In order to qualify, borrowers must not be in default and must have made 120 monthly payments on their loans AFTER October 1, 2007. Payments can be made through any one or combination of eligible repayment plans, including the new income-based repayment system, income contingent repayment, ten-year standard plan payments, graduated or extended payments of not less than the monthly amount that would be due under a ten-year standard plan. n8

The borrower must be employed full-time in a public service job at the time of the forgiveness and must have been employed in a public service job during the period in which he or she made each of the 120 payments. The repayment period does not include time spent in deferment or forbearance.

[c] Definition of "Public Service Job"

The term "public service job" is defined as "a full-time job in emergency management, government, military service, public safety, law enforcement, public health, public education (including early childhood education), social work in a public child or family service agency, public interest law services (including prosecution or public defense or legal advocacy in low-income communities at a nonprofit organization), public child care, public service for individuals with disabilities, public service for the elderly, public library sciences, school-based library sciences and other school-based services, or at an organization that is described in section 501(c)(3) of the IRS Code and exempt from taxation, or teaching as a full-time faculty member at a Tribal College or University and other faculty teaching in high-needs areas, as determined by the Secretary."

[6] Definitions for Economic Hardship Deferment n9

The definition of "economic hardship" for purposes of economic hardship deferment is amended to conform to the definition of "partial financial hardship" that is necessary to qualify for an income-based repayment plan (IBR).

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 12 Student Loans and Trade School Abuses

1-12 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 12.03

§ 12.03 Repayment Options Prior to Default

[1] FFEL Repayment

Standard repayment plans are the "typical" repayment plans that borrowers will get if they fail to choose another option. n1 Standard plans carry the highest monthly payments and borrowers generally pay the same amount for each installment period. The monthly amount may vary if there is a variable loan rate. Borrowers have at least five years, but not more than ten years to repay an FFEL loan with a standard plan. n2

Graduated repayment plans are also available. Under these plans, payments start out low and increase every two years. The repayment period will vary from twelve to thirty years, depending on the total amount borrowed. n3

Extended repayment plans are another option. These plans allow loan repayment to be extended over a period from generally twelve to thirty years, depending on the total amount borrowed. Borrowers still pay a fixed amount each month of at least $50, but monthly payments usually will be less than under the Standard repayment plan. Borrowers will also usually pay more interest because the repayment period is longer. n4

Most relevant to low-income client are the income-sensitive repayment plans ("ISRP"). n5 With these plans, the amount of the borrower's installment payment is adjusted annually based on the borrower's expected total monthly gross income.

Borrowers are required to submit income information to the lender in order to establish an income-sensitive repayment plan. If the documentation shows that the borrower will be unable to repay the loan within the maximum ten year repayment period, the lender is required to grant forbearance to the borrower for up to five years. n6

The ISRP plans with FFELs are generally much less affordable than the income contingent repayment plan ("ICRP") available for Direct Loans and discussed below. This is because monthly payments under an ISRP, unlike an ICRP, must cover at least accruing interest. n7

[2] Federal Direct Loan Repayment

As of July 1, 2006, the rules for Direct Loan repayment plans are the same as for FFEL, except for the Direct Loan

Income Contingent Repayment Plan (ICR). n8 Borrowers are required to pay loans back on these plans within ten years. As with FFELS, the ten-year period is tolled during the time of any deferments or forbearances. The Direct Loan regulations require that a borrower pay a minimum of $50 per month under the standard repayment plan. n9

For Direct Loan graduated and extended plans, the regulations set out specific repayment periods based on the amount of the loans. The Direct Loan program also allows for alternative payment plans to accommodate a borrower's "exceptional circumstances." n10

The more generous provisions of the Direct Loan ICRP are particularly useful for low-income borrowers. n11 As with an FFEL income sensitive plan, the ICRP allows borrowers to submit income documentation that is used to derive an affordable monthly payment. Unlike an ISRP, monthly payments under an ICRP do not need to cover monthly accruing interest. Monthly payments can be very low, even zero for borrowers with households incomes below the poverty level. n12

Under the ICRP, borrowers make minimal payments if they are below poverty income, taking family size into account. Payments increase incrementally as income increases. The required payments are capped at 20% of any earnings above the poverty level. n13 If borrowers continue making payments for twenty-five years, any debt that remains is forgiven. n14 However, this forgiven amount may be taxable income. n15

[3] Perkins Loan Repayment

Perkins repayment plans vary from FFELs and Direct Loans in several significant ways. The regulations set out minimum monthly repayment rates. Schools are allowed to extend the repayment period due to a borrower's prolonged illness or unemployment. n16 Interest continues to accrue during any extension of a repayment period.

[4] Interest Rates

The interest rates for FFELs, Direct Loans, and Perkins Loans are limited by federal regulations. n17 In 2007, Congress passed legislation that provides for gradual reductions in interest rates for subsidized Stafford loans. n18 The rates remain fixed at 6.8% through July 1, 2008. For loans first disbursed on or after July 1, 2008, and before July 1, 2009, the interest rate is 6%. The rates are then reduced to 5.6% for loans first disbursed on or after July 1, 2009, and before July 1, 4.5% for loans first disbursed on or after July 1, 2010, and before July 1, 2011, and 3.4% for loans first disbursed on or after July 1, 2011, and before July 1, 2012. PLUS loan interest rates are also variable and currently capped at 9 percent. n19 The interest rates on these variable loans adjust annually based on statutorily established market-indexed rate-setting formulas. n20 Perkins loan interest rates are fixed, currently at 5 percent. n21 Under current law the interest rate charged to all non-consolidation loan borrowers, except PLUS borrowers, is due to change on July 1, 2006, from a variable rate with an 8.25 percent cap to a 6.8 percent fixed rate. n22

With the exception of Perkins, interest rates for these loan programs are variable. Interest rates for consolidation loans, in contrast, are currently fixed. The fixed rate is based on the weighted average of the interest rates on the loans at the time of consolidation, rounded up to the nearest one eighth of one percent. The interest rate does not exceed 8.25 percent. n23 Each program has various repayment incentives that allow lenders to reduce interest rates for borrowers who make payments electronically and in other circumstances. n24

[5] Private Loans

[a] Growth in Private Student Lending

The private student loan business has experienced tremendous growth in recent years. Despite the boom in private lending, the vast majority of students still borrow primarily federal loan products. According to 1999-2000 data from the Department, less than 4% of all students received private loans during that year. n25 However, private loan programs are coming on strong. Private borrowing by students rose to about $5 billion in 2001-2002, up from about $1 billion in 1995-1996. n26

Private student loans continue to grow relative to the federal loans provided through the student aid system. As of 2006, private student loans totaled $17.3 billion, having grown at an average annual rate of about 27% between 2000-2001 and 2005-2006 after adjusting for inflation. n27

[b] Comparing Private Loans and Federal Loans

Private loan terms and conditions, including interest rates and fees, are generally determined by an individual's or a co-signer's credit history. Thus, low-income students and/or those with negative credit histories are more likely to receive loans on less favorable terms. Federal student loan borrowers, in contrast, must meet eligibility requirements but do not have to prove creditworthiness. n28 All eligible federal loan borrowers are subject to the same rules regarding interest rates and other terms.

Another critical difference is the lack of certain protections for private loan borrowers. For example, students with private loans are not eligible for the same types of discharge options discussed later in the Chapter. n29 The same is true for deferment and forbearance rights, all of which depend on the lender's policies and the terms of the loan contracts rather than on federal regulations.

On the other hand, there are certain advantages for private loan borrowers. Under current law, student loans made entirely by private entities should be dischargeable in bankruptcy. n30 In addition, unlike federal loan collections, there should be a statute of limitations for collection of private loans. n31 Private lenders have fewer collection tools. However, there is also no federal regulatory scheme, as discussed above, to ensure that borrowers have flexible repayment options, deferment rights, and rights to affordable payment plans. Whether these rights exist for private loan borrowers depends on the terms of the loan contract and lender policies. n32

The 2008 HEA reauthorization law includes a number of amendments to the Truth in Lending Act with respect to private student loan disclosures. The Federal Reserve Board is required to issue regulations to implement these changes no later than one year after the date of enactment of the law (August 14, 2008), and the regulations must become effective not later than six months after the date of issuance. n33 Some of these new disclosures will be required in private education loan applications and solicitations. Lenders will have to clearly and conspicuously provide information, including the potential range of interest rates; whether the rate is fixed or variable; payment deferral options; an example of the total cost of the loan over the life of the loan; information that the borrower may qualify for federal student assistance and the interest rates available with respect to these programs; information that the borrower has the right to accept the terms and consummate the transaction at any time within thirty calendar days following the date on which the application is approved; and that, except for changes based on adjustments to the index used for a loan, the rates and terms may not be changed during this time. n34 Other disclosures must be given contemporaneously at the time of approval and still others before loan consummation.

This should lead to changes in the timing of TILA disclosures for private loans. The current Truth in Lending regulations contain special rules for interim student credit extensions. n35 These are defined as credit plans that involve extensions of credit for education purposes in which the repayment amount and schedule are not known at the time the credit is advanced. n36 For interim credit extensions under a student credit program, the creditor is not required to disclose the finance charge, payment schedule, the total of payments, or the total sale price.

[6] Student Loan and Income Tax Issues

Beginning in 1998, taxpayers with qualified loans to pay certain costs of attending higher education have been allowed to take tax deductions from gross income for the interest they pay on these loans. n37 Qualified loans are loans taken out solely to pay qualified education expenses for an individual, his or her spouse, or a dependent. The loans must also be for education provided during an academic period for an eligible student. Loans from related persons and qualified employer plans do not qualify. The maximum deductible interest on a qualified student loan is $2500 per return. Married taxpayers filing jointly are allowed to deduct the full amount only when their modified adjusted gross income is $100,000 or less. For those with incomes between $100,000 and $130,000, the deduction is gradually reduced. Taxpayers filing as single, head of household, or qualifying widow(ers) may take the full $2500 deduction as long as their adjusted gross income is $50,000 or below. The amount of the student loan interest deduction increased in 2008. The deduction in 2008 is phased out if a borrower's modified adjusted gross income is between $115,000 and $145,000. This is an increase from the 2007 limits of $110,000 and $140,000. Parents may also deduct interest for loans taken out to pay children's' education as long as the child was a dependent when the parent received the loan.

There are additional tax benefits for education, including (1) certain tax-free scholarships and fellowships; (2) non-refundable Hope and Lifetime Learning Credits of up to $1500 for qualified education expenses paid for each eligible student; n38 (3) limited deductions for tuition and related expenses; and (4) deductions for work-related education. It is unclear how effective these programs have been in increasing access to higher education, particularly for the neediest students. n39

There should not be tax consequences when a borrower's loan is cancelled. The I.R.S. has stated that it may issue guidance on this issue in the future but, in the meantime, lenders and guaranty agencies are not subject to penalties for failure to report amounts forgiven pursuant to the terms of a debt obligation. This specifically includes forgiveness upon a stated event such as death, disability, or service as a teacher. n40 In addition, the Internal Revenue Code specifically allows tax-free treatment for loans that are cancelled through programs tied to work for certain amounts of time in certain professions, such as teaching. n41 There are, however, potential tax consequences when a borrower's loan is written off after paying for twenty-five years using an income-contingent repayment plan. n42

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 12 Student Loans and Trade School Abuses

1-12 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 12.04

§ 12.04 Student Loan-Related Collections

[1] Introduction

Many of the legal issues involving student loans are related to the collection of delinquent and defaulted loans. Student complaints of deception and abuse by both private collectors and guarantors are leading to more and more litigation in this area, n1 including class action litigation. n2

The Higher Education Amendments of 1998 require the new Chief Operating Officer ("COO") of the student loan program to appoint a student loan ombudsman to assist borrowers in resolving student loan complaints. n3 The COO is also required to publicize the availability and function of the ombudsman and report on his/her activities and effectiveness to Congress. The report must also include an analysis of borrower complaints.

The key issue in any challenge to student loan collection activity is determining the appropriate legal claim to use against the entity doing the collection. Claims may vary significantly depending on whether the entity is a private collector, a nonprofit guarantor, a state agency, or the DOE.

The first problem many borrowers face is figuring out which agency is collecting their loans. This information is critical to resolving student loan problems efficiently.

Defaulted loans may be held by the DOE, by a state guaranty agency, or by the school. The Department and state guaranty agencies also contract with private collection agencies to administer many of their collection responsibilities. n4

A good place for borrowers to start is the federal student aid information center, 1-800-4-FED-AID (800-433-3243). The information center staff should be able to give borrowers the address and telephone number of the agency holding a defaulted loan. Borrowers with Direct Loans should contact the Direct Loan Servicing Center at (800) 848-0979. The number for information about Department-held loans is (800) 621-3115. More information is also available on the Department's website at www.ed.gov. n5

It is best to contact the student loan ombudsman for help only after these other avenues have been exhausted. For more information about the student loan ombudsman, go to www.ombudsman.ed.gov.

[2] Common Student Loan Debt Collection Abuses

[a] Violations Unique to Student Loans

Student loan borrowers routinely receive dunning letters threatening that the Department will garnish their wages without "legal action." These letters imply that the former student will receive no notice before the wage garnishment and that there will be no opportunity either to contest the validity of the student loan or to present defenses. In truth, the statute and regulations require both notice and an opportunity for an administrative hearing before an employer may be ordered to withhold any wages. n6

Collectors may misrepresent a student's ability to obtain a closed school, unpaid refund, or false certification discharge. Collection agencies make no commissions from those obtaining the discharge, while they recover a set percentage on any payments made. These collectors thus have an incentive to discourage discharge applications. For this reason, the Department instructs them not to make any kind of determination concerning a student's eligibility, but instead to refer queries related to closed school, false certification, or unpaid refund discharges. n7

There is likely to be even more confusion and misinformation as the Department gears up to implement federal benefit offsets to collect student loans. For example, borrowers have reported numerous instances of collectors threatening to offset benefits even if the borrower receives SSI payments only. In fact, SSI benefits are completely exempt from offset.

Borrowers have also reported that the Department routinely continues collection even after borrowers have submitted disability discharge applications. This practice also clearly violates Department regulations. n8

In addition, collection agencies frequently mislead borrowers with respect to repayment options. In particular, agencies are often very aggressive in steering borrowers into loan consolidation or loan rehabilitation programs. These repayment strategies, benefit many, but not all, borrowers. Consolidation is equivalent to full payment of the existing obligation and collectors are compensated accordingly.

[b] Illegal Debt Collection Activity Not Unique to Student Loans

Student loan collectors may also engage in a number of other basic forms of illegal debt collection practices that apply to the collection of any type of consumer debt.

This subsection briefly lists a number of practices that are prohibited under the federal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("FDCPA"), and that can lead to actions for actual damages, up to $1000 in statutory damages, plus attorney fees. n9

Examples of fair debt collection standards include:

- The collection agency must stop contacting the student if the student so requests in writing. n10

- The collection agency, in its initial communication or within five days of that communication, must send the student a written notice identifying the debt and the creditor and giving the student the right to dispute the debt or to request the name and address of the original creditor, if different from the current one. If the student raises a dispute, the collector must suspend collection efforts on the disputed portion of the debt until the collector responds to the request. n11

The following collection agency conduct also violates the FDCPA:

- Communicating with third parties, such as relatives, employers, friends, or neighbors, about a debt unless the student or a court has given the collector permission to do so. Several narrow exceptions to this prohibition apply. Collectors may contact creditors, attorneys, credit reporting agencies, cosigners, spouses, and parents if the student is a minor. Third-party contacts are also permitted if the contacts are solely for the purpose of locating the student and do not reveal in any way the contact's underlying purpose. n12

- Communicating with the student at unusual or inconvenient times or places. The times 8:00 A.M. to 9:00 P.M. are generally considered convenient, but daytime contacts with a consumer known to work a night shift may be inconvenient. n13

- Contacting a student at work if the collector should know that the employer prohibits personal calls, or contacting the student at other inconvenient places, such as a friend's house or the hospital. n14

- Contacting a student represented by a lawyer, unless the lawyer gives permission for the communication or fails to respond to the collector's communications. n15

- Using obscene, profane, or abusive language. n16

- False representation of the amount of any debt should also violate state and/or federal fair debt collection practices statutes. These claims may arise in a number of ways, including improper calculation of collection fees and improper crediting of payments. n17

One key issue is whether an entity may evade liability by arguing that a violation occurred due to a bona fide error. n18 Debt collectors are not liable under the FDCPA if they can show by a preponderance of evidence that the violation was not intentional and resulted from a bona fide error notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid any such error. n19

[3] Applicability of FDCPA to Student Loan Collections

The Federal FDCPA n20 is the key statute offering students protection from debt collection harassment. The statute specifies numerous prohibited collection techniques, provides debtors with certain rights, and provides students with statutory and actual damages and attorney fees for violations. n21 The key FDCPA issue for students is whether the Act applies to student loan collection activities.

The FDCPA specifically excludes any officer or employee of the United States or any state to the extent that their activities are in the performance of their official duties. n22 While the DOE is thus excluded if it collects its own debts, the FDCPA applies to private collection agencies hired by the Department. n23

For Department-held loans, the law is very clear. The Department's own actions are not covered, and those by private collectors are. The problem in many cases though is determining who in fact engaged in the deceptive conduct--the private collector or the Department.

Even if the Department is partially responsible for deceptive collection practices, the debt collection agency doing the actual collection may still be liable under the FDCPA. For example, even if deceptive dunning notices that instruct payment to go to a debt collector are found to emanate from the Department, the letter may be viewed as an "indirect" attempt by the collection agency to collect a debt, which is within the literal scope of the FDCPA. n24 Student loan debt collectors have also claimed that they are not subject to the FDCPA in cases where the FDCPA prohibits behavior that is required pursuant to HEA due diligence collection rules. n25 At least one court concluded that it may be appropriate for specific provisions of the HEA to qualify specific provisions of the FDCPA. However, where the HEA is silent, the court gave full effect to the FDCPA. n26

If a lender has not yet turned a FFEL over to the guarantor or where a school is collecting on a Perkins Loan, the FDCPA does not apply if the lender or school is doing the collection activity by its in-house staff. The FDCPA does not apply to creditors, but only to collection agencies. n27 On the other hand, if the lender or school turns the loan over to a third party for collection, that third party is liable under the FDCPA. n28

In most cases, collection on FFELs is conducted by guaranty agencies or collection agencies hired by the guarantor. If a guaranty agency hires a private collector, that collector is covered by the FDCPA in the same way that a collector hired by the Department is covered. Guaranty agencies engaging in collection activity, in contrast, may be exempt under the Act's exclusion of state employees, n29 depending upon the structure and authority given the agency by the state legislature. The Ninth Circuit addressed the issue of guarantee agencies in a 2009 case. n29.1 In this case, the guaranty agency Educational Credit Management Corp. (ECMC) presented three possible grounds for FDCPA exemption, including that its collection activities were incidental to a bona fide fiduciary obligation, that its collection activity concerned a debt which it originated, and that it was a "creditor" rather than a "debt collector." The Ninth Circuit addressed the first ground only, finding that ECMC was not exempt under this category and remanding to the lower court to consider the other grounds. The court agreed that the agency had a fiduciary obligation to the Department of Education but that the collection activity was not incidental to this obligation. Although the court noted that the collection of defaulted loans is generally incidental to a guaranty agency's primary function, in this case the court accepted the borrower's evidence that the loan was assigned to ECMC by a different guarantor and acted as a collection agent. n29.2 The court found that such collection activity was not incidental to the guaranty agency's fiduciary duty to the Department of Education. The court also acknowledged that ECMC may turn out to have had a broader role than merely acting as a collector.

Guaranty agencies should not be exempt from liability under this "government actor" exemption to the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. n30 The key issue in bringing an FDCPA action against a guarantor is determining initially whether the guarantor is a state or a private nonprofit entity.

[4] Applicability of State Debt Collection Law to Student Loans

Whether state debt collection law applies to student loan collection is an important issue. While the FDCPA exempts creditors and government agencies from its scope, state law often does not. In addition, state law may specifically prohibit certain collection activity not explicitly restricted by the FDCPA. State laws that may apply include state debt collection statutes, state unfair and deceptive acts and practices ("UDAP") statutes, and common law tort theories. n31

[5] Collection Fees and Penalties

[a] Amount of Fees

A particular area of concern for students is the collection of fees and penalties that are assessed by the entity attempting to collect on the loan. Most of these fees are associated with collection agency costs which arise due to the Department's routine practice of turning over defaulted loans to one of several major collection agencies with whom it has contracted.

There is no easy way to take an account away from a collection agency and avoid the collection fees. Even if a student attempts to pay the Department directly, the fees will be assessed. One exception is that no collection fees are assessed on amounts seized from tax refunds.

There are three strategies a student can use to avoid paying collection costs once a loan has been turned over to a collection agency. One solution is to consolidate the defaulted loan into a new Direct or FFEL loan. The consolidation loan will include an 18.5% collection fee from the old loan, but no further amounts will go to collection fees (unless the consolidated loan goes into default). n32 A second approach is to try to cancel the student's obligation on the loan. n33 Making payments through a chapter 13 bankruptcy plan may also avoid collection fees. n34 Third, the student can complain about the collection agency's illegal or improper conduct to the Department. Sometimes the Department will then take the loan away from the collector.

A particular area of concern is the legally allowable amount of fees. Because of confusion in this area, the Department recently agreed to temporarily limit fees to 25%. This agreement arose from a lawsuit in New York in which students sued the Department for assessing 43% collection fees on certain student loan borrowers whose loan notes specified 25% collection fees. n35 The Department admits that it was in error to systematically charge 43% collection costs to those with the 25% provision in their notes. n36 It also admits that it has no method for easily distinguishing those with the 25% collection provision from other students.

Through early 2001, the Department abided by the Gibbons settlement and did not publicly announce or implement an alternative system. For most of this time, the Department stated on its website that collection costs would be no more than 25%.

In spring 2001, however, the Department began sending out notices to borrowers with loans that the Department had reviewed and determined that the collection fees charged the borrower did not exceed the promissory note, explaining this to them and advising the students of what to do if they felt they had been overcharged. n37

As of 2002, the Department was still sending out these notices with plans to complete the process by the end of the year.

Although this agreement does not directly bind state guaranty agencies in their assessment of collection fees, the same principles should apply to the larger universe of student loans held by state guaranty agencies. In addition, guaranty agencies cannot charge more in collection fees than the Department can charge. n38 Collection costs for rehabilitated loans may not exceed 18.5% of the unpaid principal and accrued interest at the time of sale. n39 Collection costs should be added to the unpaid principal at the time of sale. The implication is that collection costs should not be added prior to the sale while the borrower is making the required twelve consecutive monthly payments.

In an effort to minimize the pressure many collection agencies were placing on borrowers to consolidate loans, Congress in 2005 set new standards to ensure that consolidation loans are not an excessive proportion of a guaranty agency's recoveries on defaulted loans. n40

Under the new rules, if a borrower repays a defaulted loan through a FFEL consolidation loan on or after October 1, 2006, collection fees are still capped at 18.5%. However, when returning proceeds to the Department after consolidation, a guaranty agency that charged the borrower collection costs after October 1, 2006, must remit an amount that equals the lesser of the actual collection costs charged or 8.5% of the outstanding principal and interest. n41 By Oct. 1, 2009, guaranty agencies will have to remit the entire collection cost charged when returning proceeds from the consolidation of a defaulted loan that is paid off with excess consolidation proceeds. Excess proceeds means the amount of proceeds from the consolidation of defaulted loans under FFEL that exceed 45% of the agency's total collections on defaulted loans in that fiscal year. n42

In June 2007, the Department issued rules proposing to set limits on Perkins collection fees. The limits would apply to loans placed with a collection firm on or after July 1, 2008. The limits on collection costs will be:

-- For first collection efforts, 30% of the amount of principal, interest, and late charges collected;

-- For second and subsequent collection efforts, 40% of the amount of principal, interest, and late charges collected; and

-- For collection efforts resulting from litigation, 40% of the amount of principal, interest, and late charges collected plus court costs. n43

These proposals were adopted. The new collection fee limits are effective for loans placed with a collection agency on or after July 1, 2008. n44 In making this change, the Department specifically chose not to set the collection cost caps at the same level as in the FFEL program.

[b] Guaranty Agency Collection Fees

The Department's regulations require guaranty agencies to charge collection fees, whether or not provided in the borrower's promissory note. The method of allocating students' payments to the fees, effective January 1, 1998, must be the same as for Department-held loans. n45 The guaranty agency cannot assess an amount in advance for collection fees, but must, instead, apportion a percentage of each payment toward collection fees. n46 The guarantor has authority to compromise the amount of collection fees if it receives all principal and interest in full. n47 Guaranty agencies cannot charge more than what the Department would charge for collection fees. n48 The Department currently does not charge more than 25% in collection fees. n49 The same limit should therefore apply to guaranty agencies. In addition, a guaranty agency has authority to compromise the amount of collection fees charged if it receives all principal and interest in full. n50

[c] Collection Fees Sought by Lenders

The FFEL regulations set out what collection costs the lender can seek (that is, before the loan is turned over to the guarantor). n51 The lender can seek no collection costs unless such charges are authorized in the promissory note and such costs are actually incurred by the lender or its agent. n52

[d] Perkins Collection Fees

There are distinct collection fee provisions for schools collecting Perkins loans. These schools must charge all reasonable costs with regard to a loan obligation. n53 The amount of collection costs charged must be based on either the actual costs incurred for collection actions with regard to the individual borrower's loan or average costs incurred for similar actions taken to collect loans in similar stages of delinquency. n54

Before filing suit on a loan, the school may waive collection costs as follows: (1) The school may waive the percentage of collection costs applicable to the amount then past-due on a loan equal to the percentage of that past-due balance that the borrower pays within thirty days after the date on which the borrower and the school enter into a written repayment agreement or (2) The school may waive all collection costs in return for a lump-sum payment of the full amount of principal and interest outstanding. n55 Schools are required to apply payments on loans in the following order: (i) collection costs; (ii) late charges; (iii) accrued interest; and (iv) principal. n56

[6] Statute of Limitations as Defense to Collection Action

The Higher Education Technical Amendments of 1991 eliminated all statutes of limitations for any collection action by a school, guaranty agency, or the United States under a federal loan program. n57 This also eliminated all limitation periods for tax intercepts, wage garnishments, and other collection efforts.

The provision eliminating the statute of limitations applies retroactively, n58 so that loans whose limitations period had expired even before 1991 are revived. In a 2002 decision, a North Carolina district court noted the "obvious difficulty" that the retroactive application of the statutory change causes for students. n59 The borrower in this case was sued in 1998 for a student loan she had incurred between 1970 and 1972 and that she claimed to have repaid in 1973. The court initially granted summary judgment for the borrower but reversed itself in response to the government's motion to alter or amend the judgment. The problem, as discussed by the court, is that "people do not keep records indefinitely, especially when there is no apparent purpose to do so." n60

[7] Tax Refund Interceptions

[a] Introduction

Tax refund interception is the major technique used to collect student loans. The tax refund intercept program involves a blanket seizure of almost all tax refunds due to debtors who are in default on their student loans, including the seizure of owed Earned Income Tax Credits. n61 Only federal government agencies have the authority to actually attach a debtor's tax refund. n62 There is no statute of limitations for such an offset. n63

The only sure-fire method of avoiding a tax refund intercept is to lower federal income tax withholding from earnings and any estimated tax payments. If at the end of the year, the taxpayer is not owed a refund, there can be no interception.

Another approach to stopping an intercept or recovering intercepted amounts is to file for personal bankruptcy. Filing a bankruptcy petition before the intercept activates the U.S. Bankruptcy Code automatic stay provision. n64 The stay prohibits virtually all actions against the debtor's property, including intercepts of owed tax refunds.

The Secretary can refer a debt for offset only after complying with certain procedures set out in 34 C.F.R. section 30.33(a).

First, the Secretary, or guarantor acting on behalf of the Secretary, must send the student a written notice of intent to seek the tax intercept. n65 Courts have held that actual notice is not required, so long as reasonable means are used to provide notice. n66 The student then has a right to inspect his/her file and must make a request to do so within twenty days of the notice. n67 To obtain a review, the student must file a request for review at the address specified in the notice by the later of 65 days after the date of the notice or fifteen days after the student's loan file is provided, if requested. n68 (A student can request a later hearing, but only a timely hearing request will stop the intercept pending the hearing.)

The timely request for a hearing stops the intercept until the hearing and any further request for review have been exhausted. The statute specifies that no intercept can occur until there is a determination that a debt is owed. n69

The student can also request a written agreement to repay the debt if the student does so within twenty days of receiving the notice. n70 The Secretary or guarantor provides a repayment schedule, and, to avoid the intercept, the student must make the first payment within 65 days of receipt of the original notice. n71

[c] Grounds to Contest a Tax Intercept

While many borrowers report frustration in raising even the most meritorious defenses to a tax intercept, the Department's stated policy is to consider the following types of defenses:

- The borrower has repaid the loan or the social security number is incorrect and the borrower does not owe the loan;

- The borrower has entered into a repayment agreement with the guaranty agency or the Department and the borrower is making payments as required;

- The borrower has filed for bankruptcy and the case is still open or the loan was discharged in bankruptcy; n72

- The school failed to pay the borrower an owed refund;

- The borrower is dead or totally and permanently disabled; n73

- The loan is not enforceable. The Department will apparently recognize forgery or alteration of the loan documents as a defense. It should also recognize school-related defenses on Perkins, Direct, and many FFEL Loans issued after January 1, 1994. n74 It is less clear whether the Department will consider school-related defenses (other than the failure to pay an owed refund) for FFELs issued before that date;

- The borrower is eligible for a closed-school discharge; n75

- The borrower is eligible for a false certification discharge. n76

[d] Post-Intercept Challenges

The Internal Revenue Service ("IRS") notifies the student after the fact of the tax refund intercept. n77 The IRS takes the position that there is no right to an administrative review of the intercept within the IRS and courts do not have jurisdiction to hear challenges against the IRS n78 based on the intercept. n79 As a consequence, any post-intercept challenge should be directed to the DOE, not the IRS.

[8] Wage Garnishment

The Secretary and guaranty agencies are authorized the extraordinary remedy to garnish students' wages without first obtaining a court order. n80 The 1998 HEA clarifies that federal student loans and grants themselves are not subject to garnishment or attachment except for debts owed to the Department. n81

According to the Department's regulations, the guarantor shall initiate administrative wage garnishment proceedings by the 225th day after the guarantor takes over a loan. If the debtor has insufficient income to satisfy the debt through wage garnishment, but has assets from which the debt can be satisfied, the agency shall assign the loan to the Department. n82

The guarantor must offer the student an opportunity to enter into a repayment agreement, in lieu of the garnishment, on terms agreeable to the guarantor. n83 Prior to July 1, 2006, borrowers subject to wage garnishment were still able to consolidate their loans with the Direct Loan Program. However, Congress changed these rules effective July 1, 2006, and imposed most of the same limits on Direct loan consolidation that already existed on FFEL consolidations. Under these rules, borrowers facing wage garnishment may consolidate their loans only if the garnishment order is lifted.

Garnishment is also prohibited if the borrower has been involuntarily separated from employment until the borrower has been re-employed continuously for twelve months. The regulations depart from the statute in authorizing garnishment unless the guarantor has knowledge that this exception applies to a particular borrower. n84 This places the burden on the borrower to notify the guarantor of the lack of continuous employment. The regulations also do not provide notice to the employer in the withholding order of the twelve months continuous employment requirement. n85

Borrowers must inform loan holders that they qualify for the unemployment exception either by checking the appropriate box on the hearing form or by providing other written notice. However, borrowers should not also have to provide documentation or other proof that they qualify for the exception. Thus, collection letters requiring borrowers to submit affirmative proof of eligibility may violate the FDCPA. n86

However, the hearing request form issued by the Department requires that borrowers attach proof of unemployment. In a 2005 Seventh Circuit case, the court granted summary judgment for the defendant collection agency on plaintiff's claim that the agency's use of this form violated the FDCPA. n87 The court found that the Department's interpretation of the law as presented on the hearing form might be wrong but that the collection agency was not liable for using the Department's prescribed form. n88 Although the court did not approve the Department's use of the forms, it did observe that the Department's handling of the unemployment exemption in the form was reasonable and proper. n89 Under the HEA, up to 10% of "disposable pay" may be garnished, which means gross pay less withholding taxes and other amounts required by law to be deducted (such as the total amount garnished by other creditors). n90 The maximum amount that can be garnished under HEA is the lesser of 10% disposable income and the amount permitted by 15 U.S.C. section 1673 (which protects income equal to 30 times the prevailing minimum wage). 15 U.S.C. section 1673 also limits total garnishments to 25% of disposable income, so that a student loan garnishment and other garnishments should not exceed 25% of income. Guarantors cannot elect to garnish wages under state law procedures (i.e., pursuant to a post-judgment court order). n91

The Debt Collection Improvement Act of 1996 ("DCIA") extended additional authority to federal agencies collecting agency debts. n92 In 2002, the Department proposed rules to operate wage garnishment procedures under the authority of the DCIA. n93 The final rules were published in February 2003 and became effective on March 21, 2003. n94 These rules, which are discussed below, should apply only when the Department initiates garnishment. The previous rules under the HEA should continue to apply to guaranty agency garnishment actions. n95 It is unclear how this will operate in practice, since the Department will be authorized to garnish a higher amount than guaranty agencies. On its web site, the Department simply explains that "under the Higher Education Act, the Department and guaranty agencies may require employers who employ individuals who have defaulted on the repayment of a student loan to deduct 10% of the borrower's disposable pay per pay period toward repayment of the debt. Also, the Debt Collection Improvement Act of 1996 permits the Department to garnish up to 15% of disposable pay." n96 With respect to garnishment authority under the DCIA, the Department has agreed that the aggregate amount to be withheld cannot exceed the 15% limit. n97

Many states place even greater restrictions on wage garnishment or prohibit the practice outright. These state law limitations on garnishment do not apply to garnishments to satisfy student loan obligations. n98 Similarly, state procedural requirements prior to garnishment are not likely to apply either. n99 On the other hand, certain tribal law restrictions on garnishment do apply. n100 Accounts should not be submitted to garnishment while a borrower is still negotiating repayment. A 2006 bankruptcy case cites a statement in the Department's publication, Options for Financially-Challenged Borrowers in Default, that the Department is generally willing to accept an installment payment plan under which the borrower pays 15% of disposable pay. n100.1 The rehabilitation regulations require that borrowers make voluntary reasonable and affordable payments. It is therefore clear that garnishment or other involuntary payments will not count toward the required nine rehabilitation payments. However, many guaranty agencies will work with borrowers, when pressed, to resolve this impasse. For example, in 2009 meetings with the guaranty agency trade association (National Council of Higher Education Loan Programs), the association reported that the majority of its guaranty agency members were willing to release garnishments for borrowers who showed a willingness to make voluntary reasonable and affordable payments. All others agreed to accept a token voluntary payment and subtract that amount from the garnishment amount so that the gross monthly payment does not change for the borrower. Although this latter scenario means that the garnishment will continue, the borrower will also be on the way to getting out of default through rehabilitation. This scenario can only work if the borrower can make it through nine months of garnishment. There also may be a delay, as discussed in Chapter 8, in completing the rehabilitation even after the required payments are made.

Borrowers are often confused about these options because of misleading collection letters. For example, a commonly used student loan debt collection letter first informs borrowers that they may face wage garnishment to collect the loan.

The letter then states: "However, if your financial situation warrants such consideration, we have been authorized to substantially reduce the amount on the above-referenced account and cease any further collection efforts if your account is paid in full or assist you in establishing a possible repayment program on your loan." This is misleading because, prior to garnishment, most borrowers are eligible for either consolidation or rehabilitation to get out of default. Both of these options require borrowers to make only reasonable, affordable, or income-based repayments. They do not have to prove that their financial situations "warrant consideration" nor should they pay more than what is reasonable and affordable. It is unclear why the borrower would agree to voluntary payments in the same amount as would be garnished.

The Secretary or guaranty agency must notify the student before the garnishment. The student is entitled to a hearing with an independent official within the agency, but, according to the regulations, only at a location agreeable to the guarantor or by a telephone conference. n101 There is no requirement that the guarantor tape the hearing. n102 The borrower must be given the opportunity for a hearing to contest the existence or amount of the debt and the terms of the repayment schedule. n103

If the student's written request for a hearing is received within fifteen days of the student's receipt of the garnishment notice (receipt is presumed within five days of mailing of the notice), no garnishment can issue until the hearing is provided. n104 The Department regulations require guaranty agencies to issue the hearing decision within sixty days. n105

Possible grounds for contesting the loan obligation at the hearing include that the loan has already been repaid, that the social security numbers are wrong and the individual does not owe the loan, that the borrower is making repayments pursuant to a repayment agreement, that a bankruptcy proceeding is still pending or the loan was discharged in bankruptcy, that the borrower is totally and permanently disabled, that the school closed while the student was still enrolled, that the school falsely certified the student as eligible, that the school failed to refund money owed the student, that the loan is not enforceable, or that garnishment would result in extreme financial hardship. n106

At the hearing, the agency must provide evidence establishing the existence and amount of the debt and the agency's right to administratively garnish the borrower's wages. The case should not be allowed to proceed if, for example, the agency does not have a copy of the loan application and/or promissory note. After the agency has presented this information, the burden shifts to the borrower to provide the facts necessary to support the objection raised.

In a training manual for private collection agencies, the Department set out more specifically the type of information borrowers should submit at the hearing to support the various defenses. For the discharge-related defenses, borrowers should submit the required discharge forms and relevant supporting information. For borrowers claiming that they were entitled to a full or partial refund of their loans, the Department requests that borrowers answer the following questions and provide documentation to support these answers:

- What procedures did you follow to enroll in the school?
- How long after you enrolled did you first attend the school?
- What course did you enroll in?
- What was the cost of the course?
- What did the school charge for tuition, board, and fees?

- Did you receive any other loans or grants to pay for this training?
- What was the refund policy of the school?
- Did the school give you any money from loan(s), or were all loan proceeds used for tuition, board, and fee charges?
- Did you receive any mail-order lessons?
- If so, how many of these lessons did you complete?
- How many days did you attend the school?
- Why did you leave the school?
- What procedures did you follow when you withdrew from the school?
- What was your last day of attendance?
- What steps if any did you take to see if the school issued a refund to the lender?
- Did you notify your lender that you had withdrawn from the school? If so, how did you notify them? n107

Borrowers may also raise as a defense that the debt is not enforceable. Any viable state, federal, and common law claims should be available.

The Department's AWG Hearing Guidelines handbook elaborates on the procedures that hearing officers should follow when a borrower raises one of the discharges as a defense to garnishment. According to the handbook, the case law is unanimous that borrowers can not seek these kinds of discharge relief directly from a court but must present their claim to, and obtain a determination from, the Secretary or the guarantor, who is initially responsible for determining whether the student loan should be discharged. n108

Guaranty agencies have the authority to adjudicate disputes and make binding decisions. n109 However, unlike federal agency hearings, borrowers have no explicit right to judicial review of guaranty agency actions. This lack of review has been challenged, unsuccessfully to date, on constitutional due process grounds. n110 In 2003 court pleadings, the Department acknowledged the problem and supported implying a private right of action under the HEA for judicial review of guaranty agency administrative wage garnishment hearing decisions. n111

If the student does not request a hearing, or if the student's objection is denied, then the student's employer is notified to deduct the garnishment amount from the student's paycheck. If the student is late in requesting a hearing on the garnishment, the garnishment order will proceed, but the student should still receive a hearing and a decision within sixty days. n112 If the student prevails, the garnishment should be ordered to cease and, if appropriate, amounts garnished should be returned to him/her.

Guaranty agencies have the authority to sue employers that refuse to comply with garnishment orders to recover amounts the employer has refused to withhold plus attorney fees, costs, and punitive damages in the court's discretion. n113 Employers in some cases have tried to litigate on behalf of their employees. However, the statute allows borrowers, not employers, to raise defenses to garnishment. n114

agencies are now allowed to offset formerly exempt Social Security and Veterans benefits to collect debts, such as student loans, n116 although an exemption does exist for $9,000 of such benefits annually. However, if the head of the benefit-granting program objects, the Treasury must deny offset against a means-tested program, and may deny offset against other programs if persuaded that offset would "substantially interfere with or defeat" the purposes of the program. n117

The most significant difference between garnishment under the DCIA and garnishment under the HEA (the Higher Education Act under which all garnishments were previously conducted) is that the DCIA authorizes garnishment up to 15% and the HEA only up to 10%. n118

The DCIA, like the HEA, prohibits garnishment if the borrower has been involuntarily separated from employment until the borrower has been re-employed continuously for twelve months. n119 Under either garnishment scheme, borrowers have some burden to notify the loan holder of their unemployment status and to prove that they qualify for the unemployment exception.

Like the HEA, the DCIA requires notice to the borrower before garnishment. n120 The notice provisions are similar. Notice must be sent by mail to the last known address a minimum of thirty days before the initiation of garnishment procedures. n121 The notice must inform the borrower of the nature and amount of the debt, the agency's intention to initiate garnishment, and an explanation of the borrower's rights. n122

The Department's regulations under DCIA specify the borrower rights that must be disclosed in the notice. These are: (1) right to inspect and copy records; (2) right to enter into a repayment agreement; and (3) right to request a hearing about the existence, amount, or current enforceability of the debt and the rate of withholding. n123 The Department has developed a new "Request for Hearing" form for the DCIA-authorized garnishment program. The new "Request for Hearing" form allows a borrower to choose between a written record, in-person hearing or telephone hearing. It does not state that only borrowers requesting hearings within fifteen days are entitled to in-person hearings. The form does, however, state that borrowers requesting in-person hearings are required to pay their own expenses. As of 2004, the Department had posted the new Request for Hearing form on-line at: www.ed.gov/offices/OSFAP/DCS/forms/Request.For.Hearing.pdf.

[d] Servicemember Civil Relief Act Protections

The Servicemember Civil Relief Act (SCRA) limits collection tactics and enforcement of claims against active duty military personnel. n124 In general, everyone on active duty is entitled to the benefit of the Act, whether or not they are stationed in a war zone and whether they enlisted or were called up. Active duty includes full-time training duty, annual training duty, and attendance at a military school while in active military service. n125

The 2008 reauthorization amended the SCRA so that, as of August 2008, the interest rate protections will apply to federal student loans as well. n126 However, the protections in civil judicial and administrative proceedings should apply to student loan collection proceedings. These are relatively new protections arising under 2003 amendments to the Act that extended coverage to administrative as well as judicial proceedings. n127 The Act also restricts execution upon assets of the servicemember.

The protections in judicial and administrative procedures are divided into two main categories: cases in which the servicemember has not been notified of the proceeding and cases in which the servicemember has been notified. In cases in which the servicemember has not been notified, courts are prohibited from entering default judgments in cases in which the defendant has not appeared, unless the plaintiff files an affidavit stating whether or not the defendant is in military service and showing facts in support of the statement. If it appears that the defendant is in military service, the court may not enter a judgment until it appoints an attorney to represent the defendant, and there are special provisions for stays. n128 The Act also gives a servicemember who has been notified of an action or proceeding other than an eviction the right to an automatic, non-discretionary ninety-day stay upon request. n129 The servicemember may seek an additional stay, but this extension is not automatic. In addition, the Act allows the court to stay execution of any judgment against a servicemember and to vacate or stay any pre- or post-judgment attachment or garnishment of property. n130 There are also provisions tolling statutes of limitations during the period of active duty. n131

Dec. 17, 2001) (denying class certification on plaintiffs' FDCPA claim regarding alleged insufficient time to respond to garnishment notice, but granting class certification on claim that defendants violated the FDCPA by falsely representing that borrowers have an affirmative duty to supply "written proof" of employment history to take advantage of garnishment exception). The Court granted summary judgment on plaintiff's claim that the collection letter in this case would cause an unsophisticated consumer to believe that a wage garnishment could occur before expiration of the thirty-day notice period required by the HEA. Kort v. Diversified Collection Servs., Inc., 270 F. Supp. 2d 1017 (N.D. Ill. 2003) (District Court granted summary judgment on plaintiff's claim that the collection letter in this case would cause an unsophisticated consumer to believe that a wage garnishment could occur before expiration of the thirty-day notice period required by the HEA.). Both cases raised FDCPA violations related to defendants' requiring borrowers to affirmatively prove the exception to garnishment for borrowers who have been involuntarily separated from employment. See also Cliff v. Payco Gen. Am. Credits, Inc., 363 F. 3d 1113 (11th Cir. 2004) (student loan borrowers allowed to bring claims under state and federal fair debt laws that, among other violations, collection agency falsely represented the claim, amount, or status of the debt, falsely represented or implied that non-payment would result in garnishment, and failed to provide pre-garnishment hearing).

(n10)Footnote 10. 15 U.S.C. § 1692c(c). This provision, in particular, has been cited by collection agencies lobbying Congress to exempt student loan collectors from FDCPA coverage. They point out the conflict between federal student assistance due diligence provisions that require minimum contacts and the FDCPA prohibition against contacting borrowers in certain circumstances. Consumer advocates have responded with alternatives, including exempting collectors from the due diligence contact requirements in these cases, in lieu of the wholesale exemption from the FDCPA. This issue is likely to arise again in future legislative sessions.

CHAPTER 12 Student Loans and Trade School Abuses

1-12 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 12.05

§ 12.05 Rescheduling Student Loan Payments

One common way of dealing with student loan collection problems is for the student to reschedule the payments. This section examines each of the seven different ways to do this: deferments, forbearance, loan consolidation, repayment plans, guaranty agencies compromising the debt, the Department compromising the debt, and a chapter 13 bankruptcy.

[1] Deferments

Student loan borrowers are legally entitled in certain situations to defer payments. The HEA sets out different rights for different types of loans.

For "subsidized" student loans (where the United States pays the interest while the student is enrolled in school), a deferment not only postpones when a student must make payments, but interest obligations do not accrue during the deferment period. n1 Instead, the federal government pays the interest portion of the loan and the student's payments on the principal are postponed until after the deferment expires.

An important limitation to the usefulness of the student's deferment right is that it exists only when the student is "delinquent" on the loan obligation, not when the student is in "default." n2 If the student is in default, he or she can only obtain a deferral by making repayment arrangements acceptable to the holder of the loan. n3

If a student cannot qualify for a deferment because the loan is in default, the student can re-establish eligibility for a deferment by consolidating the loan into a new loan, n4 or by rehabilitating the defaulted loan after twelve monthly payments. Then the student could apply for a deferment under the new loan. n5 In June 2007, the Department proposed rules to simplify the deferment granting process. Under the proposed rules, FFEL lenders will be permitted to grant graduate fellowship deferments, rehabilitation training program deferments, and unemployment, military service, and economic hardship deferments if another FFEL lender or the Department has granted the borrower deferments for the same reason and the same time frame. n6 The Department may also grant Direct loan deferments based on information received from an FFEL lender, and Perkins schools may do so based on information received from another Perkins loan holder, an FFEL lender, or the Department. n7 Under this proposal, loan holders may rely in good faith on the determinations of others. However, loan holders may not grant a deferment based on another's determination if they have evidence indicating that the borrower does not qualify for the deferment.

[b] Grounds for Seeking a Deferment

Different student loans have different rules about when the borrower qualifies for a deferment. Rules differ not only by the type of loan (e.g., Perkins or FFEL), but when the loan was extended (e.g., before or after July 1, 1993).

No matter the type of deferment being sought, several items are worthy of note. Most deferments carry maximum time limits and each deferment has recertification requirements, generally every six months, for the student to remain eligible. In addition, even though the Higher Education Act requires all loans to be treated as one for deferment purposes, n8 the borrower is advised to file deferment applications for each loan in order to ensure proper and complete attribution.

One set of grounds for deferment applies to Direct Loans, FFELs extended after July 1, 1993, and to most consolidation loans extended after July 1, 1993. n9 The available deferments are:

a) Student deferments for at least half-time study, n10

b) Graduate fellowship deferments, n11

c) A rehabilitation training program deferment, n12

d) An unemployment deferment not to exceed three years, n13

e) An economic hardship deferment, granted one year at a time for a maximum of three years, n14 and

f) Deferment for Peace Corps service. n15

The economic hardship deferment is the most complicated and usually the most important for low-income borrowers. The first three qualification categories are "automatic" as long as the borrower can provide supporting documentation. These are the three categories:

1. Previous qualification for economic hardship deferment under another federal loan program. n16

2. Receipt of federal or state public assistance benefits. This includes anyone receiving payments under a federal or state public assistance program, such as TANF, SSI, Food Stamps, or state general public assistance. n17

3. Peace Corps. The borrower qualifies if he or she is serving as a Peace Corps volunteer. n18

There is also an income and employment-based category. Prior to July 1, 2009, there were three ways to qualify under this category. All three continue to apply to borrowers that applied for economic hardship deferments prior to July 1, 2009 or for those who apply after July 1, 2009 for a deferment period that began prior to that date. n19 The three tests are described below. As of July 1, 2009, only test number 1 will still be used.

1. Full-time workers making less than a stated income level. As of July 1, 2009, this is the only qualifying income/employment-based test.

An individual qualifies for an economic hardship deferment if he or she is working full-time and the earnings from this full-time job do not exceed the greater of the minimum wage or 150% of the federal poverty level applicable to the borrower's family size and state. n20

The College Cost Reduction and Access Act eliminated these grounds for economic hardship deferment. n21 However, the Department delayed issuing the corresponding regulations so that borrowers could continue to qualify using all of the tests until the new income-based repayment program (IBR) becomes available in July 2009. n22

In addition, the new income criteria under economic hardship deferment test #1 are more generous to borrowers. Previously a borrower qualified under this test if his income did not exceed the greater of the minimum wage or the federal poverty level for a family of two, regardless of family size. The test is now the greater of the minimum wage or 150% of the federal poverty level for the borrower's actual family size and state. The test was changed to mirror the standard that will be used to determine partial financial hardships under the new income-based repayment program.

A borrower in default may have some difficulties accessing IBR. However, if in default, the borrower would not be eligible for the deferment regardless of the formula used.

In addition, in fall 2001, the Department issued guidance regarding deferments for borrowers called to active duty as a result of the September 11 terrorist attacks. These new requirements include:

- If a borrower's loans are in an in-school status, in-school deferment status, or in a grace period when the borrower is ordered to active duty or reassigned, the lender is required to maintain the loans in that status during the period of the borrower's active duty service or reassignment. n23 The status must also be maintained during the time necessary for the borrower to resume enrollment in the next available regular enrollment period if the borrower wishes to return to school. n24 This maintenance of loan status may not exceed a total of three years. n25 The regulations for most of the discharges explicitly provide that both past and current loan obligations may be cancelled. n26 Thus, a borrower should be allowed to seek a discharge even if her loans are already paid off, possibly through involuntary payments such as tax offsets. Although the current obligation is already extinguished, the borrower should still be able to get a refund and other appropriate relief such as elimination of negative notations on credit reports.

Revocation of a closed school discharge is contemplated in the regulations only if the borrower provides testimony, sworn statements, or documentation that does not support the material representations made to obtain the discharge. n27 It is unclear how the Department interprets this provision.

The 1998 Higher Education Act amendments require the Secretary of Education to consult with the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to establish a deferment for disabled veterans. n28

The 2005 Deficit Reduction Act created a new military deferment for all three loan programs, FFEL, Direct Loans, and Perkins Loans. n29 The deferment applies to loans for which the first disbursement is made on or after July 1, 2001.

Previously the military deferment applied for only three years and was available only during periods in which borrowers are serving on active duty, or performing qualifying National Guard duty, during a war or other military operation.

Congress eliminated the three-year limit on the military deferment and expanded eligibility to include the six-month period following the demobilization dates of qualified service members when it enacted the College Cost Reduction and Access Act of 2007. n30

The College Cost Reduction and Access Act of 2007 added a new deferment for members of the National Guard or other reserve component of the Armed Forces or members of such forces in retired status. n31 This deferment is available for FFEL, Direct and Perkins loan borrowers. n32

The deferment is available for thirteen months following the conclusion of the borrower's active duty military service if the borrower was enrolled in a program of instruction at an eligible institution at the time, or within six months prior to the time, the borrower was called to active duty. n33 If the borrower returns to enrolled student status during the thirteen-month period, the deferment expires at the time of that return. n34

In addition to any other deferments, members of the National Guard or other reserve component of the Armed Forces or retired members of the Armed Forces, called to active duty within six months of when they are enrolled or were enrolled in school, are eligible for a deferment during the thirteen months following the conclusion of service. This right expires upon return to enrolled status in school.

There may be some cases in which a borrower is eligible for a military deferment on loans first disbursed on or after July 1, 2001, but ineligible for the deferment on older loans. A borrower consolidating loans first disbursed on or after July 1, 2001, is eligible for the new deferment on the entire consolidation loan, but only if all of the borrower's government loans included in the consolidation loan were first disbursed on or after July 1, 2001. n35

A different set of rules applies to those with FFELs extended before July 1, 1993. The grounds for deferment under these loans include: unemployment for up to two years; full-time student at a participating school; n36 active duty status in the U.S. Armed Forces; receiving or being scheduled to receive service under a program designed to rehabilitate disabled individuals; temporarily totally disabled for up to three years; providing nursing or similar services to a spouse who is temporarily totally disabled; parental leave; and mothers of pre-school children starting work at no more than one dollar above the minimum wage. n37 The regulations set out detailed standards as to when a student is eligible for a deferral based on these grounds, particularly for unemployment, rehabilitation, temporary total disability, and spouse's temporary total disability. n38 Maximum deferment periods vary for each type of deferment. n39 The in-school, rehabilitation, and armed services deferments do not have time limits.

Another set of rules applies for Perkins Loans. n40 Perkins Loans may also be completely cancelled in certain circumstances, including the debtor's service in Head Start or in the military service in an area "of hostilities." n41 The 1998 HEA contains a number of provisions that make the Perkins regulations much more like the FFEL and Direct Loan regulations. In particular, the closed school discharge for loans made on or after January 1, 1986 will now apply to Perkins Loans. n42

For Perkins loans made after July 1, 1993, deferments are available based on a number of grounds, including qualifying in-school status; n43 full-time teaching in certain schools and in Head Start; n44 full-time service in law enforcement or as correction officers under certain circumstances; n45 certain military service; n46 certain volunteer service such as the Peace Corps; n47 inability to find, despite seeking, full-time employment for a period not to exceed three years; n48 and qualifying economic hardship conditions for a period not to exceed three years. n49 The Perkins economic hardship requirements are similar to those for FFEL and Direct loans. n50

There are different criteria for Perkins Loans made before July 1, 1993. n51 Borrowers with these older loans are not eligible for economic hardship or unemployment deferments but are eligible for temporary disability deferments, among others. Perkins Loan borrowers who make 12 consecutive timely monthly payments will also be able to rehabilitate defaulted loans. n52

[c] Parent PLUS Deferment

Repayment for PLUS loans generally begins on the date the loan is fully disbursed. n53 There is no grace period. However, graduate PLUS borrowers may defer repayment while they are enrolled in school at least half-time and for loans first disbursed on or after July 1, 2008, for six months after they cease to be enrolled. In addition, in the 2008

Higher Education Opportunity Act, Congress created new in-school deferment provisions for parent PLUS borrowers. n54 The law provides that a parent PLUS borrower may defer repayment of a PLUS loan first disbursed on or after July 1, 2008, during the period while the student on whose behalf the loan was obtained is enrolled on at least a half-time basis and during the six-month period that begins on the later of the day the student ceases to be enrolled or, if the parent borrower is also a student, the day after the parent ceases to be enrolled on at least a half-time basis. The parent PLUS borrower must request this deferment. In July 2009, the Department issued a new parent PLUS borrower deferment request form. n55 The Department also published proposed regulations in July 2009 regarding the parent PLUS deferment and related interest capitalization rules. n56

Forbearance means a loan holder agreeing to a temporary stoppage of payments, an extension of time for making payments, or acceptance of smaller payments. n57 Forbearance is not as helpful for a student as a deferment because interest will continue to accrue while the loan payments are reduced or postponed. Consequently, the size of the outstanding obligation may actually increase during a forbearance period.

On the other hand, forbearance is available even if the student is in default. n58 Obtaining a forbearance agreement will not take the student out of default. But a student in default will obtain a temporary halt to collection actions--such as tax refund intercepts, collection contacts and garnishments--during the forbearance period.

A student not yet in default can use a forbearance agreement to delay going into default. The 180- (now 270-) day period before a delinquency is transformed to a default does not include periods of time when payments are subject to forbearance.

Both FFEL and Direct Loan regulations provide for administrative forbearances under various circumstances, such as while the lender is resolving a change in the loan's status or pending the resolution of a discharge application. n59 With a few limited exceptions such as local or national emergencies, the FFEL administrative forbearances are discretionary. n60

Both programs provide for forbearances during:

- A properly granted period of deferment for which the lender learns the borrower did not qualify. n61
- At the beginning of an authorized deferment period or an administrative forbearance period for FFEL loans. n62
- For Direct Loans, the period in which payments are overdue at the beginning of an authorized deferment period. n63
- The period beginning when the borrower entered repayment until the first payment due date was established. n64
- The period prior to the borrower's filing of a bankruptcy petition. n65
- For FFEL loans, a period not to exceed an additional sixty days after the lender has suspended collection for the initial sixty-day period and receives reliable information that the borrower (or student in the case of a PLUS loan) has died. n66
- For FFEL loans, the periods described in the disability discharge regulations in regard to the borrower's total and permanent disability. n67

- For Direct Loans, a period after the Secretary receives reliable information indicating that the borrower (or the student, in the case of a Direct PLUS Loan) has died or the borrower has become totally and permanently disabled, until the Secretary receives documentation of death or total and permanent disability. n68

- Periods necessary for the Secretary or the guaranty agency to determine the borrower's eligibility for discharge of the loan because of an unpaid refund, attendance at a closed school, or false certification of loan eligibility or the borrower's or, if applicable, endorser's bankruptcy. n69 The Direct Loan regulations specifically include teacher loan forgiveness programs. n70 The FFEL regulations also allow for forbearances for borrowers who are performing the type of service that would qualify the borrower for loan forgiveness and associated forbearance under the requirements of the teacher loan forgiveness program. However, these forbearances are mandatory rather than discretionary. n71

- Periods not to exceed sixty days while the lender collects and processes documentation supporting the borrower's request for a deferment, forbearance, change in repayment plan, or consolidation loan. n72

Administrative forbearances are particularly important to request when a borrower has applied for a consolidation loan or loan discharge and it is likely that considerable time will pass before the application is resolved. In some cases, the loan holder may agree to cease collection while applications are pending but may prefer to call this cessation something other than a forbearance. It is important to advocate aggressively in these cases since the Department clearly has the discretion to grant forbearances in these circumstances.

The Department also issued special forbearance guidance to assist borrowers called to active duty in response to the September 11 terrorist attacks (and aftermath) or those who lived in or worked in the New York City declared disaster area. This guidance required lenders to grant forbearances to borrowers whose loans are in repayment (other than those with in-school deferments) for the expected period of the borrower's active duty service, beginning on the first day of active duty, not to exceed one year. Borrowers must request these forbearances, but lenders must grant them if requested. Forbearances beyond the initial period require supporting documentation and a written agreement with the borrower.

The Department also required mandatory forbearances for borrowers who lived or worked in the New York City designated disaster area. This period of mandatory forbearance was effective from September 11, 2001 through January 31, 2002. To get relief beyond that period, borrowers are required to submit supporting documentation for forbearance, deferment, or other relief. n73

With respect to Perkins loans, for qualified borrowers in the military, the Department has also waived the requirement that a borrower must send a written request and supporting documentation to apply for a Perkins forbearance. Instead, the school must grant a forbearance based on the borrower's status as an "affected individual" for a one-year period, including a three-month "transition period" that immediately follows that period. These forbearances may be granted without supporting documentation or a written agreement, based on the written or oral request of the borrower, a member of the borrower's family, or another reliable source. The purpose of the three-month transition period is to assist borrowers so that they will not be required to reenter repayment immediately after they are no longer "affected individuals." In order to grant the borrower forbearance beyond the initial period, supporting documentation from the borrower, a member of the borrower's family, or another reliable source is required. In addition, affected individuals do not have to provide the loan holder with documentation showing that they are subject to a military mobilization. The borrower, a member of his/her family, or another reliable source may request the forbearance for one year including a three-month transition period without providing the loan holder with documentation. Documentation must be submitted to support a forbearance beyond this period. n74

"Affected individuals" are those who are serving on active duty during a war or other military operation or national emergency, are performing qualifying National Guard duty during a war or other military operation or national emergency, reside or are employed in an area that is declared a disaster area by any federal, state, or local official in connection with a national emergency, or suffered direct economic hardship as a direct result of a war or other military operation or national emergency, as determined by the Secretary. n75 In July 2008, the Department proposed a mandatory forbearance for borrowers who are called to active military duty for more than a thirty day period and who do not qualify for a military service deferment during the active duty period, but do qualify for the post-active duty deferment. n76 These proposals were adopted. The forbearance is available to members of the National Guard who qualify for a post-active-duty deferment but do not qualify for a military or other deferment. The National Guard member must be engaged in active state duty for a period of more than thirty consecutive days beginning on the day after the grace period ends for loans that have not entered repayment or on the day after the borrower ceases at least half-time enrollment for a loan in repayment. n77

[a] Grounds for Seeking a Forbearance

Both the FFEL and Direct Loan regulations provide for forbearances if borrowers are in poor health or have other personal problems that affect the ability of the borrower to make the scheduled payments. n78 Forbearance for these reasons is discretionary under FFEL regulations. n79 The forbearance is granted up to a year at a time, but there are no limits to the number of years this type of forbearance may be granted. n80

Both FFEL and Direct Loan regulations provide for administrative forbearances for various reasons such as while the lender is resolving a change in the loan's status or pending the resolution of a closed school or false certification discharge application. n81 With a few limited exceptions such as local or national emergencies, the FFEL administrative forbearances are discretionary.

The FFEL program also provides for mandatory forbearances, based on a statutory right. n82 This right to forbearance is available even if a student is in default. n83 To obtain mandatory forbearance, the borrower must request a forbearance from the holder of the loan and provide sufficient supporting documentation. n84

Most relevant for low-income borrowers are mandatory administrative forbearances for up to five years in cases where the borrower will not be able to repay the loan within the maximum repayment term. n85

In addition, FFEL and Direct Loan forbearances are mandatory in increments up to one year for periods that collectively do not exceed three years if the amount of the borrower's monthly student loan payments collectively are equal to or greater than 20% of the borrower's total monthly income. n86 Borrowers are required to submit documentation of income and other relevant information.

The 1998 HEA authorizes forbearance for a period not to exceed 60 days after a borrower's request for deferment, forbearance, change in repayment plan or consolidation of loans. This period is meant to give the borrower time to submit supplementary documents or other information. The interest that accrues during the 60-day period cannot be capitalized. n87

The 1998 HEA also establishes an Incentive Repayment Program for Perkins Loan holders, allowing an institution, with the approval of the Secretary, to reduce the interest rate on a loan by no more than 1% if the borrower makes 48 consecutive monthly repayments, or to discount by no more than 5% the balance owed on a loan that the borrower pays in full prior to the end of the repayment period. n88

[b] Private Loan Deferments and Forbearances

Unlike federal loans, there is no federal law requiring private student loan creditors or servicers to offer deferments or forbearances. In a 2008 study, the National Consumer Law Center surveyed private loan notes and found that most lenders provided an in-school deferment option. n89 However, interest generally accrued during this period, and borrowers were given the choice of paying the interest while in school or approving capitalization once they entered repayment.

No forbearance rights were specified in nearly half of the loans in the survey. n90 Creditors may offer these plans, but they do not inform borrowers about available choices ahead of time in the loan notes. A number of lenders in the survey disclosed that they would charge fees to process forbearance and deferment requests. The fees were generally up to $50 for forbearances.

Sallie Mae and other lenders have changed their forbearance policies. Previously, according to allegations in shareholder lawsuits, they heavily encouraged forbearance as a way of keeping delinquency rates lower. n91 The company now says that they are applying far more analysis to forbearance requests to make sure that borrowers are both committed to repaying their debt and have the actual ability to benefit from forbearance. n92 Since the economic crisis of 2008/2009, many lenders that are still offering private student loans are now requiring borrowers to pay interest while in school.

[3] Consolidation Loans

[a] Introduction

Borrowers can consolidate their defaulted student loans into a new Federal Direct Consolidation Loan with an ICRP (Income Contingent Repayment Plan)or obtain an FFEL consolidation loan with an ISRP (Income Sensitive Repayment Plan). As of July 1, 2009, an even better alternative, income-based repayment (IBR) will be available for both FFEL and Direct Loan borrowers. Borrowers in default will first have to get out of default in order to use the new IBR program. They may accomplish this by either rehabilitating or consolidating their loans, as discussed in this chapter. n93

Consolidation loans with ICRP or ISRP are designed for those who cannot afford to repay their existing student loans. Borrowers with family incomes not exceeding the poverty line for their family size need make no payments on Direct Consolidation Loans with ICRP. Payments for others are contingent on family income level and the size of the student loan. n94

After obtaining a Consolidation Loan, the borrower also obtains a fresh start--becoming eligible for new loans, grants, and even deferments. Borrowers will no longer be listed as currently in default on their credit records, and no longer subject to tax intercepts, garnishments, or other collection efforts.

[b] Which Loans Can Be Consolidated

Students can consolidate Subsidized and Unsubsidized Stafford Loans, SLSs, FISLs, PLUS Loans, Direct Loans, Perkins Loans, Health Education Assistance Loans ("HEALs"), n95 and just about any other type of federal student loan. n96 But to consolidate these types of loans, the student must have at least one outstanding FFEL or Direct Loan. n97 Borrowers may also consolidate a FFEL consolidation loan into a Direct consolidation loan if the FFEL consolidation loan is held by a guaranty agency as a result of a bankruptcy claim. The Department clarified in final regulations that even though borrowers with defaulted Direct consolidation loans are no longer eligible to "re-consolidate" except in the circumstances described above, they may enter into rehabilitation agreements that provide for reasonable and affordable payments. n98

Borrowers may also add loans received prior to the date of a consolidation loan during the 180-day period following the making of the consolidation loan. Any new loans received during this period may also be added to the consolidation loan. n99 After the 180-day period is over, the borrower may no longer add loans to the existing consolidation loan.

The Department has internal guidelines for deciding whether to consolidate a defaulted Direct Consolidation Loan. Specifically, the Department will not "re- consolidate" a consolidation loan if the underlying loans in the defaulted consolidation loan had been in default. In practice, this means that a borrower can consolidate defaulted loans with the Direct Loan program only once.

Borrowers have the option to consolidate all, just some, or even just one of their existing student loans. Married borrowers can also choose to consolidate loans from both spouses. n100 There is no minimum or maximum size for a Direct Consolidation Loan.

It is important for borrowers to understand that FFEL consolidation rules limit borrowers to one consolidation loan, locking borrowers in at the current rate for the life of the loan. n101 According to the Department, Direct Consolidation Loan borrowers could conceivably consolidate more than once but, given the restrictive formula for calculating interest rates, this may not be an advantage for many borrowers. In general, depending on how much a borrower owes and the length of the consolidated loan, a borrower who chooses to consolidate could end up spending more in interest over the longer time period. The Department warns that, in some situations, consolidation can double a borrower's total interest expense. Consolidation can also add additional fees to the borrower's balance, including collection fees, as noted above.

Another problem to consider is that many borrowers who consolidate a defaulted student loan will default again within twelve months. This is particularly true among borrowers who consolidate defaulted loans. According to a 2000 General Accounting Office study, over 20,000 borrowers repaying consolidation loans under the ICRP had already defaulted on one or more of their underlying loans. This group of previous defaulters had default rates on their consolidation loans over 40%. n102 In addition, consolidation results in a borrower losing some ability to raise school-related defenses. n103

Borrowers have many choices with respect to loan consolidation lenders and brokers. The maximum interest rates are set by federal law, although lenders are free to offer lower rates. n104 The differences between programs can be seen mainly in discounts the lenders can offer. Many lenders offer discounts to borrowers who enroll in the lender's automatic bill payment program. Another discount is often given as a reward for making a series of on-time payments, usually after a few years. Sallie Mae, for example, has offered a 0.25 percent immediate interest rate reduction to borrowers who enroll in automatic payment and an additional 1 percent reduction to those who make regular, on-time payments for three years on loan balances of more than $10,000. Some lenders will provide cash rebates to borrowers who make regular on-time payments rather than lowering interest rates. n105

[4] Reasonable and Affordable and Other Repayment Plans; Loan Rehabilitation

For those in default to guarantors or the Department on FFELs, one of the best options to reschedule payments is to seek a reasonable and affordable payment plan based on the total financial circumstances. The defaulted borrower has a statutory right to such a plan, and payments can be as low as $5 a month or less. n106

A student can renew eligibility for new loans and grants and cure the loan default by "rehabilitating" the defaulted loan. Loan rehabilitation for FFELs and Direct Loans may be requested after the borrower has made nine payments within 20 days of the due date during a consecutive period of 10 months. n107 The payment amount is determined by the guaranty agency (or the United States if it is holding the loan) in the same way as a reasonable and affordable payment plan to renew eligibility. n108

[5] Guaranty Agency Compromise and Write-Off Authority

The Department has approved Standardized Compromise and Write-Off Procedures for use by all guaranty agencies for FFELs. n109 The compromise standards relate to a negotiated agreement between the student loan borrower and the guaranty agency to accept less than full payment as full liquidation of the entire debt.

This compromise will often, but not always, be binding on the United States. It is important for borrowers to secure written verification of this point to assure that the United States will not demand the student's balance at a later date.

Write-off is different from compromise. The write-off procedures for FFEL loans are intended only to stop guaranty agency collection activity. In general, write-off does not relieve the debtor of the debt. This is in contrast to Perkins write-offs, through which the borrower can be relieved of all repayment obligations. n110 Once a guaranty agency has written-off an FFEL loan, it must permanently assign the loan to the Depart- ment. n111 The exception to this policy is that guaranty agencies have the authority to write-off loans with principal balances of less than $100 and a total balance of less than $1,000, and any loans in which the remaining balance represents only interest, attorney fees, court costs, or collection costs without requiring the permanent assignment of the loan to the Department. n112 Write-off and assignment may in some cases be less desirable for the borrower, particularly if the United States seeks larger collection fees than the guaranty agency.

The Department sets out guidelines for guaranty agencies to consider in deciding whether to write off loans and cease collection activity. Agencies are required to consider the debtor's and, if applicable, an endorser's current inability to repay the debt. Examples of borrowers who might qualify include: borrowers who are repeatedly unemployed and have no prospects for future employment; borrowers who repeatedly are public assistance recipients; borrowers who are chronically ill, partially disabled, or of an age that results in their inability to work; borrowers whose potential for future earnings is limited or non-existent; and borrowers who have no other funds available to them from other sources, such as inheritance. Borrowers who receive a compromise or write-off must reaffirm the amount compromised or written-off if they later want to receive an FFEL loan. n113 Perkins lenders have discretion to write-off a loan balance less than $25 or less than $50 if, for a period of at least two years, the borrower has been billed (and has not paid) the balance. n114 When a school writes-off an account, the borrower is relieved of all repayment obligations. n115

As of July 1, 2003, there are new, less onerous, requirements for borrowers applying for the unemployment deferment based on a conscientious employment search. See 67 Fed. Reg. 67,048 (Nov. 1, 2002) ; United States DOE, Dear Colleague Letter GEN-03-04, Approval of Revised Unemployment Deferment and Economic Hardship Deferment Forms for the Federal Family Education Loan Program (Mar. 2003). To get the initial deferment, the borrower is required to certify that she is diligently seeking but unable to find full-time employment and that she is registered with a public or private employment agency. 34 C.F.R. § 682.210(h)(2)(i). The initial period of deferment can be granted for a period of unemployment that begins up to six months before the lender receives the borrower's request and can be granted for up to six months after that date. 34 C.F.R. § 682.210(h)(2)(i).

No. 110-84, 121 Stat. 784 (Sept. 27, 2007), to conform to the definition of "partial financial hardship" that is necessary to qualify for an income-based repayment plan (IBR). Currently, a borrower working full-time is considered to have an economic hardship if his or her income does not exceed the greater of the minimum wage or the amount equal to 100% of the poverty line for a family of two. Under the new definition, the "100% of the poverty line for a family of two" is replaced by 150% of the poverty line applicable to the borrower's family size.

The criteria for borrowers not working full-time should remain the same, including receipt of federal or state public assistance benefits.

A later Dear Colleague Letter, GEN-03-06 (Mar. 2003), provides additional guidance and extends most of the time limits for borrowers actively serving in the military. The current military deferment applies for only three years and is available only during periods in which borrowers are serving on active duty, or performing qualifying National Guard duty, during a war or other military operation.

Congress eliminated the three-year limit on the military deferment and expanded eligibility to include the six-month period following the demobilization dates of qualified service members when it enacted the College Cost Reduction and Access Act of 2007. Pub. L. No. 110-84, 121 Stat. 784 (Sept. 27, 2007). However, the time limits for all non-military deferments remain unchanged.

In addition to any other deferments, members of the National Guard or other reserve component of the Armed Forces or retired members of the Armed Forces, called to active duty within six months of when they are enrolled or were enrolled in school, are eligible for a deferment during the thirteen months following the conclusion of service. This right expires upon return to enrolled status in school.

(n25)Footnote 25. This same September 2001 guidance also required lenders to grant forbearances to loans that are in repayment (other than those in an in-school deferment status) for the expected period of the borrower's active duty service. The borrower is required to request this forbearance, but it must be granted upon request. See United States DOE, Dear Colleague Letter GEN-01-13 (Sept. 2001). Lenders are also required to cease collection activities against borrowers in default for the expected period of the borrower's military service through September 14, 2002. PART I Consumer Credit

1-12 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 12.06

§ 12.06 Cancelling Student Loan Obligations

[1] Introduction

The statutory forms of discharge discussed below and the common law defenses offer the borrower complete relief relative to a student loan, as opposed to simply delaying the repayment obligation. Thus, the student no longer owes anything on the loan, and the student becomes eligible again for new student loans and grants.

[2] The Closed School Discharge

[a] The Closed School Discharge Applies to Specified Types of Loans

The closed school discharge is applicable to the student's obligation and that of all endorsers of Direct Loans n1 and FFELs received at least in part on or after January 1, 1986. n2 The closed school discharge thus applies to Staffords and SLSs and the parents' obligation under PLUS Loans. n3

If a student consolidates a loan eligible for discharge, the consolidation loan is not discharged, but the student receives a credit in the amount of the original loan relating to the closed school. n4 In addition, the closed school discharge does not apply to FFEL loans where all of the loan was received before January 1, 1986, or to Perkins Loans or FISLs.

[b] Determining if a Student Qualifies for a Discharge

The HEA states that the Secretary shall discharge one of the specified loans if the borrower was unable to complete the program due to the school's closure. n5 The regulations provide this discharge if the branch of the school at which the student attended closed. n6 The closed school discharge applies to any school at which the student obtained an FFEL or Direct Loan, whether or not the school or branch was in fact an eligible institution under the program. n7

The regulations provide a discharge if the student was still enrolled at the time of the school's closure n8 or if the student withdrew from the school within ninety days before the school's closure. n9 The ninety-day period may be extended if the Secretary determines that exceptional circumstances related to the school's closing would justify an extension. n10

The Secretary determines the closure date, and, for most situations, the student should rely on the Secretary's Cumulative List Of Closed Schools to determine the official closure date. n11

Students can obtain closed school discharges if the school closed before they completed a program, even if the school issued the student a diploma or other certificate. On the other hand, if a student completes a program, there is no discharge even if the student never received a diploma or certificate. n12

Students are also barred from receiving a discharge if they completed the program through a "teach-out" at another school, or through transfer of credits or hours earned at the closed school to another school. n13

[c] Relief Available for Those Obtaining a Closed School Discharge

When a student receives a closed school discharge, the student (and any other obligor on the note) is no longer obligated to repay the loan or any charges or costs associated with the loan. n14 That is, the loan principal, interest charges, collection costs, and all other charges are forgiven.

In addition, the student is reimbursed all amounts paid to date on the loan, whether those payments were voluntary or involuntary, such as through tax intercepts or garnishments. n15 The borrower is no longer regarded in default, and is immediately eligible for new loans and grants. n16

The discharge of an FFEL must also be reported to all credit reporting agencies to which the holder previously reported the loan's status "so as to delete all adverse credit history assigned to the loan." n17

[d] How to Obtain a Closed School Discharge

The Department and guaranty agencies will not automatically provide discharges to those who appear eligible. Students must apply for the discharge. Guarantors are required to inform those appearing eligible of their right to apply, with an application form, and the guarantors must forbear collecting from these individuals. n18

To apply for a discharge, students will typically fill-out forms created by the loan holder, and submit the application to the loan holder. The regulations specify the minimum information required, and it is this information that the student should make sure is included on the application. n19

There is no time limit on a student's eligibility for a discharge. n20 As discharge decisions often take many years to process, advocates should be prepared to request administrative forebearances for students so that collection activities will cease until the discharge has been granted or denied. n21 The regulations do not set out a review right for denial of a closed school discharge application. The Department expects guaranty agencies to respond to discharge requests within ninety days, although the Department has not set any time limits for its own response to discharge requests. The Department has published a new form for closed school discharge applications. n22 In addition, the 1998 HEA authorizes the Department and guaranty agencies to grant closed school discharges without a written application if there is enough information to establish discharge. n23 Specifically, a discharge may be granted without an application if 1) the borrower received a discharge for a Perkins or direct loan for the same program of study or 2) the Department or guaranty agency determines that the borrower qualifies for a discharge based on information in the Secretary or agency's possession. This may facilitate advocacy that a group of students be given a closed school discharge in settlement of an action, instead of requiring each student to submit an application.

[e] Effect of School Closure on Perkins, FISLs, and Older FFELs

The 1998 HEA expands the closed school discharge to Perkins Loans made on or after January 1, 1986. n24 As a consequence, students with Perkins Loans should not apply for closed school discharges because the Department is certain to deny the application as not within the scope of the statute.

The closed school discharge applies only to loans disbursed after January 1, 1986. As a consequence, students whose loans were disbursed in full before that date should not seek a closed school discharge. Instead, these students will have to pursue other approaches.

[3] False Certification Discharge

[a] In General

Students are entitled to a loan discharge if they received at least part of an FFEL after January 1, 1986, n25 or received a Direct Loan, and if their eligibility to borrow was falsely certified by the school. n26

The Department recognizes only three bases for a false certification discharge:

a) The school falsifies a non-high school graduate's ability to benefit from the program.

b) The school enrolls a student unable to meet minimum state employment requirements for the job for which the student is being trained.

c) The school forges or alters the student loan note or check endorsements.

[b] Discharge Based on Ability-to-Benefit (ATB) Fraud

Department regulations authorize a false certification discharge if, as a non-high school graduate, n27 the student was nonetheless admitted to a school and the school falsified the student's ability to benefit from the program. n28 For a school not to have falsified the ability of a student enrolled after July 1, 1987 n29 to benefit from the school, the student must have done at least one of the following:

a) Passed an ability-to-benefit ("ATB") test, the test being approved by the accrediting agency (or for enrollments after July 1, 1991, by the Secretary) and administered substantially in accordance with the test publisher's or accreditor's requirements for use of the test; n30

b) Successfully completed a program of developmental or remedial education provided by the school; n31 or

c) Enrolled before July 1, 1991 and received a general education diploma before completing the program of instruction. n32 The Higher Education Opportunity Act added a new "ability to benefit" qualification category. Students may be shown to have the ability to benefit from the education or training upon satisfactory completion of six credit hours or the equivalent coursework that are applicable toward a degree or certificate offered by the institution of higher education. n33 It is unclear how this will work in practice. For example, a student may enroll in a course and presumably not be eligible for federal aid but then qualify later if she completes the six credit hours.

For periods of enrollment after July 1, 1996 and before June 30, 2000, the student must have done at least one of the following:

- Obtained a passing score on an independently administered test; n34 or

- Enrolled in an eligible institution that participates in an alternative admissions process. n35 Alternative processes can be implemented by the states for some or all schools in that state. These processes must be approved by the Secretary of Education. In order to gain approval, the state must present certain information including proof of a minimum success rate. n36

For periods of enrollment beginning on or after July 1, 2000, the student must meet one of the two conditions discussed above for July 1, 1996 through June 30, 2000, or meet the requirements for valid home schooling. n37

For example, a school not administering a valid test where one is required is a clear example of ATB fraud. Even if an approved ATB test is used, a false certification discharge may still be granted if the student was not given the appropriate portion of the test. n38 The Department also considers various testing errors, even if unintentional, proof of ATB falsification. n39

A further precondition is placed on students that completed the program. The student must show that a reasonable attempt was made to obtain employment in the field for which the student received training. n40 The requirement that students show failure to find employment was successfully challenged in the D.C. Circuit. n41 This precondition to a false certification discharge was found to be inconsistent with the governing statute and therefore invalid. After this decision, the DOE agreed to extend the benefits of the ruling to borrowers nationwide. The Department's action was initially confirmed in a July 2000 Dear Colleague Letter and later formalized in new regulations effective July 1, 2001. n42

[c] Discharge Based on Student's Inability to Meet Minimum State Job Requirements

Even students with a high school diploma can receive a false certification discharge if, at the time of the student's enrollment, "the student would not meet the requirements for employment (in the student's state of residence) in the occupation for which the training program supported by the loan was intended because of physical or mental condition, or age, or criminal record or other reason accepted by the Secretary." n43

The discharge should also apply where the school's program, instead of the student, does not meet minimum state requirements. For example, a discharge should be available where a program was not certified by the state, and graduation from a certified program is a precondition under state law for employment.

Borrowers should submit detailed documentation of the status or condition that prevents them from working in the particular field. In addition, the Department will generally require a copy of the state statute or regulation showing the requirements for employment in the particular field and that the condition or status would prevent the student from meeting those requirements.

A third important basis for a false certification discharge is if the student's signature was forged on the loan application, promissory note, loan check endorsement, or authorization for an electronic funds transfer. n44 If the borrower's signature appears forged, the student must submit five specimens of the student's own signature, two of which had to have been within one year of the forgery. n45

A false certification discharge for a forged check is only available if the proceeds of the forged check went toward tuition payments the student was not obligated to pay, such as that portion of tuition not owed under the applicable refund formula after the student had dropped out. n46 The regulations and a Dear Colleague Letter appear to place the burden not on the student, but on the guaranty agency to determine whether the forged check proceeds went toward a legitimate student obligation or not. n47

The Department will not grant a discharge based on forgery if the borrower benefited from the loan. n48 This cancellation only applies if the school forged the borrower's signature or endorsed the borrower's loan without authorization. n49 A borrower may still qualify for a cancellation if someone else committed the forgery by either applying for a discharge based on identity theft or by challenging the enforceability of the loan due to forgery. n50

The relief available for those obtaining a false certification discharge is identical to that for a closed school discharge. n51

[e] How to Apply for a False Certification Discharge

There is no time limit on a student's eligibility for a false certification discharge. n52 Whether a student seeks a discharge based on a disqualifying condition, ATB falsification, or a forged check, the application should be directed to the entity holding the loan, almost always either a guaranty agency or the DOE.

According to the regulations, the student must submit a written request for a discharge and a sworn statement (not notarized, but sworn under the penalty of perjury) attesting:

> (1) Whether the student has made a claim against another party on the loan (such as from a state tuition recovery fund);
> (2) That at least part of the loan was disbursed after January 1, 1986;
> (3) That the student agrees, at the Secretary's request, to provide additional information concerning the student's eligibility for a discharge; and
> (4) That the student will cooperate with the Secretary in enumerated enforcement actions and to assign to the Secretary certain rights the student has to recover from third parties. n53

Since discharge applications often take many years to process, advocates should be prepared to request administrative forbearances for students so that collection activities will cease until the discharge has been granted or denied. n54 The Department's delays in making decisions on false certification discharges are among the issues raised in a 1998 class action complaint. The complaint alleges that the Secretary has not assigned adequate staff to administer the program, resulting in a backlog of over 10,000 undecided applications that have been pending, in some cases, for years. n55

[f] Identity Theft

The Higher Education Reconciliation Act of 2005 provides for discharges of FFEL or Direct loans if the borrower's eligibility to borrow was falsely certified due to identity theft. n56 This basis for a discharge became effective on July 1, 2006.

The regulations published in August 2006 require a borrower seeking this discharge to

- certify that the borrower did not sign the promissory note or that any other means of identification used to obtain the loan was used without the borrower's authorization;
- certify that the borrower did not receive or benefit from the proceeds of the loan with knowledge that the loan had been made without the borrower's authorization; and
- provide a copy of a local, state, or federal court verdict or judgment that conclusively determines that the borrower was a victim of the crime of identity theft and that the loan in question was made as a result of that theft. n57

If the judicial determination of the crime does not expressly state that the loan was obtained as a result of the crime, the borrower must provide authentic samples of his or her signature or other means of identification and a statement of facts that demonstrate that the borrower's eligibility for the loan in question was falsely certified as a result of identity theft.

The Department clarifies in the interim regulations that it is not suggesting in any way that borrowers are liable for loans they did not execute or authorize when there is no crime of identity theft. n58 The Department reiterated this point in final regulations, stating that an individual who claims that a signature was forged is not required to delay asserting that claim until a criminal prosecution occurs and nothing in the regulations requires such a delay. n59 Borrowers may also be eligible for false-certification discharges due to forgery. n60 In addition, they may have common law contract defenses or other defenses derived from HEA regulations. For example, FFEL program regulations provide that benefits are payable to loan holders only when the lender obtained a legally enforceable promissory note to evidence the loan. n61 Lender rights are also subject to the obligation of the lender to exercise due diligence in making the loan. n62

[4] Discharging Student Loans in Bankruptcy

[a] When Can a Student Loan Be Discharged in Bankruptcy?

A chapter 7 or 13 discharge eliminates all of a debtor's unsecured debts, with certain statutory exceptions. While student loans are unsecured debts subject to discharge, the Bankruptcy Code restricts when most types of student loans can be discharged in either a chapter 7 or chapter 13 bankruptcy.

Student loan debtors suffered a major setback in 1998 to their ability to discharge student loans. For all bankruptcy cases filed on or after October 7, 1998, the discharge of student loans which first became due more than seven years prior to the bankruptcy filing will no longer be allowed. n63 Cases pending on October 7, 1998 are not affected by the change in the law.

Most educational loans can only be discharged if the consumer can show that payment of the debt "will impose an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor's dependents." n64

This special restriction on dischargeability applies to educational loans "made, insured or guaranteed by any governmental unit, or made under any program funded in whole or in part by a government unit or a nonprofit institution." n65 Consequently, the dischargeability of Stafford, SLS, Federal Direct, and Perkins Loans are all restricted. Most courts find these limitations apply not only to student borrowers, but also to parents who co-sign a student loan or take out a PLUS or other loan for their child's education. n66

In addition, the limits apply to loans by state agencies and nonprofit organizations. n67 Loans made by for-profit institutions may be discharged. n68 The limits on dischargeability also apply to educational benefit overpayments (such as Pell grant overpayments) and obligations to repay funds received as educational benefits, scholarships or stipends. n69 They do not apply to a student's nonpayment of tuition, which does not involve an extension of credit. n70 The limits on dischargeability on HEALs are more severe than for other student loans. n71

[b] Discharging Student Loans Over Seven Years Old No Longer Allowed for Cases Filed After October 7, 1998

For all bankruptcy cases filed after October 7, 1998, the discharge of student loans which first became due more than seven years prior to the bankruptcy filing will no longer be allowed. n72 For cases filed before October 7, 1998, or still pending on that date, if the first student loan installment meets the seven-year test, then the entire loan and not just the first installment can be discharged. n73

The most important issue in counting the seven year period is that the seven years are "exclusive of any applicable suspension of the repayment period." n74 This means that a deferment or forbearance may lengthen the seven year period if repayments were suspended during that period. n75 Students also have to be aware of the bankruptcy implications of consolidating one or more student loans into a new consolidated loan. This may start the seven year period running all over again with the consolidated loan. n76

[c] Substantial Hardship as Basis for Discharging Student Loan

A student loan may be discharged if payment of the debt "will impose an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor's dependents." n77 There is no statutory definition of "undue hardship." Generally, it means the consumer's present income is inadequate to pay the loan and future earning potential will not change this situation. n78 The consumer may also have to show that the attempt to discharge the debt is in good faith. n79 The student's undue hardship argument may be stronger where the student loan arose from a private vocational school that closed down or defrauded the student.

Whether a student loan is discharged based on hardship is not automatically determined in the bankruptcy proceeding. The debtor must affirmatively seek such a determination. If the debtor fails to do so, and a loan holder subsequently attempts to collect on the loan, the loan's dischargeability can be resolved at that later date either by the bankruptcy court or by a state court in a proceeding relating to the note's collection. In general, it is best to resolve the loan's dischargeability in the bankruptcy court while the case is pending. The student may do this by bringing an adversary proceeding in the bankruptcy court seeking a declaratory judgment that a particular debt is dischargeable. n80 An "adversary proceeding" is a lawsuit within the bankruptcy case initiated by the filing of an adversary complaint. It is subject to rules almost identical to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, including those relating to discovery procedure. n81 As an alternative to or in conjunction with pursuing an undue hardship action, a debtor may wish to raise issues of fraud or lack of educational benefit from a program by challenging the creditor's proof of claim or through nonbankruptcy administrative remedies. n82

[d] Student's Rights After Bankruptcy Discharge

If there has been a judicial determination that a student loan is discharged in bankruptcy, the consumer is no longer liable for the obligation and is protected from any attempt to collect the debt. n83 Similarly, a school cannot withhold a former student's transcripts just because the debt has been discharged in bankruptcy. n84

In addition, the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1994 specifies that those discharging student loans in bankruptcy remain eligible for new loans and grants. The United States, guarantors, and lenders cannot discriminate against those who have not paid their student loans where those loans were discharged in bankruptcy. n85

Nevertheless, the Department will look to a prior bankruptcy in considering an applicant's future creditworthiness in applying for PLUS loans.

[e] Discharge of Student Loans Owed to State Agencies

Following the Supreme Court decision in Seminole Tribe v. Florida, state agencies collecting student loan debts aggressively asserted Eleventh Amendment immunity (sovereign immunity) as a way of barring debtors from discharging student loans in bankruptcy. n86 The issue of sovereign immunity arises because debtors must affirmatively seek student loan discharges through an adversary proceeding. State agencies had argued that this proceeding, which they characterized as a private suit in federal court against the state, was barred by the Eleventh Amendment. n87

Fortunately for student loan debtors, the sovereign immunity issue in undue hardship cases has now been resolved favorably by the Supreme Court. In Tennessee Student Assistance Corp. v. Hood, n88 the Court relied upon an exception previously carved out for admiralty proceedings and held that a bankruptcy dischargeability suit brought against the state does not implicate a state's Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit.

Another issue that may arise in these cases is the threshold question of whether the state actor collecting the loan is truly an "arm of the state." n89 If not, the state actor should not be entitled to assert sovereign immunity.

Most circuit courts have established a multi-prong test to determine whether an agency is an "arm of the state." n90 The foremost factor under these tests is whether the state will be financially burdened by the action in question. n91 This should be a strong argument in the student loan context within which states are usually not responsible for guaranty agencies' financial obligations n92 because such entities typically have a legal existence distinct from the state. n93 Moreover, based on their contractual arrangement with the Department of Education, guaranty agencies are reimbursed by the federal government for most of the indebtedness on discharged loans. n94 One court has applied the various factors of the "arm of the state" test to a student loan authority and found that it was not entitled to claim sovereign immunity. n95

[5] Discharge Based on Death, Disability

The borrower's death is a defense to collection actions on Stafford, SLS, Perkins, and Federal Direct Loans, and both parents' or the student's death discharges PLUS loans. n96 The borrower's permanent and total disability also excuses payment, although for a PLUS loan the disability of only one of two obligated parents does not discharge the debt. n97 There are also separate regulations allowing disability discharges for Health Education Assistance Loan Program (HEAL) loan borrowers. The Secretary of Health and Human Services (HHS) has the authority to discharge HEAL loans based on a finding of total and permanent disability. n98 Borrowers must provide HHS with medical evidence no more than four months old to substantiate disability claims. n99 The definition of total and permanent disability for HEAL loans is similar, but not precisely the same, as the definition for most other federal loans. HEAL loans may be discharged if the borrower is "unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity because of a medically determinable impairment, which the Secretary expects to continue for a long and indefinite period of time or to result in death." n100 The definition of total and permanent disability for FFEL loans is: "The condition of an individual who is unable to work and earn money because of an injury or illness that is expected to continue indefinitely or result in death." n101 The disability defense may rely on a preexisting condition only if that condition has deteriorated. n102

Prior to 1999, a disabled borrower simply had a licensed physician certify that the borrower was permanently disabled with an onset date after the date of the loan. This had to be done on the proper form and the discharge was almost always granted.

In 1999, the Department's Inspector General ("IG") conducted a study that led to a Department crackdown on alleged fraud. The IG found that 23% of borrowers who received disability discharges in a specified time period worked and earned money after the disability determination was made or the loan was discharged. n103

The Department initially set out a more restrictive approach to evaluating disability discharges in a November 1999 Dear Colleague letter. n104 A subsequent May 2002 Dear Colleague letter reiterated these standards and clarified the disability process under the new disability discharge regulations. n105

The disability procedures under the new program are as follows:

- The borrower applies to the loan holder for a discharge. The lender may continue collection until it receives the certification of disability. n106 After receiving the certification, the lender must cease collection efforts. n107 The Department interprets the regulations to apply only to lenders. According to the Department, a guaranty agency or the Department may continue at least certain collection efforts even after receipt of a disability discharge application. However, the Department claims that, if it is the loan holder, action on a completed application should occur within a few days. The loan holder makes a preliminary determination as to whether the borrower meets the criteria for a disability discharge. For

Perkins Loans, the school makes this determination. In the FFEL program, the current holder makes the determination. For Direct Loans, the Department's direct loan staff makes the decision. n108

The Department intends for this preliminary determination to be a rigorous process. The Department's expectations were initially set out in the November 1999 Dear Colleague letter and affirmed in the May 2002 letter.

The Department requires guaranty agencies and others making preliminary disability determinations at a minimum to:

- Require additional information to support the borrower's application where the information provided is not definitive, is illegible, or incomplete.

- Reaffirm the physician's certification if the diagnosis and prognosis do not appear to reach the standard of total and permanent disability.

- Assist borrowers to obtain deferments or forbearances in cases when it does not appear that the borrower is totally and permanently disabled. n109

The Department also suggests that agencies may want to seek the assistance of a qualified physician to evaluate discharge requests. n110

The Department will review all preliminarily approved loans to affirm that the borrower meets the disability discharge criteria. If the Department agrees with the preliminary determination, the borrower is placed in a conditional discharge status for three years beginning on the date the borrower became totally and permanently disabled. n111

The 2008 HEA reauthorization law amends the definition of total and permanent disability in a number of important ways. The effective date of these amendments is July 1, 2010. n112 The new definition is more favorable for borrowers on one hand because it allows discharges to be granted to borrowers not only with conditions that are expected to result in death, but also if the conditions have lasted for a continuous period of not less than sixty months or can be expected to last for this sixty month period. However, the law specifically allows the Department to develop safeguards as necessary to prevent fraud and abuse, including regulations to reinstate the obligation and resume collection for any borrower who receives a new loan or earns income in excess of the poverty line after receiving a discharge. Depending on how the regulations are crafted, it may be easier to get a discharge, but more difficult to retain the benefits over time.

The new definition also states that a borrower who has been determined by the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to be unemployable due to a service-connected condition and who provides documentation of such determination shall be considered permanently and totally disabled and shall not be required to present additional documentation.

The Department describes the review process as a three-step system. Before getting to this point, as discussed earlier, both the lender and guaranty agency (or solely the guaranty agency if the lender had assigned the loan to the agency before the borrower applied for discharge) must have made a preliminary determination of disability. The loan is then assigned to the Department. At this point, the Department will review the previous determinations. This review will generally include further contact with the borrower's physician. The Department will have a medical professional take a look at the applications to ensure that the medical information is sufficient. To help overcome this hurdle, it is critical that borrowers submit as much medical documentation as possible along with their application. The Department claims that it will try to set a time limit of about thirty days for this medical review process.

Assuming the borrower passes the Department's additional medical review, the next step is to confirm that the borrower did not receive any disqualifying federal loans. If the conditional period has already passed, the Department will check back to review whether the borrower took out any Perkins, FFEL, or Direct Loans during the conditional period. The only exception is that the borrower is permitted to receive a FFEL or Direct Consolidation Loan during the conditional period as long as it does not include any loans that are in a conditional discharge status. n113 Presumably, this means that the borrower could have received loans prior to his disability that he later chose to consolidate. If the conditional period has not yet passed, the Department will continue to monitor borrowers to determine whether they receive any disqualifying federal loans.

If the borrower overcomes both of these hurdles, the Department will then confirm that the borrower has no disqualifying earnings during the conditional period, as described above. The Department's process can be time-consuming. However, during this review period, all collection activity should cease and interest should not be accruing on the borrower's loans. n114

If the borrower satisfies the criteria for a disability discharge during and at the end of the conditional discharge period, the balance of the loan will be discharged. n115 Any payments received after the date the borrower became disabled are to be returned. n116

The Department has developed a new disability request form incorporating these changes. n117 Unfortunately, borrowers will often find that a discharge is denied even after they have submitted a properly completed physician's certification of total and permanent disability. Such denials may be appealed under the judicial review provision of the Administrative Procedures Act. n118

Sometimes a student who receives a discharge because of a permanent disability is able at a later date to go back to school--either to pursue job training which medical or technological changes have now made feasible or to obtain a more general education. The Department has issued regulations concerning students who have received disability discharges for FFELs or Federal Direct Loans and want to regain eligibility for new FFELs or Federal Direct Loans. To regain eligibility, the student must obtain a doctor's certificate that the student can engage in substantial gainful activity, and must sign a statement acknowledging that the new loan cannot be cancelled in the future on the basis of any impairment present when the new loan is made, unless that impairment substantially deteriorates. n119

A lender is required to cease collecting on a loan after receiving a physician's certificate or letter supporting a disability claim. n120 In addition, once the lender is notified that the guaranty agency has discharged a loan, the lender is required to return to the borrower any payment received after the date that the borrower became permanently disabled as certified by the physician. n121 The lender is also required at that time to notify the borrower that there is no obligation to repay a loan discharged on the basis of disability. n122

The 1998 HEA requires the Secretary of Education to consult with the Secretary of Veterans Affairs to establish a procedure to permit Department of Veterans Affairs physicians to provide the information necessary to enable disabled veterans to document eligibility for deferments or cancellations of student loans. n123

[6] Other Loan Cancellations

Perkins Loans may be completely cancelled in certain circumstances, including the debtor's service in Head Start or in the military service in an area "of hostilities." n124 The Department has issued rules describing in detail the "affected individuals" eligible for these waivers. The category includes borrowers serving on active duty during a war or other military operation or national emergency, performing qualifying National Guard duty during a war or other military operation or national emergency, residing or employed in an area that is declared a disaster area by any federal, state, or local official in connection with a national emergency, or suffering direct economic hardship as a direct result of a war or other military operation or national emergency, as determined by the Secretary. n125 The reason for the interruption in service must be related to the borrower's status as an "affected individual."

The Perkins program was also the first to provide for cancellations of loans for teachers in low-income school districts and for other service, including military and volunteer service. n126 Perkins cancellations are available even for borrowers in default in certain circumstances. n127 Despite the language in the statute and regulations, there is still some ambiguity regarding eligibility for some of the Perkins loan cancellations. For example, a class of public interest attorneys sued the Department after the Department terminated them from the Perkins "Children's and Family Service" cancellation program. n128 The District Court held that the Perkins Loan public service employment cancellation did not apply to public service attorneys working for New York City's Administration for Children's Services. n129 The Second Circuit reversed. n130 The Second Circuit refused to defer to the Department's informal interpretations of qualifications for the Perkins "Full-time Employment in a Public or Private Nonprofit Child or Family Service Agency" cancellation. In reaching this decision, the court found that, based on the criteria listed in the statute, the plaintiffs qualified for cancellation of their Perkins loans.

The Second Circuit noted that the Department's regulations setting out the qualifications for this cancellation simply repeat the statutory language verbatim. n131 Further, the Department's restrictive interpretation of the eligibility criteria was derived not from the regulations but from the Federal Student Aid Office's Financial Aid Handbook and informal e-mails from Department of Education staff. The Second Circuit found that the Chevron deference to the Department in this case was clearly inapplicable. n132 Although denying plaintiffs' claims, the court acknowledged that the statute and regulations do not define the meaning of "providing services" for purposes of determining eligibility. However, the court found that the Department has consistently applied the term to require "exclusive" and "direct" service to at-risk populations.

Since the Second Circuit decision, the Department has clarified its position in a Dear Colleague letter and in proposed regulations. n133 Regulations proposed in June 2007 expand on the current regulations and specify that, to qualify for a child or family service cancellation, a borrower who is a full-time, non-supervisory employee of a child or family service agency must be providing services directly and exclusively to high-risk children from low-income communities. n134 In addition, the proposed regulations specify that any services provided to the children's families must be secondary to the services provided to the high-risk children. n135

The proposed rules became final in November 2007. n136 At that time, the Department clarified that an attorney who is an employee of a child or family service agency must meet the same eligibility requirements as any other non-supervisory employee of a child or family service agency. The attorney must provide services directly and exclusively to high-risk children from low-income communities. Discharge determinations are made on a case-by-case basis and require consideration of the attorney's specific responsibilities. However, according to the Department, in general if the attorney represents the agency in court, the attorney is not providing services directly to the child. If the attorney represents children in court such as in the role of a guardian ad litem, the attorney would be considered to be providing services directly to the child. n137

The FFEL and Direct Loan programs recently added similar loan forgiveness regulations for teachers, effective July 1, 2001. n138

The FFEL and Direct Loan programs apply only to borrowers with no outstanding loan balances as of October 1, 1998 or later. Unlike the Perkins programs, FFEL and Direct Loan borrowers are not eligible for teacher loan forgiveness for defaulted loans unless they first make satisfactory repayment arrangements and reestablish loan eligibility. n139 Proposed rules issued in August 2002 for the Direct Loan program include new language stating that a joint Direct Consolidation loan may be partially discharged if one of the borrowers qualifies for teacher loan forgiveness. n140 These proposed rules were finalized in November 2002 and are effective as of July 1, 2003. n141 In 2006, Congress passed a new program to provide loan forgiveness for spouses and parents of certain individuals who died or who became permanently disabled due to the September 11 attacks. n142

[7] Forgery, Mistake, Infancy, and Other Defenses to Loan Enforceability

A student's obligation to pay a student loan is conditioned upon the loan agreement being enforceable under basic contract principles that affect a borrower's obligation on any note, such as forgery, mistake, and fraud. The only common law contract defense not available to student loan borrowers is infancy; that is, that the student was under age when signing the loan document. The HEA specifies that the U.S. and guaranty agencies, irrespective of state law on the issue, shall not be subject to a claim of infancy. n143

The HEA does not limit other contract defenses, and these should thus apply to student loans as they do to any other type of loan. The Department on numerous occasions has stated that the student does not owe on a loan, and guaranty agencies should not seek payment, to the extent to which the loan obligation is not enforceable under state law. n144

[8] Discharge for Unpaid Refunds

In November 1999, the DOE finalized regulations that provide an important new basis to discharge a student loan: that the school failed to make an owed refund to the student. n145

Failure to provide refunds was one of the most common complaints during the heyday of trade school fraud in the 1980s and early 1990s. Many borrowers signed up for schools, never attended classes, but were still charged the full amount of the loan. This new discharge should fill in some of the gaps left by the closed school and false certification discharges, which provide relief for many, but not all victims of trade school abuses.

The discharge applies to the following types of loans entered into after January 1, 1986: Guaranteed Student (Stafford) Loans, Unsubsidized Stafford Loans, Supplemental Loans for Students (SLSs), PLUS (parent borrower) loans, and Federal Direct Loans. Students already can raise an unpaid refund as a defense to the Perkins Loan collection action. n146 The unpaid refund discharge became effective as of July 1, 2000. n147

The unpaid refund discharge applies to students who signed up for a school but never attended, or withdrew, or terminated within a time frame that entitled them to a refund, but who never received the refund from the school. Students who completed 60% or more of the loan period are not entitled to refunds and therefore not entitled to the discharge. n148 A student should not have to show written proof or other formal proof of withdrawal or termination in order to qualify.

Students who never received the owed refund are eligible to reduce their current obligations by the amount that should have been refunded plus interest and related charges. The amount of the unpaid refund will be determined based on information the holder of the loan has or that the borrower can provide, or by applying the appropriate refund formula to information that the borrower provides or that is otherwise available to the agency. If the actual school refund formula is not available, the regulations set out a substitute formula to determine the amount eligible for discharge. n149

The procedures and timing for a loan discharge are slightly different depending on whether the school is currently open or closed. If the school is still open, to qualify for the discharge, the borrower and guarantor must document that they attempted to resolve the problem within 120 days from the date that the borrower submitted a completed application for discharge. n150 This requirement does not apply if the school is closed.

Except where the guaranty agency (with the Department's approval) determines, based on information in its possession, that the borrower qualifies for a discharge, borrowers must submit written discharge applications. n151 Applications should be sent to the holder or guaranty agency. In most cases the holder will be the guaranty agency. n152

The Department has developed a uniform application form. n153 In addition, the regulations require agencies to send discharge applications to potentially eligible borrowers. n154 Once they do so, they must cease collection until the application is resolved. n155 If the borrower does not return the application within sixty days, collection actions can

There is no time limit for the agency to make a decision. However, once an application is granted, the holder must suspend collection within thirty days, discharge the appropriate amount, and inform the borrower of the determination. n157

If the application is denied, the holder must notify the borrower in writing of the reason for the determination and of the borrower's right to request review within thirty days of the borrower's submission of additional documentation. Collection must be suspended during the review period. n158

[b] Relief Available for Those Obtaining a Discharge

Eligible borrowers will be granted a discharge in the amount of the unpaid refund including any accrued interest and any collection of other charges relating to the amount of the unpaid refund. n159 If the borrower has already paid off part of the loan, and the amount still owing on the loan is less than the unpaid refund, part of the unpaid refund will be used to fully discharge the loan. The rest of the unpaid refund will be paid to the borrower in cash to the extent the borrower has made payments of that amount on the loan. The holder of the loan is also required to report the discharge to all credit reporting agencies to which the holder previously reported the status of the loan. n160

Specifically, a discharge may be granted without an application if (1) the borrower received a discharge of a different type of loan for the same program of study or (2) the Department or guaranty agency determines that the borrower qualifies for a discharge based on information in the Secretary or guaranty agency's possession. § 12.07 Eligibility for Additional Educational Assistance

[1] Loss of Eligibility

Another key issue for students with defaulted loans is how to renew eligibility for additional educational assistance. Student loans are now dischargeable only if their repayment would cause substantial hardship. n1

Federal law specifies a number of ways that those in default on their student loans can become eligible for new loans and grants. The remainder of this section details those options.

[2] Renewing Eligibility by Making Six Reasonable and Affordable Payments

[a] Standards for Renewing Eligibility

Federal law requires guaranty agencies to establish a program which allows students in default to renew eligibility for loans and grants upon the student's payment of six consecutive monthly payments in an amount that is "reasonable and affordable based upon the borrower's total financial circumstances." n2 The legislation's Conference Report makes clear that the Secretary must offer the same opportunity to renew eligibility where the Department is holding the loan.

Although the regulations do not speak to the issue, the Department has stated that a student is eligible to obtain a reasonable and affordable repayment schedule even if the defaulted loan has been reduced to a court judgment. n3

Whether the Department or a guaranty agency holds the loan, the student, to renew eligibility, must enter a satisfactory repayment arrangement, defined as six consecutive, full monthly payments within fifteen days of the due date. A satisfactory repayment arrangement involves an amount that is determined to be reasonable and affordable based on the borrower's total financial circumstances. n4

If the student stays current on the reasonable and affordable plan, the student apparently can keep on the plan indefinitely at that level of payment. While the student will still technically be in default, the student will not be subject to tax intercepts, wage garnishments, collection contacts, or collection lawsuits. The student's credit record will most likely still show a default.

[3] Loan Rehabilitation

A student can renew eligibility for new loans and grants and cure the loan default by "rehabilitating" the defaulted loan. Loan rehabilitation for FFELs and Direct loans may be requested after the borrower has made nine payments within twenty days of the due date during a period of ten consecutive months. n5 Prior to July 1, 2006, twelve consecutive payments were required. The longer requirement still applies to Perkins loan rehabilitations. Pursuant to the 1998 HEA, institutions are now required to report to credit bureaus when a borrower has made six consecutive monthly payments on a defaulted loan, and to disclose promptly any changes to information previously disclosed. n6

The payment amount is determined by the guaranty agency (or, the U.S., if it is holding the loan) in the same way as a payment plan to renew eligibility, described in the prior subsection, being based on the borrower's total financial circumstances. n7 After the student makes twelve timely monthly payments under the new plan, and the borrower requests rehabilitation, the guarantor or the U.S. must attempt to secure a lender to purchase the loan. n8 If the loan is sold (it may not be if no lender agrees to purchase the loan), the loan is removed from default status and the student is eligible for new loans and grants. n9 The regulation explicitly provides for rehabilitation of defaulted loans reduced to judgment, although, in that case, the borrower must sign a new promissory note prior to sale of the loan. n10

[4] Consolidation of Defaulted Loan Renews Student's Eligibility

Another way to renew eligibility for loans and grants is to consolidate the loan in default into either a new FFEL loan or a new Direct Loan. n11

§ 12.08 Students' Claims Against the School

[1] Introduction

Student loan issues, particularly for low-income borrowers, often involve deceptive and fraudulent vocational school practices. This section therefore sets out legal theories and strategies for bringing claims against the school and related entities.

[2] Connections Between Schools and Lenders

Improper ties between lenders and schools have generated considerable controversy in recent years. The key concern has been lenders offering inducements in exchange for schools recommending their products and services to students.

Much of the controversy has centered on school preferred-lender lists. These are lists of recommended lenders that many schools use. Schools set their own criteria for inclusion on the list. If used properly and without bias, many believe that the lists can help borrowers navigate the complex student loan marketplace. Schools often claim that the lists help them increase efficiency by limiting the number of lenders they must routinely deal with.

The Higher Education Act clearly prohibits schools from refusing to certify loans because of the borrower's choice of lender or guaranty agency. n1 However, until recently, there was little enforcement activity. The Government Accountability Office (GAO) concluded in a 2007 report that, while the Department has some processes to oversee general compliance in the guaranteed loan programs, it has no oversight tools designed to proactively detect potential instances of lenders providing improper inducements. n2

A report by the U.S. Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions highlighted the following key problems:

- FFEL lenders providing compensation to schools with the expectation and, in some cases, with explicit agreements that the school will give the lenders preferential treatment, including placement on preferred lender lists.

- FFEL lenders spending large sums on travel and accommodation expenses for meetings of Advisory Boards comprised of school officials and often expecting these benefits to yield increased loan volume or other preferential treatment.

- School officials with financial interests, including stock and options to purchase stock, in FFEL lenders that are on the preferred lender list or are otherwise recommended to students.

- School officials receiving payments for consulting and other services from FFEL lenders that are on the preferred lender list or are otherwise recommended to students. n3

Congress is considering numerous bills to crack down on these abuses. In some cases, the legislation would apply to both government and private student loans. n4 In addition, in June 2007, the Department issued proposed rules that would increase its ability to enforce improper inducement regulations. n5 The proposed regulations also set specific guidelines for preferred lender lists. These guidelines include a requirement that lenders using these lists include at least three lenders that are not affiliated with each other. Schools would also be required to disclose, as part of the list, the method and criteria the school used to select any lender that it recommends or suggests, to provide comparative information to prospective borrowers about interest rates and other benefits offered by the lenders, and to include a prominent statement, in any information related to its list of lenders, advising prospective borrowers that they are not required to use one of the school's recommended or suggested lenders. n6 The proposed "improper inducement" regulations were adopted with only a few changes. n7 For example, the final rules include loan forgiveness programs for public service and other targeted purposes approved by the Secretary as "permissible activities," as long as the benefits are not marketed to secure loan applications or loan guarantees.

Among other "improper inducement" provisions in the final regulations, lenders and guaranty agencies are prohibited from providing staffing services to schools except for services provided to participating foreign schools at the direction of the Secretary, as third-party servicers, or otherwise on more than a short-term, emergency, and non-recurring basis to assist schools with financial-aid-related functions. According to the Department, these limitations also restrict the lender and guaranty agency from providing entrance and exit counseling. n8 The regulations define "emergency basis" as a state-declared or federally declared natural disaster, a federally declared national disaster, and other localized disasters and emergencies identified by the Secretary. n9 The 2008 HEA reauthorization law has a similar provision, allowing staffing on a short-term, non-recurring basis to assist the schools during emergencies, including state-declared or federally declared natural disasters, federally declared national disasters, and other localized disasters and emergencies identified by the Secretary. n10

The proposed "preferred lender" regulations were also adopted with only a few changes. n11 The regulations require schools using preferred lender agreements to include at least three lenders on the list. A May 2008 Department of Education letter clarifies that a school which has been unable to identify at least three lenders may provide the names of lenders that have indicated that they would provide FFEL loans to the school's students and parents. n12 The school must be clear it is not endorsing a particular lender and that borrowers can choose to use any FFEL lender that will make loans to them. Schools may also provide a comprehensive list of lenders that have made loans to the school's students or parents in the past three to five years (or some other period) and have indicated that they would continue to make such loans. Schools doing this in lieu of preferred lender lists should not provide any additional information about the lender. n13

The 2008 HEA reauthorization law includes additional provisions addressing improper inducements and preferred lender lists. These provisions will apply in most cases to private loans as well. n14

[3] UDAP Theories to Challenge School Misconduct

[a] Introduction

UDAP claims are generally well-suited to challenge trade school abuses. Oral and print misrepresentations can be deceptive, the failure to disclose can be deceptive, and enrolling students unable to benefit from a program can be unfair or unconscionable. The student's proof burden is simplified with a UDAP claim because the student normally need not prove intent, scienter, or other components of a common law fraud claim. n15 A number of courts have found, however, that state UDAP and other claims against schools and lenders conflict with federal law and are therefore preempted. n16 A few sections of the HEA expressly preempt certain state law claims. These include state usury laws, n17 state statutes of limitations, n18 state infancy defenses, n19 and state disclosure requirements. n20 The fact that certain provisions are expressly preempted bolsters the argument that Congress did not intend the HEA to so "occupy the field" that it would automatically preempt all state laws. n21 Thus, the key preemption doctrine to consider in these cases is "conflict preemption." Conflict preemption may arise under two circumstances: from a direct conflict between state and federal law, such that compliance with both is impossible (called "direct conflict"), or because a state law "stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress" (called "obstacle preemption"). n22

The Fourth Circuit addressed these issues in a 2005 case, overturning the district court's ruling that the plaintiff's state claims were preempted based on "obstacle preemption." n23 According to the court, the existence of extensive regulations pursuant to the HEA does not automatically mean that non-conflicting state law is preempted. n24 Further, the fact that there is no private right of action to enforce the HEA does not lead to the conclusion that the plaintiff's pursuit of state law claims would obstruct the federal scheme. n25 To the contrary, the court emphasized that the Supreme Court has recognized that the availability of a state law claim is even more important in an area where no federal private right of action exists. n26 In this case, the plaintiff sought redress under state law for the defendant's alleged violation of the HEA provision requiring lenders that receive loan verification certificates to complete and return these certificates within ten days. n27

This section will detail existing UDAP precedent concerning trade school abuses, but other unfair or deceptive practices are equally actionable under a UDAP statute. Trade school abuses should be challenged even if the exact practice is not listed below. State UDAP laws have various exclusions that may apply in these cases. For example, community colleges or other public colleges may be excluded from various UDAP laws that have government entity exemptions. n28

[b] FTC Guides and Rule

The Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") has issued guides concerning unfair and deceptive private vocational school practices. n29 The guides specify that schools cannot misrepresent, through their name or otherwise, that they are connected with government agencies or civil service commissions n30 or that they are an employment agency or employer. n31

For example, schools must disclose if the course is offered through correspondence. n32 It is deceptive for a school to misrepresent the nature of its approval or accreditation or the extent to which former students, employers, or counselors recommend a course. n33 Other deceptive misrepresentations relate to a school's size, location, facilities, or equipment, n34 the currency of its courses and the number of educational qualifications of its personnel, n35 and statements that a school is nonprofit or connected with a charitable organization. n36

The FTC updated its vocational school guides in 1998, renaming them the "Guides for Private Vocational and Distance Education Schools." n37 The most significant change was a new provision addressing misrepresentations about a school's placement success following training. The Guides now specifically state that it is deceptive for a school, in promoting a course of training, to misrepresent the availability of employment after graduation from the course, the success that the school's graduates have realized in obtaining such employment, or the salary that the school's graduates will receive in such employment. n38 The new guide also states that it is deceptive for a school to misrepresent that the lack of a high school education or prior training is not an impediment to successful completion of a course or obtaining employment. n39

[c] Other Precedent

Courts have identified a number of other trade school practices not enumerated in the FTC Guides as unfair or deceptive. State UDAP precedent and FTC case law provide important additional principles concerning job and earnings claims, student loans, and refund policies.

Schools may not deceive students with respect to the nature, terms or conditions of contractual obligations, veterans' educational benefits, and federally insured student loans. n40 A school may not misrepresent its refund policy or deceive students into attending additional classes before dropping out with the result that their contractual obligation is significantly increased under the refund formula. n41 Schools must also pay all owed refunds. n42

It is deceptive to misrepresent the amount of personalized instruction available in a correspondence course, or the difficulty of the correspondence courses themselves. n43 Schools cannot misrepresent students' ability to benefit from a course. Schools cannot fail to meet state entrance standards. n44 Nor can schools encourage students to falsify their identity or immigration status. n45 Using a deceptive name for an educational program or making changes to a program without proper disclosures may also give rise to UDAP claims. n46

Also deceptive are misrepresentations concerning the nature of school placement services. n47 For example, in one UDAP case, consumer recovery was based on the school's "admissions officers" (who worked on commission and made as much as $56,000 a year) promising 90 to 95% job placement when in fact the school was reporting to its accrediting agency job placement rates averaging only 47%. The school's higher 90 to 95% figure was derived only from students who kept in touch with the school's placement office, not the total number of the school's graduates. n48

Another source of precedent on unfair or deceptive trade school practices may be found in a state's education statutes, such as California's Maxine Waters Student Protection Act. n49 In some cases, these statutes will provide for a private right of action. If not, a violation of these standards may be actionable under a state UDAP statute. It should be noted, however, that a number of courts have found that state UDAP and other claims against schools and lenders conflict with federal law and are therefore preempted. n50

[d] Other State Law Claims

State UDAP claims are key to school cases, but other theories should also be considered. Common law fraud, in particular, should not be overlooked because of the possibility of punitive damages. n51

In some states, a state RICO claim may provide better remedies than a UDAP claim, or the two together may provide more relief than just a UDAP claim. For example, one UDAP and state RICO case in Oregon against a school resulted in a jury verdict of $320,000 in multiple and punitive damages for nine former computer school students. n52

Courts have also, on a variety of legal theories, rescinded enrollment agreements and directed schools to reimburse students for their tuition payments or student loan debts. n53

Another possible state law theory is a state education statute explicitly providing a private right of action. Even when a state education statute does not provide a private right of action, a violation of that statute may be a state UDAP violation. It is also possible to raise contract defenses such as duress when appropriate. n54

[e] Federal Claims

There are two possible federal claims against schools which provide federal court jurisdiction--the Federal RICO statute n55 and the Federal HEA. n56 Note, however, that the consumer must have a good reason to seek federal, instead of state, court jurisdiction because there are drawbacks with RICO and particularly with HEA claims.

A RICO claim requires consumers to prove various technical elements, which will significantly complicate a case. Nevertheless, RICO claims have proved successful in a number of trade school cases. n57

The HEA claim may be dismissed outright because most courts find there is no implied private right of action under the statute. n58 The HEA also explicitly states that failure to comply with its loan disclosure requirements does not provide a basis for a claim for civil damages. n59 Also, the Sixth Circuit affirmed in 2009 that the TILA federal student loan exemption applies only to government student loan programs promulgated under the Higher Education Act. TILA should apply to other federal student loan programs. n60

[f] When to Raise Claims Against the School

A key question when a student is defrauded by a trade school is whether the student should sue the school affirmatively or wait to be sued on the loan and raise school-related defenses. Suing the school affirmatively presents the student in a better stance before the court. In fact, particularly for pre-1994 FFELs, some courts refuse to allow the student to raise such claims as a defense to a collection action. n61 Moreover, it is rare that the holder of a student loan will actually sue on the loan.

A consumer sued on a loan by a guaranty agency or the United States should consider not just raising school-related defenses to the collection action, but also impleading the school (if still solvent). Joining the school will also aid discovery and paint a clearer picture for the judge.

Where no collection action has been brought against the student, but where tax refund intercepts and other collection contacts are threatened, and the school is insolvent, another approach is to bring an affirmative action for declaratory relief that the loan amount is not owed to the guarantors or the Department because of school-related claims.

[g] Potential Defendants

When the school is bankrupt or judgment-proof, a number of other parties (in addition to the obvious choices of the lender, guaranty agency, and the United States) may be liable for the school's malfeasance and may have assets to satisfy a judgment.

Another possible approach to recover from a bankrupt school is to jump ahead of other creditors by means of a criminal restitution order. United States v. Grundhoefer n62 affirms an order of almost $1 million in criminal restitution to students victimized by a private vocational school. Brooklyn and Bronx Legal Services suggested to two different federal judges sentencing several principals of the school that all the criminal restitution go to defrauded students and not to the school's other creditors. The judges agreed, instructing the government and the legal services attorneys to work out a restitution plan. The school's bankruptcy trustee, representing the school's other creditors, appealed. The Second Circuit found no abuse of discretion in the restitution plan, and no standing by the other creditors to object to the courts' orders. n63

There are also other possible avenues. First, it is possible to recover a judgment from a school in bankruptcy and a proof of claim should be submitted.

When dealing with an insolvent school, the following potential alternative defendants should also be explored:

a) A bonding company or state tuition recovery fund, since schools are licensed by many states, and a bond or contribution to a state tuition recovery fund is usually a pre-condition to licensure. In addition, the U.S. DOE, separately, often requires schools to provide a letter of credit if the school appears in financial difficulty and wishes to participate in the FFEL or Federal Direct Loan programs. This letter of credit, in appropriate circumstances, can be used to reduce the student's obligation on a loan, but is unlikely to provide a source of cash recovery for the student.

b) The parent company or franchisor is often a deep pocket and may aid or abet the school's misrepresentations.

c) Owners, officers, n64 and employees are responsible for their own actions, even if they are acting as a corporate agent. Individuals dealing directly with a student, and those supervising those individuals, are potential defendants, as is a school's owner to the extent the owner supervises the school or to the extent the corporate veil can be pierced.

d) Advertising agencies, accountants, lawyers, or others aiding and abetting a fraudulent scheme are individually liable for their own misconduct.

Other possibilities include the accrediting agency or the DOE. n65

The California law became inoperative on July 1, 2007, and is scheduled to be repealed as of January 1, 2008, unless a later enacted statute extends that date. Cal. Educ. Code § 94999. However, in July 2007, California passed a law that creates a temporary process for proprietary schools to be regulated by the state. The new law allows the state Department of Consumer Affairs to enter into voluntary agreements in which for-profit schools agree to comply with state rules. See Goldie Blumenstyk, California Restores For-Profits' Regulation, The Chron. of Higher Educ., July 27, 2007, at A19. CHAPTER 12 Student Loans and Trade School Abuses

1-12 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 12.09

§ 12.09 Raising School-Related Defenses Against Student Loan Collection Action

[1] Introduction

In many cases, defrauded students have no other practical recourse than to raise school-related defenses on their student loans. While it is almost always preferable to obtain a closed school or false certification discharge than to raise school-related defenses, most defrauded students will not receive such discharges. Similarly, most defrauded students will not want to file for bankruptcy or may not be able to obtain a bankruptcy discharge of their student loans. The student suing the school raises many practical problems, not the least of which is that the school may now be insolvent, or insolvent by the time a judgment is entered against the school. Defrauded students often do not have the financial or legal resources to pay their loan in full and then bring an affirmative suit against the school.

Consequently, for millions of students defrauded by trade schools, raising school-related defenses on their student loans is critical.

Unfortunately for defrauded students, whether they can raise school-related defenses to their loans is a complex issue, depending initially on the type of student loan involved. Students can raise school-related defenses for Perkins Loans, Direct Loans, and usually on FISLs. They can also raise these defenses on FFELs extended on or after January 1, 1994, where a for-profit school has a referral or other business relationship with the lender.

The situation for earlier FFELs, on the other hand, is far from clear, and these earlier FFELs still comprise the majority of problem loans. In addition, special issues arise where an FFEL has lost its guaranteed status or where a student loan is consolidated into a new student loan.

This section sets out existing standards for raising school-related defenses for all of these types of loans, which differ dramatically depending on the type of loan at issue. Practitioners must properly match their client's type of loan with the appropriate discussion below. n1

[a] Perkins Loans

Schools are the lender for Perkins Loans, so the lender (i.e., the school) is obviously subject to school-related defenses. The lender may assign the note to the United States for collection. n2 The United States, as assignee, is subject to all defenses that could be raised against the assignor. n3

[b] Direct Loans

The HEA specifies that, notwithstanding any other provision of state or federal law, the Secretary shall, for Direct Loans, specify in regulations when school misconduct may be asserted as a defense to loan repayment, but the student's recovery pursuant to such a defense cannot exceed the amount the borrower has repaid on the loan. n4 The Secretary has issued these regulations, n5 which state that in any proceeding to collect on a Direct Loan, the borrower may assert as a defense against repayment any act or omission of the school that would give rise to a cause of action against the school under applicable state law. In addition, the Secretary may determine that all or part of amounts already paid on the loan should be refunded to the student. n6

FISLs usually date back to the 1970s or early 1980s. Loans from a bank or even from a school were insured directly by the United States. Students can raise many school-related defenses to FISLs because, until 1986 (when it was dropped without comment), an FISL regulation explicitly stated that the United States would not collect an FISL to the extent that a school had closed or students had certain school-related defenses. n7 This regulation should apply at least to FISLs entered into before 1986. Moreover, where the school was the originating lender, students should also be able to raise all defenses against the assignee (the United States) based on the same rationale as Perkins Loans. n8

[d] FFELs Extended After January 1, 1994

Starting on January 1, 1994, all FFELs use a common promissory note that is drafted by the U.S. DOE. The note includes an adaptation of the FTC Holder Notice.

Students whose notes include this loan provision will be in a strong position to raise school-related claims because, as a matter of contract law, the student has the right to raise school-related defenses under the terms of the loan provision. Nevertheless, this loan provision, by its very terms, only allows consumers to raise school-related defenses to a FFEL if the school is for-profit and if the school refers students to the lender or is affiliated with the lender by common control, contract, or business arrangement. In raising school-related defenses, the student should thus allege that the school is for-profit and that it refers students or has a business arrangement with the lender. n9

The Department has issued a letter giving its interpretations when a referral relationship exists. n10

[2] FFELs Extended Before 1994

In large part, the Department refuses to recognize legitimate school-related defenses for FFELs entered into before 1994. For these loans, the only undisputed right to relief is through a closed school or false certification discharge. n11

The key question in determining whether students can raise school-related defenses to FFELs extended before 1994 is whether the originating lender (usually a bank) is subject to the student's claims against the school. If the bank is, then so are its assignees--a secondary market lender, a guaranty agency, and the United States. n12

An important avenue for relief for students would be if general principles of lender liability for other consumer transactions and for other student loans (including FFELs after January 1, 1994) also applied to FFELs prior to 1994. Since the lender would be liable for the school's misconduct, then the same would be true for the guaranty agency and the Department, who are merely assignees of the lender. Legal theories allowing the student to raise school-related claims and defenses against the lender, the guaranty agency, and the United States are set out immediately below.

[3] Agency and Other Common Law Theories

One ground for lender liability for school-related claims is that the lender has appointed the school its agent for certain functions, and that, under respondeat superior, the principal is liable for the acts of its agent within the actual or apparent scope of the agent's authority. n13 The federal regulatory scheme should not preempt application of the state or federal common law of respondeat superior. n14

One weakness of the agency approach is that the principal will only be liable for acts within the actual or apparent authority of the agent, which will usually relate to the student's enrollment in the school, and not to the school's quality of teaching, equipment, or placement services.

[4] State Lender Liability Statutes

Approximately one-third of the states have enacted statutes specifically requiring that lenders be liable for the acts of their related sellers, specifying in some detail the type of relationship between the seller and lender that is sufficient to allow the consumer to raise seller-related defenses on the loan. While these statutes in some states are vague, requiring court interpretation, in general, they should provide a solid basis for a student raising school-related defenses to a FFEL. n15

Beside questions of interpretation of a particular state law, the major argument why these statutes would not apply is that they are preempted by federal law. However, the HEA should not preempt these state laws where the DOE now requires that current student loans provide for the same protection specified in these state laws--that related lenders are liable for school-related claims. n16 The Department has also stated that its "regulations do not preempt state law that would affect the conduct of litigation or the enforcement of judgments, but would only preempt those state laws, if any, that would conflict with the regulatory requirement that a guarantee agency institute suit and attempt to enforce a judgment." n17

It is also Department policy that a loan which is unenforceable because of state law defenses is not re-insurable, and the guaranty agency should not honor the guaranty. n18 If the loan is not guaranteed or reinsured, the guaranty agency and the United States have no right to collect from the student.

Court precedent is consistent with this general view--that the HEA does not preempt the field of lender liability, and that these state statutes are generally effective, n19 unless they specifically conflict with a federal requirement. n20

[5] Origination Theory

The Secretary of Education recognizes that students can raise school-related defenses to FFEL collection actions when the school is in an "origination relationship" with the lender. n21

Unfortunately for students, the D.C. Circuit has ruled that the Secretary has not sufficiently communicated an intention to be bound by the origination policy so as to create a legally enforceable right grounded in federal law. n22 If a court follows the D.C. Circuit approach, then the sole application of the origination theory would be in persuading the Department to drop a loan collection.

Other courts have found the origination theory binding on the Department and guarantors, n23 based on the Department's statements that it expects guaranty agencies not to collect unenforceable loans where an origination relationship exists. n24

[6] Student Claims Against Tuition Recovery Funds

State tuition recovery funds ("STRFs") can be a valuable source of relief for defrauded students where a school is insolvent and where the student cannot obtain a closed school or false certification discharge. STRFs contain deposits of money collected from schools approved to operate in the state. The funds are disbursed to victimized students under specified conditions.

Many states have either a STRF or a bond program to reimburse defrauded students. States with STRFs tend to have two different funds--one for degree-granting institutions, and one for schools that offer non-degree-granting vocational programs. n25

The STRF is an important student remedy because it will provide relief in situations where defrauded students cannot obtain a closed school, unpaid refund, or false certification discharge. The California STRF, for example, will pay claims where a student ceased attending a school because of a breach or anticipatory breach of the agreement for the course of instruction. n26 The California STRF also provides relief for students who have obtained judgments against schools for violations of the state student protection act provisions, but are unable to collect the judgment after diligent efforts. n27 The operation of STRFs varies significantly by state. Advocates will need to contact their own state regulatory agency concerning detailed information on their STRF.

CHAPTER 12 Student Loans and Trade School Abuses

1-12 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 12.10

§ 12.10 Consumer Claims Against Scholarship Finders

A newly popular form of consumer abuse occurs where companies take advance payments from consumers in order to find them scholarships and grants. These companies sometimes make their pitch by sending high school and college students postcards advertising that, for an advance fee, they can find "unclaimed" scholarship and grant funds from private sources. When a company cannot get a consumer to send money in advance, it may discover the consumer's checking account number and take money out of the account with an unauthorized demand draft or telecheck. n1

Most of these bogus scholarship-finding companies promise to refund their fee if the student does not receive a minimum amount of aid, but quite frequently provide neither the promised financial aid not the promised refunds. n2 In some situations, the companies may also claim a refund is not owing because contractual small print places onerous conditions on receiving the monies. n3

Even where the companies do provide information, it may consist solely of lists of financial aid sources to which students must apply on their own. n4 One company recently agreed to stop its practice of selling employment and financial aid directories that they misrepresented as programs guaranteeing students with free room, board, and transportation or free financial aid. n5

CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

§ 13.01 Introduction

Few events are more devastating to a family than the loss of a home to foreclosure; children may be forced to change schools and leave friends; a family may be distanced from workplaces and social support. The homeowner's equity is often lost as a result of a foreclosure sale, and it is not unusual for the foreclosed homeowner to find that he or she is personally liable for a large deficiency. Wages may be threatened to pay the deficiency judgment, further contributing to the family's financial distress. Shortly after the foreclosure, the family may be summarily evicted from the home, although some states provide a waiting period (redemption period) before an eviction can take place. Affordable replacement housing can be difficult to find, particularly for a family already in financial straits.

The strategies discussed in this chapter are designed to prevent foreclosures, whenever possible, and, alternatively, if prevention is not possible, to postpone a foreclosure long enough to allow the family to find appropriate housing.

It is important to note from the outset that none of these strategies alone are likely to save a home. Rarely will litigation fully resolve the family's problem. Some legal defenses may reduce the amount owed or may cause a delay in the foreclosure process. Eventually, however, the homeowner will probably be left with some debt which must be paid. At that point, the homeowner must be able to cure the default, to arrange a negotiated restructuring, to refinance, or to force a cure through the bankruptcy process.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.02

§ 13.02 The Foreclosure Process Generally

[1] Introduction

Foreclosure procedures are wholly determined by state law, the details of which vary from state to state. n1 The two most common methods of foreclosure in this country are judicial foreclosure and nonjudicial foreclosure by "power of sale." All states have a procedure for judicial foreclosure and some states require that mortgages be foreclosed only by judicial process. States which permit foreclosure by power of sale have enacted statutes regulating such foreclosures.

Most states have added varying levels of protection for the homeowner to the statutory foreclosure process. Some states permit a homeowner to "cure" a default by paying the installments due and any costs of the foreclosure to reinstate the loan. All states allow the homeowner to "redeem" the mortgage by paying off the total outstanding debt before the sale, or, in some states, by paying the purchase price, plus costs and interest, to the purchaser within a time certain after the sale. A few states have developed mortgage assistance programs in response to plant closings and high rates of foreclosures involving laid-off workers.

[2] Judicial Foreclosure

In approximately half of the states, mortgages are always foreclosed by judicial action, either because of state law requirements or local custom. In these states, the lender must file an action in court, usually in the county where the property is located, to obtain a judicial decree authorizing a foreclosure sale. Generally, to obtain a judgment, the lender must prove that there is a valid mortgage between the parties, that the borrower is in default on the mortgage, and that the proper procedure has been followed. The homeowner then has an opportunity to raise procedural and substantive defenses to the foreclosure, such as tender of the payments due, the lender's fraud, usury, invalidity of the mortgage, and Truth in Lending Act ("TILA") violations. In addition, certain technical procedural defenses may be available, such as lack of jurisdiction, lack of joinder of necessary parties, insufficiency of service of process, and improper pleading. If the court concludes, after considering any defenses, that there has in fact been a default and that the lender has the legal right to foreclose, the court will determine the total amount owed and may set a deadline for a redemption, if redemption is available. If this amount is not paid by the deadline set by the court, the foreclosure will proceed, usually according to local rules and/or statutes governing foreclosure sales.

The court's decree of foreclosure may provide that additional notice of the foreclosure sale be given according to the decree. Typically, the sale is conducted by the sheriff or other public officer appointed by the court. In many states, after the sale, the court must review the sale procedures and confirm the sale.

[3] Nonjudicial, "Power of Sale" Foreclosure

In twenty-six states, and the District of Columbia, foreclosing lenders are permitted to sell the mortgaged property at a foreclosure sale without filing a court action. n2 In these jurisdictions, foreclosures are accomplished by the lender's exercise of the "power of sale" contained in the mortgage (or deed of trust). That is, the original mortgage contains a clause stating that in the event of a default in payments or other breach, the holder of the mortgage may conduct a sale of the property after giving notice as required by the terms of the mortgage or applicable statute. Generally, notice of the sale is followed by a sale by an auctioneer, sheriff, or a public official.

Notice requirements differ from state to state. Most states require that notice of the sale be mailed, by registered or certified mail, to the homeowner, though some do not. Nearly all states require some form of public notice either by legal advertisement in a newspaper or posting in a public place. Some states require that notice also be given to junior lienors, taxing authorities, and other persons with an interest in the property.

Because notice requirements vary so much from state to state, it is important to check the local notice requirements carefully, as well as any notice requirements contained in the mortgage. Courts have held that a lender's failure to comply strictly with notice requirements may render the sale void. n3

To contest a foreclosure by power of sale, the homeowner must file an affirmative action and request an injunction to stop the sale. n4 Otherwise, there is no judicial involvement at all in the foreclosure. Most courts require that a bond be posted prior to the issuance of any injunctive relief.

A further disadvantage faced by consumers required to file an action to stop a foreclosure, rather than defend against a lender's action, is that some claims against the lender may be beyond the applicable statute of limitations. When a foreclosure is by judicial action, even time-barred claims can arguably be raised defensively to reduce the amount of the plaintiff's claim. These arguments may not be equally available in an affirmative injunctive action to prevent a foreclosure. However, some courts have allowed borrowers to raise time-barred claims in affirmative suits in power of sale jurisdictions on the theory that these actions are actually "defensive" in nature. That is, they are brought not in response to a lender's foreclosure, but, because the foreclosure is conducted extra judicially, it is the borrowers who have to initiate court action. n5 Additionally, a number of bankruptcy courts have also allowed debtors to raise time-barred claim in response to a lender's proof of claim. n6

[4] Other Methods of Foreclosure

There are two other, less common methods of foreclosure: strict foreclosure and foreclosure by entry and possession.

Strict foreclosure is allowed in only two states, Connecticut and Vermont. The lender in these jurisdictions must go to court to get a court order declaring the borrower to be in default of the mortgage. Title to the property then shifts to the lender. The borrower can redeem by paying the balance of the loan by a date set by the court. With strict foreclosure, there is no sale. The results of a strict foreclosure are grossly unfair to borrowers where the property is worth more than the amount of the debt. The foreclosing lender gets title without regard to the amount owed. Borrowers lose all of their equity and the lender gets a windfall.

With foreclosure by entry and possession, the lender physically enters onto the property and takes constructive possession of the property. This method is used in Maine, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire, and in Massachusetts in conjunction with foreclosure by power of sale. Entry and possession is usually used as a supplemental procedure to termination of an owner's rights by exercise of a power of sale.

At least 19 states, and the District of Columbia, provide by statute that the borrower can cure a default in payments by paying the amount due, plus any permissible costs and fees, by a time certain before the sale. n7 This amount would only include payments due up to the date of the cure (including interest), but not future payments or accelerated payments. If the borrower becomes current in his or her obligations by the cure deadline, the foreclosure is stopped and the mortgage is reinstated. Some states place limits on the number of times a homeowner can take advantage of the right to cure. Other state statutes provide that the foreclosure action shall be stayed upon payment of the installments due, but that if a new default occurs within a certain time period, the action may be reinstated. The time period during which the homeowner can cure the default varies from state to state.

Failure to give notice of a statutory right to cure, even where the homeowner has actual notice of the amount needed to cure, may render the foreclosure defective as a matter of law. n8

Many mortgages also provide a contractual right to cure a default in payments within a specified period of time. Certain mobile home loans are covered by a federal 30-day right to cure.

When a borrower cannot cure within the statutory period, but can cure in installments within a "reasonable time" while also making current payments, a chapter 13 bankruptcy may be advisable. Since bankruptcy is governed by federal law, this option is available in all states.

[6] Redemption

All states allow the homeowner to redeem the mortgage by paying the total outstanding balance, including costs, prior to the sale. The homeowner may be able to exercise this equitable right of redemption by taking a new loan to pay off the defaulted loan, selling the home and repaying the mortgage from the proceeds, or by selling the redemption right. n9 In some states, homeowners also have a "statutory right of redemption" from the sale under which the right of redemption continues for a set period of time after the sale. The borrower redeems under the statutory right of redemption by paying (or finding a buyer to pay) the total purchase price, plus interest and any allowable costs to the foreclosure sale purchaser. n10 Some statutes also permit lienors or other interested parties to redeem the mortgage. In most "power of sale" foreclosure jurisdictions, any right of redemption is foreclosed by the exercise of the power of sale.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.03

§ 13.03 Prelitigation Strategies: Negotiating a Workout Agreement and Other Tactics to Avoid Foreclosure

[1] The Changing Climate for Workouts

In the past several years, the dynamic for negotiating pre-foreclosure workout agreements for low and moderate income homeowners has begun to improve. The banking industry has slowly and ponderously begun the process of liberalizing its approach to homeowner defaults.

The system is far from perfectly responsive, but especially given the recent spate of bad Supreme Court case law on bankruptcy, some homeowners will now do better with a negotiated agreement than with a straightforward cure of arrears in chapter 13.

[2] Breaking Down the Amount of the Default

An understanding of existing loan terms and the amount of the default is essential to a workout negotiation. A high interest rate, for example, might be negotiated down to market rates.

Obtaining a breakdown of the default between principal, interest, insurance escrow, tax escrow, foreclosure fees, and costs is also important. It is easier to negotiate forgiveness of interest than legitimate hard costs like escrow advances expended by the debtor. Additionally, in some cases, a breakdown of the default will reveal that some charges claimed are not proper. n1 Foreclosure fees and costs, for example, may be paid out to a lawyer on retainer, but not expended. The lender should recover unexpended fees and costs and deduct them from the arrears if a workout is achieved.

In 1990, Congress added a new section to the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act ("RESPA"), which created a mechanism for borrowers to obtain answers from lenders or loan servicers to disputes they have about their accounts or to obtain corrections to their accounts where appropriate. The section, known as the Servicer Act, includes a private right of action to enforce its provisions. By invoking the protections of the Act, borrowers in default can challenge the amount of the claimed default and require the lender to respond promptly to the dispute. If the lender fails to meet its obligations, it will face liability for statutory damages and attorney's fees. n2 The Act applies to any servicer of a "federally related mortgage," which is broadly defined and includes most mortgages.

The loan "servicer" includes the entity responsible for servicing the loan (accepting payments, maintaining escrow accounts, etc.) and the holder of the loan if the holder also services the loan. n3 Within sixty days of receipt of a "qualified written request" from the consumer, the servicer must conduct an investigation if an error is alleged; provide the information requested, if available; make any necessary correction to the account; and inform the consumer of its actions. n4

[3] Determining Whether Your Client Has Defenses to Repayment

In some cases, obtaining loan paperwork or talking to your client may uncover potential consumer defenses to collection, such as Truth in Lending ("TIL") violations, usury, fraud, or unfair and deceptive practices. Whenever possible, the client should not make an agreement to repay money to a lender when there is a substantial defense to repayment. When appropriate, legal claims can be used as bargaining chips for workouts either before or after legal action is commenced. A "qualified written request," under RESPA, provides an opportunity to obtain informal discovery and, if the error is correctable, to have the situation resolved without litigation.

[4] Knowing the Players

The mortgage holder is the entity which holds the borrower's mortgage. This is the party that has the right to foreclose. A high percentage of mortgages are now held by investors, including Fannie Mae or Freddie Mac. n5 When a mortgage is assigned upon sale in the secondary market, the mortgage is generally serviced by a bank or servicing company, which may or may not be the same as the originating lender. That entity is known colloquially as the " servicer ".

Unfortunately, one of the problems which has plagued the modern mortgage lending industry is unresponsive loan servicers. When a servicer is unresponsive to a workout proposal, it is appropriate to go over its head and complain directly to the mortgage holder. Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac and some institutional investors have loss-mitigation departments which will intervene, if pushed, to address a proposed workout. The applicable Fannie Mae offices are regional. n6 Freddie Mac's loss mitigation is done on a national basis. n7

The lender's attorney is also an agent with delegated authority to foreclose the mortgage. Mortgage insurance is increasingly common in residential mortgage transactions. If the borrower defaults, the mortgage insurer generally will pay the lender any monies not recouped in the foreclosure process. The mortgage insurer, therefore, has an interest in preventing foreclosure in many cases. It may, therefore, be helpful to keep the insurer informed about the work-out negotiations.

Mortgage holders package their loans as securities and sell the right to the future income stream to investors. These rights are pooled in a variety of different ways so that the income stream from a single loan may be divided up and sold as part of two or more different securities. Investments in mortgage securities are typically made by large institutions when the securities are issued, though they may be purchased after they are issued in the secondary market. n8

The majority of mortgage securities are issued and/or guaranteed by the Government National Mortgage Association (Ginnie Mae), or by government-sponsored enterprises (GSEs), the Federal National Mortgage Association (Fannie Mae) and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation (Freddie Mac). Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac's servicing handbooks contain the workout guidelines for their loans.[nn] Almost all HUD-insured loans are securitized by Ginnie Mae. Ginnie Mae's policies and requirements may supplement HUD's policies in addressing defaults and loan workouts. Other loans are held by trusts, managed by trustees who act as fiduciaries for investors in the trust. The trust may outline the parameters of its loan workout policy in a transactional document called a pooling and servicing agreement.

Pooling and servicing agreements (PSA) broadly govern the servicing of loans in the trust, and the duties of the various parties to the trust agreement. The PSA may outline the loss mitigation or workout options available to the servicer and the parameters of the servicer's authority to implement those options. It may be worthwhile for advocates to review this document if they are having trouble coming to an agreement with a servicer.

If the security was publicly sold, then the PSA is publicly available on the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission's (SEC) website. n9 However, searching SEC-filed documents requires the name of the actual loan trust in which the consumer's loan is contained. n10

[b] RESPA Disclosure Requirements as to Identity of the Mortgage Holder and Servicer

Typically, a mortgage loan will be assigned or sold several times during its term, and may be held by one entity but serviced by another. To insure that borrowers know the identity of the lender or servicer, a provision of the RESPA requires that any person who makes a mortgage loan covered by RESPA n11 must disclose to each applicant at the time of application (in a format prescribed by the United States Department of Housing and Urban Development ("HUD")) n12 whether the servicing of the loan may be assigned, sold, or transferred at any time during the term of the mortgage. The notice must also include a statement of the consumer's rights when there is a dispute about the account as well as information about the consumer's right to notice in the event of a transfer of servicing. n13

If the servicing of a mortgage is actually transferred, the old (transferring) servicer must notify the consumer in writing 15 days before the effective date of the transfer. n14 Such a notice need not be given, however, if the lender provided it at closing. The new servicer must provide the identical notice to the consumer not more than 15 days after the effective date of the transfer. n15 Notices from the old and new servicer can be combined into one notice as long as it is sent to the consumer no later than 15 days before the effective date of the transfer. n16

If a consumer mistakenly sends a payment to the old servicer within a sixty-day period after the transfer, and the payment is received before the due date, no late fee can be imposed nor can the payment be treated as late for any other purposes. n17

Failure to comply with these requirements subjects a lender or servicer to actual damages, costs, and reasonable attorney fees for "each such failure." n18 If evidence also reveals a pattern or practice of noncompliance, the court may award "additional" damages for each violation up to $1,000. n19

[5] Relevance of the Homeowner's Equity Position and Ability to Make Lump Sum Payment

Mortgage holders tend to be most willing to discuss favorable workout terms for borrowers who have the least amount invested in their property. If there is substantial equity, lenders are generally eager to foreclose since they can buy the property at below market rates, resell for fair market value and keep the difference. Conversely, where there is little equity, foreclosure is likely to be a losing proposition for the lender, so that a workout is a better option.

One further incentive to build upon for a workout discussion is the availability of a lump sum toward the workout. Many mortgage holders will provide much more favorable workout terms to borrowers who have a lump sum saved toward curing the default.

[6] The Workout Agreement

[a] Knowing the Parameters of the Mortgage Holder's Policies

The most important part of a workout negotiation may be deciding what terms to request from the mortgage holder. There are a variety of workout terms available (and there is an infinite amount of inconsistent terminology used in the industry to describe those terms). A borrower should propose terms at least sufficient to address the economic problem which caused the default.

Most mortgage holders have written policies governing workouts. The scope of these policies differs from lender to lender.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, as the largest investors in the mortgage marketplace, set the industry standards on workout options. The most important documents in the industry are Fannie Mae's Selling and Servicing Guides together with their periodic updates. The Fannie Mae Single-Family Servicing Guide, which includes a copy of the servicing contract between Fannie Mae and its vendors, is available on-line at www.allregs.com/efnma. n20 As Fannie Mae is the biggest purchaser of mortgages on the secondary market, their Guides and workout policies tend to be used generically by many servicers, as well as by some lenders acting for themselves. Fannie Mae also publishes a valuable book called Foreclosure Prevention that summarizes and explains Fannie Mae's workout policies. n21

Freddie Mac has its own multi-volume seller/servicer guide and publishes Pursuing Alternatives to Foreclosure.. The latter is not currently available directly to the general public. n22 It is not unreasonable to use the Fannie Mae publications as background for making workout proposals to Freddie Mac and its servicers. Freddie Mac's articulated policy is to consider all proposals.

In addition to the options discussed below, in certain circumstances both Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac will consider a charge-off of the loan instead of foreclosure. n23 A charge-off ceases collection efforts on a mortgage when the debt is deemed to be uncollectible. A small monetary delinquency that is deemed uncollectible accompanied by serious, uninsured damage to the property (i.e., natural disaster, presence of hazardous substance) may lead to a charge-off. All other workout options must be explored before a recommendation for a charge-off is considered. n24

[b] Requesting Delay of Foreclosure Sales

At the outset, the most important request may be for a delay of the foreclosure sale process long enough to make a workout application. A completed foreclosure sale will generally cut off all workout possibilities. In addition, as the foreclosure process moves forward, the mortgage holder continues to incur costs that will eventually have to be reimbursed by the borrower. These costs increase the amount the borrower must raise to cure the delinquency, and efforts should be made to keep costs to a minimum.

When an agreement to delay a sale is reached, it is essential to reduce it to writing. In most cases, a confirming letter should suffice unless the sale is a court-supervised process for which applicable procedural requirements must be met. n25 In addition, if the loan is transferred to a new servicer, any agreement with the former servicer should be reaffirmed in writing. n26 If an agreement to delay the sale is breached, the borrower may not have a remedy unless he or she can prove actual damages (such as reduced sale price) caused by the breach. n27 Whatever the process, it is a good idea to check and make sure that the sale is actually cancelled.

A lender may be liable for refusing a request to delay a foreclosure sale. The lender may have a duty to provide the homeowner with a reasonable delay to allow the homeowner to conduct a market sale of the property. Ideally, the homeowner should produce a buyer with a legally binding commitment to purchase the property at a price that would result in a full recovery of all money due to the lender, including costs. n28

[c] Industry-Sponsored Workout Plans

[i] HOPE NOW/ American Securitization Forum Plan

The mortgage industry, guided by Treasury Secretary Paulson, created a voluntary program to help consumers who have securitized subprime adjustable rate mortgages avoid foreclosure by temporarily freezing their interest rate at the initial level. n29 The plan sets up a streamlined procedure for processing loan modifications for borrowers who are current on their loan payments but in danger of default after the initial interest rate resets. These borrowers may be offered a limited modification under which the interest rate will be kept at the existing rate, generally for a period of five years following the upcoming reset. Since the modification offered under the plan is a temporary rate freeze, attorneys are likely to obtain more substantial loan modifications for their clients in an individualized workout or litigation settlement.

The plan applies to securitized subprime residential ARM loans originated between January 1, 2005 and July 31, 2007 with an initial interest rate reset between January 1, 2008 and July 31, 2010. The subprime loan must be a first lien ARM with an initial fixed-rate period of thirty-six months or less. Loans referred to as "2/28s" and "3/27s" meet this description.

Only borrowers who are current with loan payments are eligible for help. In addition the borrower must currently occupy the property as a primary residence; have a mortgage payment which will go up by more than 10% at the upcoming reset; and meet credit score requirements. Finally, the loan-to-value ratio (LTV) must be greater than 97% (based on first lien only).

Some borrowers may receive this temporary rate freeze modification without signing a written agreement, by making two payments under the loan as modified, after receiving notice of the modified terms. Borrowers who unwittingly receive this limited temporary freeze modification may be precluded from later obtaining another modification.

[ii] Project Lifeline

On February 12, 2008 Treasury Secretary Paulson and six HOPE NOW alliance members announced the creation of Project Lifeline. n30 The project grants eligible borrowers a thirty-day delay in the foreclosure proceedings. The borrower must be at least ninety days delinquent, and not less than thirty days from a scheduled foreclosure sale, or in bankruptcy. Any type of loan product including subprime, Alt-A, and prime loans qualify for the program. Second liens and home equity loans are eligible. The project does not apply to properties that are vacant or bought as investment.

The stated purpose of the project is to pause in the foreclosure process so the borrower can be evaluated for a loan modification.

Project guidelines emphasize that the project is not a moratorium and borrowers will be evaluated for a delay of the proceedings or workout on an individual basis. Given that the delay is not automatic, borrowers should negotiate with the servicer for a more substantial delay of the foreclosure proceedings earlier in the process. n31

[iii] Loan Modification and Mediation

A growing number of states and localities are implementing foreclosure mediation programs to help homeowners avoid foreclosure. The mortgage industry is increasingly willing to modify loans, but, because servicers are insufficiently staffed, mediation is sometimes the only chance a homeowner has for serious negotiation over modifying a loan. State and local mediation programs vary widely in design.

Regardless of whether mediation is available, housing counselors and attorneys can help borrowers negotiate for a modification before the servicer initiates a judicial or non-judicial foreclosure action. The goal of a modification is usually to permanently reduce the monthly payment and make the loan affordable for the borrower. Common modifications are changing ARMs to fixed-rate loans, reducing interest rates, waiving late fees and other default-related charges, extending the loan term, and capitalizing any arrearage. n31.1 One of the most effective ways to reduce the monthly payment on a loan is for the mortgage holder to forgive a portion of the principal balance. This, however, is fairly rare despite evidence that mortgage lenders often sustain a greater financial loss by foreclosing than by agreeing to a sustainable loan modification. n31.2

Federal efforts to encourage the mortgage industry to modify more loans have produced the FDIC's "Mod in a Box" and "Making Home Affordable" Programs. n31.3 Both programs are voluntary and based on a net present value analysis (NPV) developed by the FDIC. n31.4 The NPV analysis takes into account the costs of foreclosure and the current property value to determine whether a proposed loan modification will be less expensive to the mortgage holder than foreclosure. Mod in a Box also includes a set of guidelines for modifying a loan to reach an affordable payment based on the borrower's income. The program, however, is entirely voluntary and may be applied at the servicer's discretion on a loan-by-loan basis.

The Making Home Affordable program is similar but requires servicers to sign a contract with the Treasury Department and offers incentive payments for each modification. Under the contract, servicers must grant qualified borrowers a modification under the program guidelines upon request. Servicers must also review all loans in their portfolio for potential eligibility then notify borrowers to submit additional documentation. It is unclear how effectively servicers will notify potentially eligible borrowers. The list of servicers that have signed contracts to participate in Making Home Affordable includes many of the largest servicers. n31.5

[d] Potential Mortgage Workout Terms

[i] Traditional Payment Agreements

A payment agreement (a/k/a forbearance agreement, reinstatement agreement, or deferral agreement) involves curing a default by making regular monthly mortgage payments as they are due, together with partial monthly payment on the arrears.

The homeowners most likely to benefit from this type of payment agreement are those who have experienced temporary financial difficulties which are now resolved. The homeowners need to have some excess income in their budget to commit to the mortgage beyond the regular monthly payment. Until recently, most mortgage holders limited payment agreements to no more than one year for reinstatement. Agreements up to 24 months are now common. Time periods of 36 and even 48 months are also possible, although the servicer must get special approval from the mortgage holder.

One pitfall to this type of arrangement is that it may fail to account for the extra initial expenses associated with recovery from temporary financial difficulties.

[ii] Temporary Interest Rate Reduction

A temporary interest rate reduction may be available to help homeowners who have ongoing financial problems which are likely to be temporary in nature, but which preclude full payment of the mortgage for a foreseeable period of time.

Typically, rates can be reduced fairly easily to the market rate of interest or, with some cause shown, below market. Fannie Mae may be willing in appropriate cases to lower rates as far as 3%.

[iii] Recasting of Missed Payments

A similar provision for temporary mortgage relief is known as recasting (a/k/a deferral). Recasting involves canceling missed payments and adding the obligation to make those payments to the end of the loan term. Because of changes in mortgage accounting practices, most large institutional lenders (including Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac) no longer consider recasting. Where this option remains available, the mortgage holder is usually unwilling to recast more than six monthly payments.

[iv] Permanent Modification of Loan Terms

In some cases, mortgage holders will agree to permanent changes in loan terms, such as permanent interest rate reduction, extension of the loan's payment period, reamortization, cancellation of principal, or a combination of all four.

[v] Modification of Securitized Loan

The majority of mortgage securities are issued and/or guaranteed by Ginnie Mae, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Modifications are permitted under Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac servicing guidelines. For the most part, many other prime and subprime mortgage-backed securities pooling and servicing agreements (PSA) permit loan modifications if the loan is in default or if the servicer determines that default is reasonably foreseeable. A few transactions limit the number of loan modifications to no more than 5% or 10% of the total pool. If the PSA contains such a restriction, and if the servicer has hit the cap, the modified loan may have to be removed from the loan pool. Other restrictions, and the parameters of the servicer's authority to implement workout proposals, will be outlined in the PSA. n32

[vi] Other Creative Workout Terms

Some mortgage holders will consider other offers of workouts involving temporary or permanent relief, even if they are highly creative, such as deferral or subordination of a portion of the principal in favor of a home equity loan for emergency home repairs, cancellation of accrued arrears, or substitution or surrender of alternative collateral in exchange for a modification. n33

[vii] Presales and Other Disposition of Property

The lending industry lumps a variety of other alternatives to foreclosure together under the rubric of "presales." Generally, this means that the property is sold or otherwise transferred, rather than foreclosed.

[viii] Sales for Fair Market Value

In many cases, it is in the homeowner's interest to sell the property rather than to have it foreclosed, since the property is likely to sell for a higher price through a realtor than in the foreclosure process. This is especially true for homeowners who have substantial equity and little likelihood of being able to afford reinstatement or modification of their loan. The homeowner then gets any other proceeds of the sale above the amount of any liens on the property.

The common form of such an agreement requires the homeowner to agree to list the property with a realtor immediately. The mortgage holder generally reserves the right to approve the sale, but will always do so if the sale price is sufficient to cover the amount due on the mortgage. Good faith efforts to market and sell the property are generally required. A time limitation is also typical, usually no more than six months. Of course, if the property can be sold for the amount due before foreclosure is complete, the homeowner can tender full payment on the claim from the sale proceeds in order to vitiate the foreclosure sale. However, if additional time to find a buyer or complete the sale is necessary, the lender must agree to postpone the sale for a period of time.

Some mortgage holders, particularly in a depressed real estate market, will agree to allow property to be sold through a realtor rather than foreclose, even if the proceeds of the sale will not cover the amount due on the mortgage. This is called a "short" sale.

It rarely makes sense for a consumer to complete a short sale if the lender does not agree to waive any deficiency. However, some lenders will require that a homeowner make a partial cash payment on the deficiency as a condition of the sale. All lenders will request a financial statement to make sure that the deficiency claim they are releasing would have limited economic value. A few lenders that own properties for which foreclosure makes little sense (e.g., in neighborhoods where resale would be time consuming and expensive) will provide incentives for the homeowner or a realtor to arrange a short sale. HUD's short sale program, for example, provides latitude for a servicer to make payments to the homeowner in order to encourage short sales.

In most communities there are realtors that specialize in arranging short sales. In order to earn a sales commission, these realtors will often deal with the details necessary to obtain lender approval.

[x] Mortgage Assumptions and Other Transfers

Some mortgages can be assumed (taken over) by a third party. A mortgage is always assumable if the contract documents say it is or, in most states, if the documents are silent on this issue. Other mortgages contain a "due on sale" provision, a clause specifying that transfer of the property accelerates the full loan balance. There are a number of situations in which assumption can take place despite attempts by the mortgage holder to enforce a due on sale provision.

Some mortgage holders also refer to deeds in lieu of foreclosure and refinancings by third party lenders as presales.

[xi] Negotiating an Affordable and Sustainable Loan Modification

[A] Introduction

Over the past few years, the financial services industry and the federal government have launched several voluntary efforts to modify loans en masse. Unfortunately, these voluntary efforts did not result in homeowners being offered modifications that were realistic or sustainable over the long-term. Not surprisingly, many homeowners have re-defaulted under these unrealistic and burdensome modification terms.

There are several structural barriers in the mortgage servicing industry that discourage loan modifications. The most visible problem is the lack of adequate staff to properly respond to consumers' requests for loan modifications or other types of workouts. Homeowners have a very difficult time finding a live person who can provide reliable information about the loan account and who has authority to make modification decisions. Once the homeowner makes contact with the servicer's representative, an appropriate loan modification may remain elusive due to the terms of the pooling and servicing agreement, which govern most subprime mortgage securitizations. Some pooling and servicing agreements give servicers the ability to modify loans, while others cap loan modifications by a number or percentage of outstanding balance in the loan pool. n34.1

Despite the barriers, modifying the terms of a mortgage can be an effective way to reform an unaffordable mortgage and prevent foreclosure. For homeowners who received mortgages with abusively high interest rates or who now owe more on the mortgage than the fair market value of the property, a modification that combines interest rate and principal reductions may be the only way to restore long-term stability. Modifications that do not reduce the amount owed, and certainly those that do not even reduce monthly payments, will delay, but not prevent, foreclosures. To better assist homeowners, advocates should understand and use the tools, such as the net present value analysis, that are used by servicers to evaluate whether modifications are a good value for investors.

[B] The Net Present Value Analysis

Most securitization documents allow the servicer to modify the terms of a mortgage loan if it is in the best interest of investors. n34.2 To determine what is in the best interest of investors, servicers will perform a net present value test. Once the terms of the proposed modification are established, the net present value of the money the investor would receive under the proposed modification is compared with what would be received if no modification were made. If the servicer can expect a greater return from modifying the mortgage, then the servicer should modify and not foreclose on the mortgage. In other words, a modification will be less costly to investors than foreclosing on the property. Leading investor representatives have stated that servicers should perform loan modifications when a proposed loan modification "passes" a net present value test. n34.3

[C] Making Home Affordable Modification Program Net Present Value Test

The Making Home Affordable Modification Program n34.4 requires servicers to perform a net present value test on loans that are at least sixty days delinquent or at risk of default. If the servicer can expect a greater return from modifying the mortgage then the modification is considered to be "net present value positive" and the servicer must modify the mortgage absent fraud or a prohibition in the securitization contracts. If contractual agreements (such as pooling and servicing agreements) restrict participation in the program, servicers are required to use reasonable efforts to obtain waivers or approvals from the parties.

If the test produces a "net present value negative" because the projected return would be greater without a modification, the servicer has the option to modify the loan in its discretion. If the mortgage is serviced for a third-party investor, the servicer must obtain the investor's express permission. Details of the specific factors considered under the net present value test for the Making Home Affordable Modification Program have not yet been released. The Department of Treasury has prepared an illustrative spreadsheet, but neither that spreadsheet nor the numbers used for the re-default rate, home appreciation forecast, or REO stigma are publicly available.

The FDIC's spreadsheet is publically available on the Internet at www.fdic.gov/consumers/loans/loanmod/NPV.xls and incorporates a net present value analysis, and is a good tool to use when analyzing the benefits of a loan modification. n34.5

The regulations and guidelines issued by HUD require that HUD-insured lenders consider alternatives to foreclosure within ninety days of the date of default. n35 However, HUD does not require that mortgagees actually accomplish workouts with homeowners; mortgagees need only consider foreclosure avoidance tools.

The Department of Veteran Affairs ("VA") has established guidelines and procedures for workouts of delinquent loans insured by the agency. n36 The VA expects the holder of the mortgage to exhaust all possible alternatives before pursuing foreclosure. The holder of the mortgage may grant forbearance, usually of not more than twelve months, to qualified borrowers.

The Rural Housing Authority's ("RHS") section 502 Single-Family Housing Program includes special servicing programs designed to assist the borrower in keeping their home in the event of financial setbacks. n37 Options under these programs include payment moratorium, delinquency work-out agreements and protective advances.

[f] Alternatives to Workouts

There are a variety of alternatives to workouts which will prevent foreclosure. These should be considered and acted on in preference to a workout where appropriate.

[i] Refinancing

If the home was financed at one of the high interest rates that prevailed during the late 1970s and 1980s, refinancing at a lower interest rate and/or with a longer payment period can greatly reduce monthly payments. Moreover, refinancing a low interest first mortgage and high interest second mortgage into a low interest first mortgage can also reduce payments.

On the other hand, some refinancing schemes are frauds. Even legitimate refinancing options that look like an improvement on closer inspection are far more costly than the existing mortgage. In order to evaluate the cost and value of refinancing, it is imperative to carefully review the proposed loan terms. n38

The major disadvantages in refinancing residential mortgage debts are the increased finance charges that result from extending the repayment period, the possibility of having to pay points, the additional closing costs, and prepayment penalties on the old mortgages. The feasibility of refinancing depends on whether the homeowner can obtain a loan at a reasonable rate, usually from a savings bank, a commercial bank, a credit union, or a legitimate mortgage company. Most finance companies and certain mortgage companies do not make residential loans at reasonable rates and terms. The availability of special mortgage programs should also be explored, such as Federal Housing Administration or "FHA"-guaranteed loans, state bonded mortgage funds, or local neighborhood development funds available through banks' community reinvestment programs. Another disadvantage which must be explored carefully is whether the borrowers will lose their right to raise defenses to the original loan if it is refinanced with a new lender.

Under the Federal Equal Credit Opportunity Act, lenders who reject a credit application must explain their reasons. n39 Rejected homeowners should obtain the reasons for their rejection and determine whether the reasons are legitimate. Consumers should try to cure any problems so that the next application will be successful.

[ii] Deeds in Lieu of Foreclosure

It may be possible to negotiate to have the lender accept voluntary return of the property as an alternative to foreclosure. This is usually called a "deed in lieu of foreclosure." Deeds in lieu will not be accepted by the mortgage holder if there are junior liens on the property because, in that case, foreclosure is necessary for the mortgage holder to obtain clear title.

Deeds in lieu should not be offered unless the lender agrees to some consideration for the agreement, such as forgiveness of deficiency claims or an extra period of time for the homeowner to remain in the property before eviction. The lender may agree to these terms in order to save the time and expense of foreclosure. Borrowers should be cautioned, however, about the tax consequences of forgiveness of any portion of the loan. Under the federal tax code, forgiveness of debt is generally treated as taxable income to the debtor, n40 unless the debtor is insolvent before the discharge or the discharge occurs in a bankruptcy case. n41

Deeds in lieu can be a poor choice for a homeowner if there is significant equity in the property. That equity can only be realized by a sale rather than a voluntary transfer, even, perhaps, a foreclosure sale.

[iii] State and Local Mortgage Assistance Programs

Some states have developed mortgage assistance programs that provide for loans to homeowners to pay part of the monthly mortgage payment for several years. Homeowners who are behind in their payments because of reasons beyond their control (e.g., lay-offs, plant closings) and who are likely to be able to resume full home loan payments in several years are eligible. Some unions and corporations also have mortgage assistance programs. Notice to the homeowner of this assistance is a prerequisite to foreclosure in Pennsylvania. Lenders in Pennsylvania must also delay foreclosure proceedings once they receive notice that a homeowner has been approved for assistance from the program. n42

The federal government has established a similar mortgage relief program for borrowers unemployed as a result of a military base closing. n43

The City of Chicago and other communities have also created loan funds for homeowners facing foreclosure. It is a good idea to check on local programs with someone familiar with foreclosure prevention strategies in your area.

[g] Credit Consequences of Workout Agreements and Foreclosure

There are no easy answers for clients who are worried about how workout agreements or foreclosure will affect their credit. Most adverse information about a consumer's credit history is reported for seven years. Bankruptcy can be reported for 10 years. n44

Unfortunately, there are no hard and fast rules about how any individual credit granting decision will be made based on a particular notation on a credit report. Each creditor evaluates credit reports differently.

The following general information may be useful to clients worried about their credit:

(1) Concerns about future credit should rarely influence how homeowners address their current problem. A consumer cannot control how a credit report will be evaluated by those who check credit reports. Any delinquency will usually mean "bad credit risk" to most creditors even if it is paid in full relatively quickly. There are generally more important concerns in the foreclosure avoidance process than the potential future impact on a consumer's credit rating which may result from choosing one type of foreclosure plan instead of another.

(2) A foreclosure avoidance plan of any type is likely to look better on a credit report than a completed foreclosure. Any effort which prevents a foreclosure from being completed will show a creditor that the homeowner has made an effort. Repayment plans and loan modifications, if they cure the arrears, will show that the homeowners have gotten back on their feet.

(3) A completed foreclosure is usually fatal to applications for new mortgages from reputable lenders for about two years. Bankruptcy is also usually fatal for two years. The completed foreclosure will be an important consideration for most lenders even after the two year period has expired until the notation is deleted from the credit report (after seven years).

(4) A deed in lieu of foreclosure is not a big improvement over foreclosure. One myth about credit reporting is that a deed in lieu of foreclosure will keep a borrower in good standing on his or her credit record. A deed in lieu of foreclosure is a strong black mark on a credit record; it is only slightly better than a completed foreclosure. A deed in lieu should be considered where appropriate, but should not be seen as a "silver bullet" for future credit.

(5) Unsecured credit is often available even to people with a recent foreclosure on their credit records. There is a great deal of competition in the credit card business. Companies even compete for borrowers with bad credit records. It is therefore a good idea to shop around for reasonable terms rather than simply to accept the first offer.

(6) Avoid credit repair scams. For-profit credit repair is almost always a scam. No one can clean a credit record entirely if there have been delinquencies on debts within the past seven years. Some credit repair companies recommend credit "fixes" which are illegal. Others charge a great deal of money to write letters to credit reporting agencies that a consumer can write just as easily for free.

(7) Even if the consumer is in a high risk credit pool, it is still essential to shop around when applying for credit. Many finance companies and other "hard money" lenders prey on people's beliefs that they have no other potential source of credit. When offered credit only at high rates, a consumer should shop around, using the APR (annual percentage rate) to compare one credit offer to another.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.04

§ 13.04 Legal Defenses to Foreclosure: Procedural Defenses

[1] Introduction

Before a legally valid foreclosure can take place, there must be a valid mortgage between the parties, a default by the borrower, proper foreclosure procedure, and no cure (where permitted) or redemption by the borrower.

The procedure by which procedural challenges can be raised will depend on the method of foreclosure used. If the foreclosure is by judicial process, the homeowner/borrower will have the opportunity to raise defenses and counterclaims to the foreclosure in his or her answer to the foreclosure complaint. A trial will then be held to resolve the claims and counterclaims.

With the more common foreclosure by power of sale, however, the foreclosure takes place entirely outside the judicial process. There is no court hearing, no opportunity to raise defenses or counterclaims, no judgement or decision by a court. Thus, to contest a power of sale foreclosure, the homeowner must file an affirmative action to raise these claims and enjoin the foreclosure. This action should be accompanied by a motion for a temporary restraining order and preliminary injunction to prevent a foreclosure sale while the homeowner's claims are being litigated. In most states, the posting of a bond is a prerequisite to a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction. Courts in most jurisdictions may waive this requirement, however, in appropriate circumstances, including indigence. Often the foreclosure is imminent when the homeowner first seeks legal advice, so the advocate must work very quickly to prevent the foreclosure. One potential problem that must be considered is whether the statutes of limitations governing some of these claims bars their assertion where the foreclosure is taking place many years after the original transaction.

Whether the foreclosure is by judicial or non-judicial process, sometimes filing a bankruptcy petition is the easiest way to stop an imminent foreclosure and allow the homeowner time to initiate these claims. n1 Substantive and procedural defenses are not waived when a homeowner files bankruptcy.

In most jurisdictions, foreclosures are seldom contested by the homeowner. As a result, lenders are often careless about complying with procedural foreclosure requirements, such as the proper and timely service of notice, service on the proper parties, or advertisement in the appropriate place and manner. Practitioners who represent homeowners in foreclosures have found that statutory requirements are not met in many cases. By raising a lack of compliance, the homeowner can force the lender to start the foreclosure process over again, or at least to correct the defect, providing the homeowner with additional time to arrange a workout refinancing or a private sale.

Because foreclosure is such a harsh remedy, some courts take the position that strict compliance with statutory procedure, and the terms of the mortgage, is required before the foreclosure is permitted. Failure to strictly comply with statutory requirements can be a defense to foreclosure.

[2] Default: Waiver and Estoppel

While the provisions regarding default and acceleration in the contract documents should be checked for errors or ambiguities, almost all mortgages provide that the failure to pay any installment on its due date is a default which entitles the lender to accelerate the balance of the debt without notice to the homeowner. Some states, however, require that a notice be sent to the borrower indicating the lender's intent to accelerate and providing the borrower an opportunity to cure the default. n2

Some courts have refused to enforce an acceleration provision strictly where the lender has previously accepted late payments from the homeowner and has not insisted on timely future payments. n3 These courts generally hold that the acceptance of late payments by the lender modifies or waives the strict acceleration provisions or stops the lender from strictly enforcing the acceleration provisions. Thus, where there has been an acceleration without notice and subsequent foreclosure, the homeowner may be entitled to have the foreclosure dismissed and be given the opportunity to make timely future payments on the mortgage after notice that late payments will no longer be accepted. A pattern of acceptance of late payments at least creates a factual question as to whether a new agreement had been created. Likewise with accepting partial payments.

Some mortgages contain a provision that a waiver of any breach shall not constitute a waiver of any other or subsequent breach or default. Most courts, however, have found such clauses do not bar the borrower from claiming waiver or estoppel.

Estoppel may also provide a defense where a lender has agreed to delay foreclosure while the borrower attempts to refinance or to catch up payments, and the borrowers have relied to their detriment on the lender's promise.

[a] Real Party in Interest in a Judicial Proceeding

State law and rules of civil procedure determine who is a real party in interest and therefore has standing to bring a foreclosure action. The real party in interest is generally the entity that possesses the right sought to be enforced. n4 The question of standing, and a party's right to invoke the jurisdiction of the court, typically becomes an issue when the foreclosing entity was not properly assigned the note and mortgage, or the true holder of the loan is in doubt. n5 In that instance, courts often require proof of assignment of both the note and the mortgage to verify the identity of the holder.

Challenging a lender's standing to bring a foreclosure action is a means of temporarily delaying the proceeding as the common law or rules may allow for substitution of the real party in interest. n6

[i] Proper Assignment of Mortgage

Without a valid mortgage, a holder of the note has no lien on the property and generally can only institute a collection action, not foreclose on the home. n7 Of course, a successful collection action might give rise to a judgment lien, so defeating the mortgage and not the note may only delay the inevitable if the property can not be protected by a state homestead exemption.

The statute of frauds requires that any interest in real estate be in writing. n8 Mortgages are now widely considered to create an interest in real estate. n9 Transferring the interest created by a mortgage via assignment should also be covered by the statute of frauds. n10 Using the statute of frauds to defeat a foreclosure action may be easiest when there is no writing transferring either the note or the mortgage to the foreclosing entity. Practitioners should remember that in many jurisdictions, the statute of frauds can be waived, either by failure to plead or failure to object to parole testimony. n11

Courts, primarily in Ohio, have dismissed foreclosure cases brought by assignees when the assignees could not produce a written assignment. n12 The decisions in Ohio are based in part on a requirement in Ohio's law that assignments of mortgages be recorded. n13 Several courts in other states have barred borrowers from asserting the failure of the assignment to comply with the statute of frauds primarily because they find that the borrower is not a third party beneficiary of the assignment contract. n14 As a general rule, only the parties to the contract transferring the interest in land are able to assert a defense of the statute of frauds. n15 This of course overlooks much of the reason for the statute of frauds: to prevent fraud, to protect title to land, and to prevent multiple claims. Borrowers in today's world of securitization, where mortgages are sold often and early, with correspondingly frequent false claims n16 have reason to demand that any foreclosing entity demonstrate the validity of the documents relied on to assert the claim.

[ii] Standing of Servicers to Foreclose

Most mortgage loans are pooled and sold to investors on the secondary market. Mortgage originators retain the right to service the loans they sell to permanent investors. This includes collecting payments, maintaining all necessary accounts (including escrow accounts for taxes and insurance), making necessary disbursements, and forwarding the payments to loan investors.

Investors such as Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae enter into contracts with servicers to administer the mortgages which they hold. Under Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae guidelines the servicer does not retain an interest in the mortgage or note. The original of any note sold to the investor must be endorsed in blank and delivered to the investor's document custodian. n17 The servicer is assigned the mortgage. n18 However, the servicer is then required to assign the mortgage to the investor, but this assignment is unrecorded. n19 Thereafter the servicer will be the mortgagee of record to ensure that legal notices related to the property are sent to it.

[iii] Challenging a Servicer's Standing to Foreclose

When a foreclosure action is initiated in the servicer's name, the servicers' standing to bring a foreclosure action depends mainly on state statute and case law. In securitized transactions, it is common for the servicer to file the foreclosure action though an investor or trust is the actual holder of the note and mortgage. n20 Borrowers are most successful in challenging a servicer's standing where state law clearly defines the holder of the note and mortgage as the real party in interest.

Some courts have allowed a servicer to file a foreclosure action in its own name when the servicer's agreement with the holder gives the servicer a right to collect and foreclose on the mortgage. n21 Moreover, servicers and lenders often file affidavits from company executives asserting an ownership interest in the loan being foreclosed without providing proper documentation. The failure to produce sufficient evidence documenting the foreclosing entity's interest in the note and mortgage may necessitate a dismissal or delay in the proceedings.

[iv] Standing of Mortgage Electronic Registration System to Foreclose

The Mortgage Electronic Registration System (MERS) n22 is an electronic registry and clearinghouse established to track ownership and servicing rights in mortgages. Once a loan is assigned to MERS, all subsequent assignments will not be recorded in public records. The company will then internally track all changes of ownership, servicing rights, corporate names and mergers.

MERS can become mortgagee of record in two ways. For a newly originated loan, a mortgage or deed of trust is prepared with MERS named as the nominee for the lender. MERS as nominee for the lender has been approved by Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, Ginnie Mae, FHA, and the VA. A lender may also execute an assignment to MERS immediately after closing.

Unlike servicers which have an economic interest in servicing the debt, sufficient to confer standing in some jurisdictions, MERS has no beneficial interest in the mortgage in its role as nominee for the holder. MERS does not become the holder of the promissory note that represents the loans. n23 In most jurisdictions, however, MERS forecloses on the loan in its own name or assigns the mortgage to a servicer. n24 MERS has asserted that as the lender's nominee it has the right to foreclose in its own name. A borrower is most successful in challenging this assertion in jurisdictions where the holder of the promissory note is an indispensable party. n25

[v] New Statutory Requirements Related to Identifying Mortgage Holders

Several states have enacted legislation that requires mortgage holders to provide identifying information about themselves and their interest in the property when they foreclose. While these provisions are typically designed to facilitate settlement negotiations, the disclosure requirements can also serve as a basis for ascertaining claims related to the standing and real-party-in-interest status of the foreclosing party. For example, Maryland has enacted a statute which requires that the notice of intent to foreclose list identifying information about the mortgage holder and servicer, including contact information for a person who has authority to modify the loan. n25.1 The statute requires that a complaint or "order to docket" for a foreclosure sale be accompanied by an original or certified copy of the mortgage or deed of trust and a copy of the debt instrument accompanied by an affidavit certifying ownership of the debt. This certification must include a certified copy of the assignment or deed of appointment of a substitute trustee authorizing the party to foreclose. n25.2

Several other recent state enactments require that foreclosure notices identify contacts with the foreclosing entity who have authority to negotiate over loan terms. n25.3 The foreclosing party's failure to comply with these notification requirements should strengthen challenges raising standing and real-party-in-interest claims. New York has amended its foreclosure statutes to add a requirement that foreclosure complaints filed after September 1, 2008 for high-cost and subprime loans must include an affirmative allegation that at the time of filing the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the note and mortgage or had been delegated authority on behalf of the owner and holder. n25.4

[b] Other Procedural Defenses

Procedural defenses to foreclosure vary from state to state, and can only be determined by reference to state statutes and case law. In general, in states which require a judicial proceeding to foreclose, service of process and other procedural requirements must be met. Foreclosure pleadings may be subject to rules set by case law or rule. Similarly, rules may require that relevant documents be attached to the complaint. Failure to comply may be grounds to object to foreclosure or to move for dismissal, resulting in temporary delays. n26

Although a lender's failure to comply with statutory notice requirements may be a defense to foreclosure, n27 actual notice is generally not required: compliance with statutory notice requirements will usually be sufficient, even where the homeowner can prove that he or she did not receive the notice. n28

[3] Deed of Trust: Trustee Obligations

In some jurisdictions, a deed of trust is used as security for a loan, instead of a mortgage. Although there is little practical difference between the two, because a deed of trust is held by a trustee who has an independent duty to protect the rights of the borrower (as well as the lender), borrowers in foreclosure under a deed of trust may be able to raise breach of the trustee's duty as a defense to a foreclosure sale or, after foreclosure, when seeking to set aside a sale.

In most jurisdictions "a trustee under a deed of trust owes fiduciary duties both to the lender and to the borrower." n29 Because of her fiduciary relationship, the trustee must be "scrupulously fair and impartial" in carrying out these duties, including the foreclosure sale. n30 The trustee must comply strictly with the terms of the power of sale and with the statute.

Failure to comply with statutory requirements may subject the trustee to liability for wrongful foreclosure and may constitute grounds to set aside the sale. n31 In addition, if the trustee has actual knowledge of anything which should legally prevent the foreclosure, she may have a duty to investigate. n32

If the trustee has any potential conflict of interest in acting as trustee, she must disclose this fact or will be required to prove that she was faithful to her duties. n33

Finally, selling the property at a price that is shockingly low may amount to a breach of the trustee's duty, n34 though courts usually look for some irregularity or unfairness in addition to a low price. n35

[4] Default: Enforceability of Due on Sale Contract Provisions

[a] Overview

Due on sale clauses are common contract provisions which give a lender the option to immediately call due, or accelerate, a real-estate secured loan when the borrower sells or transfers all or part of the security to a third party. n36 Almost all consumer mortgage loans contain such a provision in the loan note and/or mortgage. Many lenders seek to enforce this right (which can lead to foreclosure proceedings) even when the transfer is between family members or in the probate process upon death of the debtor.

The enforceability of such clauses now is largely a matter of federal law, since state common law or statutory limits on the enforceability of due on sale clauses have been for the most part preempted by the Garn-St. Germain Depository Institutions Act of 1982 ("DIA" or "the Act"), n37 which makes such clauses generally enforceable.

DIA applies to any lender, which is defined to include individuals, state and federal banks, state and federal credit unions, and finance companies, n38 and every loan, mortgage, advance, or credit sale secured by a lien on real property. n39

The Act provides that notwithstanding state law, the exercise of a due on sale clause by a lender is governed exclusively by the terms of the contract, subject only to the limitations contained in the Act. Most importantly, DIA prohibits the exercise of due on sale rights with respect to certain nonsubstantive or nonsale transactions, including intra-family transfers. n40 DIA also allowed states the opportunity to maintain some restrictions with respect to some loans. Michigan, New Mexico, and Utah exercised the right to continue state restrictions.

In addition, the Act makes clear that it does not prohibit mortgage assumption. In fact, it specifically encourages lenders to permit an assumption of a mortgage, either at the contract rate of interest or at a rate between the contract rate and the market rate. n41

[b] Federal Exemptions

Under DIA and Office of Thrift Supervision ("OTS") regulations issued pursuant to DIA, valid due on sale contract provisions are enforceable by lenders, but nine specific exemptions prevent the enforcement of the due on sale clause. n42 These federal regulations and their preemption of state law can be raised defensively to prevent foreclosure if one of these exemptions applies.

[c] Intra-Family Transfers

The federal law aims to protect intra-family transfers from triggering acceleration. These include transfers to the borrower's relative on the borrower's death, transfers to the borrower's children and spouse, and transfers resulting from a marriage dissolution or property settlement.

[d] Lender Waiver by Agreement

In all states other than Michigan, New Mexico, and Utah, if, before a transfer occurs, a lender and the proposed transferee enter into a written agreement for the latter to assume the loan, the lender waives its option to exercise a due on sale clause with respect to that transfer. n43

[e] Contractual Limits on Due on Sale Clauses Are Not Preempted

With respect to all loans, contractual limits on the lender's right to accelerate still apply. Both parties are bound by the contract and the statute does not change that.

[f] Prepayment Fees and Loan Acceleration

Some mortgages include provisions which require a borrower to pay a penalty if the loan is repaid before it is legally due. The federal regulations prohibit the charging of such fees when the lender seeks to enforce a due on sale clause by written demand or formal proceedings on loans secured by the borrower's home. n44

[5] Other Procedural Defenses

Other examples of successful procedural defenses may include the failure of the lender to introduce the original note in the foreclosure proceeding, the misjoinder of a claim for personal liability on the mortgage note in the foreclosure proceeding, failure to join a necessary party, the improper or ineffective assignment of the mortgage, or the failure to comply with statutory notice requirements.

§ 13.05 State Moratoria on Foreclosure

Many states enacted moratorium laws postponing foreclosure sales of homes and farms during the economic depression of the 1930s. n1 Generally, such statutes prevent foreclosures during times of "emergency" by requiring lenders to accept smaller payments during the moratorium. A foreclosure conducted in violation of a moratorium should be invalid.

CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.06

§ 13.06 Foreclosure of Federally Insured, Guaranteed and Direct Loan Program Mortgages for One to Four Family Homes; Loan Servicing Requirements

[1] Foreclosure of HUD-Insured Mortgages

Families facing foreclosure of mortgages insured under sections 203, 221, or 235 of the National Housing Act n1 have significant protections not available to persons with conventional loans. Most courts which have considered the issue have held that the mortgagee's failure to follow the servicing obligations is a valid equitable defense to foreclosure. n2

[2] Termination of the HUD Assignment Program

Until recently, the HUD Home Mortgage Assignment Program was the primary vehicle for low-income homeowners with FHA-insured mortgages to prevent foreclosure during periods of temporary financial hardship. Homeowners facing foreclosure for reasons beyond their control applied directly to HUD for relief. If the homeowner qualified, HUD accepted assignment of the mortgage from the insured lender and provided temporary forbearance (for up to 36 months) and other relief to allow the homeowner an opportunity to regain firm financial footing.

On April 26, 1996, Congress terminated the HUD assignment program. After that, HUD urged lenders to utilize other existing foreclosure avoidance/loss mitigation tools to reduce FHA foreclosure costs and help address the needs of borrowers facing temporary financial hardship. HUD has issued revised regulations, and developed educational efforts aimed at lenders, a written clarification of the potential workout options, and an incentive program to encourage lenders to help HUD mitigate its losses by working with homeowners when appropriate. n3

[3] Summary of Current Workout Options

The options available for homeowners with HUD-insured mortgages now include the following: 1) Special Forbearance: (reduced or suspended payments for up to eighteen months); 2) Partial Claims: (HUD covers up to 12 months arrearage to the mortgagee, the homeowner gives HUD an interest-free mortgage in the amount of the arrears); n4 3) Mortgage Modification: (reamortization of the arrearage over the remaining term of the loan or a term not exceeding thirty years); 4) Pre-Foreclosure Sale: (mortgagees can allow sale of the property through pre-foreclosure sales); and 5) Deed In Lieu.

[4] FHA Secure

The FHA Secure initiative allows borrowers who are current or who became delinquent on an adjustable rate mortgage following the reset of the interest rate to refinance into an FHA-insured mortgage. n5 All non-FHA adjustable rate mortgages are eligible to be refinanced. To qualify, a delinquent borrower must have made all payments on time during the six-month period prior to the reset. There are no limits on how far behind the borrower can be to qualify though the loan amount under FHA Secure may not exceed geographical mortgage loan limits and maximum loan-to-value ratios (between 97.15% and 98.75%). The new mortgage may pay off first and second mortgages, and include closing costs, prepaid expenses, discount points, prepayment penalties, and late charges. Delinquent principal, interest, taxes, and insurance may also be added, provided that the delinquency arose after the reset. The program is temporary and loan applications must be signed no later than December 31, 2008.

[5] New Foreclosure Requirements for HUD-Insured Lenders

For defaults occurring after February 1, 1998, the mortgagee must either use a foreclosure prevention tool or begin foreclosure within six months of default (the prior requirement was nine months). n6 HUD believes this shortened time will encourage workouts rather than foreclosures. n7

In addition, all mortgagers must now review all mortgage loans that are in default for three months to determine if any of the loss mitigation tools are appropriate. n8 Mortgagees must now document that they have considered all loss mitigation options to determine which, if any, are appropriate before initiating foreclosure. n9 HUD may impose sanctions on lenders for failure to engage in loss mitigation activities in the form of a penalty in the amount of three times the amount of any HUD insurance benefit the lender is entitled to receive. n10

The foreclosure of VA-guaranteed mortgages may be subject to state or federal protections. Some courts have held that VA regulations preempt state foreclosure law protections. n11 Other courts hold that the only state law nullified are those inconsistent with VA regulations or their purposes. n12 Where original mortgagor has not been made a party to the foreclosure of an assumed mortgage, the original mortgagor is not liable for any deficiency. n13

In addition, HUD guidelines also require mortgagees to provide special relief for military personnel on active duty, including postponement of payment on the principal, and protections during foreclosure. n14

[6] Foreclosure of VA-Guaranteed Mortgages

A homeowner whose mortgage is insured by the Veteran's Administration has additional rights not available to homeowners with private conventional mortgages. The holder of the mortgage may not foreclose unless the borrower fails to make three full monthly payments; n15 may allow the borrower to reinstate prior to sale by tender of the amount of delinquency, including installment payments, late charges, and reasonable expenses incurred and paid by the lender if foreclosure has begun; n16 must provide 30 days' advance notice to the VA of its intention to foreclose; n17 must accept partial payments in many circumstances; n18 and must extend all reasonable forbearance, including consideration of temporary suspension of payments, extension of the loan, and acceptance of partial payments. n19

In addition, under the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act, a court order is required prior to a foreclosure, sale or seizure of property while the service member is on active duty or within ninety days after the end of active duty. n20

Although authority exists for the VA to refund the unpaid balance of a loan to the lender, or to take an assignment of the loan and the mortgage, n21 in reality, the VA rarely exercises this authority. Courts have found that the VA's decision not to exercise this authority is not subject to judicial review. Nonetheless, some state courts have allowed borrowers to raise improper servicing as an equitable defense to foreclosure. n22

[7] Foreclosure of Farmers Home Administration Loans and Mortgages

Rural farm and non-farm borrowers under the RHS (formerly the Farmer's Home Administration or "FmHA") have significant rights not available to borrowers with conventional loans. n23

[8] Protections from Foreclosure Available Under the Servicemembers Civil Relief Act

The Servicemembers Civil Relief Act (SCRA) n24 provides special foreclosure and other protections for military service personnel on active duty and their dependents. The SCRA was signed into law on December 19, 2003, and is a complete revision of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act of 1940. n25 The new law preserves or expands many of the protections available under the original law and restates or clarifies certain key issues. A number of states have similar laws. n26

Since the rewritten law preserves the substance of the original Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act, decisions under this former law remain relevant.

[a] Who is Protected by the Act?

The Act applies to members of the uniformed services on active duty, n27 and includes members of the National Guard who are called to active service authorized by the President or Secretary of Defense for more than thirty consecutive days for the purpose of responding to a national emergency, n28 reservists ordered to report for military service, n29 persons ordered to report for induction under the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. § 451 et seq.), n30 and United States citizens serving with allied forces, n31 are also entitled to the Act's protections, as are dependents and co-obligors of servicemembers are entitled to many of the protections of the Act, in some circumstances. n32 The act may also protect a small business owned by a servicemember. n33

[b] Protections Against Foreclosure

The relief provided by the Act applies to a servicemember who originated a mortgage, trust deed or security in the nature of a mortgage prior to beginning active duty, and for which the servicemember is still obligated. n34

A court order is required prior to a foreclosure, sale or seizure of property while the servicemember is on active duty or within ninety days after the end of active duty. n35 This is especially helpful in the states where lenders are permitted to foreclose on the mortgage without court action. A foreclosure in violation of this provision may render the sale invalid and subject the lender to criminal prosecution.

Servicemembers may waive the protections provided by a court ordered sale, but the waiver must be in writing and executed during or after the servicemember's period of active duty. n36 Assuming a sale was properly performed, a servicemember may obtain an extension of a state statutory redemption period by an amount of time equal to the servicemember's period of active duty. n37

In addition, a court may, on its own or upon application by a servicemember, impose a stay of the foreclosure proceedings or fashion such equitable relief as may be appropriate to protect the interests of all parties. n38 Military service must materially affect the servicemember's ability to pay the mortgage or meet his or her obligations under the mortgage.

Other relief available under the Act includes reopening a default foreclosure judgment issued during active duty or within sixty days after the end of active duty. n40 Upon an application by, or on behalf of a servicemember, the court may reopen the judgment if the servicemember was materially affected by military service in making a defense to the action, and the servicemember has a meritorious or legal defense to the action. n41 The servicemember must seek to vacate the judgment no later than ninety days after release from active duty.

The Act also provides protections against the forfeiture of land installment contracts similar to those provided for mortgages. n42 Lenders are also responsible for providing written notice of the SCRA's mortgage-related provisions to borrowers who are forty-five days late on their mortgage. n43

[c] Interest Rate Reduction Under the Act

The Act requires that a lender reduce the interest rate to six percent on any loan obligation incurred prior to active duty. The loan shall not bear a rate higher than six percent during the period of active duty, unless a court decides, on application by the lender, that the servicemember's ability to pay the higher interest rate is not materially affected by military service. n44 Interest in excess of six percent must be forgiven, not simply deferred. n45 In addition, the amount of the periodic payments must be reduced by the amount of the interest forgiven. n46 This prevents lenders from requiring the same monthly payment from the servicemember but simply shifting a greater portion of that payment to pay off the principal.

To benefit from the interest rate reduction, the servicemember must provide written notice to the lender and a copy of the military orders calling the servicemember to active duty and any other orders further extending military service. n47 This notice must be given no later than 180 days after the servicemember's termination or release from active duty. n48 The interest rate reduction is effective as of the date on which the servicemember is called to active duty. n49

[d] Remedies for Violation of the Act

A private cause of action is not directly established under the Act. However, the Act expressly preserves the servicemember's right to pursue a claim for wrongful conversion. n50 In addition, courts have held that the former version of the Act creates a private cause of action for violations. n51 The debtor is not confined to raising the violation of the Act defensively, in response to a foreclosure, but can sue affirmatively. n52

§ 13.07 Legal Defenses to Foreclosure: Substantive Defenses

[1] Introduction

In order to be valid, a foreclosure must be based on a valid, legally enforceable mortgage (or deed of trust). n1 This section will discuss some of the possible challenges to the validity of the mortgage agreement itself, and other claims that may be raised based on lender misconduct in the making of the loan. These claims may possibly be raised post-foreclosure in an action to set aside the sale, depending on state law and on who purchased at the sale, but obviously it is preferable to raise any available claims before the foreclosure has taken place. After a foreclosure sale, the borrower may be unable to set aside the sale, although he or she would still have a claim for damages against the original lender for wrongful foreclosure, or, in some circumstances, could seek injunctive relief to reverse the foreclosure.

[2] Lender Liability for Loans Which Are Disadvantageous to the Borrower

[a] General

Many credit transactions, especially predatory home equity secured credit and home improvement schemes, may involve overreaching and lead to contracts truly disadvantageous to borrowers. Some overreaching is substantive, as in gross disparity between the price of a product or service and its value; some is procedural, as in misrepresentation about terms or benefits, or a failure to disclose material information. n2

[b] Unfair and Deceptive Acts and Practices (UDAP) Statutes

Some unfair practices can be challenged under state unfair and deceptive acts and practices ("UDAP") statutes, providing the statute governs the type of transaction (the extension of credit) and creditor involved. n3

Several widespread practices may be challenged by UDAP claims, for example, "flipping" loans, where a lender makes a series of loans to a consumer, each loan refinancing the prior loan; "overcollateralizing," where a home is taken as security for a relatively small loan; or "loan-padding"--structuring a loan to increase its size without advancing additional funds to borrowers, thereby increasing lender profit or giving a larger loan on which to foreclose. Other state UDAP claims involve failure to follow servicing guidelines. n4

In an attempt to curb the increasing number of property flipping schemes, the FHA recently implemented property flipping guidelines. These guidelines seek to hold lenders accountable for the quality of appraisals on properties secured by FHA-insured mortgages. n5 The final rule requires that:

- Only owners of record can sell properties that will be financed using FHA-insured mortgages (the transaction may not involve any sale or assignment of the sales contract);

- Any re-sale of a property may not occur 90 or fewer days from the last sale to be eligible for FHA financing;

- For re-sales that occur between 91/-/180 days where the new sales price exceeds the previous sales price by 100%, FHA will require additional documentation validating the property's value. n6

In addition, the rules provide flexibility for FHA to examine and require additional evidence of appraised value when properties are re-sold within twelve months. n7

Remedies available for UDAP violations will vary depending on the state UDAP statute, but generally include actual damages, often statutory damages, and, in some states, punitive and treble damages. Here, UDAP damage claims could be used in two ways: the borrower may assert that he or she is not in default because the lender was involved in misconduct concerning the underlying transaction; or the borrower can assert that the UDAP claims against the lender offset the amount of delinquent payments. There is little case law in this area.

Where a lender has violated a UDAP statute, or engaged in usury or fraud, arguably the lender's illegal conduct renders the underlying contract unenforceable and, therefore, the action to enforce the mortgage by foreclosure should fail.

The borrower may attempt to stop a foreclosure by claiming that his or her claims (UDAP, usury, etc.) against the lender offset the amount of delinquent payments. These claims may eliminate the delinquency or reduce it to an amount that the borrower could afford to pay to redeem the mortgage.

Where state UDAP statutes authorize equitable relief, a UDAP claimant may seek to void or rescind the contract based on illegality.

[c] Fraud/Misrepresentation, Fiduciary Duty and RICO

Creative uses of fraud or misrepresentation may result in the note being declared unenforceable.

A credit transaction may give rise to special duties to the borrower, up to and including a fiduciary duty, which gives rise to a duty of fair and honest disclosure of all facts which might be presumed to influence the consumer in regard to his or her actions. Where there is a duty to disclose, failure to do so should give rise to a tort claim for nondisclosure, or the silence may qualify as misrepresentation. Such claims can be used to invalidate the underlying mortgage transaction or to recover money damages to offset any delinquency. n8

In the foreclosure process the lender has a fiduciary duty to ensure that the homeowner obtains the highest price possible from the sale of the property. A lender's refusal to postpone a foreclosure sale, for example, to allow the homeowner to conduct a market sale to a willing and financially capable buyer is a violation of its fiduciary duty. The pre-auction sale would have satisfied the lender's lien and costs and netted the homeowner a surplus. n9

The Federal Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO") n10 provides powerful civil remedies, including attorney's fees and treble damages, to victims subjected to a broadly defined range of "racketeering activity" or to the collection of an "unlawful debt," which is defined as any usurious debt bearing interest of at least twice the "enforceable rate." n11

[3] Truth in Lending

[a] Truth in Lending Rescission Rights

In addition to being entitled to a TIL disclosure statement summarizing the credit terms prior to consummating a credit transaction, a homeowner has a TIL right to rescind most non-purchase money transactions for which the home is taken as collateral, such as most home equity or home improvement loans.

The rescission right is absolute for three days, but it may also last up to three years, n12 if the homeowner does not sell the home and if important "material" TIL disclosures were not provided correctly at the time of the original credit transaction. Once notice of rescission is given, the lien on the consumer's home becomes void, n13 taking away the creditor's foreclosure remedy, and its leverage. The homeowner is entitled to a return, or a credit against the balance of the debt, of all finance, interest, and other charges, such as closing costs and broker's fees. n14

If the transaction is subject to the rescission right, and there are valid grounds for exercising the extended right, rescission is a complete defense to foreclosure on the property.

When the consumer has rescinded a transaction, after the creditor takes the required steps, the consumer is then obligated to tender the loan proceeds, or the fair market value of any property received which may be less than the original credit obligation. n15

[b] Rescission Rights in Bankruptcy

Filing a bankruptcy, which can be done quite quickly with a bare bones petition, n16 stops any collection activity immediately, including both judicial and non-judicial foreclosures. In general, the merits of the TIL rescission and other consumer defenses can be litigated in an adversary proceeding within the debtor's bankruptcy case. Moreover, if a debtor files for bankruptcy and does not assert TILA claims, the debtor is not estopped from asserting those claims in a later bankruptcy proceeding. n17 In other words, TILA claims are not compulsory counterclaims in bankruptcy.

In a chapter 13 bankruptcy, once the bankruptcy court has determined the consumer's tender obligation after all defenses and setoffs have been accounted for, any remaining obligation can be tendered in installments through the chapter 13 plan.

Another advantage of bankruptcy court is that there is a strong argument that an arbitration clause is ineffective in bankruptcy litigation. n18

In Beach v. Ocwen Federal Bank, n19 the Supreme Court ruled that extended rescission rights under TILA must be exercised within the three year period provided under the statute. The court has barred the use of TILA rescission by recoupment as a defense to a collection action or to a creditor's bankruptcy proof of claim after expiration of the three year period.

[c] Truth in Lending Damages Claims

Nearly all home mortgages, where the lender is in the business of making loans to consumers, are subject to the disclosure requirements of the TILA. These requirements include the disclosure of the annual percentage rate ("APR"), n20 disclosure of the finance charge, n21 disclosure of the amount financed, n22 and disclosure of any security interest taken. n23 Failure to disclose these items as required may give rise to claims for actual damages, n24 statutory damages, n25 and attorney's fees. n26 Statutory damages are limited to twice the finance, but not less than $200.00 and not more than $2000.00. While these claims will not defeat the mortgage, they may be used to reduce the amount of indebtedness. Claims for damages are not limited to non-purchase money mortgages. If the loan is covered by the Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act ("HOEPA"), the consumer is entitled to not only statutory damages and actual damages, but also special enhanced damages in the amount of all finance charges and fees paid by the consumer. n27 This award can make a substantial reduction in the balance.

[d] Special Truth in Lending Disclosure Requirements for High-Rate Home Equity Loans

In 1994, Congress passed HOEPA n28 to prevent some predatory lending practices targeted at vulnerable consumers, effective as to loans made after October 1, 1995.

This Act applies to high interest or high fee mortgages not obtained for the purchase of the home; that is, second mortgages or home equity loans. Violations of the Act trigger the usual TIL monetary damages, and, possibly, enhanced damages, as well as TIL rescission. n29 In addition, the law limits the right of assignees of high-cost mortgages to assert holder in due course statue to cut off consumer claims and defenses.

Covered loans are subject to additional TIL disclosure requirements and to prohibitions on certain mortgage terms, including prepayment penalties, n30 balloon payments in loans with terms of less than five years, and negative amortization. n31

After October 1, 2002, due on demand provisions or call provisions that permit the creditor to terminate the loan in advance of the original maturity date and to accelerate the entire loan balance are prohibited except in limited circumstances. n32 The new rules also prohibit a lender from refinancing a HOEPA loan into a new HOEPA loan within one year of the origination date, unless the refinancing is in the borrower's best interest. n33

Federal preemption of state usury laws has limited usury as a possible defense to a foreclosure action. However, where a lender is foreclosing on a second mortgage, or where the state has "opted out" of the federal preemption provisions, usury laws may provide a viable defense. Even where state (or federal) law places no restrictions on interest rates, other than that the interest rate shall be as the contract provides, the loan may be usurious, if there is "hidden interest," such as where unauthorized charges for lender services are not included in the stated interest rate or where excessive "points" or similar charges are made. Where there is hidden interest, the actual interest rate is higher than the stated contract rate, and, therefore, the loan is usurious. n34

The remedies available where usury can be established will vary from state-to-state. Often a statute will declare a usurious loan void as to all or part of the interest while leaving the principal obligation intact. Under such statutes, the widely accepted rule is that all payments already made on the contract will be applied to the principal debt until the debt has been paid off. Thus, in a foreclosure case, a borrower may be able to raise a usury claim to reduce or eliminate the amount of a default.

Some statutes declare usurious transactions to be completely void and prohibit any creditor recovery whether or not the principal has been repaid.

[5] Credit Disability Insurance: Obtaining Benefits

Credit disability insurance guarantees payment of a loan in the event that the borrower is unable to work as a result of a disability.

One of the problems associated with credit disability insurance is post-claim denial of coverage by the insurance company after the consumer had been led to believe that the insurance requested in the credit transaction had taken effect. This happens for one of two reasons. Either the insurance company determines that the borrower was not eligible for the insurance at the time of application and is, therefore, not covered, or, the creditor fails to submit or properly process the application so that coverage is never effective.

At least one court stopped a foreclosure based on a bank's negligent failure to obtain insurance coverage after a borrower purchased credit disability insurance. Borrowers may need to allege some misconduct on the part of the lender with respect to the credit insurance in order to enjoin foreclosure or repossession upon denial of a claim. n35

[6] Home Equity Scams and Foreclosure Fraud

There is no limit to the creative schemes that have been devised to separate homeowners, who have financial problems or who are otherwise vulnerable, from their property and their equity. A few of the more common scenarios, however, include sale/leaseback schemes, home improvement financing scams, and refinancing schemes/equity skimming. Failure to pay for these ventures if a secured loan is taken out may lead to foreclosure and the need to raise appropriate defenses. n36

[7] Raising Claims and Defenses Against the FDIC or RTC

Borrowers who find themselves in the position of defending against a foreclosure action brought by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation ("FDIC") or the Resolution Trust Corporation ("RTC") after it has taken over a failed lender may have difficulty raising certain claims against these agencies which arise out of the failed lender's conduct. There are special common law and statutory defenses available to the FDIC and RTC which provide broad immunity from many claims under the so-called D'Oench, Duhme doctrine; however, the law in this area is in a state of flux. n37

[8] Challenging the Amount of the Claimed Default: Unauthorized Fees and Overcharges

Even where the borrower concedes that some amount is due and owing on the mortgage, the lender's calculation of the balance of the debt should not automatically be accepted as accurate. Unauthorized fees should not be included in the amount needed to cure or redeem the mortgage. While some overcharges may be inadvertent, where an overcharge appears to be deliberate or where a creditor fails to correct an overcharge after notice, the borrower may have grounds for claims under the state UDAP and state debt collection laws for actual damages, as well as attorney's fees. Where overcharges involve interest, a usury claim may be available. n38

In some cases, it may be advantageous for the borrower to challenge the amount owed under the mortgage even after the foreclosure, so as to reduce the redemption amount or the amount of a deficiency judgment.

[9] Other Defenses

[a] Lender's Violation of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act

A number of courts, including one federal circuit court, n39 have allowed homeowners to raise a lender's violation of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act ("ECOA") n40 as a defense to foreclosure. This claim most commonly arises where a lender requires a wife's signature on a promissory note, not just the mortgage, even though she is not an applicant on the loan, and even though the husband is creditworthy in his own right. Requiring a wife to sign solely because of her status as the wife of the applicant violates the ECOA. n41

Consumer remedies available under the ECOA include actual damages, punitive damages up to $10,000, attorney's fees and costs, n42 and equitable relief, which may allow the wife to void her liability under the note and mortgage. There is a two-year statute of limitations for ECOA claims, but such a claim can be raised later as a defense or recoupment to the lender's claim to enforce the mortgage. n43

[b] Incompetence of the Borrower

Contracts entered into by incompetents are generally voidable. This may be a defense to foreclosure by voiding the underlying note and mortgage.

[c] Unconscionability of Mortgage

The common law contract defense of unconscionability may be applied to stop a foreclosure, where either the mortgage terms are unreasonably favorable to the lender, or where certain aspects of the transaction render it unconscionable.

[d] Fair Lending Statutes

A number of courts have allowed homeowners to raise a lender's violation of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act (ECOA) and the Fair Housing Act (FHA) as a defense to foreclosure. For example, the Maine Supreme Judicial Court has used its equitable power under the ECOA to bar a lender from foreclosing on property owned by joint tenancy when the wife's signature on the mortgage was obtained in violation of that Act. n44 Claims of reverse redlining under either the ECOA or the FHA may also be raised defensively in foreclosure actions. n45 More recently, ECOA has been used affirmatively to combat the predatory practice of making loans to consumers for a larger amount than they applied for and without a formal loan denial and statement of reasons why the loan in the amount requested was not provided. n46

As a general rule, both the ECOA and the FHA have a two-year statutes of limitation for affirmative claims. n47 However claims usually can be brought by way of set-off or recoupment. n48 In addition to equitable relief discussed above, consumer remedies for violation of fair lending statutes in affirmative or defensive cases include actual damages, punitive damages, and attorney fees and costs. n49

Significantly, both the ECOA and the FHA may allow consumers to reach assignees and secondary market players. The ECOA definition of creditor explicitly includes assignees as long as they regularly participate in credit decisions, including setting the terms of the credit. n50 The FHA explicitly applied to the selling, brokering, or appraising of residential real estate and to any other entity providing financial assistance related to a loan covered by the Act. n51 The FHA also applies to the activities of secondary market players in the purchasing of loans, debts, or securities, the pooling and packaging of these instruments, and the marketing and sale of securities issues on the basis of loans or debts. n52

[e] Miscellaneous Defenses

Under a California statute, a cosigner on a consumer credit transaction is entitled to a statutory notice from the lender at the time the loan is made. n53, n54 Failure to provide this notice has been held to be a defense to foreclosure. n55

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.08

§ 13.08 Due Process Challenges to Foreclosure by Power of Sale

[1] Introduction

Due process requires deprivation of a significant property interest to be preceded by both adequate notice and a meaningful opportunity for hearing. Foreclosure by power of sale would seem to violate this standard in two ways: personal notice of a foreclosure sale is not required in all states, and no state which permits power of sale foreclosure requires a hearing prior to foreclosure. In the mid- to late- 1970s, there was a wave of assaults on the power of sale foreclosure as a violation of due process. Almost all foundered, however, at the circuit court level on the Supreme Court's state action doctrine, given the Court's insistence that there can be no constitutional deprivation without a state actor, and that most power of sale foreclosure proceedings are between two private parties. n1

Without state action, there is no due process protection. There are at least two foreclosure situations, however, where state action may be easily established: where the foreclosing mortgagee is a government agency such as the VA or FmHA, or where the state foreclosure process requires the participation of a government official.

[2] Foreclosure by HUD of Single Family Mortgages

Under the "Single Family Mortgage Foreclosure Act of 1994," n2 HUD is authorized to foreclose defaulted single family mortgages by nonjudicial power of sale. The statute appears to preempt state foreclosure law by implication, so that even in states where judicial foreclosure is otherwise required, HUD may follow the nonjudicial foreclosure procedure established by the statute.

This law raises serious due process issues, particularly for borrowers in states which otherwise require a lender to foreclose by judicial process. No provision is made for a pre-foreclosure hearing, which due process would seem to require. The law may also run afoul of the contracts clause by abrogating rights under existing mortgage contracts which call for foreclosure by judicial process. Regulations promulgated under the Act do not appear to rectify these apparent defects. n3

[3] Participation by State Official

In some states, statutory foreclosure procedures require the participation of a state official for the proper conduct of the foreclosure. In these states, a strong argument may be made that the involvement of the state official constitutes state action for due process purposes. A number of courts have reached this conclusion.

It is probably unrealistic to argue that the mere recording of a deed would constitute state action. Indeed, at that point, the deprivation suffered under a foreclosure would already have taken place. But where it is required by state law that a clerk issue a writ, or receive documents, such as an accounting of sales results in order to finalize a foreclosure, or that a sheriff execute a foreclosure, it is consistent with constitutional law to find the presence of state action.

[4] Due Process Requirements Once State Action Is Found

Once state action has been established, due process protections must be applied. Exactly what this means for borrowers, however, is not entirely clear. Generally, due process requires notice reasonably calculated to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action and a pre-deprivation hearing aimed at establishing the validity of the underlying claim. In light of the Supreme Court's decision in Mennonite Board of Mission v. Adams, n4 notice by publication or posting (constructive notice) is probably invalid.

The hearing provided must give the recipient an effective opportunity to defend by confronting witnesses and presenting arguments and evidence orally. The recipient has the right to be represented by counsel, and the impartial decision maker's conclusion must be based solely on legal rules and evidence adduced at the hearing and put in writing, stating the reasons for the decision and the evidence relied upon.

A waiver contained in the mortgage giving up these rights is unlikely to be honored by the court.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.09

§ 13.09 Using Equitable Grounds to Prevent a Foreclosure

[1] Generally

Foreclosure actions at common law were actions in equity. Many state statutes retain the equitable character of the foreclosure process, even where the foreclosure is by power of sale, through provisions granting the mortgagor the right to petition the court to enjoin the foreclosure sale.

A number of courts have relied solely on equitable considerations to prohibit foreclosure, despite the lender's legal right to foreclose. Courts have found the conduct of the lender to be unconscionable or so lacking in good faith as to warrant the court's intervention to prevent the foreclosure.

[2] Failure to Comply With HUD and VA Servicing Guidelines

Federal regulations and HUD issued handbooks set forth in detail the procedures to be followed by lenders of HUD-insured loans when a borrower defaults. These guidelines recommend several alternatives to foreclosure, including assignment of the mortgage to HUD, and require that the lender take certain steps prior to foreclosure to determine whether foreclosure can be avoided. In an appropriate case, the lender's conduct may provide grounds for the court to exercise its equitable power to prevent a foreclosure.

[3] Mortgagee's/Trustee's Duty of Good Faith

A trustee under a deed of trust, or a mortgagee under a mortgage, has a duty to exercise good faith and diligence in conducting a foreclosure sale of property. n1 Failure to meet this duty may result in damages or the enjoining of a foreclosure.

The lender is also obligated to exercise good faith and diligence to protect the interests of the homeowner before the foreclosure sale. This may include postponing the foreclosure sale to allow the homeowner to conduct a market sale of the property and retain some of the equity in the property. A Massachusetts trial court held that a lender did not exercise good faith when it refused to postpone a foreclosure sale, despite the homeowner producing a buyer that made a legally binding commitment to purchase the property and was willing to pay a price that would result in a full recovery of all money due to the lender, including costs, and net $50,000 to the homeowner. The lender's compliance with state foreclosure statutes did not relieve it of liability for breach of its duty. n2

Another argument may be made for pre-foreclosure equitable relief when the sale is not likely to bring a fair price, as for example, when it is not widely advertised or is scheduled for a holiday or in a manner that would chill the bidding.

[4] Enjoining a Foreclosure Sale Where There Is Sufficient Equity in the Property to Satisfy the Mortgage Debt

Prior to a sale, a homeowner with substantial equity may be able to enjoin a foreclosure to allow a sale on the open market. A foreclosure sale is virtually guaranteed to bring no more than the balance due on the note. A sale on the open market, however, should allow the homeowner to retain some of his equity in the property. Such a sale presents no risk to the lender; it will be paid in full from the sale proceeds.

If it is not possible to get an injunction from the court to stop the foreclosure to allow a more orderly sale, a chapter 13 bankruptcy filing providing for liquidation of the property may provide a solution, by staying all proceedings against the property and, thus, allowing time for a sale.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.10

§ 13.10 Special Issues Relating to Foreclosure of Mortgages Held by HUD

[1] HUD Foreclosure Statute

Congress has enacted legislation authorizing the foreclosure by nonjudicial power of sale of HUD-held single family mortgages. The statute, titled "Nonjudicial Foreclosure of Single Family Mortgages," n1 appears to preempt state foreclosure law by implication. Some of the other key aspects of this new foreclosure provision are:

- HUD must designate a foreclosure commissioner to carry out foreclosures in accordance with the statute.
- The borrower must be given a "Notice of Default and Foreclosure Sale" at least 21 days prior to the sale.
- The foreclosure commissioner may cancel the sale if the borrower cures the default (i.e., pays the installments which are then due) before the sale, though the Commissioner has discretion to refuse to cancel a foreclosure sale if the borrower has cured a default previously.
- The borrower has no right of redemption after foreclosure.
- If the foreclosure sale price is less than the outstanding mortgage debt, the foreclosure commissioner can ask the Attorney General to seek a deficiency judgment, unless the mortgage prohibits such an action.

[2] Challenges to the Law

The new law raises serious due process issues, as well as questions of preemption of state law. No provision is made in the statute for a pre-foreclosure hearing, which due process would seem to require. n2 The apparent abrogation of rights to judicial foreclosure under the mortgage and/or state law is also troubling.

[3] Foreclosure Defense and Counseling for Loans Sold by HUD

There may be little use now, however, for the special rules regarding foreclosure of HUD-held mortgages. In 1995, as a cost-cutting measure, HUD began divesting itself of approximately 90,000 mortgage loans which it acquired through the HUD assignment and other programs. Aggressive collection activities by the lenders who have purchased the mortgages from HUD has resulted in much foreclosure activity and substantial confusion about procedures.

[4] The Importance of the Terms of the HUD Loan Sale Agreements: Enforcement by Borrowers

The purchasers of the loans are bound by the terms of their loan sale agreements, each of which has important protective provisions for the affected homeowners. HUD inserted a provision in every loan sale agreement which confirms that homeowners have third party beneficiary status to enforce the servicing requirements. Thus, in addition to making complaints to HUD if servicers are not following these mandates, homeowners have the right to sue to enforce the loan sale agreement.

On other important points, however, the loan sale agreements for each of the four sales differ and cannot be easily summarized. n3

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.11

§ 13.11 Elderly Homeowners: Special Considerations

[1] Overview

The foreclosure of a home is always a tragedy. Where elderly homeowners are involved, the consequences are even more dire. Limited income may make it impossible to find other housing. The emotional costs of leaving a family home of many years may be simply overwhelming. Equity rich, cash poor elderly homeowners are particularly attractive targets for unscrupulous lenders, home improvement contractors, and salesmen. Loss of a home to foreclosure can mean not only loss of shelter, but also loss of an elder's most valuable asset, the equity in their home. Elders are often targeted by unscrupulous mortgage lenders based on the amount of equity in their homes. Lack of experience in complicated financial matters or, in some cases, a lack of mental capacity may make some seniors even more vulnerable. Tragically, however, it is not only slick siding salesmen or shady finance companies who take advantage of the elderly. In some cases, older homeowners find themselves facing the loss of their home because of actions taken by their own children or a care giver whom they have trusted. In addition to the other claims described in this chapter, some additional legal issues may arise when advocating for an elderly homeowner facing foreclosure.

If a homeowner seeks assistance after a foreclosure judgment has been entered, advocates may have that judgment set aside for compelling reasons. For example, one Ohio appellate court ordered a default judgment vacated for excusable neglect where the elderly homeowner's affidavit indicated that she had such poor vision she could not read the complaint, her memory was so faulty that she forgot she received paperwork from the court, and she had difficulty understanding the documents. The court noted that the homeowner's case was particularly compelling because of possible fraudulent practices by the home improvement company that brokered the loan. n1

[2] Exploitation by Lenders, Home Improvement Contractors and Others

In addition to the remedies described above, which may also apply in cases where a senior is taken advantage of by a stranger, some additional remedies may be available.

There is a growing trend in state legislatures amending their UDAP statutes to provide for enhanced penalties where fraud is targeted at the elderly. These statutes generally provide extra private or state remedies for specified types of violations, such as if a seller willfully disregards the rights of the older person and if the older person was more vulnerable by reason of age or health than other persons. Penalties recovered by state enforcement agencies often go to a special fund to facilitate additional enforcement against elder fraud.

In 1994, Congress passed the HOEPA, n2 which placed substantial limitations on certain home equity lenders' ability to impose some of the terms they had been freed by deregulation to use. Among the restricted terms are negative amortization balloon payments and prepayment penalties.

The legislation applies only to closed-end loans secured by the borrower's primary home with either interest rates or closing costs above certain levels set by the Act.

§ 13.12 Reverse Mortgage Abuses

Reverse mortgages (sometimes called "reverse annuity mortgages" or "RAMs") are rising debt loans made to elderly homeowners which are secured by equity in the home. Repayment of the reverse mortgage loan is generally not required until certain events occur, such as the homeowner's death or the sale of the home. Typically, reverse mortgage loans are paid out to the homeowner in monthly installments. The amount of the monthly proceeds received by the homeowner is determined by the value of the home, the interest rate and other fees charged, the loan term, the amount of any initial lump sum disbursed to the homeowner, and the homeowner's age. n1

Reverse mortgages are subject to some additional disclosure requirements under the federal TILA. n2 A number of states have also enacted laws designed to protect against abuses in reverse mortgages.

CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

§ 13.13 Bankruptcy

[1] Introduction

A consumer facing the loss of his or her home through foreclosure or execution on a judgment may be able to secure temporary or permanent relief in the bankruptcy court. Some possible avenues of relief are discussed below. n1 A complete discussion of the bankruptcy process can be found in Consumer Bankruptcy Law and Practice n2 and we recommend that volume for those considering using bankruptcy to assist their clients. In addition, many of the topics discussed in this chapter have been affected by amendments made to the Bankruptcy Code by the 2005 Bankruptcy Act. n3 While some of these changes are covered in this chapter, readers are encouraged to review the more detailed discussion of these amendments in the National Consumer Law Center's Consumer Bankruptcy Law and Practice. n4

[a] Automatic Stay

The filing of a petition in bankruptcy automatically prevents almost all creditor actions against the debtor and the debtor's property, including foreclosure, foreclosure sales, and the filing of liens against the property. n5 A foreclosure conducted in violation of the automatic stay is generally void. n6 Depending on the circumstances of the case, this protection may be permanent or temporary.

The 2005 Bankruptcy Act creates a number of new exceptions and limitations to the automatic stay, several of which apply if there have been prior dismissed bankruptcy cases. If the debtor has had one prior bankruptcy case dismissed within the year before the petition is filed, the automatic stay will terminate thirty days after the case is filed. n7 However, the debtor may file a motion within the thirty-day period requesting that the court extend the stay as to all or some creditors. n8 The debtor must demonstrate that the case has been filed in good faith, typically by showing that circumstances have changed. The 2005 Act does not define good faith for purposes of this stay limitation, but good faith has been given a recognized meaning by case law with respect to the filing of a case. n9 In addition, this stay limitation provision sets forth several circumstances in which a case is presumed to be filed in bad faith, and the debtor may need to rebut such a presumption if it arises with clear and convincing evidence to the contrary. n10

[b] Discharge of a Deficiency Judgment

Because a deficiency judgment is an unsecured debt, it is subject to discharge in bankruptcy. n11

[c] Truth in Lending Rescission

A debtor may bring a rescission action and other consumer claims in bankruptcy court against a creditor who holds a security interest in the debtor's home. If the action is successful, the security interest will be released, in whole or in part, and the debtor is not liable for any finance charges. In several jurisdictions, after rescission, the debt may be treated as a wholly unsecured claim. n12

[i] Setting Aside a Foreclosure Sale in Bankruptcy

It is still possible to set aside a mortgage foreclosure or tax sale in bankruptcy, although grounds to do so have been limited by a 1994 Supreme Court decision. n13

[d] Curing a Mortgage Default

The borrower may be able to file a petition under chapter 13 and propose a plan to pay off the mortgage arrearage within a reasonable time and resume making mortgage payments, even if foreclosure proceedings have already begun. n14

[e] Voiding Mortgage Liens by Strip Down in Chapter 13

Although the Supreme Court has limited the availability of this remedy, it is nevertheless possible in some cases to use bankruptcy lien avoidance principles to void mortgage liens in whole or in part. n15 Where this bankruptcy remedy remains available, it can prevent a foreclosure by making a mortgage entirely void, or by reducing the amount owed and secured by the lien to a manageable sum.

[f] Avoiding Judgment Liens

If a creditor sues a homeowner and gets a judgment, the creditor may file the judgment as a lien against the debtor's home. The creditor may later execute on that lien by asking a court to sell the home and use the proceeds to satisfy the amount of the judgment lien. If the home is exempt from execution under state or federal law, bankruptcy may be used to avoid or nullify that lien. n16

[g] Saving Equity in Chapter 13

Sometimes homeowners may not be able to prevent the loss of their home because of overwhelming financial burdens. The homeowners, however, would be better off selling their home themselves, at a higher price than would be obtained at a foreclosure sale, thereby protecting their equity. It may be possible to do this in a chapter 13 bankruptcy (and sometimes in chapter 7 also). Filing bankruptcy can give the homeowner needed time to arrange the private sale.

[2] How to Use Consumer Defenses in Response to a Motion for Relief From Stay in Chapter 13 n17

[a] Responding to the Motion

A common problem in bankruptcy cases involving disputed secured claims arises when the creditor files an early motion for relief from the automatic stay to proceed with a foreclosure.

Although it is generally true that you cannot raise counterclaims directly to a motion for relief from stay, it is clear that defenses are permitted. It is thus possible to plead that the motion should be denied because the creditor has no cognizable claim or has a claim which is substantially less than the amount asserted.

[b] The Applicable Legal Standard for Evaluating Consumer Defenses to a Motion for Relief

A number of courts have held that the existence of defenses to a creditor's claim is relevant to a determination of that creditor's motion for relief. Commonly, upon a showing of "likelihood of success on the merits," courts will continue the stay until the objection to claim can be heard and finally determined.

[3] Curing Defaults on Home Loans

[a] Generally

A chapter 13 bankruptcy plan may provide for the curing of a default on a home loan. Monthly payments are reinstated and the chapter 13 debtor has a right to pay the delinquent arrearage in installments over a reasonable period of time without having to pay the entire debt balance due within the time period of the plan.

The Code does not define what period of time is "reasonable" for purposes of section 1322(b)(5). This necessarily depends to some extent on the facts and the circumstances of each case. Since the payments on long-term obligations are often higher than on any others, the debtor should seek whenever possible to make them outside the plan to avoid adding to them the substantial cost of the trustee's percentage fees and expenses (usually 10%).

Section 506(b) of the Code provides for collection of attorney's fees and costs as part of the amount needed to cure only if provided for by the parties' agreement and not otherwise restricted by state law. The creditor and its counsel have the burden of proving that the fees requested are reasonable. n18

Some courts have held that the inclusion in a proof of claim of any attorney fee incurred in connection with the bankruptcy case is improper unless the fee has been sought and approved under Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 2016, because the fee would be paid from the property of the bankruptcy estate. n19 Other courts have held that a creditor may include an attorney fee demand in a proof of claim without filing an application under Rule 2016 if the claim is sufficiently detailed and provides adequate notice to the debtor. n20

One court of appeals has concluded that creditor's attorneys fees arising after confirmation of a chapter 13 plan to cover, for example, the costs of collecting a post-confirmation default, are not subject to court approval under section 506(b) or the automatic stay. n21

In Rake v. Wade, n22 the Supreme Court held that homeowners seeking to cure a default by paying the arrears in installments over a reasonable period of time in chapter 13 also have to pay interest on the arrears at present value. In 1994, Congress overruled the Supreme Court's decision in Rake, but only for mortgages made after October 22, 1994. n23 This means that if there is a default on a mortgage made after that date, payment of interest on arrears will only be necessary to the extent required under the underlying mortgage as limited by state law. Consequently, in almost every case, interest cannot be charged on the arrears (or at least on the interest portion of the arrears) because it would be inconsistent with the contract or state law. The operative date is the date the mortgage was signed, not the date of the default.

[b] Curing a Default Under Section 1322(b)(5) After Foreclosure.

The Bankruptcy Code now makes clear that a mortgage default can be cured under 11 U.S.C. section 1322(b)(3) and (5) until the residence is sold at a valid foreclosure sale. n24 Thus, debtors may always use the chapter 13 process to cure a default in judicial foreclosure states, after the foreclosure judgment, up to the date of sale.

Some courts have held that a debtor may cure a default or pay off the balance owed on a mortgage in bankruptcy even after a valid foreclosure sale, when there is a state law right of redemption. n25 Under those precedents, state law post-foreclosure redemption rights come into the debtors' bankruptcy estate.

Some courts have found that a debtor retains an interest in the property until the trustee (or mortgagee) executes a deed to the foreclosure sale purchaser (or similar memorandum that satisfies the statute of frauds), and the consideration (purchase price) has been paid, or the sale has not been confirmed by the court where confirmation is required. If the borrower files bankruptcy during this time period, the interest becomes property of the bankruptcy estate. A subsequent execution of a deed (post-filing) would be void because of the automatic stay. A debtor can then attempt to cure the default on the mortgage through the chapter 13 plan. Other courts have found that, under state law, the sale is complete when the gavel falls at the foreclosure auction. Research under the applicable state's foreclosure law may be required to pursue a cure after the auction.

A valid foreclosure may not necessarily cut off a homeowner's right to reinstate the mortgage, decelerate the loan, and cure the default under section 1322(b)(5).

[c] Paying Secured Claims in Full

There are several reasons to consider paying off a home mortgage in full during the bankruptcy process, rather than curing the default and reinstating according to the loan's original terms. Perhaps the most important is that when a secured claim is paid in full pursuant to section 1325(a)(5), the debtor may pay present value interest rather than contract rate interest, and may reamortize the loan over the full length of the plan.

If the loan is at a high interest rate or would have matured before the end of the plan, the effect of these changes is likely to be lower monthly payments for housing costs. Additionally, upon completion of the plan, the loan will be fully paid so that no relationship between the lender and the debtor remains. Foreclosure then will be permanently averted.

The right to modify and pay off the terms of a home mortgage that would have matured during the chapter 13 bankruptcy is now clear. n26 The Code, as amended in 1994, does not distinguish between older purchase-money mortgages that are coming due and new short-term mortgages such as home equity loans. Thus, perhaps the most advantageous use of this provision will be to pay off high rate home equity loans at a lower rate and over a longer term in a bankruptcy plan. In addition, balloon payments can be spread out over the entire term of the plan.

Paying off the mortgage during the plan is generally best suited to situations where there is a low balance remaining on the mortgage. Otherwise, it is unlikely that the homeowner will be able to afford the payments required to pay off the debt in full within the maximum five-year period of a chapter 13 plan.

[4] Stripping Down Residential Mortgages to the Value of the Collateral

11 U.S.C. section 506 provides that a secured claim in bankruptcy may be limited to the amount of the value of the creditor's collateral. The statute further provides that a lien may be voided to the extent it exceeds the value of the collateral to which it is attached. n27 The process of voiding liens under this provision has come to be called "strip down."

This allows the debtor to pay off the present value of the allowed secured claim as modified at present value during the pendency of the plan. The availability of strip down is limited however, where the secured creditor's sole security is a mortgage on the debtor's residence. n28

Where strip down is available, it is a valuable strategy to prevent foreclosure because it makes some or all of a mortgage go away. If the mortgage is entirely void (e.g., as it may be in the case of some junior mortgages), then obviously foreclosure is no longer a relevant concern. If the mortgage is partially void, there is a smaller balance on which the debtor is obligated, thus increasing the potential to cure the default, pay-off, achieve a workout, or refinance.

Finally, if property is not considered real property under state law, strip down should also be available. Where mobile homes are defined by state law as personalty, one of the few potential advantages of this treatment is that 11 U.S.C. section 1322(b)(2) does not apply and strip down is available. n29

In bankruptcy, the debtor may "avoid" (i.e., nullify) many types of prebankruptcy transfers of exempt property. n30 Exemptions may be established by the Code or by state law.

The power to exempt judicial liens extends to every type of exempt property, without limitation. The burden is on the debtor to file a lien avoidance proceeding. If none is filed, all liens on the property of the debtor, including otherwise exempt property, will normally survive the bankruptcy.

[6] Sale of Property

In some cases, homeowners may have no choice but to sell their home on which mortgage payments are no longer possible, often through a liquidation provision of a chapter 13 plan, to prevent the loss of equity and other ramifications of a foreclosure sale. Before any sale of the property, it is advisable to obtain a specific order authorizing the sale free and clear of liens to satisfy any title insurers, specifying the distribution of the proceeds, and setting the compensation of any real estate broker. This can generally be accomplished by a motion seeking such an order, with service on all lienholders and other affected parties.

9.3.3 (2009 9th ed.). Since the stay terminates under this provision only "with respect to the debtor," the automatic stay provided under § 362(a) continues to apply in the later case as to property of the estate. Although § 362(c)(3) also states that the stay terminates as to property securing a debt of the debtor, it is not clear how courts will apply this section given that the statutory language also states that the stay terminates only "with respect to the debtor." If the debtor's auto remains estate property, for example, this may mean that a secured creditor cannot proceed with a home foreclosure after the 30-day period has expired without first seeking stay relief. This stay limitation also does not apply if the prior case was dismissed under § 707(b) and the new case is filed under a chapter other than chapter 7.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.14

§ 13.14 Setting Aside a Completed Foreclosure

[1] Procedural Issues

The process required to undo a completed foreclosure will depend on the foreclosure method used by the lender. If the foreclosure was conducted by power of sale, the foreclosed homeowner must initiate a suit to set aside the sale. Because the power of sale foreclosure is extra-judicial, there is no existing action in which any claims to invalidate the completed foreclosure can be raised. The action to set aside the sale may be filed in state court, or the homeowner can file bankruptcy and seek to set aside the sale within the bankruptcy case.

Where a foreclosure has been conducted by judicial process, the homeowner will have to reopen the foreclosure judgment entered by the court if the homeowner intends to raise defenses to the underlying mortgage or the lender's right to foreclose. Otherwise, res judicata will bar litigation of the homeowner's claim. n1 To raise claims regarding the conduct of the sale or the adequacy of the sale price, it is not necessary to reopen the foreclosure judgment. If, however, the sale has been confirmed by the court, the homeowner must reopen the order of confirmation. The homeowner's motion to reopen can be litigated in the state court, or, if the homeowner files bankruptcy, can be made in the existing state court foreclosure action then removed to the bankruptcy court to be litigated. In some states, there is a time limit to raise objections to a facially valid sale. n2 If the sale is set aside as void, title is normally restored to the homeowner. Mortgage and lien interests on the property are generally restored as if no foreclosure had taken place. n3

If the lender was the purchaser at the foreclosure sale (which is usually the case), once the sale has been set aside, the homeowner should be able to raise claims against the lender based on the underlying mortgage.

Even if the sale cannot be successfully challenged, the homeowner may have claims for damages against the lender. In some cases, these damages may be substantial and may include attorney fee awards. Although these claims may not invalidate the mortgage or the foreclosure, they may create leverage which could be used by the homeowner to reacquire the property from the lender in some cases.

[2] Grounds on Which a Foreclosure May Be Set Aside

In order to successfully recover the property after a foreclosure, a homeowner must be able to assert a legal basis to invalidate the foreclosure sale after a power of sale foreclosure, or to invalidate the judgment or sale after a judicial foreclosure. Generally, the homeowner will be required to show some irregularity in the foreclosure process, which makes the sale void under state law, or that the sale price was so inadequate that it shocks the conscience. Most claims based on the underlying transaction are lost if not raised before the sale, unless the homeowner can have the sale set aside.

In addition, some state foreclosure statutes provide that a completed sale to a good faith purchaser cuts off the foreclosed home owner's right to challenge the sale on procedural grounds. n4

[3] Irregularity in the Conduct of the Sale

Each state has its own statutory scheme prescribing required foreclosure procedures. Noncompliance with some aspects of this scheme will subject a sale to being set aside, without proof that the noncompliance affected the outcome of the sale. Failure to provide required notice to the borrower, or to other lien holders, will generally invalidate a sale, as will failure to comply with a material term of the mortgage contract. n5

[4] Inadequacy of Sale Price

[a] Generally

All courts follow the well-settled rule that mere inadequacy of price will not justify setting aside a foreclosure sale, absent additional circumstances of unfairness or irregularity, unless the sale price is so grossly inadequate as to shock the conscience of the court. A review of decisions from various jurisdictions shows that while it is possible in the rare case to shock the court, it is difficult to get a sale set aside solely on this basis. n6

[b] Inadequate Price and Irregularity in the Conduct of the Sale

When a low sale price is coupled with some irregularity in the foreclosure process, courts are more likely to set aside the sale. And, when the sale price is very low, even slight irregularities will be sufficient to justify setting it aside.

[c] Inadequate Price and Unfairness

A mortgagee or trustee conducting a foreclosure sale is bound to act in good faith and to exercise reasonable diligence to protect the rights of the debtor. Where a foreclosure sale yields a price grossly disproportionate to the property's value, it may be an indication of bad faith. In addition, inadequate price coupled with actions to frustrate the homeowner's presale redemption right may be sufficient to allow a court to set aside the sale. In Commercial Credit Loans, Inc. v. Espinoza, n7 the court concluded that a sale to the lender at a price of about one-fifth of value could not be confirmed. In addition to the inadequate price, the court found that the lender had unconscionably frustrated the homeowner's efforts to pay off the debt in full prior to foreclosure. The evidence showed that the lender failed to respond to a Spanish-speaking homeowner's request for information about the amount necessary to cure and the date, time and place of sale. The court ordered the lender to accept the debtor's post-sale cure of the default.

[5] Setting Aside a Foreclosure Sale in Bankruptcy

Sales that are conducted in violation of the automatic stay are generally void and can be set aside on that ground alone. n8 This means that any foreclosure sale taken after a bankruptcy filing is without legal effect. n9 This is true whether the seller had knowledge of the stay, though there are limited exceptions to this general rule.

A few courts have held that a sale in violation of the stay is voidable rather than void. n10 If the sale is merely voidable the court could ratify the sale, but will usually only do this on a showing that enforcing the stay would be unfair to the lender.

[a] Fraudulent Transfers--11 U.S.C. Section 548

A Supreme Court case, BFP v. Resolution Trust Co., n11 has made it more difficult to set aside a foreclosure sale as a fraudulent transfer in bankruptcy. However, state law may provide alternative grounds which can be used to invalidate a sale in bankruptcy court. A sale which is invalid under state law for any reason is equally invalid in the bankruptcy process. In addition, if the sale was not regularly conducted or was collusive in some way, BFP may not apply at all and 11 U.S.C. section 548 may be invoked to set aside the sale. n12 If the grounds which produce state law invalidity, however, also take the sale outside of the protections of BFP because it was not "regularly conducted," then the requirements of a fraudulent transfer case can be pled in the alternative.

The Supreme Court expressly limited its holding in BFP to mortgage foreclosures of real estate, stating that "the considerations bearing on other foreclosures and forced sales (to satisfy tax liens, for example) may be different." n13 For tax foreclosures which do not involve a formal sale of the property (i.e., where the purchaser obtains a lien or a certificate rather than an actual deed), the BFP analysis should not be relevant. n14 Typically, the purchaser of a tax lien pays only the amount of delinquent taxes, an amount which bears no relationship to the value of the property. For this reason, there is no logical basis on which to conclude that the tax lien purchase price is a "reasonably equivalent value."

[b] Preferences--11 U.S.C. Section 547

If a secured creditor forecloses within the 90-day preference period and the value of the property foreclosed upon is in excess of the creditor's claim, some bankruptcy courts have held that the foreclosure may be set aside as a preference.

[c] Sales That Are Not Complete Under State Law

If a debtor retains legal title to property under state law until an event that occurs after sale, such as delivery of a deed or confirmation of the sale, and the debtor files for bankruptcy during that period, the debtor's retained ownership interest comes into the estate. n15 This principle is important because if an auction has been held, but the sale process is not considered complete under state law, a bankruptcy debtor retains an ownership interest and the right to cure the default under 11 U.S.C. section 1322(c)(1).

An additional argument may be made if the deed generated by the foreclosure sale has not yet been recorded. In many circumstances, the trustee may avoid unrecorded interests in property under the "strong-arm" power granted by 11 U.S.C. section 544(a). By doing so, property comes into the estate free of those interests. If the trustee can avoid the unrecorded interest based on state law, the debtor may claim an exemption in the recovered property. n16

Additionally, the debtor may exercise the trustee's powers under section 544(a) to avoid involuntary transfers of exempt property when the trustee fails to act. n17 Where the opportunity is available, debtors may recover their exempt interest in the property and regain rights that apply to secured claims as if the collateral had never been transferred.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.15

§ 13.15 Post-Foreclosure Issues

[1] The Right of Redemption

Most state foreclosure statutes provide homeowners with redemption rights; that is, the right to pay the balance of the debt, including foreclosure expenses, to extinguish a lender's claim. In some states, the right must be exercised prior to a foreclosure sale. In others, the right continues for a certain period after the foreclosure.

Few financially distressed homeowners are able to redeem their homes, but the redemption right gives them the chance either to sell the home privately, refinance the debt, or cure the arrearage in bankruptcy. It may keep them from losing the equity in their homes, which is virtually inevitable with a foreclosure sale.

[2] Deficiency Judgments

If the foreclosure sale price is not enough to pay off the loan balance and any allowable foreclosure expenses, in most states, the lender is free to sue the borrower for this "deficiency." A deficiency judgment can be satisfied by garnishing wages or attaching other non-exempt property. Though a lender may decide not to sue for a deficiency where it seems unlikely that the homeowner will have any assets to satisfy the judgment, foreclosed homeowners should at least be aware of the possibility of a deficiency action after a foreclosure.

Some states have enacted anti-deficiency statutes which prohibit or limit deficiency claims against the former homeowner. A few states have banned deficiency judgments outright when mortgages are foreclosed nonjudicially. More states place limits on the amount of the deficiency judgment by requiring that the borrower be given credit for the "fair value" of the property after the foreclosure.

Most anti-deficiency statutes apply only to the foreclosure of purchase money mortgages. n1

Courts have limited deficiency judgments on equitable grounds when the foreclosure sale price was found to be inadequate, as a result of sale practices that were not commercially reasonable or because of mortgagee self-dealing. n2

A mortgagee or trustee has a duty to use good faith in the conduct of a foreclosure sale. This duty includes using due diligence to obtain a fair price for the borrower's property. When a lender purchases at its own foreclosure sale, it will be held to an even higher standard of utmost diligence for the protection of the rights of the borrower.

A breach of this duty may also be a basis upon which a court can deny a deficiency claim. Evidence of the lender's failure to use good faith in conducting the sale may be found where a foreclosing lender purchases the property at its own foreclosure sale, then immediately resells it to a third party for a substantial profit.

[3] Deficiency Claims Are Unsecured

If a borrower is obligated for a deficiency, keep in mind that this debt is not secured by any of the borrower's remaining property until a judgment lien is obtained. The foreclosed borrower at this point could file bankruptcy and discharge the deficiency as an unsecured debt. Moreover, even if the creditor obtains a court judgment for the deficiency, it still cannot seize exempt property to satisfy the deficiency. To the extent the judgment creates a lien which impairs an exemption, it can be avoided in bankruptcy pursuant to section 522(f).

[4] Claims for Damages for Wrongful Foreclosure

Many states have common law on wrongful foreclosure including a cause of action by that name. n3 In most states, however, there is little recent case law. A wrongful foreclosure may also give rise to a cause of action for UDAP, n4 common law fraud, n5 or for torts such as trespass or conversion n6 that take place during the foreclosure. Tort damages will not, however, be available for the wrongful foreclosure itself if the only duties breached arise from the contract. n7

[5] Claiming a Foreclosure Sale Surplus

If the foreclosure sale yields more than the amount owed to the foreclosing mortgagee, there is a surplus available for distribution. Though surpluses unfortunately are rare due to depressed prices at foreclosure sale auctions, it is in the former homeowner's interest to attempt to maximize the amount of the surplus as any balance that is not used to pay off liens on the property must be returned to the former owner.

State legal process differs on how and when sale proceeds (including surpluses) are distributed. In some states, distribution of sale proceeds is a subject that is addressed during the confirmation of the sale, with notice to all parties. n8 The foreclosing mortgagee and any junior lienholders n9 can file claims subject to objection by the former homeowner or others who might also have an interest in the surplus. n10 In some states, including many nonjudicial foreclosure states, distribution of excess sale proceeds is more informal. The trustee or the mortgagee's attorney distributes proceeds without any direct supervision by the court.

The former homeowner should attempt to evaluate any claims to the extent possible. Legal proceedings to reduce the amount a lienholder is claiming from the sale proceeds, if successful, will increase the share available to the homeowner (unless the total amount due on multiple liens exceeds the foreclosure sale price). A lienholder might overstate fees and costs associated with foreclosure, for example, or fail to properly rebate precalculated interest or insurance premiums.

Complex issues may arise during foreclosure when there are also judicial liens on the property. The debtor's homestead exemption, if provided under state law, should be paid ahead of any claims of judicial lienholders. In a few states, the right to a homestead exemption must be affirmatively sought by filing a claim. Whether or not an affirmative claim is required, the homeowner must be vigilant to make certain that sale proceeds are appropriately distributed. At a minimum, whenever excess sale proceeds are potentially available, the homeowner should keep the relevant court, trustee, or mortgage company informed with a current address

[6] Repurchasing the Home at the Foreclosure Sale

Like any other person or entity, a homeowner is allowed to bid on and buy her own property at a foreclosure sale. In some instances, the price at sale will be less than the amount for which the homeowner could redeem prior to sale.

Moreover, because the foreclosure sale extinguishes liens that are junior to the foreclosing mortgagee's interest, the property may be purchased at sale without junior encumbrances. n11

There are, however, various state law prerequisites to bidding on and purchasing property at a foreclosure sale. These prerequisites always include some form of deposit requirement and require the balance be paid within a relatively short time period. In some states, the time frame for paying the balance of the debt is too short for the purchaser to shop for and obtain conventional financing. If the balance is not paid, for whatever reason, most states mandate that the deposit is forfeited and that the property must be resold.

Another potential disadvantage to strategically waiting to purchase the property at foreclosure is that the homeowner may be outbid.

§ 13.16 Tax Consequences of a Foreclosure Sale: An Introduction

Both borrowers and their counsel may be surprised to learn that loss of a home by foreclosure can result in taxable income to the foreclosed homeowner in two different ways. First, if the foreclosure sale price greatly exceeds the homeowner's tax basis in the property, the homeowner may incur a taxable capital gain. And, if in connection with the foreclosure, the lender forgives any part of the mortgage debt (for example, by waiving a deficiency in exchange for a deed in lieu of foreclosure), then the homeowner can possibly, but is not likely to, incur taxable "discharge of indebtedness (DOI) income." Further consultation with an accountant or tax attorney may be necessary to resolve any specific taxation issues that arise in a given case. n1 Borrowers can have both capital gains and discharge of indebtedness income in the same transaction, if they are personally liable for the debt. n2 This double liability happens whenever the amount realized from a foreclosure sale is (1) more than the borrower's basis but (2) less than the outstanding mortgage debt and the lender forgives the difference between the outstanding mortgage debt and the foreclosure sale price.

§ 13.17 Forfeiture of Land Installment Sales Contracts

Land installment sales contracts are used in some states as an alternative to mortgages or deeds of trust. The method by which they are foreclosed or "forfeited" depends on state law. n1

Under an installment sales contract, the buyer takes possession of the property and makes monthly installment payments of principal and interest to the seller until the principal balance is paid off. The seller retains legal title to the property until the final payment is made, and then title is conveyed to the buyer.

Many such contracts include a "time is of the essence clause," which purports to allow the seller to forfeit the contract if any payment is missed, retake possession of the property, and keep all payments made as liquidated damages. If the contract is near completion, a forfeiture would result in a windfall to the seller.

Traditionally, these provisions were upheld by the courts as written, despite the obvious unfairness to the buyer. More recently, however, courts have begun to question this approach, and some states have enacted legislation to add protections for buyers or to eliminate forfeiture as a remedy altogether.

A few states have enacted legislation which provides a contract buyer with a grace period to cure the default and avoid forfeiture. n2 In some states, the length of the grace period is determined by the percentage of the contract price the buyer has already paid.

If the default is not cured by the expiration of the applicable grace period, then the forfeiture can proceed, either judicially or non-judicially, depending on the requirements of state law.

Other states have adopted legislation which treats some land sales contracts like mortgages. Even in states where there are no legislative restrictions on forfeiture, some courts have created limitations on the use of forfeiture using equitable grounds, or have decided that land sales contracts are de facto mortgages and must be foreclosed in the same manner.

In the bankruptcy context, a number of bankruptcy courts have ruled that a land sales contract creates a security interest, which allows the debtor to cure any arrearage through the life of the plan, in accordance with sections 1322(b)(2), (b)(5) and 1325(a)(5) of the Bankruptcy Code. While some of these decisions are based on state law, other courts have held that how state law characterizes land sales contracts is not controlling in bankruptcy. These courts rely upon federal bankruptcy law and cite the policies expressed in the relevant provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, which favor the preservation of the rights which a debtor and the estate hold in property, particularly residences.

In addition, a debtor in bankruptcy may be able to set aside the forfeiture of a land installment sales contract where the remaining debt under the contract is significantly less than the value of the forfeited property.

Because the law is unsettled, both statutory and case law research is necessary to determine what protections are available to a purchaser under a land sales contact. Absent consumer protections in either source, litigation challenging forfeitures may be possible based on equitable principles and on due process grounds if state action can be shown.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.18

§ 13.18 Mobile Home Foreclosures

[1] Must Foreclosure Procedures Be Followed to Retake Mobile Home?

Much of the law concerning foreclosure of mobile homes involves the question of whether the unit is considered real property or personal property for that purpose. Depending on the jurisdiction, this determination may be made by statute for all mobile homes, or it may depend on facts such as whether the mobile home is attached to the land on which it rests. n1 Some states, such as Colorado, require that certain steps be taken to convert the unit from personal to real property. n2

If the mobile home is realty, state foreclosure procedures described in this chapter are likely to apply. If the mobile home is considered to be personalty, then repossession, replevin and other creditor remedies are available in the event of default, although several states prohibit all self-help seizures of mobile homes. n3

Even states that do not grant a general right to cure may have a special statute extending that right to mobile home buyers. n4 Furthermore, whether a mobile home is considered realty or personalty, a right to cure the default which supplements or goes beyond state law is potentially available due to regulations of the federal Office of Thrift Supervision. n5

[2] Truth in Lending Defenses in Mobile Home Foreclosures

TIL claims may be available as defenses or counterclaims in mobile home foreclosure cases. The federal TILA requires disclosures in any consumer credit transaction. n6 The disclosures are to be made by the party to whom the obligation is initially payable. n7

The TILA does not apply to transactions in which the amount financed exceeds $25,000, but there is an exception for transactions in which the creditor takes a security interest in real property or in personal property used or expected to be used as the principal dwelling of the consumer. n8 The reference to personal property covers mobile homes, so the result is that TILA covers mobile home credit regardless of whether it exceeds $25,000. TILA also applies to sales of land to consumer buyers.

If the creditor does not make the disclosures required by TILA, the consumer can sue for actual damages plus attorney fees. n9 Moreover, certain violations lead to statutory damages of double the finance charge. n10 In many cases there is a $1000 cap on statutory damages, but the cap is $2000 in the case of a closed-end credit transaction secured by real property or a dwelling, n11 including a mobile home. n12

If the creditor files a replevin action to recover a mobile home, the consumer may be able to raise TILA claims defensively. n13 If the TILA claims equal or exceed the alleged delinquency, the court may find that the creditor does not have grounds for replevin. There is a one-year statute of limitations for TILA damage suits, but TILA claims can generally be raised as defenses to the creditor's claim regardless of the statute of limitations. n14

While TIL damages are an attractive counterclaim that can reduce the alleged delinquency on a mobile home, the statute also offers a right to rescind that can be an even more powerful tool to prevent foreclosure. Unfortunately, however, the right to rescind applies to only a small subset of credit transactions secured by mobile homes.

The TILA gives consumers the right to rescind certain home-secured transactions, but this right does not apply when the credit is extended to finance the acquisition of the home, n15 unless the consumer gives a security interest in an existing residence to secure the new extension of credit. In the mobile home context, the right to rescind would apply if the consumer already owned a mobile home on a plot of land and "traded up" for a better mobile home, giving the creditor a security interest in the land. A home equity loan, home improvement loan, or other non-purchase money transaction secured by a mobile home would also be subject to the right to rescind. n16

The HOEPA requires special disclosures and creates special substantive restrictions for certain high-rate home-secured loans. Like the TIL rescission right, it does not apply to credit used to purchase a mobile home. n17

[3] RESPA Defenses in Mobile Home Foreclosures

The federal RESPA n18 can also provide defenses and counterclaims in mobile home foreclosures, and unlike the rescission right, it applies to purchase-money credit.

In the mobile home context, RESPA applies to loans secured by land on which a mobile home sits or on which a mobile home will be placed within two years. n19 It thus applies to a loan that finances both land and a mobile home as a single transaction; to a loan to purchase a mobile home if the loan is secured not only by the home but also by the land on which the home will be placed; and to a loan to purchase just the land on which a home will be placed. It does not, however, apply to credit that is secured just by a mobile home, nor does it cover installment sales.

When RESPA applies, it requires disclosures about closing costs both before and at the time of settlement, notices about escrow accounts and servicing transfers, and the right to obtain account information through a qualified written request. RESPA also prohibits kickbacks and unearned fees for settlement services, charges for preparation of certain documents, and steering of borrowers to a particular title insurance company. Treble damages and attorney fees are available for violation of the anti-kickback provision, n20 and the statute also creates a private cause of action for violations of the anti-steering provision n21 and the servicer obligations. n22

Like TILA damage claims, it should be possible to raise RESPA claims defensively in a replevin action as a means of reducing the alleged delinquency. n23

[4] Defenses Based on State Credit Statutes

Claims and defenses under state credit statutes should also be investigated. Most mobile home sales are financed and will thus be covered by a state credit statute. If the transaction is set up as an installment sale, with the contract assigned to a financing institution, often there is a retail installment sales act ("RISA") or motor vehicle retail installment sales act ("MVRISA") that applies. If the transaction is set up as a loan, a different statute will apply. Remedies under credit statutes are often very powerful and can include unenforceability of the obligation. Special attention should be paid to the scope of such statutes because determination of which statute covers mobile home sales is often difficult. Federal law has also preempted many state credit statutes. n24

[5] Homestead Exemption

Sometimes foreclosure upon a mobile home is threatened because of a judgment lien rather than a consensual security interest. The determination of whether a mobile home is considered realty or personalty is important in this context. A homestead exemption typically applies to land and the improvements and chattels attached to the land. n25 If a mobile home is attached to the land, it may be included in the homestead and exempt from execution of the lien. n26 If it is not attached, and therefore not part of the homestead, it may be sold to satisfy the lien unless another exemption covers it. Some state homestead exemptions specifically include mobile homes. n27

[6] Problems Relating to Mobile Home Parks

Abuses in mobile home repossessions or foreclosures may occur when mobile home parks are owned by or connected with mobile home dealers. For example, if the original buyers try to sell the home as a way of avoiding foreclosure and recouping their investment, the park owner may refuse to transfer the lot lease to the buyer. This can prevent the sale, making it possible for the park owner or the creditor to buy the home at a low price at the foreclosure sale. Then the park owner, either acting for itself or for the creditor, may sell the home to a new buyer or may rent out the home along with the lot.

If the state has a comprehensive mobile home park statute, it may outlaw restrictions on sale or transfer of mobile homes within the park. It may also prohibit unreasonable refusal by the park to rent to a new buyer.

If Article 9 governs the transaction, the creditor's sale of the home must be commercially reasonable. If the park is operated by or closely connected to the dealer that sold the home originally, the park's reacquisition of the home may not count as an Article 9 repossession sale. Under Article 9, the repossession sale will occur only when the park sells the home to a new buyer, and any surplus should go to the original buyer. Revised Article 9 retreats from this position as an inflexible rule, n28 but adds a new remedy for low-price sales to insiders. n29

[7] Additional Foreclosure-Related Issues

Self-help repossessions which involve trespass or breach of the peace are always illegal and should be challenged aggressively. n30 It is extremely difficult for a creditor to accomplish a self-help repossession of a mobile home without a breach of the peace, and the potential for damage to personal property is great. n31

Additional issues may arise as to the land on which the mobile home rests. If the land is owned by the mobile home owner, the land may be subject to a mortgage or other liens. If the mobile home is attached to the land after the land is purchased, it may become a fixture, subject to the security interest on the land. Generally, the issue will be a question of fact controlled by evidence such as whether the wheels are removed and whether the home is substantially anchored to the ground. n32

For homeowners who rent the land on which the mobile home rests, some states strictly regulate mobile home park leases and evictions, at minimum requiring that the land or park owner follow certain specific notice procedures prior to commencing eviction proceedings. n33 Because alternative mobile home park space is not always readily available, the effect of eviction for nonpayment of ground rent may be loss of the mobile home as well. Claims have been brought against park owners based on unfair trade practice laws, other consumer protection statutes and common law conversion when rent increases appear to be in bad faith for the purpose of forcing homeowners to abandon valuable mobile homes. n34

Warranty defenses may be available if the home is defective. n35 Such defenses are clearly available if the manufacturer or seller financed the sale and may be available if the financing entity and the manufacturer or seller are closely related. n36

A number of states have statutes that limit deficiency judgments in at least some circumstances. n37 Finally, workout agreements on mobile home loans are increasingly possible, because with depreciation, the home is likely to be worth less than the amount due on the loan because of depreciation giving lenders a substantial incentive to work with borrowers in order to avoid a large loss in the foreclosure process.

[8] Using Bankruptcy to Prevent Loss of a Mobile Home

A bankruptcy filing under chapter 13 will provide a right to cure in installments in the context of a confirmed plan n38 and is a good alternative if a workout cannot be negotiated. Furthermore, in states that consider mobile homes to be personalty rather than real property, the debtor has the right to "strip down" the secured claim to the value of the collateral and then to pay off the reduced secured claim. n39 Any amount of the unsecured portion of the claim that remains unpaid after the debtor completes the Chapter 13 plan will be discharged, along with the unpaid portion of other unsecured debts.

[9] Raising Seller-Related Defenses Against the Foreclosing Creditor

The creditor foreclosing on a mobile home will usually be liable for the consumer's claims against the seller, up to the amount paid by the consumer, because of the contractual language required by the Federal Trade Commission Holder Rule. n40 All assignees of consumer sales contracts have this derivative liability, and purchase-money lenders do also as long as the seller arranged the financing or is affiliated with the lender by common control, contract or business arrangement. n41

The creditor is also, of course, liable for its own wrongful acts. In addition, if the loan to purchase the home is insured under 12 U.S.C. section 1703, the lender must investigate the manufacturer's record of warranty compliance and obtain certification that the home site meets minimum standards. n42 A lender's failure to comply with these duties may make it fully liable for problems with the home, rather than liable only up to the amount that the consumer has paid as the Holder Rule requires.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 13 Foreclosure Defense

1-13 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 13.19

§ 13.19 The Rights of Tenants in Possession Following Foreclosure on Their Landlord

[1] Generally

When a landlord owning residential rental property defaults on a mortgage, tenants stand to lose their homes. Frequently, the first step taken by a foreclosure sale purchaser is to attempt to evict existing tenants. Whether or not the purchaser may legally evict tenants of the former owner will depend largely on state law.

If a lease was given prior to the mortgage, the rights of a tenant are not extinguished by the foreclosure of the mortgage. This is so because the foreclosure purchaser acquires no greater interest than the mortgagor had. The foreclosure purchaser "steps into the shoes" of the foreclosed owner, who had transferred the possessory interest to the tenant and was not entitled to possession of the rental property, by virtue of the lease. However, leases may contain a subordination clause making the lease subordinate to later mortgages, in which case the foreclosure will terminate the tenancy.

If the lease is executed after the mortgage, the majority view holds that the judicial foreclosure of the mortgage does not extinguish the tenancy if the foreclosing party is on notice, actually or constructively, of the tenancy, unless the tenant is made a party to the foreclosure. If the tenant is not made a party to the foreclosure, then the tenancy is not extinguished, provided the mortgagee had notice of the tenancy. Most courts also hold that the nonjudicial (or power of sale) foreclosure of a mortgage extinguishes a tenancy entered into after the execution of the mortgage.

Under the minority view, the foreclosure action extinguishes the tenancy, irrespective of whether the tenant is made a party to the foreclosure action.

The majority rule, which requires that tenants be made parties to the foreclosure, provides tenants with at least a limited opportunity to defend their interests in the property.

A tenant also has the right to redeem the property by paying the mortgage debt prior to the foreclosure or by paying the foreclosure sale price after the sale where state law provides a statutory right of redemption. While this right may appear at first to be of little value to most tenants, a group of tenants working together with a community group or government housing agency may be able to use the redemption right as a means to obtain mortgage financing to purchase the property.

With respect to the issue of the lender having notice of the tenancy, notice may be either actual or constructive. A recorded lease provides notice. But even if the lease is not recorded (and most residential leases are not), the mortgagor may be deemed to be on notice of the tenancy because the possession is apparent or susceptible of ascertainment on reasonable inspection. Thus, where a tenant lives at the property, the lender may be on constructive notice of the tenant's interest in the property, and may be under a duty to investigate to ascertain the tenant's claims. If the property is an occupied apartment building with multiple units, the nature of the property alone would put the lender on notice that there are tenants in possession of the property.

[2] The Post-Foreclosure Rights of Tenants in "Good Cause" Eviction Jurisdictions

A few localities, including New York City, Washington, D.C., and New Jersey, have enacted statutory provisions which limit the grounds on which tenants may be evicted, notwithstanding the expiration of the tenant's lease. These statutes are referred to as "good cause" eviction statutes. Typically, permissible reasons for eviction include failure to pay rent, breach of a lease, or the commission of an illegal act in the rental unit. The foreclosure and sale of the property does not constitute good cause for eviction. Courts in these jurisdictions have held that the eviction restrictions apply to purchasers at foreclosure sales. n1

[3] Federally Subsidized Tenancies

Tenants in federally subsidized housing may have additional protections based on the lease contract. Subsidized tenants may also have equitable claims, which can be raised in the foreclosure action, to require the new owner to continue the tenancy and to enter into an agreement with HUD to continue the rent subsidy. New laws may provide additional protection for subsidized tenancies. Recent Massachusetts legislation codifies protections for subsidized tenancies by stating explicitly that foreclosure does not affect leases subsidized under state or federal law. n2

[4] Rights of Tenants if Their Landlord Files Bankruptcy

In many cases involving foreclosure on a landlord, the landlord files bankruptcy in an effort to retain the property. Most such cases are filed under chapter 7 or 11. Residential property may be transferred away from the current landlord during or immediately after the bankruptcy process. In some situations, the transfer will be voluntary and in others required by the court.

A variety of steps may be taken to protect tenants rights in the bankruptcy process. The Bankruptcy Code includes special protections for tenants when their landlords seek to terminate leases in the bankruptcy process. n3

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 14 Liability of Assignees and Related Creditors; The FTC Holder Rule

§ 14.01 Overview

In consumer transactions, one of the most important issues is whether a creditor is subject to the claims and defenses that the consumer has against the seller or original creditor. This is important to prevent the need for a second lawsuit against a possibly bankrupt or unavailable defendant while a collection suit takes place. By far the most practical action for the consumer is to defend the collection action by raising in that case the consumer's claims and defenses against the seller or original creditor.

There are three types of collection actions possible here. In the first type of action, a seller may sell goods or services on credit and assign the note to a subsequent creditor, who later seeks collection on the note. This creditor may then seek the protection of Uniform Commercial Code ("UCC") section 3-302 "holder in due course" status, claiming to be insulated from most assignor-related defenses.

However, in most consumer transactions, UCC section 3-302 has no effect because of the Federal Trade Commission's ("FTC's") Rule Concerning the Preservation of Consumers' Claims and Defenses ("FTC Holder Rule" or "Rule"). n1 This Rule requires credit-sellers to include in consumer credit contracts a notice that any assignees are subject to the consumer's claims and defenses against the assignor. This effectively defeats the assignee's status under the UCC as a holder in due course, and also subjects the assignee, as a matter of contract law, to the consumer's claims and defenses. n2

The second type of collection action does not involve a credit sale, but a note originated by a third party lender that provides funds that are paid to the seller. Such third party lenders or their assignees may claim insulation from the consumer's claims and defenses against the seller.

The FTC Holder Rule again offers consumers in this situation their best remedy. The Rule requires sellers to arrange for the FTC Holder notice to be present in all notes where the seller refers consumers to the lender or is affiliated with the lender by common control, contract, course of dealing or by any arrangement, be it formal or informal. n3 The FTC Holder Rule language in the note states that the holder is subject to all claims and defenses the consumer has against the related seller, up to the amount of the loan.

The third type of collection action involves a loan that is not related to a sales transaction. The FTC Holder Rule does not offer much assistance in this type of action because the Rule only provides consumers with a way to raise claims they have against the "seller."

Banks collecting on a bounced or dishonored check do not involve the FTC Holder Rule because there is no credit, the check is a negotiable instrument, and the bank is a holder in due course. A common situation is where a consumer purchases goods or services through a credit card issued by a third party. n4

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 14 Liability of Assignees and Related Creditors; The FTC Holder Rule

1-14 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 14.02

§ 14.02 Scope of the FTC Holder Rule

The Rule operates by a notice being placed in consumer credit agreements whereby, as a matter of the contract itself, the parties agree that the consumer can raise seller-related claims and defenses against the holder of the note. As such, the effect of the Rule is directly felt by any agreement that includes the FTC Holder notice. Even if a transaction is beyond the scope of the FTC Rule, if the credit agreement contains the FTC Holder notice, the holder is subject to seller-related claims and defenses. n1

There is no requirement that the Holder notice appear at any particular place in the loan documents, so the consumer's attorney must carefully review all portions of all the documents for the notice, including monthly statements or charge slips. Creditors cannot avoid the Rule by stating in credit agreements that holders are subject to claims and defenses if the FTC Holder Rule applies to the transaction, but that holders are not subject to such claims if the Rule is found not to apply. This is a Rule violation.

[1] Sales Transactions Covered

The FTC Holder Rule, in general, requires a notice to be inserted in credit agreements whenever the seller finances a sale or a creditor is related to the seller and that creditor finances the sale. The Rule applies broadly to "any sale or lease of goods or services to consumers in or affecting commerce," n2 including home improvement contracting, vocational training, employment counseling, and health spa membership, as well as all types of goods.

"Consumer" is defined as "a natural person who seeks or acquires goods or services for personal, family, or household use." n3 As such, the Rule applies to virtually every type of consumer sales transaction, but not to agricultural production equipment purchases, the purchase of securities, purchases made by an organization, or sales of real estate. n4 It is unclear whether the FTC Holder Rule applies to leases. n5

An important application of the FTC Holder Rule is illustrated where shoddy or non-existent home improvement work leads to the consumer refusing to make payments, which then leads to an assignee lender trying to foreclose. In this situation, the consumer's claims against the home improvement contractor can be raised against the foreclosing assignee. n6

[2] Covered Sellers

Since the Rule only applies to sellers who sell in the ordinary course of their business, isolated sales by individuals are not covered. n7 Since the FTC only has authority to impose requirements on sellers within the scope of the FTC Act, the FTC Holder Rule does not apply where the seller (not the assignee or related lender) is outside the scope of the FTC Act.

Public entities and truly nonprofit corporations are not within the scope of the FTC Act, n8 and the FTC Holder Rule does not obligate these entities as sellers to arrange for the notice to be placed in consumer credit agreements. Other entities outside the scope of the FTC Act include banks, savings and loans, federal credit unions, and common carriers and air carriers subject to federal regulation. n9

[3] Covered Credit Transactions

The Rule requires the FTC Holder notice to be placed in any instrument evidencing a debt arising from a "purchase money loan" or a "financed sale" (the typical credit sale where the seller acts as the initial creditor). n10 The term "purchase money loan" covers a loan made to a consumer by a creditor related in some way to the seller, which facilitates the purchase of goods or services from the seller.

For a credit transaction to be a "purchase money loan," the transaction must meet four preconditions. First, there must be a cash advance received by the consumer in return for a finance charge within the meaning of Truth in Lending ("TIL").

Second, the cash advance must be applied in whole or substantial part to a purchase of goods or services from the seller. A loan is still covered even if some part is kept by the consumer or goes to pay off another debt, as long as a substantial part goes to purchase the goods or services from the seller.

Third, the seller must be related to the creditor, either by referring consumers to the creditor or by being affiliated to the creditor by common control, contract, or virtually any form of business arrangement or practice. n11 Fourth, the Rule only applies where the related creditor fits the Rule's definition of "creditor." A creditor is a person who in the ordinary course of business makes purchase money loans or finances the sale of goods or services to consumers, n12 but does not apply to a creditor who in the particular transaction at issue is acting as a credit card issuer. But sellers that have their own "house" credit card must still comply with the Rule. In addition, separate federal legislation applies to the consumer's ability to raise with the card issuer the consumer's claims against the merchant. n13

CHAPTER 14 Liability of Assignees and Related Creditors; The FTC Holder Rule

1-14 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 14.03

§ 14.03 Operation of the FTC Holder Rule

[1] Seller-Related Claims Covered by the Rule

The holder of a credit agreement containing the Holder notice is liable for all seller-related "claims or defenses connected with the transaction." n1 As a result, consumers may not only raise seller-related defenses against creditors, but also may bring affirmative claims against the creditor relating to the seller. n2 Creditors are also liable for all claims and defenses involving the seller, including those relating to the advertising, oral claims, sale, warranties, insurance, service contracts, financing, collection, servicing of warranty, and anything else connected with the transaction. n3 On the other hand, if the consumer's claim against a seller is based on an entirely separate transaction with the seller, a transaction not involving the creditor, the creditor will have no liability since "the holder's obligations are limited to those arising from the transaction which he finances." n4 The creditor is liable even if it would be exempt from direct liability under the statute on which the consumer's claim against the seller is based. n5 For example, even if a UDAP statute exempts banks, a bank can be derivatively liable under the Holder Notice for the consumer's UDAP claims against a car dealer, where the dealer is within the UDAP statute's scope.

[2] Consumer's Claims Can Offset Remainder Due on the Note

The FTC Holder Rule limits the consumer's recovery from the creditor for seller-related claims to the "amounts paid by the debtor hereunder." n6 This means the consumer can get back all payments made plus cancel all remaining indebtedness under the note. n7 But the consumer will not be entitled to receive from the creditor an affirmative recovery which exceeds the amounts of money the consumer had paid in. n8

[3] Recovery of Amounts Already Paid

In calculating the amounts paid in, add both the amounts the consumer paid to the note holder and any amount paid to a prior holder of the note. n9 Where a loan is a credit sale assigned to a creditor (as opposed to a direct loan with a third-party creditor), the amount paid in by the consumer includes all deposits and trade-ins given to the seller, and the price which the creditor realizes when it sells collateral after repossession. n10

[4] Are Attorney Fees Included Within the Cap?

The creditor's liability for the consumer's attorney fees should not be capped by the creditor's maximum liability for seller-related claims. n11 Ohio UDAP attorney fees are an exception to this rule, based on the fact that UDAP fees are available in Ohio only in the court's discretion, and only against sellers who intentionally violate the statute. n12 The argument for recovery of attorney fees above the cap is even stronger in those states, such as California, that treat fees as costs incidental to a judgment, not as part of damages. Since the fees are in the nature of costs, they should be awarded independent of the determination of damages.

In some states, such as California, if a credit agreement provides attorney fees for the creditor, state law requires that such fees be available to the consumer as well. n13 As such, attorney fees are not based on a statute relating to the seller's misconduct, or otherwise related to the FTC Holder Rule. Instead, the fees are squarely based on the fact that the holder has required the consumer to litigate to recover amounts owed to the consumer under the contract, and as such, the fees should be independent of any FTC Holder Rule cap.

[5] No Limit on Creditor's Liability for Own Conduct

The FTC Rule sets out a creditor's liability for the acts of the seller. The creditor is additionally liable for its own conduct. There are no limits to the creditor's liability for its own conduct, and the amount of that liability is then added above and beyond its maximum liability for the seller's conduct. The lender can even be independently liable for its own conduct in misleading the consumer as to the consumer's rights to raise seller-related claims against the lender. n14

[6] Relation of FTC Holder Rule to TIL Limitation on Assignee Liability

Another issue is the interplay of the FTC Holder Rule and the Truth in Lending Act ("TILA"). n15 The TILA explicitly limits an assignee's TIL liability to those TIL violations apparent on the face of the documents. But an assignee with no liability under the TILA arguably is liable under the FTC Holder Rule for the full amount of the assignor's TIL liability (subject, of course, to the maximum liability cap under the FTC Holder Rule). That is, since the contract explicitly states the assignee is liable for claims against the assignor, this contract clause must be given effect. Some courts have followed this argument and found an assignee liable under the FTC Holder Rule for assignor-related TIL claims. n16 The trend, though, is for courts to reach the opposite conclusion. n17 One court has applied the same reasoning to an Equal Credit Opportunity Act claim, holding the FTC Holder Rule overridden by federal regulations that limit an assignee's liability to situations where the assignee knew or should have known of the assignor's violation. n18 This is not the case, though, for other types of consumer claims, such as odometer violations. n19

[7] Relation of FTC Holder Rule to the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act

The Federal Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act states that for purposes of civil liability under that Act, "only the warrantor actually making a written affirmation of fact, promise or undertaking shall be deemed to have created a written warranty, and any rights arising thereunder may be enforced under this section only against such warrantor and no other person." n20 The question arises whether a claim under the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act can be brought against an assignee of the warrantor, based on the FTC Holder language, or whether the above-quoted language restricts the consumer's ability to bring such a claim against anyone other than the warrantor.

It is important to note what the above-quoted language does not say. Since by its very terms it is limited to written warranties, a consumer can certainly bring a Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act claim against an assignee, as long as that claim is not based on the enforcement of a written warranty. Examples of claims not based on a written warranty are claims for breach of an implied warranty, for breach of a service contract, for violation of various Magnuson-Moss Act disclosure requirements, or for violation of various substantive Magnuson-Moss Act restrictions, such as those dealing with tie-ins. n21

the fact that the note contains the FTC Holder notice. At least one court has held that the Magnuson-Moss language trumps the FTC Holder notice, n22 but that case appears to involve an implied warranty claim, not a written warranty claim. The better view is that third parties do not have direct liability for breaches of the warrantor's written warranty. For example, a dealer is not liable if a manufacturer's written warranty is breached. But a third party can have derivative liability if that party is subject to claims the consumer can bring against the written warrantor.

The court that found the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act to trump the FTC Holder Rule based its ruling on similar case law relating to the relationship of the FTC Holder Rule to TIL's limitation on assignee liability. But TIL's limitation on assignee liability specifically restricts assignee liability, while the Magnuson-Moss Warranty Act limitation applies broadly to all third party liability, and does not even mention the issue of assignee liability. It thus leaves open the issue of whether the legislative intent was to limit third parties' direct liability only, or also their derivative liability. Citing TIL case law is not helpful in making this decision.

[8] Does FTC Holder Rule Create Federal Jurisdiction?

A lender may attempt to remove a state law case to federal court (or the consumer may bring an action in federal court) based on the fact that the consumer's case relies in part on the FTC Holder language. But the consumer's claim is based on the language of the credit agreement that contains the FTC Holder Notice (or may be based on various state law theories where the FTC Holder Notice language is missing. n23 As such, the FTC Holder Notice does not create any federal jurisdiction. n24

[9] Relation of FTC Holder Rule to State Law

The FTC Holder Rule states that the consumer's "recovery hereunder" is limited. The FTC Holder Rule does not limit a larger recovery under a different state or federal law.

[10] Consumer's Waiver of Claims Against Creditor

Another issue is the effect of the FTC Holder Rule where the consumer signs a document indicating the work purchased with the loan proceeds has been completed and performed satisfactorily. It is unlikely that a court will give much credence to such a statement, particularly where it is part of boilerplate language the consumer is asked to sign. n25 Similarly, a court will not give much credence to a provision whereby the consumer waives his or her right to raise defenses against assignees where the contract also contains the FTC Holder notice. n26

[11] Holder's Refusal to Accept Liability Under Holder Rule as an Independent UDAP Violation

It is very common for holders to inform consumers that the holder is not subject to the consumer's claims and defenses against the seller, even where the FTC Holder Notice is in the loan documents. Instead, the holder tells the consumer to take up the dispute with the seller, but that the consumer must continue to pay the lender.

These representations by the holder mislead the consumer as to the status of the obligation and as to the consumer's legal rights. n27 As such, the holder's own conduct is a UDAP violation, and the holder is liable for that conduct over and above any derivative liability it has for the seller's conduct. n28 Thus, where there is any question as to the holder's liability for attorney fees or multiple damages for the seller's conduct, there should be no question as to such liability for the holder's own conduct.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 14 Liability of Assignees and Related Creditors; The FTC Holder Rule

1-14 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 14.04

§ 14.04 Where FTC Notice Improperly Omitted

[1] Introduction

The seller's violation of the FTC Holder Rule (by its failure to arrange for the Holder notice to be included in the loan documents) is a state UDAP. n1 violation. In some states, this may even directly violate a state UDAP regulation. n2 But this UDAP claim against the seller rarely is of value to the consumer, who wishes to raise seller-related defenses to a creditor's collection action. However, there are other possible theories.

[2] Liability of Assignees of High-Rate Mortgages

[a] General

The Home Ownership and Equity Protection Act of 1994 ("HOEP") provides consumers with the right to raise claims and defenses against assignees of certain home mortgages. n3 Of special note, this federal statute provides the consumer with the right to raise both claims and defenses against assignees, and provides this right whether or not the assignee is a holder in due course or has inserted a waiver of defense clause in the promissory note. Unlike the FTC Holder notice, the HOEP provision applies whether or not the originating lender places a notice in the loan documents.

The HOEP provision is similar to the FTC Holder notice concerning the cap on assignee liability. The assignee's maximum liability for claims and defenses relating to the originating lender is the remainder of the mortgage indebtedness plus the total amount paid by the consumer in the transaction. n4

[b] Loans Covered by HOEP

The HOEP provision giving consumers the right to raise claims and defenses against assignees applies only to loans covered by HOEP. n5

HOEP applies to closed-end consumer credit transactions securing a consumer's principal dwelling, where the loan was entered into after October 1, 1995, n6 and applies only to non-money loans such as refinancings taking a security interest in a home, home improvement loans, or second mortgages. HOEP explicitly excludes reverse mortgages, open-end loans, and mortgages to purchase or construct a home. n7

In addition, loans meeting this definition must either: 1) have an annual percentage rate which exceeds by more than ten percentage points the yield on treasury securities having comparable maturities at the time the loan is made; n8 or 2) charge total points and fees both in excess of $400 (this number is adjusted each year for inflation) and 8% of the total loan amount. n9 Such points and fees include prepaid interest, points, origination fees, service charges and other creditor's charges for costs of doing business, all compensation paid to mortgage brokers, and certain real estate charges. n10

[c] Exemption Where Assignee Is Unaware of HOEP Coverage

Assignees are exempt from HOEP's assignee liability provision if the assignee "demonstrates, by a preponderance of the evidence, that a reasonable person exercising ordinary due diligence" could not have determined that the loan was covered by HOEP. n11

[3] Assignees Generally Subject to Assignor-Related Defenses Where FTC Holder Notice Is Omitted

Where a credit-seller fails to include the FTC Holder notice, there should be little problem raising seller-related defenses against the assignee's collection action. For an assignee of the credit-seller to claim insulation, it must claim it is a holder in due course under UCC section 3-302. The consumer should be able to defeat this argument because the noncompliance with the FTC Holder Rule should mean the creditor does not comply with the prerequisites of UCC section 3-302.

UCC section 3-302(b) gives holder status only if an assignee takes a negotiable instrument "in good faith" and without notice of any claim by the consumer against the seller. An assignee's taking an instrument that on its face violates the FTC Holder Rule should defeat any claim of good faith and should be notice of a consumer's claims against the seller, at least claims relating to this FTC Holder Rule violation.

The close connectedness doctrine, also referred to as the "party to the transaction" doctrine, contests a lender's assertion of holder-in-due-course status by disputing the "good faith" and "without notice" requirements of UCC section 3-302 where the lender played some part in the original transaction. It has also been used to allow a consumer to assert defenses to the enforcement of a non-negotiable instrument, such as a retail installment sales contract or a lease, against a third party who would not otherwise be subject to such defenses. n12 The doctrine can be thought of as a common law alternative to the FTC Holder Rule and is particularly suited to cases where a seller arranged credit through a particular financer to finance the sale and the paper was assigned when executed. n13

[4] Holder's UDAP Liability Where Notice Is Omitted

[a] Creditor's Actions as a Deceptive Practice

Where a creditor's promissory note violates the FTC Holder Rule, the creditor is engaging in a deceptive practice. A creditor also violates the state UDAP statute by supplying other forms for the consumer to sign, such as completion certificates, that contain language sidestepping the FTC Holder Rule by absolving the creditor of responsibility for some or all of the seller's liability. n14 It is also a material non-disclosure where the creditor fails to inform the consumer that the creditor's loan documents violate federal law. See also UDAP regulations, such as those in Massachusetts, n15 Wisconsin, n16 Georgia, n17 and Idaho. n18 A federal court allowed a case to go to trial to determine if it was unconscionable or unfair to have a credit agreement without the Holder notice. n19 However, the court later found no evidence that a contract without the Holder notice was unconscionable where the consumer offered no evidence that the contract unreasonably favored the creditor. n20

[b] Are the Creditor's Actions Within the UDAP Statute's Scope?

Where a consumer is bringing a UDAP claim directly against the creditor for using a note failing to contain the Holder notice, both the creditor and the creditor's alleged violation must be within the scope of the UDAP statute. Most cases facing such a UDAP scope issue involve student loan notes where the bank and guaranty agency did not include the FTC Holder notice in the loan documents. Many courts appear to be looking for ways of avoiding these complex cases, and a number of these cases have dismissed UDAP claims because of scope issues.

[5] RICO Liability for Omitted Holder Notice

Where a creditor's participation in violating the FTC Holder Rule is deceptive, the practice may also involve mail or wire fraud, and thus lead to a RICO violation. n21

[6] Does Violation of FTC Holder Rule Make the Note Illegal and Thus Unenforceable?

Another approach is to argue that the whole note is voidable where it fails to include a provision required by law. A related argument is that the creditor is estopped from claiming insulation from seller-related claims. Consumers relied on the loan documents, including all terms required by law, and the creditor cannot now renege on that implied promise.

[7] State Statute May Create Derivative Liability Despite Omission of Holder Language

A number of states have also enacted state "holder" laws. These laws state that, as a matter of a state's substantive law, related lenders are subject to seller-related claims. The operation of these state laws are not dependent on the seller or lender's insertion of the FTC Holder notice into the note or contract.

State holder statutes are usually drafted with their own unique language that makes them broader or narrower in certain ways than the FTC Holder Rule. For example, some state statutes may only allow the consumer to recover the unpaid balance. n22 On the other hand, the Missouri UDAP statute allows claims arising from the sale. n23 Where the consumer has a claim against the manufacturer, but not the dealer, the holder may have no liability under the FTC Holder Rule, but may have such liability under the Missouri statute. n24 Where the consumer has more rights under state law than the Holder Rule, the Holder Rule does not pre-empt such rights. n25

Other state statutes apply to assignments from a seller to a lender, and specify that the consumer can bring seller-related affirmative claims against the assignee. n26 Such statutes are useful because, under the common law (assuming the FTC Holder Rule does not apply), consumers can only raise defenses against the assignee and not raise affirmative claims to recover money.

About a third of the states have laws applying to some situations where a consumer takes out a loan directly with a lender, and where the lender is connected in some fashion with the seller. n27 These laws apply when there is a special relationship between the lender and seller, which relationship is defined in the statute. Many state holder laws cover leases that would not meet the TIL definition of credit sale. n28 These laws cover leases either by broadly defining a term such as "retail installment contract" to include leases, or by explicitly mentioning consumer leases in the holder statute.

[8] Revised Article 9 Requires Notice to be Implied

Revised Article 9 of the UCC makes an omitted Holder Notice part of the contract as a matter of law, allowing the consumer to utilize the Holder Notice as if it were included. Revised Article 9 has been adopted by all fifty states, and applies to the enforcement of the consumer's rights after July 1, 2001, even if the contract was created before July 1, 2001. Under Revised Article 9, an assignee of a contract without the required notice is subject to a consumer account debtor's claims and defenses to the same extent as if the contract had contained the notice. n29 Revised Article 9 applies to any credit sales agreement assigned to a lender or other holder. It does not apply to negotiable instruments.

Even prior to the enactment of Revised Article 9, some courts were willing to imply the Holder Notice into an agreement where it is required to be placed. n30

In 2002, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws and the American Law Institute adopted revisions to UCC Article 3. These revisions will be introduced to state legislatures, but have not yet been adopted in any state, and may face opposition from banking interests.

Revised Article 3 complements the Article 9 provisions discussed above by stating that the FTC Holder Notice shall be implied into any promissory note whenever that notice should have been inserted into the note. n31 The consumer may assert against the holder all claims and defenses that would have been available against the "payee" if the note included the FTC Holder Notice. n32 A payee is the person who receives the funds from the loan, i.e., the seller.

Revised Article 3 thus insures that any assignment not covered by Article 9 (because it involves a negotiable instrument) will be covered by the analogous Article 3 provision. Article 3 also applies to direct loans where the seller refers the consumer to the lender and the consumer then signs a note with the lender. n33

[9] Common Law Theories for Lender Liability

At common law, various theories establish a lender's liability for the conduct of closely related parties. These theories, based on the lender's participation in the deceptive scheme, include close-connectedness, conspiracy, joint enterprise, agency, and the like. n34 This liability is found irrespective of any waiver of defense clause or alleged holder-in-due-course status.

Civil conspiracy targets an unnaturally close relationship between the seller and the financer. However, unlike the close connectedness doctrine, which is simply a tool with which to assert defenses against a financer's attempt to collect on a note or contract, civil conspiracy is a tort claim that can yield affirmative damages. In Williams v. ITT Financial Services, n35 a court upheld a jury's award of $15,000 compensatory damages and $1.5 million in punitive damages against a lender who had financed a home improvement loan with a contractor who defaulted on the work. The court found that the lender had known that the contractor was in financial difficulty, and further knew that he was fraudulently using money from new contracts to pay for work on old ones, in a Ponzi-type scheme. n36

CHAPTER 14 Liability of Assignees and Related Creditors; The FTC Holder Rule

1-14 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 14.05

§ 14.05 Raising Lender-Related Defenses Against the Lender's Assignee

Generally, an assignee is subject to all defenses that the consumer could raise against the assignor. n1 There are two important exceptions to this rule. First, UCC section 3-305 generally allows an assignee to be free from those defenses if it has attained the status of a holder in due course. The second exception to the rule is if the note contains a valid waiver of the consumer's right to raise defenses against assignees. However, such waivers are rarely effective.

[1] Is There a Negotiable Instrument?

Assignees only attain the holder-in-due-course status (and, thus, avoid defenses the consumer could raise against the assignor) if they strictly comply with the requirements of UCC section 3-302. One critical requirement is that the note must be a negotiable instrument. UCC section 3-104(a) sets out complex rules as to when a note is negotiable. The note must contain an unconditional promise to pay a sum certain and contain no other promise, order, obligation or power given by the maker except as authorized by UCC Article 3. Additional language in the note as required by a small loan law, other state law, or carelessness by the creditor may defeat a note's negotiability. n2 In addition, even if the promise meets these requirements, it is not a negotiable instrument if it is marked "not transferable," "non-negotiable," or the like. n3

UCC section 3-104(a) requires the note to contain a promise to pay a fixed amount of money. A variable rate loan may not be an unconditional promise to pay a fixed amount of money. n4 Similarly, if the instrument refers to a payment scheme by which the consumer is given an allowance for referrals, the note may not be for a fixed amount of money. n5

To be negotiable, an instrument must be payable on demand at a definite time. n6 An estimated payment schedule, with the lender later notifying the consumer of the first payment due date, does not meet this requirement. n7 A payment due a certain period after completion of home improvement work might also not contain a definite time.

Another potential challenge to a note's negotiability will have special utility in cases of home equity loans. A holder of a negotiable instrument must obtain that instrument via an indorsement either written on the instrument itself or on a paper affixed to the instrument. n8 Such a separate paper for an indorsement is called an allonge. n9 Some cases have found that separate sheets stapled to, rolled in, or clipped to the instrument are not affixed. n10

[2] Creditor's Good Faith and Lack of Notice of Defenses

To attain holder-in-due-course status, the holder must also take the instrument in good faith n11 and without notice of any defense or claim. n12 The holder will have to establish good faith; the burden is on the assignee to show it has met the UCC's prerequisites for the holder-in-due-course status. n13

Defects apparent on the face of the documents, such as unfair contract terms, Truth in Lending violations, or usurious interest rates, should defeat the holder-in-due-course status. Assignees with close business ties to assignors are particularly vulnerable to challenges that they are not holders in due course, n14 particularly where they supply forms, receive assignment of substantially all the seller's contracts, and have constructive knowledge of seller's fraud. n15

[3] Defenses That Can Be Raised Against Holder in Due Course

UCC section 3-305 establishes that a holder in due course takes an instrument free from all defenses except incapacity, duress, or illegality that is sufficient to nullify the obligation or fraud that induced the obligor to sign the instrument with neither knowledge nor reasonable opportunity to learn of its character or its essential terms. These defenses are thus available. n16

Another important application of UCC section 3-305 is if a loan is usurious. n17 A similar result should be reached when a UDAP or other consumer protection statute authorizes the court to void an agreement where the statute is violated. n18 As revised, UCC section 3-305 now provides an additional defense against certain holders: the right to enforce an instrument is subject to a "claim in recoupment" against the original payee, so long as the claim arose from the transaction that gave rise to the claim. n19 However, the rights of a holder in due course are not subject to a claim of recoupment against a person other than the holder, a significant limit on the defense's utility. n20

[4] Waivers of Consumer's Right to Raise Defenses

Assignees may attempt to rectify their failure to achieve holder-in-due-course status with a provision in the credit documents that the consumer waives his or her right to raise defenses against assignees. But this provision is disfavored, rarely enforced by the courts, n21 and often violates specific state laws prohibiting such waivers. In addition, former UCC section 9-206(1) permits waiver of defense clauses only where the assignee takes the contract for value, in good faith, and without notice of claims and defenses.

[5] State Legislation and Common Law Theories Limiting the Holder-in-Due-Course Status

Finally, consumers should review their own state legislation and state common law. Before the FTC Holder Rule, states often enacted laws limiting the holder-in-due-course status in consumer transactions. n22 Consider whether these laws reach real estate sales, assignments of direct loans, or other transactions not covered by the FTC Holder Rule. n23

CHAPTER 15 Credit Cards

1-15 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 15.02

§ 15.02 Billing Error Procedures

[1] Covered Billing Errors

The Fair Credit Billing Act ("FCBA") billing error procedures apply to open-end credit accounts as well as all consumer credit cards. n1 Billing errors include any of the following practices found on a customer's periodic statement: n2

- An extension of credit that was not made to the consumer, n3 or not made in the amount reflected on the statement; n4 This can include an allegation that the creditor charged the consumer for a transaction for which the consumer is not liable, because the debt was owed by another person;
- An unauthorized extension of credit; n5
- An extension of credit that is not properly identified;
- An extension of credit for property or services that was not accepted by the consumer or the consumer's designee; n6 (Whether acceptance has occurred is a matter of state law, and will, in most states, depend on application of Uniform Commercial Code principles.)
- An extension of credit for property or services not delivered to the consumer or the consumer's designee as agreed; n7
- Failure to include a payment or other credit to the account; n8
- Computational or accounting error in the credit-related portion of the statement. n9
- An extension of credit for which the consumer requests additional clarification or documentation; n10 or
- Failure to send the periodic statement to the consumer's last known address. n11

A billing error can also consist of billing someone who was issued a credit card but had not requested it, in violation of the TIL prohibition against unsolicited issuance. n12 It can also include the improper assessment of finance charges. n13

[2] Notice of Billing Error

To use billing error procedures, the consumer must send a notice of billing error to the address identified for this purpose by the creditor, which must be received by the creditor no later than 60 days after the creditor first transmitted the first periodic statement that reflects the billing error. n14 In order to state a claim for violation of the billing error procedures, a consumer may need to plead compliance with these notice requirements. n15

The billing error notice must be in writing to preserve the consumer's rights, n16 must include sufficient information to identify the cardholder's name and account number, n17 the reasons for the belief that a billing error occurred, and the type, date, and amount of the error. n18 Effective July 2010, if a creditor states in its periodic statements that it will accept notices submitted electronically and provides instructions on how to do so, a consumer who submits a notice electronically pursuant to those instructions will satisfy the requirement that the notice be in writing. n19 If a consumer reasserts a billing error that the creditor has already responded to, investigated, and resolved, the creditor need not respond again. n20 This exemption only applies, however, if the consumer's second notice claims "substantially the same" billing errors as the first. n21

A consumer who does not send a dispute letter within the 60-day period does not have a billing error claim based on the inclusion of the wrongful charge in a subsequent periodic statement because the notice must be sent after the first periodic statement in which the charge appears. n22 The consumer might have a claim under another section of TILA. For example, inaccurate disclosure of the finance charge or the balance should violate TILA's periodic statement disclosure requirements. n23 Even if the statute is interpreted to confine the dispute to the new interest and charges, the creditor's investigation would have to encompass the underlying disputed charge in order to resolve them.

A consumer who did not send a dispute letter within the sixty-day period might also still have a Truth in Lending ("TIL") claim based on the inclusion of the wrongful charges in the periodic statement. Inaccurate disclosure of the finance charge or the balance is a violation of 15 U.S.C. section 1637(b)(4) and (7). n24 Sending a billing error notice is an option the consumer can pursue if he or she wants to place the duty of investigating and responding upon the creditor. Failure to give the billing error notice does not affect the consumer's right to raise the error as a defense in a collection action. n25 Consumers are not required to have a good faith belief that they actually do not owe the disputed amount in order to invoke FCBA's billing error procedures. n26 Note that the Commentary, effective July 2010, clarifies that the consumer need not send a notice to the merchant in a billing error dispute involving purchases not accepted or not delivered as agreed. n27

[3] Creditor's Interim Steps Upon Notice of Billing Error

Once the creditor receives the billing error notice, in writing, at the specified address, the creditor must acknowledge receipt of the billing error notice within 30 days of receiving it, unless it has already investigated and resolved the billing error during that time period. n28

After the consumer gives notice, the consumer may withhold payment of the amount in dispute and charges related thereto, n29 or pay the amount without waiving billing error rights. n30

The creditor may not attempt to collect the amount in dispute or related charges, close the account, or report the consumer for nonpayment to a credit reporting agency prior to resolution of the alleged error. The creditor may send a periodic statement indicating the amount in dispute.

If the consumer has an automatic payment plan whereby deductions from a deposit account held by the card issuer are used to pay the open-end credit, the card issuer may not deduct the disputed amount if it has received the billing error notice any time up to three business days before the scheduled deduction date. n31 Currently, this restriction applies only to a card issuer's own automatic payment plan from funds on deposit with it. n32 Effective July 2010, this protection applies to any automatic payment plan offered by the issuer, whether or not the payments are deducted from an account held by the issuer. n33 However, it does not apply to automatic payment plans offered by another financial institution, such as a bill payment service by the institution at which the consumer's deposit account is held. n34 When the automatic deduction comes from an account held by a financial institution other than the card issuer, the consumer may have rights under the Electronic Fund Transfer Act. n35 The consumer can stop payment by written or oral notice to the depository bank up to three business days before the scheduled transfer. n36

[4] Creditor's Billing Error Investigation

The creditor must determine whether a billing error occurred (unless the creditor decides to correct the account as requested by the consumer or unless the consumer withdraws the billing error notice) by conducting a "reasonable" investigation, n37 not merely accepting the merchant's word. The creditor must investigate and resolve the billing error dispute within two complete billing cycles (or 90 days, if that is sooner). n38 The creditor must meet the timeframes for investigation even if the billing error qualifies for another type of investigation under TILA, such as an investigation for unauthorized use or pursuant to a cardholder's right to assert claims and defenses against the merchant. n39

[a] Resolution of Error

If the creditor determines that the billing error occurred, it must correct the error and credit the account with any disputed amount and related charges (including charges imposed for the error resolution process, documentation, etc.), mail or deliver a correction notice to the consumer, n40 and report the resolution of a disputed account to each credit agency notified of a delinquency. n41

If the creditor determines that there was no billing error, or a different error than that complained of, the creditor must: mail or deliver to the consumer an explanation of its reasons for concluding that the billing error asserted by the consumer was wrong in whole or in part; furnish copies of any documentary evidence if the consumer so requests; and correct any different error discovered and credit the account with any disputed amount and related charges (including charges imposed for the error resolution process, documentation, etc.). n42 An ambiguous and cursory statement that does not set forth a legitimate justification for rejecting the dispute is insufficient, nor does an explanation meet the statutory standard if it fails to mention the liability theory that the creditor argues at trial. n43

If the creditor determines that the consumer owes all or part of the disputed amount, the creditor must promptly notify the consumer in writing of the amount owed and the time for payment, allow the consumer any free ride period for payment of the amount, and not report the disputed amount as delinquent unless the consumer has not paid by the time the free ride period is over, or 10 days has passed, whichever time period is longer. n44

If the consumer notifies the creditor in writing during the above time period for payment that the consumer still disputes the charge, the creditor must report the amount as disputed if it reports it as delinquent. n45

Even if the creditor's resolution does not favor the consumer, a consumer's invocation of the billing error procedures may present a defense in a collection action. For example, many card issuers will bring collection actions using a common law theory of "account stated" or "action on an account," which requires that the parties agree that a debt is valid and due. n46 The fact that a consumer had raised a billing error claim may mean the creditor cannot meet the elements of an account stated claim, because the consumer does not agree that the debt is valid. n47 TIL's protection against unauthorized use may also prevent the creditor from bringing an account stated claim in some states, as the TILA specifically imposes on the creditor the burden of showing that the use of the card was authorized. n48

Note: Effective July 2010, the Commentary clarifies that the creditor must make a substantive final resolution within the time limits for investigation. If a creditor fails to complete the investigation and fails to provide a written explanation as to why there was no error or a different error, or otherwise fails to comply with the error resolution procedures required in such cases, the creditor generally must credit the disputed amount and related finance or other charges to the consumer's account. n49

Furthermore, the requirement for a final resolution prohibits the creditor from reversing amounts previously credited for an alleged billing error. This is true even if the creditor obtains evidence after the error resolution time period that indicates that the billing error did not occur as asserted by the consumer. n50

[b] Credit Reports and Billing Errors

Once the consumer has properly notified the card issuer of a billing error, neither the creditor nor its agent may report the disputed amount as delinquent (but may report the amount as in dispute) to any person, including a credit reporting agency or a collection agency. n51 Actual and statutory damages are available for violation of the restrictions on reporting of disputed amounts. n52 Violation of this requirement may also give rise to liability under the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA"). n53 Under the FCRA, a credit reporting agency must conduct a reinvestigation if a consumer disputes information in the consumer's credit report. n54 In addition, the creditor may be liable if it does not cooperate in the reinvestigation. n55 The FCRA may provide an additional remedy, or an alternative remedy if the Truth in Lending Act ("TILA") is not violated or the consumer has not invoked her billing error rights, for example, because she has missed the sixty-day deadline. In order to invoke her FCRA rights, however, consumers must dispute the error directly with the credit reporting agency in writing. Thus, consumers should be advised to send billing error disputes in writing to both the creditor directly (to invoke TILA rights) and to any credit reporting agency for which the consumers' credit reports are inaccurate because of the billing error or the fact the creditor did not comply with TILA. A card issuer could still pursue normal collection routines on the disputed amount, n56 including filing suit or referral to a collection agency, but must notify the attorney or collection agency, who in turn must also notify the court or any third party of the dispute. n57

[c] Charges for Error Resolution Procedure

Generally, if a billing error occurred, even if it was not the error asserted by the consumer, the creditor cannot impose any charges related to the investigation and resolution of the dispute. n58

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 15 Credit Cards

1-15 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 15.03

§ 15.03 Cardholder's Defenses Against Card Issuer for Merchant Misconduct

[1] General

Generally, a credit card issuer is subject to all claims (except tort claims) and defenses of a consumer against a merchant when the consumer uses a credit card as a method of payment or extension of credit, if certain conditions are met. n1 For a card issuer to be subject to the consumer's claims and defenses against a merchant, the credit card must have been used to purchase goods or services in person or by mail or telephone. n2

In addition, the claims or defense must have to do with the property or services purchased from the merchant with the credit card, such as nondelivery of the goods (which could also be asserted as a billing error) or a dispute as to the quality of the merchandise. The cardholder also must have made a good faith attempt to resolve the matter with the merchant; n3 the amount of credit involved in the disputed transaction must be more than $50; n4 and the transaction must have occurred in the same state as the cardholder's current address or within 100 miles from that address, n5 though the card issuer may waive this statutory limitation. n6 The location of a transaction is a matter of state law and could be the consumer's home for mail or telephone orders. In limited situations, the cardholder can still raise claims and defenses against the card issuer if the amount in controversy is less than $50 or where the transaction occurs out-of-state. n7

Once the cardholder has met the above three conditions, where applicable, payment for the disputed transaction may be withheld, to the extent of the credit outstanding on that transaction and finance charges attributable thereto. n8

[2] Resolution Process; Adverse Credit Reports While Cardholder Asserts Claims and Defenses

The claims and defenses provisions and process operate independently of the billing error provisions, though both may be applicable to some disputes and in some circumstances. n9 The claims and errors provisions is not designed to actually resolve the underlying dispute; it is aimed at preserving the consumer's right to assert claims and defenses against the merchant. That dispute ultimately must be determined under state or other applicable law. n10 As a practical matter, when the consumer invokes the claims and errors procedure, the card-issuer charges the amount back to the merchant.

As with the billing error procedure, a card issuer cannot make an adverse credit report based on the consumer's withholding payment in accordance with these claims and defenses procedures "until the dispute is settled or judgment rendered," n11 though it may report the amount as disputed. n12 The card issuer is not prohibited from undertaking normal collection activities for delinquent accounts. n13 (Amounts being withheld in accordance with these procedures, of course, are not "delinquent," and may not be the basis for collection efforts until the matter is resolved.)

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 15 Credit Cards

1-15 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 15.04

§ 15.04 Customer's Liability for Unauthorized Use of a Credit Card

[1] General

TIL precludes customer (business or consumer) liability for unauthorized use of a credit card, except in narrowly defined circumstances, n1 and then limits that liability to $50. "Unauthorized use" means the use of the credit card by a person other than the cardholder who does not have actual, implied or apparent authority for such use, and from which the cardholder receives no benefit. n2

Thus, misuse by an authorized user (such as an employee or family member) is not "unauthorized use" subject to TIL's statutory liability limit. n3 Whether an authorized user is liable to the creditor depends on state law. n4 The card issuer has the burden of proving that the user had actual, implied or apparent authority and that the conditions for imposing liability on the cardholder have been met. n5

The cardholder's failure to review monthly statements to detect unauthorized use can give rise to "apparent authority" in the otherwise unauthorized user. n6 However, one court of appeals has held that a failure to review and object to unauthorized charges does not create apparent authority, because permitting liability in such instances would conflict with TILA's intent in placing the risk of fraud on card issuers, not cardholders. n7 Effective July 2010, the Commentary clarifies that a cardholder can be liable for unauthorized use by a person who has permission to use a card, even if the person is not officially listed as an authorized user. If the cardholder gives a credit card and grants authority to make transactions to a person, the cardholder is liable for transactions by that person even if the person exceeds the authority given, unless and until the cardholder has notified the creditor that use of the card by that person is no longer authorized. n8

An authorized user is different than a joint account holder, who is fully liable on the account. A recent Fourth Circuit case has revealed, however, that some credit card issuers may not be able to distinguish between who is a joint account holder versus solely an authorized user. In Johnson v. MBNA, n9 the card issuer attempted to hold the plaintiff liable for an account after the primary card holder filed for bankruptcy. The plaintiff claimed she was an authorized user. The card issuer was unable to show whether the plaintiff was an authorized user or joint account holder, because it did not have the original account agreement, having destroyed it pursuant to its document retention policy. Since authorized users may not be liable on a credit card account in many states, the failure of credit card issuers to distinguish between the two statuses is highly problematic.

[2] Conditions for Creditor Imposing $50 Liability

The card issuer must prove several elements to impose the $50 maximum liability on the cardholder for unauthorized use: 1) that the card was accepted by the cardholder; n10 2) that the card issuer has provided a means to identify the cardholder or authorized user, n11 such as a signature, picture, fingerprint or other electrical or mechanical means; n12 3) that the card was actually presented; n13 4) that the card issuer gave "adequate notice" to the customer, before the unauthorized use occurred, n14 of the maximum potential liability and how to notify the card issuer of the loss or theft of the card.

An "accepted credit card" is one which the consumer has requested and received, signed, used, or authorized another to use. Thus, if a consumer did not apply for or request a credit card, the use of the card by another should be unauthorized use by definition. n15 This definition of unauthorized use may be important for consumers who are victims of identity theft, which is the fastest growing crime in this country. n16 An "accepted credit card" includes a renewal or substitute for an accepted card; however, a creditor cannot issue a renewal or substitute card if the account has been closed. n17

[3] Cardholder Notice to Card Issuer of Unauthorized Use

The cardholder or any other person may give the card issuer oral or written notice of the loss, theft, or possible unauthorized use of the credit card, n18 and can be given to the card issuer in any way, whether previously authorized by the issuer or not. n19 The notice must identify the name or card number and state that unauthorized use has or may have occurred. Once notice is given, the customer's liability for unauthorized use is frozen at the amount of unauthorized use, or $50, whichever is less. n20 Giving notice of the unauthorized use to the card issuer is not, however, a precondition to raising unauthorized use as a defense in a collection action. n21

[4] Investigation Procedures

Because unauthorized use is a type of billing error, n22 the creditor must attempt to resolve the dispute. n23 The Commentary includes guidance on what reasonable steps the creditor may take to investigate the claim of unauthorized use. n24

No investigation is necessary if the card issuer does not impose liability for the unauthorized use. n25 A card issuer can terminate the investigation if the consumer refuses to provide information solely within the consumer's knowledge or control. Otherwise, the card issuer may not deny a claim based solely on the card holder's refusal to comply with a particular request. n26

Interestingly, plaintiffs in one case alleged that a major credit card issuer has a policy of giving financial incentives to its fraud investigators by tying their salaries to their ability to contain losses. n27 One question is whether such a policy is challengeable under TILA's unauthorized use protections.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 15 Credit Cards

1-15 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 15.05

§ 15.05 Prompt Crediting of Consumer Payments

Truth in Lending requires that open-end creditors n1 and credit card issuers n2 must credit payments made as of the day of receipt of the payment unless a delay in posting does not result in a finance charge. If the creditor does not specify a manner of payment, payments can be made at any location where the creditor conducts business, during normal business hours, by cash, money order, check, or similar properly negotiable instrument. If the creditor and consumer agree, the payment can also be made by electronic funds transfer. n3 As a practical matter, it may be difficult to establish when a check was received. If payment is by check, the reverse side of the canceled check will show a stamp from the creditor's bank showing when the check was deposited, which may be later than when it was received. If payment is sent by wire transfer, a receipt can be generated indicating when the funds were transmitted.

If the creditor does specify the manner of payment, the rules must be reasonable. n4 These rules could include "no cash," U.S. dollars only, one address for payments to be sent to, etc. n5 If the creditor accepts a payment made in a different manner than that specified, it can deliberately wait five days to credit the payment, even though this will result in a finance charge. n6 If the creditor and consumer agree, the payment can also be made by electronic funds transfer. n7

In recent years, several class action lawsuits have been filed against major credit card banks alleging noncompliance with prompt posting requirements for consumer payments. n8 Failure to post a credit to an account at all may violate other laws or constitute fraud. n9

1-15 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 15.06

§ 15.06 Treatment of Credit Balances

For credit cards, charge cards, and open-end accounts, creditors must appropriately identify on periodic statements any credit balance, n1

Under the Fair Credit Reporting Act, a creditor is permitted to use lists of consumers provided by credit bureaus to extend "firm offers of credit" to these consumers. n2 However, if a "firm offer of credit" is accompanied by the credit card itself, it will violate TILA's prohibition against unsolicited issuance, despite being permissible under the FCRA. n3 and refund the amount within seven business days n4 from receipt of a written request from the consumer. Oral requests are not sufficient to trigger the creditor's responsibility to refund credit balances. n5 Violations of the requirement to refund credit balances may occur as creditors become aggressive in their fraud prevention methods. n6

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 15 Credit Cards

1-15 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 15.07

§ 15.07 Restrictions on Issuing a Credit Card

A credit card issuer may not issue a credit card, or add credit to a noncredit card, except in response to an explicit oral or written request or application for a credit card from a consumer or business (or when renewing a card which the customer has already accepted). n1

Under the Fair Credit Reporting Act, a creditor is permitted to use lists of consumers provided by credit bureaus to extend "firm offers of credit" to these consumers. n2 However, if a "firm offer of credit" is accompanied by the credit card itself, it will violate TILA's prohibition against unsolicited issuance, despite being permissible under the FCRA. n3 The card issuer may solicit the consumer's request or application, by mail, telephone, print or broadcast advertising. n4

Initial disclosures need not be provided to the customer until just before the first transaction by which the customer becomes obligated on the plan, and sometimes not even then. n5 The initial disclosures need not be made before an application fee is taken, if a creditor assesses an application fee on everyone who applies for credit. n6

Once the consumer has accepted the card, by inactivity or use, the card can be renewed n7 or issued to others whom the requesting party has designated as authorized users on the account. n8

In 1999, in response to a widespread marketing of cards that from the outset had both credit and noncredit features, the Federal Reserve Board tightened the Commentary provisions that define when a creditor can issue an unsolicited non-credit device that has potential credit features. n9 The changes were made effective March 31, 1999, although compliance was optional until March 31, 2000. The new Commentary allows a creditor to add a credit feature to an unsolicited non-credit card at the consumer's specific request. However, an unsolicited non-credit card can be issued only if the issuer does not propose to connect the card to any credit plan. If the issuer includes promotional materials about credit features when it sends the card to the customer, this demonstrates that the issuer proposes to connect the card to a credit plan and makes unsolicited issuance unlawful. n10 Likewise, making the TIL credit disclosures or an account agreement along with the card shows that the creditor is proposing to connect it to a credit plan. n11 The fact that the consumer has to contact the issuer and activate the card to access credit makes no difference--it is still unlawful to send the consumer the card. n12

The creditor can issue noncredit card devices, such as a check guarantee card, a debit card, or an ATM card, without a specific request, even though these devices can be transformed into credit devices upon the customer's request. n13 In addition, the creditor can issue unsolicited PINs (personal identification numbers such as those used for automated tellers or point-of-sale terminals) to existing cardholders as long as the PINs cannot be used alone to obtain credit, but must be used in conjunction with the card. n14

TILA statutory damages, as well as actual damages, are available for violations of the prohibition against issuance of unsolicited credit cards. n15

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 15 Credit Cards

1-15 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 15.11

§ 15.11 The Creditor-Merchant-Cardholder Relationship

TIL includes some restrictions on the relationship between the card issuer, the cardholder, and the person or entity honoring the card (referred to herein as the merchant or seller, since that is most often the case).

[1] Tie-Ins

The TILA provides that the card issuer may not require a seller to open an account or procure any service from the card issuer (or other person such as an affiliate, agent, or subsidiary) as a condition to participation in the credit card plan, unless essential to the operation of the credit card. n1

[2] Prompt Crediting of Refunds

When a credit card has been used to purchase merchandise or services from a third party seller, and the merchant accepts a return or otherwise forgives the debt, the merchant must transmit a credit to the card issuer within seven business days, n2 through normal channels. The card issuer must then credit the consumer's account within three business days from its receipt of the credit.

If the third party merchant gives cash refunds to cash customers, it must also give credit or cash refunds to credit card customers, unless it discloses at the time the card is used that credit or cash refunds for credit card returns are not given. n3 The merchant may refuse to give credit when a credit card customer returns the merchandise, if that policy was disclosed at the time of the transaction (and, presumably, if state law permits).

[3] Disclosure of Finance Charge

Truth in Lending requires a third party merchant, not the card issuer, to disclose any finance charge imposed at the time of the transaction, such as a surcharge for use of the credit card, or, in some cases, a discount to encourage cash payment, before the consumer becomes obligated. n4

[4] Discounts and Surcharges

A merchant may allow a discount of any size from the regular price to induce payment by cash or check rather than by use of a charge or credit card. n5 The discount must be offered to all customers, and its availability must be clearly and conspicuously disclosed. If these conditions are met, the discount is not a finance charge. If the conditions are not met, the discount is a finance charge which must be disclosed in advance. n6

The card issuer may not prevent a third party seller from offering discounts to encourage payment by cash or other means instead of by use of a credit card account, but may prevent a seller from imposing a surcharge on the use of a credit card. Unless prohibited by the card issuer or by law, the merchant may impose a surcharge for use of a charge or credit card. n7 This surcharge is a finance charge and must be disclosed in advance. n8 The merchant must disclose the finance charge, or how it will be determined, either orally or in writing. The amount financed and annual percentage rate are not required disclosures in this instance. n9

CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

§ 16.01 Introduction

Lenders, credit sellers, insurance companies, employers, and others often seek information about consumers to minimize the risk of extending credit, selling insurance, or hiring new employees. Although the consumer who applies for credit, insurance, or employment supplies much of this information, credit bureaus (sometimes called credit reporting agencies or consumer reporting agencies) can provide additional information about the applicant. Credit bureaus collect enormous quantities of information on consumers, condense it into consumer credit reports (also called consumer reports) and then resell the credit reports to third parties such as banks, retailers and other potential creditors, prospective employers, landlords and insurers. To obtain a report, the credit bureau's customer typically uses a credit reporting terminal linked to the credit bureaus with whom the customer has a subscription agreement, or connects through a computer modem using specially developed software. Once passwords and consumer identifying information have been inputted, the bureau returns reports within seconds that match the identifying information.

A consumer credit report contains personal information such as name, age, social security number, home and business addresses, job, previous addresses, marital status, spouse's name and number of children. Estimated income, value of car and home, bank accounts, credit accounts, payment history and credit limits, mortgages and other financial information also comprise a credit report, as does public information such as tax liens, bankruptcies and court judgments. A report also indicates who has requested the consumer's credit report within the last two years. Reports sent to credit grantors often include a "credit score" or rating of a consumer's so-called creditworthiness. n1

"Investigative reports" are specialized credit reports that contain far more information than standard consumer credit reports and are used most often by insurance companies and prospective employers. In addition to the usual credit, financial and public record information, investigative reports provide information relating to a consumer's character, general reputation, personal characteristics or mode of living. This information comes from personal interviews with the consumer's friends, neighbors, and colleagues.

The FCRA n2 regulates the activities of credit reporting agencies, users of credit reports, and those who furnish information about consumers to reporting agencies. The statute also sets forth various consumer rights related to credit reporting. The FCRA was extensively amended by the Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996, as part of the Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act of 1996, Pub. L. No. 104-208, 110 Stat. 3009 (Sept. 30, 1996).

In general, the Act applies when a person collects information on a "consumer's creditworthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living" and this information is used by a third party as a basis for denying or increasing the charge for "credit or insurance to be used primarily for personal, family, or household purposes." n3 The Act also applies if the information is used for purposes relating to employment opportunities, government benefits, or certain business transactions. n4

The FCRA is intended to protect consumers from invasion of privacy and the dissemination of false, outdated, or misleading information by placing various obligations on persons who use or disseminate credit information about consumers. Consumer reporting agencies must adopt reasonable procedures to ensure that the information they disseminate is accurate and up-to-date and that it is furnished only to users with certain permissible purposes. n5

Disclosure obligations for both reporting agencies and users are designed to ensure that consumers will know when a consumer report has been used as the basis of action adverse to their interest. n6 The disclosure rules also ensure that consumers will be informed about the nature of information being disseminatedabout them. n7 Reporting agencies also have an obligation to reinvestigate information which consumers dispute and to inform users of the report of the dispute. n8 Those who furnish information to consumer reporting agencies must participate in the reinvestigation conducted by the consumer reporting agency. n9

If these obligations are not met or if the consumer sustains damage notwithstanding eventual compliance with the obligations, the consumer may bring a civil suit under the Act. n10 Additionally, it is a criminal offense for a user to obtain information on a consumer under false pretenses n11 and for an officer or an employee of a reporting agency to furnish such information to an unauthorized person. n12 Finally, the FCRA provides for public enforcement.

Congress recently amended the FCRA to allow the Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") and other administrative enforcement agencies to prescribe trade regulation rules and other rules in relation to the FCRA. n13 The FTC has issued a Statement of General Policy or Interpretation: Appendix--Commentary on the Fair Credit Reporting Act, n14 better known as the Official Staff Commentary, which interprets many particulars of the Act. Although the courts need not show deference to Commentary interpretations, they may do so because they reflect the enforcement policy of the primary federal agency with responsibility for the FCRA. n15

In addition to general rulemaking authority, n16 the agencies are specifically authorized to issue regulations pursuant to several provisions of the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act of 2003 (FACTA), amendments to the FCRA. n17 As of mid-2006, only some of the regulations required by the FACTA amendments have been finalized by the FTC and other identified agencies. n18

FACTA's rulemaking scheme is extremely complex because there are several sets of regulations issued by different federal agencies. The FTC has promulgated regulations that apply to the CRAs and non-bank furnishers. The FRB has promulgated a limited number of regulations and model forms that generally apply to all furnishers or all non-bank furnishers. Finally, the banking regulators have promulgated regulations that govern the respective financial institutions that they supervise.

In 2001, Congress passed the U.S.A. Patriot Act which, among other things, reduced the requirements for the FBI to gain access to consumer credit information. n19 Specifically, Congress amended section 1681u, to reduce the administrative certification requirements for FBI access to credit information. This amendment was one of many contained in the U.S.A. Patriot Act intended to protect against international terrorism. Investigations pursuant to this section of the FCRA may not be solely based on activities protected by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. n20

The FTC staff also issues informal opinion letters which do not bind even the FTC. n21 The weight accorded these letters should depend on their persuasiveness, but do bear the imprimatur of an FTC employee. n22

[1] Privacy Protection n23

As the world goes digital, consumers' records, both financial and otherwise, are increasingly vulnerable to exposure. Unregulated databases, escalating numbers of corporate mergers and the proliferation of information brokers--private investigators who specialize in obtaining computerized records--all threaten privacy. The Internet raises particular privacy concerns, as information sent over the Internet may pass through dozens of different computer systems, each of which can snatch and hold it. In addition, web site owners can track consumers' online behavior and thereby gather information about their preferences, often without their knowledge.

The FCRA protects only a tiny corner of our privacy. It seeks only to limit the disclosure by private parties of consumer financial information to be used, for the most part, for credit, insurance, or employment purposes. n24 It does not give consumers the right to prohibit a consumer reporting agency from disclosing accurate information to those deemed to have a permissible purpose.

Additional federal and local laws exist to protect personal privacy from invasion by federal or local government, n25 to codify the common law tort of invasion of privacy, n26 and to prohibit private parties from gaining n27 or disclosing n28 specific types of information. Work continues in the movement to expand privacy laws to cover the vast amount of consumer information now gathered and available digitally. n29

[2] The Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act of 2003

In 2003, Congress made significant changes to the FCRA by passing the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act (FACTA). n30

[a] Key Provisions

The FACTA contains several provisions intended to assist consumers with credit reporting problems. The Act provides for free annual credit reports from the three national credit reporting repositories and newly defined national specialty reporting credit bureaus (that is, tenant screening, insurance, and employment). n31 In addition to permanently extending existing preemption provisions in the FCRA, it added a long list of new preemptions that significantly limit states' abilities to regulate much of the FCRA's subject matter and conduct requirements. The full extent of the preemption and limitation of liability provisions is uncertain and will likely remain this way until courts interpret the various provisions added to the FCRA by the FACTA. To combat identity theft, the FACTA allows consumers to place fraud alerts in their credit files n32 and to block information caused by identity theft or fraud. n33 Active military duty personnel can also add an alert to their files. n34

The FACTA provided the FTC and other federal regulatory agencies with significant rulemaking authority, something the FTC lacked for many years. n35 In addition, the FACTA requires various studies or reports by the FTC and other agencies and in some cases by credit reporting agencies.

Congress also created a new right for consumers to receive notices relating to risk-based pricing. n36 Whenever a creditor extends credit on terms "materially less favorable than the most favorable terms available to a substantial proportion of consumers," the creditor must provide to consumers a notice that explains that the terms are based on information in a credit report and that the consumers can request a free copy of the report. This notice requirement will address a current flaw in the FCRA relating to failure by creditors to provide notice to consumers when they charge higher interest, fees, or other amounts based on a consumer's credit report.

The FACTA also modified the standard of accuracy for furnishers of information. n37 New duties for furnishers include requirements to prevent the "repollution" of consumer reports. n38 Furnishers must also have reasonable procedures in place to prevent them from refurnishing information that is the result of identity theft. n39

Under the FACTA, debt collectors are prohibited from selling or transferring for consideration, or placing for collection, a debt that they are on notice for and that is the result of identity theft. Third-party debt collectors, once on notice that a debt may be the result of identity theft, must notify the creditor that the information may be the result of identity theft and, upon the request of the consumer, disclose to the consumer information about the transaction. n40

The Act also provides for the truncation of credit card numbers and social security numbers. Persons who accept credit cards or debit cards may print no more than the last five digits of the card or the expiration date on any receipt provided at the point of sale. This provision is only applicable to electronically printed receipts. n41 Consumers may also request that credit reporting agencies truncate the consumer's social security number and limit disclosure to the last five numbers of the social security number. n42

The prior version of the FCRA specifically provided that agencies were not required to disclose credit scores to consumers, n43 though it did not preempt states from requiring their disclosure. The FCRA now requires disclosure of credit scores and will standardize the fees for the disclosure, but it also preempts states from imposing new requirements. n44 Mortgage lenders of loans secured by one to four units of residential real property must also disclose a credit score and related information that the lender obtained from an agency or, if the lender uses an automated underwriting system, must disclose that system's credit score and the score's key factors. n45 Mortgage lenders must also give a prescribed notice to the consumer. n46 Although state laws regarding these disclosures are preempted, several existing state laws are exempt from the preemption. n47 The FCRA now requires agencies to give consumers the FTC's summary of rights to dispute information and obtain credit scores; n48 under the prior version, agencies could substitute their own summary.

The FACTA was signed into law on December 4, 2003, and certain provisions without a designated effective date went into effect on this date. However, the effective dates of most provisions are to be determined by the FTC and other federal agencies, and these agencies have adopted regulations specifying effective dates for these provisions. n49 Still other FACTA provisions do not become effective until the FTC or other federal agencies enact regulations interpreting the provisions. At this time only some of the required regulations have been finalized by the FTC and others identified agencies. n50

[3] Legislation Since FACTA

In 2006, Congress modified the Fair Credit Reporting Act to respond to the perceived need for additional confidentiality in national security investigations. n51 The Act was amended to allow the FBI to prohibit a CRA from disclosing that the FBI sought information from the CRA. n52 Similarly, if "the head of a government agency authorized to conduct investigations of intelligence or counterintelligence activities or analysis related to international terrorism, or his designee" makes the same certification, the agency must also maintain the confidentiality of the request for consumer information. n53 In the USA PATRIOT Act Additional Reauthorizing Amendments Act of 2005, n54 Congress modified these provisions slightly to clarify that someone to whom a national security letter is issued need not disclose the name of an attorney from whom the letter recipient plans to seek legal advice about the letter. n55

The FACTA Amendments of 2003 provided that persons who accept credit cards or debit cards may print no more than the last five digits of the card or the expiration date on any electronically-printed receipt provided at the point of sale. n56 In 2008, Congress amended the FCRA's provision authorizing suits for willful noncompliance to specify that a merchant's failure to comply with the prohibition on printing card expiration dates would not be the basis of an action for willful noncompliance, so long as the receipt was printed on or before June 3, 2008. n57 Congress made the provision retroactive. n58 However, this "amnesty" period has since ended, and the expiration date provision can once again be the basis of an action for willful noncompliance.

In 2009, Congress enacted the Credit Card Accountability, Responsibility and Disclosure Act. n59 As part of these reforms to the credit card industry, Congress added two new provisions to the Fair Credit Reporting Act, both effective February 22, 2010. The first addresses deceptive practices in the marketing of credit reports by requiring that any advertisement for a "free" credit report must display a notice that free credit reports are available pursuant to federal law at annualcreditreport.com. n60 The second restricts the use of prescreened credit reports to make "firm offers of credit" to young consumers by prohibiting CRAs from furnishing prescreened reports on consumers younger than twenty-one years of age. n61

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

1-16 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 16.02

§ 16.02 FCRA Scope

[1] General

The FCRA primarily n1 regulates "consumer reports" and "consumer reporting agencies." Businesses which furnish information about consumers to consumer reporting agencies also have obligations under the Act. The rights set forth in the FCRA generally apply only to "consumers."

A "consumer" as defined by the FCRA is "an individual." n2 This definition includes only natural persons, not artificial entities such as partnerships, corporations, trusts, estates, cooperatives, associations, governments, government subdivisions, agencies n3 or nonprofit community organizations. n4 An individual need not be involved in a consumer transaction to fall within the definition of "consumer." n5

Information communicated by anyone other than a reporting agency is not a consumer report. The term "consumer reporting agency" refers not just to credit bureaus and inspection bureaus, but any entity that meets the statutory definition.

[2] Covered Consumer Reports

[a] General

A consumer report bears on a "consumer's creditworthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living." n6 Information which does not bear on one of the seven characteristics does not constitute a consumer report. Consumer reports involve information "used or expected to be used or collected in whole or in part for" various permissible purposes. n7 A consumer report thus includes information provided over the telephone, through the mails, or by electronic means. However, information about the consumer that is collected and kept on file, but not communicated to a third party, is not a consumer report. The disclosure to the consumer of information in her file may also not be a consumer report. n8 Instead, it is a consumer file subject to the FCRA's dispute and reinvestigation procedures. n9

If some information contained in a report was contained in a prior consumer report, the new report is also a consumer report, regardless of whether the new report was used or expected to be used for a permissible purpose. n10 If a consumer reporting agency provides a report with the expectation that it will be used for one of the statute's permissible purposes, the report is a consumer report under the Act; the ultimate use to which it is put is irrelevant. n11 It is enough if one of the anticipated uses is covered by the FCRA, even if it is not the primary expected use.

The standard is one of reasonable expectations; that is, whether a reporting agency knows or should reasonably anticipate the use. n12 If information is originally collected for a purpose covered by the FCRA, a report containing that information remains a consumer report even if the report is later used exclusively for purposes not covered by the FCRA. n13

If information from the consumer file enters the business file, or if information from the business file is put to a consumer purpose, then all future information from the business file will consist of consumer reports as well. n14

To be a consumer report, information must be used or expected to be used or collected at least in part for the purpose of serving as a factor in establishing the consumer's eligibility n15 for (1) credit or insurance to be used primarily for personal, family or household purposes, or (2) employment purposes, or (3) other permissible purposes authorized under the FCRA (15 U.S.C. section 1681b). n16 The "permissible purposes" section adds five additional permissible purposes for using consumer reports: to establish eligibility for government licenses and other benefits; for use by public officials to establish child support payment levels; to respond to a legitimate business need for the information in connection with a business transaction that is initiated by the consumer; to assess prepayment and credit risk associated with a current obligation; and to review existing accounts. n17

[b] Credit, Check Guarantee Businesses, and Tenant Reports

"Credit" is defined in the FCRA n18 to have the same meaning as in the Equal Credit Opportunity Act (ECOA), which defines credit as "the right granted by a creditor to a debtor to defer payment of debt or to incur debts and defer its payment or to purchase property or services and defer payment therefore." n19

There is no requirement in the ECOA that the credit be for personal, family, or household purposes. n20 Moreover, the "personal, family or household purposes" limitation of section 1681a does not appear in section 1681b.

Check guarantee businesses collect credit information on consumers from a variety of sources and, upon request, either approve or disapprove check transactions between consumers and merchants, landlords and commercial establishments. If the check approval company approves a check, it will guarantee the check against nonpayment. Both the courts and the FTC have decided that a consumer report is implicated when a check approval company, such as Uni-Check or RENTCHECK, furnishes to merchants or landlords lists of consumers with bad check cashing histories or other information which a business would use in determining whether to accept consumers' checks tendered in transactions primarily for personal, family, or household purposes. n21 In addition, banks use check approval companies to find out whether an applicant for a checking account owes a previous bank for charges related to a checking account, and may refuse to open an account if the company reports such charges. If the checking account is sought primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, the check approval company's report should be considered a consumer report. Another variation of a check approval company is TELE-TRACK, a company that specializes in providing information to rent-to-own stores and other sub-prime merchants and lenders. Unlike traditional credit reporting agencies, this company maintains a database containing only negative information. In addition to reporting on those who have written bad checks, it also reports on consumers who purportedly have not paid rent, used false social security numbers, have stolen merchandise or automobiles or have not met terms under finance or service agreements with merchants. n22

A consumer reporting agency that maintains files on consumers' check-writing histories will now also qualify as a "nationwide specialty consumer reporting agency," a new subclass of agencies added to the FCRA by the FACTA. n23

Tenant reports compiled by tenant screening companies are consumer reports under the Act. n24 Courts have generally

reached this conclusion because the reports involve consumer credit, n25 while the FTC has relied only on the fact that the reports relate to information used in a business transaction for personal, family or household purposes. n26 Tenant reports also meet the definition of consumer report because they typically "bear" on the consumer's creditworthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living. n27

The distinction between credit (the courts) and non-credit (the FTC) is not without consequence: notice of adverse actions is required for credit transactions based on information from a person other than a consumer reporting agency but not for business transactions for personal, family or household purposes and, on the other hand, credit reports may be obtained to help collect or review a credit account (debt) but not a business transaction.

Now, a consumer reporting agency that complies and maintains files on consumers on a nationwide basis relating to their residential or tenant history will be a "nationwide specialty consumer reporting agency," a new subclass of agency added to the FCRA by the FACTA. n28

[c] Business Reports

The FCRA does not cover reports on businesses or other commercial entities. n29 The proper test is whether the information was originally collected, used, or expected to be used for one or more of the permissible purposes enumerated in the Act. If it was gathered for such purposes or ever used for such purposes, the information remains a consumer report even when later used for business purposes. n30 In addition, information collected regarding a commercial transaction may be considered a consumer report if it is later used for consumer purposes regarding an individual. n30.1 On the other hand, if an individual is liable on a business' debt, and that information is reported on the individual, that is a consumer report. Information on a consumer is a consumer report even if the information relates to a business.

[d] Insurance Reports

The term consumer report includes a report to establish the consumer's eligibility for insurance to be used primarily for personal, family, or household purposes. n31 In addition, section 1681b(a)(3)(C) permits the use of consumer reports "in connection with underwriting insurance involving the consumer." These two provisions dealing with permissible insurance purposes can probably be read together harmoniously. n32 Information collected, used, and expected to be used solely for other kinds of insurance underwriting purposes than for underwriting personal insurance, such as to help an insurer decide whether to offer commercial risk insurance on an individual or a business, is not covered. n33

Eligibility for insurance coverage is different from eligibility for insurance benefits. n34 The FTC staff also maintains that the issuance of insurance benefits, which is what claims reports are usually used for, is not a business transaction involving the consumer. n35

Nevertheless, if a claims report includes information originally collected for consumer reporting purposes or originally used (or later used) for underwriting purposes, it is then a consumer report. n36 An insurance claims exchange, comprised of a group of insurance underwriters and adjusters who exchange information on consumers' prior claims in determining eligibility for insurance, issues consumer reports. n37

Health and life insurers have increasingly begun using medical information held in enormous databases on hundreds of millions of Americans, such as prescription drug information and data from clinical and pathological laboratories, in making eligibility and underwriting decisions. n37.1 This information is aggregated, analyzed, and coded to yield the expected risk that the individual will incur high medical costs or be at higher risk of death or disability.

The FCRA prohibits use of medical information for purposes of determining eligibility for credit, but not for insurance. Though use of this information raises privacy concerns, its use for insurance eligibility purposes is a permissible purpose, and these health credit reports are consumer reports subject to the protections of the FCRA. n37.2

[e] Employment Reports, Governmental Licenses and Benefits, Government Determination of Child Support Payment Levels

Consumer reports used for "employment purposes" n38 include evaluations of the consumer for "employment, promotion, reassignment or retention as an employee." n39 Employers that use consumer reports are required to certify that the consumer has authorized the use of the report and that prior to taking adverse action, the employer will provide the consumer with a copy of the report and a summary of the consumer's rights. In addition, a reporting agency which uses adverse public record information in a consumer report must either provide a separate notice to the consumer n40 or maintain strict procedures to ensure that the public record information is complete and up to date. Reporting agencies also furnish consumer reports when used in connection with a "determination of the consumer's eligibility for a license or other benefit granted by a governmental instrumentality required by law to consider an applicant's financial responsibility or status." n41 A consumer report may include reports used to determine the consumer's eligibility for a government license, even where the agency is not required by law to consider an applicant's financial responsibility or status in determining whether to grant the license. n42 Reporting agencies may furnish consumer reports to government officials for use in establishing a person's capacity to make child support payments or in determining levels of child support awards. n43

The 2003 amendments to the FCRA pulled out a large chunk of employment reports from the definition of consumer report. n44 Congress, responding to employers' complaints that the FCRA's disclosure provisions hindered investigations of workplace misconduct, amended the Act to provide that certain communications made to an employer will no longer be "consumer reports." To qualify, the communication must be in connection with the investigation of either suspected misconduct by an employee or compliance with federal, state, or local laws and regulations, the rules of a self-regulatory organization, or any preexisting written policies of the employer. n45 As a safeguard, the provision requires that, to qualify for the exclusion, the communication must not have been made for the purpose of investigating the employee's credit worthiness, credit standing, or credit capacity, and the communication must not be provided to any person other than the employer, the employer's agent, a governmental agency, or a self-regulatory organization. n46 If made for any of those purposes the communication will lose its exemption and remain a consumer report. Furthermore, the FCRA does maintain some regulation over such reports, notwithstanding that they are not "consumer reports"; an employer who takes any adverse action based in whole or in part on the exempted communication must disclose to the consumer a summary of the communication, although the employer need not disclose any sources of information for use in preparing what would be, except for the exception, an investigative consumer report. n47

[f] Other Business Transactions Initiated by the Consumer

Another permissible purpose in the definition of a consumer report includes information collected for or used by a person who "otherwise has a legitimate business need for the information in connection with a business transaction that is initiated by the consumer." n48 This section refers to a business' need for information about the consumer in a transaction in the ordinary course of the business' affairs. The relationship between the consumer and the user of the credit report must involve a potential transaction or consumer relationship, n49 and, more explicitly, one initiated by the consumer. n50 Examples of permissible purposes related to business transactions for personal, family or household purposes include applications to rent an apartment, offers to pay for goods by check, applications for checking accounts or similar services, applications for inclusion in a computer dating service, situations involving the refusal to return over-payments of government benefits, n51 and applications for land contracts (even if the contract is not treated as an application for credit). n52

Some courts deny that the business purpose provision applies to the definition of consumer report, linking the cross-reference to other purposes in section 1681b only to governmental benefits. n53 The FTC Commentary squarely rejects this approach, n54 which ignores the statute's plain language n55 and provides no explanation for the inclusion of licensing, but the exclusion of business purposes, among the purposes for a consumer report. n56

The FTC Commentary has rejected one possible application of a consumer report: law enforcement bulletins regarding individuals wanted for alleged crimes are not consumer reports because they are not collected for consumer purposes and it cannot be reasonably anticipated that they will be used for such purposes. n57

[g] Account Review and Risk Assessment of Current Obligations

The final permissible purposes of a consumer report include the collection or use of information to review current accounts or to assess the risk associated with an existing credit obligation. Prior to the enactment of the Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996, consumer reports could be used to review credit accounts. n58 The Reform Act allows access to consumer reports to review non-credit accounts as well. n59

The 1996 Reform Act also added a provision permitting consumer reports to be used by a potential investor or servicer, or current insurer, in connection with a valuation of, or an assessment of the credit or prepayment risks associated with, an existing credit obligation. n60 Consumer contracts are bought and sold in the marketplace by investors, and consumer home mortgages are often serviced by specialty companies who bill and collect monthly payments and manage related escrow accounts.

Some credit reporting agencies offer an inquiry notification service to their subscribers, offering to report when a third party inquires about a consumer whose report the subscriber had at one time requested. It has been held that if the agency collects the information contained within an inquiry report the inquiries and identifying information--for one of the permissible purposes of section 1681(b), or if the agency expects such a report to be used for one of those purposes, the inquiry report is a consumer report and subject to the FCRA's protections. n61 Accordingly, these inquiry alert services should be considered as offering consumer reports and should be subject to all the prerequisites of any other consumer report. Although the subscriber's use of the report may possibly be permitted by the risk assessment purpose, an agency may only furnish the inquiry report if it has reason to believe the subscriber is going to use the report for that purpose, and without a request from the subscriber the agency arguably has no basis to assign any expectation of purpose to the use of the inquiry report.

[3] Statutory Exemptions to Definition of Consumer Report

Information which relates solely to a reporting agency's first-hand experience with the consumer is not covered by the definition of a consumer report. n62 This statutory exception allows persons doing business with the consumer to exchange "trade experience" and to provide such information to consumer reporting agencies without becoming consumer reporting agencies under the Act. n63

The definition of a consumer report specifically excludes the direct or indirect approval, by the issuer of a credit card or similar device, of a specific extension of credit. n64 If a merchant refuses to extend credit directly to a consumer because a credit card issuer has denied authorization of a credit card transaction between the merchant and the consumer, it may be that the merchant is not denying credit on the basis of a consumer report, and may not have to comply with the obligations of users of consumer reports.

The Act's definition of "consumer report" excludes:

> "any report in which a person who has been requested by a third party to make a specific extension of credit directly or indirectly to a consumer conveys his decision with respect to such request, if the third party advises the consumer of the name and address of the person to whom the request was made and such person makes the disclosures to the consumer required under section 1681m of the title." n65

This exemption covers attempts by retailers to obtain credit for their customers from an outside source (such as a bank or a finance company), either by requesting that the financial institution extend credit directly to the consumer or purchase the retail sales agreement from the dealer.

The Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996 excludes from the definition of consumer report certain common communications made by employment agencies. n66 The exclusion applies only if three criteria are met. First, the communication must otherwise satisfy the definition of an investigative consumer report. Second, the communication must be made either for the purpose of procuring an employee for the employer, or for the purpose of procuring an opportunity for a consumer to work for the employer, and, furthermore, the communication may not be used by any person for any other purpose. Third, the consumer must consent to the communication and receive certain disclosures from the agency. n67

The Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996 also excludes from the definition of a consumer report two types of information communicated among persons related by common ownership or affiliated by corporate control. n68 The first type of excluded information is information based on first hand experience of one of the affiliates. The second type is any other information shared by affiliates, provided that the sharing is disclosed to the consumer and the consumer is given the opportunity to direct that the information not be shared among related entities. n69

However, the 2003 revisions to the FCRA allow consumers to prohibit an affiliate from using information for solicitation for marketing purposes when that information avoids being a consumer report due to the affiliate exception n70 and allowed the right to opt out of such solicitations that lasts for five years and can be renewed. n71 However, the new provision dilutes the opt-out right by exempting a number of solicitations, including solicitations by an entity that has a pre-existing business relationship with the consumer, solicitations to facilitate communications to an individual to whom the entity provides employment benefit or similar services, and solicitations to perform services on behalf of an affiliate. n72

FACTA provided the FTC and other interested agencies with rulemaking authority concerning FACTA's affiliate marketing provisions. Pursuant to this authority, the FTC issued a proposed rule that in general prohibits a company from using certain information received from an affiliate to market products or services to a consumer, unless the consumer first has been given notice and an opportunity to opt out of receiving such solicitations. n73 The new affiliate marketing opt-out does not supersede or replace the affiliate sharing opt-out contained in FCRA § 1681a, although there is some overlap between the two opt-out requirements. n74

FACTA also amended the FCRA to exclude from the definition of consumer report certain communications made to an employer concerning investigations for employee misconduct or for compliance reasons. n75 Under this exclusion, even if a particular report would otherwise be a consumer report, it will fall outside of the definition by virtue of being specifically excluded. n76 To be excluded, the communication must be made to an employer and must be in connection with an investigation of one of the following: n77

- Suspected misconduct relating to employment;
- Compliance with federal, state, or local laws;
- Compliance with the rules of a self-regulatory organization; or
- Compliance with the preexisting written policies of the employer.

To limit the exclusion's scope, the FCRA further requires that the communication must not be for the purpose of investigating a consumer's creditworthiness, credit standing, or credit capacity (in other words, the communication must only bear on the employee's character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living). These limitations appear designed so that consumer credit reports from credit bureaus will not fall within the exclusion. However, one court has held that even a traditional credit report is not considered to be a consumer report as a result of this provision, if it is used in connection with an employee misconduct investigation. n78

[4] The Consumer Reporting Agency

A consumer reporting agency must be a person, but "person" is broadly defined to include any individual, partnership, corporation, trust, estate, cooperative, association, government or governmental subdivision or agency, or other entity. n79 A consumer reporting agency assembles information for monetary fees, dues, or on a cooperative nonprofit basis. n80

The person must "regularly engage" in consumer reporting activities, and the practice engaged in must involve the assembly or evaluation of the information reported to third parties. n81 Under the Truth in Lending Act, which requires that a business "regularly extends" credit in order to be covered by the Act, n82 the standard set by regulation is roughly whether one extended credit more than twenty-five times a year. n83 Prior to that regulation, the standard applied was whether the extension of credit was more than "an occasional, isolated, and incidental portion" of the business' activities. n84

[5] Furnishing Consumer Reports to Third Party

The most critical part of the definition of a consumer reporting agency is the requirement that the business be gathering information to furnish consumer reports to third parties. If a company uses its own employees to gather and report information for itself, the employees are not consumer reporting agencies. n85 An independent contractor, when reporting information back to the company that hired her, may be a consumer reporting agency, even when the same report by a company employee would not be covered. Cooperative loan exchanges (offices that maintain information on applications for loans, names of finance companies, names of consumers, and amount of credit requested or extended) are consumer reporting agencies when they give this information to a finance company. n86

[6] Exception for Joint Lenders

When the person furnishing the report and the party receiving the report are joint lenders or joint users of the report, the furnisher of the report is not a credit reporting agency. n87 The joint-user exception also applies to other parties whose approval is needed before a lender grants credit, n88 and where the consumer asks one lender to forward information to a second creditor in connection with the second creditor's evaluation of the consumer's loan application. n89 The joint use exception should not apply where the information is shared for a subsequent transaction where the parties no longer share in the decision-making. n90

[7] Government Agencies

According to the FTC, government agencies such as the Office of Personnel Management and "similar federal agencies" do not fall within the scope of a consumer reporting agency. n91 Similarly, the Ninth Circuit has held that the FTC's exemption applies to all federal agencies, finding no legislative intent to cover such agencies. n92

A "consumer reporting agency" is defined in the FCRA as a "person," n93 and the definition of a "person" includes a "government or governmental subdivision or agency." n94 The FTC has made clear that state and local government entities, unlike federal agencies, can be consumer reporting agencies. But reports made by motor vehicle departments to other governmental authorities involved in licensing or law enforcement activities are not consumer reports because the definition of a consumer report does not include information passed between two governmental entities. n95

Some states have begun allowing private entities electronic access to state unemployment insurance wage reporting records for the purpose of consumer credit verification, and, by doing so, have become credit reporting agencies. n96 In addition, some state agencies provide criminal record information to employers. FTC staff have suggested that these agencies are not thereby credit reporting agencies, although no statutory language providing such an exemption is evident and no court has addressed the issue. n97

States and their respective agencies are protected by sovereign immunity. Under the Eleventh Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, states, as sovereigns, are immune from suit in federal court absent consent or a valid abrogation of that immunity by Congress. n98 This immunity extends to state agencies as well. n99 Since Congress enacted the FCRA under the Commerce Clause, it was not empowered to abrogate a state's Eleventh Amendment immunity through the FCRA. n100 As a result, neither a state nor its officers acting in their official capacities may be held liable for money damages. However, injunctive relief may be available against state officials when they are sued in their official capacity. n101

[8] "Nationwide" Reporting Agencies

So-called "nationwide" reporting agencies have a special meaning within the FCRA to which a few unique obligations attach. Nationwide agencies, as defined by the Act, include the "Big Three" reporting agencies: Equifax, Experian, and Trans Union. n102 The significance of being a "nationwide" agency is limited. The Summary of Consumer Rights provided to consumers by reporting agencies and others must include a toll-free telephone number for nationwide agencies where appropriate. n103 A user that provides an adverse notice to a consumer because it used information from a nationwide agency must provide a toll-free number for that agency. n104 The nationwide agencies must jointly maintain a notification system for consumers to opt-out of certain junk mail or prescreening mailings. n105 The nationwide agencies must also maintain an automated reinvestigation system so that the results of a furnisher's reinvestigation are reported to all the nationwide agencies as appropriate. n106 The FACTA of 2003 imposed new obligations that are specific to nationwide agencies, including obligations to insert fraud and active military duty alerts to consumer files; n107 to refer alerts to other such agencies; n108 review complaints of inaccuracy compiled by and transmitted by the FTC, n109 provide free annual disclosures of consumer reports to consumers, n110 coordinate consumer complaints of identity theft and requesting fraud alerts or blocks, n111 and report annually to the FTC on consumer identity theft complaints and fraud alerts. n112 Nationwide consumer reporting agencies are now also specifically prohibited from using corporate or technological means to try to circumvent these new responsibilities. n113

The FACTA also created a new category called "nationwide specialty consumer reporting agencies," defined as consumer reporting agencies that compile and maintain files on a nationwide basis relating to consumers' medical records or payments, residential or tenant histories, check-writing histories, employment histories, or insurance claims. n114 The significance of being a nationwide specialty consumer reporting agency is that such agencies, like nationwide general consumer reporting agencies, n115 must provide a free credit report. n116

[a] FTC Circumvention Rule

Pursuant to FACTA, the FTC issued a final interim circumvention rule that prohibits nationwide agencies from certain types of conduct that would circumvent their responsibilities as nationwide consumer reporting agencies. The FTC rule prohibits circumvention through any means, including but not limited to corporate organization, reorganization, structuring, or restructuring, or by maintaining or merging public record and credit account information in a manner that is substantially equivalent to a nationwide agency. The rule applies to nationwide agencies that regularly engage in the practice of assembling or evaluating, and maintaining, for the purpose of furnishing consumer reports to third parties bearing on a consumer's credit worthiness, credit standing, or credit capacity, public record information and credit account information from furnishers. n117

Nationwide consumer reporting agencies have always been subjected to special obligations, in addition to those placed on all consumer reporting agencies. Prior to FACTA, nationwide agencies were required to: (1) participate in a joint opt-out notification system for prescreened credit or insurance offers; n118 (2) maintain a toll-free telephone number during normal business hours with personnel accessible to consumers who have received their file disclosures; n119 and (3) utilize an automated system though which furnishers of information may report reinvestigation results. n120

FACTA specifically describes two types of conduct that Congress intended to prevent through the circumvention rule. The first type is corporate reorganization or restructuring, including a merger, acquisition, dissolution, divestiture, or asset sale of a consumer reporting agency. n121 The second type is "maintaining or merging public record and credit account information in a manner that is substantially equivalent to that described in § 1681a(p) of the FCRA."

The FTC also included three examples of conduct it believed would violate the circumvention rule and one example which would not. The first example is of a nationwide agency that restructures its operations so that public record information is assembled and maintained only by its corporate affiliate and the nationwide agency ceases to comply with the requirements for nationwide agencies because it no longer maintains public records. n122 The second example is of a nationwide agency that restructures its operations so that corporate affiliates separately assemble and maintain information in each state and the corporation ceases to comply with the requirements for nationwide agencies. This conduct would be a violation of the rule. n123

The third example is of a new entrant into the marketplace for consumer reports that organizes itself into two entities. One entity assembles and maintains credit account information from furnishers. The second entity assembles and maintains public record information. Neither the corporation nor its affiliated entities comply with the requirements for nationwide agencies. n124 This conduct would also violate the rule.

The final example deals with a bona fide, arms-length transaction with an unaffiliated party. A nationwide agency sells its public record information business to an unaffiliated company in a bona fide arms-length transaction. The nationwide agency ceases to assemble and maintain public record information and ceases to offer reports containing public information. This conduct would not be a violation of the circumvention rule. n125

A violation of the FTC Circumvention Rule could subject the violating CRA to liability pursuant to sections 1681n and 1681o of the FCRA. There appears to be no limitation on private enforcement of these requirements. The FTC Circumvention Rule provides a safe harbor that provides that any CRA which is otherwise in violation of the rule shall be deemed in compliance if the CRA complies with all of the responsibilities that the FCRA imposes on nationwide CRAs. n126

[9] Examples of Consumer Reporting Agencies

[a] General

In addition to the "Big Three" credit bureaus and the hundreds of smaller credit bureaus around the country, other companies and organizations may fall within the definition of a consumer reporting agency. Inspection bureaus, which assist insurance companies and employers with investigative reports, as well as medical information agencies, which assist in insurance underwriting, are consumer reporting agencies, n127 as are tenant screening companies, and check approval companies.

"Superbureaus" such as Inter-Fact, Inc., I.R.S.C, and W.D.I.A. Corp., buy large volumes of consumer reports at discount rates from the major credit bureaus and resell the data to lower volume buyers. To the extent that the superbureaus buy and sell consumer reports, they are consumer reporting agencies subject to all relevant FCRA requirements. n128

In response to the growing e-commerce market, companies such as CyberSource have started collecting and analyzing data from web merchants, and profiling consumers based on all of their purchase transactions for such characteristics as potential for fraud. Subscribers send the information of a potential customer to the service, which then returns a risk evaluation, which may just be a number between 0 and 99. n129 These companies also meet the definition of consumer reporting agencies. n130

[b] Creditors as Reporting Agencies

Excluded from the definition of consumer reporting agency is a financial institution which reports its credit decision to a dealer who requested that the financial institution extend credit to the consumer or purchase a retail sales agreement from the dealer. A creditor that reports only information about its own experience with a consumer is not issuing a "consumer report," according to a specific exemption from the Act, n131 and so is not a consumer reporting agency when it reports its own experience about a consumer to a reporting agency. If, however, the creditor reports any information other than that obtained from its first-hand dealings with the consumer, it does become a consumer reporting agency subject to the Act.

A creditor that obtains consumer reports from consumer reporting agencies, in connection with making credit decisions, is not a consumer reporting agency itself when it releases copies of those reports to rejected credit applicants. n132 A retailer, however, whose customers finance purchases through a bank, becomes a consumer reporting agency when (to avoid paying a fee to the bank) the retailer obtains information from the customers' references and furnishes it to the bank, which then decides whether to extend credit. n133

[c] Collection Agencies and Credit Bureau Collection Departments

A collection agency that provides information about a consumer's debt to a third person may be a consumer reporting agency, n134 particularly where the collection agency regularly furnishes information outside its own experience with the consumer for use in connection with consumer transactions. n135

[d] Detective and Employment Agencies, Employers

An employment agency that prepares lists containing names of employees fired for cause is a reporting agency. n136 As a result of the Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996, however, many communications by employment agencies that were considered consumer reports are excluded from the definition of a consumer report.

Private investigators and detective agencies that regularly obtain information about prospective employees or other information in connection with a consumer report, and furnish that information to their clients, become consumer reporting agencies. n137 Investigators hired by an employer to investigate an employee's possible misconduct or even allegations of sexual harassment also will be a consumer reporting agency. The investigator's report is often likely to be an investigative consumer report. n138 If an employer itself asks friends, neighbors, co-workers, and associates about an applicant, however, the employer is not a consumer reporting agency because it is not a business gathering information for the purpose of furnishing a report to third parties. n139

An attorney searching land records may be a consumer reporting agency if he or she is looking for information that bears on creditworthiness, such as the existence of liens, judgments and other items affecting title, and renders an opinion that is used by third parties, such as lenders and title insurance companies, in determining whether to grant credit or insurance. n140 Also, an attorney who requests a consumer report on potential buyers to help his or her client decide which home-purchase offer to accept, when the attorney knows the buyer is going to borrow money, is a consumer reporting agency. n141 An attorney who regularly checks criminal records of a client's potential employees may be subject to the FCRA. n142 However, an attorney who merely furnishes information about a particular debt to his client without assembling or evaluating information is not a consumer reporting agency. n143

[f] College Placement Offices

A college placement office may be a consumer reporting agency if it collects and disburses information for a fee or on a cooperative nonprofit basis, and if the reports contain information not based on its own transactions or experiences with the consumer. n144

[g] Accident Reporting Bureaus and Compilers of Insurance Claim Lists

A plan to compile a listing of policyholders who have received auto claim payments in the past would render the compiler a consumer reporting agency. n145 Accident bureaus that sell motor vehicle operating records to insurance companies may be consumer reporting agencies, n146 but not the police or sheriff's departments which prepare accident reports. n147 State motor vehicle departments are consumer reporting agencies when selling information to private parties, but not when cooperating with other government agencies. n148

Insurance claim reports are generally not considered consumer reports after the reports are compiled and used by insurance companies (or adjusters) to adjust claims made by insureds. n149 If, however, the reports are furnished for use in insurance underwriting, the compilers would be consumer reporting agencies. n150

[h] Telephone Companies

When a telephone company reports to others concerning its own experience with its own customers, a consumer report is not involved. n151 Nevertheless, local companies, long-distance companies, and other companies exchange information on customers. For example, long-distance and 900-number companies bill through local telephone companies.

If a telephone company reports information on a customer not based on its own experience, but on the experience of another company, it is acting as a reporting agency. For example, if a consumer's old local telephone company reports to the consumer's new local telephone company the experience of a long-distance carrier with that consumer, the consumer's old local company is acting as a consumer reporting agency within the scope of the FCRA. Similarly, if various telephone companies pool information in a centralized fashion, the central repository may be a reporting agency. Both situations are common. n152

(n72)Footnote 69. A common example of affiliate sharing occurs when a bank shares information about account holders and other customers with insurance or investment brokers and sellers affiliated with the bank. The bank may freely share customer lists and information relating to a customer's account. As first hand information, no disclosure to the consumer is required. The bank can also share information about a consumer's personal finances and transactions with other creditors which is gleaned from the consumer's application for credit submitted to the bank. Because this information is not first hand experience of the bank, the bank must give the consumer prior notice that this kind of information may be shared with an affiliate. See Novak, FTC Informal Staff Opinion Letter, Sept. 9, 1998.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

1-16 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 16.03

§ 16.03 Disclosure of Consumer Reports to Consumers

[1] Information Is Reported on Virtually Every American

Virtually all Americans have files with reporting agencies. For millions of Americans, some information on file will be negative. It is also probable that some negative information will be inaccurate. While errors can often be corrected, only a small percentage of consumers ever examine the contents of their files.

The solution is simple. Consumers have a right to be informed of the contents, sources and users of their files. The consumer need not wait to be told of the adverse use of the file or that a creditor has requested information on the consumer. In many cases consumers may obtain their files by calling an 800-number or writing a single letter.

There is one important reason to consider not requesting disclosure of a consumer's file. The FCRA prevents a consumer from bringing most tort actions in the nature of defamation, invasion of privacy, or negligence with respect to the reporting of information based on information disclosed pursuant to the consumer's request from the agency for the contents of his or her file. n1 In other words, a consumer cannot bring most tort claims concerning information in a file after the consumer has exercised the FCRA right to request the contents of that file. The consumer cannot avoid this result by requesting that the file be disclosed to the consumer's attorney or other representative. n2 The FCRA has always provided consumers with the right to learn what is in their consumer files. This right was enhanced in 2003 when FACTA required the FTC to adopt regulations that establish a centralized source from which consumers may request a free annual file disclosure from each nationwide consumer reporting agency. This right is in addition to other rights to free reports provided by the FCRA before it was amended by FACTA and rights provided by certain state laws.

The FTC rules required nationwide consumer reporting agencies to establish a centralized source to enable consumers, with a single request, to obtain all annual file disclosures from all nationwide consumer reporting agencies. Under the rule, consumers may request their free annual file disclosure from each of the nationwide consumer reporting agencies through a centralized Internet website, toll-free telephone number, and postal address. n3 The rule also requires a standardized form for making requests and requires a streamlined process for consumer requests. n4 The obligations of the nationwide consumer reporting agencies are limited when the volume for disclosures is excessive. The rule permits the agencies to queue requests for disclosures during times of high volume, i.e., volume that exceeds 125% of the rolling daily average volume. It also allows the agencies to decline to accept request during times of extraordinary volume, i.e., volume that exceeds 175% of the rolling daily average volume. n5

The FTC also allowed the consumer reporting agencies to have a gradual roll out of the centralized source. Concerned about the volume of requests, the centralized source is available to consumers in four cumulative stages that roll out from west to east. The rule provided for a transition of nine months, beginning on December 1, 2004 and ending on September 1, 2005. n6

[2] Notices Concerning Information Used or Obtained Relating to Consumer

[a] Types of Notices

Under the FCRA, a consumer may receive several different types of notices regarding the use of personal information by others. The most common is notice that adverse action has occurred based on a consumer report. A different notice may be required when adverse action is based on third party information other than a consumer report. Also, the consumer must be notified when information which has been previously deleted from a consumer's file as a result of a reinvestigation is nevertheless later re-inserted into the file. The FCRA was amended in 2003 by the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act, n7 which contains additional notice requirements on a variety of subjects, including identity theft, risk-based pricing, negative information furnished by financial institutions to credit reporting agencies, key factors in credit scores, fraud alerts, blocks for identity theft information, and credit scores.

Consumers need not receive any of the notices in order to obtain disclosure of the contents of their file.

[b] When Notice of Adverse Use of Consumer Report Is Required

[i] Overview

The user n8 of a consumer report is required to notify a consumer whenever adverse action is based in whole or in part on any information contained in a consumer report. n9 The FCRA also does not state how quickly the user must provide the notice of adverse action. n10 Presumably, the notice should be simultaneous with notice of the denial or increased charge. n11

As long as the report led to the adverse action, the user must notify the consumer that the report was one of the grounds for the adverse action. It is irrelevant that the report itself is not seriously adverse to the consumer. n12 Indeed, the consumer report need not be the single or primary reason for an adverse action; the user must provide notice if the consumer report provided any grounds for the adverse action. n13

Notice is not required, however, if a user took an adverse action based on information obtained from a source other than a consumer report, even if the user received a consumer report that contained some of that information. n14

[ii] Where Adverse Use Relates to Credit Purposes

The FCRA includes in its definition of "adverse action" the definition set forth in the Equal Credit Opportunity Act ("ECOA"). Interpretations of the ECOA on what constitutes adverse action directly apply. n15

"Credit" is not defined in the FCRA. The ECOA defines the term broadly to mean the right to defer payment of debt or to incur debts and defer payment. n16

Notice should be provided even if credit is denied not for any specific reason, but because the consumer's score was below the creditor's minimum standards, as long as a credit report had some relevance to the establishment of the consumer's score. n17

Because of the number of terms involved in a credit transaction, questions arise as to when credit as requested has been denied. Clearly, notice is required where credit is denied outright, where less credit is provided than requested, where an increase in the amount of credit is denied, or where the charge for the credit is increased. n18

A larger down payment could result in a lower charge for the credit, but notice is still required. Similarly, a notice will be required where a bank, based on a consumer report, requires the consumer to obtain a cosigner or put up collateral, even if the bank then lowers the interest rate because of the lower risk of the loan as restructured. Any refusal to grant credit on the terms originally requested by the consumer should be a denial of credit which requires notice of adverse action.

Some courts have ruled that there is no denial if the consumer accepts a counteroffer made by the creditor, n19 but such a conclusion is not necessarily controlling and arguments can be made that acceptance of counteroffer terms adverse to the consumer still violate the FCRA. There is also no adverse action if credit is denied because the creditor does not provide the kind of credit plan requested by the consumer.

[iii] Check Cashing Reports

A merchant's denial of check writing privileges based on a check cashing report is an adverse action requiring notice to the consumer. n20 This is because the consumer's proffer of a personal check can be considered either an application to make payment by check or an essential element of a purchase transaction initiated by the consumer. Either way, the merchant, as user of a check cashing report, would have to notify the consumer of the adverse action based on a consumer report.

[iv] Cosigners

Often in consumer credit transactions, more than one party signs a credit application--as a co-maker, guarantor or surety. The disclosures which must be made to the primary applicant for credit must also be made to any co-maker, guarantor, or surety to whom the information relates. n21

[v] Prescreening

Prescreening is the process whereby consumer reporting agencies compile or edit lists of consumers who meet specific criteria, often specified by the user, and then provide the lists to users who solicit consumers with firm offers for credit and insurance purposes.

Creditors often offer credit to those on a mailing list that has been prescreened by a reporting agency. The FTC has indicated that users of prescreening lists need not notify those deleted from the list that a consumer report has led to denial of credit because such people did not request, and, therefore, were not denied credit. n22

[vi] When Adverse Use Relates to Employment Purposes

Prior to the FACTA, n23 notice of adverse action was required whenever adverse employment decisions were based, at least in part, on consumer reports. Additional disclosures prior to the adverse action were required as well. However, the FACTA significantly reduced the circumstances in which adverse action notices will be given to employees.

Before the FACTA, employers were required to give notice of adverse action whenever they made any employment decision that was adverse to the interests of the consumer and which either 1) used the consumer's credit information, or 2) was based on the use of an investigative report to make the decision. n24

The FACTA does not change the requirement that employers provide adverse action notices (or other notices required by the FCRA) to 1) consumers who are being investigated for a new position or a new job by a third party hired by the employer for that purpose, or 2) any consumers, whether they are existing employees or not, whom the employer decides to evaluate via a consumer credit report in the employment context. As before, employers are required to disclose their reliance on a consumer report--or a third-party investigative report--any time they deny initial employment, promotion, or job transfer to an employee. n25

However, there are new requirements of the FACTA of 2003 for all adverse actions which are applicable to employers' investigations of existing employees. In response to employers' complaints that the FCRA's disclosure provisions hindered investigations of workplace misconduct, the FACTA provides that certain communications made to an employer will no longer be "consumer reports." n26 Because of this new exemption, even if a particular investigation would otherwise be an investigative consumer report, it will fall outside of the definition by virtue of being specifically exempted from the definition of "consumer report." n27 To fall within the exclusion the communication must be made to an employer and must be in connection with an investigation of one of the following:

- suspected misconduct relating to employment;
- compliance with federal, state, or local laws;
- compliance with the rules of a self-regulatory organization; or
- compliance with the preexisting written policies of the employer. n28

Accordingly, for investigations that meet the exemption, upon adverse action the employee will not be entitled to the standard adverse action notice of § 1681m. Instead, these employees will have the right to a summary of the report and not to a Summary of Rights. n29 In contrast to other employment-related investigations, the employer need not provide any notice beforehand. n30

In addition to the notice of adverse action which is required when an adverse action is taken, an employer intending to take adverse action based at least in part on a consumer report must provide to the consumer beforehand a copy of the consumer report itself and a FTC Summary of Consumer Rights. n31 This prior disclosure is unique to employment decisions.

The FCRA generally excludes from the definition of consumer report information communicated by an employment agency to a prospective employer. Thus, the employer who declines to hire a consumer recommended by an employment agency, even if the decision is based on information gleaned by the agency from a consumer report, is normally not required to make any disclosure of adverse action.

Even if an employer or employment agency has no duty in certain situations to disclose use of a consumer report to the consumer, the FCRA requires a consumer reporting agency to notify the consumer whenever the agency provides a consumer report to a user with an employment purpose and the report contains public record information that is likely to have an adverse effect on the consumer's ability to obtain employment. n32 The notice also contains the name and address of the report user. The reporting agency can avoid this disclosure requirement by maintaining strict procedures to insure that the public record information is complete and up to date.

[vii] When Adverse Action Relates to Insurance Purposes

Whenever insurance is denied or the charge for the insurance is increased either wholly or partly because of information contained in a consumer report, the insurer must notify the consumer. Notification is also required for any other adverse or unfavorable change in the terms or amount of insurance. n33 An Alabama district court certified a class action against an insurer who allegedly raised premiums by fifty percent or more in reliance on information contained in consumer reports and allegedly failed to send adverse action notice pursuant to section 1681m. n34 The insurer used Insurance Bureau Codes ("ICBs") as one factor in setting the amounts of homeowners' renewal premiums. ICBs are generated by Fair Issac, Inc. based on information contained in credit reports. n35

Insurers sometimes use CRAs specializing in medical information, such as Medical Information Bureau (MIB), in making their underwriting and ratesetting decisions. For years, MIB argued that insurers that receive MIB information did not have to provide the consumers with an adverse action notice when insurance was denied, or made more expensive, based wholly or in part on an MIB report. However, in 1995, the FTC and MIB agreed to a policy requiring MIB members to inform applicants (1) that insurance had been denied, or made more expensive, because of information obtained from an investigation conducted as a result of MIB information; (2) of the applicant's right to obtain a summary of the MIB report at no charge; and (3) of a street address and telephone number at which the applicant can contact MIB. n35.1

[viii] When Adverse Action Relates to Government Benefits and Licenses

Government agencies, which are required by law to consider an individual applicant's financial responsibility or status in order to determine eligibility for a license or other benefit, may use consumer reports. Whenever such an agency denies, conceals, increases a charge, or otherwise imposes an adverse or unfavorable change in the terms of a license or government benefit, based in whole or in part on a consumer report, the agency must notify the consumer. n36 This notification requirement may arise in a number of common situations, ranging from granting and denying professional licenses to using consumer reports in connection with public housing and welfare benefits.

The most sweeping of all adverse notice provisions requires notification whenever any action adverse to the interests of the consumer is taken in connection with an application made by the consumer or in connection with any transaction initiated by the consumer. n37 Such transactions include a landlord's denial of an apartment rental or decision to increase the required deposit; denial of check writing privileges by merchants or by financial institutions; property sales; investment and other business transactions; as well as a wide array of other potential arrangements which a consumer may seek. When this provision was added in 1966, it removed a number of contentious issues over the Act's scope and coverage and recognized that user notice is fundamentally important in assuring the accuracy of consumer reports.

Many businesses periodically review their accounts to determine whether consumers continue to meet account requirements. If a user has relied upon a consumer report to take an adverse action with respect to a consumer's account, the user must notify the consumer. n38

[c] Enforcement of Right

The FACTA amendments to the FCRA in 2003 cast serious doubt upon the ability of consumers to privately enforce the adverse action notice requirements of the FCRA. As part of those amendments, Congress added the following language to 15 U.S.C. § 1681m:

Enforcement

(A) No civil actions

Sections 1681n and 1681o of this title shall not apply to any failure by any person to comply with this section.

(B) Administrative enforcement

This section shall be enforced exclusively under section 1681s of this title by the Federal agencies and officials identified in that section.

Based upon this language, the Seventh Circuit and several district courts have issued decisions concluding that section 1681m is not privately enforceable. n39

[d] Content of Notice of Adverse Use of Consumer Report

[i] Disclosure That Report Was Basis for Adverse Action

The user must advise the consumer that adverse action was based in whole or in part on information contained in a consumer report. n40 The user need not explain what in the report was considered adverse or disclose the contents of the report. The consumer will later have to seek the contents of the report from the reporting agency.

Users must certify to reporting agencies that they will not share information in a report with others, but this does not apply to the sharing of the information with the consumer. n41

Reporting agencies also commonly require agreements with users, which prohibit disclosures of the contents of reports to consumers, but a user may not be prohibited from disclosing the contents of the report, however, if it was a basis for adverse action. n42

While the FCRA notice need not specify the exact reason for the adverse action, creditors must also provide consumers with a notice under the ECOA which will.

[ii] Disclosure of Identity of Reporting Agency

The user must tell the consumer the name and address of the reporting agency which made the report. n43 The user must provide the telephone number of the agency, and in the case of one of the big three nationwide agencies, a toll-free number. n44 This basic information must be accompanied by three additional disclosures:

- Disclosure of the consumer's sixty-day right to a free copy of the report from the reporting agency.
- Disclosure of the consumer's right to dispute with the reporting agency the accuracy or completeness of the report.
- A statement that the reporting agency did not make the adverse decision and will not be able to specify the reasons for it.

[iii] Must Disclosure Be in Writing?

The notice of adverse action and the accompanying disclosures may be provided "orally, in writing, or electronically." n45 The FTC Commentary recommends that the notice be in writing so that users have written evidence that they have taken reasonable steps to comply. n46

The recently enacted Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act ("E-Sign") n47 provides that disclosures required to be made in writing to consumers may be made electronically if several conditions are met. These conditions include informing the consumer as to the rights under the Act, providing a statement of the hardware and software necessary for access and retention of the electronic record, and having the consumer either consent electronically or confirm consent electronically. n48 However, as the FCRA does not require that the adverse action notice and accompanying disclosures be made in writing, and already provides that they may be made electronically without any additional procedures, E-Sign's safeguards likely do not apply to an FCRA-compelled notice or disclosure.

[e] Notice of Adverse Use of Information Other Than Consumer Report

The FCRA places an additional notice requirement on creditors which deny or increase the charge for credit for personal, family, or household purposes based on information obtained from a person other than a reporting agency. n49 The notice does not apply where the creditor obtained the information from its own files or directly from the consumer, but the notice provisions should apply when the creditor obtains information on its own as a result of obtaining information from a consumer reporting agency. n50

Notice of an adverse credit action based on information from a third party other than a reporting agency must either set forth the reasons for the adverse action or clearly and accurately disclose the consumer's right to make a written request within sixty days for the reasons for the adverse action. n51

Within a "reasonable time" after the consumer's written request, the user must disclose the "nature of the information" upon which the adverse action was based. n52 A disclosure which complies with the ECOA satisfies the FCRA as well; n53 the ECOA requires that the statement of reasons contain "specific reasons for the adverse action taken."

Information which is shared among companies affiliated by common ownership or corporate control is excluded from the definition of consumer report and from the protections that normally attach to the use of consumer reports. Even so, notice is required when an adverse action is based on information obtained from the user's affiliate. The affiliate must notify the consumer of the adverse action, and tell the consumer that it will disclose the nature of the information upon which the action was based within thirty days of the consumer's request. n54 There is no requirement that this disclosure be made in writing.

The adverse actions which trigger this notice requirement are less inclusive than when consumer reports provide grounds for an adverse action. Included are credit transactions, but only for adverse actions taken in connection with a transaction initiated by the consumer, employment uses, and uses in connection with insurance underwriting. Excluded are other transactions initiated by consumers; consumer applications; account reviews; and governmental licenses and benefits.

In addition, adverse actions by affiliates are covered only if the information bears on the creditworthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living of the consumer.

[f] ECOA Notices Concerning Adverse Action

The ECOA n55 requires creditors to provide borrowers and potential borrowers with notice of any adverse action taken by the creditor. n56 This notice requirement does not apply to adverse employment or insurance actions.

The ECOA notice must be given within thirty days of a credit application, n57 whereas the FCRA notice should be sent at the same time as the denial, but there is no requirement that the denial meet any time deadlines.

The ECOA notice provides a statement of the action taken, the creditor's name and address, the name and address of the federal agency with enforcement authority of the transaction, and the specific reasons for the action taken or a statement of the applicant's right to a statement of those reasons. n58

Listing only one of several reasons is not sufficient. The creditor must list the principal reasons, although the Federal Reserve Board ("FRB") has suggested that more than four reasons is not likely to be helpful to the applicant. n59

The FRB has provided creditors with a model form that combines both the FCRA notice and the ECOA notice separately on the same disclosure. n60 While the forms are illustrative and not mandatory, proper use of the FRB forms will satisfy the ECOA notice requirement. n61 Compliance with just the FCRA notice requirements will ordinarily not satisfy the ECOA requirement. n62

[i] Users Must Provide Consumers With a Risk-Based Pricing Notice

One problem Congress sought to address with the passage of the FACTA is the frequent occurrences of creditors reviewing consumers' credit reports and making risk-based adjustments to the terms offered to consumers without giving consumers adverse action notices. n63

Consumers now have a right to a new notice relating to risk-based pricing. n64 Whenever a creditor extends credit on terms "materially less favorable than the most favorable terms available to a substantial proportion of consumers," the creditor must provide to consumers a notice that explains that the terms are based on information in a credit report and that the consumers can request a free copy of the report. This notice requirement addresses a current flaw that creditors will use as a basis for arguing that they do not need to provide notice to a consumer when they charge higher-interest fees or other charges based on a credit report. The "risk-based pricing" notice must be given at the time of application or communication of the approval. n65 This notice may be given orally, in writing, or electronically. n66

The FTC and the FRB are to jointly promulgate regulations. These regulations will further define the term "materially less favorable," the required content of the notice, when the notice is required, and what rights the notice triggers. n67 The true meaning of this new requirement will not be apparent until the FTC/FCRA regulations are available. n68

A major drawback to the new risk-based pricing notice requirement is that it can only be enforced through federal agencies and officials under § 1681s of the FCRA, n69 and states are preempted from regulating the subject matter of the provision. n70

[g] Notices Required When a User Has Requested Information

[i] Public Record Information for Employment Purposes

The FCRA establishes a limited disclosure requirement for reporting agencies when they first furnish "items of information on consumers which are matters of public record and are likely to have an adverse effect upon a consumer's ability to obtain employment" n71 or to retain employment or obtain promotion. n72

The reporting agency must comply with at least one of two procedures, neither of which can be waived by the consumer. n73 Most reporting agencies choose to notify the consumer that public record information is being furnished to a user, together with the name and address of the user. n74

The other option is to maintain strict procedures to insure that the public record information is complete and up to date. n75 For arrests, indictments, convictions, suits, tax liens, and outstanding judgments, "up to date" means the status of the item as of the time of the report. n76

[ii] Investigative Consumer Reports

A user who requests an investigative consumer report must disclose to the consumer within three days of the request the existence of the request, the nature of the information sought, and the consumer's right to seek additional disclosures from the user. If the consumer then requests additional disclosure, the user must describe completely and accurately the types of questions asked, the number and types of persons interviewed, and the name and address of the investigating agency. n77 The user need not provide the names of investigative sources.

[iii] Notice When Information Is Used for Prescreening Purposes

A user of a prescreening list must accompany solicitations with certain disclosures which inform consumers that (a) consumer reports have been used, and (b) consumers may take steps to prevent future use. n78 Each written solicitation must include a clear and conspicuous statement containing each of the following items of information:

- Information from the consumer's consumer report has been used;
- The consumer met the criteria for the solicitation;
- Nevertheless, the offered credit or insurance may not be extended if it turns out the consumer does not meet the criteria for the solicitation, if the consumer does not meet any applicable criteria bearing on creditworthiness or insurability, or if the consumer does not furnish any required collateral (this part of the notice is required only if it is applicable);
- The consumer can prohibit the use of information in the consumer's consumer reporting files from being used in future solicitations. The statement must include the toll-free telephone number and address of the notification system which the consumer must notify to opt out of future such solicitations. The consumer's request is valid for only two years, however.

The prescreening use notices are required by section 1681m of the FCRA. Revisions to the FCRA by the FACTA amendments have been interpreted as removing any private rights of action to enforce the provisions of section 1681m or its prescreening notice requirements. n79 As such, the viability of any claims for violation of these notice requirements are in flux. n80

[iv] Notice Required Before Federal Agency May Disclose Debtor Information

The Debt Collection Act amended the Federal Claims Collection Act to authorize federal agencies to disclose debtor information to credit reporting agencies. n81 However, prior to such a disclosure, the head of the agency must notify the consumer in writing that the claim is overdue and that the agency intends to notify a consumer reporting agency of the debt no sooner than sixty days from the date of the notice, and must describe the specific information the agency intends to disclose to the credit reporting agency. n82 The head of the agency must also disclose to the credit reporting agency that it has given the prescribed notice to the consumer. n83 Furthermore, the agency cannot contact a credit reporting agency at all if a repayment plan has been agreed upon or administrative review requested. n84 An agency planning to release information to a credit reporting agency must establish procedures for ensuring that the information held remains accurate and up to date, and for insuring that the consumer reporting agency is complying with the FCRA and other applicable statutes concerning consumer credit information. n85

[h] Notices Required From Users Prior to a Request for Information

[i] Notice That Government Official Plans to Obtain a Consumer Report for Child Support Purposes

State and local government officials have a permissible purpose to obtain consumer reports to help determine an individual's capacity to make child support payments. Usually, notice to the consumer will not be necessary because the requesting agency is administering a state plan as provided by federal welfare laws. However, if the request comes from any other official, the official must certify to the agency that a prior notice to the consumer has been provided. The notice must be sent by certified or registered mail to the last known address of the consumer, at least ten days in advance of the request.

[ii] Notice from an Employer That It May Obtain a Consumer Report

An employer must make two disclosures to an employee prior to requesting a consumer report and, if adverse action is taken, make disclosures again prior to the adverse action. The disclosures, which must be made around the time of adverse action, are described in an earlier section. n86 However, the FACTA of 2003 amended the FCRA to remove certain communications from the definition of consumer report. n87 Communications are not consumer reports if they are made to employers in connection with the investigation of suspected employment-related misconduct or the employee's compliance with federal, state, or local laws and regulations, the rules of a self-regulatory organization, or any preexisting written policies of the employer. Such communications must also not have been made for the purpose of investigating an employee's credit worthiness, credit standing, or credit capacity, and the communication must only have been made to the employer, the employer's agent, a governmental agency, or a self-regulatory organization. n88 This amendment substantially limits situations in which employees will receive notice under the FCRA and the timing of any notice employees will receive, if any, with respect to employment. Only new applicants and employees being subject to transfer or promotion will receive notice prior to any adverse action being taken. Investigations of existing employees for alleged misconduct fall within the exception and do not require prior notice.

If an employer asks an agency to check references or to do a background check for a job applicant or a candidate for transfer or promotion, the report will almost certainly be an investigative consumer report. These types of investigations are not affected by the FACTA amendments described above. Unless the communications fall outside the definition of a consumer report pursuant to the FACTA amendments, employers must certify to a reporting agency that they have been authorized by the consumer to obtain the report. Briefly, the certification is intended to ensure that the employer has taken two steps. First, the employer must provide a clear and conspicuous notice to the consumer, in writing and in a separate document, that it may obtain a consumer report for employment purposes. n89 Second, the employee must also have provided to the employer, in writing, prior authorization to obtain a consumer report. n90

[iii] Notice That Medical Information May Be Obtained From a Consumer Reporting Agency

A reporting agency may not release medical information for insurance, employment, or credit purposes, or for prescreening and other direct marking transactions, unless the consumer consents. n91

The FACTA of 2003 continued the prohibition against agencies furnishing a report for employment purposes or in connection with a credit or insurance transaction that contains medical information without the consent of the consumer. n92 Now the consumer's consent to furnishing such a report must be written, must be specific, and must describe the use for which the agency will furnish the information. n93 However, an agency may furnish medical information that pertains solely to financial transactions if the agency uses codes so as not to identify, or provide information sufficient to infer, the specific provider of medical services or the nature of such services, products, or devices. The FACTA also reduced consumer protections by providing several exceptions to the general prohibition on the release without consumer consent of a consumer report that includes medical information. n94 The federal banking agencies, NCUA, and the FTC have been granted rulemaking authority to make exceptions that are "necessary and appropriate to protect legitimate operational, transactional, risk, consumer, and other needs ... ." n95

[iv] Notice When Certain Information Is Used by Affiliates

Information based on a company's own experience with the consumer may be shared with other affiliated businesses without notice or warning to the consumer. n96 Information obtained from "outside" the affiliate group, however, may be shared among affiliates only after the consumer has been notified of the opportunity to direct that such information not be communicated. Absent this notice, the information may be considered a consumer report under the Act.

The notice to the consumer must clearly and conspicuously disclose to the consumer that the information may be communicated among affiliates. A written notice is not required, but any other method of disclosure is subject to attack as less than conspicuous.

The FACTA amended the FCRA to provide that a consumer may opt out of the use by an affiliate of this exempt information to market its products or services, and affiliates must also notify the consumer both of the possibility that an affiliate may use the consumer's information for marketing and of the consumer's right to opt out of such use. n97 The opt-out lasts for five years and consumers may extend it for an additional five years. n98 States are preempted from regulating the subject matter of this provision. n99

[v] Special State Law Requirements

Some state laws pose additional disclosure requirements when information is first gathered or reported. For example, Minnesota requires written disclosure to the consumer prior to preparation of a report for employment purposes. n100 California requires creditors to notify consumers and cosigners when first furnishing negative credit reports to a reporting agency. n101

[A] Notice of Key Factor in Credit Score

The FACTA amended the FCRA to require the disclosure of enquiries if they are a factor in determining a consumer's credit score. Any consumer reporting agency that furnishes a consumer report containing any credit score or other risk score or predictor must include in the report a clear and conspicuous statement that a key factor (as defined in § 1681g(f)(2)(B)) which adversely affected such score or predictor was the number of enquiries, if such a predictor was in fact a key factor that adversely affected such score. n102 This notice requirement does not apply to check services companies which issues authorizations for the purpose of approving or processing checks or other negotiable instruments, electronic transfers, or similar methods of payments, to the extent they are engaged in such activities. n103

[B] Notice in Cases of Fraud Alert That Consumer May Request a Free Copy of the File

When credit reporting agencies include a fraud alert in a consumer file, the agency must disclose that the consumer may request two free copies of their file during the twelve-month period beginning on the date on which the fraud alert was included in the file. n104 This notice must include the summary of rights of identity theft victims. n105

Under the FACTA amendments to the FCRA in 2003, consumers have the right to seek a block of the reporting of information resulting from identity theft. n106 If a consumer reporting agency (CRA) declines to block identity theft information or rescinds a block, the effected consumer must be notified promptly. n107

[C] Notice to Consumer If Agency Refuses to Block Alleged Identity Theft Information

Under amendments by the FACTA, if a credit reporting agency declines or rescinds a block of information alleged to be the result of identity theft, the affected consumer must be notified promptly and in the same manner that consumers are notified when information is reinserted into their file upon certification of accuracy. n108 Consumers must be notified regarding the reinsertion of information within five days of the agency's reinsertion of information. This five-day period should be the same limitation for purposes of notification when a block is declined or rescinded.

Resellers that maintain consumer files must also promptly provide notice to consumers of a decision to block the file relating to identity theft information. n109 Such notice must contain the name, address, and telephone number of each consumer reporting agency from which the consumer information was obtained for resale. n110

[D] Disclosure of Credit Scores and Notice to Home Loan Applicant

Under amendments by the FACTA, users of credit reports who make credit or insurance solicitations must also disclose their address and telephone number. The disclosure must be prepared in such format and type as to be reasonably understood, in compliance with rules to be adopted by the FTC, in consultation with federal banking agencies and NCUA. n111

[E] Notice When Negative Information Provided by Financial Institutions

The FACTA amended the FCRA to require a one-time consumer notice when a financial institution furnishes negative information about that customer. n112 However, a financial institution may take advantage of a safe-harbor provision if it maintained reasonable compliance policies and procedures or reasonably believed that it was prohibited from contacting the consumer. n113 Once notified about an account, it appears that there is no other requirement entitling the consumer to receive further notices when additional negative information is reported about that account. n114 This provision appears not to be enforceable by private consumers' actions. n115

[i] Notice That Deleted Information Is Reinserted Into a Consumer Report File

Reporting agencies must notify the consumer whenever once-deleted informa-tion is reinserted into the files. n116 However, the notice of reinsertion is required only if the reinserted information was deleted as a result of an earlier notice of dispute provided to the agency by the consumer. The reinsertion notice must be in writing and must be made not later than five business days following the reinsertion. Electronic notice, or notice by other means, is also permitted, if authorized by the consumer.

In addition to that basic notice, the agency must provide the business name and address and phone number (if reasonably available) of any furnisher of information that was contacted by the agency or that contacted the agency in connection with the reinsertion of the information. The notice must also disclose the consumer's right to add a statement to the consumer's file disputing the accuracy or completeness of the disputed information. This notice also must be provided within five business days, and must be in writing, even if other means were used to notify the consumer of the reinsertion. The statement that the disputed information has been reinserted must also be included.

The failure of a CRA to deliver notice of reinsertion of previously deleted material is subject to the usual private remedies of the FCRA under sections 1681n and 1681o.

[j] Reasonable Procedures as a Defense

For a user who fails to satisfy the FCRA notice requirements in connection with taking an adverse action, requesting an investigative consumer report, or using a prescreened report, the FCRA provides a defense if the user can show by a preponderance of the evidence that, at the time of the alleged notice violation, it maintained reasonable procedures to assure compliance. n117 The reasonable procedures defense does not apply to users or reporting agencies with respect to any notices to consumers which users must certify they have provided before getting a consumer report.

In one of the few FCRA cases to consider this defense, n118 the court adopted the requirements imposed by the Seventh Circuit in a TIL n119 case, Mirabal v. General Motors Acceptance Corp., n120 in which the court said:

> Congress required more than just the maintenance of procedures which were designed to provide proper disclosure calculations. Rather, it required procedures designed to avoid and prevent errors which might slip through procedures aimed at good faith compliance. This means that the procedures which Congress had in mind were to contain an extra preventive step, a safety catch or a re-checking mechanism. Congress left the exact nature of the preventive mechanism undefined. It is clear, however, that Congress required more than just a showing that a well-trained and careful clerk made a mistake.

The reasonable procedures defense was rejected where failure to give notices to non-hired employment applicants was not an isolated instance. A senior manager had made a policy decision without consulting the company's Human Resources manual. n121

An FTC informal staff opinion letter suggests that one user may contract with another to provide required notices to consumers. The circumstances involved a mortgage insurer contacted by a lender. Although the insurer relied upon consumer reports (often provided by the lender) when deciding whether to issue mortgage insurance for specific consumer transactions, the insurer never had direct communication with the consumer. The insurer could reasonably comply with the adverse action notice requirement if it contracted with a responsible lender to deliver the notice to the consumer and appropriately monitored the lender as well. n122 Another related interpretation is an FTC opinion concerning the FCRA's requirement of reasonable procedures to assure accuracy of consumer reports:

> One of the most significan t compliance procedures ... will be the training of new personnel and the retraining of current employees from time to time. Even isolated instances of error should be followed up and procedures adjusted in order to correct the cause of the error. n123

The user has a somewhat different defense concerning failure to comply with the ECOA notice of adverse action. n124 An inadvertent error is not a violation of the notification requirements provided that the creditor corrects the error as soon as possible after discovering it. n125 This defense applies to clerical mistakes, computer malfunctions, and printing errors, but does not apply to errors of legal judgment or to a creditor having insufficient staff to respond in a timely fashion.

There is no statutory defense for the credit reporting agency's failure to comply with the notice requirement concerning use of public record information. A reporting agency that fails to provide notice may instead maintain strict procedures dealing with such information. But if a reporting agency fails to do either, there is an FCRA violation.

[3] Right of Consumer to Know Contents of Own File

Upon a consumer's request and proper identification, the consumer reporting agency must clearly and accurately disclose to the consumer all information then in the consumer's file. n126 In addition, as of December 1, 2004, a consumer will have a new right to learn the credit score and the key factors adversely affecting the credit score. n127 A reporting agency violates the FCRA by refusing to provide this information n128 or by providing only partial disclosure. n129 Although major credit bureaus will provide consumers with the contents of their files, some entities which may not consider themselves reporting agencies actually do fall within the FCRA definition.

Notwithstanding a consumer's right to know what is in her file, the information disclosed to a consumer will often not look like or contain the same information as the report furnished to an inquiring creditor. For example, practitioners report that agencies will hide information in the files by truncating or deleting account numbers, or deleting subscriber addresses, which hinders a consumer in directly disputing an account with a creditor. This sort of vandalism to the information associated with a consumer is in direct violation of the Act. The most significant piece of information that will be hidden from the consumer is the consumer's credit score. n130

Reports provided to users also have a different legal status than reports provided to the consumer. Only reports provided to a third party are considered "consumer reports" under the FCRA; n130.1 and are subject to the requirements for "consumer reports under the Act. Reports to consumers--sometimes called "consumer disclosures"--must include all information in the consumer's "file," n130.2 including information that may not be provided to a user.

While consumers or their attorneys may want to obtain the user versions of consumer reports, this has not always been an easy task. For many years, consumer reporting agencies prohibited users from sharing their versions of consumer reports with the consumer.

The FCRA was amended to prohibit CRAs from preventing users from disclosing the contents of a consumer report to the consumer, if the user takes an adverse action against the consumer based in whole or in part on the consumer report. n130.3 The user is not required to provide the report to the consumer, but the CRA cannot prevent the user from doing so, unless the user has taken no adverse action against the consumer.

[4] How to Obtain the Contents of a Consumer's File

[a] General

[i] Consumer Must Request Disclosure

The consumer may specify any reasonable means of disclosure available from the agency, but if the consumer specifies in-person disclosure at the agency's place of business, reasonable notice is required. n131 A casual inquiry to a reporting agency's telephone receptionist asking generally what is going on is not a proper request for disclosure. n132

[ii] Timing of Disclosures

The FCRA does not require the consumer reporting agency to make disclosures immediately upon request, but undue delays are not permissible. n133 There is no explicit standard as to how quickly reporting agencies must respond to a written request. Although major reporting agencies claim to respond within a week or two, a response may take as long as a month.

In contrast, the new provision requiring nationwide consumer reporting agencies to provide consumers with one free annual credit report requires those agencies to provide those reports within fifteen days, so long as the consumer uses the centralized source for making the request. n134 An additional avenue to a free report lies in the new extended fraud alert provision, n135 through which a consumer may obtain from the agency to which the consumer directs the alert all of the information in the consumer's file. n136 The agency must provide the information within three business days of the request, without charge. n137

[iii] In-Person and Telephone Disclosures

Disclosures must be available to consumers in person, at the reporting agency's office, by telephone, electronically, or by any other reasonable means which is available from the reporting agency. n138 The consumer reporting agency may provide disclosures through a national consumer relations center, rather than through its local offices. n139

For all disclosures, the consumer must provide proper identification. n140 For telephone disclosures, the FCRA requires a prior written consent with proper identification. n141 The FTC Commentary, however, allows telephone disclosure without written request if the consumer is properly identified, but reporting agencies can still insist on a written request. n142

The consumer reporting agency should endeavor to make it as convenient as possible for the consumer to obtain the disclosure, although it is not required to make disclosures outside its normal business hours.

[iv] Written Disclosure

Disclosure must be in writing, unless the consumer authorizes some other form of disclosure that is reasonably available from the agency. n143 Although the FCRA does not specifically provide for disclosures by mail, the FTC Commentary allows mail disclosures with the consumer's actual or implied consent. n144 In-person, electronic and telephonic disclosures are specifically contemplated by the Act. If the consumer appears in person at the reporting agency and requests oral disclosure, the consumer has a right to such a disclosure. n145 Nevertheless, consumers are usually better off having a written record of the agency's disclosure, since it provides a record of the agency's compliance or noncompliance with the Act.

[v] Employees Explaining Disclosures

Reporting agencies are required to have trained employees who will provide a full account of all information that the consumer is entitled to receive and explain all disclosed items. n146 When Congress passed FACTA it amended the FCRA disclosure requirements, but it maintained the requirement that nationwide consumer reporting agencies have toll free numbers and personnel that are accessible to consumers within normal working hours. n147

[vi] Consumer May Bring Another Person When Receiving Disclosures

Consumers are entitled to receive disclosures in the presence of one other person whom they have chosen to accompany them. n148 The consumer reporting agency may require the consumer to furnish written permission for the agency to discuss the consumer's file in front of the other person and may also require the other person to furnish reasonable identification. n149

[vii] Special Rules for Affiliates

There are a number of apparent differences between the disclosure required of an affiliate, which takes an adverse action based on information from another affiliate, n150 and the disclosure required by a consumer reporting agency. First, only the nature of the information, not the information itself or the contents of the file on the consumer, must be disclosed. Second, the request must be made by the consumer in writing. Third, the affiliate can take up to sixty days to make the disclosure, in contrast to the shorter time frames allowed reporting agencies. Fourth, the consumer has little flexibility for requiring a variety of forms of disclosure, even if they are reasonably available from the affiliate.

[b] Making the Request

The FACTA of 2003 amended the FCRA to provide consumers with the right to one free report per year. n151 To obtain such a report from a nationwide consumer reporting agency n152 the consumer must make the request through a centralized source that the FTC and nationwide agencies have set up pursuant to FTC regulations. n153 The nationwide CRAs jointly design, fund, and operate the centralized source, and consumers can request a report from that source by any of the following three methods:

- On-line at www.annualcreditreport.com;
- By telephone, to 877-322-8228; or
- By letter to Annual Credit Report Request Service, P.O. Box 105281, Atlanta, GA 30374-5281. n154

The consumer may be asked detailed information about existing credit accounts and employment, as a form of identification, in addition to the usual forms of identification. Requests for reports from nationwide specialty consumer reporting agencies n155 will not be made through a centralized source but rather pursuant to forthcoming regulations that will require such agencies to provide, at a minimum, a toll-free telephone number for consumers to use to request a free report. n156 The effective date of the free credit report provision may be delayed until December 4, 2004, or even beyond. n157 Aside from that provision the Act does not specify any particular manner for the consumer to request disclosure of the information in the consumer's file. Each of the nationwide consumer reporting agencies, Experian, TransUnion, and Equifax, allow consumers to obtain credit reports by following procedures designated on their websites. n158

In addition, Any notice that a consumer report contributed to a denial will identify the agency which provided the report. The consumer should request a report from that agency to learn about the report and to check for inaccuracies. Because of the recent adverse use of the report, the disclosure to the consumer will be free. National consumer reporting agencies are required to maintain toll-free telephone numbers staffed during normal business hours.

For a full picture of a consumer's credit record, it is generally advised to request disclosure from the three major reporting agencies, in addition to any of the smaller agencies specifically mentioned in any notice of denial due to a consumer report.

The consumer should expressly request all of the information in the consumer's file, not just the credit report. Disclosure should then include not only all information about the consumer, but also sources for the information in the file, information about persons who have procured a report on the consumer, and a record of inquiries. Information which may not be disclosed includes credit scoring, risk scores, or other predictors. n159

Credit monitoring services, such as America Online's Credit Alert, offer to compile credit information from all three major credit bureaus, reformat the information for ease of understanding, and provide driving records and even medical information. They can also periodically notify a consumer of all inquiries made regarding the consumer's credit report. These services raise privacy and security concerns, and the fees charged can greatly exceed what it would cost a consumer to obtain reports directly from the reporting agencies themselves.

[c] Proof of Consumer's Identification or Authorization

[i] Proof of Identification

Proper identification is required for all forms of disclosure. n160 Because the reporting agency may be held liable for furnishing consumer reports to persons who do not have permissible purposes for obtaining them, n161 the reporting agency is given some flexibility in designing identification procedures. The need for proper identification may not be used, however, as a pretext for collecting information which is not essential for that purpose. n162

FTC regulations require that CRAs develop and implement reasonable requirements for what proof of identity the consumer must provide. n162.1 The information the consumer supplies must be sufficient to enable the CRA to match the consumer with its files and to make sure the consumer is not misidentified. Such proof might involve enough information to obtain a file match, such as the consumer's full name, other names, current and recent addresses, Social Security Number, and date of birth. The consumer might also be asked for additional proof of identity, such as copies of various documents or answering questions only the consumer would know. n162.2

While CRAs will routinely ask for the consumer's Social Security Number, Experian and other CRAs admit that they will make the disclosure to the consumer and provide reports to creditors without this number if other identifying information is provided. n162.3 A consumer who refuses to provide a Social Security Number increases the risk that the disclosure will be incomplete or will include information from a different consumer. Of course, this may be helpful information to know, because creditors that are also requesting reports without a Social Security Number may be seeing similar errors.

[ii] Proof of Consumer's Authorization

A reporting agency may furnish a consumer report in accordance with the consumer's written instructions. n163 The FTC has indicated that an attorney acting on behalf of a client may request disclosure of all information to which the client would also have access, under a valid power of attorney, n164 the power of attorney being written instructions from the consumer. n165

The agency may also disclose the information directly to the consumer. n166 This apparently means that the agency can supply the information directly to the consumer rather than to the third party. n167

Spouses are not authorized to release or obtain reports on their partners. Reportedly, if a consumer requests a report on a spouse, the agencies will provide the report by sending it to the spouse at the spouse's address. Even this precaution is probably not adequate because the request is not made by the subject of the report.

[d] Unreasonable Preconditions or Requests for Information

The agency "shall" disclose the contents of the consumer's file. n168 The agency may not add conditions not set out in the FCRA as a prerequisite to the required disclosure. n169

[e] Consumer Payment for File Disclosure

[i] Where FCRA Prohibits Payment

A reporting agency may not impose charges when the consumer requests disclosure within sixty days after being given notice of a user's denial based on a consumer report, or after receiving notice from a debt collection agency affiliated with the reporting agency that his or her credit rating has been or may be adversely affected. n170

Even if the user's original denial is subsequently reversed, the consumer retains the sixty-day right to disclosure without charge. n171 The right to free disclosure has been said to apply only to agencies whose report was used in the denial. n172

A consumer who is unemployed and seeking employment is entitled to one free report in any twelve-month period. n173 The consumer must provide written certification that he or she is unemployed and intends to apply for employment in the sixty-day period beginning on the date of the certification.

A consumer who is receiving public welfare assistance is also entitled to one free report in any twelve-month period. n174 The Act does not define the term public welfare assistance. Presumably, the term would include family welfare benefits to low-income children and households, social security benefits to elder Americans and SSI benefits to others, state and federal food stamp programs, workers compensation benefits, fuel assistance benefits, Medicare and Medicaid coverage, and other state and federal and local benefit programs. The Act does not require the consumer to certify or reveal more than that the consumer is a "recipient of public welfare assistance."

A consumer who reasonably believes that her file contains inaccurate information due to fraud is also entitled to one free report in any twelve-month period. n175 The consumer must provide written certification of the belief, although the certification need not explain or detail the basis of the belief.

Continuing concern for identity theft led Congress to add a provision in 2003 allowing an identity theft victim to obtain an expedited free report. A consumer who has requested an extended fraud alert under the new provision allowing for such alerts n176 may obtain from the agency to which the consumer directs the alert all of the information in the consumer's file. n177 The agency must provide the information within three business days of the request, without charge. n178

[A] No Charge for Annual Report Made Through Centralized Source

Once the FTC issues final regulations establishing a centralized source through which consumers can request a free report, consumers will be entitled to one free credit report annually. n179 In addition, many specialty consumer reporting agencies compile information about consumers on a nationwide basis relating to a specific subject, such as medical records, tenant history, check writing history, employment history, or insurance claims. The Act specifically prohibits agencies from imposing a charge for such a report. n180 The Credit Card Accountability, Responsibility and Disclosure (CARD) Act of 2009 amended the FCRA to require that any advertisement for a "free" credit report disclose that free credit reports are available under Federal law at www.AnnualCreditReport.com. n180.1 For TV and radio advertisements, the disclaimer will only state: "This is not the free credit report provided by Federal law." n180.2 The Credit CARD Act requires the Federal Trade Commission to mandate the specific wording of the disclaimer for all other advertisements. n180.3

[ii] Where State Law Limits Payment

State law can limit the amount that a reporting agency may charge, and a number of state statutes either require that the first report in a year be free or limit the amount the agency may charge. The Ninth Circuit has affirmed that the FCRA does not preempt a state statute limiting fees that consumer reporting agencies charge for report disclosures to consumers. n181

[iii] Payment Amounts Where Allowed

Ten dollars is the present maximum charge for a report which does not follow a denial based on a consumer report, or fall within one of the special circumstances when free reports are available once a year, and where state law does not otherwise limit the charge. n182 The maximum charge may increase from year to year to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index.

[5] File Information That Must Be Disclosed

[a] General

Except for information concerning credit scores, risk scores or other predictors, and FBI security clearance checks, all information in the consumer's file at the time of the consumer's request must be provided to the consumer. n183

The disclosure requirement applies to every item of information which the consumer reporting agency has in its possession at the time that the consumer requests disclosure, "regardless of how the information is stored." n184 Once a consumer has requested disclosure, the agency should not change the file before disclosing it to the consumer. n185

The consumer may request less than the complete file and, in such a circumstance, the agency would not have to disclose all information. This issue arose in correspondence between a consumer reporting agency and the FTC about whether social security and consumer account numbers could be scrambled as a security measure. FTC staff opined that all information in the file must be disclosed, including unscrambled numbers, unless the consumer is given the option and does not ask for less. n186

A summary of consumer rights must also be included with the disclosures. n187

[b] Audit Trail and Other Ancillary Information

According to FTC Commentary, the consumer's "file" does not include the audit trail of changes made by the agency. n188 The consumer can, however, seek audit trail information through discovery if an action is filed in court.

The consumer's "file" also excludes other information which will not be included in a consumer report or used as a basis for preparing future reports. n189 Such other information includes billing records, consumer relations information, and the like. n190

[c] Credit Scores Do Not Have to Be Disclosed

For a discussion of the disclosure of credit scores, see § 16.03[2][g.4] and 16.01[2][a], supra .

[d] Medical Information

Reporting agencies must disclose to consumers medical information in their files. State laws may also grant consumers access to personal medical records.

Medical information provided by reporting agencies is commonly used for insurance underwriting purposes, and many insurers are members of the Medical Information Bureau, or MIB. Members provide MIB with adverse or negative information acquired when underwriting individual life, health or disability insurance policies. This information is then available to members for other underwriting decisions.

Consumers may learn what information about them is on file at MIB by contacting the Medical Information Bureau, 160 University Avenue, Westwood, MA 02090-2307, telephone (617) 426-3660.

However, most consumers will never know that personal adverse medical information is circulating unless they are told by the insurers who use it. For years, MIB argued that insurers that receive MIB information did not have to provide the consumers with a notice that insurance was denied, or made more expensive, based wholly or in part on an MIB report. n191 However, in 1995, the FTC and MIB agreed to a policy requiring MIB members to inform applicants (1) that insurance has been denied, or made more expensive, because of information obtained from an investigation conducted as a result of MIB information; (2) the applicant's right to obtain a summary of the MIB report at no charge within 60 days; and (3) of a street address and telephone number at which the applicant can contact MIB. n192 Shortly after reaching agreement with MIB, the FTC published a brochure for insurers explaining FCRA obligations, including providing the required notice to applicants. n193

In addition, a consumer reporting agency may not furnish for employment purposes, or in connection with a credit or insurance transaction or direct marketing transaction, a consumer report that contains medical information about the consumer unless the consumer consents n194 to the furnishing of such a report.

The FACTA of 2003 revised the FCRA's definition of "medical information" to remove the requirement that the information have been obtained with the consumer's consent and to remove from the definition information that does not relate to the consumer's physical, mental, or behavioral health or condition. n195

Assuming that the MIB falls within the Act's new definition of nationwide specialty consumer reporting agency, n196 eventually consumers will be entitled to a free credit report from MIB, though that right may be delayed until the FTC issues final regulations. n197

[e] Sources of Information

Pursuant to the consumer's general request for disclosure of the contents of the file, the consumer reporting agency must reveal its sources of information. n198 The consumer's right does not extend to sources of the investigative consumer report. n199 This applies only if the information was "acquired solely for use in preparing an investigative consumer report and actually used for no other purpose." n200

[f] Identification of Users Receiving Reports

The consumer reporting agency must disclose the names of all recipients of consumer reports about the consumer that were furnished within one year prior to the consumer's request for disclosure. Additionally, the reporting agency must disclose the names of any persons who received consumer reports on the consumer for employment purposes within two years before the request. n201

Where the agency has provided the report to a user at the request of another reporting agency, the agency must disclose the ultimate recipient of the report, not just the name of the requesting agency. n202 The list of recipients must also include any recipient of prescreened lists containing the consumer's name. n203 Exceptions exist for federal agencies using consumer reports for security clearance purposes and for FBI counterintelligence investigations. n204 These uses may not have to be disclosed, or indeed disclosure may be prohibited. n205

Recipients of consumer reports, like the sources of information contained in the reports, must be identified pursuant to the consumer's general request for disclosure of the consumer's file, whether or not the consumer specifically requested that the recipients' names be disclosed. n206 The recipient must be identified by name or, if applicable, the full trade name under which the person does business. The agency must also disclose the address and telephone number of the recipient, but only if specifically requested by the consumer. n207

[g] Identification of Checks Upon Which Are Based Adverse Characterization of the Consumer

The FCRA also requires disclosure of the dates, original payees, and amounts of any checks upon which is based any adverse characterization of the consumer included in the file at the time of the disclosure. n208 For example, if a consumer reporting agency has information about a bounced check in the consumer's file, disclosure of the contents of that file must include the date, payee, and amount of that bounced check.

[h] Few Rules Exist for Disclosures by Affiliates

Entities with common ownership or corporate control may share information with few restrictions.

[6] The Summary of Consumer Rights

Every time a consumer reporting agency provides a consumer with a written report, it must include with the report a "Summary of Rights." n209 The FTC form summary, the use of which or anything "substantially similar" is a priori in compliance:

- A brief description of the FCRA;
- A summary of all rights of the consumer under the Act;
- An explanation of how the consumer may exercise these rights;
- A toll-free telephone number, in the case of a nationwide consumer reporting agency, which is staffed during normal business hours;
- A statement that the agency is not required to remove accurate information which is not obsolete;
- A list of all federal enforcement agencies "in a form which will assist the consumer in selecting the appropriate agency"; and
- A reminder that the consumer may have additional rights under state law.

The FTC has issued contradictory staff opinion letters relating to this issue. The first FTC staff opinion letter (Brinckerhoff, FTC Informal Staff Opinion Letter, May 31, 1996) supports the argument that a counteroffer with adverse terms is the type of action for which the FCRA notice was created. The example used in the opinion letter is an applicant for an auto loan who had to pay more to finance an automobile purchase than she would have been charged if her credit record had been better. According to this opinion, the increase in charge triggers the notice required under § 1681m of the FCRA. A subsequent FTC staff opinion letter does not address the analysis and conclusion contained in the Brinckerhoff letter and instead simply follows the definition of adverse action contained in Regulation B. Keller, FTC Staff Opinion Letter, July 14, 2000; Berger, FTC Staff Opinion Letter, June 28, 2003.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

1-16 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 16.04

§ 16.04 Furnishing Consumer Reports to Users

In order to safeguard the confidentiality of information about consumers and to protect individual privacy, the FCRA contains specific restrictions on the release of consumer reports. The FCRA was amended by the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act of 2003. Privacy and the protection of consumer financial information from identity theft were two of the major objectives behind many of the amendments. n1 Most of these amendments are addressed in other sections in this chapter, however some of the amendments affect the furnishing of information to users of credit reports.

[1] When Reports May Be Released

[a] General

Consumer reports can only be disseminated for the purposes designated under the FCRA and for no other purpose. A person who wants information about a consumer for a purpose not listed in the FCRA must obtain the information from a source other than a consumer report. The fact that a report's use is impermissible does not make the report no longer a consumer report. If a report at any point in time qualifies as a consumer report, then users without permissible purposes, as specifically listed in the FCRA, cannot have access to that report.

If a user has a permissible purpose, the consumer cannot stop the reporting agency from furnishing the report. n2 A reporting agency may, however, refuse a user's request for a consumer report, n3 or establish any conditions it wishes on provision of the report. n4

A user with a permissible use cannot obtain a report and then put the report to an impermissible use. n5 Nor can a user with a permissible purpose pass the report on to a third party with an impermissible use. n6

[b] Agents of the User

An agent of a party with a permissible purpose may obtain a consumer report on behalf of the principal where the agent is involved in the decision that gives rise to the permissible purpose. n7 Such involvement may include the agent's making a decision or taking action for the principal, or helping to evaluate the information. n8 By implication, an agent without such an involvement does not have a permissible purpose. n9 A car dealer is not vicariously liable if it induces a finance company to impermissibly obtain a report; only the finance company is liable. n10

[c] Release by One Reporting Agency to Another

A consumer reporting agency may furnish a consumer report to another consumer reporting agency for it to furnish to a requesting subscriber. In this circumstance, one reporting agency is acting on behalf of another. n11 The agency receiving a request from a subscriber is responsible for determining the subscriber's permissible purpose, and the agency providing the report to the other agency need only determine if the requesting agency's purpose is to provide the report to a subscriber with a permissible purpose. However, the second agency, often a "reseller," is responsible for complying with all the requirements imposed by the FCRA on credit reporting agencies. n12

[d] Is Information a Consumer Report if Released for Impermissible Purposes?

Consumer reporting agencies often attempt to defend having furnished information for an impermissible purpose by arguing that the information does not fall within the definition of a consumer report because it was not used for a purpose specified in the Act. Consequently, they argue, there can be no FCRA violation because the FCRA does not apply.

The FTC and the courts generally reject this rationale. n13 If the information was originally collected for a permissible purpose, or the reporting agency expected it to be used for a permissible purpose, the Act applies to the information, regardless of its actual use. n14 The requirement that consumer reports be given only to users with permissible purposes would be meaningless if the courts did not look beyond the actual use of the information in the case being litigated. n15

[e] Discovering an Impermissible Use

Probably the best approach to discovering whether a consumer report has been used for an impermissible purpose is to request a copy from Experian, Equifax, and Trans Union. If any of the prior users named on the report are not familiar to the consumer, or the consumer's contact with a particular user does not seem to give rise to a legitimate business reason for obtaining a consumer report, the consumer may have a cause of action against the user and/or the reporting agency. Nevertheless, when a consumer is added to a prescreening list (e.g., for solicitation for a credit card or another offer), the user requesting the list will be added to the consumer's file as a user. It is thus important to differentiate between users of prescreening lists and those who do not have a permissible purpose to receive a report on the consumer. It can sometimes be difficult for consumers to determine whether the inquiries are permissible or not because creditors use many different names, some of which may not be familiar to the consumer.

[2] Permissible Uses

[a] In Response to a Court Order

A report may be furnished "[i]n response to the order of a court having jurisdiction to issue such an order, or a subpoena issued in connection with proceedings before a Federal grand jury." n16

Four statutory provisions explicitly enlarge on the court order permissible purpose. First, the Tax Code now requires reporting agencies to open their files upon receipt of a summons and a specific IRS certificate that the subject of the files has not moved in a timely fashion to quash the summons. n17

Second, information may be released pursuant to a subpoena issued in connection with proceedings before a federal grand jury. n18 A state grand jury subpoena, however, provides a permissible purpose to release a consumer report only if the subpoena is signed by a judge or magistrate.

Third, the FTC has the power to subpoena consumer reports in connection with any investigation under the FCRA. n19 Other federal agencies with enforcement authority under the FCRA should have the same power, n20 as should state officials with authority under state "little FCRA" statutes. n21

Fourth, the FBI may obtain identifying information and banking information from reporting agencies for counterintelligence purposes. The FBI may seek more complete information about an individual for similar reasons by ex parte application and in camera consideration by a court.

[b] The Consumer's Written Instructions

A consumer report may be furnished when the consumer gives the reporting agency written instructions or permission to provide a report to the user, n22 regardless of whether the report would otherwise be for a permissible purpose. n23 Under the federal E-Sign Act, an electronic authorization may suffice. n24

[c] Identifying Information Furnished to the Government

Although consumer reporting agencies must furnish consumer reports only to users with permissible purposes, reporting agencies may furnish certain "identifying information" to governmental agencies. n25 This information is the consumer's name, address, former addresses, places of employment, or former places of employment.

[d] Permissible Use in Connection With Credit

[i] General

Users have a permissible use for a consumer report "in connection with a credit transaction involving the consumer ... and involving the extension of credit to, or review or collection of an account of, the consumer." n26 A user has a permissible purpose to obtain a consumer report on the person it thinks is applying for credit, even though applicant is an identity thief. n27 On the other hand, if the credit application was taken for the purpose of identity theft, a jury could determine that there was no permissible purpose. n28 "Credit" is defined in the FCRA n29 to have the same meaning as in section 1691a of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act (ECOA). Under the ECOA, credit is defined as "the right granted by a creditor to a debtor to defer payment of debt or to incur debts and defer its payment or to purchase property or services and defer payment therefor." n30

One troubling consequence of this permissible purpose can arise when a merchant, such as a car dealer, uses it to shop for financing for the consumer, which can result in many inquiries added all at once to the consumer's file. Not only can multiple inquiries pull down a credit score, creditors may find the multiple inquiries, in and of themselves, reflect poorly on the consumer's credit history and deny credit on that basis. n31 If a key factor that adversely affects a consumer's credit score consists of the number of enquiries made with respect to a consumer report, that factor must be included in the disclosures of a credit score, a new requirement under the FACTA of 2003. n32 This requirement is not subject to the disclosure limitation of only four key factors that adversely affect a credit score. n33

It is not enough that a potential sales transaction may be financed by an extension of credit to the consumer. A consumer may comparison shop, i.e., ask about price and financing, without indicating an intent to purchase or finance a transaction. The seller or creditor may obtain a consumer report for credit purposes only when it becomes evident that the consumer has made an offer or otherwise initiated a credit transaction, n34 or when an existing credit transaction is involved. If, for example, an automobile dealer wishes to see a consumer's credit report before answering questions about the availability of financing, the dealer must request the consumer's formal authorization. n35 Sufficient reason for obtaining a credit report does not exist simply to see if the consumer is a potential customer.

[ii] Collection of Credit Accounts, Judgment Debts

A consumer report may be used in reviewing or collecting an existing credit account. n36 This allows the use of consumer reports for "skip tracing," in which the creditor hires a person to locate a debtor to facilitate the collection of a consumer account. n37 Collection agencies may obtain consumer reports and a reporting agency may furnish a consumer report to an attorney for use in a lawsuit involving a credit account. n38

Even in the case of credit accounts, collection is not a permissible purpose for obtaining a consumer report once the account is no longer collectible, i.e., because it has been discharged in bankruptcy. n38.1

The FTC Staff Commentary states that a party attempting to collect on a returned check has a permissible purpose to obtain a report concerning the maker of the check, n38.2 although the FTC has been inconsistent about whether check writing involves credit.

Whether a residential lease is a credit transaction, which would allow use of consumer reports to collect past-due rent, is not uniformly resolved. The FTC takes the view that residential leases do not involve credit, and therefore an attorney cannot legitimately seek a consumer report to collect past-due rent unless she is enforcing a judgment. n38.3 This approach is consistent with interpretations of the term "credit" under the ECOA, n38.4 which is now incorporated into the FCRA. On the other hand, before the FCRA was linked to the ECOA, courts usually held that a lease is a credit transaction, allowing access to consumer reports for collection purposes.

The FTC Commentary indicates that, even if there originally was no credit relationship between a consumer and another, the relationship becomes a creditor/debtor relationship when judgment is secured against the consumer. Thereafter, the judgment creditor may obtain a consumer report on the judgment debtor in an effort to locate the consumer or the consumer's assets. n39 However, one court has held that the 2003 amendments to the FCRA may repudiate the earlier view of the FTC and most courts that consumer reports may be used to collect on non-credit-related judgment debts. n39.1 The 2003 amendments added a definition of "credit." The court held that a child support order could not meet that definition, because a typical child-support arrangement does not involve one party granting rights to another to defer payment, as required under the definition. Moreover, the definition of "credit" incorporates the definition of "creditor," n39.2 and a party to a child support order does not "regularly extend" credit, as required under that definition. The court rejected the argument that collection of a judgment debt need not bear a nexus to a credit transaction and found that an agency retained by one parent to collect child support did not have a permissible purpose to obtain a credit report. This reasoning, if followed by other courts, would apply to other types of non-credit-related judgment debts as well.

The child support collection unit of a district attorney's office may obtain a consumer report to determine whether court-ordered support payments should be increased, if the intent of the unit is to collect amounts due and not to initiate criminal prosecution. n40 Consumer reports may also be furnished to child support enforcement agencies where quasi-judicial administrative orders which establish liability for the payments have been entered. n41 Once the obligation is established, whether by court decree or administrative order, the child support agency becomes a judgment creditor having a permissible purpose to obtain a consumer report, n42 as does the parent/creditor. n43

[iii] Business Credit as Permissible Purpose

A consumer report cannot be furnished to a creditor to determine an individual's or businesses' eligibility for business credit. If a partnership or corporation applies for credit, a reporting agency may not furnish a consumer report about an individual partner, owner, or officer of the business, n44 absent specific authorization or application from the individual. n45

While the FTC limits the permissible purpose of determining eligibility for credit only to credit for personal, family or household purposes, the FTC defines "personal, family and household purposes" to include credit for securities transactions and real estate investments, as long as the consumer is not engaged in such transactions as a business. n46

[iv] Assessment and Review of Existing Credit Obligations

Creditors may obtain a consumer report as part of a review of an existing account or credit obligation. n47 Reviews frequently occur when creditors seek to determine whether to retain, close out, or modify current terms of an account for better or for worse. This permissible purpose does not permit access to consumer report information for the purpose of offering unrelated products or services. n48

Third parties who are considering buying or investing in a consumer credit transaction, or merely servicing a current credit obligation, also have a permissible purpose to obtain a consumer report. n49

[e] Permissible Use in Connection With Employment

[i] Employment Purposes

Another permissible purpose for which a consumer report may be furnished to a user is for "employment purposes," n50 which is defined to mean "evaluating a consumer for employment, promotion, reassignment or retention as an employee." n51 This includes employers who are "considering the possibility" of actions, such as termination, n52 investigating a current employee concerning disappearance of money from the employment premises (because the employee's retention is at issue), n53 and determining whether a government contractor's employee should have security clearance. n54 It also includes trucking firms who are hiring drivers as independent contractors. n55 However, certain employee investigations are now excluded from the definition of a consumer report. n56 Jury duty is a civic duty, not employment, and therefore counsel has no permissible purpose to obtain reports on potential jurors. n57 Further, the evaluation of Workers Compensation Fund claims is unrelated to the enumerated employment purposes, and is not a permissible reason to obtain a consumer report. n58

An employer may not obtain a consumer report on someone other than the subject of its decision-making. n59 A user may not obtain consumer reports on an employment applicant's relatives, even where the applicant is being considered for a security-sensitive position. n60 Before obtaining a report for employment purposes, the employer must have the employee's written consent. n61

The Fourth Circuit found that a state licensing board has an employment purpose in receiving a consumer report in order to evaluate an applicant for a professional license, n62 even if there is no employer-employee relationship between the board and the applicant.

Once an employment relationship has ended, and re-employment is not contemplated, the former employer no longer has an "employment purpose" for a consumer report on the former employee. If the employer takes adverse action based in any part on the consumer report, the employer must provide an adverse action notice to the employee (or prospective employee). n63 Note that some states may have statutes restricting use of consumer reports for employment purposes. n63.1

[ii] Employer Must Provide Prior Certification

A consumer reporting agency may not release a consumer report for employment purposes without certain certifications by the employer. n64 This requirement applies so long as the report does not fall within the excluded communications provision that was added to the FCRA by the FACTA of 2003. n65 The employer must certify that it has clearly and conspicuously disclosed to the consumer that a consumer report may be obtained for employment purposes, and that the consumer has authorized in writing the procurement of the report. In addition, the employer must certify that prior to taking adverse action based in full or in part on the consumer report, the employer will give the consumer a copy of the consumer report along with a Summary of Consumer Rights as prescribed by the FTC. The reporting agency is required only to have received the employer's certification; it is not required to obtain further evidence of compliance. n66 Exceptions exist for security clearance related employment decisions by United States government agencies and for the tracking industry. n67 In addition, the FACTA of 2003 provides for exceptions for certain communications relating to employer investigation of employees. n68

[iii] Agency Must Enclose Summary of Consumer Rights

The reporting agency may release a consumer report for employment purposes only if it provides with the report a Summary of Consumer Rights. n69 The employer, in turn, is required to provide an employee or potential employee with a copy of this Summary in the event the employer takes adverse action on the basis of the consumer report. However, if the report pertains to an employee investigation that falls outside coverage as a consumer report under the FACTA amendments, the employee is only entitled to a summary of the report if adverse action is taken. They will are not entitled to the Summary of Rights. n70

[f] Permissible Use in Connection With Insurance

Another permissible purpose for furnishing consumer reports to users is "in connection with the underwriting of insurance involving the consumer." n71 Underwriting activities include deciding whether to issue or cancel a policy and determination of coverage, terms, rates and similar items. n72 Underwriting does not include investigating an insurance claim after the insurance has been written.

Consumer reports may be furnished for insurance use only when the insurance is for personal, non-business purposes. n73

[g] Permissible Use in Connection With Government Licenses or Other Benefits

Another permissible use of a consumer report is "in connection with a determination of the consumer's eligibility for a license or other benefit granted by a governmental instrumentality required by law to consider an applicant's financial responsibility or status." n74

The user of the report need not be the governmental instrumentality itself. Any party charged by law (including regulations having the force of law) with responsibility for assessing the consumer's eligibility for the benefit has a permissible purpose. n75 If the governmental body has reason to believe a particular consumer's eligibility is in doubt, or wishes to conduct random checks to confirm eligibility, it has a permissible purpose. n76

[h] Permissible Use by Child Support Enforcement Agencies

Another permissible purpose is in connection with state or local agency determination and enforcement of child support awards. n77 Only a public agency may obtain a consumer report under this provision.

Consumer reports for child support enforcement purposes may be provided two different ways. An agency administering a state plan under 42 U.S.C. section 654 may obtain a consumer report to use to set an initial child support award or to later modify it.

A state or local agency may, with proper certification, also obtain a consumer report for child support enforcement purposes even if it is not the agency administering the state plan.

[i] Permissible Use in Connection With Business Transactions

[i] User's Business Purpose, Where Individual Has a Consumer Purpose

A consumer reporting agency may furnish a consumer report to any user with a legitimate business need for the information in connection with a business transaction initiated by the consumer. n78 The transaction must involve the individual as a consumer. Consumer reports can thus be furnished to a user in connection with a business transaction where the consumer enters the transaction for personal, family, or household purposes. n79

[ii] Where Individual Has a Business Purpose

If a report is used, expected to be used, and collected for purely business or commercial reasons, then a consumer report is not involved, the FCRA does not apply, and the FCRA does not restrict the possible use of such a non-consumer report. On the other hand, if a report qualifies as a consumer report, then the prevailing view, as discussed below, is that the report cannot be furnished for transactions the consumer enters into for business or commercial reasons as opposed to personal, family or household purposes. (Of course, the consumer can consent in writing to such use.)

The FTC takes the position that the reference to business transactions as a permissible purpose is limited to transactions for personal, family, or household purposes. n80 One would expect the FTC position now to be adopted uniformly by the courts, except that courts may question the lack of statutory language limiting the business transactions provision to just personal, family, or household purposes. n81 Normally, courts will not import language or meaning into a statute unless no other way exists to resolve a conflict. Moreover, unlike other consumer protection legislation, consumer is defined to mean an individual, n82 without any limitation as to the purposes of the consumer's actions.

To avoid this problem, some courts have held that any business use of a consumer report is permissible. n83 Such an interpretation does not incorporate the predominant view that consumer reports cannot be furnished to evaluate an individual's or business' eligibility for business or commercial credit or insurance, or for evaluating any type of insurance claim.

[j] Permissible Use by FBI for Counterintelligence Purposes

The FCRA grants to the FBI secret access to information from consumer reporting agencies for counterintelligence purposes. n84 This access is not to be reported to consumers. If this section is violated, the consumer may claim statutory damages of one hundred dollars in addition to actual and punitive damages and attorneys fees. Injunctive relief is also available.

[3] Reports Issued for Impermissible Purposes

[a] Use in Alimony, Child Support or Paternity Proceedings

A person seeking to enforce a child support order has a permissible purpose to obtain the consumer's report. A child support order, whether judicial or administrative, creates a debtor-creditor relationship with the consumer. n85 Certain public officials also have a permissible purpose to use consumer reports to help determine child support levels. Prior to the amendment permitting this use, in contrast to the enforcement of a child support order, a child support agency seeking to establish paternity or the duty to pay child support did not have a permissible purpose for obtaining a consumer report. n86 Similar logic would indicate that a consumer report cannot be used to establish a property settlement or child custody in a divorce proceeding, but can be used in an attempt to collect alimony after a payment schedule is set by a court.

[b] Use in Tax Collection Proceedings

A tax collection agency has no general permissible purpose to obtain a consumer report to collect delinquent tax accounts because, until the tax amount is reduced to some kind of judgment, there is no debtor-creditor relationship. n87

A tax collection agency does have a permissible purpose after it has acquired a tax lien having the same effect as a judgment or after it has obtained a judgment. n88 In addition, the Internal Revenue Service ("IRS"), but not other tax collection agencies, was given in 1976 special statutory authority to require a consumer reporting agency to furnish a consumer report in response to an IRS summons.

[c] Use in Civil or Criminal Litigation

Generally, a party involved or potentially involved in litigation does not have a permissible purpose to receive a consumer report because litigation is not a permissible purpose. In addition, litigation between two parties usually does not come under the business transaction permissible purpose. n89

Potential plaintiffs may not use consumer reports to determine whether potential defendants are worth suing, unless the litigation otherwise involves a permissible purpose (such as a suit on a credit account, actions to collect on a judgment, or a business transaction between the two parties). n90 The FTC would also say that a suit against a former tenant does not involve credit and a consumer report may not be used for this purpose. n91 If there is no permissible purpose relating to the litigation, there is no permissible purpose to obtain a consumer report for the purpose of locating a defendant, for service of process or otherwise, in connection with litigation. n92 Likewise, it is impermissible to obtain a defendant's credit report with the intent of forcing a party to settle litigation. n93

An attorney may have a permissible purpose to obtain a consumer report on a prospective client, however, if a consumer is seeking legal assistance from an attorney for personal, family, or household purposes. n94 An attorney for a collection agency has no immunity from suit under the FCRA simply because he obtained and used a credit report in the course of his duties as a lawyer in the context of litigation. n95

[d] Use by Investigators

Detectives and other investigators are covered by the same permissible purposes rules that apply to their clients. Thus, consumer reports could be furnished to a detective for skip tracing purposes while investigating a consumer for employment, insurance, credit, or debt collection purposes, or, in relationship to a business transaction, but not for other purposes. n96

[e] Use of Reports on the Consumer's Spouse, Relatives, or Other Third Parties

There is no permissible purpose to obtain a consumer report on one individual to assist the user in making a determination on a different individual.

Nevertheless, certain specific situations exist where a creditor can obtain information about an applicant's spouse or other third party involved in a credit transaction. A permissible purpose exists to obtain a report on a third party:

- At the time of a credit application where the consumer is relying on the third party's income or assets to establish credit, or the third party will be an authorized user on the account; or

- At the time of account collection if the third party is liable on the account. n97

If none of these narrow exceptions apply, then the creditor cannot obtain a consumer report on the spouse. n98

According to the FTC Commentary, a permissible purpose for making a consumer report on a nonapplicant spouse can never exist under the FCRA where Equal Credit Opportunity Act Regulation B prohibits the creditor from requesting the information, n99 or where a nonapplicant is a former spouse, a legally separated spouse, or has otherwise indicated an intent to legally disassociate with the marriage. n100 On the other hand, it may be that there is a permissible purpose to seek information on a divorced spouse if alimony or child support payments from that spouse are relied upon by the applicant to qualify for credit. n101 A former spouse also has a permissible purpose to obtain a joint credit report of her former husband when the information contained in the report related to the creditworthiness, credit standing and credit capacity of the parties' ability to discharge their parental duties under state law. n102 An ex-spouse may access the former spouse's credit report as long as she reasonably believes the former spouse owes her a debt (even if it is not actually owed). n103

[f] Use in Connection With Insurance Claims

Most courts and FTC opinions have held that insurance claims reports are not consumer reports when information is used, expected to be used, and collected solely for that purpose.

Nevertheless, there is still the question whether a consumer report can be furnished to a user whose purpose involves investigation of an insurance claim.

The FTC Commentary finds no permissible purpose to use consumer reports for insurance claims purposes. n104 The FCRA lists as permissible insurance purposes only those uses "connected with the underwriting of insurance." n105

Practitioners report that insurance companies utilize waivers containing vague but broad language in connection with processing insurance claims. Such waivers are then used as grounds to access consumer reports and gather information on the consumers. This practice undermines the FCRA's protections against accessing consumer reports for impermissible purposes.

[g] Use of Lists of Consumers, Marketing Research, and Prescreening

[i] General

Users often seek from reporting agencies lists of consumers with certain characteristics, or lists which specify the varying characteristics of individuals on the list. Whether reporting agencies can provide such lists to users will turn on three questions--whether the lists are consumer reports (and thus covered by the FCRA), whether the user has a permissible purpose for obtaining the list, and whether the user has a permissible purpose for obtaining information on every member of the list.

[ii] Requirement That Lists Be Coded

Lists of consumers are prohibited, unless at the time the list is furnished to the user, the user is involved in a transaction with every consumer on the list. A list of consumers and their characteristics is actually a consumer report on each named individual on the list, n106 and the user must have a permissible purpose to obtain the information from each consumer on the list. n107

The FTC Commentary provides an important exception to this rule, however: such lists are not consumer reports and can be provided to users as long as the list is coded (for example, by social security number) so that the consumer's identity is not disclosed. n108

The list becomes a series of consumer reports when the list is decoded. n109 At that time, the user must have a permissible purpose for each report (i.e., on each individual) that is decoded. For example, a reporting agency might provide a user with a list of individually coded bad check writers. The agency also provides the user with additional information to "break" the code. This is permissible as long as the user does not break the code on an individual until that individual seeks to write a check with that creditor. n110

[iii] Permissible Purpose Also Required

Lists compiled for marketing research cannot be used under the FCRA because marketing research is not a permissible purpose. n111

[iv] Prescreening Lists

Prescreening is the process whereby consumer reporting agencies compile or edit lists of consumers who meet specific criteria, and then provide the lists to users who solicit consumers with a firm offer for the users' products or services. n112 Prescreening is at the heart of the pre-approved credit card solicitations that inundate many households. The FCRA allows prescreening for credit and insurance purposes only; n113 prescribes limitations on prescreening; and requires that the reporting agencies maintain an elaborate system permitting consumers to elect to be excluded from prescreened lists. n114

The section of the FCRA governing prescreening is titled Furnishing Reports in Connection With Credit or Insurance Transactions That Are Not Initiated by the Consumer. In the vernacular, however, this simply means prescreening.

[A] Prescreened Lists Are a Type of Consumer Report

Consumer reporting agencies do in fact compile and sell many kinds of mailing lists to retailers to use to solicit business from consumers, many of which are not prescreened reports. These so-called target marketing lists compete with thousands of other mailing lists of consumers sold to every imaginable kind of business. The question is when a mailing list of consumers from a consumer reporting agency is a prescreened list and when is it a target marketing list. If it is a prescreened list, the list may be sold, but only for credit or insurance purposes and only to be used by the retailer to make a "firm offer" to the consumer. If it is a target marketing list, its use may be altogether unrestricted.

In a settlement with TRW (now Experian) in the early 1990s, the FTC distinguished between the use of generic identification information to generate mailing lists and lists compiled from credit information (and presumably employment or insurance information) used as a factor in determining a consumer's creditworthiness. Thus, TRW could freely use names, telephone numbers, mother's maiden names, addresses, zip codes, years of birth, ages, generational definitions, social security numbers, and "substantially similar" identifiers to compile lists of consumers for marketing purposes. n115 Such target marketing lists the FTC considers outside the scope of the FCRA and FCRA restrictions do not apply.

Trans Union goes much further. Its target marketing lists are compiled from information collected and used by retailers in determining creditworthiness. That is, the lists reflect specific credit-based factors, such as number of car loans, open credit card accounts and credit limits, presence of second mortgages, and/or credit scores. n116 These lists are heavily marketed to send catalogues, sweepstakes promotions, product offers, and invitations to apply for services.

Following remand from the U.S. Court of Appeals, n117 the FTC recently affirmed an administrative law judge's ruling, on remand from the U.S. Court of Appeals, that such lists are prescreening lists that may be used only for permissible purposes enumerated by the FCRA. n118 The Commission interpreted "factor in establishing the consumer's eligibility for credit" n119 to include any information considered by lenders in prescreening. The D.C. Court of Appeals denied Trans Union's subsequent petition for review, n120 finding substantial evidence to support the Commission's finding that Trans Union allowed marketers to request lists based on any of five categories of information: credit limits, open dates of loans, number of tradelines, type of tradeline and existence of a tradeline, and that lenders consider each of these five categories of information in prescreening or credit scoring models. n121 Accordingly, the Commission was justified in finding that the target marketing lists were "consumer reports." In dissenting from the denial of Trans Union's petition for certiorari, Justice Kennedy recognized, "Prescreening entails the disclosure of detailed credit performance information, including bill payment history. Release of this information is far more invasive of consumer privacy than release of the names and addresses contained in petitioner's marketing lists." n122

In prescreening, the user may provide a list of consumers to a reporting agency, which then edits out consumers with credit problems. Alternatively, the consumer reporting agency may generate lists from its own files. The prescreened list is a series of consumer reports because the list conveys information on each individual's creditworthiness or insurability, n123 and the user wishes to mail an offer to individuals on the list. The user can receive little more than the name and the address of the consumer. n124 An identifier may be provided, but it must not be unique to the consumer, such as a social security number is, and is to be used solely for the purpose of verifying the identity of the consumer. Other information about the consumer may be provided, but it must not identify the relationship or the experience of the consumer with a particular creditor, insurer, or other entity.

[B] A Firm Offer Is Required

A consumer reporting agency may provide a prescreened list of consumers only if the user makes a so-called "firm offer" of credit or insurance to each consumer on the list, or if the consumer authorizes an agency to include the consumer's name and address on prescreening lists. A firm offer is necessary in the logic of the statute because the report can be used only in connection with a consumer transaction. Having a firm offer apparently is close enough.

A "firm offer" does not have to be very firm or include specific terms, such as interest rate. n125 The general rule is that the offer of credit or insurance will be honored if, based on the information in the consumer report, the consumer meets the criteria specified for the prescreening list. However, the definition of firm offer allows three contingencies. n126 First, the user may require and rely on the consumer's application for whatever product or service is offered. The second, the user may retain the right to verify that the consumer meets the criteria used to select the prescreening list. The third, the consumer may be required to provide sufficient collateral for the offered credit or insurance. The collateral requirement must be disclosed to the consumer in the offer.

The Seventh Circuit has ruled that "sham" offers--those that provide no meaningful benefit to consumers in exchange for giving up statutorily protected privacy rights in credit reports--are not "firm offers." The court rejected defendant's claim that guarantee of at least $300 credit line to buy a car at interest rates anywhere from 2.9% to 24.9% is a firm offer. Defendant argued that a firm offer can be of any amount, but the court disagreed, concluding that such a definition would eviscerate the statutory purpose behind the FCRA to protect consumer data and privacy. In reversing the lower court the Seventh Circuit found that the "entire offer and the effect of all material conditions that comprise the credit product in question" must be considered. n127

On the other hand, another Seventh Circuit panel found 2-1, over a strong dissent, that a credit card offer had value even though the card was admittedly not an attractive deal for "the great majority" of consumers. n128 The defendant offered a credit card with a $250 credit limit and with $184 in fees for opening the account. The court noted that the offer did specify the material terms and might have value to a consumer who charged and paid off $250 in purchases each month and was trying to build up or reestablish credit.

The rigor of the "firm offer" test varies considerably from judge to judge, even in the same court. n128.1 Some courts reject offers that treat prescreened consumers no differently than other consumers, n128.2 but others strain to find value even in totally vague offers with significant contingencies. n128.3 Some courts outside of the Seventh Circuit have rejected the idea that an offer must have some value to be firm. n128.4

Note that a firm offer of credit may not be accompanied by a credit card; if it is, the issuer has violated the Truth in Lending Act's prohibition against unsolicited credit cards. n129 A lender has a permissible purpose to request a credit report to verify eligibility even if the lender previously represented that the consumer was preapproved for credit. The Act specifically permits lenders to make purportedly "firm offers of credit" that are conditioned on verification "using information in a consumer report" that the consumer continues to meet the criteria used to make the offer. n129.1

[C] Consumers Can Elect to Be Excluded From Prescreening Lists

Recognizing the intrusive nature of direct marketing campaigns, the FCRA requires that consumer reporting agencies which prepare prescreening lists also maintain a system by which consumers may elect to have their names omitted from such lists. n130 Consumer reporting agencies must establish and maintain a notification system, including a toll-free number, which permits any consumer to notify agencies of the consumer's election to keep his or her name and address off such marketing lists. The nationwide reporting agencies must operate a joint notification system, so that an opt-out notice to one is effectively an opt-out notice to the others and their affiliates. To remove oneself from future prescreened offers and solicitations for more than two years, the consumer must submit a signed notice of election issued by the agency. n131 Indications are that consumers overwhelmingly choose to opt out permanently. n132 As of December 1, 2004, the term of the opt-out period changed from two years to five. n133 This right to opt-out of prescreening lists should not be confused with the new right of consumers to opt-out of the use of their information by affiliates for marketing purposes. This right, added by the FACTA, applies to information that falls outside of the FCRA's definition of consumer report pursuant to either the first-hand knowledge exception or the affiliate exception. n134 Pursuant to a FACTA requirement, the FTC issued a final rule for the prescreened offer notice in which consumers are informed of their right to opt out of receiving future prescreened offers. n135 The effective date for this regulation is August 1, 2005. n136 Each prescreened offer must contain a short statement informing consumers of their right to opt out and listing the toll-free number to call, as well as a longer statement providing additional information about prescreening. Agencies must present the notice in that format and must also include the address and telephone number of the opt-out notification system. n137

[v] No FCRA Restriction Where List Does Not Involve Consumer Reports

Lists which are not used, expected to be used, or collected for evaluating consumers for credit, insurance, employment, or other permissible purposes are not consumer reports and are not subject to the Act. Examples may include telephone directories, lists of individuals with checking accounts, lists used only for law enforcement purposes, target marketing, and lists of insurance agents. n138 Whether a list is a series of consumer reports is a factual issue which must be resolved based on the expected and actual uses of the lists. However, although the FCRA may not prohibit a consumer reporting agency from reporting lists that do not involve consumer reports, if the information on the list falls within the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act's definition of nonpublic personal information, n139 it may be protected from disclosure by that Act.

[4] Agency Procedures Insuring That Only Users With Permissible Purposes Obtain Reports

[a] General

Consumer reporting agencies have two separate obligations concerning when they can release consumer reports to users, and they should be liable under the FCRA for failing to comply with either provision. Agencies cannot furnish consumer reports for impermissible purposes, and both negligent and willful violations of this requirement are actionable under the Act. n140 In addition, reporting agencies must "maintain reasonable procedures ... to limit the furnishing of consumer reports to the purposes listed." n141 Failure to comply with this provision should be actionable under the FCRA as well. That is, agencies are liable if they either furnish reports for impermissible purposes or if they do not maintain reasonable procedures. n142

[b] User Identification and Certifications

[i] Nature of Certification

The reporting agency must obtain a specific, written certification that the recipient will obtain reports for certain specific purposes and for no others. n143 If the report is obtained by a reseller to furnish to someone else, the reseller must identify the end-user. In addition, if an investigative consumer report has been requested, the user must certify to the agency that it has already made the required disclosures to the subject of the report, and, further, that, upon written request, the user will make a complete and accurate disclosure of the nature and scope of the investigation requested.

Reports used for employment purposes and some reports requested by child support enforcement agencies are subject to additional certification requirements which are discussed elsewhere.

[ii] Blanket Certifications

The user may provide a blanket certification stating that it will use all reports only for particular specified permissible purposes and for no others. As long as there is no reason to believe the user may be violating its certification, additional certification need not be provided for each individual report furnished. n144

Some auto dealers have been reported to pull customer reports before any actual application for credit has been made in order to increase negotiating power; Louisiana has even specifically addressed this abuse by statute, prohibiting dealers from requesting, obtaining or reviewing a consumer's credit report in connection with: (1) a test drive; (2) a request for information about pricing or financing; or (3) for negotiating with the consumer, unless the dealer received an application from the consumer to lease or finance or has written authorization from the consumer to obtain or review the credit report. n145 The abuse may be sufficiently widespread that a credit reporting agency may not reasonably rely on a dealer's blanket certification, but should require additional separate certifications from the dealer to ensure that the dealer has a permissible purpose, such as an application for financing or for a lease, to obtain the report.

[iii] Follow-Up and Continuing Reports

If there is a risk that follow-up reports will not be used for a permissible purpose, the reporting agency will have to obtain a separate certification for each follow-up report. n146

Similarly, if a reporting agency provides to a creditor activity reports on customers with open-end accounts, it must make certain that the creditor will notify the agency when an account is closed and paid in full. Once the account is closed, the creditor no longer has a permissible purpose to receive the report. n147

[c] Agency Verification Procedures

It is not enough that the reporting agency obtain a certification from the user. The agency must have a system to verify that it is dealing with a legitimate business having a legitimate permissible purpose for the requested report. n148 What constitutes adequate verification will vary with the circumstances. n149

When doubt arises concerning a particular user's compliance with its contractual certification, the reporting agency must take steps to insure compliance, such as requiring from that user a separate, advance certification for each report it furnishes or auditing the user to verify that it is obtaining reports only for a permissible purpose. n150

[d] Electronic Communication of Reports

Electronic communication of consumer reports to users is common. The FTC Commentary permits users to access the files of consumer reporting agencies through in-house computer terminals. n151 Agencies must, however, take the necessary steps to insure that the users have a permissible purpose. n152 The agency must also be able to know and retain a record of what users have obtained access to consumer reports on which consumers. n153

[e] Retention of Request Records

The consumer has the right to request from the reporting agency disclosure of the names of all persons who have received a report issued for any permissible purpose within the past six months, and the names of all persons who have received a report furnished for employment purposes within the preceding two years. n154 If the consumer discovers that the consumer report contains inaccurate or inadequate information, the consumer will want to ensure that all past users of the report are notified of corrections or additions to the consumer report. Additionally, the consumer will be able to discover users that may have used the report for impermissible purposes or under false pretenses. n155

[5] Liability of Reporting Agency Employees for Impermissible Uses

"Any officer or employee of a consumer reporting agency who knowingly and willfully provides information ... from the agency's files to a person not authorized to receive that information" is subject to criminal liability under the Act. n156 While the FTC has not issued an interpretation of this FCRA provision, and no criminal suits have been brought under it, it is likely that there is a private civil action under the FCRA to enforce this provision.

Where a reporting agency employee acts beyond the scope of employment, issues may arise as to whether the reporting agency is liable for the employee's release of information for an impermissible use. The consumer may be able to obtain a judgment against an employee who acts without the reporting agency's knowledge, even if there is no cause of action against the reporting agency. If an employee of the consumer reporting agency has violated the criminal provision of the Act, n157 and the reporting agency cannot be held liable for violating the Act's substantive permissible purposes requirement, n158 the reporting agency nevertheless may be liable for failing to comply with the Act's procedural requirement. n159

[6] User Liability for Impermissible Purposes n160

It is unclear whether consumers can bring FCRA actions against users for negligently obtaining information for impermissible purposes. Users are liable under the Act for actual damages and attorney fees if they negligently fail to comply with any FCRA requirement, n161 and for punitive damages as well as for willful violations. n162 The question is whether a user may be liable for negligently or willfully causing a report to be prepared for impermissible purposes in violation of section 1681b, the section on permissible purposes. n163

The more direct approach to suing is to tie liability to a user's certification violation, or to use the FCRA's false pretenses provision. Civil liability under the Act applies to users who willfully fail to comply with any FCRA requirement. n164 Furthermore, the false pretenses section provides that "[a]ny person who knowingly and willfully obtains information on a consumer from a consumer reporting agency under false pretenses" will be subject to criminal penalties. n165 Thus, consumers may bring a civil suit under the FCRA for violation of the criminal provision dealing with false pretenses. n166

CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

1-16 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 16.05

§ 16.05 Furnishing Information to Consumer Reporting Agencies

While the FCRA imposes standards and obligations upon those who furnish information about consumers to consumer reporting agencies, there is no private enforcement and no statutory remedy for violations. In some circumstances, tort actions may be brought but often the only realistic civil remedy available to the consumer will be for violations of the duty of a furnisher to adequately reinvestigate the accuracy or completeness of information after the consumer has disputed the accuracy of that information with the consumer reporting agency.

The FACTA of 2003 placed additional duties on furnishers, some of which are completely new and many of which relate to existing duties. Such duties include the duty to reinvestigate certain consumer disputes received directly from consumers, the duty of financial institutions to notify consumers when they submit negative information, and the duty to block unverifiable information. Additional duties were placed on furnishers with respect to identity theft.

[1] Creditors and Others Who Furnish Information to Consumer Reporting Agencies

[a] Limitations on Who Is a Furnisher

The rules of the FCRA, including those that apply to furnishers, generally do not apply to companies furnishing information to other entities affiliated by common ownership or corporate control, even if the receiving affiliate functions as an in-house credit bureau. n1

Creditors sometimes sell lists of customers meeting specified criteria to other creditors, direct marketers and mass mailing houses, and to other compilers of marketing databases. Although a creditor or other business may be furnishing information, it is not furnishing information to a consumer reporting agency. Other privacy regulations may apply, n2 but the FCRA rules on furnishers and on consumer reporting agencies do not.

In addition, the FCRA preempts all state laws regarding the furnishing of information to consumer reporting agencies, with the exception of California and Massachusetts.

[b] Who Qualifies as a Furnisher

Practically anyone who furnishes consumer information to a consumer reporting agency is a "furnisher" of information under the FCRA. The terms furnisher and furnishing are not defined. Furnishers include creditors, insurers, employers, landlords, banks, doctors, lawyers, and even those who do not regularly report information to reporting agencies. The Act simply uses language like "any person who furnishes information about a consumer to a consumer reporting agency."

Public agencies may be furnishers as well, in which case special rules may apply. Federal agencies are authorized to disclose debtor information to consumer reporting agencies, but restrictions apply to the nature of the information which may be furnished and when it may be furnished. n3 Federal law actually requires that defaults on student loans be reported to consumer reporting agencies as a means of encouraging debt repayment. A few restrictions apply.

The information which is furnished must be about a consumer and must be furnished to a consumer reporting agency. A consumer is essentially any individual natural person. n4 A consumer reporting agency may be a credit bureau, tenant screening business, check verification company, or a variety of other compilers of databases. n5

[2] Furnishing Information to Consumer Reporting Agencies

[a] Most Information Is Furnished Electronically

While not required by law, the practical reality is that virtually all information furnished to and used by consumer reporting agencies is transmitted electronically. Users of consumer reporting agencies regularly dump information about their customers into an electronic computer-to-computer communication or onto a disk provided to the reporting agency. Rarely is information furnished by hard copy, and it is generally discouraged. Information from courts, city halls, tax offices, and departments of motor vehicles is usually available and reported electronically as well, although sometimes agencies will use contractors to collect the information by hand for conversion to electronic form.

One consequence of this reliance upon electronic communication even by furnishers of information is that a correction of inaccurate information by a creditor is of limited effectiveness if it is not reflected with precision in the same database used to report current information on a weekly or monthly basis to the consumer reporting agencies. Any resolution of a dispute with a furnisher should ensure that the outcome is properly reported to the agency and also properly added to the correct database.

The computer reporting software used by most creditors is "Metro 2." n6 It was designed by the credit reporting industry, including the so-called "Big Three": Equifax, Experian, and Trans Union. The program and instructions are available for users from the Consumer Data Industry Association, Inc. ("CDIA") an industry trade association, and from each of the major reporting agencies. CDIA's website also contains valuable information about Metro 2, including instructions on how to access the Metro 2 format and frequently asked questions and answers about Metro 2 reporting. n7

[b] The Furnishing of Disputed Information Is Restricted

Under the FCRA, if a consumer has disputed with the creditor or other furnisher the accuracy or completeness of information, the furnisher may not report that information to a consumer reporting agency unless it also provides notice that the information is disputed. n8 In turn, the agency must note the dispute in each consumer report which contains the disputed information. n9

Private enforcement of this furnisher obligation, like so many others, is severely restricted. However, the additional restrictions on furnishing disputed information to a reporting agency can give rise to claims of civil liability under other statutory provisions. Under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, n10 a debt collector is required to cease all collection efforts if a written dispute is received within the thirty-day validation period, until verification is provided. n11 Reporting an outstanding debt to a reporting agency is a "powerful tool" to force payment. n12 (The validation period commences when the collector sends a required validation notice to the consumer at the beginning of the collection efforts.) An informal FTC staff opinion n13 states that reporting a charged-off debt to a reporting agency is collection activity and that the debt may not be reported at all during this period. If the collector ceases collection activity altogether during this period, it still may not report the debt. Further, if an agency has already reported the debt to a credit reporting agency (for example, in the period before a written dispute is received), the debt collection act requires the collector to report the dispute. n14 In addition, false threats or threats to report false information to a credit bureaus are prohibited by the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act when they are made by a debt collector, and the same behavior by creditors may likewise be proscribed by state statutes or be deceptive under state unfair and deceptive acts and practices laws. n15

The Fair Credit Billing Act ("FCBA") regulates creditor activity when a consumer complains of a billing error. n16 The FCBA applies to credit card bills and other open-end credit, although there is some possibility that the FCBA may also apply to closed-end loans. n17 A billing error is defined quite broadly to cover a wide variety of consumer complaints. n18 After receiving the consumer's written notification of a billing error, the creditor may not directly or indirectly threaten to report to any person (such as a consumer reporting agency) that the consumer has failed to pay an amount which is due. The creditor is permitted to report that the consumer has disputed the amount.

Federal law also allows credit card holders to raise defenses against a card issuer based on the card holder's claims against the merchant. n19 The card holder must have first made a good faith attempt to resolve the dispute with the merchant, the amount involved must exceed $50, and the transaction must have occurred in the consumer's state or within one hundred miles of the consumer's residence. n20 The card holder loses the right to raise defenses if payment for that charge has already been made to the card issuer. This is a common reason for a consumer to dispute the accuracy of a credit card bill.

Once the consumer has notified the card issuer that payment is being withheld because claims and defenses are being asserted, the amount is in dispute and may not be reported as a delinquent amount, at least until the dispute is settled or judgment rendered. n21 The creditor may report the amount as in dispute. n22 The card issuer can pursue normal collection routines on the disputed amount, including filing suit, but the consumer can then raise the merchant's misconduct as a defense in the suit. Often the card issuer will simply remove the debit from the consumer's account and charge back the amount to the merchant, although this is not required.

The Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act ("RESPA") n23 provides certain rights to consumers to dispute the amount owed under all of these different types of loans and offers the consumer protection from adverse credit reports during the dispute period. RESPA applies to federally related mortgage loans, which is a defined term that includes virtually all loans secured by a first or junior lien on residential real property (including individual condominium and cooperative units) designed for occupancy of one to four families. n24 If a consumer disputes an amount being sought on a loan covered by RESPA, the consumer can send the servicer a qualified written request. n25 Within sixty days the servicer must make any necessary corrections to the account or provide the consumer with a statement why the servicer believes the account is correct. During the sixty-day period when a servicer is evaluating a borrower's qualified written request relating to a dispute regarding the borrower's payments or a request for information, a servicer may not provide any information to a reporting agency regarding an overdue payment that relates to the consumer's qualified written request. n26

Noncompliance with these RESPA requirements subjects the servicer to an action for attorney fees, actual damages, and (if there is a pattern or practice of noncompliance) up to $1000 in statutory damages for each individual or up to $500,000 or one percent of the servicer's net worth in the case of a class action. n27

The ECOA prohibits creditors from discriminating against consumers in credit transactions n28 including discrimination in the "furnishing of credit information."

Federal agencies may report debts to consumer reporting agencies, but only to a limited extent and only if certain procedures are established and followed. n29 Perhaps more importantly, the internal procedures which must be followed include prior notice to the consumer and the agency keeping reported information up to date. Compliance with the FCRA is also required.

[c] Standards of Accuracy for Furnishers

The Fair Credit Reporting Act and the FACTA of 2003 establish minimum standards of accuracy for creditors and other furnishers initially providing information about consumers to consumer reporting agencies. n30

The duties of accuracy contained in the FCRA may be enforced by the Federal Trade Commission, state attorneys general, and other public officials, but may not be enforced by private right of action. n31 The only privately enforceable FCRA standards of accuracy covering the furnishers of information are those involving the reinvestigation which a creditor must perform after a consumer requests that a consumer reporting agency reinvestigate. (Reinvestigations standards are discussed below). In particularly egregious cases, involving malice, a creditor may be liable for defamation or other torts, n32 but otherwise FCRA liability for furnishers derives from consumer reporting agency reinvestigations and not from any independent standard of accuracy applicable to furnishers.

The FCRA previously prohibited a furnisher from furnishing information that the furnisher "knows or consciously avoids knowing is inaccurate." n33 This standard was changed by the FACTA of 2003 to prohibit a furnisher from furnishing information that the furnisher "knows or has reasonable cause to believe" is inaccurate. n34 The term "reasonable cause to believe" is defined as "having specific knowledge, other than solely allegations by the consumer, that would cause a reasonable person to have substantial doubts about the accuracy of the information." n35 This standard, however, is not applicable to furnishers who maintain a special address for notification of inaccuracies. n36 The FCRA also prohibits furnishers from furnishing information that is in fact inaccurate, but only if the consumer has complained. n37 This provision was not amended by the FACTA.

The two accuracy provisions must also be read in conjunction with the subsection that immediately follows them establishing a duty to promptly correct and update furnished information determined to be incomplete or inaccurate, a provision that also was not amended by the FACTA. n38 This duty is applicable to furnishers that regularly and in the ordinary course of business furnish information to credit reporting agencies. n39

[i] Furnisher Accuracy and Integrity Guidelines

The Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act of 2003 (FACTA) required the Federal Trade Commission and the banking regulators n40 (referred to collectively as "Regulators") to issue guidelines for furnishers regarding the accuracy and integrity of information they furnish to the consumer reporting agencies (CRAs). n41 The Regulators must also issue regulations requiring furnishers to establish reasonable policies and procedures for implementing those guidelines. n42

Violation of the furnisher accuracy and integrity guidelines does not subject the furnisher to the private right of action under sections 1681n and 1681o of the FCRA. n43 However, these guidelines may influence what constitutes a "reasonable investigation" when the furnisher must respond to a dispute pursuant to section 1681s-2(b) that the consumer made to a CRA.

The effective date of the furnisher accuracy and integrity guidelines is July 1, 2010. n44 States are preempted from regulating the subject matter of the provision. n45

[A] Furnishers Required to Have Policies and Procedures for Accuracy and Integrity

The furnisher accuracy and integrity guidelines are divided into two parts--the Guidelines themselves and a mandatory regulation. The regulation requires furnishers to establish and implement reasonable policies and procedures regarding the accuracy and integrity of the information that they furnish to CRAs. n46 However, while having a set of policies and procedures is mandatory, compliance with all of the Guidelines is not. n47

A furnisher's policies and procedures regarding accuracy and integrity must be in writing. n48 The regulation requires the policies and procedures to be appropriate to the business's nature, size. n49

Furnishers are required to periodically review and update their policies and procedures for accuracy and integrity as necessary to ensure their continued effectiveness. n50

[B] Definitions

The regulation defines accuracy and integrity for the purposes of both the accuracy and integrity guidelines and the direct dispute regulation.

Under the regulations, "accuracy" is defined to mean that information a furnisher provides to a CRA about an account or other relationship with the consumer correctly:

(1) Reflects the terms of and liability for the account or other relationship; n51

(2) Reflects the consumer's performance and other conduct with respect to the account or other relationship; n52 and

(3) Identifies the appropriate consumer. n53

"Integrity" is defined to mean that information provided by a furnisher to a CRA about an account or other relationship with the consumer:

(1) Is substantiated by the furnisher's records at the time it is furnished [emphasis added]; n54

(2) Is furnished in a form and manner that is designed to minimize the likelihood that the information may be incorrectly reflected in a consumer report; n55 and

(3) Includes the information in the furnisher's possession about the account or other relationship that the [applicable regulator] has:

(i) Determined that the absence of which would likely be materially misleading in evaluating a consumer's creditworthiness, credit standing, credit capacity, character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living; n56 and

(ii) Listed in section I(b)(2)(iii) of Appendix E. n57 (Appendix E is where the accuracy and integrity Guidelines are located).

A "furnisher" is defined as an entity that furnishes information relating to consumers to one or more CRAs for inclusion in a consumer report. n58 The definition excludes certain entities from being a furnisher, including:

- An entity that provides information to a CRA solely to obtain a consumer report in accordance with sections 1681b(a) and (f), that is, as part of an inquiry; n59

- A "consumer reporting agency" as defined in section 1681a(f); n60

- The consumer himself or herself to whom the furnished information pertains; n61 or

- A neighbor, friend, or associate of the consumer, or another individual, with whom the consumer is acquainted or who may have knowledge about the consumer and who provides information about the consumer's character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living in response to a specific request from a CRA. n62

The last exception is intended to apply to persons from whom information is collected in connection with an investigative consumer report. n63

[C] The Guidelines

The guidelines are located in Appendix E of each Regulator's FCRA regulations. They are divided into three parts: Nature, Score, and Objectives; Establishing and Implementing Policies and Procedures; and Specific Components of Policies and Procedures.

The first part of the guidelines sets forth the objectives that a furnisher's accuracy and integrity policies and procedures should have. These objectives include:

- Furnishing information that is accurate and has integrity. These objectives restate the definition of accuracy and integrity but expand upon the latter by requiring the furnishing of credit limits. n64

- Conducting reasonable investigations of consumer disputes and taking appropriate action based on the outcomes; n65 and

- Updating information as necessary to reflect the current status of the consumer's account or other relationship, including any transfer of an account (for example, sale or assignment for collection) or cure of the consumer's failure to abide by the terms of the account or other relationship. n66

The second part of the guidelines involves what furnishers should do when establishing and implementing policies and procedures for accuracy and integrity. Furnishers should identify practices or activities that can compromise the accuracy or integrity of information by:

- Reviewing existing practices and activities, including the technology and methods used to furnish information to CRAs and the frequency and timing of furnishing of information; n67

- Reviewing historical records relating to accuracy or integrity or to disputes; n68

- Reviewing other information relating to the accuracy or integrity of information; n69

- Considering the types of errors, omissions, or other problems that may have affected the accuracy or integrity of information; n70

- Obtaining feedback from the furnisher's staff; n71

- Considering the potential impact of the furnisher's policies and procedures on consumers; n72 and

- Considering feedback received from CRAs, consumers, or other appropriate parties. n73

The final and most critical part of the guidelines is a section of specific components that furnishers should consider including in their policies and procedures on accuracy and integrity. Some of these specific components include:

- Using standard data reporting formats when feasible. n74 This component presumably suggests that furnisher use the Metro 2 reporting format. n75

- Maintaining records for a reasonable period of time, not less than any applicable recordkeeping requirement, in order to substantiate the accuracy of any information about consumers it furnishes that is subject to a direct dispute. n76

- Establishing and implementing appropriate internal controls regarding the accuracy and integrity of information furnished to CRAs, such as by implementing standard procedures and verifying random samples of information provided to CRAs. n77

- Training appropriate staff. n78

- Providing for appropriate and effective oversight of relevant service providers. n79

- Furnishing information following mergers, portfolio acquisitions, or sales or other acquisitions or transfers of accounts in a manner that prevents:

    -- Re-aging of information,

    -- Duplicative reporting, or

    -- Other similar problems. n80

- Deleting, updating, and correcting information in the furnisher's records, as appropriate, to avoid furnishing inaccurate information. n81

- Designing technological and other means of communication with CRAs to prevent:

    -- Duplicative reporting of accounts,

    -- Erroneous association of information with the wrong consumer(s), and

    -- Other problems. n82

- Providing sufficient identifying information in the furnisher's possession about consumers. n83

If a consumer disputes the accuracy or completeness of any information which has been furnished to a consumer reporting agency, the furnisher may not in the future report this information to a reporting agency unless it notes that it has been disputed. n84 Even if the creditor determines that the disputed information was neither inaccurate nor incomplete, or is unable to make any determination about the dispute raised by the consumer, the creditor must note that the information is disputed whenever it furnishes the information to a reporting agency in the future.

Accounts placed for collection or charged to profit and loss may not be included in consumer reports after seven years. n85 The information is then considered obsolete. The seven-year period begins when the account is placed for collection or charged to profit and loss. Any person who provides information about a delinquent account placed for collection or written off must also inform the reporting agency when the preceding delinquency commenced. n86 FACTA amended the FCRA to require that a date of delinquency be reported within 90 days from the date the item of information is furnished to the credit reporting agency. n87 This requirement assists in determining the seven year obsolescence period and any proper tolling of the period. Before this amendment problems persisted because the month and year to report as the date of delinquency were not synonymous with the date of initial default, nor were they linked to a specific event. This caused significant compliance problems and the debt collection industry sought a fix, which resulted in the aforementioned amendment.

[ii] Consumers May Dispute Furnished Information Directly With the Furnisher Under the FACTA

The prior version of the FCRA had no provision by which a consumer could formally dispute an inaccurate item of information and request a reinvestigation directly with the furnisher; rather, the consumer had to dispute the item with the agency, which was then required by the FCRA to notify the furnisher. n88 The FCRA, prior to amendment by the FACTA, required the furnisher to reinvestigate the item only upon receiving the agency's notice; a notice from the consumer was irrelevant and ineffective. n89 Now a consumer may trigger a furnisher's responsibility to reinvestigate by disputing the item directly with the furnisher when the circumstances of the dispute meet the conditions of to-be-prescribed regulations. n90 This new provision specifically provides, however, that such a reinvestigation responsibility will not be initiated by a notice from or prepared by a credit repair organization, n91 and furnishers need not respond to "frivolous" or "irrelevant" disputes. n92 However, if the furnisher considers the dispute frivolous, the furnisher must notify the consumer within five business days of this determination, the reason it considers the dispute frivolous, and what information the consumer must provide to convert the dispute into one that will trigger a reinvestigation. n93 The furnisher must investigate the dispute and report the results back to the consumer in the same time frame allowed credit reporting agencies for reinvestigation. n94 If the furnisher finds the information to be inaccurate, the furnisher must correct the information with each agency to which the furnisher furnished the information. n95 As with the pre-existing reinvestigation responsibilities that arise upon notice from an agency, states are preempted from regulating the subject matter of this provision; n96 however, unlike those responsibilities, under this law it appears that consumers may not privately enforce this provision against furnishers. n97

The regulations concerning this obligation will impact what constitutes a "reasonable investigation" when the furnisher must reinvestigate a dispute pursuant to section 1681s-2(b) that the consumer made to a CRA. Some of the requirements contained in the regulations can be used to show the recurring problems that furnishers now must be on notice for and thus take reasonable steps to deal with in a section 1681s-2(b) investigation. Indeed, the Regulators have noted the parallel between the furnisher's duties of investigation under the direct dispute provision and under Section 1681s-2(b), stating that "a furnisher's investigation resulting from a direct dispute would be required to meet the same standard of reasonableness as it would if the notice of dispute were received through a CRA." n98

The effective date of the direct dispute regulations is July 1, 2010. States are preempted from regulating the subject matter of this provision. n99

[3] Consumer Reporting Agency Investigation Must Involve Furnisher

After a consumer has initiated a reinvestigation of inaccurate or incomplete information by submitting a dispute to a consumer reporting agency, the agency must notify any persons who furnished any of the disputed information. n100 This notice of dispute must be delivered within five days and, by statute, must include all relevant information provided by the consumer. If the agency receives additional information from the consumer before the furnisher completes its own investigation, that information too must be forwarded to the furnisher.

After receiving notice from a consumer reporting agency that information provided by the furnisher has been disputed, the furnisher must conduct its own investigation of the accuracy and completeness of the disputed information. n101 The investigation must be relatively swift. Results are normally to be reported back to the reporting agency within a month, sometimes a little longer. n102

The act does not specify standards or procedures for the investigation. Courts are, however, adopting the "reasonable investigation" standard, n103 the same standard as applicable to credit reporting agencies under section 1681i. The adequacy of the investigation will be a question of fact for jury determination. n104 An inadequate investigation may be actionable if it is negligent or willful behavior. n105 At least one defendant argued unsuccessfully that a furnisher's duty to "investigate" has no qualitative component to it. Their theory, that "any" investigation is sufficient, no matter how cursory, was rejected by a district court in Virginia in an unpublished opinion. n106

Because the furnisher must actually conduct an investigation and because the accuracy of the information is so important to both credit grantors and consumers, the furnisher may not instruct deletion instead of conducting a reasonable investigation. n107 Similarly, a consumer may maintain a claim to redress the furnisher's failure to conduct a reasonable investigation irrespective of whether the information is in fact inaccurate or incomplete. n108

[4] Furnisher Must Report Investigation Results

When its investigation determines that disputed information is "inaccurate or incomplete or cannot be verified," the furnisher must, "as appropriate," modify, delete, and/or "permanently block the reporting of that item of information" to prevent its re-reporting. n109 Because this duty is codified as part of section 1681s-2(b), it is subject to private enforcement under the same terms that recognize the consumer's private right of action to enforce the formal investigation duties. n110

Reinvestigations conducted by reporting agencies and initiated by a consumer's dispute must be completed within thirty days, with one extension allowed. n111 The thirty-day period begins on the date the agency receives the consumer's notice of dispute. At the end of the reinvestigation period, the disputed information must be deleted if it cannot be verified, or corrected or modified in light of the reinvestigation.

One fifteen-day extension of the reinvestigation period is allowed but only if, during the original thirty-day period, additional information relevant to the reinvestigation is received from the consumer. If it is reinserted into the consumer's file later, perhaps after the agency has obtained verification from the furnisher, the consumer must at the time be provided notice of the reinsertion. n112

Failure to complete the reinvestigation within the required statutory time limit subjects the agency to actual damages and attorney fees if the action is negligent. n113 If the failure is willful, the agency can also be liable for punitive damages. n114 To help ensure that corrected information is appropriately disseminated, an investigation which finds that the disputed information was inaccurate or incomplete must be reported by the furnisher to all agencies that operate on a nationwide basis and to which the information had been furnished. n115 Unlike section 1681*i*, which allows a CRA to terminate its investigation under certain circumstances if the consumer fails to provide it with sufficient information, n116 section 1681s-2(b) contains no similar provision, and a furnisher must still meet its duty to conduct a reasonable investigation even if the consumer fails or refuses to provide it with requested documentation. n117

[5] Creditor and Furnisher Liability For Information Furnished To Consumer Reporting Agencies

[a] Liability Under the FCRA

The single most important fact about furnisher liability is that private enforcement under the FCRA against creditors and others who furnish information to consumer reporting agencies is virtually eliminated except when the furnisher has failed to properly investigate, correct or update information in response to a notice of dispute received, not from the consumer, but from a consumer reporting agency. While tort liability may be available, state law claims are otherwise preempted

A furnisher who fails to comply with the requirements of the reinvestigation process is liable to the consumer for its negligent or willful acts. n118 The act generally provides that any person who negligently or willfully violates any of its provisions may be sued for actual, statutory and punitive damages. n119 No exception is made for furnishers who violate their obligations as part of the Act's reinvestigation procedures. Any furnisher who negligently fails to comply with any of these requirements is liable to the consumer for any actual damages, the costs of litigation and attorney's fees. If the failure of the furnisher is willful, the furnisher is liable for actual damages of not less than $100 and not more than $1000, and for punitive damages, as well as for costs and attorney's fees.

The strongest cases for furnisher liability arise when the creditor has clearly been informed of its error and failed to make corrections. A consumer puts herself in a strong position when the creditor is informed in writing of a dispute (with appropriate details of the error) and of the importance to the consumer of an accurate credit record, and when a copy of the dispute given to the reporting agency is also given to the creditor.

[b] Furnisher Liability for Related Torts

The FCRA limits a consumer's right to bring a proceeding in the nature of defamation, invasion of privacy, or negligence with respect to the reporting of information against any person who furnishes information to a consumer reporting agency. n120 There are two important caveats about this qualified immunity of furnishers. First, if the furnisher provides false information with malice or a willful intent to injure the consumer, the FCRA provides no immunity for such an act. n121 The consumer can then bring a tort action against the creditor or other party furnishing the information and, in such circumstances, often should also seek punitive damages.

Second, the limited immunity only applies when the information at issue was disclosed to the consumer pursuant to one of the various FCRA disclosure requirements to consumers disclosure of the contents of the consumer's file or disclosure after a consumer report leads to a denial of credit, insurance or employment. n122 If the consumer obtained the information directly from the furnisher, the immunity should not apply. Similarly, the immunity should not apply if the consumer obtained the information from a user who did not notify the consumer of a denial of employment, insurance or credit based on the report. n123 Concurrently with adopting in 1996 the furnisher provisions of section 1681s-2(b), Congress also expanded the preemption provisions to further insulate furnishers from most state law obligations. n124

Several cases have considered the effects of section 1681t's preemption. Two different phrases in section 1681t have caused confusion: the meaning of "requirement or prohibition" and the meaning of "subject matter regulated under ... section 1681s-2."

A Texas district court interpreted "requirement or prohibition" to include only state statutes, not common law actions, on the reasoning that the two specific state laws exempted from the preemption provision were both credit reporting statutes that specifically referenced furnishers. n125 A Kansas district court, however, seems to have assumed that the "requirement or prohibition" language includes common law tort actions, and not just state statutes. n126

More thoughtful analyses have sought to reconcile the two provisions by reading the preemption provision restrictively. For example, a Minnesota district court rejected a furnisher's argument that the immunity and preemption provisions together barred any action based on any matter regulated by section 1681s-2 because that reading would render the general immunity provision superfluous as to furnishers. n127

The other phrase that determines the scope of section 1681t's preemption is "subject matter regulated under ... section 1681s-2." n128 The cases discussing whether a claim encompasses such subject matter have more or less fallen into two schools of thought. The first, the before-and-after school, focuses on when the conduct that gave rise to the plaintiff's claim against the furnisher occurred, on the theory that section 1681s-2 regulates furnisher conduct only after a specific event has occurred: the furnisher has reported information with actual knowledge of errors (triggering section 1681s-2(a)(1)(A)); the furnisher has received notice from a consumer that specific information is inaccurate (triggering section 1681s-2(a)(1)(B)); or a consumer reporting agency has notified that furnisher that a reported item is in dispute (triggering section 1681s-2(b)). Under this analysis, claims based on the furnisher's behavior after the furnisher's responsibilities under section 1681s-2 have arisen are barred by the preemption provision. So, for example, in Aklagi v. Nationscredit Financial, n129 the court held that any defamation claim brought by an identity theft victim based on a furnisher furnishing inaccurate information to a consumer reporting agen cy after the furnisher received notice that the consumer disputed the information was wholly preempted.

Other courts have not focused on when the furnisher received notice of the inaccuracy, but rather have directed their attention towards the elements of the alleged cause of action itself, and how those elements compare with section 1681s-2. In short, this school of thought asks whether the essence of the claim the plaintiff seeks to bring is too similar to the subject matter of section 1681s-2 to escape preemption. So, for example, in another identity theft case, Carlson v. Trans Union, L.L.C., n130 the court framed its analysis around the elements of the particular claims, and held that a consumer's defamation claim against a telephone company that had furnished allegedly false reports withstood preemption under 1681t. The court noted that the scope of the preemption provision is limited to those state claims that relate to any "subject matter regulated under" section 1681s-2.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

1-16 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 16.06

§ 16.06 Obsolete Information

[1] General

The FCRA prohibits the reporting of most adverse information which is more than seven years old, n1 but does not restrict reporting information that is not adverse. n2 Agencies can thus report favorable information beyond the seven year period. n3 Certain information has been characterized as neutral by the FTC staff, and, as neutral information, it may be reported indefinitely. n4 Education records of graduation and degrees and dates of past employment are not considered adverse information.

Agencies can delete adverse or favorable information from reports whenever they wish before the seven year period, n5 although they should not purge favorable information sooner than adverse information. n6

It is improper to indicate or imply the existence of obsolete adverse information, even if the information itself is not reported. n7 A reporting agency may not report that a creditor (whose debt is now obsolete) cannot locate the debtor. n8 Similarly, the reporting agency cannot include information that the consumer was denied a job with a certain employer because of a criminal record, if that criminal record is obsolete. n9

[2] Maximum Time Periods to Retain Adverse Information

Under the FCRA, the various time periods for determining if information is obsolete relate to the occurrence of unfavorable events; the date the consumer reporting agency acquired the adverse information is irrelevant. n10

The FCRA provides specific time frames for five specialized types of information--bankruptcies, suits and judgments, paid tax liens, accounts placed for collection or charged to profit or loss, and records relating to a crime--and then provides a general rule for "any other adverse item of information," n11 excepting "records of convictions of crimes." No limit applies to criminal convictions. n12

The section of the FCRA specifying time frames for the five specialized types of information to become obsolete was as amended by the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act of 2003(FACTA) to also exclude certain types of medical information from being reported. FACTA amended the FCRA to specify how debt collectors should designate the date of delinquency to ensure that the date precedes the date the creditor placed the account for collection. n13

[a] Any Other Adverse Item

The general rule that adverse items (other than criminal conviction records and the five exceptions listed in the statute) cannot antedate the report by more than seven years applies to most information about delinquent loans other than those placed for collection or charged to profit and loss. n14 The existence of a delinquent account may be reported for seven years from the date of the last regularly scheduled payment before the account became delinquent. n15 Criminal convictions do not fall within the rule and may effectively be reported without limit. n16 Third, large transactions and high-paying jobs are exempted and are also discussed in a following section. n17

[b] Accounts Placed for Collection or Charged Off

Accounts placed for collection and charged to profit and loss are subject to a slightly different seven year rule. n18 The seven year rule for these accounts is modified by tying the calculation to the preceding delinquency and allowing an extra half year. n19 If an account is placed for collection, charged to profit or loss, or subjected to similar action more than 180 days after the preceding delinquency, the debt may still be included in consumer reports for only seven years and 180 days from the beginning of the delinquency, or about seven and a half years. This limit, which did not exist before the 1996 amendment to the Fair Credit Reporting Act, is effective for any item added to a consumer's reporting agency file after December 29, 1997. n20 In addition, the seven year period may commence sometime between the date of delinquency and 180 days afterwards.

The FTC Staff Commentary details specific standards as to when the seven year period begins. An account is placed for collection (thus triggering a seven year period) when dunning notices or other collection efforts begin, though not when the initial past-due notices are sent. n21 The collection efforts may be those either initiated by the creditor in-house or by an outside collection agency, whichever occurs first. The reporting period is not extended by assignment to another entity for further collection, or by a partial or full payment of an account. n22 However, the Commentary states that if the account is brought completely up to date, and another default occurs subsequently, the seven-year reporting period will run from the date of the new default. n23

Even though accounts may be listed as charge offs and may not be reported after the applicable obsolescence period has elapsed, creditors may still attempt to collect on the accounts. Charge offs are mere accounting procedures and creditors or debt collectors may still attempt to collect upon the underlying debt even after the account has become obsolete for credit reporting purposes. Such collection efforts remain subject to the applicable statute of limitations defense, so long as the consumer has not made any payments, which would renew the statute.

It is unclear whether the seven-year limitation period should begin anew if the consumer signs a repayment agreement. Such agreements, in effect, are one type of collection tool to assure that the original debt is paid in full or in part. In this sense, it should be treated as a repayment which does not extend the limitations period. To do otherwise will punish those who agree to repay and reward those who do not. However, one FTC staff opinion letter and the FTC Commentary say that a repayment agreement may be considered a new transaction with a new seven-year limitation period. n24 It may be separately reported as long as the report does not imply that there was a default prior to the repayment agreement.

[c] Furnisher's Duty

Unless informed by the creditor or person furnishing information about a delinquency, a CRA has no way of knowing when the delinquency commenced and hence when the information must be eliminated from reports as obsolete. The FCRA requires that any person who furnishes information about a delinquent account placed for collection or written off, must also inform the CRA when the preceding delinquency commenced. n25 The date of delinquency does not have to be provided until ninety days following the time the information is first furnished to the CRA. A CRA which does not receive the date of delinquency within ninety days risks reporting obsolete information.

The restrictions on reporting obsolete information under section 1681(c)(a) specifically apply to CRAs. Thus, furnishers of information have no liability under that section. n26 Furnishers, however, are subject to accuracy and dispute investigation requirements under another section of the FCRA. n27 Only the dispute investigation requirements are privately enforceable by consumers, but consumers can challenge the furnisher's reporting of obsolete information by using this mechanism. n28

Under this section, furnishers have an obligation to provide the date of delinquency from which the obsolescence period is calculated. n29 Debt collectors must follow specific rules in furnishing the date of delinquency to ensure that it precedes the date on which the account was placed for collection. n30 Again, these duties are not directly enforceable by consumers, but a consumer could send a dispute raising these duties.

[d] Suits and Judgments

Information concerning suits and judgments is obsolete after seven years from the "date of entry" or until the governing statute of limitations has expired, whichever is longer. n31 For suits, the "date of entry" is the date the suit was initiated and, for judgments, the "date of entry" is the date judgment was rendered. n32

[e] Paid Tax Liens

Paid tax liens may not be reported more than seven years after the date of payment. n33 On the face of the statute, unpaid tax liens and other liens, whether paid or unpaid, are within the catch-all seven-year limitations for any other adverse item of information. The FTC Staff Commentary, nevertheless, takes the position that unpaid tax or other types of liens may be reported as long as they remain filed and effective. n34

[f] Criminal Records

In 1998, 15 U.S.C. section 1681c was amended to remove records of indictment and criminal convictions from the seven year limit. n35 The effective date of the new provision is retroactive to September 30, 1998. Records of arrest still become obsolete after seven years or the expiration of the statute of limitations, whichever is longer. n36 Acquittals and dismissed charges may be reported for seven years from the date of acquittal or dismissal. n37

[g] Bankruptcy Reports Considered Obsolete After Ten Years

Bankruptcies more than ten years old cannot be included in a consumer report. n38 The ten year rule applies to all bankruptcy filings under the U.S. Bankruptcy Code, whether they be under chapters 7, 11, 12, or 13. n39 Both direct and indirect references to a consumer's bankruptcy should be deleted from reports after ten years.

The ten year limitation on bankruptcy reporting begins from the date of entry of the order for relief or date of adjudication under the Bankruptcy Code. n40 This refers to the actual entry of the order, not a judge's oral utterance during a hearing. n41 In a voluntary bankruptcy case, the filing by the consumer of the bankruptcy petition itself is the entry of the order for relief from which the ten year limitation is measured. n42

The ten year limit for reporting bankruptcy cases does not appear to extend the seven year limit for reporting specific debts discharged in bankruptcy. n43

[h] Prescreening Inquiries

Prescreening is the process whereby consumer reporting agencies compile or edit mailing lists of consumers who meet particular credit or insurance-related criteria, used by creditors or insurers to offer services or products to those consumers. Agencies must keep a record for one year of all such "inquiries" that identified a consumer for such a list, and include that information in any file disclosure made to the consumer. n44 On the other hand, the agency may not include such information in any consumer report furnished to others. n45

[i] Student Loans

The Higher Education Act sets out two rules as to when reports on defaulted, federally backed student loans become obsolete.

Federal Family Education Loans ("FFELs") (including guaranteed student or Stafford loans, SLS loans, and PLUS loans) are obligations owed to a lender, which are guaranteed by a guaranty agency and then reinsured by the United States. FFEL defaults may be included in consumer reports for seven years from the later of three dates: (1) when the Secretary of Education or the guaranty agency pays a claim to the loan holder on the guaranty, which could be months or even years after default; (2) when the Secretary of Education, guaranty agency, lender, or any other loan holder first reported the account to the consumer reporting agency; or (3) if a borrower re-enters repayment after defaulting on a loan, when the borrower subsequently goes into default on the loan. n46 In contrast, Perkins loans are not subject to any limit on reporting. n47 Student loan borrowers are also entitled to certain procedural rights before a guaranty agency can report a student loan delinquency to a CRA. The borrower must have an opportunity to inspect and copy the records concerning the debt and to obtain an administrative review of the enforceability of the debt and whether the student loan is past due. n48

[3] Exemptions Allow Reporting of Obsolete Information

The FCRA specifies three exemptions to the rules about obsolete information. Agencies may furnish consumer reports containing information that would normally be considered obsolete, namely: n49

- A "credit transaction involving, or which may reasonably be expected to involve, a principal amount of $150,000 or more"; n50
- The "underwriting of life insurance involving, or which may reasonably be expected to involve, a principal amount of $150,000 or more"; n51 or
- The "employment of any individual at an annual salary which equals, or which may reasonably be expected to equal, $75,000 or more." n52

Because of these exemptions, reporting agencies have legitimate grounds for retaining otherwise obsolete information in their files, n53 as long as the agency reports this information only when the user's need falls within one of the three itemized situations. Nevertheless, to reduce the danger of obsolete information making its way into a report not involving any of the three exemptions, agencies must establish procedural safeguards. These procedures should insure that obsolete information is only released after an internal decision is made that the release will not violate the statute. n54

[a] Preemption of State Obsolescence Laws

State laws that have obsolescence periods which differ from those in the FCRA are preempted unless they were in effect on September 30, 1996. n55

[4] Reasonable Procedures Concerning Obsolete Information

[a] General

A consumer reporting agency must "maintain reasonable procedures designed to avoid violations" of the requirements dealing with obsolete information. n56 FTC Commentary also states that consumer reporting agencies should establish procedures with its sources of adverse information that will avoid the risk of reporting obsolete information. n57 The FCRA imposes two separate obligations: (1) reporting agencies cannot supply obsolete information in violation of the Act; and (2) reporting agencies must also follow reasonable procedures designed to avoid violations of the Act's obsolete information requirements. Private remedies under the FCRA are available, however, only if an agency's action is negligent.

An agency's failure to follow its own procedures is evidence of negligence. Similarly, adoption of improper procedures makes the report of obsolete information at least negligent. But there will be an issue whether there is negligence when an agency strictly follows its own reasonable procedures, but where obsolete information is still reported.

While reporting of obsolete information should generally involve negligence, it is probably the case that a reporting agency is not liable for punitive damages (i.e., its actions are not willful) n58 where it maintains reasonable procedures and followed those procedures, even if obsolete information was reported. On the other hand, the failure of an agency to adopt any standards or the adoption of clearly inadequate procedures may be evidence of willfulness, leading to punitive damages. Intentional violation of a reporting agency's own procedures may also be evidence of willfulness.

[b] What Are "Reasonable" Procedures?

Whether procedures are "reasonable" will depend on whether the consumer reporting agency used procedures which "a reasonably prudent person would [exercise] under the circumstances." n59 The types of procedures required "may vary depending on the size of the agency and the type and volume of reports that it issues." n60 The cost, in time and money, of imposing specific procedural requirements on the consumer reporting agency will obviously be one factor that the court will consider in determining reasonableness in any given case. n61

[c] Procedures Determining Whether an Exemption Applies

If an agency reports obsolete information pursuant to one of the three exceptions, it must first verify that the user's purpose falls within one of the three designated situations. Consequently, the consumer reporting agency must maintain procedures which "require that prospective users of the information identify themselves, certify the purposes for which the information is sought, and certify that the information will be used for no other purpose." n62

The FTC has interpreted this section to require written certification by the user of the purpose for which the consumer report will be used, n63 or, at least, to require the reporting agency to keep a written record of the user's oral certification. n64 The Act explicitly requires the reporting agency to verify the prospective user's identity and stated purpose only if it is a user to which the reporting agency has not previously furnished a consumer report. n65

CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

1-16 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 16.07

§ 16.07 Inaccurate Consumer Reports

[1] Introduction

Evidence suggests that inaccurate consumer reports are quite frequent. A recent study showed that better than 20% of all complaints received by the FTC involved consumer reports. n1

Seven types of errors frequently occur in consumer reports: n2

- Creditor errors occur when creditors dump erroneous computerized records of customer accounts into the files of reporting agencies. Correcting the error at a reporting agency will not automatically correct the creditor's files, and some time after the reporting agency has corrected the error, it will copy the creditor's computer tape again and once again include the same inaccurate information in the consumer's credit report.

- Errors in the collection of public record information occur when the public record contains errors, or when people make mistakes in copying (particularly when copying manually), interpreting or understanding the information in public records.

- Mixed or mismerged files result when credit information relating to one consumer is placed in the file of another, thus creating a false description of both consumers' credit histories.

- Identity theft occurs when an impostor uses information about a consumer to obtain credit in the consumer's name, and then runs up a string of debts. In the normal course of events, information about these debts and defaults on these debts is furnished to consumer reporting agencies. n3

- Transcription errors occur when information coming to a reporting agency is not on computer tape and must be manually transcribed into the reporting agency's computer system.

- Illogical files contain inconsistent information. For example, a consumer could be listed as current on a credit account and also as seriously in default on the same account.

- Incomplete files do not illustrate the consumer's full credit history. Such files might contain information from credit bureau subscribers and public records, but lack payment history to landlords, utilities, or others.

FACTA amended the FCRA to allow consumers to dispute information directly with furnishers, but no private enforcement is available. n4 Federal banking agencies and the National Credit Union Administration have rulemaking authority to identify circumstances under which a furnisher shall be required to reinvestigate a dispute concerning the accuracy of information, based on a direct request from the consumer. n5 As of mid-2005, no regulations have been proposed by the agencies. This section examines consumer rights concerning inaccurate information. n6

[2] Contacting the Creditor or Other Party Furnishing Inaccurate Information

Often the best approach to correcting an inaccurate report is to contact the party who furnished the inaccurate information to the reporting agency. The FCRA requires the furnisher of information to participate in a reinvestigation by a consumer reporting agency. Furthermore, the information furnisher risks civil liability if it fails to conduct its own reinvestigation. Of course, a creditor may correct its own records, but not pass the correction on to all relevant reporting agencies, and the reporting agencies themselves may not enter the information properly in the consumer's file. n7 Note that when a credit reporting agency sells credit report information to a reselling agency, the first credit reporting agency becomes a furnisher subject to the new obligations imposed on furnishers.

[a] Furnishers May Have a Special Address for Notification of Inaccurate Information

In general, the FCRA prohibits the furnishing of information to a consumer reporting agency if the information furnisher knows or consciously avoids knowing that the information is inaccurate. n8 The FCRA imposes no affirmative duty, however, to furnish only accurate information or even, arguably, to maintain reasonable procedures to assure that only accurate information is furnished.

This general rule does not apply, however, to any furnisher of information who clearly and conspicuously specifies to the consumer an address for complaints about inaccuracies. n9 When a consumer complaint address is maintained, the furnisher is barred only from furnishing information which has been specified by the consumer as inaccurate in a notice sent to the address specified, and which, in fact, is inaccurate.

[b] The Furnisher of Information Has a Duty to Correct and Update Information

A person who furnishes information "regularly and in the ordinary course of business" to a consumer reporting agency has a limited duty to correct and update that information. n10 If the furnisher determines that reported information was not accurate or complete, then it must provide the reporting agency with information which will make the report correct or complete. The correction must be made whether the determination is based on information in the control of the furnisher or on information provided by the consumer.

If a furnisher has determined that reported information is inaccurate or incomplete, it must act "promptly" to provide the corrected or updated information to the reporting agency. Any delay may cause harm to the consumer. Moreover, once corrected or updated information is provided to the agency, the furnisher may not thereafter furnish any information which remains inaccurate or incomplete.

[c] Furnisher of Information Must Note Consumer Disputes

If a consumer disputes the accuracy or completeness of any information which has been furnished to a consumer reporting agency, the furnisher may not in the future report that information to a reporting agency unless it notes that it has been disputed. n11

This rule does not apply to consumer disputes with reporting agencies, even though the reporting agency notifies the furnisher of the dispute and forwards to the furnisher the notice of dispute submitted by the consumer. If the furnisher of information is a collection agency, the collection agency must report the debt as disputed under not only the FCRA, but also under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. Unlike the FCRA, the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act allows the consumer to collect actual and statutory damages along with attorneys' fees for failure to notify the agency of the disputed nature of the debt. n12

[3] Reporting Agency Reinvestigation and Correction of Disputed Information

[a] Consumer Request for Reinvestigation

[i] When a Reporting Agency Must Reinvestigate

If a consumer disputes the completeness or accuracy of any item of information in the consumer's file with a reporting agency, the agency must conduct a reinvestigation n13 free of charge to the consumer. n14 However, the reporting agency may avoid conducting a reinvestigation by simply deleting the disputed information within three business days. n15 The obligation to reinvestigate is not contingent upon the consumer having been denied credit, employment or other benefits, having requested a copy of the consumer report, or having asserted any other rights under the FCRA. n16 The agency also cannot refuse to reinvestigate because consumers say they will conduct their own investigation or threaten to sue. n17

An agency may not impose unreasonable preconditions to a reinvestigation, for example, by requiring the consumer to authorize the agency to obtain information from creditors, medical practitioners, employers, and the like. n18

The FACTA of 2003 creates special provisions for resellers. n19 Although resellers are exempt from the general reinvestigation requirement, n20 as of December 1, 2004, they must investigate a consumer's dispute made to the reseller. If the reseller determines that the information is incomplete or inaccurate as a result of the reseller's act or omission, the reseller must correct or delete the information within twenty days. n21 If, however, the reseller does not find that the alleged inaccuracy resulted from the reseller's act or omission, the reseller must notify the agency from whom the reseller obtained the information, and the agency must then reinvestigate the information. n22 Once notified, the providing agency must reinvestigate n23 and then report the results of its reinvestigation back to the reseller, who must then reconvey the results back to the consumer. n24 This provision basically treats the reseller as a consumer for purposes of the agency's reinvestigation responsibilities.

[ii] Frivolous Requests to Reinvestigate

A reporting agency may refuse to delete or reinvestigate the information only if it has reasonable grounds to believe that the dispute is frivolous or irrelevant. n25 The consumer's failure to provide sufficient information to investigate the disputed information is grounds for determining that the dispute is frivolous. n26

The FTC Commentary states that reporting agencies must assume that a consumer's dispute is bona fide, unless there is evidence to the contrary. n27 Such evidence may include letters disputing all information in the file without allegations concerning the specific items in the file. n28

A reporting agency may not refuse to reinvestigate the consumer's dispute on the grounds that it is frivolous "unless it is clearly 'beyond credulity' or made in bad faith." n29

A consumer's repeated request for an investigation, after the agency has already reinvestigated the same item, may be viewed as frivolous. n30 But the repeat request is not frivolous if the consumer provides additional evidence that the item is inaccurate or incomplete or alleges changed circumstances. n31 When a reporting agency adds new information to a file (even as a result of a reinvestigation), the consumer can again dispute the new information, and the agency must then conduct another reinvestigation. n32

Within five business days after determining that the dispute is frivolous or irrelevant, the agency must notify the consumer of the determination by mail, or, if authorized by the consumer, by any other means available to the agency. n33 This notice must give the reasons for the determination and identify any information required to investigate the disputed information. n34 State laws, n35 which establish deadlines for the agency to inform the consumer of its decision not to reinvestigate, are preempted by the FCRA unless in effect on September 30, 1996. n36

[iii] Agency's Reinvestigation Must Involve the Party Who Furnished the Disputed Information to the Agency

The creditor or other party who furnished the information disputed by the consumer must participate in the reinvestigation conducted by the consumer reporting agency. The only exceptions are if the agency has determined the dispute to be frivolous or has deleted the disputed information pursuant to an expedited dispute resolution process.

[iv] Consumer Reporting Agency Must Notify the Furnisher of the Disputed Information

Within five business days of receipt of a notice of dispute from a consumer, the consumer reporting agency must provide to the person who provided any disputed information a notice of the dispute. n37 If during the dispute resolution period the reporting agency receives additional, relevant information from the consumer, that information too must be promptly provided to the furnisher.

[v] Furnisher of Disputed Information Must Conduct a Reinvestigation

After receiving notice from a consumer reporting agency that information provided by the furnisher has been disputed, the furnisher must conduct its own reinvestigation of the accuracy and completeness of the disputed information. n38 Although the FCRA does not specify standards or procedures for furnisher reinvestigations, the furnisher must review all relevant information provided to it by the agency.

The results of the investigation must be reported to the consumer reporting agency in time for the agency to complete its reinvestigation in timely fashion, usually thirty days from the day the agency received notice of dispute. The furnisher, then, will have less than thirty days for most reinvestigations. The reasonableness standard imposed on reporting agencies for a reinvestigation is also applicable to furnishers. n39

[vi] Results of the Furnisher's Reinvestigation Must Also Be Reported to All Nationwide Consumer Reporting Agencies

All furnishers of information must report the results of reinvestigations to every nationwide consumer reporting agency to which the disputed information was reported. n40 Such reports must be made by the same deadline as the report to the consumer reporting agency which initiated the reinvestigation. The nationwide consumer reporting agencies must create and maintain automated systems through which furnishers of information may report to other national consumer reporting agencies the results of a reinvestigation that finds incomplete or inaccurate information. n41

[vii] Deadline for Reporting Agency to Respond

The deadline for the consumer reporting agency to respond to the consumer's notification depends upon the process through which the consumer obtained the inaccurate information. The Fair and Accurate Credit Transaction Act of 2003 added a new provision granting every consumer the right to a free annual credit report from nationwide consumer reporting agencies. n42 To receive the report from a nationwide agency other than the nationwide specialty consumer reporting agency, n43 the consumer must use a centralized source to make the request, a source that the FTC is to create

by regulation. n44 The FTC will also create a separate process through which consumers may request a free report from nationwide specialty consumer reporting agencies. n45 Normally, reinvestigations conducted by CRAs must be completed within thirty days, with one extension allowed when the CRA receives additional information from the consumer in the interim. n46 The thirty-day period begins on the date that the CRA receives the consumer's notice of dispute. n47 If, however, the consumer discovered the basis for the dispute through a free annual report provided pursuant to section 1681j(a), the CRA has forty-five days in which to complete the investigation. n48

[viii] Nature of Reinvestigation

A reinvestigation must be a good faith effort to determine the accuracy of the disputed item. n49 The agency cannot merely tell users that the consumer disputes the report. n50 Reinvestigation requires more than returning to the original source, asking the same question, and receiving the same answer. n51 At a minimum, the agency must check with both the original sources and other reliable sources (such as those suggested by the consumer) of the disputed information. n52 Before the FACTA of 2003, the FCRA did not specify a standard by which the agency must reinvestigate. As of December 1, 2004, the Act clarifies that the reinvestigation must be "reasonable." n53 Despite this requirement, the CRAs have developed an entirely automated, perfunctory investigation system which consists of nothing more than translating consumer disputes into a two-or three-digit code, forwarding that code and a one-page electronic form to the furnisher, and "parroting" whatever the furnisher states in response. n53.1

Several courts have held that, in the context of a claim brought under section 1681*i*, the CRAs could be found to have failed to fulfill their obligations to conduct a reasonable investigation when they use this automated system. However, it appears that this entire automated investigation system fails to ensure maximum possible accuracy in consumer credit reports. Thus, a few courts have held that this automated system may violate section 1681e(b). n53.2

There are limits, however, as to what constitutes a reasonable reinvestigation. Usually, a review of the furnishing creditor's ledger sheets should be sufficient--the reporting agency need not review actual sales slips or similar documentation. n54

If the reinvestigation reveals that the disputed information is inaccurate or that it can no longer be verified, the consumer reporting agency is required to delete the information, and the current status of the information must be recorded in the consumer's file. n55 If the item was disputed as incomplete, the reinvestigation should correct the item so that the information is now complete. n56 The agency should act promptly. n57

In some instances, a consumer reporting agency will want to delete information disputed by a consumer without initiating a reinvestigation. The agency may resolve the dispute in expedited fashion by deleting the disputed information within three business days from receipt of the dispute. n58 In fact, even prior to this statutory provision for expedited dispute resolution, Equifax and Experian (formerly TRW) agreed to accept the consumer's version of a dispute if accompanied by documentation from the original source confirming the consumer's version (unless Equifax or TRW in good faith doubt the documentation's authenticity). n59 In many other instances in which the consumer does not provide documentation from the original source, agencies will want to delete information and forego a reinvestigation.

An expedited resolution of the dispute requires notice to the consumer, and frees the agency from other requirements of reinvestigation. A consumer must be promptly notified, by telephone, that the disputed information has been deleted. In addition, within five business days of the deletion, written confirmation and a copy of the current, corrected report must be provided to the consumer. As part of either the telephone notification, or the written confirmation, the consumer must be informed of the right to have previous recipients of the report receive an updated, corrected report.

The FACTA of 2003 added a provision that requires an agency to not only notify the consumer of the results of the reinvestigation but also the furnisher of the information when the agency corrects or deletes the information as a result of the reinvestigation. n60 Such a notice should trigger a separate responsibility of the furnisher--to cease furnishing any information if the furnisher "knows or has reason to believe" the information to be inaccurate n61--since the correction/deletion notice from the agency should serve as reason to believe that the information was inaccurate.

[x] Notice to Consumer of Results of Reinvestigation

A consumer reporting agency must, within five business days of the completion of the reinvestigation, notify the consumer of its results. n62 Notice shall be by mail, or, if authorized by the consumer, other means available to the agency. A written statement that the investigation is completed, together with a copy of any corrected report, is also required within the same five-day period. It should not be surprising if a single written notice is provided to fulfill both notice requirements.

The written communication must also inform the consumer of the right to request a description of the reinvestigation procedure, including the business name and address, and, if reasonably available, the telephone number of any furnisher contacted during the reinvestigation. If requested, this description must be provided within fifteen days.

If a dispute remains after the reinvestigation is complete, the consumer may elect to have a statement of dispute included in the consumer's file. The written communication must also include a notice of this right, as well as the right to have the agency notify past users of a disputed report.

[xi] Consumer Follow-Up Steps Where Corrections Made

After the reporting agency has corrected or deleted the disputed items, the consumer should obtain another copy of the information in the consumer's file to confirm that the corrections and deletions were made. Second, the consumer should check if other agencies have files on the consumer with the same error. The consumer should obtain a copy of the consumer's file again three or six months later to see if the offending information has been reinserted. n63 A consumer should also consider asking the agency to notify past users of the correction.

[xii] Reinsertion of Information Previously Deleted From Consumer's File

The Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996 promulgated rules specifically designed to prevent abuses long associated with the reinsertion of information that had been corrected or deleted because it was inaccurate, incomplete, or unverifiable. n64 The provision on the reinsertion of previously deleted material has three parts: (1) consumer reporting agencies must maintain reasonable procedures to prevent the reappearance of material, except as specifically allowed; (2) for previously deleted material to be reinserted, the material must be certified as accurate and complete by the furnisher; and (3) if material is reinserted, the consumer must be notified within five business days.

Notice to the consumer must be in writing or, if authorized by the consumer for this purpose, by any other means available to the agency. Separately, or together, but also within the same five day period, the agency must provide a written statement that the disputed information has been reinserted. The written notice must disclose the business name and address, and, if reasonably available, the telephone number of any furnisher which contacted the agency with regard to the information. In many instances, the consumer will find it necessary to dispute the accuracy with the furnisher if not also with the agency. Finally, the notice must include a statement that the consumer has the right to add a statement to the consumer's file disputing the accuracy or completeness of the disputed information. The FACTA of 2003 added another layer of protection against the refurnishing of inaccurate information; as of December 1, 2004, a furnisher who receives notice from a consumer reporting agency that the consumer has disputed an item of information and who finds upon reinvestigation that the information is inaccurate, incomplete, or unverifiable, must modify, delete, or permanently block the information in its files for purposes of reporting to a consumer reporting agency. n65

[4] Inclusion of Consumer's Statement of Dispute in Consumer's File

[a] Consumer's Right to File Statement of Dispute

[i] Statement Concerning Incomplete or Inaccurate Items

If reinvestigation does not resolve the dispute, the consumer may file a brief statement setting forth the nature of the dispute. n66 Agencies cannot charge consumers for filing this statement of dispute. n67 The consumer should file the statement of dispute with every reporting agency whose file contains the inaccuracy.

Despite the statement's importance, the FCRA does not explicitly require the agency to inform the consumer of the right to file a dispute statement, and courts have held that the agency has no affirmative duty to disclose this right. n68 In addition, consumers should be warned that the statement, which appears at the bottom of the credit report, may not be seen by a potential creditor and likely will not be incorporated into the computation of a credit score.

If a reporting agency assists the consumer in writing a clear summary of the dispute, the statement may be limited to one hundred words for each disputed item of information. n69 If the agency does not assist the consumer, there is no explicit length of statement (although the statute describes it as a "brief" statement setting forth the nature of the dispute). n70 It is an FCRA violation for an agency even indirectly to represent that the statement must be limited to 100 words (unless the agency assists the consumer). n71

The consumer's right to dispute the completeness or accuracy of an item does not also create a right to explain the reasons for an unfavorable item. The agency can, however, include consumer explanations and charge a fee for inserting such information. n72 Nor does the right to dispute information require agencies to add new items of information to a file, create a file for a consumer for whom it has no file, or add new lines of information about accounts not reflected in the existing file, n73 unless the new information increases the completeness or accuracy of an item already in the file.

If a consumer has filed a statement of dispute, n74 the reporting agency must, in any subsequent consumer report containing the information in question, clearly note that the consumer disputes the information and also provide either the consumer's statement or "a clear and accurate codification or summary" of that statement. n75

The agency cannot tell the recipient of a subsequent report that the consumer's statement is on file, and will be provided when requested. The report must contain the actual statement or a summary of that statement. n76 When a user makes a telephonic request for information, the agency must read the dispute statement or summary to the user before disclosing the disputed information in the consumer's file. n77

The practical importance of the statement is somewhat unclear. Creditors will usually give more weight to the credit report than to explanatory statements, n78 or may ignore them altogether. Moreover, explanatory statements will not effect credit scores used by a growing number of creditors. The FACTA of 2003 gave to consumers a powerful right to add what should be far more effective notices to a file: fraud alerts, extended fraud alerts, and active military duty alerts, a provision that becomes effective on December 1, 2004. n79 These alerts, unlike the Statement of Dispute discussed below, impose specific obligations on users of reports that contain such alerts. n80

[5] Notification of Previous Users Who Received Disputed Information

[a] Consumer Request for Notification

Following the deletion of information from the consumer's file pursuant to a reinvestigation or following the consumer's filing of a statement of dispute, the reporting agency must provide notice to past recipients of the consumer's report. n81 The notice must indicate what items were deleted, the consumer's statement, or a codification or summary of that statement. n82

This notice requirement is triggered only by the consumer's request that the notice be sent, and only to past users of the report specifically designated by the consumer. n83 The consumer may only specify users who received the report within the prior six months (or two years if the user received the report for employment purposes). n84

An agency cannot even indirectly report that an item has been deleted from the consumer's file to anyone other than those who were previously informed of the disputed item. n85 For example, where the agency's records contain the notation "cancelled" or "purged," these notations cannot appear in subsequent consumer reports. n86

Moreover, the reporting agency may not routinely send corrected or updated reports even to past recipients of the disputed report unless so directed by the consumer. The FCRA restricts reports to users with permissible purposes, n87 and there is no guarantee that past users with permissible purposes still would have a permissible purpose to receive the report.

[6] Liability for Furnishing and Reinvestigating Information

Those who furnish information to consumer reporting agencies are subject to liability in two main regards. First, there are certain obligations which only public officials have the power to enforce. These obligations relate to the furnishing of accurate and up-to-date information and consumer disputes regarding accuracy and completeness. Second, consumers can bring private lawsuits against information furnishers who fail to participate in reinvestigations.

In addition, a furnisher of information who falls within the definition of a consumer reporting agency, for example, by furnishing information beyond its own first-hand experience with a consumer could face FCRA liability for violating reporting agency requirements.

[a] Furnisher Liability Regarding Information Furnished to Consumer Reporting Agencies

The FCRA contains five standards regarding the accuracy or current status of information furnished to reporting agencies. A furnisher violating these obligations may be subject to enforcement actions by public officials.

Of the five standards imposed upon furnishers by the FCRA, n88 three relate generally to information which may be furnished to a consumer reporting agency and two relate only to closed or delinquent accounts. The five standards are:

- If a furnisher of information clearly and conspicuously specifies an address for consumers to use for the purpose of informing the furnisher that specific information is inaccurate, then the furnisher may not provide an agency with information that is in fact inaccurate when the consumer has notified the furnisher that the particular information is inaccurate. If the furnisher does not clearly and conspicuously provide an address for these consumer complaints, then the furnisher may not furnish information it knows to be inaccurate;

- A furnisher who regularly and in the ordinary course of business furnishes information must update and correct information previously reported to a consumer reporting agency;

- Any furnisher must note when a consumer has disputed information being furnished to a consumer reporting agency;

- A furnisher who regularly and in the ordinary course of business furnishes information to a consumer reporting agency must note when an account has been voluntarily closed; and

- Within ninety days of furnishing information about any delinquent account that has been placed for collection, charged to profit or loss, or the like, the furnisher must notify the agency of the month and the year of the preceding delinquency.

The FCRA does not explicitly require that furnishers maintain reasonable procedures to assure accuracy, as it does for consumer reporting agencies.

[b] Private Enforcement of Standards for Furnishers Providing Information to Consumer Reporting Agencies

Although private enforcement is the hallmark of the FCRA, the standards for furnishers providing information to consumer reporting agencies may not be enforced under the FCRA by consumer litigation for damages. n89 That is, the FCRA provisions regarding negligent and willful noncompliance with the Act do not apply to any failure by information furnishers to comply with the five reporting standards for furnishers. n90

[c] Furnisher Liability for Reinvestigation Activities

The furnisher of disputed information must participate in the reinvestigation process. Any furnisher which negligently fails to comply with any of these requirements is liable to the consumer for any actual damages, the costs of litigation, and attorney's fees. If the failure of the furnisher is willful, the furnisher is liable for actual damages of not less than $100 and not more than $1000, and for punitive damages, as well as for costs and attorneys' fees. n91

[7] Agency Liability for Reporting Inaccurate Information

[a] General

Consumer reporting agencies are not liable under the FCRA merely for reporting inaccurate information. n92 Instead, liability arises when an agency, in preparing a consumer report, fails to follow reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy of the information about the consumer. n93

A reporting agency also is liable, even if it has enacted reasonable procedures, when it does not correctly handle a consumer's dispute over the accuracy or completeness of information. n94 The consumer's right to have inaccuracies and incompleteness corrected does not depend on the consumer having first disputed the information, however. n95 The right to dispute and correct inaccuracies is merely an alternative to a lawsuit over agency procedures. n96

[b] Is the Information Inaccurate: The First Test

The FCRA requires that agencies use reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy. Courts have inferred from this requirement that the information at issue must in fact be inaccurate before an agency can be found liable under this provision. n97 A report is clearly inaccurate if a source provided inaccurate information, if public record information was inaccurately copied, interpreted or transcribed, if files were mismerged, or if two conflicting pieces of information were both reported.

A grey area is where information is technically accurate, but where additional information would make the file more accurate or less misleading. Courts disagree as to when the lack of clarifying information makes a report inaccurate. n98

[c] Reasonable Procedures: The Second Test

The agency must follow reasonable procedures to assure "maximum possible accuracy." n99 It must adopt procedures not just to catch many of the errors, but to assure "maximum" possible accuracy. If the agency's review of its procedures reveals, or the agency should reasonably be aware of, steps it can take to improve the accuracy of its reports at a reasonable cost, it must take such steps. n100

When an a gency learns or should reasonably be aware of errors in its reports that may indicate systematic problems, it must review its procedures for assuring accuracy. n101 This is the case whether the agency discovers the problem from consumers, users, or its own internal reviews. n102

When an agency sees systematic errors, it must revise its procedures. But even when only one error is brought to its attention, the agency should correct that consumer's file even if it does not warrant a change in overall procedures. n103

Some courts apply a "reasonable person" test which may vary greatly in application. n104

The Seventh Circuit held that despite evidence that a consumer's file contained facially inconsistent information concerning an account in bankruptcy, Experian's procedures for assuring maximum possible accuracy were reasonable as a matter of law. The court relied upon Experian's expert to conclude that it would be unduly burdensome and unreasonable to require Experian to evaluate each computer record for anomalous information given the enormous volume of information processed. n105 In effect, this decision says that credit reporting agencies are not on notice of facially inconsistent information in their own files. Thus it becomes even more important for practitioners to prove actual notice of inaccurate information, through depositions or other appropriate evidence. Arguing that the credit reporting agencies knew or should have known of the inaccuracy based on the facially inaccurate information may not be enough, at least not in the Seventh Circuit.

[d] Inaccurate Sources

Agencies must insure that information provided by sources is accurate. n106 This includes adopting reasonable procedures to eliminate systematic errors generated by the sources, n107 for example, by requiring a frequently erroneous source to revise its procedures or by ceasing to report information from that source. n108

[e] Public Record Information

Special problems exist with respect to the accuracy of public record information. In addition to the many possible causes of human error, records themselves are constantly changing due to corrections of errors or changes in a matter's status.

While the agency may not have to engage in extensive analysis to discover errors in public records, n109 it should institute certain procedures for dealing with public records.

Even where the agency used a "match logic" program and had a legal department review report of judgments, its procedure may be found unreasonable when the form used to report judgments has no space to indicate which defendant was subject to the judgment. n110

[f] Mismerged Information and Wrong Consumer Identification

To furnish a report on the wrong consumer is to furnish a report without a permissible purpose. n111 Even a single occurrence should be an FCRA violation leading to a cause of action, even if the agency has adopted reasonable procedures to prevent such misidentifications. n112

In addition, the consumer reporting agency must follow reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy of the information "concerning the individual about whom the report relates." n113 When receiving information on a consumer, an agency must exercise reasonable care to verify that the subject is in fact the consumer into whose file it inserts the information, and that the individual whose report is furnished to a user is the same individual that is requested by the user. n114 Relying exclusively on social security numbers alone, however, may be inadequate, n115 especially in light of the possibility of identity theft or the presence of other possibly inconsistent information.

Agencies also must take reasonable steps to insure that mismerged information that is corrected does not reoccur at a later date. n116 The same weakness in a system that created one mismatch could create another.

[g] Transcription, Data Communication, and Interpretation

An agency must establish reasonable procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy where it is transcribing information into the agency's data system. n117 A common, therefore reasonable, procedure in data entry is to enter the data twice, by separate data entry clerks, and then compare the two transcriptions.

According to the FTC Commentary, agencies that send data electronically should have reasonable procedures to assure that the data is accurately converted into machine-readable format and not distorted by machine malfunction or transmission failure. Agencies must adopt reasonable security procedures to minimize theft or alteration of information, either by authorized or unauthorized users. n118

[h] Internal Inconsistencies and Illogical Entries

Reporting agencies must have procedures to compare recently obtained information with information added to the file earlier to discover and correct inconsistent or contradictory information. n119

[i] Identity Theft

Identity theft (where the thief, using personal information about the consumer, runs up debts in the name of the consumer) poses serious problems for consumers. It remains a rapidly growing phenomenon, causing substantial injury and frustration to consumers.

Concerns with identity theft were a primary force behind the FACTA of 2003. n120 That Act created a variety of new tools for consumers to use both to prevent identity theft and to restore credit records polluted by a thief's transactions. The most significant provisions allow consumers who believe that they are or are about to be the victim of fraud, including identity theft, to require an agency to include a ninety-day fraud alert in their files. n121 The new alert is called a "one-call" alert because the agency must refer the alert to other nationwide agencies, and all the agencies must not only include the alert in the consumer's file but provide the alert each time they generate that consumer's credit score. n122 Agencies must also refer identity theft complaints and fraud alerts to each other. n123 The agencies must present to any user a "clear and conspicuous" view of the statement that notifies users of the consumer's report that the consumer may be a victim of fraud, including identity theft. n124 Those consumers who supply an agency with an identity theft report can obtain a seven-year fraud alert. n125 As of December 1, 2004, a consumer can also require an agency to block fraud related information in the consumer's file; the agency must also notify the original furnisher that the information was blocked and the reason for it. n126 Furnishers must have reasonable procedures to respond to such notices to prevent them from refurnishing the blocked information. n127 Effective December 1, 2004, the Act requires agencies to notify a user when the user's request for a report contains an address for the consumer different from that in the agency's files, n128 requiring the creation of red flag guidelines and regulations to help financial institutions and creditors to identify identity theft, n129 requiring debt collectors to notify creditors of fraudulent debts, n130 and prohibit the sale or transfer of identity theft debts. n131 Forthcoming regulations will establish accuracy and integrity guidelines for furnishers. n132 Consumers may obtain certain transaction information from businesses that have done business with an identity thief. n133 Finally, the Act requires designated agencies to come up with regulations that will require those who use consumer information from consumer reports to dispose of it properly, which could eventually curb thieves' access to consumer financial information. n134

However, while many of these provisions could assist consumers in preventing identity theft, locating identity thieves, and ultimately restoring their credit reports, Congress correspondingly preempted many provisions of state laws targeting identity theft. State laws with "requirements and prohibitions" with respect to the conduct required by the specific preemptions enumerated are thus preempted. n135 However, states should nonetheless be able to enact and enforce identity theft laws with respect to other conduct.

Preexisting provisions of the FCRA can also be used to counter identity theft: the requirement that agencies follow reasonable procedures to ensure maximum possible accuracy, n136 and the provisions requiring that the accuracy of information challenged by consumers be reinvestigated. n137

Given that in the nature of identity theft, the thief is posing as the consumer, accuracy procedures that are otherwise considered reasonable may not be sufficiently designed to catch fraudulent activities that are reported to a victim's account, at least before the agency learns of the fraud. Moreover, as identity theft has become increasingly more common, a reporting agency's failure to increase the sophistication of its procedures to respond to this problem is itself unreasonable. n138 In fact, each of the big three consumer reporting agencies now advertises enhanced fraud detecting software that takes a consumer's name, address, telephone number and social security number and other information and tries to verify them against a number of other data sources. n139 These products, developed to help businesses prevent losses suffered from application fraud, would do a great deal to help consumers prevent losses suffered from identity fraud, and the failure to use them for that purpose may be arguably unreasonable.

Even if a consumer reporting agency maintains reasonable procedures to assure accurate information, once an identity theft victim contests a false item on the report, the agency must reinvestigate the disputed information. One of the earliest identity theft cases, Stevenson v. TRW, Inc., n140 ruled that the defendant agency had not reinvestigated reasonably. The consumer discovered that someone had opened as many as sixteen fraudulent accounts in his name. He notified TRW, which completed a reinvestigation and claimed that all fraud-related items were deleted. Nonetheless, false data continued to appear and reappear, either because it had never been deleted or because it had been reinserted. The consumer sued, alleging the agency had negligently and willfully violated its duty to reinvestigate under the FCRA and had libeled him, and won actual and punitive damages at a bench trial. On appeal, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the court's judgment as to negligence. n141 In reinvestigating, TRW had simply asked each person who furnished the original information to verify its accuracy. The court held that TRW's actions were insufficient: "In a reinvestigation of the accuracy of credit reports, a credit bureau must bear some responsibility for evaluating the accuracy of information obtained from subscribers." n142

Identity theft victims often find that false data excluded upon the first reinvestigation reappears in later reports. Since the cases discussed above, the FCRA has been amended to require a reporting agency to notify a consumer within five business days that a previously deleted item has been reinserted, n143 so a victim should at least be able to track this problem and challenge the reasonableness of any reinsertion of false information.

[j] Incomplete and Outdated Items in the File

[i] Information That Was Incomplete When Collected

There should be no question that an agency should adopt reasonable procedures to assure that information when collected is complete, and not just a partial statement of the facts as then known. n144 The agency must balance whether the report's potential to mislead outweighs the availability of more accurate information and the burden of producing such information. n145

[ii] Guarantors and Reports Relating to a Bankruptcy

Certain special rules have developed (through the FTC Commentary, the courts, or legislative history) on when certain information is on its face so incomplete that it is inaccurate to report, apparently no matter the cost of obtaining complete information. An agency must have procedures to insure that where an individual is acting solely as a guarantor of a debt, that any nonpayment of that debt be listed in that individual's file with a notation that the individual is only the guarantor and not the primary obligator. n146

In addition, any consumer report of a consumer's bankruptcy should clarify whether the bankruptcy action is a proceeding under chapter 7 (a straight bankruptcy) or under chapter 13 (a reorganization or wage earner plan). n147 The Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996 added statutory language requiring that any report of a bankruptcy case also identify the chapter under which the case arises, "if provided by the source of the information." Thus bankruptcies should commonly be reported as arising under chapter 7 or chapter 13.

In reporting a debt discharged in bankruptcy, the balance should be reported as "0," although the report can indicate that the debt was not paid for a time and then was discharged in bankruptcy. n148

[iii] Reasonable Methods to Acquire Updated Information

Consumer reporting agencies must apply reasonable procedures to assure that information is not outdated, even if the information is accurately reported as being current only as of a certain date, because the report produces a misleading picture of the consumer. n149

This requirement is emphasized by the language of the Act that requires accuracy when the report is "prepared," n150 implying that the information must be accurate each time the information from the file is furnished to a user. n151

A balancing test will determine when an agency must find additional or updated information to make a file more accurate. The agency's interest in speed and expense must be weighed against the consumer's interest in maximum possible accuracy. In terms better fit for a trier of fact, the accessibility of correct or missing information must be weighed against the likelihood of harm to the consumer. n152

[iv] Must Report All Updated Information That Is Furnished to the Agency

If an agency is informed of later developments relating to an item in the consumer's file, either by the source of the information or by the consumer, the agency must update the file. n153 An agency must report significant, verified information it possesses about an item. n154 Even where the consumer does not formally dispute the accuracy of a report, if the consumer provides additional information on an incomplete file, then the agency must include the statement. n155

If an agency has reported an account as delinquent and obtains verified information that the account is paid, it must add that information to the file. n156 The same is true of information that a debt is discharged in bankruptcy or that a bankruptcy was involuntarily dismissed. n157 The Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996 has added statutory language requiring that if an agency is notified by the furnisher of information that a consumer account has been voluntarily closed by the consumer, the agency must indicate that fact in any consumer report. n158

[v] Updated Information That Need Not Be Reported

The FTC Commentary indicates that four types of new information do not have to be added to the consumer's file, even when the information is furnished to the agency. The agency does not have to:

- Open a new file on a consumer;
- Report new credit accounts not already listed in the consumer's file;

- Add explanations for why a debt was not paid; or

- Report the reasons that credit or some other benefit was denied when reporting on the existence of that denial.

If, however, additional information regarding extenuating circumstances would enhance the accuracy of the report and reasonable procedures could result in its inclusion, an agency may not arbitrarily ignore or exclude it from its files and reports. The reasonableness of procedures including or excluding information of extenuating circumstances will depend upon an appropriate balancing of interests.

[k] Procedures for Reports of Adverse Public Record Information for Employment Purposes

The Act mandates specific procedures when the consumer reporting agency furnishes "items of information on consumers which are matters of public record and are likely to have an adverse effect upon a consumer's ability to obtain employment." n159 The type of information that is covered includes "items ... relating to arrests, indictments, convictions, suits, tax liens, and outstanding judgments." n160

Consumers may be denied jobs or terminated from employment as a result of an arrest record, where the employer may not realize that the arrest never led to a conviction, that the arrest was due to a case of mistaken identity, that the arrest occurred when a personal foe filed a baseless criminal complaint and the charges were dropped as soon as the police conducted an initial inquiry, or where the arrest occurred when the individual was a juvenile. n161 An employer may also view negatively an unsatisfied court judgment against an individual not knowing that the case involved only a default judgment which the consumer has since paid.

A consumer reporting agency must comply with the special FCRA protections for public record information even if information is received from another reporting agency, n162 and even if the agency does not actually include the public record information in the consumer report.

When public record information is likely to have an adverse effect on employment, the reporting agency must comply with at least one of the following two procedures, neither of which can be waived by the consumer. n163 The option most reporting agencies seem to choose is to notify the consumer that the reporting agency is furnishing the public record information to a user, together with the name and address of the person to whom such information is being furnished. n164 The Commentary indicates the notice can be by first class mail. n165 The second option is to maintain strict procedures to insure that the public record information is complete and up to date. n166 For records relating to arrests, indictments, conviction, suits, tax liens, and outstanding judgments, "up to date" means "current" at the time of the report. n167 Relying upon database records updated every thirty days does not suffice. n168

Increasingly, consumer disputes are being investigated pursuant to a process developed by Associated Credit Bureaus, Inc., a trade organization of consumer reporting agencies. However, merely accepting the furnisher's response does not fulfill the agency's responsibility to reinvestigate if all the response does is to confirm the original information. *Zala v. CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

§ 16.08 Investigative Consumer Reports

[1] What Is an Investigative Consumer Report?

[a] FCRA Definition

The FCRA defines "investigative consumer report" as a consumer report or portion n1 thereof:

> "in which information on a consumer's character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living is obtained through personal interviews with neighbors, friends, or associates of the consumer reported on or with others with whom he is acquainted or who may have knowledge concerning any such items of information. However, such information shall not include specific factual information on a consumer's credit record obtained directly from a creditor of the consumer or from a consumer reporting agency when such information was obtained directly from a creditor of the consumer or from the consumer." n2 The FACTA of 2003 amended the FCRA to exclude certain reports of employee behavior from the definition of "consumer report," and thereby from the definition of "investigative consumer report." Nonetheless, employers must make certain disclosures to benefit from the exclusion. n3

The report must concern character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living. The FTC has suggested that the subject matter of an investigative report involves subjective information. n4

An investigative report must contain information obtained by a "personal interview" with neighbors, friends, associates or others. n5 "Personal interview" includes inquiries made by telephone or other method of transmission. n6 But information obtained by observing a consumer's home is not an investigative report because there is no interview. n7 The interview could be with members of the consumer's family, n8 but probably not the consumer, as the consumer is not a third party. n9 This section summarizes FCRA law in this area. n10

The Act specifically excludes from the definition of "investigative consumer report" a report that consists solely of specific factual information on a consumer's credit record obtained directly from a creditor or a consumer reporting agency (where the reporting agency obtained the information from a creditor or the consumer). n11 A report with both non-investigative and investigative information is still an investigative consumer report, since the statutory definition of an "investigative consumer report" is a consumer report "or portion thereof" that contains investigative information. n12

In addition, any report excluded from the definition of "consumer report" will be excluded from the definition of "investigative consumer report."

[i] Reports Excluded from the Definition; Certain Employee Investigations

The FACTA of 2003 met a rising demand by employers to exempt certain reports about employees from the requirements for consumer reports. n13 Nonetheless the Act still requires employers to disclose certain information to an employee in connection with such a report. n14 Because of this new exemption, even if a particular investigation would otherwise be an investigative consumer report, it will fall outside of the definition by virtue of being specifically exempted from the definition of "consumer report." n15 To fall within the exclusion the communication must be made to an employer and must be in connection with an investigation of one of the following:

- suspected misconduct relating to employment;
- compliance with federal, state, or local laws;
- compliance with the rules of a self-regulatory organization; or
- compliance with the preexisting written policies of the employer. n16

To limit the exemption's scope the FACTA further requires that the communication must not be for the purpose of investigating a consumer's creditworthiness, credit standing, or credit capacity (in other words, the communication must only bear on the employee's character, general reputation, personal characteristics, or mode of living) and must not be provided to anyone other than the employer (or the employer's agent), a governmental authority, or a self-regulatory organization with regulatory authority over the employer. n17 The FACTA defines a self-regulatory organization to be "any self-regulatory organization (as defined in section 3(a)(26) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934[15 U.S.C. § 78c(a)(26)]), any entity established under title I of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 [15 U.S.C. §§ 7211-7218], any board of trade designated by the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, and any futures association registered with such Commission." n18

Employees will have a right to a notice containing a summary of the nature and substance of the communications if the employer takes adverse action based on communications resulting from an investigation. n19

[b] Types of Investigative Reports

Three main types of investigative reports predominate: reports for employment purposes, insurance purposes, and reports for landlords. Employment purposes include not only hiring, but also promotions, demotions, transfers, discharges, and related employment decisions, n20 including investigations of alleged sexual harassment. n21

The Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996 excludes employment agencies in many circumstances from the definition of consumer reporting agency. To combat potential invasions of privacy, the Reform Act requires employers to obtain written permission from the consumer before requesting any consumer report, be it investigative or non-investigative. n22 The employer must also certify to the reporting agency (1) that it has notified the consumer that a consumer report may be obtained, (2) that the consumer has authorized in writing the procurement of the report, and (3) that information in the consumer report will not be used in violation of any federal or state equal employment opportunity law.

The other most common form of an investigative consumer report is for insurance purposes. Under the FCRA, a permissible purpose for a consumer report is the "underwriting" of insurance involving the consumer. n23

Investigative reports prepared for landlords may involve personal interviews of a tenant's former landlords, employers, or other references. A growing number of tenant screening companies in effect blacklist certain tenants because of their past practices. The screening companies obtain their information not only by culling information from court dockets (not likely to entail an investigative consumer report), but also by interviewing former landlords.

[2] Disclosure to Consumer of Investigative Report's Existence

[a] Notice That User Has Requested an Investigative Report

No person may procure an investigative consumer report unless the consumer is notified that an investigative report may be made. n24 Notice of the investigative report must be mailed to the consumer within three days of the user's first request to the reporting agency for a report on the consumer. n25 It is the obligation of the person requesting the report, not the reporting agency, to send notice of the request to the consumer. n26 If the user requesting an investigative consumer report is an employer, additional requirements apply. Whether or not a requested consumer report is an investigative report, employers must have disclosed in a separate document that a report may be obtained for employment purposes.

The notice should inform the consumer that a request for an investigative consumer report has been made and should describe the types of information that the report will seek, including, as applicable, information on the consumer's character, general reputation, personal characteristics, and mode of living. n27 The disclosure must also state that an investigative consumer report involves personal interviews with sources such as friends, neighbors, and associates. n28

The notice must be in writing, n29 must be mailed or otherwise delivered to the consumer, n30 and the information in the notice must be clearly and accurately disclosed. n31 The FTC staff has drafted and published a form which it deems adequate. n32 A user may not procure an investigative report without certifying to the consumer reporting agency that it has notified the consumer of the investigative report and that it will, upon written request from the consumer, completely and accurately disclose the nature and scope of the investigation. n33

The user of any consumer report, investigative or otherwise, must notify the consumer when it takes an adverse action based at least in part on information in a consumer credit report, and must supply the name, address, and telephone number of the reporting agency making the report. The user must also notify the consumer of the right to obtain a free copy of the report within sixty days.

As discussed above, however, if a report qualifies as an employee investigation report the report will be exempt from the definition of consumer report and accordingly from the related definition of investigative consumer report. n34 In such a case the employer need not comply with these requirements, though the employer must comply with the special disclosure provisions imposed on employee investigation reports. n35

[b] Consumer's Right to Additional Disclosures

Within a reasonable period of time after the consumer receives notice that an investigative consumer report has been requested, the consumer can seek from the person requesting the report a complete and accurate disclosure of the nature and scope of the investigation. n36 The requester's disclosure must include a complete and accurate description of the types of questions asked, the number and types of persons interviewed, and the name and address of the investigating agency. n37 The reporting agency must provide a free copy of the report if the consumer requests it following an adverse action.

Furthermore, reporting agencies may not prohibit users from disclosing the contents of the consumer report when adverse action has been taken. n38 The reporting agencies enter into agreements with users covering use of reports, and such an agreement may specify that users cannot disclose contents of reports to consumer subjects. n39

The FTC Commentary states that users need not disclose sources of information (i.e., the names of the individuals interviewed). n40 For the FCRA exception concerning sources of investigative consumer reports to apply, however, the information must have been "acquired solely for use in preparing an investigative consumer report and actually used for no other purpose." n41

The second, more detailed disclosure to the consumer must be made in writing, and must be mailed or otherwise delivered to the consumer within five days of receipt of the consumer's request for the disclosure. n42

[c] Reporting Agency Must Disclose Nature of Consumer Report

Whenever the consumer requests, a reporting agency must disclose all information in the consumer's file at the time of the request, other than information concerning credit or other risk scores or predictors. Upon request, the reporting agency must also provide the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of any recipients of a report on the consumer within the last year (two years for reports with employment purposes). In addition, following an adverse action based in part on a consumer report, the reporting agency must provide a free copy of the report to the consumer upon the consumer's request. n43

[d] Reasonable Procedures Defense

Users cannot be held liable for a violation of any of their three disclosure requirements relating to investigative reports if the user can show "by a preponderance of the evidence that at the time of the violation he maintained reasonable procedures to assure compliance" with these requirements. n44

The Act does not specify the types of procedures that must be shown to avoid liability under this section. Ordinarily, the reasonableness of procedures is a question of fact. n45

[e] Waiver of Consumer Rights

Persons requesting investigative reports may attempt to avoid the FCRA notice requirements by seeking a waiver from the consumer. The FTC has determined that a reporting agency cannot condition disclosure upon the execution by the consumer of a waiver of claims, even where the waiver closely conforms to the language contained in the Act. n46 Waivers are strictly construed against the drafter; preprinted waivers with potential employees of unequal bargaining power demand careful judicial scrutiny when they are "so broad as to afford protection for all conduct no matter how egregious." n47

[3] Procedures for Investigative Reports

[a] Procedures Required for Any Consumer Report

Reporting agencies have an obligation to insure that information in consumer reports is accurate and not obsolete. These requirements apply to investigative reports as they do to any other consumer reports.

[b] Information From Personal Interviews

To guard against the inclusion of unsubstantiated information in investigative consumer reports, a reporting agency which interviews a consumer's neighbor, friend, or other associate must follow "reasonable procedures" to confirm the interview information with an additional source having independent and direct knowledge of the information. The agency may escape the confirmation requirement, however, if the person interviewed is the "best possible source of the information." n48

[c] Adverse Information Based on Public Records

Certain adverse information which is a matter of public record must be verified before the release of the investigative report. A consumer reporting agency may not furnish an investigative consumer report that includes public record information relating to an arrest, indictment, conviction, civil judicial action, tax lien, or outstanding judgment, unless the agency has verified the accuracy of the information within thirty days prior to releasing the information. n49

[d] Verification of Information for Re-Use in Subsequent Investigative Report

If information in an investigative report is adverse, the consumer reporting agency may not include that information in a subsequent consumer report unless it "has been verified in the process of making such subsequent consumer report." n50 Reverification may not be required when a user requests a copy of an old report, no new report is prepared, and the copy supplied clearly states that it is dated and does not provide fresh information. n51 Verification also is not required for information that is a matter of public record, unless the public record information is adverse and relates to criminal or civil legal records. In addition, investigative information that "was received within the three-month period preceding the date the subsequent report is furnished" is also exempted from the reverification requirement.

[4] State Laws on Investigative Reports

Several states also have laws regulating investigative reports, n52 often filling the void left by the FCRA, and providing consumers with enhanced protections against the unfair and improper use of investigative reports for employment and insurance purposes. Most of these statutes use the same definition of an investigative report found in the FCRA, but California's statute does not require a personal interview, part of the FCRA's definition. n53 State laws on consumer investigative reports usually govern insurance and employment investigative reports and typically require certain disclosures and notices when such reports are requested.

For example, in California, if an investigative report is for insurance purposes, a written disclosure must be provided to the consumer at the time the consumer signs the application, medical form or binder. If there is no signed application, medical form or binder, the disclosure must be made in writing and mailed or otherwise delivered within three days after the report was first requested. n54 However, a California appellate court recently held that the state's investigative report statute was unconstitutionally vague as applied to tenant screening reports that include unlawful detainer records. n55 The court reasoned that the investigative report statute was intended to apply to information pertaining to character, while the less strict credit reporting statute was intended to cover information pertaining to creditworthiness, but unlawful detainer records could fall within both categories. n56 The problem is that each statute expressly excludes information covered by the other, leaving landlords uncertain as to which statute they must comply with. n57

The disclosure warns the consumer that an investigative report regarding the consumer's character, general reputation, personal characteristics, and mode of living may be made. The disclosure must include the name and address of the investigative consumer reporting agency conducting the investigation and the nature and scope of the investigation requested.

For investigative reports for an employment purpose, California law requires employers to show the consumer the report and identify who asked for the report and how to contact them. n58 The California statute has an exception similar to that found in the FCRA. Notice is not required if the reports are made because of a "suspicion of wrongdoing by the subject of the investigation. n59

§ 16.09 FCRA Litigation

[1] Available FCRA Claims

[a] General

This section provides an overview of important FCRA litigation considerations. n1 The FCRA establishes civil liability for noncompliance with its requirements that is negligent n2 or willful. n3 This subsection details when an FCRA violation involves negligence. Willful noncompliance is only relevant for the awarding of punitive damages.

The FCRA provides that any "person" who fails to comply with certain requirements with respect to a consumer will be liable to that consumer. n4 Potential defendants include consumer reporting agencies, users of information, and furnishers of information.

The general standard is that the consumer must show that the defendant's noncompliance was negligent. Whether a defendant is negligent may depend upon industry standards, although normal practices within the industry may themselves fall below a reasonable standard of care. n5 One of the most dramatic aspects of the recently enacted FACTA is that a sizable portion of the new obligations imposed on businesses, creditors, furnishers, and financial institutions are not enforceable under an FCRA private cause of action. n6 The new obligations that have no private enforcement include: n7

- The new responsibility of businesses that have transacted with an identity thief to provide the victim, upon the victim's request, with transaction information n8

- The obligation of financial institutions or creditors to establish policies to implement the red flag guidelines that appointed agencies will issue to curb identity theft n9

- The new requirement that creditors issue risk-based pricing notices when they offer credit on "material terms that are materially less favorable" than those offered to other consumers n10

- The revised obligation of furnishers to refrain from furnishing information about a consumer to an agency if the furnisher knows or has reason to believe that the information is inaccurate n11

[b] Claims Against Reporting Agencies for Inaccurate Reports

The FCRA does not create liability merely for inaccurate consumer reports. The consumer must show that the reporting agency was negligent in failing to follow reasonable procedures to assure the maximum possible accuracy of the reported information. n12

Where procedures are not in place that should be in place, this provision presents little difficulty for the consumer litigant. The FCRA section regarding "maximum possible accuracy" requires the agency to "follow" reasonable procedures. n13 Claims based on plaintiff's being a third party beneficiary of the subscriber's contract with the reporting bureau have been dismissed. n14 A warning that the information may be inaccurate does not shield the agency from liability. n15

The reasonable procedures standard should be considered violated when a consumer reporting agency returns a report in response to an inquiry about one consumer that mixes in, or mismerges, information about another consumer. However, a recent Seventh Circuit opinion agreed with Trans Union that such mismerging may be justified, reasoning that it is more important to overinclude information that may, but may not, refer to the subject consumer than to omit an item that was intended to be tagged to that consumer but, because of data miscollection, was not. n16 The court appeared to misread the language of the statute to require only that the consumer reporting agency must have reasonable procedures to "avoid inaccuracy," not to "assure maximum possible accuracy." n17

To prove negligent noncompliance, the consumer must show by a preponderance of evidence, that (1) the report contained an inaccurate entry; (2) the inaccuracy was due to defendant's failure to follow procedures to assure maximum possible accuracy; (3) the consumer suffered injury; (4) the injury was caused, in part, by the inaccuracy. n18

Where it is difficult to show that the agency was negligent in failing to follow reasonable procedures, a better approach may be to show that the agency was negligent in failing to correct the report after the inaccuracy was brought to the agency's attention. The FCRA specifies, in detail, requirements on handling consumer disputes of inaccurate or incomplete information. Note, however that the consumer can recover under § 1681e(b) even if the consumer has not provided notice of the inaccuracy to the agency. n19

[c] Claims Against Reporting Agencies for Obsolete Reports

An agency is liable if it is negligent in making any consumer report that contains any obsolete information. n20 The agency is also liable if it is negligent in maintaining reasonable procedures designed to avoid reporting of obsolete information. n21

[d] Claims Against Reporting Agencies for Furnishing Reports for Impermissible Purposes

An agency is liable if it is negligent in furnishing any consumer report in any circumstance other than those explicitly permitted in the statute. n22 The agency is also liable if it is negligent in maintaining reasonable procedures designed to avoid such reporting. n23

What is reasonable depends in part on patterns and practices of abuse by particular users or groups of users. When a consumer reporting agency has reason to doubt a user's compliance, it has an obligation to take additional steps to ensure compliance or to deny the user access to reports altogether. n24 When Vermont found that Equifax was failing to reasonably ensure that users obtained prior consumer consent to access credit reports, as required Vermont law, Equifax agreed to require audits of user practices and to terminate users who fail to sign promises to follow new prophylactic procedures imposed by Equifax. n25

[e] Claims Relating to Medical Information Reported Without Consumer Consent

Prior to the FACTA, consumer reporting agencies were prohibited from furnishing medical information about consumers for employment purposes, or in connection with credit, insurance or direct marketing transactions without consumer consent. n26 The FACTA continues to prohibit agencies from issuing a report for employment purposes or in connection with a credit or insurance transaction that contains medical information without the consumer's consent. n27

In addition, as of June 1, 2004, a consumer's consent must be in writing, must be specific, and must describe the use for which the agency will furnish the information. n28 These requirements are applicable if the report is for employment purposes or in connection with a credit or insurance transaction. n29 An agency may provide medical information that pertains solely to financial transactions as long as it insures that the information does not disclose a specific provider of medical services or the nature of services. n30 The FACTA also prohibits users from re-disclosing such reports. n31

The FACTA also prohibits reporting agencies from including the name, address, and telephone information of medical information furnishers in consumer reports unless the agency formats the information to prevent the disclosure either of the specific provider or the nature of the medical services. However, the agency may provide such information in a report to an insurance agency. n32

Consistent with the FCRA prior to amendment by the FACTA, these requirements are violated if the medical information is negligently reported. There is no "reasonable procedures" defense to the improper furnishing of medical information without the required consumer consent. If medical information is released without such consent, it should create a prima facie case, or at least a rebuttable presumption, of negligence.

[f] Claims Against Reporting Agencies for Failure to Disclose Content of the Consumer's File or to Handle Consumer Disputes and Reinvestigations Properly

The FCRA requires that agencies disclose the contents of the consumer's file to the consumer under specified conditions, and in specified ways. n33 Negligent or willful failure to comply with these requirements is actionable.

Reporting agencies must follow certain procedures when the consumer has disputed the accuracy of a report. n34 Negligent or willful failure to follow those procedures is actionable. n35

[g] Claims Against Reporting Agencies for Failure to Reverify Investigative Reports

Agencies must reverify adverse information in subsequent investigative reports even if verified for the first investigative report. n36 Any negligent or willful failure to comply should be actionable.

[h] Claims Against Reporting Agencies Relating to Adverse Public Record Information for Employment Purposes

Another obligation is that a consumer reporting agency must notify the consumer that adverse public record information is being reported for employment purposes, or the agency must maintain strict procedures to insure the information is complete and up to date. n37 The FACTA excludes certain employee investigation communications from FCRA requirements. n38 To fall within the exclusion, the communication must not be for the purpose of investigating the employee's credit worthiness, credit standing, personal characteristics or mode of living, and must not be provided to anyone other than the employer or employer's agent, a governmental authority, or a self-regulatory organization with regulatory authority over the employer. n39

[i] Claims Against Reporting Agencies Relating to Prescreening Lists

Reporting agencies must create and maintain a system to allow consumers to "opt out" of the prescreening process. n40 The negligent failure to provide a consumer with the opportunity to opt out, or the failure to comply with a consumer's decision to opt out, is actionable. The provision by a reporting agency of a prescreened list for impermissible purposes is actionable.

[j] Claims Against Resellers or Superbureaus

Failure by a reseller of consumer reports to establish reasonable procedures to ensure that reports are resold only for permissible purposes and to previously identified end-users is sufficient to show negligent noncompliance with the requirements. Resellers must also comply with the FCRA's reinvestigation requirements. n41

[k] Claims Against Users for Failure to Provide Required Notices

The FCRA requires users of information to provide certain notices to consumers. n42 Negligent or willful failure to provide such notices is actionable.

[l] Claims for Failure to Comply With Disclosure and Certification Requirements for Investigative Reports

The FCRA prohibits any person from procuring an investigative consumer report without disclosure to the consumer and places various disclosure and certification obligations on both users and reporting agencies. n43 In addition, the FCRA also prohibits consumer reporting agencies from making inquiries in connection with investigative consumer reports for employment purposes if the making of such inquiries by an employer would violate any federal or state equal employment opportunity law. Negligent or willful failure to comply with the disclosure and certification requirements is actionable.

[m] Claims Against Those Obtaining Reports Without a Permissible Purpose or Under False Pretenses

The FCRA prohibits any person from using or obtaining a consumer report unless the report is obtained for a permissible purpose and such purpose is certified by the user in accordance with the Act. n44 A "user" includes the person who actually requests or obtains the report, the person who is the ultimate destination of the report, and one who fraudulently causes a report to be issued (such as an impostor who applies for credit using someone else's personal identifiers). n45 The FCRA also contains special sanctions against any person who obtains a consumer report under false pretenses or knowingly without a permissible purpose. Such a person is liable to both the consumer and the consumer reporting agency which furnished the report for actual damages or $1,000, whichever is greater, as well as punitive damages, costs, and attorney's fees. n46

[n] Claims Against Information Furnishers

The FCRA imposes specific obligations for businesses (typically creditors) who furnish information to consumer reporting agencies. n47 A furnisher can be liable to the consumer for negligently or willfully violating the provisions regarding reinvestigation, but not for improperly reporting information to a reporting agency in the first instance. n48 Several district courts have confirmed that the statute allows consumers to bring a private action for civil damages against furnishers who fail to comply with their reinvestigation obligations. n49 Only one decision, which grows increasingly isolated with each new opinion upholding private actions, has misconstrued the provision as only allowing consumer reporting agencies--and not consumers--to bring civil actions. n50 An allegation that the consumer has notified the reporting agency of a dispute is essential to triggering the furnisher's liability. n51 Furthermore, if a collection agency furnishes information, the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, which is not preempted by FCRA, requires the collection agency to report the debt as disputed once the consumer disputes it, and allows actual and statutory damages along with attorney's fees for violation of the Act. n52 The FACTA of 2003 also requires the FTC and other agencies to issue accuracy guidelines for furnishers; however, enforcement of these guidelines is limited to federal and state officials. n53

[2] FCRA Immunity From Tort Claims

The FCRA prohibits any action:

> in the nature of defamation, invasion of privacy, or negligence with respect to the reporting of information against any consumer reporting agency, any user of information, or any person who furnishes information to a consumer reporting agency, based on information disclosed pursuant to [the sections concerning disclosures to consumers, conditions of disclosure to consumers, and disclosure requirements for users of consumer reports] or based on information disclosed by a user of a consumer report to or for a consumer against whom the user has taken adverse action, based in whole or in part on the report, except as to false information furnished with malice or willful intent to injure such consumer. n54

This section establishes a limited qualified immunity for the reporting agency, user, and provider of information from liability under three tort theories, unless the conduct involves malice or willful intent. n55 Immunity arises only for claims based on information disclosed to consumers n56 pursuant to three FCRA sections requiring specified disclosures to consumers. n57 Two of the sections require agencies to disclose to consumers the information in their files about the consumer (other than information concerning credit scores or any other risk scores or predictors). n58

The third FCRA disclosure section requires users to disclose to consumers the fact that an adverse action has been taken on the basis of information contained in a consumer report or that credit was denied on the basis of other third party information, including information provided by an affiliate. n59 The immunity does not extend to information disclosed or obtained by means other than the reporting agency's disclosure to the consumer of the contents of the file or the user's disclosure to the consumer of the adverse action. n60

The qualified immunity applies only to actions and proceedings in the "nature of" defamation, invasion of privacy, and negligence. The immunity thus should not apply to other tort claims and claims based on state credit reporting statutes, state deceptive practices statutes, and state debt collection statutes. n61

The FCRA's limited tort immunity applies to "any person who furnishes information to a consumer reporting agency." n62 The immunity does not apply when the person furnishes information to someone other than a consumer reporting agency. For example, the immunity does not apply to a creditor reporting its own experience with its customer to another creditor.

The FCRA's qualified immunity raises the level of proof required by a consumer to prevail in state defamation, privacy, and negligence actions. The qualified immunity requires that the consumer prove that the defendant acted with malice or willful intent to injure, and that the reported information was false.

Some of the new responsibilities imposed by the FACTA of 2003 may be eligible for qualified immunity protection to the extent that a plaintiff's action is based on information that the defendant disclosed to fulfill the responsibility. While the FACTA did not amend the qualified immunity provision itself, it did amend two of the three sections, 609 (§ 1681g) and 615 (§ 1681m), that benefit from the immunity section's protection. Accordingly, plaintiffs may have to meet the elevated proof requirements when bringing actions based on the failure of a party to comply with any of the following new (or amended) provisions:

- An agency's responsibility, upon the consumer's request, to truncate the first five digits of the consumer's social security number when making a disclosure pursuant to the consumer's request n63

- An agency's new responsibility to disclose to consumers the forthcoming summary, to be prepared by the FTC, of consumer's rights to obtain and dispute information and to obtain credit scores n64

- An agency's new responsibility to provide identity theft victims with a statement of their rights n65

- The new responsibility of businesses that have done business with an identity thief to provide the victim, upon the victim's request, with transaction information (to the extent such a provision is a "disclosure") n66

In addition, a new disclosure provision requires businesses that have done business with an identity thief to disclose transaction information to the thief's victim upon the victim's request. n67 Accordingly, the qualified immunity provision may protect the business from suit to the extent that the suit is in the nature of defamation, invasion of privacy, or negligence, but only to the extent that the action is "with respect to the reporting of information." n68

The same reasoning applies to the new responsibilities of debt collectors who are notified that information related to the debt may be fraudulent or the result of identity theft. n69

[3] FCRA Preemption of State Credit Reporting Statutes

Most states have credit reporting laws. The FCRA provides:

> Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c), [the Act] does not annul, alter, affect, or exempt any person subject to the provisions of this [Act] from complying with the laws of any State with respect to the collection, distribution, or use of any information on consumers, except to the extent that those laws are inconsistent with any provision of this [Act], and then only to the extent of the inconsistency. n70

According to this savings clause, the FCRA does not generally preempt state credit reporting or other laws, unless there is a specific inconsistency between the FCRA and the state law, n71 or unless certain explicit FCRA exceptions apply. Courts have consistently found that this savings clause shows that Congress did not intend to comprehensively preempt states from the field of credit reporting regulation. n72 Furthermore, in 2003, Congress added to the savings clause state laws "for the prevention or mitigation of identity theft." This evinces a strong presumption in favor of the rights of states to protect their citizens from identity theft. n73

Despite the general rule limiting preemption of state law, the Consumer Credit Reporting Reform Act of 1996 adds specific provisions which preempt any state law which differs from the federal provision, regardless of whether the state law is inconsistent or provides the consumer greater protection.

These specific preemptions of state law do not affect any settlement agreement or consent judgment between any state attorney general and any consumer reporting agency in effect on September 30, 1996. More importantly, these preemption rules may be temporary. Any state law enacted after January 1, 2004, which states explicitly that it is intended to supplement the FCRA and gives greater protection to consumers than is provided under the FCRA, will not be superseded. n74

The following is a summary of the new federal preemptions of state laws: n75

- State laws regulating the creation and use of prescreened reports are preempted. n76

- State laws relating to the time by which a reporting agency must handle the various aspects of a consumer dispute and reinvestigation, including the times by which various notices must be given, are preempted, except for those state laws in effect on September 30, 1996. n77

- State laws relating to the duties of persons who take adverse actions against consumers, based on information in consumer reports or information provided by third parties other than consumer reporting agencies, are preempted. n78

- State laws relating to users of prescreened reports, specifically to the duties of creditors and insurance companies who use consumer reports to make solicitations of credit or insurance, where the transactions are not initiated by consumers and involve a firm offer, are preempted. n79

- State laws concerning the contents of consumer reports, such as standards of obsolescence, reports of account closings, and which transactions are not covered because of size or amount, are preempted, except for those state laws in effect on September 30, 1996. n80

- State laws regarding the responsibilities of furnishers of information to consumer reporting agencies are preempted, except certain laws in Massachusetts and California in effect September 30, 1996. n81 For instance, the California law prohibiting any report if the furnisher "knows or should know" is inaccurate (parallel to section 1681s-2(a)) is not preempted, but the California law providing a private right of action to enforce the prohibition is preempted. n82

- State laws with respect to the exchange of information between affiliates are preempted, except the law in Vermont in effect September 30, 1996. n83

- State laws are preempted with regard to the summary of rights which must be provided to consumers by consumer reporting agencies. n84

- States must use the FCRA's meaning of "firm offer of credit or insurance" for any equivalent term under state law. n85

The recently enacted FACTA preempts states from governing much of the new territory added to the FCRA. Prior to the FACTA, the FCRA preempted any "requirement or prohibition" of a state with respect to the "subject matter" of identified FCRA provisions. n86 The FACTA added additional preemptions, the largest group of which forbids states from regulating the "conduct required by" certain identified FCRA provisions. n87 In addition, the state statute itself may impose limitations on its use in conjunction with the FCRA. n88

Nonetheless, these preemptions should have a much narrower effect than the preexisting (and supplemented) "subject matter" preemption provision since the preemption should not apply to state laws regulating the subject matter of the provision beyond the specific conduct that the provision demands. n89 In addition, the Act preempts state laws with respect to the required disclosures of the FCRA rights of identity theft victims, n90 to the new provision allowing consumers to opt out of some use by affiliates of consumer information for solicitation purposes, n91 and to the new responsibility of creditors to provide risk-based pricing notices to credit applicants when they offer credit on "material terms that are materially less favorable" than those offered to other consumers. n92

[4] FCRA Claims May Be Brought in Federal or State Court

FCRA suits may be brought in federal courts without regard to the amount in controversy, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction. n93 Bringing an action in state court will not alter substantive rights. n94

[5] Enforceability of Arbitration Agreements

Increasingly, credit and sales agreements contain binding arbitration provisions that may affect a consumer's FCRA claim against the other party to a consumer contract. n95 Arbitration clauses are found in most consumer contracts, including agreements for credit cards, loans, and utilities. Credit reporting agencies have also included such clauses in agreements with consumers who seek disclosure of their own credit reports, at least those who order their reports online through the centralized source and directly through the agency's websites. The legality of including arbitration clauses as a requirement for consumers to obtain their own credit reports, as allowed under the FCRA, is questionable and this practice may have a short life, depending on whether the FTC finds this an objectionable practice.

[6] FCRA Limitations Period

The FACTA amended the FCRA's statute of limitations to provide that the two-year limitations period dates from the consumer's discovery of the violation, not the date of the violation itself. This effectively overrules Andrews v. TRW, n96 which held that the discovery rule did not apply to the FCRA's limitations period. However, the consumer must bring the action within five years of the date of the violation, regardless of the discovery rule. n97 The effective date for this change to the statute of limitation is March 31, 2004. n98 Republication by the CRA of the same inaccurate information as had appeared in earlier credit reports that plaintiff was aware of does not serve to restart the statute of limitations. n99

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 16 Fair Credit Reporting

1-16 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 16.10

§ 16.10 Private Remedies

[1] Introduction

A person who negligently fails to comply with any most FCRA requirements is liable to the consumer for actual damages sustained as a result of the failure and, in the case of a successful action, the costs of the action together with reasonable attorney's fees. n1 A person who willfully fails to comply with the FCRA is liable for either (a) actual damages sustained by the consumer as a result of the violation or (b) damages ranging from $100 to $1000. n2 A natural person who obtains a consumer report under false pretenses or knowingly without a permissible purpose is liable to the consumer for actual damages or $1000, whichever is greater. n3 In addition, a person who willfully fails to comply with the FCRA is liable for such punitive damages as the court may allow. n4

[a] FACTA Limitations on Private Enforcement

[i] FACTA Expands FCRA's Qualified Immunity Provision

The FCRA provides a qualified immunity to any agency, user or furnisher against any state law claim "in the nature of defamation, invasion of privacy, or negligence" based in whole or in part on a consumer report. n5

The FACTA adds eight actions, based on new FACTA requirements, that also come under this qualified immunity:

- Requirements that agencies to withhold the last five digits of a consumer's social security number from the disclosure of the consumer's file if the consumer so requests n6

- Requirements that agencies provide certain information with their disclosure of a file to a consumer, including the FTC's summary of consumers' rights to obtain and dispute information in consumer reports and to obtain and dispute credit scores n7

- Requirements for agencies to provide consumers who believe they are or may be the victim of identity theft with an FTC-issued summary of their right to use the FCRA's new procedures for remedying the fraud n8

- Rights for identity theft victims to obtain business transaction information from businesses that have done business with the thief n9

- Requirements for agencies to disclose credit scores and certain related information n10

- Requirements for mortgage lenders to disclose credit scores to loan applicants and to provide them with a designated notice n11

- Requirements that users making credit or insurance solicitations present the required prescreening notice in a format, size, type, and manner to be established by the FTC n12

- Requirements for creditors to issue risk-based pricing notices n13

[ii] No Private Enforcement of Certain New Furnisher Obligations

The following new furnisher obligations, n14 are protected from private enforcement: n15

- The requirement that furnishers have procedures for responding to identity theft notifications from agencies and that prohibits furnishers from re-submitting fraudulent information n16

- The requirement that financial institutions notify customers that they are furnishing negative information to agencies about that customer n17

- The requirement that consumers be allowed to dispute information directly with a furnisher and that furnishers must reinvestigate a dispute when it meets certain conditions, complete the investigation within the designated time, and notify each agency to whom the furnisher furnished the information if the furnisher finds that it was inaccurate n18

- The requirement that persons in the business of providing medical services, products, or devices and who furnish information to agencies notify the agencies of their status as medical information furnishers n19

[iii] No Private Enforcement for Certain Other New FACTA Requirements

The FACTA also adds a number of other limitations on private enforcements as to new responsibilities created by the Act. Identity theft victims may not enforce their new rights to business transaction information from businesses that have done business with the thief. n20 Consumers may not enforce the new obligations of users to provide risk-based pricing notices. n21 Consumers also may not enforce the obligation of the federal banking agencies, the National Credit Union Administration, and the FTC to establish accuracy and integrity guidelines for furnishers and to prescribe regulations requiring furnishers to establish reasonable policies and procedures for implementing those guidelines. n22 Finally, consumers may not enforce the obligation of agencies to issue red flag guidelines and regulations. n23 Nonetheless, as long as none of these guidelines and regulations apply to other furnisher requirements in which private claims may be brought, consumers should be able to pursue private actions in accordance with the FCRA's willful and negligent liability provisions. n24

[2] Actual Damages

For a consumer to recover for a defendant's negligent failure to comply with the FCRA, the consumer will have to prove actual damages n25 which were a result of the defendant's failure to comply with an FCRA requirement. n26 These damages can be intangible (such as pain and suffering or humiliation) and need not be pecuniary. The consumer is under no duty to mitigate actual damages by exhausting other FCRA remedies or rights. n27 Nominal damages may be recoverable for procedural violations. n28

An inaccurate consumer report may cause a denial of credit, the loss of a job opportunity, or the refusal of an insurance policy. These denials may result in financial loss, which, if proved, entitles the consumer to an actual damage award. n29 To the extent that the FCRA does not envision recovery of business or commercial damages, the plaintiff may recover said damages under normal consumer law theories. n30 In many cases, the most significant damage sustained by a consumer is the emotional distress and vexation of dealing with the repercussions of an inaccurate consumer report and the often frustrating ordeal of trying to correct the record. n31 If emotional distress damages will be claimed, examine the law of the jurisdiction to determine whether expert testimony may be required to obtain those damages. n32

[3] Punitive Damages

A person who willfully fails to comply with the FCRA is liable for such punitive damages as the court will allow. n33 It is unnecessary to prove malice or evil motive, or any other element that may be required for recovery under a common law tort theory. n34 Intent may be deduced by circumstantial evidence. n35 Courts generally find that the consumer need not prove actual damages in order to collect punitive damages. n36 The FCRA does not limit the size of punitive damages in either an individual or a class action; punitive damages are determined at the discretion of the courts. Credit reporting agencies and other defendants may be unwilling to produce information on net worth without a claim for punitive damages. Consumers must thus include an allegation in their complaint that the defendant acted willfully, in violation of section 1681n, in order to establish a claim for punitive damages, justifying the request for information on net worth.

[4] Statutory Minimum Damages

Any person who willfully fails to comply with the FCRA with respect to any consumer is liable to the consumer for either (a) actual damages sustained or (b) damages ranging from $100 to $1000. n37 In 2007, the standard to be used in determining whether a violation is "willful" was clarified by the Supreme Court in Safeco Insurance Company v. Burr. n38 Consumers should normally request in their pleadings the greater of actual damages or statutory damages. A natural person who obtains a consumer report under false pretenses or knowingly without a permissible purpose is liable to the consumer for the greater of actual damages or $1000. n39 The FCRA does not provide for minimum statutory damages for negligence actions, nor does it authorize multiple damages. n40

[5] Attorney's Fees and Costs

The FCRA provides that a defendant is liable to a consumer, in the case of a successful action, in an amount equal to the costs of the action, as well as reasonable attorney's fees as determined by the court. n41 Costs may also be awarded to the prevailing defendant under the federal rules. n42

CHAPTER 17 Credit Repair Agencies

§ 17.01 General

Recent years have seen the spread of organizations promising to assist consumers improve poor credit ratings or credit records. Calling themselves "credit repair" or "credit service" agencies, "credit clinics" and the like, they are widely reported to be disreputable. n1 The Federal Trade Commission ("FTC") has charged many such organizations and their principals with misleading consumers by falsely and deceptively claiming the ability to improve credit records and by not honoring refund guarantees. n2

The agencies offer, usually for a substantial fee, to remove negative items from a credit history. Sometimes, they encourage consumers to establish a new credit identity by using an Employer Identification Number instead of their social security number, a seemingly fraudulent and possibly criminal solution to a bad situation. Generally, these agencies do nothing consumers cannot do for themselves free of charge. Indeed, consumers may be better positioned to deal with their credit histories by themselves, as some credit bureaus refuse to deal with credit repair agencies.

The FCRA allows credit reporting agencies to disregard disputes of items on consumers' credit reports that are generated by credit repair organizations. n3 The credit reporting agency must notify the consumer that it has deemed the request frivolous. n4 Creditors who furnish information to credit reporting agencies may also disregard disputes sent by credit repair organizations. n5

Other credit repair agencies do not promise to make the actual improvements to the consumer's credit report, but sell credit repair books, CD-ROMs, or other materials, often accompanied by a promise to provide personal credit repair advice to the consumer. There have been reports of creditors selling these services, or even requiring consumers to buy them, as a condition of an extension of credit.

A portion of the blame for the ready market for credit repair agencies lies squarely with the credit reporting industry, which continues to hold a very poor record with regard to the quality of its product. With a huge percentage of all consumer reports flawed by error, the credit repair agencies have learned to turn a chaotic reporting industry to their advantage. Credit repair agencies are actually successful in having negative (but accurate) information removed from consumers' files. Already inundated with legitimate disputes, the credit reporting agencies are ill-equipped to handle the barrage of additional disputes generated by credit repair agencies. All too often the easiest alternative for the reporting agency is to delete the disputed information. Thus, the rash of inaccurate and unreliable credit reporting generates more disputes, reporting agencies find themselves less capable of responding properly, and credit reports become more inaccurate and unreliable, all to the detriment of the entire consumer credit system.

Tools to combat the credit repair agencies include the Federal Credit Repair Organizations Act ("CROA"), state credit repair acts, the FTC's Telemarketing Sales Rule (limited to credit repair services that are sold through telephone calls), and state unfair and deceptive practices acts. n6 Credit repair laws do not impinge on First Amendment rights. n7

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 17 Credit Repair Agencies

1-17 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 17.02

§ 17.02 Federal Repair Organizations Act

[1] Introduction

The CROA n1 imposes stringent limitations on the activities of credit repair agencies. Enacted as part of the 1997 Omnibus Appropriations Act, the CROA seeks to provide consumers "with the information necessary to make an informed decision regarding the purchase of [credit repair] services" and "to protect the public from unfair or deceptive advertising and business practices by credit repair organizations." n2

[2] Substantive Regulation of Credit Repair Organizations

The CROA contains an exceptionally broad definition of credit repair organizations subject to its requirements. n3 A credit repair organization may be any person who performs or offers to perform any service, for a fee or other valuable consideration, for the purpose of improving a consumer's credit record, credit history, or credit rating. The definition includes individuals engaging in credit repair activities. n4 An organization that merely advises or assists a consumer in credit repair is covered even if all actual credit repair steps are undertaken by the consumer. n5 The definition also requires that the organization use an instrumentality of interstate commerce or the mail. n6 It also does not apply unless the organization uses any instrumentality of interstate commerce, such as mail or telephone, an unlikely event.

The definition includes an element of intent. To be a credit repair organization, one must act for the "express or implied purpose" of improving a consumer's credit record or provide advice and assistance towards that end. The application of the Act to lawyers may prove particularly troubling. Nothing in the Act explicitly exempts lawyers who, for example, advertise and solicit customers for the express purpose of "fixing" or improving their credit reports. n7

Some retailers, lenders, and professionals advertise and offer services to consumers with bad credit histories and promise to improve the consumer's credit record. For example, a growing segment of the used car market targets customers perceived as having bad credit and promises not only to find them financing but also, in the process, to help them reestablish credit or improve their credit records. n8 Whether car dealers or other retailers are included within a credit repair statute depends on its language. n9 For instance, Ohio courts were divided on coverage of used car dealers who advertised they could obtain financing for those with bad credit. The Ohio Court of Appeals found the state credit repair act did not apply unless money or its equivalent was paid specifically for the credit services. n10 In contrast, the language of the Illinois law was held broad enough to include retailers who helped consumers get credit. n11

An entity is a credit repair organization even if its services are offered for the implied rather than the express purpose of credit repair. n12 Promising that accepting an offered credit card will improve the consumer's credit rating, n13 or that debt consolidation plans will "help repair bad credit negatives on your credit report" n14 may be sufficient to establish coverage. Using terms such as "establish," "rebuild," "raise," and "improve" to describe the effect of the organization's services on a consumer's credit rating is sufficient, even if some of these representations refer to free products or services. n15 A contract that implicitly promises to attempt to improve the consumer's credit record, history, or rating falls within the definition even if it uses phrases from the FCRA and other consumer protection statutes to describe the services that will be performed and even if it states that the contracting party is not a credit repair organization. n16

A credit repair organization may provide no services until three days after a written and dated contract has been signed. n17 The contract must state the terms and conditions of payment, including the total of all payments due; "a full and detailed description of the services to be performed," including "all guarantees of performance," an estimate of the date by which performance will be completed, and the time necessary to perform the services; and a conspicuous, bold face disclosure of a three-day right to cancel placed "in immediate proximity" to the consumer's signature. n18 The consumer must also be provided in duplicate with a form Notice of Cancellation. n19 The credit repair organization must also provide on a separate document a required disclosure that details consumer rights to self-help concerning their credit reports under the Fair Credit Reporting Act ("FCRA") and the consumer's rights under the CROA. n20 Consumers must receive a copy of the contract and any other document that they sign. n21

Cancellation may be effectuated by sending the signed and dated Notice of Cancellation form or any other written notice to the credit repair organization. n22 The right to cancel extends until midnight of the third business day after execution of the contract or after the contract becomes enforceable. n23 Since a contract not meeting the requirements of the CROA is void and unenforceable, n24 the unqualified right to cancel is effectively extended until three days after the credit repair organization complies with the CROA. No credit repair organization may charge or receive payment for services before the services are "fully performed." n25

The CROA lists a number of prohibited practices. n26 A credit repair organization cannot make any statements which are false or misleading (or which upon the exercise of reasonable care should be known to be false or misleading), provide any misleading advice to consumers, or attempt to or actually engage in any other form of deception directed at the consumer, a credit reporting agency, or any person "to whom the consumer has applied or is applying for an extension of credit." n27 Misrepresenting that an organization is a non-profit is a violation. n28 The organizations cannot make any statement to encourage consumers to alter their identification. n29

Any waiver of any consumer protection under the CROA is void and may not be enforced by any court or other person, and the attempt to obtain the waiver is a violation of the CROA. n30 The CROA also prohibits credit repair organizations from charging or receiving payment for their services until the service is fully performed. n31

[3] Private Remedies for CROA Violations

Contracts not in compliance with the CROA are treated as void and may not be enforced by any court or person. n32 In addition, individual consumers or a class of consumers can recover for any violation of the CROA the sum of:

- The greater of actual damages or the amount paid to the organization;
- Such additional punitive damages as the court may allow;
- Costs and reasonable attorney's fees. n33

In awarding punitive damages, courts will use as factors the frequency, persistence, and nature of the noncompliance, the extent to which the violation was intentional, and, in a class action, the number of consumers adversely affected. n34 The Act allows the court to consider "other relevant factors" as well, n35 and one court has allowed discovery of a defendant's net worth as relevant to punitive damages. n36

Unlike other titles of the Consumer Credit Protection Act, which provide for enforcement through private rights of action, n37 the CROA does not contain a specific grant of jurisdiction in the federal district courts. Whether this omission will deny federal courts jurisdiction to hear private claims or whether jurisdiction is created under the general federal question statute n38 remains to be seen. As is the case with regard to the other titles, the CROA is silent as to the right to trial by jury. Consistent with the Seventh Amendment and the case law under these related statutes, a jury should be available. n39 The CROA allows attorney's fees for a prevailing plaintiff, n40 but contains no allowance for attorney's fees to a prevailing defendant. In addition, since consumers seek the services of a credit repair organization only when they are in dire financial straits, an arbitration clause that imposes high up-front costs on the consumer is particularly vulnerable to an unconscionability challenge. n41

The statute of limitations for an action under the CROA is five years from the occurrence of the violation. n42 Where the violation relates to the organization's material and willful failure to disclose, the five years begins to run from when the consumer discovers the misrepresentation. n43 Other entities that are directly or indirectly involved in deception or other violations of the Act--such as assignees of a credit repair organization's contracts, related corporations involved in a deceptive credit repair scheme, n44 the owner or employees of the credit repair organization, n45 creditors who agree to accept referrals from the credit repair organization, n46 or persons who assist in concealment of a credit applicant's identification or in misrepresentation of an applicant's creditworthiness--may be liable. In addition, a court may apply the state "alter ego" or veil-piercing doctrine, tailored to CROA, to hold related entities liable for the acts of a credit repair organization. n47

The Act specifically contemplates class actions. It sets forth a special rule for determining the amount of punitive damages in a class action: the aggregate amount the court allows for each named plaintiff, plus the aggregate amount it allows for each other class member without regard to any minimum individual recovery. n48 Class actions must meet the usual requirements of Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. n49

[4] Does an Arbitration Clause Apply to CROA Claims?

Credit repair organizations may include clauses in their consumer contracts that require any dispute to be resolved by binding arbitration, thus attempting to keep consumer litigation out of the courts.

CROA states that any contract for services which does not comply with the Act is void, and this might lead to an argument that the arbitration clause is void as well. n50 But the U.S. Supreme Court, in Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna, established a bright-line test as to whether a court or an arbitrator decides if an arbitration agreement is enforceable. n51 The arbitration clause is treated as a separate agreement. A court decides a challenge directed to that separate agreement - such as that it is unconscionable or misrepresented. An arbitrator decides challenges to the rest of the contract. Thus a claim that a credit repair contract is void for violating CROA goes to the contract as a whole, and not specifically to the arbitration clause. Therefore an arbitrator, not the court, decides if CROA has been violated, making the contract void.

If the consumer instead takes advantage of the CROA right to cancel the contract by sending timely notice to the repair organization, however, the result should be different. If the defendant does not dispute the effectiveness of the cancellation (i.e., does not dispute that it received a timely cancellation notice), then the contract and with it the arbitration clause are cancelled. n52 Any subsequent litigation can proceed in court.

Of special significance for CROA cases, a federal decision in Alexander v. U.S. Credit Management, Inc. holds that a mandatory arbitration requirement conflicts with congressional intent in enacting CROA. n53 CROA has an unusually specific anti-waiver clause: "Any waiver by any consumer of any protection provided by or any right of the consumer under this subchapter shall be treated as void; and may not be enforced by any Federal or State court of any other person." n54 CROA also states: "Any attempt by any person to obtain a waiver from any consumer of any protection provided by or any right of the consumer under this subchapter shall be treated as a violation of this subchapter." n55 Alexander thus holds that it is the arbitration clause that is void as an impermissible waiver, not the whole contract. Since this challenge goes to the arbitration clause and not to the contract as a whole, Alexander is consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Cardegna that a court and not an arbitrator determines the challenge to the arbitration clause specifically.

Alexander looks to CROA's explicit language requiring disclosure to the consumer of the "right to sue a credit repair organization that violates the Credit Repair Organization Act." n56 It finds the right to sue in court (not some other proceeding) specifically protected by the Act. An arbitration clause would waive this right, and is thus unenforceable. n57 Alexander distinguishes CROA from other statutes both in the explicit nature of the right to sue and the detailed anti-waiver provision, and also by examining CROA's legislative history in detail. n58

Moreover, the anti-waiver provision is particularly applicable where the arbitration clause either explicitly or by reference to the rules of an arbitration service provider limits the consumer's right to punitive damages, attorney fees, or a class claim, all of which are rights explicitly granted by CROA. Although some courts will only strike an arbitration clause where it limits the consumer's substantive rights, Alexander states that it is not necessary to determine if punitive damages, attorney fees, or class claims are substantive CROA rights, because the anti-waiver language applies to any waiver. n59 Since Alexander, another district court has agreed with its reasoning and held that arbitration clauses are unenforceable as to CROA claims. n60 However, the Third Circuit has held such clauses to be enforceable. n61 The court took a strained and very narrow interpretation of the anti-waiver clause and treated CROA's references to class actions and the consumer's right to "sue" as mere surplusage. In addition, a federal district court judge in Michigan has issued two decisions finding such clauses enforceable, n62 and one other district court has issued a similar ruling. n63

Of course, other grounds to challenge an arbitration clause also apply to CROA cases as well. For example, since consumers seek the services of a credit repair organization only when they are in dire financial straits, an arbitration clause that imposes high up-front costs on the consumer is particularly vulnerable to an unconscionability challenge. n64 A detailed analysis of unconscionability and other challenges to arbitration clauses is found at NCLC's Consumer Arbitration Agreements. n65

[5] Relation to State Laws

The CROA does not preempt state credit repair statutes, except to the extent to which the two are inconsistent, and then only to the extent of such inconsistency. n66 Determination of any such inconsistency and the effect of this provision should proceed under the same principles which are employed to test the identical standard under the FCRA. The advocate can use state unfair and deceptive acts and practices ("UDAP") and consumer law remedies in addition to statutory remedies. n67

[6] Federal and State Enforcement of the CROA

The FTC enforces the CROA under the FTC Act, whether or not the organization comes under the jurisdictional tests for the FTC Act. n68 In one case against a lawyer, the FTC obtained equitable disgorgement of $1.3 million for numerous violations. n69 In addition, state enforcement officials can bring actions under the CROA to enjoin violations, to act on behalf of its residents to recover damages that the residents could have recovered in private actions, and to recover its own costs and attorney's fees. n70

The joint enforcement by the FTC and state enforcement officials continues cooperation that already existed with respect to FTC Telemarketing Rule enforcement. For example, in 1996, as part of "Operation Payback," the FTC and ten state attorney general offices filed fifteen fraud cases against credit repair clinics. n71 Likewise, federal and state officials teamed up recently to stop a company from misrepresenting the nature of its credit repair business. n72 Under New Jersey law, the company engaged in deceptive representation and omissions, as well as fraudulent and unconscionable commercial practices.

CHAPTER 17 Credit Repair Agencies

§ 17.03 State Credit Repair Laws

Many states have passed statutes to address problems that have arisen with credit repair organizations. n1 While often similar to the CROA, the differences can be important and should be carefully considered. These laws typically require written contracts that describe specific services to be provided, the right of rescission of contract, the requirement of bond posting with the state, a description of rights under the FCRA, and remedies under state deceptive practices statutes for violations. These state laws have been applied to credit card issuers, n2 retailers "who provide credit assistance in the course of the transaction for the sale of goods," n3 and loan brokers. n4 The requirement that a fee be paid to a repair organization has been fulfilled when credit has been just a part of the transaction for which the consumer pays, even if no separate fee or payment is identifiable. n5 Most credit repair abuses should also be state UDAP violations, and the CROA explicitly states that state laws are not preempted.

PART I Consumer Credit
CHAPTER 17 Credit Repair Agencies

1-17 Consumer Credit Law Manual § 17.04

§ 17.04 Federal Telemarketing Statutes and Regulations

In 1995, the FTC adopted its Telemarketing Rule ("the Rule"), n1 which applies to credit repair services that are marketed through at least one interstate telephone call without a face-to-face meeting. n2 The Rule was extensively amended effective March 31, 2003, n3 but the amendments do not have a significant impact on the restrictions that apply to credit repair organizations. It specifically covers cases where the consumer makes the first call to the credit repair organization in response to an advertisement or direct mail solicitation, including those transmitted by fax, e-mail, or similar methods. n4 It does not, however, cover 900-number calls to credit repair clinics because these are regulated by different statutes and rules. n5

One area in which the Telemarketing Rule provides greater consumer protection than the CROA is payment for services. The CROA prohibits credit repair organizations from charging or receiving payment for their services until the service is fully performed. n6 The FTC's Telemarketing Rule, on the other hand, prohibits a credit repair clinic from requesting or receiving any payment for its services until it has provided the consumer with a credit report, issued at least six months after the credit repair services were provided, that demonstrates that the promised results have been achieved. n7 In 1996, the FTC, in cooperation with state attorneys general, announced a crackdown on fraudulent credit repair clinics and began filing suits to enforce the prohibition against advance payment. n8 Other FTC actions have been taken against companies that deceptively represent that they can delete accurate information from a consumer's credit record. n9

As credit repair clinics have difficulty achieving an improvement in the consumer's credit record that lasts six months, the FTC Rule comes close to outlawing credit repair organizations to the extent that they fall within its coverage. Because of the Rule's limited coverage, however, the CROA should prove to be more useful. The CROA offers strong private remedies, while the FTC Rule provides no direct private remedy. The restrictions imposed by the CROA strike at the heart of the tactics used by credit repair agencies, and the prohibition on receiving payment before services are fully performed threatens to eliminate the financial imbalance that has made the organizations profitable. Perhaps most important is that credit reporting agencies, which have both the incentive and resources to act, have standing to enforce the CROA and can be expected to use it aggressively to police, if not abolish, credit repair agencies.

The 2003 amendments to the Rule established a nationwide do-not-call list. n10 Consumers who have received telephone solicitations from credit repair organizations should consider adding their names to the do-not-call list. n11

Consumers who have received telephone solicitations from credit repair organizations should consider adding their names to the do-not-call list.

The Federal Telephone Consumer Protection Act of 1991 n12 provides certain protections against telemarketing calls. It covers both interstate and intrastate calls. n13 FCC regulations under this statute prohibit telephone solicitations before 8:00 a.m. or after 9:00 p.m., local time. n14

The statute and regulations also prohibit:

- The use of a telephone fax machine, a computer, or any other device to send an unsolicited advertisement to a telephone fax machine; n15

- Placing calls by means of an automatic dialing system or using an artificial or pre-recorded voice to emergency telephone lines, to patient or guest rooms at nursing homes, hospitals, and similar health facilities, or to pagers, cellular phones, or other services in which the called party is charged for the call; n16

- Placing a call that uses an artificial or pre-recorded voice to a residence, unless the caller is a tax-exempt nonprofit organization, the call is for emergency purposes, the caller has an established business relationship with the called party, the call is for non-commercial purposes, or the call is for commercial purposes but does not include any unsolicited advertisements. n17

The Act explicitly grants consumers the right to bring suit for violations in state court "if otherwise permitted by the laws or rules of court" of the state. n18 Several federal courts have held that federal courts do not have jurisdiction over consumer suits to enforce the statute. n19 However, one federal court has reached the opposite result, holding that federal courts do have federal question jurisdiction. n20

The consumer may seek an injunction or the greater of actual monetary loss or up to $500 for each violation. n21 The consumer need not prove actual damages in order to recover the statutory damages. n22 The court may treble the damages if it finds that the defendant willfully or knowingly violated this section. n23 Courts have differed about whether class certification is appropriate for unsolicited fax claims. n24 The federal statute does not provide for an attorney fee award, but the consumer may be able to assert a parallel claim under the state UDAP statute and win fees under that statute.

§ 202.1 Authority, scope and purpose.

(a) Authority and scope. This regulation is issued by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System pursuant to title VII (Equal Credit Opportunity Act) of the Consumer Credit Protection Act, as amended (15 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.). Except as otherwise provided herein, this regulation applies to all persons who are creditors, as defined in § 202.2(1). Information collection requirements contained in this regulation have been approved by the Office of Management and Budget under the provisions of 44 U.S.C. 3501 et seq. and have been assigned OMB No. 7100-0201.

(b) Purpose. The purpose of this regulation is to promote the availability of credit to all creditworthy applicants without regard to race, color, religion, national origin, sex, marital status, or age (provided the applicant has the capacity to contract); to the fact that all or part of the applicant's income derives from a public assistance program; or to the fact that the applicant has in good faith exercised any right under the Consumer Credit Protection Act. The regulation prohibits creditor practices that discriminate on the basis of any of these factors. The regulation also requires creditors to notify applicants of action taken on their applications; to report credit history in the names of both spouses on an account; to retain records of credit applications; to collect information about the applicant's race and other personal characteristics in applications for certain dwelling-related loans; and to provide applicants with copies of appraisal reports used in connection with credit transactions.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 202 REGULATION B--EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.2

§ 202.2 Definitions.

For the purposes of this regulation, unless the context indicates otherwise, the following definitions apply.

(a) Account means an extension of credit. When employed in relation to an account, the word use refers only to open-end credit.

(b) Act means the Equal Credit Opportunity Act (title VII of the Consumer Credit Protection Act).

(c) Adverse action.

(1) The term means:

(i) A refusal to grant credit in substantially the amount or on substantially the terms requested in an application unless the creditor makes a counteroffer (to grant credit in a different amount or on other terms) and the applicant uses or expressly accepts the credit offered;

(ii) A termination of an account or an unfavorable change in the terms of an account that does not affect all or substantially all of a class of the creditor's accounts; or

(iii) A refusal to increase the amount of credit available to an applicant who has made an application for an increase.

(2) The term does not include:

(i) A change in the terms of an account expressly agreed to by an applicant.

(ii) Any action or forbearance relating to an account taken in connection with inactivity, default, or delinquency as to that account;

(iii) A refusal or failure to authorize an account transaction at point of sale or loan, except when the refusal is a termination or an unfavorable change in the terms of an account that does not affect all or substantially all of a class of the creditor's accounts, or when the refusal is a denial of an application for an increase in the amount of credit available under the account;

(iv) A refusal to extend credit because applicable law prohibits the creditor from extending the credit requested; or

(v) A refusal to extend credit because the creditor does not offer the type of credit or credit plan requested.

(3) An action that falls within the definition of both paragraphs (c)(1) and (c)(2) of this section is governed by paragraph (c)(2) of this section.

(d) Age refers only to the age of natural persons and means the number of fully elapsed years from the date of an applicant's birth.

(e) Applicant means any person who requests or who has received an extension of credit from a creditor, and includes any person who is or may become contractually liable regarding an extension of credit. For purposes of § 202.7(d), the term includes guarantors, sureties, endorsers, and similar parties.

(f) Application means an oral or written request for an extension of credit that is made in accordance with procedures used by a creditor for the type of credit requested. The term application does not include the use of an account or line of credit to obtain an amount of credit that is within a previously established credit limit. A completed application means an application in connection with which a creditor has received all the information that the creditor regularly obtains and considers in evaluating applications for the amount and type of credit requested (including, but not limited to, credit reports, any additional information requested from the applicant, and any approvals or reports by governmental agencies or other persons that are necessary to guarantee, insure, or provide security for the credit or collateral). The creditor shall exercise reasonable diligence in obtaining such information.

(g) Business credit refers to extensions of credit primarily for business or commercial (including agricultural) purposes, but excluding extensions of credit of the types described in § 202.3(a)-(d).

(h) Consumer credit means credit extended to a natural person primarily for personal, family, or household purposes.

(i) Contractually liable means expressly obligated to repay all debts arising on an account by reason of an agreement to that effect.

(j) Credit means the right granted by a creditor to an applicant to defer payment of a debt, incur debt and defer its payment, or purchase property or services and defer payment therefor.

(k) Credit card means any card, plate, coupon book, or other single credit device that may be used from time to time to obtain money, property, or services on credit.

(l) Creditor means a person who, in the ordinary course of business, regularly participates in a credit decision, including setting the terms of the credit. The term creditor includes a creditor's assignee, transferee, or subrogee who so participates. For purposes of § 202.4(a) and (b), the term creditor also includes a person who, in the ordinary course of business, regularly refers applicants or prospective applicants to creditors, or selects or offers to select creditors to whom requests for credit may be made. A person is not a creditor regarding any violation of the Act or this regulation committed by another creditor unless the person knew or had reasonable notice of the act, policy, or practice that constituted the violation before becoming involved in the credit transaction. The term does not include a person whose only participation in a credit transaction involves honoring a credit card.

(m) Credit transaction means every aspect of an applicant's dealings with a creditor regarding an application for credit or an existing extension of credit (including, but not limited to, information requirements; investigation procedures; standards of creditworthiness; terms of credit; furnishing of credit information; revocation, alteration, or termination of credit; and collection procedures).

(n) Discriminate against an applicant means to treat an applicant less favorably than other applicants.

(o) Elderly means age 62 or older.

(p) Empirically derived and other credit scoring systems--

(1) A credit scoring system is a system that evaluates an applicant's creditworthiness mechanically, based on key attributes of the applicant and aspects of the transaction, and that determines, alone or in conjunction with an evaluation of additional information about the applicant, whether an applicant is deemed creditworthy. To qualify as an empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system, the system must be:

(i) Based on data that are derived from an empirical comparison of sample groups or the population of creditworthy and noncreditworthy applicants who applied for credit within a reasonable preceding period of time;

(ii) Developed for the purpose of evaluating the creditworthiness of applicants with respect to the legitimate business interests of the creditor utilizing the system (including, but not limited to, minimizing bad debt losses and operating expenses in accordance with the creditor's business judgment);

(iii) Developed and validated using accepted statistical principles and methodology; and

(iv) Periodically revalidated by the use of appropriate statistical principles and methodology and adjusted as necessary to maintain predictive ability.

(2) A creditor may use an empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system obtained from another person or may obtain credit experience from which to develop such a system. Any such system must satisfy the criteria set forth in paragraph (p)(1)(i) through (iv) of this section; if the creditor is unable during the development process to validate the system based on its own credit experience in accordance with paragraph (p)(1) of this section, the system must be validated when sufficient credit experience becomes available. A system that fails this validity test is no longer an empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system for that creditor.

(q) Extend credit and extension of credit mean the granting of credit in any form (including, but not limited to, credit granted in addition to any existing credit or credit limit; credit granted pursuant to an open-end credit plan; the refinancing or other renewal of credit, including the issuance of a new credit card in place of an expiring credit card or in substitution for an existing credit card; the consolidation of two or more obligations; or the continuance of existing credit without any special effort to collect at or after maturity).

(r) Good faith means honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction.

(s) Inadvertent error means a mechanical, electronic, or clerical error that a creditor demonstrates was not intentional and occurred notwithstanding the maintenance of procedures reasonably adapted to avoid such errors.

(t) Judgmental system of evaluating applicants means any system for evaluating the creditworthiness of an applicant other than an empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system.

(u) Marital status means the state of being unmarried, married, or separated, as defined by applicable state law. The term "unmarried" includes persons who are single, divorced, or widowed.

(v) Negative factor or value, in relation to the age of elderly applicants, means utilizing a factor, value, or weight that is less favorable regarding elderly applicants than the creditor's experience warrants or is less favorable than the factor, value, or weight assigned to the class of applicants that are not classified as elderly and are most favored by a creditor on the basis of age.

(w) Open-end credit means credit extended under a plan in which a creditor may permit an applicant to make purchases or obtain loans from time to time directly from the creditor or indirectly by use of a credit card, check, or other device.

(x) Person means a natural person, corporation, government or governmental subdivision or agency, trust, estate, partnership, cooperative, or association.

(y) Pertinent element of creditworthiness, in relation to a judgmental system of evaluating applicants, means any information about applicants that a creditor obtains and considers and that has a demonstrable relationship to a determination of creditworthiness.

(z) Prohibited basis means race, color, religion, national origin, sex, marital status, or age (provided that the applicant has the capacity to enter into a binding contract); the fact that all or part of the applicant's income derives from any public assistance program; or the fact that the applicant has in good faith exercised any right under the Consumer Credit

Protection Act or any state law upon which an exemption has been granted by the Board.

(aa) State means any state, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, or any territory or possession of the United States.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.5

§ 202.5 Rules concerning requests for information.

(a) General rules --

(1) Requests for information. Except as provided in paragraphs (b) through (d) of this section, a creditor may request any information in connection with a credit transaction. n1

(2) Required collection of information. Notwithstanding paragraphs (b) through (d) of this section, a creditor shall request information for monitoring purposes as required by § 202.13 for credit secured by the applicant's dwelling. In addition, a creditor may obtain information required by a regulation, order, or agreement issued by, or entered into with, a court or an enforcement agency (including the Attorney General of the United States or a similar state official) to monitor or enforce compliance with the Act, this regulation, or other federal or state statutes or regulations.

(3) Special-purpose credit. A creditor may obtain information that is otherwise restricted to determine eligibility for a special purpose credit program, as provided in § 202.8(b), (c), and (d).

(b) Limitation on information about race, color, religion, national origin, or sex. A creditor shall not inquire about the race, color, religion, national origin, or sex of an applicant or any other person in connection with a credit transaction, except as provided in paragraphs (b)(1) and (b)(2) of this section.

(1) Self-test. A creditor may inquire about the race, color, religion, national origin, or sex of an applicant or any other person in connection with a credit transaction for the purpose of conducting a self-test that meets the requirements of § 202.15. A creditor that makes such an inquiry shall disclose orally or in writing, at the time the information is requested, that:

(i) The applicant will not be required to provide the information;

(ii) The creditor is requesting the information to monitor its compliance with the federal Equal Credit Opportunity Act;

(iii) Federal law prohibits the creditor from discriminating on the basis of this information, or on the basis of an applicant's decision not to furnish the information; and

(iv) If applicable, certain information will be collected based on visual observation or surname if not provided by the applicant or other person.

(2) Sex. An applicant may be requested to designate a title on an application form (such as Ms., Miss, Mr., or Mrs.) if the form discloses that the designation of a title is optional. An application form shall otherwise use only terms that are neutral as to sex.

(c) Information about a spouse or former spouse --

(1) General rule. Except as permitted in this paragraph, a creditor may not request any information concerning the spouse or former spouse of an applicant.

(2) Permissible inquiries. A creditor may request any information concerning an applicant's spouse (or former spouse under paragraph (c)(2)(v) of this section) that may be requested about the applicant if:

(3) Other accounts of the applicant. A creditor may request that an applicant list any account on which the applicant is contractually liable and to provide the name and address of the person in whose name the account is held. A creditor may also ask an applicant to list the names in which the applicant has previously received credit.

A creditor may explain that the category unmarried includes single, divorced, and widowed persons.

(2) Disclosure about income from alimony, child support, or separate maintenance. A creditor shall not inquire whether income stated in an application is derived from alimony, child support, or separate maintenance payments unless the creditor discloses to the applicant that such income need not be revealed if the applicant does not want the creditor to consider it in determining the applicant's creditworthiness.

(3) Childbearing, childrearing. A creditor shall not inquire about birth control practices, intentions concerning the bearing or rearing of children, or capability to bear children. A creditor may inquire about the number and ages of an applicant's dependents or about dependent-related financial obligations or expenditures, provided such information is requested without regard to sex, marital status, or any other prohibited basis.

§ 202.6 Rules concerning evaluation of applications.

(a) General rule concerning use of information. Except as otherwise provided in the Act and this regulation, a creditor may consider any information obtained, so long as the information is not used to discriminate against an applicant on a prohibited basis. n2

(b) Specific rules concerning use of information. --

(1) Except as provided in the Act and this regulation, a creditor shall not take a prohibited basis into account in any system of evaluating the creditworthiness of applicants.

(2) Age, receipt of public assistance.

(i) Except as permitted in this paragraph, a creditor shall not take into account an applicant's age (provided that the applicant has the capacity to enter into a binding contract) or whether an applicant's income derives from any public assistance program.

(ii) In an empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system, a creditor may use an applicant's age as a predictive variable, provided that the age of an elderly applicant is not assigned a negative factor or value.

(iii) In a judgmental system of evaluating creditworthiness, a creditor may consider an applicant's age or whether an applicant's income derives from any public assistance program only for the purpose of determining a pertinent element of creditworthiness.

(iv) In any system of evaluating creditworthiness, a creditor may consider the age of an elderly applicant when such age is used to favor the elderly applicant in extending credit.

(3) Childbearing, childrearing. In evaluating creditworthiness, a creditor shall not make assumptions or use aggregate statistics relating to the likelihood that any category of persons will bear or rear children or will, for that reason, receive diminished or interrupted income in the future.

(4) Telephone listing. A creditor shall not take into account whether there is a telephone listing in the name of an applicant for consumer credit but may take into account whether there is a telephone in the applicant's residence.

(5) Income. A creditor shall not discount or exclude from consideration the income of an applicant or the spouse of an applicant because of a prohibited basis or because the income is derived from part-time employment or is an annuity, pension, or other retirement benefit; a creditor may consider the amount and probable continuance of any income in evaluating an applicant's creditworthiness. When an applicant relies on alimony, child support, or separate maintenance payments in applying for credit, the creditor shall consider such payments as income to the extent that they are likely to be consistently made.

(6) Credit history. To the extent that a creditor considers credit history in evaluating the creditworthiness of similarly qualified applicants for a similar type and amount of credit, in evaluating an applicant's creditworthiness a creditor shall consider:

(i) The credit history, when available, of accounts designated as accounts that the applicant and the applicant's spouse are permitted to use or for which both are contractually liable;

(ii) On the applicant's request, any information the applicant may present that tends to indicate the credit history being considered by the creditor does not accurately reflect the applicant's creditworthiness; and

(iii) On the applicant's request, the credit history, when available, of any account reported in the name of the applicant's spouse or former spouse that the applicant can demonstrate accurately reflects the applicant's creditworthiness.

(7) Immigration status. A creditor may consider the applicant's immigration status or status as a permanent resident of the United States, and any additional information that may be necessary to ascertain the creditor's rights and remedies regarding repayment.

(8) Marital status. Except as otherwise permitted or required by law, a creditor shall evaluate married and unmarried applicants by the same standards; and in evaluating joint applicants, a creditor shall not treat applicants differently based on the existence, absence, or likelihood of a marital relationship between the parties.

(9) Race, color, religion, national origin, sex. Except as otherwise permitted or required by law, a creditor shall not consider race, color, religion, national origin, or sex (or an applicant's or other person's decision not to provide the information) in any aspect of a credit transaction.

(c) State property laws. A creditor's consideration or application of state property laws directly or indirectly affecting creditworthiness does not constitute unlawful discrimination for the purposes of the Act or this regulation.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.7

§ 202.7 Rules concerning extensions of credit.

(a) Individual accounts.A creditor shall not refuse to grant an individual account to a creditworthy applicant on the basis of sex, marital status, or any other prohibited basis.

(b) Designation of name. A creditor shall not refuse to allow an applicant to open or maintain an account in a birth-given first name and a surname that is the applicant's birth-given surname, the spouse's surname, or a combined surname.

(c) Action concerning existing open-end accounts --

(1) Limitations. In the absence of evidence of the applicant's inability or unwillingness to repay, a creditor shall not take any of the following actions regarding an applicant who is contractually liable on an existing open-end account on the basis of the applicant's reaching a certain age or retiring or on the basis of a change in the applicant's name or marital status:

(i) Require a reapplication, except as provided in paragraph (c)(2) of this section;

(ii) Change the terms of the account; or

(iii) Terminate the account.

(2) Requiring reapplication. A creditor may require a reapplication for an open-end account on the basis of a change in the marital status of an applicant who is contractually liable if the credit granted was based in whole or in part on income of the applicant's spouse and if information available to the creditor indicates that the applicant's income may not support the amount of credit currently available.

(d) Signature of spouse or other person --

(1) Rule for qualified applicant. Except as provided in this paragraph, a creditor shall not require the signature of an applicant's spouse or other person, other than a joint applicant, on any credit instrument if the applicant qualifies under the creditor's standards of creditworthiness for the amount and terms of the credit requested. A creditor shall not deem the submission of a joint financial statement or other evidence of jointly held assets as an application for joint credit.

(2) Unsecured credit. If an applicant requests unsecured credit and relies in part upon property that the applicant owns jointly with another person to satisfy the creditor's standards of creditworthiness, the creditor may require the signature of the other person only on the instrument(s) necessary, or reasonably believed by the creditor to be necessary, under the law of the state in which the property is located, to enable the creditor to reach the property being relied upon in the event of the death or default of the applicant.

(3) Unsecured credit -- community property states. If a married applicant requests unsecured credit and resides in a community property state, or if the applicant is relying on property located in such a state, a creditor may require the signature of the spouse on any instrument necessary, or reasonably believed by the creditor to be necessary, under applicable state law to make the community property available to satisfy the debt in the event of default if:

(i) Applicable state law denies the applicant power to manage or control sufficient community property to qualify for the credit requested under the creditor's standards of creditworthiness; and

(ii) The applicant does not have sufficient separate property to qualify for the credit requested without regard to community property.

(4) Secured credit. If an applicant requests secured credit, a creditor may require the signature of the applicant's spouse or other person on any instrument necessary, or reasonably believed by the creditor to be necessary, under applicable state law to make the property being offered as security available to satisfy the debt in the event of default, for example, an instrument to create a valid lien, pass clear title, waive inchoate rights, or assign earnings.

(5) Additional parties. If, under a creditor's standards of creditworthiness, the personal liability of an additional party is necessary to support the credit requested, a creditor may request a cosigner, guarantor, endorser, or similar party. The applicant's spouse may serve as an additional party, but the creditor shall not require that the spouse be the additional party.

(6) Rights of additional parties. A creditor shall not impose requirements upon an additional party that the creditor is prohibited from imposing upon an applicant under this section.

(e) Insurance. A creditor shall not refuse to extend credit and shall not terminate an account because credit life, health, accident, disability, or other credit-related insurance is not available on the basis of the applicant's age.

CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 202 REGULATION B--EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.8

§ 202.8 Special purpose credit programs.

(a) Standards for programs. Subject to the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section, the Act and this regulation permit a creditor to extend special purpose credit to applicants who meet eligibility requirements under the following types of credit programs:

(1) Any credit assistance program expressly authorized by federal or state law for the benefit of an economically disadvantaged class of persons;

(2) Any credit assistance program offered by a not-for-profit organization, as defined under section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended, for the benefit of its members or for the benefit of an economically disadvantaged class of persons; or

(3) Any special purpose credit program offered by a for-profit organization, or in which such an organization participates to meet special social needs, if:

(i) The program is established and administered pursuant to a written plan that identifies the class of persons that the program is designed to benefit and sets forth the procedures and standards for extending credit pursuant to the program; and

(ii) The program is established and administered to extend credit to a class of persons who, under the organization's customary standards of creditworthiness, probably would not receive such credit or would receive it on less favorable terms than are ordinarily available to other applicants applying to the organization for a similar type and amount of credit.

(b) Rules in other sections --

(1) General applicability. All the provisions of this regulation apply to each of the special purpose credit programs described in paragraph (a) of this section except as modified by this section.

(2) Common characteristics. A program described in paragraph (a)(2) or (a)(3) of this section qualifies as a special purpose credit program only if it was established and is administered so as not to discriminate against an applicant on any prohibited basis; however, all program participants may be required to share one or more common characteristics (for example, race, national origin, or sex) so long as the program was not established and is not administered with the purpose of evading the requirements of the Act or this regulation.

(c) Special rule concerning requests and use of information. If participants in a special purpose credit program described in paragraph (a) of this section are required to possess one or more common characteristics (for example, race, national origin, or sex) and if the program otherwise satisfies the requirements of paragraph (a) of this section, a creditor may request and consider information regarding the common characteristic(s) in determining the applicant's eligibility for the program.

(d) Special rule in the case of financial need. If financial need is one of the criteria under a special purpose credit program described in paragraph (a) of this section, the creditor may request and consider, in determining an applicant's eligibility for the program, information regarding the applicant's marital status; alimony, child support, and separate maintenance income; and the spouse's financial resources. In addition, a creditor may obtain the signature of an applicant's spouse or other person on an application or credit instrument relating to a special purpose credit program if the signature is required by federal or state law.

§ 202.9 Notifications.

(a) Notification of action taken, ECOA notice, and statement of specific reasons --

(1) When notification is required. A creditor shall notify an applicant of action taken within:

(i) 30 days after receiving a completed application concerning the creditor's approval of, counteroffer to, or adverse action on the application;

(ii) 30 days after taking adverse action on an incomplete application, unless notice is provided in accordance with paragraph (c) of this section;

(iii) 30 days after taking adverse action on an existing account; or

(iv) 90 days after notifying the applicant of a counteroffer if the applicant does not expressly accept or use the credit offered.

(2) Content of notification when adverse action is taken. A notification given to an applicant when adverse action is taken shall be in writing and shall contain a statement of the action taken; the name and address of the creditor; a statement of the provisions of § 701(a) of the Act; the name and address of the federal agency that administers compliance with respect to the creditor; and either:

(i) A statement of specific reasons for the action taken; or

(ii) A disclosure of the applicant's right to a statement of specific reasons within 30 days, if the statement is requested within 60 days of the creditor's notification. The disclosure shall include the name, address, and telephone number of the person or office from which the statement of reasons can be obtained. If the creditor chooses to provide the reasons orally, the creditor shall also disclose the applicant's right to have them confirmed in writing within 30 days of receiving the applicant's written request for confirmation.

(3) Notification to business credit applicants. For business credit, a creditor shall comply with the requirements of this section in the following manner:

(i) With regard to a business that had gross revenues of $1 million or less in its preceding fiscal year (other than an extension of trade credit, credit incident to a factoring agreement, or other similar types of business credit), a creditor shall comply with paragraphs (a)(1) and (2) of this section, except that:

(A) The statement of the action taken may be given orally or in writing, when adverse action is taken;

(B) Disclosure of an applicant's right to a statement of reasons may be given at the time of application, instead of when adverse action is taken, provided the disclosure contains the information required by paragraph (a)(2)(ii) of this section and the ECOA notice specified in paragraph (b)(1) of this section;

(C) For an application made entirely by telephone, a creditor satisfies the requirements of paragraph (a)(3)(i) of this section by an oral statement of the action taken and of the applicant's right to a statement of reasons for adverse action.

(ii) With regard to a business that had gross revenues in excess of $1 million in its preceding fiscal year or an extension of trade credit, credit incident to a factoring agreement, or other similar types of business credit, a creditor shall:

(A) Notify the applicant, within a reasonable time, orally or in writing, of the action taken; and

(B) Provide a written statement of the reasons for adverse action and the ECOA notice specified in paragraph (b)(1) of this section if the applicant makes a written request for the reasons within 60 days of the creditor's notification.

(b) Form of ECOA notice and statement of specific reasons. --

(1) ECOA notice. To satisfy the disclosure requirements of paragraph (a)(2) of this section regarding section 701(a) of the Act, the creditor shall provide a notice that is substantially similar to the following: The federal Equal Credit Opportunity Act prohibits creditors from discriminating against credit applicants on the basis of race, color, religion, national origin, sex, marital status, age (provided the applicant has the capacity to enter into a binding contract); because all or part of the applicant's income derives from any public assistance program; or because the applicant has in good faith exercised any right under the Consumer Credit Protection Act. The federal agency that administers compliance with this law concerning this creditor is [name and address as specified by the appropriate agency listed in appendix A of this regulation].

(2) Statement of specific reasons. The statement of reasons for adverse action required by paragraph (a)(2)(i) of this section must be specific and indicate the principal reason(s) for the adverse action. Statements that the adverse action was based on the creditor's internal standards or policies or that the applicant, joint applicant, or similar party failed to achieve a qualifying score on the creditor's credit scoring system are insufficient.

(c) Incomplete applications --

(1) Notice alternatives. Within 30 days after receiving an application that is incomplete regarding matters that an applicant can complete, the creditor shall notify the applicant either:

(i) Of action taken, in accordance with paragraph (a) of this section; or

(ii) Of the incompleteness, in accordance with paragraph (c)(2) of this section.

(2) Notice of incompleteness. If additional information is needed from an applicant, the creditor shall send a written notice to the applicant specifying the information needed, designating a reasonable period of time for the applicant to provide the information, and informing the applicant that failure to provide the information requested will result in no further consideration being given to the application. The creditor shall have no further obligation under this section if the applicant fails to respond within the designated time period. If the applicant supplies the requested information within the designated time period, the creditor shall take action on the application and notify the applicant in accordance with paragraph (a) of this section.

(3) Oral request for information. At its option, a creditor may inform the applicant orally of the need for additional information. If the application remains incomplete the creditor shall send a notice in accordance with paragraph (c)(1) of this section.

(d) Oral notifications by small-volume creditors. In the case of a creditor that did not receive more than 150 applications during the preceding calendar year, the requirements of this section (including statements of specific reasons) are satisfied by oral notifications.

(e) Withdrawal of approved application. When an applicant submits an application and the parties contemplate that the applicant will inquire about its status, if the creditor approves the application and the applicant has not inquired within 30 days after applying, the creditor may treat the application as withdrawn and need not comply with paragraph (a)(1) of this section.

(f) Multiple applicants. When an application involves more than one applicant, notification need only be given to one of them but must be given to the primary applicant where one is readily apparent.

(g) Applications submitted through a third party. When an application is made on behalf of an applicant to more than one creditor and the applicant expressly accepts or uses credit offered by one of the creditors, notification of action taken by any of the other creditors is not required. If no credit is offered or if the applicant does not expressly accept or use the credit offered, each creditor taking adverse action must comply with this section, directly or through a third party. A notice given by a third party shall disclose the identity of each creditor on whose behalf the notice is given.

12 C.F.R. Part 202 REGULATION B--EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.11

§ 202.11 Relation to state law.

(a) Inconsistent state laws. Except as otherwise provided in this section, this regulation alters, affects, or preempts only those state laws that are inconsistent with the Act and this regulation and then only to the extent of the inconsistency. A state law is not inconsistent if it is more protective of an applicant.

(b) Preempted provisions of state law. --

(1) A state law is deemed to be inconsistent with the requirements of the Act and this regulation and less protective of an applicant within the meaning of section 705(f) of the Act to the extent that the law:

(i) Requires or permits a practice or act prohibited by the Act or this regulation;

(ii) Prohibits the individual extension of consumer credit to both parties to a marriage if each spouse individually and voluntarily applies for such credit;

(iii) Prohibits inquiries or collection of data required to comply with the Act or this regulation;

(iv) Prohibits asking about or considering age in an empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system to determine a pertinent element of creditworthiness, or to favor an elderly applicant; or

(v) Prohibits inquiries necessary to establish or administer a special purpose credit program as defined by § 202.8.

(2) A creditor, state, or other interested party may request that the Board determine whether a state law is inconsistent with the requirements of the Act and this regulation.

(c) Laws on finance charges, loan ceilings. If married applicants voluntarily apply for and obtain individual accounts with the same creditor, the accounts shall not be aggregated or otherwise combined for purposes of determining permissible finance charges or loan ceilings under any federal or state law. Permissible loan ceiling laws shall be construed to permit each spouse to become individually liable up to the amount of the loan ceilings, less the amount for which the applicant is jointly liable.

(d) State and federal laws not affected. This section does not alter or annul any provision of state property laws, laws relating to the disposition of decedents' estates, or federal or state banking regulations directed only toward insuring the solvency of financial institutions.

(e) Exemption for state-regulated transactions. --

(1) Applications. A state may apply to the Board for an exemption from the requirements of the Act and this regulation for any class of credit transactions within the state. The Board will grant such an exemption if the Board determines that:

(i) The class of credit transactions is subject to state law requirements substantially similar to those of the Act and this regulation or that applicants are afforded greater protection under state law; and

(ii) There is adequate provision for state enforcement.

(2) Liability and enforcement.

(i) No exemption will extend to the civil liability provisions of section 706 of the Act or the administrative enforcement provisions of section 704 of the Act.

(ii) After an exemption has been granted, the requirements of the applicable state law (except for additional requirements not imposed by federal law) will constitute the requirements of the Act and this regulation.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.12

§ 202.12 Record retention.

(a) Retention of prohibited information. A creditor may retain in its files information that is prohibited by the Act or this regulation for use in evaluating applications, without violating the Act or this regulation, if the information was obtained:

(1) From any source prior to March 23, 1977;

(2) From consumer reporting agencies, an applicant, or others without the specific request of the creditor; or

(3) As required to monitor compliance with the Act and this regulation or other federal or state statutes or regulations.

(b) Preservation of records --

(1) Applications. For 25 months (12 months for business credit, except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section) after the date that a creditor notifies an applicant of action taken on an application or of incompleteness, the creditor shall retain in original form or a copy thereof:

(i) Any application that it receives, any information required to be obtained concerning characteristics of the applicant to monitor compliance with the Act and this regulation or other similar law, and any other written or recorded information used in evaluating the application and not returned to the applicant at the applicant's request;

(ii) A copy of the following documents if furnished to the applicant in written form (or, if furnished orally, any notation or memorandum made by the creditor):

(A) The notification of action taken; and

(B) The statement of specific reasons for adverse action; and

(iii) Any written statement submitted by the applicant alleging a violation of the Act or this regulation.

(2) Existing accounts. For 25 months (12 months for business credit, except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section) after the date that a creditor notifies an applicant of adverse action regarding an existing account, the creditor shall retain as to that account, in original form or a copy thereof:

(i) Any written or recorded information concerning the adverse action; and

(ii) Any written statement submitted by the applicant alleging a violation of the Act or this regulation.

(3) Other applications. For 25 months (12 months for business credit, except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section) after the date that a creditor receives an application for which the creditor is not required to comply with the notification requirements of § 202.9, the creditor shall retain all written or recorded information in its possession concerning the applicant, including any notation of action taken.

(4) Enforcement proceedings and investigations. A creditor shall retain the information beyond 25 months (12 months for business credit, except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section) if the creditor has actual notice that it is under investigation or is subject to an enforcement proceeding for an alleged violation of the Act or this regulation, by the Attorney General of the United States or by an enforcement agency charged with monitoring that creditor's compliance with the Act and this regulation, or if it has been served with notice of an action filed pursuant to section 706 of the Act and § 202.17 of this regulation. The creditor shall retain the information until final disposition of the matter, unless an earlier time is allowed by order of the agency or court.

(5) Special rule for certain business credit applications. With regard to a business that had gross revenues in excess of $1 million in its preceding fiscal year, or an extension of trade credit, credit incident to a factoring agreement, or other similar types of business credit, the creditor shall retain records for at least 60 days after notifying the applicant of the action taken. If within that time period the applicant requests in writing the reasons for adverse action or that records be retained, the creditor shall retain records for 12 months.

(6) Self-tests. For 25 months after a self-test (as defined in § 202.15) has been completed, the creditor shall retain all written or recorded information about the self-test. A creditor shall retain information beyond 25 months if it has actual notice that it is under investigation or is subject to an enforcement proceeding for an alleged violation, or if it has been served with notice of a civil action. In such cases, the creditor shall retain the information until final disposition of the matter, unless an earlier time is allowed by the appropriate agency or court order.

(7) Prescreened solicitations. For 25 months after the date on which an offer of credit is made to potential customers (12 months for business credit, except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section), the creditor shall retain in original form or a copy thereof:

(i) The text of any prescreened solicitation;

(ii) The list of criteria the creditor used to select potential recipients of the solicitation; and

(iii) Any correspondence related to complaints (formal or informal) about the solicitation.

§ 202.13 Information for monitoring purposes.

(a) Information to be requested. --

(1) A creditor that receives an application for credit primarily for the purchase or refinancing of a dwelling occupied or to be occupied by the applicant as a principal residence, where the extension of credit will be secured by the dwelling, shall request as part of the application the following information regarding the applicant(s):

(i) Ethnicity, using the categories Hispanic or Latino, and not Hispanic or Latino; and race, using the categories American Indian or Alaska Native, Asian, Black or African American, Native Hawaiian or Other Pacific Islander, and White;

(ii) Sex;

(iii) Marital status, using the categories married, unmarried, and separated; and

(b) Obtaining information. Questions regarding ethnicity, race, sex, marital status, and age may be listed, at the creditor's option, on the application form or on a separate form that refers to the application. The applicant(s) shall be asked but not required to supply the requested information. If the applicant(s) chooses not to provide the information or any part of it, that fact shall be noted on the form. The creditor shall then also note on the form, to the extent possible, the ethnicity, race, and sex of the applicant(s) on the basis of visual observation or surname.

(c) Disclosure to applicant(s). The creditor shall inform the applicant(s) that the information regarding ethnicity, race, sex, marital status, and age is being requested by the federal government for the purpose of monitoring compliance with federal statutes that prohibit creditors from discriminating against applicants on those bases. The creditor shall also inform the applicant(s) that if the applicant(s) chooses not to provide the information, the creditor is required to note the ethnicity, race and sex on the basis of visual observation or surname.

(1) Routine delivery. A creditor may routinely provide a copy of an appraisal report to an applicant (whether credit is granted or denied or the application is withdrawn).

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.15

§ 202.15 Incentives for self-testing and self-correction.

(a) General rules --

(1) Voluntary self-testing and correction. Voluntary self-testing and correction. The report or results of a self-test that a creditor voluntarily conducts (or authorizes) are privileged as provided in this section. Data collection required by law or by any governmental authority is not a voluntary self-test.

(2) Corrective action required. The privilege in this section applies only if the creditor has taken or is taking appropriate corrective action.

(3) Other privileges. The privilege created by this section does not preclude the assertion of any other privilege that may also apply.

(b) Self-test defined --

(1) Definition. A self-test is any program, practice, or study that:

(i) Is designed and used specifically to determine the extent or effectiveness of a creditor's compliance with the Act or this regulation; and

(ii) Creates data or factual information that is not available and cannot be derived from loan or application files or other records related to credit transactions.

(2) Types of information privileged. The privilege under this section applies to the report or results of the self-test, data or factual information created by the self-test, and any analysis, opinions, and conclusions pertaining to the self-test report or results. The privilege covers workpapers or draft documents as well as final documents.

(3) Types of information not privileged. The privilege under this section does not apply to:

(i) Information about whether a creditor conducted a self-test, the methodology used or the scope of the self-test, the time period covered by the self-test, or the dates it was conducted; or

(ii) Loan and application files or other business records related to credit transactions, and information derived from such files and records, even if the information has been aggregated, summarized, or reorganized to facilitate analysis.

(c) Appropriate corrective action --

(1) General requirement. For the privilege in this section to apply, appropriate corrective action is required when the self-test shows that it is more likely than not that a violation occurred, even though no violation has been formally adjudicated.

(2) Determining the scope of appropriate corrective action. A creditor must take corrective action that is reasonably likely to remedy the cause and effect of a likely violation by:

(i) Identifying the policies or practices that are the likely cause of the violation; and

(ii) Assessing the extent and scope of any violation.

(3) Types of relief. Appropriate corrective action may include both prospective and remedial relief, except that to establish a privilege under this section:

(i) A creditor is not required to provide remedial relief to a tester used in a self-test;

(ii) A creditor is only required to provide remedial relief to an applicant identified by the self-test as one whose rights were more likely than not violated; and

(iii) A creditor is not required to provide remedial relief to a particular applicant if the statute of limitations applicable to the violation expired before the creditor obtained the results of the self-test or the applicant is otherwise ineligible for such relief.

(4) No admission of violation. Taking corrective action is not an admission that a violation occurred.

(d) Scope of privilege --

(1) General rule. The report or results of a privileged self-test may not be obtained or used:

(i) By a government agency in any examination or investigation relating to compliance with the Act or this regulation; or

(ii) By a government agency or an applicant (including a prospective applicant who alleges a violation of § 202.4(b)) in any proceeding or civil action in which a violation of the Act or this regulation is alleged.

(2) Loss of privilege. The report or results of a self-test are not privileged under paragraph (d)(1) of this section if the creditor or a person with lawful access to the report or results:

(i) Voluntarily discloses any part of the report or results, or any other information privileged under this section, to an applicant or government agency or to the public;

(ii) Discloses any part of the report or results, or any other information privileged under this section, as a defense to charges that the creditor has violated the Act or regulation; or

(iii) Fails or is unable to produce written or recorded information about the self-test that is required to be retained under § 202.12(b)(6) when the information is needed to determine whether the privilege applies. This paragraph does not limit any other penalty or remedy that may be available for a violation of § 202.12.

(3) Limited use of privileged information. Notwithstanding paragraph (d)(1) of this section, the self-test report or results and any other information privileged under this section may be obtained and used by an applicant or government agency solely to determine a penalty or remedy after a violation of the Act or this regulation has been adjudicated or admitted. Disclosures for this limited purpose may be used only for the particular proceeding in which the adjudication or admission was made. Information disclosed under this paragraph (d)(3) remains privileged under paragraph (d)(1) of this section.

12 C.F.R. Part 202 REGULATION B--EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.16

§ 202.16 Enforcement, penalties and liabilities.

(a) Administrative enforcement --

(1) As set forth more fully in section 704 of the Act, administrative enforcement of the Act and this regulation regarding certain creditors is assigned to the Comptroller of the Currency, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, Board of Directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Office of Thrift Supervision, National Credit Union Administration, Surface Transportation Board, Secretary of Agriculture, Farm Credit Administration, Securities and Exchange Commission, Small Business Administration, and Secretary of Transportation.

(2) Except to the extent that administrative enforcement is specifically assigned to other authorities, compliance with the requirements imposed under the Act and this regulation is enforced by the Federal Trade Commission.

(b) Penalties and liabilities --

(1) Sections 702(g) and 706(a) and (b) of the Act provide that any creditor that fails to comply with a requirement imposed by the Act or this regulation is subject to civil liability for actual and punitive damages in individual or class actions. Pursuant to sections 702(g) and 704(b), (c), and (d) of the Act, violations of the Act or this regulation also constitute violations of other federal laws. Liability for punitive damages can apply only to nongovernmental entities and is limited to $10,000 in individual actions and the lesser of $500,000 or 1 percent of the creditor's net worth in class actions. Section 706(c) provides for equitable and declaratory relief and section 706(d) authorizes the awarding of costs and reasonable attorney's fees to an aggrieved applicant in a successful action.

(2) As provided in section 706(f), a civil action under the Act or this regulation may be brought in the appropriate United States district court without regard to the amount in controversy or in any other court of competent jurisdiction within two years after the date of the occurrence of the violation, or within one year after the commencement of an administrative enforcement proceeding or of a civil action brought by the Attorney General of the United States within two years after the alleged violation.

(3) If an agency responsible for administrative enforcement is unable to obtain compliance with the Act or this regulation, it may refer the matter to the Attorney General of the United States. If the Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Office of Thrift Supervision, or the National Credit Union Administration has reason to believe that one or more creditors have engaged in a pattern or practice of discouraging or denying applications in violation of the Act or this regulation, the agency shall refer the matter to the Attorney General. If the agency has reason to believe that one or more creditors violated section 701(a) of the Act, the agency may refer a matter to the Attorney General.

(4) On referral, or whenever the Attorney General has reason to believe that one or more creditors have engaged in a pattern or practice in violation of the Act or this regulation, the Attorney General may bring a civil action for such relief as may be appropriate, including actual and punitive damages and injunctive relief.

(5) If the Board, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Office of Thrift Supervision, or the National Credit Union Administration has reason to believe (as a result of a consumer complaint, a consumer compliance examination, or some other basis) that a violation of the Act or this regulation has occurred which is also a violation of the Fair Housing Act, and the matter is not referred to the Attorney General, the agency shall:

(i) Notify the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development; and

(ii) Inform the applicant that the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development has been notified and that remedies may be available under the Fair Housing Act.

(c) Failure of compliance. A creditor's failure to comply with §§ 202.6(b)(6), 202.9, 202.10, 202.12 or 202.13 is not a violation if it results from an inadvertent error. On discovering an error under §§ 202.9 and 202.10, the creditor shall correct it as soon as possible. If a creditor inadvertently obtains the monitoring information regarding the ethnicity, race, and sex of the applicant in a dwelling-related transaction not covered by § 202.13, the creditor may retain information and act on the application without violating the regulation.

Appendix B to Part 202 Model Application Forms

1. This appendix contains five model credit application forms, each designated for use in a particular type of consumer credit transaction as indicated by the bracketed caption on each form. The first sample form is intended for use in open-end, unsecured transactions; the second for closed-end, secured transactions; the third for closed-end transactions, whether unsecured or secured; the fourth in transactions involving community property or occurring in community property states; and the fifth in residential mortgage transactions which contains a model disclosure for use in complying with § 202.13 for certain dwelling-related loans. All forms contained in this appendix are models; their use by creditors is optional.

2. The use or modification of these forms is governed by the following instructions. A creditor may change the forms: by asking for additional information not prohibited by § 202.5; by deleting any information request; or by rearranging the format without modifying the substance of the inquiries. In any of these three instances, however, the appropriate notices regarding the optional nature of courtesy titles, the option to disclose alimony, child support, or separate maintenance, and the limitation concerning marital status inquiries must be included in the appropriate places if the items to which they relate appear on the creditor's form.

3. If a creditor uses an appropriate Appendix B model form, or modifies a form in accordance with the above instructions, that creditor shall be deemed to be acting in compliance with the provisions of paragraphs (b), (c) and (d) of § 202.5 of this regulation.

12 C.F.R. Part 202 REGULATION B--EQUAL CREDIT OPPORTUNITY
Appendix C to Part 202 Sample Notification Forms

1B Consumer Credit Law Manual Appendix C to Part 202

Appendix C to Part 202 Sample Notification Forms

1. This appendix contains ten sample notification forms. Forms C-1 through C-4 are intended for use in notifying an applicant that adverse action has been taken on an application or account under §§ 202.9(a)(1) and (2)(i) of this regulation. Form C-5 is a notice of disclosure of the right to request specific reasons for adverse action under §§ 202.9(a)(1) and (2)(ii). Form C-6 is designed for use in notifying an applicant, under § 202.9(c)(2), that an application is incomplete. Forms C-7 and C-8 are intended for use in connection with applications for business credit under § 202.9(a)(3). Form C-9 is designed for use in notifying an applicant of the right to receive a copy of an appraisal under § 202.14. Form C-10 is designed for use in notifying an applicant for nonmortgage credit that the creditor is requesting applicant characteristic information.

2. Form C-1 contains the Fair Credit Reporting Act disclosure as required by sections 615(a) and (b) of that act. Forms C-2 through C-5 contain only the section 615(a) disclosure (that a creditor obtained information from a consumer reporting agency that played a part in the credit decision). A creditor must provide the section 615(a) disclosure when adverse action is taken against a consumer based on information from a consumer reporting agency. A creditor must provide the section 615(b) disclosure when adverse action is taken based on information from an outside source other than a consumer reporting agency. In addition, a creditor must provide the section 615(b) disclosure if the creditor obtained information from an affiliate other than information in a consumer report or other than information concerning the affiliate's own transactions or experiences with the consumer. Creditors may comply with the disclosure requirements for adverse action based on information in a consumer report obtained from an affiliate by providing either the section 615(a) or section 615(b) disclosure.

3. The sample forms are illustrative and may not be appropriate for all creditors. They were designed to include some of the factors that creditors most commonly consider. If a creditor chooses to use the checklist of reasons provided in one of the sample forms in this appendix and if reasons commonly used by the creditor are not provided on the form, the creditor should modify the checklist by substituting or adding other reasons. For example, if "inadequate down payment" or "no deposit relationship with us" are common reasons for taking adverse action on an application, the creditor ought to add or substitute such reasons for those presently contained on the sample forms.

4. If the reasons listed on the forms are not the factors actually used, a creditor will not satisfy the notice requirement by simply checking the closest identifiable factor listed. For example, some creditors consider only references from banks or other depository institutions and disregard finance company references altogether; their statement of reasons should disclose "insufficient bank references," not "insufficient credit references." Similarly, a creditor that considers bank references and other credit references as distinct factors should treat the two factors separately and disclose them as appropriate. The creditor should either add such other factors to the form or check "other" and include the appropriate explanation. The creditor need not, however, describe how or why a factor adversely affected the application. For example, the notice may say "length of residence" rather than "too short a period of residence."

5. A creditor may design its own notification forms or use all or a portion of the forms contained in this appendix. Proper use of Forms C-1 through C-4 will satisfy the requirement of § 202.9(a)(2)(i). Proper use of Forms C-5 and C-6 constitutes full compliance with §§ 202.9(a)(2)(ii) and 202.9(c)(2), respectively. Proper use of Forms C-7 and C-8 will satisfy the requirements of § 202.9(a)(2)(i) and (ii), respectively, for applications for business credit. Proper use of Form C-9 will satisfy the requirements of § 202.14 of this part. Proper use of Form C-10 will satisfy the requirements of § 202.5(b)(1).Form C-1 Sample Notice of Action Taken and Statement of Reasons

§ CFR Introduction

1. Official status. Section 706(e) of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act protects a creditor from civil liability for any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with an interpretation issued by a duly authorized official of the Federal Reserve Board. This commentary is the means by which the Division of Consumer and Community Affairs of the Federal Reserve Board issues official staff interpretations of Regulation B. Good-faith compliance with this commentary affords a creditor protection under section 706(e) of the Act.

2. Issuance of interpretations. Under Appendix D to the regulation, any person may request an official staff interpretation. Interpretations will be issued at the discretion of designated officials and incorporated in this commentary following publication for comment in the Federal Register. Except in unusual circumstances, official staff interpretations will be issued only by means of this commentary.

3. Status of previous interpretations. Interpretations of Regulation B previously issued by the Federal Reserve Board and its staff have been incorporated into this commentary as appropriate. All other previous Board and staff interpretations, official and unofficial, are superseded by this commentary.

4. Footnotes. Footnotes in the regulation have the same legal effect as the text of the regulation, whether they are explanatory or illustrative in nature.

5. Comment designations. The comments are designated with as much specificity as possible according to the particular regulatory provision addressed. Each comment in the commentary is identified by a number and the regulatory section or paragraph that it interprets. For example, comments to § 202.2(c) are further divided by subparagraph, such as comment 2(c)(1)(ii)-1 and comment 2(c)(2)(ii)-1.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.1

§ 202.1 Authority, Scope, and Purpose

1(a) Authority and scope.

1. Scope. The Equal Credit Opportunity Act and Regulation B apply to all credit-commercial as well as personal-without regard to the nature or type of the credit or the creditor. If a transaction provides for the deferral of the payment of a debt, it is credit covered by Regulation B even though it may not be a credit transaction covered by Regulation Z (Truth in Lending) (12 CFR part 226). Further, the definition of creditor is not restricted to the party or person to whom the obligation is initially payable, as is the case under Regulation Z. Moreover, the Act and regulation apply to all methods of credit evaluation, whether performed judgmentally or by use of a credit scoring system.

2. Foreign applicability. Regulation B generally does not apply to lending activities that occur outside the United States. The regulation does apply to lending activities that take place within the United States (as well as the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and any territory or possession of the United States), whether or not the applicant is a citizen.

3. Board. The term Board, as used in this regulation, means the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.2

§ 202.2 Definitions

2(c) Adverse action.

Paragraph 2(c)(1)(i)

1. Application for credit. If the applicant applied in accordance with the creditor's procedures, a refusal to refinance or extend the term of a business or other loan is adverse action.

Paragraph 2(c)(1)(ii)

1. Move from service area. If a credit card issuer terminates the open-end account of a customer because the customer has moved out of the card issuer's service area, the termination is adverse action unless termination on this ground was explicitly provided for in the credit agreement between the parties. In cases where termination is adverse action, notification is required under § 202.9.

2. Termination based on credit limit. If a creditor terminates credit accounts that have low credit limits (for example, under $400) but keeps open accounts with higher credit limits, the termination is adverse action and notification is required under § 202.9.

Paragraph 2(c)(2)(ii)

1. Default -- exercise of due-on-sale clause. If a mortgagor sells or transfers mortgaged property without the consent of the mortgagee, and the mortgagee exercises its contractual right to accelerate the mortgage loan, the mortgagee may treat the mortgagor as being in default. An adverse action notice need not be given to the mortgagor or the transferee. (See comment 2(e)-1 for treatment of a purchaser who requests to assume the loan.)

2. Current delinquency or default. The term adverse action does not include a creditor's termination of an account when the accountholder is currently in default or delinquent on that account. Notification in accordance with § 202.9 of the regulation generally is required, however, if the creditor's action is based on a past delinquency or default on the account.

Paragraph 2(c)(2)(iii)

1. Point-of-sale transactions. Denial of credit at point of sale is not adverse action except under those circumstances specified in the regulation. For example, denial at point of sale is not adverse action in the following situations:

i. A credit cardholder presents an expired card or a card that has been reported to the card issuer as lost or stolen.

ii. The amount of a transaction exceeds a cash advance or credit limit.

iii. The circumstances (such as excessive use of a credit card in a short period of time) suggest that fraud is involved.

iv. The authorization facilities are not functioning.

v. Billing statements have been returned to the creditor for lack of a forwarding address.

2. Application for increase in available credit. A refusal or failure to authorize an account transaction at the point of sale or loan is not adverse action except when the refusal is a denial of an application, submitted in accordance with the creditor's procedures, for an increase in the amount of credit.

Paragraph 2(c)(2)(v)

1. Terms of credit versus type of credit offered. When an applicant applies for credit and the creditor does not offer the credit terms requested by the applicant (for example, the interest rate, length of maturity, collateral, or amount of downpayment), a denial of the application for that reason is adverse action (unless the creditor makes a counteroffer that is accepted by the applicant) and the applicant is entitled to notification under § 202.9.

2(e) Applicant.

1. Request to assume loan. If a mortgagor sells or transfers the mortgaged property and the buyer makes an application to the creditor to assume the mortgage loan, the mortgagee must treat the buyer as an applicant unless its policy is not to permit assumptions.

2(f) Application.

1. General. A creditor has the latitude under the regulation to establish its own application process and to decide the type and amount of information it will require from credit applicants.

2. Procedures used. The term "procedures" refers to the actual practices followed by a creditor for making credit decisions as well as its stated application procedures. For example, if a creditor's stated policy is to require all applications to be in writing on the creditor's application form, but the creditor also makes credit decisions based on oral requests, the creditor's procedures are to accept both oral and written applications.

3. When an inquiry or prequalification request becomes an application. A creditor is encouraged to provide consumers with information about loan terms. However, if in giving information to the consumer the creditor also evaluates information about the consumer, decides to decline the request, and communicates this to the consumer, the creditor has treated the inquiry or prequalification request as an application and must then comply with the notification requirements under § 202.9. Whether the inquiry or prequalification request becomes an application depends on how the creditor responds to the consumer, not on what the consumer says or asks. (See comment 9-5 for further discussion of prequalification requests; see comment 2(f)-5 for a discussion of preapproval requests.)

4. Examples of inquiries that are not applications. The following examples illustrate situations in which only an inquiry has taken place:

i. A consumer calls to ask about loan terms and an employee explains the creditor's basic loan terms, such as interest rates, loan-to-value ratio, and debt-to-income ratio.

ii. A consumer calls to ask about interest rates for car loans, and, in order to quote the appropriate rate, the loan officer asks for the make and sales price of the car and the amount of the downpayment, then gives the consumer the rate.

iii. A consumer asks about terms for a loan to purchase a home and tells the loan officer her income and intended downpayment, but the loan officer only explains the creditor's loan-to-value ratio policy and other basic lending policies, without telling the consumer whether she qualifies for the loan.

iv. A consumer calls to ask about terms for a loan to purchase vacant land and states his income and the sales price of the property to be financed, and asks whether he qualifies for a loan; the employee responds by describing the general lending policies, explaining that he would need to look at all of the consumer's qualifications before making a decision, and offering to send an application form to the consumer.

5. Examples of an application. An application for credit includes the following situations:

i. A person asks a financial institution to "preapprove" her for a loan (for example, to finance a house or a vehicle she plans to buy) and the institution reviews the request under a program in which the institution, after a comprehensive analysis of her creditworthiness, issues a written commitment valid for a designated period of time to extend a loan up to a specified amount. The written commitment may not be subject to conditions other than conditions that require the identification of adequate collateral, conditions that require no material change in the applicant's financial condition or creditworthiness prior to funding the loan, and limited conditions that are not related to the financial condition or creditworthiness of the applicant that the lender ordinarily attaches to a traditional application (such as certification of a clear termite inspection for a home purchase loan, or a maximum mileage requirement for a used car loan). But if the creditor's program does not provide for giving written commitments, requests for preapprovals are treated as prequalification requests for purposes of the regulation.

ii. Under the same facts as above, the financial institution evaluates the person's creditworthiness and determines that she does not qualify for a preapproval.

6. Completed application -- diligence requirement. The regulation defines a completed application in terms that give a creditor the latitude to establish its own information requirements. Nevertheless, the creditor must act with reasonable diligence to collect information needed to complete the application. For example, the creditor should request information from third parties, such as a credit report, promptly after receiving the application. If additional information is needed from the applicant, such as an address or a telephone number to verify employment, the creditor should contact the applicant promptly. (But see comment 9(a)(1)-3, which discusses the creditor's option to deny an application on the basis of incompleteness.)

2(g) Business credit.

1. Definition. The test for deciding whether a transaction qualifies as business credit is one of primary purpose. For example, an open-end credit account used for both personal and business purposes is not business credit unless the primary purpose of the account is business-related. A creditor may rely on an applicant's statement of the purpose for the credit requested.

2(j) Credit.

1. General. Regulation B covers a wider range of credit transactions than Regulation Z (Truth in Lending). Under Regulation B, a transaction is credit if there is a right to defer payment of a debt -- regardless of whether the credit is for personal or commercial purposes, the number of installments required for repayment, or whether the transaction is subject to a finance charge.

2(l) Creditor.

1. Assignees. The term creditor includes all persons participating in the credit decision. This may include an assignee or a potential purchaser of the obligation who influences the credit decision by indicating whether or not it will purchase the obligation if the transaction is consummated.

2. Referrals to creditors. For certain purposes, the term creditor includes persons such as real estate brokers, automobile dealers, home builders, and home-improvement contractors who do not participate in credit decisions but who only accept applications and refer applicants to creditors, or select or offer to select creditors to whom credit requests can be made. These persons must comply with § 202.4(a), the general rule prohibiting discrimination, and with § 202.4(b), the general rule against discouraging applications.

2(p) Empirically derived and other credit scoring systems.

1. Purpose of definition. The definition under § 202.2(p)(1)(i) through (iv) sets the criteria that a credit system must meet in order to use age as a predictive factor. Credit systems that do not meet these criteria are judgmental systems and may consider age only for the purpose of determining a "pertinent element of creditworthiness." (Both types of systems may favor an elderly applicant. See § 202.6(b)(2).)

2. Periodic revalidation. The regulation does not specify how often credit scoring systems must be revalidated. The credit scoring system must be revalidated frequently enough to ensure that it continues to meet recognized professional statistical standards for statistical soundness. To ensure that predictive ability is being maintained, the creditor must periodically review the performance of the system. This could be done, for example, by analyzing the loan portfolio to determine the delinquency rate for each score interval, or by analyzing population stability over time to detect deviations of recent applications from the applicant population used to validate the system. If this analysis indicates that the system no longer predicts risk with statistical soundness, the system must be adjusted as necessary to reestablish its predictive ability. A creditor is responsible for ensuring its system is validated and revalidated based on the creditor's own data.

3. Pooled data scoring systems. A scoring system or the data from which to develop such a system may be obtained from either a single credit grantor or multiple credit grantors. The resulting system will qualify as an empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system provided the criteria set forth in paragraph (p)(1)(i) through (iv) of this section are met. A creditor is responsible for ensuring its system is validated and revalidated based on the creditor's own data when it becomes available.

4. Effects test and disparate treatment. An empirically derived, demonstrably and statistically sound, credit scoring system may include age as a predictive factor (provided that the age of an elderly applicant is not assigned a negative factor or value). Besides age, no other prohibited basis may be used as a variable. Generally, credit scoring systems treat all applicants objectively and thus avoid problems of disparate treatment. In cases where a credit scoring system is used in conjunction with individual discretion, disparate treatment could conceivably occur in the evaluation process. In addition, neutral factors used in credit scoring systems could nonetheless be subject to challenge under the effects test. (See comment 6(a)-2 for a discussion of the effects test).

2(w) Open-end credit.

1. Open-end real estate mortgages. The term "open-end credit" does not include negotiated advances under an open-end real estate mortgage or a letter of credit.

2(z) Prohibited basis.

1. Persons associated with applicant. As used in this regulation, prohibited basis refers not only to characteristics -- the race, color, religion, national origin, sex, marital status, or age -- of an applicant (or officers of an applicant in the case of a corporation) but also to the characteristics of individuals with whom an applicant is affiliated or with whom the applicant associates. This means, for example, that under the general rule stated in § 202.4(a), a creditor may not discriminate against an applicant because of that person's personal or business dealings with members of a certain religion, because of the national origin of any persons associated with the extension of credit (such as the tenants in the apartment complex being financed), or because of the race of other residents in the neighborhood where the property offered as collateral is located.

2. National origin. A creditor may not refuse to grant credit because an applicant comes from a particular country but may take the applicant's immigration status into account. A creditor may also take into account any applicable law, regulation, or executive order restricting dealings with citizens (or the government) of a particular country or imposing limitations regarding credit extended for their use.

3. Public assistance program. Any federal, state, or local governmental assistance program that provides a continuing, periodic income supplement, whether premised on entitlement or need, is "public assistance" for purposes of the regulation. The term includes (but is not limited to) Temporary Aid to Needy Families, food stamps, rent and mortgage supplement or assistance programs, social security and supplemental security income, and unemployment compensation. Only physicians, hospitals, and others to whom the benefits are payable need consider Medicare and Medicaid as public assistance.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.3

§ 202.3 Limited Exceptions for Certain Classes of Transactions

1. Scope. Under this section, procedural requirements of the regulation do not apply to certain types of credit. All classes of transactions remain subject to § 202.4(a), the general rule barring discrimination on a prohibited basis, and to any other provision not specifically excepted.

3(a) Public-utilities credit.

1. Definition. This definition applies only to credit for the purchase of a utility service, such as electricity, gas, or telephone service. Credit provided or offered by a public utility for some other purpose -- such as for financing the purchase of a gas dryer, telephone equipment, or other durable goods, or for insulation or other home improvements -- is not excepted.

2. Security deposits. A utility company is a creditor when it supplies utility service and bills the user after the service has been provided. Thus, any credit term (such as a requirement for a security deposit) is subject to the regulation's bar against discrimination on a prohibited basis.

3. Telephone companies. A telephone company's credit transactions qualify for the exceptions provided in § 202.3(a)(2) only if the company is regulated by a government unit or files the charges for service, delayed payment, or any discount for prompt payment with a government unit.

3(c) Incidental credit.

1. Examples. If a service provider (such as a hospital, doctor, lawyer, or merchant) allows the client or customer to defer the payment of a bill, this deferral of debt is credit for purposes of the regulation, even though there is no finance charge and no agreement for payment in installments. Because of the exceptions provided by this section, however, these particular credit extensions are excepted from compliance with certain procedural requirements as specified in § 202.3(c).

3(d) Government credit.

1. Credit to governments. The exception relates to credit extended to (not by) governmental entities. For example, credit extended to a local government is covered by this exception, but credit extended to consumers by a federal or state housing agency does not qualify for special treatment under this category.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.4

§ 202.4 General Rules

Paragraph 4(a)

1. Scope of rule. The general rule stated in § 202.4(a) covers all dealings, without exception, between an applicant and a creditor, whether or not addressed by other provisions of the regulation. Other provisions of the regulation identify specific practices that the Board has decided are impermissible because they could result in credit discrimination on a basis prohibited by the Act. The general rule covers, for example, application procedures, criteria used to evaluate creditworthiness, administration of accounts, and treatment of delinquent or slow accounts. Thus, whether or not specifically prohibited elsewhere in the regulation, a credit practice that treats applicants differently on a prohibited basis violates the law because it violates the general rule. Disparate treatment on a prohibited basis is illegal whether or not it results from a conscious intent to discriminate.

2. Examples.

i. Disparate treatment would exist, for example, in the following situations:

A. A creditor provides information only on "subprime" and similar products to minority applicants who request information about the creditor's mortgage products, but provides information on a wider variety of mortgage products to similarly situated nonminority applicants.

B. A creditor provides more comprehensive information to men than to similarly situated women.

C. A creditor requires a minority applicant to provide greater documentation to obtain a loan than a similarly situated nonminority applicant.

D. A creditor waives or relaxes credit standards for a nonminority applicant but not for a similarly situated minority applicant.

ii. Treating applicants differently on a prohibited basis is unlawful if the creditor lacks a legitimate nondiscriminatory reason for its action, or if the asserted reason is found to be a pretext for discrimination.

Paragraph 4(b)

1. Prospective applicants. Generally, the regulation's protections apply only to persons who have requested or received an extension of credit. In keeping with the purpose of the Act -- to promote the availability of credit on a nondiscriminatory basis -- § 202.4(b) covers acts or practices directed at prospective applicants that could discourage a reasonable person, on a prohibited basis, from applying for credit. Practices prohibited by this section include:

i. A statement that the applicant should not bother to apply, after the applicant states that he is retired.

ii. The use of words, symbols, models or other forms of communication in advertising that express, imply, or suggest a discriminatory preference or a policy of exclusion in violation of the Act.

iii. The use of interview scripts that discourage applications on a prohibited basis.

2. Affirmative advertising. A creditor may affirmatively solicit or encourage members of traditionally disadvantaged groups to apply for credit, especially groups that might not normally seek credit from that creditor.

Paragraph 4(c)

1. Requirement for written applications. Model application forms are provided in Appendix B to the regulation, although use of a printed form is not required. A creditor will satisfy the requirement by writing down the information that it normally considers in making a credit decision. The creditor may complete an application on behalf of an applicant and need not require the applicant to sign the application.

2. Telephone applications. A creditor that accepts applications by telephone for dwelling-related credit covered by § 202.13 can meet the requirement for written applications by writing down pertinent information that is provided by the applicant.

3. Computerized entry. Information entered directly into and retained by a computerized system qualifies as a written application under this paragraph. (See the commentary to § 202.13(b), Applications through electronic media and Applications through video.)

Paragraph 4(d)

1. Clear and conspicuous. This standard requires that disclosures be presented in a reasonably understandable format in a way that does not obscure the required information. No minimum type size is mandated, but the disclosures must be legible, whether typewritten, handwritten, or printed by computer.

2. Form of disclosures. Whether the disclosures required to be on or with an application must be in electronic form depends upon the following:

i. If an applicant accesses a credit application electronically (other than as described under ii below), such as online at a home computer, the creditor must provide the disclosures in electronic form (such as with the application form on its website) in order to meet the requirement to provide disclosures in a timely manner on or with the application. If the creditor instead mailed paper disclosures to the applicant, this requirement would not be met.

ii. In contrast, if an applicant is physically present in the creditor's office, and accesses a credit application electronically, such as via a terminal or kiosk (or if the applicant uses a terminal or kiosk located on the premises of an affiliate or third party that has arranged with the creditor to provide applications to consumers), the creditor may provide disclosures in either electronic or paper form, provided the creditor complies with the timing, delivery, and retainability requirements of the regulation.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.5

§ 202.5 Rules Concerning Requests for Information

5(a) General rules.

Paragraph 5(a)(1)

1. Requests for information. This section governs the types of information that a creditor may gather. Section 202.6 governs how information may be used.

Paragraph 5(a)(2)

1. Local laws. Information that a creditor is allowed to collect pursuant to a "state" statute or regulation includes information required by a local statute, regulation, or ordinance.

2. Information required by Regulation C. Regulation C generally requires creditors covered by the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act (HMDA) to collect and report information about the race, ethnicity, and sex of applicants for home-improvement loans and home-purchase loans, including some types of loans not covered by § 202.13.

3. Collecting information on behalf of creditors. Persons such as loan brokers and correspondents do not violate the ECOA or Regulation B if they collect information that they are otherwise prohibited from collecting, where the purpose of collecting the information is to provide it to a creditor that is subject to the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act or another federal or state statute or regulation requiring data collection.

5(d) Other limitations on information requests.

Paragraph 5(d)(1)

1. Indirect disclosure of prohibited information. The fact that certain credit-related information may indirectly disclose marital status does not bar a creditor from seeking such information. For example, the creditor may ask about:

i. The applicant's obligation to pay alimony, child support, or separate maintenance income.

ii. The source of income to be used as the basis for repaying the credit requested, which could disclose that it is the income of a spouse.

iii. Whether any obligation disclosed by the applicant has a co-obligor, which could disclose that the co-obligor is a spouse or former spouse.

iv. The ownership of assets, which could disclose the interest of a spouse.

Paragraph 5(d)(2)

1. Disclosure about income. The sample application forms in appendix B to the regulation illustrate how a creditor may inform an applicant of the right not to disclose alimony, child support, or separate maintenance income.

2. General inquiry about source of income. Since a general inquiry about the source of income may lead an applicant to disclose alimony, child support, or separate maintenance income, a creditor making such an inquiry on an application form should preface the request with the disclosure required by this paragraph.

3. Specific inquiry about sources of income. A creditor need not give the disclosure if the inquiry about income is specific and worded in a way that is unlikely to lead the applicant to disclose the fact that income is derived from alimony, child support, or separate maintenance payments. For example, an application form that asks about specific types of income such as salary, wages, or investment income need not include the disclosure.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.6

§ 202.6 Rules Concerning Evaluation of Applications

6(a) General rule concerning use of information.

1. General. When evaluating an application for credit, a creditor generally may consider any information obtained. However, a creditor may not consider in its evaluation of creditworthiness any information that it is barred by § 202.5 from obtaining or from using for any purpose other than to conduct a self-test under § 202.15.

2. Effects test. The effects test is a judicial doctrine that was developed in a series of employment cases decided by the U.S. Supreme Court under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2000e et seq.), and the burdens of proof for such employment cases were codified by Congress in the Civil Rights Act of 1991 (42 U.S.C. 2000e-2). Congressional intent that this doctrine apply to the credit area is documented in the Senate Report that accompanied H.R. 6516, No. 94-589, pp. 4-5; and in the House Report that accompanied H.R. 6516, No. 94-210, p.5. The Act and regulation may prohibit a creditor practice that is discriminatory in effect because it has a disproportionately negative impact on a prohibited basis, even though the creditor has no intent to discriminate and the practice appears neutral on its face, unless the creditor practice meets a legitimate business need that cannot reasonably be achieved as well by means that are less disparate in their impact. For example, requiring that applicants have income in excess of a certain amount to qualify for an overdraft line of credit could mean that women and minority applicants will be rejected at a higher rate than men and nonminority applicants. If there is a demonstrable relationship between the income requirement and creditworthiness for the level of credit involved, however, use of the income standard would likely be permissible.

6(b) Specific rules concerning use of information.

Paragraph 6(b)(1)

1. Prohibited basis -- special purpose credit. In a special purpose credit program, a creditor may consider a prohibited basis to determine whether the applicant possesses a characteristic needed for eligibility. (See § 202.8.)

Paragraph 6(b)(2)

1. Favoring the elderly. Any system of evaluating creditworthiness may favor a credit applicant who is age 62 or older. A credit program that offers more favorable credit terms to applicants age 62 or older is also permissible; a program that offers more favorable credit terms to applicants at an age lower than 62 is permissible only if it meets the special-purpose credit requirements of § 202.8.

2. Consideration of age in a credit scoring system. Age may be taken directly into account in a credit scoring system that is "demonstrably and statistically sound," as defined in § 202.2(p), with one limitation: applicants age 62 years or older must be treated at least as favorably as applicants who are under age 62. If age is scored by assigning points to an applicant's age category, elderly applicants must receive the same or a greater number of points as the most favored class of nonelderly applicants.

i. Age-split scorecards. Some credit systems segment the population and use different scorecards based on the age of an applicant. In such a system, one card may cover a narrow age range (for example, applicants in their twenties or younger) who are evaluated under attributes predictive for that age group. A second card may cover all other applicants, who are evaluated under the attributes predictive for that broader class. When a system uses a card covering a wide age range that encompasses elderly applicants, the credit scoring system is not deemed to score age. Thus, the system does not raise the issue of assigning a negative factor or value to the age of elderly applicants. But if a system segments the population by age into multiple scorecards, and includes elderly applicants in a narrower age range, the credit scoring system does score age. To comply with the Act and regulation in such a case, the creditor must ensure that the system does not assign a negative factor or value to the age of elderly applicants as a class.

3. Consideration of age in a judgmental system. In a judgmental system, defined in § 202.2(t), a creditor may not decide whether to extend credit or set the terms and conditions of credit based on age or information related exclusively to age. Age or age-related information may be considered only in evaluating other "pertinent elements of creditworthiness" that are drawn from the particular facts and circumstances concerning the applicant. For example, a creditor may not reject an application or terminate an account because the applicant is 60 years old. But a creditor that uses a judgmental system may relate the applicant's age to other information about the applicant that the creditor considers in evaluating creditworthiness. As the following examples illustrate, the evaluation must be made in an individualized, case-by-case manner:

i. A creditor may consider the applicant's occupation and length of time to retirement to ascertain whether the applicant's income (including retirement income) will support the extension of credit to its maturity.

ii. A creditor may consider the adequacy of any security offered when the term of the credit extension exceeds the life expectancy of the applicant and the cost of realizing on the collateral could exceed the applicant's equity. An elderly applicant might not qualify for a 5 percent down, 30-year mortgage loan but might qualify with a larger downpayment or a shorter loan maturity.

iii. A creditor may consider the applicant's age to assess the significance of length of employment (a young applicant may have just entered the job market) or length of time at an address (an elderly applicant may recently have retired and moved from a long-term residence).

4. Consideration of age in a reverse mortgage. A reverse mortgage is a home-secured loan in which the borrower receives payments from the creditor, and does not become obligated to repay these amounts (other than in the case of default) until the borrower dies, moves permanently from the home, or transfers title to the home, or upon a specified maturity date. Disbursements to the borrower under a reverse mortgage typically are determined by considering the value of the borrower's home, the current interest rate, and the borrower's life expectancy. A reverse mortgage program that requires borrowers to be age 62 or older is permissible under § 202.6(b)(2)(iv). In addition, under § 202.6(b)(2)(iii), a creditor may consider a borrower's age to evaluate a pertinent element of creditworthiness, such as the amount of the credit or monthly payments that the borrower will receive, or the estimated repayment date.

5. Consideration of age in a combined system. A creditor using a credit scoring system that qualifies as "empirically derived" under § 202.2(p) may consider other factors (such as a credit report or the applicant's cash flow) on a judgmental basis. Doing so will not negate the classification of the credit scoring component of the combined system as "demonstrably and statistically sound." While age could be used in the credit scoring portion, however, in the judgmental portion age may not be considered directly. It may be used only for the purpose of determining a "pertinent element of creditworthiness." (See comment 6(b)(2)-3.)

6. Consideration of public assistance. When considering income derived from a public assistance program, a creditor may take into account, for example:

i. The length of time an applicant will likely remain eligible to receive such income.

ii. Whether the applicant will continue to qualify for benefits based on the status of the applicant's dependents (as in the case of Temporary Aid to Needy Families, or social security payments to a minor).

iii. Whether the creditor can attach or garnish the income to assure payment of the debt in the event of default.

Paragraph 6(b)(5)

1. Consideration of an individual applicant. A creditor must evaluate income derived from part-time employment, alimony, child support, separate maintenance payments, retirement benefits, or public assistance on an individual basis, not on the basis of aggregate statistics; and must assess its reliability or unreliability by analyzing the applicant's actual circumstances, not by analyzing statistical measures derived from a group.

2. Payments consistently made. In determining the likelihood of consistent payments of alimony, child support, or separate maintenance, a creditor may consider factors such as whether payments are received pursuant to a written agreement or court decree; the length of time that the payments have been received; whether the payments are regularly received by the applicant; the availability of court or other procedures to compel payment; and the creditworthiness of the payor, including the credit history of the payor when it is available to the creditor.

3. Consideration of income.

i. A creditor need not consider income at all in evaluating creditworthiness. If a creditor does consider income, there are several acceptable methods, whether in a credit scoring or a judgmental system:

A. A creditor may score or take into account the total sum of all income stated by the applicant without taking steps to evaluate the income for reliability.

B. A creditor may evaluate each component of the applicant's income, and then score or take into account income determined to be reliable separately from other income; or the creditor may disregard that portion of income that is not reliable when it aggregates reliable income.

C. A creditor that does not evaluate all income components for reliability must treat as reliable any component of protected income that is not evaluated.

ii. In considering the separate components of an applicant's income, the creditor may not automatically discount or exclude from consideration any protected income. Any discounting or exclusion must be based on the applicant's actual circumstances.

4. Part-time employment, sources of income. A creditor may score or take into account the fact that an applicant has more than one source of earned income-a full-time and a part-time job or two part-time jobs. A creditor may also score or treat earned income from a secondary source differently than earned income from a primary source. The creditor may not, however, score or otherwise take into account the number of sources for income such as retirement income, social security, supplemental security income, and alimony. Nor may the creditor treat negatively the fact that an applicant's only earned income is derived from, for example, a part-time job.

Paragraph 6(b)(6)

1. Types of credit references. A creditor may restrict the types of credit history and credit references that it will consider, provided that the restrictions are applied to all credit applicants without regard to sex, marital status, or any other prohibited basis. On the applicant's request, however, a creditor must consider credit information not reported through a credit bureau when the information relates to the same types of credit references and history that the creditor would consider if reported through a credit bureau.

Paragraph 6(b)(7)

1. National origin -- immigration status. The applicant's immigration status and ties to the community (such as employment and continued residence in the area) could have a bearing on a creditor's ability to obtain repayment. Accordingly, the creditor may consider immigration status and differentiate, for example, between a noncitizen who is a long-time resident with permanent resident status and a noncitizen who is temporarily in this country on a student visa.

2. National origin -- citizenship. A denial of credit on the ground that an applicant is not a United States citizen is not per se discrimination based on national origin.

Paragraph 6(b)(8)

1. Prohibited basis -- marital status. A creditor may consider the marital status of an applicant or joint applicant for the purpose of ascertaining the creditor's rights and remedies applicable to the particular extension of credit. For example, in a secured transaction involving real property, a creditor could take into account whether state law gives the applicant's spouse an interest in the property being offered as collateral.

§ 202.7 Rules Concerning Extensions of Credit

7(a) Individual accounts.

1. Open-end credit -- authorized user. A creditor may not require a creditworthy applicant seeking an individual credit account to provide additional signatures. But the creditor may condition the designation of an authorized user by the account holder on the authorized user's becoming contractually liable for the account, as long as the creditor does not differentiate on any prohibited basis in imposing this requirement.

2. Open-end credit -- choice of authorized user. A creditor that permits an account holder to designate an authorized user may not restrict this designation on a prohibited basis. For example, if the creditor allows the designation of spouses as authorized users, the creditor may not refuse to accept a nonspouse as an authorized user.

3. Overdraft authority on transaction accounts. If a transaction account (such as a checking account or NOW account) includes an overdraft line of credit, the creditor may require that all persons authorized to draw on the transaction account assume liability for any overdraft.

7(b) Designation of name.

1. Single name on account. A creditor may require that joint applicants on an account designate a single name for purposes of administering the account and that a single name be embossed on any credit cards issued on the account. But the creditor may not require that the name be the husband's name. (See § 202.10 for rules governing the furnishing of credit history on accounts held by spouses.)

7(c) Action concerning existing open-end accounts.

Paragraph 7(c)(1)

1. Termination coincidental with marital status change. When an account holder's marital status changes, a creditor generally may not terminate the account unless it has evidence that the account holder is now unable or unwilling to repay. But the creditor may terminate an account on which both spouses are jointly liable, even if the action coincides with a change in marital status, when one or both spouses:

i. Repudiate responsibility for future charges on the joint account.

ii. Request separate accounts in their own names.

iii. Request that the joint account be closed.

2. Updating information. A creditor may periodically request updated information from applicants but may not use events related to a prohibited basis -- such as an applicant's retirement or reaching a particular age, or a change in name or marital status -- to trigger such a request.

Paragraph 7(c)(2)

1. Procedure pending reapplication. A creditor may require a reapplication from an account holder, even when there is no evidence of unwillingness or inability to repay, if (1) the credit was based on the qualifications of a person who is no longer available to support the credit and (2) the creditor has information indicating that the account holder's income may be insufficient to support the credit. While a reapplication is pending, the creditor must allow the account holder full access to the account under the existing contract terms. The creditor may specify a reasonable time period within which the account holder must submit the required information.

7(d) Signature of spouse or other person.

1. Qualified applicant. The signature rules ensure that qualified applicants are able to obtain credit in their own names. Thus, when an applicant requests individual credit, a creditor generally may not require the signature of another person unless the creditor has first determined that the applicant alone does not qualify for the credit requested.

2. Unqualified applicant. When an applicant requests individual credit but does not meet a creditor's standards, the creditor may require a cosigner, guarantor, endorser, or similar parties -- but cannot require that it be the spouse. (See commentary to § 202.7(d)(5) and (6).)

Paragraph 7(d)(1)

1. Signature of another person. It is impermissible for a creditor to require an applicant who is individually creditworthy to provide a cosigner -- even if the creditor applies the requirement without regard to sex, marital status, or any other prohibited basis. (But see comment 7(d)(6)-1 concerning guarantors of closely held corporations.)

2. Joint applicant. The term "joint applicant" refers to someone who applies contemporaneously with the applicant for shared or joint credit. It does not refer to someone whose signature is required by the creditor as a condition for granting the credit requested.

3. Evidence of joint application. A person's intent to be a joint applicant must be evidenced at the time of application. Signatures on a promissory note may not be used to show intent to apply for joint credit. On the other hand, signatures or initials on a credit application affirming applicants' intent to apply for joint credit may be used to establish intent to apply for joint credit. (See Appendix B). The method used to establish intent must be distinct from the means used by individuals to affirm the accuracy of information. For example, signatures on a joint financial statement affirming the veracity of information are not sufficient to establish intent to apply for joint credit.

1. Jointly owned property. If an applicant requests unsecured credit, does not own sufficient separate property, and relies on joint property to establish creditworthiness, the creditor must value the applicant's interest in the jointly owned property. A creditor may not request that a nonapplicant joint owner sign any instrument as a condition of the credit extension unless the applicant's interest does not support the amount and terms of the credit sought.

i. Valuation of applicant's interest. In determining the value of an applicant's interest in jointly owned property, a creditor may consider factors such as the form of ownership and the property's susceptibility to attachment, execution, severance, or partition; the value of the applicant's interest after such action; and the cost associated with the action. This determination must be based on the existing form of ownership, and not on the possibility of a subsequent change. For example, in determining whether a married applicant's interest in jointly owned property is sufficient to satisfy the creditor's standards of creditworthiness for individual credit, a creditor may not consider that the applicant's separate property could be transferred into tenancy by the entirety after consummation. Similarly, a creditor may not consider the possibility that the couple may divorce. Accordingly, a creditor may not require the signature of the nonapplicant spouse in these or similar circumstances.

ii. Other options to support credit. If the applicant's interest in jointly owned property does not support the amount and terms of credit sought, the creditor may offer the applicant other options to qualify for the extension of credit. For example:

A. Providing a co-signer or other party (§ 202.7(d)(5));

B. Requesting that the credit be granted on a secured basis (§ 202.7(d)(4)); or

C. Providing the signature of the joint owner on an instrument that ensures access to the property in the event of the applicant's death or default, but does not impose personal liability unless necessary under state law (such as a limited guarantee). A creditor may not routinely require however, that a joint owner sign an instrument (such as a quitclaim deed) that would result in the forfeiture of the joint owner's interest in the property.

2. Need for signature -- reasonable belief. A creditor's reasonable belief as to what instruments need to be signed by a person other than the applicant should be supported by a thorough review of pertinent statutory and decisional law or an opinion of the state attorney general.

Paragraph 7(d)(3)

1. Residency. In assessing the creditworthiness of a person who applies for credit in a community property state, a creditor may assume that the applicant is a resident of the state unless the applicant indicates otherwise.

Paragraph 7(d)(4)

1. Creation of enforceable lien. Some state laws require that both spouses join in executing any instrument by which real property is encumbered. If an applicant offers such property as security for credit, a creditor may require the applicant's spouse to sign the instruments necessary to create a valid security interest in the property. The creditor may not require the spouse to sign the note evidencing the credit obligation if signing only the mortgage or other security agreement is sufficient to make the property available to satisfy the debt in the event of default. However, if under state law both spouses must sign the note to create an enforceable lien, the creditor may require the signatures.

2. Need for signature -- reasonable belief. Generally, a signature to make the secured property available will only be needed on a security agreement. A creditor's reasonable belief that, to ensure access to the property, the spouse's signature is needed on an instrument that imposes personal liability should be supported by a thorough review of pertinent statutory and decisional law or an opinion of the state attorney general.

3. Integrated instruments. When a creditor uses an integrated instrument that combines the note and the security agreement, the spouse cannot be asked to sign the integrated instrument if the signature is only needed to grant a security interest. But the spouse could be asked to sign an integrated instrument that makes clear -- for example, by a legend placed next to the spouse's signature -- that the spouse's signature is only to grant a security interest and that signing the instrument does not impose personal liability.

Paragraph 7(d)(5)

1. Qualifications of additional parties. In establishing guidelines for eligibility of guarantors, cosigners, or similar additional parties, a creditor may restrict the applicant's choice of additional parties but may not discriminate on the basis of sex, marital status, or any other prohibited basis. For example, the creditor could require that the additional party live in the creditor's market area.

2. Reliance on income of another person -- individual credit. An applicant who requests individual credit relying on the income of another person (including a spouse in a non-community property state) may be required to provide the signature of the other person to make the income available to pay the debt. In community property states, the signature of a spouse may be required if the applicant relies on the spouse's separate income. If the applicant relies on the spouse's future earnings that as a matter of state law cannot be characterized as community property until earned, the creditor may require the spouse's signature, but need not do so-even if it is the creditor's practice to require the signature when an applicant relies on the future earnings of a person other than a spouse. (See § 202.6(c) on consideration of state property laws.)

3. Renewals. If the borrower's creditworthiness is reevaluated when a credit obligation is renewed, the creditor must determine whether an additional party is still warranted and, if not warranted, release the additional party.

Paragraph 7(d)(6)

1. Guarantees. A guarantee on an extension of credit is part of a credit transaction and therefore subject to the regulation. A creditor may require the personal guarantee of the partners, directors, or officers of a business, and the shareholders of a closely held corporation, even if the business or corporation is creditworthy. The requirement must be based on the guarantor's relationship with the business or corporation, however, and not on a prohibited basis. For example, a creditor may not require guarantees only for women-owned or minority-owned businesses. Similarly, a creditor may not require guarantees only of the married officers of a business or the married shareholders of a closely held corporation.

2. Spousal guarantees. The rules in § 202.7(d) bar a creditor from requiring the signature of a guarantor's spouse just as they bar the creditor from requiring the signature of an applicant's spouse. For example, although a creditor may require all officers of a closely held corporation to personally guarantee a corporate loan, the creditor may not automatically require that spouses of married officers also sign the guarantee. If an evaluation of the financial circumstances of an officer indicates that an additional signature is necessary, however, the creditor may require the signature of another person in appropriate circumstances in accordance with § 202.7(d)(2).

7(e) Insurance.

1. Differences in terms. Differences in the availability, rates, and other terms on which credit-related casualty insurance or credit life, health, accident, or disability insurance is offered or provided to an applicant does not violate Regulation B.

2. Insurance information. A creditor may obtain information about an applicant's age, sex, or marital status for insurance purposes. The information may only be used for determining eligibility and premium rates for insurance, however, and not in making the credit decision.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.8

§ 202.8 Special Purpose Credit Programs

8(a) Standards for programs.

1. Determining qualified programs. The Board does not determine whether individual programs qualify for special purpose credit status, or whether a particular program benefits an "economically disadvantaged class of persons." The agency or creditor administering or offering the loan program must make these decisions regarding the status of its program.

2. Compliance with a program authorized by federal or state law. A creditor does not violate Regulation B when it complies in good faith with a regulation promulgated by a government agency implementing a special purpose credit program under § 202.8(a)(1). It is the agency's responsibility to promulgate a regulation that is consistent with federal and state law.

3. Expressly authorized. Credit programs authorized by federal or state law include programs offered pursuant to federal, state, or local statute, regulation or ordinance, or pursuant to judicial or administrative order.

4. Creditor liability. A refusal to grant credit to an applicant is not a violation of the Act or regulation if the applicant does not meet the eligibility requirements under a special purpose credit program.

5. Determining need. In designing a special purpose credit program under § 202.8(a), a for-profit organization must determine that the program will benefit a class of people who would otherwise be denied credit or would receive it on less favorable terms. This determination can be based on a broad analysis using the organization's own research or data from outside sources, including governmental reports and studies. For example, a creditor might design new products to reach consumers who would not meet, or have not met, its traditional standards of creditworthiness due to such factors as credit inexperience or the use of credit sources that may not report to consumer reporting agencies. Or, a bank could review Home Mortgage Disclosure Act data along with demographic data for its assessment area and conclude that there is a need for a special purpose credit program for low-income minority borrowers.

6. Elements of the program. The written plan must contain information that supports the need for the particular program. The plan also must either state a specific period of time for which the program will last, or contain a statement regarding when the program will be reevaluated to determine if there is a continuing need for it.

8(b) Rules in other sections.

1. Applicability of rules. A creditor that rejects an application because the applicant does not meet the eligibility requirements (common characteristic or financial need, for example) must nevertheless notify the applicant of action taken as required by § 202.9.

8(c) Special rule concerning requests and use of information.

1. Request of prohibited basis information. This section permits a creditor to request and consider certain information that would otherwise be prohibited by §§ 202.5 and 202.6 to determine an applicant's eligibility for a particular program.

2. Examples. Examples of programs under which the creditor can ask for and consider information about a prohibited basis are:

i. Energy conservation programs to assist the elderly, for which the creditor must consider the applicant's age.

ii. Programs under a Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Corporation, for which a creditor must consider the applicant's minority status.

8(d) Special rule in the case of financial need.

1. Request of prohibited basis information. This section permits a creditor to request and consider certain information that would otherwise be prohibited by §§ 202.5 and 202.6, and to require signatures that would otherwise be prohibited by § 202.7(d).

2. Examples. Examples of programs in which financial need is a criterion are:

i. Subsidized housing programs for low- to moderate-income households, for which a creditor may have to consider the applicant's receipt of alimony or child support, the spouse's or parents' income, etc.

ii. Student loan programs based on the family's financial need, for which a creditor may have to consider the spouse's or parents' financial resources.

3. Student loans. In a guaranteed student loan program, a creditor may obtain the signature of a parent as a guarantor when required by federal or state law or agency regulation, or when the student does not meet the creditor's standards of creditworthiness. (See § 202.7(d)(1) and (5).) The creditor may not require an additional signature when a student has a work or credit history that satisfies the creditor's standards.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.9

§ 202.9 Notifications

1. Use of the term adverse action. The regulation does not require that a creditor use the term adverse action in communicating to an applicant that a request for an extension of credit has not been approved. In notifying an applicant of adverse action as defined by § 202.2(c)(1), a creditor may use any words or phrases that describe the action taken on the application.

2. Expressly withdrawn applications. When an applicant expressly withdraws a credit application, the creditor is not required to comply with the notification requirements under § 202.9. (The creditor must comply, however, with the record retention requirements of the regulation. See § 202.12(b)(3).)

3. When notification occurs. Notification occurs when a creditor delivers or mails a notice to the applicant's last known address or, in the case of an oral notification, when the creditor communicates the credit decision to the applicant.

4. Location of notice. The notifications required under § 202.9 may appear on either or both sides of a form or letter.

5. Prequalification requests. Whether a creditor must provide a notice of action taken for a prequalification request depends on the creditor's response to the request, as discussed in comment 2(f)-3. For instance, a creditor may treat the request as an inquiry if the creditor evaluates specific information about the consumer and tells the consumer the loan amount, rate, and other terms of credit the consumer could qualify for under various loan programs, explaining the process the consumer must follow to submit a mortgage application and the information the creditor will analyze in reaching a credit decision. On the other hand, a creditor has treated a request as an application, and is subject to the adverse action notice requirements of § 202.9 if, after evaluating information, the creditor decides that it will not approve the request and communicates that decision to the consumer. For example, if the creditor tells the consumer that it would not approve an application for a mortgage because of a bankruptcy in the consumer's record, the creditor has denied an application for credit.

9(a) Notification of action taken, ECOA notice, and statement of specific reasons.

Paragraph 9(a)(1)

1. Timing of notice -- when an application is complete. Once a creditor has obtained all the information it normally considers in making a credit decision, the application is complete and the creditor has 30 days in which to notify the applicant of the credit decision. (See also comment 2(f)-6.)

2. Notification of approval. Notification of approval may be express or by implication. For example, the creditor will satisfy the notification requirement when it gives the applicant the credit card, money, property, or services requested.

3. Incomplete application -- denial for incompleteness. When an application is incomplete regarding information that the applicant can provide and the creditor lacks sufficient data for a credit decision, the creditor may deny the application giving as the reason for denial that the application is incomplete. The creditor has the option, alternatively, of providing a notice of incompleteness under § 202.9(c).

4. Incomplete application -- denial for reasons other than incompleteness. When an application is missing information but provides sufficient data for a credit decision, the creditor may evaluate the application, make its credit decision, and notify the applicant accordingly. If credit is denied, the applicant must be given the specific reasons for the credit denial (or notice of the right to receive the reasons); in this instance missing information or "incomplete application" cannot be given as the reason for the denial.

5. Length of counteroffer. Section 202.9(a)(1)(iv) does not require a creditor to hold a counteroffer open for 90 days or any other particular length of time.

6. Counteroffer combined with adverse action notice. A creditor that gives the applicant a combined counteroffer and adverse action notice that complies with § 202.9(a)(2) need not send a second adverse action notice if the applicant does not accept the counteroffer. A sample of a combined notice is contained in form C-4 of Appendix C to the regulation.

7. Denial of a telephone application. When an application is made by telephone and adverse action is taken, the creditor must request the applicant's name and address in order to provide written notification under this section. If the applicant declines to provide that information, then the creditor has no further notification responsibility.

Paragraph 9(a)(3)

1. Coverage. In determining which rules in this paragraph apply to a given business credit application, a creditor may rely on the applicant's assertion about the revenue size of the business. (Applications to start a business are governed by the rules in § 202.9(a)(3)(i).) If an applicant applies for credit as a sole proprietor, the revenues of the sole proprietorship will determine which rules govern the application. However, if an applicant applies for business credit as an individual, the rules in § 202.9(a)(3)(i) apply unless the application is for trade or similar credit.

2. Trade credit. The term trade credit generally is limited to a financing arrangement that involves a buyer and a seller -- such as a supplier who finances the sale of equipment, supplies, or inventory; it does not apply to an extension of credit by a bank or other financial institution for the financing of such items.

3. Factoring. Factoring refers to a purchase of accounts receivable, and thus is not subject to the Act or regulation. If there is a credit extension incident to the factoring arrangement, the notification rules in § 202.9(a)(3)(ii) apply, as do other relevant sections of the Act and regulation.

4. Manner of compliance. In complying with the notice provisions of the Act and regulation, creditors offering business credit may follow the rules governing consumer credit. Similarly, creditors may elect to treat all business credit the same (irrespective of revenue size) by providing notice in accordance with § 202.9(a)(3)(i).

5. Timing of notification. A creditor subject to § 202.9(a)(3)(ii)(A) is required to notify a business credit applicant, orally or in writing, of action taken on an application within a reasonable time of receiving a completed application. Notice provided in accordance with the timing requirements of § 202.9(a)(1) is deemed reasonable in all instances.

9(b) Form of ECOA notice and statement of specific reasons.

Paragraph 9(b)(1)

1. Substantially similar notice. The ECOA notice sent with a notification of a credit denial or other adverse action will comply with the regulation if it is "substantially similar" to the notice contained in § 202.9(b)(1). For example, a creditor may add a reference to the fact that the ECOA permits age to be considered in certain credit scoring systems, or add a reference to a similar state statute or regulation and to a state enforcement agency.

Paragraph 9(b)(2)

1. Number of specific reasons. A creditor must disclose the principal reasons for denying an application or taking other adverse action. The regulation does not mandate that a specific number of reasons be disclosed, but disclosure of more than four reasons is not likely to be helpful to the applicant.

2. Source of specific reasons. The specific reasons disclosed under §§ 202.9(a)(2) and (b)(2) must relate to and accurately describe the factors actually considered or scored by a creditor.

3. Description of reasons. A creditor need not describe how or why a factor adversely affected an applicant. For example, the notice may say "length of residence" rather than "too short a period of residence."

4. Credit scoring system. If a creditor bases the denial or other adverse action on a credit scoring system, the reasons disclosed must relate only to those factors actually scored in the system. Moreover, no factor that was a principal reason for adverse action may be excluded from disclosure. The creditor must disclose the actual reasons for denial (for example, "age of automobile") even if the relationship of that factor to predicting creditworthiness may not be clear to the applicant.

5. Credit scoring -- method for selecting reasons. The regulation does not require that any one method be used for selecting reasons for a credit denial or other adverse action that is based on a credit scoring system. Various methods will meet the requirements of the regulation. One method is to identify the factors for which the applicant's score fell furthest below the average score for each of those factors achieved by applicants whose total score was at or slightly above the minimum passing score. Another method is to identify the factors for which the applicant's score fell furthest below the average score for each of those factors achieved by all applicants. These average scores could be calculated during the development or use of the system. Any other method that produces results substantially similar to either of these methods is also acceptable under the regulation.

6. Judgmental system. If a creditor uses a judgmental system, the reasons for the denial or other adverse action must relate to those factors in the applicant's record actually reviewed by the person making the decision.

7. Combined credit scoring and judgmental system. If a creditor denies an application based on a credit evaluation system that employs both credit scoring and judgmental components, the reasons for the denial must come from the component of the system that the applicant failed. For example, if a creditor initially credit scores an application and denies the credit request as a result of that scoring, the reasons disclosed to the applicant must relate to the factors scored in the system. If the application passes the credit scoring stage but the creditor then denies the credit request based on a judgmental assessment of the applicant's record, the reasons disclosed must relate to the factors reviewed judgmentally, even if the factors were also considered in the credit scoring component. If the application is not approved or denied as a result of the credit scoring, but falls into a gray band, and the creditor performs a judgmental assessment and denies the credit after that assessment, the reasons disclosed must come from both components of the system. The same result applies where a judgmental assessment is the first component of the combined system. As provided in comment 9(b)(2)-1, disclosure of more than a combined total of four reasons is not likely to be helpful to the applicant.

8. Automatic denial. Some credit decision methods contain features that call for automatic denial because of one or more negative factors in the applicant's record (such as the applicant's previous bad credit history with that creditor, the applicant's declaration of bankruptcy, or the fact that the applicant is a minor). When a creditor denies the credit request because of an automatic-denial factor, the creditor must disclose that specific factor.

9. Combined ECOA-FCRA disclosures. The ECOA requires disclosure of the principal reasons for denying or taking other adverse action on an application for an extension of credit. The Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA) requires a creditor to disclose when it has based its decision in whole or in part on information from a source other than the applicant or its own files. Disclosing that a credit report was obtained and used in the denial of the application, as the FCRA requires, does not satisfy the ECOA requirement to disclose specific reasons. For example, if the applicant's credit history reveals delinquent credit obligations and the application is denied for that reason, to satisfy § 202.9(b)(2) the creditor must disclose that the application was denied because of the applicant's delinquent credit obligations. To satisfy the FCRA requirement, the creditor must also disclose that a credit report was obtained and used in the denial of the application. Sample forms C-1 through C-5 of Appendix C of the regulation provide for the two disclosures.

9(c) Incomplete applications.

Paragraph 9(c)(1)

1. Exception for preapprovals. The requirement to provide a notice of incompleteness does not apply to preapprovals that constitute applications under § 202.2(f).

Paragraph 9(c)(2)

1. Reapplication. If information requested by a creditor is submitted by an applicant after the expiration of the time period designated by the creditor, the creditor may require the applicant to make a new application.

Paragraph 9(c)(3)

1. Oral inquiries for additional information. If an applicant fails to provide the information in response to an oral request, a creditor must send a written notice to the applicant within the 30-day period specified in § 202.9(c)(1) and (2). If the applicant provides the information, the creditor must take action on the application and notify the applicant in accordance with § 202.9(a).

9(g) Applications submitted through a third party.

1. Third parties. The notification of adverse action may be given by one of the creditors to whom an application was submitted, or by a noncreditor third party. If one notification is provided on behalf of multiple creditors, the notice must contain the name and address of each creditor. The notice must either disclose the applicant's right to a statement of specific reasons within 30 days, or give the primary reasons each creditor relied upon in taking the adverse action -- clearly indicating which reasons relate to which creditor.

2. Third party notice -- enforcement agency. If a single adverse action notice is being provided to an applicant on behalf of several creditors and they are under the jurisdiction of different federal enforcement agencies, the notice need not name each agency; disclosure of any one of them will suffice.

3. Third-party notice -- liability. When a notice is to be provided through a third party, a creditor is not liable for an act or omission of the third party that constitutes a violation of the regulation if the creditor accurately and in a timely manner provided the third party with the information necessary for the notification and maintains reasonable procedures adapted to prevent such violations.

CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.10

§ 202.10 Furnishing of Credit Information

1. Scope. The requirements of § 202.10 for designating and reporting credit information apply only to consumer credit transactions. Moreover, they apply only to creditors that opt to furnish credit information to credit bureaus or to other creditors; there is no requirement that a creditor furnish credit information on its accounts.

2. Reporting on all accounts. The requirements of § 202.10 apply only to accounts held or used by spouses. However, a creditor has the option to designate all joint accounts (or all accounts with an authorized user) to reflect the participation of both parties, whether or not the accounts are held by persons married to each other.

3. Designating accounts. In designating accounts and reporting credit information, a creditor need not distinguish between accounts on which the spouse is an authorized user and accounts on which the spouse is a contractually liable party.

4. File and index systems. The regulation does not require the creation or maintenance of separate files in the name of each participant on a joint or user account, or require any other particular system of recordkeeping or indexing. It requires only that a creditor be able to report information in the name of each spouse on accounts covered by § 202.10. Thus, if a creditor receives a credit inquiry about the wife, it should be able to locate her credit file without asking the husband's name.

10(a) Designation of accounts.

1. New parties. When new parties who are spouses undertake a legal obligation on an account, as in the case of a mortgage loan assumption, the creditor must change the designation on the account to reflect the new parties and must furnish subsequent credit information on the account in the new names.

2. Request to change designation of account. A request to change the manner in which information concerning an account is furnished does not alter the legal liability of either spouse on the account and does not require a creditor to change the name in which the account is maintained.

§ 202.11 Relation to State Law

11(a) Inconsistent state laws.

1. Preemption determination -- New York. The Board has determined that the following provisions in the state law of New York are preempted by the federal law, effective November 11, 1988:

i. Article 15, section 296a(1)(b) -- Unlawful discriminatory practices in relation to credit on the basis of race, creed, color, national origin, age, sex, marital status, or disability. This provision is preempted to the extent that it bars taking a prohibited basis into account when establishing eligibility for certain special-purpose credit programs.

ii. Article 15, section 296a(1)(c) -- Unlawful discriminatory practice to make any record or inquiry based on race, creed, color, national origin, age, sex, marital status, or disability. This provision is preempted to the extent that it bars a creditor from requesting and considering information regarding the particular characteristics (for example, race, national origin, or sex) required for eligibility for special-purpose credit programs.

2. Preemption determination -- Ohio. The Board has determined that the following provision in the state law of Ohio is preempted by the federal law, effective July 23, 1990:

i. Section 4112.021(B)(1) -- Unlawful discriminatory practices in credit transactions. This provision is preempted to the extent that it bars asking or favorably considering the age of an elderly applicant; prohibits the consideration of age in a credit scoring system; permits without limitation the consideration of age in real estate transactions; and limits the consideration of age in special-purpose credit programs to certain government-sponsored programs identified in the state law.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.12

§ 202.12 Record Retention

12(a) Retention of prohibited information.

1. Receipt of prohibited information. Unless the creditor specifically requested such information, a creditor does not violate this section when it receives prohibited information from a consumer reporting agency.

2. Use of retained information. Although a creditor may keep in its files prohibited information as provided in § 202.12(a), the creditor may use the information in evaluating credit applications only if permitted to do so by § 202.6.

12(b) Preservation of records.

1. Copies. Copies of the original record include carbon copies, photocopies, microfilm or microfiche copies, or copies produced by any other accurate retrieval system, such as documents stored and reproduced by computer. A creditor that uses a computerized or mechanized system need not keep a paper copy of a document (for example, of an adverse action notice) if it can regenerate all pertinent information in a timely manner for examination or other purposes.

2. Computerized decisions. A creditor that enters information items from a written application into a computerized or mechanized system and makes the credit decision mechanically, based only on the items of information entered into the system, may comply with § 202.12(b) by retaining the information actually entered. It is not required to store the complete written application, nor is it required to enter the remaining items of information into the system. If the transaction is subject to § 202.13, however, the creditor is required to enter and retain the data on personal characteristics in order to comply with the requirements of that section.

Paragraph 12(b)(3)

1. Withdrawn and brokered applications. In most cases, the 25-month retention period for applications runs from the date a notification is sent to the applicant granting or denying the credit requested. In certain transactions, a creditor is not obligated to provide a notice of the action taken. (See, for example, comment 9-2.) In such cases, the 25-month requirement runs from the date of application, as when:

i. An application is withdrawn by the applicant.

ii. An application is submitted to more than one creditor on behalf of the applicant, and the application is approved by one of the other creditors.

12(b)(6) Self-tests

1. The rule requires all written or recorded information about a self-test to be retained for 25 months after a self-test has been completed. For this purpose, a self-test is completed after the creditor has obtained the results and made a determination about what corrective action, if any, is appropriate. Creditors are required to retain information about the scope of the self-test, the methodology used and time period covered by the self-test, the report or results of the self-test including any analysis or conclusions, and any corrective action taken in response to the self-test.

12(b)(7) Preapplication marketing information.

1. Prescreened credit solicitations. The rule requires creditors to retain copies of prescreened credit solicitations. For purposes of this regulation, a prescreened solicitation is an "offer of credit" as described in 15 U.S.C. 1681a(1) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act. A creditor complies with this rule if it retains a copy of each solicitation mailing that contains different terms, such as the amount of credit offered, annual percentage rate, or annual fee.

2. List of criteria. A creditor must retain the list of criteria used to select potential recipients. This includes the criteria used by the creditor both to determine the potential recipients of the particular solicitation and to determine who will actually be offered credit.

3. Correspondence. A creditor may retain correspondence relating to consumers' complaints about prescreened solicitations in any manner that is reasonably accessible and is understandable to examiners. There is no requirement to establish a separate database or set of files for such correspondence, or to match consumer complaints with specific solicitation programs.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.13

§ 202.13 Information for Monitoring Purposes

13(a) Information to be requested.

1. Natural person. Section 202.13 applies only to applications from natural persons.

2. Principal residence. The requirements of § 202.13 apply only if an application relates to a dwelling that is or will be occupied by the applicant as the principal residence. A credit application related to a vacation home or a rental unit is not covered. In the case of a two- to four-unit dwelling, the application is covered if the applicant intends to occupy one of the units as a principal residence.

3. Temporary financing. An application for temporary financing to construct a dwelling is not subject to § 202.13. But an application for both a temporary loan to finance construction of a dwelling and a permanent mortgage loan to take effect upon the completion of construction is subject to § 202.13.

4. New principal residence. A person can have only one principal residence at a time. However, if a person buys or builds a new dwelling that will become that person's principal residence within a year or upon completion of construction, the new dwelling is considered the principal residence for purposes of § 202.13.

5. Transactions not covered. The information-collection requirements of this section apply to applications for credit primarily for the purchase or refinancing of a dwelling that is or will become the applicant's principal residence.

Therefore, applications for credit secured by the applicant's principal residence but made primarily for a purpose other than the purchase or refinancing of the principal residence (such as loans for home improvement and debt consolidation) are not subject to the information-collection requirements. An application for an open-end home equity line of credit is not subject to this section unless it is readily apparent to the creditor when the application is taken that the primary purpose of the line is for the purchase or refinancing of a principal dwelling.

6. Refinancings. A refinancing occurs when an existing obligation is satisfied and replaced by a new obligation undertaken by the same borrower. A creditor that receives an application to refinance an existing extension of credit made by that creditor for the purchase of the applicant's dwelling may request the monitoring information again but is not required to do so if it was obtained in the earlier transaction.

7. Data collection under Regulation C. See comment 5(a)(2)-2.

13(b) Obtaining of information.

1. Forms for collecting data. A creditor may collect the information specified in § 202.13(a) either on an application form or on a separate form referring to the application. The applicant must be offered the option to select more than one racial designation.

2. Written applications. The regulation requires written applications for the types of credit covered by § 202.13. A creditor can satisfy this requirement by recording on paper or by means of computer the information that the applicant provides orally and that the creditor normally considers in a credit decision.

3. Telephone, mail applications.

i. A creditor that accepts an application by telephone or mail must request the monitoring information.

ii. A creditor that accepts an application by mail need not make a special request for the monitoring information if the applicant has failed to provide it on the application form returned to the creditor.

iii. If it is not evident on the face of an application that it was received by mail, telephone, or via an electronic medium, the creditor should indicate on the form or other application record how the application was received.

4. Video and other electronic-application processes.

i. If a creditor takes an application through an electronic medium that allows the creditor to see the applicant, the creditor must treat the application as taken in person. The creditor must note the monitoring information on the basis of visual observation or surname, if the applicant chooses not to provide the information.

ii. If an applicant applies through an electronic medium without video capability, the creditor treats the application as if it were received by mail.

5. Applications through loan-shopping services. When a creditor receives an application through an unaffiliated loan-shopping service, it does not have to request the monitoring information for purposes of the ECOA or Regulation B. Creditors subject to the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act should be aware, however, that data collection may be called for under Regulation C (12 CFR part 203), which generally requires creditors to report, among other things, the sex and race of an applicant on brokered applications or applications received through a correspondent.

6. Inadvertent notation. If a creditor inadvertently obtains the monitoring information in a dwelling-related transaction not covered by § 202.13, the creditor may process and retain the application without violating the regulation.

13(c) Disclosure to applicants.

1. Procedures for providing disclosures. The disclosure to an applicant regarding the monitoring information may be provided in writing. Appendix B contains a sample disclosure. A creditor may devise its own disclosure so long as it is substantially similar. The creditor need not orally request the monitoring information if it is requested in writing.

13(d) Substitute monitoring program.

1. Substitute program. An enforcement agency may adopt, under its established rulemaking or enforcement procedures, a program requiring creditors under its jurisdiction to collect information in addition to information required by this section.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.14

§ 202.14 Rules on Providing Appraisal Reports

14(a) Providing appraisals.

1. Coverage. This section covers applications for credit to be secured by a lien on a dwelling, as that term is defined in § 202.14(c), whether the credit is for a business purpose (for example, a loan to start a business) or a consumer purpose (for example, a loan to finance a child's education).

2. Renewals. This section applies when an applicant requests the renewal of an existing extension of credit and the creditor obtains a new appraisal report. This section does not apply when a creditor uses the appraisal report previously obtained to evaluate the renewal request.

14(a)(2)(i) Notice.

1. Multiple applicants. When an application that is subject to this section involves more than one applicant, the notice about the appraisal report need only be given to one applicant, but it must be given to the primary applicant where one is readily apparent.

14(a)(2)(ii) Delivery.

1. Reimbursement. Creditors may charge for photocopy and postage costs incurred in providing a copy of the appraisal report, unless prohibited by state or other law. If the consumer has already paid for the report -- for example, as part of an application fee -- the creditor may not require additional fees for the appraisal (other than photocopy and postage costs).

14(c) Definitions.

1. Appraisal reports. Examples of appraisal reports are:

i. A report prepared by an appraiser (whether or not licensed or certified), including written comments and other documents submitted to the creditor in support of the appraiser's estimate or opinion of the property's value.

ii. A document prepared by the creditor's staff that assigns value to the property, if a third-party appraisal report has not been used.

ii. An internal review document reflecting that the creditor's valuation is different from a valuation in a third party's appraisal report (or different from valuations that are publicly available or valuations such as manufacturers' invoices for mobile homes).

2. Other reports. The term "appraisal report" does not cover all documents relating to the value of the applicant's property. Examples of reports not covered are:

i. Internal documents, if a third-party appraisal report was used to establish the value of the property.

ii. Governmental agency statements of appraised value.

iii. Valuations lists that are publicly available (such as published sales prices or mortgage amounts, tax assessments, and retail price ranges) and valuations such as manufacturers' invoices for mobile homes.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 202 Official Staff Interpretations to Regulation B

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 202.15

§ 202.15 Incentives for Self-Testing and Self-Correction

15(a) General rules.

15(a)(1) Voluntary self-testing and correction.

1. Activities required by any governmental authority are not voluntary self-tests. A governmental authority includes both administrative and judicial authorities for federal, state, and local governments.

15(a)(2) Corrective action required.

1. To qualify for the privilege, appropriate corrective action is required when the results of a self-test show that it is more likely than not that there has been a violation of the ECOA or this regulation. A self-test is also privileged when it identifies no violations.

2. In some cases, the issue of whether certain information is privileged may arise before the self-test is complete or corrective actions are fully under way. This would not necessarily prevent a creditor from asserting the privilege. In situations where the self-test is not complete, for the privilege to apply the lender must satisfy the regulation's requirements within a reasonable period of time. To assert the privilege where the self-test shows a likely violation, the rule requires, at a minimum, that the creditor establish a plan for corrective action and a method to demonstrate progress in implementing the plan. Creditors must take appropriate corrective action on a timely basis after the results of the self-test are known.

3. A creditor's determination about the type of corrective action needed, or a finding that no corrective action is required, is not conclusive in determining whether the requirements of this paragraph have been satisfied. If a creditor's claim of privilege is challenged, an assessment of the need for corrective action or the type of corrective action that is appropriate must be based on a review of the self-testing results, which may require an in camera inspection of the privileged documents.

15(a)(3) Other privileges.

1. A creditor may assert the privilege established under this section in addition to asserting any other privilege that may apply, such as the attorney-client privilege or the work-product privilege. Self-testing data may be privileged under this section whether or not the creditor's assertion of another privilege is upheld.

15(b) Self-test defined.

15(b)(1) Definition.

Paragraph 15(b)(1)(i)

1. To qualify for the privilege, a self-test must be sufficient to constitute a determination of the extent or effectiveness of the creditor's compliance with the Act and Regulation B. Accordingly, a self-test is only privileged if it was designed and used for that purpose. A self-test that is designed or used to determine compliance with other laws or regulations or for other purposes is not privileged under this rule. For example, a self-test designed to evaluate employee efficiency or customers' satisfaction with the level of service provided by the creditor is not privileged even if evidence of discrimination is uncovered incidentally. If a self-test is designed for multiple purposes, only the portion designed to determine compliance with the ECOA is eligible for the privilege.

Paragraph 15(b)(1)(ii)

1. The principal attribute of self-testing is that it constitutes a voluntary undertaking by the creditor to produce new data or factual information that otherwise would not be available and could not be derived from loan or application files or other records related to credit transactions. Self-testing includes, but is not limited to, the practice of using fictitious applicants for credit (testers), either with or without the use of matched pairs. A creditor may elect to test a defined segment of its business, for example, loan applications processed by a specific branch or loan officer, or applications made for a particular type of credit or loan program. A creditor also may use other methods of generating information that is not available in loan and application files, such as surveying mortgage loan applicants. To the extent permitted by law, creditors might also develop new methods that go beyond traditional pre-application testing, such as hiring testers to submit fictitious loan applications for processing.

2. The privilege does not protect a creditor's analysis performed as part of processing or underwriting a credit application. A creditor's evaluation or analysis of its loan files, Home Mortgage Disclosure Act data, or similar types of records (such as broker or loan officer compensation records) does not produce new information about a creditor's compliance and is not a self-test for purposes of this section. Similarly, a statistical analysis of data derived from existing loan files is not privileged.

15(b)(3) Types of information not privileged.

Paragraph 15(b)(3)(i)

1. The information listed in this paragraph is not privileged and may be used to determine whether the prerequisites for the privilege have been satisfied. Accordingly, a creditor might be asked to identify the self-testing method, for example, whether preapplication testers were used or data were compiled by surveying loan applicants. Information about the scope of the self-test (such as the types of credit transactions examined, or the geographic area covered by the test) also is not privileged.

Paragraph 15(b)(3)(ii)

1. Property appraisal reports, minutes of loan committee meetings or other documents reflecting the basis for a decision to approve or deny an application, loan policies or procedures, underwriting standards, and broker compensation records are examples of the types of records that are not privileged. If a creditor arranges for testers to submit loan applications for processing, the records are not related to actual credit transactions for purposes of this paragraph and may be privileged self-testing records.

15(c) Appropriate corrective action.

1. The rule only addresses the corrective actions required for a creditor to take advantage of the privilege in this section. A creditor may be required to take other actions or provide additional relief if a formal finding of discrimination is made.

15(c)(1) General requirement.

1. Appropriate corrective action is required even though no violation has been formally adjudicated or admitted by the creditor. In determining whether it is more likely than not that a violation occurred, a creditor must treat testers as if they are actual applicants for credit. A creditor may not refuse to take appropriate corrective action under this section because the self-test used fictitious loan applicants. The fact that a tester's agreement with the creditor waives the tester's legal right to assert a violation does not eliminate the requirement for the creditor to take corrective action, although no remedial relief for the tester is required under paragraph 15(c)(3).

15(c)(2) Determining the scope of appropriate corrective action.

1. Whether a creditor has taken or is taking corrective action that is appropriate will be determined on a case-by-case basis. Generally, the scope of the corrective action that is needed to preserve the privilege is governed by the scope of the self-test. For example, a creditor that self-tests mortgage loans and discovers evidence of discrimination may focus its corrective actions on mortgage loans, and is not required to expand its testing to other types of loans.

2. In identifying the policies or practices that are a likely cause of the violation, a creditor might identify inadequate or improper lending policies, failure to implement established policies, employee conduct, or other causes. The extent and scope of a likely violation may be assessed by determining which areas of operations are likely to be affected by those policies and practices, for example, by determining the types of loans and stages of the application process involved and the branches or offices where the violations may have occurred.

3. Depending on the method and scope of the self-test and the results of the test, appropriate corrective action may include one or more of the following:

i. If the self-test identifies individuals whose applications were inappropriately processed, offering to extend credit if the application was improperly denied and compensating such persons for out-of-pocket costs and other compensatory damages;

ii. Correcting institutional policies or procedures that may have contributed to the likely violation, and adopting new policies as appropriate;

iii. Identifying and then training and/or disciplining the employees involved;

iv. Developing outreach programs, marketing strategies, or loan products to serve more effectively segments of the lender's markets that may have been affected by the likely discrimination; and

v. Improving audit and oversight systems to avoid a recurrence of the likely violations.

15(c)(3) Types of relief.

Paragraph 15(c)(3)(ii)

1. The use of pre-application testers to identify policies and practices that illegally discriminate does not require creditors to review existing loan files for the purpose of identifying and compensating applicants who might have been adversely affected.

2. If a self-test identifies a specific applicant who was discriminated against on a prohibited basis, to qualify for the privilege in this section the creditor must provide appropriate remedial relief to that applicant; the creditor is not required to identify other applicants who might also have been adversely affected.

Paragraph 15(c)(3)(iii)

1. A creditor is not required to provide remedial relief to an applicant that would not be available by law. An applicant might also be ineligible for certain types of relief due to changed circumstances. For example, a creditor is not required to offer credit to a denied applicant if the applicant no longer qualifies for the credit due to a change in financial circumstances, although some other type of relief might be appropriate.

15(d)(1) Scope of privilege.

1. The privilege applies with respect to any examination, investigation or proceeding by federal, state, or local government agencies relating to compliance with the Act or this regulation. Accordingly, in a case brought under the ECOA, the privilege established under this section preempts any inconsistent laws or court rules to the extent they might require disclosure of privileged self-testing data. The privilege does not apply in other cases (such as in litigation filed solely under a state's fair lending statute). In such cases, if a court orders a creditor to disclose self-test results, the disclosure is not a voluntary disclosure or waiver of the privilege for purposes of paragraph 15(d)(2); a creditor may protect the information by seeking a protective order to limit availability and use of the self-testing data and prevent dissemination beyond what is necessary in that case. Paragraph 15(d)(1) precludes a party who has obtained privileged information from using it in a case brought under the ECOA, provided the creditor has not lost the privilege through voluntary disclosure under paragraph 15(d)(2).

15(d)(2) Loss of privilege.

Paragraph 15(d)(2)(i)

1. A creditor's corrective action, by itself, is not considered a voluntary disclosure of the self-test report or results. For example, a creditor does not disclose the results of a self-test merely by offering to extend credit to a denied applicant or by inviting the applicant to reapply for credit. Voluntary disclosure could occur under this paragraph, however, if the creditor disclosed the self-test results in connection with a new offer of credit.

2. The disclosure of self-testing results to an independent contractor acting as an auditor or consultant for the creditor on compliance matters does not result in loss of the privilege.

Paragraph 15(d)(2)(ii)

1. The privilege is lost if the creditor discloses privileged information, such as the results of the self-test. The privilege is not lost if the creditor merely reveals or refers to the existence of the self-test.

Paragraph 15(d)(2)(iii)

1. A creditor's claim of privilege may be challenged in a court or administrative law proceeding with appropriate jurisdiction. In resolving the issue, the presiding officer may require the creditor to produce privileged information about the self-test.

Paragraph 15(d)(3) Limited use of privileged information

1. A creditor may be required to produce privileged documents for the purpose of determining a penalty or remedy after a violation of the ECOA or Regulation B has been formally adjudicated or admitted. A creditor's compliance with such a requirement does not evidence the creditor's intent to forfeit the privilege.

(d) Closed-end lease means a consumer lease other than an open-end lease as defined in this section.

(1) Consumer lease means a contract in the form of a bailment or lease for the use of personal property by a natural person primarily for personal, family, or household purposes, for a period exceeding four months and for a total contractual obligation not exceeding $25,000, whether or not the lessee has the option to purchase or otherwise become the owner of the property at the expiration of the lease. Unless the context indicates otherwise, in this part "lease" means "consumer lease."

(2) The term does not include a lease that meets the definition of a credit sale in Regulation Z (12 CFR 226.2(a)). It also does not include a lease for agricultural, business, or commercial purposes or a lease made to an organization.

(3) This part does not apply to a lease transaction of personal property which is incident to the lease of real property and which provides that:

(i) The lessee has no liability for the value of the personal property at the end of the lease term except for abnormal wear and tear; and

(ii) The lessee has no option to purchase the leased property.

(f) Gross capitalized cost means the amount agreed upon by the lessor and the lessee as the value of the leased property and any items that are capitalized or amortized during the lease term, including but not limited to taxes, insurance, service agreements, and any outstanding prior credit or lease balance. Capitalized cost reduction means the total amount of any rebate, cash payment, net trade-in allowance, and noncash credit that reduces the gross capitalized cost. The adjusted capitalized cost equals the gross capitalized cost less the capitalized cost reduction, and is the amount used by the lessor in calculating the base periodic payment.

(g) Lessee means a natural person who enters into or is offered a consumer lease.

(h) Lessor means a person who regularly leases, offers to lease, or arranges for the lease of personal property under a consumer lease. A person who has leased, offered, or arranged to lease personal property more than five times in the preceding calendar year or more than five times in the current calendar year is subject to the act and this part.

(i) Open-end lease means a consumer lease in which the lessee's liability at the end of the lease term is based on the difference between the residual value of the leased property and its realized value.

(j) Organization means a corporation, trust, estate, partnership, cooperative, association, or government entity or instrumentality.

(k) Person means a natural person or an organization.

(l) Personal property means any property that is not real property under the law of the state where the property is located at the time it is offered or made available for lease.

(m) Realized value means:

(1) The price received by the lessor for the leased property at disposition;

(2) The highest offer for disposition of the leased property; or

(3) The fair market value of the leased property at the end of the lease term.

(n) Residual value means the value of the leased property at the end of the lease term, as estimated or assigned at consummation by the lessor, used in calculating the base periodic payment.

(o) Security interest and security mean any interest in property that secures the payment or performance of an obligation.

(p) State means any state, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any territory or possession of the United States.

12 C.F.R. Part 213 REGULATION M--CONSUMER LEASING

§ 213.3 General disclosure requirements.

(a) General requirements. A lessor shall make the disclosures required by § 213.4, as applicable. The disclosures shall be made clearly and conspicuously in writing in a form the consumer may keep, in accordance with this section. The disclosures required by this part may be provided to the lessee in electronic form, subject to compliance with the consumer consent and other applicable provisions of the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-Sign Act) (15 U.S.C. § 7001 et seq.). For an advertisement accessed by the consumer in electronic form, the disclosures required by § 213.7 may be provided to the consumer in electronic form in the advertisement, without regard to the consumer consent or other provisions of the E-Sign Act.

(1) Form of disclosures. The disclosures required by § 213.4 shall be given to the lessee together in a dated statement that identifies the lessor and the lessee; the disclosures may be made either in a separate statement that identifies the consumer lease transaction or in the contract or other document evidencing the lease. Alternatively, the disclosures required to be segregated from other information under paragraph (a)(2) of this section may be provided in a separate dated statement that identifies the lease, and the other required disclosures may be provided in the lease contract or other document evidencing the lease. In a lease of multiple items, the property description required by § 213.4(a) may be given in a separate statement that is incorporated by reference in the disclosure statement required by this paragraph.

(2) Segregation of certain disclosures. The following disclosures shall be segregated from other information and shall contain only directly related information: §§ 213.4(b) through (f), (g)(2), (h)(3), (i)(1), (j), and (m)(1). The headings, content, and format for the disclosures referred to in this paragraph (a)(2) shall be provided in a manner substantially similar to the applicable model form in appendix A of this part.

(3) Timing of disclosures. A lessor shall provide the disclosures to the lessee prior to the consummation of a consumer lease.

(4) Language of disclosures. The disclosures required by § 213.4 may be made in a language other than English provided that they are made available in English upon the lessee's request.

(b) Additional information; nonsegregated disclosures. Additional information may be provided with any disclosure not listed in paragraph (a)(2) of this section, but it shall not be stated, used, or placed so as to mislead or confuse the lessee or contradict, obscure, or detract attention from any disclosure required by this part.

(c) Multiple lessors or lessees. When a transaction involves more than one lessor, the disclosures required by this part may be made by one lessor on behalf of all the lessors. When a lease involves more than one lessee, the lessor may provide the disclosures to any lessee who is primarily liable on the lease.

(d) Use of estimates. If an amount or other item needed to comply with a required disclosure is unknown or unavailable after reasonable efforts have been made to ascertain the information, the lessor may use a reasonable estimate that is based on the best information available to the lessor, is clearly identified as an estimate, and is not used to circumvent or evade any disclosures required by this part.

(e) Effect of subsequent occurrence. If a required disclosure becomes inaccurate because of an event occurring after consummation, the inaccuracy is not a violation of this part.

(f) Minor variations. A lessor may disregard the effects of the following in making disclosures:

(1) That payments must be collected in whole cents;

(2) That dates of scheduled payments may be different because a scheduled date is not a business day;

(3) That months have different numbers of days; and

(4) That February 29 occurs in a leap year.

CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 213 REGULATION M--CONSUMER LEASING

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 213.4

§ 213.4 Content of disclosures.

For any consumer lease subject to this part, the lessor shall disclose the following information, as applicable:

(a) Description of property. A brief description of the leased property sufficient to identify the property to the lessee and lessor.

(b) Amount due at lease signing or delivery. The total amount to be paid prior to or at consummation or by delivery, if delivery occurs after consummation, using the term "amount due at lease signing or delivery." The lessor shall itemize each component by type and amount, including any refundable security deposit, advance monthly or other periodic payment, and capitalized cost reduction; and in motor-vehicle leases, shall itemize how the amount due will be paid, by type and amount, including any net trade-in allowance, rebates, noncash credits, and cash payments in a format substantially similar to the model forms in appendix A of this part.

(c) Payment schedule and total amount of periodic payments. The number, amount, and due dates or periods of payments scheduled under the lease, and the total amount of the periodic payments.

(d) Other charges. The total amount of other charges payable to the lessor, itemized by type and amount, that are not included in the periodic payments. Such charges include the amount of any liability the lease imposes upon the lessee at the end of the lease term; the potential difference between the residual and realized values referred to in paragraph (k) of this section is excluded.

(e) Total of payments. The total of payments, with a description such as "the amount you will have paid by the end of the lease." This amount is the sum of the amount due at lease signing (less any refundable amounts), the total amount of periodic payments (less any portion of the periodic payment paid at lease signing), and other charges under paragraphs (b), (c), and (d) of this section. In an open-end lease, a description such as "you will owe an additional amount if the actual value of the vehicle is less than the residual value" shall accompany the disclosure.

(f) Payment calculation. In a motor-vehicle lease, a mathematical progression of how the scheduled periodic payment is derived, in a format substantially similar to the applicable model form in appendix A of this part, which shall contain the following:

(1) Gross capitalized cost. The gross capitalized cost, including a disclosure of the agreed upon value of the vehicle, a description such as "the agreed upon value of the vehicle [state the amount] and any items you pay for over the lease term (such as service contracts, insurance, and any outstanding prior credit or lease balance)," and a statement of the lessee's option to receive a separate written itemization of the gross capitalized cost. If requested by the lessee, the itemization shall be provided before consummation.

(2) Capitalized cost reduction. The capitalized cost reduction, with a description such as "the amount of any net trade-in allowance, rebate, noncash credit, or cash you pay that reduces the gross capitalized cost."

(3) Adjusted capitalized cost. The adjusted capitalized cost, with a description such as "the amount used in calculating your base [periodic] payment."

(4) Residual value. The residual value, with a description such as "the value of the vehicle at the end of the lease used in calculating your base [periodic] payment."

(5) Depreciation and any amortized amounts. The depreciation and any amortized amounts, which is the difference between the adjusted capitalized cost and the residual value, with a description such as "the amount charged for the vehicle's decline in value through normal use and for any other items paid over the lease term."

(6) Rent charge. The rent charge, with a description such as "the amount charged in addition to the depreciation and any amortized amounts." This amount is the difference between the total of the base periodic payments over the lease term minus the depreciation and any amortized amounts.

(7) Total of base periodic payments. The total of base periodic payments with a description such as "depreciation and any amortized amounts plus the rent charge."

(8) Lease payments. The lease payments with a description such as "the number of payments in your lease."

(9) Base periodic payment. The total of the base periodic payments divided by the number of payment periods in the lease.

(10) Itemization of other charges. An itemization of any other charges that are part of the periodic payment.

(11) Total periodic payment. The sum of the base periodic payment and any other charges that are part of the periodic payment.

(g) Early termination--

(1) Conditions and disclosure of charges. A statement of the conditions under which the lessee or lessor may terminate the lease prior to the end of the lease term; and the amount or a description of the method for determining the amount of any penalty or other charge for early termination, which must be reasonable.

(2) Early-termination notice. In a motor-vehicle lease, a notice substantially similar to the following: "Early Termination. You may have to pay a substantial charge if you end this lease early. The charge may be up to several thousand dollars. The actual charge will depend on when the lease is terminated. The earlier you end the lease, the greater this charge is likely to be."

(h) Maintenance responsibilities. The following provisions are required:

(1) Statement of responsibilities. A statement specifying whether the lessor or the lessee is responsible for maintaining or servicing the leased property, together with a brief description of the responsibility;

(2) Wear and use standard. A statement of the lessor's standards for wear and use (if any), which must be reasonable; and

(3) Notice of wear and use standard. In a motor-vehicle lease, a notice regarding wear and use substantially similar to the following: "Excessive Wear and Use. You may be charged for excessive wear based on our standards for normal use." The notice shall also specify the amount or method for determining any charge for excess mileage.

(i) Purchase option. A statement of whether or not the lessee has the option to purchase the leased property, and:

(1) End of lease term. If at the end of the lease term, the purchase price; and

(2) During lease term. If prior to the end of the lease term, the purchase price or the method for determining the price and when the lessee may exercise this option.

(j) Statement referencing nonsegregated disclosures. A statement that the lessee should refer to the lease documents for additional information on early termination, purchase options and maintenance responsibilities, warranties, late and default charges, insurance, and any security interests, if applicable.

(k) Liability between residual and realized values. A statement of the lessee's liability, if any, at early termination or at the end of the lease term for the difference between the residual value of the leased property and its realized value.

(l) Right of appraisal. If the lessee's liability at early termination or at the end of the lease term is based on the realized value of the leased property, a statement that the lessee may obtain, at the lessee's expense, a professional appraisal by an independent third party (agreed to by the lessee and the lessor) of the value that could be realized at sale of the leased property. The appraisal shall be final and binding on the parties.

(m) Liability at end of lease term based on residual value. If the lessee is liable at the end of the lease term for the difference between the residual value of the leased property and its realized value:

(1) Rent and other charges. The rent and other charges, paid by the lessee and required by the lessor as an incident to the lease transaction, with a description such as "the total amount of rent and other charges imposed in connection with your lease [state the amount]."

(2) Excess liability. A statement about a rebuttable presumption that, at the end of the lease term, the residual value of the leased property is unreasonable and not in good faith to the extent that the residual value exceeds the realized value by more than three times the base monthly payment (or more than three times the average payment allocable to a monthly period, if the lease calls for periodic payments other than monthly); and that the lessor cannot collect the excess amount unless the lessor brings a successful court action and pays the lessee's reasonable attorney's fees, or unless the excess of the residual value over the realized value is due to unreasonable or excessive wear or use of the leased property (in which case the rebuttable presumption does not apply).

(3) Mutually agreeable final adjustment. A statement that the lessee and lessor are permitted, after termination of the lease, to make any mutually agreeable final adjustment regarding excess liability.

(n) Fees and taxes. The total dollar amount for all official and license fees, registration, title, or taxes required to be paid in connection with the lease.

(o) Insurance. A brief identification of insurance in connection with the lease including:

(1) Through the lessor. If the insurance is provided by or paid through the lessor, the types and amounts of coverage and the cost to the lessee; or

(2) Through a third party. If the lessee must obtain the insurance, the types and amounts of coverage required of the lessee.

(p) Warranties or guarantees. A statement identifying all express warranties and guarantees from the manufacturer or lessor with respect to the leased property that apply to the lessee.

(q) Penalties and other charges for delinquency. The amount or the method of determining the amount of any penalty or other charge for delinquency, default, or late payments, which must be reasonable.

(r) Security interest. A description of any security interest, other than a security deposit disclosed under paragraph (b) of this section, held or to be retained by the lessor; and a clear identification of the property to which the security interest relates.

(s) Limitations on rate information. If a lessor provides a percentage rate in an advertisement or in documents evidencing the lease transaction, a notice stating that "this percentage may not measure the overall cost of financing this lease" shall accompany the rate disclosure. The lessor shall not use the term "annual percentage rate," "annual lease rate," or any equivalent term.

(t) Non-motor vehicle open-end leases. Non-motor vehicle open-end leases remain subject to section 182(10) of the act regarding end of term liability.

Supp I to Part 213 Official Staff Commentary to Regulation M

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual CFR

§ CFR Introduction

1. Official status. The commentary in Supplement I is the vehicle by which the Division of Consumer and Community Affairs of the Federal Reserve Board issues official staff interpretations of Regulation M (12 CFR part 213). Good faith compliance with this commentary affords protection from liability under section 130(f) of the Truth in Lending Act (15 U.S.C. 1640(f)). Section 130(f) protects lessors from civil liability for any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any interpretation issued by a duly authorized official or employee of the Federal Reserve System.

2. Procedures for requesting interpretations. Under appendix C of Regulation M, anyone may request an official staff interpretation. Interpretations that are adopted will be incorporated in this commentary following publication in the Federal Register. No official staff interpretations are expected to be issued other than by means of this commentary.

3. Comment designations. Each comment in the commentary is identified by a number and the regulatory section or paragraph that it interprets. The comments are designated with as much specificity as possible according to the particular regulatory provision addressed. For example, some of the comments to § 213.4(f) are further divided by subparagraph, such as comment 4(f)(1)-1 and comment 4(f)(2)-1. In other cases, comments have more general application and are designated, for example, as comment 4(a)-1. This introduction may be cited as comments I-1 through I-4. An appendix may be cited as comment app. A-1.

4. Illustrations. Lists that appear in the commentary may be exhaustive or illustrative; the appropriate construction should be clear from the context. Illustrative lists are introduced by phrases such as "including," "such as," "to illustrate," and "for example."

§ 213.1 Authority, Scope, Purpose, and Enforcement

1. Foreign applicability. Regulation M applies to all persons (including branches of foreign banks or leasing companies located in the United States) that offer consumer leases to residents of any state (including foreign nationals) as defined in § 213.2(p). The regulation does not apply to a foreign branch of a U.S. bank or to a leasing company leasing to a U.S. citizen residing or visiting abroad or to a foreign national abroad.

§ 213.2 Definitions

2(b) Advertisement

1. Coverage. The term advertisement includes messages inviting, offering, or otherwise generally announcing to prospective customers the availability of consumer leases, whether in visual, oral, print or electronic media. Examples include:

i. Messages in newspapers, magazines, leaflets, catalogs, and fliers.

ii. Messages on radio, television, and public address systems.

iii. Direct mail literature.

iv. Printed material on any interior or exterior sign or display, in any window display, in any point-of-transaction literature or price tag that is delivered or made available to a lessee or prospective lessee in any manner whatsoever.

v. Telephone solicitations.

vi. On-line messages, such as those on the Internet.

2. Exclusions. The term does not apply to the following:

i. Direct personal contacts, including follow-up letters, cost estimates for individual lessees, or oral or written communications relating to the negotiation of a specific transaction.

ii. Informational material distributed only to businesses.

iii. Notices required by federal or state law, if the law mandates that specific information be displayed and only the mandated information is included in the notice.

iv. News articles controlled by the news medium.

v. Market research or educational materials that do not solicit business.

3. Persons covered. See the commentary to § 213.7(a).

2(d) Closed-End Lease

1. General. In closed-end leases, sometimes referred to as "walk-away" leases, the lessee is not responsible for the residual value of the leased property at the end of the lease term.

2(e) Consumer lease

1. Primary purposes. A lessor must determine in each case if the leased property will be used primarily for personal, family, or household purposes. If a question exists as to the primary purpose for a lease, the fact that a lessor gives disclosures is not controlling on the question of whether the transaction is covered. The primary purpose of a lease is determined before or at consummation and a lessor need not provide Regulation M disclosures where there is a subsequent change in the primary use.

2. Period of time. To be a consumer lease, the initial term of the lease must be more than four months. Thus, a lease of personal property for four months, three months or on a month-to-month or week-to-week basis (even though the lease actually extends beyond four months) is not a consumer lease and is not subject to the disclosure requirements of the regulation. However, a lease that imposes a penalty for not continuing the lease beyond four months is considered to have a term of more than four months. To illustrate:

i. A three-month lease extended on a month-to-month basis and terminated after one year is not subject to the regulation.

ii. A month-to-month lease with a penalty, such as the forfeiture of a security deposit for terminating before one year, is subject to the regulation.

3. Total contractual obligation. The total contractual obligation is not necessarily the same as the total of payments disclosed under § 213.4(e). The total contractual obligation includes nonrefundable amounts a lessee is contractually obligated to pay to the lessor, but excludes items such as:

i. Residual value amounts or purchase-option prices;

ii. Amounts collected by the lessor but paid to a third party, such as taxes, licenses, and registration fees.

4. Credit sale. The regulation does not cover a lease that meets the definition of a credit sale in Regulation Z, 12 CFR 226.2(a)(16), which is defined, in part, as a bailment or lease (unless terminable without penalty at any time by the consumer) under which the consumer:

i. Agrees to pay as compensation for use a sum substantially equivalent to, or in excess of, the total value of the property and services involved; and

ii. Will become (or has the option to become), for no additional consideration or for nominal consideration, the owner of the property upon compliance with the agreement.

5. Agricultural purpose. Agricultural purpose means a purpose related to the production, harvest, exhibition, marketing, transportation, processing, or manufacture of agricultural products by a natural person who cultivates, plants, propagates, or nurtures those agricultural products, including but not limited to the acquisition of personal property and services used primarily in farming. Agricultural products include horticultural, viticultural, and dairy products, livestock, wildlife, poultry, bees, forest products, fish and shellfish, and any products thereof, including processed and manufactured products, and any and all products raised or produced on farms and any processed or manufactured products thereof.

6. Organization or other entity. A consumer lease does not include a lease made to an organization such as a corporation or a government agency or instrumentality. Such a lease is not covered by the regulation even if the leased property is used (by an employee, for example) primarily for personal, family or household purposes, or is guaranteed by or subsequently assigned to a natural person.

7. Leases of personal property incidental to a service. The following leases of personal property are deemed incidental to a service and thus are not subject to the regulation:

i. Home entertainment systems requiring the consumer to lease equipment that enables a television to receive the transmitted programming.

ii. Security alarm systems requiring the installation of leased equipment intended to monitor unlawful entries into a home and in some cases to provide fire protection.

iii. Propane gas service where the consumer must lease a propane tank to receive the service.

8. Safe deposit boxes. The lease of a safe deposit box is not a consumer lease under § 213.2(e).

2(g) Lessee

1. Guarantors. Guarantors are not lessees for purposes of the regulation.

2(h) Lessor

1. Arranger of a lease. To "arrange" for the lease of personal property means to provide or offer to provide a lease that is or will be extended by another person under a business or other relationship pursuant to which the person arranging the lease (a) receives or will receive a fee, compensation, or other consideration for the service or (b) has knowledge of the lease terms and participates in the preparation of the contract documents required in connection with the lease. To illustrate:

i. An automobile dealer who, pursuant to a business relationship, completes the necessary lease agreement before forwarding it for execution to the leasing company (to whom the obligation is payable on its face) is "arranging" for the lease.

ii. An automobile dealer who, without receiving a fee for the service, refers a customer to a leasing company that will prepare all relevant contract documents is not "arranging" for the lease.

2. Consideration. The term "other consideration" as used in comment 2(h)-1 refers to an actual payment corresponding to a fee or similar compensation and not to intangible benefits, such as the advantage of increased business, which may flow from the relationship between the parties.

3. Assignees. An assignee may be a lessor for purposes of the regulation in circumstances where the assignee has substantial involvement in the lease transaction. See cf. Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Cenance, 452 U.S. 155 (1981) (held that an assignee was a creditor for purposes of the pre-1980 Truth in Lending Act and Regulation Z because of its substantial involvement in the credit transaction).

4. Multiple lessors. See the commentary to § 213.3(c).

2(j) Organization

1. Coverage. The term "organization" includes joint ventures and persons operating under a business name.

2(l) Personal Property

1. Coverage. Whether property is personal property depends on state or other applicable law. For example, a mobile home or houseboat may be considered personal property in one state but real property in another.

2(m) Realized Value

1. General. Realized value refers to either the retail or wholesale value of the leased property at early termination or at the end of the lease term. It is not a required disclosure. Realized value is relevant only to leases in which the lessee's liability at early termination or at the end of the lease term typically is based on the difference between the residual value (or the adjusted lease balance) of the leased property and its realized value.

2. Options. Subject to the contract and to state or other applicable law, the lessor may calculate the realized value in determining the lessee's liability at the end of the lease term or at early termination in one of the three ways stated in § 213.2(m). If the lessor sells the property prior to making the determination about liability, the price received for the property (or the fair market value) is the realized value. If the lessor does not sell the property prior to making that determination, the highest offer or the fair market value is the realized value.

3. Determination of realized value. Disposition charges are not subtracted in determining the realized value but amounts attributable to taxes may be subtracted.

4. Offers. In determining the highest offer for disposition, the lessor may disregard offers that an offeror has withdrawn or is unable or unwilling to perform.

5. Lessor's appraisal. See commentary to § 213.4(l).

2(o) Security Interest and Security

1. Disclosable interests. For purposes of disclosure, a security interest is an interest taken by the lessor to secure performance of the lessee's obligation. For example, if a bank that is not a lessor makes a loan to a leasing company and takes assignments of consumer leases generated by that company to secure the loan, the bank's security interest in the lessor's receivables is not a security interest for purposes of this regulation.

2. General coverage. An interest the lessor may have in leased property must be disclosed only if it is considered a security interest under state or other applicable law. The term includes, but is not limited to, security interests under the Uniform Commercial Code; real property mortgages, deeds of trust, and other consensual or confessed liens whether or not recorded; mechanic's, materialman's, artisan's, and other similar liens; vendor's liens in both real and personal property; liens on property arising by operation of law; and any interest in a lease when used to secure payment or performance of an obligation.

3. Insurance exception. The lessor's right to insurance proceeds or unearned insurance premiums is not a security interest for purposes of this regulation.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 213 Official Staff Commentary to Regulation M

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 213.3

§ 213.3 General Disclosure Requirements

3(a) General Requirements

1. Basis of disclosures. Disclosures must reflect the terms of the legal obligation between the parties. For example:

i. In a three-year lease with no penalty for termination after a one-year minimum term, disclosures are based on the full three-year term of the lease. The one-year minimum term is only relevant to the early termination provisions of §§ 213.4 (g)(1), (k) and (l).

2. Clear and conspicuous standard. The clear and conspicuous standard requires that disclosures be reasonably understandable. For example, the disclosures must be presented in a way that does not obscure the relationship of the terms to each other; appendix A of this part contains model forms that meet this standard. In addition, although no minimum typesize is required, the disclosures must be legible, whether typewritten, handwritten, or printed by computer.

3. Multipurpose disclosure forms. A lessor may use a multipurpose disclosure form provided the lessor is able to designate the specific disclosures applicable to a given transaction, consistent with the requirement that disclosures be clearly and conspicuously provided.

4. Number of transactions. Lessors have flexibility in handling lease transactions that may be viewed as multiple transactions. For example:

i. When a lessor leases two items to the same lessee on the same day, the lessor may disclose the leases as either one or two lease transactions.

ii. When a lessor sells insurance or other incidental services in connection with a lease, the lessor may disclose in one of two ways: as a single lease transaction (in which case Regulation M, not Regulation Z, disclosures are required) or as a lease transaction and a credit transaction.

iii. When a lessor includes an outstanding lease or credit balance in a lease transaction, the lessor may disclose the outstanding balance as part of a single lease transaction (in which case Regulation M, not Regulation Z, disclosures are required) or as a lease transaction and a credit transaction.

3(a)(1) Form of Disclosures

1. Cross-references. Lessors may include in the nonsegregated disclosures a cross-reference to items in the segregated disclosures rather than repeat those items. A lessor may include in the segregated disclosures numeric or alphabetic designations as cross-references to related information so long as such references do not obscure or detract from the segregated disclosures.

2. Identification of parties. While disclosures must be made clearly and conspicuously, lessors are not required to use the word "lessor" and "lessee" to identify the parties to the lease transaction.

3. Lessor's address. The lessor must be identified by name; an address (and telephone number) may be provided.

4. Multiple lessors and lessees. In transactions involving multiple lessors and multiple lessees, a single lessor may make all the disclosures to a single lessee as long as the disclosure statement identifies all the lessors and lessees.

5. Lessee's signature. The regulation does not require that the lessee sign the disclosure statement, whether disclosures are separately provided or are part of the lease contract. Nevertheless, to provide evidence that disclosures are given before a lessee becomes obligated on the lease transaction, the lessor may, for example, ask the lessee to sign the disclosure statement or an acknowledgement of receipt, may place disclosures that are included in the lease documents above the lessee's signature, or include instructions alerting a lessee to read the disclosures prior to signing the lease.

3(a)(2) Segregation of Certain Disclosures

1. Location. The segregated disclosures referred to in § 213.3(a)(2) may be provided on a separate document and the other required disclosures may be provided in the lease contract, so long as all disclosures are given at the same time. Alternatively, all disclosures may be provided in a separate document or in the lease contract.

2. Additional information among segregated disclosures. The disclosures required to be segregated may contain only the information required or permitted to be included among the segregated disclosures.

3. Substantially similar. See commentary to appendix A of this part.

3(a)(3) Timing of Disclosures

1. Consummation. When a contractual relationship is created between the lessor and the lessee is a matter to be determined under state or other applicable law.

3(b) Additional Information; Nonsegregated Disclosures 1. State law disclosures. A lessor may include in the nonsegregated disclosures any state law disclosures that are not inconsistent with the act and regulation under § 213.9 as long as, in accordance with the standard set forth in § 213.3(b) for additional information, the state law disclosures are not used or placed to mislead or confuse or detract from any disclosure required by the regulation.

3(c) Multiple Lessors or Lessees

1. Multiple lessors. If a single lessor provides disclosures to a lessee on behalf of several lessors, all disclosures for the transaction must be given, even if the lessor making the disclosures would not otherwise have been obligated to make a particular disclosure.

3(d) Use of Estimates

3(d)(1) Standard

1. Time of estimated disclosure. The lessor may, after making a reasonable effort to obtain information, use estimates to make disclosures if necessary information is unknown or unavailable at the time the disclosures are made.

2. Basis of estimates. Estimates must be made on the basis of the best information reasonably available at the time disclosures are made. The "reasonably available" standard requires that the lessor, acting in good faith, exercise due diligence in obtaining information. The lessor may rely on the representations of other parties. For example, the lessor might look to the consumer to determine the purpose for which leased property will be used, to insurance companies for the cost of insurance, or to an automobile manufacturer or dealer for the date of delivery. See commentary to § 213.4(n) for estimating official fees and taxes.

3. Residual value of leased property at termination. In an open-end lease where the lessee's liability at the end of the lease term is based on the residual value of the leased property as determined at consummation, the estimate of the residual value must be reasonable and based on the best information reasonably available to the lessor (see § 213.4(m)). A lessor should generally use an accepted trade publication listing estimated current or future market prices for the leased property unless other information or a reasonable belief based on its experience provides the better information. For example:

i. An automobile lessor offering a three-year open-end lease assigns a wholesale value to the vehicle at the end of the lease term. The lessor may disclose as an estimate a wholesale value derived from a generally accepted trade publication listing current wholesale values.

ii. Same facts as above, except that the lessor discloses an estimated value derived by adjusting the residual value quoted in the trade publication because, in its experience, the trade publication values either understate or overstate the prices actually received in local used-vehicle markets. The lessor may adjust estimated values quoted in trade publications if the lessor reasonably believes based on its experience that the values are understated or overstated.

4. Retail or wholesale value. The lessor may choose either a retail or a wholesale value in estimating the value of leased property at termination of an open-end lease provided the choice is consistent with the lessor's general practice when determining the value of the property at the end of the lease term. The lessor should indicate whether the value disclosed is a retail or wholesale value.

5. Labelling estimates. Generally, only the disclosure for which the exact information is unknown is labelled as an estimate. Nevertheless, when several disclosures are affected because of the unknown information, the lessor has the option of labelling as an estimate every affected disclosure or only the disclosure primarily affected.

3(e) Effect of Subsequent Occurrence

1. Subsequent occurrences. Examples of subsequent occurrences include:

i. An agreement between the lessee and lessor to change from a monthly to a weekly payment schedule.

ii. An increase in official fees or taxes.

iii. An increase in insurance premiums or coverage caused by a change in the law.

iv. Late delivery of an automobile caused by a strike.

2. Redisclosure. When a disclosure becomes inaccurate because of a subsequent occurrence, the lessor need not make new disclosures unless new disclosures are required under § 213.5.

3. Lessee's failure to perform. The lessor does not violate the regulation if a previously given disclosure becomes inaccurate when a lessee fails to perform obligations under the contract and a lessor takes actions that are necessary and proper in such circumstances to protect its interest. For example, the addition of insurance or a security interest by the lessor because the lessee has not performed obligations contracted for in the lease is not a violation of the regulation.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 213 Official Staff Commentary to Regulation M

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 213.4

§ 213.4 Content of Disclosures

4(a) Description of Property

1. Placement of description. Although the description of leased property may not be included among the segregated disclosures, a lessor may choose to place the description directly above the segregated disclosures.

4(b) Amount Due at Lease Signing or Delivery

1. Consummation. See commentary to § 213.3(a)(3).

2. Capitalized cost reduction. A capitalized cost reduction is a payment in the nature of a downpayment on the leased property that reduces the amount to be capitalized over the term of the lease. This amount does not include any amounts included in a periodic payment paid at lease signing or delivery.

3. "Negative" equity trade-in allowance. If an amount owed on a prior lease or credit balance exceeds the agreed upon value of a trade-in, the difference is not reflected as a negative trade-in allowance under § 213.4(b). The lessor may disclose the trade-in allowance as zero or not applicable, or may leave a blank line.

4. Rebates. Only rebates applied toward an amount due at lease signing or delivery are required to be disclosed under § 213.4(b).

5. Balance sheet approach. In motor-vehicle leases, the total for the column labeled "total amount due at lease signing or delivery" must equal the total for the column labeled "how the amount due at lease signing or delivery will be paid."

6. Amounts to be paid in cash. The term cash is intended to include payments by check or other payment methods in addition to currency; however, a lessor may add a line item under the column "how the amount due at lease signing or delivery will be paid" for non-currency payments such as credit cards.

4(c) Payment Schedule and Total Amount of Periodic Payments

1. Periodic payments. The phrase "number, amount, and due dates or periods of payments" requires the disclosure of all payments that are made at regular or irregular intervals and generally derived from rent, capitalized or amortized amounts such as depreciation, and other amounts that are collected by the lessor at the same interval(s), including, for example, taxes, maintenance, and insurance charges. Other periodic payments may, but need not, be disclosed under § 213.4(c).

4(d) Other charges

1. Coverage. Section 213.4(d) requires the disclosure of charges that are anticipated by the parties incident to the normal operation of the lease agreement. If a lessor is unsure whether a particular fee is an "other charge," the lessor may disclose the fee as such without violating § 213.4(d) or the segregation rule under § 213.3(a)(2).

2. Excluded charges. This section does not require disclosure of charges that are imposed when the lessee terminates early, fails to abide by, or modifies the terms of the existing lease agreement, such as charges for:

i. Late payment.

ii. Default.

iii. Early termination.

iv. Deferral of payments.

v. Extension of the lease.

3. Third-party fees and charges. Third-party fees or charges collected by the lessor on behalf of third parties, such as taxes, are not disclosed under § 213.4(d).

4. Relationship to other provisions. The other charges mentioned in this paragraph are charges that are not required to be disclosed under some other provision of § 213.4. To illustrate:

i. The price of a mechanical breakdown protection (MBP) contract is sometimes disclosed as an "other charge." Nevertheless, the price of MBP is sometimes reflected in the periodic payment disclosure under § 213.4(c) or in states where MBP is regarded as insurance, the cost is be disclosed in accordance with § 213.4(o).

5. Lessee's liabilities at the end of the lease term. Liabilities that the lessor imposes upon the lessee at the end of the scheduled lease term and that must be disclosed under § 213.4(d) include disposition and "pick-up" charges.

6. Optional "disposition" charges. Disposition and similar charges that are anticipated by the parties as an incident to the normal operation of the lease agreement must be disclosed under § 213.4(d). If, under a lease agreement, a lessee may return leased property to various locations, and the lessor charges a disposition fee depending upon the location chosen, under § 213.4(d), the lessor must disclose the highest amount charged. In such circumstances, the lessor may also include a brief explanation of the fee structure in the segregated disclosure. For example, if no fee or a lower fee is imposed for returning a leased vehicle to the originating dealer as opposed to another location, that fact may be disclosed. By contrast, if the terms of the lease treat the return of the leased property to a location outside the lessor's service area as a default, the fee imposed is not disclosed as an "other charge," although it may be required to be disclosed under § 213.4(q).

4(e) Total of payments

1. Open-end lease. The additional statement is required under § 213.4(e) for open-end leases because, with some limitations, a lessee is liable at the end of the lease term for the difference between the residual and realized values of the leased property.

4(f) Payment Calculation

1. Motor-vehicle lease. Whether leased property is a motor vehicle is determined by state or other applicable law.

2. Multiple-items. If a lease transaction involves multiple items of leased property, one of which is not a motor vehicle under state law, at their option, lessors may include all items in the disclosures required under § 213.4(f). See comment 3(a)-4 regarding disclosure of multiple transactions.

4(f)(1) Gross Capitalized Cost

1. Agreed upon value of the vehicle. The agreed upon value of a motor vehicle includes the amount of capitalized items such as charges for vehicle accessories and options, and delivery or destination charges. The lessor may also include taxes and fees for title, licenses, and registration that are capitalized. Charges for service or maintenance contracts, insurance products, guaranteed automobile protection, or an outstanding balance on a prior lease or credit transaction are not included in the agreed upon value.

2. Itemization of the gross capitalized cost. The lessor may choose to provide the itemization of the gross capitalized cost only on request or may provide the itemization as a matter of course. In the latter case, the lessor need not provide a statement of the lessee's option to receive an itemization. The gross capitalized cost must be itemized by type and amount. The lessor may include in the itemization an identification of the items and amounts of some or all of the items contained in the agreed upon value of the vehicle. The itemization must be provided at the same time as the other disclosures required by § 213.4, but it may not be included among the segregated disclosures.

4(f)(7) Total of Base Periodic Payment

1. Accuracy of disclosure. If the periodic payment calculation under § 213.4(f) has been calculated correctly, the amount disclosed under § 213.4(f)(7) -- the total of base periodic payments -- is correct for disclosure purposes even if that amount differs from the base periodic payment disclosed under § 213.4(f)(9) multiplied by the number of lease payments disclosed under § 213.4(f)(8), when the difference is due to rounding.

4(f)(8) Lease Payment

1. Lease Term. The lease term may be disclosed among the segregated disclosures.

4(g) Early Termination

4(g)(1) Conditions and Disclosure of Charges

1. Reasonableness of charges. See the commentary to § 213.4(q).

2. Description of the method. Section 213.4(g)(1) requires a full description of the method of determining an early termination charge. The lessor should attempt to provide consumers with clear and understandable descriptions of its early termination charges. Descriptions that are full, accurate, and not intended to be misleading will comply with § 213.4(g)(1), even if the descriptions are complex. In providing a full description of an early termination method, a lessor may use the name of a generally accepted method of computing the unamortized cost portion (also known as the "adjusted lease balance") of its early termination charges. For example, a lessor may state that the "constant yield" method will be utilized in obtaining the adjusted lease balance, but must specify how that figure, and any other term or figure, is used in computing the total early termination charge imposed upon the consumer. Additionally, if a lessor refers to a named method in this manner, the lessor must provide a written explanation of that method if requested by the consumer. The lessor has the option of providing the explanation as a matter of course in the lease documents or on a separate document.

3. Timing of written explanation of a named method. While a lessor may provide an address or telephone number for the consumer to request a written explanation of the named method used to calculate the adjusted leased balance, if at consummation a consumer requests such an explanation, the lessor must provide a written explanation at that time. If a consumer requests an explanation after consummation, the lessor must provide a written explanation within a reasonable time after the request is made.

4. Default. When default is a condition for early termination of a lease, default charges must be disclosed under § 213.4(g)(1). See the commentary to § 213.4(q).

5. Lessee's liability at early termination. When the lessee is liable for the difference between the unamortized cost and the realized value at early termination, the method of determining the amount of the difference must be disclosed under § 213.4(g)(1).

4(h) Maintenance Responsibilities

1. Standards for wear and use. No disclosure is required if a lessor does not set standards or impose charges for wear and use (such as excess mileage).

4(i) Purchase Option

1. Mandatory disclosure of no purchase option. Generally the lessor need only make the specific required disclosures that apply to a transaction. In the case of a purchase option disclosure, however, a lessor must disclose affirmatively that the lessee has no option to purchase the leased property if the purchase option is inapplicable.

2. Existence of purchase option. Whether a purchase option exists under the lease is determined by state or other applicable law. The lessee's right to submit a bid to purchase property at termination of the lease is not an option to purchase under § 213.4(i) if the lessor is not required to accept the lessee's bid and the lessee does not receive preferential treatment.

3. Purchase-option fee. A purchase-option fee is disclosed under § 213.4(i), not § 213.4(d). The fee may be separately itemized or disclosed as part of the purchase-option price.

4. Official fees and taxes. Official fees such as those for taxes, licenses, and registration charged in connection with the exercise of a purchase option may be disclosed under § 213.4(i) as part of the purchase-option price (with or without a reference to their inclusion in that price) or may be separately disclosed and itemized by category. Alternatively, a lessor may provide a statement indicating that the purchase-option price does not include fees for tags, taxes, and registration.

5. Purchase-option price. Lessors must disclose the purchase-option price as a sum certain or as a sum certain to be determined at a future date by reference to a readily available independent source. The reference should provide sufficient information so that the lessee will be able to determine the actual price when the option becomes available. Statements of a purchase price as the "negotiated price" or the "fair market value" do not comply with the requirements of § 213.4(i).

4(j) Statement referencing nonsegregated disclosures

1. Content. A lessor may delete inapplicable items from the disclosure. For example, if a lease contract does not include a security interest, the reference to a security interest may be omitted.

4(l) Right of appraisal

1. Disclosure inapplicable. The lessee does not have the right to an independent appraisal merely because the lessee is liable at the end of the lease term or at early termination for unreasonable wear or use. Thus, the disclosure under § 213.4(l) does not apply. For example:

i. The automobile lessor might expect a lessee to return an undented car with four good tires at the end of the lease term. Even though it may hold the lessee liable for the difference between a dented car with bald tires and the value of a car in reasonably good repair, the disclosure under § 213.4(l) is not required.

2. Lessor's appraisal. If the lessor obtains an appraisal of the leased property to determine its realized value, that appraisal does not suffice for purposes of section 183(c) of the act; the lessor must disclose the lessee's right to an independent appraisal under § 213.4(l).

3. Retail or wholesale. In providing the disclosures in § 213.4(l), a lessor must indicate whether the wholesale or retail appraisal value will be used.

4. Time restriction on appraisal. The regulation does not specify a time period in which the lessee must exercise the appraisal right. The lessor may require a lessee to obtain the appraisal within a reasonable time after termination of the lease.

4(m) Liability at end of Lease Term Based on Residual Value

1. Open-end leases. Section 213.4(m) applies only to open-end leases.

2. Lessor's payment of attorney's fees. Section 183(a) of the act requires that the lessor pay the lessee's attorney's fees in all actions under § 213.4(m), whether successful or not.

4(m)(1) Rent and other charges

1. General. This disclosure is intended to represent the cost of financing an open-end lease based on charges and fees that the lessor requires the lessee to pay. Examples of disclosable charges, in addition to the rent charge, include acquisition, disposition, or assignment fees. Charges imposed by a third party whose services are not required by the lessor (such as official fees and voluntary insurance) are not included in the § 213.4(m)(1) disclosure.

4(m)(2) Excess liability

1. Coverage. The disclosure limiting the lessee's liability for the value of the leased property does not apply in the case of early termination.

2. Leases with a minimum term. If a lease has an alternative minimum term, the disclosures governing the liability limitation are not applicable for the minimum term.

3. Charges not subject to rebuttable presumption. The limitation on liability applies only to liability at the end of the lease term that is based on the difference between the residual value of the leased property and its realized value. The regulation does not preclude a lessor from recovering other charges from the lessee at the end of the lease term. Examples of such charges include:

i. Disposition charges.

ii. Excess mileage charges.

iii. Late payment and default charges.

iv. In simple-interest accounting leases, amount by which the unamortized cost exceeds the residual value because the lessee has not made timely payments.

4(n) Fees and taxes

1. Treatment of certain taxes. Taxes paid in connection with the lease are generally disclosed under § 213.4(n), but there are exceptions. To illustrate:

i. Taxes paid by lease signing or delivery are disclosed under § 213.4(b) and § 213.4(n).

ii. Taxes that are part of the scheduled payments are reflected in the disclosure under § 213.4(c), (f), and (n).

iii. A tax payable by the lessor that is passed on to the consumer and is reflected in the lease documentation must be disclosed under § 213.4(n). A tax payable by the lessor and absorbed as a cost of doing business need not be disclosed.

iv. Taxes charged in connection with the exercise of a purchase option are disclosed under § 213.4(i), not § 213.4(n).

2. Estimates. In disclosing the total amount of fees and taxes under § 213.4(n), lessors may need to base the disclosure on estimated tax rates or amounts and are afforded great flexibility in doing so. Where a rate is applied to the future value of leased property, lessors have flexibility in estimating that value, including, but not limited to, using the mathematical average of the agreed upon value and the residual value or published valuation guides; or a lessor could prepare estimates using the agreed upon value and disclose a reasonable estimate of the total fees and taxes. Lessors may include a statement that the actual total of fees and taxes may be higher or lower depending on the tax rates in effect or the value of the leased property at the time a fee or tax is assessed.

4(o) Insurance

1. Coverage. If insurance is obtained through the lessor, information on the type and amount of insurance coverage (whether voluntary or required) as well as the cost, must be disclosed.

2. Lessor's insurance. Insurance purchased by the lessor primarily for its own benefit, and absorbed as a business expense and not separately charged to the lessee, need not be disclosed under § 213.4(o) even if it provides an incidental benefit to the lessee.

3. Mechanical breakdown protection and other products. Whether products purchased in conjunction with a lease, such as mechanical breakdown protection (MBP) or guaranteed automobile protection (GAP), should be treated as insurance is determined by state or other applicable law. In states that do not treat MBP or GAP as insurance, § 213.4(o) disclosures are not required. In such cases the lessor may, however, disclose this information in accordance with the additional information provision in § 213.3(b). For MBP insurance contracts not capped by a dollar amount, lessors may describe coverage by referring to a limitation by mileage or time period, for example, by indicating that the mechanical breakdown contract insures parts of the automobile for up to 100,000 miles.

4(p) Warranties or Guarantees

1. Brief identification. The statement identifying warranties may be brief and need not describe or list all warranties applicable to specific parts such as for air conditioning, radio, or tires in an automobile. For example, manufacturer's warranties may be identified simply by a reference to the standard manufacturer's warranty. If a lessor provides a comprehensive list of warranties that may not all apply, to comply with § 213.4(p) the lessor must indicate which warranties apply or, alternatively, which warranties do not apply.

2. Warranty disclaimers. Although a disclaimer of warranties is not required by the regulation, the lessor may give a disclaimer as additional information in accordance with § 213.3(b).

3. State law. Whether an express warranty or guaranty exists is determined by state or other law.

4(q) Penalties and Other Charges for Delinquency

1. Collection costs. The automatic imposition of collection costs or attorney fees upon default must be disclosed under § 213.4(q). Collection costs or attorney fees that are not imposed automatically, but are contingent upon expenditures in conjunction with a collection proceeding or upon the employment of an attorney to effect collection, need not be disclosed.

2. Charges for early termination. When default is a condition for early termination of a lease, default charges must also be disclosed under § 213.4(g)(1). The § 213.4(q) and (g)(1) disclosures may, but need not, be combined. Examples of combined disclosures are provided in the model lease disclosure forms in appendix A.

3. Simple-interest leases. In a simple-interest accounting lease, the additional rent charge that accrues on the lease balance when a periodic payment is made after the due date does not constitute a penalty or other charge for late payment. Similarly, continued accrual of the rent charge after termination of the lease because the lessee fails to return the leased property does not constitute a default charge. But in either case, if the additional charge accrues at a rate higher than the normal rent charge, the lessor must disclose the amount of or the method of determining the additional charge under § 213.4(q).

4. Extension charges. Extension charges that exceed the rent charge in a simple-interest accounting lease or that are added separately are disclosed under § 213.4(q).

5. Reasonableness of charges. Pursuant to section 183(b) of the act, penalties or other charges for delinquency, default, or early termination may be specified in the lease but only in an amount that is reasonable in light of the anticipated or actual harm caused by the delinquency, default, or early termination, the difficulties of proof of loss, and the inconvenience or nonfeasibility of otherwise obtaining an adequate remedy.

4(r) Security Interest

1. Disclosable security interests. See § 213.2(o) and accompanying commentary to determine what security interests must be disclosed.

4(s) Limitations on Rate Information

1. Segregated disclosures. A lease rate may not be included among the segregated disclosures referenced in § 213.3(a)(2).

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 213 Official Staff Commentary to Regulation M

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 213.5

§ 213.5 Renegotiations, Extensions and Assumptions

1. Coverage. Section 213.5 applies only to existing leases that are covered by the regulation. It does not apply to the renegotiation or extension of leases with an initial term of four months or less, because such leases are not covered by the definition of consumer lease in § 213.2(e). Whether and when a lease is satisfied and replaced by a new lease is determined by state or other applicable law.

5(a) Renegotiations

1. Basis of disclosures. Lessors have flexibility in making disclosures so long as they reflect the legal obligation under the renegotiated lease. For example, assume that a 24-month lease is replaced by a 36-month lease. The initial lease began on January 1, 1998, and was renegotiated and replaced on July 1, 1998, so that the new lease term ends on January 1, 2001.

i. If the renegotiated lease covers the 36-month period beginning January 1, 1998, the new disclosures would reflect all payments made by the lessee on the initial lease and all payments on the renegotiated lease. In this example, since the renegotiated lease covers a 36-month period beginning January 1, 1998, the disclosures must reflect payments made since that date. On the model form, the "total of base periodic payments" disclosed under § 213.4(f)(7) should reflect periodic payments to be made over the entire 36-month term. Payments received since January 1, 1998, are added as a new line item disclosed as "total of payments received" and are subtracted from the "total of base periodic payments" in calculating a new item disclosed as the "total of base periodic payments remaining." For example, if 6 monthly payments of $300 were received since January 1, 1998, the disclosure form should include a "total of base periodic payments" line from which $1,800 is subtracted to arrive at the "total of base periodic payments remaining." The remainder of the disclosures would not change.

ii. If the renegotiated lease covers only the remaining 30 months, from July 1, 1998, to January 1, 2001, the disclosures would reflect only the charges incurred in connection with the renegotiation and the payments for the remaining period.

5(b) Extensions

1. Time of extension disclosures. If a consumer lease is extended for a specified term greater than six months, new disclosures are required at the time the extension is agreed upon. If the lease is extended on a month-to-month basis and the cumulative extensions exceed six months, new disclosures are required at the commencement of the seventh month and at the commencement of each seventh month thereafter for as long as the extensions continue. If a consumer lease is extended for terms of varying durations, one of which will exceed six months beyond the originally scheduled termination date of the lease, new disclosures are required at the commencement of the term that will exceed six months beyond the originally scheduled termination date.

2. Content of disclosures for month-to-month extensions. The disclosures for a lease extended on a month-to-month basis for more than six months should reflect the month-to-month nature of the transaction.

3. Basis of disclosures. The disclosures should be based on the extension period, including any upfront costs paid in connection with the extension. For example, assume that initially a lease ends on March 1, 1999. In January 1999, agreement is reached to extend the lease until October 1, 1999. The disclosure would include any extension fee paid in January and the periodic payments for the seven-month extension period beginning in March.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
Supp I to Part 213 Official Staff Commentary to Regulation M

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 213.7

§ 213.7 Advertising

7(a) General Rule

1. Persons covered. All "persons" must comply with the advertising provisions in this section, not just those that meet the definition of a lessor in § 213.2(h). Thus, automobile dealers, merchants, and others who are not themselves lessors must comply with the advertising provisions of the regulation if they advertise consumer lease transactions. Pursuant to section 184(b) of the act, however, owners and personnel of the media in which an advertisement appears or through which it is disseminated are not subject to civil liability for violations under section 185(b) of the act.

2. "Usually and customarily." Section 213.7(a) does not prohibit the advertising of a single item or the promotion of a new leasing program, but prohibits the advertising of terms that are not and will not be available. Thus, an advertisement may state terms that will be offered for only a limited period or terms that will become available at a future date.

7(b) Clear and Conspicuous Standard

1. Standard. The disclosures in an advertisement in any media must be reasonably understandable. For example, very fine print in a television advertisement or detailed and very rapidly stated information in a radio advertisement does not meet the clear and conspicuous standard if consumers cannot see and read or hear, and cannot comprehend, the information required to be disclosed.

7(b)(1) Amount due at Lease Signing or Delivery

1. Itemization not required. Only a total of amounts due at lease signing or delivery is required to be disclosed, not an itemization of its component parts. Such an itemization is provided in any transaction-specific disclosures provided under § 213.4.

2. Prominence rule. Except for a periodic payment, oral or written references to components of the total due at lease signing or delivery (for example, a reference to a capitalized cost reduction, where permitted) may not be more prominent than the disclosure of the total amount due at lease signing or delivery.

7(b)(2) Advertisement of a Lease Rate

1. Location of statement. The notice required to accompany a percentage rate stated in an advertisement must be placed in close proximity to the rate without any other intervening language or symbols. For example, a lessor may not place an asterisk next to the rate and place the notice elsewhere in the advertisement. In addition, with the exception of the notice required by § 213.4(s), the rate cannot be more prominent than any other § 213.4 disclosure stated in the advertisement.

7(c) Catalogs or Other Multipage Advertisements; Electronic Advertisements

1. General rule. The multiple-page advertisements referred to in § 213.7(c) are advertisements consisting of a series of numbered pages-for example, a supplement to a newspaper. A mailing comprising several separate flyers or pieces of promotional material in a single envelope is not a single multiple-page advertisement.

2. Cross references. A catalog or other multiple-page advertisement or an electronic advertisement (such as an advertisement appearing on an Internet Web site) is a single advertisement (requiring only one set of lease disclosures) if it contains a table, chart, or schedule with the disclosures required under § 213.7(d)(2)(i) through (v). If one of the triggering terms listed in § 213.7(d)(1) appears in a catalog, or in a multiple-page or electronic advertisement, it must clearly direct the consumer to the page or location where the table, chart, or schedule begins. For example, in an electronic advertisement, a term triggering additional disclosures may be accompanied by a link that directly connects the consumer to the additional information.

7(d)(1) Triggering Terms

1. Typical example. When any triggering term appears in a lease advertisement, the additional terms enumerated in § 213.7(d)(2) (i) through (v) must also appear. In a multi-lease advertisement, an example of one or more typical leases with a statement of all the terms applicable to each may be used. The examples must be labeled as such and must reflect representative lease terms that are made available by the lessor to consumers.

7(d)(2) Additional Terms

1. Third-party fees that vary by state or locality. The disclosure of a periodic payment or total amount due at lease signing or delivery may:

i. Exclude third-party fees, such as taxes, licenses, and registration fees and disclose that fact; or

ii. Provide a periodic payment or total that includes third-party fees based on a particular state or locality as long as that fact and the fact that fees may vary by state or locality are disclosed.

7(e) Alternative Disclosures -- Merchandise Tags

1. Multiple-item leases. Multiple-item leases that utilize merchandise tags requiring additional disclosures may use the alternate disclosure rule.

7(f) Alternative Disclosures -- Television or Radio Advertisements

7(f)(1) Toll-Free Number or Print Advertisement

1. Publication in general circulation. A reference to a written advertisement appearing in a newspaper circulated nationally, for example, USA Today or the Wall Street Journal, may satisfy the general circulation requirement in § 213.7(f)(1)(ii).

2. Toll-free number, local or collect calls. In complying with the disclosure requirements of § 213.7(f)(1)(i), a lessor must provide a toll-free number for nonlocal calls made from an area code other than the one used in the lessor's dialing area. Alternatively, a lessor may provide any telephone number that allows a consumer to reverse the phone charges when calling for information.

3. Multi-purpose number. When an advertised toll-free number responds with a recording, lease disclosures must be provided early in the sequence to ensure that the consumer receives the required disclosures. For example, in providing several dialing options -- such as providing directions to the lessor's place of business -- the option allowing the consumer to request lease disclosures should be provided early in the telephone message to ensure that the option to request disclosures is not obscured by other information.

4. Statement accompanying toll free number. Language must accompany a telephone and television number indicating that disclosures are available by calling the toll-free number, such as "call 1-800-000-0000 for details about costs and terms."

Such records may be retained in paper form, on microfilm, microfiche, or computer, or by any other method designed to reproduce records accurately. The lessor need retain only enough information to reconstruct the required disclosures or other records.

Appendix A Model Forms

1B Consumer Credit Law Manual Appendix A

Appendix A Model Forms

1. Permissible changes. Although use of the model forms is not required, lessors using them properly will be deemed to be in compliance with the regulation. Generally, lessors may make certain changes in the format or content of the forms and may delete any disclosures that are inapplicable to a transaction without losing the act's protection from liability. For example, the model form based on monthly periodic payments may be modified for single-payment lease transactions or for quarterly or other regular or irregular periodic payments. The model form may also be modified to reflect that a transaction is an extension. The content, format, and headings for the segregated disclosures must be substantially similar to those contained in the model forms; therefore, any changes should be minimal. The changes to the model forms should not be so extensive as to affect the substance and the clarity of the disclosures.

2. Examples of acceptable changes.

i. Using the first person, instead of the second person, in referring to the lessee.

ii. Using "lessee," "lessor," or names instead of pronouns.

iii. Rearranging the sequence of the nonsegregated disclosures.

iv. Incorporating certain state "plain English" requirements.

v. Deleting or blocking out inapplicable disclosures, filling in "N/A" (not applicable) or "0," crossing out, leaving blanks, checking a box for applicable items, or circling applicable items (this should facilitate use of multipurpose standard forms).

vi. Adding language or symbols to indicate estimates.

vii. Adding numeric or alphabetic designations.

viii. Rearranging the disclosures into vertical columns, except for § 213.4 (b) through (e) disclosures.

ix. Using icons and other graphics.

3. Model closed-end or net vehicle lease disclosure. Model A-2 is designed for a closed-end or net vehicle lease. Under the "Early Termination and Default" provision a reference to the lessee's right to an independent appraisal of the leased vehicle under § 213.4(l) is included for those closed-end leases in which the lessee's liability at early termination is based on the vehicle's realized value.

4. Model furniture lease disclosures. Model A-3 is a closed-end lease disclosure statement designed for a typical furniture lease. It does not include a disclosure of the appraisal right at early termination required under § 213.4(l) because few closed-end furniture leases base the lessee's liability at early termination on the realized value of the leased property. The disclosure should be added if it is applicable.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 226 REGULATION Z--TRUTH IN LENDING
Subpart A General

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.1

§ 226.1 Authority, purpose, coverage, organization, enforcement, and liability.

(a) Authority. This regulation, known as Regulation Z, is issued by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to implement the federal Truth in Lending Act, which is contained in title I of the Consumer Credit Protection Act, as amended (15 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.). This regulation also implements title XII, section 1204 of the Competitive Equality Banking Act of 1987 (Pub. L. 100-86, 101 Stat. 552). Information-collection requirements contained in this regulation have been approved by the Office of Management and Budget under the provisions of 44 U.S.C. 3501 et seq. and have been assigned OMB No. 7100-0199.

(b) Purpose. The purpose of this regulation is to promote the informed use of consumer credit by requiring disclosures about its terms and cost. The regulation also gives consumers the right to cancel certain credit transactions that involve a lien on a consumer's principal dwelling, regulates certain credit card practices, and provides a means for fair and timely resolution of credit billing disputes. The regulation does not generally govern charges for consumer credit, except that several provisions in Subpart G set forth special rules addressing certain charges applicable to credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan. The regulation requires a maximum interest rate to be stated in variable-rate contracts secured by the consumer's dwelling. It also imposes limitations on home-equity plans that are subject to the requirements of § 226.5b and mortgages that are subject to the requirements of § 226.32. The regulation prohibits certain acts or practices in connection with credit secured by a consumer's principal dwelling. The regulation also regulates certain practices of creditors who extend private education loans as defined in § 226.46(b)(5).

(c) Coverage.

(1) In general, this regulation applies to each individual or business that offers or extends credit when four conditions are met:

(i) The credit is offered or extended to consumers;

(ii) The offering or extension of credit is done regularly; n1

(iii) The credit is subject to a finance charge or is payable by a written agreement in more than four installments; and

(iv) The credit is primarily for personal, family, or household purposes.

(2) If a credit card is involved, however, certain provisions apply even if the credit is not subject to a finance charge, or is not payable by a written agreement in more than four installments, or if the credit card is to be used for business purposes.

(3) In addition, certain requirements of § 226.5b apply to persons who are not creditors but who provide applications for home-equity plans to consumers.

(4) Furthermore, certain requirements of § 226.57 apply to institutions of higher education.

(d) Organization. The regulation is divided into subparts and appendices as follows:

(1) Subpart A contains general information. It sets forth:

(i) The authority, purpose, coverage, and organization of the regulation;

(ii) The definitions of basic terms;

(iii) The transactions that are exempt from coverage; and

(iv) The method of determining the finance charge.

(2) Subpart B contains the rules for open-end credit. It requires that account-opening disclosures and periodic statements be provided, as well as additional disclosures for credit and charge card applications and solicitations and for home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5a and § 226.5b, respectively. It also describes special rules that apply to credit card transactions, treatment of payments and credit balances, procedures for resolving credit billing errors, annual percentage rate calculations, rescission requirements, and advertising.

(3) Subpart C relates to closed-end credit. It contains rules on disclosures, treatment of credit balances, annual percentages rate calculations, rescission requirements, and advertising.

(4) Subpart D contains rules on oral disclosures, disclosures in languages other than English, record retention, effect on state laws, state exemptions, and rate limitations.

(5) Subpart E contains special rules for certain mortgage transactions. Section 226.32 requires certain disclosures and provides limitations for loans that have rates and fees above specified amounts. Section 226.33 requires disclosures, including the total annual loan cost rate, for reverse mortgage transactions. Section 226.34 prohibits specific acts and practices in connection with mortgage transactions that are subject to § 226.32. Section 226.35 prohibits specific acts and practices in connection with higher-priced mortgage loans, as defined in § 226.35(a). Section 226.36 prohibits specific acts and practices in connection with credit secured by a consumer's principal dwelling.

(6) Subpart F relates to private education loans. It contains rules on disclosures, limitations on changes in terms after approval, the right to cancel the loan, and limitations on co-branding in the marketing of private education loans.

(7) Subpart G relates to credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan (except for § 226.57(c), which applies to all open-end credit plans). Section 226.51 contains rules on evaluation of a consumer's ability to make the required payments under the terms of an account. Section 226.52 limits the fees that a consumer can be required to pay with respect to an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan during the first year after account opening. Section 226.53 contains rules on allocation of payments in excess of the minimum payment. Section 226.54 sets forth certain limitations on the imposition of finance charges as the result of a loss of a grace period. Section 226.55 contains limitations on increases in annual percentage rates, fees, and charges for credit card accounts. Section 226.56 prohibits the assessment of fees or charges for over-the-limit transactions unless the consumer affirmatively consents to the creditor's payment of over-the-limit transactions. Section 226.57 sets forth rules for reporting and marketing of college student open-end credit. Section 226.58 sets forth requirements for the Internet posting of credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan.

(8) Several appendices contain information such as the procedures for determinations about state laws, state exemptions and issuance of staff interpretations, special rules for certain kinds of credit plans, a list of enforcement agencies, and the rules for computing annual percentage rates in closed-end credit transactions and total-annual-loan-cost rates for reverse mortgage transactions.

(e) Enforcement and liability. Section 108 of the act contains the administrative enforcement provisions. Sections 112, 113, 130, 131, and 134 contain provisions relating to liability for failure to comply with the requirements of the act and the regulation. Section 1204 (c) of title XII of the Competitive Equality Banking Act of 1987, Public Law 100-86, 101 Stat. 552, incorporates by reference administrative enforcement and civil liability provisions of sections 108 and 130 of the act.

Subpart A General

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.2

§ 226.2 Definitions and rules of construction.

(a) Definitions. For purposes of this regulation, the following definitions apply:

(1) Act means the Truth in Lending Act (15 U.S.C. 1601 et seq.).

(2) Advertisement means a commercial message in any medium that promotes, directly or indirectly, a credit transaction.

(3) [Reserved.] n2

(4) Billing cycle or cycle means the interval between the days or dates of regular periodic statements. These intervals shall be equal and no longer than a quarter of a year. An interval will be considered equal if the number of days in the cycle does not vary more than four days from the regular day or date of the periodic statement.

(5) Board means the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

(6) Business day means a day on which the creditor's offices are open to the public for carrying on substantially all of its business functions. However, for purposes of rescission under §§ 226.15 and 226.23, and for purposes of §§ 226.19(a)(1)(ii), 226.19(a)(2), 226.31, and 226.46(d)(4), the term means all calendar days except Sundays and the legal public holidays specified in 5 U.S.C. 6103(a), such as New Year's Day, the Birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr., Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, Columbus Day, Veterans Day, Thanksgiving Day, and Christmas Day.

(7) Card issuer means a person that issues a credit card or that person's agent with respect to the card.

(8) Cardholder means a natural person to whom a credit card is issued for consumer credit purposes, or a natural person who has agreed with the card issuer to pay consumer credit obligations arising from the issuance of a credit card to another natural person. (9) Cash price means the price at which a creditor, in the ordinary course of business, offers to sell for cash property or service that is the subject of the transaction. At the creditor's option, the term may include the price of accessories, services related to the sale, service contracts and taxes and fees for license, title, and registration. The term does not include any finance charge.

(10) Closed-end-credit means consumer credit other than open-end-credit as defined in this section.

(11) Consumer means a cardholder or natural person to whom consumer credit is offered or extended. However, for purposes of rescission under §§ 226.15 and 226.23, the term also includes a natural person in whose principal dwelling a security interest is or will be retained or acquired, if that person's ownership interest in the dwelling is or will be subject to the security interest.

(12) Consumer credit means credit offered or extended to a consumer primarily for personal, family, or household purposes.

(13) Consummation means the time that a consumer becomes contractually obligated on a credit transaction.

(ii) Credit card account under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan means any open-end credit account accessed by a credit card, except:

(ii) Will become (or has the option to become), for no additional consideration or for nominal consideration, the owner of the property upon compliance with the agreement.

(17) Creditor means:

(i) A person who regularly extends consumer credit n3 that is subject to a finance charge or is payable by written agreement in more than four installments (not including a down payment), and to whom the obligation is initially payable, either on the face of the note or contract, or by agreement when there is no note or contract.

(ii) For purposes of §§ 226.4(c)(8) (Discounts), 226.9(d) (Finance charge imposed at time of transaction), and 226.12(e) (Prompt notification of returns and crediting of refunds), a person that honors a credit card.

(iii) For purposes of subpart B, any card issuer that extends either open-end credit or credit that is not subject to a finance charge and is not payable by written agreement in more than four installments.

(iv) For purposes of subpart B (except for the credit and charge card disclosures contained in §§ 226.5a and 226.9(e) and (f), the finance charge disclosures contained in § 226.6(a)(1) and (b)(3)(i) and § 226.7(a)(4) through (7) and (b)(4) through (6) and the right of rescission set forth in § 226.15) and subpart C, any card issuer that extends closed-end credit that is subject to a finance charge or is payable by written agreement in more than four installments.

(v) A person regularly extends consumer credit only if it extended credit (other than credit subject to the requirements of § 226.32) more than 25 times (or more than 5 times for transactions secured by a dwelling) in the preceding calendar year. If a person did not meet these numerical standards in the preceding calendar year, the numerical standards shall be applied to the current calendar year. A person regularly extends consumer credit if, in any 12-month period, the person originates more than one credit extension that is subject to the requirements of § 226.32 or one or more such credit extensions through a mortgage broker.

(18) Downpayment means an amount, including the value of property used as a trade-in, paid to a seller to reduce the cash price of goods or services purchased in a credit sale transaction. A deferred portion of a downpayment may be treated as part of the downpayment if it is payable not later than the due date of the second otherwise regularly scheduled payment and is not subject to a finance charge.

(25) Security interest means an interest in property that secures performance of a consumer credit obligation and that is recognized by state or federal law. It does not include incidental interests such as interests in proceeds, accessions, additions, fixtures, insurance proceeds (whether or not the creditor is a loss payee or beneficiary), premium rebates, or interests in after-acquired property. For purposes of disclosures under §§ 226.6 and 226.18, the term does not include an interest that arises solely by operation of law. However, for purposes of the right of rescission under §§ 226.15 and 226.23, the term does include interests that arise solely by operation of law.

(26) State means any state, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and any territory or possession of the United States.

12 C.F.R. Part 226 REGULATION Z--TRUTH IN LENDING
Subpart A General

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.4

§ 226.4 Finance charge.

(a) Definition. The finance charge is the cost of consumer credit as a dollar amount. It includes any charge payable directly or indirectly by the consumer and imposed directly or indirectly by the creditor as an incident to or a condition of the extension of credit. It does not include any charge of a type payable in a comparable cash transaction.

(1) Charges by third parties. The finance charge includes fees and amounts charged by someone other than the creditor, unless otherwise excluded under this section, if the creditor:

(i) Requires the use of a third party as a condition of or an incident to the extension of credit, even if the consumer can choose the third party; or

(ii) Retains a portion of the third-party charge, to the extent of the portion retained.

(2) Special rule; closing agent charges. Fees charged by a third party that conducts the loan closing (such as a settlement agent, attorney, or escrow or title company) are finance charges only if the creditor:

(i) Requires the particular services for which the consumer is charged;

(ii) Requires the imposition of the charge; or

(iii) Retains a portion of the third-party charge, to the extent of the portion retained.

(3) Special rule; mortgage broker fees. Fees charged by a mortgage broker (including fees paid by the consumer directly to the broker or to the creditor for delivery to the broker) are finance charges even if the creditor does not require the consumer to use a mortgage broker and even if the creditor does not retain any portion of the charge.

(b) Examples of finance charges. The finance charge includes the following types of charges, except for charges specifically excluded by paragraphs (c) through (e) of this section:

(1) Interest, time price differential, and any amount payable under an add-on or discount system of additional charges.

(2) Service, transaction, activity, and carrying charges, including any charge imposed on a checking or other transaction account to the extent that the charge exceeds the charge for a similar account without a credit feature.

(3) Points, loan fees, assumption fees, finder's fees, and similar charges.

(4) Appraisal, investigation, and credit report fees.

(5) Premiums or other charges for any guarantee or insurance protecting the creditor against the consumer's default or other credit loss.

(6) Charges imposed on a creditor by another person for purchasing or accepting a consumer's obligation, if the consumer is required to pay the charges in cash, as an addition to the obligation, or as a deduction from the proceeds of the obligation.

(7) Premiums or other charges for credit life, accident, health, or loss-of-income insurance, written in connection with a credit transaction.

(8) Premiums or other charges for insurance against loss of or damage to property, or against liability arising out of the ownership or use of property, written in connection with a credit transaction.

(9) Discounts for the purpose of inducing payment by a means other than the use of credit.

(10) Charges or premiums paid for debt cancellation or debt suspension coverage written in connection with a credit transaction, whether or not the coverage is insurance under applicable law.

(c) Charges excluded from the finance charge. The following charges are not finance charges:

(1) Application fees charged to all applicants for credit, whether or not credit is actually extended.

(2) Charges for actual unanticipated late payment, for exceeding a credit limit, or for delinquency, default, or a similar occurrence.

(3) Charges imposed by a financial institution for paying items that overdraw an account, unless the payment of such items and the imposition of the charge were previously agreed upon in writing.

(4) Fees charged for participation in a credit plan, whether assessed on an annual or other periodic basis.

(5) Seller's points.

(6) Interest forfeited as a result of an interest reduction required by law on a time deposit used as security for an extension of credit.

(7) Real-estate related fees. The following fees in a transaction secured by real property or in a residential mortgage transaction, if the fees are bona fide and reasonable in amount:

(i) Fees for title examination, abstract of title, title insurance, property survey, and similar purposes.

(ii) Fees for preparing loan-related documents, such as deeds, mortgages, and reconveyance or settlement documents.

(iii) Notary and credit-report fees.

(iv) Property appraisal fees or fees for inspections to assess the value or condition of the property if the service is performed prior to closing, including fees related to pest-infestation or flood-hazard determinations.

(v) Amounts required to be paid into escrow or trustee accounts if the amounts would not otherwise be included in the finance charge.

(8) Discounts offered to induce payment for a purchase by cash, check, or other means, as provided in section 167(b) of the Act.

(d) Insurance and debt cancellation and debt suspension coverage.

(1) Voluntary credit insurance premiums. Premiums for credit life, accident, health, or loss-of-income insurance may be excluded from the finance charge if the following conditions are met:

(i) The insurance coverage is not required by the creditor, and this fact is disclosed in writing.

(ii) The premium for the initial term of insurance coverage is disclosed in writing. If the term of insurance is less than the term of the transaction, the term of insurance also shall be disclosed. The premium may be disclosed on a unit-cost basis only in open-end credit transactions, closed-end credit transactions by mail or telephone under § 226.17(g), and certain closed-end credit transactions involving an insurance plan that limits the total amount of indebtedness subject to coverage.

(iii) The consumer signs or initials an affirmative written request for the insurance after receiving the disclosures specified in this paragraph, except as provided in paragraph (d)(4) of this section. Any consumer in the transaction may sign or initial the request.

(2) Property insurance premiums. Premiums for insurance against loss of or damage to property, or against liability arising out of the ownership or use of property, including single interest insurance if the insurer waives all right of subrogation against the consumer, n5 may be excluded from the finance charge if the following conditions are met:

(i) The insurance coverage may be obtained from a person of the consumer's choice, n6 and this fact is disclosed. (A creditor may reserve the right to refuse to accept, for reasonable cause, an insurer offered by the consumer.)

(ii) If the coverage is obtained from or through the creditor, the premium for the initial term of insurance coverage shall be disclosed. If the term of insurance is less than the term of the transaction, the term of insurance shall also be disclosed. The premium may be disclosed on a unit-cost basis only in open-end credit transactions, closed-end credit transactions by mail or telephone under § 226.17(g), and certain closed-end credit transactions involving an insurance plan that limits the total amount of indebtedness subject to coverage.

(3) Voluntary debt cancellation or debt suspension fees. Charges or premiums paid for debt cancellation coverage for amounts exceeding the value of the collateral securing the obligation or for debt cancellation or debt suspension coverage in the event of the loss of life, health, or income or in case of accident may be excluded from the finance charge, whether or not the coverage is insurance, if the following conditions are met:

(i) The debt cancellation or debt suspension agreement or coverage is not required by the creditor, and this fact is disclosed in writing;

(ii) The fee or premium for the initial term of coverage is disclosed in writing. If the term of coverage is less than the term of the credit transaction, the term of coverage also shall be disclosed. The fee or premium may be disclosed on a unit-cost basis only in open-end credit transactions, closed-end credit transactions by mail or telephone under § 226.17(g), and certain closed-end credit transactions involving a debt cancellation agreement that limits the total amount of indebtedness subject to coverage;

(iii) The following are disclosed, as applicable, for debt suspension coverage: That the obligation to pay loan principal and interest is only suspended, and that interest will continue to accrue during the period of suspension.

(iv) The consumer signs or initials an affirmative written request for coverage after receiving the disclosures specified in this paragraph, except as provided in paragraph (d)(4) of this section. Any consumer in the transaction may sign or initial the request.

(4) Telephone purchases. If a consumer purchases credit insurance or debt cancellation or debt suspension coverage for an open-end (not home-secured) plan by telephone, the creditor must make the disclosures under paragraphs (d)(1)(i) and (ii) or (d)(3)(i) through (iii) of this section, as applicable, orally. In such a case, the creditor shall:

(i) Maintain evidence that the consumer, after being provided the disclosures orally, affirmatively elected to purchase the insurance or coverage; and

(ii) Mail the disclosures under paragraphs (d)(1)(i) and (ii) or (d)(3)(i) through (iii) of this section, as applicable, within three business days after the telephone purchase.

(e) Certain security interest charges. If itemized and disclosed, the following charges may be excluded from the finance charge:

(1) Taxes and fees prescribed by law that actually are or will be paid to public officials for determining the existence of or for perfecting, releasing, or satisfying a security interest.

(2) The premium for insurance in lieu of perfecting a security interest to the extent that the premium does not exceed the fees described in paragraph (e)(1) of this section that otherwise would be payable.

(3) Taxes on security instruments. Any tax levied on security instruments or on documents evidencing indebtedness if the payment of such taxes is a requirement for recording the instrument securing the evidence of indebtedness.

(f) Prohibited offsets. Interest, dividends, or other income received or to be received by the consumer on deposits or investments shall not be deducted in computing the finance charge.

CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 226 REGULATION Z--TRUTH IN LENDING
Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.5

§ 226.5 General disclosure requirements.

(a) Forms of disclosures.

(1) General.

(i) The creditor shall make the disclosures required by this subpart clearly and conspicuously.

(ii) The creditor shall make the disclosures required by this subpart in writing, n7 in a form that the consumer may keep, n8 except that:

(A) The following disclosures need not be written: Disclosures under § 226.6(b)(3) of charges that are imposed as part of an open-end (not home-secured) plan that are not required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(2) and related disclosures of charges under § 226.9(c)(2)(iii)(B); disclosures under § 226.9(c)(2)(vi); disclosures under § 226.9(d) when a finance charge is imposed at the time of the transaction; and disclosures under § 226.56(b)(1)(i).

(B) The following disclosures need not be in a retainable form: Disclosures that need not be written under paragraph (a)(1)(ii)(A) of this section; disclosures for credit and charge card applications and solicitations under § 226.5a; home-equity disclosures under § 226.5b(d); the alternative summary billing-rights statement under § 226.9(a)(2); the credit and charge card renewal disclosures required under § 226.9(e); and the payment requirements under § 226.10(b), except as provided in § 226.7(b)(13).

(iii) The disclosures required by this subpart may be provided to the consumer in electronic form, subject to compliance with the consumer consent and other applicable provisions of the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-Sign Act) (15 U.S.C. 7001 et seq.). The disclosures required by §§ 226.5a, 226.5b, and 226.16 may be provided to the consumer in electronic form without regard to the consumer consent or other provisions of the E-Sign Act in the circumstances set forth in those sections.

(2) Terminology.

(i) Terminology used in providing the disclosures required by this subpart shall be consistent.

(ii) For home-equity plans subject to § 226.5b, the terms finance charge and annual percentage rate, when required to be disclosed with a corresponding amount or percentage rate, shall be more conspicuous than any other required disclosure. n9 The terms need not be more conspicuous when used for periodic statement disclosures under § 226.7(a)(4) and for advertisements under § 226.16.

(iii) If disclosures are required to be presented in a tabular format pursuant to paragraph (a)(3) of this section, the term penalty APR shall be used, as applicable. The term penalty APR need not be used in reference to the annual percentage rate that applies with the loss of a promotional rate, assuming the annual percentage rate that applies is not greater than the annual percentage rate that would have applied at the end of the promotional period; or if the annual percentage rate that applies with the loss of a promotional rate is a variable rate, the annual percentage rate is calculated using the same index and margin as would have been used to calculate the annual percentage rate that would have applied at the end of the promotional period. If credit insurance or debt cancellation or debt suspension coverage is required as part of the plan, the term required shall be used and the program shall be identified by its name. If an annual percentage rate is required to be presented in a tabular format pursuant to paragraph (a)(3)(i) or (a)(3)(iii) of this section, the term fixed, or a similar term, may not be used to describe such rate unless the creditor also specifies a time period that the rate will be fixed and the rate will not increase during that period, or if no such time period is provided, the rate will not increase while the plan is open.

(3) Specific formats.

(i) Certain disclosures for credit and charge card applications and solicitations must be provided in a tabular format in accordance with the requirements of § 226.5a(a)(2).

(ii) Certain disclosures for home-equity plans must precede other disclosures and must be given in accordance with the requirements of § 226.5b(a).

(iii) Certain account-opening disclosures must be provided in a tabular format in accordance with the requirements of § 226.6(b)(1).

(iv) Certain disclosures provided on periodic statements must be grouped together in accordance with the requirements of § 226.7(b)(6) and (b)(13).

(v) Certain disclosures provided on periodic statements must be given in accordance with the requirements of § 226.7(b)(12).

(vi) Certain disclosures accompanying checks that access a credit card account must be provided in a tabular format in accordance with the requirements of § 226.9(b)(3).

(vii) Certain disclosures provided in a change-in-terms notice must be provided in a tabular format in accordance with the requirements of § 226.9(c)(2)(iv)(D).

(viii) Certain disclosures provided when a rate is increased due to delinquency, default or as a penalty must be provided in a tabular format in accordance with the requirements of § 226.9(g)(3)(ii).

(b) Time of disclosures.

(1) Account-opening disclosures.

(i) General rule. The creditor shall furnish account-opening disclosures required by § 226.6 before the first transaction is made under the plan.

(ii) Charges imposed as part of an open-end (not home-secured) plan. Charges that are imposed as part of an open-end (not home-secured) plan and are not required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(2) may be disclosed after account opening but before the consumer agrees to pay or becomes obligated to pay for the charge, provided they are disclosed at a time and in a manner that a consumer would be likely to notice them. This provision does not apply to charges imposed as part of a home-equity plan subject to the requirements of § 226.5b.

(iii) Telephone purchases. Disclosures required by § 226.6 may be provided as soon as reasonably practicable after the first transaction if:

(A) The first transaction occurs when a consumer contacts a merchant by telephone to purchase goods and at the same time the consumer accepts an offer to finance the purchase by establishing an open-end plan with the merchant or third-party creditor;

(B) The merchant or third-party creditor permits consumers to return any goods financed under the plan and provides consumers with a sufficient time to reject the plan and return the goods free of cost after the merchant or third-party creditor has provided the written disclosures required by § 226.6; and

(C) The consumer's right to reject the plan and return the goods is disclosed to the consumer as a part of the offer to finance the purchase.

(iv)

(A) General. In general, a creditor may not collect any fee before account-opening disclosures are provided. A creditor may collect, or obtain the consumer's agreement to pay, membership fees, including application fees excludable from the finance charge under § 226.4(c)(1), before providing account-opening disclosures if, after receiving the disclosures, the consumer may reject the plan and have no obligation to pay these fees (including application fees) or any other fee or charge. A membership fee for purposes of this paragraph has the same meaning as a fee for the issuance or availability of credit described in § 226.5a(b)(2). If the consumer rejects the plan, the creditor must promptly refund the membership fee if it has been paid, or take other action necessary to ensure the consumer is not obligated to pay that fee or any other fee or charge.

(B) Home-equity plans. Creditors offering home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b are not subject to the requirements of paragraph (b)(1)(iv)(A) of this section.

(v) Application fees. A creditor may collect an application fee excludable from the finance charge under § 226.4(c)(1) before providing account-opening disclosures. However, if a consumer rejects the plan after receiving account-opening disclosures, the consumer must have no obligation to pay such an application fee, or if the fee was paid, it must be refunded. See § 226.5(b)(1)(iv)(A).

(2) Periodic statements.

(i) Statement required. The creditor shall mail or deliver a periodic statement as required by § 226.7 for each billing cycle at the end of which an account has a debit or credit balance of more than $1 or on which a finance charge has been imposed. A periodic statement need not be sent for an account if the creditor deems it uncollectible, if delinquency collection proceedings have been instituted, if the creditor has charged off the account in accordance with loan-loss provisions and will not charge any additional fees or interest on the account, or if furnishing the statement would violate federal law.

(ii) Timing requirements.

(A) Payment due date. For credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan, a card issuer must adopt reasonable procedures designed to ensure that

(1) Periodic statements are mailed or delivered at least 21 days prior to the payment due date disclosed on the statement pursuant to § 226.7(b)(11)(i)(A); and

(2) The card issuer does not treat as late for any purpose a required minimum periodic payment received by the card issuer within 21 days after mailing or delivery of the periodic statement disclosing the due date for that payment.

(B) Grace period expiration date. For open-end consumer credit plans, a creditor must adopt reasonable procedures designed to ensure that:

(1) Periodic statements are mailed or delivered at least 21 days prior to the date on which any grace period expires; and

(2) The creditor does not impose finance charges as a result of the loss of a grace period if a payment that satisfies the terms of the grace period is received by the creditor within 21 days after mailing or delivery of the periodic statement.

(3) For purposes of paragraph (b)(2)(ii)(B) of this section, "grace period" means a period within which any credit extended may be repaid without incurring a finance charge due to a periodic interest rate. n10

(3) Credit and charge card application and solicitation disclosures. The card issuer shall furnish the disclosures for credit and charge card applications and solicitations in accordance with the timing requirements of § 226.5a.

(4) Home-equity plans. Disclosures for home-equity plans shall be made in accordance with the timing requirements of § 226.5b(b).

(c) Basis of disclosures and use of estimates. Disclosures shall reflect the terms of the legal obligation between the parties. If any information necessary for accurate disclosure is unknown to the creditor, it shall make the disclosure based on the best information reasonably available and shall state clearly that the disclosure is an estimate.

(d) Multiple creditors; multiple consumers. If the credit plan involves more than one creditor, only one set of disclosures shall be given, and the creditors shall agree among themselves which creditor must comply with the requirements that this regulation imposes on any or all of them. If there is more than one consumer, the disclosures may be made to any consumer who is primarily liable on the account. If the right of rescission under § 226.15 is applicable, however, the disclosures required by §§ 226.6 and 226.15(b) shall be made to each consumer having the right to rescind.

(e) Effect of subsequent events. If a disclosure becomes inaccurate because of an event that occurs after the creditor mails or delivers the disclosures, the resulting inaccuracy is not a violation of this regulation, although new disclosures may be required under § 226.9(c).

(a) General rules. The card issuer shall provide the disclosures required under this section on or with a solicitation or an application to open a credit or charge card account.

(1) Definition of solicitation. For purposes of this section, the term solicitation means an offer by the card issuer to open a credit or charge card account that does not require the consumer to complete an application. A "firm offer of credit" as defined in section 603(l) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (15 U.S.C. 1681a(l)) for a credit or charge card is a solicitation for purposes of this section

(2) Form of disclosures; tabular format.

(i) The disclosures in paragraphs (b)(1) through (5) (except for (b)(1)(iv)(B)) and (b)(7) through (15) of this section made pursuant to paragraph (c), (d)(2), (e)(1) or (f) of this section generally shall be in the form of a table with headings, content, and format substantially similar to any of the applicable tables found in G-10 in appendix G to this part.

(ii) The table described in paragraph (a)(2)(i) of this section shall contain only the information required or permitted by this section. Other information may be presented on or with an application or solicitation, provided such information appears outside the required table.

(iii) Disclosures required by paragraphs (b)(1)(iv)(B) and (b)(6) of this section must be placed directly beneath the table.

(iv) When a tabular format is required, any annual percentage rate required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(1) of this section, any introductory rate required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(1)(ii) of this section, any rate that will apply after a premium initial rate expires required to be disclosed under paragraph (b)(1)(iii) of this section, and any fee or percentage amounts required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraphs (b)(2), (b)(4), (b)(8) through (b)(13) of this section must be disclosed in bold text. However, bold text shall not be used for: Any maximum limits on fee amounts disclosed in the table that do not relate to fees that vary by state; the amount of any periodic fee disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(2) of this section that is not an annualized amount; and other annual percentage rates or fee amounts disclosed in the table.

(v) For an application or a solicitation that is accessed by the consumer in electronic form, the disclosures required under this section may be provided to the consumer in electronic form on or with the application or solicitation.

(vi)

(A) Except as provided in paragraph (a)(2)(vi)(B) of this section, the table described in paragraph (a)(2)(i) of this section must be provided in a prominent location on or with an application or a solicitation.

(B) If the table described in paragraph (a)(2)(i) of this section is provided electronically, it must be provided in close proximity to the application or solicitation.

(3) Fees based on a percentage. If the amount of any fee required to be disclosed under this section is determined on the basis of a percentage of another amount, the percentage used and the identification of the amount against which the percentage is applied may be disclosed instead of the amount of the fee.

(4) Fees that vary by state. Card issuers that impose fees referred to in paragraphs (b)(8) through (12) of this section that vary by state may, at the issuer's option, disclose in the table required by paragraph (a)(2)(i) of this section: the specific fee applicable to the consumer's account; or the range of the fees, if the disclosure includes a statement that the amount of the fee varies by state and refers the consumer to a disclosure provided with the table where the amount of the fee applicable to the consumer's account is disclosed. A card issuer may not list fees for multiple states in the table.

(5) Exceptions. This section does not apply to:

(i) Home-equity plans accessible by a credit or charge card that are subject to the requirements of § 226.5b;

(ii) Overdraft lines of credit tied to asset accounts accessed by check-guarantee cards or by debit cards;

(iii) Lines of credit accessed by check-guarantee cards or by debit cards that can be used only at automated teller machines;

(iv) Lines of credit accessed solely by account numbers;

(v) Additions of a credit or charge card to an existing open-end plan;

(vi) General purpose applications unless the application, or material accompanying it, indicates that it can be used to open a credit or charge card account; or

(vii) Consumer-initiated requests for applications.

(b) Required disclosures. The card issuer shall disclose the items in this paragraph on or with an application or a solicitation in accordance with the requirements of paragraphs (c), (d), (e)(1) or (f) of this section. A credit card issuer shall disclose all applicable items in this paragraph except for paragraph (b)(7) of this section. A charge card issuer shall disclose the applicable items in paragraphs (b)(2), (4), (7) through (12), and (15) of this section.

(1) Annual percentage rate. Each periodic rate that may be used to compute the finance charge on an outstanding balance for purchases, a cash advance, or a balance transfer, expressed as an annual percentage rate (as determined by § 226.14(b)). When more than one rate applies for a category of transactions, the range of balances to which each rate is applicable shall also be disclosed. The annual percentage rate for purchases disclosed pursuant to this paragraph shall be in at least 16-point type, except for the following: Oral disclosures of the annual percentage rate for purchases; or a penalty rate that may apply upon the occurrence of one or more specific events.

(i) Variable rate information. If a rate disclosed under paragraph (b)(1) of this section is a variable rate, the card issuer shall also disclose the fact that the rate may vary and how the rate is determined. In describing how the applicable rate will be determined, the card issuer must identify the type of index or formula that is used in setting the rate. The value of the index and the amount of the margin that are used to calculate the variable rate shall not be disclosed in the table. A disclosure of any applicable limitations on rate increases or decreases shall not be included in the table.

(ii) Discounted initial rate. If the initial rate is an introductory rate, as that term is defined in § 226.16(g)(2)(ii), the card issuer must disclose in the table the introductory rate, the time period during which the introductory rate will remain in effect, and must use the term "introductory" or "intro" in immediate proximity to the introductory rate. The card issuer also must disclose the rate that would otherwise apply to the account pursuant to paragraph (b)(1) of this section. Where the rate is not tied to an index or formula, the card issuer must disclose the rate that will apply after the introductory rate expires. In a variable-rate account, the card issuer must disclose a rate based on the applicable index or formula in accordance with the accuracy requirements set forth in paragraphs (c)(2), (d)(3), or (e)(4) of this section, as applicable.

(iii) Premium initial rate. If the initial rate is temporary and is higher than the rate that will apply after the temporary rate expires, the card issuer must disclose the premium initial rate pursuant to paragraph (b)(1) of this section and the time period during which the premium initial rate will remain in effect. Consistent with paragraph (b)(1) of this section, the premium initial rate for purchases must be in at least 16-point type. The issuer must also disclose in the table the rate that will apply after the premium initial rate expires, in at least 16-point type.

(iv) Penalty rates.

(A) In general. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(1)(iv)(B) of this section, if a rate may increase as a penalty for one or more events specified in the account agreement, such as a late payment or an extension of credit that exceeds the credit limit, the card issuer must disclose pursuant to paragraph (b)(1) of this section the increased rate that may apply, a brief description of the event or events that may result in the increased rate, and a brief description of how long the increased rate will remain in effect.

(B) Introductory rates. If the issuer discloses an introductory rate, as that term is defined in § 226.16(g)(2)(ii), in the table or in any written or electronic promotional materials accompanying applications or solicitations subject to paragraph (c) or (e) of this section, the issuer must briefly disclose directly beneath the table the circumstances, if any, under which the introductory rate may be revoked, and the type of rate that will apply after the introductory rate is revoked.

(v) Rates that depend on consumer's creditworthiness. If a rate cannot be determined at the time disclosures are given because the rate depends, at least in part, on a later determination of the consumer's creditworthiness, the card issuer must disclose the specific rates or the range of rates that could apply and a statement that the rate for which the consumer may qualify at account opening will depend on the consumer's creditworthiness, and other factors if applicable. If the rate that depends, at least in part, on a later determination of the consumer's creditworthiness is a penalty rate, as described in paragraph (b)(1)(iv) of this section, the card issuer at its option may disclose the highest rate that could apply, instead of disclosing the specific rates or the range of rates that could apply.

(vi) APRs that vary by state. Issuers imposing annual percentage rates that vary by state may, at the issuer's option, disclose in the table: the specific annual percentage rate applicable to the consumer's account; or the range of the annual percentage rates, if the disclosure includes a statement that the annual percentage rate varies by state and refers the consumer to a disclosure provided with the table where the annual percentage rate applicable to the consumer's account is disclosed. A card issuer may not list annual percentage rates for multiple states in the table.

(2) Fees for issuance or availability.

(i) Any annual or other periodic fee that may be imposed for the issuance or availability of a credit or charge card, including any fee based on account activity or inactivity; how frequently it will be imposed; and the annualized amount of the fee.

(ii) Any non-periodic fee that relates to opening an account. A card issuer must disclose that the fee is a one-time fee.

(3) Fixed finance charge; minimum interest charge. Any fixed finance charge and a brief description of the charge. Any minimum interest charge if it exceeds $1.00 that could be imposed during a billing cycle, and a brief description of the charge. The $1.00 threshold amount shall be adjusted periodically by the Board to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index. The Board shall calculate each year a price level adjusted minimum interest charge using the Consumer Price Index in effect on June 1 of that year. When the cumulative change in the adjusted minimum value derived from applying the annual Consumer Price level to the current minimum interest charge threshold has risen by a whole dollar, the minimum interest charge will be increased by $1.00. The issuer may, at its option, disclose in the table minimum interest charges below this threshold.

(4) Transaction charges. Any transaction charge imposed by the card issuer for the use of the card for purchases.

(5) Grace period. The date by which or the period within which any credit extended for purchases may be repaid without incurring a finance charge due to a periodic interest rate and any conditions on the availability of the grace period. If no grace period is provided, that fact must be disclosed. If the length of the grace period varies, the card issuer may disclose the range of days, the minimum number of days, or the average number of days in the grace period, if the disclosure is identified as a range, minimum, or average. In disclosing in the tabular format a grace period that applies to all types of purchases, the phrase "How to Avoid Paying Interest on Purchases" shall be used as the heading for the row describing the grace period. If a grace period is not offered on all types of purchases, in disclosing this fact in the tabular format, the phrase "Paying Interest" shall be used as the heading for the row describing this fact.

(6) Balance computation method. The name of the balance computation method listed in paragraph (g) of this section that is used to determine the balance for purchases on which the finance charge is computed, or an explanation of the method used if it is not listed. In determining which balance computation method to disclose, the card issuer shall assume that credit extended for purchases will not be repaid within the grace period, if any.

(7) Statement on charge card payments. A statement that charges incurred by use of the charge card are due when the periodic statement is received.

(8) Cash advance fee. Any fee imposed for an extension of credit in the form of cash or its equivalent.

(9) Late payment fee. Any fee imposed for a late payment.

(10) Over-the-limit fee. Any fee imposed for exceeding a credit limit.

(11) Balance transfer fee. Any fee imposed to transfer an outstanding balance.

(12) Returned-payment fee. Any fee imposed by the card issuer for a returned payment.

(13) Required insurance, debt cancellation or debt suspension coverage.

(i) A fee for insurance described in § 226.4(b)(7) or debt cancellation or suspension coverage described in § 226.4(b)(10), if the insurance or debt cancellation or suspension coverage is required as part of the plan; and

(ii) A cross reference to any additional information provided about the insurance or coverage accompanying the application or solicitation, as applicable.

(14) Available credit. If a card issuer requires fees for the issuance or availability of credit described in paragraph (b)(2) of this section, or requires a security deposit for such credit, and the total amount of those required fees and/or security deposit that will be imposed and charged to the account when the account is opened is 15 percent or more of the minimum credit limit for the card, a card issuer must disclose the available credit remaining after these fees or security deposit are debited to the account, assuming that the consumer receives the minimum credit limit. In determining whether the 15 percent threshold test is met, the issuer must only consider fees for issuance or availability of credit, or a security deposit, that are required. If fees for issuance or availability are optional, these fees should not be considered in determining whether the disclosure must be given. Nonetheless, if the 15 percent threshold test is met, the issuer in providing the disclosure must disclose the amount of available credit calculated by excluding those optional fees, and the available credit including those optional fees. This paragraph does not apply with respect to fees or security deposits that are not debited to the account.

(15) Web site reference. A reference to the Web site established by the Board and a statement that consumers may obtain on the Web site information about shopping for and using credit cards.

(c) Direct mail and electronic applications and solicitations.

(1) General. The card issuer shall disclose the applicable items in paragraph (b) of this section on or with an application or solicitation that is mailed to consumers or provided to consumers in electronic form.

(2) Accuracy.

(i) Disclosures in direct mail applications and solicitations must be accurate as of the time the disclosures are mailed. An accurate variable annual percentage rate is one in effect within 60 days before mailing.

(ii) Disclosures provided in electronic form must be accurate as of the time they are sent, in the case of disclosures sent to a consumer's e-mail address, or as of the time they are viewed by the public, in the case of disclosures made available at a location such as a card issuer's Web site. An accurate variable annual percentage rate provided in electronic form is one in effect within 30 days before it is sent to a consumer's e-mail address, or viewed by the public, as applicable.

(d) Telephone applications and solicitations.

(1) Oral disclosure. The card issuer shall disclose orally the information in paragraphs (b)(1) through (7) and (b)(14) of this section, to the extent applicable, in a telephone application or solicitation initiated by the card issuer.

(2) Alternative disclosure. The oral disclosure under paragraph (d)(1) of this section need not be given if the card issuer either:

(i)

(A) Does not impose a fee described in paragraph (b)(2) of this section; or

(B) Imposes such a fee but provides the consumer with a right to reject the plan consistent with § 226.5(b)(1)(iv); and

(ii) The card issuer discloses in writing within 30 days after the consumer requests the card (but in no event later than the delivery of the card) the following:

(A) The applicable information in paragraph (b) of this section; and

(B) As applicable, the fact that the consumer has the right to reject the plan and not be obligated to pay fees described in paragraph (b)(2) or any other fees or charges until the consumer has used the account or made a payment on the account after receiving a billing statement.

(3) Accuracy.

(i) The oral disclosures under paragraph (d)(1) of this section must be accurate as of the time they are given.

(ii) The alternative disclosures under paragraph (d)(2) of this section generally must be accurate as of the time they are mailed or delivered. A variable annual percentage rate is one that is accurate if it was:

(A) In effect at the time the disclosures are mailed or delivered; or

(B) In effect as of a specified date (which rate is then updated from time to time, but no less frequently than each calendar month).

(e) Applications and solicitations made available to general public. The card issuer shall provide disclosures, to the extent applicable, on or with an application or solicitation that is made available to the general public, including one contained in a catalog, magazine, or other generally available publication. The disclosures shall be provided in accordance with paragraph (e)(1) or (e)(2) of this section.

(1) Disclosure of required credit information. The card issuer may disclose in a prominent location on the application or solicitation the following:

(i) The applicable information in paragraph (b) of this section;

(ii) The date the required information was printed, including a statement that the required information was accurate as of that date and is subject to change after that date; and

(iii) A statement that the consumer should contact the card issuer for any change in the required information since it was printed, and a toll-free telephone number or a mailing address for that purpose.

(2) No disclosure of credit information. If none of the items in paragraph (b) of this section is provided on or with the application or solicitation, the card issuer may state in a prominent location on the application or solicitation the following:

(i) There are costs associated with the use of the card; and

(ii) The consumer may contact the card issuer to request specific information about the costs, along with a toll-free telephone number and a mailing address for that purpose.

(3) Prompt response to requests for information. Upon receiving a request for any of the information referred to in this paragraph, the card issuer shall promptly and fully disclose the information requested.

(4) Accuracy. The disclosures given pursuant to paragraph (e)(1) of this section must be accurate as of the date of printing. A variable annual percentage rate is accurate if it was in effect within 30 days before printing.

(f) In-person applications and solicitations. A card issuer shall disclose the information in paragraph (b) of this section, to the extent applicable, on or with an application or solicitation that is initiated by the card issuer and given to the consumer in person. A card issuer complies with the requirements of this paragraph if the issuer provides disclosures in accordance with paragraph (c)(1) or (e)(1) of this section.

(g) Balance computation methods defined. The following methods may be described by name. Methods that differ due to variations such as the allocation of payments, whether the finance charge begins to accrue on the transaction date or the date of posting the transaction, the existence or length of a grace period, and whether the balance is adjusted by charges such as late payment fees, annual fees and unpaid finance charges do not constitute separate balance computation methods.

(i) Average daily balance (including new purchases). This balance is figured by adding the outstanding balance (including new purchases and deducting payments and credits) for each day in the billing cycle, and then dividing by the number of days in the billing cycle.

(ii) Average daily balance (excluding new purchases). This balance is figured by adding the outstanding balance (excluding new purchases and deducting payments and credits) for each day in the billing cycle, and then dividing by the number of days in the billing cycle.

(3) Previous balance. This balance is the outstanding balance at the beginning of the billing cycle.

(4) Daily balance. For each day in the billing cycle, this balance is figured by taking the beginning balance each day, adding any new purchases, and subtracting any payment and credits.

12 C.F.R. Part 226 REGULATION Z--TRUTH IN LENDING
Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.5b

§ 226.5b Requirements for home equity plans.

The requirements of this section apply to open-end credit plans secured by the consumer's dwelling. For purposes of this section, an annual percentage rate is the annual percentage rate corresponding to the periodic rate as determined under § 226.14(b).

(a) Form of disclosures.

(1) General. The disclosures required by paragraph (d) of this section shall be made clearly and conspicuously and shall be grouped together and segregated from all unrelated information. The disclosures may be provided on the application form or on a separate form. The disclosure described in paragraph (d)(4)(iii), the itemization of third-party fees described in paragraph (d)(8), and the variable-rate information described in paragraph (d)(12) of this section may be provided separately from the other required disclosures.

(2) Precedence of certain disclosures. The disclosures described in paragraph (d)(1) through (4)(ii) of this section shall precede the other required disclosures.

(3) For an application that is accessed by the consumer in electronic form, the disclosures required under this section may be provided to the consumer in electronic form on or with the application.

(b) Time of disclosures. The disclosures and brochure required by paragraphs (d) and (e) of this section shall be provided at the time an application is provided to the consumer.[10a]

(c) Duties of third parties. Persons other than the creditor who provide applications to consumers for home equity plans must provide the brochure required under paragraph (e) of this section at the time an application is provided. If such persons have the disclosures required under paragraph (d) of this section for a creditor's home equity plan, they also shall provide the disclosures at such time. n10a

(d) Content of disclosures. The creditor shall provide the following disclosures, as applicable:

(1) Retention of information. A statement that the consumer should make or otherwise retain a copy of the disclosures.

(2) Conditions for disclosed terms.

(i) A statement of the time by which the consumer must submit an application to obtain specific terms disclosed and an identification of any disclosed term that is subject to change prior to opening the plan.

(ii) A statement that, if a disclosed term changes (other than a change due to fluctuations in the index in a variable-rate plan) prior to opening the plan and the consumer therefore elects not to open the plan, the consumer may receive a refund of all fees paid in connection with the application.

(3) Security interest and risk to home. A statement that the creditor will acquire a security interest in the consumer's dwelling and that loss of the dwelling may occur in the event of default.

(4) Possible actions by creditor.

(i) A statement that, under certain conditions, the creditor may terminate the plan and require payment of the outstanding balance in full in a single payment and impose fees upon termination; prohibit additional extensions of credit or reduce the credit limit; and, as specified in the initial agreement, implement certain changes in the plan.

(ii) A statement that the consumer may receive, upon request, information about the conditions under which such actions may occur.

(iii) In lieu of the disclosure required under paragraph (d)(4)(ii) of this section, a statement of such conditions.

(5) Payment terms. The payment terms of the plan, including:

(i) The length of the draw period and any repayment period.

(ii) An explanation of how the minimum periodic payment will be determined and the timing of the payments. If paying only the minimum periodic payments may not repay any of the principal or may repay less than the outstanding balance, a statement of this fact, as well as a statement that a balloon payment may result. n10b

(iii) An example, based on a $10,000 outstanding balance and a recent annual percentage rate, n10c showing the minimum periodic payment, any balloon payment, and the time it would take to repay the $10,000 outstanding balance if the consumer made only those payments and obtained no additional extensions of credit.

If different payment terms may apply to the draw and any repayment period, or if different payment terms may apply within either period, the disclosures shall reflect the different payment terms.

(6) Annual percentage rate. For fixed-rate plans, a recent annual percentage rate [10c] imposed under the plan and a statement that the rate does not include costs other than interest.

(7) Fees imposed by creditor. An itemization of any fees imposed by the creditor to open, use, or maintain the plan, stated as a dollar amount or percentage, and when such fees are payable.

(8) Fees imposed by third parties to open a plan. A good faith estimate, stated as a single dollar amount or range, of any fees that may be imposed by persons other than the creditor to open the plan, as well as a statement that the consumer may receive, upon request, a good faith itemization of such fees. In lieu of the statement, the itemization of such fees may be provided.

(9) Negative amortization. A statement that negative amortization may occur and that negative amortization increases the principal balance and reduces the consumer's equity in the dwelling.

(10) Transaction requirements. Any limitations on the number of extensions of credit and the amount of credit that may be obtained during any time period, as well as any minimum outstanding balance and minimum draw requirements, stated as dollar amounts or percentages.

(11) Tax implications. A statement that the consumer should consult a tax advisor regarding the deductibility of interest and charges under the plan.

(12) Disclosures for variable-rate plans. For a plan in which the annual percentage rate is variable, the following disclosures, as applicable:

(i) The fact that the annual percentage rate, payment, or term may change due to the variable-rate feature.

(ii) A statement that the annual percentage rate does not include costs other than interest.

(iii) The index used in making rate adjustments and a source of information about the index.

(iv) An explanation of how the annual percentage rate will be determined, including an explanation of how the index is adjusted, such as by the addition of a margin.

(v) A statement that the consumer should ask about the current index value, margin, discount or premium, and annual percentage rate.

(vi) A statement that the initial annual percentage rate is not based on the index and margin used to make later rate adjustments, and the period of time such initial rate will be in effect.

(vii) The frequency of changes in the annual percentage rate.

(viii) Any rules relating to changes in the index value and the annual percentage rate and resulting changes in the payment amount, including, for example, an explanation of payment limitations and rate carryover.

(ix) A statement of any annual or more frequent periodic limitations on changes in the annual percentage rate (or a statement that no annual limitation exists), as well as a statement of the maximum annual percentage rate that may be imposed under each payment option.

(x) The minimum periodic payment required when the maximum annual percentage rate for each payment option is in effect for a $10,000 outstanding balance, and a statement of the earliest date or time the maximum rate may be imposed.

(xi) An historical example, based on a $10,000 extension of credit, illustrating how annual percentage rates and payments would have been affected by index value changes implemented according to the terms of the plan. The historical example shall be based on the most recent 15 years of index values (selected for the same time period each year) and shall reflect all significant plan terms, such as negative amortization, rate carryover, rate discounts, and rate and payment limitations, that would have been affected by the index movement during the period.

(xii) A statement that rate information will be provided on or with each periodic statement.

(e) Brochure. The home equity brochure published by the Board or a suitable substitute shall be provided.

(f) Limitations on home equity plans. No creditor may, by contract or otherwise:

(1) Change the annual percentage rate unless:

(i) Such change is based on an index that is not under the creditor's control; and

(ii) Such index is available to the general public.

(2) Terminate a plan and demand repayment of the entire outstanding balance in advance of the original term (except for reverse mortgage transactions that are subject to paragraph (f)(4) of this section) unless:

(i) There is fraud or material misrepresentation by the consumer in connection with the plan;

(ii) The consumer fails to meet the repayment terms of the agreement for any outstanding balance;

(iii) Any action or inaction by the consumer adversely affects the creditor's security for the plan, or any right of the creditor in such security; or

(iv) Federal law dealing with credit extended by a depository institution to its executive officers specifically requires that as a condition of the plan the credit shall become due and payable on demand, provided that the creditor includes such a provision in the initial agreement.

(3) Change any term, except that a creditor may:

(i) Provide in the initial agreement that it may prohibit additional extensions of credit or reduce the credit limit during any period in which the maximum annual percentage rate is reached. A creditor also may provide in the initial agreement that specified changes will occur if a specified event takes place (for example, that the annual percentage rate will increase a specified amount if the consumer leaves the creditor's employment).

(ii) Change the index and margin used under the plan if the original index is no longer available, the new index has an historical movement substantially similar to that of the original index, and the new index and margin would have resulted in an annual percentage rate substantially similar to the rate in effect at the time the original index became unavailable.

(iii) Make a specified change if the consumer specifically agrees to it in writing at that time.

(iv) Make a change that will unequivocally benefit the consumer throughout the remainder of the plan.

(v) Make an insignificant change to terms.

(vi) Prohibit additional extensions of credit or reduce the credit limit applicable to an agreement during any period in which:

(A) The value of the dwelling that secures the plan declines significantly below the dwelling's appraised value for purposes of the plan;

(B) The creditor reasonably believes that the consumer will be unable to fulfill the repayment obligations under the plan because of a material change in the consumer's financial circumstances;

(C) The consumer is in default of any material obligation under the agreement;

(D) The creditor is precluded by government action from imposing the annual percentage rate provided for in the agreement;

(E) The priority of the creditor's security interest is adversely affected by government action to the extent that the value of the security interest is less than 120 percent of the credit line; or

(F) The creditor is notified by its regulatory agency that continued advances constitute an unsafe and unsound practice.

(4) For reverse mortgage transactions that are subject to § 226.33, terminate a plan and demand repayment of the entire outstanding balance in advance of the original term except:

(i) In the case of default;

(ii) If the consumer transfers title to the property securing the note;

(iii) If the consumer ceases using the property securing the note as the primary dwelling; or

(iv) Upon the consumer's death.

(g) Refund of fees. A creditor shall refund all fees paid by the consumer to anyone in connection with an application if any term required to be disclosed under paragraph (d) of this section changes (other than a change due to fluctuations in the index in a variable-rate plan) before the plan is opened and, as a result, the consumer elects not to open the plan.

(h) Imposition of nonrefundable fees. Neither a creditor nor any other person may impose a nonrefundable fee in connection with an application until three business days after the consumer receives the disclosures and brochure required under this section. n10d

FOOTNOTES:

(n13)Footnote 10a. The disclosures and the brochure may be delivered or placed in the mail not later than three business days following receipt of a consumer's application in the case of applications contained in magazines or other publications, or when the application is received by telephone or through an intermediary agent or broker.

(n14)Footnote 10b. A balloon payment results if paying the minimum periodic payments does not fully amortize the outstanding balance by a specified date or time, and the consumer must repay the entire outstanding balance at such time.

(n15)Footnote 10c. For fixed-rate plans, a recent annual percentage rate is a rate that has been in effect under the plan within the twelve months preceding the date the disclosures are provided to the consumer. For variable-rate plans, a recent annual percentage rate is the most recent rate provided in the historical example described in paragraph (d)(12)(xi) of this section or a rate that has been in effect under the plan since the date of the most recent rate in the table.

(n16)Footnote 10d. If the disclosures and brochure are mailed to the consumer, the consumer is considered to have received them three business days after they are mailed.

§ 226.6 Account-opening disclosures.

(a) Rules affecting home-equity plans. The requirements of this paragraph (a) apply only to home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b. A creditor shall disclose the items in this section, to the extent applicable:

(1) Finance charge. The circumstances under which a finance charge will be imposed and an explanation of how it will be determined, as follows:

(i) A statement of when finance charges begin to accrue, including an explanation of whether or not any time period exists within which any credit extended may be repaid without incurring a finance charge. If such a time period is provided, a creditor may, at its option and without disclosure, impose no finance charge when payment is received after the time period's expiration.

(ii) A disclosure of each periodic rate that may be used to compute the finance charge, the range of balances to which it is applicable, n11 and the corresponding annual percentage rate. n12 If a creditor offers a variable-rate plan, the creditor shall also disclose: the circumstances under which the rate(s) may increase; any limitations on the increase; and the effect(s) of an increase. When different periodic rates apply to different types of transactions, the types of transactions to which the periodic rates shall apply shall also be disclosed. A creditor is not required to adjust the range of balances disclosure to reflect the balance below which only a minimum charge applies.

(iii) An explanation of the method used to determine the balance on which the finance charge may be computed.

(iv) An explanation of how the amount of any finance charge will be determined, n13 including a description of how any finance charge other than the periodic rate will be determined.

(2) Other charges. The amount of any charge other than a finance charge that may be imposed as part of the plan, or an explanation of how the charge will be determined.

(3) Home-equity plan information. The following disclosures described in § 226.5b(d), as applicable:

(i) A statement of the conditions under which the creditor may take certain action, as described in § 226.5b(d)(4)(i), such as terminating the plan or changing the terms.

(ii) The payment information described in § 226.5b(d)(5)(i) and (ii) for both the draw period and any repayment period.

(iii) A statement that negative amortization may occur as described in § 226.5b(d)(9).

(iv) A statement of any transaction requirements as described in § 226.5b(d)(10).

(v) A statement regarding the tax implications as described in § 226.5b(d)(11).

(vi) A statement that the annual percentage rate imposed under the plan does not include costs other than interest as described in § 226.5b(d)(6) and (d)(12)(ii).

(vii) The variable-rate disclosures described in § 226.5b(d)(12)(viii), (d)(12)(x), (d)(12)(xi), and (d)(12)(xii), as well as the disclosure described in § 226.5b(d)(5)(iii), unless the disclosures provided with the application were in a form the consumer could keep and included a representative payment example for the category of payment option chosen by the consumer.

(4) Security interests. The fact that the creditor has or will acquire a security interest in the property purchased under the plan, or in other property identified by item or type.

(5) Statement of billing rights. A statement that outlines the consumer's rights and the creditor's responsibilities under §§ 226.12(c) and 226.13 and that is substantially similar to the statement found in Model Form G-3 or, at the creditor's option, G-3(A), in appendix G to this part.

(b) Rules affecting open-end (not home-secured) plans. The requirements of paragraph (b) of this section apply to plans other than home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b.

(1) Form of disclosures; tabular format for open-end (not home-secured) plans. Creditors must provide the account-opening disclosures specified in paragraph (b)(2)(i) through (b)(2)(v) (except for (b)(2)(i)(D)(2)) and (b)(2)(vii) through (b)(2)(xiv) of this section in the form of a table with the headings, content, and format substantially similar to any of the applicable tables in G-17 in appendix G.

(i) Highlighting. In the table, any annual percentage rate required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i) of this section; any introductory rate permitted to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i)(B) or required to be disclosed under paragraph (b)(2)(i)(F) of this section, any rate that will apply after a premium initial rate expires permitted to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i)(C) or required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i)(F), and any fee or percentage amounts required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraphs (b)(2)(ii), (b)(2)(iv), (b)(2)(vii) through (b)(2)(xii) of this section must be disclosed in bold text. However, bold text shall not be used for: Any maximum limits on fee amounts disclosed in the table that do not relate to fees that vary by state; the amount of any periodic fee disclosed pursuant to paragraph (b)(2) of this section that is not an annualized amount; and other annual percentage rates or fee amounts disclosed in the table.

(ii) Location. Only the information required or permitted by paragraphs (b)(2)(i) through (b)(2)(v) (except for (b)(2)(i)(D)(2)) and (b)(2)(vii) through (b)(2)(xiv) of this section shall be in the table. Disclosures required by paragraphs (b)(2)(i)(D)(2), (b)(2)(vi) and (b)(2)(xv) of this section shall be placed directly below the table. Disclosures required by paragraphs (b)(3) through (b)(5) of this section that are not otherwise required to be in the table and other information may be presented with the account agreement or account-opening disclosure statement, provided such information appears outside the required table.

(iii) Fees that vary by state. Creditors that impose fees referred to in paragraphs (b)(2)(vii) through (b)(2)(xi) of this section that vary by state and that provide the disclosures required by paragraph (b) of this section in person at the time the open-end (not home-secured) plan is established in connection with financing the purchase of goods or services may, at the creditor's option, disclose in the account-opening table the specific fee applicable to the consumer's account, or the range of the fees, if the disclosure includes a statement that the amount of the fee varies by state and refers the consumer to the account agreement or other disclosure provided with the account-opening table where the amount of the fee applicable to the consumer's account is disclosed. A creditor may not list fees for multiple states in the account-opening summary table.

(iv) Fees based on a percentage. If the amount of any fee required to be disclosed under this section is determined on the basis of a percentage of another amount, the percentage used and the identification of the amount against which the percentage is applied may be disclosed instead of the amount of the fee.

(2) Required disclosures for account-opening table for open-end (not home-secured) plans. A creditor shall disclose the items in this section, to the extent applicable:

(i) Annual percentage rate. Each periodic rate that may be used to compute the finance charge on an outstanding balance for purchases, a cash advance, or a balance transfer, expressed as an annual percentage rate (as determined by § 226.14(b)). When more than one rate applies for a category of transactions, the range of balances to which each rate is applicable shall also be disclosed. The annual percentage rate for purchases disclosed pursuant to this paragraph shall be in at least 16-point type, except for the following: A penalty rate that may apply upon the occurrence of one or more specific events.

(A) Variable-rate information. If a rate disclosed under paragraph (b)(2)(i) of this section is a variable rate, the creditor shall also disclose the fact that the rate may vary and how the rate is determined. In describing how the applicable rate will be determined, the creditor must identify the type of index or formula that is used in setting the rate. The value of the index and the amount of the margin that are used to calculate the variable rate shall not be disclosed in the table. A disclosure of any applicable limitations on rate increases or decreases shall not be included in the table.

(B) Discounted initial rates. If the initial rate is an introductory rate, as that term is defined in § 226.16(g)(2)(ii), the creditor must disclose the rate that would otherwise apply to the account pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i) of this section. Where the rate is not tied to an index or formula, the creditor must disclose the rate that will apply after the introductory rate expires. In a variable-rate account, the card issuer must disclose a rate based on the applicable index or formula in accordance with the accuracy requirements of paragraph (b)(4)(ii)(G) of this section. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(2)(i)(F) of this section, the creditor is not required to, but may disclose in the table the introductory rate along with the rate that would otherwise apply to the account if the creditor also discloses the time period during which the introductory rate will remain in effect, and uses the term "introductory" or "intro" in immediate proximity to the introductory rate.

(C) Premium initial rate. If the initial rate is temporary and is higher than the rate that will apply after the temporary rate expires, the creditor must disclose the premium initial rate pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i) of this section. Consistent with paragraph (b)(2)(i) of this section, the premium initial rate for purchases must be in at least 16-point type. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(2)(i)(F) of this section, the creditor is not required to, but may disclose in the table the rate that will apply after the premium initial rate expires if the creditor also discloses the time period during which the premium initial rate will remain in effect. If the creditor also discloses in the table the rate that will apply after the premium initial rate for purchases expires, that rate also must be in at least 16-point type.

(D) Penalty rates.

(1) In general. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(2)(i)(D)(2) of this section, if a rate may increase as a penalty for one or more events specified in the account agreement, such as a late payment or an extension of credit that exceeds the credit limit, the creditor must disclose pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i) of this section the increased rate that may apply, a brief description of the event or events that may result in the increased rate, and a brief description of how long the increased rate will remain in effect. If more than one penalty rate may apply, the creditor at its option may disclose the highest rate that could apply, instead of disclosing the specific rates or the range of rates that could apply.

(2) Introductory rates. If the creditor discloses in the table an introductory rate, as that term is defined in § 226.16(g)(2)(ii), creditors must briefly disclose directly beneath the table the circumstances under which the introductory rate may be revoked, and the rate that will apply after the introductory rate is revoked.

(E) Point of sale where APRs vary by state or based on creditworthiness. Creditors imposing annual percentage rates that vary by state or based on the consumer's creditworthiness and providing the disclosures required by paragraph (b) of this section in person at the time the open-end (not home-secured) plan is established in connection with financing the purchase of goods or services may, at the creditor's option, disclose pursuant to paragraph (b)(2)(i) of this section in the account-opening table:

(1) The specific annual percentage rate applicable to the consumer's account; or

(2) The range of the annual percentage rates, if the disclosure includes a statement that the annual percentage rate varies by state or will be determined based on the consumer's creditworthiness and refers the consumer to the account agreement or other disclosure provided with the account-opening table where the annual percentage rate applicable to the consumer's account is disclosed. A creditor may not list annual percentage rates for multiple states in the account-opening table.

(F) Credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan. Notwithstanding paragraphs (b)(2)(i)(B) and (b)(2)(i)(C) of this section, for credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) plan, issuers must disclose in the table:

(1) Any introductory rate as that term is defined in § 226.16(g)(2)(ii) that would apply to the account, consistent with the requirements of paragraph (b)(2)(i)(B) of this section, and

(2) Any rate that would apply upon the expiration of a premium initial rate, consistent with the requirements of paragraph (b)(2)(i)(C) of this section.

(ii) Fees for issuance or availability.

(A) Any annual or other periodic fee that may be imposed for the issuance or availability of an open-end plan, including any fee based on account activity or inactivity; how frequently it will be imposed; and the annualized amount of the fee.

(B) Any non-periodic fee that relates to opening the plan. A creditor must disclose that the fee is a one-time fee.

(iii) Fixed finance charge; minimum interest charge. Any fixed finance charge and a brief description of the charge. Any minimum interest charge if it exceeds $1.00 that could be imposed during a billing cycle, and a brief description of the charge. The $1.00 threshold amount shall be adjusted periodically by the Board to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index. The Board shall calculate each year a price level adjusted minimum interest charge using the Consumer Price Index in effect on the June 1 of that year. When the cumulative change in the adjusted minimum value derived from applying the annual Consumer Price level to the current minimum interest charge threshold has risen by a whole dollar, the minimum interest charge will be increased by $1.00. The creditor may, at its option, disclose in the table minimum interest charges below this threshold.

(iv) Transaction charges. Any transaction charge imposed by the creditor for use of the open-end plan for purchases.

(v) Grace period. The date by which or the period within which any credit extended may be repaid without incurring a finance charge due to a periodic interest rate and any conditions on the availability of the grace period. If no grace period is provided, that fact must be disclosed. If the length of the grace period varies, the creditor may disclose the range of days, the minimum number of days, or the average number of the days in the grace period, if the disclosure is identified as a range, minimum, or average. In disclosing in the tabular format a grace period that applies to all features on the account, the phrase "How to Avoid Paying Interest" shall be used as the heading for the row describing the grace period. If a grace period is not offered on all features of the account, in disclosing this fact in the tabular format, the phrase "Paying Interest" shall be used as the heading for the row describing this fact.

(vi) Balance computation method. The name of the balance computation method listed in § 226.5a(g) that is used to determine the balance on which the finance charge is computed for each feature, or an explanation of the method used if it is not listed, along with a statement that an explanation of the method(s) required by paragraph (b)(4)(i)(D) of this section is provided with the account-opening disclosures. In determining which balance computation method to disclose, the creditor shall assume that credit extended will not be repaid within any grace period, if any.

(vii) Cash advance fee. Any fee imposed for an extension of credit in the form of cash or its equivalent.

(viii) Late payment fee. Any fee imposed for a late payment.

(ix) Over-the-limit fee. Any fee imposed for exceeding a credit limit.

(x) Balance transfer fee. Any fee imposed to transfer an outstanding balance.

(xi) Returned-payment fee. Any fee imposed by the creditor for a returned payment.

(xii) Required insurance, debt cancellation or debt suspension coverage.

(A) A fee for insurance described in § 226.4(b)(7) or debt cancellation or suspension coverage described in § 226.4(b)(10), if the insurance, or debt cancellation or suspension coverage is required as part of the plan; and

(B) A cross reference to any additional information provided about the insurance or coverage, as applicable.

(xiii) Available credit. If a creditor requires fees for the issuance or availability of credit described in paragraph (b)(2)(ii) of this section, or requires a security deposit for such credit, and the total amount of those required fees and/or security deposit that will be imposed and charged to the account when the account is opened is 15 percent or more of the minimum credit limit for the plan, a creditor must disclose the available credit remaining after these fees or security deposit are debited to the account. The determination whether the 15 percent threshold is met must be based on the minimum credit limit for the plan. However, the disclosure provided under this paragraph must be based on the actual initial credit limit provided on the account. In determining whether the 15 percent threshold test is met, the creditor must only consider fees for issuance or availability of credit, or a security deposit, that are required. If fees for issuance or availability are optional, these fees should not be considered in determining whether the disclosure must be given. Nonetheless, if the 15 percent threshold test is met, the creditor in providing the disclosure must disclose the amount of available credit calculated by excluding those optional fees, and the available credit including those optional fees. The creditor shall also disclose that the consumer has the right to reject the plan and not be obligated to pay those fees or any other fee or charges until the consumer has used the account or made a payment on the account after receiving a periodic statement. This paragraph does not apply with respect to fees or security deposits that are not debited to the account.

(xiv) Web site reference. For issuers of credit cards that are not charge cards, a reference to the Web site established by the Board and a statement that consumers may obtain on the Web site information about shopping for and using credit cards.

(xv) Billing error rights reference. A statement that information about consumers' right to dispute transactions is included in the account-opening disclosures.

(3) Disclosure of charges imposed as part of open-end (not home-secured) plans. A creditor shall disclose, to the extent applicable:

(i) For charges imposed as part of an open-end (not home-secured) plan, the circumstances under which the charge may be imposed, including the amount of the charge or an explanation of how the charge is determined. For finance charges, a statement of when the charge begins to accrue and an explanation of whether or not any time period exists within which any credit that has been extended may be repaid without incurring the charge. If such a time period is provided, a creditor may, at its option and without disclosure, elect not to impose a finance charge when payment is received after the time period expires.

(ii) Charges imposed as part of the plan are:

(A) Finance charges identified under § 226.4(a) and § 226.4(b).

(B) Charges resulting from the consumer's failure to use the plan as agreed, except amounts payable for collection activity after default, attorney's fees whether or not automatically imposed, and post-judgment interest rates permitted by law.

(C) Taxes imposed on the credit transaction by a state or other governmental body, such as documentary stamp taxes on cash advances.

(D) Charges for which the payment, or nonpayment, affect the consumer's access to the plan, the duration of the plan, the amount of credit extended, the period for which credit is extended, or the timing or method of billing or payment.

(E) Charges imposed for terminating a plan.

(F) Charges for voluntary credit insurance, debt cancellation or debt suspension.

(iii) Charges that are not imposed as part of the plan include:

(A) Charges imposed on a cardholder by an institution other than the card issuer for the use of the other institution's ATM in a shared or interchange system.

(B) A charge for a package of services that includes an open-end credit feature, if the fee is required whether or not the open-end credit feature is included and the non-credit services are not merely incidental to the credit feature.

(C) Charges under § 226.4(e) disclosed as specified.

(4) Disclosure of rates for open-end (not home-secured) plans. A creditor shall disclose, to the extent applicable:

(i) For each periodic rate that may be used to calculate interest:

(A) Rates. The rate, expressed as a periodic rate and a corresponding annual percentage rate.

(B) Range of balances. The range of balances to which the rate is applicable; however, a creditor is not required to adjust the range of balances disclosure to reflect the balance below which only a minimum charge applies.

(C) Type of transaction. The type of transaction to which the rate applies, if different rates apply to different types of transactions.

(D) Balance computation method. An explanation of the method used to determine the balance to which the rate is applied.

(ii) Variable-rate accounts. For interest rate changes that are tied to increases in an index or formula (variable-rate accounts) specifically set forth in the account agreement:

(A) The fact that the annual percentage rate may increase.

(B) How the rate is determined, including the margin.

(C) The circumstances under which the rate may increase.

(D) The frequency with which the rate may increase.

(E) Any limitation on the amount the rate may change.

(F) The effect(s) of an increase.

(G) Except as specified in paragraph (b)(4)(ii)(H) of this section, a rate is accurate if it is a rate as of a specified date and this rate was in effect within the last 30 days before the disclosures are provided.

(H) Creditors imposing annual percentage rates that vary according to an index that is not under the creditor's control that provide the disclosures required by paragraph (b) of this section in person at the time the open-end (not home-secured) plan is established in connection with financing the purchase of goods or services may disclose in the table a rate, or range of rates to the extent permitted by § 226.6(b)(2)(i)(E), that was in effect within the last 90 days before the disclosures are provided, along with a reference directing the consumer to the account agreement or other disclosure provided with the account-opening table where an annual percentage rate applicable to the consumer's account in effect within the last 30 days before the disclosures are provided is disclosed.

(iii) Rate changes not due to index or formula. For interest rate changes that are specifically set forth in the account agreement and not tied to increases in an index or formula:

(A) The initial rate (expressed as a periodic rate and a corresponding annual percentage rate) required under paragraph (b)(4)(i)(A) of this section.

(B) How long the initial rate will remain in effect and the specific events that cause the initial rate to change.

(C) The rate (expressed as a periodic rate and a corresponding annual percentage rate) that will apply when the initial rate is no longer in effect and any limitation on the time period the new rate will remain in effect.

(D) The balances to which the new rate will apply.

(E) The balances to which the current rate at the time of the change will apply.

(5) Additional disclosures for open-end (not home-secured) plans. A creditor shall disclose, to the extent applicable:

(i) Voluntary credit insurance, debt cancellation or debt suspension. The disclosures in §§ 226.4(d)(1)(i) and (d)(1)(ii) and (d)(3)(i) through (d)(3)(iii) if the creditor offers optional credit insurance or debt cancellation or debt suspension coverage that is identified in § 226.4(b)(7) or (b)(10).

If a range of late payment fees may be assessed, the card issuer may state the range of fees, or the highest fee and at the issuer's option with the highest fee an indication that the fee imposed could be lower. If the rate may be increased for more than one feature or balance, the card issuer may state the range of rates or the highest rate that could apply and at the issuer's option an indication that the rate imposed could be lower.

(ii) Exception. The requirements of paragraph (b)(11)(i) of this section do not apply to the following:

(A) Periodic statements provided solely for charge card accounts; and

(B) Periodic statements provided for a charged-off account where payment of the entire account balance is due immediately.

(12) Repayment disclosures.

(i) In general. Except as provided in paragraphs (b)(12)(ii) and (b)(12)(v) of this section, for a credit card account under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan, a card issuer must provide the following disclosures on each periodic statement:

(A) The following statement with a bold heading: "Minimum Payment Warning: If you make only the minimum payment each period, you will pay more in interest and it will take you longer to pay off your balance;"

(B) The minimum payment repayment estimate, as described in Appendix M1 to this part. If the minimum payment repayment estimate is less than 2 years, the card issuer must disclose the estimate in months. Otherwise, the estimate must be disclosed in years and rounded to the nearest whole year;

(C) The minimum payment total cost estimate, as described in Appendix M1 to this part. The minimum payment total cost estimate must be rounded to the nearest whole dollar;

(D) A statement that the minimum payment repayment estimate and the minimum payment total cost estimate are based on the current outstanding balance shown on the periodic statement. A statement that the minimum payment repayment estimate and the minimum payment total cost estimate are based on the assumption that only minimum payments are made and no other amounts are added to the balance;

(E) A toll-free telephone number where the consumer may obtain from the card issuer information about credit counseling services consistent with paragraph (b)(12)(iv) of this section; and

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (b)(12)(i)(F)(2) of this section, the following disclosures:

(i) The estimated monthly payment for repayment in 36 months, as described in Appendix M1 to this part. The estimated monthly payment for repayment in 36 months must be rounded to the nearest whole dollar;

(ii) A statement that the card issuer estimates that the consumer will repay the outstanding balance shown on the periodic statement in 3 years if the consumer pays the estimated monthly payment each month for 3 years;

(iii) The total cost estimate for repayment in 36 months, as described in Appendix M1 to this part. The total cost estimate for repayment in 36 months must be rounded to the nearest whole dollar; and

(iv) The savings estimate for repayment in 36 months, as described in Appendix M1 to this part. The savings estimate for repayment in 36 months must be rounded to the nearest whole dollar.

(2) The requirements of paragraph (b)(12)(i)(F)(1) of this section do not apply to a periodic statement in any of the following circumstances:

(i) The minimum payment repayment estimate that is disclosed on the periodic statement pursuant to paragraph (b)(12)(i)(B) of this section after rounding is three years or less;

(ii) The estimated monthly payment for repayment in 36 months, as described in Appendix M1 to this part, rounded to the nearest whole dollar that is calculated for a particular billing cycle is less than the minimum payment required for the plan for that billing cycle; and

(iii) A billing cycle where an account has both a balance in a revolving feature where the required minimum payments for this feature will not amortize that balance in a fixed amount of time specified in the account agreement and a balance in a fixed repayment feature where the required minimum payment for this fixed repayment feature will amortize that balance in a fixed amount of time specified in the account agreement which is less than 36 months.

(ii) Negative or no amortization. If negative or no amortization occurs when calculating the minimum payment repayment estimate as described in Appendix M1 of this part, a card issuer must provide the following disclosures on the periodic statement instead of the disclosures set forth in paragraph (b)(12)(i) of this section:

(A) The following statement: "Minimum Payment Warning: Even if you make no more charges using this card, if you make only the minimum payment each month we estimate you will never pay off the balance shown on this statement because your payment will be less than the interest charged each month";

(B) The following statement: "If you make more than the minimum payment each period, you will pay less in interest and pay off your balance sooner";

(C) The estimated monthly payment for repayment in 36 months, as described in Appendix M1 to this part. The estimated monthly payment for repayment in 36 months must be rounded to the nearest whole dollar;

(D) A statement that the card issuer estimates that the consumer will repay the outstanding balance shown on the periodic statement in 3 years if the consumer pays the estimated monthly payment each month for 3 years; and

(E) A toll-free telephone number where the consumer may obtain from the card issuer information about credit counseling services consistent with paragraph (b)(12)(iv) of this section.

(iii) Format requirements. A card issuer must provide the disclosures required by paragraph (b)(12)(i) or (b)(12)(ii) of this section in accordance with the format requirements of paragraph (b)(13) of this section, and in a format substantially similar to Samples G-18(C)(1), G-18(C)(2) and G-18(C)(3) in Appendix G to this part, as applicable.

(iv) Provision of information about credit counseling services.

(A) Required information. To the extent available from the United States Trustee or a bankruptcy administrator, a card issuer must provide through the toll-free telephone number disclosed pursuant to paragraphs (b)(12)(i) or (b)(12)(ii) of this section the name, street address, telephone number, and Web site address for at least three organizations that have been approved by the United States Trustee or a bankruptcy administrator pursuant to 11 U.S.C. 111(a)(1) to provide credit counseling services in, at the card issuer's option, either the state in which the billing address for the account is located or the state specified by the consumer.

(B) Updating required information. At least annually, a card issuer must update the information provided pursuant to paragraph (b)(12)(iv)(A) of this section for consistency with the information available from the United States Trustee or a bankruptcy administrator.

(v) Exemptions. Paragraph (b)(12) of this section does not apply to:

(A) Charge card accounts that require payment of outstanding balances in full at the end of each billing cycle;

(B) A billing cycle immediately following two consecutive billing cycles in which the consumer paid the entire balance in full, had a zero outstanding balance or had a credit balance; and

(C) A billing cycle where paying the minimum payment due for that billing cycle will pay the entire outstanding balance on the account for that billing cycle.

(13) Format requirements. The due date required by paragraph (b)(11) of this section shall be disclosed on the front of the first page of the periodic statement. The amount of the late payment fee and the annual percentage rate(s) required by paragraph (b)(11) of this section shall be stated in close proximity to the due date. The ending balance required by paragraph (b)(10) of this section and the disclosures required by paragraph (b)(12) of this section shall be disclosed closely proximate to the minimum payment due. The due date, late payment fee and annual percentage rate, ending balance, minimum payment due, and disclosures required by paragraph (b)(12) of this section shall be grouped together. Sample G-18(D) in Appendix G to this part sets forth an example of how these terms may be grouped.

(14) Deferred interest or similar transactions. For accounts with an outstanding balance subject to a deferred interest or similar program, the date by which that outstanding balance must be paid in full in order to avoid the obligation to pay finance charges on such balance must be disclosed on the front of each periodic statement issued during the deferred interest period beginning with the first periodic statement issued during the deferred interest period that reflects the deferred interest or similar transaction. The disclosure provided pursuant to this paragraph must be substantially similar to Sample G-18(H) in Appendix G to this part.

§ 226.8 Identifying transactions on periodic statements.

The creditor shall identify credit transactions on or with the first periodic statement that reflects the transaction by furnishing the following information, as applicable. n16

(a) Sale credit.

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (a)(2) of this section, for each credit transaction involving the sale of property or services, the creditor must disclose the amount and date of the transaction, and either:

(i) A brief identification n17 of the property or services purchased, for creditors and sellers that are the same or related; n18 or

(ii) The seller's name; and the city and state or foreign country where the transaction took place. n19 The creditor may omit the address or provide any suitable designation that helps the consumer to identify the transaction when the transaction took place at a location that is not fixed; took place in the consumer's home; or was a mail, Internet, or telephone order.

(2) Creditors need not comply with paragraph (a)(1) of this section if an actual copy of the receipt or other credit document is provided with the first periodic statement reflecting the transaction, and the amount of the transaction and either the date of the transaction to the consumer's account or the date of debiting the transaction are disclosed on the copy or on the periodic statement.

(b) Nonsale credit. For each credit transaction not involving the sale of property or services, the creditor must disclose a brief identification of the transaction; n20 the amount of the transaction; and at least one of the following dates: The date of the transaction, the date the transaction was debited to the consumer's account, or, if the consumer signed the credit document, the date appearing on the document. If an actual copy of the receipt or other credit document is provided and that copy shows the amount and at least one of the specified dates, the brief identification may be omitted.

(c) Alternative creditor procedures; consumer inquiries for clarification or documentation. The following procedures apply to creditors that treat an inquiry for clarification or documentation as a notice of a billing error, including correcting the account in accordance with § 226.13(e):

(1) Failure to disclose the information required by paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section is not a failure to comply with the regulation, provided that the creditor also maintains procedures reasonably designed to obtain and provide the information. This applies to transactions that take place outside a state, as defined in § 226.2(a)(26), whether or not the creditor maintains procedures reasonably adapted to obtain the required information.

(2) As an alternative to the brief identification for sale or nonsale credit, the creditor may disclose a number or symbol that also appears on the receipt or other credit document given to the consumer, if the number or symbol reasonably identifies that transaction with that creditor.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 226 REGULATION Z--TRUTH IN LENDING
Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.9

§ 226.9 Subsequent disclosure requirements.

(a) Furnishing statement of billing rights.

(1) Annual statement. The creditor shall mail or deliver the billing rights statement required by § 226.6(a)(5) and (b)(5)(iii) at least once per calendar year, at intervals of not less than 6 months nor more than 18 months, either to all consumers or to each consumer entitled to receive a periodic statement under § 226.5(b)(2) for any one billing cycle.

(2) Alternative summary statement. As an alternative to paragraph (a)(1) of this section, the creditor may mail or deliver, on or with each periodic statement, a statement substantially similar to Model Form G-4 or Model Form G-4(A) in appendix G to this part, as applicable. Creditors offering home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b may use either Model Form, at their option.

(b) Disclosures for supplemental credit access devices and additional features.

(1) If a creditor, within 30 days after mailing or delivering the account-opening disclosures under § 226.6(a)(1) or (b)(3)(ii)(A), as applicable, adds a credit feature to the consumer's account or mails or delivers to the consumer a credit access device, including but not limited to checks that access a credit card account, for which the finance charge terms are the same as those previously disclosed, no additional disclosures are necessary. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(3) of this section, after 30 days, if the creditor adds a credit feature or furnishes a credit access device (other than as a renewal, resupply, or the original issuance of a credit card) on the same finance charge terms, the creditor shall disclose, before the consumer uses the feature or device for the first time, that it is for use in obtaining credit under the terms previously disclosed.

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (b)(3) of this section, whenever a credit feature is added or a credit access device is mailed or delivered to the consumer, and the finance charge terms for the feature or device differ from disclosures previously given, the disclosures required by § 226.6(a)(1) or (b)(3)(ii)(A), as applicable, that are applicable to the added feature or device shall be given before the consumer uses the feature or device for the first time.

(3) Checks that access a credit card account.

(i) Disclosures. For open-end plans not subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, if checks that can be used to access a credit card account are provided more than 30 days after account-opening disclosures under § 226.6(b) are mailed or delivered, or are provided within 30 days of the account-opening disclosures and the finance charge terms for the checks differ from the finance charge terms previously disclosed, the creditor shall disclose on the front of the page containing the checks the following terms in the form of a table with the headings, content, and form substantially similar to Sample G-19 in appendix G to this part:

(A) If a promotional rate, as that term is defined in § 226.16(g)(2)(i) applies to the checks:

(1) The promotional rate and the time period during which the promotional rate will remain in effect;

(2) The type of rate that will apply (such as whether the purchase or cash advance rate applies) after the promotional rate expires, and the annual percentage rate that will apply after the promotional rate expires. For a variable-rate account, a creditor must disclose an annual percentage rate based on the applicable index or formula in accordance with the accuracy requirements set forth in paragraph (b)(3)(ii) of this section; and

(3) The date, if any, by which the consumer must use the checks in order to qualify for the promotional rate. If the creditor will honor checks used after such date but will apply an annual percentage rate other than the promotional rate, the creditor must disclose this fact and the type of annual percentage rate that will apply if the consumer uses the checks after such date.

(B) If no promotional rate applies to the checks:

(1) The type of rate that will apply to the checks and the applicable annual percentage rate. For a variable-rate account, a creditor must disclose an annual percentage rate based on the applicable index or formula in accordance with the accuracy requirements set forth in paragraph (b)(3)(ii) of this section.

(2) [Reserved]

(C) Any transaction fees applicable to the checks disclosed under § 226.6(b)(2)(iv); and

(D) Whether or not a grace period is given within which any credit extended by use of the checks may be repaid without incurring a finance charge due to a periodic interest rate. When disclosing whether there is a grace period, the phrase "How to Avoid Paying Interest on Check Transactions" shall be used as the row heading when a grace period applies to credit extended by the use of the checks. When disclosing the fact that no grace period exists for credit extended by use of the checks, the phrase "Paying Interest" shall be used as the row heading.

(ii) Accuracy. The disclosures in paragraph (b)(3)(i) of this section must be accurate as of the time the disclosures are mailed or delivered. A variable annual percentage rate is accurate if it was in effect within 60 days of when the disclosures are mailed or delivered.

(1) Rules affecting home-equity plans.

(i) Written notice required. For home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, whenever any term required to be disclosed under § 226.6(a) is changed or the required minimum periodic payment is increased, the creditor shall mail or deliver written notice of the change to each consumer who may be affected. The notice shall be mailed or delivered at least 15 days prior to the effective date of the change. The 15-day timing requirement does not apply if the change has been agreed to by the consumer; the notice shall be given, however, before the effective date of the change.

(ii) Notice not required. For home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, a creditor is not required to provide notice under this section when the change involves a reduction of any component of a finance or other charge or when the change results from an agreement involving a court proceeding.

(iii) Notice to restrict credit. For home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, if the creditor prohibits additional extensions of credit or reduces the credit limit pursuant to § 226.5b(f)(3)(i) or (f)(3)(vi), the creditor shall mail or deliver written notice of the action to each consumer who will be affected. The notice must be provided not later than three business days after the action is taken and shall contain specific reasons for the action. If the creditor requires the consumer to request reinstatement of credit privileges, the notice also shall state that fact.

(2) Rules affecting open-end (not home-secured) plans.

(i) Changes where written advance notice is required.

(A) General. For plans other than home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, except as provided in paragraphs (c)(2)(i)(B), (c)(2)(iii) and (c)(2)(v) of this section, when a significant change in account terms as described in paragraph (c)(2)(ii) of this section is made to a term required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(3), (b)(4) or (b)(5) or the required minimum periodic payment is increased, a creditor must provide a written notice of the change at least 45 days prior to the effective date of the change to each consumer who may be affected. The 45-day timing requirement does not apply if the consumer has agreed to a particular change; the notice shall be given, however, before the effective date of the change. Increases in the rate applicable to a consumer's account due to delinquency, default or as a penalty described in paragraph (g) of this section that are not due to a change in the contractual terms of the consumer's account must be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (g) of this section instead of paragraph (c)(2) of this section.

(B) Changes agreed to by the consumer. A notice of change in terms is required, but it may be mailed or delivered as late as the effective date of the change if the consumer agrees to the particular change. This paragraph (c)(2)(i)(B) applies only when a consumer substitutes collateral or when the creditor can advance additional credit only if a change relatively unique to that consumer is made, such as the consumer's providing additional security or paying an increased minimum payment amount. The following are not considered agreements between the consumer and the creditor for purposes of this paragraph (c)(2)(i)(B): The consumer's general acceptance of the creditor's contract reservation of the right to change terms; the consumer's use of the account (which might imply acceptance of its terms under state law); the consumer's acceptance of a unilateral term change that is not particular to that consumer, but rather is of general applicability to consumers with that type of account; and the consumer's request to reopen a closed account or to upgrade an existing account to another account offered by the creditor with different credit or other features.

(ii) Significant changes in account terms. For purposes of this section, a "significant change in account terms" means a change to a term required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(1) and (b)(2), an increase in the required minimum periodic payment, or the acquisition of a security interest.

(iii) Charges not covered by § 226.6(b)(1) and (b)(2). Except as provided in paragraph (c)(2)(vi) of this section, if a creditor increases any component of a charge, or introduces a new charge, required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(3) that is not a significant change in account terms as described in paragraph (c)(2)(ii) of this section, a creditor may either, at its option:

(A) Comply with the requirements of paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section; or

(B) Provide notice of the amount of the charge before the consumer agrees to or becomes obligated to pay the charge, at a time and in a manner that a consumer would be likely to notice the disclosure of the charge. The notice may be provided orally or in writing.

(iv) Disclosure requirements.

(A) Significant changes in account terms. If a creditor makes a significant change in account terms as described in paragraph (c)(2)(ii) of this section, the notice provided pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section must provide the following information:

(1) A summary of the changes made to terms required by § 226.6(b)(1) and (b)(2), a description of any increase in the required minimum periodic payment, and a description of any security interest being acquired by the creditor;

(2) A statement that changes are being made to the account;

(3) For accounts other than credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan subject to § 226.9(c)(2)(iv)(B), a statement indicating the consumer has the right to opt out of these changes, if applicable, and a reference to additional information describing the opt-out right provided in the notice, if applicable;

(4) The date the changes will become effective;

(5) If applicable, a statement that the consumer may find additional information about the summarized changes, and other changes to the account, in the notice;

(6) If the creditor is changing a rate on the account, other than a penalty rate, a statement that if a penalty rate currently applies to the consumer's account, the new rate described in the notice will not apply to the consumer's account until the consumer's account balances are no longer subject to the penalty rate; and

(7) If the change in terms being disclosed is an increase in an annual percentage rate, the balances to which the increased rate will be applied. If applicable, a statement identifying the balances to which the current rate will continue to apply as of the effective date of the change in terms.

(B) Right to reject for credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan. In addition to the disclosures in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A) of this section, if a card issuer makes a significant change in account terms on a credit card account under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan, the creditor must generally provide the following information on the notice provided pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section. This information is not required to be provided in the case of an increase in the required minimum periodic payment, a change in an annual percentage rate applicable to a consumer's account, a change in the balance computation method applicable to consumer's account necessary to comply with § 226.54, or when the change results from the creditor not receiving the consumer's required minimum periodic payment within 60 days after the due date for that payment:

(1) A statement that the consumer has the right to reject the change or changes prior to the effective date of the changes, unless the consumer fails to make a required minimum periodic payment within 60 days after the due date for that payment;

(2) Instructions for rejecting the change or changes, and a toll-free telephone number that the consumer may use to notify the creditor of the rejection; and

(3) If applicable, a statement that if the consumer rejects the change or changes, the consumer's ability to use the account for further advances will be terminated or suspended.

(C) Changes resulting from failure to make minimum periodic payment within 60 days from due date for credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan. For a credit card account under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan, if the significant change required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section is an increase in an annual percentage rate or a fee or charge required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(2)(ii), (b)(2)(iii), or (b)(2)(xii) based on the consumer's failure to make a minimum periodic payment within 60 days from the due date for that payment, the notice provided pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section must also contain the following information:

(1) A statement of the reason for the increase; and

(2) That the increase will cease to apply to transactions that occurred prior to or within 14 days of provision of the notice, if the creditor receives six consecutive required minimum periodic payments on or before the payment due date, beginning with the first payment due following the effective date of the increase.

(D) Format requirements.

(1) Tabular format. The summary of changes described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(1) of this section must be in a tabular format (except for a summary of any increase in the required minimum periodic payment), with headings and format substantially similar to any of the account-opening tables found in G-17 in appendix G to this part. The table must disclose the changed term and information relevant to the change, if that relevant information is required by § 226.6(b)(1) and (b)(2). The new terms shall be described in the same level of detail as required when disclosing the terms under § 226.6(b)(2).

(2) Notice included with periodic statement. If a notice required by paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section is included on or with a periodic statement, the information described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(1) of this section must be disclosed on the front of any page of the statement. The summary of changes described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(1) of this section must immediately follow the information described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(2) through (c)(2)(iv)(A)(7) and, if applicable, paragraphs (c)(2)(iv)(B) and (c)(2)(iv)(C) of this section, and be substantially similar to the format shown in Sample G-20 or G-21 in appendix G to this part.

(3) Notice provided separately from periodic statement. If a notice required by paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section is not included on or with a periodic statement, the information described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(1) of this section must, at the creditor's option, be disclosed on the front of the first page of the notice or segregated on a separate page from other information given with the notice. The summary of changes required to be in a table pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(1) of this section may be on more than one page, and may use both the front and reverse sides, so long as the table begins on the front of the first page of the notice and there is a reference on the first page indicating that the table continues on the following page. The summary of changes described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(1) of this section must immediately follow the information described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(A)(2) through (c)(2)(iv)(A)(7) and, if applicable, paragraphs (c)(2)(iv)(B) and (c)(2)(iv)(C), of this section, substantially similar to the format shown in Sample G-20 or G-21 in appendix G to this part.

(v) Notice not required. For open-end plans (other than home equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b) a creditor is not required to provide notice under this section:

(A) When the change involves charges for documentary evidence; a reduction of any component of a finance or other charge; suspension of future credit privileges (except as provided in paragraph (c)(2)(vi) of this section) or termination of an account or plan; when the change results from an agreement involving a court proceeding; when the change is an extension of the grace period; or if the change is applicable only to checks that access a credit card account and the changed terms are disclosed on or with the checks in accordance with paragraph (b)(3) of this section;

(B) When the change is an increase in an annual percentage rate upon the expiration of a specified period of time, provided that:

(1) Prior to commencement of that period, the creditor disclosed in writing to the consumer, in a clear and conspicuous manner, the length of the period and the annual percentage rate that would apply after expiration of the period;

(2) The disclosure of the length of the period and the annual percentage rate that would apply after expiration of the period are set forth in close proximity and in equal prominence to the first listing of the disclosure of the rate that applies during the specified period of time; and

(3) The annual percentage rate that applies after that period does not exceed the rate disclosed pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(v)(B)(1) of this paragraph or, if the rate disclosed pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(v)(B)(1) of this section was a variable rate, the rate following any such increase is a variable rate determined by the same formula (index and margin) that was used to calculate the variable rate disclosed pursuant to paragraph (c)(2)(v)(B)(1);

(C) When the change is an increase in a variable annual percentage rate in accordance with a credit card agreement that provides for changes in the rate according to operation of an index that is not under the control of the creditor and is available to the general public; or

(D) When the change is an increase in an annual percentage rate, a fee or charge required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(2)(ii), (b)(2)(iii), or (b)(2)(xii), or the required minimum periodic payment due to the completion of a workout or temporary hardship arrangement by the consumer or the consumer's failure to comply with the terms of such an arrangement, provided that:

(1) The annual percentage rate or fee or charge applicable to a category of transactions or the required minimum periodic payment following any such increase does not exceed the rate or fee or charge or required minimum periodic payment that applied to that category of transactions prior to commencement of the arrangement or, if the rate that applied to a category of transactions prior to the commencement of the workout or temporary hardship arrangement was a variable rate, the rate following any such increase is a variable rate determined by the same formula (index and margin) that applied to the category of transactions prior to commencement of the workout or temporary hardship arrangement; and

(2) The creditor has provided the consumer, prior to the commencement of such arrangement, with a clear and conspicuous disclosure of the terms of the arrangement (including any increases due to such completion or failure). This disclosure must generally be provided in writing. However, a creditor may provide the disclosure of the terms of the arrangement orally by telephone, provided that the creditor mails or delivers a written disclosure of the terms of the arrangement to the consumer as soon as reasonably practicable after the oral disclosure is provided.

(vi) Reduction of the credit limit. For open-end plans that are not subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, if a creditor decreases the credit limit on an account, advance notice of the decrease must be provided before an over-the-limit fee or a penalty rate can be imposed solely as a result of the consumer exceeding the newly decreased credit limit. Notice shall be provided in writing or orally at least 45 days prior to imposing the over-the-limit fee or penalty rate and shall state that the credit limit on the account has been or will be decreased.

(d) Finance charge imposed at time of transaction.

(1) Any person, other than the card issuer, who imposes a finance charge at the time of honoring a consumer's credit card, shall disclose the amount of that finance charge prior to its imposition.

(2) The card issuer, other than the person honoring the consumer's credit card, shall have no responsibility for the disclosure required by paragraph (d)(1) of this section, and shall not consider any such charge for the purposes of §§ 226.5a, 226.6 and 226.7.

(e) Disclosures upon renewal of credit or charge card.

(1) Notice prior to renewal. A card issuer that imposes any annual or other periodic fee to renew a credit or charge card account of the type subject to § 226.5a, including any fee based on account activity or inactivity or any card issuer that has changed or amended any term of a cardholder's account required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(1) and (b)(2) that has not previously been disclosed to the consumer, shall mail or deliver written notice of the renewal to the cardholder. If the card issuer imposes any annual or other periodic fee for renewal, the notice shall be provided at least 30 days or one billing cycle, whichever is less, before the mailing or the delivery of the periodic statement on which any renewal fee is initially charged to the account. If the card issuer has changed or amended any term required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(1) and (b)(2) and such changed or amended term has not previously been disclosed to the consumer, the notice shall be provided at least 30 days prior to the scheduled renewal date of the consumer's credit or charge card. The notice shall contain the following information:

(i) The disclosures contained in § 226.5a(b)(1) through (b)(7) that would apply if the account were renewed; n20a and

(ii) How and when the cardholder may terminate credit availability under the account to avoid paying the renewal fee, if applicable.

(2) Notification on periodic statements. The disclosures required by this paragraph may be made on or with a periodic statement. If any of the disclosures are provided on the back of a periodic statement, the card issuer shall include a reference to those disclosures on the front of the statement.

(f) Change in credit card account insurance provider.

(1) Notice prior to change. If a credit card issuer plans to change the provider of insurance for repayment of all or part of the outstanding balance of an open-end credit card account of the type subject to § 226.5a, the card issuer shall mail or deliver to the cardholder written notice of the change not less than 30 days before the change in provider occurs. The notice shall also include the following items, to the extent applicable:

(i) Any increase in the rate that will result from the change;

(ii) Any substantial decrease in coverage that will result from the change; and

(iii) A statement that the cardholder may discontinue the insurance.

(2) Notice when change in provider occurs. If a change described in paragraph (f)(1) of this section occurs, the card issuer shall provide the cardholder with a written notice no later than 30 days after the change, including the following items, to the extent applicable:

(i) The name and address of the new insurance provider;

(ii) A copy of the new policy or group certificate containing the basic terms of the insurance, including the rate to be charged; and

(iii) A statement that the cardholder may discontinue the insurance.

(3) Substantial decrease in coverage. For purposes of this paragraph, a substantial decrease in coverage is a decrease in a significant term of coverage that might reasonably be expected to affect the cardholder's decision to continue the insurance. Significant terms of coverage include, for example, the following:

(i) Type of coverage provided;

(ii) Age at which coverage terminates or becomes more restrictive;

(iii) Maximum insurable loan balance, maximum periodic benefit payment, maximum number of payments, or other term affecting the dollar amount of coverage or benefits provided;

(iv) Eligibility requirements and number and identity of persons covered;

(v) Definition of a key term of coverage such as disability;

(vi) Exclusions from or limitations on coverage; and

(vii) Waiting periods and whether coverage is retroactive.

(4) Combined notification. The notices required by paragraph (f)(1) and (2) of this section may be combined provided the timing requirement of paragraph (f)(1) of this section is met. The notices may be provided on or with a periodic statement.

(g) Increase in rates due to delinquency or default or as a penalty.

(1) Increases subject to this section. For plans other than home-equity plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, except as provided in paragraph (g)(4) of this section, a creditor must provide a written notice to each consumer who may be affected when:

(i) A rate is increased due to the consumer's delinquency or default; or

(ii) A rate is increased as a penalty for one or more events specified in the account agreement, such as making a late payment or obtaining an extension of credit that exceeds the credit limit.

(2) Timing of written notice. Whenever any notice is required to be given pursuant to paragraph (g)(1) of this section, the creditor shall provide written notice of the increase in rates at least 45 days prior to the effective date of the increase. The notice must be provided after the occurrence of the events described in paragraphs (g)(1)(i) and (g)(1)(ii) of this section that trigger the imposition of the rate increase.

(i) Disclosure requirements for rate increases.

(A) General. If a creditor is increasing the rate due to delinquency or default or as a penalty, the creditor must provide the following information on the notice sent pursuant to paragraph (g)(1) of this section:

(1) A statement that the delinquency or default rate or penalty rate, as applicable, has been triggered;

(2) The date on which the delinquency or default rate or penalty rate will apply;

(3) The circumstances under which the delinquency or default rate or penalty rate, as applicable, will cease to apply to the consumer's account, or that the delinquency or default rate or penalty rate will remain in effect for a potentially indefinite time period;

(4) A statement indicating to which balances the delinquency or default rate or penalty rate will be applied; and

(5) If applicable, a description of any balances to which the current rate will continue to apply as of the effective date of the rate increase, unless a consumer fails to make a minimum periodic payment within 60 days from the due date for that payment.

(B) Rate increases resulting from failure to make minimum periodic payment within 60 days from due date. For a credit card account under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan, if the rate increase required to be disclosed pursuant to paragraph (g)(1) of this section is an increase pursuant to § 226.55(b)(4) based on the consumer's failure to make a minimum periodic payment within 60 days from the due date for that payment, the notice provided pursuant to paragraph (g)(1) of this section must also contain the following information:

(1) A statement of the reason for the increase; and

(2) That the increase will cease to apply to transactions that occurred prior to or within 14 days of provision of the notice, if the creditor receives six consecutive required minimum periodic payments on or before the payment due date, beginning with the first payment due following the effective date of the increase.

(ii) Format requirements.

(A) If a notice required by paragraph (g)(1) of this section is included on or with a periodic statement, the information described in paragraph (g)(3)(i) of this section must be in the form of a table and provided on the front of any page of the periodic statement, above the notice described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv) of this section if that notice is provided on the same statement.

(B) If a notice required by paragraph (g)(1) of this section is not included on or with a periodic statement, the information described in paragraph (g)(3)(i) of this section must be disclosed on the front of the first page of the notice. Only information related to the increase in the rate to a penalty rate may be included with the notice, except that this notice may be combined with a notice described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv) or (g)(4) of this section.

(4) Exception for decrease in credit limit. A creditor is not required to provide a notice pursuant to paragraph (g)(1) of this section prior to increasing the rate for obtaining an extension of credit that exceeds the credit limit, provided that:

(i) The creditor provides at least 45 days in advance of imposing the penalty rate a notice, in writing, that includes:

(A) A statement that the credit limit on the account has been or will be decreased.

(B) A statement indicating the date on which the penalty rate will apply, if the outstanding balance exceeds the credit limit as of that date;

(C) A statement that the penalty rate will not be imposed on the date specified in paragraph (g)(4)(i)(B) of this section, if the outstanding balance does not exceed the credit limit as of that date;

(D) The circumstances under which the penalty rate, if applied, will cease to apply to the account, or that the penalty rate, if applied, will remain in effect for a potentially indefinite time period;

(E) A statement indicating to which balances the penalty rate may be applied; and

(F) If applicable, a description of any balances to which the current rate will continue to apply as of the effective date of the rate increase, unless the consumer fails to make a minimum periodic payment within 60 days from the due date for that payment; and

(ii) The creditor does not increase the rate applicable to the consumer's account to the penalty rate if the outstanding balance does not exceed the credit limit on the date set forth in the notice and described in paragraph (g)(4)(i)(B) of this section.

(iii)

(A) If a notice provided pursuant to paragraph (g)(4)(i) of this section is included on or with a periodic statement, the information described in paragraph (g)(4)(i) of this section must be in the form of a table and provided on the front of any page of the periodic statement; or

(B) If a notice required by paragraph (g)(4)(i) of this section is not included on or with a periodic statement, the information described in paragraph (g)(4)(i) of this section must be disclosed on the front of the first page of the notice. Only information related to the reduction in credit limit may be included with the notice, except that this notice may be combined with a notice described in paragraph (c)(2)(iv) or (g)(1) of this section.

(h) Consumer rejection of certain significant changes in terms.

(1) Right to reject. If paragraph (c)(2)(iv)(B) of this section requires disclosure of the consumer's right to reject a significant change to an account term, the consumer may reject that change by notifying the creditor of the rejection before the effective date of the change.

(2) Effect of rejection. If a creditor is notified of a rejection of a significant change to an account term as provided in paragraph (h)(1) of this section, the creditor must not:

(i) Apply the change to the account;

(ii) Impose a fee or charge or treat the account as in default solely as a result of the rejection; or

(iii) Require repayment of the balance on the account using a method that is less beneficial to the consumer than one of the methods listed in § 226.55(c)(2).

(3) Exception. Section 226.9(h) does not apply when the creditor has not received the consumer's required minimum periodic payment within 60 days after the due date for that payment.

Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.10

§ 226.10 Payments.

(a) General rule. A creditor shall credit a payment to the consumer's account as of the date of receipt, except when a delay in crediting does not result in a finance or other charge or except as provided in paragraph (b) of this section.

(b) Specific requirements for payments.

(1) General rule. A creditor may specify reasonable requirements for payments that enable most consumers to make conforming payments.

(2) Examples of reasonable requirements for payments. Reasonable requirements for making payment may include:

(i) Requiring that payments be accompanied by the account number or payment stub;

(ii) Setting reasonable cut-off times for payments to be received by mail, by electronic means, by telephone, and in person (except as provided in paragraph (b)(3) of this section), provided that such cut-off times shall be no earlier than 5 p.m. on the payment due date at the location specified by the creditor for the receipt of such payments;

(iii) Specifying that only checks or money orders should be sent by mail;

(iv) Specifying that payment is to be made in U.S. dollars; or

(v) Specifying one particular address for receiving payments, such as a post office box.

(3) In-person payments on credit card accounts.

(i) General. Notwithstanding § 226.10(b), payments on a credit card account under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan made in person at a branch or office of a card issuer that is a financial institution prior to the close of business of that branch or office shall be considered received on the date on which the consumer makes the payment. A card issuer that is a financial institution shall not impose a cut-off time earlier than the close of business for any such payments made in person at any branch or office of the card issuer at which such payments are accepted. Notwithstanding § 226.10(b)(2)(ii), a card issuer may impose a cut-off time earlier than 5 p.m. for such payments, if the close of business of the branch or office is earlier than 5 p.m.

(ii) Financial institution. For purposes of paragraph (b)(3) of this section, "financial institution" shall mean a bank, savings association, or credit union.

(4) Nonconforming payments. If a creditor specifies, on or with the periodic statement, requirements for the consumer to follow in making payments as permitted under this § 226.10, but accepts a payment that does not conform to the requirements, the creditor shall credit the payment within five days of receipt.

(c) Adjustment of account. If a creditor fails to credit a payment, as required by paragraphs (a) or (b) of this section, in time to avoid the imposition of finance or other charges, the creditor shall adjust the consumer's account so that the charges imposed are credited to the consumer's account during the next billing cycle.

(d) Crediting of payments when creditor does not receive or accept payments on due date.

(1) General. Except as provided in paragraph (d)(2) of this section, if a creditor does not receive or accept payments by mail on the due date for payments, the creditor may generally not treat a payment received the next business day as late for any purpose. For purposes of this paragraph (d), the "next business day" means the next day on which the creditor accepts or receives payments by mail.

(2) Payments accepted or received other than by mail. If a creditor accepts or receives payments made on the due date by a method other than mail, such as electronic or telephone payments, the creditor is not required to treat a payment made by that method on the next business day as timely, even if it does not accept mailed payments on the due date.

(e) Limitations on fees related to method of payment. For credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan, a creditor may not impose a separate fee to allow consumers to make a payment by any method, such as mail, electronic, or telephone payments, unless such payment method involves an expedited service by a customer service representative of the creditor.

(f) Changes by card issuer. If a card issuer makes a material change in the address for receiving payments or procedures for handling payments, and such change causes a material delay in the crediting of a payment to the consumer's account during the 60-day period following the date on which such change took effect, the card issuer may not impose any late fee or finance charge for a late payment on the credit card account during the 60-day period following the date on which the change took effect.

Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.11

§ 226.11 Treatment of credit balances; account termination.

(a) Credit balances. When a credit balance in excess of $1 is created on a credit account (through transmittal of funds to a creditor in excess of the total balance due on an account, through rebates of unearned finance charges or insurance premiums, or through amounts otherwise owed to or held for the benefit of the consumer), the creditor shall:

(1) Credit the amount of the credit balance to the consumer's account;

(2) Refund any part of the remaining credit balance within seven business days from receipt of a written request from the consumer;

(3) Make a good faith effort to refund to the consumer by cash, check, or money order, or credit to a deposit account of the consumer, any part of the credit balance remaining in the account for more than six months. No further action is required if the consumer's current location is not known to the creditor and cannot be traced through the consumer's last known address or telephone number.

(b) Account termination.

(1) A creditor shall not terminate an account prior to its expiration date solely because the consumer does not incur a finance charge.

(2) Nothing in paragraph (b)(1) of this section prohibits a creditor from terminating an account that is inactive for three or more consecutive months. An account is inactive for purposes of this paragraph if no credit has been extended (such as by purchase, cash advance or balance transfer) and if the account has no outstanding balance.

(c) Timely settlement of estate debts.

(1) General rule.

(i) Reasonable policies and procedures required. For credit card accounts under an open-end (not home-secured) consumer credit plan, card issuers must adopt reasonable written policies and procedures designed to ensure that an administrator of an estate of a deceased accountholder can determine the amount of and pay any balance on the account in a timely manner.

(ii) Application to joint accounts. Paragraph (c) of this section does not apply to the account of a deceased consumer if a joint accountholder remains on the account.

(2) Timely statement of balance.

(i) Requirement. Upon request by the administrator of an estate, a card issuer must provide the administrator with the amount of the balance on a deceased consumer's account in a timely manner.

(ii) Safe harbor. For purposes of paragraph (c)(2)(i) of this section, providing the amount of the balance on the account within 30 days of receiving the request is deemed to be timely.

(3) Limitations after receipt of request from administrator.

(i) Limitation on fees and increases in annual percentage rates. After receiving a request from the administrator of an estate for the amount of the balance on a deceased consumer's account, a card issuer must not impose any fees on the account (such as a late fee, annual fee, or over-the-limit fee) or increase any annual percentage rate, except as provided by § 226.55(b)(2).

(ii) Limitation on trailing or residual interest. A card issuer must waive or rebate any additional finance charge due to a periodic interest rate if payment in full of the balance disclosed pursuant to paragraph (c)(2) of this section is received within 30 days after disclosure.

Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.12

§ 226.12 Special credit card provisions.

(a) Issuance of credit cards. Regardless of the purpose for which a credit card is to be used, including business, commercial, or agricultural use, no credit card shall be issued to any person except:

(1) In response to an oral or written request or application for the card; or

(2) As a renewal of, or substitute for, an accepted credit card. n21

(b) Liability of cardholder for unauthorized use.

(i) Definition of unauthorized use. For purposes of this section, the term "unauthorized use" means the use of a credit card by a person, other than the cardholder, who does not have actual, implied, or apparent authority for such use, and from which the cardholder receives no benefit.

(ii) Limitation on amount. The liability of a cardholder for unauthorized use n22 of a credit card shall not exceed the lesser of $50 or the amount of money, property, labor, or services obtained by the unauthorized use before notification to the card issuer under paragraph (b)(3) of this section.

(2) Conditions of liability. A cardholder shall be liable for unauthorized use of a credit card only if:

(i) The credit card is an accepted credit card;

(ii) The card issuer has provided adequate notice n23 of the cardholder's maximum potential liability and of means by which the card issuer may be notified of loss or theft of the card. The notice shall state that the cardholder's liability shall not exceed $50 (or any lesser amount) and that the cardholder may give oral or written notification, and shall describe a means of notification (for example, a telephone number, an address, or both); and

(iii) The card issuer has provided a means to identify the cardholder on the account or the authorized user of the card.

(3) Notification to card issuer. Notification to a card issuer is given when steps have been taken as may be reasonably required in the ordinary course of business to provide the card issuer with the pertinent information about the loss, theft, or possible unauthorized use of a credit card, regardless of whether any particular officer, employee, or agent of the card issuer does, in fact, receive the information. Notification may be given, at the option of the person giving it, in person, by telephone, or in writing. Notification in writing is considered given at the time of receipt or, whether or not received, at the expiration of the time ordinarily required for transmission, whichever is earlier.

(4) Effect of other applicable law or agreement. If state law or an agreement between a cardholder and the card issuer imposes lesser liability than that provided in this paragraph, the lesser liability shall govern.

(5) Business use of credit cards. If 10 or more credit cards are issued by one card issuer for use by the employees of an organization, this section does not prohibit the card issuer and the organization from agreeing to liability for unauthorized use without regard to this section. However, liability for unauthorized use may be imposed on an employee of the organization, by either the card issuer or the organization, only in accordance with this section.

(c) Right of cardholder to assert claims or defenses against card issuer. n24

(1) General rule. When a person who honors a credit card fails to resolve satisfactorily a dispute as to property or services purchased with the credit card in a consumer credit transaction, the cardholder may assert against the card issuer all claims (other than tort claims) and defenses arising out of the transaction and relating to the failure to resolve the dispute. The cardholder may withhold payment up to the amount of credit outstanding for the property or services that gave rise to the dispute and any finance or other charges imposed on that amount. n25

(2) Adverse credit reports prohibited. If, in accordance with paragraph (c)(1) of this section, the cardholder withholds payment of the amount of credit outstanding for the disputed transaction, the card issuer shall not report that amount as delinquent until the dispute is settled or judgment is rendered.

(3) Limitations.

(i) General. The rights stated in paragraphs (c)(1) and (c)(2) of this section apply only if:

(A) The cardholder has made a good faith attempt to resolve the dispute with the person honoring the credit card; and

(B) The amount of credit extended to obtain the property or services that result in the assertion of the claim or defense by the cardholder exceeds $50, and the disputed transaction occurred in the same state as the cardholder's current designated address or, if not within the same state, within 100 miles from that address. n26

(ii) Exclusion. The limitations stated in paragraph (c)(3)(i)(B) of this section shall not apply when the person honoring the credit card:

(A) Is the same person as the card issuer;

(B) Is controlled by the card issuer directly or indirectly;

(C) Is under the direct or indirect control of a third person that also directly or indirectly controls the card issuer;

(D) Controls the card issuer directly or indirectly;

(E) Is a franchised dealer in the card issuer's products or services; or

(F) Has obtained the order for the disputed transaction through a mail solicitation made or participated in by the card issuer.

(d) Offsets by card issuer prohibited.

(1) A card issuer may not take any action, either before or after termination of credit card privileges, to offset a cardholder's indebtedness arising from a consumer credit transaction under the relevant credit card plan against funds of the cardholder held on deposit with the card issuer.

(2) This paragraph does not alter or affect the right of a card issuer acting under state or federal law to do any of the following with regard to funds of a cardholder held on deposit with the card issuer if the same procedure is constitutionally available to creditors generally: Obtain or enforce a consensual security interest in the funds; attach or otherwise levy upon the funds; or obtain or enforce a court order relating to the funds.

(3) This paragraph does not prohibit a plan, if authorized in writing by the cardholder, under which the card issuer may periodically deduct all or part of the cardholder's credit card debt from a deposit account held with the card issuer (subject to the limitations in § 226.13(d)(1)).

(e) Prompt notification of returns and crediting of refunds.

(1) When a creditor other than the card issuer accepts the return of property or forgives a debt for services that is to be reflected as a credit to the consumer's credit card account, that creditor shall, within 7 business days from accepting the return or forgiving the debt, transmit a credit statement to the card issuer through the card issuer's normal channels for credit statements.

(2) The card issuer shall, within 3 business days from receipt of a credit statement, credit the consumer's account with the amount of the refund.

(3) If a creditor other than a card issuer routinely gives cash refunds to consumers paying in cash, the creditor shall also give credit or cash refunds to consumers using credit cards, unless it discloses at the time the transaction is consummated that credit or cash refunds for returns are not given. This section does not require refunds for returns nor does it prohibit refunds in kind.

(f) Discounts; tie-in arrangements. No card issuer may, by contract or otherwise:

(1) Prohibit any person who honors a credit card from offering a discount to a consumer to induce the consumer to pay by cash, check, or similar means rather than by use of a credit card or its underlying account for the purchase of property or services; or

(2) Require any person who honors the card issuer's credit card to open or maintain any account or obtain any other service not essential to the operation of the credit card plan from the card issuer or any other person, as a condition of participation in a credit card plan. If maintenance of an account for clearing purposes is determined to be essential to the operation of the credit card plan, it may be required only if no service charges or minimum balance requirements are imposed.

(g) Relation to Electronic Fund Transfer Act and Regulation E. For guidance on whether Regulation Z (12 CFR part 226) or Regulation E (12 CFR part 205) applies in instances involving both credit and electronic fund transfer aspects, refer to Regulation E, 12 CFR 205.12(a) regarding issuance and liability for unauthorized use. On matters other than issuance and liability, this section applies to the credit aspects of combined credit/electronic fund transfer transactions, as applicable.

Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.13

§ 226.13 Billing error resolution.n27

(a) Definition of billing error. For purposes of this section, the term billing error means:

(1) A reflection on or with a periodic statement of an extension of credit that is not made to the consumer or to a person who has actual, implied, or apparent authority to use the consumer's credit card or open-end credit plan.

(2) A reflection on or with a periodic statement of an extension of credit that is not identified in accordance with the requirements of §§ 226.7(a)(2) or (b)(2), as applicable, and 226.8.

(3) A reflection on or with a periodic statement of an extension of credit for property or services not accepted by the consumer or the consumer's designee, or not delivered to the consumer or the consumer's designee as agreed.

(4) A reflection on a periodic statement of the creditor's failure to credit properly a payment or other credit issued to the consumer's account.

(5) A reflection on a periodic statement of a computational or similar error of an accounting nature that is made by the creditor.

(6) A reflection on a periodic statement of an extension of credit for which the consumer requests additional clarification, including documentary evidence.

(7) The creditor's failure to mail or deliver a periodic statement to the consumer's last known address if that address was received by the creditor, in writing, at least 20 days before the end of the billing cycle for which the statement was required.

(b) Billing error notice. n28 A billing error notice is a written notice n29 from a consumer that:

(1) Is received by a creditor at the address disclosed under § 226.7(a)(9) or (b)(9), as applicable, no later than 60 days after the creditor transmitted the first periodic statement that reflects the alleged billing error;

(2) Enables the creditor to identify the consumer's name and account number; and

(3) To the extent possible, indicates the consumer's belief and the reasons for the belief that a billing error exists, and the type, date, and amount of the error.

(c) Time for resolution; general procedures.

(1) The creditor shall mail or deliver written acknowledgment to the consumer within 30 days of receiving a billing error notice, unless the creditor has complied with the appropriate resolution procedures of paragraphs (e) and (f) of this section, as applicable, within the 30-day period; and

(2) The creditor shall comply with the appropriate resolution procedures of paragraphs (e) and (f) of this section, as applicable, within 2 complete billing cycles (but in no event later than 90 days) after receiving a billing error notice.

(d) Rules pending resolution. Until a billing error is resolved under paragraph (e) or (f) of this section, the following rules apply:

(1) Consumer's right to withhold disputed amount; collection action prohibited. The consumer need not pay (and the creditor may not try to collect) any portion of any required payment that the consumer believes is related to the disputed amount (including related finance or other charges). n30 If the cardholder has enrolled in an automatic payment plan offered by the card issuer and has agreed to pay the credit card indebtedness by periodic deductions from the cardholder's deposit account, the card issuer shall not deduct any part of the disputed amount or related finance or other charges if a billing error notice is received any time up to 3 business days before the scheduled payment date.

(2) Adverse credit reports prohibited. The creditor or its agent shall not (directly or indirectly) make or threaten to make an adverse report to any person about the consumer's credit standing, or report that an amount or account is delinquent, because the consumer failed to pay the disputed amount or related finance or other charges.

(3) Acceleration of debt and restriction of account prohibited. A creditor shall not accelerate any part of the consumer's indebtedness or restrict or close a consumer's account solely because the consumer has exercised in good faith rights provided by this section. A creditor may be subject to the forfeiture penalty under 15 U.S.C. 1666(e) for failure to comply with any of the requirements of this section.

(4) Permitted creditor actions. A creditor is not prohibited from taking action to collect any undisputed portion of the item or bill; from deducting any disputed amount and related finance or other charges from the consumer's credit limit on the account; or from reflecting a disputed amount and related finance or other charges on a periodic statement, provided that the creditor indicates on or with the periodic statement that payment of any disputed amount and related finance or other charges is not required pending the creditor's compliance with this section.

(e) Procedures if billing error occurred as asserted. If a creditor determines that a billing error occurred as asserted, it shall within the time limits in paragraph (c)(2) of this section:

(1) Correct the billing error and credit the consumer's account with any disputed amount and related finance or other charges, as applicable; and

(2) Mail or deliver a correction notice to the consumer.

(f) Procedures if different billing error or no billing error occurred. If, after conducting a reasonable investigation, n31 a creditor determines that no billing error occurred or that a different billing error occurred from that asserted, the creditor shall within the time limits in paragraph (c)(2) of this section:

(1) Mail or deliver to the consumer an explanation that sets forth the reasons for the creditor's belief that the billing error alleged by the consumer is incorrect in whole or in part;

(2) Furnish copies of documentary evidence of the consumer's indebtedness, if the consumer so requests; and

(3) If a different billing error occurred, correct the billing error and credit the consumer's account with any disputed amount and related finance or other charges, as applicable.

(g) Creditor's rights and duties after resolution. If a creditor, after complying with all of the requirements of this section, determines that a consumer owes all or part of the disputed amount and related finance or other charges, the creditor:

(1) Shall promptly notify the consumer in writing of the time when payment is due and the portion of the disputed amount and related finance or other charges that the consumer still owes;

(2) Shall allow any time period disclosed under § 226.6(a)(1) or (b)(2)(v), as applicable, and § 226.7(a)(8) or (b)(8), as applicable, during which the consumer can pay the amount due under paragraph (g)(1) of this section without incurring additional finance or other charges;

(3) May report an account or amount as delinquent because the amount due under paragraph (g)(1) of this section remains unpaid after the creditor has allowed any time period disclosed under § 226.6(a)(1) or (b)(2)(v), as applicable, and § 226.7(a)(8) or (b)(8), as applicable or 10 days (whichever is longer) during which the consumer can pay the amount; but

(4) May not report that an amount or account is delinquent because the amount due under paragraph (g)(1) of the section remains unpaid, if the creditor receives (within the time allowed for payment in paragraph (g)(3) of this section) further written notice from the consumer that any portion of the billing error is still in dispute, unless the creditor also:

(i) Promptly reports that the amount or account is in dispute;

(ii) Mails or delivers to the consumer (at the same time the report is made) a written notice of the name and address of each person to whom the creditor makes a report; and

(iii) Promptly reports any subsequent resolution of the reported delinquency to all persons to whom the creditor has made a report.

(h) Reassertion of billing error. A creditor that has fully complied with the requirements of this section has no further responsibilities under this section (other than as provided in paragraph (g)(4) of this section) if a consumer reasserts substantially the same billing error.

(i) Relation to Electronic Fund Transfer Act and Regulation E. If an extension of credit is incident to an electronic fund transfer, under an agreement between a consumer and a financial institution to extend credit when the consumer's account is overdrawn or to maintain a specified minimum balance in the consumer's account, the creditor shall comply with the requirements of Regulation E, 12 CFR 205.11 governing error resolution rather than those of paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (e), (f), and (h) of this section.

Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.14

§ 226.14 Determination of annual percentage rate.

(a) General rule. The annual percentage rate is a measure of the cost of credit, expressed as a yearly rate. An annual percentage rate shall be considered accurate if it is not more than 1/8th of 1 percentage point above or below the annual percentage rate determined in accordance with this section. n31a An error in disclosure of the annual percentage rate or finance charge shall not, in itself, be considered a violation of this regulation if:

(1) The error resulted from a corresponding error in a calculation tool used in good faith by the creditor; and

(2) Upon discovery of the error, the creditor promptly discontinues use of that calculation tool for disclosure purposes, and notifies the Board in writing of the error in the calculation tool.

(b) Annual percentage rate--in general. Where one or more periodic rates may be used to compute the finance charge, the annual percentage rate(s) to be disclosed for purposes of §§ 226.5a, 226.5b, 226.6, 226.7(a)(4) or (b)(4), 226.9, 226.15, 226.16, 226.26, 226.55, and 226.56 shall be computed by multiplying each periodic rate by the number of periods in a year.

(c) Optional effective annual percentage rate for periodic statements for creditors offering open-end plans subject to the requirements of § 226.5b. A creditor offering an open-end plan subject to the requirements of § 226.5b need not disclose an effective annual percentage rate. Such a creditor may, at its option, disclose an effective annual percentage rate(s) pursuant to § 226.7(a)(7) and compute the effective annual percentage rate as follows:

(1) Solely periodic rates imposed. If the finance charge is determined solely by applying one or more periodic rates, at the creditor's option, either:

(i) By multiplying each periodic rate by the number of periods in a year; or

(ii) By dividing the total finance charge for the billing cycle by the sum of the balances to which the periodic rates were applied and multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by the number of billing cycles in a year.

(2) Minimum or fixed charge, but not transaction charge, imposed. If the finance charge imposed during the billing cycle is or includes a minimum, fixed, or other charge not due to the application of a periodic rate, other than a charge with respect to any specific transaction during the billing cycle, by dividing the total finance charge for the billing cycle by the amount of the balance(s) to which it is applicable n32 and multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by the number of billing cycles in a year. n33 If there is no balance to which the finance charge is applicable, an annual percentage rate cannot be determined under this section. Where the finance charge imposed during the billing cycle is or includes a loan fee, points, or similar charge that relates to opening, renewing, or continuing an account, the amount of such charge shall not be included in the calculation of the annual percentage rate.

(3) Transaction charge imposed. If the finance charge imposed during the billing cycle is or includes a charge relating to a specific transaction during the billing cycle (even if the total finance charge also includes any other minimum, fixed, or other charge not due to the application of a periodic rate), by dividing the total finance charge imposed during the billing cycle by the total of all balances and other amounts on which a finance charge was imposed during the billing cycle without duplication, and multiplying the quotient (expressed as a percentage) by the number of billing cycles in a year, n34 except that the annual percentage rate shall not be less than the largest rate determined by multiplying each periodic rate imposed during the billing cycle by the number of periods in a year. n35 Where the finance charge imposed during the billing cycle is or includes a loan fee, points, or similar charge that relates to the opening, renewing, or continuing an account, the amount of such charge shall not be included in the calculation of the annual percentage rate. See appendix F to this part regarding determination of the denominator of the fraction under this paragraph.

(4) If the finance charge imposed during the billing cycle is or includes a minimum, fixed, or other charge not due to the application of a periodic rate and the total finance charge imposed during the billing cycle does not exceed 50 cents for a monthly or longer billing cycle, or the pro rata part of 50 cents for a billing cycle shorter than monthly, at the creditor's option, by multiplying each applicable periodic rate by the number of periods in a year, notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs (c)(2) and (c)(3) of this section.

(d) Calculations where daily periodic rate applied. If the provisions of paragraph (c)(1)(ii) or (c)(2) of this section apply and all or a portion of the finance charge is determined by the application of one or more daily periodic rates, the annual percentage rate may be determined either:

(1) By dividing the total finance charge by the average of the daily balances and multiplying the quotient by the number of billing cycles in a year; or

(2) By dividing the total finance charge by the sum of the daily balances and multiplying the quotient by 365.

Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.15

§ 226.15 Right of rescission.

(1)

(i) Except as provided in paragraph (a)(1)(ii) of this section, in a credit plan in which a security interest is or will be retained or acquired in a consumer's principal dwelling, each consumer whose ownership interest is or will be subject to the security interest shall have the right to rescind: each credit extension made under the plan; the plan when the plan is opened; a security interest when added or increased to secure an existing plan; and the increase when a credit limit on the plan is increased.

(ii) As provided in section 125(e) of the Act, the consumer does not have the right to rescind each credit extension made under the plan if such extension is made in accordance with a previously established credit limit for the plan.

(2) To exercise the right to rescind, the consumer shall notify the creditor of the rescission by mail, telegram, or other means of written communication. Notice is considered given when mailed, or when filed for telegraphic transmission, or, if sent by other means, when delivered to the creditor's designated place of business.

(3) The consumer may exercise the right to rescind until midnight of the third business day following the occurrence described in paragraph (a)(1) of this section that gave rise to the right of rescission, delivery of the notice required by paragraph (b) of this section, or delivery of all material disclosures, n36 whichever occurs last. If the required notice and material disclosures are not delivered, the right to rescind shall expire 3 years after the occurrence giving rise to the right of rescission, or upon transfer of all of the consumer's interest in the property, or upon sale of the property, whichever occurs first. In the case of certain administrative proceedings, the rescission period shall be extended in accordance with section 125(f) of the Act.

(4) When more than one consumer has the right to rescind, the exercise of the right by one consumer shall be effective as to all consumers.

(b) Notice of right to rescind. In any transaction or occurrence subject to rescission, a creditor shall deliver two copies of the notice of the right to rescind to each consumer entitled to rescind (one copy to each if the notice is delivered in electronic form in accordance with the consumer consent and other applicable provisions of the E-Sign Act). The notice shall identify the transaction or occurrence and clearly and conspicuously disclose the following:

(1) The retention or acquisition of a security interest in the consumer's principal dwelling.

(2) The consumer's right to rescind, as described in paragraph (a)(1) of this section.

(3) How to exercise the right to rescind, with a form for that purpose, designating the address of the creditor's place of business.

(4) The effects of rescission, as described in paragraph (d) of this section.

(5) The date the rescission period expires.

(c) Delay of creditor's performance. Unless a consumer waives the right to rescind under paragraph (e) of this section, no money shall be disbursed other than in escrow, no services shall be performed, and no materials delivered until after the rescission period has expired and the creditor is reasonably satisfied that the consumer has not rescinded. A creditor does not violate this section if a third party with no knowledge of the event activating the rescission right does not delay in providing materials or services, as long as the debt incurred for those materials or services is not secured by the property subject to rescission.

(d) Effects of rescission.

(1) When a consumer rescinds a transaction, the security interest giving rise to the right of rescission becomes void, and the consumer shall not be liable for any amount, including any finance charge.

(2) Within 20 calendar days after receipt of a notice of rescission, the creditor shall return any money or property that has been given to anyone in connection with the transaction and shall take any action necessary to reflect the termination of the security interest.

(3) If the creditor has delivered any money or property, the consumer may retain possession until the creditor has met its obligation under paragraph (d)(2) of this section. When the creditor has complied with that paragraph, the consumer shall tender the money or property to the creditor or, where the latter would be impracticable or inequitable, tender its reasonable value. At the consumer's option, tender of property may be made at the location of the property or at the consumer's residence. Tender of money must be made at the creditor's designated place of business. If the creditor does not take possession of the money or property within 20 calendar days after the consumer's tender, the consumer may keep it without further obligation.

(4) The procedures outlined in paragraphs (d)(2) and (3) of this section may be modified by court order.

(1) The consumer may modify or waive the right to rescind if the consumer determines that the extension of credit is needed to meet a bona fide personal financial emergency. To modify or waive the right, the consumer shall give the creditor a dated written statement that describes the emergency, specifically modifies or waives the right to rescind, and bears the signature of all the consumers entitled to rescind. Printed forms for this purpose are prohibited, except as provided in paragraph (e)(2) of this section.

(2) The need of the consumer to obtain funds immediately shall be regarded as a bona fide personal financial emergency provided that the dwelling securing the extension of credit is located in an area declared during June through September 1993, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 5170, to be a major disaster area because of severe storms and flooding in the Midwest. n36a In this instance, creditors may use printed forms for the consumer to waive the right to rescind. This exemption to paragraph (e)(1) of this section shall expire one year from the date an area was declared a major disaster.

(3) The consumer's need to obtain funds immediately shall be regarded as a bona fide personal financial emergency provided that the dwelling securing the extension of credit is located in an area declared during June through September 1994 to be a major disaster area, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 5170, because of severe storms and flooding in the South. n36b In this instance, creditors may use printed forms for the consumer to waive the right to rescind. This exemption to paragraph (e)(1) of this section shall expire one year from the date an area was declared a major disaster.

(4) The consumer's need to obtain funds immediately shall be regarded as a bona fide personal financial emergency provided that the dwelling securing the extension of credit is located in an area declared during October 1994 to be a major disaster area, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 5170, because of severe storms and flooding in Texas. n36c In this instance, creditors may use printed forms for the consumer to waive the right to rescind. This exemption to paragraph (e)(1) of this section shall expire one year from the date an area was declared a major disaster.

(f) Exempt transactions. The right to rescind does not apply to the following:

(1) A residential mortgage transaction.

(2) A credit plan in which a state agency is a creditor.

Subpart B Open End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.16

§ 226.16 Advertising.

(a) Actually available terms. If an advertisement for credit states specific credit terms, it shall state only those terms that actually are or will be arranged or offered by the creditor.

(b) Advertisement of terms that require additional disclosures.

(1) Any term required to be disclosed under § 226.6(b)(3) set forth affirmatively or negatively in an advertisement for an open-end (not home-secured) credit plan triggers additional disclosures under this section. Any term required to be disclosed under § 226.6(a)(1) or (a)(2) set forth affirmatively or negatively in an advertisement for a home-equity plan subject to the requirements of § 226.5b triggers additional disclosures under this section. If any of the terms that trigger additional disclosures under this paragraph is set forth in an advertisement, the advertisement shall also clearly and conspicuously set forth the following: n36d

(i) Any minimum, fixed, transaction, activity or similar charge that is a finance charge under § 226.4 that could be imposed.

(ii) Any periodic rate that may be applied expressed as an annual percentage rate as determined under § 226.14(b). If the plan provides for a variable periodic rate, that fact shall be disclosed.

(iii) Any membership or participation fee that could be imposed.

(2) If an advertisement for credit to finance the purchase of goods or services specified in the advertisement states a periodic payment amount, the advertisement shall also state the total of payments and the time period to repay the obligation, assuming that the consumer pays only the periodic payment amount advertised. The disclosure of the total of payments and the time period to repay the obligation must be equally prominent to the statement of the periodic payment amount.

(c) Catalogs or other multiple-page advertisements; electronic advertisements.

(1) If a catalog or other multiple-page advertisement, or an electronic advertisement (such as an advertisement appearing on an Internet Web site), gives information in a table or schedule in sufficient detail to permit determination of the disclosures required by paragraph (b) of this section, it shall be considered a single advertisement if:

(i) The table or schedule is clearly and conspicuously set forth; and

(ii) Any statement of terms set forth in § 226.6 appearing anywhere else in the catalog or advertisement clearly refers to the page or location where the table or schedule begins.

(2) A catalog or other multiple-page advertisement or an electronic advertisement (such as an advertisement appearing on an Internet Web site) complies with this paragraph if the table or schedule of terms includes all appropriate disclosures for a representative scale of amounts up to the level of the more commonly sold higher-priced property or services offered.

(d) Additional requirements for home-equity plans.

(1) Advertisement of terms that require additional disclosures. If any of the terms required to be disclosed under § 226.6(a)(1) or (a)(2) or the payment terms of the plan are set forth, affirmatively or negatively, in an advertisement for a home-equity plan subject to the requirements of § 226.5b, the advertisement also shall clearly and conspicuously set forth the following:

(i) Any loan fee that is a percentage of the credit limit under the plan and an estimate of any other fees imposed for opening the plan, stated as a single dollar amount or a reasonable range.

(ii) Any periodic rate used to compute the finance charge, expressed as an annual percentage rate as determined under § 226.14(b).

(iii) The maximum annual percentage rate that may be imposed in a variable-rate plan.

(2) Discounted and premium rates. If an advertisement states an initial annual percentage rate that is not based on the index and margin used to make later rate adjustments in a variable-rate plan, the advertisement also shall state with equal prominence and in close proximity to the initial rate:

(i) The period of time such initial rate will be in effect; and

(ii) A reasonably current annual percentage rate that would have been in effect using the index and margin.

(3) Balloon payment. If an advertisement contains a statement of any minimum periodic payment and a balloon payment may result if only the minimum periodic payments are made, even if such a payment is uncertain or unlikely, the advertisement also shall state with equal prominence and in close proximity to the minimum periodic payment statement that a balloon payment may result, if applicable. n36e A balloon payment results if paying the minimum periodic payments does not fully amortize the outstanding balance by a specified date or time, and the consumer is required to repay the entire outstanding balance at such time. If a balloon payment will occur when the consumer makes only the minimum payments required under the plan, an advertisement for such a program which contains any statement of any minimum periodic payment shall also state with equal prominence and in close proximity to the minimum periodic payment statement:

(i) That a balloon payment will result; and

(ii) The amount and timing of the balloon payment that will result if the consumer makes only the minimum payments for the maximum period of time that the consumer is permitted to make such payments.

(4) Tax implications. An advertisement that states that any interest expense incurred under the home-equity plan is or may be tax deductible may not be misleading in this regard. If an advertisement distributed in paper form or through the Internet (rather than by radio or television) is for a home-equity plan secured by the consumer's principal dwelling, and the advertisement states that the advertised extension of credit may exceed the fair market value of the dwelling, the advertisement shall clearly and conspicuously state that:

(i) The interest on the portion of the credit extension that is greater than the fair market value of the dwelling is not tax deductible for Federal income tax purposes; and

(ii) The consumer should consult a tax adviser for further information regarding the deductibility of interest and charges.

(5) Misleading terms. An advertisement may not refer to a home-equity plan as "free money" or contain a similarly misleading term.

(6) Promotional rates and payments.

(i) Definitions. The following definitions apply for purposes of paragraph (d)(6) of this section:

(A) Promotional rate. The term "promotional rate" means, in a variable-rate plan, any annual percentage rate that is not based on the index and margin that will be used to make rate adjustments under the plan, if that rate is less than a reasonably current annual percentage rate that would be in effect under the index and margin that will be used to make rate adjustments under the plan.

(B) Promotional payment. The term "promotional payment" means:

(1) For a variable-rate plan, any minimum payment applicable for a promotional period that:

(i) Is not derived by applying the index and margin to the outstanding balance when such index and margin will be used to determine other minimum payments under the plan; and

(ii) Is less than other minimum payments under the plan derived by applying a reasonably current index and margin that will be used to determine the amount of such payments, given an assumed balance.

(2) For a plan other than a variable-rate plan, any minimum payment applicable for a promotional period if that payment is less than other payments required under the plan given an assumed balance.

(C) Promotional period. A "promotional period" means a period of time, less than the full term of the loan, that the promotional rate or promotional payment may be applicable.

(ii) Stating the promotional period and post-promotional rate or payments. If any annual percentage rate that may be applied to a plan is a promotional rate, or if any payment applicable to a plan is a promotional payment, the following must be disclosed in any advertisement, other than television or radio advertisements, in a clear and conspicuous manner with equal prominence and in close proximity to each listing of the promotional rate or payment:

(A) The period of time during which the promotional rate or promotional payment will apply;

(B) In the case of a promotional rate, any annual percentage rate that will apply under the plan. If such rate is variable, the annual percentage rate must be disclosed in accordance with the accuracy standards in §§ 226.5b or 226.16(b)(1)(ii) as applicable; and

(C) In the case of a promotional payment, the amounts and time periods of any payments that will apply under the plan. In variable-rate transactions, payments that will be determined based on application of an index and margin shall be disclosed based on a reasonably current index and margin.

(iii) Envelope excluded. The requirements in paragraph (d)(6)(ii) of this section do not apply to an envelope in which an application or solicitation is mailed, or to a banner advertisement or pop-up advertisement linked to an application or solicitation provided electronically.

(e) Alternative disclosures--television or radio advertisements. An advertisement made through television or radio stating any of the terms requiring additional disclosures under paragraphs (b)(1) or (d)(1) of this section may alternatively comply with paragraphs (b)(1) or (d)(1) of this section by stating the information required by paragraphs (b)(1)(ii) or (d)(1)(ii) of this section, as applicable, and listing a toll-free telephone number, or any telephone number that allows a consumer to reverse the phone charges when calling for information, along with a reference that such number may be used by consumers to obtain the additional cost information.

(f) Misleading terms. An advertisement may not refer to an annual percentage rate as "fixed," or use a similar term, unless the advertisement also specifies a time period that the rate will be fixed and the rate will not increase during that period, or if no such time period is provided, the rate will not increase while the plan is open.

(g) Promotional rates.

(1) Scope. The requirements of this paragraph apply to any advertisement of an open-end (not home-secured) plan, including promotional materials accompanying applications or solicitations subject to § 226.5a(c) or accompanying applications or solicitations subject to § 226.5a(e).

(2) Definitions.

(i) Promotional rate means any annual percentage rate applicable to one or more balances or transactions on an open-end (not home-secured) plan for a specified period of time that is lower than the annual percentage rate that will be in effect at the end of that period on such balances or transactions.

(ii) Introductory rate means a promotional rate offered in connection with the opening of an account.

(iii) Promotional period means the maximum time period for which the promotional rate may be applicable.

(3) Stating the term "introductory". If any annual percentage rate that may be applied to the account is an introductory rate, the term introductory or intro must be in immediate proximity to each listing of the introductory rate in a written or electronic advertisement.

(4) Stating the promotional period and post-promotional rate. If any annual percentage rate that may be applied to the account is a promotional rate under paragraph (g)(2)(i) of this section, the information in paragraphs (g)(4)(i) and (g)(4)(ii) of this section must be stated in a clear and conspicuous manner in the advertisement. If the rate is stated in a written or electronic advertisement, the information in paragraphs (g)(4)(i) and (g)(4)(ii) of this section must also be stated in a prominent location closely proximate to the first listing of the promotional rate.

(i) When the promotional rate will end; and

(ii) The annual percentage rate that will apply after the end of the promotional period. If such rate is variable, the annual percentage rate must comply with the accuracy standards in §§ 226.5a(c)(2), 226.5a(d)(3), 226.5a(e)(4), or 226.16(b)(1)(ii), as applicable. If such rate cannot be determined at the time disclosures are given because the rate depends at least in part on a later determination of the consumer's creditworthiness, the advertisement must disclose the specific rates or the range of rates that might apply.

(5) Envelope excluded. The requirements in paragraph (g)(4) of this section do not apply to an envelope or other enclosure in which an application or solicitation is mailed, or to a banner advertisement or pop-up advertisement, linked to an application or solicitation provided electronically.

(h) Deferred interest or similar offers.

(1) Scope. The requirements of this paragraph apply to any advertisement of an open-end credit plan not subject to § 226.5b, including promotional materials accompanying applications or solicitations subject to § 226.5a(c) or accompanying applications or solicitations subject to § 226.5a(e).

(2) Definitions. "Deferred interest" means finance charges, accrued on balances or transactions, that a consumer is not obligated to pay or that will be waived or refunded to a consumer if those balances or transactions are paid in full by a specified date. The maximum period from the date the consumer becomes obligated for the balance or transaction until the specified date by which the consumer must pay the balance or transaction in full in order to avoid finance charges, or receive a waiver or refund of finance charges, is the "deferred interest period." "Deferred interest" does not include any finance charges the consumer avoids paying in connection with any recurring grace period.

(3) Stating the deferred interest period. If a deferred interest offer is advertised, the deferred interest period must be stated in a clear and conspicuous manner in the advertisement. If the phrase "no interest" or similar term regarding the possible avoidance of interest obligations under the deferred interest program is stated, the term "if paid in full" must also be stated in a clear and conspicuous manner preceding the disclosure of the deferred interest period in the advertisement. If the deferred interest offer is included in a written or electronic advertisement, the deferred interest period and, if applicable, the term "if paid in full" must also be stated in immediate proximity to each statement of "no interest," "no payments," "deferred interest," "same as cash," or similar term regarding interest or payments during the deferred interest period.

(4) Stating the terms of the deferred interest or similar offer. If any deferred interest offer is advertised, the information in paragraphs (h)(4)(i) and (h)(4)(ii) of this section must be stated in the advertisement, in language similar to Sample G-24 in Appendix G to this part. If the deferred interest offer is included in a written or electronic advertisement, the information in paragraphs (h)(4)(i) and (h)(4)(ii) of this section must also be stated in a prominent location closely proximate to the first statement of "no interest," "no payments," "deferred interest," "same as cash," or similar term regarding interest or payments during the deferred interest period.

(i) A statement that interest will be charged from the date the consumer becomes obligated for the balance or transaction subject to the deferred interest offer if the balance or transaction is not paid in full within the deferred interest period; and

(ii) A statement, if applicable, that interest will be charged from the date the consumer incurs the balance or transaction subject to the deferred interest offer if the account is in default before the end of the deferred interest period.

(5) Envelope excluded. The requirements in paragraph (h)(4) of this section do not apply to an envelope or other enclosure in which an application or solicitation is mailed, or to a banner advertisement or pop-up advertisement linked to an application or solicitation provided electronically.

§ 226.17 General disclosure requirements.

(a) Form of disclosures.

(1) The creditor shall make the disclosures required by this subpart clearly and conspicuously in writing, in a form that the consumer may keep. The disclosures required by this subpart may be provided to the consumer in electronic form, subject to compliance with the consumer consent and other applicable provisions of the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-Sign Act) (15 U.S.C. 7001 et seq.). The disclosures required by §§ 226.17(g), 226.19(b), and 226.24 may be provided to the consumer in electronic form without regard to the consumer consent or other provisions of the E-Sign Act in the circumstances set forth in those sections. The disclosures shall be grouped together, shall be segregated from everything else, and shall not contain any information not directly related n37 to the disclosures required under § 226.18. n38 The itemization of the amount financed under § 226.18(c)(1) must be separate from the other disclosures under that section.

(2) The terms "finance charge" and "annual percentage rate," when required to be disclosed under § 226.18 (d) and (e) together with a corresponding amount or percentage rate, shall be more conspicuous than any other disclosure, except the creditor's identity under § 226.18(a).

(b) Time of disclosures. The creditor shall make disclosures before consummation of the transaction. In certain mortgage transactions, special timing requirements are set forth in § 226.19(a). In certain variable-rate transactions, special timing requirements for variable-rate disclosures are set forth in § 226.19(b) and § 226.20(c). In certain transactions involving mail or telephone orders or a series of sales, the timing of the disclosures may be delayed in accordance with paragraphs (g) and (h) of this section.

(c) Basis of disclosures and use of estimates.

(1) The disclosures shall reflect the terms of the legal obligation between the parties.

(i) If any information necessary for an accurate disclosure is unknown to the creditor, the creditor shall make the disclosure based on the best information reasonably available at the time the disclosure is provided to the consumer, and shall state clearly that the disclosure is an estimate.

(ii) For a transaction in which a portion of the interest is determined on a per-diem basis and collected at consummation, any disclosure affected by the per-diem interest shall be considered accurate if the disclosure is based on the information known to the creditor at the time that the disclosure documents are prepared for consummation of the transaction.

(3) The creditor may disregard the effects of the following in making calculations and disclosures.

(i) The payments must be collected in whole cents.

(ii) That dates of scheduled payments and advances may be changed because the scheduled date is not a business day.

(iii) That months have different numbers of days.

(iv) The occurrence of leap year.

(4) In making calculations and disclosures, the creditor may disregard any irregularity in the first period that falls within the limits described below and any payment schedule irregularity that results from the irregular first period:

(i) For transactions in which the term is less than 1 year, a first period not more than 6 days shorter or 13 days longer than a regular period;

(ii) For transactions in which the term is at least 1 year and less than 10 years, a first period not more than 11 days shorter or 21 days longer than a regular period; and

(iii) For transactions in which the term is at least 10 years, a first period shorter than or not more than 32 days longer than a regular period.

(5) If an obligation is payable on demand, the creditor shall make the disclosures based on an assumed maturity of 1 year. If an alternate maturity date is stated in the legal obligation between the parties, the disclosures shall be based on that date.

(i) A series of advances under an agreement to extend credit up to a certain amount may be considered as one transaction.

(ii) When a multiple-advance loan to finance the construction of a dwelling may be permanently financed by the same creditor, the construction phase and the permanent phase may be treated as either one transaction or more than one transaction.

(d) Multiple creditors; multiple consumers. If a transaction involves more than one creditor, only one set of disclosures shall be given and the creditors shall agree among themselves which creditor must comply with the requirements that this regulation imposes on any or all of them. If there is more than one consumer, the disclosures may be made to any consumer who is primarily liable on the obligation. If the transaction is rescindable under § 226.23, however, the disclosures shall be made to each consumer who has the right to rescind.

(e) Effect of subsequent events. If a disclosure becomes inaccurate because of an event that occurs after the creditor delivers the required disclosures, the inaccuracy is not a violation of this regulation, although new disclosures may be required under paragraph (f) of this section, § 226.19, or § 226.20.

(f) Early disclosures. If disclosures required by this subpart are given before the date of consummation of a transaction and a subsequent event makes them inaccurate, the creditor shall disclose before consummation (subject to the provisions of § 226.19(a)(2) and § 226.19(a)(5)(iii)): n39

(1) Any changed term unless the term was based on an estimate in accordance with § 226.17(c)(2) and was labelled an estimate;

(2) All changed terms, if the annual percentage rate at the time of consummation varies from the annual percentage rate disclosed earlier by more than 1/8 of 1 percentage point in a regular transaction, or more than 1/4 of 1 percentage point in an irregular transaction, as defined in § 226.22(a).

(g) Mail or telephone orders--delay in disclosures. If a creditor receives a purchase order or a request for an extension of credit by mail, telephone, or facsimile machine without face-to-face or direct telephone solicitation, the creditor may delay the disclosures until the due date of the first payment, if the following information for representative amounts or ranges of credit is made available in written form or in electronic form to the consumer or to the public before the actual purchase order or request:

(1) The cash price or the principal loan amount.

(2) The total sale price.

(3) The finance charge.

(4) The annual percentage rate, and if the rate may increase after consummation, the following disclosures:

(i) The circumstances under which the rate may increase.

(ii) Any limitations on the increase.

(iii) The effect of an increase.

(5) The terms of repayment.

(h) Series of sales--delay in disclosures. If a credit sale is one of a series made under an agreement providing that subsequent sales may be added to an outstanding balance, the creditor may delay the required disclosures until the due date of the first payment for the current sale, if the following two conditions are met:

(1) The consumer has approved in writing the annual percentage rate or rates, the range of balances to which they apply, and the method of treating any unearned finance charge on an existing balance.

(2) The creditor retains no security interest in any property after the creditor has received payments equal to the cash price and any finance charge attributable to the sale of that property. For purposes of this provision, in the case of items purchased on different dates, the first purchased is deemed the first item paid for; in the case of items purchased on the same date, the lowest priced is deemed the first item paid for.

(i) Interim student credit extensions. For each transaction involving an interim credit extension under a student credit program, the creditor need not make the following disclosures: the finance charge under § 226.18(d), the payment schedule under § 226.18(g), the total of payments under § 226.18(h), or the total sale price under § 226.18(j).

FOOTNOTES:

(n50)Footnote 37. The disclosures may include an acknowledgment of receipt, the date of the transaction, and the consumer's name, address, and account number.

(n51)Footnote 38. The following disclosures may be made together with or separately from other required disclosures: the creditor's identity under § 226.18(a), the variable rate example under § 226.18(f)(1)(iv), insurance or debt cancellation under § 226.18(n), and certain security interest charges under § 226.18(o).

(ii) is greater than the amount required to be disclosed.

(2) Other credit. In any other transaction, the amount disclosed as the finance charge shall be treated as accurate if, in a transaction involving an amount financed of $1,000 or less, it is not more than $5 above or below the amount required to be disclosed; or, in a transaction involving an amount financed of more than $1,000, it is not more than $10 above or below the amount required to be disclosed.

(ii) A statement that variable-rate disclosures have been provided earlier.

(g) Payment schedule. The number, amounts, and timing of payments scheduled to repay the obligation.

(1) In a demand obligation with no alternate maturity date, the creditor may comply with this paragraph by disclosing the due dates or payment periods of any scheduled interest payments for the first year.

(2) In a transaction in which a series of payments varies because a finance charge is applied to the unpaid principal balance, the creditor may comply with this paragraph by disclosing the following information:

(i) The dollar amounts of the largest and smallest payments in the series.

(ii) A reference to the variations in the other payments in the series.

(h) Total of payments. The "total of payments," using that term, and a descriptive explanation such as "the amount you will have paid when you have made all scheduled payments." n44

(i) Demand feature. If the obligation has a demand feature, that fact shall be disclosed. When the disclosures are based on an assumed maturity of 1 year as provided in § 226.17(c)(5), that fact shall also be disclosed.

(j) Total sale price. In a credit sale, the "total sale price," using that term, and a descriptive explanation (including the amount of any downpayment) such as "the total price of your purchase on credit, including your downpayment of $_____." A statement that the consumer should refer to the appropriate contract document for information about nonpayment, default, the right to accelerate the maturity of the obligation, and prepayment rebates and penalties. At the creditor's option, the statement may also include a reference to the contract for further information about security interests and, in a residential mortgage transaction, about the creditor's policy regarding assumption of the obligation.

(q) Assumption policy. In a residential mortgage transaction, a statement whether or not a subsequent purchaser of the dwelling from the consumer may be permitted to assume the remaining obligation on its original terms.

(r) Required deposit. If the creditor requires the consumer to maintain a deposit as a condition of the specific transaction, a statement that the annual percentage rate does not reflect the effect of the required deposit. n45

Subpart C Closed-End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.19

§ 226.19 Certain mortgage and variable-rate transactions. [Effective Oct. 1, 2009.]

(a) Mortgage transactions subject to RESPA--

(i) Time of disclosures. In a mortgage transaction subject to the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (12 U.S.C. 2601 et seq.) that is secured by the consumer's dwelling, other than a home equity line of credit subject to § 226.5b or mortgage transaction subject to paragraph (a)(5) of this section, the creditor shall make good faith estimates of the disclosures required by § 226.18 and shall deliver or place them in the mail not later than the third business day after the creditor receives the consumer's written application.

(ii) Imposition of fees. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(1)(iii) of this section, neither a creditor nor any other person may impose a fee on a consumer in connection with the consumer's application for a mortgage transaction subject to paragraph (a)(1)(i) of this section before the consumer has received the disclosures required by paragraph (a)(1)(i) of this section. If the disclosures are mailed to the consumer, the consumer is considered to have received them three business days after they are mailed.

(iii) Exception to fee restriction. A creditor or other person may impose a fee for obtaining the consumer's credit history before the consumer has received the disclosures required by paragraph (a)(1)(i) of this section, provided the fee is bona fide and reasonable in amount.

(2) Waiting periods for early disclosures and corrected disclosures.

(i) The creditor shall deliver or place in the mail the good faith estimates required by paragraph (a)(1)(i) of this section not later than the seventh business day before consummation of the transaction.

(ii) If the annual percentage rate disclosed under paragraph (a)(1)(i) of this section becomes inaccurate, as defined in § 226.22, the creditor shall provide corrected disclosures with all changed terms. The consumer must receive the corrected disclosures no later than three business days before consummation. If the corrected disclosures are mailed to the consumer or delivered to the consumer by means other than delivery in person, the consumer is deemed to have received the corrected disclosures three business days after they are mailed or delivered.

(3) Consumer's waiver of waiting period before consummation. If the consumer determines that the extension of credit is needed to meet a bona fide personal financial emergency, the consumer may modify or waive the seven-business-day waiting period or the three-business-day waiting period required by paragraph (a)(2) of this section, after receiving the disclosures required by § 226.18. To modify or waive a waiting period, the consumer shall give the creditor a dated written statement that describes the emergency, specifically modifies or waives the waiting period, and bears the signature of all the consumers who are primarily liable on the legal obligation. Printed forms for this purpose are prohibited.

(4) Notice. Disclosures made pursuant to paragraph (a)(1) or paragraph (a)(2) of this section shall contain the following statement: "You are not required to complete this agreement merely because you have received these disclosures or signed a loan application." The disclosure required by this paragraph shall be grouped together with the disclosures required by paragraphs (a)(1) or (a)(2) of this section.

(5) Timeshare plans. In a mortgage transaction subject to the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act (12 U.S.C. 2601 et seq.) that is secured by a consumer's interest in a timeshare plan described in 11 U.S.C. 101(53(D)):

(i) The requirements of paragraphs (a)(1) through (a)(4) of this section do not apply;

(ii) The creditor shall make good faith estimates of the disclosures required by § 226.18 before consummation, or shall deliver or place them in the mail not later than three business days after the creditor receives the consumer's written application, whichever is earlier; and

(iii) If the annual percentage rate at the time of consummation varies from the annual percentage rate disclosed under paragraph (a)(5)(ii) of this section by more than 1/8 of 1 percentage point in a regular transaction or more than 1/4 of 1 percentage point in an irregular transaction, as defined in § 226.22, the creditor shall disclose all the changed terms no later than consummation or settlement.

(b) Certain variable-rate transactions. n45a If the annual percentage rate may increase after consummation in a transaction secured by the consumer's principal dwelling with a term greater than one year, the following disclosures must be provided at the time an application form is provided or before the consumer pays a non-refundable fee, whichever is earlier: n45b

(1) The booklet titled Consumer Handbook on Adjustable Rate Mortgages published by the Board and the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, or a suitable substitute.

(2) A loan program disclosure for each variable-rate program in which the consumer expresses an interest. The following disclosures, as applicable, shall be provided:

(i) The fact that the interest rate, payment, or term of the loan can change.

(ii) The index or formula used in making adjustments, and a source of information about the index or formula.

(iii) An explanation of how the interest rate and payment will be determined, including an explanation of how the index is adjusted, such as by the addition of a margin.

(iv) A statement that the consumer should ask about the current margin value and current interest rate.

(v) The fact that the interest rate will be discounted, and a statement that the consumer should ask about the amount of the interest rate discount.

(vi) The frequency of interest rate and payment changes.

(vii) Any rules relating to changes in the index, interest rate, payment amount, and outstanding loan balance including, for example, an explanation of interest rate or payment limitations, negative amortization, and interest rate carryover.

(viii) At the option of the creditor, either of the following:

(A) A historical example, based on a $10,000 loan amount, illustrating how payments and the loan balance would have been affected by interest rate changes implemented according to the terms of the loan program disclosure. The example shall reflect the most recent 15 years of index values. The example shall reflect all significant loan program terms, such as negative amortization, interest rate carryover, interest rate discounts, and interest rate and payment limitations, that would have been affected by the index movement during the period.

(B) The maximum interest rate and payment for a $10,000 loan originated at the initial interest rate (index value plus margin, adjusted by the amount of any discount or premium) in effect as of an identified month and year for the loan program disclosure assuming the maximum periodic increases in rates and payments under the program; and the initial interest rate and payment for that loan and a statement that the periodic payment may increase or decrease substantially depending on changes in the rate.

(ix) An explanation of how the consumer may calculate the payments for the loan amount to be borrowed based on either:

(A) The most recent payment shown in the historical example in paragraph (b)(2)(viii)(A) of this section; or

(B) The initial interest rate used to calculate the maximum interest rate and payment in paragraph (b)(2)(viii)(B) of this section.

(x) The fact that the loan program contains a demand feature.

(xi) The type of information that will be provided in notices of adjustments and the timing of such notices.

(xii) A statement that disclosure forms are available for the creditor's other variable-rate loan programs.

(c) Electronic disclosures. For an application that is accessed by the consumer in electronic form, the disclosures required by paragraph (b) of this section may be provided to the consumer in electronic form on or with the application.

§ 226.20 Subsequent disclosure requirements.

(a) Refinancings. A refinancing occurs when an existing obligation that was subject to this subpart is satisfied and replaced by a new obligation undertaken by the same consumer. A refinancing is a new transaction requiring new disclosures to the consumer. The new finance charge shall include any unearned portion of the old finance charge that is not credited to the existing obligation. The following shall not be treated as a refinancing:

(1) A renewal of a single payment obligation with no change in the original terms.

(2) A reduction in the annual percentage rate with a corresponding change in the payment schedule.

(3) An agreement involving a court proceeding.

(4) A change in the payment schedule or a change in collateral requirements as a result of the consumer's default or delinquency, unless the rate is increased, or the new amount financed exceeds the unpaid balance plus earned finance charge and premiums for continuation of insurance of the types described in § 226.4(d).

(5) The renewal of optional insurance purchased by the consumer and added to an existing transaction, if disclosures relating to the initial purchase were provided as required by this subpart.

(b) Assumptions. An assumption occurs when a creditor expressly agrees in writing with a subsequent consumer to accept that consumer as a primary obligor on an existing residential mortgage transaction. Before the assumption occurs, the creditor shall make new disclosures to the subsequent consumer, based on the remaining obligation. If the finance charge originally imposed on the existing obligation was an add-on or discount finance charge, the creditor need only disclose:

(1) The unpaid balance of the obligation assumed.

(2) The total charges imposed by the creditor in connection with the assumption.

(3) The information required to be disclosed under § 226.18(k), (l), (m), and (n).

(5) The payment schedule under § 226.18(g) and the total of payments under § 226.18(h) based on the remaining obligation.

(c) Variable-rate adjustments. n45c An adjustment to the interest rate with or without a corresponding adjustment to the payment in a variable-rate transaction subject to § 226.19(b) is an event requiring new disclosures to the consumer. At least once each year during which an interest rate adjustment is implemented without an accompanying payment change, and at least 25, but no more than 120, calendar days before a payment at a new level is due, the following disclosures, as applicable, must be delivered or placed in the mail:

(1) The current and prior interest rates.

(2) The index values upon which the current and prior interest rates are based.

(3) The extent to which the creditor has foregone any increase in the interest rate.

(4) The contractual effects of the adjustment, including the payment due after the adjustment is made, and a statement of the loan balance.

(5) The payment, if different from that referred to in paragraph (c)(4) of this section, that would be required to fully amortize the loan at the new interest rate over the remainder of the loan term.

Subpart C Closed-End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.22

§ 226.22 Determination of annual percentage rate.

(a) Accuracy of annual percentage rate.

(1) The annual percentage rate is a measure of the cost of credit, expressed as a yearly rate, that relates the amount and timing of value received by the consumer to the amount and timing of payments made. The annual percentage rate shall be determined in accordance with either the actuarial method or the United States Rule method. Explanations, equations and instructions for determining the annual percentage rate in accordance with the actuarial method are set forth in Appendix J to this regulation. n45d

(2) As a general rule, the annual percentage rate shall be considered accurate if it is not more than 1/8 of 1 percentage point above or below the annual percentage rate determined in accordance with paragraph (a)(1) of this section.

(3) In an irregular transaction, the annual percentage rate shall be considered accurate if it is not more than 1/4 of 1 percentage point above or below the annual percentage rate determined in accordance with paragraph (a)(1) of this section. n46

(4) Mortgage loans. If the annual percentage rate disclosed in a transaction secured by real property or a dwelling varies from the actual rate determined in accordance with paragraph (a)(1) of this section, in addition to the tolerances applicable under paragraphs (a)(2) and (3) of this section, the disclosed annual percentage rate shall also be considered accurate if:

(i) The rate results from the disclosed finance charge; and

(ii)

(A) The disclosed finance charge would be considered accurate under § 226.18(d)(1); or

(B) For purposes of rescission, if the disclosed finance charge would be considered accurate under § 226.23(g) or (h), whichever applies.

(5) Additional tolerance for mortgage loans. In a transaction secured by real property or a dwelling, in addition to the tolerances applicable under paragraphs (a)(2) and (3) of this section, if the disclosed finance charge is calculated incorrectly but is considered accurate under § 226.18(d)(1) or § 226.23(g) or (h), the disclosed annual percentage rate shall be considered accurate:

(i) If the disclosed finance charge is understated, and the disclosed annual percentage rate is also understated but it is closer to the actual annual percentage rate than the rate that would be considered accurate under paragraph (a)(4) of this section;

(ii) If the disclosed finance charge is overstated, and the disclosed annual percentage rate is also overstated but it is closer to the actual annual percentage rate than the rate that would be considered accurate under paragraph (a)(4) of this section.

(b) Computation tools.

(1) The Regulation Z Annual Percentage Rate Tables produced by the Board may be used to determine the annual percentage rate, and any rate determined from those tables in accordance with the accompanying instructions complies with the requirements of this section. Volume I of the tables applies to single advance transactions involving up to 480 monthly payments or 104 weekly payments. It may be used for regular transactions and for transactions with any of the following irregularities: an irregular first period, an irregular first payment, and an irregular final payment. Volume II of the tables applies to transactions involving multiple advances and any type of payment or period irregularity.

(2) Creditors may use any other computation tool in determining the annual percentage rate if the rate so determined equals the rate determined in accordance with Appendix J, within the degree of accuracy set forth in paragraph (a) of this section.

(c) Single add-on rate transactions. If a single add-on rate is applied to all transactions with maturities up to 60 months and if all payments are equal in amount and period, a single annual percentage rate may be disclosed for all those transactions, so long as it is the highest annual percentage rate for any such transaction.

(d) Certain transactions involving ranges of balances. For purposes of disclosing the annual percentage rate referred to in § 226.17(g)(4) (Mail or telephone orders--delay in disclosures) and (h) (Series of sales--delay in disclosures), if the same finance charge is imposed on all balances within a specified range of balances, the annual percentage rate computed for the median balance may be disclosed for all the balances. However, if the annual percentage rate computed for the median balance understates the annual percentage rate computed for the lowest balance by more than 8 percent of the latter rate, the annual percentage rate shall be computed on whatever lower balance will produce an annual percentage rate that does not result in an understatement of more than 8 percent of the rate determined on the lowest balance.

FOOTNOTES:
(n62)Footnote 45d. An error in disclosure of the annual percentage rate or finance charge shall not, in itself, be considered a violation of this regulation if: (1) The error resulted from a corresponding error in a calculation tool used in good faith by the creditor; and (2) upon discovery of the error, the creditor promptly discontinues use of that calculation tool for disclosure purposes and notifies the Board in writing of the error in the calculation tool.

(n63)Footnote 46. For purposes of paragraph (a)(3) of this section, an irregular transaction is one that includes one or more of the following features: multiple advances, irregular payment periods, or irregular payment amounts (other than an irregular first period or an irregular first or final payment).

Subpart C Closed-End Credit

§ 226.23 Right of rescission.

(1) In a credit transaction in which a security interest is or will be retained or acquired in a consumer's principal dwelling, each consumer whose ownership interest is or will be subject to the security interest shall have the right to rescind the transaction, except for transactions described in paragraph (f) of this section. n47

(2) To exercise the right to rescind, the consumer shall notify the creditor of the rescission by mail, telegram or other means of written communication. Notice is considered given when mailed, when filed for telegraphic transmission or, if sent by other means, when delivered to the creditor's designated place of business.

(3) The consumer may exercise the right to rescind until midnight of the third business day following consummation, delivery of the notice required by paragraph (b) of this section, or delivery of all material disclosures, n48 whichever occurs last. If the required notice or material disclosures are not delivered, the right to rescind shall expire 3 years after consummation, upon transfer of all of the consumer's interest in the property, or upon sale of the property, whichever occurs first. In the case of certain administrative proceedings, the rescission period shall be extended in accordance with section 125(f) of the Act.

(4) When more than one consumer in a transaction has the right to rescind, the exercise of the right by one consumer shall be effective as to all consumers.

(1) Notice of right to rescind. In a transaction subject to rescission, a creditor shall deliver two copies of the notice of the right to rescind to each consumer entitled to rescind (one copy to each if the notice is delivered in electronic form in accordance with the consumer consent and other applicable provisions of the E-Sign Act). The notice shall be on a separate document that identifies the transaction and shall clearly and conspicuously disclose the following:

(i) The retention or acquisition of a security interest in the consumer's principal dwelling.

(ii) The consumer's right to rescind the transaction.

(iii) How to exercise the right to rescind, with a form for that purpose, designating the address of the creditor's place of business.

(iv) The effects of rescission, as described in paragraph (d) of this section.

(v) The date the rescission period expires.

(2) Proper form of notice. To satisfy the disclosure requirements of paragraph (b)(1) of this section, the creditor shall provide the appropriate model form in Appendix H of this part or a substantially similar notice.

(c) Delay of creditor's performance. Unless a consumer waives the right of rescission under paragraph (e) of this section, no money shall be disbursed other than in escrow, no services shall be performed and no materials delivered until the rescission period has expired and the creditor is reasonably satisfied that the consumer has not rescinded.

(d) Effects of rescission.

(1) When a consumer rescinds a transaction, the security interest giving rise to the right of rescission becomes void and the consumer shall not be liable for any amount, including any finance charge.

(2) Within 20 calendar days after receipt of a notice of rescission, the creditor shall return any money or property that has been given to anyone in connection with the transaction and shall take any action necessary to reflect the termination of the security interest.

(3) If the creditor has delivered any money or property, the consumer may retain possession until the creditor has met its obligation under paragraph (d)(2) of this section. When the creditor has complied with that paragraph, the consumer shall tender the money or property to the creditor or, where the latter would be impracticable or inequitable, tender its reasonable value. At the consumer's option, tender of property may be made at the location of the property or at the consumer's residence. Tender of money must be made at the creditor's designated place of business. If the creditor does not take possession of the money or property within 20 calendar days after the consumer's tender, the consumer may keep it without further obligation.

(4) The procedures outlined in paragraphs (d)(2) and (3) of this section may be modified by court order.

(1) The consumer may modify or waive the right to rescind if the consumer determines that the extension of credit is needed to meet a bona fide personal financial emergency. To modify or waive the right, the consumer shall give the creditor a dated written statement that describes the emergency, specifically modifies or waives the right to rescind, and bears the signature of all the consumers entitled to rescind. Printed forms for this purpose are prohibited, except as provided in paragraph (e)(2) of this section.

(2) The need of the consumer to obtain funds immediately shall be regarded as a bona fide personal financial emergency provided that the dwelling securing the extension of credit is located in an area declared during June through September 1993, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 5170, to be a major disaster area because of severe storms and flooding in the Midwest. n48a In this instance, creditors may use printed forms for the consumer to waive the right to rescind. This exemption to paragraph (e)(1) of this section shall expire one year from the date an area was declared a major disaster.

(3) The consumer's need to obtain funds immediately shall be regarded as a bona fide personal financial emergency provided that the dwelling securing the extension of credit is located in an area declared during June through September 1994 to be a major disaster area, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 5170, because of severe storms and flooding in the South. n48b In this instance, creditors may use printed forms for the consumer to waive the right to rescind. This exemption to paragraph (e)(1) of this section shall expire one year from the date an area was declared a major disaster.

(4) The consumer's need to obtain funds immediately shall be regarded as a bona fide personal financial emergency provided that the dwelling securing the extension of credit is located in an area declared during October 1994 to be a major disaster area, pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 5170, because of severe storms and flooding in Texas. n48c In this instance, creditors may use printed forms for the consumer to waive the right to rescind. This exemption to paragraph (e)(1) of this section shall expire one year from the date an area was declared a major disaster.

(f) Exempt transactions. The right to rescind does not apply to the following:

(1) A residential mortgage transaction.

(2) A refinancing or consolidation by the same creditor of an extension of credit already secured by the consumer's principal dwelling. The right of rescission shall apply, however, to the extent the new amount financed exceeds the unpaid principal balance, any earned unpaid finance charge on the existing debt, and amounts attributed solely to the costs of the refinancing or consolidation.

(3) A transaction in which a state agency is a creditor.

(4) An advance, other than an initial advance, in a series of advances or in a series of single-payment obligations that is treated as a single transaction under § 226.17(c)(6), if the notice required by paragraph (b) of this section and all material disclosures have been given to the consumer.

(5) A renewal of optional insurance premiums that is not considered a refinancing under § 226.20(a)(5).

(g) Tolerances for accuracy.

(1) One-half of 1 percent tolerance. Except as provided in paragraphs (g)(2) and (h)(2) of this section, the finance charge and other disclosures affected by the finance charge (such as the amount financed and the annual percentage rate) shall be considered accurate for purposes of this section if the disclosed finance charge:

(i) is understated by no more than 1/2 of 1 percent of the face amount of the note or $100, whichever is greater; or

(ii) is greater than the amount required to be disclosed.

(2) One percent tolerance. In a refinancing of a residential mortgage transaction with a new creditor (other than a transaction covered by § 226.32), if there is no new advance and no consolidation of existing loans, the finance charge and other disclosures affected by the finance charge (such as the amount financed and the annual percentage rate) shall be considered accurate for purposes of this section if the disclosed finance charge:

(i) is understated by no more than 1 percent of the face amount of the note or $100, whichever is greater; or

(ii) is greater than the amount required to be disclosed.

(h) Special rules for foreclosures.

(1) Right to rescind. After the initiation of foreclosure on the consumer's principal dwelling that secures the credit obligation, the consumer shall have the right to rescind the transaction if:

(i) A mortgage broker fee that should have been included in the finance charge was not included; or

(ii) The creditor did not provide the properly completed appropriate model form in Appendix H of this part, or a substantially similar notice of rescission.

(2) Tolerance for disclosures. After the initiation of foreclosure on the consumer's principal dwelling that secures the credit obligation, the finance charge and other disclosures affected by the finance charge (such as the amount financed and the annual percentage rate) shall be considered accurate for purposes of this section if the disclosed finance charge:

(i) is understated by no more than $35; or

(ii) is greater than the amount required to be disclosed.

FOOTNOTES:

(n64)Footnote 47. For purposes of this section, the addition to an existing obligation of a security interest in a consumer's principal dwelling is a transaction. The right of rescission applies only to the addition of the security interest and not the existing obligation. The creditor shall deliver the notice required by paragraph (b) of this section but need not deliver new material disclosures. Delivery of the required notice shall begin the rescission period.

(n65)Footnote 48. The term "material disclosures" means the required disclosures of the annual percentage rate, the finance charge, the amount financed, the total of payments, the payment schedule, and the disclosures and limitations referred to in §§ 226.32(c) and (d) and 226.35(b)(2).

(n66)Footnote 48a. A list of the affected areas will be maintained by the Board.

(n67)Footnote 48b. A list of the affected areas will be maintained and published by the Board. Such areas now include parts of Alabama, Florida, and Georgia.

(n68)Footnote 48c. A list of the affected areas will be maintained and published by the Board. Such areas now include the following counties in Texas: Angelina, Austin, Bastrop, Brazos, Brazoria, Burleson, Chambers, Fayette, Fort Bend, Galveston, Grimes, Hardin, Harris, Houston, Jackson, Jasper, Jefferson, Lee, Liberty, Madison, Matagorda, Montgomery, Nacagdoches, Orange, Polk, San Augustine, San Jacinto, Shelby, Trinity, Victoria, Washington, Waller, Walker, and Wharton.

Subpart C Closed-End Credit

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.24

§ 226.24 Advertising.

(a) Actually available terms. If an advertisement for credit states specific credit terms, it shall state only those terms that actually are or will be arranged or offered by the creditor.

(b) Clear and conspicuous standard. Disclosures required by this section shall be made clearly and conspicuously.

(c) Advertisement of rate of finance charge. If an advertisement states a rate of finance charge, it shall state the rate as an "annual percentage rate," using that term. If the annual percentage rate may be increased after consummation, the advertisement shall state that fact. If an advertisement is for credit not secured by a dwelling, the advertisement shall not state any other rate, except that a simple annual rate or periodic rate that is applied to an unpaid balance may be stated in conjunction with, but not more conspicuously than, the annual percentage rate. If an advertisement is for credit secured by a dwelling, the advertisement shall not state any other rate, except that a simple annual rate that is applied to an unpaid balance may be stated in conjunction with, but not more conspicuously than, the annual percentage rate.

(d) Advertisement of terms that require additional disclosures--

(1) Triggering terms. If any of the following terms is set forth in an advertisement, the advertisement shall meet the requirements of paragraph (d)(2) of this section:

(i) The amount or percentage of any downpayment.

(ii) The number of payments or period of repayment.

(iii) The amount of any payment.

(iv) The amount of any finance charge.

(2) Additional terms. An advertisement stating any of the terms in paragraph (d)(1) of this section shall state the following terms, n49 as applicable (an example of one or more typical extensions of credit with a statement of all the terms applicable to each may be used):

(i) The amount or percentage of the downpayment.

(ii) The terms of repayment, which reflect the repayment obligations over the full term of the loan, including any balloon payment.

(iii) The "annual percentage rate," using that term, and, if the rate may be increased after consummation, that fact.

(e) Catalogs or other multiple-page advertisements; electronic advertisements--

(1) If a catalog or other multiple-page advertisement, or an electronic advertisement (such as an advertisement appearing on an Internet Web site), gives information in a table or schedule in sufficient detail to permit determination of the disclosures required by paragraph (d)(2) of this section, it shall be considered a single advertisement if--

(i) The table or schedule is clearly and conspicuously set forth; and

(ii) Any statement of the credit terms in paragraph (d)(1) of this section appearing anywhere else in the catalog or advertisement clearly refers to the page or location where the table or schedule begins.

(2) A catalog or other multiple-page advertisement or an electronic advertisement (such as an advertisement appearing on an Internet Web site) complies with paragraph (d)(2) of this section if the table or schedule of terms includes all appropriate disclosures for a representative scale of amounts up to the level of the more commonly sold higher-priced property or services offered.

(f) Disclosure of Rates and Payments in Advertisements for Credit Secured by a Dwelling.

(1) Scope. The requirements of this paragraph apply to any advertisement for credit secured by a dwelling, other than television or radio advertisements, including promotional materials accompanying applications.

(2) Disclosure of rates--

(i) In general. If an advertisement for credit secured by a dwelling states a simple annual rate of interest and more than one simple annual rate of interest will apply over the term of the advertised loan, the advertisement shall disclose in a clear and conspicuous manner:

(A) Each simple annual rate of interest that will apply. In variable-rate transactions, a rate determined by adding an index and margin shall be disclosed based on a reasonably current index and margin;

(B) The period of time during which each simple annual rate of interest will apply; and

(C) The annual percentage rate for the loan. If such rate is variable, the annual percentage rate shall comply with the accuracy standards in §§ 226.17(c) and 226.22.

(ii) Clear and conspicuous requirement. For purposes of paragraph (f)(2)(i) of this section, clearly and conspicuously disclosed means that the required information in paragraphs (f)(2)(i)(A) through (C) shall be disclosed with equal prominence and in close proximity to any advertised rate that triggered the required disclosures. The required information in paragraph (f)(2)(i)(C) may be disclosed with greater prominence than the other information.

(3) Disclosure of payments--

(i) In general. In addition to the requirements of paragraph (c) of this section, if an advertisement for credit secured by a dwelling states the amount of any payment, the advertisement shall disclose in a clear and conspicuous manner:

(A) The amount of each payment that will apply over the term of the loan, including any balloon payment. In variable-rate transactions, payments that will be determined based on the application of the sum of an index and margin shall be disclosed based on a reasonably current index and margin;

(B) The period of time during which each payment will apply; and

(C) In an advertisement for credit secured by a first lien on a dwelling, the fact that the payments do not include amounts for taxes and insurance premiums, if applicable, and that the actual payment obligation will be greater.

(ii) Clear and conspicuous requirement. For purposes of paragraph (f)(3)(i) of this section, a clear and conspicuous disclosure means that the required information in paragraphs (f)(3)(i)(A) and (B) shall be disclosed with equal prominence and in close proximity to any advertised payment that triggered the required disclosures, and that the required information in paragraph (f)(3)(i)(C) shall be disclosed with prominence and in close proximity to the advertised payments.

(4) Envelope excluded. The requirements in paragraphs (f)(2) and (f)(3) of this section do not apply to an envelope in which an application or solicitation is mailed, or to a banner advertisement or pop-up advertisement linked to an application or solicitation provided electronically.

(g) Alternative disclosures--television or radio advertisements. An advertisement made through television or radio stating any of the terms requiring additional disclosures under paragraph (d)(2) of this section may comply with paragraph (d)(2) of this section either by:

(1) Stating clearly and conspicuously each of the additional disclosures required under paragraph (d)(2) of this section; or

(2) Stating clearly and conspicuously the information required by paragraph (d)(2)(iii) of this section and listing a toll-free telephone number, or any telephone number that allows a consumer to reverse the phone charges when calling for information, along with a reference that such number may be used by consumers to obtain additional cost information.

(h) Tax implications. If an advertisement distributed in paper form or through the Internet (rather than by radio or television) is for a loan secured by the consumer's principal dwelling, and the advertisement states that the advertised extension of credit may exceed the fair market value of the dwelling, the advertisement shall clearly and conspicuously state that:

(1) The interest on the portion of the credit extension that is greater than the fair market value of the dwelling is not tax deductible for Federal income tax purposes; and

(2) The consumer should consult a tax adviser for further information regarding the deductibility of interest and charges.

(i) Prohibited acts or practices in advertisements for credit secured by a dwelling. The following acts or practices are prohibited in advertisements for credit secured by a dwelling:

(1) Misleading advertising of "fixed" rates and payments. Using the word "fixed" to refer to rates, payments, or the credit transaction in an advertisement for variable-rate transactions or other transactions where the payment will increase, unless:

(i) In the case of an advertisement solely for one or more variable-rate transactions,

(A) The phrase "Adjustable-Rate Mortgage," "Variable-Rate Mortgage," or "ARM" appears in the advertisement before the first use of the word "fixed" and is at least as conspicuous as any use of the word "fixed" in the advertisement; and

(B) Each use of the word "fixed" to refer to a rate or payment is accompanied by an equally prominent and closely proximate statement of the time period for which the rate or payment is fixed, and the fact that the rate may vary or the payment may increase after that period;

(ii) In the case of an advertisement solely for non-variable-rate transactions where the payment will increase (e.g., a stepped-rate mortgage transaction with an initial lower payment), each use of the word "fixed" to refer to the payment is accompanied by an equally prominent and closely proximate statement of the time period for which the payment is fixed, and the fact that the payment will increase after that period; or

(iii) In the case of an advertisement for both variable-rate transactions and non-variable-rate transactions,

(A) The phrase "Adjustable-Rate Mortgage," "Variable-Rate Mortgage," or "ARM" appears in the advertisement with equal prominence as any use of the term "fixed," "Fixed-Rate Mortgage," or similar terms; and

(B) Each use of the word "fixed" to refer to a rate, payment, or the credit transaction either refers solely to the transactions for which rates are fixed and complies with paragraph (i)(1)(ii) of this section, if applicable, or, if it refers to the variable-rate transactions, is accompanied by an equally prominent and closely proximate statement of the time period for which the rate or payment is fixed, and the fact that the rate may vary or the payment may increase after that period.

(2) Misleading comparisons in advertisements. Making any comparison in an advertisement between actual or hypothetical credit payments or rates and any payment or simple annual rate that will be available under the advertised product for a period less than the full term of the loan, unless:

(i) In general. The advertisement includes a clear and conspicuous comparison to the information required to be disclosed under sections 226.24(f)(2) and (3); and

(ii) Application to variable-rate transactions. If the advertisement is for a variable-rate transaction, and the advertised payment or simple annual rate is based on the index and margin that will be used to make subsequent rate or payment adjustments over the term of the loan, the advertisement includes an equally prominent statement in close proximity to the payment or rate that the payment or rate is subject to adjustment and the time period when the first adjustment will occur.

(3) Misrepresentations about government endorsement. Making any statement in an advertisement that the product offered is a "government loan program", "government-supported loan", or is otherwise endorsed or sponsored by any federal, state, or local government entity, unless the advertisement is for an FHA loan, VA loan, or similar loan program that is, in fact, endorsed or sponsored by a federal, state, or local government entity.

(4) Misleading use of the current lender's name. Using the name of the consumer's current lender in an advertisement that is not sent by or on behalf of the consumer's current lender, unless the advertisement:

(i) Discloses with equal prominence the name of the person or creditor making the advertisement; and

(ii) Includes a clear and conspicuous statement that the person making the advertisement is not associated with, or acting on behalf of, the consumer's current lender.

(5) Misleading claims of debt elimination. Making any misleading claim in an advertisement that the mortgage product offered will eliminate debt or result in a waiver or forgiveness of a consumer's existing loan terms with, or obligations to, another creditor.

(6) Misleading use of the term "counselor". Using the term "counselor" in an advertisement to refer to a for-profit mortgage broker or mortgage creditor, its employees, or persons working for the broker or creditor that are involved in offering, originating or selling mortgages.

(7) Misleading foreign-language advertisements. Providing information about some trigger terms or required disclosures, such as an initial rate or payment, only in a foreign language in an advertisement, but providing information about other trigger terms or required disclosures, such as information about the fully-indexed rate or fully amortizing payment, only in English in the same advertisement.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.28

§ 226.28 Effect on State laws.

(a) Inconsistent disclosure requirements.

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (d) of this section, state law requirements that are inconsistent with the requirements contained in chapter 1 (General Provisions), chapter 2 (Credit Transactions), or chapter 3 (Credit Advertising) of the act and the implementing provisions of this regulation are preempted to the extent of the inconsistency. A State law is inconsistent if it requires a creditor to make disclosures or take actions that contradict the requirements of the Federal law. A State law is contradictory if it requires the use of the same term to represent a different amount or a different meaning than the Federal law, or if it requires the use of a term different from that required in the Federal law to describe the same item. A creditor, state, or other interested party may request the Board to determine whether a State law requirement is inconsistent. After the Board determines that a state law is inconsistent, a creditor may not make disclosures using the inconsistent term or form.

(i) State law requirements are inconsistent with the requirements contained in sections 161 (Correction of billing errors) or 162 (Regulation of credit reports) of the Act and the implementing provisions of this regulation and are preempted if they provide rights, responsibilities, or procedures for consumers or creditors that are different from those required by the Federal law. However, a State law that allows a consumer to inquire about an open-end credit account and imposes on the creditor an obligation to respond to such inquiry after the time allowed in the Federal law for the consumer to submit written notice of a billing error shall not be preempted in any situation where the time period for making written notice under this regulation has expired. If a creditor gives written notice of a consumer's rights under such State law, the notice shall state that reliance on the longer time period available under state law may result in the loss of important rights that could be preserved by acting more promptly under Federal law; it shall also explain that the state law provisions apply only after expiration of the time period for submitting a proper written notice of a billing error under the Federal law. If the state disclosures are made on the same side of a page as the required Federal disclosures, the state disclosures shall appear under a demarcation line below the Federal disclosures, and the Federal disclosures shall be identified by a heading indicating that they are made in compliance with Federal law.

(ii) State law requirements are inconsistent with the requirements contained in chapter 4 (Credit billing) of the Act (other than section 161 or 162) and the implementing provisions of this regulation and are preempted if the creditor cannot comply with State law without violating Federal law.

(iii) A State may request the Board to determine whether its law is inconsistent with chapter 4 of the Act and its implementing provisions.

(b) Equivalent disclosure requirements. If the Board determines that a disclosure required by state law (other than a requirement relating to the finance charge, annual percentage rate, or the disclosures required under § 226.32) is substantially the same in meaning as a disclosure required under the act or this regulation, creditors in that state may make the state disclosure in lieu of the federal disclosure. A creditor, State, or other interested party may request the Board to determine whether a State disclosure is substantially the same in meaning as a Federal disclosure.

(c) Request for determination. The procedures under which a request for a determination may be made under this section are set forth in Appendix A.

(d) Special rule for credit and charge cards. State law requirements relating to the disclosure of credit information in any credit or charge card application or solicitation that is subject to the requirements of section 127(c) of chapter 2 of the act (§ 226.5a of the regulation) or in any renewal notice for a credit or charge card that is subject to the requirements of section 127(d) of chapter 2 of the act (§ 226.9(e) of the regulation) are preempted. State laws relating to the enforcement of section 127 (c) and (d) of the act are not preempted.

(a) General rule. Any State may apply to the Board to exempt a class of transactions within the State from the requirements of chapter 2 (Credit transactions) or chapter 4 (Credit billing) of the Act and the corresponding provisions of this regulation. The Board shall grant an exemption if it determines that:

(1) The State law is substantially similar to the Federal law or, in the case of chapter 4, affords the consumer greater protection than the Federal law; and

(2) There is adequate provision for enforcement.

(b) Civil liability.

(1) No exemptions granted under this section shall extend to the civil liability provisions of sections 130 and 131 of the Act.

(2) If an exemption has been granted, the disclosures required by the applicable State law (except any additional requirements not imposed by Federal law) shall constitute the disclosures required by this Act.

§ 226.31 General rules.

(a) Relation to other subparts in this part. The requirements and limitations of this subpart are in addition to and not in lieu of those contained in other subparts of this part.

(b) Form of disclosures. The creditor shall make the disclosures required by this subpart clearly and conspicuously in writing, in a form that the consumer may keep. The disclosures required by this subpart may be provided to the consumer in electronic form, subject to compliance with the consumer consent and other applicable provisions of the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-Sign Act) (15 U.S.C. § 7001 et seq.).

(c) Timing of disclosure.

(1) Disclosures for certain closed-end home mortgages. The creditor shall furnish the disclosures required by § 226.32 at least three business days prior to consummation of a mortgage transaction covered by § 226.32.

(i) Change in terms. After complying with paragraph (c)(1) of this section and prior to consummation, if the creditor changes any term that makes the disclosures inaccurate, new disclosures shall be provided in accordance with the requirements of this subpart.

(ii) Telephone disclosures. A creditor may provide new disclosures by telephone if the consumer initiates the change and if, at consummation:

(A) The creditor provides new written disclosures; and

(B) The consumer and creditor sign a statement that the new disclosures were provided by telephone at least three days prior to consummation.

(iii) Consumer's waiver of waiting period before consummation. The consumer may, after receiving the disclosures required by paragraph (c)(1) of this section, modify or waive the three-day waiting period between delivery of those disclosures and consummation if the consumer determines that the extension of credit is needed to meet a bona fide personal financial emergency. To modify or waive the right, the consumer shall give the creditor a dated written statement that describes the emergency, specifically modifies or waives the waiting period, and bears the signature of all the consumers entitled to the waiting period. Printed forms for this purpose are prohibited, except when creditors are permitted to use printed forms pursuant to § 226.23(e)(2).

(2) Disclosures for reverse mortgages. The creditor shall furnish the disclosures required by § 226.33 at least three business days prior to:

(i) Consummation of a closed-end credit transaction; or

(ii) The first transaction under an open-end credit plan.

(d) Basis of disclosures and use of estimates.

(1) Legal Obligation. Disclosures shall reflect the terms of the legal obligation between the parties.

(2) Estimates. If any information necessary for an accurate disclosure is unknown to the creditor, the creditor shall make the disclosure based on the best information reasonably available at the time the disclosure is provided, and shall state clearly that the disclosure is an estimate.

(3) Per-diem interest. For a transaction in which a portion of the interest is determined on a per-diem basis and collected at consummation, any disclosure affected by the per-diem interest shall be considered accurate if the disclosure is based on the information known to the creditor at the time that the disclosure documents are prepared.

(e) Multiple creditors; multiple consumers. If a transaction involves more than one creditor, only one set of disclosures shall be given and the creditors shall agree among themselves which creditor must comply with the requirements that this part imposes on any or all of them. If there is more than one consumer, the disclosures may be made to any consumer who is primarily liable on the obligation. If the transaction is rescindable under § 226.15 or § 226.23, however, the disclosures shall be made to each consumer who has the right to rescind.

(f) Effect of subsequent events. If a disclosure becomes inaccurate because of an event that occurs after the creditor delivers the required disclosures, the inaccuracy is not a violation of Regulation Z (12 CFR part 226), although new disclosures may be required for mortgages covered by § 226.32 under paragraph (c) of this section, § 226.9(c), § 226.19, or § 226.20.

(g) Accuracy of annual percentage rate. For purposes of § 226.32, the annual percentage rate shall be considered accurate, and may be used in determining whether a transaction is covered by § 226.32, if it is accurate according to the requirements and within the tolerances under § 226.22. The finance charge tolerances for rescission under § 226.23(g) or (h) shall not apply for this purpose.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.32

§ 226.32 Requirements for certain closed-end home mortgages.

(a) Coverage.

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (a)(2) of this section, the requirements of this section apply to a consumer credit transaction that is secured by the consumer's principal dwelling, and in which either:

(i) The annual percentage rate at consummation will exceed by more than 10 percentage points the yield on Treasury securities having comparable periods of maturity to the loan maturity as of the fifteenth day of the month immediately preceding the month in which the application for the extension of credit is received by the creditor; or

(ii) The total points and fees payable by the consumer at or before loan closing will exceed the greater of 8 percent of the total loan amount, or $400; the $400 figure shall be adjusted annually on January 1 by the annual percentage change in the Consumer Price Index that was reported on the preceding June 1.

(2) This section does not apply to the following:

(i) A residential mortgage transaction.

(ii) A reverse mortgage transaction subject to § 226.33.

(iii) An open-end credit plan subject to subpart B of this part.

(b) Definitions. For purposes of this subpart, the following definitions apply:

(1) For purposes of paragraph (a)(1)(ii) of this section, points and fees means:

(i) All items required to be disclosed under § 226.4(a) and 226.4(b), except interest or the time-price differential;

(ii) All compensation paid to mortgage brokers;

(iii) All items listed in § 226.4(c)(7) (other than amounts held for future payment of taxes) unless the charge is reasonable, the creditor receives no direct or indirect compensation in connection with the charge, and the charge is not paid to an affiliate of the creditor; and

(iv) Premiums or other charges for credit life, accident, health, or loss-of-income insurance, or debt-cancellation coverage (whether or not the debt-cancellation coverage is insurance under applicable law) that provides for cancellation of all or part of the consumer's liability in the event of the loss of life, health, or income or in the case of accident, written in connection with the credit transaction.

(2) Affiliate means any company that controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with another company, as set forth in the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 (12 U.S.C. 1841 et seq.).

(c) Disclosures. In addition to other disclosures required by this part, in a mortgage subject to this section the creditor shall disclose the following:

(1) Notices. The following statement: "You are not required to complete this agreement merely because you have received these disclosures or have signed a loan application. If you obtain this loan, the lender will have a mortgage on your home. You could lose your home, and any money you have put into it, if you do not meet your obligations under the loan."

(2) Annual percentage rate. The annual percentage rate.

(3) Regular payment; balloon payment. The amount of the regular monthly (or other periodic) payment and the amount of any balloon payment. For a mortgage refinancing, the total amount the consumer will borrow, as reflected by the face amount of the note; and where the amount borrowed includes premiums or other charges for optional credit insurance or debt-cancellation coverage, that fact shall be stated, grouped together with the disclosure of the amount borrowed. The disclosure of the amount borrowed shall be treated as accurate if it is not more than $100 above or below the amount required to be disclosed.

(d) Limitations. A mortgage transaction subject to this section may not provide for the following terms:

(i) Balloon payment. For a loan with a term of less than five years, a payment schedule with regular periodic payments that when aggregated do not fully amortize the outstanding principal balance.

(ii) Exception. The limitations in paragraph (d)(1)(i) of this section do not apply to loans with maturities of less than one year, if the purpose of the loan is a "bridge" loan connected with the acquisition or construction of a dwelling intended to become the consumer's principal dwelling.

(2) Negative amortization. A payment schedule with regular periodic payments that cause the principal balance to increase.

(3) Advance payments. A payment schedule that consolidates more than two periodic payments and pays them in advance from the proceeds.

(4) Increased interest rate. An increase in the interest rate after default.

(5) Rebates. A refund calculated by a method less favorable than the actuarial method (as defined by section 933(d) of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1992, 15 U.S.C. 1615(d)), for rebates of interest arising from a loan acceleration due to default.

(6) Prepayment penalties. Except as allowed under paragraph (d)(7) of this section, a penalty for paying all or part of the principal before the date on which the principal is due. A prepayment penalty includes computing a refund of unearned interest by a method that is less favorable to the consumer than the actuarial method, as defined by section 933(d) of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1992, 15 U.S.C. 1615(d).

(7) Prepayment penalty exception. A mortgage transaction subject to this section may provide for a prepayment penalty (including a refund calculated according to the rule of 78s) otherwise permitted by law if, under the terms of the loan:

(i) The penalty will not apply after the two-year period following consummation;

(ii) The penalty will not apply if the source of the prepayment funds is a refinancing by the creditor or an affiliate of the creditor;

(iii) At consummation, the consumer's total monthly debt payments (including amounts owed under the mortgage) do not exceed 50 percent of the consumer's monthly gross income, as verified in accordance with § 226.34(a)(4)(ii); and

(iv) The amount of the periodic payment of principal or interest or both may not change during the four-year period following consummation.

(8) Due-on-demand clause. A demand feature that permits the creditor to terminate the loan in advance of the original maturity date and to demand repayment of the entire outstanding balance, except in the following circumstances:

(i) There is fraud or material misrepresentation by the consumer in connection with the loan;

(ii) The consumer fails to meet the repayment terms of the agreement for any outstanding balance; or

(iii) There is any action or inaction by the consumer that adversely affects the creditor's security for the loan, or any right of the creditor in such security.

Subpart E Special Rules for Certain Home Mortgage Transactions

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.34

§ 226.34 Prohibited acts or practices in connection with credit subject to § 226.32.

(a) Prohibited acts or practices for loans subject to § 226.32. A creditor extending mortgage credit subject to § 226.32 shall not--

(1) Home improvement contracts. Pay a contractor under a home improvement contract from the proceeds of a mortgage covered by § 226.32, other than:

(i) By an instrument payable to the consumer or jointly to the consumer and the contractor; or

(ii) At the election of the consumer, through a third-party escrow agent in accordance with terms established in a written agreement signed by the consumer, the creditor, and the contractor prior to the disbursement.

(2) Notice to assignee. Sell or otherwise assign a mortgage subject to § 226.32 without furnishing the following statement to the purchaser or assignee: "Notice: This is a mortgage subject to special rules under the federal Truth in Lending Act. Purchasers or assignees of this mortgage could be liable for all claims and defenses with respect to the mortgage that the borrower could assert against the creditor."

(3) Refinancings within one-year period. Within one year of having extended credit subject to § 226.32, refinance any loan subject to § 226.32 to the same borrower into another loan subject to § 226.32, unless the refinancing is in the borrower's interest. An assignee holding or servicing an extension of mortgage credit subject to § 226.32, shall not, for the remainder of the one-year period following the date of origination of the credit, refinance any loan subject to § 226.32 to the same borrower into another loan subject to § 226.32, unless the refinancing is in the borrower's interest. A creditor (or assignee) is prohibited from engaging in acts or practices to evade this provision, including a pattern or practice of arranging for the refinancing of its own loans by affiliated or unaffiliated creditors, or modifying a loan agreement (whether or not the existing loan is satisfied and replaced by the new loan) and charging a fee.

(4) Repayment ability. Extend credit subject to § 226.32 to a consumer based on the value of the consumer's collateral without regard to the consumer's repayment ability as of consummation, including the consumer's current and reasonably expected income, employment, assets other than the collateral, current obligations, and mortgage-related obligations.

(i) Mortgage-related obligations. For purposes of this paragraph (a)(4), mortgage-related obligations are expected property taxes, premiums for mortgage-related insurance required by the creditor as set forth in § 226.35(b)(3)(i), and similar expenses.

(ii) Verification of repayment ability. Under this paragraph (a)(4) a creditor must verify the consumer's repayment ability as follows:

(A) A creditor must verify amounts of income or assets that it relies on to determine repayment ability, including expected income or assets, by the consumer's Internal Revenue Service Form W-2, tax returns, payroll receipts, financial institution records, or other third-party documents that provide reasonably reliable evidence of the consumer's income or assets.

(B) Notwithstanding paragraph (a)(4)(ii)(A), a creditor has not violated paragraph (a)(4)(ii) if the amounts of income and assets that the creditor relied upon in determining repayment ability are not materially greater than the amounts of the consumer's income or assets that the creditor could have verified pursuant to paragraph (a)(4)(ii)(A) at the time the loan was consummated.

(C) A creditor must verify the consumer's current obligations.

(iii) Presumption of compliance. A creditor is presumed to have complied with this paragraph (a)(4) with respect to a transaction if the creditor:

(A) Verifies the consumer's repayment ability as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(ii);

(B) Determines the consumer's repayment ability using the largest payment of principal and interest scheduled in the first seven years following consummation and taking into account current obligations and mortgage-related obligations as defined in paragraph (a)(4)(i); and

(C) Assesses the consumer's repayment ability taking into account at least one of the following: The ratio of total debt obligations to income, or the income the consumer will have after paying debt obligations.

(iv) Exclusions from presumption of compliance. Notwithstanding the previous paragraph, no presumption of compliance is available for a transaction for which:

(A) The regular periodic payments for the first seven years would cause the principal balance to increase; or

(B) The term of the loan is less than seven years and the regular periodic payments when aggregated do not fully amortize the outstanding principal balance.

(v) Exemption. This paragraph (a)(4) does not apply to temporary or "bridge" loans with terms of twelve months or less, such as a loan to purchase a new dwelling where the consumer plans to sell a current dwelling within twelve months.

(b) Prohibited acts or practices for dwelling-secured loans; open-end credit. In connection with credit secured by the consumer's dwelling that does not meet the definition in § 226.2(a)(20), a creditor shall not structure a home-secured loan as an open-end plan to evade the requirements of § 226.32.

PART I Consumer Credit
CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 226 REGULATION Z--TRUTH IN LENDING
Subpart E Special Rules for Certain Home Mortgage Transactions

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.35

§ 226.35 Prohibited acts or practices in connection with higher-priced mortgage loans. [§ 226.35(b)(3)) effective on April 1, 2010.]

(a) Higher-priced mortgage loans

(1) For purposes of this section, a higher-priced mortgage loan is a consumer credit transaction secured by the consumer's principal dwelling with an annual percentage rate that exceeds the average prime offer rate for a comparable transaction as of the date the interest rate is set by 1.5 or more percentage points for loans secured by a first lien on a dwelling, or by 3.5 or more percentage points for loans secured by a subordinate lien on a dwelling.

(2) "Average prime offer rate" means an annual percentage rate that is derived from average interest rates, points, and other loan pricing terms currently offered to consumers by a representative sample of creditors for mortgage transactions that have low-risk pricing characteristics. The Board publishes average prime offer rates for a broad range of types of transactions in a table updated at least weekly as well as the methodology the Board uses to derive these rates.

(3) Notwithstanding paragraph (a)(1) of this section, the term "higher-priced mortgage loan" does not include a transaction to finance the initial construction of a dwelling, a temporary or "bridge" loan with a term of twelve months or less, such as a loan to purchase a new dwelling where the consumer plans to sell a current dwelling within twelve months, a reverse-mortgage transaction subject to § 226.33, or a home equity line of credit subject to § 226.5b.

(b) Rules for higher-priced mortgage loans. Higher-priced mortgage loans are subject to the following restrictions:

(1) Repayment ability. A creditor shall not extend credit based on the value of the consumer's collateral without regard to the consumer's repayment ability as of consummation as provided in § 226.34(a)(4).

(2) Prepayment penalties. A loan may not include a penalty described by § 226.32(d)(6) unless:

(i) The penalty is otherwise permitted by law, including § 226.32(d)(7) if the loan is a mortgage transaction described in § 226.32(a); and

(ii) Under the terms of the loan --

(A) The penalty will not apply after the two-year period following consummation;

(B) The penalty will not apply if the source of the prepayment funds is a refinancing by the creditor or an affiliate of the creditor; and

(C) The amount of the periodic payment of principal or interest or both may not change during the four-year period following consummation.

(3) [Effective April 1, 2010.] Escrows --

(i) Failure to escrow for property taxes and insurance. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(3)(ii) of this section, a creditor may not extend a loan secured by a first lien on a principal dwelling unless an escrow account is established before consummation for payment of property taxes and premiums for mortgage-related insurance required by the creditor, such as insurance against loss of or damage to property, or against liability arising out of the ownership or use of the property, or insurance protecting the creditor against the consumer's default or other credit loss.

(ii) Exemptions for loans secured by shares in a cooperative and for certain condominium units --

(A) Escrow accounts need not be established for loans secured by shares in a cooperative; and

(B) Insurance premiums described in paragraph (b)(3)(i) of this section need not be included in escrow accounts for loans secured by condominium units, where the condominium association has an obligation to the condominium unit owners to maintain a master policy insuring condominium units.

(iii) Cancellation. A creditor or servicer may permit a consumer to cancel the escrow account required in paragraph (b)(3)(i) of this section only in response to a consumer's dated written request to cancel the escrow account that is received no earlier than 365 days after consummation.

(iv) Definition of escrow account. For purposes of this section, "escrow account" shall have the same meaning as in 24 CFR 3500.17(b) as amended.

(4) Evasion; open-end credit. In connection with credit secured by a consumer's principal dwelling that does not meet the definition of open-end credit in § 226.2(a)(20), a creditor shall not structure a home-secured loan as an open-end plan to evade the requirements of this section.

CONSUMER CREDIT LAW MANUAL PRIMARY SOURCE SUPPLEMENT
12 C.F.R. Part 226 REGULATION Z--TRUTH IN LENDING
Subpart E Special Rules for Certain Home Mortgage Transactions

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.36

§ 226.36 Prohibited acts or practices in connection with credit secured by a consumer's principal dwelling.

(a) Mortgage broker defined. For purposes of this section, the term "mortgage broker" means a person, other than an employee of a creditor, who for compensation or other monetary gain, or in expectation of compensation or other monetary gain, arranges, negotiates, or otherwise obtains an extension of consumer credit for another person. The term includes a person meeting this definition, even if the consumer credit obligation is initially payable to such person, unless the person provides the funds for the transaction at consummation out of the person's own resources, out of deposits held by the person, or by drawing on a bona fide warehouse line of credit.

(b) Misrepresentation of value of consumer's dwelling--

(1) Coercion of appraiser. In connection with a consumer credit transaction secured by a consumer's principal dwelling, no creditor or mortgage broker, and no affiliate of a creditor or mortgage broker shall directly or indirectly coerce, influence, or otherwise encourage an appraiser to misstate or misrepresent the value of such dwelling.

(i) Examples of actions that violate this paragraph (b)(1) include:

(A) Implying to an appraiser that current or future retention of the appraiser depends on the amount at which the appraiser values a consumer's principal dwelling;

(B) Excluding an appraiser from consideration for future engagement because the appraiser reports a value of a consumer's principal dwelling that does not meet or exceed a minimum threshold;

(C) Telling an appraiser a minimum reported value of a consumer's principal dwelling that is needed to approve the loan;

(D) Failing to compensate an appraiser because the appraiser does not value a consumer's principal dwelling at or above a certain amount; and

(E) Conditioning an appraiser's compensation on loan consummation.

(ii) Examples of actions that do not violate this paragraph (b)(1) include:

(A) Asking an appraiser to consider additional information about a consumer's principal dwelling or about comparable properties;

(B) Requesting that an appraiser provide additional information about the basis for a valuation;

(C) Requesting that an appraiser correct factual errors in a valuation;

(D) Obtaining multiple appraisals of a consumer's principal dwelling, so long as the creditor adheres to a policy of selecting the most reliable appraisal, rather than the appraisal that states the highest value;

(E) Withholding compensation from an appraiser for breach of contract or substandard performance of services as provided by contract; and

(F) Taking action permitted or required by applicable federal or state statute, regulation, or agency guidance.

(2) When extension of credit prohibited. In connection with a consumer credit transaction secured by a consumer's principal dwelling, a creditor who knows, at or before loan consummation, of a violation of paragraph (b)(1) of this section in connection with an appraisal shall not extend credit based on such appraisal unless the creditor documents that it has acted with reasonable diligence to determine that the appraisal does not materially misstate or misrepresent the value of such dwelling.

(3) Appraiser defined. As used in this paragraph (b), an appraiser is a person who engages in the business of providing assessments of the value of dwellings. The term "appraiser" includes persons that employ, refer, or manage appraisers and affiliates of such persons.

(c) Servicing practices.

(1) In connection with a consumer credit transaction secured by a consumer's principal dwelling, no servicer shall--

(i) Fail to credit a payment to the consumer's loan account as of the date of receipt, except when a delay in crediting does not result in any charge to the consumer or in the reporting of negative information to a consumer reporting agency, or except as provided in paragraph (c)(2) of this section;

(ii) Impose on the consumer any late fee or delinquency charge in connection with a payment, when the only delinquency is attributable to late fees or delinquency charges assessed on an earlier payment, and the payment is otherwise a full payment for the applicable period and is paid on its due date or within any applicable grace period; or

(iii) Fail to provide, within a reasonable time after receiving a request from the consumer or any person acting on behalf of the consumer, an accurate statement of the total outstanding balance that would be required to satisfy the consumer's obligation in full as of a specified date.

(2) If a servicer specifies in writing requirements for the consumer to follow in making payments, but accepts a payment that does not conform to the requirements, the servicer shall credit the payment as of 5 days after receipt.

(3) For purposes of this paragraph (c), the terms "servicer" and "servicing" have the same meanings as provided in 24 CFR 3500.2(b), as amended.

(d) This section does not apply to a home equity line of credit subject to § 226.5b.

(a) Scope. The disclosure requirements of this section apply to any covered person except as otherwise provided in this section. For purposes of this section:

(1) A "covered person "means any person, as defined in § 226.2(a)(22), that becomes the owner of an existing mortgage loan by acquiring legal title to the debt obligation, whether through a purchase, assignment, or other transfer, and who acquires more than one mortgage loan in any twelve-month period. For purposes of this section, a servicer of a mortgage loan shall not be treated as the owner of the obligation if the servicer holds title to the loan or it is assigned to the servicer solely for the administrative convenience of the servicer in servicing the obligation.

(2) A "mortgage loan "means any consumer credit transaction that is secured by the principal dwelling of a consumer.

(b) Disclosure required. Except as provided in paragraph (c) of this section, any person that becomes a covered person as defined in this section shall mail or deliver the disclosures required by this section to the consumer on or before the 30th calendar day following the acquisition date. If there is more than one covered person, only one disclosure shall be given and the covered persons shall agree among themselves which covered person shall comply with the requirements that this section imposes on any or all of them.

(1) Acquisition date. For purposes of this section, the date that the covered person acquired the mortgage loan shall be the date of acquisition recognized in the books and records of the acquiring party.

(2) Multiple consumers. If there is more than one consumer liable on the obligation, a covered person may mail or deliver the disclosures to any consumer who is primarily liable.

(c) Exceptions. Notwithstanding paragraph (b) of this section, a covered person is not subject to the requirements of this section with respect to a particular mortgage loan if:

(1) The covered person sells or otherwise transfers or assigns legal title to the mortgage loan on or before the 30th calendar day following the date that the covered person acquired the mortgage loan; or

(2) The mortgage loan is transferred to the covered person in connection with a repurchase agreement and the transferor that is obligated to repurchase the loan continues to recognize the loan as an asset on its own books and records. However, if the transferor does not repurchase the mortgage loan, the acquiring party must make the disclosures required by § 226.39 within 30 days after the date that the transaction is recognized as an acquisition in its books and records.

(d) Content of required disclosures. The disclosures required by this section shall identify the loan that was acquired or transferred and state the following:

(1) The identity, address, and telephone number of the covered person who owns the mortgage loan. If there is more than one covered person, the information required by this paragraph shall be provided for each of them.

(2) The acquisition date recognized by the covered person.

(3) How to reach an agent or party having authority to act on behalf of the covered person (or persons), which shall identify a person (or persons) authorized to receive legal notices on behalf of the covered person and resolve issues concerning the consumer's payments on the loan. However, no information is required to be provided under this paragraph if the consumer can use the information provided under paragraph (d)(1) of this section for these purposes. If multiple persons are identified under this paragraph, the disclosure shall provide contact information for each and indicate the extent to which the authority of each agent differs. For purposes of this paragraph (d)(3), it is sufficient if the covered person provides only a telephone number provided that the consumer can use the telephone number to obtain the address for the agent or other person identified.

(4) The location where transfer of ownership of the debt to the covered person is recorded. However, if the transfer of ownership has not been recorded in public records at the time the disclosure is provided, the covered person complies with this paragraph by stating this fact.

(e) Optional disclosures. In addition to the information required to be disclosed under paragraph (d) of this section, a covered person may, at its option, provide any other information regarding the transaction.

1B- Consumer Credit Law Manual § 226.46

§ 226.46 Special disclosure requirements for private education loans.

(a) Coverage. The requirements of this subpart apply to private education loans as defined in § 226.46(b)(5). A creditor may, at its option, comply with the requirements of this subpart for an extension of credit subject to §§ 226.17 and 226.18 that is extended to a consumer for expenses incurred after graduation from a law, medical, dental, veterinary, or other graduate school and related to relocation, study for a bar or other examination, participation in an internship or residency program, or similar purposes.

(1) Relation to other subparts in this part. Except as otherwise specifically provided, the requirements and limitations of this subpart are in addition to and not in lieu of those contained in other subparts of this Part.

(b) Definitions. For purposes of this subpart, the following definitions apply:

(1) Covered educational institution means:

(i) An educational institution that meets the definition of an institution of higher education, as defined in paragraph (b)(2) of this section, without regard to the institution's accreditation status; and

(ii) Includes an agent, officer, or employee of the institution of higher education. An agent means an institution-affiliated organization as defined by section 151 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1019) or an officer or employee of an institution-affiliated organization.

(2) Institution of higher education has the same meaning as in sections 101 and 102 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1001-1002) and the implementing regulations published by the U.S. Department of Education.

(3) Postsecondary educational expenses means any of the expenses that are listed as part of the cost of attendance, as defined under section 472 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1087ll), of a student at a covered educational institution. These expenses include tuition and fees, books, supplies, miscellaneous personal expenses, room and board, and an allowance for any loan fee, origination fee, or insurance premium charged to a student or parent for a loan incurred to cover the cost of the student's attendance.

(4) Preferred lender arrangement has the same meaning as in section 151 of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1019).

(5) Private education loan means an extension of credit that:

(i) Is not made, insured, or guaranteed under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 1070 et seq.);

(ii) Is extended to a consumer expressly, in whole or in part, for postsecondary educational expenses, regardless of whether the loan is provided by the educational institution that the student attends;

(iii) Does not include open-end credit any loan that is secured by real property or a dwelling; and

(iv) Does not include an extension of credit in which the covered educational institution is the creditor if:

(A) The term of the extension of credit is 90 days or less; or

(B) an interest rate will not be applied to the credit balance and the term of the extension of credit is one year or less, even if the credit is payable in more than four installments.

(c) Form of disclosures.

(1) Clear and conspicuous. The disclosures required by this subpart shall be made clearly and conspicuously.

(2) Transaction disclosures.

(i) The disclosures required under §§ 226.47(b) and (c) shall be made in writing, in a form that the consumer may keep. The disclosures shall be grouped together, shall be segregated from everything else, and shall not contain any information not directly related to the disclosures required under §§ 226.47(b) and (c), which include the disclosures required under § 226.18.

(ii) The disclosures may include an acknowledgement of receipt, the date of the transaction, and the consumer's name, address, and account number. The following disclosures may be made together with or separately from other required disclosures: the creditor's identity under § 226.18(a), insurance or debt cancellation under § 226.18(n), and certain security interest charges under § 226.18(o).

(iii) The term "finance charge" and corresponding amount, when required to be disclosed under § 226.18(d), and the interest rate required to be disclosed under §§ 226.47(b)(1)(i) and (c)(1), shall be more conspicuous than any other disclosure, except the creditor's identity under § 228.18(a).

(3) Electronic disclosures. The disclosures required under §§ 226.47(b) and (c) may be provided to the consumer in electronic form, subject to compliance with the consumer consent and other applicable provisions of the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (E-Sign Act) (15 U.S.C. 7001 et seq.). The disclosures required by § 226.47(a) may be provided to the consumer in electronic form on or with an application or solicitation that is accessed by the consumer in electronic form without regard to the consumer consent or other provisions of the E-Sign Act. The form required to be received under § 226.48(e) may be accepted by the creditor in electronic form as provided for in that section.

(d) Timing of disclosures.

(1) Application or solicitation disclosures.

(i) The disclosures required by § 226.47(a) shall be provided on or with any application or solicitation. For purposes of this subpart, the term solicitation means an offer of credit that does not require the consumer to complete an application. A "firm offer of credit" as defined in section 603(l) of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (15 U.S.C. 1681a(l)) is a solicitation for purposes of this section.

(ii) The creditor may, at its option, disclose orally the information in § 226.47(a) in a telephone application or solicitation. Alternatively, if the creditor does not disclose orally the information in § 226.47(a), the creditor must provide the disclosures or place them in the mail no later than three business days after the consumer has applied for the credit, except that, if the creditor either denies the consumer's application or provides or places in the mail the disclosures in § 226.47(b) no later than three business days after the consumer requests the credit, the creditor need not also provide the § 226.47(a) disclosures.

(iii) Notwithstanding paragraph (d)(1)(i), for a loan that the consumer may use for multiple purposes including, but not limited to, postsecondary educational expenses, the creditor need not provide the disclosures required by § 226.47(a).

(2) Approval disclosures. The creditor shall provide the disclosures required by § 226.47(b) before consummation on or with any notice of approval provided to the consumer. If the creditor mails notice of approval, the disclosures must be mailed with the notice. If the creditor communicates notice of approval by telephone, the creditor must mail the disclosures within three business days of providing the notice of approval. If the creditor communicates notice of approval electronically, the creditor may provide the disclosures in electronic form in accordance with § 226.46(d)(3); otherwise the creditor must mail the disclosures within three business days of communicating the notice of approval. If the creditor communicates approval in person, the creditor must provide the disclosures to the consumer at that time.

(3) Final disclosures. The disclosures required by § 226.47(c) shall be provided after the consumer accepts the loan in accordance with § 226.48(c)(1).

(4) Receipt of mailed disclosures. If the disclosures under paragraphs (d)(1), (d)(2) or (d)(3), are mailed to the consumer, the consumer is considered to have received them three business days after they are mailed.

(e) Basis of disclosures and use of estimates

(1) Legal obligation. Disclosures shall reflect the terms of the legal obligation between the parties.

(2) Estimates. If any information necessary for an accurate disclosure is unknown to the creditor, the creditor shall make the disclosure based on the best information reasonably available at the time the disclosure is provided, and shall state clearly that the disclosure is an estimate.

(f) Multiple creditors; multiple consumers. If a transaction involves more than one creditor, only one set of disclosures shall be given and the creditors shall agree among themselves which creditor will comply with the requirements that this part imposes on any or all of them. If there is more than one consumer, the disclosures may be made to any consumer who is primarily liable on the obligation.

(g) Effect of subsequent events.

(1) Approval disclosures. If a disclosure under § 226.47(b) becomes inaccurate because of an event that occurs after the creditor delivers the required disclosures, the inaccuracy is not a violation of Regulation Z (12 CFR part 226), although new disclosures may be required under § 226.48(c).

(2) Final disclosures. If a disclosure under § 226.47(c) becomes inaccurate because of an event that occurs after the creditor delivers the required disclosures, the inaccuracy is not a violation of Regulation Z (12 CFR part 226).
