colonial governments, and such as were afterwards adopted, expressly or tacitly, constituted the common law; second, in those states which have adopted the common law, and the British statutes passed and in force prior to the dated fixed in the act of adoption, and were of a general nature, and suitable to their situation, such common law and statutes constitute their common law; and, third, in those states and territories which were not of the original colonies, and which have not in terms adopted any English statutes, but have adopted the common law, the unwritten or common law of England, and the acts of parliament of a general nature, not local to Great Britain, which had been passed and were in force at the date of the war of the Revolution, and not in conflict with the constitution or laws of the United States, nor of the state or territory, and which were suitable to the wants and condition of the people, are the > common law of such states and territories.

>
> This territory belongs to the last class. It was not a part of the original colonies, but was acquired in 1848. The legislature has not in terms adopted any British statutes, nor has it undertaken to define what is embraced in the words 'common law,' or lex non scripta, and such British statutes of a general nature, not local to that kingdom, nor in conflict with the constitution or laws of the United States, nor of this territory, which are applicable to our condition and circumstances, and which were in force at the time of our separation from the mother country. n579

Under this view, the English statute of frauds has been held to be part of the common law, n580 but other common law doctrines have been specifically rejected, such as treble damages for waste, n581 destructibility of contingent remainders, n582 common law marriage, n583 common law water rights, n584 and, of course, common law rights of dower and curtesy. n585 The statutory community property rights of husband and wife in New Mexico are drawn from Spanish law, which may be used for interpretation. n586 Many land titles in New Mexico antedate 1846, when American governmental authority was first imposed. n587

§ 7.02(gg) New York.

Fundamental law and the basic institutions of government in what is now New York state were at first entirely Dutch. The first settlements, the first land distributions, and the first organizations of local government were all under the authority and influence of Dutch law.

Although the first settlements in the area that is now New York state were by the Dutch, the charter authorizing the Dutch West India Company to undertake colonization made no mention of the company's rights to deal with interests in land. Emphasis on settlement and an orderly land distribution did not emerge until the Charter of Privileges to Patroons was approved in 1629.

The policy of encouraging settlement by patroons imparted significant consequences for landholding in New Netherlands. Patroons can be best described as the Dutch equivalents of English manorial lords. A patroon who held land held it according to a feudal system of land rights, which included the rights to require services as well as rents from tenants who were occupying the patroon's lands, and the right to exercise judicial and other governmental powers over the patroon's holdings. Only the patroon held the land outright; others could only be tenants of the patroon. The patroons of New Netherlands obligated themselves to commence a colony with at least 50 persons during a four-year period of time, in return for which each patroon received manorial and proprietary rights to sixteen miles of Hudson River shoreline and the lands behind the shoreline.

In the end only one patroonship ever succeeded, that of Kiliaen Van Rensselaer. Over lands covering present-day Albany, Columbia and Rensselaer counties in New York, he established a feudal tenant system that persisted until tenants rebelled early in the 19th century.

Inevitably, the institutions of Dutch colonial government clashed from time to time with the feudalistic independence of the Dutch patroons. The monopolistic powers exercised by the Dutch West India Company as colonial proprietor were very extensive, and even when its monopoly was abolished in 1640, its director and council remained the principal organs of government in the province:

> Few formal instructions [from the company] appear, but orders were transmitted in the letters concerning grants of land, recall of grants, duties and all the minutia of trade relations, claims and suits against the company, dealings with the Indians, relations with the English on the north and the south and with the Swedes, the appointment and removal of officials, and the claims of patroons. n588

The Company's director and council exercised legislative power, especially in the absence of any popular legislative assembly similar to those emerging in contemporary English colonies. Their power over management of the land was almost total and was tied closely to exercising powers of local government:

> By ordinances concerning land, provision was made for the extinguishment of Indian claims, for issue of patents, for the annulment of extravagant and unimproved grants, for the fencing of land, for the levying of tenths and other taxes upon it, for the collection of rents, and the prevention of trespass. Courts were established under the authority of these ordinances; their jurisdiction was prescribed, and provision was made for their officials. Provisions for land grants and for courts, when combined, led to the origin of local government within New Netherland. n589

When the Company revised its rules of settlement in 1640, under a grant entitled Freedoms and Exemptions for New Netherland, n590 its colonial monopoly was surrendered and the possibility of colonies being founded by private persons was opened. If settlements in such private colonies grew into towns or villages, the Company was required to grant to such villages powers of local government; eventually village magistrates exercised authority to pass ordinances regulating land, fences, highways, schools, and churches.

Even during the Dutch era, a large proportion of the villages were populated by English settlers, so it is not surprising that the first conferring of village rights was on English towns within Dutch territory on Long Island in 1644. Other bestowals of village rights on Dutch communities followed quickly and continued right up to the time of the English takeover in 1664. While these developments in local government organization were occurring, officials in the patroonships sought to exclude completely any exercise of provincial government within the patroon holdings; these conflicts also continued unresolved right up to the end of Dutch rule in New Netherland.

Because the Dutch colony of New Netherland was technically an intrusion into lands already claimed by a grant to the Virginia Company in 1606, conflict with the English was bound to ignite. The first overt outbreak of strife occurred in the spring of 1632 when a Dutch ship returning to Holland was forced by weather to put into Plymouth, where the vessel and its passengers were detained while the governments at home bickered over their respective claims. The ship was released in May, but the English asserted the release was "without any prejudice to his majesty's rights." n591

Further contentions followed in 1633. English trading with the Indians was obstructed, colonists from Plymouth began a settlement in territory along the Connecticut River claimed by the Dutch, and by 1635 numerous families from Massachusetts Bay had followed. By 1639 migration into New Netherlands was originating from both New England and Virginia. From as many English settlers as possible, the Dutch colonial government obtained an oath of fidelity:

> to their High Mightinesses the Lords States General, his Highness of Orange, and the Noble Director and Council of New Netherland; to follow the Director or any of his Council, wherever they shall lead; faithfully to give instant warning of any treason, or other detriment to this country that shall come to their knowledge; to assist to the utmost of their power in defending and protecting with their blood and treasure, the inhabitants thereof against all its enemies. n592

The English soon commenced a settlement at New Haven and purchased Indian land in all the surrounding areas. As for Long Island, > the Plymouth Company had taken upon itself to grant, at the request of Charles I, in 1635, the whole of Long Island to William Alexander, Earl of Stirling, who, in the early part of the following year, appointed an agent to dispose of the lands thus conveyed to him, to all who were desirous to purchase and settle them. n593

While the English were settling the eastern end of Long Island, the Dutch were purchasing and settling the western lands of the island. A series of isolated confrontations led, in 1641, to negotiations between the Dutch and English, as a result of which it was agreed that the English could settle in territory claimed by the Dutch according to the provisions of the 1640 charter revising the Freedoms and Exemptions for New Netherland. Several families then considering moving from Massachusetts to Long Island thereafter declined to do so, because the new arrangement tacitly conceded the Dutch rights to colonize. Nevertheless, the provisions of the 1640 charter "formed the basis of all future grants from the Dutch to the English." n594 According to those provisions, English settling in Dutch territory:

> were to take the oath of allegiance to their High Mightinesses the States General and the West India Company, and in return, to enjoy free exercise of religion, and if they desired to have a magistracy from among themselves, they were to be allowed to nominate three or more persons from the most respectable among them, from which the Director-general would select one or more schepens, or magistrates... In criminal cases, they might proceed to, but not inflict capital punishment. They were empowered to erect towns, but could not construct forts except by special leave. Lands were to be shown to them free of expense, and whatever ground they might select, they were to hold free of rent or taxes for ten years; at the expiration of which time, they should be holden to pay the tenths of the produce. They were, in addition, to enjoy free hunting and fishing, and unshackled commerce, conformably to the privileges granted to New Netherland, but they were bound, in return, to make use of the weights and measures of the country. n595

In March, 1642, several families from Massachusetts, under the leadership of the Rev. Francis Doughty, a dissenting minister, did obtain a patent for 13,342 acres on Long Island and resettled there. Families from Lynn had obtained a similar patent in June, 1641. Under both patents, the English settlers had the usual privileges of free manors, including free exercise of religion and powers to establish towns, churches, and systems of civil and criminal justice, all according to the charter of 1640.

The English, who had never officially acknowledged Dutch claims to the territory of New Netherlands, took over the colonial government by force but without much violence in 1664. By means of a royal charter dated March 12, 1664, and despite King James I having included the same lands in the 1606 patent for the Virginia colony, the English King Charles II granted full rights over the province to his brother the Duke of York and future King James II.

The grantee, as a feudal lord, was given extensive powers of government and court jurisdiction. The laws to be administered in the granted lands were to be not contrary to and as near "as conveniently may bee" to the laws of England, and judicial judgments and sentences were subject to a right of appeal in England.

These powers were implemented in 1665, when the Duke appointed a governor, who promulgated a simple code known as the "Duke's Law." This law eventually governed the Duke's vast American grant, which included, along with New York, Delaware, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. Those who held land rights under the Dutch were directed by the Duke's Law of 1665 to turn in their old grants and receive new patents from the English; however, in the Dutch areas, except for New York City itself, the settlers were permitted to be governed by their traditional laws, especially as to landholding. When a brief period of revived Dutch rule in 1673 and 1674 ended with the English once again in control, the Duke's Law was applied even in the traditional Dutch areas.

The "Duke's Law" has been described as rudimentary, probably because it was patched together from laws of other English colonies in America. Nevertheless, it is a lengthy code, occupying almost 100 pages in its most recent printing:

> The Duke of York's Laws for the government of the Colony of New York were compiled from the statutes for the governments of the other English colonies in America, under the direction of Nicolls, the first English Governor. They were promulgated at Hempstead, on Long Island, March 1, 1665, and copies were transmitted to the several ridings, constituting the shire of Yorkshire. n596

This law, too, contained a provision that laws adopted in the Duke's colonies were to be "not Contrary to the known Lawes of England." n597

At first, under the "Duke's Law" the Dutch settlers were permitted to be governed by their traditional laws, but this changed after English rule resumed in 1673-1674. When the English retook the lands from the Dutch in 1674, Charles II issued a second grant to the Duke of York, specifying certain territories in addition to those described in the first grant, but describing the rights in those lands in terms essentially identical to the wording of the first grant. n598 These grants and laws remained formally in effect even after the "Glorious Revolution" in England in 1688, when the Stuart monarchy was rejected.

A provincial assembly met in 1690, which temporarily kept in force the existing laws:

> With the "Duke's Law" still in effect, the earliest work of the new legislature was directed toward proclaiming and defining the new political authority, establishing courts, adjusting municipal boundaries, establishing a body of liberties, repairing the damage done by the [Leisler] rebellion, and establishing the law of :mb England :mx as the basis of all provincial legislation. Thereafter, as in all other jurisdictions, the assembly confined itself to meeting the current and ever-changing needs of the province, and its enactments eventually became sufficiently extensive to replace the "Duke's Law." n599

In 1693 a legislative committee began reviewing all legislation enacted since 1691 and preparing it for printing. The product of the committee's efforts became the first printed collection of laws for New York. One enactment included in this collection, "An Act declaring what are the Rights & Priviledges of Their Majesties Subjects inhabiting within Their Province of New-York" showed the colony's heavy reliance on the Magna Carta and other sources of English law, as revealed in examples of individual provisions quoted below:

> That no Free-man shall be taken or imprisoned, or be deprived of his Free-hold or Liberty, or free Customs, or Out-Lawed, or Exiled, or any other wayes destroyed; nor shall be passed upon, adjudged or condemned, but by the lawful Judgment of his Peers, and by the Law of this Province.
>
> Justice nor Right shall be neither Sold, Denyed or Delayed to any Person within this Province.
>
> That no Aid, Tax, Talliage or Custom, Loan, Benevolence, Gift, Excise, Duty or Imposition whatsoever shall be laid, assessed, imposed, levied or required of or on any of Their Majesties Subjects within this Province, &c. or their Estates, upon any manner of Colour or Pretence whatsoever, but by the Act and Consent of the Governour and Council, and Representatives of the People in General Assembly met and convened.
>
> That no Man, of what Estate or Condition soever, shall be put out of his Lands, Tenements, nor taken, imprisoned, nor disinherited, nor banished, nor any ways destroyed or molested, without first being brought to answer by due court of Law.
>
> That a Free-man shall not be amerced for a small Fault, but after the manner of his Fault, and for a great Fault after the greatness thereof, saving to him his Free-hold; and a Husband-man, saving to him his Wainage and none of these Amercements shall be assessed, but by the Oath of Twelve Honest and Lawful men of the Vicinage ...
>
> That no Free-man shall be compelled to receive any Souldiers or Marriners, except Inholders, and other Houses of publick Entertainment, who are to quarter for ready Money into his House, and there suffer them to sojourn again their Wills; provided it be not in time of actual War within this Province ...
>
> That all the Lands within this Province shall be esteemed and accounted Lands of Free-hold, and > Inheritance in free and common Soccage, according to the Tenor of East-Greenwich in their Majesties Realm of England.

>
> That no Estate of a Feme-Covert shall be sold or conveyed, but by Deed acknowledged by her in some Court of Record, the Woman being secretly examined, if she doth it freely, without threats or compulsion of her Husband ...
>
> That all Lands and Heritages within this Province and Dependencies shall be free from all Fines, Lisences upon Alienations, and from all Heriots, Wardships, Liveries, Primiers, Seizins, Year and Day, and Waste, Escheat and Forfeiture upon the Death of Parents and Ancestors, Natural, Unnatural, Casual or Judicial, and that forever, Cases of High-Treason only excepted... n600

The thoroughness of English common law adoption in New York after 1700 can be illustrated by the fact that it was only in 1782, after the Revolution and after adoption of a state constitution, that the state legislature acted to abolish primogeniture, reestablish partible inheritance, and eliminate further entails. n601

Well before the Revolutionary period, the colonial courts and judicial procedure had been revised after resumption of English rule, so that in 1684, English common law forms of procedures became the rule in New York n602. In 1691, the colonial legislature created the Supreme Court of Judicature which was to function "as fully and amply to all Intents & purposes whatsoever, as the Courts of Kings Bench, Comon Pleas, & Exchequer within their Majestyes Kingdome of England, have or ought to have...." n603 This court has been described as "the instrument by which the great body of the jurisprudence of the English common law was applied to New York." n604 In 1774 the New York royal governor declared that "the common law of England is the fundamental law of the province, and it is a received doctrine that all the statutes enacted before the province had a legislature are binding upon the colony." n605

The first state constitution was adopted in 1777 with an explicit common law reception provision:

> And this convention doth further, in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, ordain, determine, and declare that such parts of the common law of England, and of the statute law of England and Great Britain, and of the acts of the legislature of the colony of New York, as together did form the law of the said colony on the 19th day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, shall be and continue the law of this State, subject to such alterations and provisions as the legislature of this State shall, from time to time, make concerning the same. That such of said acts, as are temporary, shall expire at the times limited for their duration respectively. That all such parts of the said common law, and all such of the said statutes and acts aforesaid, or parts thereof, as may be construed to establish or maintain any particular denomination of Christians or their ministers, or concern the allegiance heretofore yielded to, and the supremacy, sovereignty, government, or prerogatives claimed or exercised by, the King of Great Britain and his predecessors, over the colony of New York and its inhabitants, or are repugnant to this constitution, be, and they hereby are, abrogated and rejected. n606

The essence of this provision was continued in the 1821 constitution, n607 in the 1846 constitution, n608 and throughout the subsequent piecemeal constitution revision process in New York.

This same 1777 constitution also made specific provision for certain land rights, especially those that might be affected during the transition to independence:

> That all grants of lands within this State, made by the King of Great Britain, or persons acting under this authority, after the fourteenth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, shall be null and void; but that nothing in this constitution contained shall be construed to affect any grants of land within this State, made by the authority of the said King or his predecessors, or to annul any charters > to bodies-politic by him or them, or any of them, made prior to that day. n609

Beginning with the 1846 constitution, specific provisions as to land rights ensured recognition of sovereignty in the state of New York and the final demise of feudalistic landholding practices:

> Sec. 11. The people of this State, in their right of sovereignty, are deemed to possess the original and ultimate property in and to all lands within the jurisdiction of the State; and all lands the title to which shall fail, from a defect of heirs, shall revert or escheat to the people.
>
> Sec. 12. All feudal tenures of every description, with all their incidents, are declared to be abolished, saving, however, all rents and services certain which at any time heretofore have been lawfully created or reserved.
>
> Sec. 13. All lands within this State are declared to be allodial, so that, subject only to the liability to escheat, the entire and absolute property is vested in the owners, according to the nature of their respective estates.
>
> Sec. 14. No lease or grant of agricultural land for a longer period than twelve years, hereafter made, in which shall be reserved any rent or service of any kind, shall be valid.
>
> Sec. 15. All fines, quarter sales, or other like restraints upon alienation reserved in any grant of land hereafter to be made, shall be void. n610

These identical provisions were continued in the 1897 constitution. n611 This 1897 constitution, as significantly revised in 1938, is New York's current constitution, and these provisions remain mostly intact, although rearranged. The sovereignty and allodial land ownership provisions have been combined in one section; n612 the common law provision has retained most of its original wording; n613 the section validating certain older land grants has continued with certain additions; and the provisions abolishing feudal tenures have been dropped.

After the 1777 constitution went into effect and after independence was established, New York courts made appropriately selective application of English common law. In one 1799 case, the common law applicable in New York was drawn from an English case decided only five years earlier; n614 in another 1799 case the English common law of ejectment was rejected as unsuitable to govern New York's western frontier lands. n615 English statutes of limitation enacted in 1541 and 1624 were applied in an 1835 New York case. n616

English common law continues to be the last resort rule of decision in 20th century New York cases, n617 under a constitutional provision whose wording has been somewhat altered from the 1777 version:

> Such parts of the common law, and of the acts of the legislature of the colony of New York, as together did form the law of the said colony, on the nineteenth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, and the resolutions of the congress of said colony, and of the convention of the State of New York, in force on the twentieth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, which have not since expired, or been repealed or altered; and such acts of the legislature of this state as are now in force, shall be and continue the law of this state, subject to such alterations as the legislature shall make concerning the same. But all such parts of the common law, and such of the said acts, or parts thereof, as are repugnant to this constitution, are hereby abrogated. n618

New York courts have recognized that determining what was the common law rule as of 1775 can be an uncertain undertaking. It is easiest "where recognized printed reports of the English courts prior to 1775 show that the common law on any particular subject was by such case established and determined as therein stated, [so that] such reports are the best and highest evidence of such common law." n619 However, > where the rules of the common law relating to a matter under consideration are not expressly stated in the reported cases of the English courts prior to 1775, the statement of the courts of this country and of England subsequent to that time, especially when they do not purport to modify the common law, are not only entitled to careful consideration, but to great weight in determining the common-law rule prior to 1775. An unreserved statement by a court as to the common-law rule will in the absence of other authority, be assumed to be based upon custom and the unwritten law antedating such time. n620

As an example, it has been held that the English statute of frauds in effect in 1677 was a part of the common law of New York, n621 and a ruling that a state has priority over its citizens in obtaining payment of debts owed has been held to derive from the common law. n622

§ 7.02(hh) North Carolina.

The first English charter for land located in what is now North Carolina was that granted in 1578 to Sir Humphrey Gilbert. The application of English law to any of such lands that were eventually colonized under the charter was confirmed in Gilbert's rights to "all the soil of all such lands ... to be had or used with full power to dispose thereof, and of every part thereof, in fee simple or otherwise, according to the laws of England, as near as the same conveniently may be." n623 To Gilbert and all his fellow colonists was granted that they "shall and may have and enjoy all the privileges of free denizens n624 and persons native of England and within our allegiance...." n625 Powers of government, including the administration of justice, were also included in the charter, "so always, that the said statutes, laws, and ordinances may be, as near as conveniently may, agreeable to the form of the laws and policy of England...." n626

Gilbert's short-lived 1583 settlement in Newfoundland, and his death during the voyage back to England, resulted in the renewal of Gilbert's charter in Raleigh's name, on March 25, 1584. Issued shortly before Gilbert's charter was to expire, Raleigh's charter was, in effect, a six-year extension, and, in its grants of property rights and governing power, was virtually identical to Gilbert's charter. Raleigh's single colonization effort in North Carolina was the legendary "lost colony" of Roanoke Island, discovered abandoned in 1590, and his colonial privileges were thereafter lost when he was imprisoned and convicted for high treason. Because his charter rights were forfeited to the crown upon his conviction, North Carolina land, as part of "Virginia," became available for re-granting by King James I.

When King James I took the throne after Queen Elizabeth's death in 1603, several influential and wealthy men were still interested in colonizing ventures. Hoping to resume what Raleigh had not finished, they approached James about another charter, and this was granted to the Virginia Company on April 10, 1606. The Virginia Company charter, obtained only three years after the last of Raleigh's expeditions, was a continuation of the Gilbert and Raleigh projects and included among its principals several men who had participated in those earlier enterprises. Charter lands were divided into northern and southern sectors assigned to two different groups within the Company, and the southern territory included in the charter encompassed most of the coastal sector of North Carolina. Nevertheless, this charter was not as generous as the earlier charters given to Gilbert and Raleigh:

> The territory involved in the new charter was restricted to a prescribed region. The company was not given the right to own land, although it could parcel out land among settlers, to be granted to them by patents from the king. Governmental authority over colonies was reserved by the crown, to be exercised by a council resident in London, appointed and instructed by the king. The authority of the company chiefly consisted by recruiting, transporting, and supplying colonists, conducting trade, and handling other financial matters. Colonists were guaranteed the rights of Englishmen at home, such as trial by jury, habeas corpus, and the right to own and inherit property, but they were not given the right to participate in government. n627

Unsatisfactory aspects of the 1606 charter led to requests for a new charter, which was granted on May 23, 1609. Driven principally by the desire to extend jurisdiction over the Bermuda Islands, the Company obtained yet another charter on March 12, 1612. Because of factional disputes within the colony, this charter was revoked by court decision in 1624, and the land and rights of the Virginia Company reverted to the crown. Still no permanent settlement had been established in North Carolina, so that land was available for re-granting by the crown. Such a re-grant occurred five years later, when King Charles I granted most of present-day North Carolina to his attorney-general Sir Robert Heath. Heath was unable to assemble the resources needed to commence colonization, so in the 1630's he disposed of his interest in the tract. Several of Heath's assignees continued to promote a colony in North Carolina, but no settlement materialized. Eventually, the crown considered the grant lapsed, because no colonies had been established, and because of this King Charles II re-granted the Heath tract to eight other persons in 1663.

The Heath Charter, however, did not remain a dead letter. First, despite the royal grant of 1663, persons holding rights under the Heath Charter of 1629 began to press their claims to North Carolina territory. Those claims were rejected by an order in council of August 12, 1663, but the claimants and their heirs and successors persisted, finally in 1768 obtaining a court judgment that awarded them a settlement of 100,000 acres in New York. Second, the Heath Charter of 1629 was the model for the new royal charter of 1663; the essential provisions of 1629 reappeared in the proprietors' charters of 1663 and beyond.

The Heath Charter was based entirely on a foundation of English law, indeed, upon English law with its entire remaining feudal accessories. The charter states that "we ... have Given, Granted, and confirmed ... to the said Sir Robert Heath, Knight, his heirs and assigns, for ever, ... all the lands, Tenements, and Hereditaments [in the described tract]...." n628 This grant of land was accompanied by a very broad grant of governmental authority that was as thoroughly and feudally English as was consistent with the times:

> Together with all ... Rights, Jurisdictions, privileges, prerogatives, Royalties, liberties, and immunities ...
>
> To have, exercise, use, and enjoy, in like manner as any Bishop of Durham within the Bishopric, or County Palatine, of Durham, in our Kingdom of England, ever heretofore had, held, used, or enjoyed, or of right ought or could have, held, use, or enjoy.
>
> And, by these presents, we make, create, and constitute the same Sir Robert Heath, his Heirs and assigns, true and absolute Lords and Proprietors of the Region and Territory aforesaid, and all other the premises, for us, our heirs and successors;
>
> Saving always, the faith and allegiance due to us, our heirs and Successors... n629

The feudal and English nature of this proprietary grant was emphasized in the provision that described tenure as knight's service of a tenant-in-chief:

> To be held of Us, our Heirs and Successors, Kings of England, in chief, by Knight's service; and by paying for it, to us, our Heirs and successors, one Circle of Gold, formed in the fashion of a crown, of the weight of twenty Ounces, with this inscription engraved upon it, DEUS CORONET OPUS SUUM ["God crowns His work"], whensoever, and as often as it shall happen, that we, Our Heirs or Successors, shall enter the said Region. n630

The proprietor Heath was granted a very broad lawmaking power, but with provision for a legislative body that would function as consistently as possible with English law:

> [W]e ... do give Power to the said Sir Robert ... and to his Heirs and assigns, for the good and happy Government of the said Province, to form, make, and enact, and Publish under the Seal of the said Sir Robert ... what Laws soever may concern the public state of the said province, or the private profit of all,

> according to the wholesome directions of and with the counsel, assent, and approbation of the Freeholders of the same Province, or the Major part of them ...
>
> Yet, so that the foresaid laws and ordinances be consonant to Reason, and not repugnant or contrary but, as conveniently as may be done, consonant to the Laws, Statutes, Customs, and rights of our Realm of England. n631

Any person born into or coming into the colony would be considered an English subject or citizen, and their property rights would be the same as those of English subjects:

> And also, that they shall possess lands, Tenements, Rents, services, and Hereditaments whatsoever within our Kingdom of England and other our Dominions, to purchase, receive, take, have, hold, buy, and possess, and them to use and enjoy, and also, them to give, sell, alienate, and bequeath; and also, all liberties, franchises, and privileges of this our Realm to have and possess freely, quietly, and peacably; and that they may use and enjoy them as our lieges born or to be born within our Kingdom of England... n632

On March 24, 1663, King Charles II granted the old Heath tract to eight prominent men who had given important support toward the restoration of the Stuart monarchy. To resolve a territorial dispute with Virginia, a second North Carolina charter was issued in 1665 expanding on the original grant.

The 1663 charter followed the 1629 Heath charter in important particulars, especially in its provision for representative government, the English feudal powers resting in the proprietors, and the foundation of English law. As in the 1629 charter, the feudal powers of the proprietors were expressed in the "Bishop of Durham" clause, "To have, use, exercise, and enjoy, and in as ample manner as any Bishop of Durham, in our Kingdom of England, ever heretofore have held, used, or enjoyed, or of right ought or could have, use, or enjoy." n633 However, in declaring the tenure by which the proprietors held, this 1663 charter departed from the 1629 charter. The earlier document had described Heath's tenure as "in chief, by Knight's service," with a somewhat nominal payment obligation (a gold crown to be given over each time the monarch visited the province). The new charter abandoned this outmoded formula and adopted the new tenurial language commonly found in other colonies' charters, the free and common socage of East Greenwich royal manor: "To be held of us, our heirs and successors, as of our Manor of East Greenwich, in our County of Kent, in Free and Common Soccage, and not in Capite nor by knight's Service. n634 Again, the lawmaking power was subject to the requirement "that the said laws be consonant to reason and, as near as may be conveniently, agreeable to the laws and Customs of this our Kingdom of England," and that ordinances "do not extend to the binding, charging, or taking away of the right or interest of any Person or Persons in their freehold, goods, or Chattels whatsoever." n635

Grants of land were entirely in the context of English law, with the charter specifying even certain features of English law, such as Statute Quia Emptores, that would be suspended for the purpose of making these grants:

> We do give and Grant ... Licence, authority, and power That such Person or Persons may have or take the premises, or any parcel thereof, of [any of the proprietors]...; and the same to hold to themselves, their heirs and Assigns; in what estate of Inheritance soever, in Fee simple or Fee tail or otherwise...; The Statute made in the Parliament of Edward, Son of King Henry, heretofore King of England, our Predecessor, commonly called the Statute of Quia Emptores Terrarum, or any other Statute, Act, or Ordinance, use, Law, Custom, or any other matter, Cause, or thing heretofore published or provided to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. n636

In 1669 the North Carolina proprietors finally moved to implement the enormous feudal powers they had obtained through their charters, even though it meant reducing the rights of the settlers. On July 21, 1669, they adopted their "Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina," which was to apply colony-wide, but ultimately was implemented only partially and only in individual settlements. The Fundamental Constitutions made no explicit reference to reception or adoption of the common law of England, but their entire premise derived exclusively from the last feudal vestiges of English law. Lest any modern colonist reflect too deeply on its anachronisms, one provision of the "Constitutions" even prohibited commentary on the colonial laws:

> Since multiplicity of Comments, as well as of laws, have great inconveniences, and Serve only to obscure and perplex, all manner of comments and expositions on any part of these fundamental constitutions, or on any part of the Common or Statute law of Carolina, are absolutely prohibited. n637

Despite the inadequacies and anachronisms of the Fundamental Constitutions, they did help establish a system of representative government that eventually led to the demise of the proprietary system in North Carolina.

Between 1689 and 1713 the administration of Carolina was formally divided between North Carolina and South Carolina; thereafter the crown took over the colonies and in 1729 created the royal provinces of North and South Carolina.

Until 1751 the laws of the colony were prepared and circulated only in manuscript form. The first printing in 1751 gave the full text of only the laws then in force, while obsolete or repealed acts were indicated by title only. One of the superseded acts from 1711 contained a lengthy provision on the applicability of English law in the colony:

> III. And whereas this Province is annexed to and declared to be a member of the Crown of England, yet notwithstanding disputes do often arise concerning the Laws of England, how far they are in force in this Government; and it appearing by the Charter that the power therein granted of making Laws are limited with the expression Viz. Provided such Laws be consonant to reason, and as near as may be agreeable to the Laws and Customs of Our Kingdom of England, from whence it is manifest that the Laws of England are the Laws of this Government, so far as they are compatible with our way of living and Trade, Be it therefore Enacted by the authority aforesaid, and it is hereby Enacted and declared that the common Law is and shall be in force in the Government except such part of the practice in the issueing out and return of Writts, and proceedings in the Court of Westminster which for want of several Officers, cannot be put in execution, which ought to be supplied by Rules of the General Court of this Government, being first approved of by the Governor in Council which shall be good in Law from time to time till it shall be altered by Act of Assembly.
>
> IV. And be it further Enacted and Declared by the authority aforesaid that all statute Laws of England made for maintaining the Queen's Royal Prerogative and the security of her royal person and succession of the Crown, and all such Laws made for the establishment of church and the Laws made for granting Indulgencies to the protestant dissenters, and all Laws providing for the privileges of the people and security of trade as also statute Laws made for Limitation of Actions and for preventing vexatious Lawsuits, and for preventing immorality and frauds, and confirming Inheritances and Titles of Land are and shall be in force here, altho' this province or the plantations in general are not therein named. n638

A North Carolina enactment of 1715, repealed in 1745, required an oath of fealty to English law of every member of the Council or proprietor's deputy who might be called upon to give "his opinion or determination in any cause":

> [Every council member or deputy] shall upon his entering into that Office take an Oath that he will do right to all manner of persons according to the best of his Judgment & understanding of the Laws and Usages of the Kingdom of Gt. Britain... n639

The North Carolina Assembly, in its second 1749 session, enacted a lengthy provision specifying approximately 202 chapters of about 110 English statutes "to be in as full Force, Power, and Virtue, as if the same had been specially Enacted and made for this Province, or as if the same had been made and Enacted therein, by any General Assembly thereof...." n640 In the third session of the same 1749 Assembly, an appropriation was made enabling justices to obtain specified law books. n641

Upon attaining independence and statehood, North Carolina continued its reliance on the English common law. In its first constitution, of 1776, no direct provisions concerning common law were included, only a section confirming land titles:

> That nothing herein contained shall affect the titles or possessions of individuals holding or claiming under the laws heretofore in force, or grants heretofore made by the late King George II or his predecessors, or the late lords proprietors or any of them. n642

Another section required the future legislatures of the state "to regulate entails, in such a manner as to prevent perpetuities." n643 This provision was continued in the 1868 constitution, n644 along with a new provision in the judicial article declaring that "The laws of North Carolina, not repugnant to this constitution or to the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall be in force until lawfully altered." n645 Both provisions were continued in the constitution of 1876. n646 In the current constitution, of 1972, appears only the declaration that "The laws of North Carolina not in conflict with this Constitution shall continue in force until lawfully altered." n647

The more direct mode of common law reception in the state of North Carolina has been by legislation, beginning in 1778:

> I. Whereas doubts may arise, upon the Revolution in Government, whether any and what Laws continue in force here: For Prevention of Which,
>
> II. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the Authority of the same, That all such Statutes, and such Parts of the Common Law, as were heretofore in Force and Use within this Territory, and all the Acts of the late General Assemblies thereof, or so much of the said Statutes, Common Law, and Acts of Assembly, as are not destructive of, repugnant to, or inconsistent with the Freedom and Independence of this State, and Form of Government therein established, and which have not been otherwise provided for, in the Whole or in Part, not abrogated, repealed, expired, or become obsolete, are hereby declared to be in full force within this State. n648

With only minor modifications, this provision is carried in the current North Carolina statutes:

> All such parts of the common law as were heretofore in force and use within this State, or so much of the common law as is not destructive of, or repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the freedom and independence of this State and the form of government therein established, and which has not been otherwise provided for in whole or in part, not abrogated, repealed, or become obsolete, are hereby declared to be in full force within this State. n649

Judicial interpretations of this legislative provision have added some detail to the matter of reception. For instance, it has been held that under this section is adopted the common law of England as of the date the Declaration of Independence was signed. n650 In a modern property-related instance of the continuing viability of the common law in North Carolina, the common law rule that future interests in personal property may be created by will but not by deed was applied in a 1952 case. n651

§ 7.02(ii) North Dakota.

The southwestern part of North Dakota was first part of French territory when La Salle made a claim for the entire Mississippi River drainage system in 1682. The northeastern portion of North Dakota also became subject to French claims for territory south of Hudson, but this claim was ceded to the British in 1713. First explorations in the area were by the French beginning in 1738. From these activities, and even after the Lewis and Clark expedition in 1804-1806, only a few forts and trading posts were established, and the land remained inhabited almost entirely by Indians.

The sovereignty over the land was nominally French at first. The southern part of North Dakota (land south or west of the Mississippi River) was included in the territory of the Louisiana Purchase, but hardly shared in the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to that area, inasmuch as virtually no permanent settlements existed in North Dakota before the Louisiana Purchase. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n652

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, called the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n653 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n654

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with a pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad common law reception statute:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n655

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n656

When the State of Missouri was formed in 1821, no actual governmental authority applied to the Louisiana Purchase territory north of Missouri, including North Dakota, until 1834, when Congress attached it to the Territory of Michigan. n657

Meanwhile, the portion of North Dakota not in the Louisiana Purchase was ceded by Britain to the United States in 1818 and added to the Michigan Territory. The Michigan Territory had originally been part of Indiana Territory, which, when it was created in 1800, n658 had been required to create "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n659

A separate Michigan Territory was established in 1805, n660 and the enabling act required the new territory to form a government in conformance with the Northwest Ordinance. n661 The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed... n662

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district." n663 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n664

The Michigan territorial legislature apparently wished to start afresh with fundamental law, however, because legislation in 1810 purported to repeal all prior English statutes, French law and custom, and laws of the Northwest Territory and of the Indiana Territory, leaving only common law decisions in effect, by virtue of the Northwest Ordinance. This, then, would have been the status of common law reception in the northern part of North Dakota when that region was part of Michigan Territory. Michigan courts later modified this position to include reception of some older English statutes.

When Wisconsin Territory was established in 1836, the northern part of North Dakota became part of that territory until Wisconsin attained statehood in 1848.

Wisconsin's territorial enabling act n665 in 1836 authorized the formation of a government in conformance with the Northwest Ordinance and specifically continued in force the Michigan territorial laws in effect at the time:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to, and enjoy, all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the [Northwest Ordinance]; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of the said Territory. The said inhabitants shall also be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Michigan, and to its inhabitants, and the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Wisconsin; and further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof may be applicable. n666

The enabling act also declared that "the said supreme court and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction." n667

In 1838, while the northern part of North Dakota was still part of Wisconsin Territory, the Wisconsin territorial legislature followed Michigan's example and declared that statutes of Great Britain would not be considered law in the territory; that same legislature also repealed prior acts of Michigan territory, and then enacted a large compilation of laws borrowed mostly from Michigan, which in turn had been borrowed from New York, Ohio and Massachusetts. n668 However, much later and long after North Dakota was no longer part of Wisconsin, the Wisconsin Supreme Court followed the courts of Michigan and Iowa in reinvigorating the common law reception long after the legislative attacks. n669

Wisconsin was authorized for statehood in 1846, n670 and formally admitted in 1848. n671 In 1849 Congress created the Territory of Minnesota, n672 and included the northern portion of North Dakota, with the laws of Wisconsin Territory, in effect when Wisconsin was admitted as a state, continuing in force:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Wisconsin and to its inhabitants; and the laws in force in the Territory of Wisconsin at the date of the admission of the State of Wisconsin shall continue to be valid and operative therein, so far as the same be not incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the governor and legislative assembly of the said Territory of Minnesota; and the laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory, so far as the same, or any provision thereof, may be applicable. n673

In addition, the territorial enabling act declared that "the said Supreme and District Courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction." n674

In 1854 all of North Dakota was included in the newly designated Nebraska Territory. In the territorial enabling act, n675 no explicit common law reception was mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n676 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n677 Thereafter, in its first session, the Nebraska territorial legislature enacted a common law reception provision:

> That so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this Territory, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this Territory be and the same is adopted and declared to be law within said Territory. n678

North Dakota remained in Nebraska Territory until 1861, when it was included in the newly formed Dakota Territory. n679 The territorial enabling act had no provision for continuing prior laws in force, but did decree that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction...." n680 In the territorial legislation thereafter only a slight acknowledgement of common law reception was made in the provision that "In this Territory there is no common law in any case where the law is declared by the Codes." n681

When North Dakota was approved for statehood in 1889, n682 the enabling act continued prior laws in force:

> [A]ll laws in force made by said Territories, at the time of their admission into the Union, shall be in force in said States, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitutions of the States, respectively. n683

The 1889 constitution of North Dakota contained a provision continuing prior laws in force, and, although this document remains the current state constitution, that provision has since been repealed:

> All laws now in force in the territory of Dakota, which are not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations or be altered or repealed. n684

The current North Dakota statutes more fully acknowledge the existence of the common law than did the territorial legislature, but the following series of statutory provisions, undoubtedly affected by the Dakota Territory adoption of the Field codification in 1866, hardly amount to an overt reception of the common law:

> 1-01-02. Origin of law. Law is a rule of property and of conduct prescribed by the sovereign power.
>
> 1-01-03. Expression of law. The will of the sovereign power is expressed by:
>
> 1. The Constitution of the United States.
>
> 2. Treaties made under the authority of the United States.
>
> 3. Statutes enacted by the Congress of the United States.
>
> 4. The constitution of the state.
>
> 5. The statutes of the state.
>
> 6. The ordinances of other and subordinate legislative bodies.
>
> 7. The decisions of the tribunals enforcing those rules, which, though not enacted, form what is known as customary or common law.
>
> 1-01-04. Common law divided. The common law is divided into:
>
> 1. Public law, or the law of nations; and
>
> 2. Domestic or municipal law.
>
> 1-01-05. Evidence of common law. The evidence of the common law is found in the decisions of the tribunals.
>
> 1-01-06. Code excludes common law. In this state there is no common law in any case where the law is declared by the code. n685

Despite this somewhat offhanded treatment of common law reception, North Dakota courts have accepted the common law as the rule of decision where there is no express constitutional or statutory declaration on a subject; n686 "common law is by statute ... declared to be the basic law ..."; "by statute the provisions of the Civil Code are to be considered as but continuations of the common law...." n687 An example of the interplay between the common law and statutory law was noted by a federal bankruptcy court in North Dakota:

> The [North Dakota state] court held that common law lien rights are not defeated by a statute's silence because the Code is a continuation of the common law and the two must be construed together where the Code merely declares a lien already recognized at common law but is silent on the question of priority. n688

§ 7.02(jj) Ohio.

Ohio was first claimed in rather vague fashion by the French during the 17th century, ceded by treaty to the British in 1697, and, following Queen Anne's War in 1701-1703, was an area of predominantly French influence. When Virginia obtained huge tracts of Ohio land for sale to settlers, beginning in 1750, the French responded by building forts and repulsing a British military expedition under General Braddock in 1755. However, the area returned to British control in 1763 at the end of the French and Indian War. Under the terms of the 1774 Quebec Act, Ohio was governed as part of British Canada. n689 This act continued to enforce both French and English rights and titles:

> Provided always, and be it enacted, That nothing in this Act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to make void, or to vary or alter any Right, Title, or Possession, derived under any Grant, Conveyance, or otherwise, however, of or to any Lands within the said Province, or the Provinces thereto adjoining; but that the same shall remain and be in Force, and have Effect, as if this Act had never been made. n690

During the American Revolution, the Ohio area was captured and controlled for Virginia by George Rogers Clark, and eventually ceded to the United States under the terms of the Northwest Ordinance. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n691

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district...." n692 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to > the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n693

Ohio settlers' first representative under the terms of the Northwest Ordinance was appointed in 1799, and in 1800 Congress formed the Territory of Ohio and by 1802 had already acted to authorize formation of the state of Ohio. n694 A constitution was drafted in 1802, and then Ohio was admitted as a state in 1803. n695 Neither the statehood enabling nor admission acts contained provisions for reception of the common law or for continuing prior law in force, but the new constitution included such a provision: "All laws and parts of laws not in force in this Territory, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall continue and remain in full effect until repealed by the legislature, [except for an act regarding attorney qualifications...]." n696 The new constitution also declared that the state courts had both common law and chancery jurisdiction. n697

References to the state courts' common law and chancery jurisdiction were not included in Ohio's next constitution of 1851, but a provision to continue prior laws in force did appear: "All laws of this State in force on the first day of September, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall continue in force until amended or repealed." n698 This constitution and this provision remain currently in effect in Ohio.

Laws passed during the period of governance under the Northwest Ordinance were repealed by the state legislature in 1805, n699 and no common law reception statute has been subsequently enacted. However, in 1972, the state legislature did authorize consideration of common law as an aid in statutory interpretation:

> If a statute is ambiguous, the court, in determining the intention of the legislature, may consider among other matters:
>
> (A) The object sought to be attained;
>
> (B) The circumstances under which the statute was enacted;
>
> (C) The legislative history;
>
> (D) The common law or former statutory provisions, including laws upon the same or similar subjects;
>
> (E) The consequences of a particular construction;
>
> (F) The administrative construction of the statute. n700

Despite the absence of constitutional or statutory authority for common law reception, Ohio courts have presumed reception. The Ohio Court of Appeals declared the common law in effect insofar as it is adaptable to the needs of the jurisdiction:

> It has been rightly said that the common law has no force in this state, except in so far as it derives authority from judicial recognition in the practice and course of adjudication in our courts. But when natural justice requires, and reason prompts, the principles and rules of the common law are adopted in our theory of jurisprudence, when such do not conflict with statute and are adaptable to our circumstances. And we are drawn to the conclusion by the authorities, and the rule and reason of the common law, and its adaptability in this instance to our form of procedure... n701

Much earlier the Ohio Supreme Court had actually declared that the common law may provide the rule of decision in Ohio courts, when not inconsistent with Ohio circumstances and institutions, even though not explicitly adopted by the state legislature:

> We profess to administer the common law of England, in so far as its principles are not inconsistent with the genius and spirit of our own institutions, or opposed to the settled habits, customs, and policy of the people of this State, thereby rendering it inapplicable to our situation and circumstances.
>
> It has not been adopted by express legislative enactment, but brought to the old States by our fathers, and constantly claimed as their birthright. Its introduction here by their descendants was almost a matter of course, and its terms and foundation principles have been so interwoven with our constitution and laws, so blended with the remedies we afford, and so constantly enforced by our courts, that its implied recognition by the government and people, may be fairly assumed; and if it cannot be said to be in force as the common law of England, it may not inaptly be termed the common law of Ohio. To it we constantly resort, when the positive law is silent or insufficient. Built up, as it has been, from the experience of ages, and constantly adapting itself to the business and relations of men in society, we seldom fail to find principles which, if carried to legitimate results, are not altogether sufficient to settle every controversy. If no precedent is found for a remedy to enforce an acknowledged right, one of its own cherished principles requires us to adapt one to the exigency, and to make good the maxim, that there is no legal right, without a legal remedy.
>
> Whatever is not prohibited, may be lawfully done. Whatever a man possesses, that the law recognizes as property, and may be used for his benefit, in a lawful manner. What it allows to one, it allows to all, and secures to all the enjoyment...
>
> These [are] the general principles of the common law... n702

§ 7.02(kk) Oklahoma.

The land that is now Oklahoma was first explored and claimed for Spain in 1541, then, without exploration, claimed for France as part of the Mississippi River drainage system late in the seventeenth century. When it was sold to the United States in 1803 as part of the Louisiana Purchase, it came under the same governance arrangements as the other parts of that region, although virtually no settlements existed to be governed at that time.

French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n703 When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n704 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n705

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad reception statute for the English common law:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n706

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n707

When the State of Missouri was formed in 1821, no actual governmental authority applied to Oklahoma until 1834, when Congressional legislation declared that region "taken and deemed to be Indian country." n708 The part of the Indian country including Oklahoma was annexed to the Territory of Arkansas. n709 Arkansas Territory had been creation in 1819, just three years after enactment of the Missouri reception statute, with the Missouri Territory laws then in effect adopted as its laws for the moment:

> And be it further enacted, That all the laws which shall be in force in the territory of Missouri, on the fourth day of July next, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and which shall be applicable to the territory of Arkansaw, shall, and continue, in force in the latter territory, until modified or repealed by the legislative authority thereof. n710

When Arkansas became a state in 1836, presumably the Missouri reception statute was left in effect in the Oklahoma Indian country, although it would have been considered applicable only to settlements of non-Indians in the area. In the event that the developing law of the state of Arkansas continued to be applicable in Oklahoma, it should be noted that leaders of Arkansas in 1836 drafted a constitution in anticipation of statehood, most of which document was effectively ratified when statehood was granted later that year. The new constitution provided "That all laws now in force in the Territory of Arkansas, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations, or be altered or repealed by the general assembly." n711 More specifically, a common law reception statute was enacted in Arkansas shortly after statehood and a modern counterpart is in the current Arkansas code:

> The common law of England, so far as it is applicable and of a general nature, and all statutes of the British Parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the common law made prior to March 24, 1606, which are applicable to our own form of government, of a general nature and not local to that kingdom, and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States or the Constitution and laws of this state, shall be the rule of decision in this state unless altered or repealed by the General Assembly of this state. n712

Oklahoma was still Indian country in 1889 when a federal court was established there and the area was made subject to procedural laws of Arkansas.

However, in 1890, the Territory of Oklahoma, which encompassed only part of the present state of Oklahoma, was created n713 and declared subject to certain specific provisions of Nebraska state law, including Nebraska's 1855 common law reception statute. n714 In Nebraska's territorial enabling act, n715 no explicit common law reception had been mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n716 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n717 Thereafter, in its first session, the Nebraska territorial legislature had enacted a common law reception provision in 1855:

> That so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this Territory, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this Territory be and the same is adopted and declared to be law within said Territory. n718

Nebraska had been authorized for admission to statehood in 1864, n719 and had become a state in 1867. n720 Its first constitution of 1866 had no reception provision but provided that "all laws now in force shall remain in force until altered, amended, or repealed by the legislature." n721 Current Nebraska state statutes have carried forward the territorial common law reception statute:

> Common law; applicability. So much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this state, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this state, is adopted and declared to be law within the State of Nebraska. n722

Nebraska courts, in decisions subsequent to the adoption of Nebraska law in Oklahoma, but likely revealing the proper understanding of that law in 1890, have held that by this statute Nebraska "adopted the common law of England and not the statutory law of England." n723 They have also accorded a large flexibility to the concept of the common law:

> What is the meaning of the term "common law of England"...? Does it mean the common law as it stood at the time of the Declaration of Independence, or as it stood when our statute was enacted, or are we to understand the common-law system, in its entirety, including all judicial improvements and modifications in this country and in England, to the present time, so far as applicable to our conditions? We cannot think, and we do not believe this court has ever understood, that the Legislature intended to petrify the common law, as embodied in judicial decisions at any one time, and set it up in such inflexible form as a rule of decision. The theory of our system is that the law consists, not in the actual rules enforced by decisions of the courts at any one time, but the principles from which those rules flow; that old principles are applied to new cases, and the rules resulting from such application are modified from time to time as changed conditions and new states of fact require ... "We may look to American as well as English books, and to American as well as English jurists, to ascertain what this law is, for neither the opinions nor the precedents of judges can be said, with strict propriety, to be the law. They are only evidence of law." Forbes v. Scannell, 13 Cal. 242, 286 . On this ground it was held in Sayward v. Carlson, 1 Wash. St. 29, 33 Pac. 830 , that a statutory provision in Washington making the common law of England the rule of decision in all the courts did not confine the courts to the decisions of the English courts, and of those American courts which have followed them closely, for the interpretation of the law. Such has been the understanding of this court from the beginning. What Sir Frederick Pollock has called "the immemorial and yet freshly growing fabric of the common law" is to be our guide, not the decisions of any particular courts at any particular period. The term "common law of England," as used in the statute, refers to that general system of law which prevails in England, and in most of the United States by derivation from England, as distinguished from the Roman or civil law system, which was in force in this territory prior to the Louisiana purchase. Hence the statute does not require adherence to the > decisions of the English common-law courts prior to the Revolution, in case this court considers subsequent decisions, either in England or America, better expositions of the general principles of that system. n724

In 1893, the Oklahoma territorial legislature enacted its own common law reception provision:

> The common law, as modified by constitutional and statutory law, judicial decisions and the condition and wants of the people, shall remain in force in aid of the Statutes of Oklahoma; but the rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof, shall be strictly construed, shall not be applicable to any general statute of Oklahoma; but all such statutes shall be liberally construed to promote their object. n725

The part of the present state of Oklahoma that had not been included in Oklahoma Territory in 1890 was left in what was designated as Indian Territory and was made subject to certain statutes of Arkansas, n726 in addition to Arkansas procedural rules that had been made applicable in 1889. As has been discussed above, Arkansas state law at that time included a common law reception provision.

The parts of Oklahoma that were in Oklahoma Territory and Indian Territory were united into the State of Oklahoma, under Congressional authority enacted in 1906. n727 Laws in effect in the Territory of Oklahoma at the time statehood was attained would continue "in force throughout said State..." n728 Oklahoma was admitted as a state in 1907. n729 Current state statutes contain a reception provision n730 virtually identical to the 1893 enactment, quoted above and a separate provision limiting the rule of common law calling for strict construction of states in derogation of the common law. n731

The Oklahoma courts have taken a broad view of the common law, including within the concept not only the old English elements but also the notion of a flexible state court jurisprudence:

> The common law, followed in Oklahoma, refers not only to the ancient unwritten law of England, but also to that body of law created and preserved by decisions of courts. The common law is not static, but is a dynamic and growing thing and its rules arise from the application of reason to the changing conditions of society. Flexibility and capacity for growth and adaptation is its peculiar boast and excellence. n732

The Oklahoma Supreme Court, considering a case on the common law of waste, has also decided that English statutes enacted prior to the settlement of the earliest American colonies are part of the law of Oklahoma:

> We can only find four cases where the issue [reception of English statutes] has been addressed by the [Oklahoma] Supreme Court. Two of these cases construed the law prior to statehood. These two early decisions stated that the territory of Oklahoma was governed by the rule of common law as recognized and promulgated by the American courts; such law to include not only the unwritten English law but such English statutes mandatory of the common law, which were in general application and suited to our conditions, and which were enacted prior to the settlement of the colonies... [I]n most states English statutes are a part of the common law when such English statutes were adopted prior to the settlement of our colonies and are of a general nature and suitable to conditions in the states. Only three states have not adopted this view. We agree with the majority view and therefore shall follow the two pre-statehood Oklahoma decisions that English statutes adopted prior to the settlement of our colonies that were in general application and suited to our conditions as recognized and promulgated by the American courts are part of the common law of Oklahoma.
>
> We must now determine whether the Statute of Gloucester was an English statute that was recognized and promulgated by the American courts as appropriate to the different conditions and > situations of an early America? The Statute of Gloucester changed the common law punishment for waste to forfeiture of the thing wasted and treble damages. The Statute of Gloucester was ignored for more than 300 years in England after its enactment, and was repealed in 1879 ... It is generally held that the Statute of Gloucester did not become a part of our common law as the strict English law of waste has never been appropriate to a new country like ours. We hold pursuant to the clear weight of authority that Oklahoma has not adopted the Statute of Gloucester as a part of the common law. Absent a permissible statute, forfeiture as a remedy for waste is not available. Oklahoma has no such statute. n733

§ 7.02(ll) Oregon.

The first formal European claim to the region that is now Oregon was made by the Spaniard Jose Estevan Martinez in 1789, but a more effective American claim was made soon after in 1792. While the area of Oregon state was not officially included in the Louisiana Purchase, part of the later established Oregon Territory was, and in any event, the Lewis and Clark expedition explored the lands of the Purchase and extended itself all the way to the Pacific coast. An American fur settlement was established in 1811, but sovereignty over the Oregon region changed hands during the War of 1812, and subsequent treaties attempted to resolve claims of rival Canadian and American fur companies. Not until 1839 did the first large group of American immigrant settlers arrive, prompting the formation of a provisional government in 1841. n734

In 1843 the settlers prepared Articles of Provisional Government, which were adopted in 1845. According to this document, laws of Iowa Territory and principles of common law and equity would be the laws in force in Oregon:

> The Laws of Iowa Territory shall be the Law of this Territory in Civil, Military and Criminal cases (where not otherwise provided for) and where no Statute of Iowa Territory applies, the principles of common Law and Equity shall govern. n735

In addition to this enactment, the provisional government's legislative committee adopted a similar provision governing judicial power in 1844:

> All of the statute laws of Iowa territory passed at the first session of the legislative assembly of said territory, and not of a local character, and not incompatible with the conditions and circumstances of this country, shall be the law of this government, unless otherwise modified; and the common law of England and principles of equity, not modified by the statutes of Iowa or of this government, and not incompatible with its principles, shall constitute a part of the law of this land. n736

Following adoption of the Organic Act in 1845, another enactment adopted as the laws of Oregon the statute laws of the territory of Iowa

> so far as applicable to the conditions of this country where not otherwise provided for by "the acts of the people of the House of Representatives of the Territory" and it was further provided that the common law of England should govern in all cases where no statute law had been made or adopted. The acts passed by the legislative committee of 1844 not incompatible with the original organic laws and not repealed by the house of representatives in 1845 were adopted as the laws of Oregon by a bill enacted August 23, 1845. n737

The predilection for Iowa law has been explained by the circumstance that there happened to be a copy of the Iowa code in Oregon at the time. n738

Iowa had attained territorial status in 1838, n739 and by its territorial enabling act had adopted "the existing laws of the Territory of Wisconsin...." n740 Wisconsin had become a territory in 1836, n741 and had as its law in force the laws imposed by the Northwest Ordinance and the laws of the Territory of Michigan. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted in

1787 while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n742

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district...." n743 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n744

Michigan Territory had been established in 1805, n745 and, even though the territory had a legal heritage of both English common law and elements of French law, it, too, was brought under the legal regime of the Northwest Ordinance. Michigan became a state in 1837, and was thus no longer a territory when Oregon invoked Michigan law in its provisional frame of government.

Therefore, the initial laws in force in the area of Oregon were the laws of Iowa territory, which were the common law and the laws of Wisconsin. The laws of Wisconsin were the laws of the Northwest Ordinance and the laws of Michigan territory. The Northwest Ordinance, which was also extended to the Michigan territory, imposed a common law system over its jurisdictions.

After the United States and Great Britain began, by a treaty of 1846, to resolve their jurisdictional claims to what is now the Pacific Northwest area of the United States, the Oregon Territory was established in 1848. n746

The territorial enabling act for Oregon contained no provisions for common law reception or even for continuing prior laws in force. Instead, it declared that "all such laws, or any law or laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be utterly null and void," n747 and also voided prior land grants:

> ...all laws heretofore passed in said Territory making grants of land, or otherwise affecting or incumbering the title to lands, shall be, and are hereby declared to be, null and void; and the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and declared to be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provision thereof, may be applicable. n748

One provision continuing prior law in force pertained to judicial proceedings pending at the time the territory was created, which were transferred to the territorial district court; also "penalties, forfeitures, actions, and causes of action" were made recoverable "in like manner as they would have been under the laws in force within the limits composing said Territory at the time this act shall go into operation." n749

A portion of Oregon territory was assigned to the newly formed Washington Territory in 1853. n750 When Oregon attained statehood in 1859, the enabling act n751 included no provision for reception of common law or for continuing prior laws in force. However, two years earlier, in anticipation of statehood, citizens had adopted a constitution containing a provision continuing prior laws in force, and this section is still in effect:

> All laws in force in the Territory of Oregon when this Constitution takes effect, and consistent therewith, shall continue in force until altered or repealed. n752

The Oregon Supreme Court has interpreted this provision as leaving in force the common law, in the sense of an evolving body of law, insofar as it is not in conflict with legislation or constitutional provisions:

> The "common law of England" was adopted prior to statehood or official territorial status by Oregon's provisional government. Act of July 5, 1843, Art 12, reprinted in Harris, History of the Oregon Code, 1 Or L Rev 129, 135 (1922); Act of June 27, 1844, Art III, 1 reprinted in id. at 138. The common law, in the sense of an evolving body of law, continues in force insofar as it is not in conflict with legislation or constitutional provisions. See Or. Const., Art. XVIII, 7; Peery v. Fletcher, 93 Or. 43, 52-54, 182 P. 143 (1919) . n753

The state Supreme Court, in a case cited with approval by the 1987 Court, as noted above, has also held that English statutes were included in Oregon's common law reception:

> It is stated as a general rule that English statutes passed before the emigration of our ancestors, in aid or amendment of the common law, applicable to our condition, and not repugnant to our institutions, constitute a part of our common law...
>
> The common law, as it existed in England at the time of the settlement of the American colonies, has never been in force in all of its provisions in any colony or state of the United States. It has been adopted so far only as its general principles were suited to the habits and conditions of the colonies, and in harmony with the genius, spirit, and objects of American institutions. Different geographical conditions may justify modifications, and whether common-law rules will be followed strictly in the United States will, necessarily, where no vested rights are actually concerned, depend upon the extent to which they are reasonable and in consonance with public policy and sentiment. What may be the common law in one state is not necessarily so considered in another. In many jurisdictions in the United States the rules of the common law of England have been held by the courts to be in full force so far as the same are applicable and of a general nature, and are not in conflict with the Constitution or special enactments of the Legislature. This is the rule in Oregon... In some of the states all statutes and acts of the British Parliament of James the First are declared to be a part of the law of the state... The common law with all the statutes amending it prior to a certain time was adopted excluding statutes passed afterwards unless expressly adopted. In applying the general rule to a state which, like ours, had no political existence before the Revolution, it must in harmony with reason be held that, when our territorial Legislature and the framers of our Constitution and our courts recognized the existence here of the common law, they must have had reference to that law as it existed, modified, and amended by the English statutes passed prior to the Revolution... It is not necessary in the case at bar to fix the exact age of the English statutes which were ingrafted into the common law and recognized as a part of the law of this state. n754

In matters of land law Oregon has legislated extensively, including statutory regulation of such matters as the rule against perpetuities n755 and extinguishment of certain future interests. n756 Oregon previously adopted and then repealed a community property law for marital property.

§ 7.02(mm) Pennsylvania.

Beginning in 1638, Swedish and Dutch settlements arose in land that is now Pennsylvania. In 1664 the English King Charles II granted to his brother the Duke of York lands that included the present states of Pennsylvania, as well as New York, New Jersey, and Delaware, and encompassing much territory that the Dutch claimed in America; this led directly to the English takeover of New Amsterdam, quickly renamed New York. The royal charter authorizing this was based firmly on English common law, expressed in terms of the fullest property rights consistent with the feudal incidents still connected with the English tenure of free and common socage. The grantee, as a feudal lord, was given extensive powers of government and court jurisdiction and told that the laws to be administered in the granted lands were to be not contrary to and as near " 'as conveniently may bee' to the laws of England, [with] judicial judgments and sentences ... subject to a right of appeal in England." The powers of the 1664 charter were implemented by the "Duke's Law" of 1665, a collection of typical English laws adapted to the frontier environment.

For the next fifteen years, uncoordinated settlement activity emanating from several sources proceeded, until by a royal patent dated March 4, 1680, William Penn received from King Charles II a patent for lands and a grant of governmental authority in the province of Pennsylvania. By deed of feoffment dated August 4, 1682, the Duke of York granted to Penn all the lands in the New York provincial territory covered by the royal patent to Penn from the king, which meant conveyance of title to the Pennsylvania lands. n757

Pursuant to the patent, Penn had obtained a charter in January, 1682, which declared the colony's reliance on English common law:

> ...[W]ee ... doe grant free, full and absolute power, by vertue of these presents to him and his heirs for the good and happy government of the said Countrey, to ordeyne, make, enact and under his and their Seals to publish any Lawes whatsoever by and with the advice, assent and approbacon of the freemen of the said Countrey, or the greater part of them Provided; Nevertheless, that the said Lawes bee consonant to reason, and bee not repugnant or contrarie, but as neere as conveniently may bee agreeable to the Lawes, statutes and rights of this our Kingdome of England... n758

The creation of English property rights, including suspension of certain statutory restraints, was also authorized:

> ...Wee have given and granted ... unto the said William Penn ... full and absolute power, licence and authoritie, That he ... from time to time hereafter forever, att his ... will or pleasure, may assigne, alien, grant, demis or infeoffe of the premises, soe many, and such partes and parcells to him or them, that shall be willing to purchase the same, as they shall think fitt. To Have And To Hold to them, the said person and persons willing to take or purchase in fee simple or feetaile, or for the term of life, or liues, or yeares, to be held of the said William Penn as of the seigniory of Windsor, by such services, customes and rents, as shall seeme fitt to the said William Penn, and not imediately of us the Statute Quia Emptores terrarum ... in any wise notwithstanding. n759

Any reliance on English common law or the rights and liberties of English citizens was not made explicit in the subsequent documents promulgated by Penn to govern the colony, including the 1682 First Frame of Government, the 1683 Charter of Liberty, the 1683 Second Frame of Government, the 1696 Third Frame of Government, or the 1701 Charter of Privileges.

Likewise, in the 1776 constitution is no provision adopting or receiving in force the English common law. In the 1790 constitution is found a provision receiving laws already in force, without specific reference to the common law:

> That no inconvenience may arise from the alterations and amendments in the constitution of this commonwealth, and in order to carry the same into complete operation, it is hereby declared and ordained:
>
> Section 1. That all laws of this commonwealth, in force at the time of making the said alterations and amendments in the said constitution, and not inconsistent therewith, and all rights, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts, as well of individuals as of bodies-corporate, shall continue as if the said alterations and amendments had not been made. n760

This provision was continued in later Pennsylvania constitutions, but is not included in the current constitution. However, by legislation in 1777 a type of reception statute was enacted, and in the following form this lengthy legislation appeared in modern Pennsylvania statutes until repealed in 1972:

> § 151. Whereas by the unconstitutional power claimed by the British king and parliament over the American colonies, and the cruel and oppressive measures which the said king and parliament have pursued to establish that power, it became necessary for the colonies to declare themselves free and independent states, which was accordingly done, pursuant to a resolve of the Continental Congress; whereupon all authority being in any person under the said king consequently ceased, and the laws enacted by his representatives here became of no force or effect, although the same were for the most part suited to the circumstances of the people; whereas it is absolutely necessary for the well-governing of every state, that laws properly adapted to the circumstances of the inhabitants be at all times in force.
>
> § 152. Each and every one of the laws or acts of general assembly, that were in force and binding on the inhabitants of the said province on the 14th day of May last, shall be in force and binding on the inhabitants of this state, from and after the 10th day of February next, as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if the said laws, and each of them, had been made or enacted by this general assembly: and all and every person and persons whomsoever are hereby enjoined and required to yield obedience to the said laws, as the case may require, until the said laws or acts of general assembly, respectively, shall be repealed or altered, or until they expire by their own limitation: and the common law and such of the statute laws of England, as have heretofore been in force in the said province, except as hereafter excepted.
>
> § 154. Provided always, that so much of every law or act of general assembly of the province aforesaid, as orders taking or subscribing any oath, affirmation or declaration of allegiance or fidelity to the king of Great Britain, or his successors, or oath of office; and so much of every law or act of general assembly aforesaid, as acknowledges any authority in the heirs or devisees of William Penn, Esq., deceased, the former governor of the said province, or any other person whomsoever as governor; and so much of every law or act of general assembly, as ascertains the number of members of assembly in any county, the time of election and the qualifications of electors; and so much of every law or act of assembly aforesaid, as declares, orders, directs or commands any matter or thing repugnant to, against, or inconsistent with the constitution of this commonwealth, is hereby declared not to be revived, but shall be null and void, and of no force or effect; and so much of the statute laws of England aforesaid relating to felonies, as takes notice of or relates to treason or misprision of treason, or directs the style of the process in any case whatsoever, shall be, and is hereby declared, of no force or effect, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding. n761

This reception statute has now been modernized and streamlined into the following text:

> § 15.03. (a) English law. -- The common law and such of the statutes of England as were in force in the Province of Pennsylvania on May 14, 1776, and which were properly adapted to the circumstances of the inhabitants of this Commonwealth shall be deemed to have been in force in this Commonwealth from and after February 10, 1777.

(b) Provincial statutes. -- The statutes enacted on or before May 14, 1776, under the authority of the late Proprietaries of the Province of Pennsylvania have the same validity and effect as statutes enacted under the authority of this Commonwealth.

(c) Exceptions. -- The rules specified in subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall not be applicable to any statute or law which:

(1) has been heretofore or is hereafter amended or repealed or which has expired by its own limitation;

(2) orders the taking or subscribing any oath, affirmation or declaration of allegiance or fidelity to the British crown;

(3) acknowledges any authority in the heirs or devisees of William Penn, Esq., deceased, the former Governor of the Province of Pennsylvania, or any other person whomsoever as Governor of the Province of Pennsylvania; or

(d) is repugnant to the Constitution of this Commonwealth or of the United States. n762

Similar to the undertaking by North Carolina in 1749, in 1807 the Pennsylvania legislature ordered the Supreme Court judges to determine which English statutes were then in force in the state and should be continued in force. n763 The resulting report identified 180 statutes then in force, all but fourteen of which should be continued in force. n764 Accompanying this element of the report was a lengthy but informative comment on the factors considered in determining the reception of common and statutory law, especially with respect to property rights:

It is provided by the charter, that the laws for the regulating and governing of property, as well for the descent and enjoyment of lands, as likewise for the enjoyment and succession of goods and chattels, and likewise as to felonies, within the said province, shall be and continue the same as they shall be for the time being, by the general course of the law in the kingdom of England, until the said laws be altered by the said William Penn, his heirs or assigns, and by the freemen of the said province, their delegates or deputies, or the greater part of them. Notwithstanding the generality of these expressions, it has always been held, that many of the :mb English :mx laws, relating both to property and to felonies, would have been improper for the state of things in an infant colony; and accordingly they were never practically extended here. It is the true principle of colonization, that the emigrants from the mother country carry with them such laws as are useful in their new situation, and none other. A multitude of English statutes, relating to the king's prerogative, the rights and privileges of the nobility and clergy, the local commerce and revenue of England, and other subjects unnecessary to enumerate, were improper to be extended to Pennsylvania. In order to execute the duty required of them, it was necessary for the judges to examine the code of English statute law from the beginning to the time of the settlement of Pennsylvania; and to weigh deliberately which of them were proper to be adopted. But this was not all. It was essential that our own statute book should be examined, to see in what cases the English law had been altered, or in what cases it had been expressly extended here. Wherever our own legislature had enacted a law on the same subject on which an English statute was to be found, it has been supposed that the English statute had no force here, even if it contained more extensive provisions than our own act of assembly; because it was reasonable to presume, that our assembly were acquainted with the English statute, and designedly omitted some of its provisions.

Besides these inquiries, it was necessary to ascertain, what had been the decisions of our own courts, respecting the extension of English statutes. This was no easy task, as we have no printed reports prior to > our revolution, of cases determined in our courts of justice. Of course these decisions are only to be known by tradition, or manuscript notes in the possession of the gentlemen of the bar, or judges.

>
> With respect to English statutes enacted since the settlement of Pennsylvania, it has been assumed as a principle, that they do not extend here, unless they have been recognized by our acts of assembly, or adopted by long continued practice in courts of justice. Of the latter description there are very few, and those, it is supposed, were introduced from a sense of their evident utility. As English statutes they had no obligatory force but from long practice they may be considered as incorporated with the law of our country. n765

Among the modern judicial commentary on common law reception in Pennsylvania is a 1949 decision declaring rather broadly that the English common law became the law of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, n766 a 1955 decision noting that the common law of England as to crimes is in force except insofar as it has been abrogated by statute, n767 and a 1961 decision declaring a statute of Henry VIII still in effect as to lessors' reversionary interests. n768

§ 7.02(nn) Rhode Island.

Rhode Island emerged almost inadvertently out of an amalgamation of three independent settlements -- Providence, Portsmouth and Newport -- and later joined by the town of Warwick. In 1647, acting with the authority of a charter obtained from a revolutionary English government, they combined into a colony. Before that time, Rhode Island had functioned independent of any superior government authority or authorization.

The natural impulse of these independent settlers was apparently not to invoke the common law as a legal foundation for their enterprises. When the Portsmouth settlers did bother to formalize their local government structure, they entered into a plantation covenant, declaring that the covenantors "incorporate ourselves into a Bodie Politick and ... submit our persons ... to all those perfect and most absolute laws of [Jesus Christ] given us in his holy word of truth, to be guided and judged thereby." n769 The man chosen as judge covenanted "to do justice and Judgment impartially according to the lawes of God, and to maintaine the Fundamentall Rights and Privileges of this Bodie Polltick...." n770

When several of the leading men of Portsmouth moved to a better site, now known as Newport, the remaining members adopted a new covenant on April 30, 1639. A striking difference from the first covenant is that the signers departed from their earlier position of recognizing no earthly superior governing authority. They agreed that they "[doe acknowledge] ourselves the legall subjects of [his Majestie] King Charles, and in his name [doe hereby binde] ourselves into a civill body politicke, unto his lawes according to matters of justice." n771

Meanwhile the Newport colonists in 1640 acknowledged King Charles as their sovereign and made overtures of union toward Portsmouth, which union was amicably achieved. A general court of the unified communities on March 16-19, 1641, restated the settlers' notions of their source of governmental authority:

> It is ordered and unanimously agreed upon, that the Government which this Bodie Politick doth attend unto in this Island, and the Jurisdiction thereof, in favour of our Prince is a Democracie, or Popular Government; that is to say, It is in the Powre of the Body of Freemen orderly assembled, or the major part of them, to make or constitute Just Lawes, by which they will be regulated, and to depute from among themselves such Ministers as shall see them faithfully executed between Man and Man. n772

All of the first Rhode Island settlements shared the common characteristic of being utterly without a superior governing authority and -- necessarily -- being without any authority to colonize or conduct governmental activities, except such authority as they agreed to exercise among themselves. Roger Williams therefore traveled to England and obtained a patent in 1644. That patent obtained by Roger Williams declared the basic authority for law and governance, and confirmed the rights to the land: The Earl of Warwick, as governor-in-chief of the plantations, and a majority of commissioners by the authority of Parliament, > do ... give, grant, and confirm, to the aforesaid Inhabitants of the Towns of Providence, Portsmouth, and Newport, a free and absolute Charter of Incorporation ... Together with full Power and Authority to rule themselves, and such others as shall hereafter inhabit within any Part of the said Tract of land, by such a Form of Civil Government, as by voluntary consent of all, or the greater Part of them, they shall find most suitable to their Estate and Condition ... Provided, nevertheless, that the said Laws, Constitutions, and Punishments, for the Civil Government of the said Plantations, be conformable to the Laws of England, so far as the Nature and Constitution of the place will admit. n773

In 1647 a code of laws was drawn up by representatives from all the settlements. In this code, the delegates consented to be governed by the laws of England, "together with the way of the Administration of them, soe far as the nature and constitution of this Plantation will admit...." n774 They agreed that their legislation "shall be conformable to the laws of England so far as the nature and constitution of our place will admit. n775

Upon restoration of the Stuart monarchy in 1660, it was necessary to obtain a new charter, which was issued in 1663. In this charter the rights of the people in conducting their land affairs as if in England was confirmed. The named patentees and others thereafter admitted to their number, were constituted "a Body Corporate and Politick in Fact and Name" and

> They and their Successors, shall and may have Perpetual Succession... And also to have, Take, Possess, Acquire, and Purchase Lands, Tenaments and Hereditaments, or any Goods or Chattels; and the same to Lease, Grant, Demise, Aliene, Bargain, Sell and dispose of, at their own will and Pleasures, as other our Leige People of this Our Realm of England...." n776

Another provision invoked the law of England where no law of the colony afforded a remedy.

The 1663 charter remained in force until Rhode Island adopted its first constitution in 1842. A provision in this document, which remains in force today, continues the validity of existing statutes and rights of actions, but otherwise does not mention the common law of England:

> All statutes, public and private, not repugnant to this constitution, shall continue in force until they expire by their own limitations, or are repealed by the general assembly. All charters, contracts, judgments, actions and rights of action shall be as valid as if this constitution had not been made. n777

While common law reception does not appear in the Rhode Island constitution, a type of statutory reception has been enacted. In 1749 the Rhode Island assembly appointed three of its members to determine which of the English statutes should be considered in force in the colony. After this list was submitted and accepted by legislative enactment, a digest of local laws, prepared in 1766 provided that the laws of England should govern on matters not covered by a law of the colony or act of parliament. This provision was modified in 1798, invoking statutes of England where Rhode Island's own common law or statutes did not apply. In 1822, this provision of English statutes was again amended into essentially the form in which it now appears in Rhode Island's current statutes:

> § 43-3-1. English statutes as common law. -- In all cases in which provision is not made herein, the English statutes, introduced before the Declaration of Independence, which have continued to be practiced under as in force in this state, shall be deemed and taken as a part of the common law thereof, and remain in force until otherwise specially provided. n778

The English common law itself, excluding the old English statutes, appears to be in effect in Rhode Island where the state's own statutes and common law, or unique circumstances, have not superseded those rules. In a 1942 decision, the common law tenancy by the entirety was held to be still recognized in Rhode Island, because it had been recognized before the first colonial settlement in 1636 and because no other subsequent ruling or law of the colony or state touched upon it. n779 The court declared, in effect, that the common law of England was received into Rhode Island's common law even on points not actually applied in colonial court cases:

> This historical background in matters of law convinces us that the common law of England, with reference to the nature of the estates in which land might be held in this state and the attributes of any particular estate that might be created under that law, was adopted at the time of the Revolution and became a part of the common law of this state. n780

In 1884 a federal court applying Rhode Island law upheld a right of dower based on a common law marriage, even though state legislation could have been viewed as preempting this issue. n781 A 1965 decision rejected reception of an English statute that was not among those identified by the 1749 committee. n782

§ 7.02(oo) South Carolina.

South Carolina's earliest colonial history, and the foundation for its reception of English common law and property rights, are held in common with North Carolina. As discussed supra in 7.02(hh), these shared beginnings lie late in the sixteenth century, as a charter was granted in 1578 to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, giving property in and governmental rights to unoccupied North American lands, on condition that settlement be commenced within six years. A settlement was commenced within that time, but survived only a few months, so a similar grant was conferred on Sir Walter Raleigh in 1584. Raleigh's ill-fated colony on Roanoke Island had entirely disappeared by the time a delayed supply ship was able to reach the site in 1590. Both of these charters conferred on the grantees full power to dispose of the land "according to the laws of England, near as the same conveniently may be," and with powers to legislate, "so always, that the said statutes, laws, and ordinances may be, as near as conveniently may, agreeable to the form of the laws and policy of England." n783

When South Carolina territory next came under the jurisdiction of the Virginia Company according to its charter of 1606, colonists were guaranteed the rights of Englishmen, but this meant nothing for South Carolina, which was not to have any colonists for many decades to come. Similarly, new Virginia charters granted in 1609 and 1612, and ultimately revoked in 1624, had no impact on South Carolina.

With rights to the territory back in the hands of the monarch, King Charles I granted to his attorney general Robert Heath a huge tract that included virtually all of North and South Carolina. Heath and his associates and successors were given legislative power over their grant, but on a foundation of English law:

> Yet, so that the aforesaid laws and ordinances be consonant to Reason, and not repugnant or contrary but, as conveniently as may be done, consonant to the Laws, Statutes, Customs, and rights of our Realm of England. n784

Neither Heath nor any of his assignees was able to commence a colonization effort, so eventually the crown considered the grant lapsed and re-granted the territory in 1663. Claimants and their successors in interest under the Heath tract, after a long battle, were later able to establish their rights to some land and were awarded a compensatory tract in New York. More pertinent to South Carolina, however, was the fact that the 1629 charter set the pattern for the 1663 charter in defining the property rights of the Carolina colonists. The most noteworthy features of the 1663 charter were its provisions for representative government, for broad feudal powers resting in the private proprietors, and for authority in the proprietors to create a colonial nobility, all based on English law. The grant of legislative power under the 1663 charter was subject to the requirement "that the said laws be consonant to reason and, as near as may be conveniently, agreeable to the laws and Customs of this our Kingdom of England." n785 Grants of land were entirely in the context of English law, with the charter specifying even certain features of English law, such as Statute Quia Emptores, that would be suspended for the purpose of making these grants:

> We do give and Grant ... Licence, authority, and power That such Person or Persons may have or take the premises, or any parcel thereof, of [any of the proprietors]...; and the same to hold to themselves, their heirs and Assigns; in what estate of Inheritance soever, in Fee simple or Fee tail or otherwise...; The Statute made in the Parliament of Edward, Son of King Henry, heretofore King of England, our Predecessor, commonly called the Statute of Quia Emptores Terrarum, or any other Statute, Act, or Ordinance, use, Law, Custom, or any other matter, Cause, or thing heretofore published or provided to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding. n786

The grant under the 1663 charter was revised and expanded under an additional charter in 1665, extending the granted territory to southern Virginia on the north and south to St. Augustine, in modern Florida.

In 1669 the North Carolina proprietors finally moved to implement the enormous feudal powers they had obtained through their charters, even though it meant reducing the rights of the settlers. On July 21, 1669, they adopted their "Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina," which were to apply colony-wide, but ultimately were implemented only partially and only in individual settlements. The Fundamental Constitutions made no explicit reference to reception or adoption of the common law of England, but their entire premise derived exclusively from the last feudal vestiges of English law. Lest any colonist reflect too deeply on its anachronisms, one provision of the "Constitutions" even prohibited commentary on the colonial laws:

> Since multiplicity of Comments, as well as of laws, have great inconveniences, and Serve only to obscure and perplex, all manner of comments and expositions on any part of these fundamental constitutions, or on any part of the Common or Statute law of Carolina, are absolutely prohibited. n787

It was under the auspices of this frame of government and of a separate governor appointed for South Carolina in 1669 that the founders of the first permanent settlement in South Carolina established their site in March, 1670, at the site of modern Charleston. More precisely, the Fundamental Constitutions were actually suspended until the new colony obtained a greater population. In their place, the proprietors directed that executive and judicial powers be exercised by a Grand Council, composed of proprietors' deputies, freemen, and the governor.

Dissent arose over this form of government, and two dissenters protested that their land rights could not be secured until a regular parliamentary assembly was chosen and would then confirm their past land grants. A parliament was held in July, 1670. In August, 1671, the proprietors issued a set of temporary laws for this first South Carolina colony:

> These [temporary laws] reveal anew the fact that the board intended to force upon the province the most important provisions of the [Fundamental] Constitutions. These temporary laws provided for an elaborate official system like that of England, for the development as rapidly as possible of the provincial nobility and its incorporation with the council, and for the exercise by the council of the right of initiation and the other powers prescribed for the grand council in the Constitutions. Parliaments were to be called biennially. The creation of landgraves also began at this time, and the governor and council were ordered to have their baronies surveyed when any of the provincial nobility should desire it. n788

Because of South Carolina settlers' objections to the restrictions in 1669 Fundamental Constitutions, a revised version was put forward in 1682, but that was rejected, too, with a unanimous declaration from the legislature that the province should be governed solely by the terms of its charter. No new laws were passed, the temporary laws expired in 1690, and by that time no statute at all was in force in South Carolina.

A five-year period of persistent political disturbance followed, unrelieved by any generally accepted source of law for the colony. When a new governor was appointed in 1695, he carried new powers from the proprietors that were used to reach accords. Because most of the unrest was over land issues, settlement of those issues was also essential in stabilizing the government. The province nevertheless failed to produce more benefits than problems for the proprietors.

A formal separation of South Carolina from North Carolina was effected in 1710; the proprietors, however, managed to retain actual title to the land and it was not until 1729 that the title was changed by purchase, the land reverted to the crown, and the royal provinces of North and South Carolina were established. After takeover of the colony by the crown, governing officials in the 1730's promoted township arrangements similar to those that were so common in New England.

In 1736, a mere seven years after South Carolina became a royal province, a retrospective collection of South Carolina laws was published, covering the period of earliest settlement until the crown took over the province. Within this collection is a most significant enactment listing all of the English statutes deemed then to be in force in South Carolina. The English statutes were declared "to be in as full Force, Power and Virtue, as if the same had been specially enacted and made for this Province, or as if the same had been made and enacted therein by any General Assembly thereof." n789

In addition to the specifically enumerated statutes, the Reception Act also included "all such Statutes in the Kingdom of England, as declare the Rights and Liberties of the Subjects, and enact the better Securing the same...." n790 This massive listing of over 160 separate English enactments and several categories of other acts was concluded with a statement intended to make this a final list:

> ... all the Statute Laws of the Kingdom of England, which are not enumerated and made of Force in this Province by this Act, (such only excepted which release to or concern her Majesty's Customs and the Acts of Trade or Navigation) are hereby declared impracticable in this Province. n791

Significantly, the act also included a reception of English common law:

> That all and every part of the Common Law of England, where the same is not altered by the above enumerated Acts, or inconsistent with the particular Constitutions, Customs and Laws of this Province, excepting so much thereof as hath relation to the ancient Tenures which are taken away by [the act of 1660, 12 Charles II, ca. 24], is hereby enacted and declared to be of as full Force in this Province as if particularly enumerated by this Act... n792

When South Carolina prepared its first constitution upon declaring independence, previous laws were declared in force in the new state:

> That the resolutions of this or any former congress of this colony, and all laws now of force here, (and not hereby altered,) shall so continue until altered or repealed by the legislature of this colony, unless where they are temporary, in which case they shall expire at the times respectively limited for their duration. n793

The same provision was included in the 1778 Constitution, n794 but a slightly modified version appeared in the 1790 Constitution:

> All laws of force in this State at the passing of this constitution shall so continue, until altered or repealed by the legislature, except where they are temporary, in which case they shall expire at the times respectively limited for their duration, if not continued by act of the legislature. n795

A further modification of this reception provision was introduced into the unaccepted constitution of 1865, n796 and carried over into the Constitutions of 1868 n797 and 1895: n798

> All laws now in force in this State and not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain and be enforced until altered or repealed by the General Assembly, or shall expire by their own limitations. n799

Little discussion of and dissent from common law reception appears in South Carolina jurisprudence. A century after the statutory adoption of English common law in 1712, a judge commented:

> I do not know by what other law we should be governed; for the Common Law is as much the law of this country as of England. I do not mean to say, that we are bound by every decision made by the court of England. We have a right to take our own view of the Common Law; but when a principle of law has been settled for ages, by a series of uniform decisions, the reasons must be very strong, that would authorize a departure from it; and, in no case, ought an established rule to be given up, without substituting another in its place. n800

The list of received statutes, though continued in South Carolina's code revision of 1872, n801 was dropped from the codification of 1912. However, a reception statute for the common law was introduced into South Carolina's 1962 Code and is continued in its present code:

> All, and every part, of the common law of England, where it is not altered by the Code or inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of this State, is hereby continued in full force and effect in the same manner as before the adoption of this section. n802
>
> The rule of common law that statutes in derogation of that law are to be strictly construed has no application to this Title. n803

A quite literal application of this provision has been adopted by both state n804 and federal courts n805 adjudicating South Carolina law n806.

§ 7.02(pp) South Dakota.

Until the time the states of South Dakota and North Dakota were formed from the Dakota Territory in 1889, the two areas shared most of their history. Whereas North Dakota land lay partially within the area of the Louisiana Purchase and partly in the region ceded by Great Britain to the United States in 1818, South Dakota, with the exception of a small parcel of land in the northeast corner of the present state, lay almost entirely within the territory of the Louisiana Purchase.

South Dakota, in common with the southwestern part of North Dakota, was first part of French territory when La Salle made a claim for the entire Mississippi River drainage system in 1682. First explorations in the area were by the French beginning in 1738. From these activities, and even after the Lewis and Clark expedition in 1804-1806, only a few forts and trading posts were established, and the land remained inhabited almost entirely by Indians. The first permanent settlement in South Dakota, Fort Pierre, was founded in 1817 by the Frenchman Pierre Chouteau.

As with the southern part of North Dakota, the sovereignty over the land was nominally French at first. South Dakota was included in the territory of the Louisiana Purchase, but was hardly influenced by the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to that area, because of the absence of settlement before the Louisiana Purchase. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n807

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, called the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n808 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n809

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad common law reception statute:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n810

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate in determined in said estate. n811

When the State of Missouri was formed in 1821, no actual governmental authority applied to the Louisiana Purchase territory north of Missouri, including South Dakota, until 1834, when Congress attached it to the Territory of Michigan. n812

In 1854, all of South Dakota was included in the newly-designated Nebraska Territory. In the territorial enabling act, n813 no explicit common law reception was mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n814 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n815 Thereafter, in its first session, the Nebraska territorial legislature enacted a common law reception provision:

> That so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this Territory, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this Territory be and the same is adopted and declared to be law within said Territory. n816

South Dakota remained in Nebraska Territory until 1861, when it was included in the newly-formed Dakota Territory. n817 The territorial enabling act had no provision for continuing prior laws in force, but did decree that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction." n818 In the territorial legislation thereafter, only a slight acknowledgement of common law reception was made in the provision that "In this Territory there is no common law in any case where the law is declared by the Codes." n819

When South Dakota was approved for statehood in 1889, n820 the enabling act continued prior laws in force:

> all laws in force made by said Territories, at the time of their admission into the Union, shall be in force in said States, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitutions of the States, respectively. n821

South Dakota's original constitution, adopted in 1889 and still the current constitution, had no provision for continuing prior laws in force, although existing "writs, actions, prosecutions, claims and rights" were continued. n822 State legislation in 1890 more explicitly continued prior law in effect and also formally adopted the common law where it was not superseded by statute. n823 After 1913, the phrasing of South Dakota's current reception statute, similar in some respects to North Dakota's code-influenced law, was substituted:

> 1-1-22. Law defined. Law is a rule of property and of conduct prescribed by the sovereign power.
>
> 1-1-23. Expression of sovereign will. The will of the sovereign power is expressed by:
>
> (1) By the Constitution of the United States;
>
> (2) By treaties made under the authority of the United States;
>
> (3) By statutes enacted by the Congress of the United States;
>
> (4) By the Constitution of this state;
>
> (5) By statutes enacted by the Legislature;
>
> (6) By statutes enacted by the voters;
>
> (7) By the ordinances of authorized subordinate bodies;
>
> (8) Rules of practice and procedure prescribed by courts or adopted by departments, commissions, boards, officers of the state or its subdivisions pursuant to authority so to do.
>
> 1-1-24. Common law and law merchant applied -- Evidence of common law. The evidence of the common law, including the law merchant, is found in the decisions of the tribunals. In this state the rules of the common law, including the rules of the law merchant, are in force, except where they conflict with the will of the sovereign power, expressed in the manner stated in § 1-1-23. n824

The South Dakota Supreme Court has recognized that the "common law of this state ... is flexible and susceptible of adaptation to the needs and demands of changing times." n825 This may be especially true in a state that is predominantly agricultural:

> It is well settled that the common law of a state may differ from that of other states or may even vary from time to time in order to meet the peculiar, and perchance varying, conditions and circumstances of the state ... The rights acquired and the burdens undertaken by those who settle upon or purchase lands in a particular locality are such rights and burdens of those people who may become possessed of other lands in the same locality. These right[s] and burdens must, from the very nature of things, depend upon the purposes for which nature has apparently fitted and intended such lands. n826

Despite this somewhat offhanded treatment of common law reception, North Dakota courts have accepted the common law as the rule of decision where there is no express constitutional or statutory declaration on a subject; n827 "common law is by statute declared to be the basic law."; "by statute the provisions of the Civil Code are to be considered as but continuations of the common law." n828 An example of the interplay between the common law and statutory law was noted by a federal bankruptcy court in North Dakota:

> The [North Dakota state] court held that common law lien rights are not defeated by a statute's silence because the Code is a continuation of the common law and the two must be construed together where the Code merely declares a lien already recognized at common law but is silent on the question of priority. n829

§ 7.02(qq) Tennessee.

Tennessee's first settlers came west from North Carolina and in about 1772 formed their own local government. A lingering dissatisfaction over the association with North Carolina, which vaguely claimed the Tennessee area as part of its western territory, was inflamed when North Carolina proposed to cede the area to the federal government. Fearing that the cession act had "thrown us into such a situation that the influence of the law in common cases was almost a nullity, and in criminal jurisdiction had ceased entirely; which reduced us to the verge of anarchy," n830 the Tennessee settlers attempted to form their own "State of Franklin," complete with constitution, in 1784.

North Carolina withdrew its cession act and reclaimed jurisdiction over Tennessee, and Franklin functioned under the laws of North Carolina, albeit as an independent entity. In 1790, North Carolina once again ceded its western lands to the federal government, and the cession was accepted by Congress. n831 The North Carolina deed of cession accepted by Congress provided "[t]hat the laws in force and use in the State of North Carolina, at the time of passing this act, shall be, and continue in full force within the territory hereby ceded, until the same shall be repealed, or otherwise altered by the legislative authority of the said territory." n832

Less than two months later Congress enacted the "Southwest Ordinance," imposing a temporary government over the area south of the Ohio River, including Tennessee, and declaring that the inhabitants of the territory "shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits and advantages set forth in the [Northwest Ordinance]" and that "the government of the said territory south of the Ohio, shall be similar to that which is now exercised in the territory northwest of the Ohio...." n833 The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n834

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district...." n835

The Southwest Ordinance, incorporating the borrowed law of the Northwest Ordinance, was in effect over Tennessee from 1790 until Tennessee became a state in 1796, and during that time the territorial governor was also the governor of North Carolina. Therefore, the laws in force in Tennessee prior to statehood were officially the common law as adopted under the Northwest Ordinance, but as a practical matter Tennessee settlers had traditionally relied more on the laws of North Carolina.

North Carolina had a long tradition of reliance on English common law. The first English charter for land located in what is now North Carolina was that granted in 1578 to Sir Humphrey Gilbert. The application of English law to any of such lands that were eventually colonized under the charter was confirmed in Gilbert's rights to "all the soil of all such lands ... to be had or used with full power to dispose thereof, and of every part thereof, in fee simple or otherwise, according to the laws of England, as near as the same conveniently may be." n836 To Gilbert and all his fellow colonists was granted that they "shall and may have and enjoy all the privileges of free denizens n837 and persons native of England and within our allegiance...." n838 Powers of government, including the administration of justice, were also included in the charter, "so always, that the said statutes, laws, and ordinances may be, as near as conveniently may, agreeable to the form of the laws and policy of England...." n839

Gilbert's short-lived 1583 settlement in Newfoundland, and his death during the voyage back to England, resulted in the renewal of Gilbert's charter in Raleigh's name, on March 25, 1584. Issued shortly before Gilbert's charter was to expire, Raleigh's charter was, in effect, a six-year extension, and, in its grants of property rights and governing power, was virtually identical to Gilbert's charter. North Carolina later was included in the rights and land granted to the Virginia Company, beginning with the charter of 1606, which required conformance with English law. Various North Carolina land grants lapsed until King Charles II made new grants in 1663, but under the terms of a 1629 charter that was based entirely on a foundation of English law. That charter also provided for a legislative body that would function as consistently as possible with English law. Grants of land in North Carolina were entirely in the context of English law, with the charter specifying even certain features of English law, such as Statute Quia Emptores, that would be suspended for the purpose of making these grants.

Between 1689 and 1713 the administration of Carolina was formally divided between North Carolina and South Carolina; thereafter the crown took over the colonies and in 1729 created the royal provinces of North and South Carolina.

Until 1751 the laws of the colony were prepared and circulated only in manuscript form. The first printing in 1751 gave the full text of only the laws then in force, while obsolete or repealed acts were indicated by title only. One of the superseded acts from 1711 contained a lengthy provision on the applicability of English law in the colony. The North Carolina Assembly, in its second 1749 session, enacted a lengthy provision specifying approximately 202 chapters of about 110 English statutes "to be in as full Force, Power, and Virtue, as if the same had been specially Enacted and made for this Province, or as if the :qf same had been made and Enacted therein, by any General Assembly thereof...." n840 In the third session of the same 1749 Assembly, an appropriation was made enabling justices to obtain specified law books. n841

Upon attaining independence and statehood, North Carolina continued its reliance on the English common law. In its first constitution, of 1776, no direct provisions concerning common law were included, only a section confirming land titles:

> That nothing herein contained shall affect the titles or possessions of individuals holding or claiming under the laws heretofore in force, or grants heretofore made by the late King George II. or his predecessors, or the late lords proprietors or any of them. n842

Another section required the future legislatures of the state "to regulate entails, in such a manner as to prevent perpetuities." n843 North Carolina has relied on legislation to express reception of the common law, beginning with this provision in 1778:

> I. Whereas doubts may arise, upon the Revolution in Government, whether any and what Laws continue in force here: For Prevention of Which,
>
> II. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina, and it is hereby enacted by the Authority of the same, That all such Statutes, and such Parts of the Common Law, as were heretofore in Force and Use within this Territory, and all the Acts of the late General Assemblies thereof, or so much of the said Statutes, Common Law, and Acts of Assembly, as are not destructive of, repugnant to, or inconsistent with the Freedom and Independence of this State, and Form of Government therein established, and which have not been otherwise provided for, in the Whole or in Part, not abrogated, repealed, expired, or become obsolete, are hereby declared to be in full force within this State. n844

Tennessee was admitted as a state in 1796, n845 and implemented a constitution which had been adopted early that same year. The new constitution continued in force in prior laws of the territory:

> All laws and ordinances now in force and use in this Territory, not inconsistent with this constitution, shall continue to be in force and use in this State, until they expire, be altered, or repealed by the legislature. n846

Similar provisions were carried over into the successor constitutions of 1834 n847 and 1870, n848 so that the current constitutional provision is as follows:

> All laws and ordinances now in force and use in this State, not inconsistent with this Constitution, shall continue in force and use until they shall expire, be altered or repealed by the Legislature; but ordinances contained in any former Constitution or schedule are hereby abrogated. n849

Glimpses of received common law appear in the Tennessee statutes. Certain county constables are "vested with all the power and authority belonging to the office of constable by common law." n850 Another section preserves > the common law remedies, including damages, of a surface owner or any other person against the oil and gas developer for the unreasonable, negligent or otherwise wrongful exercise of the contractual right, whether express or implied, to use the surface of the land for the benefit of his interest. n851

Also, the Tennessee Rules of Evidence require courts to take judicial notice of the common law. n852

Several early Tennessee judicial opinions described the extent of common law reception in the state. In an 1842 case, the borrowing from North Carolina was described:

> The revolutionary statute of North Carolina adopts all such portions of the common law as had theretofore been in force and use in the Province. This portion had before that time been and subsequently continued in force and use in that State, and has been adopted and enforced in this State from its origin. The whole body of the common law on the subject of domestic relations, and especially the relation of baron and feme, except so far as changed and modified by statute, has been adopted among us. n853

A legislative enactment of 1858, repealing most prior enactments, was argued to have also nullified the old English statutes previously received, a point conditionally accepted by a Tennessee court in 1883:

> It is then insisted that since the Code no statute, except such as are therein provided for, are in force in this State, therefore the decisions based on the law, as founded on these English statutes, are not > authority...

>
> * * *
>
> [W]e have no doubt of the proposition, that no English statute as such is in force in our State since the Code.
>
> But while we have no doubt on this question, we do not think it follows that all principles and rules of law that had been adopted by our courts, that may originally have grown out of the provisions of ancient English statutes, are necessarily to be held as swept away, or abrogated as established law among us.
>
> Numerous cases since the Code have adopted the principle [at issue in this case], it having become a settled rule of property long recognized. But this no more went on the idea that the English statute was in force, or involved it, than does the fact that a large mass of our law as familiarly administered in our courts, especially courts of equity, is derived from Roman law, involved the proposition that the civil law as such is in force to any degree in our State.
>
> So we hold the cases referred to ... have announced a rule of law originally derived from old English statutes, or resulting from them by construction of the courts, but which have been adopted as rules of property and settled principles governing this question, as rules of law in accord with sound public policy, and therefore should not be disturbed or abrogated, or overruled, except on the same principles and for the same reasons we would overrule any other rule of law heretofore announced by this court. n854

§ 7.02(rr) Texas.

A small portion of the northern part of the present state of Texas was included within the territory of the Louisiana Purchase and was thus nominally subject to the same governmental arrangements as the other, more settled portions of that area, although virtually no settlements existed to be governed at that time.

French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n855 When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n856 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n857

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad reception statute for the English common law:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of

> James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n858

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate in determined in said estate. n859

By far the largest and most important part of Texas was, however, not part of the Louisiana Purchase, but was sovereign territory of first Spain and then of Mexico. Spanish exploration began as early as 1519, but two centuries later only a few missions and three small settlements had emerged. When the United States acquired the territory of the Louisiana Purchase, the main portion of Texas became conveniently accessible to numerous uncontrolled and unbidden American settlers. In 1819, the United States renounced American interest in Texas as part of an arrangement to settle claims in Florida, and in 1821 Mexico won its independence from Spain and succeeded to the sovereignty of Texas.

However, the incursion of American settlers continued unabated, and in 1836 the American settlers obtained their independence from Mexico by military action and established themselves as an independent republic.

In 1833, even before achieving independence, a provisional constitution had been drawn up, which was intended to establish a state government nominally subordinated to the Mexican government. This constitution was signed as the Provisional Constitution of 1835, but never put into operation. Despite the acknowledgement of Mexican governance, this document explicitly adopted the common law in criminal jurisprudence:

> Every Judge, so nominated and commissioned, shall have jurisdiction over all crimes and misdemeanors recognized and known to the common law of England: he shall have power to grant writs of "habeas corpus" in all cases known and practised, to and under the same laws... n860
>
> All trials shall be by jury, and in criminal cases the proceedings shall be regulated and conducted upon the principles of the common law of England... n861

Early in 1836, the Texas congress adopted the French law of Louisiana for its laws of succession, probate and administration of estates.

Texas declared its independence from Mexico and promulgated a new constitution in March, 1836. This constitution required the common law generally to be adopted by statute, and invoked the common law as the rule of decision in criminal proceedings:

> The congress shall, as early as practicable, introduce, by statute, the common law of England, with such modifications as our circumstances, in their judgment, may require; and in all criminal cases the common law shall be the rule of decision. n862

Laws previously enacted or adopted were continued in force:

> That no inconvenience may arise from the adoption of this constitution, it is declared by this convention that all laws now in force in Texas, and not inconsistent with this constitution, shall remain in full force until declared void, repealed, altered, or expire by their own limitation. n863

Thus the previously adopted French legal principles for succession, probate and administration of estates were continued in force in the new republic.

The new constitution also contained a mandate for law revision and codification, including reformation of the land laws:

> So soon as convenience will permit, there shall be a penal code formed on the principles of reformation, not of vindictive justice; and the civil and criminal laws shall be revised, digested, and arranged under different heads; and all laws relating to land-titles shall be translated, revised, and promulgated. n864

Pursuant to this mandate, the Anglo-American conveyancing laws were adopted by the Texas Congress in December, 1836. However, the system of community property derived from Spanish law remained in force.

In 1840, the Texas Congress enacted a broad common law reception provision that was, however, limited in its scope, by a companion provision continuing prior laws in force:

> That the Common Law of England (so far as it is not inconsistent with the Constitution or Acts of Congress now in force) shall, together with such acts be the rule of decision in this Republic, and shall continue in force until altered or repealed by Congress.
>
> Be it further enacted, That all laws in force in this Republic, prior to the first of September, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six (except the Laws of the Consultation and Provisional Government, now in force, and except such Laws as relate exclusively to grants and the colonization of lands in the State of Coahuila and Texas, and also such Laws as relate to the reservation of Islands and Lands, and also of Salt-Lakes, Licks and Salt-Springs, Mines and Minerals of every description; made by the General and State Governments) be, and the same are hereby repealed. n865

Texas was approved for annexation as a state in 1845, n866 and its new constitution of that same year continued prior laws in force:

> All laws or parts of laws now in force in the Republic of Texas, which are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, the joint resolutions for annexing Texas to the United States, or to the provisions of this constitution, shall continue and remain in force as the laws of this State until they expire by their own limitation, or shall be altered or repealed by the legislature thereof. n867

This 1845 constitution also contained several other provisions impacting on land law:

> Perpetuities and monopolies are contrary to the genius of a free government, and shall never be allowed; nor shall the law of primogeniture or entailments ever be in force in this State. n868
>
> All property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned or claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property; and laws shall be passed more clearly defining the rights of the wife, in relation as well to her separate property, as that held in common with her husband. Laws shall also be passed providing for the registration of the wife's separate property. n869

> The legislature shall have power to protect, by law, from forced sale a certain portion of the property of all heads of families. The homestead of a family, not to exceed two hundred acres of land, (not included in a town or city, or any town or city lot or lots,) in value not to exceed two thousand dollars, shall not be subject to forced sale for any debts hereafter contracted; nor shall the owner, if a married man, be at liberty to alienate the same, unless by the consent of the wife, in such manner as the legislature may hereafter point out. n870

In the current Texas statutes, several provisions touch upon the extent to which the common law pervades Texas jurisprudence generally and land law specifically. A rather uniquely worded common law reception statute establishes the rule of decision:

> The rule of decision in this state consists of those portions of the common law of England that are not inconsistent with the constitution or the laws of the United States, the constitution of this state, or the laws of this state. n871

Another provision establishes limits on the extent to which particular common law doctrines are received in Texas:

> (a) The common law rules known as the rule in Shelley's Case, the rule forbidding a remainder to the grantor's heirs, and the doctrine of worthier title do not apply in this state.
>
> (b) A deed, will, or other conveyance of property in this state that limits an interest in the property to a particular person or to a class such as the heirs, heirs of the body, issue, or next of kin of the conveyor or of a person to whom a particular interest in the same property is limited is effective according to the intent of the conveyor.
>
> (c) Status as an heir or next of kin of a conveyor or the failure of a conveyor to describe a person in a conveyance other than as a member of a class does not affect a person's right to take or share in an interest as a conveyee.
>
> (d) Subject to the intention of a conveyor, which controls unless limited by law, the membership of a class described in this section and the participation of a member in a property interest conveyed to the class are determined under this state's laws of descent and distribution. n872

A special provision governs land titles established before adoption of the common law in 1840:

> That in any case where any land in the State of Texas was titled prior to the adoption of the Common Law on March 20, 1840, and there has been a judicial finding that the original grantee of said land abandoned said land prior to the adoption of the Common Law, and the State of Texas has at any time instituted suit for the recovery of said land, resulting in a final judgment adverse to the State of Texas whether on demurrer, exception, or a jury finding of fact, it shall be conclusively presumed that those now claiming said land under conveyance from, or judgment against, the original grantee or his heirs, are vested with all title to said land which was vested in said original grantee by virtue of any patent or title from the sovereignty of the soil to him. n873

Landlord/tenant relationships rest upon a base of common law, except where changed by statute:

> (a) The duties of a landlord and the remedies of a tenant under this subchapter are in lieu of existing common law and other statutory law warranties and duties of landlords for maintenance, repair, security, habitability, and nonretaliation, and remedies of tenants for a violation of those warranties and duties.

> Otherwise, this subchapter does not affect any other right of a landlord or tenant under contract, statutory law, or common law that is consistent with the purposes of this subchapter or any right a landlord or tenant may have to bring an action for personal injury or property damage under the law of this state. This subchapter does not impose obligations on a landlord or tenant other than those expressly stated in this subchapter. n874

Likewise, common law liens also may be imposed in Texas:

> Except as provided by Chapter 59, this subtitle does not affect:
>
> (1) the right to create a lien by special contract or agreement; or
>
> (2) a lien that is not treated in this subtitle, including a lien arising under common law, in equity, or under another statute of this state. n875

In a case concerning a controversy about surface water rights, the Texas Supreme Court has also declared that "absent a statute governing the rights of land holders, those owners whose title derives from Spanish or Mexican land grants are governed by the civil law, whereas those whose title derives from subsequent grants are governed by the common law." n876

Early in the history of the state, Texas courts held that English statutes were not adopted with the common law:

> Such statutes and such policy constitute elements in the judicial mind, in establishing rules of construction, which it cannot discard, however much it may struggle to escape their trammels. The English judges, in numberless decisions, acknowledge their force and influence especially in the interpretation of devises, in which they feel constrained to conform their judgments in such cases to the policy of the government in its peculiar tenure of landed estates... But it clearly shows that even they who, without detracting from the distinguished jurists of other countries, may be regarded as the great expounders of the common law, compound their rules of construction of the common law, of the statutes, and of the policy of the government. Our own judicial authorities are constrained by the same moral necessities; and the rules of construction and interpretation are composed of like elements -- the common law, legislative enactments, and the policy of the government. It is a singular fact, that, although this state has adopted the common law by express legislative enactment, yet, unlike most, if not all, of the states which have adopted the common law, we have not, as they have, also adopted all English statutes of a general nature, up to a particular period, not repugnant to or inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the state. Hence our rules of construction and interpretation must be predicated upon the common law, upon our statutes, and upon the general policy embodied in our varied form of government. It would be dangerous, as we think, to submit too implicitly to rules of construction founded entirely upon English jurisprudence. n877

This restrictive view of Texas common law reception was reaffirmed nearly a century later:

> The question of common law recoupment in Texas is to be determined in accordance with the decisions of this Court. Texas never was a British colony nor an American territory and the common law comes to us by adoption rather than by inheritance, so to speak. The Congressional Act of January 20, 1840, ... simply makes the common law of England, so far as it is consistent with our constitutional and legislative enactments the rule of decision in Texas. No English statutes were adopted ... and although Texas was an independent republic in 1840, the Act of the Congress of that year was construed as referring to the common law as applied in England in 1840, but rather to the English common law as declared by the courts of the various states of the United States ...The common law of Texas is somewhat unique in origin and its development has not in all respects coincided with the general course of evolution discernable throughout the other American states... n878

§ 7.02(ss) Utah.

No permanent settlement in the area that is now the state of Utah occurred until July, 1847, when members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints ("Mormons") began arriving in huge numbers fleeing from religious persecution in the Midwest. At the time the region was nominally under Spanish governance, although this governance was never effective beyond California. Spanish outposts at San Diego and Monterey in California had been established by the beginning of the 19th century, but little governmental control was exercised, especially from Mexico after Mexican independence was achieved in 1821. From the time that American settlers arrived until effective American governmental control was asserted a few years later, church officials established governmental institutions and commenced a vigorous effort of widespread settlement throughout the intermountain area.

While the church organizations dealt effectively with local problems, a larger government movement was underway by the founding of the State of "Deseret" (a religious term) in 1849, a huge entity extending from Nebraska to California, and from Oregon to and including Arizona. The constitution for the State of Deseret made no explicit references to the common law, but the governmental institutions established by the document were familiar in most American common law jurisdictions. n879

In 1850 the authorization for the Territory of Utah was enacted by Congress, n880 with boundaries including the present states of Utah, Nevada, the southwest corner of Wyoming, and a large part of western Colorado. According to this act, the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n881 and federal law was extended over the area, but no prior laws were declared to be in force. n882

Numerous applications for statehood and accompanying draft constitutions were rejected because of a federal policy strongly opposed to the practice of plural marriage among the Mormons, so statehood was delayed until after the church prohibited the practice in 1890.

Meanwhile, territorial courts were considering the nature and sources of fundamental law in Utah. In 1873, the Utah territorial supreme court commented:

> In American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. 511 , the Court, by Judge Marshall, say substantially, that the laws of Florida, as they were when the Territory was ceded, so far as not inconsistent with the Constitution and Laws of the United States, continued in force until altered by the newly created power of the State ... This appears to be the settled doctrine in regard to conquered and ceded Territory in the absence of special treaty stipulation. It applies to territory acquired from Mexico, since the treaty of Guadaloupe made no special provision on the subject. Utah was embraced in that acquisition. As in Florida, the pre-existing law was Spanish. So in Utah, it was Mexican, and in both cases the laws were derived mainly from the laws of Rome. In neither did the English Common Law ... prevail. Congress made no special change, and the Territorial Legislature, upon whom authority was conferred, have made no express enactment upon the subject.
>
> This Territory was first settled in 1847, and from that time to the acquisition and treaty in 1848, the settlers were comparatively few in number. There were no settled laws, usages and customs among them. They came here as American citizens, under the flag, and claiming the protection of the United States Government.
>
> The particular class of persons forming the great, if not entire, bulk of emigrants, claim to have furnished troops from among their own numbers to assist this Government in its war against Mexico.
>
> At the time of the acquisition and treaty, they could not claim Mexican citizenship, and have never > adopted its laws and customs.

>
> Soon after the change of sovereignty by the treaty, emigrants in large numbers flocked in from the States and surrounding Territories, and for many years there has been an organized community.
>
> When we turn to the communities from whence these emigrants proceeded, we find that they differed one from another, more or less, in regard to their laws and institutions. No two are alike. In the most, it is true, many common law principles and doctrines were in force. Still the body of the common law in each was peculiar to the particular State, and it was rather the common law of the State than English Common Law. In some, the English statutes had been received as Common Law; in others, not.
>
> These diversities make it impossible to assume that any specific body of the Common Law was transplanted to the Territory by the fact of immigration.
>
> But one course was open, and that was for the whole body of the people to agree, expressly or tacitly, upon a common measure. It was to be expected that the emigrants would not be contented with the loose and alien institutions of an outlying Mexican department, and they have not been.
>
> They have tacitly agreed upon maxims and principles of the Common Law suited to their conditions and consistent with the Constitution and Laws of the United States, and they only wait recognition by the courts to become the Common Law of the Territory. When so recognized, they are laws as certainly as if expressly adopted by the law-making power. n883

Three years later this court, in an opinion without accompanying reasoning or documentation, declared that the common law had been extended to Utah by the territorial enabling act:

> [T]he Common Law ... is most positively extended over the Territory of Utah by the express language of the Act of Congress providing a Territorial Government for Utah, approved September 9th, 1850, the 17th section of which was relied on by the plaintiff in error, and reads as follows, viz: "That the Constitution and Laws of the United States, are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah, so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable." n884

In 1894, Utah was authorized for statehood, n885 and the enabling act decreed that "all laws in force made by said Territory at the time of its admission into the Union shall be in force in said State, except as modified or changed by this Act or by the constitution of the State...." n886 A similar provision appeared in the Utah Constitution of 1895, which went into effect when the territory attained statehood in 1896, n887 and remains the current provision for continuing prior laws in force:

> All laws of the Territory of Utah now in force, not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitations, or are altered or repealed by the Legislature... n888

In 1898 the state legislature enacted a general common law reception provision, which appears in the current Utah code as follows:

> The common law of England so far as it is not repugnant to, or in conflict with, the constitution or laws of the United States, or the constitution or laws of this state, and so far only as it is consistent with and adapted to the natural and physical conditions of this state and the necessities of the people hereof, is hereby adopted, and shall be the rule of decision in all courts of this state. n889

In subsequent litigation the Utah Supreme Court stated, in opposition to the territorial court opinion of 1873, cited supra, that the common law was not received in Utah until enactment of the 1898 reception statute, and that Mexican civil law prevailed until Utah became a territory in 1850:

> Utah is of territory which, in 1846, passed from the possession of Mexico into that of the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which terminated the Mexican War. The original territory so acquired embraced the region west of the summit of the Rocky Mountains, east of California, and between the thirty-seventh and forty-second parallels of north latitude. At the time of the treaty and cession the civil law prevailed in the republic of Mexico. It continued to so prevail in the acquired and ceded territory until changed by the new sovereign... A provisional government was established in the territory by its people in 1849. There is nothing in that to show that the English common law was established by them. In 1850 Congress created the acquired territory into a temporary government by the name of the territory of Utah, and passed what is known as the Organic Act for the territorial government of Utah Territory. Later Nevada, portions of Idaho, and of Wyoming and Colorado, and other territory, were carved out of Utah Territory. The last section of the act reads:
>
> > That the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said territory of Utah so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable.
>
> By that it is claimed on the one side, and denied on the other, that Congress extended over and transplanted the English common law into the territory so acquired from Mexico. There are no other enactments on the subject, either by Congress, the territorial Assembly, or the state Legislature of Utah, until 1898, when the state Legislature adopted this [current reception provision].
>
> Not until then was the common law of England adopted in this territory or state by a positive enactment.
>
> Our conclusion, therefore, is that, while Congress, by extending over the territory of Utah the Constitution and laws of the United States, put in force, in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, "the system of common law and equity which generally prevails in this country," yet did not so extend or transplant the common law of England, with all its rigor and harshness, but only so much of it as was and had been generally recognized and enforced in this country, and as is and was suitable to our conditions. n890

More recently the Utah Supreme Court has expressed a preference for English common law as expounded by American courts:

> A glance at our decisions clearly shows that we follow the common law of England as developed and expounded by the courts of last resort in this country, but that only on rare occasions do we refer to or rely on the English decisions but constantly rely on the decisions of our sister states. Thus it is clear that by this statute we adopted the common law of England only where it is suitable to our conditions, morals, history and background, that generally we look to the system of common law and equity which prevails in and has been and is now being developed by the decisions of this country and that we reject the common law of England which is not suitable or adapted to our needs, morals or ideals. n891

§ 7.02(tt) Vermont.

In its pre-statehood history, the land that is now Vermont was claimed at various times by Massachusetts, New York and New Hampshire. The rival claims were still being vigorously contested when the War for Independence broke out, so local residents took advantage of the distraction and in 1777 declared the Republic of the Green Mountains as a sovereign state. The constitution drawn up in 1777 contained no provision directly referring to the common law. Possible inferences of common law foundation could be perceived in provisions conferring chancery powers on the courts, requiring recordation of land deeds and mandating legislation regulating entails so as to prevent perpetuities. n892 When Massachusetts and New Hampshire gave up their claims to Vermont Territory in 1786, a new constitution was drafted. This document, similar to its predecessor, authorized creation of a court of chancery, required recording of land deeds, and called for legislation regulating entails so as to prevent perpetuities, but made no explicit reference to the common law. n893 New York finally ceased pursuing its claims in 1790, and in February, 1791, Vermont was authorized for admission as the fourteenth state. n894 A new constitution, drafted in 1793 and adopted in 1796, also made no explicit reference to the common law but contained versions of the three provisions just mentioned. n895

Meanwhile, even before statehood, legislative adoption of the common law was emerging. Commenting on the Vermont legislature's failure to fulfill its constitutional mandate for legislation regulating entails and perpetuities, the Vermont Supreme Court in an early decision described the gradual recognition of common law reception:

> After the first constitution was adopted, at the session of the legislature holden in 1778, they had recourse to Connecticut for their laws, and from the journal of the legislature we learn they passed several acts as the said acts stand in the Connecticut law book... In February, 1779, they enacted "that common law, as it is generally practiced and understood, in the New England States, be, and is hereby established as the common law of this state." Common law, as practiced and understood, probable meant, as considered or altered by statute or by judicial constructions, and as it was adapted to our local circumstances and usages, generally adopted. It is most probably they had reference to the common law as understood and established by usage, or the determination of the courts in Connecticut, as that appears to be the state to which the legislature had particular reference in passing laws...
>
> ...In June, 1782, the legislature passed an act, wherein they recited that "the inhabitants of this state have been habituated to conform their manners to English law, and hold their real estate by English tenure," and enacted, "that so much of the common law of England as is not repugnant to the constitution, or any act of the legislature, be adopted, and shall be, and continue to be, law within this state;" and that such "statute laws and parts of laws of the kingdom of England, passed before October, A.D. 1760, for the alteration and explanation of the common law, &c., shall be, and continue to be, law within this state." This law was continued to the revision made in 1797, with the alteration only, that, in the laws passed in 1787, adopting the statute laws of England, they omit the word "alteration," and adopt only such as were made for the explanation of the common law. n896

The Vermont court's edited version of the concluding paragraphs from the 1782 reception legislation should be more accurately reported as follows:

> And whereas, the statute law of England is so connected and interwoven with the common law, that our jurisprudence would be incomplete without it; therefore,
>
> Be it further enacted, that such statute laws and parts of laws of the kingdom of England, as were passed before the first day of October, Anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and sixty, for the alteration and explanation of the common law, and which are not repugnant to the constitution, or some act of the legislature, and are applicable to the circumstances of the State, are hereby adopted and made, and shall be and continue to be, law within this State: and all courts are to take notice thereof, and govern themselves accordingly. n897

A simpler version of the common law reception provision is in the current Vermont statutes:

> So much of the common law of England as is applicable to the local situation and circumstances and is not repugnant to the constitution or laws shall be laws in this state and courts shall take notice thereof and govern themselves accordingly. n898

The Vermont Supreme Court in this century has declared that:

> The common law of England thus adopted is the unwritten law of England as amended or altered by acts of Parliament in force at the time of the migration of settlers to this country, and such other acts of Parliament, passed since the migration, which have been adopted by our courts. n899

§ 7.02(uu) Virginia.

The royal charter that led directly to establishment of Jamestown in Virginia as the first permanent English settlement in North America asserted English sovereignty over a huge area of North America between 34 and 45 degrees north latitude, from coast to coast and one hundred miles into each ocean, all called Virginia.

The patentees who were from London were authorized to establish a privately funded joint stock company in order to set up a colony anywhere on the coast between 34 and 41 degrees latitude, and to take jurisdiction of a tract 50 miles north and 50 miles south of the settlement and one hundred miles out to sea and one hundred miles inland. This London group was designated the "first colony," while the group from Plymouth and Bristol was called the "second colony" and was given similar instructions pertaining to a second joint stock company and a colony in the territory between the 38th and 45th parallels. n900

In each colony a council of thirteen persons was to govern "according to such laws, ordinances, and instructions, as shall be in that behalf, given and signed with our hand or sign manuel, and pass under the privy seal of our realm of England." n901 These two colonial councils were made subject to the direction of another council of thirteen, sitting in England, called the Council of Virginia. n902

The charter secured to all persons dwelling or born within the colonies the right of English citizens, to "have and enjoy all liberties, franchises, and immunities, within any of our other dominions, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born, within this our realm of England, or any other of our said dominions." n903 Supplemental instructions drafted in November, 1606, proclaimed that > for the good government of the people to be planted in those parts, and for the good ordering and disposing of all causes happening within the same, and the same to be done for the substance thereof, as neer to the common lawes of England, and the equity thereof, as may be... n904

Thus was expressed from the outset a fundamental commitment to a rule of law based on the rules of common law and equity in the English jurisprudence of the time. n905

The language of the charter conferring power to make grants of land obviously invoked and relied upon the English common law. The supplemental instructions of November 20, 1606, added further confirmation that property rights rested on the established rights under the laws of England:

> ...and moreover wee doe hereby ordaine and establish for us, our heires and successors, that all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments to be had and enjoyed by any of our subjects within the precincts aforesaid, shall be had and inherited and enjoyed, according as in the like estates they be had and enjoyed by the lawes within this realme of England... n906

Early in 1609 the patentees drafted a new charter, which was approved by James I on May 23, 1609. With respect to property rights, the 1609 charter reconfirmed that the patentees were authorized to acquire such rights, after first obtaining royal permission:

> And that [the patentees] and their successors, shall be, from henceforth, forever enabled to take, acquire and purchase, by the name aforesaid (license for the same, from us, our heirs or successors, first > had and obtained) any manner of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, goods and chattels, within our realm of England, and dominion of Wales. n907

The 1609 charter also confirmed that such property rights were the rights recognized under existing English law:

> [The patentees] are to have and to hold, possess and enjoy, all and singular the said lands, countries and territories, with all and singular other premises, heretofore by these presents granted, or mentioned to be granted ...; to the sole and proper use of [the patentees], their successors and assigns for ever; to be holden of us, our heirs, and successors, as of our manour of East Greenwich, in free and common socage, and not in capite... n908

Property rights previously granted were ratified, except that the northern boundary of the territory open to Virginia Company colonization was shifted back from the forty-first to the fortieth latitude. n909

Soon patentees sought and obtained from the king a third charter on March 12, 1612. This charter reaffirmed the grants of the earlier charters and reiterated the language of the two previous charters concerning the holding of lands in free and common socage. n910 It also confirmed interests previously granted n911 and declared that questions in construing or interpreting any of the charter provisions should be resolved in favor of the company. n912

A new charter was issued in 1618 but was never delivered, because the new governor bringing it with him died while making the ocean crossing. Later that year, on November 18, 1618, the Virginia Company in London issued instructions that transferred governmental power to the colony in Virginia and mandated that the colony be governed by both appointed officers and an assembly consisting of colonists' representatives. These instructions, the so-called "Great Charter" of Virginia, are of greatest importance because they led to the swift assembling of the earliest representative legislative body in North America. The General Assembly, consisting of the governor, 6 councilors and 22 burgesses elected by the colonists, first met at Jamestown on July 30, 1619. n913

In these rules was embodied a liberal right to acquire fee simple in land. Even common laborers were able to become landholders under the farmers' tenure. Yet another form of land grant commenced in 1618, a type of sub-patent issued to private societies. Under this arrangement several prominent colonists banded together, combining their own shares and sometimes purchasing additional shares, and offered to form a plantation at their own expense. Among the terms of the private plantation grants or patents was that the grantees could regulate their servants and business in ways not repugnant to the laws of England. This was tested when, at the time the first assembly met, John Martin claimed the privileges of an English manorial lord over his plantation, but was instead directed to submit to usual company regulations.

In 1622, King James I was prompted to involve himself more directly in the affairs of the company, fearing the conditions in the colony were fomenting too much independence and possible sedition. He had his attorney general issue a quo warranto against the company; when the matter came before the King's Bench on June 26, 1624, the company's charter was revoked on a technicality, because of an alleged error in pleading.

With the return of the colony to royal governance, a commission was appointed with the objective of reinstating the plan of government described in the 1606 charter. However, James died before the commission could finish its work, his successor Charles I then officially proclaimed Virginia a royal colony, and in the end no major changes were made in form of government that was in place in 1624. The Virginia assembly did not meet officially between 1624 and 1628, but then resumed meetings and legislating, albeit without formal sanction from the king. Finally, in January, 1639, Charles gave formal consent to restoration of the assembly as a permanent institution of the colony.

When the Stuart monarch was restored to the throne in 1660, it seemed appropriate to the assembly to confirm their allegiance to English law. Thus the assembly proclaimed that Virginians "have also endeavoured in all things (as neere as the capacity and constitution of this country would admitt) to addhere to those excellent and often refined laws of England, to which we profess and acknowledge all due obedience and reverence...." n914 The assembly sorted through its past enactments and those to be kept were compiled in a new code of laws adopted by the assembly in March, 1662:

> By the statutes of 1661-1662, procedure in the courts was regulated. At the time of the Restoration, Virginia seems to have been especially anxious to show herself loyal to England, and these enactments breathe a deep respect for the common law. In the preamble it is stated that the legislature has endeavored in all things to adhere to these "excellent and refined laws of England to which we profess to acknowledge all due obedience and reverence." As a reason for enacting laws at all they assign the vast volume of the English law from which courts would be unable to collect the necessary principles without the aid of such codification. The former laws are repealed and a new code is enacted. As some former laws restrained the trial by jury quite contrary to the laws of England, the law of juries is restated with special carefulness and precision. It is interesting to note in this connection that the colonists express their regret that they are unable to comply with the requirement of the English jury system that the jurors shall come from the immediate neighborhood of the place where the fact was committed; but they state that they desire to approach as near as possible to compliance by enacting that six men of the ablest and nearest of the inhabitants of the county shall be on the jury... In this code the period of prescription for land is limited to five years. n915

In 1666 the assembly appropriated money to purchase law books, in order to more faithfully follow English common law:

> Whereas for the better conformity of the proceedings of the courts of this country to the lawes of England, as appeares necessary for their better direction therein, all the former statutes at large and those made since the beginning of the raigne of his sacred majestie that now is and a few other approved books of law should be purchased, It is therefore by this grand assembly and the authority thereof enacted accordingly that all the aforesaid statute books, and Daltons justice of the peace, and office of a sherriffe, and Swinburnes book of Wills and Testaments may be sent for by the auditor for the use of the general courts and assembly, and the like books be sent for by some of the commissioners of the severall county courts for the use of the respective counties, and paid for out of the county levy. n916

Given the background of colonial Virginia's early leaders, reliance on English common law was only natural:

> Throughout the nearly two decades that the London Company managed Virginia, it recruited the colony's leaders from England's ruling classes. Those men were well schooled in English law and custom. They had been educated at the universities or Inns of Court; some knew martial law, and they all enjoyed ties to the court and Parliament. Despite such qualifications these men were to leave only a slight impression on colonial law. Few survived or stayed in Virginia long enough to make much of a mark. Furthermore, there was little agreement before 1625 as to which of England's legal traditions were most suitable to a struggling colony. The question of what law should prevail was only vaguely addressed before formulation of The Lawes Divine, Morall and Martiall [the very severe code adopted for Jamestown in 1611, and sometimes enforced]. The Charter of 1618 supplanted The Lawes, but that change merely introduced the possibility of adopting a more familiar form of law. Thus it was the members of the post-1625 general assemblies, together with their counterparts in local government, who assumed the greater role in grafting English common law to colonial needs. n917

A provision for reception of the English common and statutory law was never included in Virginia's various constitutions, the first of which was adopted in 1776. However, Virginia's legislature in that same year did enact a statutory reception provision:

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law

> prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n918

This provision was partially repealed, as to English statutes, in 1792, and its modern and current counterpart, originally enacted in 1919, is more narrow:

> § 1-10. The common law. -- The common law of England, insofar as it is not repugnant to the principles of the Bill of Rights and Constitution of this Commonwealth, shall continue in full force within the same, and be the rule of decision, except as altered by the General Assembly.
>
> § 1-22. Acts of Parliament. -- The right and benefit of all writs, remedial and judicial, given by any statute or act of Parliament, made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of James the First, of a general nature, not local to England, shall still be saved, insofar as the same are consistent with the Bill of Rights and Constitution of this Commonwealth and the Acts of Assembly. n919

Virginia courts have consistently and unhesitatingly applied English common law in appropriate cases throughout the period of statehood. Decisions of English courts both before and after the Revolution have been found acceptable. n920 They have recognized that the reception is not only selective, but that even adopted common law principles may be modified to suit local conditions, suggesting a substantial rather than a literal compliance with common law. n921 It has also been recognized that the common law rules are still living and changing, adapting to contemporary needs. n922 Common law reception cases continue to emerge in Virginia jurisprudence. n923

§ 7.02(vv) Washington.

The area of Washington state was first claimed by the Spanish in 1775 and then by the English in 1787. The first British fur trading post was established in 1810, and in 1811 an American trading post was also founded. Following the War of 1812 and subsequent treaty activity, the Americans and British agreed in 1818 to ten years of joint occupation of the area, extended indefinitely in 1827. Increased American settlement in the southern portion of the area (later Oregon) prompted formation of a provisional government there and resolution of the British-American boundary in 1849.

In 1853 the Washington Territory was created out of the northern portion of the Oregon Territory. n924 As in the Oregon Territory enabling act, "all such laws, or any law or laws, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall be utterly null and void," n925 but the Washington act did explicitly continue prior laws in force:

> And be it further enacted, That the laws now in force in said Territory of Washington, by virtue of the legislation of Congress in reference to the Territory of Oregon, which have been enacted and passed subsequent to the first day of September, eighteen hundred and forty-eight, applicable to the said Territory of Washington, together with the legislative enactments of the Territory of Oregon, enacted and passed prior to the passage of, and not inconsistent with, the provisions of this act, and applicable to the said Territory of Washington, be, and they are hereby, continued in force in said Territory of Washington until they shall be repealed or amended by future legislation. n926

As explained in 7.02(ll), supra, the initial laws in force in the area of Oregon were the laws of Iowa territory, which were the common law and the laws of Wisconsin. The laws of Wisconsin were the laws of the Northwest Ordinance and the laws of Michigan territory. The Northwest Ordinance, which was also extended to the Michigan territory, imposed a common law system over its jurisdictions n927.

A new common law reception provision was enacted by the Washington territorial legislature in 1863, n928 and its counterpart in the current Washington statutes is nearly identical:

> The common law, so far as it is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, or of the state of Washington nor incompatible with the institutions and condition of society in this state, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of this state. n929

Against this common law reception background, Congress finally passed a statehood enabling act for Washington and several other states in 1889, n930 with a brief clause continuing in force prior laws: "and all laws in force made by said Territories, at the time of their admission into the Union, shall be in force in said States, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitutions of the States, respectively." n931 The state constitution of 1889 also continued prior law in force, by means of a provision still in effect:

> All laws now in force in the Territory of Washington, which are not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or are altered or repealed by the legislature: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to validate any act of the legislature of Washington Territory granting shore or tide lands to any person, company or any municipal or private corporation. n932

The Washington Supreme Court has held that the state's common law reception has included English statutes:

> The common law prevails in this state, so far as it is not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this state, nor incompatible with the institutions and conditions of society.
>
> The common law of England, including the English statutes in force at the time of the Declaration of Independence, as adopted by the territorial law of 1863, continues to be the law of this state, except so far as modified by statute. n933

In matters relating to property rights, the rule in Shelley's Case has been adopted as a rule of decision, n934 common law arbitration rules have been recognized, n935 and Washington has adopted the community property approach to marital property. n936

§ 7.02(ww) West Virginia.

Until 1863, when Virginia's western counties refused to concur in Virginia's secession from the Union and were admitted as the new state of West Virginia, its history of common law reception was the same as Virginia's.

The initial royal charter for Virginia in 1606 established for each of its colonies a council of thirteen persons to govern "according to such laws, ordinances, and instructions, as shall be in that behalf, given and signed with our hand or sign manuel, and pass under the privy seal of our realm of England." n937

The charter secured to all persons dwelling or born within the colonies the right of English citizens, to "have and enjoy all liberties, franchises, and immunities, within any of our other dominions, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born, within this our realm of England, or any other of our said dominions." n938 Supplemental instructions drafted in November, 1606, proclaimed that > for the good government of the people to be planted in those parts, and for the good ordering and disposing of all causes happening within the same, and the same to be done for the substance thereof, as neer to the common lawes of England, and the equity thereof, as may be... n939

The supplemental instructions of November 20, 1606, added further confirmation that property rights rested on the established rights under the laws of England:

> ...and moreover wee doe hereby ordaine and establish for us, our heires and successors, that all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments to be had and enjoyed by any of our subjects within the precincts aforesaid, shall be had and inherited and enjoyed, according as in the like estates they be had and enjoyed by the lawes within this realme of England... n940

Early in 1609 the patentees drafted a new charter, which was approved by James I on May 23, 1609. This charter confirmed that such property rights were the rights recognized under existing English law:

> [The patentees] are to have and to hold, possess and enjoy, all and singular the said lands, countries and territories, with all and singular other premises, heretofore by these presents granted, or mentioned to be granted...; to the sole and proper use of [the patentees], their successors and assigns for ever; to be holden of us, our heirs, and successors, as of our manour of East Greenwich, in free and common socage, and not in capite... n941

When the Stuart monarch was restored to the throne in 1660, it seemed appropriate to the Virginia assembly to confirm their allegiance to English law. Thus the assembly proclaimed that Virginians "have also endeavoured in all things (as neere as the capacity and constitution of this country would admitt) to addhere to those excellent and often refined laws of England, to which we profess and acknowledge all due obedience and reverence...." n942 In 1666 the assembly appropriated money to purchase law books, in order to more faithfully follow English common law.

A provision for reception of the English common and statutory law was never included in Virginia's various constitutions, the first of which was adopted in 1776. However, Virginia's legislature in that same year did enact a statutory reception provision:

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n943

This provision was partially repealed, as to English statutes, in 1792.

Virginia courts consistently and unhesitatingly applied English common law in appropriate cases throughout the period of statehood. Decisions of English courts both before and after the Revolution were found acceptable. n944

In anticipation of a separation, inhabitants of Virginia's western counties drafted a constitution in 1861, which included a common law reception provision:

> Such parts of the common law and of the laws of the State of Virginia as are in force within the boundaries of the State of West Virginia when this constitution goes into operation, and are not repugnant thereto, shall be and continue the law of this State until altered or repealed by the legislature. n945

A virtually identical provision is in West Virginia's current constitution. n946

West Virginia was authorized for statehood late in 1862, and formally admitted by presidential proclamation in 1863. n947 A new constitution of 1872 contained essentially the same reception provision as its predecessor constitution. n948 In addition, a constitutional provision on land titles continued in effect the prior land law:

> All private rights and interests in lands in this State derived from or under the laws of the State of > Virginia, and from or under the constitution or laws of this State prior to the time this constitution goes into operation, shall remain valid and secure and shall be determined by the laws in force in Virginia, prior to the formation of this State, and by the constitution and laws in force in this State prior to the time this constitution goes into effect. n949

This provision, too, remains in the current constitution. n950

West Virginia's statutory common law reception provision emphasizes the 1863 break from Virginia's laws:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to the principles of the constitution of this state, shall continue in force within the same, except in those respects wherein it was altered by the general assembly of Virginia before the twentieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, or has been, or shall be, altered by the Legislature of this state. n951

Several other statutory provisions limit the extent to which common law is received in West Virginia:

> The common law of England in regard to ancient lights is not in force in this state. n952
>
> The provisions of section one [36-1A-1, Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities] of this article do not apply to...:
>
> (7) A property interest, power of appointment, or arrangement that was not subject to the common-law rule against perpetuities or is excluded by another provision of this code. n953
>
> The right and benefit of all writs, remedial and judicial, given by any statute or act of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of James the First, of a general nature, not local to England, shall still be saved, so far as the same may be consistent with the Constitution of this State, the acts of the general assembly of Virginia passed before the twentieth day of June, eighteen hundred and sixty-three, and the acts of the legislature of this State. n954

West Virginia courts have held that the 1792 Virginia statute repealing all British statutes then in force, "with certain savings," was also the law in West Virginia. n955 State courts have also had to resolve a controversy over whether the judiciary has inherent power to alter established common law principles. Answering in the affirmative, the West Virginia Supreme Court has declared:

> Based on the foregoing law, we hold that Article VIII, Section 13 of the West Virginia Constitution and W. Va. Code, 2-1-1, were not intended to operate as a bar to this Court's evolution of common law principles, including its historic power to alter or amend the common law. n956

In clarifying this stance a few months later, the court said,

> We did not hold in Morningstar that we would ignore the English common law, but only that we are not required to accept it as forever binding on us to the point where we cannot make our own assessment of the reasonableness of an ancient common law rule in light of the present condition of our society. n957

§ 7.02(xx) Wisconsin.

In the area that is now Wisconsin, the first formal claim on behalf of a European power was made for France in 1634. French exploration and fur trading activities resulted in the founding of the first settlement, at Green Bay in 1684. The British assumed formal control after the French and Indian War, and the Americans became sovereign after the Treaty of Paris in 1783. However, no effective American governmental activity disturbed the British Canadian influence until after the War of 1812.

During the period of nominal American sovereignty, Wisconsin area underwent numerous changes of territorial designation, each with its own particular type of common law reception. At first, the area was simply part of the Northwest Territory and under the legal regime of common law as required by the Northwest Ordinance. The Northwest Ordinance, enacted while the Articles of Confederation were in effect, ensured to the inhabitants of the territory judicial proceedings according the course of the common law, among other rights:

> The inhabitants of the said territory shall always be entitled to the benefits of the writs of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate representation of the people in the legislature, and of judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law. All persons shall be bailable, unless for capital offenses, where the proof shall be evident, or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate; and no cruel or unusual punishments shall be inflicted. No man shall be deprived of his liberty or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and should the public exigencies make it necessary, for the common preservation, to take any person's property, or to demand his particular services, full compensation shall be made for the same. And, in the just preservation of rights and property, it is understood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made or have force in the said territory, that shall, in any manner whatever, interfere with or affect private contracts, or engagements, bona fide, and without fraud previously formed. n958

The Northwest Ordinance also required the appointment of a three-judge court, the judges to "have a common-law jurisdiction," and who, with the governor, "shall adopt and publish in the district such laws of the original States, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district." n959 In 1795 the governor and the judges of the Northwest Territory enacted the Virginia reception statute of 1776 (even though Virginia had in 1792 repealed the portion of the statute receiving English statutes):

> That the common law of England, all statutes or acts of parliament made in aid of the common law prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first, and which are of a general nature, not local to the kingdom, together with the several acts of the general assembly of this colony now in force, so far as the same may consist with the several ordinances, declarations, and resolutions of the general convention, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered as in full force, until the same shall be altered by legislative power of this colony. n960

When the Indiana Territory was created in 1800, n961 it included Wisconsin land within its boundaries, and this territory, too, was required to create "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n962 In 1807 the Indiana territorial legislature enacted its own reception statute:

> The common law of England, all statutes and acts of the British Parliament, made in aid of the common law, prior to the fourth year of the reign of King James the first (excepting the second section of the sixth Chapter of forty-third Elizabeth [costs in certain cases], the 8th Chapter, thirteenth Elizabeth [usury] and 9th Chapter, thirty-seventh Henry eighth [usury], and which are of a general nature, not local to that kingdom; and also the several laws in force in this Territory, shall be the rule of decision, and shall be considered, as of full force, until repealed by legislative authority. n963

Wisconsin land was then transferred to the Territory of Illinois in 1809. As in the Indiana territorial enabling act nine years earlier, the Illinois territorial enabling act of 1809 n964 also called for "a government in all respects similar to that provided by [the Northwest Ordinance]; and the inhabitants thereof shall be entitled to, and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges and advantages granted and secured to the people by the said ordinance." n965

In 1818 Wisconsin became part of the Territory of Michigan. When the Michigan territory had been formed in 1805, n966 its enabling act also required the new territory to form a government in conformance with the Northwest Ordinance. n967 But the territorial legislature apparently wished to start afresh with fundamental law, because Michigan legislation in 1810 had purported to repeal all prior English statutes, French law and custom, and laws of the Northwest Territory and of the Indiana Territory, leaving only common law decisions in effect, by virtue of the Northwest Ordinance. This, then, was the received common law in Michigan Territory then Wisconsin became a part of that territory. The Michigan territory -- already including the areas of Michigan, Wisconsin and part of Minnesota -- was augmented in 1834 with land from the rest of Minnesota, and from Iowa and much of the Dakotas. Then in 1836, the Territory of Wisconsin was established with all of the land from the old Territory of Michigan, except the new state of Michigan, and in 1838, the Territory of Iowa was formed from part of Wisconsin Territory.

Wisconsin's territorial enabling act n968 in 1836 authorized the formation of a government in conformance with the Northwest Ordinance and specifically continued in force the Michigan territorial laws in effect at the time:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the said Territory shall be entitled to, and enjoy, all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, by the [Northwest Ordinance]; and shall be subject to all the conditions and restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of the said Territory. The said inhabitants shall also be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, heretofore granted and secured to the Territory of Michigan, and to its inhabitants, and the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan shall be extended over said Territory, so far as the same shall not be incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject, nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the said Territory of Wisconsin; and further, the laws of the United States are hereby extended over, and shall be in force in, said Territory, so far as the same, or any provisions thereof may be applicable. n969

The enabling act also declared that "the said supreme court and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction." n970

In 1838 the Wisconsin territorial legislature followed Michigan's example and declared that statutes of Great Britain would not be considered law in the territory; that same legislature also repealed prior acts of Michigan territory, and then enacted a large compilation of laws borrowed mostly from Michigan, which in turn had been borrowed from New York, Ohio and Massachusetts. n971 However, the Wisconsin Supreme Court followed the courts of Michigan and Iowa in reinvigorating the common law reception long after the legislative attacks:

> This case presents the simple question, whether the landlord's common law right of distress for rent exists in this state...
>
> There is perhaps no better rule established than that which holds that the common law, so far as applicable to our condition, exists in the states of this country, except those whose systems were based upon the civil law or some other foreign code...
>
> I have sometimes heard it denied that any part of the common law was in force in this state, though I have never heard the reasoning by which that conclusion was arrived at. The same claim has, however, been made in other states similarly situated, and to show how it has been met I will quote from a few decisions. In Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich., 25 , the court says:
>
>> Some reference was made on the argument to the general system of law prevailing here in view of the former history of the country, but we deem it useless to enter into any > extended examination of this question. It is undoubtedly true that at one time the custom of Paris was in force here. It was expressly abrogated by the territorial legislature in 1810, and probably applied to a very few cases then, if to any. Practically the common law has prevailed here, in ordinary matters, since our government took possession; and the country has grown up under it. How, or by what particular means, it originated, would open an inquiry more curious than useful. A custom which is as old as the American settlements, and has been universally recognized by every department of government, has made it the law of the land, if not made so otherwise. Our statutes, without this substratum, would not only fail to provide for the great mass of affairs, but would lack the means of safe construction. We are of opinion that questions of property, not clearly excepted from it, must be determined by the common law, modified only by such circumstances as render it inapplicable to our local affairs.

In O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa, 381 , the court says:

> The defendant suggests the further question, whether the complainant would be entitled to dower in this lot if she had not signed the deed. And under this he starts the query whether the common law is the law of this state. This question has been suggested in this court before, but it has not been with apparent seriousness, and therefore it has received no formal answer: and it is not now pressed with an appearance demanding more than a suggestive reply. In the first place, according to our recollection of history, the common law was substituted for the civil law by the Missouri territory, of which this state was once a part. In the next place, so many rights and titles -- so great interests have grown up, as if by and under the common law, and not by and under the civil -- that it would be the duty of a court to hold that the people brought it with them. The territory has, from the beginning, including all private rights and titles, been administered upon the basis of the common law, and to hold that the civil, and not the common law, is the law of this state, would produce startling and revolutionary effects. The extent and magnitude of the interests involved, would require a court to hold to the common law, if there was no other reason. But, besides this, all our laws, back to the beginning of the territory, recognize -- assume the common law. They would many of them, be unmeaning, senseless, without it. All the proceedings of the courts would be so, and not a judgment heretofore recovered would be valid, nor a title under it. But the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwest Territory, made it the law of that country; and that was extended over Wisconsin, and then the laws of Wisconsin, over Iowa. And although the statutes of Michigan and Wisconsin were repealed in 1840, the ordinance of 1787 was not affected, but remained in full vigor as before.

> I have quoted thus at some length from these two decisions, for the reason not only that they are so applicable to the point, but that they were given by courts of states with both of which this state has in a territorial condition been connected. And all that they say about their entire system of laws having from the beginning assumed the existence of the common law, is equally true here. And, as if to remove all pretense for raising the question, our constitution itself expressly assumed the existence of the common law here, and provided that such parts of it as were then in force, not inconsistent with the constitution, should "be and continue part of the law of this state until altered or suspended by the legislature." n972

Wisconsin was authorized for statehood in 1846, n973 formally admitted in 1848, n974 and adopted a new constitution in that same year. This constitution, as noted in Coburn, contained a provision continuing the common law in force: "Such parts of the common law as are now in force in the Territory of Wisconsin, not inconsistent with this Constitution, shall be and continue part of the law of this State, until altered, or suspended by the Legislature." n975 The identical provision continues in the state's current constitution. n976

As in Michigan, the legislative rejection of statutes of Great Britain apparently did not necessarily apply to earlier English statutes. As noted by Coburn, > when our territorial legislature and the framers of our constitution recognized the existence here of the common law, they must be held to have had reference to that law as it existed, modified and amended by English statutes passed prior to the [American] revolution. n977

A later Wisconsin court elaborated on this chronological dividing point for common law statutory reception:

> The rule fixing the period of our revolution as the time from which the English statutes and acts of parliament shall be considered as part of the common law of this country, or that those statutes enacted before that time and which were adapted to our condition and circumstances as a people, shall be so considered, is a general one adopted for convenience merely, and which should govern in the generality of cases, but not one intended to apply always and to all cases or to all statutes which may have been so enacted, without regard to any other facts or circumstances. The fundamental idea represented by the rule and upon which it is based is, that those statutes which were so enacted and which were suited to the condition and circumstances of our colonial ancestors, had been received, acted upon and ratified by them as part of the jurisprudence and laws of the colonies before the separation from the mother country, and which, upon the separation, the colonists took with them as the still continuing law, except where subsequently repealed or modified by positive legislative enactment. This view of the reasons and grounds of the rule would seem to exclude the statute in question from it, since the same was enacted on the very eve of the revolution, and at a time when we know our ancestors, in their colonial state, could not have become familiar with, or have ratified or adopted it, and at a time, too, when, as history shows, all or nearly all respect for British sovereignty and British laws or acts of parliament then being passed, was well nigh extinct throughout the colonies. That our ancestors did not, and could not have adopted and acted upon this statute as part of their laws, before their independence, is, therefore very certain. n978

More recent Wisconsin cases have reaffirmed this position, n979 although one case has fixed the common law reception as of the "time of the State Constitution." n980

To a large extent, questions concerning common law reception for property issues has been mooted by extensive legislation on interests in property. Major chapters in the Wisconsin statutes deal with interests in property, trusts, powers of appointment, condominiums, landlord and tenant, multiple-party and agency accounts, conveyances of real property (including recording and titles), mortgages and land contracts, and other miscellaneous provisions. n981 In addition, Wisconsin has adopted the Uniform Marital Property Act, which effectively invokes a community property approach toward marital property. n982

§ 7.02(yy) Wyoming.

All but the southwestern fifth of Wyoming was included in the Louisiana Purchase. The governance of that minor portion originated variously with the annexation of Texas in 1845, the cession from Mexico in 1848, and in the Oregon territory. Part of Wyoming was included in the Utah-based "State of Deseret" beginning in 1849; part of it was in the Colorado-based "State of Jefferson" beginning in 1859, although Wyoming was officially part of Nebraska Territory beginning in 1854.

As part of the Louisiana Territory, Wyoming was hardly influenced by the common French and Spanish legal heritage belonging to that area, because of the absence of settlement before and for long after the Louisiana Purchase. French governance over the region ended with the arrival of a Spanish governor in 1769, and Spanish authority ended in 1803. Upon his assumption of office in 1769, the Spanish governor officially proclaimed the substitution of Spanish law for all prior laws in the area. n983

When the new American governor arrived in New Orleans in 1804, he created a "court of common pleas" with proceedings in English, signifying an abrupt transition into an American common law system. Reacting to local protest, Congress later in that same year separated the area of Louisiana state, called the Territory of Orleans, from the rest of the Louisiana territory, designating the remainder as the District of Louisiana and placing it administratively under the Territory of Indiana. n984 Existing law was continued in force for the District of Louisiana: "The laws in force in the said district of Louisiana, at the commencement of this act, and not inconsistent with any of the provisions thereof, shall continue in force until altered, modified or repealed by the governor and judges of the Indiana territory, as aforesaid." n985

The Indiana territorial government enacted certain laws of the new territory between 1804 and 1805, all of them with pronounced common law flavor, and in 1806 Congress established a separate administration for the area, redesignating it the Territory of Louisiana. Statutes enacted after this change also covered familiar common law subjects. In 1812 the Territory of Louisiana was granted the right to its own legislative assembly, and its name was changed to the Territory of Missouri. A territorial enactment in 1815 authorized the recording of land titles acquired during the period of Spanish government, but in 1816 the territorial legislature adopted a broad common law reception statute:

> The common law of England, which is of a general nature, and all statutes made by the British parliament in aid of or to supply the defects of the said common law, made prior to the fourth year of James the first, and of a general nature, and not local to that kingdom, which said common law and statutes are not contrary to the laws of this territory, and not repugnant to, nor inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States shall be the rule of decision in this territory, until altered or repealed by the legislature, any law, usage, custom to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, however, that none of the British statutes respecting crimes and punishments shall be in force in this territory, nor shall any person be punished by common law, where the laws and statutes of this territory have made provision on the subject, but where the laws and statutes of the United States and this territory have not made provision for the punishment of offences, the several courts may proceed to punish for such offences, provided, the punishment shall in no case be other than fine and imprisonment, and the term of imprisonment shall not exceed two months; and the fine shall not exceed one hundred dollars. n986

A companion provision to this general common law reception statute indicated certain real property common law doctrines that were excepted from this reception:

> The doctrine of survivorship in cases of joint tenants shall never be allowed, in this territory. The doctrine of entails shall never be allowed, and in all cases where any real estate shall be entailed, the whole of the right and interest of, in, and to the same, shall vest in fee simple in the person having the first reversion or remainder in said estate, after the life estate is determined in said estate. n987

When the State of Missouri was formed in 1821, no actual governmental authority applied to the Louisiana Purchase territory north of Missouri, including Wyoming, until 1834, when Congress attached it to the Territory of Michigan. n988

In 1854 all of Wyoming was included in the newly-designated Nebraska Territory. In the territorial enabling act, n989 no explicit common law reception was mentioned. However, it was provided that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common law jurisdiction," n990 and federal law, except for the 1820 Missouri Compromise legislation, was declared applicable in the new territory. n991 Thereafter, in its first session, the Nebraska territorial legislature enacted a common law reception provision:

> That so much of the common law of England as is applicable and not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, with the organic law of this Territory, or with any law passed or to be passed by the Legislature of this Territory be and the same is adopted and declared to be law within said Territory. n992

In 1863, Wyoming was made part of the Dakota Territory. n993 The territorial enabling act had no provision for continuing prior laws in force, but did decree that the territorial supreme and district courts "shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction." n994 In the territorial legislation thereafter only a slight acknowledgement of common law reception was made in the provision that "In this Territory there is no common law in any case where the law is declared by the Codes." n995

While Wyoming was part of Dakota territory, it was shuttled into the Idaho territory for one year, 1863-1864. Idaho, which had attained territorial status in March, 1863,90 n996 had in its enabling act no provision for continuing previous laws in force or explicitly receiving the common law. The only provision in this organic act pertinent to reception was the declaration that "the said supreme and district courts, respectively, shall possess chancery as well as common-law jurisdiction." n997 With no organic provision for reception, the Idaho legislature the next year, while Wyoming was still part of the territory, enacted a statutory common law reception provision, very similar to Washington's, and which continues in the current Idaho code:

> The common law of England, so far as it is not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the constitution or laws of the United States, in all cases not provided for in these compiled laws, is the rule of decision in all courts of this state. n998

In 1864, after enactment of this Idaho territorial provision, Wyoming was re-assigned to the Nebraska Territory, and then organized as the Territory of Wyoming in 1868. n999 The enabling act, in addition to confirming the "chancery as well as common law jurisdiction" of the territorial supreme and district courts, n1000 placed the current laws of Dakota Territory in force in Wyoming:

> That all general territorial laws of the Territory of Dakota in force in any portion of said Territory of Wyoming at the time this act shall take effect shall be and continue in force throughout the said Territory until repealed by the legislative authority of said Territory, except such laws as relate to the possession or occupation of mines or mining claims. n1001

The next year, in 1869, the Wyoming territorial legislature enacted a traditional common law reception statute, the current version of which is as follows:

> The common law of England as modified by judicial decisions, so far as the same is of a general nature and not inapplicable, and all declaratory or remedial acts or statutes made in aid of, or to supply the defects of the common law prior to the fourth year of James the First (excepting the second section of the sixth chapter of forty-third Elizabeth, the eighth chapter of thirteenth Elizabeth and ninth chapter of thirty-seventh Henry Eighth) and which are of a general nature and not local to England, are the rule of decision in this state when not inconsistent with the laws thereof, and are considered as of full force until repealed by legislative authority. n1002

When Wyoming was authorized for statehood in 1889, the enabling act continued in force existing territorial laws: "all laws in force made by said Territory, at the time of its admission into the Union, until amended or repealed, shall be in force in said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State... n1003

Wyoming's constitution of 1889 also continued territorial laws in force, with a provision that is still current: "All laws now in force in the Territory of Wyoming, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or be altered or repealed by the legislature." n1004

Wyoming courts have delivered an unusually generous commentary on various aspects of common law reception in the state. However, probably the earliest full judicial discussion of Wyoming's reception statute was issued by the Supreme Court of Utah. Following a lengthy discussion of authorities, the Utah Supreme Court concluded in 1904 that:

> the phrase "common law of England," as used in section 2695 of the Wyoming Revised Statutes of 1899, was not intended and does not include the judicial decisions of England upon the subject rendered subsequently to the independence of America. But, notwithstanding such decisions are not a part of the common law adopted by the state of Wyoming, and are not, therefore, binding upon the courts of that state, yet, as evidence of what the common law, as so adopted, is, they are entitled to respect, and in particular cases may properly be regarded as conclusive. n1005

The Wyoming Supreme Court has adopted a pragmatic attitude toward the state's reception statute:

> [A]lthough W.S. 8-1-101 adopts the common law as the law of this state, we have held that we will recognize the common law as modified by judicial decisions and will adopt that interpretation which seems best... Moreover, we have previously expressed a reluctance to recognize, or continue a recognition of, a common law rule that had its genesis in a social, economic and political climate entirely foreign to Wyoming in current times. n1006 The common law is not exactly the common law of 1607. Many, and probably most of the rules of the common law of 1607, aside from equitable rules and aside from fundamental maxims, have been modified by judicial decisions. And that is true with the rule under discussion. Our statute ... does not state what are the judicial decisions to which reference is made. However, it is, and has been, the constant practice of courts in common law jurisdictions to freely cite cases from other common-law courts, and we take it that the legislature had in mind the judicial decisions of all of the various jurisdictions. The cases may differ; one court may take one view, another another. Hence we cannot consider these various decisions as the law in this state, but as interpretations of the common law, and we are at liberty to adopt that interpretation which seems to be the best. n1007
>
> The adoption of common law by Wyoming was not an adoption of a set code of law. By nature, the common law is not a set code of law. Nor was the adoption one of static and nonchanging law...
>
> With reference to the ... statute, we have said that:
>
> > "[W]e must decide this case in accordance with the decisions subsequent to the time of James I, in so far as not inconsistent with the laws of this state, and the decision which must govern us, to the extent mentioned, are not only the English decisions..., but other decisions as well, comparatively recent though they may be, and we are at liberty to follow any of them, or rest our decision upon the fundamental principle underlying all of them...." Johnston v. Laird, 48 Wyo. 532, 538, 52 P.2d 1219, 1220 (1935) . n1008

In adopting a particular construction of the rule in Shelley's Case, the Wyoming Supreme Court adopted the English approach, "and we view it as the correct approach, notwithstanding the fact that there is respectable American authority to the contrary." n1009

FOOTNOTES:

(n1)Footnote 2. "And be it further enacted, That all offices which may exist, and all laws which may be in force, in said territory, within the boundaries above described, at the time this act shall go into effect, shall continue to exist, and be in force, until otherwise provided by law." An act to Establish a separate territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory, Ch. LIX, § 2, 3 Stat. 371 (1817).

(n2)Footnote 3. Act of April 7, 1798, Chap. XXVIII, § 6, 1 Stat. 549-550 (1798).

(n3)Footnote 4. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n4)Footnote 5. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, §§ 4, 5 (1787), published as a footnote in 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n5)Footnote 6. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n6)Footnote 7. Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212 (1845) .

(n7)Footnote 8. Statutes of Mississippi Territory, Ch. V, § 4 (1807).

(n8)Footnote 9. Ch. XLVII, § 5 (1819).

(n9)Footnote 10. Alabama Constitution of 1819, Schedule, § 5.

(n10)Footnote 11. Ala. Code § 1-3-1.

(n11)Footnote 12. Ex Parte H.H., 830 So. 2d 21, 33 (Ala. 2002) (special concurrence of Chief Justice Moore); Weaver v. G. D. Searle & Co., 558 F. Supp. 720 (N.D. Ala. 1983) ; Swartz v. United States Steel Corp., 304 So. 2d 881 (Ala. 1974) ; Swanner v. United States, 275 F. Supp. 1007 (M.D. Ala. 1967) ; Hollis v. Crittenden, 37 So. 2d 193 (Ala. 1948) .

Romaine S. Scott III, The Title Question: Do Bankruptcy Courts Have Jurisdiction Over Mortgaged Alabama Real Property?, 45 Ala. Law. 248 (1984).

(n12)Footnote 13. Nelson v. McCrary, 60 Ala. 301 (1877) ; Clark v. Goddard, 39 Ala. 164 (1863) ; Carter v. Balfour, 19 Ala. 814 (1851) .

(n13)Footnote 14. Smith v. United Constr. Workers, Dist. 50, 122 So. 2d 153 (Ala. 1960) .

(n14)Footnote 15. Beasley v. MacDonald Eng'g Co., 249 So. 2d 844 (Ala. 1971) .

(n15)Footnote 16. Nottingham v. C. H. & B., Inc., 522 So. 2d 777 (Ala. 1988) .

(n16)Footnote 17. 1 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 159-168 (1973).

(n17)Footnote 18. Ch. 53, 23 Stat. 24.

(n18)Footnote 19. Ch. 786, 31 Stat. 321, § 367.

(n19)Footnote 20. Ch. 387, 37 Stat. 512, § 3 (1912).

(n20)Footnote 21. Alaska Stat. § 01.10.010.

(n21)Footnote 22. Valentine v. Roberts, 1 Alaska 536 (1902) .

(n22)Footnote 23. Howarth v. Pfeifer, 443 P.2d 39 (Alaska 1968) . James R. Pomeranz, Note, The State of Caveat

Emptor in Alaska as it Applies to Real Property, 13 Alaska L. Rev. 237 (1996); Donald Craig Mitchell, Alaska v. Native Village of Venetie: Statutory Construction or Judicial Usurpation? Why History Counts, 14 Alaska L. Rev. (1997).

(n23)Footnote 24. Territorial Act of 1850, § 17.

(n24)Footnote 25. Territorial Act of 1850, § 10.

(n25)Footnote 26. Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 1 N.M. (1 Gild.) 34 (1853), aff'd, 61 U.S. 176 (1857) .

(n26)Footnote 27. Federal Territorial Act, § 2, 12 Stat. 664 (1850).

(n27)Footnote 28. Arizona Draft Constitution of 1891, art. XXII, § 3.

(n28)Footnote 29. Arizona Constitution, art. XXII, § 2.

(n29)Footnote 30. The rejection of Hispanic law was explicit:

> All laws, customs, ordinances, and decrees of the Mexican Republic; all laws, customs, ordinances, and decrees of the kingdom of Spain; and all legislative enactments of the Territory of New Mexico, now or heretofore in force in this Territory, are hereby repealed...

Ariz. Comp. Laws, Ch. 61, § 1.

(n30)Footnote 31. Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 1-201.

(n31)Footnote 32. Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. §12-122.

(n32)Footnote 33. John W. Masury & Son v. Bisbee Lumber Co., 68 P.2d 679 (Ariz. 1937) . See also Patterson v. Connolly, 77 P.2d 813 (Ariz. 1938) (declaring that the common law of Arizona includes the English common law as amended by statute down to the time the union between the colonies and England was severed). See Sherry Hutt and C. Timothy McKeown, Control of Cultural Property as Human Rights Law, 31 Ariz. St. L.J. 363 (Summer 1999). See also Emily Sherwin, Two- and Three-Dimensional Property Rights, 29 Ariz. St. L.J. 1075 (Winter 1997). M. June Harris, Who Owns the Pot of Gold at the End of the Rainbow? A Review of the Impact of Cultural Property on Finders and Salvage Laws, 14 Ariz. J. Int'l & Comp. Law 223 (1997); Rebecca Tsosie, Privileging Claims to the Past: Ancient Human Remains and Contemporary Cultural Values, 31 Ariz. St. L.J. 583 (1999).

(n33)Footnote 34. Pendleton v. Brown, 221 P. 213 (Ariz. 1923) .

(n34)Footnote 35. Boquillas Land & Cattle Co. v. Curtis, 89 P. 504 (Ariz. 1907) ; Boquillas Land & Cattle Co. v. Curtis, 213 U.S. 339 (1909) .

(n35)Footnote 36. Austin v. Chandler, 42 P. 483 (Ariz. 1895) .

(n36)Footnote 37. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n37)Footnote 38. 2 Stat. 283 (1804).

(n38)Footnote 39. 2 Stat. 13 (1804).

(n39)Footnote 40. 1 Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1 (1842).

(n40)Footnote 41. 1 Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 2 (1842).

(n41)Footnote 42. 3 Stat. 419.

(n42)Footnote 43. 3 Stat. § 10.

(n43)Footnote 44. Arkansas Constitution of 1836, Schedule, § 2.

(n44)Footnote 45. Arkansas Constitution, Schedule, § 1.

(n45)Footnote 46. Ark. Code Ann. § 1-2-119. See Moore v. Sharpe, 91 Ark. 407, 121 S.W. 341 (Ark. 1909) .

(n46)Footnote 47. Ark. Code Ann. § 16-13-201.

(n47)Footnote 48. Ark. Code Ann. § 18-14-104(a).

(n48)Footnote 49. Horsley v. Hilburn, 44 Ark. 458 (1884) ; First Nat'l Bank v. Graham, 113 S.W.2d 497 (Ark. 1938) . Anthony W. Juneau, Survey of Legislation: Title 18-Property Law, 26 U. Ark. Little Rock L. Rev. 459 (Winter, 2004) (the 2003 state legislature abolished the use of Shelley's Rule in Arkansas courts).

(n49)Footnote 50. Stewart v. Tucker, 208 Ark. 612, 188 S.W.2d 125 (Ark. 1945) .

(n50)Footnote 51. Smith v. Wright, 779 S.W.2d 177 (Ark. 1989) ; Meadows v. State, 722 S.W.2d 584 (Ark. 1987) . Stephen J. Maddex, Case Note, Propst v. McNeill: Arkansas Landlord-Tenant Law, A Time for Change, 51 Ark. L. Rev. 575 (1998).

(n51)Footnote 52. California Constitution of 1849, Schedule, § 1. Myra K. Saunders, California Legal History: The California Constitution of 1849, 90 Law Libr. J. 447 (1998); Paul J. Boudreaux, The Quintessential Best Case for "Takings" Compensation--A Pragmatic Approach to Identifying the Elements of Land-Use Regulations That Present the Best Case for Government Compensation, 34 San Diego L. Rev. 193 (1997).

(n52)Footnote 53. California Constitution, art. XXII, § 1. Susan F. French, Toward A Modern Law of Servitudes: Reweaving the Ancient Strands, 55 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1261 (1982).

(n53)Footnote 54. Laws of California, Ch. 95.

(n54)Footnote 55. Cal. Civ. Code § 22.2. David Dudley, The Civil Law and Field's Civil Code in Common-Law California Note on What Might Have Been, 5(1) W. Legal Hist. 13 (1992).

(n55)Footnote 56. Ferguson v. Keays, 484 P.2d 70 (Cal. 1971) ; Reed v. Eldredge, 27 Cal. 346 (1865) .

(n56)Footnote 57. Lux v. Haggin, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674 (Cal. 1886) .

(n57)Footnote 58. Lux v. Haggin, 4 P. 919, 10 P. 674 (Cal. 1886) .

(n58)Footnote 59. Ferguson v. Keays, 484 P.2d 70 (Cal. 1971) .

(n59)Footnote 60. In re Fair, 60 P. 442, 64 P. 1000 (Cal. 1901) .

(n60)Footnote 61. Moore v. Purse Seine Net, 118 P.2d 1 (Cal. 1941) ; Martin v. Superior Ct., 168 P. 135 (Cal. 1917) .

(n61)Footnote 62. Martin v. Superior Ct., 168 P. 135 (Cal. 1917) .

(n62)Footnote 63. Strong v. Shatto, 187 P. 159 (Cal. 1919) .

(n63)Footnote 64. Chow v. Santa Barbara, 22 P.2d 5 (Cal. 1933) . See Mark T. Kanazawa, Efficiency in Western Water Law: The Development of the California Doctrine, 18501911, 7 J. Legal Stud. 159 (1998); Michael Graf, Using the Public Trust Doctrine to Achieve Proportionate Reductions of Water Diversions from the Delta, 13 Ucla J. Envtl. L. & Pol'y 263 (1995) .

(n64)Footnote 65. Chandler v. Chandler, 55 Cal. 267 (1880) .

(n65)Footnote 66. Tennant v. Tennant (John) Mem. Home, 140 P. 242 (Cal. 1914) .

(n66)Footnote 67. Katz v. Walkinshaw, 70 P. 663, 74 P. 766 (Cal. 1903) .

(n67)Footnote 68. Lund Estate, 159 P.2d 643 (Cal. 1945) . Susan E. Dalton, Article: From Presumed Fathers to Lesbian Mothers: Sex Discrimination and the Legal Construction of Parenthood, 9 Michigan Journal of Gender & Law 261 (2003) (Article criticizes the traditional legal status afforded parents in light of societal changes).

(n68)Footnote 69. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n69)Footnote 70. 2 Stat. 283.

(n70)Footnote 71. 2 Stat. 13.

(n71)Footnote 72. 1 Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1 (1842).

(n72)Footnote 73. 1 Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 2 (1842).

(n73)Footnote 74. Kansas-Nebraska Act, § 27, 10 Stat. 277, 283.

(n74)Footnote 75. Kansas-Nebraska Act, § 32, 10 Stat. 277, 283.

(n75)Footnote 76. Kan. Terr. Stat., Ch. 96, § 1.

(n76)Footnote 77. Colo. Terr. Laws 35.

(n77)Footnote 78. Colo. Rev. Stat. § 2-4-211.

(n78)Footnote 79. Colorado Constitution of 1876, Schedule, § 1.

(n79)Footnote 80. Colorado Constitution, Schedule, § 1.

(n80)Footnote 81. People ex rel. Att'y Gen. v. News-Times Pub'g Co., 84 P. 912 (Colo. 1906) , appeal dismissed, 205 U.S. 454 (1907) .

(n81)Footnote 82. Perry v. Brundage, 614 P.2d 362 (Colo. 1980) ; Malouff v. Midland Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 509 P.2d 1240 (Colo. 1973) .

(n82)Footnote 83. But see The Code of 1650: Being A Compilation of The Earliest Laws & Orders of the General Court of Connecticut (1998, Reprint Ed.).

(n83)Footnote 84. The Earliest Laws of the New Haven and Connecticut Colonies, 1639-1673 13-14 (John D. Cushing ed. 1977).

(n84)Footnote 85. The Earliest Laws of the New Haven and Connecticut Colonies, 1639-1673 65-70 (John D. Cushing Ed. 1977).

(n85)Footnote 86. The Earliest Laws of the New Haven and Connecticut Colonies, 1639-1673 75 (John D. Cushing Ed. 1977).

(n86)Footnote 87. The Earliest Laws of the New Haven and Connecticut Colonies, 1639-1673 112 (John D. Cushing Ed. 1977).

(n87)Footnote 88. 2 Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 137 (William F. Swindler ed. 1973).

(n88)Footnote 89. Address to the King, June 13, 1689, 2 Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 138-141 (William F. Swindler ed. 1973).

(N89)Footnote 90. Constitutional Ordinance of 1776, Address to the King, June 13, 1689, 2 Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 143 (William F. Swindler ed. 1973).

(n90)Footnote 91. Baldwin v. Walker, 21 Conn. 168, 181 (1851) .

(n91)Footnote 92. Bassett v. City Bank & Trust Co., 161 A. 852 (Conn. 1932) .

(n92)Footnote 93. The Earliest Printed Laws of New York 1665-1693 148 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n93)Footnote 94. The Earliest Printed Laws of New York 1665-1693 148-149 (John D. Cushing ed. 1978).

(n94)Footnote 95. 2 Source and Documents of United States Constitutions 194 (William F. Swindler ed., 1973).

(n95)Footnote 96. 2 Source and Documents of United States Constitutions 53 (William F. Swindler ed., 1973).

(n96)Footnote 97. Delaware Constitution of 1776, art. 25, in 2 Source and Documents of United States Constitutions 203 (William F. Swindler ed., 1973).

(n97)Footnote 98. Delaware Constitution of 1792, art. VIII, § 10, in Delaware Constitution of 1776, art. 25, in 2 Source and Documents of United States Constitutions 214 (William F. Swindler ed., 1973).

(n98)Footnote 99. Delaware Constitution of 1831, art. VII, § 9.

(n99)Footnote 100. Delaware Constitution of 1897, Schedule, § 18.

(n100)Footnote 101. History of the D.C. Code, 1District of Columbia Code 1-2 (1981 ed.).

(n101)Footnote 102. History of the D.C. Code, 1District of Columbia Code 4 (1981 ed.).

(n102)Footnote 103. 18 Stat. 1-149 (Part 2).

(n103)Footnote 104. 18 Stat. 2 (Part 2).

(n104)Footnote 105. 18 Stat. 149 (Part 2).

(n105)Footnote 106. 18 Stat. 9 (Part 2).

(n106)Footnote 107. History of the D.C. Code, 1District of Columbia Code 12 (1981 ed.).

(n107)Footnote 108. D.C. Code Ann. § 49-301. Little v. United States, 709 A.2d 708 (D.C. 1998) (Common law of District of Columbia encompasses all common law in force in Maryland in 1801, unless expressly repealed or modified; this is a criminal case).

(n108)Footnote 109. J. Randall T. Shepard, Land Use Regulation in the Rehnquist Court: The Fifth Amendment and Judicial Intervention, 38 Cath. U.L. Rev. 847 (1989).

(n109)Footnote 110. In re Lee's Estate, 80 F. Supp. 293 (D.D.C. 1948) . Herman Schwartz, Property Rights and the Constitution: Will the Ugly Duckling Become a Swan?, 37 Am. U.L. Rev. 9 (1987).

(n110)Footnote 111. Cunningham v. Rodgers, 267 F. 609 (D.C. Cir. 1920) , aff'd, 257 U.S. 466 (1922) .

(n111)Footnote 112. Baltimore & Ohio R.R. v. Thomas, 37 App. D.C. 255 (1911) .

(n112)Footnote 113. Treaty of Amity, Settlement and Limits, 8, 8 Stat. 252 (1819).

(n113)Footnote 114. 3 Stat. 654.

(n114)Footnote 115. 3 Stat. 13.

(n115)Footnote 116. John P. Duval, Compilation of the Public Acts of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, Passed Prior to 1840 5, 45 (1839).

(n116)Footnote 117. John P. Duval, Compilation of the Public Acts of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, Passed Prior to 1840 at 80, 85, 128, 140, 154, 168, 197, 202 (1839).

(n117)Footnote 118. John P. Duval, Compilation of the Public Acts of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida, Passed Prior to 1840, Act of November 6, 1829 (1839).

(n118)Footnote 119. Florida Constitution of 1838, art. XVI, § 6.

(n119)Footnote 120. Florida Constitution of 1838, art. XVII, § 1.

(n120)Footnote 121. Florida Constitution of 1865, art. XVI, § 6; art. XVII, § 1.

(n121)Footnote 122. Florida Constitution of 1868, art. XVI, §§ 1, 2.

(n122)Footnote 123. Florida Constitution of 1885, art. XVIII, § 2.

(n123)Footnote 124. Florida Constitution, art. XII, Schedule, § 6(a).

(n124)Footnote 125. Fla. Stat. Ann. § 2.01.

(n125)Footnote 126. First Nat'l Bank of Leersburg v. Hector Supply Co., 254 So. 2d 777 (Fla.) , mandate conformed to, 257 So. 2d 83 (Fla. 1971) . Susan N. Gary, Marital Partnership Theory and the Elective Share: Federal Estate Tax Law Provides a Solution, 49 U. Miami L. Rev. 567 (1995).

(n126)Footnote 127. Davis v. Geyer, 9 So. 2d 727 (Fla. 1942) .

(n127)Footnote 128. Reid v. Barry, 112 So. 846 (Fla. 1927) .

(n128)Footnote 129. Sylvia R. Lazos Vargas, Florida's Property Rights Act: A Political Quick Fix Results in a Mixed Bag of Tricks, 23 Fla. St. U.L. Rev. 315 (1995).

(n129)Footnote 130. Jonathan D. Colan, Comment, You Can't Take That Away from Me: The Sanctity of the Homestead Property Right and Its Effect on Civil Forfeiture of the Home, 49 U. Miami L. Rev. 159 (1994); Ronald A. Christaldi, Comment, Sharing the Cup: A Proposal for the Allocation of Florida's Water Resources, 23 Fla. St. U.L. Rev. 1063 (1996).

(n130)Footnote 131. 1 Fla. Stat. Ann. §§ 14 - 24.

(n131)Footnote 132. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 77 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n132)Footnote 133. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 78 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n133)Footnote 134. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 80 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n134)Footnote 135. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 242 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n135)Footnote 136. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 243 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n136)Footnote 137. Georgia Constitution of 1777, [Preamble] in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 444 (1973). Alan Watson, The Transformation of American Property Law: A Comparative Law Approach, 24 Ga. L. Rev. 163 (1990).

(n137)Footnote 138. Georgia Constitution of 1777, art. VII, in William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 445 (1973).

(n138)Footnote 139. 2 Allen E. Candler, The Colonial Records of Georgia 290-292 (1911). This act was styled as "An Act for reviving and enforcing certain laws therein mentioned and adopting the common law of England as they existed on May 14, 1776," and was approved on February 25, 1784. The act has survived all Georgia recodifications and is specifically preserved in Georgia's current code, Official Code of Georgia Annotated (O.C.G.A.) 1-1-10(c)(1).

(n139)Footnote 140. Georgia Constitution of 1789, art. I, § 16, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 453 (1973).

(n140)Footnote 141. Georgia Constitution of 1798, art. I, § 22, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 460 (1973).

(n141)Footnote 142. Georgia Constitution of 1865, art. II, § 5, P I, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 491 (1973).

(n142)Footnote 143. Georgia Constitution of 1865, art. V, § 1, P V, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 495 (1973).

(n143)Footnote 144. Georgia Constitution of 1868, art. III, § 5, P I, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 503 (1973).

(n144)Footnote 145. Georgia Constitution of 1868, art. XI P III, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 511 (1973).

(n145)Footnote 146. Georgia Constitution of 1877, art. III, § VII, P XXII, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 524 (1973).

(n146)Footnote 147. Georgia Constitution of 1877, art. XII, § I, PP I-III, in 2 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 544 (1973).

(n147)Footnote 148. Georgia Constitution of 1945, art. XII, § I, P III.

(n148)Footnote 149. Doe dem. Patterson v. Winn, 30 U.S. 233 (1831) .

(n149)Footnote 150. Robert & Wife v. West & Reid, Trustees, 15 Ga. 122 (1854) . See also Grimmett v. Barnwell, 192 S.E. 191 (Ga. 1937) . See T. Daniel Brannan and William J. Sheppard, Survey Article: Real Property, 51 Mercer L. Rev. 441 (Fall 1999).

(n150)Footnote 151. See Walter F. Frear, Hawaiian Statute Law, Address to the Hawaiian Historical Society at its Annual Meeting (January 22, 1906) 15-42. Mari J. Matsuda, Law and Culture in the District Court of Honolulu, 32 Am. J. Legal Hist. 16 (1988); Calvin G. C. Pang, Slow-Baked, Flash-Fried, Not to be Devoured: Development of the Partnership Model of Property Division in Hawai'i and Beyond, 20 Hawaii L. Rev. 1 (1998) .

(n151)Footnote 152. Walter F. Frear, Hawaiian Statute Law, Address to the Hawaiian Historical Society at its Annual Meeting (January 22, 1906) 25.

(n152)Footnote 153. Hawaii Constitution of 1840, in 3 William F. Swindler, Source and Documents of United States Constitutions 15 (1974); The Fundamental Law of Hawaii 1 (Lorrin A. Thurston ed. 1904).

(n153)Footnote 154. Hawaii Constitution of 1852, art. 103.

(n154)Footnote 155. Hawaii Constitution of 1864, art. 78.

(n155)Footnote 156. Hawaii Constitution of 1887, art. 79.

(n156)Footnote 157. The Fundamental Law of Hawaii 44, 71-72, 137-147 (Lorrin A. Thurston ed. 1904); Walter F. Frear, Hawaiian Statute Law, Address to the Hawaiian Historical Society at its Annual Meeting, (January 22, 1906) 49-50, 59. See also Isaac Moriwake, Comment, Critical Excavations: Law, Narrative, and the Debate on Native American and Hawaiian "Cultural Property" Repatriation, 20 Hawaii L. Rev. 261 (1998) .

(n157)Footnote 158. Hawaii Compiled Laws 823; Walter F. Frear, Hawaiian Statute Law, Address to the Hawaiian Historical Society at its Annual Meeting (January 22, 1906) 47.

(n158)Footnote 159. Laws of Hawaii, ch. 57, § 5 (1892).

(n159)Footnote 160. Haw. Rev. Stat. § 1-1.

(n160)Footnote 161. Hawaii Constitution of 1894, art. 92, § 1.

(n161)Footnote 162. Resolution of Annexation, 30 Stat. 750.

(n162)Footnote 163. Hawaii Territorial Act, §§ 6, 7, 31 Stat. 141.

(n163)Footnote 164. Id. § 83 .

(n164)Footnote 165. 3 William F. Swindler, Source and Documents of United States Constitutions 105 (1974); Daniel G. Mueller, Comment, The Reassertion of Native Hawaiian Gathering Rights Within the Context of Hawai'i's Western System of Land Tenure, 17 Hawaii L. Rev. 165 (1995) ; Gina M. Watumull, Comment, Pele Defense Fund v. Paty : Exacerbating the Inherent Conflict Between Hawaiian Native Tenant Access and Gathering Rights and Western Property Rights, 16 Hawaii L. Rev. 207 (1994) ; Douglas W. MacDougal, Private Hopes and Public Values in the "Reasonable Beneficial Use" of Hawaii's Water: Is Balance Possible?, 18 Hawaii L. Rev. 1 (1996) ; Kent D. Morihara, Comment, Hawai'i Constitution, Article XI, Section 1 : The Conservation, Protection, and Use of Natural Resources, 19 Hawaii L. Rev. 177 (1997) .

(n165)Footnote 166. Achiles v. Cajigal, 39 Haw. 493 (1952) ; Hawaiian Trust & Inv. Co. v. Barton, 16 Haw. 294 (1904) .

(n166)Footnote 167. In re Estate of Chun Quan Yee Hop, 469 P.2d 183 (Haw. 1970) .

(n167)Footnote 168. Hawaiian Trust & Inv. Co. v. Barton, 16 Haw. 294 (1904) .

(n168)Footnote 169. In the Matter of the Estate of Holt, 19 Haw. 78 (1908) .

(n169)Footnote 170. Rosenbledt v. Wodehouse, 25 Haw. 561 (1920) .

(n170)Footnote 171. De Freitas v. Coke, 380 P.2d 762 (Haw. 1963) .

(n171)Footnote 172. 8 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 193 (1979).

(n172)Footnote 173. 5 Stat. 235.

(n173)Footnote 174. 5 Stat. 12.

(n174)Footnote 175. 5 Stat. 10.

(n175)Footnote 176. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n176)Footnote 177. 5 Stat. 10 §§ 4, 5.

(n177)Footnote 178. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n178)Footnote 179. 2 Stat. 309.

(n179)Footnote 180. 9 Stat. 323.

(n180)Footnote 181. Id. § 6 .

(n181)Footnote 182. Id. § 14 .

(n182)Footnote 183. Id. § 17 .

(n183)Footnote 184. 10 Stat. 172.

(n184)Footnote 185. Id. § 6 .

(n185)Footnote 186. Id. § 12 .

(n186)Footnote 187. Wash. Terr. Laws p. 83, § 1.

(n187)Footnote 188. 12 Stat. 808.

(n188)Footnote 189. Id § 9 .

(n189)Footnote 190. Idaho Code § 73-116.

(n190)Footnote 191. 26 Stat. 215 (1890).

(n191)Footnote 192. Id. § 21 .

(n192)Footnote 193. Idaho Constitution, art. XXI, § 2.

(n193)Footnote 194. Locklear v. Tucker, 203 P.2d 380 (Idaho 1949) . See also Note: Dynasty Trusts and the Rule against Perpetuities, 116 Harv. L. Rev. 2588 (June, 2003) (examines the common law reception of the rule against perpetuities); T.P. Gallanis, Article: The Future of Future Interests, 60 Wash & Lee L. Rev. 513 (Spring, 2003) (similar).

(n194)Footnote 195. Idaho Code §§ 32-901 - 32-920.

(n195)Footnote 196. Drake v. Earhart, 23 P. 541 (Idaho 1890) .

(n196)Footnote 197. Northern Pac. Ry. v. Hirzel, 161 P. 854 (Idaho 1916) .

(n197)Footnote 198. 161 P.2d at 858.

(n198)Footnote 199. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 552 (1823).

(n199)Footnote 200. Id.

(n200)Footnote 201. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n201)Footnote 202. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n202)Footnote 203. Id. §§ 4 , 5.

(n203)Footnote 204. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n204)Footnote 205. 2 Stat. 58.

(n205)Footnote 206. Id. § 2 .

(n206)Footnote 207. Indiana Terr. Laws, Ch. 24.

(n207)Footnote 208. 3 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 229 (1974).

(n208)Footnote 209. 2 Stat. 514.

(n209)Footnote 210. Id. § 2 .

(n210)Footnote 211. 3 Stat. 428.

(n211)Footnote 212. Id. § 4 .

(n212)Footnote 213. Illinois Constitution of 1818, Schedule, § 1. Substantively similar provisions were included in the Illinois Constitution of 1848, Schedule, § 1; and in the Illinois Constitution of 1870, Schedule, 1; and is included in the current Illinois Constitution, Transition Schedule, § 9.

(n213)Footnote 214. Ill. Ann. Stat. ch. 1, P 801.

(n214)Footnote 215. John Edward Cribbet, Concepts in Transition: The Search for a New Definition of Property, 1986 U. Ill. L. Rev. 1 (1986); George M. Armstrong, Jr., From the Fetishism of Commodities to the Regulated Market: The Rise and Decline of Property, 82 Nw. U.L. Rev. 79 (1987).

(n215)Footnote 216. Minonk State Bank v. Grassman, 432 N.E.2d 386 (Ill. App.) , aff'd, 447 N.E.2d 822 (Ill. 1982) .

(n216)Footnote 217. Lee v. City of Pontiac, 426 N.E.2d 300 (Ill. 1981) .

(n217)Footnote 218. Ill. Stat. Ann. ch. 30, PP 191-196. Teachers Ins. and Annuity Ass'n of America v. La Salle Nat'l Bank, 691 N.E.2d 881 (Ill. App. 1998) (legislature has inherent power to repeal or change common law and may do away with all or part of it).

(n218)Footnote 219. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n219)Footnote 220. Id. §§ 4, 5.

(n220)Footnote 221. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823). See also Ray F. Bowman III, English Common Law and Indiana Jurisprudence, 30 Ind. L. Rev. 409 (1997).

(n221)Footnote 222. 2 Stat. 58.

(n222)Footnote 223. Id. § 2.

(n223)Footnote 224. Indiana Terr. Laws, Ch. 24. Ray F. Bowman III, English Common Law and Indiana Jurisprudence, 30 Ind. L. Rev. 413 (1997).

(n224)Footnote 225. See especially the Land Act, 2 Stat. 73 (1800), and the Disposal of Lands in the Indiana Territory, 2 Stat. 277 (1804). Sarah Harding, Justifying Repatriation of Native American Cultural Property, 72 Ind. L.J. 723 (1997).

(n225)Footnote 226. 3 Stat. 289.

(n226)Footnote 227. Id. § 4.

(n227)Footnote 228. Indiana Constitution of 1816, art. XII, § 4.

(n228)Footnote 229. Indiana Constitution of 1851, Schedule, § 1.

(n229)Footnote 230. Ind. Code Ann. § 1-1-2-1.

(n230)Footnote 231. Morton v. Merrillville Toyota, Inc., 562 N.E.2d 781 (Ind. App. 1990) . William A. Reppy, Jr., Judicial Overkill in Applying the Rule in Shelly's Case, 73 Notre Dame L. Rev. 83 (1997) .

(n231)Footnote 232. Ketelson v. Stilz, 111 N.E. 423, 424-425 (Ind. 1916) . See generally Ray F. Bowman III, English Common Law and Indiana Jurisprudence, 30 Ind. L. Rev. 415 (1997).

(n232)Footnote 233. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Finkelstein, 8 N.E.2d 598 (Ind. 1937) . See Joseph C. Bowman and Michael A. Dorelli, Recent Developments in Property Law. 32 Ind. L. Rev. 973 (1999) .

(n233)Footnote 234. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n234)Footnote 235. 2 Stat. 283.

(n235)Footnote 236. Id. § 13.

(n236)Footnote 237. 1 Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1 (1842).

(n237)Footnote 238. Id. § 2.

(n238)Footnote 239. 4 Stat. 701.

(n239)Footnote 240. 5 Stat. 10.

(n240)Footnote 241. Id. § 12.

(n241)Footnote 242. 5 Stat. 235.

(n242)Footnote 243. Id. § 12.

(n243)Footnote 244. Id. § 9.

(n244)Footnote 245. Iowa Terr. Laws, Special Session, Ch. 29.

(n245)Footnote 246. 5 Stat. 742 (1845). Iowa's actual admission to the union was accomplished by the Act of Admission, 9 Stat. 117 (1846).

(n246)Footnote 247. Iowa Constitution of 1846, art. XII, § 2.

(n247)Footnote 248. Iowa Constitution of 1857, art. XII, § 2.

(n248)Footnote 249. O'Ferrall v. Simplot, 4 Iowa 381, 399-402 (1857) .

(n249)Footnote 250. In re Proestler's Will, 5 N.W.2d 922 (Iowa 1942) .

(n250)Footnote 251. Pierson v. Lane, 14 N.W. 90 (Iowa 1882) (the Statute De Donis Conditionalibus rejected because its purpose was to restrain alienation, contrary to Iowa policy).

(n251)Footnote 252. See generally Paul E. Wilson, How the Law Came to Kansas, 63 J. Kan. B.A. 26 (1993).

(n252)Footnote 253. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n253)Footnote 254. 2 Stat. 283.

(n254)Footnote 255. Id. § 13. Michael J. Davis, Survey of Kansas Law: Real Property, 41 Kan. L. Rev. 669 (1993) .

(n255)Footnote 256. 1 Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1 (1842).

(n256)Footnote 257. Id. § 2.

(n257)Footnote 258. Kansas-Nebraska Act, § 27, 10 Stat. 277, 283.

(n258)Footnote 259. Id. § 32.

(n259)Footnote 260. Kan. Terr. Stat., Ch. 96, § 1.

(n260)Footnote 261. Kan. Laws 678.

(n261)Footnote 262. 12 Stat. 126.

(n262)Footnote 263. Kansas Constitution of 1859, Schedule, § 4.

(n263)Footnote 264. Kan. Stat. Ann. § 77-109.

(n264)Footnote 265. Kan. Stat. Ann. §§ 58-501 - 58-506.

(n265)Footnote 266. Act of December 6, 1776, 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 257 (1823). Elizabeth K. Rouse, Kentucky Law Survey: Mineral Law, 72 Ky. L.J. 437 (1983). Frances E. Catron, Kentucky Law Survey: Wills, Probate, and Real Property Law, 71 Ky. L.J. 333 (1983) . Carolyn S. Bratt, Kentucky Law Survey: Property, 73 Ky. L.J. 459 (1984).

(n266)Footnote 267. Article VII, Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, in 1 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 60-61 (1823).

(n267)Footnote 268. Article XV, Letters Patent to Sir Thomas Gates et al., April 10, 1606, in 1 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 64 (1823).

(n268)Footnote 269. "Articles, Instructions and Orders," etc., Nov. 20, 1606, in 1 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 68 (1823).

(n269)Footnote 270. "Articles, Instructions and Orders," etc., Nov. 20, 1606, in 1 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 69 (1823).

(n270)Footnote 271. Article IV, The Second Charter to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, in 1 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 88 (1823).

(n271)Footnote 272. Article VI, The Second Charter to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, in 1 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 89 (1823).

(n272)Footnote 273. Article XXVII, The Second Charter to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, in 1 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 97 (1823).

(n273)Footnote 274. Article IV, A Third Charter of K. James I. to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, in William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 101 (1823).

(n274)Footnote 275. Article XXI, A Third Charter of K. James I. to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, in William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 109 (1823).

(n275)Footnote 276. Article XX, A Third Charter of K. James I. to the Treasurer and Company, for Virginia, in William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 109 (1823).

(n276)Footnote 277. Preamble, 1661-1662, vol. 2, 43.

(n277)Footnote 278. Act XX, Virginia Assembly of 1666, in 2 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large,

Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 246 (1823).

(n278)Footnote 279. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n279)Footnote 280. Act of October 1785, in 12 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 37 (1823).

(n280)Footnote 281. Id. at P II.

(n281)Footnote 282. Act of October 16, 1786, in 12 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 240 (1823).

(n282)Footnote 283. Act of December 29, 1788, in 12 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 788 (1823).

(n283)Footnote 284. Id. at P I, third clause.

(n284)Footnote 285. Act of December 18, 1789, in 13 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 17 (1823).

(n285)Footnote 286. Id. § 7.

(n286)Footnote 287. 1 Stat. 123.

(n287)Footnote 288. 1 Stat. 189.

(n288)Footnote 289. Kentucky Constitution of 1792, art. VIII.

(n289)Footnote 290. Kentucky Constitution of 1799, art. VI, §8.

(n290)Footnote 291. Kentucky Constitution of 1850, art. VIII, § 8.

(n291)Footnote 292. Kentucky Constitution of 1890, § 233.

(n292)Footnote 293. Ky. Rev. Stat. § 447.040.

(n293)Footnote 294. Burks v. Commonwealth, 259 S.W.2d 68, 70 (Ky. 1953) .

(n294)Footnote 295. Commonwealth v. Donoghue, 63 S.W.2d 3, 4 (Ky. 1933) .

(n295)Footnote 296. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Commonwealth, 51 S.W. 624, 627-628 (Ky. 1899) .

(n296)Footnote 297. 4-A William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 23-30 (1975).

(n297)Footnote 298. Id. at P VII.

(n298)Footnote 299. 4-A William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 31-33 (1975).

(n299)Footnote 300. Id. at 31.

(n300)Footnote 301. Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348, 366-368 (La. 1816) .

(n301)Footnote 302. 4-A William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 34 (1975).

(n302)Footnote 303. 8 Stat. 200. Judith Shafer and Warren Billings, The Louisiana Purchase Bicentennial Series in Louisiana History, An Uncommon Experience: Law And Judicial Institutions In Louisiana 1802-2003, Vol. XIII (1997).

(n303)Footnote 304. 8 Stat. 200, art. III.

(n304)Footnote 305. 2 Stat. 283.

(n305)Footnote 306. Id. § 8 .

(n306)Footnote 307. Id. § 11.

(n307)Footnote 308. Id. § 13.

(n308)Footnote 309. Id. § 14.

(n309)Footnote 310. § 1, 2 Stat. 324.

(n310)Footnote 311. § 1, 9, 2 Stat. 331.

(n311)Footnote 312. Id. § 4 .

(n312)Footnote 313. La. Acts, ch. 29, § 2 (1808).

(n313)Footnote 314. Cottin v. Cottin, 5 Mart. 93 (La. 1817) (referring to Spanish laws "which were, and have continued to be ours, where not repealed"); Hayes v. Berwick, 2 Mart. 138 (La. 1812) . John A. Lovett, Article: On the Principle of Legal Certainty in the Louisiana Civil Law Tradition: From the Manifesto to the Great Repealing Act and Beyond, 63 La. L. Rev. 1397 (Summer, 2003) (Article highlights the conflicts between the civil and common law experienced in Louisiana); Vernon Valentine Palmer, Article: The French Connection and the Spanish Perception: Historical Debates and Contemporary Evaluation of French Influence of Louisiana Civil Law, 63 La. L. Rev. 1067 (Summer, 2003) (Article explores the influence French law on Louisiana code); J.R. Trahan, Article: The Continuing Influence of le Droit Civil and el Derecho Civil in the Private Law of Louisiana, 63 La. L. Rev. 1019 (Summer, 2003) (argues that although Louisiana law has evolved from its French and Spanish connections, the state's code still closely resembles the systems).

(n314)Footnote 315. 2 Stat. 641.

(n315)Footnote 316. 2 Stat. 701.

(n316)Footnote 317. Louisiana Constitution of 1812, Schedule, § 1.

(n317)Footnote 318. Louisiana Constitution of 1812, Schedule, § 4. Also, "All laws contrary to this constitution shall be null and void." Id. at art. VI, § 25.

(n318)Footnote 319. Louisiana Constitution of 1812, art. IV, § 11.

(n319)Footnote 320. Agnes v. Judice, 3 Mart. 182 (La. 1813) .

(n320)Footnote 321. Art. 3521, La. Code of 1825.

(n321)Footnote 322. Flower v. Griffith, 6 Mart. (n.s.) 89 (La. 1827) .

(n322)Footnote 323. La. Acts, No. 40.

(n323)Footnote 324. La. Acts, No. 83, § 25.

(n324)Footnote 325. Handy v. Parkinson, 10 LA. 92 (1836) .

(n325)Footnote 326. Reynolds v. Swain, 13 La. 193 (1839) . John A. Lovett, Article: On the Principle of Legal Certainty in the Louisiana Civil Law Tradition: From the Manifesto to the Great Repealing Act and Beyond, 63 La. L. Rev. 1397 (2003) (Article traces the development of Louisiana law and the relationship between legal certainty on one hand, and flexibility and equity on the other hand); Thomas W. Tucker, Article: Interpretations of the Louisiana Civil Codes, 1808-1840: The Failure of the Preliminary Title, 19 Tul. Eur. & Civ. L.F. 57 (2004) (explains the manner in which the Reynolds court interpreted the Louisiana Civil Codes).

(n326)Footnote 327. Moulin v. Monteleone, 115 So. 447 (La. 1928) ; Hugh v. New Orleans R.R., 6 La. Ann. 495 (1851) .

(n327)Footnote 328. Louisiana Constitution of 1845, Tit. IX, art. 142.

(n328)Footnote 329. Louisiana Constitution of 1845, Tit. VI, art. 120.

(n329)Footnote 330. Louisiana Constitution of 1852, Tit. VI, art. 117; Tit. X, art. 143. Louisiana Constitution of 1864, Tit. VII, art. 120; Tit. XIII, art. 149. Louisiana Constitution of 1868, Tit. VI, art. 116; Tit. X, art. 149. Louisiana Constitution of 1879, arts. 31, 258. Louisiana Constitution of 1898, arts. 33, 325. Louisiana Constitution of 1913, arts. 33, 325. Louisiana Constitution of 1921, art. III, 18; art. XXII, § 1.

(n330)Footnote 331. Louisiana Constitution, art. 3, 15(b); art. 14, § 18.

(n331)Footnote 332. State v. De Hart, 33 So. 605, 607 (La. 1903) .

(n332)Footnote 333. La. Civ. Code Ann. art. 21.

(n333)Footnote 334. Charter of Acadia (November 8/18, 1603) (English text), in 4 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 252, 258 (1975).

(n334)Footnote 335. Grant of Province of Maine (August 10, 1622), in 4 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 263, 266 (1975).

(n335)Footnote 336. Grant of Province and County of Maine (April 3/13, 1639), in id. at 268, 270.

(n336)Footnote 337. The Charter of Massachusetts Bay - 1629, in 5 William F. Swindler (ed.), Sources and Documents of the United States Constitutions 32 (1975).

(n337)Footnote 338. Id. at 37.

(n338)Footnote 339. See Paul Samuel Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 367, 3372-386 (1907).

(n339)Footnote 340. Grant of Province of Maine (March 12, 1664), in id. at 278, 279.

(n340)Footnote 341. Grant of the Province of Maine (June 29, July 9, 1674), in id. at 282.

(n341)Footnote 342. See Paul Samuel Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 367, 383-384 (1907).

(n342)Footnote 343. The Charter of Massachusetts Bay of 1691, in 5 William F. Swindler (ed.), Source And Documents of United States Constitutions 80 (1975).

(n343)Footnote 344. Id. at 84.

(n344)Footnote 345. Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, Ch. I, § I, art. IV, in id. at 97.

(n345)Footnote 346. Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, Ch. VI, art. VI, in id. at 108.

(n346)Footnote 347. Editorial Note, in id. at 2.

(n347)Footnote 348. Commonwealth v. Churchill, 2 Met. 118, 123, 124 (Mass. 1840) .

(n348)Footnote 349. Sackett v. Sackett, 8 Pick. 309, 315 (Mass. 1829) .

(n349)Footnote 350. Act of Separation of 1819, in id. at 299 , 311.

(n350)Footnote 351. Maine Constitution of 1819, art. X, § 2.

(n351)Footnote 352. Maine Constitution, art. 10, § 3.

(n352)Footnote 353. Act of Cession of 1820, in 4 William F. Swindler (ed.), Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 331 (1975).

(n353)Footnote 354. 3 Stat. 544.

(n354)Footnote 355. Conant v. Jordan, 77 A. 938, 941-942 (Me. 1910) .

(n355)Footnote 356. Davis v. Scavone, 100 A.2d 425, 427-428 (Me. 1953) .

(n356)Footnote 357. William MacDonald (ed.), Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 55 (1914).

(n357)Footnote 358. Id. at 56 .

(n358)Footnote 359. See Francis J. Mootz III, Legal Classics: After Deconstructing the Legal Canon, 72 N.C. L. Rev. 977 (1994).

(n359)Footnote 360. Paul Samuel Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 401 (1907).

(n360)Footnote 361. Id.

(n361)Footnote 362. Id. at 402.

(n362)Footnote 363. Id. at 402-403. Michael Carlton Tolley, Maryland and its Anglo-Legal Inheritance, 11(3) Legal Hist. [Great Britain] 353 (1990).

(n363)Footnote 364. Maryland Constitution of 1776, Declaration of Rights art. III, in 4 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 372 (1975).

(n364)Footnote 365. Maryland Constitution of 1851, Declaration of Rights art. III, in id. at 393.

(n365)Footnote 366. Maryland Constitution of 1864, Declaration of Rights art. 4, in id. at 417.

(n366)Footnote 367. Maryland Constitution of 1867, Declaration of Rights art. 5, in id. at 448.

(n367)Footnote 368. Coomes v. Clements, 4 H. & J. 480 (Md. 1819) .

(n368)Footnote 369. Mayor and City Council v. Williams, 6 Md. 235 (1854) .

(n369)Footnote 370. Dudrow v. King, 83 A. 34 (Md. 1912) .

(n370)Footnote 371. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 27 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n371)Footnote 372. Id. at 28 .

(n372)Footnote 373. Id. at 32 .

(n373)Footnote 374. Bradford's History of Plymouth Plantation 107 (William T. Davis ed. 1908).

(n374)Footnote 375. 5 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 27 (1975).

(n375)Footnote 376. Id. at 29-30 .

(n376)Footnote 377. The Laws of the Pilgrims xiv (John D. Cushing ed. 1977) (a facsimile edition of The Book of the General Laws of the Inhabitants of the Jurisdiction of New-Plimouth 1672 & 1685, Introduction by John D. Cushing). See Martin Donahue, The History of Administrative Law in Massachusetts, 16291932, 8 J. Legal Hist. 330 (1987).

(n377)Footnote 378. 11 Records of the Colony of New Plymouth in New England 6 (David Pulsifer ed. 1861). See also Henry E. Huntington, The Laws & Liberties of Massachusetts: Reprinted from the Copy of the 1648 Edition in the Henry E. Huntington Library (1998).

(n378)Footnote 379. Id. at 12 .

(n379)Footnote 380. Id.

(n380)Footnote 381. Id. at 13 .

(n381)Footnote 382. The Laws of the Pilgrims xv (John D. Cushing ed. 1977) (a facsimile edition of The Book of the General Laws of the Inhabitants of the Jurisdiction of New-Plimouth 1672 & 1685, Introduction by John D. Cushing). See also Gordon S. Wood, The Origins of Vested Rights in the Early Republic, 85 Va. L. Rev. 1421 (1999) .

(n382)Footnote 383. 11 Records of the Colony of New Plymouth in New England 78 (David Pulsifer ed. 1861).

(n383)Footnote 384. Id., 1671 Code at 34-35.

(n384)Footnote 385. Id., 1685 Code at 42.

(n385)Footnote 386. Id.

(n386)Footnote 387. The Charter of Massachusetts Bay -- 1629, in 5 Sources and Documents of the United States Constitutions 32 (William F. Swindler ed. 1975).

(n387)Footnote 388. Id. at 37 .

(n388)Footnote 389. See Paul Samuel Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in 1

Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 367, 372-86 (1907). See also Jose L. Fernandez, Untwisting the Common Law: Public Trust and the Massachusetts Colonial Ordinance, 62 Alb. L. Rev. 623 (1998).

(n389)Footnote 390. Id. at 383-84.

(n390)Footnote 391. The Charter of Massachusetts Bay of 1691, in 5 Source And Documents of United States Constitutions 80 (William F. Swindler ed. 1975).

(n391)Footnote 392. Id. at 84 .

(n392)Footnote 393. Mass. Const. of 1780, art. IV, ch. I, § I, in id. at 97 .

(n393)Footnote 394. Mass. Const. of 1780, at. VI, ch. VI, in id. at 108 .

(n394)Footnote 395. Editorial Note, in id. at 2.

(n395)Footnote 396. Commonwealth v. Churchill, 2 Met. 118, 123-124 (Mass. 1840) .

(n396)Footnote 397. Commonwealth v. Knowlton, 2 Mass. 530, 534 (1807) .

(n397)Footnote 398. Sackett v. Sackett, 8 Pick. 309, 315 (Mass. 1829) . One author has concluded that Massachusetts law "did change substantially in the seventy years between 1760 and 1830," which changes "also reflected more basic changes in American thought and society in the same seventy-year period." William E. Nelson, Americanization Of The Common Law: The Impact of Legal Change on Massachusetts Society, 1760-1830 vii (1975).

(n398)Footnote 399. 14 Geo. 3 , ch. 83 (1774).

(n399)Footnote 400. Id. at P III.

(n400)Footnote 401. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n401)Footnote 402. Id. §§ 4 , 5.

(n402)Footnote 403. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n403)Footnote 404. 2 Stat. 58.

(n404)Footnote 405. Id. § 2 .

(n405)Footnote 406. 2 Stat. 309.

(n406)Footnote 407. Id. § 2 .

(n407)Footnote 408. Lamphere's Case, 27 N.W. 882, 883 (Mich. 1886) .

(n408)Footnote 409. Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 24, 33 (1860) .

(n409)Footnote 410. 5 Stat. 144 (1836).

(n410)Footnote 411. Mich. Const. of 1835, Schedule, § 2.

(n411)Footnote 412. Mich. Const. of 1850, Schedule, § 1.

(n412)Footnote 413. Mich. Const. of 1908, Schedule, § 1.

(n413)Footnote 414. Mich. Const. art. 3, § 7 .

(n414)Footnote 415. Beech Grove Inv. Co. v. Civil Rights Comm'n, 157 N.W.2d 213 (Mich. 1968) .

(n415)Footnote 416. Semmens v. Floyd Rice Ford, Inc., 1 Mich. App. 395, 136 N.W.2d 704 (Mich. App. 1965) .

(n416)Footnote 417. In re Sanderson, 286 N.W. 198 (Mich. 1939) . Carl W. Herstein, Real Property, 44 Wayne L. Rev. 1019 (1998) .

(n417)Footnote 418. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n418)Footnote 419. 2 Stat. 283.

(n419)Footnote 420. Id. § 13 .

(n420)Footnote 421. Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 1, § 1 (1842).

(n421)Footnote 422. Id. § 2 .

(n422)Footnote 423. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance]," art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in vol. 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n423)Footnote 424. Id. §§ 4 , 5.

(n424)Footnote 425. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n425)Footnote 426. 2 Stat. 58.

(n426)Footnote 427. Id. § 2 .

(n427)Footnote 428. 2 Stat. 309.

(n428)Footnote 429. Id. § 2 .

(n429)Footnote 430. 5 Stat. 10 (1836).

(n430)Footnote 431. Id. § 12 .

(n431)Footnote 432. Id. § 9 .

(n432)Footnote 433. Statutes of the Territory of Wisconsin.

(n433)Footnote 434. Coburn v. Harvey, 8 Wis. 147-151 (1864) .

(n434)Footnote 435. 9 Stat. 178.

(n435)Footnote 436. 9 Stat. 233.

(n436)Footnote 437. 9 Stat. 403.

(n437)Footnote 438. Id. § 12 .

(n438)Footnote 439. Id. § 9 .

(n439)Footnote 440. 11 Stat. 156.

(n440)Footnote 441. 11 Stat. 285.

(n441)Footnote 442. Minn. Comst. of 1857, Schedule, § 2.

(n442)Footnote 443. Minn. Const., Art. 1, § 15 .

(n443)Footnote 444. Congdon v. Congdon, 200 N.W. 76, 82-83 (Minn. 1924) . See also Lake v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 582 N.W.2d 231 (Minn. 1998) (Supreme Court has the power to recognize or abolish common law).

(n444)Footnote 445. Act of April 7, 1798, Chap. XXVIII, § 6, 1 Stat. 549-550 (1798).

(n445)Footnote 446. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in vol. 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n446)Footnote 447. Id. §§ 4 , 5.

(n447)Footnote 448. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n448)Footnote 449. Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan, 44 U.S. 212 (1845) .

(n449)Footnote 450. Statutes of Mississippi Territory, ch. V, § 4.

(n450)Footnote 451. Miss. Const. of 1817, Schedule, § 5.

(n451)Footnote 452. Miss. Const. of 1832, Schedule, § 4.

(n452)Footnote 453. Miss. Const. of 1868, Schedule, § 2.

(n453)Footnote 454. Mississippi Constitution, Schedule, § 274.

(n454)Footnote 455. Boarman v. Catlett, 21 Miss. (1 S. & M.) 149 (1849) .

(n455)Footnote 456. Powell v. Brandon, 24 Miss. 343 (1852) .

(n456)Footnote 457. Miss. Const., art. 6, § 160 ; Miss. Code Ann. § 11-17-37 . W. Rodney Clement, Jr., Enforcing Security Interests in Personal Property in Mississippi, 67 Miss. L.J. 44 (1997) . Robert A. Weems & Katherine L. Evans, Mississippi Law of Intestate Succession, Wills, and Administration and the Proposed Mississippi Uniform Probate Code: A Comparative Analysis, 62 Miss. L.J. 1 (1992) .

(n457)Footnote 458. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n458)Footnote 459. 2 Stat. 283.

(n459)Footnote 460. Id. at § 13 .

(n460)Footnote 461. Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1, 1 (1842).

(n461)Footnote 462. Id. § 2 .

(n462)Footnote 463. Mo. Const. of 1820, Schedule, § 2.

(n463)Footnote 464. Mo. Const., Schedule, § 2.

(n464)Footnote 465. Mo. Rev. Stat. § 1.010 .

(n465)Footnote 466. Gillilan v. Gillilan, 212 S.W. 348 (Mo. 1919) .

(n466)Footnote 467. Wantuck v. United Sav. & Loan Asso., 461 S.W.2d 692 (Mo. 1971). See also Stuart Banner, The Political Function of the Commons: Changing Conceptions of Property and Sovereignty in Missouri, 17501850, 41 Am. J. Legal Hist. 61 (1997) .

(n467)Footnote 468. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n468)Footnote 469. 2 Stat. 283.

(n469)Footnote 470. Id. § 13 .

(n470)Footnote 471. Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1, 1 (1842).

(n471)Footnote 472. Id. § 2 .

(n472)Footnote 473. 4 Stat. 701.

(n473)Footnote 474. 5 Stat. 10.

(n474)Footnote 475. Id. § 12 .

(n475)Footnote 476. Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854, 10 Stat. 277 (1854).

(n476)Footnote 477. Id. § 9 .

(n477)Footnote 478. Id. § 14 .

(n478)Footnote 479. Neb. Terr. Laws, 328 (1st Sess. 1855).

(n479)Footnote 480. 12 Stat. 239.

(n480)Footnote 481. 8 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 193 (1979).

(n481)Footnote 482. 5 Stat. 235.

(n482)Footnote 483. Id. § 12 .

(n483)Footnote 484. 5 Stat. 10.

(n484)Footnote 485. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n485)Footnote 486. Id. §§ 4 , 5.

(n486)Footnote 487. 9 William Walter Hening, The Statutes at Large, Being a Collection of all the Laws of Virginia 127, P VI (1823).

(n487)Footnote 488. 2 Stat. 309.

(n488)Footnote 489. 9 Stat. 323.

(n489)Footnote 490. Id. § 6 .

(n490)Footnote 491. Id. § 14 .

(n491)Footnote 492. Id. § 17 .

(n492)Footnote 493. 10 Stat. 172.

(n493)Footnote 494. Id. § 6 .

(n494)Footnote 495. Id. § 12 .

(n495)Footnote 496. Wash. Terr. Laws, p. 83, § 1.

(n496)Footnote 497. 12 Stat. 808.

(n497)Footnote 498. Id. § 9 .

(n498)Footnote 499. Idaho Code § 73-116 .

(n499)Footnote 500. Territorial Act of 1864, 13 Stat. 85.

(n500)Footnote 501. Id. § 9 .

(n501)Footnote 502. Mont. Terr. Laws 356, § 1 (1st Sess.).

(n502)Footnote 503. Enabling Act of 1889, 25 Stat. 676.

(n503)Footnote 504. Id. § 24 .

(n504)Footnote 505. Mont. Const. of 1889, art. XX, § 1.

(n505)Footnote 506. Mont. Code Ann. §§ 1-1-107 - 1-1-109 .

(n506)Footnote 507. Smith Eng'g Co. v. Rice, 102 F.2d 492, 497 (9th Cir. 1938) .

(n507)Footnote 508. State v. Young, 170 P. 947, 948 (Mont. 1918) .

(n508)Footnote 509. Aetna Acc. & Liab. Co. v. Miller, 170 P. 760 (Mont. 1918) .

(n509)Footnote 510. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n510)Footnote 511. 2 Stat. 283.

(n511)Footnote 512. Id. § 13 .

(n512)Footnote 513. Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1, 1 (1842).

(n513)Footnote 514. Id. § 2 .

(n514)Footnote 515. Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854, 10 Stat. 277.

(n515)Footnote 516. Id. § 9 .

(n516)Footnote 517. Id. §14 .

(n517)Footnote 518. Neb. Terr. Laws, 328 (1st Sess. 1855).

(n518)Footnote 519. 13 Stat. 47.

(n519)Footnote 520. 14 Stat. 820.

(n520)Footnote 521. Neb. Const. of 1866, Schedule, § 1.

(n521)Footnote 522. Neb. Rev. Stat. § 49-101 .

(n522)Footnote 523. Brooks v. Kimball Cty., 256 N.W. 501, 504 (Neb. 1934) .

(n523)Footnote 524. Williams v. Miles, 94 N.W. 705, 708 (Neb. 1903) . See also Bloomfield State Bank v. Miller, 75 N.W. 569-571 (Neb. 1898) . See also Yasuhide Kawashima, Law and the Great Plains: Essays on the Legal History of the American Heartland (1996). A. Dan Tarlock, Touch and Concern Is Dead, Long Live the Doctrine, 77 Neb. L. Rev. 804 (1998) . Stephen D. Mossman, "Whiskey Is for Drinkin' But Water Is for Fightin' About": A First-Hand Account of Nebraska's Integrated Management of Ground and Surface Water Debate and the Passage of L,B. 108, 30 Creighton L. Rev. 67 (1996) .

(n524)Footnote 525. Constitution of the State of Deseret, 1849, in 31st Cong., 1st Sess., H. Misc. Doc. No. 18; also published in 9 Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 375-381 (William F. Swindler ed. 1979).

(n525)Footnote 526. 9 Stat. 453.

(n526)Footnote 527. Id. § 9.

(n527)Footnote 528. Id. § 17.

(n528)Footnote 529. 12 Stat. 209.

(n529)Footnote 530. Id. §9.

(n530)Footnote 531. Id. § 16.

(n531)Footnote 532. Nev. Terr. Laws, 1st Sess., ch. I.

(n532)Footnote 533. 13 Stat. 30.

(n533)Footnote 534. 13 Stat. 749.

(n534)Footnote 535. Nevada Constitution, art. XXVII, § 2 .

(n535)Footnote 536. Vansickle v. Haines, 7 Nev. 249, 285-286 (1872) .

(n536)Footnote 537. Nev. Rev. Stat. § 1.030 .

(n537)Footnote 538. Hamilton v. Kneeland, 1 Nev. 40, 44, 46-47 (1865) .

(n538)Footnote 539. Melody L. Luetkehans, Recent Development, What's New in Nevada Real Property, 7-AUG Nev. Law. 18 (1999); Greg Walch, Treading Water Law --A Nevada Water Rights Primer, 6-Nov Nev. Law. 18 (1998).

(n539)Footnote 540. Nev. Rev. Stat. §§ 123.130 - 123.259 .

(n540)Footnote 541. Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606-1775 27 (William MacDonald ed. 1914).

(n541)Footnote 542. Id. at 28.

(n542)Footnote 543. Id. at 32.

(n543)Footnote 544. Frank B. Sanborn, New Hampshire, an Epitome of Popular Government 13 (1904).

(n544)Footnote 545. Id. at 14-15.

(n545)Footnote 546. David E. Van Deventer, The Emergence of Provincial New Hampshire 1623-1741 8 (1976).

(n546)Footnote 547. See § 7.02(v) supra.

(n547)Footnote 548. David E. Van Deventer, The Emergence of Provincial New Hampshire 1623-1741 13 (1976).

(n548)Footnote 549. Acts And Laws of New Hampshire 1680-1726 197-198 (John D. Cushing ed.), (1978).

(n549)Footnote 550. William H. Fry, New Hampshire as a Royal Province 433-436 (1908).

(n550)Footnote 551. N.H. Const. of 1776, in 6 William F. Swindler, Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 342 (1976).

(n551)Footnote 552. N.H. Const. of 1784, The General Court in id. at 348.

(n552)Footnote 553. N.H. Const. of 1784, Encouragement of Literature, etc., in id. at 356.

(n553)Footnote 554. N.H. Const., part II, art. 5.

(n554)Footnote 555. N.H. Const., part II, art. 90.

(n555)Footnote 556. The Earliest Printed Laws of New York 1665-1693 103-104 (John D. Cushing ed., 1978).

(n556)Footnote 557. Id. at 104-105.

(n557)Footnote 558. Id. at 106-107.

(n558)Footnote 559. Id. at 148-149.

(n559)Footnote 560. Id. at 109.

(n560)Footnote 561. Fundamental Laws and Constitutions of New Jersey 1664-1964 9-10 (Julian P. Boyd ed. 1964).

(n561)Footnote 562. Id.

(n562)Footnote 563. The Instructions from the Queen in Council to the Governor of the Province of New Jersey, November 16, 1702, in Fundamental Laws and Constitutions of New Jersey, 1664-1964 126-154 (Julian P. Boyd ed. 1964). See also Christine A. Desan, The Constitutional Commitment to Legislative Adjudication in the Early American Tradition, 111 Harvard L. Rev. 1381 (1998) .

(n563)Footnote 564. N.J. Const. of 1776, §§ XXI, XXII, in 6 Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions 452 (William F. Swindler ed. 1976).

(n564)Footnote 565. N.J. Const. of 1844, art. X, § 1, in id. at 463.

(n565)Footnote 566. N.J. Const. of 1947, art. XI, § 3.

(n566)Footnote 567. Girard Trust Co. v. Schmitz, 20 A.2d 21 (N.J. Eq. 1941) .

(n567)Footnote 568. Caparell v. Goodbody, 29 A.2d 563 (N.J. Eq. 1942) .

(n568)Footnote 569. Territorial Act of 1850, § 17.

(n569)Footnote 570. Id. § 10 .

(n570)Footnote 571. Leitensdorfer v. Webb, 1 N.M. (1 Gild.) 34 (1853), aff'd, 61 U.S. 176 (1857) . J.R. Remacha, Traces of the Spanish Legal System in New Mexico, 69(3) N.M. Hist. Rev. 281 (1994). See also Malcolm Ebright, Frontier Land Litigation in Colonial New Mexico: A Determinant of Spanish Custom and Law, 8(2) W. Legal Hist. 203 (1995). See generally Daniel Tyler, The Spanish Colonial Legacy and the Role of Hispanic Custom in Defining New Mexico Land and Water Rights, Colonial Latin Am. Hist. Rev. 162 (Spring 1995).

(n571)Footnote 572. N.M. Laws, ch. 2, § 2 (1876).

(n572)Footnote 573. N.M. Stat. Ann. § 38-1-3 .

(n573)Footnote 574. N.M. Stat. Ann. § 338-1-4 : "Generally in all matters in which there is any conflict or variance between the rules of equity and the rules of the common law, with reference to the same matter, the rules of equity shall prevail."

(n574)Footnote 575. "Nothing herein shall adversely affect the rights or the enforcement of rights in trademarks acquired in good faith at any time at common law." N.M. Stat. Ann. § 57-3-12 . "The Mortgage Loan Company and Loan Broker Act is not intended to impair any remedies available to injured parties under other statutes or under common law." N.M. Stat. Ann. § 58-21-25 .

(n575)Footnote 576. Browning v. Estate of Browning, 9 P. 677 (N.M. 1886) .

(n576)Footnote 577. Bent v. Thompson, 23 P. 134 (N.M. 1890) , aff'd, 138 U.S. 114 (1891) . See also David A. Reichard, The Politics of Village Water Disputes in Northern New Mexico, 18821905. 9(1) W. Legal Hist. 9 (1996).

(n577)Footnote 578. The rejection of Hispanic law in Arizona Territory was explicit and comprehensive:

> All laws, customs, ordinances, and decrees of the Mexican Republic; all laws, customs, ordinances, and decrees of the kingdom of Spain; and all legislative enactments of the Territory of New Mexico, now or heretofore in force in this Territory, are hereby repealed ...

Ariz. Comp. Laws, ch. 61, § 1.

(n578)Footnote 579. Browning v. Estate of Browning, 3 N.M. 659, 9 P. 677 (N.M. 1886) . See also Boddy v. Boddy, 420 P.2d 301 (N.M. 1966) (New Mexico's adoption of the common law made it binding as the rule of practice and decision in the courts of this state); Yeo v. Tweedy, 34 N.M. 611, 286 P. 970 (N.M. 1929) .

(n579)Footnote 580. Alvarez v. Alvarez, 383 P.2d 581 (N.M. 1963) .

(n580)Footnote 581. Blake v. Hoover Motor Co., 212 P. 738 (N.M. 1923) .

(n581)Footnote 582. Abo Petr. Corp. v. Amstutz, 600 P.2d 278 (N.M. 1979) .

(n582)Footnote 583. In re Gabaldon's Estate, 34 P.2d 672 (N.M. 1934) .

(n583)Footnote 584. Martinez v. Cook, 244 P.2d 134 (N.M. 1952) , aff'd, 258 P.2d 375 (N.M. 1953) .

(n584)Footnote 585. Hernandez v. Becker, 54 F.2d 542 (10th Cir. 1931) .

(n585)Footnote 586. McDonald v. Senn, 204 P.2d 990 (N.M. 1949) . See generally Malcolm Ebright, Frontier Land Litigation in Colonial New Mexico: A Determinant of Spanish Custom and Law, 8(2) W. Legal Hist. 201 (1995).

(n586)Footnote 587. See United States v. San Pedro & Canon del Agua Co., 17 P. 337 (N.M. 1888) .

(n587)Footnote 588. 2 Herbert L. Osgood, The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century 99 (1904).

(n588)Footnote 589. Id. at 104.

(n589)Footnote 590. 1 E. B. O'Callaghan (ed.), Documents Relative to the Colonial History of the State of New-York 118-123 (1856).

(n590)Footnote 591. 1 E. B. O'callaghan, History of New Netherland, or New York Under the Dutch 130-136 (1845).

(n591)Footnote 592. Id. at 298.

(n592)Footnote 593. Id. at 209-210.

(n593)Footnote 594. Id. at 237.

(n594)Footnote 595. Id.

(n595)Footnote 596. Id. at 110.

(n596)Footnote 597. Id. at 148, 149.

(n597)Footnote 598. Id. at 109.

(n598)Footnote 599. Id. at viii.

(n599)Footnote 600. Id. at 19-23.

(n600)Footnote 601. New York Laws of 1782, ch. 2.

(n601)Footnote 602. See Steven J. Eagle, Article: The 1997 Regulatory Takings Quartet: Retreating from the "Rule of Law" 42 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 345 (1998) . Dominic R. Massaro, Taking Title to New York: The Enduring Authority of Roman Law 72 Jan N.Y. St. B.J. 44 (2000).

(n602)Footnote 603. The text of this colonial legislation is quoted and explained in In re Steinway, 53 N.E. 1103 (N.Y. 1899) .

(n603)Footnote 604. Robert Ludlow Fowler, Organization of the Supreme Court of Judicature of the Province of

New York, 19 Albany L.J. 209, 211 (1879). Deborah A. Rosen, Courts and Commerce in Colonial New York, 36 Am. J. Legal Hist. 39 (1992) .

(n604)Footnote 605. Quoted in Paul Samuel Reinsch, The English Common Law in the Early American Colonies, in 1 Select Essays in Anglo-American Legal History 394-395 (1907).

(n605)Footnote 606. N.Y. Const. of 1777, art. XXXV.

(n606)Footnote 607. N.Y. Const. of 1821, art. VII, § 13.

(n607)Footnote 608. N.Y. Const. of 1846, art. I, § 17.

(n608)Footnote 609. Id. at art. XXXVI.

(n609)Footnote 610. N.Y. Const. of 1846, art. I, §§ 11-15.

(n610)Footnote 611. N.Y. Const. of 1987, art. I, §§ 10-14.

(n611)Footnote 612. N.Y. Const., art. I, §1 0 .

(n612)Footnote 613. Id. art. I, § 14.

(n613)Footnote 614. Hamilton v. Holcomb, 1 Coleman & Caines 67 (N.Y. 1799).

(n614)Footnote 615. Saltonstall v. White, 1 Johnson 221 (N.Y. 1799) .

(n615)Footnote 616. Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Paige 178 , aff'd, 15 Wend. 111 (N.Y. 1835) .

(n616)Footnote 617. See Matter of Murphy, 63 N.E.2d 49 (N.Y. 1945) ; Matter of Chambers, 54 N.Y.S.2d 88 (1945) .

(n617)Footnote 618. N.Y. Const., art. I, § 14 .

(n618)Footnote 619. Horace Waters & Co. v. Gerard, 82 N.E. 143, 147 (N.Y. 1907) .

(n619)Footnote 620. Id.

(n620)Footnote 621. Harmon v. Alfred Peats Co., 214 N.Y.S. 353 (Sup. Ct. App. Div.) , rev'd on other grounds, 154 N.E. 314 (N.Y. 1926) .

(n621)Footnote 622. Matter of Melvin, 483 N.Y.S.2d 941 (Surr. Ct. 1984) . Dominic R. Massaro, Taking Title To New York: The Enduring Authority of Roman Law., 72 N.Y. St. B.J. 44 (January 2000) .

(n622)Footnote 623. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 6 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n623)Footnote 624. "Denizen" ordinarily means an inhabitant or resident, although in British usage it may also mean a foreigner who is permitted certain rights of citizenship.

(n624)Footnote 625. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 7 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n625)Footnote 626. Id. at 8.

(n626)Footnote 627. Id. at 19, 20.

(n627)Footnote 628. Id. at 64, 65.

(n628)Footnote 629. Id. at 65. The "bishop of Durham" clause refers to the traditional expectation held of the bishop of Durham, located on the Scottish border, to help protect English land from foreign enemies who intruded on English land. To fulfill these expectations, the bishop enjoyed almost regal powers, including rights to enact laws, impose taxes, prepare for and conduct warfare, among others.

(n629)Footnote 630. Id. at 66.

(n630)Footnote 631. Id. at 66, 67.

(n631)Footnote 632. Id. at 68, 69.

(n632)Footnote 633. North Carolina Charters and Constitutions, 1578-1698 77 (Mattie Erma Edwards Parker ed. 1963).

(n633)Footnote 634. Id. at 78.

(n634)Footnote 635. Id. at 80.

(n635)Footnote 636. Id. at 84, 85.

(n636)Footnote 637. 7 Source And Documents of United States Constitutions 391 (William F. Swindler ed. 1978).

(n637)Footnote 638. 2 The Earliest Printed Laws of North Carolina 1669-1751 167 (John D. Cushing ed. 1977).

(n638)Footnote 639. Chapter XXII, § XI, in id. at 26 .

(n639)Footnote 640. Id., vol. 1 at 293-301.

(n640)Footnote 641. Id. at 321, 322.

(n641)Footnote 642. N.C. Const. of 1776, Declaration of Rights, § XXV.

(n642)Footnote 643. N.C. Const. of 1776, art. XLIII.

(n643)Footnote 644. N.C. Const. of 1868, art. II, § 17.

(n644)Footnote 645. Id. at art. IV, § 24.

(n645)Footnote 646. N.C. Const. of 1876, art. II, 15; art. IV, § 19.

(n646)Footnote 647. N.C. Const., art. XIV, § 4 .

(n647)Footnote 648. N.C. Laws of 1778, ch. 5, I, §§ II.

(n648)Footnote 649. N.C. Gen. Stat. § 4-1 .

(n649)Footnote 650. Steelman v. City of New Bern, 184 S.E.2d 239 (N.C. 1971) .

(n650)Footnote 651. Woodard v. Clark, 72 S.E.2d 433 (N.C. 1952) . David A. Thomas, Anglo-American Land Law: Diverging Developments from A Shared History Part II: How Anglo-American Land Law Diverged After American Colonization and Independence, 34 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 295 (Summer 1999) .

(n651)Footnote 652. This substitution is discussed in Beard v. Poydras, 4 Mart. 348 (La. 1816) .

(n652)Footnote 653. 2 Stat. 283.

(n653)Footnote 654. Id. § 13 .

(n654)Footnote 655. Laws of a Public and General Nature, of the District of Louisiana, of the Territory of Louisiana, of the Territory of Missouri, and of the State of Missouri up to the Year 1824 § 1, 1 (1842).

(n655)Footnote 656. Id. § 2 .

(n656)Footnote 657. 4 Stat. 701.

(n657)Footnote 658. 2 Stat. 58.

(n658)Footnote 659. Id. § 2 .

(n659)Footnote 660. 2 Stat. 309.

(n660)Footnote 661. Id. § 2 .

(n661)Footnote 662. An Ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio [Northwest Ordinance], art. II, § 14 (1787), published as a footnote in vol. 1 United States Statutes at Large 51-53.

(n662)Footnote 663. Id. §§ 4 , 5.

