Preliminary objections were filed to the complaint and were sustained. In ruling on the preliminary objections, the court determined that the plaintiffs in the class action suit were couching their argument in terms of excess surplus but were in actuality seeking a retroactive rate relief. Old Forge Shcool District at 1208. The court held that the class action was not the appropriate vehicle by which to seek retroactive relief. The court considered it noteworthy that a previous determination had been made in the appeal from the Commissioners determination that the plaintiffs did not have a protected property interest in their rates, and, therefore did not have standing to appeal the findings made by the Insurance Commissioner. Id. In sustaining the preliminary objections, the court also granted another defendants motion for counsel fees, reasoning that appellants had engaged in single obdurate and vexatious litigation. Id. At 1209. In making its ruling, the court stated the following:

This is now at least the third time that most of the appellants herein have had to be reminded of the basic premise that rates and reserves are part of a regulatory process under the sound discretion of the commissioner, and are not proper subject of adversary litigation in which individual entities or groups may assert their private interests. At this point, we believe that imposition of counsel fees for obdurate where vexatious litigation is appropriate.

Thereafter, on February 17, 2006, Highmark, seeking a similar award as had been granted to the co-defendant, filed its application for attorneys fees under Section 2503(7) and 2503(9) of the Judicial Code found at 42 Pa. C.S. Sections 2503(7), (9). Highmark sought an award of attorneys fees against all but one of the defendants. That Section of the Pennsylvania Statutes reads in relevant part as follows:

The following participants shall be entitled to a reasonable counsel fee as part of the taxable cost of the matter:

(7) Any participant who is awarded counsel fees as a sanction against another participant for dilatory, obdurate or vexatious conduct during the pendency of a matter.

(9) Any participant who is awarded counsel fees because the conduct of another party commencing the action or otherwise was arbitrary, vexatious or in bad faith.

On March 21, 2006, the Commonwealth Court entered an order granting Highmarks application for fees.

Supreme Court Vacates and Remands. On appeal to the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, the class action plaintiffs asserted that the Commonwealth Court erred in granting an award of attorneys fees. The Supreme Court engaged in a lengthy discussion regarding the appropriateness of the Commonwealth Courts handling of the motion for attorneys fees as a separate matter under Pennsylvania Rule of Appellate Procedure (hereinafter Pa. R. A. P.) 1701(a). However, more importantly, the Court undertook an examination of what is considered vexatious conduct under Section 2503(9).

Ultimately, the Court issued a remand to the Commonwealth Court with instructions to reevaluate its decision in light of the then recent decision by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court set forth in Ciamaichelo v. Independence Blue Cross, 589 Pa. 415, 909 A.2d 1211 (2006). In Ciamaichelo v. Independence Blue Cross, the Supreme Court held that a lawsuit alleging a breach of contractual and fiduciary duties by the health insurance plan could proceed in a Court of Common Pleas where there was an allegation by the policyholders that the plan had amassed an excess in surplus funds. Further, the Supreme Court considered it problematic that the Commonwealth Court did not set forth with sufficient clarity how it applied the two prong test for vexatious conduct as set forth in Thunberg [v. Strause], 545 Pa. 607, 617, 682 A.2d 295, 299 (1996). Old Forge School District at 1213. The Supreme Court had made clear in the Thunberg decision that a court when deciding whether the initiation of an action was vexatious must determine the following: 1) the suit was filed without sufficient ground in either law or in fact; and 2) the suit served the sole purpose of causing annoyance. Thunberg, 682 A.2d 299.

Practice Tips

- . Attorney fees in Pennsylvania are only permitted where provided for by contract or statute;
- . when proceeding under 42 Pa. C.S.A. section 2503(7) or (9) be prepared to present evidence to support the two findings required under Thunberg;
- . guide the court to make necessary findings to support an award of attorney fees under Thunberg.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Matthew P. Barrett is a partner with the law firm of O'Malley, Harris, Durkin & Perry where he specializes in civil litigation matters. He has been a member of the bar of Pennsylvania since 1992. He is a graduate of the University of Scranton and Seton Hall University School of Law. He is a Board Member of the Lackawanna Bar Association and a Past President of the Young Lawyer Division of the Lackawanna Bar Association. Mr. Barrett serves as a member of the Scranton Preparatory School Alumni Board of Governors (Past President) and the Lackawanna Industrial Fund Enterprise. He is also a former member of the following Boards: Greater Scranton Chamber of Commerce, Pennsylvania Defense Institute. Mr. Barrett can be reached by email at mbarrett@omalleyandharris.com.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

105 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Barrett on Cooper v. Schoffstall, 588 Pa. 505, 905 A.2d 482, 2006 Pa. LEXIS 1717

2008 Emerging Issues 2499

Matthew P. Barrett on Cooper v. Schoffstall, 588 Pa. 505, 905 A.2d 482, 2006 Pa. LEXIS 1717 (Pa. 2006).

By Matthew P. Barrett

July 7, 2008

SUMMARY: In a decision that constitutes an important part of the body of law covering discovery of financial data of expert witnesses, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court ruled that compelling an expert witness to produce all of their financial records will typically be viewed as abuse of the discovery process. This commentary discusses Coopers importance and implications for discovery of financial information of an expert witness in civil litigation.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: What started as a common personal injury lawsuit arising out of a pedestrian/automobile accident in December 2001 resulted in an important decision from the Pennsylvania Supreme Court on the determination when there is cause supporting the discovery of financial information and records from an expert witness. That decision did not end the case, but rather resulted in a remand to the court of common pleas with guidance on how to resolve a dispute between the parties involving the discovery of financial records of a non-party expert medical witness to facilitate an inquiry into potential bias.

Plaintiff Seeks Discovery of Defense Medical Experts Financial Records. During the course of the litigation, Barbara Cooper, plaintiff was requested by the defendant to attend an Independent Medical Examination (IME) with Dr. Perry Eagle. Ms. Cooper attended the IME. Thereafter, Ms. Cooper sought through the issuance of subpoenas and discovery copies of federal form 1099 tax records associated with [Dr. Eagles] performance of services as an independent contractor for the calendar years 1999, 2000 and 2001 in undertaking defense related reports, examinations and depositions. Cooper, 905 A.2d 508. Dr. Eagle moved to exclude any discovery of payments made by other persons or firms entirely unrelated to the parties, counsel or insurer involved in the case on the basis that it exceeded the bounds of permissible discovery.

Trial Court Orders Disclosure of Defense Medical Experts Financial Documents. Mrs. Cooper presented evidence that Dr. Eagle had participated in a number of prior civil actions maintaining that the doctor had participated in 200 to 400 defense medical examinations in recent prior years. The trial court denied the motions for protective order but did issue an order requiring confidential treatment of the financial information to be produced by the doctor.

Dr. Eagle filed a notice of appeal. In a memorandum, the trial court explained that Pennsylvania Rule of Civil Procedure (hereinafter Pa. R.C.P.) 4003.1 allows discovery of any matter, not privileged, that is relevant to the litigation subject matter and will substantially aid in advancing claims or defenses. Additionally, the trial court held that Pa. R.C.P. 4003.5 permits additional discovery from an expert witness upon cause shown. In reviewing the evidence presented to him, the trial court concluded that Dr. Eagle performed defense medical examinations, prepared reports and testified in court proceedings with high frequency. The trial court recognized that an expert witness could have a bias in favor of a specific party, and reasoned that it is also proper to show that an expert has a bias in favor of a class of parties. Cooper v. Schoffstall, No 5932 CV 2001, slip op at 5-6 (C.P. Dauphin December 15, 2003) The court did not accept the arguments of Dr. Eagle that the discovery which had been served upon him was burdensome, harassing and/or annoying or would have chilling effect on doctors willing to perform independent medical examinations.

The Superior Court Affirmed But for Different Reasons. On appeal to the Superior Court, a three judge panel affirmed the decision of the trial court ruling that the trial court properly used its discretion in allowing the discovery. However, the Superior Court performed its own analysis and determined that Pa. R.C.P. 4003.5 was not applicable to the discovery of potential bias on the part of expert witnesses. Cooper at 486. Rather, the Superior Court held that the rule addresses only facts and opinions required or divulged in anticipation of litigation. The Superior Court held that the discovery sought from Dr. Eagle fell within the broad, general scope of discovery under Rule 4003.1 of the Pennsylvania Rules of Civil Procedure.

The Supreme Court Undertakes Review. Unfortunately for Dr. Eagle, not only was he embroiled in the discovery dispute in the Cooper matter, but he was also involved in a similar discovery dispute in another case. J.S. v. Whetzel, 2004 Pa. Super. 406, 860 A.2d 1112 (Pa. Super. 2004). The Pennsylvania Supreme Court allowed the appeal in the Cooper case to address the discovery issue.

On appeal to the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, Dr. Eagle asserted that the discovery sought by the plaintiff was beyond that permitted of an expert witness. Dr. Eagle urged the court to adopt the trial courts view that Pa. R.C.P. 4003.5 governed the dispute and that the trial court had erred in ordering the disclosure. Dr. Eagle requested the Supreme Court to reject the Superior Courts approach of determining the dispute under Pa. R.C.P. 4003.1 which he considered too liberal. Dr. Eagle argued that the Superior Courts approach would authorize litigants, without seeking leave of court or paying expert fees, to freely depose an opposing partys expert witness on virtually any subject except the one most central to the litigation (the experts opinion on the facts of the case). Cooper at 488. Dr. Eagle urged the Supreme Court to consider the privacy interest of expert witnesses and suggested that the court consider the decision by the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in the matter of Fraternal Order of Police v. City of Philadelphia, 812 F.2d at 109, 115 (3rd Cir. 1987). In that matter, the court held that public disclosure of financial information may be personally embarrassing and highly intrusive. Dr. Eagle sought the Pennsylvania Supreme Court to limit the scope of discovery of an experts financial interests to those instances where the financial interests are demonstratively probative of any bias that [the witness] may harbor in favor of the law firm retaining [the expert]. Cooper at 489.

The Supreme Court considered the three important public policy issues advanced by Dr. Eagle that allowing discovery of an expert witnesses financial would (1) have a chilling effect on the availability of qualified expert witnesses; (2) substantially increases the burden, expense and delay attendant on permitting the parties to delve into matters that are collateral to the central issues in personal injury litigations; and has a disproportionate adverse effect on the defense. Cooper at 490.

The Supreme Court also considered the arguments of the plaintiff who maintained that the information was an essential response to the defense tactics of cultivating and employing professional witnesses as well as the evasiveness of such witnesses in responding to legitimate inquiries concerning the extent of their financial entanglements with the firms and/or the insurance industry. Id.

Supreme Court Set Guidelines. Ultimately, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court determined that the trial courts are in the best position to make an assessment after interrogatory responses are received and upon appropriate motion to determine whether or not there is cause to support further supplemented discovery of the personal documents of the expert. Where a witness has been evasive or untruthful in responding to written discovery, additional discovery may be warranted. Noting that the trial court should exercise sound discretion, the Supreme Court determined that in all likelihood, information exchanged through written interrogatories would adequately provide information which would support adequate trial preparation. The Supreme Court determined that there are procedures supporting adequate trial preparation on the issue of potential bias of non-party expert witnesses less burdensome than production of personal financial records. In other words, the trial courts throughout the Commonwealth will serve as gatekeepers, and there would be no categorical right to obtain information regarding the financial documents of litigation experts.

Practice Tips

. Practitioners should prepare extensive and carefully crafted interrogatories inquiring into the extent an expert is engaged in litigation or expert services.

. Although personal financial documents may not be easily obtainable, trial preparation should include interrogatories as to the number of times an expert has served as and expert, performed examinations or other services, been deposed and other questions to flesh out potential evidence of bias. Other questions should be posed to find out the amounts received by the expert in providing the services in the present litigation and in other matters.

. Careful consideration should be given to pursuing additional discovery by filing a motion supported with evidence that the personal financial documents of the expert are necessary to establish his or her bias based upon evasive or untruthful discovery responses.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Matthew P. Barrett is a partner with the law firm of O'Malley, Harris, Durkin & Perry where he specializes in civil litigation matters. He has been a member of the bar of Pennsylvania since 1992. He is a graduate of the University of Scranton and Seton Hall University School of Law. He is a Board Member of the Lackawanna Bar Association and a Past President of the Young Lawyer Division of the Lackawanna Bar Association. Mr. Barrett serves as a member of the Scranton Preparatory School Alumni Board of Governors (Past President) and the Lackawanna Industrial Fund Enterprise. He is also a former member of the following Boards: Greater Scranton Chamber of Commerce, Pennsylvania Defense Institute. Mr. Barrett can be reached by email at mbarrett@omalleyandharris.com.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

106 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

CAFA's Exception for Securities: Vairo on Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli

2008 Emerging Issues 2502

Vairo on Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli

By Georgene Vairo

July 7, 2008

SUMMARY: For the first time, a federal appellate court has construed the reach of CAFAs statutory exception for actions that relate to the rights, duties, and obligations relating to or created by or pursuant to any security. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, analyzes the Second Circuits reading of the exception in Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Vairo, Georgene. Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Estate of Pew v. Cardarelli, 527 F.3d 25, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 10269 (2d Cir. May 13, 2008), involves a rarely litigated provision of the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA): the statutory exception for actions that relate to the rights, duties, and obligations relating to or created by or pursuant to any security. It is the first federal appellate ruling on the reach of the provision, 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(9). The Second Circuit, by a 2-1 vote, ruled that the exception applies only to suits that seek to enforce the terms of instruments that create and define securities, and to duties imposed on persons who administer securities. The court also grappled with some of the problems raised by CAFAs appellate jurisdiction provisions.

Background. This action alleged that officers of an issuer of debt certificates, abetted by the issuer's auditor, failed to disclose that the issuer was insolvent. The plaintiffs sought relief under New York's consumer fraud statute. The action was brought as a class action in state court and then removed to federal court under the Class Action Fairness Act. The plaintiffs sought remand, arguing that the suit fell within the securities exception to CAFA's removal provision. The district court remanded, and the defendants sought permission to appeal the district court's remand order.

General Appellate Issues. Ordinarily, an order of remand is not appealable [see 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d)]. CAFA, however, allows a party who loses on a motion to remand to seek permission to appeal [28 U.S.C. § 1453(c)(1)]. However, the timing provisions are tricky. First, the text of § 1453(c)(1) states that the petition be made to the court of appeals not less than 7 days after entry of the order." Following the other courts of appeals that have considered the issue, the Second Circuit concluded that this was a drafting error, and that the language should be interpreted to mean not more than seven days after entry of the order. Clearly, the intention of Congress was to impose a seven-day deadline, not to require an indefinite waiting period. Because the defendants petition for review filed on the seventh business day after the entry of the district court's remand order, the petition was timely.

Second, CAFA imposes a strict deadline on the court of appeals to resolve the appeal. Again, the language of the statute is problematic. Section 1453(c)(2) provides: If a court of appeals accepts an appeal . . . the court shall complete all action on the appeal, including rendering judgment, not later than 60 days after the date on which such appeal was filed. [emphasis added]. What if the court of appeals does not accept the appeal until 61 days after the appeal was filed? Again, like the other courts of appeals who have had to deal with this issue, the Second Circuit essentially finds that an appeal is not an appeal until the request for review is granted. It ignores the word filed. So, once it grants the request to appeal, the Court has only 60 days to render a decision [see DiTolla v. Doral Dental IPA of N.Y., LLC, 469 F.3d at 275 (2d Cir. 2006) (CAFA's 60-day clock for rendering judgment starts running on the day that the Court's order granting permission to appeal is filed")].

Finally, the Second Circuit noted that a court of appeals retains discretion to decline to hear CAFA appeals, and that its sound exercise of discretion should be guided by consideration of the importance and novelty of the issues raised by the case. Here, the Second Circuit allowed the appeal because the question of whether a state-law deceptive practices claim predicated on the sale of a security is removable under CAFA was important and consequential, was a case of first impression in the courts of appeals, and a decision on the question would alleviate uncertainty in the district courts.

Comment. It is laudable that the courts of appeals are sticking together on their readings of the appellate timing provisions of CAFA. It would be preferable for Congress to clean up the language of the statute, but at least in the meantime, there is emerging clarity on these technical issues.

Parity of District Court and Appellate Court Jurisdiction. The CAFA provision allowing interlocutory review of remand orders does not apply to any class action that solely involves a claim that relates to the rights, duties, and obligations relating to or created by or pursuant to any security [28 U.S.C. § 1453(d)(3)]. This exception mirrors 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(9)(C), which provides an exception to CAFA's grant of original federal jurisdiction. The plain language of § 1453(d), the Second Circuit said, limits all of § 1453, including subsection (c), which delineates the scope of the court of appeals' authority to accept an appeal from a remand order. Accordingly, § 1453(d) limits a court of appeals jurisdiction to review the district court's remand order.

The congruity of the text of the original jurisdiction and appellate jurisdiction exceptions led the court to combine its grant of leave to appeal with the merits of the appeal. Not to do so would waste some of the 60-day time limit for deciding the appeal. More importantly in this case, it would be inefficient because the decision on appellate jurisdiction required construction of the same statutory language on which the district court based its remand order. In other words, CAFA's relevant jurisdictional and removal provisions operate in tandem" because both original and appellate jurisdiction depend on whether plaintiffs' allegations fall within CAFA's exception for claims that relate to rights, duties and obligations related to or created by or pursuant to a security. If there is original jurisdiction for plaintiffs' underlying claim, the court of appeals would have appellate jurisdiction, and it would reverse the remand order, with the case remaining in federal district court. If, on the other hand, the district court lacked jurisdiction over the underlying claim, the appellate court would dismiss the appeal for lack of appellate jurisdiction. Thus, the remand order would stand, and the action would be litigated in state court.

Interpretation of Statutory Exception. The question then, both as to the merits and as to appellate jurisdiction, was whether the case fell under the exception to CAFA's grant of original federal jurisdiction for any class action that solely involves a claim . . . that relates to the rights, duties (including fiduciary duties), and obligations relating to or created by or pursuant to any security [28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(9)(C)]. The Second Circuit acknowledged that CAFAs general purpose was to ensure that cases of national importance involving securities be litigated in federal court. But, it also noted that the securities exception was one of several CAFA provisions designed to keep purely local matters in the state courts. Because it found the wording of the statute to be ambiguous, the Second Circuit considered not only the text of statute itself but also the statutory context and the legislative history.

The Second Circuit interpreted the exception as applying only to suits that seek to enforce the terms of instruments that create and define securities, and to duties imposed on persons who administer securities. The natural reading of the statute, the court said, is to differentiate obligations from duties by reading obligations to be those created in instruments, such as a certificate of incorporation, an indenture, a note, or some other corporate document. The rights are those of the security-holders (or their trustees or agents) to whom these duties and obligations run.

The Second Circuit rejected the idea that the term rights . . . relating to . . . any security" includes the right to bring any cause of action that relates to a security. This interpretation would defeat any limitation that was intended by the use of the term. Moreover, this interpretation would render superfluous other sections of CAFA excepting class actions concerning a covered security [see 28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d)(9)(A), 1453(d)(1)].

The Second Circuit then found that the certificates involved here were clearly securities and created obligations and corresponding rights in the holders. However, the suit did not relate to those rights; rather, it was a state-law consumer fraud action alleging that the defendants fraudulently concealed the issuer's insolvency when it sold the certificates. The claims here were not grounded in the terms of the security itself, the kind of claims that might arise, for example, when the interest rate was pegged to a rate set by a bank that later merges into another bank, or when a bond series is discontinued, or when a failure to negotiate replacement credit results in a default on principal. The present claim that a debt security was fraudulently marketed by an insolvent enterprise did not enforce the rights of the certificate holders as holders, and therefore it did not fall within the statutory exception.

Because the statutory exception to jurisdiction did not apply, the Second Circuit had appellate jurisdiction. This also meant that the district court had jurisdiction and the case should not have been remanded to state court. Accordingly, the Second Circuit reversed the remand order and remanded to the district court for further proceedings.

Dissent. The dissenting judge argued that the majority opinion misconstrued the plain language of the statute. While the majority saw the provision as ambiguous and even cryptic, the dissent saw it as straightforward. Section 1332(d)(9)(C) applies to claims relating to the rights, duties . . . and obligations relating to or created by or pursuant to any security. In the dissent's view, it was readily apparent that the present suit did relate to rights and obligations created by, or at least relating to, the securities. It plainly concerned the defendant's failure to fulfill its obligations with respect to the certificates, and the plaintiffs' deprivation of rights with respect to the certificates.

Indeed, the dissenting judge notes her agreement with virtually every assertion made by the majority, but then chastises it for reaching a wrong conclusion that does not follow from its own analysis.

The majority opinion, the dissent said, was a wholly inexplicable departure from the plain text of Section 1332(d)(9)(C). . . . I can only conclude that the majority's specifications as to what claims must be in order to qualify for exemption is an act of judicial re-drafting of CAFA."

Comment. Judge Rosemary Pooler, in dissent, has the better of the argument. However, it is not surprising that the majority ruled as it did. First, as both the majority and the dissent point out, the purpose of CAFA is to expand federal jurisdiction. Moreover, subsection (A) of § 1332(d)(9) carves out class actions only because jurisdiction exists under another federal statute: the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act (SLUSA"). Between SLUSA and CAFA, Congress clearly wanted to steer cases involving claims of securities fraud into federal court.

The decision shows once again that the importance of the mode of statutory construction. Judge Pooler, quoting Benjamin Cardozo, acknowledges that there are times when judges will need to fill in the gaps of poorly drafted or ambiguous statutes [Benjamin N. Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process, 83 (1921) (statutes are designed to meet the fugitive exigencies of the hour")]. In Judge Pooler's view, the text of CAFA points to a clear remand. In contrast, the majority has ignored the plain terms of CAFA, created its own waste space, and filled in the resulting gap with an unwarranted exercise of legislative power."

References. 5 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 23.63[2][a], 23.63A[1]; 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.)

§ 102.26[1][a][ii]; 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 107.15[13][b][i][B]; 19 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 203.34[2].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors' qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

107 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Pre-Action Depositions: Vairo on In re Vioxx Prods. Liab. Litig.

2008 Emerging Issues 2503

Vairo on In re Vioxx Prods Liab Litig

By Georgene Vairo

July 7, 2008

SUMMARY: Can pre-action depositions under Civil Rule 27 be used by a nonparty as a vehicle for compliance with Civil Rule 11? In In re Vioxx Prods. Liab. Litig., the Eastern District of Louisiana rejected such a use of Rule 27. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, addresses the practical implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Vairo, Georgene. In re Vioxx Prods. Liab. Litig. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

In re Vioxx Prods. Liab. Litig., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36744 (E.D. La. May 5, 2008), involves the issue of whether a nonparty may argue that its pre-filing compliance with Fed. R. Civ. P. 11 necessitates the opportunity to use Fed. R. Civ. P. 27 to take depositions to perpetuate testimony. The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana held that Rule 27(a) pre-action depositions cannot be used as a vehicle for compliance with Rule 11 representations to the court that claims or legal contentions are warranted and that factual contentions have evidentiary support.

Background. In connection with the Vioxx Multi-District Litigation (Vioxx MDL") against Merck & Co., Inc., Healthcare Recoveries, Inc. (HRI), on behalf of numerous health insurers, filed a verified petition for pre-action depositions pursuant to Rule 27(a). The petition sought an order requiring all plaintiffs counsel in the Vioxx MDL to provide (1) the names of all plaintiffs who allegedly took Vioxx and suffered personal injury or wrongful death as a consequence; (2) the addresses and social security numbers of these individuals; (3) the docket numbers of specific cases filed by these individuals; and (4) the identities of health insurers who provided coverage for some or all of the medical expenses incurred to treat the injuries or conditions alleged to have been caused by Vioxx.

The Plaintiffs Steering Committee (PSC") from the Vioxx MDL, as well as Merck, filed motions to dismiss the petition, both arguing that HRI attempted use of Rule 27 was improper. Specifically, they asserted that Rule 27 does not permit a party to seek pre-action discovery so that the party can comply with Rule 11. They alleged that HRI sought to identify the names of Vioxx plaintiffs for the sole purpose of framing a cause of action against those individuals to attempt to recover all or a part of the monies these individuals would potentially receive as a result of the Vioxx settlement. PSC and Merck also argued that the information HRI sought was in no danger of being destroyed or lost, which is a requirement for Rule 27(a) relief.

Rule 27 Cannot Be Used to Meet Rule 11 Requirements. Rule 27 provides that:

A person who wants to perpetuate testimony about any matter cognizable in a United States court may file a verified petition in the district court for the district where any expected adverse party resides. The petition must ask for an order authorizing the petitioner to depose the named persons in order to perpetuate their testimony."

The Rule further provides that the petitioner certify that the petitioner expects to be a party to an action cognizable in a United States court but cannot presently bring it or cause it to be brought; and that the petitioner provide (1) the subject matter of the expected action and the petitioner's interest; (2) the facts that the petitioner want to establish by the proposed testimony and the reason to perpetuate it; (3) the names or a description of the persons whom the petitioner expects to be adverse parties and their addresses, as far as known; and (4) the name, address, and expected substance of the testimony of each deponent [Fed. R. Civ. P. 27(a)].

The district court explained the purpose of Rule 27. It merely provides a means to perpetuate known testimony. The Rule is intended to apply when testimony might be lost to a prospective litigant unless the litigant is permitted to take the testimony without waiting until suit is filed. Thus, the petitioner must show that there is a danger the testimony will be lost by delay. The rule is most frequently applied to potential deponents who may be unavailable after a complaint is filed due to such reasons as advanced age, illness, or an indefinite departure from the country. General allegations that evidence may not be lost are not sufficient.

Most courts interpreting the rule have concluded that Rule 27 may not be used as a discovery device to determine whether a cause of action exists, and if so, against whom the action should be instituted. A petitioner may not use Rule 27 for discovery of unknown information that the petitioner hopes will assist it in the future when the petitioner applies for judicial relief. Courts have also held that a petitioner may not use Rule 27 to seek information in order to complete a Rule 11 investigation [see In re Landry-Bell, 232 F.R.D. 266 (W.D. La. 2005)].

The court opined that HRI, in filing its Rule 27 petition, was attempting to use Rule 27 in order to fulfill its Rule 11 requirements, or to discover information it already had access to through its own records. HRI sought the basic identifying information of the plaintiffs in the Vioxx MDL so that it could determine whether it had a lien against any recovery the plaintiffs would potentially receive through settlement or trial. Based on the overwhelming weight of authority, the district court concluded that HRIs attempted use of Rule 27 should not be allowed.

The court also found that petitioner had not met its burden of showing that the information sought was likely to be lost or destroyed prior to it being able to file suit. In fact, the majority of the information HRI sought the names and addresses of the plaintiffs was public record and not likely to be destroyed any time soon. The court suggested that HRI could easily compare the names and addresses of its insureds against the names and addresses of the plaintiffs and find out which of its insureds had a case pending in the MDL. Instead, HRI was seeking to make the existing parties in the Vioxx MDL undertake the time and incur the cost to do its work. This is not a proper purpose of Rule 27. Therefore, the district court granted the motions to dismiss the Rule 27(a) petition for pre-action discovery.

Court Disagrees With Contrary Case. The district court acknowledged the case of In re Alpha Industries [see In re Alpha Indus., 159 F.R.D. 456 (S.D.N.Y. 1995)], in which the petitioner argued that it could not bring a copyright and trademark infringement action that complied with Rule 11 because it was unsure which potential defendants were actually selling counterfeit goods. The Alpha Industries court held that the fact that petitioner must delay bringing suit until receiving the information sought is a sufficient showing to allow the use of Rule 27 to perpetuate the respondents testimony. However, the Vioxx MDL court noted that other courts have routinely disagreed with In re Alpha Industries, and found that In re Alpha Industries is not a correct statement of the law. The threat of evidence being lost or destroyed is in fact a requirement for use of Rule 27(a).

Comment. This case was correctly decided. When Rule 11 was first amended in 1983, there were suggestions that Rule 27 could be used to help a prospective plaintiff, in particular, both comply with Rule 11's reasonable inquiry requirement and to ensure that the evidence needed to bring a meritorious case existed. However, the suggestion fell on deaf ears. First of all, Rule 11 does not require that a prospective plaintiff have all the evidence needed to prove the elements of all claims. Rather, it requires a reasonable inquiry "and that the fact allegations of a pleading have evidentiary support or, if specifically so identified, are likely to have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery" [Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(b)(3)]. And, if such further investigation fails to reveal such evidentiary support, Rule 11 prohibits the claimant from later advocating "the facts alleged" [Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(a)].

In other words, Rule 11 and Rule 27 are apples and oranges, designed for specific purposes. Rule 11 imposes obligations on lawyers; and Rule 27 is a discovery tool to be used only in limited situations when there is a need to preserve known testimony. [See 6 Moore's Federal Practice § 27.13 (3d ed.).] The costs of litigation are high enough. The evolution of a rule suggesting that there is a need to take depositions to comply with pre-filing Rule 11 obligations would increase costs and open the door to a flood of formal pre-filing depositions that may not ever otherwise need to have been taken. The Vioxx MDL court was entirely correct to slam the door shut on HRI's attempt to increase the costs of its potential adversaries. Indeed, In re Vioxx Prods. Liab. Litig., is somewhat reminiscent of the Supreme Court's ruling in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 67 S. Ct. 385, 91 L. Ed. 451 (1947), in which the Court dealt a blow to another prospective free-rider who sought the work-product of his adversary. Bottom line: Do your own work first!

References. 6 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 27.03, 27.13[4].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors' qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

108 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Kyle C. Bisceglie on Ehrenfeld v. Mahfouz, 9 N.Y.3d 501 (N.Y. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2485

Kyle C. Bisceglie on Ehrenfeld v. Mahfouz, 9 N.Y.3d 501 (N.Y. 2007), and the New York Libel Terrorism Protection Act

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

July 7, 2008

SUMMARY: The Court of Appeals held in Ehrenfeld that NY lacked jurisdiction over a NY writers action to declare a foreign libel judgment unenforceable; four months later, the NY Legislature passed the Libel Terrorism Protection Act effectively reversing the COA. Kyle Bisceglie, a partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP, discusses personal jurisdiction in foreign libel/defamation actions and forum shopping in light of Ehrenfeld & LTPA.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Bisceglie, Kyle C. Ehrenfeld v. Mahfouz, 9 N.Y.3d 501 (N.Y. 2007), and the New York Libel Terrorism Protection Act. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

New York Legislature Extends Limits of New Yorks Personal Jurisdiction Statute to Permit Declaratory Actions in New York of Enforcement of Foreign Libel Judgments

On December 20, 2007, the Court of Appeals ruled in a unanimous 6-0 decision that the New York long-arm statute did not confer personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant who had won a default judgment in England against a New York based author and dismissed the authors declaratory action. Ehrenfeld v. Mahfouz, 9 N.Y.3d 501 (N.Y. 2007). In so holding, Ehrenfeld reminded us that the New York long-arm statute does not reach the Constitutional limits of due process. Suing a New York resident abroad, serving her here and publishing the English opinion on the winning partys website accessible in New York were insufficient to confer jurisdiction in New York. By these acts, the defendant simply did not purposefully conduct business in New York, nor did he avail himself of the laws and privileges of New York.

The New York State Legislature effectively overturned the Ehrenfeld decision on April 30, 2008 when Governor David Paterson signed into law the Libel Terrorism Protection Act (the Act) which amended New Yorks personal jurisdiction and foreign judgment sections of the CPLR to overrule Ehrenfeld to the extent it prevented authors in New York from obtaining a declaration of unenforceability of foreign libel judgments. This statute was the result of a political and editorial uproar in the aftermath of Ehrenfeld, and, while clearly aimed at helping plaintiffs such as Ms.

Ehrenfeld, it has extended New York's personal jurisdiction in ways unintended.

Background of Ehrenfeld v. Mahfouz. Rachel Ehrenfeld wrote a book entitled Funding Evil: How Terrorism is Financed and How to Stop It. Published in 2003 by Bonus Books, her book claims that Khalid bin Mahfouz, a Saudi businessman and financier, has directly and indirectly financed various Islamist terror groups. The book was published in the United States, but one chapter was available on the Internet on the ABCNews.com website, and twenty-three copies were purchased in the United Kingdom via the Internet from third-party vendors. Mahfouz denied any claims that he funded terrorism in any way, and, in January 2004, demanded that Ehrenfeld cease and desist in various ways set forth in the Court of Appeals decision. Mahfouz then sued in England and, on four occasions in 2004 and 2005, served legal papers upon Ehrenfeld in New York.

Ehrenfeld did not appear in England for the same reasons that Mahfouz chose to sue her there: the high costs and plaintiff-friendly standards for libel suits in England. Because Ehrenfeld never defended herself, the English court entered default judgment against her in 2004, and awarded Mahfouz the then-equivalent of approximately $225,000 in damages and attorneys fees.

Before Mahfouz took any significant step to enforce his judgment, Ehrenfeld preemptively filed a declaratory action in the Southern District of New York claiming the decision was both incorrect and unenforceable under New York and federal law. Not surprisingly, Mahfouz moved to dismiss based on lack of personal and subject matter jurisdiction.

The district court held it lacked personal jurisdiction under New York's long-arm statute, CLPR 302(a)(1). This decision was appealed to the Second Circuit which then certified the personal jurisdiction question to the New York Court of Appeals.

Libel Tourism: United States Versus British Libel Laws. It is not uncommon to strike at U.S. publishers and authors from England because the libel standards vary. This overview will place Ehrenfeld in context.

The U.S. libel standard for a public figure is found in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (U.S. 1964). To recover damages for libel, a public figure must prove that the statement was made with actual malice that is, with knowledge that it was false or with reckless disregard of whether it was false or not. Id. at 279-280. A non-public official may still be deemed a public figure for purposes of the libel law if he or she commanded sufficient continuing public interest and had sufficient access to the means of counterargument to be able to expose through discussion the falsehood and fallacies of the defamatory statements. Curtis Pub. Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. at 155 (U.S. 1967).

Private figures have as a lower standard for proving libel: where a newspaper publishes speech of public concern, a private-figure plaintiff cannot recover damages without also showing that the statements at issue are false. Phila. Newspapers v. Hepps, 475 U.S. at 769 (1986) Private parties bear the burden of showing that the speech at issue is false before recovering damages for defamation from a media defendant because holding otherwise (therefore putting the burden on the media defendant) could only result in a deterrence of speech which the Constitution makes free. Id. at 777.

Until 2006, British defamation laws generally did not distinguish between public and private figures, and typically presumed that the contested statement is defamatory and required that the defendant prove the truth of the allegedly defamatory statement. Heather Maly, Note and Comment, Publish at Your Own Risk or Don't Publish at All: Forum Shopping Trends in Libel Litigation Leave the First Amendment Un-Guaranteed, 14 J.L. & Pol'y at 898-99 (2006). A statement is considered defamatory if it is likely to injure the reputation of an individual in the eyes of reasonable members of the public. Id. at 899.

This burden on the defendant can make British libel suits extremely costly to defend. See Sarah Lyall, Where Suing for Libel is a National Specialty, NY Times, July 22, 2000, at B9 (an author of a book about the denial of the Holocaust spent $3 million defending a British libel suit brought by a Holocaust denier portrayed in the book). While the Reynolds

v. Times Newspapers Ltd., [2001] 2 AC 127, case held that journalists may have a defense against libel charges when the media has a legitimate duty to report matters of public interest, this case did not change British libel law in practice courts still imposed a high standard upon defendants. See Catherine Spratt, A new day in the U.K.: Britains highest court has handed down a watershed ruling that allows the media to better defend responsible journalism against libel claims, News Media & The Law, Winter 2007, <http://www.rcfp.org/news/mag/31-1/lib-anewdayi.html>.

Not surprisingly, such standards have made British courts a destination for libel lawsuits. Doreen Carvajal, Britain, a Destination for Libel Tourism, Inth Herald Tribune, Jan. 20, 2008. This arises not only from plaintiff-friendly standards but also because British courts exert jurisdiction even if there are very tenuous ties between the conflict and the United Kingdom. Id. An Icelandic investment bank successfully brought suit against a Danish tabloid for libel in the UK because there was an English translation on a Danish website that gets some minimal traffic in the UK. Id. In Ehrenfeld, Mahfouz could maintain suit against Ehrenfeld in the UK because twenty-three copies of the book were purchased in the UK via the Internet and one chapter of the book was accessible in the UK on the ABCNews.com website. Ehrenfeld, 9 N.Y.3d at 504. These contacts that the British court used to assert personal jurisdiction are comparable to or less palpable than the contacts that Mahfouz had with New York State (which included suing a New York resident in British court and publishing the British courts decision on his website that was accessible in New York). The fact that the Court of Appeals held that it did not have personal jurisdiction over Mahfouz shows that the New York standard for personal jurisdiction in libel cases is more limited than the British standard.

A better known example of libel tourism involves film director Roman Polanskis 2005 libel suit victory in British court against American magazine Vanity Fair for its description of events that occurred after Polanskis wife died in 1969. Sarah Lyall, Polanski Wins Vanity Fair Libel Suit, N.Y. Times, July 23, 2005. Although the events described were largely accurate, Vanity Fair was ordered to pay $87,700 in damages and a substantial portion of Polanski's legal costs because some of the dates and chronology were inaccurate. Further, the court reached this result without Polanski ever stepping foot into the UK during the duration of the trial. Why? Because Polanski was a fugitive from justice in the United States and may face arrest and extradition in the UK, the British court permitted his testimony from France via live video link. Polanski had no real contact with the UK and the only real contact that this libel suit had with the UK was the magazines limited circulation there. As a result, Polanski prevailed in a suit about damage to his character from inaccurate dates when he can't be here [in the UK] because he slept with a 13-year-old-girl and has been a fugitive from justice for more than a quarter of a century. Id. Apparently, the UK also does not recognize that some people should be libel proof.

Serious journalism may have finally caught a break because of the House of Lordss decision in Jameel v. Wall Street Journal Europe Sprl [2006] UKHL 44. In this case, which also involved allegations of Saudi entities financing terrorism, the court gave journalists the right to publish allegations about public figures, so long as the reporting is responsible and in the public interest. See Sarah Lyall, High Court in Britain Loosens Strict Libel Law, NY Times, Oct. 12, 2006. The court agreed it would be impossible for the newspaper to prove the truth of the allegations because they were based upon secretive surveillance by Saudi authorities. As a result of this decision, journalists have a public interest defense to libel claims and do not always bear the burden of proving accuracy. This moves British libel law closer to American libel law for serious journalism, but the defense will not be available to celebrity magazines, which are often the subject of libel suits for vapid gossip. See Catherine Spratt, A New Day in the U.K. Further, Jameel will not curtail British courts from asserting jurisdiction over every libel claim that the Worldwide Web can carry.

Media and Legislative Response to Ehrenfeld. Numerous American publishers and media companies that supported Ehrenfeld in her lawsuit and provided amicus curiae briefs were upset by the result of her case. Jim Milliot, Appeals Court Rejects Ehrenfelds Bid to Block Libel Tourism, PublishersWeekly, Dec. 20, 2007, available at <http://www.publishersweekly.com/article/CA6514697.html>. Ehrenfeld claimed that the English judgment deterred publishers from accepting her work on financing of terrorism in order to avoid foreign libel suits. Ehrenfeld, 9 N.Y.3d at 510-11. Ehrenfeld's attorney, Daniel Kornstein, has stated publicly that having the judgment hanging over her head has affected Ehrenfelds research and writing. Joseph Goldstein, N.Y. Appeals Court Opens Door to 'Libel Tourism', The Sun, Dec. 21, 2007. Ehrenfeld herself described Mahfouzs award against her as the Damocles sword effect. He's holding it above my head to intimidate me and others. James Oliphant, Saudi wields British law against U.S. author: Billionaire leverages harsher libel rules to suppress unflattering book, Chicago Tribune, Mar. 17, 2008.

The New York State Legislature responded very quickly to the Ehrenfeld decision. Ehrenfeld was decided on December 20, 2007, and in January 2008, Assemblyman Rory I. Lancman and Senator Dean Skelos introduced the Libel Terrorism Protection Act (the Act) that would effectively overrule Ehrenfeld. After some debate in the NY Legislature (and some constitutional concerns which will be discussed below), the Act was signed into law by Governor Paterson on April 30, 2008. The new law amends the CPLR in the following ways:

1. By prohibiting enforcement of overseas libel judgments in New York unless the court determines that the overseas law satisfies speech and press protections guaranteed by the New York and United States Constitutions; and

2. By permitting New York courts to exercise long-arm jurisdiction over persons outside of New York who obtain a judgment in a defamation proceeding outside the United States against a person who is a New York resident, has assets here and/or involving a New York publication.

See bill summary, <http://assembly.state.ny.us/leg/?bn=A9652>.

The Act adds subdivision 2(b)(8) to CPLR 5304, adding no recognition of foreign country judgment if:

the cause of action resulted in a defamation judgment obtained in a jurisdiction outside the United States, unless the court before which the matter is brought sitting in this state first determines that the defamation law applied in the foreign courts adjudication provided at least as much protection for freedom of speech and press in that case as would be provided by both the United States and New York Constitutions.

The new law also adds section (d) to CPLR 302 (Personal jurisdiction by acts of non-domiciliaries):

(d) Foreign Defamation Judgment. The Courts of this State shall have personal jurisdiction over any person who obtains a judgment in a defamation proceeding outside the United States against any person who is a resident of New York or is a person or entity amenable to jurisdiction in New York who has assets in New York or may have to take actions in New York to comply with the judgment, for the purposes of rendering declaratory relief with respect to that persons liability for the judgment, and/or for the purpose of determining whether said judgment should be deemed non-recognizable pursuant to section Fifty-Three Hundred Four of this Chapter, to the fullest extent permitted by the United States Constitution, provided:

1. The publication at issue was published in New York, and

2. That resident or person amenable to jurisdiction in New York (i) has assets in New York which might be used to satisfy the foreign defamation judgment, or (ii) may have to take actions in New York to comply with the foreign defamation judgment. The provisions of this subdivision shall apply to persons who obtained judgments in defamation proceeding outside the United States prior to and/or after the effective date of this subdivision.

That the Act overruling the Ehrenfeld holding passed so quickly shows the widespread dissatisfaction with the decision. Much of the justification behind the bill was to protect writers who expose terrorist networks and financiers. See http://www.ny.gov/governor/press/press_0501082.html. In other words, much of the enthusiasm for the Act had to do with combating the financing of terrorism. Many American writers and organizations previously have been sued for libel in England without any such connection to exposing terrorism. Fortunately for those like them, despite the intentions and title of the Act, the Act is broad enough to protect all writers, publishers, and media outlets from the enforcement of British defamation or libel suits in New York.

The public response to Ehrenfeld and libel tourism doesnt end there. On May 22, 2008, Rep. Cohen (D-TN) introduced a bill to Congress that would have the same effect as the New York legislation, except it would apply to federal courts across the country. See <http://cohen.house.gov/index.php?option=content&task=view&id=542>. Presumably, this would give every federal court in the country the personal jurisdiction to declare a foreign libel judgment against an American defendant unenforceable (if the speech protection in the foreign country are not as great as those under the First Amendment), and would preclude every federal court from enforcing such a judgment.

The New York law (and pending federal law) relieves writers of the negative effect of Ehrenfeld, that is, the unresolved threat of a foreign lawsuit and, because the Act is retroactive, helps Ehrenfeld achieve her established goal when she brought her suit in the Southern District.

As discussed below, it is this authors belief that this Act was both unnecessary and proceeds on questionable constitutional grounds.

Enforcement of Foreign Libel Judgments in New York Courts. Even if the New York legislature had not passed the Libel Terrorism Protection Act, Mahfouz would not be able to collect his British libel award in New York. Generally, the non-enforcement of a foreign judgment requires more than a difference in law, procedure, or policy. Jeremy Maltby, Note, Juggling Comity and Self-Government: The Enforcement of Foreign Libel Judgments in U.S. Courts, 94 Colum. L. Rev. at 1990 (1994). By defaulting in a foreign lawsuit, a defendant ensures that the judgment will be entered in against [her], and assumes the risk that an irrevocable mistake of law or fact may underlie that judgment. Ackermann v. Levine, 788 F.2d at 842 (2d Cir. 1986). When there is a foreign default judgment, the New York courts accept the finding of the foreign court, but still must consider whether the foreign law applied is repugnant to the public policy of New York. Sarl Louis Feraud Intl v. Viewfinder, Inc., 489 F.3d at 479 (2d Cir. 2007). A judgment is unenforceable as against public policy to the extent that it is repugnant to fundamental notions of what is decent and just in the state where enforcement is sought. Ackermann v. Levine, 788 F.2d at 941 (2d Cir. 1986) (internal citation omitted). CPLR 5304(b)(4) reflects this principle.

The non-recognition of a foreign judgment may be considered constitutionally mandatory when the judgment conflicts with the principles of the U.S. Constitution. WIP Wohnungsbaugesellschaft Prenzlauer Berg mbH v. Sutton, 2007 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 6381, at * 6 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2007). State and federal courts in New York have been clear that foreign libel awards cannot be enforced in New York unless the foreign courts gave the defendant the same protections guaranteed by the First Amendment. See Ajitabh Bachchan v. India Abroad Publication, Inc., 154 Misc. 2d 228 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1992). Foreign lawsuits against the press must meet the safeguards for the press which have been enunciated by the courts of this country. Id. at 231. Because British libel law places no burden on the plaintiff to prove the falsity of the statement, enforcement would jeopardize the guarantees of the First Amendment, and the judgment is unenforceable in New York. Id. at 234-35. Because British libel laws offer significantly less protection than the protection offered under the First Amendment of the United States Constitution, courts in New York would almost certainly find that the default libel judgment against Ehrenfeld was repugnant to public policy and, therefore, should not be recognized. Admittedly, the Jameel decision may ultimately affect the willingness of U.S. courts to enforce British libel judgments.

Additionally, Ehrenfeld would be unenforceable because the UKs personal jurisdiction standards vary from those of the U.S. Constitution. CPLR 5304(a)(2) states that a foreign country judgment is not conclusive if: . . . the foreign court did not have personal jurisdiction over the defendant. It is likely that the jurisdictional analysis used by British courts to assert personal jurisdiction over Ehrenfeld would not meet our due process requirements. There is no evidence that Ehrenfeld wrote her book to target Mahfouz. Furthermore, the facts that twenty-three copies of her book were purchased in England over the Internet from a third-party vendor and that one chapter of her book was available on the Internet were probably not enough for an American court to assert jurisdiction because they do not meet the due process requirements of the U.S. Constitution. See International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945); Zippo Manufacturing Co. v. Zippo Dot Com, Inc., 952 F.Supp. 1119 (E.D. Pa. 1997).

Constitutionality of the Libel Terrorism Protection Act. Despite homage to the bounds of the fullest extent of the U.S. Constitution, the Act confers jurisdiction upon New York Courts in circumstances that exceed the due process limits of the U.S. Constitution. While the bill passed the N.Y. Senate unanimously, the Assembly noted that an advisory committee to the state court administrator opposed the bill because of constitutional concerns. James Oliphant, Saudi wields British law against U.S. author.

Unlike New York, the Supreme Court of the United States does not give any special procedural protection to defendants in libel and defamation actions. See, e.g., Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. at 790 (1984). In Calder, the Court stated that the potential chill on protected First Amendment activity stemming from libel and defamations is already taken into account in the constitutional limitation on the substantive laws governing such suits. To reintroduce those concerns at the jurisdictional stage would be a form of double counting. Id. (internal citations omitted). Therefore, in determining the constitutionality of the Act, the fact that its goal is to protect First Amendment activity cannot be taken into account at all.

In Calder, the Supreme Court found jurisdiction over the defendants because their allegedly libelous activity was aimed at the forum state, and they knew that the brunt of that injury would be felt by the plaintiffs in the forum state, even though the conduct (publishing the article) occurred in another state. Id. at 789-90. To claim personal jurisdiction under Calder, the effects or actual injury must occur in the forum state. In the case of foreign libel suits against New Yorkers, the plaintiff is targeting a New Yorker. However, because the Act prohibits the enforcement of foreign libel suits, it precludes the bulk of what should constitute the actual (economic) injury. Without injury to New Yorkers (as the law precludes it), how can New York courts assert personal jurisdiction consistent with Calder? Therefore, the portion of the Act giving New York Courts personal jurisdiction in cases where New Yorkers are subject to foreign libel judgments lacks an element Calder requires under the Due Process Clause. An exception may exist in those cases where the plaintiff can establish injury by an unenforceable foreign award (as Ehrenfeld attempted to do).

Additionally, the provisos of the Act seem to provide personal jurisdiction based on the plaintiffs own actions rather than the defendants independent activities, and, thereby, runs afoul of long standing Court of Appeals precedent. See Haar v. Armendaris Corp., 31 N.Y.2d 1040 (1973); Parker-Bernet Galleries, Inc. v. Franklyn, 26 NY2d 13 (1970).

Finally, if the Act prohibits the enforcement of certain foreign libel judgments, why does an author need a declaratory judgment as well?

Significance of Ehrenfeld in Light of the Libel Terrorism Protection Act. The Libel Terrorism Protection Act overturned the result of Ehrenfeld, but left certain statements contained in Ehrenfeld intact as dicta. In particular, Ehrenfeld helps define the extent of New Yorks long-arm statute under CPLR 302(a)(1). The Act added an exception to the New York long-arm statute for the occurrence of foreign libel judgments only. *Ehrenfeld*s analysis and description of New Yorks long-arm statute remain valid.

The decision affirms that CPLR 302(a)(1) is not co-extensive with constitutional limits. Ehrenfeld distinguishes Yahoo! v. La Ligue Contre Le Racisme et L'Antisemitisme, 433 F.3d 1199 (9th Cir. 2006) (en banc), in which the Ninth Circuit asserted personal jurisdiction in a situation with facts very similar to that in Ehrenfeld. Yahoo! states that the Ninth Circuit interprets the effects test from Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783 (1984), to impose three requirements for personal jurisdiction: the defendant allegedly [must] have (1) committed an intentional act, (2) expressly aimed at the forum state, (3) causing harm that the defendant knows is likely to be suffered in the forum state. Ehrenfeld states that this test is broader than that in CPLR 302(a)(1) and following the Ninth Circuits test would usurp the legislative function. The fact that New York does not follow the Ninth Circuits effects test is still good law, even with the passage of the Act. Practically speaking, the new CPLR 302(a)(5) effectively adopts the Ninth Circuits holding in Yahoo! for libel actions only.

Ehrenfeld reiterates holdings from a number of earlier cases that the overriding criterion necessary to establish a transaction of business is some act by which the defendant purposefully avails itself of the privilege of conducting activities within New York. Id. at 508 (emphasis added). Personal jurisdiction is only proper when a defendant purposefully engages in activity in New York, and invokes the benefits and protections of New York law. Id. As Mahfouz's only relevant contacts to New York were to further his assertions under the laws of England, the court could not assert jurisdiction. Id. at 509. The court said that Mahfouz's prior acts, including his prior ownership of New York real estate and his previous indictment by a New York grand jury, were not relevant because the judgment in question has nothing to do with these acts. Id. at n. 6. Therefore, in cases other than foreign libel suits, these sorts of contacts with New York are insufficient to confer personal jurisdiction on New York courts.

Beyond Ehrenfeld. The Ehrenfeld decision is still valid outside of defamation cases. The Libel Terrorism Protection Act effectively overrules only that part of Ehrenfeld that denied Ehrenfeld's ability to obtain a declaration of rights, and codifies what was likely preexisting New York law on enforcement of foreign judgments. However, this Act likely unintentionally challenges the long-standing principle under New York law that the plaintiffs' own actions cannot be used as a basis for personal jurisdiction over a defendant. More fundamentally, because the Act immunizes New York authors and others from liability, establishing injury in New York will require carefully crafted case theory. Without that injury, application of the Act to a foreign defendant likely exceeds the Due Process limits of Calder and progeny.

As to the problem of libel tourism, American writers, publishers, and media companies are still susceptible to foreign libel suit and there is nothing the Court of Appeals, New York legislature or Congress can do about the law in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. New York has certainly done as much as its territorial limits permit for writers and New York based publishers.

Because so much is accessible to read or purchase over the Internet, British courts can assert jurisdiction over a wide range of writing, including most contemporary published books that can be purchased easily over the Internet and shipped to the UK. Until British laws change, litigants from around the world are going to file libel and defamation suits in the UK against American writers and media organizations. While they may have piece of mind in New York, they still must carefully avoid exposure to the UK forum.

For a detailed analysis of American versus British libel laws and a more extensive discussion of libel tourism, see Heather Maly, Note and Comment, Publish at your own Risk or Dont Publish at All: Forum Shopping Trends in Libel Litigation Leave the First Amendment Un-Guaranteed, 14 J.L. & Pol'y 883 (2006); Marin Roger Scordato, The International Legal Environment for Serious Political Reporting Has Fundamentally Changed: Understanding the Revolutionary New Era of English Defamation Law, 40 Conn. L. Rev. 165 (2007); Raymond W. Beauchamp, Note, Englands Chilling Forecast: The Case for Granting Declaratory Relief to Prevent English Defamation Action from Chilling American Speech, 74 Fordham L. Rev. 3073 (2006).

For a detailed analysis of the enforcement of foreign libel judgments in the United States, see Jeremy Maltby, Note, Juggling Comity and Self-Government: The Enforcement of Foreign Libel Judgments in U.S. Courts, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1978 (1994); Melinda Luthin, U.S. Enforcement of Foreign Money Judgments and the Need for Reform, 14 U.C. Davis J. Intl L. & Poly 111 (2007); Eric P. Enson, Comment, A Roadblock on the Detour Around the First Amendment: Is the Enforcement of English Libel Judgments in the United States Unconstitutional?, 21 Loy. L.A. Intl & Comp. L. Rev. (1999); 2-27 Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 27.27; 1-3 Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 3.06.

For a general overview of the exercise of long-arm jurisdiction under CPLR 302(a)(1), see 2-3 New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 302; 1-3 Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 3.05; 1-2 LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 2.03; and 1-2 LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 2.05.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-451-2207 or by email at Kbisceglie@olshanlaw.com.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

109 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Loman v. Freeman, 2008 Ill Lexis 317 (April 17, 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2490

Susan M. Brazas on Loman v. Freeman, 2008 Ill Lexis 317 (April 17, 2008), rehearing denied, 2008 Ill Lexis 338 (May 27, 2008).

By Susan M. Brazas

July 7, 2008

SUMMARY: The Race to the Courthouse: But Where? The Illinois Supreme Court considered the question of which forum is appropriate for a veterinary malpractice claim when the defendant is a state university employee.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Illinois Supreme Court Examines Court of Claims vs. Circuit Court as Forum for Action Against State University Employees

In Loman v. Freeman the Supreme Court of Illinois gave new hope to plaintiffs attorneys trying to avoid confinement to the Court of Claims, thought by many to be a black hole and not plaintiff-friendly. Traditionally, claims against the State of Illinois must be litigated in the Illinois Court of Claims. Among the significant differences that distinguish the Court of Claims is that jury trials are not available there. Kiersch v. Ogena, 230 Ill. App. 3d at 63-64 (1992).

In Loman the owners of a race horse sued a professor of equine surgery, who was a state university faculty member, for negligence after the allegedly unauthorized surgery he performed on their horse made the horse lame and unable to race. The Supreme Court of Illinois rejected the professors contention that the Court of Claims had exclusive jurisdiction over the claim. The Court held that because the duty of care breached by the professor arose from his status as veterinarian, not from his status as a state employee, and because he was not performing a governmental function when he operated on the horse, the circuit court was the proper venue. Additionally, a decision against the defendant would not control the actions of the state, or subject the state to liability.

In finding that the alleged acts of negligence were independent of the equine professor's role as a state employee and, therefore, subjected him to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, the majority made a distinction between the duties arising from the professor's state employment and the common law duty of a veterinarian which he was alleged to have breached. Although the actions of state employees within the scope of employment are afforded immunity, actions that do not arise solely from state employment are not. The professor was not performing a uniquely government function.

The second aspect of the court's inquiry, in considering whether the suit's proper venue was the Court of Claims, was whether a judgment against the defendant employee would operate to control the actions of the state or subject it to liability. The Loman court concluded that it would not. In the future, this will be an important point for counsel to address. Depending on the factual circumstances, counsel could argue that the imposition of liability would (or would not) have such an impact that state policies and procedure changes would follow, therefore controlling (or not controlling) the actions of the state.

Other Professional Liability Cases. The Illinois courts have, in several decisions, held that the doctrine of sovereign immunity does not shield physicians from liability for their conduct. The source of duty rule was first applied to physicians in the case of Jenkins v. Lee, 785 N.E.2d at 921, 337 Ill. App. 3d 403 (1st Dist. 2003). Since then, nearly all of the appellate court cases in which the question of sovereign immunity is raised in this context hold that it does not shield the professional from liability.

Practical Implications for State Employees. State employees who practice in a profession such as law, medicine, or veterinary medicine, should explore whether their state employer provides liability insurance adequate to cover them for a judgment rendered in a circuit court action. Moreover, the question will likely be raised of whether such coverage applies if the basis for jurisdiction in the circuit court is that the actions for which liability was imposed were outside the scope of the employee's duties.

Impact on Pleadings. The Loman opinion makes such a fine distinction between scope of employment and scope of duty that plaintiff's attorneys should be cautious to use language to place the action within the latter category in an effort to avoid the Court of Claims. Averments that the veterinarian or other professional was an employee of the state should be avoided. However, if the state (in the form of any of its units, agencies, or entities, such as a state university) is the employer, then the plaintiff must be careful to assert a duty apart from that employment. Otherwise, the court would undoubtedly grant a motion to dismiss or transfer the action to the Court of Claims.

The attorney should discuss with the client whether to proceed in two actions simultaneously: one against the individual (professor, veterinarian, physician, etc.) in the circuit court, and one against the state entity in the Court of Claims. Even though the latter is generally disfavored by plaintiff's attorneys, nonetheless the client should be informed of the right to proceed in that venue.

Of note, too, in the Loman opinion is the statement that because the defendant was a professor of equine surgery, he was not required to be a licensed veterinarian. The defendant suggested that it was important that while the surgeries in question were being performed, the defendant professor was teaching and students were present. Defense counsel explained that such allegations had not been pleaded because the motion to dismiss served as his responsive pleading.

One way for a party to include such important facts within the pleadings would be, for example, to raise an affirmative defense, or even an answer, filed simultaneously with a motion to dismiss. In this way the court can consider all such factors when deciding whether indeed the breach occurred solely as a result of the individual's state employment. Counsel should be cautioned, however, to follow the requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure that certain defenses (such as forum non conveniens and lack of jurisdiction) be raised by the time of the first responsive pleading.

Implications for Charging Allegations. The Loman court relied heavily on the case of Currie v. Lao, 148 Ill. 2d 151 (1992), citing to it almost exclusively in its analysis. In that case, a state police officer collided with another driver. Although the officer had been in pursuit of a suspect at the time, the collision occurred when the officer was traveling the wrong way on a one-way street. The Currie court held that the duty breached was the officer's duty as a licensed driver, rather than as a police officer, and thus the officer was not entitled to immunity.

The Loman court noted that the strongest parallel to the Currie case was that the professor performed a surgery which was not authorized by the horse's owner, and, therefore, was like the Currie officer who had driven down a one-way street the wrong way, then collided with the plaintiff. The Loman court explained, when [the professor] performed a procedure that the owners of the animal had forbidden, his conduct was like that of Officer Lao, who was acting outside his authority as a state trooper when he caused an accident.

This language should guide attorneys in the preparation of their pleadings. They should frame the charging allegations (or responses thereto) so as to characterize the conduct as outside (or within) the authority of the state employee's position.

Statute of Limitations Concerns. The fact that sovereign immunity so rarely shields a state's employee from liability should not lull plaintiff's attorneys into a false sense of security as to the statute of limitations. The Local Governmental and Governmental Employees Tort Immunity Act, found at 745 ILCS 10/1-101, contains a one-year statute of limitations for filing an action against a state or local government employee. As was noted by the court in Wheaton v. Suwana, 355 Ill. App. 3d 506, 823 N.E.2d 993 (5th Dist. 2005), this one-year period will apply even if the employee is held not to be protected by immunity.

Impact on Liability of Other Professionals. Attorneys should explore whether the principles of the Loman case would extend to other professional teaching scenarios, such as legal aid clinics affiliated with state law schools, health clinics at state universities, and even practicums, internships, and externships affiliated with public high schools, or state colleges and universities. Although the Loman opinion made no suggestion as to such extension, counsel will be well advised to tailor their pleadings toward or away from, as applicable the source of duty factor. The move from a police officers duty as a licensed driver (in Currie) to a professionals duty to comport with the requirements of their professional judgment (in Jinkins and beyond) may signal the willingness of courts to widen the scope of civil liability of state employees.

For additional discussion of circuit court jurisdiction and immunity of state employees, see Illinois Civil Procedure § 2.05 Alternatives to Circuit Court Adjudication; Illinois Tort Law § 22.08 Tort Immunities; Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts Ch. 3, Part I State Government Tort Liability; LexisNexis(R) Forms: FORM 1468-4.28 Caption and Designation of Parties in Complaint at Law Against Government Entity and Officer Sued Individually; LexisNexis(R) Forms: FORM 1468-71.22 Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Personal Jurisdiction-Defendant Immune.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin, at the trial and appellate level. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

110 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Rabiej on the Uniform Rules Relating to the Discovery of ESI

2008 Emerging Issues 2450

Rabiej on the Uniform Rules Relating to the Discovery of ESI

By John K. Rabiej

July 2, 2008

SUMMARY: In August 2007, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State laws approved and recommended for adoption by all states the "Uniform Rules Relating to the Discovery of Electronically Stored Information (ESI)." John K. Rabiej, Chief of the Rules Committee Support Office, identifies the differences with the federal rules, including a emphasis in the Uniform Rules on "cost sharing" as a means to facilitate the production of ESI.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: At its annual conference held on July 27-August 3, 2007, the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws approved and recommended for enactment in all states the Uniform Rules Relating to the Discovery of Electronically Stored Information (ESI) (Uniform Rules) (see http://www.law.upenn.edu/bll/archives/ulc/udoera/2007_final.htm). The Uniform Rules were approved by the American Bar Association's House of Delegates in February 2008.

The Uniform Rules are based on the electronic-discovery amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that took effect on December 1, 2006. They are intended to mirror the spirit and direction of the federal rule amendments and are different only where necessary, to accommodate the varying state procedures.

To a large extent, the Uniform Rules achieve their stated mission and accurately reflect the substance of the electronic-discovery federal rules. But there are some subtle differences between the two, primarily differences in degree, including a greater emphasis in the Uniform Rules on: (1) early direct judicial intervention to address ESI discovery issues; and (2) cost sharing as a means to facilitate the production of ESI. Unlike the federal rules, the Uniform Rules also do not expressly require the parties to meet and confer to resolve ESI issues that arise at various stages of litigation. The difference is an example of the preference of the Uniform Rules for early judicial intervention. The following discussion identifies the differences between the two in the order presented in the Uniform Rules.

Rule 1. Definitions. The definition provision in Rule 1 has no counterpart in the federal rules. None of the definitions of the four terms in Rule 1 (discovery, electronic, electronically stored information, and person) is inconsistent with the federal rules. The Civil Rules Committee considered, but ultimately declined, to define ESI in the federal rules, though a description of ESI is provided in the Committee Notes. The Committee recognized that technology was rapidly changing how information was transmitted, stored, and retrieved. Exotic technologies based, for example, on biologic principles, were being explored that some day may be used to store ESI. The Committee's goal was to ensure that the federal rules were flexible enough to encompass future changes and developments. It believed that defining ESI might unnecessarily constrain its meaning in the future (see Committee Note to Rule 34(a) (2006) (rapidity of technological change, counsel against a limiting or precise definition of ESI)). The drafters of the Uniform Rules were also sensitive to the inherent limitations of a definition, but they determined that direct guidance on basic terms was appropriate. Their definition of ESI is broad and is intended to define ESI to encompass future technological changes and developments, a policy consistent with the position of the federal rules (Note to Uniform Rule 1 (2007)).

Under Rule 1, ESI is defined to mean information that is stored in an electronic medium and is retrievable in perceivable form. The Committee Note to the federal rules describes ESI as information that is fixed in a tangible form and ... information that is stored in a medium from which it can be retrieved and examined (Committee Note to Rule 34(a) (2006)). The definition in Rule 1 focuses on ESI as matter that is retrievable in perceivable form. The federal rules seem to focus more on the definite, fixed nature of ESI. But it is difficult to imagine any real-life scenario in which the different articulations of ESI would make any difference. The meaning of ESI is very broad under both Rule 1 and the federal rules. There is no appreciable difference between the two now, and that status will likely continue for the foreseeable future.

Rule 2. Supplemental Rules of Discovery. There is no counterpart to Rule 2 in the federal rules. Rule 2 serves as a necessary bridge, facilitating incorporation of the Uniform Rules into state procedural rules.

Rule 3. Conference, Plan, and Report to Court. Rule 3 requires parties to meet and confer to discuss ESI and to prepare a plan addressing any ESI discovery issues. It lists topics that parties must discuss at the discovery-planning conference if ESI is likely to be sought. The rule is similar, though not identical, to its counterpart in the federal rules (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f); see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.20[1]). For example, the provisions of Rule 3 apply to conferences dealing only with ESI discovery issues, while the federal rules apply to conferences dealing with any discovery issue (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f)(2)). There are some other noteworthy differences between the two.

Though both Rule 3 and the federal rules recognize that holding a discovery-planning conference may not be appropriate in every case, they adopt different approaches to determine which cases do not require a conference. Under Rule 3, the parties decide which cases a conference should be held. The presumption under the rule is that the parties will hold a discovery-planning conference. It appears, however, that the conference must be held unless the parties unanimously agree not to hold it. On the other hand, the federal rules require the parties to hold a conference in all cases with the exception of nine enumerated categories of cases, including cases initiated pro se without the assistance of an attorney (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f)(1)). Thus, unlike Rule 3, the parties cannot opt out and decline to hold a conference in a non-exempted case under the federal rules.

Rule 3(a) sets a relatively short deadline to hold the ESI discovery-planning conference, no later than 21 days after each responding party has appeared in the case. The comment to the rule recognizes that parties may be joined after other parties have met and conferred. Parties added later to the litigation are encouraged to adopt the earlier discovery plan or incorporate the plan into their own plans and reports. The federal rules encourage parties to meet as soon as practicable and set an outside deadline that provides slightly more time to schedule and hold the discovery-planning conference. The conference must be held no later than 21 days before a scheduling conference is to be held or a scheduling order is due (earlier of 120 days after any defendant has been served with a complaint or 90 days after any defendant has appeared). The different time deadlines adopted by the Uniform Rules and the federal rules reflect different approaches that are each designed to encourage prompt discovery conferences while providing for parties added later in the litigation.

Among the topics to be considered at the discovery-planning conference, Rule 3(a)(6) requires parties to discuss whether allocation among the parties of the expense of production [of ESI] is appropriate (Uniform Rule 3(a)(6)). This is the first of three separate references in the Uniform Rules to cost sharing as a means of facilitating discovery and production of ESI. Cost sharing has many champions, who view this option as a fair way to handle particularly close judgment calls in cases when the equity interests between the requesting party and producing party are not at all clear. The federal rules do not prohibit cost sharing; in fact, courts have ordered cost sharing in traditional discovery, and are increasingly ordering it in ESI cases (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.36). The prominence of the cost-sharing recommendation in the Uniform Rules as an appropriate means to facilitate discovery lies in contrast to the federal rules, which is deliberately silent and omits a specific reference to cost sharing in the text of the rules, referring explicitly to it only once in the Committee Notes (see Committee Note to Rule 26(b)(2) (2006)).

Cost sharing as an option in discovery proved to be a lightning rod for criticism in earlier discovery proposals considered by the Civil Rules Committee. Critics were concerned that courts would view any reference to cost sharing in the federal rules as an expression of official approval. They contended that though cost sharing might make sense when parties were financially evenly matched, it would provide an unfair advantage to parties with financial resources greater than their opponent's. Moreover, the critics were concerned about the potential slippery slope effect. Parties without financial resources might be deterred from filing legitimate claims or prematurely might agree to inadequate settlement offers if compelled to share discovery costs. After careful and long deliberations, the Committee decided not to refer directly to cost sharing in the text of the federal rules. The federal rules expressly mention cost sharing only as a factor to be considered in evaluating whether good cause has been shown to compel a party to produce inaccessible ESI (see Committee Note to Rule 26(b)(2) (2006)).

The note to Rule 3 makes clear that parties are not required to hold a face-to-face discovery-planning conference. Video teleconference or conference calls are adequate. The same policy applies in the federal courts, though the federal rules expressly authorize a court to require that the parties hold a face-to-face conference (Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f)(2)).

Rule 4. Order Governing Discovery. Rule 4 encourages a court to issue an order governing ESI, which is similar in nature to a scheduling order or an order following a pretrial conference issued under the federal rules (see Fed. R. Civ. 16(b) and (c)). A court, under either the Uniform Rules or the federal rules, with one exception, has discretion to determine the order's contents (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b)(3)(A) (scheduling order must limit the time to ... complete discovery)).

Rule 4 enumerates eight specific categories relating to ESI issues and a ninth catch-all category that a court should consider in its order. Each of these categories has a counterpart in the federal rules, with one exception (federal rules do not refer to cost sharing). The federal rule counterparts are set forth as topics that parties must consider during their discovery-planning conference. The parties must state their views on these topics in a discovery plan, which is presented to the court for its consideration when preparing its mandatory scheduling order (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f)(3) listing the topics and Fed. R. Civ. P. 16 (b)(3) describing contents of the court order; see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.24 and § 37A.25).

Rule 4(b)(6) and (7) encourage a court to address in an order the method for asserting or preserving claims of privilege or of the protection of the information as trial-preparation material after production for both parties and nonparties. The federal rules provision is more general, authorizing a court to include [in an order] any agreement the parties reach for asserting claims of privilege or of protection as trial-preparation materials after information is produced (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b)(3)(B)(iv)). The federal rules do not focus on the method for asserting a privilege or protection because a uniform method is prescribed in another part of the rules (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(5)). Nor do the federal rules focus on such agreements relating to a person not a party to the proceeding, which is explicitly addressed in Rule 4.

Rule 4(b)(8) contains the second reference to cost sharing. The rule encourages a court to address the allocation of the expense of production of both accessible and inaccessible ESI in its order. As discussed above, the federal rules do not expressly provide for cost sharing and mention it as an option only when evaluating good cause for producing inaccessible ESI. Highlighting this option is not without controversy. Some courts, including Zubulake, expressly limit cost sharing to instances in which the source of the ESI is determined to be inaccessible (see Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 216 F.R.D. 280, 284 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (It is worth emphasizing again that cost-shifting is potentially appropriate only when inaccessible data is sought.)). In these courts, sharing the cost of producing accessible ESI typically would be inappropriate. Recognizing the lack of consensus among the courts, the federal rules left the cost-sharing issue to case law development. Rule 4 takes a more definitive position on the issue, strongly implying that cost sharing is available for the production of both accessible and inaccessible ESI in appropriate cases (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.36[3], supporting position that cost sharing may be appropriate when producing accessible ESI under certain circumstances).

Rule 5. Limitation on Sanctions. Rule 5 provides a safe harbor for the destruction of ESI as a result of the good faith operation of an electronic information system. The provision is virtually identical to its federal counterpart (see Fed. R. Civ. R. 37(e); see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.57). Unlike the Committee Note to Rule 37(e), however, the Note to Rule 5 does not highlight the limitation on the protection provided by the safe harbor. The Committee Note makes clear that the protection, which applies in both the federal rules and the Uniform Rules, governs only sanctions under these rules and does not affect other sources of authority to impose sanctions or rules of professional responsibility (see Committee Note to Rule 37(e) (2006)).

Rule 6. Request for Production. Rule 6 sets out procedures governing the form of production of ESI. The text of the rule is similar to its federal rule counterpart (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 34(b)(2)(D) and (E); see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.42). Neither Rule 6 nor its Note, however, provides specific guidance to a party who is not satisfied with the form of ESI selected by the producing party. In contrast, the Committee Note to federal Rule 34 states that if the requesting party objects to the selected form of ESI identified in the written response to the production request, the parties must meet and confer to resolve the matter before raising the issue with the court (see Committee Note to Rule 34(b) (2006)). The meet and confer requirement is viewed as an important tool to limit the number of occasions a federal court must intervene to settle a discovery dispute. The absence of a similar meet-and-confer requirement in Rule 6 may reflect a policy preference in the Uniform Rules for early judicial intervention in discovery.

Rule 7. Form of Production. Rule 7 provides procedures governing the form of production of ESI. The provision is nearly identical to the federal rules counterpart (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 34(b)(2); see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.43).

In some cases, the volume of relevant ESI may be enormous and a party may store different types of ESI in different mediums. In these cases, it often would not make sense to require the party to produce all the different types of ESI in a single form (see Committee Note to Rule 34(b)). Though Rule 7 refers only to a form of production, it clearly permits a party to produce different forms for different types of ESI. The federal Rule 34 refers to form or forms and makes explicit this option.

Rule 8. Limitations on Discovery. Rule 8 provides procedures governing the discovery of inaccessible ESI (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.35[1], discussing what constitutes inaccessible ESI). It has a similar counterpart in the federal rules (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B)). The Uniform Rule and the federal rules prescribe standards to determine whether and on what conditions a party must produce inaccessible ESI. Both sets of rules require the court to consider the same factors or elements in determining whether to issue an order compelling production of inaccessible ESI. But each set of rules uses different language, adopting different drafting approaches. Though the articulated standards are different, they produce the same results.

Both the Uniform Rules and federal rules use a two-tier structure when evaluating production requests for inaccessible ESI. The first tier in both sets of rules is the same. The producing party must produce relevant, non-privileged ESI, unless it objects, showing that the requested ESI is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense. The producing party has the burden to demonstrate the undue burden or expense. If the producing party meets this burden, the court may nonetheless order the party to produce the inaccessible ESI under the second-tier.

The difference between Rule 8 and the federal rules lies primarily in the wording of the second tier. A court may order production of inaccessible ESI under federal Rule 26(b)(2)(B) if the requesting party shows good cause, considering the limitations of Rule 26(b)(2)(C) (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.35[2]). The limitations include two general factors: (1) whether the requested ESI is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative; and (2) whether the party seeking discovery has had ample opportunity to obtain the information; and a balancing test, which weighs the benefits of the requested ESI against the burden and expense in obtaining it, taking into consideration five separate factors. In applying the balancing test, the Committee Note provides an additional seven elements that the court should consider (Committee Note to Rule 26(b)(2) (2006)).

Rule 8 adopts a different drafting approach to the second tier. Unlike the federal rule, Rule 8 does not explicitly require a good cause showing. But the difference is not material because the sole function of the good cause requirement in federal Rule 26 is to serve as a bridge to the limitations referenced in Rule 26(b)(2)(C). The bridge was necessary as a drafting artifice so that all the elements and factors that a court must consider in both approving and limiting a request to produce inaccessible ESI could be included in a single provision.

Rule 8 addressed this drafting task differently and broke down the factors and elements into two separate provisions; the first identifies elements that the court should consider when ruling on a request to produce inaccessible ESI and the follow-up second provision identifies elements that the court should consider when determining whether to limit the discovery. The first provision is contained in Rule 8(c). Under this provision, a court may order discovery after it applies the same balancing test used in the federal rule. In applying the balancing test, the Note to Rule 8 states that the court should consider the same seven elements that are set out in the Committee Note to Rule 26(b)(2). If a court orders discovery of ESI under Rule 8(c), the second provision set out as Rule 8(e) becomes operative. Under Rule (e), the court considers the two general limiting factors used in the federal rule after again applying the same balancing test to determine whether the frequency or extent of discovery should be limited. Though Rule 8 takes a different and more winding road, it arrives at the same destination as federal Rule 26. Rule 8 is wordier. Whether it is clearer than the federal rule is a matter of preference.

For the third time, the Uniform Rules highlight the potential use of cost sharing, expressly providing that a court should consider cost sharing as a condition for discovery of inaccessible ESI (see Uniform Rule 8(d)). As earlier discussed, cost sharing is not mentioned in the text of the federal rules and is mentioned only once in the Committee Notes. In addition, neither Rule 8 nor the comment to the rule expressly requires the parties to meet and confer if they fail to agree on whether ESI is inaccessible. The federal rules require the parties to try and resolve this matter before raising it with the court (see Committee Note to Rule 26(b)(2) (2006)).

Rule 9. Claim of Privilege or Protection After Production. Rule 9 provides procedures for asserting a claim of privilege or protection for trial preparation materials, which are very similar to the federal rules counterpart (see Fed. R. Civ. R. 26(b)(5); see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.32[5]). The federal rule requires a party to promptly return, sequester, or destroy the ESI that the other party identifies as subject to a claim of privilege or protection. The provision in Rule 9 seems more urgent, requiring immediate sequestration.

Under the federal rule, a party may sequester, as an alternative to returning or destroying, ESI that is claimed to be privileged or protected in a situation in which the party has incorporated the substance of the privileged information in its own documents. Rule 9 provides that the party must first sequester the ESI in all cases and then return, destroy, or present the information to the court for resolution of the underlying privilege claim. It is unclear why the party is required to sequester the ESI in all situations.

Rule 10. Subpoena for Production. Rule 10 extends the ESI discovery standards and procedures to requests for production of ESI from nonparties. It provides basically the same standards and procedures as does the federal rule (see Fed. R. Civ. P. 45; see also 7 Moores Federal Practice, Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, § 37A.27). Rule 10(d) provides that a court order must protect nonparties against subpoenas for ESI that would impose undue burden or expense. The federal rules seem to employ a narrower standard. Under the federal rules, if the nonparty objects to the subpoena, the court may order compliance with the subpoena so long as the order protects the nonparty from significant expense resulting from compliance (Fed. R. Civ. P. 45(c)(2)(B)(ii)). But the apparent difference is not material. A court is obligated under federal Rule 45 to protect nonparties from subpoenas that would impose undue burden or expense (Fed. R. Civ. P. 45(c)(1)). Moreover, a court must quash or modify the subpoena on timely motion if it subjects a person to undue burden (Fed. R. Civ. P. 45(3)(A)(iv)).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors' qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

111 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on State v. Reynolds, 746 N.W.2d 837 (Iowa 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2413

Arthur Best on Business Records and Hearsay Within Hearsay: The Iowa Supreme Court Gets Back to Basics in State v. Reynolds, 746 N.W.2d 837 (Iowa 2008)

By Arthur Best

June 30, 2008

SUMMARY: In this criminal case, the Supreme Court of Iowa dealt with some important and basic hearsay issues, involving hearsay within hearsay and the business records exception. On appeal, the court held that the evidence the prosecution used to show that the money orders were counterfeit had been wrongly admitted. Arthur Best, a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, comments on State v. Reynolds, 746 N.W.2d 837 (Iowa 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Best, Arthur. Business Records and Hearsay Within Hearsay: The Iowa Supreme Court Gets Back to Basics in State v. Reynolds. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Overview. In this criminal case, the Supreme Court of Iowa dealt with some important and basic hearsay issues, involving hearsay within hearsay and the business records exception. The defendant was convicted of theft and forgery in connection with his cashing twelve money orders at an Iowa bank for a total amount of more than $12,000. On appeal, the court held that the evidence the prosecution used to show that the money orders were counterfeit had been wrongly admitted.

Crucial Evidence and Rationale for Admission. For ten of the money orders, to prove that they were counterfeit the trial court allowed the prosecution to use the business records exception to introduce documents described by an employee of the bank where the defendant cashed them. The documents, for each money order, included an e-mail and an error report allegedly sent by the Federal Reserve to the cashing bank. The e-mails and error reports stated that each of the money orders was counterfeit. The cashing bank's employee testified that she commonly received and dealt with e-mails and error reports of the type introduced, as part of the normal course of work at her bank. For two other money orders, the trial court similarly accepted a business records exception rationale for testimony by an employee of the cashing bank. She described a telephone call she made to an automated phone number operated by the apparent issuer of the money orders, and stated that in response to her providing the money order identification numbers, she heard a computerized recording stating that the money orders had no value.

Significant Rules. The business records exception, under Iowa Rule of Evidence 5.803(6), treats hearsay as admissible if it satisfies the following definition:

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity. A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and the regular practice of that business activity was to make the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this subrule includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

The Reynolds court summarized this definition as requiring the proponent of hearsay evidence to establish:

- 1) That it is a business record;
- 2) That it was made at or near the time of an act;
- 3) That it was made by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge;
- 4) That it was kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity;
- 5) That it was the regular practice of that business activity to make such a business record.

State v. Reynolds, 746 N.W.2d at 841 (Iowa 2008) (relying on Beachel v. Long, 420 N.W.2d at 484 (Iowa Ct.App.1988)).

For evidence that incorporates more than one level of hearsay, Iowa Rule of Evidence 5. 807 provides:

Hearsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in this chapter.

Basic Rationale for the Business Records Exception. The rationale for the business records exception has usually been that the records it covers are likely to be accurate because those who make them have a strong incentive to be careful and accurate. They may lose their jobs if they make mistakes, the business may suffer if it relies on internal records that turn out to be flawed, and normal routines within a business are likely to uncover errors in the business's own records. In a straightforward example of a business record, someone employed at a business makes contemporaneous notes about some aspect of the entity's work. If it is the regular practice of the entity to make such notes, then the document would be admissible.

Multiple Declarants and Business Records. Often, more than one declarant is involved in the production of a document that can qualify as a business record. For example, a salesperson might report weekly sales figures to a sales manager, and the sales manager might make a record that incorporates information from that salesperson. The salesperson had knowledge of what he or she recorded, and presumably did that recording in the ordinary course of the business. The sales manager had knowledge of what he or she was recording information from the salesperson and presumably made the summary record in the ordinary course of business.

Third-Party Statements Adopted by a Business. Sometimes a business record may contain information from someone outside the business, a third party. The usual understanding of the business record exception treats the business's recording of the third party's statement as admissible evidence of the fact that the third party said something. It does not serve to remove the hearsay taint from the third party's statement, if there is a need to have the third party's statement admitted for the truth of what it asserts. This makes sense, because the third party does not have incentives for accuracy; the third party can't be fired and the third party doesn't care about the ongoing success of the business that recorded his or her statement.

If a business record contains a third party's statement and the third party's statement itself is covered by a hearsay exception, then the business record is admissible proof that the third party said something, and whatever additional exception covers the third party's statement enables a court to properly admit the business record as proof of the underlying fact reported by the third party.

The Iowa Supreme Courts Decision. The Iowa Supreme Court held that the federal reserve e-mails and error reports and the telephone computerized statements were all wrongly admitted. It cited its decision in Polson v. Meredith Publ'g Co., 213 N.W.2d at 525 (Iowa 1973), where the court held that admitting third-party hearsay statements contained in a business record without a separate hearsay exception for the third-party hearsay would constitute a complete departure from the most elementary rules of evidence rather than obedience to the statutory admonition that such rules should be liberally applied.

Since there was no foundation evidence about how the e-mails or error reports were created, there was no allowable basis for treating them as reliable. There was no attempt made to establish that they were within the coverage of any hearsay exception except the business record exception. With regard to that exception, the fact that the cashing bank saved them and relied on them does not make them qualified for admission as business records. Similarly, there was no foundation evidence about the process by which the computerized telephonic statement was made, and this prohibited their introduction for the truth of what they asserted, even though the cashing bank relied on them.

Lessons for Practice. The key to handling hearsay problems is to be very careful in identifying declarants and statements. The prosecution in this case treated the error reports as business records of the cashing bank, essentially overlooking the fact that the declarants for those reports were employees of another entity, the Federal Reserve. In the Supreme Courts analysis, there were multiple declarants employees of the Federal Reserve and any workers at the cashing bank who might have incorporated those records into the banks files or data systems. For the telephonic data also relied on by the prosecution, although the prosecution sought to use a business records theory for their admission, the Supreme Court properly noted that there was only one declarant, the money order company, and that the cashing bank actually did no record-keeping about that telephonic data.

See 1-16 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 16.07 for a full discussion of the rationale for the business records exception and an analysis of proper treatment of statements by volunteers contained in business records, in the context of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

See 1-9 California Evidentiary Foundations D and 1-10 New York Evidentiary Foundations § D, for analysis of the business records exception in the context of California and New York law that is instructive for those states in particular and has general application for other states as well.

Rival Analysis. There are some federal precedents that contradict the Iowa Supreme Courts analysis. Applying the Federal Rules of Evidence, for example, in Air Land Forwarders, Inc. v. United States, 172 F.3d 1338 (Fed. Cir. 1999), the court held that if a business usually relies on third-party statements and if those statements have some indicial of reliability, the business records exception should cover them. This position is opposite to the Iowa courts rationale, and seems to give little weight to the underlying rationale for the business record exception. Nonetheless, the opinion and some other precedents cited in it could support argument by counsel in future Iowa cases or in cases in other jurisdictions that a more pro-admissibility interpretation of the business records exception is proper.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

112 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McCullagh on Washington E-Discovery

2008 Emerging Issues 2416

James R. McCullagh on Washington State Law and E-Discovery Requirements

By James R. McCullagh

June 25, 2008

SUMMARY: Washington currently has no e-discovery rules or statutes, but a State Bar committee is considering e-discovery amendments to the Civil Rules. This commentary reviews reported Washington cases on the subject of e-discovery, summarizes the status of proposed Washington rules, then addresses fundamental e-discovery issues to consider when litigating in Washington courts.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: McCullagh, James R. Washington State Law and E-Discovery Requirements. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Introduction. The explosion of electronically stored information ("ESI") is well documented and continues to accelerate. Recent estimates indicate that 97 billion emails are sent each day worldwide and that 92 percent of all new data is created and stored electronically. While e-discovery has become a regular and required component of federal litigation since the 2006 amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which included e-discovery amendments to federal rules 16, 26, 33, 34, 37, and 45, states have been less uniform in their approach to e-discovery issues. Some states such as Idaho, New Hampshire, New Jersey and Minnesota enacted amendments based on the Federal Rules. Other states, such as Texas, Mississippi and New York had ESI rules in place before the Federal Rules. However, the majority of states, including Washington, have not yet addressed ESI.

In addition to the lack of state statutes or rules addressing e-discovery obligations in Washington, there is very little Washington case law addressing this topic. The Washington State Bar Association Court Rules and Procedures Committee is currently considering whether to propose amending the Washington Civil Rules to address e-discovery issues. However, the exact contours of the state e-discovery rules, or even if such rules will be proposed, has not yet been decided. Furthermore, it will take many months for any recommendation that may eventually find its way out of committee to work its way through the approval process. As a result this commentary primarily relies upon secondary sources to suggest one possible approach to addressing e-discovery issues in Washington state litigation.

This commentary first reviews the few reported Washington cases that even arguably touch on the subject of e-discovery. It then summarizes the status of proposed Washington state rules before addressing fundamental e-discovery issues that should be considered when litigating in Washington courts.

Washington E-Discovery Case Law

Electronic files are generally discoverable, but absent a court order, backup files (or other inaccessible information) do not need to be searched or produced by the responding party. In Bedford, LLC v. Safeco Ins. Co. of America [140 Wn. App. 1033 (9/24/2007, unreported)], plaintiff was granted permission to examine defendant's consultant's computer system after learning of the presence of a draft report that had not been produced by defendant. Plaintiff eventually located the draft report on a backup file on the penultimate day of trial and moved for discovery violation sanctions on the grounds that the defendant's failure to produce the report prejudiced plaintiff's case. The Court of Appeals noted that "electronic files and experts' draft reports are generally discoverable, but the failure to produce a responsive document is not necessarily a violation of discovery rules. The court expressly noted that there was no requirement that a testifying expert witness retain all electronic drafts, including "those that were overridden or subsumed during the drafting process." The court did not expressly refer to the Federal Rules, but its analysis is consistent with Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26(b)(2)(B), which does not require a party to provide ESI "from sources that the party identifies as not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost" [Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 26(b)(2)(B)]. Thus, this unpublished case, while having no precedential value, may be indicative of Washington courts willingness to look to the federal rules for guidance in matters related to e-discovery.

ESI produced in anticipation of litigation is subject to disclosure pursuant to same considerations as traditional work product. Even though Demelash v. Ross Stores, Inc. [105 Wn. App. 508, 20 P.3d 447 (2001)] was decided well before the issue of ESI took center stage on discovery issues, it remains instructive as a reminder that Washington courts will evaluate ESI as they would any other item of potentially relevant information. In Demelash, defendant delayed its response to plaintiff's discovery requests for some 14 months and then stated that the requested records had been destroyed in a recent flood [Demelash 105 Wn. App. at 518]. Defendant withheld certain computer records on the grounds that they were protected under the attorney work product doctrine, but did produce a computer-generated summary of the records. On appeal, the court applied a standard work product analysis to the withheld computer records and found that plaintiff had demonstrated the required substantial need for the information sought. It then found that the computer summary produced by defendant was "useless" and remanded with instructions that the trial court order defendant to produce the alleged work product [Demelash, 105 Wn. App. at 520].

Proposed E-Discovery Amendments to Washington Civil Rules

As of June 2008, the Court Rules and Procedures Committee of the Washington State Bar Association has tabled consideration of e-discovery amendments to the Civil Rules until the ESI subcommittee has given additional consideration to recently submitted comments. Current information regarding the Committee and the ESI subcommittee's work can be found at: <http://www.wsba.org/lawyers/groups/courtrules/default1.htm>.

The ESI subcommittee is currently considering amendments that generally track federal ESI rules. In addition, there is also a proposal that the comments to the Federal Rules be adopted by Washington. Conforming Washington ESI rules to the Federal Rules and incorporating the advisory notes is attractive to some for the consistency that it would bring between e-discovery practice in state and federal courts. In addition, adopting amendments that track the federal language should allow Washington courts and practitioners to be guided by the growing body of federal law addressing ESI issues.

However, some entities, such as the Washington State Association of Prosecuting Attorneys and the Washington State Association of Municipal Attorneys, are not in favor of adding ESI provisions at this time. These groups and others believe that ESI amendments are premature for a variety of reasons including: (1) the state of advancing technology and the rapidly evolving body of federal case law; (2) state courts are not in the same position as federal courts because they address inherently different questions (more unsophisticated litigants and a wider variety of problems); and (3) state courts have not experienced problems with electronic discovery similar to the that which was the impetus for the federal ESI amendments. There is also concern with the often substantial costs associated with ESI. Some groups are concerned that especially when the discovery burden is asymmetric, the costs of collecting, reviewing, and producing ESI can alter the litigation playing field, and have suggested that Washington adopt mandatory cost shifting when the requesting party demands ESI that is not reasonably accessible. Other groups are concerned that cost shifting will add further hurdles for litigants with limited resources. The cost-shifting issue has received much attention and appears to be one of the major issues that the rules committee will need to address, if it proceeds with proposing ESI amendments to the civil rules.

E-Discovery Practice Pointers

As noted, there are no Washington Rules that directly address ESI. However, both case law and the Civil Rules leave no doubt that ESI is clearly within the scope of permissible discovery. Washington permits broad discovery "regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action, whether it relates to the claim or defense of a party seeking discovery or to the claim or defense of any other party, including the existence, description, nature, custody condition and location of any books, documents, or other tangible things" [CR 26(b)]. "Documents" are further defined by CR 34 to include writings, drawings, graphs, charts, photographs, phonorecords, and other data compilations from which information can be obtained.

Since the scope of discovery in state courts is similar to that permitted in federal courts, it is likely that Washington courts will consider federal law when grappling with e-discovery issues. In addition to the guidance provided by federal rules and case law, state courts may also refer to the "Guidelines for State Trial Courts Regarding Discovery of Electronically Stored Information" ("Guidelines") when addressing ESI issues. The Guidelines were developed by the Conference of Chief Justices Working Group on Electronic Discovery in August 2006. (available at <http://www.ncsconline.org/images/EDiscCCJGuidelinesFinal.pdf>). A review draft of the Guidelines was sent to each state's chief justice and a wide array of lawyer organizations and e-discovery experts in late 2005. Comments related to the draft were reviewed by a working group of the Conference of Chief Justices and incorporated into the final Guidelines.

The Guidelines note that [Guidelines at vii]:

Uncertainty about how to address the differences between electronic and traditional discovery under current discovery rules and standards exacerbates the problems [associated with e-discovery]. Case law is emerging, but it is not consistent and discovery disputes are rarely the subject of appellate review.

The Guidelines are "intended to help reduce this uncertainty in state court litigation by assisting trial judges faced by a dispute over e-discovery in identifying the issues and determining the decision-making factors to be applied" [Guidelines at vii]. The Guidelines were not intended to be treated as model rules, but rather were crafted to offer guidance to judges faced with addressing the practical problems created by ESI. As such, counsel should at least consider whether following and citing the Guidelines would be advantageous in state court litigation.

After briefly defining ESI as "any information created, stored, or best utilized with computer technology of any type," the Guidelines state that it is the responsibility of counsel to be informed about the client's ESI [Guidelines at 1]. They also recognize that judges "should, when appropriate, encourage counsel to become familiar with the operation of the party's relevant information management systems" and that "If a party intends to seek the production of [ESI] in a specific case, that fact should be communicated to opposing counsel as soon as possible and the categories or types of information to be sought should be clearly identified" [Guidelines at 1]. There can be no mistake that state court chief justices recognized that ESI-related issues will arise in state courts, and believe that a common set of guidelines would be helpful.

The Guidelines recommend that the parties meet and confer and voluntarily agree on the scope of ESI to be produced as well as the manner and timing of its production. Where the parties are unable to agree, the Guidelines suggest that judges consider the following items when crafting a discovery order [Guidelines at 2B3]:

1. A list of persons most knowledgeable about the relevant computer systems or networks, the storage and retrieval of ESI, and the backup, archiving, retention, and routine destruction of ESI;
2. A list of most likely custodians or relevant ESI, including non-parties;
3. A list of all the electronic systems that may contain relevant ESI and general description of each system;
4. An indication of whether relevant ESI may be of limited accessibility or duration of existence, and an explanation for the limitation;
5. A list of all ESI that has been stored off-site or off-system;
6. A description of efforts to preserve relevant ESI, including the suspension of regular document destruction, removal and storage of computer media with relevant information, or the making of forensic image back-ups;
7. The form of production preferred by the party; and
8. Notice of any known problems reasonably anticipated to arise in connection with compliance with requests for ESI.

Prior to conferring with opposing counsel regarding the scope and details of e-discovery, it may be prudent to consider those items that may be evaluated by a court in the event that agreement cannot be reached. To that end, the Guidelines suggest specific factors that a judge may consider in weighing the benefits to the requesting party against the burden and expense of the discovery to the responding party [Guidelines at 5]:

1. The ease of accessing the requested information;
2. The total cost of production compared to the amount in controversy;
3. The materiality of the information to the requesting party;
4. The availability of the information from other sources;
5. The complexity of the case and the importance of the issues addressed;
6. The need to protect privileged, proprietary, or confidential information, including trade secrets;
7. Whether the information or software needed to access the requested information is proprietary or constitutes confidential business information;
8. The breadth of the request, including whether a subset or representative sample of the contested ESI can be provided initially to determine whether production of additional such information is warranted;
9. The relative ability of each party to control costs and its incentive to do so;
10. The resources of each party compared to the total cost of production;

11. Whether the requesting party has offered to pay some or all of the costs of identifying, reviewing, and producing the information;

12. Whether the ESI is stored in a way that makes it more costly or burdensome to access than is reasonably warranted by legitimate personal, business, or other non-litigation-related reasons; and

13. Whether the responding party has deleted, discarded, or erased ESI after litigation was commenced or after the responding party was aware that litigation was probable.

The Guidelines also contain separate discussions related to cost-shifting and suggests that cost-shifting is only appropriate where the ESI sought is not accessible and when restoration and production of a small sample of the requested information is not sufficient. In an effort to assist courts with resolving issues of cost, the Guidelines adopt the analysis set out in Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC [216 F.R.D. 280 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) ("Zubulake III")] and identify (1) the extent to which the request is specifically tailored to discovery relevant information; (2) the availability of the requested information from other sources; (3) the total cost of production versus the amount in controversy; (4) the total cost of production compared to the resources available to each party; (5) the relative ability of each party to control costs and its incentive to do so; (6) the importance of the issues at stake in the litigation; and (7) the relative benefits of obtaining the information, as factors to consider when determining how the burdens of e-discovery should be apportioned among the parties [Guidelines at 7].

The Guidelines also comment on the issues of inadvertent disclosure of privileged information by encouraging the parties to agree to procedures to be used for clawing back inadvertently disclosed privileged information as a way to permit litigation to move forward without undue delay or expense on the producing party. The Guidelines further recommend that courts consider supporting parties' claw-back agreements by issuing orders that recognizes the agreements and declare that inadvertent production of privileged information will not create an express or implied waiver of privilege [Guidelines at 8B9].

The message that resonates throughout the Guidelines is that courts should encourage parties to addresses ESI issues early and that discovery disputes involving ESI should be handled with an eye for a practical and balanced resolution. While the Guidelines are not binding on Washington courts, they may be a useful tool to address ESI-related issues.

Regardless of what, if any, weight a Washington court will place on the Guidelines, practitioners should take steps to ensure that they are in the best position possible to fully and accurately consider the potential costs and benefits of ESI, that they have taken steps to minimize the potential need to access information stored on back-up media, and that they have counseled their clients on the importance of addressing ESI in addition to traditional paper discovery. To that end, every litigator should consider the following five subjects at the onset of every representation.

1. Document hold notices. As soon as litigation is reasonably anticipated, a client should evaluate the need to send document hold notices to persons that may have relevant information and instruct them to retain and not destroy any potentially relevant information. A client's IT department should also be notified of the document hold and steps should be taken to prevent the deletion of potentially relevant information in order to minimize the chance of motion practice related to document preservation issues.

2. Understand scope of ESI before initiating discovery. If you are considering seeking ESI from the other side, carefully consider both the cost of receiving and reviewing the discovery requested as well as the burden that will be placed on your client in responding to a reciprocal request.

3. Preservation letters/orders. Once the decision is made to seek ESI in the course of discovery, consider sending a letter notifying the opposing party that ESI will be sought and instructing them to preserve and not destroy potentially responsive information. This letter should identify the potentially relevant issues with as much specificity as possible in order to minimize the burden on the opposing side and ensure that the most important sources of ESI are retained. If necessary, consider whether a preservation order from the court is warranted. In such a case, a court is likely to weigh the following factors: (1) the likelihood that the requested ESI will not be preserved absent an order; (2) the importance of the information and the level of harm likely to be suffered absent a preservation order; (3) the capability of the responding party to maintain the information sought in its original form, condition, and content; and (4) the physical, technological, and financial burdens created by ordering preservation of the information.

4. Address ESI issues with opposing counsel early and thoroughly. Among the topics that should be discussed are: (1) the potential sources of ESI; (2) the format for production; (3) a production schedule; (4) whether there are sources of ESI with limited accessibility or availability; and (5) issues related to privilege. Determining how to resolve these issues will depend on the specific facts and parties involved in the dispute. There is no one-size-fits-all answer to ESI issues.

5. If agreement on the scope of ESI related discovery cannot be reached, motion practice will be necessary. When taking ESI-related discovery issues to the court, be prepared to both educate the court and support your position as one of reason. Consider addressing the following topics: (1) the ease (or difficulty) of accessing the requested information; (2) the total cost of production compared to the amount in controversy; (3) the complexity of the case; (4) the likely materiality of the information to the requesting party; (5) the availability of the information from other sources; (6) possible ways to limit the burden on of ESI production, including limiting the search by date, custodian, or keyword searching prior to production; (7) the relative ability of each party to control costs; (8) the burden of the requested discovery on the responding party and that party's ability to absorb the burden; and (9) issues related to shifting the costs of discovery.

Summary. E-discovery is a rapidly developing area of law. There is little formal guidance on requirements and limitations in discovery of ESI in Washington state litigation. The lack of guidance results in both uncertainty and the potential for the unwary to suffer unintended consequences from inadequate preparation. However, the growing body of federal law as well as guidance provided by the Conference of Chief Justices provides signposts by which Washington courts are likely to evaluate disputes related to ESI. The prudent practitioner will recognize the growing import of ESI to almost every type of litigation and will address ESI issues very early in litigation.

Disclaimer. The above commentary is for informational purposes only and not for the purpose of providing legal advice. The opinions expressed in this commentary are the opinions of the individual author and may not reflect the opinions of Perkins Coie LLP or any other individual attorney at the firm.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

James R. McCullagh is a litigation partner in the Seattle office of the law firm Perkins Coie LLP. Mr. McCullagh is a member of the firm's E-Discovery services and Strategy Group and routinely counsels clients on document retention and e-discovery related issues. Mr. McCullagh graduated from the University of Washington School of Law in 1997 and clerked for the Honorable H. Joseph Coleman of the Washington State Court of Appeals, Division I for two years.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

113 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on Pineda v. Ford Motor Co., 520 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2414

Arthur Best on Pineda v. Ford Motor Co., 520 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2008)

By Arthur Best

June 25, 2008

SUMMARY: Does the rule against introduction of evidence of subsequent remedial measures to prove liability for defective warnings preclude an experts reliance on a car manufacturers Safety Recall Instruction? Arthur Best, a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, comments on the practical implications of Pineda v. Ford Motor Co., 520 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

Does the rule against introduction of evidence of subsequent remedial measures to prove liability for defective warnings preclude an experts reliance on a car manufacturers Safety Recall Instruction? In Pineda v. Ford Motor Co., 520 F.3d 237 (3d Cir. 2008), the plaintiff was injured when glass in a vehicle tailgate he was repairing shattered and cut him. He sought damages from the manufacturer in a failure to warn products liability case. The District Court granted summary judgment to the defendant. It found that the plaintiffs expert was not qualified to give testimony about warnings because his background and expertise in product design, glass and ceramics did not related to warnings. Also, it held that the expert could not rely in any way on the manufacturers safety recall instructions that were issued after the plaintiffs injury. The Third Circuit rejected each of these District Court conclusions.

Summary of the case

The plaintiff was injured he was replacing the rear liftgate glass of a 2002 Ford Explorer and the glass shattered. He brought a products liability action against the defendant, raising numerous claims. As the case progressed, the plaintiff dropped all claims except one for failure to warn.

The plaintiff sought to introduce testimony from an expert. This expert received a Bachelor of Science and a Master of Science in Metallurgical Engineering and Material Science, and had spent considerable time studying fracture mechanics and modeling materials such as glass. Upon graduation, he worked at Westinghouse Electric in its materials engineering lab and then Phoenix Steel Corporation as the manager of quality control. He eventually joined a consulting company, and has consulted in over two hundred cases involving the failure of glass or other ceramics. At a Daubert hearing, he testified that although he had experience in materials analysis and systems failure analysis, he was a warning expert only in the sense that warnings and instructions are solutions to an engineering problem and are part of a hierarchy of approaches designers can use to create products that will be properly safe.

The proposed expert testified at the hearing that he had reached a conclusion that the vehicle was excessively dangerous because the defendant had failed to provide warnings and instructions related to the danger of glass fracturing when the vehicle's liftgate was replaced. He based that conclusion on a 2004 Safety Recall Instruction ("SRI") that described the procedure for replacing the liftgate brackets and hinges on the 2002 Ford Explorer. This SRI, unlike a 2002 service manual used by the plaintiff, provided adequate warnings and detailed instructions for replacing the liftgate brackets and hinges.

The trial court held that the expert was not properly qualified to give testimony about warnings. It also held that the proposed opinion testimony was not reliable, because it was based only on generalized experience. The trial court criticized the proposed testimony because it did not include any proposed alternative language for a warning, did not test the effectiveness of a possible alternative warning, and did not compare the language of the 2002 service manual with the language provided by other automobile manufacturers. The trial court also ruled that the expert could not use the defendant's 2004 SRI as a basis for his testimony.

These rulings rejecting testimony by the plaintiff's expert were the basis for grant of summary judgment to the defendant.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Daubert* requirements. Admission of expert testimony usually requires a Daubert pretrial hearing in which a court determines whether a proffered expert witness's testimony is relevant and reliable, as required by Federal Rule of Evidence 702 and Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993).

Federal Rule of Evidence 702. This Rule provides:

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise, if (1) the testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data, (2) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods, and (3) the witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

Federal Rule of Evidence 407. This rule provides:

When, after an injury or harm allegedly caused by an event, measures are taken that, if taken previously, would have made the injury or harm less likely to occur evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove negligence, culpable conduct, a defect in a product, a defect in a product's design, or a need for a warning or instruction. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment.

For analysis of Rule 407, see 1-407 Federal Evidence § 407.3, and 1-7 Weinsteins Evidence Manual § 7.04.

Federal Rule of Evidence 703. This Rule provides:

The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion or inference to be admitted. Facts or data that are otherwise inadmissible shall not be disclosed to the jury by the proponent of the opinion or inference unless the court determines that their probative value in assisting the jury to evaluate the expert's opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect.

For analysis of Rule 703 see 1-703 Federal Evidence § 703.5, and 1-13 Weinstens Evidence Manual § 13.03.

The Third Circuits Decision

Qualification of the proposed expert. The Third Circuit reasoned that the District Court applied qualification requirements too narrowly. The fact that the expert did not have significant background in the details of product warnings was not crucial, since the defendant in this case had provided no warnings or instructions at all. The Third Circuit relied in part on its decision in Holbrook v. Lykes Bros. S.S. Co., 80 F.3d at 782 (3d Cir. 1996) ("[I]t is an abuse of discretion to exclude testimony simply because the trial court does not deem the proposed expert to be the best qualified or because the proposed expert does not have the specialization that the court considers most). This pro-admissibility approach is consistent with Knight v. Otis Elevator Co., 596 F.2d at 87-88 (3d Cir. 1979), in which the court held that an expert could testify that unguarded elevator buttons constituted a design defect despite expert's lack of specific background in design and manufacture of elevators.

Having established that the trial courts requirement of specific warning experience was improper, the Third Circuit readily characterized the experts background and training as adequate to qualify him to testify in a case involving the safety of glass in a products design. Because he would not opine on how the warning should have been worded or presented, but would testify only that neglecting to follow the steps of an instruction when replacing the 2002 Explorer's liftgate brackets and hinges might result in failure of the liftgate glass, and that therefore a warning was necessary, the Third Circuit held that he was substantively qualified to testify. It held that a proper warning is a solution to an engineering problem and that therefore general engineering expertise is adequate to support such testimony.

Subsequent Remedial Measure Evidence. At the Daubert hearing, the expert testified that his conclusion that the lack of instructions rendered the product improperly dangerous was based on comparing the 2002 service manual with the SRI issued by the defendant about two years later. The District Court ruled that Federal Rule of Evidence 407 precluded such a comparison and that without that basis for comparison, the experts testimony lacked an adequate basis.

The Third Circuit acknowledged that Rule 407 precludes admission of the subsequently issued SRI to establish liability. However, it noted that Rule 703 only requires that the data used by an expert in developing an opinion be "of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject." The Rules provision that data need not be admissible in order to be a basis for expert opinion made it legitimate for the experts opinion to be based on the subsequent recall notice. The court stated that it is reasonable for an engineer to rely upon a warning and alternative safety instruction subsequently issued by a manufacturer in forming an opinion that an earlier service manual fails to provide adequate instructions and warnings to automobile technicians. Thus, despite Rule 407's general exclusion of subsequent remedial measure evidence, we hold that Rule 703 permits [the expert] to base his opinion on a consideration of the SRI. Pineda v. Ford Motor Co., 520 F.3d at 247 (3d Cir. 2008).

The Third Circuit noted additionally that Rule 703 permits otherwise inadmissible evidence to be disclosed to the jury if the trial court determines that the probative value in assisting the jury substantially outweighs the prejudicial effect. Without deciding the issue of whether the SRI should be admitted into evidence, the Third Circuit referred with approval to Rules of Evidence Advisory Committee notes providing that if otherwise inadmissible information is admitted, then the trial judge must give a limiting instruction if one is requested, stating that the underlying information must not be used for substantive purposes. This limitation on introduction of the recall notice would apply only to the plaintiffs case. If the defendant were to cross-examine the expert on the bases of his opinion, which would include the SRI, the SRI would then become part of the record for the jury to consider.

Comments. Rule 407s limitations on the use of subsequent remedial measures has been controversial. Some courts have suggested that where a manufacturer is required to take such actions, as in the case of automobile recalls, the rule should be withdrawn because its public policy justification encouraging corrective actions has no application when a manufacturer is compelled to act. See, e.g., See O'Dell v. Hercules, Inc., 904 F.2d 1194, 1204 (8th Cir. 1990); Nexen Petroleum U.S.A., Inc. v. Sea Mar Div. of Pool Well Servs. Co., No. 06-3043, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 71675, at *5 (E.D. La. Sept. 26, 2007) (citing Rozier v. Ford Motor Co., 573 F.2d at 1343 (5th Cir. 1978)). This opinion creates a new and potentially powerful avenue for the use of subsequent remedial measures, despite the Rule 407 prohibitions. An expert may rely on such a measure in developing his or her opinion. Then, on cross-examination the expert will be permitted to describe that remedial measure to the jury. While this seems contrary to the purpose of Rule 407, the provisions of Rule 703 permitting inadmissible evidence as a basis for expert opinion provide strong support for the Third Circuits conclusion.

With regard to the Third Circuits treatment of evidence from experts whose knowledge is general, it should be noted that the plaintiffs use of a general engineering expert with no significant experience regarding warnings was facilitated by the fact that the defendant had provided no warnings or instructions related to the problem cited by the plaintiff. Had there been some warnings provided, the issue in the case would have been the particular value of those warnings and it is likely that an expert with greater experience connected to warnings would have been required.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

114 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Connolly on Virginia v. Moore

2008 Emerging Issues 2406

Sean F. Connolly on Analyzing State Arrest Statutes Under Virginia v. Moore

By Sean F. Connolly

June 23, 2008

SUMMARY: Until recently, plaintiff's lawyers and criminal defense practitioners had been crying foul for arrests made by police officers that, while permissible under the United States Constitution, violated specific state-law arrest statutes. The United States Supreme Court has now put to rest the argument that a violation of state law may form the basis for a federal Constitutional violation. This Expert Commentary analyzes this Supreme Court ruling.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Introduction. Until recently, plaintiff's lawyers and criminal defense practitioners had been crying foul for arrests made by police officers that, while permissible under the United States Constitution, violated specific state-law arrest statutes. The issue fueled arguments by the plaintiff's bar and criminal defense bar that these arrests violated the Fourth Amendment. The United States Supreme Court has now put to rest the argument that a violation of state law may form the basis for a federal Constitutional violation [Virginia v. Moore, 533 U.S. , 128 S. Ct. 1598, 177 L. Ed. 2d 559 (2008)]. The Supreme Court ruling will affect civil and criminal practitioners in California by limiting a police officer or other state actor's liability in civil lawsuits, and limiting a criminal defendant's ability to argue for suppression of evidence based on purported violations of specific state statutes.

Relevant Facts of Virginia v. Moore. The lawsuit in Virginia v. Moore [533 U.S. , 128 S. Ct. 1598, 177 L. Ed. 2d 559 (2008)] arose out of the arrest of David Lee Moore by police officers in Portsmouth, Virginia, after he was stopped and arrested for driving on a suspended driver license, a misdemeanor. The police subsequently searched Moore and found that he was in possession of 16 grams of cocaine and a large amount of cash. Moore was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to distribute and then tried, convicted, and sentenced to prison. Moore appealed, arguing that because Virginia had a "cite and release" law, which characterized some offenses such as driving on a suspended driver license as a non-arrestable offense, the Portsmouth police should have cited and released him from custody without having conducted a search of him incident to arrest [Moore, 128 S. Ct. at 1601-1602].

That is to say, under Virginia state law, the police officer had no business conducting a full custodial arrest of Moore for a minor non-arrestable offense, or searching him incident to that arrest. Virginia state law required the police to release him, as long as he promised to sign the citation and discontinue his offense. The case bounced back and forth through the Virginia state court appellate system before landing in the Virginia Supreme Court, where Moore's conviction was reversed [Moore v. Commonwealth, 272 Va. 717, 725, 636 S.E. 2d 395 (2006)]. The Virginia Supreme Court reasoned that because Moore should have been cited and released, and because the Fourth Amendment does not allow search incident to citation, the arrest violated the Fourth Amendment and thus the exclusionary rule required that the fruits of search incident to arrest (the cocaine and cash) be suppressed [Moore, 272 Va. at 725]. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari [128 S. Ct. 28 (2007)].

Supreme Court Holding in Virginia v. Moore. In Moore, the United States Supreme Court held that "warrantless arrests for crimes committed in the presence of an arresting officer are reasonable under the Constitution, and that while States are free to regulate such arrests however they desire, state restrictions do not alter the Fourth Amendment's protections" [Moore, 128 S. Ct. at 1607]. In reaching this conclusion, the Court examined the historical context of the Fourth Amendment, as well as traditional standards of reasonableness, before finding that although the states are free to afford greater protections to their citizens, "the Constitution's protections concerning search and seizure remain the same" [Moore, 128 S. Ct. at 1605]. The Court was careful to point out that Moore's preferred remedy for the state-law violation was to exclude the evidence, a remedy traditionally reserved for violations of the Fourth Amendment. The Moore Court flatly rejected the argument that violations of state law alone can constitute a Fourth Amendment violation. The Court, wanting to maintain a bright-line standard when assessing Fourth Amendment issues, pointed out that the danger in "linking Fourth Amendment protections to state law would cause them to vary from place to place and from time to time" [Moore, 128 S. Ct. at 1607].

The significance of Moore is better understood in the context of Atwater v. City of Lago Vista [532 U.S. 318, 121 S. Ct. 1536, 149 L. Ed. 2d 549 (2001)], which essentially revived the issue that Moore resolved. Atwater involved a civil rights lawsuit for false arrest after a Lago Vista, Texas, police officer conducted a full custodial arrest of a mother driving with her children in violation of state seatbelt laws and other related offenses. The seatbelt violations were punishable only by fine, and Texas law allowed for citation at the officer's discretion. The issue in Atwater was whether police officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they conducted a full custodial arrest of a person for a minor offense. Stressing the need for uniformity of the Fourth Amendment when applied to serious and minor crimes alike, the Supreme Court held that the Fourth Amendment does not forbid a warrantless arrest for a minor criminal offense, such as misdemeanor seatbelt violation [Atwater, 532 U.S. at 354].

Because Atwater involved a cite-and-release law that was discretionary with the arresting officer, civil rights and criminal defense practitioners began arguing that full custodial arrests of persons for minor citeable offenses, such as Virginia's a suspended driver license law (which mandates citation), were unconstitutional, thus entitling them to constitutional remedies such as exclusion of evidence in criminal cases, or a viable claim for false arrest under the federal Constitution in civil cases. Moore resoundingly rejects the argument.

Impact of Virginia v. Moore on California Civil and Criminal Practice. The Supreme Court's decision in Moore will directly impact California practitioners in both the civil and criminal arenas. California has a cite-and-release law similar to the Virginia law implicated in Moore [see Cal. Penal Code §§ 853.5, 853.6; Cal. Veh. Code § 40303 et seq.]. These laws essentially require police to "cite and release" a person arrested for various minor offenses (both infractions and misdemeanors in California) as long as certain requirements are met.

Before Moore, it was commonplace for plaintiffs to bring civil rights actions under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against police officers and municipalities for "false arrest" in instances where police conducted full custodial arrests of persons for "citeable" offenses. Plaintiffs and their attorneys were aided by financial incentive to argue that a police officer's violation of state law constituted a Fourth Amendment violation, because Section 1983 allows for attorneys' fees to be awarded to a prevailing plaintiff. City attorneys, county counsel, and other attorneys defending police officers and public entities in civil actions frequently argued that no constitutional basis existed for such claims based on Cooper v. California [386 U.S. 58, 87 S. Ct. 788, 17 L. Ed. 2d 730 (1967)] and California v. Greenwood [486 U.S. 35, 108 S. Ct. 1625, 100 L. Ed. 2d 730 (1988)], and later Atwater [532 U.S. 318, 121 S. Ct. 1536, 149 L. Ed. 2d 549 (2001)], all of which rejected similar arguments attempting to assign constitutional magnitude to violations of state procedural arrest laws, or alternatively argued that the arresting officers were entitled to qualified immunity due to the ambiguity in the law. Likewise, criminal defendants would argue for suppression of evidence as a purported Fourth Amendment remedy for violations of state law.

The impact of Moore and Atwater together should end this trend. Now, police officers and public entities will be protected from claims of Fourth Amendment violations if and when they make an arrest that comports with the "reasonableness" standard of a Fourth Amendment analysis, yet violates a state procedural law. However, both Moore and Atwater leave room for plaintiffs to argue that custodial arrests made in violation of state "cite and release" laws give rise to state-law based remedies.

After Moore, criminal defendants will no longer be able to argue for suppression of evidence under the Fourth Amendment and will have to rely strictly on state-court remedies for such violations, to the extent they exist.

Impact of Virginia v. Moore on Qualified Immunity. Another significant impact of the Moore decision for civil practitioners who bring or defend civil rights cases under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is that it strengthens a police officer's argument to the right to qualified immunity. Because the doctrine of qualified immunity applies in those areas where a constitutional right is not clearly defined, Moore highlights the ambiguity faced by police officers confronted with making an arrest that would be legal under the Fourth Amendment, but illegal under state law. Any police officer making such an arrest will clearly enjoy protection from civil suit pursuant to the doctrine of qualified immunity because of the ambiguity in the law before Moore.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Sean F. Connolly is a Deputy City Attorney for the City and County of San Francisco, where he defends the City and San Francisco police officers in civil rights and police misconduct litigation. Before that, Mr. Connolly was General Counsel to the San Francisco Police Officers' Association and a Deputy Public Defender for the City and County of San Francisco.

Mr. Connolly is a 1990 graduate of the University of San Francisco School of Law, and received his undergraduate degree from Boston University in 1986. He is a frequent lecturer on civil rights litigation and trial practice.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

115 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Scallen on New Minnesota E-Discovery Rules

2008 Emerging Issues 2409

Professor Eileen A. Scallen on the New Minnesota E-Discovery Rules: The Times They Are A-Changin

By Eileen A. Scallen

June 23, 2008

SUMMARY: Minnesota amended its rules of civil procedure in 2007 to account for new issues arising from the discovery of ESI. Professor Eileen Scallen examines the impact of the new rules, and reviews Minnesota e-discovery practice.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as. Scallen, Eileen. The New Minnesota E-Discovery Rules: The Times They Are A-Changin. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

There is nothing new under the sun, wrote the sage behind the Book of Ecclesiastes. In the case of electronically stored information (ESI), this maxim is both true and false. Litigants are still free to pursue all of the information and data they have always sought in the myriad kinds of civil cases litigated in Minnesota, but the way that information or data is created, stored, copied, and reproduced has changed significantly in the digital age. Most types of potentially relevant evidence are now created and stored in electronic formats. The range of types of evidence is staggering--calendars, voicemails, emails, spreadsheets, word processing files, and other electronic files of infinite variety. Thus, effective July 1, 2007, Minnesota amended several of its Rules of Civil Procedure to address the growing prevalence e-discovery.

The Scope of E-Discovery

The types of digital information that may be sought in discovery are almost too numerous to name with specificity. Consider the breadth of this definition from an order requiring preservation of ESI in an antitrust case [In re Flash Memory Antitrust Litigation, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 40433 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 22, 2008)]:

Documents, data, and tangible things" shall be interpreted broadly to include writings, records, files, correspondence, reports, memoranda, calendars, diaries, minutes, electronic messages, voice mail, E-mail, telephone message records or logs, computer and network activity logs, hard drives, backup data, removable computer storage media such as tapes, discs and cards, printouts, document image files, Web pages, databases, spreadsheets, software, books, ledgers, journals, orders, invoices, bills, vouchers, check statements, worksheets, summaries, compilations, computations, charts, diagrams, graphic presentations, drawings, films, charts, digital or chemical process photographs, video, phonographic, tape or digital recordings or transcripts thereof, drafts, jottings and notes, studies or drafts of studies or other similar such material. Information that serves to identify, locate, or link such material, such as file inventories, file folders, indices, and metadata, is also included in this definition.

Moreover, litigants and courts face a moving target; innovation leads to new modes of creating and storing ESI, so these categories keep expanding.

The ESI Amendments to the Minnesota Rules of Civil Procedure

Here is the essence of the 2007 amendments to Minnesota Rules of Civil Procedure 16, 26, 33, 34, 37, and 45, dealing with ESI:

. Pretrial Scheduling Issues. Minn. R. Civ. P. 16.02 (Pretrial Conference) and Minn. R. Civ. P. 26.06 (Discovery Conference) allow, but do not require, courts to address ESI issues in the discovery conference and the pretrial scheduling orders. These amendments allow the court to incorporate agreements reached by the parties to minimize the risk of waiver of claims of privilege or work product protection. For example, parties may want to allow documents to be reviewed or sampled, to permit the requesting parties to assess the reasonable need for further production but without prejudice to any privilege claims. The rule amendments authorize the court to incorporate these sneak peek agreements but do not weigh in on whether such peeking could be grounds for waiver of privilege or work product protection.

. Protective Orders and Inadvertent Disclosure. Minn. R. Civ. P. 26.02 contains two significant amendments:

- o The rule permits a responding party to identify ESI that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. If a responding party raises this objection, the party seeking discovery may bring a motion to compel, forcing the responding party to prove the undue burden or cost of accessing the information. Moreover, even if the responding party makes a showing of undue burden or cost, the court has the discretion to order discovery of ESI if the discovering party shows good cause for the ESI under the circumstances or the court can shape an order to minimize the burden on the responding party.

- o The rule creates a procedure for raising claims of privilege after production and directs the discovering party to, sequester, or destroy the material produced, pending a decision by the court on whether protection for the material has been waived through inadvertent disclosure. The rule itself does not create a presumption or a standard for determining whether claims of privilege or work product protection have been waived; those issues are to be determined under existing law.

. Interrogatories. Minn. R. Civ. P. 33.03 allows a party to answer an interrogatory simply by specifying the ESI that contains the answer.

. Production of Documents. Minn. R. Civ. P. 34 contains two revisions:

- o Minn. R. Civ. P. 34.01 allows parties specifically to request ESI for inspection, copying, testing or sampling in addition to requesting documents and things. The testing or sampling provision is especially meaningful in the ESI context; it enables a party to inspect a small subset of requested information to determine whether it is worth pursuing additional or broader discovery.

- o Under Minn. R. Civ. P. 34.02, a party requesting production of ESI may specify the form in which the information is to be produced, otherwise the responding party is directed to produce the ESI in a form in which it is ordinarily maintained or that is reasonably usable. If the responding party objects to the requested form, the responding party must then state the form it plans to use instead. If the parties cannot agree on this issue, the court will resolve the issue.

. Subpoena of ESI Directed to Nonparties. Minn. R. Civ. P. 45 allow for the issuance of subpoenas commanding production of electronically stored information for inspection, copying, testing, or sampling. Although a subpoena may specify the form in which the ESI is to be produced, the responding party need not produce the same ESI in more than one form, and may seek a protective order when production in the specified form would be unduly burdensome.

. Sanctions. Minn. R. Civ. P. 37.05 provides a safe harbor provision that precludes sanctions for spoliation of evidence when loss of ESI is the result of the routine, good faith operation of a computer system. This good faith test does not apply if a responding party with a duty to preserve ESI failed to take reasonable steps to do so.

Case Law to Remember

Minnesota was one of the first states to follow the federal lead in amending its discovery rules to account for ESI. The federal rule amendments became effective December 1, 2006. Minnesotas amended rules were effective July 1, 2007, and have slightly different numbering, but are substantively identical to their federal counterparts (Minnesota does not have a counterpart to the mandatory initial disclosure provisions of Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a), which now encompass ESI). Thus, one can safely predict that Minnesota courts will turn to federal court interpretations of the rules for guidance, for although there are no published Minnesota cases regarding ESI, there is a growing number of federal cases addressing the issues raised by ESI.

Hold Everything! Litigation Holds and Preservation Orders. A fundamental premise of discovery--electronic or otherwise--is that a party to litigation, or someone who reasonably anticipates being a party to litigation, has a duty to preserve relevant evidence that might be useful to an adversary [*E*Trade Sec. LLC v. Deutsche Bank AG*, 230 F.R.D. at 591 (D. Minn. 2005), citing Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. at 217 (S.D.N.Y. 2003)]. The obligation to preserve evidence begins when a party knows or should have known that the evidence is relevant to future or current litigation [*E*Trade Sec. LLC*, 230 F.R.D. at 588]. A party who disregards the obligation to preserve evidence may be punished for spoliation of evidence. Sanctions may include an adverse inference jury instruction, which allows jurors to infer that the material that was destroyed was unfavorable to the party that should have preserved it. Other potential sanctions include issue preclusion or dismissal, or monetary sanctions [see Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16897 (S.D. Cal. 2008) ($8.5 million attorneys fees sanction)].

In the electronic evidence context, the spoliation principle takes on additional significance, since most major companies have a system for preserving information for some period of time, but eventually destroy it, or make it functionally unavailable, pursuant to a document retention policy. Any organization large enough to have a computer network should have a written document retention policy. Such a policy establishes processes to identify, locate, preserve, retrieve, and produce information that may be relevant or required for future litigation [The Sedona Principles: Best Practices Recommendations & Principles for Addressing Electronic Document Production, at 30 (June 2007) (The Sedona Principles)]. Moreover, the policy should state how it relates to the legitimate business purposes of the organization, to avoid any inference of improper destruction of data.

There are two devices used to stem the possibility of intentional or inadvertent spoliation. The first is a litigation hold, which puts a prospective party and its agents on notice that certain types of ESI will be sought in discovery and should be preserved. A litigation hold is typically issued by in-house counsel or litigation counsel and should include the following information [see The Sedona Principles at 32]:

(1) A description of the subject matter of the litigation and the subject matter, dates, and other criteria defining the information to be preserved;

- (2) A statement that relevant electronically stored information and paper documents must be preserved;
- (3) The likely location of relevant information (e.g., network, workstation, laptop, cell phones, blackberries, and other devices);
- (4) The steps that can be followed for preserving the information as may be appropriate (such as the form the data is to be preserved in); and
- (5) A reminder of the significance of the preservation obligations to the recipients.

The description of the material to be preserved and the scope of the preservation are especially crucial, for although a party is required to identify relevant information to future litigation, a company is not required to take heroic efforts far beyond those consistent with [the party's] regular course of business [Convolv, Inc. v. Compaq Computer Corp., 223 F.R.D. at 177 (S.D.N.Y. 2004)].

The second restriction limiting destruction of ESI is a preservation order issued by the court as a direction not to destroy particular classes of information. This is less common because it is a more direct intrusion into the operations of the litigants and can result in undue expense in collecting and maintaining information that may not be vital to the resolution of the dispute. In general, courts should not issue a preservation order over objection unless the party requesting such an order demonstrates its necessity, which may require an evidentiary hearing in some circumstances [The Sedona Principles at 33; see also Advisory Committee Note to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f) (preservation orders should be given only in extraordinary circumstances); Gorgen Co. v. Brecht, 2002 Minn. App. LEXIS 539 (Minn. Ct. App. 2002) (TRO that ordered former employees party to preservation ESI reversed for lack of showing of irreparable harm)].

If a party does destroy ESI, there is the limited safe harbor of Minn. R. Civ. P. 37.05. When the destruction was done in good faith pursuant to a routine document destruction policy, the court will not impose sanctions. This underscores the need for a clearly written document retention policy. Good faith is a highly fact-intensive and discretionary standard. It does not, however, necessarily mean unintentional. A party who accidentally destroys ESI that was subject to a litigation hold or preservation order will face an uphill battle proving that the destruction was in good faith.

Who Pays for E-Discovery? The prevailing rule in American litigation is that parties pay their own expenses in discovery [Oppenheimer Fund, Inc. v. Sanders, 437 U.S. at 358, 98 S. Ct. 2380, 57 L. Ed. 2d 253 (1978)]. However, in the context of electronic discovery, there are situations in which courts will shift the burden of paying for discovery, in whole or in part, to the party seeking production of ESI. The most common scenario for cost-shifting is when a party seeks an unusually large or broad array of material or where the information sought is no longer readily available (through no fault of the responding party) and can be produced only at great expense. Minn. R. Civ. P. 26.02 provides the court with the authority to shape such a cost-shifting discovery order. The most widely used guidelines come from Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC [217 F.R.D. 309 (S.D.N.Y. 2003)].

The discovery dispute in Zubulake, a gender-discrimination case, centered on the production of emails that existed only on backup tapes and other archived forms. The Zubulake factors, in order of importance, are (1) the extent to which the request is specifically tailored to discover relevant information; (2) the availability of the information from other sources; (3) the total cost of production, compared to the amount in controversy; (4) the total cost of production, compared to the resources available to each party; (5) the relative ability of each party to control costs and its incentive to do so; (6) the importance of the issues at stake in the litigation; and (7) the relative benefits to the parties of obtaining the information [Zubulake, 217 F.R.D. at 332; see also Advisory Committee Note to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2) (citing Zubulake factors)]. As with any discovery matter, these issues are subject to an abuse of discretion standard of review.

Coping With E-Discovery Requires Forethought, Planning, and Communication

1. Communicate With the Client. Lawyers cannot afford to ignore e-discovery. Courts will hold counsel overseeing the production of ESI responsible. Counsel should establish a good working relationship with the clients technology staff and review the clients document retention policy with them, stressing the significance of litigation holds.

2. Communicate With Opposing Counsel. The major emphasis of the e-discovery amendments to the Minnesota Rules of Civil Procedure is that ESI issues are best dealt with through consultation, negotiation, and agreement with opposing counsel. The rules for the discovery conference order [Minn. R. Civ. P. 26.05] and pretrial scheduling order [Minn. R. Civ. P. 16.02] both strongly reflect this intent. The rules reinforce the role of planning by their willingness to incorporate agreements by counsel which allow for sampling or quick peeks of information that has not been pre-screened for privilege so discovery can be organized in a cheaper and more efficient manner and for claw-back agreements, which allow for the return of documents discovered to be privileged after production. Although these procedural devices do not alter the rules of selective privilege waiver and inadvertent production, courts will likely modify those doctrines to uphold the value of these agreements to further the goal of cooperative, efficient discovery.

Moreover, courts always want see discovery disputes resolved among the parties without court intervention. This is reflected in the numerous requirements that counsel meet and confer before bringing any motion to compel or motion for a protective order [see e.g., Minn. R. Civ. P. 26.02; Mikron Industries, Inc. v. Hurd Windows and Doors, Inc., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35166 (W.D. Wash. 2008) (denying protective order that would have prevented discovery or imposed cost-shifting because of failure of party to engage in meaningful pre-motion discussions about difficulty of producing responsive ESI, degree to which responding party had searched for ESI to date, and basis for responding partys belief that more detailed search of backup tapes would not produce additional responsive material)].

3. Communicate Candidly With the Court. Although E-discovery may interject new issues arising from a wider range of data available for discovery, some basic litigation truths remain the same. Most fundamental is that courts do not look kindly on behavior that appears to be less than candid with the tribunal [see Afremov v. Amplatz, 2006 Minn. App. Unpub LEXIS 39 (Minn. Ct. App. Jan. 10, 2006) (attorney sanctioned for being untruthful with district court, obstructing discovery, and violating court order; reversed due to procedural due process defects)].

LexisNexis E-Discovery Resources

Moore's Federal Practice (3rd ed.), Ch. 37A, Discovery of Electronically Stored Information (Matthew Bender)

Search lexis.com source Discovery: Mealey's Litigation Report

Search lexis.com source E-Discovery: The Newly Amended Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

LexisNexis Applied Discovery provides electronic discovery services to law firms and corporations:
<http://www.lexisnexis.com/applieddiscovery/electronicDiscovery/litigation.asp>

Other Online Resources

. Rothstein, Hedges, & Wiggins, Managing Discovery of Electronic Information: A Pocket Guide for Judges (Federal Judicial Center 2007), available for download at http://www.fjc.gov/public/pdf.nsf/lookup/eldscpkt.pdf/\$file/eldscpkt.pdf

. Conference of Chief Justices, Guidelines for State Trial Courts Regarding Discovery of Electronically Stored Information (2006), available for download at

http://www.ncsconline.org/WC/Publications/CS_ElDiscCCJGuidelines.pdf

. The Sedona Principles: Best Practices Recommendations & Principles for Addressing Electronic Document Production (2d ed. 2007), available for download at http://www.thesedonaconference.org/content/miscFiles/TSCGlossary_12_07.pdf

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Eileen A. Scallen is currently Professor of Law at William Mitchell College of Law, in St. Paul, Minnesota, and is a former Professor of Law and Associate Academic Dean at the University of California, Hastings College of the Law. She is the primary author of California Evidence Courtroom Manual (Matthew Bender) (with Glen Weissenberger).

Professor Scallen has served as Chair of the American Association of Law Schools, Section on Evidence. She publishes and lectures on legal issues in Civil Procedure, Evidence, and Trial Advocacy. She regularly teaches judges and members of the bar in Minnesota, California, and elsewhere, both within the United States and abroad.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

116 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ferstendig on Miller v. Waters

2008 Emerging Issues 2397

David L. Ferstendig on Miller v. Waters, 51 A.D.3d 113, 853 N.Y.S.2d 183, 2008 N.Y.App. Div LEXIS 1630 (3d Dept 2008)

By David L. Ferstendig

June 18, 2008

SUMMARY: Despite recent amendments to the CPLR, problems with proper commencement of actions persist. As the decision in Miller v. Waters illustrates, only the passage of time and the attention of practitioners will fully resolve the issues.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Ferstendig, David L. Miller v. Waters. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Commencement Problems Persist Despite CPLR Amendments

In 2007, two separate amendments to the CPLR were passed purporting to deal with commencement problems. Nevertheless, in Miller v. Waters, 853 N.Y.S.2d 183, 2008 N.Y.App. Div LEXIS 1630 (3d Dept 2008), the Third Department dismissed the action based on a commencement defect, finding that one of the amendments was inapplicable and the other was not in effect. Thus, practitioners must await further pronouncements to determine whether the 2007 legislation has effectively eliminated, or even reduced, the possibility of the harsh result of the dismissal of actions based on technical commencement defects.

The 2007 Amendments. Two significant amendments were passed in 2007 aimed at dealing with commencement problems:

1. An amendment effective January 1, 2008 (L 2007, ch. 125) attempted to clear up the ambiguities of CPLR 304, 305, 1007, and 2102 and to avoid a trap for unwary counsel concerning where papers should be filed for commencement purposes. The amendment, which was originally introduced years before in response to the decision in Mendon Ponds Neighborhood Assn v. Dehm, 98 N.Y.2d 745, 751 N.Y.S.2d 819, 781 N.E.2d 883 (2002), confirms, among other things, that the initiating pleadings should be filed with the county clerk. Significantly, the amendment provides that:

A paper filed in accordance with the rules of the chief administrator or any local rule or practice established by the court shall be deemed filed. Where such rules or practice allow for the filing of a paper other than at the office of the clerk of the court, such paper shall be transmitted to the clerk of the court. CPLR 2102 (b); and

A clerk shall not refuse to accept for filing any paper presented for that purpose except where specifically directed to do so by statute or rules promulgated by the chief administrator of the courts, or order of the court. CPLR 2102(c).

2. CPLR 2001 was amended (L 2007, ch. 529, eff. 8/15/07) to provide a court with discretion to correct or ignore mistakes in the commencement process that do not prejudice the opposing party. This amendment brings these mistakes in line with other non-prejudicial procedural events already covered by CPLR 2001. The amended statute specifically refers to defects in filing and the failure to purchase an index number. In the case of a failure to pay an index number fee, the court will have to condition the denial of a motion to dismiss on plaintiffs payment of the proper fee. Significantly, the sponsors memorandum specifically noted that the amendment did not:

- a. excuse a complete failure to file within the statute of limitations;
- b. excuse a plaintiff or petitioner from having to actually file a summons and complaint or petition in order to properly commence an action;
- c. excuse a bare summons, because that would not constitute a filing;
- d. intend to overrule the Court of Appeals decision in Parker v. Mack, 61 N.Y.2d 114, 472 N.Y.S.2d 882, 460 N.E.2d 1316 (1984).

See Ferstendig Expert Commentary on the 2007 CPLR Amendments Clarifying Rules Regarding Filing of Papers to Commence Action.

The Facts in Miller. In Miller, the petitioner commenced a proceeding in the County Court seeking to find the respondent in contempt, both civilly and criminally, for violating a Court order in a prior criminal action. After hearings began, the respondent moved for summary judgment asserting, among other things, that the proceeding was never properly commenced. It was undisputed that the petitioner did not obtain an index number or pay the necessary filing fee at the time of commencement although the fee was later paid. Moreover, petitioners papers were improperly filed at the office of the administrative clerk of the Supreme and County Courts, rather than the Chemung County Clerk.

The Defect as to the Failure Timely to Pay the Index Number Fee Was Waived. The Miller court found that the respondent had waived his objection to the defect in filing with the wrong clerk:

Here, respondent acquiesced to these deficiencies by failing to object or move for dismissal on these grounds in his answer and by fully participating in the litigation on the merits, including filing of papers and participating in several hearings over the course of approximately two years before moving to dismiss. Accordingly, under the law as it existed in November 2006 when County Court rendered a decision on respondent's motion to dismiss, a finding that respondent waived objections to petitioner's failure to obtain an index number and timely pay the required fee was appropriate.

In addition, the court found that the amendment to CPLR 2001, passed August 15, 2007 and effective immediately, increased a courts discretion to forgive such filing errors. Courts now have discretion to permit a defect to be corrected, even where timely objected to, including the failure to purchase or acquire an index number or other mistake in the filing process.

853 N.Y.S.2d 183, 185.

But the Filing Defect was Non-Waivable. The petitioner was not out of the woods yet. There still was that nasty filing defect: the failure to file the papers with the proper clerk. Here, the Miller court found that the amendment to CPLR 2001 and the inherent discretion awarded a court to forgive errors did not apply to the filing defect. The court characterized such a defect as one that impacted the courts subject matter jurisdiction and, thus, was non-waivable. The court pointed to the sponsors memorandum which listed three cases: Harris v. Niagara Falls Bd. of Educ., 6 N.Y.3d 155, 811 N.Y.S.2d 299, 844 N.E.2d 753 (2006), Gershel v. Porr, 89 N.Y.2d 327, 653 N.Y.S.2d 82, 675 N.E.2d 836 (1996), and Fry v. Village of Tarrytown, 89 N.Y.2d 714, 658 N.Y.S.2d 205, 680 N.E.2d 578 (1997). The court stated that each of these cases involved waivable commencement defects. Significantly, the court noted that the decision in Mendon Ponds, supra, was not mentioned. Moreover, the memorandum specifically stated that the legislation was not intended to overrule the Court of Appeals decision in Parker v. Mack, 61 N.Y.2d 114, 472 N.Y.S.2d 882, 460 N.E.2d 1316 (1984), where the Court found that the failure to include the requisite notice in a summons (a bare summons) was a nonwaivable defect which the Miller court again characterized as impacting the courts subject matter jurisdiction. While that characterization may be misplaced--the Parker majority expressly distinguished the commencement defect there from one going to subject matter jurisdiction--the Miller courts point was that a Mendon Ponds type defect was not the type of error the court could forgive even under the amended version of CPLR 2001.

But How About the Mendon Ponds Amendment? It would seem, however, that the amendments to CPLR 304, 306-a and 2102, expressly passed to resolve the Mendon Ponds type filing defect involved in the action, should have provided relief. However, the Miller court noted correctly in a footnote that the amendments were applicable only to actions or proceedings commenced on or after January 1, 2008, and thus could not save petitioners case.

Practice Considerations. Hopefully, Miller type situations will become rare as time passes and the Mendon Ponds amendment applies to more and more actions and proceedings. The two amendments passed in 2007 were intended to permit courts to look past commencement defects so that cases could be decided more properly on the merits.

For additional discussion of these issues, see New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 304.01 (Action or Proceeding Commenced by Filing); New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 304.02 (Action Commenced by Filing Summons; Special Proceeding Commenced by Filing); New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 2102.01 (No General Filing Requirement); New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 305.02 (Title Must Include Name of Court, Basis of Venue and Index Number); New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 306-a.01 (Index Number Secured at Time of Filing); Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 3.10-a (Commencing the action-filing and service); LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 1.03 (Commencing Action by Filing in Supreme Court or County Court).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David L. Ferstendig, currently a member of the Law Offices of David L. Ferstendig, LLC, New York, was a founding officer of the law firm Breindel & Ferstendig, P.C. He litigates a spectrum of civil and corporate matters, including: contract, products liability, environmental, toxic torts, reinsurance and insurance issues, and trade secrets. Mr. Ferstendig is also an adjunct law professor at New York Law School, where he teaches New York Practice. In addition to being a member of the Weinstein, Korn and Miller Editorial Board, he is the author of the LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation, the Editor of the CPLR Manual, a General Editor and author of CPLR Practice Insights in New York Consolidated Law Service, and an update author of Timetable for New York Civil Practice from LexisNexis. He is also the Chair of the Civil Practice Law and Rules Committee of the New York State Bar Association. Mr. Ferstendig has lectured on civil practice issues for bar associations, the New York State Judicial Institute, and LexisNexis.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

117 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Eli Wald on Sample v. Morgan, 935 A.2d 1046 (Del. Ch. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2384

Eli Wald on Law Firms Exposure to Personal Jurisdiction in Delaware for Filing a Corporate Instrument in Delaware

By Eli Wald

June 12, 2008

SUMMARY: May a corporate lawyer and her law firm be sued in Delaware as to claims arising out of their actions in providing advice and services to a Delaware public corporation, its directors, and its managers regarding matters of Delaware corporate law? In Sample v. Morgan the Delaware court of chancery took a first step in answering the question in the affirmative. This Commentary studies the case and its implications for corporate lawyers.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

May a corporate lawyer and her law firm be sued in Delaware as to claims arising out of their actions in providing advice and services to a Delaware public corporation, its directors, and its managers regarding matters of Delaware corporate law? In Sample v. Morgan the Delaware court of chancery took a first step in answering the question in the affirmative, holding that a law firm involved in filing a corporate instrument in Delaware is subject to personal jurisdiction in Delaware. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, studies the case and its implications for corporate lawyers.

Factual Background

Randall Bearings, Inc. (RBI) is an Ohio-headquartered bronze ball bearings entity incorporated in Delaware. Following the death of the entity's founder and largest stock-holder, the three Top Managers of RBI, concerned that the deceased's stock would fall into hands unfriendly to them, implemented a two-prong scheme to ensure their control over the entity. First, they arranged the sale of the deceased's 127,442 shares to an entity friendly to management. Id. at 1050-51. Second, the Top Managers had the entity distribute to them 200,000 shares at a nominal price of $200. Id. at 1049-52. Taken together, the two measures placed a majority of RBI's voting power under the control and influence of the Top Managers.

In executing the scheme to obtain voting control, the Top Managers were allegedly advised and aided by Mr. Boeckman, an attorney with the law firm of Baker & Hostetler, which was being paid at all relevant times by RBI to act as its outside counsel.

Importantly, when Mr. Boeckman advised the board regarding the scheme, he never disclosed the extent of his involvement with, and advice to the Top Managers. With regard to the sale of the late founders shares, Boeckman immersed himself in the negotiations over the terms of the sale and had the Top Managers execute a Term Sheet reflecting an agreement in principle with the sole owner of [the entity friendly to management]. Id. at 1050. The Term Sheet contained side arrangements meant to confer voting control on Top Management. Id. at 1051. When Mr. Boeckman reported the sale to the board, he vaguely stated that The companys participation in the transaction was solely to facilitate the transaction. Id. (internal citation omitted). The court noted: it is not clear how informed the only non-management director in attendance was about these side arrangements. Id.

Similarly, Mr. Boeckman advised the board to approve the distribution of shares. The court noted that When the Randall Bearings board approved the Certificate Amendment [a measure lowering the par value of the entitys stock from $1.00 to $000.1, to allow the Top Managers to receive the 200,000 share distribution at a cost of $200 as opposed to $200,000] and the Equity Incentive Plan [purporting to attract[] and retain[] key employees, Id. at 1051, but in fact authorizing shares designed to be distributed to the Top Managers] some months later, neither the Top Managers nor Boeckman--who was acting as the boards counsel--disclosed [Boeckmans involvement with and advice to the Top Managers]. Id. at 104849.

Subsequent to obtaining board approval of the two-prong scheme, Mr. Boeckman assisted the Top Managers obtain shareholder approval. Id. at 1051. Criticizing the deficient disclosure to the shareholders, the court tellingly observed:

The proxy statement is remarkable in what it did not say. It told the Randall Bearings stockholders that the purpose of the Equity Incentive Plan was to enable the company to attract[] and retain[] key employees. But it failed to mention that the Top Managers already contemplated that all 200,000 shares would be granted to the Top Managers, leaving no shares left for the attract[ion] of anyone, and no shares left to help retain[] any but the three Top Managers on the board itself. Likewise, the proxy statement failed to disclose anything about the contractual arrangements Randall Bearings had entered into with [the friendly entity] As important, the proxy statement did not disclose that [the friendly entity] and the Top Managers would, if their plans were implemented, control over 50% of the companys voting power.

Id. at 1051.

After the stockholders approved the scheme in a close vote, a Baker & Hostetler paralegal under the supervision of Mr. Boeckman drafted the necessary Certificate Amendment and a local service company engaged by Baker & Hostetler filed it in Delaware. Id. at 1052, 1054.

Procedural Background

Plaintiff-shareholder argued defendant-directors breached their fiduciary duty by implementing a scheme to entrench themselves in office and to self-enrich at the expense of the shareholders. Rejecting defendant-directors motion to dismiss, the court of chancery noted that defendant-directors scheme was facilitated by the advice of Boeckman. Id. at 1052. Subsequently, plaintiff sought to amend the complaint to state claims for aiding and abetting breaches of fiduciary duty against Boeckman and Baker & Hostetler. Boeckman and Baker & Hostetler moved to dismiss the claims against them based solely on the ground of lack of personal jurisdiction over them. Id. at 105253.

The Pertinent Question

May a corporate lawyer and her law firm be sued in Delaware as to claims arising out of their actions in providing advice and services to a Delaware public corporation, its directors, and its managers regarding matters of Delaware corporate law, and in particular in filing a corporate instrument in Delaware?

The Decision

The court explained that in considering a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction it must address two questions: whether there is a statutory basis for serving the defendant with process; and whether the courts exercise of jurisdiction over the defendant would be consistent with the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at 1056.

(1) The statutory basis for exercising personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state law firm in Delaware. Mr. Boeckman and Baker & Holstetler were served under Delaware's long-arm statute, 10 Del. C. §3104. That statute provides in relevant part:

(c) As to a cause of action brought by any person arising from any of the acts enumerated in this section, a court may exercise personal jurisdiction over any nonresident who in person or through an agent:

(1) Transacts any business or performs any character of work or service in the State; [or]

(3) Causes tortious injury in the State by an act or omission in this State...

The Delaware Supreme Court has held that the long-arm statute is to be construed broadly. Id. at 1056 (citations omitted).

Defendant-law firm argued that it did not transact any business or perform any work in Delaware because all of the legal work it performed was done in its offices outside of Delaware. Id. at 1055. The court rejected this claim on the face of the facts, finding that [d]iscovery has since revealed that Boeckman and Baker & Holstetler themselves prepared and sent the Certificate Amendment to [a local service company] in Delaware for filing with the Secretary of State. Id. at 1057. As a matter of law, the court held that The involvement of a defendant in arranging, either directly or through an agent such as [a service company], for filing of a corporate instrument in Delaware that facilitated transactions under challenge in litigation in this court has been repeatedly recognized as sufficient to constitute the transaction of business under §3104(c)(1). Id. at 1057 (citations omitted).

In reaching its conclusion the court explicitly rejected the defendant-law firm argument that because the Certificate Amendment was formally filed by the corporation itself, and not by the law firm, it was immunized from liability. The court reasoned that the underlying conduct almost always involves formal action of the corporation itself, Id. at 1059, and concluded that [s]uch an accountability-destroying reading of the long-arm statute would itself be entirely disloyal to the statute's purpose. Id. at 1060.

Next, the court turned its attention to subsection §3104(c)(3). It found that the defendant-law firm's filing of the Certificate Amendment in Delaware injured RBI, a Delaware corporation, thus satisfying the long-arm statute. Id. at 1057. The court explained that when conspirators, for example, managers and their lawyers, commit a breach of a fiduciary duty against a Delaware corporation that causes cognizable injury to the entity, here the scheme to ensure voting control, the corporation was injured in its chosen home. Id. at 1057-58.

The defendant-law firm argued that case law in other jurisdictions supports the proposition that attorneys cannot be sued simply for performing services for a client if all that the lawyers get out of those services is a fee. Id. at 106061. In other words, the law firm argued that lawyers acting in their official capacity as lawyers are incapable, as a matter of law, of conspiring with the corporation-client. Accordingly, the law firm could not have conspired with the Top Managers to cause a tortious injury in Delaware.

The court rejected the argument on two separate grounds. First, it held that while in some instances it makes little sense to describe the officers or agents of a corporation as conspiring with the entity, Id. at 1061, the conspiracy in this case was among the Top Managers, allegedly with the assistance of the law firm, and, importantly, did not include RBI itself. Thus, the entity did not conspire with its Top Managers, or with the law firm. Second, the court pointed out that the law firm was not acting within the appropriate scope of its agency. Id. at 1062. Rather than serving the interests of RBI as its outside counsel, the law firm was allegedly aiding the Top Managers at the expense of RBI.

Consequently, Mr. Boeckman and the law firm were appropriately served pursuant to §3104(c)(1) and §3104(c)(3).

(2) The Due Process constraint on the exercise of personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state law firm in Delaware.

The United Supreme Court has held that a long-arm statute may exercise personal jurisdiction over an out-of-state defendant when that defendant should have reasonably anticipated that his actions might result in the forum state exercising personal jurisdiction over him in order to adjudicate disputes arising from those actions. Id. at 106263. The test is not one of physical presence in the state, but rather one of reasonable foreseeability. Id.

Applying the test, the court found that the law firm should have reasonably anticipated being subject to personal jurisdiction in Delaware. The court noted that Baker & Holstetler advertised itself as a national and even international law firm with a coast-to-coast platform, regularly engaged in advising public corporations in matters of corporate and securities law, Id. at 1063, and, in particular, purported to provide a wide range of advice to the officers and board of a Delaware corporation about important issues of Delaware law. Id. at 1064. As a sophisticated practitioner of corporate law, the court opined, the law firm should have foreseen that Delaware would have an important interest in regulating the internal affairs of its corporations. Given these realities, the court concluded, it is difficult to conceive how it would shock the conscience to require the moving defendants to defend a lawsuit in Delaware. Id. Indeed, [f]or a sophisticated counsel to argue that they did not realize that acting as the de facto outside general counsel to a Delaware corporation and regularly providing advice about Delaware law about matters important to that corporation and its stockholders might expose it to this courts jurisdiction fails the straight-face test. Id. at 1065.

Analysis

The chancery court drafted its opinion narrowly. To be clear, it did not hold generally that a corporate lawyer and her law firm can be sued in Delaware as to claims arising out of their actions in providing advice and services to a Delaware public corporation, its directors, and its managers regarding matters of Delaware corporate law. Instead, the court limited its holding to circumstances where a law firm files a corporate instrument in Delaware and faces well-pled allegations of having aided and abetted top managers in breaching their fiduciary duties.

Indeed, the court explicitly stated that it did not believe its holding will deter out-of-state law firms from providing advice to Delaware corporations fearing that they will be regularly hauled into Delaware court. This is a highly unusual case stated the court. In most fiduciary duty cases, it will be exceedingly difficult for plaintiffs to state an aiding and abetting claim against corporate counsel. Id. at 1065.

The courts reassuring language notwithstanding, Sample v. Morgan does open the personal jurisdiction door and may give some out-of-state law firms pause regarding providing legal advice about Delaware corporate law to Delaware corporations. While the court is correct in pointing out that pleading lawyers aiding and abetting facts is usually a daunting task for plaintiffs, this pleading hurdle seems to be more applicable to §3104(c)(3), and less so to §3104(c)(1). On its face, all that subsection §3104(c)(1) requires is transaction of any business or performance of any service in Delaware, and the courts broad reading of the states long-arm statute may mean that a corporate lawyer and her law firm can be sued in Delaware as to claims arising out of their actions in merely providing advice and services to a Delaware public corporation, its directors, and its managers regarding matters of Delaware corporate law, on the ground that providing legal advice about Delaware corporate law to a Delaware corporation constitutes the performance of service in the state.

The courts own analysis lends some support for this broad reading of personal jurisdiction. The court reasoned: [t]he precise circumstances when corporate advisors should be deemed responsible to the corporation or its stakeholders for their role in advising directors and officers should be determined by decisions addressing the merits of aiding and abetting claims, not by decisions about motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. Id. at 1065. In other words, the court seems to be suggesting that the liability of lawyers for providing legal advice about Delaware law to a Delaware corporation, its officer and directors should be determined on the merits, not on the formalities of personal jurisdiction.

Practice Tip #1. The filing of a corporate instrument by an out-of-state law firm in Delaware avails it to personal jurisdiction in Delaware pursuant to the states long-arm statute, even if the law firm has no offices in Delaware and the drafting of the instrument took place outside of Delaware.

Practice Tip #2. The preparation, drafting of or arranging of Delaware corporate instruments by an out-of-state law firm avails it to personal jurisdiction in Delaware pursuant to the states long-arm statute, even if the law firm does not directly file the instrument but engages an agent to file the instrument in Delaware.

Practice Tip #3. A law firm advising a Delaware corporation, its officers and directors about Delaware corporate law may be subject to the risk of personal jurisdiction in Delaware. While Sample v. Morgan did not hold that mere advising on Delaware corporate law will subject an out-of-state law firm to personal jurisdiction in Delaware, the case indicates the willingness of Delaware courts to construe the states long-arm statute broadly, and decide the liability of the out-of-state law firm on the merits, as opposed to on the procedural ground of personal jurisdiction.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

118 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Eli Wald on Hybrid Fee Arrangements

2008 Emerging Issues 2383

Eli Wald on Hybrid Fee Arrangements: Compton v. Kittleson, 171 P.3d 172 (Alaska 2007)

By Eli Wald

June 12, 2008

SUMMARY: In Compton v. Kittleson the Alaska Supreme Court explored the propriety of hybrid fee arrangements. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, summarizes the pertinent legal issues decided by the Court.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

In Compton v. Kittleson the Alaska Supreme Court explored the propriety of hybrid fee arrangements. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, summarizes the pertinent legal issues decided by the Court.

Factual Background

Clients sought to retain Mr. Kittleson to represent them in a consumer protection action. Attorney Kittleson proposed a hybrid fee arrangement consisting of a contingency-fee and an hourly-fee. The default fee would be thirty-three percent of any recovery but would automatically convert to an hourly-fee if the clients were to settle the case for an amount that would compensate Mr. Kittleson less than $175 per hour for time invested in the case. The clients agreed to the proposed fee agreement. Compton, at 174.

While the clients case was pending, Mr. Kittleson sought an informal ethics opinion from the Alaska Bar Association regarding the propriety of the hybrid fee arrangement. Bar Counsel opined that the arrangement, hinging on whether the clients agreed to settle, had the potential to significantly inhibit the clients exercise of his or her right to settle a matter, and therefore would likely be reduced, by a fee arbitration panel in case of a dispute, to the contingency component of thirty-three percent of recovery. Id.

Shortly thereafter the defendant offered to settle the case for $25,000. Mr. Kittleson explained to his clients that since his hourly fees to date exceeded $30,000, acceptance of the settlement offer would trigger the hourly-fee component of the hybrid fee arrangement and would leave the clients with no recovery. While advising the clients about the Bar Associations informal opinion, Mr. Kittleson recommended they reject the settlement offer and the clients followed his advice. Id. at 17475.

In trial defendant prevailed on all counts. Moreover, since the clients rejected its pretrial offer, defendant successfully moved for award of costs and attorneys fees pursuant to Alaska Civil Rule of Procedure 68 and AS 09.30.065. The award forced clients to file for bankruptcy. Id. at 175.

Procedural Background

Bankruptcy Trustee Compton filed a malpractice lawsuit against Mr. Kittleson arguing that the hybrid fee arrangement was prohibited by Alaska law. The parties stipulated that no issues of fact were in dispute. Trustee Compton moved for summary judgment and Mr. Kittleson sought dismissal of the complaint. The trial court dismissed the case holding that the plain language of the hybrid fee agreement did not violate Alaska law. Trustee Compton appealed to the Alaska Supreme Court. Id.

Pertinent Legal Questions

- (1) Are hybrid fee agreements generally permissible under Alaska law?
- (2) May hybrid fee arrangements hinge on the clients decision to settle? In other words, may the clients decision to settle the case trigger a conversion from a contingency-fee to an hourly-fee?
- (3) May hybrid fee agreements, once converted from contingency-fee to hourly-fee, retroactively charge a client for work previously performed by the attorney?

The Decision

(1) Hybrid Fee Arrangements Are Permissible Under Alaska Law. The Court held that Alaska Rule of Professional Conduct 1.5, which regulates attorneys fees, implicitly authorizes hybrid fee arrangements. Id. at 176. Rule 1.5 states in relevant part: A fee agreement which is in whole or in part contingent shall be in writing and shall state the method by which the fee is to be determined Alaska R. Prof. Conduct 1.5(c) (emphasis added). The Court further noted that its holding allowing hybrid fee arrangements reflects the prevailing law in other jurisdictions. Compton, at 176 (citations omitted).

(2) Hybrid Fee Arrangements May Not Hinge On A Clients Decision to Settle. Assessing the particular type of the hybrid fee arrangement utilized by Mr. Kittleson, one in which the hourly-fee alternative was triggered by the clients decision to settle, the Court turned its attention to Rule 1.2, and held that a fundamental aspect of the attorney-client relationship is that the client, as principal, is responsible for setting the objectives of the relationship and has the ultimate authority over decisions relating to the relationship. In particular, a client has the right to decide whether to settle a case, and an attorney cannot demand that the client relinquish that right. Id. at 176. Because the client has the right to determine whether to settle a case, courts have consistently declined to enforce fee arrangements that give lawyers control over settlement. Id. at 177-78. Consequently, hybrid fee agreements that hinge on a client's decision whether to settle a case are invalid.

(3) Hybrid Fee Arrangements May Not, Once Converted From Contingency-Fee To Hourly-Fee, Retroactively Charge A Client For Work Previously Performed. The Court further noted that the fee agreement in question was further tainted by the fact that once the conversion from contingency-fee to hourly-fee was triggered, it operated retroactively to encompass all work performed by Mr. Kittleson from the inception of the case. The impact of this fee surprise, the court held, is compounded by the predictable difficulty of forecasting the effects of the fee-conversion provision. Id. at 179. The client's lack of sophistication prevented them from appreciating the risks and benefits of the fee provision. The impact of the retroactive obligation to pay for work already performed by Mr. Kittleson but never before charged to the clients, an obligation largely incalculable at the inception of the attorney-client relationship, rendered the fee conversion provision at issue impermissible.

Analysis

Hybrid fee arrangements are generally permissible. See, City of Burlington v. Dague, 505 U.S. 557, 560 (1992) (Fees for legal services in litigation may be either certain or contingent (or some hybrid of the two)). As Professor Charles Silver has argued: [Rules of professional conduct] recognize that lawyers and clients employ diverse approaches to compensation, including hourly rates, contingent percentages, flat fees, salaries, and hybrid arrangements, and they admit the propriety of applying different criteria to different arrangements. Charles Silver, Due Process and the Lodestar Method: You Can't Get There From Here, 74 Tul. L. Rev. 1809, 1824 (2000). See also, Peter D. Zeughauser, The Use of Alternative Fee Arrangements to Achieve Smart Results and Improve Outside Counsel Relationships, 871 PLI/Corp 47, 71 (1994) (To optimize the value of alternative fee arrangements, so they provide incentives and allocate risk it is frequently best, and even necessary, to craft a hybrid fee arrangement. This can be done in litigation and transaction work). The propriety of hybrid fee arrangements is measured by the general reasonableness requirement. See, e.g., American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, R. 1.5(a).

The Court's admonition that hybrid fee arrangements may not hinge on a client's decision whether to settle the case is consistent with the general principle that the client is responsible for the objectives of the attorney-client relationship. See generally, American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, R. 1.2(a). Using the client's decision to settle the case as the fee-conversion trigger unduly deprives the client the ability to freely determine the objectives of the case. See, Wis. State Bar Prof'l Ethics Comm., Formal Op. E-82-5 (1982); Neb. State Bar Assn Lawyers Advisory Comm., Formal Op. 95-1 (1995); Colo. Bar Assn Ethics Comm., Formal Op. 100 (1997).

Practice Tip #1. Subject to the general reasonableness requirement, see generally, American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, R. 1.5(a), attorneys may utilize hybrid fee arrangements. Hybrid fee agreements, however, may not hinge on the client's decision whether to settle the case because such a trigger infringes on the client's inherent authority over the objectives of the attorney-client relationship. See generally, American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, R. 1.2(a).

The Alaska Supreme Court's holding in Compton v. Kittleson that a hybrid fee arrangement cannot, once converted from a contingency-fee to an hourly-fee, retroactively charge a client for work already performed by the attorney (while the attorney-client relationship was governed by the contingency-fee provision) is a reasonable, yet not inevitable under the Alaska and American Bar Association rules of professional conduct.

The Court found that it seems unlikely, too, that the attorney-client agreement between Kittleson and the [clients], with a single sentence devoted to the fee-conversion, satisfies an attorneys duty to fully explain the terms of a fee agreement in such a way that the client can understand. Compton, at 179 (citation omitted). On the facts of the case, because the operation of the hybrid fee agreement, and, in particular, of the conversion formula, was not explained to the clients in sufficient detail, retroactively charging the clients an hourly-fee for work performed before the agreement converted to an hourly-fee arrangement was appropriately disallowed.

Generally, however, consistent with the doctrine of attorney-client communications, see, American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct, R. 1.4(b); Eli Wald, Taking Attorney-Client Communications (And Therefore Clients) Seriously, 42 U. S. F. L. Rev. 747 (2008), an attorney can explain a fee conversion formula to the client in sufficient detail and keep the client apprised of hours spent on the case even while the fee agreement is governed by a contingency-fee provision, such that in the event of conversion to an hourly-fee provision the client will not be surprised by the overall fees charged. Whether retroactively charging a client for hours worked once the fee arrangement converts from a contingency-fee to an hourly-fee is reasonable given specific facts thus becomes a question of fact. Relevant considerations include, inter alia, the extent of explanation provided by the attorney to the client regarding the hybrid fee formula and the clients level of sophistication.

Example #1. On January 1st client and attorney execute a hybrid fee agreement. On April 1st, pursuant to the provisions of the fee agreement, the fee converts from a contingency fee to an hourly-fee. Between January 1st and April 1st the lawyer spent 100 hours on the case. The lawyer may charge the client retroactively for the 100 hours she spent between January 1st and April 1st if: (1) the provisions of the fee agreement entitle the lawyer to charge for work performed prior to the conversion; (2) the provisions of the fee agreement were explained to the client in sufficient detail; (3) the client was kept apprised of the number of hours the lawyer worked in the case; and (4) the fee charged by the lawyer is reasonable given the circumstances.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

119 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Vairo on ConnectU LLC v Zuckerberg

2008 Emerging Issues 2361

Vairo on ConnectU LLC v Zuckerberg

By Georgene Vairo

June 10, 2008

SUMMARY: In ConnectU LLC v. Zuckerberg, the First Circuit addresses whether an amended complaint that switches the basis of the district courts jurisdiction from diversity of citizenship to federal question confers jurisdiction when filed as of right before any jurisdictional challenge has been mounted. This Emerging Issues Analysis, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, discusses the opinions practical significance.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: ConnectU LLC v. Zuckerberg, 522 F.3d 82, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 7064 (1st Cir. Apr. 3, 2008), involves an arcane subject matter jurisdiction issue: whether an amended complaint that switches the basis of the district court's subject matter jurisdiction from diversity of citizenship (28 U.S.C. § 1332(a)(1)) to federal question (28 U.S.C. § 1331) confers jurisdiction when filed as of right before any jurisdictional challenge has been mounted. This is a significant case because it raises a question of first impression at the federal appellate level and because it sets two established subject matter jurisdictional principles on a collision course. Who knew that Facebook that spectacularly successful communications creature could create such a jurisdictional enigma, as the First Circuit labeled the problem before it?

Facts. In a Harvard College dormitory room, several undergraduates (the Founders), hatched the idea of creating a social networking website for college students. Unschooled in the programming expertise needed to develop their ideas, they asked Mark Zuckerberg to help them complete the proposed website's source code. Zuckerberg agreed. However, according to the Founders, he failed to carry out the assignment and, unbeknownst to them, stole their idea, business plan, and rudimentary source code to launch a competing social networking website. By the time that the Founders learned of what Zuckerberg had done, they had completed the source code through other means and inaugurated their own social networking website renamed connectU.com. Meanwhile, Zuckerberg's venture, known as facebook.com, had obtained a huge head start in user traffic.

Procedural Background. On September 2, 2004, ConnectU LLC, a Delaware limited liability company (the LLC) commenced an action in the federal district court alleging diversity of citizenship against Zuckerberg, five other defendants, and Facebook itself. The complaint asserted a gallimaufry of state-law claims arising from the alleged misappropriation and unauthorized use of the LLC's confidential source code and business plan.

On October 28, 2004 approximately two weeks after registering a copyright for its website's source code with the United States Copyright Office and before any responsive pleading was filed by the defendants the LLC served an amended complaint. The amended complaint added a corporate affiliate of Facebook as a defendant and introduced two new statements of claim, including a federal-law claim for copyright infringement. The jurisdictional allegation now rested on the existence of a federal question over the newly asserted copyright infringement claim, and supplemental jurisdiction, under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a), over the state-law claims.

Almost one year later, the defendants moved to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, arguing that the parties to the original complaint were not completely diverse. According to the defendants, the only complaint that mattered was the original one alleging diversity jurisdiction, not the amended complaint that alleged federal question jurisdiction.

Comment. Although the subject matter jurisdiction was made a year after the case was initially filed, it was not untimely. An absence of subject matter jurisdiction can be raised by any party or the court at any time. Two rules suggested that the motion could be granted: First, the First Circuit, like most others, has ruled that the citizenship of a limited liability company is to be determined by the citizenship of all its members [see Pramco, LLC v. San Juan Bay Marina, Inc., 435 F.3d 51 (1st Cir. 2006)]. Second, the Supreme Court has announced a time-of-filing rule: the existence of subject matter jurisdiction must be measured by the facts as existing at the time the complaint is filed [see Grupo Dataflux v. Atlas Global Group L.P., 541 U.S. 567, 570-571, 124 S. Ct. 1920, 158 L. Ed. 2d 866 (2004)]. Because one of the Founders, who was a member of the LLC at the time the suit was originally filed, and the defendant Zuckerberg, were both alleged to be citizens of New York, there would be no diversity jurisdiction. After holding a protracted evidentiary hearing, the magistrate judge recommended that the motion to dismiss be granted, essentially agreeing with the defendants that the original complaint controlled. The district judge adopted the decision, dismissed the case and the appeal followed. So, the issue for the First Circuit was whether the original or the amended complaint controlled.

Was it an Amended or Supplemental Complaint? Before reaching the arcane subject matter jurisdiction issue, the First Circuit delved into an esoteric bit of nomenclature. There is an open question as to whether an amended complaint asserting a cause of action that arose only after the prior complaint was filed should be regarded as a "supplemental" rather than an "amended" complaint. An amended complaint relates to matters that had taken place prior to the date of the original pleading [see Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)]. A supplemental complaint, on the other hand, relates to transactions or occurrences or events which happened since the date of the original pleading [see Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(d)]. The distinction matters because, under Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a), an amended complaint can be filed "as a matter of course" under certain circumstances; while a supplemental complaint cannot. Because none of the parties or courts below noticed the nomenclature issue, however, the First Circuit ruled that any problem arising out of the possible status of the second pleading was waived.

Comment. The distinction may or may not have mattered had it been pursued in the district court. Although the copyright registration took place after the original complaint was filed, the rights may have preexisted the filing. Had the pleading actually been properly characterized as a supplemental pleading, the First Circuits subject matter jurisdiction analysis could have been quite different, as the discussion below demonstrates. The court adumbrates two lines of analysis to find that subject matter jurisdiction exists.

Should the Case be Viewed as a Diversity Case or a Federal Question Case? According to the plaintiff, the amended complaint superseded the original complaint and rendered it functus officio as the First Circuit put it. Unquestionably, an amended pleading may be filed "once as a matter of course at any time before a responsive pleading is served" [Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)]. Nonetheless, the defendants argued that an action originally filed under diversity jurisdiction must live or die from a jurisdictional standpoint as of the time of filing regardless of subsequent changes. The First Circuit agreed with the plaintiff that the amended complaint controlled and that its assertion of federal question jurisdiction sufficed.

The First Circuit found that its ruling was substantially supported by a recent Supreme Court decision. In Rockwell International Corp. v. United States, 127 S. Ct. 1397, 1409, 167 L. Ed. 2d 190 (2007), the Court stated that "when a plaintiff files a complaint in federal court and then voluntarily amends the complaint, courts look to the amended complaint to determine jurisdiction." However, the Court in Rockwell was dealing with totally different issues and it made the statement in a footnote, citing two lower court cases.

As the First Circuit realized, however, the issue was complicated by a line of authority headed by Grupo Dataflux which reaffirmed the time-of-filing rule. It ruled that the lower courts had stretched the meaning of Grupo Dataflux, a diversity case. It is black letter law that diversity jurisdiction requires complete diversity of citizenship, and that citizenship is determined as of the date of commencement of an action. However, according to the First Circuit, the time-of-filing rule was inapposite in this case where the plaintiffs amended a complaint asserting federal question jurisdiction. The First Circuit suggested that the letter and spirit of the time-of-filing rule apply most obviously in diversity cases, where there are heightened concerns about forum-shopping and strategic forum selection behavior. It then claimed that courts have not imported the time-of-filing rule into the federal question realm.

Comment. It is not at all clear that the First Circuit is correct that the time-of-filing rule has no relevance. The Supreme Court has uttered all kinds of pronouncements about jurisdiction when it exists; when it doesn't; what the meaning of jurisdiction is; whether and when jurisdictional defects can be cured and when not. A review of these cases does not support the idea that there are distinctions between diversity and federal question cases. It may well be that if ConnectU ends up being reviewed by the Supreme Court that it would affirm the First Circuit, however. The Court could, for example, implicitly agree with the forum shopping rationale advanced by the First Circuit by citing how Congress has always intended that diversity jurisdiction be limited.

The Importance of Amendment as of Right. The First Circuit's next explanation is on firmer footing. There is no authority for invoking the time-of-filing rule to bar a plaintiff from switching jurisdictional horses before any jurisdictional issue has been raised. The defendants argued that even if the time-of-filing rule does not apply, an amended complaint cannot relate back to an earlier pleading over which the court had no jurisdiction. However, [e]ven if that were so a matter on which we take no view the argument mixes plums with pomegranates. Rule 15(c)'s language about the relation back of amendments has no bearing here. The amended complaint did not purport to "cure" a jurisdictional defect by Rule 15(c)'s relation back mechanism. Rather, it replaced the original complaint at a point when the district court's jurisdiction had not yet been questioned. Moreover, this was not a case of a court exercising hypothetical jurisdiction [see Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 94, 118 S. Ct. 1003, 140 L. Ed. 2d 210 (1998)]. Indeed, as an initial matter, courts sometimes may constitutionally exercise jurisdiction over a case even though it does not secure solid jurisdictional footing until after the case has been brought [see, e.g., Caterpillar, Inc. v. Lewis, 519 U.S. 61, 73, 117 S. Ct. 467, 136 L. Ed. 2d 437 (1996) (curing wrongful exercise of removal jurisdiction); Newman-Green, Inc. v. Alfonzo-Larrain, 490 U.S. 826, 837, 109 S. Ct. 2218, 104 L. Ed. 2d 893 (1989) (dropping party to cure diversity defect)].

More importantly, amendments as of right under Rule 15(a) operate "as a matter of course," and do not require a judicial imprimatur. Seen in this light, Rule 15(a)'s allowance of amendments as of right does not ask a court to make an end run around the requirement that jurisdiction be established as a threshold matter. The Rule simply creates a roadmap; where the time-of-filing rule does not obtain, it directs an inquiring court to evaluate an action (including its jurisdictional predicate) by reference to the amended complaint instead of the original complaint.

Comment. Judge Selyas' opinion must be read for at least two reasons. First of all, in this case involving all kinds of arcania, he employs an incredible array of interesting and unusual words. More importantly for most readers of this Commentary, he reminds us of the importance of paying attention. It is unclear whether the plaintiff was concerned about the jurisdictional basis before it filed the amended complaint. But, any plaintiff who wants to be in federal court who knows there may be some intricate diversity issue can cite this case if the plaintiff manages to cure whatever issues there is by filing an amended complaint as of right. This procedure is little known to most practitioners but can be put to good use in many contexts.

References. 3 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 15.17[3]; 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 102.16.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moores Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

120 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Vairo on Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches

2008 Emerging Issues 2362

Vairo on Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches

By Georgene Vairo

June 10, 2008

SUMMARY: May a defendant remove under the Class Action Fairness Act if one of the plaintiffs is a state? In In re Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches, the Fifth Circuit addresses this question of first impression in the federal appellate courts. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, discusses the opinions practical significance.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In re Katrina Canal Litigation Breaches, F.3d , 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 7933 (5th Cir. Apr. 11, 2008) involves an issue of first impression under the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA): May a defendant remove under CAFA if the plaintiff is a state? This is a significant opinion because general litigation on behalf of state citizens by state attorneys general has become increasingly important. The Fifth Circuit held that the State of Louisiana was not entitled to remand of a class action suit, which had been removed from state court based on the minimal diversity requirement of the Class Action Fairness Act, because the class of citizen plaintiffs was not entitled to any immunity that might otherwise protect the state from removal.

Facts and Procedural Background. The case is one of many spawned by Hurricane Katrina. Louisiana enacted the Road Home Program. In exchange for a partial assignment of the homeowners' claims against their insurers, the State of Louisiana advanced money to Louisiana homeowners to reconstruct homes damaged by Hurricanes Rita and Katrina. As the partial assignee of these claims, the State of Louisiana sued over 200 insurance companies for breach of contract in Louisiana state court. The State added a class of Louisiana citizens who had applied for funds from the program as plaintiffs. The defendants removed the case to federal court on the ground of diversity under the Class Action Fairness Act (CAFA) (28 U.S.C. §§ 1332(d)(2), 1453(b)) as well as under the Multiparty Multiforum Trial Jurisdiction Act (MMTJA) (28 U.S.C. §§ 1369, 1441(e)(1)(A)).

Louisiana argued that (1) CAFA did not apply; (2) even if CAFA applied by its terms, CAFA could not abrogate sovereign immunity from federal process, or at least Congress did not clearly do so in CAFA; and (3) MMTJA did not apply by its own terms. The district court denied Louisiana's motion to remand, and the Fifth Circuit affirmed. The courts dealt only with removal under CAFA.

Class of Citizen Plaintiffs Satisfied CAFA's Diversity Requirement. The Fifth Circuit agreed with Louisiana that a state is not a citizen for diversity purposes, even under CAFA. However, Louisiana sought relief not only for itself, but also for the class of citizens joined as plaintiffs. This class of citizens satisfied the minimal diversity rules of CAFA, which require only that any member of a class of plaintiffs is a citizen of a State different from any defendant [see 28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(2)]. Thus, the Fifth Circuit rejected Louisiana's argument that CAFA did not apply. CAFA defines class action as any civil action filed under rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure or similar State statute or rule of judicial procedure authorizing an action to be brought by 1 or more representative persons as a class action [28 U.S.C. § 1332(d)(1)(B)]. Louisiana Code of Civil Procedure, Article 591, under which the state attorney general brought this suit, was such a statute [see La. Code Civ. Proc. Art. 591(A)].

The States argument that it should not be subject to CAFA jurisdiction was not without force. The United States Supreme Court has held that a state is not a person in several contexts [see Wilson v. Omaha Indian Tribe, 442 U.S. 653, 658, 666-667, 99 S. Ct. 2529, 61 L. Ed. 2d 153 (1979) (citing (United States v. Cooper Corp., 312 U.S. 600, 604-605, 61 S. Ct. 742, 85 L. Ed. 1071 (1941)) (holding that under 25 U.S.C. § 194, applying to land disputes between a tribe and a "white person," a state was not a person but observing that "[t]here is nevertheless "no hard and fast rule of exclusion," . . . and much depends on the context, the subject matter, the legislative history, and executive interpretation")); Will v. Mich. Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 64, 109 S. Ct. 2304, 105 L. Ed. 2d 45 (1989) (finding that a state was not a "person" as defined by § 1983 because reading the term "person" to include "state" under the statutory language would "be a decidedly awkward way of expressing an intent to subject the States to liability")]. In essence, however, the Fifth Circuit found that it was irrelevant that the state might not be considered a person under CAFA because the statute only requires that the action be brought under Rule 23 or a state statute that authorizes class actions to be brought by a person. Louisiana's Article 591(A) is such a statute, as it permits "members of a class" to "sue or be sued as representative parties" [La. Code Civ. Proc. Art. 591(A)]. Congress considered and rejected an amendment that would have exempted class actions filed by an attorney general from removal under CAFA. Even CAFA's use of the term "citizen" did not bar its application. The statute refers to the citizenship of any class member and any defendant. Accordingly, in expanding federal jurisdiction over certain class actions filed in state court, CAFA eliminated the rule that citizenship of the named representative is controlling.

The court also rejected Louisianas argument that it was the real party in interest and as a state, it was not a citizen for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. The court agreed that a state is not a citizen under the diversity statutes, including CAFA. But in this case, Louisiana sought relief for both the State and the citizens as "recipients" of insurance. Accordingly, as partial assignees and assignors, both the State and the citizens were likely real parties in interest. CAFA only requires minimal diversity. Thus, CAFA supplies federal jurisdiction and a path to removal unless state sovereignty turns away its exercise.

Comment. The obvious practice pointer for state attorneys general here is that if they want to stay out of federal court, they ought not join a class of state citizens. The line of Supreme Court precedent suggesting that a state is not a person or a citizen would likely be controlling if the State of Louisiana had not amended its complaint. Before CAFA was enacted, the question whether a state plaintiff suing defendants over whom it has regulatory authority in state court under its own state laws may be removed to federal court on diversity grounds would not arise. The rule that a state is not a person for diversity purposes and the requirement of complete diversity always precluded the removal of a state's action on the ground of diversity. CAFA, with its minimal diversity requirements, however, pushes the question forward, because diversity jurisdiction may be based on minimal diversity, i.e., the citizenship of plaintiffs other than the state.

State Sovereignty Considerations The State. The Fifth Circuit noted that the case law and the debates over Article III when the Constitution was drafted all focused on the importance of protecting states as defendants, not as plaintiffs. Ultimately, however, the court concluded that it did not need to decide whether plaintiff states are entitled to protection from removal. Instead, the court based its decision on the narrower issue of whether any state immunity from removal extends to the class of private citizens.

State Immunity Inapplicable to Class of Citizens. For purposes of this appeal, the Fifth Circuit accepted that states enjoy some measure of protection from removal. However, the court held that any such protection did not extend to the class of private citizens joined as plaintiffs. Thus, the Fifth Circuit affirmed, determining that the district court properly denied Louisiana's motion to remand the entire case to state court.

Comment. Although providing a federal forum is the goal of removal, the effect of removal is to deprive the state court of an action properly within its jurisdiction, which raises federalism concerns. There are a number of Supreme Court cases discussing states and removal [see 16 Moors Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 107.03] that the Fifth Circuit did not address. These cases are not directly on point but do provide the backdrop for understanding the Fifth Circuit's cautious approach. For example, under Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence, if a state has consented to suit in its own courts, but not in federal courts, any action brought against the state must be litigated in the state court and may not be removed to federal court under the general removal statute [see generally 17A Moors Federal Practice (3d ed.) Ch. 123, Access to Courts: Eleventh Amendment and State Sovereign Immunity]. However, in Lapides v. Board of Regents, 535 U.S. 613, 618-624, 122 S. Ct. 1640, 152 L. Ed. 2d 806 (2002), the Supreme Court held that if the state itself removes the case, the state's Eleventh Amendment immunity is waived. This ruling is in line with Supreme Court precedent holding that a state's voluntary appearance in federal court amounts to a waiver of its Eleventh Amendment immunity.

Although Lapides involved the state as voluntary federal court plaintiff, under the Supreme Court's decision in Wisconsin Department of Corrections v. Schacht [see Wisconsin Dep't of Corr. v. Schacht, 524 U.S. 381, 397-398, 118 S. Ct. 2047, 141 L. Ed. 2d 364 (1998)], a case against a state defendant and state officials is removable. The fact that the claim against the state or state entity may not be removable on Eleventh Amendment grounds does not mean that the claims against the individuals are not removable. Applying this analysis to the Fifth Circuit case, it would be the claims of the class members that provide federal jurisdiction, making the case removable under the converse of the argument in Schacht.

Possible Partial Remand. In the lower court, the plaintiffs had raised the possibility of splitting the action in two, leaving the plaintiff class to pursue the class action in federal court, and ordering a remand of the States portion of the case to state court. There also was a suggestion of then staying the federal case to await the decision of the Louisiana courts. The district court considered this approach but decided to deny the remand motion instead. The Fifth Circuit discussed the approach at the end of its opinion when it decided to remand the case.

Comment. Clearly the Fifth Circuit was mindful of two important principles. On the one hand, it tried to avoid stepping on the toes of the district court by making plain that it wished that its observations would be viewed against the backdrop of the settled power of the district courts. It complimented that district court as an able manager of this complex litigation. On the other hand, the Fifth Circuit sent a strong signal that its caution about the state sovereignty issues raised by the case should prompt the district court to explore anew the plaintiffs proposed approach. In this day and age of the New Federalism, the Fifth Circuit provides an appropriate balance.

References. 5 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 23.63A[1]; 15 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 102.26[1][b][i], [2]; 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 107.03; 107.14[2][c][vii].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moores Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

121 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Rabiej on Preserving & Searching Stored Information on a Computer

2008 Emerging Issues 2320

Rabiej on Preserving & Searching Stored Information on a Computer

By John K. Rabiej

May 27, 2008

SUMMARY: Data in RAM is impermanent and may exist for less than a second. The court in Columbia Pictures Indus. v. Bunnell ordered the defendant to preserve certain data in RAM, which was crucial to the plaintiff's copyright infringement claims. John Rabiej discusses how the court's ruling should be limited to the peculiar facts in the case and should not be viewed as setting a general precedent, requiring a party to preserve or search data in RAM.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Columbia Pictures Industries v. Bunnell, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 46364 (C.D. Cal. May 29, 2007), a magistrate judge ordered the defendant to preserve certain electronically stored information (ESI) that existed only for a limited time in its web server's Random Access Memory (RAM). The data was critical to proving the plaintiff's copyright infringement claims. The magistrate judge's ruling, upheld on appeal by the district court, created an immediate firestorm of criticism (245 F.R.D. 443 (C.D. Cal. 2007)). Some found the ruling naive, while others scathingly attacked the ruling for displaying a profound ignorance of how computers work and establishing an unworkable precedent, which would require parties to retain all RAM data. Was the court's ruling so off-base?

Facts. The defendant operated a web site that provided a search engine that could locate, upload, and download files, including digital movies, stored in the computers of persons who were accessing the web server at any single point in time. The web site supported a peer-to-peer network, providing an opportunity for persons to swap files, including movies, without incurring an expense. Motion picture studios, which were suffering major revenue losses from copyright infringements, had successfully taken legal action to suspend the operations of similar web sites in the past. The software programs used in these other web sites contained a logging function that automatically retained certain data in a file, including the IP address of the user's computer and the name of the file downloaded. As soon as this identifying data was produced in discovery during litigation, the game was effectively over and the web site was ordered shut down (see Interscope Records v. DOES 1-14, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73627 (D. Kan. Oct. 1, 2007) (ex parte expedited discovery request for server log data retained by defendant who maintained software program that captured and downloaded the data from information held in RAM); see also Warner Bros. Records Inc. v. Does 1-6, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86431 (D.D.C. Nov. 26, 2007) (request for expedited discovery under Rule 45 for server log data retained by third party internet service provider)).

Bunnell operated a similar web site, but unlike the others, Bunnell turned off and deactivated the web server's program logging function. Absent the logging data, there was no way to show whether movies were being downloaded and no way to prove a copyright infringement claim. Bunnell argued that there was no preservation obligation to create new data by activating the logging function because the data existed solely in RAM and it was too ephemeral to fall within the meaning of electronically stored information as defined under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Under Bunnell's theory, RAM data could not be realistically stored because it was dynamic, possibly existing for less than a second. If the data could not be stored, Bunnell contended that Rule 34 would not apply, and he should be allowed to continue to operate the web site. Bunnell also contended that a court's finding that RAM data was discoverable would impose intolerable burdens and costs on parties in all future litigation to preserve and search such data, a virtually impossible task.

The magistrate judge declined Bunnell's invitation, reasoning that the definition of ESI under Rule 34 was very broad and included RAM. The magistrate judge emphasized the rulings limited effect, requiring Bunnell to preserve only the logging data. The ruling did not require Bunnell to preserve any movie files that might be downloaded during the web site's operations. The magistrate judge dismissed the defendant's privacy, First Amendment, and other claims and defenses. But the magistrate judge declined to sanction Bunnell for failing to preserve RAM data lost before the entry of the court's order because the issues were novel and the plaintiff's request did not specifically identify the RAM data. Faced with the magistrate judge's ruling as approved by the district court, Bunnell suspended operations in the United States. The court eventually entered a default judgment against the defendant for intentional destruction of incriminating evidence not involving RAM data (2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96360 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 13, 2007)).

What Is RAM? RAM is defined as the computers primary storage unit for instructions and data, representing the computer's memory. It is very fast and impermanent. It is designed to promote a computer's efficiency. The computer's memory is activated and operates whenever a software program is running. As soon as the operation of the program ends, all the data that was generated, reviewed, or used while running the program is lost unless the program contains a storage function, which transfers the RAM data to the computer's hard disk drive (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, § 37A.05[6]).

How does RAM relate to the Bunnell case? RAM data existed during the time a user's computer was interfacing with Bunnells web server and downloading data. The web site was accessed by many outside users, and RAM data was being generated as soon as the web server connected with the user's computer and terminated when the connection ceased. In addition, information in RAM was being updated constantly when memory buffers were cleared or refreshed many times per second. Thus, certain RAM data may have been in existence for less than a second. When the connection between the user's computer and the web server was cut, all RAM data was irretrievably lost including logging data and any movies actually downloaded.

Ruling's Implications. Setting to one side the magistrate judges legal analysis, the courts decision was clearly reasonable and reflected a common-sense resolution. Activating the web server's logging function was not burdensome nor was storing the logging data. A contrary ruling would have offered a free pass to anyone flouting the copyright infringement laws.

So why the firestorm? The court's ruling was challenged not for its common-sense judgment, but for its analytical and legal justification and its potential precedential effect. Critics argued that the ruling greatly expanded the definition of reasonably accessible under Rule 26 to include temporary stored data that is not kept in the usual course of business.

If ESI as defined under Rule 34 includes RAM data, critics argued that parties would have an intolerable burden to preserve and search all such data in all cases. RAM data is dynamic and ephemeral and as shown in the Bunnell case it can be voluminous, especially if it includes movie images, which require enormous storage space. Storing and retrieving all RAM data would be a herculean task. For example, Bunnell claimed that capturing RAM data would consume 30-40 gigabytes of storage space, vastly exceeding the web server's capacity.

RAM Data Is ESI. RAM data, though dynamic, is clearly ESI as defined under Rule 34 (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, § 37A.05[6]). The Committee Note to Rule 34 and the background information discussing the 2006 amendments to Rule 34 make it abundantly clear that the rule was intended to apply to all information that was electronic in nature, which would apply to RAM data. In crafting Rule 34, the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules deliberately fashioned a broad definition of ESI broad enough to capture information stored in exotic mediums developed under new technologies, including chemical and biologic, which would store data in organic matter (see minutes of April 14-15, 2005, Civil Rules Committee meeting at <www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC0405.pdf>). Despite this broad definition, the defendant contended that the fleeting nature of RAM data was inconsistent with the notion of stored data. There is no time duration limit placed on ESI in Rule 34, nor was any intended. The Committee Note to Rule 34 expressly recognizes that ESI may be temporary when it observes that ESI may exist in dynamic databases.

The magistrate judge was certainly correct in her ruling that RAM data is ESI. Once the Rule 34 issue was lost, Bunnell could only argue that the cost and burden associated in producing the RAM data outweighed its benefits under the Rule 26(b)(2)(C) proportionality test. But the plaintiff eliminated this option by significantly narrowing the scope of the discovery request.

Search Obligations. What are a party's search duties regarding RAM data?

A party is not obligated to search electronically stored information from sources that the party identifies as not reasonably accessible (Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B)). Zubulake and its progeny teach us that the medium on which information is stored usually determines whether the information is accessible (see 7 Moors Federal Practice, § 37A.36[3]). For example, information on an active database ordinarily is accessible, while information stored on a backup tape ordinarily is inaccessible. RAM data in the Bunnell case was run on an active database. But as acknowledged in Zubulake, though the storage medium is an important factor, the decisive factor distinguishing accessible from inaccessible information is the cost and burden in locating and retrieving it (see 7 Moors Federal Practice, § 37A.35[1][a]).

The critics of the court's ruling are certainly correct that the costs and burdens associated with searching all data in RAM would be enormous in most cases, because the database is dynamic and information is constantly generated and lost. Attempting to capture and retain all such data would require special software programs and large storage capacity. Despite these concerns, the court in Bunnell ruled that RAM data was reasonably accessible.

The court's finding that RAM data is reasonably accessible is explained by the plaintiff's adjustments in its discovery request. Rule 26 provides that a requesting party may file a motion to compel production of information, which the responding party asserts is not reasonably accessible. A court may order that such information be produced, however, if the requesting party makes a good cause showing that the likely benefit of the requested information outweighs the costs and burden in retrieving it under the Rule 26(b)(2)(C) proportionality test. Had the plaintiff filed such a motion, the case would have been decided under a standard Rule 26 proportionality analysis like hundreds of other similar cases (see 7 Moors Federal Practice, § 37A.33 and 7 Moors Federal Practice, § 37A.34). Instead, the plaintiff properly followed the guidance given in the Committee Note to Rule 26 before filing the motion and discussed with Bunnell the burdens and costs of accessing and retrieving the information, the needs that may establish good cause for requiring all or part of the requested discovery even if the information sought is not reasonably accessible, and conditions on obtaining and producing the information that may be appropriate. It became clear to the plaintiff that all the data in the web site server's RAM was not material, much of it containing digital movies that were not essential to its case. In accordance with the guidance in the Committee Note, the plaintiff set conditions on obtaining and producing the information, which significantly limited production costs and burden. The plaintiff targeted only the logging data in RAM, which could be easily stored and retrieved. By narrowing the scope of the requested information, the plaintiff simplified the issue for the court.

The plaintiff narrowed its discovery request, asking the court to determine whether only the defendant's logging data in RAM was reasonably accessible. Having framed the issue in this way, the burden shifted to the defendant to show that the logging data was not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost (see 7 Moors Federal Practice, § 37A.35[1][c]). Bunnell could not meet this burden. In fact, activating the logging function on the defendant's web server entailed little burden. Requiring the defendant to store only the logging data and prospectively enforcing the order set reasonable limits. Instead of 30-40 gigabytes of RAM data that the defendant initially claimed would be needed to store all the RAM data, the plaintiff was seeking data that only required storage of one-hundredth of the volume or 300-400 megabytes.

It is important to note that the court did not hold that all RAM data was accessible. It held that only the small subset of RAM data containing the logging data was relevant and accessible because the cost and burden in retrieving the specified data was relatively modest. There was no need to engage the proportionality test under Rule 26(b)(2)(C), because the defendant failed to meet its initial burden, demonstrating undue production costs and burden. The court highlighted the limited scope of its ruling: In response to amici's concerns over the potentially devastating impact of this decision on the record-keeping obligations of businesses and individuals, this Court notes that the decision does not impose an additional burden on any website operator or party outside the case. It simply requires that the defendants in this case, as part of this litigation, after the issuance of a court order, and following a careful evaluation of the burden to these defendants of preserving and producing the specific information requested in light of its relevance and lack of other available means to obtain it, begin preserving and subsequently produce a particular subset of the data in RAM under defendant's control. (245 F.R.D. 443, 448.)

Preservation Duty. The court did not sanction Bunnell for failing to preserve the RAM logging data. Rule 37(e) provides a safe harbor against sanctions if ESI is lost as a result of the good faith operation of computer equipment. The rule is intended to allow routine computer operations, which are designed to make the computer efficient, e.g., deletion of e-mails after a period of time to prevent overloading the computer's storage capacity, debilitating its efficiency. The rule does not permit a party, however, to exploit the safe harbor and allow destruction of ESI if the party knows or should know that the ESI is relevant and is not available from another source. The Committee Note to Rule 37(e) requires a party to modify or suspend certain features of that routine operation to prevent the loss of information, if that information is subject to a preservation obligation.

The magistrate judge did not sanction Bunnell for failing to preserve the ESI logging data before the entry of the court order because the plaintiff had not explicitly asked for it. The courts justification is not persuasive. The plaintiff expressly asked for the logging data in its preservation notice. [P]laintiffs' counsel wrote to defense counsel "to formally remind [him] of [his] clients' obligation to preserve all potentially discoverable evidence related to the litigation" including "[a]ll logs, including without limitation web server access logs"... A party requesting relevant information is not obligated, nor should it be, to identify the precise location of the requested information. Bunnell understood where the logging data was located. He had the responsibility to place a litigation hold to retain the information once the litigation commenced. Bunnell understood that the continued deactivation of the web server's logging function prevented the storage of the information. Bunnell also understood that the logging data was relevant, indeed critical, to the plaintiff's claim and not available from other sources.

The magistrate judge was generous in not imposing sanctions. Most likely, the plaintiff was more interested in immediately suspending the defendant's operations and establishing a precedent against similar future operations. In addition, though evidence of potential copyright infringement was lost, the ongoing operation of the web site provided similar evidence that could substantiate the plaintiffs copyright infringement claims. Having satisfied the plaintiff's main interests without undermining the plaintiffs ability to prove its case and acknowledging the novel status of the case, the magistrate judge's decision not to sanction Bunnell can hardly be criticized.

Consequences. The magistrate judge's order was reasonable and consistent with Rule 26 and Rule 34. The case provides a good blueprint for parties to follow in future cases in which RAM data may be relevant. The court took special pains to limit the effect of its ruling to the instant facts in Bunnell. In most cases, relevant ESI will be stored in a computer's hard disk drive. Only in exceptional cases, like Bunnell, will RAM information be relevant and unavailable from another source. Though the federal discovery rules do not expressly refer to RAM ESI data, the rules' general provisions provide guidance on how to address such data. In most cases, a party need not search RAM data because it is not reasonably accessible. Only in very peculiar circumstances will a party be obligated to take steps to store RAM data when the party knows or should know that the data is relevant, not available from other sources, and its benefit outweighs the costs and burdens in producing it. In such presumably rare cases, the cost-benefit analysis under Rule 26(b)(2)(C) will determine whether all or only a limited segment of the ESI in the RAM is subject to preservation and discovery (see 7 Moores Federal Practice, § 37A.05[6]).

The lesson for the practitioner is to identify early in the case whether RAM data is relevant and not available from other sources, and, if so, to narrow the scope of the requested discovery within reasonable limits.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

John K. Rabiej is the chief of the Rules Committee Support Office of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. His office staffs the Advisory Committees of Appellate, Bankruptcy, Civil, Criminal, and Evidence Rules and the Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference of the United States. He has served as chief since 1992. As chief of the office he works directly with the rules committees' chairs and reporters on drafts of proposed rule amendments and prepares reports to the Judicial Conference and Congress on the amendments. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois College of Law. He was inducted into the American Law Institute in May 2004.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

122 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on United States v. Ary

2008 Emerging Issues 2324

Arthur Best on United States v. Ary, 518 F.3d 775 (10th Cir. 2008)

By Arthur Best

May 23, 2008

SUMMARY: Is work product privilege waived if six weeks pass before counsel asserts the privilege? Arthur Best, Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, comments on United States v. Ary, 518 F.3d 775 (10th Cir. 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

The defendant was convicted of numerous counts of fraud, theft and money laundering in connection with the sale of space artifacts that had come into his possession while he was President and Chief Executive Officer of the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Museum. Defense counsel reviewed discovery materials and found that material seized by the government that was possibly protected by attorney-client or work product privileges was being used in the defendants prosecution. Because counsel waited six weeks to assert privilege claims about these materials, the claims were waived. The case also considers whether inventory records can be admitted under the business records hearsay exception if they are based on data in invoices that were prepared by individuals not employed by the enterprise that kept the inventory records.

Summary of the case

The defendant learned he was under investigation in connection with artifacts missing from the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Museum where he had been President and Chief Executive Officer for many years. He obtained legal counsel and prepared notes and summaries of his involvement with sales of artifacts, on instructions from his lawyer.

A search warrant was executed at the defendants home. The defendants lawyer then wrote to the Assistant United States Attorney (AUSA) working on the case, claiming that computer and other files containing privileged communications had been seized. In response, the AUSA stated that a taint team had identified privileged material and insured that it would not be reviewed or examined as part of the investigation of the defendant. More than one year later, the defendants lawyer went to the United States Attorneys office to review Rule 16 discovery materials. They included what the court called a black box containing print-outs from computer files with index titles by the defendant such as court case and [Attorney] Information. About six weeks later, the attorney moved to suppress these materials on grounds of privilege. The trial judge denied that motion, on the basis that because the attorney failed to raise the issue when he first saw those materials, he waived the protection of the attorney-client and work product privileges.

At trial, certain Cosmosphere computer records were introduced to show that the United States or the museum had been the owner of particular items. The prosecution showed that these records were maintained in the usual course of the museums operations. Some of their data was derived from invoices prepared by individuals not employed by the museum. The defendant objected to their admission on hearsay grounds, arguing that this double hearsay was outside the coverage of the business records exception. The trial judge admitted the evidence.

The defendant was convicted. On appeal, he claimed that the trial judge had erred in connection with the privilege and hearsay rulings.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Attorney-Client Privilege. The attorney-client privilege is the oldest of the privileges for confidential communications known to the common law. It protects communications between a client and the clients attorney from use in litigation. It is recognized only when "the communication between the client and the attorney is made in confidence of the relationship and under circumstances from which it may reasonably be assumed that the communication will remain in confidence." In re Qwest Communs. Int'l, 450 F.3d 1179, 1185 (10th Cir. 2006) (quotation omitted). Confidentiality is critical to the privilege, so the privilege is lost if the holder reveals a confidential communication to a third party. If a communication is revealed involuntarily, waiver may or may not be the consequence, depending on overall circumstances.

Work-Product Privilege. The work-product doctrine was recognized by the Supreme Court in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 509-11, 67 S. Ct. 385, 91 L. Ed. 451 (1947). It protects against disclosure of the mental processes of an attorney in analyzing and preparing a client's case. The doctrine is codified in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(3). It covers material assembled by an attorney in preparation for impending litigation, and materials prepared by an attorney's agent, if that agent acts at the attorney's direction in creating the documents. The voluntary production of work-product material during discovery may waive a work-product objection. Grace United Methodist Church v. City of Cheyenne, 451 F.3d 643, 668-69 (10th Cir. 2006).

Involuntary Disclosure and Loss of Attorney-Client or Work Product Privileges. The attorney-client privilege and work-product doctrine are distinct, but courts have treated them identically when considering involuntary disclosure. See In re Grand Jury (Impounded), 138 F.3d 978, 981 (3d Cir. 1998) (applying attorney-client waiver case law to a work-product issue). Prior to this case, the Tenth Circuit had not decided whether protection is lost when material has been involuntarily disclosed, but other courts have treated this question by focusing on three aspects: (1) the specificity with which the defendant identifies the material; (2) the expediency by which the defendant informs the government that it seized protected material; and (3) the expediency by which the defendant seeks judicial action to enforce the protection.

For analysis of privilege waiver in the criminal context, see 1 -16 Courtroom Criminal Evidence § 1611. For related discussion of loss of privilege through accidental disclosure in the civil context, see 30-809 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 809.03.

Business Records Hearsay Exception. Rule 803(6) of the Federal Rules of Evidence allows admission of business records if they are "kept in the course of regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the . . . record." To satisfy Rule 803(6) the records must (1) have been prepared in the normal course of business; (2) have been made at or near the time of the events recorded; and (3) be based on the personal knowledge of the entrant or of a person who had a business duty to transmit the information to the entrant. Circumstances must indicate that the sources, methods and circumstances by which the record was made were trustworthy. The proponent of the document must also lay this foundation for its admission.

For discussion of the hearsay exception for records of regularly conducted activity (business records), see 5-803 Weinstein's Federal Evidence § 803.08

The Tenth Circuits Decision

Waiver. The court adopted the three-factor analysis other courts have applied to consider whether involuntary disclosure of privileged material constitutes a waiver of the privilege. The court treated attorney-client and work product privileges identically for this purpose.

Identifying the Privileged Material. The first factor the court adopted is the specificity with which the defendant identifies the material. This factor cut against the defendant in this case because the defendant never specified the particular black box contents to which privilege claims might apply.

Expediency in Notifying Government and Seeking Enforcement of Privilege. The second factor is the expediency with which the defendant notifies the government of the privilege issues, and the third factor is the expediency with which the defendant seeks judicial action to enforce the protection. The Court noted:

When a party delays in asserting protection, however, the adverse party is free to continue to use the material, thereby negating its confidential character. See In re Grand Jury (Impounded), 138 F.3d at 982. The government's investigation may irreparably rely on the protected information, thereby tainting the investigation. Id. By failing to minimize the damage caused by the breach of confidentiality, the defendant is prohibited from using the privilege or doctrine to prohibit the government's use of the information. See de la Jara, 973 F.2d at 750.

Thus, in the case of an involuntary disclosure, the party asserting the work-product doctrine or attorney-client privilege must pursue all reasonable means to preserve the confidentiality of the material.

United States v. Ary, 518 F.3d 775, 784 (10th Cir. 2008).

In this case, the defendant did not inform the government of the privilege issues and the defendant waited more than six weeks after discovering the problem to seek judicial action. This delay, the Tenth Circuit concluded, was a failure to assert protection in a timely fashion. United States v. Ary, 518 F.3d 775, 785 (10th Cir. 2008).

Counsel should note the Courts definition of timely and understand that seeking a remedy within days of discovering an involuntary disclosure is the wisest course. Also, unlike the defendants actions in this case, communicating to the government immediately upon discovering a privilege problem is the surest way to preserve the privilege rights.

Business Records Exception to the Hearsay Exclusionary Rule. The court recognized that there was a double hearsay issue with regard to the inventory records. Testimony showed that some of the computerized entries were derived from documents prepared by individuals outside the employ of the entity that made the records. The Tenth Circuit stated that because the outside documents were invoices, those who provided them were under a duty to provide accurate information.

Comments

This case is one of first impression in the Tenth Circuit. In adopting the three-factor test for determining the consequences of involuntary disclosure of privileged material, the Court made it clear that immediate remedial efforts must be made once a disclosure is identified by a defendant. The delay in this case, described as involving six weeks, was so long that it precluded application of privilege. This application of the three-part test puts great responsibility on the victims of improper searches and seizures, and is consistent with some courts general disinclination to give broad application to privileges.

With regard to the business records exception, the Courts analysis can fairly be characterized as pro-admissibility. Ordinarily, the business record exception is justified by pointing to the internal needs of organizations to maintain accurate records and to the likelihood that errors in records will come to light during the normal operation of an enterprise. To apply those ideas to a third-party who submits a bill to an organization may represent an extension of the policies that support the exception. It is certainly consistent with a common-sense approach to hearsay and with the overall pro-admissibility orientation of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

123 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on Flood v. Mercantile Adjustment Bureau

2008 Emerging Issues 2325

Arthur Best on Flood v. Mercantile Adjustment Bureau, LLC, 176 P.3d 769 (Colo. 2008)

By Arthur Best

May 23, 2008

SUMMARY: Does a letter sent by a debt collector to a debtor, suggesting the debtor contact the debt collector, violate the Colorado Fair Debt Collection Practices Act? Arthur Best, Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, comments on the Colorado Supreme Courts decision in Flood v. Mercantile Adjustment Bureau, LLC, 176 P.3d 769 (Colo. 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

The Colorado Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, C. R. S. 12-14-101 to 12-14-137, requires a debt collector to inform a debtor about his or her right to make a written demand that the collection agency verify the alleged debt. Also, it prohibits communications between a debt collector and third parties. In Flood v. Mercantile Adjustment Bureau, LLC, 176 P.3d 769 (Colo. 2008), a debt collector sent a letter to a debtor that included a telephone number and a suggestion that the debtor contact the debt collector, but communicated the verification right only in small print below the letters signature. The Court concluded that the letters reference to the verification right was not clear enough to satisfy the statute. The debt collection company used a third-party to provide automated production and mailing of its debt collection letters. This communication to third parties was de minimus and therefore did not violate the statutes confidentiality provision.

Summary of the Case

The defendant debt collection company used a third-party mailing service to send the plaintiff a letter that stated:

Your account with CITI FINANCIAL-TRANSOUTH has been listed with our office for collection. The balance due is $ 5604.45. If you don't agree with the balance it is important that you contact our office to discuss this matter.

Please be advised that our client has authorized us to offer you substantial savings to settle this account. We will accept $ 2522.00 if payment is received by 08-21-04. Contact our office for more information.

Respectfully,

J. Dial

Mercantile Adjustment Bureau, LLC

P.O. Box 9315A

Rochester, NY 14604

1-877-230-8414

There Will Be A $ 20.00 Fee Added On All Returned Checks.

This Communication Is From A Debt Collector This Is An Attempt To Collect A Debt.

Any Information Obtained Will Be Used For That Purpose.

Unless you notify this office within 30 days after receiving this notice that you dispute the validity of the debt or any portion thereof, this office will assume the debt is valid. If you notify this office in writing within 30 days from receiving this notice, this office will: obtain verification of the debt or obtain a copy of a judgment and mail you a copy of such judgment or verification. If you request this office in writing within 30 days after receiving this notice, this office will provide you with the name and address of the original creditor, if different from the current creditor.

For more information about the colorado fair debt collection act visit www. Ago. State. Co. Us/cab.htm.

The plaintiff sued the defendant under the Colorado Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, claiming that the communication did not include required information, was contradictory about her rights, and that the defendant had impermissibly communicated with a third party. She sought damages, costs, and attorneys fees. The defendant won at county court, and won an appeal to a district court. The Supreme Court granted certiorari.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Colorado Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, § 12-14-109. This section establishes requirements for a collection agency's communications with a debtor. It provides:

Validation of debts. (1) Within five days after the initial communication with a consumer in connection with the collection of any debt, a debt collector or collection agency shall, unless the following information is contained in the initial communication or the consumer has paid the debt, send the consumer a written notice with the disclosures specified in paragraphs (a) to (e) of this subsection (1). If such disclosures are placed on the back of the notice, the front of the notice shall contain a statement notifying consumers of that fact. Such disclosures shall state:

(a) The amount of the debt;

(b) The name of the creditor to whom the debt is owed;

(c) That, unless the consumer, within thirty days after receipt of the notice, disputes the validity of the debt, or any portion thereof, the debt will be assumed to be valid by the debt collector or collection agency;

(d) That, if the consumer notifies the debt collector or collection agency in writing within the thirty-day period that the debt, or any portion thereof, is disputed, the debt collector or collection agency will obtain verification of the debt or a copy of a judgment against the consumer and a copy of such verification or judgment will be mailed to the consumer by the debt collector or collection agency;

(e) That upon the consumer's written request within the thirty-day period, the debt collector or collection agency will provide the consumer with the name and address of the original creditor, if different from the current creditor.

(2) If the consumer notifies the debt collector or collection agency in writing within the thirty-day period described in paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of this section that the debt, or any portion thereof, is disputed or that the consumer requests the name and address of the original creditor, the debt collector or collection agency shall cease collection of the debt, or any disputed portion thereof, until the debt collection or collection agency obtains verification of the debt or a copy of a judgment or the name and address of the original creditor and mails a copy of such verification or judgment or name and address of the original creditor to the consumer.

Colorado Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, § 12-14-105(2). This provision prohibits communications between a debt collector and third parties, with some exceptions. It is parallel to a federal provision that has been described as intended to protect a consumer's reputation and privacy, as well as to prevent loss of jobs resulting from a debt collector's communication with a consumer's employer concerning the collection of a debt." West v. Costen, 558 F. Supp. 564, 575 (W.D. Va. 1983) (citations omitted).

See Debtor-Creditor Law § 8.01 and Banking Law § 155.01 for overviews of the federal statute on which the Colorado statute is based.

Least Sophisticated Consumer Standard. In construing compliance with a consumer protection statute, courts often use a least sophisticated consumer standard, to determine the likely meaning of a communication to a consumer, or to determine if a communication to consumers is misleading. See Clomon v. Jackson, 988 F.2d 1314, 1318 (2d Cir. 1993), where the court stated that The basic purpose of the least-sophisticated-consumer standard is to ensure that the [federal Fair Debt Collection Practices statute] protects all consumers, the gullible as well as the shrewd. This standard is consistent with the norms that courts have traditionally applied in consumer-protection law."

The Supreme Courts Decision

Majority, Concurring and Dissenting Opinions. This case resolved two issues the adequacy of the defendants disclosures and the legitimacy of the defendants use of a third-party mailing service. With regard to the disclosures, the court was split with four justices in the majority and three dissenting. With regard to the use of a mailing service, the court was unanimous.

Disclosure of Verification Right. The court held that the defendants letter failed to provide an adequate disclosure of the verification right, because it contained contradictions that could confuse an unsophisticated consumer about what was required in order to dispute the debt. It also noted that the disclosure of the need to contact the debt collector in writing was buried in the fine print appended to the bottom of the communication. Flood v. Mercantile Adjustment Bureau, LLC, 176 P.3d 769, 774 (Colo. 2008).

The court stated that the letter gives the impression that contacting the debt collector by phone is the only necessary means to dispute the debt and that there would be no deadline for doing so, when in fact the statute requires a consumer to make a written request to invoke the verification right.

Indicative of the courts application of the least sophisticated consumer standard is its analysis that because the letter used the expression respectfully above the signature, the letter conveyed the idea that its writer was dedicated to protecting all of the recipients rights. The court also noted that the name used below respectfully is fictitious, although it did not explicitly link that fact to its conclusion that the letters overall message failed to satisfy the statutory requirements.

Significantly, the court stated that the letter included a deadline for accepting its reduced payment offer, but that this deadline was longer than the deadline applicable to the consumers right to require verification.

Because of the use of fine print, the implication that a phone call was all that was required, and the communication of a deadline that was later than the statutory deadline for asserting rights, the court held that the letter violated the statute. It concluded, While the statute provides that the collection agency may make the required section 12-14-109 disclosures on the back of the notice if the front of the notice contains a statement notifying consumers of that fact, see § 12-14-109(1), the statute does not authorize the collection agency to couch, conceal, veil, contradict, or minimize the required disclosures so as to confuse or mislead the consumer into foregoing her rights. Flood v. Mercantile Adjustment Bureau, LLC., 176 P.3d 769, 776 (Colo. 2008).

Third-party Communications. The plaintiff had claimed that the defendant violated C. R. S. section 12-14-105(2) by using a mailing service to prepare and mail its communications. The court affirmed the lower courts conclusion that this use of a third party was consistent with the statute. It reviewed a parallel federal statute that contains a nearly identical provision, 15 U.S.C. § 1692c(b) (2007). The purpose of that statute has been described as to protection of a consumer's reputation, privacy, and job security. See West v. Costen, 558 F. Supp. 564, 575 (W.D. Va. 1983). The court found that the defendants use of a service that was entirely automated and that relied on electronic submission of data from the defendant to the service did not entail the risk that a consumer would be coerced into paying a debt because of contacts with his or her employer, family, or other third parties. For that reason, it held that the challenged communications were de minimus and not a violation of the statute.

Comments

The majority opinion represents a pro-consumer analysis of the statutory requirements. This case was far from clear-cut. The required disclosures did appear in the communication. Use of the word respectfully may not convey to many people the meaning ascribed to it by the majority. And the majoritys critique of the letters use of a pseudonymous signature may not be well-grounded in the statute.

Nevertheless, this opinion is consistent with many consumer protection opinions that give a generous pro-consumer interpretation of consumer protections statute. Counsel should be aware that the statute provides for payment of attorneys fees as one way of encouraging enforcement of the statutory requirements.

Practice Tip. As is true in various instances of documents provided to lay people, providing the clearest and most straightforward disclosures increases the likelihood that the documents will be given effect or found to comply with statutory requirements.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

124 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

O'Sullivan on Nelson v. Appleway Chevrolet

2008 Emerging Issues 2304

Kathleen M. O'Sullivan on Class Certification Under CR 23(b)(2) in Nelson v. Appleway Chevrolet, Inc.

By Kathleen M. O'Sullivan

May 15, 2008

SUMMARY: Kathleen O'Sullivan comments on Nelson v. Appleway Chevrolet, Inc., in which the Washington Supreme Court evaluated the standard for certifying a class under Washington Civil Rule 23(b)(2), which provides for class certification when "final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief with respect to the class as a whole" is an "appropriate" remedy.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: O'Sullivan, Kathleen M. Class Certification Under CR 23(b)(2) in Nelson v. Appleway Chevrolet, Inc.. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Overview of Standards for Certifying a CR 23(b)(2) Class in Washington. In Nelson v. Appleway Chevrolet, Inc. [160 Wn.2d 173, 157 P.3d 847 (2007)], the Washington Supreme Court evaluated the standard for certifying a class under Washington Civil Rule 23(b)(2), which provides for class certification when "final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief with respect to the class as a whole" is an "appropriate" remedy. In doing so, the Court said that it was not changing the CR 23(b)(2) standard it had previously adopted, but was simply enforcing the rule the Court announced in Eriks v. Denver [118 Wn.2d 451, 824 P.2d 1207 (1992)], that when the declaratory relief sought "merely forms the basis for monetary relief, a CR 23(b)(2) action is not appropriate" [Eriks, 118 Wn.2d at 466]. The Court insists in Nelson that certification under CR 23(b)(2) "is inappropriate if the claim relates 'exclusively or predominantly' to monetary damages," and is appropriate only if the monetary relief is "incidental" to the declaratory relief [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 189190].

That said, the outcome in the Nelson case is somewhat surprising given that (according to the dealership's appellate brief), the plaintiff class consisted of at least tens of thousands of class members (purchasers of automobiles) [Nelson, petitioners' brief at 48] who were seeking to collect from an automobile dealership the business and occupation (B&O) tax that the dealership had itemized and passed on to them. The Court's opinion never addresses the issue of the size of the class, and simply dismisses the dealer's argument that the plaintiff class seeks millions of dollars by observing that the named plaintiff sought only $79.23, which "is not millions of dollars," and also dismisses the dealer's argument that the determination of class members' individual damages would not be a simple exercise [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 190]. For these reasons, the Court concludes that "Nelson's claim for monetary relief does not dominate his claim for declaratory relief" [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 190].

Procedural Stance of Nelson v. Appleway Chevrolet, Inc. Appleway Chevrolet, an automobile dealer, sold a used car to plaintiff Herbert Nelson. Nelson alleged that after the parties had negotiated a final price, Appleway added $79.23 for Washington's B&O tax. Appleway disclosed the pass-through of the tax at four places in the sales contract. Nelson paid the tax under protest and then sued the dealership.

Nelson filed a class action seeking declaratory relief that the dealer's collection of B&O tax, and the sales tax on the B&O tax, was a violation of Washington's B&O tax statute. He also sought injunctive relief barring the dealer from collecting the B&O tax from future customers and monetary relief on a claim of unjust enrichment. The trial court granted summary judgment in favor of Nelson on all relief requested, and certified a class under CR 23(b)(2). The Court of Appeals, and then the Washington Supreme Court, affirmed the class certification and the judgment in favor of the plaintiff class.

Before the Supreme Court, the two primary issues in Nelson addressed by the Court did not involve class certification. First, the Court ruled that the Washington B&O tax statute barred the dealership from passing through the B&O tax to its customers under the facts presented, when the B&O charge was added "after Appleway and Nelson negotiated and agreed upon a final purchase price" [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 181 (emphasis in original)]. Second, the Court ruled that Nelson had standing to seek a declaratory judgment under Washington's B&O tax statute, that the case involved a justiciable controversy, and that the source of plaintiff's right to sue was the unjust enrichment claim (in and of itself, an important substantive development).

Supreme Court Addresses Class Certification Issue Last. "Finally," after addressing these tax and procedural issues, the Supreme Court turned to the class certification issue [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 188]. The class action issue in Nelson was whether the trial court had properly certified a CR 23(b)(2) class (the only class that plaintiff sought to be certified). The defendant automobile dealer argued that a CR 23(b)(2) class should not have been certified because the class claims sought "predominantly" monetary relief; plaintiff Nelson argued that the monetary relief claim was not predominant at all, but was merely incidental to its "primary" claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. The auto dealer lost. As Justice Sanders wrote for the Court, "incidental damages 'flow directly from liability to the class as a whole on the claims forming the basis of the injunctive or declaratory relief'" [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 189 (quoting Molski v. Gleich, 318 F.3d 937, 949 (9th Cir. 2002) (emphasis in Nelson decision))], and that these damages must be "cognizable by objective standards" [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 189]. The Court was convinced that adding up the amount of B&O tax that the dealer charged each class member above the purchase price of his or her car was precisely the kind of objectively determinable damages that flow directly from liability to the class as a whole, thus warranting certification under CR 23(b)(2).

What Does the Nelson Decision Mean? At least one commentator has concluded that "Nelson substantially increases the availability of CR 23(b)(2) certification . . . for cases involving money claims. . ." [Washington State Bar Association CLE, 24th Annual Antitrust and Consumer Protection Seminar, Ch. 6, "Recent Developments in Class Actions in Washington," November 2007 (Daniel J. Dunne)]. My view is that the jury is still out on this one. If we are to take the Washington Supreme Court at its word, the Court was not creating a new standard for CR 23(b)(2) certification at all, but was merely enforcing the existing standard: plaintiffs seeking "exclusively or predominantly" monetary relief will not be able to have a CR 23(b)(2) class certified; those seeking monetary relief that is "merely incidental" to their "primary claim" for declaratory or injunctive claim will be able to have a CR 23(b)(2) class certified.

But actions speak louder than words, so three aspects of the Supreme Court's decision warrant particular attention. First, the Court hastily rejected the defendant's argument that the significant cumulative sum of money the class sought--as opposed to the small amount sought by the named plaintiff--transformed the case from one primarily about declaratory relief to one primarily about monetary relief [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 190].

Second, the Court was not persuaded by the defendant's argument that the calculation of damages for potentially tens of thousands of class members could not be determined simply by reference to their individual sales agreements because of the haggling that likely went on at the dealership regarding the B&O tax pass-through [Nelson, 160 Wn.2d at 189 ("computing the monetary relief is simple and relies entirely on objective facts, without need for individual assessments of each class member's circumstances"]].

Third, although Washington's CR 23(b)(2) jurisprudence (i.e., the predominantly/ incidental test in Eriks v. Denver [118 Wn.2d 451, 824 P.2d 1207 (1992)] and Sitton v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. [116 Wn. App. 245, 63 P.3d 198 (2003)]) is based on the Ninth Circuit's decision in Molski v. Gleich [318 F.3d 937, 949 (9th Cir. 2002)], the Washington Supreme Court did not look to the Ninth Circuit for guidance on how to decide which cases fall on the "predominantly" monetary divide and which fall on the "incidental" monetary divide. In Molski, the Ninth Circuit said that although this process will entail an "ad hoc balancing" test (that bane of predictability), at a minimum, a trial court should find that for declaratory and injunctive relief claims to be predominant, (1) "reasonable plaintiffs would bring the suit to obtain the injunctive or declaratory relief sought" "even in the absence of possible monetary recovery," and (2) "the injunctive or declaratory relief sought would be both reasonably necessary and appropriate were the plaintiffs to succeed on the merits" [Molski, 318 F.3d at 950 n.15 (emphasis added)]. Is it "reasonable" to sue an auto dealer to "declare" a practice illegal when there is no chance to recover any money if the practice is deemed illegal? Perhaps, but a court (probably the trial court), not a commentator, should have answered that question.

These factors may be troubling for companies potentially subject to class action suits in Washington. Why should those companies (and plaintiffs' lawyers) care? They should care because a CR 23(b)(2) class (1) requires no notice (meaning plaintiffs can avoid potentially costly notice to class members), (2) is a "mandatory class" (meaning class members cannot opt out of the class to pursue individual litigation), and (3) has a less rigorous test for class certification than under CR 23(b)(3). As the United States Supreme Court recognized in Ortiz v. Fibreboard Corp. [527 U.S. 815, 844-846, 864, 119 S.Ct. 2295, 144 L.Ed.2d 715 (1999)], mandatory classes raise due process concerns when monetary damages are sought. In Nelson, those concerns did not trouble the Washington Supreme Court because of its conclusion that the request for monetary relief was simply the tail on the declaratory/injunctive-relief-seeking dog. Going forward, plaintiffs will presumably ask Washington courts to "declare" more statutes or even business practices "illegal" and then attempt to get a CR 23(b)(2) class certified on the basis that the monetary claim for a refund of the illegal fee or practice is merely "incidental" to their predominant request for declaratory or injunctive relief.

In sum, in light of the Nelson decision, expect to see more--not fewer--disputes as to whether a proposed class's request for monetary relief is "predominant" or "incidental."

Disclaimer. The above commentary is for informational purposes only and not for the purpose of providing legal advice. The opinions expressed in this commentary are the opinions of the individual author and may not reflect the opinions of Perkins Coie LLP or any other individual attorney at the firm.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kathleen M. O'Sullivan is a partner in the Seattle office of the law firm Perkins Coie LLP. Ms. O'Sullivan is the co-chair of the firm's Appellate Practice Group and focuses her practice in the area of class action litigation, complex business litigation, and constitutional and appellate litigation. She is a member of the American Law Institute's Members Consultative Group on the Principles of the Law of Aggregate Litigation. Ms. O'Sullivan received her J.D. from Georgetown University Law Center in 1996 and her B.A. from Yale University in 1991.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

125 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joseph B. McDonnell on Evans v. Doherty Construction, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 2316

Joseph B. McDonnell on Evans v. Doherty Construction, Inc., 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 382 (April 25, 2008)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

May 15, 2008

SUMMARY: The Illinois Workers Compensation Act requires an employer who has obtained reimbursement of compensation benefits paid to an employee to pay the employees attorney 25 % of the amount reimbursed, plus a pro-rata share of employees litigation expenses. Evans v. Doherty Construction holds that an employer cannot avoid this obligation by selling the right to reimbursement to the defendants sued by the employee and being dismissed from the case.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Sale of Workers Compensation Lien Rights Did Not Relieve Employer of Obligation to Pay Attorneys Fees and Expenses

Statutory Scheme for Reimbursement, Cost Sharing and Fees. An employee who is injured in a work-related accident has the right, under Sec. 5(b) of the Illinois Workers Compensation Act, to sue a third party who may be legally liable for damages. 820 ILCS 305/5(b) (first paragraph). If a recovery is made against that third party, either by suit or settlement, the employee is required to reimburse the employer the amount of the compensation paid or to be paid by the employer to the employee. 820 ILCS 305/5(b) (second paragraph); Ramsey v. Morrison 175 Ill.2d 218 (1997); Wilson v. Hoffman Group, Inc., 131 Ill.2d 308 (1989). Out of the reimbursement, the employer is required to pay a pro rata share of the costs and expenses of the action; and if the services of the employees attorney have contributed to the procurement of the proceeds out of which the employer is reimbursed, then, in the absence of any other agreement between them, the employer must pay to the employees attorney 25% of the gross amount of the reimbursement. 820 ILCS 305/5(b) (second paragraph); Silva v. Electrical Systems, Inc., 183 Ill.2d 356 (1998); Reno v. Maryland Casualty Co. 27 Ill.2d 245 (1962).

In Evans v. Doherty Construction, Inc., the First District considered whether a sale or an assignment by the employer of its lien rights relieved it of its obligation under Sec. 5(b) to pay attorneys fees and a pro rata share of the plaintiffs litigation expenses. Ashta, plaintiffs employer, had been third-partied in plaintiffs action against several defendants, and had reached an agreement with the third parties to sell its lien rights to them for $90,000.00. (The amount of its lien was $152,000.00). It claimed thereafter that it had no liability to the plaintiff for fees and expenses because it had not received reimbursement, within the meaning of Sec. 5(b), from any settlement made with the plaintiff. The trial judge disagreed and ordered payment by the employer of $22,500 in fees out of the $90,000 received by the employer plus a proportionate share of the plaintiffs litigation expenses. Ashta appealed.

History and Rationale. Until 1957, there was no provision in the Illinois Workers Compensation Act for payment of attorneys fees by the employer even if the lien was enforced and reimbursement was obtained by the employer. The employer was entitled to full reimbursement without deduction for fees or costs incurred by the employee and the employees attorney in procuring the recovery. Hardwick v. Munsterman, 15 Ill.2d at 567 (1959). To remedy this inequity, the legislature added the second paragraph of Sec. 5(b) which requires the employer to contribute to the necessary costs of the employees recovery against a negligent third party where the employer is to receive reimbursement from the recovery for workmens compensation payments made or to be made to the employee. Reno v. Maryland Casualty Co., 27 Ill.2d 245 (1962) (construing amendment by Laws 1957, p. 610, Sec. 1, eff. July 11, 1957; emphasis added). The provision was based on the belief that the employer should share in the fees and costs associated with the employees lawsuit because the litigation benefits the employer by providing a fund from which the employer can obtain reimbursement of its workers compensation payments. Silva v. Electrical Systems, Inc., 183 Ill.2d 356 (1998) (emphasis added).

In Silva, the Illinois Supreme Court, in construing Sec. 5(b), pointed out that the obligation to pay attorneys fees under the statute arises where an employer is able to obtain reimbursement for the workers compensation benefits it has paid. Silva v. Electrical Systems, Inc., 183 Ill.2d at 363 (1998). The principle behind the fee provision of the statute, the Court continued, is that employers should pay their fair share of the cost of their employees tort recoveries against third parties because those recoveries benefit the employers by enabling them to receive reimbursement for their workers compensation payments. Silva, 183 Ill.2d at 364.

In 1957, when Sec. 5(b) was amended to provide for employers contribution to a plaintiffs recovery by payment of fees and expenses out of the employers reimbursement, there was no right of action for contribution against the employer by defendants sued by the plaintiff-employee. Thus, there was no occasion in those days for an employer to sell or assign its lien for compensation benefits paid. Even where more than one non-employer defendant was sued by the employee, there was no right of contribution between them; joint and several liability was the order of the day. Even so, the operative phrase used in the 1957 statute to describe the liability of the employer for fees and expenses was out of any reimbursement. The legislature did not specify the source of such reimbursement and did not place any qualifications on the employers obligation to contribute to the plaintiffs fees and litigation expenses. All that was necessary was that the employer receive reimbursement of the statutory benefits paid by it to its employee.

In Evans, both the trial judge and the appellate court recognized that the vital element in the statute which triggers the employers obligation to share in the payment of fees and expenses is reimbursement. The legislature has determined that it is appropriate that the employer be responsible for payment of some portion of the fees and expenses incurred by its employee in pursuing rights against one or more third parties. Otherwise, the employer would be made completely whole by recovering the entire amount of its mandated workers compensation payments, even though the employee and the employees attorneys efforts may have been largely responsible for the recovery. Thus, the employer would be unjustly enriched--precisely the evil that the 1957 amendment was designed to overcome. Reno, supra, 27 Ill.2d at 248. Guided by the cardinal rule of statutory construction that the primary goal is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the legislature, both the trial court and the appellate court in Evans properly determined that the sale or assignment of the employers lien rights was ineffective to extinguish the employers liability under Sec. 5(b) for fees and expenses.

Non-delegable duties. Ashta made an effort in the trial court to transfer its liability for fees and expenses to the principal defendants pursuant to the assignment. That effort went nowhere. It is elementary contract law that a valid delegation of duties does not relieve the delegator of obligations under the contract. (Cf., e.g., Sec. 2-210 of the Uniform Commercial Code which, although applicable to contracts for the sale of goods, specifies that a party may perform his duty through a delegate unless otherwise agreed or unless the other party has a substantial interest in having his original promisor perform or control the acts required by the contract. 810 ILCS 5/2-210). All the more inappropriate would be an attempted delegation of duties specifically imposed on an employer by statute, and in which an employee, as plaintiff, has a substantial interest.

Practice Strategy. Where the legislature has addressed a perceived inequity and has prescribed a specific procedure to cure that inequity, courts are loath to allow an evasion of the legislative mandate by artful and imaginative transactions that have the effect of eliminating the remedy or emasculating the obligation. There is, of course, a recognized method of avoiding the obligation of the employer to pay the attorneys fees and expenses: by a waiver of the compensation lien. A waiver by the employer of its statutory right to reimbursement of benefits paid to its employee discharges the employer from liability to any other tortfeasor under the Contribution Act. The amount of the waiver is then deducted from any judgment against such other tortfeasor. Sec. 2(c), Joint Tortfeasor Contribution Act (740 ILCS 100/2(c); Kotecki v. Cyclops Welding Corp., 146 Ill.2d 155 (1991), Wilson v. Hoffman Group, Inc., 131 Ill.2d 308 (1989). Where the employer waives its statutory right to reimbursement of the compensation benefits paid, there has been no reimbursement to the employer from which attorneys fees may be paid, and the employer is therefore not liable for the payment of such fees. Sec. 5(b), Workers Compensation Act, 820 ILCS 305/5(b); LaFever v. Kemlite Co., 185 Ill.2d 380 (1998).

This may be the prudent course to take on behalf of the employer where its liability in contribution may negate its right of reimbursement for compensation benefits paid. Its liability for contribution is capped by the total amount of compensation benefits paid (Kotecki v. Cyclops Welding Corp., 146 Ill.2d 155 (1991)), and it can avoid any liability for contribution to any other tortfeasor (Higginbottom v. Pillsbury Co., 232 Ill.App.3d 240 (5th Dist. 1992)) as well as the statutory obligation for plaintiffs fees and expenses, by waiving its right to reimbursement of benefits paid. LaFever v. Kemlite Co., 185 Ill.2d 380 (1998). The plaintiff will not suffer, because the plaintiff is relieved of the obligation of repayment of the compensation benefits under Sec. 5(b), and the principal defendants, in turn, will benefit from the set-off of the amount of the compensation benefits paid by the employer. Wilson v. Hoffman Group, Inc., 131 Ill.2d 308 (1989).

For additional discussion of employee and employer rights in the context of third party suits, see Illinois Jurisprudence, Workers' Compensation, Chapter 9 THIRD PARTY SUITS-INDEMNITY, CONTRIBUTION AND SUBROGATION

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

126 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mike Wilson on Edwards v. Hickman, 237 S.W.3d 183 (Ky. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2309

Mike Wilson on Edwards v. Hickman, 237 S.W.3d 183 (Ky. 2007)

By Mike Wilson

May 13, 2008

SUMMARY: Can Rule 34 be used to compel production of records owned by entities that are not named parties? The Kentucky Supreme Court ruled in Edwards v. Hickman, 237 S.W.3d 183 (Ky. 2007) that if a party has control over records that belong to an alter-ego non-party, production of the records can be compelled from that party. This commentary, written by Mike Wilson, explores the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Why make a Rule 34 request for documents that do not belong to a party? Edwards v. Hickman involved brothers, Stephen and Mark Edwards, who disputed ownership of various businesses. To understand how non-parties came to have documents that were sought from parties under Rule 34, a description of the creation of the various businesses is required.

Bill Edwards, the father of the two brothers, incorporated Edwards House Movers, Inc. Initially, 90% of the shares were owned by Bill, the father, 5% by Bills wife, and 5% by the son Stephen. A few years later, during the midst of a divorce, Bill, the father, transferred his 90% ownership to the son Mark. The dispute between the brothers arose from Stephens claim that the 90% ownership transferred by his father to Mark was in trust and that Mark was supposed to divide the ownership equally between the three siblings (Mark, Stephen, and Lynn) after certain conditions had occurred. This division was never made.

Instead, in 1992, the company was renamed and restructured, resulting in the creation of Edwards Holdings, Inc. and Edwards Moving & Rigging, Inc., which was wholly owned by Edwards Holdings. Edwards Holdings was owned 90% by Mark, 5% by Stephen, and 5% by Lynn, his sister.

In 1999, Mark incorporated Fireside Properties, Inc., and issued all of its stock to himself. Fireside became the sole general partner in two limited partnerships, Cleo Housing, Ltd. and Cleo Housing II, Ltd., created in 1999 and 2003. Stephen claimed these entities were created with assets from the Edwards companies in which Stephen had an ownership interest, and, therefore, gave him an ownership interest in Fireside Properties and the Cleo partnerships.

Stephen sued Mark and the two Edwards companies intervened to join as parties. In the course of discovery, Stephen requested that Mark produce documents for non-parties Fireside and the two Cleo partnerships. Fireside and the Cleo partnerships then intervened for the limited purpose of opposing the Rule 34 request. The trial court ordered that the Mark produce the records and the non-parties sought a writ of prohibition, claiming that the trial court lacked jurisdiction to order production of documents by non-parties. The Court of Appeals agreed. The Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeals on this point, stating that the Court of Appeals had misconceived the issue.

Control is the issue. Orders sustaining the requests to produce were directed at parties, not at the non-parties, the Supreme Court noted. [T]he issue is not whether the affected business entities were parties to the lawsuit, but whether the documents sought were in the possession, custody or control of the party upon whom the request is served. Edwards, p. 189.

The Supreme Courts decision in this case seemed influenced by two factors. First, Mark was the sole officer and incorporator of Fireside, which, in turn, was the sole general partner in both Cleo partnerships. This, the Supreme Court said, meant Mark had possession, custody, or control of the business and financial records of Fireside Properties and, by extension, the Cleo partnerships. Edwards, p. 190. In fact, in this case Mark had actually permitted inspection of some of the requested documents.

Second, the court said that immunizing the documents from Rule 34 would require courts to succumb to transactional sleight-of-hand and allow the owner of such a closely held business to increase the complexity and cost of litigation by forcing the party seeking discovery to resort to an alternative such as a deposition combined with a subpoena under CR 45 despite the fact that the sole owner of the business entity in question is a named party and exercises complete control over the business's records.

Edwards, p. 189. This, said the Court, would be at odds with the notion that Civil Rules are to be construed to secure the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action. Edwards, at p. 189, citing Grange Mut. Ins. Co. v. Trude, 151 S.W.3d 803, 814 (Ky. 2004).

Must the non-party be an alter-ego? Edwards, citing Metropolitan Property & Cas. Ins. Co. v. Overstreet, 103 S.W.3d 31, 45 (Ky.2003) says that control is the legal right to obtain the documents requested upon demand and that [o]rdinarily, a mere shareholder or partner will not exercise such a degree of control over corporate records sufficient to satisfy the requirement of having a legal right to obtain them on demand, unless the relationship between the shareholder or partner and the business is so close as to make the business little more than an alter-ego.

Edwards, p. 190.

Strategic considerations. Where practitioners seek Rule 34 production of records of non-party entities owned 100% by a party, Edwards should be sufficient authority to obtain the production under the alter-ego analogy. It is not clear what the result would be in other situations. If the party owns a controlling interest but is not sole owner, must he or she use the controlling position to demand the documents? If a minority owner, can the party be compelled to exercise rights to demand inspection of certain corporate records under KRS 271B.16-020(2) or partnership records under KRS 362.408?

Counsel arguing to prohibit disclosure can cite the alter-ego language in the Edwards opinion and characterize demand as meaning an unqualified right exercisable without others having any say in the matter. Counsel seeking disclosure can point out that in Edwards disclosure of records for the Cleo limited partnerships was required, although the party controlled only Fireside, the general partner in the Cleo partnerships.

Counsel seeking to avoid the application of Rule 34 to interrelated companies through the use of nondisclosure agreements should be aware of Ice Corp. v. Hamilton Sundstrand Corp., 245 F.R.D. 513 (D.Kan.,2007), which held that the ability to obtain documents on demand is not affected by the source's retention of ownership or its unilaterally imposed restriction on disclosure.

For additional discussion of Rule 34, see Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book § 84.00 Practice Context for Discovery-Requests for Production of Documents and Things or for Inspection of Property and Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 84.01 Form 84.01 Request for Production of Documents, Etc., Under Rule 34 (Form 19).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mike Wilson, J.D., University of Kentucky, has been a practicing attorney since 1980. He is a contributor to Caldwell's Kentucky Legal Forms, 5th Ed., Lexis-Nexis, 2006, teaches law to paralegals at Sullivan University, Lexington, Kentucky, and has prepared instructional material for numerous continuing legal education seminars for paralegals. He also is an administrative law judge for the Kentucky Department of Education.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

127 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Hedges on Access or Confidentiality: The Sunshine in Litigation Act of 2008

2008 Emerging Issues 2285

Hedges on Access or Confidentiality: The Sunshine in Litigation Act of 2008

By Ronald J. Hedges

May 12, 2008

SUMMARY: Will the Sunshine in Litigation Act strike the appropriate balance between privacy and openness or would it make civil litigation more expensive, more burdensome, and less accessible? Find out what Ronald J. Hedges of Nixon Peabody LLP in New York and former U.S. Magistrate Judge has to say about the potential impact of this proposed legislation.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Introduction. Rule 26(c) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure authorizes the United States District Courts to issue protective orders which, among other things, limit disclosure of information produced in discovery. Courts have developed balancing tests to determine whether such orders should issue. n1 These judge-crafted balancing tests, as well as the broad discretion afforded judges to enter protective orders, will be affected should the Sunshine in Litigation Act of 2008 (the Act) be enacted into law. n2 The Act will also address the sealing of settlements and court records.

Legislative Purpose. I rise today to introduce the Sunshine in Litigation Act of , a bill to curb the ongoing abuse of secrecy orders in Federal courts. The result of this abuse, which often comes in the form of sealed settlement agreements, is to keep important health and safety information from the public. Floor Statement of Senator Kohl, 154 Cong. Rec. S15140 (Dec. 11, 2007).

Senator Kohl continued on to explain what he perceives to be a decades-long problem, which frequently arises in areas such as products liability where individual plaintiffs are pitted against large corporate defendants:

Facing a formidable opponent and mounting medical bills, plaintiffs often have no choice but to settle the litigation. In exchange for the award he or she was seeking, the victim is forced to agree to a provision that prohibits him or her from revealing information disclosed during the litigation.

Id. at S15140. The individual plaintiff is compensated, and the defendant is able to keep damaging information from becoming public. Id. However, according to Senator Kohl, the private gain of the parties is offset by the costs paid by the American public as a result of remaining unaware of critical public health and safety information that could potentially save lives. Id.

The Act is clearly not intended to prevent the use of protective orders in situations involving trade secrets and other truly confidential company information. Id. Senator Kohl explicitly limited the focus of the Act to instances where protective orders are used for the sole purpose of hiding damaging information from the public to protect a company's reputation or profit margin. Id. Senator Kohl concluded:

The Sunshine in Litigation Act is a modest proposal that would require Federal judges to perform a simple balancing test to ensure that the defendant's interest in secrecy truly outweighs the public interest in information related to public health and safety. Id. at S15141.

Whatever the merits of these statements may be and there are certainly arguments pro and con -- the Act deserves broad attention by the legal community for what it will do if it is enacted.

New Section 1660 Would Be Added to U.S. Code. The Act would amend Title 28 of the United States Code to add a new Section 1660. n4 Section 1660(a)(1) would prohibit a court from entering an order restricting the disclosure of information obtained through discovery , approving a settlement agreement that would restrict the disclosure of such information, or  restricting access to court records in a civil case unless the Court has made findings of fact that

(A) Such Order would not restrict the disclosure of information which is relevant to the protection of public health or safety; or

(B) (i) the public interest in the disclosure of potential health or safety hazards is outweighed by a specific and substantial interest in maintaining the confidentiality of the information or records in question; and

(ii) the requested protective order is no broader than necessary to protect the privacy interest asserted.

Section 1660(a)(2) would provide that no protective order entered under (a)(1), other than an order approving a settlement agreement, shall continue in effect after the entry of final judgment unless a separate finding of fact was made that the requirements of (a)(1) have been met. Section 1660(a)(3) would allocate the burden of proof to the party seeking the order.

The Act would restrict party agreements. Section 1660(a)(4)(B) would apply the (a)(1) standards even if an order  is requested by application pursuant to the stipulation of the parties. Section 1660(a)(5)(B) would prohibit a party from requesting, as a condition for the production of discovery, that another party stipulate to an order that would violate this section.

Section 1660(a)(5)(A) would provide that, [t]he provisions of this section shall not constitute grounds for the withholding of information in discovery that is otherwise discoverable. Section 1660(b)(1) would bar a court from approving or enforcing any provision of an agreement or order that prohibits or otherwise restricts a party from disclosing any information  to any Federal or State agency with authority to enforce laws regulating an activity related to such information. However, as provided by Section 1660(b)(2), [a]ny such information disclosed to a Federal or State agency shall be confidential to the extent provided by law.

Section 1660(c)(1) would prohibit enforcement of any provision of a settlement agreement described under  [Section 1660(a)(1)] that prohibits a party from:

(A) disclosing that a settlement was reached or the terms of such settlement, other than the amount of money paid; or

(B) discussing a case, or evidence produced in the case, that involves matters related to public health or safety.

This prohibition would not apply if a court made findings of fact that the public interest in the disclosure of potential health or safety hazards is outweighed by a specific and substantial interest in maintaining the confidentiality of the information. Section 1660(c)(2).

Finally, Section 1660(d) would establish a rebuttable presumption that, [w]hen weighing the interest in maintaining confidentiality, the interest in protecting personally identifiable information relating to financial, health or similar information of an individual outweighs the public interest in disclosure. n5

If the Act Becomes Law. What should the litigator and the client expect should the Act become law? How will the federal courts respond to the Act? Here are some observations and possible practice tips.

1) Key Phrases Left Undefined. First, and most elementary, the phrases public health or safety and potential health or safety hazards are not defined in the Act. Regulatory agencies appear to agonize over such definitions. Also omitted from the Act is any guidance regarding the steps a party must take to prove that neither of the foregoing conditions will be negatively affected or exacerbated by the proposed order. Should a prima facie showing be sufficient? Should a court conduct a hearing and expect the parties to present expert testimony? If so, should this be done at what might be the earliest stage of litigation (say, the initial Rule 16(b) pretrial conference) before discovery has even been conducted? Will (or should) a party's reliance on a protective order entered before discovery started be a factor in a subsequent motion to dissolve or modify the order once a hazard is revealed in later discovery?

2) Stipulated Confidentiality Orders Prohibited. Second, the Act would prohibit stipulated confidentiality orders. n6 Will courts accept a prima facie showing that the requirements of Section 1660(a)(1) have been met, perhaps one agreed to by parties who are not in disagreement as to the need for an order? Would this be a stipulated protective order barred by the Act? If a prima facie showing will not be accepted, the day of the umbrella protective order in complex litigation that somehow affects public health or safety may become a relic of judicial history usable in some types of civil litigation but not in others. Is that in the public interest, when the costs of litigation (in the depletion of the resources of courts and parties) appear to be increasing exponentially due to discovery of electronically stored information?

By removing the ability of parties to bargain for the inclusion of a stipulated confidentiality order in a settlement agreement, it may be that the Act will discourage settlement for the party in the superior bargaining position by way of its ability to absorb litigation costs. Without a confidentiality order protecting their secrets, it may be more appealing for large corporate defendants to fully litigate claims brought by individuals, since there will be no way for corporate defendants to avoid damage to their reputation through the disclosure of sensitive information involved in the claim.

3) Burdens of Proof Conflated. Third, the Act conflates two very different burdens of proof. There is a fundamental distinction between confidentiality orders, which apply to the discovery process and the so-called fruits of discovery, and sealing orders, which purport to restrict access to materials filed with courts. n7 First amendment and federal common law standards already exist among the circuits which address the sealing of materials filed with courts. It is unclear where the balancing test required by the Act fits among this preexisting framework. Will the Act confuse the existing tests? It is a possibility that, without any instruction to the contrary, federal courts may simply use the Act's required balancing test to create a third, all-encompassing standard that combines the prior two? Only time (and adoption of the Act) will tell, as will the affect on judicial and party resources.

Additional References. For information about sealing orders generally, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 26.106 and Benders Forms of Discovery § 1.75. For information about sealing of settlement agreements in class action matters, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 23.194. For information about intervention to seek access to sealed documents, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.) § 24.11.

Return to Text

n1 . See, e.g., Pansy v. Burrough of Stroudsburg, 23 F.3d 772, 787 (3d Cir. 1994); Phillips v. General Motors Corp., 307 F.3d 1206, 1210-11 (9th Cir. 2002); see generally The Sedona Guidelines: Best Practices Addressing Protective Orders, Confidentiality & Public Access in Civil Cases (Mar. 2007) (hereinafter, The Sedona Guidelines), available at <http://www.thesedonaconference.org> (follow link to Publications).

n2 . S. 2449, 110th Cong.. § 1 (2007). S. 2449 was introduced on December 11, 2007 by Senator Kohl for himself and Senator Leahy. It was reported out of the Senate Judiciary Committee with amendment favorably by a 12-6 vote on March 6, 2008. THOMAS (Library of Congress), http://thomas.loc.gov/home/bills_res.html (follow Search Bill Summary, Status hyperlink; search for S. 2449 by bill number; then follow hyperlink for All Congressional Actions).

n3

[3]. See testimony before the Subcommittee on Antitrust, Competition Policy and Consumer Rights of the Senate Judiciary Committee on December 11, 2007, by Johnny Bradley, the Honorable Joseph F. Anderson, Jr., USDJ, Robert N. Weiner, Leslie A. Bailey, and Richard Zitran, and Stephen G. Morrison, available at <http://judiciary.senate.gov/hearing.cfm?id=3053>

n4

[4]. Unless otherwise noted, references will be to proposed U.S.C. §1660 rather than to S. 2449 itself. S. 2449 has three sections. Section 1 is the short title. Section 2 is titled, Restrictions on Protective Orders and Sealing of Cases and Settlements, and contains proposed U.S.C. §1660. Section 3 addresses the effective date of the Act.

n5

[5]. The final substantive provision of Section 1660 would address disclosure of classified information. Section 1660(e).

n6

[6]. Incidentally, such orders are already banned by the Third Circuit. See Pansy, 23 F.3d at 786.

For a discussion of the use of umbrella and particularized protective orders in complex litigation, see Manual for Complex Litigation, Fourth, § 11.432 (Federal Judicial Center: 2004).

n7

[7]. See, for this distinction, The Sedona Guidelines, supra n. 2, at 7, 16-17.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Ronald J. Hedges is counsel to Nixon Peabody LLP in its New York City office. He served as a United States Magistrate Judge in the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey from 1986 to 2007. Among other things, Mr. Hedges was a member of the Editorial Team for The Sedona Guidelines: Best Practices Addressing Protective Orders, Confidentiality & Public Access in Civil Cases (Mar. 2007). He was also the drafter of Local Civil Rule 5.3 of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, which established procedures for protective and sealing orders. For more information, or to contact Mr. Hedges, go to http://www.nixonpeabody.com/attorneys_detail1.asp?ID=1324. Mr. Hedges would like to thank Nixon Peabody associate Luis A. Casillas for his dedicated assistance on this project. Mr. Casillas is an associate in the firms Business Litigation Group, and is a recent graduate of the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

128 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sua Sponte Remand: Vairo on Ellenburg v. Spartan Motors Chassis, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 2286

Sua Sponte Remand: Vairo on Ellenburg v. Spartan Motors Chassis, Inc.

By Georgene Vairo

May 12, 2008

SUMMARY: In Ellenburg, the Fourth Circuit has held that a court of appeals has jurisdiction to review a sua sponte remand predicated on a procedural defect. This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author of several books, including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, explains how the court reached this holding notwithstanding 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Ellenburg v. Spartan Motors Chassis, Inc., 519 F.3d 192, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 5076 (4th Cir. Mar. 10, 2008), involves two removal issues: 1) Whether the court of appeals has jurisdiction to review a sua sponte remand predicated on a procedural defect; and 2) Whether a district may sua sponte remand based on a procedural defect. The Fourth Circuit joined the majority view with respect to the second issue, holding that a district court exceeded its authority in remanding a case sua sponte based on a perceived procedural error in the notice of remand.

Facts and Procedural Background. Plaintiff filed a state court action seeking actual, incidental, consequential, and punitive damages and replacement of a vehicle or refund of its purchase price. No dollar amount was stated for the vehicle's value or the amount of damages. The defendants removed the case to federal court, alleging that the parties were diverse and that the value of the matter in controversy exceeded the sum of $75,000. Six days later, sua sponte and without notice to the parties, the district court remanded the case to state court on the ground that the notice of removal failed to allege facts adequate to establish the jurisdictional amount. Nowhere in its opinion did the court actually address or find that subject matter jurisdiction over this case did not exist. Instead the opinion stated that the Notice of Removal alleging that the value of the matter in controversy exceeded $ 75,000 was insufficient "to establish that the jurisdictional amount ha[d] been satisfied."

The defendants timely filed a motion to alter or amend the court's order pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 59(e), arguing that they could unquestionably demonstrate that the amount in controversy exceeded the jurisdictional threshold. They attached to their motion an affidavit from one of defendants employees, as well as the bill of sale for Ellenburg's recreational vehicle, together clearly establishing that the sales price of the vehicle in question was $327,669. Without mentioning that it had failed to provide defendants the opportunity to oppose the order, the district court nonetheless denied the motion because a Rule 59(e) motion cannot be used to raise arguments which could have been raised prior to the issuance of the judgment. The district court then reiterated that the Notice of Removal failed to present a sufficient factual basis on which the Court could make an informed decision as to whether Plaintiff can or cannot recover damages in excess of $ 75,000 in this case.

Spartan appealed, presenting the single issue of whether the district court erred in remanding the case. The Fourth Circuit reversed the district court's order of remand and remanded the case to the district court for further proceedings.

Sua Sponte Remand Based on Procedural Insufficiency Is Reviewable. The Fourth Circuit first held that 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) did not bar review of the remand order. That section prohibits review of remand orders within the scope of § 1447(c). Section 1447(c) provides for remands based on: (1) lack of subject matter jurisdiction, which may be raised at any time, or (2) a defect in removal procedure a procedural defect as opposed to a lack of subject matter jurisdiction raised by motion no more than 30 days after the filing of the notice of appeal.

The Fourth Circuit began with a review of the applicable Supreme Court pronouncements on § 1447(d). That section precludes review of a remand order even if the appellate court believes the order is erroneous because Congress wanted to limit the forum selection battle. It noted, however, that even though that policy is important, the protection against delay caused by review has been tightly circumscribed by the Supreme Courts strict approach to what § 1447(d) proscribes. Section 1447(d) bars review of only remand orders within the scope of § 1447(c), i.e., those based on (1) a district court's lack of subject matter jurisdiction or (2) a defect in removal "other than lack of subject matter jurisdiction" that was raised by the motion of a party within 30 days after the notice of removal was filed.

When remand is based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction, the remand order may be entered at any time, and the lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be noticed by the district court sua sponte or by any party. A remand order based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction, whether sua sponte or not, falls within the scope of § 1447(c) and therefore, pursuant to § 1447(d), is not reviewable by a court of appeals. But when a remand would be justified by a defect in removal other than a lack of subject matter jurisdiction, the Fourth Circuit reads § 1447(c) to require that the defect must be asserted by a party's motion to remand filed within 30 days.

Here, the district court, considering remand without having a motion to remand before it, stated that the case was before it "for a determination as to whether it ha[d] jurisdiction over the matter." But then the court ruled not that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction, but rather that the defendants' allegations of diversity jurisdiction were "inadequate" and that their Notice of Removal failed "to establish that the amount in controversy exceeds the jurisdictional amount." Even though the defendants alleged in their Notice of Removal that the value of the matter in controversy exceeded $ 75,000, the district court concluded that that allegation alone was insufficient and that the defendants had to make a factual showing. In other words, the district court applied a particular standard for assessing the sufficiency of the filing, but did not consider whether subject matter jurisdiction in fact existed. Accordingly, the district court's selection and application of a legal standard for pleading in a notice of removal remained reviewable as a "conceptual antecedent" to the remand order.

Comment. Finding that appellate jurisdiction exists here is a bit of a stretch, but is consistent with the court of appeals practice of finding ways of reviewing even when at first glance it would appear that 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) should bar review. No good deed goes unpunished surely Congress intended to end the forum selection battle as soon as possible. And, the Fourth Circuit correctly noted that Congress understood that this would mean that there would be no review of a remanded case even when the appellate court knows that the case should remain in the federal court. And, looking at it on a case-by-case basis, surely the appellate courts are not unhappy about being spared the job of monitoring district court remands. However, an interpretation of § 1447(d) that would deprive the appellate courts of the opportunity to stop the wholesale inappropriate remand by district courts of cases that should be in federal court is a real problem. Like the district court in the Thermtron Prods., Inc. v. Hermansdorfer, 423 U.S. 336, 351, 96 S. Ct. 584, 46 L. Ed. 2d 542 (1976), who remanded because it was too busy to hear the case, the district court in Ellenburg went over the magic line by being a bit too hasty and obvious in trying to ditch the case.

Being too busy is not a ground for remand under § 1447(c), said the Supreme Court in Thermtron. So, the Fourth Circuit cloaked itself in the Thermtron limiting approach to § 1447(d) with some heavy duty language: We may review a conceptual antecedent ruling even if it was an essential precursor to a remand order that is itself unreviewable under § 1447(d). In other words, an otherwise reviewable ruling is not necessarily shielded from review merely because it is a constituent aspect of a remand order that appears to be on an appropriate ground under § 1447(c). The Fourth Circuit's approach is another example of an interpretation of § 1447(d) that interpret[s] § 1447(d) to cover less than the words alone suggest. Powerex Corp. v. Reliant Energy Servs., Inc., 127 S. Ct. 2411, 2415, 168 L. Ed. 2d 112 (2007).

So, an analysis that may seem to strain or push the boundary of § 1447(d) is not unusual and is necessary to ensure a proper policing of district court remand orders. As the Fourth Circuit put it: When considering § 1447(d), we are instructed not to extinguish the power of an appellate court to correct a district court that has not merely erred in applying the requisite provision for remand but has remanded a case on grounds not specified in the statute and not touching the propriety of the removal. (quoting Thermtron, 423 U.S. at 352.) Indeed, the Fourth Circuit began the next section by noting that its decision to review the remand order forecasted its ruling on the merits of the remand order.

Sua Sponte Remand Exceeded District Court's Authority. The rest was easy. The fact that the district court's remand fell outside the scope of Section 1447(c) led the Fourth Circuit to conclude that it also fell outside the district court's authority to order remand sua sponte. Section 1447(c) assigns the responsibility of policing non-jurisdictional questions regarding the propriety of removal to the parties, not to the court. The parties may assert procedural defects if they wish, but they may ignore such defects if they prefer to remain in federal court.

Comment. Circuits are split regarding whether the district court may raise procedural defects sua sponte. The Fourth Circuit joined the majority of sister circuits in holding that in the absence of a motion from a party, a district court may not remand a case based on a procedural defect. See Moore's Federal Practice § 107.41[1][a][ii] (collecting cases). The majority view is the preferable view. Some plaintiffs may not mind having their cases removed to federal court. Maybe the district court judge is preferable to them than the state court judge that has been assigned to the case. For whatever reason, once properly in federal court because subject matter jurisdiction exists, a plaintiff has a right to remain there even if there was a procedural defect in the removal process itself. By sua sponte remanding on a procedural ground, the district court deprived the plaintiff of this right to remain in federal court.

Jurisdictional Allegations in Removal Notice Were Sufficient. As an additional ground for reversal, the Fourth Circuit held that the unchallenged allegations in the removal notice were sufficient to establish diversity jurisdiction. Section 1446(a) requires only a short and plain statement of the grounds for removal and that it be signed pursuant to Rule 11. The Fourth Circuit noted that this language is deliberately parallel to the requirements for notice pleading in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a). Therefore, the district court should not have required the defendants to meet a higher pleading standard in the removal notice than the one imposed on plaintiffs with respect to an initial complaint. A notice that alleges that the parties are of diverse citizenship and that [t]he matter in controversy exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum specified by 28 U.S.C. § 1332 is sufficient to establish jurisdictional grounds for removal. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 84; Fed. R. Civ. P. app. Form 2(a). The Fourth Circuit acknowledged that if the jurisdictional allegations are challenged, the removing party must demonstrate the jurisdictional basis for removal, but even then the burden is no greater than that required to establish federal jurisdiction as alleged in a complaint.

Instructions on Remand. The Fourth Circuit specified that on remand, the district court may sua sponte inquire whether it has subject matter jurisdiction and may impose on the defendants the burden of demonstrating jurisdiction. Alternatively, it may invite a motion to remand based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction and resolve that motion as it would any other motion, again imposing the burden of demonstrating jurisdiction on the defendants. If the court concludes that it does not have subject matter jurisdiction, then it must remand the case to state court.

References. 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 107.14[2][g][v], 107.41[1][a][ii], 107.44[2][b]; 19 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 202.11[5].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moores Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

129 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Stream of Commerce: Vairo on Steinbuch v. Culter

2008 Emerging Issues 2287

Stream of Commerce: Vairo on Steinbuch v. Culter

By Georgene Vairo

May 12, 2008

SUMMARY: In Steinbuch, a case alleging invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress, the Eighth Circuit applied the stream-of-commerce theory to support general jurisdiction. This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author of several books, including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, addresses the Eighth Circuit's noteworthy analysis.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Steinbuch v. Cutler, 518 F.3d 580, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 4809 (8th Cir. Mar. 6, 2008), involves a possibly expansive use of stream-of-commerce theory to support general jurisdiction. The Eighth Circuit held that the district court erred by not providing the plaintiff with limited discovery to support the assertion of general personal jurisdiction over a publisher who delivered its products to a regional distributor with an expectation that the distributor would penetrate the forum state. Steinbuch is important because stream-of-commerce theory is usually applied to support specific jurisdiction as opposed to general jurisdiction.

Background. Generally, the stream-of-commerce (SOC) Theory is used in product liability and similar personal injury cases in which the plaintiff claims injury due to a defective product that is manufactured somewhere in the world, causing injury in a particular state. The Steinbuch case involves considerably more colorful facts. The plaintiff, Robert Rob Steinbuch sued his former colleague, Jessica Cutler, and several corporate defendants who published or were involved in the distribution of Cutler's book, alleging invasion of privacy and intentional infliction of emotional distress. While Steinbuch was counsel to the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee in Washington, the plaintiff had had a sexual relationship with Cutler, who also served as a congressional staff member at the time. Unbeknownst to him, she had detailed this relationship and her relationships with several other men on her weblog.

Steinbuch was not named in the weblog, but he was identified by his initials, and sometimes referred to as Rob. Various postings also included personal information, such as his place of employment, religious affiliation, and physical attributes. For example, she wrote that: "RS looks just like George Clooney when he takes off his glasses." Steinbuch admitted that he had a brief liaison with Cutler but denied particular statements she made in her weblog about some of his alleged sexual preferences and practices. He apparently had no problem with the George Clooney look-alike comment. About a year later, she published a fictionalized book based on her website, which was distributed throughout the United States. The other defendants were the book publisher and its parent company, and a television company that had purchased an option to make a television series based on the book, along with its parent company.

Steinbuch, having moved on and taken a position as a professor of law at the University of Arkansas, filed suit in Arkansas. None of the defendants resided, were incorporated, or had their principal place of business in Arkansas. The district court dismissed the claims against the publisher and its parent for lack of personal jurisdiction, and dismissed the television company and its parent based on failure to state a claim. The claims against the individual defendant were stayed after she filed for bankruptcy and were not involved in the appeal.

Jurisdictional Standards. The party asserting jurisdiction bears the burden of establishing a prima facie case. Johnson v. Woodcock, 444 F.3d 953, 955 (8th Cir. 2006). To survive a motion to dismiss, the plaintiff must state sufficient facts in the complaint to support a reasonable inference that defendants may be subjected to jurisdiction in the forum state. Denver v. Hentzen Coatings, Inc., 380 F.3d 1070, 1072 (8th Cir. 2004).

Due process requires minimum contacts"" between a nonresident defendant and the forum state, such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice."" World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 291-292, 100 S. Ct. 559, 62 L. Ed. 2d 490 (1980). This inquiry focuses on whether the defendant purposely availed itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum state and thereby invoked the benefits and protections of its laws. Hanson v. Denckla, 357 U.S. 235, 253, 78 S. Ct. 1228, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1283 (1958). Personal jurisdiction may be either general, if the defendant's connections with the forum state are continuous and systematic, or specific, if the injury giving rise to the suit occurred within or had some connection to the forum state, meaning that the defendant purposely directed its activities at the forum state and the claim arose out of or relates to those activities. Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz, 471 U.S. 462, 472, 105 S. Ct. 2174, 85 L. Ed. 2d 528 (1985) (specific jurisdiction); Keeton v. Hustler Magazine, Inc., 465 U.S. 770, 779, 104 S. Ct. 1473, 79 L. Ed. 2d 790 (1984) (general jurisdiction).

To evaluate the sufficiency of a defendant's contacts, a court considers five factors, affording the first three primary importance: (1) the nature and quality of the defendant's contacts with the forum state, (2) the quantity of such contacts, (3) the relation of the cause of action to the contacts, (4) the interests of the forum state in providing a forum for its residents, and (5) the convenience of the parties. Burlington Industries, Inc. v. Maples Industries, Inc., 97 F.3d 1100, 1102 (8th Cir. 1996). The third factor applies only in the specific jurisdiction context and is immaterial in a general jurisdictional inquiry. Johnson v. Woodcock, 444 F.3d 953, 956 (8th Cir. 2006).

Specific Personal Jurisdiction Was Not Shown. The plaintiff argued that specific jurisdiction could be exercised over the publisher under the Calder effects test because the publisher knew that the brunt of the harm would be felt by him in the state in which he lived and worked. See Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 789-790, 104 S. Ct. 1482, 79 L. Ed. 2d 804 (1984). This was unlikely, as the publication of the book occurred around the same time the plaintiff moved to Arkansas. In any event, the plaintiff had not alleged in his complaint that he resided in Arkansas at the time of publication, nor had he provided an affidavit in the district court to that effect. Accordingly, he had not met his burden of proving specific personal jurisdiction.

Remand Was Required on General Jurisdiction Issue. The plaintiff argued that general personal jurisdiction existed with respect to the publisher because the publisher purposely availed itself of the protections of the forum state laws by continuously and deliberately exploiting the Arkansas market. In support of this argument, he produced a list of approximately 30 different titles from the publisher available in a particular Arkansas bookstore, affidavits by several individuals who purchased the book in Arkansas, and an affidavit declaring that the book was available at all major bookstores in Arkansas, as well as through the state's central public library system.

The district court had found that general jurisdiction was not present, emphasizing the relatively small numbers of the book sold in Arkansas and the lack of a substantial advertising campaign there. In a general jurisdiction inquiry, however, the court looks to the defendant's general presence in the forum and is not limited to contacts related to the case. The focus lies on whether the contacts are continuous and systematic. Because the affidavits by individuals who purchased the book in Arkansas implied that the publisher had profited from the sale of its books in the state, the inquiry centered on whether the publisher's forum contacts were such that it purposely availed itself of the privilege of conducting business in the state and should therefore have reasonably anticipated being haled into court.

While mere placement of a product into the stream of commerce, without more, is insufficient to constitute purposeful availment, a court may exercise jurisdiction over a seller who delivered its products to a regional distributor with an expectation that the distributor would penetrate the forum state. The publisher here granted the distributor the exclusive right and sole responsibility for distribution of its publications throughout the U.S. and did not explicitly target specific states or regions, but it did require written monthly sales reports. This fact would permit an inference that the publisher had reasonable expectations and knowledge that its products were going to be offered in the Arkansas market.

There was also evidence that the publisher was actively involved in marketing plans and promotions of books placed in stores. The publisher's agreement with the distributor provided that they would consult with respect to establishing marketing plans, sales forecasting, determining appropriate print runs, and planning advertising and promotional campaigns. The publisher may have been involved in the promotion and marketing of its books and might have reasonably expected their distribution in Arkansas.

This evidence was not sufficient to show a prima facie case of general personal jurisdiction over the publisher, as it did not show enough specifics about the quality and quantity of the publisher's contacts with Arkansas or the publisher's exploitation of the Arkansas market. However, the district court had denied discovery on jurisdiction. Because the current record reflected that the plaintiff had offered documentary evidence, and not merely speculations or conclusory allegations, about the publisher's contacts with Arkansas, the district court should not have dismissed his action without permitting him to take some jurisdictional discovery to establish whether general personal jurisdiction would be justified. Consequently, the Eighth Circuit remanded the claim against the publisher for an opportunity for tailored discovery to elicit whether its contacts with Arkansas were so continuous and systematic as to warrant general personal jurisdiction.

The publisher's parent company, on the other hand, argued that it was separate from its subsidiary and did not publish or distribute the book. The plaintiff contended that the parent engaged in continuous and systematic business activity in Arkansas, pointing to its cable television programs in the state. However, the plaintiff failed to meet his burden of proving jurisdiction by providing any affidavits, testimony, or documents in response to the parent's affidavit denying control over the publisher and denying that it had continuous and systematic contacts in the state. Nor did the district court abuse its discretion by granting a stay of discovery against the parent when the plaintiff failed to rebut its affidavits and offered only speculative and conclusory assertions about the parent's contacts with the forum state.

Dismissal for Failure to State Claim Was Affirmed. The Eighth Circuit also affirmed the dismissal of the television company and its parent based on failure to state a claim. This company had acquired an option to develop a television series based on the book, but had done nothing yet and therefore had not invaded the plaintiff's privacy or caused him emotional distress. The complaint was devoid of any factual support for the allegation that the plaintiff had been injured by the yet undeveloped television series.

References. 16 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 108.41, 108.42.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moores Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

130 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on Fischbarg v. Doucet, 9 N.Y.3d 375, 849 N.Y.S.2d 501 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2292

Bisceglie on Fischbarg v. Doucet, 9 N.Y.3d 375, 849 N.Y.S.2d 501 (2007)

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

May 12, 2008

SUMMARY: In Fischbarg v. Doucet, the Court of Appeals ruled that a clients hiring and subsequent communications with a lawyer in New York to litigate a case in Oregon supported long-arm jurisdiction in the lawyers subsequent suit for non-payment. Kyle C. Bisceglie, explains how Fischbarg v. Doucet, extends the reach of New Yorks long-arm statute for attorneys and other service professionals involved in disputes over fees.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Formation of Attorney-Client Relationship and Subsequent Communication with Lawyer in New York Sufficient for Long-Arm Jurisdiction

In Fischbarg v. Doucet, 9 N.Y.3d 375, 849 N.Y.S.2d 501 (2007), six judges of the New York Court of Appeals (with Judge Smith abstaining) unanimously upheld the exercise of jurisdiction under CPLR 302(a)(1) over two defendant-residents of California who retained and communicated with a lawyer in New York to represent their interest in a suit in Oregon. During the eleven-month representation, the lawyer never traveled to Oregon or California, and allegedly worked 238.4 hours from New York for a fee claimed to be $57,096.05. The clients, now defendants, never traveled to New York but communicated with the attorney via email, telephone, fax and U.S. mail. The Court noted that, during the representation, plaintiff and defendants spoke twice a week by telephone; defendants sent 31 emails and three faxes to plaintiff; and defendants sent documents by email or mail seven times. Id., 9 N.Y.3d at 378, 849 N.Y.S.2d at 504. The Court characterized this course of communication as regular and frequent.

After a dispute over the terms of engagement, Fischbarg resigned as attorney and sued for his fees in Oregon. The Oregon court denied his application for a fee while the underlying Oregon case was still pending. Shortly after the Oregon case settled, Fischbarg filed suit in New York. Defendants moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction under CPLR 3211(a)(8). The Supreme Court, and the Appellate Division in a 3-2 decision, denied the motion.

The Court of Appeals affirmed. The Court found that a defendant need not physically enter New York so long as the defendants activities here were purposeful and there is a substantial relationship between the transaction and the claim asserted. Id., 9 N.Y.3d at 380, 849 N.Y.S.2d at 505 (citations omitted). Purposeful activity requires a defendant to avail[] itself of the privilege of conducting activities within the forum State, thus invoking the privileges and benefits of its laws. Id. (citations omitted).

The defendants acts of reaching into New York to hire an attorney and their frequent communications with him in this state were sufficient to confer long-arm jurisdiction over the defendants. In a footnote, the Court noted that defendants benefited from New Yorks Client Bill of Rights found in 22 NYCRR 1210.1, which includes the right to a reasonable fee. That is the only benefit noted in Fischbarg. In fact, clients often receive additional benefits in New York. These include receipt of an engagement letter for representations likely to involve a fee in excess of $3,000, pursuant to 22 NYCRR 1215, and the right to arbitration, pursuant to Part 137 of the Rules of the Chief Administrator of the State of New York. The Fischbarg defendants apparently did not receive either of these benefits. See Fischbarg v. Doucet, 38 A.D.3d 270, 276; 832 N.Y.S.2d 164, 169-170 (1st Dept. 2007) (dissenting opinion) (Plaintiff did not prepare a retainer statement; the corporate defendant wrote to plaintiff to confirm the arrangement.).

In finding that defendants availed themselves of the benefits and protections of New Yorks laws governing lawyers by project[ing] themselves into New York via telephone to establish a continuing attorney-client relationship and repeatedly projecting themselves into New York via telephone, mail, e-mail and facsimile, the Court ruled that requiring defendants to defend a suit arising out of these contacts properly comport[ed] with traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. Fischbarg, 9 N.Y.3d at 385, 849 N.Y.S.2d at 509.

Haar Distinguished. Fischbarg surprised some observers in light of Haar v. Armendoris Corp., 31 N.Y.2d 1040, 342 N.Y.S.2d 70 (1973). In Haar, the Court of Appeals denied jurisdiction in a lawsuit filed by a New York licensed lawyer hired in Massachusetts by a Delaware Corporation to represent it in a transaction in New York. This representation by plaintiff was defendants only connection with New York. The Haar Court, however, found an agent cannot rely on its own activities in a forum to sue its principal. Adopting the dissenting decision of the Appellate Division, the Court of Appeals in Haar found that the present plaintiff is relying on his own activities within the State, rather than on defendants independent activities. Haar v. Armendoris Corp., 40 A.D.2d 769, 770, 337 N.Y.S.2d 285, 288 (1st Dept. 1972) (dissenting opinion).

Would the defendant in Haar find itself subject to suit in New York if it had emailed, called and/or faxed its attorney while he negotiated the transaction in New York? What if the attorney filed and litigated a prolonged lawsuit here? The Fischbarg Court concluded that the defendant in Haar had no New York contacts in connection with the plaintiffs representation of it. Its contacts were with its attorney in Massachusetts. What the Fischbarg Court meant by no New York contacts is unclear as the record in Haar makes no mention if the client communicated with its counsel in New York or not. See Haar, 40 A.D.2d 769, 337 N.Y.2d 285. In any event, the practice of law in the 21st Century involves much greater and more active communication through mobile phone and PDA-enabled electronic mail than existed in 1973. These telecommunication advances make facts as existed in Haar increasingly uncommon (viz., obtaining client instruction in one state and, then, going into New York as an advocate incommunicado with client).

Read together, Haar and Fischbarg suggest that the location of the lawyer hired affects the clients subsequent amenability to suit in New York. They also raise significant questions about how much location matters and the limits of these decisions. Practitioners seek meaningful practical guidance for prospective matters. Yet, like so many cases and courts before it, the Fischbarg Court reminds us that it is impossible to precisely fix those acts that constitute a transaction of business. This view begets more questions. Would the Court in Fischbarg find jurisdiction based solely on the New York engagement in circumstances where the lawyer traveled to Oregon and most of the communications took place there? Illustrating the same idea, what if most of the communications were outgoing from New York rather than directed into the forum?

New York precedent to date suggests no jurisdiction in these circumstances. Lower court decisions addressing the question typically involve qualitatively greater contacts with New York. For example, the Appellate Division found jurisdiction where the defendant hired a New York lawyer to represent it in New York litigation, hired other New York lawyers and participated in the proceeding through an agent. Colucci & Umans v. 1 Mark, Inc., 224 A.D.2d 243, 637 N.Y.S.2d 705 (1st Dept. 1996). Likewise, jurisdiction was found where defendant participated actively in bankruptcy and other proceedings venued here. Otterbourg, Steindler, Houston & Rosen v. Shreve City Apts. Ltd., 147 A.D.2d 327, 543 N.Y.S.2d 978 (1989). The court in Otterbourg identified the issue which Fischbarg leaves unaddressed: We need not, however, reach the issue of whether the retention of New York counsel to provide services in connection with legal proceedings in this State, without more, is sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the courts of this State in any action brought by the attorneys to recover their fees. Id., 147 A.D.2d at 332, 543 N.Y.S.2d at 981.

In Otterbourg, the Appellate Division observed that the defendants did more than merely retain plaintiff, noting 93 telephone calls, letters, settlement negotiations, settlements applying New York law, and retention of other attorneys among other activity directed at or in New York. Id. Likewise, the underlying matter in Otterbourg was venued in New York. The Fischbarg decision certainly demands far fewer purposeful acts than Otterbourg. Kaczorowski v. Black and Adams, 293 A.D.2d 358, 741 N.Y.S.2d 28 (1st Dept. 2002) potentially required even less. In Kaczorowski, the court found jurisdiction where plaintiff was retained and repeatedly consulted in New York on the matter. Unfortunately, the single-page decision does not expound on what is meant by repeatedly consulted. Id., 741 N.Y.S.2d at 29.

Physical Presence and Single-Transaction Jurisdiction. There has been considerable discussion whether or not a single act of particular quality or nature is enough to establish long-arm jurisdiction in New York. See, e.g., Hi Fashion Wigs, Inc. v. Hammond Adver., Inc., 32 N.Y.2d 583, 347 N.Y.S.2d 47 (1973); Reiner & Co., Inc. v. Schwartz, 41 N.Y.2d 648, 651-52, 394 N.Y.S.2d 844, 846 (1977). The clearest and perhaps only case for single-transaction jurisdiction involves physical presence. See Reiner, 41 N.Y.2d 648, 394 N.Y.S.2d 844. As a result, physical presence continues to be an important element of New York jurisdictional analysis. At the same time, physical presence is decreasingly relevant to the facts of professional services disputes which have, since the telecommunications revolution, increasingly been consummated and maintained without the professional and client ever meeting face-to-face. Fischbarg provides guidance on the type of non-physical contact sufficient to sustain long-arm jurisdiction.

The Fischbarg Court emphasized the quality of the defendants New York contacts. The Court noted that, after establishing an attorney-client relationship, defendants were communicating with plaintiff regularly, frequent[ly], and repeatedly. Additionally, plaintiff never left the state during the entirety of the representation. This necessarily increased the quality (and quantity) of contacts with New York.

Conclusions to be drawn from Fischbarg. First conclusion: telecommunication has come of age. The Court treated each email and telephone call as a significant, qualitative contact with New York. In particular, the attorney in Fischbarg was rendering services in an action pending in Oregon. The only activity in New York noted by the Court was a retention that did not even yield an engagement agreement and limited communication which of greatest significance included 31 emails and weekly telephone calls. Yet, in an age where it is not exceptional for people to exchange 31 electronic messages in a single day, New York now finds this sufficient to assert statutory jurisdiction. This is a significant development in the evolution of New Yorks jurisdictional law. Certainly not without basis, Fischbarg moves New York away from the importance of physical presence and, at the same time, gives greater legal consequence to acts of telecommunication. The Fischbarg Court analogized the facts of the case to the similar facts in Reiner yet noted the lack of physical presence in Fischbarg was immaterial, which is not something the Reiner Court was willing to say. The Court of Appeals, in effect, ruled that, where the dispute arises out a professional services contract, 31 emails and weekly telephone calls are the jurisdictional equivalent of one visit to New York.

Second conclusion: despite *Fischbarg*s emphasis on quality, the quantity of non-physical contacts still matters. In the context of professional services contracts, one federal court observed that New York is a retention-plus jurisdiction meaning jurisdiction is normally upheld if the defendant has additional contacts with the state in addition to, and relating to, the retainer agreement. Winston & Strawn v. Dong Won Secs. Co., Ltd., 02 Civ. 0183, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20952, at *9-10 (S.D.N.Y. November 1, 2002). Keeping in mind the principle that New Yorks long-arm statute does not extend to the limits of due process, Ehrenfeld v. Bin Mahfouz, 9 N.Y.3d 501, 512, 851 N.Y.S.2d 381 (2007), Fischbarg requires more than hiring a New York attorney to give rise to personal jurisdiction, but not much more. One, two or three emails would not be enough. Indeed, while New York claims to be a jurisdiction where a single contact is sufficient to uphold jurisdiction, see Kreutter v. McFadden Oil Corp., 71 N.Y.2d 460, 467, 527 N.Y.S.2d 195 (1988), few significant cases involve a single contact as the basis for jurisdiction. Primarily, we look to Reiner, 41 N.Y.2d 648, 394 N.Y.S.2d 551, as a case where the exercise of personal jurisdiction was based on what can be called a single transaction, namely the negotiation and signing at plaintiffs Albany, New York headquarters of an employment agreement as a salesman in New England that gave rise to the cause of action.

Otherwise, beginning with Longines-Wittnauer Watch Co. v. Barnes & Reinecke, 15 N.Y.2d 443, 261 N.Y.S.2d 8 (1965), the Court of Appeals has avoided reliance on a single transaction and instead found a combination of contacts met the statutory and constitutional standard. Parke-Bernet Galleries, Inc. v. Franklyn, 26 N.Y.2d 13, 308 N.Y.S.2d 337 (1970), held a non-paying customer amenable to suit based not only on his participation in an auction through an open telephone line but also his letters in setting up the line and use of one of plaintiffs employees as an agent for purposes of the auction. Hi-Fashion Wigs, Inc. v. Peter Hammond Advertising, Inc., 32 N.Y.2d 583, 347 N.Y.S.2d 47, found jurisdiction not only on the delivery of a personal guarantee in New York, but also based on a company that did business in New York and a contract that called for all services to be rendered in New York. Ehrlich-Bober & Co. v. Univ. of Houston, 49 N.Y.2d 574, 427 N.Y.S.2d 604 (1980), involved suit by a broker-dealer arising from two reverse repurchase agreements with defendant. On two separate occasions, an individual claiming to represent the defendant called plaintiff in New York and delivered the purchase price to a bank there. Additionally, in a four-month period, defendant entered at least 22 separate transactions with New York institutions for an aggregate value of $44 million. Id., 49 N.Y.2d at 577, 427 N.Y.S.2d at 606. The Court of Appeals in Kreutter held the defendants amenable to suit based on the acts of its agent. Kreutter, 71 N.Y.2d 460, 527 N.Y.S.2d 195.

Most recently before Fischbarg, the Court of Appeals in Deutsche Bank Sec., Inc. v. Montana Bd. of Invs., 7 N.Y.3d 65, 71, 818 N.Y.S.2d 164 (2006), upheld the exercise of jurisdiction based on the defendants use of instant messaging service on the Bloomberg Message System. The Court was careful to note, however, that in the thirteen months prior to the trade at issue, the counterparty executed eight other bond trades with the plaintiff, as part of $471 million in trades the defendant placed the preceding year with banks in New York. Id., 7 N.Y.3d at 77 n.2, 818 N.Y.S.2d at 167 n.2.

As the case law discussed here suggests, while New York theoretically permits one qualitatively-sufficient transaction to support long-arm jurisdiction, the Court of Appeals usually grounds its decision upon more. Fischbarg merely extends this concept to the context of a professional services contract.

Lessons to be learned. Fischbarg recognizes that an attorney-client relationship is, by its very nature, continuing until terminated. Yet, Fischbarg did not base its decision solely on the on-going attorney-client relationship. Rather, Fischbarg relied upon additional purposeful acts beyond retention to uphold jurisdiction. At the same time, Fischbarg leaves no doubt that telephone, mail e-mail and facsimile are qualitatively sufficient additional acts, and, thereby, further eviscerated the requirement of physical presence. Fischbarg found jurisdiction based on an eleven month relationship, 31 emails and weekly telephone calls. By its logic, even fewer purposeful acts are necessary for jurisdiction. Given the types of contracts involved in the precedent relied upon by Fischbarg (purchase agreements, repo trades and salesman contracts), courts will subsequently extend the rule from the professional services agreement in Fischbarg to all types of contract disputes, and beyond. See, e.g., Pryor Personnel Agency Inc. v. Waage Law Firm, 14148/06, 2008 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 1930 (Sup. Ct. Nassau Co. February 28, 2008) (applying Fischbarg to an employment agency contract to uphold jurisdiction).

Cross-References

For a general overview of the exercise of long-arm jurisdiction under CPLR 302(a)(1), see 2-3 New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 302; 1-3 Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 3.05; 1-2 LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 2.03; and 1-2 LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 2.05.

For scholarly analysis of the impact of electronic interstate communications and activities on the application of long-arm jurisdiction, see Jeffrey A. Van Detta, Extraterritorial Personal Jurisdiction for the Twenty-First Century: A Case Study Reconceptualizing the Typical Long-Arm Statute to Codify and Refine International Shoe After its First Sixty Years, 3 Seton Hall Circuit Rev. 339 (Spring 2007) (discussing the need for an overhaul of the current long-arm jurisdiction regime, given the 21st-century realities of electronic interstate communications and activities); Louis U. Gasparini, Comment: The Internet and Personal Jurisdiction: Traditional Jurisprudence for the Twenty-First Century under the New York CPLR, 12 Alb. L.J. Sci. & Tech. 191 (2001).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a partner with Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and is regularly involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in disputes involving, business, contract, commercial transactions, financial services, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, partnerships and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. He also serves as outside general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-451-2207 or by email at kbisceglie@olshanlaw.com.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

131 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mike Wilson on Witten v. Pack, 237 S.W.3d 133 (Ky. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2301

Mike Wilson on Witten v. Pack, 237 S.W.3d 133 (Ky. 2007)

By Mike Wilson

May 12, 2008

SUMMARY: A comparison of the Supreme Courts opinion in Witten v. Pack, 237 S.W.3d 133 (Ky. 2007) with the Court of Appeals opinion in the same case suggests that the Supreme Courts decision may impliedly overrule in part a case that as recently as 1992 the Court called the leading Kentucky case on the law of judicial admissions. This commentary, written by Mike Wilson, explores the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Witten v. Pack, 237 S.W.3d 133 (Ky. 2007), Dr. Witten performed a hip replacement. After doing so, while holding onto the patients leg, the doctor slipped and fell. Both the Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court agreed that the doctor unequivocally admitted slipping. The patient contended, and the Court of Appeals unanimously agreed, that the doctors admission, in light of surrounding circumstances, constituted a judicial admission of negligence that caused the hip to dislocate. The Supreme Court unanimously disagreed. Both opinions cited Bell v. Harmon, 284 S.W.2d 812 (Ky. 1955) as authority. Why the disagreement?

The Court of Appeals cited Hamby v. University of Kentucky Medical Center, 844 SW2d 431 (Ky. App. 1993), stating that the conclusiveness of a judicial admission should be determined in light of all the conditions and circumstances proven in the case. This principal traces back through a line of cases to Sutherland v. Davis, 151 SW2d 1021 (Ky 1941), described below as the Sutherland test.

The Supreme Court, however, stated that judicial admissions should be narrowly construed, citing Lewis v. Kenady, 894 S.W.2d 619, 622 (Ky.1994). The language of narrow construction first appears in Goldsmith v. Allied Building Components, 833 S.W.2d 378 (Ky. 1992) but traces back to Bell, also discussed below, which held that judicial admission should be applied cautiously and only in exceptional cases. The Supreme Court also emphasized contradictory evidence that made the substance of the alleged admission in Witten a disputed issue, described below as the Halbert test.

The Sutherland Test. The conflict grows out of Sutherland, recognized by the Supreme Court in Goldsmith (1992) as the leading Kentucky decision on the law of judicial admissions. Sutherland held at 1024:

We believe the law to be that admissions fatal to his cause given in the testimony of a party to an action on the trial of the case should be viewed in the light of all the conditions and circumstances proven in the case; and unless all such circumstances and conditions give rise to the probability of error in the party's own testimony, he should not be permitted to avert the consequences of his testimony by the introduction of, or reliance on, other evidence in the case.

(emphasis added). Sutherland gives a checklist of circumstances to be weighed in determining whether judicial admission has occurred, only one of which is whether the party's alleged admission was contradicted by other witnesses. Under Sutherland, contradictory evidence can not prevent a judicial admission unless circumstances prove the party's own admission was probably in error.

The Halbert Test. Over time, cases eroded the liberal application of judicial admission that Sutherland seems to permit. Halbert v. Lange, 233 SW2d 278 (Ky. 1950) held at p. 280:

[A]dmissions will be conclusive only as long as they are allowed to stand. This conclusiveness, however, is destroyed if and when the party corrects his statements, explains them, or introduces other testimony showing that he could have been mistaken as to the facts.

Note that Halbert says "could have been mistaken" where Sutherland said "probability" of mistake.

Halbert held at p. 280:

It appears difficult to lay down an ironclad or entirely satisfactory rule. The true test seems to be whether the party's testimony is merely a narrative of events observed or participated in, wherein there is always present the obvious possibility that he, like any other witness, could be mistaken, or whether he was testifying to facts peculiarly within his own knowledge.

In other words, Halbert seemed to say that, except for facts uniquely known only to the party, such as motive or state of mind, if there is evidence conflicting with the alleged judicial admission, the jury decides the issue.

Bell and a Divided Court. In 1955, Bell seemed to revive the Sutherland test, stating:

unless all circumstances and conditions give rise to the probability of error in the party's own testimony, the party should not be permitted to avert the consequences of his or her testimony by the introduction of, or reliance on, other evidence in the case.

Bell, p. 817. Bell also states at p. 815, citing Sutherland, that we have recognized that even though contradicted, testimony of the plaintiff may constitute a judicial admission. In Bell, the court found a judicial admission occurred and that a verdict should have been directed.

But Bell also seems to controvert Halbert, which says contradictory evidence can nullify a judicial admission, and Bell's own statement elsewhere in the opinion that a judicial admission must be deliberate and unequivocal and unexplained or uncontradicted.

Bell's dissenting opinion, at p. 817, stated the dilemma bluntly:

The majority opinion treats [Sutherland] as authority for the principle that a party's contradicted testimony may constitute a judicial admission. With this conclusion I am unable to agree.

Witten Emphasizes Conflicting Evidence. Recent cases leading up to Witten disfavor judicial admissions. Lewis, at 622, stated that allowing explanation of the facts and context surrounding [the alleged judicial] admissions was a perfectly reasonable exercise of the trial court's discretion and that judicial admissions should be narrowly construed. Goldsmith v. Allied Building Components, 833 S.W.2d 378 (Ky. 1992), at p. 380 held the determination by a court that a party may not contradict an admission is strong medicine and should be sparingly administered.

Strategic Considerations after Witten. Attorneys should notice two things about the Witten opinion. First, it emphasizes evidence that makes the substance of the alleged judicial admission disputed and judicial admission, therefore, inappropriate. Second, unlike the Court of Appeals, it does NOT include the Sutherland test language about judicial admissions being conclusive unless circumstances and conditions give rise to the probability of error in the party's own testimony.

Witten and the cases discussed above suggest that, notwithstanding Sutherland, judicial admissions can be avoided by explaining or presenting contradictory evidence sufficient to create an issue of fact. Attorneys should be alert to any statement by a client during trial that, considered in isolation, might sound like an admission and be sure to introduce proof directly contradicting the admission or the inferences that could be drawn from the admission. For example, Q: You testified that you were sorry you struck the plaintiff's vehicle and caused her injury. What caused you to strike her vehicle? A: She pulled out in front of me.

As argued in this commentary, the Sutherland test seems no longer to be favored. However, there are three points to comfort attorneys who would prefer that the Sutherland test control. First, the analysis in this commentary does not appear in either Witten opinion. Second, the Supreme Court's interpretation of the Witten record greatly differed with that of the Court of Appeals, thus the Supreme Court arguably saw the facts, rather than the law, differently than did the Court of Appeals. Third, Sutherland has not been overruled and in Goldsmith (1992) was hailed by the Supreme Court as the leading case on judicial admissions.

For sample forms for a motion for summary judgment based on judicial admission, see Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 335.04 Motion for Summary Judgment in Action for Injuries from Crossing Accident and Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 335.05 Summary Judgment in Action for Injuries from Crossing Accident.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mike Wilson, J.D., University of Kentucky, has been a practicing attorney since 1980. He is a contributor to Caldwell's Kentucky Legal Forms, 5th Ed., Lexis-Nexis, 2006, teaches law to paralegals at Sullivan University, Lexington, Kentucky, and has prepared instructional material for numerous continuing legal education seminars for paralegals. He also is an administrative law judge for the Kentucky Department of Education.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

132 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jefferson James Davis on Vibratech, Inc. v. Frost, 2008 Ga. App. LEXIS 385

2008 Emerging Issues 2303

Jefferson James Davis on Vibratech, Inc. v. Frost, 2008 Ga. App. LEXIS 385 (Ga. Ct. App. 2008)

By Jefferson James Davis

May 12, 2008

SUMMARY: Vibratech, Inc. v. Frost confirms that the Georgia courts have effectively expanded statutory long arm jurisdiction to its maximum limits in cases arising out of business transactions. This changes the way that litigators should approach the personal jurisdiction issue in this state. This commentary, written by Jefferson James Davis, explores the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Seeking Jurisdiction over Nonresidents. The plaintiffs succeeded in keeping alive their wrongful death suits against a defunct manufacturer that had never purposefully marketed its products for use specifically in Georgia. This decision confirms that the Georgia courts have effectively expanded statutory long arm jurisdiction to its maximum limits in cases arising out of business transactions, including cases involving torts. This now-settled rule of expansion changes the way that litigators should approach the personal jurisdiction issue in this state.

In late 2004, a pilot and four passengers died in the Tennessee crash of a Cessna owned by the Georgia Cumberland Conference of Seventh-Day Adventists. The Conference and the decedents estates filed six companion suits in Gwinnett County State Court against multiple defendants. Among those defendants was Vibratech, Inc., a defunct Delaware corporation whose principal place of business had been in New York. Vibratech had manufactured a viscous damper (a mechanism designed to reduce engine vibration) that ended up in the plane that crashed.

An Unsuccessful Response. In each suit, Vibratech failed to file an answer to the complaint for almost three months after service. Ultimately, the company also filed in each case a motion to open the default and a motion to dismiss the suit. As to dismissal, it argued that there was no personal jurisdiction, that service was insufficient, and that the suits were a violation of the automatic stay of litigation for bankruptcy proceedings. The trial court denied Vibratech's two motions, and the company applied for interlocutory appeal in each case.

The Court of Appeals granted the applications and consolidated the cases into a single appeal. In the present decision, a panel of the Court affirmed the order denying Vibratech's motion to dismiss, first finding that Georgia courts have personal jurisdiction of Vibratech, that the bankruptcy proceedings do not stay the suits (there appears to be applicable insurance coverage, and it is not an asset protected by the automatic stay), and that the plaintiffs effected adequate service on the company under the circumstances (the company or its bankruptcy trustee failed to take the requisite steps to alter its registered agent for service, which accepted the papers, albeit mistakenly).

The Court also concluded that the company cannot open the default by right, since it failed to timely answer the original complaints when the plaintiffs amended them, and that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to open the default. Since the ruling on personal jurisdiction concerns a vitally important issue that recurs quite frequently, this Commentary focuses only on it.

Jurisdictional Foundations. The factual predicate for the personal jurisdiction holding is this: Vibratex made the damper at its New York factory and sold it to Teledyne Continental Motors, Inc. (TCM), which installed the damper in a rebuilt Cessna engine that it sold through a Texas company to the Georgia Cumberland Conference, which then had a company in Rome, Georgia, install the engine in the Conference's Cessna aircraft. The Court of Appeals noted Vibratex's contention that it never transacted any business in the State of Georgia, in that it had no office, took no orders, made no sales, delivered no products and solicited no business here. Vibratex at 9. It also noted, however, that the shipment of the damper to Mobile in this case was not an isolated transaction:

The two parties apparently entered into a supply contract, under which Vibratex sold as many as several hundred dampers per year to TCM for incorporation into its airplane engines. In addition, the two parties entered into a side agreement in which TCM agreed to indemnify Vibratex and to carry the company as an additional insured on an aviation liability policy. The certification of insurance to Vibratex under this agreement indicates that the geographical limit of the coverage is Worldwide.

Vibratex at 16.

The legal predicate for the personal jurisdiction holding includes, first, the federal due process requirement that a nonresident defendant have certain minimum contacts with [the forum] such that the maintenance of the suit does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. International Shoe Co. v. State of Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316, 66 S.Ct. 154, 158, 90 L.Ed. 95, 102 (1945).

Consistently with this principle, a state may constitutionally assert personal jurisdiction over a corporation that delivers its products into the stream of commerce with the expectation that they will be purchased by consumers in the forum State. World-Wide Volkswagen Corp. v. Woodson, 444 U.S. 286, 297-98, 100 S. Ct. 559, 567, 62 L. Ed. 2d 490, 502 (1980). However,

[t]he placement of a product into the stream of commerce, without more, is not an act of the defendant purposefully directed toward the forum State. Additional conduct of the defendant may indicate an intent or purpose to serve the market in the forum State, for example, designing the product for the market in the forum State, advertising in the forum State, establishing channels for providing regular advice to customers in the forum State, or marketing the product through a distributor who has agreed to serve as the sales agent in the forum State. But a defendant's awareness that the stream of commerce may or will sweep the product into the forum State does not convert the mere act of placing the product into the stream into an act purposefully directed toward the forum State.

Asahi Metal Industry Co. v. Superior Court of Cal., Solano Cty., 480 U.S. 102, 112, 107 S. Ct. 1026, 1032, 94 L. Ed. 2d 92, 104 (1987).

Just as importantly, Georgia's long arm statute provides, insofar as pertinent here, that the state's courts may exercise personal jurisdiction over a nonresident, as to a cause of action arising from any of the acts, omissions, ownership, use, or possession enumerated in the statute, if the nonresident:

- (1) Transacts any business within this state;
- (2) Commits a tortious act or omission within this state...; [or]

(3) Commits a tortious injury in this state caused by an act or omission outside this state if the tortfeasor regularly does or solicits business, or engages in any other persistent course of conduct, or derives substantial revenue from goods used or consumed or services rendered in this state...

O.C.G.A. § 9-10-91.

The Decision. The Court of Appeals first recognized that the law that controls the case is subsection (1) of the long-arm statute, but it acknowledged that our appellate courts have not considered the application of subsection (1) to the specific factual situation before us, where the manufacturer of an aviation component ships to an intermediary like TCM, who installs the part into an aviation engine and then ships the engine into Georgia. Vibratech at 12. It then noted that we cannot limit our analysis to a strictly literal reading of the subsection's language, but must consider Vibratech's intangible contacts with the state in determining whether the company transacted any business, subject to the limits of due process. Id.

To frame this consideration, the Court adopted a test that originated during the ancien regime, in Davis Metals, Inc. v. Allen, 230 Ga. 623, 625 198 S.E.2d 285, 287 (1973): personal jurisdiction exists if (1) the nonresident defendant has purposefully done some act or consummated some transaction in this state, (2) if the cause of action arises from or is connected with such act or transaction, and (3) if the exercise of jurisdiction by the courts of this state does not offend traditional fairness and substantial justice. Vibratech at 13, quoting Aero Toy Store v. Grieves, 279 Ga. App. 515, 517-18, 631 S.E.2d 734, 737 (2006). The Court found that jurisdiction existed here on two grounds: Vibratech's conduct in selling the damper to TCM in New York for installation (in Mobile) in engines for re-sale in other locales across the country was such that the company should have reasonably anticipated being haled into court here, and fairness requires that the Georgia plaintiffs be able to seek redress here rather than in New York or Delaware. Vibratech at 17, 18.

The Rationale. For subsection (1) of the long arm statute to apply to the facts here, the Court had to give that statutory text two meanings that are not at all obvious on its face. First, the Court relied on Innovative Clinical & Consulting Servs. v. First Natl Bank, 279 Ga. 672, 620 S.E.2d 352 (2005), for the construction that this subsection applies to cases of any type, including those tort cases described in subsections (2) and (3) of the statute. Vibratech at 10.

The Supreme Court unanimously held in Innovative Clinical that this construction of subsection (1) was required by the literal language of the statute (279 Ga. at 675, 620 S.E.2d at 355), although the construction seems to result from considering the literal language of subsection (1) in a vacuum, rather than in the context of the whole statute. Innovative Clinical thus rejected the longstanding rule that, in enacting subsection (1) as part of the original long-arm statute in 1966, [t]he Georgia legislature could have defined transactions of business as including both contractual and tortious actions, as other states have done... But they chose not to do so. By including tortious action under... separate subsection[s]... the legislature could not have meant for a cause of action in tort to arise from the transaction of business, under [subsection (1)] as well. Otherwise, [the tort subsections] would have been redundant and unnecessary.

Whitaker v. Krestmark of Alabama, Inc., 157 Ga. App. 536, 537-38, 278 S.E.2d 116, 118 (Ga. App. 1981), quoting Scott v. Crescent Tool Co., 296 F. Supp. 147, 153 (N.D. Ga. 1969) (diversity case). With the Innovative Clinical construction, the plaintiffs in the present case are able to avoid the disqualifying limitations of subsection (3) -- the subsection that otherwise seems to be the closest fit with the facts here.

Second, the Court of Appeals construed subsection (1)'s transacts any business within this state language to include a broad swath of business that is transacted outside the state -- like Vibratech's. To do so, it used a stream-of-commerce analysis to find that the minimum-contacts requirement was satisfied because Vibratech's actions in selling a product to TCM in Alabama with the intention of deriving an economic benefit from its sale in other states, were purposeful actions which should have led Vibratech to reasonably anticipate being haled into court in those states, especially a border state such as Georgia. Vibratech at 17.

Answered and Unanswered Questions. This decision answers the question of how closely the Court of Appeals will follow Innovative Clinical as to the meaning of subsection (1) in a tort case: the Court will follow it enthusiastically, to the very limits of due process. Following such a dramatic change of law so closely is no small thing, because by doing so the Court helps to avoid uncertainty and litigation over the preliminary issue of the forum's competence. Burnham v. Superior Court of Cal., Cty. of Marin, 495 U.S. 604, 626, 110 S. Ct. 2105, 2119, 109 L. Ed. 2d 631, 649 (1990).

But this decision raises some questions, too, and these questions must be answered so that practitioners will know how to proceed. First, why does the Courts intangible contacts finding seem to reflect just the foreseeability theme of World-Wide Volkswagen, instead of both that and the subsequently decided Asahi's additional requirement for the defendant to engage in purposeful conduct directed specifically toward serving the forum states market? The answer must be that World-Wide Volkswagen sweeps more widely than Asahi, bringing more nonresident defendants into Georgia courts a good thing for the Courts goal of protecting Georgias interest in providing an effective means of redress for citizens whose health and welfare has been injured by defective products which our commercial laws permit to be imported into the State. Vibratech at 18, quoting Showa Denko K. K. v. Pangle, 202 Ga. App. 245, 250, 414 S.E.2d 658, 663 (1991). In fact, the Court in Showa Denko rejects the splintered view of Asahi in favor of World-Wide Volkswagens analysis. 202 Ga. App. at 250, 414 S.E.2d at 662.

Second, why does the Courts characterization of its construction of subsection (1) of the long arm statute seem to contradict the Supreme Courts description in Innovative Clinical of its own construction of that same subsection? For sure, both courts end up at the same place: in giving effect to subsection (1), both will consider intangible contacts in determining whether the defendant has transacted business in Georgia. But the Supreme Court says that it will do so because of the literal meaning of the statutory language (279 Ga. at 675, 620 S.E.2d at 355), while the Court of Appeals says that it will do so despite the literal meaning of the same language. Vibratech at 12.

Given the identical outcomes, is this a distinction without a difference? No, because dueling rationales undercut confidence in the correctness and durability of this construction, leading practitioners to wonder whether the Supreme Court will change the construction, or whether the General Assembly will rewrite subsection (1).

The answer to both questions probably is no. The Supreme Court will probably not change this construction because, as the Court stated in Innovative Clinical, [f]or over 17 years the justices of this Court and the judges of the Court of Appeals have urged the Legislature to amend Georgia's long-arm statute so as to provide the maximum protection for Georgia residents damaged by the out-of-state acts or omissions committed by nonresident tortfeasors. 279 Ga. at 674, 620 S.E.2d at 355. In Innovative Clinical and now in Vibratech, the courts themselves have accomplished that task as to subsection (1). Moreover, since Innovative Clinical, several legislative sessions have passed without the General Assemblys enacting amendatory language for subsection (1). The plain fact is that in Georgia, as in every other jurisdiction, the cause of protecting the interests of nonresident defendants has no constituency.

Citations and Cross References. The long arm statute is O.C.G.A. §§ 9-10-90 to 9-10-94. The history and application of the courts construction of O.C.G.A. § 9-10-91 are explicated in Gregory, Georgia Civil Practice (3d ed. 2003) §§ 10.01 to 10.03. Forms for contesting personal jurisdiction are located in Jenkins and Pitts, Georgia Civil Procedure Forms (1988), Forms 9-11-12(b).13 to 9-11-12(b).17.

Practice Tips

Because the rule expanding personal jurisdiction in all types of cases now appears settled, counsel for nonresident defendants should expend the time and effort to contest this issue only in the rare case where the facts give the defendant a realistic chance of escaping the rules broad sweep. Plaintiffs counsel can, in carrying out their own strategy, redirect their energies to other issues in almost all cases.

On the other hand, defense counsel for a nonresident now should more carefully scrutinize the service-of-process issue, which, if it ends in a defense victory, will prevent the court from exercising personal jurisdiction over the defendant. For the same reason, plaintiffs counsel should take greater care now to assure that service is accomplished properly on the nonresident a task that is often harder than it looks.

Where both sides of a controversy have a claim against the other but only one side is in Georgia as in a dispute between a large corporation and a recent employee over a noncompetition clause and the final compensation owed, for instance the Georgia side should race to the courthouse even faster than before, since the Georgia court will now have personal jurisdiction over the nonresident opponent in most cases.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jefferson James Davis graduated in 1973 from the University of Texas School of Law in Austin, where he was an Associate Editor of the Texas Law Review. After serving three years in the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps, he was an Assistant Attorney General for the State of Georgia from 1976 to 1979. From 1979 to 2007, he was in private practice in Decatur, Georgia, specializing in civil litigation at the trial and appellate levels in state and federal courts. He litigated business, domestic, and personal injury cases for private clients, and as a Special Assistant Attorney General for the State of Georgia he served as lead trial and appellate counsel in litigation involving constitutional, mental health, contract, bidding, ad valorem taxation, tort claim, and administrative law. He has coauthored two books and authored numerous articles on Georgia trial law and legal history. He is admitted to practice in the Georgia and Texas state courts as well as in the Northern and Middle Districts of Georgia, the Fifth and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeal, and the United States Supreme Court. He is a member of the Supreme Court Historical Society and the Georgia Legal History Foundation.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

133 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Cathcart on Discovery Issues in Qualcomm, Inc v. Broadcom Corp.

2008 Emerging Issues 2289

Patrick A. Cathcart on the Disciplinary and Ethical Issues Arising From Discovery in Qualcomm, Inc. v. Broadcom Corp.

By Patrick A. Cathcart

May 7, 2008

SUMMARY: Experienced Southern California litigator Patrick A. Cathcart provides a litigator's practical perspective on the sanctions imposed as a result of discovery abuses in Qualcomm, Inc. v. Broadcom Corp., and discusses the lessons of this case regarding the dangers inherent in conducting discovery in any complex litigation and in taking a careless or nonresponsive approach in responding to discovery requests.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp. (S.D. Cal. Jan 7, 2008) Case No. 05-CV1958-B (BLM) 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 911 n1, is a case that should strike fear in the hearts of most corporate litigators at major law firms who specialize in complex litigation. Large complex cases, with literally millions of documents produced in boxes and on electronic databases, handled by dozens of lawyers and usually with more than one law firm per side, dangerously precipitate a complacent approach to document searches and production: There's always another lawyer or a partner responsible for decisions.

In Qualcomm, this attitude, and perhaps a more sinister motive or behavioral approach to discovery, resulted in an Exceptional Case Finding and an award of attorneys fees requiring Qualcomm to pay Broadcom $9,259,985.09 in attorneys fees and costs, as well as post-judgment interest on the final fee award of $8,568,633.24, at 4.91% accruing from August 6, 2007, which the Court reduced essentially to a fine of approximately $8,500,000, and referred to the California State Bar six attorneys for discovery misconduct. These attorneys, and the others actively participating in the litigation, were highly educated, highly intelligent attorneys at well known law firms. They attended Franklin and Marshall, UCLA, UC Berkeley, New York University, Trinity University, Cornell, Oxford University in England, Carnegie Mellon, Duquesne University, Stanford, Harvard, Grinnell College, and other well known top drawer schools. Caught up in high exposure, big case litigation, they and their clients pay a heavy price for hardball litigation that attempted to hide documents rather than be forthright, win at all costs without recognizing adverse facts and inferences staring them in the face.

1. The Dispute and the Discovery Battle

The case involved a complaint and cross-complaint concerning Broadcom's alleged infringement of Qualcomms patents, and Qualcomms alleged inequitable conduct and waiver making the patents unenforceable. Broadcoms defense that Qualcomm waived enforceability of its patent was predicated on Qualcomms participation in a Joint Video Team (JVT) in 2000 and early 2003. The JVT is the standards-setting body that created a standard, released in May 2003, that governs video coding. Broadcom requested, through numerous interrogatories and multiple Rule 30(b)(6) deposition notices, information concerning Qualcomms attendance at JVT meetings. Qualcomm responded that it had attended meetings, that it had submitted four proposals to the JVT in 2006, but had no earlier involvement. Qualcomm produced deposition witnesses who had not been fully prepared or did not have the information necessary to testify consistent with documents that were produced. Qualcomm produced a second witness not much better prepared. Qualcomm did not search the computers for documents or emails, or provide information to the witnesses to help them prepare for their testimony.

(a) Qualcomms Argument: It Did Not Participate In The Meetings Of The Standards-Setting Body, the JVT.

As the case progressed, Qualcomm became increasingly aggressive in its argument that it did not participate in the JVT during the time that the JVT was creating relevant standards for video coding. Qualcomm submitted an expert declaration confirming the absence of any corporate records indicating that Qualcomm had participated in the JVT. Qualcomm filed a motion for summary judgment and supporting evidence, supporting evidence in a reply, that sought to establish Qualcomms non-participation in the JVT during the relevant period. Qualcomm filed a motion in limine to exclude evidence relating to among other things Qualcomms participation in the JVT, and a Memorandum of Contentions of Fact and Law in which it similarly asserted its lack of involvement in the standardization process. At trial, Qualcomms lead trial attorney stated that Qualcomm only participated in the JVT after its standard was produced.

(b) Discovery of E-mails Contradicting Qualcomms Position. A Qualcomm witness, Viji Raveendran, testified at trial. During Raveendrangs preparation, one of the trial attorneys (an associate at one of the law firms) discovered a 2002 email to the witness that welcomed her to a mailing list that related to JVT meetings. On searching Raveendrangs laptop, the attorney discovered 21 separate emails relating to the JVT process. The Qualcomm trial team decided not to produce these emails, claiming they were not responsive to Qualcomms discovery requests. The attorneys ignored the fact that the presence of the emails on Raveendrangs computer undercut Qualcomms premier argument that it had not participated in the JVT in 2002. The Qualcomm trial team failed to conduct any investigation to determine whether they were more emails that also had not been produced.

2. Denial of the Emails and the Contrary Facts

(a) At Trial. Another trial attorney stated to the court during a sidebar discussion, arguing against the admission of the December 2002 list reflecting recipients of these emails: Actually, there are no emails there are no emails theres no evidence that any email was actually sent to this list. This is just a list of email addresses. Theres no evidence of anything being sent. None of the Qualcomm attorneys present during the sidebar mentioned that there were 21 other emails found on Raveendrangs computer a few days earlier.

The jury returned verdicts in favor of Broadcom on the non-infringement of two patents, and in favor of Qualcomm regarding the validity and non-obviousness of the patents. The jury also returned a unanimous advisory verdict in favor of Broadcom that the patent was unenforceable due to inequitable conduct and waiver.

In arguing for a waiver, Broadcom relied on the email to Raveendran noting that Raveendran was invited to participate in the JVT process in 2002 to show that Qualcomm had in fact participated.

(b) Post-trial Proceedings: Qualcomm Denies Relevancy of E-mails. In post-trial proceedings, Qualcomm continued to dispute the relevancy and responsiveness of the 21 emails. Trial attorneys told Broadcom in correspondence that they had continued to believe that Qualcomm performed a reasonable search of Qualcomms documents during discovery and that the 21 unsolicited emails were not responsive to any valid discovery obligation.

Subsequently the attorney told Broadcom that Broadcom's negative characterization of Qualcomm's compliance with its discovery obligation was wholly without merit, but agreed to search the current and archived emails of five trial witnesses. Subsequently the Qualcomm trial team admitted to the court that Qualcomm had thousands of relevant unproduced documents and that their review of the documents revealed facts that appear to be inconsistent with certain arguments that [counsel][sic] made on Qualcomm's behalf at trial and in the equitable hearing following trial.

3. Courts Ruling

(a) Standards For Determining Compliance With Discovery Obligations. The Qualcomm v. Broadcom opinion discusses the standards for determining compliance with Fed Rules Civ. Proc. Rule 26 and Rule 37 discovery obligations, and denotes that the rule requires the court to award reasonable attorneys fees to the prevailing party on motions to compel unless the court finds the losing parties position was substantially justified or other circumstances that make such an award unjust. The court noted there is no requirement under this rule that the failure be willful or reckless; sanctions may be imposed even for negligent failures to provide discovery. Fjelstad v. American Honda Motor Co., Inc., 762 F.2d 1334, 1343 (9th Cir. 1985). The rules also provide for sanctions against individual attorneys who are remiss in complying with their discovery obligations. Sanctions are available as a matter of rule under Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. Rule 26, including the payment of attorneys fees [see Fed. Rules Civ. Proc. Rule 37(c)(1)]. Such sanctions can be sufficient to be commensurate with the discovery harm [see Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 51, 111 S. Ct. 2133, 114 L. Ed. 2d 27 (1991)]. The courts may also use their inherent power to sanction litigants to prevent abuse of the judicial process [Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 44-46, 111 S. Ct. 2133, 114 L. Ed. 2d 27 (1991)]. Citing Chambers, the Qualcomm opinion noted that all federal courts are vested with inherent powers enabling them to manage their cases and courtrooms effectively and to ensure obedience to their orders.

(b) Application of the Standards to Qualcomm's Conduct. Qualcomm argued that Broadcom had not made any motion to compel discovery. The Qualcomm court dismissed that argument, noting that Qualcomm had responded it would produce non-privileged relevant responsive documents, that it was committed to producing responsive non-privileged documents that were given to or received from the standards-setting body responsible for the video coding standard, and yet did not produce over 46,000 responsive documents, many of which directly contradict the non-participation argument that Qualcomm repeatedly made. As the court noted, Broadcom had no reason to file a motion to compel. Further, the argument was indicative of the gamesmanship Qualcomm engaged in throughout this litigation. Why should Broadcom file a motion to compel when Qualcomm agreed to produce the documents? What would the court have compelled: Qualcomm to do what it already said it would do? As the court noted, this dilemma highlighted another problem with Qualcomm's conduct of the case: Qualcomm was required to conduct and respond to discovery in good faith; producing 1.2 million pages of marginally relevant documents while hiding 46,000 critically important emails and other documents does not constitute good faith and does not satisfy either the clients or attorneys discovery obligations. And, [s]imilarly, agreeing to produce certain categories of documents and then not producing all of the documents that fit within such a category is unacceptable.

Qualcomm's conduct involved egregious mistakes. Qualcomm did not present any evidence attempting to explain or justify its failure to produce the documents. Qualcomm did not establish that it searched the computers or email databases of individuals who testified on Qualcomm's behalf at trial or in depositions as Qualcomm's most knowledgeable corporate witnesses. In fact, it indicates that it did not conduct any such search. Qualcomm intentionally withheld the documents: (1) when it discovered the 21 emails, it did not produce them and did not engage in any type of review to determine whether they were additional relevant responsive and unproduced documents; (2) Qualcomm did not conduct an internal investigation to determine if there were additional unproduced documents in addition after trial; and (3) Qualcomm spent its time opposing Broadcom's efforts to force such a search, insisting, without any factual basis, that Qualcomm's search was reasonable.

Qualcomm claimed it had inadvertently failed to find and produce the withheld documents. Such claims were negated by the massive volume and direct relevance of the hidden documents, Qualcomms ability to easily locate the suppress documents using fundamental JVT and other search terms when forced to do ultimately; and belied by the number of Qualcomm employees and consultants who received the emails relating to the JVT meetings, who attended the JVT meetings, and otherwise knew about the information set forth in the undisclosed emails.

4. Lessons to be Learned

According to the findings by the Magistrate and ruling by the District Court judge, the attorneys failed to heed several warning signs that should have alerted Qualcomm to the fact that its document search and production were inadequate. The two Rule 30(b)(6) depositions were of individuals who testified, as Qualcomm employees supposedly most knowledgeable about Qualcomms involvement in the JVT, that they had not searched their personal computers, they were not provided with relevant JVT documents to review, and they did not make any further other efforts to ensure that they were in fact knowledgeable about Qualcomms JVT involvement. The Qualcomm court found that these were obligations the attorneys as well as the party-client shoulders. If a witness is testifying as an organizations most knowledgeable person on a specific subject, the organization has an obligation to conduct a reasonable investigation and review to ensure that the witness does process the organizations knowledge. Fed R. Civ. P. 30(b)(6); In re JDS Uniphase Corp. Sec. Litig., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8523 (N.D. Cal. 2007) (the corporation must prepare the designee to the extent matters are reasonably available, whether from documents, past employees, or other sources). In its analysis of the attorneys misconduct, the court outlined four possible scenarios to explain what role lawyers retain by Qualcomm played in withholding the documents.

The first scenario the court outlined posited that Qualcomm hid the documents from the lawyers so effectively that they did not know or suspect the documents existed. The second possible cause was that the lawyers failed to discover the hidden documents or suspect their existence due to their complete ineptitude and disorganization. The third scenario imagined that Qualcomm shared the damaging documents with the lawyers, or some of them, and the lawyers then worked with Qualcomm to hide the documents and the evidence of Qualcomms early involvement in the JVT. Or, finally, while Qualcomm did not tell the retained lawyers about the damaging documents and evidence the lawyers suspected there was additional evidence or information but chose to ignore the evidence and warning signs. The court found no evidence of the first three scenarios, and that it was likely some variation of option 4 occurred:

One or more of the retained lawyers chose not to look in the correct locations for the correct documents, to accept the unsubstantiated assurances of an important client that its search was sufficient, to ignore the warning signs that the document search and production were inadequate, not to press Qualcomm employees for the truth, and/or encourage employees to provide the information (or lack of information) that Qualcomm needed to assert its non-participation argument and to succeed in this lawsuit.

That conduct enabled Qualcomm to withhold hundreds of thousands of pages of relevant discovery and to assert numerous false and misleading arguments to the court and jury.

5. Conclusion

It is no wonder sanctions were imposed. The case provides a road map for what attorneys involved in high profile, large document, multi-attorney cases must do in discharging their discovery responses. Over the past few decades, many large law firms have fostered or ignored within their ranks an attitude of hide the ball litigation, of gamesmanship, of fashioning arguments and then making the facts fit, of denying the existence of bad facts or bad documents. Such an attitude is often coupled to rank incivility in dealing with adversaries, but that will undoubtedly be the subject of a different court ruling.

The era of this attitude is over. Attorneys in complex cases should, and not simply out of an excess of caution, do the following:

- . First, recognize the facts of their cases for what they are;
- . Second, diligently pursue the existence of all documents and other writings that relate in any way to those facts;
- . Third, impress upon clients the dire consequences of not preserving those documents and other writings, especially electronically stored data, including the good, bad, or ugly, through adequate litigation hold letters and instructions; and only then,
- . Fourth, fashion arguments that actually fit the facts.

When an attorney discovers the slightest issue that reflects adversely on the litigation process, through the discovery of a document that should have been produced, through testimony that is recorded that is contrary to the facts, or through any other realization that prior representations by the attorney or co-counsel may have been misleading, serious ethical concerns should go off like a four alarm fire in a crowded city. When attorneys either rely on other attorneys to take care of the problem or give short shrift to corrective measures, one or more bar licenses are unnecessarily put at risk. Attorneys have nothing to sell to clients if they do not have their integrity.

For coverage of discovery sanctions in federal court actions in California, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: Fed Pretrial Civil Procedure in California, Ch. 25, Motions to Compel and Discovery Sanctions.

For discussion of sanctions for misuse of discovery in California state court actions, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Civil Discovery, Ch. 3, Sanctions.

Return to Text

n1 . In a subsequent proceeding, the trial court in the case heard motions by the attorneys sanctioned in this order in which the attorneys claimed that Qualcomms assertion of attorney-client privilege prevented the attorneys from adequately responding to the Order to Show Cause. See Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp. (S.D. Cal. March 5, 2008), Case NO. 05-CV 1958B (BLM) 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16897. The court granted the motions, and will permit the attorneys to respond to raise any pertinent information, on remand to the Magistrate, by virtue of the self-defense exception to Qualcomms assertion of attorney-client privilege. As a result, the attorneys may, possibly, obtain relief. The conduct as outlined in the original ruling by the Magistrate and the trial courts ruling remains egregious and deserves special consideration by attorneys in similar situations in the future.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Patrick A. Cathcart is a partner in the firm of Adorno, Yoss, Alvarado & Smith in Los Angeles. He was a founding partner in the firm of Cathcart Collins LLP. For over 30 years, his practice has emphasized complex business trials and appeals, including multi-party insurance coverage litigation and professional liability matters. He is an editorial consultant for Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Trial and Post-Trial Civil Procedure. Mr. Cathcart was trial counsel for London market insurers in Fuller-Austin Insulation Co. v. Highlands Ins. Co. (2006) 135 Cal. App. 4th 958, 38 Cal. Rptr. 3d 716, and lead counsel for the successful appeal in Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's of London v. Superior Court (Powerine) (2001) 24 Cal. 4th 945, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 672, 16 P.3d 94. Mr. Cathcart is a Past President of the Association of Business Trial Lawyers (Los Angeles). Following law school, Mr. Cathcart clerked for United States District Judge Spencer Williams, in the Northern District of California. During law school, Mr. Cathcart was Editor-in-Chief of the Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

134 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jefferson James Davis on Mason v. The Home Depot U.S.A., Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 2293

Jefferson James Davis on Mason v. The Home Depot U.S.A., Inc.

By Jefferson James Davis

May 7, 2008

SUMMARY: The Georgia Supreme Court, in Mason v. The Home Depot U.S.A., Inc., has approved the use of Daubert expert evidence standards for civil cases. This commentary, written by Jefferson James Davis, explores the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Seismic Shifts. When Arvin Ritchey Mason and Claudia Mason filed their personal injury suit in 1997, they could not have envisioned that the case would last longer than 10 years and would determine the validity of a 2005 statute that significantly alters expert-evidence standards in Georgia civil litigation. Their recently decided appeal focuses on evidence law, but for litigators its main lesson is what to do when the tectonic plates of the law shift beneath a case that is ready for trial.

In 1996, Mr. Mason bought and used Varathane, a wood finish manufactured by the Flecto Company and sold by Home Depot. The next year he and Ms. Mason, asserting that the Varathane injured him when he inhaled its vapors, sued the two companies for those injuries and for her resulting loss of consortium. The plaintiffs engaged one expert witness on causation and another on labeling.

The case first went to trial in February 2005, eight years after it was filed. Five days before that trial, however, the Governor signed into law the Tort Reform Act of 2005. One part of that statute (codified as O.C.G.A. § 24-9-67.1) overhauled Georgias expert witness statute, making it more like the corresponding federal evidence rule and case law by enhancing the trial judges role of gatekeeper for expert evidence. Based on the new statute, the defendants moved to exclude the testimony of the plaintiffs expert witnesses. The trial court denied the motion, however, on the ground that applying the new statute after years of discovery under the former expert-witness rules would violate the Georgia Constitutions proscription against retroactive laws.

The trial then took an unexpected turn, ending in a hung jury and a mistrial. The defendants at that point renewed their motion to exclude the expert testimony, and the plaintiffs responded by launching a multi-pronged attack on the new statute. The trial court granted the motion this time, however. In doing so, the court rejected some of the prongs of the plaintiffs attack, accepted other prongs but severed offending parts of the statute, and found that the proposed testimony of both of plaintiffs expert witnesses failed to satisfy the resulting statutes reliability standards. The plaintiffs appealed the two orders without proceeding to a second trial.

Tort Reform? The legal context for deciding the Masons appeal appeared promising for them, as the Supreme Court had already struck down (at least in part) three other sections of the Tort Reform Act. In EHCA Cartersville, LLC v. Turner, 280 Ga. 333, 626 S.E.2d 482 (2006), the Court found that O.C.G.A. § 9-10-31 (c) violated the joint tortfeasor venue provision of the Georgia Constitution; the statute provided that in a medical malpractice case a nonresident defendant could require that the case be transferred to a county of that defendant's residence if the tortious act upon which the claim was based occurred in that county.

The Court in Allen v. Wright, 282 Ga. 9, 644 S.E.2d 814 (2007), found that O.C.G.A. § 9-11-9.2, which required medical malpractice plaintiffs to file a particular medical authorization form along with the complaint, violated the Supremacy Clause of the federal Constitution. The state statute, the Court held in Allen, was less stringent than and inconsistent with the requirements of the federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 (HIPAA) as to notice of the right to revoke. Finally, the Court invalidated retroactive application of O.C.G.A. § 9-11-68(b)(1), the offer-of-judgment part of the Act, on the ground that, by creating a new obligation for attorney fees, the statute operates as a substantive law and thus cannot apply retroactively to pending cases. Fowler Properties, Inc. v. Dowland, 282 Ga. 76, 646 S.E.2d 197 (2007).

The Supreme Courts docket in Mason reflects the cases importance in the long war over tort law changes. As that docket shows, three briefs of amici curiae were filed for each side. Prominent members of the Georgia plaintiffs bar and defendants bar served as counsel for the parties and for amici. The plaintiffs also enlisted as counsel an attorney from the Center for Constitutional Litigation, a Washington law firm aligned with the American Association for Justice (until 2006, the Association of Trial Lawyers of America), and a Duke law professor served as a plaintiffs-side amicus counsel.

The Legal Change. The easiest way to analyze the Supreme Courts decision in Mason is to examine the statutory foundation of the dispute first. A longtime statute, applicable in both civil and criminal cases prior to the Tort Reform Act, provided that the opinions of experts on any question of science, skill, trade, or like questions shall always be admissible. Former O.C.G.A. § 24-9-67. The only reliability limitation on the admissibility of such evidence was the test adopted by the Court in Harper v. State, 249 Ga. 519, 292 S.E.2d 389 (1982) -- whether the technique or procedure the expert used in arriving at an opinion had reached a scientific stage of verifiable certainty. 249 Ga. at 525, 292 S.E. 2d at 395. In a series of cases over the years, the Court has also limited the data base for expert opinions by generally excluding from evidence opinions that were based substantially or wholly on hearsay. E.g., Leonard v. State, 269 Ga. 867, 506 S.E.2d 853 (1998).

The new statute applies only to civil cases and provides that the facts or data upon which the expert forms the opinion need not be admissible in evidence in order for the opinion to be admitted, so long as they are of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject. O.C.G.A. § 24-9-67.1(a). It also provides that a qualified expert may testify if:

(1) The testimony is based upon sufficient facts or data which are or will be admitted into evidence at the hearing or trial;

(2) The testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and

(3) The witness has applied the principles and methods reliably to the facts of the case.

O.C.G.A. § 24-9-67.1(b).

Upholding the New Statute. The Supreme Court by a 5-2 vote affirmed the trial courts exclusion of the expert witnesses testimony. In their appeal, the Masons argued that the new statute should be invalidated on equal protection and due process grounds; that, due to retroactivity, the statute should not be applied to them; and that, if the statute were to be found valid and generally applicable to them, it was incorrectly used in excluding their witnesses. From the plaintiffs viewpoint, the linchpin of the Courts decision is the rejection of their retroactivity argument, since a win for them on that one point would have obviated rulings on the other prongs of their attack.

The plaintiffs retroactivity argument essentially was that the new evidence statute was stricter than the old one, that by virtue of their hiring and preparing expert witnesses under the old law they now had a vested right to its application, and that applying the new one to them violated the Georgia Constitution. The Constitution provides simply that [n]o ... retroactive law ... shall be passed. Ga. Const. 1983, Art. 1, Sec. 1, Par. 10 The Court acknowledged that the new law is stricter, Mason at 3, but it found that the subject matter of the statute an evidentiary rule -- did not permit the its being vested in any party. Mason at 15.

Retroactive Application. Generally, the constitutional prohibition against retroactivity applies when the law injuriously affects vested rights. Bullard v. Holman, 184 Ga. 788, 193 S.E. 586 (1937). The Court here noted specifically that [w]here a statute governs only procedure of the courts, including the rules of evidence, it is to be given retroactive effect absent an expressed contrary intention. Polito v. Holland, 258 Ga. 54 (2) (365 SE2d 273) (1988).

The Court contrasted this treatment with statutes governing substance, noting that it had recently struck down the offer-of-judgment part of the Tort Reform Act on that basis in the Fowler Properties case. An uncodified part of the Act itself provides that certain parts of the Act shall apply only with respect to causes of action arising on or after the effective date of this Act, and that certain other parts, including the expert-testimony one, shall apply to causes of action pending on its effective date, unless such application would be unconstitutional leaving the courts with the same question of unconstitutionality. 2005 Ga. ALS 1, *; 2005 Ga. Act 1; 2005 Ga. SB 3, § 15(b).

Structural Soundness. As for their other structural arguments, the plaintiffs contended that the evidence statute violates the equal protection guarantees in the federal and Georgia constitutions, in that the statute by its terms applies to civil cases but not to criminal or eminent domain cases, which are governed by the less strict older act. The Court agreed that the older statute was not as strict. Mason at 3. It found, however, that one challenging a statute on this ground must initially establish that he or she is similarly situated to persons who are treated differently from him or her. It concluded that civil litigants are not similarly situated to criminal defendants, since different procedural statutes apply to each. Mason at 5, 6. Presiding Justice Hunstein, writing in dissent, was the lone justice to disagree on this point.

The plaintiffs also asked the Court to hold that the statute violated due process provisions by being too vague, since part (a) of the statute provides that the data underlying the expert opinion need not be admissible, while part (b)(1) provides that the data are or will be admitted into evidence. The Court agreed that these provisions are contradictory and thus unconstitutionally vague. Like the trial court, though, it determined that it could sever part (b)(1), since by doing so legislative intent is not compromised. The Court did not explain why it chose to sever that part rather than part (a), but the statutory statement of intent seems to supply the reason. That statement says essentially that federal evidence law may be used to construe this statute (O.C.G.A. § 24-9-67.1(f)), and federal law provides that the data underlying an opinion need not be admissible. F.R.E. 703.

The plaintiffs also argued that the statute usurps judicial authority by providing how the statutes own terms are to be construed. The last part of the statute states that in interpreting and applying this Code section, the courts of this state may draw from the opinions of the United States Supreme Court in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993) and its progeny. O.C.G.A. § 24-9-67.1(f). The Court rejected the usurpation argument by holding that the statute was not couched in mandatory terms and merely stated a principle of law regularly employed by Georgia courts. Mason at 12.

The last part of the statute also states that [i]t is the intent of the legislature that, in all civil cases, the courts of the State of Georgia not be viewed as open to expert evidence that would not be admissible in other states. The plaintiffs argued, in contrast to their previous points, that this language improperly delegates the legislative power to the courts of Georgia, and ultimately to the courts and legislatures of other states. The Court rejected this argument, noting again that this language contains no words of command and simply states intent. Mason at 14. Both Presiding Justice Hunstein and Justice Carley dissented on these usurpation points.

Daubert Applied. Finally the Court, having disposed of the attacks on the validity of the new statute, reviewed the trial courts application of the statute to the facts at hand. Crucially, the Court first determined the proper standard of review: whether a witness is qualified to render an opinion as an expert is a legal determination for the trial court and will not be disturbed absent a manifest abuse of discretion. Mason at 18. The trial court had rejected the plaintiffs causation witness on the basis that she had no scientific support for using her methods of determining causation. The Court used a federal Court of Appeals decision to support refraining from disturbing this ruling. Ervin v. Johnson & Johnson, Inc., 492 F.3d 901 (7th Cir. 2007). It used its own evaluation of the evidence proffered by the plaintiffs labeling expert to conclude that his exclusion by the trial court was not an abuse of discretion. Mason at 19.

Citations and Cross References. The statute that imposes the Daubert-style reliability rules is O.C.G.A. § 24-9-67.1, and it is codified from 2005 Ga. ALS 1, *; 2005 Ga. Act 1; 2005 Ga. SB 3, § 15(b). The particular cases suggested in the statute as models for construing the statute are Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 U.S. 579 (1993); General Electric Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136 (1997); and Kumho Tire Co. Ltd. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137 (1999). The corresponding federal rules are F.R.E. 702, 703.

Practice Tips

Now that the Daubert statute has been approved by the highest court, make effective use of its standards by securing and using expert witnesses at the very beginning of the case (or, for plaintiffs in novel or potentially substantial cases, as part of deciding whether to undertake representation). Employ the standards to frame the experts work and trial examination, and use them against opposing expert witnesses in discovery and cross-examination. Resist the use of the standards, though, in ordinary cases where the reliability of the experts methods is properly taken for granted.

As to the problem of significant changes occurring in the law underlying a trial-ready case, avoiding these changes altogether is of course the best solution, but the only chance of doing that lies in keeping the case moving and paying close attention to pending legislation. Plaintiffs-bar and defense-bar groups provide assistance to their members on the latter.

Avoiding the unfavorable effects of such changes is next best, and that can be done in some cases by making alternative trial-preparation plans reflecting potential upcoming changes in the law.

If the statutory change or the unfavorable effects of that change cannot be avoided, then attacking the new statute becomes the last best hope. As in Mason, counsel should marshal their arguments and make them vigorously by way of an interlocutory appeal.

Illustrative Example. In another case like Mason where the General Assembly is threatening to change the law on the admissibility of certain evidence, counsel should from the outset seek evidence that will satisfy the potential new law as well as the existing law, present both sets of evidence to the expert, and have the expert consider alternative conclusions based on the two sets of evidence. In a normal case, this two-alternative approach would drastically undercut the force of the experts findings, but a case facing a substantial change in the governing law is not a normal case.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jefferson James Davis graduated in 1973 from the University of Texas School of Law in Austin, where he was an Associate Editor of the Texas Law Review. After serving three years in the Army Judge Advocate Generals Corps, he was an Assistant Attorney General for the State of Georgia from 1976 to 1979. From 1979 to 2007, he was in private practice in Decatur, Georgia, specializing in civil litigation at the trial and appellate levels in state and federal courts. He litigated business, domestic, and personal injury cases for private clients, and as a Special Assistant Attorney General for the State of Georgia he served as lead trial and appellate counsel in litigation involving constitutional, mental health, contract, bidding, ad valorem taxation, tort claim, and administrative law. He has coauthored two books and authored numerous articles on Georgia trial law and legal history. He is admitted to practice in the Georgia and Texas state courts as well as in the Northern and Middle Districts of Georgia, the Fifth and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeal, and the United States Supreme Court. He is a member of the Supreme Court Historical Society and the Georgia Legal History Foundation.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

135 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joe McDonnell on Carter v. SSC Odin Operating Company, LLC

2008 Emerging Issues 2269

Joe McDonnell on Carter v. SSC Odin Operating Company, LLC, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 305, opinion filed Apr. 4, 2008

By Joseph B. McDonnell

May 6, 2008

SUMMARY: The Federal Arbitration Act (9 U.S.C. Sec. 1 et seq.) mandates enforcement of agreements to arbitrate disputes. The Illinois Nursing Home Act (210 ILCS 45/1 et seq.) invalidates agreements which waive rights granted by the Act, including the right to a jury trial. This commentary by Joe McDonnell discussed the interplay of these Acts and the role of public policy in the preemption analysis.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Public Policy of Illinois as Expressed in Illinois Nursing Home Care Act (210 ILCS 45/1-101 et seq.) prevails over Federal Arbitration Act (9 U.S.C. Sec. 1 et seq.)

The Rule of Preemption. Generally, federal law preempts a state statute when a conflict between the two arises. Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725 (1981). However, preemption must be the clear and manifest purpose of Congress as expressed in the pertinent statute. Thompson v. Northeast Illinois Regional Commuter R.R. Corp., 854 N.E.2d 744 (Ill.App. 1st Dist. 2006) (citing CSX Transportation, Inc. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658 (1993)). If that purpose is not evident, or if the state statute deals with issues affecting the validity of contracts generally, the statute will be recognized and given force according to its terms.

The Rule as Applied to the FAA. The Federal Arbitration Act (9 U.S.C. Sec. 1 et seq) reflects a liberal federal policy favoring arbitration agreements. Moses H. Cone Memorial Hospital v. Mercury Construction Corp., 460 U.S.1 (1983). Section 2 of the Act provides that arbitration agreements governed by the Act shall be valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract.

In Southland Corp. v. Keating, 465 U.S.1 (1984), the U. S. Supreme Court held that Sec. 2 of the FAA applies in state as well as federal courts and forecloses any action by a state which would require a judicial forum for the resolution of claims which the contracting parties agreed to resolve by arbitration. The Southland decision held that the FAA established a broad principle of enforceability and that Sec. 2 of the Act provided for revocation of arbitration agreements only upon grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract.

The FAA v. Illinois Public Policy. The Illinois Nursing Home Care Act creates a right of action for damages, including recovery of attorneys fees and costs, in favor of a nursing home resident injured because of the intentional or negligent conduct of the nursing home or its agents. The Act invalidates any waiver, whether oral or in writing, by a nursing home resident of such rights and of the right to a jury trial, which is granted by the Act. The effect of these provisions on the applicability of the Federal Arbitration Act was the issue presented in Carter v. SSC Odin Operating Company, LLC, Appellate Court of Illinois, Fifth District, No. 5-07-0392.

Background. Plaintiffs two-count complaint, filed on behalf of the estate of Joyce Gott, sought damages against the nursing home for injuries the decedent incurred prior to death (the survival action) and while a resident at the home and damages for loss of society to the decedents heirs (the wrongful death action). Defendants answer included an affirmative defense based on a written agreement which had been signed by the decedent and which purported to require arbitration of any disputes arising from her care while a resident. The defendant later moved to compel arbitration, in accordance with Section 4 of the Federal Arbitration Act, which provides for orders compelling arbitration when one party has failed, neglected, or refused to comply with an arbitration agreement. The lower court held that the agreements signed by the decedent violated the clear public policy of Illinois as expressed in the Nursing Home Care Act and refused to order arbitration. The nursing home appealed.

The Question Presented. The appellate court posited that a violation of a states public policy may be an appropriate defense to an action based on contract. The defendant had not urged the contrary and, even if it had, abundant Illinois authority established the rule. Carter, slip op. at 5. This left for determination only the issue of federal preemption. Given that the Nursing Home Care Act, and particularly its provisions precluding waiver of rights granted under the Act, contain an emphatically stated public policy of the State of Illinois, must that policy yield to the overriding philosophy of the Federal Arbitration Act recognizing as a general rule the enforceability of agreements to arbitrate?

The Courts Analysis. The fifth district was at pains to express its agreement with the U. S. Supreme Courts decisions in Doctors Associates, Inc. v. Casarotto, 517 U.S. 681 (1996), and Perry v. Thomas, 482 U.S. 483 (1987). In those cases, the Court had expressed the view that state law is not preempted by federal law if the state law governs issues concerning the validity, revocability, and enforceability of contracts generally. Carter, slip op. at 7. Conversely, where the state law purports to be directed to a contract or agreement to arbitrate, it will not overcome the applicability of the Federal Arbitration Act.

The fifth district found that the language of Sections 6 and 7 of the Nursing Home Care Act was not specifically directed to an agreement to arbitrate; rather, it applied generally to [a]ny waiver of the right to commence an action (Sec. 6) and to any waiver of the right to trial by jury (Sec. 7). The statute does not mention arbitration agreements at all and is not limited to such agreements. To the extent that the Act may invalidate an arbitration agreement, that, according to the court, is a tangential, rather than a direct, effect of the statute, and would apply to all contracts containing a waiver of rights under the Act, not simply arbitration agreements. Id. The statute expresses the public policy of Illinois relative to the validity, revocability, and enforceability of contracts generally, and since Illinois recognizes public policy as a defense to a contract action, the Federal Arbitration Act does not compel arbitration and the circuit court was correct in denying the motion to compel arbitration.

Strategies for Practitioners. Although the U. S. Supreme Court has stressed that federal policy, as express in the Federal Arbitration Act, favors the enforcement of valid arbitration agreements (see, e.g., Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. at 24-25 (1991)), the Court has also clearly recognized that a party cannot be forced into arbitration unless the party has entered into a valid, enforceable contract waiving his or her right to a judicial forum. Typically, plaintiffs attempt to avoid arbitration by asserting defenses based on invalidity of the agreement, unconscionability, fraudulent inducement, illegality of one provision affecting the entire agreement, etc. See Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna, 546 U.S. 440 (2006). The importance of the Carter case lies in the confrontation between a state statute specifically creating a cause of action and guaranteeing attendant rights (including nullification of agreements waiving such rights), and a federal law which recognizes arbitration agreements as valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract. 9 U.S.C. Sec. 2. It is not often that such grounds will be found. (For examples of federal preemption as applied to an Illinois statute and a municipal ordinance, see Eagle Marine Industries, Inc. v. Union Pacific Railroad Company, 227 Ill. 377, and Village of Mundelein v. Wisconsin Central Railroad, 227 Ill.2d 281, both decided January 25, 2008). When such a situation occurs, however, counsel must be alert to recognize that federal preemption has its limits; and that Illinois recognizes as valid a contract defense based on the public policy of the state as clearly stated in its statutes.

From the defense standpoint, while an affirmative defense may be pleaded with respect to any matter which seeks to avoid the legal effect of or defeat the cause of action set forth in the complaint (735 ILCS 5/2-613), ordinarily the motion to compel arbitration is filed as the initial pleading and that is the recommended course. If the goal is to get the case out of court and into arbitration quickly, a motion for that purpose, filed as soon as reasonably possible, would be the preferred route. (If the motion is denied, an appeal may be taken immediately under Supreme Court Rule 307(a)(1)). On the issue of arbitration, defense counsel should stress the increasing use of arbitration agreements and the increased willingness of the courts to recognize arbitration, so long as the contractual agreement is not susceptible to attack on a legally cognizable basis.

For additional discussion of arbitration and preemption, see Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists Checklist 15.03. See also Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists Form 15.17 Demand for Arbitration, Form 15.20 Motion for Order to Compel Arbitration, Form 15.21 Motion in Opposition to Motion to Compel Arbitration, Form 15.22 Order Granting or Denying Motion to Compel Arbitration, Form 15.23 Motion for Order to Stay Arbitration.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

136 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

William C. Bochet on SWH Funding Corp. v. Walden Printing Co.

2008 Emerging Issues 2271

William C. Bochet on SWH Funding Corp. v. Walden Printing Co., 399 N.J. Super. 1, 942 A.2d 839 (App. Div. 2008)

By William C. Bochet

May 5, 2008

SUMMARY: In SWH Funding Corp. v. Walden Printing Co., the Appellate Division issued an outline of the applicable standards for vacating an arbitration award entered where neither the party nor its counsel appear for an arbitration hearing. This commentary, written by William C. Bochet, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Grounds for Relief from Failure to Appear at Arbitration Sanctions Outlined by Appellate Decision

The Appellate Division has issued an outline of the applicable standards for vacating an arbitration award entered where neither the party nor its counsel appear for an arbitration hearing. In SWH Funding Corp. v. Walden Printing Co., 399 N.J. Super. 1, 942 A.2d 839 (App. Div. 2008), the court addressed N.J. Ct. R. 4:21A-4(f) (Failure to Appear) and set requirements of both a showing of good cause and a meritorious defense to obtain relief from an order entered against the absent party.

Not Feeling Too Well. The case was a commercial collection matter arising from defendant's failure to make rent and other payments in order to have the plaintiff forebear foreclosure on premises occupied by the defendant. The plaintiff filed suit, the defendant joined issue and the case ultimately was listed for arbitration under the court-mandated program, pursuant to N.J. Ct. R. 4:21A. The defendant's attorney successfully obtained an adjournment of the first-scheduled hearing date.

When the second hearing date approached, defense counsel was stricken with "flu-like" symptoms, apparently unrelated to the paucity of favorable equities in the case, and sought a second adjournment. This was denied by the arbitration administrator, via a message on counsel's voicemail. The arbitration proceeded without the defendant or its counsel and the arbitrator entered an award reflecting unpaid damages in excess of $325,000.00.

Feeling Worse. Plaintiff's counsel moved to confirm the award 29 days later. Defendant's attorney opposed the motion and, this time, made it a point to be present at oral argument. The motion did not end in confirmation of the award. Rather, a series of orders were entered which ultimately resulted in a judgment against the defendant for $416,508.00, an amount substantially in excess of the arbitration award.

The Appellate Division took on the task of dealing with the peculiar course of events which led to the result in the court below. The court's opinion does not paint a clear picture of the basis for the trial court's ruling, beyond ultimately suggesting that the easiest route between two points is a straight line. The appellate court pointed out that the rule that applies is the most obvious, namely N.J. Ct. R. 4:21A-4(f), as it sets the procedure for relief from an order entered against a party that does not appear at arbitration. The machinations of the lower court were not necessary.

Feeling Much Better. The first path to relief is a showing of "good cause" for failing to appear at the hearing. An example is provided in Del. Valley Wholesale Florist v. Addalia, 349 N.J. Super. 228, 793 A.2d 139 (App. Div. 2002). There, a busy trial lawyer failed to show for a hearing after a conversation with adverse counsel led to the impression that no claim would be advanced against his client at the hearing, thus allowing him to give his attention elsewhere. There was an unexpected result against counsel's client. The Appellate Division found this scenario to be sufficient to constitute "good cause" to permit rejection of the award. Other cases provide further enlightenment on that reasoning. See Ghandi v. Cespedes, 390 N.J. Super. 193, 196, 915 A.2d 39 (App. Div. 2007); Farrell v. TCI of Northern New Jersey, 378 N.J. Super. 341, 875 A.2d 1017 (App. Div. 2005); Davis v. DND Fidorio, Inc., 317 N.J. Super. 92, 99, 721 A.2d 312 (App. Div. 1998).

Applying the "good cause" standard to judge the conduct of counsel for the defendant, the appellate panel found that there was sufficient showing to satisfy that ground for relief under N.J. Ct. R. 4:21A-4(f). This is in keeping with other appellate decisions which are forgiving of attorney misfeasance in connection with arbitration proceedings. See Severino v. Marks, 366 N.J. Super. 275, 840 A.2d 982 (App. Div. 2004); Ravelo v. Campbell, 360 N.J. Super. 511, 823 A.2d 868 (2003); and Del. Valley Wholesale Florist, Inc., v. Addalia, 349 N.J. Super. 228, 793 A.2d 139 (App. Div. 2002).

The reprieve for defendant's counsel was not visited upon the defendant. Rather, the appellate panel added a second requirement for paragraph (f) relief which it held was not satisfied.

Defenseless Defendant. N.J. Ct. R. 4:21A-4(f) allows for relief from an order entered after non-appearance at an arbitration upon a showing of good cause. The decision in SWH Funding added that it is also necessary for the moving party to show that it had a meritorious defense--a basis to oppose the claim for relief. 399 N.J. Super. 1, 942 A.2d 839 (App. Div. 2008)

The need to show a meritorious defense is found most frequently in the context of motions to vacate a default judgment, N.J. Ct. R. 4:43-3 and N.J. Ct. R. 4:50. It is satisfied when the moving party asserts sufficient facts or legal defenses so as to place plaintiff's claims at issue. See Siwec v. Financial Resources, Inc., 375 N.J. Super. 212, 865 A.2d 485 (App. Div. 2005); Morales v. Santiago, 217 N.J. Super. 496, 501, 526 A.2d 266 (App. Div. 1987); Marder v. Realty Constr. Co., 84 N.J. Super. 313, 202 A.2d 175 (App. Div. 1964), aff'd, 43 N.J. 508, 205 A.2d 744 (1964).

The SWH Funding panel applied that prerequisite and found the defendant's defense was lacking. 399 N.J. Super. 1, 942 A.2d 839 (App. Div. 2008). The court reinstated the judgment entered after the arbitration hearing for the amount of the award and pre-judgment interest.

Evading the Agony. The case evokes sympathy for the hapless defense attorney whose blunder was to assume that a request for adjournment due to illness would be granted as a matter of course. Instead, the arbitration administrator denied the request, apparently as a result of the emasculation of discretion by an immutable -- and improper, the decision points out -- county policy of allowing only one adjournment. The tortuous course of events suffered by counsel, until salvation by the appellate court, is obviously best avoided. Some lessons can be learned:

1. Requests to adjourn an arbitration hearing should be made in writing as soon as the reason therefor is known.
2. After the application for adjournment is submitted, counsel should follow up its outcome with the arbitration administrator.

3. When the administrator denies the request, counsel should make a new request by way of a phone call or fax to the civil presiding or designated judge, if possible.

4. On or before the hearing date, the request should be made in person to the civil presiding or designated judge.

Above all, every effort must be made to ensure sanctions pursuant to N.J. Ct. R. 4:21A-4(f) do not come into play.

Cross-references. LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice § 6.12: Preparing for and Participating in Arbitration Hearing.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

137 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Curry on California Unlawful Detainer Notices

2008 Emerging Issues 2238

Christian A.M. Curry on the California Unlawful Detainer Process and its Required Notices

By Christian A.M. Curry

May 1, 2008

SUMMARY: In an unlawful detainer proceeding, the issues are limited to possession (the primary issue), and rent or holdover damages (a secondary issue) contingent on the existence of a valid claim for possession. Unlawful detainer is a creation of statute, unknown at common law, and demands strict adherence to the statutory procedural requirements. This Expert Commentary discusses these important requirements.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Introduction. Unlawful detainer is a summary proceeding to recover possession of real property by a landlord from a tenant. In an unlawful detainer proceeding, the issues are limited to possession (the primary issue), and rent or holdover damages (a secondary issue) contingent on the existence of a valid claim for possession. Unlawful detainer is a creation of statute, unknown at common law, and demands strict adherence to the statutory procedural requirements.

With the exception of the termination of a fixed-term lease (where all parties are aware of the tenancy termination date), one of the several types of noticed set forth in Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1161 must be served on the tenant and run as a prerequisite to the filing of a viable case in unlawful detainer. It is the service and running of the notice that terminates the tenancy such that the landlord-plaintiff may file and maintain a case in unlawful detainer, and allows the court to award possession.

Statutory Duty Requires Serving Notice and Allowing Notice to Run Before Filing Unlawful Detainer. The statutes that govern service of notices as prerequisites to an unlawful detainer action are Cal. Civ. Code § 1946 and Code Civ. Proc. § 1162.

30-day notices to quit under Civ. Code § 1946 (and 60-day notices to quit under Civ. Code §1946.1) may be given in the manner prescribed in Section 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure or by sending a copy by certified or registered mail addressed to the other party@ [Civ. Code § 1946]. All other notices as a prerequisite to an unlawful detainer action per Code Civ. Proc. § 1161 must be served in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1162 to be valid [see Judicial Council of California Civil Jury Instructions ("CACI") Nos. 4303, 4305, 4307 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender, official publisher)].

Unlawful Detainer Is Unique Body of Law; Requirements That Deviate From Common or Statutory Law Must be Followed. Chapter 4 of Title 3 of Part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure (§§ 1159B, 1179a) is known as the Unlawful Detainer Act. The Unlawful Detainer Act is broad in scope, available to both landlords and tenants who have suffered wrongs committed by the other [Woods-Drury, Inc. v. Superior Court (1936) 18 Cal. App. 2d 340, 344, 63 P.2d 1184]. Procedures and proceedings in unlawful detainer were unknown at common law and are creatures of statute [Woods-Drury, Inc. v. Superior Court (1936) 18 Cal. App. 2d 340, 344, 63 P.2d 1184]. As such, they are governed solely by the statutes that created them [Kwok v. Bergren (1982) 130 Cal. App. 3d 596, 599, 181 Cal. Rptr. 785]. Thus, where the Unlawful Detainer Act deals with matters of practice, its provisions supersede the rules of practice contained in other portions of the code@ [Schubert v. Lowe (1924) 193 Cal. 291, 295, 223 P. 550; Losornio v. Motta (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 110, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 799].

Landlord Must Strictly Comply With Notice Statute to Effect Valid Service to Support Unlawful Detainer Claim. Requirements for Service Are Set Forth in Plain Language of Code Civ. Proc. § 1162. The requirements for service are unequivocal, set forth in Code Civ. Proc. § 1162:

The notices required by Sections 1161 and 1161a may be served, either:

1. By delivering a copy to the tenant personally; or,
2. If he or she is absent from his or her place of residence, and from his or her usual place of business, by leaving a copy with some person of suitable age and discretion at either place, and sending a copy through the mail addressed to the tenant at his or her place of residence; or,
3. If such place of residence and business can not be ascertained, or a person of suitable age or discretion there can not be found, then by affixing a copy in a conspicuous place on the property, and also delivering a copy to a person there residing, if such person can be found; and also sending a copy through the mail addressed to the tenant at the place where the property is situated. Service upon a subtenant may be made in the same manner.

Only Strict Compliance With Statutory Requirements Will Afford Remedy of Unlawful Detainer. The landlord must follow the procedures outlined in Code Civ. Proc. § 1162, or the action will fail. Thus, in an unlawful detainer action, a landlord must strictly comply with statutorily mandated requirements for service of the notice to pay rent or quit; compliance with one of these methods must be shown or judgment declaring the landlord's right to possession must be denied. The landlord must prove compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1162 [Liebovich v. Shahrokhkhany (1997) 56 Cal. App. 4th 511, 513-514, 65 Cal. Rptr. 2d 457]. Thus, if there is not complete compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1162, judgment for unlawful detainer cannot be had.

Three cases are commonly cited to refute the plain language of Code Civ. Proc. § 1162: Hozz v. Lewis (1989) 215 Cal. App. 3d 314, 263 Cal. Rptr. 577; Highland Plastics v. Enders (1980) 109 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1, 167 Cal. Rptr. 353; and Nourafchan v. Miner (1985) 169 Cal. App. 3d 746, 215 Cal. Rptr. 450. However, neither these cases, nor any other, stands for that premise.

In Hozz v. Lewis, the tenant had multiple residence addresses, and the court found that the landlord had no duty to demonstrate reasonable diligence in determining at which address the tenant was staying [Hozz v. Lewis (1989) 215 Cal. App. 3d 314, 317, 263 Cal. Rptr. 577]. The more important distinction in the Hoss case was that the landlord had a legitimate belief that the tenant had no business address, and could thus not attempt service there.

The Hozz case also addresses Highland Plastics v. Enders [(1980) Cal. App. 3d Supp.1, 7, 167 Cal. Rptr. 353]. Highland Plastics case also found that posting and mailing pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1162(3) was appropriate. But, in Highland Plastics, the defendant used the property as both his residence and business addresses. The attempt of service on the home was itself also an attempt of service at the business because the business was in the home. In this case, two trips to the same address were not necessary.

This was also the case in Nourafchan v. Miner, where the evidence supported the property manager's belief that the tenant used his home as his workplace. This included evidence that the tenant had converted one room into an office, and that the residence was frequented by his employees [Nourafchan v. Miner (1985) 169 Cal. App. 3d 746, 750, 215 Cal. Rptr. 450]. In the Nourafchan and Highland Plastics cases, posting and mailing was appropriate because the landlord, believing the tenant was away from home, had attempted service at the home and business before resorting to posting and mailing.

None of these cases supports the frequently misstated presumption that a landlord need not comply with the plain language of Code Civ. Proc. § 1162. All modern (post-Hozz [1998]) cases specifically say the landlord must strictly comply with all of Code Civ. Proc. § 1162. In Losornio v. Motta, the court stated in pertinent part [Losornio v. Motta (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 110, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 799]:

Section 1162 provides three methods of serving these notices: (1) by personal delivery to the tenant (personal service); or (2) if the tenant is absent from his residence and usual place of business, by leaving a copy with a person of suitable age and discretion at either place, and sending a copy through the mail to the tenant's residence (substituted service); or (3) if a place of residence and usual place of business cannot be ascertained or a person of suitable age or discretion cannot be found there, then by affixing a copy in a conspicuous place on the property and delivering a copy to a person residing there, if such a person can be found, and also sending a copy through the mail addressed to the tenant at the place where the property is situated (post and mail service). (§ 1162, subds. 1B3; Civ. Code, § 1946.) A 30-day or 3-day notice is valid and enforceable only if the lessor has strictly complied with these statutorily mandated requirements for service. (Liebovich v. Shahrokhkhany (1997) 56 Cal. App. 4th 511, 513, 65 Cal. Rptr. 2d 457.)

It is thus well established that strict compliance with statutory mandate as to contents and service of the subject notice is required, including attempting personal service and substituted service at both the home and place of business, if known, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1162(1), (2) before resorting to posting and mailing at the property pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1162(3) [Liebovich v. Shahrokhkhany (1997) 56 Cal. App. 4th 511, 513-514, 65 Cal. Rptr. 2d 457; Losornio v. Motta (1998) 67 Cal. App. 4th 110, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 799; Underwood v. Corsino (2005) 133 Cal. App. 4th 132, 135, 34 Cal. Rptr. 2d 542].

Legally Required Service Vs. Actual Receipt of Service. Lack of actual receipt of a notice is not a defense to an unlawful detainer based on it when proper service is alleged and proven.

Landlords sometimes argue that actual receipt of a notice cures any defects in service, often citing Lehr v. Crosby [(1982) 123 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1, 177 Cal. Rptr. 96] and Valov v. Tank [(1985) 168 Cal. App. 3d 867, 214 Cal. Rptr. 546]. Neither case actually supports that position.

In Lehr, the landlord served the tenant by substituted service under Civ. Code § 1962(2) by delivering a copy to the tenants' 16-year-old daughter and mailing a copy to the tenant [Lehr v. Crosby (1982) 123 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1, 4, 177 Cal. Rptr. 96]. The landlord's efforts to serve ended there and did not proceed to the third step of posting and mailing. The court in Lehr stated [Lehr v. Crosby (1982) 123 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 1, 4, 177 Cal. Rptr. 96]:

[T]here is no evidence in the record that Hazlett [tenant] had a place of business, nor, in fact, does she so allege on appeal. Lacking such evidence, we believe the trial judge correctly concluded that an attempt to serve her at the one location where she might be found satisfies the requirements of the statute.

If anything, Lehr confirms that if the landlord knows of the tenant's place of business, the landlord must attempt personal service there before serving the tenant by substituted service at the subject property.

In oft-cited footnote 3, the court merely states that Awe infer that plaintiff received actual notice@ [Lehr v. Crosby (1982) 123 Cal. App. Supp. 1, 6 n.3, 177 Cal. Rptr. 96]. Not only is this dicta because the service under Civ. Code § 1962(2) means the court never directly addressed service under § 1962(3), but also the court never said what, if any, was the effect of actual receipt.

Valov was a commercial tenancy for sharecrop revenue, easily distinguishable from a residential tenancy. In Valov, the court found that the tenant had avoided service. The process server had observed the defendant sitting in the living room, but after the tenant saw the process server, he left the room and did not answer the door [Valov v. Tank (1985) 168 Cal. App. 3d 867, 870, 214 Cal. Rptr. 546]. There was also evidence that the tenant's business was at the same address as his residence and that this address, which was different from the address of the subject property, was where service was made. The Valov court found waiver Aunder the circumstances of this case@ only [Valov v. Tank (1985) 168 Cal. App. 3d 867, 870, 214 Cal. Rptr. 546]. In Valov service was not made by posting and mailing under Civ. Code § 1962(3) because the notice was not posted Aon the [subject] property@ or sent Athrough the mail addressed to the tenant at the place where the property is situated@ as required by § 1962(3). As such, the service in Valov bore no resemblance to posting and mailing, relying more on the position that mail service can be de facto Apersonal service@ when the tenant admits receiving notice.

Courts have made this type of finding on a case-by-case basis in several instances:

C Colyear v. Tobriner (1936) 7 Cal. 2d 735, 741-742, 62 P.2d 641 (commercial case predating Civ. Code § 827 requirement that notice served pursuant to Civ. Code § 1162).

C University of So. Calif. v. Weiss (1962) 208 Cal. App. 2d 759, 769, 25 Cal. Rptr. 475 (commercial case).

C Wilcox v. Anderson (1978) 84 Cal. App. 3d 593, 597, 148 Cal. Rptr. 773 (service of 30-day notice of termination of tenancy).

None of these cases addresses when a notice would start to run, but arguably they could not start to run earlier than the admitted date of receipt.

Although one reported case states that service by posting and mailing is effective only if it creates actual notice and that opportunity to cure is a possibility [see Davidson v. Quinn (1982) 138 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 9, 188 Cal. Rptr. 421], later cases do not follow this line of thinking [Walters v. Meyers (1990) 226 Cal. App. 3d Supp. 15, 19, 277 Cal. Rptr. 316].

Service on One Tenant Is Service on All Tenants. When two or more tenants hold the property either jointly or in common, service of notice on one of them is service on all of them [University of Southern Cal. v. Weiss (1962) 208 Cal. App. 2d 759, 769, 25 Cal. Rptr. 475; Gentry v. Citron (1918) 36 Cal. App. 288, 171 P. 1079].

Parties to Commercial Lease May Alter Statutory Requirements for Service.

Parties to a commercial lease may waive or modify the right to statutory notice, substituting a mutually agreed-on form of notice instead [Folberg v. Clara G.R. Kinney Co., Inc. (1980) 104 Cal. App. 3d 136, 140, 163 Cal. Rptr. 426; Hignell v. Gebala (1949) 90 Cal. App. 2d 61, 202 P.2d 378 (15-day notice to quit served only by registered mail)].

Unless the lease directs that the agreed-on notice is a replacement for (rather than an alternative to) the statutory notice requirements, the agreed-on notice period may be deemed an option to the statutory provisions, and not the exclusive remedy [Fifth & Broadway Partnership v. Kimny, Inc. (1980) 102 Cal. App. 3d 195, 200-201, 162 Cal. Rptr.

271].

Proving Defense of Defective Service of Subject Notice in Unlawful Detainer Action. A specific allegation in the tenant's answer that service is defective is not necessary. Service is part of the landlord's case in chief. Thus, a general denial is sufficient to cover this defense, which puts all facts of the landlord's case in issue including sufficiency of notice to quit [Bevill v Zoura (1994) 27 Cal. App. 4th 694, 698, 32 Cal. Rptr. 2d 635; see Code Civ. Proc. §§ 431.10(a), 431.30].

Proof that the landlord knows the tenant's business or primary residence address may come from various sources, including:

C Cross examination of the landlord or property manager.

C Direct examination of the tenant.

C Examination of the tenant's co-workers or co-habitators regarding contact at the alternative property by the landlord.

C Normal discovery channels.

C Information in the rental application.

Because proof of service is an element of the plaintiff's case in chief, the best starting point is to ask the person who served the notice to state the steps taken before resorting to posting and mailing.

For further discussion, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: Landlord-Tenant Litigation, Ch. 4, Termination of Tenancy, §§ 4.07 et seq., 4.21 et seq.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Christian A.M. Curry is an attorney with the Tenants Legal Center in San Diego, California. He is a graduate of the University of California, San Diego, and Thomas Jefferson School of Law in San Diego. He has been in private practice for 15 years.

Mr. Curry's practice is dedicated to the representation of tenants and consumers. He has acted as an advisor to all four branches of the military and numerous public organizations on the issues of housing and tenancies. He has served as a judge pro tempore of the Superior Court and has been involved directly and as a consultant on several groundbreaking tenant law cases, including the Losornio case cited above.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

138 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Hauser on Florida Rule of Civil Procedure 1.525

2008 Emerging Issues 2143

Florida Rule of Civil Procedure 1.525 -- Bright Line Turns Into Black Hole.

By Hon. James C. Hauser

April 30, 2008

SUMMARY: In Florida, following the necessary procedures for obtaining attorneys fees is becoming more and more critical. This commentary, written by James C. Hauser, an expert on attorneys fees and author of Attorneys Fees in Florida, examines important considerations for the practitioner on Rule 1.525 motions for attorneys fees in light of recent case law interpreting the Rule.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Hauser, James C. Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 Bright Line Turns Into Black Hole. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Background. When the Florida Supreme Court adopted Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 (1.525) the clear goal was to set a time certain when the motion for attorneys fees must be served after the final judgment was signed. However, Rule 1.525, as recently interpreted by several appellate courts, has only created more uncertainty on the proper filing procedures for seeking attorneys fees than it has resolved -- exactly the opposite objective of what Rule 1.525 was intended to cure. In fact, several weeks after the publication of Hauser on Proper Motion Filing for Attorney's Fees the Second District Court of Appeals in Parrot Cove Marina, LLC., v. Duncan Seawall Dock & Boatlift, Inc., 32 Fla. L. Weekly d2733 (Fla. 2d DCA 2007) (Parrot Cove) created additional ambiguities on this critical step in obtaining attorneys fees and withdrew their opinion four months later.

2nd DCA Holds That Both the Basis for Attorneys Fees and Discovery Supporting the Amount of Such Fees Must be Disclosed in the 1.525 Motion. In Parrot Cove Marina, LLC., v. Duncan Seawall Dock & Boatlift, Inc., 32 Fla. L. Weekly d2733 (Fla. 2d DCA 2007) (Parrot Cove) the trial court ruled that the prevailing party was entitled to attorneys fees. Because the final judgment dealt with the issue of entitlement to attorneys fees, the prevailing party did not serve a 1.525 motion for attorneys fees. Instead within the required 30 day time period required by 1.525, Duncan served a notice of hearing to recover on attorneys fees. Duncan argued that because its notice of hearing was the functional equivalent of a 1.525 motion, attorneys fees should be permitted as suggested by dicta in a prior 2nd DCA case, Gulf Landings Assoc., v. Hershberger, 845 So. 2d 344 (Fla. 2d DCA 2003). The 2nd DCA in Parrot Cove tentatively agreed that a notice of hearing could comply with 1.525. Parrot Cove was less concerned about the nomenclature of the document filed, be it a notice of hearing or a motion for attorneys fees, then the contents of such document. Thus the issue to be decided in Parrot Cove was whether Duncans notice of hearing on attorneys fees complied with 1.525.

In Hart v. City of Groveland, 919 So. 2d 665 (Fla. 5th DCA 2006), the 5th DCA stated in dicta that it would be superfluous to require a party to file a motion to tax attorneys fees and costs, when the issue of entitlement to attorneys fees had already been decided in the final judgment. By implication, the 5th DCA was following a long line of cases holding that the law does not require a redundant, useless or futile act. C.U. Associates, Inc. v. R. B. Grove, Inc., 472 So. 2d 1177 (Fla. 1985) (C.U.); Florida Emergency Physicians- Kang and Assoc. v. Parker, 800 So. 2d 631 (Fla. 5th DCA 2001).

In C.U., Mr. Grove brought an action to foreclose on a mechanics lien, which permits attorneys fees to the prevailing party, against C.U. C.U. agreed to pay in full the unpaid balance of the bill, which was the subject of the dispute. Mr. Grove refused and recovered the exact amount offered by C.U. The trial court then awarded Grove attorneys fees, because there had not been a formal tender of the settlement amount after the informal offer had been rejected. The Florida Supreme Court reversed and denied Grove attorneys fees. C.U. Associates, Inc. v. R.B. Grove, Inc., 472 So. 2d 1177 (Fla. 1985).

The Florida Supreme Court stated at page 1179: ...we note that the law does not require a futile act. Haimovitz v. Robb, 178 So. 827 (Fla. 1937). Thus when a bona fide, good faith settlement offer has been unequivocally refused, a formal tender of the settlement is not required. The 2nd DCA in Parrot Cove declined to follow the Hart decision, stating the plain language of the rule n1 and prior case law within the 2nd DCA, Nicoletti v. Nicoletti, 902 So. 2d 215 (Fla. 2d DCA 2005); Gulf Shores, L.L.C. v. Riverwood Community Development District, 927 So. 2d 246 (Fla. 2d DCA 2006) and Caldwell v. Finochi, 909 So. 2d 976 (Fla. 2d DCA 2005) prevented them from doing so.

Once the issue of entitlement to attorneys fees has been resolved, the only remaining issue to be decided is the amount of attorneys fees to be awarded. Thus when the 2nd DCA ruled that a 1.525 must be served, even though entitlement to attorneys fees had been resolved, it had no choice but to require that a 1.525 motion notify the opposing party of the amount of attorneys fees sought. Gulf Landings Association v. Hershberger, 845 So. 2d 344 (Fla. 2nd DCA 2003).

As will be explained in this EC, Parrot Cove did not so much preserve a bright line, as paint itself in a corner. Parrot Cove stated:

We think that to comply with rule 1.525, a partys filing should, at a minimum, include a statement of the amount of fees sought and the substantive basis for the amount of fees sought, including, but not limited to, supporting affidavits, copies of bills or invoices, and the identities of any witnesses whose testimonies are intended to support the request for fees. In other words, the notice should be the substantive equivalent of a proper fee motion, and therefore its nomenclature alone should not determine its effect. However, Duncans notice of hearing did not contain any such information- it merely referenced the final judgment. Parrot Cove Marina, LLC., v. Duncan Seawall Dock & Boatlift, Inc., 32 Fla. L. Weekly d2733, 2735 (Fla 2d DCA 2007)(emphasis added).

Parrot Cove* Misinterprets the Purpose of Rule 1.525 -- 1.525 Must be Read in Conjunction with 1.100(b). Motions for Costs and Attorneys Fees states: Any party seeking a judgment taxing costs, attorneys fees, or both, shall serve a motion no later than 30 days after filing of the judgment, including a judgment of dismissal, or the service of a notice of voluntary dismissal.

1.525 deals solely with when the motion for attorneys fees must be served. There is nothing in the rule that hints what must be contained in the motion itself. Gulf Landings Association v. Hershberger, 845 So. 2d 344 (Fla. 2nd DCA 2003)(Gulf Landings). However, like any other rule, 1.525 must be read in conjunction with the other rules of Florida Civil Procedure. Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.100(b) requires that any motion state with particularity the grounds therefor and shall state the relief or order sought. Thus to comply with 1.100(b) the 1.525 motion must state the relief sought (the recovery of attorneys fees) and state with particularity the basis to obtain such relief, to wit, the contract, statute or common law that entitles a party to recover attorneys fees.

In applying 1.100(b) in conjunction with 1.525, Gulf Landings, which was relied upon by Parrot Cove, was correct when it held that to comply with the first prong of Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.100(b) (state with particularity the grounds therefore) the 1.525 motion must state the legal basis for entitlement to attorneys fees. Unfortunately, Gulf Landings misapplied the second prong of Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.100(b)(shall state the relief or order sought) by holding that the amount of attorneys fees must be disclosed. As will be shown by this EC, the misapplication of this second prong to 1.525 motions has led to unnecessary and expensive legal confusion. Two other appellate courts have rejected the requirement that 1.525 requires that the motion for attorneys fees be accompanied by an affidavit as to the time spent on the case. Silver Springs Properties, LLC., v. ERA Murray Realities Inc., 874 So. 2d 712 (Fla. 2004); P.R. Smith Corp., v. Goyarrola, 864 So. 2d 584 (Fla. 3d DCA 2004). Their analysis was simple. The wording of 1.525 does not mention the need for affidavits and therefore none is required.

Silver Springs rejected outright the argument that somehow 1.100(b) might require an affidavit of the attorneys fees sought, by pointing out that no court has ever required that a motion be accompanied by an affidavit. See Exceletech Inc., Williams, 579 So. 2d 850 (Fla. 5th DCA 1991). It should be noted that Parrot Cove never mentioned, much less distinguished the above two cases.

Discovery Requirements Judicially Created by Parrot Cove Unconstitutionally Impinges on the Rule Making Authority of the Florida Supreme Court. Fla. Const. Art. V sec 2(a) grants the Florida Supreme Court sole power to create rules of procedure. Various rules committees meet, and once every four years, submit suggested rule changes to the Florida Supreme Court. The Florida Supreme Court then invites comment on the suggested rule changes. It then decides, after careful deliberation, what rules should be amended, deleted or left unchanged.

In Citigroup, Inc. v. Holtsberg, 915 So. 2d 1265 (Fla. 4th DCA 2005), a high level corporate officer sought to prevent his deposition unless the party seeking discovery was able to show he had unique or superior knowledge about the lawsuit. However there were no Florida discovery rules demanding such proof. The trial court denied the corporate officers objection and the corporate officer filed a petition for writ of certiorari to the 4th DCA. In denying the corporate officers petition for writ of certiorari, the 4th DCA stated at page 1269: A district court may not adopt a doctrine which arguably conflicts with the discovery rules. Because discovery rules are rules of practice and procedure, only the Florida Supreme Court has this authority. Article V sec 2(a) Florida Constitution. See also Capone v. Florida Board of Regents, 774 So. 2d 825 (Fla. 4th DCA 2000).

Requiring the disclosure of supporting affidavits, copies of bills or invoices and the identities of any witnesses, as part of the 1.525 motion clearly constitute rules of discovery, which are rules of practice and procedure, solely within the province of the Florida Supreme Court. As a result it is not even worthy of debate that the 2d DCA in Parrot Cove unconstitutionally infringed on the rule making authority of the Florida Supreme Court and therefore the discovery requirements are not necessary to comply with 1.525.

Finally the language of 1.525 is clear on its face. There is no reason to try to add language where none exists. Florida courts interpret statutes according to their plain meaning. There are certain accepted principles of statutory construction that can be applied if a statute is ambiguous, but the courts have no reason to speculate as to the meaning of a statute if it is clear on its face. Brown v. State of Florida Commission on Ethics, 32 Fla. L. Weekly d 2342, 2348 (Fla. 1st DCA 2007).

Requiring the Amount of Attorneys Fees be Disclosed Prior to the Entitlement Phase of Attorneys Fees Being Decided Creates Unnecessary Expense.

1. Prevailing Party Is Unclear -- who is the prevailing party, entitled to attorneys fees, is often very difficult to determine. n2 The test as to which party prevailed is which party prevailed on the significant issue of the case. Moritz

v. Hoyt Enterprises, Inc., 604 So. 2d 807 (Fla. 1992).

For example, a plaintiff files a four count complaint, of which Counts I- III permits the award of attorneys fees to the prevailing party. After a one month jury trial, the plaintiff prevails on Count I, loses on counts II and III, but prevails on Count IV, which does not authorize the award of attorneys fees. Thus at this stage of the proceedings, it is not clear whether the plaintiff or defendant will be the prevailing party entitled to attorneys fees. In virtually every case, the entitlement phase of the attorneys fees hearing will be heard long after 30 day time period required by the 1.525 motion has expired.

In the above example, if 1.525 only deals with entitlement to attorneys fees, then both parties must timely serve its 1.525 motion citing only their legal theory that would entitle them to attorneys fees. However under Parrot Cove, both parties would be required to submit their time records, calculate the amount of attorneys fees incurred and hire an attorney as an expert witness to review the time sheets, a needless and costly expense to the party that does not prevail. From a practical standpoint the amount of attorneys fees should only have to be disclosed after the issue of entitlement to attorneys fees has been decided.

2. Entitlement to Attorneys Fees is Not Clear a successful offer of judgment permits a party to recover attorneys fees, even if there is no other statutory or contractual basis for attorneys fees. If a defendant makes an offer of judgment and the amount obtained in the net judgment is at least 25% less than the offer, the defendant will be entitled to attorneys fees. Fla. Stat. § 768.79(6)(a). Attorneys fees under the offer of judgment will be denied if the offer is found not to have been made in good faith. Sec 768.79(7)(a).

Suppose the defendant serves an offer of judgment for $100,000 and the jury returns a verdict of $70,000. Two separate issues must be decided before the defendant will be entitled to attorneys fees. First the offer of judgment must be procedurally valid. The procedural validity of the offer of judgment has been the subject of extensive litigation, with many offer of judgments being found defective, which resulted in attorneys fees not being awarded. n3

Secondly, even if procedurally valid, the amount of the net judgment must be less than 75% of the offer of judgment. When costs and other legally permissible amounts are added to the above final judgment, it may, or may not, be less than 75% of the threshold level which would entitle the defendant to attorneys fees. Again there has been extensive litigation in this area, where many offers have been found not to have met the threshold level and thus attorneys fees denied. n4

Even if the offer of judgment is procedurally adequate and the threshold level has been met, attorneys fees may be denied if the offer is found not to have been made in good faith. Sec. 768.79(7). There has also been extensive litigation on whether the offer has, or has not, been made in good faith. n5

If, in fact, the offer of judgment is not valid, for any of the reasons listed above, it is a needless and unnecessary expense for the defendant to have to go through the procedural hoops created by Parrot Cove, only to be denied attorneys fees.

3. Multiplier -- in calculating attorneys fees the court must multiply the reasonable number of hours times the hourly rate. Standard Guarantee Ins. Co. v. Quanstrom, 555 So. 2d 828 (Fla. 1990). In certain situations, that amount may be increased by a multiplier. n6 In order to recover a multiplier under Standard Guarantee, the prevailing party must prove:

1. Whether the relevant market rate requires a contingency fee multiplier to obtain competent counsel.
2. Whether the attorney was able to mitigate the risk of non payment.
3. The amount involved, the results obtained and the type of fee arrangement between the client and attorney.

If a multiplier should be awarded, then the court must determine the likelihood of success at the beginning of the case to calculate the amount of the multiplier.

Requiring the discovery disclosures as part of the 1.525 motion under Parrot Cove becomes not just an onerous financial burden, but raises even more questions. When Parrot Cove stated that an affidavit must be filed, one assumes Parrot Cove was referring to the prevailing party's attorney. In order to satisfy prong I of Standard Guarantee, recent case law has mandated that the prevailing party himself testify that he had difficulty in obtaining counsel. Progressive Express Ins. Co., Schultz, 948 So. 2d 1027 (Fla. 5th DCA 2007). Does Parrot Cove also require an affidavit from the party himself as to this issue?

To satisfy prong three of Standard Guarantee, the contact between the attorney and client must be introduced into evidence. Suppose the original attorney withdraws and is succeeded by a replacement attorney. Must the contracts of both attorneys be attached to the motion? If the original attorney's contract is not attached, may it be submitted after the 1.525 motion is served?

If a multiplier is to be awarded then there must be evidence as to the likelihood of success at the beginning of the case. Can that be accomplished in the 1.525 motion by the attorney seeking fees or must an expert attorney's fees witness have to submit an affidavit on this issue within the 30 day time period required by 1.525?

Attorneys Fees Not Yet Incurred Post Judgment Are Not Capable of Being Disclosed in the 1.525 Motion

Example: Attorneys Fees for Litigating Entitlement to Attorneys Fees. Florida permits attorneys fees for litigating entitlement to attorneys fees, but not the amount of attorneys fees. State Farm Fire & Cas. Ins. Co. v. Palma, 555 So. 2d 836 (Fla. 1990); Crittenden Orange Blossom Fruit v. Stone, 514 So. 2d 351 (Fla. 1987). In fact the 2nd DCA has suggested that attorneys fees should also be permitted for litigating the amount of attorneys fees. Wight v. Wight, 880 So. 2d 692 (Fla. 2d DCA 2004).

As previously stated, if the issue of entitlement to attorneys fees is disputed, the entitlement hearing will be heard long after the 1.525 motion is served. How, pray tell, is the party seeking attorneys fees to disclose an amount of attorney fees spent on the entitlement phase, when the amount of time is not yet known? Obviously any such disclosure would have to be speculative and as a result, serve no useful purpose.

World Omni timely served its 1.525 motion seeking attorneys fees under sec. 768.79 Florida Statutes, based on the offer of judgment statute. Attorneys fees were awarded. The losing party appealed both the merits of the case and the attorneys fees award. The appellate court affirmed on both issues and awarded attorneys fees for the appeal based on sec. 768.79. After the remand, the trial court awarded attorneys fees for both the appeal and for non appellate post judgment attorneys fees. Clearly the attorneys fees incurred for the non appeal, post judgment attorneys fees occurred more than 30 days after the final judgment and thus there was no way that World could timely comply with time requirements of 1.525. Nevertheless, the 15th Circuit denied attorneys fees for the non appellate, post judgment attorneys fees for failure to comply with 1.525. Cohen v. World Omni Financial Corp., 15 Fla. L. Weekly Supp. 30a (15th Cir. App. 2007) (Cohen).

It is axiomatic that courts will not interpret a statute or rule which would lead to an absurd or unreasonable result. State v. Webb, 398 So. 2d 820 (Fla. 1991); Contract Point Florida Parks, L.L.C. v. State of Florida, Dept. Of Env. Protection, 958 So. 2d 1035 (Fla. 1st DCA 2007). The basis for denying post judgment attorneys fees in Cohen, for failure to comply with 1.525, because the attorneys fees has not yet accrued at the time the 1.525 motion was served, is both absurd and unreasonable.

Summary. In its zeal to make sure the bright line test is not violated, appellate courts have added layer after layer of requirements, making it more confusing and difficult to comply with 1.525. 1.525 is a notice rule for when the attorneys fees motion must be served. Compliance with the rule is fully accomplished by the party seeking attorneys fees serving a motion for attorneys fees no later than 30 days after the final judgment and informing the opposing party of its basis for entitlement to attorneys fee. That is all 1.525 requires.

Practice Tips. Unless the 2nd DCA reverses its position in Parrot Cove, attorneys in order to avoid any problems should include in their 1.525 motion the amount of attorneys fees sought, an affidavit from the attorney as to the hours spent on the case and his normal hourly rate, invoices and or bills and the name, address and phone number of the attorneys fees expert witness.

Return to Text

n1 . It is not clear to the author what plain language requiring the added disclosures mandated by in 1.525 the 2nd DCA is referring to.

n2

[2]. Attorneys Fees in Florida by James C. Hauser, Chapter 3 -- Prevailing Party (LexisNexis).

n3

[3]. See generally Attorneys Fees in Florida by James C. Hauser, Chapter 4.01 2(b)(c)(d) (LexisNexis).

n4

[4]. See generally Attorneys Fees in Florida by James C. Hauser, Chapter 4.01 2(f)(g) (LexisNexis). More specifically White v. Steak and Ale of Florida, Inc., 816 So. 2d 546 (Fla. 2002); Scottsdale Ins. Co., v. DeSalvo, 748 So. 2d 941 (Fla. 1999); Danis Industries Corp., v. General Imp. Techniques, Inc., 645 So. 2d 420 (Fla. 1994)

n5

[5]. See generally Attorneys Fees in Florida by James C. Hauser, Chapter 4.01 2(h) (LexisNexis).

n6

[6]. If an attorney normally charges $300 an hour, and a court awards a multiplier of two, then the hourly rate equals $600 an hour.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Hon. James C. Hauser is a recently retired Circuit Court Judge for the Ninth Judicial Circuit of the State of Florida where he had served since 1990. Previously, he was County Judge in Orange County, in which capacity he was named Jurist of the Year by the Young Lawyers Division of the Florida Bar in 1989. He is a graduate of Boston University School of Law and the Wharton School of Finance at the University of Pennsylvania. Judge Hauser lectures frequently before the bench, bar, and public on the subject of attorney's fees. He is the author for Floridas foremost authority on attorneys fees, Attorneys Fees in Florida, Second edition. He is also the author Florida Residential Landlord-Tenant Manual. Judge Hauser is available for personal consultations or to lecture on obtaining and maximizing attorney fees and can be reached at 407-951-6685, 9012 Summit Centre Way 102, Orlando, Fla. 32810 or by email at jameshauser@attorneysfeesflorida.com.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

139 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Russ Bensing on Tabatha v. Zimmerman, 2008 Ohio 1639 (6th Dist. 2008).

2008 Emerging Issues 2242

Russ Bensing on Tabatha v. Zimmerman and Expert Testimony in Medical Malpractice Cases

By Russell Bensing

April 29, 2008

SUMMARY: Tabatha v. Zimmerman joins a number of recent decisions discussing the standards for admission of medical testimony in medical malpractice cases. This commentary, by Russ Bensing, discusses the trend in these cases and concludes that the courts may be adopting a more lenient attitude toward the admission of such testimony.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Less Restrictive Standards of Admissibility for Expert Testimony in Medical Malpractice Cases

Your case is only as good as your expert is a common aphorism among lawyers who handle medical malpractice cases. Although a physician is usually the first choice for an expert, the decision in Tabatha v. Zimmerman, 2008 Ohio 1639 (6th Dist. 2008) makes clear that non-physicians can fulfill that function in certain cases. The Tabatha decision was not ground-breaking; the opinion draws largely from Morris v. Childrens Hosp. Medical Center, 73 Ohio App. 3d 437 (1st Dist. 1991), where the court reached a similar result, reversing a grant of summary judgment based on the trial courts conclusion that the plaintiffs expert witness, a nurse, was unqualified to give testimony.

Interplay of Evidence Rules. What Tabatha and several other recent decisions indicate, however, is that the courts may be willing to adopt a more relaxed attitude toward expert testimony in medical malpractice cases. Its important to note that there are two evidentiary rules at issue. The first is R. Evid. 702, which spells out the broad requirements for expert testimony: basically, that the subject is beyond the normal understanding of laymen, that the witness has a specialized knowledge or training, and that his or her testimony is based on reliable scientific methods. R. Evid. 601(D), however, defines the qualifications necessary for an expert testifying in a medical claim, requiring that the expert devote at least one-half his or her time to the active clinical practice of medicine, or to instruction in an accredited school.

While Rule 601(D) is obviously a restriction on Rule 702, counsel considering the presentation of expert testimony in medical malpractice cases should still emphasize the latter rule over the former, relying on case law that stresses the importance of the expert in assisting the jury in coming to a just result, such as the Supreme Courts language in Ishler v. Miller, 56 O.St.2d 447, 453 (1978) that the test of admissibility is whether a particular witness offered as an expert will aid the trier of fact in the search of the truth, not whether the expert witness is the best witness on the subject. Similarly helpful is the decision last year in Celmer v. Rogers, 114 O.St.3d 221 (2007), where the Court affirmed the 11th Districts decision to permit the testimony of a doctor, even though he did not meet the Rule 601(D) requirements at the time of his testimony because he had retired six months earlier. The unique facts render the case of little precedential value the trial had to be continued for over a year because of the insolvency of the defendants insurance carrier but the opinion contains important language to the effect that Rule 601(D) must be read in conformity with other rules of evidence to provide procedures for the adjudication of causes to the end that the truth may be ascertained and proceedings justly determined. (Emphasis in opinion).

Caveats for Practitioners. To be sure, Rule 601(D) still governs the admissibility of expert testimony in medical malpractice cases, and counsel contemplating the use of non-physician experts, or even physician experts, should keep several caveats in mind:

- . As Tabatha indicates, a nurse is competent to give testimony as to the standard of care of a nurse. In fact, where the case revolves around the issue of the professional skill and judgment of a nurse, a nurse may be the best expert. Ramage v. Central Ohio Emergency Services, Inc., 64 Ohio St. 3d 97 (1992).

- . A non-physician cannot testify as to the direct liability of a physician or a hospital, but can testify as to the liability of a physician or hospital under a respondeat superior theory. Morris, supra, 73 Ohio App. 3d 437.

- . Even if a non-physician is qualified to testify on the issue of standard of care, he or she may not be qualified to testify as to proximate cause. Grigsby v. Anesthesiologists of Southwestern Ohio, 1994 Ohio App. LEXIS 1814 (1st Dist. 1994) (nurse qualified to testify that anesthesiologist violated standard of care, but not to testify that proximate result was vasovagal episode). But see Tranter v. Mercy Franciscan Hosp. W. Hills, 2007 Ohio 5132 (1st Dist. 2007) (nurse experts testimony that negligence of nurse caused fall sufficient, because issue of proximate cause and damages was within common knowledge).

- . The standards for expert testimony under the evidentiary rules are not the same as the standards for an affidavit of merit for a medical liability claim under Civ.R. 10(D)(2). Tranter, supra (purpose of affidavit to winnow out utterly frivolous claims. . . not to test the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence on the ultimate issue of the defendant's liability).

- . Doctors arent fungible as experts: even a physician may not be qualified to testify as to another doctors standard of care. The cautionary tale here is provided by Taulbee v. Dunskey, 2003 Ohio 5988 (12th Dist. 2003), where the plaintiffs decedent alleged that the defendant emergency room physicians had negligently failed to diagnose an aortic dissection. The plaintiffs presented the testimony of a cardiothoracic surgeon, but the defense objected at trial, claiming that the doctor lacked the qualifications to testify as to the standard of care of an emergency room physician and family practitioner. The court acknowledged the general rule that an expert need not be of the same specialty as the defendant, but despite the fact that the expert testified he had diagnosed and treated aortic dissections on numerous occasions, the court concluded that his experience in that regard was much different from that of emergency physicians in initial consults, and held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the experts testimony.

Taulbee may well be an outlier, or may have been the result of inadequate preparation of the expert. In Schutte v. Mooney, 165 O.App.3d 56 (2nd Dist. 2006), the appellate court reversed the trial judges decision, which had been based on Taulbee, excluding the testimony of an expert in a case involving an emergency room physician. Despite the fact that the expert, a cardiovascular surgeon, had not worked in emergency rooms for twenty-eight years, the appellate court held that Taulbee was distinguishable because the expert had testified that the standard of care was the same whether the patient had presented to a family practitioner, and emergency room physician, or a specialist.

Perhaps the key to Taulbee, and to many of these cases, is the standard of review: like virtually all questions of admission of evidence, the trial courts determination of an experts qualifications is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. The essential task is persuading the trial judge, in the first instance, that the testimony is admissible. Given Tabatha, Celmer, and the other recent decisions in this area, counsel can be prepared to argue that the standards of admissibility for expert testimony in medical malpractice cases should be viewed less restrictively than they traditionally have been.

For additional discussion of expert testimony, see Weissenberger's Ohio Evidence Treatise 702.syn Testimony by Experts; Weissenberger's Ohio Evidence Treatise § 601.6 Expert Medical Testimony in Medical Malpractice Cases; Ohio Evidence Courtroom Manual 702.syn Rule 702. Testimony by Experts; Ohio Evidence Courtroom Manual 601.syn Rule 601. General Rule of Competency.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Russell Bensing is a solo practitioner in Cleveland, Ohio, specializing in criminal, appellate, and general civil litigation. He graduated from Case Western Reserve University Law School in 1975, and was admitted to the Ohio Bar that year, to practice in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio in 1976, and to the United States Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1982. He is a member of the Ohio State Bar Association, the Cleveland Metropolitan Bar Association, the Ohio Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys, and the Cuyahoga Criminal Defense Lawyers Association. He is the author of The Briefcase, a blog devoted to Ohio law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

140 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 305

2008 Emerging Issues 2234

Joe McDonnell on MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 305 (Ill. S. Ct. 2008)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

April 28, 2008

SUMMARY: In MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams, a case of first impression, the Illinois Supreme Court applied the principles of statutory construction and the custom and usage of the construction industry to conclude that the Home Repair and Remodeling Act does not apply to subcontractors. This commentary, written by Joe McDonnell, explores the implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: McDonnell, Joe. MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Home Repair and Remodeling Act Does Not Apply to Subcontractors

In MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams, a case of first impression, the Illinois Supreme Court held that the Home Repair and Remodeling Act does not apply to subcontractors. The Court relied on several principles of statutory construction, as well as custom and usage in the construction industry, to reach its result. The case stresses the importance of reading all relevant parts of a statute in order to determine the legislative intent. It also emphasizes the significance of commonly-understood business practices in gaining insight into the application of a statute.

Background of the Home Repair and Remodeling Act. The Home Repair and Remodeling Act (815 ILCS 513/5) was passed in 1999 as Public Act 91-230 and became effective on January 1, 2000. Its purpose was to improve communications between consumers and persons engaged in the business of home repairs or remodeling in order to increase consumer confidence, reduce the likelihood of disputes, and promote fair and honest practices in that business in this State. Smith v. Bogard, 316 Ill. Dec. 476 (4th Dist. 2007).

In Smith v. Bogard, cited supra, the plaintiff, who had orally contracted with the defendants to build an addition to the living room of their home, sued for the balance that he contended was due him after receiving some $15,000.00 from the defendants. Defendants motion to dismiss on the basis that plaintiff had failed to comply with the Home Repair and Remodeling Act was allowed and, on appeal, the ruling was affirmed. Even though plaintiff contended that he was a subcontractor and thus not bound by the Act, the Smith court found, based on the evidence, that he was a person engaged in the business of home repair, that he had performed general construction work for the homeowner; and that no other person had a written contract with the homeowners, as envisioned by the Act. He was therefore held to be subject to the Act and his failure to have a written contract with the defendants, as required by the Act, was fatal to his action. Smith v. Bogard, 316 Ill. Dec. 476 (4th Dist. 2007).

The court in Smith, however, did not squarely address whether a subcontractor (if proven to be such) was subject to the Home Repair and Remodeling Act. That issue was dealt with for the first time by the Supreme Court in MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams.

Principles of Statutory Construction. In MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams, the plaintiff argued that the Act was designed to regulate communications between contractors and the consumer/home owner and that, because subcontractors typically do not have significant direct communications with homeowners, the Act could not apply to them. Any ambiguity in the wording of the statute, plaintiff contended, must be resolved against the inclusion of subcontractors within its terms. The homeowner defendants argued that since the term contractor was not defined, and the statute repeatedly referred to any person in describing those bound by its terms, all contractors, including subcontractors, were included within its scope.

The court rejected each approach suggested by the parties and, instead, focused on the importance of reading the statute as a whole and considering all of its relevant parts. In addition, the Court found it important to understand what it termed the common business practice in the home repair and remodeling industry. That practice, noted the court, typically involves a homeowner contracting with a general contractor to oversee a specific project, such as an addition to a residence. In the usual circumstance, the general contractor acts as project manager and may in turn contract with other individuals or tradesman to perform certain duties. This frees the homeowner from the necessity of coordinating the work of various contractors and tradespeople, permits the homeowner to deal only with one person or company, and frees the homeowner from the responsibility of supervising every aspect of the project. This common understanding, said the court, is critical to the understanding of the Home Repair and Remodeling Act. MD Electrical, slip op. at 4-5.

Employing these aids to statutory construction, the Court found it clear that the statute unambiguously applies only to those who directly contract with the homeowner. The Courts focus on the principles of statutory construction, and particularly the principle of reading every relevant part of the statute in an effort to arrive at the legislative intent, is well supported by Illinois authority. In Parizon v. Granite City Steel Company, 71 Ill.App.2d 53 (5th Dist. 1966), the Fifth District Appellate Court, in determining whether the roof of a structure was a scaffold, support or mechanical contrivance within the terms of the former Structural Work Act, found it useful to consider all sections of the statute, in addition to the one containing the quoted language. The Supreme Court reiterated and followed the rule in other recent cases. See, e.g., Illinois Dept. of Healthcare and Family Services v. Warner, 227 Ill.2d 223 (Ill. 2008) and Vine Street Clinic v. HealthLink, Inc., 222 Ill.2d 276, 856 N.E.2d 422 (Ill. 2006).

In addition to considering all portions of the Home Repair and Remodeling Act, the Court also pointed to other related statutes in determining the limited scope of the Act. The Mechanics Lien Act (770 ILCS 60/0.01 et seq.) protects subcontractors by giving them lien rights against the property in the event their bills are not paid through the general contractor. For that reason, the pamphlet that the Home Repair and Remodeling Act mandates be given the consumer references the rights of suppliers and subcontractors to lien the property if not paid by the general contractor. Such references would be meaningless if the Act were intended to apply to subcontractors. MD Electrical, slip op. at 10-12.

Aided by the principles of statutory construction and its understanding of common business practice in the home repair and remodeling industry, the Courts conclusion that the statute does not apply to subcontractors is well-supported. Because the usual contracts involve only the homeowners and the general contractor who undertakes overall responsibility for the project and the homeowners rarely, if ever, deal with subcontractors and suppliers, it appears manifest that the legislative intent was to limit the statutes applicability to general contractors in their dealings with homeowners and not to include subcontractors.

Tips for Practitioners. A case involving the application of a statute may bring into play several principles of statutory construction. The cardinal rule, of course, is to give effect to the intent of the legislature, and the best evidence of legislative intent is the language used in the statute itself, which must be given its plain and ordinary meaning. It is also a well-settled principle of statutory interpretation that undefined terms in a statute shall be accorded their plain and commonly understood meanings. The statute should be read as a whole and construed so that no part of it is rendered meaningless or superfluous. And if the statutory language is susceptible to more than one interpretation, the court may look beyond the language to consider the purposes of the statute. In re B.C., 176 Ill.2d 536 (Ill. 1997).

As is seen from MD Electrical Contractors, Inc. v. Abrams, sometimes one or more of these rules is overlooked, and the result may leave the court unsatisfied with the approach taken by either or both of the parties. It is imperative that all applicable rules of statutory construction be consulted and utilized as appropriate by counsel on both sides of the case. Anything less will handicap the court (whether trial or appellate) in reaching an appropriate resolution.

For additional discussion of the home improvement contracts, see Midwest Trans. Guide -- Bus. & Comm. Law & Forms § 56.41 Home Improvement Contracts.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors' qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

141 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Don Cetrulo on Asset Acceptance, LLC v. Moberly, 241 S.W.3d 329 (Ky. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2228

Don Cetrulo on Asset Acceptance, LLC v. Moberly, 241 S.W.3d 329 (Ky. 2007)

By Don Cetrulo

April 28, 2008

SUMMARY: In Asset Acceptance, LLC v. Moberly, 241 S.W.3d 329 (Ky. 2007), the Supreme Court of Kentucky joins the federal courts in recognizing a narrow exception to the rule that orders setting aside a judgment are not subject to an immediate appeal under Ky. R. Civ. P. 60.02(f). This commentary, written by Don Cetrulo, examines this decision and its ramifications.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Asset Acceptance, LLC v. Moberly, 241 S.W.3d 329 (Ky. 2007), the Kentucky Supreme Court recognized a new avenue of relief by appeal, for a party aggrieved by a trial courts vacating a judgment under CR 60.02, so long as the courts temporal jurisdiction may reasonably be questioned.

In this collections case, Asset Acceptance obtained a default judgment against Moberly, who admitted that she had been served with all of the relevant pleadings and orders, and hence, claimed no procedural defect in the judgment. Nevertheless, Moberly claimed to be unaware of the proceedings because she was going through substance addiction treatment at the time, and, two years after the judgment, Moberly moved to have it set aside primarily on CR 60.02(f) grounds, that is, relief from a judgment for reasons of an extraordinary nature. The trial court set aside the judgment because default judgments are disfavored in the law. See e.g., Educator & Executive Insurers, Inc. v. Moore, 505 S.W.2d 176, 178 (Ky. 1974).

Asset Acceptance unsuccessfully argued that, to the dubious extent Moberly might have been entitled to any relief at all, it could only have come from CR 60.02(a), inter alia, excusable neglect, which must be raised within one year. It sought redress from the trial courts order via an appeal.

Rare Appeal for Interlocutory Order. A trial courts order setting aside the judgment is interlocutory for the obvious reason: rather than finalizing a case it reopens it. Hackney v. Hackney, 327 S.W.2d 570 (Ky. 1959). The rule prohibiting appeals from interlocutory orders is not an invariable one. Previously, however, the Court confined the exception to those instances in which the appeals were expressly authorized by statute. Cavalier Homes of Ala. v. Coleman, 181 S.W.3d 558 (Ky. 2005). Otherwise, relief from interlocutory orders has been limited to that attainable by writ. In Asset Acceptance, the Court recognized another exception: appeals from orders vacating judgments under CR 60.02 if the trial courts jurisdiction is doubtful owing to the passage of time, in this case, beyond a year.

Narrow Holding but Broad Grounds. By way of its expression of confidence that its decision would result in few additional appeals, the Court implied that the case should not be read as establishing a broad new class of interlocutory appeals. Nonetheless, the holding is grounded in the Courts reasoning that an out-of-time order vacating a judgment amounts to an act beyond the jurisdiction of the trial court and should be appealable. Logically, the holding could extend to any other claim that the trial court has acted beyond its jurisdiction. This would include, for example, a family courts issuing an order to nonparties, or the courts issuing sua sponte restraining orders or injunctions. Lewis LP Gas, Inc. v. Lambert, 113 S.W.3d 171, 173 (Ky. 2003).

Acts Beyond Courts Jurisdiction Are Also Grounds for a Writ. A courts acting beyond its jurisdictional boundaries is also recognized as sufficient grounds for a writ. Hoskins v. Maricle, 150 S.W.3d 1 (Ky. 2004); Newell Enters. v. Bowling, 158 S.W.3d 750 (Ky. 2005); Wood v. Graham, 633 S.W.2d 404 (Ky. 1982). Although the Court in Asset Acceptance referred to irreparable injury" as a prerequisite to a writ in like circumstances, it was by way of dicta, and it is highly unlikely that the Court intended to modify its holding in Hoskins, which specifically held that the irreparable injury/no adequate remedy by appeal test was to be applied only to the class of writ applications grounded in a claim that the trial court was acting erroneously but within its jurisdiction.

The better explanation is that the Court disfavors writs and may be disposed toward permitting interlocutory appeals whenever the trial court acted beyond its jurisdiction. That theory will have to be tested in cases to come. But it should not go unnoticed that to accomplish the narrow end of allowing certain appeals under CR 60.02, the Court need only have amended the Rules of Civil Procedure to expressly permit those appeals. The Court mentioned that many jurisdictions have adopted statutes authorizing such appeals. At least in this jurisdiction, the Supreme Court itself is vested with that power under KY. CONST. §§ 110 (2)(b) and 116. Elk Horn Coal Corp. v. Cheyenne Res., Inc., 163 S.W.3d 408 (Ky. 2005); O'Bryan v. Hedgespeth, 892 S.W.2d 571 (Ky. 1995); Smothers v. Lewis, 672 S.W.2d 62 (Ky. 1984).

Strategic Considerations for the Practitioner. For the practitioner, an appeal is always preferable to a writ. The former is less particularized to the trial judge, and the latter is always discretionary on the part of the higher court. It is, to say the least, inadvisable to choose the route of the writ if, by a reasonable extension of Asset Acceptance, an appeal would do. A writ is an extraordinary remedy that Kentucky courts have always been cautious and conservative both in entertaining and granting. Commonwealth v. Paisley, 201 S.W.3d 34 (Ky. 2006). Conversely, appeals are routine and are more likely to succeed.

For additional discussion of writs and interlocutory appeals, see Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book § 9.00 et seq. (Writ of Prohibition); Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book § 103.00 et seq. (Appeals to the Kentucky Supreme Court);

Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book § 105.00 et seq. (Special Appellate Remedies);

UK/CLE Kentucky Civil Practice After Trial § 4.1 et seq. (Extraordinary Appellate Remedies).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Don Cetrulo is a practicing attorney, an Adjunct Professor at University of Kentucky College of Law, and a Commissioner of the Circuit Court for the Fourteenth Judicial Circuit. He previously served as the Director of Administrative Office of the Courts for fourteen years between 1981 and 1995, and as Director of the Legislative Research Commission for four years between 1995 and 1999. From 1999 to 2006, he was a Kentucky Commissioner of the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws.

He is a graduate of the University of Kentucky College of Law. In 1988 he received the prestigious Innovations in State and Local Government award for excellence in State and local Government from the Ford Foundation and Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government.

From 1972 to 1980 Cetrulo served as a member of the United States Army Reserve.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

142 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Wilson on Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd. v. Cotton Allen, P.S.C.

2008 Emerging Issues 2233

Mike Wilson on Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd. v. Cotton Allen, P.S.C., 237 S.W.3d 141 (Ky. 2007)

By Mike Wilson

April 25, 2008

SUMMARY: Can a party prevent summary judgment without producing affirmative evidence of the existence of a genuine issue of material fact for trial? Probably not, unless issues of material fact are self-evident from the record, according to the Supreme Court of Kentucky in Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd. v. Cotton Allen, P.S.C., 237 S.W.3d 141 (Ky. 2007). This commentary, written by Mike Wilson, explores the implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Wilson, Mike. Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd v. Cotton Allen, P.S.C. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

In Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd v. Cotton Allen, P.S.C., the Supreme Court of Kentucky held that summary judgment based upon the running of the statute of limitations for a professional malpractice action was appropriate where there was no material issue of fact regarding when the appellant should have known it had a cause of action. While acknowledging that the record must be construed in a light most favorable to the party opposing the summary judgment, the court observed that [Queensway] did not file evidence of its own in response to Cotton & Allen's motion for summary judgment cannot be ignored. Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd., p. 150. The court further observed that ordinarily [t]he party opposing a properly presented summary judgment motion cannot defeat it without presenting at least some affirmative evidence showing the existence of a genuine issue of material fact for trial. Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd., at 150, quoting City of Florence v. Chipman, 38 S.W.3d 387, 390 (Ky.2001).

Application of Rule 56. Rule 56 allows for summary judgment if (1) there is no genuine issue as to any material fact, and (2) the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law. City of Florence, at p. 390, states:

All doubts are to be resolved in favor of the party opposing the motion. The movant should not succeed unless a right to judgment is shown with such clarity that there is no room left for controversy, and it is established that the adverse party cannot prevail under any circumstances.

Rule 56.03 states that summary judgment shall be rendered if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, stipulations, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact. The initial burden is on the moving party to establish that a genuine issue does not exist. Steelvest, Inc. v. Scansteel Serv. Ctr., Inc., 807 S.W.2d 476 (Ky.1991).

However, though the rule includes pleadings as items to be considered, Morton v. Allen Const. Co., 416 S.W.2d 733 (Ky. 1967) and other cases have held that allegations in a complaint cannot supplant testimony in the record. Similarly, allegations in the unverified pleadings are not sufficient to controvert affidavits submitted in support or opposition to summary judgment, as one of the purposes of the affidavits is to pierce the pleadings. Gevedon v. Grigsby, 303 S.W.2d 282, 284 (Ky. 1967).

City of Florence states that the trial judge must examine the evidentiary matter, not to decide any issue of fact, but to discover if a real or genuine issue exists. City of Florence, p. 390. Queensway Financial Holdings, Ltd serves as a reminder that for there to be a genuine issue of fact, there must be some evidence that could support a judgment in favor of the party opposing the summary judgment.

How much evidence is required to defeat a motion for summary judgment? Summary judgment is only proper when it would be impossible for the plaintiff to produce any evidence at trial warranting a judgment in his favor. Queensway, at 150, emphasis added, citing Steelvest, Inc. v. Scansteel Serv. Ctr., Inc., 807 S.W.2d 476, 480 (Ky.1991). Wymer v. JH Properties, Inc., 50 S.W.3d 195, 199 (Ky.2001) citing Steelvest, Inc., states the same rule, but then adds that [t]he party opposing summary judgment cannot rely on their own claims or arguments without significant evidence in order to prevent a summary judgment. Wymer, p. 199.

Though Kentucky courts continue to use the impossible language from Steelvest, Welch v. American Publishing Co. of Kentucky, 3 S.W.3d 724, 729 (Ky. 1999) attempted to clarify what Steelvest meant:

Since rendition of our decision in Steelvest v. Scansteel, Ky., 807 S.W.2d 476 (1991), on the question of the proper standard for deciding summary judgment motions, much attention has been given to the use of the word impossible. Steelvest did not repeal CR 56. See CR 56.03 (summary judgment shall be granted if there is no genuine issue as to any material fact). It merely stated forcefully that trial judges are to refrain from weighing evidence at the summary judgment stage; that they are to review the record after discovery has been completed to determine whether the trier of fact could find a verdict for the non-moving party. Steelvest at 482-483. The inquiry should be whether, from the evidence of record, facts exist which would make it possible for the non-moving party to prevail. In the analysis, the focus should be on what is of record rather than what might be presented at trial.

Although Welch says the focus is on what is of record at the time of the motion, the determination being made as stated in Queensway and many other cases is whether the party opposing summary judgment can produce any evidence at trial warranting a judgment in his favor. Queensway, p. 150.

Advice for Practitioners. Queensway, and Welch, with its statement that the focus should be on what is of record rather than what might be presented at trial, suggest affidavits opposing summary judgment should be filed and response to a summary judgment motion should reference evidence in the record, not just pleadings, and draw inferences from such evidence to put facts at issue.

Arguments can be styled in favor or opposing summary judgment by emphasizing certain cases as illustrated below.

When seeking summary judgment, meet your initial burden to establish the non-existence of material issue of fact and determine whether the opposing party has put facts at issue merely by unverified allegations. Rule 56 is designed to resolve matters where a purported issue of fact is not genuine. If opposing party speculates about what could be proven at trial, cite Welch that the focus should be on evidence in the record.

When opposing summary judgment, note that summary judgment circumvents trial. Steelvest at p. 482 notes that [r]uling on summary judgment is more delicate matter than ruling on directed verdict, and requires greater judicial determination and discretion. Per Welch, it is not proper to weigh evidence at the summary judgment stage. City of Florence, at p. 390, states:

All doubts are to be resolved in favor of the party opposing the motion. The movant should not succeed unless a right to judgment is shown with such clarity that there is no room left for controversy, and it is established that the adverse party cannot prevail under any circumstances.

For more information about motions for summary judgment, see Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book § 30.12 Motion for Summary Judgment; Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 51.04 Motion for Summary Judgment (Defendant).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mike Wilson, J.D., University of Kentucky, has been a practicing attorney since 1980. He is a contributor to Caldwell's Kentucky Legal Forms, 5th Ed, LexisNexis, 2006, teaches law to paralegals at Sullivan University, Lexington, Kentucky, and has prepared instructional material for numerous continuing legal education seminars for paralegals. He also is an administrative law judge for the Kentucky Department of Education.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

143 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mike Wilson on Bissell v. Baumgardner, 236 S.W.3d 24 (Ky. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 2231

Mike Wilson on Bissell v. Baumgardner, 236 S.W.3d 24 (Ky. 2007)

By Michael Wilson

April 25, 2008

SUMMARY: What must be shown to require recusal of a judge for bias or the appearance of bias? A lot, according to the Court of Appeals of Kentucky in Bissell v. Baumgardner, 236 S.W.3d 24 (Ky. 2007), which reaffirms Stopher v. Commonwealth, 57 SW3d 787 (Ky. 2001) and states that the burden of proof required is onerous and there must be a showing of facts of a character calculated seriously to impair the judge's impartiality and sway his judgment.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Wilson, Mike. Bissell v. Baumgardner. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Onerous Burden Must Be Met to Require Recusal

In Bissell v. Baumgardner, a case involving a Domestic Violence Order (DVO) proceeding, Baumgardner appeared, accompanied by her stepfather, former Fayette Circuit Judge Charles Tackett. The presiding judge stated on the record that she knew and respected Judge Tackett. Based on this information, Bissell asked the presiding judge to recuse herself, which the presiding judge agreed to do, and requested appointment of a special judge. When Judge Philpot was appointed as the special judge, Bissell filed a new motion to recuse Philpot, arguing that (1) the matter should be assigned to a judge from outside Fayette County, (2) that Judge Philpot had once been a law partner with a close friend of Judge Tackett; and (3) that Judge Tackett had contributed to Judge Philpot's judicial campaign.

Bissell asserted that this prior relationship created an appearance of partiality requiring Judge Philpot to recuse himself. Judge Philpot denied the motion to recuse, explaining that he had never had any relationship with Judge Tackett outside of court, and that he had no knowledge as to whether Judge Tackett had contributed to his campaign. Judge Philpot decline to recuse, holding that Bissell failed to make any showing that Judge Philpot's impartiality might reasonably be questioned.

Statutory Standards for Recusal. KRS 26A.015 sets forth the standards for disqualification of judges. Certain specified relationships, conflicts, and prior associations set forth in KRS 26A.015(2)(b) through (d) are grounds for disqualification. KRS 26A.015(2)(a) requires disqualification for actual bias and KRS 26A.015(2)(e) for other circumstances in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. It is KRS 26A.015(2)(e) that Bissell argued required recusal in this case.

Stopher v. Commonwealth, 57 S.W.3d 787, 794 (Ky. 2001), cited by Bissell, holds that the burden of proof required for recusal is onerous and there must be a showing of facts of a character calculated seriously to impair the judge's impartiality and sway his judgment. Stopher in turn, is quoting Foster v. Commonwealth, 348 SW2d 759 (Ky. 1961).

Circumstances that Are NOT Sufficient to Show Bias. [T]he mere belief that the judge will not afford a fair and impartial trial is not sufficient grounds for recusal. Bissell, p. 29. A judge is not required to disqualify himself or herself based solely on an allegation that a litigant or counsel for a litigant has made a legal campaign contribution to the political campaign of the trial judge. Bissell, at p. 29, citing Dean v. Bondurant, 193 S.W.3d 744, 748 (Ky. 2006). Bissell also held that the fact that one of the parties was related to a retired Fayette County judge did not disqualify all Fayette County judges from hearing the case.

Affidavits alleging a judge had presided in other litigation between parties in which the movants were unsuccessful were not enough to establish bias requiring recusal. Johnson v. Ducobu, 258 SW2d 509 (Ky. 1953). Generally, political alignment is not deemed sufficient ground for disqualification of a judge. Howerton v. Price, 449 SW2d 775 (Ky 1970).

Circumstances that Are Sufficient to Show Bias. Overt bias or stated predisposition to rule a certain way may be grounds for recusal. Where a judge repeated several times, in open court, that under no circumstances would he suspend or probate the sentence of anyone convicted of armed robbery, regardless of the facts, Wyatt v. Ropke, 407 SW2d 410 (Ky. 1966) held that the judge should have recused himself. Similarly, where a judge advised that he could not impose the death penalty if recommended by the jury, Tamme v. Commonwealth 973 SW2d 13 (Ky. 1998) held that the judge should have recused himself.

In Sommers v. Commonwealth, 843 SW2d 879 (Ky. 1992), it was found to be an error not to recuse where a judge made public comments to a newspaper possibly indicating a presumption that a defendant being tried was guilty. In this case, the newspaper alleged that this judge had granted guardianship of two girls, later victims of homicide, to the custody of the defendant charged with murdering them. The judges statements that, in hindsight, he would not have granted guardianship, it was argued, assumed that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged and responsible for the embarrassing publicity to which the judge had been subjected.

Implications for Practitioners. If one of the prohibited relationships, conflicts or associations set forth in KRS 26A.015(2)(b) through (d) is not present, it will be difficult to force recusal absent proof that the judge has said something that indicates an intent not to be impartial or that the judge has formed assumptions regarding the merits of the case prior to hearing the evidence. Prior rulings against a particular party, political relationships, and the like, are unlikely to be sufficient to require recusal. Some examples follow:

Recusal is sought on grounds that opposing counsel or opposing party donated money to a judges political campaign. This will not require recusal under Bissell.

Judge and opposing counsel or the opposing party socialize frequently. It is unlike that this alone will constitute facts of a character calculated seriously to impair the judge's impartiality and sway [the judges] judgment. Bissell, p. 29.

An indigent defendant requests appointment of counsel and the judge says, you can have an attorney, but it wont keep you from going to jail. Here, the judge has made a statement indicating he or she will not impartially judge the case and recusal would be required.

For additional discussion of recusal, see generally Moore's Federal Practice, Ch. 63 Judge's Inability to Proceed.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mike Wilson, J.D., University of Kentucky, has been a practicing attorney since 1980. He is a contributor to Caldwell's Kentucky Legal Forms, 5th Ed, Lexis-Nexis, 2006, teaches law to paralegals at Sullivan University, Lexington, Kentucky, and has prepared instructional material for numerous continuing legal education seminars for paralegals. He also is an administrative law judge for the Kentucky Department of Education.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

144 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joe McDonnell on Williams v. Manchester, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 306 (April 3, 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2230

Joe McDonnell on Williams v. Manchester, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 306 (April 3, 2008)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

April 25, 2008

SUMMARY: In a return to basics, the Illinois Supreme Court in Williams v. Manchester examined the requirements of the Illinois Wrongful Death Act and reiterated the need to show an injury to the decedent as a prerequisite to obtaining damages under the Act. This commentary, written by Joe McDonnell, examines the implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Need to Showing Injury Under Illinois Wrongful Death Act

In Williams v. Manchester, the Illinois Supreme Court examined the Illinois Wrongful Death Act and focused on the necessity of demonstrating an injury as the basis for a suit under the Act -- a fundamental prerequisite that had escaped the attention of the appellate court, notwithstanding a dissent in that court which pointed it out. Williams v. Manchester, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 306 at *16-17.

Background of The Illinois Wrongful Death Act. The Illinois Wrongful Death Act (740 ILCS 180/1 et seq.) creates a cause of action in favor of the estate of a deceased person if the death resulted from the wrongful act, neglect or default of another and would have entitled the deceased person, had he or she lived, to maintain an action against the wrongdoer. The cause of action is for the benefit of the surviving spouse and next of kin of the decedent. 740 ILCS 180/2.

There was no cause of action at common law for the death of an individual. A suit for personal injuries abated at the death of the injured party. In 1846, the British Parliament enacted a statute which changed the common-law rule. Known as Lord Campbells Act, the law created an action for damages whenever the death was caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of another. The English statute became the model for similar legislation enacted in America beginning in the mid-19th century. Illinois enacted its statute (originally called the Injuries Act) in 1853. Ill. Ann. Stat., ch. 70, para. 1. The statute created a cause of action in the estate of a deceased person for pecuniary injuries suffered by the decedents next of kin where the death was caused by a tortious act.

The Act As Applied to Williams. In October 2000, Michelle Williams, ten and one-half weeks pregnant, was injured when the automobile in which she was a passenger was struck by another vehicle. Her injuries included a broken hip and pelvis. While the fetus in her womb was unharmed, fears were expressed by her doctors that x-rays done at the emergency room could cause disabilities in the unborn child, including mental problems. After consultation with a high-risk specialist in obstetrics, plaintiff decided to terminate the pregnancy.

Plaintiffs later suit for injuries sustained in the automobile accident included a count under the Wrongful Death Act for damages to herself and the baby's father as next of kin, arising out of the death of the unborn child. The trial judge entered summary judgment in defendants favor on the wrongful death claim, pointing out that, subsequent to the car accident, the fetus was uninjured and viable; and that, rather than continuing with the pregnancy and waiting until later to address her own injuries, plaintiff chose to receive medical treatment for her own injuries, at the expense of her unborn child. The trial court concluded that it was plaintiffs termination of the pregnancy that was the actual cause of the child's death and that defendants alleged negligence did not cause any injury to, much less the death of, the child, as required by the Wrongful Death Act.

Plaintiff appealed and the Appellate Court, First District, reversed, holding that a question of proximate cause, i.e., the foreseeability of the choice to terminate the pregnancy, was a triable issue for the jury to determine. The Supreme Court, after allowing defendants petition for leave to appeal, vacated the appellate court's decision and affirmed the judgment of the circuit court.

Fetus Is a Person Under the Act. Both the appellate court and the Supreme Court assumed, for purposes of their respective analyses, that the child Baby Doe, of a gestational age less than three months at the time of the accident, was a person within the meaning of the Wrongful Death Act.

Earlier cases had held that viability of a fetus is critical to the determination of whether he or she is a "person" within the meaning of the Wrongful Death Act and that no cause of action existed for injuries to, or death of, an unborn infant plaintiff unless, at the time of the occurrence, it had attained viability. See Green v. Smith, 1978, 17 Ill.Dec. 847, 71 Ill.2d 501, 377 N.E.2d 37 and Chrisafogeorgis v. Brandenburg, 1973, 55 Ill.2d 368, 304 N.E.2d 88.

By a 1980 amendment to the statute, the legislature determined that viability was unnecessary: [T]he state of gestation or development of a human being when an injury is caused, when an injury takes effect, or at death, shall not foreclose maintenance of any cause of action under the law of this State arising from the death of a human being caused by wrongful act, neglect or default. 740 ILCS 180/2.2. On the basis of that amendment, the Illinois Supreme Court has held that the parents of a stillborn child may maintain a cause of action to recover damages for loss of a child's society, as an unborn fetus is recognized as a "person" under the Act. Seef v. Sutkus, 164 Ill.Dec. 594, 145 Ill.2d 336, 583 N.E.2d 510 (1991).

Where Is the Injury? Granting that Baby Doe qualified as a person under the Act, the Supreme Court looked in vain for any evidence in the record demonstrating that the child was injured as a result of the automobile accident. In its analysis, the first district had treated the issue as one of proximate cause, and had engaged in a discussion of the concept of foreseeability in connection with the mother's dilemma in determining whether to proceed with medical treatment of her injuries which might prove harmful to the fetus. But the Supreme Court stated that whether the ultimate decision to abort the child was or was not foreseeable was beside the point. Both the parties and the appellate court had identified the wrong issue. As framed there, the issue was whether Baby Doe's death was foreseeable; the appropriate inquiry, however, was whether there was an injury to the unborn child, as the Act requires.

As a creation of the legislature, the Wrongful Death Act must be interpreted according to its terms. The Act changed the common-law rule that a cause of action for injury did not survive the death of an injured person. No cause of action for wrongful death existed at common law. The Court therefore could not extend the application of the Act beyond its precise terms, and one of those terms requires that the person injured would have been entitled to maintain an action for his injuries had he lived. Williams, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 306 at *24, citing, inter alia, Biddy v. Blue Bird Air Service, 374 Ill. 506 (1940).

The undisputed evidence as shown by the record indicated that the unborn child was not injured as a result of the accident. Therefore, he would not have been entitled to sue the tortfeasor had he lived, and that, in turn, meant there was no cause of action on behalf of the parents for their pecuniary loss under the Wrongful Death Act.

Plaintiff also contended that the increased risk of future injury to the fetus by reason of radiation exposure was a present injury which would have permitted the child (had he been born) to file an action for damages against the tortfeasor. The Court pointed out in response to this argument that increased risk of injury is an element of damages if a defendant's conduct causes injury; it is not in and of itself a present injury. Williams, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 306 at *31-33, distinguishing Dillon v. Evanston Hospital, 199 Ill.2d 483 (2002) (a portion of a catheter inserted in plaintiff's vein broke off and lodged in plaintiff's heart chamber, creating an increased risk of future harm from its presence). Even if it were otherwise, said the Court, there was nothing in the record to support a finding that the fetus suffered any damage up to the time of the death as the appellate court had properly concluded in affirming the trial court's dismissal of the survival action. Absent proof of damages by reason of an injury to the unborn child, there was no basis for either a survival action (for damages up to the time of death) or for a wrongful death claim on behalf of the next of kin, arising from any such injury.

Lessons for Practitioners. Difficult issues concerning proximate cause may sometimes cause lawyers to overlook the more basic elements presented in a particular case. Since the time of Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R. Co., barrels of ink have been spilled in debating whether a given fact pattern satisfies the requirement that an injury be the natural and probable result of the defendant's act or omission. Foreseeability of the injury is an appropriate consideration in that context. See, for example, Ney v. Yellow Cab, 2 Ill.2d 74 (1954); Neering v. Illinois Central R.R. Co., 383 Ill. 366 (1943). As Williams illustrates, however, one must first determine whether there is in fact a demonstrable injury, before considering whether that injury was brought about by the defendant's wrongful conduct. Particularly where a statute removed or modifies a common-law disability, the terms of the statute must be satisfied before an action based on the statute can be pursued.

One further comment seems appropriate: Had the mother decided to continue the pregnancy to term, and the child did indeed exhibit symptoms of prenatal injury following its birth, the inquiry then would be directed toward whether the injuries were the result of the automobile accident (a difficult connection, given the doctors' earlier assurance of no injury) or whether they were, as feared by the doctors, the result of the treatment, including X-Rays, given the mother. In the latter scenario, it would then be appropriate to cast the issue in terms of proximate cause (as the appellate court improperly did in its decision in Williams). Was it reasonably foreseeable that the mother would choose not to terminate the pregnancy, but to undergo treatment for her own injuries even at the risk of injuring her unborn child? Cogent arguments could be made on either side of that issue, plaintiff arguing that a mother can hardly be faulted for choosing the life of her child over abortion, even at risk to the child, and the defense arguing that the conscious and voluntary act of foregoing the legal option of abortion to prevent the prospect of a damaged child was a superseding cause of the injury.

For additional discussion of the Illinois Wrongful Death Act, see Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts, Chapter 18 Wrongful Death.

Illinois Civil Procedure LexisNexis Forms FORM 25.20 Claim for Wrongful Death Damages: Survivors; FORM 25.22 Claim for Additional Wrongful Death Damages: Parent of Minor Decedent.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

145 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McGhee on Winston Products Co., Inc. v. Deboer

2008 Emerging Issues 2219

Kimberly R. McGhee on Winston Products Co., Inc. v. Deboer

By Kimberly R. McGhee

April 24, 2008

SUMMARY: In managing a successful legal practice, every Nevada practitioner must know how to accurately calculate filing deadlines. Analyzing Winston Products Co., Inc. v. Deboer, this Expert Commentary provides the Nevada practitioner with a set of guidelines for computing filing deadlines that maximize the allowable time when service is made through the mail.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: McGhee, Kimberly R. Winston Products Co., Inc. v. Deboer. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Introduction. Every Nevada litigator appreciates the critical need for observance of deadlines in his or her practice. However, at times, the computation of filing deadlines can be a fluid concept. This dichotomy may be caused by ambiguous rules for determining the computation of time to file motions. For instance, pursuant to NRCP 59(b), the time to file a motion for a new trial shall be no later than 10 days after the service of written notice of the entry of the judgment. Rule 59(b) must then be read in conjunction with NRCP 6(a), which provides that [w]hen the period of time prescribed or allowed is less than 11 days, intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days shall be excluded in the computation Additionally, because most motions are served by mail or electronic means, an additional 3 days shall be added to the prescribed period [NRCP 6(e)]. On its face, this computation appears clear: 10 days, plus three, excluding non-judicial days. However, the method a practitioner uses to compute the time or to calendar these dates can lead to dramatically different deadlines.

Many practitioners read these rules to mean that there is a 13-day period for filing motions--leading to the inclusion of intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days. Other practitioners read the rules as counting the three-day allowance only after computing the 10-day filing period--which would exclude intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days. Still others add the three-day allowance and then count the 10-day filing period while still excluding the intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days. Each calculation can lead to a different filing deadline. Which is correct?

Nevadas Historical Treatment of NRCP 6. In Ross v. Giacomo [97 Nev. 550, 635 P.2d 298 (1981)] and Custom Cabinet Factory of New York v. District Court [119 Nev. 51, 62 P.3d 741 (2003)], the Nevada Supreme Court

considered the issue of time computation when service is made by mail. In Ross, the Nevada Supreme Court held that in calculating the time for filing a motion, the additional three days allowed for mailing should be added directly to the 10-day period, for a total of a 13-day filing period [Ross, 97 Nev. at 553 nn. 1 & 2]. In Custom Cabinet, the Nevada Supreme Court affirmed the Ross computation, reasoning that an alternative computation would result in additional time--five to seven days--to file motions which was complicated and absurd [Winston Products Co., Inc. v. Deboer, 122 Nev. 517, ___, 134 P.3d 726, 729 (2006) (quoting Custom Cabinet Factory of New York, 119 Nev. at 5455)]. The Court found that adding the three days to the time computation was a simpler and speedier computation scheme [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 729].

However, subsequent to the Courts decisions, in 2004 the Court amended NRCP 6 to be consistent with the federal rules [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 729]. The amendment provided for the exclusion of intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days when the period of time for filing is less than 11 days--as opposed to the previous seven-day rule [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 729]. When interpreting the NRCP 6(e) three-day mailing allowance, the Nevada Supreme Court considered several federal court decisions that found that the period of time prescribed does not include the additional three days for mailing [Winston Products Co., Inc., 134 P.3d at 729]. For instance, in Nalty v. Nalty Tree Farm [654 F. Supp. 1315 (S.D. Ala. 1987)], the court recognized that the intent of the 1985 amendment to Fed. R. Civ. P. 6 was to extend the response time when a 10-day limit was prescribed [Nalty, 654 F. Supp. at 1317]. The Nalty court reasoned that to hold otherwise would result in the allowance for the same amount of time to file the motion or response [Nalty, 654 F. Supp. at 1317]. Therefore, the appropriate computation should add the three-day allowance for mailing only after computing the time period under Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a) [Nalty, 654 F. Supp. at 1317]. n1

Nevadas Current Interpretation of NRCP 6. Because the Ross and Custom Cabinet decisions did not involve time computation when intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial should be excluded, the Nevada Supreme Court revisited the issue in order to reconcile the calculations with the intent--to provide additional time when service is made by mail--behind Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(e). In Winston Products Co., Inc. v. Doboer [122 Nev. 517, 134 P.3d 726 (2006)], the Nevada Supreme Court addressed the issue of computing the deadline for a filing when the prescribed period is less than 11 judicial days and when service was made by mail or electronic means. The Nevada Supreme Court was concerned that with the inclusion of the 2004 amendment, computing time under the Ross and Custom Cabinet holdings resulted in more time to act for a party who is served in person than a party who is served by mail [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 730].

For example, pursuant to NRCP 59(b), a party has 10 days to file a motion for a new trial after service of written notice of the entry of the judgment. If the notice of entry was personally served, the party would have 14 calendar days to file the motion [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 730]. However, under the Ross and Custom Cabinet decisions, if the notice of entry was served by mail, the party would only have 13 days to file the motion. This result is contrary to the purpose of Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a) [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 730]. Therefore, in Winston Products, the Nevada Supreme Court reversed its decisions in Ross and Custom Cabinet to the extent that they require filing periods to be computed by adding the three-day allowance for mail before applying the computation under NRCP 6(a) [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 731]. The appropriate time computation for filing deadlines under 10 days is to first calculate the time period under NRCP 6(a), excluding intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days, and then to add the three-day allowance for mailing, if applicable [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 731].

Practical Application of NRCP 6. An example of how the Winston Products decision applies to NRCP 6 can be seen when calculating the time period to file motions for judgment as a matter of law and for a new trial [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 731]. Supposing the notice of entry of judgment in the matter was served by mail on April 21, 2005, the deadline to file the motions would be computed as follows: compute the 10-day time period from April 21, 2005, excluding intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days, which results in May 5, 2005 [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 731]. The party should then add the three-day allowance for service by mail, which extends the final deadline to May 9, 2005 [Winston Products, 134 P.3d at 731]. Practitioners should also note that the order in which this calculation is made is also important. In the event the practitioner adds the three days for mail service before calculating the 10-day period, excluding intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and non-judicial days, the deadline would be May 6, 2005, not May 9, 2005.

In Winston Products, the Nevada Supreme Court provides the practitioner with the clearest method with which to calculate filing deadlines in order to comport with the intent of the rules--to maximize response times.

For additional information on computation of time in Nevada, see Nevada Civil Practice Manual, Ch. 9, Service, § 9.20 (Matthew Bender).

Return to Text

n1 . For additional case law, see Lerro v. Quaker Oats Co. [84 F.3d 239, 242 (7th Cir. 1996) (holding that prescribed time to file objection to magistrate judges report was not sum of all allowable periods)] and Tushner v. U. S. Dist. Court for Cent. Dist. of Cal. [829 F.2d 853 (9th Cir. 1987) (holding that three-day allowance for mailing was not added to 10-day period prescribed for filing jury demand)].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kimberly R. McGhee is an associate with Bailey Kennedy in Las Vegas, Nevada. Ms. McGhee attended California Western School of Law, receiving her J.D. magna cum laude 2005. Ms. McGhee did her undergraduate work at the University of California, San Diego and received a B.A. in Economics. Before joining Bailey Kennedy in 2006, Ms. McGhee served as a judicial extern to the Honorable Barbara Lynn Major of the United States District Court for the Southern District of California and was an associate at Nevadas largest law firm from 2005 to 2006.

Ms. McGhees practice focuses on civil litigation, including domestic and international contract disputes, product liability, complex commercial litigation, and real estate. Bailey Kennedy represents, among others, healthcare facilities, publicly traded corporations, gaming companies, financial institutions, travel and tourism leaders, public entities, real estate developers, sports and entertainment concerns, and entrepreneurs.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

146 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Washko on Retention of Employment Records in the Age of Electronic Discovery

2008 Emerging Issues 2206

Washko on Retention of Employment Records in the Age of Electronic Discovery

By Elizabeth Washko

April 24, 2008

SUMMARY: Employers in the United States are required, by statute, regulation and case law, to retain various types of employment records for varying periods of time. Compliance with the existing laws requires 3 steps: 1) creation and implementation of a sound data retention program that addresses electronic data issues; (2) creation and implementation of an effective litigation hold procedure; and 3) training employees.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Employers in the United States are required, by statute, regulation and case law, to retain various types of employment records for varying periods of time. With companies increasing use of and dependence on computerized and electronic communications, data creation and data maintenance, the burden on employers to retain the required employment records has increased substantially. Ever improving technology creates new forms of communication in text and digital formats as well as new, often mobile, storage platforms. At the same time, technology improvements continue to simplify the process of creating recorded information, resulting in its proliferation at exponentially escalating rates. To further complicate matters, our litigious society has turned its attention to accusations of spoliation as alternative methods of securing recoveries.

There are no special rules applicable to the retention of electronic data for discovery purposes. However, recent litigation and amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have brought electronic discovery to the forefront, making it even more important to clearly understand the existing rules regarding document retention and how to apply them to electronic data.

To ensure compliance with the existing laws and regulations, best practice requires three key steps: (1) creation and implementation of a sound data retention program, that addresses electronic data issues; (2) creation and implementation of an effective litigation hold procedure; and (3) training employees on these policies and procedures. In order to understand why compliance is so important, it is helpful to understand the potential consequences of failing to comply. This information should also be utilized in training employees so they understand the importance of their data retention obligations.

I. Potential Consequences of Failing to Retain the Right Data -- The Growing Threat and Potential Consequences of Spoliation Claims

Anyone who has an obligation to retain and produce data or other evidence, for that matter) and fails to do so -- by withholding it, losing it or destroying it, may be subject to a claim for spoliation. While spoliation may be found to have occurred even in the absence of any wrongdoing, the consequences of spoliation are generally determined based on a combination of two factors: fault and prejudice to the non-producing party.

Prejudice is shown when it is proven that the withheld evidence was relevant. Absent such proof, even deliberate destruction of recorded information may not be sanctionable. Gates Rubber Co. v. Bando Chemical Industries, Ltd., 167 F.R.D. 90 (D. Colo. 1996) (declining to create a strict liability discovery offense and requiring establishment of some minimal relevance of any discarded or destroyed materials to the circumstances of the litigation).

Fault is more difficult to define. As one court said:

We have recognized that spoliation of evidence occurs along a continuum of fault, from innocence through the varying degrees of negligence to intentional destruction. Likewise, a host of penalties may accompany the types of behavior manifested through this continuum.

Welsh v. United States, 844 F.2d 1239, 1245-1247 (6th Cir. 1988).

On the lower end of the spectrum, the consequences of proven spoliation are ordinarily additional discovery (e.g., an opportunity to inspect a computer system or re-depose a witness after previously withheld documents are belatedly produced). More serious sanctions may include awards of attorneys fees and costs associated with the protraction of discovery (e.g., if repeated trips to the court were needed in order to ultimately obtain certain evidence) or fines. Monetary sanctions may range from tens of thousands of dollars to millions. See, e.g., Phoenix Four, Inc. v. Strategic Resources Corp., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52402 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ($30,000 sanction plus costs relating to the motion for sanctions for failure to timely locate legacy servers); MOSAID Techs. Inc. v. Samsung Elecs. Co., 224 F.R.D. 595 (D.N.J. 2004) (more than $500,000 in fines and costs for failure to preserve e-mails); Qualcomm Incorporated v. Broadcom Corporation, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 911 (S.D. Cal. 2008) (more than $8.5 million in fees for failure to timely search for and produce 46,000 relevant e-mails).

The worst civil sanctions involve either adverse inference instructions to the jury (i.e., that certain information under the control of a party was not produced, and that the jury should assume the information would have been detrimental to that party), Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 229 F.R.D. 422 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (failure to preserve all relevant e-mail); Broccoli v. Echostar Communications Corp., 229 F.R.D. 506 (D. Md. 2005) (failure to preserve any relevant e-mail or other records relating to an employee termination), or outright default judgment, Coleman Holdings, Inc. v. Morgan Stanley & Co., Inc. Case No. 4D04-135 (Fla. Cir. Ct. 2005), reversed on other grounds 955 So.2d 1124 (Fla. 4th DCA 2007) (substantial delay and repeated misrepresentations to the court concerning the existence of back-up tapes containing relevant evidence); Communications Center, Inc. v. Hewitt, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10891 (E.D. Cal. 2005) (use of Evidence Eliminator to wipe computer hard drives alleged to contain relevant evidence) or dismissal. Leon v. IDX Sys. Corp., 464 F.3d 12951 (9th Cir. 2006) (deliberate destruction of evidence). The outcome in many adverse inference cases suggests the sanction may be as effective as a default judgment. For example, in Zubulake, the jury awarded the plaintiff more than $21 million dollars after receiving the instruction.

Many of the recent cases (several cited above) have focused on the issue of spoliation in the context of electronic data. Electronic data is easy to create, easy to inadvertently destroy (in some respects) and easy to forget about when an employer begins the process of collecting documents and evidence in connection with defending against a claim or lawsuit. This makes a sound data retention program more important today than it has ever been.

II. Creating and Implementing an Effective Data Retention Program

An effective data retention program has several components. First, it identifies those categories of documents and other data that need to be retained and the period of time for which they must be retained. Second, an effective data retention program provides for the regular destruction of categories of documents and data that do not need to be retained at all or that no longer need to be retained because the required timeframe has passed. Finally, the program must provide a mechanism to ensure that documents subject to a litigation hold (to be discussed in the next section) are retained until the litigation hold period has passed. It is this last component which is often critical in warding off sanctions for spoliation. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg, LLC, 229 F.R.D. 422 (S.D.N.Y. 2004); Broccoli v. Echostar Communications, Inc., 229 F.R.D. 506 (D. Md. 2005); Tantivy Communications, Inc. v. Lucent Technologies, Inc., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29981 (E.D. Tex. 2005).

It is important to note that a data retention program successfully fulfills its litigation role only if (1) it includes provisions for suspending the expiration of retention periods and obligations to discard transient materials; (2) it is adopted for reasons of record management, not to avoid discovery obligations; and (3) it is regularly enforced, not just when it is convenient in order to eliminate troublesome information. The absence of any one of these conditions can turn the program into evidence of spoliation. See, e.g., Rambus, Inc. v. Infineon Technologies AG, 220 F.R.D. 264 (E.D. Va. 2004) (adopting program and purposefully holding a shred day shortly before filing suit on a patent claim was grounds for sanctions); Broccoli v. Echostar Communications Corp., 229 F.R.D. 506 (D. Md. 2005) (failure to suspend record destruction when claim should have been anticipated was grounds for sanctions); Arthur Anderson, Inc. v. United States, 544 U.S. 696 (2005) (sudden, selective compliance with a record retention program was basis for prosecution).

In developing the record retention program, the employer should make sure that, in addition to legal and human resources professionals, the company's relevant IT professionals are consulted. The IT professionals can provide invaluable assistance in properly identifying and defining the electronic data that should be covered by the program, designing systems to assist with proper retention and timely destruction, and implementing the litigation hold elements of the program.

A. Identifying Data to be Retained. An effective data retention program should typically identify those categories of employment records that need to be retained, how they should be retained and stored and how long after their creation they need to be retained and stored. A checklist identifying employment records that must be retained and the periods of time for which they must be retained is provided at the end of this Commentary.

This requirement has become trickier with the development of the many ways in which employees are required and encouraged to utilize electronic and portable data systems in their work and communications. In developing data retention programs, the employer should make clear that the program does not apply only to paper documents, but also applies to electronic data as well. For example, under Title VII, an employer is required to maintain, for a one year period (absent the filing of a claim or litigation) any document that qualifies as an employment or personnel record. In the context of disciplinary action against an employee accused of sexual harassment, such documents may include the complainant's statement, investigation notes and other witness statements, a report on the complaint and investigation and, of course, the disciplinary write-up. However, the employer may also be required to retain emails exchanged between the complainant, the investigator, the supervisor and/or the accused relating to the allegations, investigation and discipline. Care must be taken to ensure that those responsible for retaining records understand the need to collect (if necessary) and retain email exchanges and other electronic data relevant to the employment action at issue.

B. Destroying Unnecessary Data. An employer that destroys documents and data that it was not otherwise required to keep (because no law required they be kept or the timeframe for retention had expired) in accordance with a comprehensive retention/destruction program cannot be faulted for any such destruction that occurs prior to receipt of notice of a potential claim. OBrien v. Ed Donnelly Enterprises, Inc., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66633 (S.D. Ohio 2006) (rejecting spoliation claim based on overwriting of electronic data in accordance with established procedures); Molins PLC v. Textron, Inc., 48 F.3d 1172 (Fed. Cir. 1995) (companies are entitled to maintain file destruction programs without being found to have improperly destroyed evidence). In addition, to the extent that a jurisdiction requires bad faith in order to warrant severe sanctions for spoliation, a data retention program may serve as a defense even if the destruction occurs after notice of a claim. See, e.g., Tulip Computers International B.V. v. Dell Computer Corp., 63

U.S.P.Q.2d (BNA) 1527, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7792 (D. Del 2002) (refusing severe sanctions for spoliation resulting from the operation of Dells record retention policy even though Dell had an obligation to preserve at the time). Additionally, regularly and systematically discarding recorded information that is otherwise of no continued use to the company, reduces its store of data -- there is less to search and review and litigation costs are reduced.

C. Mechanism to Retain Data for Litigation. As discussed in the next section, the data retention program needs to include a mechanism for putting a hold on any destruction components of the plan (including automatic destruction like electronic data overwrites) when the employer receives notice of a potential claim. Those responsible for implementing and enforcing the program must be particularly attuned to potential issues with the destruction of electronic data. It is easy enough for a supervisor to pull a paper file and set it aside with a do not destroy note placed on it. It is another task, however, for that supervisor to engage in the necessary work to review electronic files, including emails, to identify additional data that must be retained that might otherwise be destroyed by an automated program or through an inadvertent manual destruction, and make sure that data is properly protected.

III. Litigation Holds

Apart from the legislative and regulatory requirements to retain certain types of records (and other evidence), an employer has an additional obligation to retain any and all records that may be relevant to a claim that has been threatened or filed against the company. One of the most effective ways of dealing with this obligation is through the use of a notice, often called a litigation hold that is sent to those who may have possession or control of records that may be relevant to the claim.

As set forth above, a litigation hold process should be part of the overall data retention program and should define the circumstances when litigation holds apply, set forth basic rules on what is expected of employees when a hold is in place, and provide guidance to help employees successfully meet those expectations. In addition, it is recommended that the employer identify an individual or team to be responsible for implementing the litigation hold policy and, further, anytime a litigation hold notice is issued, identify one individual (whether the person in charge of the program or a delegate) to be responsible for that particular litigation hold process (Litigation Hold Coordinator).

A. Potential Triggers. A litigation hold ordinarily applies when there is notice of litigation, government investigation, or a subpoena or similar information request. However, it may also apply when a claim, lawsuit, or investigation is reasonably anticipated. Reasonable anticipation is deemed to exist whenever an administrative claim is filed, and might likely be based on receipt of a demand letter. It may also be based on receipt of internal complaints, even of an informal nature. In Zubulake v. UBS Warburg, LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 217-218 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), the court held that the duty to preserve evidence would arise prior to the filing of an EEOC charge if there were a uniform belief by key players that litigation would ensue.

However, it should be noted that whether litigation or other circumstances requiring evidence should have been reasonably anticipated is always decided by a court or other tribunal with the benefit of hindsight, and the decision is often colored by the extent of missing evidence. For example, in Broccoli v. Echostar Communications Corp., 229 F.R.D. 506, 511 (D. Md. 2005) where essentially all evidence had been destroyed, the court concluded that litigation should have been anticipated at the time of an initial informal complaint of mistreatment to the plaintiffs immediate supervisors without regard to whether those supervisors formed a belief as to the likelihood of litigation.

B. Who Should Receive Notice. Who should receive notice of the litigation hold needs to be determined on a case-by-case basis. Essentially, it should be provided to any employee who the company reasonably believes may have possession of or may come into possession of potentially relevant data. For example, in a case where an individual was terminated for violating company policy and claims the termination was based on sex discrimination, the company should identify those individuals who may have records relevant to the individuals employment and termination. That would likely include the individuals direct supervisor and anyone directly involved in the termination decision. However, it may also include others within the individuals chain of command (the supervisors supervisor, for example), human resources personnel, and, perhaps coworkers who may have exchanged relevant emails with the individual.

The company's IT Department should also be notified anytime a litigation hold notice is going to issue and should be told who is going to be receiving the notice. This will enable the IT professionals to take any necessary steps to halt automated electronic data destruction systems (i.e. overwrites or programs that delete all emails after a certain period of time has passed). In addition, it will enable the IT Department to analyze and determine whether it needs to take steps to ensure preservation of data on particular computers and/or to provide assistance to notice recipients in doing so.

C. What Should Be Retained. Again, the specifics of what needs to be retained must be determined on a case-by-case basis. Certainly, those receiving notice should be advised of the general categories of documents that need to be retained personnel files, email communications, time records. In addition, to the extent the employer is aware of the existence of specifically relevant documents for example, in a termination case, all documents prepared in connection with the investigation that led to the termination -- these should be identified as well.

In a case where an individual claims they were treated differently than another employee, the employer may be under an obligation to retain records relating to the other potential comparators. For example, if a claimant contends he was denied a promotion based on his race, the employer should identify the promotions at issue (if possible from the claim or complaint), identify those who were considered for the promotion and received it, and make sure that the relevant employment documents for those individuals are also retained as they are likely to be considered relevant during the course of any investigation or litigation.

D. Notice Requirements. There is no magic language required of a litigation hold notice. However, the typical notice should include:

1. The identity of the person or persons who are the subject of the hold (i.e. the claimant(s));
2. The fact that a claim has been made or is anticipated;
3. The company is mandating that those receiving notice take immediate steps to preserve, retain and maintain (or perhaps turnover to HR or Legal) the identified documents;
4. An identification of the categories of documents to be retained and any relevant specifics;
5. An identification of the relevant timeframe (i.e., January 1, 2005 to December 31, 2006);
6. Any specific instructions, including steps that need to be taken to preserve electronic data or other special procedures the company wants to use to ensure documents are retained; and
7. The name and contact number of the Litigation Hold Coordinator who they may contact with any questions or concerns.

Other items that may be included in the litigation hold notice are: (a) a request that the recipient notify the Litigation Hold Coordinator of any special circumstance that exists or is reasonably anticipated; (b) guidance regarding where to search for potentially relevant data; (c) the potential need to disseminate the notice to subordinate employees; and (d) a request that the recipient identify additional personnel with relevant information.

A word of caution: if the claimant is still employed by the company, the litigation hold notice must take into account the continuing obligation to preserve documents as they continue to be created emails, performance evaluations, etc. In addition, a best practice in preparing a litigation hold notice involving a current employee, would be to include a no retaliation provision. n1

Many companies incorporate an acknowledgment of receipt and/or compliance as an aspect of the litigation hold process. Such an acknowledgment enhances the ability to track compliance, may serve to further impress on the employee the need for compliance by creating individual accountability, and may serve as evidence of the company's good faith efforts to preserve potentially relevant evidence.

E. Follow-Up. The litigation hold process must provide for regular reminders to employees who hold data subject to a hold, and other activities to ensure that potentially relevant evidence is preserved and is continuing to be preserved. IT must audit systems under its control to ensure that auto delete functions have been deactivated as needed, or that alternative measures have successfully been implemented to avoid the destruction of potentially relevant evidence in those cases where the automatic roll-off of information cannot be suspended. It may be advisable to initiate e-mail journaling for select custodians, or to segregate select custodians to specific servers whose back-up tapes are then preserved.

IV. Training

It is recommended that employees who have responsibilities that involve creating, handling or maintaining recorded data of any kind receive some training on the company's data retention program. Certainly, all such employees should receive a copy of the policy or a concise but substantive summary of the policy with a signed acknowledgment of their receipt. However, in order to make sure that these employees understand the importance of complying with their respective retention and destruction obligations, it is advisable to provide an orientation or training class on the elements of the program and the employee's role in ensuring compliance. The better the employees understand their retention obligations, the more likely they are to properly fulfill those obligations and, thus, protect the company. Such training may have an added benefit of serving as further evidence of the company's good faith efforts to ensure compliance, in the event a mistake is made in the preservation process.

V. Conclusion

Effective implementation of a comprehensive data retention program is an integral component of successful business operations in today's legal and business environments. Although development of such a program may require a substantial investment of time, effort and other resources, the investment ultimately pays off.

Federal Document Retention Requirements

STATUTE

RECORDS TO BE RETAINED

LENGTH OF RETENTION

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; Americans with Disabilities Act Any personnel or employment record made or kept by an employer (including but not necessarily limited to requests for reasonable accommodation, application forms submitted by applicants and other records having to do with hiring, evaluations, promotion, demotion, transfer, lay-off, discipline or termination, rates of pay or other terms of compensation, and selection for training or apprenticeship)

Records relevant to any charge of discrimination or court proceedings related to charge of discrimination

1 year from date record is made or personnel action taken, whichever is later

Final disposition of charge or proceeding

Age Discrimination in Employment Act

Name; address; date of birth; occupation; rate of pay; and compensation

Job applications; job advertisements or postings; job orders submitted to employment agencies or unions; resumes; replies to job advertisements; personnel actions (promotions, transfers, training ,layoffs, recalls, discharges); aptitude test results; physical exam test results

Employee benefit plans; seniority system plans; merit systems

Records relating to any charge of discrimination or court proceedings related to charge of discrimination

3 years

1 year

1 year after plan termination

Final disposition of charge or proceeding

Fair Labor Standards Act

Employee's full name and on the same record, the employee's identifying symbol or number if such is used in place of name on any time, work, or payroll records; address, including zip code; birth date, if younger than 19; sex and occupation; time and day of week when employee's workweek begins; hours worked each day and total hours worked each workweek; basis on which employee's wages are paid; regular hourly pay rate; total daily or weekly straight-time earnings; total overtime earnings for the workweek; all additions to or deductions from the employee's wages; total wages paid each pay period; date of payment and the pay period covered by the payment.

For non-exempt employees, must also keep records showing the basis on which wages are paid in sufficient detail to permit calculation for each pay period of the employee's total remuneration for employment including fringe benefits and prerequisites

Supplementary records, including employment and earnings records; wage rate tables; work schedules; additions or deductions from wages; shipping and billing records; changes in compensation rates

3 years

3 years

2 years

Family and Medical Leave Act

Same as FLSA, but also dates FMLA leave is taken; hours of leave if incremental leave is taken; copies of employee notices of leave furnished to the employer and copies of all general and specific written notices given to employees; any documents describing employee benefits or employer policies and practices regarding the taking of paid and unpaid leaves; premium payments of employee benefits; and records of any dispute between the employer and an employee regarding designation of leave as FMLA leave

3 years

Equal Pay Act

Any records an employer makes relating to the payment of wages, evaluations, job wage rates, job descriptions, merit systems, seniority agreements, or other collective bargaining matters which explain the basis for payment of a wage differential to employees of the opposite sex.

All records required to be kept by the FLSA.

2 years

Immigration Reform and Control Act

INS Form I-9

3 years after date of hiring or 1 year after date of termination, whichever is later

Employee Retirement Income Security Act

Benefit plans; summary benefit descriptions; all related benefit documents

Minimum of 6 years following the end of the applicable plan year for which the record applies.

Occupational Safety and Health Act

A log and summary of all recordable occupational injuries and illnesses for each establishment (OSHA Form 200) and a supplementary record (OSCH Form 101).

Employee exposure records on toxic substances and harmful physical agents (including environmental and biological monitoring information and material safety data sheets).

Employee medical records (including medical histories, examinations and test results, medical opinions and diagnoses, description of treatment and prescriptions, and employee complaints).

5 years.

30 years.

Duration of employment, plus 30 years.

Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985

General Notice

Election Notice

Notice of Unavailability

Notice of Termination

COBRA policy

COBRA correspondence with participant, including returned election forms, premium payments, postage marks, etc.

Proof of mailing

Not specified (recommend proof of COBRA notice mailing and COBRA records be maintained for at least 7 years)

from date last effective)

For labor and employment content, see Labor and Employment Area of Law Page.

For further analysis of record keeping of employee information, see Labor & Employment Law, Chapter 271.

For the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure related to electronic discovery, see E-Discovery: The Newly Amended Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

For further analysis of electronically stored information, see Moore's Federal Practice Civil, Chapter 37.

For more resources on electronic discovery, visit <https://www.lexisnexis.com/applieddiscovery/>

Return to Text

n1 . One of the risks of notifying all relevant individuals about the potential claim, charge or litigation is the possibility of retaliation or, more likely, that the employee will perceive any potentially adverse employment action is retaliatory.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Elizabeth Washko is a shareholder with the law firm of Ogletree Deakins, Nash, Smoak & Stewart, P.C. Ms. Washko represents management in a wide variety of employment litigation matters, including discrimination, harassment, retaliation, FMLA, FLSA, wrongful termination, breach of contract, and covenant not to compete cases. Ms. Washko has acted as lead counsel in many jury trials in both state and federal courts. In addition to her litigation experience, Ms. Washko also conducts training on employment issues, drafts and reviews employment policies and agreements, and conducts harassment and other types of investigations for employers. Ms. Washko is a frequent speaker on topics relating to all types of employment issues and works with clients on preventive strategies to avoid discrimination, retaliation and other employment claims.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

147 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Judge David M. Gersten on Progressive Express Ins. Co. v. Menendez

2008 Emerging Issues 2221

Judge David M. Gersten on Progressive Express Ins. Co. v. Menendez

By David M. Gersten

April 24, 2008

SUMMARY: Judge David M. Gersten on the latest development in pre-suit notice requirements under section 627.736, Florida Statutes, and Progressive Express Ins. Co. v. Menendez, No. 3D06-2570 (Fla. 3d DCA March 19, 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Progressive Express Ins. Co. v. Menendez. In 2001, Cathy Menendez suffered injuries in an automobile accident. Menendez had PIP automobile insurance through Progressive. Thereafter, Menendez's attorney sent Progressive a series of letters, requesting supplemental lost income and reimbursement for a workers compensation lien. In response, Progressive sent Menendez two letters, requesting additional documentation. Meanwhile, Menendez sued for overdue PIP benefits. Then, over a year after litigation commenced, Menendez finally sent a demand letter to Progressive.

In a motion for summary judgment, Progressive argued that Menendez failed to comply with the pre-suit notice requirement of section 627.736, Florida Statutes (2001), which was enacted after filing suit. The trial court found that the pre-suit notice requirement did not apply, and that even if it did apply, Progressive effectively denied Menendez's claim.

On appeal, the Third District Court of Appeal determined that the pre-suit notice was procedural in nature. Therefore, applying it did not violate Article I, Section 10 of the Florida Constitution, which prohibits laws impairing existing contracts. Thus, the Third District reasoned, Menendez failed to comply with section 627.736(11), which required that the insured must provide the insurer with written notice of the intent to initiate litigation for overdue benefits.

Ultimately, the court found that in the absence of a dismissal and subsequent refiling of the complaint, the demand letter sent nearly one year after the initiation of the lawsuit has no effect. To rule otherwise would effectively nullify the words of the legislature. . . . Menendez, No. 3D06-2570.

Therefore, the court remanded the cause to the trial court to determine whether Progressive denied Menendez's claim. If Progressive did not deny Menendez's claim, then recovery is barred because Menendez would be in material breach of the insurance contract.

Prospective vs. Retroactive Laws. It is incorrect to assume that all laws operate prospectively. Although Florida follows the general rule that in the absence of a clear legislative expression to the contrary, a law is presumed to apply prospectively, Rothermel v. Fla. Parole & Probation Comm., 441 So. 2d 663, 664 (Fla. 1st DCA 1983), Menendez demonstrates that a law can be applied retroactively to a pending lawsuit.

To determine whether a newly enacted law or amendment applies to a pending case, the court must examine whether it is substantive or procedural in nature. Alamo Rent-A-Car, Inc. v. Mancusi, 632 So. 2d 1352, 1358 (Fla. 1994). Substantive law prescribes the duties and rights under our system of government. Procedural law concerns the means and method to apply and enforce those duties and rights. Benyard v. Wainwright, 322 So. 2d 473, 475 (Fla. 1975).

In general, a substantive law is presumed to operate prospectively, unless legislative intent clearly shows otherwise. State v. Lavazzoli, 434 So. 2d 321, 323 (Fla. 1983). On the other hand, procedural legislation is to apply retroactively. Arrow Air v. Walsh, 645 So. 2d 422, 424 (Fla. 1994). Procedural statutes do not fall within the constitutional prohibition against retroactive legislation. Instead, they may be held immediately applicable to pending cases. Vill. of El Portal v. City of Miami Shores, 362 So. 2d 275, 278 (Fla. 1978).

Remedial legislation is also applied retroactively. Arrow Air, 645 So. 2d at 424. A remedial statute intend[s] to afford [a] private remedy to [a] person injured by [a] wrongful act; it is designed to correct existing law, redress existing grievance, or introduce regulations conducive to [the] public good. Walsh v. Arrow Air, Inc., 629 So. 2d 144, 148 (Fla. 3d DCA 1993). This type of legislation does not create new rights or eliminate any existing rights. City of Lakeland v. Catinella, 129 So. 2d 133, 136 (Fla. 1961).

Practitioner Pointers. In light of Menendez, practitioners must be aware of whether legislation is substantive or procedural in nature. The first step is to research similar laws to determine whether courts have designated the law as substantive or procedural. If the law is substantive in nature, it will not be applied retroactively.

Avoiding the Menendez Trap. In general, since section 627.736(11) is procedural in nature, courts will apply it retroactively to pending suits, regardless of the date of the accident or issuance of the policy. Thus, if the practitioner fails to send a demand letter before initiating suit, the court will dismiss the action. Also, if the court has not dismissed the action and the practitioner has not filed an amended complaint, any subsequent demand letter has no legal effect.

Therefore, before initiating suit, practitioners should research the claim together with current legislation and determine the conditions precedent to filing suit. Further, the practitioner should send a demand letter to the insurer, even if the effective date of the applicable policy or the date of the accident precedes the enactment of the statute. Remember, the complaint must contain an allegation of compliance with all conditions precedent. Failure to do so may lead to a dismissal of the claim.

If suit has already been filed and conditions precedent are not met, the practitioner should immediately make a motion to abate or voluntarily dismiss the claim and re-file after compliance. However, be sure that the limitations period has not run for the condition precedent. If the period has expired, the court will dismiss the claim with prejudice.

Menendez and section 627.736, Florida Statutes, gives defense practitioners grounds for dismissal. Now, this defense is viable regardless of the effective date of the policy and the date of the accident. Therefore, fulfillment of conditions precedent should be the first item on defense practitioners checklist for a dismissal.

As a last note, the Southern District of Florida has held that the pre-suit notice requirement is substantive in nature, and therefore only prospective in application. Shenandoah Chiropractic, P.A. v. Natl Specialty Ins. Co., 526 F.Supp.2d 1283 (S.D. Fla. 2007). Thus, if practicing in federal court, retroactivity does not apply. Regardless, a practitioner should still comply with pre-suit notice requirements, even if the effective date of the insurance policy and date of the accident precede the enactment of the statute.

Conclusion. A practitioner should research current law and determine whether it is procedural or substantive in nature. Compliance with all conditions precedent is essential. The failure to do so can lead to serious consequences for the client and for the practitioner. The clients claim may be dismissed and the practitioner may face a malpractice action. Be sure not to fall into the same Menendez trap.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Judge David M. Gersten is currently a judge on the Third District Court of Appeal where he was appointed in 1989. Prior to his appointment, he was in private practice from 1975 until 1980. He was elected to the Dade County Court in 1980 and elected to the Eleventh Judicial Circuit in 1982. In 1995, he was appointed as Associate Dean, Appellate Division, at the Florida College of Advanced Judicial Studies, and became a member of the Florida Court Education Council in 1996. He is the author for the Florida Civil Practice Guide, a multi volume set published by LexisNexis/Matthew Bender, and he is a judicial consultant for LexisNexis Practice Guide: Florida Pretrial Civil Procedure.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

148 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Federal Question Juris: Hoffman on Grable & Sons Metal Prods. v Darue Eng'g Mfg.

2008 Emerging Issues 2199

Federal Question Juris: Hoffman on Grable & Sons Metal Prods. v. Darue Eng'g Mfg.

By Lonny Hoffman

April 17, 2008

SUMMARY: After the Supreme Court decided Grable & Sons Metal Products v. Darue Engineering & Manufacturing, 545 U.S. 308 (2005), there has been a notable increase in the number of reported cases involving the question of whether a case raising a state law claim nevertheless comes within the 28 U.S.C. §1331 grant of jurisdiction. In this commentary Professor Lonny Hoffman analyzes the Grable decision and subsequent removal cases.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview. In 2005, the Court handed down a case that, quietly and well below the radar screen of most observers, can be a powerful strategic tool for defendants and, in consequence, a source of frustration, cost and delay for plaintiffs. The case, Grable & Sons Metal Products v. Darue Engineering & Manufacturing, 545 U.S. 308 (2005) considered whether a state court lawsuit--comprised entirely of state law claims--may nevertheless be regarded as arising under federal law within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1331, the general statutory grant of federal question jurisdiction to the district courts. If so, then defendants may be able to trump the plaintiffs choice of forum by using the removal power to take the case from state to federal court.

The doctrine at issue in Grable, known as the substantial federal question doctrine traditionally has played a very small role in federal practice. Indeed, with only two limited exceptions, Grable was the first Supreme Court case since Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Thompson 478 U.S. 804 (1986) to directly ask whether a civil action in which the plaintiffs claims for relief sound exclusively in state law nonetheless arises under federal law for jurisdictional purposes.

Rising Incidence of Substantial Federal Question Removals. Lots of people read Merrell Dow as limiting the scope of arising under jurisdiction to cases in which the plaintiff asserts a right to relief pursuant to a federal statute. This reading had the effect of really restricting the effective scope of cases said to come within the § 1331 grant of arising under jurisdiction. Thats borne out by the empirical evidence. In 1986, the year of Merrell Dow, only 76 cases raised the issue. That figure had only barely budged (up to 81) by 1994.

To be sure, since 1994 the numbers of reported substantial federal question cases continued to creep up but the pace was slow and regular, and probably in line with the overall increases in the total number of federal question cases. But, after Grable was handed down, there's been a notable increase in the number of reported cases involving the question of whether a case raising a state law claim nevertheless comes within the § 1331 grant of jurisdiction. Grable was decided in June but, before the year was out, there were 197 reported cases involving the substantial federal question doctrine. In 2006, there were 241 and 258 in 2007. And these are the reported cases which, as we should know by now, probably are but the tip of the iceberg. n1

Court Encourages More Attempts to Gain Entrance Into the Federal Courthouse. The uptick in reported substantial federal question cases after Grable confirms a prediction I previously made that, even if the courts end up interpreting Grable as not expanding in any significant way the scope of the arising under jurisdiction through the substantial federal question doctrine, the Courts decision nevertheless emboldens defendants to remove cases on the basis of Grable. Along with another decision that same term that effectively immunizes defendants from cost shifting under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(c) for improvident removals (Martin v. Franklin, 546 U.S. 132 (2005)), the practical effect of Grable is that defendants are now able--at the least--to successfully delay the plaintiffs bid for relief and add considerable additional costs into this early forum battle that has nothing to do with the merits of the dispute. Even worse, for those federal courts interested in reading the substantial federal question doctrine expansively, Grable provides plenty of available cover to do so.

But enough preamble. On to Grable to see what were the factual circumstances of that case and the new standard the Court laid out for determining if federal jurisdiction exists under the substantial federal question doctrine.

The Grable Case. The plaintiff in Grable had filed a quiet title action in Michigan state court alleging that the federal tax delinquency sale of his property was invalid because the IRS failed to give proper notice of the seizure, as required by 26 U.S.C. § 6335(a). Defendant had purchased the property from the IRS but plaintiff maintained that it had superior title because service had been improper. Defendant removed the case to federal court, asserting that the source of the district courts original jurisdiction was § 1331. Although plaintiff asserted purely state law causes of action and no federal statute did not provide a private right of action, the district court held that it had original jurisdiction over the cause because the sole issue in dispute--whether § 6335(a) requires personal service--raised a substantial federal question. The Sixth Circuit affirmed the district courts jurisdictional determination. Thereafter, the Supreme Court granted certiorari.

The Well Pledged Complaint Rule. What makes it seem that a case like Grable shouldn't come within the general grant of federal jurisdiction in § 1331 is that the Court has long insisted Congress only meant to permit jurisdiction when the federal question arises as part of the plaintiffs well-pleaded complaint. You may remember Louisville & Nashville R.R. v. Mottley, 211 U.S. 149 (1908), where the Court, in rejecting the plaintiffs bid to characterize their breach of contract case against the railroad as raising a federal question, gave a classic exposition of the well pleaded complaint rule. One justification often offered for the well pleaded complaint rule is that plaintiffs are said to be the masters of their own complaints; if they choose not to bring a federal law cause of action, so be it. It's their choice.

Looking Beyond the Plaintiffs Allegations. We don't always have to take the plaintiffs pleading at face value, however. One occasion when this is appropriate is when complete preemption exists: that is, when Congress has preempted so fully all conflicting state laws that we can just as well say there is no such thing as a claim based on state law in this field. n2 The other primary instance when we look beyond the plaintiffs assertion of exclusively state claims for relief--and the one with which Grable was concerned--arises when a closer look at the pleading reveals that there are substantial federal issues that must necessarily be decided in the course of adjudicating the claim for relief. The hard question, then, is how we figure out when a case can be removed into federal court when the plaintiff is asserting entirely state law causes of action. And that's where Grable comes in. The Court has now given us a two-part test for answering this question.

The First Prong of Grable's Two-Part Test: Focusing on the Question. Under the first formal step in the post-Grable inquiry, the court must determine whether there is a substantial federal question that is necessary to the determination of plaintiffs right to relief and actually in dispute. So, not only must there be an issue of federal law, but there must be one that is substantial, necessary, and actually in dispute. In Grable, this first step was readily met because the Court found that the question of what constitutes proper notice under § 6335(a) is a substantial and important question and one that was necessary and actually in dispute in the case. Indeed, if proper notice had been given, the plaintiff would lose; if it had not been given, the plaintiff would win. Simple as that: there were no other material issues in dispute.

Grables Second Step: Considering the Federalism Balance. Even after finding such a substantial, necessary federal question that is actually in dispute, the courts interpretative task is not complete until a second step is taken, however. That is, Grable further directs that it is necessary to determine whether exercising jurisdiction under § 1331 would upset the balance Congress intended to strike in terms of allocating cases between the state and federal courts. In Grable, this second step was also easily satisfied where the notice question was going to be relevant to this one case, which is to say that it was not likely to arise again very often, if at all. That is, once the federal courts decided that § 6335 did or did not require personal service, there would not be a need thereafter for a federal court to decide the question again in another quiet title (or other) case where service was effected under the statute.

Analysis: Interpreting Grable, and Beyond. Grables retreat from what for many years appeared to be the predominant interpretation of Merrell Dow--that a private right of action is a necessary condition to entry through the § 1331 door into the federal courthouse--might lead one to contend that Grable was meant to expand significantly the number of suits that can be heard and adjudicated in federal court. Indeed, as I noted at the outset, many more defendants seem to be making this precise argument, taking advantage of the pliancy in the new Grable test to argue that all kinds of state law claims actually raise a question of federal law substantial enough to come within Grables new interpretation of 1331. But this reading of Grable misunderstands the result of the Courts decision and profoundly misreads the lesson the eight-member majority intended to send.

Federal Question Must Be Only Key Issue in Case. On the first Grable step--whether there is a substantial federal question that is actually in dispute and necessary to the determination of plaintiffs right to relief--most courts seem to have recognized that the meaning of the federal statute must be the only legal or factual issue in the case. Post-Grable courts have also closely followed the Supreme Courts directive from earlier decisions and, in contrast to the circumstances confronting the Court in Grable, that when a claim can be supported by alternative and independent theories and one of those theories is based on state law, then a federal question is not a necessary element of the claim.

In Sheridan v. New Vista L.L.C., 406 F. Supp. 2d 789 (W.D. Mi. 2005), for instance, the court remanded a suit brought against defendants who allegedly induced plaintiffs to make investments based on the representation that they would receive the tax benefits from doing so when the IRS subsequently disallowed the intended strategy. Rejecting the analogy to Grable, the court concluded that plaintiffs would have to prove primarily state-law based allegations. Indeed, the proper interpretation of the federal tax law was not even the key issue in the case, the court found. Even if plaintiffs were correct that the investment was not proper under federal law, they would still have to demonstrate that the defendants were aware or should have been aware that the tax strategy would be illegal.

Cant Rely on Conclusory Allegations about the Importance of Federal Law. Cases like Sheridan and others underscore the necessity of going through each cause of action, element by element, to assess whether the plaintiffs suit necessarily raises a stated federal issue, actually disputed and substantial as required by Grable. Defendants cannot rely on conclusory allegations that a plaintiffs petition is peppered with references to federal law or that federal issues pervade the case. To succeed in demonstrating arising under jurisdiction, the defendant must be precise in identifying when, how and why a substantial federal question will arise in the course of adjudicating the plaintiffs claims.

Remembering the Second Step. Even if a substantial federal question is actually in dispute and necessary to the adjudication of plaintiffs state law claims, Grable held that the arising under jurisdiction in § 1331 is still not satisfied until the court undertakes an evaluation to determine how Congress intended to allocate the balance of jurisdiction between state and federal courts. To illustrate the importance of taking into consideration the legislative judgment regarding federalism interests, consider again the district courts decision in Sheridan.

Remember that the nub of the claims against the defendants was that plaintiffs were induced to make investments that did not produce the intended tax benefits. Having found that federal law not substantial because it was only one of several issues to be decided in the case, the court in Sheridan went on to observe that even if the federal law issue were treated as substantial, the impact on federalism would counsel against finding the arising under jurisdiction satisfied. The court recognized that a determination that the case asserting exclusively state law claims comes within § 1331 merely because some interpretation of federal tax law was required would herald a substantial transfer of cases from state to federal courts. Put another way, Sheridans conclusion reaffirms that state courts are to be routinely relied upon to decide and apply questions of federal law.

The Two Prongs Usually Pull in Opposite Directions. At its essential core, Grables refinement of the substantial federal question doctrine is best understood as signaling that routine efforts to come within this statutory head of jurisdiction should be rejected in favor of allowing the state court to apply and interpret the applicable federal law. What is perhaps most important about Grables two-part test is to see that, on most occasions, these two prongs will pull in opposite directions. That is, as formulated, to satisfy the first step the federal question has to be very important. Not some minor point of federal law, but significant to those who would be impacted by interpretation of the federal question.

So, in Grable, the Court thought the meaning of the federal tax provision was an important issue because government has a strong interest in the prompt and certain collection of taxes. Also, buyers of property sold at a delinquency sale have a significant interest in making sure that notice was proper so that they are purchasing with clean title. So resolution of the federal question in this case will impact a wide range of persons and behavior. By contrast, an issue relevant only in a single circumstance is far less likely to qualify as substantial.

At the same time, the second step of the Grable test will usually point in the other direction. That is, if it has been determined that a question of federal law is substantial because its resolution will impact a wide range of persons and behavior, the consequence of shifting so much of the state caseload into federal court will often be that such a profound federalism impact will not be understood to be the legislative judgment. The sheer number of cases affected may not be the only criterion Grable contemplates in the measurement of the federalism impact, but it is likely to be one of the most significant factors.

Conclusion. The lesson of lower court cases like Sheridan is that Grable shouldnt be read as signaling a wide expansion in the scope of the substantial federal question doctrine. It is also the lesson of another and even more obscure Supreme Court decision that came out after Grable: Empire Healthchoice Assurance, Inc. v. McVeigh, 547 U.S. 677 (2006).

Empire involved a suit brought by an insurance carrier in federal court seeking reimbursement for amounts it had paid for medical care to one of its beneficiaries. The carriers action was based entirely on state law and, although it advanced a different argument to justify keeping the case in federal court on § 1331 grounds, the Court seemed to be interested in the possibility that the substantial federal question doctrine from Grable might provide a jurisdictional basis. Ultimately, however, a majority of the justices rejected this argument as well, concluding that the case was poles apart from Grable, referring to the earlier decision as a special and small category of federal jurisdiction. Grable was distinguished as a case where the resolution of the federal question, a nearly pure issue of law was both dispositive of that case and would be controlling in numerous other cases. By contrast, the issues in Empire were fact-bound and situation-specific. Even the four dissenting justices who urged that jurisdiction did exist for the suit to remain in federal court relied on other arguments to make their case. Grable and the substantial federal question doctrine were not even mentioned.

In sum, although the Grable issue in Empire was one of the minor issues in the case, the Courts treatment of the argument helps show that its wrong to read the Courts decision as significantly expanding federal jurisdiction. A substantial federal question will usually only be found when an issue is of widespread import: that is, it will be relevant not just to the instant case, but its interpretation will be relevant in lots of other cases. At same time, a question that will have relevance in lots of cases cannot arise in a way that would result in continuous removal of cases routinely tried in state courts. Otherwise, that would open the federal courthouse doors too widely and that, Grable emphatically tells us, is not what Congress meant. So, defendants contemplating removal--but wary of overreaching--should think twice before removing on the basis of Grable. But for plaintiffs who are facing a substantial federal question removal after Grable, this Expert Commentary offers some ammunition that might just come in handy at the motion to remand stage.

References

For more information about the substantial federal question doctrine, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 103.31, 103.42.

For more information about the nature and purpose of removal and the basis of removal jurisdiction, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 107.04, 107.14.

Return to Text

n1 . Indeed, because most remand orders are not reviewable on appeal or otherwise, thanks to 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d), focusing only on reported cases likely means dramatically understating the number of unreported instances when a defendant tried to remove a case to federal court on the basis of this doctrine.

n2 . I won't say any more about complete preemption here other than that complete preemption is a really, really rare phenomenon. Even when a federal law does preempt conflicting state law, almost all of the time that issue is litigated as a defense to the plaintiff's claim; and issues of federal law that arise by way of defense don't satisfy the well-pleaded complaint rule.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Lonny Hoffman is the George Butler Research Professor of Law at the University of Houston Law Center. He is a specialist on civil procedure in the federal and state courts, including class actions and other complex litigation. His full bio and CV may be found at <http://www.law.uh.edu/faculty/main.asp?PID=179>.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

149 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Atty-Client Privilege: Sullivan on In re Sonicblue

2008 Emerging Issues 2200

Atty-Client Privilege: Sullivan on In re Sonicblue

By Christopher D. Sullivan

April 17, 2008

SUMMARY: Can an attorney seek advice from other lawyers within the same firm regarding problems arising during the course of representing a client and then shield such communications from the client by claiming an attorney-client privilege? If so, under what circumstances? These are the questions Christopher D. Sullivan addresses in this Emerging Issues Analysis on In re Sonicblue, Inc.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Can an attorney seek advice from other lawyers within the same firm regarding problems arising during the course of representing a client and then shield such communications from the client by claiming an attorney-client privilege? If so, under what circumstances? These were the questions addressed in In re Sonicblue, Inc., 2008 Bankr. LEXIS 181 (Bankr. N.D. Cal. 2008), which is an important decision in a developing area of law of significant interest to attorneys. The court had to decide whether to permit former counsel for the debtors, which had been disqualified for failing to disclose an actual conflict of interest with the debtors during the course of its representation, to assert an attorney-client privilege as to internal firm communications against its own former client for communications made during the course of the firms representation.

Introduction and Summary of In re Sonicblue Holding. After thoughtfully analyzing the issues and existing precedent, the court held that a law firm cannot assert the attorney-client privilege against a current outside client when the communications that it seeks to protect arise out of self-representation that creates an impermissible conflicting relationship with that outside client. 2008 Bankr. LEXIS 181, *26-27. In particular, a privilege cannot be asserted by a law firm against a client as to intra-firm communications after such time as the firm has, or should have, determined that dual representation of itself and an outside client should not continue without the informed consent of the client. Id. at *27 (emphasis added).

This Expert Commentary focuses on: (1) the case law considering when, if at all, a law firm can protect internal firm communications regarding potential ethical issues arising during the course of a clients representation from the client if disputes later arise; (2) the courts decision in In re Sonicblue; and (3) practical issues for attorneys faced with ethical or conflict problems involving a current client and potential solutions to such difficulties.

Background. Most experienced practitioners have encountered problems after discovering a potential conflict between the firm and a current client. For example, a mistake during the course of a clients representation may expose the firm to liability for malpractice. In the bankruptcy context, many issues arise regarding the firms representation of a debtor where a conflict emerges or if the firms fees are questioned. Courts generally recognize that communications regarding a law firms consultation with in house counsel may fall within an attorney-client privilege and be protected from disclosure to third parties. United States v. Rowe, 96 F.3d 1294 (9th Cir. 1996). When lawyers seek advice from their firms internal legal counsel regarding the firms ethical responsibilities and a dispute arises as to whether the firm can protect these communications by invoking an attorney-client privilege against its former client very different considerations apply.

In Bankruptcy Cases, Little Protection for Intra Firm Communications. Courts are reluctant to allow a firm to protect such intra firm communications. For example, in Koen Book Distributors v. Powell, Trachtman, Logan, Carrle, Bowman & Lombardo, P.C., 212 F.R.D. 283, 286 (E.D. Pa. 2002), the court refused to allow a law firm to shield communications relating to the firms efforts to oppose a motion to disqualify the firm from continuing to represent the debtor. The court recognize[d] the law firm was enmeshed in an unenviable situation once [a] threat had been made with a hearing before the bankruptcy judge . . . only weeks away. Nonetheless, the firm still owed a fiduciary duty to [its] clients. This duty is paramount to its own interests. Koen Book Distributors v. Powell, Trachtman, Logan, Carrle, Bowman & Lombardo, P.C., 212 F.R.D. 283, 286 (E.D. Pa. 2002). Claiming a privilege against its own client as to communications prior to the Courts ruling on the motion to disqualify was held to be fundamentally incompatible with the firms fiduciary duty to its client during any ongoing representation. Id.; Burns v. Hale and Dorr, LLP, 242 F.R.D. 170, 172-73 (D. Mass 2007).

Similar Results for Non-Bankruptcy Cases. The same results have been reached outside of the bankruptcy context as well In Bank Brussels Lambert v. Credit Lyonnais (Suisse), S.A., 220 F. Supp. 2d 283, 287 (S.D.N.Y. 2002), the court cited Rowe as the leading case on the applicability of the privilege to in-house consultations by law firms. The court then noted, However, while these cases did recognize the attorney-client privilege for intra-firm communications, none of these cases addressed whether the privilege can be asserted against the firms current client. See Rowe, 96 F.3d at 1296 (privilege asserted in response to governmental subpoena in criminal investigation); [other citations]. Asserting the privilege against a current client seems to create an inherent conflict against that client. Id. The court refused to allow the firm to assert the privilege against its former client as to communications during the scope of the representation.

Work Product Doctrine. In the same vein, it has been held repeatedly that the work product doctrine does not apply to the situation in which a client seeks access to documents or other tangible things created or amassed by his attorney during the course of the representation. Spivey v. Zant, 683 F.2d 881, 885 (5th Cir. 1982); see also Roberts v. Heim, 123 F.R.D. 614, 631 (N.D. Cal. 1988) (reasoning of the Spivey court is apparent and speaks for itself, there can be no assertion of the work product privilege against the former client); In re Standard Financial Management Corporation, 79 B.R. 97, 99 (Bankr. D. Mass. 1987) (To protect counsel from his own client trying to recapture background detail is a perversion of the privilege unsupported by text writers or cases and in no way comporting with the Hickman rationale for such a privilege.)

Thelen: An Exception Providing Limited Protection. In Thelen Reid & Priest, LLP v. Marland, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17482 (N.D. Cal. 2007), the court carved out a very important possible exception to the developing rule that a law firm cannot protect communications against in house counsel against its own former client.

In Thelen, the court first noted that no case had been cited to it in which an intra-firm communication relating to the firms representation of a client was withheld from the client under a claim of privilege. Id. at *17. But the court recognize[d] that law firms should and do seek advice about their legal and ethical obligations in connection with representing a client and that firms normally seek this advice from their own lawyers. Id. To reconcile the competing concerns, the Thelen court held that a limited privilege applies to confidential communications from a lawyer seeking advice regarding ethical obligations. However, once the law firm learns that a client may have a claim against the firm or that the firm needs client consent in order to commence or continue another client representation, then the firm should disclose to the client the firms conclusions with respect to those ethical issues. Id. at *21 The court compelled disclosure of communications discussing claims the former client may have against the firm or discussing known errors, conflicts, or other circumstances that triggered a duty to advise its former client and obtain consent to continued representation.

The In re Sonicblue decision. In In re Sonicblue, Pillsbury, Winthrop, Shaw Pittman LLP (PWSP), long term counsel for the debtors, claimed a privilege as to at least 435 communications among various PWSP attorneys, though its former client had waived its privileges. 2008 Bankr. LEXIS 181, at *4. Conflicts developed between PWSP and the debtors during PWSPs representations during the bankruptcy, which became more acute in the summer of 2006 when certain of the debtors former directors and officers entered into a tolling agreement with PWSP over an insurance dispute (id. at *12) and then the largest creditors threatened PWSP with an indemnity demand arising from a pre-bankruptcy opinion PWSP had issued in connection with a private placement of $75 million in senior secured debentures. Id. at *17-18. PWSP did not disclose any of these conflicts to the court or obtain waivers from the debtor to continue the representation until after the first of the conflicts had been discovered by third parties and the United States Trustee moved to disqualify PWSP. Id. at *20-22.

PWSP claimed protection for communications with its firms in-house counsel that were made in an effort to defend itself against the allegations made in the bankruptcy proceedings. Id. at *24. The Sonicblue court rejected the claim, holding that no privilege applies once a law firm has, or should have, determined that dual representation of itself and the outside client should not continue without the informed written consent of the outside client. Id. at *27. The court thus followed the guidance of the Thelen court, but also expressly applied an objective standard refusing to protect communications once the firm knows, or should know, it is faced with a conflict requiring it to obtain the informed written consent of its client to continue the representation.

The In re Sonicblue decision puts an affirmative burden on law firms to recognize when a conflict with its client triggers a need to inform the client of the conflict and the potential ramifications and will not protect any internal firm communications after the conflict was, or should have been, apparent to the firm unless proper client waivers are received.

Practical Implications. There are several practical lessons that can be drawn from the In re Sonicblue decision and the case law the court relied upon. First, early recognition of potential conflicts with a client and then paying prompt and adequate attention to the issues raised is critical. Counsel should not downplay the importance of any potential divergence between the interests of the law firm and the client even if the attorneys believe it is unlikely that the conflict will ripen into a material claim. The mere threat of a potential claim against the firm later can create the appearance that the firms loyalties will not remain undivided.

Second, when a question is raised, it is safer to seek advice from outside counsel if the attorneys are concerned that communications regarding the issues should be protected from subsequent disclosure to the client. The In re Sonicblue court upheld the privilege as to communications between PWSP and its outside counsel despite the presence of an actual conflict. 2008 Bankr. LEXIS 181, *32-33. The court reasoned that outside counsel, unlike the firm that continues to represent its client, owes no fiduciary duty to the client. Id. It should be noted, however, that in Rowe the court stated that inside and outside counsel should be treated the same (96 F.3d at 1296) and it is the law firm itself not outside counsel that is attempting to claim a privilege against its own client. If the law firm as the client cannot invoke the attorney-client with respect to internal communications, logic suggests that it should not be able to protect communications with outside counsel either. Thus, counsel should be cautious as to whether a privilege can be successfully asserted later even when consulting outside counsel.

Third, the cardinal rule once a potential conflict surfaces should be disclosure, disclosure, disclosure. The central basis for the decisions by the courts that have refused to protect the law firms internal communications is the importance of the firms fiduciary duty to its client. Trying to keep any information that the law firm becomes aware of that could implicate the interests of its client secret conflicts with the firms duties of ultimate fidelity to its client. By affirmatively disclosing all potential issues to its client (or in a bankruptcy context, to the client, the court, and all parties) keeps the client fully informed and eliminates any disadvantage the client may suffer from if it lacks knowledge regarding a potential conflict with the firm.

Finally, the attorneys should err on the side of either seeking the informed written consent of its client when a conflict arises or taking steps to withdraw. The importance of the lawyers obligations under the professional rules cannot be over-emphasized. The rules may be strictly applied, regardless of whether the lawyer thinks that the chances of a potential dispute germinating into a real problem are slim. Once such a problem does develop, the fallout from the conflict can be quite serious. And the potential that damaging or embarrassing internal communications will be disclosed reflecting the law firms efforts to protect itself first and the client second is very real in light of court decisions such as In re Sonicblue.

References

For information about the scope of the attorney-client privilege, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 26.49.

For information on the attorney-client privilege and the ethical duty of confidentiality, see Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 811.06.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Christopher D. Sullivan is a partner in McGrane Greenfield LLP (www.mcgranegreenfield.com), with over fifteen years of experience with complex multi-party litigation, primarily in federal courts. He received a Bachelor of Arts degree from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst in 1985, and a Juris Doctorate from the University of California, Hastings School of Law in 1990, magna cum laude, where he was the Editor-in-Chief of the Hastings Law Journal. Mr. Sullivan clerked for the Honorable Melvin J. Brunetti of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and taught Legal Writing and Research at Stanford Law School, before joining the firm of Bartko, Zankel, Tarrant & Miller in 1992 and becoming a partner in 1997. Mr. Sullivan's practice focuses on high stakes commercial litigation, corporate and partnership disputes, and bankruptcy-related litigation. He is admitted to practice before the California State Courts and the U.S. District Court for the Northern, Central, and Eastern Districts of California. Mr. Sullivan is Vice President of the Federal Bar Association for the Northern District of California and a court appointed mediator in the Northern District of California's ADR program.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

150 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Section 2-1117 of the Illinois Code of Civil Procedure

2008 Emerging Issues 2135

Joe McDonnell on Joint Liability: Section 2-1117 of the Illinois Code of Civil Procedure (735 ILCS 5/2 1117)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: Joint liability for tort damages among multiple defendants is a perplexing issue. Just who are the defendants who are liable and in what proportion? How can the plaintiff ensure that recovery is not diluted? How can defendants ensure that they are not unduly burdened? These and other issues arising out of 735 ILCS 5/2 1117 are examined by Joe McDonnell in this commentary on the joint liability statute.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: McDonnell, Joseph B. Joint Liability: Section 2-1117 of the Illinois Code of Civil Procedure (735 ILCS 5/2 1117). LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Background. One of the most vigorously disputed aspects of Illinois practice and procedure over the past several years involves the construction of Section 2-1117 of the Civil Practice Act. 735 ILCS 5/2-1117. As originally enacted in 1986, the statute provided that in injury, death, or product liability actions, all defendants found liable were jointly and severally liable for medical expenses, but that any defendant whose fault was more than 25% of the total fault attributable to the plaintiff, the defendants sued by the plaintiff, and any third party defendant who could have been sued by the plaintiff, shall be severally liable for all of the damages. Because of uncertainty created by the phrase any third party who could have been sued by the plaintiff and conflicting interpretations by the appellate court districts as to whether that phrase included the plaintiffs employer, n1 the Act was amended in 2003 to substitute the phrase and any third party defendant except the plaintiffs employer in place of the former language. See P.A. 93-10 and P.A. 93-12, eff. June 4, 2003.

Another Problem Presents Itself. The resolution of that problem, however, has not to this point resolved another issue pertaining to the construction of the statute. Sec. 2-1117 states that [a]ny defendant, whose fault is less than 25% of the total fault attributable to the plaintiff, the defendants sued by the plaintiff, and any third party defendants except the plaintiffs employer is severally, rather than jointly, liable for all non-medical damages. 735 ILCS 5/2-1117 (emphasis added).

The italicized language continues to vex the bench and bar. Conflicting results have been reached as to whether a defendant who was sued, but with whom a settlement was reached prior to submission of the case to the jury, should be included in the jury verdict form for purposes of apportionment of damages under Sec. 2-117. Once again, the appellate districts have reached opposite results. See Ready v. United/Goedecke Services, Inc., 367 Ill.App.3d 272 (2006); Blake v. Hy Ho Restaurant, Inc., 273 Ill.App.3d 372 (5th Dist. 1995); Skaggs v. Senior Services of Central Illinois, Inc., 355 Ill.App.3d 1120 (4th Dist. 2005).

Importance of the Issue. The resolution of the question has a great bearing on the apportionment of damages by the jury. Inclusion of the absent party's name on the jury verdict form increases the chances that a particular defendant's share of the liability will be decreased, because the damages will be spread among more parties. Conversely, inclusion of the absent party's name on the jury verdict will be disadvantageous to the plaintiff for the same reason.

The Illinois Supreme Court granted petition for leave to appeal in the Ready case and oral argument was heard on May 22, 2007. The case is on the Court's advisement docket awaiting decision.

Yet Another Problem. A recent case decided by the First District, 3d Division, has added a new wrinkle to the debate. In Heupel v. Jenkins, Docket No. 1-07-1338, opinion filed March 5, 2008, the Appellate Court considered for the first time the effect of a settlement with a tortfeasor who was never sued in the case, but against whom a claim had been made by the plaintiff. Before suit was filed, plaintiff settled with Murugeson, one of several tortfeasors, for Murugeson's insurance limits, then filed suit against others. Prior to trial, defendants sought leave to join Murugeson as a third party defendant, so that his alleged liability could be before the jury, as had been done in Skaggs and Blake, cited supra. Leave was denied, but the motion judge indicated that he felt that Murugeson's name should be on the jury verdict nonetheless. The trial judge agreed with the ruling and also agreed that Murugeson's name would appear on the jury verdict form. The jury returned a defendant's verdict and plaintiff appealed, asserting, inter alia, that the trial court had erred in including Murugeson's name on the jury verdict form.

The Appellate Court held that the inclusion of Murugeson's name was appropriate. Relying on Skaggs and on an unreported federal court memorandum opinion (Dowe v. National Railroad R.R. Passenger Corp., No. 01-C-5808, April 26, 2004), the court held that the legislative intent supporting Section 2-1117 of the Code, and the cases interpreting the statute, apply where an absent defendant was never sued. This was particularly true, the court said, in light of the events leading to the trial court's determination that Murugeson was to be named on the jury verdict form. Slip Op. at 13.

The applicable jury verdict form (IBI Civil (2000) b 4503.A) provides for the apportionment of fault among all tortfeasors. In the First District's opinion, there was no substantial difference between Murugeson's status and any other settling defendant simply because Murugeson had settled before being named a defendant in the suit. The court said that several principles of statutory construction supported its decision: [W]e conclude that Section 2-1117 of the Code applies to all tortfeasors no matter whether or when the plaintiff enters a settlement with any individual. Slip op. at 14.

Tips for Practitioners. At this writing, Heupel is not final and it is conceivable that review will be sought either by petition for rehearing or by petition for leave to appeal to the Illinois Supreme Court. In the meantime, the Ready case awaits decision by the high court. Until the issue is resolved, plaintiffs should continue to resist the inclusion of the name of any party, whether sued or not, who is not in the case at the time a case goes to jury, relying on Blake v. Hy Ho Restaurant. Where plaintiff has settled with a party prior to filing suit, the argument should be that, notwithstanding Heupel, the statute uses the word defendant and that the plain meaning rule should therefore exclude any reference in the jury verdict form to any tortfeasor who is not only absent but who was never a defendant to begin with. The argument that the jury should consider only those parties actually before it at the time they receive the case for determination is particularly appropriate where the absent party has not had the opportunity to defend itself at trial. Finally, any ruling to the contrary would frustrate the policy of the law to encourage settlement.

From the defendants standpoint, the argument should be that the obvious intent of the legislature in enacting Section 2-1117 was to enable the jury to determine and to apportion liability among all parties whose wrongful conduct contributed to the alleged injuries. The obvious policy behind apportionment of damages is to reach all persons whose conduct may have contributed to the injurious occurrence, and their formal status in the litigation is irrelevant to that purpose. To omit from the verdict form the identity of a contributing tortfeasor would lead to absurd results; first, it would deprive the jury of the opportunity to consider the liability of all responsible persons, and, second, it would enable a plaintiff to manipulate liability and damages issues by settling, whether before or after filing suit, with a party or parties whose liability may be substantial, but who would never be accountable in the final resolution of the claims considered by the jury.

For additional discussion of the issues surrounding 735 ILCS 5/2 1117 see

Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts § 33:148 Joint and several liability of multiple tortfeasors; Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts § 29:109

Contributory fault; joint liability; Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts § 4:03 Actions in concert; Illinois Jurisprudence, Personal Injury and Torts § 4:02

Statutory limitations on joint and several liability; Illinois Tort Law § 23.03 Joint Liability Law; see generally Illinois Tort Law Ch. 23 Third Party Practice.

Return to Text

n1 . Compare Lilly v. Marcal Rope & Rigging, 289 Ill.App.3d 1105 (5th Dist. 1997) and Unzicker v. Kraft Food Ingredients Corp. (4th Dist. 2001); conflict resolved by Illinois Supreme Court, Unzicker v. Kraft Food Ingredients Corp., 203 Ill.2d 64 (Ill. 2002)(plaintiffs employer was a third party defendant who could have been sued by the plaintiff and was therefore properly included in the jury verdict form for purposes of apportioning damages under Sec. 2-1117; abrogating Lilly v. Marcal Rope and Rigging, supra.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

151 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Labady on Davidson v. Slater

2008 Emerging Issues 2177

Jean-Claude Labady, Esq. on A Double-Edged Sword: Re-Assessing Comparative Analysis in Injury Aggravation Claims, Davidson v. Slater, 189 N.J. 166, 914 A.2d. 282 (2007).

By Jean-Claude Labady

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: The NJ Supreme Court in Davidson v. Slater examines the long-standing decision in Polk on when a claimant is required to produce a comparative analysis report to show the impact of prior and subsequent accidents on alleged injuries. This commentary, written by Jean Claude Labady, an experienced New Jersey litigator, examines important strategic considerations surrounding comparative analysis reports in light of Davidson.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Labady, Jean-Claude. A Double-Edged Sword: Re-Assessing Comparative Analysis in Injury Aggravation Claims. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

The New Jersey Supreme Courts decision in Davidson examined the Appellate Divisions long-standing approach in Polk v. Daconceicao, 268 N.J.Super. 568, 634 A.2d 135 (App. Div. 1993). Under Polk, a claimant is required to produce a comparative analysis, referred to as the Polk analysis by practitioners, to show the impact of prior and subsequent accidents on alleged injuries. Comparative analysis reports produced by plaintiffs usually spell out physicians opinions of percentages of causation attributed to each accident. Yet, the Court went further in Davidson to hold that when a plaintiff does not plead aggravation of a previous injury, he does not have to produce a comparative analysis report. This holding is a double-edged sword: it appears to relieve claimants for the burden and expenses associated with producing such reports while it inspires caution. After a plaintiff made the decision not to produce the analysis, a defendant may be able to prove at trial that the plaintiffs injuries had pre-existed and hence were aggravated in the course of the current accident, in which case it may be too late for the plaintiff to differentiate between the injuries.

The Supreme Court Modifies a Long-Standing Approach. In Davidson, the defendant took the position that the Polk analysis was required even when the plaintiff asserted no aggravation claims in her pleadings. Practitioners cannot complain that the Courts holding, which thwarts the defendants attempt, is bereft of clarity: When a plaintiff alleges aggravation of pre-existing injuries as the animating theory for the claim, then plaintiff must produce comparative evidence to move forward with the causation element of that tort action. When a plaintiff does not plead aggravation of pre-existing injuries, a comparative analysis is not required to make that demonstration. Davidson, 189 N.J. at 170.

The Plaintiffs Prior Injuries. The Davidson plaintiff sustained injuries when her vehicle was involved in an automobile accident. In answers to interrogatories, she described her symptoms as related to the present accident and did not identify any prior injury. She described her injuries as rib, right knee, lower back and neck pain, headaches, and tingling sensation in her hand and feet. The plaintiff followed treatment with a number of physicians who related her injuries only to the present accident. A physician who examined her for her no-fault insurer reached the same conclusion. Nonetheless, a physician who examined her at the behest of the defendant stated in his report that the plaintiff did not give an accurate history of injury in failing to reveal her neck problems from a prior accident. Indeed, in a report related to that accident her symptoms were reported, among other things, as severe neck, back, shoulder and lower back pain, headache, and tenderness over the left knee. It was stated at that time that she would continue to feel the effects of those injuries. However, the plaintiff maintained that the symptoms from that accident existed only for two months, and that she had fully recovered by the time of the present accident.

The Indiscriminate Requirement of an Analysis Challenged. The defendant filed a summary judgment motion based on the plaintiffs failure to meet the verbal threshold standard under the Automobile Insurance Cost Reduction Act (AICRA), 39 N.J.S.A. 6A:1.1 et seq., failed to provide a certification of permanency as required by AICRA, and did not provide her physicians comparative analysis as required by Polk, supra, 268 N.J.Super. 568 (App. Div. 1993). The trial court granted summary judgment on the basis that the analysis was required since the plaintiff suffered similar injuries to the same body parts in three separate accidents. Thus, the plaintiff produced no evidence to vault AICRA's verbal threshold. The Appellate Division rejected that approach. It noted that the plaintiff was not claiming that prior injuries were aggravated by the current accident. It also rejected the blanket approach adopted by other panels of requiring a Polk analysis in the context of non-aggravation claims. Davidson, 189 N.J. at 176.

The Supreme Court Clipped Polks Reach. The Court noted that, since the passage of AICRA, Polks comparative analysis requirement has been seen in different lights by the panels: (1) requiring comparative analysis regarding an aggravation claim; (2) requiring the analysis where injuries are claimed to the same body parts; (3) viewing the analysis as unnecessary in the context of summary judgment motions. Davidson, 189 N.J. at 182-3. The Court limited the reach of Polk in observing that a plaintiff does not have to present automatically a comparative analysis to oppose a summary judgment motion. Rather, the necessity for comparative evidence should depend upon whether the factual construct presented by the moving papers calls into question whether any reasonable jury could find that plaintiff incurred a permanent injury resulting from the subject automobile. Id. at 184.

Is Polk Still Relevant Post-AICRA? The Court questioned whether Polks comparative analysis requirement is still relevant post-AICRA. Prior to AICRA, Polk was relevant in the context of establishing serious impact on a plaintiff's life. Practitioners are aware that a plaintiff no longer needs to prove impact post AICRA. See DiProspero v. Penn, 183 N.J. 477, 84 A.2d 1039 (2005). Plaintiffs no longer have to recount a litany of sufferings in order to overcome the injury threshold although they still do so at depositions and trial. Polks analysis requirement is relevant when the need for a plaintiff to produce evidence is based on traditional principles of causation and burden allocation to tort cases only. Any other approach is wide of the mark. Davidson, 189 N.J. at 184. Thus, it is only when aggravation of a previous injury is pled that a plaintiff is required to produce a comparative analysis in order to establish causation between accidents and injuries to the same body parts.

A practical twist arises, the Court recognizes, when a plaintiff does not plead aggravation to pre-existing injuries, but there have been other injuries to a body part. Upon clarifying that a defendant cannot place the burden on a plaintiff to exclude all other injuries by comparative analysis, the Court yet recognizes that it is a defendant's prerogative to produce evidence to show that, even where a plaintiff does not allege aggravation, her present injury could have been caused by a previous condition. The Courts practical advice for practitioners is easily gleaned from the following comment:

We presume that defendants routinely will inquire during discovery about a plaintiff's prior injuries. In respect of the element of causation specifically, a plaintiff will risk dismissal on summary judgment if the defendant can show that no reasonable fact-finder could conclude that the defendant's negligence caused plaintiff's alleged permanent injury. Thus, the plaintiff who does not prepare for comparative medical evidence is at risk of failing to raise a jury-worthy factual issue about whether the subject accident caused the injury. [Davidson, 189 N.J. at 188.]

Practical Considerations. Whether Polk is still good law is not really the practical issue. The aspect of Polk that requires a comparative analysis in the context of an aggravation claim is still alive. Davidson galvanized a number of interested constituencies who, other than the direct parties, submitted amicus curiae briefs in favor of the suspension or expansion of the comparative analysis requirement. The Court seemed at first to have given victory to the plaintiff bar in rejecting the automatic provision of a Polk analysis regardless of the nature of a claim. Read literally, this new approach would do away with the burden a plaintiffs attorney routinely faces in having to obtain, pay for and produce a Polk report. Clients sometimes cannot be found for updated examinations, and busy physicians can be expensive. Where the report cannot be produced in time, dismissal sometimes occurs, summary judgment motions are granted, and arbitration awards are reduced. Yet, the cautious practitioner will be very careful in making the decision as to whether to produce the analysis or not. In this area of practice, it is more likely that injuries extend across the body and do not confine themselves to distinct body parts. Moreover, it is often the case that a client provides new information about injuries that heretofore had not been suggestive of aggravation. Depending on the stage of discovery, the new information could prove fatal if it is too late to produce the analysis. If that information is revealed during testimony at trial, or more dangerously a defendant can successfully prove aggravation then, it is unlikely that the case will be saved. Therefore, it behooves a plaintiffs practitioner to err on the side of obtaining the analysis unless current injuries are clearly distinct from previous injuries. Defense counsel, on the other hand, should probe deeply into all forms of injury to assess whether aggravation is a factor and move for summary judgment when it is and had not been competently established through comparative analysis.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jean-Claude Labady, Esq. has been a member of the New Jersey bar since 1992. He formerly served as the Managing Partner of Labady & Randolph and headed up the litigation department of the firm. He received his B.A. with honors and M.A. magna cum laude from Rutgers University. Mr. Labady is also a 1992 graduate of the Seton Hall University School of Law. Upon graduation from law school, Mr. Labady served as Judicial Law Clerk to the Hon. Reginald Stanton, Assignment Judge, New Jersey Superior Court (retired). Following his clerkship, Mr. Labady has primarily focused his practice on insurance defense work and has defended insured parties and insurance companies in complex coverage disputes. Mr. Labady was a pioneer in the area of complex fraud litigation on behalf of insurance carriers in New Jersey. He is responsible for decisions of first impression in both health care law and fraud law. Mr. Labady can be reached by email at jlaby@verizon.net.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

152 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Best on People v. MacLeod

2008 Emerging Issues 2182

Arthur Best on People v. MacLeod, 176 P.3d 75 (Colo. 2008)

By Arthur Best

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: The Colorado Supreme Court applies the Rape Shield Statute to statements introduced for purposes other than to prove the truth of what they assert. Arthur Best, Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, comments on People v. MacLeod, 176 P.3d 75 (Colo. 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Best, Arthur. The Colorado Supreme Courts Application of the Rape Shield Statute to Statements Introduced for Purposes Other Than to Prove the Truth of What They Assert. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Overview

Colorados Rape Shield statute defines certain types of evidence as presumptively inadmissible and imposes procedural requirements for consideration of whether they may be admissible in a particular case. This case considers whether the statute should apply when a witnesss past statements about her sexual history would be relevant whether or not they were true.

Summary of the Case

The defendant was accused of sexually assaulting his daughter multiple times. Two counts, sexual assault on a child and sexual assault on a child by one in a position of trust, went to the jury, and the defendant was found not guilty of both charges.

The defendant and the daughters mother were divorced. The defendant claimed that the charges were false, and that his daughter had made them so that she could live permanently with her mother. At trial the defendant was permitted to ask the mother if she had told her daughter that she had been sexually assaulted and if she had told her daughter not to make the same mistake she had made by not reporting the sexual abuse. In addition to asking the mother whether she had made statements to her daughter about having been sexually abused, the defendant was permitted to ask the mother whether she had, in fact, been sexually abused as a child. The claimed relevance of this inquiry was that it would show that the defendant's daughter had learned that sexual abuse was of special concern to her mother so that if she claimed she had been a victim of sexual abuse her mother would likely increase the likelihood that she would be permitted to live with her mother.

The prosecution objected to these questions on the ground that the defendant had never filed a rape shield offer of proof. The trial court allowed the questions, stating:

[T]he case law also says that the purpose [of the rape shield statute] is to prevent protection [sic] from humiliating and embarrassing public fishing expeditions into past sexual conduct. The Court agrees with [the defendant] that in this case it doesn't even matter whether it occurred. The only issue is whether the daughter was told it occurred[,] whether the daughter was encouraged to report and had that knowledge and that is very relevant to this case and the Court will allow it.

People v. MacLeod, 176 P.3d 75, n.6 (Colo. 2008)

Pertinent Legal Principles

C. R. S. 18-3-407. Victim's and witness's prior history--evidentiary hearing--victim's identity--protective order.

(1) Evidence of specific instances of the victim's or a witness's prior or subsequent sexual conduct, opinion evidence of the victim's or a witness's sexual conduct, and reputation evidence of the victim's or a witness's sexual conduct may be admissible only at trial and shall not be admitted in any other proceeding except at a proceeding pursuant to paragraph (c) of subsection

(2) of this section. At trial, such evidence shall be presumed to be irrelevant except:

(a) Evidence of the victim's or witness' prior or subsequent sexual conduct with the actor;

(b) Evidence of specific instances of sexual activity showing the source or origin of semen, pregnancy, disease, or any similar evidence of sexual intercourse offered for the purpose of showing that the act or acts charged were or were not committed by the defendant.

(3) In any criminal prosecution for class 4 felony internet luring of a child, as described in section 18-3-306(3) or under sections 18-3-402 to 18-3-405.5, 18-6-301, 18-6-302, 18-6-403, and 18-6-404, or for attempt or conspiracy to commit any of said crimes, if evidence, that is not excepted under subsection (1) of this section, of specific instances of the victim's or a witness's prior or subsequent sexual conduct, or opinion evidence of the victim's or a witness's sexual conduct, or reputation evidence of the victim's or a witness's sexual conduct, or evidence that the victim or a witness has a history of false reporting of sexual assaults is to be offered at trial, [procedures specified in the remaining sections of the statute shall be followed]...

In re People v. Weiss*, 133 P.3d 1180 (Colo. 2006). Interpreting the statute's reference to evidence of a history of false reporting of sexual assaults, the court held that one who seeks to make an offer of proof that a victim had a history of falsely reporting sexual assaults must prove that the accusations had been actually false, and not merely that the victim had previously made accusations that were not prosecuted.

The Supreme Courts Decision

Relying on the language of the statute its policy of protecting witnesses from irrelevant, immaterial or repeated public examination as the price for testifying in sexual assault cases, the court held that the statute applies no matter the purpose for which the proponent is offering the evidence of a witness's sexual history. The court stated that there would be no exception for instances when the proffered evidence is not being offered for the truth of the matter asserted.

Legislative History. The court reviewed the history of the rape shield statute. Ordinarily, the rules of evidence favor admissibility. The rape shield statute was adopted to reverse the common practice of humiliating alleged victims in sex crime cases by requiring them to make public all kinds of information about their past sexual conduct. In reaction to that abuse, the statute reflects an intent to change standard evidence law to declare that evidence of a witness's sexual history is presumptively irrelevant. It also creates an offer-of-proof procedure that must be followed in order to rebut the presumption and to introduce evidence of a witness's sexual history at trial. The act requires the proponent to prove its relevance and materiality before trial. It also limits the public exposure of the witness. Public examination of the witness about the witness's sexual history may occur only once, that is, at trial, because the required pretrial hearing must be held in camera.

Plain Language. The statute makes no reference to instances when material of the type its provisions specify might be relevant even if it was untrue. In the words of the court, The statutes language includes no purpose exception that would enable the statutes requirements to be avoided if the proponent were not offering the evidence for the truth of the matter asserted.

Significance of Statutory Procedural Requirements. The court stated that treating some inquiries regarding a witness's sexual conduct as outside the coverage of the statute would hamper the application of the statutes procedural protections. The statute requires an in camera hearing and permits inquiries about a witness's sexual conduct only at trial, when a prior in camera hearing has held that the statutes presumption of irrelevance has been overridden. Allowing inquiries about sexual conduct to be made without adherence to that procedure in instances when their claimed relevance does not depend on their truth would, the court reasoned, would allow witnesses to be surprised by the introduction of that topic, no matter how marginal the evidences relevancy, materiality or veracity.

Distinction Between Relevance and Hearsay. The court noted that the concept of evidence being introduced for a purpose that does not require that the evidence be true is the central concept in the law of hearsay, which treats out-of-court statements differently depending on whether their relevance depends or does not depend on the truth of what they assert. Hearsay and relevance are different, the court noted, and its concepts should not affect application of the rape shield statute.

Broad Application of Statute. The court supported its result by referring to In re People v. Weiss, 133 P.3d 1180 (Colo. 2006). In that case the court interpreted the statutes provision about evidence of prior false claims as requiring that the proponent of the evidence prove that the claims actually were false, rather than just show that they did not lead to any prosecution. This interpretation was motivated in part to provide the broadest possible coverage under the statute.

Comments

Colorados rape shield statute excludes more evidence than the similar statutes and rules of many states, because of its explicit treatment of false claims. In many states, the act of making a claim of having been the victim of a sex crime is not treated as equivalent to sexual conduct and is therefore outside the scope of the rape shield provisions. Given the broad coverage and clear social policy manifest in the Colorado statute, the courts decision rejecting an approach that would decrease the power of the statute is understandable.

See Chapter 312, Colorado Evidence Courtroom Manual, and Colorado Evidentiary Foundations § 6[B] for discussions of Colorado's rape shield statute.

The court's suggestion that not for the truth asserted is a concept that belongs only to hearsay and cannot be helpful in the context of relevance inquiries may require additional analysis. Many topics in evidence law recognize that the purpose for which evidence is presented may control the decision on its admissibility. Here, where a party suggests that a statement about sexual conduct would be relevant regardless of its truth, it is arguable that bringing that statement to the attention of a jury is completely different from showing that the person who made the statement had actually engaged in the sexual conduct that the statement described.

Practice Tip. Depending on the circumstances of a particular case, if a non-truth use of a witness's statements about past sexual conduct were highly significant in a defendant's defense, constitutional issues might arise if provisions of the rape shield statute were used to preclude introduction of the evidence.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsel's office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Nader's Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the author's qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

153 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Arthur Best on United States v. Nuccio, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 5702 (10th Cir. 200

2008 Emerging Issues 2183

Arthur Best on the Tenth Circuits Treatment of Expert Testimony on Economics for Insider Trading Issues, United States v. Nuccio, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 5702 (10th Cir. 2008)

By Arthur Best

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: Arthur Best, Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, comments on the Tenth Circuits treatment of expert testimony on economics for insider trading issues, including application of Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Daubert, and Rules 403, 602, 702 and 703 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. United States v. Nuccio, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 5702 (10th Cir. 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as. Best, Arthur. The Tenth Circuits Treatment of Expert Testimony on Economics for Insider Trading Issues. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Overview

The defendant was convicted of nineteen counts of insider trading, in connection with his sales of stock in Qwest Communications International, Inc. At trial, the defendant sought to introduce testimony by an expert who would have concluded that the defendant's trades were inconsistent with what one would expect them to be if the government's claims were true. The trial court ruled that this testimony should be excluded, because the defendant had made an inadequate disclosure under Rule 16 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, because the testimony fell short of the requirements of Daubert and Kumho Tire, because the testimony would not have been helpful to the jury, and because the proposed expert lacked personal knowledge of the facts that were the basis for his opinion. The Tenth Circuit rejected each of these rationales for exclusion and remanded the case for retrial before a different judge.

Summary of the Case

In 2000 and 2001, when the defendant was the CEO of Qwest, he assured investors that the company was on track to meet its public guidance statements. At the same time, he received internal reports regarding sales and revenue that may have made it unlikely that the company would perform that well. During this period, the defendant sold over a million shares of Qwest stock. A few months after he made these sales, the company was forced to lower its guidance statements and the stock lost half its value. These sales are the basis of the government's charge that the defendant was trading on inside information. The defendant argued that a full understanding of the context of his sales would prove otherwise.

At trial, the defendant filed a Rule 16 disclosure describing the experts qualifications as an academic, his research and teaching in law and finance, and his previous experience consulting and testifying. It gave a "Summary of Opinions and Bases for Opinions," explained that the expert had conducted a "study of the Questioned Sales in relation to various benchmarks," and provided his opinion that the defendant's sales were inconsistent with what one would expect them to be if the government's claims were true. It stated that the expert had studied stock data and assorted public information and stock analysis and had concluded that Qwest's stock price was not significantly affected when the allegedly material information was released.

The trial court rejected the experts testimony on the basis of that Rule 16 disclosure, stating that the experts methodology was absolutely undisclosed in this expert disclosure. The judge separately concluded that the testimony would not be helpful to the jury under Federal Rule of Evidence 403 or 702, because expert economic analysis would "invit[e] the jurors to abandon their own common sense and common experience and succumb to this expert's credentials." In addition, the judge concluded that the expert did not have personal knowledge of the facts that formed the basis for his opinions.

The defendant was convicted. He appealed on a number of grounds, including the argument that exclusion of the expert testimony was erroneous and that the error was not harmless.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Rule 16, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure require a defendant under certain circumstances to provide to the government, upon request, "a written summary of any testimony that the defendant intends to use [at trial] under Rules 702, 703, or 705 of the Federal Rules of Evidence." Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(b)(1)(C). This includes expert testimony. "The summary must describe the witness's opinions, the bases and reasons for these opinions, and the witness's qualifications." Id.

For detailed analysis of Rule 16, see 25-616 Moore's Federal Practice--Criminal Procedure Scope, Discovery and Inspection.

Daubert and Kumho Tire. Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993) requires expert testimony to be based on reliable methodology. Kumho Tire Co. v. Carmichael, 526 U.S. 137, 119 S. Ct. 1167, 143 L. Ed. 2d 238 (1999) is commonly referred to as part of the Daubert requirements: it held that the explicit screening function that Daubert required the trial judge to carry out for scientific opinion testimony should be applied also to technical testimony based on the experts experience.

Rule 403, Federal Rules of Evidence. This rule allows the exclusion of relevant evidence if the trial judge finds that its probative value is substantially outweighed by various dangers, including the dangers of confusion of issues or misleading the jury.

Rule 602, Federal Rules of Evidence. This rule requires that a witness have personal knowledge of the subject of his or her testimony. It explicitly states that its requirement is subject to the specific provisions of Rule 703 regarding expert testimony.

Rule 702, Federal Rules of Evidence. This rule governs the admissibility of expert testimony, stating that it is admissible if it will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue.

For an overview of Rule 702 and related rules governing expert testimony, see 1-702 Weissenbergers Federal Evidence § 702.1, Testimony by Experts.

Rule 703, Federal Rules of Evidence. This rule permits an expert to base his or her testimony on information that is of a type reasonably relied on by experts in the field, regardless of whether it would be admissible in evidence.

The Tenth Circuits Decision

Rule 16. The Tenth Circuit paid particular attention to proper application of Rule 16, noting that the trial court may have confused the civil and criminal rules for disclosures related to expert witnesses. A Rule 16 disclosure must contain only "a written summary of any testimony" and "describe the witness's opinions, the bases and reasons for those opinions, and the witness's qualifications." Fed. R. Crim. P. 16(b)(1)(C). In a civil case, however, an expert's written report must include all of the data or other information considered in forming the opinion, all summary or supporting exhibits, and the compensation he was paid, as well as "a complete statement of all opinions the witness will express and the basis and reasons for them." Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(2)(B)(i), and his qualifications, R. 26(a)(2)(B)(iv). The Tenth Circuit noted that a comment by the trial judge that the criminal expert disclosure requirement is "pretty close to what is required in the civil area," was wrong, since the civil rule imposes broader requirements.

The Tenth Circuit held that the defendant's disclosure satisfied Rule 16. The defendant's disclosure listed the expert's opinions on several topics. It explained that the opinion was "based on" analysis of the defendant's trades, data on stock prices, executive options, and stock sales, and on analysis of press reports, analysts' reports and forecasts, and SEC filings. It also contained the reasons for the expert's ultimate opinions. It disclosed, for example, that he would have testified that principles of risk reduction and the pattern of the defendant's sales were inconsistent with reliance on adverse material inside information. Additionally, the disclosure described the expert's work at a law-and-economics consulting firm, his academic positions, his academic research, his previous experience as an economic consultant and adviser, and his curriculum vitae.

Daubert and Kumho Tire. The trial court, having ruled that the defendant's Rule 16 disclosure was inadequate, refused to permit the defendant to make arguments about the proposed expert testimony in the context of the Daubert and Kumho factors. The Tenth Circuit rejected that position, holding that the trial court did not have a basis for making an informed decision on whether the testimony satisfied the Daubert and Kumho Tire factors since the court chose not to hear testimony or to receive submissions on that issue in some other form. The trial judge's exclusion of the testimony was not proper in terms of Daubert or Federal Rule of Evidence 702, the Tenth Circuit held. It noted that in admitting expert testimony, courts are required to make "specific findings on the record" rather than rule "off-the-cuff." Dodge v. Cotter Corp., 328 F.3d 1212, 1223 (10th Cir. 2003) (quoting Goebel v. Denver & Rio Grande W.R.R., 215 F.3d 1083, 1088 (10th Cir. 2000)) (internal quotation marks and emphasis omitted). Courts must create "a sufficiently developed record in order to allow a determination [on appeal] of whether the district court properly applied the relevant law." Goebel, 215 F.3d at 1088 (quoting United States v. Nichols, 169 F.3d 1255, 1262 (10th Cir. 1999)) (internal quotation marks and further citation omitted).

The Tenth Circuit had not, prior to this case, considered whether the same procedural requirements apply before a judge excludes an expert. The court did not precisely resolve that issue in this case, however. It concluded that at a minimum it is an abuse of discretion to exclude an expert witness because his methodology is unreliable without allowing the proponent to present any evidence of what the methodology would be. The proponent bears the burden of establishing the admissibility of the evidence under Rule 702, but it must be given an opportunity to do so before the testimony may be ruled inadmissible. United States v. Nacchio, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 5702, *30 (10th Cir. 2008).

Federal Rules of Evidence 403 and 702. The trial court concluded that the testimony would not be helpful to the jury under Federal Rule of Evidence 403 or 702, because expert economic analysis would "invit[e] the jurors to abandon their own common sense and common experience and succumb to this expert's credentials." The Tenth Circuit rejected these conclusions. It stated that expert economic testimony is routine when a materiality determination requires the jury to decide the effect of information on the market and that expert testimony can properly ask jurors to abandon their own common sense, because Armchair economics is not the way to decide complex securities cases. United States v. Nacchio, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 5702, *35 (10th Cir. 2008).

Federal Rules of Evidence 602 and 703. The Tenth Circuit rejected the trial court's conclusion that "the bulk of [the proposed expert's] testimony is simply a recitation of facts which is improper under Rule 602." The trial court stated that the proposed expert did not have personal knowledge of Qwest's stock price, of the contents of analysts' reports, or of the guidance issued by other telecommunications companies. The Tenth Circuit noted that the expert disclosure said that the expert and his staff had reviewed Qwest's stock prices, the analysts' reports, and other data. That reflects personal knowledge. For example, in Bryant v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 432 F.3d 1114 (10th Cir. 2005), the Tenth Circuit held that Rule 602 permitted a lay witness to testify about the contents of a list of audit reports. Also, the Tenth Circuit has held that "[t]he standards [of personal knowledge] applied to lay and expert witnesses differ." Durflinger v. Artilles, 727 F.2d 888, 892 (10th Cir. 1984). Rule 703 "permits an expert to base an opinion on any facts or data, admissible or not, which are of a type reasonably relied on by experts in the particular field . . ." Id. (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). For these reasons, the trial court erred in treating lack of personal knowledge as a basis for excluding the testimony.

Comments

This opinion clarifies the fact that the procedural requirements for disclosure in advance of expert testimony are easier to satisfy in criminal than in civil cases. Also, for all cases, it shows that the Federal Rules of Evidence in general have a pro-admissibility orientation. With regard to expert testimony, this case provides a helpful reaffirmation of several basic points.

Practice Tip 1. Where complicated economic or business information is central to a case, jurors' experience with daily life and typical business transactions cannot preclude a role for economic expert testimony.

Practice Tip 2. The experts' knowledge of the facts that are a basis for the experts' opinion can come in a wide variety of ways, including reliance on otherwise inadmissible material so long as experts in the field would typically rely on it.

Practice Tip 3. Findings on the record for application of Daubert should be made both when testimony is accepted and when it is excluded.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored), a popular law school casebook.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

154 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on Gianocostas v. Interface Group-MA, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 2197

Grace V.B. Garcia on Gianocostas v. Interface Group-MA, Inc., 2008 Mass. LEXIS 132 (Feb. 26, 2008)

By Grace V. B. Garcia

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: The Supreme Judicial Courts decision in Gianocostas v. Interface Group-MA, Inc. illustrates a rare grant of dismissal on the ground of forum non conveniens and raises some issues for those who would travel to destinations where the standards for medical care might differ from those at home. In this commentary, Grace V.B. Garcia, examines the Courts analysis and offers some cautionary lessons to be drawn from the outcome.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Garcia, Grace V.B. Gianocostas v. Interface Group-MA, Inc. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Cautions for Selecting a Forum and, Perhaps, for Selecting a Vacation Spot

In Gianocostas v. Interface Group-MA, Inc., 2008 Mass. LEXIS 132 (Sup. Jud. Ct. Feb. 26, 2008), Massachusetts highest court, the Supreme Judicial Court, evaluated a forum non conveniens challenge to a negligence based case. As a result of its analysis, the court remanded the case to the trial court for an entry of dismissal based on forum non conveniens. It is rare for the court to dismiss a case based on forum non conveniens. This case highlights for practitioners the strong factual situation it takes for such a challenge to be successful. It also reminds all of us about the risks of traveling to foreign countries where the standard of medical care may differ, and reminds travel professionals and those who counsel them to be cautious in what they promise about the facilities and care in a foreign county.

Facts Make the Case. Plaintiffs, administrators of their daughters estate, asserted claims for negligence against a hotel in the Dominican Republic, and its related corporate entities, as well as negligence and negligent misrepresentation claims against a Massachusetts-based tour operator. With respect to the negligence claim against the tour operator, the claim was based on negligent selection, meaning that the tour operator had taken insufficient steps to ensure the competence of medical staff at the hotel clinic. Gianocostas, 2008 Mass LEXIS at *18 n.11. The claims arose after the plaintiffs daughter, a Massachusetts resident and insulin-dependant diabetic, died after receiving what the plaintiffs alleged to be sub-standard medical care while she was vacationing at the defendant hotel in the Dominican Republic on a trip arranged by the defendant tour operator. Specifically, the facts indicated that the plaintiffs daughter became sick on the second day of her week long vacation, was seen several times throughout the week by the hotels clinic and doctors, but the medical personnel did not test her blood glucose level for four days. At that point, the plaintiff was hallucinating and had to be transferred to the local hospital. Five days after first falling ill, plaintiffs daughter was transferred, through arrangements made by the plaintiffs, to a Miami hospital where she died a month later due to grossly deficient insulin availability.

The plaintiffs filed their complaint in Massachusetts and the defendants sought dismissal based on forum non conveniens, arguing that the Dominican Republic was the proper forum to hear and rule on the case. Several years after their initial motion, and after four other decisions in the case (Gianocostas v. Riu Hotels, S.A., 2001 Mass. Super. LEXIS 236 (2001) (allowing defendants motions to dismiss based on forum non conveniens); Gianocostas v. Riu Hotels, S.A., 59 Mass. App. Ct. 753, 759 (2003) (vacating the dismissal and remanding the case for a determination of whether it is proper to dismiss the case against the Massachusetts-based tour operator based on forum non conveniens and if so, whether the action should be tried together or separately from the Dominican hotel defendants); Gianocostas v. Riu Hotels, S.A., 2005 Mass. Super. LEXIS 12 (2005) (allowing the tour operators motion to dismiss for forum non conveniens with respect to the negligence claim, but not the negligent misrepresentation claim); Gianocostas v. Riu Hotels, S.A., 2006 Mass. Super. LEXIS 266 (2006) (denying the Massachusetts tour operators motion to reconsider dismissal and granting it summary judgment on plaintiffs claim of negligent misrepresentation)), the Supreme Judicial Court vacated the trial courts summary judgment decision in favor of the tour operator and remanded the case to the trial court for dismissal based on forum non conveniens.

Forum Non Conveniens Analysis. Generally, if the jurisdiction and venue are proper, Massachusetts courts rarely will dismiss a case on the grounds of forum non conveniens, an argument that the plaintiffs chosen forum is not the best forum to address the claims asserted. Kearsage Metallurgical Corp. v. Peerless Ins. Co., 383 Mass. 162, 169 (1981). If personal and subject matter jurisdiction exist, courts do not want to disturb a forum selection because it involves a decision to decline jurisdiction which is constitutionally permissible. Carlson Corp. v. Univ. of Vt., 380 Mass. 102, 109 n. 10 (1980). Forum non conveniens, however, is an argument based on a Massachusetts statute that provides for dismissal [w]hen the court finds that in the interest of substantial justice the action should be heard in another forum, the court may stay or dismiss the action in whole or in part on any conditions that may be just. M.G.L. c. 223A, § 5.

It is an exercise of the courts discretion and there is no universal formula that the courts apply in order to decide motions based on forum non conveniens. Universal Adjustment Corp. v. Midland Bank, Ltd., 281 Mass. 303, 316 (1933). In order to decide such a motion, however, a court must apply some general principles: whether justice is attainable in the offered alternative forum and whether the balance of private and public concerns favors the dismissal. Only if the interests strongly favor the defendants alternative jurisdiction will a court disturb the plaintiffs original forum choice. Id. at 315. It should be noted, however that both by statute and case law, as is seen in the Gianocostas line of cases, a court is not obligated to grant a full dismissal of an action on forum non conveniens grounds, but rather may choose to grant a partial dismissal of an action. Thus, a defendant who brings a motion to dismiss based on forum non conveniens takes a risk of defending the claims of a case in more than one forum if the court decides only to dismiss some claims.

Availability of an Alternative Forum. The moving party, or defendant, has the burden of proving that the alternative forum permits recovery for the type of case the plaintiff has asserted. Gianocostas, 2008 Mass. LEXIS at *20. It is important to understand, however, that the fact that the proceedings and remedies available in the foreign jurisdiction differ from, or are possibly less favorable [to a plaintiff] than, those in the Commonwealth does not render the alternative system inadequate. Gianocostas, 59 Mass. App. Ct. at 758.

In Gianocostas for example, the Supreme Judicial Court had evidence regarding the Dominican Republic as an alternative forum from six lawyers licensed to practice in the Dominican Republic. Although only four of them, by way of affidavit, stated that the plaintiffs could assert a similar action in the Dominican Republic, while the other two did not state that jurisdiction would be viable, the court found that the evidence was sufficient to find that the plaintiffs did, in fact, have an adequate alternative forum for their case.

It should be noted, however, that an alternative forum may not be available if for instance, the refiling of the case is barred by the applicable statute of limitations. This was a potential problem in Gianocostas and the court noted that its decision to remand the case for dismissal was conditioned on defendants waiver of defenses, such as proper jurisdiction and the statute of limitations, as well as the acceptance of such a waiver by the Dominican court. Such waivers are important because they can make alternative jurisdictions, which would not be technically available to hear the case, deemed available.

Assessing the Private Interests. The presumption in favor of a plaintiffs choice of forum may be overcome only when the private and public interest factors clearly point towards trial in the alternative forum. Gianocostas, 59 Mass. App. Ct. at 759 (quoting Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, 454 U.S. 235, 255 (1981)). With regard to private interests in the context of forum non conveniens, a case may be dismissed if the access to proof, the availability of compulsory process for forcing the attendance of an unwilling witness, the costs of obtaining attendance of willing witnesses, and the enforceability of any judgment favor another forum. Green v. Manhattanville College, 40 Mass. App. Ct. 76, 80 (1996); W.R. Grace & Co. v. Hartford Acc. & Indem. Co., 407 Mass. 572, 578 (incident occurred in New York and all witnesses and reports were in New York).

In arguing the private interests, the parties must focus on what the heart of the litigation entails. For instance, in Gianocostas, the litigation was going to focus on the testimony concerning the quality of medical care the plaintiffs daughter received while in the Dominican Republic, as well as her physical condition while receiving that care. The important witnesses, such as the medical personnel who were in contact or provided care to the plaintiffs daughter, were in the Dominican Republic. Such witnesses, who the defendants argued were vital, could not be compelled to Massachusetts to give testimony. In addition, the critical medical records were also located in the Dominican Republic. Thus, the court agreed that the defendants would be at a severe disadvantage in preparing their defense because the potential parties, such as the medical clinic and hospital, had no offices or employees in the United States, and thus the defense cannot join critical parties; cannot compel critical testimony, and they cannot obtain critical documents. Gianocostas, 2001 Mass. Super. LEXIS *21.

Assessing the Public Interests. The doctrine of forum non conveniens not only protects the interest of private litigants, but also is designed to serve the public interests. In determining motions to dismiss courts review public interest factors, such as the best use of judicial resources, the administrative burden the litigation imposes, and the interest the state has in enforcing its substantive law on the issue.

In Gianocostas, the court noted that the case centered on whether actions involving the care of plaintiffs daughter were negligent. Clearly, Massachusetts has an interest in keeping its residents safe while traveling, regulating the travel industry that conducts business in Massachusetts, and seeing that Massachusetts residents are compensated for improper conduct. In this case, however, the questions surrounding care, which were tied to the negligence claims, depended on the standard of care in the Dominican Republic. Therefore, the court found that, on balance, the public interest favored the dismissal.

Practical Implications for Practitioners. The Gianocostas line of cases presents to practitioners the considerations they should evaluate to both challenge a case, or oppose such a challenge, based on a forum non conveniens argument. Plaintiffs should file the case in the venue where it is most convenient and favorable to them, assuming personal and subject matter jurisdiction is proper. Defendants may move to dismiss based on forum non conveniens, but a defendant should know that despite the outcome in Gianocostas, it is a motion that the courts rarely grant and depends to a very great extent upon the facts of each case.

Therefore, prior to making a forum non conveniens argument, a defendant should take carefully outline the arguments that he or she would make to the court to dismiss the action. Then the defendant should determine whether the cost of going forward with a motion to dismiss on forum non conveniens is merited. Additionally, if the defendant decides to go forward with the motion, the defendant may want to consider offering to waive certain defenses if the motion is allowed, such as defenses based on the statute of limitations or defenses relating to proper jurisdiction in the alternative forum, to improve their chances to succeed on the motion.

Additionally, practitioners who represent those in the travel industry should advise their clients to be cautious in what they promise about the facilities and care in a foreign county, so as to avoid claims such as negligence and negligent misrepresentations. Moreover, this case can remind us all of the risks of traveling to foreign countries where medical care may differ from what we receive at home.

For additional discussion of forum non conveniens, see MA Pleading and Practice § 4.57 (Jurisdictional Facts). See also Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 111.70 et seq. (Analysis of Common Law Doctrine of Forum non Conveniens).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcia's practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors' qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

155 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joe McDonnell on Sabados v. Planned Parenthood of Greater Indiana

2008 Emerging Issues 2133

Joe McDonnell on Sabados v. Planned Parenthood of Greater Indiana, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1370 (December 28, 2007)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: The Appellate Court of Illinois, in Sabados v. Planned Parenthood of Greater Indiana, refused to permit an Illinois resident who received treatment out of state and later suffered injury and damage in Illinois to require the defendant clinic to appear and defend against her complaint. This commentary, written by Joe McDonnell discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: A Refresher On Long Arm Jurisdiction. Most lawyers will remember from their law school days Pennoyer v. Neff 95 U.S. 714 (1877) in which the United States Supreme Court first grappled with the concept of state court jurisdiction over a non-resident. Pennoyer, and the later equally-famous case of International Shoe Company v. Washington 326 U.S. 310 (1945), set the standards for the exercise of in personam jurisdiction, standards which remain essentially unchanged. On the basis of those standards, every state has created its version of what have become known as the long-arm statutes, which empower the courts of the state to reach out to non-residents and exert power over them to respond to legal process instituted within the state. Probably the most familiar example is the provision of state vehicle codes, stating in substance that the driver of any motor vehicle who is involved in an accident within the state consents to the exercise of jurisdiction over his or her person with respect to any suit for injury or property damage that might be filed as a result of the accident. The consent, of course, is a legal fiction; so far as is known, no driver has ever expressly agreed with the authority of a state to compel the driver to voluntarily return to the state to defend any suit that may be filed as a result of driving within the state. As is true of so many other legal fictions, however, the requirement is justified on public policy grounds as a reasonable trade-off, in the federalist form of American government, for the privilege of moving freely from state to state, for either personal or business reasons, and engaging in conduct within such state that results in injury or damage to another.

Besides the operation of a motor vehicle, there are, of course, other acts that may subject a non-resident to the jurisdiction of the courts of a state. In Illinois, those acts are codified in 735 ILCS 5/2-209, which lists a total of 14 different kinds of conduct that may enable a plaintiff to bring a non-resident into Illinois to answer the plaintiff's claim. 735 ILCS 5/2-209(a). Apart from the specific acts so listed, the court may exercise jurisdiction on any other basis now or hereafter permitted by the Illinois Constitution and the Constitution of the United States. 735 ILCS 5/2-209(c).

Specifics of the Illinois Statute. An important caveat: with respect to those acts enumerated in Section (a) of the statute (specific jurisdiction), plaintiff may assert only a cause or causes of action which arise from the doing of such act or acts. 735 ILCS 5/2-209(f). This is consistent with the theory behind the long-arm statutes: that it is the performance of an act within the state that justifies the exercise of that states judicial power over the person of the individual or corporation performing the act. Equally important, however, is the fact that, as to causes of action arising under the catch-all provisions of Section (b), plaintiff need only demonstrate that the defendants activities within the state met constitutional standards of due process for the exercise of general jurisdiction, even though no specific act as described in Section (a) was committed.

Whos Crossing Which Line? Sabados v. Planned Parenthood of Greater Indiana, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1370 (3rd Div. 2007) discussed both the specific acts basis of jurisdiction under Section (a) of the Illinois statute and the general jurisdiction concept under Section (b).

Plaintiff, an Illinois resident, had traveled four miles to defendants clinic in Hammond, Indiana, where she received a prescription for birth control pills. Returning to Illinois, and after ingesting the pills for two months, plaintiff developed a blood clot. She later filed suit against the defendant in Cook County, Illinois. The defendant filed a special and limited appearance, contesting the Illinois courts jurisdiction, and, after permitting limited discovery on the jurisdictional issue, the trial judge denied the motion to dismiss. On appeal, the judgment was reversed, the first district finding no basis under either Section (a) or Section (b) to find that defendant had subjected itself to the jurisdiction of the Illinois courts.

The appellate court initially pointed out that since the legislative amendment to the statute in 1989 creating the catch-all provisions for the exercise of personal jurisdiction over non-residents the exercise of such jurisdiction need only be consistent with constitutional guarantees of due process. This requires a showing that the defendant had minimum contacts with the forum state such that the exercise of jurisdiction over it does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. Slip op. 5 (citing International Shoe v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310, 316 (1945)). In addition, the action must arise out of the defendants contacts with the forum state to such an extent that it is reasonable to require the defendant to answer the complaint in that forum (citing Crum & Forster Specialty Insurance Co. v. Extended Stay America, 375 Ill.App.3d 654, 664 (2007)).

In arguing for affirmance of the trial courts order, plaintiff contended that the defendant had committed a tort in Illinois (Sec. 2-209(a)(2)) because the effects of the defendants wrongful conduct were experienced in Illinois. The court rejected this argument (characterized as the portable tort theory which originated with Gray v. American Radiator & Standard Sanitary Corp., 22 Ill.2d 432 (1961)), stating that the courts now focus on where the defendants services occurred, since this is the place of the receivers.need. Slip op. at 7 (citing Wright v Yackley, 459 F.2d 287, 289 (9th Cir. 1972)). Turning the rationale of long-arm statutes on its head, the court said that a plaintiff who travels out of state to seek personal services and then returns to her own state should expect to travel back to the state where the services were rendered in order to seek redress. Sabados, Slip op. at 8. Accordingly, the court found that the record failed to establish the requisite minimum contacts to justify the exercise of personal jurisdiction.

Plaintiffs argument based on the concept of general jurisdiction under Section (c) of the statute was equally unavailing. General jurisdiction, said the court, may be exercised only where the non-resident has continuous and systematic business contacts within the forum state. Slip op. at 10 (citing Illinois Commerce Commission v. Entergy-Kock Trading, LP, 362 Ill.App.3d 790, 796 (2005)). The Illinois Supreme Court has held that such contacts must demonstrate that the non-resident is present and doing business within Illinois (Braband v. Beech Aircraft Corp., 72 Ill.2d 548, 554-55 (1978)) on a basis not merely occasional or causal, but with permanence and continuity. Id. The relatively few Illinois residents who utilized the defendants services; the lack of any office facilities or services or sales performed in Illinois; and even placement of ads in several telephone directories in Illinois (amounting to mere solicitation) were insufficient to demonstrate that continuous and permanent presence required to justify general jurisdictional principles.

Tips for Practitioners. It is no longer necessary to file a special and limited appearance in order to challenge personal jurisdiction. Sec. 2-301 of the Code of Civil Procedure allows a party to object to the courts jurisdiction on the basis that the party is not amenable to process in Illinois, so long as the motion is made before the filing of any other substantive pleading. 735 ILCS 5/2-301(a). Where such challenge is made, it is the normal practice to seek leave of court to conduct discovery, limited to the jurisdictional issue. Counsel for all parties should strive to develop all facts relevant in arguing for and against jurisdiction, including the volume of business done, maintenance of offices or outlets within the state, the frequency of forays within the state, etc. Plaintiffs must focus on the nature and quantity of defendants contacts with the forum, and defendants on the lack of meaningful presence within the state. It is also a good idea for the defense to emphasize that it is basically unfair to require a nonresident to appear in Illinois to answer the complaint of an Illinois resident who came to the defendants state to obtain services in the first place.

For Additional Discussion on Long Arm Jurisdiction, see Illinois Civil Procedure Ch. 2, The Prerequisites To A Civil Lawsuit: Jurisdiction And Venue; Illinois Jurisprudence, Civil Procedure § 2:09 Jurisdiction And Venue.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnells trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

156 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Motion to Dismiss Burden: Vairo on Walk Haydel & Assoc. v. Coastal Power Prod.

2008 Emerging Issues 2138

Motion to Dismiss Burden: Vairo on Walk Haydel & Assoc. v. Coastal Power Prod.

By Georgene Vairo

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: In Walk Haydel & Assocs. v. Coastal Power Prod. Co., the Fifth Circuit provides guidance on what type of evidentiary showing is sufficient to defeat the motion and what happens to the plaintiffs burden if the court opts to conduct a pretrial evidentiary hearing on the issue of personal jurisdiction. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, analyzes this important case.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Walk Haydel & Assocs. v. Coastal Power Prod. Co., 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 2668 (5th Cir. Feb. 6, 2008), involves the correct procedures and burdens of proof for making motions to dismiss. The Fifth Circuit held that the district court erred when, on a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, the district court held the plaintiff to a burden above the prima facie level without holding a full evidentiary hearing. The case is important because it clarifies how the district court must handle motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction.

Background. A Louisiana corporation alleged third party claims against a Chicago-based law firm for fraud, breach of contract, and breach of fiduciary duty. The suit, filed in a Louisiana state court and removed to federal court by the law firm, arose out of an attempt by the Louisiana corporation and others to acquire a contract to build a power plant in El Salvador. The joint venturers had won a bid to negotiate the contract. The Louisiana corporation alleged that the defendant law firm agreed to provide legal representation for the joint venturers during this process. However, it further alleged that the law firm enabled another of its clients, which had become involved in the negotiations, to obtain the contract. The law firms motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction was met with a motion for discovery to support the Louisiana corporation's claims of general and specific jurisdiction. The district court denied discovery on general jurisdiction and almost all discovery on specific jurisdiction. After a hearing, granted the motion to dismiss, finding that the law firm was not subject to personal jurisdiction in Louisiana.

Usual Procedure: Plaintiff Presents Prima Facie Case. The Fifth Circuit began by reciting the applicable procedural rules: When the defendant disputes the factual bases for jurisdiction, the court may receive interrogatories, depositions, or other discovery to help it resolve the jurisdictional issue. The district court has discretion as to the type and amount of discovery to allow. But even if the court receives discovery materials, unless there is a full and fair hearing, it should not act as a fact finder and must construe all disputed facts in the plaintiff's favor and consider them along with the undisputed facts. At this stage, the plaintiff is required to present only a prima facie case for personal jurisdiction. Any greater burden such as proof by a preponderance of the evidence would permit a defendant to obtain a dismissal simply by controverting the facts established by a plaintiff through affidavits and supporting materials.

Application of Preponderance of Evidence Standard. Ultimately, the plaintiff must show by a preponderance of the evidence that jurisdiction is proper. Often, this is resolved at trial along with the merits. This is especially likely when the jurisdictional issue is intertwined with the merits and therefore can be determined based on jury fact findings. However, when the court holds a pretrial evidentiary hearing confined to the jurisdictional issue and both sides have the opportunity to present their cases fully, the district court can decide whether the plaintiff has established jurisdiction by a preponderance of the evidence.

Need for Jurisdictional Discovery. The hearing in this case was inadequate to justify raising the plaintiff's burden above the prima facie level. A pretrial evidentiary hearing is intended to serve as a substitute for the resolution of factual and legal disputes relevant to jurisdiction at trial. Accordingly, both parties must be allowed to submit affidavits and to employ all forms of discovery on the jurisdictional issue, subject to the district court's discretion. Furthermore, if requested by the parties, the district court often should convene a hearing and entertain live testimony. Here, the district court had substantially curtailed discovery, had not allowed any depositions, and had not allowed live testimony. Because the court had not allowed relevant discovery and had not held an evidentiary hearing to help resolve the factual disputes, it should not have held the plaintiff to a higher standard than a prima facie showing.

Comment. The Fifth Circuit has helped to unravel a mystery pertaining to personal jurisdiction. Ultimately, the plaintiff must be able to prove that personal jurisdiction exists. However, because that effort requires evidence, and our procedural system is designed to get to the merits of a litigation as soon as possible, the general approach is to rely on a plaintiff's prima facie jurisdictional case. If the defendant seeks to wage war with the plaintiff on a pretrial motion to dismiss, then the court must either refuse to dismiss if the plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, or, if it seeks to hold the plaintiff to the ultimate preponderance level, it must provide appropriate discovery and a trial-like hearing to resolve the issues of fact.

Specific Jurisdiction. Reviewing the dismissal on a prima facie standard, the Fifth Circuit reversed. The plaintiff had established a prima facie case for specific personal jurisdiction. The defendant's alleged formation of an attorney-client relationship with the plaintiff, a Louisiana corporation, was not by itself sufficient to confer jurisdiction. Nor would an attorney's visit to a state, by itself, likely be sufficient. However, minimum contacts existed because of those contacts as well as the defendant's alleged misrepresentations and omissions directed toward Louisiana, the forum. Once a plaintiff has established minimum contacts, the burden shifts to the defendant to show that the assertion of jurisdiction would be unfair. Here, because a cause of action for fraud committed against a resident of the forum was directly related to the tortious activities giving rise to personal jurisdiction, the exercise of that jurisdiction was fair.

Comment. Having established the correct procedure and standard, the Fifth Circuit engaged in a straightforward application of the alleged facts and correctly found that the plaintiff's prima facie case merited a finding of specific personal jurisdiction.

References. 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 12.31, 108.143[2].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moores Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

157 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Eli Wald on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel and Habeas Corpus

2008 Emerging Issues 2162

Eli Wald on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel and Habeas Corpus

By Eli Wald

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: In Wright v. Van Patten, 128 S. Ct. 743 (U.S. 2008) the Supreme Court decided two important issues. It clarified its ineffective assistance of counsel jurisprudence explaining the relationship between the general rule of Strickland and the exception promulgated in Cronic, and it explored the circumstances under which federal courts will defer to state courts interpretation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

In Wright v. Van Patten, 128 S. Ct. 743 (U.S. 2008) the Supreme Court decided two important issues. It clarified its ineffective assistance of counsel jurisprudence explaining the relationship between the general rule of Strickland v. Wash., 466 U.S. 668 (U.S. 1984) and the exception promulgated in United States v. Cronic, 466 U.S. 648 (U.S. 1984), and it explored the circumstances under which federal courts will defer to state courts interpretation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, studies both prongs of this decision.

Factual Background

Van Patten pleaded no-contest to a reduced charge. His counsel was not present in person at the plea bargain hearing but was linked to the courtroom by speaker phone. After the state trial court imposed the maximum term of imprisonment, Van Patten retained different counsel and moved in the state court of appeals to withdraw his no-contest plea arguing that his Sixth Amendment right to counsel had been violated by his trial counsel's physical absence from the plea hearing. Van Patten, at 744.

Procedural Background

The state court of appeals construed the applicable state law and denied Van Patten's post-conviction motion to withdraw his no-contest plea. After the state supreme court declined further review, Van Patten petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2254 in Federal District Court. The District Court denied relief, but the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit reversed. It held that Van Patten's Sixth Amendment claim should have been resolved, not under Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), which requires a showing of deficient performance and prejudice to the defendant, but under the standard discussed in United States v. Cronin, 466 U.S. 648 (1984), under which prejudice may be presumed. The resolution was in Van Patten's favor.

While the prison warden's petition for certiorari was pending, the Court decided Carey v. Musladin, 127 S.Ct. 649 (2006), construing § 2254, which bars relief on any claim adjudicated on the merits in state court, unless the state court's decision was contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established Federal law, as determined by the Supreme Court of the United States. 28 U.S.C. § 2254(d)(1) (emphasis added). Musladin's explanation of the clearly established Federal law requirement prompted the Court to remand Van Patten's case to the Seventh Circuit for further consideration. The remand order implied that the Court did not believe that the state supreme court unreasonably applied Federal Law and thus that the Court of Appeals had no grounds to grant a habeas corpus. A majority of the Court of Appeals panel reaffirmed its original judgment. The Court reversed.

The Pertinent Questions

(1) Under what "ineffective assistance of counsel" circumstances does the Cronin exception apply in lieu of the Strickland rule?

(2) Does defense attorneys participation in a plea-bargaining hearing via telephone constitute ineffective assistance of counsel per Strickland?

(3) Should defense attorneys participation in a plea-bargaining hearing via telephone constitute ineffective assistance of counsel per Cronin?

(4) Under what circumstances will federal courts defer to a state court's interpretation of the ineffective assistance of counsel clause of the Sixth Amendment?

The Decision

Strickland: The general rule of law regarding ineffective assistance of counsel claims. The Court held that Strickland generally applies to claims of ineffective assistance of counsel. Van Patten, at 746. Strickland states that a defendant who asserts ineffective assistance of counsel must demonstrate not only that his attorney's performance was deficient, but also that the deficiency prejudiced the defense. Id.

Cronin: The exception. The Court clarified that Cronin recognized a narrow exception to Strickland. Citing Cronin, the Court explained that a Sixth Amendment violation may be found without inquiring into counsel's actual performance or requiring the defendant to show the effect it had on the trial, in circumstances that are so likely to prejudice the accused that the cost of litigating their effect in a particular case is unjustified. Cronin, at 658. Cronin applies when ... the likelihood that any lawyer, even a fully competent one, could provide effective assistance is so small that a presumption of prejudice is appropriate without inquiry into the actual conduct of the trial, Cronic at 659660, and one circumstance warranting the presumption is the complete denial of counsel, that is, when counsel [is] either totally absent, or prevented from assisting the accused during a critical stage of the proceeding. Id. at 659.

Application in Van Patten

Having resolved the relationship between Strickland and Cronic, the Court turned to the facts of Van Patten and concluded that contrary to the approach taken by the Court of Appeals, Strickland applied to the case.

The Court found that its precedents do not clearly hold that counsel's participation by speaker phone should be treated as a complete denial of counsel, on par with total absence. The Court was willing to assume that a lawyer physically present in a courtroom will tend to perform better than one on the phone, but held that: The question is not whether counsel in those circumstances will perform less well than he otherwise would, but whether the circumstances are likely to result in such poor performance that an inquiry into its effects would not be worth the time. Van Patten, at 746. Pointing out that the state court of appeals held counsel's performance by speaker phone to be constitutionally effective, and having held that its precedents do not clearly hold that counsel's participation by speaker phone should be treated as a complete denial of counsel, the Court concluded that Cronic did not clearly control the case.

Rejecting the applicability of Cronic proved fatal to Van Patten's petition, because on the facts of the case he could prove neither element of Strickland. Van Patten, at 746747. The Court turned to Musladin and in summary fashion concluded that Because our cases give no clear answer to the question presented, let alone one in Van Patten's favor, it cannot be said that the state court unreasonabl[y] appli[ed] clearly established Federal law. Consequently, under the explicit terms of § 2254(d)(1), therefore, relief was unauthorized.

Analysis

(1) Circumstances under which the Cronic exception applies in lieu of Strickland. The Court held that the Cronic exception applies, that is, a petitioner may establish ineffective assistance of counsel without inquiring into counsel's actual performance or requiring the defendant to show the effect it had on the trial

. when ... the likelihood that any lawyer, even a fully competent one, could provide effective assistance is so small that a presumption of prejudice is appropriate without inquiry into the actual conduct of the trial. The presumption is warranted when, for example, counsel [is] either totally absent, or prevented from assisting the accused during a critical stage of the proceeding, Cronic, at 659660; or

. when there [is] a breakdown in the adversarial process, Cronic, at 662, such that counsel entirely fails to subject the prosecution's case to meaningful adversarial testing, id. at 659.

(2) Does defense attorneys participation in a plea-bargaining hearing via telephone constitute ineffective assistance of counsel per Strickland? The Court never decided this issue. Rather, it explicitly stated: Our own consideration of the merits of telephone practice, however, is for another day, and this case turns on the recognition that no clearly established law contrary to the state court's conclusion justifies collateral relief. Van Patten, at 747 .

(3) Should defense attorneys participation in a plea-bargaining hearing via telephone constitute ineffective assistance of counsel per Cronic? The Court previously decided that the presence of lawyers is essential because they are the means through which the other rights of the person on trial are secured. Cronic, at 653.

The Court of Appeals apparently read the presence of counsel in Cronic to mean the presence of counsel in open court. Van Patten v. Deppisch, 434 F.3d 1038, 1042 (7th Cir. 2006). The Court of Appeals explained that It is well-settled that a court proceeding in which a defendant enters a plea is a critical stage where an attorney's presence is crucial because defenses may be ... irretrievably lost, if not then and there asserted (citation omitted). Id.

Applying the Cronic standard, the Court of Appeals found that Van Patten stood alone before judge and prosecutor, without effective assistance of counsel. It reasoned that since Van Patten's counsel was physically absent, Van Patten could not turn to his lawyer for private legal advice, to clear up misunderstandings, to seek reassurance, or to discuss any last-minute misgivings. Listening over an audio connection, counsel could not detect and respond to cues from his client's demeanor that might have indicated he did not understand certain aspects of the proceeding, or that he was changing his mind. If Van Patten wished to converse with his attorney, anyone else in the courtroom could effectively eavesdrop. Id. at 1042-1043.

For the compelling reasons stated by the Court of Appeals, defense attorneys' physical absence from the courtroom during a plea-bargaining hearing renders him totally absent and prevents him from assisting the accused during a critical stage of the proceeding. Cronic, at 659-660. Consequently, defense attorneys' participation in a plea-bargaining hearing via telephone triggers Cronic and constitutes ineffective assistance of counsel.

(4) Van Patten's demise: form over substance. The state court did not agree with the Court of Appeals' interpretation of Cronic. It did not construe the presence of counsel to mean the presence of counsel in open court. To the contrary, it found that attorney participation in plea-bargain negotiations can be effective even if defense counsel is present only over the phone.

Unfortunately for Van Patten, the Court never got to assess the merits of telephone practice. Van Patten, at 747. As Justice Stevens, concurring in the opinion, explained, the question before the Court was not the reasonableness of the federal court's interpretation of Cronic, but rather whether the state court's narrower reading of that opinion was objectively unreasonable. Van Patten, at 747-48. To be clear, the Court was not asked to render its substantive judgment and side with either the Court of Appeals or with the state court. Furthermore, the Court was not asked to decide whether the state court's narrow reading of Cronic was correct or not. It only was asked to decide whether the state court's decision was unreasonable.

Justice Stevens clearly stated: I emphasize that today's opinion does not say that the state court's interpretation of Cronic was correct, or that we would have accepted that reading if the case had come to us on direct review rather than by way of 28 U.S.C. § 2254, concluding [A]n unreasonable application of federal law is different from an incorrect application of federal law (citation omitted). Van Patten, at 747-748.

To be sure, if Cronic had stated that counsel is totally absent when defendant is deprived the presence of counsel in open court (emphasis added), then Federal Law would have been settled per Musladin, Cronic would have applied to Van Patten's case and the Court would have sided with the Court of Appeals grant of habeas corpus. Alas, as Justice Stevens noted: in 1984, when Cronic was decided, neither the parties nor the Court contemplated representation by attorneys who were not present in the flesh. Van Patten, at 748. Because the Court did not consider the possibility of attorney appearance over the phone, it did not add in open court after the word present.

Justice Stevens concluded: An unfortunate drafting error in the Court's opinion in Cronic makes it necessary to join the Court's judgment in this case. Van Patten, at 747.

Technically, Justice Stevens is correct: if the Court in Cronic did not contemplate representation by physically absent attorneys, then per Musladin Cronic was not clearly established Federal law given the facts of Van Patten, and pursuant to § 2254 federal courts must defer to state courts' interpretation of the Sixth Amendment in this instance.

The outcome, however, is somewhat troubling. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals and the Supreme Court, at least according to Justice Stevens, would have found, on the merits, that representation over the phone in a plea-bargain hearing violates the defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel under the Sixth Amendment. Procedural form, however, took precedence over substance and the high level federal courts ended up deferring to a lower state courts interpretation of federal constitutional law.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

158 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Grace V.B. Garcia on Liss v. Studeny, 450 Mass. 473 (2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2191

Grace V.B. Garcia on Liss v. Studeny, 450 Mass. 473 (2008)

By Grace V. B. Garcia

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: In a decision that is a flashing caution light for all attorneys who use contingent fee agreements, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in Liss v. Studeny, 450 Mass. 473 (2008), affirmed the denial of an award of fees both under a poorly drafted agreement and also under the equitable remedy of quantum meruit. This commentary, written by Grace V.B. Garcia, examines the important lessons to be learned from this case.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Importance of Drafting a Clear Contingent Fee Agreement

In Liss v. Studeny, 450 Mass. 473 (2008), the Supreme Judicial Court affirmed summary judgment for the defendant, finding that the plaintiff attorney was not entitled to any payment for work performed on a contingent fee case because the contingency itself had not occurred and, thus, the expectation for payment was not reasonable. This case cautions attorneys to be careful in drafting contingent fee agreements so as to ensure that the terms clearly cover the attorneys expectations for payment.

The Agreement at Issue. In July 1998, plaintiff, attorney Liss, and defendant, Studeny, entered into a contingent fee contract for the plaintiff to pursue a wrongful termination claim. The contingent contract stated that Studeny shall not be liable to pay compensation otherwise than from amounts collected for him by [Liss], except as follows: Payments of [Liss reasonable] expenses and disbursements . . . ; otherwise None except from amounts collected. The contract also provided that Studeny would advance Liss money for expenses and disbursements and that [w]hen the balance of the foregoing advance is less that $500.00, [Studeny] shall pay to [Liss] a further advance in amount to be determined by [Liss and Studeny] at the time based upon an estimate of future expenses and disbursements to be incurred by [Liss]. Further, the contract provided that [f]ailure to pay said expenses and disbursements promptly upon request will constitute a material breach of this agreement by [Studeny] and will be grounds for [Liss] to withdraw from any pending litigation and otherwise to discontinue his services. Liss, 450 Mass. at 474.

As the case progressed, Studeny made certain advances for expenses. In April 2000, Liss requested a further advance from Studeny to prepare the case for trial. Studeny refused to advance further funds and Liss moved for, and was granted, permission to withdraw as counsel. After the motion to withdraw was allowed, Liss returned the legal files and the remaining $1,874, which had been advanced, to Studeny. Studeny then represented himself pro se at his wrongful termination trial and lost. Thereafter, based on the contingent fee agreement, Liss filed a complaint seeking $39,360 in fees. Among the counts he alleged against Studeny were breach of contract and quantum meruit.

Popularity of Contingent Fee Agreements. In certain civil cases, contingent fee agreements are popular among attorneys and their clients because they allow attorneys to assess, and accept, the risk that they will be paid from the outcome of a case, while a client may proceed with a case that he or she may not otherwise have been able to fund. Contingent fee agreements between attorneys and clients are subject to ethical rules and in most cases must be in writing. See Mass. R. Prof. C. 1.5(c). As with many contracts in which ambiguities are read against the drafter, any ambiguity in a fee agreement is construed against the attorney who drafted it. Cambridge Trust Company v. Hanify & King, 430 Mass. 472, 479 (1999).

Reading This Contingent Fee Agreement Against the Drafter. Contingent fee agreements, like all contracts, should clearly spell out the terms of the contract. In Liss, the attorney-plaintiff lost his $39,360 case because the terms of the contingent fee agreement did not support his position for either breach of contract or recovery under quantum meruit.

Liss argued that Studeny breached the contract when he failed to advance further funds to Liss to prepare for the trial. Liss based his argument on the requirement that Studeny would advance funds for future expenses and disbursements. The court, however, found that Liss's breach of contract argument failed for two reasons. First, the contract did not state that Studeny was required to advance funds whenever they were requested. Rather, the contract provided that such advancement would be determined by both Liss and Studeny. Second, the contract provided that the advancement of funds was only to be determined if the amount previously advanced fell below $500. At the time that Liss withdrew from the case, there was $1,874 remaining in funds previously advanced by Studeny. Thus, Studeny had not breached the terms of the agreement as they were written.

Liss's argument for quantum meruit also failed. At its core, quantum meruit is a theory of recovery that assumes that a valid contract covering the subject matter does not exist. Boswell v. Zephyr Lines, Inc., 414 Mass. 241, 250 (1992). It is a theory that allows one to obtain compensation for the reasonable value of his or her services, thereby preventing an unjust enrichment of one party and unjust detriment to the other party. Salamon v. Terra, 394 Mass. 857, 859 (1985). Often, discharged attorneys who had a contingent fee agreement use the quantum meruit theory to recover the reasonable value of their services because they generally do not have a right to recover fees under the contingent fee contract itself. Malonis v. Harrington, 442 Mass. 692, 701 (2004); cf. Opert v. Mellios, 415 Mass. 634, 636-7 (1993) (stating that there are some occasions when a discharged attorney may be able to seek compensation through the contingent fee contract).

To recover under quantum meruit, an attorney must prove not only that the attorney conferred a measurable benefit to the former client, but also that the right to recover under quantum meruit has accrued. Liss, 450 Mass. at 478. In Liss, the court found that Liss's preparation of the case provided a benefit to Studeny in that it allowed him to try his case against his former employer. However, [t]he fact that a person has benefited from another is not of itself sufficient to require the other to make restitution therefor. Liss at 479, quoting Keller v. OBrien, 425 Mass. 774, 778 (1997).

The problem Liss faced in recovering under a theory of quantum meruit is that although a party does not recover on the contract itself under quantum meruit, a court may look to the terms of the underlying contract to help determine appropriate recovery . . . Liss at 480. Thus, in Liss, the court looked at the terms of the contingent fee contract and found that a reasonable person would not believe that Liss would be entitled to any compensation unless he collected funds from Studeny's former employer. As that contingency did not occur, the court found that the right to recover under quantum meruit did not accrue because it would run counter to the reasonable expectation of the parties to require compensation where no amounts are collected. Id.

In affirming the general, although not absolute, rule that the contingency must occur in order to obtain quantum meruit recovery, the court noted that the rule was simply a function of practicality. Specifically, the court stated that an award in the matter that is the subject of the contingent fee contract would give a judge a basis from which to determine what a reasonable recovery for the work performed would be based on the result achieved. The court noted that, if the contingency did not occur, a judge would have no practical method by which to determine the fair and reasonable compensation for the work performed by the attorney.

Lessons for the Practitioner. Practitioners who use, or who contemplate using, contingent fee agreements must take care that the terms of such contracts are clear and that the terms cover all expectations that the attorney has for payment. The agreement must be in writing. In addition, the agreement should plainly state the method by which the attorneys fee is determined and how expenses and disbursements are to be handled. It is good practice to ensure that terms provide for payment under different scenarios, such as settlement, trial or appeal. Additionally, learning from Liss, it is important that the terms be definite, and leave no room for speculation, such as by providing (as Liss did) that the client will advance funds to be determined by the attorney and client. Rather, practitioners who want to ensure that such determinations are made by them should plainly state that in the agreement.

To protect themselves in the event that a contingent fee agreement is deemed unenforceable, it is also advisable that attorneys keep records of the time spent on the case in order to support a claim for quantum meruit. These time records will address the courts concerns, raised in Liss, about determining fair and reasonable compensation.

For additional discussion of contingent fee agreements, see Massachusetts Tort Damages 2d § 15-1 (Chapter 15. Costs, Interest and Attorneys Fees); Winning Through Settlement § 1.6 (Negotiating with Ones Client); Representing a Plaintiff in a Wrongful Termination Case § 4.35 (Enter into an Appropriate Written Fee Agreement with the Client); MCLE Ethical Lawyering in Massachusetts § 4.1.11 (Prerepresentation Contracts and Caveats); MCLE Ethical Lawyering in Massachusetts § 5.4 (Contingent Fees); Massachusetts Pleading and Practice § 8.58 (Complaint for Attorney Fees on Contingent Fee Contract Where Client Settled-Form).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

159 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Karas v. Strevell, Nos. 104123, 104133 (Feb. 22, 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 2192

Susan M. Brazas on Karas v. Strevell, Nos. 104123, 104133 (Feb. 22, 2008)

By Susan M. Brazas

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: In Karas v. Strevell, the Illinois Supreme Court considered an ice hockey player's claims against a member of an opposing team and against the youth hockey club and its officials, including a civil conspiracy claim. This commentary, written by Susan Brazas, explores the heightened standard for pleading applied in Karas and also addresses the assumption that only conventional sources of authority will be considered by courts.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Get in the Game: Illinois Supreme Court Raises the Bar on Fact-specific Pleading for Injuries Occurring in Full Contact Sports

In Karas v. Strevell, the Illinois Supreme Court addressed the standard for recoverable injuries sustained in the full-contact sport of ice hockey. The Karas court did not specifically overrule its decision in Pfister v. Shusta, 167 Ill. 2d 417 (1995), which defined the minimum standard for recoverable injuries in contact sports: that the injury resulted from intentional or willful and wanton conduct. The Pfister court had broadened the scope of the contact sports exception to the duty of ordinary care beyond organized sports to include unorganized, informal, and even spontaneous sports activities and games.

Instead, the Karas court articulated a new standard for liability for full- contact sports, which the court identified as including football and ice hockey: that the injury resulted from conduct which was either done with intent to injure, or which was totally outside the range of the ordinary activity associated with the sport. The Karas court acknowledged that this was a newly-defined standard for pleading, and thus remanded almost all counts of the plaintiff's action to the circuit court.

The Karas analysis is surprising in what it does not include: no explanation was given for distinguishing ice hockey from the sport at issue in the Pfister case, a spontaneous game of kick-the-can which the Pfister court likened to a hockey game. Further, no comparison was made with the First District's opinion in Savino v. Roberston, 273 Ill. App. 3d 811, 652 N.E.2d 1240 (1st Dist. 1995) (youth hockey league injury to player by fellow teammate during pre-game warm-up), or the opinion in Azzano v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 304 Ill. App. 3d 713, 710 N.E.2d 117 (1st Dist. 1999) (injury in daily game of killerball played at school recess).

Importantly, the Karas court also did not mention the seminal Illinois case on the contact sports exception, Nabozny v. Barnhill, 31 Ill. App. 3d 212, 334 N.E.2d 258 (1975) (injury caused by soccer league player kicking goalie in the head while he ran for the ball, although kicking ball in the penalty area was prohibited by game rules).

Practical Implications for Practitioners. It is expected that the Karas decision will be cited by defense counsel as a limiting precedent for actions involving other sports and even, perhaps, other non-sport activities and games that carry an inherent element of danger. The presence of opponents and the extent to which danger is volatile and potentially significant will be key to the extension of this standard to other sports or activities.

The fact that the court did not distinguish the cases cited above is also troubling for attorneys preparing for argument: they cannot safely assume that prior case law of the appellate courts, even when involving a sport or activity of the same type, will be given great weight by the reviewing court. In particular, these attorneys should be prepared to distinguish, or to argue the applicability of, a given case depending on the circumstances. A case that sets forth a different standard, even if it is from another jurisdiction, may be of greater interest than a case with a similar fact pattern.

Applicability to Non-Participants. The Karas court identified the question of whether the contact sports exception applied to non-participants as an issue of first impression. The Karas plaintiff named the officials' association and the youth hockey league as defendants, and alleged, among other things, a conspiracy between the two to not enforce the rules against back-checking. The Pfister opinion had not addressed non-participants, and instead held that the contact sports exception applied to participants in the sport.

The Karas court explicitly extended its holding, and applying the Pfister court's contact sports exception, stated that the full contact sports exception applies to non-participants. However, the Karas court added that when a non-participant is charged with failure adequately to enforce the rules in a full-contact sport, plaintiff must allege either (1) that the defendant acted with intent to cause the injury or (2) that the defendant engaged in conduct totally outside the range of the ordinary activity of coaching or officiating. This mirrors the Karas court's holding that participant liability in a full-contact sport requires that the plaintiff allege either (1) that the participant intentionally injured the co-participant, or (2) that the participant engaged in conduct totally outside the range of the ordinary activity of the sport.

Standards for Pleading. Of necessity, all complaints setting forth a cause of action for injuries sustained in a sport or sporting activity should specify as much detail as possible about the conduct of the defendant, and should spell out that this conduct was completely outside the range of the ordinary activity associated with the sport.

One interesting aspect of the Karas opinion is that it seems to broaden fact-pleading requirements to fact with detail pleading. The Karas court remarked that the plaintiff had failed to identify where the hockey puck was at the time of the alleged wrongful conduct. Although the plaintiff had specified that he was in the corner of the rink, next to the boards, was partially bent down and was struck from behind by the defendant, this was not sufficiently descriptive of where the play was occurring, noted the Karas court.

Nonetheless, the Karas court took the unusual step of striking, upon motion of the defendants, a portion of the amicus curiae brief of the trial attorneys group (ITLA) which advocated for change from fact pleading to notice pleading. Although the latter standard applies in federal courts and in several states, the Karas court firmly declined to jump into the fray. Noting that no party had raised the issue of abolishment of fact pleading, the Court stated that it was concerned only with those issues raised by the parties to the appeal.

More Lessons for Practitioners. The attorney pleading a novel or little-recognized scenario for recovery, or pleading willful and wanton conduct, is well-advised to spell out every possible aspect of the egregious conduct in the pleadings. If the setting is one unfamiliar to the average person, counsel should set forth precise details about all the circumstances of the incident to educate the court on the atrocity of the conduct. The Karas court has set the standard high for full-contact sports, meaning that counsel must include in the complaint all information about what the range of the ordinary activity of the sport is and about why the conduct alleged was totally outside of this range.

Implications for Argument and Briefing. Once again, as with several of its recent opinions, in Karas the Illinois Supreme Court relied on persuasive, rather than precedential, case law from other jurisdictions in its analysis. See, e.g., Porter v. Decatur Memorial Hospital, 227 Ill. 2d 343 (Jan. 25, 2008); Brucker v. Mercola, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 29 (Dec. 28, 2007); and Townsend v. Sears, Roebuck & Company, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1701 (November 29, 2007).

Indeed, the new pleading standard for full contact sports identified in Karas is adopted verbatim from a California case, Knight v. Jewett, 3 Cal. 4th 296, 320, 834 P.2d 696, 711, 11 Cal Rptr. 2d 2, 17 (1992). The Karas court does not identify the sport involved in the Knight case, but draws from a law review article in exploring the nature of the sport of ice hockey. The Karas court even went so far to cite to an out of state case which it acknowledged was factually distinguishable (a novice swimmer alleged that the team's coach had not properly instructed her to dive from a starting block into a racing pool). This cited case illustrated the Karas court's prediction, drawing from Pfister, that a flood of litigation (or, per a Connecticut court, a surfeit of lawsuits) would result if simple negligence were allowed to support liability for contact sports injuries.

Yet, it could be argued that the Karas court has drawn a clear distinction between full-contact sports and those which are less-than-full-contact sports, that is, contact sports. The Karas court noted that the Pfister court did not consider the appropriateness of a willful and wanton standard to full-contact sports. Perhaps the Karas court wished to emphasize the critical nature of this distinction by relying heavily on another jurisdiction's case law to define this new standard. In any event, counsel are urged to make a careful assessment of whether to argue that precedential Illinois case law renders moot alternative case authority, even if factually on point.

The continuing challenge for attorneys seeking a departure from established Illinois precedent is to locate, and argue the applicability of, alternative approaches from non-traditional authority. Law review articles on the subject should be offered, especially if the articles advocate a position based on a jurisdiction's plainly articulated standard.

Further, novel theories of recovery should not be overlooked. In Karas, the plaintiff pleaded willful and wanton conduct and civil conspiracy, and the Supreme Court acknowledged that the plaintiff could attempt to re-plead under these theories if the facts so warranted.

Counsel Must Educate the Court. The Karas court made its analysis of the wrongful conduct in question by drawing assumptions about the sport of ice hockey, including the assumption that dictionary definitions are adequate. Plaintiff had pleaded that the defendant had back-checked from behind, but the Supreme Court concluded, based on its reference to a definition in a 1993 edition of a dictionary, that the plaintiff must have really meant body-checked from behind. Much of the Karas court's analysis seems based on the court's assertion (and the parties' agreement) that body-checking is allowed in ice hockey.

Counsel would thus be well advised to cite reliable authoritative sources on the sport or activity in question to minimize the risk that the court might make mistaken assumptions about the sport and, thus, reach erroneous conclusions about the types of conduct that fall totally outside the range of ordinary activity. Similarly, counsel should consider carefully whether using sport jargon would predispose the court to conclude that the named conduct was to be expected and was thus within the range of ordinary activity.

For additional discussion of the contact sports exception and pleading requirements, see Illinois Tort Law § 14.03 (standard of care); Illinois Civil Procedure § 3.01 (pleading a cause of action).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

160 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Pleading Standards: Vairo on Phillips v County of Allegheny

2008 Emerging Issues 2137

Pleading Standards: Vairo on Phillips v County of Allegheny

By Georgene Vairo

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: In Phillips v. County of Allegheny, the Third Circuit sets out a framework for analyzing the sufficiency of complaints in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly. This commentary, by Moores Federal Practice Editorial Board member Georgene Vairo, discusses how the Third Circuits approach can serve as a useful guide for applying Twombly.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 2513 (3d Cir. Feb. 5, 2008), the Third Circuit finds that the United States Supreme Courts 2007 Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly decision did not replace established Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 notice pleading standards.

Facts and Procedural Background. After her son was murdered, the plaintiff sued various defendants alleging violations of her son's civil rights under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and also raised wrongful death and survivorship claims under state law. The facts were quite horrific. The plaintiffs son and girlfriend were killed by the girlfriends former boyfriend. The former boyfriend was a 911 dispatcher who had obtained confidential information about her new boyfriends whereabouts from his own use of confidential 911 information, as well as information obtained from other 911 workers. The district court dismissed all the claims under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). The Third Circuit found it necessary to pause here to re-evaluate our de novo standard of review in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) [discussed in July 2007 MOORES FEDERAL PRACTICE UPDATE, p. 149].

Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly. In Twombly, the Supreme Court held that the plaintiffs had failed to state a claim under § 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act. The plaintiffs had alleged that the defendants had engaged in parallel conduct, but had not pleaded facts making it plausible that the conduct was the product of a conspiracy. The Supreme Court also retired long-standing language from Conley v. Gibson [355 U.S. 41, 78 S. Ct. 99, 2 L. Ed. 2d 80 (1957)], that a complaint may not be dismissed unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.

Third Circuits Take on Twombly. The Third Circuits opinion illustrates the bipolar nature of the Supreme Courts Twombly decision. On the one hand, the Third Circuit notes that Twombly introduces a new plausibility paradigm for establishing the sufficiency of complaints. On the other hand, Twombly expressly indicates that it intended no drastic change in pleading standards. Even in retiring Conley's no set of facts language, the Third Circuit said that the Supreme Court did not appear to have believed that it was really changing the Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 or Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) framework. Rather, Twombly expressly restated the text of Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 as requiring only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief. Additionally, the Court reaffirmed that the purpose of the Rule 8 requirement is to ensure a statement of claims sufficient to give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds on which it rests. Further, the Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 standard does not require detailed factual allegations. Additionally, Twombly reaffirmed that the facts alleged must be taken as true and a complaint may not be dismissed merely because it appears unlikely that the plaintiff can prove those facts or will ultimately prevail on the merits. Nor did the Court speak to or appear to change the rule that reasonable inferences must be drawn in favor of the plaintiff.

Comment. By emphasizing how Twombly adheres to past understandings of Fed. R. Civ. P. 8, the Third Circuit clearly is setting itself up to limit the reach of Twombly. Although, the Third Circuit identified three new concepts in Twombly, the Third Circuit finds that the Twombly opinion is not as far-reaching as some commentators and courts have suggested.

Factual Allegations May Be Necessary to Satisfy Fair Notice Requirement. First, the Supreme Court elevates the importance of the word showing in Fed. R. Civ. P. 8. While a complaint does not need detailed factual allegations, a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions. A formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Rather, Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 expressly requires a showing, rather than a blanket assertion, of entitlement to relief. The plaintiff's factual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. While the Supreme Court expressly reaffirmed that Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 requires only a short and plain statement of the claim and its grounds, the new emphasis on a showing requires courts to more carefully analyze the facts alleged.

Accordingly, the Third Circuit creates another new concept to provide content to the showing requirement: the showing requirement requires a focus on the context of the required short, plain statement. In other words, context matters in notice pleading. Fair notice under Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 depends on the type of case and some cases will require at least some factual allegations to make out a showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the . . . claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. [Quoting Twombly, 127 S. Ct. at 1964, 167 L. Ed. 2d at 940.] The Third Circuit then found that Twombly and the Court's contemporaneous opinion in Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081 (2007), in which the Court took a more liberal approach to a pro se complaint, instructed that situations may arise where the factual detail in a complaint is so undeveloped that it does not provide a defendant the type of fair notice of claim that Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 contemplates. Put another way, in light of Twombly, Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) requires a "showing" rather than a blanket assertion of an entitlement to relief. The Third Circuit cautioned that without some factual allegations in the complaint, a claimant cannot satisfy the requirement that he or she has provided not only fair notice, but also the grounds on which the claim rests.

Comment. Whether the Third Circuit's notion that looking at the context of the claim will help determine whether the plaintiff has made a sufficient showing to satisfy Fed. R. Civ. P. 8's fair notice requirement remains to be seen. However, it is a sensible approach, and provides a good segue to the plausibility standard, discussed below, enunciated by the Supreme Court in Twombly.

Rejection of Conley Language. Second, the Supreme Court clearly disavowed indeed retired the no set of facts language from Conley. That formulation may no longer be used as part of the Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) standard. The Supreme Court, the Third Circuit said, appears to have rejected a hyper-literal understanding of Conley's language. The no set of facts language could, in isolation, be read as saying that any statement revealing the theory of the claim will suffice unless its factual impossibility may be shown on the face of the pleadings. Thus, a wholly conclusory statement of the claim would survive a motion to dismiss whenever the pleading left open the possibility that a plaintiff might later establish some set of undisclosed facts to support recovery. The Supreme Court emphasized, however, that it was neither demanding a heightened pleading of specifics nor imposing a probability requirement.

Accordingly, under the Third Circuit's reading, the notice pleading standard of Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 remains intact, and courts may generally state and apply the Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) standard, attentive to context and a showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, sufficient to give the defendant fair notice. It remains an acceptable statement of the Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) standard that courts accept all factual allegations as true, construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and determine whether, under any reasonable reading of the complaint, the plaintiff may be entitled to relief.

Plausibility Standard Not Limited to Antitrust Cases. The third, and most difficult, new concept the Third Circuit wrestled with is the plausibility standard enunciated in Twombly. Arguably, Twombly did not apply in the context of the civil rights case before the Third Circuit. The certiorari petition in Twombly involved the question of pleading in antitrust cases. Nonetheless, as suggested in our analysis of Twombly [discussed in July 2007 MOORES FEDERAL PRACTICE UPDATE, p. 149], the Third Circuit concluded that this aspect of Twombly applies to the Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) standard in general and is not limited to antitrust cases. The numerous references to plausibility in Twombly, the Third Circuit said, seem to counsel reliance on the concept as a standard for notice pleading generally. Yet the Twombly decision repeatedly indicated that the Court was not adopting or applying a heightened pleading standard. We are not alone in finding the opinion confusing. . . . The issues raised by Twombly are not easily resolved, and likely will be a source of controversy for years to come. Therefore, we decline at this point to read Twombly so narrowly as to limit its holding on plausibility to the antitrust context.

Comment. Given the somewhat confusing nature of Twombly, the Third Circuit would have been well within its rights to take a narrow approach to the plausibility element, rather than a broader reading. However, the Third Circuit is correct that plausibility is related to the Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 requirement of a showing. By adding the idea of context, the Third Circuit provides a way of understanding how to bridge from the showing requirement to the plausibility requirement. The concept of a showing requires notice of a claim and its grounds sufficient to show that the pleader is entitled to relief. That is, there must be some showing, given the context of the claim C be it antitrust or civil rights or whatever claim is alleged C sufficient to justify moving the case beyond the pleadings to the next stage of litigation. In other words, as the Supreme Court put it, it is not imposing a probability requirement at the pleading stage." Rather, the plaintiff must allege "enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of" the necessary elements of the claim.

Application. According to the Third Circuit, the complaint here clearly satisfied this pleading standard with respect to some defendants, by making a sufficient showing of enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest the required elements of the plaintiff's claims. Thus, the district court erred in dismissing these claims. With respect to other defendants, there was no error in the dismissal. However, a district court must provide a plaintiff an opportunity to amend (in the Third Circuit, even if the pleader does not request it) unless an amendment would be inequitable or futile. So, all these claims were remanded to allow repleading. With respect to a third group of defendants, remand was unnecessary as the plaintiff could not plead a valid case against them and so repleading would be futile.

Conclusion. The Third Circuit opinion nicely blends the Supreme Courts new pleading concepts with its own. This blend provides a tool that should result in Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 and Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) being applied in the way that the framers of notice pleading originally intended. Certainly, the framers did not intend plaintiffs to be able to come into court and simply say they were injured by a particular defendant. Rather, by requiring a showing they intended that enough information be provided to defendants to justify moving to the discovery stage of litigation, which, as we all know, is the real ballgame.

The context idea provides the district judge with a way of determining whether the plaintiff has pleaded enough to move forward. While preparing the complaint, plaintiffs attorneys need to keep in mind that they need to plead enough facts to provide the district judge with the context for determining that the discovery plaintiff seeks will be worthwhile. The danger from the plaintiffs perspective is that the Third Circuit, like the Supreme Court, may be giving the courts some ability to engage in a cost benefit approach to whether a case will be allowed to live on.

References. 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 8.04, 12.34; 1 Federal Litigation Guide 1.34.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

161 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Discovery Sanctions: Vairo on Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp.

2008 Emerging Issues 2123

Discovery Sanctions: Georgene Vairo on Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp.

By Georgene Vairo

April 16, 2008

SUMMARY: This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author and editor of several books including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, outlines the courts reasoning in awarding high sanctions and notes the relationship between retained and corporate attorneys when conducting broad e-discovery.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp., -- F.R.D. -, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 911 (S.D. Cal. Jan. 7, 2008), is a high-profile patent infringement case in which a magistrate judge imposed one of the highest monetary discovery sanctions awards ever, as well as serious non-economic sanctions. The sanctions order raises serious questions about the problems associated with conducting broad electronic discovery in large business organizations and in large complex cases, the relationship between inside and outside counsel conducting such discovery, the sanctioning power of the court, and the role ethical considerations should play in e-discovery. However, the district court vacated the magistrate judge's order, holding that the outside counsel ought to have been allowed to pierce the attorney-client privilege to defend themselves. Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp., -- F.R.D. -, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16897 (S.D. Cal. March 5, 2008).

Sanctions Imposed by Magistrate Judge. The magistrate judge in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California sanctioned both a party and its counsel when it was discovered through trial testimony that the party failed to disclose thousands of e-mails and other documents relevant to the case. The court ordered the plaintiff to pay all the defendant's attorneys' fees and costs, $8.5 million, for "monumental and intentional discovery violation." In addition, the court found that six Qualcomm attorneys engaged in "intentionally hiding or recklessly ignoring relevant documents... and blindly accepting Qualcomm's unsupported assurances that its document search was adequate." The court ordered the six attorneys to submit to state ethics authorities, and ordered Qualcomm's legal department to engage in a comprehensive internal investigation of its discovery practices, and to report its findings and recommendations to the court.

Background. Qualcomm filed a patent infringement action alleging Broadcom Corporation's infringement of certain Qualcomm patents. Broadcom filed a counterclaim alleging that at least one of the patents was unenforceable due to inequitable conduct. Broadcom also asserted the affirmative defense of waiver predicated on Qualcomm's participation in the Joint Video Team ("JVT"), a standards-setting body that created the H.264 standard, which governs video coding. The allegedly infringing products were based on the H.264 standard.

Over the course of discovery, Broadcom expressly and specifically had sought information about Qualcomm's participation in and communications with the JVT through a variety of discovery means, including requests for production of documents, interrogatories, and multiple Rule 30(b) deposition notices. As the case progressed, Qualcomm strenuously argued that it did not participate in the JVT during the time the JVT was creating the H.264 standard. This argument was essential to Qualcomm because if it had participated in the creation of the H.264 standard, it would have been required to identify its patents that reasonably may be essential to the practice of the H.264 standard, and to license them royalty-free or under nondiscriminatory, reasonable terms. Thus, participation in the JVT during the creation of the H.264 standard would have prohibited Qualcomm from suing companies utilizing the H.264 standard.

After trial had commenced, and while preparing Qualcomm witness Viji Raveendran to testify, one of Qualcomm's attorneys discovered an August 6, 2002 email to this witness, welcoming her to the mailing list for the JVT. Several days later, the attorney and Raveendran searched her computer and discovered 21 other emails from the JVT mailing list, none of which Qualcomm had produced in discovery. Raveendran had maintained them on her computer for more than four years. The Qualcomm trial team decided not to produce these newly discovered emails to Broadcom, later claiming they were not responsive to Broadcom's discovery requests. Furthermore, the trial team failed to conduct any investigation to determine whether there were more emails from the JVT team to Qualcomm employees during the period the H.264 standard was being developed. In addition, one of Qualcomm's attorneys argued in a sidebar discussion against admission of the JVT email list, stating to the judge, "there's no evidence that any email was actually sent to this list."

During Raveendran's direct testimony, Qualcomm's attorney pointedly did not ask her any questions that would reveal the fact that she had received any of the 21 emails. Rather, he asked whether she had "any knowledge of having read" any emails from the mailing list. But on cross-examination, Broadcom's attorney asked the right question and Raveendran was forced to admit that she had received emails from the mailing list. Immediately following this admission, in response to Broadcom's request for the emails, and despite the fact that he had participated in the decision three days earlier not to produce them, another Qualcomm lawyer told the Court at sidebar: "[I]t's not clear to me [the emails are] responsive to anything. So that's something that needs to be determined before they would be produced .. I'm talking about whether they were actually requested in discovery.. . I'm simply representing that I haven't seen [the emails], and [whether Broadcom requested them] hasn't been determined." Nevertheless, during the lunch break that day, Qualcomm produced the 21 emails.

At the conclusion of the trial, the trial judge found "by clear and convincing evidence that Qualcomm, its employees, and its witnesses actively organized and/or participated in a plan to profit heavily by (1) wrongfully concealing the patents-in-suit while participating in the JVT and then (2) actively hiding this concealment from the Court, the jury, and opposing counsel during the present litigation." The judge also found that Qualcomm's attorneys participated "in an organized program of litigation misconduct and concealment throughout discovery, trial, and post-trial." The trial judge granted Broadcom's motion of an award of attorney's fees and litigation costs reasonably incurred by Broadcom in the defense of this case.

Following trial, Qualcomm continued to dispute the relevancy and responsiveness of the 21 emails. Qualcomm also resisted Broadcom's efforts to determine the scope of Qualcomm's discovery violations. However, Qualcomm's outside attorneys and its General Counsel eventually admitted to the trial judge that Qualcomm had searched the email archives of twenty-one employees and had located more than forty-six thousand documents (totaling more than three hundred thousand pages), which had been requested but not produced in discovery. They also noted that their review of these documents "revealed facts that appear to be inconsistent with certain arguments" made on Qualcomm's behalf at trial. Counsel apologized "for not having discovered these documents sooner and for asserting positions that [they] would not have taken had [they] known of the existence of these documents."

Broadcom made a motion for discovery sanctions, which the trial judge referred to the magistrate judge.

Authority for Imposition of Sanctions. The magistrate judge began by discussing the sources of its authority to award sanctions. Rule 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure authorizes a party to file a motion to compel an opponent to comply with a discovery request when the opponent fails to do so initially. The court is required to award reasonable attorney's fees to the prevailing party in such a motion, unless the court finds that the losing party's position was "substantially justified" or other circumstances make such an award unjust. Depending on the circumstances, the court may require the attorney, the client, or both to pay the awarded fees [see Fed. R. Civ. P. 37(a)]. If the court grants a discovery motion and the losing party fails to comply with the order, the court may impose additional sanctions against that party [see Fed. R. Civ. P. 37(b)].

Discovery sanctions are also available under Rule 26(g), which provides that an attorney must certify that "to the best of the signer's knowledge, information, and belief, formed after a reasonable inquiry, the request, response, or objection is: consistent with the rules and law, not interposed for an improper purpose, and not unreasonable or unduly burdensome or expensive." If an attorney makes an incorrect certification without substantial justification, the court must sanction the attorney, party, or both and the sanction may include an award of reasonable attorney's fees. If a party, without substantial justification, fails to amend a prior response to discovery as required by Rule 26(e)(2), the court may also impose sanctions.

Finally, in addition to this rule-based authority, federal courts have inherent power to sanction litigants to prevent abuse of the judicial process.

Limits on Broadcom's Remedies Under Rules 37 and 26. Qualcomm argued that Broadcom was not entitled to sanctions under Rule 37(a) or (b) because Broadcom never filed a motion to compel. The magistrate judge noted that Broadcom had no reason to file a motion to compel because Qualcomm produced documents and answered interrogatories (even though falsely and incompletely). Unfortunately for Broadcom, nonetheless, the failure to file a motion to compel did restrict Broadcom's remedies to sanctions other than those available under Rule 37(a) and (b). Furthermore, Rule 26(g) only imposes liability on the attorney who signed the discovery request or response. Under a strict interpretation of the rules, the only attorney who could be held responsible for the discovery failure was the sole attorney who signed the false discovery responses. However, numerous Qualcomm attorneys were involved in the discovery proceedings in this case. Moreover, Qualcomm's suppression of the documents actually put its retained attorneys in a better legal position than they would have been in if Qualcomm had refused to produce the documents and Broadcom had been forced to compel their production.

Comment. The magistrate judge rightly criticized Qualcomm's gamesmanship. Why should Broadcom file a motion to compel when Qualcomm had agreed to produce the documents? As a practical matter, Qualcomm's argument would require the filing of prophylactic motions to compel to preserve their rights in case the other side hides documents. Fortunately for the wronged party, there are other sanctions mechanisms that provide a remedy without the filing of such motion. Those mechanisms were used by the court to exact onerous sanctions on Qualcomm and some of its attorneys.

Duty of Good Faith Discovery. Citing the Advisory Committee Note to the 1983 amendment to Rule 26, the magistrate judge read into Rule 26(g) a duty to respond to discovery in good faith. [See Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 Advisory Committee Notes (1983 Amendment) (Rule 26(g) imposes an affirmative duty to engage in pretrial discovery in a responsible manner that is consistent with the spirit and purposes of Rules 26 through 37)]. This duty is heightened in this age of electronic discovery when attorneys may not physically touch and read every document within the client's custody and control. The magistrate judge opined that this "good faith requirement" falls heavily on the attorney, who should ensure that clients conduct a comprehensive and appropriate document search. Producing 1.2 million pages of marginally relevant documents while hiding 46,000 critically important ones does not constitute good faith and does not satisfy either the client's or the attorney's discovery obligations. The court concluded that Qualcomm intentionally withheld tens of thousands of decisive documents from its opponent in an effort to win this case and gain a strategic business advantage over Broadcom. Qualcomm could not have achieved this goal without some type of assistance or deliberate ignorance from its attorneys. Accordingly, the magistrate judge concluded that it should sanction both Qualcomm and some of its retained attorneys under its inherent power.

Comment. The magistrate judge later correctly stated that the applicable discovery rules do not adequately address the misconduct in this case. Rule 26(g) only imposes liability upon the attorney who signed the discovery request or response. Similarly, Rule 37(a) authorizes sanctions against a party or attorney only if a motion to compel is filed; Rule 37(b) authorizes sanctions against a party or an if the party fails to comply with a discovery order; and Rule 37(c) only imposes liability upon a party for the party's failure to comply with various discovery obligations. Under a strict interpretation of these rules, only one attorney would be responsible for the discovery failure because he signed the false discovery responses. However, the magistrate judge read into Rule 26(g) and the federal rules "a duty of good faith and reasonable inquiry on all attorneys involved in litigation who rely on discovery responses executed by another attorney." The court warned that attorneys may not use inadequate or misleading discovery responses to present false and unsupported legal arguments. Additionally, given the egregious conduct in this case, the facts of the Qualcomm case also justified the imposition of sanctions against all attorneys involved in the suppression of relevant e-discovery pursuant to the Court's inherent power.

How (Not) to Comply with Good Faith Duties Part One: The Corporation. The magistrate judge distinguished between the conduct of the corporation and the retained attorneys. First, it found that Qualcomm had violated its discovery obligations by failing to produce more than 46,000 emails and documents that were requested in discovery. Further, Qualcomm did not establish "substantial justification" for its failure to produce the documents, or, indeed, any evidence attempting to explain or justify its failure to produce the documents. Despite the fact that it maintained detailed records showing whose computers were searched and which search terms were used, Qualcomm did not present any evidence establishing that it searched for the relevant records or emails on its computer system or email databases, or that it searched the computers or email databases of the individuals who testified on its behalf at trial or in depositions. Failing to perform these basic searches at any time before the completion of trial indicated that Qualcomm intentionally withheld the documents. Once the documents surfaced, it still did not produce them, and instead, opposed Broadcom's efforts to obtain the documents.

Additionally, Qualcomm's claim of inadvertence was belied by the massive volume and direct relevance of the suppressed documents. It was inexplicable that it was able to locate the documents that either supported, or did not harm its arguments, but was unable to locate the documents that hurt its arguments. The bottom line for the court: it was "inconceivable that Qualcomm was unaware of its involvement in the JVT and of the existence of these documents."

Finally, Qualcomm failed to heed several warning signs that should have alerted it to the fact that its document search and production were inadequate. For example, with respect to the depositions of two employees, Irvine and Ludwin, testifying as the Qualcomm employee most knowledgeable about its involvement in the JVT, Qualcomm did not search either person's computer for JVT documents, did not provide either person with relevant JVT documents to review, and did not make any other efforts to ensure each person was in fact knowledgeable about Qualcomm "s JVT involvement. When a witness is testifying as an organization's most knowledgeable person on a specific subject, the organization has an obligation to conduct a reasonable investigation and review to ensure that the witness does possess the organization's knowledge. The magistrate judge concluded that Qualcomm intentionally withheld tens of thousands of decisive documents from its opponent in an effort to win a case and to gain a strategic business advantage over Broadcom.

Comment. Beyond the obvious wrongdoing and willful inadvertence, so to speak, the opinion provides a primer on how to conduct proper discovery. It states: "An adequate investigation should include an analysis of the sufficiency of the document search and, when electronic documents are involved, an analysis of the sufficiency of the search terms and locations. In the instant case, a reasonable inquiry should have included using the JVT, avc and H.264 search terms and searching the computers of Raveendran, Irvine, Ludwin (and other Qualcomm employees identified in the emails discovered on the computers of these witnesses). This minimal inquiry would have revealed the existence of the suppressed documents. Moreover, the fact that Broadcom alleged, and Qualcomm agreed or acquiesced, that Irvine was not sufficiently knowledgeable about Qualcomm's JVT involvement or adequately prepared for her deposition, should also have alerted Qualcomm to the inadequacy of its document search and production."

Additionally, the opinion neatly distinguishes between inside and outside counsel's obligations. Qualcomm had made self-serving statements that "outside counsel selects .. the custodians whose documents should be searched" and the paralegal does not decide "what witnesses to designate to testify on behalf of the company." Hiding behind retained counsel, or blaming the paralegal, does not relieve a corporate party of its obligations to the court. Qualcomm made no showing of any evidence establishing what actions, if any, it took to ensure it designated the correct employee, performed the correct computer searches, and presented the designated employee with sufficient information to testify as the corporation's most knowledgeable person. Hiding behind outside counsel was inappropriate also because Qualcomm did not present any evidence that outside counsel knew enough about the corporation's organization and operation to identify all of the individuals whose computers should be searched and determine the most knowledgeable witness. Most importantly, because Qualcomm is a large corporation with an extensive legal staff; it clearly had the ability to identify the correct witnesses and determine the correct computers to search and search terms to use.

How (Not) to Comply with Good Faith Duties Part Two: Retained Counsel. The magistrate judge did not spare the rod with retained counsel either. Rather, it found that Qualcomm could not have achieved its litigation goals without some type of assistance or deliberate ignorance from its retained attorneys. It began by questioning the assertions of Qualcomm's attorneys that they "innocently" failed to discover the intentionally hidden documents or even suspect their existence. The charge against outside counsel was not intentional concealment but willful blindness and tacit complicity in the client's discovery misbehavior. The Court discussed four scenarios that might explain outside counsel's role in connection with the client misconduct: 1) Qualcomm intentionally effectively hid the documents from its retained lawyers so that the lawyers did not know or suspect that the suppressed documents existed; 2) the retained lawyers failed to discover the intentionally hidden documents or suspect their existence due to their complete ineptitude and disorganization; 3) Qualcomm shared the damaging documents with its retained lawyers (or at least some of them) and the knowledgeable lawyers worked with Qualcomm to hide the documents and all evidence of Qualcomm's early involvement in the JVT; or 4) while Qualcomm did not tell the retained lawyers about the damaging documents and evidence, the lawyers suspected there was additional evidence or information but chose to ignore the evidence and warning signs and accept Qualcomm's incredible assertions regarding the adequacy of the document search and witness investigation.

The magistrate judge rejected the first two scenarios, successful client deception of the lawyers or lawyer ineptitude, as "inconceivable" given the impressive credentials of plaintiff's outside counsel, the massive nature of the non-production, and the numerous corporate employees involved in the misconduct. The judge also found no direct evidence showing intentional, knowing involvement by counsel in client misconduct. It thus held that the lawyers engaged in sanctionable misconduct under scenario four:

"[T]he Court finds it likely that ... one or more of the retained lawyers chose not to look in the correct locations for the correct documents, to accept the unsubstantiated assurances of an important client that its search was sufficient, to ignore the warning signs that the document search and production were inadequate, not to press Qualcomm employees for the truth, and/or to encourage employees to provide the information (or lack of information) that Qualcomm needed to assert its non-participation argument and to succeed in this lawsuit. These choices enabled Qualcomm to withhold hundreds of thousands of pages of relevant discovery and to assert numerous false and misleading arguments to the court and jury."

Comment. Retained counsel who choose to ignore evidence and warning signs that the client's document search was inadequate do so at their peril. The court emphasized that the attorneys failed to conduct a reasonable inquiry, under their "good faith" duty, to determine whether discovery responses were sufficient and proper. At the very least, a reasonable inquiry should have included searches using fundamental terms such as "JVT," "H.264," and the JVT's email list on computers belonging to knowledgeable people such as Raveendran and other Rule 30(b)(6) witnesses. None of the computers of the Rule 30(b)(6) deponents selected to speak on behalf of the corporation were searched for JVT-related emails until after trial. At the very least, before signing off on discovery responses, Qualcomm's retained counsel should have insisted on reviewing Qualcomm's records regarding the locations searched and the terms utilized.

Sanctions Imposed. The magistrate judge imposed monetary sanctions against Qualcomm, and referred some of the Qualcomm attorneys to the State Bar for further investigation. Qualcomm was sanctioned the cost of all of Broadcom's litigation expenses -- fees and costs -- in the sum of $8,568,633.24, with an offset to the extent it made payments to its adversary pursuant to the district court's liability findings. Because of the size of the award, the magistrate judge declined to impose a fine.

With respect to retained counsel, the court enumerated the sanctionable conduct of six of the attorneys responsible for the discovery violations, and specifically exonerated others because they were not involved in the suppression or could have prevented it. The sanctions imposed on the six attorneys, in addition to referral to state disciplinary authorities, consisted of a finding that "the Sanctioned Attorneys assisted Qualcomm in committing this incredible discovery violation by intentionally hiding or recklessly ignoring relevant documents, ignoring or rejecting numerous warning signs that Qualcomm's document search was inadequate, and blindly accepting Qualcomm's unsupported assurances that its document search was adequate. The Sanctioned Attorneys then used the lack of evidence to repeatedly and forcefully make false statements and arguments to the court and jury. As such, the Sanctioned Attorneys violated their discovery obligations."

More creative, however, was the magistrate's order that Qualcomm and the sanctioned attorneys participate in a comprehensive Case Review and Enforcement of Discovery Obligations (CREDO) program. This is a collaborative process to identify the failure in the case management and discovery protocol utilized by Qualcomm and its in-house and retained attorneys in this case, to craft alternatives that will prevent such failures in the future.

At a minimum, the CREDO protocol must include a detailed analysis: (1) identifying the factors that contributed to the discovery violation; (2) creating and evaluating proposals, procedures, and processes that will correct the deficiencies identified in subsection (1); (3) developing and finalizing a comprehensive protocol that will prevent future discovery violations; (4) applying the protocol that was developed in subsection (3) to other factual situations, such as when a client does not have in-house counsel, when the client has a single in-house lawyer, when the client has a large legal staff, and when there are two law firms representing one client; (5) identifying and evaluating data tracking systems, software, or procedures that corporations could implement to better enable inside and outside counsel to identify potential sources of discoverable documents; and (6) any other information or suggestions that will help prevent discovery violations in the future.

Comment. Unquestionably, the magistrate's opinion is significant and provides guidance going forward as to how retained and corporate attorneys must cooperate and undertake discovery to meet their good faith obligations. Indeed, the district court already has vacated the portion of the magistrate judge's opinion with respect to retained counsel, holding that the magistrate judge should have granted retained counsels' motion to pierce the attorney-client privilege. Qualcomm Inc. v. Broadcom Corp., -- F.R.D. -, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16897 (S.D. Cal. March 5, 2008).

District Court Proceedings. The district court noted that the retained attorneys had filed a Motion for an Order Determining that the Federal Common law Self-Defense Exception to Disclosing Privileged and/or Confidential Information Applies to the sanctions motion before the magistrate judge. The motion was denied. Thereafter, as discussed above, the magistrate judge imposed the sanctions on Qualcomm, some of its attorneys and six retained counsel. The district court, on appeal from the sanctions order, confirmed that the magistrate judge had jurisdiction to award the sanctions. However, it ruled that on remand, the retained attorneys should be permitted to pierce the attorney-client privilege on the grounds of self-defense. After Qualcomm refused to waive the privilege before the sanctions proceeding before the magistrate judge, it filed declarations that were critical of the retained counsel. "This introduction of accusatory adversity between Qualcomm and its retained counsel regarding the issue of assessing responsibility for the failure of discovery changes the factual basis which supported the court's earlier order denying the self-defense exception to Qualcomm's attorney-client privilege." Accordingly, it vacated and remanded the sanctions order with respect to the six retained attorneys.

The district court also provided ground rules for any further hearings ordered by the Magistrate Court. It ruled that the retained attorneys may defend their conduct by any procedures permitted by the Magistrate Court, including declarations, depositions and testimony of the retained attorneys as well as any other percipient witnesses. It also specifically noted that in the proceedings, the retained attorneys may not be prevented from defending their conduct by the attorney-client privilege of Qualcomm and its employees and representatives.

It also granted Broadcom the right to fully participate. Additionally, Qualcomm was provided the right, but not required, to fully participate in any further sanctions proceedings without any exposure to further sanctions of Qualcomm or any of its employees. The district court noted that the order with respect to Qualcomm was final and was, in fact, nearly fully satisfied. Finally, the district court noted that the magistrate judge's "discretion regarding responsibility and sanctions, if any, are not limited, either upwardly or downwardly, by the Order of Remand."

Comment. It is notable that the district court did not suggest that the magistrate judge was incorrect in originally denying the motion to pierce the privilege. Rather, changed circumstances dictated their right to pierce. Similarly, the district court's comment about the magistrate judge's discretion demonstrates that the retained attorneys are not necessarily out of the woods. Recall that the magistrate judge imposed sanctions against the retained attorneys after finding that they had failed to conduct a reasonable inquiry and had blindly accepted the client's assertions. According to the magistrate judge, they recklessly ignored relevant documents and numerous warning signs that Qualcomm's document search was inadequate, and they blindly accepted unsupported assurances that Qualcomm's document search was adequate.

It is also notable that the district court order goes beyond the usual situations where attorneys are permitted to pierce the privilege, such as malpractice suits, State Bar disciplinary proceedings, and fee disputes, to the introduction of accusatory adversity. In other words, once the attorney and the client start to blame each other, the court will allow piercing, which would prevent clients from gaming the system by pointing to the attorney while hiding possible wrongdoing of their own.

Nonetheless, it is difficult to predict what will happen on remand. The retained attorneys will get their full due process, but given the harsh tone, specific basis for awarding sanctions, as well as the meticulous recitation of the shortcomings of the six sanctioned attorneys, in the magistrate judge's sanctions order, it is questionable whether anything revealed in further proceedings will lead to their exoneration. Stay tuned.

References. 6 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 26.154; 7 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) §§ 37A.50, 37A.53.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon

Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

162 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Wald on Inadvertent Disclosure

2008 Emerging Issues 2026

Wald on Inadvertent Disclosure

By Eli Wald

March 18, 2008

SUMMARY: In Rico v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 42 Cal. 4th 807, 68 Cal. Rptr. 3d 758, 171 P.3d 1092 (Cal. 2007), the California Supreme Court explored the duties owed by an attorney who receives privileged documents through inadvertence to opposing counsel and held that a lawyer may not read the documents more closely than is necessary to ascertain that they are privileged. Once it becomes apparent that the documents are privileged, an attorney must promptly notify the opposing counsel and try to resolve the situation. An attorney who fails to meet this standard of professional conduct and makes full use of the privileged documents, causing irreversible damage to opposing counsel, may be disqualified. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, summarizes the pertinent legal issues decided by the Court, and offers Practice Tips and examples for attorneys.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Cite as: Wald, Eli Inadvertent Disclosure. LexisNexis Expert Commentary, (Insert date you accessed the document online).

Overview

In Rico v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 42 Cal. 4th 807, 68 Cal. Rptr. 3d 758, 171 P.3d 1092 (Cal. 2007), the California Supreme Court explored the duties owed by an attorney who receives privileged documents through inadvertence of opposing counsel and held that a lawyer may not read the documents more closely than is necessary to ascertain that they are privileged. Once it becomes apparent that the documents are privileged, an attorney must promptly notify the opposing counsel and try to resolve the situation. An attorney who fails to meet this standard of professional conduct and makes full use of the privileged documents, causing irreversible damage to opposing counsel, may be disqualified. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, summarizes the pertinent legal issues decided by the Court, and offers Practice Tips and examples for attorneys.

Factual Background

Defense attorney Yukevich deposed plaintiffs expert witness at the offices of plaintiffs counsel Johnson. A document privileged under the work product rule prepared by Yukevich found its way into the hands of Johnson. Yukevich argued that the document was removed from his file while he was out of the room; Johnson maintained that the document was accidentally given to him by the court reporter and the trial court found that Johnson came into possession of the document through inadvertence. Rico v. Mitsubishi Motors Corp., 42 Cal. 4th 807, 810811, 68 Cal. Rptr. 3d 758, 171 P.3d 1092 (Cal. 2007). Johnson admitted that he knew within a minute or two that the document related to defendants case, that Yukevich did not intend to produce it and that that the document could be used to impeach defendants expert witnesses testimony. Nonetheless, Johnson made a copy of the document and used it at the subsequent deposition of plaintiffs experts. Rico, at 811. As soon as Yukevich realized that Johnson had a copy of his privileged document, he wrote to Johnson demanding the return of all duplicates and moved to disqualify Johnson and plaintiffs entire legal team. Rico, at 813.

Pertinent Legal Questions

- (1) What action is required of an attorney who receives privileged documents through inadvertence?
- (2) What is the appropriate remedy against an attorney who fails to take required action following inadvertent disclosure of privileged documents by opposing counsel?

The Decision

(1) Action required of an attorney who receives privileged documents through inadvertence of opposing counsel. Regarding the action required of an attorney who receives through the inadvertence of opposing counsel privileged documents, the Court adopted a standard promulgated by the California court of appeals in State Comp. Ins. Fund v. WPS, Inc., 70 Cal. App. 4th 644, 656657 (1999) (hereinafter State Fund):

When a lawyer who receives materials that obviously appear to be subject to an attorney-client privilege or otherwise clearly appear to be confidential and privileged and where it is reasonably apparent that the materials were provided or made available through inadvertence, the lawyer receiving such materials should refrain from examining the materials any more than is essential to ascertain if the materials are privileged, and shall immediately notify the sender that he or she possesses material that appears to be privileged. The parties may then proceed to resolve the situation by agreement or may resort to the court for guidance with the benefit of protective orders and other judicial intervention as may be justified.

Rico, at 817.

The Court reasoned that the State Fund standard supports the work product doctrine, Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 2018.030, is consistent with Californias policy to [p]reserve the rights of attorneys to prepare cases for trial with that degree of privacy necessary to encourage them to prepare for their cases thoroughly Rico, at 818, citing Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 2018.020(a), and is necessary given contemporary practice realities of massive discoveries, under which a contrary standard could severely disrupt the discovery process. Rico, at 818.

Practice Tip #1. The Rico standard is an objective one. In considering whether a document inadvertently disclosed is privileged an attorney should consider:

- . Whether reasonable competent counsel, knowing the relevant circumstances of the litigation, would have concluded the document was privileged.

- . The extent and scope of review reasonably necessary to draw that conclusion.

- . When counsels examination of the document in question should have ended.

Rico, at 818.

Example #1. A document may reasonably be deemed privileged even in the absence of prominent notations of privilege or confidentiality.

Practice Tip #2. Under the Rico standard, an attorney must promptly notify opposing counsel that he or she is in possession of inadvertently disclosed privileged documents.

Practice Tip #3. The Rico holding holds attorneys to a reasonable standard of conduct when privileged or confidential documents are inadvertently disclosed by opposing counsel. An attorney has an obligation to protect his or her clients interests, but, under Rico, a lawyer should also respect the legitimate interests of fellow members of the bar in representing their clients.

Rico, at 818.

The Court found that Johnsons admissions and subsequent conduct demonstrated a violation of the State Fund standard. Johnson admitted he realized shortly after beginning to examine the document in question that it was privileged, yet he did not promptly notify Yukevich and instead made a copy of the document and used it to impeach the defendants expert witnesses.

(2) Appropriate remedies against an attorney who fails to meet the requirements of the Rico standard and makes full use of the privileged document. The Court explained that disqualification should generally be frowned upon as a remedy against lawyers violating standards of professional conduct because such a sanction interferes with a partys right to representation by chosen counsel. Rico, at 819. An appropriate remedy could be an award of monetary sanctions. Id. at 817. The Court reasoned further, however, that in circumstances where the offending attorney makes full use of the privileged information causing unmitigable damage to, and placing the other party at a great disadvantage, disqualification may be appropriate. Id. at 819.

Applying the rule, the Court found that Johnsons use of the privileged document undermined the defense experts opinions and caused the defendants irreversible damage; the Court upheld the disqualification order. Id.

Analysis

(1) When does an attorney know that a document is privileged? Rico does not explicitly address the question of when an attorney knows that a document is privileged. Rather, the Court states: Once it becomes apparent that the content is privileged, counsel may immediately notify opposing counsel and try to resolve the situation. Rico, at 810. The Court does note, however, that the lawyer receiving such materials should refrain from examining the materials any more than is essential to ascertain if the materials are privileged. Id. at 817.

The Rico holding--not adopting a bright line rule regarding when a lawyer knows a document is privileged--is consistent with the approach taken by the American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Rule 4.4, entitled Respect for Rights of Third Persons, reads in subsection (b): A lawyer who receives a document relating to the representation of the lawyer's client and knows or reasonably should know that the document was inadvertently sent shall promptly notify the sender. ABA Model Rule 1.0(f) defines knowledge of an attorney to mean actual knowledge which may be inferred from the circumstances, ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct, R. 1.0(f) (2007), and Rule 1.0(j) defines "reasonably should know" when used in reference to a lawyer to mean that a lawyer of reasonable prudence and competence would ascertain the matter in question. ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct, R. 1.0(j) (2007).

Indeed, the Rico Courts promulgation of a standard to evaluate whether a document is privileged--cautioning attorneys against examining the materials any more than is essential to ascertain if the materials are privileged -- Id. at 817, is also consistent with the approach adopted by the ABA and other jurisdictions. See, ABA Formal Ethics Op. 92-368 (1992) (a lawyer who receives privileged documents inadvertently must notify the sender and resist the temptation to examine the materials further). See generally, Gloria A. Kristopek, To Peek or Not to Peek: Inadvertent or Unsolicited Disclosure of Documents to Opposing Counsel, 33 Val. U. L. Rev. 643 (1999).

(2) The appropriate remedy against an attorney who fails to meet the requirements of the Rico standard.

Courts faced with the problem of unringing the bell after inadvertent disclosure, see, Rico, at 813, have considered remedies ranging from ordering return of the materials in question to the sender and destruction of all copies in possession of the recipient, see, Resolution Trust Corp. v. First of Am. Bank, 868 F. Supp. 217 (W.D. Mich. 1994), to awarding monetary sanctions and to, in appropriate circumstances, disqualifying the offending attorney, Rico.

In Elkton Care Ctr. Assocs. LP v. Quality Care Mgmt., Inc., 805 A.2d 1177 (MD. 2002), the Maryland Court of Appeals explored the consequences of inadvertent disclosure and reasoned compellingly that the outcome must balance the violation of standards of professional conduct by the receiving attorney against the culpability of the sending attorney inadvertently disclosing the privileged materials. See, id. at 1184; CO Ethics Op. 108 (2000). See generally, Andrew M. Perlman, Untangling Ethics Theory from Attorney Conduct Rules: The Case of Inadvertent Disclosures, 13 Geo. Mason L. Rev. 767 (2006), striking the balance between assessing the conduct of inadvertent senders and receivers of privileged materials by arguing that receiving lawyers should have an affirmative duty not to read and comply with senders instructions regarding the documents if the senders notify the recipients that the documents were inadvertently sent before the receiving lawyers have read the documents. However, if the senders do not discover their mistakes, receiving lawyers must immediately stop reading the documents once they realize they are privileged but have the discretion whether to notify sender about their mistakes. See, id. at 796-816. See also, Michael J. Dileria, Note: Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(5)(B) and the Ethics of inadvertent Disclosure, 20 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 533 (2007) (balancing F.R.C.P. 26(b)(5)(B), which requires the producing party to assert its privilege claim before the recipient incurs any obligations, against ABA Model Rule 4.4 and ethics opinions which impose an immediate obligation on the recipient to notify the sender).

The Rico Court disqualified Johnson and did not consider Yukevich's inadvertent disclosure a mitigating factor, let alone a waiver of privilege, in assessing whether Johnson's disqualification was warranted. The Court's finding is explained by the extreme factual underpinnings of the case. While the Court did not find that Johnson rifled through and removed the document from Yukevich's file and instead found that Johnson came into possession of the document through inadvertence, Rico, at 812, it did find that Yukevich was at no fault at all. The document arguably came into Johnson's possession through the hands of the court reporter, Yukevich and his defense team inquired about the use of an unknown document by Johnson, id. at 813, and promptly upon learning that Johnson was using the document Yukevich demanded the return of all copies and moved to disqualify Johnson. Id. Thus, given the facts of the case, the Court did not fault Yukevich and did not consider his inadvertent disclosure a waiver.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

Expert Commentary is the title of this LexisNexis publication. All information provided in this publication is provided for educational purposes only and use of the term Expert Commentary is not intended to describe or designate the authors qualifications as a lawyer or in a subspecialty of the law. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

163 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Hedges on Proposed Rule of Evidence 502

2008 Emerging Issues 1989

Hedges on Proposed Rule of Evidence 502

By Ronald J. Hedges

March 5, 2008

SUMMARY: For the first time since 1975, the U.S. Congress is considering legislation, Senate Bill 2450, that would create a new Federal Rule of Evidence affecting privileges. If enacted into law, proposed Evidence Rule 502 would substantially change current law pertaining to waiver of the attorney-client privilege and work product protection. Ronald J. Hedges, counsel at the New York office of Nixon Peabody LLP and former U.S. magistrate, discusses the history, purpose, and potential impact of this important new legislation, which was intended to help cut rising litigation costs, particularly in the area of electronic discovery, as well as clarify inconsistencies in the common law pertaining to inadvertent disclosure and the scope of waiver.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: A sea change in the law of privilege and waiver may soon be upon us. That change will come should Senate Bill 2450 be enacted into law. S. 2450 is intended to address the waiver of the attorney-client privilege and the work product doctrine, and would create a new Federal Rule of Evidence 502. n1

Unlike other amendments to the federal rules of practice and procedure that take effect unless Congress acts affirmatively to modify, defer, or reject it, "[a]ny such rule creating, abolishing, or modifying an evidentiary privilege shall have no force or effect unless approved by Act of Congress." See 28 U.S.C. § 2074(b).

On February 27, 2008, the U. S. Senate approved S. 2450 by unanimous consent without amendment. The bill has gone on to be voted upon by the U. S. House of Representatives.

Overview. Rule 502 is intended to apply in the circumstances set out, to disclosure of a communication or information covered by the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection. Attorney-client privilege and work-product protection are defined in Rule 502(g)(1) and (2). Senator Leahy of Vermont, who introduced S.2450 on behalf of himself and Senator Specter of Pennsylvania, explained its purpose as follows:

Billions of dollars are spent each year in litigation to protect against the inadvertent disclosure of privileged materials. With the routine use of email and other electronic media in today's business environment, discovery can encompass millions of documents in a given case, vastly expanding the risks of inadvertent disclosure. [This rule] is aimed at adapting to the new realities that accompany today's modes of communication, and reducing the burdens associated with the conduct of diligent electronic discovery. n2

Senator Specter went on to cite the need to provide clear guidelines for when privilege is or is not waived, the desire to not allow an inadvertent disclosure to result in a broad subject matter waiver beyond what was disclosed, and the importance of protecting parties who enter into confidentiality agreements as motivation for the rule change. n3

Rule 502(a) provides that, when a disclosure is made in a Federal proceeding or to a Federal office or agency and waives the attorney-client privilege or work-product protection, the waiver extends to an undisclosed communication or information in a Federal or State proceeding only if: (1) the waiver is intentional; (2) the disclosed and undisclosed communications or information concern the same subject matter; and (3) they ought in fairness to be considered together. n4

Rule 502(b) concerns inadvertent disclosure: When made in a Federal proceeding or to a Federal office or agency, the disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a Federal or State proceeding if: (1) the disclosure is inadvertent; (2) the holder of the privilege or protection took reasonable steps to prevent disclosure; and (3) the holder promptly took reasonable steps to rectify the error, including (if applicable) following USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 26 (b)(5)(B). n5

Rule 502(c) concerns a disclosure made in a State proceeding which is not the subject of a State-court order concerning waiver. n6 The disclosure does not operate as a waiver in a Federal proceeding if the disclosure: (1) would not be a waiver under this rule if it had been made in a Federal proceeding; or (2) is not a waiver under the law of the State where the disclosure occurred. n7

Rule 502(d) addresses the controlling effect of federal court orders: A federal court may order that the privilege or protection is not waived by disclosure connected with the litigation pending before the Court in which event the disclosure is also not a waiver in any other Federal or State proceeding. n8 Rule 502(e) concerns the controlling effect of a party agreement: An agreement on the effect of disclosure in a federal proceeding is binding only on the parties to the agreement, unless it is incorporated into a court order. n9

Rule 502(f) addresses the controlling effect of the rule itself: this rule applies to state proceedings and to federal court-annexed and federal courtmandated arbitration proceedings, in the circumstances set out in the rule. n10 Rule 502(f) goes on to state that, notwithstanding Rule 501, this rule [502] applies even if State law provides the rule of decision. n11

Brief History. Rule 502 should be considered the substantive counterpart to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(5)(B), which established a uniform procedure among the federal courts to address claims of inadvertent disclosure. The latter is a procedural rule only, and does not address whether the privilege or protection that is asserted after production was waived by the production. n12 The adoption process differs as well: Unlike other Federal court rules, any proposed rule that modifies an evidentiary privilege must be approved by Congress pursuant to the Rules Enabling Act. n13

The costs that waiver of privilege causes have long been a concern, and in 2006 the task of creating a new rule was delegated to the Advisory Committee on Evidence Rules. n14 The Committee approved a version of Rule 502 after a mini-conference in April 2006. n15 The proposed rule had two major purposes:

(1) It resolves some longstanding disputes in the courts about the effect of certain disclosures of material protected by the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine specifically those disputes involving inadvertent disclosure and selective waiver.

(2) It responds to the widespread complaint that litigation costs necessary to protect against waiver of attorney-client privilege or work product protection have become prohibitive due to the concern that any disclosure of protected information in the course of discovery (however innocent or minimal) will operate as a subject matter waiver of all protected information. This concern is especially troubling in cases involving electronic discovery. n16

After public comment and revision, Rule 502 was submitted to the Senate by the Judicial Conference of the United States on September 26, 2007. In that submission, authored by Judge Lee H. Rosenthal, Chair of the Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure of the Judicial Conference, problems that Rule 502 was intended to address were set forth: (1) the rising costs of discovery due to the time and effort necessary to preserve privilege and to prevent inadvertent disclosure, (2) the inconsistency and uncertainty of current law on inadvertent disclosure and the scope of waiver, and (3) the fact that third parties are not bound by agreements setting forth what the effect of disclosure would be. n17

Rule 502(b) would address inadvertent production. Rule 502(d) and (e) would address party agreements and orders. Rule 502(a) would address another area of contention: intentional disclosure to an agency. In doing so, it would appear to incorporate prevailing law, at least with regard to the near-universal rejection by courts of the concept of so-called selective waiver. n18

Rule 502 and Claw Back or Quick Peek Agreements. One issue that 502 would address stems from the sheer volume of the electronically stored information over which plaintiffs claims are asserted. In this regard, [p]arties sometimes try to facilitate discovery by agreeing that the disclosure of a privileged document will not be deemed a waiver with respect to that document or other documents involving the same subject matter. Some courts, however, have refused to enforce such agreements. n19 These are commonly known as quick peek or claw back agreements. Under the former, there is a purposeful disclosure of information, without intending to waive a claim of privilege, prior to production with an express reservation of the right to assert privilege at a later point in the discovery process. n20 Under the claw back agreement, the parties agree to a procedure for the return of apparently privileged information within a reasonable time of its discovery. n21

A concern with claw back and quick peek agreements is that these may not be binding on non signatories. Will production of privileged materials under an agreement be deemed a waiver vis--vis third parties? n22 Judicial compulsion may be a means to avoid third-party waiver. At least one court has directed a party to allow an adversary to inspect allegedly privileged documents as part of a meet and confer and concluded that this judicially-compelled disclosure would not give rise to a waiver. n23 This approach appears to have been embodied in Rule 502(d).

Questions Arising Under Rule 502. Several questions are likely to arise if S.2450 is enacted:

. Nonparties will be bound by federal court orders entered under Rule 502(d). The nonparty will presumably be required to seek leave to intervene in the federal court issuing the order to challenge it. How effective will this procedure be?

. Rule 502(d) does not require a prior meet-and-confer and agreement of the parties. Is the intent of 502(d) to allow the issuance of orders without such agreement and regardless of whether a party undertakes a preliminary privilege review?

. Assuming that parties present an agreement to a federal judge to be embodied in an order, what level of judicial review, if any, is required? Should the judge require a showing of good cause or simply execute the consent order?

. What incentive is there for parties to execute an agreement under Rule 502(e)? Will incorporation of such agreements into orders become commonplace to secure the protection afforded under Rule 502(d)?

Practice Insights. If enacted, Rule 502 will require attorneys to consider various issues. First, clients may wish to cooperate with agencies in the face of investigations or the like. Attorneys must be prepared to weigh with their clients the benefits of cooperation against the possible loss of privilege. Second, as noted above, Rule 502 would appear to encourage attorneys to seek the entry of nonwaiver orders. An attorney representing a nonparty which is bound by any such order must consider the costs of attempting to mount a challenge to the order. Similarly, an attorney seeking a nonwaiver order must consider whether, given the volume of electronically stored information that might be produced in a given civil action, there might be a benefit in relying on an agreement between the parties rather than entering into a nonwaiver order.

Additional References. Weinsteins Federal Evidence, Chapters 501, 511, and 512; 6-1102 Weinstein's Federal Evidence § 1102.02; 6-26 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 26.49 [5], 6-26 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 26.70 [6].

Return to Text

n1 . S. 2450, 110th Cong. § 1 (2007). S. 2450 was introduced on December 11, 2007. It was reported out of the Senate Judiciary Committee without amendment favorably on February 25, 2008. THOMAS (Library of Congress), http://thomas.loc.gov/home/bills_res.html (follow Search Bill Summary, Status, search for S. 2450 by bill number; then follow the hyperlink for All Congressional Actions).

n2

[2]. Floor statement of Senator Leahy, 154 Cong. Rec. S15141, S15142 (December 11, 2007).

n3

[3]. Id.

n4

[4]. S. 2450, 110th Cong. § 1 (2007).

n5

[5]. Id.

n6

[6]. Id.

n7

[7]. Id.

n8

[8]. Id.

n9

[9]. Id.

n10

[10]. Id.

n11

[11]. Id. Section 1(b) of S.2450 would amend the table of contents of the Federal Rules of Evidence to incorporate Rule 501. Section 1(c) sets forth the effective date of the rule.

n12

[12]. Advisory Committee Note to Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(b)(5)(B).

n13

[13]. Floor statement of Senator Leahy, 154 Cong. Rec. S15142-43 (December 11, 2007).

n14

[14]. A Bill to Amend the Federal Rules of Evidence to Address the Waiver of the Attorney-Client Privilege and the Work Product Doctrine, S. Rep. No. 110-264, at 4 (2008).

n15

[15]. See Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure, Proposed New Evidence Rule 502 (2007) in Letter from Lee H. Rosenthal, Chair, Advisory Committee on Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, to Honorable David F. Levi, Chair, Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure (September 26, 2007) (copy on file with author).

n16

[16]. Id. (citations omitted).

n17

[17]. Letter from Lee H. Rosenthal, Chair, Advisory Committee on Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, to Honorable David F. Levi, Chair, Standing Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure (September 26, 2007) (copy on file with author).

n18

[18]. See, e.g., In re Qwest Communicns Intl, Inc., 450 F.3d 1179, 1186-1200 (10th Cir. 2006), cert. denied, 127 S. Ct. 584 (2006).

n19

[19]. Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation 63 (4th ed. 2004) (citations omitted).

n20

[20]. Ronald Hedges, United States Magistrate Judge for the District of New Jersey, LegalTech 2005 Keynote Address at the New York Hilton 16: Comments on Proposed Amendment to Rules 26 and 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (January 31, 2005), available at <http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/e-discovery/04-CV-169.pdf>.

n21

[21]. Kenneth Withers, Two Tiers and a Safe Harbor: Federal Rulemakers Grapple with E-Discovery, Federal Lawyer 29 (Sept. 2004).

n22

[22]. In this regard, see Ronald Hedges, A Critical Appraisal of Proposed Amendment to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(5)(B) 5 Digital Discovery & e-Evidence (Mar. 2005).

n23

[23]. Collaboration Props., Inc. v. Polycom, Inc., 224 F.R.D. 473, 478-79 (N.D. Cal. 2004).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Ronald J. Hedges is counsel to Nixon Peabody LLP in New York City. He served as a United States Magistrate Judge in the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey from 1986 to 2007. Among other things, Mr. Hedges is a member of the advisory boards of The Sedona Conference and the Georgetown University Law Center E-Discovery Institute. Mr. Hedges wishes to acknowledge Mr. Andrew M. Jacobs, an associate at Nixon Peabody LLP, for his contributions to this article. For more information, or to contact Mr. Hedges, go to http://www.nixonpeabody.com/attorneys_detail1.asp?ID=1324.

164 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Bayview Loan Servicing, LLC v. Simmons

2008 Emerging Issues 1991

Sinclair and Harrison on Bayview Loan Servicing, LLC v. Simmons

By Prof. Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

March 5, 2008

SUMMARY: In a real estate market experiencing an increase in the number of foreclosure sales, properly positioned investors and speculators are presented with opportunities to acquire properties at bargain prices. However, as illustrated in the recent opinion of the Supreme Court of Virginia in Bayview Loan Servicing, LLC v. Simmons, 275 Va. 114, 654 S.E.2d 898 (2008), these opportunities are not without attendant risks. In this case, the Supreme Court of Virginia teaches that, under Virginia law, one of the typical procedural steps leading up to a foreclosure sale -- the accrual of the creditor's right to accelerate the payments owed under a promissory note and accompanying deed of trust following the borrower's default -- is a matter governed not by statute, but by the language the parties have used in their contracts. This commentary, written by Professor Sinclair and Mr. Harrison, discusses the Court's analysis of the issues of whether the noteholder's right to accelerate the payments owed to it actually accrued on the facts presented and the steps taken by the parties, and whether it successfully exercised such right so as to permit it to conduct a valid foreclosure sale. It also makes observations with respect to the initiation of such sales, based on the language of the Court's ruling concerning the scope of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Foreclosure Litigation and Accrual of the Right to Accelerate Payments in Virginia: A Matter of Contract or Statute?

In a real estate market experiencing an increase in the number of foreclosure sales, properly positioned investors and speculators are presented with opportunities to acquire properties at bargain prices. However, as illustrated in the recent opinion of the Supreme Court of Virginia in Bayview Loan Servicing, LLC v. Simmons, 275 Va. 114, 654 S.E.2d 898 (2008), these opportunities are not without attendant risks. In this case, the Supreme Court of Virginia teaches that, under Virginia law, one of the typical procedural steps leading up to a foreclosure sale -- the accrual of the creditor's right to accelerate the payments owed under a promissory note and accompanying deed of trust following the borrower's default -- is a matter governed not by statute, but by the language the parties have used in their contracts. This commentary discusses the Court's analysis of the issues of whether the noteholder's right to accelerate the payments owed to it actually accrued on the facts presented and the steps taken by the parties, and whether it successfully exercised such right so as to permit it to conduct a valid foreclosure sale. It also makes observations with respect to the initiation of such sales, based on the language of the Court's ruling concerning the scope of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1.

Background. Bayview Loan Servicing, LLC, a loan servicing company (hereafter, "Bayview"), desiring to foreclose upon a parcel of real property owned by Janet M. Simmons and encumbered by a deed of trust securing the indebtedness she owed under a promissory note held by it, purportedly sent her a letter by first-class mail notifying her that the note would be accelerated and foreclosure proceedings would begin if the past due amount was not paid within 30 days. A little over 120 days later, a substitute trustee under the deed of trust notified Simmons by certified mail that her account was in default, that payment had been accelerated due to that default, and that the parcel would be sold at foreclosure. Simmons did not claim the letter and it was returned to the substitute trustee.

The foreclosure sale took place as scheduled and the parcel sold to a third party bidder for substantially less than its fair market value. Simmons learned of the sale two days later, and subsequently filed a complaint in the circuit court alleging that Bayview had breached provisions of the deed of trust by failing to personally deliver or send to her, via certified mail, a pre-acceleration notice of breach and the action required to cure the breach before accelerating the indebtedness secured by the deed of trust. Bayview, while not disputing that its initial letter was not sent by certified mail, contended that it had substantially complied with the requirements of the deed of trust in sending that letter, that Simmons had not provided credible evidence to overcome the presumption that she had received it, and that the notice of foreclosure sale under Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A), which was later sent by certified mail by the substitute trustee, satisfied the pre-acceleration notice required by the deed of trust. After a hearing, the circuit court made the specific factual finding that Simmons had presented credible evidence that she had not received the initial letter. It then ruled in Simmons' favor based on her theory of the case, rejecting all of Bayview's contrary arguments and awarding Simmons a little over $156,000 for her loss of equity in the parcel. Bayview appealed, stating as its sole assignment of error that "the circuit court erred in failing to hold that, under Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A), the notice of proposed foreclosure sale from [the substitute trustee, which was sent via certified mail,] 'effectively exercise[d] the right of acceleration expressly contained in the deed of trust.'"

Helpful Information re: Foreclosure Sale Litigation. In Sharpe v. Talley, 215 Va. 615, 212 S.E.2d 273 (1975), the Supreme Court of Virginia provided the following description of the circumstances and claims of parties involved in and affected by that foreclosure sale:

The [debtors] allege that they have been deprived of their property and [that] the defendant [beneficiary under the deed of trust, who had acquired the debtors' real property at the foreclosure sale] has been unjustly enriched as the result of . . . unlawful, fraudulent and unconstitutional acts by the defendants [(the aforementioned beneficiary and the trustee under the deed of trust)]. The [debtors] seek from the [C]ourt the type of relief which was accorded the aggrieved parties in Rohrer v. Strickland, 116 Va. 755, 82 S.E. 711 (1914), and Linney v. Normoyle, 145 Va. 589, 134 S.E. 554 (1926). In these cases . . . there were foreclosure sales following default, and allegations were made of improper and inequitable conduct by the trustee and the beneficiary. In each case the property was sold under the deed of trust for an amount less than the secured debt, and subsequently resold by the beneficiary at an advanced price to a [third party] bona fide purchaser. A recovery was permitted in each case by the [debtors] for [the] fair value [of the property] after deducting the amount due on the deed of trust debt.

Sharpe, 215 Va. 615, 619, 212 S.E.2d 273, 275276.

Although not repeated in its Bayview opinion, this description accurately delineates the general contours of the Bayview litigation and is informative insofar as it generally explains the competing interests and motivations of the parties involved, and what is usually at stake in typical foreclosure sale litigation.

General Principles. The Court in Bayview Loan Servicing analyzed the issues of whether Bayview's right to accelerate the payments owed to it accrued and whether it had successfully exercised such right so as to permit it to conduct a valid foreclosure sale, by stating the following principles of Virginia law:

. Statutory language: Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A), which, as the Court noted, formed the basis of Bayview's sole assignment of error, provides that "[t]he written notice of proposed [foreclosure] sale when given as provided herein shall be deemed an effective exercise of any right of acceleration contained in such deed of trust or otherwise possessed by the party secured relative to the indebtedness secured." The statute further provides that "[t]he inadvertent failure to give notice as required by this subsection shall not impose liability on either the trustee or the secured party."

. Prior case law: In determining the impact, if any, of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) upon its analysis of Bayview's assignment of error, the Court noted that in Sharpe v. Talley, it had previously "concerned [itself] with a noteholder's duty to apprise the makers of the note of the fact that by reason of their default the holder had accelerated the payment of their debt, principal and interest, and had declared their entire debt due and payable." 215 Va. 615, 619-620, 212 S.E.2d 273, 276 (1975). It further observed that it had held in that case that "notice of acceleration must be complete and effective prior to a foreclosure sale," and that ultimately, it had concluded that "the notice provided to the debtor . . . was ineffective," ultimately causing it to "remand[] the case for an award of monetary damages to the debtor against the beneficiary of the deed of trust." Sharpe, 215 Va. 615, 622-623, 212 S.E.2d 273, 277-278. In reaching this result, however, the Court in Sharpe had expressly stated that the defendants' reliance upon the then-effective version of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59(6), the predecessor of current Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A), was "misplaced [because it] referred to notice of a trustee's sale" and did not address the issue of a noteholder's duty to notify a debtor of the acceleration of the indebtedness prior to initiating a foreclosure sale. Sharpe, 215 Va. 615, 622-623, 212 S.E.2d 273, 277-278.

Key Issue: Scope of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) and putative effect of post-Sharpe amendment to its predecessor. Seizing upon the language in Sharpe that defendants' reliance in that case upon former Va. Code Ann. § 55-59(6) was "misplaced," Bayview asserted that the General Assembly subsequently amended that statute to include the language currently appearing in Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) and that this language "allow[s] the notice of acceleration to be merged with the notice of foreclosure sale, notwithstanding any contrary provision in [a] [d]eed of [t]rust." Bayview thus argued that the General Assembly had enacted this subsequent amendment "to derogate the decision" in Sharpe, and that as a result, Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) "superseded" any contractual pre-acceleration notice obligation imposed on it by the deed of trust at issue.

The Court ultimately rejected Bayview's argument, stating that "Bayview misreads the scope of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) and any analogy to the Sharpe case."

With respect to Bayview's interpretation of the scope of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A), the Court acknowledged that "a notice of foreclosure sale . . . could act as the exercise of the 'right of acceleration'" under the deed of trust, but concluded that the statute "does not establish a statutory mandate as to whether such 'right of acceleration' is in existence and [is] capable of being exercised by the foreclosure notice." The Court explained that "[s]uch a determination remains a matter of contract between the parties" under Virginia law. The Court then examined the language of the notice provisions of the deed of trust and determined that "the parties [had] agreed no right of acceleration would be in existence to exercise (in other words, that no such right would have accrued to Bayview) until the condition precedent of providing the pre-acceleration notice had been satisfied." The Court also determined, from the language of the deed of trust, that this "condition precedent" required that the pre-acceleration notice be given "by personal delivery or certified mail." The Court then observed that "Bayview did not comply with the specific condition precedent," and that as a result, it "had not acquired the right to accelerate payment under the terms of the [d]eed of [t]rust." The Court then determined that "[t]he statutory cure of Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) is of no benefit to Bayview because it had not acquired the right to accelerate the indebtedness . . . when the foreclosure notice was issued."

With respect to Bayview's reliance upon Sharpe, the Court opined that "Bayview's citation to Sharpe is without merit and has no application to this case." The Court explained its reasoning, noting at the outset that "[i]n Sharpe, [215 Va. at 620, 212 S.E.2d at 276,] we determined that the language used in the deed of trust in that case created a condition subsequent, requiring notification to a borrower that his loan had been accelerated in order to complete the exercise of the right of acceleration prior to foreclosure." Continuing, the Court reaffirmed its conclusion in Sharpe: "It is essential for a valid exercise of an option to accelerate the maturity of a note that the noteholder do some positive act to indicate that the option has been exercised." It further emphasized that "[w]hile such notice is not a condition precedent to an effective exercise of the option . . . it must reach the maker. The Court then distinguished Sharpe, explaining that "the notice in Sharpe was required after the noteholder had accelerated the indebtedness and there was no issue that a right of acceleration had accrued to the noteholder, only a question of how that existing right was exercised." Directly addressing Bayview's assertion regarding the subsequent statutory amendment, the Court concluded that "[e]ven if the General Assembly created Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) to overturn that result, it has no application when the right to accelerate has not accrued."

Accordingly, the Court ultimately held that "Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) does not cure Bayview's contractual breach under the [d]eed of [t]rust or immunize Bayview from its liability to Simmons for her lost equity in the Parcel sold in foreclosure," because "Bayview had no right of acceleration at the time that the notice of foreclosure sale was sent." As a result, it concluded that "the circuit court did not err by entering judgment in favor of Simmons" for $156,809.46 in damages resulting from the foreclosure sale.

Importance of Ruling. In Bayview Loan Servicing, the Supreme Court of Virginia sends a clear message to those who seek to profit from foreclosure sales: Virginia law requires strict compliance with pre-acceleration notice obligations imposed upon trustees or beneficiaries by contractual language appearing in a deed of trust, and Va. Code Ann. § 55-59.1(A) does not control the issue of whether the right to accelerate has accrued. For trustees, noteholders, deed of trust beneficiaries, and others who play a part in the decision to initiate a foreclosure sale, the Court's holding has obvious significance. Yet, the burden that this holding imposes is neither onerous nor unfair, from an economic standpoint. Trustees, noteholders, and deed of trust beneficiaries typically enjoy unfettered access to the underlying loan documents and records of correspondence with each borrower. Thus, using this information, they can readily ascertain for themselves whether such obligations have been met prior to initiating any particular foreclosure sale.

Moreover, the trustees, noteholders and deed of trust beneficiaries involved in foreclosure sales are, like those involved in the foreclosure sale in Bayview Loan Servicing, typically sophisticated financial institutions and professional loan servicing companies who make use of standardized deed of trust and other lending form documents containing "boilerplate" language. Thus, they can easily avoid the significant financial consequences of conducting deficient foreclosure sales by imposing internal controls, such as uniform pre-acceleration notice provisions in every loan document and a "checklist"-type of record evidencing not only the substance, but the mode of delivery, of the pre-acceleration notice given to each borrower who is in default. Although some trustees, noteholders and deed of trust beneficiaries may find that the initial costs of implementing these internal controls are not insignificant, certainly, when they are compared to the magnitude of the cost of conducting a deficient foreclosure sale, few, if any, will deem the expense to be unjustified.

CVirginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

Regarding deeds of trust generally, see Douglass W. Dewing, A Virginia Title Examiners' Manual, Chapter 17: Deeds Of Trust, Mortgages, And Vendors Liens (1998), and Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Mortgages and Deeds of Trust, §§ 1-184 (2007).

Regarding the foreclosure process and foreclosure sales, see Douglass W. Dewing, A Virginia Title Examiners' Manual, § 17-13: Foreclosure by Trustee's Sale and § 17-14: Purchasers at Trustee's Sale (1998); see also Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Mortgages and Deeds of Trust, § 93184 (2007).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Advance Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. For the past 15 years he has been Reporter and Editor of the Guide to Evidence in Virginia, and starting in 2008 he is co-author of Friend & Sinclair, The Law of Evidence in Virginia.

Mr. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and loose-leaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management, and is the author of multiple law review articles on subjects including criminal appellate procedure, constitutional law, crime victim's rights legislation, and environmental law. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

165 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Jones v. Brandt and Ott v. L&J Holdings

2008 Emerging Issues 1992

Sinclair and Harrison on Jones v. Brandt and Ott v. L&J Holdings

By Prof. Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

March 5, 2008

SUMMARY: Given that a durable power of attorney is an instrument typically constituting an integral part of many family and estate plans, it is not surprising that disputes arise concerning the scope of authority conferred by such instruments. This is particularly true with regard to the authority conferred by the principal upon the attorney-in-fact to contract and to transfer and dispose of property, as these kinds of transactions oftentimes result in material changes in the size of the estate and, thus, the amount of money or property that the principal's heirs will receive. In two recent decisions, Jones v. Brandt, 274 Va. 131, 645 S.E.2d 312 (2007), and Ott v. L&J Holdings, LLC, 275 Va. 182, 654 S.E.2d 902 (2008), the Supreme Court of Virginia teaches that while the scope of the authority of the attorney-in-fact to contract and to transfer and dispose of property is a matter still strictly determined based on the express language used in a durable power of attorney with respect to such acts, courts should not construe a durable power of attorney so strictly that it results in a frustration of the purpose of that language, considering the power of attorney as a whole. In doing so, the Court takes a guarded, but nevertheless practical, approach to ascertaining the scope of authority conferred by a durable power of attorney. This commentary, written by Professor Sinclair and Mr. Harrison, examines the disputes the Court resolved in these cases and discusses the impact of the holdings reached in each.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: On What Authority? Interpreting Powers Conferred by a Durable Power of Attorney in Virginia.

Given that a durable power of attorney is an instrument typically constituting an integral part of many family and estate plans, it is not surprising that disputes arise concerning the scope of authority conferred by such instruments. This is particularly true with regard to the authority conferred by the principal upon the attorney-in-fact to contract and to transfer and dispose of property, as these kinds of transactions oftentimes result in material changes in the size of the estate and, thus, the amount of money or property that the principal's heirs will receive. In two recent decisions, Jones v. Brandt, 274 Va. 131, 645 S.E.2d 312 (2007), and Ott v. L&J Holdings, LLC, 275 Va. 182, 654 S.E.2d 902 (2008), the Supreme Court of Virginia teaches that while the scope of the authority of the attorney-in-fact to contract and to transfer and dispose of property is a matter still strictly determined based on the express language used in a durable power of attorney with respect to such acts, courts should not construe a durable power of attorney so strictly that it results in a frustration of the purpose of that language, considering the power of attorney as a whole. In doing so, the Court takes a guarded, but nevertheless practical, approach to ascertaining the scope of authority conferred by a durable power of attorney. This commentary examines the disputes the Court resolved in these cases and discusses the impact of the holdings reached in each.

Background. In Jones, a lawyer who had represented the decedent for many years prepared a durable power of attorney at his request, appointing the lawyer as attorney-in-fact to act for him. The power of attorney contained express grants of authority, including the powers to sign, endorse, or assign any . . . instrument of any nature whatsoever, negotiable or non-negotiable, for deposit and to make, sign, acknowledge and deliver any contract . . . or other document relating to . . . personal property. The power of attorney also contained general grants of authority and instructions that it should be broadly construed. After a will was prepared, the decedent informed the attorney-in-fact that he would provide for the executrix, a widow with whom decedent lived for the last two years of his life, outside of the will. A few weeks before his death the decedent made an oral request that the attorney-in-fact designate the executrix as beneficiary payable on death (POD) of a certificate of deposit in the amount of $250,000, that was in the decedents name at a local bank. The attorney-in-fact went to the bank the same day and executed such a POD designation, signing it in the decedents name by himself under the power of attorney, and the next day advised the decedent in a letter that his request had been complied with, enclosing a copy of the beneficiary designation in the letter. After the decedents death two months later, the executrix of the estate sought guidance and direction in the distribution of the estate, naming all parties in interest, including herself in her individual capacity, as defendants. The circuit court heard evidence ore tenus and ruled that the designation of the executrix as the beneficiary POD was valid and that the proceeds of the certificate of deposit were payable to her individually. Pursuant to VA Code Ann. § 8.01-670(B)(2), an interlocutory appeal was awarded to the decedents two daughters, who contended that the power of attorney did not specifically confer authority to the attorney-in-fact to make the change in the beneficiary designation on the certificate of deposit and that, as a result, the certificate of deposit became part of the estate that would be distributable to them.

In Ott, a husband executed a durable power of attorney naming his wife of 50 years his attorney-in-fact and granting her the authority to sell and convey real property, enter into binding contracts and manage his business affairs. The power of attorney also authorized the attorney-in-fact to make gifts, but only to family members and to such other persons or charitable organizations with whom [the husband had] an established pattern of giving." It likewise provided that his "Agent may not make gifts of [his] property to the Agent. Finally, the power of attorney additionally provided that it would not be affected by the husband's disability or lack of mental competence and would remain effective until his death unless revoked by written notice. He later suffered a debilitating stroke that left him unable to communicate or to manage his business affairs, and remained in a nursing home for 30 months until his death. The couple had for many years been in the business of developing real property, by subdividing and selling residential building lots. On advice of counsel, after the husband's stroke, but well before his death, the wife created a limited liability company (LLC), establishing the husband's membership interest at 80% and her own interest at 20%, and then signed an operating agreement for the entity, on her own behalf and as attorney-in-fact for her husband. Two months later she conveyed three parcels of land, with General Warranty and English covenants, to the LLC pursuant to an instrument captioned as a "deed of gift" reciting nominal consideration. Title to the smallest of the three parcels, which lay between the other two parcels, was in the name of the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, but title to the other two parcels was in the husbands name alone. After the husband's death, his last will was admitted to probate. One of the couple's children qualified as the husband's personal representative and brought this suit challenging the deed of gift in a declaratory judgment proceeding against the wife, the LLC and two other unrelated entities that had contracted to purchase the land from the LLC. The personal representative argued that deed was void ab initio because it was a gift, that it failed to comply with the requirements of Va. Code Ann. § 11-9.5(C), and that it was beyond the powers granted to the attorney-in-fact by the power of attorney. All parties, by agreement, submitted the case to the circuit court upon the pleadings, exhibits, depositions and argument. The court ruled that the deed, despite its misleading caption, was not in fact a deed of gift and, because of ambiguity apparent on the face of the deed, parol evidence was properly received to determine the grantors intent. The circuit court found from that evidence that there was a valid business purpose for the deed, and that the conveyance was supported by valuable consideration. The circuit court entered a decree denying the relief prayed for and dismissing the declaratory suit, and the personal representative appealed, reiterating her argument that the deed should be set aside on the ground that it was a gift and thus exceeded the authority conferred upon the attorney-in-fact.

General Principles. In determining the issues concerning the scope of authority conferred by the power of attorney at issue in Jones, the Court, in a 4-to-3 majority opinion, stated the following well-settled principles of Virginia law regarding a durable power of attorney:

. Strict construction and underlying policy: Citing the landmark case of Hotchkiss v. Middlekauf, 96 Va. 649, 653, 32 S.E. 36, 3738 (1899), the Court observed in Jones that "[i]n Virginia, powers of attorney have been strictly construed for over a century." The Court then explained, citing Hotchkiss as support, that "[t]he authority granted by such an instrument is never considered to be greater than that warranted by its language, or indispensable to the effective operation of the authority granted[, and] [t]he authority given is not extended beyond the terms in which it is expressed." Reaffirming the continued validity of this general rule of construction with respect to current-day disputes, the Court explained that it "essentially provides that expansive language [appearing in the provisions of a power of attorney] should be interpreted as intending only to confer those incidental powers necessary to accomplish objects as to which express authority has been given to the attorney-in-fact." The Court then specified that the long-recognized policy underlying the rule was that "the power to dispose of the principals property is so susceptible of abuse that [it] should not be implied," and it also specifically acknowledged that the potential for abuse "is particularly dangerous in a case involving a durable power of attorney, which by its nature remains in effect after the principal has become incapable of monitoring the . . . conduct" of the attorney-in-fact. On this point, the Court clearly expressed its intention to continue to recognize and remain faithful to the underlying rule of strict construction: "We do not retreat from the rationale of these guidelines of construction."

In determining the issue concerning the scope of authority conferred by the power of attorney at issue in Ott, the Court stated the following well-settled principles of Virginia contract law regarding the use of parol evidence to ascertain the intent of the parties embodied within a deed, and when a conveyance qualifies as a gift:

. When parol evidence may be considered: As the Supreme Court had made clear in Eure v. Norfolk Shipbuilding & Drydock Corp., 263 Va. 624, 632, 561 S.E.2d 663, 667668 (2002), the Court observed that the "parol evidence rule requires a court to construe a document according to its plain terms if it is clear and unambiguous on its face." Continuing, the Court explained that "[i]n such a case, the court will not look for meaning beyond the instrument itself," but that "[w]hen a document is ambiguous . . . the court will look to parol evidence[, i.e., evidence outside of the "four corners" of the writing itself,] in order to determine the intent of the parties."

. When a writing is ambiguous: Echoing an approach announced in Video Zone, Inc. v. KF&F Props., 267 Va. 621, 594 S.E.2d 921 (2004), the Court observed that "[t]he language of an instrument is ambiguous if it may be understood in more than one way or when it refers to two or more things at the same time," and stated that "[s]uch an ambiguity, if it exists, must appear on the face of the instrument." Regarding the issue of "whether the disputed terms are ambiguous," the Court explained that the words employed in the writing were to be "considered . . . in accordance with their usual, ordinary and popular meaning." 267 Va. 621, 625626, 594 S.E.2d 921, 923924.

. When a conveyance qualifies as a gift: Citing the classic decision in Spooner v. Hilbish, 92 Va. 333, 341, 23 S.E. 751, 753 (1895), the Court observed that "[a] gift has been defined as a contract without a consideration." Continuing, the Court, applying an interpretation set forth by the Court of Appeals in Theismann v. Theismann, 22 Va. App. 557, 566, 471 S.E.2d 809, 813 (1996), identified "[d]onative intent on the grantors part" as being "an essential element of a gift."

Key Issue #1 (Jones): Is a broadly worded express grant of authority in a power of attorney effective despite the general rule of strict construction? In addressing the issue of whether the power of attorney in Jones conferred sufficient authority upon the attorney-in-fact to change the beneficiary designation on a certificate of deposit, the Jones majority observed that, from a practical standpoint, "[i]t is highly doubtful that every power of attorney, even . . . one carefully drawn by a skilled draftsman, will always expressly confer the authority necessary to address every specific circumstance in which the principal nevertheless intends to give authority to the attorney-in-fact." As a result, the Jones majority noted that, "[u]ndoubtedly, standard provisions granting broad general power to the [attorney-in-fact] are intended by the principal to become applicable so as to avoid any potential unintended limitation in the authority expressly granted."

Bearing these principles in mind, the Jones majority turned its attention to examining the specific language appearing in two particular paragraphs of the power of attorney at issue in Jones. Regarding the first of these two paragraphs, the Jones majority observed that it specifically authorized the attorney-in-fact "[t]o sign, endorse or assign any note, check or other instrument of any nature whatsoever, negotiable or non-negotiable, for deposit, discount, collection or otherwise." Regarding the second paragraph, the Jones majority observed that it authorized the attorney-in-fact "[t]o make, sign, acknowledge and deliver any contract . . . or other document relating to . . . personal property." The Jones majority then noted that a third paragraph appearing near the end of the power of attorney at issue expressly conferred broad powers upon the attorney-in-fact and featured the following language: "[w]ithout limiting the above powers, generally to perform any other acts of any nature whatsoever, . . . in any circumstances as fully and effectively as I could do as part of my normal, everyday business affairs if acting personally."

Applying the language appearing in these three paragraphs of the power of attorney, the Jones majority found that "[a] certificate of deposit is an instrument for deposit" within the intendment of the language appearing in the first of these paragraphs. Continuing, the Jones majority found that "[a] certificate of deposit including the designation of the beneficiary . . . thereon is a contract between the depositor and the bank relating to personal property" within the intendment of the language appearing in the second of these paragraphs. Finally, construing the language appearing in the third of these three paragraphs, the Jones majority concluded that "[s]urely, the change of a beneficiary designation on a certificate of deposit is an act within 'the normal, everyday business affairs' of the owner of a certificate of deposit at a bank." As a result, the Jones majority ultimately held that the decedent, as the maker of the power of attorney, "sufficiently expressed the intent to authorize . . . the attorney-in-fact[] to make a change in the beneficiary designation under the provisions of [the three aforementioned] paragraphs . . . of the power of attorney when those provisions are considered in concert."

In the course of reaching this holding, the Jones majority also considered an argument by the appellants seemingly based on the maxim of expressio unius est exclusio alterius as it has been applied to the construction and interpretation of contracts, which provides that "the omission of a particular covenant or term from a contract reduced to writing shows an intent to exclude it." See Bentley Funding Group v. SK&R Group, 269 Va. 315, 609 S.E.2d 49 (2005). As a basis for their argument, the appellants pointed out that two other paragraphs of the power of attorney in Jones--one pertaining specifically to IRAs and employee benefit plans, and another pertaining to "insurance policies and any pension, profit sharing, stock ownership, or other retirement plans,"--expressly permitted the attorney-in-fact to change and/or select the beneficiaries thereof. They therefore argued that such specific grants of authority, coupled with the absence of express language specifically authorizing the attorney-in-fact to change and/or select the beneficiary of a certificate of deposit, strongly implied that the decedent had not intended to confer that type of authority on the attorney-in-fact. Pointing out that "all of these enumerated financial instruments or arrangements are entirely distinct financial matters from a certificate of deposit," the Jones majority nevertheless rejected the appellants' argument, concluding that "it is a reasonable assumption that [the decedent] felt it necessary to expressly address his intent with regard to them, while operating under the equally reasonable assumption that his intentions were adequately addressed in other paragraphs [of the power of attorney] with regard to any other instrument of any nature 'for deposit' and any 'contract' for personal property."

The dissenting opinion in Jones espoused a different view, however. While agreeing with the majority's citation to Hotchkiss for its statement of the general rule of strict construction applicable when construing the authority granted by a durable power of attorney, it relied on the interpretation of Virginia law made by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Estate of Casey v. Commissioner, which held that "broad general powers contained in a power of attorney . . . should be interpreted as intending only to confer those incidental, interstitial powers necessary to accomplish objects as to which authority has been expressly conferred." 948 F.2d 895, 901 (4th Cir. 1991). Continuing, the dissenting opinion, based on the holdings in Hotchkiss and Casey, agreed with the appellants' argument akin to, but not specifically referencing, the expressio unius maxim:

Having explicitly included the power to change or select beneficiaries on the assets specifically named [in the power of attorney, i.e., IRAs, employee benefit plans, insurance policies, and any pension, profit sharing, stock ownership, or other retirement plans] the absence of a power to change beneficiaries as to other assets was a glaring omission on the principals part. He knew how to confer such an express power, but declined to extend it to certificates of deposit.

Thus, "[a]pplying the rule that the instrument is assumed to represent the entire understanding of the parties," the dissenting opinion concluded that "no power to change the beneficiary of a certificate of deposit was intended by [the decedent]."

Key Issue #2 (Ott): Did the trial court properly determine that the "deed of gift" was ambiguous and, therefore, properly consider parol evidence in determining whether the deed was within the scope of the authority conferred on the attorney-in-fact? In addressing the issue of whether the circuit court had erred in concluding that the deed was ambiguous and that parol evidence could be used to ascertain the grantor's intent underlying the deed, the Court concluded that it "agree[d] with the circuit courts analysis." In arriving at this conclusion, the Court also signaled its agreement with the circuit court's rejection of the personal representative's assertion that the mere fact that the deed initially recited that it was a "deed of gift" meant that the conveyance it embodied was "plainly and unambiguously a donation of the principals property" that was "beyond the authority of the attorney-in-fact." The Court confirmed the circuit court's determination that this recital was inconsistent with the statute recited in the deed to invoke an exemption from recordation taxes, Va. Code Ann. § 58.1-811(A)(10), because that statute did not apply to deeds of gift. It likewise confirmed the circuit court's conclusion that the deed's recital of valuable consideration, as well as its conveyance with General Warranty and English Covenants, were "inconsistent with a gift."

Based on the foregoing, the Court explained that that "[a]ll terms of the deed that were consistent with the grantors receipt of valuable consideration were inconsistent with donative intent on her part," and that as a result, "the deed could be understood in more than one way." Thus, the Court concluded that "the circuit court correctly decided that [the deed] was ambiguous and admitted parol evidence to resolve the ambiguity."

Regarding the issue of whether the parol evidence considered by the circuit court established that the deed was within the scope of the authority conferred on the attorney-in-fact, the Court began by noting that the circuit court had "found from the evidence that the deed was not, in fact, a deed of gift despite its caption [and] that it was given for a valuable consideration." Continuing, it observed that the circuit court had specifically determined that "the evidence showed no donative intent on [the] part [of the attorney-in-fact]." Instead, the Court noted that the circuit court had found that "the transfer of the property was undertaken for legitimate business reasons and that [the decedent] and [the attorney-in-fact] each received benefits, including possible future tax benefits, commensurate with their respective percentage interests [in the properties at issue], without any self-dealing on [the] part [of the attorney-in-fact]." Thus, the Court concluded that "the transaction was . . . within the powers granted by [the] power of attorney."

Importance of Rulings. Jones is obviously a pivotal ruling, even though it largely maintains the status quo first established in Hotchkiss. The majority opinion clearly indicates that most of the members of the Court believe that broad grants of authority included within a power of attorney should properly be viewed as an expression of the maker's intent to authorize the attorney-in-fact to take actions that, despite the absence of language specifically authorizing them, are consistent with other types of actions specifically authorized in the power of attorney. Yet, the dissenting opinion in Jones just as clearly indicates that the absence of language within a power of attorney specifically authorizing the attorney-in-fact to take an action has at least the potential to result in a judicial determination that the attorney-in-fact was not authorized to take that action, if there is little or no support in the language of the other provisions for the existence of such authority. Practitioners should thus be able largely to avoid the obvious tension between the majority and dissenting opinions in Jones through deliberate and conscientious drafting of the power of attorney document, focusing on two basic guidelines.

[] First, as a general rule, practitioners should generally seek to err on the side of caution, being over inclusive and detailed when setting out and describing the various powers to be given to the attorney-in-fact.

[] Second, practitioners should strongly consider including a broad, general grant of authority similar to the one construed in Jones as a way to help ensure that any particular powers that were overlooked or otherwise not specifically set out in the power of attorney may nevertheless be within the scope of authority conferred upon the attorney-in-fact.

These two guidelines work in tandem to accomplish the true intent of the maker, inasmuch as Jones indicates that the detailed expression of specifically authorized acts will be considered in concert with a general broad grant of authority. The Court's ruling in Ott is likewise instructive on the issue of drafting, clearly showing that those persons who are exercising powers conferred upon them via a power of attorney would do well to ensure that any contract, deed, or other legal document that they execute as an attorney-in-fact unambiguously indicates that the underlying transaction is one which is clearly within the scope of the powers conferred upon them. By following these guidelines, practitioners and attorneys-in-fact should be able to avoid the types of disputes addressed in Jones in Ott and accomplish, rather than frustrate, the intent underlying the power of attorney.

CVirginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

Regarding powers of attorney, see James P. Cox, Harrison on Wills and Administration for Virginia and West Virginia § 33.05: Durable Powers of Attorney (4th ed. 2007); see also Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Agency, §§1-126, and Powers, §§1-10 (2007).

Regarding the use of parol evidence, see Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice § 24.15: Parol Evidence Rule (2d ed. 2007); see also Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Parol Evidence, § 130 (2007).

Regarding conveyances qualifying as gifts, see Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Gifts, §§1-42 (2007).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

About the Author(s). Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Advance Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. For the past 15 years he has been Reporter and Editor of the Guide to Evidence in Virginia, and starting in 2008 he is co-author of Friend & Sinclair, The Law of Evidence in Virginia.

Mr. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and loose-leaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management, and is the author of multiple law review articles on subjects including criminal appellate procedure, constitutional law, crime victim's rights legislation, and environmental law. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

166 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Hudson v. City of Chicago, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 12 (Ill. 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 1993

Brazas on Hudson v. City of Chicago, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 12 (Ill. 2008)

By Susan M. Brazas

March 5, 2008

SUMMARY: The Res Judicata Peril of Voluntary Dismissal: The Thorny Issue of the Right to Refile. Just a few months ago, the Illinois Supreme Court proclaimed the sanctity of a plaintiff's absolute right to refile after a voluntary dismissal in Case v. Galesburg Cottage Hosp., 227 Ill. 2d 207 (Ill. 2007). However, in Hudson v. City of Chicago, the Court minces no words about the danger lurking for a plaintiff who has chosen to exercise that absolute right. In an unusual move, the Court makes extensive analysis of the amicus curiae brief submitted by one lawyers' group. This commentary, written by Susan Brazas, points out the caution needed before presuming that no harm will come from a voluntary dismissal.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Illinois Supreme Court Clarifies Res Judicata Effect on a Refiled Action if Voluntary Dismissal Taken of Complaint in Which Any Portion Has Been Involuntarily Dismissed.

In Hudson v. City of Chicago, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 12 (Ill. 2008), the Illinois Supreme Court addressed the interplay of the voluntary dismissal statute and the doctrine of res judicata. In affirming the trial court and the appellate court, the Supreme Court applied its decision of 12 years earlier to find that the plaintiff's refiled action was barred by res judicata, because the plaintiff could have, but did not, pursue his case to conclusion in the trial court after one count of his original action was involuntarily dismissed with prejudice.

In its Case v. Galesburg Cottage Hosp., 227 Ill. 2d 207 (Ill. 2007) decision, the Supreme Court held that the one-year window of time, set forth in Section 13-217 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within which a voluntarily dismissed complaint may be refiled is an absolute right that must be protected. The Case holding was a confirmation of the Court's opinion on a similar factual scenario upholding the absolute right to refile, according to the predecessor to 735 ILCS 5/13-217 in Aranda v. Hobart Mfg. Corp., 66 Ill. 2d 616, 620 (1977).

The Hudson Court devoted several paragraphs to the arguments advanced by the plaintiff and several more to those advanced by the Illinois Trial Lawyers Associations amicus curiae brief. Both of those positions argued against the applicability of the case upon which the Hudson most heavily relied, Rein v. David A. Noyes & Co., 172 Ill. 2d 325

(1996). The Hudson Court noted that its decision was in furtherance of a policy against claim-splitting as identified in Rein. It is noteworthy that four Justices participated in the Hudson majority decision, but two Justices sharply dissented.

Practical Implications. A plaintiff's attorney cannot assume that the one-year window of time to refile a voluntarily dismissed action is an absolute right. The recent case of Case v. Galeburg seemed to proclaim the sanctity of this right, but under the circumstances where, as in Hudson, at least a portion of the complaint was involuntarily dismissed, this right is far from absolute.

Earlier cases had also described that Section 2-1009(a) of the Illinois Code of Civil Procedure gives plaintiffs an unfettered right to voluntarily dismiss their claims without prejudice, upon proper notice and payment of costs, 'at any time before trial or hearing begins.' Morrison v. Wagner, 191 Ill. 2d 162, 165 (2000). The Rein case, cited extensively in the Hudson decision, emphasized that a voluntary dismissal does not automatically immunize a plaintiff against the bar of res judicata or other legitimate defenses. Rein v. David A. Noyes & Co., 172 Ill. 2d 325, 342-343 (1996); Zuniga v. Dwyer, 752 N.E.2d 491, 495 (1st Dist. 2001).

Loss of Consortium Claims. The Zuniga court clarified that the mandatory joinder rule set forth in Brown v. Metzger, 104 Ill. 2d 30 (1984) also trumps the plaintiff's right to a voluntary dismissal and subsequent refiling. Under that rule, a spouse's loss of consortium claim must be joined with the impaired spouse's cause of action, unless the spouse can prove that joinder is impossible.

Strategic Considerations. The harsh outcome of the Hudson case illustrates that great caution must be exercised whenever an involuntary dismissal is imminent. The more prudent approach in that instance may be to take a voluntary dismissal of the entire case, so that there can be no res judicata bar to a voluntary refiling. The refiled complaint could then remain free of the troublesome count or theory to avoid another risk of involuntary dismissal.

However, defense counsel will urge the court to decide its motion to dismiss first, before granting plaintiff's counsel leave to voluntarily dismiss. The court will likely rule first on the first-filed motion, meaning that prompt action to bring either motion will be critical. It is within the court's discretion to hear and decide a previously-filed dispositive motion prior to ruling on a plaintiff's motion for voluntary dismissal. Morrison v. Wagner, 191 Ill. 2d 162, 165 (2000).

A key consideration of the Hudson court's decision is that the plaintiff's counsel could have, but did not, litigate certain claims (which were sought to be refiled) to a conclusion. Therefore, the conditions, which served as an effective bar to litigating the claims to conclusion, should be specified, if that is the case. Examples are claims that could not stand alone without the dismissed claims could not have been litigated; or, even, an extremely slow docket that may have prevented the claims from moving forward.

Plaintiff's counsel can also request language in the dismissal order to clarify that the dismissal is without prejudice to the plaintiff's right to refile. Given the warnings in the Hudson footnotes, however, counsel must be cautious to avoid the appearance of harassing the defendant with successive suits. Note that an order of voluntary dismissal is final, for the purposes of taking an appeal, but it becomes non-final upon a complaint being refiled, thereby discouraging piecemeal appeals. Such refiled claims would thus be outside the jurisdiction of the appellate court. Dubina v. Mesirow Realty Dev't, Inc., 283 Ill. App. 3d 36, 669 N.E.694, 696 (1st Dist. 1996).

Cautions Upon Refiling. The Hudson Court stressed that the subsequently-filed suit was not a continuation of the same suit, but instead was an entirely new action. Other cases using the Rein analysis of res judicata, which examined whether a later-filed suit arose from the same set of operative facts, found a res judicata bar when categorizing a second filing to be a separate action. Zabel v. Cohn, 283 Ill. App. 3d 1043, 670 N.E.877, 880-81 (1st Dist. 1996). Another way to describe the res judicata bar is that it prevents bringing a second action that arises out of the same controversy as the first. Downen v. Country Mutual Ins. Co., 1811 Ill. App. 3d 716, 537 N.E.2d 445, 447 (5th Dist. 1989).

Thus, in anticipation of a res judicata argument, counsel should consider whether the two actions can be described as factually distinct, if the two suits allege different injuries. Careful analysis should be done before raising a res judicata argument, as the burden of establishing res judicata is upon the party invoking it. Downen v. Country Mutual Ins. Co., 1811 Ill. App. 3d 716, 537 N.E.2d 445, 447 (5th Dist. 1989).

Cross References. Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists Checklist 80.04: Dismissal by Court Order.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the Illinois Civil Procedure LexisNexis Forms. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

167 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on Coston v. Bio-Medical Applications of Virginia

2008 Emerging Issues 1986

Sinclair on Coston v. Bio-Medical Applications of Virginia

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

March 4, 2008

SUMMARY: In Coston v. Bio-Medical Applications of Virginia, 275 Va. 1, 654 S.E.2d 560, 2008 Va. LEXIS 7, the Supreme Court of Virginia has yet again found it necessary to address the doctrine explaining when an expert witness is needed to state a prima facie case in a medical negligence action -- a topic at the intersection of Virginia's expert proof doctrines which, in civil cases, emphasize the possible assistance an expert may provide to the trier of fact, and the separate doctrines governing sufficient proof of medical negligence. The decision provides a useful perspective on a history of decisions which buck the trend by allowing a plaintiff, in very limited contexts, to reach the jury without an expert to address standards of care or causation in a medically-related context. This commentary, written by Kent Sinclair, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Expert Proof Revisited: Once Again the Supreme Court of Virginia Addresses the Issue of When an Expert is Required in a Medical Case -- What is Within the Jury's Natural Competence and Experience? Is it as Simple as Falling Off a Log (or Chair)?

The Supreme Court of Virginia has yet again found it necessary to address the doctrine explaining when an expert witness is needed to state a prima facie case in a medical negligence action -- a topic at the intersection of Virginia's expert proof doctrines which, in civil cases, emphasize the possible assistance an expert may provide to the trier of fact, and the separate doctrines governing sufficient proof of medical negligence. The decision provides a useful perspective on a history of decisions which buck the trend by allowing a plaintiff, in very limited contexts, to reach the jury without an expert to address standards of care or causation in a medically-related context.

Summary. In a medical negligence case alleging that employees of the defendant dialysis operator placed the plaintiff in a defective chair for a kidney dialysis procedure, even though they had knowledge that the chair was not safe -- and then put her back in the chair after it failed -- the Court holds that the allegations, if proven at trial, would be sufficient to establish a prima facie case of medical negligence without the necessity of expert testimony. Because of the everyday nature of the physical issues and safety judgments involved, the Court found that, based upon these allegations, the issue whether the acts or omissions constitute medical negligence is within a jury's common knowledge and experience and, therefore, expert testimony was not necessary.

Factual Background. The plaintiff patient filed a civil action alleging that, in the course of receiving dialysis treatment from a facility that the defendant operated, she was injured when a chair in which she was seated collapsed to the ground. She alleged that despite the chair's defective condition, the defendant's employees placed her back in the chair, which failed again, causing her to strike the ground a second time.

During the pretrial phases of the litigation in Coston, the circuit court entered a scheduling order that required the plaintiff to identify her expert witnesses by a certain date, but she failed timely to identify any expert witness who would testify about the applicable standards of care and deviations from those standards. After the deadline for such designations passed, the defendants filed a motion for summary judgment asserting that plaintiff could not establish a prima facie case of medical negligence against them because she failed to identify any expert witnesses who would testify about the applicable standards of care.

After a prior appeal involving the application of the nonsuit statute, the circuit court held that the plaintiff was required to present expert testimony to establish the applicable standards of care and any deviations therefrom, and entered summary judgment for the defendant because the plaintiff had not identified an expert witness who would render such testimony.

Nonsuit Episode. Because of the frequency of nonsuits in modern Virginia practice, it may be worth noting that when the hearing was held on the defense motion for summary judgment, the plaintiff requested, and was granted, a voluntary nonsuit after the case had been submitted to the circuit court for decision. The Supreme Court granted the defendant's appeal and held that under Code § 8.01-380 the circuit court erred in granting the plaintiff's motion for a nonsuit because the case had been submitted to the court for decision. The case was remanded so that the circuit court could rule on the defendant's motion for summary judgment. Bio-Medical Applications of Virginia, Inc. v. Coston, 272 Va. 489, 495, 634 S.E.2d 349, 352 (2006). On remand, the circuit court held that the plaintiff was required to present expert testimony to establish the applicable standards of care and any deviations therefrom, and the court entered summary judgment on behalf of the defendant because the plaintiff had not identified an expert witness who would render such testimony.

In the present appeal the argument was advanced that failure to cross-appeal in the earlier proceeding to challenge the issue of requiring an expert witness barred a renewed effort at appellate review. The Supreme Court of Virginia rejected this argument, noting that the plaintiff could not have assigned as cross-error in the first appeal the circuit court's ruling that is the subject of the present appeal: the first appeal presented only the issue whether the circuit court erred by granting the plaintiff a nonsuit, which was a properly appealable issue. The Court noted that the plaintiff was not required to assign cross-error in the prior appeal because in the former proceeding in the circuit court, that court had not granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment.

Experts in Medical Cases The Legal Landscape. The Virginia Supreme Court has often noted in prior decisions that issues involving medical negligence often fall outside the realm of the common knowledge and experience of a lay jury. As a result, in most instances expert testimony is required to assist a jury. Expert testimony is usually necessary to establish:

the applicable standards of care, and a deviation from those standards of care, and that such deviation was a proximate cause of a plaintiff's damages.

Leading modern case law on these general principles is summarized in Perdieu v. Blackstone Family Practice Center, Inc., 264 Va. 408, 420, 568 S.E.2d 703, 710 (2002); Beverly Enterprises-Virginia, Inc. v. Nichols, 247 Va. 264, 267, 441 S.E.2d 1, 3 (1994); and Bly v. Rhoads, 216 Va. 645, 653, 222 S.E.2d 783, 789 (1976).

In Raines v. Lutz, 231 Va. 110, 113, 341 S.E.2d 194, 196 (1986), the Court summarized the general rule in medical cases as follows:

[E]xpert testimony is ordinarily necessary to establish the appropriate standard of care, to establish a deviation from the standard, and to establish that such a deviation was the proximate cause of the claimed damages.

The Common Knowledge and Experience of Lay Jurors. Despite this general rule, in a handful of cases the Court has held that expert testimony is not necessary in a medical negligence case because the alleged acts of negligence clearly lie within the range of the jury's common knowledge and experience. Perhaps the earliest decision in the modern era -- i.e., after it was routinely recited that a plaintiff must generally produce expert testimony to address standards of care, deviations therefrom, and causation of the plaintiff's injuries -- to deal with the question of the need for an expert in a medical malpractice or negligence case was Jefferson Hospital, Inc. v. Van Lear, 186 Va. 74, 7677, 84, 41 S.E.2d 441, 441442, 445 (Va. 1947). In that case the trial court allowed a jury to decide a medical negligence action without the presentation of expert testimony, and confirmed the verdict for plaintiff. In Jefferson Hospital, the plaintiff fell and fractured his hip while trying to walk to a bathroom. Even though the plaintiff had utilized a device that activated a signal light plainly visible to the floor nurse, neither the nurse nor any other attendant responded to his call during the 20- or 30-minute period that the signal light was activated. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding of negligence without expert testimony because the hospital personnel were aware of the plaintiff's physical condition and they knew, or should have known, that a delay in answering his call for assistance might induce him to leave his bed and attempt to use the bathroom without assistance. Jefferson Hospital, 186 Va. 74, 7880, 41 S.E.2d 441, 442-443.

Then just over a decade ago, the Court in Beverly Enterprises affirmed another circuit court's judgment confirming a jury verdict in favor of a plaintiff in a medical negligence action even though the plaintiff did not produce expert testimony. 247 Va. 264, 270, 441 S.E.2d 1, 34. In that case, the plaintiff's decedent was an elderly woman diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease. She could not care for herself, and she was unable to eat unassisted. She was admitted to a nursing home, and an administrator at the home was informed that the patient was unable to eat unassisted. Indeed, the Court noted that her sons also informed the administrator of prior incidents when the patient had choked while eating. Nonetheless, employees of the nursing home, on at least two occasions, delivered food to this patient without providing any personnel to assist her with her food. Even though the nursing home personnel knew that she "needed to be spoon fed" and that someone "had to keep an eye" on her, the employees failed to assist her and Nichols died when food obstructed a portion of her air passage and lodged in her windpipe. 247 Va. 264, 266-267, 441 S.E.2d 1, 23.

In Beverly Enterprises the Court held that the plaintiff was not required to present expert testimony to establish a prima facie case of medical negligence because "the question whether a reasonably prudent nursing home would permit its employees to leave a tray of food with an unattended patient who had a history of choking and who was unable to eat without assistance is certainly within the common knowledge and experience of a jury." 247 Va. 264, 269, 441 S.E.2d 1, 4.

A few years later, in Dickerson v. Fatehi, 253 Va. 324, 484 S.E.2d 880 (1997), the plaintiff alleged that during the course of surgery, a physician used a blunt tipped hypodermic needle, including a plastic attachment to the syringe, and that the physician negligently failed to remove the hypodermic needle from her neck at the conclusion of the procedure. After the surgery, she experienced severe pain in her right arm, hand, and neck. Approximately 20 months after the surgery, another surgeon discovered and removed the needle and plastic attachment from the patient's neck. On appeal the Supreme Court again considered whether expert testimony was necessary to establish the appropriate standards of care and breaches thereof in this particular circumstance. In response to the plaintiff's contention that -- based upon the specific facts alleged in her pleadings and the defendant's admissions expert testimony was not necessary to establish the appropriate standards of care and breaches thereof, the Court held that if the facts alleged by the plaintiff and admitted by the doctor were presented to a jury, the jurors,

"absent expert testimony, reasonably could determine, by calling upon their common knowledge and experience, whether [the doctor] was negligent and whether his negligence was a proximate cause of Dickerson's injuries. Therefore, the trial court erred in ruling that expert testimony was necessary to establish the standard of care."

253 Va. 324, 328, 484 S.E.2d 880, 882.

In its recent Coston decision the Court was again presented with what might be characterized as a physical, care-based circumstance not falling into the typical mold of expert medical judgment. Whether defendant's personnel acted negligently in placing the patient in a defective chair was an issue that ordinary jurors, who use chairs in all aspects of daily life, could comprehend. The Supreme Court therefore held that "the plaintiff's allegations that she was injured after she was placed in a defective chair, if proven at trial, would be sufficient to establish a prima facie case of medical negligence against the defendant without the necessity of expert testimony." The Court observed that -- based upon these allegations -- "a jury could find that defendant's employees placed the plaintiff in a defective chair even though they had knowledge that the chair was not safe."

Thus in Coston the Court found another example where it was clear that the issues involved in determining whether the defendant's acts or omissions in this case constitute medical negligence were easily within a jury's common knowledge and experience. Where circumstances in a given case present such a non-scientific issue, the Court found that expert testimony is for that reason not necessary.

The Fallout from Perdieu. A prominent recent decision from the Court, in the Perdieu case, has been thought by some members of the Virginia bar to signal an absolute requirement that the plaintiff establish the applicable standards of care and deviations therefrom with expert testimony. In Coston the Supreme Court took pains to explain that the broad implications of Perdieu, which had considered multiple medical personnel in various categories of training and activity, do not erect such an absolute requirement.

In Perdieu, the Supreme Court of Virginia held that a plaintiff in a medical negligence action must produce expert testimony to establish that:

a physician failed to supervise a resident physician; that a physician breached the standards of care by failing to timely diagnose an injury;

a nursing home was negligent in failing to attend, restrain, assist, diagnose, examine, and treat an inpatient; and the nursing home was negligent in its failure to implement a care plan for the patient.

Thus, in that case the plaintiff was required to present expert testimony to establish a prima facie case of negligence.

In its recent Coston decision, the Court goes on to clarify that the reason why such expert proof was required in assessing claims against the various personnel in Perdieu was that the issues presented by the facts of that case were not within the common knowledge and experience of lay jurors. 264 Va. 408, 421-422, 568 S.E.2d 703, 711. Thus, while Perdieu characterized prior case law allowing a case to go to the jury without expert proof as "unique," and stressed that the defendants in that case knew of the patient's physical condition and her prior choking incidents, and despite this knowledge, left a tray of food in front of her and failed to provide her with the required assistance, Coston makes clear that its implications are not limited to the question whether a reasonably prudent nursing home would permit its employees to leave a tray of food with an unattended patient who had a history of choking and who was unable to eat without assistance is certainly within the common knowledge and experience of a jury.

Unlike the standard of care issues the Court discussed in Perdieu, in situations like the "defective chair" presented in Coston, the issue of the defendant's acts of medical negligence is seen as "quite simple and within the common knowledge and experience of a lay jury."

Conclusions in the Broader Context. By way of conclusion, it may be noted that there is an inherent tension in modern Virginia evidence law about experts which has clear analogies for the situation presented in Coston. While the Code of Virginia today establishes principles (borrowed from the Federal Rules of Evidence) favoring the admission of expert proof in any circumstances where it can be "helpful" to the trier of fact, traditional doctrine viewed expert proof more warily. In traditional case law, there was discussion of the prospect that the fact-finding prerogatives of the jury were being trammelled upon if a party adduced expert proof on a topic for which the jury's common life experiences equipped it to decide issues. See, for example, David A. Parker Enters. v. Templeton, 251 Va. 235, 467 S.E.2d 488 (1996), which recites the general principle that an expert's opinion is admissible in evidence if it will assist the fact finder -- while incorporating an express limitation that the subject of such an opinion must be "a matter that is not within the range of common knowledge." (Applying law to that effect noted in Lyle, Siegel v. Tidewater Capital Corp., 249 Va. 426, 436, 457 S.E.2d 28, 34 (1995)). Such case law holds that, conversely, "an expert's opinion is inadmissible, however, if it relates to matters about which the fact finder is equally as capable as the expert of reaching an intelligent and informed opinion." David A. Parker Enters., invoking Kendrick v. Vaz, Inc., 244 Va. 380, 384, 421 S.E.2d 447, 449 (1992), and Grasty v. Tanner, 206 Va. 723, 726, 146 S.E.2d 252, 254 (1966). The draft Rules of Evidence for Virginia do not incorporate the requirement that expert opinion address a topic a distinct step above the common knowledge or experience of the trier of fact, but this Virginia doctrine remains high in the consciousness of many Virginia litigators and judges.

Further, resistance to the modern "ultimate opinion rule" (which by statute in Virginia does not bar opinions on key questions) is evident in the same case law. Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-401.3(B) is thus honored more in the breach than in the observance. The tension between the mere helpfulness standard, and a more demanding requirement of necessity for expert proof, if not the latter concern for preserving the proper province of the trier of fact's prerogatives to make key determinations without influence by hired witnesses, is just below the surface in the Court's recent Coston decision.

CVirginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

With respect to general issues concerning the standards for admission of expert and scientific proof in Virginia, see Charles E. Friend, The Law of Evidence in Virginia, Chapter 14: Scientific Evidence, The Law of Evidence in Virginia § 17-18: Basis for Expert Opinion. See also the Boyd-Graves Conference (Kent Sinclair, Reporter), The Guide to Evidence in Virginia (2007), Section 702 (Experts). See also Sinclair, Kearfott, Sheridan & Imwinkelreid, Virginia Evidentiary Foundations Guide (Supp. 2004), passim.

In connection with managing expert proof at trial, see Virginia Civil Benchbook, Ch.4, § III: Opinion Evidence, and Virginia Criminal Benchbook, Ch. 7, § III: Opinion Evidence and § V: Scientific Evidence.

See generally Michies Jurisprudence of Virginia and West Virginia: Evidence (2007).

Draft Rules of Evidence for Virginia dealing with the issues of helpfulness, necessity for expert proof, and proof on an "ultimate issue" may be seen in the Guide to Evidence, 2008 edition, which incorporates in Sections 702, 703 and 704 many of the principles discussed in this article.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is a Professor of Law and served for several years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. In 2007 he was accepted to advise the High Court of London on issues of Virginia law in pending litigations.

168 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on Hilton v. Martin

2008 Emerging Issues 1987

Sinclair on Hilton v. Martin

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

March 4, 2008

SUMMARY: In its recent decision in Hilton v. Martin, 275 Va. 176, 654 S.E.2d 571, 2008 Va. LEXIS 18 (2008) the Supreme Court of Virginia revisited one of the classic issues in civil tort litigation in Virginia -- the question whether the "exclusive remedy" provision of the Virginia Workers' Compensation Act precludes a private civil action for damages. The context is one that arises with some frequency: Intentional conduct that might be characterized as assault or other volitional behavior. And the key issue is also one that arises in a large range of cases -- whether the cause of action asserted by a private plaintiff "arises out of the employment" of the victim as that term is interpreted under Va. Code § 65.2-101. This commentary, written by Kent Sinclair, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Civil Actions for Assault or Wrongful Death of Workers in Virginia -- When Is the Workers' Compensation Act the Exclusive Remedy Precluding a Private Cause of Action? Amorous Advances, Flirtation, and "Social" Assaults.

Scope & Importance. In its recent decision in Hilton v. Martin, 275 Va. 176, 654 S.E.2d 571, 2008 Va. LEXIS 18 (2008) the Supreme Court of Virginia revisited one of the classic issues in civil tort litigation in Virginia -- the question whether the "exclusive remedy" provision of the Virginia Workers' Compensation Act precludes a private civil action for damages. The context is one that arises with some frequency: Intentional conduct that might be characterized as assault or other volitional behavior. And the key issue is also one that arises in a large range of cases -- whether the cause of action asserted by a private plaintiff "arises out of the employment" of the victim as that term is interpreted under Va. Code § 65.2-101.

Summary. In an action to recover damages for personal injury and death resulting from an apparent assault on the victim by a fellow employee, the Supreme Court holds that a trial judge erred in concluding that the Virginia Workers' Compensation Act provided the exclusive remedy for the claims. Applying the "actual risk test," the Court concludes that the assault on this particular victim had no relationship with her status as an employee. On bizarre facts noted below, the Court found that -- whether the tortfeasor's behavior was intended as flirtatious, merely playful, or as harassment -- the assault was "purely personal" and thus the resulting injury and death did not "arise out of the employment" under Va. Code § 65.2-101. The judgment was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings in the pending civil action for wrongful death.

Background Facts. Plaintiff's decedent (his daughter) was an emergency medical services employee, seated on the passenger side of the front seat of an ambulance owned by her employer. The driver of the vehicle, and a third individual riding in the back, were also employees of the same emergency medical services company. The three had visited a restaurant for an on-duty meal, and were returning to the medical services station to await further assignments.

As the vehicle proceeded along the road, the passenger in the rear of the vehicle -- the alleged individual tortfeasor -- had a bizarre idea. This individual, whom the pleadings alleged had a reputation as a kid in an adults body, and who had a tendency to harass his female co-workers and exhibited childish and immature behavior, focused on the decedent, a co-worker who was also riding in the ambulance. The tortfeasor turned on the power to a manual cardiac defibrillator that was in the rear of the ambulance, adjusted its energy to 150 joules, and picked up the defibrillator paddles. With the paddles in his hands, he turned toward the front of the ambulance and told the victim, Im going to get you. She screamed, Get those away from me, and pushed the tortfeasor back. He turned away from her and appeared to be replacing the paddles in the unit. Suddenly, he again came toward her, striking her with the paddles on the left shoulder and left breast, while simultaneously activating them. The victim screamed, [h]e shocked me, and appeared to be having a seizure. As a result of this electrocution, the victim experienced cardiac and respiratory arrest.

The victim's father qualified as administrator of her estate and brought this action against the individual tortfeasor, the employer and another medical professional. As eventually became pertinent, the complaint included counts for assault and battery against the individual tortfeasor and the medical service, and negligent hiring and negligent retention against that employer for allowing the individual tortfeasor to remain in the workplace.

The defendants filed pleas in bar, asserting that the plaintiffs sole remedy was provided by the Virginia Workers' Compensation Act (the "Act"). The parties submitted the case to the trial court on the pleadings, depositions and arguments of counsel, thus waiving the prohibition upon the use of depositions in summary adjudication.

The court, by letter opinion, ruled that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment under Va. Code § 65.2-101. The trial court dismissed the complaint on these grounds, and the administrator pursued an appeal.

Note on Appellate Review in this Context. It should be emphasized that the trial court accepted for purposes of the motion to dismiss the averments set forth in the complaint filed by the administrator, and the Supreme Court also relied upon those assertions as framing the context for the legal issues. The Court noted that when a question of law concerning the trial courts application of the law to essentially undisputed facts is presented, a de novo standard of review is applied. Thus, the Court accorded no particular deference to the legal conclusions drawn by the trial court from the circumstances sketched by the parties as background for the motion to dismiss.

Overview of the Exclusive Remedy Doctrine. Under Va. Code § 65.2-101, an injury falls within the scope of the Workers' Compensation Act only if it results from an accident and arises out of and in the course of the injured persons employment. If the injury meets those tests, the rights provided by the Act are the sole remedies for the injury, to the exclusion of any other rights and remedies at common law or otherwise, on account of such injury, loss of service or death, under Va. Code § 65.2-307.

As the Court noted in a recent decision which also had elements of sexual predation to it, Butler v. Southern States Cooperative, Inc., 270 Va. 459, 465, 620 S.E.2d 768, 772 (2005), to the extent that an employees injury does not meet the statutory tests for coverage under the Act, the employees common-law remedies are preserved unimpaired. In Butler the Court concluded:

In the present case, Butler's allegations, taken as true for purposes of our review, clearly establish that Allen's assault on Butler was personal to Butler and not directed against her as an employee or because of her employment. Allen's actions were the result of his asserted personal attraction to Butler. Allen's actions were in no way in furtherance of Southern States' business and, therefore, Butler's injury cannot fairly be traced to her employment as a contributing proximate cause. Our prior decisions regarding personal assaults dictate the conclusion that the assault on Butler did not arise "out of" her employment in the context of the Workers' Compensation Act.

In the recent Hilton case, it was undisputed that the victim's fatal injury arose in the course of her employment. Therefore, the sole question on appeal was whether the circuit court erred in finding from the undisputed facts that her injury also was one arising out of her employment.

At the outset, the Supreme Court stressed a point it had also made in Butler -- that in considering the arising out of prong, the positional risk test, whereby simply sustaining an injury at work is sufficient to establish compensability, is not applied. Rather, the actual risk test is applied. Under the "actual risk" standard, an injury giving rise to a cause of action comes within the Act only if there is a causal connection between the employee's injury and the conditions under which the employer requires the work to be done.

While Hilton and Butler both involved inappropriate acts relating to amorous or sexual motivations, the Supreme Court of Virginia has reviewed a large number of cases over the years involving assaultive behavior directed against a victim who was an employee performing job duties at the time of the tortious behavior directed against him or her. Examples that have been cited in modern decisions are these:

"Goosing" another individual. Webster's Third New International Dictionary informs readers that to "goose" means "to poke or dig (a person) in some sensitive spot; esp: to poke (a person) between buttocks with an upward thrust of a finger or hand from the rear." See Richmond Newspapers v. Hazelwood, 249 Va. 369, 373, 457 S.E.2d 56, 58 (1995).

Rape of the victim by an assailant the victim knew personally off the job, in which theft of the employer's money appeared to be an afterthought. Reamer v. National Service Industries, 237 Va. 466, 471, 377 S.E.2d 627, 630 (1989)

Shooting of the driver of a moving truck, unrelated to any robbery, was personal to him and outside the employment. Metcalf v. A. M. Express Moving Systems, Inc., 230 Va. 464, 470, 339 S.E.2d 177, 181 (1986).

Shooting of a newspaper carrier while seated in her car at 2:00 a.m., waiting for her employer to arrive with her supply of newspapers. Plummer v. Landmark Communications, 235 Va. 78, 366 S.E.2d 73 (1988) (the employee alleged that the employer knew of dangerous conditions in the parking lot and knew that another carrier had had difficulties there. She showed that the employer had notice of a dangerous condition and failed to protect her from it. These allegations showed that the probability of assault was augmented by the character of the job and the environment in which the employee worked, and therefore, that the injury arose out of the employment).

Assault of an employee of a merchant dealing in precious metals by a bank robber, in circumstances where the employer's requirement that the employee make daily bank deposits was a condition that "exposed her to a special risk of assault" and, hence, that the assault constituted an accident arising out of the employment. R & T Investments v. Johns, 228 Va. 249, 252, 321 S.E.2d 287, 289 (1984).

Sexual "fondling" and further harassment. City of Richmond v. Braxton, 230 Va. 161, 165, 335 S.E.2d 259, 262 (1985) (the victim was employed by the city as a ticket seller in the box office of a municipally owned theater. While the claimant was making a telephone call, her supervisor grabbed her and began fondling her breasts. The episode was interrupted when a customer appeared at the box office window. After the customer left, the supervisor attempted to grab the claimant again, but she broke away and ran out of the box office. The supervisor displayed sexually oriented literature in his office and regularly discussed sexual topics with another female employee in the box office and showed her pictures from Playboy magazine).

Murder of a coal delivery truck driver by an escaped mental patient who wanted the truck to escape the area. See Hopson v. Hungerford Coal Co., 187 Va. 299, 305306, 46 S.E.2d 392, 395 (Va. 1948) (noting that the outcome might be different if the victim was defending the employer's property at the time he was killed).

Shooting of the victim because of a poker game and "working on Sundays." A. N. Campbell & Co. v. Messenger, 171 Va. 374, 377378, 199 S.E. 511, 513 (Va. 1938) ("if the shooting resulted from religious prejudice of the assailant aroused by the employment of claimant in labor on the Sabbath day, then his injury arose out of his employment and was compensable," but the poker motivation was equally plausible on the facts).

Attack with a hatchet on a traveling insurance premium collector by two hitchhiking youths. Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Gough, 161 Va. 755, 759760, 172 S.E. 264, 266 (Va. 1934) (suggesting that if robbery to obtain the employer's premiums the victim had collected were the motive, the Act would apply).

Reviewing the range of prior decisions in these contexts the Court concluded that this body of prior case law involving assaults upon employees all adheres to a common principle: If the assault is personal to the employee and not directed against him as an employee or because of his employment, the resulting injury does not arise out of the employment. That principle was expressly articulated after a review of numerous authorities in Richmond Newspapers, and it was deemed to control the recent Hilton case.

The virtually inexplicable motivations and intentions of the individual tortfeasor in Hilton did not trouble the Supreme Court, which found that it was "immaterial whether the assailants subjective motivation is playful, amorous, vindictive, or hostile. An injury resulting from an assault arises out of the injured person's employment when it is directed at the victim as an employee."

The Court also stressed that such an injury "also arises out of the employment when the conditions under which the employer requires the work to be done are a contributing cause of the injury. (Emphasis by the Court). Additionally, the assailants unauthorized use of a tool that happened to be available at the workplace was immaterial in making the determination.

A particular issue raised in Hilton sprung from the fact that the tortfeasor accomplished the assault and injury upon the victim through the use of medical equipment owned and made available to the workers by their common employer -- a powerful electric defibrillator. The Supreme Court found, however, that "[u]nauthorized use of the employer's equipment is not probative on the question whether the employer's workplace requirements were a contributing cause of the injury."

Respondeat Superior Also No Out. It may be remembered that in the prior sexual assault case, Butler, the Court had rejected the employer's claim that the victim's allegations of respondeat superior liability in her pleading necessarily caused her claim to be barred under the Act. The Court there noted that "to plead respondeat superior liability, a plaintiff must allege that the injury caused by the act of an employee, such as [individual tortfeasor in that case], occurred within the scope of the employment relationship. This is directly analogous to an injury "in the course of" an individual's employment for purposes of the exclusivity analysis under the Act. However, this is only one prong of that analysis." The exclusivity provision of Va. Code § 65.2-307 applies only to an injury both "arising out of" and "in the course of" an individual's employment under Va. Code § 65.2-300. As the Court dryly observed in Butler: "These requirements for compensability of a claim and, in turn, for the exclusivity of the remedy under the Act, are not synonymous," citing R & T Investments, Ltd. v. Johns, 228 Va. 249, 252, 321 S.E.2d 287, 289 (1984).

Conclusion. The Supreme Court concluded in the recent Hilton decision that the evidence, assumed as true for purposes of deciding the pending issues, clearly established that the individual tortfeasor's assault had no relationship with the victim's status as an employee. The Court states: "Whether intended as flirtatious, merely playful, or as harassment, it was purely personal. Further, the employers workplace requirements had no causal connection with the risk of injury by assault." Since the Court also held that the individual tortfeasor's decision to use the employer's equipment in assaulting a fellow employee was entirely his own and unconnected with the conditions of the employment, it ultimately found that the injury resulting from the assault did not "arise out of the employment." Thus the "exclusive remedy" provisions of the Virginia Workers' Compensation Act were not applicable, and a private wrongful death action could be maintained.

C Virginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

With respect to Respondeat Superior and Negligent Retention claims, see John Costello, Virginia Remedies, (3rd Edition 2005) §§ § 17A.04: Respondeat Superior and § 17A.06: Negligent Hiring or Retention.

For a discussion of appeal of Workers' Compensation Commission decisions, see Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice § 38.07: Procedure for Filing Appeal from the Workers' Compensation Commission.

For an overview of standards applied in the Determination of Compensable Injuries under the Worker's Compensation Act, see Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia (2nd ed. 2002), § 23.7: Determination of Compensable Injury and § 23.26: Common Law Remedies.

For specific discussion of the Causal Connection With Employment Test in Virginia Tort and Workers' Compensation law, see Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia (2nd ed. 2002), § 23.8: Causal Connection With Employment and § 23.26: Common Law Remedies.

For an overall review of case law principles construing and applying the Virginia Workers' Compensation Act, and the issues in this article, see generally Michies Jurisprudence of Virginia and West Virginia (2007), Workers' Compensation, § 1: Scope, § 2: Nature, Purpose and Constitutionality of Acts, § 25: Injuries and Diseases Compensable Under the Act: Particular Instances, § 53: Effect of the Act on Other Remedies: Generally.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Kent Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. The architect of the 2006 reforms in the Virginia civil justice system, he is Professor of Law and served for several years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2006 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. In 2007 he was accepted as an expert to advise the High Court of London, England, on issues of Virginia law in pending litigations.

169 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on Rush v. Norfolk Electric Company, Inc., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 373 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1975

Garcia on Rush v. Norfolk Electric Company, Inc., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 373 (2007)

By Grace V. B. Garcia

March 3, 2008

SUMMARY: In Rush v. Norfolk Electric Company, Inc., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 373 (2007), the Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the trial courts decision to partially grant defendants, Modern Continental Construction Company, Inc., post-trial summary judgment motion to obtain indemnification from the third-party defendant, Harding & Smith, Inc. Although there has been a lot written on the subject of indemnification within construction contracts, this case is important in that it reminds contracting parties to ensure proper drafting of the construction agreements so that all of their clauses, including clauses regarding indemnification, can be read harmoniously, or else face the consequence of losing the benefits of a possibly favorable clause due to the conflicting clause rule. This commentary, written by Grace V.B. Garcia, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Rush v. Norfolk Electric Company, Inc., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 373 (2007), the Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the trial courts decision to partially grant defendants, Modern Continental Construction Company, Inc., post-trial summary judgment motion to obtain indemnification from the third-party defendant, Harding & Smith, Inc. Although there has been a lot written on the subject of indemnification within construction contracts, this case is important in that it reminds contracting parties to ensure proper drafting of the construction agreements so that all of their clauses, including clauses regarding indemnification, can be read harmoniously, or else face the consequence of losing the benefits of a possibly favorable clause due to the conflicting clause rule.

Background for the Courts Decision. Plaintiff, Michael Rush, was injured while working on a waste treatment project, on which Modern Continental was the general contractor. He brought a suit for negligence against Modern Continental and its subcontractor, Norfolk Electric Company, Inc. (Norfolk Electric), and his wife, Colleen Rush asserted claims for loss of consortium. For the project, Modern Continental also subcontracted the plumbing to Harding & Smith. Harding & Smith then sub-subcontracted the insulation and piping work to New England Insulation Co. (NEI), the plaintiffs employer.

Although Norfolk Electrics general liability insurer assumed the defense of Modern Continental based on an indemnification agreement, Modern Continental also asserted a third-party complaint against Harding & Smith for indemnification based on its subcontract agreement. Harding & Smith, in turn, asserted a fourth-party complaint against NEI for indemnification based on its sub-subcontract.

As part of the subcontract Modern Continental had with Harding & Smith, it stated as follows:

Subcontractor does further agree to be bound to the General Contractor by the aforementioned General Contract Documents and all other instruments herein referred to and further to assume toward the General Contractor all the obligations and responsibilities pertaining to the work that the General Contractor by the aforesaid General Contract Documents has assumed to the owner including the furnishing of warranties and guarantees as are required in the General Contract Documents for the work of this subcontractor. (emphasis in original)

As part of the original contract for the project between the owner and Modern Continental, there was indemnification language which required Modern Continental to indemnify the owner with respect to claims for personal injuries or property damage incurred in connection with the work performed by Modern Continental on the project if such personal injuries occurred, even in part, as a result of the negligence of Modern Continental or any person or entity for which it was responsible. Rush, 70 Mass. App. Ct. at 377. As a result of the incorporation clause, Modern Continental argued that its subcontractor, Harding & Smith, was obligated to indemnify Modern Continental to the same degree Modern Continental was obligated to indemnify the owner.

Giving rise to this case, however, is the fact that there was also another indemnification provision that was contained in the subcontract between Modern Continental and Harding & Smith. The provision in the subcontract stated as follows:

To the extent permitted by law, the Subcontractor shall (1) fully indemnify and save the General Contractor wholly harmless from any and all claims, liabilities, liens, demands and causes of action for or on account of any injury to person, . . . arising out of or in consequence of the performance of the Subcontractors work hereunder, but only to the extent caused in whole or in part by the acts or omissions of the Subcontractor, its subcontractors, anyone directly or indirectly employed by it, or anyone for whose acts it may be liable. (emphasis in original)

After a jury found Modern Continental, Norfolk Electric and the plaintiff Michael Rush all partially negligent, the trial court allowed, only in part, Modern Continentals post-trial motion for summary judgment seeking indemnification from Harding & Smith. Rather, than allow Modern Continental full indemnification from Harding & Smith based on the general contract language, the court only granted Modern Continental a right to partial indemnification based on the subcontract language.

Indemnification. Indemnification provisions are common in construction contracts. Generally, the contract documents provide that the general contractor agrees to indemnify the owner for the project and then, in its subcontracts, the general contractor obtains indemnification agreements from its subcontractors. Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 149, § 29C controls indemnification clauses in construction projects for Massachusetts. The statute voids indemnity in construction contracts for personal injuries or damages to property not caused by a subcontractor. However, pursuant to the statute, it is legal for a general contractor and subcontractor to agree that the subcontractor will indemnify for a loss even if the subcontractors negligence is only partially responsible. Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 149, § 29C. As such, many indemnification clauses will begin with the clause To the fullest extent permitted by law, as such is a savings provision that enables a court to excise offensive portions of an indemnity provision and enforce the remainder of the provision. Callahan v. A.J. Welch, 36 Mass. App. Ct. 608, 611-613 (1994).

There are several types of indemnification provisions used in construction contracts. For example, some provisions contain the language arising out of or in consequence of the performance of the subcontractors work. Such language, which is enforceable, limits the subcontractors indemnity obligation to situations where there is a causal connection between the subcontractors work and the injury. M. DeMatteo Construction Co. v. A.C. Dellovade, Inc., 39 Mass. App.

Ct. 1, 3-4 (1995). Other indemnity provisions in a subcontract agreement require indemnity but only to the extent caused in whole or in part by the indemnitor. Such language is deemed to be a proportional indemnity provision. North American Site Developers, Inc. v. MRP Site Development, Inc., 63 Mass. App. Ct. 529, 534-35 (2005). Therefore, in a proportional indemnity provision, the language limits the indemnity obligation that the indemnitor, often the subcontractor, is responsible for.

Why Not Full Indemnification? In Rush, the general contract provided for indemnification by the indemnitor for the entire loss, as long as the loss was connected to the work performed by the indemnitor, regardless of whether the indemnitee was partly responsible for the loss. Consequently, if the indemnification obligation required of Harding & Smith in Rush was solely based on the broad indemnification language contained in the general contract, then Modern Continental would have been entitled to full indemnification from Harding & Smith. Rush, 70 Mass. App. Ct. at 377.

The problem in Rush arose, however, due to the fact that the indemnification clause in the subcontract limited the subcontractors obligation to indemnify to the extent the damages were caused by the subcontractor. Thus, although Modern Continental would have been entitled to complete indemnification under the provisions of the general contract, in contrast, it limited its right for indemnification by the additional and separate language contained in its subcontract with Harding & Smith.

As the Appeals Court held that the two indemnification clauses could not be read harmoniously, it followed the conflicting clauses rule which it laid out in Lembo v. Waters, 1 Mass. App. Ct. 227, 233 (1973). There, the court held that [i]f the apparent inconsistency is between a clause that is general and broadly inclusive in character and one that is more limited and specific in its coverage, the latter should generally be held to operate as a modification and pro tanto nullification of the former. Id., quoting Corbin on Contracts § 24.23, at 176. Applying this rule, the Appeals Court in Rush agreed with the trial courts finding that the more limited indemnification clause in the subcontract was applicable, nullifying the indemnification clause contained in the general contract.

In reaching this conclusion, the Appeals Court noted that as the subcontract was actually between Modern Continental and Harding & Smith, the indemnification provision contained in that subcontract had been bargained for. Conversely, the general contract contained terms that were more applicable to the owner and Modern Continental, as well as contained several provisions that had nothing to do with Harding & Smiths plumbing duties, and only became operative against the subcontract due to the incorporation clause.

What Can Practitioners Due to Avoid the Outcome of Rush? In order to protect your client, whether the general contractor or subcontractor, it is important that practitioners make sure that they have read all the terms of the contract or contracts. This is especially important when a contract includes an incorporation clause, incorporating the terms of another contract or document. If there are two provisions that cover the same topic, such as indemnification, it is imperative that the parties be sure that they are artfully drafted in such a way that they can be read harmoniously. If the two provisions are not harmonious, the practitioner may want to take out one clause, thus, relying solely on the other clause. Otherwise, if litigation arises, a favorable clause may be lost due to the application of the conflicting clause rule, as shown by the Rush decision.

Cross References. MA Pleading and Practice § 8.171: Complaint on Contract in Writing: General Form.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council.

Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

170 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Martin on Lioce v. Cohen

2008 Emerging Issues 1973

Martin on Lioce v. Cohen

By Leah A. Martin

February 29, 2008

SUMMARY: Nevada authority on attorney misconduct during closing argument and the resulting motion for new trial analysis have been moving targets in recent years. The newest (and final?) of these targets was entered by the Nevada Supreme Court in January 2008. Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008), provides new and substantially modified authority in this matter, detailing the significance of whether objections were made and if so whether they were sustained, whether admonishments were given, and whether the improper conduct of counsel continued.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Introduction. Nevada authority on attorney misconduct during closing argument, and the resulting motion for new trial analysis, have been moving targets in recent years. The newest (and hopefully final) of these targets was entered by the Nevada Supreme Court in January 2008. Lioce v. Cohen [124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)] provides new and substantially modified authority in this matter, detailing the significance of whether objections were made and, if so, whether they were sustained, whether admonishments were given, and whether the improper conduct of counsel continued. This Expert Commentary (1) highlights the factors to be considered in deciding a motion for new trial in cases of attorney misconduct, and (2) outlines conduct that could result in the granting of a new trial (and possible attorney discipline and sanctions).

Nevadas Historical Treatment of New Trials Based on Attorney Misconduct. The issue of attorney misconduct at trial was first addressed by the Nevada Supreme Court relatively recently--in 1995. In Barrett v. Baird [111 Nev. 1496, 908 P.2d 689 (1995)], Nevada adopted the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals rule on the subject, holding that [t]o warrant [a new trial] on grounds of attorney misconduct, the flavor of misconduct must sufficiently permeate an entire proceeding to provide conviction that the jury was influenced by passion and prejudice in reaching its verdict [Barrett, 111 Nev. 1496, 1515, 908 P.2d at 702 (quoting Kehr v. Smith Barney, Harris Upham & Co., Inc., 736 F.2d 1283, 1286 (9th Cir. 1984))]. The Barrett court did not specify whether an objection to the attorney misconduct was required to preserve the issue for a motion for new trial or the extent of misconduct required to justify a new trial [see Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)].

Five years later, the Nevada Supreme Court took on this issue again in DeJesus v. Flick [116 Nev. 812, 7 P.3d 459 (2000)]. The DeJesus majority noted that as a general rule, failure to object to attorney misconduct precludes review, but concluded that an exception exists in cases of plain error resulting from the inflammatory quality and sheer quantity of misconduct [DeJesus, 116 Nev. at 815816, 7 P.3d at 462].

Just a few years later, in Ringle v. Bruton [120 Nev. 82, 86 P.3d 1032 (2004)], the Nevada Supreme Court clarified when unobjected-to attorney misconduct would be considered the basis for a new trial. The Ringle court held that egregious unobjected-to misconduct would be considered in those rare circumstances where the comments are of such sinister influence as to constitute irreparable and fundamental error [Ringle, 120 Nev. at 9596, 86 P.3d at 10401041].

Lioce Brings Us Up to Date. That brings us to the final target: Lioce v. Cohen [124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)].ⁿ¹ In Lioce, the Nevada Supreme Court breaks down the analysis of whether a new trial should be allowed due to attorney misconduct into several categories, which are detailed below.

When Misconduct Is Objected to and Admonishments Are Given. In Lioce, the Nevada Supreme Court first addresses circumstances where the attorney misconduct is objected to and the objection is sustained. The court noted that in such circumstances, sustaining the objection is not enough--the court should admonish the jury and counsel. If admonishment is properly given, the burden is on the party seeking a new trial to demonstrate that the misconduct is so extreme that the objection and admonishment could not remove the misconducts effect [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)]. If the moving party meets that burden, a new trial should be granted [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)].

When Misconduct Is Objected to But Objection Is Overruled. The Nevada Supreme Court then addresses circumstances where the attorney misconduct is objected to but the court overrules the objection and does not admonish the jury. When this occurs, the moving party must first demonstrate that the district court erred by overruling the partys objection [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)]. If the moving party meets that burden, the trial court must then consider whether an admonition to the jury would likely have affected the verdict in favor of the moving party, evaluating the evidence and the parties and the attorneys demeanor to determine whether a partys substantial rights were affected by the courts failure to sustain the objection and admonish the jury [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)].

When Misconduct Is Objected to but Misconduct Continues. The Nevada Supreme Court next considers circumstances where the attorney misconduct is repeated or persistent, and is objected to by the opposing party. The Lioce court noted that by being forced to continuously object to such conduct, the nonoffending attorney is placed in the difficult position of having to make repeated objections before the trier of fact, which might cast a negative impression on the attorney and the party the attorney represents, emphasizing the improper point [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)]. As a result, when considering a motion for new trial based on repeated or persistent misconduct, the court must consider that by engaging in continued misconduct, the offending attorney has accepted the risk that the jury will be influenced by his misconduct and give great weight to the fact that single instances of improper conduct that could have been cured by objection and admonishment might not be curable when that improper conduct is repeated or persistent [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)].

When No Objection Is Made Concerning Misconduct. The Lioce court finally considers circumstances where a motion for new trial is brought, but no objection was made concerning the underlying attorney misconduct. The Nevada Supreme Court maintains the position that failure to object to attorney misconduct is generally deemed a waiver, but that in cases of plain error the misconduct may be considered in the new trial analysis [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)]. The burden is high, and requires a determination that no other reasonable explanation for the verdict exists [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)]. In other words, but for the misconduct, the verdict would have been different [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. 1 (January 17, 2008)].

What Does This Mean for the Trial Lawyer? The most important thing to take away from Lioce is the importance of preserving all objections--particularly those relating to attorney misconduct--at trial. Best practice dictates that counsel should repeat the objection after each instance of attorney misconduct to ensure a complete and clear record. In addition to simply stating the objections, counsel must also ensure that the closing arguments are reported and transcribed as part of the record [see Beccard v. Nev. Natl Bank, 99 Nev. 63, 657 P.2d 1154 (1983)]. A motion for new trial should be brought after the jury enters its verdict; until that occurs, the required prejudice cannot be demonstrated.

To avoid engaging in attorney misconduct, counsel must be aware of the state of the law in this delicate area of practice. In Lioce, the three categories of improper closing argument noted were [Lioce v. Cohen, 124 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 1 (January 17, 2008)]:

- (1) Jury nullification;
- (2) Statements of personal opinion; and
- (3) Golden rule arguments.

The Nevada Supreme Court discussed additional areas of forbidden argument in DeJesus v. Flick [116 Nev. 812, 7 P.3d 459 (2000)] and Canterino v. Mirage Casino-Hotel [117 Nev. 19, 16 P.3d 415 (2001)]. Specifically, those cases provide that counsels arguments cannot contain:

- (1) Perceived emotionalism;
- (2) Inflammatory argument;
- (3) Personal commentary concerning a party or witness; or
- (4) Send a message arguments (unless in relation to a punitive damages case).

Although this list is not comprehensive of all potential misconduct, it provides substantial guidance as to areas that are clearly outside the scope of permissible argument.

Lioce provides a great deal of clarity as to what is required in various circumstances to justify the granting of a new trial based on attorney misconduct. Hopefully, the Nevada Supreme Court will, in the future, further focus the authority as set forth in Lioce rather than making it just another in a string of moving targets.

For additional general information on the purpose and permissible scope of closing argument in Nevada and objections to closing argument, see NEVADA CIVIL PRACTICE MANUAL, Ch. 22, Trials, § 22.24 (Matthew Bender).

For additional general information on attorney conduct and misconduct, see NEVADA CIVIL PRACTICE MANUAL, Ch. 22, Trials, § 22.25 (Matthew Bender).

Return to Text

n1 This opinion vacates 122 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 115 (December 28, 2006), which bears the same name.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Leah A. Martin is an associate with Bailey Kennedy in Las Vegas, Nevada. Ms. Martin attended the University of Nevada, Las Vegas, receiving her J.D. summa cum laude 2002; B.A., Political Science summa cum laude 1999; and

B.A., Environmental Studies summa cum laude 1999. Ms. Martin was the recipient of the William S. Boyd Outstanding Graduate Award at the William S. Boyd School of Law. Ms. Martin served as Editor-in-Chief of the Nevada Law Journal, and served as judicial extern to the Honorable Phillip M. Pro of the United States District Court for the District of Nevada. Before joining Bailey & Kennedy in 2006, Ms. Martin was an associate at Nevadas largest law firm from 2002 to 2006.

Since 2003, Ms. Martin has served as an associate editor for the State Bar of Nevada CLE Publications Committee on the Nevada Civil Practice Manual, published by Matthew Bender. Beginning in 2006, Ms. Martin has assisted in teaching Nevada Civil Practice at the William S. Boyd School of Law. Ms. Martin practices in the area of civil litigation. She has substantial experience in the areas of products liability, wrongful death, complex commercial litigation, class actions, dissenting shareholders rights, and appellate advocacy. Bailey Kennedy represents, among others, healthcare facilities, publicly traded corporations, gaming companies, financial institutions, travel and tourism leaders, public entities, real estate developers, sports and entertainment concerns, and entrepreneurs.

171 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Pleading Scierter: Vairo on the Remand of Makor Issues v. Tellabs

2008 Emerging Issues 1964

Pleading Scierter: Vairo on the Remand of Makor Issues v. Tellabs

By Georgene Vairo

February 28, 2008

SUMMARY: Georgene Vairo on Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd. v. Tellabs, Inc. The Seventh Circuit on remand applied the Supreme Courts new Tellabs standard for pleading scierter under the PSLRA in Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd. v. Tellabs, Inc. This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author and editor of several books including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, discusses how the Seventh Circuit interpreted Tellabs and addresses how lower courts may apply the standard in the future.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd. v. Tellabs, Inc., F.3d, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 975 (7th Cir. Jan. 17, 2008), involves the application of the Supreme Courts new, stricter standard for judging allegations of scierter in securities fraud actions under the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (PSLRA). [See Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. , 127 S. Ct. 2499, 168 L. Ed. 2d 179, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8270 (June 21, 2007), discussed in Moores Federal Practice Update, August 1, 2007, p. 177]. Here, the Seventh Circuit, on remand, adhered to its earlier decision and ruled that the complaint was sufficient even under the strict formulation.

Procedural Background. The Seventh Circuit originally reversed the dismissal of the suit by the district court. The Supreme Court then reversed the Seventh Circuit, setting out a new, more stringent, test for determining whether allegations of securities fraud create a strong inference of scierter" as required by the PSLRA. The Supreme Court then remanded to the Seventh Circuit with directions to consider whether the plaintiffs' allegations of scierter were sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss under the standard defined by the Supreme Court.

Standard for Alleging Scierter. The PSLRA requires courts to determine whether the complaint contains the required strong inference." A complaint that on its face creates only a weak or bare inference of scierter, suggesting that the plaintiff would prevail only if there were no defense case at all, must be dismissed. The Seventh Circuit continued: Apparently Congress does not believe that weak complaints should put a defendant to the expense of discovery in a securities fraud case, which is likely to be complexas this case is."

Unquestionably, to prove liability in a securities fraud action, the plaintiff must show that the defendant either knew a material statement was false, or was reckless in disregarding a substantial risk that it was false. The PSLRA provides that the complaint must state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind" [15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2)]. Under the Supreme Court's interpretation of this language, a court must dismiss a complaint unless a reasonable person would deem the inference of scienter cogent and at least as compelling as any opposing inference one could draw from the facts alleged." Moreover, the plaintiff must plead facts rendering an inference of scienter at least as likely as any plausible opposing inference."

Conclusion. The Seventh Circuit correctly articulated the three aspects of the Supreme Courts new test: 1) cogency; 2) comparability; and 3) plausibility. It also noted the departure of the Courts new test from established pleading rules: [t]o judges raised on notice pleading, the idea of drawing a strong inference' from factual allegations is mysterious." Further, it noted that even when a plaintiff is required by Rule 9(b) to plead facts with particularity, the district court must treat the pleaded facts as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the plaintiff. Thus, the Tellabs court on remand had to deal with a brave new world beyond notice pleading and presumptions favoring plaintiffs.

Plaintiffs Allegations. The Seventh Circuit reviewed the story told by the plaintiff in the complaint: The defendant's chief executive officer and others had made announcements about the defendant's products, a telephone switching system called TITAN 5500 and its successor product, TITAN 6500. They said that the 6500 system was available now" and that a company had signed a multi year, $100 million contract to buy it, although in fact no sales closed until after the period covered by the complaint. They stated that sales of the 5500 would also continue to grow. Other announcements said that customers are buying more and more" of the defendant's equipment, that the defendant had set the stage for sustained growth," that growth was robust," that customers are embracing" the 6500, and that sales of the 5500 were still going strong."

The defendant later reduced its sales estimates slightly but said it was doing so because of lower than expected growth in a part of its business unrelated to the 5500 and 6500 systems, that interest in and demand for the 6500 continues to grow," and that it was experiencing no weakness in demand for the 5500. Despite these claims, the defendant had been flooding its customers with tens of millions of dollars worth of 5500 systems that the customers had not requested, in order to create an illusion of demand. The defendant had to lease extra storage space to accommodate the large number of returns.

A few weeks after making these statements, the defendant reduced its sales projections significantly, but reiterated that demand was very strong" and that [e]very thing we can build, we are building and shipping." Shortly afterward, however, the defendant announced a major drop in revenues, and its share price plummeted. Not a single 6500 system was shipped during the complaint period.

Inference of Scienter Was At Least as Compelling as Any Opposing Inference." The Seventh Circuit found it easier to consider the second, comparative part of the Supreme Court's formulation first: whether the inference of scienter was at least as compelling as the contrary inference. According to the court, the two competing inferences were that the company knew the statements were false and material, or that the falsity was the result of innocent or careless mistakes. The critical question was how likely it was that the allegedly false statements were the result of merely careless mistakes at the management level based on false information from below, rather than of an intent to deceive or a reckless indifference to whether the statements were misleading.

The inference that the false statements were merely careless was exceedingly unlikely. The 5500 and the 6500 were the defendant's most important products. Sounding like Representative Elijah E. Cummings (D. Md.) commenting on Roger Clemens testimony at the House Baseball Steroids Hearing on February 13, 2008, the Seventh Circuit stated that: That no member of the company's senior management who was involved in authorizing or making public statements about the demand for the 5500 and 6500 knew that they were false is very hard to credit, and no plausible story has yet been told by the defendants that might dispel our incredulity." The defendant argued that its executives had no motive to exaggerate the prospects for the 5500 and 6500 systems because within months they acknowledged their mistakes and disclosed the true situation, and because they did not profit from it financially. However, the executives might have thought that the situation would right itself and the benefits of concealment would exceed the costs. The inference of scienter, the Seventh Circuit concluded, was not only as likely as its opposite, it was far more likely.

Inference of Scienter Was Cogent. "If there are only two possible inferences, and one is much more likely than the other, it must be cogent." Because the alternative hypotheses either a cascade of innocent mistakes, or acts of subordinate employees, either or both resulting in a series of false statements are far less likely than the hypothesis of scienter at the corporate level at which the statements were approved, the latter hypothesis must be considered cogent." It was conceivable, the Seventh Circuit said, that the defendant's chief executive, who was responsible for most of the statements, was unaware of the problems of his company's two major products, but it was exceedingly unlikely.

Inferring Collective Intent. Although it found that the complaint before it satisfied the Supreme Courts test, the Seventh Circuit noted other problems confronting plaintiffs in PSLRA cases: The problem with inferring a collective intent to deceive behind the act of a corporation is that the hierarchical and differentiated corporate structure makes it quite plausible that a fraud, though ordinarily a deliberate act, could be the result of a series of acts none of which was both done with scienter and imputable to the company by the doctrine of respondeat superior... To establish corporate liability for a violation of Rule 10b-5 requires look[ing] to the state of mind of the individual corporate official or officials who make or issue the statement (or order or approve it or its making or issuance, or who furnish information or language for inclusion therein, or the like) rather than generally to the collective knowledge of all the corporation's officers and employees acquired in the course of their employment.

Channel-Stuffing as Fraud? Similarly, the Seventh Circuit warns that the use of channel stuffing as the basis for inferring fraud also is more difficult in the wake of Tellabs: Channel stuffing becomes a form of fraud only when it is used . . . to book revenues on the basis of goods shipped but not really sold because the buyer can return them. However, the plaintiffs complaint sufficiently alleged channel-stuffing.

Confidential Sources. As a final matter, the Seventh Circuit discussed the complaint's reliance on confidential sources for its allegations. In a recent case, the Seventh Circuit had ruled that allegations as to scienter derived from confidential informants, because the strength of inferences to be drawn from them is so difficult to assess, must be strongly discounted" [see Higginbotham v. Baxter Int'l Inc., 495 F.3d 753, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 17918 (7th Cir. July 27, 2007), discussed in Moore's Federal Practice Update, October 1, 2007, p. 263]. The present case was very different in the Seventh Circuit's view. In Higginbotham, there was no basis for a strong inference of scienter other than the confidential sources, described merely as three ex employees and two consultants. The confidential sources listed in the complaint in the present case, in contrast, were numerous and consisted of persons who from the description of their jobs were in a position to know the alleged facts at first hand e.g., that sales of the 5500 were dropping and units were being returned, that the 6500 was still in the beta stage and failing performance tests conducted by prospective customers, and that it was too bulky for customers' premises. The information from the confidential informants was set forth in convincing detail, with some of the information, moreover, corroborated by multiple sources. Under these circumstances, the absence of proper names did not invalidate the drawing of a strong inference from the informants' assertions.

Conclusion. The Seventh Circuit concluded that the plaintiffs had succeeded, with regard to the statements alleged to be false and material, in pleading scienter in conformity with the requirements of the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. The court therefore adhered to its prior decision to reverse the judgment of the district court dismissing the suit, and remanded for further proceedings.

I predicted in my Expert Commentary to the Supreme Courts Tellabs opinion that it would be likely to generate analytic confusion in the lower courts as they struggled with Justice Ginsburgs majority formulation. In their concurrences, Justices Scalia and Alito adopted even more stringent tests. Justice Scalias test is: whether the inference of scienter (if any) is more plausible than the inference of innocence. Justice Alitos similar test is: To satisfy the strong inference test, the plaintiff must show that the inference is more likely than not correct. However, as in any context, the more strict sounding the test, the more latitude the district court will have in ruling for a defendant, and the greater the likelihood that an opinion dismissing a case will be affirmed in a close case. The Seventh Circuit clearly had the concurring opinions in mind when it applied the Supreme Courts test(s) to the story told in the complaint. The courts cogency analysis made clear that the court believed that the plaintiffs theory was more plausible than the defendants.

One of the interesting things to note in this regard is that it would appear to be a jury function to decide whether a theory is more or less plausible. Even though Tellabs presents an easier case for deviating from the Federal Rules of Civil Procedures pleading rules because Congress enacted the strong inference requirement, it is consistent with another recent Supreme Court pleading case that tightened up pleading in an antitrust context. [See Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. , 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 5901 (2007)]. As a general matter, both cases are consistent with the approach taken by the Supreme Court in its 1986 trilogy of summary judgment cases. Bell Atlantic, in turn, also is reminiscent of Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986), in terms of its analysis and emphasis. Therefore, the pleading standards enunciated in these two cases may have ramifications to pleading practice beyond the realm of antitrust and PSLRA cases.

During the Spring and Summer of 1986, the Supreme Court decided three summary judgment cases: Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986); Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986); and Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). The trilogy was decided at a time when the federal courts took other stringent steps to correct perceived abuses of the judicial system. In 1983, amendments to Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 11, 16 and 26 became effective. These amended rules attempted to clarify the kind of litigation practice that would no longer be tolerated and required the imposition of sanctions when a court found abuses of the new standards. Most federal judges embraced these amended rules. Accordingly, the Rules ushered in a new era of federal practice in which anything goes no longer is the rule.

The Bell Atlantic majority opinions emphasis on avoiding needless discovery, improving efficiency, and cutting wasteful costs is consistent with the developments in the 1980s. Just as the trilogy of summary judgment cases suggested a quite radical departure from past summary judgment practice under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56, it will be interesting to see if Tellabs and Bell Atlantic provide a basis for a similar departure in pleading practice. Clearly, the new emphasis of the Supreme Court led the Seventh Circuit on remand to apply a more stringent test than it perhaps needed to. In any event, as a practical matter, litigants ought to couch their arguments regarding the strength of their scienter inferences in comparative terms. Clearly, if they can show that the inference more likely than not shows scienter, the complaint will survive.

References. 2 Moore's Federal Practice (3d Ed.) § 9.03[6][a].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

172 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Kajima Constr. Servs. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co.

2008 Emerging Issues 1943

McDonnell on Kajima Constr. Servs. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co.

By Joseph B. McDonnell

February 25, 2008

SUMMARY: Does the rule permitting an insured to tender its defense to one of multiple insurers require the exhaustion of all policies (both primary and excess) by the targeted insurer before a deselected insurers primary policy may be required to contribute? The Supreme Court in Kajima Constr. Servs. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 227 Ill. 2d 102 (Ill. 2007), held that, to the extent that defense and indemnity costs exceed the primary limits of the selected insurer, the other insurer must answer for the loss pursuant to its primary policy before coverage under the excess policy of the targeted insurer can be sought. This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The targeted tender rule permits an insured which has multiple insurance coverages to direct its tender of defense to one of those insurers, and obligates the company to which the defense is tendered to undertake the defense and indemnity of the insured to the limits of its policy. In this case of first impression, the Illinois Supreme Court explores the question of whether the company to which the defense is tendered must exhaust both its primary and excess coverages before coverage afforded by other companies is implicated.

Background. Kajima, a general contractor, entered into a subcontract with Midwestern Steel Fabricators, Inc. for a construction project. Under the contract terms, Midwestern was obligated to maintain Comprehensive General Liability (CGL) coverage naming Kajima as an additional insured. Midwestern provided Kajima with a certificate of insurance from St. Paul which named Kajima as an additional insured and which provided Kajima with $2,000,000 in general liability coverage and $5,000,000 in umbrella coverage. Kajima also had its own primary CGL insurance policy with Tokio with limits of $1,000,000 per occurrence.

A portion of Midwesterns subcontract was in turn subcontracted to Up-Rite Steel Company, whose employee was injured on the job. The employee filed suit against both Kajima and Midwestern. Kajima made a targeted tender to Midwestern and its insurer, St. Paul, stating that it was exercising its right to elect St. Paul to provide Kajima with the exclusive defense and indemnification in the employees suit. Ultimately, St. Paul accepted Kajimas targeted tender under a reservation of rights.

Prior to trial, Tokio demanded that St. Paul settle the Jones lawsuit for $3,000,000 from its primary and umbrella insurance policies. St. Paul refused this demand. The case settlement was ultimately agreed to, with St. Paul agreeing to pay its primary limits of $2,000,000 and Tokio contributing its primary limits of $1,000,000. Kajima and Tokio then filed a declaratory judgment suit against St. Paul seeking reimbursement of the $1,000,000 that Tokio had contributed to the settlement.

Trial Court Proceedings. Both parties filed motions for summary judgment. Tokio argued that St. Paul, with its primary coverage of $2,000,000 and excess coverage of $5,000,000, was solely responsible for the defense and indemnification of Kajima without any contribution from Tokio. St. Paul took the position that, although the targeted tender rule permitted Kajima to tender its defense and indemnification to St. Paul as one of several insurers, Illinois law also provides that all primary policies must be exhausted prior to reaching an excess policy; and that Kajima had no right to require St. Paul to exhaust its excess coverage, over and above its primary limits, before subjecting other insurance to indemnification. The trial court agreed, granting St. Paul's motion for summary judgment and denying plaintiff's motion. The First District Appellate Court affirmed and the Illinois Supreme Court granted leave to appeal.

Decision on Appeal. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that, to the extent that defense and indemnity costs exceed the primary limits of the selected insurer, the other insurer must answer for the loss pursuant to its primary policy before coverage under the excess policy of the targeted insurer can be sought.

The Issue: Horizontal vs. Vertical Exhaustion. At issue was the horizontal exhaustion rule, which requires an insured which has multiple primary and excess policies to exhaust all of the primary policy limits before invoking excess coverage.

In its analysis, the Supreme Court said that earlier authority established that an insured must exhaust all primary coverage before the excess carrier can be compelled to participate. This became known as the horizontal exhaustion rule. United States Gypsum Co. v. Admiral Ins. Co., 268 Ill. App. 3d 598 (1994); AAA Disposal Systems, Inc. v. Aetna Casualty & Surety Co., 355 Ill. App. 3d 275 (2005); Outboard Marine Corp. v. Liberty Mutual Ins. Co., 283 Ill. App. 3d 630 (1996).

The targeted tender doctrine developed with Institute of London Underwriters v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 234 Ill. App. 3d 70 (1992). There, the Great Lakes Towing Company had a primary policy with Hartford and was an additional insured under a policy issued by Institute of London Underwriters. After Great Lakes was sued in a wrongful death action, it tendered defense of the suit to London Underwriters, also notifying Hartford of the suit but requesting that Hartford not participate in the action. London Underwriters settled the case and then filed a declaratory judgment action seeking a declaration that Hartford was obligated to pay 50% of the settlement.

The Appellate Court held that Hartford was not asked by its insured to participate and, therefore, its policy was never triggered. There was thus no reason to invoke the other insurance clause of London Underwriters policy.

The right of an insured to knowingly forgo an insurer's assistance by instructing the insurer not to involve itself in the litigation had been established in Cincinnati Cos. v. West American Ins. Co., 183 Ill. 2d 317 (1998). The Court there recognized that such a request may be made for various reasons, including the insured's fear that, if it tenders the defense to its own insurance company, its premiums may be increased or its policy canceled in the future. When a request not to participate is made by the insured, that particular insurer is relieved of its obligation to the insured with regard to that particular claim.

Later authority also recognized the right of an insured to deactivate a previous tender to an insurance company and to tender its defense to another insurer when coverage by the latter insurer has been discovered by the insured. Alcan United, Inc. v. West Bend Mutual Ins. Co., 303 Ill. App. 3d 72 (1999).

In John Burns Constr. Co. v. Indiana Ins. Co., 189 Ill. 2d 570 (2000), the Supreme Court had held that Burns

Construction had the right to choose which insurer would be required to defend and indemnify it and that nothing in the Indiana Insurance policy limited Burns right to select which insurer would be required to defend. The existence of an other insurance provision does not in and of itself overcome the insureds right to tender the defense of an action to one insurer alone.

In the case in question, the Supreme Court held that the horizontal exhaustion rule is based on a recognition of the difference between primary and excess insurance. Citing Justice Freeman's separate concurring opinion in Roberts v. Northland Ins. Co., 185 Ill. 2d 262, 275 (1998), the Court pointed out that when excess insurance exists as part of an overall insurance package, it provides a secondary level of coverage to protect the insured where a judgment or settlement exceeds the primary policy's limit of liability. In the ordinary case, the limits of the primary insurance must be exhausted before an excess carrier will be required to contribute to a settlement or judgment.

St. Paul's excess policy was entitled Umbrella Excess Liability Protection Coverage, which the Court characterized as a true excess policy. The Court declined to extend the targeted tender doctrine to require one insurer to vertically exhaust its primary and excess coverage limits before all primary insurance available to the insured had been exhausted. Extending the targeted tender rule in such would eliminate the distinction between primary and excess coverage. It would also make it possible for an insured to deselect all of its primary insurers and tender only to its carriers who had excess coverage as well as primary.

Consequently, the court said that the better rule is that the targeted tender can be applied to circumstances where concurrent primary coverage exists for additional insureds, but, in a situation where the costs of defense and indemnification exceed the primary limits of the targeted insurer, the deselected insurer must answer for the loss (to the extent of its limits) before the insured can seek coverage under an excess policy. This, said the court, preserves the distinction between primary and excess insurance policies.

Accordingly, Kajima was required to exhaust its primary policies before invoking St. Paul's excess coverage. Therefore, Tokio was not entitled to reimbursement of the $1,000,000 that it had paid toward the Jones settlement, and the judgment of the appellate court, affirming the decision of the trial court, was affirmed.

Tips for Practitioners. It is common, particularly in the construction industry, for both owners and general contractors to insist upon insurance protection as a component of the contract, which will cover them as additional insureds in the event of suit by an employee or other third party. Such provisions have been uniformly upheld (Davis v. Commonwealth Edison Co., 61 Ill. 2d 494 (Ill. 1975); USX Corp. v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 269 Ill. App. 3d 233 (Ill. App. Ct. 1994)) and are in fact recognized by statute. 740 ILCS 35/1 et seq. The additional insured must be certain to receive a certificate of insurance evidencing such coverage before permitting the contractor/subcontractor to commence work; failure to do so may constitute a waiver of the requirement. Geier v. Hamer Enterprises, Inc., 226 Ill. App. 3d 372 (Ill. App. Ct. 1992). Moreover, it is prudent in most cases for the additional insured to tender the defense of the suit to the contractor/subcontractor and its insurer, to avoid any possible penalty in connection with its own coverage by way of increased premium or even cancellation.

Cross Reference. See generally Construction Law, Chapter 13: Risk Management and Indemnity.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant State Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnells trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

173 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Best on Vasquez v. People, 173 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1938

Best on Vasquez v. People, 173 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2007)

By Arthur Best

February 22, 2008

SUMMARY: A criminal defendant forfeits his right to confront a witness against him under the United States and Colorado constitutions if he procures that persons unavailability with an intent to prevent the person from providing evidence in the criminal justice system. Vasquez v. People, 173 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2007) answers a significant question: can hearsay statements be admitted in a case if the defendant killed the hearsay declarant to prevent the declarant from testifying in a case different from the current case? It also resolves a related problem, whether a defendants conduct that causes a forfeiture of Confrontation Clause rights should be treated as also barring the defendant from raising standard hearsay objections to statements by the witness whom the defendant has rendered unavailable.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

A criminal defendant forfeits his right to confront a witness against him under the United States and Colorado constitutions if he procures that persons unavailability with an intent to prevent the person from providing evidence in the criminal justice system. Vasquez v. People, 173 P.3d 1099 (Colo. 2007) answers a significant question: can hearsay statements be admitted in a case if the defendant killed the hearsay declarant to prevent the declarant from testifying in a case different from the current case? It also resolves a related problem, whether a defendants conduct that causes a forfeiture of Confrontation Clause rights should be treated as also barring the defendant from raising standard hearsay objections to statements by the witness whom the defendant has rendered unavailable.

Summary of the Case

The defendants wife was scheduled to testify against him on harassment charges. Two days before the date of that intended testimony, she was found dead in a motel room. When a police officer arrived at the scene, the defendant (who was present) said to the police officer, referring to his wife, She set me up. The defendant was tried and convicted of first degree murder for killing his wife.

Subsequently, he was charged with restraining order and bail bond violations. In that case, the trial court admitted out-of-court statements the defendant's wife had made reporting restraining order and bail bond violations, although the defendant made Confrontation Clause and hearsay objections to their admission. With regard to forfeiture, the defendant argued that he could not have formed the intent to prevent his wife from testifying in the case because the case was not pending at the time of the murder.

The trial court held that the statements were admissible because part of the defendant's motivation for killing his wife was to silence her with regard to the restraining order and bail bond case. The trial court also held that the residual exception to the hearsay exclusionary rule applied to the statements. The defendant was convicted and the conviction was affirmed by the Court of Appeals. In People v. Vasquez, 155 P.3d 565 (Colo. App. 2006), the Court of Appeals held that no matter what purpose the defendant might have had for killing his victim, the fact that he killed her prevented him from asserting a Confrontation Clause claim and also prevented him from raising hearsay objections to admission of her statements. The Colorado Supreme Court granted certiorari to consider the Confrontation Clause and hearsay issues.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Federal Confrontation Clause Rights. Admitting testimonial hearsay at trial, absent the unavailability of the declarant and a prior opportunity for cross-examination by the defendant, violates the defendant's Sixth Amendment right to confrontation. See Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L. Ed. 2d 177 (2004).

Detailed analysis of current Confrontation Clause jurisprudence is found in Criminal Evidentiary Foundations § 10.01 and Weinsteins Evidence Manual § 14.03.

State Confrontation Clause Rights. In People v. Fry, 92 P.3d 970 (Colo. 2004), the Colorado Supreme Court adopted the Crawford test as the appropriate inquiry for the admission of testimonial hearsay under Colorado's confrontation clause.

Motive Requirement for Forfeiture of Confrontation Clause Rights. In People v. Moreno, 160 P.3d 242, 247 (Colo. 2007), the Colorado Supreme Court stated that to deprive a criminal defendant of his right to confront a witness, the defendant's wrongful conduct must have been "designed, at least in part, to subvert the criminal justice system by depriving that system of the evidence upon which it depends."

The Colorado Supreme Courts Decision

Specificity of Motive to Support Forfeiture. The Court noted that this case is one of first impression in Colorado and nationally, in terms of state evidence holdings. No state that uses the intent requirement for forfeiture has considered whether a defendant's intent to prevent a witness from testifying in one proceeding can support forfeiture in a different proceeding.

Federal Rules Analogy and General Policy. The Court considered federal courts treatment of Rule 804(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Evidence. That Rule does not have a parallel in the Colorado Rules of Evidence but the Court considered it as persuasive with regard to understanding forfeiture doctrine. The Federal Rule requires that the defendant intended to render the declarant unavailable as a witness but does not refer to any particular case. Construing the application of forfeiture broadly, the Court suggested, will provide the greatest deterrent to tampering with witnesses.

Motive to Suppress Testimony in Any Case Supports Forfeiture for All Cases. On the basis of the federal analogy and general policy, the Court held that a defendant forfeits his right to confront a witness at any proceeding in which the witness's statements are otherwise admissible when a trial court makes three findings:

- (1) the witness is unavailable;
- (2) the defendant was involved in procuring the unavailability of the witness; and
- (3) the defendant acted with the intent to deprive the criminal justice system of evidence.

The Court stated explicitly that the defendant does not have to be under indictment or pending trial and the declarant need not be a scheduled witness at the time of the defendant's interference. Additionally, preventing the witness's testimony does not have to be the defendant's sole motivation for the action that has the effect of preventing it.

Procedural Aspects. The Court held that in considering forfeiture, a trial court should conduct a hearing outside the presence of the jury. Under Colorado Rule of Evidence 104(a), the determination is not bound by the rules of evidence except those with respect to privileges, so hearsay evidence, including the unavailable witness's out-of-court statements, will be admissible. A preponderance of evidence standard applies to the trial court's findings, and they will not be disturbed on appeal unless they are clearly erroneous.

Application in This Case. The Court considered whether the trial courts decision on forfeiture satisfied the requirements announced in this decision. It found that there was an adequate factual basis for the trial courts conclusion that the defendants conduct in killing his wife was motivated in part by his interest in suppressing her testimony. Support for this conclusion was the defendants statement at the scene of the murder, She set me up.

General Hearsay Rule Survives Forfeiture. Once a defendant has forfeited Confrontation Clause objections to a declarants out-of-court statements, should the general hearsay exclusionary rule still have force? Under the Federal Rules of Evidence and in many states, forfeiture of Confrontation Clause rights is equivalent to forfeiture of hearsay objections as well. The Supreme Court rejected that position, stating that even if a defendant has forfeited Confrontation Clause rights, the evidence must meet provisions of the Colorado Rules of Evidence that are intended to assure the reliability of evidence.

Application in This Case. The hearsay statements in this case were statements made by the murder victim to police, stating that her husband had left messages on her phone, in violation of a restraining order. The trial court admitted these statements under the residual exception, Colorado Rule of Evidence 807, which authorizes admission of

A statement not specifically covered by Rule 803 or 804 but having equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, is not excluded by the hearsay rule, if the court determines that (A) the statement is offered as evidence of a material fact; (B) the statement is more probative on the point for which it is offered than any other evidence which the proponent can procure through reasonable efforts; and (C) the general purposes of these rules and the interests of justice will best be served by admission of the statement into evidence.

The trial court made findings on the record pursuant to this Rule, concluding that the legitimate value of the evidence outweighed risks of prejudice and that admission would serve justice. The Supreme Court noted that the findings were incomplete but that this error was harmless. It also noted that corroborating evidence should not have been relied on to support the Rule 807 finding.

Comments

The Supreme Courts holding gives broad effect to the forfeiture doctrine, but does leave one class of cases in which a defendant who has made a declarant unavailable could be protected from admission of that declarant's statements: cases where the defendant's conduct had no motivation at all with regard to the declarant's possible role in the future as a witness. Cases of that kind might involve a killing during a fight or a robbery. An interpretation that applies forfeiture even in cases of that kind has been made by the California Supreme Court in People v. Giles, 40 Cal. 4th 833, 55 Cal. Rptr. 3d 133, 152 P.3d 433 (2007). The United States Supreme Court has granted certiorari in that California case, and is likely to decide whether a defendant forfeits the right to confrontation when the defendant engaged in an intentional criminal act that caused the declarant to be unavailable for any reason.

In connection with the residual hearsay exception, the Vasquez court adhered to a close reading of Colorado Rule of Evidence 807. It stated that corroboration of an out-of-court statement does not support a finding of admissibility under that Rule. While the Rule refers to statements that have circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness that are equivalent to those that support the other enumerated hearsay exceptions, those guarantees are understood to be guarantees found in the nature and circumstances of the statement, not supplied by separate sources of corroboration.

Colorado Evidence Courtroom Manual, Chapter 807 and Colorado Evidentiary Foundations § 10.P analyze Colorado cases on the residual exception.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsel's office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Nader's Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored) a popular law school casebook.

174 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Best on United States v. Moran, 503 F.3d 1135 (10th Cir. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1939

Best on United States v. Moran, 503 F.3d 1135 (10th Cir. 2007)

By Arthur Best

February 22, 2008

SUMMARY: Character evidence is inadmissible to show that a person acted in conformity with his or her character on a specific occasion. However, evidence that could support a conclusion about character is properly admitted if it is also relevant in some way that does not involve the prohibited character evidence. Trial courts receive lots of deference when they conclude that a non-character rationale for admission of evidence about a defendants past conduct is legitimate. In this case, proof that a defendant had been convicted in 1994 of knowing possession of a firearm was treated as properly admitted to show that when he was in possession of a firearm eleven years later, that possession was also knowing.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

Character evidence is inadmissible to show that a person acted in conformity with his or her character on a specific occasion. However, evidence that could support a conclusion about character is properly admitted if it is also relevant in some way that does not involve the prohibited character evidence. Trial courts receive lots of deference when they conclude that a non-character rationale for admission of evidence about a defendants past conduct is legitimate. In this case, proof that a defendant had been convicted in 1994 of knowing possession of a firearm was treated as properly admitted to show that when he was in possession of a firearm eleven years later, that possession was also knowing.

Summary of the Case

In 2005, the defendant was driving a car and was stopped by law enforcement personnel. An officer saw the butt of a rifle stock sticking out of an unzipped rifle case on the vehicles back seat. Next to the rifle were a bow and some arrows. An officer asked the defendant if the rifle was loaded, and the defendant replied that it was. The defendant was indicted for being a felon in possession of a firearm. At his trial for that offense, when the defendant denied that he knowingly possessed the rifle, the court admitted evidence that the defendant had been convicted in 1994 for being a felon in possession of a firearm. The court admitted evidence of that past conviction as relevant to show that the defendant had knowledge of the firearms presence in the car at the time of his 2005 arrest.

Pertinent Legal Principles

General Relevance Standard. Under the Federal Rules of Evidence, the general test for relevance, in Rule 401, heavily favors admissibility. It states that evidence is relevant if it has any tendency to affect the probability of the existence of any fact of consequence at trial.

Special Rule for Character Evidence. Federal Rule of Evidence 404(a) requires that evidence be excluded if its only relevance is to support a conclusion that an individual has a certain character trait and acted in conformity with that character on a specific occasion. However, Rule 404(b) makes clear that evidence of other acts may be admissible for purposes other than proof of a defendant's bad character or general propensity to commit crime. It states:

Evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show action in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident

Huddleston Analysis. In Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 691692, 108 S. Ct. 1496, 99 L. Ed. 2d 771 (1988), the Supreme Court held that evidence of a defendants prior conviction may be admitted if: (1) the evidence is offered for a proper purpose; (2) is relevant; (3) has probative value that is not substantially outweighed by its potential for unfair prejudice under Rule 403; and (4) the court gives a proper limiting instruction, if the defendant requests one.

Colorado Evidentiary Foundations § 6.D and Colorado Evidence Courtroom Manual, Chapter 404 analyze cases on non-character use of evidence of a defendants past crimes or bad acts.

The Tenth Circuits Decision

Applying Huddleston: Purpose. The Court applied each of the Huddleston factors to uphold the trial courts decision to admit the evidence. With regard to proper purpose, the Court noted that the defendant denied that he knowingly possessed the firearm, so that showing his knowledge of the weapon would serve a proper purpose.

Applying Huddleston: Relevance. On the issue of relevance, the Court held that knowing possession of a firearm in 1994 was relevant to whether someone in the presence of a firearm in 2005 had knowledge of that firearm. The Court cited earlier cases that reached the same conclusion: United States v. Mills, 29 F.3d 545 (10th Cir. 1994), United States v. Walker, 470 F.3d 1271 (8th Cir. 2006), United States v. Jernigan, 341 F.3d 1273 (11th Cir. 2003), and United States v. Cassell, 352 U.S. App. D.C. 84, 292 F.3d 788 (D.C. Cir. 2002).

Applying Huddleston: Balancing Probative Value and Unfair Prejudice. Considering the balance between probative value and unfair prejudice, the third Huddleston factor, the Court referred to the usual deference according trial courts with regard to this kind of balancing, and credited the trial courts statement that the evidence was highly probative. The Court stated that because the defendant had denied he had knowledge of the rifle, the prior conviction had clear probative value in rebutting this defense.

Applying Huddleston: Jury Instruction. The fourth Huddleston factor was satisfied with a jury instruction that cautioned the jury to consider the evidence "only as it bears on the defendant's intent, knowledge, absence of mistake or accident, and for no other purpose."

Comments

This opinion represents two well-known patterns in the treatment of other crimes evidence: generous deference by appellate courts to trial court decisions in the area, and generous pro-prosecution treatment of the Rule 404(b) list of possible non-character uses of information about a defendant's past bad acts.

The trial court held that possession of a firearm eleven years prior to the charged offense was highly probative, and the Tenth Circuit referred to the clear probative value of the evidence. However, the Tenth Circuit's opinion states that when the defendant was questioned about the rifle by a law enforcement officer, he stated that the rifle was loaded. Certainly that statement could support a jury conclusion that the defendant knew that the rifle was in the vehicle. The availability of that proof tending to support the conclusion of knowing possession could well have been treated as diminishing the probative value to the prosecution of the logical link between knowing possession in 1994 and knowing possession in 2005.

Practice Tip. Probative value of evidence should always be analyzed in the overall context of all evidence available that points in a certain direction. Where the prosecution has more than one way of showing a controverted fact, defense counsel should be aware that the availability of multiple items of evidence can decrease the probative value of any single item.

The Tenth Circuit's opinion acknowledged that admission of the prior conviction involved a propensity inference, but it characterized that propensity inference as specific enough to be different from a prohibited general inference of bad character. It distinguished a propensity to possess firearms from a propensity to commit criminal acts. Whether a jury can really make that distinction is, of course, a matter on which individuals and judges might disagree. But the Tenth Circuit's recognition that admission of this evidence involved a logical analysis that is similar to the prohibited kinds of propensity analysis may be instructive. In future cases, defense counsel might emphasize that parallel. If there are factors that might arguably reduce the probative value of other crimes evidence, and the trial court is inclined to acknowledge the relatively weak logic of the idea that since he knew about a weapon once so he may well have known about a weapon on another occasion, those factors might incline a trial court to exclude the other crimes evidence.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored) a popular law school casebook.

175 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Cathcart on DiCola v. White Brothers Performance Products, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 1941

Cathcart on DiCola v. White Brothers Performance Products, Inc.

By Patrick A. Cathcart

February 22, 2008

SUMMARY: Expert litigator Patrick A. Cathcart analyzes the Fourth District Court of Appeals ruling in DiCola v. White Brothers Performance Products Inc. (2008) 158 Cal. App. 4th 666, 69 Cal. Rptr. 3d 888, and its effect on the common practice of having attorneys for parties opposing motions for summary judgment provide declarations outlining the evidence that would controvert facts offered on the summary judgment motion.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: California Court of Appeal for the Fourth District Affirms Judgment By Limiting Permissible Testimony In Declarations. The Fourth District Court of Appeal, in affirming a grant of a motion for summary judgment, has also affirmed a ruling by the trial court striking a declaration in opposition to the motion as impermissible hearsay and double hearsay. The courts opinion in DiCola v. White Brothers Performance Products Inc. (2008) 158 Cal. App. 4th 666, 69 Cal. Rptr. 3d 888, will foreclose a common litigation practice of having attorneys for parties opposing motions for summary judgment provide declarations outlining the evidence that would controvert facts offered on the motion for summary judgment.

The Underlying Action. DiCola was a wrongful death and products liability action stemming from an accident that was alleged to have occurred when a motorcycle side stand failed to retract. The principal defendants were the alleged manufacturer and distributor of the motorcycle side stands. The motion for summary judgment argued, and the trial court found, that (1) there was no evidence that either White, a distributor, or Tolemar, a manufacturer, placed the allegedly defective side stand on the market; (2) plaintiffs' evidence did not create a triable issue of material fact as to whether White and Tolemar were the distributor and manufacturer, respectively, of an exemplar side stand that plaintiffs' experts asserted was essentially identical to the side stand involved in the case; and (3) defendants demonstrated they were not responsible for placing the subject side stand into the stream of commerce.

Declaration In Opposition to Summary Judgment. The opinion is a red flag to practitioners in preparing oppositions to motions for summary judgment. The appellate court reviewed and affirmed the trial courts ruling striking a declaration filed in a supplemental opposition to the motion. The declaration relied impermissibly on statements made by an attorney for a third plaintiff concerning the packaging and labeling of an exemplar side stand on which plaintiffs expert relied in connecting the exemplar side stand with the allegedly defective side stand. The declaration was provided by an associate with the plaintiffs law firm, and stated that the exemplar side stand relied on by plaintiffs two experts was identical to the one involve in the accident, that it was manufactured by Tolemar and distributed by White. The declaration stated:

[S]everal months after plaintiffs filed their complaint against Custom Chrome, that company's attorney of record, Mortimer Hartwell, and a Custom Chrome representative inspected Thomas DiCola's motorcycle and subject side stand. According to [declarant], Hartwell represented to her at that time that the subject side stand was not one of theirs, but a part manufactured and distributed by White. A few days later, Hartwell repeated that information to her in a letter. [Declarant] averred: "Custom Chrome's attorney then informed me that they had an exemplar of a White Brothers side stand that was identical to the subject side stand. Per our discovery request, Mr. Hartwell provided our offices with a Burly Brands side stand. The side stand that was produced is exemplar 'B' This side stand came in its original packaging for comparison to the subject side stand. [] ... Exemplar 'B' was in an un-opened, vacuum-sealed package when it arrived in our office. It was identified by the label 'Burly Brands' across the top of the packaging. I opened the package and removed the side stand. Inside the package was an instruction sheet for proper mounting of the side stand. On this sheet, the side stand indicated it was a White Brothers product, part 12-1200X."

[Declarant] averred that as a result of this information, plaintiffs eventually added White as a defendant, which in responses to special interrogatories "identified their packaging of the 12-1200X side stand in an identical manner to the packaging of the side stand provided by Custom Chrome." [Declarant] averred that White identified Tolemar as the sole manufacturer of the 12-1200X, and stated, "I am informed and believe, and thereupon allege that Tolemar, Inc. is the sole manufacturer of the 12-1200X side stand, and that they only sell their product to White ... for distribution and sale."

Grounds for Ruling That Declaration Contained Hearsay. In striking the declarations statements on grounds of hearsay, the appellate court noted that the appellants did not contest the hearsay nature of attorney Hartwells statements to the declarant, but also that the declarants statements concerning the packaging and the information on the labels, which would have tied the exemplar to the manufacturer and distributor, was double hearsay. The appellate court noted that its standard of review on rulings concerning admissibility of evidence is for abuse of discretion, not the de novo review according a review of the grant of the motion for summary judgment [Alexander v. Codemasters Group Limited (2002) 104 Cal. App. 4th 129, 139-140, fn. 3, 127 Cal. Rptr. 2d 145; Jackson v. County of Los Angeles (1997) 60 Cal. App. 4th 171, 192, fn. 15, 70 Cal. Rptr. 2d 96]. The trial court would be overruled only if it exceeded the bounds of reason [In re Marriage of Eben-King & King (2000) 80 Cal.App.4th 92, 118, 95 Cal. Rptr. 2d 113]. The appellate court went further, relying on Smith v. Smith (1969) 1 Cal. App. 3d 952, 958, 82 Cal. Rptr. 282, and In re Marriage of Eben-King & King (2000) 80 Cal.App.4th 92, 118; 95 Cal. Rptr. 2d 113, holding not only that it would have to determine "no judge could reasonably have made the order that he did, but also that the evidence provided would be "insufficient if it presents a state of facts which simply affords an opportunity for a difference of opinion."

Proper Foundation for Evidence Provided In an Attorneys Declaration. The declaration at issue declaration sought to use the package label and enclosed information sheet to prove that the content of the package--the exemplar side stand was a particular model manufactured by Tolemar and distributed by White. The appellate court ruled that the package labeling as well as the instruction sheet were extrajudicial assertions offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted, namely, that the box contained a certain brand side stand [see In re Michael G. (1993) 19 Cal. App. 4th 1674, 1677, 24 Cal. Rptr. 2d 260 (information on label relative to ingredients of spray can was hearsay)]. The declaration, in reciting this written information, was inadmissible double hearsay.

Plaintiff offered discovery responses in an attempt to establish supporting facts as to Whites distribution of the exemplar. However, the discovery responses did not reference the exemplar side stand and, according to the court of appeal, did not concede that the allegedly defective side stand was one of it products, or, while likely distributed by Tolemar, that it was in fact distributed by Tolemar.

In footnote 7, the appellate court in DiCola provides one blueprint for the practitioner:

For example, a writing is admissible as a business record if it was made in the regular course of business, at or near the time of the relevant event, the "custodian or other qualified witness testifies to its identity and the mode of its preparation," and the "sources of information and method and time of preparation were such as to indicate its trustworthiness." (Evid. Code, § 1271, subds. (a)-(d).) Plaintiffs made no such showing in the trial court as to example B's packaging or instruction sheet.

Practitioners could avoid a potentially disastrous result in opposing motions for summary judgment if they use the 75 days afforded following notice of a motion for summary judgment, or, if necessary, avail themselves of Code Civ. Proc. § 437c(h) and, through further discovery, establish the foundation and factual basis for admitting the hearsay. In DiCola, testimony or discovery responses from White personnel identifying the exemplar side stand, and authenticating the labeling, and if necessary, testimony from appropriate Tolemar witnesses, would have established information concerning the method and time of preparation that would indicate the trustworthiness of the testimony as required by Evid. Code § 1271. In seeking further discovery under Code Civ. Proc. § 437c(h), the information provided in the declaration at issue in DiCola, coupled with the information in that case that was provided by plaintiffs two expert witnesses, should also satisfy the requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 437c(h) for establishing the need and probability of further discovery.

For discussion of summary judgment generally, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 537, Summary Judgment and Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 38, Summary Judgment.

For discussion of the preparation of the notice of motion for summary judgment and accompanying papers, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 537, Summary Judgment, § 537.21[2].

For specific discussion of preparing affidavits and declarations in support of a motion for summary judgment, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 537, Summary Judgment, § 537.24[1].

For points and authorities relating to summary judgments, see California Points & Authorities, Ch. 221, Summary Judgments.

For analysis of Evid. Code § 1271, the business records exception to the hearsay rules, discussed in this commentary, see Scallen & Weissenberger, California Evidence Courtroom Manual, Div. 10, Hearsay Evidence, Ch. 2, Exceptions to the Hearsay Rule, Article 7, Section 1271 analysis.

For analysis of hearsay evidence issues generally, see Scallen & Weissenberger, California Evidence Courtroom Manual, Div. 10, Hearsay Evidence, Ch. 1, General Provisions.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Patrick A. Cathcart is a founding partner in the Los Angeles law firm Cathcart Collins LLP. For over 25 years, his practice has emphasized complex business trials and appeals, including multi-party insurance coverage litigation and professional liability matters. He is an editorial consultant for Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Trial and Post-Trial Civil Procedure. Mr. Cathcart was trial counsel for London market insurers in Fuller-Austin Insulation Co. v. Highlands Ins. Co. (2006) 135 Cal. App. 4th 958, 38 Cal. Rptr. 3d 716, and lead counsel for the successful appeal in Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's of London v. Superior Court (Powerine) (2001) 24 Cal. 4th 945, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 672, 16 P.3d 94. Mr. Cathcart is a Past President of the Association of Business Trial Lawyers (Los Angeles). Following law school, Mr. Cathcart clerked for United States District Judge Spencer Williams, in the Northern District of California. During law school, Mr. Cathcart was Editor-in-Chief of the Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly.

176 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McLean Brewer on Fireside Bank v. Superior Court

2008 Emerging Issues 1931

McLean Brewer on Fireside Bank v. Superior Court

By Carol McLean Brewer

February 21, 2008

SUMMARY: In Fireside Bank v. Superior Court (2007) [40 Cal. 4th 1069, 56 Cal. Rptr. 3d 861, 155 P.3d 268], the California Supreme Court revisited the long-dormant issue of one-way intervention in class actions. It held that trial courts in class actions should decide whether the class should be certified and if so, order class notice and an opportunity to opt out, before ruling on the substantive merits of the action. The Court held that one-way intervention--in which a trial court rules on the substantive merits in a putative class action before certifying and notifying the class--is prohibited in California unless the defendant waives its right to object to such a ruling or there is a compelling justification for doing so.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Introduction. In Fireside Bank v. Superior Court (2007) [40 Cal. 4th 1069, 56 Cal. Rptr. 3d 861, 155 P.3d 268], the California Supreme Court revisited the long-dormant issue of one-way intervention in class actions. It held that trial courts in class actions should decide whether the class should be certified and if so, order class notice and an opportunity to opt out, before ruling on the substantive merits of the action. The Court held that one-way intervention--in which a trial court rules on the substantive merits in a putative class action before certifying and notifying the class--is prohibited in California unless (1) the defendant waives its right to object to such a ruling, or (2) there is a compelling justification for doing so.

Factual Background of Fireside Bank. Fireside Bank sued the class representative on individual grounds, after repossessing a van on which she had failed to make payments. She then filed a class action cross-complaint. The class representative (cross-plaintiff) then moved for judgment on the pleadings as to Fireside Bank's individual claim against her, asserting that Fireside Bank's post-repossession notice violated the Rees-Levering Act [Civ. Code § 2981 et seq.], and therefore its claim against her was barred. When Fireside Bank objected on one-way intervention grounds, the cross-plaintiff agreed to have the class issues resolved before any merits ruling. She filed and then argued her class certification motion. But over Fireside Bank's objections and to the cross-plaintiff's surprise, the trial court ruled on the substantive merits of Fireside Bank's claim at the same time it decided that a class could be certified [see Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 1086, 1088].

The California Supreme Court held that the trial court abused its discretion by prematurely ruling on the motion for judgment on the pleadings simultaneously with its ruling on class certification, all of which was before class notice was sent [Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 1087]. But changed circumstances justified the cross-plaintiffs belated motion for class certification due to Fireside Banks belated discovery response establishing numerosity sufficient to support a class. Therefore, the Court declined to decertify the class, finding that to bar the cross-plaintiff from pursuing a class action in response to the trial courts error would be inequitable. The Court also found that vacating the trial court's premature merits ruling and ordering it to decide any future motion de novo would reduce the risk of one-way intervention for Fireside Bank without unduly punishing the plaintiffs [Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 1088].

Absent Compelling Justification, Court Must Decide Class Certification First. The California Supreme Court last touched on this issue in 1981, in Green v. Obledo (1981) [29 Cal. 3d 126, 172 Cal. Rptr. 206, 624 P.2d 256] in the context of a defendants belated motion to decertify a class after it lost on summary judgment. In Green, the Court reversed the trial courts decertification order. Green found that a defendant should not be allowed to sandbag a plaintiff, withholding its best case against certification and then seeking decertification if it lost on the merits [Green, 29 Cal. 3d at 147]. Green said procedural class-action issues--including the composition of the class--must ordinarily be resolved before a decision on the merits [Green, 29 Cal. 3d at 147 (italics added)].

In revisiting this issue in Fireside Bank, the Court clarified that ordinarily in Green means almost always. The Court explained that in Green, [w]hile it is true that we declined to strip trial courts of all authority to certify or decertify a class after a decision on the merits, we confined the trial courts authority to do so to situations involving a clear showing of changed circumstances. We further recognized that it is desirable for the trial court to retain some measure of flexibility in handling a class action; consequently, in an individual case compelling justifications may exist that will support a trial courts decision to depart from the usual order. Absent a finding of compelling justification, however, for the trial court to refuse defendants request to resolve class issues before merits issues is an abuse of discretion [Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 10831084 (citations omitted)].

Rules to Avoid Problems. In light of Fireside Banks holding, the practitioner should carefully follow the Courts directives [see Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 1083]:

§ A defendant must actively preserve its protection against one-way intervention by objecting. If it fails to timely object, or if the defendant affirmatively seeks resolution of the merits before certification, it will be deemed to have waived its rights.

§ Plaintiffs should seek certification before moving for any resolution on the substantive merits. If they seek certification after seeking resolution of the merits, in the absence of a defense waiver, they must demonstrate changed circumstances or other good cause justifying the belated motion before the court may consider it.

§ In the absence of a defense waiver courts should not resolve the merits before class certification and notice, absent a compelling justification for doing so.

Penalty for Violating Rule Against One-Way Intervention Can be Decertification. The practitioner must be cautioned that the penalty for violating the rule against one-way intervention is steep. Absent a showing of changed circumstances, the trial court may not consider a motion for class certification; absent a further showing of compelling justification it may not grant it. If the trial court erroneously grants class certification, the class generally must be vacated [Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 10871088].

Courts Should Postpone Deciding Any Substantive Merits Issue Until After Class Certification. Fireside Bank articulated that the rule against one-way intervention applies to any substantive merits issue. Previously, several cases from the 1970s seemed to limit one-way intervention to instances in which the court determined the merits of the class claims. Home Sav. & Loan Assn. v. Superior Court (1974) [42 Cal. App. 3d 1006, 117 Cal. Rptr. 485 (Home Savings I)], and Home Sav. & Loan Assn. v Superior Court (1976) [54 Cal. App. 3d 208, 126 Cal. Rptr. 511 (Home Savings II)] describe one-way intervention as a procedure under which potential members of the class can reserve their decision to become part of the class until the validity of the cause asserted by the named plaintiffs on behalf of the class has been determined [Home Savings I, 42 Cal. App. 3d at 1011; Home Savings II, 54 Cal. App. 3d at 211 (italics added)]. In Travelers Ins. Co. v. Superior Court (1977) [65 Cal. App. 3d 751, 135 Cal. Rptr. 579], the court explained that the trial court in a class action should first try the issue of identity of the class and designate the appropriate form and manner of notice to such class before trying the issue of the defendants liability [Travelers Ins. Co., 65 Cal. App. 3d at 756757 (italics added)]. Thus, pursuant to Home Savings I, Home Savings II, and Travelers, the practitioner could argue that one-way intervention could not happen unless the defendants liability to the class was decided before the identity of the class was fixed.

That argument is no longer persuasive. The trial court in Fireside Bank decided the merits of Fireside Banks individual claim against the class representative, not the merits of the class claim. But the Court in Fireside Bank said that did not matter, because the merits of the class claim--whether Fireside Banks post-repossession notices violated the Rees-Levering Act and thus whether they were unlawful for purposes of the UCL--involved substantive issues common to Fireside Banks individual claim, so that resolving the individual claim squarely resolved the central issue in the class claim [see Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 10861087]. What matters is the extent to which a motion impacts the principal legal issue or issues in a case and thereby poses for the defendants the risk of one-way intervention depending on its outcome [Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 1086].

Any Ruling That Offers Substantial Hints About Outcome On Merits Should be Postponed. The practitioner should be cautioned that many situations that trial courts routinely face have the potential to decide some issue that touches on the merits and could lead to violating the rule against one-way intervention. The class certification process itself can touch on the relative merits of the case [see Linder v. Thrifty Oil (2000) 23 Cal. 4th 429, 443, 97 Cal. Rptr. 2d 179, 2 P.3d 27]. So can the trial courts decision to allocate the cost of giving notice to the class [Civil Service Employees Ins. Co. v. Superior Court (1978) 22 Cal. 3d 362, 380, 149 Cal. Rptr. 360, 584 P.2d 497]. Trial courts may consider a wide range of factors relevant to allocating the cost of notice to the class, including the apparent merit or lack of merit in the class claims [Civil Service Employees, 22 Cal. 3d at 380, n.10, citing Berland v. Mack (S.D.N.Y. 1969) 48 F.R.D. 121, 131132]. Even discovery motions can impact merits issues.

The California Supreme Court recognized that many rulings may offer substantial hints as to the likely substantive outcome of a given case, but warned this is no reason not to require trial courts to postpone such rulings until after certification and class notice [Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 1085]. The Court suggested a two-step balancing test:

§ The degree to which the given motion poses one-way intervention problems, balanced against

§ The compelling justification proffered by the moving party for nevertheless deciding the given motion in advance of resolving class issues.

The greater the concerns, the more compelling the countervailing justification must be [Fireside Bank, 40 Cal. 4th at 1085]. Thus, when faced with this problem, the practitioner should err on the side of caution absent truly compelling justification.

Practitioners Should Consider CLRAs Procedures, Which Allows Merits Issues and Class Certification to be Decided Concurrently. If the parties agree to resolve merits issues before class certification, the defendants waiver removes the obstacle to a subsequent class certification. Absent a defense waiver, if class counsel wants to obtain a merits ruling before going to the expense of notifying the class, counsel should consider proceeding pursuant to the Consumers Legal Remedies Act [Civ. Code § 1750 et seq. (CLRA)]. Civil Code § 1781 expressly authorizes trial courts to determine whether there is no defense to the action concurrently with deciding whether a class action is appropriate [see Civ. Code § 1781(c)(1), (3)]. In practice, courts have applied the same standards that apply to summary judgment motions in deciding motions for no-merit determinations [Smith v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. (2005) 135 Cal. App. 4th 1463, 14741475, 38 Cal. Rptr. 3d 653 (citations omitted)]. Additionally, courts have found that this virtually identical no-merit procedure does not deprive parties of their due process rights [Consumer Advocates v. Echostar Satellite Corp. (2003) 113 Cal. App. 4th 1351, 13591360, 8 Cal. Rptr. 3d 22; Olsen v. Breeze, Inc. (1996) 48 Cal. App. 4th 608, 624, 55 Cal. Rptr. 2d 818].

Importantly, the CLRAs class action procedures are not limited to class actions brought pursuant to the CLRA. In Vasquez v. Superior Court (1971) [4 Cal. 3d 800, 820, 94 Cal. Rptr. 796, 484 P.2d 964], the California Supreme Court established that if Civ. Code § 382 does not directly cover a class action issue, for procedural efficiency California courts should look to the CLRA. Only in the event of a hiatus should California courts consult Rule 23 [Vasquez, 4 Cal. 3d 800, 820-821]. Numerous decisions since Vasquez have held that the CLRAs procedures apply to all California class actions and should be used wherever possible [see, e.g., Linder, 23 Cal. 4th at 437; Civil Service Employees, 22 Cal. 3d at 376, and cases cited therein].

Conclusion. The lesson to be learned from Fireside Bank is that although trial courts have discretion to manage class actions, the California Supreme Court has constructed a strict framework which directs that in nearly all instances class certification issues must be decided before the trial court determines any merits issues.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Carol McLean Brewer, a partner with Kemnitzer, Anderson, Barron, Ogilvie & Brewer LLP in San Francisco, prosecutes class actions and other consumer protection cases. She represents consumers against whom banks and automobile finance companies have made unlawful or deceptive claims, particularly resulting from vehicle repossessions. She also represents consumers who are victims of identity theft.

Ms. Brewer graduated from the University of Florida School of Law. She practiced in Florida for more than 20 years, where she was president of the Palm Beach County Bar Association and an elected member of the Florida Bars Board of Governors. In 2000 she relocated to California and joined Kemnitzer, Anderson, Barron & Ogilvie as a partner on passing the bar. She is a member of the National Association of Consumer Lawyers and the National Consumer Law Center.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

177 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan Brazas on Porter v. Decatur Mem. Hosp., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 10 (Ill. 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 1922

Susan Brazas on Porter v. Decatur Mem. Hosp., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 10 (Ill. 2008)

By Susan M. Brazas

February 20, 2008

SUMMARY: Revisiting, Again: The Relation Back of Specific Allegations of Error in Medical Treatment. In another recent opinion addressing the relation back of amendments to pleadings, Porter v. Decatur Mem. Hosp., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 10 (Ill. 2008), the Illinois Supreme Court has spoken to the interplay of notice to defendants and fact pleading standards. Eschewing an analysis of the recent and divergent views on the subject from the Illinois Appellate Courts, the Supreme Court gives weight--and print space--to authority from unexpected sources. This commentary, written by Susan Brazas, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Illinois Supreme Court Identifies the Sufficiently Close Relationship Test for Relation Back Of Amendments to Pleadings

The Pleadings in Porter. The Illinois Supreme Court has addressed the issue of the relation back of amendments to a medical malpractice complaint in its recent decision in Porter v. Decatur Mem. Hosp., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 10 (Ill. 2008). The case arose after the Plaintiff's January 12, 2001 hospitalization after sustaining injuries in an automobile accident. His original complaint, filed on March 25, 2002, named the admitting physician as a Defendant, and named the hospital as a Respondent in Discovery. This complaint alleged negligence in the physician failing to continually immobilize the plaintiff's spine, and failure to appreciate signs and symptoms of further spinal injury.

The first amended complaint, filed on January 6, 2003, added the hospital as a Defendant, and alleged that hospital staff failed to perform thorough hourly neurological checks as the co-defendant physician had ordered, failed to document specific findings, and failed to notify the physician of diminishing neurological status.

The second amended complaint, filed on August 10, 2004 (over objection by Defendant hospital), added allegations that the hospital's apparent agent, a radiologist, misinterpreted a cervical CT scan and failed to diagnose plaintiff's cervical fractures, resulting in loss of extremity function. Attached to plaintiff's motion for leave to file this amended complaint was the January 2004 deposition testimony of a professor of surgery from Chicago Medical School who testified that the fractures on the cervical CT scan were very evident and unequivocally showed a cervical spine injury, and that this misinterpretation affected the patient's entire management.

Recent Appellate Decision. The recent First District opinion of Frigo v. Silver Cross Hosp. & Med. Ctr., 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1014 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007) cited but not commented on by the Porter Court, held that an initial complaint's allegations of negligent management by the Defendant hospital were sufficient to put the hospital on notice of the later allegations of negligent credentialing. The Frigo Court found that these later, more detailed allegations related back to the original pleading and were thus not barred by the statute of limitations.

Porter and the Sufficiently Close Relationship Test. The Porter Court's conclusion was also that the later-filed amended allegations related back to the original, timely-filed complaint. The Porter Court identified the sufficiently close relationship test as determinative. Under this test, later amendments relate back if a comparison of the new and original allegations show that the events alleged were close in time and subject matter and led to the originally alleged injury. Interestingly, the Porter Court's authority for this standard was not the well-known relation back case of Zeh v. Wheeler, 111 Ill. 2d 266, 278, 489 N.E.2d 1342 (1986), but instead a federal district court case decided one year prior to the Zeh case: In Re Olympia Brewing Co. Securities Litigation, 612 F. Supp. 1370, 1371-72 (N.D. Ill. 1985).

Strategic Considerations as the Case Progresses. Attorneys handling any type of action, especially medical malpractice actions, are well advised to examine whether new allegations could be brought, either in a new case filing or via amended pleadings, as the case progresses. If the statute of limitations has run, however, careful consideration should be given as to whether sufficient allegations have been made in existing pleadings, under the sufficiently close relationship test described above. The Porter decision is consistent with the trend of a liberal standard for relation back of amendments. This trend was acknowledged by the Illinois Supreme Court in Zeh v. Wheeler, and has been especially liberal as to medical malpractice complaints. See Castro v. Bellucci, 338 Ill. App. 3d 386, 391 (1st Dist. 2003).

Importance of Notice. The Porter Court emphasized the overarching importance of notice. Often, details of the specific acts or omissions of negligence are not ascertainable until discovery is underway. However, an attorney's own expert can be a helpful source of input as to what general allegations adequately cover the possible range of specific acts or omissions that may be discovered. Counsel should draft allegations against hospitals or clinics that are broad enough to encompass a wide range of specific acts of negligence, to provide adequate notice and guard against statute of limitations problems.

Ramifications for Argument. The key phrase found within the relation back statute which the Porter Court was construing was whether the new allegations grew out of the same transaction or occurrence. The Court's analysis resembled its interpretation of arising out of patient care within the context of the health care statute of repose, as discussed in Orlak v. Loyola Univ. Health Sys., 221 Ill. 2d 643 (Ill. 2006) and Brucker v. Mercola, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1838 (Ill. 2007).

Yet, the sufficiently close relationship test adopted by Porter bears resemblance to the substantially the same as phrase that had been omitted from the relation back statute in its 1933 amendment which added the grew out of the same transaction or occurrence phrase.

The Porter opinion illustrates that the Illinois Supreme Court is, with increasing frequency, looking to case law and statutes outside the traditional realm. The common thread, when non-binding precedent is the key to the Court's decision, is that the factual circumstances of the cited authority are quite similar to the case under review. Thus, attorneys should not limit their research to only those sources within Illinois state case law, nor to the statute or rule in question. Instead, attorneys should search for persuasive authority in similar fact patterns and argue that these factual similarities justify that the authority be given greater weight than other authority.

Discovery Strategies. The Plaintiff's attorney in Porter wisely presented for deposition an expert who explained the allegations of the amendment adequately to show their consistency with the allegations of the original complaint. This may well have been the deciding factor in the Court's decision that the amendments related back to the original complaint. By attaching the transcript of a physician or expert's deposition to a motion for leave to amend, counsel will help provide the court with guidance for its determination of whether the amendment bears a sufficiently close relationship to the original complaint. To reach this step, however, counsel should push the experts' and treating physicians' depositions forward so that a motion to amend (or opposition thereto) can be promptly supported with expert opinion.

Respondent in Discovery Strategies. Counsel may find it necessary to name Respondents in Discovery as a way to force expedited discovery. Under the statute, 735 ILCS 5/2-402, a limited six-month window is allowed to convert a Respondent to a Defendant, except where the Respondent has refused to comply with discovery. The trial court has no discretion to extend this six-month deadline. Robinson v. Johnson, 346 Ill. App. 3d 895, 907 (1st Dist. 2003). Therefore, an attorney may well consider naming the entity or person as a Respondent in Discovery, in order quickly to obtain facts needed to determine whether additional factual allegations or additional legal theories should be pleaded. Requests to Admit and other discovery tools can also be used to determine whether amendments are in order.

Cross References. 735 ILCS 5/2-402; 735 ILCS 5/2-616(b); Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216; Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C6.01: Drafting a Complaint.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and civil practice case law developments.

178 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on Supeno v. Equity Office Prop. Manag., LLC

2008 Emerging Issues 1923

Garcia on Supeno v. Equity Office Prop. Manag., LLC, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 470 (2007)

By Grace V. B. Garcia

February 20, 2008

SUMMARY: In Supeno v. Equity Office Prop. Manag., LLC, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 470 (Oct. 11, 2007), the Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the trial courts decision to grant the defendants summary judgment based on the defendants argument that the plaintiff was collaterally estopped from relitigating a claim that had been asserted at the Department of Industrial Accidents and decided. This Appeals Court decision reminds practitioners of the breadth and use of collateral estoppel. This commentary, written by Grace Garcia, discusses the important implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Supeno v. Equity Office Prop. Manag., LLC, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 470 (Oct. 11, 2007), the Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the trial courts decision to grant the defendants summary judgment based on the defendants argument that the plaintiff was collaterally estopped from relitigating a claim that had been asserted at the Department of Industrial Accidents and decided. This Appeals Court decision reminds practitioners of the breadth and use of collateral estoppel.

Background for the Courts Decision. Plaintiff brought a claim to the Department of Industrial Accidents (DIA) against her employer for workers compensation benefits under Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 152, § 1 (7A). She claimed that her condition of idiopathic environmental intolerance (IEI) was caused by her exposure to harmful toxins in the workplace. After a hearing, a DIA administrative law judge denied her claim, finding that there was no evidence that any exposure to toxins in the workplace caused, or made worse, her IEI, as the plaintiff had a significant medical history of such intolerances before working for the employer at issue. The DIA review board and a single justice of the Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the administrative law judges decision.

While the case before the DIA was pending, the plaintiff brought an action in the trial court against the management company and owner of the building in which her employer was located. She alleged that she was harmed by exposure to toxic substances emitted during renovation work in the building. After the DIA issued its decision, the trial court granted summary judgment to the defendants finding the plaintiff was collaterally estopped from asserting the same issues that already had been ruled upon by the DIA.

Collateral Estoppel. Collateral estoppel, or issue preclusion, essentially prevents relitigation of an issue that has been determined in an earlier action. Heacock v. Heacock, 402 Mass. 21, 23 n.2 (1988). Res judicata, which also has been used to describe collateral estoppel, is the generic term for various doctrines by which a judgment in one action has a binding effect in another. Id.

Specifically, collateral estoppel provides that when an issue of fact or law is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, and the determination is essential to the judgment, the determination is conclusive in a subsequent action between the parties, whether on the same or a different claim. Alba v. Raytheon Co., 441 Mass. 836, 841 (2004), quoting Fireside Motors, Inc. v. Nissan Motor Corp. in U.S.A., 395 Mass. 366, 372 (1985). Collateral estoppel is an important doctrine as its purpose is to conserve judicial resources, to prevent the unnecessary costs associated with multiple litigation, and to ensure the finality of judgments. Martin v. Ring, 401 Mass. 59, 61 (1987).

To prove collateral estoppel, one must prove that (1) there was a final judgment on the merits in the prior adjudication; (2) the party against whom preclusion is asserted was a party (or in privity with a party) to the prior adjudication; . . . (3) the issue in the prior adjudication was identical to the issue in the current adjudication; . . . [and (4)] the issue decided in the prior adjudication must have been essential to the earlier judgment. Tuper v. North Adams Ambulance Serv., Inc., 428 Mass. 132, 134-35 (1998). Thus, collateral estoppel prevents the re-litigation of issues that are actually litigated in the prior action. Fidelity Mgmt. & Research Co. v. Ostrander, 40 Mass. App. Ct. 195, 199 (1996). If the four-part standard is met, it is important to note that the involvement of the same parties to both actions is not always required. Supeno, 70 Mass. App. Ct. at 473. Moreover, in some cases even if there is a lack of total identity between the issues involved in two adjudications, the overlap may be so substantial that preclusion is plainly appropriate. Commr., of the Dept. of Employ. & Training v. Dugan, 428 Mass. 138, 143 (1998).

A party can defend against issue preclusion by arguing that it did not have an adequate opportunity to litigate the issues decided. Foster v. Evans, 384 Mass. 687, 696 (1981). A party who wishes to use collateral estoppel has the burden of proof in showing that the issues have already been litigated. Patterson v. Hantzes, 5 Mass. App. Ct. 806, 806-07 (1977). Issue preclusion, however, may not be available if there is ambiguity concerning the issue or the basis of the decision, or if there were issues deliberately left open by the prior adjudication. Moreover, a party cannot avoid the use of issue preclusion simply by offering evidence in the second proceeding that could have been admitted, but was not, in the first action. DeCosta v. Viacom Intl., Inc., 981 F.2d 602, 611 (1st Cir. 1992).

The Different Issues Argued in Supeno v. Equity Office Prop. Manag., LLC. On appeal, the plaintiff in Supeno argued that collateral estoppel could not be used because the issues argued to the DIA and those in the tort action involved different legal standards of causation, and thus, the issues differed. Specifically, in a tort action, to prove causation the plaintiff must show that the defendants negligence was a substantial factor in bringing about the injury and harm. Bernier v. Boston Edison Co., 380 Mass. 372, 385 (1980) (emphasis added). Whereas to prove causation under the workers compensation statute, the plaintiff must show that the workplace injury remains a major but not necessarily predominant cause of disability. Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 152, § 1 (7A) (emphasis added).

In its decision denying benefits, the DIA held that any alleged exposure to toxins by the plaintiff were not a major cause of either [of plaintiffs] medical impairments or [plaintiffs] ongoing disability. Subpeno, 70 Mass. App. Ct. at 472. Thus, the DIA found no probative evidence that showed the alleged exposure worsened or caused the plaintiffs disability. Id. In affirming summary judgment, the Appeals Court found that the issue of causation, which was the central issue of the case, was fully litigated in the DIA action. Specifically, as the DIA found that there was no evidence indicating any causal relationship between the alleged exposure and injury, that the issue of causation, regardless of the legal standard of proof, had been litigated. Consequently, the Appeals Court did not find a need to address the different standards of causation between a tort and workers compensation action as the essential issue of causation had been previously litigated.

How Practitioners Can Use Supeno v. Equity Office Prop. Manag., LLC. Practitioners should remember that they can use collateral estoppel both as a plaintiff and as a defendant. For an offensive use of collateral estoppel, the plaintiff can seek to prohibit a defendant from relitigating an issue the defendant previously litigated unsuccessfully in another action against the same or a different party. For defensive use of collateral estoppel, a defendant can seek to prevent a plaintiff from relitigating an issue the plaintiff has previously litigated unsuccessfully in another action against the same or different party. Thus, it is a tool that can be used by both sides.

Cross References. MA Pleading and Practice § 8.416.1: Affirmative Defense Collateral Estoppel; MA Pleading and Practice § 8.429: Affirmative Defense Res Judicata.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

179 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Class Actions & Distribution of Residual Funds

2008 Emerging Issues 1924

McDonnell on Class Actions & Distribution of Residual Funds, Illinois Public Act 95-0479

By Joseph B. McDonnell

February 20, 2008

SUMMARY: What Shall We Do With These Leftovers? The Illinois legislature creates a recipe for distribution of residual funds in class action suits. An analysis of Illinois Public Act 95-0479 (735 ILCS 5/2-807). This commentary, written by Joe McDonnell, discusses the implications of this important legislation.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Problem. The treatment of leftover funds following the settlement of class actions has been the subject of increasing comment over the past several years. When a class action is settled (or, if trial results in a judgment in favor of the class) it is not uncommon that there will be residual funds after all distributions have been made to claimants and all costs and attorneys fees have been paid. If the parties have not dealt with the subject in their settlement agreement, it is left to the trial judge, aided by suggestions of counsel and interested organizations, to provide for the disposition of such funds.

Alternative Solutions. In some cases, the court has provided for a return to the defendant of all unclaimed funds. This approach has been criticized as unfairly reducing the benefit to the class and, in turn, allowing the defendant to recoup some (perhaps much) of the money wrongfully obtained from the class. Another alternative has been to pay the residual funds, on a pro rata basis, to the class members who have already been paid. This procedure has also been criticized as creating a windfall for those class members who had already received their proportionate shares. Then there is the possibility that the excess be given to the government or a governmental agency (which almost nobody wants to do).

Searching for a Rationale. In most courts throughout the country the procedure for disposing of unclaimed or leftover funds has been ad hoc; both the identities of possible beneficiaries and the method of choosing them vary from state to state and sometimes from court to court. Although some courts have relied upon their inherent equitable powers to fashion decrees disposing of the undistributed funds, more often the common-law doctrine of cy pres has been employed as the vehicle for distribution. The rule of cy pres (derived from the French term cy pres comme possible, i.e. as near as possible) is a child of trust law, and developed as a means of permitting distribution of a gift for charitable purposes in a fashion as close as possible to the fulfillment of the underlying charitable intent where, for one reason or other, the donors express direction could not be accomplished. Under this theory, courts have ordered that undistributed funds in class action settlements be diverted to organizations that bear some relationship to the subject matter of the class action. For example, an action based on housing discrimination may result in funds being distributed to tenants organizations; an action based on predatory lending practices might result in funds going to consumer watch-dog entities, etc.

A number of courts, including federal and state courts in Illinois, n1 have pointed out that trial judges have broad discretion in shaping equitable decrees and that, since class actions are founded on equitable principles, trial judges should be allowed broad discretion in framing orders for the distribution of residual funds. According to this view, the cy pres doctrine allows for virtually any charitable, educational or legally-related organization to be the beneficiary of distribution of residuary funds in class actions. The organization need not necessarily be one that has some relationship to the subject matter of the suit or to the members of the class. See, generally, Forde, K., What Can a Court Do with Leftover Class Action Funds? Almost Anything! The Judges Journal, vol. 35, no. 3 (Summer 1996).

Three basic reasons are advanced in support of this rationale: (1) the deterrence goals of the law are met, as the unclaimed funds do not revert to the defendant; (2) there is no unjust enrichment, since the defendant is still required to pay the entire liability regardless of the number of class members who fail to come forward and claim the amount to which they are entitled; and (3) an indirect benefit accrues to all class members through the benefits provided to society in general. See Forde, K., op cit.

Illinois: The Statutory Approach. The new Illinois statute (2007 Bill Text IL S.B. 486, 735 ILCS 5/2-807) appears to embrace this cy pres philosophy. It requires the trial court, in approving a class action settlement resulting in the creation of a common fund, to provide for the distribution of residual funds to one or more eligible organizations. The term eligible organization is defined as a not-for-profit organization which: (1) has been in existence for and qualified as a tax-exempt 501(c)(3) organization for at least three years; (2) is in compliance with the Charitable Trust Act and Solicitation of Charity Act; and (3) has as a principle purpose the promoting or providing of services eligible for funding under the Illinois Equal Justice Act. 735 ILCS 5/2-807(a)(i-iv). The Act further provides, however, that the court may, if it finds good cause to do so, order distribution of up to 50% of the residual funds to one or more other not-for-profit charitable organizations that serve the public good. 735 ILCS 5/2-807(b).

With respect to a judgment, however, as opposed to an agreed settlement, the courts discretion is more circumscribed. Following a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the judgment shall provide for the distribution of residual funds to one or more eligible organizations. 735 ILCS 5/2-807(c). Unlike Section (b) dealing with settlements, in Section (c) there is no provision for distribution to one or more other non-profit charitable organizations. (Emphasis added). Presumably, this is because the jury or the trier of fact can deal only with those parties properly before the court and its verdict may not be enlarged to benefit persons or organizations not parties to the case. This is consistent with existing law on class actions: any judgment is binding on all class members, as the class is defined by the court, except those who have been properly excluded. 735 ILCS 5/2-805. The courts power with respect to the entry of judgment in such case is restricted accordingly.

Application and Effective Date. The Act does not apply to class actions against the State of Illinois or any of its political subdivisions. The effective date of the legislation is July 1, 2008. It applies to all actions commenced on or after its effective date and to all actions pending on such date for which no court order has been entered preliminarily approving a proposed settlement for a class of plaintiffs.

Tips for Practitioners. The best way to avoid application of the statute is to make provision in the settlement agreement for the disposition of residual funds to one or more organizations agreed upon by the parties and their counsel. It is not uncommon that class counsel will have close connections with one or more public-interest or law-related organizations who may be considered as class action beneficiaries. Such relationship will not prohibit distribution of part of the funds to such organizations, provided that there is no direct benefit or quid pro quo to counsel in exchange for the payment. Barring such agreed-upon provisions, the statute expresses a preference for eligible organizations as beneficiaries of at least 50% of the residual distribution. In order to benefit organizations that do not meet the requirements of Section (a) of the statute, counsel must demonstrate to the court that any such contemplated beneficiary is a not-for-profit charitable organization, and that, for reasons particularly described to the court (preferably in writing), it is one that serves the public good.

It should also be kept in mind that, even though the statute does not take effect until July 1, 2008, existing class action cases qualify for treatment under the statute if no order preliminarily approving a settlement has been entered by that date.

Cross References. Illinois Civil Procedure § 7.08: Special Joinder Provisions Class Actions.

Return to Text

n1 . Superior Beverage Co. v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 89-C-251 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (over $2,000,000 ordered distributed to various law schools, legal aid clinics, and public interest groups); Isenstein v. Rosewell, No. 85-CH-7019, Circuit Court of Cook County, IL (distribution of unclaimed funds to Cook County Judicial Advisory Council, Lawyers Trust Fund, Chicago area law schools, Womens Bar Association of Illinois, and American Judicature Society)

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

180 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joseph McDonnell on Vill. of Mundelein v. Wis. Cent. R.R.

2008 Emerging Issues 1915

Joseph McDonnell on Vill. of Mundelein v. Wis. Cent. R.R., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 9 (Ill. 2008), and Eagle

By Joseph B. McDonnell

February 13, 2008

SUMMARY: The significance of Vill. of Mundelein v. Wis. Cent. R.R., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 9 (Ill. 2008) and Eagle Marine Indus. v. Union Pac. R.R., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 2 (Ill. 2008), discussed in this comment, lies in the fact that no Illinois court, state or federal, has previously considered the preemption question with respect to the blocked-crossing statute which has been in force in Illinois for at least 130 years. Moreover, the cases may have significant impact on state laws and regulations in the transportation field and in other areas as well. This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, discusses the important implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The significance of Mundelein and Eagle Marine, lies in the fact that no Illinois court, state or federal, has previously considered the preemption question with respect to the blocked-crossing statute which has been in force in Illinois for at least 130 years. (See, e.g., Peoria, D. & E.R.Co. v/ Lyons, 9 Ill.App. 350 (1882) and Sec. 52 of chapter 114, R. S. 1874). Moreover, the cases may have significant impact on state laws and regulations in the transportation field and in other areas as well.

The Commerce Clause. Art. I, Sec. 8 of the U. S. Constitution gives Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states, i.e., interstate commerce. Since Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton 1, 6 L.Ed. 23 (1824), it has been settled law that state or local action affecting commerce which conflicts with Congress regulation of the subject is invalid under the commerce clause. It is also recognized, however, that a state may legislate upon a subject in which its authority is concurrent with that of the federal government. Cooley v. Bd. of Wardens, 53 U.S. 299 (U.S. 1852). In such a situation, a question may arise as to whether state regulation concerning the subject is or is not preempted by federal law. This issue was presented in two cases recently decided by the Illinois Supreme Court. The subject of both is one with which almost all drivers have become exasperatingly familiar: blocking of railroad crossings by trains.

The Rule of Preemption. Generally, federal law preempts a state statute when a conflict between the two arises. Maryland v. Louisiana, 451 U.S. 725 (1981). However, preemption must be the clear and manifest purpose of Congress as expressed in the pertinent statute. Thompson v. Northeast Illinois Regional Commuter R.R. Corp., 854 N.E.2d 744 (Ill.App. 1st Dist. 2006), citing CSX Transportation, Inc. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658 (1993). In the area of railroad transportation, the U. S. Supreme Court has interpreted federal regulations under the commerce clause to preclude state laws covering both train length (Southern Pacific v. Arizona, 325 U.S. 761 (1945) and train speed (CSX Transportation, Inc. v. Easterwood, 507 U.S. 658 (1993).

The Issues. At issue in the two cases was whether the Mundelein ordinance and the Illinois statute had been preempted by the Federal Railroad Safety Authorization Act of 1994 (49 U.S.C. § 20101 et seq. (2000) (FRSA) and by the Interstate Commerce Commission Termination Act of 1995 (49 U.S.C. § 10101 et seq. (2000) (ICCTA); and whether the ordinance and statute violated Article 1, § 8, cl. 3 of the United States Constitution.

The Argument. On its face, the statute at issue in Eagle Marine (625 ILCS 5/18c-7402(1)(b)), often referred to as the ten-minute statute (and the Mundelein ordinance which copied it) regulates neither train speed nor train length, and applies only where a non-moving train is blocking a grade crossing. In addition, it is part of a statute entitled Safety Requirements for Railroad Operations and the section immediately preceding the ten-minute statute deals with obstruction of emergency vehicles, lending at least some support to the argument made by the railroads that the statute (and its mirror image ordinance) was a proper subject of local safety concerns.

Although the village in each case argued that the primary purpose of the statute (and ordinance) was to prevent emergency vehicles from being impeded in responding to calls, the Illinois Supreme Court, citing U.S. Supreme Court precedent, stated that it is the effect of the law on railroad operations that is important, rather than its professed purpose; and that a state may not frustrate the operation of federal law by claiming some purpose other than that specifically addressed by the federal law. Gade v. National Solid Wastes Management Assn, 505 U.S. 88 (1992) (slip op. at 10).

The Holding. Preemption, said the Court, depends on whether the applicable federal regulations substantially subsume the subject matter of the villages ordinance. (slip op at 8). The Court found it significant that the ordinance applied only to rail carriers and prohibited them from allowing trains to obstruct public travel at highway grade crossings except in specific circumstances. Relying on a Pennsylvania case, Krentz v. Consolidated R. Corp., 589 Pa. 576, 910 A.2d 20 (2006), the Court held that the subject matter of the ordinance was directed at regulating the movement of trains. Reviewing federal regulations dealing with train speed, air brake testing and grade crossing safety, the Court determined that the overall structure of the federal regulations substantially subsumes the subject matter of the movement of trains at grade crossings. (slip op at 12). Thus, the regulations manifest a clear intent to preempt the villages ordinance on that subject matter.

The Court then explored whether an express preemption clause contained in the Federal Railroad Safety Act (49 U.S.C.A. Sec. 20106) might allow the ordinance to stand, notwithstanding the preemption. The statute has particular relevance in today's climate regarding national security:

Laws, regulations and orders related to railroad safety and laws, regulations and orders related to railroad security shall be nationally uniform to the extent practicable. A State may adopt or continue in force a law, regulation, or order related to railroad safety or security until the Secretary of Transportation (with respect to railroad safety matters), or the Secretary of Homeland Security (with respect to railroad security matters), prescribes a regulation or issues an order covering the subject matter of the State requirement. (49 U.S.C.A. Sec. 20106)

The opening sentence of Section 20106 makes it clear that uniformity in the field of railroad operations is Congress preference. The phrase related to, as used in that sentence, has been construed broadly and the Court had no difficulty in concluding that the Mundelein ordinance was embraced by the federal statute. In the wording employed in the statute, it was evident to the Court that the federal regulations covered the subject matter of state and local regulation (49 U.S.C.A. Sec. 20106) and thus manifested Congress clear intent to preempt both the ordinance and the state statute.

The Court also discussed the three conditions specified in Sec. 20106 under which a state or local law, regulation or order might coexist with federal law on the same subject. The three conditions (all of which must be satisfied) are: (1) where the law, regulation or order is necessary to eliminate or reduce a local traffic hazard; (2) where the challenged law, rule or order is not incompatible with federal law; and (3) where it does not unnecessarily burden interstate commerce.

The Court found that the second and third conditions were not satisfied, thus finding it unnecessary to discuss the first condition. The ordinance was clearly incompatible with the federal regulatory scheme with respect to railroad operations and, in addition, ran afoul of the established authority of Congress to regulate interstate commerce under Art. I, Sec. 8 of the Constitution.

Implications of the Decisions. The Illinois statutes contain a plethora of provisions dealing with the authority of the Illinois Commerce Commission, the regulatory arm of the Illinois legislature, with regard to rail carriers. (See 625 ILCS 5/18c-7101 et seq.) Registration, rate-making, transportation of hazardous materials, maintenance of crossings, signs and signals, safeguards at crossings, clearing of brush and other obstructions to the view of drivers, are only a few of the subjects regulated by Illinois law. And, of course, other subjects may be covered by both state and federal law. Whether and to what extent such laws may be affected by the Mundelein and Eagle Marine decisions is problematical. It may well be that, with the advent of and increased focus on homeland security (expressly mentioned in 49 U.S.C.A. Sec. 20106), the courts will look at state statutes covering the same subject matter as federal law with an increased awareness of Congress expression of a preference for uniformity in any field in which federal and state or local laws may conflict.

Tips for Practitioners. Whenever a question of preemption by federal law arises, it is essential that the question be examined in the light of those factors traditionally considered by the courts. In representing a local or state agency seeking to uphold the ordinance or statute, one should focus on the established police power of the state to safeguard the health, morals, safety and welfare of the public, and on harmonizing the state/local rule with the federal law or regulation. Is there language indicating an apparent intent by Congress to preempt the field? If so, does that mean complete preemption? Is there a savings clause which respects state regulation on the subject? Is the state or local rule compatible with the federal regulatory scheme? Is the federal regulation limited in its reach, so that purely local concerns can be accommodated?

Where counsel's goal is to establish preemption, the focus will be on congressional intent as the ultimate touchstone guiding the analysis; if the statute contains an express preemption clause, then the statutory construction should center on its plain meaning as the best evidence of Congress's preemptive intent. Is the overall federal regulatory treatment of the subject complementary or plenary? Will enforcement of the state or local regulation hamper the implementation of the federal rule? Are the two compatible, or will the federal regulation be impaired or thwarted by operation of the local/state regulation? What is the effect on interstate commerce?

Cross References. Lundeen v. Canadian Pacific Ry. Co., 447 F.3d 606 (8th Cir. 2006), Peters v. Union Pacific R.R. Co., 80 F.3d 257 (8th Cir. 1996); and Thompson v. Northeast Illinois Regional Commuter R.R. Corp., Ill.App., 854 N.E.2d 744 (1st Dist. 2006).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

181 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Robert Kugler and James Brand on Christians v. Grant Thornton, LLP

2008 Emerging Issues 1916

Robert Kugler and James Brand on Christians v. Grant Thornton, LLP

By Robert Kugler and James Brand

February 13, 2008

SUMMARY: In July 2007, the Minnesota Court of Appeals held that deepening insolvency is not a recognized theory of damages in Minnesota [Christians v. Grant Thornton, LLP, 733 N.W.2d 803 (Minn. App. 2007)]. In September 2007, the Supreme Court of Minnesota denied a petition to review the case [see Christians v. Thornton, 2007 Minn. LEXIS 572 (Minn. Sept. 18, 2007)], leaving in place a decision that is an enormous relief to officers and directors of troubled companies, banks that have lent to troubled companies, and professionals such as lawyers, accountants, and investment brokers who have provided services to troubled companies.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview. In July 2007, the Minnesota Court of Appeals held that deepening insolvency is not a recognized theory of damages in Minnesota [Christians v. Grant Thornton, LLP, 733 N.W.2d 803 (Minn. App. 2007)]. In September 2007, the Supreme Court of Minnesota denied a petition to review the case [see Christians v. Thornton, 2007 Minn. LEXIS 572 (Minn. Sept. 18, 2007)], leaving in place a decision that is an enormous relief to officers and directors of troubled companies, banks that have lent to troubled companies, and professionals such as lawyers, accountants, and investment brokers who have provided services to troubled companies.

Factual Background to Underlying Controversy in Christians. The Christians case arose from the bankruptcy of Technimar Industries, Inc., a company that had hoped to manufacture an agglomerated stone product from a facility in northern Minnesota. To pay for the necessary equipment, Technimar's investment banker arranged for the City of Cohasset, Minnesota, where the facility was located, to issue industrial-revenue bonds. Through a series of arrangements, Technimar essentially underwrote a substantial portion of the bonds. However, its financials, which were audited by the defendant accounting firm Grant Thornton, did not indicate this obligation. Had the financials been correct, they would have reflected that Technimar was insolvent. After this time, Technimar took out additional loans before defaulting on the bonds and filing for bankruptcy. Trustee Julie Christians was appointed, who brought an action against Grant Thornton in state court alleging, primarily, auditor malpractice and breach of contract. For damages, the trustee claimed that Technimar was harmed by the deepening of its insolvency [Christians v. Grant Thornton, LLP, 733 N.W.2d 803, 806808 (Minn. App. 2007)].

Federal Recognition of Deepening Insolvency Theory. Over the past decade a number of federal courts have recognized a theory of damages called deepening insolvency, where a defendant's wrongful action caused an insolvent corporation to incur further debt. As the court stated in Christians: The concept presumes that, in taking on additional unpayable debt, a corporation might be harmed by operational limitations, strained corporate relationships, diminution of corporate assets, and the legal and administrative costs of bankruptcy [Christians, 733 N.W.2d at 810]. The Christians court cited the deepening insolvency damages theory as recognized in bankruptcy courts in the Southern District of Ohio, District of Colorado, Middle District of Florida, and Southern District of New York [Christians, 733 N.W.2d at 810]. Although there is no consensus among these courts regarding how to measure deepening insolvency damages, courts often assume that the corporation was injured to the extent of the deepening, suggesting that defendants could be liable for that full amount.

Other federal courts have gone so far as to find a new cause of action in various states common law. For example, the Third Circuit has articulated Pennsylvanias tort of deepening insolvency as the fraudulent expansion of corporate debt and prolongation of corporate life [Official Committee of Unsecured Creditors v. R.F. Lafferty & Co., 267 F.3d 340, 347 (3d Cir. 2001)]. While the Third Circuit has limited this to fraudulent conduct [see Seitz v. Detweiler, Hershey and Associates, P.C. (In re CITX Corp.), 448 F.3d 672, 681 (3d Cir. 2006)], other courts have suggested that negligence could trigger liability [Smith v. Arthur Anderson LLP, 421 F.3d 989, 995 (9th Cir. 2005)]. This cause of action has the potential to override the business judgment rule to add a new substantive duty--a duty to liquidate rather than risk further operations--that complicates efforts to rehabilitate a struggling corporation.

Minnesota State Courts Rejection of Theory. The Christians court firmly holds that Minnesota does not recognize deepening insolvency as a theory of damages. It reached this conclusion in two steps. First, the court rejected the additional-loans component of deepening insolvency damages because loans are balance-sheet neutral. [E]very addition to a corporations liabilities is offset by an equal addition to the corporations assets [Christians, 733 N.W.2d at 811]. That is, the corporation is not damaged simply because it carries more debt. Second, the court stated: Once the deepening-insolvency theory is stripped of the additional-loans component, we are unable to discern what recoverable harms the concept captures that the ordinary measures of damages in auditor-malpractice and breach-of-contract claims do not [Christians, 733 N.W.2d at 811]. In other words, to the extent that this theory of damages makes any sense, the law already recognizes damages for any wrongdoing under other theories of recovery.

Professionals who work with corporations near insolvency will be relieved by the Christians opinion for two reasons. First, refusing to recognize the additional-loans component of damages reduces the likelihood of strike suits. The additional-loans component of damages can be quite large and nearly all corporations in bankruptcy will have gone through a period of increasing debt-load. This makes outside professionals an attractive target. Second, although the court held only that deepening insolvency is not a recognized theory of damages, a deepening insolvency cause of action is likely dead in the water as well in Minnesota courts. The court was unreceptive of the development.

Federal Court Could Still Recognize Theory. Despite Christians, a federal court could still find that Minnesota would recognize deepening insolvency, either as a theory of damages or as a cause of action. Where a states supreme court has not articulated the law, federal courts take their best guess, giving intermediate court decisions such as Christians only persuasive weight. For example, a recent case from the bankruptcy court in the District of Delaware recognized a deepening insolvency cause of action in Delaware law despite a recent state court decision that reached the opposite conclusion [compare Miller v. McCown De Leeuw & Co. (In re The Brown Schools), 368 B.R. 394 (Bankr. D. Del. 2007) with Trenwick America Litigation Trust v. Ernst & Young, L.L.P., 906 A.2d 168 (Del. Ch. 2006)].

Lawyers who work in the area of business insolvency and bankruptcy, or who advise other professionals who do, should follow this development. While Christians is significant, the deepening insolvency theory still poses a risk for those who participate in the rehabilitation of failing corporations.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Robert Kugler is the head of the Bankruptcy Practice Group at Minneapolis-based law firm Leonard, Street & Deinard, a professional association. Rob is an experienced business and commercial litigator with an emphasis in bankruptcy litigation, who regularly provides counsel to creditors, boards of directors, shareholders, trustees, committees, and professionals in all matters relating to bankruptcy protection and litigation. He began his legal career as a law clerk to the Honorable Dennis OBrien of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for the District of Minnesota. Before joining Leonard, Street and Deinard, he was a partner at the firm of Robins, Kaplan, Miller & Ciresi in Minneapolis.

James Brand is an associate at Leonard, Street and Deinard, P.A., and a 2006 graduate of the University of Chicago Law School. James concentrates his business litigation practice in the areas of bankruptcy and regulatory compliance. Before joining Leonard, Street and Deinard, he clerked for the Honorable Eugene Wedoff, Chief Judge of the Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

182 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joe McDonnell on Buenz v. Frontline Transp. Co., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 4 (Ill. 2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 1902

Joe McDonnell on Buenz v. Frontline Transp. Co., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 4 (Ill. 2008)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

February 12, 2008

SUMMARY: There are many commercial transactions in which a party may seek to be indemnified from liability or damages arising out of the performance of a contractual relationship. While it is possible to draft an agreement that may entitle a party to be indemnified even for its own negligence, the language must be clear and free from doubt. However, the law also recognizes freedom of contract. Since the law recognizes the right of competent parties to contract, and assuming no fraud, overreaching, or illegality, the courts will enforce an agreement whereby a contracting party undertakes to protect another against the consequences of the others negligence. Buenz v. Frontline Transp. Co., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 4 (Ill. 2008) presents an example of just such an agreement. This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, discusses the important implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: There are many commercial transactions in which a party may seek to be indemnified from liability or damages arising out of the performance of a contractual relationship. Clauses of this kind are commonly seen in construction contracts, consultant agreements, manufacture-distributor arrangements, transportation agreements, and the like. While it is possible to draft an agreement that may entitle a party to be indemnified even for its own negligence, the language must be clear and free from doubt. This is because considerations of public policy, as well as fundamental concepts of tort liability, require that a party whose wrongful conduct has caused injury should be held accountable for the consequences of that conduct.

However, the law also recognizes freedom of contract. In certain industries (including transportation of goods), circumstances may be such that risk-shifting may be a compelling consideration. A shipper has little or no control over goods placed with it for transportation by a carrier, once the goods are loaded for transport. That will not guarantee, of course, that the shipper will not be sued if a third party is damaged in connection with the transportation of the goods. Under those circumstances, the shipper may expect the carrier to assume responsibility for all claims which might be made against either or both of the contracting parties. The carrier may assume the responsibility as an acceptable calculated risk to get the business. Since the law recognizes the right of competent parties to contract, and assuming no fraud, overreaching, or illegality, the courts will enforce an agreement whereby a contracting party undertakes to protect another against the consequences of the others negligence. Frontline presents an example of just such an agreement.

The Contract Terms. COSCO, a shipper, contracted with Frontline, a carrier, for the transportation of goods by Frontline. The contract between the companies provided in pertinent part that Frontline would be responsible for the performance of the agreement until the return of the equipment [to COSCO]; and that Frontline shall indemnify and hold [COSCO] harmless for any and all claims, demands, actions, suits, proceedings, costs, expenses, damages, and liability arising out of, [in] connection with, or resulting from the possession, use, operation or returning of the equipment during all periods when the equipment shall be out of the possession of [COSCO].

Since the accident involved in the litigation had occurred during Frontlines operation of the equipment used to transport COSCOs goods, and both defendants were sued for various acts or omissions of negligence, COSCO took the position that the agreement covered its own alleged negligence and that Frontline was obligated to defend and indemnify it. The issue considered by the Supreme Court, on appeal by Frontline following the appellate courts affirmance of summary judgment in favor of COSCO, was whether the language in the contract was sufficiently inclusive to warrant the construction adopted by both the trial court and the appellate court.

Governing Principles. The parties agreed that the governing law was as set out in Westinghouse Electric Elevator Co. v. LaSalle Monroe Building Corp., 395 Ill. 429 (1946). That case, cited many times over the years, held that a contract may provide for indemnification for ones own negligence where clear and explicit language to that effect is used or where such intention is expressed in unequivocal terms. The Supreme Court noted at the outset that an indemnity agreement, like any other contract, must be interpreted in light of established rules of construction and that the cardinal rule of interpretation is to discern the intent of the parties, if possible, from the terms used in the agreement. Where the contract language is unambiguous, it should be given its plain and ordinary meaning. Virginia Surety Co. v. Northern Insurance Co. of New York, 224 Ill.2d 550, 556 (2007).

Frontline, contending that the language was not clear and explicit, as required by Westinghouse Electric and its progeny, drew on cases which held that the language any and all claims, etc., was not sufficient to include claims based upon the negligent or wrongful conduct of the party to be indemnified.

Reconciling the Case Law. The Court, however, pointed out that a close reading of those cases (and, in fact, Westinghouse Electric itself) showed that other language in the agreements limited the promise of indemnification to acts or omissions of the promisor or indemnitor; thus the courts would not extend the promise of indemnification to cover a party for its own negligence because the language of the agreements in those cases did not clearly and explicitly include that risk.

In the contract at issue, however, there was no such language which limited the scope of the undertaking by Frontline or which suggested that the promised indemnity did not include claims resulting from COSCOs own negligence. The express language of the interchange agreement clearly and explicitly provides indemnification for COSCOs own negligence pursuant to the rest of the contract terms. (slip op. at 12). While Frontline argued that the use of the words any and all were not sufficient to cover the negligence of an indemnitee, the Court turned that argument on its head, pointing out that where the words any and all are used in conjunction with other language which does not limit the scope of the promise, the intent of the parties is clear: the indemnification extends to any and all claims, without limitation, including those based upon negligence of the indemnitee.

A Common Thread. The Court, in reviewing the case law since Westinghouse Electric, found (with the exception of one case, to be discussed shortly) a consistent thread: where the contract contains language limiting the promise of indemnification to acts or omissions of the promisor/indemnitor, it will not be construed to require indemnification of the other party against that partys negligence. By the same token, where the language clearly and explicitly provides for indemnification for the indemnitees own negligence, the agreement will be enforced according to its terms.

Karsner: A Short Shelf-Life. The sole exception to this consistent mode of analysis, according to the Court, was the appellate courts decision in Karsner v. Lechters Illinois, Inc., 331 Ill.App.3d 474 (2002), decided only five years earlier. The language in that agreement was quite similar to that in Frontline. The pertinent clause provided that the Carrier [plaintiffs employer, as indemnitor] shall indemnify and hold [indemnitee] harmless from and against any and all claims arising from or out of the pick-up, transportation and delivery of the property of [indemnitee] by Carrier, and the use of any motor vehicle or other equipment by Carrier in connection therewith. Plaintiff was injured while unloading a trailer containing defendant's merchandise. In its discussion of Karsner in the Frontline opinion, the Supreme Court said that the contract language was unlimited in its scope and that the appellate court had erred in holding that the indemnitee in Karsner was not entitled to indemnification for its own alleged negligence. Karsner was accordingly overruled.

Tips for Practitioners. It seems fundamental, but the most important consideration in drafting and interpreting contract language concerning indemnification is the language used. Keeping in mind the general policy against a construction that would protect a party from the results of its own wrongdoing, the language chosen must remove any doubt that that is exactly the parties' intention. Clear and precise language specifying that any and all claims are covered by the promise of indemnification, whether based on the conduct, acts or omissions of either party to the contract, will present a strong case for indemnification of a party against its own negligence. Words which fall short of that mark will fail the clear and explicit test of Westinghouse Electric.

From the indemnitors' standpoint, the less-inclusive the language, the better; and, if all else fails, the indemnifying party must be certain that its own insurance covers liabilities assumed by contract. Otherwise, there is the definite possibility that coverage for the tendered defense of the indemnitee will be refused, resulting in costly and prolonged litigation covering two fronts and possibly three: the underlying suit, the tendered defense of the indemnitee, and a declaratory judgment action by or against the indemnitors' insurer.

Cross References. Illinois Tort Law § 23.06: Indemnity.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant State Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

183 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on Basis Technology Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 1888

Grace V.B. Garcia on Basis Technology Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc., 71 Mass. App. Ct. 29 (2008)

By Grace V.B. Garcia

February 11, 2008

SUMMARY: Be Careful when You Hit the Send Key: E-mail Contained All Material Terms of Settlement Agreement. Billions of e-mail messages are sent each day. As practitioners, we receive and write numerous e-mails every day to clients, colleagues, and adversarial counsel. These e-mails, whether consisting of a well planned out communication or an off-the-cuff response, can be vital to a case. Such an e-mail was vital to the resolution in Basis Technology Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc., 71 Mass. App. Ct. 29 (2008). In Basis Technology, the Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the lower courts decision to enforce a settlement agreement that consisted of an e-mail exchange between counsel on the third day of a trial. This lesson of this decision is that parties and their lawyers must be extremely careful when they discuss settlements via e-mail or other means of communication and report a case settled to the court prior to having a formal written agreement. This commentary, written by Grace V.B. Garcia, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Be Careful when You Hit the Send Key: E-mail Contained All Material Terms of Settlement Agreement

Billions of e-mail messages are sent each day. As practitioners, we receive and write numerous e-mails every day to clients, colleagues, and adversarial counsel. These e-mails, whether consisting of a well planned out communication or an off-the-cuff response, can be vital to a case. Such an e-mail was vital to the resolution in Basis Technology Corp. v. Amazon.com, Inc., 71 Mass. App. Ct. 29 (2008). In Basis Technology, the Appeals Court of Massachusetts affirmed the lower courts decision to enforce a settlement agreement that consisted of an e-mail exchange between counsel on the third day of a trial. This lesson of this decision is that parties and their lawyers must be extremely careful when they discuss settlements via e-mail or other means of communication and report a case settled to the court prior to having a formal written agreement.

What Happened Here. In 1999, the plaintiff, Basis Technology Corporation and defendant, Amazon.com, entered into a service contract. Under the terms of the contract, Basis Technology agreed to provide technical services to Amazon to create an electronic commerce system in Japan for the sale of books and other products. In 2003, the plaintiff brought suit against Amazon for breach of fiduciary duty, quantum meruit and violation of Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 93A based on failure to pay. After discovery, a bench trial began in March 2005. After the third day of the trial and some settlement discussions, counsel for Basis Technology sent an e-mail to Amazons counsel that stated the following:

Subject: Basis v. Amazon Settlement Terms

This e-mail confirms the essential business terms of the settlement between our respective clients . . . Basis and Amazon agree that they promptly will take all reasonable steps to memorialize in a written agreement, to be signed by individuals authorized by each party, the terms set forth below, as well as such other terms that are reasonably necessary to make these terms effective.

After Basis attorney listed six terms for the settlement, he concluded his e-mail by stating: [P]lease contact me first thing tomorrow morning if this e-mail does not accurately summarize the settlement terms reached earlier this evening. See you tomorrow morning when we report this matter settled to the Court. In response to this e-mail, early the next morning, Amazons counsel sent a one-word reply: correct.

The next day, in open court and on the record, both attorneys reported the case settled. Consequently, the trial court ended the trial and issued a dismissal nisi order, which contemplates the filing of a dismissal within thirty days. Despite the e-mail and the report of settlement, the parties were unable to agree on a written settlement agreement. Basis Technology then filed a motion to enforce the settlement agreement based on the e-mail, which motion the trial court allowed. Amazon argued on appeal that the agreement was not enforceable because not all of the material terms had been agreed upon and the terms were ambiguous.

Understanding when There Is a Settlement Agreement. Massachusetts has long enforced oral settlement agreements. In enforcing settlement agreements, the court reviews whether the parties had an intention to be legally bound. The court will examine the circumstances to determine whether the parties had an intention to be legally bound on the material terms and whether those terms were unambiguous. To the extent that there is any writing, the court will look at the document as a whole. A party cannot argue that the terms of a settlement are ambiguous unless the terms are reasonably susceptible to more than one meaning. Provisions are not ambiguous simply because the parties have developed different interpretations of them. Basis Tech., Inc., 71 Mass. App. Ct. at 36. Even if a settlement agreement leaves a party open to choose between two defined settlement options, it is not ambiguous or indefinite. Correia v. DeSimone, 34 Mass. App. Ct. 601, 603 (1993).

In Basis Technology, the court found that through the e-mail exchange, the parties had agreed on the essential business terms of the settlement. The mere fact that they needed to memorialize the settlement terms later did not make the settlement incomplete; it did not require the parties to create the terms, but merely required them to record the terms. Thus, the Basis Technology court stood by a decision it made twenty years earlier when it stated that if the parties have agreed upon all material terms, it may be inferred that the purpose of a final document which the parties agree to execute is to serve as a polished memorandum of an already binding contract. Goren v. Royal Invs., Inc., 25 Mass. App. Ct. 137, 140 (1987).

Exercise Extreme Caution When Reporting Settlements to the Court. A large factor in finding that Basis Technology and Amazon had entered into a binding settlement agreement is the fact that the parties reported the matter settled to the court. The Appeals Court followed many Massachusetts cases that have found it important to enforce settlements that are reported to the court by counsel. See e.g. Correia, 34 Mass. App. Ct. at 603-604 ([b]y reporting to the court that the case was settled, the defendants signalled that they had gone beyond deciding whether to give up the right to trial in exchange for the plaintiffs offer . . . the integrity of the judicial process . . . would be ill served if those intimately involved in that process. . . could not rely on declarations of settlement made to the court); Dominick v.

Dominick, 18 Mass. App. Ct. 85, 86-89 (1984) (once the parties informed the court that they had entered into a settlement agreement with the intention of reducing such an agreement to writing, the agreement was binding notwithstanding the absence of a formal signed agreement). The courts have enforced many agreements based on the doctrine of judicial estoppel, a doctrine that has not been officially recognized in Massachusetts but which has sufficient vitality. Correia, 34 Mass. App. Ct. at 604. Judicial estoppel binds a party to the party's judicial declarations and prevents the party from contradicting them in a subsequent proceeding involving the same issues and parties. Thus, a party who reports the case settled to the court cannot later say that he or she has changed his or her mind.

Enforcing settlement agreements that have been orally relayed to the court protects the integrity of the judicial process as well as the parties themselves. It allows courts to dismiss juries, clean up their dockets and prepare for the next case. It also allows parties to rely on the results of negotiations that they have had in coming to a settlement conclusion. Failure to enforce such agreements would def[y] logic and fundamental principles of fairness to allow a represented party who has sought justice in a forum to contradict and undermine an agreement it reached and acknowledged in that same forum, especially when the judge and other litigants appear to have relied on that acknowledgement. Correia, 34 Mass. App. Ct. at 604.

Lesson for Practitioners. Based on the Basis Technology decision, counsel must be sure of the terms and conditions of a settlement before they confirm agreements to settle on behalf of their client. It is important that both counsel and their clients understand the terms that they are agreeing to when the agreement is made. Clients must understand that they cannot later change their minds. Practitioners should have heart-to-heart conversations with their clients, making it clear that the terms upon which there is general agreement can be enforced, even if there is no formal written agreement, once the case is reported settled to the court.

Cross References

MA Pleading and Practice § 16.15: Settlement and Agreement as to Damages.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcia's practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

184 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on Waiver of Right to Arbitrate

2008 Emerging Issues 1893

Bisceglie on Waiver of Right to Arbitrate

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

February 11, 2008

SUMMARY: The NY Ct of Apps held that a law firm retained its contractual right to seek arbitration despite multiple forays in court in a partner dispute. The Court added important guidance on the extent parties may pursue actions in NY before they will lose arbitral rights. Kyle Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman, analyzes Stark v. Molod, et al., in the context of prior law for permissible bounds/limits of contemporaneous litigation and arbitration.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Stark v. Molod Spitz DeSantis & Stark, P.C., 9 N.Y.3d 59, 876 N.E.2d 903, 845 N.Y.S.2d 217 (2007), a unanimous Court of Appeals ruled that a law firm could invoke an arbitration clause in a dispute with a former partner despite participating in related, intermittent proceedings in court for nearly eleven months before moving in favor of arbitration. It reasoned that the law firm's actions had not manifested affirmative acceptance of the judicial forum inconsistent with its later request. How the Court reached this conclusion requires examination of the clause at issue, and procedural history between the parties.

The partnership agreement contained an arbitration clause that provided "controversies and claims which may arise out of the transaction contemplated by this Agreement or the construction, performance or breach of this Agreement shall be determined by binding arbitration." Stark v. Molod Spitz DeSantis & Stark, P.C., 29 A.D.3d 481, 482, 816 N.Y.S.2d 34, 35 (1st Dep't 2006), reversed and remanded, 9 N.Y.3d 59.

After receiving notice of termination and being locked out of her office, plaintiff brought the equivalent of a special proceeding seeking mainly to permit her continued representation of certain clients with pending cases. The parties resolved this by stipulation, which stipulation included both the law firm's preservation of right to claim a share of attorneys' fees on the cases in dispute as well as a general "reservation-of-rights" clause providing "[t]his Stipulation should not otherwise be construed as a waiver of any rights or remedies that [plaintiff] or [the firm] may seek to obtain against one another." Plaintiff, subsequently, filed a plenary action that was summarily "dismissed" on a technicality, and, then, a five count second complaint. The law firm made at least two applications for division of fees and disbursements under the Judiciary Law to Supreme Courts with jurisdiction over respective personal injury cases. That same month, the law firm moved to dismiss plaintiff's second complaint in favor of arbitration. The plaintiff opposed the law firm's requests for division of fees and moved to, among other things, stay arbitration.

The judicial view on this case had gone back and forth with each level of review. The trial court dismissed various claims on other grounds but granted the law firm's request to proceed to arbitration. A split Appellate Division reinstated the dismissed claims, and denied the law firm's motion to compel arbitration and granted the plaintiff's motion to stay arbitration. The Appellate Division held that the law firm waived its right to arbitration by "actively participat[ing] in a special proceeding and two plenary actions that involved matters falling within the ambit of the arbitration clause, thereby manifesting an affirmative acceptance of the judicial forum."

The Court of Appeals saw things differently, and reversed the Appellate Division. The Court reminded us that "the crucial question" is the "degree of participation by the defendant in the action that will create a waiver of a right to stay the action." Stark, 9 N.Y.3d at 66, 876 N.E.2d at 908, 845 N.Y.S.2d 217 (quoting De Sapio v. Kohlmeyer, 35 N.Y.2d 402, 405, 321 N.E.2d 770, 772, 362 N.Y.S.2d 843, 846 (1974)). There is no waiver where the "defendant's actions are consistent with an assertion of the right to arbitrate." Id. Waiver not found where "urgent need to preserve the status quo requires some immediate action..." Stark, 9 N.Y.3d at 67, 876 N.E.2d at 908 (quoting Sherrill v. Grayco Builders, Inc., 64 N.Y.2d 261, 273, 475 N.E.2d 772, 776, 486 N.Y.S.2d 159, 163 (1985); Preiss/Breismeister Architects v. Westin Hotel Co., 56 N.Y.2d 787, 789, 437 N.E.2d 1154, 452 N.Y.S.2d 397 (1982)). Unreasonable delay and "participation in the lawsuit" to the extent they "[manifest] an affirmative acceptance of the judicial forum" supports waiver. Stark, 9 N.Y.3d at 66-67, 876 N.E.2d at 907.

The Court found that the litigation did not "as a matter of law 'manifest an affirmative acceptance of the judicial forum.'" Id. The Stark Court reasoned "urgent need justify[ed] resort to the courts" given the affect on plaintiff's clients and all of the "the firm's ventures in Supreme Court addressed or grew out of" these clients representations. Id. at 9 N.Y.3d at 67-68, 876 N.E.2d at 908-909. The Court, also, noted the mutual "reservation-of-rights" provision. In so doing, the Stark Court broadened the type of exigent circumstances and the number of collateral and provisional skirmishes New York state courts will countenance without waiver of the right to later seek arbitration.

Stark in light of Prior Decisions. Stark does not make "new law" in New York but adds significant factual color to prior Court of Appeals decisions including De Sapio (1974), Preiss/Breismeister (1982) and Sherrill (1985), among others.

It is axiomatic in New York that the right to arbitration can be modified, waived or abandoned. Sherrill, 64 N.Y.2d at 272, 475 N.E.2d at 775, 486 N.Y.S.2d at 162. It is less clear when this modification, waiver or abandonment occurs:

The crucial question, of course, is what degree of participation by the defendant in the action will create a waiver of the right to stay the action. In the absence of unreasonable delay, so long as the defendant's actions are consistent with an assertion of the intention to arbitrate, there is no waiver. However, where the defendant's participation in the lawsuit manifests an affirmative acceptance of the judicial forum, with whatever advantages it may offer in the particular case, his actions are then inconsistent with a later claim that only the arbitral forum is satisfactory.

De Sapio v. Kohlmeyer, 35 N.Y.2d at 405, 321 N.E.2d at 772, 362 N.Y.S.2d at 846.

Clearly, parties can participate in parallel, unrelated claims even when those claims constitute but "various skirmishes" within "one internecine, intracorporate war." Denihan v. Denihan, 34 N.Y.2d 307, 311, 313 N.E.2d 759, 761, 357 N.Y.S.2d 454, 456 (1974). The practitioner should note that Denihan and Stark make clear that the court will focus on whether the claims are separate and distinct rather than their factual genesis or origination in a "common agreement" or transaction. See Sherrill, 64 N.Y.2d at 273, 475 N.E.2d at 776, 486 N.Y.S.2d at 163; Denihan, 34 N.Y.2d at 310, 313 N.E.2d at 761, 357 N.Y.S.2d at 456. Here, practitioners must examine the scope of the arbitration clause to identify arbitrable and non-arbitrable claims, and assess the availability of non-contractual causes of action such as statutory and/or common-law rights that permit a party to initially avail itself of court.

Parties also can seek judicial intervention to preserve the status quo without prejudicing their rights in arbitration. Sherrill, 64 N.Y.2d at 273, 475 N.E.2d at 776, 486 N.Y.S.2d at 163; Preiss/Breismeister Architects, 56 N.Y.2d at 789.

NY CLS CPLR §7502 (c) specifically countenances "an order of attachment or for a preliminary injunction in connection with" a pending or future arbitration. However, the practitioner usually should plead the necessity of this provisional relief as it is conditioned "only upon the ground that the award to which the applicant may be entitled may be rendered ineffectual without such provisional relief." NY CLS CPLR § 7502(c)(emphasis added). Stark specifically expanded on the type of "exigencies" parties can litigate before arbitration beyond those described in Preiss/Breismeister Architects.

The amount of time from suit to assertion of right is less important than the extent a party actively litigates during that time. See City Trade & Indus., Ltd., v. New Cent. Jute Mills Co., 25 N.Y.2d 49, 250 N.E.2d 52, 302 N.Y.S.2d 557 (1969) (no waiver where time to answer had been extended by stipulation for a period of 18 months); Plateis v. Flax, 54 A.D.2d 813, 388 N.Y.S.2d 245 (3d Dep't 1976) (no waiver where arbitration sought by defendant after defendant answered and approximately three months after action commenced to allow settlement negotiations). New York requires meaningful use of the judicial forum for prosecution of claims, defense or seeking of discovery. Serving a notice of deposition may not waive arbitration rights. Jade Press, Inc. v. Packard, 91 Misc. 2d 820, 398 N.Y.S.2d 785 (Civ. Ct. New York Cty. 1977). Entrance of a general appearance and bond posting to secure a future judgment does not constitute a waiver. See In re Terminal Auxiliar Maritima, 6 N.Y.2d 294, 160 N.E.2d 526, 189 N.Y.S.2d 655 (1959).

The court will look for the "totality" of acts presented for conclusive evidence of waiver. Sherrill, 64 N.Y.2d at 273, 475 N.E.2d at 776, 486 N.Y.S.2d at 163. C. I. Planning v. Weeks, 112 A.D.2d 854, 493 N.Y.S.2d 4 (1st Dep't 1985)(waiver where defendant participated in litigation for 18 months and asserted a counterclaim); Sullivan v. Kisly, 93 A.D.2d 783, 461 N.Y.S.2d 808 (1st Dep't 1983)(waiver where party litigated for 17 months by answering, and participating in discovery including depositions); City of Niagara Falls v. Rudolph, 91 A.D.2d 817, 458 N.Y.S.2d 97 (4th Dep't 1982)(waiver after seven months pretrial conferences, examinations before trial, and some fact and expert discovery); Malan Constr. Corp. v. Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., 35 A.D.2d 788, 315 N.Y.S.2d 258 (1st Dep't 1970)(waiver through participation in litigation for 28 months including answers to multiple pleadings and discovery).

It has been argued as convention in New York that a defendant's interposition of a counterclaim effects waiver. In fact, New York cases involve more than such an act alone, including -- prosecution of the counterclaim and/or cross-claims, lengthy delay, failure to assert arbitration as an affirmative defense or resort to the discovery process. See, e.g., DeSapio, 35 N.Y.2d 402, 321 N.E.2d 770, 362 N.Y.S.2d 843 (assertion of cross-claim apportioning liability and deposition of plaintiff); Sherrill, 64 N.Y.2d 261, 475 N.E.2d 772, 486 N.Y.S.2d 159 (assertion of counterclaim, delay, and depositions); Gross v. Tagger, 46 A.D.2d 876, 362 N.Y.S.2d 17 (1st Dep't 1974)(counterclaim and unreasonable delay). See also In re Zimmerman, 236 N.Y. 15, 139 N.E. 764 (1923) (waiver under the Arbitration Law where counterclaim, notices of trial, placement on the trial calendar, issuance of commissions to take foreign depositions and delay of two years); Nagy v. Arcas Brass & Iron Co., 242 N.Y. 97 (1926)(waiver under Arbitration Law where assertion of counterclaim without pleading arbitration "either as a defense or a counterclaim" and undue delay). See also International Modular Housing Inc. v. Atlanta Shipping Corp., 61 A.D.2d 941, 403 N.Y.S.2d 38 (1st Dep't 1978)(assertion of counterclaim did not waive right to arbitration where complaint consisted of both arbitrable and non-arbitrable claims -- defendant's response to nonarbitrable claims not imputed to waive arbitrable claims).

Federal Approach Briefly Compared. Unlike New York's approach, the Second Circuit requires prejudice to the party opposed to arbitration. Com-Tech Assoc. v. Computer Assoc., 938 F.2d 1574, 1576 (2d Cir. 1991). More specifically, a party that engages in "protracted litigation" waives his right to arbitrate when an order compelling arbitration would result in prejudice to the party opposing arbitration. S & R Co. of Kingston v. Latona Trucking Inc., 159 F.3d 80, 83 (2d Cir. 1998); Kramer v. Hammond, 943 F.2d 176, 179 (2d Cir. 1991); Sherrill, 64 N.Y.2d at 272, 475 N.E.2d 775, 486 N.Y.S.2d at 162. "Factors to consider include (1) the time elapsed from the commencement of litigation to the request for arbitration; (2) the amount of litigation (including exchanges of pleadings, any substantive motions, and discovery); (3) proof of prejudice, including taking advantage of pre-trial discovery not available in arbitration, delay and expense." In re S & R Co. of Kingston, 159 F.3d at 83. "An inquiry into whether an arbitration right has been waived is factually specific and not susceptible to bright line rules." Cotton v. Slone, 4 F.3d 176, 179 (2d Cir. 1993).

"Generally, waiver is more likely to be found the longer the litigation goes on, the more a party avails itself of the opportunity to litigate, and the more that party's litigation results in prejudice to the opposing party." Thyssen, Inc. v. Calypso Shipping Corp., S.A., 310 F.3d 102, 105 (2d Cir. 2002).

Although some commentators have urged otherwise, the case law is clear that the Second Circuit has tolerated more litigation than New York state courts before finding a waiver. This result is likely attributable to the requirement of prejudice, the FAA's "strong presumption in favor of arbitration," e.g., Thyssen, Inc., 310 F.3d at 104 (citations omitted) and federal courts view that "waiver is not to be lightly inferred." In re S & R Co. of Kingston, 159 F.3d at 83. The Second Circuit resolves doubts in favor of arbitration. Leadertex, Inc. v. Morganton Dyeing & Finishing Corp., 67 F.3d 20, 25 (2d Cir. 1995).

Sufficient prejudice to infer waiver has been found when a party seeking to compel arbitration engages in extensive discovery successfully obtaining substantial disclosures not available pre-hearing in arbitration, (Liggett & Myers Inc. v. Bloomfield, 380 F. Supp. 1044, 1047-48 (S.D.N.Y. 1974)), makes motions going to the merits of an adversary's claims, (Com-Tech Assoc., 938 F.2d at 1576), delays invoking arbitration rights while the adversary incurs unnecessary delay or expense, (Kramer, 943 F.2d at 179) or does all three. Cotton, 4 F.3d at 179.

A standard capable of varying interpretation, compare Com-Tech Assoc., 938 F.2d at 1576 (holding that the party's "protracted litigation" activities, such as full participation in discovery, making of motions relating to the merits, and delaying the motion to compel arbitration until four months before the scheduled trial date, resulted in waiver), with the often criticized Rush v. Oppenheimer & Co., 779 F.2d 885, 887-888 (2d Cir. 1985) (holding that delay of eight months prior to moving to compel arbitration, participation in extensive discovery, motion to dismiss, and answering of complaint without raising the arbitration clause as an affirmative defense did not result in waiver because there was no showing of prejudice). Second Circuit precedent permits significant litigation on the same claim before granting a request for arbitration. See, e.g., Jung v. Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, LLP, 434 F. Supp. 2d 211 (2d Cir. 2006) (arbitration after defendant filed a motion to dismiss); Leadertex, 67 F.3d 20 (arbitration where parties engaged in discovery that yielded minimal information); Sweater Bee by Banff, Ltd. v. Manhattan Industries, Inc., 754 F.2d 457, 461-64 (2d Cir. 1985) (arbitration where case pending two years and Court ruled on Defendants' motion to dismiss); Carcich v. Rederi A/B Nordie, 389 F.2d 692, 694 (2d Cir. 1968) (no waiver after two years of litigation before stay sought); Robert Lawrence Co. v. Devonshire Fabrics, Inc., 271 F.2d 402, 412-13 (2d Cir. 1959), cert. dismissed, 364 U.S. 801, 5 L. Ed. 2d 37, 81 S. Ct. 27 (1960) (no waiver after nine months despite defendant agreeing to deposition and receiving discovery from plaintiff); Kulukundis Shipping Co. v. Amtorg Trading Corp., 126 F.2d 978 (2d Cir. 1942) (no waiver where no mention of arbitration in affirmative defense after ten months of litigation and case on "trial ready" calendar)

Practitioners' Take-Away. Parties commonly risk the forfeiture of their arbitration rights and proceed in a judicial forum first because they do not understand the nature of plaintiff's claims sufficiently, desire pre-hearing discovery, wish to bring a motion to clarify issues, want to make adjudication as complex and costly as possible for their adversary, seek to preserve the ability to choose a (more advantageous) forum and, often, a combination of these considerations. Occasionally, a party does not know and/or understand the scope of its arbitration rights until later. Parties are wise to assess the scope of the arbitration clause to determine if certain non-mandatory claims can be litigated separately in order to achieve the goals enumerated above. If a dual strategy is appropriate or viable, practitioners must carefully assess how, when and where their claims and defenses are pled. Parties have more latitude to pursue some litigation on the same claim in federal court without stanching arbitration. In state court, Stark specifically expands the types of "exigent circumstances" permitting judicial relief.

Cross-references

Anna Sim, To Waive or Not to Waive: New York and Federal Law on Waiver of the Right to Compel Arbitration, 43 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 609 (1999); 13-75 New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 7501.26 (right to arbitrate or to litigate may be waived); 13-75 New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 7503.15 (bringing action generally waives right to arbitrate); 13-75 New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 7503.16 (defendant's actions manifesting agreement to judicial forum may waive right to demand arbitration).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution ("ADR"), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-885-8818 or by email at kbisceglie@bartonesq.com.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

185 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan Brazas on Brucker v. Mercola, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1838 (Ill. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1862

Susan Brazas on Brucker v. Mercola, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1838 (Ill. 2007)

By Susan M. Brazas

February 6, 2008

SUMMARY: Nutritional Supplement Dispensing Error Falls Within Arising out of Patient Care; But Does an Unborn Fetus Have the Right to Sue? This commentary discusses another must-read Illinois Supreme Court decision which addresses the current controversy over what constitutes arising out of patient care to render an action subject to the health care statute of repose. The surprise ending of the opinion identifies the time of accrual of an unborn fetus' cause of action for in utero injury. This commentary, written by Susan Brazas, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Illinois Supreme Court Addresses Scope of Health Care Statute of Repose for Nutritional Supplement Dispensing Error and for Tolling Of Statute Of Limitations for Fetal Injury.

In the first of two same-day decisions, the Illinois Supreme Court has construed broadly the scope of the health care statute of repose, 735 ILCS 5/13-212, in Brucker v. Mercola, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1838 (Ill. 2007). The Court undertook an extensive analysis of the meaning of the phrase arising out of patient care, which is the description within 735 ILCS 5/13-212 of the types of cases to which this statute of repose applies.

The other opinion filed by the Illinois Supreme Court on the same day, Orlak v. Loyola Univ. Health Sys., 221 Ill. 2d 643 (Ill. 2006), also turned on the interpretation of that same phrase, but as applied to a hospital's failure to notify a prior patient that she was at risk for Hepatitis C virus from the blood transfusion of several years prior.

Both cases gave a broad reading to the phrase arising out of patient care, but with different approaches. In Orlak, the Court declined to follow an out-of-state case holding with a similar fact pattern. In Brucker, the Court assessed and adopted case law interpreting that same phrase by the Seventh Circuit, and also in state court decisions interpreting the phrase arising out of and in the course of employment found within the Illinois Worker's Compensation Act.

In Brucker, a female patient ingested a high dose of selenium, which an osteopathic physician's office receptionist had mistaken for a nutritional supplement which the physician had recommended and sold to the patient. The patient was pregnant at the time, and she amended her complaint to add an action for injury to her unborn fetus resulting from the error. The defense claimed that this amendment was beyond the time allowed by the health care statute of repose, 735 ILCS 5/13-212.

The Brucker Court concluded that the cause of action was one arising from patient care, because the injury had its origin in the plaintiff's status as a patient, and had a causal connection to the patient care which included the prescribing of the supplements. The Brucker Court explicitly denied that it was applying a but-for test, which would be too broad, and also denied that the test was whether the error claimed was one of medical malpractice, as that would be too narrow. Still, the First District Appellate Court decision in Brucker referred to 735 ILCS 5/13-212 as the medical malpractice repose provision.

One might expect that the result of Brucker would be the dismissal of the action as time-barred. However, the Brucker Court concluded with an extensive discussion of whether the fetus' cause of action accrued at the time of the mother's injurious ingestion of selenium, or instead at the time of the fetus' birth. The Brucker Court relied heavily on the decisions of Louisiana and New York case precedent on this issue to conclude that because a fetus is incapable of suing, its cause of action does not accrue until its birth. The result was that the amended count brought on behalf of the infant was viewed as timely filed under the health care statute of repose.

Strategic Implications. As with the Orlak decision, one lesson to be learned from this decision is that specific facts should be pleaded in anticipation of the categorization of a case as arising out of patient care. More than the simple causal connection test set forth in Orlak is proposed by the Brucker Court, in its reference to the Workers' Compensation Act test that the injury must have had its origin in some risk connected with employment--or, in Brucker--connected with patient care.

Practical Ramifications. This case again illustrates the importance of drawing on unconventional citations as persuasive authority for a novel issue. The Brucker Court examined case law from the Seventh Circuit, and from state courts in New York, Louisiana, and Texas, as well as case law on the Illinois Workers' Compensation Act. As in its recent opinion in Townsend v. Sears, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1701 (Nov. 29, 2007), in Brucker the Court looked to law review articles for part of its analysis. Thus, attorneys are well advised to make liberal use of persuasive authority for a variety of sources in their briefing and arguments, especially on issues for which there is little or no case law directly on point.

Considerations for Pleading. Counsel should exercise caution to set up pleadings so that charging allegations include those which are broad enough to encompass later, more detailed allegations which become apparent only as discovery proceeds. The Court's opinion of one month later, in Porter v. Decatur Mem. Hosp., 2008 Ill. LEXIS 10 (Ill. 2008), held that allegations of failure timely to diagnose and treat progressing spinal injury were broad enough so that amended allegations of failure to take prompt action as shown necessary by a CT scan. The Brucker Court, in contrast, held that later amendments to the complaint did not relate back and, thus, the action was time-barred under the statute of repose.

Counsel can make use of techniques of pleading in the alternative as a means to guard against the risk of being time-barred, so that both ordinary negligence and medical negligence, for example, can be pleaded if warranted. If the culpability of a person or entity cannot be ascertained with sufficient certainty by the time the initial pleading is ready to be filed, counsel can use the Respondent in Discovery provision, 735 ILCS 5/2-402. This tool will serve to put the potential defendants on notice of the cause of action, and will allow for discovery (especially depositions) to proceed much more quickly than if only Defendants are named.

Counsel are also urged to pay special attention to those factual allegations that can add to (or detract from) the characterization of conduct as arising out of patient care. Both Brucker and Orlak demonstrate that it is not enough to show that the alleged wrongful conduct involved the exercise of medical judgment as opposed to administrative decision-making. Thus, counsel should set forth, in their pleadings and briefs, the connection between the plaintiff's status as a patient and the alleged wrongful conduct.

Extension to Other Issues. It may be argued that the Brucker decision should be limited to its facts, i.e., a fetus' lack of capacity to sue as justification to toll the statute of repose. Still, counsel could offer creative arguments about why this principle should apply to other persons and entities--such as a corporation which is not in good standing--to toll a statute of limitations. Counsel should make use of what the Court's current receptiveness to alternative sources of authority in offering citations to various sources, including other statutes and other jurisdictions, in support of these arguments.

Cross References. Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C6.01: Drafting a Complaint; Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C6.03: Serving a Complaint on Defendant.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

186 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

James J. Walsh on Hill v. L.F. Transportation, Inc., 2008 Mich. App. LEXIS 139

2008 Emerging Issues 1863

James J. Walsh on Hill v. L.F. Transportation, Inc., 2008 Mich. App. LEXIS 139

By James J. Walsh

February 6, 2008

SUMMARY: In Hill v. L.F. Transportation, Inc., 2008 Mich. App. LEXIS 139, the Michigan Court of Appeals found that the trial court had abused its discretion when it refused to allow a third party to intervene in a lawsuit. This decision indicates that Michigan courts will continue their long-standing practice of liberally interpreting the rules governing intervention. This commentary, written by James J. Walsh, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Hill v. L.F. Transportation, Inc., 2008 Mich. App. LEXIS 139, the Michigan Court of Appeals found that the trial court had abused its discretion when it refused to allow a third party to intervene in a lawsuit. This decision indicates that Michigan courts will continue their long-standing practice of liberally interpreting the rules governing intervention.

The plaintiff in Hill was a personal representative of the estate of a decedent who had been killed in an automobile accident. An insurance company moved to intervene in the settlement of the plaintiffs claims after case evaluation for the purpose of collecting costs awarded to it in an earlier proceeding. The trial court denied intervention, stating that in its opinion the insurance company would not have prevailed had it been permitted to bring its claim. On appeal, the Michigan Court of Appeals held that the trial court had abused its discretion in denying the insurance companys motion on this basis. To reach this decision, the Court of Appeals construed the court rule granting an individual the ability to intervene in a case under certain circumstances and found that MCR 2.209 required only that the potential intervener have a claim, not that the potential intervener necessarily have a meritorious claim. The Court of Appeals thus found that the trial court had erred by considering its assessment of the merit of the insurance companys claim when deciding to deny intervention. With its ruling in Hill, the Court of Appeals reaffirmed the practice of Michigan courts of interpreting the rules governing intervention in favor of allowing interested third parties to intervene.

Intervention is an action by which a third party becomes party in a suit pending between others. School Dist. of the City of Ferndale v. Royal Oak Twp. School Dist. No. 8, 291 N.W. 199, 204; 293 Mich. 1 (1940)) (quoting Zeitinger v. Hargadine-McKittrick Dry Goods Co., 250 S.W. 913, 916; 298 Mo. 461 (1923)). As no right to intervention existed under the common law, the right to intervene is a creature of the judiciary in the court rules, and earlier, of the legislature by statute. See id. at 202. Currently, MCR 2.209 governs intervention by right and permissive intervention. Subsection A sets forth three methods by which a third party can intervene as a matter of right. First, a third party has the right to intervene if a statute or court rule confers such a right. Second, a third party has the right to intervene if all parties to the action stipulate to allow intervention. Finally, a third party has the right to intervene if he claims an interest relating to the property or transaction which is the subject of the action and is so situated that the disposition of the action may as a practical matter impair or impede the applicants ability to protect that interest, unless the applicants interest is adequately represented by existing parties. Subsection B sets forth the circumstances under which the court may permit a third party to intervene. Under this subsection, a third party may be permitted to intervene if a statute or court rule confers on the individual a conditional right to intervene or if his claim or defense and the main action have a question of law or fact in common.

Regardless of whether he is seeking intervention under subsection A or B, a third party looking to intervene in a suit must submit to the court a motion stating the grounds for his intervention as well as a pleading stating the claim or defense for which he seeks intervention. MCR 2.209(C). He must also give notice to all parties already involved in the suit. Id.

When the legislature by statute granted third parties the right to intervene in lawsuits under certain circumstances, the Michigan Supreme Court ruled that the remedial statute must be construed liberally. Ford Motor Co. v. Blair, 244 N.W. 167, 169; 259 Mich. 574 (1932) (discussing former statute). Michigan courts have held that the court rules governing intervention should also be construed liberally to permit a third party to intervene by right if it can be demonstrated that the original parties to the suit may not be adequately representing the third partys interests. See Precision Pipe & Supply, Inc. v. Meram Constr., Inc., 489 N.W.2d 166, 167; 195 Mich. App. 153 (1992); Sumpter v. Kosinski, 419 N.W.2d 463, 470; 165 Mich. App. 784 (1988) (discussing former rule).

Not only do the courts liberally construe the rules to allow intervention, courts also reject efforts to create new, different or greater barriers to the ability to intervene under the rules. For example, Michigan courts have construed MCR 2.209(A)(3) to hold that it does not require the third party to demonstrate that the original parties are in fact inadequately representing his interests. Although such a demonstration would certainly suffice, the rule does not require it. Rather, the rule only requires the third party to demonstrate that the concern or possibility of inadequate representation exists. See Vestevich v. West Bloomfield Twp., 630 N.W.2d 646, 649; 245 Mich. App. 759 (2001); see also Davidson v. City of Pontiac, 167 N.W.2d 856, 859; 16 Mich. App. 110 (1969) (under former court rule). Courts have characterized the resulting burden as minimal. Karrip v. Twp. of Cannon, 321 N.W.2d 690, 692; 115 Mich. App. 726 (1982)).

Although Michigan courts do recognize that intervention may be denied when it would result in either undue delay or causing a multifariousness of parties and causes of action, see Precision Pipe & Supply, Inc., 489 N.W.2d at 168; School Dist of the City of Ferndale, 291 N.W. at 203, the courts do not strictly follow this. As the Michigan Court of Appeals observed in Precision Pipe, intervention might never be granted if this were strictly construed. Precision Pipe, 489 N.W.2d at 168.

Thus, Hill represents the latest rejection by a Michigan court of an attempt to make it more difficult for third parties to intervene in a lawsuit. The decision in Hill is also in line with dicta from a prior decision of the court, decided under a former version of the court rules. See Davidson, 167 N.W.2d 856, 16 Mich. App. 110. As in Hill, the court in Davidson noted that [t]he ultimate success or failure of a third partys defense (or claim) is of course, irrelevant to the question of intervention. Id. at 116.

Considerations. Although MCR 2.209 is liberally construed to allow intervention, practitioners should be aware of potential limitations on a third partys ability to intervene. The first consideration appears in the rule itself. The rule requires that a third partys motion to intervene (either by right or through permissive intervention) must be timely. It is within a courts discretion to deny a motion to intervene based on a finding of laches or unreasonable delay. Karrip, 321 N.W.2d at 692. Although timeliness is a requirement for intervention under both subsections A and B, a court may more closely scrutinize the timeliness of a motion seeking permissive intervention than a motion seeking intervention by right. Subsection B explicitly allows a court to consider whether the proposed intervention will cause undue delay or prejudice to the original parties, and the court may deny intervention on that basis.

An example of the application of the timeliness requirement concerns the courts handling of a motion to intervene brought postjudgment. A third party bringing such a motion must make a strong showing that intervention is appropriate, and courts show a considerable reluctance to grant such motions. Dean v. Dept of Corr., 527 N.W.2d 529, 532; 208 Mich. App. 144 (1994); see also Czajkowski v. Lount, 52 N.W.2d 642, 646; 333 Mich. 156 (1952) (decided under former statute). The concern in such a situation is fairness a third party bringing a postjudgment motion to intervene is looking to take advantage of a judgment already known to be favorable to his position. See Dean, 527 N.W.2d at 532. Thus, in his motion the third party must explain to the court why he did not move to intervene prior to judgment. See id.

Not every interested third party may intervene in a suit. Practitioners should note that a third party looking to intervene in an action must also meet traditional constitutional standing requirements before a court will grant a motion to intervene. Karrip, 321 N.W.2d at 692. As these requirements are constitutionally mandated, no court rule or statute can eliminate them. See Rohde v. Ann Arbor Public Schools, 737 N.W.2d 158, 166; 479 Mich. 336 (2007). Michigan state courts have recently adopted federal standing requirements. See Lee v. Macomb County Board of Commrs, 629 N.W.2d 900; 464 Mich. 726 (2001) (adopting the standing requirements as set forth in Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555 (1992)).

Finally, practitioners must be aware of the consequences of a decision to intervene. Once a third party has successfully intervened, he becomes a party to the action, and is thus bound by the courts judgment in that action. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Mich. v. Eaton Rapids Cmty. Hosp., 561 N.W.2d 488; 221 Mich. App. 301 (1997).

For general information on intervention in Michigan, see Michigan Law and Practice Civil Procedure §§ 134, 135, 136.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

James J. Walsh is a partner in the Ann Arbor office of Bodman LLP, a Detroit based firm. Mr. Walsh is a 1975 graduate of Louisiana State University Law School and clerked for two judges on the Michigan Court of Appeals before joining Bodman in 1977. His litigation experience is quite broad, with numerous jury and bench trials and appeals in federal and state courts. He was primary litigation counsel for Michigans Commissioner of Financial and Insurance Services in the rehabilitation of the U.S. branch of Confederation Life Insurance Company, the largest and most successful insurance insolvency in North American history. He has extensive experience in class actions and also specializes in the constitutional aspects of sign regulations as counsel to the Outdoor Advertising Association of Michigan.

187 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Merrill on Nevada Summary Judgment

2008 Emerging Issues 1872

Merrill on Nevada Summary Judgment

By David J. Merrill

February 6, 2008

SUMMARY: For 20 years after the U.S. Supreme Court adopted its summary judgment trilogy [Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 91 L.Ed.2d 265 (1986); Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202 (1986); Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio, 475 U.S. 574, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538 (1986)], Nevada Supreme Court summary judgment jurisprudence vacillated between the federal standard adopted by the Court and the slightest doubt standard first accepted by the Nevada Supreme Court in 1954. These parallel lines of authority subjected the Court to criticism from both the bench and bar. In Wood v. Safeway, Inc. [121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73, 121 P.3d 1026 (2005)], the Nevada Supreme Court put the criticism to rest. The court finally abandoned the slightest doubt standard and formally embraced the trilogy. In 2007, the Court further cemented the federal standard into Nevada law by clarifying the summary judgment burdens of proof and production [see Cuzze v. Univ. & Cmty. Coll. Sys. of Nev., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55, 172 P.3d 131 (2007)].

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Introduction. For almost 20 years after the United States Supreme Court adopted its summary judgment trilogy [Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 106 S.Ct. 2548, 91 L.Ed.2d 265 (1986); Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S.Ct. 2505, 91 L.Ed.2d 202 (1986); Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio, 475 U.S. 574, 106 S.Ct. 1348, 89 L.Ed.2d 538 (1986)], Nevada Supreme Court summary judgment jurisprudence vacillated between the federal standard adopted by the Court and the slightest doubt standard first accepted by the Nevada Supreme Court in 1954. These parallel lines of authority subjected the Court to criticism from both the bench and bar. However, in Wood v. Safeway, Inc. [121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73, 121 P.3d 1026 (2005)], the Nevada Supreme Court put the criticism to rest. In Wood, the court finally abandoned the slightest doubt standard and formally embraced the trilogy. In 2007, the Nevada Supreme Court further cemented the federal standard into Nevada law by clarifying the summary judgment burdens of proof and production [see Cuzze v. Univ. & Cmty. Coll. Sys. of Nev., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55, 172 P.3d 131 (2007)]. Thus, the Nevada practitioner can no longer blindly adhere to the past 20 years of Nevada jurisprudence when moving for or opposing a motion for summary judgment, but must refer to more recent Nevada Supreme Court cases or federal cases.

The Slightest Doubt Standard. In Parman v. Petricciani, [70 Nev. 427, 436, 272 P.2d 492, 496 (1954), abrogated by Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73, 121 P.3d 1026], the Nevada Supreme Court quoted the following language from the Second Circuits opinion in Doehler Metal Furniture Co. v. United States, [149 F.2d 130, 135 (2d Cir. 1945) (emphasis added)]:

We take this occasion to suggest that trial judges should exercise great care in granting motions for summary judgment. A litigant has a right to trial where there is the slightest doubt as to the facts...

Ever since, the slightest doubt standard has permeated Nevadas summary judgment jurisprudence [see Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 4, 121 P.3d at 1038; see also Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 16, 121 P.3d at 1038 n. 1 (Maupin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part)].

However, in Wood, the court noted that other courts and commentators had criticized the slightest doubt standard as unduly limiting the use of summary judgment [see Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 4, 121 P.3d at 102930 & n.5]. The court also recognized that although the United States Supreme Court did not address the slightest doubt standard directly in Celotex and Liberty Lobby, the Courts opinions in those cases undermin[ed] the slightest doubt standard [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 4, 121 P.3d at 1030]. For example, in Celotex, the Court concluded that summary judgment should not be regarded as a disfavored procedural shortcut [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 4, 121 P.3d at 1030 (quoting Celotex, 477 U.S. at 327, 106 S.Ct. at 2555)]. Likewise, in Liberty Lobby, the Court noted that not all factual disputes preclude summary judgment, only genuine issues of material fact [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 5, 121 P.3d at 1030 (quoting Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. 24748, 106 S.Ct. at 2510)].

Despite its continued adherence to the slightest doubt standard in certain circumstances, the Nevada Supreme Court also issued several decisions that seemingly reject[ed] the slightest doubt standard [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 5, 121 P.3d at 1030]. For example, Wood noted that previous decisions concluded that a nonmoving party may not defeat a motion for summary judgment by relying on the gossamer threads of whimsy, speculation and conjecture [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 5, 121 P.3d at 1030]. In addition, the court had previously stated that [w]hen a motion for summary judgment is made and supported as required by NRCP 56, the nonmoving party may not rest upon general allegations and conclusions, but must, by affidavit or otherwise, set forth specific facts demonstrating the existence of a genuine factual issue [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 5, 121 P.3d at 1030 (quoting Pegasus v. Reno Newspapers, Inc., 118 Nev. 706, 71314, 57 P.3d 82, 87 (2002))]. In fact, the court had previously cited Celotex and Liberty Lobby with approval [see, e.g., Valley Bank of Nev. v. Marble, 105 Nev. 366, 367, 775 P.2d 1278, 1279 (1989); Oehler v. Humana, Inc., 105 Nev. 348, 350, 775 P.2d 1271, 1272 (1989); NGA #2 Ltd. Liab. Co. v. Rains, 113 Nev. 1151, 1156, 946 P.2d 163, 167 (1997); Clauson v. Lloyd, 103 Nev. 432, 435, 743 P.2d 631, 633 (1987)].

The Nevada Supreme Courts use of the slightest doubt standard in certain circumstances and citation to the federal standard in other instances made the court the rightful subject of criticism within the bench and bar for shaping results by variant applications of the two standards [see Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 17, 121 P.3d at 1038 (Maupin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part)]. However, in Wood, the court put the criticism to rest as it took the opportunity to clarify that the slightest doubt standard in our summary judgment jurisprudence is an incorrect statement of the law and should no longer be used when analyzing motions for summary judgment [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 2, 121 P.3d at 1028]. Instead, the court formally adopted the United States Supreme Court trilogy [see 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 6, 121 P.3d at 1031].

Nevadas Summary Judgment Standard. As stated in Nevada Rule of Civil Procedure 56:

[Summary] judgment ... shall be rendered forthwith if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.

[N.R.C.P. 56(c)]. The substantive law controls which factual disputes are material and will preclude summary judgment; other factual disputes are irrelevant [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 6, 121 P.3d at 1031]. In addition, [a] factual dispute is genuine when the evidence is such that a rational trier of fact could return a verdict for the nonmoving party. [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 6, 121 P.3d at 1031]. The court must construe the evidence in a light most favorable to the nonmoving party [see Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 6, 121 P.3d at 1031]. However, to avoid summary judgment, the nonmoving party must produce admissible evidence demonstrating a genuine issue of material fact [see Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 6, 121 P.3d at 1031]. However, as recently clarified in Cuzze v. University & Community College System of Nevada, [t]he manner in which each party may satisfy its burden of production depends on which party will bear the burden of persuasion on the challenged claim at trial [Cuzze v. University & Community College System of Nevada, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55, 5, 172 P.3d 131, 134 (2007)].

Burden of Production and Persuasion. In Cuzze, the court noted that it follows the United States Supreme Courts opinion in Celotex Corp. v. Catrett when analyzing who bears the burden of proof and persuasion [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 4, 172 P.3d at 134]. The moving party always bears the initial burden of production to show the absence of a genuine issue of material fact [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 4, 172 P.3d at 134 (citing Celotex, 477 U.S. at 323, 106 S.Ct. 2548)]. Assuming the moving party satisfies its initial burden, then the nonmoving party must produce admissible evidence demonstrating a genuine issue of material fact [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 4, 172 P.3d at 134 (citing Celotex, 477 U.S. at 331, 106 S.Ct. 2548)].

How this burden of production may be satisfied depends on who bears the burden of persuasion at trial [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 4, 172 P.3d at 134 (citing Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322, 106 S.Ct. 2548)]. For example, if the moving party bears the burden of persuasion, that party must present evidence that would entitle it to a judgment as a matter of law in the absence of contrary evidence [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 5, 172 P.3d at 134 (citing N.R.C.P. 56(a), (e))]. However, if the moving party does not bear the burden of persuasion, it can satisfy the burden of production in two ways. First, it can provide evidence that negates an essential element of the nonmoving partys claim [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 5, 172 P.3d at 134 (citing Celotex, 477 U.S. at 331, 106 S.Ct. 2548 (Brennan, J., dissenting))]. Second, the party may satisfy its initial burden by pointing out ... that there is an absence of evidence to support the nonmoving partys case [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 5, 172 P.3d at 134 (quoting Celotex, 477 U.S. at 325, 106 S.Ct. 2548)]. In such cases, the burden of production then shifts to the nonmoving party to demonstrate, through admissible evidence, that there is a genuine issue of material fact [Cuzze, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. 55 at 5, 172 P.3d at 134 (citing Wood, 121 Nev. at 732, 121 P.3d at 1031)].

The Bottom Line. Because the Nevada Supreme Court has adopted the summary judgment standard used by the federal courts and entirely abandoned the slightest doubt standard, Nevada practitioners must take a critical look at prior Nevada Supreme Court summary judgment cases. Actions in which the court reversed the granting of summary judgment may no longer support the same outcome in a similar case if the prior case--as many of them were--was based on the slightest doubt standard. Practitioners seeking to avoid summary judgment can no longer cling to the slightest doubt standard, which was the death knell for many well-supported motions. Likewise, parties can more confidently move for summary judgment knowing that it is no longer viewed by the court as a disfavored procedural shortcut but instead as an integral part of the [Nevada] Rules as a whole, which are designed to secure the just, speedy and inexpensive determination of every action [Wood, 121 Nev. Adv. Op. 73 at 45, 121 P.3d at 1030 (quoting Celotex, 477 U.S. at 327, 106 S.Ct. 2548))].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David J. Merrill is a shareholder with Bailey & Kennedy in Las Vegas, Nevada. Mr. Merrill attended Pepperdine University School of Law, receiving his J.D. cum laude in 1996 and also received a Certificate in Alternative Dispute Resolution from Pepperdines Strauss Institute for Dispute Resolution. Mr. Merrill did his undergraduate work at the University of California at Irvine and received a B.A. in Political Science with a minor in Global Peace and Conflict Studies. Mr. Merrill served as Business Editor of the Pepperdine Law Review. Before joining Bailey & Kennedy in 2003, Mr. Merrill was an associate at Nevadas largest law firm from 1996 to 2002.

Mr. Merrills practice focuses on complex civil litigation, including disputes in such areas as corporate law, commercial law, constitutional law, products liability, and business torts. In addition, Mr. Merrills practice has included a significant amount of appellate work in both the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit and the Nevada Supreme Court.

188 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Law Rev. Commn Proposals to Add Two New Hearsay Exceptions to the CA Evid. Code

2008 Emerging Issues 1874

Prof. Paul Bergman on Law Revision Commission Proposals to Add Two New Hearsay Exceptions to the Cal

By Paul Bergman

February 6, 2008

SUMMARY: Paul Bergman, UCLA Law School Professor Emeritus, discusses the status of the California Law Revision Commissions pending proposals to add a new hearsay exception that would make present sense impressions admissible in California, and to expand Californias very limited version of the forfeiture by wrongdoing hearsay doctrine. The Commissions proposals, existing California law, and the treatment of similar issues under the Federal Rules of Evidence are discussed and analyzed.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: As of February 2008, the California Law Revision Commission is in the process of deciding whether to recommend to the Legislature the addition of two new hearsay exceptions to the California Evidence Code (CEC). One of the new hearsay exceptions would make present sense impressions admissible in California. The second new hearsay exception would expand Californias very limited version of the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine. If enacted by the California Legislature, each addition would bring the CEC more in line with the Federal Rules of Evidence (FRE).

Present Sense Impressions

A California Law Revision Commission report of January 2008 recommends the addition of a new Evid. Code § 1243 to the CEC, adding a new hearsay exception for present sense impressions. This exception was rejected when the CEC was enacted in the mid-1960s, but is in effect in 44 states, has received limited opposition, and will almost certainly be enacted by the Legislature.

New Evid. Code § 1243 probably will be nearly identical to Federal Rules of Evidence (FRE), Rule 803(1), which provides a hearsay exception for A statement describing or explaining an event or condition made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition, or immediately thereafter.

The Commissions January 2008 report includes an example of the type of hearsay that the present sense impression exception will make admissible: a baseball announcers description of a game. Because an announcer describes the action as it unfolds, faulty memory is not a concern, nor is the announcer likely to have enough time to be deliberately deceptive. These factors mean that the description is very likely to be trustworthy, and a hearsay exception therefore warranted.

In many situations in which present sense impressions are offered into evidence, the testifying witness will be either the declarant or a person who was at the scene and near enough to the declarant to hear the statement. Either way, an additional justification for the exception is that a witness with first-hand knowledge of the event to which the statement pertains is likely to be available for cross examination. (Of course, this may not always be true, and in fact is not true in the Commissions baseball announcer example. If the testifying witness was listening to the game on the radio, the witness will have first-hand knowledge of the announcers statement but not of the play to which the statement pertains.)

The Commission dismissed an objection that an exception for present sense impressions is not warranted because this type of hearsay is often cumulative, simply repeating a witness in-court testimony. The hearsay may well be more reliable than testimony that takes place long after an event, and at any rate trial judges have discretion under Evid. Code § 352 (the CEC counterpart to Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 403) to exclude present sense impressions if their probative value is substantially outweighed by time considerations.

The Commission also noted that the exception for present sense impressions ordinarily will not apply to pretrial identifications. When for example a declarant attends a lineup and says that No. 3 was the robber, the statement does not constitute a present sense impression because it relates back to an event that took place well before the statement was made, not during or immediately thereafter. And the CEC, like the FRE, has a separate rule governing pretrial identifications.

A common uncertainty is how to treat statements of opinion under the exception for present sense impressions. For example, what if our baseball announcer says, That was a wicked line drive; the shortstop made a great play to catch it? Under proposed Evid. Code § 1243, as under to Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 803(1), the conclusory nature of a statement is a factor that trial judges can consider when exercising discretion under Evid. Code § 352.

How much time can elapse before a statement no longer qualifies as having made during or immediately after the event to which it pertains? The issue is a common one; it arises every time lawyers argue about and judges have to apply the abstract language of legal rules to concrete events. The Commission proposes to somewhat limit judges discretion in this regard by including in its official comment an advisory that the permissible time lapse is strictly limited to the moment required to verbalize what has just been perceived.

Finally, the Commission proposes that the official comment to the new rule remind judges that the proponent of a present sense impression must offer foundational corroborative evidence independent of the present sense impression itself that (1) the event or condition took place and (2) the declarant perceived the event or condition. And because California does not follow the Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 104(a) provision that federal judges can consider inadmissible evidence when making foundational rulings, a California proponent of a present sense impression will have to corroborate a present sense impression with admissible evidence that an event occurred and that the declarant perceived it.

Forfeiture by Wrongdoing

Background. In Crawford v. Washington (2004) 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L. Ed. 2d 177, the U.S. Supreme Court made a sea change in its interpretation of the right of confrontation guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. The Court ruled that testimonial hearsay is inadmissible against a criminal defendant unless the defendant has an opportunity to cross examine the declarant either before or during trial.

The Court gave further guidance in Davis v. Washington (2006) 547 U.S. 813, 126 S. Ct. 2266, 165 L. Ed. 2d 224. The Court ruled that statements made to 911 operators (as well as police officers and other government authorities) in the course of an ongoing emergency are not testimonial. Once an emergency has passed and objective circumstances indicate that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution, statements are testimonial.

Prior to Crawford, the Confrontation Clause was rarely an obstacle for prosecutors who sought to offer hearsay into evidence. Prosecutors could satisfy the Confrontation Clause by showing that hearsay had indicia of reliability. For example, in a common situation, a female victim of domestic violence may describe an attack to the police, identifying her attacker. By the time of trial, however, the woman often recants and refuses to cooperate in the prosecution. Under pre-Crawford law, prosecutors successfully prosecuted many attackers by calling a police officer to testify to the victims hearsay statements. Post-Crawford, the hearsay is inadmissible unless the hearsay statements were made in the course of an ongoing emergency.

The Court recognized the obstacle that Crawford and Davis present in cases in which victims may be too scared and intimidated to testify against their attackers. For example, with reference to domestic violence cases, the Court in Davis said that this particular type of crime is notoriously susceptible to intimidation or coercion of the victim to ensure that she does not testify at trial. The Court pointed to a possible way-out for prosecutors: the doctrine of forfeiture by wrongdoing [Davis v. Washington (2006) 547 U.S. 813, 165 L. Ed. 2d at 244; 126 Sup. Ct. at 2280].

As set forth in to Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 804(b)(6), forfeiture by wrongdoing is a hearsay exception that arises when the party against whom a statement is offered has engaged or acquiesced in wrongdoing that was intended to, and did, procure the unavailability of the declarant as a witness. As the Court stated in Crawford and repeated in Davis, forfeiture by wrongdoing extinguishes confrontation claims on essentially equitable grounds. One who obtains the absence of a witness by wrongdoing forfeits the constitutional right to confrontation [Davis v. Washington (2006) 547 U.S. 813, 165 L. Ed. 2d at 244; 126 Sup. Ct. at 2280].

Cases in which federal courts have found forfeiture by wrongdoing to have occurred include:

. United States v. Thompson (7th Cir. 2002) 286 F.3d 950 (wrongful act of co-conspirator constituting forfeiture are imputable to other co-conspirators if the wrongful act was within the course and scope of the conspiracy and reasonably foreseeable to co-conspirators who did not participate in the wrongful act); see also United States v. Carson (D.C. Cir. 2006) 455 F. 3d 336.

. United States v. Montague (10th Cir. 2005) 421 F.3d 1099 (defendant procured his wives unavailability through previous acts of domestic violence and threats made to her when she visited him in jail prior to trial)

California. Evid. Code § 1350 is far more narrow than its FRE counterpart, Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 804(b)(6), and seemingly was drafted with the expectation that prosecutors would rarely be able to satisfy it. Evid. Code § 1350 applies only in criminal proceedings charging a serious felony (Evid. Code § 1350(d) identifies the felonies to which the rule relates). For the Evid. Code § 1350 hearsay exception to apply, the proponent of hearsay has to prove by clear and convincing evidence that all of the following conditions have been satisfied:

. The party against whom the hearsay is offered (almost certainly the defendant) knowingly caused the declarant to be unavailable (or aided or solicited another persons act that caused the declarant to be unavailable).

. The act that caused the declarant to be unavailable was a homicide or a kidnapping.

. The act that caused the declarant to be unavailable was committed for the purpose of preventing the partys arrest or prosecution.

. The offering party was in no way responsible for the declarants unavailability.

Even if the proponent of a hearsay statement overcomes these substantial hurdles, a statement is not admissible unless it has been memorialized in writing or electronically by a law enforcement official, and signed and notarized by the declarant. Moreover, the hearsay statement must have been made under circumstances that indicate its trustworthiness, and must be corroborated by evidence independent of evidence of the commission of the offense. A salmon that is blind, deaf, and lacks a sense of smell probably has a better chance of reaching its spawning ground than prosecutors have of proving forfeiture by wrongdoing under Evid. Code § 1350.

In People v. Giles (2007) 40 Cal. 4th 833, 55 Cal. Rptr. 3d 133, 152 P.3d 433, the California Supreme Court ruled that a homicide victims hearsay statement undermining her ex-boyfriends self-defense claim was admissible. The decision was based not on Evid. Code § 1350, but on the Courts interpretation of equitable principles underlying the Sixth Amendments confrontation clause. Under Giles, a defendant forfeits the right to confrontation if the prosecution can prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant engaged in an intentional criminal act that caused the declarant to be unavailable. If these foundational elements are proved, forfeiture occurs regardless of whether the defendant acted with the intent to prevent the declarant from testifying. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari Giles to consider the constitutional legitimacy of this holding.

Moreover, under Giles, the intentional criminal act that caused the declarants unavailability could either be the same act charged in the underlying case or a different act. In other words, a defendant charged with murder might be considered to have forfeited the right to rely on the Sixth Amendments right of confrontation if the prosecution proves to the judge by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant committed the murder.

In Giles, the California Supreme Court noted that a finding of forfeiture only bars a defendant's objection under the confrontation clause of the federal Constitution and does not bar statutory objections under the Evidence Code. Thus, even if it is established that a defendant has forfeited his or her right of confrontation, the contested evidence is still governed by the rules of evidence; a trial court should still determine whether an unavailable witness's prior hearsay statement falls within a recognized hearsay exception and whether the probative value of the proffered evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect [People v. Giles, 40 Cal. 4th 833, 854].

The accuracy of this statement may depend on whether or not the party against whom a hearsay statement is offered engaged in wrongdoing for the purpose of making a declarant unavailable. Purposefully making a declarant unavailable to testify arguably constitutes evidence that the declarants hearsay statement was trustworthy. Hence, the same wrongful act may overcome both constitutional and hearsay objections to the introduction of evidence. When forfeiture occurs in the absence of intent to make a declarant unavailable (as in Giles), inferring from the wrongful act that the declarants hearsay statement was trustworthy is less warranted. In the latter situations, the party offering the declarants hearsay statement into evidence may need to satisfy a hearsay exception.

The California Law Revision Commission has struggled with the question of whether to repeal the narrow forfeiture by wrongdoing hearsay exception created by Evid. Code § 1350 and replace it with a broader exception based on Giles. The Commissions January 2008 report recommends that the Legislature retain Evid. Code § 1350 in its present form at least until the U.S. Supreme Court decides Giles; the Court has already granted certiorari and the case is expected to be decided in 2008.

The Commission considered at least four options for responding to Giles. These are as follows:

. Option 1: Repeal Evid. Code § 1350 and codify the holding in Giles by enacting a new rule providing that if the prosecution proves by a preponderance of the evidence that a defendants intentional criminal act caused a declarant to be unavailable, forfeiture has occurred. The act which constitutes forfeiture may be the charged crime.

. Option 2: Repeal Evid. Code § 1350 and replace it with a rule similar to Federal Rules of Evidence, Rule 804(b)(6). The primary difference from Option 1 is that Rule 804(b)(6) requires that to constitute a forfeiture, the act must have been done with the intent to procure the declarants unavailability.

. Option 3: Retain Evid. Code § 1350 but broaden it in a variety of possible ways. For example, the Legislature could remove the serious felony limitation, or expand the types of statements that are admissible.

. Option 4: Leave Evid. Code § 1350 in place; do nothing, at least until after the U.S. Supreme Court issues its decision in Giles.

The Commissions January 2008 report recommends Option 4 to the Legislature: wait and see. Its conclusion rests partly on the uncertainty surrounding the scope of the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine, and partly on the fact that guidance from the Supremes is in the offing. The Commission also cited a concern that is unique to California: The so-called Victims Bill of Rights, enacted through the initiative process in the early 1980s, provides in part that in criminal cases, a rule that restricts the admissibility of relevant evidence can be adopted only by another initiative or by a two-thirds vote in the Legislature. The Commission prefers that the Legislature wait until Giles is decided before enacting a rule that may require an initiative or a super-majority vote to undo.

For further information on the present sense impression and forfeiture by wrongdoing hearsay exceptions, see § Friedland, Bergman & Taslitz, Evidence Law and Practice (3d ed. LexisNexis 2007), Ch. 14, § 5 and Ch. 15, §. 8.

§ Weinstein's Evidence Manual (Matthew Bender), Ch. 16, Hearsay Exceptions--Availability of Declarant Immaterial, § 16.02 and Ch. 17, Hearsay Exceptions Requiring Unavailability--Rule 804, § 17.06

§ Weissenberger & Duane, Weissenbergers Federal Evidence, 5th ed. (Matthew Bender 2007), Ch. 803, Rule 803. Hearsay Exceptions; Availability of Declarant Immaterial, §§ 803.1--803.5, 804.22.

For discussion of Evid. Code 1350 and the Crawford and Davis cases cited in this commentary, see Scallen & Weissenberger, California Evidence Courtroom Manual, §§ 1350, 1370.

For general coverage of the hearsay exceptions in California, see Imwinkelried, Wydick & Hogan, California Evidentiary Foundations, Ch. 9, The Hearsay Rule and Its Exceptions.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Paul Bergman is Professor of Law Emeritus at the UCLA School of Law. Prof. Bergman has regularly taught Evidence for about two decades, and his courses include coverage of both the California Evidence Code and the Federal Rules of Evidence. Prof. Bergman is a co-author of the textbook, Evidence Law and Practice (Friedland, Bergman & Taslitz, 3d ed. LexisNexis 2007), published by LexisNexis. Prof. Bergman has been invited to give presentations at meetings of law school Evidence teachers and has contributed to the AALS Evidence Section Newsletter. He regularly speaks to groups of lawyers and judges about evidentiary issues and their portrayal in popular culture.

189 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Professor Kent Sinclair on Lloyd v. Kime, 654 S.E.2d 563 (Va. 2008).

2008 Emerging Issues 1855

Professor Kent Sinclair on Lloyd v. Kime, 654 S.E.2d 563 (Va. 2008).

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

February 1, 2008

SUMMARY: In its recent decision in Lloyd v. Kime, 654 S.E.2d 563 (Va. 2008), the Supreme Court of Virginia issued an important decision dealing with the propriety of the trial court's use of discovery deposition testimony from the plaintiffs expert witness as a basis to sustain a motion in limine excluding the witness testimony and subsequently granting summary judgment for the defendant based on the plaintiffs lack of an expert witness. Further, it addressed the scope of practice issues involving intraoperative and post-operative care in an orthopedic and neurological context, ruling on whether the trial court erred in holding that the plaintiffs witness was not qualified to testify as to standard of care, breach of the standard of care, and proximate causation in a medical malpractice action because the expert failed to meet the requirements of Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20. This commentary, written by Professor Kent Sinclair, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Summary Judgment by Any Other Name Excluding Experts and Entering Judgment. Virginia Procedural Limits and Evidence Doctrine Interact in Medical Negligence Cases, and Elsewhere. Intraoperative and Post-Operative Negligence: Partial Qualification of Witnesses and the Separation of Issues for Expert Testimony

In its recent decision in Lloyd v. Kime, 654 S.E.2d 563 (Va. 2008), the Supreme Court of Virginia issued an important decision dealing with the propriety of the trial court's use of discovery deposition testimony from the plaintiffs expert witness as a basis to sustain a motion in limine excluding the witness testimony and subsequently granting summary judgment for the defendant based on the plaintiffs lack of an expert witness. Further, it addressed the scope of practice issues involving intraoperative and post-operative care in an orthopedic and neurological context, ruling on whether the trial court erred in holding that the plaintiffs witness was not qualified to testify as to standard of care, breach of the standard of care, and proximate causation in a medical malpractice action because the expert failed to meet the requirements of Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20.

Key Evidence and Procedure Points. In its recent Lloyd decision, the Supreme Court of Virginia reviewed an appeal in a medical malpractice case in which the trial court used deposition evidence to resolve a motion in limine and subsequent motion for summary judgment. There is important consideration given to the absence of objection as a form of agreement under the governing section of Title 8.01 of the Code of Virginia.

Moving from procedure to Evidence issues, the Court makes several efforts to clarify the standards for holding that an expert witness is or is not qualified under Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 to testify on standard of care and breach thereof respecting diverse issues in a malpractice case. Distinguishing between the proffered expert's expertise and recent clinical activities as they relate to intraoperative negligence and post-operative care, the Court reverses part of the lower court's handling of the issues.

Moreover, the Court holds that an expert may be qualified to testify concerning proximate causation in respect of a problem for which the expert could not testify to the standards of care or deviation therefrom.

Factual and Procedural Background. Plaintiff sued the defendant orthopedic surgeon and his practice group for medical malpractice in the performance of a surgical procedure upon him known as an anterior cervical discectomy decompression and for his post-operative treatment in the hospital. Plaintiff alleged that the surgeon should not have cut plaintiff's spinal cord during the surgery so as to leave him partially paralyzed, and should have administered certain medicine to him within the first eight hours after the surgery to minimize and/or correct the spinal cord injury. He sought recovery for, among other things, continued unsteadiness, weakness in his right arm and leg, pain in his abdomen, difficulty swallowing and sexual dysfunction.

Plaintiff designated a single practicing out-of-state neurologist as an expert witness on the required standard of care, deviation therefrom, and proximate causation, who was proffered to testify at trial that the standard of care for surgeons performing spinal surgeries required the defendant surgeon to not cut the spinal cord with the surgical instruments so as to cause permanent paralysis and to initiate conventional heavy steroid dosage immediately post-operatively.

At the time of plaintiff's surgery, though plaintiff's expert was a practicing neurologist and had performed spinal surgeries, including anterior cervical discectomies, in the past, he had not performed any surgeries, worked in a hospital, or had hospital privileges since 1997. The defendant surgeon filed a motion in limine seeking to exclude the testimony of plaintiff's expert because he did not meet the requirements of Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20.

After reading portions of the depositions of plaintiff's expert, the defendant surgeon, and the defense expert witness, the trial court held that plaintiff's expert was not qualified to testify as to the standard of care for either the surgical procedure or plaintiff's post-operative care under Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20(A), and was also not qualified to testify as to breach of the standard of care or proximate causation. The court denied the plaintiff patient's request to file a supplemental expert designation to offer another surgeon to testify on the standard of care, because the time for designation of experts pursuant to the pretrial scheduling order had expired.

Soon after his motion in limine was granted, the defendant surgeon successfully moved for summary judgment on the grounds that plaintiff had no designated expert witness to testify on standard of care, breach, or proximate causation, and therefore could not demonstrate a prima facie case of medical malpractice. Plaintiff appeals.

Use of Depositions on Summary Judgment. Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 and Va. Code § 8.01-420 provide that no motion for summary judgment or to strike the evidence shall be sustained when based in whole or in part upon any discovery depositions under Va. Sup. Ct. R. 4:5, unless all parties to the action agree that such deposition may be so used. Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 states:

No motion for summary judgment or to strike the evidence shall be sustained when based in whole or in part upon any discovery depositions under Va. Sup. Ct. R. 4:5, unless all parties to the action shall agree that such deposition may be so used.

See also Va. Code § 8.01-420, which is the mandate that Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 implements.

A decade ago, the Court in Gay v. Norfolk & W. Ry. Co., 253 Va. 212, 214, 483 S.E.2d 216, 218 (1997), held that Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 and Va. Code § 8.01-420 impose a very specific condition; namely, the parties must agree to the use of depositions before they may serve as a basis in whole, or in part, for the entry of summary judgment. This condition requires some showing of acquiescence in the use of a deposition.

While the qualification of expert witnesses is a matter in which the trial judges of Virginia have wide discretion, the Court has also held that the question whether a trial court's actions conflict with the procedural requirements set forth in a rule of Court or a statute is a question of law that is reviewed de novo. See Collins v. Shepherd, 274 Va. 390, 397, 649 S.E.2d 672, 675 (2007). As a result, the hands-off standards normally applied to trial court discretionary rulings do not effectively shield these dispositions from appellate scrutiny.

In its recent Lloyd decision, the Court considered the plaintiff's argument that the trial court erred in using his experts' discovery deposition to disqualify the expert and to then grant summary judgment based on the disqualification. On one hand the Court was quite clear in noting the applicability of the statutory and rule-based ban on use of deposition transcripts to support a summary judgment application even though the defendant doctor in Lloyd did not offer deposition testimony in support of his motion for summary judgment. The Court noted that the defendant, in fact, had utilized the deposition transcript in a manner that was functionally a motion for summary judgment, an application of the statute and the Rule that had previously been demonstrated in Gay, 253 Va. at 214 n., 483 S.E.2d at 218 n. where the court held that -- that regardless of the label, a defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction was functionally a motion for summary judgment and subject to Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 and Va. Code § 8.01-420.

Moreover, the Court in Lloyd drew attention to a case that leaders of the litigating bar have given considerable attention in the last three years, but which many practitioners are unaware of, its decision in Parker v. Elco Elevator Corp., 250 Va. 278, 281 n.2, 462 S.E.2d 98, 100 n.2 (1995). In that decision, without significant fanfare and in a procedural context which may have obscured the significance of the decision for many practitioners -- the Court expressly held that Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 and Va. Code § 8.01-420 apply when a defendant files a motion in limine seeking the exclusion of the plaintiff's expert testimony, and the court's ruling excluding the testimony is followed by the defendant's motion for summary judgment predicated upon the exclusion. In such a case, the Court in Lloyd comments, "the motion in limine is functionally a motion for summary judgment."

Thus the Court applied Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 and Va. Code § 8.01-420 in considering the trial court's ruling in the Lloyd case that it would exclude the testimony of the expert tendered by the plaintiff in that case. Under those standards, deposition testimony could not be used to support the motion in limine unless the party opposing the motion acquiesced.

In Lloyd the defendant argued that plaintiff's counsel acquiesced in the use of the deposition by quoting it in his Argument in Opposition to the Motion to Exclude and his Motion to Reconsider. However, Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 and Va. Code § 8.01-420 are directed to use of deposition transcripts to support a motion for summary judgment. Thus, Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 states that [n]o motion for summary judgment shall be sustained when based in whole or in part on discovery depositions unless the parties agree that depositions can be used.

The Court in Lloyd states:

Under Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:20 and Va. Code § 8.01-420 discovery depositions cannot be used to support a motion for summary judgment unless the parties agree. The Rule and statute do not apply to the use of depositions to oppose a motion for summary judgment.

For the first time, the Court then went on to state the converse, long assumed to be true but lacking in case law support prior to Lloyd: Use of the deposition by the party opposing the motion in limine "would be a permissible use."

Waiver of Objection. Having spelled out the importance of the barrier on use of deposition testimony, contrasted with the option to use the deposition transcript to oppose summary adjudication, the Court then turned to the other strand of Virginia law on these points: the doctrine of waiver of the statutory ban.

The Court in Lloyd began the waiver analysis by noting that, based upon its review the record of this case, it found that the plaintiff did not object to the use of the depositions by the defendant doctor in support of the motion. Citing Parker, 250 Va. at 281 n.2, 462 S.E.2d at 100 n.2, the Court held: "Failure to object to the use of the deposition is sufficient to establish acquiescence."

Appellate Practice Sidelight: on Proving You Objected. In addressing the waiver issue the plaintiff maintained in appellate papers that he had objected at a hearing in the trial court about the use of depositions by the moving defendant. On appeal, counsel quoted in the rebuttal briefing the pertinent language suggesting that an objection to the use of depositions may have been expressly lodged by the plaintiff before the final ruling of the trial court. The Supreme Court, however, includes a footnote to its opinion in Lloyd noting that a transcript of that hearing was not filed in the circuit court clerk's office and, consequently, is not a part of the record. The Court said simply that in this situation, the "transcript is unavailable for our consideration," citing Woodfin v. Commonwealth, 236 Va. 89, 97-98, 372 S.E.2d 377, 382 (1988) ("[W]e are limited to the appellate record in this case in consideration of issues presented here. We are not permitted to supplement the record by referring to [other evidence] not made a part of this record."); Dere v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 224 Va. 277, 281 n.2, 295 S.E.2d 794, 796 (1982) (holding the Court was bound by the record and the circuit court's certified written statement of fact, and "not upon counsel's recollection of what occurred" during proceedings in the circuit court); Rountree v. Rountree, 200 Va. 57, 62-63, 104 S.E.2d 42, 47 (1958) (holding the Court would not consider facts in affidavits attached to the appellate briefs that were not part of the record from the circuit court); Old Dominion Iron & Steel Corp. v. VEPCO, 215 Va. 658, 212 S.E.2d 715 (1975); and Godfrey v. Commonwealth, 227 Va. 460, 317 S.E.2d 781 (1984). The Court did not provide any information as to whether failure to include the transcript was a result of counsel's oversight or a problem with the court reporter, for example.

On this basis, the Supreme Court found that procedurally trial court did not err in using deposition evidence in the resolution of the motion in limine and subsequent motion for summary judgment.

Qualification of a Medical Expert under Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20. Having resolved the question whether the trial court had the power to make a pre-trial disposition on the issue of expert qualification using deposition materials in support of the in limine motion, the Supreme Court in Lloyd turned to the merits of the question whether the trial judge ruled correctly.

The Court has recently stated in Perdieu v. Blackstone Family Practice Ctr., 264 Va. 408, 418, 568 S.E.2d 703, 709 (2002), that while [t]he question whether a witness is qualified to testify as an expert is largely within the sound discretion of the trial court, in the context of a medical malpractice action, this determination must be made with reference to Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20. (quoting Noll v. Rahal, 219 Va. 795, 800, 250 S.E.2d 741, 744 (1979)).

As noted above, even though it is routinely recited that a trial court's exercise of its discretion in determining whether to admit or exclude evidence will not be overturned on appeal absent evidence that the trial court abused that discretion, see e.g., Wright v. Kaye, 267 Va. 510, 517, 593 S.E.2d 307, 310 (2004) (quoting May v. Caruso, 264 Va. 358, 362, 568 S.E.2d 690, 692 (2002)), the fact that in medical cases this judgment entails a construction of the statute governing testimony in malpractice cases makes the matter fair game for "de novo" review on appeal.

The qualification of a witness as an expert on the standard of care in a medical malpractice action is governed by Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20, which states in relevant part:

Any physician who is licensed to practice in Virginia shall be presumed to know the statewide standard of care in the specialty or field of medicine in which he is qualified and certified. This presumption shall also apply to any physician who is licensed in some other state of the United States and meets the educational and examination requirements for licensure in Virginia. An expert witness who is familiar with the statewide standard of care shall not have his testimony excluded on the ground that he does not practice in this Commonwealth. A witness shall be qualified to testify as an expert on the standard of care if he demonstrates expert knowledge of the standards of the defendants specialty and of what conduct conforms or fails to conform to those standards and if he has had active clinical practice in either the defendants specialty or a related field of medicine within one year of the date of the alleged act or omission forming the basis of the action.

In Lloyd, the Court divides its analysis under this statute, recognizing that there are two methods by which a physician is presumed to know the statewide standard of care in his particular specialty or field of medicine:

(1) If the physician is licensed in Virginia, he is presumed to know the standard of care of the specialty or field of medicine in which he is qualified and certified. Wright, 267 Va. at 518, 593 S.E.2d at 311.

(2) If the physician is licensed out-of-state, but meets the educational and examination requirements of the statute, he is presumed to know the standard of care of the specialty or field of medicine in which he is qualified and certified. Id.

The Court went on to note that if neither of these situations applies, a witness nonetheless may be qualified to testify as to the standard of care if the witness demonstrates sufficient knowledge, skill, or experience to make him competent to testify as an expert on the subject matter at issue. Lloyd, quoting and applying Christian v. Surgical Specialists of Richmond, Ltd., 268 Va. 60, 65, 596 S.E.2d 522, 524 (2004); Sami v. Varn, 260 Va. 280, 284, 535 S.E.2d 172, 174 (2000); Hinkley v. Koehler, 269 Va. 82, 88, 606 S.E.2d 803, 806 (2005).

It is basic Virginia law under these authorities that in all cases to qualify as an expert witness on the standard of care, the witness must have expert knowledge on the standard of care in the defendants specialty and an active clinical practice in either the defendants specialty or a related field of medicine within one year of the date of the alleged act or omission forming the basis of the action as Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 requires.

In Lloyd the Supreme Court notes that in order to qualify a witness as an expert on the standard of care, the proponent of the expert must show, among other things, that the specialty or field of medicine in which [the expert] is qualified and certified is the same as the defendants specialty or a related field of medicine. For example, in Griffett v. Ryan, 247 Va. 465, 472-73, 443 S.E.2d 149, 153-54 (1994), the Court held that the expert, an internist, was qualified to testify because he demonstrated that the standard of care in his field did not vary from the standard of care in the defendants field, gastroenterology (a subspecialty of internal medicine).

In its recent case, evidence produced by the moving defendant indicated that plaintiff's tendered expert witness did not have an active clinical practice in neurosurgery. However, for purposes of the motion in limine, the parties agreed that he was a neurologist. While not licensed in Virginia, the Virginia Department of Health Professions provided a letter asserting that this physician's "credentials meet the educational and examination requirements for licensure in Virginia. The Supreme Court concluded that on that record, under Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20, the witness was therefore presumed to know the standard of care in Virginia for neurologists.

In Lloyd, the defendant was an orthopedist performing a surgery that is also performed by neurosurgeons. As the Court had made clear in Griffett, 247 Va. at 472-73, 443 S.E.2d at 153-54, the plaintiff patient as the party tendering the proposed expert -- had the initial burden to demonstrate that the witness' area of qualification and certification had certain overlapping medical practices and similar standards of care with the defendant's. In the recent case, this translated into a requirement that the plaintiff show that the specialty of the proposed witness, neurology, is a related field of medicine to the defendants specialty of orthopedics. The Supreme Court treated this as a clear prerequisite to any finding accepting the witness as an expert qualified to testify as to the intraoperative standard of care.

In one of the Supreme Court's leading precedents on the topic of accrediting a witness to testify as an expert, Sami v. Varn, 260 Va. 280, 285, 535 S.E.2d 172, 175 (2000), the Court laid out the purposes which underlie the statute:

The purpose of the requirement in Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 that an expert have an active practice in the defendant's specialty or a related field of medicine is to prevent testimony by an individual who has not recently engaged in the actual performance of the procedures at issue in a case. Therefore, we conclude that, in applying the related field of medicine test for the purposes of Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20, it is sufficient if in the expert witness clinical practice the expert performs the procedure at issue and the standard of care for performing the procedure is the same.

In Wright v. Kaye, 267 Va. at 523, 593 S.E.2d at 314, and other case law, the Court has also stated clearly that "the term actual performance of the procedures at issue must be read in the context of the actions by which the defendant is alleged to have deviated from the standard of care.

In Lloyd, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant orthopedist deviated from the standard of care in two different ways: The first deviation was intraoperative (defendant allegedly performed the anterior cervical discectomy negligently); the second deviation was postoperative (defendant alleged that in the first 17 hours after the surgery the defendant failed to recognize that the patient had a new neurological injury, to properly diagnose it, and to properly treat the new injury).

Intraoperative Negligence. In a situationally specific argument, the plaintiff in Lloyd contended that the proffered expert should be allowed to testify as an expert witness on the standard of care applicable to intraoperative negligence because the parties did not dispute the standard of care for that claim, and plaintiff theorized that the requirements of Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 are not applicable if the standard of care is not in dispute. However, the Supreme Court noted that it has previously held in Perdieu, 264 Va. at 419, 568 S.E.2d at 709 and other decisions, that the requirements of Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 are mandatory.

Thus, since it was also undisputed that the witness had not performed any surgeries, worked in a hospital, or had hospital privileges since 1997; he had no active clinical practice in performing spinal surgery, and no evidence was presented to suggest that his practice as a neurologist included performing spinal surgery. The Supreme Court therefore held that the trial court was correct in finding that the witness was not qualified to testify as an expert witness on the standard of care as to the allegation of intraoperative negligence.

The situation was different under the Supreme Court's analysis, however, with respect to the allegation of postoperative negligence. On that topic the plaintiff presented to the trial judge evidence of "an overlap between a neurologist's practice and a neurosurgeon's or orthopedist's practice." The theory of postoperative negligence was that the defendant should have recognized that his patient had symptoms of having suffered a new neurological injury during surgery, and should have performed the appropriate diagnostic tests, discovered the injury, and promptly treated the injury with a heavy dose of the steroid Solu-Medrol or a similar medication.

Affidavit Proof on Standards of Post-Operative Care. In Lloyd the plaintiff had presented evidence that the standard of care for neurologists and neurosurgeons or orthopedists in such a post-operative care circumstance is the same. The plaintiff's expert stated in an affidavit that the neurological symptoms the patient displayed post-surgery must be evaluated like any new patient. This is done by taking a thorough history, performing a complete physical examination for neurological function, evaluating and ordering proper tests and studies, reaching a diagnosis and prognosis, and formulating and implementing a treatment plan. . . . The medical procedures utilized in the evaluation, diagnosis, and treatment of an acute spinal cord injury . . . are the same utilized in the hospital setting as opposed to the office setting, or anywhere else for that matter. There is no significant medical distinction in how these procedures are done in a hospital setting as opposed to an office setting or anywhere else.

The Supreme Court found that the defendant had offered no evidence to contradict this assertion, or to otherwise suggest that there is a medical distinction between evaluation of a neurological injury post-surgery and any other time. In light of that record, the Supreme Court holds in Lloyd that trial court "could not disregard the uncontradicted testimony that the standard of care for evaluation of a neurological injury was common to neurosurgeons, orthopedists, and neurologists," citing Sami, 260 Va. at 284, 535 S.E.2d at 174. Therefore, the Court held that the trial judge abused his discretion by failing to qualify the plaintiff's proposed witness as an expert on the standard of care with regard to the allegation of postoperative negligence.

Further, the Court noted that while the proposed witness had not performed surgery within one year of the date of the alleged negligence, there was nothing in the record on the motion to suggest that this witness' "active practice" in the year before Lloyds surgery was not in a related field of medicine with regard to postoperative diagnosis and care.

Therefore, the moving defendant had failed to rebut the statutorily-based presumption noted above, to the effect that this witness was qualified to testify as to the standard of care on the allegation of postoperative negligence. Thus the trial court was held to have abused its discretion in holding that the witness was not so qualified.

Breach of the Standard of Care And Proximate Causation. Even though the Supreme Court held that the proposed witness lacked the current practice requirement to testify about the operative standard of care, the Court also reviewed in the recent Lloyd decision the plaintiff's claim that the witness was nonetheless qualified under Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 to testify as to breach of the standard of care or proximate causation for either allegation of negligence. Citing Hinkley, 269 Va. at 92 n.5, 606 S.E.2d at 809 n.5, the Court noted an important limitation on the qualifications required under the Code, restricting their impact to aspects of the standard of care:

Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 addresses only the qualifications of experts to testify on the standard of care and whether the standard of care is breached.

Thus the Court concluded: "The requirements do not address whether an expert witness is qualified to testify on proximate causation." Thus the trial court was found to have abused its discretion by excluding this witness as not qualified to testify on proximate causation as to either allegation of negligence (intraoperatively or postoperatively).

Summary. The recent decision of the Virginia Supreme Court in Lloyd draws important distinctions, both as a matter of procedure and on expert qualification. Its clarification of the waiver possibilities for use of depositions on in limine and summary judgment applications is important in itself. Moreover, because the trial court did not consider the uncontradicted affidavit "testimony" from the proposed witness himself -- that the standard of care for postoperative evaluation of a neurological injury was common to neurosurgeons, neurologists, and orthopedists the Court holds that the trial court abused its discretion by not finding the proposed witness qualified to testify on this issue. Exemplifying the level of differentiation required in these expert-qualification judgments at the trial level, the Court finds that the proposed witness was qualified to testify on standard of care, breach of standard of care, and proximate causation as to Lloyds allegation of postoperative negligence. Further, even though the witness was not qualified under the express terms of Virginia Code § 8.01-581.20 to testify as to standard of care or breach of standard of care as to the plaintiff's allegation of intraoperative negligence, given that there was no contest about what the applicable standard of care was for the procedure, it was altogether possible that the witness could be qualified to testify as to proximate causation for the injuries received in the operation.

C Virginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

With respect to Summary Judgment and the Use of Depositions in Motions, see Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice § 13.04 (Basis of Summary Judgment); § 13.05 (How Summary Judgment Sought and Opposed).

For a General Introduction to Summary Judgment in Virginia, see also Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure § 11.7 (Summary Judgment).

Concerning Expert Witness Qualification, see Charles E. Friend, The Law of Evidence in Virginia § 17-15 (Qualification of Expert Witnesses).

For draft rules on Expert Testimony and Commentary Discussing the governing principles for qualification of experts, see Boyd-Graves Conference (Kent Sinclair, Editor), The Guide to Evidence in Virginia (2008 ed.) Sections 702 (Expert testimony) and 703 (Basis for Expert Proof).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Kent Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. The architect of the 2006 reforms in the Virginia civil justice system, he is a Professor of Law and served for several years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2006 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. In 2007 he was accepted as an expert to advise the High Court of London, England, on issues of Virginia law in pending litigations.

190 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Professor Kent Sinclair on Dogwood Valley Citizens Ass'n v. Shifflett

2008 Emerging Issues 1856

Professor Kent Sinclair on Dogwood Valley Citizens Ass'n v. Shifflett, 2008 Va. LEXIS 2 (Va. 2008)

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

February 1, 2008

SUMMARY: A new decision in a long-running saga of a beleaguered homeowners' association and its unavailing efforts to enforce assessment obligations on recalcitrant lot owners in the subdivision has reached a defining moment, in the second broadside leveled by the Supreme Court against the effectiveness of the instruments under which the association claimed the right of enforcement. This commentary, written by professor Kent Sinclair, discusses the important implications of the Court's decision in Dogwood Valley Citizens Ass'n v. Shifflett, 2008 Va. LEXIS 2 (Va. 2008).

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Homeowners' Associations in Virginia are there Any "Teeth" in the Association's Governing Instruments? Key Statutes for "Special Assessments" in Myriad Virginia Subdivisions

A new decision in a long-running saga of a beleaguered homeowners' association and its unavailing efforts to enforce assessment obligations on recalcitrant lot owners in the subdivision has reached a defining moment, in the second broadside leveled by the Supreme Court against the effectiveness of the instruments under which the association claimed the right of enforcement.

IMPORTANCE: In the past decade the Virginia Property Owners Association Act, Va. Code §§ 55-508 through Va. Code §55-516.2, has become one of the most often amended and frequently enforced statutes in the Code of Virginia. Created in 1989 but reaching back by its express terms to at least 1959, this Act was originally modeled on the "horizontal property act" provisions that governed condominium developments. Since then, it has been amended numerous times to increase the enforcement options and to beef up the reporting requirements for associations to which it applies. This statute applies to large numbers of Virginia property owners' associations, and thus the issues involved which include the basic powers of an association to impose assessment charges against lot owners and the concomitant power to seek enforcement remedies in court when a lot owner refuses to pay have broad applications for lawyers and their clients throughout the Commonwealth. Important provisions of the Act include:

Coverage: Va. Code §55-508

Definitions of Terms: Va. Code §55-509

Adoption and Enforcement of Rules: Va. Code §55-513

Authority to Levy Special Assessments: Va. Code §55-514

Requirement to Comply with Declarations: Va. Code §55-515

Amendment of a Declaration: Va. Code §55-515.1 and Va. Code §55-515.2

Liens to Enforce Assessments: Va. Code §55-516

The Act also contains detailed provisions concerning so-called "disclosure packets" of information for prospective buyers interested in purchasing a lot subject to the rights and responsibilities administered by the Property Owners' Association. See, e.g., Va. Code §55-511 (contract disclosure statement requirement and timing provisions); Va. Code §55-512 (detailed components for disclosure package); Va. Code §55-514 (reserve requirements, including a periodic reserve "study"); Va. Code §55-516.1 (annual reports).

The new decision in Dogwood Valley Citizens Ass'n v. Shifflett, 2008 Va. LEXIS 2 (Va. 2008) sheds bright light on the necessary conditions for this system of maintenance and assessments to work properly in Virginia.

SUMMARY: The Supreme Court holds in Dogwood Valley (a proceeding which followed from a homeowners' association's levy of special assessments and subsequent warrants in debt against lot owners in a development) that the circuit court did not err in determining that the particular homeowners' association involved in this subdivision, which was a non-stock Virginia corporation, did not qualify as a property owners association under the Property Owners Association Act, Va. Code §55-508 through Va. Code §55-516.2.

Key Point. Because the filing of the association's articles of incorporation and bylaws in the land records did not constitute a declaration imposing upon it operational or maintenance responsibilities for the common areas or roads of the development, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed. The key requirement for a declaration is "imposing" duties on an association which are not voluntary or avoidable, although as the Supreme Court's opinion goes forward, it appears to also require a separate instrument denominated as a "declaration" to assure that an organization qualifies as a homeowners' association under the Virginia statutes.

Legal Background. In Anderson v. Lake Arrowhead Civic Association, Inc., 253 Va. 264, 483 S.E.2d 209 (1997), the developers of a subdivision in Stafford County made each lot subject to a recorded plat with identical restrictive covenants that were recorded by deeds of dedication among the land records. As emphasized by the Supreme Court of Virginia, the most important features of these instruments were these:

A key covenant granted to the developers the power to assign "all of the rights and powers, title, easements and estates reserved" to him, provided that the assignee would have the same "obligations and duties with respect to the land area concerned."

Other provisions in the covenants required each purchaser of a lot to pay the developer or his assignee $20 each year for the first lot owned and $10 per year for each additional lot owned "to be used for general maintenance.

The covenant also stated that the "maintenance fee shall be a lien on the real estate."

However, these covenants did not expressly require that the developers or their assignees actually maintain the common areas of the subdivision.

Subsequently, a Civic Association was formed. The entity was a Virginia non-stock corporation. Its articles provided that the association's purpose was to "further and promote the community welfare of the property owners in the Lake Arrowhead Subdivision . . . and to handle and supervise any funds received for community betterment." The articles were subsequently amended to require that "each owner of any lot by acceptance of a deed therefore, whether or not it shall be expressed in any such deed or other conveyance, . . . [shall] covenant and agree to pay [the association]: 1) annual assessments or fees and, 2) special assessments for capital expenditures." 253 Va. at 267-68, 483 S.E.2d at 211. The developers conveyed to the association various parcels of land consisting primarily of roads, lakes, beaches, and park areas within the subdivision. The language in these deeds did not impose any duty upon the association to maintain the common areas. 253 Va. at 268, 483 S.E.2d at 211.

In Anderson, the Supreme Court applied Va. Code §55-508 and Va. Code §55-509, holding that it is clear that in order to qualify under the Property Owners' Association Act an association "must possess both the power to collect a fixed assessment or to make variable assessments and a corresponding duty to maintain the common area. In addition, these conditions must be expressly stated in a recorded instrument in the land records of the jurisdiction where some portion of the development is located." 253 Va. at 271-72, 483 S.E.2d at 213. On the facts in Anderson, the Court found that the language of the deed that conveyed the common areas from the developers to the association failed to expressly require the association to maintain the common areas.

Factual Background the prior appeal involving the present subdivision community association. Several years after the Anderson decision, the Court dealt with the Dogwood Valley Citizens Association for the first time. In Dogwood Valley Citizens Ass'n, Inc. v. Winkelman, 267 Va. 7, 590 S.E.2d 358 (2004), the Court noted that this community association is a non-stock corporation. According to its articles of incorporation, it was created to provide for the maintenance of the roads and common facilities of the Dogwood Valley subdivision. These articles and the association's bylaws purportedly authorized it to impose fees and special assessments on the property owners in the subdivision pursuant to the applicable restrictive covenants.

The deed that transferred the roads and common areas from the developers to the homeowners' association contained the following paragraphs:

"WHEREAS, in the aforesaid Deeds of Dedication and Protective Covenants, the Grantor has reserved the right to use, keep and maintain all of the roads and common facilities in the aforesaid subdivision; and

"WHEREAS, the aforesaid Deeds of Dedication and Protective Covenants provide that the rights, duties and responsibilities as are created therein may be delegated by the Grantor to a committee of lot owners approved by the Grantor; and

. . . .

"WHEREAS, the property owners of Dogwood Valley have united and formed a corporation referred to herein as[4] the Grantee, whose purpose is to see that the roads, public facilities and other common areas of Dogwood Valley Subdivision are properly maintained; and

"WHEREAS, it is the desire of the Grantor herein, B. K. Haynes Corporation, now to convey to the Grantee, Dogwood Valley Citizens Association, Inc., all of the rights, duties and responsibilities which were created or may have been created by the aforesaid Deeds of Dedication and Protective Covenants; and

"WHEREAS, it is the desire and intent of the Grantee to receive from the Grantor and accept herein by the recordation of this deed all of the rights, duties and obligations which the Grantor has pursuant to the aforesaid Deeds of Dedication and statement of Protective Covenants.

"The Grantor hereby further QUITCLAIMS, ASSIGNS, RELEASES and REMITS unto the Grantee, Dogwood Valley Citizens Association, Inc. any and all rights which it may have, both legal and equitable in all of the roads within the aforesaid subdivision, together with any other common areas or public areas not specifically set forth in this deed."

In Winkelman the Supreme Court applied the "plain language" of Va. Code §55-509, which provides:

"Declaration" means any instrument, however denominated, recorded among the land records of the county or city in which the development or any part thereof is located, that either (i) imposes on the association maintenance or operational responsibilities for the common area or (ii) creates the authority in the association to impose on lots, or on the owners or occupants of such lots, or on any other entity any mandatory payment of money in connection with the provision of maintenance and/or services for the benefit of some or all of the lots, the owners or occupants of the lots, or the common area. "Declaration" includes any amendment or supplement to the instruments described in this definition. "Declaration" shall not include a declaration of a condominium, real estate cooperative, time-share project or campground.

Interpreting its prior Anderson decision, the Court in Winkelman held that the Dogwood Valley Citizen's Association was not a property owners' association within the meaning of the Property Owners' Association Act: It failed to identify any document, recorded among the land records of the jurisdiction where some property of the development is located, that expressly requires it to maintain the common areas or the roads. The Court said: "This duty must be expressly stated in the recorded documents and may not be inferred or implied."

The Court in Winkelman rejected expressly the suggestion that the following instruments were sufficient to clothe an association with the powers provided under the Act:

A paragraph of the Dogwood Valley subdivision's deed of dedication references an annual lot assessment not to exceed $15 for "the use, upkeep and maintenance of the roads . . . and . . . other common facilities."

?

That declaration also provides that "the right and responsibilities as created by this paragraph may be delegated by the grantors to a Committee of lot owners within said subdivision"

?

Other paragraphs in the declaration and the statements of protective covenants refer to maintenance fees.

?

One covenant specifically states: "The following shall be an additional covenant 'Each lot owner shall be responsible for damages to subdivision roads and other common facilities by his agents. It is the intent of this covenant to limit the liability of the road maintenance fund for the cost of repair of roads and other common facilities, when the damage to the roads and common facilities was caused by the act or acts of an individual lot owner or his agent.' "

The Supreme Court of Virginia, however, held that these provisions were insufficient. It found that the association was simply unable to identify any language in any recorded instrument that expressly required it to maintain the roads or common areas. The Court found its failure to do so "fatal to its assertion that [it] is a property owners' association within the meaning of the Property Owners' Association Act."

The Present Litigation. After the decision in Winkelman, the president of this same Dogwood Valley community association filed in the land records an affidavit and a copy of its articles of incorporation and bylaws. The bylaws stated:

It shall be the duty of the Board of Directors to. . . cause the roads and common facilities to be maintained according to the extent that the funds permit.

The association then levied special assessments against its members under Va. Code § 55-514. When some of the landowners refused to pay these assessments, the association filed warrants in debt to enforce the assessments. The general district court denied the association's claims, and the circuit court held that filing the articles and bylaws did not qualify the association as a property owners association under the Property Owners' Association Act and, therefore, it did not have the right to levy special assessments, charge interest, charge penalties, collect attorneys or docketing fees, or any other charge other than the regular assessments set forth in the deeds of dedication. The association appealed and the Supreme Court spelled out the meaning and extent of the requirement that qualification as a property owners association under the Act requires that a declaration recorded in the land records where the development is located impose on an association both the power to assess fees for road and common facilities maintenance and the duty to perform such maintenance.

The Court noted that in Va. Code § 55-509 the Act defines a property owners association as an incorporated or unincorporated entity upon which responsibilities are imposed and to which authority is granted in the declaration. Declaration is defined Va. Code § 55-509 as:

any instrument, however denominated, recorded among the land records of the county or city in which the development or any part thereof is located, that either (i) imposes on the association maintenance or operational responsibilities for the common area or (ii) creates the authority in the association to impose on lots. . . any mandatory payment of money in connection with the provision of maintenance and/or services for the benefit of . . . the common area.

In essence the Dogwood Citizens group argued that the core defect that controlled the Court's prior decisions was the failure of a property owners association to have a document on file in the land records that imposed on it the responsibility of maintaining the roads or common areas. This defect was cured, it was argued, by filing the Articles of Incorporation and Bylaws in the land records because those documents provided the requisite duty to maintain the roads and common areas of the development. However, the suggestion that these corporate instruments met the definition of declaration under the Act was rejected by the Supreme Court, which concluded that "a literal application of the phrase 'any instrument' in the definition of 'declaration' [in Va. Code §55-509] is inconsistent with the concept of 'declaration' used in other provisions of the [Act]."

The Court noted that the Property Owners' Association Act applies under the terms of Va. Code §55-508 (A) to developments subject to a declaration. A [d]evelopment is defined by the Act as real property . . . subject to a declaration which contains both lots . . . and common areas with respect to which any person, by virtue of ownership of a lot . . . is obligated to pay assessments provided for in a declaration.

See Va. Code § 55-509. The Supreme Court concluded that these two definitions along with the definition of declaration itself as quoted above reflect the intent of the General Assembly to apply the statutory scheme to "real property subject to certain benefits and burdens that are part of the bundle of property rights conveyed with the transfer of ownership of the property." In passing the Court made reference to the benefits and burdens generally described as restrictive covenants that run with the land, as described in certain of its prior case law. See Sonoma Development, Inc. v. Miller, 258 Va. 163, 167 n.2, 515 S.E.2d 577, 579 n.2 (1999); Burton v. Chesapeake Box and Lumber Corp., 190 Va. 755, 764, 57 S.E.2d 904, 908 (1950); Willard v. Worsham, 76 Va. 392, 396 (1882).

Under the Property Owners' Association Act, however, the Code provisions designate the required instrument imposing these restrictions as a declaration. The Court noted that articles of incorporation and bylaws "are not instruments that apply to real property and are not instruments that subject real property to certain burdens and benefits that pass as part of the property rights in the conveyance of the property."

Thus, the Court held that the corporate articles and bylaws could not be a declaration for purposes of the definition of development, even if filed among the land records pursuant to a sworn affidavit by an officer thereof.

Several other provisions of the Property Owners' Association Act clearly treat declarations as instruments separate and distinct from articles of incorporation and bylaws. For example, the Court noted that Va. Code § 55-512(A)(12) requires that the "disclosure packet" given to a buyer of a lot in the subdivision to describe the health and operations of the community organization must include [a] copy of the current declaration, the associations articles of incorporation and bylaws, and any rules and regulations or architectural guidelines adopted by the association. Similarly, Va. Code § 55-515.1 discusses the process for obtaining the consent of a mortgagee [i]n the event that any provision in the declaration requires the written consent of a mortgagee in order to amend the bylaws or the declaration.

The Supreme Court concluded that the operative language of these various Code provisions supported the conclusion that the General Assembly did not consider articles of incorporation and bylaws to be synonymous with declarations. It noted in passing that in the Dogwood Valley corporate bylaws themselves, there is a reference to declarations as documents separate from the bylaws.

From a policy standpoint the Court was unwilling to water down the bright-line significance of a distinct declaration instrument. To seize upon the broad language of Va. Code §55-509 by allowing corporate charters and by-laws to suffice "would allow a property owners association to acquire the right to issue special assessments under the [Act] merely by filing in the appropriate land records a document, regardless of its nature, stating that the association has the authority to assess property owners for maintenance of common areas and the responsibility to maintain those areas."

The Court noted that one fatal flaw in such an interpretation is the fact that a change in prescribed duties and responsibilities of an association and its members could occur without any notice to or concurrence by the property owners in such a system, by amendment of the corporate documents themselves. Clearly, the Property Owners' Association Act contemplates a declaration document that can be changed only if the lot owners have notice and agree to the change, see Va. Code §55-515.1, a condition consistent with the method of altering restrictive covenants applicable to real property. In this regard the Court cited Hening v. Maynard, 227 Va. 113, 117, 313 S.E.2d 379, 382 (1984).

Unilateral action is permitted under the Property Owners' Association Act but only in only carefully limited circumstances. The Court observed that Va. Code §55-515.2 allows unilateral changes to a declaration in very limited situations, "such as correction of a scrivener's error, a mathematical mistake, or an inconsistency." The Court simply concluded that no provision of the Act suggested that "the unilateral filing of a document without notice and concurrence of the lot owners can impose upon real property and subject owners of that property to conditions not included in a deed of dedication or by a properly adopted amendment to such deed."

The decision might have stopped there. However, the Supreme Court went on to emphasize the concept that the instrument must "impose" the duties upon an association. It stated that "voluntary assumption of this duty is insufficient," citing its prior decision in Lake Arrowhead, 253 Va. at 272, 483 S.E.2d at 213-14. The Court then explained that a duty imposed on an organization for purposes of qualifying as a property owners association under the Property Owners' Association Act is "one that cannot be altered or eliminated simply by amending the associations bylaws."

Thus, while the Dogwood Valley Citizens Association bylaws recited that the board of directors has such a duty, the Court read that assumption of this duty as being voluntary and not required by the declarations in the deeds of dedication of the development.

Whether this language in the current opinion will interfere with efforts to create bona fide binding obligations after the initial deeds are filed will remain an issue for future litigation. In the current Dogwood Valley decision it was sufficient for the Court to note that the declarations applicable to this particular development did not impose on the association the duty to maintain the roads and common areas, a matter the Court had previously noted in the Winkelman decision, 267 Va. at 13-14, 590 S.E.2d at 361.

Thus the community association's articles of incorporation and bylaws, although filed in the land records, were not the functional equivalent of a freestanding "declaration" as defined by the Act in Va. Code §55-509. The result, of course, was that the association did not qualify as a property owners association for purposes of the Property Owners' Association Act, and lacked the power to enforce the assessments which began this litigation saga.

CVirginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

Enforcement of Assessment Liens, see Enforcement of Judgments and Liens in Virginia Ch. 1 (Enforcement of Judgments and Liens) and Ch. 2 (Collection of Money Judgments from Personal Property) (Lexis Law Publishing, 2004).

On the title effects of restrictions in deeds, see Virginia Title Examiners Manual § 15-1 et seq. (Dedication); § 38-1 et seq. (Restrictions); and § 41-1 et seq. (Subdivisions) (Mathew Bender & Co. 1998).

For a variety of Real Estate Forms dealing with Property Owners' Association Act issues, including liens and disclosure obligations, for rental and sale transactions, see generally Virginia Forms for Real Estate Transactions (Matthew Bender & Company, 2007).

General issues respecting covenants affecting real property, and lien rights, are discussed in Michie's Jurisprudence, COVENANTS, and LIENS (Matthew Bender & Co. 2007).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is a Professor of Law and served for several years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. In 2007 he was accepted by the High Court of London to advise the Court on issues of Virginia law in pending litigations.

191 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan Brazas on Orlak v. Loyola Univ. Health Sys., 221 Ill. 2d 643 (Ill. 2006)

2008 Emerging Issues 1857

Susan Brazas on Orlak v. Loyola Univ. Health Sys., 221 Ill. 2d 643 (Ill. 2006)

By Susan M. Brazas

February 1, 2008

SUMMARY: This commentary, written by Susan Brazas, discusses the impact and implications of Orlak v. Loyola Univ. Health Sys., 221 Ill. 2d 643 (Ill. 2006) which addresses the arises from patient care factor to determine whether the statute of repose barred the plaintiff's action. Unlike some of its recent opinions, the Illinois Supreme Court declines to adopt case law from other states and from federal courts on the issue.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Once a patient, always a patient. That seems to be the conclusion of the Illinois Supreme Court in Orlak v. Loyola Univ. Health Sys., 221 Ill. 2d 643 (Ill. 2006). The Orlak Court held that where patient care was at the beginning of a course of events, even if remote in time, a cause of action which is causally connected to it will be subject to the four-year statute of repose for actions arising out of patient care.

The Orlak plaintiff had received a blood transfusion in 1989, while she was an in-patient at Loyola University Hospital. In 1990, the Hospital notified the plaintiff that she should be tested for HIV. The Plaintiff did, and the HIV test was negative. The blood donor later told the Hospital of having tested positive for Hepatitis C, and the Hospital notified Plaintiff of this, and advised her to be tested for that condition, in August 2000. Plaintiff filed suit against the Hospital in 2002, for failure timely to notify her of her risk for the Hepatitis C virus. Plaintiff's four theories of recovery were constructive fraud, medical negligence, medical battery, and ordinary negligence.

The Court found that Plaintiff's suit was untimely, and concluded that it was filed past the four-year statute of repose for health care lawsuits. The Court found that it was irrelevant whether the notification decision was administrative or involved the exercise of medical judgment, because the decision was one which arose from patient care. The Court noted that Plaintiff's cause of action arose 13 years prior to filing suit (which would be the time of the actual transfusion).

The Court elected to distinguish the facts from out-of-state cases which presented very similar factual scenarios. In those cases, the other courts had focused on whether the alleged wrong was a medical decision, but the Orlak Court focused on whether it arose from patient care. Looking more closely at the opinion, it seems to give greatest weight to the arose from aspect of this test, rather than the patient care aspect. In explaining its reasoning, the Court noted that no special fiduciary or confidential relationship existed any longer between the Plaintiff and the Hospital, and therefore at the time that, according to Plaintiff, the Hospital should have notified the Plaintiff of the risk of HCV infection, the Hospital owed Plaintiff no special duty which would warrant extension of the statute of repose.

Strategic Implications. Depending upon the perspective, counsel will want to establish the status of alleged wrongful conduct as either arising from patient care or not arising from patient care. The Orlak dissent sharply disagreed with the majority's opinion, calling the majority's logic a but-for analysis despite assertions to the contrary. Thus, the course of events--from the patient's arrival at the hospital doors to the lawsuit's filing through the courthouse doors--should be described in terms of the plaintiff's status as a recipient of patient care.

Practical Ramifications for Pleading. If fraudulent concealment is pleaded, then affirmative acts on the part of the defendant must be pleaded to withstand a motion to dismiss. However, if it is shown that a confidential or fiduciary relationship existed at the time that the cause of action arose, then no affirmative acts of concealment need be pleaded. Hagney v. Lopeman, 147 Ill. 2d 458 (1992). Thus, to establish this latter situation, counsel should set forth specific allegations to demonstrate that a fiduciary or confidential relationship existed.

The Orlak court concluded that no fiduciary or confidential relationship existed between Plaintiff and the Hospital at the point when, Plaintiff claimed, the Hospital should have notified her of the HCV risk. However, it is doubtful that the Hospital would deny that a duty of confidentiality no longer existed as to her patient records and other medical information. Thus, counsel are well advised to set forth HIPAA regulations, hospital policies restricting the release of medical records as to current and past patients, and other indicia of confidentiality to help establish that such a relationship existed at the time of the alleged wrongful conduct.

Causal Connection Element. The Orlak opinion suggests a very low threshold test for arising from patient care: that only a causal connection exists between the alleged wrongful conduct and the patient care which occurred. It is not clear how such a connection could be causal, and perhaps this phrasing could be interpreted as simply any connection. Interestingly, the Orlak court cited to its decision of the same day, Brucker v. Mercola, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1838 (Ill. 2007), in support of this point.

Another means of overcoming a statute of limitations argument is to show equitable estoppel, as set forth in the case of DeLuna v. Burgiaga, 223 Ill. 2d 49, 857 N.E.2d 299 (2006). Counsel is cautioned that this theory should be advanced only when all elements of equitable estoppel, including reasonable reliance, can be established.

Patient Care vs. When Cause of Action Arose. Counsel should be prepared to argue the distinction between when patient care occurred and when the cause of action arose. Plaintiff's counsel will try to establish that the cause of action did not arise from patient care because the plaintiff was not a patient at the time the wrongful act occurred. Defense counsel, in contrast, will argue that the simultaneous happening of these two events is not critical, but that instead so long as the wrongful act was in some way connected to the plaintiff having been a patient, then the wrongful act arose from patient care and the statute of repose applies.

The Fourth District Appellate Court has recently described the distinction between the two-year statute of limitations and the four-year statute of repose in Follis v. Watkins, 367 Ill. App. 3d 548 (Ill. App. Ct. 2006): the former is triggered by the plaintiff's discovery of the injury, whereas the latter is triggered by the defendant's wrongful act. However, for this limitations scheme to apply, the cause of action must be arising out of patient care. 735 ILCS 5/13-212(a).

Medical Judgment vs. Administrative Decisions. The Supreme Court had, a few months earlier, spelled out the distinguishing factor for cases requiring expert testimony as those which involve medical judgment as opposed to those which are simply administrative decisions in Heastie v. Roberts, 226 Ill. 2d 515 (2007). The Orlak dissent pointed to this recent categorization as support for its view that whether a case is arising out of patient care should turn on whether the wrongful conduct alleged is medical malpractice. Given the holding in Heastie, counsel should not automatically rule out arguments based on the distinction between medical judgments and administrative decisions. Even though the Orlak court opted to not follow that approach, nonetheless Orlak neither overruled nor disagreed with Heastie and thus it could be cited as supporting this distinction.

Applicability to Other Theories. The language of the limitations statute itself states that it applies to all theories of recovery, including breach of contract, where the cause of action arises out of patient care. 735 ILCS 5/13-212(a). After the Illinois Supreme Court applied legal theories of liability to HMOs, the First District Appellate Court held that actions against HMOs are subject to the limitations scheme of Section 13-212, where the HMO can be held liable for medical malpractice. Thornton v. Shah, 333 Ill. App. 3d 1011, 777 N.E.2d 396 (1st Dist. 2002). Note the Thornton court's emphasis on the medical malpractice aspect of the cause of action as key to the applicability of 735 ILCS 5/13-212, thus broadening the arising out of patient care requirement. Given this precedent, counsel can interweave the medical judgment factor in argument on the issue of whether an action arose from patient care.

Cross References. Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C6.01 (Drafting a Complaint); Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C8.03 (Preparing the Answer: Form and Content).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

192 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Class Certification: Vairo on Dukes v. Wal-Mart

2008 Emerging Issues 1845

Class Certification: Vairo on Dukes v. Wal-Mart

By Georgene Vairo

January 30, 2008

SUMMARY: Vairo on Dukes v. Wal-Mart The opinion in Dukes, the largest civil rights class actions suit in United States history, addresses several issues pertaining to class actions. The first issue is whether the commonality requirement of Rule 23 was met. Also, the court evaluates whether the class action, a sex discrimination action involving approximately 1.5 million plaintiffs, would pose manageability problems. Lastly, the court discusses the admissibility of the plaintiffs expert report and its relationship to class certification issues. This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author and editor of several books, including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, analyzes the Ninth Circuits opinion.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Dukes v. Wal-Mart, 509 F.3d 1168, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 28558 (9th Cir. Dec. 11, 2007) involved perhaps the largest class action ever certified. The Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's certification of a sex discrimination class action by approximately 1.5 million women employees of Wal-Mart.

The opinion focuses on three major contested points: 1) whether the requirements of Rule 23 were met, most importantly whether the commonality requirement was met; 2) whether the class action would pose manageability problems; and 3) the admissibility of the plaintiffs expert report and its relationship to the class certification issues.

(1) Background. The plaintiffs filed suit against Wal-Mart alleging sexual discrimination against woman employees. The district court agreed to certify a nationwide class of women who had been subjected to allegedly discriminatory pay and promotions policies. This class was estimated to number more than 1.5 million. They sought injunctive and declaratory relief, back pay, and punitive damages, but not traditional compensatory damages. The district court certified the class with respect to all these types of relief.

Both sides sought and were granted interlocutory appeal under Rule 23(f). The Ninth Circuit first issued an opinion on February 6, 2007 [see Dukes v. Wal-Mart, Inc., 474 F.3d 1214, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 2601 (9th Cir. Feb. 6, 2007)], discussed in May 2007 MOORES FEDERAL PRACTICE UPDATE p. 115], but then withdrew it and issued the present opinion.

(2) Rule 23(a) Prerequisites Were Met. A class may be certified only if it meets the four requirements of Rule 23(a): numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation. The plaintiffs argued that, despite the breadth and diversity of the class, it met these requirements because it was united by a complex array of company-wide discriminatory practices. The Ninth Circuit agreed that the district court had not abused its discretion in finding that these requirements were met. All parties agreed that the numerosity requirement was met. The Ninth Circuit spent little time rejecting the defendants arguments that the typicality and adequacy of representation requirements were not met on the basis that only one low paid class representative was named, and that the class consisted of supervisory and non-supervisory employees. The court found that all women suffered the same sort of alleged discrimination. The hotly contested issue was whether the commonality requirement was met.

(3) Commonality Was Established Through Factual Evidence, Expert Testimony, Statistical Evidence, and Anecdotal Evidence. The commonality requirement focuses on the relationship of common facts and legal issues among class members. The Ninth Circuit construes this requirement permissively. The existence of only one significant factual or legal issue common to the class may be sufficient. The plaintiffs had presented four categories of evidence to support their commonality argument: (1) facts supporting the existence of company-wide policies and practices; (2) expert sociological opinions supporting the existence of company-wide policies and practices; (3) expert statistical evidence of class-wide gender disparities attributable to discrimination; and (4) anecdotal evidence from class members around the country of discriminatory attitudes held or tolerated by management. The district court had conducted a rigorous analysis of this evidence and was within its discretion in concluding that the commonality prerequisite was satisfied.

The plaintiffs' factual evidence consisted of evidence of (1) uniform personnel and management structure across stores; (2) extensive oversight of store operations by the defendant's headquarters, company-wide policies governing pay and promotion decisions, and a strong, centralized corporate culture; and (3) consistent gender-related disparities in every domestic region of the company. The plaintiffs used this evidence to show that the defendant operated a highly centralized company that promoted policies common to all stores and maintained a single system of oversight.

The plaintiffs proffered expert testimony from a sociologist to interpret and explain the facts suggesting that the defendant promoted a strong corporate culture that included gender stereotyping. The sociologist concluded that (1) the defendant's centralized coordination, reinforced by a strong organizational culture, sustained uniformity in personnel policy and practice; (2) there were significant deficiencies in the defendant's equal employment policies and practices; and (3) the defendant's personnel policies and practices made pay and promotion decisions vulnerable to gender bias.

The plaintiffs expert statistical evidence was also relevant to show commonality. A statistician analyzed data for each of the forty-one regions containing the defendant's stores, and concluded that there were statistically significant disparities between men and women employees in terms of compensation and promotions, that these disparities were wide-spread across regions, and that they could be explained only by gender discrimination. Another expert compared the defendant with twenty of its competitors and concluded that it promoted a smaller percentage of women. As with the sociologist's expert testimony, the Ninth Circuit refused to examine the relative probativeness of this statistical evidence; rather, it concluded that the district court did not abuse its discretion in considering this evidence as a valid component of its commonality analysis.

The plaintiffs also presented anecdotal evidence in the form of declarations by class members, who testified to being paid less than similarly situated men, being denied or delayed in receiving promotions in a disproportionate manner when compared with similarly situated men, working in an atmosphere with a strong corporate culture of discrimination, and being subjected to various individual sexist acts. The Ninth Circuit noted that anecdotal evidence of discrimination is commonly used in Title VII pattern and practice" cases to bolster statistical proof by bringing the cold numbers convincingly to life." There is no requirement that a plaintiff class submit a statistically significant number of declarations for such evidence to have value.

Finally, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the district court did not err in considering, as part of the commonality analysis, that the defendant permitted its managers to use subjectivity in interpreting company policies. While decentralized, discretionary authority is not inherently discriminatory, subjective decision-making is a ready mechanism for discrimination and courts should scrutinize it carefully. This factor could contribute to an inference of discrimination and was properly considered by the district court.

All four types of evidence, taken together, demonstrated that the defendant's female employees nationwide were subjected to a single set of corporate policies (not merely a number of independent discriminatory acts) that may have worked to unlawfully discriminate against them. Evidence of subjective decision-making policies provided further evidence of a common practice of discrimination. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit concluded that the district court did not abuse its discretion in holding that the commonality prerequisite to class certification was satisfied.

Conclusion. The Ninth Circuit's opinion serves as a primer for how to present a claim of commonality. Of course, it is important to remember that the Dukes class sought certification under USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23(b)(2), and accordingly, did not need to prove the more exacting requirement that common questions predominate when class certification for monetary damages is sought under USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23(b)(3). Looking at the nature of the evidence provided in the Dukes case, it is unlikely that a predominance finding could have been made given the widespread nature of the class, even with the evidence of company-wide gender stereotyping and decision making. Nonetheless, the Ninth Circuit approval of class certification of such a huge nation-wide class is noteworthy.

(4) Rule 23(b) Requirements Were Satisfied Claims For Injunctive Relief Predominated Over Claims For Monetary Relief. As discussed above, the plaintiffs had moved to certify the class under USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(2). Such class actions seek primarily injunctive or declaratory relief, but in the Ninth Circuit may include claims for monetary damages so long as damages are not the predominant relief sought. Looking at the size of the class-wide damages request, the defendant argued that the class should not have been certified because monetary claims predominated.

Even though the class claims amounted to billions of dollars, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the mere size of the request did not undermine class certification under USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(2). This large amount was a function of the size of the defendant and the alleged harm and did not establish that the primary goal was monetary relief. Although the Ninth Circuit agreed with the defendant that the request for back pay did weigh against certification, certification is not improper when back pay is requested as long as such request does not predominate. Here, the court was convinced that the plaintiffs would have brought the suit to obtain injunctive relief even in the absence of a possible back pay recovery, and accordingly, that the injunctive relief claims predominated.

Similarly, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the request for punitive damages did not predominate over the requested injunctive relief. It would thwart congressional intent if plaintiffs were forced to forego the punitive damages provided for under Title VII in order to proceed as a class action. The Ninth Circuit also noted that the district court's order contained a provision allowing plaintiffs to opt out of claims for punitive damages.

The Ninth Circuit did throw one bone to the defendant, finding that putative class members who were no longer employees at the time the complaint was filed did not have standing to pursue injunctive or declaratory relief. However, class certification under USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(2) was appropriate at least as to the class members who were employees at that time. On remand, therefore, the district court would have to determine the appropriate scope of the class.

Conclusion. As the dissent strenuously argued, it is hard to understand how damages claims for billions of dollars cannot be said to predominate over Wal-Mart being told to behave in the future. The plaintiff class eschewed claims for compensatory damages surely to avoid the problem raised by the dissent and the defendant with respect to certification under USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(2). The point of the dissent is that the Wal-Mart class action is a damages class action in disguise and therefore needs to meet the factual predominance requirement of a USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(3) class action. Looking at the majority's concern about Congressional intent in terms of ensuring a meaningful remedy for victims of sexual discrimination, the Ninth Circuit took an expansive view of the reach of a USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(2) class action. It will be interesting to determine whether there will be a rehearing en banc. In any event, the result in Dukes may lead the Ninth Circuit to reconsider its view that claims for back pay and punitive damages are permissible so long as the claims for injunctive relief predominate.

(5) Class Action Was Manageable. Although USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(3), not Rule 23(b)(2) contains a manageability requirement, the district court did consider manageability. It concluded, however, that the immense size of the class, while a concern, would not present undue obstacles to managing the class action. It outlined a two-stage trial plan based in large part on how other courts have handled similarly large and complex class actions. In the first phase, plaintiffs would attempt to prove that the defendant engaged in a pattern and practice of discrimination and, if so, that punitive damages were warranted. If the plaintiffs succeeded, the second phase would focus on remedies: first class-wide injunctive relief, then back pay.

The Ninth Circuit found it premature to address the defendant's objections to the tentative trial plan, but noted that there was a range of possibilities that would allow the class action to proceed in a manner both manageable and in accordance with due process, citing as an example Hilao v. Estate of Ferdinand Marcos [103 F.3d 767, 782-787 (9th Cir. 1996)]. In Hilao, the district court appointed Moore's Editorial Board Member Sol Schreiber as a special master to consider a representative sample of claims to determine the amount of compensatory damages due the plaintiff class. Schreiber's report and recommendations were then presented to the Hilao jury for consideration in reaching its verdict. Because Schreiber's thoughtful approach in Hilao showed that there existed at least one method of managing the large class action in the present case, the Ninth Circuit concluded that manageability concerns presented no bar to class certification.

Conclusion. The dispute about manageability, like those about commonality and whether injunctive relief claims predominated, stem from the billions of dollars at stake, and whether the class action is a USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (b)(3) class action in disguise. The Ninth Circuit is technically correct that the claim about manageability is premature, and it is undoubtedly correct that there are methods, such as those suggested by my Moore's Board of Editors colleague, Sol Schreiber in the Hilao case, for solving such problems.

(6) Dissent. There was a vehement dissent by Judge Kleinfeld. In his view, the only one of the USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 23 (a) prerequisites that was met was numerosity. The situations of the class members were too divergent to meet the other requirements. Further, it was risible to say that injunctive and declaratory relief predominate' . . . billions of dollars are going to predominate over words and solemn commands and promises about how to behave in the future."

Moreover, the dissent found that the district court's management plan would violate the defendant's constitutional rights to due process and jury trial. There will never be an adjudication, let alone an adjudication by an Article III judge and a jury, to determine whether Wal-Mart owes any particular woman the money it will be required to pay, nor will any particular woman ever get a trial to establish how much she is owed." Nor was there any legitimate way for the jury or court to decide on a punitive damages award, when no compensatory damages were sought.

Judge Kleinfeld also complained that class action treatment would sacrifice the rights of women injured by discrimination. Women who have suffered great loss because of sex discrimination will have to share the punitive damages award with many women who did not. Women entitled to considerable compensatory damages in addition to lost pay will be deprived of them. Women who have left Wal-Mart will get injunctive and declaratory relief of no value to them, while new female Wal-Mart employees will benefit from the injustice done to other women. If the settlement is mostly words for the women and money for the lawyers, a realistic possibility, it will be a pyrrhic victory indeed." In other words, what the district court characterized as an historic class action is simply an unprecedented one, according to the dissent.

Conclusion. If ever there is a case for en banc consideration, Dukes v. Wal-Mart is it. It presents a stark example of the possibilities of obtaining relief for victims of discrimination on the one hand, versus the draconian effect of class actions upon corporate defendants on the other. If rehearing is denied, and the Supreme Court denies certiorari, as the dissent predicts, the pressure on Wal-Mart to settle will be extreme. It matters little that the Ninth Circuit told that district court or a jury that they could credit Wal-Mart's experts on the merits. At what stage of the litigation would that happen? As discussed below, the Ninth Circuit has left the door ajar for arguing that opinions that meet the Daubert standard for class certification purposes do not necessarily meet Daubert for the purpose of raising a genuine issue of material fact.

(7) Daubert's Gatekeeping Function. The defendant challenged some of the sociologist's conclusions, arguing they did not meet the standards set by Federal Rule of Evidence 702 and Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc. [509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993)]. However, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the defendant's argument went to whether certain inferences could be persuasively drawn from the data, while Daubert simply requires a court to admit or exclude evidence based on its scientific reliability and relevance. Whether the sociologist's inferences should be credited was a merits question for the jury. In the context of the commonality inquiry for certification purposes, it was enough that the sociologist presented properly analyzed, scientifically reliable evidence tending to show that a common question of fact existed.

Second, and perhaps most important, the Ninth Circuit held that district courts are not required to apply the full Daubert gatekeeping standard at the class certification stage. The Ninth Circuit approved the Second Circuit's reasoning: A Daubert motion is typically not made until later stages in litigation . . . and a district court should not postpone consideration of a motion for class certification for the sake of waiting until a Daubert examination is appropriate" [In re Visa Check/Mastermoney Antitrust Litig. 280 F.3d at 124, 132 n.4 (2d Cir. 2001)].

Third, the Ninth Circuit stated that an expert's testimony need not be exact or quantifiable. Moreover, the defendant did not challenge the expert's methodology, acknowledging that social science statistics may have probative value in class action claims. In sum, the district court was not required to apply Daubert at the class certification stage. And even if Daubert did apply at that stage, the proffered expert testimony satisfied Daubert because the expert used a well-accepted methodology to reach his opinions and because his testimony had a reliable basis in the knowledge and experience of [the relevant] discipline." Even though a jury might ultimately agree with defendant that the expert's social science analysis not enough to show that defendant engaged in actual gender discrimination, that question would have to be resolved at the merits stage of the litigation. At the class certification stage, it was sufficient that the expert presented properly-analyzed, scientifically reliable evidence" tending to show that a common question of fact (Does Wal-Mart's policy of decentralized, subjective employment decision making operate to discriminate against female employees?) existed with respect to all members of the class.

Similarly, with respect to the statistical evidence, the Ninth Circuit found that even if it were to conclude that defendant's statistical evidence was more persuasive than plaintiffs', this fact alone would not compel the conclusion that the district court improperly relied on plaintiff's expert's testimony as a valid component of its commonality analysis or that the district court erred in its ultimate conclusion that the commonality prerequisite was satisfied.

Conclusion. The Ninth Circuit's analysis here is confusing, but does leave the door open to a full-fledged Daubert hearing on the admissibility of the sociologists' testimony, as well as the statistical evidence that supported the claims of commonality for class purposes, and discrimination for merits purposes. The Ninth Circuit bounced back and forth between whether the testimony could persuade a jury and whether it would meet a full-fledged Daubert standard.

The Ninth Circuit draws a basic distinction between class certification, on the one hand, and the merits of a discrimination claim, on the other hand. In this case, the plaintiffs expert used a valid statistical model to demonstrate that there was discrimination in compensation and promotion at Wal-Mart on a regional basis. Wal-Mart offered its own statistical analysis to demonstrate that if stores were examined individually and by departments, there was no discrimination. The Ninth Circuit determined that a district judge need not (and probably could not) decide which analysis is more persuasive at the class certification stage. Discovery might demonstrate that promotions were made store by store or that employees are promoted from one store to positions in other stores. The emerging facts could well demonstrate that one analysis has a much better fit than another. At the class certification stage, the key question is whether the plaintiffs have set forth sufficient evidence of commonality for the district court to determine that class certification is warranted. The courts determination that a valid statistical analysis is properly considered by a district judge in making the commonality determination makes sense, as does the courts conclusion that, once the merits are reached, the district court might conclude that Wal-Marts expert is more persuasive and that the class claim should be rejected on the merits. However much sense this distinction seems to make analytically, as a practical matter, Wal-Mart is the big-time loser, especially if it fails to persuade the district court at a Daubert hearing and motion for summary judgment.

References. 5-23 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 23.23, 5-23 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 23.43, 5-23 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 23.46 [2][e]; 3 Stephen A. Saltzburg, Michael M. Martin & Daniel J. Capra, 702 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 702.02 [5], 702 Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 702.03 [43][b], [d] (9th ed. 2006); 4-702 Weinstein's Federal Evidence § 702.05 [2][a], 4-702 Weinstein's Federal Evidence § 702.06 [4] (Matthew Bender 2d ed.).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

193 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Grace V.B. Garcia on MacFayden v. Maki, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 618 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1842

Grace V.B. Garcia on MacFayden v. Maki, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 618 (2007)

By Grace V.B. Garcia

January 29, 2008

SUMMARY: In MacFayden v. Maki, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 618, the Appeals Court of Massachusetts evaluated Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 128, § 2E as an affirmative defense to tort cases occurring on a farm. Specifically, the Court ruled that Chapter 128, § 2E gives limited liability protection to pick-your-own farms under certain conditions, namely that a compliant sign is posted for visitors to see. This decision is important in that it expands the reading of the statute, thus requiring farms to have appropriate signage in order to obtain the statutes protection. This commentary, written by Grace Garcia, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In MacFayden v. Maki, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 618, the Appeals Court of Massachusetts evaluated Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 128, § 2E as an affirmative defense to tort cases occurring on a farm. Specifically, the Court ruled that Chapter 128, § 2E gives limited liability protection to pick-your-own farms under certain conditions, namely that a compliant sign is posted for visitors to see. This decision is important in that it expands the reading of the statute, thus requiring farms to have appropriate signage in order to obtain the statutes protection.

Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 128, § 2E. Massachusetts, through Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 128, § 2E, provides the following statutory defense to farms:

No owner . . . of a farm who allows any person to enter said farm for the purpose of agricultural harvesting, including the cutting of Christmas trees under a so-called pick-your-own agreement shall be liable for injuries or death to persons . . . resulting from the conduct of such operation in the absence of willful, wanton, or reckless conduct on the part of said owner.

The statute further requires the following: Said owner . . . of said farm shall post and maintain signs which contain the warning notices specified herein. Such signs shall be placed in a location visible to persons allowed to enter said farm for the purpose of agricultural harvesting. The warning signs mandated by the statute effectively inform individuals of the farms limited liability.

The Trial Courts Evaluation of Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 128, § 2E. In MacFayden the plaintiff fell over a snow-covered tree stump while looking to cut down her own Christmas tree on the defendants pick-you-own tree farm.

As a result of her injuries, the plaintiff filed a complaint alleging various counts of negligence. Despite the farm not having the designated Ch. 128, § 2E sign, the defendant filed a motion for summary judgment which the trial court granted.

In making its decision, the trial court acknowledged that the word shall in the statute mandated that farms post the obligatory sign warning people of their limited liability. Notwithstanding the mandate, the court found that the statute was ambiguous as to the consequence of failing to post the required sign. Based on the ambiguity, as well as the statutes preamble which made it an emergency act, the court enforced the limited exposure provided by the statute and granted the defendants summary judgment motion.

The Appeals Court Interpretation of Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 128, § 2E. The Appeals Court reversed summary judgment finding no ambiguity in Ch. 128, § 2E. The Appeals Court reiterated that the basic tenet in statute interpretation is to interpret according to the intent of the Legislature ascertained from all its words construed by the ordinary and approved usage of the language, considered in connection with the cause of its enactment, the mischief or imperfection to be remedied and the main object to be accomplished. MacFayden, 70 Mass. App. Ct. at 621, quoting Lowery v. Klemm, 446 Mass. 572, 576-77 (2006). In doing so, the court determined the word shall, with respect to the posting of notice, makes such posting mandatory. The court held that the statute required the posting of the warning sign as a prerequisite to obtaining the limited liability protections granted by the statute. Because the warning was required, the court determined the legislatures intent to be two-fold: First, to limit pick-your-own farmers liability to visitors on those farms, and second, to require farmers to post clear and explicit notices to those visitors that their rights to file certain tort claims had been eliminated. Id. at 622. As a consequence of this interpretation, farm visitors have the ability to make informed decisions as to whether they want to proceed with activities at the farm.

The court stated that its decision follows the well-known basic tenet of statutory construction that statutes be construed so that effect is given to all of its provisions, so that no part will be inoperative or superfluous. Id., quoting, Boston Police Patrolmens Assn. v. Police Dept. of Boston, 446 Mass. 46, 50 (2006). A decision to the contrary, such as the trial courts decision would render the mandatory requirement to post the warning notice superfluous and give the owner of the tree farm discretion to post the waning notice. Id. at 623. Consequently, MacFayden now makes it clear that for a farm to obtain the protections afforded by Ch. 128, § 2E, it must comply with the statute and post the appropriate warning signs.

Despite the courts statement that it followed basic principles of statutory construction, the dissent argued that the Appeals Courts decision actually expanded the reading of the statute. Specifically, as the statute failed to contain a penalty for not posting the required sign or state that the posting of the sign was a prerequisite to being afforded Ch. 128, § 2Es protection, the courts decision to make the posting a prerequisite expanded the statute by making a requirement that the Legislature did not write. Indeed, the dissent argued that the courts decision read into the statute a provision which the Legislature did not see fit to put there. Id. at 624. Notwithstanding the dissent, now based on MacFayden, pick-your-own farms should definitely post the appropriate warning signs.

Other Possible Defenses for Farmers in Tort Cases. In the event you represent a farm in a tort case which does not have the appropriate signage, there are still other defenses that may be used. In Massachusetts, a landowner owes a single duty of reasonable care to all persons lawfully on the premises. Mounsey v. Ellard, 363 Mass. 693, 707 (1973). Specifically, the law imposes on a property owner a duty to maintain his property in a reasonably safe condition in view of all the circumstances, including the likelihood of injury to others, the seriousness of the injury and the burden of avoiding the risk. Barry v. Beverly Enterprises-Massachusetts, Inc., 418 Mass. 590, 592-593 (1994) (quoting, Taubiana v. Priestly, 402 Mass. 84, 88 (1988)). However, a defendant in a premises liability case is not obligated to supply a place of maximum safety, but only one which would be safe to a person who exercises such minimum care as the circumstances reasonably indicate. Barry, 418 Mass. at 593 (quoting, Gadweuski v. Union Oil Co., 326 F.2d 524, 525 (1st Cir. 1964)).

It is well settled in Massachusetts that there is no duty to protect lawful visitors from dangers obvious to persons of ordinary intelligence. OSullivan v. Shaw, 431 Mass. 201 (2000) (no duty to warn plaintiff of risk of diving in shallow end of pool). An obligation to warn depends on the nature of the danger to be apprehended. If the risk is obvious, the defendant cannot readily anticipate the resulting injury. Rainka v. Shing, 2000 Mass. App. Div. 186 (Mass. App. Div. 2000).

Indeed, [k]nowledge of the condition is a predicate to what is open and obvious. Rainka, 2000 Mass. App. Div. LEXIS at *15. (holding defendant not liable for plaintiffs fall on cardboard boxes that were on the ground at a tag sale). Further, even if a plaintiff may have forgotten about the existence of the condition, such is not a defense to the application of the open and obvious rule. Ware v. Evangelical Baptist Benevolent & Missionary Soc. of Boston, 181 Mass. 285, 286 (1902) (defendant not negligent when plaintiff tripped while leaving a room that was about a five inches higher than the corridor she was entering, as plaintiff was aware of the uneven floor as she had passed by it once); see also, Letiecq v. Denholm & McKay, Co., 328 Mass. 120 (1951) (the footstool plaintiff tripped over was obvious as she had seen it prior to her fall). Despite the usefulness of the open and obvious rule in a case like MacFayden, the court acknowledged that it was not used as an argument for summary judgment. MacFayden, 70 Mass. App. Ct. at 623 n.6.

Thus, if you represent a farm, you want to advise them to post the mandated signs under Ch. 128, § 2E. If, however, you are defending a farm that does not have such signs, it is important to argue the other basic tenets of premises liability that a landowner is generally not liable for open and obvious dangers.

Cross References

MA Pleading and Practice § 51.12, § 8.416.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

194 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Forum Non Conveniens: Vairo on Adelson v. Hananel

2008 Emerging Issues 1843

Forum Non Conveniens: Vairo on Adelson v. Hananel

By Georgene Vairo

January 29, 2008

SUMMARY: Vairo on Adelson v. Hananel In the Adelson decision, the court addresses two important issues pertaining to forum non conveniens. The first issue is the weight that should be afforded to the plaintiffs choice of forum. Secondly, the court addresses the extent to which the existence of proceedings in the foreign venue ought to be determinative. Also, this commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author and editor of several books, including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, discusses the First Circuits approach to determining whether there is personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Adelson v. Hananel, 510 F.3d 43, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 28033 (1st Cir. Dec. 5, 2007), involved a breach of contract action between a United States citizen and an Israeli citizen. The district court found that personal jurisdiction existed over the Israeli defendant, but dismissed on forum non conveniens grounds. The First Circuit affirmed the personal jurisdiction ruling, but reversed the forum non conveniens dismissal.

The opinion addresses two significant issues that arise in forum non conveniens motions: 1) the degree of deference that ought to be accorded to the plaintiffs choice of forum; and 2) the extent to which the existence of proceedings in the foreign venue ought to be determinative. It also provides an excellent illustration of the First Circuits generally liberal approach to determining whether there is personal jurisdiction over a foreign defendant.

(1) Background. The plaintiff, a U.S. citizen, was an international businessman with holdings around the world, including a corporation based in Massachusetts established to make business investments in Israel. The plaintiff hired the defendant, a citizen and resident of Israel, as the general manager of the Massachusetts corporation's operations in Israel. The plaintiff terminated the defendant's employment, which resulted in several lawsuits in an Israeli labor court. The plaintiff then filed the present suit in Massachusetts seeking a declaration of the parties' respective rights under the oral employment contract.

The district court found that it had personal jurisdiction over the defendant for the declaratory action. However, it dismissed the case on forum non conveniens grounds, finding that Israel was an adequate alternative forum and that the balancing of public and private interest factors weighed in favor of the Israeli forum. The First Circuit reversed the dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds, ruling that the district court failed to give sufficient deference to the U.S. plaintiff's choice of a U.S. forum, and should not have given substantial weight to the existence of related litigation in the foreign forum.

(2) Personal Jurisdiction. The district court had applied the prima facie method to the resolution of the personal jurisdiction motion, rather than adjudicating the jurisdictional facts. Under this approach, the court considers only whether the plaintiff has proffered evidence that, if construed in the light most favorable to the jurisdictional claim, is enough to support findings of all facts essential to finding personal jurisdiction. To support specific personal jurisdiction, the plaintiff must show three elements: (1) the claims arise out of or relate to the defendant's forum activities; (2) the defendant's forum contacts represent a purposeful availment of the privilege of conducting activities in the forum state; and (3) the exercise of jurisdiction is reasonable.

With respect to the first element, relatedness, the First Circuit uses a flexible, relaxed standard that focuses on the nexus between the defendant's contacts and the plaintiff's cause of action. In a contract action, the court may look to the parties' negotiations and contemplated future consequences, along with the terms of the contract and the actual course of dealing. The court asks whether the defendant's activity in the forum state was instrumental either in the formation or breach of the contract. Here, according to the First Circuit, the district court had properly found (based on the version of events supplied by the plaintiff) that the employment contract was formalized and entered into in Massachusetts, when the defendant traveled there to meet with the plaintiff. The action arose from and was related to that activity in the forum.

The purposeful availment element ensures that jurisdiction is not based on random, isolated, or fortuitous contacts. The two key focal points are voluntariness and foreseeability. Here, these requirements were easily met. The defendant had freely negotiated and executed his own contract while in Massachusetts. Litigation in Massachusetts was foreseeable when the employment relationship was formalized in Massachusetts, the defendant had an ongoing business relationship with the state (where the offices and officers of the employer were located), and all of his budgets and operational funds were submitted to and obtained through that Massachusetts office. In short, the defendant knowingly affiliated himself with an entity based primarily in Massachusetts and, thus, the possibility of a suit there was amply foreseeable.

The third element, reasonableness, is determined in light of several factors: (1) the defendant's burden of appearing, (2) the forum state's interest in adjudicating the dispute, (3) the plaintiff's interest in obtaining convenient and effective relief, (4) the judicial system's interest in obtaining the most effective resolution of the controversy, and (5) the common interests of all sovereigns in promoting substantive social policies.

These factors supported the exercise of jurisdiction. It was true that the defendant would be inconvenienced by litigating in Massachusetts: he lived and worked in Israel and was a legally blind diabetic. However, there was no unusual burden. Neither his foreign residence nor his medical condition prevented him from traveling internationally in the course of his employment or from agreeing to work for a U.S. company. Further, the plaintiff had an interest in litigating in Massachusetts, and Massachusetts had an interest in providing a convenient forum for its residents. Finally, the interests of the judicial system in achieving efficient resolution did militate against jurisdiction in Massachusetts, because of the prior suits pending in Israel. Foreshadowing its forum non conveniens analysis, the First Circuit found, however, that this factor alone was insufficient to tip the constitutional balance on the facts of this case. Accordingly, the First Circuit affirmed the district court's holding that personal jurisdiction could be exercised over the Israeli defendant.

Conclusion. There is nothing surprising in the courts personal jurisdiction ruling. The case for specific jurisdiction was straightforward, given the purposeful connection between the Israeli citizen and the State of Massachusetts. Nonetheless, the opinion provides a good example of how the First Circuit handles motions to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction.

(3) Weighing the Interest of the United States Plaintiff: A Defendants Heavy Burden. Forum non conveniens is a discretionary tool for the district court to dismiss a claim, even when it has proper jurisdiction. The First Circuit began by noting the power to dismiss on forum non conveniens grounds is limited by the principle that a plaintiff's choice of forum should rarely be disturbed. Accordingly, the party moving for dismissal bears the heavy burden of establishing that an adequate alternative forum exists and that considerations of convenience and judicial efficiency strongly favor litigating the claim in the second forum.

The parties did not dispute the availability and adequacy of the Israeli forum. Rather, the plaintiff argued that the district court, in dismissing, had improperly calculated the balance of public and private interest factors, and the First Circuit agreed. A plaintiff not only enjoys some degree of deference for the original choice of forum, but is entitled to heightened deference when that forum is the plaintiff's home. This heightened deference should have applied here as the plaintiff, while not a Massachusetts domiciliary, was a U.S. citizen seeking to litigate in a U.S. forum rather than a foreign forum. Thus, according to the First Circuit, the Massachusetts district court is still deemed a "home forum" where the alternative is foreign. Although dismissal is not automatically barred in such cases, a heavy presumption weighs in favor of that plaintiff's initial forum choice.

Conclusion. The First Circuit's opinion is important because it confirms the elevated importance of United States citizenship, as opposed merely to state citizenship, in the forum non conveniens analysis. Had the plaintiff here been a Massachusetts citizen, it would have been an easier case for reversing the district court. But the fact that any United States citizen would have to litigate in a foreign venue required a heightened deference as well. A logical extension of that heightened deference in favor of a plaintiff's "home forum" applies in cases such as this which involves a U.S. citizen plaintiff who is seeking to litigate against a foreign defendant in a United States forum. This heightened deference for the United States plaintiff's choice of forum is the flip side of the United States Supreme Court's explicit rejection, in Piper Aircraft Co. v. Reyno, 454 U.S. 235, 102 S. Ct. 252, 70 L. Ed. 2d 419 (1981), of providing deference to a foreign plaintiff's choice of a United States forum.

The First Circuit noted that while it has only implicitly recognized the strong presumption favoring a U.S. forum selected by U.S. plaintiffs, other circuits have articulated it more explicitly. The First Circuit's approach is thus now consistent with the approach of the Second Circuit in Iragorri v. Int'l Elevator, Inc., 203 F.3d 8 (1st Cir. 2000), and the Eighth Circuit in Reid-Walen v. Hansen, 933 F.2d 1390, 1394 (8th Cir. 1991) (in a forum non conveniens case involving a foreign court, "the 'home' forum for the plaintiff is any federal district in the United States, not the particular district where the plaintiff lives").

(4) Weighing the Importance of Foreign Proceedings. The First Circuit noted that the district court had properly observed that the plaintiff was a U.S. citizen and that there was a heavy presumption "in favor of his choice of forum, but that the district court had ignored that presumption because of the existence of the concurrent actions in the Israeli court. That was the determinative factor in the district court's view. The district court therefore erred in elevating the importance of the concurrent Israeli litigation within the forum non conveniens analysis. Indeed, in its analysis up to that point, the district court had found that the "private interest factors did not weigh in favor of either party" and that the public interest was "also in equipoise between the parties." Having found the public and private interest factors to be in equipoise, the district court should have concluded that the defendant failed to overcome the heavy presumption in favor of the plaintiff's home forum. Instead, the district court in discussing the Israeli suit, stated, "I see no reason why Adelson cannot fairly litigate his claim in Israel."

According to the First Circuit, the existence of the concurrent Israeli litigation is not a relevant factor to a forum non conveniens analysis. There is nothing in the public interest factors expressed by the Supreme Court that invokes a comparison between the two competing fora. By focusing on the existence of parallel proceedings in a foreign court, the district court essentially converted the analysis into a determination of which of the two pending cases should go forward. In so doing, the court erroneously lowered the defendant's burden of proving that the balance of factors justified dismissal of a suit from a U.S. plaintiff's choice of home forum.

Conclusion. There is little surprise in finding that it was error to dismiss on forum non conveniens grounds a case brought by a United States citizen against a foreign citizen on a claim arising out of a contract made in the United States. The archetypical case for dismissing on forum non conveniens grounds is a case brought by foreign citizens against a United States citizen on a claim that arose in a foreign jurisdiction. It is also not a surprise that the court would rule that no one factor here the existence of the foreign litigation would be determinative. What is a surprise is the First Circuits finding, without citation or analysis, that the existence of parallel foreign proceedings is not relevant at all in a forum non conveniens analysis. That is an interesting proposition.

First of all, one of the public interest factors expressed by the Supreme Court does allow the district court to take into account docket congestion, which suggests that if a case could be resolved sooner in a foreign jurisdiction that is a factor supporting dismissal. In other words, some weighing of the relative fora is appropriate. Similarly, determining whether the foreign forum is an adequate alternative forum under the Piper analysis also requires a look at that forum. Second, and more importantly, the Supreme Court in Piper made it plain that forum non conveniens involves a balancing. In Piper, the Third Circuit had elevated the importance of choice of law, and the fact that the plaintiff would not fare as well under foreign law as under United States law, as determinative. The Supreme Court reversed. It found that the application of less favorable law by the foreign jurisdiction could not be given substantial weight in the forum non conveniens analysis. In other words, it did not find the factor to have no weight. Rather, the Court clarified that the forum non conveniens doctrine needs to be applied flexibly. Thus, the First Circuit may well have understated the importance of parallel proceedings in the forum non conveniens analysis.

This underscores the importance of understanding the difference between a dismissal on forum non conveniens grounds and a transfer to another federal court under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). The existence of a parallel federal proceeding almost always leads to a transfer to the district in which the first case was brought. The district court likely was motivated by similar efficiency considerations. The First Circuit is likely correct not to have disturbed the United States plaintiffs choice of a United States forum, but its statement that the existence of the foreign litigation has no weight must be taken with a grain of salt. For example, where the private and public factors are less in equipoise, as for example, where the relevant claims can be said to arise in the foreign jurisdiction, the existence of parallel litigation may provide the tipping point.

References

2-12 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 12.31; 16-108 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 108.42; 17-111 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 111.75.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

195 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Townsend v. Sears, Roebuck & Co.

2008 Emerging Issues 1818

Susan M. Brazas on Townsend v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1701 (November 29, 2007).

By Susan M. Brazas

January 24, 2008

SUMMARY: On November 29, 2007, the Illinois Supreme Court issued two opinions addressing, for the first time in many years, conflict of laws analysis. In this surprising reversal of the trial and appellate courts, the Townsend court applied Michigan law to a products liability case for severe injuries suffered by a child run over by a lawn mower. The significant differences in the remedies available under Michigan law, as compared to Illinois law, dealt a blow to the plaintiff's prospects upon remand. This commentary, written by Susan M. Brazas, frequent author and lecturer on civil practice matters, discusses the impact and implications of this novel and ground-breaking opinion.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Illinois Supreme Court Confirms Strong Presumption of Situs of Injury and Contributory Negligence in Conflict of Law Analysis for Products Liability Case

The Illinois Supreme Court in Townsend v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1701 concluded that the situs of injury, and the situs of alleged contributory negligence, were to be given great weight in making a conflict of law and choice of law analysis. The case involved severe injuries, including a resulting foot amputation, suffered by a 3 year old boy when he was run over by a riding lawn mower being operated by his father. Plaintiffs alleged that the defendant lawn mower manufacturer failed to install a safety feature known as a no-mow-in-reverse feature which would prevent back-over injuries.

The accident occurred in Michigan, where the injured boy and his parents resided and where his father purchased the riding mower at the defendant's retail store. The defendant was headquartered in Illinois but was incorporated in New York.

The Townsend court first evaluated whether the laws of Illinois and Michigan were actually in conflict, as if they were not then no choice of law decision would need to be made, and Illinois law would apply to all aspects of the litigation. The Townsend court found that significant differences existed between the laws of the two states. Michigan has no strict liability law, but Illinois does; Michigan allows no punitive damages, but Illinois does; and Michigan has caps on non-economic damages for products liability cases, but Illinois does not.

The Townsend court devoted extensive discussion to the methodology for a conflict of laws analysis as described in a law review article and textbooks on the subject. This may well have been because the Illinois Supreme Court had not spoken on conflict of laws for several years.

The Second Opinion. Interestingly, on the same day as the Townsend opinion was released, however, the Supreme Court also issued an opinion addressing conflict of laws in Barbara's Sales, Inc. v. Intel Corp., 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1698 (Nov. 29, 2007). The Townsend case cites to the Barbara's Sales opinion in a footnote; and the Barbara's Sales opinion cites to, and quotes from, the Townsend opinion.

The Barbara's Sales case involved a class action regarding the marketing of the Pentium 4 processor by Intel, whose principal place of business is in California. The court held that Illinois law governed the case and that class certification was improper. Key aspects of the decision were that a choice of law analysis should be undertaken only if it will be outcome-determinative; and that in the Illinois approach to choice of law analysis are the most significant relationship and lex loci delicti analysis; and that in doing this analysis the courts do not merely count contacts. As in Townsend, the court devoted extensive portions of the opinion to the principles set forth in the Restatement 2d of Conflict of Laws. (Note that the court had granted leave to the Conflict of Law Professors to file an amicus brief.)

Strategic Considerations. Prior to drafting an initial pleading (Complaint or Answer), counsel should consider whether another state's laws might be viewed to apply. Thus, the client can be informed upfront as to whether there are alternative forums, and whether it is likely that another state's laws will be applicable. Consultation with counsel in the other state could prove helpful to understand whether that state's laws are significantly different in key areas such as caps on damages and the availability of punitive damages, strict liability, and contributory negligence.

Arguing for Application of Illinois Law vs. Out-of-State Law. The Barbara's Sales court noted that generally, Illinois courts should not be burdened with applying another state's laws, in the absence of strong policy reasons and a strong connection to the case, and thus held Illinois law to apply. In contrast, the Townsend court made no mention of a concern for burden, and instead emphasized the strong preference for the site of the injury forum, unless the other state (in that case, Illinois) has a pivotal relationship with the case.

One advantage of this disparity between the two cases is that opposing arguments can be raised by citing to one of the two cases of the day. Neither the ease of application of the forum's own law nor the simplicity of the other state's laws should be overlooked in briefing a conflict or choice of law question. Similarly, the site of the injury and the forum's interest in the outcome should be considered, preferably with supporting affidavits, reports, or other writings.

Preparing for Conflict of Laws Analysis. The Restatement 2d of Conflict of Laws and the Illinois case law interpreting it do not specifically endorse a tallying of the factors to determine which state's laws should apply. Nonetheless, this can be inferred from the analysis of the Townsend and Barbara's Sales cases, where the Supreme Court ticked off the contacts of each state to reach a conclusion, in both cases deciding for the states whose contacts were most numerous. This was so even though the Barbara's Sales court denied that its approach was a mere counting of contacts.

Practical Application. Counsel are well advised to consult current law review texts and articles discussing the methodology and weight of factors before briefing motions involving disputes of choice of law. Although this is contrary to the usual approach to find precedential case law first and foremost, the Supreme Court's heavy reliance on law review articles and texts, in both cases, illustrates the importance of these sources in this particular area of law.

Still, research of case law throughout the state, and in federal courts as persuasive authority, can be helpful. The Townsend court cited to federal court cases in its analysis. The Fifth District case of Chochorowski v. Home Depot U.S.A., Inc., 376 Ill. App. 3d 167 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007) emphasized that one court's categorization of a factor (such as venue) as a substantive issue, and not a procedural issue, does not mean that this will be that factor's categorization in every case.

Chapman & Assocs. v. Kitzman, 302 Ill. App. 3d 780, 706 N.E.2d 1067 (5th Dist. 1999) describes that the most-significant-contacts approach must be undertaken along with an interest analysis to determine the significance of each factor. In Allianz Ins. Co. v. Guidant Corp., 869 N.E.2d 1049 (2d Dist. 2007), the Second District applied a conflict of laws analysis to a discovery dispute and concluded that Illinois law applied to determine whether sought-after materials were privileged as work-product or attorney-client materials.

It seems that a widely held preference is to apply the law of the state where the injury or transaction occurred. As such, attorneys are well-advised to comb through the factual circumstances to gather and document all such connections or lack thereof. It is also important to know the residence of all parties and witnesses, which can be requested in interrogatories, to establish the forum's connections with the relevant persons. For corporations or other entities, the principal place of business, state of incorporation, and location of various offices and facilities should be determined. Due to the relatively sparse case precedent, attorneys should be creative in gathering and presenting sources and methods to identify a state's interest in the issue and connections to the transaction or injury.

Cross References. See generally Parness, Illinois Civil Procedure § 1.06, Choosing the Applicable Substantive Law for Civil Actions in the Illinois Circuit Courts (LexisNexis); Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C6.01, Drafting a Complaint (LexisNexis).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the Illinois Civil Procedure LexisNexis Forms. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and civil practice case law developments.

196 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Grace V.B. Garcia on Coombes v. Florio, 450 Mass. 182 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1790

Grace V.B. Garcia on Coombes v. Florio, 450 Mass. 182 (2007)

By Grace V.B. Garcia

January 16, 2008

SUMMARY: In Coombes v. Florio, 450 Mass. 182 (2007), a strongly divided Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled that a doctor may be liable to someone other than his patient for harm caused by a doctors failure to warn his patient of the side-effects of treatment. The Court, in reversing the trial courts grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendant doctor, expanded the duty of care that doctors owe, extending it to all persons who are foreseeably put at risk by the doctors failure to warn. This decision expands the potential liability of doctors and opens up the doors to further litigation in this area. This commentary, written by Grace V.B. Garcia, explores the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Broadening of a Doctors Duty of Care

In Coombes v. Florio, 450 Mass. 182 (2007), a strongly divided Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled that a doctor may be liable to someone other than his patient for harm caused by a doctors failure to warn his patient of the side-effects of treatment. The Court, in reversing the trial courts grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendant doctor, expanded the duty of care that doctors owe, extending it to all persons who are foreseeably put at risk by the doctors failure to warn. This decision expands the potential liability of doctors and opens up the doors to further litigation in this area.

Background for the Courts Decision. On March 22, 2002, David Sacca, seventy-five years old, lost control of his vehicle when he lost consciousness causing him to strike and kill a pedestrian, Kevin Coombes. For three years prior to the accident, Dr. Roland Florio was Sacca's primary care physician. Prior to the accident, Sacca had been diagnosed with several serious medical conditions, requiring him to see Dr. Florio six or seven times a year. At the time of the accident Sacca had prescriptions for eight different medications, whose potential side effects included drowsiness, dizziness, lightheadedness, fainting, altered consciousness and sedation.

The last time Sacca saw Dr. Florio before the accident was on January 4, 2002, and Dr. Florio did not discuss the potential side effects of the medications or warn Sacca about driving. The evidence indicated that Sacca reported no problems with side effects or driving before the accident. Despite the lack of reported problems, the plaintiff, the administratrix of the estate of Coombes, sued Florio for negligence, alleging that Sacca lost control of his vehicle due to the side effects of the medication prescribed by Florio. The lower court granted the defendant summary judgment holding that the doctor did not owe a duty to care to anyone other than his patient. The administratrix appealed.

A Doctors Duty to Warn. In determining a duty of reasonable care, a court makes a determination by reference to existing social values and customs and appropriate social policy. Cremins v. Clancy, 415 Mass. 289, 292 (1993). In order to have any duty, however, the risk of harm needs to be reasonably foreseeable by the actor. For medical professionals, such as doctors, the Supreme Judicial Court has ruled that as part of a doctors duty of reasonable care, they are required to give appropriate warnings of a prescriptions potential side-effects to their patients. Cottam v. CVS Pharmacy, 436 Mass. 316, 321 (2002). When the potential side effects include those that can diminish capacity or state of consciousness, the warnings are meant to protect patients from foreseeable accidents, including automobile accidents.

In its decision in Coombes, with three of the six justices who heard the case joining in the opinion authored by Justice Ireland, the Court found that under common-law negligence Dr. Florio was negligent in prescribing medication to Sacca without giving him warnings of the potential side-effects and the duty to warn extended to Coombes because his injury was a foreseeable consequence of the negligence. Specifically, the Court found that [i]n the case of automobile accidents, it is clear that the foreseeable risk of injury is not limited to the patient. Although the plaintiff also made arguments to support her negligence claim based on an assumed duty of warning and a special relationship between a doctor and patient which extends to others who are foreseeably put at risk by the medical care provided, the Court found such argument inapplicable.

In determining that liability for failure to warn may extend to third-parties, the Court stated that it was not broadening the current duty. Rather, the Court based its decision in part on the fact that in cases outside the medical context it has extended a duty of care to third-parties when an accident is reasonably foreseeable. Coombes, 450 Mass. at 188. For example, in the case of an impaired driver, a risk of an accident is reasonably foreseeable. See e.g. Michnik-Ziberman v. Gordans Liquor, Inc., 390 Mass. 6, 7-8 (1983) (liquor store liable for injuries to cyclist struck by minor driver to whom alcohol had been sold). Additionally, the Court has also found liability to third-persons in some cases in which there is foreseeable criminal conduct. Carey v. New Yorker of Worcester, Inc., 355 Mass. 450, 454 (1969) (failure to remove known intoxicated trouble-maker from tavern, who previously had had to be removed by police, resulted in shooting of customer). Thus, the Court indicated that it was not stretching current law to hold that a physician owes a duty of reasonable care to everyone foreseeably put at risk by his failure to warn of the side effects of his treatment of a patient. Coombes, 450 Mass. at 190.

In evaluating the cost and benefits of such a duty, the Supreme Judicial Court found that public policy requires the duty it imposed on doctors and the cost of imposing the duty is limited, because tort law already imposes on a doctor a duty to warn a patient of the adverse side effects of medication. Coombes, 450 Mass. at 190. Thus, this decision, allegedly, places no further burden on physicians than that which they already have by current law. On the other hand, the benefits to the public, that is informing patients when risks of medication will impair them, is great.

Decisions in Other Jurisdictions. Massachusetts is not the only state to hold doctors to this duty of care. Hawaii, Maine, and Washington have also imposed a similar duty. See e.g. McKenzie v. Hawaii Permanente Med. Group, Inc., 98 Haw. 296, 307-309 (2002) (a logical reason exists to impose upon physician, for the benefit of third parties, a duty to advise their patients that a medication may affect the patients driving ability when such a duty would otherwise be owed to the patient); Joy v. Eastern Me. Med. Ctr., 529 A.2d 1364, 1366 (Me. 1987); Kaiser v. Suburban Transp. Sys., 398 P.2d 14 (Wash. 1965).

The duty imposed in Massachusetts, however, is a broader duty than those imposed by other states. For example, in Florida and New Mexico the courts have limited a doctors duty to warn patients of the side effects of drugs to only those drugs that were administered by the doctor, as opposed to simply those for which the doctor has given a prescription. See e.g. Cheeks v. Dorsey, 846 So. 2d 1169, 1173 (Fla. Dt. Ct. App. 2003); Lester v. Hall, 970 P.2d 590 (1998). Although Massachusetts acknowledged that some states have not gone as far in imposing a duty, it declined to make such a distinction. Coombes, 450 Mass. at 191.

Potential Side Effects of the Courts Decision. There are several potential side effects that the Coombes decision may have. The following are three possible consequences: First, the Coombes decision may create a larger class of plaintiffs who will now add physicians to their civil actions. In its decision, the Court declined to address the argument, but rather stated that it would leave it to the Legislature to impose limits on a physicians liability. Such a statement, however, will not prevent further costs to the legal system, and possibly physicians malpractice insurance rates.

Second, the decision creates great uncertainty as to which warnings, for which prescriptions, a physician must give his or her patient. The Court limited its decision by stating that its holding does not imply that a doctor must warn a patient of every possible side-effect under the sun. Rather, a doctor must warn of those side-effects that may cause his or her patient to have a reasonably foreseeable accident. By not setting clear boundaries on what side-effects doctors must warn of, but rather leaving it up to a jury to make a factual determination that will, in itself, give rise to further litigation, the Court opened the door to significant additional demands on the judicial system and costs to litigants.

Third, by allowing a third-party to assert claims, the Court increases the probability that the confidential communications between a patient and the physician will be breached during discovery. It is likely that the third-party will be entitled to discovery regarding the communications between the physician and the patient. This will violate the strong public policy that currently protects such conversations.

Considerations for Practitioners. Practitioners representing plaintiffs must be careful that if they choose to assert claims against doctors in cases in which they represent third parties, they do not assert medical malpractice claims, but rather negligence claims. For a malpractice claim, there must be a physician-patient relationship and the Coombes decision has not changed this. See 450 Mass. at 186. Furthermore, this case does not address any duty to third-parties that a doctor has in his or her decision as to what medications to prescribe. Rather, it addresses only a duty to warn of the side-effects of the medication. Thus, practitioners need to be careful not to overreach when asserting claims.

On the other hand, practitioners who represent physicians should argue that Coombes does not expand a physicians duty to warn, but rather the duty they have is the same duty they had prior to the Coombes case: a duty to warn of the foreseeable risks of prescriptions that the doctor may give the patient.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance:

Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

197 of 197 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Grace V.B. Garcia on Koe v. Mercer, 450 Mass. 97 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1791

Grace V.B. Garcia on Koe v. Mercer, 450 Mass. 97 (2007)

By Grace V.B. Garcia

January 16, 2008

SUMMARY: In affirming the trial courts grant of summary judgment for the defendant, and reversing the Appeals Court, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Koe v. Mercer reiterated the discovery rule for use in the calculations of the statute of limitations with regards to torts. The decision confirms the way in which statutes of limitations must be calculated and bolsters their importance to our legal system. This commentary, written by Grace V.B. Garcia, explores the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Discovery Rule Reiterated. In affirming the trial courts grant of summary judgment for the defendant, and reversing the Appeals Court, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Koe v. Mercer reiterated the discovery rule for use in the calculations of the statute of limitations with regards to torts. The decision confirms the way in which statutes of limitations must be calculated and bolsters their importance to our legal system.

Fact pattern of Koe. Plaintiff, born in 1968, alleges that he was sexually abused by a pastor in his church at an event in 1983. Shortly after the incident, the plaintiff told his parents who discussed it with the defendant, an elder of the church and a member of the church's council. Nothing further was done. Plaintiff claimed that in 1984 or 1985 he was again sexually abused by the same pastor on two other occasions. Approximately a year later, the plaintiff ran away and became homeless for several years.

In 1998, the plaintiff began therapy to help him cope with his emotional problems. On February 8, 1999, the plaintiff met with a psychiatrist, who noted that the plaintiff wanted help with his anger and [h]as had a history of sexual abuse by a pastor. Plaintiff filed his complaint on February 28, 2002, alleging negligence against the defendant for allowing a pastor to sexually abuse him. No claims were brought against the pastor who died several years earlier.

In his deposition taken during discovery, the plaintiff stated that by February 8, 1999 he knew that he had been sexually abused by the pastor, that the abuse had been wrong, and that his psychiatrist was able to help him contemplate a connection between the abuse and his emotional issues. Further, the plaintiff stated that on February 22, 1999, the psychiatrist suggested to him that his anger and depression could be related to the sexual abuse he experienced. Plaintiff continued with therapy and in a session with a social worker in March 2, 1999, the social worker claimed that the plaintiff was able to identify his emotional problems with the sexual abuse.

The defense filed a motion for summary judgment on the grounds that the applicable three-year statute of limitations had expired. In his opposition, in which he argued that he, himself, did not make the connections until March of 1999 or later, the plaintiff filed an affidavit of a psychologist who examined him. In the affidavit, the psychologist stated that the plaintiff had suffered post-traumatic stress disorder due to the sexual abuse and that the plaintiff's failure to make the connection between the abuse and his emotional problems prior to late 1999 or early 2000 was reasonable.

When does the cause of action accrue? Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 260, § 2A provides for a three-year statute of limitation period for tort actions. The statute specifically states that [a]ctions of tort . . . shall be commenced only within three years next after the cause of action accrues. See Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 260, § 2B. The statute does not define accrues; common law has determined that accrues means when the plaintiff is damaged as a result of the defendant's unlawful act or omission. Pagliuca v. Boston, 35 Mass. App. Ct. 820, 824 (1994).

The actual date a person is injured is not always easy to determine. Accordingly, the common law has developed the discovery rule. That rule holds that if the wrong is inherently unknowable at the time it actually takes place, the cause of action accrues when the plaintiff knows or should know that he has been injured. Riley v. Presnell, 409 Mass. 239, 245-48 (1991). The knowledge required to trigger the statute of limitations is not notice of every fact which must eventually be proved in support of the claim, but rather knowledge that an injury has occurred. White v. Peabody Constr. Co., 386 Mass. 121, 130 (1982). Thus, a potential plaintiff need not be aware of every fact that must be proved to prevail upon a claim before the statute of limitations period begins to run. Indeed, it is important to be aware that Massachusetts does not require discovery of each of the elements of the cause of action duty, breach, causation, and damages before the limitation clock . . . starts ticking. Krasnow v. Allen, 29 Mass. App. Ct. 562, 568-69 (1990) (citing Malapanis v. Shirazi, 21 Mass. App. Ct. 378, 382 (1986)).

Consequently, a cause of action accrues on the happening of an event likely to put the plaintiff on notice. White v. Peabody Constr. Co., 386 Mass. 121, 129-130 (1982). Whether an event is likely to put a plaintiff on notice is judged by an objective standard of a reasonable person. Doe v. Creighton, 439 Mass. 281, 284 (2003). Thus, [o]nce a plaintiff relies upon the discovery rule to argue that his claim was delayed due to an inability to recognize the cause of his injuries, he bears the burden of proving both an actual lack of causal knowledge and the objective reasonableness of that lack of knowledge. Koe, 450 Mass. at 101 (quoting Doe, 439 Mass. at 283).

What Is Reasonable? Whether a plaintiff's lack of knowledge is objectively reasonable is measured by the reasonable person standard. What is a reasonable person? There is no specific definition, although many factors can be considered. For instance, in sexual abuse cases, the factors that are used to determine whether a reasonable person in plaintiff's situation would realize the injuries were caused by the conduct of the defendant are normally the timing of the harm, meaning the person's age; whether the perpetrator attempted to disguise the harm; and whether the event can be considered a life-changing event. Important to note, however, is that [p]ersonal character traits, educational history and cultural backgrounds are usually immaterial in determining whether a lack of knowledge is objectively reasonable. Koe, 450 Mass. at 103. Thus, in arguing the reasonable person standard, one must look to the factors that are important to someone in the plaintiff's position, but not necessarily to the plaintiff's traits or characteristics.

How does the Discovery Rule apply? The discovery rule requires that before the three year statute of limitation period starts to run, two conditions must be met: (1) the plaintiff must have an awareness of his injuries and (2) the plaintiff must be aware that the defendant caused his injuries. Applying this rule, the Supreme Judicial Court in Koe noted that the plaintiff was aware of his injuries as he admitted to experiencing emotional problems in 1998. Hence, the Court concentrated on when the plaintiff, as a reasonable person, should have become aware of the connection between his emotional problems and alleged abuse.

The Court determined that by February 22, 1999, the plaintiff should have known of the causal link between the abuse and the harm. Although the Court acknowledged that it was on that date that plaintiffs psychiatrist made the connection between the sexual abuse and the plaintiffs emotional state, as opposed to the plaintiff himself making the connection, the Court stated that the discovery rule does not grant plaintiffs the option of ignoring connections once they have been made aware of them. Koe, 450 Mass. at 102 (quoting Bowen v. Eli Lilly & Co., 408 Mass. 204, 210 (1990)). Thus, in determining the running of the statute, it is irrelevant who makes the connection between the event and harm, only that the plaintiff has been informed, in some way, of that connection. Since Koe filed his complaint on February 28, 2002, more than three years after he should have know of the connection between his injuries and the defendants action, summary judgment was properly granted to the defendant.

Considerations for Practitioners. The calculation of the limitation period for torts is determined from the date that a reasonable person should have known of the causal connection between the alleged act and the harm. Although an issue of whether the plaintiff knew or should have known is often a question of fact for trial, in order to survive summary judgment, the plaintiff must demonstrate a reasonable expectation of proving that the claim is timely filed. Thus, if you represent a plaintiff, and you need to prove that a reasonable person would not have known of the causal connection before the date that the plaintiff made the connection and you may want to submit competent expert testimony or affidavits that focus on what a reasonable person should have known in the particular circumstances. Be aware, however, that you do not want the experts testimony or affidavit to focus on the plaintiffs ability to make the connection, but rather whether a reasonable person could or should have made the connection.

If, however, you represent the defendant, you want to argue that a reasonable person should have known of some connection between the alleged act and the harm, and to stress that the law does not required a person to fully comprehend the full consequences of the harm in order to start the clock ticking. Argue that some knowledge, as opposed to complete knowledge, will start the running of the statute of limitations period.

For additional discussion of statutes of limitations in Massachusetts, see 1-6 MA Pleading and Practice § 6.3 Computation of Time and Statutes of Limitation

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms.

Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

1 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Causes of Action in Medical Malpractice Cases

2010 Emerging Issues 4939

Sinclair and Harrison on Election of Causes of Action in Medical Malpractice Cases Under Virginia Law

By Kent Sinclair and Gessner Harrison

April 1, 2010

SUMMARY: Important holdings by the Supreme Court of Virginia in Centra Health, Inc. v. Mullins, 277 Va. 59 (2009) clarify the issue of precisely when the administrators of a decedent's estate must elect between a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim arising from the same negligent acts or omissions of healthcare providers. Related issues are also addressed. The impact of the holdings in this case is explored in this Commentary.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction: Virginia law recognizes that it is possible for the negligent acts or omissions of healthcare providers to give rise to two distinct causes of action when a patient dies. The first of these is a survival personal injury claim governed by Code §§ 8.01-25 and 8.01-56, which is based on the theory that the negligent acts or omissions of a healthcare provider caused a decedent to suffer personal injuries prior to death, but did not cause the decedent's death. The second is a wrongful death claim governed by Code § 8.01-50, which is based on the theory that the negligent acts or omissions of a healthcare provider caused a decedent's death. The damages recoverable under each theory are also distinct. Under a survival personal injury claim, damages are limited to pain, suffering, inconvenience, the effect on the decedent's health while he or she was still alive, and medical expenses. By contrast, in a wrongful death claim damages may be awarded pursuant to the statutes for the sorrow, mental anguish, and loss of solace suffered by the decedent's family members, expenses for the decedent's hospitalization incident to the injuries causing death, and funeral expenses.

Although it has long been the law in Virginia that recovery may be had under only one theory or the other, in the recent case of Centra Health v. Mullins, 277 Va. 59 (2009), the Supreme Court of Virginia resolved the issue of precisely when the administrators of a decedent's estate must elect between a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim arising from the same negligent acts or omissions of healthcare providers. In doing so, the Court also considered important related issues, including whether it is proper to employ multipart jury instructions and verdict forms providing for recovery on either theory and the availability of bifurcation to create separate trial phases for liability and damages. In addressing these issues, the Court provides valuable guidance as to the options available to pursue redress for acts of medical negligence and the means through which litigants can be assured of achieving just and fair results that provide damages only under one theory of recovery, if at all.

Background: In Centra Health, an 84-year-old patient was admitted to a hospital operated by Centra Health, Inc. for treatment of a broken hip. As a result of purported negligence by hospital staff in failing to remove a catheter as ordered and failure to recognize and report the development of a urinary tract infection, the patient was released after the hip repair surgery, but readmitted to the hospital the following day for treatment of the continuing urinary tract infection, which had progressed into sepsis, and he remained hospitalized until his death several days later. The administrators of his estate brought suit, asserting a claim for wrongful death and an alternate survival claim for the personal injuries sustained by the patient prior to his death as a result of the hospital's negligent treatment resulting in the urinary tract infection and its attendant complications. The defendant denied negligence and asserted an affirmative defense of intervening causation to the wrongful death claim.

At all stages of the proceeding - before and during trial - the hospital made motions requesting that the circuit court compel the administrators to elect between the survival and wrongful death causes of action. The trial court overruled these motions, and specifically instructed the jury on the alternative theories. A verdict form directed the jury to complete only one of the two sections, and the judge instructed the jury on how to indicate the absence of liability as well as the alternative liability options. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff on the survival claim only, setting damages at $325,000. After post-trial motions and a further hearing, the circuit court entered a final judgment on the jury's verdict awarding damages in accord with the verdict. The hospital appealed.

Legal Principles: In resolving the issue of the timing of an election between a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim as presented in Centra Health, the Court relied on the following well-established principles of Virginia law:

■ Statutory scheme. In Centra Health, the Court began its analysis by reviewing the "statutory scheme . . . concerning whether and under what circumstances the personal representative of a decedent can maintain concurrent causes of action seeking damages for both personal injuries suffered by the decedent under the survival statute and for the decedent's death arising from the same negligent acts or omissions under the wrongful death statute." In its analysis, the Court cited and quoted Code § 8.01-50, observing that this statute "governs actions for wrongful death of a decedent," providing specifically that "[w]henver the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or corporation . . . the person who, or corporation . . . which, would have been liable, if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action . . . notwithstanding the death of the person injured." The Court also quoted the relevant provisions of Code § 8.01-25, which "governs survival of causes of action that accrue during a decedent's lifetime."

■ Survival. Under Code § 8.01-25, "[e]very cause of action whether legal or equitable, which is cognizable in the Commonwealth of Virginia, shall survive . . . the death of the person in whose favor the cause of action existed." However, as the Supreme Court noted in Centra Health, Code § 8.01-25 also provides that "if the cause of action asserted by the decedent in his lifetime was for a personal injury and such decedent dies as a result of the injury complained of with a timely action for damages arising from such injury pending, the action shall be amended in accordance with the provisions of § 8.01-56." The Court further commented that Code § 8.01-56 "in part governs the maintenance of a pending personal injury action as a survival action following the death of the plaintiff." It then observed that under this statute, "when a person who has brought an action for personal injury dies pending the action, such action may be revived in the name of his personal representative" and that "[i]f death resulted from the injury for which the action was originally brought, a motion for judgment and other pleadings shall be amended so as to conform to an action under § 8.01-50, and the case proceeded with as if the action had been brought under such section." Importantly, the Court noted, Code § 8.01-56 specifically provides that "[i]n such cases, . . . there shall be but one recovery for the same injury." Summarizing the foregoing provisions, the Court, discussing its prior opinions in Lucas v. HCMF Corp., 238 Va. 446, 384 S.E.2d 92 (1989) and Brammer v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 107 Va. 206, 57 S.E. 593 (1907), explained that it had previously "recognized that under Code § 8.01-56 'there shall be but one recovery for the same injury' for which both personal injury and wrongful death actions might be brought by the plaintiff," and that "if the injuries cause death, the recovery must be sought under Code § 8.01-50, the wrongful death statute."

■ Prior case law requires election of remedies, but does not specify the timing of the election. After examining the interplay of Code §§ 8.01-25, 8.01-50, and 8.01-56, the Court examined its two prior decisions concerning the issue of when an election between a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim must be made. The Court began by observing that in Lucas, it had dealt with a situation in which a survival action brought by an administratrix against a nursing home had been dismissed with prejudice following her medical expert's testimony that the negligence of the nursing home's staff had "hastened" the decedent's death, even though the administratrix contended that she could "present evidence from another expert to establish an intervening cause of death" or that, alternatively, she should be "permitted to amend the pleadings and proceed on a claim for wrongful death." The Court had observed in Lucas that "under Code § 8.01-56 the administratrix could not recover on both a survival claim for personal injuries sustained by the decedent and for a claim of wrongful death if both the injuries and the death arose from the same negligent acts." However, in its recent decision in Centra Health the Court also emphasized that it had nevertheless held in Lucas that the administratrix "should have been permitted . . . to present further evidence that the decedent's death could have resulted from an intervening cause and then have 'the trier of fact . . . resolve [the] conflicting testimony.'" Even so, the Court quickly pointed out that on remand in Lucas, it had "expressed no opinion as to whether the administratrix should be permitted to join the two causes of action or whether and when the administratrix would be required to elect between them if she did so." Hendrix v. Daugherty, 249 Va. 540, 457 S.E.2d 71 (1995), had addressed the issue of election of remedies in the context of a legal malpractice claim brought against attorneys who had counseled their client to pursue only a wrongful death action on facts that also gave rise to a survival action. In Hendrix, the Court it had observed that "[t]he plain language contained in Code §§ 8.01-25 and -56 unequivocally mandates that a person may not recover for the same injury under the survival statute and the wrongful death statute" and that "[t]here can be but one recovery." As a result, the Court concluded in Hendrix that "the plaintiffs . . . as a matter of law, could not have recovered in the underlying tort action . . . on both theories of wrongful death and survival." However, the Court also acknowledged in Hendrix that, on remand, "at an appropriate time after discovery has been completed, the plaintiffs must be required to elect whether they will proceed against the defendant attorneys on the theory that the attorneys breached a duty owed to the plaintiffs in the prosecution of the wrongful death action or breached a duty owed to the plaintiffs in the prosecution of the survival action." In the recent Centra Health decision the Court ultimately observed that "[s]ince deciding Hendrix, [the Court has] not been afforded the opportunity to address further the circumstances that would constitute the 'appropriate time after discovery has been completed' at which a circuit court must require an election between a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim" and that it had not "specifically addressed whether there can be circumstances in which that 'appropriate time' might be after the trier of fact has resolved disputed issues of liability."

Key Issue #1: When is election between a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim required in a medical malpractice case?

In answering this question, the Supreme Court of Virginia relied heavily on its prior holdings in Lucas and Hendrix. The Court began by noting that in Lucas, it had "recognized that the plaintiff was not constrained to bring only a wrongful death action if causation was in doubt," that "[i]n choosing to file a personal injury action, [the plaintiff only] had to prove the elements of that claim to recover damages," and that the plaintiff was "entitled to the opportunity to prove those elements." The Court then acknowledged that it had held in Lucas that "had the plaintiff been permitted to introduce evidence in support of the survival claim, the trier of fact would have had to resolve conflicting testimony regarding the cause of the decedent's death." Significantly, the Court then concluded that "[t]he error of the circuit court in Lucas was that the [circuit] court essentially required an election by the plaintiff between the survival claim and a wrongful death claim before the contested causation issue was determined by the trier of fact." Continuing, the Court then turned to its decision in Hendrix, observing that "[i]mplicit in the direction in Hendrix that . . . an election [between a survival personal injury action and a wrongful death action] will occur 'at an appropriate time after discovery has been completed' is the understanding that the plaintiff ought not be compelled to make the election without a full opportunity to develop its case." Based on the foregoing, the Court explained that upon its review of the record, "it is evident that Centra Health vigorously contested that [the decedent] had suffered any compensable injury for which a survival claim could be successfully maintained and also that any act of Centra Health's employees had caused [the decedent's] death." The Court then emphasized that, notwithstanding Centra Health's contrary assertion, it "did not hold in Hendrix that a plaintiff would always be required to elect between remedies prior to trial." Instead, the Court noted that "the election is required only at a time when the record sufficiently establishes that the personal injuries and the death arose from the same cause."

As a result, the Court concluded in its most recent decision that "[i]n this particular case, . . . compelling an election would put the administrators in the untenable, and manifestly unjust, position of having to elect between two potentially viable claims, which Centra Health was contesting on separate and independent grounds" and that, "[u]nder those circumstances, there was no 'appropriate time' prior to trial at which compelling an election would not have prejudiced the administrators and, consequently, unfairly benefited Centra Health." Consequently, the Court held that "the circuit court did not err in denying Centra Health's motion to compel the administrators to elect between the survival and wrongful death claims" prior to trial.

Key Issue #2: What methods are available to prevent potential prejudice to a defendant healthcare provider arising from the possibility that a jury could conflate the different elements of damages for a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim?

In Centra Health, the Court highlighted that it was "not unmindful" of the contention, advanced by the defendant, that "in permitting a plaintiff to present evidence in support of a survival claim and a wrongful death claim when the issue of causation is disputed, a defendant may be subject to potential prejudice by the possibility that in a jury trial the jury could conflate the differing elements of damages from each claim in rendering a single verdict." Nevertheless, the Court concluded that "a defendant can obviate this potential for prejudice by requesting that the trial be bifurcated into separate proceedings to determine liability and damages." Drawing on its prior observation regarding the discretion vested in trial courts regarding the bifurcation of proceedings made in Allstate Ins. Co. v. Wade, 265 Va. 383, 579 S.E.2d 180 (2003), the Court explained that in its view, "in a case where there is any doubt as to when compelling an election would be proper, bifurcation is the most practical means to assure that each party receives a fair opportunity to present their case to the jury without prejudice to the other."

Key Issue #3: Were the jury instructions and verdict forms improper in that they permitted the jury, in awarding damages on the survival claim, to consider evidence relevant only to the claim for damages for wrongful death?

The Court answered this question in the negative in Centra Health.

The Court began its analysis of this issue by reciting a detailed description of the instructions and verdict forms provided to the jury:

The circuit court granted instructions proffered by the administrators that directed the jury to first consider whether Centra Health, through its employees, had been negligent in failing to provide an appropriate standard of care to [the decedent] and, if so, whether that "negligence was a proximate cause of injury or death to [the decedent]." In Instruction No. 16, which it later referred to as "the wrongful death damages [instruction]," the court advised the jury as to the evidence it could consider in awarding damages for wrongful death including "the sorrow, mental anguish, and loss of solace suffered by" [the decedent's] family, expenses for his hospitalization incident to the injuries that resulted in his death, and funeral expenses. Similarly, in Instruction No. 17, "the survival damage[s] instruction," the court advised the jury that if it were to award damages for personal injuries to [the decedent] "that did not cause his death," it should only consider the effect of those injuries on [the decedent's] health, his pain, suffering and inconvenience, and the medical expenses he incurred as a result. Centra Health noted its objection to these instructions, but did not request a separate instruction expressly cautioning the jury that if it chose to award damages under one theory it should disregard the damages evidence relevant to the other cause of action.

After the circuit court read the two damages instructions to the jury, the court provided this additional guidance:

They [the two damages instructions] are effectively going to be mutually exclusive. If you decide to award damages, you can do it under one.

If you find negligence caused the death, you can do it under [the wrongful death damages instruction]. If you find it just caused the injury, you can do it under [the survival damages instruction], but you can't do both. You've got to choose. That's a jury issue for [you] to resolve, and you have to determine one or the other.

That will become apparent on the verdict form, but you don't award either unless you find for the plaintiffs and that the defendant was negligent.

The jury was given a multi-part verdict form, prepared by the administrators, that provided for alternative verdicts on either wrongful death or the survival personal injury claims. The verdict form directed the jury to complete only one of the two sections, the first of which permitted the jury to make individual awards to [the decedent's] widow and children as well as awards for medical and funeral expenses, while the second directed the jury to award damages in accord with the instruction for the personal injury survival claim. Each part also permitted the jury to render a verdict for Centra Health. The verdict form expressly referenced the two instructions detailing the source of damages for each claim.

. . . .

The circuit court gave the jury the following guidance with respect to its consideration of the verdict and how to render its decision on the verdict form:

[W]e have a verdict form and it's a little more complicated than the normal civil case because it has a Part A and Part B to it.

The Part A part is involving the wrongful death, and the Part B is what we call a survival action or injuries before [the decedent] died.

The jury . . . has got to decide whether or not there is any negligence, violation of [the] standard of care. And if that standard of care was violated, did it cause [the decedent's] injury or did it cause his death.

The circuit court then directed that if the jury found that Centra Health was not liable for either [the decedent's] death or any injury to him, it could indicate this by rendering its verdict for Centra Health under either of the two parts of the verdict form. The court further instructed that if the jury "decide[d] that the hospital is responsible, through its nurses, for the wrongful death of [the decedent]," it was to apportion the damages for the wrongful death among his survivors and to award damages for the medical and funeral expenses on the "wrongful death" part of the verdict form. If, however, the jury found that Centra Health had been negligent in its care of [the decedent], but "his death wasn't the result of any negligence or causation of the hospital nurse[s]," the jury should award damages under the "survival action" part of the form.

When the jury returned its verdict, consistent with the instructions on the verdict form and the directions of the circuit court, it rendered a verdict only on one of the two claims. In reading the verdict, the circuit court noted, "On Part A [the wrongful death claim] there is no verdict. Part B [the survival personal injury claim], we the jury, on the issues joined, instruction number 17, find the verdict in favor of the plaintiff and set his damages at [$]325,000.

Following this detailed recitation of the instructions and verdict forms provided to the jury, the Court addressed the healthcare provider's contention that in returning the $325,000 verdict on the survival personal injury claim, "the jury must have misunderstood or misapplied the . . . instructions with regard to the determination of damages for the survival claim and improperly considered evidence that was relevant only to the damages for wrongful death." In doing so, the Court acknowledged that it had previously "recognized that when a personal representative is permitted to go forward with both a personal injury survival claim and a wrongful death claim, there is at least the potential that the jury could conflate the differing elements of damage in rendering the single verdict." Ultimately, however, the Court determined that it was "not persuaded that the jury's verdict reflects any confusion as to the law or undue sympathy based on the loss of solace evidence for the wrongful death claim that was not relevant to damages for the survival claim."

As background and support for this conclusion, the Court observed that "[t]he record shows that the circuit court was painstaking in its efforts to instruct the jury both in how it was to determine the liability, if any, of the defendant health care facility and then, based upon its determination, what quantum of damages could be assessed depending on whether that liability was for the wrongful death claim or for the survival claim." Continuing, the Court further observed that "[t]he law and its application were clearly detailed in the instructions, the court's further explanations, and in the verdict form." It then noted that, "[t]hough Centra Health might have requested a specific instruction expressly cautioning the jury to disregard evidence that was not relevant to the damages it might award, it did not do so," and further explained that "in any case such an instruction would have added little to the court's clear differentiation of the two causes of action in the other instructions." Finally, the Court, relying on its holding in Stump v. Doe, 250 Va. 57, 458 S.E.2d 279 (1995), explained that "[a] jury is presumed to follow the court's instructions" and that "an appellant who challenges a verdict bears the burden of rebutting that presumption." The Court then concluded that "[i]n this case, there is no indication that the jury failed to follow the court's instructions and nothing express in the record to rebut the presumption that the jury did not do so." Ultimately, the Court held that "in consideration of the fact that the jury's verdict reflects a clear understanding that the administrators were entitled to recover only for the survival claim if Centra Health was found to be negligent, but not liable for [the decedent's] death," the award was "adequately supported by the record."

Importance of Rulings: Centra Health is a pivotal case. The ruling unambiguously informs litigants in medical malpractice cases that under Virginia law, an election between a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim is not required until such time that "the record sufficiently establishes that the personal injuries and the death arose from the same cause." It eliminates any uncertainty on this point that existed as a result of the issues not reached in Lucas and Hendrix. Thus, in cases where the issue of causation remains contested throughout the trial, the ruling also clearly indicates that plaintiffs will be permitted to present evidence concerning both claims to the jury and that the jury will then be compelled to choose between three options: award nothing on either claim, award damages on the survival personal injury claim but not the wrongful death claim, or award damages on the wrongful death claim but not the survival personal injury claim.

In a broader procedural perspective, the ruling plainly presents bifurcation of a trial into separate liability and damages phases as an option that will permit healthcare providers to avoid the potential for prejudice arising from possible conflation of elements of damages awardable under each type of claim. Finally, the ruling also approves a set of written and oral instructions, as well as multipart verdict forms, that may be used in cases where bifurcation is not sought and both claims are presented to the jury for consideration because causation is contested. These rulings undoubtedly provide valuable guidance to practitioners in developing the optimal trial strategy for cases in which both a survival personal injury claim and a wrongful death claim may lie.

RELATED LINKS: Regarding wrongful death and survival actions generally, see

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 15: Wrongful Death;
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.02 (Negligence Actions for Personal Injuries);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.04 (Survival of Actions);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 25.05 (Wrongful Death);
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 26.23 (Survival of Actions);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.2 (Survival and Assignment of Causes of Action);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.11 (Wrongful Death Actions);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 3.7 (Election of Remedies Rules);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 5.11 (Actions for Wrongful Death);
- John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies, Section 17.07 (Medical Malpractice);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.2 (Survival and Assignment of Causes of Action);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.11 (Wrongful Death);

- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 3.7 (Election of Remedies Rules);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 5.11 (Actions for Wrongful Death)

Regarding medical malpractice generally, see

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 20: Medical Malpractice;
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 26.04 (Medical Malpractice)

Regarding damages recoverable for wrongful death, see

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 15: Wrongful Death;
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Section 23.07 (Damages- Wrongful Death);
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 2.11 (Wrongful Death);
- John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies, Section 17.07 (Medical Malpractice)

Regarding damages recoverable for personal injury

- Charles E. Friend, Personal Injury Law in Virginia, Chapter 13: Damages;
- Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice, Chapter 23: Damages;
- Kent Sinclair and Leigh B. Middleditch, Jr., Virginia Civil Procedure, Section 3.2 (Damages)

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Mr. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and loose-leaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management, and is the author of multiple law review articles on subjects including criminal appellate procedure, constitutional law, crime victim's rights legislation, and environmental law. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

2 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Davis v. American Optical Co.

2009 Emerging Issues 3351

Is Your Share Fair? Good-Faith Analysis of a High Settlement. Brazas on Davis v. American Optical Co.

By Susan Brazas

February 6, 2009

SUMMARY: Is Your Share Fair? Good-Faith Analysis of a High Settlement. Recently the Fifth District Appellate Court evaluated a trial courts assessment of a settlement where the dollar amounts of the settlement were partly based on the procurement of releases of product liability claims. This commentary discusses the review of settlements--rarely addressed by the appellate courts--and their implications.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: FIFTH DISTRICT APPELLATE COURT UPHOLDS GOOD FAITH SETTLEMENT APPROVAL WHERE AGREEMENT BASED ON RELEASE OF PRODUCTS LIABILITY CLAIMS BY COAL MINERS.

In Davis v. American Optical Co., 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 1202 (Dec. 3, 2008), the Fifth District Appellate Court made an analysis of the trial courts approval of a settlement in good faith. Even though the two settling defendants had admittedly paid more than their pro rata share, the court found that this was done in order to procure a release from the non-settling defendant for contribution, relating to products liability claims for defective masks sold for use by coal miners who allegedly contracted black lung disease as a result.

In Davis, two corporate defendants settled with the plaintiffs, who claimed that the masks and respirators sold by the defendants were defective and thus failed to prevent the plaintiff coal miners from contracting black lung disease. The settling parties then sought a dismissal, with prejudice, of the complaint as to these settling defendants, and also a dismissal of all third-party claims for contribution filed by the non-settling defendants.

The Davis court interpreted the Contribution Act, 740 ILCS 100/2, as allowing the dismissal of third-party contribution claims filed by other parties, even those who were not party to the settlement. The Davis court reasoned that this would promote the two purposes of the Contribution Act: the encouragement of settlements and the equitable apportionment of damages among tortfeasors. The Davis court also found that the dismissal of third-party claims was also expressly and implicitly provided by the Act.

Recent Case Developments. There is no extensive body of case law on the issue of settlements. The most notable recent opinion was in Garley v. Columbia LaGrange Hospital, 377 Ill. App. 3d 678, 881 N.E.2d 370 (1st Dist. 2007). The appellate court in Garley held that 1) because its own previous order of reversal and remand was general, rather than limited to any specific parties, and consistent with the settlement agreement, the two defendant physicians remained parties for the purposes of the re-trial; and 2) collateral estoppel did not bar the plaintiff from re-litigating damages, including as to the two physicians who settled, upon re-trial, because there was no final judgment.

It should be noted that the standard of review for a good faith finding as to a settlement is abuse of discretion. Thus, the most effective time to object to a settlements approval is in the trial court, including via a motion to reconsider.

Strategic Considerations. The Davis court noted that it could not evaluate the dollar amount of the settlements, in that the two Exhibits wherein the dollar amounts were documented were, by agreement, confidential, and thus were not part of the record. The court noted that it was the appellants burden to have a complete record, citing Haudrich v. Howmedica, Inc., 169 Ill. 2d 525, 546-47 (1996). Thus, even where certain documents are deemed confidential and/or are sealed, counsel would be well-advised to have the confidentiality waived for the purpose of the record on appeal. An alternative method would be to move the appellate court to supplement the record on appeal with specifically identified documents, pursuant to Supreme Court Rule; or to move the trial court to include any potentially important documents in the court file, so that they are present in the record on appeal.

Cautions When Approaching Settlement. Attorneys should be cautious to request set-offs as appropriate. This can be easily overlooked with the press of time during trial. As did the settling defendants in Davis, counsel should also be careful to preserve their causes of action as against potential third-part defendants, and should keep updated on the status of any lien, especially workers compensation liens.

CROSS REFERENCES: 740 ILCS 100/2; LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has written and lectured on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and developments in case law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

3 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Jackson v. Victory Memorial Hospital

2009 Emerging Issues 3354

Is It Time Yet? A New Twist on a Plaintiffs Right to Voluntarily Dismiss.

By Susan Brazas

February 6, 2009

SUMMARY: The 2nd Dist. Ct. re-visited the issue addressed by the 4th Dist. and abruptly reversed by the IL Sup. Ct. on the perils of voluntary dismissals. In Jackson, the 2nd Dist. breathed new life into a plaintiffs medical malpractice complaint which had been several years in the drafting. The unique approach to the time deadline for a 2-622 report and the applicability of res judicata to a voluntary dismissal make for surprising reading.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: SECOND DISTRICT APPELLATE COURT HOLDS THAT NO DECLARATION AS TO PRIOR VOLUNTARY DISMISSALS REQUIRED FOR A MEDICAL MALPRACTICE PLAINTIFF.

In Jackson v. Victory Memorial Hospital, 2008 Ill. App. LEXIS 1198 (Dec. 2, 2008), the Second District Appellate Court tackled the thorny issue of the ramifications of a plaintiff's voluntary dismissal in the face of difficulties obtaining a Section 2-622 reviewing physician's report. This is the first Appellate Court decision commenting on last year's important Illinois Supreme Court decision of O'Casek v. Children's Home & Aid Society of Illinois, 229 Ill. 2d 421, 892 N.E.2d 994 (2008). It is also one of the first Appellate Court decisions applying the Illinois Supreme Court's decision on the topic of res judicata in the context of voluntary dismissals, Hudson v. City of Chicago, 228 Ill. 2d 462, 467 (2008).

In Hudson v. City of Chicago, the Illinois Supreme Court had addressed the interplay of the voluntary dismissal statute and the doctrine of res judicata. The Hudson Court found that the plaintiff's re-filed action was barred by res judicata, because plaintiff could have, but did not, pursue his case to conclusion in the trial court after one count of his original action was involuntarily dismissed with prejudice.

The Jackson v. Victory Hospital court held that the requirement that a plaintiff make a written declaration of having made no prior voluntary dismissals was inapplicable to the plaintiff's subsequently-filed complaint, because that complaint was filed after the passage of a revised version of the statutory provision which contained no such declaration requirement. The Jackson court also held that the principle of res judicata is inapplicable to render a plaintiff's voluntary dismissal--which is a non-final order--a final order. In practical terms, this meant that the plaintiff was not barred, by res judicata, from filing a complaint after having voluntarily dismissed a complaint after the court had granted a Section 2-615 motion to dismiss.

Practical Implications. The balancing act of a decision whether to voluntarily dismiss has perplexed attorneys, especially in recent years with the uncertainties of case law less than clear as to the ramifications of a voluntary dismissal. It is especially critical to keep abreast of the ever-changing landscape of case law on the subject of voluntary dismissals and of related issues such as notice and service.

Recent Related Case Law. Over the past year, several key decisions have addressed a plaintiff's rights to voluntarily dismiss and to re-file within one year. In its Case v. Galesburg decision, 227 Ill. 2d 207, 880 N.E.2d 171 (2007), the Supreme Court held that the one-year window of time, set forth in Section 13-217 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within which a voluntarily dismissed complaint may be re-filed is an absolute right and which must be protected. The Case court held, as did the Hatchett court, that the window of time between a voluntary dismissal and a re-filing must not be considered in assessing whether there was diligence in service under Supreme Court Rule 103(b).

More recently, the Illinois Supreme Court has addressed the evolving question of whether the legislative amendments to Section 2-622, passed after the Best v. Taylor Machine Works, 179 Ill. 2d 367, 689 N.E.2d 1057 decision, re-enacted the pre-Best version of Section 2-622. O'Casek v. Children's Home & Aid Society, 229 Ill. 2d 421, 892 N.E.2d 994 (2008).

Critical to the O'Casek opinion was its overruling to the recent Fourth District cases of Cargill v. Czelatdko, 353 Ill. App. 3d 654, 818 N.E.2d 898 (4th Dist. 2004) and Crull v. Sriratana, 376 Ill. App. 3d 803, 878 N.E.2d 753 (4th Dist. 2007). The Cargill court had found that the 1998 legislative amendments to Section 2-622 which became effective following the Supreme Court's landmark decision in Best reenacted the procedural requirements of Section 2-622 requiring identification of the 2-622 reviewer, and requiring an affidavit that no prior voluntary dismissal has been taken. The Crull court held that the 2-622 reviewer must be licensed and identified or dismissal with prejudice could result.

The Fifth District had addressed one aspect of diligence as applied to notice of a voluntary dismissal in Smith v. Bartley, 364 Ill. App. 3d 725, 847 N.E.2d 642 (5th Dist. 2006). In Smith, the court found that notice of a voluntary dismissal need be provided to only those parties (or their counsel) who have actually appeared in the action. The Smith court proclaimed a plaintiff's right to voluntarily dismiss within one year as virtually unfettered, so long as the requirements of 735 ILCS 5/2-1009(a) are met. The Jackson court's decision gives new hope to the attorney contemplating a voluntary dismissal because of difficulties obtaining the necessary 2-622 report that there will still be a one-year window of time to muster the necessary information and support.

CROSS REFERENCES: 735 ILCS 5/2-615; 5/2-619; 5/2-622; 5/2-1009; LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts, at the trial and appellate level, in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has written and lectured on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and developments in case law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

4 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Hanson-Suminski v. Rohrman Midwest Motors, Inc.

2009 Emerging Issues 3355

Be Careful What You Wish For: Consumer Fraud Act Claims Beware. Brazas on Hanson-Suminski v. Rohrman Midwest Motors, Inc.

By Susan Brazas

February 6, 2009

SUMMARY: Recently the Illinois Supreme Court continued its recent trend of review of cases under the Illinois Consumer Fraud Act. Although Illinois is not known as an extremely consumer-friendly state compared to some, in the recent case of Hanson-Suminski, the Illinois Supreme Court scrutinized the statements of a salesman of used vehicles and gave teeth to the Consumer Fraud Acts prohibition against deceptive statements by sellers.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: FIRST DISTRICT AFFIRMS JURY VERDICT AGAINST USED CAR SELLER FOR STATEMENTS CLAIMING LACK OF KNOWLEDGE OF PRIOR CRASHES.

In Hanson-Suminski v. Rohrman Midwest Motors, Inc., 898 N.E.2d 194, 325 Ill. Dec. 461 (Nov. 7, 2008), the First District Appellate Court affirmed a jury's verdict and the trial court's judgment on a case filed on theories of common-law fraud and the Illinois Consumer Fraud Act, found at 815 ILCS 505/1 et seq. The Court declined to adopt the defendant car sales company's reasoning that allowing both a jury verdict and the trial court's judgment wrongly provided the plaintiff with a double recovery. Instead, the Appellate Court pointed out, the plaintiff was not being given a double recovery, but instead the judgment would be taken against the amount of the jury verdict.

Similarly, the First District disagreed with the defendant's argument that to allow the case to proceed under both a common-law fraud theory and a statutory basis under the Consumer Fraud Act was error under the doctrine of election of remedies. The Court also found that the jury's verdict was not against the weight of the evidence, and found that the court's judgment was not clearly erroneous. Lastly, the Court remanded the case to the trial court so that the plaintiff could petition for fees associated with defending herself in the appellate court, as she remained the prevailing party.

Practical Implications. Many an attorney wrestles with the decision of just how much argument to include in a post-trial motion. Even though in some instances the less is more approach is the best course, in this area extreme caution must be exercised. Specifically, the Hanson-Suminski Court found that it was not enough that the defendant had raised various points of argument during briefing in the trial court, but that instead a single post-trial motion, addressing all issues to be raised on appeal, was required, pursuant to 735 ILCS 5/2-1202(b) and Illinois Supreme Court Rule 366(b)(2)(iii). Thus, attorneys need to fully advise their clients that the preserving of issues on appeal via post-trial motions with be a critical yet time-consuming and labor-intensive process.

Another recent Illinois Supreme Court case which contains a thorough analysis of the Consumer Fraud Act and its implications is Imperial Apparel, Ltd. v. Cosmos Designer Direct, Inc., 227 Ill. 2d 381, 882 N.E.2d 1011 (2008). Note that the Consumer Fraud Act creates a broader scope of liability than does common-law fraud, and under the former theory plaintiffs need not prove all elements of a common-law fraud claim. This can be potentially more advantageous for a plaintiff, depending on the circumstances.

Strategic Considerations. This holding illustrates the real risk posed to attorneys who bring an appeal of a Consumer Fraud Act case. If the opposing party was the prevailing party at trial and, upon the appellate court reaching its decision, remains the prevailing party, then that party may petition the court for its attorneys fees. In the Hanson-Suminski case, the court allowed the plaintiff to file a supplemental petition for fees upon remand, citing Check v. Clifford Chrysler-Plymouth of Buffalo Grove, Inc., 342 Ill. App. 3d 150, 166 (2003). Thus, counsel are well advised to caution clients that even if the trial courts ruling seems erroneous, a significant risk remains that the appellant who does not prevail will have to pay a significant sum for the winning partys attorneys fees. In the Hanson-Suminski case, the plaintiff had been awarded just over $29,000 in attorneys fees. This amount was significantly less than the $7000 or so award against the defendant under the common-law fraud and statutory actions. Note that even though technically the trial court must first make a threshold finding of bad faith by the party filing the appeal, Krautsack v. Anderson, 223 Ill. 2d 541, 861 N.E.2d 633 (2006), the Hanson-Suminski court makes no mention of this finding. Naturally, the attorney considering an appeal of a Consumer Fraud Act action will want to evaluate carefully the merits and problems of the case before proceeding to appeal.

CROSS REFERENCES: 735 ILCS 5/2-1202(b); Illinois Supreme Court Rule 366(b)(2)(iii); LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has written and lectured on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and developments in case law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

5 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Ready v. United/Goedecke Services

2009 Emerging Issues 3356

Whose Fault is it, Anyway? A Look at the Contribution Act in the Context of a Partial Settlement. Brazas on Ready v. United/Goedecke Services

By Susan Brazas

February 6, 2009

SUMMARY: Recently the Illinois Supreme Court addressed the issue of whether the fault of non-settling defendants is to be apportioned when one or more defendants remain in a case at trial. In the case of Ready v. United/Goedecke Services, the Court clarified the apportionment question by a thorough analysis of the Illinois Contribution Act.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT HOLDS THAT JURY VERDICT FORM WILL NOT INCLUDE APPORTIONMENT OF FAULT OF SETTLING DEFENDANTS.

In Ready v. United/Goedecke Services, 2008 Ill. LEXIS 1439, No. 103474 (Nov. 25, 2008) the Illinois Supreme Court interpreted the Illinois Contribution Act for the first time since its decision of five years prior in Board of Trustees v. Coopers & Lybrand, 208 Ill. 2d 259, 803 N.E.2d 460 (2003). In Coopers & Lybrand, the Court reversed the appellate court in concluding that the harm was indivisible and therefore could not be divided into portions, separately attributable to each defendant. Because the damages claimed against the defendants were exactly the same as, and indivisible, the defendant remaining in the case at trial was entitled to a setoff in the full amount of the settlement of the other defendant.

The Ready Court identified the central issue of its analysis as whether those defendants who have settled are defendants sued by the plaintiff within the meaning of the Illinois Contribution Act, 735 ILCS 5/2-1117. The opinion includes a painstakingly comprehensive analysis of the language, context, and history of the Contribution Act. The plurality opinion also acknowledges, in a strikingly unusual way, the vastly different conclusion as to the crucial statutory language among members of its own Court. The Ready Court concluded that the statutory language of Section 2-1117 is ambiguous. The bottom line key holding of Ready is: We hold that section 2-1117 does not apply to good-faith settling tortfeasors who have been dismissed from the lawsuit.

Practical Implications. This opinion underscores the importance of obtaining a good-faith finding whenever reaching a settlement. This should be done by filing a Motion for Good-Faith Finding and to Approve Settlement, and all parties should be given notice of the hearing and of the Motion.

If the settlement is an unconventional one as was discussed in the recent case of Davis v. American Optical Co., No. 5-07-0385 (5th Dist. Dec. 3, 2008), then a good-faith finding is especially critical. However, the Ready holding puts pressure on the plaintiffs attorney to make a careful analysis of a proposed settlement, knowing that each setoff will reduce the bottom line total amount which the plaintiff will receive. Thus, when getting the clients authority to settle, both plaintiff and defense counsel should factor in the holding of Ready before giving the client the take-home figure for various settlement

Strategic Considerations. The attorney considering settlement should be careful to gather complete information about all possible deductions from a settlement or verdict before making the final decision of whether to settle or proceed to trial. Among the considerations, for those inclined to proceed to trial, is the importance of fully informing the client of the risk of an unexpected verdict dependent on whether co-defendants settle. A lone defendant could end up bearing the brunt of a verdict if all other defendants have settled, as there will be no opportunity to put before the jury information about the conduct or potential liability of the settling defendants. Such issues will undoubtedly be the subject of motions in limine, as was the case for the Ready litigation. Obtaining the courts rulings on such key issues in advance of trial, when possible, will aid the attorney and client in making the important decision of whether to settle or proceed to trial.

Cautions for a Complete Record. The Ready Court opinion gives pause to counsel as to the importance of including all documents remotely related to the issues and arguments. In particular, the Ready Court noted that it was unable to analyze whether the appellate court erred in applying the doctrine of procedural default, because the defendant failed to file in the Supreme Court the appellate court briefs pursuant to Illinois Supreme Court Rule 318(c).

Thus, counsel cannot assume that the Illinois Supreme Court has at hand the appellate court briefs filed by the parties; instead, any pertinent briefs must be affirmatively brought to the Supreme Court by a party filing them there, per Rule 318 (c). Further, the Ready court cautions against a party giving short shrift to an issue by addressing it only in a summary ending portion of a brief. Instead, all issues should be explored, with reasons and citations, in the argument portion of the briefs, pursuant to Illinois Supreme Court Rule 341(h)(7). Counsel should thus be cautious to address, within the substantive portion of any appellate brief, all potential issues.

CROSS REFERENCES: 735 ILCS 5/2-1117, 2-1118; Ill. S. Ct. R. 314, 371; LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has written and lectured on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and developments in case law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

6 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ohio: Flying High With ESI

2009 Emerging Issues 3254

David P. Pierce on Electronically Stored Information -- Ohio: Flying High with ESI.

By David Pierce

January 5, 2009

SUMMARY: This Emerging Issues Analysis summarizes the legal developments in Ohio related to electronically stored information ("ESI") or "electronic discovery", as it is called in Ohio state courts. This commentary emphasizes Ohio state law in this emerging area, referencing federal precedent as necessary to guide state practice, and treats ESI evidentiary issues and new substantive claims that merit the practitioners attention.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: What is ESI, and why should Ohio lawyers care? Ohio's Rules of Civil Procedure recently were amended to create a framework for discovery involving electronically stored information (ESI). Revised Rules 16, 26, 33, 34, 36, 37, and 45 apply to all cases pending on or filed on or after July 1, 2008, with the usual exception for unfair or impracticable application to pending cases per Ohio R. Civ. P. 86 (EE). As a general proposition, Ohio's new rules largely adopt the changes made in the 2006 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Ohio lawyers who do not practice in federal court (or federal court practitioners who have avoided ESI issues) have the opportunity and obligation to familiarize themselves with the new rules and the special issues involved in dealing with ESI. This commentary will describe ESI, identify some of the challenges in managing ESI, summarize the changes to the rules, and address some emerging ESI trends and issues.

What is ESI?

Electronically stored information generically describes all information created, modified, transmitted, and stored in digital form, thereby requiring a computer (or other hardware) and software to access and use it. Revised Rule 34 includes a non-exhaustive definition that includes writings, drawings, graphs, charts, photographs, sound recordings, images, and other data or data compilations stored in any medium from which information can be obtained. Conceptually, ESI is information that we all interact with every day when using electronic devices like computers and cell phones.

Why is ESI different from other discoverable information?

ESI's ethereal nature diverges from conventional discovery materials in terms of quantity, form, and cost. Presently, approximately 93% of all documents are created electronically. Redgrave, Jonathan M., The Sedona Principles: Best Practices, Recommendations & Principles for Addressing Electronic Document Production. Annotated Version. BNA Books (2007). Stand alone desktop and laptop computers commonly hold multiple gigabytes of information. Each gigabyte is equal to upwards of 500,000 pages. Larger organizations commonly store terabytes of information; a single terabyte equals approximately five hundred million typed pages. Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedures of the Judicial Conference of the United States, Report of the Civil Rules Advisory Committee, at 3 (Washington, DC August 2004). Given the abundance and volume of ESI, traditional means of preservation and production such as reviewing each page of information before production, are often impractical if not impossible.

The difficulty of reviewing electronic information in advance of production is leading to new practices, including procedures for designating electronic records as privileged after producing them (see Ohio R. Civ. P. 16 (9), which invites the parties to establish such procedures). To illustrate, assume that an employer sues a former employee for breaching non-competition covenants and the employer requests a forensic image of the hard drive on the employee's new work computer. The parties can agree to allow a third-party service provider to image the hard drive, index it, and run certain searches for information. Before the search results are provided to the new employer, the employee and the employee's counsel receive the results from the service provider and have the opportunity to designate certain documents in the results as privileged. This paradigm diverges sharply from the tried and true method of collecting, reviewing, redacting, and producing paper, but provides for the exchange of truly massive quantities of information, while still preventing waiver of privilege.

In addition to the challenges attendant to the fast growing volume of ESI, the form that ESI can take also leads to special challenges. ESI includes far more than conventional documents like letters, reports, or memoranda and e-mails; it goes beyond mere paper copies of such documents. Some forms of ESI leave little or no paper trail. One example is the creation of an airline e-ticket whereby no permanent record exists following the time the ticket is printed. Conference of Chief Justices. Guidelines for State Trial Courts Regarding Discovery of Electronically Stored Information, at vi. (August 2006). Richard Van Duizend Reporter.

ESI also includes metadata. Metadata is commonly described as data about data and is defined as a set of data that describes and gives information about other data. Scotts Co. LLC v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., No. 2:06-CV-899, 2007 U.S. Dist. Lexis 43005, at *11 n.2 (S.D. Ohio June 12, 2007) (citing Oxford English Dictionary).

Metadata is inherent to the interaction between computer programs and data files. Conceptually, among other things, metadata can be compared to a news report that accompanies every document, spreadsheet, or email on a computer. The metadata commonly answers the classic reporters questions: who, what, where, and when because it typically establishes when a document was created, by whom, and when it was last saved. But metadata news reports can provide much more information, including authenticity of a document, who modified the document, how they changed it, whether they explained the reason for their change, who reviewed the document, how many drafts were created, how much time it took to edit, when it was last accessed or opened, and other inside information. If you happen to have a document open while you are reviewing this article, you could click on the File pull-down menu, and select Properties to see some of your documents metadata. Some metadata can be modified by the user, and some cannot. In some cases, documents can be cleaned and metadata removed to deprive the person reviewing the file access to such inside information.

While some metadata is easy to view, other metadata is hidden or embedded. The Scotts Company, supra, at *11 n.2. Traditional document production (i.e. sending photocopies) will not reveal this metadata. While metadata is not specifically mentioned in the Ohio Rules of Civil Procedure or the corresponding federal rules, the federal rule drafters clearly contemplated that metadata was within the definition of ESI. Minutes of April 15-16, 2004, Civil Rules Advisory Committee Meeting, p.13, available at <http://www.uscourts.gov/rules/Minutes/CRAC0404.pdf>.

To illustrate the real life value of metadata, consider two examples of its possible use. First, in a trade secrets case, a former employee possesses information on his personal computer that is considered by his former employer to be trade secrets. The employer obtains the information in its native format by imaging the employee's hard drive. The metadata reveals that someone accessed the information after the employees separation from employment. The employees possession of the information and his possible interaction with the information revealed through metadata may be innocent or inadvertent, but the former employer is likely to attempt to use such information as evidence to demonstrate misappropriation of its trade secrets.

Second, in a case involving expert testimony, assume that the testifying experts files are produced electronically, including an electronic version of his report. The metadata reveals that the author of the report is a person who is not testifying, and who does not even work for the same firm. Further, the metadata reveals that the report is based upon a template. The opposing party, with such information in hand, has advanced its ability to attack the witnesss credibility (i.e. the witness may be relying upon someone elses opinions and a form report) merely by obtaining and reviewing the metadata.

In addition to the substantial and growing volume of ESI and the varied forms that ESI and metadata can take, a third major challenge associated with ESI is the cost of maintaining it and producing it. In one case, it was necessary to restore approximately 200 backup tapes as part of discovery. The cost to do so was estimated at $9.75 million and the court required the party seeking the information to pay for the production, except for the costs of screening the data for relevance and privilege. Rowe Entmt, Inc. v. William Morris Agency, Inc., 205 F.R.D. 421, 424-25 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). While Rowe is an extreme example, Ohios ESI provisions force practitioners to consider and question whether they and their clients are equipped to handle large scale ESI productions without the assistance of an outside vendor. See Oce Business Services Survey, available at http://www.obs-innovation.com/news_view.aspx?docid=165 (estimating 57% of law firms surveyed believe clients are not ready to meet E-discovery demands). While these vendors often facilitate more effective production and review of ESI, there is an added cost to the client associated with the use of any such consultant.

How have the rules changed?

The 2008 Ohio Amendments to the Rules of Civil Procedure lend a framework to the problem of managing ESI in litigation. Yet, the rules do not, and perhaps cannot, answer all questions that are likely to arise.

Rule 16, Pretrial Procedure:

Rule 16 now includes two additional topics for discussion at pretrials:

(8) The timing, methods of search and production, and the limitations, if any, to be applied to the discovery of documents and electronically stored information;

(9) The adoption of any agreements by the parties for asserting claims of privilege or for protecting designated materials after production;

Ohio R. Civ. P. 16. The rule is permissive rather than mandatory.

By way of comparison, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide for a mandatory discussion relating to the disclosure or discovery of electronically stored information at least 21 days prior to a scheduling conference or the time that a scheduling order is issued. Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 (f).

Some courts such as the Northern District of Ohio have even adopted local rules or orders concerning the preservation of such evidence. N.D. Ohio LR-Appendix K, Default Standard for Discovery of Electronically Stored Information. Best practices dictate that counsel should address with each other the preservation, search protocol, and production of ESI early on in the process and memorialize any such agreements in the form of a court order. Over time, Ohio courts are likely to adopt or modify local rules for ESI, and rules like the ones used in the Northern District of Ohio may serve as models.

Rule 26, General Provisions Governing Discovery:

Rule 26 has been amended to (a) include ESI within its descriptions of information that is subject to discovery requests, (b) regulate the burden of producing ESI, and (c) mitigate the effect of inadvertent production of privileged documents.

ESI, like other forms of discoverable information, need not be produced when the production imposes undue burden or expense. Ohio R. Civ. P. 26(B)(4). The party resisting production must show that the information is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or expense. Ohio R. Civ. P. 26(B)(4). Neither the Ohio Rules of Civil Procedure nor their federal counterpart specifically defines the term reasonably accessible.

The Federal Rules Advisory Committee noted certain particular problems that often lead to information not being reasonably accessible without undue burden or expense. Examples include database information that requires additional reprogramming to retrieve information stored on a medium that must be converted to another form before it is searched, deleted data that requires forensics to recover, and legacy data from obsolete systems. Federal Rules Advisory Committee Final Report, Standing Committee (2005), at 42.

In Zubulake v. UBS Warburg L.L.C., 217 F.R.D. 309, 321-322 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), the court listed three categories of information that are normally reasonably accessible. These categories were as follows: 1) active on-line data (i.e. hard drives); 2) near-line data (typically, robotic storage devices); and 3) off-line storage/archives (removable optical disks or magnetic tape media which can be labeled and stored in a shelf or rack). Conversely, the Court noted two additional categories that likely are not accessible: back-up tapes and fragmented or damaged data. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg L.L.C., 217 F.R.D. 309, 321-322 (S.D.N.Y. 2003).

The most recent paper published by the Sedona Conference on the topic of reasonable accessibility suggests that additional factors should be considered: transient complexity, hidden complexity, extraction complexity, preservation complexity, search complexity, and dispersion complexity. The Sedona Conference Commentary on Preservation, Management and Identification of Sources of Information that are Not Reasonably Accessible, at 12 (July 2008). Federal courts have already taken the lead in analyzing more than mere availability of data and considering the complexities of making data accessible, retrieving it, and reviewing it.

To illustrate, an individual tagged image format file (TIFF), which is essentially a picture, may be located on a file server that is easily accessed, but because the TIFF is not a searchable format, it is difficult to locate the document. The Sedona Conference Commentary on Preservation, Management and Identification of Sources of Information that are Not Reasonably Accessible, at 11 (July 2008). Cf. Goodbys Creek, LLC v. Arch Ins. Co., No. 3:07-CV-947-J-34HTS, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 79660, at *8 (M.D. Fla. Sep. 15, 2008) (requiring that documents which were produced as non-searchable TIFF files be produced in searchable format or that receiving party be given software to search the files); Connor Crowley, Digital Discovery & E-Evidence Report, dated November 1, 2007 (criticizing N.D. Ohio LR-Appendix K, Default Standard for Discovery of Electronically Stored Information for allowing production of non-searchable imaged files).

The practitioner is advised to learn about the various media that a client uses to store data as well as how difficult it would be to retrieve and search through ESI. If the information is difficult to retrieve solely due to a party's own unique proprietary system, this fact would seem to militate against a finding of inaccessibility. Another consideration is the number of different devices that need to be searched. In an appropriate case, courts may limit the search to groups of key employees or require that only a limited number of search terms or search software be used. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg, L.L.C., 217 F.R.D. 309, 324 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (court ordered sampling of 5 of 94 backup tapes to see if they contained relevant information). The sooner the lawyer understands these problems, the sooner they can be discussed with opposing counsel or brought before the court.

If court intervention is needed, the party requesting the information should be aware that the scope of discovery is more limited than in other contexts. The Staff Notes to Rule 26 make it clear that the Rule attempts to temper the virtually unlimited discovery traditionally authorized by Ohio Rule of Civil Procedure 26(B)(1). These potential problems associated with very broad discovery are particularly acute where ESI is involved.

Before the 2006 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, several different tests were used to determine who should bear the costs of producing ESI. These tests were explained by the court in Hagemeyer N. Am., Inc. v. Gateway Data Sciences Corp., 222 F.R.D. 594 (E.D. Wis. 2004). One test was a straightforward Cost Benefit Analysis. The theory underlying this test is that a party who wants discovery will pay fair value for it. A second test utilized by the courts was the Marginal Utility Test set forth in McPeck v. Ashcroft, 212 F.R.D. 33 (D.D.C. 2003). The theory behind this standard was that the more likely it is that the backup tape contains information that is relevant to a claim or defense, the fairer it is that the responding party search at its own expense.

Both of these tests contained inherent strengths and weaknesses. Therefore, a more sophisticated multi-factored test including eight factors was set forth by the court in Rowe Entmt, Inc. v. William Morris Agency, Inc., 205 F.R.D. 421, 429 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). The first Zubulake decision stated that the Rowe test was the gold standard at the time. Zubulake, 217 F.R.D. at 320. Sometimes, however, even the gold standard can be improved. Zubulake established a weight-ordered seven-factor test:

1. The extent to which the request is specifically tailored to discover relevant information;
2. The availability of such information from other sources;
3. The total cost of production, compared to the amount in controversy;
4. The total cost of production, compared to the resources available to each party;
5. The relative ability of each party to control costs and its incentive to do so;
6. The importance of the issues at stake in the litigation; and
7. The relative benefits to the parties of obtaining the information.

Zubulake, 217 F.R.D. at 321.

After a party resisting discovery has shown undue burden or expense, the requesting party may seek the information anyway for good cause. Ohio's Amended rule 26(B)(4) expressly incorporates several of the foregoing Zubulake factors for determining whether good cause exists as follows:

- whether the information is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative;
- whether the information sought can be obtained from a less costly source;
- whether the party seeking the discovery has had ample opportunity to obtain the discovery in the action; and
- whether the burden or expense of the proposed discovery outweighs the likely benefit.

In considering the last factor, the court can take into account other concepts at play in Zubulake such as the parties' resources and the amount in controversy. Further, the court has broad discretion in specifying the format, extent, timing, and allocation of expenses pertaining to the discovery. Thus, revised Rule 26(B)(4) encompasses two burden shifting tests: undue burden or expense to be established by the producing party versus good cause to be established by the requesting party. In addition to this burden shifting analysis, moreover, Rule 26 now includes a clawback provision to help deal with the problem of inadvertent production.

Lawyers producing ESI may struggle with the production of electronic media because they lack confidence that all privileged material has been removed prior to production. This phenomenon is a function of the volume of information to be produced and the time and expense required to review these materials.

The new clawback provision not only addresses the issue of inadvertent production of privileged documents in ESI, but also covers inadvertently produced conventional documents. According to the rule, a party receiving an inadvertently produced document must return, sequester, or destroy it after receiving notice from the producing party.

Ohio Rule Civ. P. 26 (B)(6)(b). This rule is consistent with new Ohio Rule of Professional Conduct 4.4(b) which requires a recipient who knows or reasonably should know that the document was inadvertently sent to promptly notify the sender of the same.

While such a clawback rule enables a party to regain possession of its materials, the remaining question is whether a subject matter waiver has occurred. In this regard, the new Ohio rule may not provide as much protection as the federal rules given the adoption of Federal Rule of Evidence 502. Pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 502, inadvertently producing a document does not operate as a waiver of the attorney-client or work product privilege provided that reasonable steps were taken to prevent disclosure and the holder of the privilege took reasonable steps to rectify the error. Reasonable steps include following Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 26(b)(5)(B).

RULE 34. Producing documents, electronically stored information, and tangible things, or entering onto land, for inspection and other purposes:

Rules 33 and 34 now include references to ESI. The primary change to Rule 33 provides the party answering interrogatories with the option to produce business records, and business records now include ESI by definition.

In addition to the clarified scope now embodied in Rule 34 (the inclusion of ESI), the revised rule potentially gives counsel more influence over the form of documents that will be received. The requesting party may specify the form or forms in which electronically stored information is to be produced, but may not require the production of information in more than one form. Ohio R. Civ. P. 34 (B). If a form is specified, then the responding party must produce it in that form unless a proper objection is made. Ohio R. Civ. P. 34 (B)(1). If no form is specified, the responding party has the option to produce ESI in the form that it is ordinarily maintained or in any form that is reasonably usable. Ohio R. Civ. P. 34 (B)(3). Rule 45 includes similar revisions.

The new procedure authorized by Rule 34 has important consequences for the practitioner. To begin with, before requesting ESI, the lawyer should, to the extent possible, become familiar with the each partys information systems, and how documents from such systems can be integrated with the practitioners own tools. Although the federal rules require a discussion between counsel in connection with a 26(f) conference, such a discussion in a state court case may have to be initiated informally with opposing counsel, either with or without technical representatives present. If an opposing corporate party is unwilling to engage in such informal discussions, a party should consider deposing a corporate technical representative in accordance with Ohio Rule 30(B)(5) before initiating written discovery requests.

Once the lawyer understands how an opposing party maintains its ESI, the lawyer can request the information in an appropriate form. The most potentially rich ESI is likely to be ESI in its native form. If the document to be produced was created using Microsoft Word, for example, then the native form would be the familiar *.doc form of the document.

Native documents are likely to have most of their metadata intact. Native documents are usually text-searchable, and may provide cut and paste ability. Further, native form usually consumes the least amount of hard drive space. To review native form documents, however, the recipient must have compatible software.

The responding party should consider objecting to requests to produce ESI in native form, especially if the requesting party has not agreed to produce its own documents in native form. Additionally, native form may not necessarily be locked to prevent changes by the recipient. Moreover, it is difficult to Bates stamp native form documents without interfering with document metadata. As a practical matter, when electronic documents become paper exhibits, it is difficult to make sure that everyone is working with the same file, and that the file is authentic.

If a requesting party fails to specify the form of the production at the outset, it may be difficult later on to attempt to obtain metadata or another form of production provided that the responding party identifies in advance the form in which it intends to produce the documents. See Scotts Co., supra, at *12-14. A party may produce documents in any form that is reasonably useable if the request for production does not specify the form. Common forms of production include portable document files (PDF) or TIFF files. A practitioner who uses a PDF can Bates stamp the file. Moreover, it is possible to create searchable PDF files.

Even if a searchable PDF file is created, such a file will not necessarily contain metadata (or at least not the original metadata). Therefore, the metadata will need to be extracted and produced separately if the parties agree to produce it or if the court orders such a production. At present, the Northern District of Ohio Default Standard requires a showing of particularized need for producing ESI in native format. N.D. Ohio LR-Appendix K, Default Standard for Discovery of Electronically Stored Information at 6.

Recent decisions have also declined to require the production of metadata. See, e.g.,

Mich. First Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Society, Inc., No. 05-74423, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84842, at *5 (E.D. Mich. Nov. 16, 2007); Ky Speedway LLC v. Nascar, No. 05-138 WOB, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92028, at *24 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 18, 2006); Williams v. Sprint/United Mgmt. Co., 230 F.R.D. 640, 651 (D. Kan. 2005) (stating emerging standards of electronic discovery appear to articulate a general presumption against the production of metadata).

While the trend in published decisions may appear somewhat hostile towards the production of metadata, the Sedona Conference has recently suggested that organizations evaluate the potential benefits of retaining metadata (whether or not it is produced) to ensure that documents are authentic and to preclude the fraudulent creation of evidence. See The Sedona Principles Second Edition (2007) at Comment 12 (B). This need for authenticity may lead courts to require the production of at least a limited number of fields of metadata.

In addition to disputes over the form of ESI to be produced, a party requesting discovery needs to consider whether it wants to obtain both active and residual ESI or just active ESI. Active ESI is can be defined as ESI kept in the ordinary course of business, while residual ESI can be defined in the discovery request to include deleted and overwritten files. Residual ESI is more expensive to produce and courts may be more likely to shift the costs of such a production to the requesting party. Likewise, some vendors suggest specifically requesting certain computer artifacts in a particular case. These artifacts can include Windows registry history showing all software and external hardware devices connected to the computer; Master File Tables identifying the file structure and folders on a computer; Internet History Files which will disclose the internet activities of individuals and link files which may show usage of files stored on external storage devices. Scott Roseland, Cyberinfo@cybercontrols.net E-mail bulletin dated 9/23/2008.

Rule 37. Failure to Make Discovery: Sanctions:

Ohio Rule of Civil Procedure 37 now provides that absent exceptional circumstances, a court may not impose sanctions on a party for losing electronically stored information as the result of a routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system. Ohio R. Civ. P. 37(F). The Rule lists 5 factors that a court may now consider in deciding whether to impose sanctions:

- Whether and when any obligation to preserve the information was triggered;
- Whether the information was lost as a result of the routine alteration or deletion of information that attends the ordinary use of the system in issue;
- Whether the party intervened in a timely fashion to prevent the loss of the information;
- Any steps taken to comply with any court order or party agreement requiring preservation of specific information;
- Any other relevant facts.

The best way to avoid a dispute as to whether the clients actions were routine or were in good faith is to become familiar with a clients information systems, document retention policy, and to make sure that an effective litigation hold is timely implemented.

The commentary to Rule 37 states that it does not displace existing law regarding preserving documents (a litigation hold). The obligation to preserve evidence arises when the party has notice that the evidence is relevant to litigation or when a party should have known that the evidence may be relevant to future litigation. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (quoted in Kemper Mortgage, Inc. v. Russell, No. 3:06-CV-042, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20729, at *3 (S.D. Ohio Apr. 18 2006). This duty often arises before suit or even before an administrative charge is filed and the cost of simply preserving ESI is the responsibility of the party who owns it. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, at *5-6 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). Litigation holds also are required in other settings like governmental investigations and audits. The Sedona Conference Guidelines at 44.

A party who fails to preserve documents can be subject to an independent claim for spoliation of evidence. In Ed Schmidt Pontiac-GMC Truck Inc. v. DaimlerChrysler Motors Co., 538 F. Supp.2d 1032, 1034-37 (N.D. Ohio 2008), the court allowed an amended complaint under Ohio law for spoliation of evidence due to allegation that a proper litigation hold was not in place after the complaint was filed and based upon allegations of intentional destruction of evidence by replacing computer hard drives.

Even in the case of a litigation hold, however, not all documents need to be retained. The failure to preserve evidence does not warrant sanctions when the missing evidence could not be relevant E.g., Hildreth Mfg. v. Semco, 151 Ohio App. 3d 693, 2003-Ohio-741 (Marion Cty. 2003) (failure to preserve hard drives did not warrant sanctions where there was no reasonable possibility that the missing hard drives contained evidence of the theft of trade secret information); Kemper, at *3; see also The Sedona Conference Commentary on Preservation, Management and Identification of Sources of Information that are Not Reasonably Accessible at 7 (July 2008) (proposing that ESI need not be preserved absent an agreement or court order unless there is a reasonable belief that it contains potentially relevant information that is likely to be discoverable).

In addition to spoliation claims, federal courts in Ohio have imposed significant sanctions against parties who fail to preserve documents. See, e.g., Ferron v. Search Cactus, L.L.C., No. 2:06-CV-327, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34599, at *10 (S.D. Ohio Apr. 28, 2008) (allowing defendant access to plaintiffs computer systems in part because plaintiff failed to fulfill his duty of preserving information because of pending or reasonably anticipated litigation); Grange Mut. Cas. Co. v. Mack, Nos. 07-5097/07-5387, 2008 U.S. App. LEXIS 6113, at * 11-12 (6th Cir. Mar. 17, 2008) (affirming default judgment for a variety of electronic and paper discovery abuses including changing office computers and refusing to turn over other computers).

In addition to making sure that the clients own documents are preserved, the lawyer should consider putting the opposing party on notice as soon as a dispute has arisen and advising the adverse party to institute its own litigation hold on ESI and relevant documents. Likewise, the lawyer should consider issuing a preservation subpoena to non-parties. Such a subpoena may be necessary when the non-party does not have notice of the litigation or there is a danger that a corporate party may destroy ESI by performing routine back-up procedures without notice of the suit. In re: Natl Century Fin. Enterprises, Inc., 347 F. Supp. 2d 538, 542 (S.D. Ohio 2004).

Conclusion. Given the rapidly evolving area of ESI and the uncertainty confronting lawyers on a variety of fronts, best practices dictate that counsel educate themselves about their own ESI management abilities as well as their clients capabilities and practices, and then promptly seek agreement regarding the scope and form of production, privilege review, and cost shifting. Such agreements can be memorialized in the form of a court order.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David P. Pierce is a shareholder at Coolidge Wall Co., L.P.A. in Dayton, Ohio where he focuses his practice on business and employment litigation. He has lectured to professional and business organizations on a wide variety of topics and teaches evidence and trial practice as an adjunct professor at the University of Dayton School of Law. He received his B.A. degree cum laude, from Vanderbilt University and J.D. degree from the University of Cincinnati. Mr. Pierce has served as President of the Carl D. Kessler Inn of Court and Chair of the Dayton Bar Associations Federal Practice Committee.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

7 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Transfer Venue: Lonny Hoffman on In re Volkswagen of America, Inc.

2009 Emerging Issues 3274

Transfer Venue: Lonny Hoffman on In re Volkswagen of America, Inc.

By Lonny Hoffman

January 1, 2009

SUMMARY: The Fifth Circuit in In re Volkswagen of America, Inc., 545 F.3d 304 (2008) found that a trial judge in the Eastern District of Texas abused his discretion in not transferring a case to the Northern District of Texas. Lonny Hoffman, George Butler Research Professor of Law at the University of Houston Law Center, in this Emerging Issues Analysis discusses why this cases will likely be a key precedent in future battles over venue.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Legal Background. A majority of the Fifth Circuit in an important en banc decision has found that a trial judge in the Eastern District of Texas abused his discretion in not transferring a case to the Northern District of Texas when the only basis for laying venue in the Eastern District was that the defendant was subject to jurisdiction there. Finding that the district judge abused his discretion in denying the defendant's request for transfer, the Fifth Circuit's decision in In re Volkswagen of America, Inc., No 07-40058, 545 F.3d 304 (5th Cir., Oct. 10, 2008) will likely be a key precedent in future battles over venue, not only for cases filed in the Eastern District of Texas but also for cases filed anywhere in the circuit in which transfer of venue is at issue. That's because the appellate court's opinion addressed both (i) the proper measure a federal district court should use in deciding a motion to transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1404 and (ii) the circumstances in which mandamus is appropriately exercised to review a district court's decision whether to grant transfer under the convenience transfer statute.

After a traffic accident that killed a seven-year old girl and seriously injured other passengers, suit was filed against Volkswagen AG and Volkswagen of America, Inc., in the Marshall Division of the Eastern District of Texas. Plaintiffs alleged that design defects in the car were the cause of the accident. Suit was properly laid in the Eastern District because Volkswagen was subject to jurisdiction in the Eastern District and, thus, venue was proper under 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a)(1). There were no other connection between the case and the Eastern District.

Volkswagen sought transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) to the Northern District of Texas, Dallas Division, but the trial judge denied the request. Volkswagen then sought a writ of mandamus, which an initial panel of the Fifth Circuit denied in a split opinion. Request for rehearing was successful and a second panel then reversed course, granting Volkswagen's petition and issuing a writ that directed the district court to transfer the case to Dallas. In re Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 506 F.3d 376 (5th Cir. 2007). Plaintiffs then filed a petition for rehearing en banc. In re Volkswagen of Am., Inc., 517 F.3d 785 (5th Cir. 2008).

District court's § 1404(a) ruling may be tested through mandamus, under limited circumstances. Writing for a majority of the Fifth Circuit, Judge Jolly first confirmed that mandamus is an appropriate means of testing a district court's § 1404(a) ruling, though he simultaneously emphasized that use of the writ should be quite limited. A writ should not issue to correct a mere 'abuse of discretion, but a writ is appropriate to correct a clear abuse of discretion,' he wrote. This distinction--between a mere 'and clear' abuse of discretion--may not susceptible to sharp definition in all cases, his opinion acknowledged. Nevertheless, In re Volkswagen makes clear that when a trial judge issues a patently erroneous ruling, 'mandamus is available.

Fifth Circuit finds clear abuse of discretion. How, then, did the district judge in this case reach a patently erroneous decision that amounted to a clear abuse of discretion? It seems that he set the bar too high. The judge had required Volkswagen to show that the § 1404(a) factors must substantially outweigh 'the plaintiffs' choice of venue. This was the proper standard, according to the district court, because the plaintiff's choice of venue is to be given a degree of weight in the § 1404 analysis. Thus, only if the balance of convenience and justice substantially weighs in favor of transfer should the plaintiff's choice of venue be trumped.

Plaintiff's choice of venue treated as burden of proof question. A majority of the Fifth Circuit concluded, however, that no special weight should be accorded to a plaintiff's choice of venue when there is no meaningful connection between it and the litigation. Instead, the plaintiff's choice of venue is to be treated as a burden of proof question rather than one of a presumption.' The court reached this conclusion by noting that the district court's standard may be right for forum non conveniens dismissals but is not the proper measure for transfers under § 1404. Because there was no meaningful factual connection with the Eastern District, and far greater connection to Dallas, the trial judge applied the wrong standard in deciding whether to grant transfer.

Thus, according to the majority, when it would not aid convenience to transfer, then it is appropriate to honor the plaintiff's choice of venue. However, when the transferee venue is clearly more convenient, a transfer should be granted. In this case, then, the district judge should have found that a transfer to the Northern District of Texas, Dallas Division, would be for the convenience of the parties and in the interests of justice. [It bears emphasizing here that the dissent sharply disagreed with this characterization of the litigation, noting that the plaintiffs' case involved design defect allegations and, thus, bore no greater connection to Dallas than to Marshall or to anywhere else in the state for that matter.]

Immediate impact on cases filed in Eastern District of Texas. The most immediate impact In re Volkswagen will have is on cases filed in the Eastern District of Texas that, like this one, have no obvious connection to the district other than that they are technically authorized by the general venue provisions in 28 U.S.C. § 1391. Thus, defendants who have been sued in the Eastern District and who seek a way out may find the Fifth Circuit's decision significantly aids their prospects of having transfer granted to another federal district court where suit might otherwise have been brought.

Case will stand as critical Fifth Circuit precedent. More broadly, In Re Volkswagen is likely going to be a critical precedent for cases filed throughout the circuit. The majority's decision seems to give a far greater role to the appellate courts to monitor transfer decisions by the district judge. Notably, this broader oversight role would appear applicable whether the trial judge denies the transfer request--as in In re Volkswagen--or grants it. To be sure, Judge Jolly emphasized that the writ is an extraordinary remedy and that appellate courts are not to replace a district court's exercise of discretion with [their] own.' Only clear abuses of discretion that produce patently erroneous results' are subject to hindsight review by a superior court.

Additional litigation burdens and delay are certain. Nevertheless, these cautionary words are not likely to provide much of a restraint for the party on the losing end of a transfer battle. The result is that what was once a decision largely left to the sound discretion of the trial judge is now likely going to be a much more heated battleground in the appellate courts. The majority's imprecise distinction between mere and clear abuses of discretion may or may not result in better determinations by an appellate court of what district constitutes the more convenient venue. It is certain to produce greater additional litigation burdens and delay, a point Judge King emphasized in dissent.

RELATED LINKS: For discussion of the weight to be accorded the plaintiff's original choice of venue

- Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.), § 111.13[1][c]

For discussion of mandamus review of transfer orders, see

- Moore's Federal Practice (3d ed.), § 111.61

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Lonny Hoffman is the George Butler Research Professor of Law at the University of Houston Law Center. He is a specialist on civil procedure in the federal and state courts, including class actions and other complex litigation. His full bio and cv may be found at <http://www.law.uh.edu/faculty/main.asp?PID=179>.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

8 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Attempts to Defeat the Statute of Frauds Defense in Virginia: Recent Cases

2008 Emerging Issues 3191

Attempts to Defeat the Statute of Frauds Defense in Virginia: Recent Cases Professor Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison discuss the Supreme Court of Virginia's Opinions in Moorman v. Blackstock, Inc., 276 Va. 64 (2008) and Delta Star, Inc. v. Michael's Carpet World, 276 Va. 524 (2008):

By Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

December 21, 2008

SUMMARY: Professor Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison examine recent attempts to defeat the Statute of Frauds defense in Virginia in light of the important Supreme Court of Virginia's opinions in Moorman v. Blackstock, Inc., 276 Va. 64 (2008) and Delta Star, Inc. v. Michael's Carpet World, 276 Va. 524 (2008).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Virginia, the contract-based statute of frauds defense is largely embodied in two statutes: Va. Code § 8.2-201, which is a part of the Uniform Commercial Code as it has been adopted in Virginia and which applies to a contract for the sale of goods for the price of $500 or more, and Va. Code § 11-2, the general statute of frauds, which embraces specific types of agreements traditionally recognized at common law and to which Va. Code § 8.2-201 does not otherwise apply. Both statutes require that a writing, signed by the party to be charged, exist in order for the agreement to be enforceable in an action brought in a Virginia court. However, a person desiring to avoid the bar to enforcement created by each statute can establish, using evidence of certain types of written communications relating to or concerning the agreement, that the bar to enforcement does not apply. Such a person could also establish that the bar to enforcement does not apply because the agreement has been partially performed. Finally, such a person could also attempt to show that, as a matter of equity, the party seeking to take advantage of the bar to enforcement is estopped from relying on the statute of frauds altogether. In two recent cases, Moorman v. Blackstock, 276 Va. 64 (2008) and Delta Star, Inc. v. Michael's Carpet World, 276 Va. 524 (2008), the Supreme Court of Virginia determined whether parties seeking to enforce agreements for the sale of real estate and for the sale of flooring materials, respectively, presented evidence sufficient to overcome the statute of frauds defenses asserted in each case, based upon, inter alia, evidence of written communications between the parties and evidence of part performance of the agreement. The Court also determined in one of these cases whether the party seeking to avail itself of the protection afforded by the statute of frauds was equitably estopped from asserting it as a defense. In reaching these determinations, the Court provides buyers, sellers, and their counsel valuable guidance concerning what evidence is considered insufficient to prevent the statute of frauds defense from being asserted, and what evidence is considered insufficient to overcome the defense. This Commentary examines the disputes that the Court resolved in these cases, highlights the principles of law that the Court relied upon to resolve each dispute, and discusses the impact of the holdings reached in each case.

Background.

Virginia Code Ann. § 8.2-201(1) states, in pertinent part, that Except as otherwise provided in this section a contract for the sale of goods for the price of $500 or more is not enforceable by way of action or defense unless there is some writing sufficient to indicate that a contract for sale has been made between the parties and signed by the party against whom enforcement is sought or by his authorized agent or broker.

The general statute of frauds, found in Virginia Code Ann. § 11-2, states, in pertinent part, that Unless a promise, contract, agreement, representation, assurance, or ratification, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing and signed by the party to be charged or his agent, no action shall be brought with respect to the nine types of agreements described in subsections (1) through (9) of the statute.

In Moorman, several family members and a certain trust, each of whom owned an undivided interest in a 200 acre family farm near a mountain lake resort, desired to sell the property to a developer who would agree to certain restrictions and conditions to assure that the property, located adjacent to their own individual residences, would be appropriately developed into an upscale residential neighborhood. After soliciting proposals from several prospective purchasers, the family members accepted the individual plaintiff's proposal, which provided for a purchase price of $1.7 million and an express promise to abide by their desired restrictions regarding development. One of the family members, who had agreed to serve as liaison between the family members and the prospective purchaser, then began negotiating with the individual plaintiff towards a final written purchase agreement embodying all of the desired provisions, conditions, and other necessary specific terms of the sale. Plaintiff and the family members exchanged a number of electronic mail communications, facsimile communications, notes, and interim draft purchase agreements pertaining to and reflecting some, but not all, of the various terms, amendments, and additional conditions desired by the parties. After approximately 18 months, despite the various documents and communications exchanged between the parties, none of the interim draft purchase agreements -- including the last draft sent by the individual plaintiff -- contained all of the terms and conditions desired, and none was ever signed on behalf of both the purchaser and the sellers. Nevertheless, during this period, the individual plaintiff -- unbeknownst to the family members -- had contracted to resell the property to another developer for $3 million. Approximately two months after receiving the last draft of the purchase agreement from the individual plaintiff, and still desiring to sell the family farm property, the family members sold the property to another developer for $2.6 million.

The individual plaintiff and his development company, to whom he had intended to assign his interests in the agreement for the purchase of the family farm property, subsequently sued, alleging that they had a binding contract obligating the family members to sell them the family farm property for the previously agreed-upon purchase price of $1.7 million, that the multiple written communications and documents exchanged between the parties satisfied the statute of frauds, and that, in any event, equitable estoppel and part performance justified granting them specific performance because they had incurred certain costs and had taken other certain actions in furtherance of and in reliance upon the parties' agreement. Following a bench trial, the circuit court agreed with plaintiffs and awarded them specific performance of the purported contract. The family members appealed, asserting that although the plaintiff desired to purchase the land for $1.7 million and that the family members desired to sell the land to plaintiff for that purchase price, there was no written and signed contract between the parties for the sale of the land involved. The family members further contended that there never was an oral contract for the sale of the land because the parties never mutually agreed upon all of the same contract terms. For these reasons, the family members argued that the circuit court had erred in rejecting their statute of frauds defense and in enforcing the sale via specific performance.

In Delta Star, a company specializing in the sale and installation of various types of flooring products sued its customer, Delta Star, Inc., to recover the unpaid balance of the purchase price on an alleged contract for the purchase and installation of flooring in an entranceway and office area in the customer's building. The customer denied that there was a contract for the purchase and installation of the flooring in the office area and filed a plea in bar contending that the alleged contract was not in writing as required by the Statute of Frauds and, therefore, was unenforceable. The trial court heard the parties' evidence, found that the customer had breached the contract with the flooring company, and entered judgment. It overruled the statute of frauds defense based on the exceptions set out in Va. Code § 8.2-201(3), finding that the goods at issue were specifically manufactured, that part performance of the alleged contract -- specifically, the flooring company's installation of the flooring in the entranceway and Delta Star's payment therefore -- extended to the disputed portions of the alleged contract concerning the offices, and that one of Delta Star's employees who had testified that it didn't want to act on the estimate for the office area and that it hadn't agreed to order the flooring for that area amounted to an admission that a contract for the installation of the flooring in the office area existed. The trial court also concluded that various sales proposals/quotes and an invoice provided by the carpet company qualified as confirmatory writings of the contract establishing its enforceability under Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(2), and that the parties' course of dealing under Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-202 established the existence of the alleged contract. The customer appealed, assigning error to all of these rulings.

Legal Principles. In resolving the dispute concerning the enforceability of the purported real estate sale agreement at issue in Moorman, the Court relied on the following well-established principles of Virginia law:

. Purpose underlying the general statute of frauds (Va. Code § 11-2): Relying on its prior decisions in Lindsay v. McEneaney Assocs., 260 Va. 48, 5455, 531 S.E.2d 573, 576 (2000), and Reynolds v. Dixon, 187 Va. 101, 106, 46 S.E.2d 6, 8 (1948), in Moorman, the Court explained that the statute is founded in wisdom and sound policy and requires contracts of so important a nature as the sale and purchase of real estate to be reduced to writing since otherwise . . . it often happens either that the specific contract is incapable of exact proof or that it is unintentionally varied from its original terms. The Court further recognized the principle, stated in its prior opinion in Gibbens v. Hardin, 239 Va. 425, 430, 389 S.E.2d 478, 480 (1990), that with respect to a suit for specific performance, ascertaining whether there is a writing satisfying the statute of frauds insures that a court enforces the agreement made by the parties and reduces the likelihood that a court will create an agreement where none existed.

. Types of documents and other communications that may satisfy the writing requirement imposed by the general statute of frauds as it applies to agreements for the sale of real estate: Citing its prior decisions in Janus v. Sproul, 250 Va. 90, 91, 458 S.E.2d 300, 301 (1995), and Reynolds, 187 Va. at 107, 46 S.E.2d at 9, in Moorman the Court reaffirmed the well-settled principle that a legally sufficient, signed writing may consist of any kind of writing, from a solemn deed down to mere hasty notes or memorandum in books or papers. However, the Court was also quick to explain that the writing must nonetheless contain all the essential terms of the agreement.

. Terms that must be reflected in a writing purporting to accomplish a sale of real estate in order for the writing to satisfy the general statute of frauds: Relying again on Reynolds, 187 Va. at 108, 46 S.E.2d at 9, in Moorman the Court explained that [t]he essential terms to a contract for the sale of real estate include the names of the parties, the terms and conditions of the contract, and a description of the property sufficient to render it capable of identification.' In addition, the Court, citing Phillips v. Mazyck, 273 Va. 630, 636, 643 S.E.2d 172, 175 (2007), emphasized that mutuality of assent -- the meeting of the minds of the parties -- is an essential element of all contracts, and explained that [u]ntil the parties have a distinct intention common to both . . . there is a lack of mutual assent and, therefore, no contract. Continuing, the Court, relying upon Phillips, 273 Va. at 636, 643 S.E.2d at 175, and Lucy v. Zehmer, 196 Va. 493, 503, 84 S.E.2d 516, 522 (1954), instructed that [m]utual assent is determined exclusively from those expressions of [the parties'] intentions which are communicated between them.'

. Quality of proof required to satisfy the general statute of frauds as it applies to agreements for the sale of real estate: Revitalizing a string of prior decisions, including Taylor v. Hopkins, 196 Va. 571, 575, 845 S.E.2d 430, 432 (1954), Frizzell v. Frizzell, 149 Va. 815, 822824, 141 S.E. 868, 870 (1928), Burruss v. Nelson, 132 Va. 17, 21, 110 S.E. 254, 255 (1922), and Dunsmore v. Lyle, 87 Va. 391, 393, 12 S.E. 610, 611 (1891), in Moorman, the Court reaffirmed the longstanding principle that [i]n reviewing a claim for specific performance of an oral contract for the purchase and sale of real property, the evidence relied upon to establish the contract and its part performance by the party seeking to enforce it must be clear and convincing.' Continuing, the Court, applied the principles established in Reynolds, 187 Va. at 107, 46 S.E.2d at 89 and Rahm v. Klerner & Sons, 99 Va. 10, 1314, 37 S.E.2d 292, 293 (1900). It concluded that if the court cannot ascertain, using this standard of proof, from the memoranda, or from other writings therein referred to, the essential terms of the contract, such writings do not take the case out of the statute of frauds.

. Where parties intend to memorialize their agreement in a signed contract, it is presumed that no agreement exists until there is a written contract that is formally signed, and this presumption can only be overcome by strong evidence: Placing its recent case in the tradition of Atlantic Coast Realty Co. v. Robertson, 135 Va. 247, 253254, 116 S.E. 476, 478 (1923), in Moorman, the Court explained that where parties intend to culminate their agreement with a signed contract, there is a strong presumption that no contract exists until a contract is formally signed and in writing. Continuing, the Court explained that [o]vercoming such a presumption requires strong evidence,' a standard flowing from the decision in Andrews v. Sams, 233 Va. 55, 58, 353 S.E.2d 735, 737 (1987).

. Required showing when invoking part performance exception to overcome the general statute of frauds: In Moorman, the Court emphasized that, as set forth explicitly in its prior decision in Henley v. Cottrell Real Estate Co., 101 Va. 70, 73, 43 S.E. 191, 192 (1903), that one of the most important objects of the statute of frauds [is] to prevent the introduction of loose and indeterminate proofs of what ought to be established by solemn written contracts. Accordingly, the Court also reaffirmed its holding in Runion v. Helvestine, 256 Va. 1, 6, 501 S.E.2d 411, 414 (1998), explaining that when invoking part performance to overcome the statute of frauds, a party must show that: (1) the parol agreement relied on is certain and definite in its terms,' (2) the acts proved in part performance refer to, result from, or [were] made in pursuance of the agreement,' and (3) the agreement was so far executed that a refusal of full execution would operate a fraud upon the party, and place him in a situation which does not lie in compensation.'

. Required showing when invoking equitable estoppel to bar a party from asserting the general statute of frauds as a defense to enforcement: Restating some of the principles from the classic case of Boykins Narrow Fabrics Corp. v. Weldon Roofing and Sheet Metal, Inc., 221 Va. 81, 86, 266 S.E.2d 887, 890 (1980), the Court explained in Moorman that a party seeking to invoke the doctrine of estoppel must prove by clear, precise, and unequivocal evidence the following elements: (1) A material fact was falsely represented or concealed; (2) The representation or concealment was made with knowledge of the facts; (3) The party to whom the representation was made was ignorant of the truth of the matter; (4) The representation was made with the intention that the other party should act upon it; (5) The other party was induced to act upon it; and (6) The party claiming estoppel was misled to his injury. Additionally, the Court specified, based on its prior opinions in Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Walker, 100 Va. 69, 94, 40 S.E. 633, 642 (1902), and Hyson v. Dodge, 198 Va. 792, 799, 96 S.E.2d 792, 797 (1957), that with respect to the estoppel . . . which affects the title to real estate, there must be the express intention to deceive, or such careless and culpable negligence as amounts to constructive fraud.

In resolving the dispute concerning the enforceability of the purported contract for the sale of goods at issue in Delta Star, the Court relied on the following principles of Virginia law:

. Factors qualifying goods as being specially manufactured and not suitable for sale to others in the ordinary course of the seller's business for purposes of Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(a): In Delta Star, the Court relied upon its prior decision in Flowers Baking Co. v. R-P Packaging, Inc., 229 Va. 370, 329 S.E.2d 462 (1985) as a classic illustration of specially manufactured goods that were not suitable for sale to others in the ordinary course of the seller's business. The Court pointed out that in Flowers, the customer, a commercial bakery, had engaged a cellophane-wrapping manufacturer via a verbal order to measure its cookie trays, determine the appropriate size for cellophane wrapping, and design artwork to be printed on the wrapping, and that the customer, following its acquisition by a different commercial bakery, had repudiated the manufacturing agreement and returned the cellophane wrapping featuring the customer's artwork to the manufacturer without payment, even though the cellophane wrapping conformed to the specifications of the order. Under these facts, the Court explained that it had held in Flowers Baking Co. that the parties' oral contract was enforceable under Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(a) because the cellophane wrapping was manufactured to the size required by [the bakery's] containers, was imprinted with [the bakery's] name and unique artwork, and was completely produced by the [manufacturer].'

Key Issue # 1 (Moorman): Did plaintiff present sufficient evidence to prevent the family members from asserting the statute of frauds defense under the equitable estoppel doctrine?

The Court answered this question in the negative in Moorman.

The Court began its analysis by pointing out that the circuit court's ruling estopping the family members from asserting the general statute of frauds embodied in Va. Code Ann. § 11-2 was based on the rationale that the plaintiff, in reliance on the family members' representation that they desired to sell the family farm property to him, had purchased for $260,000 a small tract of land located in the center of the family farm that was owned by a third party and that plaintiff would have no use [for that tract] without the [family farm] tract. However, the Court, applying the factors identified and enumerated in Boykins Narrow Fabrics, Chesapeake & Ohio Ry., and Hyson, concluded that [t]he record does not support the circuit court's ruling with regard to equitable estoppel in this case, for two reasons. Addressing the first of the enumerated factors, the Court explained that there was no evidence that the family members either falsely represented or concealed a material fact from the plaintiff. Second, addressing the sixth of the enumerated factors, the Court emphasized that the purchase of the small tract was never a condition of any purported contract between the parties, and that the plaintiff had never informed the family members of his intentions to sell their farm to a third party. As a result, the Court held that the plaintiff could not establish the requisite detrimental reliance necessary to sustain an equitable estoppel claim, and that the circuit court erred in ruling that the [family members] were equitably estopped from asserting a defense of the statute of frauds based on Va. Code Ann. § 11-2.

Key Issue #2 (Moorman): Did plaintiff present sufficient evidence to overcome the family members' statute of frauds defense?

The Court also answered this question in the negative in Moorman.

The Court began its analysis by analogizing the background facts and circumstances underlying its holding in Gibbens to those present in Moorman. In doing so, the Court pointed out that the trial court had found that a certain letter sent by the family members' liaison via facsimile to the plaintiff's attorney on July 2, 2004 established that, as of the date of that communication, the family [members] w[ere] in agreement on the material terms of the last . . . draft contract that plaintiff had transmitted to them. The Court disagreed with this finding, however. The Court emphasized that this letter was not a communication of mutual agreement between the parties, but rather, a communication reflecting the disagreement with the draft contract among the members of one party, specifically, the family members, and that [t]he letter expressly indicates that the parties had yet to agree upon numerous essential terms and conditions for the sale of the farm. Specifically, the Court explained that in this letter, the family liaison noted that the family still had not seen any development plans for the property, that the agreement still failed to address the tax consequences of the transaction, and that [plaintiff] had not included the desired restrictive covenants in the [earlier] draft of the proposed contract. Additionally, the Court, examining the draft of the proposed contract that had been transmitted to the family members, noted that this draft failed to include an exact date for closing and final payment. Ultimately, based on the foregoing, the Court found that [a]s in Gibbens, here there is a lack of clear and convincing evidence that the [family members] and [the plaintiff] ever mutually agreed to all the essential terms of a contract for the sale of the [family] farm to [plaintiff].

Continuing, the Court explained that the testimony of the parties and their attorneys corroborated that a signed agreement would be executed before the [family members] would be bound in the sale of their property. The Court then observed that the parties had exchanged numerous draft agreements, that the plaintiff's attorney specifically invited the family members' attorney to finalize one of the drafts, and that the family members' attorney also repeatedly requested that a contract be formalized by a signed writing. The Court also noted that the plaintiff advised his prospective purchaser that the required signatures were not yet on his purported contract with the [family members]. Based on the foregoing, the Court ultimately concluded that [c]learly, the [parties] never formalized their negotiations with a signed contract for the sale of the [family] farm.

The Court then addressed the plaintiff's argument that the family liaison's email and facsimile communications with the plaintiff and his counsel concerning the proposed sales contract established that the liaison had the authority to bind all of the family members. In doing so, the Court acknowledged its prior holding in Drake v. Livesay, 231 Va. 117, 122, 341 S.E.2d 186, 189 (1986) that [a]gency may be inferred from the conduct of the parties and from the surrounding facts and circumstances. Nevertheless, the Court found that [a]lthough the circuit court found it clear that [the family liaison] was acting on behalf of and with the consent of the Moorman family,' the conduct of the parties . . . does not support a finding that [the liaison] acted as the agent of the . . . family members. The Court cited two reasons why this was so. First, the Court pointed out that one of the family members had testified that the liaison was no more than a spokesperson' for the family, as [i]t was much easier to have one person serve as the liaison . . . than have all five of us be involved.' Second, the Court explained that it was clear that plaintiff was aware that the [family members] were represented by [the liaison], due in no small part to the fact that [plaintiff's] own formalized draft agreements required the signatures of the entire Moorman family, rather than the signature of [the liaison], acting as the agent of the Moorman family. Accordingly, the Court concluded that the evidence [was] insufficient to establish that the [family liaison] had the authority to bind the whole Moorman family by his e mail and facsimile exchanges.

Finally, the Court turned to the plaintiff's argument that his actions in conducting certain surveying, engineering, and soil studies concerning the family farm property, as well as his purchase of the small tract of land located in the center of the family farm from a third party, constituted evidence of part performance sufficient to overcome the statute of frauds. The Court acknowledged that the circuit court had specifically held that this evidence was sufficient, even if the writings were insufficient to establish a contract for the sale of the land. Nevertheless, the Court, after reviewing the trial testimony, determined that plaintiff's testimony demonstrates that he did not actually engage in the acts of surveying, engineering, performing soil studies, and purchasing the [other] property [consisting of the small tract at the center of the family farm], in pursuance of the purported agreement. The Court explained that this was so because the plaintiff had testified that he merely did [] engineering work to obtain the right-of-way' from [another third party], and that plaintiff had admitted that [t]hese acts and the purchase of the [small] tract were not . . . part of the purported contract with the [family members] concerning the family farm property.

Based on all of these considerations, the Court ultimately held that the circuit court erred in finding that the various notes and memoranda between the [family members] and [plaintiff] regarding the purported oral contract for the sale of the [family] farm were sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds, and held also that the evidence is insufficient to establish that [plaintiff] undertook any actions in furtherance of the purported contract so as to remove this case from the bar of the statute of frauds imposed by Va. Code Ann. § 11-2.

Key Issue #3 (Delta Star): Did the flooring company present sufficient evidence to overcome the customer's statute of frauds defense?

The Court answered this question in the negative in Delta Star.

In resolving the issue, the Court addressed the trial court's finding that there exists a confirmatory writing [under Va. Code § 8.2-201(2)] establishing an enforceable contract . . . for the purchase and installation of the [office] flooring. The Court acknowledged that the trial court's finding agreed with the flooring company's assertion, previously made at trial, that the flooring company's written proposals and its invoice for the purchase and installation of flooring in Delta Star's entryway constituted [such] confirmatory writings. The Court then explained that [a] writing in confirmation of the contract' presupposes that there exists an oral agreement between the parties and necessarily follows the formation of such an agreement. Continuing, the Court reasoned that the flooring company's written proposals by definition, cannot constitute confirmatory writings. This is so, the Court explained, because a proposal is an offer presented for acceptance or rejection and because [i]n submitting its proposals, [the flooring company] sought to form a contract, rather than to confirm a contract, concerning the purchase and installation of flooring in the office area. Similarly, the Court explained that the invoice for the entryway flooring also cannot serve as confirmation of a contract for the purchase and installation of flooring in [the] office [area], because [t]he invoice confirms only the parties' agreement with regard to the entryway flooring. As a result of the foregoing, the Court d[id] not agree that a confirmatory writing existed under Va. Code § 8.2-201(2) that could render the proposed contract for the installation of flooring in the office area enforceable.

Additionally, the Court addressed the trial court's finding that, pursuant to Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-202, an enforceable contract was established by the parties' course of dealing. The Court began addressing this issue by reciting the pertinent language of this statute, which provides that the [t]erms with respect to which the confirmatory memoranda of the parties agree or which are otherwise set forth in a writing intended by the parties as a final expression of their agreement . . . may be explained or supplemented . . . by . . . course of dealing.' The Court then observed that under this statutory language, the parties' course of dealing is relevant only to explain or supplement the terms of the parties' contract, but emphasized that [t]he parties' course of dealing cannot establish the existence of a contract. As a result, the Court held that the trial court erred in finding that Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-202 permitted the parties' course of conduct to establish the existence of an enforceable contract for the installation of flooring in the office area of Delta Star's building.

The Court also considered the three exceptions to the bar to enforcement imposed by the U.C.C. statute of frauds set out in Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(a), (b), and (c).

Initially, the Court addressed the trial court's finding, made in reliance on the holding reached in Flowers Baking Co., that the flooring materials were specially manufactured goods or products for [Delta Star] and not readily suitable for sale [to] others in the ordinary course of [the] business' for purposes of the exception embodied in Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(a). Examining the factual background of the dispute, the Court noted that [i]n the present case, the flooring samples displayed in [the flooring company's] showroom are available to all customers, but all flooring materials selected by customers must be ordered directly from the manufacturer or distributor because [the flooring company] keeps no inventory. Continuing, the Court observed that the flooring materials chosen by Delta Star were selected from the samples displayed [and] were not altered in any way to suit only Delta Star. Based on the foregoing, the Court found that these flooring materials were suitable for sale to others in [the flooring company's] ordinary course of business, and that, [t]herefore, the flooring materials were not specifically manufactured' for Delta Star within the intentment of Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(a). As a result, the Court concluded that [t]he trial court's reliance upon Flowers Baking Co. is misplaced because the facts of that case are distinguishable from the facts in the present case, and held that the trial court erred in ruling that the parties' contract was enforceable by virtue of Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(a).

Next, the Court turned to consideration of the part performance exception to the U.C.C. statute of frauds set out in Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(c). The Court began by noting that the trial court had found that there existed a single contract between the parties and that the installation of flooring in Delta Star's entryway constituted part performance thereof. The Court began its analysis of the part performance exception by explaining that [p]ursuant to Code § 8.2-201(3)(c), a contract that is not evidenced by a sufficient writing is enforceable with respect to goods for which payment has been made and accepted.' The Court then observed that [i]n the present case, payment has been made and accepted for only the entryway flooring. Accordingly, the Court reasoned, enforcement of any contract based upon part performance extends only to the entryway flooring and not to the purchase and installation of flooring in [the] office [area]. In doing so, the Court expressly agreed with Delta Star's contention that even if the present case involves a single contract, rather than three separate contracts, the purchase and installation of the entryway flooring does not take this case out of the Statute of Frauds.'

Finally, the Court considered whether the exception embodied in Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201(3)(b) established the existence of an enforceable contract for the installation of flooring in the office area of Delta Star's building, based on the testimony of one of Delta Star's employees. The Court began by noting that the trial court had ruled that Delta Star admitted in its testimony the existence of a contract for the purchase and installation of [such] flooring, and acknowledged that [a]t trial, [the flooring company] contended that [the employee's] testimony regarding her attempt to cancel that portion of the alleged contract dealing with [the] office [area] constituted an admission that a contract existed, on the theory that you can't cancel something unless you're admitting that you got a contract and you want to cancel it.' After examining the employee's testimony, however, the Court explained that [a] review of [the employee's] trial testimony reveals that she stated that Delta Star 'didn't want to act on the estimate [for the office area],' and that she further stated that Delta Star hadn't agreed to . . . order [that flooring] yet.' As a result, the Court ultimately concluded that the employee did not admit the existence of a contract for the purchase and installation of flooring in [the] office [area], and held that the trial court erred in holding otherwise and in declaring the contract enforceable under Code § 8.2-201(3)(b).

In light of these several factors, the Court held that the trial court erred in overruling Delta Star's Statute of Frauds defense and in finding that an enforceable contract existed . . . for the purchase and installation of flooring in [the] office [area of Delta Star's building].

Importance of rulings. In Moorman and Delta Star, the Court revitalizes and clarifies the conclusion it has reached in a number of prior cases: the statute of frauds defense is not easily overcome. In doing so, these decisions reinforce the strong public policy considerations that have long been at the heart of the defense -- specifically, that courts should not enforce parole agreements unless sufficient proof can be adduced by the party seeking enforcement as to their specific terms and as to the existence of mutual assent to those terms. Although neither of the parties seeking enforcement of the agreements at issue in Moorman and Delta Star were ultimately successful in overcoming the defenses asserted, the Court's analysis and conclusions reached in each case are nevertheless significant in that they suggest what the quality and quantity of proof necessary for a party to adduce would be in order for there to be a reasonable chance to overcome the defense. In Moorman, the Court clearly indicates that mutual assent as to all of the essential terms desired by each party, and not just the purchase price, is required to overcome the defense in the context of an agreement to sell real estate. In this context, Moorman clearly indicates that the mere exchange of unsigned interim draft agreements, as well as the exchange of written communications concerning the terms of those draft agreements, is insufficient to defeat the defense.

Furthermore, Moorman also establishes that the party seeking enforcement must reasonably assure that the person representing a group of owners has the authority to act on behalf of, and therefore bind, the group. Finally, both Moorman and Delta Star teach that the mere existence of writings purporting to establish that the parole agreement has the precise scope and specific terms that the party seeking enforcement claims is insufficient to overcome the defense. Instead, these cases indicate that the writings sought to establish the precise scope and specific terms of a parole agreement must objectively establish that the scope and terms are exactly what the party seeking enforcement claims them to be. In addition, both Moorman and Delta Star establish that part performance must unequivocally reflect the mutual assent of the parties as to the scope of the parole agreement, as well as the terms thereof, in order for it to serve as a basis for a court to determine that either the general statute of frauds embodied in Va. Code Ann. § 11-2 or the U.C.C. statute of frauds embodied in Va. Code Ann. § 8.2-201 will not bar enforcement of the agreement.

Virginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

Regarding the statute of frauds, see Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice § 24.11 (2008); John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies § 7.10 (2008); see also Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Statute of Frauds §§ 1-46;

On the doctrine of estoppel, see John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies § 10.06 (2008); see also Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Estoppel §§ 14-31 (Estoppel by Representations or Conduct), Estoppel § 36 (Estoppel by Contract), Estoppel § 39 (Evidence and Burden of Proof).

For the consequences of part performance on these doctrines, see Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Contracts § 60 (Effect of Partial Performance), Contracts § 90 (General Consideration), Contracts § 101 (Void Contracts); Statute of Frauds § 27 (Effect of Performance), Statute of Frauds § 35 (Requisites for Sufficient Part Performance).

The requirements and doctrines in specific performance, see Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice § 24.04 (2008); John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies §§ 14.01-14.12 (2008); see also Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, Statute of Frauds §§ 31-40 (Specific Performance).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Kent Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges. In 2008 he became co-author with Charles E. Friend of the leading treatise, The Law of Evidence in Virginia.

Gessner H. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and loose-leaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management, and is the author of multiple law review articles on subjects including criminal appellate procedure, constitutional law, crime victim's rights legislation, and environmental law. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

9 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Travelers Casualty & Surety Co. v. Bowman, 229 Ill. 2d 461 (2008).

2008 Emerging Issues 3195

Performance Bond Breach: Which Statute of Limitations Applies? Brazas on Travelers Casualty & Surety Co. v. Bowman, 229 Ill. 2d 461 (2008).

By Susan Brazas

December 21, 2008

SUMMARY: Recently the Illinois Supreme Court considered the question of what statute of limitations applies for an insurance company's action for breach of indemnity agreement related to construction performance bonds. In Travelers Casualty & Surety v. Bowman, the Supreme Court examined the applicability of three possible statutes of limitation to a claim by an insurer against the owners of a metalworking company for breach of an indemnity agreement.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT HOLDS THAT 10-YEAR STATUTE OF LIMITATION FOR WRITTEN CONTRACTS APPLIES TO INSURERS ACTION FOR BREACH OF WRITTEN INDEMNITY AGREEMENT AS TO PERFORMANCE BONDS.

In Travelers Casualty & Surety Co. v. Bowman, the Illinois Supreme Court addressed the applicability of three statutes of limitation to a claim for breach of a written indemnity agreement: 735 ILCS 5/13-204, 735 ILCS 5/13-206, and 735 ILCS 5/13-214. The Kane County circuit court had initially granted the metalworking company owners motion to dismiss, finding that the four-year statute of limitations for construction improvements (735 ILCS 5/13-214) barred the insurers claim. However, the appellate court reversed, holding that the ten-year statute of limitations for written contracts (735 ILCS 5/13-206) applied. The appellate court rejected the business owners alternative argument that the two-year statute of limitations for claims of indemnity and contribution (735 ILCS 5/13-204) applied to bar the claim.

In this opinion, the Supreme Court affirmed the appellate court, but remanded the case to the trial court for determination of when the statute of limitations started to run, because the date of the business owners refusal to tender payment could not be determined from the record.

Practical Implications. Although the trial court initially found the complaint subject to the construction improvements (four-year) statute of limitations, the Supreme Court held that the key inquiry was nature of the defendants liability. Here, although the business owners did provide the metalworking work for a construction project, Travelers sought to hold them liable not for their construction work, but instead for their breach of the indemnification agreement.

A plaintiff's attorney cannot assume that only the statute of limitations which seems likely to apply to a claim will actually be held applicable. Certainly, at first blush the applicability of the construction modification statute of limitations would seem to be a reasonable conclusion. However, the final decision of the Travelers Court was that it was indeed the ten-year statute of limitations which applied. Where it cannot be determined with certainty which statute of limitations will be viewed as applicable, it is advisable to inform the client. If, for example, the client has come to the attorney after the expiration of one possible time limit but prior to the expiration of another, the potential for dismissal on this grounds should be discussed, verbally and in writing, with the client.

Another practical caution to be gleaned from Travelers v. Bowman is that a client should be urged to weigh carefully the risk of doing business as an individual rather than a corporation, especially where large dollar projects or indemnification agreements are in place.

Strategic Considerations. One lesson to be learned from the Travelers v. Bowman opinion is that it is advisable to research carefully all possible statutes of limitation which might be argued to apply to a client's claim. Further, all such possible statutes of limitation should be argued, in the alternative, at the trial court level. As was the case in Travelers, the business owners were able to raise the two-year statute of limitations for the first time on appeal, but this was only because they had prevailed in the trial court. Shaw v. Lorenz, 42 Ill. 2d 246, 248 (1969). Had they been the appellants, they would have waived this argument, and would not have been allowed to make this argument for the first time on appeal.

Of course, an attorney cannot predict with certainty whether a client will prevail in the trial court. Thus, it is advisable to raise all possible alternative arguments, at least in written briefing, in order to preserve them for appeal. In any case, the court rejected this alternative argument, finding that 735 ILCS 5/13-204 does not apply to claims for express indemnification based on a written contract. Instead, that statute of limitations applies only to cases where there is an underlying tort claim for injury to person or property. In so holding, the Travelers court overruled the case of United General Title Insurance Co. v. AmeriTitle, Inc., 365 Ill. App. 3d 142 (2006).

Making a Record. The Boren court remanded the case because it could not determine, from the record, when the insurers' cause of action accrued. The court looked to the express language of the indemnification agreement to conclude that the accrual was at the point when the business owners refused to make indemnification payments after the insurer had demanded that they do so. Thus, the procuring of affidavits, responses to requests to admit and other discovery requests, and depositions will all aid the attorney to develop a record to avoid the need for remand in such a situation.

CROSS REFERENCES:

735 ILCS 5/2-1009; 735 ILCS 5/13-204; 735 ILCS 5/13-206; 735 ILCS 5/13-214; 735 ILCS 5/13-217; LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has written and lectured on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and developments in case law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

10 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Brazas on Boren v. The Boc Group, Inc., 895 N.E.2d 53, 324 Ill. Dec. 53 (2008).

2008 Emerging Issues 3196

Trial or Mistrial? Exploring the Sanctity of Motions in Limine and Remarks about Trial Attorneys. Brazas on Boren v. The Boc Group, Inc., 895 N.E.2d 53, 324 Ill. Dec. 53 (2008).

By Susan Brazas

December 21, 2008

SUMMARY: Recently the Fifth District Appellate Court considered the trial courts granting of a motion for new trial based on claims of inflammatory remarks about trial attorneys, billboard advertising, and the current climate about lawsuits and the trial system.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: FIFTH DISTRICT AFFIRMS GRANTING OF NEW TRIAL DUE TO PREJUDICIAL REMARKS AND BILLBOARD PHOTO VIOLATIVE OF MOTIONS IN LIMINE RULINGS.

WELDING ROD INJURIES? Call 1-800-INJURED Milwaukee. This was the writing on a billboard shown on an overhead screen by defense counsel during the cross-examination of the plaintiffs physician neurologist from Milwaukee, in Boren v. The Boc Group, Inc., 895 N.E.2d 53, 324 Ill. Dec. 53 (5th Dist. Sept. 9, 2008). Although the image was shown only for a fleeting moment, according to the trial judge, nonetheless the trial court concluded, one year after judgment on the jury's verdict for the defendants, that this and other remarks about welding claims being a cottage industry were together so inflammatory that a new trial was warranted. The Fifth District Appellate Court of Illinois affirmed the trial courts granting of a motion for new trial.

Practical Implications. Motions in limine have long been regarded as a powerful, yet potentially dangerous weapon. Reidelberger v. Highland Body Shop, Inc., 83 Ill. 2d 535, 550 (1981). No attorney can foresee exactly what remarks, events, or visuals might surface to push the envelope on the courts in limine rulings. Pushing too close to the prohibited subject could prove costly, in the form of a motion for new trial and briefing; an appeal; and another trial. Thus, counsel for all parties should consider carefully the possible ramifications of treading too close to the prohibited subject matter, even if the comment or visual is quite brief.

However, not every remark violative of a courts in limine order will be grounds for a new trial. In McDonnell v. McPartlin, 192 Ill. 2d 505, 535 (2000), the plaintiffs neurologist made one brief reference to a prior trial, which was in violation of the courts in limine order prohibiting reference to the mistrial of five months earlier (when the parties agreed that an impartial jury could not be selected from the jury pool). The trial and appellate courts in Boren concluded that the potential prejudice of this one statement was adequately cured by the courts instruction to disregard that testimony; and, because the remark did not reveal the outcome of the prior trial.

Closing Arguments. Counsel are well advised to consider carefully the possible ramifications of remarks which might later be viewed as in violation of motions in limine rulings. Even if an entire trial has proceeded without incident, offhanded remarks in closing argument could alone be sufficient grounds for a mistrial. Among such grounds are where the statements made are not supported by the evidence in the record, and where the statements are improper expression of personal opinion. Kerns v. Lenox Machine Co., 74 Ill. App. 3d 194, 198, 392 N.E.2d 688, 691 (1979). The standard of review for a trial courts granting of a new trial is abuse of discretion. Ervin v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 65 Ill. 2d 140, 144, 357 N.E.2d 500, 502 (1976). However, less latitude is allowed on review of a denial of a motion for new trial. Magnani v. Troggi, 70 Ill. App. 2d 216, 220, 218 N.E.2d 21, 24 (1966). Strategic Considerations. Among the factors leading the circuit court to grant the motion for new trial was the revelation that the defendants, in federal multi-district litigation (MDL), had disclosed in discovery there that they had funded approximately $600,000 in studies about the neurological effects of welding. This was critical because the defendants were allowed to present testimony at trial that the plaintiffs neurologist expert had assisted with a study of welding rod injuries which had received extensive funding from trial attorneys.

The lesson to be learned from this aspect of the Boren case is that discovery requests should include inquiries about whether discovery is ongoing in any other matters. One might even request that an opposing party produce, in discovery, any and all discovery responses it makes in any case pending which involves a similar theory of recovery or mechanism of injury. Confidentiality concerns can be allayed by offers to first redact from the discovery responses any data which identifies other parties, and especially any medical information.

Cautions When Drafting Motions in Limine. As is noted by the Boren court, the conduct of counsel and witnesses is to be measured against the specifics of a courts order as to motions in limine. Generally the trial transcript is not available for immediate viewing, and therefore attention to detail in the drafting of motions in limine is critical. Often the only written reference available to the court for review in making rulings on objections as violative of in limine orders is the text of the motions in limine. Counsel are thus well advised to reduce all possible motions in limine to writing, and to spell out in great detail within the text of the motions in limine exactly what is sought to be barred from evidence.

It is also easier to reference specific areas of prohibited subjects by drafting the motions in limine as separate documents. An index with brief description of the subject of the motion, and the courts rulings, can also serve as a handy reference tool for attorneys (and an extra copy should be provided to the court and to opposing counsel). The text of the motion in limine--and the wording of the courts order granting or denying the motion--will be extremely important as a reference both during trial and afterward in post-trial motions or on appeal. Thus, counsel should carefully draft all motions in limine, and should reduce to written form all revisions to them as well as orders reflecting the courts rulings on the motions.

CROSS REFERENCES:

Illinois Supreme Court Rule 306; LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas has written and lectured on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and developments in case law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

11 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on The Alphas Co., Inc. v. Kilduff, 72 Mass. App. Ct. 104 (2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 3134

Grace V.B. Garcia on The Alphas Co., Inc. v. Kilduff, 72 Mass. App. Ct. 104 (2008)

By Grace Garcia

December 7, 2008

SUMMARY: Litigants, although diligent in their discovery efforts, sometimes lack the facts needed to defeat a motion for summary judgment and invoke Mass. R. Civ. P. 56(f) to forestall the motion and obtain more time. Grace Garcia, a partner at Morrison Mahoney LLP in Boston, explains the showing that parties requesting further discovery are required to make under Rule 56(f) in light of the ruling in The Alphas Co. v. Kilduff.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Further Discovery Should Be Allowed If Party Shows by Affidavit That It Cannot Otherwise Establish Facts Essential to Its Opposition to Summary Judgment

In The Alphas Co., Inc. v. Kilduff, 72 Mass. App. Ct. 104 (2008), the plaintiff challenged a lower courts denial of the plaintiffs request to conduct further discovery, filed in response to the defendants motion for summary judgment. The Appeals Court determined that the lower court abused its discretion in failing to allow the plaintiff to conduct further discovery prior to granting the defendants motion for summary judgment. In its decision, the court explained the showing that parties requesting further discovery under Mass. R. Civ. P. 56(f) are required to make for a court to grant the request.

The case arose out of a business dispute involving the purchase of fruit in which the plaintiff alleged that the defendants engaged in deceptive financial schemes associated with the sale of the fruit. After only limited discovery, as a result of a court order, the defendants moved for summary judgment. The plaintiff opposed the motion and sought additional discovery pursuant to Mass. R. Civ. P. 56(f). The court denied plaintiffs request for further discovery and allowed defendants summary judgment motion, finding that there was no basis upon which a reasonable trier of fact could find for the plaintiff. The appeals court, using an abuse of discretion standard, reversed the trial court.

Rule 56(f). Mass. R. Civ. P. 56(f), which is identical to the Federal Rule, is a method of buying time for a party who, when confronted by a summary judgment motion, can demonstrate an authentic need for, and an entitlement to, an additional interval in which to marshal facts essential to mount an opposition. Resolution Trust Corp. v. North Bridge Assocs., Inc., 22 F.3d 1198, 1203 (1st Cir. 1994). Consequently, after a party moves for summary judgment, the opposing party can request that it be given time to conduct further discovery prior to the court ruling on the summary judgment motion. Thus the Rule is used as a defense to a summary judgment motion when there is an objection as to the timing of that motion. Tetrault v. Mahoney, Hawkes & Goldings, 425 Mass. 456, 458 (1997). To properly make a request for further discovery, the party must follow the mandates of Rule 56(f) or else face a denial. See e.g. Aronson v. Commonwealth, 401 Mass. 244, 254-55 (1987). Specifically, the Rule states as follows:

Should it appear from the affidavits of a party opposing the motion [for summary judgment] that he cannot for reasons stated present by affidavit facts essential to justify his opposition, the court may refuse the application for judgment or may order a continuance to permit affidavits to be obtained or depositions to be taken or discovery to be had or may make such other order as is just.

Based on Rule 56(f) it is appropriate for a court to allow further discovery before ruling on a summary judgment motion if the party opposing a summary judgment motion shows by way of affidavit that it cannot show the facts essential to justify its opposition without the requested discovery. Commonwealth v. Fall River Motor Sales, 409 Mass. 302, 307 (1991). Thus, a court may not routinely grant the request; rather the requesting party must make a minimal showing that the requested discovery is warranted.

How to Make a Rule 56(f) Request. To effectively use Rule 56(f), the party should make a specific request for further discovery in their opposition to the summary judgment motion. The request should comprise of the following five points:

(1) Authority: An affidavit must always be submitted. The affidavit should be based on first-hand knowledge and should state the basis for the request.

(2) Time: Although there is no set deadline for raising a Rule 56(f) request, the party invoking Rule 56(f) should show that it has done so in a timely fashion. Thus, the request should be raised immediately in the written opposition to the summary judgment motion.

(3) Good Cause: The party requesting discovery should show good cause for the party's failure to conduct the requested discovery earlier. A request for further discovery under Rule 56 is not meant for the lazy. Rather, the rule is meant to be used by those who have been diligent in the discovery process, but despite their diligence, have not been able to obtain the requested discovery. Thus, the party must be cognizant of the discovery deadline contained in the court's tracking order or other court imposed discovery deadlines. If the deadline is imminent, the party may also want to seek an extension of that deadline.

(4) Utility: The requesting party should not make a blanket request for further general discovery. Rather, the requesting party should state the specific discovery it seeks and the facts it anticipates such discovery will reveal. Thus, the party will want to state why they believe it is probable that the proposed facts, which would raise a material question of fact and defeat summary judgment, exist and can be found during further discovery. The showing for this factor does not need to be in a form suitable as evidence at trial, but it must rise above mere speculation.

(5) Materiality: The requesting party must show that if the facts are found during the requested discovery, such facts would be relevant to the pending summary judgment motion.

Resolution Trust Corp., 22 F.3d at 1203-1208. Although the party opposing summary judgment under Rule 56(f) does not need to show all five elements, if the party does show all five points, then a strong presumption arises in favor of relief. Id. at 1203. The requesting party should argue that the rule should be applied generously. Id.

Practitioner Points. Rule 56(f) requests are used to defend against summary judgment. The request, however, cannot be used as a fishing expedition for discovery. Rather, it must be shown that the requested discovery will be relevant to the issue being adjudicated in the summary judgment motion. Consequently, the requesting party must show that the information it seeks in discovery would raise a material question of fact, thereby giving a valid basis to deny the motion for summary judgment. The request must be timely and be in the form of an affidavit, meeting the requirement that the affiant have firsthand knowledge. The request should indicate that the requested discovery can be completed within a reasonable time frame.

To argue against a request for further discovery brought under Rule 56(f), a party must argue that there are teeth to the Rule, and that it does not apply to every case in which a party opposing summary judgment wants further discovery. A party arguing against further discovery should argue that the requesting party was not vigilant, and did not actively engage in discovery during the time it was available. Further, a party can argue that the requesting party is merely seeking to abuse discovery and waste time and judicial resources.

It also cannot be forgotten that a grant of a Rule 56(f) request does not indicate that the court has denied the pending summary judgment motion. Rather, such a ruling acts as a continuance of the summary judgment in order to give time to conduct the requested discovery.

For additional discussion of Rule 56(f) see: Massachusetts Pleading and Practice Ch. 56, (discussing the requirements of Rule 56).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. Bacon Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcia's practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, 2007, and 2008 she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a "SuperLawyer Rising Star."

Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and has served on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council (2006-2008), the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003-2006), the MBA's New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chaired the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and served on the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002-2003).

Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Practical Implications of the Electronic Discovery -- Related FRCP Amendments, Massachusetts Bar Association Section Review (2007)(co-author); Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003), Ethical Restraints of the Tripartite Relationship, 3:2 Massachusetts Bar Association Section Review 15 (Spring 2001); and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000)(co-author); as well as contributed articles to legal blogs. Ms. Garcia has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques. Further, Ms. Garcia was a Legal Writing and Research Instructor for Boston University School of Law's first year J.D. program from 2003 to 2006. Ms. Garcia is a graduate of the University of Rochester (B.A., cum laude) and Boston University School of Law (J.D., cum laude), where she was an Edward F. Hennessey Scholar and a Paul J. Liacos Scholar. While at Boston University, Ms. Garcia was a Case and Note Editor for the American Journal of Law and Medicine and a member of the ABA National Appellate Advocacy Moot Court Team Northeast Champion.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

12 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on Iannacchino v. Ford Motor Company, 451 Mass. 623 (2008)

2008 Emerging Issues 3137

Grace V.B. Garcia on Iannacchino v. Ford Motor Company, 451 Mass. 623 (2008)

By Grace Garcia

December 7, 2008

SUMMARY: It has gotten just a little bit harder for a plaintiff in Massachusetts to draft a viable complaint. In Iannacchino v. Ford Motor Company the MA Supreme Judicial Ct. has determined that plaintiffs in MA courts will be held to the new, heightened pleading standard applied in federal courts. This Emerging Issues Analysis discusses that revised standard and what it means to plaintiffs and defendants.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court Adopts Federal Pleading Standard for Motion to Dismiss

In weighing a motion to dismiss, Massachusetts has long followed the U.S. Supreme Court case of Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957), which stated that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief. In Iannacchino v. Ford Motor Company, 451 Mass. 623 (2008), however, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court has retired the Conley language and has adopted a new heightened standard for considering a motion to dismiss.

Mass. R. Civ. P. 8 and 12. Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) requires that a complaint contain a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. Conley, 355 U.S. at 47. The Massachusetts Rules of Civil Procedure, adopted in 1974, were patterned on the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Van Christro Advertising, Inc. v. M/A-COM/LCS, 426 Mass. 410, 414 (1998). Therefore, it is not surprising that Mass. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(1) is identical to Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) in requiring a complaint to contain a short statement showing the pleader is entitled to relief.

A defendant can attack the complaint in several ways, including, under both the Federal and Massachusetts Rules of Civil Procedure, using Rule 12(b)(6), that is, moving to dismiss for [f]ailure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. In construing the Massachusetts Rules, the courts follow the construction given to the Federal rules absent compelling reasons to the contrary or significant differences in content. Id. (quoting Rollins Envtl. Servs., Inc. v. Superior Ct., 368 Mass. 174, 179-180 (1975)). For many years, Massachusetts had followed the Federal interpretation of Rule 12(b)(6), which employed a very low standard to survive a dismissal. Now, however, under both Federal and State law, based on the decisions of both Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955 (2007) and Iannacchino v. Ford Motor Company, allegations in a complaint must meet a higher, although not difficult, standard in order to avoid a dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6).

Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twomble. In Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twomble, the U.S. Supreme Court addressed whether the plaintiffs, a class of telephone and internet subscribers, failed to state a claim against local exchange carriers for actions that were designed to discourage competition in violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Finding that the plaintiffs provided no foundation for showing that there was an agreement between the providers, which agreement was necessary to prove a violation of the Sherman Act, the Court ruled that the plaintiffs failed to state a claim and reversed the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. The Court held that the case should be dismissed [b]ecause the plaintiffs here have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.

In the decision, written by Judge Souter, the Court acknowledged that under the fifty-year old Conley standard a wholly conclusory statement of claim would survive a motion to dismiss whenever the pleadings left open the possibility that a plaintiff might later establish some set of [undisclosed] facts to support recovery. Id. at 1968. In order to move away from what the Court indicated was a misunderstood standard, the Court ruled that plaintiffs should have a higher burden to meet when faced with a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Under this new standard, a plaintiff is required to assert factual allegations that, assuming they are true, are enough to raise a right to relief above the speculation level. Id. at 1965. This does not mean that a plaintiff needs to set forth detailed factual allegations in order to survive a motion to dismiss. Rather, a plaintiff is now required to include in its complaint factual allegations that are plausibly suggesting (not merely consistent with) a right to relief in order to meet the basic requirement of Rule 8(a)(2) that the plain statement in the complaint possess enough heft to show that the plaintiff is entitled to relief. Id. at 1966.

Thus, under the new federal interpretation of Rule 8(a)(2), a plaintiffs obligation to provide the grounds of his entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twomble, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1964-65 (2007). Now, the plaintiffs pleadings must indicate a right to relief that is beyond the level of speculation.

Iannacchino v. Ford Motor Company. In Iannacchino v. Ford Motor Company, a group of plaintiffs alleged that the defendants manufactured certain vehicles whose door handles failed to comply with applicable federal safety standards, and were, therefore, defective and unsafe. As a result, they brought several claims, including violation of Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93A and breach of implied warranty. In their complaint, the plaintiffs did not allege any personal injury or property damage arising from the noncompliance, rather, they argued that their vehicles were worth less due to the alleged defect. In deciding that the plaintiffs complaint did not contain sufficient factual allegations to proceed with their claims, the Court ruled that the complaint should be dismissed. Although the Court used the Conley standard in determining the dismissal, it took the opportunity to adopt a new standard for dismissal under Mass. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). As a result, a defendant will now be entitled to judgment under Rule 12(b)(6) when a complaint fails to provide factual allegations sufficient to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.

The Effect of Iannacchino. The Massachusetts adoption of the Federal Rule 12(b)(6) standard detailed in Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twomble raises the bar for plaintiffs in proceeding with civil actions within the Commonwealth. Under the old standard, a complaint would pass muster as long as it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief. Now, however, plaintiffs have to assert sufficient factual allegations that are more than mere conclusory statements. This standard does not require that a plaintiff prove its case in the complaint. Rather, a plaintiff need only state enough factual matter, which will be assumed to be true for purposes of a motion to dismiss, to suggest the basis of a claim. Thus, the showing required is only a plausible standard, not a probability standard; the rule requires only enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal [supportive] evidence. Id. at 1965.

A plaintiff will no longer be able to abuse discovery based on speculative allegations on the hope that it will find something during the discovery process to support its claim. Thus, money will be saved on all sides. This higher standard will help prevent claims that appear to be groundless based on the face of the complaint; these claims can be dismissed before parties are required to expend money in the discovery process or to settle solely to avoid further costs.

In addition, court time and judicial resources expended on complaints that lack merit will be saved.

Although motions to dismiss are not as common as other dispositive motions, defendants should use the refined Mass. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) standard to evaluate each complaint to determine whether to move for dismissal. Be aware, however, that a well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge [or practitioner] that actual proof of those facts is improbable, and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely. Id. at 1966. Nevertheless, if a plaintiff has simply made a bald allegation, without articulating the factual basis that suggests it is entitled to relief, defendants now have a strong argument for such dismissal using the revised Mass. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) standard. For additional discussion of the 12(b)(6) standard see: Massachusetts Pleading and Practice §12.8 (Motion to Dismiss for Failure to State a Claim); Massachusetts Pleading and Practice, Ch. 8 General Rules of Pleading; Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 12.34 Failure to State Claim--Rule 12(b)(6) Motion; Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 8.04 (Claim for Relief Requires Showing That Pleader Is Entitled to Relief)

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. Bacon Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcia's practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, 2007, and 2008 she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a "SuperLawyer Rising Star."

Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and has served on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council (2006-2008), the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003-2006), the MBA's New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chaired the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and served on the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002-2003).

Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Practical Implications of the Electronic Discovery -- Related FRCP Amendments, Massachusetts Bar Association Section Review (2007)(co-author); Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003), Ethical Restraints of the Tripartite Relationship, 3:2 Massachusetts Bar Association Section Review 15 (Spring 2001); and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000)(co-author); as well as contributed articles to legal blogs. Ms. Garcia has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques. Further, Ms. Garcia was a Legal Writing and Research Instructor for Boston University School of Law's first year J.D. program from 2003 to 2006. Ms. Garcia is a graduate of the University of Rochester (B.A., cum laude) and Boston University School of Law (J.D., cum laude), where she was an Edward F. Hennessey Scholar and a Paul J. Liacos Scholar. While at Boston University, Ms. Garcia was a Case and Note Editor for the American Journal of Law and Medicine and a member of the ABA National Appellate Advocacy Moot Court Team Northeast Champion.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

13 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

William C. Bochet on Carbis Sales, Inc. v. Eisenberg

2008 Emerging Issues 1792

William C. Bochet on Carbis Sales, Inc. v. Eisenberg, 935 A.2d 1236 (App. Div. 2007).

By William C. Bochet

January 16, 2008

SUMMARY: Carbis Sales, Inc. v. Eisenberg, 935 A.2d 1236 (App. Div. 2007), was a suit against insurance defense counsel for malpractice in their representation of a ladder distribution company in a personal injury trial. The court ordered a new trial in an opinion that addresses the full spectrum of issues that typically arise in professional liability cases against attorneys. It is also a rare instance in which all parties came out winners. This commentary, written by William C. Bochet, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Appellate Division Grants New Trial on Legal Malpractice Case

Carbis Sales, Inc. v. Eisenberg, 935 A.2d 1236 (App. Div. 2007), was a suit against insurance defense counsel for malpractice in their representation of a ladder distribution company in a personal injury trial. The court ordered a new trial in an opinion that addresses the full spectrum of issues that typically arise in professional liability cases against attorneys. It is also a rare instance in which all parties came out winners.

Not Net. The underlying action involved a personal injury case in which plaintiff alleged he suffered back injuries as a result of a fall from a ladder. The claimant contended that Carbis Sales, Inc., negligently altered the ladder and that the alteration caused the accident. The jury accepted the plaintiff's version of events and awarded damages that ultimately came to exceed one million dollars.

Israel N. Eisenberg, Esq., tried the case on behalf of Carbis Sales. The shocking result did more than upset his client and its insurance carrier. They sued him and his firm for negligence, contending Mr. Eisenberg was not prepared and failed to present appropriate evidence and witnesses. The case was tried and the jury found that the attorney was indeed deficient. It awarded damages of $362,561.70.

Mr. Eisenberg and his firm appealed. Among their contentions was an assertion that the trial court should not have permitted the plaintiffs' legal malpractice expert to offer opinions that were not based upon generally accepted professional standards. This involved so-called "net opinions," which are frequently a source of complaint in professional liability cases. A net opinion by an expert is an opinion that is not premised upon the facts of the case or generally accepted standards of care. An opinion that is outside of the factual context of the case is not admissible at trial. So, too, opinions which are "personally held views" of the expert are inappropriate. Bucklew v. Grossbard, 87 N.J. 512, 435 A.2d 1150 (N.J. 1981), Kaplan v. Skoloff, 339 N.J. Super. 97, 770 A.2d 1258 (App. Div. 2001).

The conclusions of the expert who testified against Israel Eisenberg were found not to be net opinion. The appellate panel noted that the expert cited case law, treatises and the Rules of Professional Conduct in his testimony that the defendant attorney's efforts as trial counsel for Carbis failed to reach professionally acceptable standards. More importantly, the court's opinion outlines deficiencies in Mr. Eisenberg's performance which clearly sustain the expert's testimony. He spent little time preparing for trial and failed to call both expert and lay witnesses. The appellate panel was sufficiently offended by these omissions that it had no difficulty permitting the expert's testimony.

Timeliness is Next to Godliness. Another ground for appeal by the defendants was the trial court's failure to order the plaintiff to produce an investigator's memo from an interview with a witness. The appellate court could have rejected this point as without merit, pursuant to N.J. Court Rules, R. 2:11-3, since the witness had been deposed and the memo was not evidential. Rather, the court pointed out that the defendants' motion came after the discovery end date for the case. On that basis alone, the trial judge was justified in denying the defendants' motion. This stands as a warning that the Appellate Division's adherence to discovery deadlines under the 2001 rule amendments ("Best Practices") is not necessarily softening.

Everybody Wins. The appellate court opinion was written by Judge Anthony Parrillo. It systematically rejected each of the defendants' points on appeal. Ordinarily, one would think that the defendants lost their appeal. In this case, however, the Appellate Division ordered a new trial on all issues, the same outcome as if the defendants had prevailed. This anomaly occurred as a result of plaintiff's cross-appeal. The jury awarded damages, which seemed inexplicable. The plaintiffs sought a new trial on the issue of damages and cross-appealed when that relief was not granted. The appellate court agreed that the damages phase of the case was disjointed but chose to order a new trial on both liability and damages. In effect, both sides achieved what they wanted.

The reasoning behind this result is not clearly manifested in the opinion. Judge Parrillo faults the trial court's instructions and comments by defense counsel. The opinion also mentions that a retrial would require evidence of liability. Nonetheless, it would seem that plaintiffs should still have retained their hard-won determination of liability. The issue of damages proximately caused by that negligence would remain for the next new trial. Such a process routinely occurs in personal injury cases when negligence is admitted. One suspects that the Appellate Division simply felt that the trial court's instructions to the jury so confused the overall result that justice requires a new trial on all issues.

Not to Be Disgorged. N.J. Court Rules, R. 4:42-9 sets forth instances in which the court may award fees in certain actions. There are also statutes which shift attorneys' fees to the prevailing party (e.g., Consumer Fraud, NJS 56:12-42). These are exceptions to the so-called American Rule which states that parties to litigation are obliged to pay their own attorney's fees. Another exception was crafted by the New Jersey Supreme Court as a special gift to lawyers. In Saffer v. Willoughby, 143 N.J. 256 (1996), the court held that attorneys' fees are collectible by a successful claimant in a legal malpractice case. Also, a negligent attorney may not recover or retain fees paid for a matter negligently handled.

Although not necessary to the outcome, the Carbis Sales opinion states that plaintiffs may not recover the entire fee paid to the firm for whom Israel Eisenberg worked, even if they prevail in the retrial. This is premised upon the fact that another attorney in the firm handled the case before Mr. Eisenberg took over. As there were no complaints about that lawyer's work, the firm may keep the fees earned during that period.

Cross References. For more information, see LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Trial & Post-Trial § 8.08[7]: Determining if Expert's Conclusions Constitute Net Opinion; LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Trial & Post-Trial § 10.07[5]: Incorporating Award of Counsel Fees in Judgment; 1-8 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Civil Discovery § 8.04[2]: Conducting Discovery within Time Frame Allowed by Track Assignment; Professional Negligence: Law of Malpractice in NJ § I-A et seq.; Professional Negligence: Law of Malpractice in NJ II-A.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

14 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

William C. Bochet on Weber v. Mayan Palace Hotel & Resorts

2008 Emerging Issues 1793

William C. Bochet on Weber v. Mayan Palace Hotel & Resorts, 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 375 (App. Div. 20

By William C. Bochet

January 16, 2008

SUMMARY: The Appellate Division provided civil trial counsel with much-needed clarification as to restoration standards and procedures applicable to N.J. Court Rules, R. 1:13-7(a). Universally detested, the rule deals with the so-called "administrative" dismissal of complaints or other affirmative pleadings against a party where there has been a failure to serve or enter default for a period of four months. The dismissals are preceded by a computer generated "notice" issued 60 days before an order is entered. Although the dismissal is without prejudice, the rule is silent as to what procedure follows a dismissal or what standards apply in vacating the order. The Appellate Division has now lifted some of the fog surrounding the rule in Weber v. Mayan Palace Hotel & Resorts, 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 375 (App. Div. 2007). This commentary, written by William C. Bochet, discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Administrative Dismissal Rule Procedure Clarified by Appellate Panel

The Appellate Division provided civil trial counsel with much-needed clarification as to restoration standards and procedures applicable to N.J. Court Rules, R. 1:13-7(a). Universally detested, the rule deals with the so-called "administrative" dismissal of complaints or other affirmative pleadings against a party where there has been a failure to serve or enter default for a period of four months. The dismissals are preceded by a computer generated "notice" issued 60 days before an order is entered. Although the dismissal is without prejudice, the rule is silent as to what procedure follows a dismissal or what standards apply in vacating the order. The Appellate Division has now lifted some of the fog surrounding the rule in Weber v. Mayan Palace Hotel & Resorts, 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 375 (App. Div. 2007).

Distinguishing Dismissals. Elena Weber filed a complaint against the Mayan Palace Hotel as a result of injuries sustained from a fall in a restaurant at that Mexican facility. The complaint was dismissed without prejudice eight months later, pursuant to N.J. Court Rules, R. 1:13-7(a). More than one year after that order was entered, the plaintiff moved to vacate same, showing unsuccessful efforts at service before the dismissal order was entered. An "affiliate" of the defendant opposed the effort to restore, allegedly because the wrong party was named and there was no jurisdiction over the correct party. The trial court refused to vacate the dismissal.

The Appellate Division reversed that refusal. It held that dismissals under N.J. Court Rules, R. 1:13-7(a) should be routinely vacated. The rule is administrative in nature and justice should not be denied by virtue of its provisions.

Complaints must be reinstated even if an extended period of time passes or if the cause of delay is careless conduct by counsel. This continues a line of cases which virtually mandate restoration of actions dismissed for administrative purposes only. See Ghandi v. Cespedes, 390 N.J. Super. 193, 915 A.2d 39 (App. Div. 2002) and Rivera v. Atl. Coast Rehab. Center, 320 N.J. Super. 340, 729 A.2d 42 (App. Div. 1999).

Counsel should not view this decision as opening the door for restoration of cases dismissed for other reasons. For example, a dismissal for failure to supply discovery is dealt with differently. In Cooper v. Cons. Rail Corp., 391 N.J. Super. 17, 916 A.2d 1061 (App. Div. 2007), the court made it clear that attorney neglect is no basis to avoid dismissal under N.J. Court Rules, R. 4:23-5(a)(2) where there was an earlier dismissal for discovery lapses. Also, attorney neglect is no basis for excusing a failure to file a timely demand for trial de novo in the arbitration program Hartsfield v. Fantini, 149 N.J. 611, 695 A.2d 259 (1997). The trial bar's sense of relief must be left as a sigh, not a shout.

Filling the Gap. The rule pertaining to administrative dismissals (N.J. Court Rules, R. 1:13-7) leaves open what is required of counsel for both the plaintiff and defendant once the court's computer spits out its barely legible "order". In Weber, above, the Appellate Division provides welcome instruction. The order of dismissal can be followed by successful service of the complaint. At the same time, the defendant must be advised that the case has a present "dismissed" status. After service is effected, the plaintiff must promptly move to vacate the dismissal order. When that occurs, the time for defendant's responding pleadings begins to run. See Stanley v. Great Gorge Country Club, 353 N.J. Super. 475, 803 A.2d 475 (Law Div. 2002).

More Than a Staple is Needed. The defendant responded to plaintiff's motion to restore with a brief and documents which were simply affixed thereto. The appellate panel chided counsel for this violation of N.J. Court Rules, R. 1:6-6 and N.J. Court Rules, R. 4:46-2. Documents or other exhibits used in motions must be supported by a certification or affidavit by a witness who has personal knowledge of the authenticity of same. These are "...not merely formal requirements...". They go "...to the heart of procedural due process." Celino v. General Accident Ins., 211 N.J. Super. 538, 512 A.2d 496 (App. Div. 1986). See also Valley Nat. v. American Motor Ins., 316 N.J. Super. 152, 719 A.2d 1028 (App. Div. 1998).

Cross References. For more information, see LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice § 2.06[4]: Restoring Action After Dismissal; LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice § 2.15: Applying for Entry of Judgment More than Four Months from Entry of Default.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

15 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

"Implied Authority" to Reveal Client Confidential Conflict-Checking Information

2008 Emerging Issues 1775

Wald on "Implied Authority" to Reveal Client's Confidential Conflict-Checking Information (Colo. RPC

By Eli Wald

January 11, 2008

SUMMARY: In its new Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules) the Colorado Supreme Court has adopted a Comment purporting to resolve, for the first time, the tension between the conflict of interest rule, Colo. RPC 1.7 requiring conflict-checks before lateral moves, and confidentiality, Colo. RPC 1.6, which prohibits the disclosure of the very same conflict-checking information. New RPC 1.6, Comment 5A states that an attorney contemplating a move has implied authority to disclose confidential conflict-checking information. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, explores the new Colorado Comment and its importance to lawyers contemplating a lateral move.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview. In its new Rules of Professional Conduct (Rules) the Colorado Supreme Court has adopted a Comment purporting to resolve, for the first time, the tension between the conflict of interest rule, Colo. RPC 1.7 requiring conflict-checks before lateral moves, and confidentiality, Colo. RPC 1.6, which prohibits the disclosure of the very same conflict-checking information. New RPC 1.6, Comment 5A states that an attorney contemplating a move has implied authority to disclose confidential conflict-checking information. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, explores the new Colorado Comment and its importance to lawyers contemplating a lateral move.

The Problem: Lawyer Mobility and the Tension Between Conflict-Checks and Confidentiality. Colo. RPC 1.7 Comment 3 states that a lawyer should adopt reasonable procedures to prevent and detect conflicts of interest. See generally, Colo. RPC 5.1(a) on the responsibility of partners or supervisory lawyers to ensure a law firm's compliance with the rules of professional conduct, and specifically Colo. RPC 5.1 Comment 2, stating that: Such policies and procedures include those designed to detect and resolve conflicts of interest. Standard conflict-checking procedures require a moving attorney to disclose to the new firm the identity of her clients and a brief description of the subject matter of the representations. See, e.g., David W. Evans, Ethical Issues and Financial Data -- Conflicts of Interest, 1004 PLI/CORP 229, 239-40 (1997).

Colo. RPC 1.6(a), however, deems information relating to the representation of a client confidential. This sweeping definition includes the client's identity and a description of the matter handled for the client, the exact information necessary for conflict-checks. See, Eli Wald, Lawyer Mobility and Legal Ethics: Resolving the tension between Confidentiality and Contemporary Lawyers Career Paths, 31 J. Legal Prof. 199, 203-07 (2007); Paul R. Tremblay, Migrating Lawyers and the Ethics of Conflict Checking, 19 Geo. J. Legal Ethics 489, 500-05 (2006). Consequently, lawyer mobility leads to a clash between confidentiality and conflict of interest rules.

The tension between confidentiality and conflict of interest rules is not new; rather, the impossibility of simultaneously complying with both ethical obligations has always posed a problem for moving attorneys. Nor is the tension unique to Colorado, as its rules of professional conduct are based upon and follow the ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct. However, in the traditional landscape of legal practice when lawyers seldom moved between firms the problem rarely arose and was therefore easier to ignore. Increased lawyer mobility makes the problem more acute, as it implicates more lawyers and thus impacts more clients. See, Charles W. Wolfram, Ethics 2000 and Conflicts of Interest: The More Things Change..., 70 Tenn. L. Rev. 27, 59 (2002) (Movement by lawyers between law firms has become institutionalized, universal, and routine).

The Colorado Solution: Implied Authority to Reveal Confidential Conflict-Checking Information. Colo. RPC 1.6 Comment 5A attempts to resolve the tension. It reads, in relevant part:

A lawyer moving (or contemplating a move) from one firm to another is impliedly authorized to disclose certain limited non-privileged information protected by Rule 1.6 in order to conduct a conflicts check to determine whether the lawyer or the new firm is or would be disqualified.

Colo. RPC 1.6(a) generally holds that an attorney may reveal confidential information if the disclosure is impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation. Comment 5A permits disclosure of conflict-checking information by deeming it impliedly authorized. See also, Boston Bar Ass'n Ethics Comm., Op. 2004-1 (2004) (the Opinion lends support to the position that attorneys have implied authority to disclose conflict-checking information although its position is dicta because it found that conflict-checking information was not confidential under Massachusetts confidentiality rule). The Comment further clarifies that such disclosure is prohibited in the unusual circumstances where this basic disclosure may materially prejudice the interests of a client or a former client, and cautions the moving attorney to insist in advance that the new firm keep the information disclosed in confidence. See, Colo. RPC 1.6 cmt. 5A.

Practice Tip. Colo. RPC 1.6 Comment 5A resolves the tension between confidentiality and conflict rules by allowing disclosure of confidential conflict-checking information. In light of the Courts interpretation of implied authority, a Colorado moving attorney should feel free to share confidential conflict-checking information with a potential new law firm, to the extent necessary to conduct the conflicts-check.

Analysis of Colorados Proposed Solution. The confidentiality of conflict-checking information is a rule more honored in the breach than in the observance and thus the intention of the Colorado Supreme Court to resolve the tension between conflict rules and confidentiality is to be commended. Unfortunately, its proposed solution -- an expansive reading of implied authority -- is inconsistent with implied authority as defined in the Rules, and worse, it contradicts basic principles of agency law from which the notion of implied authority is derived.

The term implied authority is not explicitly defined in the Rules. Colo. RPC 1.6 explains that implied authority to disclose client information exists in order to carry out the representation. It is hard to see how disclosure of conflict-checking information by an attorney contemplating a move to a new law firm is necessary to carry out the representation of a current client. Quite the contrary, lawyer mobility, unless the current client decides to join the attorney and move, is likely to result not in carrying out the representation but rather in its termination.

Colo. RPC 1.6 Comment 5 offers three examples where an attorney has implied authority to make disclosures:

1. Allowing an attorney to admit a fact that cannot properly be disputed;

2. Making disclosures that facilitate the satisfactory resolution of a matter on behalf of a client;
3. Permitting sharing of confidential information within a firm representing a client.

The first two examples are consistent with the working definition of implied authority in the Rule as they clearly serve the interests of the client in a quick and efficient resolution of the matter and are therefore appropriate in carrying out the representation. The third example also serves the interests of the client by allowing him to benefit from the insights of other attorneys at the firm.

All of these examples support the conclusion that an attorney has implied authority to disclose client information when disclosure benefits the client by bringing about the quick and efficient resolution of a matter. Once again, it is difficult to see how disclosure of confidential conflict-checking information fits within this definition. It is conceivable that if a client decides to move with his attorney to a new law firm, the lawyer may be able to better represent the client, for example, by taking advantage of resources available at the new, but not the old, law firm. Such a speculation, however, can hardly serve as a justification for the Courts expansive reading of implied authority. First, clients who decide not to move with the attorney to a new law firm will likely suffer delay and inconvenience. Surely, disclosure of their confidential conflict-checking information does not further their representations. Moreover, even clients who decide to move with the attorney to a new law firm will ordinarily experience delays and inconvenience as their attorney settles in at the new firm.

The Restatement (Third) of The Law Governing Lawyers further supports the conclusion that the Colorado Supreme Court erred in construing implied authority to encompass permission to disclose confidential conflict-checking information. Section 61 states that A lawyer may use or disclose confidential client information when the lawyer reasonably believes that doing so will advance the interests of the client in the representation. Comment b makes it clear that Section 61 explores implied authority stating that no explicit request or grant of permission is required. The Comment clarifies that implied authority only exists to take steps reasonably calculated to further the client's objectives in the representation, and requires that a lawyer have a reasonable belief that the use or disclosure will further the objectives of the client in the representation. Disclosure of confidential conflict-checking information clearly advances the interest of the lawyer exploring a possible move. It does not, however, advance the objectives of the client in the representation and therefore, contrary to the position taken by the Colorado Supreme Court, no implied authority exists allowing its disclosure.

Furthermore, Section 26 of the Restatement, exploring generally an attorneys authority to act on behalf of a client, references agency law and specifically the Restatement on Agency for a finer definition of implied authority. Restatement (Third) of Agency § 2.01, defines implied authority as the power to do what is necessary, usual, and proper to accomplish or perform an agent's express responsibilities or to act in a manner in which an agent believes the principal wishes the agent to act based on the agent's reasonable interpretation of the principal's manifestation in light of the principal's objectives and other facts known to the agent.

The definition does not support the Colorado Supreme Courts broad reading of implied authority in Comment 5A. Even assuming that clients derive some abstract benefit from disclosure of confidential conflict-checking information because increased lawyer mobility in turn means that clients are likely to be able to retain the lawyer of their choosing, implied authority requires more than such an abstract speculative benefit. Because a move never directly accomplishes a lawyers express responsibility to a client and would usually be inconsistent with the objectives of current clients to efficiently and quickly resolve the representations, no implied authority exists to allow for disclosure of confidential conflict-checking information.

Recommendation to Colorado Attorneys Contemplating a Move. Pursuant to new Comment 5A a Colorado lawyer contemplating a lateral move may share with the potential new firm confidential conflict-checking information consistent with the demands of the conflict of interest rules, unless the disclosure will materially prejudice the interests of his current clients, in which case the moving attorney should seek informed client consent before disclosing the confidential information.

Recommendation to Attorneys Outside Colorado Contemplating a Move. The Colorado Supreme Courts expansive reading of implied authority is inconsistent with its meaning within the rules of professional conduct and with agency law in general. Therefore, moving attorneys outside of Colorado faced with the tension between the demands of confidentiality and conflict-checks should not rely on the Colorado precedent of expansive implied authority as granting permission to reveal confidential conflict-checking information. Rather, moving lawyers should seek their clients informed consent before revealing confidential conflict-checking information, see, ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rules 1.0(e) and 1.6(a), including seeking a future-looking informed consent at the outset of the representation.

Recommendation to Jurisdictions Seeking to Resolve the Tension Between Confidentiality and Conflict-Checks Demands. Increased lawyer mobility requires resolving the tension between confidentiality and conflict-checks requirements. Jurisdictions contemplating revising their rules of professional conduct should not follow the Colorado precedent. Instead, such jurisdictions can adopt an explicit exception to their confidentiality rule permitting disclosure reasonably necessary to ensure compliance with conflict-checks requirements, revise their confidentiality rule to explicitly deem conflict-checking information not confidential (consistent with the approach of the old Model Code of Professional Conduct), or encourage moving attorneys and new law firms to employ middle counsel -- legal ethics experts outside of the new firm -- charged with conducting the conflict-check pursuant to ABA Model Rule 1.6(b)(4). See, Eli Wald, Lawyer Mobility and Legal Ethics: Resolving the tension between Confidentiality and Contemporary Lawyers Career Paths, 31 J. Legal Prof. 199, 227239 (2007).

Related Commentary: Eli Wald on the New Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct. LexisNexis Expert Commentary (January 2008),

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

16 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Wald on the New Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct

2008 Emerging Issues 1752

Wald on the New Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct

By Eli Wald

January 7, 2008

SUMMARY: The Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct are changing. The Amendments approved by the Colorado Supreme Court go into effect January 1, 2008 and create two categories of pitfalls for practicing attorneys. Colorado lawyers should note that the Court significantly revised the current Colorado Rules consisted with Ethics 2000 the recently revised American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Non-Colorado attorneys should be aware that, in spite of its commitment to uniformity, the Court did keep in tact some specific Colorado Rules that differ from the Ethics 2000 approach. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, highlights some of the important rule changes.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

The Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct are changing. The Amendments approved by the Colorado Supreme Court go into effect January 1, 2008 and create two categories of pitfalls for practicing attorneys. Colorado lawyers should note that the Court significantly revised the current Colorado Rules consisted with Ethics 2000 the recently revised American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Non-Colorado attorneys should be aware that, in spite of its commitment to uniformity, the Court did keep in tact some specific Colorado Rules that differ from the Ethics 2000 approach. This Commentary, written by Professor Eli Wald, a legal ethics expert and member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and the Colorado Bar Association Ethics Committee, highlights some of the important rule changes.

Analysis

Rule Changes Consistent with the Ethics 2000 Approach

Rule 1.0 Definitions. The new Rules include a definitional section, Rule 1.0. Rule 1.0(e), imposes substantive demands regarding the nature of communications between attorney and client. Informed consent denotes the agreement by a person to a proposed course of conduct after the lawyer has communicated adequate information and explanation about the material risks of and reasonably available alternatives. Comment 6 explains that in assessing the adequacy of information and explanation provided to a client, an attorney should consider the experience and sophistication of the client, as well as whether he or she is represented by other counsel in giving the consent. Comment 7 cautions attorneys that in general a lawyer may not assume consent from a clients silence.

Rule 1.4(a) Communications. Rule 1.4(a) expands on the old Colorado communications rule and adds subsections detailing circumstances under which an attorney must communicate with a client. New subsection 1.4(a)(1) requires an attorney to promptly inform the client when the clients informed consent is required; new subsection 1.4(a)(2) requires reasonable consultation with the client about the means by which the clients goals are to be accomplished, see also, Colo. RPC 1.2(a) (allocation of authority within the relationship between attorney and client); and new subsection 1.4(a)(5) mandates consultation with the client about any relevant limitation on the lawyers conduct when the lawyer knows that the client expects assistance not permitted by the Rules or other law. Read in conjunction with Rule 1.13 (on communicating with entity clients), new Rule 1.4 seems to reflect a trend of demanding more communication between attorney and client. When considered in the context of Rule 1.0(e) (informed consent), Rule 1.4 seems to require more detailed substantive communications between attorney and client. See generally, Eli Wald, Taking Attorney-Client Communications (and therefore Clients) Seriously, 42 U. S. F. L. Rev. __ (forthcoming 2008).

Rule 1.6(b) Exceptions to Confidentiality. While subsection 1.6(a) continues to broadly extend the protection of confidentiality to information relating to the representation, subsection 1.6(b) greatly expands exceptions to the general rule. Subsection 1.6(b)(1) follows Ethics 2000 and permits disclosure of confidential information to prevent reasonably certain death or substantial bodily harm. Subsection 1.6(b)(2) retains Colorados current Rule 1.6(b) allowing for disclosure to reveal the clients intention to commit a crime and the information necessary to prevent it.

The Court also followed Ethics 2000 in adopting subsection 1.6(b)(5), permitting disclosure to secure legal advice about an attorneys compliance with the Rules of Professional Conduct, other law or a court order, and subsection 1.6(b)(7) allowing disclosure to comply with other law or a court order. Colorados current Colo. RPC 1.6(c), permitting disclosure to allow an attorney to establish a claim or defense in circumstances relating to the representation was carried forward to subsection 1.6(b)(6).

Practice Tip: Three Consequences of Colorados Unique Crime Exception

(1) Whereas other jurisdictions adopting Ethics 2000 have six exceptions to confidentiality enumerated in subsections 1.6(b)(1)-(6), Colorado has seven exceptions, leading to inconsistency in terms of numbered exceptions. A Colorado attorney conducting comparative research, for example, about permission to reveal confidential information to comply with a court order should note that in most jurisdictions the exception appears in 1.6(b)(6) and not in 1.6(b)(7).

(2) Whereas Ethics 2000 adopted a new exception (ABA Model Rule 1.6(b)(2)) generally permitting disclosure to prevent the client from committing a crime or a fraud reasonably certain to result in substantial injury to the financial interests of a third party in which the client is using the lawyers services, Colorados corresponding 1.6(b)(3) only covers fraud by the client because crimes are covered by Colorados broader 1.6(b)(2), which allows for disclosure to prevent any crime.

(3) Colorados 1.6(b)(4) tracks ABA Model Rule 1.6(b)(3) in generally allowing disclosure to prevent or mitigate a substantial injury to the financial interest of a third party resulting from fraud or a crime by the client, because subsection 1.6(b)(2) does not apply to completed crimes. See, Colo. RPC 1.6, Cmt. 6A.

Practice Tip: Although the new exceptions dramatically expand the circumstances under which an attorney is allowed to reveal confidential information, they do not give a lawyer a general license to override confidentiality. All 1.6(b) subsections are subject to the caveat that a lawyer may only reveal information relating to the representation to the extent reasonably necessary. However, Comment 15A clarifies that while disclosure pursuant to Rule 1.6 is always permissive, other Rules of Professional Conduct or other law may require disclosure. In other words, whatever disclosures Rule 1.6 makes permissive, other Rules or law may render mandatory. See, Colo. RPC 1.6, Cmt. 15A.

Rules 1.7 and 1.9 Conflict of Interests. The general conflict of interests rules, Rules 1.7 and 1.9, feature new formulation and organization but no substantive changes. When faced with a conflict of interest, the practitioner should note three Comments providing useful guidance: Comment 22 deals with future-looking waivers and states that the effectiveness of such waivers will be determined by the extent to which a client reasonably understands the material risks entailed by the waiver. Comment 24 generally permits positional conflicts of interest subject to the requirements of the general conflicts rule, 1.7. Comment 31 deals with confidentiality among co-clients and following the Restatement of the Law Governing Lawyers states that generally confidentiality does not attach among co-clients. See Restatement of the Law, Third, The Law Governing Lawyers, § 75.

Rule 1.8(j) Attorney-Client Sexual Relations. New subsection 1.8(j) prohibits an attorney from having sexual relations with a client unless the sexual relationship existed prior to the commencement of the attorney-client relationship. When the client is an entity, Comment 19 explains that subsection 1.8(j) prohibits an attorney for the entity from having a sexual relationship with a constituent of the entity who has authority concerning the entity's legal matters.

Rule 1.13 Reporting Misconduct. Promulgated following the corporate scandals of the late 1990s and early 2000 and ensuing federal legislation, see, Eli Wald, Lawyers and Corporate Scandals, 7 Legal Ethics 54 (2004), Rule 1.13 sets forth detailed procedures relating to communicating effectively and reporting misconduct both within an entity client (the so-called reporting up-the-ladder, per subsection 1.13(b)), and outside of the entity client, per subsection 1.13(c).

Practice Tip: The practitioner must be cautioned that while disclosure pursuant to the Rule is permissive, it does trump Rule 1.6. See, Colo. RPC 1.13(c), Cmt. 6.

Rule 1.18 Duties to Prospective Clients. Rule 1.18 extends limited confidentiality and conflict of interest protection to prospective clients, defined as persons who discuss with an attorney the possibility of forming an attorney-client relationship. Subsection 1.18(b) generally prohibits a lawyer from using or revealing information learned in the consultation, and subsection 1.18(c) generally prohibits representation of a client with interests materially adverse to those of a prospective client in the same or substantially related matter, if the lawyer received information during the consultation that could be significantly harmful to the prospective client. See, Colo. RPC 1.18.

Rule 4.4(b), (c) Inadvertent Disclosure. Subsections 4.4(b) and (c) regulate a lawyer's obligations regarding inadvertent disclosure. Subsection 4.4(b) mandates prompt notice to the sender if a lawyer receives a document, relating to the representation of a client, which the lawyer knows, or reasonably should know, was inadvertently sent. Subsection 4.4(c) adds that a lawyer who receives notice from a sender that a document was inadvertently sent shall not examine the documents and abide by the sender's instruction as to its disposition. See, Colo. RPC 4.4.

Practice Tip: In light of new subsections 4.4(b) and (c), attorneys should exercise caution when supervising document review by subordinate attorneys and non-lawyers.

Colorado Unique Rules

Rule 1.5 Writing Required. Colorado Rule 1.5 mandates writing within a reasonable timeframe after the commencement of the representation regarding the basis or rate of the fee and expenses, unless the attorney has regularly represented the client. This differs from the ABA Model Rule 1.5, which recommends that the scope of the representation and the basis or rate of the fee and expenses for which the client will be responsible be communicated to the client in writing. In addition, Colorado Rule treats any material changes to the basis or rate of the lawyers fee or expenses subsequent to the initial fee agreement as a business transaction with the client, per Rule 1.8(a), requiring the clients informed consent, confirmed in writing signed by the client. However, such a change which is reasonably likely to benefit the client is deemed by Comment 3A to be immaterial and therefore exempt from the demands of Rule 1.8(a). See, Colo. RPC 1.5, 1.8.

Practice Tip: Failure to familiarize oneself with Colorado's more client-friendly Rule 1.5 may have dire consequences for the out-of-state attorney. For example, Colorado subsection 1.5(e) continues to prohibit referral fees; subsection 1.5(f) states that fees are not earned until the attorney confers a benefit on the client or performs a legal service for the client; and subsection 1.5(g) states that nonrefundable fees and nonrefundable retainers are prohibited.

Rule 1.10(e) Screening. Responding to practice realities featuring increased lawyer mobility, See, Eli Wald, Lawyer Mobility And Legal Ethics: Resolving The Tension Between Confidentiality Requirements And Contemporary Lawyers' Career Paths, 31 J. Legal Prof. 199 (2007), Colorado has adopted new subsection 1.10(e) allowing timely screens, defined in subsection 1.0(k), if the matter is not one in which the personally disqualified attorney substantially participated in, the personally disqualified attorney is apportioned no fees resulting from the matter, the disqualified attorney gives prompt written notice to affected former clients, and the screen is objectively effective. See, Colo. RPC 1.0(k), 1.10(e).

Rule 1.15 Accounting. Colorado Rule 1.15 is significantly more detailed and demanding than its ABA Model Rule counterpart. The Rule regulates required bank accounts, trust accounts (often referred to as COLTAF Colorado Lawyer Trust Account Foundation), and required accounting records.

Rule 6.1 Pro Bono. While Colorado Rule 6.1 and corresponding comments follow the ABA Model Rule, the Colorado Comment includes a detailed preface and recommended Model Pro Bono Policy for Colorado Licensed Attorneys and Law Firms, approved by the Court in late 2005.

Rules 7.17.6 Legal Services. Colorado's regulation of information about legal services, Rules 7.17.6, continues to be more detailed and expansive than its ABA counterpart. For example, Colo. RPC 7.1 specifically prohibits comparing an attorneys services with other lawyers services unless the comparison can be factually substantiated, see, Colo. RPC 7.1(a)(2); deems as false or misleading a communication likely to create an unjustified clients expectation about the results an attorney can achieve, see, Colo. RPC 7.1(a)(3); regulates the form of unsolicited communications an attorney may send, see, Colo. RPC 7.1(c); and prohibits even non in-person solicitation of a prospective client believed by the attorney to be in need of legal services which arise out of a personal injury or death of any person, within thirty days of such occurrence, see, Colo. RPC 7.3(c).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Eli Wald is a professor at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law, where he teaches in the areas of legal ethics and legal profession. He is the author of numerous law review articles examining topics such as the regulation of the corporate bar in the post-corporate scandals era, increased lawyer mobility, attorney-client communications and the rise and fall of Jewish law firms.

Prof. Wald, a Continuing Legal Education instructor and expert witness, is a member of the Colorado Supreme Court Standing Committee on the Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct and a member of the Colorado Bar Associations Ethics Committee.

17 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Ross v. May Company

2008 Emerging Issues 1685

McDonnell on Ross v. May Company

By Joseph B. McDonnell

December 26, 2007

SUMMARY: An at-will employment relationship may under certain circumstances be converted into a contract of employment, which can be terminated only for cause. May a contractual employment relationship be abrogated by an employers offer of additional benefits which are accepted by an employee? The answer may surprise you. This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, an experienced Illinois litigator, examines this question.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Employment Law in Illinois -- Evolution. The employer-employee relationship and the proper termination of that relationship has received increasing attention in recent years. Traditionally, Illinois has followed the common-law rule that an employee hired without a fixed term of employment is an at-will employee, meaning that either he or the employer may terminate the employment relationship at any time, with or without cause.

The rule is subject to several exceptions. An employee may not be discharged in retaliation for making a workers compensation claim (Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 Ill.2d 172 (Ill. 1978)) nor for activities in furtherance of a clearly-mandated public policy, e.g. reporting criminal activities to the employer. Palmateer v. International Harvester, 85 Ill.2d 124 (Ill. 1981).

Moreover, an at-will employment relationship may be converted into an enforceable contract of employment where an employee handbook or other policy statement by the employer creates enforceable rights, if the traditional elements of contract formation are present. (Vickers v. Abbott Laboratories, 308 Ill.App.3d 393 (1999); Duldulao v. Saint Mary of Nazareth Hospital Center, 115 Ill. 2d 482 (1987)).

In Ross v. May Company, the First District Appellate Court considered whether an at-will employment relationship had, by virtue of the issuance of employee handbooks by the May Company during plaintiffs at-will employment, created enforceable contract rights; and, if so, whether such rights had been abrogated by the employer when it offered new benefits to plaintiff and his co-employees, which were accepted.

The trial court determined, first, that the handbooks issued in 1987 and 1989 created an employment contract, altering plaintiffs at-will employment status and obligating defendant to observe progressive disciplinary procedures before it could terminate plaintiffs employment. The court further determined, however, that additional benefits (paid personal days, short and long-term disability benefits, an insurance reimbursement plan, and enhanced retirement benefits) which were offered to and accepted by plaintiff abrogated the earlier contract relationship and returned plaintiff to an at-will employment status. The trial court dismissed plaintiff's additional claim of promissory estoppel based on alleged representations by defendant's agent, on the grounds that plaintiff could not establish reasonable reliance on those representations.

On appeal, the First District affirmed the dismissal of the promissory estoppel claim because the employee handbooks consistently stated that only the Vice-President of Human Resources could alter an at-will employment status. Therefore, statements by defendant's manager could not reasonably be relied upon by plaintiff to alter his at-will employment status.

With respect to the breach of contract claim, however, the Appellate Court reversed the trial judge, finding that the contractual relationship created by the handbooks was not altered by the additional benefits made available to plaintiff and his co-employees in 1990. This is because the additional benefits were unilaterally offered by the employer and were not bargained for; there was no reciprocal agreement or consideration received by the plaintiff for the relinquishment of his contract rights evidenced by the employee handbooks.

The fact that plaintiff had accepted the benefits and continued his employment with the defendant made no difference; mere continued employment, standing alone, does not constitute consideration supporting the unilateral modification of an existing contract of employment. Doyle v. Holy Cross Hospital, 289 Ill.App.3d 75, 80 (1997); aff'd 186 Ill. 2d 104. Since the 1990 benefits were offered to all employees, at-will and contractual, and no promises were made to plaintiff in return for which he agreed to relinquish his contractual rights as an employee, his status as a contractual employee was unchanged and his termination by defendant, without complying with the disciplinary procedures, was unlawful.

Tips for Practitioners. Many corporate employers have adopted employee handbooks or other policy statements setting out the terms of the employment relationship. Most contain statements that, absent explicit language to the contrary, the relationship is an at-will relationship which may be terminated by the employer at any time, with or without cause. Practitioners should be careful, in any disputed employment termination case, to examine not only the employee handbook but all policy statements which may have been issued by the employer, in order to determine whether an at-will employment relationship has been altered. The difference can be important, since union contracts or other circumstances may entitle the employee to a hearing or other protections before his employment can be appropriately terminated.

Cross References

1-1 Employment in Illinois § 1-3 (§ 1-3 Special Forms of Illinois Employment Relationships, Employment At Will).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students. Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

18 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Eclipse Mfg. Co. v. United States Compliance Co.

2008 Emerging Issues 1691

McDonnell on Eclipse Mfg. Co. v. United States Compliance Co.

By Joseph B. McDonnell

December 26, 2007

SUMMARY: When an insurance company breaches its duty to defend its insured, may it nevertheless raise policy defenses in an action to enforce a judgment taken against its insured? This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, an experienced Illinois litigator, examines this question and other important issues surrounding an insurers duty to defend in Illinois.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: An insurers duty to defend its insured has been the subject of seemingly endless litigation in Illinois. The seminal case on the subject is Maryland Casualty Company v. Peppers, 64 Ill.2d 187 (Ill. 1976). The general rules that have emerged may be simply stated. If the facts alleged in the underlying complaint against the insured fall within, or potentially within, the policy's coverage provisions, the liability insurer has a duty to defend the insured. National Fire Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Kilfoy, 375 Ill.App.3d 530 (1st Dist. 2007). The insured's duty to defend is broader than its duty to indemnify. Crum & Forster Managers Corp. v. Resolution Trust Corp., 156 Ill. 2d 384 (Ill. 1993). Provisions that limit or exclude coverage are construed liberally in favor of the insured and against the insurer. State Farm Mutual Automobile Ins. Co. v. Villicana, 181 Ill. 2d 436 (Ill. 1998). The insurance company may weigh the following options where the complaint contains allegations which fall within, or potentially within, the policy coverage: it may, defend the suit; defend under a reservation of rights; or seek a declaratory judgment of no coverage. L.A. Connection v. Penn-America Inc. Co., 363 Ill.App.3d 259 (3rd Dist. 2006).

In Eclipse, a class action arising out of unsolicited fax advertisements transmitted to plaintiff and several other businesses without their permission, Hartford was tendered the defense of United States Compliance Company within days of its being served with summons and a copy of the Complaint. Hartford refused to defend on the basis that the allegations did not come within the coverage of its policy. However, it did not file an action seeking a declaratory judgment of no coverage. Eclipse eventually settled the case for just under $4 million, the limits of Hartford's policy. Eclipse then took an assignment from United States Compliance Company of its rights under the Hartford policy and then filed a third party citation against Hartford to enforce the consent judgment entered into with U. S. Compliance.

Hartford attempted to raise its policy defenses in the citation proceeding, but the trial court ruled against it and entered a turnover order requiring that Hartford's policy limits be applied to satisfy the consent judgment in favor of Eclipse. On appeal, Hartford contended that the turnover order should be reversed because its policy did not cover U. S.

Compliance's transmission of the unsolicited faxes. Hartford admitted that it had breached its duty to defend U. S. Compliance under the policies. However, it asserted that, under Minnesota law, which it contended should control, Hartford's breach of its duty did not estop it from raising policy defenses in the citation proceeding and that, under Minnesota law, there was no coverage under the policies.

The Second District held, however, that there was no need to apply conflict of law principles because, based upon its reading of Home Insurance Co. v. National Union Fire Insurance of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, 658 N.W.2d 522 (Minn. 2003), Minnesota law agreed with Illinois law on the issue of estoppel of an insurance company to raise policy defenses after it has refused to defend.

In Home Insurance, the Minnesota Supreme Court, according to the Second District, had explicitly adopted the Illinois rule that providing notice of the suit sufficiently triggers an insurer's duty to defend. The case also implied, according to the Second District, that Minnesota would adopt Illinois' position that an insurer will be estopped from raising policy defenses if it does not defend the suit or file a declaratory judgment action to determine its obligations under the policy. Home Insurance, 658 N.W. 2d at 533; slip op at 15.

Tips for Practitioners. The safest course, in advising insurance companies regarding a disputed duty to defend, is to defend the suit under a reservation of rights and, simultaneously, file a declaratory judgment action (through separate counsel) to determine the issue of coverage. It should also be kept in mind that, where there is a conflict between the interests of the insured and the insurer, the insured must be permitted to select his own counsel to represent the insured in the underlying action, and the insurer's obligation is satisfied by paying the reasonable costs of the defense, pending a determination of coverage in the declaratory judgment action.

For Further Discussion on Class Actions, see 1-7 Illinois Civil Procedure § 7.08 (§ 7.08 Special Joinder Devices, Class Action).

For Further Discussion on Insurers Duty to Defend, see 1-3 Insurance Bad Faith Litigation § 3.09 (§ 3.09 Duty to Defend Third Party Actions); 1-3 Insurance Bad Faith Litigation § 3.10 (§ 3.10 When Duty to Defend Arises); 1-5 The Law of Liability Insurance § 5.01 (§ 5.01 Scope of the Duty to Defend).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant State Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students. Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

19 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Barbara's Sales, Inc. v. Intel Corp.

2008 Emerging Issues 1664

McDonnell on Barbara's Sales, Inc. v. Intel Corp.

By Joseph B. McDonnell

December 21, 2007

SUMMARY: What considerations do the Illinois courts entertain in determining, under conflict-of-laws principles, which state law is to govern the substantive rights of the parties in a class action suit, where more than one state (including the forum state) has significant contacts with the transactions in question? This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, an experienced Illinois litigator, examines this question and other important issues in pursuing class actions lawsuits in Illinois.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Illinois Supreme Court recently issued one of its most significant class action decisions since Avery v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 216 Ill. 2d 100 (2005). In Avery, the court had overturned a verdict rendered on a nationwide class action suit against State Farm based on the use of replacement parts for the repair of State Farm-insured vehicles. The court there held that the Illinois Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Practices Act (815 ILCS 505/1) applies only to fraudulent transactions which take place primarily and substantially in Illinois. Therefore, Illinois law precludes relief arising out of transactions which occur entirely outside Illinois.

Background. In this case, the Supreme Court considered two certified questions arising from a decision of the Circuit Court of Madison County. The complaint contained alternative counts based upon California and Illinois consumer fraud laws. The circuit court held that Illinois substantive law applied, and certified a class limited to Illinois consumers. Both parties appealed the order, plaintiff on the basis that it limited the class to Illinois residents and defendant on the basis that the court should have denied class certification entirely.

The Appellate Court reversed, finding that California law applied, and directed the circuit court to reconsider its class certification order in light of California law. The Illinois Supreme Court granted Intel's petition for leave to appeal.

Whither Goest Thou? Illinois or California? The conflict-of-laws issues presented to the Supreme Court were whether California or Illinois law was to be applied, and, secondly, whether under that law the motion for class certification was appropriate. The court answered the first question by holding that Illinois law governs the liability and damages issues; and the second by holding that the action could not proceed as a class action.

As to the first issue, the court examined several sections of the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws in determining which state law governed. The court pointed out that, while plaintiffs suit implicated consumer fraud laws and class members of all 50 states and the District of Columbia, plaintiffs sought relief only under Illinois or California law. This, according to the opinion, simplified the courts analysis because, under Avery, no relief may be had under Illinois law for transactions occurring outside the state. Therefore, the courts analysis was narrowed to include only Illinois and California under conflict of laws principles.

The Court rejected plaintiffs argument that Sec. 6 of the Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws controlled in determining the issue of which law was to be applied. The Introduction to the Restatement, the court said, enunciated the broad principle that the rights and liabilities of the parties are to be governed by the jurisdiction which retains the most significant relationship to the occurrence and to the parties. (slip op. at 12).

While the record showed that both states had significant relationships to the action, the court concluded that it should be guided by Sec. 148 of the Restatement, which sets forth a secondary statement in black letter setting forth the choice of law to be applied. That choice was Illinois, the forum in which the suit was filed. The Court pointed out that Illinois courts should not be burdened with applying foreign law absent strong policy reasons and a strong connection to the case (slip op. at 14), citing Gridley v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co., 217 Ill. 2d 158. The court noted that most of the plaintiffs (eight out of eleven) were Illinois residents who had purchased the Intel product in Illinois and had received Intels representations in Illinois. Although Californias consumer protection law was consumer-friendly, there was no reason to believe that either California or its residents would suffer by the application of Illinois law, since California had no interest in applying its laws to non-citizens or to occurrences taking place outside its borders. (slip op. at 15). The court also found that Sec. 148 of the Restatement was more specific in its application to claims of false representations (as were alleged in the complaint) than was Sec. 145, relied upon by plaintiff, which dealt basically with claims based on false advertising. Consulting Comment j to Sec. 148, the Court said that the general approach of Sec. 148 favored the application of Illinois law. For example, plaintiffs had received and relied on Intels alleged representations in their home states, again favoring the application of Illinois law. Since more than two of the relevant contacts (as set out in Sec. 148) of each plaintiff occurred in either Illinois or Missouri, the laws of their state will ordinarily govern. Considering all of the circumstances, the court determined that Illinois, rather than California, substantive law controlled.

Was class certification proper? There remained for consideration the question of class certification. The court briefly reviewed the requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure for maintenance of the class action (numerosity, common questions of fact or law, adequacy of representation, and appropriateness), but concluded that it was unnecessary to determine whether the requirements were met because, as a threshold matter, the representation identified by plaintiffs did not form the basis of an actionable claim under the Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act.

Plaintiffs contended that Intels representation regarding the name Pentium 4--that this processor was the best and fastest on the market was sufficient to afford recovery under the Consumer Fraud Act. The Court disagreed. Such representations constituted nothing more than puffery and therefore did not amount to a deceptive act within the meaning of the Consumer Fraud and Deceptive Business Practices Act.

As in Avery, where the court said a statement that the product was a quality replacement part was puffing, the court concluded here that words such as best were puffery and not actionable. Likewise, the implicit representation inherent in the name Pentium 4 (or that, in plaintiffs words, 4 is better than 3) was also mere puffery and therefore not actionable. The court said that a reasonable customer would not rely on such statements because there is nothing specific or explicit about the name Pentium 4 or even its alleged implicit meaning of 4 is better than 3 or best.

Accordingly, the court overturned the circuit courts decision regarding class certification and held that the lawsuit as presently constituted should not proceed as a class action.

Tips for Practitioners. Under this decision and the Supreme Courts earlier opinions in Avery and Gridley, it is apparent that plaintiffs who file class action suits in Illinois carry a heavy burden if they seek to incorporate a class which includes non-resident consumers. The attractiveness of the Consumer Fraud Act as a vehicle for prosecuting class actions is the provision for attorneys fees to the prevailing party. The Act will be unavailing, however, where transactions occurred outside the state of Illinois. In addition, plaintiffs must be careful to distinguish between statements (whether in advertising or from other sources attributable to defendant) that are representations of fact as opposed to puffing of the defendants product. Finally, where most of the representative plaintiffs are Illinois residents and the bulk of the contacts occurred in Illinois, plaintiffs will be hard-pressed to convince trial courts that, under conflict-of-laws principles, the law of any state other than Illinois should be applied.

Cross References

1-7 Illinois Civil Procedure § 7.08 (§ 7.08 Special Joinder Devices, Class Action).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students. Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

20 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Bauer v. Memorial Hospital

2008 Emerging Issues 1653

Susan M. Brazas on Bauer v. Memorial Hospital

By Susan M. Brazas

December 20, 2007

SUMMARY: Susan M. Brazas on Jury Instructions for Increased Risk of Decreased Life Expectancy and Special-Parental-Help in a Catastrophic Injury Case: Applying the Dillon Holding. Non-pattern jury instruction identifying damages for increased risk of decreased life expectancy and for special-parental-help may be given, held the Fifth District Appellate Court's decision in Bauer v. Memorial Hospital. The court affirmed in part and vacated in part a $7.15 million jury verdict for severe injuries sustained by a newborn not promptly treated for hypoglycemia. Among the dramatic issues confronted are claims of improper ex parte communications between counsel and the court and claims of error in allowing the plaintiffs' attorney to call the defendants' attorney as a fact witness. This commentary, written by Susan M. Brazas, frequent author and lecturer on civil practice matters, discusses the significance and implications of this opinion addressing numerous rulings of the trial court.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Bauer & New Damages. The Fifth District Appellate Court in Bauer v. Memorial Hospital, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1262 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007) has recognized two new categories of damages: (1) increased risk of decreased future life expectancy; and (2) special-parental-help. The first such category is an extension of the principle which has evolved in Illinois over the past several years that increased risk of future harm or lost chance of recovery damages are compensable. This principle was first clarified by the Illinois Supreme Court in Dillon v. Evanston Hospital, where the Court held that compensation for such damages may be awarded if it is shown, to a reasonable degree of certainty, that the defendants wrongdoing created the increased risk. Dillon v. Evanston Hosp., 199 Ill. 2d 483, 771 N.E.2d 357 (2002). Currently, the IPI pattern instructions include IPI 30.04.04, Increased Risk of Harm--Calculation. The Bauer court agreed that this and other IPI pattern instructions could be modified to describe increased risk of future decreased life expectancy, and held that it was proper to have given these modified instructions to the jury.

The Bauer court also upheld the use of the plaintiffs specially crafted instruction identifying a new category of damages: special-parental-help. This category is meant to define the value of the parents services in providing care for the special needs of the severely disabled child.

Strategic Considerations. Attorneys should be willing to tailor pattern jury instructions in creative ways, but with great care to follow the case law of the pertinent issues and, when possible, using a pattern instruction as the framework. The Bauer court seemed to stretch the bounds of the familiar with their approval of the non-pattern instructions given.

Where, for example, multiple instructions reference categories of damages, then counsel should carefully review all pattern instructions and make the appropriate modifications as needed. In particular, the requirements set forth in the key case of Dillon v. Evanston Hosp., 199 Ill. 2d 483 (Ill. 2002) should be strictly followed.

Jury Instruction Argument. The Bauer court cited, on several occasions, to the Notes on Use to the IPI Instructions. Although technically these Notes on Use are not precedential or binding, they are often helpful leverage for bolstering an argument as to whether or not a particular instruction should be given. Additionally, when the topics are novel, citation to practices in other states can be helpful. The Bauer court cited to the trend in other states of awarding future damages in reaching its decision as to the compensability of future damages for reduced life expectancy. Where no Illinois court has directly addressed a particular topic, case law or even jury instructions from other jurisdictions can provide guidance to the trial court.

Discovery Implications. Counsel are well advised to incorporate, into written discovery requests and depositions, specifically drafted inquiries to address the areas covered in these two new categories of damages.

The Bauer court expressed disbelief that the defendant could not identify several nurse witnesses. This can serve as a warning to attorneys that explanations for why a witness is not called to testify will be closely scrutinized. Otherwise, the penalty, as for the defendants in Bauer, may be the giving of the missing witness instruction, IPI (Civ.) 5.01 (2007)(1-2 Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 2.50).

Thus, counsel should be persistent in exhausting all sources of information to identify witnesses who could potentially provide useful testimony. When the search is not fruitful, counsel should thoroughly document efforts made to identify or locate a witness, in the hope of minimizing the risk that the missing witness instruction will be given.

The trend in recent case law appears to be to give the missing witness instruction, so long as even a modicum of the elements set forth in IPI 5.01 are present. Kersey v. Rush Trucking, Inc., 344 Ill. App. 3d 690, 702, 800 N.E.2d 847, 858 (2003). However, if a previously-disclosed retained expert is not called at trial, the missing witness instruction need not be given. Montgomery v. Blas, 359 Ill. App. 3d 83, 88, 833 N.E.2d 931, 935 (2005).

Strategy for Expert Testimony and Disclosure. The Bauer court identified a broad range of adequate expert disclosures in affirming the testimony of experts. Whereas some attorneys might strive to describe in painstaking detail all opinions of experts, the Bauer court called it sufficient where the experts opinions had been set forth in a variety of means: through reports, depositions, and even the experts own medical records. Thus, more than just the partys Answers to Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213 Interrogatories will be viewed as providing notice of the experts opinions. Even so, court decisions on the admissibility of expert opinion vary greatly and are highly fact-specific. Recent court decisions on Rule 213 include Boyd v. City of Chicago, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1270 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007), Pancoe v. Singh, 876 N.E.2d 288 (1st Dist. 2007), and Lopez v. Northwestern, 375 Ill. App. 3d 637, 873 N.E.2d 420 (1st Dist. 2007). Best practice dictates that Rule 213 disclosures be reviewed for completeness shortly before the 60-day-prior-to-trial date, and supplemented as needed. Disclosures should be broad enough to encompass all opinions known on the subject, including deposition testimony, reports, and medical record entries.

Cross References: LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions); Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213; IPI (Civil) 5.01 (1-2 Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 2.50), 30.04.04 (2007).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

21 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joseph B. McDonnell on Babich v. River Oaks Toyota and Flair Design, Ltd.

2008 Emerging Issues 1655

Joseph B. McDonnell on Babich v. River Oaks Toyota and Flair Design, Ltd.

By Joseph B. McDonnell

December 20, 2007

SUMMARY: Where a product-liability count is barred by the statute of limitations, is a second count, alleging spoliation of evidence, also barred? This commentary, written by Joseph B. McDonnell, an experienced Illinois litigator, examines considerations for the practitioner on spoliation of evidence claims in light of Babich v. River Oaks Toyota and Flair Design, Ltd.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Spoliation of evidence has been a fairly fertile field of litigation since the Illinois Supreme Court, in Boyd v. Travelers Insurance Company, 166 Ill. 2d 188 (1995), recognized the concept as a valid theory under existing principles of negligence law. This case presents the issue of whether a spoliation claim may be maintained when the action to which it relates is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Background. Matthew Babich filed a product liability action (Count I) and a negligent spoliation action (Count II) based upon injuries allegedly sustained by him on July 16, 2001 when he fell from an allegedly defective chair manufactured by Flair Design, Ltd. He settled his product liability claim with Flair Design. River Oaks, the Toyota dealership which owned the chair at the time of the accident, then moved for summary judgment on the spoliation claim. Discovery established that the dealership had purchased the chair no later than 1990. The pertinent statute of limitations provided in substance that no product liability action shall be commenced except within the applicable limitations period and, in any event, within 12 years from the date of first sale, lease or delivery of possession by a seller or 10 years from the date of first sale, lease or delivery of possession to its initial user, consumer, or other non-seller, whichever period expires earlier 735 ILCS 5/13-213(b).

Shorter or Longer? Since a seller and a consumer were involved, the First District applied the 10-year limitations period because it expired earlier. (Citing Garza v. Navistar International Transportation Corp., 172 Ill. 2d 373 (1996) (in cases involving manufacturers and distributors-lessors, two categories of sellers with two different limitations periods, the earlier of the 10- or 12-year repose period is to be applied in determining whether the product liability claim was timely filed)).

The Holding. The court accordingly determined that the statute of limitations (more appropriately, the statute of repose with respect to paragraph (b)) had expired. The chair had come into the dealerships possession no later than 1990, and the statute would then have run in 2000. Since the suit was not filed until July 12, 2002, any product liability action was barred.

What Next? It remained to consider the effect of the holding as to Count I on the negligent spoliation count. Plaintiff claimed that Toyota had improperly disposed of the chair that had caused his injury. The court pointed out that Boyd had established that an action for negligent spoliation of evidence is not recognized as an independent cause of action, but can be stated under existing negligence principles. (Citing Boyd 166 Ill. 2d, 188, 193 (1995)). This means that it is a derivative cause of action, depending for its validity on the successful maintenance of the primary action to which it relates, in this case the product liability claim against Flair Design. Inasmuch as that claim (notwithstanding the settlement made by plaintiff) was barred by limitations, the spoliation claim, being derivative, must suffer the same fate.

The Holding. An action for spoliation of evidence, being derivative in nature, has the same period of limitations, and once the product liability action expired there was no pending action in which the chair could be introduced as evidence. See Antler v. Classic Residence Management, Ltd. Partnership, 315 Ill.App.3d 259, 269 (2000). Therefore, the trial court was correct in granting defendants motion for summary judgment and its judgment was affirmed.

Tips for Practitioners. It is well established in Illinois that, in legal malpractice cases generally, the plaintiff must prove that he had a valid underlying claim which was lost as a proximate result of his attorneys negligence. This entails proof of the case-within-a-case, as it is commonly called. Babich appears to require that a spoliation action is subject to the same requirement; that the action is derivative of the principle claim and therefore intimately tied to it. Thus, where the principle action for one reason or another cannot be maintained, the spoliation claim will also fail.

In addition, the spoliation claim should be filed in the same suit as the principle action, as is commonly done in loss-of-consortium claims, which are also derivative. See Brown v. Metzger, 104 Ill.2d 30 (1984).

Although the Babich opinion does not discuss the subject, it is well to remember the distinction between a statute of limitations and a statute of repose. A statute of repose differs from a statute of limitations in that a statute of limitations governs the time within which lawsuits may be commenced after a cause of action has accrued, while a statute of repose extinguishes the action itself after a fixed period of time, regardless of when the action accrued. DeLuna v. Burciaga, 223 Ill.2d 49 (Ill.2006). The difference was not discussed in Babich because it made no difference. The two-year statute of limitations applicable to personal injury actions generally had obviously run, and the only issue was the application of the 10-year or 12-year statute of repose. 735 ILCS 5/13-213(b).

Cross References. 1-1 Illinois Civil Procedure § 1.07 (Timing Requirements for Civil Actions in the Illinois Circuit Courts: Statutes of Limitations and Repose, Mandated Notices and the Like). 1-19 Illinois Tort Law 19.syn (Chapter 19 Products Liability).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students. Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

22 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

James J. Walsh on Governmental Immunity

2008 Emerging Issues 1658

James J. Walsh on Governmental Immunity

By James J. Walsh

December 20, 2007

SUMMARY: This commentary, written by James J. Walsh, an experienced litigator, discusses the significance and implications of Frohriep v. Flanagan on governmental immunity from tort liability in Michigan.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Frohriep v. Flanagan, 739 N.W.2d 645; 275 Mich. App. 456 (2007), a unanimous three-judge panel of the Court of Appeals affirmed the trial courts grant of summary disposition in favor of three officers of the Michigan Department of Education. The plaintiffs in Frohriep were schoolteachers wrongly identified by the Department of Education as having criminal convictions on their records. The plaintiff schoolteachers sought damages resulting from having inaccurate information disseminated to various school districts. The identifications had occurred during the Departments effort to implement new legislation related to school safety. The plaintiffs attempted to bring numerous tort claims against three defendants, all Department of Education officials.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the grant of summary disposition on the grounds that all three defendants were immune from suit under Michigans governmental tort liability act, MCLS § 691.1401, et seq., because there were no allegations that they had been acting outside the scope of their authority when they allegedly committed the torts, and because there were no allegations of gross negligence.

Seven months after the Court of Appeals issued its opinion, the Michigan Supreme Court on December 5, 2007 issued an order partially reversing the Court of Appeals decision. See Frohriep v. Flanagan, 2007 Mich. LEXIS 3160. The court held that the plaintiffs could bring their claims against the two lower-ranking officials, the chief academic officer/deputy superintendent and the supervisor of client services, but it agreed with the Court of Appeals that the superintendent was immune from liability under the governmental tort liability act. In its succinct decision, the Michigan Supreme Court offered the following brief analysis: MCLS § 691.1407(2) does not apply to these defendants because they are individual government employees who are not provided immunity under MCLS § 691.1407(5), and because the plaintiffs alleged intentional torts for which liability was imposed before July 7, 1986.

Governmental Immunity From Tort Liability in Michigan. In 1964, the Michigan legislature codified common-law sovereign immunity to liability and put all then-existing legislative exceptions in one place by enacting the states governmental tort liability act. MCLS § 691.1401, et seq.; Ballard v. Ypsilanti Township, 577 N.W.2d 890, 893;

457 Mich. 564 (1998). Certain sections of the act grant immunity to government departments or agencies, and two sections extend immunity to individual governmental employees. MCLS § 691.1407(5) governs immunity from tort liability for judges, legislators and the elective or highest appointive executive official[s] of all levels of government, and MCLS § 691.1407(2) governs immunity for all other individual government officers and employees. To receive immunity from liability for personal injury and property damage claims resulting from their alleged tortious conduct, judges, legislators and elective or highest appointive executive official[s] must have been acting within the scope of their authority when the alleged tort occurred. MCLS § 691.1407(5).

In comparison, other governmental employees enjoy tort immunity only if a three-prong statutory test is met. See MCLS § 691.1407(2); see also May v. Greiner, 2006 Mich. App. LEXIS 3089. Firstly, the employee must either have acted within the scope of his authority, or at least must have acted reasonably believing that his actions were within the scope of his authority. Secondly, the governmental agency or department that employs the employee must be engaged in the exercise or discharge of a governmental function. Lastly, to receive immunity the employee must not have acted in a grossly negligent fashion.

Exceptions to Governmental Immunity, and Considerations for Plaintiffs Counsel. Practitioners should realize that while the immunity extended to governmental employees is powerful, it is far from absolute. Although the immunity does extend beyond negligence claims to also cover other types of torts, such as a claim of trespass-nuisance made against a governmental employee, see Pohutski v. City of Allen Park, 641 N.W.2d 219 ; 465 Mich. 675 (2001), the act neither immunizes an employee from liability for every type of tort nor protects an employee from liability in every instance. Thus, practitioners representing plaintiffs are advised not to dismiss the possibility of bringing a claim against a governmental employee without first analyzing whether the potential claim falls under a recognized exception that will allow a court to hold a governmental employee liable for his tortious conduct.

Some exceptions are in the statute itself. As stated in the three-prong test under section MCLS § 691.1407(2), a plaintiff can bring claims based on ultra vires acts of the employee in certain circumstances, MCLS § 691.1407(2)(a), or claims alleging gross negligence in every circumstance, MCLS § 691.1407(2)(c). Besides those found in the three-prong test, other limitations exist. As the Michigan Supreme Court noted in its order in Frohriep, section 1407(2) immunity does not prevent a plaintiff from bringing claims for intentional torts. See Frohriep, 2007 Mich. LEXIS 3160 (citing MCLS § 691.1407(3) and Sudul v. Hamtramck, 562 N.W.2d 478; 221 Mich. App. 455 (1997)); see also Lavey v. Mills, 639 N.W.2d 261, 268; 248 Mich. App. 244 (2001). Following the Michigan Supreme Courts order in Frohriep, it appears that a plaintiff may be allowed to bring claims for intentional torts committed within the scope of employment. Finally, governmental immunity cannot protect a government employee from liability for a violation of constitutional right. Smith v. State Dept of Public Health, 410 N.W.2d 749, 751; 428 Mich. 540 (1987) (Where it is alleged that the state, by virtue of custom or policy, has violated a right conferred by the Michigan Constitution, government immunity is not available in a state court action.); see also Burdette v. State, 421 N.W.2d 185, 187; 166 Mich. App. 406 (1988) (Constitutional rights serve to restrict government conduct. These rights would never serve this purpose if the state could use governmental immunity to avoid constitutional restrictions.).

Practitioners should also be aware of several procedural issues. It is important to appreciate the fact that governmental immunity works differently depending on whether the potential defendant is a governmental entity or a governmental employee. As it relates to governmental entities, immunity is considered a characteristic of those entities, and not an affirmative defense. Therefore, when bringing a claim against a governmental entity, a plaintiff must plead his claims in a way as to avoid having his claims barred. Meadows v. City of Detroit, 418 N.W.2d 100, 106; 164 Mich. App. 418 (1987). Contrastingly, because immunity is not considered to be a characteristic of an individual government employee, under the Michigan Rules of Court defendants who are individual governmental employees must plead immunity as an affirmative defense in their responsive pleadings. MCR 2.111(F) (2), (3) (a); Meadows, 418 N.W.2d at 106. Practitioners should also note that statutes of limitation may come into play to bar stale tort claims brought against governmental employees just as they bar stale claims brought against any other defendant. See MCLS § 691.1411.

For additional information on governmental immunity in Michigan, see Michigan Law & Practice 2d State § 104 (M.L.P. STATE § 104); MCLS § 691.1407.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

James J. Walsh is a partner in the Ann Arbor office of Bodman LLP, a Detroit based firm. Mr. Walsh is a 1975 graduate of Louisiana State University Law School and clerked for two judges on the Michigan Court of Appeals before joining Bodman in 1977. His litigation experience is quite broad, with numerous jury and bench trials and appeals in federal and state courts. He was primary litigation counsel for Michigans Commissioner of Financial and Insurance Services in the rehabilitation of the U.S. branch of Confederation Life Insurance Company, the largest and most successful insurance insolvency in North American history. He has extensive experience in class actions and also specializes in the constitutional aspects of sign regulations as counsel to the Outdoor Advertising Association of Michigan.

23 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Langsdorf on Kilroy v. Northeast Sunspaces, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 1659

Langsdorf on Kilroy v. Northeast Sunspaces, Inc.

By Stephen E. F. Langsdorf

December 20, 2007

SUMMARY: This commentary, written by Stephen E. F. Langsdorf, an experienced litigator, discusses the significance and implications of Kilroy v. Northeast Sunspaces, Inc. on the Maine Unfair Trade Practices Act and the recovery of attorneys fees.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Attorneys Fees Denied as Remedy for Lack of Notice for UTPA Claim. The Maine Unfair Trade Practices Act (UTPA), 5 M.R.S.A. §§205-A 214 (2006), requires that 30 days prior to the filing of an action for damages, a written demand for relief be served, identifying the claimant, reasonably describing the unfair and deceptive act or practice relied upon, and stating the injuries suffered. There is no provision in the UTPA that specifies a penalty for failure to provide the notice. In Kilroy v. Northeast Sunspaces, Inc., the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine held that it was not an abuse of discretion for the court to consider lack of notice in exercising its discretion regarding a request for attorneys fees and upheld the denial of a motion for an award of fees.

Fact Pattern of Kilroy. Kilroy sued Northeast Sunspaces, Inc. and Four Seasons Solar Products, LLC for breach of contract, breach of express warranty, and violation of the UTPA because of injuries he sustained when, in May 2002, he slipped and fell while removing water from a leaking sunroom which he had purchased in 1997 and which had started leaking almost immediately. Kilroy had communicated his concerns to Northeast, the franchisee/installer, and Four Seasons, the manufacturer, and sent letters to both companies describing the problem prior to March 2001. As a result of his fall, Kilroy was hospitalized for a month and did not recover from his injuries. His attorney sent a letter to Four Seasons on November 20, 2002, stating that Kilroy seriously injured himself when attempting to deal with leaks caused by negligent installation and/or design of the Four Seasons sunroom that was installed at his home in December 1997. The letter also stated that Kilroy intended to pursue a claim against Four Seasons for damages for personal injury.

In 2004, Kilroy filed a complaint against Northeast and Four Seasons which included the UTPA claim and a demand for attorneys fees. The Defendants did not raise the issue of inadequate statutory notice as an affirmative defense. Northeast made an offer of judgment pursuant to Me. R. Civ. P. 68 on August 22, 2005 for $150,000.00, which was rejected, and a second offer of judgment on December 29, 2005, for $200,000.00, which was also rejected. After an eleven day jury trial in January 2006, the jury found for Kilroy for breach of contract, breach of express warranty and unfair trade practices and awarded him $75,000.00 in damages.

After trial, Kilroy moved for an award of attorneys fees on the UTPA claim pursuant to 5 M.R.S.A. §213 (2). The Defendants, for the first time, raised adequacy of the pre-litigation notice as a defense to the attorneys fee claim.

What Notice Was Provided. The Superior Court denied Kilroys motion for attorneys fees finding that the letter written by Kilroys lawyer in November 2002, was not sufficient notice that he was asserting a UTPA claim because it only alleged that the leaks were caused by negligent construction or design. The Court also found that Northeast and Four Seasons had not waived the defense of lack of notice because the defense did not go to the substantive claim, but only to the attorneys fees claim and thus there was not an occasion for the Defendants to assert [the] issue previously.

Despite the fact that the November 2002 letter was a written demand for relief which identified negligent construction and/or design as the conduct leading to personal injuries, the Supreme Judicial Court affirmed the ruling that the judge did not abuse his discretion by determining that it did not sufficiently describe the unfair and deceptive act.

Background of the ruling. Even though there is no provision in the UTPA which specifies a penalty for failure to provide the notice, the Court previously held in the case of Oceanside at Pine Point Condominium Owners Association v. Peachtree Doors, Inc., 659 A.2d 267, 273 (Me. 1995) that failure to award attorneys fees when appropriate notice had not been provided was one potential remedy. Accordingly, the Court in Kilroy ruled that it was not an abuse of discretion to deny a claim for attorneys fees.

The Plaintiff in Kilroy noted that in Oceanside the lack of pre-litigation notice in a UTPA case was an affirmative defense and cited case law, e.g., Inniss v. Methot Buick-Opel, Inc., 506 A.2d 212 (Me. 1986), that affirmative defenses are waived unless timely raised. Plaintiff argued that by not raising the affirmative defense of lack of notice in the answer, Defendants had waived the affirmative defense. However, the Court noted, remarkably, that since failure of notice was an affirmative defense only to the claim for attorneys fees it was not a defense that had to be raised in the initial answer. The Court stated if Defendant is going to raise a lack of notice in response to an attorneys fees request, the appropriate time to do so is when the fee request is actually made. In so doing, the Court ignored the fact that the attorneys fees request was made in the Complaint.

Why this case is curious. The UTPA is a consumer protection statute which allows victims of unfair trade practices to recover attorneys fees if they prevail. For decades, Maine case law has embodied the public policy that the purpose of providing notice in advance of litigation is to put a party on reasonable notice of a claim, to allow the parties an opportunity to settle. Here, both Defendants were provided with notice describing in detail the nature of the claim and had the opportunity to settle. Even though the Court held that the notice did not reasonably describe the unfair conduct, negligent design and/or construction are considered to be unfair trade practices under appropriate circumstances (as the jury found here).

The conclusion that an affirmative defense of failure of pre-litigation notice for UTPA claim need not be made until the attorneys fees request is made is certainly unprecedented under Maine law. The reason that Courts normally require affirmative defenses to be raised at the time of initial pleading is to allow those legal issues to be aired and remedied, if necessary, at the beginning of the lawsuit, not at the conclusion of the case.

What to do now. Despite the holding in Kilroy, defense counsel is not well advised to wait until after trial to first raise a failure of pre-litigation notice as a defense.

In order to avoid the problem in this case and the odd result that a winner of a UTPA case after a jury trial is denied attorneys fees, counsel for the plaintiff needs to be certain to fully describe the unfair conduct, identify it as unfair, and cite the statute in a notice to the defendant(s) more than 30 days prior to filing suit.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Stephen E. F. Langsdorf specializes in civil litigation and employment law before administrative agencies, in arbitrations and in court. He has been lead counsel in more than twenty jury trials and has argued twenty or more cases before the Maine Supreme Judicial Court. He is currently Corporation Counsel for the City of Augusta and attends Council, Planning Board and committee meetings. He graduated from Texas A & M University with a degree in philosophy and history and in 1986 earned his law degree from the University of Texas. He joined Preti Flaherty in 1986, became a Member in 1996 and an Equity Member in 1997.

24 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Case v. Galesburg Cottage Hospital

2008 Emerging Issues 1625

Susan M. Brazas on Case v. Galesburg Cottage Hospital

By Susan M. Brazas

December 19, 2007

SUMMARY: Susan M. Brazas on Defining Diligence of Service: The Illinois Supreme Court Clarifies the Time Factor in a Motion to Dismiss for Lack of Diligence in Service. The clock stops running when no complaint is pending, in the gap between a voluntary dismissal and re-filing, for the purpose of a Rule 103(b) motion to dismiss for lack of diligence in service of process. This is the holding in the Illinois Supreme Court's reversal of the circuit court and the Third District Appellate Court in Case v. Galesburg Cottage Hospital. This commentary, written by Susan M. Brazas, frequent author and lecturer on civil practice matters, discusses the impact and implications of the Supreme Court's first examination of this issue since its 1977 opinion in Aranda v. Hobart Mfg. Corp.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Illinois Supreme Court Clarifies the Time Factor For Motions to Dismiss Based on Lack of Diligence of Service. In Case v. Galesburg Cottage Hospital, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1707, the Illinois Supreme Court addressed the interplay of the voluntary dismissal statute and the Supreme Court Rule on dismissal for lack of diligence. In this reversal of both the trial court and the appellate court (via its Ill. Sup. Ct., R 23 unpublished opinion), the Supreme Court recognized the practical realities of diligence of service when a plaintiff has voluntarily dismissed a complaint.

Ill. Sup. Ct., R 103(b), as amended in 1997, reads:

Dismissal for Lack of Diligence. If the plaintiff fails to exercise reasonable diligence to obtain service on a defendant, the action as to that defendant may be dismissed without prejudice, with the right to refile if the statute of limitation has not run. The dismissal may be made on the application of any defendant or on the courts own motion.

In Case, the Illinois Supreme Court re-visited the factors to be considered in a Ill. Sup. Ct., R 103(b) motion to dismiss in the factual context of a medical malpractice action naming several defendants. The plaintiff had not attached a Section 622 reviewing physicians report to the complaint, but instead filed an attorneys affidavit requesting an additional 90 days to do so. The key facts were that:

- . summons was not issued as to the initial complaint;
- . a voluntary dismissal was taken one month later;

- . the complaint was re-filed eleven months later; and
- . a summons was issued and served within 14 days after the re-filing.

Although both the trial court and the appellate court found that the plaintiff had not been diligent in service, the Supreme Court disagreed. They noted that the one-year window of time in which a voluntarily dismissed complaint may be re-filed is an absolute right, which must be protected. The Court noted that when considering a claim of non-diligence, to include the time between voluntary dismissal and re-filing toward the time which it took for plaintiff to obtain service would infringe upon the one-year right to re-file. This was a confirmation of the Courts opinion on a similar factual scenario upholding the absolute right to re-file, according to the predecessor to 735 ILCS 5/13-217 in Aranda v. Hobart Mfg. Corp., 66 Ill. 2d 616, 620 (1977).

Practical Implications. Excerpts from the circuit courts letter opinion cast aspersions on the decision of the plaintiffs attorney to withhold issuance of the summons, as he specifically instructed the clerks office to do. This appears to be without basis in the Supreme Court Rules or in the Code of Civil Procedure. Indeed, Rule 103(b) provides a penalty only for lack of reasonable diligence to obtain service on a defendant, and not for lack of reasonable diligence to obtain issuance of summons.

Even so, the Case court did not rally to the defense of the plaintiffs right to seek issuance of summons at leisure. Instead, the opinion affirms the validity of the several factors to be considered when lack of diligence is claimed. These factors are enumerated in Segal v. Sacco, 136 Ill. 2d 282, 287, 555 N.E.2d 719, 720 (1990). They include the length of time used to obtain service of process, and the ease of locating the defendant. The Case court cautioned that in some instances, a lack of diligence could be found where the delay in service was even shorter than in the present situation, if there were unnecessary delay in order to circumvent the statute of limitations.

Strategic Considerations. Counsel are cautioned against stretching too far the limits of delay in either the issuance of summons or the service of summons upon any defendant. Unlike some other states, in Illinois the statutes, Supreme Court Rules, and case law are devoid of any absolute deadline by which service of process must be had upon a defendant, or by which summons must be issued. The Segal factors identified by the Supreme Court remain intact, and are general enough to give courts wide discretion in scrutinizing any delay in service, regardless of whether voluntary dismissal has occurred.

However, in certain cases where procedural hoops cannot be timely completed (as in medical malpractice cases where a Section 622 report cannot be timely filed), it may be the most prudent course to voluntarily dismiss and, promptly after re-filing, obtain service. To maximize the diligence determination, attorneys are well advised to attempt to locate the whereabouts of all defendants in advance of re-filing the complaint.

Cautions Upon Re-Filing. The harsh reality of holding back on service is that once a defendant has filed a Rule 103(b) motion to dismiss for lack of diligence, that motion must be ruled upon before any ruling upon a plaintiffs motion to voluntarily dismiss. OConnell v. St. Francis Hosp., 112 Ill. 2d 273, 283 (1986). The Case court distinguished OConnell as a case involving the non-diligent delay of a pending case. Where a case is, essentially, non-existent because it has been voluntarily dismissed and not yet re-filed, the Case court noted, there is no pending case, and to expect diligence in service during that time is groundless.

What the timing predicament of OConnell does mean for the practitioner, however, is that even the appearance of non-diligence should be avoided so that the tool of voluntary dismissal will remain readily available. If a voluntary dismissal is had, the later of one year or the remaining period of the statute of limitations is available. However, if dismissal occurs pursuant to Rule 103(b), then the remaining statute of limitations, if any, is all that is available for a window of time in which to re-file the complaint. This remains a great risk for the practitioner which should be considered in any decision to delay the issuance of summons or the service of process.

Cross References: 735 ILCS 5/2-1009; 735 ILCS 5/13-217; Ill. Sup. Ct., R 103; LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists (Civil; pleadings and motions); C. Lizak, Dismissal for Lack of Diligence in Serving Process: The Failure of Rule 103(b), 94 Ill. Bar J. 372 (2006).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and civil practice case law developments.

25 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jean-Claude Labady on Internet Communication and Long-Arm Jurisdiction

2008 Emerging Issues 1629

Jean-Claude Labady on Internet Communication and Long-Arm Jurisdiction

By Jean-Claude Labady

December 19, 2007

SUMMARY: Issues surrounding the establishment of jurisdiction through internet postings and communications present new challenges. This commentary, written by Jean Claude Labady, an experienced New Jersey litigator, examines considerations for the practitioner in determining if long-arm jurisdiction exists in New Jersey light of Goldhaber v. Kohlenberg.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Internet Postings & Jurisdiction -- A Daunting Defendant. In Goldhaber v. Kohlenberg, 395 N.J. Super. 380, 928 A.2d. 948 (App. Div. 2007) a father and daughter who resided in New Jersey joined an internet newsgroup about cruises. The defendant was also a subscriber to the same group. The plaintiffs filed a complaint alleging that the defendant, a California resident, who had no contacts with New Jersey, posted extremely derogatory statements about them on the newsgroup site. The Appellate Division found the statements to be so vile in nature that it did not relay them in the body of the opinion.

Internet Postings & Jurisdiction -- A Defaulting Defendant. A single-count complaint was served on the defendant. He consulted with a lawyer in California who told him that New Jersey had no jurisdiction over him. Accordingly, he failed to file an answer to the complaint and default judgment was entered against him. Normally, it takes merely the filing of a simple request for default form with a certification stating that service was effected and no responsive pleading filed for a plaintiff to be permitted to have a proof hearing for the entry of a judgment in a sum certain against a defaulting defendant.

Whether by this mechanism or another, judgment was entered against the California defendant in a small amount.

Blakey: The New Jersey Supreme Court Opts for the Basics. The Appellate Division first explored the propositions offered in the New Jersey Supreme Court opinion in Blakey v. Continental Airlines, 164 N.J. 38, 751 A.2d 538 (2000). In this case, airline pilots posted derogatory comments on an online bulletin board against a female employee who had filed a lawsuit alleging discrimination against the airline. The bulletin board, although powered by CompuServe, was part of a Continental company-wide network. The plaintiff filed libel actions against the pilots in

New Jersey in addition to her discrimination claims. The pilots moved to dismiss her claims on the basis that they had no contacts with New Jersey. The Supreme Court remanded the suit for further discovery on the ground that there was no evidence that the pilots knew that she had filed her discrimination lawsuit in New Jersey and knew that their messages would be disseminated in the state. Importantly, the Court declined to adopt new jurisdiction propositions for the internet communications field. It placed its comments in the context of the traditional precepts of due process based on minimum contacts and traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. The basic inquiry remains whether the offending party expects to be haled into court in New Jersey. Furthermore, an intentional act will give rise to jurisdiction. Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 386 .

Blakey Not Followed by the Appellate Division. The Appellate Division declined to follow Blakey for an important reason, which a practitioner seeking jurisdiction for an alleged internet offender should heed. The court made a distinction between the Continental site that is accessible only to Continental employees as a closed network and the newsgroup site in Goldhaber, which was not monitored by a moderator. The Court examined precedents from other states. One approach is that the mere fact of posting messages on a newsgroup site, which can be read all over the world, does not convey jurisdiction. Another approach is to uphold jurisdiction where there exists any form of contact, technical or otherwise with the state (e.g., a server in Virginia where the message passed through or soliciting business there).

The Goldhaber court observed that the courts that espouse the view that the mere posting of messages is not sufficient evidence for jurisdiction search for messages that direct or focus the offensive messages on the forum state. This is called by commentators a targeting-based analysis. Closer to this view is the effects approach adopted in Blakey by the New Jersey Supreme Court, which in turn relied on the United States Supreme Courts opinion in Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 104 S.Ct. 1482, 79 L.Ed.2d 804 (1984). Under this approach, jurisdiction may be posited based upon where the effects of the harassment were expected or intended to be felt. . . Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 389. Here, the offending message cannot be what is described as interactive or passive; it must both target and be intended to have effects in New Jersey as the forum state. Accordingly, the court found that Kohlenberg did target New Jersey since he knew that the plaintiffs lived in New Jersey; replied to some of the plaintiffs comments; made derogatory comments about the municipality and its police department; and referred to plaintiffs neighbors in the apartment complex where they resided and even posted the plaintiffs address in one of the postings. The court stated that [c]onduct of that nature and its connection to New Jersey are such that [defendant] should reasonably [have] anticipate[d] being haled into court here. . . Indeed, we would deem it against the policy of our courts to deny these plaintiffs a forum in which to seek redress. Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 390 .

Defendants Service of Process Argument Rejected. The court next addressed the defendants service of process challenges. It rejected his position that the plaintiffs did not file an affidavit of diligent inquiry stating that he could not be served personally in California. The Court based the rejection essentially on the proposition that [d]efault judgments will not be vacated for minor flaws in the service of process. Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 391. The court also rejected the defendants argument that when process was served in California he was away in Nevada, and the person receiving the summons and complaint did not match his description. The court remarked that service of process is proper when someone receiving process at a defendants address promptly transmits the papers to the defendant. Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 391.

Reversing the Default Judgment. Another important procedural aspect of the case is the reversal of the default judgment against the defendant. The case law here is typical in New Jersey: the defendant has to show excusable neglect for not having filed an answer to the complaint in a timely fashion and has to have a meritorious defense to the plaintiffs claims. In this case, the trial court found no excusable neglect, but the Appellate Division did since the defendant relied on the advice of his California attorney in failing to file a responsive pleading to the complaint. It also found a meritorious defense because the defendant asserted in a certification that he had filed a prior suit against the plaintiffs in his home state on the basis that the plaintiffs had accused him falsely of posting defamatory comments about them. Golhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 392.

Lessons From Goldhaber

Long Arm Jurisdiction & New Jersey. The California lawyer in Goldhaber had not paid attention to the fact that New Jersey stays closely to the traditional long-arm precepts and goes just a little farther.

Be Liberal on Minimum Contacts. New Jersey does not go as far as the jurisdictions who find any contact sufficient. However, New Jersey does not like to turn away plaintiffs with valid claims, as demonstrated by the Appellate Divisions statement of the states policy to provide a forum for plaintiffs to seek redress. Therefore, foreign clients should be advised to respond to suits in New Jersey where there exist the slightest indicia that the statements complained of targeted New Jersey so that any effect can be felt in New Jersey by a plaintiff or by others.

When In Doubt a Responsive Pleading Should be Filed. It is more advisable for a practitioner to file a motion to dismiss in lieu of an answer under Rule_4:6-2 of the Rules Governing the Courts of the State of New Jersey than to do nothing. If the practitioner believes that his client truly has no minimum contacts with the State, the motion should be simple and can be based on a certification, along with a simple brief. (The formality of a brief often is ignored but this is not the proper practice.)

When Does Jurisdiction Not Exist? The rare instance in which jurisdiction truly does not exist in New Jersey, and when a practitioner may advise a client to ignore the complaint, is when the comments are general in nature, with no connection with New Jersey, and are out there for the world to see. Note, however, that eventually a default judgment may be entered in New Jersey against the client, and some form of defense will be required in the clients home state to vacate the judgment based on lack of jurisdiction. The calculus yet may be in favor of the clients litigating in his home instead of New Jersey.

A Word on Default Judgments. Default judgments are routinely vacated in New Jersey. The Appellate Division stated the Supreme Courts policy of having them stand only in rare circumstances. Practitioners in the communications or internet fields, however, should be cognizant of the fact that clients from other states often will come to them with default judgments considering the topsy-turvy ways in which process may take place in other states once it leaves New Jersey. Notwithstanding, clients should be advised not to despair: much more likely than not, they will be given their days in the New Jersey courts.

Cross References. 1-1 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pleadings § 1.11 (determining whether New Jersey courts can obtain jurisdiction over defendant); 1-4 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pleadings § 4.03 (checklist: satisfying requirements for obtaining jurisdiction); 1-2 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice § 2.11 (checklist for entry of Default Judgment).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jean-Claude Labady has been a member of the New Jersey bar since 1992. He formerly served as the Managing Partner of Labady & Randolph and headed up the litigation department of the firm. He received his B.A. with honors and M.A. magna cum laude from Rutgers University. Mr. Labady is also a 1992 graduate of the Seton Hall University School of Law. Upon graduation from law school, Mr. Labady served as Judicial Law Clerk to the Hon. Reginald Stanton, Assignment Judge, New Jersey Superior Court (retired). Following his clerkship, Mr. Labady has primarily focused his practice on insurance defense work and has defended insured parties and insurance companies in complex coverage disputes. Mr. Labady was a pioneer in the area of complex fraud litigation on behalf of insurance carriers in New Jersey. He is responsible for decisions of first impression in both health care law and fraud law. Mr. Labady can be reached by email at jlaby@verizon.net.

26 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Convenience Transfer: Vairo on In re Volkswagen of Am. Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 1604

Convenience Transfer: Vairo on In re Volkswagen of Am. Inc.

By Georgene Vairo

December 18, 2007

SUMMARY: The plaintiffs choice is given significant weight even when a defendant seeks to transfer a case under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). The Fifth Circuit in In re Volkswagen of America, addressed the weight the district court must accord to the plaintiffs choice of forum. This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author and editor of several books, including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, discusses this issue and also the use of mandamus to review a district courts convenience transfer order.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In re Volkswagen of Am. Inc., 506 F.3d 376, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 24931 (5th Cir. 2007) (decided Oct. 24, 2007), involves the standard the district court must employ when deciding a convenience transfer motion under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a). Specifically, the court addressed the weight that the district court must accord to the plaintiffs choice of forum. Additionally, as a threshold matter, the court discussed the use of mandamus to review a district courts convenience transfer order.

Procedural Facts. Volkswagen involved an automobile collision in which one person was seriously injured and another killed. The injured person and the survivors of the decedent brought suit against the automobile manufacturer, alleging that a design defect caused their injuries. They filed in the Marshall Division of the Eastern District of Texas, and the defendant sought a convenience transfer to the Dallas Division of the Northern District of Texas, where the car was purchased, where the collision and the injuries occurred. None of the parties or witnesses, nor any element of the claims, resided or took place in the Marshall Division. Nonetheless, the district court denied transfer, holding that the defendant had not satisfied its burden of showing that the balance of convenience and justice weighed substantially in favor of transfer. The defendant then sought a writ of mandamus to compel the district court to transfer.

Availability of Mandamus. Because the district court order was not a final appealable order under 28 U.S.C. § 1291, the defendant sought mandamus. The Fifth Circuit first noted that mandamus is an extraordinary writ that may be issued only in the absence of other adequate remedies when the trial court has exceeded its jurisdiction or has declined to exercise it, or when the trial court has so clearly and indisputably abused its discretion as to compel prompt intervention by the appellate court. Nevertheless, the Fifth Circuit recognizes that it has allowed the use of mandamus as a limited means to test the district court's discretion in issuing transfer orders. For mandamus to issue, the Fifth Circuit decision in Ex parte Chas. Pfizer & Co., 225 F.2d 720, 723 (5th Cir. 1955), is controlling: When determining the propriety of a district court's ruling on a motion to transfer under the convenience transfer statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), the court of appeals must ask (1) whether the district court correctly construed and applied the relevant statutes; (2) whether the district court considered the relevant factors incident to ruling on a motion to transfer; and (3) whether the district court abused its discretion in deciding the motion to transfer. These standards require a careful review of the circumstances presented to and the decision-making process used by the district court. Further, the reviewing court may not replace the district court's exercise of discretion with its own.

The Fifth Circuit is not alone in permitting the use of mandamus in limited circumstances. For example, in Lemon v. Druffel, 253 F.2d 680 (6th Cir. 1958), a case decided shortly after Congress codified § 1404(a), the Sixth Circuit ruled that mandamus was an appropriate remedy to test a district court's discretion on a motion to transfer. That court looked to the Supreme Court decision in Norwood v. Kirkpatrick, 349 U.S. 29 (1955), in which the Court made clear that the convenience transfer statute and the forum non conveniens doctrine were quite different, and that § 1404(a) accorded district judges considerably more discretion: Congress, in writing § 1404 (a), which was an entirely new section, was revising as well as codifying. The harshest result of the application of the old doctrine of forum non conveniens, dismissal of the action, was eliminated by the provision in § 1404 (a) for transfer. When the harshest part of the doctrine is excised by statute, it can hardly be called mere codification. As a consequence, we believe that Congress, by the term "for the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice," intended to permit courts to grant transfers upon a lesser showing of inconvenience. This is not to say that the relevant factors have changed or that the plaintiff's choice of forum is not to be considered, but only that the discretion to be exercised is broader. Because it was so clear in Norwood that the district court correctly construed § 1404(a), the Norwood Court specifically declined to decide whether mandamus was an appropriate remedy. That question was answered indirectly in the affirmative by the Court in Van Dusen v. Barrack, 376 U.S. 612, 615 n. 3; 84 S. Ct. 805, 809 n. 3; 11 L. Ed. 2d 945, 949 n. 3; 1964 U.S. LEXIS 1537 (1964). See also 17-111 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 111.61.

Application of Convenience Transfer Statute. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1404, a district court with proper venue may transfer to another district or division 1) where the action might have been brought here, because the accident took place in the Northern District of Texas; 2) for the convenience of the parties and witnesses; and 3) in the interest of justice. In making a transfer decision, the district court must consider various private and public interest factors. The private interest factors are: (1) the relative ease of access to sources of proof; (2) the availability of compulsory process to secure the attendance of witnesses; (3) the cost of attendance for willing witnesses; and (4) all other practical problems that make trial of a case easy, expeditious and inexpensive. The public interest factors are: (1) the administrative difficulties flowing from court congestion; (2) the local interest in having localized interests decided at home; (3) the familiarity of the forum with the law that will govern the case; and (4) the avoidance of unnecessary problems of conflict of laws or in the application of foreign law.

Weight Given to Plaintiff's Choice of Forum. In addition to the public and private interest factors, the court must also consider the plaintiffs' choice of forum. The district court had given the plaintiffs' choice an elevated status, stating that the moving party must show that the balance of convenience and justice substantially weighs in favor of transfer. This standard, the Fifth Circuit said, reflects the much stricter forum non conveniens dismissal standard, and is inappropriately applied in the 28 U.S.C. § 1404 context.

The Fifth Circuit recognized that its earlier decisions were not a model of clarity in terms of the role of the plaintiff's choice of forum in the venue transfer analysis. Nonetheless, its earlier cases indicate that the plaintiff's choice of forum is to be treated as a burden of proof question rather than one of a presumption." Moreover, it noted that the heavy burden traditionally imposed on defendants by the forum non conveniens doctrine that is dismissal permitted only in favor of a substantially more convenient alternative was eliminated in the § 1404 context. Accordingly, the district court applied the wrong standard on the weight of the plaintiffs choice and its relationship to the other factors.

Rather, according to the Fifth Circuit, the plaintiff's choice of forum was entitled to deference: this deference establishes the burden that a moving party must meet in seeking a 28 U.S.C. § 1404 transfer. The party seeking transfer must show good cause," meaning that the moving party must demonstrate that the transfer is for the convenience of the parties and witnesses and in the interest of justice as required by § 1404. When the transferee forum is no more convenient than the chosen forum, the plaintiff's choice should not be disturbed. When the transferee forum is clearly more convenient, a transfer should be ordered.

This standard, the Fifth Circuit said, is consistent with the language and with the intended purpose and effect of § 1404, which provides that a district court may transfer any civil action [f]or the convenience of parties and witnesses, in the interest of justice." Other language that has appeared in some decisions, such as that the plaintiff's choice is highly esteemed" or strongly favored," the Fifth Circuit criticized as vague and unworkable. These formulations were derived primarily from forum non conveniens cases, and § 1404 was intended to be a departure from that standard.

Balance of Factors. Additionally, while the Fifth Circuit ruled that the district court erroneously applied the stricter forum non conveniens dismissal standard and did not give the proper weight to the plaintiffs' choice of forum, it also ruled that the district court abused its discretion in failing to properly consider and apply some of the private and public interest factors.

One of these factors requires the court to consider the relative ease of access to sources of proof. The district court observed that all the documents and physical evidence relating to the accident were located in the Dallas Division. The district court found, however, that this factor did not weigh in favor of transfer as this factor has become less significant because of advances in copying technology and information storage. The Fifth Circuit agreed that advances in technology affect the access to sources of proof, and that district courts should consider the actual convenience or inconvenience of accessing sources of proof. However, this factor has not become superfluous. The district court erred in not considering this factor, which clearly weighed in favor of transfer, although its precise weight might be subject to debate. The district court also failed to give sufficient consideration to other private and public interest factors that favored transfer, including the availability of compulsory process to secure the attendance of witnesses, the cost of attendance for willing witnesses, and the local interest in having localized interests decided at home.

Under a proper application of the factors, no relevant factor favored the chosen forum. Accordingly, the district court abused its discretion by failing to order transfer. The Fifth Circuit granted the petition for mandamus to correct this abuse of discretion.

Conclusion. Even when a defendant seeks to transfer a case under 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a), as opposed to making a motion to dismiss under the forum non conveniens doctrine, as a general rule, the plaintiffs choice is given significant weight. However, even so, the plaintiffs choice must be weighed against the relevant public and private factors. See 17-111 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 111.13 [1][c][i]. Moreover, the plaintiffs choice is given more or less weight, depending on whether the plaintiff resides in the chosen forum, and on whether the operative events took place in the chosen forum. See 17-111 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 111.13[1][c][i-iii]. Accordingly, the Fifth Circuit was correct to grant mandamus and remand for further consideration.

A reading of the Fifth Circuits opinion may prompt the question whether venue was proper in the Marshall Division of the Eastern District in the first place. This is an important question because it determines whether the defendant could have moved to dismiss or transfer under 28 U.S.C. § 1406, rather than 1404(a). Had the motion been made under § 1406, the plaintiff could have lost the benefit of favorable law that otherwise would have been retained in a diversity case under Van Dusen v. Barrack. Since both districts in this case were in Texas, it is not likely that the distinction would have mattered. But, had the transferee district been in another state, it might have.

In any event, venue was proper in the Eastern District of Texas. As the district court pointed out, in a diversity action, such as this, venue is proper in a judicial district in which "any defendant resides." 28 U.S.C. § 1391(a)(1). When the defendant is a corporation, the corporation is "deemed to reside in any district in that State within which its contacts would be sufficient to be subject it to personal jurisdiction." 28 U.S.C. § 1391(c). Venue was proper in the Eastern District of Texas because there was no question that Volkswagen, a corporation licensed to do business in the State of Texas, was subject to personal jurisdiction in the Eastern District. Furthermore, venue was proper in any division in that District.

References: 17-111 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 111.13 [1][c]; 17-111 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 111.61.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

27 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Work-Product & Attorney-Client Privilege Doctrines in Compton v. Safeway, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 1612

Best on Work-Product and Attorney-Client Privilege Doctrines in Compton v. Safeway, Inc.

By Arthur Best

December 18, 2007

SUMMARY: In a case involving an injury at the defendants premises, the Colorado Supreme Court considered whether attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine can protect statements made by two of the defendants workers to the defendants own risk management and loss control department. It held that the statements were discoverable. In this commentary, Prof. Arthur Best discusses the implications of this decision on companies, noting that they might want to structure their responses to accidents in ways that might make application of these privileges more likely.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Factual Background of Compton v. Safeway, Inc., 169 P.3d 135 (Colo. 2007). Attempting to bring boxes of Pepperidge Farm food products into the basement of a Safeway store, a delivery worker named Stephen Compton tripped on something and was injured. He was employed by Pepperidge Farm and not by Safeway. About two months after he was hurt, Compton hired a lawyer. The lawyer wrote to Safeway asserting that Safeway was responsible for Comptons injury and asking it to inform its insurer of the claim. Safeway is self-insured and maintains its own risk management and loss control department. After receiving the letter from Comptons lawyer, a Safeway claims adjuster obtained statements from two Safeway employees who had witnessed the injury. Safeway determined that it was not at fault and refused Comptons claim. Compton then filed suit against Safeway and requested copies of the employees statements. Safeway objecting on grounds of attorney work product and attorney-client privileges, and the trial court refused to compel discovery. The Supreme Court issued a rule to show cause.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Work-Product, in General. Discovery under the Colorado Rules of Civil Procedure is limited by the work-product doctrine under Rule 26, to the extent that documents or information sought were obtained by a party or a partys representative in anticipation of litigation. See C.R.C.P. 26(b)(3). With regard to the concept of "anticipation of litigation," Hawkins v. Dist. Ct., 638 P.2d 1372 (Colo. 1982) held that to obtain the protection of Rule 26, the party resisting discovery must demonstrate that the document was prepared or obtained in contemplation of specific litigation. The rule does not protect materials prepared in the ordinary course of business, whether litigation had already commenced or not.

See 6-26 Moore's Federal Practice Civil for a comprehensive overview of work-product doctrines.

Work-Product and Insurance Companies. Hawkins also held, in the specific context of an insurance company's discovery obligations, that when an insurance company compiles statements by witnesses to injuries, there is a presumption that those statements are prepared in the normal course of business because those materials are ordinary business records rather than trial preparation materials.

Distinguishing Normal Insurance Company Business from Litigation-Related Activity. The presumption that statements gathered by an insurer are collected in the ordinary course of business can be overcome if the statements are collected after a specific claim has arisen for the purpose of defending that claim, if a claim has already been filed or if there is a substantial probability of imminent litigation. Hawkins, 638 P.2d 1372, 1379.

Attorney-Client Privilege in the Corporate Setting. For attorney-client privilege to protect communications made in the corporate setting, there must be a showing that the confidential statements were made in the course of obtaining counsel, advice, or direction with respect to the business entity's obligations.

Colorado Evidence Courtroom Manual, Chapter 501 and Colorado Evidentiary Foundations § 7.F analyze Colorado cases on attorney-client privilege.

The Colorado Supreme Court's Decision

Equivalence of Insurers and Self-Insurers. The Colorado Supreme Court held first that a self-insurer should be treated identically to an independent insurance company with regard to issues such as a description of its ordinary business. Even though the insurance aspect of its operations is only a part of the overall enterprise's activities, when a company decides to become self-insured, discovery obligations related to its self-insurance function should be treated under Hawkins.

Anticipation of Litigation. The crucial issue for resolving the work-product issue was whether the statements had been obtained in anticipation of litigation. The defendant's risk management personnel collected the statements after the company received a letter indicating that the potential claimant was represented by counsel. Representation indicated that litigation was possible, but in the view of the Court, litigation is possible in every insurance claim and that fact alone did not satisfy the Hawkins requirement of substantial probability of imminent litigation.

Investigation Precedes Imminence of Litigation. The Court noted that the statements were obtained more than a month before the defendant concluded its investigation and decided to deny the claim. In the Court's analysis, litigation did not become imminent until the claim was denied, so statements gathered prior to the claim denial could not be protected by the work-product privilege. The defendant had obtained a very brief accident report shortly after the plaintiff's injury occurred. It did not obtain statements from witnesses until after the plaintiff's lawyer contacted the defendant. This chronology failed to support an argument by the defendant that its first accident report constituted a general investigation of the claim and that the more detailed work by its claims department was done because the company anticipated litigation.

Attorney-Client Privilege. The statements were outside the protection of attorney-client privilege because there was no evidence that any Safeway lawyer had any involvement in the investigation of the claim. To be covered by the privilege, the statements would have to have been made to Safeway in the course of obtaining counsel, advice, or direction with respect to the company's rights or obligations. See People v. Trujillo, 144 P.3d 539 (Colo. 2006).

Discovery Allowed. The Supreme Court ordered the trial court to compel discovery of the statements.

Comments

Narrow Application of Work-Product Privilege. This opinion reinforces the Court's general position on the limited application of work-product protection to information compiled by insurers and self-insuring companies in response to claims. Particularly where an inquiry by counsel does not threaten litigation, it is highly unlikely that investigations conducted in response to such inquiries will be treated as having been made where there is a substantial probability of imminent litigation.

Practice Tip: Counsel representing claimants should be aware of this trend in drafting initial inquiry letters and in conducting discovery in cases that do eventuate in litigation.

Practice Tip: The Courts persistence in allowing only the narrowest scope of work-product protection to insurance and insurance-like investigations of claims suggests that a similar approach would apply to parallel circumstances in large non-self-insuring enterprises that collect accident reports and investigate accidents.

Attorney-Client Privilege. The Courts treatment of this issue was extremely brief. The lack of any involvement by lawyers in the claims department work related to this incident made it impossible for the defendant to obtain protection of that privilege. The Courts reference to Trujillo indicates that it intends to restrict the privilege to instances in which a business entitys lawyers have a genuine role in the gathering of the information sought to be protected by privilege.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored) a popular law school casebook.

28 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Best on Confrontation Clause & Crime Lab Reports in Hinojos-Mendoza v. People

2008 Emerging Issues 1614

Best on the Confrontation Clause and Crime Lab Reports in Hinojos-Mendoza v. People

By Arthur Best

December 18, 2007

SUMMARY: Is a police crime lab report testimonial hearsay and therefore covered by the Confrontation Clause? Since these reports are a lot like typical business records, should they be exempt from the testimonial category? States have varied in their treatment of this issue, but the Colorado Supreme Court has analyzed the United States Supreme Courts recent Confrontation Clause cases and concluded that crime lab reports are the type of hearsay that should be defined as testimonial. In this commentary, Prof. Arthur Best discusses Hinojos-Mendoza, the Confrontation Clause, hearsay, and a state statute governing introduction of evidence from police crime labs.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview

Is a police crime lab report testimonial hearsay and therefore covered by the Confrontation Clause? Since these reports are a lot like typical business records, should they be exempt from the testimonial category? States have varied in their treatment of this issue, but the Colorado Supreme Court has analyzed the United States Supreme Courts recent Confrontation Clause cases and concluded that crime lab reports are the type of hearsay that should be defined as testimonial. For that reason their use is subject to significant restrictions. However, the states statute that requires a defendant to request testimony by a lab employee at least ten days prior to trial does not violate the Confrontation Clause.

Summary of the Case

Hinojos-Mendoza was convicted of possession with intent to distribute more than one thousand grams of cocaine. At trial, the state introduced a lab report from the Colorado Bureau of Investigation stating that a tan taped wrapped block of compressed powder contained 1004.5 grams of cocaine. There was possibly some ambiguity about whether the 1004.5 grams statement referred only to the cocaine or referred to the cocaine and its packaging. This ambiguity was important to the defendant. The maximum sentence for possession with intent to distribute less than one thousand grams of cocaine is significantly shorter than the maximum sentence for a crime involving one thousand or more grams.

Defense counsel made a hearsay objection to introduction of the report. The trial court overruled the objection because the defendant had failed to request testimony by the lab employee who performed the analysis prior to ten days before the date of the trial. Colo. Rev. Stat. § 16-3-309(5) imposes this requirement:

Any report or copy thereof . . . of the criminalistics laboratory shall be received in evidence in any court . . . in the same manner and with the same force and effect as if the employee or technician of the criminalistics laboratory who accomplished the requested analysis, comparison, or identification had testified in person. Any party may request that such employee or technician testify in person at a criminal trial on behalf of the state before a jury or to the court, by notifying the witness and other party at least ten days before the date of such criminal trial.

Following his conviction, while Hinojos-Mendozas direct appeal was pending, the United States Supreme Court decided Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36, 124 S. Ct. 1354, 158 L. Ed. 2d 177 (2004). Based on that decision, Hinojos-Mendoza argued that section 16-3-309(5) was both facially unconstitutional and unconstitutional as applied in his case.

The Court of Appeals held that the lab report was nontestimonial hearsay and therefore outside the coverage of the Confrontation Clause. It did not consider the challenges to the statute because those issues had not been raised at trial.

Pertinent Legal Principles

Hearsay and the Confrontation Clause. In Crawford and subsequently in Davis v. Washington, 547 U.S. 813; 126 S. Ct. 2266, 165 L. Ed. 2d 224 (2006) the Supreme Court held that the Confrontation Clause applies only to testimonial hearsay. The Colorado Supreme Court has adopted the Crawford analysis for treatment of hearsay under the state constitutions Confrontation Clause. See Compan v. People, 121 P.3d 876, 884 (Colo. 2005). Under that test, a statement is testimonial if its primary purpose is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to a criminal prosecution or if an objective witness would reasonably believe that the statement would be available for use at a trial.

Waiver of Constitutional Rights. With regard to waiver of constitutional rights, People v. Mojica-Simental, 73 P.3d 15 (Colo. 2003) held that waiver of the right to testify must be voluntary, knowing and intentional. It stated in dictum that the same requirements apply to waiver of confrontation rights.

The Colorado Supreme Courts Decision. The Court found that crime lab reports are testimonial hearsay. It also found that the notice statute is constitutional and permits waiver by a defendants counsel. The Court did not consider whether the defendants counsel provided adequate assistance.

Crime Lab Reports Are Testimonial. The Supreme Court noted that the lab report listed Hinojos-Mendoza as suspect and listed an offense as cocaine sell. It was prepared at the direction of the police and a copy of it was transmitted to the district attorneys office. Interestingly, the Court of Appeals had found that the lab report was not prepared at the express direction of the prosecutor for litigation and that it contained no directly accusatory statements about the defendant. The Supreme Court took a less technical and more common-sense approach to characterizing the report. Its view of the purpose and likely use of the report led it to characterize the report as testimonial. The Court went so far as to refer to it as having all the characteristics of an ex parte affidavit.

In some other states, courts have treated crime lab reports as business records and concluded that so long as the requirements for the business record exception are met, the Confrontation Clause cannot bar their admission. The Colorado Supreme Court dealt with that analysis explicitly, and correctly rejected it. Reliability, which is the basis for the business records exception, has no logical connection with the current constitutional analysis of hearsay and the Confrontation Clause.

Detailed analysis of the new Confrontation Clause jurisprudence is found in Criminal Evidentiary Foundations § 10.01, and Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 14.03.

Demand Requirement for Testimony by Lab Technician Is Constitutional. Unfortunately for the defendant, the Court found that admission of the report did not violate his Confrontation Clause rights because his attorney had waived the opportunity to require testimony from the crime lab employee who tested the seized material. If the dictum in Mojica-Simental had properly described the law, there could not have been a waiver of the Confrontation Clause right.

The Court in the current case held that the Mojica-Simental dictum failed to describe the law properly. Relinquishing the right to testify (the right at stake in Mojica-Simental) must be done personally by the defendant and must be voluntary, knowing, and intentional. However, determining what procedures are required for waiver depends on the right at stake. The rights to counsel, to testify, and to trial by jury are so personal and fundamental that they require personal waiver by the defendant. In contrast, the confrontation right is in the class of rights that defense counsel can waive through strategic decisions, such as choosing whether and how to conduct cross-examination or by stipulating to the admission of evidence.

Comments & Practice Tips

Divided Court. Counsel should be aware that two justices dissented with regard to the waiver issue. The dissenting opinion suggests that the majority treated the passage of the ten-day period in the waiver statute as equivalent to a showing that the defendant and the defendant's attorney knew the law and chose to make a voluntary and intentional waiver. The dissenting opinion contends that an irrebuttable presumption should not be used to effect the waiver of a fundamental right.

Practice Tip: Since one justice did not participate, the Courts holding with regard to the constitutionality of the waiver statute had the support of only four justices. This suggests that the issue might reasonably be considered afresh in an appropriate case.

Decisions Value to Defendants. Application of the Confrontation Clause to lab reports will mean that in cases where the lab technician who conducted an original test is not available to testify, introduction of the test results will be forbidden. The prosecution in such an instance will have to forego use of the test results or will have to commission a new test.

Practice Tip: Where a technician does testify, defense counsel should take the opportunity to probe techniques used in the analysis and any deficiencies in the records the technician made at the time of the test. For example, in this case ambiguity about whether the drugs wrappings were included in the stated weight would be an important topic for cross-examination.

Application Beyond Crime Lab Reports. The Courts recognition that the lab report should be considered testimonial makes it clear that the Court will not attempt to avoid the impact of the new Confrontation Clause jurisprudence adopted by the United States Supreme Court in Crawford and Davis. This direction is likely to continue as the Court considers related Confrontation Clause issues, particularly related to statements made by declarants in settings that do not directly involve police or prosecutors. See People v. Vigil, 127 P.3d 916 (Colo. 2006) (to determine whether questioning by someone outside of law enforcement is the functional equivalent of police questioning, a court should consider the extent of involvement by government officials in producing the statement and whether their purpose was to develop testimony for use at a trial).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Arthur Best is a Professor of Law at the University of Denver Sturm College of Law. Prior to entering teaching, he served in the general counsels office of the Federal Communications Commission, was a litigator for the Federal Trade Commission, was a project director for Ralph Naders Center for Study of Responsive Law, and was a Deputy Commissioner of the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs. His books include the widely-used evidence text Evidence: Examples and Explanations, the semi-annual Supplement volumes to Wigmore on Evidence, and Basic Tort Law (co-authored) a popular law school casebook.

29 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ferstendig on Summary Judgments in Serious Injury, No-Fault Threshold Cases

2008 Emerging Issues 1544

David L. Ferstendig on Summary Judgments in Serious Injury, No-Fault Threshold Cases

By David L. Ferstendig

December 17, 2007

SUMMARY: Defendants who are prepared to concede the liability phase of a case subject to the no-fault threshold are well-advised to reserve expressly their right to litigate the serious injury issue. There is a divergence of opinion in the Appellate Division as to whether a finding of liability necessarily determines the serious injury issue. This Emerging Issues Analysis, analyzes the Department split regarding this issue.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Defendants who are prepared to concede the liability phase of a case subject to the no-fault threshold are well-advised to reserve expressly their right to litigate the serious injury issue. There is a divergence of opinion in the Appellate Division as to whether a finding of liability necessarily determines the serious injury issue. The Fourth Department treats the grant of summary judgment on liability as including a determination of serious injury. The remaining departments, taking a more efficient approach, allow the parties to resolve the liability issue by summary judgment and litigate the serious injury issue in the damages phase of the case. Until the Court of Appeals rules, however, defendants in all departments should protect their interests in an excess of caution.

Fourth Department: Grant of summary judgment on liability necessarily decides serious injury issue. The Fourth Department of the Appellate Division concludes that the grant of summary judgment on liability necessarily includes the issue of serious injury. The reasoning behind this position is that the serious injury issue is a threshold determination and is a required element of plaintiff's prima facie case that must be pleaded. Ruzycki v. Baker, 301 A.D.2d 48, 52, 750 N.Y.S.2d 680, 683 (4th Dep't 2002) (the finding of Liability in a motor vehicle accident case includes serious injury issue). See also Leahey v. Fitzgerald, 1 A.D.3d 924, 926, 768 N.Y.S.2d 55, 57 (4th Dep't 2003) ([P]laintiffs failed to establish that plaintiff sustained a serious injury as a matter of law, a necessary element of a finding of liability).

Interestingly, the Fourth Department distinguishes between a finding of liability and negligence. Thus, the relief sought by the plaintiff who moves for summary judgment on the liability issue without raising the serious injury issue, is more accurately described as a determination of the issue of negligence' rather than liability'. Ruzycki v. Baker, 301 A.D.2d 48, 51, 750 N.Y.S.2d 680, 683. However, parties who concede liability waive their right to contest the serious injury issue. See Simone v. City of Niagara Falls, 281 A.D.2d 923, 721 N.Y.S.2d 892 (4th Dep't 2001) (defendants conceded serious injury case as part of stipulation on liability and trial was limited to damages).

Although the First Department was in accord (see Maldonado v. DePalo, 227 A.D.2d 21, 715 N.Y.S.2d 245 (1st Dep't 2000)), it has since reversed itself. See Shinn v. Catanzaro, 1 A.D.3d 195, 199, 767 N.Y.S.2d 88, 92 (1st Dep't 2003), citing Reid v. Brown, 308 A.D.2d 331, 764 N.Y.S.2d 260 (1st Dep't 2003).

Remaining Departments: Determination of liability does not decide serious injury issue. The remaining departments are concerned that allowing summary judgment on liability to establish serious injury would be contrary to the intent of the No-Fault Law. The plaintiff has the burden to prove, and the court has the obligation to determine, that the plaintiff sustained a serious injury. The courts reasoned that they would be shirking their duty if they permitted the plaintiff to recover merely because the defendant conceded liability.

In Zecca v. Riccardelli, 293 A.D.2d 31, 742 N.Y.S.2d 76 (2d Dep't 2002), the plaintiffs in two separate actions asserted that the orders granting their summary judgment motions on the issue of liability, necessarily decided the serious injury issue in their favor. The court held, however, that to rule the issue of serious injury as being necessarily resolved in favor of a plaintiff, even where no evidence of such injury is presented, was directly contradictory to the purpose of the No-Fault law:

[B]y holding that the issue of serious injury is "necessarily" resolved in favor of the plaintiff even when no evidence of such injury is presented, the courts may be authorizing recovery for minor injuries, which is contrary to the purpose of the No-Fault Law as set forth above. It is the plaintiff's burden to establish that he or she has sustained a serious injury within the definition of NY CLS Ins § 5102(d). Further, the court is charged with the duty of determining, as a threshold matter, whether the plaintiff has presented proof of such an injury. Accordingly, the court would be abdicating its duty by allowing a plaintiff to recover for minor injuries, merely because the defendant failed to, or chose not to, respond to a motion for summary judgment on liability. Lack of opposition to a motion for summary judgment on the issue of liability, be it negligent or purposeful, is not justification to relieve the plaintiff of his or her burden to submit adequate evidence of his or her injury.

293 A.D.2d at 35, 742 N.Y.S.2d at 79.

The recent case of Abbas v. Cole, 44 A.D.3d 31, 840 N.Y.S.2d 388 (2d Dept 2007), applied the reasoning of Zecca in determining an opposed motion for leave to enter a default judgment:

[B]y requiring the plaintiff, even upon the default of the defendant, to nevertheless submit proof that he or she has sustained a serious injury, we are comporting with the original legislative intent of the "No-Fault" Law, which was "to eliminate recovery in a common-law tort action for minor personal injuries" (Zecca v. Riccardelli, 293 A.D.2d 31, 33 [2002]).

44 A.D.3d at 34, 840 N.Y.S.2d at 391. Significantly, in Abbas, (i) the complaint did not allege that the plaintiff had sustained a serious injury, and (ii) it was unclear whether the plaintiff had alleged serious injury in the motion to enter the default judgment. Compare Beresford v. Waheed, 302 A.D.2d 342, 343, 754 N.Y.S.2d 350, 352 (2d Dep't 2003), decided on procedural grounds, in which the Court held that the defendant was precluded under the law of the case doctrine from raising the serious injury issue at a second inquest because the defaulting defendant had conceded the serious injury issue pleaded and raised by the plaintiff:

In contrast to Zecca, the instant case did not involve an unopposed motion for summary judgment. Here, the defendant opposed the plaintiff's motion for leave to enter a default judgment by cross moving to compel service of his proposed answer. The defendant, in his cross motion, raised the issue of a meritorious defense without addressing the issue of serious injury. In this case, the issue of whether the defendant set forth a meritorious defense, including the issue of serious injury, was fully litigated on the merits.

302 A.D.2d at 343. See also Van Nostrand v. Froehlich, 44 A.D.3d 54, 55, 844 N.Y.S.2d 293 (2d Dep't 2007) (majority finds prejudgment interest should run from date of liability determination, either by default, summary judgment, or bifurcated liability trial, even though the plaintiff has yet to establish the existence of a serious injury).

Conclusion

As has been noted, the peculiar nature of a "serious injury" claim crosses the boundaries of both the liability and the damages spheres of a lawsuit. While the injuries sustained by a plaintiff in an action arising from a motor vehicle accident constitute the measure of his or her damages, it is the "serious" nature of those injuries which must be established before any recovery for pain and suffering can be obtained (see NY CLS Ins § 5104).

Abbas v. Cole, 44 A.D.3d at 33-34, 840 N.Y.S.2d at 390.

The Fourth Department ruling in Ruzycki not only directly contradicts the purpose of the No-Fault Law, but it also relies on a First Department case which was later expressly overruled by the same department.

We are now left with three of four departments agreeing that a finding of liability does not necessarily determine the serious injury issue. We await a final determination of the Court of Appeals. Until then, defendants should be careful not to concede the serious injury issue, by failing to address it, whether in a stipulation conceding liability, or in opposition to a summary judgment motion or a motion for a default judgment.

Cross References. Weinstein, Korn & Miller, New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 3212.03: Summary Judgment Available in All Actions; LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 7.09: Moving for Summary Judgment; Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 21.07: Motion for Summary Judgment; Bender's Forms for the Civil Practice CPLR 3212 et seq.: Motion for Summary Judgment.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David L. Ferstendig, currently a member of the Law Offices of David L. Ferstendig, LLC, New York, was a founding officer of the law firm Breindel & Ferstendig, P.C. He litigates a spectrum of civil and corporate matters, including: contract, products liability, environmental, toxic torts, reinsurance and insurance issues, and trade secrets. Mr. Ferstendig is also an adjunct law professor at New York Law School, where he teaches New York Practice. In addition to being a member of the Weinstein, Korn and Miller Editorial Board, he is the author of the LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation, the Editor of the CPLR Manual, a General Editor and author of CPLR Practice Insights in New York Consolidated Law Service, and an update author of Timetable for New York Civil Practice from LexisNexis. He is also the Chair of the Civil Practice Law and Rules Committee of the New York State Bar Association. Mr. Ferstendig has lectured on civil practice issues for bar associations, the New York State Judicial Institute, and LexisNexis.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

30 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

William C. Bochet on Impink v. Reynes

2008 Emerging Issues 1504

William C. Bochet on Impink v. Reynes, 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 351 (App. Div. 2007)

By William C. Bochet

December 14, 2007

SUMMARY: Ancient concepts as to the sanctity of contracts were held to trump the best interests of a child in Impink v. Reynes, 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 351 (App. Div. 2007). The case involved whether or not a trial court could compel a liability insurance carrier to use settlement proceeds to purchase a structured settlement annuity on behalf of an infant plaintiff in a personal injury case.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Appellate Division Bars Forced Structured Settlement

Contracts Beat Children. Ancient concepts as to the sanctity of contracts were held to trump the best interests of a child in Impink v. Reynes, 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 351 (App. Div. 2007). The case involved whether or not a trial court could compel a liability insurance carrier to use settlement proceeds to purchase a structured settlement annuity on behalf of an infant plaintiff in a personal injury case. The insurer offered its entire policy proceeds to the plaintiff to settle the claims against its insured arising from a child who became legally blind in one eye. The injury occurred when the infant plaintiff was accidentally shot in the eye with a paint ball.

The guardian of the injured child was willing to accept the policy limit ($300,000), but wanted a portion of the funds used to purchase an annuity that would pay tax-free money over a period of time. The defendants' insurer insisted upon a cash payment unless it received a discount. Ultimately, the case was settled for a cash payment of $300,000.

Not So Friendly. A parent does not have the right to enter into a binding settlement of a child's personal injury case without approval of the court. Such approval is sought in proceedings brought under N.J. Ct. R. 4:44, either as part of a pending case or in a separate action. Evidence is presented as to the terms of a proposed settlement and its reasonableness in light of issues of liability and damages. The disposition of the proceeds is also considered, including attorneys' fees and costs. The hearing is commonly referred to as a "Friendly."

Although the parties in Impink agreed to a lump sum payment, the plaintiff moved for an order to have the defendants' carrier use a portion of the settlement monies to purchase a deferred payment annuity. The trial court granted the motion, finding that the best interests of the child were served by a structured settlement and that the insurer was not prejudiced. The carrier appealed.

The Importance of the Insurer's Purchase of the Annuity. A structured settlement is an arrangement that allows for payment of funds over a period of time. These could be periodic payments, lump-sum payments at various stages, or both. Typically, the liability insurer purchases an annuity or assigns the obligation to make payment to a third party via a qualified assignment.

The advantage of a structure is that the future payments are not subject to income tax under the Income Tax Code (26 U.S.C. § 104 and § 130). For this to happen, however, the payments must be payable by a party to the action or a qualified assignee under the Act. A claimant does not have the right to purchase an annuity and have the payments qualify for tax-free status. Thus, the trial judge ordered the insurer to act.

Courts Cannot Alter the Terms. The Appellate Division reversed the trial judge's order. It held that the parties had entered into a settlement for a lump-sum payment, not a structured settlement. The court had no authority to change the settlement terms. Its power to approve an infant's settlement was an up-or-down process.

The opinion by the Honorable Thomas M. Lyons, J.A.D. gently condemned the trial court's order on traditional contract grounds. Absent ambiguity, courts should enforce contracts as they are made. Karl's Sales & Serv., Inc., v. Gimbel Bros., Inc., 249 N.J. Super. 487, 493, 592 A.2d 647 (App. Div. 1991) certif. denied 127 N.J. 548 (1991). A settlement is such a contract, Jennings v. Reed, 381 N.J. Super. 217, 227, 885 A.2d 482 (App. Div. 2005).

The inviolability of the settlement terms may not be breached by the court, even in the name of the best interests of a child. Citing Kinsella v. Kinsella, 150 N.J. 276, 696 A.2d 556 (1997) and other cases asserting a court's role in parens patriae for children, the appellate panel made it clear that equity powers do not extend to changing the terms of a settlement.

Back in the Future. The Appellate Division sent the case back for consideration of the appropriateness of the settlement terms by the trial court. This gives rise to the intriguing possibility that the court will not approve a lump-sum payment. The defendants' carrier would then be in a position where it may risk acting in bad faith by refusing to offer a structured settlement without a discount from the policy limit. The insurer has an affirmative duty to protect its insured by settling the case without exposing them to excess liability Rova Farms Resort, Inc., v. Investors Ins. Co. of Am., 64 N.J. 474, 323 A.2d 495 (1974). The carrier may have no choice but to ultimately accede to a structured settlement.

Cross References. LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Trial & Post-Trial § 11.19: Participating in Civil Appeal Settlement Program.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

31 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Burton on Presumption of Validity of Trademark

2008 Emerging Issues 1517

Burton on Presumption of Validity of Trademark

By Don Burton

December 14, 2007

SUMMARY: A registered trademark that is entitled to a statutory presumption of validity may still be deemed "weak" and unprotectable. The presumption is rebuttable, and, where there was evidence in the record suggesting the presumption could be rebutted, the Sixth Circuit held in Leelanau Wine Cellars that the trial court should assess such evidence.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: A registered trademark that is entitled to a statutory presumption of validity may still be deemed "weak" and unprotectable. The presumption is rebuttable, and, where there was evidence in the record suggesting the presumption could be rebutted, the Sixth Circuit held in Leelanau Wine Cellars that the trial court should assess such evidence.

A trademark registered on the Principal Register of the United States Patent and Trademark Office is entitled to use the symbol (15 U.S.C. § 1111), and the layperson entitled to use a registered mark surely assumes that such a mark would be viewed as valid and entitled to protection in the federal courts. That assumption, however, is not necessarily correct, as illustrated in Leelanau Wine Cellars, Ltd. v. Black & Red, Inc., 502 F.3d 504, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 22409 (6th Cir. 2007).

Strength of trademark under caselaw.

Leelanau involved a trademark -- "Leelanau Cellars" -- that the court deemed to be merely descriptive. Marks are classified on a spectrum that includes "arbitrary" or "fanciful," "suggestive," "descriptive," and "generic." Id. at 512-513. Classic examples of each type of mark are listed in A&H Sportswear, Inc. v. Victoria's Secret Stores, Inc., 237 F.3d 198, 221 (3d Cir. 2000):

Arbitrary or fanciful: "KODAK" (a made up word and thus fanciful; "APPLE" as used by a computer company is an arbitrary mark);

Suggestive: "COPPERTONE";

Descriptive: "SECURITY CENTER";

Generic: "DIET CHOCOLATE FUDGE SODA."

"Only those marks that are 'distinctive' as a matter of law are accorded trademark protection." Id. at 512. Marks classified as arbitrary, fanciful, or suggestive are considered "inherently distinctive" and entitled to protection, while generic marks "never qualify for trademark protection." Id. at 513. Marks in the category in between, descriptive, can qualify for protection, but only if they acquire "secondary meaning," which means that in the mind of the public the mark identifies the source of the product. Id. For example, marks that are merely surnames are considered descriptive, but some have clearly acquired secondary meaning, like McDonald's. In general, though, the secondary meaning requirement presents a significant hurdle for a trademark litigant; in many of the litigated cases, evidence of secondary meaning was found wanting (e.g., Eagle Snacks, Inc. v. Nabisco Brands, Inc., 625 F. Supp. 571 (D. N.J. 1985) ("HONEY ROASTED"); Ralston Purina Co. v. Thomas J. Lipton, Inc., 341 F. Supp. 129 (S.D. N.Y. 1972) ("TENDER VITTLES"); but cf. The Committee for Idaho's High Desert, Inc. v. Yost, 92 F.3d 814, 823 (9th Cir. 1996) ("COMMITTEE FOR IDAHO'S HIGH DESERT" had acquired secondary meaning)).

THE STATUTORY PRESUMPTION.

Overlaying this classification system is the principle, enacted in § 15 U.S.C. § 1115(a), that the fact of registration on the Principal Register "shall be prima facie evidence of the validity of the registered mark." This rule means that, if the mark is descriptive, yet also registered, then it is presumed to have acquired distinctiveness, i.e., it has secondary meaning. Leelanau at 514.

The presumption is rebuttable, however. In an infringement action on a descriptive, registered mark, "[t]he effect of the statutory presumption contained in § 1115(a) is to shift the burden of proof to the alleged infringer . . . to prove the absence of secondary meaning." Id.

APPLYING THE PRESUMPTION IN A CASE INVOLVING A MARK THAT IS NOT INHERENTLY DISTINCTIVE.

In Leelanau, the mark "Leelanau Cellars" was deemed descriptive for a brand of wine because it referred to a geographic place of origin, which is a common example of a merely descriptive mark ("Leelanau" signifies Michigan's Leelanau Peninsula, an "Approved American Viticultural Area" under federal regulations, Id. at *2). "LEELANAU CELLARS" was, however, a registered mark. As a descriptive yet registered mark, it was entitled to the statutory presumption of validity, which as to a descriptive mark means a statutory presumption of secondary meaning, but the defendant "was . . . free to attempt to rebut the § 1115 presumption." Leelanau at 514. The appellate court did not expressly rule as to whether the presumption of secondary meaning was rebutted on the evidence before it, since it disposed of the appeal on the ground that Leelanau Wine Cellars failed to prove a likelihood of confusion. (The finding of no likelihood of confusion was predicated mainly on the different marketing channels used by the parties -- the defendant's "Chateau de Leelanau" wines were sold primarily through its own tasting rooms.) The court nevertheless "note[d] that there is strong evidence in the record tending to undermine LWC's claim of secondary meaning," and that the district court "failed to assess the evidence in the record to determine whether the presumption had been rebutted," Id.; further, the court alluded to the weakness of LWC's mark in the discussion of likelihood of confusion, in particular, to the evidence of lack of secondary meaning, Id. at 516.

CONCLUSION AND PRACTICE TIPS:

For the alleged infringer, Leelanau suggests that, even if that evidence introduced to rebut secondary meaning does not result in an express finding of a lack of secondary meaning, the evidence can nevertheless pay dividends when the court considers the strength of the mark as a factor in its analysis of the likelihood of confusion. In Leelanau, while the appellate court declined to rule expressly on the issue of secondary meaning, it did hold that the mark was not strong, in part because there was a "substantially decreased . . . possibility" that a consumer confronted with the name LEELANAU CELLARS would "necessarily think of LWC's product," rather than the geographic area, Id. at 516, which is essentially a finding that the mark lacked secondary meaning.

In light of that discussion in Leelanau, the practitioner representing the owner of the registered mark should not rely solely on the presumption deriving from the fact of registration to prove distinctiveness, if there is a chance the court will deem the registered mark descriptive. The plaintiff should of course argue the presumption, but it also should introduce evidence tending to show a secondary meaning for the mark; typical ways of showing secondary meaning include consumer surveys and direct consumer testimony. Abercrombie & Fitch Stores, Inc. v. American Eagle Outfitters, Inc., 280 F.3d 619, 640 n.14 (6th Cir. 2002).

The plaintiff should also argue that the registered mark is "suggestive" rather than descriptive, so as to avoid the issue of secondary meaning altogether. The line between suggestive and descriptive is difficult to draw in practice ("admittedly hazy," Tumblebus, Inc. v. Cranmer, 399 F.3d 754, 763 (6th Cir. 2005)), so there may be a chance of proving suggestiveness even in the face of a strong argument that the mark is merely descriptive. E.g., Playtex Products, Inc. v. Georgia-Pacific Corp., 390 F.3d 158, 163-64 (2nd Cir. 2004) ("WET ONES" is suggestive, not descriptive).

The owner of the mark should also take steps to make the mark incontestable. A mark is deemed incontestable under 15 U.S.C. § 1065 if certain conditions are met, the primary one being that an affidavit is filed to show that the mark was in continuous use for five consecutive years after registration. A descriptive mark that has become incontestable is not subject to a rebuttal of the presumption of secondary meaning, as the court noted in Leelanau at 516. (citing Wynn Oil Co. v. Am. Way Serv. Corp., 943 F.2d 595, 600 (6th Cir. 1991) ("[W]hen a mark is incontestable, then it is presumed to be at least descriptive with secondary meaning, and therefore a relatively strong mark.") (internal quotations omitted)).

Leelanau's mark did not qualify as incontestable under § 1065. Id. Yet, the mark had been registered in 1997, and liability in the case was tried in 2006, Id. at 510, 512. Assuming use of the mark had been continuous for five years after 1997, LWC may have been able to have made its mark incontestable and thus own an unassailably "strong mark."

For a discussion of proving secondary meaning, see 1-2 Gilson on Trademarks § 2.09 (2007 Matthew Bender).

For information on filing an affidavit of incontestability, see Trademark Manual of Examining Procedure (TMEP) §§ 1605 ("Affidavit of Incontestability Under § 15") and 1605.02 ("Form for Filing Affidavit of Incontestability").

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Don Burton is an associate with the firm of Faruki Ireland & Cox P.L.L., whose practice includes intellectual property litigation and who writes on subjects related to intellectual property litigation. Other articles on intellectual property litigation by this author include: "The SanDisk trap: The CAFC rewrite the rules on declaratory judgments," Intellectual Property News (Summer 2007) (Ohio State Bar Association) and "The Metes and Bounds of the Defendant Class Action in Patent Cases," 5 J. Marshall Rev. Intell. Prop. L. 291 (Spring 2006).

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

32 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Labady on Offers of Judgment

2008 Emerging Issues 1492

Labady on Offers of Judgment

By Jean-Claude Labady

December 14, 2007

SUMMARY: New Jersey attorneys are generally aware of the necessary procedures for filing an offer of judgment. Jean-Claude Labady, an experienced New Jersey litigator, examines important strategic considerations for the practitioner in effectively using offers of judgment in light of Wiese v. Dedhia, 188 N.J. 587, 911 A.2d 479 (2006).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Internet Postings & Jurisdiction -- A Daunting Defendant. In Goldhaber v. Kohlenberg, 395 N.J. Super. 380, 928 A.2d. 948 (App. Div. 2007) a father and daughter who resided in New Jersey joined an internet newsgroup about cruises. The defendant was also a subscriber to the same group. The plaintiffs filed a complaint alleging that the defendant, a California resident, who had no contacts with New Jersey, posted extremely derogatory statements about them on the newsgroup site. The Appellate Division found the statements to be so vile in nature that it did not relay them in the body of the opinion.

Internet Postings & Jurisdiction -- A Defaulting Defendant. A single-count complaint was served on the defendant. He consulted with a lawyer in California who told him that New Jersey had no jurisdiction over him. Accordingly, he failed to file an answer to the complaint and default judgment was entered against him. Normally, it takes merely the filing of a simple request for default form with a certification stating that service was effected and no responsive pleading filed for a plaintiff to be permitted to have a proof hearing for the entry of a judgment in a sum certain against a defaulting defendant. Whether by this mechanism or another, judgment was entered against the California defendant in a small amount.

Blakey: The New Jersey Supreme Court Opts for the Basics. The Appellate Division first explored the propositions offered in the New Jersey Supreme Court opinion in Blakey v. Continental Airlines, 164 N.J. 38, 751 A.2d 538 (2000). In this case, airline pilots posted derogatory comments on an online bulletin board against a female employee who had filed a lawsuit alleging discrimination against the airline. The bulletin board, although powered by CompuServe, was part of a Continental company-wide network. The plaintiff filed libel actions against the pilots in New Jersey in addition to her discrimination claims. The pilots moved to dismiss her claims on the basis that they had no contacts with New Jersey. The Supreme Court remanded the suit for further discovery on the ground that there was no evidence that the pilots knew that she had filed her discrimination lawsuit in New Jersey and knew that their messages would be disseminated in the state. Importantly, the Court declined to adopt new jurisdiction propositions for the internet communications field. It placed its comments in the context of the traditional precepts of due process based on "minimum contacts" and "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." The basic inquiry remains whether the offending party expects to be haled into court in New Jersey. Furthermore, an intentional act will give rise to jurisdiction. Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 386 .

Blakey Not Followed by the Appellate Division. The Appellate Division declined to follow Blakey for an important reason, which a practitioner seeking jurisdiction for an alleged internet offender should heed. The court made a distinction between the Continental site that is accessible only to Continental employees as a "closed" network and the newsgroup site in Goldhaber, which was not monitored by a moderator. The Court examined precedents from other states. One approach is that the mere fact of posting messages on a newsgroup site, which can be read all over the world, does not convey jurisdiction. Another approach is to uphold jurisdiction where there exists any form of contact, technical or otherwise with the state (e.g., a server in Virginia where the message passed through or soliciting business there).

The Goldhaber court observed that the courts that espouse the view that the mere posting of messages is not sufficient evidence for jurisdiction search for messages that direct or focus the offensive messages on the forum state. This is called by commentators a "targeting-based" analysis. Closer to this view is the "effects" approach adopted in Blakey by the New Jersey Supreme Court, which in turn relied on the United States Supreme Court's opinion in Calder v. Jones, 465 U.S. 783, 104 S.Ct. 1482, 79 L.Ed.2d 804 (1984). Under this approach, "jurisdiction may be posited based upon where the effects of the harassment were expected or intended to be felt. . ." Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 389. Here, the offending message cannot be what is described as "interactive" or "passive;" it must both target and be intended to have "effects" in New Jersey as the forum state. Accordingly, the court found that Kohlenberg did target New Jersey since he knew that the plaintiffs lived in New Jersey; replied to some of the plaintiffs' comments; made derogatory comments about the municipality and its police department; and referred to plaintiffs' neighbors in the apartment complex where they resided and even posted the plaintiffs' address in one of the postings. The court stated that "[c]onduct of that nature and its connection to New Jersey are such that [defendant] should reasonably [have] anticipate[d] being haled into court' here. . . Indeed, we would deem it against the policy of our courts to deny these plaintiffs a forum in which to seek redress." Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 390 .

Defendant's Service of Process Argument Rejected. The court next addressed the defendant's service of process challenges. It rejected his position that the plaintiffs did not file an affidavit of diligent inquiry stating that he could not be served personally in California. The Court based the rejection essentially on the proposition that " [d]efault judgments will not be vacated for minor flaws in the service of process." " Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 391. The court also rejected the defendant's argument that when process was served in California he was away in Nevada, and the person receiving the summons and complaint did not match his description. The court remarked that service of process is proper when someone receiving process at a defendant's address promptly transmits the papers to the defendant. Goldhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 391.

Reversing the Default Judgment. Another important procedural aspect of the case is the reversal of the default judgment against the defendant. The case law here is typical in New Jersey: the defendant has to show "excusable neglect" for not having filed an answer to the complaint in a timely fashion and has to have a "meritorious defense" to the plaintiff's claims. In this case, the trial court found no excusable neglect, but the Appellate Division did since the defendant relied on the advice of his California attorney in failing to file a responsive pleading to the complaint. It also found a meritorious defense because the defendant asserted in a certification that he had filed a prior suit against the plaintiffs in his home state on the basis that the plaintiffs had accused him falsely of posting defamatory comments about them. Golhaber, 395 N.J.Super. at 392.

Lessons From Goldhaber:

Long Arm Jurisdiction & New Jersey. The California lawyer in Goldhaber had not paid attention to the fact that New Jersey stays closely to the traditional long-arm precepts and goes just a little farther.

Be Liberal on "Minimum Contacts". New Jersey does not go as far as the jurisdictions who find any contact sufficient. However, New Jersey does not like to turn away plaintiffs with valid claims, as demonstrated by the Appellate Division's statement of the state's policy to provide a forum for plaintiffs to seek redress. Therefore, foreign clients should be advised to respond to suits in New Jersey where there exist the slightest indicia that the statements complained of targeted New Jersey so that any effect can be felt in New Jersey by a plaintiff or by others.

When In Doubt a Responsive Pleading Should be Filed. It is more advisable for a practitioner to file a motion to dismiss in lieu of an answer under Rule_4:6-2 of the Rules Governing the Courts of the State of New Jersey than to do nothing. If the practitioner believes that his client truly has no minimum contacts with the State, the motion should be simple and can be based on a certification, along with a simple brief. (The formality of a brief often is ignored but this is not the proper practice.)

When Does Jurisdiction Not Exist? The rare instance in which jurisdiction truly does not exist in New Jersey, and when a practitioner may advise a client to ignore the complaint, is when the comments are general in nature, with no connection with New Jersey, and are out there for the world to see. Note, however, that eventually a default judgment may be entered in New Jersey against the client, and some form of defense will be required in the client's home state to vacate the judgment based on lack of jurisdiction. The calculus yet may be in favor of the client's litigating in his home instead of New Jersey.

A Word on Default Judgments. Default judgments are routinely vacated in New Jersey. The Appellate Division stated the Supreme Court's policy of having them stand only in rare circumstances. Practitioners in the communications or internet fields, however, should be cognizant of the fact that clients from other states often will come to them with default judgments considering the topsy-turvy ways in which process may take place in other states once it leaves New Jersey. Notwithstanding, clients should be advised not to despair: much more likely than not, they will be given their days in the New Jersey courts.

Cross References: 1-1 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pleadings § 1.11 (determining whether New Jersey courts can obtain jurisdiction over defendant); 1-4 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pleadings § 4.03 (checklist: satisfying requirements for obtaining jurisdiction); 1-2 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice § 2.11 (checklist for entry of Default Judgment)..

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jean-Claude Labady has been a member of the New Jersey bar since 1992. He formerly served as the Managing Partner of Labady & Randolph and headed up the litigation department of the firm. He received his B.A. with honors and M.A. magna cum laude from Rutgers University. Mr. Labady is also a 1992 graduate of the Seton Hall University School of Law. Upon graduation from law school, Mr. Labady served as Judicial Law Clerk to the Hon. Reginald Stanton, Assignment Judge, New Jersey Superior Court (retired). Following his clerkship, Mr. Labady has primarily focused his practice on insurance defense work and has defended insured parties and insurance companies in complex coverage disputes. Mr. Labady was a pioneer in the area of complex fraud litigation on behalf of insurance carriers in New Jersey. He is responsible for decisions of first impression in both health care law and fraud law. Mr. Labady can be reached by email at jlabady@verizon.net.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

33 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

David Fish on Nedzvekas v. Fung, 374 Ill.App.3d 618, 622 (1st Dist. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1465

David Fish on Nedzvekas v. Fung, 374 Ill.App.3d 618, 622 (1st Dist. 2007)

By David Fish

December 13, 2007

SUMMARY: In Nedzvekas v. Fung, 374 Ill.App.3d 618, 622 (1st Dist. 2007), the First District Court of Appeals set an important precedent by solidifying the broad discretion that trial court judges possess regarding discovery sanctions. This Emerging Issues Analysis, written by David Fish, discusses the important implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: The Abyss of Untimely Witness Disclosure Under Rule 213 (f)--Dont commit malpractice in trying to prove that someone else committed malpractice!

Many litigators are averse to confronting their own shortcomings, and by extension, their inability to meet certain court deadlines. This is ironic because, as described herein, candor may be all that is necessary to avoid harsh discovery sanctions. Examples of such sanctions are orders barring use of untimely disclosed witnesses at trial, and even an entry of summary judgment. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 219(c).

By Illinois Supreme Court rule, trial witnesses are divided into three categories: lay witnesses, independent experts, and control experts. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213(f). Beyond the nomenclature, with each witness category comes an increased disclosure requirement. For lay witnesses, only the subjects on which they will testify must be disclosed. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213(f)(1). As for independent expert witnesses, e.g., treating physicians, a partys disclosure must include the subjects on which they will testify and the opinions they will likely provide. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213(f)(2). Finally, and by far the most onerous, a partys disclosure for each controlled expert must include: (i) the subject matter on which the witness will testify; (ii) the conclusions and opinions of the witness and the bases therefore; the qualifications of the witness; and (iv) any reports prepared by the witness about the case. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213(f)(3).

In Nedzvekas v. Fung, 374 Ill.App.3d 618, 622 (1st Dist. 2007), the First District Court of Appeals set an important precedent by solidifying the broad discretion that trial court judges possess regarding discovery sanctions. Nedzvekas held that the trial court was within its discretion when it barred a medical malpractice plaintiff from using yet undisclosed Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213(f)(2) and (3) independent and controlled expert witnesses as a sanction for violating three separate court orders setting deadlines for witness disclosure. Nedzvekas v. Fung, 374 Ill.App.3d 618, 622 (1st Dist. 2007). Specifically, Nedzvekas counsel obtained an extension of a discovery deadline after not complying with it. Nedzvekas counsel then failed to comply with the new deadline. The trial court set a third deadline for Plaintiff to complete discovery and also set a new court date. When the Plaintiff did not comply with the new deadline, and failed to show up to Court, the trial judge entered an order barring Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213(f)(2) and (3) witnesses. Nedzvekas v. Fung, 374 Ill.App.3d 618, 622 (1st Dist. 2007).

Instead of creating a bright-line rule however, the Nedzvekas court went out of its way to clarify that no three-strike rule was in play. Nedzvekas, 374 Ill.App.3d at 621. Rather, an appropriate discovery sanction, if any, must be tailored on a case by case basis according to the following factors: (1) the surprise to the adverse party; (2) the prejudicial effect of the witness testimony; (3) the nature of the testimony; (4) the diligence of the adverse party; (5) the timeliness of the objection; and (6) the good faith of the party seeking to offer the testimony. Nedzvekas, 374 Ill.App.3d at 621 citing Boatmens National Bank of Belleville v. Martin, 155 Ill.2d 305, 314 (1993).

Although the Nedzvekas plaintiff narrowly escaped summary judgment, without a controlled expert, trial counsel was undoubtedly handicapped. It is imperative that the prudent practitioner timely meet Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213(f)s graduated disclosure requirements. Nedzvekas, 374 Ill.App.3d at 620-21. However, in the growing world of multi-tasking, delays in the discovery process are inevitable. From a facial reading of Nedzvekas, the prudent practitioner will note that the way in which one deals with those inevitable delays is absolutely critical. In fact, although the Nedzvekas court articulated six factors for courts to consider on similar discovery sanctions motions, its analysis focused almost exclusively on the lack of diligence of the party opposing sanctions.

Practical Solution. The most important thing a party having difficulty meeting a courts discovery deadline can do is to come to court and request a continuance. Candor-- prior to missing a deadline--is critical because once the deadline passes, counsel may find themselves at the mercy of the trial court. This may seem obvious, but too often busy practitioners watch the deadline go by and just hope no one files a motion to bar evidence or witnesses. If such a motion is filed, counsel will then request a continuance and subsequently provide the required disclosures. As Nedzvekas demonstrates, a continuance request made after a motion to bar is filed may be too late. Moreover, without key expert witnesses, it is difficult to imagine how the Nedzvekas medical malpractice plaintiff could prevail at trial. What is not difficult to imagine however, is an attorney malpractice action presuming the Nedzvekas plaintiff would have recovered damages at trial but for the imposition of discovery sanctions.

Cross References. Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists Checklist 51.01: Identifying Witnesses Expected to Testify and their Testimony.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mr. Fish has litigated numerous multi-million dollar disputes throughout the United States. Mr. Fish has represented a broad array of clients including large Fortune 500 companies, publicly traded companies, governmental bodies, privately held companies, small corporations, and individuals.

Mr. Fish graduated second in his law school class from Northern Illinois University College of Law. He received his undergraduate degree from Illinois State University (Major: Political Science, Minor: Philosophy). Prior to starting his own firm, Mr. Fish was employed by larger law firms. (Jenner & Block in Chicago, Klein, Thorpe & Jenkins in Chicago and The Collins Law Firm, P.C. in Naperville).

Current and Past Bar and Professional Associations include Illinois State Bar Association's Federal Civil Practice

Section (vice chairman), ATLA Business Torts Section (Subcommittee on Antitrust & Unfair Competition), Northern District of Illinois Federal Trial Bar, Illinois State Bar Association, DuPage Bar Association (past vice-chair of the Business Law Practice Committee), Chicago Bar Association, Naperville-Area Chamber of Commerce.

David is also a frequent lecturer and author in the areas in which he practices. Based upon his civil litigation experience, David recently was selected by LexisNexis to serve as one of the authors of its Illinois Civil Procedure Forms.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

34 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

David Fish on Thompson v. Gordon, 221 Ill.2d 414, 429 (2006).

2008 Emerging Issues 1466

David Fish on Thompson v. Gordon, 221 Ill.2d 414, 429 (2006).

By David Fish

December 13, 2007

SUMMARY: The Illinois Supreme Court recently demonstrated its commitment to providing juries with helpful and relevant expert testimony. In Thompson v. Gordon, 221 Ill.2d 414, 429 (2006), the court held that even unlicensed professionals may testify as experts when the testimony itself constitutes statutorily proscribed unlicensed practice of a profession. This Emerging Issues Analysis discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: The Illinois Supreme Court recently demonstrated its commitment to providing juries with helpful and relevant expert testimony. In Thompson v. Gordon, 221 Ill.2d 414, 429 (2006), the court held that even unlicensed professionals may testify as experts when the testimony itself constitutes statutorily proscribed unlicensed practice of a profession.

Contrary to what many practitioners may expect, in Illinois, a witness may qualify and testify as an Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213 expert and simultaneously become criminally culpable for the unlicensed practice of a regulated profession. In Thompson, the Illinois Supreme Court held that a professional license was not a prerequisite to providing competent expert testimony. Thompson v. Gordon, 221 Ill.2d 414, 429 (2006). Rather, it is within the trial courts discretion to determine the admissibility of an Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213 expert based on his knowledge, skill, experience, training, education, and licensing. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 428-29 (ruling based on Illinois common law regarding expert admissibility and not Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213 itself, which focuses on expert disclosure). However, licensure is but one factor to be considered in judging an experts admissibility and it is an abuse of discretion for a court to per se disqualify an expert because he is unlicensed. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 429.

The Thompson case involved a plaintiffs retained forensic engineering expert that was to testify regarding the defendant road designers duty to construct a type of safety median that might have limited plaintiffs injuries. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 417. Defendants moved to strike the expert because he was not licensed as an engineer in Illinois as required by the Engineering Act (225 ILCS 325/39(b)(4)). Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 418. In other words, the challenge was to the experts qualifications (and thus competence as an expert) as opposed to just the substance of the experts testimony. Moreover, the proffered expert was ordered by the Illinois Department of Professional Regulation to cease and desist from testifying, which it held amounted to the unlicensed practice of professional engineering. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 420. Notwithstanding this order and the potential for the expert to be held criminally responsible for his testimony, the court held that Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213 did not require licensure as a prerequisite to admissibility as an expert witness. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 429.

General Applicability. The Thompson rule applies generally to Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213 experts, not just engineers. At least three parts of the Thompson decision support this broad interpretation. First, the decision was predicated on Illinois common law involving expert witnesses, not the Engineering Act. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 428-29. Second, the court expressly overruled an Illinois Appellate case: People v. West, 264 Ill.App.3d 176 (1994), a case that involved a non-engineer expert. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 431-33. Finally, the court stated that the outcome in this case was beside the point, and implied it was concerned about clarifying Ill. Sup. Ct., R 213. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 430. Therefore, an argument attempting to limit the Thompson holding to cases involving engineering experts will likely prove unsuccessful. Instead, the policy reasoning behind Thompson appears to be predicated on the broad discretion of trial judges to allow opinion witnesses who will assist the fact finder Strategies for opposing unlicensed experts. A party seeking to exclude an unlicensed expert should argue that the relevant licensing statute specifically mandates the expert be licensed as a precondition to his admissibility. That is not to say a party opposing the expert should rehash a fight already finished in Thompson, but the court did recognize one important exception. In medical malpractice actions, Thompson stated, the Code of Civil Procedure specifically requires the trial court in assessing the admissibility of an expert to consider whether the witness is licensed. Thompson, 221 Ill.2d at 433 citing 735 ILCS 5/8-2501(c); see Sullivan v. Edward Hosp., 209 Ill.2d 100, 115-16 (2004) (expert witnesses in medical malpractice actions must be licensed). If such a statute is applicable, an effective strategy may be to wait until trial before objecting to the proffered experts admissibility.

Out of the box solutions. What lawyer would ever want a criminal as an expert witness? The most obvious strategy is to stress to a jury on cross-examination that the expert is unlicensed and committing a crime. However, the easiest way to oppose an unlicensed expert after Thompson may be out of the courtroom. A prudent practitioner can save his client time, money, and frustration by informing the opposing unlicensed expert that his or her testimony constitutes illegal conduct. When an expert learns about this (through deposition or otherwise) he or she may retreat from their testifying role.

Cross References. Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists Checklist 51.01: Identifying Witnesses Expected to Testify and their Testimony.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mr. Fish has litigated numerous multi-million dollar disputes throughout the United States. Mr. Fish has represented a broad array of clients including large Fortune 500 companies, publicly traded companies, governmental bodies, privately held companies, small corporations, and individuals.

Mr. Fish graduated second in his law school class from Northern Illinois University College of Law. He received his undergraduate degree from Illinois State University (Major: Political Science, Minor: Philosophy). Prior to starting his own firm, Mr. Fish was employed by larger law firms. (Jenner & Block in Chicago, Klein, Thorpe & Jenkins in Chicago and The Collins Law Firm, P.C. in Naperville).

Current and Past Bar and Professional Associations include Illinois State Bar Association's Federal Civil Practice Section (vice chairman), ATLA Business Torts Section (Subcommittee on Antitrust & Unfair Competition), Northern District of Illinois Federal Trial Bar, Illinois State Bar Association, DuPage Bar Association (past vice-chair of the Business Law Practice Committee), Chicago Bar Association, Naperville-Area Chamber of Commerce.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

35 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Robins on Use of Outside Vendors for E-Discovery

2008 Emerging Issues 1458

Robins on Use of Outside Vendors for E-Discovery

By Martin Robins

December 12, 2007

SUMMARY: While there has been no shortage of commentary on the changes in discovery practice wrought by the adoption of FRCP 26(f) to deal with discovery of electronically stored materials, the same can not be said for the mechanics of compliance with the new rule. This is particularly important in intellectual property cases where information can be stored in a multitude of ways. It is an area where practitioners are just waiting to get stung.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Twenty-seven year transactional practitioner, adjunct law school professor and frequently published author, Martin Robins, discusses how to use contracts with third party vendors to facilitate client compliance with new e-discovery obligations and to avoid sanctions.

Discovery in intellectual property cases has the same purposes as discovery in any other type of case; however, even straightforward IP cases are technically complex and many involve advanced technologies. The mechanics of compliance with the discovery rules can be particularly difficult in intellectual property cases due to the complexity of the technology, and especially with discovery of electronically stored materials. As a large portion of intellectual property matters are stored as electronic documents, there is an important issue of dealing with storing and maintaining the information to avoid charges of spoliation of evidence. However, issues with electronically stored materials are not unique to intellectual property cases.

While there has been no shortage of commentary on the changes in discovery practice wrought by the adoption of FRCP 26(f) in 2006 to deal with discovery of electronically stored materials (ESM), e.g., Arkfelds Best Practices Guide for Electronic Discovery and Evidence, 07-08 Ed., the same can not be said for the mechanics of compliance with the new rule. That is, litigators need to provide some guidance to their clients as to the mechanical steps which need to be taken in order to maintain and access the ESM covered by the Rule. It is preferable that this guidance be provided by litigators having an ongoing relationship with their clients as part of an ongoing compliance program encompassing third party vendor support, rather than used to deal with a discovery order in a specific matter. Nevertheless, if counsel is engaged on a one-off basis, they should still advise their clients to take these steps at the earliest practicable date.

Why a Vendor? Which Vendor? Many companies by choice or necessity will involve an outside vendor in this process either to utilize the specialized technical expertise of such vendor (i.e. get the best in the business) or simply because they have no relevant expertise of any kind in house. This note is intended to address the contractual considerations which companies should address when engaging a third party to assist or perform a material portion of its storage or retrieval of ESM in connection with litigation.

Prior to entering into any contract with a vendor, companies and counsel must perform meaningful due diligence in order to satisfy themselves that the vendor possesses the claimed expertise as well the integrity and financial wherewithal to make meaningful its contractual commitments. Even the strongest contract will be of limited value if the vendor is unwilling or unable to perform its obligations. It must be emphasized that preservation and production obligations under Rule 26(f) and related cases such as the Zubulake series, e.g. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 217 F.R.D. 309 (SDNY 2003), are those of the litigant and can not be delegated in the event of non-compliance, a court will sanction the litigant (and possibly its counsel) and not its vendor. It is not enough for a litigant and its counsel to say that we engaged XYZ Inc. and this is what they did when there has been spoliation or non-production of evidence. Counsel must provide guidance that a vendors failure to deliver what is required by the Rule or a court order may have dire consequences for all concerned.

When to Address the Topic? Litigators must provide guidance to their clients before the beginning of litigation involving e-discovery as to how to evaluate and engage vendors for this purpose.

What to Put in the Contract? Best practices dictate that a litigator needs be involve herself in her clients vendor contract negotiations to ensure that the contract contains the following:

- . A business-level statement of the vendors obligation. For example, if a vendor is being engaged to assist in retrieval of relevant documents and e-mails from the customers logs on ten servers in response to a document request dated March 15, 2008 in the ABC v. XYZ case then pending in the Northern District of Illinois, the contract should say so. Vendor efforts to substitute technobabble must be resisted.

- . A firm commitment to deliver such result in an accurate manner. Vendors will often couch their commitments in terms like best efforts or commercially reasonable efforts. Needless to say, the new FRCP and discovery requests do not contain such qualification.

- . A commitment to maintain and retrieve (upon customer request) relevant metadata about the materials at issue. Literally speaking, metadata is data about data, such as its author, date of creation, date of modification, number of modifications and the like. Such information may have significant legal relevance in connections with issues such as notice or knowledge.

- . A firm date (or time frame) by which the vendors obligations will be performed. Such date should reflect or incorporate applicable requirements of the court and FRCP. Payment of the vendor should be, at least in part, tied to timely delivery.

- . A commitment to perform the tasks in the customers actual hardware and software environment. For example, if a customer is still running an old version of Microsoft Outlook such as the 1997 or 2000 versions it is critical that the vendor be apprised of this and commit to perform in this environment. The same is true with other non-standard programs such as a Linux operating system or Apple hardware. In many cases, vendors will use a particular technical approach which is incompatible with many other technical environments.

- . A commitment to deliver output in the format required by local rule and applicable orders in the particular case e.g. CD, mag tape, paper, etc.

. A commitment to perform at the customers actual scale. Many vendors will do well with smaller and midsize companies but lack the technical infrastructure to properly service larger, international companies. If a customer requires retrieval of 5 terabytes of data located on 5 continents, this must be stated in the contract.

. Meaningful remedies for failure to perform, starting with payment of any amounts awarded by a court as sanctions for non-compliance. In many sectors of the information technology world, vendors seek to limit their liability to the fees they are paid. Maintenance of error and omission insurance, similar to legal malpractice insurance is often an essential part of a customers remedies.

. The ability to tailor searches to reflect customer or counsel tactical preferences and legal requirements e.g. sorted by author, size, time sent, topic, etc.

. Security mechanisms to ensure the preservation and integrity of the materials at issue in light of the threat of internal and external hacking and virus (malicious code) dissemination.

Inclusion of such language will probably require counsel to work with the clients information technology staff. In view of frequent industry practice by service providers, failure to include enumerated language in vendor contracts or obtain qualified vendors may result in sanctions to litigants and counsel and prejudice to underlying claims and will result in wasted time and money.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Martin Robins, JD Harvard Law School, BS Wharton School, University of Pennsylvania, has been a transactional practitioner for 27 years, representing clients of all sizes from individual entrepreneurs to multinational firms. He is the principal of The Law Office of Martin B. Robins of Buffalo Grove IL (847/229-8710; mrobins@mr-laws.com). He is also an adjunct professor at DePaul University College of Law in Chicago and has published numerous books and articles on legal topics ranging from information technology contracting to capital raising to equipment leasing [co-author of Bender Business Law Monographs] to M&A practice and has served on various CLE panels.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

36 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jeffrey P. Michalowski on Wagner Construction Co. v. Pacific Mechanical Corp.

2008 Emerging Issues 1448

Jeffrey P. Michalowski on Wagner Construction Co. v. Pacific Mechanical Corp.

By Jeffrey P. Michalowski

December 11, 2007

SUMMARY: Wagner Construction Co. v. Pacific Mechanical Corp. further entrenched California's public policy supporting enforcement of arbitration agreements, but in so doing provides plaintiffs a potential escape-hatch for pursuing time-barred claims. This Emerging Issues Analysis analyzes this opinion and explains how cautious counsel can foreclose such uncertainty only through careful drafting of arbitration agreements.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Wagner Construction Co. v. Pacific Mechanical Corp. (2007) 41 Cal. 4th 19, 157 P.3d 1029, 58 Cal. Rptr. 3d 434 further narrows the role of the California courts in resolving disputes covered by arbitration agreements, holding that questions of statutes of limitations are for the arbitrator to decide, rather than the court.

Background. In 1997, defendant Pacific hired plaintiff Wagner as a subcontractor to perform installation work. The parties signed an agreement that provided for arbitration of disputes arising from the contract. The agreement did not set a time limit for demanding arbitration.

A dispute arose between the parties and, in 1999, Wagner brought suit in California Superior Court, alleging breach of contract and other causes of action. Wagner voluntarily dismissed the suit without prejudice when both Wagner and Pacific were sued for personal injuries related to the construction project. In 2004, after the personal injury action was resolved, Wagner brought a new lawsuit in Superior Court, bringing the same contract cause of action alongside new claims. Shortly thereafter, Wagner filed a petition to compel arbitration.

The Superior Court denied the petition on the grounds that the underlying claims were time-barred by the three-year statute of limitations under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 338. The Court of Appeals court upheld the denial, but on different grounds, finding that Wagner had waived its contractual right to demand arbitration under Code Civ. Proc. § 1281.2 by failing to seek arbitration in a timely manner. Wagner then sought review in the California Supreme Court.

Result. The California Supreme Court reversed the lower courts and indicated that the role of the courts in disputes covered by arbitration agreements is not to move toward resolution of the underlying dispute, but is instead the more modest project of determining the enforceability of the contractual agreement to arbitrate. Accordingly, the Supreme Court holds that a court may not deny a petition to compel arbitration on the ground that the statute of limitations has run on the claims the parties agreed to arbitrate. While a court may deny a petition to compel on the grounds of unreasonable delay in demanding arbitration, unreasonable delay is to be determined in accordance with a number of rules unrelated to the statutes of limitations for the underlying claims.

Statutes of Limitation. As indicated by Code Civ. Proc. § 1281, California has a strong public policy in favor of enforcing arbitration agreements. It refuses to enforce such agreements only upon such grounds as exist for the revocation of any contract. As the contract merely serves to select the forum in which a dispute is to be resolved (an arbitral rather than judicial forum), the fact that the underlying claim may be time-barred does not constitute a ground for non-enforcement of the contract.

Waiver. A court may deny a petition to compel arbitration on the grounds that the demanding party has waived its contractual right to arbitrate. Delay in bringing such a demand can constitute a waiver, but a determination of when delay amounts to a waiver has nothing to do with the statutes of limitation; instead, the court must look to specific rules regarding the timing of arbitration demands. Under these rules, the party must act timely with respect to both the demand for arbitration and the petition to compel arbitration.

Timing of the Demand. A time limit for issuing a demand for arbitration may be provided by statute or by contract, and when a party fails to comply with such limits, a judge will be justified in finding waiver. Where both statute and contract are silent, general contract principles require that a party still must demand arbitration within a reasonable time [see Civ. Code § 1657]. What constitutes a reasonable time under Civ. Code § 1657 is a question of fact, and depends upon the facts of the particular case [see Sawday v. Vista Irrigation Dist. (1966) 64 Cal. 2d 833, 836, 415 P.2d 816, 52 Cal. Rptr. 1].

Timing of the Petition to Compel. As parties seeking arbitration are essentially demanding specific performance of a contractual agreement to arbitrate, they are subject to the four-year statute of limitations for actions founded upon written contracts, regardless of the limitations period for the underlying claim. They must attempt to enforce this contractual right (which occurs with the filing of a petition to compel) within four years of the time when the opposing party refuses to arbitrate the controversy [Spear v. Cal. State Automobile Ass'n (1992) 2 Cal. 4th 1035, 1040, 831 P.2d 821, 9 Cal. Rptr. 2d 381].

The Significance of the Case. Counsel should consider the significance of Wagner on the following issues:

The Decision-Maker Matters. A court determines the facts upon the weight of the evidence, and applies the law as it is laid down by the authorities. Arbitrators have considerably more leeway: they may base their decision upon broader principles of justice and equity, and in doing so may be more inclined to stray from legal authority. In this sense, Wagner provides parties a possible escape-hatch for time-barred claims.

Appeal. While Superior Court judges enjoy a presumption of correctness, arbitrators' decisions are much more insulated from review. Aside from the narrow grounds for vacating or correcting arbitration awards specifically enumerated by statute [see Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1286.2, 1286.6], arbitration awards are immune from judicial review [Moncharsh v. Heily & Blase (1992) 3 Cal. 4th 1, 12, 13, 832 P.2d 899, 10 Cal. Rptr. 2d 183].

Expansion to Other Affirmative Defenses. While the Supreme Court addressed only who is the proper decision maker for statutes of limitation defenses, the Courts' reasoning that a court's role on a petition to compel arbitration is limited to determining the enforceability of the agreement to arbitrate applies to affirmative defenses generally. Accordingly, it is likely that the lower courts will expand the reach of Wagner to other affirmative defenses, such as failure to exhaust administrative remedies.

The Practitioners Perspective. The practitioner also should consider the following consequences of Wagner :

Drafting Arbitration Agreements. An attorney can avoid the Wagner escape-hatch by providing time limits for demanding arbitration in the text of the arbitration agreement itself. However, in the context of statutory employment claims, the legally applicable limitations period should be followed [see Armendariz v. Found. Health Psychcare Servs. (2000) 24 Cal. 4th 83, 6 P.3d 669, 99 Cal. Rptr. 2d 745 (requiring heightened safeguards for pre-dispute arbitration agreements as to certain claims in employment context)]. Alternatively, an attorney can include language indicating that arbitrators must act in conformity with all applicable rules of law, with respect to both all causes of action and all affirmative defenses.

Do Not Over-Reach. Unless a contrary approach is justified by business necessity, the best practice is for any time limits in an arbitration agreement to apply identically to both parties; to do otherwise invites non-enforcement of the contract as unconscionable.

Beware of Context. Attorneys serving clients in the employment context should be particularly wary. Driven by Armendariz, California courts have been quick to find unconscionable provisions in arbitration agreements between employees and employers and refuse to enforce the agreements on those grounds. Non-mutual time-limits may be evidence supporting such a finding.

For further analysis of the issues in Wagner, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 32, Contractual Arbitration: Arbitration Agreements and Compelling Arbitration, § 32.40 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jeffrey P. Michalowski is an associate in the San Francisco office of Paul Hastings Janofsky & Walker LLP. He received his B.A. in Philosophy, with High Distinction, from the University of Virginia, and his J.D., cum laude, from Harvard Law School. Mr. Michalowski counsels and represents employers in all aspects of employment law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

37 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Kevin V. DeSantis on Moran v. Murtaugh Miller Meyer & Nelson

2008 Emerging Issues 1449

Kevin V. DeSantis on Moran v. Murtaugh Miller Meyer & Nelson

By Kevin V. DeSantis

December 11, 2007

SUMMARY: The California Supreme Court establishes that trial courts must weigh the evidence when determining whether a vexatious litigant has no reasonable probability of success in his or her claim and is therefore required to post security. The decision disapproves a prior appellate decision that prohibited weighing the evidence and had the effect of applying the standard for a demurrer. This Emerging Issues Analysis analyzes this opinion.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Standard of Reviewing Evidence on a Vexatious Litigant Motion.

Issue: Moran v. Murtaugh Miller Meyer & Nelson LLP, involves the evidentiary standard to determine whether a vexatious litigant has no reasonable probability of success and is therefore required to post security. The decision addresses whether the trial court may weigh the evidence presented by both parties or if it must assume the truth of a plaintiffs alleged facts and determine if the claim is foreclosed as a matter of law.

Californias Vexatious Litigant Statute. In recognition of the unreasonable burden placed upon the courts by vexatious litigants, the California Legislature, in 1963, enacted Code Civ. Proc. § 391 et seq. The Vexatious Litigant Statutes were enacted to require a person qualifying as a vexatious litigant to post security for the reasonable expenses of a defendant who becomes the target of one of these obsessive and persistent litigants [Holcomb v. U.S. Bank Nat. Assn. (2005) 129 Cal. App. 4th 1494, 29 Cal. Rptr. 3d 578].

Section 391 provides several definitions of a vexatious litigation [see Code Civ. Proc. § 391(b)(1)-(4)]. In Moran, the plaintiff qualified as a vexatious litigant under Code Civ. Proc. § 391(b)(1)(i) because in the immediately preceding seven year period he had commenced, prosecuted, or maintained in propria persona at least five litigations that were determined adversely.

Once the plaintiff qualifies as a vexatious litigant, a defendant may then bring a motion seeking an order requiring the plaintiff to furnish security. The defendant must demonstrate the defendant qualifies as a vexatious litigant and there is no reasonable probability that the plaintiff will prevail in the litigation [Code Civ. Proc. § 391.1]. The court must consider such evidence, written or oral, by witness or affidavit, as may be material to the ground of the motion [Code Civ. Proc. § 391.2]. If the Court concludes that there is no reasonable probability that the plaintiff will prevail in the litigation, then the court must order the plaintiff to furnish, for the benefit of the moving defendant, security in such amount and within such time as the court shall fix [Code Civ. Proc. § 391.3]. If the security is not furnished then the litigation must be dismissed as to the moving defendant [Code Civ. Proc. § 391.4]. Finally, upon filing the motion, the litigation is stayed until 10 days after the motion is denied or 10 days after the required security is furnished [Code Civ. Proc. § 391.6].

Pre-Moran Standard for Determining Reasonable Probability of Prevailing. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 391.2 it is clear that the court is to receive evidence, written or oral by witness or affidavit, in connection with determining whether there is a reasonable probability of prevailing. The issue in Moran focused on whether the court may evaluate or weigh that evidence.

The only previous case addressing the standard for reviewing evidence was Devereaux v. Latham & Watkins (1995) 32 Cal. App. 4th 1571, 38 Cal. Rptr. 2d 849. In Devereaux, the Second District Court of Appeal held that the defendant must show that the plaintiffs recovery is foreclosed as a matter of law or that there are insufficient facts to support recovery by plaintiff. Devereaux, 32 Cal. App. 4th 1782-1783. This standard was utilized by plaintiff to argue that the Court could not evaluate or weigh the evidence. Instead, plaintiff argued that the court was required to disregard any contradicted evidence submitted by the moving party. In essence plaintiff was arguing that a demurrer standard must be applied and all pleadings and evidence submitted by plaintiff accepted as true.

Obviously the standard established in Devereaux and as advanced by the plaintiff in Moran severely limited the effectiveness of the Vexatious Litigant Statute. Any plaintiff that could plead the elements of a claim or draft a declaration setting out the facts of the claim could, conceivably, overcome a motion.

The Moran Decision: In Moran, the California Supreme Court granted review specifically to address the evidentiary standard. In making its decision, the Court considered the statutory language of Code Civ. Proc. § 391.2 and reviewed the history of the Vexatious Litigant Statute. In particular the Court found persuasive that the Vexatious Litigant Statute was modeled in part on former section 834 of the California Corporations Code addressing security provisions applicable to shareholders derivative suits [Moran, 40 Cal. 4th at 784]. Under former section 834, the Court previously held that the trial court was permitted to weigh evidence in connection with determining probability of success [Moran, 40 Cal. 4th at 784 , citing Beyerbach v. Juno Oil Co. (1954) 42 Cal. 2d 11, 265 P.2d 1].

Based on this analysis, the Court in Moran disapproved of the holding in Devereaux [Moran, 40 Cal. 4th at 785 n. 7]. Instead, the Court found that the trial court performs an evaluative function in a Section 391.1 hearing. The Court concluded that the trial court is, therefore, permitted to weigh the evidence in considering whether there is a reasonable probability of prevailing.

The Court also upheld the constitutionality of Code Civ. Proc. § 391.1 because the vexatious litigant motion does not terminate the action and merely requires the posting of security, and does not deprive the vexatious litigant of the right to a jury trial under Article I, section 16 of the California constitution; nor does the motion violate due process given the plaintiffs ability to file opposing declarations [Moran, 40 Cal. 4th at 786].

Import of the Moran Decision. The decision in Moran is significant in a number of respects. It serves to clarify the apparent disparity between the plain language of Code Civ. Proc. § 391.2 that provides for the Court to consider the evidence, and Devereaux which appeared to restrain the Courts role. The standard is now clear: The trial court may weigh and evaluate the evidence. Further, in confirming that the trial court serves in an evaluative capacity, the Court has given strength to the Vexatious Litigant Statute. This should result in the increased use of the procedure established in the statute. Whereas a demurrer standard is likely easily overcome by adept pleading, allowing the trial court to consider and weigh the evidence allows for judicial scrutiny at an early stage in the litigation.

Practice Tips--Plaintiffs. The Court rejected a due process challenge by noting the plaintiff had ample opportunity to augment the record by filing a nine-page declaration opposing the motion in addition to the complaints allegations. Plaintiffs should be prepared to submit any and all declarations and to produce witnesses to comply with the language of Code Civ. Proc. § 391.2 requiring the court to [c]onsider such evidence, written or oral, by witnesses or affidavit, as may be material to the ground of the motion. Plaintiffs may need to lay out a complete case as though facing a motion for summary judgment since losing the motion may well be the same as a dismissal should the amount of security be fiscally prohibitive.

Practice Tips--Defendants. Anyone who has been the target of a vexatious litigant understands the financial and often times emotional toll that can be exacted by one of these individuals. For a defendant faced with a lawsuit by a vexatious litigant, a motion to require posting of security can be a very effective litigation tactic.

Because the litigation is stayed immediately upon filing the motion, the defendant should consider filing the motion as soon as possible. Typically, the defendant will have access to the documentary evidence and witnesses necessary to demonstrate no reasonable probability of prevailing. Counsel should consider the motion as similar in substance to a motion for summary judgment [see Code Civ. Proc. § 437c] or an anti-SLAPP motion [see Code Civ. Proc. § 425.16 et seq.].

However, defense counsel and clients should be aware that a motion to post security is not intended to serve as a dispositive motion. If the motion is granted, the plaintiff will be ordered to post security. If security is posted, the matter proceeds. Should the matter proceed, defense counsel will still gain valuable insight on the plaintiffs evidence and theory of the case. Additionally, because the plaintiff may essentially present an entire case at the outset of litigation to oppose the motion, the plaintiffs declarations and arguments may be subject to later contradiction as litigation and discovery unfolds. Defense counsel should carefully review the declarations opposing the motion and be prepared to identify for the court any contradictions that may arise during subsequent procedures in light of restrictions on amending a complaint that directly contradicts a prior version, asserting contradictory facts on a motion for reconsideration, or attempts to create a triable issue on a motion for summary judgment. These contradictions are also valuable for impeachment should the matter proceed to trial.

References: For forms to move for a plaintiff to furnish security as a vexatious litigant, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 174, Costs and Attorney's Fees §§ 174.290 (notice of motion and motion for order requiring plaintiff to furnish security), 174.291 (declarations), 174.293 (order granting motion and fixing amount), 174.294 (motion to dismiss for failing to furnish security).

For additional analysis of vexatious litigants, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 573, Vexatious Litigants (LexisNexis Matthew Bender), and MB Practice Guide: CA Pretrial Civil Procedure, § 35.15A et seq. (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

For analysis of motions for summary judgment, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 537, Summary Judgment (LexisNexis Matthew Bender) and Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 38, Summary Judgment (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

For analysis of anti-SLAPP motions to strike, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 376, Motions to Strike: Anti-SLAPP and Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 13, Anti-SLAPP Motions (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kevin V. DeSantis is a shareholder with the law firm of Butz Dunn & DeSantis in San Diego, California. He earned his Bachelor of Science degree in Biological Sciences from the University of California at Irvine in 1985. He received his Juris Doctorate degree from the University of San Diego School of Law in 1988 where he was a member of the San Diego Law Review. Mr. DeSantis areas of practice include general business representation and complex civil litigation focusing on professional liability, commercial disputes, government liability and employment and wrongful termination litigation. His professional liability practice includes representations of attorneys, architects and engineers in a wide range of matters. Mr. DeSantis represented the defendants in Moran v. Murtaugh Miller Meyer & Nelson LLP and successfully argued this case before the California Supreme Court.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

38 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Dorsaneo on Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa

2008 Emerging Issues 1427

Dorsaneo on Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa

By William V. Dorsaneo III

December 11, 2007

SUMMARY: In Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, the TX Supreme Court modified the standards for the recoverability of attorney's fees in cases involving tort and contract theories of liability. No longer can parties rely on the argument that the causes of action in a suit are dependent upon the same set of facts and thus the fees allocated towards each of them are inseparable.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In December 2006, the Texas Supreme Court modified the standards for the recoverability of attorney's fees by recasting the "intertwined claims" exception frequently used by claimants in cases involving claims that will support recovery of fees and claims that will not do so. In the same opinion, the Court clarified the operation of the "one satisfaction" or "one recovery" rule and the relationship between statutory and constitutional limits on the recoverability of exemplary damages [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299 (Tex 2006)].

Duty to Segregate Attorney's Fees. In Gullo, the Court made significant changes in Texas law concerning the recovery of attorney's fees in cases involving multiple theories of liability. These changes require the presentation of specific evidence segregating recoverable fees from fees that are not recoverable. In Texas the ability of a prevailing party to recover attorney's fees depends on the type of claim. As a general rule, Texas allows for the recovery of attorney's fees in breach of contract cases [See Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide, Ch. 21, Damages in Contract, § 21.20 (Matthew Bender); see also Ch. 22, Attorney's Fees (Matthew Bender)]. But, absent specific statutory authority, Texas law does not allow for recovery of attorney's fees in tort cases [See Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide, Ch. 20, Damages in Tort (Matthew Bender); see, e.g., Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 304 (Tex. 2006) (no award of attorney's fees in action for fraud); cf. King v. Acker, 725 S.W.2d 750, 757 (Tex. App.-Houston [1st Dist.] 1987, no writ) (plaintiff's attorney's fees were factor to consider in setting exemplary damages at common law)].

Accordingly, for some time parties have been required to segregate recoverable fees from nonrecoverable fees in cases involving both breach of contract and tort claims. However, in 1991 an exception to the segregation requirement was recognized by the Texas Supreme Court [see Stewart Title Guaranty Co. v. Sterling, 822 S.W.2d 1 (Tex. 1991)].

This exception applies if attorney's fees are incurred in connection with multiple claims arising out of the same transaction, that are so interrelated that their prosecution or defense entails proof or denial of essentially the same set of facts [see Stewart Title Guaranty Co. v. Sterling, 822 S.W.2d 1, 11 (Tex. 1991); Sonterra Capital Partners, Ltd. v. Sonterra Property Owners Association, Inc. 216 S.W.3d 417, 424 (Tex. App.-San Antonio, pet. denied); Girdner v. Rose, 213 S.W.3d 438, 447 (Tex. App.-Eastland 2006, no pet.)]. In this situation, the party suing for attorney's fees may recover the entire amount of fees incurred in connection with all of the claims [see e.g., French v. Moore, 169 S.W.3d 1, 16-18 (Tex. App.-Houston [1st Dist.] 2004, no pet.); Texas Cookie Co. v. Hendricks & Peralta, 747 S.W.2d 873, 880 (Tex. App.-Corpus Christi 1988, den.)].

Gullo Redefines the Exception. Because all attorney's fees can arguably be made recoverable under the original segregation exception, more and more claimants have invoked it [see Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 312 (Tex. 2006)]. As a result, the courts of appeals have been flooded with claims that recoverable and unrecoverable fees are inextricably intertwined [see Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 312 (Tex. 2006)].

Therefore, to ease the volume of appeals and to prevent the rule of segregation from being swallowed by the exception, the Court modified the exception by holding that intertwined facts, do not make unrecoverable fees recoverable; parties must segregate attorney's fees except when discrete legal services advance both recoverable and unrecoverable claims. It is only when discrete legal services advance both a recoverable and an unrecoverable claim that they are so intertwined that they need not be segregated [see Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 312-314 (Tex. 2006)].

Failure to segregate when attorney's fees are capable of segregation requires a remand to the trial court so that evidence of segregated attorney's fees may be presented [Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Sterling, 822 S.W.2d 1, 11 (Tex. 1991) (disapproving of cases awarding no fees for failure to segregate)]. Under this construction of the exception to the duty to segregate, counsel must be prepared to give an opinion about the amount or percentage of time that was applied to the claims that support the attorney's fee award, so that the trier of fact can decide the matter [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 312-314 (Tex. 2006)]. Similarly, in a case involving multiple defendants, when one or more of those defendants have made settlements, the plaintiff must segregate the fees owed by the remaining defendants [Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Sterling, 822 S.W.2d 1, 10-11 (Tex. 1991); Main Place Custom Homes, Inc. v. Honaker, 192 S.W.3d 604, 621-623 (Tex. App.-Fort Worth 2006, pet. denied)]. If no objection is made to the failure to segregate attorney's fees, either at the time evidence of fees is presented or at the time of the charge, the error is waived [Apache Corp. v. Dynegy Midstream Services, 214 S.W.3d 554, 566 (Tex. App.-Houston [14th Dist.] 2006, no pet.); Holmes v. Concord Homes, Ltd., 115 S.W.3d 310, 313 (Tex. App.-Texarkana 2003, no pet.) (objection did not ask trial court to either segregate or divide the claims for attorneys' fees among the parties, so error was not preserved for appellate review; moreover, although several defendants were brought into the case, all claims against defendants were based on the same wrongful acts alleged against the main defendant, so segregation was not required in absence of effort to raise issue at trial)].

In light of the Texas Supreme Court decision in Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, practitioners should pay closer attention to whether attorney's fees are recoverable under each claim they plead, and if they are not recoverable under all claims, should pay close attention to how much time is allocated towards each claim.

Refining the One Satisfaction Rule. Texas law has long recognized the "one satisfaction" or "one recovery" rule [see Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide, Ch. 21, Damages in Contract, § 21.50 (Matthew Bender)]. Under the "one satisfaction" rule, a party who alleges a single legal injury is permitted only one recovery for that injury [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 303 (Tex. 2006)]. However, that party has a right to a judgment on the theory that affords him the greatest or most favorable relief [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 303-304 (Tex. 2006)]. In Gullo, [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 308-310 (Tex. 2006)], the plaintiff sued a car dealership over the sale of a vehicle, and argued liability theories of: (1) breach of the sales contract; (2) fraud in the inducement to enter the contract; and (3) the Deceptive Trade Practices Act. The jury found for the plaintiff, and awarded economic damages, mental anguish damages, exemplary damages, and attorney's fees. The trial court set most of these awards aside, on the ground that the plaintiff could recover only for breach of the sales contract. The court of appeals reversed, reinstating all the categories of recovery, though reducing the exemplary damages as excessive.

The Texas Supreme Court reversed in turn, holding that permitting recovery of all the damages violated the "one satisfaction" rule. The Court noted that because the plaintiff alleged a single legal injury, she was permitted only one recovery for that injury [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 303-304 (Tex. 2006)]. At the same time, however, that injury could be redressed through any available liability theory supported by the evidence and the jury's findings.

Therefore, the trial court also had erred in finding that recovery was restricted to a breach of contract theory, because the plaintiff submitted evidence of fraud in the inducement to enter the contract, and the jury found for the plaintiff on that issue. Thus, the plaintiff was entitled to recover under the liability theory that would produce the greatest recovery [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 304 (Tex. 2006)]. By requiring the claimant to choose among available theories of recovery, the Court's opinion strongly suggests that a claimant cannot mix and match contract and tort claims to increase the amount of recovery. For example, the choice of a fraud theory over a breach of contract claim would allow the claimant to recover economic damages, mental anguish damages, possibly exemplary damages, but not attorney's fees.

Recoverability of Exemplary Damages. While the excessiveness of damages as a factual matter is final in the Texas courts of appeals, the constitutionality of exemplary damages is a legal question within the jurisdiction of the Texas Supreme Court. Furthermore, exemplary damages on a fraud claim are subject to the generally applicable statutory cap on those damages, which limits recovery to the greater of (1) noneconomic damages of no more than $750,000, plus two times economic damages, or (2) $200,000 [Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 41.008(b); see Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 307, n.28 (2006) (because of limited compensatory damage recovery, exemplary damages for fraud limited by statute to $200,000); Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide, Ch. 20, Damages in Tort, §20.201 (Matthew Bender)]. Significantly, however, even if the amount of exemplary damages awarded is permissible under this cap, it may still be constitutionally excessive, particularly if the award exceeds four times the amount of exemplary damages [Tony Gullo Motors I, L.P. v. Chapa, 212 S.W.3d 299, 308 (2006) (constitutionality of exemplary damages award determined under three "guideposts:" (1) nature of defendant's conduct, (2) ratio between exemplary and compensatory damages, and (3) size of civil penalties in comparable cases; when defendant's fraudulent conduct was not reprehensible, and exemplary damages award far exceeded available civil penalties, ratio of 4.33 to 1 was constitutionally excessive and required remand to court of appeal for appropriate remittitur)].

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William V. Dorsaneo III is the Chief Justice John and Lena Hickman Distinguished Faculty Fellow and Professor of Law at Southern Methodist University's Dedman School of Law in Dallas, Texas, where he teaches a variety of litigation courses. He is also the principal author of the widely used and often cited 26-volume Texas Litigation Guide, published by Matthew Bender, the coauthor of the five-volume Texas Civil Trial Guide, the co-author of three Texas civil procedure casebooks, and several other volumes on Texas litigation subjects.

Professor Dorsaneo served as the Reporter to the Combined Committee appointed by the Texas Supreme Court, the Court of Criminal Appeals and the Texas Legislature to draft the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure and for the last 15 years he has served as the Chairman of the Appellate Rules Subcommittee of the Advisory Committee to the Texas Supreme Court. He is also the Chairman of the Texas Supreme Courts Task Force for Revision of the Texas Rules of Civil Procedure and a member of the American Law Institute. Professor Dorsaneo is Board Certified in Civil Appellate Law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

39 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joseph B. McDonnell on Nickon v. City of Princeton

2008 Emerging Issues 1405

Joseph B. McDonnell on Nickon v. City of Princeton, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1137 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

December 10, 2007

SUMMARY: Where a plaintiff's medical bills are discounted and paid by Medicare and Medicaid, and the payment is accepted in full satisfaction by the medical providers, is the plaintiff nevertheless entitled to submit to the jury and to recover as damages the initial billed amount? Nickon v. City of Princeton, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1137 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007) provides an answer to this vexing question. This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, discusses the important implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: The collateral source rule, recently considered anew by the Illinois Supreme Court in Arthur v. Catour, 216 Ill.2d 72 (2005), was presented to the Third District Appellate Court after a jury in Bureau County, Illinois returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff. This case and the Fourth District case of Wills v. Foster, 372 Ill.App.3d 670 (2007) reach opposite conclusions on the application of the collateral source rule where Medicare and Medicaid benefits result in a reduction of the amounts billed for medical services. Since the Supreme Court has allowed leave to appeal in Wills, it is likely that further clarification of the rule will be forthcoming.

Statement of the Rule. The collateral source rule is of common-law origin and is supported by substantial case authority in Illinois. The rule is that payments made to or on behalf of a plaintiff pursuant to a contract or other relationship between the plaintiff and the third party payor will not reduce the amount of the bill submitted by plaintiff; and that evidence of such collateral source payments is inadmissible. The rule is based on the proposition that a defendant tortfeasor may not take advantage of a relationship between the plaintiff and the third party payor (such as a medical insurer) to which the defendant is not a party. The allowance of such evidence would constitute a windfall to the defendant.

Exception to the Rule. In 1979, the Illinois Supreme Court recognized an exception to the collateral source rule. In Peterson v. Lou Bachrodt Chevrolet Co., 76 Ill. 2d 353 (1979), the minor plaintiff had been hospitalized and treated at a Shriners Hospital for Children, which for many years has provided medical care for children free of charge to the family. The court held that because there was no bill and no expectation of payment on the part of the medical provider, evidence of the reasonable value of the services so provided by the Shriners Hospital was inadmissible.

Peterson Revisited. In Arthur v. Catour, 216 Ill. 2d 72 (2005), the Illinois Supreme Court reexamined the collateral source rule and the exception to the rule carved out in Peterson. The initial bill of the medical provider had been discounted and the bill as discounted was paid by the plaintiffs medical insurer and accepted by the provider as payment in full. Noting that, at the time of the initial billing the medical provider expected payment of the billed amount, the court concluded that plaintiff could present to the jury the amount initially billed for the services rendered, notwithstanding the fact that the bill was later compromised for a lesser amount.

The Third Districts Approach. In the case under consideration, the medical charges that plaintiff was allowed to submit to the jury totaled $119,000. Plaintiff, however, was Medicare-eligible and his bills for treatment were submitted to Medicare. Defendant attempted to produce evidence that the medical providers discounted the $119,000 in charges and accepted a drastically reduced amount, $34,888.61, as payment in full for services rendered. The trial court, citing the collateral source rule, disallowed the evidence of the reduction in charges, and, following a verdict for the plaintiff in the amount of $180,000, denied defendants post-trial motion seeking a set-off or reduction of the verdict in the amount of the discount.

The Third District affirmed both actions of the trial judge, declining defendants invitation to expand the Peterson exception to services initially billed but subsequently discounted by Medicare as the third party payor. The court emphasized that the collateral source rule does not allow a wrongdoer to take advantage of contracts or other relations that may exist between the injured party and third person[,] citing Wilson v. Hoffman Group, Inc., 131 Ill. 2d 308, 320 (2005) (courts emphasis). The relationship between the plaintiff and Medicare was one of the other relations which, according to the court, qualifies for application of the collateral source rule. The court said that the myriad of problems associated with making further exceptions to the rule speak strongly in favor of limiting the exception to that established by the Supreme Court in Peterson. Moreover, the court pointed out, if the third party payor, whether a government agency or an insurance company, fails for one reason or other to pay the bill, the entire amount as initially billed becomes the plaintiffs responsibility. Such liability, said the court, is not relieved until payment is received from some source. The court concluded that is the reason for the application of the collateral resource rule.

An Apparent Conflict. In Wills v. Foster, 372 Ill.App.3d 670 (2007), the Fourth District Appellate Court reached the opposite conclusion. Plaintiffs medical bills as submitted amounted to $80,163.47, but the amount paid by Medicare and Medicaid was $19,005.50. The trial judge, after considering arguments by both parties, denied defendants motion to limit the medical bills to the amount actually paid and permitted plaintiff to submit the billed amount. At trial, defendant stipulated to plaintiffs exhibit that demonstrated plaintiffs total medical bills as $80,163.47. The jury returned an itemized verdict for plaintiff for the full amount of the medical bills as submitted and an additional $7,500 for pain and suffering. Pursuant to defendants post-trial motion, the trial court (a different judge), granted defendants motion for a set-off equal to the discounted amount and entered judgment on the verdict as so reduced, but gave plaintiff leave to petition for revision of its order in the event that plaintiffs medical providers sought to recover from him the difference between the amount billed and that paid Medicare and Medicaid. Plaintiff appealed.

In affirming the trial courts order, the Fourth District employed a different approach than that utilized by the Third District in Nickon. It emphasized that, unlike the plaintiff in Arthur v. Catour who had paid a premium for private insurance and who then had received the benefit of her bargain when her insurance company negotiated a lesser amount in payment, Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries pay no premium and do not bargain for their coverage. In addition, said the court, the plaintiff incurs no liability for the initial charges because the medical providers have agreed to accept the discounted sums as full payment for services. Thus, the court (although acknowledging a split of authority among the states that have considered the issue) held that the plaintiff who receives Medicare and Medicaid benefits in reduction of his medical bills is precluded from recovering the full amount of those bills and may recover only the amount actually paid.

Tips for Practitioners. The reach of the exception recognized in Peterson and reexamined most recently in Arthur may yet be extended when the Illinois Supreme Court rules on Wills v. Foster. Leave to appeal was allowed on September 26, 2007 and a decision is not likely before mid-2008. Until such clarification, plaintiffs should continue to submit the initially-billed amounts of medical bills and resist attempts by defense counsel to limit the evidence to the amounts actually paid and oppose motions or reduction of the verdict by the amount of the discount. Defense counsel, on the other hand, should continue to press for admission of evidence regarding the discount accepted by the medical care provider (whether due to insurance coverage or Medicare/ Medicaid) and, if unsuccessful, to move post-trial for a set-off in the amount of the discount.

Cross References. Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists Checklist 73.01: Bringing a Motion to Strike

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

40 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Manning and Libowsky on the Proposed Arbitration Fairness Act of 2007

2008 Emerging Issues 1406

Manning and Libowsky on the Proposed Arbitration Fairness Act of 2007

By Diana C. Manning and David J. Libowsky

December 10, 2007

SUMMARY: Identical bills have been introduced in both the United States Senate and House of Representatives that would void and bar enforcement of pre-dispute arbitration provisions contained in consumer, employment, and franchise contracts. This broadly drafted legislation would encompass pre-dispute arbitration provisions contained in agreements between securities broker-dealers and their customers.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Introduction. Identical bills have been introduced in both the United States Senate and House of Representatives that would void and bar enforcement of pre-dispute arbitration provisions contained in consumer, employment, and franchise contracts. This broadly drafted legislation would encompass pre-dispute arbitration provisions contained in agreements between securities broker-dealers and their customers. Under the proposed legislation, which is known as the Arbitration Fairness Act of 2007, customers would no longer be required to submit claims against broker-dealers and their registered representatives to arbitration, but instead would have the option of suing in a judicial forum.

This commentary analyzes the Arbitration Fairness Act in connection with securities arbitrations; the scope of this commentary does not extend to other "consumer," franchise, or employment dispute arbitrations. As detailed herein, the Arbitration Fairness Act is premised on findings which are legally and/or factually erroneous as far as securities arbitrations are concerned. In my opinion, such flawed findings do not justify the drastic measure of invalidating pre-dispute arbitration provisions in securities brokerage agreements as Congress is now considering.

The Proposed Legislation. On July 12, 2007, Senator Russ Feingold (D-WI) and Representative Henry C. "Hank" Johnson, Jr. (D-GA) introduced identical bills in the Senate and House of Representatives (2007 S. 1782 and 2007 H.R. 3010, respectively) that would invalidate and bar enforcement of pre-dispute arbitration provisions contained in consumer, employment, and franchise contracts. Entitled the Arbitration Fairness Act of 2007 ("Arbitration Fairness Act"), the proposed legislation would amend the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), 9 U.S.C.A. § 2 (2007), by adding inter alia the following subpart to Section 2 thereof:

(b) No predispute arbitration agreement shall be valid or enforceable if it requires arbitration of --

- (1) an employment, consumer, or franchise dispute; or
- (2) a dispute arising under any statute intended to protect civil rights or to regulate contracts or transactions between parties of unequal bargaining power.

2007 S. 1782 and 2007 H.R. 3010, 110th Cong., 1st Sess. § 2 (2007).

The term "consumer dispute" is defined as meaning "a dispute between a person other than an organization who seeks or acquires real or personal property, services, money, or credit for personal, family or household purposes and the seller or provider of such property, services, money or credit." 2007 S. 1782 and 2007 H.R. 3010, 110th Cong., 1st Sess. at § 3. Such definition may be broad enough to encompass claims brought by individuals against securities broker-dealers arising out of transactions in such person's securities brokerage accounts. As drafted, plaintiffs could argue that the proposed legislation voids and bars enforcement of arbitration provisions in contracts between broker-dealers and customers. Some courts may agree. The Arbitration Fairness Act, as proposed, would take effect on the date of its enactment, and would apply to any dispute or claim that arises on or after that date. 2007 S. 1782 and 2007 H.R. 3010, 110th Cong., 1st Sess. at § 5.

The Arbitration Fairness Act recites a number of findings that purportedly justify the legislation:

- (1) The Federal Arbitration Act (now enacted as chapter 1 of title 9 of the United States Code) was intended to apply to disputes between commercial entities of generally similar sophistication and bargaining power.
- (2) A series of United States Supreme Court decisions have changed the meaning of the Act so that it now extends to disputes between parties of greatly disparate economic power, such as consumer disputes and employment disputes. As a result, a large and rapidly growing number of corporations are requiring millions of consumers and employees to give up their right to have disputes resolved by a judge or jury, and instead submit their claims to binding arbitration.
- (3) Most consumers and employees have little or no meaningful option whether to submit their claims to arbitration. Few people realize, or understand, the importance of the deliberately fine print that strips them of rights; and because entire industries are adopting these clauses, people increasingly have no choice but to accept them. They must often give up their rights as a condition of having a job, getting necessary medical care, buying a car, opening a bank account, getting a credit card, and the like. Often times, they are not even aware that they have given up their rights.
- (4) Private arbitration companies are sometimes under great pressure to devise systems that favor the corporate repeat players who decide whether those companies will receive their lucrative business.
- (5) Mandatory arbitration undermines the development of public law for civil rights and consumer rights because there is no meaningful judicial review of arbitrators' decisions. With the knowledge that their rulings will not be seriously examined by a court applying current law, arbitrators enjoy near complete freedom to ignore the law and even their own rules.
- (6) Mandatory arbitration is a poor system for protecting civil rights and consumer rights because it is not transparent. While the American civil justice system features publicly accountable decision makers who generally issue written decisions that are widely available to the public, arbitration offers none of these features.
- (7) Many corporations add to their arbitration clauses unfair provisions that deliberately tilt the systems against individuals, including provisions that strip individuals of substantive statutory rights, ban class actions, and force people to arbitrate their claims hundreds of miles from their homes. While some courts have been protective of individuals, too many courts have upheld even egregiously unfair mandatory arbitration clauses in deference to a supposed Federal policy favoring arbitration over the constitutional rights of individuals.

2007 S. 1782 and 2007 H.R. 3010, 110th Cong., 1st Sess. § 2 (2007).

2007 H.R. 3010 was referred to the House Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative Law on August 10, 2007. That subcommittee held a hearing on the bill on October 25, 2007. 2007 S. 1782 has been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee; no hearings have been scheduled to date on the Senate bill.

Analysis. The findings cited by 2007 H.R. 3010 and 2007 S. 1782 as the basis for the Arbitration Fairness Act with respect to securities arbitrations are flawed in a number of critical respects both legally and factually. As such, those findings lend little, if any, credible support to the abrogation of arbitration provisions in securities brokerage agreements that the House and Senate bills seek to accomplish.

First, the finding that the FAA was "intended to apply to disputes between commercial entities of generally similar sophistication and bargaining power" is not based on the legislative history of the FAA. To the contrary, that legislative history demonstrates that the primary purpose of the FAA was to insure enforcement of arbitration agreements. As set forth in the House Report on the FAA:

The purpose of this bill is to make valid and enforceable agreements for arbitration contained in contracts involving interstate commerce or within the jurisdiction or admiralty, or which may be the subject of litigation in the Federal courts.

H.R. Rep. No. 96, 68th Cong., 1st Sess. 1 (1924). The FAA sought to "overcome the rule of equity, that equity will not specifically enforce any arbitration agreement." Hearing on S. 4214 Before a Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 67th Cong., 4th Sess. 6 (1923) (remarks of Senator Walsh). The House Report accompanying the bill further provided:

The need for the law arises from an anachronism of our American law. Some centuries ago, because of the jealousy of the English courts for their own jurisdiction, they refused to enforce specific agreements to arbitrate upon the ground that the courts were thereby ousted from their jurisdiction. This jealousy survived for so long a period that the principle became firmly embedded in the English common law and was adopted with it by the American courts. The courts have felt that the precedent was too strongly fixed to be overturned without legislative enactment, although they have frequently criticized the rule and recognized its illogical nature and the injustice which results from it. This bill declares simply that such agreements for arbitration shall be enforced, and provides a procedure in the Federal courts for their enforcement.

H.R. Rep. No. 96, 68th Cong., 1st Sess. 1-2 (1924). The stated secondary purpose of the FAA was to promote the expedited resolution of disputes. As the House Report observed:

It is practically appropriate that the action should be taken at this time when there is so much agitation against the costliness and delays of litigation. These matters can be largely eliminated by agreements for arbitration, if arbitration agreements are made valid and enforceable.

H.R. Rep. No. 96, 68th Cong., 1st Sess. at 2. There is nothing in the FAA's legislative history indicating that the statute was only intended to apply to disputes between "commercial entities of generally similar sophistication and bargaining power." See also, Southland Corporation v. Keating, 465 U.S. 1, 12-14, 104 S. Ct. 852, 79 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1984) and Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc. v. Byrd, 470 U.S. 213, 219-221, 105 S. Ct. 1238, 84 L. Ed. 2d 158 (1985).

Second, given the stated purpose of the FAA, the finding that a "series of United States Supreme Court decisions have changed the meaning of the [FAA] so that it now extends to disputes between parties of greatly disparate economic power, such as consumer disputes and employment disputes" is incorrect. Since the FAA's purpose was, and has always been, to insure enforcement of arbitration agreements, the statute's scope has always included disputes between "parties of greatly disparate economic power," as well as disputes between "commercial entities of generally similar sophistication and bargaining power." The fact that the courts are enforcing agreements requiring the arbitration of disputes between "parties of greatly disparate economic power" merely shows that the courts are interpreting the FAA exactly as Congress intended.

Third, the finding that "with the knowledge that their rulings will not be seriously examined by a court applying current law, arbitrators enjoy near complete freedom to ignore the law and even their own rules" materially misstates the legal standards by which arbitrations (both securities and non-securities) are subject. Under Section § 10(a) of the FAA, an arbitration award is subject to vacatur on a number of grounds when the integrity of the arbitration process has been undermined or the fundamental due process rights of one of the parties has been violated. Such grounds include: (1) where the award was procured by corruption, fraud, or undue means; (2) where there was evident partiality or corruption by the arbitrators; (3) where the arbitrators are guilty of misconduct; and (4) where the arbitrators have exceeded their powers. 9 USCS § 10(a) (2007).

Arbitrators do not "enjoy near complete freedom to ignore the law." Rather, as cases decided under the FAA have held, an arbitration award is subject to vacatur under the manifest disregard of the law doctrine where "a governing legal principle is well defined, explicit, and clearly applicable to the case, and where the arbitrator ignored it after it was brought to the arbitrator's attention in a way that assures that the arbitrator knew its controlling nature." See, e.g., Westerbeke Corp. v. Daihatsu Motor Co., Ltd., 304 F. 3d 200, 217 (2d Cir. 2002).

Further, the finding that "private arbitration companies are sometimes under great pressure to devise systems that favor the corporate repeat players who decide whether those companies will receive their lucrative business" does not apply to securities arbitrations. Securities arbitrations are governed by a single body, the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority ("FINRA"). FINRA is a self-regulatory organization ("SRO") subject to oversight by the Securities and Exchange Commission ("SEC"). Any proposed rules or amendments to existing rules for the arbitration of claims before FINRA Dispute Resolution are subject to notice and comment, allowing both members of the public and industry members to effectively participate in the rule making process. Any such proposed rules or amendments to existing rules are then approved by the SEC.

No empirical evidence was presented that FINRA has been pressured to devise a system favoring the securities industry. Indeed, if anything, in recent years, the amendments to the FINRA Code of Arbitration Procedure, and its pronouncements and actions evidence a clear trend in favor of claimants. See, e.g., NASD Notice to Members 99-90 (establishing a Discovery Guide pursuant to which various categories of documents are deemed to be presumptively discoverable and are to be turned over without a formal request for production of said documents); NASD Notice to Members 03-70 (reminding member firms and associated persons of their duty to cooperate in the exchange of documents requested by parties or listed on applicable document production lists within the specified timeframe); NASD Notice dated July 19, 2004 (FINRA imposing a total of $750,000 in fines on a number of member firms for failing to comply with discovery obligations); NASD Notice to Members 06-64 (amending arbitrator classification criteria to ensure that individuals with significant ties to the securities industry may not serve as public arbitrators in FINRA arbitrations).

Equally inapplicable is the criticism that there are unfair provisions that "deliberately tilt the systems against individuals, including provisions that strip individuals of substantive statutory rights, ban class actions, and force people to arbitrate their claims hundreds of miles from their homes." Arbitrating claims before FINRA Dispute Resolution merely changes the forum for the resolution of claims without altering the statutory and common law rights and obligations that otherwise apply. Investors can bring claims for violation of the federal securities laws along with claims for violation of other applicable federal and state statutory and common law. The FINRA Code of Arbitration Procedure does not take away the protections of applicable federal or state statute or common law. Indeed, the law and the practice is to the contrary. For example, the United States Supreme Court has confirmed that investors may pursue claims for punitive damages in arbitration. See Mastrobuono v. Shearson Lehman Hutton, Inc., 514 U.S. 56, 115 S. Ct. 1212, 131 L. Ed. 76 (1995).

Further, unlike federal courts which will adjudicate and frequently grant motions to dismiss for failure to state a claim and for summary judgment, arbitrators in FINRA Dispute Resolution arbitrations rarely grant pre-hearing motions to dismiss a statement of claim, thereby almost always allowing the claim to proceed to a hearing. In that regard, FINRA is currently considering an amendment to the Code of Arbitration Procedure that would further restrict the already limited ability of member firms and associated persons to file dispositive motions. Such motions would be limited to the following circumstances: (1) where the parties previously had settled their dispute in writing; (2) "factual impossibility," meaning the party could not have been associated with the conduct at issue; or (3) the existing six-year time limitation on the submission of claims to arbitration. Under the proposed amendment, a respondent who files a pre-hearing motion to dismiss that is denied would be subject to the imposition of attorneys' fees if the motion is deemed by the panel to be frivolous. See SR-FINRA-2007-021 (Nov. 2, 2007) (hyperlink at: http://www.finra.org/web/groups/rules_regs/documents/rule_filing/p037391.pdf).

Moreover, arbitration provisions in securities brokerage agreements do not bar class actions. In accordance with Rule 12204 of the FINRA Code of Arbitration Procedure, class action claims are simply not eligible for submission to arbitration. Any person purporting to assert a putative class action claim against a broker-dealer is able to bring such claim in the appropriate federal or state court.

Nor are claimants in securities arbitrations required to "arbitrate their claims hundreds of miles from their homes." Rather, under Rule 12213 of the FINRA Code of Arbitration Procedure, the Director of Arbitration is required to "select the hearing location closest to the customer's residence at the time of the events giving rise to the dispute." FINRA Dispute Resolution provides a hearing location in every state along with Washington, D.C. and Puerto Rico, and in many states it provides more than one location. See FINRA Dispute Resolution Regional Offices and Hearing Locations (hyperlink at

<http://www.finra.org/ArbitrationMediation/FINRADisputeResolution/WhatIsDisputeResolution/DisputeResolutionRegionalHearingLocations>

Last, the bills' criticisms of arbitration based on the lack of judicial review of arbitrators' decisions and the absence of transparency are, as Professor Peter Rutledge of the Catholic University of America, Columbus School of Law has pointed out, not at all unique to arbitration. As Professor Rutledge testified at the hearing on 2007 H.R. 3010, settlement is another mechanism which is not transparent, nor does it facilitate the development of public law, yet there are clear benefits associated with settlement, such as "reduced stress on the judicial system, speedier relief for plaintiffs and lower legal fees for both sides." See Testimony of Peter B. Rutledge, Associate Professor of Law, Columbus School of Law, Catholic University of America, Hearing on H.R. 3010, House Judiciary Committee, Subcommittee on Commercial and Administrative law (Oct. 25, 2007) at 9. As Professor Rutledge concluded, "the same logic supporting settlements -- notwithstanding their retarding effect on the development of public law -- also supports arbitration."

In short, the proposed findings upon which the Arbitration Fairness Act is premised lack substantial foundation in law or fact with respect to the arbitration of securities claims.

Conclusion. The legislative process with respect to the Arbitration Fairness Act is still at a relatively early stage. It is unclear whether any Senate hearing will be scheduled on the Act at any time in the near future. It is clear, however, that securities arbitrations do not suffer from the defects that are claimed to exist with respect to other types of consumer arbitrations. In light of the seriously flawed nature of its findings from both a legal and factual perspective, and the absence of any significant supporting empirical evidence whether the Arbitration Fairness Act's attempt to invalidate arbitration provisions contained in securities brokerage agreements constitutes necessary or appropriate public policy should be questioned.

Cross References. LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice Chapter 6: Arbitration.

Return to Text

n1 . FINRA was formed as a result of a merger in July 2007 between the regulatory arms of the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc. and the New York Stock Exchange, Inc. Arbitrations previously governed by NASD Dispute Resolution and the NYSE are now conducted by FINRA Dispute Resolution.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Diana C. Manning is a member of the law firm of Bressler, Amery & Ross, P.C., and practices in its Florham Park, New Jersey office. Ms. Manning concentrates her practice in trial and appellate litigation, including commercial litigation, professional negligence, and product liability claims. She is admitted to practice in New Jersey and New York, as well as, the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey, the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

Ms. Manning has been involved in a number of reported decisions, appears frequently before the New Jersey Superior Court, Appellate Division, and has been appointed to the Malpractice Insurance Committee and the Appellate Practice Committee of the New Jersey State Bar Association. She has authored the Professional Liability and Product Liability chapters of the LexisNexis Practice Guide, New Jersey Personal Injury Litigation, 2007. She also authored the article, The Expansion of Recoverable Damages in Legal Malpractice Actions Impacts Us All, for the New Jersey Lawyer Magazine.

David J. Libowsky is a shareholder and director of Bressler, Amery & Ross, P.C. Mr. Libowsky has over 20 years of securities and commercial litigation experience in state and federal courts and in arbitration proceedings. He has authored a number of articles, including: (1) Motive and Opportunity Pleading After the Securities Litigation Uniform Standards Act, The Review of Securities and Commodities Regulation, Vol. 32, No. 11, June 9, 1999; (2) The Pleading of Scienter in Federal Securities Fraud Class Actions in the Third Circuit Under the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, New Jersey Lawyer-The Magazine, June 2000; (3) Close Corporations: Federal and New Jersey Securities Litigation Issues, New Jersey State Bar Association Corporate & Business Law Section Newsletter, Vol. 26, No. 1, June 2002; and (4) Immunity for the Broker-Dealer, New Jersey Law Journal, Vol. CLXXXVII, No. 9, Index 775, February 26, 2007. He has also co-authored Current Trends in Broker/Dealer Litigation, The Journal of Investment Compliance, Vol. 2, No. 4, Spring 2002. He was a member of the Securities Litigation in Close Corporations panel for the New Jersey Institute for Continuing Legal Education's Second Annual Business Law Symposium held in October 2001. He was also a speaker at the New Jersey Organization and Sale of Small Businesses seminar for the third-year component of the New Jersey Institute for Continuing Legal Education's Skills and Methods course held in September 2002 on the topic, Close Corporations: Federal and New Jersey Securities Litigation Issues.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

41 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on High-Low Agreements

2008 Emerging Issues 1386

Bisceglie on High-Low Agreements

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

December 7, 2007

SUMMARY: The NY Ct. of Apps. held that the right to a fair trial mandates that parties to a high-low agreement who remain as parties in a multi-defendant case must disclose the existence of the agreement to the court and to all non-agreeing defendants. Kyle Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman examines considerations for the practitioner entering high-low and related agreements in light of In the Matter of Eighth Jud. Dist. Asbestos Litigation.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: High-Low Agreements Must Be Disclosed to Court and Non-Agreeing Parties. In the Matter of Eighth Judicial District Asbestos Litigation, 8 N.Y.3d 717, 872 N.E.2d 232, 840 N.Y.S.2d 546 (2007), a unanimous Court of Appeals ruled that a high-low agreement between plaintiff and defendant, who remain in a multi-defendant lawsuit, must be disclosed to the trial court and to non-settling defendants. The Court also expressly ruled that disclosure of the agreement to the jury lay in the "sound discretion" of the trial court. This case is significant for at least three reasons. First, it provides bright line instruction on disclosure where previous practice standards varied. Second, the decision reaffirms the discretion held by the trial court to permit a jury to hear evidence about the agreement. Third, it raises the question whether disclosure will affect other partial settlements in multi-defendant cases including so-called Mary Carter agreements.

Elements of a High-Low Agreement. A high-low agreement is commonly used in a case going to trial to guarantee the plaintiff a minimum recovery while capping a defendant's potential maximum exposure. It is commonly asserted that high-low agreements allow the parties to re-allocate the risk of going to trial. In the context of a multi-defendant litigation where not all remaining defendants are parties to the high-low agreement, a defendant not a party to the agreement may be prejudiced if it is not informed of the agreement until after trial.

In the Matter of Eighth Judicial District, the plaintiff and the settling defendant entered into an agreement wherein settling defendant's liability would fall within a pre-determined range. If the jury awarded damages against settling defendant of $155,000 or less, settling defendant would pay $155,000; $185,000 or more, settling defendant would pay $185,000; and only in the range of $155,000 and $185,000 would settling defendant be obligated to pay the actual amount awarded. The Court was made aware of the existence of this high-low agreement but the agreement was not disclosed to the non-settling party or the jury. After trial, the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the amount of $3,750,000 and apportioned 60%, or $2,250,000, to the non-settling party. After various post-trial motions, the trial court ultimately granted judgment against the non-settling defendant for $1.55 million.

Prejudice of a Secret High-Low Agreement. In Matter of Eighth Judicial District, the Court of Appeals found that the agreement "furnished plaintiff with an incentive to maximize" the non-settling defendant's liability. While it is "not uncommon" for the plaintiff to maximize the liability of one defendant, the non-settling defendant was entitled to know "the true posture of the case." Such disclosure would have permitted the non-settling defendant the opportunity to adjust trial strategy and re-evaluate its decision to proceed to trial as "the target defendant." The Court noted a litany of procedural and evidentiary strategies denied to the non-settling party: conducting jury selection differently, arguing that it is entitled to its own peremptory challenges rather than sharing them with the settling co-defendant, filing in limine motions on the admissibility of the agreement and cross-examining witnesses differently.

The Court of Appeals ruled that disclosure of the existence of the agreement to the trial court and to the non-settling defendant strikes "the proper balance between [New York's] public policy of encouraging the expeditious settlement of claims, and the need to ensure that all parties to a litigation are apprised of the true posture of the litigation so they may tailor their strategy accordingly." Additionally, disclosure of the agreement allows the non-settling party the opportunity to make a record of how it believes the high-low agreement affects its rights, and allows the trial court to consider the interests of all the parties before determining the high-low agreement's role, if any, at trial. The Court of Appeals left all determinations about the evidentiary treatment of the high-low agreement to the "sound discretion of the trial court."

Prior to Matter of Eighth Judicial District, whether or not such agreements were disclosed to the non-settling parties or the court was a matter of varying practice without any significant limitation beyond guidance imported from other jurisdictions and equity. For example, Matter of Eighth Judicial District involves an appeal from Reynolds v. Anchem Products, 32 A.D.3d 1268, 822 N.Y.S.2d 216 (4th Dep't 2006). Therein, in a three-to-one decision with one justice abstaining, the Appellate Division based solely on authority cited from other states, upheld a non-disclosed high-low agreement because it found no "evidence of collusion" to "realign the loyalties" of the parties. Id., 32 A.D.3d at 1270, 822 N.Y.S.2d at 218 (citations omitted).

The Court of Appeals cited a singular concern with "lack of disclosure." Read broadly, the decision raises questions under New York practice about the role of disclosure, the trial court and jury in all partial settlements.

Open Questions in New York. Matter of Eighth Judicial District raises the issue whether other types of partial settlement agreements must be disclosed in New York. Examples include: settlement agreements involving sums certain, (see, e.g., Wausau Bus. Ins. Co. v. Turner Constr. Co., 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7294 (S.D.N.Y. June 5, 2001)); agreements calling for testimony at trial of witnesses of the settling defendant, (see, e.g., Minpeco, S.A. v. Hunt, 127 F.R.D. 460 (S.D.N.Y. 1989)); or agreements between the plaintiff and defendant to forego summation against one another (see, e.g., Leon v. J & M Peppe Realty Corp., 190 A.D.2d 400, 596 N.Y.S.2d 380 (1st Dep't 1993)).

Effect of Decision on Status of Mary Carter Agreements in New York. Matter of Eighth Judicial District raises the question of whether Mary Carter agreements, which are generally viewed as impermissible by New York courts, will now be per se permissible as long as disclosure of the agreement is made to the court and to the non-settling defendants. Both high-low and Mary Carter agreements raise similar policy concerns. To wit, they are often secret and realign the interests of supposedly adverse and aligned parties alike. The term "Mary Carter Agreement" arises from Booth v. Mary Carter Paint Co., 202 So. 2d 8 (Fla. Dist Ct. App. 1967) and usually describes confidential agreements that require the settling defendant's continued participation as a party to the litigation with reduced exposure in proportion to an increase in the non-settling defendants' liability over a specific amount. Some courts define the key characteristic as realignment of the parties: "most importantly, .. the settling parties structure the settlement in such a way as to give the settling defendant a financial incentive to assist the plaintiff in increasing the liability of the non-settling defendant." Wausau Bus. Ins. Co., 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7294, *2 (the agreement in Wausau was disclosed to the Court but not the non-settling party). Other courts emphasize its secrecy, and, nearly, use a "secret" partial settlement as a synonym for Mary Carter agreement. E.g., Minpeco, 127 F.R.D. at 463 ; Sierra Rutile Ltd. v. Katz, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14921, *9-10 (S.D.N.Y. October 19, 1994) ("[S]ecrecy is part of the essence of a Mary Carter agreement," and disclosure "avoids prejudice to the non-settling defendants.").

Either way, federal courts consistently have observed that New York law precludes Mary Carter agreements. See, e.g., Wausau, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7294, at *3 ("Most jurisdictions, including New York, hold that such agreements are void as against public policy, because they secretly realign the parties, may confuse juries if not disclosed, and may affect the settling defendant's presentation of evidence in a way that prejudices the non-settling defendants.")(Citations omitted); Minpeco, 127 F.R.D. at 463-464 (finding agreement not "unlawful" because agreement was not a Mary Carter agreement); Sierra Rutile Limited, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14921, at *9-10 (agreement "not a Mary Carter agreement and is thus not void against public policy").

At least two First Department cases note, in passing, the impermissible collusive nature of Mary Carter agreements. See Considar, Inc. v. Equipment & Parts Export, Inc., 271 A.D.2d 288, 706 N.Y.S.2d 633 (1st Dep't 2000)(litigation agreement between two parties in multi-defendant case "did not amount to an impermissible collusive Mary Carter agreement since [co-defendant] did not agree to feign a defense so as to minimize liability.."); Herbst v. 40 Worth Associates, 276 A.D.2d 320, 321, 714 N.Y.S.2d 211, 212 (1st Dep't 2000)(agreement to apportion liability "not an improper Mary Carter agreement").

Treatise authority goes so far to state that New York prohibits Mary Carter agreements. 1-10 Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 10.05 (2007). While this may be a valid observation about New York practice, there are no New York State cases that so hold. The only New York state authority relied upon in federal cases is Stiles v. Batavia Atomic Horseshoes, Inc., 174 A.D.2d 287, 579 N.Y.S.2d 790 (4th Dep't 1992), reversed on other grounds, Stiles v. Batavia Atomic Horseshoes, Inc., 81 N.Y.2d 950, 613 N.E.2d 572, 597 N.Y.S.2d 666 (1993). In Stiles, the Appellate Division stated that a Mary Carter agreement may be invalid in some circumstances, found that the agreement before it was not a Mary Carter agreement and, in any event, was ultimately reversed.

The combined weight of prior authority and Matter of Eighth Judicial District suggests that, provided full disclosure to the court and non-settling defendants, New York law would permit parties to enter partial settlements that provide greater realignment than called for in a high-low agreements including but not limited to the type of realignment typically associated with Mary Carter agreements.

Disclosure to the Jury. Matter of Eighth Judicial District reminds practitioners that the trial court has discretion to reveal high-low agreements to the jury. Many practitioners rely on CPLR 4533-b (takes proof of settlement "out of the hearing of a jury" to show "mitigation of damages") or Federal Rule of Evidence 408 to argue that the jury should not be made aware of settlement as the prejudice outweighs probative value. Matter of Eighth Judicial District emphasizes the discretion trial courts possess to disclose the high-low agreement to the jury for purposes other than proving liability, mitigation or amount of the claim in dispute, which adds a dimension of risk that settling parties likely previously underestimated or ignored, viz., will they have to disclose to the jury part or all of the elements of their high-low agreement? Disclosure of settlement to the jury in a multi-defendant case has precedent in New York. See, e.g., Lambert Houses Redevelopment Co. v. HRH Equity Corp., 117 A.D.2d 227, 234, 502 N.Y.S.2d 433, 437 (1st Dep't 1986)(plaintiff and settling defendant annexed copies of the settlement agreement to proposed amended pleadings "thereby assuring that the jury in this case will be fully informed of the [settlement] agreement and of the relationship" between plaintiff and settling defendant); Meleo v. Rochester Gas & Elec. Corp., 72 A.D.2d 83, 98, 423 N.Y.S.2d 343, 353 (4th Dept. 1979)(failure to disclose secret agreement between plaintiff and four settling defendants denied the jury the opportunity to "scrutinize the evidence in the light of the true self-interests and interrelationships of the parties.") In light of Matter of Eighth Judicial District, parties interested in entering high-low agreements and other partial settlement agreements in multi-defendant cases ignore potential disclosure to the jury at their own risk.

Cross-references: 1-5 LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Negligence § 5.51 (2006); 1-10 LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 10.10 (discussing offering proof of payment by joint tortfeasor in mitigation of damages); John E. Benedict, It's a Mistake to Tolerate the Mary Carter Agreement, 87 Colum. L. Rev. 368 (1987)(outlining problems created by Mary Carter agreements); 1-3 New York Practice Guide: Negligence § 3.08(3)(d) (note on Mary Carter Agreements); Lisa Bernstein & Daniel Klerman, An Economic Analysis of Mary Carter Settlement Agreements, 83 Geo. L.J. 2215, 2222-23 (1995)(more on Mary Carter Agreements); 9-45 New York Civil Practice: CPLR P 4533-b.01 (2007)(notes that CPLR § 4533-b provision was designed to avoid drawing of prejudicial inference by jury); 2-408 Weinstein's Federal Evidence 408 (2007) (1-7 Weinstein's Evidence Manual § 7.05 discussing admissibility of evidence of settlement and consequences of admitting evidence of a settlement).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to Judge Alfred M. Wolin, United States District Court for the District of New Jersey. He can be reached by phone at 212-885-8818 or by email at kbisceglie@bartonesq.com.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

42 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Secura Ins. Co. v. Ill. Farmers Ins. Co.

2008 Emerging Issues 1384

Secura Ins. Co. v. Ill. Farmers Ins. Co., 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1198 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

December 7, 2007

SUMMARY: An automobile liability insurance policy excludes from coverage "any person or organization, other than (the named insured) or a family member, who is the employer of any insured person." Is such a clause consistent with IL public policy?

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: From time to time, Illinois courts have determined that a particular provision of a liability insurance policy violates Illinois public policy. This is one such case. The Second District Appellate Court holds void a policy provision excluding from coverage "any person or organization [other than the named insured or a family member] who is the employer of any insured person."

Background. Daniel Dill was employed by Bogoja Muzikoski, d/b/a B&A Automotive Repair. B&A had a commercial liability insurance policy issued by Secura which provided coverage for B&A and its employees while operating "non-owned" vehicles in the course and scope of their employment. On October 21, 2000 Dill was driving, in the course and scope of his employment by B&A, a vehicle owned by a B&A customer when he collided head-on with another vehicle. Suit was filed by the occupants of the second vehicle against both Dill and B&A as Dill's employer. The vehicle Dill was driving was insured by Farmers. Their policy contained an exclusion from coverage with respect to "any person or organization, other than you or a family member, who is the employer of any insured person."

Defense of the suit was initially tendered by B&A to Secura, its carrier, and, after several exchanges of correspondence between Secura and Farmers, Farmers accepted the defense of the employee Dill, but declined the tender as to B&A, Dill's employer.

Dill was eventually dismissed from the underlying suit, leaving B&A as the only defendant. The case was eventually settled and Secura then sued Farmers, seeking a declaratory judgment that B&A was covered by Farmers' policy and that Farmers owed Secura reimbursement of attorney's fees and costs. It also sought a bad faith finding against Farmers that would entitle Secura to reimbursement of the entire settlement paid.

On cross-motions for summary judgment, the trial court found in Farmers' favor on the coverage issue, ruling that Farmers' policy clearly excluded B&A as an insured because of the language excluding from coverage the employer of any insured (other than the named insured or a family member), and that the provision did not violate Illinois public policy. Secura appealed.

The "Omnibus Clause." Secura argued on appeal that the Farmers' policy provision excluding the employer of any insured (with exceptions not pertinent) from coverage violated Illinois' public policy. The Illinois Vehicle Code (625 ILCS 5/1-100, et seq.) requires that both a user and any other person responsible for the use of a motor vehicle, with the express or implied permission of the insured, be covered by liability insurance. Excluding an employer from coverage where the employee himself is covered does not, Secura contended, comply with the statute. Accordingly, argued Secura, the trial court erred in finding that Farmers could exclude B&A from coverage as long as its employee, Dill, was covered.

Application of the Illinois Vehicle Code. The Appellate Court pointed out that Section 5/7-601(a) of the Illinois Vehicle Code requires that a motor vehicle be insured through a liability insurance policy (625 ILCS 5/7-601(a) and that Section 7-317(b)(2) mandates that such a policy "insure the person named therein and any other person using or responsible for the use of such motor vehicle with the express or implied permission of the insured."

This section, said the court, requires an insurer to provide coverage to the named insured and any permissive user of the insured vehicle. The quoted language mandates coverage for not only the named insured but "any other person using or responsible for the use of" the vehicle with the insured's express or implied permission. This, said the court, was the only reasonable interpretation to be given the statute.

The court then examined case law interpreting Section 7-317(b)(2). State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company v. Smith, 197 Ill. 2d 369 (2001), held that an automobile policy's business exclusion clause violated Illinois' public policy and was, therefore, unenforceable. There, the insured had dropped his automobile off to a valet driver at a casino, who then had an accident injuring a third party. The insured declined to cover the driver or the casino on the basis of the business exclusion clause, which provided that there was no coverage while the insured vehicle was "being repaired, serviced or used by any person employed or engaged in any way in a car business." (The definitions section included those engaged in "parking" vehicles). The Smith court held that this clause clearly violated Section 7-317(b)(2) and its mandate that a motor vehicle liability policy cover the named insured and any other person using the vehicle with the insured's permission.

In Progressive Universal Insurance Co. of Illinois v. Liberty Mutual Fire Insurance Co., 215 Ill. 2d 121 (2005), a pizza deliverer, driving his mother's vehicle, struck and injured a pedestrian. The issue presented was whether Progressive, which had issued the liability policy on the mother's vehicle, had a duty to defend and indemnify the son in the personal injury action brought by the injured pedestrian and his wife. The Progressive policy contained a provision excluding coverage for bodily injury arising out of the use of a vehicle to carry persons or property for compensation or a fee, including food delivery. The Supreme Court upheld the trial court's determination that the food delivery exclusion was not void as against public policy. Progressive, 215 Ill. 2d at 134. In doing so, the court distinguished the "omnibus clause" of a liability policy from a provision that excludes certain risks from policy coverage. Whereas Smith dealt with the arbitrary exclusion from coverage of persons, the policy in Progressive dealt with the exclusion of risks. The teaching of the cases is that actual owners, i.e. "named insureds" and permissive users, must be treated equally in terms of policy coverage. In excluding a named insured's employer from coverage, Farmers' policy treated persons differently in terms of coverage based on whether or not they were named insureds (or family members). The trial court, applying an inappropriate standard, ignored the fact that certain permissive users were not covered, in contravention of Illinois public policy. Accordingly, the trial court's judgment was reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

Tips for Practitioners. Both the Illinois Vehicle Code and the Illinois Insurance Code should be consulted when the validity of any auto policy provision is an issue. Effective July 1, 1989, Illinois joined those states enacting compulsory automobile liability insurance. 625 ILCS 5/7-601 mandates that the insurance on the vehicle cover the person named in the policy and any other person using or responsible for the use of such motor vehicle with the insured's express or implied permission. See also 625 ILCS 5/7-317(b)(2)("omnibus clause"). This, of course, is consistent with well-established case law. At the same time, Illinois courts have recognized the right of the legislature to prohibit insurers from excluding certain risks from coverage (see, e.g., State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Illinois Farmers Ins. Co., 226 Ill.2d 395 (2007) and the Illinois Insurance Code recognizes that certain risks may be excluded. (See, e.g., 215 ILCS 5/143a (recognizing exclusions from uninsured motorist coverage.)

Cross References. See Appleman on Insurance Chapter 132: "Coverage A" Exclusions in the Commercial General Liability (CGL) Insurance Policy.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint

Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

43 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mike Wilson on Davis v. Fischer Single Family Homes, LTD

2008 Emerging Issues 1387

Mike Wilson on Davis v. Fischer Single Family Homes, LTD, 231 S.W.3d 767 (Ky. App. 2007)

By Mike Wilson

December 7, 2007

SUMMARY: Ky. CR 47.03 permits co-parties to have three peremptory challenges each, rather than sharing three, if the parties interests are antagonistic. In Davis v. Fischer Single Family Homes, LTD, the KY Court of Appeals held that the presence or absence of any particular factors listed in Sommerkamp v. Linton, 114 S.W.3d 811 (Ky. 2003) is not determinative as to whether interests are antagonistic.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Analysis. In Davis, a homeowner sued a builder and a subcontractor claiming personal injuries related to mold exposure and alleging construction defects, fraud and negligence.

The trial court allowed three peremptory challenges to each of the defendants.

The homeowner argued that because the defendants engaged in common defense efforts, their interests were not antagonistic and therefore they were not entitled to separate preemptory challenges.

Davis, quoting Sommerkamp v. Linton, 114 S.W.3d 811 (Ky. 2003), listed factors to be considered in determining if co-parties have antagonistic interests. One factor is whether the co-parties have filed cross-claims. In Davis, the defendants had not filed cross-claims but nonetheless had antagonistic interests in the court's view. The court noted that the complaint charged separate acts of negligence, that the defendants had separate, independent counsel, and that each defendant had a different strategy for the case. Davis states that all factors identified in Sommerkamp are to be given due weight "as the existence or absence of a single factor is insufficient to make a determination as to the reasonableness of [finding that interests are antagonistic]. Each factor must be weighed in the balance with the others." 231 S.W.3d at 773-4.

However, a few paragraphs later, relying upon the Sommerkamp, Davis also held that co-defendants' interests are inherently antagonistic when apportionment applies, as it did in Davis. A question raised, then, is whether apportionment of fault, by itself, is sufficient to constitute antagonistic interests or is just one factor to weigh along with others.

Cases holding that no particular factor is necessary. Roberts v. Taylor, Ky., 339 S.W.2d 653 (1960) held that if defendants in a personal injury action are charged with independent acts of negligence, the interests of the defendants are most always antagonistic.

The assertion of cross-claims merely formalizes the antagonism, but is not necessary for a finding that interests are antagonistic. Co-defendants who share a theory of the case may not have antagonistic interests. In Davenport v. Ephraim McDowell Mem'l Hosp., Inc. 769 S.W.2d 56 (Ky.App. 1988), a medical malpractice case against an anesthesiologist, hospital, and others, not only were no cross-claims filed, the co-defendants shared the same theory of the case. The Court of Appeals found the co-defendants' interests were not antagonistic. Sommerkamp v. Linton, 114 S.W.3d 811 (Ky. 2003), citing Roberts and Davenport, identified three "elements" to consider in determining if interests are antagonistic:

- 1) whether the co-parties are charged with separate acts of negligence;
- 2) whether they share a common theory of the case; and
- 3) whether cross-claims are filed.

Sommerkamp also identified as relevant whether the defendants are represented by separate counsel, whether the alleged acts of negligence occurred at different times, whether the defendants have individual theories of defense, and whether fault will be subject to apportionment. 114 S.W.3d at p. 816[cedil] states that "[a]ll of these factors are to be weighed by the trial court in determining if the defendants have antagonistic interests and thus are entitled to separate peremptory challenges." Davis quotes Sommerkamp on all of these points.

Is apportionment alone sufficient to demonstrate antagonistic interests? Sommerkamp also noted, however, that prior to the adoption of comparative negligence, and the enactment of Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182, a defendant was required to cross-claim for contribution against joint tortfeasors pursuant to Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 412.030 or Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 454.040. The adoption of Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182, said the court, dispensed with the need for cross-claims:

Contemporary apportionment requirements including Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 provide that fault in a tort action is automatically subject to apportionment among the parties to the action. This statute renders a crossclaim for contribution, as well as a counterclaim for contributory or comparative negligence, needless. Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 deems codefendants that are charged with separate acts of negligence to be antagonistic because it requires apportionment of the total liability. Sommerkamp, p. 817. How does adoption of Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 affect the question of antagonistic interests in a case like Davenport, where defendants share a theory of the case? Sommerkamp states at page 816 that

The [apportionment] system is inherently antagonistic because it requires codefendants to attempt to shift responsibility to each other. The Court of Appeals failed to consider the role of apportionment and the clear antagonism which is created by that method of assessing liability. . . [R]eliance on Davenport was misplaced. That case was decided prior to the adoption of the apportionment statute, Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182.

Similarly, Davis, p. 774, says "[t]he system of apportionment is inherently antagonistic."

Though neither Sommerkamp nor Davis expressly says so, the language in Sommerkamp and Davis could be argued to mean that apportionment is sufficient to create antagonistic interests without weighing other factors. If there is antagonism, Sommerkamp says, "the clear language of .. rule [47.03] does not require the defendants to demonstrate a certain degree of antagonism, but only the existence of antagonism between the [parties] at the time of jury selection, in order to permit separate peremptory challenges." Sommerkamp, p. 816.

Practice Tips. Language in Sommerkamp and Davis can be used to make contrary arguments- Athat apportionment alone is sufficient to permit separate peremptory challenges, and that apportionment is just one factor to be weighed.

Illustrative examples

Argument that apportionment is sufficient to create antagonistic interests. Apportionment alone is sufficient to create antagonistic interests because Sommerkamp says that Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 deems codefendants that are charged with separate acts of negligence to be antagonistic because the statute requires apportionment of the total liability. Other factors, therefore, do not matter because if there is antagonism, whatever the degree, separate peremptory challenges are permitted under Sommerkamp. Both Sommerkamp and Davis hold that apportionment is inherently antagonistic.

Argument that apportionment is just a factor to be weighed. Both Sommerkamp and Davis, after listing factors, including whether fault is to be apportioned, state that all factors should be given due weight. Neither case expressly states that apportionment is sufficient to require separate peremptory challenges without weighing other factors.

Both cases make a point of examining facts, other than apportionment, that show interests are antagonistic, which would be unnecessary if apportionment alone were sufficient to determine the issue. Also, Davis expressly states that the existence or absence of a single factor is insufficient to make a determination.

Cross-References to Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book. Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 19.14, Admonition to Jury; Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book § 130.00, Practice Context for Negligence; Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 130.10, Answer Asserting Assorted Defenses

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mike Wilson, J.D., University of Kentucky, has been a practicing attorney since 1980. He is a contributor to Caldwell's Kentucky Legal Forms, 5th Ed, Lexis-Nexis, 2006, teaches law to paralegals at Sullivan University, Lexington, Kentucky, and has prepared instructional material for numerous continuing legal education seminars for paralegals. He also is an administrative law judge for the Kentucky Department of Education.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

44 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mike Wilson on U.S. Bank, NA v. Hasty, 232 S.W.3d 536 (Ky. App. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1388

Mike Wilson on U.S. Bank, NA v. Hasty, 232 S.W.3d 536 (Ky. App. 2007)

By Mike Wilson

December 7, 2007

SUMMARY: When can a judgment or order be set aside on the basis of mistake, surprise, or excusable neglect? According to U.S. Bank, NA v. Hasty, 232 S.W.3d 536 (Ky. App. 2007), a key factor is whether the moving party was able, through exercise of reasonable diligence, to present the claim or defense prior to entry of the order or judgment sought to be set aside.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Analysis. U.S. Bank, NA v. Hasty involved a foreclosure action where the mortgagee attempted to set aside foreclosure sale proceedings and join a judgment lien creditor as a party. The trial court initially set aside the proceedings, but then rescinded its order. The Kentucky Court of Appeals, relying on Fortney v. Mahan, 302 S.W.2d 842 (Ky. 1957), affirmed the trial court, holding that with minimal effort the bank could have discovered the lien prior to entry of a final judgment in the foreclosure action and, therefore, the plaintiff "had the ability to have presented its claim prior to the entry of judgment." 232 S.W.3d at 542. U.S. Bank reaffirms the notion appearing in many Kentucky cases interpreting Ky. CR Rule 60.02 and, before it, the similar provision in section 518 of the old Code of Civil Practice: claims of mistake, surprise or excusable neglect are given less weight if the movant failed to exercise reasonable diligence.

Duty of diligence. Kentucky courts maintain that Ky. CR Rule 60.02 is only intended to provide relief if the reasons for the relief are of an extraordinary nature. Ray v. Commonwealth, 633 S.W.2d 71 (Ky. App. 1982). The Kentucky courts generally have not held that the client's or attorney's neglect is both extraordinary and excusable where reasonable diligence has not been exercised.

In Fortney, relied upon by the U.S. Bank court, a litigant sought relief under Ky. CR Rule 60.02 on the grounds that his attorney mistakenly failed to introduce certain records into evidence. The Fortney court denied relief, holding that Ky. CR Rule 60.02 does not apply to such a mistake. The rule stated in Fortney is "[t]wo of the factors to be considered by the trial court in exercising its discretion [to set aside judgment under Ky. CR Rule 60.02] are whether the movant had a fair opportunity to present his claim at the trial on the merits and whether the granting of the relief sought would be inequitable to other parties." Fortney, p. 843. Fortney cites a case interpreting a similar provision under the Civil Code of Practice, Mason v. Lacy, 117 S.W.2d 1026 (Ky. 1938), which sets forth that "The casualty or misfortune that will authorize the vacating of a judgment must be 'unavoidable.' A mere casualty or misfortune is not sufficient. It must be such as could not by the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence have been avoided." Mason v. Lacy at 1029. Similarly, Workingmen's Perpetual Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Stephens, 184 S.W.2d 575 (Ky. 1944) held that a party seeking to set aside a judgment must have exercised reasonable foresight and diligence to avoid surprise and misfortune.

Presence of other factors. Obtaining relief based upon mistake, surprise, or excusable neglect is more likely to occur if elements of fraud are present. Childers v. Potter, 165 S.W.2d 3 (Ky. 1942) held that negligence of counsel "unaccompanied by disarming or misleading facts" will not be grounds for setting aside a judgment, citing McGuire v. Mishawaka Woolen Mills, 291 S.W. 741 (Ky. 1927) where it was alleged that "disarming" statements by opposing counsel caused the neglect resulting in default judgment (however, in this case, relief was denied). Also, if the opposing party will agree to set aside the judgment, Robertson v. City of Hazard, 401 S.W.2d 223 (Ky. 1966) has held that the court should do so.

Trial court discretion. U.S. Bank, quoting Schott v. Citizens Fidelity Bank and Trust Co., 692 S.W.2d 810, 814 (Ky. App. 1985), emphasizes that the decision to grant relief under Ky. CR Rule 60.02 "is generally left to the sound discretion of the trial court." U.S. Bank, p. 540. Numerous Kentucky cases affirming the trial court's ruling on a Ky. CR Rule 60.02 motion also mention deferring to the trial court's "sound discretion." Though in most of these cases the trial court declined to set aside the judgment, the same deference to the trial court's "broad discretion" has been in cases where relief was granted, as in Kurtsinger v. Board of Trustees of Kentucky Retirement Systems, 90 S.W.3d 454 (Ky. 2002); Webb v. Compton, 98 S.W.3d 513 (Ky. App. 2002); and Dull v. George, 982 S.W.2d 227 (Ky. App. 1998).

Practice Tips. Determine whether opposing counsel will agree to set aside the order or judgment on grounds of mistake, surprise or excusable neglect. If not, determine whether you can blame factors beyond your or your client's control, and show that a lack of diligence was not the cause. Emphasize the trial court's "broad discretion" to grant the relief requested. Emphasize, if applicable, that granting relief will not be inequitable to other parties (the second factor mentioned in Fortney). Ensure that your motion is filed within one year, per the requirements of Ky. CR Rule 60.02.

Cross-References. 1-51 Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 51.34 Motion to Set Aside Judgment or Order.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mike Wilson, J.D., University of Kentucky, has been a practicing attorney since 1980. He is a contributor to Caldwell's Kentucky Legal Forms, 5th Ed., Lexis-Nexis, 2006, teaches law to paralegals at Sullivan University, Lexington, Kentucky, and has prepared instructional material for numerous continuing legal education seminars for paralegals. He also is an administrative law judge for the Kentucky Department of Education.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

45 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ferstendig on Thomas v. Alleyne, 302 A.D.2d 36, 752 N.Y.S.2d 362 (2d Dept 2002)

2008 Emerging Issues 1392

Ferstendig on Thomas v. Alleyne, 302 A.D.2d 36, 752 N.Y.S.2d 362 (2d Dept 2002)

By David L. Ferstendig

December 7, 2007

SUMMARY: In Thomas v. Alleyne, the Second Department correctly recognized that in view of numerous technological advancements, particularly the internet, it is futile for plaintiffs counsel to try to conceal the experts identity in medical, dental and podiatric malpractice actions. CPLR 3101(d)(1)(i) provides, plaintiffs counsel should be permitted only to omit the name of the expert, while providing all of the other information required by the statute.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Omitting information other than the expert's identity in medical, dental or podiatric malpractice actions

In Thomas v. Alleyne, 302 A.D.2d 36, 752 N.Y.S.2d 362 (2d Dept 2002) the Second Department correctly recognized that in view of numerous technological advancements, particularly the internet, it is futile for plaintiff's counsel to try to conceal the expert's identity in medical, dental and podiatric malpractice actions. As CPLR § 3101(d)(1)(i) provides, plaintiff's counsel should be permitted only to omit the name of the expert, while providing all of the other information required by the statute. An even better and more realistic result would be for the Legislature to repeal the exception totally and make expert disclosure in all areas uniform.

Statute permits plaintiff to omit name of expert only. CPLR § 3101(d)(1)(i) provides that a party must, upon demand, disclose the identity and qualifications of his or her prospective expert witness in "reasonable detail". The statute goes on to create an exception applicable in medical, dental and podiatric malpractice cases, in that in such cases, the expert's name need not be disclosed. Reading the statute literally, however, there is no exception to the requirement that, upon demand, the qualifications of the parties' experts be set forth in "reasonable detail."

Nevertheless, arguments have been made as to whether a party can in fact omit reference to the expert's qualifications. These arguments are based on the proposition that with the expansion of computer technology, it is relatively easy for attorneys and their staff to determine the identity of an expert based on the qualifications provided. Courts have come down on both sides of this issue, and fashioned various remedies ranging from full disclosure of the expert's qualifications to the withholding of information that could lead to revealing the expert's identity.

The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Compared. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure allow the discovery of the names of adverse expert witnesses (and much more) in medical malpractice cases through depositions or interrogatories. Virtually every jurisdiction in the United States, except New York, conforms to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in this respect. Thus, New York's rule is at variance with the Federal Rules, by permitting parties in medical malpractice cases to conceal the identity of their expert witness. This somewhat anomalous rule adhered to by New York is contrary to the policy of encouraging full pre-trial disclosure. Rather than advancing the fundamental purpose of litigation, which is to ascertain the truth, it appears that New York's rule hinders litigation by giving a party statutory authority to limit what might be essential disclosure.

Policy underlying CPLR 3101(d)(1)(i). CPLR § 3101(d)(1)(i) was enacted in 1985 (L1985, ch 294, § 4) as part of a legislative package aimed at reform in medical malpractice litigation. The Legislature's enactment permits litigants in medical, dental or podiatric malpractice cases (but not litigants, for example, in cases based on accounting, legal or architectural malpractice) to omit the name of their proposed expert during disclosure, thus postponing revelation of the expert's identity until trial. The policy underlying the enactment was apparently based on a "concern that medical experts might be discouraged from testifying by their colleagues." Ryan v. Michelsen, 241 A.D.2d 434, 435, 660 N.Y.S.2d 435 (1st Dept 1997). It appears that the Legislature concluded that doctors as a class are somehow more aggressive than other professionals in applying pressure on their colleagues, who might also serve as an expert witness. Or, perhaps the Legislature believed that experts in medical malpractice cases are more sensitive to whatever pressures might be exerted on them by their colleagues.

The Jasopersaud decision. In Jasopersaud v. Tao Gyoun Rho, 169 A.D.2d 184, 572 N.Y.S.2d 700 (2d Dept 1991), the Appellate Division for the Second Department adopted a restrictive approach to expert disclosure. The defendants in that case were prohibited from obtaining disclosure to which they would otherwise have a statutory right, because the court found that such disclosure would have, or at least might have, led to revelation of the identity of the plaintiff's expert. Thus, the court determined that the defendants were entitled to disclosure limited to:

- (1) the expert's board certifications,
- (2) the jurisdictions in which the expert was licensed,
- (3) the medical school attended by the expert,
- (4) the expert's areas of expertise, and (5) the institutions in which the expert served in connection with any internship, residency or fellowship.

The court refused to require the revelation of (i) the "dates associated with the attainment of the foregoing qualifications," and (ii) the expert's present hospital affiliations.

In limiting the defendant's right to disclosure, the court recognized the balancing act required in determining such an issue.

[T]he Legislature could not have intended to undermine a party's statutory right to omit an expert's identity by authorizing excessively detailed demands for an expert's qualifications (citation omitted). Accordingly, in order to harmonize and effectuate the objectives sought to be achieved by the competing provisions of the statute, the desirability of broad disclosure must be balanced against the concern that the information requested will "effectively lead to the disclosure of the expert's identity" (Jones v Putnam Hosp. Center, 133 A.D.2d 447; Renucci v Mercy Hosp., 124 AD2d 796). Jasopersaud v. Tao Gyouun Rho, 169 A.D.2d at 188, 572 N.Y.S.2d at 703.

Modernizing the Jasopersaud decision. In Thomas v. Alleyne, 302 A.D.2d 36, 45-46, 752 N.Y.S.2d 362, 369-370 (2d Dept 2002), the plaintiff argued that the decision in Jasopersaud should be overruled to further limit disclosure of expert qualifications to essentially only the licensing state and board certifications. Given the developments in computer technology, particularly the internet, the plaintiff argued that an opposing party would be able to ascertain the identity of one's expert witness with relative ease based on a full and accurate statement of credentials.

The Appellate Division for the Second Department agreed with the plaintiff that their decision in Jasopersaud should be modified to reflect modern developments in technology.

However, the Thomas court came to a dramatically different conclusion in overruling its earlier decision:

The plaintiff argues that the law should recognize this technological change by further limiting defendants' right to the disclosure of background information relating to a medical malpractice plaintiff's expert's qualifications. We believe, instead, that this technological change points to the futility of attempting to conceal the identity of expert witnesses in medical malpractice cases, or in any other kind of case for that matter. Thomas v. Alleyne, 302 A.D.2d at 43, 752 N.Y.S.2d at 368.

The court held that to obtain relief under the statute, plaintiff must provide a factual showing of a concrete risk that a prospective expert medical witness would be subjected to intimidation or threats if the expert's name were revealed before trial. The Thomas court, in essence, shifted the burden to the plaintiff to establish that the expert will be "subjected to intimidation" if the expert's identity were revealed, before the court would consider limiting the disclosure of the expert's qualifications. 302 A.D.2d at 46, 752 N.Y.S.2d at 370.

Fourth Department disagrees. In Thompson v. Swiantek, 291 A.D.2d 884, 736

N.Y.S.2d 819 (4th Dep't 2002), the Fourth Department came to a diametrically opposed conclusion and carved out its own rule. The plaintiffs disclosed only that their expert was (i) a board certified urologist, (ii) licensed to practice both in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and (iii) a professor of urology in Pennsylvania. The court permitted the plaintiff to withhold information concerning the expert's medical school education, and the location of his or her internships, residences and fellowships, finding that: Because disclosure of that additional information would "effectively lead to disclosure of the expert's identity", the request for such disclosure is "palpably improper". 291 A.D.2d at 885, 736 N.Y.S.2d at 820.

The other departments have not ruled yet. The First and Third Departments have not ruled yet as to whether they will accept the Thomas, Thompson or some other approach to expert disclosure in medical, dental or podiatric malpractice actions. Moreover, the lower courts in these departments have shown no consistency in predicting how the appellate courts will rule. Compare e.g. Quinn v. St Peter's Hospital, 9 Misc.3d 1002 (A), 806 N.Y.S.2d 448, 2005 N.Y. Misc Lexis 1846 (Sup. Ct. Albany Co. 2005), Muniz v. Our Lady of Mercy Medical Center, 2003 N.Y. Misc Lexis 617, 2003 NY Slip. Op 50910U (Sup. Ct. Bx Co. 2003); Scher v. St Luke's Roosevelt Hospital, N.Y.L.J. 2/03/03, p. 18, col. 4 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2003) (adopting Thomas) and Hall v. Shah (Sup. Ct. Albany Co. Index No. 10897-02, 6/6/03); Hara v. Levin, 2003 N.Y. Misc Lexis 184, 2003 N.Y. Slip. Op. 50615U (Sup. Ct. Bx Co 2003) (limiting disclosure of qualifications).

Conclusion. The Second Department's burden-shifting approach in Thomas recognized that New York's rule of excluding an expert's name only in medical malpractice cases is futile, given recent technological advancements. The court correctly identified its decision in Jasopersaud as unduly restrictive and inconsistent with the terms of the governing statute, CPLR § 3101(d)(1)(i). Rather, the court held that a party in a medical malpractice case is presumptively entitled to a statement of the opposing party's expert's qualifications in "reasonable detail". A party can shield itself from disclosing qualifications, only if compliance with disclosure would lead to "unreasonable annoyance, expense, embarrassment, disadvantage or other prejudice." CPLR § 3103(a).

The author believes this is the more logical and reasonable approach. A practitioner is left with the clear conflict between the Second Department decision in Thomas and the Fourth Department decision in Thompson. Practitioners in those Departments must strictly follow the dictates of those decisions. Practitioners in the First and Third Departments are left to divine the intention of the Appellate Division in their Departments, not a very fruitful task in view of the lower courts' disagreement on this issue.

Clearly, some type of action is needed. A Court of Appeals pronouncement on the proper rule to apply would be helpful. Perhaps more useful would be the abolishment by the Legislature of the medical, dental and podiatric practice exception entirely. It is questionable whether the original rationale for the exception -- the possible harassment of potential experts -- still exists to any great measure. Indeed, [w]hile the capability of computer technology has expanded greatly, so has the willingness and availability of medical experts" to come forward and testify, which is clearly attested by the proliferation of medical, dental and podiatric cases, in the 12 years since Jasopersaud. Muniz v. Our Lady of Mercy Medical Center, 2003 N.Y. Misc Lexis 617 at 11 (Sup. Ct. Bx. Co. 2003). See also Esquelin v. Brooklyn Hospital Center -- Downtown Campus, 190

Misc.2d 753, 757, 739 N.Y.S.2d 230, 233 (Sup. Ct. Kings County 2002).

It should be noted that the locality rule -- which required a plaintiff in a medical malpractice action to seek an expert familiar with the local standard of care -- has been in steady decline for years. Under that system, an expert could conceivably be testifying against someone he or she actually worked with or with whom he or she were friends.

Now, with the decline of the locality rule, experts are more likely to come from jurisdictions far from the defendant's and thus are less likely to be testifying against "friends" or close colleagues.

Moreover, even under the Thomas rule, all that is being accomplished is deferring the revelation of the expert's identity until trial. See e.g., Schiffer v. Speaker, 6 Misc 3d 1010(A), 800 N.Y.S.2d 356, 2004 N.Y. Misc Lexis 2925 (Sup. Ct. NY Co. 2004) (court requires plaintiff "to make arrangements for this expert to return to court on a second day (plaintiff to abide the cost) so that defendants will have an opportunity, at the least, to properly research the expert and his/her writings".) And, since the expert's identity is revealed at trial, does that mean that the experts are presumed to testify only once in their lifetimes -- since they will be discouraged by their colleagues from testifying ever again? Would that not have resulted after all these years in a very limited supply of nonpressured medical experts, for which there appears to be no empirical evidence?

In sum, in an era where there have been continuous efforts on the federal level to increase the ease of disclosure, New York should follow their lead and make expert disclosure uniform. Even better, perhaps New York could pattern its expert disclosure after the federal model.

Cross References. Weinstein, Korn & Miller, New York Civil Practice: CPLR 3101; LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 6.25, Using Experts; § 2.12, Obtaining Disclosure of Medical, Dental or Podiatric Experts; § 21.03 Exchanging Expert Qualifications While Withholding Identity; Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 20.02, Scope of Disclosure.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David L. Ferstendig, currently a member of the Law Offices of David L. Ferstendig, LLC, New York, was a founding officer of the law firm Breindel & Ferstendig, P.C. He litigates a spectrum of civil and corporate matters, including: contract, products liability, environmental, toxic torts, reinsurance and insurance issues, and trade secrets. Mr. Ferstendig is also an adjunct law professor at New York Law School, where he teaches New York Practice. In addition to being a member of the Weinstein, Korn and Miller Editorial Board, he is the author of the LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation, the Editor of the CPLR Manual, a General Editor and author of CPLR Practice Insights in New York Consolidated Law Service, and an update author of Timetable for New York Civil Practice from LexisNexis. He is also the Chair of the Civil Practice Law and Rules Committee of the New York State Bar Association. Mr. Ferstendig has lectured on civil practice issues for bar associations, the New York State Judicial Institute, and LexisNexis.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

46 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Hudson v. YMCA of Metro. Chi. LLC

2008 Emerging Issues 1368

Hudson v. YMCA of Metro. Chi. LLC, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1196 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

December 6, 2007

SUMMARY: Does the purchase of liability insurance by an organization which is otherwise immune from liability for negligence waive its immunity to the extent of the liability insurance limits? Hudson v. YMCA of Metro. Chi. LLC, was a suit for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while performing community service at the YMCA in connection with a sentence entered on his plea of guilty to a criminal offense.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Immunity as a Fact of Legal Life. Illinois trial lawyers are aware that state statutes provide immunity from suit to governmental entities and public employees under a variety of circumstances. Even before the advent of the Tort Immunity Act, the doctrine of "charitable immunity" protected hospitals and other charitable institutions from tort liability, under the theory that subjecting such an entity's trust funds to the payment of damage awards would subvert the charitable or eleemosynary purpose for which those funds were designed to be used. Over time, an exception to the immunity doctrine was recognized where the organization had procured liability insurance. In such cases, the courts held that the insurance served the purpose of protecting the organization's trust funds and that the public policy favoring compensation of tort victims would be served by holding that the immunity was waived to the extent of the insurance coverage. Thus, the "waiver of immunity" rule was born. In the Hudson case, the court considers, in the context of a suit for negligence and willful and wanton conduct, whether the immunity provided by the Probation Community Service Act (730 ILCS 115/1(e)) is waived by the purchase of liability insurance.

Background. Hudson v. YMCA of Metro. Chi. LLC, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1196 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007) was a suit for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while performing community service at the YMCA in connection with a sentence entered on his plea of guilty to a criminal offense. The trial court entered summary judgment on the plaintiff's negligence claim, finding the YMCA immune from tort liability under Section 1(e) of the Probation Community Service Act. 730 ILCS 115/1. Plaintiff's motion to reconsider was denied and he appealed.

The Statute. Under Sec. 1 of 730 ILCS 115/1, certain not-for-profit organizations may agree to accept offenders to perform community service and to report to the court on the offender's progress. Under Sec. 3, the organization and its employees are not liable for injury to anyone performing community service at the site, except for willful or wanton misconduct or gross negligence.

Charitable Immunity is Buried, but is the Waiver Rule Alive? On appeal, plaintiff, drawing upon the common-law "charitable immunity" and case authority creating the "waiver of immunity" rule, contended that the YMCA's purchase of liability insurance amounted to a waiver of its statutory immunity, to the extent of the limits of the insurance. While the charitable immunity doctrine was overturned in Darling v. Charleston Community Memorial Hospital, 33 Ill. 2d 326, 211 N.E.2d 253 (1965), plaintiff argued that the "waiver of immunity" rationale survived; and that the purpose behind the waiver rule, i.e., compensating tort victims where the otherwise immune defendant was protected by liability insurance, should apply in interpreting Sec. 1 of the Probation Community Service Act (730 ILCS 115/1).

Close but No Cigar. The Appellate Court disagreed. It recognized that, in fashioning the "waiver of immunity" rule, the courts had held that charitable immunity was not absolute as long as the entity's trust funds were protected; that the purchase of liability insurance afforded such protection and at the same time provided compensation for tort victims for their injuries. However, the court determined that plaintiff's argument was overly simplistic. Turning to the Local Governmental and Governmental Employees Tort Immunity Act (745 ILCS 10/9-103), the court noted that the legislature had specifically provided that a local public entity may protect itself from liability by taking out insurance, but that the insurance company which provides coverage "shall utilize any immunities or may assert any defenses to which the insured public entity or its employees are entitled." 745 ILCS 10/9-103(c). While plaintiff contended that the absence of any such directive in the Probation Community Service Act amounted to legislative recognition of the waiver of immunity by the purchase of liability insurance, the court pointed out that the plain language of Section 1(e) makes no mention of any such legislative intent that the existence of liability insurance operates as a waiver of immunity to the extent of the insurance. Moreover, the court observed that the legislature recognized that there might be cases in which the immunity granted to a public entity might not protect it from liability; for example, where a willful and wanton misconduct exception exists. In such cases, the purchase of insurance would simply be prudent; and permitting a public entity to acquire insurance coverage does not in and of itself reflect a legislative recognition of waiver of immunity if such insurance were purchased. This is further demonstrated by the fact that the statute then directs the insurance company to assert any immunities and defenses to which the insured was entitled.

Statutory immunities are generally considered absolute unless the legislature provides language expressly limiting the scope of the immunity. Jost v. Bailey, 286 Ill. App. 3d 872, 878-79, 676 NE 2d 1033, 1037 (1997). The only exception contained in Sec. 1(e) is for willful and wanton misconduct or gross negligence. 730 ILCS 115/1(e). The legislature's awareness of the "waiver" rule is evidenced by the fact that until November 25, 1986 Section 9-103(c) of the Tort Immunity Act required that every liability insurance policy must provide that the company issuing the policy waived any right to refuse payment or to deny liability by reason of the non-liability of the insured public entity for wrongful or negligent acts and its immunity from suit by reason of the defenses and immunities provided in the Act. Effective November 25, 1986, the statute was amended to eliminate the requirement that an insurer waive any such defense of immunity of its insured, and to specifically direct insurers to claim such immunities. The amendment reflected a clear legislative direction that insurance coverage makes no difference with respect to the extent of a public entity's immunity.

Turning to the statute in question, the court stated that Section 1(e) of the Probation Community Service Act contains no provision allowing a public or charitable entity to purchase insurance to protect itself from tort liability. Thus, there exists no implied waiver of immunity by the purchase of insurance and there was no need for the legislature to clarify that an insurer may assert its insured's immunities, notwithstanding the existence of insurance. Had the legislature intended that the waiver of immunity doctrine should apply to Section 1, it could have said so expressly or, as it had done with respect to Section 9-103(c) of the Tort Immunity Act, could have provided that the entity could acquire liability insurance without including the instruction that an insurer may claim its insured's immunities. This it did not do, and, accordingly, the YMCA did not waive its statutory immunity to the extent of its coverage.

Tips for Practitioners: It is important to recognize that, while statutes are often construed in pari materia, that rule has its limitations. Here, for example, plaintiff's attempt to link the insurance provisions of Section 9-103(c) of the Tort Immunity Act to Section 1(e) of the Probation Community Service Act was unavailing. The Acts deal with different subjects and different considerations. The Probation Community Service Act supplements the Code of Criminal Corrections by providing offenders with the opportunity to escape confinement while at the same time allowing community organizations to realize the benefit of free labor in return for protection against liability for negligent acts. The Tort Immunity Act, on the other hand, is concerned with liability for acts or omissions of public entities and their employees in the discharge of certain governmental functions. Recognition of the nature and purpose of the statute involved may serve to clarify its application.

Cross References. See Appleman on Insurance § 140.5; Appleman on Insurance § 128.14.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

47 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Professor Robert Aronson on State v Foxhoven

2008 Emerging Issues 1366

Professor Robert Aronson on State v Foxhoven

By Robert Aronson

December 5, 2007

SUMMARY: The Washington Supreme Courts standards for a trial court to determine whether to admit such prior acts given ER 404(b) does not provide any tests or procedures for admitting such evidence. The Court holds that while the trial court and Court of Appeals erred in holding that prior graffiti evidence of tagging was admissible as part of a common plan or scheme, the evidence was admissible to show a particular modus operandi or signature.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Signature (Modus Operandi) and Common Plan or Scheme Bases for Admissibility of Character Evidence

Background. In State v. Foxhoven, 160 Wn.2d 910, 163 P.3d 786 (2007), the defendants Michael Foxhoven and Anthony Sanderson were convicted of malicious mischief for etching graffiti on the windows of several businesses. The graffiti included tags moniker[s] or pseudonym[s] used by a graffiti artist in his or her graffiti. A tag is placed on public or private property to identify the person responsible for the graffiti (the tagger) [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 172 n.1]. The trial judge admitted evidence that the defendant and Sanderson had used the tags on previous occasions, including: Foxhovens criminal history of graffiti from California and photographs seized from his home showing the SERIES tag; and Sandersons prior arrests for graffiti, drawings of the HYMN tag seized from his home, and photos of him painting the HYMN tag. The trial judge admitted the other acts of graffiti vandalism to show a common scheme or plan or to establish a particular modus operandi.

Court Establishes Standards For Admission. Although ER 404(b) lists purposes, other than to show conformity, that warrant admission of prior acts of misconduct, it does not provide any tests or procedures for admitting such evidence. The Washington Supreme court has, however, established the standards a trial court should use in determining whether to admit such prior acts [see The Law of Evidence in Washington § 404.04[2][c]].

(1) Standards of Proof and Standards of Review. In deciding whether to admit other act evidence under ER 404(b), the trial court must: (1) find by a preponderance that the prior act occurred; (2) identify the purpose for which the evidence is sought to be introduced; (3) determine whether the evidence is relevant to prove an element of the crime charged; and (4) weigh the probative value against the prejudicial effect [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 175, quoting State v. Thang, 145 Wn.2d 630, 642, 41 P.3d 1159 (2002)]. The court must do the balancing on the record [State v. Saltarelli, 98 Wn.2d 358, 655 P.2d 697 (1982)], and find that the relevancy of the evidence outweighs the prejudicial effect [State v. DeVries, 149 Wn.2d 842, 72 P.3d 748, 751 (2003)]. Finally, due to the strong tendency of the jury to use prior acts of misconduct for the improper purpose of showing action in conformity on the present occasion, the trial court must instruct the jury as to the limited purpose for which the jury may consider the evidence [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 175, citing State v. Lough, 125 Wn.2d 847, 864, 889 P.2d 487 (1995); see Saltarelli, 98 Wn.2d at 366].

Finally, it should be noted that any prior acts introduced to show it is more likely the defendant committed the presently charged crime must be analyzed under ER 404(b). In Foxhoven, the Court rejects the States contention that since the drawings and tags do not show criminal conduct or bad acts, they are outside the scope of ER 404(b). Rather, the rule encompasses not only prior bad acts and unpopular behavior but any evidence offered to show the character of a person to prove the person acted in conformity with that character at the time of a crime [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 175, citing State v. Everybodytalksabout, 145 Wn.2d 456, 466, 39 P.3d 294 (2002)].

As the Court notes in Foxhoven, interpretation of an evidentiary rule is a question of law, which is reviewed de novo [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 175, citing State v. DeVincentsis, 150 Wn.2d 11, 17, 74 P.3d 119 (2003)]. Once the trial court has correctly interpreted ER 404(b), however, its decision to admit the evidence of other acts is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Discretion is abused if it is exercised on untenable grounds or for untenable reasons [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 174, quoting Thang, 145 Wn.2d at 642]. Failure to adhere to the requirements of an evidentiary rule can be considered an abuse of discretion [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 174, citing Sate v. Neal, 144 Wn.2d 600, 609, 30 P.3d 1255 (2001)].

(2) Common Plan or Scheme. Evidence of prior acts to show a common plan or scheme has been admitted for three discrete purposes: First, to hear the whole story or get the entire picture surrounding the charged crime--activities such as stealing the getaway car, assaulting a customer outside the bank, or raping another victim, in the same vicinity, near the time of the charged crime, all fall within this category, sometimes referred to as res gestae [see The Law of Evidence in Washington § 404.04[2][d][v]]. Second, to show a causal connection between the offenses, so that proof of the other offense[s] could be said to evidence a pre-existing design, system, plan, or scheme directed toward the doing of the very act charged [State v. Goebel, 40 Wn.2d 18, 21, 240 P.2d 251 (1952); State v. Bennett, 36 Wash. App. 176, 672 P.2d 772 (1983) (statutory rape case, testimony of two similar incidents with defendant admissible to show common plan to entice teens to his home and trade food and shelter for sex)]. Third, to show markedly similar acts of misconduct against similar victims under similar circumstances [Lough, 889 P.2d at 492], or when an individual devises a plan and uses it to repeatedly perpetrate separate but very similar crimes [Lough, 889 P.2d at 491; see State v. Devincentis, 150 Wn.2d 11, 74 P.3d 119 (2003)].

The Foxhoven Court holds that the evidence relating to prior tagging by the defendant is not admissible under the common plan or scheme exception. Noting that the exception is generally employed when the occurrence of the crime or the intent of the defendant is at issue, it requires a slightly lower level of similarity inconsistent with that required to show identity [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 179]. In Foxhoven, there was no dispute that the buildings were vandalized with graffiti or that whoever did it intended to paint the graffiti. Therefore, since the evidence of the defendants prior graffiti was not sufficiently similar to the currently charged crime to show identity, the trial court abused its discretion in admitting the evidence as part of a common plan or scheme, and the Court of Appeals erred in affirming that decision. However, as discussed below, the Court holds that the evidence was admissible under the signature or modus operandi exception, so the error was harmless [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 179].

(3) Signature (Modus Operandi). As the Court states [Foxhoven, 161 Wn.2d at 176]:

When evidence of other bad acts is introduced to show identity by establishing a unique modus operandi, the evidence is relevant to the current charge only if the method employed in the commission of both crimes is so unique that proof that an accused committed one of the crimes creates a high probability that he also committed the other crimes with which he is charged.

[quoting Thang, 145 Wn.2d at 643, see also State v. Coe, 101 Wn.2d 772, 777, 684 P.2d 668, 672 (1984) (The device used must be so unusual and distinctive as to be like a signature, quoting E. Cleary, McCormick on Evidence § 190, at 449 (2d ed. 1972))]. The defendant in Foxhoven contended that the prior tagging was too dissimilar from the vandalism in the present charge (different mediums, on a wide variety of buildings, vehicles and papers, using varied styles and fonts) to constitute a modus operandi. However, based on extensive evidence introduced at trial, the Court holds that the tags in this case were signatures. Therefore, the identity of surrounding circumstances essential to show modus operandi in the usual case is not necessary where, as here, a tag is a persons identity [Foxhoven, 163 P.3d at 178-179].

Several police officers testified that taggers do not take on another taggers identity by stealing or biting their tag. In fact, Sanderson himself told one officer, You dont do that. People will throw down with you if that happens [Foxhoven, 163 P.3d at 178]. The few circumstances in which a tagger may practice with anothers tag did not exist in the present case. Thus, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence under ER 404(b). Where a signature is provided, the signature alone is sufficiently distinctive to be admissible under the modus operandi exception to ER 404(b) [Foxhoven, 163 P.3d at 179].

Finally, as indicated, the Court found the probative value of the prior tagging evidence to be high. With respect to the mandatory balancing of prejudicial effect, the prior tagging did not involve violent crimes, sexual misconduct, drug use, or other emotionally inflammatory conduct. Thus, the probative value did outweigh the prejudicial effect.

Practical Import: The lesson for practitioners is that the list of exceptions to the inadmissibility of prior acts in ER 404(b) is not exclusive -- any basis for admissibility that does not require the impermissible conformity inference may cause the trial court to admit the evidence.

For further analysis of the issues in Foxhoven, see The Law of Evidence in Washington § 404.04[2][a]--[d] (Other Acts Admissible for Purposes Other Than to Show Conformity) (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Robert Aronson joined the University of Washington School of Law faculty in 1975. Prior to coming to UW, he was a Teaching Fellow at Stanford Law School, and taught Civil Procedure at the University of San Diego Law School while clerking for Judge James Carter of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. He is a nationally recognized expert in professional responsibility and his book, The Law of Evidence in Washington, is one of the leading treatises on the subject. He has served as Chair of The Association of American Law Schools (AALS) Section on Professional Responsibility, National Conference of Bar Examiners MPRE Drafting Committee, Commissioner on Uniform State Laws, Washington Legislative Ethics Board, AALS Committee on Bar Admission and Lawyer Performance, Law School Admission Council, Finance and Legal Affairs Committee, President of the Board of the Washington Appellate Defender Association, Reporter for the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers Standards of Conduct, and Hearing Tribunal Member for the Washington Human Rights Commission.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

48 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Scott v. Commonwealth

2008 Emerging Issues 1341

Sinclair and Harrison on Scott v. Commonwealth, 274 Va. 636, 651 S.E.2d 630, 2007 Va. LEXIS 132 (2007)

By Prof. Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

December 5, 2007

SUMMARY: It has long been established in VA that evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts," while not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he or she acted in conformity therewith, may be admissible for purposes of proving "motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident."

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Character Proof: Differences and Similarities Between Common Scheme and Common Plan Evidence in Virginia

It has long been established in Virginia that evidence of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts," while not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he or she acted in conformity therewith, may be admissible for purposes of proving "motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident." In criminal cases, Virginia has followed the rule that evidence of other crimes is admissible when it tends to establish a common plan, design, or scheme embracing a series of crimes including the current offense. In Scott v. Commonwealth, 274 Va. 636, 651 S.E.2d 630 (2007), in the context of an appeal from a trial court ruling granting a motion to join multiple criminal charges for trial, the Supreme Court of Virginia clarified how it may be established that evidence of a series of other crimes, wrongs or acts constitutes either a "common plan" or a "common scheme" sufficient to permit joinder of multiple charges for trial.

In this decision the Court also provides guidance as to how such evidence may be used for the other proper purposes for which character proof may be admissible under Virginia evidence law. Thus, the decision has important implications for evidence in civil cases as well as criminal cases.

Background. In Scott, the defendant was indicted for 27 offenses based on incidents that occurred between February and June of a particular year in a large metropolitan area of Virginia. The charges included nine counts of robbery and 18 other related charges, including three counts of burglary, one count of abduction with the intent to extort money, one count of attempted extortion, one count of attempted carjacking, and 12 counts of use of a firearm in the commission of these offenses. The Commonwealth filed a pretrial motion requesting that the trial court join the charges for a single trial, arguing that the robberies were part of a "common scheme or plan" and, therefore, could be tried together under the provisions of Rules 3A:6(b) and 3A:10(c) of the Rules of the Supreme Court of Virginia. After oral argument, the circuit court granted the motion over defense objections. The circuit court found that several of the Commonwealth's witnesses might be required to testify regarding the identity of the perpetrator in the different offenses, and that there were substantial similarities among the offenses that constituted a "modus operandi." At trial, various victims testified to the details of the crimes committed against them, including the various contexts, times and manners in which they were accosted, robbed, assaulted, asported and otherwise victimized.

The jury convicted defendant of seven counts of robbery, three counts of burglary, one count of abduction with the intent to extort money, one count of attempted extortion, and nine related counts of use of a firearm in the commission of a felony. He was acquitted of two robbery counts and related firearm charges, and acquitted of attempted carjacking and use of a firearm with another victim. The circuit court sentenced him to a total of 253 years' imprisonment, in accordance with the jury verdict.

The Court of Appeals held that it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to have granted the Commonwealth's motion for a single trial of all the charged offenses because the nine robberies had "strikingly similar" characteristics and it was reasonable to conclude that the offenses were part of a "common scheme," within the meaning of Rule 3A:6(b). The Court of Appeals also held that the circuit court properly exercised its discretion in concluding that justice did not require separate trials under Rule 3A:10(c), because evidence of the other crimes would have been admissible in each individual trial to establish the identity of the criminal agent. The defendant appealed, arguing that "the Commonwealth failed to establish that the [offenses] shared unusual characteristics, were linked to one another, were committed within a limited geographic area, or were committed to meet a single goal."

General Principles Underlying the Supreme Court of Virginia's Analysis. The Supreme Court of Virginia analyzed the issue of whether the series of other crimes alleged to have been committed by the defendant constituted either a "common plan" or a "common scheme" sufficient to permit joinder under the provisions of Rules 3A:6(b) and 3A:10(c) by stating the following principles of Virginia evidence law:

. Other similar acts evidence is admissible to establish the identity of the perpetrator. Relying on its prior opinions in Scates v. Commonwealth, 262 Va. 757, 762, 553 S.E.2d 756, 759 (2001) and McWhorter v. Commonwealth, 191 Va. 857, 870-71, 63 S.E.2d 20, 26 (1951), the Court explained that "evidence of similar offenses is admissible to prove a 'common scheme, design, or plan,' for purposes of establishing a defendant's identity, when those offenses exhibit 'such a concurrence of common features that the various acts are naturally to be explained as caused by a general plan of which they are the individual manifestations.'" In addition, the Court explained that, based on its prior opinions in Turner v. Commonwealth, 259 Va. 645, 651, 529 S.E.2d 787, 791 (2000); Chichester v. Commonwealth, 248 Va. 311, 326-27, 448 S.E.2d 638, 649 (1994); and Spencer v. Commonwealth, 240 Va. 78, 89-90, 393 S.E.2d 609, 616-17 (1990), evidence of other crimes "is admissible in cases of disputed identity to prove the probability of a common perpetrator, provided that the other crimes bear a 'singular strong resemblance to the pattern of the offense charged' and are 'sufficiently idiosyncratic to permit an inference of pattern for purposes of proof.'"

. "Common scheme" and "Common plan" are not synonymous concepts. Relying on its prior opinions in Johnson v. Commonwealth, 259 Va. 654, 676-78, 529 S.E.2d 769, 782-83 (2000); Turner, 259 Va. at 651-53, 529 S.E.2d at 790-92; and Spencer, 240 Va. at 81, 87-91, 393 S.E.2d at 611, 615-17, the Court distinguished the concepts of "common scheme" and "common plan" with respect to other crimes, wrongs, or acts evidence, finding that "'common scheme' describes crimes that share features idiosyncratic in character, which permit an inference that each individual offense was committed by the same person or persons as part of a pattern of criminal activity involving certain identified crimes." In contrast, the Court, relying on its prior opinions in Powell v. Commonwealth, 267 Va. 107, 118, 140-41, 590 S.E.2d 537, 544, 557-58 (2004) and Collins v. Commonwealth, 226 Va. 223, 228-32, 307 S.E.2d 884, 888-90 (1983), found that "'common plan' describes crimes that are related to one another for the purpose of accomplishing a particular goal."

. "Common scheme" and "Common plan" are not mutually exclusive concepts. Relying on its prior opinion in Satcherv. Commonwealth, 244 Va. 220, 229-30, 421 S.E.2d 821, 827, the Court concluded that "a series of crimes may exhibit both a 'common scheme' and a 'common plan.'"

Key Issue #1: Did the series of crimes establish a "common scheme"? After reviewing the record, the Court determined that the series of acts did not establish a "common scheme." Instead, the Court found that "[t]he Commonwealth proved only that during a period of about four months in the same large city, various individuals who were alone outside their homes were robbed during the late evening hours, and that the robber displayed a gun, usually threatening the victims with harm or actually striking them, and demanded from the victims money, credit cards and, in some cases, their PINs." According to the Court, "[t]his evidence demonstrated only a general similarity of manner in which the crimes were committed and failed to establish that the crimes shared idiosyncratic features permitting an inference of a pattern of criminal activity committed by the same person." As a result, the Court concluded that "[t]he absence of idiosyncratic features in the present record leaves a record showing only separate crimes of the same type that share features that are likely similar to numerous other robbery offenses."

In reaching this conclusion, the Court was quick to make several observations concerning information that did and did not appear in the record. First, the Court observed that "[t]he fact that the robber in five of the . . . offenses demanded a PIN for the stolen credit cards was not an idiosyncratic feature, because it is common knowledge in our consumer society that such a number must be provided before making a cash withdrawal." Continuing, the court noted that the record "does not indicate the relative location of each robbery to the other robberies committed," and that, as a result, it "fails to show that the robberies were committed in any particular neighborhood or area of th[e] city."

In its decision, the Court further noted that the record "fails to show that a weapon of the same description was used in the commission of the crimes, that the robber made unusual threatening remarks, or that the robber chose victims only of a certain gender or age group." The Court then emphasized that it "cite[d] these various factors, not as requirements of a 'common scheme,' but merely to illustrate that the possible range of idiosyncratic features that may establish a 'common scheme' is very broad, and that no such idiosyncratic features were common incidents of all the . . . offenses [at issue]."

Key Issue #2: Did the series of crimes establish a "common plan"? Likewise, after reviewing the record, the Court determined that the series of acts did not establish a "common plan." Referring to the assessment of the record that it had undertaken in an effort to determine whether a "common scheme" had been established, the Court found that "the evidence showed only the commission of nine robberies and other related offenses bearing a general similarity to one another." The Court also found that "the evidence completely lacked any proof that the offenses were related to one another for the purpose of accomplishing a particular goal."

Importance of Ruling. Character evidence is one of the most frequently used types of evidence. In Scott, the Court provides an important clarification and delineation of closely-related character evidence concepts that had previously seemed duplicative, while at the same time expressly acknowledging that the concepts can overlap. Thanks to the pronouncements made in Scott, practitioners will know that, with respect to "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" evidence, a "common scheme" describes acts that share features idiosyncratic in character, so as to permit an inference that each individual act was committed by the same person or persons as part of a pattern, while a "common plan" describes acts that are related to one another for the purpose of accomplishing a particular goal.

Practitioners can also rely on the explicit conclusion made in Scott that a series of acts may exhibit both a "common scheme" and a "common plan," and know what kinds of facts and commonalities they should endeavor to establish in order to prove the existence of either or both. As a result, Scott not only clarifies the requirements necessary for use of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" evidence to establish and/or resolve identity issues; it also helps to clarify the requirements necessary for the use of such evidence for any of the other proper purposes previously recognized under Virginia evidence law respecting character proof, specifically, the establishment of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, or absence of mistake or accident.

Virginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

Regarding character proof and the use of "other crimes, wrongs, or acts" evidence, see Kent Sinclair, et al., Virginia Evidentiary Foundations, Chapter 6: Handling Character, Habit, and Prior Circumstances Proof (2002); Charles E. Friend, The Law Of Evidence In Virginia, Chapter 5: Character Evidence (6th ed. 2003).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Mr. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and looseleaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management, and is the author of multiple law review articles on subjects including criminal appellate procedure, constitutional law, crime victim's rights legislation, and environmental law. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

49 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bochet on Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 1357

Bochet on Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc., 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 350 (App. Div. 2007)

By William C. Bochet

December 5, 2007

SUMMARY: In Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel Inc., the Appellate Division issued a strong opinion condemning the lower court practice of certifying certain interlocutory orders as final to avoid the need for leave to appeal an interlocutory order. Both the pervasiveness of this abuse of N.J. Ct. R. 4:42-2 and the lack of clarity in the rule itself make it unlikely that this practice will cease any time soon, despite the sharp rebuke by the Appellate Division.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Appellate Division Condemns Improper Finality Certifications; An appeal as of Right May be Taken to the New Jersey Appellate Division Only from a Final Judgment

Aside perhaps from using plastic sheet covers on briefs and appendices, one of the most certain ways to rouse the ire of appellate judges is to bypass their prerogative to select which cases should be subject to interlocutory review. Appeals to the Appellate Division as of right come only after the entry of final judgment. In the interim, an order granting an interlocutory appeal must be obtained. Such orders are granted "only sparingly". See State v. Reldan, 100 N.J. 187, 205, 495 A.2d 76 (1985), quoting In re Pennsylvania R.R., 20 N.J. 398, 404, 120 A.2d 94 (1956).

In Janicky v. Point Bay Fuel, Inc., 2007 N.J. Super. LEXIS 350 (App. Div. 2007), the bypass efforts of counsel and the court below are excoriated by what is more a polemic than a legal opinion. The villainy below was the misuse of N.J. Ct. R. 4:42-2, which allows for certification of an order as final in very limited circumstances. The frustration of the appellate panel is palpable within the opinion which concludes with dismissal of the "appeal".

Doing It Wrong. Appellate Division Presiding Judge Stephen Skillman filled the opinion with a litany of prior published instances of abuse of N.J. Ct. R. 4:42-2 to avoid the need for leave to appeal an interlocutory order. In each of these instances, the trial judge certified as "final" orders which were, in fact, interlocutory. Counsel then proceeded to appeal as of right [N.J. Ct. R. 2:2-3(a)(1)]. The cases cited by Judge Skillman reflect a variety of errant instances:

Leonardis v. Bunnel, 164 N.J. Super. 338, 396 A.2d 357 (App. Div. 1978), certif. denied, 81 N.J. 265 (1979) -- certification of partial summary judgment.

Delbridge v. Jann Holding Co., 164 N.J. Super. 506, 397 A.2d 356 (App. Div. 1978) -- certification where damages and dispossession claims were still open.

Di Marino v. Wishkin, 195 N.J. Super. 390, 479 A.2d 444 (App. Div. 1984) -- certification of judgment on a third party complaint when primary claims remained.

Taylor v. Gen. Elec. Co., 208 N.J. Super. 207, 505 A.2d 190 (App. Div. 1986) certif. denied, 104 N.J. 379 (1986) -- order for summary judgment as to two parties certified, although the motion as to a third party was denied.

Jacob v. Norris, Mc Laughlin & Marcus, 247 N.J. Super. 266, 588 A.2d 1297 (App. Div. 1991) -- summary judgment order for only one count of the complaint certified as final.

Kurzman v. Appicie, 273 N.J. Super. 189, 641 A.2d 566 (App. Div. 1994) -- certification of summary judgment order for two of three counts of the complaint.

Cobo v. Market Transition Facility, 293 N.J. Super. 374, 680 A.2d 1103 (App. Div. 1996) -- judgment on bifurcated issue certified.

Bloom v. Clara Maas Med. Ctr., 295 N.J. Super. 594, 685 A.2d 966 (App. Div. 1996) -- partial summary judgment certified before entry of final judgment.

Hallowell v. Am. Honda Motor Co., 297 N.J. Super. 314, 688 A.2d 110 (App. Div. 1996) -- summary judgment order in favor of two defendants certified, although multiple defendants remained in the case.

Fu v. Fu, 309 N.J. Super. 435, 707 A.2d 473 (App. Div. 1998), rev'd on other grounds, 160 N.J. 108 (1999) -- order directing that the case proceed under foreign law certified as final.

S.N. Golden Estates, Inc., v. Continental Cas. Co., 317 N.J. Super. 82, 721 A.2d 307 (App. Div. 1998) -- certification of an order awarding partial counsel fee.

D'Oliviera v. Micol, 321 N.J. Super. 637, 729 A.2d 1084 (App. Div. 1999) -- order granting a motion for new trial certified as final.

Tradesoft Tech. v. Franklin Mut. Ins. Co., 329 N.J. Super. 137, 746 A.2d 1078 (App. Div. 2000) -- certified order for judgment as to two of seven counts of the complaint.

Caggiano v. Fontoura, 354 N.J. Super. 111, 804 A.2d 1193 (App. Div. 2002) -- certified summary judgment order on two counts where a third remained pending.

Interestingly, in all but four of the cited cases, the Appellate Division decided the issue on appeal despite the improper certification.

Doing It Right. An order is interlocutory unless it disposes of "...all claims against all parties." S.N. Golden Estates, Inc., v. Continental Cas. Co., 317 N.J. Super. 82, 87, 721 A.2d 307 (App. Div. 1998). In the absence of such finality, an appeal of an order can only be obtained by seeking permission for the same through a motion for an interlocutory appeal (N.J. Ct. R. 2:5-6). This must be made within 20 days of service of the order in question. After that time, it is necessary to move for an extension or for leave to appeal nunc pro tunc [N.J. Ct. R. 2:4-4(b)]. Relief under that rule is a long shot, particularly if there is no compelling reason why a motion for leave to file an interlocutory appeal was not sought.

An exception to these rules is the certification procedure set forth in N.J. Ct. R. 4:42-2. That rule allows the trial court to certify a judgment as final if the "...order would be subject to process to enforce a judgment..." and it comes within one of three prerequisite categories. Relief under that rule is primarily sought to permit an appeal where the trial court refuses to stay execution under N.J. Ct. R. 2:9-5. The purpose of the rule is to allow for appellate review under circumstances where assets may be seized to satisfy the interlocutory judgment. It is not the objective of the rule to permit trial judges to bypass the prerogatives of the Appellate Division to decide what should be heard by that court on an interlocutory basis. Put simply, the rule can be used in certain circumstances where execution may result in assets changing hands.

Can the Court's Goal Be Reached? Judge Skillman provides a list of cases of wrongful use of the "certification" rule over a period of 30 years. The obvious frustration of the appellate court is compounded by the fact that judges of the lower courts are necessary participants in the process. Dismissal of the appeal and even sanctions may send a partial message to counsel, but that occurs after the appellate panel has done its work. Clearly, counsel and trial judges are confused by the rule. The "recurrent problem" cited by Judge Skillman will continue, but not because the bar and bench are miscreants deliberately sneaking cases into the Appellate Division. N.J. Ct. R. 4:42-2 with its 100 word sentence should be changed and, more importantly, made comprehensible.

Cross-references: See Robert B. Hille and Mark R. Vespoli LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice §§ 5.02 and 5.04.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

50 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Little v. Cook

2008 Emerging Issues 1346

Sinclair and Harrison on Little v. Cook, 274 Va. 697, 652 S.E.2d 129, 2007 Va. LEXIS 136 (2007)

By Prof. Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

December 5, 2007

SUMMARY: In Little v. Cook, a decision that will doubtless be of interest to real estate and other investment-based partnerships in the Commonwealth, the Supreme Court of VA was called upon to determine the kinds of damages that could be awarded to a limited partnership via a derivative suit brought by a group of its limited partners. In Little, the Court addressed several significant issues.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Partnership Derivative Suits: The Scope of Recoverable Damages and Attorneys Fees and Costs in Virginia

In Little v. Cook, 274 Va. 697, 652 S.E.2d 129 (2007), a decision that will doubtless be of interest to real estate and other investment-based partnerships in the Commonwealth, the Supreme Court of Virginia was called upon to determine the kinds of damages that could be awarded to a limited partnership via a derivative suit brought by a group of its limited partners. In Little, the Court addressed several significant issues, including whether income tax consequences arising from the sale of the partnership's sole asset and flowing through to the limited partners could be recovered by the partnership as damages, and whether damages allegedly arising from the "hurried sale" of that asset for a below-market price, were properly awarded to the partnership. The Court also construed the "common fund" exception to the American Rule generally prohibiting the assessment of attorneys fees and costs of suit against unsuccessful litigants to determine whether and to what extent the limited partners were entitled to recover the fees and costs incurred in pursuing the derivative suit under Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.65.

Background. In connection with the sale of an apartment complex that was the sole asset of a limited partnership, a group of the limited partners, representing two-thirds of the ownership interest, filed a derivative suit on behalf of the partnership pursuant to Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.62 and sought monetary damages against its general partner and an attorney, both individually and as trustee for the general partner. The limited partners asserted, among other things, counts for breach of fiduciary duty and legal malpractice. After a bench trial, the circuit court held that the attorney defendant breached not only the standard of care applicable to attorneys in his role as the attorney for the partnership and its general partner but also his fiduciary duties while performing the tasks and responsibilities of the partnership's general partner. It awarded, among other things, over $3 million in damages to the partnership, principally comprised of what the circuit court referred to as "tax damages." The circuit court also awarded attorneys' fees and costs to the limited partners individually, which were to be "added on" to the total amount of damages otherwise awarded.

The attorney and the general partner appealed, asserting five assignments of error, and the limited partners cross-appealed. In the first assignment of error, the defendants challenged the award of "tax damages" asserting, among other arguments, that "tax damages" are not damages to the partnership and thus are not recoverable in a derivative action. In the remaining assignments of error, the defendants contested, among other things, the award of attorneys' fees to the limited partners individually in addition to the other damages awarded rather than an award of attorneys' fees from the "common fund" recovered for the partnership. The plaintiffs' assignments of cross-error asserted that the circuit court erred either by refusing to award an additional $2,050,000 in damages against the defendants arising from the sale of the apartment complex based on valuations made on the closing date of the sale and on a date shortly before trial, or by failing to award at least a sum representing the difference between the appraised market value of the complex and the sale price on the date of sale.

General Principles. The Court in Little analyzed the damages and "common fund" exception issues by stating the following well-settled principles of Virginia law regarding derivative actions, the recovery of damages, and the recovery of attorneys fees and costs by the prevailing party:

- Nature of derivative actions. Citing Simmons v. Miller, 261 Va. 561, 573, 544 S.E.2d 666, 674 (2001) and Bernstein v. Levenson, 437 F.2d 756, 757 (4th Cir. 1971), the Court explained that "[a] derivative action is an equitable proceeding in which a shareholder asserts, on behalf of the corporation, a claim that belongs to the corporation rather than the shareholder." Within the context of limited partnerships, the Court, quoting Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.62, explained that a limited partner could "bring an action in the right of a limited partnership to recover a judgment in its favor to the same extent that a stockholder may bring an action for a derivative suit under the [Virginia] Stock Corporation Act [(Va. Code Ann. § 13.1-601 et seq.)]."

- Recovery of damages in derivative actions. The Court, quoting Michaud v. Morris, 603 So. 2d 886, 887 (Ala. 1992) and citing 13 William Mead Fletcher et al., Fletcher Cyclopedic of the Law of Private Corporations §§ 6028 and 6038 (perm ed., rev. vol. 2004), explained that generally, in the context of a corporate derivative suit, "the corporation must have suffered an actual injury for there to be grounds for a shareholder's derivative suit," and that "the only damages recoverable in a derivative suit are those related to the loss or damage proximately caused by the wrong committed."

The Court then observed that its prior decisions in Mount v. Radford Trust Co., 93 Va. 427, 431, 25 S.E. 244, 245 (1896) and Brown v. Bedford City Land & Improvement Co., 91 Va. 31, 37, 20 S.E. 968, 970 (1895), were consistent with these principles. Citing Strain v. Seven Hills Assocs., 75 A.D.2d 360, 371, 429 N.Y.S.2d 424, 432 (N.Y. App. Div. 1980), the Court also observed that these same principles "apply in the context of a derivative suit filed on behalf of a limited partnership," and expressly held that, as a matter of Virginia law, the claim asserted in such a suit "belongs to the limited partnership, not to the limited partners, and the limited partnership itself must have sustained injury." The Court further held that, with respect to damages that may be recovered in a derivative suit filed on behalf of a limited partnership, "any recovery belongs to the limited partnership."

- Income tax liability of limited partnerships and partners. Citing and quoting section 701 of the Internal Revenue Code (26 U.S.C. § 701), and relying upon Bufferd v. Commissioner, 506 U.S. 523, 525 (1993) and Littriello v. United States, 484 F.3d 372, 375 (6th Cir. 2007), the Court observed that the Code expressly provides that partnerships, as such, are not be subject to the income tax imposed by chapter 1 of Subtitle A of the Code, pertaining to "Normal Taxes and Surtaxes." The Court further observed that section 701 of the Internal Revenue Code also provides that "[p]ersons carrying on business as partners shall be liable for income tax only in their separate or individual capacities."

■ Recovery of attorneys' fees and costs in a successful derivative suit. Quoting Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.65, the Court explained that Virginia law regarding the recovery of attorney's fees and costs incurred in connection with derivative suits provides, inter alia, that "[i]f a derivative action is successful, in whole or in part, or if anything is received by the plaintiff as a result of a judgment, compromise or settlement of an action or claim, except as hereinafter provided, the court may award the plaintiff reasonable expenses, including reasonable attorney's fees, and shall direct [the plaintiff] to remit to the limited partnership the remainder of those proceeds received." Finding the language of the statute to be "clear and unambiguous," the Court, ascribing a plain meaning interpretation of its terms, concluded that "[t]he [Virginia] General Assembly's use of the word 'remainder' [in Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.65] indicates its intent for the award of reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses to be subtracted from the total amount 'received by the plaintiff as a result of a judgment, compromise or settlement of an action or claim,' with the 'remainder' being remitted to the limited partnership." The Court then observed that its interpretation of Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.65 "is consistent with what is known as the 'common fund' exception to the 'American Rule' prohibiting the shifting of attorneys' fees to the losing party." Relying upon Chambers v. NASCO, Inc., 501 U.S. 32, 45 (1991), the Court explained that the "'common fund exception' is based on a court's 'historic equity jurisdiction . . . allow[ing] a court to award attorney's fees to a party whose litigation efforts directly benefit others.'" The Court then explained, relying on Boeing Co. v. Van Gemert, 444 U.S. 472, 478 (1980), that under the common fund exception, "[Whoever] recovers a common fund for the benefit of persons other than himself . . . is entitled to a reasonable attorney's fee from the fund as a whole." Specifically regarding the recovery of attorneys fees and costs in the context of a derivative suit, the Court, relying on Mardel Secur., Inc. v. Alexandria Gazette Corp., 278 F. Supp. 1010, 1017-1018 (E.D. Va. 1967), explained that under the common fund exception, "attorneys' fees constitute an incident to the claim" and "are payable out of the fund recovered."

■ Measure of damages applicable to allegedly below-market price property sales. Quoting and citing to its prior opinion in Definite Contract Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Tumin, 158 Va. 771, 784, 164 S.E. 562, 566 (1932), the Court explained that "generally the measure of [plaintiff's] damages is the difference between the contract price and the [saleable] or market value of the property at the time of the breach." Specifically, within the context of below-market price sales of real property, the Court relied upon its prior holding in Barr v. MacGlothlin, 176 Va. 474, 482, 11 S.E.2d 617, 620 (1940), as well as similar holdings reached in Webster v. Di Trapano, 114 A.D.2d 698, 699, 494 N.Y.S.2d 550, 551 (N.Y. App. Div. 1985) and First Methodist Episcopal Church of Strong City v. North, 140 P. 888, 889 (Kan. 1914), in explaining that "the measure of damages ordinarily is the difference between the contract price and the saleable or market value at the time of the breach."

Key Issue #1: Were the tax consequences incurred by the limited partnership's investors as a result of the sale of the partnership's sole asset damages recoverable in a derivative suit? In Little, the defendants surmised that the "tax damages" awarded by the circuit court represented the estimated collective income tax liability incurred by the limited partnership's investors as a result of the sale of the apartment complex, its sole asset. The defendants also argued that such damages were not damages sustained by the limited partnership since it, like any partnership, does not pay taxes. Instead, the defendants asserted that the tax consequences represented damages to all of the limited partnership's investors, including the plaintiffs, and that because the purpose of a derivative suit is to recover those damages actually suffered by the partnership, as opposed to its partners, the "tax damages" could not be recovered and were not properly awarded.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, theorized that the value of the limited partnership decreased by virtue of the sale of the apartment complex, positing that "the 'tax damages' were computed as a surrogate for the loss of the value of the partnership as an investment vehicle." As support for their theory, they relied on the testimony of their own accounting expert, who opined that the partnership was damaged because the value of its asset was reduced "by the taxes that were paid from the sale." They also relied on the testimony of a defense witness who qualified as an expert in the field of certified public accounting and partnership taxation and who, when asked if the value of an investment vehicle declines when its only asset is converted to cash and then part of the cash has to be distributed to pay taxes, responded in the affirmative. Based on the foregoing, the plaintiffs argued that the diminution in value of the partnership would not have occurred if the apartment complex had not been sold or if the transaction had been structured as a tax-free exchange pursuant to section 1301 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Court ultimately rejected the plaintiffs' arguments "for several reasons." First, the Court explained that the plaintiffs' argument "overlooks the legal posture of a limited partnership with regard to income tax liability" under section 701 of the Internal Revenue Code (26 U.S.C. § 701), Bufferd, and Littriello, insofar as "[t]he partnership's investors-not the partnership-incurred whatever income tax liability resulted from the sale of [the apartment complex]." As a result, the Court held that the circuit court "erred in its assessment of 'damages to the [p]artnership . . . relating to any tax consequences attributed to the [p]artnership,'" because "there were no tax consequences attributable to the partnership."

Next, the Court addressed the plaintiffs' assertion that the sale of the apartment complex "converted the partnership's sole asset to cash and that the value of the [p]artnership decreased when that cash had to be distributed to pay the [ir] and [the] other investors' income tax liabilities." Responding, the Court opined that the sale of the apartment complex, while resulting in a conversion of the asset to cash, did not diminish the value of that asset because "at that moment in time, the value of the . . . asset was the same as before the sale; it . . . just changed the nature of the . . . asset."

Continuing, the Court addressed the plaintiffs' assertion that "cash had to be distributed to pay the investors' income tax liabilities resulting from the sale of [the apartment complex]," finding that such assertion "was not supported by" the terms of the partnership agreement governing the limited partnership. The Court explained that the partnership agreement provided that "[a]ny revenues of the [p]artnership not required to meet its obligations and to conduct future operations were to be distributed to the investors on a quarterly basis," and that upon dissolution, the partnership's assets "were to be distributed in cash or in kind in proportion to each partner's capital account as adjusted according to a formula set forth in the [p]artnership [a]greement." Contrary to what the plaintiff's asserted, the Court concluded that "[n]o provision in the [p]artnership [a]greement required a distribution of cash to pay income taxes owed by the [p]artnership's investors as a result of the [p]artnership's business activities."

Finally, the Court rejected the plaintiffs' assertion, purportedly supported by the Court's opinion in Rutter v. Jones, Blechman, Woltz & Kelly, P.C., 264 Va. 310, 568 S.E.2d 693 (2002), that "the 'tax damages' were a proper measure of damages . . . because legal 'malpractice damages are calculated on the basis of the value of what is lost by the client which in many cases will be measured by tax consequences.'" The Court found that the plaintiffs' assertion had "no merit" because the decision in Rutter "d[id] not support their position," inasmuch as Rutter was readily distinguishable on the ground that it "did not address the type of damages recoverable in a derivative suit involving a claim for legal malpractice."

As a result, the Court held that "the circuit court erred by awarding 'tax damages' against the [d]efendants," because "[s]uch damages were not sustained by the [p]artnership and thus were not recoverable in th[e] plaintiffs' derivative suit."

Key Issue #2: Did the circuit court err in awarding attorneys' fees and costs to the plaintiffs in addition to the other damages awarded to the partnership, instead of awarding such fees and costs from the "common fund" recovered for the Partnership? In addressing the issue of whether the circuit court had erred in awarding the plaintiffs the attorneys fees and costs incurred by them in bringing the derivative suit, the Court plainly stated that, under the operative language of Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.65, a successful plaintiff who has received an award of reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses in a derivative suit is directed "to remit to the limited partnership the remainder of those proceeds received by him." The Court then explained that the use of the word "remainder" in the statute indicated that the General Assembly had "intended for the award of reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses to be subtracted from the total amount 'received by the plaintiff as a result of a judgment, compromise or settlement of an action or claim,' with the 'remainder' being remitted to the limited partnership." As a result, the Court held that the circuit court erred by awarding reasonable attorneys' fees and expenses to the individual plaintiffs in addition to the other damages awarded to the partnership. Instead, the Court concluded that "in accordance with the requirements of Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.65, the award of attorneys' fees and expenses must be paid from the 'common fund' received by the limited partners on behalf of the partnership and the remainder remitted to the partnership."

Key Issue #3: Did the circuit court err in failing to award the plaintiffs damages relating to the allegedly "hurried sale" of the apartment complex? In addressing the issue of whether the circuit court erred in failing to award damages to the plaintiffs arising from the allegedly "hurried sale" of the apartment complex, the Court was asked to consider the plaintiffs' evidence consisting of two valuations—one made on the closing date of the sale (January 30, 2003), and the other made on a date shortly before trial (June 30, 2005)—as purportedly establishing that the value of the apartment complex as of the date of the sale exceeded the contract price. The Court ultimately concluded, however, that "[t]he fair market value of [the apartment complex] on either January 30, 2003 or June 30, 2005 was irrelevant and did not establish any damages on the date of breach," which the parties did not dispute was the date when the attorney defendant entered into the contract to sell it to a third party (October 16, 2002). As a result, the Court held that the plaintiffs had "offered no proof to establish that the fair market value of [the apartment complex] on the date of breach . . . exceeded the contract price."

Importance of Ruling. There are likely many cooperative business entities in the Commonwealth that, like the partnership involved in Little, were formed to acquire real property for investment purposes. Invariably, some portion of the memberships of these entities will find themselves dissatisfied with the business decisions made by those in control regarding the sale of their investment properties. Whether these entities are small or large, the Supreme Court of Virginia's opinion in Little provides valuable guidance to their members and their counsel regarding the limitations of a derivative suit as a vehicle for the recovery of damages arising from the sale of an entity's only asset. First and foremost, the Court teaches in Little that the recovery of damages arising from the tax consequences of such a sale flowing through to the members of a partnership is not within the scope of a derivative action, because such damages do not belong to the partnership as a result of its exclusion from taxation under section 701 of the Internal Revenue Code.

Little also clarifies that the expense of the derivative suit—specifically, attorneys fees and court costs—is to be awarded out of the entire fund recovered as a result of the derivative suit via the "common fund" view that the Court expresses with respect to Va. Code Ann. § 50-73.65, and not awarded in addition to such amount. As a practical matter, this means that members who are dissatisfied with the decision to dispose of a partnerships' sole asset will do well to make an honest assessment of what the likely recovery will be if they choose to initiate a derivative suit, because if the likely recovery is small, the deduction of attorneys fees and costs therefrom may mean that it will likely not be cost effective to pursue the remedy.

In addition, Little teaches that the recovery of damages arising from an allegedly below-market price sale of real property caused by a failure to properly market it or by a failure to advantageously time the sale thereof must be established using adequate proof of the property's value. Thus, members contemplating the initiation of a derivative suit based on the theory of a deficient sale of a partnerships' investment property would be well advised, based on the Court's analysis and rejection of the proffered valuation evidence in Little, to (1) ascertain the precise point in time at which the breach giving rise to the loss takes place and (2) obtain sufficient evidence of the value of the property at that time, in order to sufficiently establish a claim for damages.

Virginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

Regarding damages, see Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice Chapter 23: Damages; Kent Sinclair, Virginia Civil Procedure § 3.2: Damages; John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies Chapter 21:

Damages; Virginia Model Jury Instructions -- Civil, Chapter 9: Damages.

Regarding contracts and breach of contract, see Charles E. Friend and Kent Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice Chapter 24: Contract Actions; Kent Sinclair, Virginia Civil Procedure § 2.3: Contract Actions Generally; Virginia Model Jury Instructions -- Civil, Chapter 45: Contracts.

Regarding partners and partnerships, see John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies Chapter 22: Partners and Partnerships.

For a general discussion of partnerships and tax aspects of partnerships, see Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia and West Virginia, PARTNERSHIP; Zolman Cavitch, Business Organizations with Tax Planning, Part 2: Taxation of Partnerships; Part 3: Partnership: Formation, Operation, Dissolution; and Part 4: Limited Partnerships (Matthew Bender 2007).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Mr. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and looseleaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management, and is the author of multiple law review articles on subjects including criminal appellate procedure, constitutional law, crime victim's rights legislation, and environmental law. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

51 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia C&I Steel, LLC v. Travelers Casualty & Surety Co. of America

2008 Emerging Issues 1300

Garcia C&I Steel, LLC v. Travelers Casualty & Surety Co. of America

By Grace V. B. Garcia

December 4, 2007

SUMMARY: In C&I Steel, LLC v. Travelers Cas. & Surety Co. of Am., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 653 (2007), the Appeals Court, considering an issue of first impression in Massachusetts, reversed the lower court and held that a surety who issued a construction bond could not be held liable for a punitive damage award against its principal because the terms of the bond covered only payment for labor, materials and equipment. Thus, this decision confirms the important principle that a surety will be responsible only for the obligations the surety specifically undertakes in the bond. This commentary, written by Grace Garcia, discusses the implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Suretys Responsibility for Punitive Damages

In C&I Steel, LLC v. Travelers Cas. & Surety Co. of Am., 70 Mass. App. Ct. 653 (2007), the Appeals Court, considering an issue of first impression in Massachusetts, reversed the lower court and held that a surety who issued a construction bond could not be held liable for a punitive damage award against its principal because the terms of the bond covered only payment for labor, materials and equipment. Thus, this decision confirms the important principle that a surety will be responsible only for the obligations the surety specifically undertakes in the bond.

Types of Surety Bonds. Essentially, a surety bond is a bond that a surety issues guaranteeing that the entity it is bonding, called the principal, will pay monies that it owes to third parties. In the construction industry, there are generally three types of surety bonds: (1) a performance bond, which is a promise by the surety to pay, or sometimes to perform, if the principal fails to complete the contract; (2) a payment bond, which protects the owner from liens or claims if the principal fails to pay for the labor or material; and (3) a maintenance bond, which guarantees the principals performance of certain maintenance over a fixed period of time after completion of the work. Under all of these bonds the surety promises that, if the contract is not properly performed, the surety will pay the damages if the principal cannot. A surety bond is not an insurance policy; the surety will not be liable for personal injuries or property damages that result from the principals negligence. Rather, a surety bond acts as a further financial resource behind the contractor, if the contractor fails to make good on the contract. These bonds are generally issued by a licensed corporate surety, who is often a subsidiary or affiliate of an insurance company.

In Massachusetts, for most public construction projects in towns and cities if the contract price is more than $2,000, and for contracts over $5,000 with the Commonwealth, the public entity must obtain a surety bond in an amount equal to at least one half of the total contract price to ensure that the contractor pays for labor, materials and equipment. Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 149, § 29. Thus, in most cases in Massachusetts when a town hires a general contractor to perform work, the town will require that the general contractor obtain a surety bond that guarantees that the general contractor will pay for all of the labor, materials and equipment it needs to perform the contract. By requiring the bond, the town, as owner of the project, is guaranteed that the project will be completed; that all of the project bills, such as those by subcontractors and suppliers, will be paid; and that any claims can be referred to the surety. From a public interest standpoint, a surety bond is beneficial because it allows the owners of public projects to mitigate the performance and payment risks associated with construction projects.

Background for the Courts Decision. In C&I Steel, LLC, a town awarded a general contractor a contract for the construction of a school. The general contractor obtained a payment bond from Travelers Casualty & Surety Company of America (Travelers), as required by the contract and Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 149, § 29. Under the terms of the bond, the general contractor and Travelers jointly and severally bound themselves to the town to pay for labor, materials and equipment furnished for use in the performance of the construction contract. Additionally, the bond defined the construction contract as the agreement between the town and the general contractor, including all contract documents and changes thereto.

After being awarded the contract, the general contractor subcontracted with C&I Steel to perform work required for the project. The subcontract agreement contained a broad arbitration clause. Throughout the project the general contractor and C&I Steel had numerous disputes, leading to an action by C&I Steel against the general contractor, as well as Travelers as the surety, in Superior Court. Based on the terms of the subcontract, the general contractor moved the case to arbitration, in which Travelers did not participate. Travelers then stayed the Superior Court action pending the arbitration.

Following the hearing, the arbitrator found in favor of C&I Steel and issued an award that included both contract and punitive damages against the general contractor. C&I Steel sought confirmation of the entire award in the Superior Court as against both the general contractor and Travelers. Travelers opposed the motion to the extent that the award contained punitive damages. After the Superior Court confirmed the award in total, Travelers appealed. The Appeals Court reviewed this case to determine whether Travelers could be held liable for punitive damages awarded against its principal because this was a question of first impression in Massachusetts.

Surety Bonds Are Interpreted Like All Other Contracts. Absent any ambiguity, when interpreting a contract, the plain meaning of the contract controls. With regard to the surety bond, the Appeals Court looked to the plain language of the bond which stated that Travelers, as the surety, agreed to pay for labor, materials and equipment furnished for use in the performance of the construction contract. By the clear terms, the bond did not include an obligation to pay for punitive damages or any other type of damages not related to labor, materials and equipment. Punitive damages are not considered compensation for an injured party; rather, they are considered to be a form of deterrence and punishment. Gasior v. Massachusetts Gen. Hosp., 446 Mass. 645, 653 (2006). Therefore, punitive damages are not covered by a bond unless the bond specifically spells out an obligation to cover more than labor, materials and equipment. Hence, the Appeals Court held that Travelers could not be held liable for punitive damages.

As a result of C&I Steel, LLC, Massachusetts now follows the Restatement 3d of Suretyship & Guaranty, § 73 (1996), which states that a surety's liability generally does not include penalties beyond the actual losses resulting from the principal's breach. In addition, Massachusetts joins many other states that have refused to find a surety responsible for punitive damages. Those states include: Alabama, Arizona, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Kansas, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Texas. C&I Steel LLC, 70 Mass. App. Ct. 653, 658 (2007). In addition, the C&I Steel, LLC decision now allows sureties in Massachusetts to clearly limit their liability and protect themselves from the bad-faith conduct of their principal simply by limiting the language contained in the bond.

Lessons for Practitioners. Practitioners must be aware of, and properly advise their clients about, the potential limits of a surety bond. As a result of the C&I Steel, LLC decision, it is now clear that a surety cannot be held liable for its principals wrong-doing beyond the obligations it undertook in the bond. Consequently, an owner, subcontractor or other entity who seeks damages, such as punitive damages, against the general contractor, will not be able to rely on the bond for payment. In determining whether to bring a suit, the owner, subcontractor or other entity will want to assess the general contractors capacity to pay any future judgment and possibly take steps to secure assets to cover any potential judgment.

On the other hand, practitioners should also counsel their clients that although a surety may not be obligated in Massachusetts to pay for the wrongful actions of its principal under the bond, a surety can still be held liable for its own wrongful actions. Thus, a surety could be sued, for example, pursuant to Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 93A, also known as Massachusetts Consumer Protection Statute. This statute, which allows claims to be asserted by either consumers or businesses, protects against unfair acts or practices. The statute allows the prevailing party who successfully proves a Chapter 93A claim to recover its reasonable costs and attorneys fees and, under some circumstances, allows the court to assess punitive damages in the amount of multiple (double or treble) damages.

For additional discussion of surety contracts in Massachusetts, see 7-65.1 MA Pleading and Practice § Rule 65.1 Security: Proceedings Against Sureties; 3-14 MA Pleading and Practice § 14.8 Who "Is or May Be Liable" to Defendant: General Scope of Rule 14(a); 2-8 MA Pleading and Practice § 8.23.1 Punitive Damages; 2-8 MA Pleading and Practice § 8.170.1 Complaint by Consumer for Injunctive Relief and Damages Under Massachusetts Consumer Protection Act, Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 93A-Form.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

52 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Papageorge on Pioneer Electronics (USA), Inc. v. Superior Court

2008 Emerging Issues 1242

Papageorge on Pioneer Electronics (USA), Inc. v. Superior Court

By Thomas A. Papageorge

November 30, 2007

SUMMARY: The California Supreme Court has unanimously held that the plaintiffs discovery interests outweighed privacy concerns such that a discovery request for victim contact information in a consumer class action did not require the affirmative written consent of those consumers. This Emerging Issues Analysis offers insights on how they may frame the facts and issues to support their positions on a motion for pre-certification discovery.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Privacy Considerations Do Not Outweigh Plaintiffs Rights to Class Member Information

Background. In the brave new world after Proposition 64, with its substantial limits on private representative actions under Californias Unfair Competition Law [Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 et seq.], plaintiffs counsel must now rely much more on certifying class actions in order to succeed with consumer protection lawsuits. However, a recent California Supreme Court opinion has provided an important boost to plaintiffs attempting to scale the privacy barriers that defendants often erect around their customers contact information.

In a unanimous decision, the California Supreme Court in Pioneer Electronics (USA), Inc. v. Superior Ct. (2007) 40 Cal. 4th 360, 53 Cal. Rptr. 3d 513, 150 P.3d 198 has ruled that privacy considerations, while important, do not necessarily outweigh plaintiffs traditional rights to discovery to identify potential class members. The plaintiffs sought discovery of contact information for consumers who had lodged complaints about an alleged product misrepresentation by defendant Pioneer Electronics. The court of appeal ruled that the class members privacy rights outweighed the competing discovery interests, requiring affirmative consent (opt-in permission) by the consumers before disclosure of contact information would be allowed.

The Supreme Court reversed the appellate court and held that the lower courts ruling was overprotective of the purchasers privacy rights, inconsistent with established privacy principles, and likely to cause adverse consequences in future cases [Pioneer Electronics, 40 Cal. 4th at 365]. Defendants would have a distinct and unfair litigation advantage if they enjoyed the exclusive use and benefit of the putative class members contact information. The Court concluded that the trial court had correctly permitted opt-out notices requiring consumer complainants to object in order to have their contact information withheld from plaintiffs counsel.

The Balancing Test for Discovery of Class Member Information. The Supreme Court has thus provided clear guidance on the balancing test to be used in determining if privacy concerns outweigh discovery rights. The Court of Appeals approach was too strict and failed to consider the nature of the privacy invasion involved here and apply a balancing test that weighs the various competing interests, as outlined in our case law." [Pioneer Electronics, 40 Cal. 4th at 370].

The Court emphasized that the right of privacy protects the individuals reasonable expectation of privacy against a serious invasion," citing Hill v. National Collegiate Athletic Assn (1994) 7 Cal. 4th 1 (U.S. Supreme Court upheld NCAA drug testing program; emphasis by the Court). The California Court adopted the U.S. Supreme Courts analytical elements, derived from Hill, which a court must evaluate when assessing invasion of privacy claims under the California Constitution: (1) Does the claimant possess a legally protected privacy interest? (2) Does the privacy claimant possess a reasonable expectation of privacy under the particular circumstances? (3) Is the privacy invasion serious or egregious? "[T]rivial invasions afford no cause of action." [Pioneer Electronics, 40 Cal. 4th at 371]; (4) If the first three criteria are met, the trial court must then engage in a balancing test. "Conduct alleged to be an invasion of privacy is to be evaluated based on the extent to which it furthers legitimate and important competing interests" [Pioneer Electronics, 40 Cal. 4th at 371 , citing Hill, 7 Cal. 4th at 38].

Under Pioneer and Hill, trial courts are vested with substantial discretion to strike this balance of interests. Litigants in California today should affirmatively address these competing discovery needs and privacy interests in their discovery motions in order to help the courts exercise this discretion in determining whether substantial privacy concerns are threatened inappropriately. Where, as in Pioneer, the plaintiff seeks only basic contact information (such as name and address) from persons who have already complained about defendants conduct and thus would be likely to want contact from plaintiffs counsel the privacy interests are minimal and plaintiffs access to potential class members will take precedence.

Litigation Significance of Pioneer and Its Balancing Approach. The Pioneer opinion has far-reaching significance for private plaintiffs and class action counsel. At least where the contact information sought is basic and victims can be expected to welcome contact, plaintiffs attorneys can successfully argue that opt-out and negative option procedures (as approved by the trial court in Pioneer) provide all the privacy protection necessary in those circumstances. This approach will greatly reduce class certification costs and broaden the range of victims whom counsel will be easily able to reach.

Class action counsel may also find that the policy statements in Pioneer apply well beyond traditional consumer law. Plaintiffs can argue in appropriate cases that these principles apply to precertification access to class members in other contexts where state law protects those who would ordinarily welcome contact, including employees, insureds, utility and bank customers, and others.

If under particular facts a court proves reluctant to accept opt-out or negative option protections of privacy interests, plaintiffs counsel should be prepared to suggest other means of assuring adequate privacy protection, including protective orders governing the uses of the information.

Defense counsel may also find support in the Pioneer balancing process. Where the facts permit, counsel should stress the presence of greater privacy interests, such as those associated with health records or personal financial information. In cases involving such interests, arguments that putative class members might value privacy over contacts from plaintiffs lawyers will have greater force.

Pioneer will also prove useful to public prosecutors handling unfair competition cases and related matters. The Court specifically endorsed the suggestion in an amicus brief submitted by prosecutors that a contrary rule would have improperly restricted public enforcement in such cases as consumer and investor fraud, elder financial abuse schemes, food and drug hazards, and breaches of consumer product warranty, health, and safety standards [Pioneer Electronics, 40 Cal. 4th at 374]. On this basis prosecutors should vigorously resist efforts to limit the Peoples access to victim contact information in all the types of health and safety and consumer fraud matters favorably referenced by the Supreme Court in Pioneer.

For further discussion of class certification and pre-certification discovery, see Cabraser, California Class Action Practice and Procedure, Ch. 8, Class Action Notice, § 8.07 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender) and Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Pretrial Civil Procedure, Ch. 33, Class Actions, § 33.16 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

For further discussion of privacy interests and the balancing of these interests in discovery proceedings, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 191, Discovery: Privileges and Other Discovery Limitations, § 473.28 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

For further discussion of the scope of unfair and deceptive trade practice actions brought by public prosecutors in California, see Papageorge & Fellmeth, California White Collar Crime, Ch. 3 (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Thomas A. Papageorge, a graduate of UCLA and the Harvard Law School, has supervised the Consumer Protection Division of the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office since 1984, and presently directs the Office's sections of consumer law, antitrust, environmental law, and elder abuse. He has served with the Federal Trade Commission in Los Angeles and Washington, D.C., including as Regional Director of the FTC's Los Angeles Regional Office. Mr. Papageorge is past chair of the Antitrust and Unfair Competition Law Section of the State Bar of California, past chair of the Antitrust Section of the Los Angeles County Bar Association, and has chaired the Consumer Protection Committee of the California District Attorney's Association for several terms between 1985 and 2006. In 2004 he was honored by the Antitrust and Unfair Competition Section of the State Bar of California as the Antitrust Lawyer of the Year. Mr. Papageorge has served as Associate Dean and Associate Professor of Law at the Whittier Law School, and he continues as an Adjunct Professor of Law there, teaching and writing in the areas of antitrust, consumer law, and white collar crime. His publications include more than twenty articles and four books, the latest of which is his treatise California White Collar Crime (2nd Ed., 2004), with R. Fellmeth, published by LexisNexis Matthew Bender.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

53 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Professor Robert Aronson on State v. Mason

2008 Emerging Issues 1249

Professor Robert Aronson on State v. Mason, 160 Wn.2d 910, 162 P.3d 396 (July 19, 2007)

By Robert Aronson

November 30, 2007

SUMMARY: Noting the lapse between the time a murder victim was assaulted and when he made statements to the police, combined with the fact that the statements were made in the safety of the police station, miles from the encounter, the Washington Supreme Court holds that the statements were testimonial under the United States Supreme Courts Confrontation Clause.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: The Meaning of Testimonial For Confrontation Clause Purposes, and Adopting The Forfeiture by Wrongdoing Doctrine

Background. State v. Mason, 160 Wn.2d 910, 162 P.3d 396 (2007) involves a trial court's admission of statements the murder victim made to police and a domestic violence victim's advocate before he disappeared. The defendant was convicted of aggravated first-degree murder. At trial, the prosecution introduced the testimony of a police officer concerning the victim's statements about being choked, gagged, threatened with a gun and drain cleaner, and being forced by the defendant to write a note and a check. Despite being hearsay and made 24 hours after the attack, the trial court admitted the statement as an excited utterance. [For a discussion of the excited utterance exception, and particularly the requirement that the declarant must still be under the shock of the event, see The Law of Evidence in Washington § 803.04].

At the outset of its opinion, the Washington Supreme Court notes that it will not consider arguments that the trial court erred by also admitting statements reported by an emergency room doctor who treated the victim after the assault, or that the Washington State Constitution, Art. I, § 22 provides greater protection than the Confrontation Clause of the United States Constitution, because those arguments were not adequately argued or briefed previously. Mason, 162 P.3d at 400 nn.1 & 2. The lesson to be learned is that evidentiary -- and even most Constitutional -- objections and arguments must be made at the first possible opportunity, usually when the evidence is first offered at trial.

The Meaning of Testimonial for Purposes of Confrontation Clause Analysis. In Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004), the United States Supreme Court reformulated Confrontation Clause analysis that had been employed by courts for 24 years. Under Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), out-of-court statements of an unavailable witness could be admitted without violating the Confrontation Clause if they bore adequate indicia of reliability. However, in Crawford, the Court shifted the focus from the reliability of the statement to whether or not it was testimonial. Such statements are only admissible if they have been subject to confrontation, either at the present trial or on a previous occasion (e.g., prior trial or deposition). The Crawford Court did not provide a clear definition of testimonial, but it would appear to apply at a minimum to prior testimony at a preliminary hearing, before a grand jury, or at a formal trial; and to police interrogations [Crawford, 541 U.S. at 51-52]. In addition, the core class of testimonial statements includes those pretrial statements that declarants would reasonably expect to be used prosecutorially [Crawford, 541 U.S. at 51]. Further, the Court appeared to approve a definition of testimonial statements as those that were made under circumstances which would lead an objective witness reasonably to believe that the statement would be available for use at a later trial [Crawford, 541 U.S. at 52].

For two years after Crawford, state and federal courts struggled with the definition of testimonial, particularly with respect to statements made by victims and witnesses to police officers. While some statements accusing someone of criminal conduct were clearly intended to aid in criminal prosecution, many others were ambiguous concerning the declarants' purpose and belief.

In Davis v. Washinton, 126 S. Ct. 2266 (2006), the United States Supreme Court clarified the meaning of testimonial, at least with respect to statements made to law enforcement personnel. In Davis, the Court held that the primary purpose of a police interrogation distinguishes testimonial from nontestimonial statements. Statements are nontestimonial under circumstances objectively indicating that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to enable police assistance to meet an ongoing emergency. [Statements] are testimonial when the circumstances objectively indicate that there is no such ongoing emergency, and that the primary purpose of the interrogation is to establish or prove past events potentially relevant to later criminal prosecution [Davis, 126 S. Ct. at 2273-74 (emphasis added)].

Out-Of-Court Statements Must Survive Both Hearsay and Confrontation Clause Objections to be Admissible. In addition to the victim's statements to a police officer regarding being choked, gagged, and threatened with a gun and drain cleaner, the victim also stated to other police officers that he was terrified for his life and asked to sleep at the police station. The trial court admitted the first statements as excited utterances and the latter statements to show the victim's state of mind and because the request to sleep at the police station was a question, and therefore not hearsay because not offered for its truth. See The Law of Evidence in Washington §§ 803.04[4][b] & [c] (state of mind exception to the hearsay rule) and 801.04[2] (exclusion from hearsay treatment of statements not offered to prove their truth).

It is at least questionable whether the latter statements were relevant if admitted solely for the purposes indicated. As the Court notes, In a homicide case, the general rule is that statements by the victim, typically expressing fear of, or anxiety about, the defendant, are not admissible under the state of mind exception because the victim's state of mind is deemed irrelevant. See State v. Powell, 126 Wn.2d 244, 266, 893 P.2d 615(1995) (prosecution witnesses should not have been permitted to recount murdered wife's out-of-court statements that she was afraid of her defendant husband) [Mason, 162 P.3d at 401-402 n.3]. And it would seem that the only relevance of the victim's request to sleep at the police station would be to show his fear of the defendant. The Court thus cautions against any backdoor' admission of inadmissible hearsay statements, and that [w]hether or not the United States Supreme Court would approve the introduction of [the victim's] entire testimonial story to explain the admission of exhibits or someone's state of mind, under one theory or another that the evidence was not offered for its truth is, at the very least, debatable. [W]e are not convinced a trial court's ruling that a statement is offered for a purpose other than to prove the truth of the matter asserted immunizes the statement from confrontation clause analysis. To survive a hearsay challenge is not, per se, to survive a confrontation clause challenge [Mason, 162 P.3d at 402].

In light of the Court's holding, prosecutors and defense counsel should consider the admissibility of out-of-court statements both under a hearsay and Confrontation Clause analysis. Finding that a statement is not hearsay, or meets a hearsay exception does not ensure admissibility in criminal cases.

Standard of Review. An appellate court will not reverse a trial court's ruling on a hearsay objection unless it constitutes an abuse of discretion. Discretion is abused only if the trial court's decision is manifestly unreasonable or is based on untenable reasons or grounds.' [Mason, 162 P.3d at 402 (quoting State v. C.J., 148 Wn.2d 672, 686, 63 P.3d 765 (2003))]. A confrontation clause challenge is, on the other hand, reviewed de novo. [Mason, 162 P.3d at 402 (citing State v. Price, 158 Wn.2d 630, 638-39, 146 P.3d 1183 (2006))].

Application of Davis' Definition of Testimonial to the Statements in Mason. The Court appears to suggest that the victim's statements to the police officers should be considered testimonial. However, because the Court adopts the doctrine of forfeiture by waiver (see discussion below) and finds that any of the claimed errors were harmless in light of other substantial evidence of guilt, it finds it unnecessary to decide the issue with respect to those statements. The Court clearly holds that similar statements the victim made to a domestic violence victim's advocate were testimonial. Although the victim may have been seeking protection, not bearing witness to a crime as held by the Court of Appeals (State v. Mason, 127 Wn.App. 554, 568, 126 P.3d 34 (2005)), the Washington Supreme Court finds that his statements would be viewed by an objective witness as available for use at a later trial [Mason, 162 P.3d at 403, quoting Crawford, 541 U.S. at 52]. The statements were made six days after the assault, not during any emergency, and not as part of a call for help against [a] bona fide physical threat [Mason, 162 P.3d at 403 (quoting Davis, 126 S. Ct. 2276)]. Therefore, the statements were testimonial, and their admission would have violated the Confrontation Clause, were it not for the Court's adoption of the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine.

Forfeiture by Wrongdoing Doctrine. The forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine extinguishes confrontation claims on essentially equitable grounds [Crawford, 541 U.S. at 62]. Essentially, a defendant forfeits his or her confrontation clause claim by causing the out-of-court declarant to be unavailable. As the Court states in Mason, by causing the victim to be unavailable, Mason made his right impossible to implement; he has only himself to blame for its loss [Mason, 162 P.3d at 404]. While many courts have adopted the basic principle of forfeiture by wrongdoing, however, at least two sub-issues remained to be decided in Mason: first, whether the doctrine should be applied when the conduct of the defendant alleged to have made the declarant unavailable is the same conduct for which the defendant is being tried; and second, what standard should the trial judge use in deciding whether the defendant has caused the declarant's unavailability?

(1) Where the conduct of the defendant alleged to have made the declarant unavailable is the conduct for which the defendant is being tried. Four Justices (two concurring and two dissenting) would not adopt the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine, at least where the alleged wrongdoing forms the factual basis for the charge against the defendant. As stated by Justice Sanders in dissent, under such circumstances, the court must assume the defendant's guilt prior to trial, an assumption which offends the presumption of innocence imbedded in our state and federal constitutions [Mason, 162 P.3d at 411]. For that reason, a number of state and federal courts that have adopted the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine have not applied it in cases where the alleged wrongdoing that caused the declarant's unavailability is the same as the conduct alleged in the charged crime [see, e.g., State v. Jarzbek, 204 Conn. 683, 529 A.2d 1245 (1987); People v. Maher, 89 N.Y.2d 456, 654 N.Y.S.2d 1004, 677 N.E.2d 728 (1997); United States v. Lentz, 282 F. Supp. 2d 399 (2002), aff'd in part, rev'd in part on other grounds, 383 F.3d 191 (4th Cir. 2004)].

(2) Clear, cogent, and convincing standard of proof required. Although noting that a majority of the courts that have adopted the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine apply a preponderance of the evidence standard to decide whether the witness was made unavailable by the wrongdoing of the accused, the Court in Mason agrees with the New York Court of Appeals that forfeiture of the right of confrontation warrants a more exacting standard of proof [Mason, 162 P.3d at 404 (citing People v. Geraci, 85 N.Y.2d 359, 367, 649 N.E.2d 817, 635 N.Y.S.2d 469 (1995))]. Therefore, although under ER 104(a) preliminary facts relating to the admissibility of evidence are normally decided by the judge under a preponderance of the evidence standard [see, e.g., Condon Bros. v. Simpson Timber Co., 92 Wn.App. 275, 966 P.2d 355, 360 (1998)], the Court in Mason establishes a clear, cogent, and convincing standard to be applied under the forfeiture by wrongdoing doctrine.

Additional Issues. The Court addresses a number of additional issues, finding either a waiver of the alleged error, no error, or harmless error. First, the Court finds that the trial judge erred in informing the jury, over a somewhat lukewarm objection, that the present trial was not a death penalty case. The Court reaffirms its holding in State v. Townsend, 142 Wn.2d 838, 15 P.3d 145 (2001): The strict prohibition against informing the jury of sentencing considerations ensures impartial juries and prevents unfair influence on a jury's deliberations [Mason, 162 P.3d at 406 (quoting Townsend)]. Again, however, the Court finds the error harmless.

Second, the court finds that a number of potential errors in admitting prior bad acts under ER 404(b) were waived. Those acts included evidence indicating the defendant possessed a loaded gun and two knives and admission of a passage from a book he owned titled, The Ancient Art of Strangulation. However, because defense counsel objected to the testimony about the gun and knives on the basis of relevance and not prior bad acts under ER 404(b), any error was waived. Because defense counsel objected to the State's introduction of fingerprint evidence on the pages from the book, but not to the introduction of the pages themselves, the objection on that basis was also not preserved. In light of the number of potentially valid objections that were either waived or not preserved in Mason, practitioners would be well advised to comply with ER 103(a): Error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and [i]n case the ruling is one admitting evidence, a timely objection or motion to strike is made, stating the specific ground of objection . For a discussion of the procedures for excluding evidence, see The Law of Evidence in Washington § 103.05[2].

For further analysis of the issues in Mason, see The Law of Evidence in Washington §§ 103.05[3][a]--[c] (Reversible Error on Appeal), 404.04[2][a]--[e] (Admissibility of Prior Bad Acts), 804.04[1][c] (Confrontation Clause Analysis) (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Robert Aronson joined the University of Washington School of Law faculty in 1975. Prior to coming to UW, he was a Teaching Fellow at Stanford Law School, and taught Civil Procedure at the University of San Diego Law School while clerking for Judge James Carter of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. He is a nationally recognized expert in professional responsibility and his book, The Law of Evidence in Washington, is one of the leading treatises on the subject. He has served as Chair of The Association of American Law Schools (AALS) Section on Professional Responsibility, National Conference of Bar Examiners MPRE Drafting Committee, Commissioner on Uniform State Laws, Washington Legislative Ethics Board, AALS Committee on Bar Admission and Lawyer Performance, Law School Admission Council, Finance and Legal Affairs Committee, President of the Board of the Washington Appellate Defender Association, Reporter for the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers Standards of Conduct, and Hearing Tribunal Member for the Washington Human Rights Commission.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

54 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bochet on Massachi v. AHL Services

2008 Emerging Issues 1223

Bochet on Massachi v. AHL Services

By William C. Bochet

November 30, 2007

SUMMARY: The Appellate Division faced a tragic set of facts and a lower court decision which granted summary judgment to the Police Department of the City of Newark and a police emergency operator who allegedly erred in recording information given in the course of a 9-1-1 call. The court reversed, finding that the Tort Claims Act did not give immunity to the City and its employee.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: This case was decided on November 15, 2007

Appellate Division Finds 9-1-1 Operator Not Immune under Tort Claims Act-Operator's Errors are Actionable

In Massachi v. AHL Services, the Appellate Division faced a tragic set of facts and a lower court decision which granted summary judgment to the Police Department of the City of Newark and a police emergency operator who allegedly erred in recording information given in the course of a 9-1-1 call. The court reversed, finding that the Tort Claims Act did not give immunity to the City and its employee. The decision hinged on whether or not the conduct of the operator was ministerial in nature and not a failure to provide adequate police protection.

Sohayla Massachi was abducted by her former boyfriend outside of the gates of Seton Hall University. The act was witnessed by several persons, including two off-duty sheriff's officers. One of the officers called 9-1-1, reported the abduction and provided a detailed description of the abduction vehicle and the direction it was traveling. This information was allegedly recorded incorrectly by the 9-1-1 operator. This resulted in the vehicle being long gone and untraceable when police arrived at the scene where Ms. Massachi was abducted. She ultimately was brought to the ex-boyfriend's home where he proceeded to shoot her, as well as himself. The injuries proved to be mortal.

Ministerial or Immune? The municipal defendants moved for summary judgment on three grounds: (1) immunity under N.J.S. § 59:5-4 (Tort Claims Act), (2) immunity under N.J.S. § 52:17C-10(d) [9-1-1 Statute] and (3) insufficient facts to show proximate cause. The motion judge granted summary judgment on the first of these grounds. The court relied upon Sczyrek v. County of Essex, 324 N.J. Super. 235, 735 A.2d 33 (App. Div. 1999), certif. denied, 163 N.J. 75 (2000). That case arose from a fatal shooting in the Essex County Courthouse. The plaintiff therein argued that the County was liable due to the insufficiency of its security plan, as well as its failure to respond to warnings before the incident which portended the shooting. The Appellate Division found that N.J.S. § 59:5-4 conferred immunity upon the County as the plaintiff's claims were premised upon a "...failure to provide sufficient police protection" which the statute exempts from liability. Sczyrek found that the inadequacy of the security plan was a result of decisions on the part of the County and that there was immunity under the Tort Claims Act from liability for policy or political decisions. The court went further, however, and said that the cited provision confers immunity for alleged negligent performance in responding to the warnings. The statute's clear language and its basic policy provide immunity for acts or omissions in the course of law enforcement. The analogy of the facts in Sczyrek to the claimed negligent conduct of the 9-1-1 operator was clear to the motion judge.

Perhaps influenced by the tragic facts and the obvious carelessness of the emergency call recipient, the Appellate Division reversed the granting of summary judgment. The court found that the acts of the operator were mere ministerial acts which did not reach a level where immunity would attach. The opinion distinguished ministerial acts from public policy decisions or other exercises of judgment or discretion by a public servant or entity.

The Case Law. In finding against the County and operator, the Appellate Division cited cases which held that the immunity conferred by the Tort Claims Act does not come into play in situations where police officers were negligent in the performance of their duties. In Shore v. Housing Authority of Harrison, 208 N.J. Super. 348, 506 A.2d 16 (App. Div. 1986), for example, a public security officer was held subject to liability for "goofing off" in the performance of his duties. Also, in Suarez v. Dosky, 171 N.J. Super. 1, 407 A.2d 1237 (App. Div. 1979), certif. denied, 82 N.J. 300 (1980), two state troopers were held subject to liability for failure to escort a family off of a busy highway after responding to an accident. These acts by police officers were deemed "ministerial" and not the allocation of resources to which immunity would attach. The alleged mistakes of the 9-1-1 operator also were "ministerial".

The Undecided Issue. The Appellate Division has the innate power under N.J. Ct. R. 2:10-5 to retain jurisdiction and decide an issue not necessarily addressed by the court below. In this case, it chose not to do so. Rather, the court remanded the case for "fuller development" of the question of immunity under the "9-1-1 Act" [N.J.S. § 52:17C-10(d)]. That statute holds that a person at a "public safety answering point" shall not be liable for civil damages for "failure or omission" in performing 9-1-1 services. The language and intent of the statute appear to grant immunity in this instance.

Yet, the Appellate Division skirted the issue. Several reasons may be inferred:

1. The appellate panel felt the Title 59 immunity issue was ripe for review by the Supreme Court. The judges did not want to terminate the case on other grounds, thus making the prospects of a published opinion unlikely in this instance.
2. There was dissatisfaction with the way the 9-1-1 issue was addressed in the court below and/or before the appellate court. Also, the trial judge did not decide the question, leaving the Appellate Division to defer consideration if it so chose.
3. Sympathy for the plaintiff's cause, under the circumstances, provoked an attitude to keep the claim against the City and its employee alive. This also keeps as a possibility the chances of settlement.

More likely than not, all of these factors played a role in the panel's decision to avoid the 9-1-1 statute issue.

Whither the Action? The claims against the other defendants in the case were reported settled by the plaintiff's attorney in the New Jersey Law Journal (190 N.J.L.J. 691). The dismissal of these claims made the appeal of summary judgment entered earlier an appeal as of right [N.J. Ct. R. 2:2-3(a)], as compared to an interlocutory appeal. The case now stands with the Title 59 and proximate cause issues ready for trial, absent grant of certification by the Supreme Court. The 9-1-1 Act immunity issue remains open. The defendant City and its employee may move for summary judgment on that question, as per the invitation within the appellate court opinion. That would open up a new appeal, if successful. Case law provides no guidance as to the probabilities of what direction that will go.

The Risks. The County has already provoked "bad law" for its Title 59 colleagues. This case is one more precedent in favor of ordinary negligent conduct by police officers being excluded from Title 59 immunity, even when a criminal act is involved. On the other hand, there is no certainty from plaintiff's point of view that the Supreme Court will tolerate the ministerial conduct exception to what Sczyrek described as the clear meaning of the language and intent of the Tort Claims Act.

Tip for Counsel. One of the bases for the Appellate Division's not addressing the 9-1-1 Act immunity question was that the City did not cross-appeal the trial judge's failure to rule on the issue. This may have been a deliberate tactic on the part of the City. Nonetheless, appellate counsel should always raise issues they wish the appellate court to decide both in the Notice of Appeal (N.J. Ct. R. 2:5-1), Case Information Statement (N.J. Ct. R. 2:5-1) and in their briefs (N.J. Ct. R. 2:6-2). Otherwise, as happened here, the Appellate Division may refuse to consider the question.

Cross-references

See generally New Jersey Pleadings (LexisNexis 2007) § 5.44, Asserting Third-party Claim.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William C. Bochet is a member of the firm of Muscarella, Bochet, Edwards & D'Alessandro, with offices in Fair Lawn, New Jersey. He is a graduate of Dickinson College and the University of Pennsylvania School of Law. He was admitted to practice in the State of New Jersey in 1970 and to the United States Supreme Court in 1975. In 1982, he was certified as a Civil Trial Attorney by the New Jersey Supreme Court and was certified as a Certified Civil Trial Specialist by the National Board of Trial Advocacy in 1989. Mr. Bochet has been a Master of the Justice Morris Pashman American Inn of Court since its inception in 1990. He is presently Secretary of the Bergen County Bar Association, as well as a member of Trial Attorneys of New Jersey, New Jersey State Bar Association and the American Bar Association. Mr. Bochet has written and lectured on trial practice throughout his career and has provided commentary and annotations for LexisNexis New Jersey Court Rules Annotated, Parts One, Two and Four since 2007.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

55 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Professor Robert Aronson on State v. Dixon

2008 Emerging Issues 1202

Professor Robert Aronson on State v. Dixon

By Robert Aronson

November 29, 2007

SUMMARY: Relying on the since deleted Task Force Comments, the Court holds that extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statements of a testifying witness may only be excluded if the witness admits making the statements or the proponent of the evidence fails to provide sufficient evidence of the preliminary fact that the prior statements refer to the subject of the statements at trial. This Emerging Issues Analysis analyzes the views of this case.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Admissibility of Prior Inconsistent Statements to Impeach Testifying Witnesses in Child Molestation Cases

Background. State v. Dixon, 159 Wn.2d 65, 147 P.3d 991 (2006) involves a trial courts refusal to allow the defendant, charged with child molestation, to cross-examine the child witness regarding a conversation with her aunt. According to the aunt, the child had asked, What do I do if Im lying? and said that she could not tell anyone about her lie because it had gone too far [Dixon, 147 P.3d at 995]. The aunt further testified that the conversation had taken place in the context of a conversation about the defendant. Observing that the relevancy of the conversation (Fact A) depended upon the defenses ability to prove that the childs question pertained to the molestation allegations (Fact B), the court held that the trial court could require the defense to prove Fact B before it allowed the questioning to proceed. As the defense had shown only that the witness had possibly lied about something, it had not established the foundation necessary to admit the evidence [Dixon, 147 P.3d at 997-98].

Child sexual abuse cases often raise the most difficult evidentiary issues. On the one hand, such cases involve the most heinous crimes, so there is a strong incentive to convict those who commit them. In addition, the victims are not only traumatized by the acts themselves, but there is concern that they will be traumatized by having to testify and be cross-examined. On the other hand, the seriousness of a conviction for child sexual abuse requires that constitutional and evidentiary protections of criminal defendants be strictly enforced, particularly since statements by children can be inaccurate due to their young age and susceptibility to manipulation.

Numerous appellate decisions each year address aspects of evidence offered in child sexual abuse cases, including: prejudice [ER 403], character [ER 404], impeachment [ER 608 and ER 613], scientific evidence [ER 702 and ER 703], and hearsay [ER 803 and ER 804].

Dixon addresses at least three significant issues: (1) Under what circumstances should the defendant be permitted to introduce a prior inconsistent statement by a witness? (2) What standard of proof must the defendant meet before introducing evidence that a witness is lying? (3) What harmless error standard should be applied to the erroneous refusal to allow the defendant to impeach a witness with a prior inconsistent statement?

(1) Use of Prior Inconsistent Statement for Impeachment under ER 613(b). At trial, the defendants nine-year-old daughter testified that the defendant molested her. In addition to the child's testimony, her mother and a police officer testified to statements the child had made to them about the abuse. For a discussion of the admissibility of child hearsay statements in abuse cases, see The Law of Evidence in Washington §§ 803.04[3][e] (excited utterances); 803.04[5][c] (statements for purposes of diagnosis or treatment); 804.04[1][c][v] (Confrontation Clause analysis); and 807.04 (child victim or witness hearsay exception).

The child admitted at trial that she later told her mother it didn't happen because he said to me that he was only trying to teach me something. And, in another conversation, the child told her mother that it didn't happen exactly the way she said. That the touching hadn't happened. However, her mother testified to a number of occasions where the child related the molestation in some detail. Further, a police detective testified to a number of statements about the molestation the child made to him.

The defense sought to impeach the child by calling a counselor to testify that the child told her she could not tell whether the molestation had actually happened or was a dream. The trial court held that the defense could only introduce the evidence if the child denied making the statement. In response to the question, Do you remember saying I don't know if it happened or if it was a dream?, the child responded, Yes, but I know it wasn't a dream. The trial court ruled that the response foreclosed the defense from calling the counselor for impeachment purposes.

Standard of Review. On appeal, Washington Supreme Court holds that [d]eterminations regarding the scope of cross-examination are within the trial court's discretion and will not be overturned on appeal absent an abuse of discretion. Abuse of discretion will be found only when the trial court's decision is manifestly unreasonable, or is exercised on untenable grounds, or for untenable reasons, namely, if it rests on facts unsupported by the record or was reached by applying the wrong legal standard [Quoting State v. Rohrich, 149 Wn.2d 647, 654, 71 P.3d 638 (2003)].

Analysis Under ER 613(b). ER 613(b) governs the admissibility of impeachment evidence, providing that [e]xtrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon. In upholding the trial court's refusal to permit the defense to call the child's counselor to testify to the inconsistent statement, the Washington Supreme Court relies heavily on the Task Force Comment that [t]here are prior Washington decisions to the effect that if the witness responds to foundation questions by admitting making the prior inconsistent statement, then extrinsic evidence of the statement is inadmissible. Although ER 613 does not expressly preclude admission of extrinsic evidence in such a situation, rule 403 gives the court broad discretion to exclude evidence on the grounds that it would cause undue delay, be a waste of time, or that it is a needless presentation of cumulative evidence [Task Force Comment, quoted at Dixon, 147 P.3d at 996].

Ironically, effective September 1, 2006, the Court deleted the Task Force Comments from the Washington Evidence Rules. Therefore, although the trial in Dixon occurred prior to September 1, 2006, the Court's heavy reliance on the Comments suggests that attorneys would be well-advised to consult the Comments in interpreting the Rules. It should also be noted that neither the Comment to ER 613 nor the Court's opinion in Dixon cites to any case support for the inadmissibility of extrinsic evidence of a statement that the witness admits making.

(2) Standard of Proof Regarding Conditional Facts. The trial court also refused to permit the defense to call the child's aunt to testify that the child had asked, What do I do if I'm lying? and said that she couldn't tell anyone about her lie because it had gone too far. Although the aunt testified that she and the child had been talking about her dad and the aunt believed the child was referring to lying about her dad, the trial court ruled that the defense had not made an adequate showing that the child's statement pertained to her molestation allegations against the defendant. In a 5-4 decision (on this issue), the Washington Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the child's statements were conditionally relevant under ER 104(b) only upon proof that the statements pertained to the molestation allegations.

The court states that the standard of proof under ER 104(b) is whether the evidence is sufficient to support a finding of the needed fact [Dixon, 147 P.3d at 997 (emphasis in opinion), quoting State v. Karpenski, 94 Wash. App. 80, 102, 971 P.2d 553 (1999)]. As noted in the concurring and dissenting opinions in Dixon, however, When the relevancy of evidence depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court shall admit it upon, or subject to, the introduction of evidence sufficient to support a finding of the condition. ER 104(b). In other words, the judge determines only whether a juror could reasonably find the preliminary fact [see The Law of Evidence in Washington § 104.04; see also Justice Sanders dissenting opinion, Dixon, 147 P.3d. at 1000 n.2 (could a reasonable jury conclude, from the evidence before them [the child's] question referred to Dixon's molestation charges)]. Under that standard, it would seem evident that a juror could reasonably find that the child in Dixon was referring to her lying about the molestation, given that her aunt testified she believed the child was talking about her dad, based on the context and surrounding circumstances. Therefore, Dixon should have been allowed to pursue this area of inquiry. The State could then have attempted to demonstrate that the earlier statement was not made or that it not refer to Dixon [Dixon, 147 P.3d. at 999 (Madsen, J., concurring)].

(3) Harmless Error Standard. The majority in Dixon (5 Justices) and the concurring judge hold that any error in refusing to admit the testimony regarding the child's prior inconsistent statements was harmless. According to the majority, the untainted evidence is so overwhelming it necessarily leads to a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt [Dixon, 147 P.3d. at 998, quoting State v. Easter, 130 Wn.2d 228, 242, 922 P.2d 1285 (1996)].

The dissenters believe that because the entire case rested upon the child's credibility, the refusal to permit testimony concerning her statement that she was lying and couldn't tell anyone about her lie because it had gone too far was not harmless error. Because criminal defendants have a constitutional right to impeach prosecution witnesses with prior statements that are inconsistent with the witness's trial testimony, reversal is required unless no rational jury could have a reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt absent the error [Dixon, 147 P.3d. at 1001].

Practical Import. Dixon is important for practitioners for several reasons. First, the Court confirms that a trial judge may refuse to admit a prior inconsistent statement, even one by the alleged victim in a criminal case, if the witness admits making the statement. Second, the Court relies heavily for support on the Task Force Comments, despite the fact that the Court deleted those Comments from the official version of the Evidence Rules in 2006. For that reason, practitioners would be well advised not to throw away the Comments, although it remains to be seen whether the Court will rely on -- or even permit citation to -- the Comments with respect to cases tried after September 1, 2006. Third, it is unclear whether Dixon has changed the standard for admission of conditionally relevant evidence under ER 104(b) and, if so, whether the new standard applies only in child abuse cases, criminal cases generally, or all cases.

For further analysis of the issues in Dixon, see The Law of Evidence in Washington §§ 103.053[a]--[c] (Reversible Error on Appeal); 104.04 (Conditional Relevancy); 613.04 (Prior Statements of Witnesses) (LexisNexis Matthew Bender).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Robert Aronson joined the University of Washington School of Law faculty in 1975. Prior to coming to UW, he was a Teaching Fellow at Stanford Law School, and taught Civil Procedure at the University of San Diego Law School while clerking for Judge James Carter of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. He is a nationally recognized expert in professional responsibility and his book, The Law of Evidence in Washington, is one of the leading treatises on the subject. He has served as Chair of The Association of American Law Schools (AALS) Section on Professional Responsibility, National Conference of Bar Examiners MPRE Drafting Committee, Commissioner on Uniform State Laws, Washington Legislative Ethics Board, AALS Committee on Bar Admission and Lawyer Performance, Law School Admission Council, Finance and Legal Affairs Committee, President of the Board of the Washington Appellate Defender Association, Reporter for the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers Standards of Conduct, and Hearing Tribunal Member for the Washington Human Rights Commission.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

56 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Leah A. Martin on Rocker v. KPMG LLP

2008 Emerging Issues 1216

Leah A. Martin on Rocker v. KPMG LLP

By Leah A. Martin

November 29, 2007

SUMMARY: It is often a substantial challenge (or impossibility) for plaintiffs to satisfy NRCP 9(b)s pleading-with-particularity requirement when the details of the fraudulent activity are uniquely within the knowledge of the defendants and/or third parties. The Nevada Supreme Court recently acknowledged this challenge, adopting a common sense approach as to the extent to which the details of fraudulent activity must be pled.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Nevada, it can be a substantial challenge (or impossibility) for plaintiffs to satisfy Nev. R.C.P. 9(b)s pleading-with-particularity requirement when the details of relevant fraudulent activity are uniquely within the knowledge of the defendants and/or third parties. The Nevada Supreme Court recently acknowledged this challenge, adopting a more common-sense approach as to the extent that details of fraudulent activity must be pled. Rocker v. KPMG LLP [122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703 (2006)], provides useful information whether counsel is attempting to (1) navigate the tricky waters of pleading fraud, or (2) identify shortfalls in the pleading of an opponent.

Pleading Requirements in Nevada--Generally. Nevada is a notice pleading jurisdiction, in which it is generally adequate for a pleader to set forth a short and plain statement showing that the pleader is entitled to relief [Nev. R.C.P. 8(a)]. However, the standards for pleading fraud are more stringent, requiring that in claims for fraud or mistake, the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake be particularly identified, while [m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of mind of a person may be averred generally [Nev. R.C.P. 9(b)]. Traditionally, to satisfy this rule, the plaintiff has been required to plead in detail all averments to the time, the place, the identity of the parties involved, and the nature of the fraud or mistake [Brown v. Kellar, 97 Nev. 582, 583584, 636 P.2d 874 (1981)]. Particularized pleading of fraud is necessary so that defendants can effectively defend against the alleged fraud, rather than being forced to simply deny wrongdoing [Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 708 (2006)] (citing Ivory Ranch v. Quinn River Ranch, 101 Nev. 471, 47273, 705 P.2d 673, 675 (1985); Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 671 (9th Cir. 1993); Semegen v. Weidner, 780 F.2d 727, 731 (9th Cir. 1985)). However, when Rocker v. KPMG LLP [122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 70810 (2006)] was issued in December 2006, the Nevada Supreme Court clarified that there may be circumstances when it is impracticable and therefore unnecessary to preliminarily plead every detail giving rise to a fraud cause of action.

When May Some Details of Fraud be Omitted? In Rocker, the Nevada Supreme Court adopted the looser pleading standard used by federal courts in cases when some or all of the circumstances constituting fraud are peculiarly within the defendants knowledge or possession [Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 709 (2006)].

Why Is More General Pleading Allowed in Such Circumstances? The Nevada Supreme Court recognizes in Rocker that in cases where plaintiffs lack understanding of the specifics giving rise to the fraud claim because such information is in the possession of the defendants, the plaintiffs face a catch-22. [T]hey are required to file a complaint to enable them to conduct discovery to ascertain the relevant information they need, but they cannot file a complaint with sufficient particularity because they do not know the information possessed by the defendants [Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 708 (2006)]. The relaxed pleading requirements are designed to avoid this dilemma and strike a balance when particularized pleading is not possible because the plaintiff cannot ascertain the relevant facts without formal discovery.

How to Avoid Dismissal for Failure to Plead Fraud With Particularity? Even in cases where the facts constituting fraud cannot be pled by the plaintiff because they are exclusively within the knowledge of the defendant (and possibly third persons), general pleading of fraud is still inadequate and would give rise to dismissal for failure to plead with particularity pursuant to Nev. R.C.P. 9(b). To withstand dismissal, the plaintiff must set forth the factual basis for his or her belief that a fraud has been committed [see Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 708 (2006) (citing Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 671 (9th Cir. 1993))]. Although not every circumstance may be known, the specific facts pled must give rise to a strong inference of fraud [see Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 709 (2006) (citing Wexner v. First Manhattan Co., 902 F.2d 169, 172 (2d Cir. 1990))]. The Nevada Supreme Court augments the relaxed federal standard by requiring that the plaintiff assert that the relaxed standard is appropriate and that more particularized pleading is not possible at that time because the relevant facts are uniquely in the possession of the defendant [see Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 709 (2006)].

What Then? On showing that more specific pleading of fraud is impossible, the plaintiff should be permitted to conduct discovery necessary to identify the facts constituting fraud [see Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 710 (2006)]. Following discovery, the plaintiff should move to amend the complaint to plead the fraud claims with particularity in conformance with NRCP 9(b). At that point, the defendant may renew the NRCP 9(b) motion to dismiss [see Rocker v. KPMG LLP, 122 Nev. Adv. Op. 101, 148 P.3d 703, 710 (2006)].

The Bottom Line. The lesson to be learned from Rocker is that the pleading requirements of Nev. R.C.P. 9(b) are not set in stone. The Nevada judiciary recognizes that there are times when the who, what, when, where, and why of the case may not be readily apparent at the outset of litigation. A defendant who effectively conceals the details of fraudulent activity will no longer be allowed to avoid liability.

In light of the Nevada Supreme Courts holding in Rocker, a plaintiff wishing to state a claim for fraud should continue to identify as many of the particulars constituting fraud as possible, specify the facts that are unknown to the plaintiff at that time and why they are unknown, and assert that the plaintiff is entitled to take discovery to identify the missing facts. The particularized pleading requirements of Nev. R.C.P. 9(b) have not changed; Rocker merely gives plaintiffs an opportunity to identify the particulars. Best practice dictates that discovery as to the fraud claim be propounded at the earliest possible juncture. The cautious practitioner must be careful to demonstrate all efforts to obtain the necessary information, and timely seek leave to amend the complaint when the relevant facts come to light. Likewise, if it becomes apparent during discovery that the facts do not give rise to a claim for fraud, plaintiffs counsel should seek voluntary dismissal of the claim to avoid litigation sanctions and professional discipline.

Although Rocker may not calm the choppy waters of fraud pleading, it provides useful insight on how to effectively navigate those waters. Care should be used at all times to follow the guidelines set forth in Rocker. If practitioners become lackadaisical in the manner in which they plead fraud, their claims will undoubtedly be dismissed.

For additional general information on the Nevada pleading requirements, see Nevada Civil Practice Manual, Ch. 8, Pleadings, Amendments to Pleadings, and Supplemental Pleadings, § 8.03 (Matthew Bender).

For additional information on the pleading requirements for fraud, see Nevada Civil Practice Manual, Ch. 8, Pleadings, Amendments to Pleadings, and Supplemental Pleadings, § 8.07 (Matthew Bender).

For jury instructions related to fraud, see Nevada Pattern Jury Instructions--Civil, 9.009.08 (Matthew Bender).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Leah A. Martin is an associate with Bailey Kennedy in Las Vegas, Nevada. Ms. Martin attended the University of Nevada, Las Vegas, receiving her J.D. summa cum laude 2002; B.A., Political Science summa cum laude 1999; and B.A., Environmental Studies summa cum laude 1999. Ms. Martin was the recipient of the William S. Boyd Outstanding Graduate Award at the William S. Boyd School of Law. Ms. Martin served as Editor-in-Chief of the Nevada Law Journal, and served as judicial extern to the Honorable Phillip M. Pro of the United States District Court for the District of Nevada. Before joining Bailey Kennedy in 2006, Ms. Martin was an associate at Nevada's largest law firm from 2002 to 2006.

Since 2003, Ms. Martin has served as an associate editor for the State Bar of Nevada CLE Publications Committee on the Nevada Civil Practice Manual, published by Matthew Bender. Beginning in 2006, Ms. Martin has assisted in teaching Nevada Civil Practice at the William S. Boyd School of Law. Ms. Martin practices in the area of civil litigation. She has substantial experience in the areas of products liability, wrongful death, complex commercial litigation, class actions, dissenting shareholders' rights, and appellate advocacy. Bailey Kennedy represents, among others, healthcare facilities, publicly traded corporations, gaming companies, financial institutions, travel and tourism leaders, public entities, real estate developers, sports and entertainment concerns, and entrepreneurs.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

57 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Vairo on Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's London v. Argonaut Ins. Co.

2008 Emerging Issues 1198

Vairo on Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's London v. Argonaut Ins. Co.

By Georgene Vairo

November 29, 2007

SUMMARY: In the Argonaut decision, the Seventh Circuit interpreted several issues of an arbitration agreement under the United Nations Convention on Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards. The main issue in the case was whether federal common law applies when interpreting the terms of an arbitration agreement under this Convention. This Emerging Issues Analysis focuses on the applicability of federal common law.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: HIF Bio, Inc. v. Yung Shin Pharms. Indus. Co., -- F.3d --, 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 26329 (Fed. Cir. Nov. 13, 2007), involves the question whether 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) precludes appellate review of a decision to remand state law claims supported by supplemental jurisdiction. This is a significant issue that is dividing the courts of appeals. As a matter of first impression for the circuit, the Federal Circuit parted ways with a number of its sister circuits by holding that a remand based on the district court's decision to decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction is not reviewable on appeal.

Procedural Facts. HIF Bio involved a novel anti-angiogenic, anti-cancer application discovered by two Korean scientists. Two companies that obtained the rights to license the application sued a number of individuals and other companies alleging causes of action for violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) [18 U.S.C. §§ 1961 -1968], violations of rights and ownership of invention, slander of title, conversion, fraud, intentional and negligent interference with contractual relations and prospective economic advantage, breach of implied contract, unfair competition and fraudulent business practices, and unjust enrichment-constructive trust. The district court dismissed the RICO claim for failure to adequately allege a pattern of racketeering. The district court found that the rights and ownership of invention claims were state-law claims lacking an independent federal jurisdiction basis. Under the supplemental jurisdiction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c), the court then declined supplemental jurisdiction over all state-law claims because the preponderance of state law issues means that a state court is the proper venue to try the state law claims" and remanded the case to state court. The Federal Circuit dismissed the appeal, holding that it did not have appellate jurisdiction.

Review of Remand Decision Basics. 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) provides that [a]n order remanding a case to the State court from which it was removed is not reviewable on appeal or otherwise." However, the Supreme Court has limited the scope of § 1447(d)'s non-reviewability principle. For example, in Thermtron Products, Inc. v. Hermansdorfer, 423

U.S. 336, 345-346, 96 S. Ct. 584, 46 L. Ed. 2d 542 (1976), the Court reasoned that § 1447(d) must be read in pari materia with, and thus be limited by the grounds enumerated in, 28 U.S.C. § 1447(c). Section 1447(c) requires that a motion to remand based on "any defect other than a lack of subject matter jurisdiction" be made within 30 days, and also requires the district court to remand if at any time before entry of final judgment it appears that the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction. In Quackenbush v. Allstate Ins. Co., 517 U.S. 706, 116 S. Ct. 1712, 135 L. Ed. 2d 1 (1996), the Supreme Court thus clarified that § 1447(d) bars appellate review only if the remand decision is based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction or a defect in the removal process. Accordingly, as in Thermtron, a remand decision based on an overly crowded docket was reviewable; and, as in Quackenbush, a remand decision based on abstention was reviewable.

So far, so good. If the remand decision is based on a defect in the removal process, which was not in issue in the HIF Bio case, or a lack of subject matter jurisdiction, § 1447(d) bars a review of a remand decision. If the remand decision is based on any other ground, § 1447(d) does not bar appellate review of the remand decision. Only one problem: Determining whether a remand decision is based on a lack of jurisdiction. That is the problem raised by HIF Bio.

Reviewability of Remand of Supplemental Claims. When a district court remands claims supported by supplemental jurisdiction because it is declining to exercise such jurisdiction, is the remand based on a lack of subject matter jurisdiction, which would bar appellate review of the decision? Most courts of appeals that have examined this question have ruled that 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) does not act as a bar. Indeed, the Federal Circuit noted the Third Circuit opinion in Trans Penn Wax Corp. v. McCandless, 50 F.3d 217, 223-224 (3d Cir. 1995), which so held, and cited the precedents from the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits which agreed. These decisions were primarily based on a footnote in Carnegie-Mellon Univ. v. Cohill stating that [Section] 1447(c) . . . do[es] not apply to cases over which a federal court has pendent jurisdiction," 484 U.S. 343, 355 n. 11, 108 S. Ct. 614, 98 L. Ed. 2d 720 (1988). The circuits reasoned that if § 1447(c) does not apply to cases over which a federal court has pendent jurisdiction, a remand order based on declining supplemental jurisdiction also is not within the class of remands described in § 1447(c) and, therefore, is not subject to the bar on review in § 1447(d).

The law here was clear -- a remand based on a declination of supplemental jurisdiction was not barred by § 1447(d). This approach made sense. Assuming, as the claims in HIF Bio were, that the state law claims were so related to the federal claims asserted in the case that they would be supported by supplemental jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a), the district court unquestionably had subject matter jurisdiction over those state law claims. The only relevant question then, would be whether the district court would decide whether to exercise such jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c) provides that a district court "may" decline to exercise supplemental jurisdiction under certain circumstances. With all the circuits having weighed in on this issue, why would the Federal Circuit rule that § 1447(d) did bar review of remands based on § 1367(c)?

Supreme Court Raises Doubts. The Federal Circuit questioned the other circuits' reliance on the Cohill footnote because of more recent statements by the Supreme Court. In particular, the Federal Circuit noted the Court's statement in Powerex Corp. v. Reliant Energy Servs., Inc., 127 S. Ct. 2411, 168 L. Ed. 2d 112 (2007): It is far from clear . . . that when discretionary supplemental jurisdiction is declined the remand is not based on lack of subject-matter jurisdiction for purposes of § 1447(c) and § 1447(d)." What Powerex adds to the supplemental jurisdiction issue is its holding that a remand order is unreviewable if it can be colorably characterized" as a remand based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction.

Federal Circuit Bars Review of Remands Based on Declination of Supplemental Jurisdiction. The Federal Circuit distinguished remands based on abstention, which are reviewable under Quackenbush, from remands based on declining supplemental jurisdiction. The court acknowledged that the considerations underlying abstention may in some cases be similar to those enumerated for declining supplemental jurisdiction under § 1367, and both are discretionary doctrines that allow a district court to decline jurisdiction. However, the court reasoned that the two types of remands are fundamentally different in that a court abstains from hearing claims over which it has an independent basis for subject matter jurisdiction, such as federal question or diversity jurisdiction, while a court declines to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over a claim for which it has no independent basis for subject matter jurisdiction, i.e., state claims. Thus, declining supplemental jurisdiction strips the claims of the only basis on which the district court had jurisdiction. Without the cloak of supplemental jurisdiction," state claims must be remanded for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The court concluded that because every § 1367(c) remand necessarily involves a predicate finding that the claims at issue lack an independent basis of subject matter jurisdiction, the remand can be colorably characterized as a remand based on lack of subject matter jurisdiction, and thus is within the class of remands described in § 1447(c) and for which appellate review is barred by § 1447(d).

Conclusion. The Federal Circuit decision is significant because it went against the grain of every previous court of appeals decision on the question whether remand decisions based on a declination of supplemental jurisdiction are reviewable. To the extent that Powerex can be read as reinvigorating the essence of 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d), and specifically Congress' goal of putting the reviewability of remand decision off-limits, the Federal Circuit may well result in other courts of appeals rethinking their approach. On the other hand, the Federal Circuit's approach seems to be contradicted by Powerex itself: That case unquestionably turned on whether or not the district court had the power to exercise jurisdiction, not whether it had discretion to decline to exercise that jurisdiction. Thus, Powerex is simply a case about whether the district court got the existence of subject matter jurisdiction question right -- a case involving precisely the type of potential appellate second guessing that Congress sought to thwart by enacting § 1447(d). Accordingly, the better reading of Powerex is that decisions to remand based on 28 U.S.C. § 1367(c) remain outside the 28 U.S.C. § 1447(d) bar.

References: 16-107 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 107.44 [2][d]; 19-202 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 202.11[5], 19-205 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 205.08[1]

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporation's Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs various national and local associations and institutes.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

58 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ogden on Alcoholic Beverage Control v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Bd.

2008 Emerging Issues 1203

Professor Gregory Ogden on Alcoholic Beverage Control v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board

By Gregory L. Ogden

November 29, 2007

SUMMARY: This Emerging Issues Analysis analyzes the Courts ban on ex parte communications where the department prosecutor prepared a hearing report after the hearing and issuance of a proposed decision by the Administrative Law Judge and then submitting that report to the chief counsel of the Department before a final decision was reached by the director of the Department in that case.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: California Third District Court of Appeal Enforces Ex Parte Communications Ban in California APA

Background. In Chevron Stations Inc. v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (2007) 149 Cal. App. 4th 116, 57 Cal. Rptr. 3d 6, the California Court of Appeal for the Third District holds the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control violated provisions of the California Administrative Procedures Act (APA) [see Gov. Code § 11430.10] because the Department prosecutor sent an ex parte communication (prosecutor's hearing report) to the department decision maker prior to the time the decision maker decided whether or not to adopt the proposed decision of the administrative law judge. The Court of Appeal relied on the decision of the California Supreme Court in the Quintenar case [Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (2006) 40 Cal. 4th 1, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 585, 145 P.3d 462]. In Quintenar, the California Supreme Court held that the Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control violated the ex parte communications provisions of the California Administrative Procedures Act by following the practice of having the department prosecutor prepare a hearing report after the hearing and issuance of a proposed decision by the Administrative Law Judge and then submitting that report to the chief counsel of the Department before a final decision was reached by the director of the Department in that case [see Quintenar for an expert commentary on that decision].

In Chevron, The Third District Court of Appeal holds that the ex parte communication violated the California Administrative Procedures Act even though the Department adopted the proposed decision of the administrative law judge. The Court of Appeal also holds that the licensee established a prima facie case of a violation of the ex parte communications prohibition of Gov. Code §§ 11430.10 to 11430.70. Once that showing was made, the Department had the burden of proof to justify the department's practices under the APA, and the department failed to meet that burden of proof before the Board. The court rejected the department's efforts to make this showing for the first time on appeal. A first showing on appeal violates exhaustion of administrative remedies requirements, as well as the requirement that the appellate court review the agency decision based on the administrative record before the agency decision maker.

Purposes Under The California APA for Banning Ex Parte Communications Provisions. The ban on ex parte communications under the California Administrative Procedure Act applies to pending adjudicative proceedings under the APA and prohibits communications, direct or indirect, regarding any issue in the proceeding, to the presiding officer from insiders (employees or representatives of an agency that is a party to the proceeding) or outsiders (an interested person outside the agency) without notice and opportunity for all parties to participate in the communication [Gov. Code § 11430.10(a)]. The ban does not apply to communications made on the record at the hearing [Gov. Code § 11430.10(b)]. The ban starts either from the issuance of the agency's pleading, or from an application for an agency decisions, whichever is earlier [Gov. Code § 11430.10(c)].

There are several purposes to ex parte communication bans, including the requirement that the decision in the pending case be based exclusively on the record in the agency proceeding [Gov. Code § 11425.10(a)(6) (agency adjudicative decision must be based on the record), Gov. Code § 11425.50(c) (factual basis for decision must be based exclusively on the evidence in the record, or officially noticed facts)]. Without the ban, ex parte communications could influence the presiding officer but not be placed in the record of the proceeding.

Second, the ban ensures that adversary communications are made in circumstances that allow the opposing advocate to hear and respond to the communication, and to rebut the substance of the communication in front of the presiding officer [Matthew Zaheri Corp. v. New Motor Vehicle Bd (1997) 55 Cal. App. 4th 1305, 64 Cal. Rptr. 2d 705 (ex parte communications to ALJ related to fear for safety of counsel should have been disclosed but did not justify reversal)].

Third, in administrative law proceedings, it is common for agencies to communicate with those parties regulated by the agency in the rulemaking setting, and this ban on interested outsider communications makes clear that such communications are improper in administrative adjudications.

Fourth, the ban on insider ex parte communications helps to enforce an internal separation of functions requirements [Gov. Code § 11425.10(a)(4) (agency adjudicative functions separated from advocacy, prosecution, and investigative function); Gov. Code § 11425.30 (presiding officers can not adjudicate in agency proceedings if they have served in advocacy, investigative, or prosecutorial roles in the same matter, or they are subject to supervision of an agency employee with those responsibilities); Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (2006) 40 Cal. 4th 1, 4-6, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 585, 145 P. 3d 462]. The purpose of internal separation of functions is to protect the impartiality of the agency adjudication process so that advocates, who often work for the same agency as the ALJ, do not unfairly influence the outcome of the agency proceeding, or do not get a second chance at influencing the agency decision maker [see also Rondon v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (2007) 151 Cal. App. 4th 1274, 60 Cal. Rptr. 3d 295 (prosecutor's ex parte report of hearing sent to department decision maker violated APA ban on ex parte communications; department decision reversed, no showing of prejudice required to justify reversal on the merits of the decision)].

Import of Chevron Decision. The Chevron decision is one of three recent California court opinions deciding ex parte communications questions under the California APA [for expert commentary on these related cases, see Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (2006) 40 Cal. 4th 1, 50 Cal. Rptr. 3d 585, 145 P. 3d 462; Rondon v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Appeals Board (2007) 151 Cal. App. 4th 1274, 60 Cal. Rptr. 3d 295].

The Chevron decision is important because it clarified three questions in ex parte communications challenges under the California APA.

First, the ex parte communication violated the California APA regardless of whether the department decision maker rejected or adopted the proposed decision of the administrative law judge. Essentially, what this means is that the challenger does not have to show prejudice from the violation to win on appeal, and the normal rule in appellate practice of harmless error [see FRCP Rule 61 (harmless error)] does not apply to ex parte communications violations. The usual appellate rule is that an appealing party has to show prejudice from a legal error to convince the appellate court to reverse the judgment or decision of the trial court or agency whose action is being appealed. Requiring proof of prejudice caused by legal error makes it more difficult for an appealing party to obtain a reversal of the trial court judgment or agency. Conversely, if the appellant does not have to show prejudice, then it is much easier to obtain a reversal in the same circumstances.

Second, once the challenger established a prima facie case of an APA ex parte communications violation, then the burden of proof shifted to the agency decision maker to show that there was no ex parte communications violation. The Department was unable to make that type of showing in this case. This is significant because it is uncommon in appellate practice for burden of proof requirements to shift from the appealing party (the challenger licensee in this case) to the responding party. It is even less common in administrative law appeals based on an agency administrative record when the responding party is the agency decision maker. Burden of proof shifting is much more common in trial court or equivalent agency process in which the rules of evidence permit the use of presumptions, allow prima facie case showings, and permit burden shifting. An agency that is subject to burden shifting in similar circumstances would have to anticipate this issue in time to get the rebuttal information into the administrative record, which did not happen in this case.

Third, the agency decision maker could not offer rebuttal evidence for the first time on judicial review because appellate review of the decision is limited to material that was part of the administrative record before the Board, and this evidence was not submitted to the board, and was not included in the administrative record. The requirement of a decision on the record is a procedural safeguard, and the requirement that the evidence be presented at the leave of Board review is designed to satisfy exhaustion of administrative remedies requirements, that the Board be given the opportunity to consider this evidence, and make a ruling on the issue. This would have given the Board the opportunity to correct a mistake, and make a ruling that might have avoided the need for an appeal.

Scope of Ex Parte Communication Ban and Remedies. The ban on ex parte communications under the California APA applies not only to presiding officers, but also to agency heads, who are decision makers [Gov. Code § 11430.70(a)]. The ban does not apply to certain types of communications [Gov. Code §§ 11430.20, 11430.30]. These include ex parte matters authorized by statute [Gov. Code § 11430.20(a)], procedure or practice matters, including continuances, that are not in controversy [Gov. Code § 11430.20(b)], technical assistance or advice given to the presiding officer by agency staff that has not participated in the proceeding as an advocate, investigator, or prosecutor [Gov. Code § 11430.30(a)], and communications to the presiding officer related to settlement proposals [Gov. Code § 11430.30(b)]. Remedies for violations include disclosure on the record by the presiding officer of the substance of the ex parte communication [Gov. Code § 11430.50], disqualification of the presiding officer [Gov. Code § 11430.60], and as noted in the California Supreme court decision, above, another remedy can be reversal of the agency decision on the merits.

For further discussion of the prohibition of ex parte communications in public administrative actions, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice § 473.28.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Gregory L. Ogden is a professor of law at Pepperdine University where he has taught since 1978. He teaches administrative law, civil procedure, professional responsibility, and remedies. He is a graduate of UCLA, (BA, cum laude) UC Davis school of Law (JD, Law Review Editor), and he has two LLM's, one from Temple University in legal education, and one from Columbia University in administrative law. He has been an administrative law consultant to the Administrative Conference of the United States, and to the California Law Revision Commission. He has taught administrative law for over 25 years, and was the principal author of California Public Agency Practice, (three volumes, Matthew, Bender & Co., Inc. 1989), and California Public Administrative Law (two volumes in California Forms of Pleading and Practice, (LexisNexis Matthew Bender), the leading treatise on California administrative law. In fall 2005, he completed a major revision of a State Administrative Law in California chapter (200 pages) for a multi volume treatise on California Environmental Law and Land Use Practice (LexisNexis Matthew Bender). He has authored several articles in the administrative law field, including most recently the following article in the Journal of the NAALJ: Ogden, Gregory L., "The Role of Demeanor Evidence in Determining Credibility of Witnesses in Fact Finding: The Views of ALJ's," 20 Journal of NAALJ 1 (2000). Professor Ogden was the 1999 NAALJ Fellowship recipient, and he presented his fellowship paper on demeanor evidence at the 1999 NAALJ Conference in Asheville, North Carolina.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

59 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Mike Wilson on Suter v. Mazyck, 226 S.W.3d 837 (Ky. App. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1166

Mike Wilson on Suter v. Mazyck, 226 S.W.3d 837 (Ky. App. 2007)

By Mike Wilson

November 28, 2007

SUMMARY: Summary judgment is appropriate when there is no material issue of fact. But unless there has been an opportunity for discovery, the nonmoving party may be unable to present controvertible evidence because there has not been a chance to discover and develop such evidence. The Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in Suter v. Mazyck, 226 S.W.3d 837 (Ky. App. 2007), explains why summary judgment should not be used to short-circuit full development of a case. This commentary, written by Mike Wilson, discusses the implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Analysis. In Davis, a homeowner sued a builder and a subcontractor claiming personal injuries related to mold exposure and alleging construction defects, fraud and negligence. The trial court allowed three peremptory challenges to each of the defendants. The homeowner argued that because the defendants engaged in common defense efforts, their interests were not antagonistic and therefore they were not entitled to separate preemptory challenges.

Davis, quoting Sommerkamp v. Linton, 114 S.W.3d 811 (Ky. 2003), listed factors to be considered in determining if co-parties have antagonistic interests. One factor is whether the co-parties have filed cross-claims. In Davis, the defendants had not filed cross-claims but nonetheless had antagonistic interests in the courts view. The court noted that the complaint charged separate acts of negligence, that the defendants had separate, independent counsel, and that each defendant had a different strategy for the case. Davis states that all factors identified in Sommerkamp are to be given due weight as the existence or absence of a single factor is insufficient to make a determination as to the reasonableness of [finding that interests are antagonistic]. Each factor must be weighed in the balance with the others. 231 S.W.3d at 773-4.

However, a few paragraphs later, relying upon the Sommerkamp, Davis also held that co-defendants interests are inherently antagonistic when apportionment applies, as it did in Davis. A question raised, then, is whether apportionment of fault, by itself, is sufficient to constitute antagonistic interests or is just one factor to weigh along with others.

Cases holding that no particular factor is necessary. Roberts v. Taylor, Ky., 339 S.W.2d 653 (1960) held that if defendants in a personal injury action are charged with independent acts of negligence, the interests of the defendants are most always antagonistic. The assertion of cross-claims merely formalizes the antagonism, but is not necessary for a finding that interests are antagonistic.

Co-defendants who share a theory of the case may not have antagonistic interests. In Davenport v. Ephraim McDowell Meml Hosp., Inc. 769 S.W.2d 56 (Ky.App. 1988), a medical malpractice case against an anesthesiologist, hospital, and others, not only were no cross-claims filed, the co-defendants shared the same theory of the case. The Court of Appeals found the co-defendants interests were not antagonistic.

Sommerkamp v. Linton, 114 S.W.3d 811 (Ky. 2003), citing Roberts and Davenport, identified three elements to consider in determining if interests are antagonistic: 1) whether the co-parties are charged with separate acts of negligence; 2) whether they share a common theory of the case; and 3) whether cross-claims are filed. Sommerkamp also identified as relevant whether the defendants are represented by separate counsel, whether the alleged acts of negligence occurred at different times, whether the defendants have individual theories of defense, and whether fault will be subject to apportionment. 114 S.W.3d at p. 816 states that [a]ll of these factors are to be weighed by the trial court in determining if the defendants have antagonistic interests and thus are entitled to separate peremptory challenges. Davis quotes Sommerkamp on all of these points.

Is apportionment alone sufficient to demonstrate antagonistic interests? Sommerkamp also noted, however, that prior to the adoption of comparative negligence, and the enactment of Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182, a defendant was required to cross-claim for contribution against joint tortfeasors pursuant to Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 412.030 or Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 454.040. The adoption of Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182, said the court, dispensed with the need for cross-claims:

Contemporary apportionment requirements including Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 provide that fault in a tort action is automatically subject to apportionment among the parties to the action. This statute renders a cross-claim for contribution, as well as a counterclaim for contributory or comparative negligence, needless. Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 deems codefendants that are charged with separate acts of negligence to be antagonistic because it requires apportionment of the total liability.

Sommerkamp, p. 817. How does adoption of Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 affect the question of antagonistic interests in a case like Davenport, where defendants share a theory of the case? Sommerkamp states at page 816 that

The [apportionment] system is inherently antagonistic because it requires codefendants to attempt to shift responsibility to each other. The Court of Appeals failed to consider the role of apportionment and the clear antagonism which is created by that method of assessing liability. . . [R]eliance on Davenport was misplaced. That case was decided prior to the adoption of the apportionment statute, Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182.

Similarly, Davis, p. 774, says [t]he system of apportionment is inherently antagonistic.

Though neither Sommerkamp nor Davis expressly says so, the language in Sommerkamp and Davis could be argued to mean that apportionment is sufficient to create antagonistic interests without weighing other factors. If there is antagonism, Sommerkamp says, the clear language of rule [47.03] does not require the defendants to demonstrate a certain degree of antagonism, but only the existence of antagonism between the [parties] at the time of jury selection, in order to permit separate peremptory challenges. Sommerkamp, p. 816.

Practice Tips. Language in Sommerkamp and Davis can be used to make contrary arguments -- Athat apportionment alone is sufficient to permit separate peremptory challenges, and that apportionment is just one factor to be weighed.

Illustrative examples:

Argument that apportionment is sufficient to create antagonistic interests. Apportionment alone is sufficient to create antagonistic interests because Sommerkamp says that Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 411.182 deems codefendants that are charged with separate acts of negligence to be antagonistic because the statute requires apportionment of the total liability. Other factors, therefore, do not matter because if there is antagonism, whatever the degree, separate peremptory challenges are permitted under Sommerkamp. Both Sommerkamp and Davis hold that apportionment is inherently antagonistic.

Argument that apportionment is just a factor to be weighed. Both Sommerkamp and Davis, after listing factors, including whether fault is to be apportioned, state that all factors should be given due weight. Neither case expressly states that apportionment is sufficient to require separate peremptory challenges without weighing other factors. Both cases make a point of examining facts, other than apportionment, that show interests are antagonistic, which would be unnecessary if apportionment alone were sufficient to determine the issue. Also, Davis expressly states that the existence or absence of a single factor is insufficient to make a determination.

Cross-References to Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book. Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 19.14, Admonition to Jury; Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book § 130.00, Practice Context for Negligence; Caldwell's Kentucky Form Book Form 130.10, Answer Asserting Assorted Defenses

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Mike Wilson, J.D., University of Kentucky, has been a practicing attorney since 1980. He is a contributor to Caldwell's Kentucky Legal Forms, 5th Ed , Lexis-Nexis, 2006, teaches law to paralegals at Sullivan University, Lexington, Kentucky, and has prepared instructional material for numerous continuing legal education seminars for paralegals. He also is an administrative law judge for the Kentucky Department of Education.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

60 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Confidentiality Implications of the UT Uniform Mediation Act for Mediation

2008 Emerging Issues 1190

Tamara A. Fackrell on the Confidentiality Implications of the Utah Uniform Mediation Act for Mediation

By Tamara A. Fackrell

November 28, 2007

SUMMARY: Confidentiality mandated by the Utah Uniform Mediation Act can place parties and attorneys in a quandary unless they carefully consider the consequences of attorneys presence in mediation and in drafting mediation agreements. This Emerging Issues Analysis discusses practical suggestions to avoid common pitfalls and learn recommended procedures to make informed decisions regarding drafting agreements in mediation.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Setting the Scene. Bob and Cindy have engaged in a frenzied court battle for four years. While they were waiting in the lobby for mediation, the tension was so strong it was almost visible. Yet after the opening statement and a cooperative beginning, the parties began to let down their guard, work together, and emerge with a resolution. The attorneys were by their clients' sides, providing options, advising on the law, and encouraging the clients. The mediator was able to perform magic as the barriers of a four-year legal battle fell, resulting in a 10-page memorandum of understanding. But what if the mediation is agreed to orally but not signed or drafted in the mediation? Is the agreement binding? Is the communication in the mediation confidential? How can attorneys make binding agreements while also avoiding potential future controversy in court?

Mediation is most simply defined as a facilitated negotiation. Utah Code of Judicial Administration Rule 4-510, Utah Ethical Guidelines Rule 104, and Utah Code Annotated Section 78-31c-101 et seq. (new in 2006, known as the Utah Uniform Mediation Act) all govern alternative dispute resolution.

Confidentiality Under the Utah Uniform Mediation Act. The Utah Uniform Mediation Act (UUMA) was enacted effective May 1, 2006, with Utah the eighth state to adopt the Uniform Mediation Act. Confidentiality is of utmost concern to mediators and parties so as to ensure an open and candid mediation process. The mediation is treated as a confidential communication, in which the mediators, parties, attorneys, or third-parties involved cannot testify in future court proceedings regarding the mediation [see Utah Code Ann. §§ 78-31c-108, 78-31b-8(4), (5) (2006); Utah Rules Alt. Disp. Res. Rule 103; Utah Code Jud. Admin. Rule 4-510]. Before enactment of the UUMA, in Lyons v. Booker [982 P.2d 1142 (Utah App. 1999)], the Utah Court of Appeals had held that confidentiality of the mediation process is essential for mediation to function properly, and held that no party to the mediation could disclose any comments or information acquired during mediation or in mediation-related discussions.

The definition of mediation is vast, and includes "conduct or a statement, whether oral, in a record, verbal, or nonverbal, that occurs during a mediation or is made for purposes of considering, conducting, participating in, initiating, continuing, or reconvening a mediation or retaining a mediator" [Utah Code Ann. § 78-31c-102(2) (2006)]. Thus, confidentiality extends to discussions that occur in preparation for mediation, during mediation, and after mediation regarding the case.

Exceptions to Confidentiality. The privilege of confidentiality can be waived if all parties involved, including the mediator agree to waive confidentiality, if a person makes a representation about mediation that prejudices another person but only to the extent for the person to respond to the representation, or if mediation was used to commit or conceal criminal activity [Utah Code Ann. § 78-31c-105 (2006)].

The UUMA also provides for a confidentiality exception "in an agreement evidenced by a record signed by all parties to the agreement" [Utah Code Ann. § 78-31c-106(1)(a) (2006)]. Therefore, if all parties sign the agreement, it is not held confidential. Further, the UUMA provides that there is no privilege of confidentiality if (1) the proceeding is available under public meeting laws to the public, (2) there is a threat of physical harm, (3) it used in a crime of violence, or (4) needed in a claim for professional mediator malpractice [Utah Code Ann. § 78-31c-106(1)(b)-(e) (2006)]. The UUMA also waives confidentiality if "there is a need for the evidence that substantially outweighs the interest in protecting confidentiality" [Utah Code Ann. § 78-31c-106(2)(b) (2006)].

Preparing Clients Before the Mediation. How can attorneys preserve confidentiality in the mediation process, yet reach workable agreements? Clients who are well prepared for mediation seem to more easily come to agreements, saving time and money. Some mediators will send a mediation mapping sheet for the parties to consider all of the issues involved, solutions to the issues, and alternatives to settlement. Mapping is most effective when each party will also consider the other side's positions, interests, and options put on the table in mediation. Attorneys should consistently use a form of mapping sheet they find effective. This will help prepare the parties for a reasonable bargaining range and collaborative options within the mediation. Preparation before mediation will set expectations for the party and will allow the mediation process to be productive.

Attorneys who give realistic settlement options before mediation help their clients significantly. Attorneys who tell their clients that their case is a "slam dunk" tend to create clients who are unwilling to make concessions, frustrating the process. A bargaining range that explores best- and worst-case scenarios is best in gauging mediation expectations for the parties.

Helpful Questions to Ask Before the Mediation. It is appropriate and recommended that attorneys coordinate with the mediator before the mediation about expectations in the case. This is essential for confidentiality, especially regarding communication before mediation and the mediation agreement. The following questions may be helpful:

1. Will the mediation have attorneys present?
2. Will the attorneys submit memoranda about issues in the case before the mediation?
3. If attorney memoranda will be provided, will the attorneys drafting them for the other side, or will they be confidential and just for the mediator?
4. Will the process be attorney-driven or party-driven?
5. Will the agreement be drafted during the mediation process?
6. Will the attorneys or the mediator draft the agreement?
7. If the mediator will draft the agreement, can he or she send "standard clauses" (i.e., payment of attorney's fees, future disputes, dispute resolution clauses) to the attorneys before the mediation so they can review them with the clients?

8. If the agreement will be drafted after the mediation, should a short agreement outlining the future agreement be signed at the mediation?

9. If the attorneys will not be present at the mediation, should the parties sign the agreement?

10. If the attorneys will not be present at the mediation should they be available for a phone conference before any signatures?

Should Attorneys Be Present at the Mediation? Some clients choose to go to mediation without their attorneys because of the increased cost. If the parties sign the agreement in the mediation, but have not conferred with their attorneys, is the agreement binding or is the conference confidential? The UUMA arguably supports that the agreement is binding whether or not parties were able to talk to their attorneys, contemplating "an agreement evidenced by a record signed by all parties to the agreement" [Utah Code Ann. § 78-31c-106(1)(a) (2006)]. Therefore, it is advisable for attorneys to proceed with caution and take preparatory steps as described above if they will not attend the mediation.

Most mediators do different types of mediation forums. Sometimes there will be attorneys, other times only the parties will be present. The genre of the case is important in considering whether attorneys will be present, as well as the conflict-resolution styles of the parties. Parties who are less assertive generally do better with their attorneys present. Best practice dictates that the attorneys should either both attend or both not attend, although occasionally there is a good reason to have only one party's attorney attend.

Suggestions to Avoid Having Unsigned Agreement Protected by Confidentiality of UUMA. Many mediators prefer that the attorneys be present in the mediation. The mediation process can then be either a party-driven process with the parties performing most of the negotiation, or an attorney-driven process with the attorneys in charge. In the party-driven process, attorneys can be helpful in offering options, creating "soft reality checks," and advising clients on their legal rights. Attorneys should be respectful of the other party, and refrain from name-calling and excessive haranguing. If the agreement is signed with the parties and attorneys present, there will be little dispute as to the binding nature of the agreement.

However, if there is no signature in the mediation, the confidentiality dilemma arises [see Utah Code Ann. § 78-31c-106(1)(a) (2006)]. One option includes having the parties sign a short agreement during the mediation with the main agreed points, then having the mediator or attorney draft a formal agreement after the mediation. If the agreement is not signed during the mediation, there is the potential for it to crumble under uncertainty afterward. This is a risk attorneys should discuss with their clients. Sometimes it is best to sign the agreement in the mediation; other times it may be best to give the client time to think about the agreement before signing it. If the agreement is not signed in mediation, there is a possibility for future negotiation and also future deadlock, and the potential agreement may become ensnared in the UUMA confidentiality clause.

If the attorneys are not present at the mediation, counsel should be available for a short phone conference afterward to advise the client before signing the documents. Counsel also may advise the mediator that they would like to review the final documentation before it becomes binding. Most mediators will be flexible and adapt the process given the attorneys' input. Mediators can also begin with the parties and have the attorneys enter the process later at an appropriate time. This can save the client money but ensure the parties have counsels' advice as they make important mediation decisions.

These practical suggestions should help to circumvent the effect of possible confidentiality on potential, yet unsigned, mediated agreements. Attorneys should consider whether they will attend the mediation process and whether the mediation agreement will be signed in the mediation or later, after further consideration. Failure to consider these implications in preparation for mediation can have dire consequences.

For discussion of alternative dispute resolution in Utah, including mediation, see Utah Civil Practice, Ch. 1, Overview of Utah's Legal System, § § 1.08 [13] (Matthew Bender).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Tamara A. Fackrell is a Utah attorney mediator. She graduated cum laude from BYU Law School and is part-time faculty at the Law School teaching mediation. She received the Phi Alpha Delta Professor of the Year Award in 2006, and supervises four mediation undergraduate classes at BYU in Marriage Family Human Development, Social Work, Pre-Law, and Psychology. She received a bachelor's degree at BYU magna cum laude in psychology with a minor in communications, and helped start the mediation program at Utah Valley State College.

Ms. Fackrell has had a private mediation practice focusing on divorce and domestic mediation since 1997. She helped initiate the Victim Offender Mediation Program in the Fourth District Juvenile Court and the Provo School District Truancy Program. She is a Master Mediator and Primary Trainer for the State of Utah and performs certifications in mediation for professionals. Tamara has written many curricula to teach youth communication, mediation, and negotiation skills. Ms. Fackrell was director of Community Dispute Resolution Services. She received an honorary award from the Juvenile Justice Services and the Slate Canyon Youth Program in 2004 and 2005 and was a Zion's Wow Award Winner in 2005.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

61 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Grace V.B. Garcia on Powell v. Stevens, 69 Mass. App. Ct. 87 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 1134

Grace V.B. Garcia on Powell v. Stevens, 69 Mass. App. Ct. 87 (2007)

By Grace V.B. Garcia

November 27, 2007

SUMMARY: In Powell v. Stevens, 69 Mass. App. Ct. 87 (2007), rev. denied, 449 Mass. 1109 (2007), the Appeals Court held that the filing of a lis pendens memorandum in connection with litigation affecting the title to real estate lie[s] within the absolute privilege afforded judicial proceedings in Massachusetts. This Emerging Issues Analysis discusses the implications of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Powell v. Stevens, 69 Mass. App. Ct. 87 (2007), rev. denied, 449 Mass. 1109 (2007), the Appeals Court held that the filing of a lis pendens memorandum in connection with litigation affecting the title to real estate lie[s] within the absolute privilege afforded judicial proceedings in Massachusetts. Thus, although the use of an absolute privilege is a question of law to be decided by the court, practitioners should be aware that an absolute privilege provides a complete defense to a defamation suit, even if the offensive statement is made in bad faith.

Background for the Courts decision. Lis pendens is based on Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 184, § 15. Pursuant to that statute, in order for a litigation that will affect the title to real property to have any effect on non-parties, a memorandum of lis pendens must be filed with the appropriate registry of deeds to notify prospective buyers or interested parties that the property is part of a litigation.

In Powell, the plaintiff brought an action for breach of contract, rescission and other related claims based on a belief that the defendants had obtained a discharge of a property mortgage fraudulently. 69 Mass. App. Ct. at 88. At the same time as filing the complaint, the plaintiff obtained an ex parte lis pendens, which she recorded with the appropriate registry of deeds. 69 Mass. App. Ct. at 88. In response to the complaint, the defendants filed a counterclaim for slander of title due to the filing of the lis pendens. A claim for slander of title is essentially a defamation claim involving a false and malicious statement concerning a persons property. Minovitch v. Battin, 2005 Mass. Super. LEXIS 351 at *14 (July 15, 2005). At trial, the court granted the defendants motion for a directed verdict on the underlying claims. After the trial, the court granted plaintiffs summary judgment on defendants counterclaim for slander. The Appeals Court reviewed this case to determine whether the absolute privilege applies to slander claims based on the filing of lis pendens, as such question was one of first impression that had had never been reviewed previously by a Massachusetts appellate court. Powell, 69 Mass. App. Ct. at 87-88.

Lis Pendens Hold an Important Role. Lis pendens is not meant to assist either side in the litigation, but rather its primary purpose is to give third parties notice that the property is involved in a lawsuit. Powell v. Stevens, 17 Mass. L. Rep. 592 (Mass. Super. Ct. 2004). Lis pendens is appropriate on any action affecting title to real estate. As such, lis pendens may be appropriate in many types of claims such as those involving fraud, breach of contract, rescission, a claim to quiet title, adverse possession, a mechanics lien, or a declaratory judgment claim.

Lis pendens serves an important public policy function in preventing further disputes that could be made by prospective buyers who had no notice of the litigation. Specifically, by giving notice to prospective buyers, mortgagees, tenants, or users of real estate, it prevents further disputes and resulting claims and litigation from those parties who would have acted to purchase, to accept a security interest in, or to lease or use, the contested real estate if they had lacked notice of its prior involvement in litigation. The prevention of such unnecessary conflict and compounding lawsuits furnishes a strong practical purpose for the lis pendens. Exposure of the process to damages liability would tend to chill its use and to harm its purpose. Powell, 69 Mass. App. Ct. at 90.

The Absolute Privilege Provides a Complete Defense. Generally, the law provides an absolute privilege to all statements, whether oral or written, that are made during the course of a judicial proceeding, preventing any action based on those statements. See Restat 2d of Torts, §§ 586 and 587. Thus, [a]n absolute privilege provides a complete defense to a defamation claim even if the offensive statements are uttered maliciously or in bad faith, so long as the challenged remarks are relevant or pertinent to the judicial proceeding. Powell v. Stevens, 17 Mass. L. Rep. 592 (Mass. Super. Ct. 2004). Defendants opposed the protection of the absolute privilege, arguing that the privilege only attaches to statements made as part of the litigation. The filing of a lis pendens, which is optional, is not significantly connected to litigation, as it is not necessary to the judicial proceeding itself. Plaintiff, on the other hand, argued that the filing of a lis pendens is nothing more than a reiteration of the information already set forth in the case. In its decision, the court determined that the filing of lis pendens is so close to the underlying litigation that it falls within the protections provided by the judicial proceedings. Powell, 69 Mass. App. Ct. at 90.

Massachusetts has now followed many other jurisdictions that have faced this question. Alaska, Florida, California, Mississippi, Montana, New Jersey, New Mexico, Rhode Island, Texas and Utah have all concluded that the absolute privilege extends to the filing of a lis pendens memorandum. 69 Mass. App. Ct. at 89 n.5. In holding the absolute privilege applies, these courts have used the following justifications:

(1) with few exceptions, any publication made in judicial proceedings enjoys an absolute privilege from subsequent claims of defamation; (2) the only purpose of recording a notice of lis pendens is to put prospective buyers on constructive notice of the pendency of the litigation; (3) the notice of lis pendens is purely incidental to the action in which it is filed, refers specifically to that action, and has no existence apart from that action; and (4) the recording of a notice of lis pendens is in effect a republication of the proceedings in the action and is, therefore, accorded the same absolute privilege as any other publication in that action.

69 Mass. App. Ct. at 89-90. Thus, these courts, like Massachusetts have found a connection between lis pendens and the judicial proceeding it refers to.

Strategic Consideration. When there is a claim involving the title to real property, plaintiff should always obtain a lis pendens and file it with the appropriate registry of deeds in order to give notice to prospective purchasers. The lis pendens itself must include a legal description of the real property and give a specific description of the lawsuit in which the property is involved. Practitioners should be careful to ensure that they include all material facts in their complaint underlying the lis pendens.

If defendant takes the position that the lis pendens has been filed wrongly, the best course of action is not to file a counterclaim based on slander, but first to determine whether it is appropriate to move for dissolution of the lis pendens and seek dismissal of the underlying claim. See Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 184, § 15(c). If the defendant is successful, the defendant is entitled to reasonable attorney fees and costs. Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 184, § 15(c). If dismissal is not appropriate, a defendant should consider whether there are other theories of law, such as interference with contact, abuse of process, malicious prosecution, or frivolous or bad faith claims, that are appropriate counterclaims for the particular fact pattern. With these alternative defense strategies, the defendant may be able to recover attorney fees. Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 184, § 15(c). See also Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 231, § 6F. The attorney should be aware, however, that in some cases the action may be brought by a judgment proof plaintiff. Thus, although defendants may be able to obtain fees, they should evaluate the plaintiffs ability to pay.

Thus, while Powell has effectively foreclosed counter-claims for slander of title based on the contents of a lis pendens, other remedies are available to defendants who believe the lis pendens is inappropriate. At the same time, the court reiterated the value of lis pendens by affording plaintiffs the opportunity to protect a potential resource from which to satisfy a judgment and put the public on notice of actions that may affect title.

Cross References. MA Pleading and Practice §§ 3.1, 83.1.2.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcia's practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

62 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Stevens on Trends in E-Discovery

2008 Emerging Issues 2949

Sandra Tvarian Stevens on Trends in E-Discovery One Year After the Amendment of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure

By Sandra Tvarian Stevens

November 26, 2007

SUMMARY: In her analysis of Trends in E-Discovery One Year After the Amendment of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Wiley Rein, LLP litigation partner, Sandra Tvarian Stevens, Esq., discusses e-discovery "best practices" and provides practical advice for corporate litigants, including insurers, on topics such as: knowing your preservation obligations, understanding the consequences of failing to Meet E-Discovery obligations..

PDF LINK: Premium Emerging Issues Commentary ($)

ARTICLE: December 1, 2007 will mark the first anniversary of the amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that relate to the production of electronically stored information (ESI). While corporate litigants and their counsel have responded to the amendments in different ways, with some companies attempting to re-evaluate and streamline their existing records management and retention processes in advance of future litigation, and others responding to electronic discovery (e-discovery) issues as they have arisen in the context of particular cases, a consensus has started to emerge with respect to certain best practices that corporate litigants should follow to comply with their e-discovery obligations.

Like other businesses, insurance companies have undertaken to make sense of, and comply with, the new requirements in the past year. Unlike other businesses, however, insurers are often in the unique position of having to address electronic discovery issues on two separate fronts: (1) in the context of litigation in which they themselves are parties; and (2) when defending, or funding the defense of lawsuits brought against their policyholders by third parties. Thus, unlike many other corporate litigants, some insurers are finding themselves monitoring not only their own compliance with the new e-discovery rules, but also their policyholders ability to abide by the amended rules.

Knowing Your Preservation Obligations. Any discussion of e-discovery best practices must begin with an understanding that while the e-discovery rules may be new, the duty to preserve information that is at the heart of these requirements is not. In fact, courts have long imposed certain preservation obligations on litigants. [See, e.g., Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 216 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (quoting Fujitsu Ltd. v. Fed. Express Corp., 247 F.3d 423, 436 (2d Cir. 2001) (additional citations omitted) ("The obligation to preserve evidence arises when the party has notice that the evidence is relevant to litigation or when a party should have known that the evidence may be relevant to future litigation."); Silvestri v. GMC, 271 F.3d 583, 591 (4th Cir. 2001) ("The duty to preserve material evidence arises not only during litigation but also extends to that period before the litigation when a party reasonably should know that the evidence may be relevant to anticipated litigation.".)] Therefore, because the duty to preserve attaches when litigation reasonably can be anticipated, it may arise even before the formal filing of a lawsuit. "While a litigant is under no duty to keep or retain every document in its possession, it is under a duty to preserve what it knows, or reasonably should know, is relevant in the action, is reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence, is reasonably likely to be requested during discovery and/or is the subject of a pending discovery request." Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 217 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), quoting Turner v. Hudson Transit Lines, Inc., 142 F.R.D. 68, 72 (D.N.Y. 1991) (additional citations omitted).]

Although the amended Federal Rules do not change this preservation obligation, the increased focus on electronically stored information has caused corporate litigants, including insurers, to be more sensitive to the manner in which they manage their electronically stored information. As a result, many businesses have responded to the amendments by undertaking an evaluation of their existing records management and retention processes in advance of litigation. However, others, including insurance companies who were in the midst of ongoing litigation at the time the amendments were enacted, often have not been afforded the opportunity to address many of these issues proactively. The good news is that by now, many corporate litigants have completed their e-discovery compliance analysis, and as a result should be better prepared to respond to future e-discovery requests.

Understanding the Consequences of Failing to Meet Those Obligations. Much of the current case law addressing e-discovery focuses on the imposition of sanctions on parties who have failed to retain documents or institute litigation holds. While corporate litigants understand that the stakes of failing to meet their e-discovery obligations can be high, they are also coming to the realization that courts view sanctions as a measure of last resort for particularly egregious conduct.

Generally speaking, when existing document retention policies are applied consistently, courts will not penalize a company if electronically stored information is deleted pursuant to a good faith document retention policy that was in effect prior to the time that litigation began. [See, e.g., Floeter v. City of Orlando, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9527 (D. Fla. Feb. 9, 2007) (refusing to impose sanctions against defendant and finding no bad faith destruction of information where destruction was pursuant to pre-existing procedures that allowed for over-writing of back up tapes and hard drives).] However, once litigation begins, parties must review and assess their document retention policies to ensure that information that may be relevant to the litigation is not lost. As one federal court recently explained, [w]hile the new amendment to Rule 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure indicates that, absent exceptional circumstances, a court may not impose sanctions on a party for failing to provide electronically stored information lost as a result of the routine, good-faith operation of an electronic information system, it is clear that this Rule does not exempt a party who fails to stop the operation of a system that is obliterating information that may be discoverable in litigation. [Disability Rights Council of Greater Wash. v. Wash. Metro. Transit Auth., 242 F.R.D. 139, 146 (D.D.C. 2007)].

Thus, courts have imposed sanctions on parties who have neglected to suspend routine document retention and destruction policies in a timely fashion, or who have failed to disable default e-mail deletion settings on their computers once litigation is reasonably anticipated. [See, e.g., Quantum Communs. Corp. v. Star Broad., Inc., 473 F. Supp. 2d 1249 (S.D. Fla. 2007) (awarding default judgment and monetary sanctions against defendant for bad faith discovery conduct, including deletion of e-mails defendant asserted was part of its routine deletion practice, that court found hampered the ability of Plaintiff to present its claim on the central issue of this case); Gordon Partners, et. al. v. Blumenthal (In re NTL, Inc. Sec. Litig.), 244 F.R.D. 179 (S.D.N.Y. 2007) (awarding adverse inference and attorneys fees where many requested documents and e-mails previously existed, but never were produced, presumably because they were discarded and because certain employees were free to retain e-mails or discard them to suit their needs).]

Once litigation is reasonably anticipated or has begun, it also is crucial to institute a litigation hold that identifies the sources of information that must be preserved. Courts have long required companies to ensure that the litigation hold is communicated to key employees likely to have information relevant to the dispute or litigation and have further required companies to issue periodic reminders during the course of the litigation. [Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 437 (S.D.N.Y. 2003)]. Courts have sanctioned parties who have failed to institute appropriate litigation holds. See, e.g., Reino de Espana v. Am. Bureau of Shipping, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 81415, at *14 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) (partys belated issuance of a litigation hold, particularly where [i]ndividual users determine how long emails are preserved led to the conclusion that relevant evidence had been lost).

Because insurers can be involved in litigation not only on their own behalf, but also in third-party litigation where they are defending or funding the defense of their policyholders, some insurers have responded to the amended rules by first reviewing their own document retention practices and litigation hold policies, and then by taking the additional step of monitoring the document retention practices and litigation hold policies that their policyholders have instituted.

Getting the Answers Early. Another emerging point of agreement with respect to electronic discovery is that the meet and confer requirements set forth in Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f), which obligate parties to meet and confer about issues such as disclosure and discovery of electronically stored information at their initial meet and confer conference, mean that it is never too early to address issues relating to electronically stored information. This early identification requirement has received much attention because the discovery agreed to by the parties at the Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(f) conference may be incorporated into a scheduling order that will set the parameters for the parties discovery obligations. [See, e.g., In re Celexa & Lexapro Prods. Liab. Litig., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 91590, at *10 (E.D. Mo. Nov. 13, 2006) (entering parties agreed order that responsive electronically stored information will be obtained only from an active IT environment, and that absent some exceptional circumstance and a demonstration by plaintiffs of some substantial need, defendants [would] not be required to restore any backup tapes.).] The need to identify electronically stored information early is further underscored by Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(1)(B) which requires that each party produce any electronically stored information in its possession, custody or control which it may use to support its claims or defenses at the time it makes its initial disclosures.

Using Your IT Department and Outside Vendors Wisely. Corporate litigants would also tend to agree that the increase in e-discovery has given rise to a growing litigation role for information services departments, and in some cases, outside vendors specializing in e-discovery. Unlike paper files, electronically stored information can exist in many different formats. This can include, on the one hand, active or online data such as data residing on a computer hard drive; near-line data, such as CD-ROMs that are used to store removable data; and archived data, including magnetic tape data often used to store additional copies of data in the event of a disaster. It can also include, on the other hand, back-up tapes that contain vast volumes of data typically organized in a manner that is not conducive to easy retrieval; and erased or damaged data that can only be recovered at a significant cost or expense.

Given the broad range of media on which electronic information is stored, parties are finding that in order to comply with discovery obligations they need the assistance of technology specialists to answer questions such as:

- . Where is the information stored?
- . What format is used to store the information?
- . How easy or difficult will it be to retrieve the information?
- . What are the system settings and defaults?

. What archiving and backup systems are being used?

. In what format will the information be produced?

As technology continues to evolve, it seems likely that a company's internal IT role, as well as that of outside e-discovery vendors will continue to expand.

While it is advisable to decide early into the litigation whether it will be necessary to use an outside e-discovery vendors services to ensure that the vendor has adequate time to retrieve and process the electronic information, it is not always possible to know at the outset how simple or complex the search for, and retrieval of, electronic information may be in a particular case. Sometimes a party may not know until after it has started the process of searching for and retrieving the requested information whether the assistance of an outside e-discovery vendor will be needed. In that regard, parties should be aware that courts have not been sympathetic to situations where a party has decided to hire an outside vendor late in the litigation and has failed to provide a reason why it did not do so sooner. [See, e.g., Synergy Tech & Design, Inc. v. Terry, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34463, at *15 (N.D. Cal. May 2, 2007) (finding that [t]here is no explanation in the record justifying the substantial delay in initiating the forensic search for responsive documents which was begun shortly before submission of defendants opposition to the motion to compel; and awarding costs for the motion to compel against defendant).]

In addition, courts are growing increasingly less tolerant of vendor errors, particularly where parties and their counsel have failed to properly monitor the vendors work. As one federal court recently noted, the [u]ltimate responsibility for ensuring the preservation, collection, processing, and production of electronically stored information rests with the party and its counsel, not with the non-party consultant or vendor." [See, e.g., In re Seroquel Prods. Liab. Litig., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 61287, at *49 n.14 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 21, 2007) (citations omitted).] Thus, where outside vendors are used, parties and their counsel need to ensure that they adequately supervise the vendors efforts to locate, retrieve or produce responsive electronically stored information.]

Determining Whats Reasonably Accessible and Whats Not. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure recognize [] that the right to conduct discovery is not absolute. [See, e.g., Cache La Poudre Feeds, LLC v. Land O'Lakes Farmland Feed, LLC, 244 F.R.D. 614 (D. Colo. 2007).] In that regard, Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B) recognizes that electronically stored information may have differing levels of accessibility and allows parties to seek to limit production of electronically stored information from sources that are not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. As the Cache La Poudre Court explained, [a]s of December 2006, a party responding to discovery requests must identify but need not produce electronically stored information that is not reasonably accessible because of under burden or cost. [Cache La Poudre Feeds, LLC v. Land O'Lakes Farmland Feed, LLC, 244 F.R.D. 614 (D. Colo. 2007).] Thus, corporate litigants and their counsel increasingly are coming to the realization that in assessing the scope of potentially relevant information, it is important to determine at the outset whether that information is reasonably accessible. If an agreement can be reached with opposing counsel that data that is not reasonably accessible does not need to be produced, the potential exists for significant costs savings because resources will not need to be devoted to restoration of such relatively inaccessible data.

However, the assertion of undue burden or cost by one side does not bar the other from continuing to seek discovery of the requested information. Rather, Fed. R. Civ. P. 37(a)(2)(B) requires the parties to attempt to meet and confer about the requested information before seeking court intervention. [See, e.g., Emmerick v. Penley/Groseclose, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59147 (E.D. Tenn. Aug. 6, 2007) (denying motion to compel electronic discovery where parties had failed to meet and confer about the requested discovery). As one court has noted, [i]t is vitally important that counsel confer with one another in good faith, and so represent to the Court, before taking up Court time. [See, e.g., In re Presto, 358 B.R. 290, at *6 (Bankr. S.D. Tex. 2006) (denying motion to compel where counsel had pointed out flaws in written deposition answers to opposing counsel, but had failed to meet and confer with opposing counsel prior to filing the motion).] The responding party bears the burden of demonstrating that the information is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost. [Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B).]

Even if the responding party meets its burden and demonstrates undue burden or cost, the court may nonetheless order discovery from such sources if the requesting party shows good cause. [Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B).] However, in making that determination, the court must consider the limitations of Rule 26(b)(2)(C) which requires the Court to limit discovery based on a number of factors. Those include, inter alia: (1) whether the information is available from other less burdensome or less expensive sources; (2) whether the requesting party has had ample opportunity to obtain the information sought; or (3) whether the burden or expense would outweigh the likely benefit of the proposed discovery, taking into account the importance of the information, the needs of the case, and the parties resources.

In reviewing these factors, some courts have instructed parties and their counsel to report back to the court with specific information about the discovery sought prior to making any ruling as to whether the requested information should be produced. For example, in Apsley v. Boeing Co., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5144, at *22 (D. Kan. Jan. 17, 2007), the plaintiffs argued that the benefits of the electronic discovery they had requested from the defendants outweighed the defendants burden argument. The court advised the parties that it would set the matter for a hearing because it required additional information to better evaluate the requested discovery. In so doing, the court ordered the parties, at a minimum, to address issues such as:

- . The manner in which plaintiffs formulated a proposed search protocol for the e-mails;
- . The number of persons the e-mail search would involve;
- . Whether the number of search terms used would increase the costs of discovery;
- . The estimated costs associated with locating and searching for the requested e-mails;
- . The specific benefits that the requested discovery would provide;
- . Who should bear the costs of the requested discovery; and
- . Whether the requested discovery could be obtained in some other more efficient manner.

[Apsley v. Boeing Co., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5144, at *22 (D. Kan. Jan. 17, 2007)].

Courts are also looking closely at whether a party has failed to take timely and adequate steps to preserve the disputed electronic information in easily accessible form. [See, e.g., Disability Rights Council of Greater Wash. v. Wash. Metro. Transit Auth., 242 F.R.D. 139, 147 (D.D.C. 2007) (While the newly amended Federal Rules of Civil Procedure initially relieve a party from producing electronically stored information that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden and cost, I am anything but certain that I should permit a party who has failed to preserve accessible information without cause to then complain about the inaccessibility of the only electronically stored information that remains.). [See also Quinby v. WestLB AG, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 64531, at *29-30 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 5, 2006)] (finding that where a party has create[d] its own burden or expense by converting into an inaccessible format data that it should have reasonably foreseen would be discoverable material, it should not be permitted to take unfair advantage of a self-inflicted burden by attempting to shift[] part of the costs of [the] undoing to the other side).]

The amended federal rules do not define what is or is not reasonably accessible. Thus, courts increasingly are being asked to assist parties in determining whether a particular category or type of electronically stored information is reasonably accessible or not. These decisions have held generally that a finding of inaccessibility must be premised upon the existence of undue burden or cost. [See, e.g., Pipefitters Local No. 636 Pension Fund v. Mercer Human Res. Consulting, Inc., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 52169, at *4-5 (E.D. Mich. July 19, 2007) (Under the electronically stored information amendment to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B), the party from whom discovery is sought must show that the information is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost.). See also Semsroth v. City of Wichita, 239 F.R.D. 630, 637 (D. Kan. 2006) (the Amendment to [Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(B)] makes clear that any inaccessibility must be because of undue burden or cost.); Cache La Poudre Feeds, LLC v. Land O'Lakes Farmland Feed, LLC, 244 F.R.D. 614 (D. Colo. 2007) (stating that back-up tapes containing archived data may be one source of information that is not reasonably accessible because of undue burden or cost); Ameriwood Indus., Inc. v. Liberman, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10791, at *6 (E.D. Mo. Feb. 13, 2007) (denying broad discovery request for all documents and communications regarding plaintiff's business during the relevant time period based on its finding that "the information is not reasonably accessible because [defendant's] request is unduly burdensome").]

Like other businesses attempting to keep up with the pace of changing technology, insurance companies periodically update their computer systems and software. Some insurers may store data on a legacy computer system, or other system that uses software and/or hardware that has become obsolete. At least one court has recognized that as computer systems and software continue to evolve it may become more difficult to retrieve electronic information stored in an earlier legacy system. [See, e.g., In re Seroquel Prods. Liab. Litig., 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5877, at *12 (M.D. Fla. Jan. 26, 2007) (equating legacy electronically stored information with data that is inaccessible; entering case management order governing [i]naccessible and/or legacy electronically stored information; and requiring parties to confer regarding inaccessible electronically stored information prior to seeking intervention from the court). As old software and systems become obsolete and new software and applications evolve, it appears likely that courts increasingly will be asked to tackle the issue of whether or not particular data is reasonably accessible.

Conclusion. A year after the enactment of the amended Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, parties, their counsel and even courts continue to grapple with the ever-expanding role that electronically stored information plays in today's litigation environment. Most companies, insurers included, have now assessed or re-evaluated their existing records management and retention processes, either in advance of litigation, or while in the midst of it. In the process, corporate litigants have discovered not only that they need to understand their preservation obligations and the consequences of their failure to meet their discovery obligations, but also that practical limitations on the extent of permissible electronic discovery exist and that the Federal Rules provide parties with reasonable means to impose those limitations. However, while certain best practices are beginning to emerge with respect to how e-discovery should be conducted, the changing nature of technology makes it a near certainty that those practices will need to be periodically reviewed in order to keep pace with advances in technology.

For additional information about electronic discovery issues of particular interest to insurers, see Sandra Tvarian Stevens, E-Discovery: Competing Considerations for Insurers and Policyholders, published in Coverage, LexisNexis, Vol. 17, No. 4 (March/April 2007).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Sandra Tvarian Stevens is a partner with the law firm of Wiley Rein LLP in Washington, DC, and a member of the firm's insurance and litigation practice groups. Ms. Stevens has particular expertise in complex litigation before state and federal courts and in alternative dispute resolution and arbitration proceedings involving insurance and reinsurance claims. She regularly counsels clients with respect to preservation and production of electronically stored information. Ms. Stevens is a frequent author and speaker on insurance, reinsurance and electronic discovery issues. She received her B.A. from American University magna cum laude and her J.D. from American University's Washington College of Law summa cum laude.

63 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Douglas R. Richmond on Defense Lawyers Malpractice Liability to Excess Insurers

2008 Emerging Issues 2951

Douglas R. Richmond on Defense Lawyers Malpractice Liability to Excess Insurers

By Douglas R. Richmond

November 26, 2007

SUMMARY: In his analysis of Defense Lawyers' Malpractice Liability to Excess Insurers, Senior Vice President of Aon Risk Services, Douglas R. Richmond, Esq., discusses the rise in malpractice suits by excess insurers against defense counsel hired by liability insurers when verdicts exceed primary insurance policy limits.

PDF LINK: Premium Emerging Issues Commentary ($)

ARTICLE: INTRODUCTION

When their policyholders are sued, liability insurers typically appoint defense counsel to represent them. If a case turns out badly, the defense lawyers conduct may be unfavorably scrutinized in the insurance defense context as in all others. Malpractice claims by insurance companies against defense attorneys are now common. While primary insurers have for some time been willing to sue defense attorneys they hire, and their right to sue defense counsel for malpractice is widely acknowledged, ⁿ¹ excess insurers are increasingly willing to sue defense counsel when verdicts exceed primary policy limits. Excess insurers have sued defense counsel on both direct duty and equitable subrogation theories.

In some ways malpractice claims by excess insurers against defense counsel make little sense. An excess insurer has no direct relationship with the defense attorneys it sues; it did not retain them, nor did it pay for their services. An excess insurer typically does not share an attorney-client relationship with the defense attorneys that a primary carrier hires. Yet this very detachment may actually encourage malpractice claims, for an aggrieved excess carrier may have no continuing business relationship with defense counsel, such that loyalty and the perspective that comes with judging many cases as compared to one are no bar to litigation. Additionally, as cost-conscious insurers have seen their litigation expenses rise, the possibility of recovering some portion of an excess verdict or settlement from other sources has driven both primary and excess insurers to look to defense counsel in certain circumstances. ACTIONS BY EXCESS CARRIERS ALLOWED

American Centennial Insurance Co. v. Canal Insurance Co. Because excess insurers generally do not share an attorney-client relationship with defense lawyers hired by a primary insurer, they generally cannot sue those lawyers on any sort of direct duty theory because of a lack of privity. ⁿ² Accordingly, courts that allow an excess insurer to sue defense counsel hired by a primary insurer for malpractice typically hold that the excess insurer is equitably subrogated to the insured's rights against the attorneys. ⁿ³ The leading case in this area is American Centennial Insurance Co. v.

Canal Insurance Co. n4

In American Centennial, General Rent-A-Car was sued for injuries and death allegedly attributable to a defective tire on one of its rental cars. General was insured under three policies. Canal Insurance provided primary coverage up to $100,000. A first level excess insurer, First State, insured General from $100,000 up to $1 million. American Centennial provided an additional $3 million in excess coverage above the First State policy. Canal defended the suit and hired counsel for General. Because defense counsel allegedly mishandled the suit, the insurers were forced to settle for $3,700,000. First State and American Centennial then sued Canal and its chosen defense counsel on a number of theories, including negligence. n5

The trial court granted summary judgment for the defendants, holding that all of the excess carriers claims were barred by the statute of limitations, and further finding that defense counsel owed no duty to First State or American Centennial. A lower appellate court affirmed the trial courts judgment on the malpractice claims based on the attorneys statute of limitations defense. The Texas Supreme Court granted review.

The American Centennial court determined that the excess insurers malpractice claims against defense counsel were not time barred, thus opening inquiry into whether an excess insurer could even bring such an action. Under Texas law, attorneys ordinarily cannot be held liable to non-clients because there is no privity of contract. n6 Privity as a prerequisite to malpractice liability is the product of judicial reluctance to permit malpractice actions by non-clients because of the potential interference with attorneys duties to their clients. n7 This concern is heightened in the insurance defense context, where attorneys must be especially sensitive to the varying interests of the insured and the insurer which produce complex and often conflicting relationships. n8

The Texas Supreme Court reasoned that recognizing an equitable subrogation action by an excess insurer against defense counsel would not interfere with the attorney-client relationship, however, nor would it create additional conflicts of interest. Equitable subrogation would only permit an insurer to enforce defense counsels existing duties to the insured. Further, the interests of the insured, its primary insurer and its excess insurer generally overlap when it comes to ensuring that a defense attorneys malpractice does not prevent the presentation of a meritorious defense. Insureds and insurers interests converge in expectations of competent representation. n9

The American Centennial court observed that those considerations compelling its recognition of an excess insurers right to bring an equitable subrogation action against a primary insurer for failing to settle a claim within policy limits also supported an excess insurers right to sue defense counsel hired by a primary insurer.

No new or additional burdens are imposed on the attorney, who already has the duty to represent the insured Defense counsel should not be relieved of these obligations merely because the insurer, rather than the client, must pay the claim. If the asserted malpractice has resulted of a judgment or settlement within the excess carriers policy limits, the insured has little incentive to enforce its right to competent representation. Refusal to permit the excess carrier to vindicate that right would burden the insurer with a loss caused by the attorneys negligence while relieving the attorney from the consequences of legal malpractice. Such an inequitable result should not arise simply because the insured has contracted for excess coverage. n10

The supreme court thus reversed the court of appeals for failing to allow the excess insurers to pursue their malpractice claims against defense counsel. n11

Practice Insight: If called upon to defend lawyers hired by a primary insurer against allegations of malpractice by an excess insurer, resist any direct duty allegations based on a lack of privity. Because the existence of a duty is a question of law, it should be capable of resolution on a motion to dismiss--there is no reason to wait for summary judgment. If an excess carrier has only pleaded a direct duty, however, it may be advisable to wait until any deadline for amending the pleadings has passed before moving to dismiss or for judgment on the pleadings, so that the carrier cannot simply amend its pleadings to assert an equitable subrogation claim.

National Fire Insurance Co. v. Dowd & Dowd. The courts embrace of equitable subrogation as a vehicle for excess insurers potential recovery from negligent defense attorneys hired by a primary insurer while declining to impose a direct duty is nicely illustrated by National Union Fire Insurance Co. v. Dowd & Dowd.ⁿ¹² In Dowd & Dowd, an Illinois federal court was forced to apply Illinois law in the absence of any guidance from the states appellate courts.

Schneider National Carriers hired the law firm of Dowd & Dowd to defend it and its driver, Henry Howard, in a personal injury action brought by John Miksis. Miksis was catastrophically injured when Howard drove a Schneider tractor-trailer rig into a stationary lift truck on which Miksis was working. At the time of the accident, Schneider was self-insured up to $3 million with a $5 million dollar National Union excess policy above its self-insured retention (SIR).ⁿ¹³

The case went to trial and Miksis recovered an $8 million verdict. Schneider paid $3 million and National Union paid the remaining $5 million. National Union then sued Dowd & Dowd for malpractice. Dowd & Dowd moved to dismiss National Unions complaint, arguing that an excess insurer cannot maintain a malpractice claim against the insureds defense attorney.

Dowd & Dowd asserted that National Union could not state a cause of action for legal malpractice because it could not establish the first prerequisite, that being an attorney-client relationship with the law firm. Under Illinois law, the fiduciary relationship between attorney and client is jealously guarded as personal and confidential, and only a client can assert a malpractice claim against an attorney. National Union argued that an attorney-client relationship did exist and, alternatively, that it was equitably subrogated to Schneiders legal malpractice action against Dowd & Dowd. The case was one of first impression under Illinois law.

In arguing for a direct claim against Dowd & Dowd, National Union first asserted that the Illinois Supreme Court should take an expansive view of the tripartite relationship that exists between an insured, a primary insurer, and defense counsel to recognize that a defense attorney also owes a fiduciary duty to an excess insurer. Illinois law clearly provides that a defense attorney hired by a primary insurer owes a fiduciary duty to both the insured and the insurer, and that either can sue the attorney for malpractice. National Union argued that Illinois law would permit a direct action because there is no logical reason to distinguish between a primary insurer and an excess carrier in determining when an insurer may sue for malpractice.ⁿ¹⁴

The court rejected National Unions argument because it ignored the fact that a primary insurer actually contracts with a defense attorney to represent the insured.

Since the primary insurer contracts with the attorney, pays the attorneys legal fees, and directs the litigation or settlement of the claim, it stands to reason that the primary insurer is one of the attorneys clients Excess insurers, on the other hand, do not have the duty to defend the insured Thus, unlike a primary insurer, an excess insurer has no direct relationship with the attorney retained to defend an action against the insured.ⁿ¹⁵

The Illinois courts recognition of the tripartite relationship is premised upon a primary insurers legal duty to retain and pay for an attorney to defend an action against its insured. Thus, the Dowd & Dowd court reasoned, the Illinois Supreme Court would be unlikely to enlarge the tripartite relationship to include an excess insurer. National Union acknowledged that it did not retain Dowd & Dowd to defend Schneider and Howard; Schneider made that decision. The insurers tripartite relationship argument for the existence of an attorney-client relationship had no basis in fact or law. Dowd & Dowd owed no fiduciary duty to National Union, and the court dismissed that portion of the insurers complaint.ⁿ¹⁶

National Union next contended that Schneider retained Dowd & Dowd for the insurers direct or primary benefit. Accordingly, it was a third-party beneficiary to the contract between Schneider and the law firm.ⁿ¹⁷

Under Illinois law, an attorney generally only owes his or her client a duty to exercise requisite skill and care in the course of a representation. There is an exception, however, for intended third-party beneficiaries. This exception is narrowed in cases of an adversarial nature. In such cases, there must be a clear indication that the attorneys representation of the client is intended to directly confer a benefit on the third-party. n18

The Dowd & Dowd court did not believe that the Illinois Supreme Court would find that Schneider entered into its relationship with its defense attorneys for National Unions benefit. Schneider hired Dowd & Dowd to benefit itself and Howard. Although National Union also benefitted from the firms engagement through its harmonious relationship with its insureds, its incidental benefit was not sufficient to support a direct duty of care on defense counsels part. n19

The court finally reached National Unions equitable subrogation argument. The court was convinced that the Illinois Supreme Court would recognize an excess liability insurers right to be subrogated to its insureds rights unless the nature of the subrogated claim and public policy considerations dictated a different conclusion. n20

Legal malpractice claims are not assignable in Illinois. The policy considerations that cut against assignment arguably apply equally in the equitable subrogation context. Subrogation opponents might argue, for example, that permitting an excess insurer to sue defense counsel strains the tripartite relationship, a point that was not lost on the court. n21 Nonetheless, the court was persuaded to permit an excess insurers equitable subrogation to its insureds rights against defense counsel because it does not entail any additional burdens. n22

[Equitable subrogation] merely allows an excess insurer, who pays for any excess liability, to enforce the duties that the attorney already owes to the insured, who might have little incentive to sue his attorney since he has excess insurance coverage Evidently, if the insured had not contracted for excess insurance coverage, the attorney would have to be similarly concerned about being sued by the insured for any excess liability Malpractice attorneys should not enjoy a windfall merely because the insured contracted for excess insurance coverage. Further, the social costs of legal malpractice [are] best borne by the malpracticing attorneys. n23

Additionally, in the equitable subrogation context, there is less concern that malpractice claims will become a commodity to be exploited by strangers to the attorney-client relationship. n24 Basic subrogation principles strictly limit the right to be subrogated to a legal malpractice claim to a non-client who, pursuant to a legal duty, has paid the clients debt or loss attributable to the malpractice. Any concerns about an uncontrollable flow of baseless malpractice actions by excess insurers is speculation. Finally, the court noted, while excess insurers possess the sophistication necessary to protect themselves in many situations, that ability or capability does not preclude the application of the equitable subrogation doctrine. n25 ACTIONS BY EXCESS CARRIERS NOT RECOGNIZED

Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves. Other courts have declined to allow excess insurers to sue defense counsel for malpractice even on an equitable subrogation theory. n26 This is not surprising, for a number of courts have generally rejected equitable subrogation in the legal malpractice context. n27 These courts tend to view equitable subrogation as the assignment of a legal malpractice claim and such assignments are generally impermissible. n28

The leading case favoring defense counsel is Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, n29 decided by the Second Circuit under Connecticut law. Pullman arose out of a medical malpractice action against Griffin Hospital. The hospital was insured by Aetna at the primary level, with Continental Casualty its excess insurer. Aetna hired the law firm of Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves to defend the malpractice action. The case went to trial and resulted in a staggering verdict against the hospital. Continental paid over $10 million under its excess policy to satisfy the judgment. Continental then sued the Pullman firm for legal malpractice for failing to adequately defend the underlying tort case.

Pullman moved for judgment on the pleadings, arguing that Continental had no standing to sue because it was Aetna that retained the firm. Continental argued that it had standing to sue because (1) it was an intended and foreseeable beneficiary of the Pullman firms services for the hospital, such that it shared an attorney-client relationship with Pullman; (2) it was equitably subrogated to Griffin Hospitals right to sue Pullman; and (3) it shared an actual attorney-client relationship with Pullman. n30 After Continental unsuccessfully pursued an interlocutory appeal and amended its complaint, the district court granted a motion to dismiss by the law firm. Continental then appealed to the Second Circuit, raising the same arguments in support of its claim against Pullman that it made in the district court below. n31

The Pullman court first addressed Continentals claim that because it was an intended and foreseeable beneficiary of Pullmans legal services for the hospital, Pullman owed it a duty of care. n32 Under Connecticut law, attorneys are not liable to persons other than their clients except in will cases. n33 Only in estate work may a third-party beneficiary sue an attorney for malpractice. The court declined to equate an attorneys dual representation of an insured and its insurer with that of a testator and his beneficiary. Moreover, Continental was free to monitor the defense of the medical malpractice action through its own attorneys to assure itself that Aetna was living up to its responsibilities as the primary insurer. Under these circumstances, it seemed implausible that the primary or direct purpose of the transaction at issue (Aetnas engagement of Pullman to defend Griffin Hospital) was intended to benefit a third-party (Continental). n34

Continental next argued that once it satisfied the judgment against Griffin Hospital, it was subrogated to its insureds rights, and it could therefore bring any legal malpractice claims against Pullman that the hospital should have brought. n35 The Pullman court gave this argument short shrift, rejecting it as running contrary to Connecticut public policy. n36 The court presumably feared that permitting non-clients to sue attorneys via equitable subrogation would potentially interfere with attorneys ethical obligations to their clients. n37

Continental's final argument for a direct duty owed to it by the Pullman law firm came in for harsh treatment by the Second Circuit. The Pullman court was especially critical of Continentals attempts to plead a direct duty in the district court, describing Continentals amended complaint as [r]esonating . . . with bald conclusions. n38 In its amended complaint Continental alleged that it shared an attorney-client relationship with Pullman because the law firm communicated with it about the progress of the medical malpractice action, advised it with respect to settlement, and served as its counsel on the appeal of the underlying action. Continental never pleaded--nor could it--that it retained Pullman, a fact the Pullman court found interesting, but not dispositive.

It is clear beyond cavil, the Pullman court observed, that in the insurance context the attorney owes his allegiance, not to the insurance company that retained him but to the insured defendant. n39 Though a defense attorney may be retained and paid by the insurer, and informs the insurer about the progress of the case he is defending, the attorney owes his allegiance to the insured. n40 Accordingly, the district court did not err in dismissing Continentals amended complaint for pleading insufficient facts to support an attorney-client relationship.

Although some courts may find Pullman persuasive, the last portion of the opinion may not travel well. Connecticut is a single client state in the insurance defense context, meaning that the law considers the insured to be the defense attorneys sole client. n41 Many jurisdictions follow the dual client doctrine, n42 which holds that so long as the insureds interests and the insurers interests are aligned, they both are the defense attorneys client and he owes each an equal duty of loyalty. Of course, even in dual client states it remains that the primary insurer hired the defense attorney, and it is the primary insurer and the insured to whom the attorney must be faithful. It is the primary insurer with which the defense attorney shares an attorney-client relationship. The excess insurer remains a step removed.

Federal Insurance Co. v. North American Specialty Insurance Co. Most recently, a New York appellate court rejected equitable subrogation theory in Federal Insurance Co. v. North American Specialty Insurance Co. n43 The court there reasoned that subrogation was unavailable to the excess insurer, Federal, because the insured had not been harmed by the defense lawyers malpractice in failing to raise a critical affirmative defense to cross-claims; the insureds liability was attributable to its own negligence. n44 Thus, Federal's payment of the loss within its limits was not attributable to a third-party against whom it could subrogate through its insured. n45

The Federal Insurance courts reasoning is a bit strained and the case is best limited to its somewhat unusual facts. There will be an underlying tort allegedly attributable to the insured in every case in which an excess insurer sues defense lawyers hired by a primary insurer. That does not relieve the defense lawyers of their duty to defend the underlying action responsibly. If the defense lawyers conduct falls below the standard of care and an excess insurer is damaged as a result, equitable subrogation ought to afford the excess insurer with a remedy.

American Continental Insurance Co. v. Weber & Rose. A Kentucky court rejected an excess insurers equitable subrogation claim against defense counsel hired by the insured under its SIR in American Continental Insurance Co. v. Weber & Rose.ⁿ⁴⁶ The American Continental court was convinced that permitting an excess insurer to sue defense attorneys under an equitable subrogation theory would be inimical to the preservation of traditional and longstanding concepts associated with [the] attorney-client relationship.ⁿ⁴⁷ Allowing excess insurers to sue their insureds defense attorneys would undermine the traditional view of the attorney-client relationship as both personal and fiduciary.

The American Continental court also rejected the insurers claim that it was an intended and foreseeable beneficiary of the defense attorneys services to the insured.ⁿ⁴⁸ Unlike Pullman, in which defense counsel were hired by the primary insurer, the defense attorneys in this case were hired by the insured, as was its right under its SIR.ⁿ⁴⁹ Accordingly, there was even less of a basis for the court to conclude that the defense attorneys were hired to represent the excess carrier. The insured hired the defense attorneys for its sole benefit, and American Continental was at most an incidental beneficiary of their contract. The defense attorneys did not owe American Continental a duty that could form the basis for a malpractice action.ⁿ⁵⁰ CONCLUSION

The development of excess insurers rights against defense attorneys hired by primary carriers is far from complete. The law in many states is uncertain, and there are good arguments both for and against recognizing excess insurers right to sue defense attorneys they did not hire for malpractice. It is, for example, difficult to refute the American Centennial and Dowd & Dowd courts conclusions that allegedly negligent defense lawyers should not be able to escape liability simply because an insured prudently purchased excess insurance. At the same time, excess insurers are far from helpless when it comes to protecting their interests. They can employ their own attorneys to work with the defense attorneys hired by the primary insurer, and often do just that. In some cases an excess insurer actually may be able to take over the defense and direct counsel, control defense and settlement strategy, and so on.

Return to Text

ⁿ¹ See, e.g., Gen. Sec. Ins. Co. v. Jordan, Coyne & Savits, LLP, 357 F. Supp. 2d 951, 956-957 (D. Va. 2005) (stating that despite sharp doctrinal differences regarding the relationship between the insurer and the firm it retains, nearly all jurisdictions in the United States permit some form of legal malpractice action by an insurer against the firm it retains to defend an insured) (footnote omitted); see, e.g., American Int'l Adjustment Co. v. Galvin, 86 F.3d 1455 (7th Cir. 1996) (applying Indiana law); Mutuelles Unies v. Kroll & Linstrom, 957 F.2d 707 (9th Cir. 1992); St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Birch, Stewart, Kolasch & Birch, LLP, 379 F. Supp. 2d 183, 190-196 (D. Mass. 2005) (predicting Massachusetts law); Bohna v. Hughes, Thorsness, Gantz, Powell & Brundin, 828 P.2d 745 (Alaska 1992); State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Fed. Ins. Co., 72 Cal. App. 4th 1422, 1428-1429 (Cal. Ct. App. 1999); Pennsylvania Ins. Guaranty Ass'n v. Sikes, 590 So. 2d 1051 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1991); Mid-America Bank & Trust Co. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 224 Ill. App. 3d 1083 (Ill. App. Ct. 1992); Atlanta Int'l Ins. Co. v. Bell, 438 Mich. 512 (Mich. 1991).

n2 Federal Ins. Co. v. North Am. Specialty Ins. Co., 2007 NY Slip Op 8391 (N.Y. App. Div. 2007).

n3 See, e.g., National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1019-1027 (D. Ill. 1998) (interpreting Illinois law); Allstate Ins. Co. v. American Transit Ins. Co., 977 F. Supp. 197 (D.N.Y. 1997) (interpreting New York law); Allianz Underwriters Ins. Co. v. Landmark Ins. Co., 13 A.D.3d 172, 173-175 (N.Y. App. Div. 2004); American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480 (Tex. 1992).

n4 843 S.W.2d 480 (Tex. 1992).

n5 American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480, 481 (Tex. 1992).

n6 American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480, 484 (Tex. 1992).

n7 American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480, 484 (Tex. 1992) (citing Texas Disciplinary Rules of Professional Conduct).

n8 American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480, 484 (Tex. 1992).

n9 American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480, 484 (Tex. 1992) (quoting Atlanta Int'l Ins. Co. v. Bell, 438 Mich. 512, 521 (Mich. 1991)).

n10 American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480, 484-485 (Tex. 1992).

n11 American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480, 485 (Tex. 1992)

n12 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013 (D. Ill. 1998).

n13 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1015 (D. Ill. 1998).

n14 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1016 (D. Ill. 1998) (quoting National Unions response).

n15 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1017-1018 (D. Ill. 1998) (citations and footnotes omitted).

n16 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1018 (D. Ill. 1998).

n17 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1019 (D. Ill. 1998).

n18 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1019 (D. Ill. 1998) (quoting Pelham v. Griesheimer, 92 Ill. 2d 13, 21 (Ill. 1982)).

n19 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1019 (D. Ill. 1998).

n20 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1022 (D. Ill. 1998).

n21 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1023 (D. Ill. 1998).

n22 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1023 (D. Ill. 1998) (citing American Centennial Ins. Co. v. Canal Ins Co., 843 S.W.2d 480 (Tex. 1992)).

n23 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1023-1024 (D. Ill. 1998) (citations omitted).

n24 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1024 (D. Ill. 1998).

n25 National Union Ins. Co. v. Dowd & Dowd, P.C., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1013, 1024 (D. Ill. 1998).

n26 See, e.g., Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103 (2d Cir. 1991) (interpreting Connecticut law); St. Paul Ins. Co. v. AFIA Worldwide Ins. Co., 937 F.2d 274 (5th Cir. 1991) (applying Louisiana law); Essex Ins. Co. v. Tyler, 309 F. Supp. 2d 1270, 1274 (D. Colo. 2004) (predicting Colorado law); Querrey & Harrow, Ltd. v. Transcon. Ins. Co., 861 N.E.2d 719, 721-725 (Ind. Ct. App. 2007); American Continental Ins. Co. v. Weber & Rose, 997 S.W.2d 12 (Ky. Ct. App. 1998).

n27 See, e.g., Fireman's Fund Ins. Co. v. McDonald, 30 Cal. App. 4th 1373 (Cal. Ct. App. 1994) (rejecting claim by primary insurer); National Union Fire Ins. Co. v. Salter, 717 So. 2d 141 (Fla. 5th DCA 1998) (prohibiting subrogation by primary insurer); Bank IV Wichita v. Arn, Mullins, Unruh, Kuhn & Wilson, 250 Kan. 490 (Kan. 1992) (rejecting banks claim against debtors attorney); Great Am. Ins. Co. v. Perry, 1994 Minn. App. LEXIS 276 (Minn. Ct. App. Mar. 29, 1994); (rejecting claim by surety on a guardianship bond against guardians attorney). But see Chemical Bank of New Jersey Nat. Ass'n v. Bailey, 296 N.J. Super. 515 (App. Div. 1997) (permitting subrogation); General Accident Ins. Co. of Am. v. Schoendorf & Sorgi, 202 Wis. 2d 98 (Wis. 1996) (permitting subrogation).

n28 See, e.g., Querrey & Harrow, Ltd. v. Transcon. Ins. Co., 861 N.E.2d 719, 723-724 (Ind. Ct. App. 2007) (rejecting equitable subrogation claim by excess insurer).

n29 929 F.2d 103 (2d Cir. 1991).

n30 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103 (2d Cir. 1991) (citing Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 709 F. Supp. 44, 46 (D. Conn. 1989)).

n31 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 104-105 (2d Cir. 1991).

n32 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 105 (2d Cir. 1991).

n33 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 105 (2d Cir. 1991).

n34 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 106 (2d Cir. 1991).

n35 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 106 (2d Cir. 1991).

n36 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 107 (2d Cir. 1991) (citing Krawczyk v. Stingle, 208 Conn. 239 (Conn. 1988)).

n37 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 106 (2d Cir. 1991) (citing and quoting Krawczyk v. Stingle, 208 Conn. 239 (Conn. 1988)).

n38 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 108 (2d Cir. 1991).

n39 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 108 (2d Cir. 1991).

n40 Continental Casualty Co. v. Pullman, Comley, Bradley & Reeves, 929 F.2d 103, 108 (2d Cir. 1991).

n41 Higgins v. Karp, 239 Conn. 802 (Conn. 1997).

n42 See, e.g., Home Indem. Co. v. Lane Powell Moss & Miller, 43 F.3d 1322, 1331 (9th Cir. 1995) (interpreting Alaska law); Gulf Ins. Co. v. Berger, 79 Cal. App. 4th 114, 125-127 (Cal. Ct. App. 2000); Pennsylvania Ins. Guaranty Ass'n v. Sikes, 590 So. 2d 1051, 1052 (Fla. 3rd DCA 1991); Mobil Oil Corp. v. Maryland Cas. Co., 288 Ill. App. 3d 743, 755-756 (Ill. App. Ct. 1997); Cincinnati Ins. Co. v. Wills, 717 N.E.2d 151, 161 (Ind. 1999); Moeller v. American Guar. & Liab. Ins. Co., 707 So. 2d 1062, 1070 (Miss. 1996); Nev. Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial Dist. Court of Nev., 152 P.3d 737, 742 (Nev. 2007); Nationwide Mut. Fire Ins. Co. v. Bourlon, 172 N.C. App. 595, 601-604 (N.C. Ct. App. 2005); Spratley v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 2003 UT 39, at *P9-*P12 (Utah 2003); In re Illuzzi, 159 Vt. 155 (Vt. 1992); Barry v. USAA, 98 Wn. App. 199, 202-204 (Wash. Ct. App. 1999).

n43 2007 NY Slip Op 8391 (N.Y. App. Div. 2007).

n44 Federal Ins. Co. v. North Am. Specialty Ins. Co., 2007 NY Slip Op 8391, at *7 (N.Y. App. Div. 2007).

n45 Federal Ins. Co. v. North Am. Specialty Ins. Co., 2007 NY Slip Op 8391, at *7-*8 (N.Y. App. Div. 2007).

n46 997 S.W.2d 12 (Ky. Ct. App. 1998).

n47 American Continental Ins. Co. v. Weber & Rose, 997 S.W.2d 12, 13 (Ky. Ct. App. 1998).

n48 American Continental Ins. Co. v. Weber & Rose, 997 S.W.2d 12, 14 (Ky. Ct. App. 1998).

n49 American Continental Ins. Co. v. Weber & Rose, 997 S.W.2d 12, 12-13 (Ky. Ct. App. 1998).

n50 American Continental Ins. Co. v. Weber & Rose, 997 S.W.2d 12, 14 (Ky. Ct. App. 1998).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Douglas R. Richmond is Senior Vice President in the Professional Services Group of Aon Risk Services in Chicago, Illinois. Aon is the worlds largest insurance brokerage and risk consulting firm. Before joining Aon, Mr. Richmond was a partner with Armstrong Teasdale LLP in Kansas City, Missouri, where he had a national trial and appellate practice concentrated on insurance issues. In 1998, he was named the nations top defense lawyer in an insurance industry poll. In addition to his practice and industry experience, Mr. Richmond has taught Insurance Law at the University of Missouri School of Law and the University of Kansas School of Law. Opinions expressed here are the authors alone.

64 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Patrick A. Cathcart on The Oakland Raiders v. National Football League

2008 Emerging Issues 1106

Patrick A. Cathcart on The Oakland Raiders v. National Football League

By Patrick A. Cathcart

November 22, 2007

SUMMARY: Patrick A. Cathcart discusses the CA Supreme Courts decision in The Oakland Raiders v. Nat'l Football League, how that decision interprets the standard for appellate review of a trial courts grant of a motion for a new trial when the trial court does not provide an adequate specification of its reasons for granting a new trial as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: California Supreme Court Rules on Necessity of Specifying Explicitly the Reasons for a Grant of a New Trial

In a striking decision, the California Supreme Court held in The Oakland Raiders v. National Football League (2007) 41 Cal. 4th 624; 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 634; 2007 Cal. LEXIS 6863 (July 2, 2007) that an order granting a new trial, under the limitations of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, is subject to independent review when the order lacks an adequate specification of reasons for granting a new trial, rather than the normal review for abuse of discretion. Amendments to Code Civ. Proc. § 657 enacted in 1965 (modified slightly in 1967) require the trial court to state not only the ground upon which the motion is granted, but also the reasons for granting the motion on that ground. In this case, the trial court's order did not specify its reason or reasons for granting a new trial on each ground stated in the order [see Diamond v. Superior Court (1922) 189 Cal. 732, 736, 210 P. 36].

The striking aspect of the decision is not the basic holding, but rather its rationale and application. The holding means that a grant of a new trial that does not satisfy Code Civ. Proc. § 657 will be reversed on that ground if the evidence warranting a new trial is controverted. The application of the holding means that in an independent review of the evidence, there is practically no review beyond a determination of whether or not the evidence is in conflict.

Practitioners should endeavor to make sure that a motion for a new trial that contains any controverted evidence is accompanied by a plea to the court that the reasons supporting any grant of the motion be specified in the order. If the order does not specify the reasons, then the prevailing party must act to obtain a specification in writing of the court's reasons within 10 days, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

Grounds for Trial Court's Grant of New Trial

The trial court granted the Raiders' motions for a new trial and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, stating only:

The motion for new trial is granted. The Court finds that the objectively ascertainable acts of juror misconduct were prejudicial to the Oakland Raiders' right to a fair trial [The Oakland Raiders v. National Football League (2007) 41 Cal. 4th 624, 632; 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 634].

The trial court did not specify any reasons for its conclusion. With respect to the other grounds raised by the motion, the court stated:

While some of the objections in the motion for new trial premised on erroneous and/or prejudicial jury instructions raise serious questions concerning their use, and hav[e] given the Court some pause, having granted the motion for new trial on other grounds, we have not reached these issues [The Oakland Raiders v. National Football League (2007) 41 Cal. 4th 624, 632-633; 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 634].

Absence of Stated Reasons to Support Order Granting New Trial Shifts Burden of Proof to Party Seeking to Uphold Order

The Supreme Court, citing Aguilar v. Atlantic Richfield Co. (2001) 25 Cal. 4th 826, 850, 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 841, 24 P.3d 493, noted that ordinarily the appellant would bear the burden of persuading the appellate court that the order granting a new trial should be overturned [see also Yarrow v. State of California (1960) 53 Cal.2d 427, 434, 2 Cal. Rptr. 137, 348 P.2d 687]. However, when a party is appealing from an order granting a new trial that is defective under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, the moving party (the respondent in the appellate court) bears the burden of persuading the appellate court to uphold the order.

The Raiders court was concerned that the absence of specified reasons for a new trial necessarily would mean that the reviewing court would be speculating on the basis for the new trial. The court noted that a specific statement of "reasons" would facilitate appellate review and avoid any need for inference or speculation [Mercer v. Perez (1968) 68 Cal. 2d 104, 112-115, 65 Cal. Rptr. 315, 436 P.2d 315; see also Scala v. Jerry Witt & Sons, Inc. (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 359, 370, 90 Cal. Rptr. 592, 475 P.2d 864; Meiner v. Ford Motor Co. (1971) 17 Cal. App. 3d 127, 136, 94 Cal. Rptr. 702].

If Trial Court Provides Specification of Reasons, Standard of Review Is "Abuse of Discretion"? But Use of That Standard Is Improper In Absence of Specification of Reasons

When the trial court provides a statement of reasons as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 657, the reviewing court defers to the trial court's evidentiary determination and only reviews whether the court's decision was an abuse of discretion [see, e.g., Lane v. Hughes Aircraft Co. (2000) 22 Cal. 4th 405, 409, 412, 93 Cal. Rptr. 2d 60, 993 P.2d 388; In re Marriage of Beilock (1978) 81 Cal. App. 3d 713, 728, 146 Cal. Rptr. 675]. When there is no statement of reasons, however, an abuse of discretion standard of review would subvert the purposes of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, which are (1) "to promote judicial deliberation before judicial action" [Mercer v. Perez (1968) 68 Cal. 2d 104, 113, 65 Cal. Rptr. 315, 436 P.2d 315] and (2) "to make the right to appeal from the order more meaningful" [Mercer v. Perez (1968) 68 Cal. 2d 104, 113, 65 Cal. Rptr. 315, 436 P.2d 315]. Nor are "ultimate facts" in the court's order sufficient, since that "frustrates rather than promotes the legislative purpose of facilitating meaningful appellate review of the order granting a new trial..." [Scala v. Jerry Witt & Sons, Inc. (1970) 3 Cal. 3d 359, 370, 90 Cal. Rptr. 592, 475 P.2d 864].

Interestingly, in his concurrence, Justice Baxter seems concerned that the holding too strongly implies that the absence of specification will mean that no grant of a new trial, in violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, can be sustained. He says:

[O]ur decision to review this new trial order under a nondeferential standard is 'a narrow one'.. in that the trial court's failure to file a statement of reasons made it impossible for us to determine 'whether the trial court's ruling was based on the bias of Joseph A., the misconduct of Linda H., or both.' .. Our decision today thus does not preclude the possibility of deference to the trial court, despite its failure to supply a statement of reasons, when the record leaves no room for doubt as to the trial court's reasons for granting a new trial and its resolution of conflicting evidence supporting those reasons?as may be the case where the motion for new trial alleged only a single, specific instance of juror misconduct. [The Oakland Raiders v. National Football League (2007) 41 Cal. 4th 624, 643; 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 634].

Application of Independent Review Standard to Facts of Case

The motion for a new trial in the Raiders case was based principally on alleged juror misconduct, supported by declarations from jurors. An "independent review" as discussed above would seem to require reviewing the evidence presented and the arguments made for and against a new trial and then deciding whether substantial evidence supports a conclusion that there was juror misconduct. (In contrast, an abuse of discretion standard would limit the inquiry to whether any evidence supports the decision to grant a new trial.) However, the Supreme Court's review concluded that the violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 657 meant that the order granting the motion must be reversed, since the appellate court could not determine the basis for the trial court's decision.

In its "independent review" the Supreme Court found, in sum, that the testimonial evidence submitted by the parties in the form of juror declarations was "sharply conflicting on every material issue," and the Raiders had submitted no other evidence to support their motion for a new trial. "Consequently, upon independent review of the record, we conclude that the Raiders have failed to discharge their burden to persuade us of jury misconduct warranting the grant of a new trial" [The Oakland Raiders v. National Football League (2007) 41 Cal. 4th 624, 642; 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 634].

For general discussions of motions for a new trial, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Trial and Post-Trial Civil Procedure, Ch. 21, Motion for New Trial, and California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 371, Motions After Trial.

For discussion of juror misconduct issues generally, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Trial and Post-Trial Civil Procedure, Ch. 17, Dealing With the Jury, § 17.18 et seq.

For discussion of juror misconduct as the basis for a new trial, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Trial and Post-Trial Civil Procedure, Ch. 21, Motion for New Trial, § 21.09[2], and California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 371, Motions After Trial, § 371.63[4].

For discussion of appellate review of motions for new trial, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 371, Motions After Trial, § 371.74.

For discussion of the standards of review on appeal, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Trial and Post-Trial Civil Procedure, Ch. 21, Motion for New Trial, § 21.26 et seq., and California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 41, Appeal: Review Standards and Appellate Rules of Law, § 41.10 et seq.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Patrick A. Cathcart is a founding partner in the Los Angeles law firm Cathcart Collins LLP. For over 25 years, his practice has emphasized complex business trials and appeals, including multi-party insurance coverage litigation and professional liability matters. Mr. Cathcart was trial counsel for London market insurers in Fuller-Austin Insulation Co. v. Highlands Ins. Co. (2006) 135 Cal. App. 4th 958, 38 Cal. Rptr. 3d 716, and lead counsel for the successful appeal in Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's of London v. Superior Court (Powerine) (2001) 24 Cal. 4th 945, 103 Cal. Rptr. 2d 672, 16 P.3d 94. Mr. Cathcart is a Past President of the Association of Business Trial Lawyers (Los Angeles). Following law school, Mr. Cathcart clerked for United States District Judge Spencer Williams, in the Northern District of California. He was a Research Assistant in 1974-1975 to Hon. Arthur J. Goldberg, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, retired. During law school, Mr. Cathcart was Editor-in-Chief of the Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

65 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on the Impact of Marcus, Santoro & Kozak, P.C. v. Hung-Lin Wu

2008 Emerging Issues 1069

Sinclair on the Impact of Marcus, Santoro & Kozak, P.C. v. Hung-Lin Wu

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

November 20, 2007

SUMMARY: In the case of Marcus, Santoro & Kozak, P.C. v. Hung-Lin Wu, the Supreme Court holds that a circuit court judge correctly determined that the lien of a writ of fieri facias under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-501 required two Virginia law firms to cease disbursing funds from their trust accounts in satisfaction of accrued legal fees and related costs and to pay those funds to a judgment creditor effective upon the issuance of the writ of fieri facias.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Attorney Trust Accounts: Creditors of a Client can Grab Retainer Deposits to Satisfy the Client's Judgment Debts. Timing of "Fee Payments" and Service of the Fieri Facias Writ.

In an important ruling in the case of Marcus, Santoro & Kozak, P.C. v. Hung-Lin Wu, the Supreme Court has announced that creditors of a client can reach trust account funds provided by the client and not yet consumed by legal fees of the attorney. The Court holds that a circuit court judge correctly determined that the lien of a writ of fieri facias under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-501 required two Virginia law firms to cease disbursing funds from their trust accounts in satisfaction of accrued legal fees and related costs and to pay those funds to a judgment creditor effective upon the issuance of the writ of fieri facias.

Key Topics

- The decision charts important provisions governing trust account funds, both in light of traditional trust principles and in light of the particular mechanisms contained in the garnishment provisions of Va. Code Ann. Title 8.01. It construes the proper scope of collection efforts, garnishments directed to law firms, the effectiveness of writs of fieri facias, whether service of the writ on the debtor plays any role in triggering the obligation to make trust fund deposits available to satisfy the creditor's claims, and the mechanical requirements of Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-501 and Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502.
- The opinion invalidates, for garnishment avoidance purposes, payments of legal fees by the law firms to themselves after the date on which they receive notice of the issuance of a writ of fieri facias, even absent service of the writ upon the client, and prior to the issuance of a garnishment summons directed to the law firms.

Factual Context

The Court's landmark garnishment case involving client trust accounts arose upon facts in which a judgment debtor hired two different Virginia law firms to contest judgments entered against him and a number of business entities with which he was affiliated. This client paid each of the firms a retainer, pursuant to representation agreements that permitted each firm to place the retainer funds into trust accounts and periodically disburse funds to themselves from these accounts as legal fees and costs were incurred over the course of the representation.

A key goal of the client in engaging the firms was apparently to resist enforcement of judgment efforts by the judgment creditor. Undeterred, the creditor set about efforts to collect on the judgments. The judgment creditor caused writs of fieri facias to be delivered to the sheriff pursuant to Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-466, and on the same day served it upon the law firms, but not initially on the judgment debtor. About one week later, the judgment creditor caused separate garnishment summonses to be issued against each of the firms that contained new writs of fieri facias and notices of the liens arising therefrom, and the judgment debtor was also served. It was not disputed by the law firms that by the time of service of the second writs and the garnishment summonses, which were served both upon the client and the law firms, the effectiveness of the writs' asset capture mechanisms was triggered. However -- after the initial service of fieri facias only upon the law firms and prior to the dates on which the law firms and the judgment debtor were served with the second wave of summonses and notices -- both law firms took the occasion to disburse accrued legal fees and expenses from the trust accounts to themselves for work previously done.

On the return date of the garnishment summonses, both firms tendered checks to the circuit court representing the full amount of retainer funds remaining in their trust accounts as of the dates that they and the judgment debtor were served with the garnishment summonses in the second wave of writs. The firms also filed separate motions to dismiss the garnishment and motions for summary judgment, contending that -- by operation of Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502 -- the liens created under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-501 were not perfected at the time the initial papers were served and thus did not obligate the firms, as "person[s] making a payment to the judgment debtor," to refrain from disbursing funds from the trust accounts until the dates that they and the judgment debtor were both served with the garnishment summonses containing the new writs of fieri facias and notices of the liens arising therefrom. The circuit court disagreed and found in favor of the judgment creditor, ruling that the law firms were not "person[s] making a payment to the judgment debtor" under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502 and thus it found that they were personally liable for any amounts disbursed out of the trust funds after the dates that they were served with the initial notices of liens of fieri facias (without regard to whether the client was served with the writs at that time). The law firms appealed.

Arguments and Analysis

The law firms took the position that the client's interest in the trust accounts, into which he deposited his funds under the retainer agreements, was only a bare contract right. They contended that he had no property right or ownership interest in the trust account funds. The Supreme Court promptly and unequivocally rejected the argument that the firms had only had a legally enforceable contractual obligation to repay the client the unearned and unused retainer deposits. Spelling out for the first time in Virginia case law some principles previously only articulated in federal court decisions, the Court noted that an attorney who receives funds from a client for the future payment of legal fees for services not yet rendered holds those funds in trust. It holds that he funds are the corpus of a trust of which the attorney is the trustee and the client the beneficiary.

Applying Broadbush v. Gresham, 181 Va. 725, 26 S.E.2d 33 (1943) and other older law on the general nature of the fiduciary relationship, and its distinction from a debtor/creditor relationship, the Court made it clear at the outset that the law firms were in a fiduciary relationship with the judgment debtor, holding his property (the funds he tendered to the firms) as the corpus of a trust of which he was the beneficiary. It noted that nothing in either representation agreement evidenced any other type of relationship.

The firms were thus under a fiduciary duty to, among other things, return the funds in the fiduciary trust account to the client upon his request. The Court found that this obligation did not convert the parties' relationship to that of debtor and creditor as to the trust funds although the client could have sought many of the same remedies as a creditor had the firms failed to discharge their fiduciary duty.

Since client funds deposited in an attorney's trust account are funds held in trust, a claim of the client for return of funds is more than merely a personal claim against the attorney for the payment of the sum of money on deposit: the Court observed that clients retain both an equitable or beneficial ownership interest in the funds. The deposit of one client's funds in an account with funds of other clients does not destroy the beneficial interest of the clients in the funds so deposited. The Court held that the clients are entitled to those funds to the extent their equitable ownership interests can be traced. Thus, for all relevant purposes in this context, the trust account funds were the client's property.

Review of Enforcement Mechanisms Basics

Under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-474, a writ of fieri facias commands "the officer . . . to make the money therein mentioned out of the goods and chattels of the person against whom the judgment is." Garnishment is the process by which a judgment creditor may enforce the lien of his writ of fieri facias against any debt or property due his judgment debtor that is held by a third party, the garnishee. The creditor can assert no greater rights against the garnishee than the judgment debtor, himself, possesses. In Marcus, Santoro the Supreme Court emphasized that a garnishment summons does not create a lien itself, but, instead, is a means of enforcing the lien of an execution placed in the hands of an officer to be levied.

The Court holds that a garnishment reaches any intangible property interest of a debtor, a scope that is not limited to the "narrow category of a debtor-creditor obligation." Thus, the Court holds that if it appears upon proof or upon confession of the garnishee that he owes the judgment debtor any debt or property, the court may give judgment against him.

Applied in the law firm context in the Marcus, Santoro decision, the Court found that the firms, as garnishees, held the intangible equitable property interest of the judgment debtor in their trust accounts and were under a fiduciary duty not only to hold that interest but to return the property to him when the trust obligation ended.

The key result of this analysis is that the judgment debtor's interest in the trust accounts could be attached in garnishment by the judgment creditor, who enforces the lien of his execution against property of the judgment debtor in the hands of a third person, the garnishee (here, the firms).

Persons Making Payment. Perhaps the central argument of the law firms in the Marcus, Santoro case was the claim that with respect to the retainer deposits in trust accounts each firm was "a person making a payment to the judgment debtor" under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502 such that no liability under the writ of fieri facias attached until the notice requirements of the statute had been met. This argument was flatly rejected by the Supreme Court of Virginia.

Starting from the standard premise that garnishment, like other lien enforcement remedies authorizing seizure of property, is a creature of statute unknown to the common law, the principle of strict satisfaction of requirements is applied. The Court called the "person making a payment" theory "attenuated, if not illusory:"

If [the client] were a plumber and provided plumbing services to the Firms, then their payment to Tseng for those services would clearly be a Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502 "payment to the judgment debtor." In that case, the lien of fieri facias would not cause a liability on the part of the Firms for making the plumbing payment to Tseng until he had been properly served with notice of the lien. However, the Firms' claim of a statutory payment in this case is far more attenuated, if not illusory, than the foregoing example.

The Court found "no hint in Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502 that any artifice or legal fiction is contemplated by the plain language of the statute." Proceeding on the plain meaning canon of construction that the words of the statute mean simply what they say, and that words cannot be interpolated into clear statutory provisions, the Court held:

The service requirements of Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502 apply only where the garnishee actually makes a payment to the judgment debtor. Simply put, the firms never made a payment to the judgment debtor; they paid themselves. When the firms withdrew their client's property from the trust accounts, they made no payment to the client, the judgment debtor. Instead, the firms put his money into their pockets or the pockets of their nominees, but never the judgment debtor. Consequently, the firms are not persons making a payment to the judgment debtor within the intentment of Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-502 and the notice requirements of that statute cannot be claimed by them. Therefore, the failure to make service upon the judgment debtor under that statute has no effect on the firms' liability to the judgment creditor under the garnishments.

Open Issues Remaining.

- Because there was no error assigned to the circuit court's factual finding that the firms were served on the same date the first fieri facias writs were delivered to the sheriff, the Court in Marcus, Santoro had no occasion to comment on whether failure to have made service upon the firms on the same day that delivery of the writ was made to the sheriff would have changed the effectiveness -- or the effective date -- of the lien under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-501.

- Additionally, the Court's repeated mention of the absence of any provision in the retainer agreements prepared by both firms that would make provisions altering the general treatment of the retainer deposit as trust account funds under long-established law leaves open the issue of to what extent express provisions might be crafted by Virginia lawyers to address -- or head off -- the sort of enforcement efforts attempted here. However, the strength of the Court's rejection of the theory that the firms are "persons making a payment to the debtor" suggests that any such provisions will not have this easy avenue to follow.

Conclusion

The Marcus, Santoro decision provides not only a roadmap to the operations of two key sections in the garnishment article of Va. Code Ann. Title 8.01, but also a red flag for lawyers about the timing of fee and expense draws against retainer deposits held in trust funds. Where the possibility exists that the client has a judgment creditor in the hunt for assets against which to enforce the judgment lien, prompt and regular accounting for fees and expenses incurred will minimize the risk that a garnishment summons and writ of fieri facias will intervene to capture trust account moneys intended to compensate the attorney for work already undertaken in the pending engagement.

Virginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

With respect to general issues concerning the procedures and mechanisms for creation and enforcement of judgment liens in Virginia, see Enforcement of Judgments and Liens in Virginia § 1.2 (Virginia's Statutory Scheme); Chapter 2 (Collection of Money Judgments from Personal Property: Execution Fi. Fa); § 3.8 (Other Property Subject to Garnishment). See also Virginia Civil Benchbook §10-III (Garnishment).

Complete overviews of the relevant tools for enforcement of judgments in Virginia may be found in Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure, Chapter 15: Execution of Judgments and Related Proceedings, and in Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice Chapter 32: Enforcement of Judgments and § 22.03 (Enforcement of Judgment Liens), § 22.04 (Execution: Writ of Fieri Facias, Etc.) and § 22.08 (Garnishment).

For a complete discussion of the related topic of attachment, including the "harmonization" in recent years of the Virginia remedies of Attachment, Detinue, Seizure, and Distress, the recognized grounds for attachment, procedures for issuance of the writ, mechanics of service, levy, and return on the writ, as well as the guidelines for the defendant's response, applicable bond provisions, and post-judgment procedures, see Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure, Chapter 16: Attachment.

For a brief overview of the equitable and remedial aspects of lawyers' trust accounts, see John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies § 19.11 (The Lawyer's Office Trust Fund(s)).

The contempt remedy in connection with writs of attachment is discussed in John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies § 15.03 (Contempts (Writ of Attachment)).

See generally Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia and West Virginia, ATTACHMENT AND GARNISHMENT, and TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES (2007).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Kent Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

66 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on the impact of Billips v. Commonwealth

2008 Emerging Issues 1070

Sinclair on the impact of Billips v. Commonwealth

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

November 20, 2007

SUMMARY: One of its Senior Justices, rendered in a specialized--one is tempted to say arcane--criminal practice context, the Supreme Court of Virginia has issued a general statement about the application of the "reliability standard" for admission of expert proof in the Commonwealth, and has made that standard applicable in at least some aspects of the sentencing process in criminal cases, over a pointed concurring opinion by two Justices of the Court.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Broad Impact from a Narrow Ruling: "Daubert," the Adequacy of the Basis for Expert Proof, and the Application in Virginia of the Burden to Show the Reliability of Expert Proof-Whose Job is it and What is the Standard? Does the same standard apply in Civil and Criminal Cases, and to All Phases of a Criminal Case?

In a short opinion by one of its Senior Justices, rendered in a specialized-one is tempted to say arcane-criminal practice context, the Supreme Court of Virginia has issued a general statement about the application of the "reliability standard" for admission of expert proof in the Commonwealth, and has made that standard applicable in at least some aspects of the sentencing process in criminal cases, over a pointed concurring opinion by two Justices of the Court who argued that the general reliability doctrine should not have been addressed and was being applied in a context inconsistent with at least some aspects of Virginia's sentencing statutes and procedures in which inadmissible hearsay can be used.

On depressing facts, the decision in Billips v. Commonwealth demonstrates that Virginia's "reliability" standard for admission of expert proof has continuing vitality. This doctrine, enunciated in Virginia decisions well prior to the United States Supreme Court's celebrated decision in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 509 U.S. 579 (1993), and the thousands of trial and appellate decisions applying "Daubert" thinking to flesh out analysis about the admission of scientific and expert proof, is "alive and well" in Virginia and has a well-established burden of proof. At least with new technologies, as exemplified in the present sex-crimes context, that burden rests on the proponent of the scientific proof-not on the objector-to show the reliable scientific basis for the proffered evidence.

Narrow Context-Broad Issue

On one level, the Billips decision presents the issue of the admissibility of a form of proof unique to sex-crime sentencing procedures: "penile plethysmograph testing." According to the dictionary that every Virginia practitioner should have on his or her shelf (because it is the standard to which the Supreme Court of Virginia has recourse every year in large numbers of cases), Webster's Third New International Dictionary (1993, the latest edition), a "plethysmograph" is "an instrument for determining and registering variations in the size of an organ or limb and in the amount of blood present or passing through it."

The distressing reality is that such an instrument is used by social workers and psychological professionals in forming an assessment of the tendency of an individual to be aroused by images of a sexual nature, often focusing on the age or developmental stage of the persons depicted in the images. The present case demonstrates the prospective use of this technology.

The defendant in Billips, who was himself a juvenile, was charged with two counts of forcible sodomy of a child under the age of 13 years, and one count of soliciting a child to commit sodomy. The juvenile and domestic relations district court certified the case to the circuit court, where he was found guilty of all three offenses in a jury trial. The circuit court continued the case for a presentence evaluation. By the time of trial, this defendant had attained his majority. The circuit court, before sentencing, ordered a presentence report containing a psychosexual evaluation pursuant to Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-300.

As recounted by the Supreme Court in its appellate opinion, at the initial sentencing hearing in circuit court, defense counsel objected to the presentence report and to the testimony of a licensed clinical social worker who explained the report, on the grounds that the report was based in part on inadmissible polygraph test results, and also was based in part on plethysmograph testing. Advancing an argument that has been made in several states as this technology became more well-known in recent years, defense counsel in this Virginia case argued that the plethysmograph was "conceptually similar" to the polygraph in that both allow an operator to draw inferences from the body's physical responses to emotional stimuli.

Interestingly, in Billips the trial court sustained the defense objection to any testimony based on polygraph testing, but not to plethysmograph testing. The court ordered a new risk assessment report excluding any consideration of polygraph testing, but ruled that the plethysmograph results could remain a part of the report.

At the final sentencing proceeding in the circuit court, over the defendant's objection, the judge considered a revised risk evaluation report and heard the testimony of the licensed clinical social worker who participated in preparing it. The report stated that this defendant had been subjected to a "penile plethysmograph assessment" to evaluate the presence or absence of "deviant sexual arousal." The report further stated:

Research has demonstrated that deviant sexual arousal is one of the best indicators of risk to sexually re-offend. As used by our agency, the penile plethysmograph is designed to measure sexual responsiveness to a variety of stimuli. Males and females ranging in age from infant to adult are represented in the stimuli. Visual stimuli are accompanied by audio stimuli describing behavior across a range of different sexual activity.

The report concluded that the defendant's responses to various scenarios, including those involving children, placed him "in the highest re-offense risk category."

Defendant's objections to the report's continued inclusion of the plethysmograph test results and the witness's testimony about such tests focused on the need for a "threshold finding of fact with respect to reliability of the scientific method used." As is often the case in disputes concerning expert or scientific proof in the Commonwealth, this argument relied on language in Spencer v. Commonwealth, 240 Va. 78, 393 S.E.2d 609 (1990), one of the earliest references to the need for reliability in scientific proof in Virginia. The circuit court overruled the foundational objection and then imposed sentences of life imprisonment for each of the sodomy convictions and five years confinement on the solicitation conviction. After affirmance in the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court awarded this defendant an appeal limited to an assignment of error concerning admission of evidence based on plethysmograph testing.

Legal Landscape

Seventeen years ago the Supreme Court of Virginia in Spencer (1) confirmed its rejection of the so-called "Frye test" (a prominent but minority rule, nationally requiring "general acceptance" of a technology in the relevant scientific discipline), and (2) stated a general "reliability approach" which the Court in the present Billips decision calls the "rule governing the admissibility of scientific evidence":

We have declined to adopt the "Frye test" in Virginia. When scientific evidence is offered, the court must make a threshold finding of fact with respect to the reliability of the scientific method offered, unless it is of a kind so familiar and accepted as to require no foundation to establish the fundamental reliability of the system, such as fingerprint analysis; or unless it is so unreliable that the considerations requiring its exclusion have ripened into rules of law, such as "lie-detector" tests; or unless its admission is regulated by statute, such as blood-alcohol test results.

Criminal Cases. When Billips was heard in the Court of Appeals, that court held the Spencer standard inapplicable because a "relaxed standard of admissibility [applies] at sentencing hearings" and concluded that, at the sentencing stage, all that is required is that the proffered evidence bear "some indicia of reliability." The Court of Appeals found such indicia of reliability in the testimony of the probation officer and the licensed clinical social worker who had prepared the defendant's presentence report.

Referring again to the Spencer language as the "rule," the Supreme Court observed that neither witness qualified before the trial judge as an expert in the field of plethysmograph testing and the circuit court made no "threshold finding of fact that the system was reliable." While the Court of Appeals noted that the defendant had offered no evidence at the sentencing hearing to support his contention that the plethysmograph testing method was unreliable, the Supreme Court rejected that allocation of the burden to lay the necessary evidentiary foundation. Further, the Supreme Court flatly rejects the view expressed by the Court of Appeals that no threshold finding of reliability was necessary and that the admission of the evidence was within the circuit court's discretion.

The Supreme Court explained that the "rule" spelled out in Spencer has very broad application:

Although Spencer was a case in which scientific evidence was offered at the guilt phase of a capital murder trial, we said nothing there to limit the applicability of its rule to that phase alone. Rather, the Spencer rule applies to the use of scientific evidence in judicial proceedings generally.

Recognizing that "advancements in the sciences continually outpace the education of laymen . . . judges, jurors and lawyers," the Supreme Court warned in the present case that reliability is not to be presumed for new technology, citing the landmark polemic, Peter W. Huber, Galileo's Revenge: Junk Science in the Courtroom 206-209 (1991), the Court said:

[T]here is a risk that those essential components of the judicial system may gravitate toward uncritical acceptance of any pronouncement that appears to be "scientific," and the more esoteric the field, the more difficult it becomes for laymen to greet it with skepticism. That tendency has given rise to frequent complaints of "junk science" in the courts.

Given this "risk" and inherent power of baseless science to mislead, the Court concluded:

To guard against that risk, we continue to require a "threshold finding of fact with respect to the reliability of the scientific method offered," subject only to the exceptions [mentioned] in Spencer.

The "exceptions" adverted to in the Court's 1990 decision in Spencer, 240 Va. 78, 97, 393 S.E.2d 609, 620, 621, are illustrative, and important. They are:

- techniques or science that are so familiar and accepted as to require no foundation to establish fundamental reliability of the system (the Court gave the example of fingerprint identification).
- tests that are so unreliable that the exclusion of such proof has "ripened into rules of law." (The Court gave the example of polygraph proof).
- categories of proof the admissibility of which is directed by statute. (The Court referred to legislative provisions concerning blood-alcohol test results as one example).

Burden of Laying The Foundation

Rejecting the implication in the lower courts' decisions that the defendant had the obligation to show affirmatively that there was a problem with plethysmograph proof, the Court stressed that the proponent of new scientific evidence has the burden to establish its reliability:

As with any evidence requiring a preliminary foundation, the burden of making a prima facie showing of that foundation rests upon the proponent of the evidence, subject to the opponent's opportunity for cross-examination and refutation. Here, the Court of Appeals erred in reversing that burden, requiring Billips to introduce evidence of unreliability instead of requiring that the Commonwealth first make out a prima facie case of "the reliability of the scientific method offered."

In the Billips case itself, the Commonwealth failed to offer any proof of the general scientific reliability of the particular technique involved. Hence the Supreme Court concluded that the plethysmograph evidence, lacking foundation, was inadmissible in the sentencing proceeding. Since this was not a "harmless" error, the case was remanded for resentencing.

Relaxed Standards in Phases of a Criminal Case?

One of the backdrops for the discussion in this recent Billips decision is a longstanding confusion among some practitioners and judges about a "relaxed" standard of evidentiary admission in criminal cases, or certain phases of a criminal case. The key point made by the two judges who chose in Billips to concur specially rather than join the Court's broad opinion, was that this case concerned only the admissibility of evidence contained in a pre-sentence report prepared in accordance with the provisions of Va. Code Ann. §§ 19.2-299 and Va. Code Ann. 19.2-300. Under these provisions, and also under Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-301, such a pre-sentence report is considered only by a trial court in its sentencing decision. The two concurring Justices refer to this doctrine with great precision, noting that it is a relaxed standard governing admissibility of evidence that is contained in a pre-sentence report, in accord with these cited statutes and decisions such as O'Dell v. Commonwealth, 234 Va. 672, 701, 364 S.E.2d 491, 508 (1988), which noted that after the jury has fixed the sentence the court may consider hearsay evidence contained in pre-sentence report.

This is a far cry from there being a "relaxed standard" for admission of proof in a criminal case, or even in sentencing proceedings where the jury is still functioning. There is nothing in the cited statutes or cases like O'Dell that could properly be read as relaxing admissibility of proof in the jury phase of sentencing under the bifurcated procedure. Rather, these items address the range of the trial judge's discretion to consider all helpful sources after the jury has completed its work and has been discharged.

References by Virginia courts over the last 20 years to the permitted use of postsentence reports containing hearsay has caused some confusion in the bar about admissibility standards. Most of the prior cases, including O'Dell, use the term "postsentence" reports, keyed off of Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-264.5. Much of the problem may be due to the application in modern bifurcated sentencing cases of the older United States Supreme Court Cases, and of mixing the questions of admissibility standards for proof to the jury in the sentencing phase of a bifurcated case with the freedom a trial judge has to consider unadmitted material and hearsay in the presentence or postsentence report.

In the Court of Appeals' decision in the Billips appeal, there was a long discussion of relaxed evidence standards in sentencing, citing both its own decision in Harris v. Commonwealth, 26 Va. App. 794, 497 S.E.2d 165 (1998), and the Supreme Court of Virginia's decision in McClain v. Commonwealth, 189 Va. 847, 55 S.E.2d 49 (1949), both of which rely upon the U.S. Supreme Court's older case law. But the general tenor of the latter is to address whether Due Process prevents considering proof that does not meet traditional standards for admission into evidence, not whether a state's evidence law could require more of an evidentiary foundation at sentencing.

Beyond the Due Process aspect (which is not a comment on admissibility of ordinary evidence or scientific evidence) there is a second problem. It would be a mistake to reason from the admissibility of unadjudicated prior bad acts in a criminal case, and whether those instances of prior conduct can be established merely by a preponderance of the evidence, to a conclusion that relaxed standards apply for the admissibility of evidence. Rather, those doctrines merely reflect the proposition that while the overall burden of proving guilt in the pending criminal case is beyond a reasonable doubt, any particular bad act does not need to be proven by the higher level of proof. Such authority is not saying, for example, that hearsay is admissible to prove a prior bad act in the jury phase of the bifurcated sentencing, just that the regular preponderance standard need is all that need be satisfied for the judge to allow consideration of the prior act.

The general confusion of the bar on this topic in recent decades has been addressed squarely in two decisions by the Supreme Court. In 2004, when the Court rendered Powell v. Commonwealth, 267 Va. 107, 590 S.E.2d 537 (2004), it wrote as follows:

We further reject Powell's contention that there is a "relaxed evidentiary standard" applicable to the penalty determination phase of a capital murder trial in Virginia. To the contrary, Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-264.4(B) expressly provides, and we have consistently held, that the Commonwealth must prove the existence of one or both aggravating factors beyond a reasonable doubt. See, e.g., Clark v. Commonwealth, 220 Va. 201, 212, 257 S.E.2d 784, 791 (1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1049 (1980).

Powell's contention that the introduction of evidence of unadjudicated criminal acts is not admissible because Ring somehow refines the need for "heightened reliability" in capital sentencing is, as the Commonwealth notes, nothing more than a reassertion of the same argument raised in his prior motion and consistently rejected by this Court. Jackson v. Commonwealth, 267 Va. 178, 590 S.E.2d 520 (2004) (today decided). Powell's assertion that Code § 19.2-264.4(B) permits the introduction of hearsay evidence not otherwise subject to an exception is simply wrong. n.9. See, e.g., Lovitt v. Warden, 266 Va. 216, 259, 585 S.E.2d 801, 806 (2003); Jackson, 267 Va. at 536, 590 S.E.2d at 206, 2004.

For these reasons, we hold that the trial court did not err in overruling Powell's motion to have the Virginia capital murder statutes declared unconstitutional.

Footnote No. 9 in Powell read: "On brief, the Commonwealth suggests that Powell has confused the evidentiary standard applicable to the penalty determination phase with that applicable to the trial court's consideration of the presentence report. Powell did not respond to this assertion in his reply brief and does not otherwise assert that Ring has any implication to the post-verdict sentencing procedure. Accordingly, we express no opinion on that issue."

And in the Lovitt case, cited above, the Court also expressly said:

We also find no merit in Lovitt's claim that the judge at the habeas hearing improperly excluded certain affidavits by several of Lovitt's family members that Lovitt attempted to introduce into evidence. Assuming, without deciding, that such affidavits are admissible subject to the trial court's discretion in an evidentiary hearing held under Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-654(C), we conclude that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit them into evidence. The facts alleged in those affidavits were cumulative of the testimony of Taylor, Jones, and Carter.

Lovitt also is incorrect in his assertion that the affidavits at issue would have been admissible in the penalty phase proceeding and, thus, should have been admitted into evidence on that basis at the habeas hearing. Unlike some other jurisdictions, Virginia does not permit the admission of such hearsay evidence during penalty phase proceedings. See Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-264.4(B).

The cited Va. Code Ann. section, § 19.2-264.4(B), in the first paragraph provides that those presentence reports shall not be admitted in a jury case, and in the second, unnumbered paragraph invokes the application of the normal rules of evidence.

Conclusion

Just like hearsay, it would be exceptionally dangerous to suggest that the reliability standard for admission of expert proof is relaxed in the guilt phase of jury proceedings in criminal cases. A computer search back to 1788 for any evidence decision in Virginia using any form of the "relax" concept in a criminal case yields: nothing. At least where the jury has a function, whatever standards the Court ultimately spells out for assuring the reliability of scientific evidence generally would also be applied at that stage. The recent Billips decision goes a measurable distance down this road, stressing the universally applicable principle that the proponent of scientific proof (which has not yet attained the level of acceptance of, say, fingerprint analysis) has the burden of laying a finding to support a threshold determination that the principles involved in the proof are reliable.

Virginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

With respect to general issues concerning the standards for admission of expert and scientific proof in Virginia, see Charles E. Friend, The Law of Evidence in Virginia Chapter 14: Scientific Evidence; § 17-18 (Basis for Expert Opinion). See also the Boyd-Graves Conference (Kent Sinclair, Reporter), The Guide to Evidence in Virginia (2007), Section 702 (Experts). See also Sinclair, Kearfott, Sheridan & Imwinkelreid, Virginia Evidentiary Foundations Guide (Supp. 2004).

In connection with managing expert proof at trial, see Virginia Civil Benchbook §4-III (Opinion Evidence), and Virginia Criminal Benchbook § 7-III (Opinion Evidence) and § V (Scientific Evidence).

Landmark Virginia decisions on the admission of expert or scientific proof, in addition to the Spencer case discussed above would include Satcher v. Commonwealth, 244 Va. 220, 244, 421 S.E.2d 821, 835 (1992). The Supreme Court of Virginia has expressly left open for future consideration the issue whether analysis similar to that employed by the federal courts under Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharms., 516 U.S. 869 (1995), should be applied in Virginia trial courts to determine the scientific reliability of expert testimony. See John v. Im, 263 Va. 315, 559 S.E.2d 694 (2000). Concerning "blood spatter" evidence and the testability of scientific proof, see Smith v. Commonwealth, 265 Va. 250, 576 S.E.2d 465 (2003).

For an overview of the sentencing process, including discussion of non-capital felony practice, the trial judge's role, general considerations, bifurcated trial aspects, sentencing factors, jury sentencing processes, and suspended sentences, see Virginia Criminal Law and Procedure Chapter 63.

See generally Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia and West Virginia, EVIDENCE, (2007).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Kent Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). He is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

67 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Dorsaneo on Significant 2007 Texas Legislation

2008 Emerging Issues 1047

Dorsaneo on Significant 2007 Texas Legislation

By William V. Dorsaneo III.

November 19, 2007

SUMMARY: Gain insights and a quick overview of key developments from the 2007 80th Texas Regular Legislative Session. Topics covered include: venue in Jones Act cases; new requirements for all partys first pleadings; and, additional filing fees for Appellate Practice;

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Overview

The 2007 80th Texas Regular Legislative Session affected many areas of law. Some of the key changes relevant to civil litigation are summarized and analyzed by Professor Dorsaneo below. For detailed coverage, see Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide, at the chapters and sections identified below.

Civil Practice and Litigation

New Identification Requirements for Original Pleadings. In a new pleading requirement, newly added Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 30.014(a) requires a partys first pleading, typically an original petition or original answer, to include the last three numbers of the partys drivers license number (if the party has a drivers license) and the last three numbers of the partys social security number, if the party has been issued a social security number. The remedy for violating these requirements is a court order compelling compliance that is itself enforceable by contempt. See Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 30.014(b).

Increase in Justice and Small Claims Court Jurisdiction. Tex. Gov't Code §§ 26.042, 27.031, and 28.003 have been amended to increase the upper limit of justice and small claims court jurisdiction to $10,000 from the previous $5,000. Similarly, Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code §§ 51.001 and §51.002 have been amended to give county courts appellate jurisdiction over justice court cases if the amount in controversy exceeds $250, up from $20 previously. The higher jurisdictional limits for justice and small claims courts should aid in expediting trials and decreasing the backlog in county level and district courts. See Ch. 2, Jurisdiction, § 2.01[3][b][e], and Ch. 46, Justice Court Proceedings, § 46.01. The increase in the jurisdictional ceiling of justice and small claims courts was one of several recommendations made in a report published in 2007 by the Texans for Lawsuit Reform Foundation entitled The Texas Judicial System. A companion change that did not get enacted in the last legislative session would have increased the jurisdictional threshold for a district courts civil jurisdiction to $10,000. More can be expected on the subject of reforming the structure of Texas trial courts in 2009.

Venue in Jones Act Cases. New 2007 legislation providing for mandatory venue in Jones Act cases in listed counties has been added to Ch. 61, Venue [Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 15.0181; see § 61.02[7][a]]. Under prior law, venue in Jones Act was proper in the county of the plaintiff's residence at the time the cause of action accrued. See former Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code @ 15.018 (enacted in 1995, eff. 1/1/96). Apparently, blanket authorization for such actions to be filed in the plaintiffs county of residence caused or contributed to an explosion of lawsuits in Texas against dredging companies under the Jones Act. These lawsuits threatened to make dredging in Texas so expensive that projects along the Texas Gulf Coast were arguably placed at serious risk. Accordingly, the new law takes a more nuanced approach by providing special mandatory venue rules for cases in which a substantial part of the events giving rise to a claim occurred on inland waters in Texas, outside Texas, ashore in Texas, in another Gulf Coast state, or during the course of an erosion response project.

Business Entities and Relationships

Continuation of Partnership After Event Requiring Winding Up. If a domestic general partnership does not have a period of duration, is not for a particular undertaking, and is not required under its partnership agreement to wind up the partnership on the occurrence of a specified event, an event requiring the winding up of the partnership occurs on the 60th day after the date on which the partnership receives notice of a request for the winding up of the partnership from a partner, unless a majority in interest of the partners deny the request for winding up or agree to continue the partnership. See Tex. Bus. Org. Code § 11.057(d), covered in Ch. 181, Withdrawal of Partners and Winding Up, § 181.21[7].

Real Estate Litigation

Trespass to Try Title Actions. In an important change, Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 37.004(c) permits a declaratory judgment action and an award of attorney's fees when the sole issue concerning title to real property is the determination of the proper boundary line between adjoining properties. This overrules the Texas Supreme Court's decision in Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262 (Tex. 2004) and provides a more user friendly alternative method of resolving title disputes concerning boundary lines. See Ch. 250, Adverse Possession, § 250.101[1]; Ch. 251, Trespass to Try Title, §§ 251.01[2], 251.05[1], 251.101[1]; Ch. 257, Suit to Quiet Title, §§ 257.01[3], 257.110[1]; Ch. 280, Adjoining Landowners, §§ 280.01[2], 280.51, 280.60, 280.100[1], 280.101[1].

Statute of Limitations in Suits to Recover Title. Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 16.033(c) enacts a two-year statute of limitations for suits to recover title to or an interest in real property based on several kinds of technical defects in a property instrument recorded with the county clerk in the county where the property is located. See Ch. 251, Trespass to Try Title, § 251.04[3]; Ch. 257, Suit to Quiet Title, § 257.05[1]).

Condemnation Bill of Rights. A condemning authority must provide to the owner of property affected a landowner's bill of rights statement, which describes condemnation procedures, including both the authority's obligations to the owner and the owner's rights to object to and appeal the amount of damages awarded [Tex. Prop. Code § 21.0112; Tex. Gov't Code § 402.031]. See Ch. 261, Condemnation, §§ 261.02[1], 261.100[1].

Personal Injury Litigation

Right to Use Force in Defense. Amendments to Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 83.001 and corresponding sections to the Penal Code greatly expand the right of a person to use force or deadly force in self-defense, in defense of another, or in defense of property. As to causes of action that accrued on or after Sept. 1, 2007, Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 83.001 provides civil immunity from liability for personal injury or death that results from any use of force or deadly force that is justified under Chapter 9 of the Penal Code. See Ch. 292, Death Actions, § 292.02[1]; Ch. 330, Assault and Battery, §§ 330.07, § 330.110.

Settlements Against State of Texas. New Chapter 111 of the Civil Practice and Remedies Code requires legislative consent or approval of certain settlements of claims or actions against the State of Texas when the settlement was entered into on or after June 15, 2007. See Ch. 102, Settlement, § 102.04[5]; Ch. 293, Claims Against Governmental Entities, § 293.16[6].

Architect Immunity. New Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 150.003 provides that an architect or engineer who voluntarily (and without compensation or the expectation of compensation) performs professional services during and in response to a declared emergency or disaster is not liable for civil damages unless the act, error, or omission constitutes gross negligence, or wanton, willful, or intentional misconduct. See Ch. 322, Professional Malpractice, §§ 322.04[2], 322.102[1].

Insurance Litigation

Parent's Worker's Compensation Benefits. Tex. Lab. Code § 408.182 is amended to authorize an eligible parent to collect worker's compensation death benefits, even if not dependent on the deceased employee, when the employee has no other legal beneficiary otherwise entitled to the benefits. See Ch. 340, Worker's Compensation, § 340.12.

Life Insurance. New Tex. Ins. Code § 1114.001 et seq. requires that if an existing life insurance policy or annuity is replaced by different coverage on or after January 1, 2008, the replacing insurer and any insurance agent must ascertain whether the insured has existing coverage and, if so, to provide notice to the insured of the effects of replacing the existing coverage, including whether the proceeds or value of the existing coverage will be used to finance the replacement coverage. These notices may aid in preventing unethical practices such as "twisting," which involves a failure to make complete comparisons of insurance contracts for the purpose of persuading an insured to surrender an existing contract and to purchase another insurance contract, or "churning," which involves persuading a life insurance policy holder to purchase a policy with a higher death benefit, even though these transactions do not benefit the policy holder. See Ch. 344, Life, Health and Accident Insurance, § 344.01[2][b].

Family Code Litigation

Annulment Based on Mental Incapacity. A marriage may be declared void based on a party's lack of mental capacity if the application to declare the marriage void was pending on the date of the party's death or the decedent had been married for less than three years and the application is filed within one year of the death. See Tex. Prob. Code §

47A; see also Tex. Fam. Code § 6.108(a)(c); see Ch. 361, Annulment and Suit To Declare Marriage Void, § 361.02[6][e]. In such cases, a court must declare that a decedent's marriage is void if it finds that, on the date the marriage occurred, the decedent did not have the mental capacity to consent to the marriage and understand the nature of the marriage ceremony. The court may not declare the marriage void, however, if it finds that after the marriage occurred, the decedent gained the mental capacity to recognize the marriage relationship and did recognize that relationship. See Tex. Prob. Code § 47A(d)(e), covered in Ch. 394, Will Construction, § 394.02[7]. This new law was passed in order to void those marriages entered into as a result of mendacious caretakers who sought to take advantage of individuals who were mentally incapable of entering into marriages.

Obligor's Death Does Not End Child Support. The death of a parent on or after September 1, 2007, who has been ordered to pay child support no longer terminates the support obligation. Now, any remaining unpaid future obligation accelerates and becomes payable on the date of death. See Tex. Fam. Code §§ 154.006, 154.015; Ch. 371A, Child Support, § 371A.05.

Extended Statute of Limitations for Support Enforcement. The statute of limitations for contempt enforcement of child support orders has been expanded from six months to two years after the child becomes an adult or the support obligation terminates. See Tex. Fam. Code § 157.005(c); Ch. 372, Enforcement of SAPCR Orders, § 372.02[2][c][i].

Probate Code Litigation

Opposition to Application to Sell Estate Property. Any person interested in the estate may file an opposition to an application for the sale of estate property or may make an application for the sale of other estate property. The clerk of the court in which the application for an order of sale is filed must immediately call to the judges' attention any opposition to the sale that is timely filed, and the court must hold a hearing on the application. See Tex. Prob. Code §§ 345 and 345A, covered in Ch. 400, Managing the Estate, § 400.03[4][a].

Guardian Ad Litem in Guardianship Proceeding. The guardian ad litem's term of appointment expires, without court order, on the date the court either appoints a guardian or denies the application for appointment of a guardian, unless the court determines that the continued appointment of the guardian ad litem is in the ward's best interest. See Tex. Prob. Code § 645(f), covered in Ch. 410, Appointment of Guardians, § 410.06[7].

Opposition to Application to Sell Guardianship Property. When an application for the sale of guardianship real property is filed, a citation must be issued to all persons interested in the guardianship, informing them of their right to file an opposition to the sale during the period prescribed by the court as shown in the citation, if they so elect. The clerk of the court in which the application is filed must immediately call to the judges' attention any opposition to the sale that is timely filed, and the court must hold a hearing on the application. See Tex. Prob. Code §§ 824 and 824A(a), covered in Ch. 411, Administration of Guardianships, § 411.03[2][d][iii].

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William V. Dorsaneo, III is the Chief Justice John and Lena Hickman Distinguished Faculty Fellow and Professor of Law at Southern Methodist University's Dedman School of Law in Dallas, Texas, where he teaches a variety of litigation courses. He is also the principal author of the widely used and often cited twenty-six volume Texas Litigation Guide published by Matthew Bender & Company, the co-author of the five-volume Texas Civil Trial Guide, the co-author of three casebooks entitled Cases and Materials on Civil Procedure, Texas Civil Procedure: Pre-Trial Litigation, and Texas Civil Procedure: Trial and Appellate Practice, and several other volumes on Texas litigation subjects.

Professor Dorsaneo served as the Reporter to the Combined Committee appointed by the Texas Supreme Court, the Court of Criminal Appeals and the Texas Legislature to draft the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure and for the last fifteen years he has served as the Chairman of the Appellate Rules Subcommittee of the Advisory Committee to the Texas Supreme Court. He is also the Chairman of the Texas Supreme Courts Task Force for Revision of the Texas Rules of Civil Procedure and a member of the American Law Institute.

Professor Dorsaneo is Board Certified in Civil Appellate Law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

68 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Martin on Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial District Court

2008 Emerging Issues 981

Martin on Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial District Court

By Leah A. Martin

November 16, 2007

SUMMARY: While Nevada may still be part of the Wild West in many ways, attorney ethics is not one of them. The Nevada Supreme Court has issued many decisions on attorney behavior, ethics, and disqualification. The most recent Nevada case on attorney disqualification for former client conflicts, Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial District Court [123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737 (2007)], provides useful information, whether an attorney is (1) determining whether to file a motion to disqualify; (2) crafting a persuasive argument concerning disqualification; or (3) attempting to manage the attorneys own practice in a manner that is consistent with Nevadas current ethical standards.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: While Nevada may still be part of the Wild West in many ways, attorney ethics is not one of them. The Nevada Supreme Court has in recent years issued many decisions on attorney behavior, ethics, and disqualification. The most recent Nevada case on attorney disqualification for former client conflicts, Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial District Court [123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737 (2007)], provides useful information, whether an attorney is (1) determining whether to file a motion to disqualify; (2) crafting a persuasive argument concerning disqualification; or (3) attempting to manage the attorneys own practice in a manner that is consistent with Nevadas current ethical standards.

History of Attorney Disqualification in Nevada. In Nevada, it has been recognized for many years that as part of their inherent authority, district courts have the responsibility to control the conduct of attorneys practicing before them [Cronin v. Eighth Jud. Dist. Ct., 105 Nev. 635, 640, 781 P.2d 1150, 1153 (1989)]. District courts are vested with broad discretion to determine whether conduct is such that disqualification is required [Cronin, 105 Nev. at 640, 781 P.2d at 1153]. Over the years, the Nevada Supreme Court has issued only a few decisions on attorney disqualification--particularly in the area of former client conflicts. Among these decisions, Waid v. Dist. Court [121 Nev. 605, 119 P.3d 1219 (2005)] was particularly instructive. However, when Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial District Court [123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737 (2007)] was issued in early 2007, the Nevada Supreme Court provided substantial guidance on this subject.

What is a Former Client Conflict? Nevada Rule of Professional Conduct 1.9(a) n1 provides that:

A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which the persons interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing.

If an attorney provides such representation, it gives rise to a former client conflict.

What Relief is Available? If a client believes that its former counsel has taken on representation that creates a former client conflict, the client can seek disqualification of its former counsel with regard to counsels current conflicting representation.

What Showing is Required for Disqualification?

The Elements for Disqualification

The elements for disqualification are [Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial District Court, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737, 741 (2007)]:

- (1) The party seeking disqualification had an attorney-client relationship with the lawyer;
- (2) The former and current matters are substantially related; and
- (3) The current clients interests are materially adverse to those of the party seeking disqualification.

In practice, there is generally little conflict as to whether an attorney-client relationship existed. Such a relationship can be readily proven through an engagement letter, billing statements, correspondence, or simply the affidavit or declaration of the moving party.

Likewise, whether the current clients interests are materially adverse to those of the former client is generally a relatively simple analysis. For example, if the former and current clients are opposing parties in the same action, material adversity is clear.

The Substantially Related Standard

The heart of the disqualification analysis in former client conflict cases is whether the former and current matters are substantially related. In Nevada Yellow Cab, the Nevada Supreme Court reiterated its three-part test for determining whether two representations are substantially related. Specifically, a district court presented with a disqualification motion based on a former representation should (1) make a factual determination concerning the scope of the former representation, (2) evaluate whether it is reasonable to infer that the confidential information allegedly given would have been given to a lawyer representing a client in those matters, and (3) determine whether that information is relevant to the issues raised in the present litigation [see Nevada Yellow Cab v. Eighth Jud. Dist. Ct., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737, 742 (2007) (citing Waid v. Dist. Court, 121 Nev. 605, 119 P.3d 1219 (2005))].

In determining whether a matter is substantially related to a prior matter, the factual contexts of both representations govern, regardless of whether confidences were in fact imparted to the attorney by the client in the prior representation [see Waid v. Dist. Court, 121 Nev. 605, 119 P.3d 1219 (2005)]. This distinction is key in that it protects the attorney-client privilege and duties of confidentiality arising from both the former and current representations.

However, it is important to recognize that the court must focus on the actual relationship between the two matters, rather than any superficial resemblance between the former and current representation [see Nevada Yellow Cab v. Eighth Jud. Dist. Ct., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737, 742 (2007) (citing Waid v. Dist. Court, 121 Nev. 605, 119 P.3d 1219 (2005))]. While best practice dictates that the moving party provide sufficient information to allow the court to determine the scope of the prior representation, it is not necessary to submit billing statements, attorney-client communications, or any other specific case materials.

The Balancing Test

In determining whether a disqualification motion should be granted, district courts must weigh the effects or prejudices disqualification would have on the parties and the public interests involved, while discouraging the use of such motions as a strategic tool for harassment and delay [see Nevada Yellow Cab v. Eighth Jud. Dist. Ct., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737, 74243 (2007)]. In balancing these factors, doubts should generally be resolved in favor of disqualification [Nevada Yellow Cab, 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d at 74243].

How Does Waiver of Conflict Occur? When faced with a former client conflict, the most common response is probably that the conflict has been waived. Fortunately for former clients seeking disqualification, waiver is not a simple matter. Rather, [w]aiver requires the intentional relinquishment of a known right [Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Jud. Dist. Ct., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737, 740 (2007)]. One way in which waiver can occur (although it is rare) is the former clients informed written consent to the current representation [see NRPC 1.9(a)]. If waiver is instead to be inferred from conduct, the conduct must clearly indicate the partys intention [Nevada Yellow Cab Corp., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d at 740].

Delay in seeking disqualification is in itself insufficient to establish a waiver [Nevada Yellow Cab Corp., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d at 740]. Nevertheless, best practice dictates that disqualification be sought promptly on discovery of a former client conflict.

What is the Standard of Review? A district courts decision on a motion to disqualify is reviewed under a manifest abuse of discretion standard [Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Jud. Dist. Ct., 123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737, 742 (2007)].

The Bottom Line. The lesson to be learned from Nevada Yellow Cab and its predecessors is the importance of conducting thorough conflict checks before commencing any representation. This is of particular importance in multiple-attorney firms, in which each attorney may not have complete knowledge of all the firms clients and/or matters. If any potential conflict appears, the practitioner is faced with a decision to decline the new representation or seek the informed written consent of its former client to the current representation. If written consent is not obtained from the former client, failure to decline the representation could have dire consequences, including disqualification, disgorgement of fees, and professional discipline. The choice between taking a new case and these potentially serious ramifications should be simple.

In light of the Courts holding in Nevada Yellow Cab, clients that feel that their former counsel is engaging in representation substantially related to their prior representation and materially adverse to their interests should seek voluntary withdrawal of their former counsel and, if necessary, file a motion to disqualify at the earliest possible time. While delay itself cannot be deemed a waiver, other conduct taken during the course of the delay could be interpreted as manifesting the intent to waive the conflict. The motion to disqualify should clearly articulate the bases for disqualification and should be supported, at a minimum, by the declaration or affidavit of the moving party.

While some attorneys in Nevada still practice under the Wild West mentality, they are setting themselves up for failure. Legal practitioners in Nevada must carefully follow the professional standards set forth in relevant Nevada authority. Those who fail to do so are now being held accountable by both their peers and the judiciary.

For additional information on conflicts of interest and disqualification, see Nevada Civil Practice Manual, Ch. 2, Judges and Attorney, § 2.12 (Matthew Bender).

For comments to the Model Rules of Professional Conduct (on which the Nevada Rules of Professional Conduct are based) and a compilation of relevant case annotations, see Annotated Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Fifth Edition (American Bar Association Center for Professional Responsibility).

Return to Text

n1 . It should be noted that the Nevada Rules of Professional Conduct (NRPC) went into affect in May 2006. The NRPC adopted, in large part, the language of the former Supreme Court Rules on professional conduct. Nevada Yellow Cab Corp. v. Eighth Judicial District Court [123 Nev. Adv. Op. No. 6, 152 P.3d 737 (2007)] involved conduct arising under the earlier Supreme Court Rules. However, the analysis does not differ whether the old Supreme Court Rules or the NRPC applies.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Leah A. Martin is an associate with Bailey Kennedy in Las Vegas, Nevada. Ms. Martin attended the University of Nevada, Las Vegas, receiving her J.D. summa cum laude 2002; B.A., Political Science summa cum laude 1999; and B.A., Environmental Studies summa cum laude 1999. Ms. Martin was the recipient of the William S. Boyd Outstanding Graduate Award at the William S. Boyd School of Law. Ms. Martin served as Editor-in-Chief of the Nevada Law Journal, and served as judicial extern to the Honorable Phillip M. Pro of the United States District Court for the District of Nevada. Before joining Bailey Kennedy in 2006, Ms. Martin was an associate at Nevadas largest law firm from 2002 to 2006.

Since 2003, Ms. Martin has served as an associate editor for the State Bar of Nevada CLE Publications Committee on the Nevada Civil Practice Manual, published by Matthew Bender. Beginning in 2006, Ms. Martin has assisted in teaching Nevada Civil Practice at the William S. Boyd School of Law. Ms. Martin practices in the area of civil litigation. She has substantial experience in the areas of products liability, wrongful death, complex commercial litigation, class actions, dissenting shareholders rights, and appellate advocacy. Bailey Kennedy represents, among others, healthcare facilities, publicly traded corporations, gaming companies, financial institutions, travel and tourism leaders, public entities, real estate developers, sports and entertainment concerns, and entrepreneurs.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

69 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Jean-Claude Labady on In Re Vioxx Litigation

2008 Emerging Issues 985

Jean-Claude Labady on In Re Vioxx Litigation

By Jean-Claude Labady

November 16, 2007

SUMMARY: The New Jersey Appellate Division in In Re Vioxx Litigation, 395 N.J. Super. 358 (App. Div. 2007) recently affirmed the Superior Court ruling dismissing claims brought by plaintiffs that are citizens of the United Kingdom under the infrequently used defense of forum non conveniens. This Emerging Issues Analysis examines the Court's ruling and future prospects for foreign citizens bringing civil actions in New Jersey.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: The Sharp Edge of the Forum Non Conveniens Doctrine. Although the recent $4.85 billion settlement that Merck has agreed to pay to tens of thousands of plaintiffs throughout the country sends a signal to foreign claimants that U.S. courts are attractive forums for the litigation of their claims, entry into U.S. courts is not always easy, however, as New Jersey's Appellate Division has shown in the Vioxx Litigation case recently. 395 N.J. Super. 358, 928 A.2d 935 (App. Div. 2007). New Jersey trial courts typically do not keep out a plaintiff that asserts potentially meritorious claims simply on the basis of the forum non conveniens doctrine. The prudent defendant often includes in its answer to a complaint the assertion of the doctrine with other more robust affirmative defenses. Moreover, New Jersey is known as a pro-plaintiff state where a defense attorney thinks twice before seeking dismissal of a plaintiff's case on almost any equitable or procedural ground. If the case law tradition in the state's courts favors the adjudication of a plaintiff's claims on the merits, 98 plaintiffs from the United Kingdom and Wales recently felt the sharp edge of the forum non conveniens doctrine when their claims were dismissed by a trial court in Atlantic County.

The Trial Judge Turned Away U.K. Plaintiffs. Even trial court judges in New Jersey tread cautiously in deciding defendants' motions to dismiss plaintiffs' claims on procedural or equitable grounds. Judge Carol E. Higbee of the New Jersey Superior Court in Atlantic County was selected as the single judge to manage cases that have been filed against Merck whose headquarter is located in New Jersey. Merck became the target of mass-tort personal injury cases after it recalled Vioxx, a well used drug in the treatment of arthritis. The recall came about when studies were released showing a possible correlation between the drug and an increased risk of heart attack.

In 2005, 98 plaintiffs from the U.K. filed a complaint asserting claims for product liability, breach of express warranty, wrongful death and survivorship, loss of consortium, and breach of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act (N.J. Stat. § 56:8-1). The plaintiffs also sought compensatory and punitive damages, attorney's fees and costs. 395 N.J. Super. 363 (successful plaintiffs are also entitled to treble damages under the Consumer Fraud Act, N.J. Stat. § 56:8-1.)

Merck's counsel filed in the same year a motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' complaint on the basis of forum non conveniens. Judge Higbee granted Merck's motion and dismissed the complaint. She, however, issued a conditional order permitting the U.K. plaintiffs to return to New Jersey to assert their claims if somehow they could not be pursued in the U.K. for various reasons given in her decision. The Appellate Division affirmed her decision.

The Doctrine Is Hinged on Established Federal Precedents. The Appellate Division sought support for the application of the forum non conveniens doctrine in well settled principles established in federal cases. The doctrine ultimately stands for considerations of convenience and justice. 395 N.J. Super. 364. The appellate panel deferred to the sound discretion of Judge Higbee as the trial judge and would reverse her decision only if she abused that discretion. Not unlike the approach followed in federal jurisdictions, Merck as a defendant bore the burden of proof in evoking the equitable doctrine. Yet, while New Jersey has a strong tradition of according deference to its residents, less deference was to be accorded to U.K. residents.

The Two-Step Analysis. In rejecting the plaintiffs' arguments, the Appellate Division utilized a two-step analysis. Counsel facing forum non conveniens issues should first ask whether there is a suitable alternative forum. The test here is whether the defendant is "amenable to process" elsewhere. Only in "rare circumstances" where the process is so lacking will the test not be satisfied. 395 N.J. Super. 363. In Vioxx Litigation, there was evidence that product liability and wrongful death causes of action exist in the U.K. It is true that substantive laws there do not exactly mirror New Jersey laws. For instance, there is no real match in the U.K. for the Consumer Fraud Act, and breach of express warranty and loss of consortium are not recognized there. Nonetheless, the lack of some specific causes of action will not preclude the application of the doctrine. If some of the causes of action are available, the alternative forum is satisfactory.

Accordingly, the lack of the loss of consortium cause of action in the U.K. does not give rise to jurisdiction in New Jersey. Likewise, the absence of punitive damages does not convey jurisdiction in the state. This consideration is not peculiar to Vioxx Litigation since the assertion of a measure of damages is a sine qua non to every complaint. Practitioners should be aware that the absence of particular measures of damages in the alternative jurisdiction is not sufficient to award their clients jurisdiction in New Jersey. Further, the absence of generous discovery in the U.K. and the inability to obtain jury trial do not suffice. Here again, it is very tempting for practitioners to place undue weight on discovery and jury trial considerations in seeking a forum. However, the Vioxx Litigation court clarifies that these considerations alone will not grant jurisdiction. Ultimately, the Appellate Division determined that there were sufficient safeguards in procedural and substantive laws in the U.K. to support at least the plaintiffs' product liability action in that forum. 395 N.J. Super. 370. This finding is not disturbed by the plaintiffs' argument that public funding for mass-tort litigation is not easy to come by in the U.K. Although litigation funding and upfront cash are not readily available there, and the famous "loser pays" system is a further deterrent to lawsuit initiation, the court still found that the availability of some funding avenues makes cost recovery adequate enough for the plaintiffs' cases to be litigated in that forum.

The second part of the analysis in the application of the forum non conveniens doctrine is the assessment of private and public factors that relate to a plaintiff's choice of a forum. Private factors include easy access to sources of proof; compulsory processes to ensure that witnesses attend proceedings; "whether a view of the premises is appropriate to the action"; and the need to avert practical problems post-trial, including judgment enforcement, can be "easy, expeditious and inexpensive." 395 N.J. Super. 374. The court found that evidence was geographically divided between the U.K. and New Jersey, but it opted for U.K. jurisdiction because it is more likely for a court there to use compulsory processes to ensure the attendance of Merck employees to trial in the U.K. than it is under the "cumbersome procedures" of the Hague Convention to bring independent witnesses to a New Jersey court.

The public factors in turn include the need to avoid piling up cases in a "congested center;" the imposition of duty on jury members that have no relation with the litigation; the local interest in the subject matter of the litigation; and the local interest in having local matters decided in its courts. 395 N.J. Super. 376. The court found the U.K. to be a suitable forum because it provided the regulatory standards for the use of Vioxx in that country. New Jersey would have no interest in determining how the applicable regulations pertain to the plaintiffs' use of the product. The more important factor, according to the court, is the avoidance of the administrative difficulties that, if not thwarted by the proper application of the forum non conveniens doctrine, would continue to make U.S. courts attractive forums to foreign citizens. The Appellate Division thus agreed with Judge Higbee's position that, while cases from different U.S. states are being managed in tandem, a burden would be imposed on the New Jersey courts if they have to manage foreign cases, which depend on the interpretation of foreign laws.

Practical Considerations

The decision of the trial court, as affirmed by the Appellate Division, to keep out such a large number of plaintiffs prompts a litigator to consider the following practical considerations:

Is the Gate Closed to Foreign Plaintiffs? Judge Higbee's managerial fear is an omen to foreign litigants. The message is clear to a practitioner contemplating bringing mass-tort actions in the representation of foreign plaintiffs in New Jersey's liberal courts that the gate is not wide open. In light of the court's decision in Vioxx Litigation, prior to embarking on the highly expensive road of mass-tort litigation in New Jersey, alternative forums of the practitioner's clients must be scrutinized for adequacy. The practitioner should err on the side of establishing jurisdiction in New Jersey an exception rather than the norm when there is a suitable forum elsewhere. Even such lofty considerations as lack of certain causes of action, generous discovery rules, jury trial and fee payment feasibility will not confer jurisdiction in New Jersey to the practitioner's clients.

Will U.S. Litigants Be Kept Out of New Jersey Courts? The decision seems to warn litigants from other U.S. states to stay away from New Jersey. That warning carries some weight on its face since the typical litigant in any state in the United States has an available arsenal of procedural and substantive safeguards. Nonetheless, where mass-tort U.S. litigants can pinpoint some reasons for jurisdiction to lie in New Jersey, e.g., Merck's residence in the state, it is unlikely that they will be turned away. Considering New Jersey's industrial past (or present for that matter), its court system has an established tradition of consolidating mass-tort cases filed by its citizens and other states' citizens in one single venue, usually under the supervision of a single judge, for effective administrative management. Yet, the practitioner representing U.S. clients from states other than New Jersey should perform the usual long-arm analysis before seeking New Jersey jurisdiction.

A Doctrine with a Sharp Edge? Vioxx Litigation is a strong reminder that even a dormant equitable doctrine at times can be lethal, even in a state like New Jersey that has a strong tradition of permitting claimants to pursue their substantive claims. It is not that the doctrine is not often evoked in the appropriate cases; rather, experience dictates that practitioners often shy away from utilizing it even in circumstances where its application might be warranted. Vioxx Litigation is a stern reminder that forum non conveniens is no longer to be taken for granted.

Practice Tips

§ Foreign litigants seeking mass-tort jurisdiction in New Jersey should not be completely deterred by the current decision. Rather, they should work with counsel from the country where the tort arose to determine the availability or non-availability of procedural and substantive processes and remedies in that country. Vioxx Litigation, in a sense, can be a fluke in that not all cases will arise out of the U.K. where sufficient remedies are available to claimants. But it can be a trend setter where causes of action arise in foreign states where sufficient processes and substantive remedies are available to claimants.

§ Practitioners should keep in mind that the result obtained in Vioxx Litigation has a lot to do, as expressed in the end of the decision, with the administrative burden thousands of Vioxx cases have imposed on New Jersey. While the propositions stated in the opinion should be heeded, their impact may be lessened in mass-tort cases involving a different product, a different country, or both.

§ Although U.S. litigants from other states normally will not be turned away in New Jersey, they should not assume that entry is automatic. The Vioxx Litigation decision, for instance, starts with the indication that mass-tort designation was given to the litigation by the New Jersey Supreme Court. It behooves a practitioner thoroughly to be familiar with the mass-tort procedures and administration before selecting the state as a preferred jurisdiction.

§ Practitioners in mass-tort cases or otherwise should continue to assert the applicability of forum non conveniens as an affirmative defense. One is not penalized in New Jersey's courts for asserting in pleadings defenses that ultimately are not used in litigation. Once the forum non conveniens defense is asserted, the practitioner should not hesitate to base dispositive motions on its application where that is warranted.

For a Further Discussion on Class Actions and Mass Torts in New Jersey, see LexisNexis Practice Guide New Jersey Pretrial Practice, Chapter 1 -- Class Actions & Mass Torts Strategy, 1-1 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pretrial Practice § 1.01.

For a Further Discussion on the Doctrine of Forum Non Conveniens, see LexisNexis Practice Guide New Jersey Pleadings, Chapter 1, Part III -- Determining Appropriate Forum, 1-1 LexisNexis Practice Guide NJ Pleadings § 1.08 and Federal Litigation Guide, Chapter 3 -- Rule 12 Motions, 1-3 Federal Litigation Guide P 3.61.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Jean-Claude Labady, Esq. is Trial Counsel for Harleysville Insurance Company and has been a member of the New Jersey bar since 1992. He formerly served as the Managing Partner of Labady & Randolph and headed up the litigation department of the firm. He received his B.A. with honors and M.A. magna cum laude from Rutgers University. Mr. Labady is also a 1992 graduate of the Seton Hall University School of Law. Upon graduation from law school, Mr. Labady served as Judicial Law Clerk to the Hon. Reginald Stanton, Assignment Judge, New Jersey Superior Court (retired). Following his clerkship, Mr. Labady has primarily focused his practice on insurance defense work and has defended insured parties and insurance companies in complex coverage disputes. Mr. Labady was a pioneer in the area of complex fraud litigation on behalf of insurance carriers in New Jersey. He is responsible for decisions of first impression in both health care law and fraud law. Mr. Labady can be reached by email at jlaby@verizon.net.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

70 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Grace V.B. Garcia on Hanover Ins. Co., v. Rapo & Jepsen Ins. Serv., Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 946

Grace V.B. Garcia on Hanover Ins. Co., v. Rapo & Jepsen Ins. Serv., Inc., 449 Mass. 609 (2007)

By Grace V.B. Garcia

November 15, 2007

SUMMARY: Massachusetts, in Hanover Insurance Company v. Rapo & Jepsen Insurance Services, Inc., has now officially recognized the common interest doctrine, and thus the validity of what many refer to as "joint defense agreements." The common interest doctrine allows for confidential attorney-client communications to be shared by counsel or a party with other interested parties to their mutual benefit without waiving the attorney-client privilege.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Massachusetts, in Hanover Insurance Company v. Rapo & Jepsen Insurance Services, Inc., 449 Mass. 609 (2007), has now officially recognized the common interest doctrine, and thus the validity of what many refer to as "joint defense agreements." The common interest doctrine allows for confidential attorney-client communications to be shared by counsel or a party with other interested parties to their mutual benefit without waiving the attorney-client privilege. Although the common interest doctrine, which is often put into effect through the use of joint defense agreements, has been used for a number of years by practitioners, the decision in Hanover Insurance Company is the first time that Massachusetts' highest court has given the doctrine its official stamp of approval. Now attorneys and clients can be sure that when they enter into common interest or joint defense agreements, such agreements will ensure that shared communications do not waive the attorney-client privilege.

Background for the Court's Decision. This case arises from an interlocutory appeal from the lower court's discovery order. In this case, Hanover Insurance Company's ("Hanover") asserted claims against an insurance company and two insurance service providers based on an argument that they wrongfully conspired to transfer high risk motor vehicle insurance from Arbella Mutual Insurance Company ("Arbella") to Hanover. During the course of discovery, Hanover served a request for production of documents to Arbella. In response to some of the requests, Arbella refused to produce certain documents based on an assertion that they were privileged under a joint defense privilege. In answer to Hanover's motion to compel, the lower court ordered Arbella to produce the requested documents finding that Massachusetts had not officially recognized the joint defense privilege. In taking the appeal, the Supreme Judicial Court's interest may have been perked as the joint defense agreement in this case was not written, but only an oral agreement.

Attorney-Client Privilege is a Fundamental Privilege. In evaluating the common interest doctrine, which gives rise to joint defense agreements and the like, the Supreme Judicial Court examined the importance of the attorney-client privilege. The attorney-client privilege is one of the oldest privileges in common law and it is considered a fundamental privilege to which courts show great deference. The attorney-client privilege "shields from the view of third parties all confidential communications between a client and its attorney undertaken for the purpose of obtaining legal advice." Suffolk Construction Co., Inc. v. Division of Capital Asset Management, 449 Mass. 444, 448 (2007). It protects information that is not only shared with an attorney in confidence, but also those shared with necessary agents of the attorney or the client, such as experts consulted for advising the client. Cavallaro v. United States, 284 F.3d 236, 247 (1st Cir. 2002). The attorney-client privileged is owned by the client, not the attorney. In order to be protected, however, the privilege cannot be waived meaning one cannot disclose the confidential communication to a third-party. Town of Norfolk v. U.S. Army Corp of Eng'rs., 968 F.2d 1438, 1457 (1st Cir. 1992). One major exception to the waiver of the attorney-client privilege, however, is the common interest doctrine.

The Common Interest Doctrine Protects Against Waiver of the Attorney-Client Privilege. The common interest doctrine is a recognized exception to the attorney-client privilege that has been in existence for more than 225 years. The common interest doctrine "extends the attorney-client privilege to any privileged communication shared with another represented party's counsel in a confidential manner for the purpose of furthering a common legal interest." Hanover Insurance Company, 449 Mass. at 612. The initial reasoning behind the common interest doctrine is that to the extent two defendants could have engaged the same counsel to represent them, their communications with that attorney, either jointly and severally, would be protected by the attorney-client privilege. There is no reason to waive the privilege if two defendants choose to obtain different counsel but still want to confer in order to effect a common interest. Indeed, it has been determined that "there is no reason to treat confidential client communications differently when shared with an attorney representing a client having a common interest where the purpose for sharing is to provide a free flow of information essential to providing the best available legal services to the client." 449 Mass. at 616.

The common interest doctrine is very broad and is not just limited to criminal or civil defendants. Rather, the doctrine has been applied to cases involving co-plaintiffs, jointly interested individuals who may be part of a pending litigation, documents shared between plaintiff's and defendant's counsel, as well as to shared work-product. 449 Mass. at 613. In fact, the common interest doctrine is not limited to litigation or impending litigation, but applies to those involved in business transactions as it applies to anyone who is seeking legal advice for a common interest. 449 Mass. at 614.

Practitioners must remember that the common interest doctrine is not a privilege, but simply provides an exception to waiver of the attorney-client privilege when otherwise the disclosure of such confidential communications would act as a waiver.

Strategic Consideration. In order to use the common interest doctrine, whether by means of a joint defense agreement, a joint prosecution agreement, or other agreement that expresses a similar understanding, the clients' interests do not need to be identical, they just need to be shared. Massachusetts supports an expanded definition of "common interest" in that an interest is considered to be "common" "where two or more parties share a sufficiently similar interest and attempt to promote that interest by sharing privileged communication." 449 Mass. at 619. For example, parties may be deemed to have a common interest in defending against a toxic tort case, although the parties may be of different types, such as a manufacturer, distributor, and employer, and may have their own separate agendas, in addition to the common interest they share.

The common interest doctrine is easy to use. For instance, the common interest doctrine does not require any type of writing to enforce it. Indeed, a practitioner does not necessarily need to inform his or her client of its use. As the attorney-client privilege is owned by the client, and can only be waived by a client, attorneys are allowed to disclose confidential information to the extent "impliedly authorized in order to carry out the representation." 449 Mass. at 618. Best practice, however, is for the practitioner to inform his or her client about disclosure based on the common interest doctrine, obtain consent, and put the agreement in writing.

Both practitioners and clients should be wary before moving precipitously into a joint defense agreement. Although on first blush the opportunity to share information with others for the purpose of furthering and strengthening one's position seems like a great idea, sometimes it may not be the best option for either the practitioner or for the client. For example, in some cases, a post-agreement conflict of interest may arise that was not foreseeable. Such a conflict may affect both the client and the practitioner due to potential claims for disqualification. If the dispute causes the disqualification of the practitioner, not only does he lose the ability to represent the client, he may face future disqualification from representation depending on the nature of the conflict. Also, if an attorney is disqualified, the client loses out on his or her first choice of counsel.

Practitioners Should Draft Common Interest or Joint Defense Agreements Carefully. Prior to disclosing information, if parties decide to enter into a common interest agreement, or a joint defense agreement, such agreement should be written. In drafting the agreement, practitioners need to evaluate what they are seeking from the common interest agreement, and ensure that the agreement is drafted appropriately. For example, in drafting a joint defense agreement, practitioners may wish to consider including some or all of the following clauses:

? A statement declaring the purpose of the agreement. For example, practitioners may want to state something such as: "Counsel have agreed to disclose and exchange Defense Materials between themselves in order to further their clients' common interests."

? A description of the parameters of the agreement.

? A disclaimer that the joint defense agreement does not create any actual attorney-client relationship between the attorneys and the clients of the other attorneys who are signatories to the agreement. An example of such a clause is as follows:

Nothing contained in this agreement is intended to create any attorney-client relationship, for the purposes of conflicts or otherwise, between a counsel and a party which is represented by other counsel. Each undersigned counsel understands that it is their sole responsibility to represent his, her or their respective client and that none of the other signatories to this agreement have in any way assumed any such responsibility. Nothing in this agreement shall be construed to affect the separate and independent representation of each party by its respective counsel.

? A representation that all counsel who are signatories to the agreement have performed a conflict check.

? A representation that all counsel have discussed the agreement with their clients.

? A clause that prohibits all counsel and parties who are signatories to the agreement from disclosing any information they receive through the agreement to any other person or entity unless they obtain written consent from all signatories of the agreement

? A clause indicating how parties may withdraw from the joint defense agreement. It should be noted that any party should be able to freely withdraw from the agreement upon proper notice to the other parties.

Cross References. See Massachusetts Pleading and Practice § 26.14.1.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcia's practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a "Super Lawyer Rising Star." Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

71 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

James J. Walsh on Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation, 479 Mich. 280 (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 942

James J. Walsh on Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation, 479 Mich. 280 (2007)

By James J. Walsh

November 14, 2007

SUMMARY: This Emerging Issues Analysis, written by James J. Walsh, focuses on the implications of the decision in Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation v. Nestle Waters North America Inc., 737 N.W.2d 447, 479 Mich. 280 (2007). The Michigan Supreme Court held that standing to pursue even a statutory cause of action requires injury in fact.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: In Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation v. Nestle Waters North America Inc., 737 N.W.2d 447, 479 Mich. 280 (2007), the Michigan Supreme Court held that standing to pursue even a statutory cause of action requires injury in fact. A 4-3 majority overturned the Michigan Court of Appeals' decision in the case (see Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation v. Nestle Waters North America Inc., 709 N.W.2d 174 269 Mich. App. 25 (2005)), and found that because the plaintiffs failed to allege any actual injury from Nestle Water's actions with respect to a particular body of water and wetland areas, they lack standing to bring that portion of their claim. The majority made this ruling despite the presence of a statutory section that purported to grant "any person" the ability to bring a claim under the Michigan Environmental Protection Act. See MCLS § 324.1701(1) ("The attorney general or any person may maintain an action in the circuit court having jurisdiction where the alleged violation occurred or is likely to occur for declaratory and equitable relief against any person for the protection of the air, water, and other natural resources and the public trust in these resources from pollution, impairment, or destruction.") (emphasis added).

Background. The plaintiffs in Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation were a non-profit corporation concerned with environmental issues, along with two individual members who owned land on a body of water called the Dead Stream, and two members who owned land on a body of water called Thompson Lake. They brought a single claim under the Michigan Environmental Protection Act to temporarily and permanently enjoin Nestle Corporation's water pumping activities in the entire Tri-Lakes area of Mecosta County. The Michigan Supreme Court divided their single claim into multiple causes of action, and held that although the riparian landowners had standing with respect to the Dead Stream and Thompson Lake, they did not have standing with respect to nearby Osprey Lake and certain wetlands, because none of them actually owned or used any land bordering those particular areas. Furthermore, because the non-profit corporation's members had standing with respect to those two bodies of water, the non-profit corporation did as well, and likewise did not have standing with respect to Osprey Lake and the wetlands. See, e.g., Trout Unlimited, Muskegon White River Chapter v. White Cloud, 489 N.W.2d 188 (1992); 195 Mich. App. 343, 348 (1992).

MCLS § 324.1701(1) Insufficient to Confer Automatic Standing. In Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation, the Michigan Supreme Court found MCLS § 324.1701(1) insufficient to confer automatic standing on the parties. The Court held that despite the existence of MCLS § 324.1701(1), which on its face purportedly grants anyone the ability to bring a lawsuit under the Act, potential plaintiffs still must satisfy the traditional constitutional standing requirements.

Michigan courts recently have adopted federal standing requirements. See Lee v. Macomb County Board of Commissioners, 629 N.W.2d 900; 464 Mich. 726 (2001) (adopting the standing requirements as set forth in Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555 (1992)). Thus, before a Michigan court will adjudicate a plaintiff's claim under the Michigan Environmental Protection Act (or indeed any other statute), the plaintiff must first demonstrate that he has suffered an actual, concrete injury that is "fairly . . . traceable" to the defendant, and that it is "likely" that the injury will be "redressed by a favorable decision" of the court. Lee at 907 (quoting Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560-561).

The Michigan Supreme Court's holding in Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation is harmonious with other recent cases that have emphasized the need for plaintiffs to satisfy the traditional constitutional standing test, in addition to meeting any applicable statutory requirements, even if a statute purportedly grants an individual the specific ability to bring a suit. See, e.g., Rohde v. Ann Arbor Public Schools, 737 N.W.2d 158, 479 Mich. 336 (2007) (holding that plaintiff taxpayers did not have standing to challenge defendant public school district's granting of benefits to employees' same-sex partners because plaintiffs did not allege that they suffered any actual injury from the school district's actions); Tingley v 900 Monroe L.L.C., 733 N.W.2d 440, 274 Mich. App. 335 (2007) (holding that plaintiffs must satisfy constitutional standing requirements in addition to statutory requirements in order to bring a claim under the Michigan Hazardous Waste Management Act); City of Detroit Downtown Development Authority v. U.S. Outdoor Advertising Inc., 2007 Mich. App. LEXIS 1002 (2007) (holding that former MCLS § 125.585(11) is insufficient to confer standing to plaintiff in the absence of traditional standing requirements); American Family Association of Michigan v Michigan State University Board of Trustees, 2007 Mich. App. LEXIS 1499 (2007), lv. den. 2007 Mich. LEXIS 2797 (holding that plaintiff association lacked standing to challenge defendant's policy which granted benefits to employees' same-sex partners because plaintiffs failed to establish that it suffered any actual injury from defendant's benefit policy). As the Michigan Supreme Court noted in Rohde, it is clear that "no court rule or statute can eliminate the injury requirement for constitutional standing." Rohde, 737 N.W.2d at 166. These holdings in these recent cases reaffirm the importance of separation of powers, as expressed in the state constitution. See MCLS Const. Art. III, § 2; see also MCLS Const. Art. IV, § 1 (legislative power), MCLS Const. Art. V, § 1 (executive power), MCLS Const. Art. VI, § 1 (judicial power).

Because the decision in Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation has recognized that there are additional hurdles any potential plaintiff first must cross before Michigan courts will adjudicate his or her claims under the Michigan Environmental Protection Act, practitioners should be aware of the implications of its holding.

Considerations. One of the lessons to be learned from Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation is that plaintiffs suing under the Michigan Environmental Protection Act cannot gain standing to bring a claim related to activities impacting an entire region unless they can allege sufficient interests to claim that they suffered injuries throughout the entire region. Although the plaintiffs in Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation owned riparian property only on two bodies of water, they attempted to bring a claim against Nestle Water for its pumping activities in the entire Tri-Lakes area of Mecosta County. Although the Court did not dismiss their entire case, the Court did, in its own word, "refine" their single claim into multiple claims, and found that while the plaintiffs had standing to bring the claims related to the two bodies of water, the plaintiffs failed to allege sufficient facts to confer standing upon them for the claims related to the other areas.

Similarly, this case also reiterated that a potential plaintiff must be able to show a concrete injury. Practitioners should note that Michigan courts will not allow a plaintiff to bring claims based on any injuries only tenuously related to a potential defendant's conduct, or any hypothetical injuries. A plaintiff only has standing to sue for his own injuries, even if defendant's activities allegedly caused widespread harm. Accordingly, the Michigan Supreme Court in Michigan

Citizens for Water Conservation specifically rejected the Court of Appeals' "interconnectedness" theory as insufficient to confer standing upon the plaintiffs. See also Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 US 555 (1992) (rejecting "ecosystem," "animal nexus" and "vocational nexus" theories as insufficient to grant plaintiffs standing under the federal Endangered Species Act). Thus, a potential plaintiff must do more than simply allege that a potential defendant's activities in one area may harm the potential plaintiff's interests in another area simply due to the connectedness of the ecosystem.

It is important that practitioners recognize that options still remain for potential plaintiffs. First, although individual plaintiffs may have standing only to challenge conduct that injures their particular property or other interests, class actions can be considered as a vehicle to challenge defendant's conduct that affects a larger region. See MCLS § 3.501 (Michigan court rule governing class actions). Second, it is also important for practitioners to remember that in a suit under the Michigan Environmental Protection Act, standing does not require actual ownership of real property affected by a defendant's activities. Plaintiffs can gain standing if they merely used or had access to a piece of affected property, and the defendant's activities allegedly threatened their recreational, aesthetic or economic interests in the property, even if the plaintiffs do not hold title to the property. See National Wildlife Federation & Upper Peninsula Wildlife Council v Cleveland Cliffs Iron Co, 684 N.W.2d 800; 471 Mich. 608 (2004) (holding that plaintiffs who "birdwatched, canoed, bicycled, hiked, skied, fished, and farmed in the area" had standing to challenge defendant's mining activities). This remains true even after Michigan Citizens for Water Conservation. In this case, the Court noted that the plaintiffs failed to allege that they used or had access to Osprey Lake or the wetlands, or that Nestle Water's pumping activities threatened whatever recreational or aesthetic interests plaintiffs had in those areas. Michigan courts' recognition of a plaintiff's protectable aesthetic and recreational interests in land not owned by plaintiff is in line with federal case law. See Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 183 (holding that the existence of injury to plaintiffs' aesthetic and recreational interests in land was sufficient to confer standing on the plaintiffs bringing suit under the federal Clean Water Act). Finally, practitioners should be aware that we may receive further guidance on the issue from the Michigan Supreme Court if it grants leave to appeal in City of Detroit Downtown Development Authority v. U.S. Outdoor Advertising Authority, Inc., 2007 Mich. App. LEXIS 1002 (2007).

Cross References

For information on standing in Michigan, see Michigan Law & Practice 2d ACTIONS § 7.

For more background on "citizen suit" provisions under the Michigan Environmental Protection Act and federal law, see Heather Terry, Comment: Still Standing but "Teed Up": The Michigan Environmental Protection Act's Citizen Suit Provision after National Wildlife Federation v Cleveland Cliffs, 2005 Mich. St. L. Rev. 1297 (2005).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

James J. Walsh is a partner in the Ann Arbor office of Bodman LLP, a Detroit based firm. Mr. Walsh is a 1975 graduate of Louisiana State University Law School and clerked for two judges on the Michigan Court of Appeals before joining Bodman in 1977. His litigation experience is quite broad, with numerous jury and bench trials and appeals in federal and state courts. He was primary litigation counsel for Michigans Commissioner of Financial and Insurance Services in the rehabilitation of the U.S. branch of Confederation Life Insurance Company, the largest and most successful insurance insolvency in North American history. He has extensive experience in class actions and also specializes in the constitutional aspects of sign regulations as counsel to the Outdoor Advertising Association of Michigan.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

72 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Hauser on Proper Motion Filing for Attorney's Fees

2008 Emerging Issues 881

Hauser on Proper Motion Filing for Attorney's Fees

By James C. Hauser

November 7, 2007

SUMMARY: Attorneys are generally aware of the necessary procedures and filings to obtain attorneys fees. James Hauser, expert on Florida attorneys fees and civil procedure, explains the important implications of recent decisions in the Saia, AmerUs and Gulf Shores cases on preserving your entitlement to attorneys fees.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Motion Filing Requirements for Attorneys Fees Under Saia & Florida Rule of Civil Procedure 1.525.

Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 states: Any party seeking a judgment taxing costs, attorneys fees, or both shall serve a motion no later than 30 days after the filing of the judgment, including a judgment of dismissal, or the service of a notice of voluntary dismissal.

Prior to the adoption of Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525, a party seeking attorneys fees had to serve their motion within a reasonable period of time after the final judgment. Folta v. Bolton, 493 So. 2d 440 (Fla. 1986). What constituted a reasonable time period created confusion and led to unnecessary litigation. For example in Folta, the Florida Supreme Court held that a 60 day delay in serving the motion for attorneys fees was reasonable. The Florida Supreme Court cited with approval the United States Supreme Court decision of White v. New Hampshire Dept of Emp. Sec., 455 U.S. 445, 102 S. Ct. 1162, 71 L. Ed. 2d 325 (1982) which held that a four month delay was not unreasonable. On the other hand, the 2nd DCA held that an 80 day delay was unreasonable and denied attorneys fees. Wunderlee v. Fruits, Nuts & Bananas, Inc., 715 So. 2d 325 (Fla. 2d DCA 1998).

In Saia Motor Freight Line, Inc. v. Reid, 930 So. 2d 598 (Fla. 2006) (Pariente, Anstead and Lewis dissenting) the Florida Supreme Court ruled that even though the final judgment stated that the trial court retained jurisdiction to decide whether a party is entitled to attorneys fees, the party seeking attorneys fees must still serve a Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 motion to recover attorneys fees. The majority in Saia held that the purpose of Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 was to create a bright line time requirement for a party seeking attorneys fees to serve its motion to recover attorneys fees. That bright line was that the motion must be served no later than 30 days after the final judgment. That being the case, a mere reservation in the final judgment to decide the issue of attorneys fees did not relieve the party seeking attorneys fees from filing the motion. To hold otherwise would not correct the problem created by Folta, since it could be months before a court set a hearing on the issue of entitlement to attorneys fees. Justice Pariente, in dissent, joined by Justices Anstead and Lewis, would have ruled that a reservation in the final judgment of jurisdiction was procedurally an enlargement of time under Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.090(b), for to hold otherwise, would make the trial courts reservation not only a nullity, but create a procedural trap.

Fundamentally, the purpose of a Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 motion is to put the other side on notice that a party is seeking to recover attorneys fees from the opposing party and the basis for such recovery. Gulf Landings Assn. v. Hersberger, 845 So. 2d 344 (Fla. 2d DCA 2003). However, if that issue has already been decided in the final judgment it seems incongruous that a rule 1.525 motion is still necessary.

It is also important to note that Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 does not require that the party seeking attorneys fees include a reference as to the amount of attorneys fees in the motion. Silver Springs Properties, L.L.C. v. ERA Murray Realities, Inc., 874 So. 2d 712 (Fla. 4th DC 2004); P & R Smith Corp. v. Goyarrola, 864 So. 2d 584 (Fla. 3d DCA 2004). The 3d DCA explained in P & R Smith Corp. that because Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 is silent on when supporting documentation for the amount of attorneys fees is required it is unnecessary to include it in the motion for attorneys fees.

Does Saia Extend to Cases Where the Final Judgment Decides that a Party is Entitled to Attorneys Fees?

This issue is actually one step removed from Saia. If the final judgment not only reserves jurisdiction to award attorneys fees, but it also states that the prevailing party is entitled to attorneys fees, the only remaining issue for the trial court to decide should be the amount of attorneys fees. Chamizo v. Forman, 933 So. 2d 1240 (Fla. 3d DCA 2006), which was decided after the Florida Supreme Court decision in Saia, stated succinctly that once the decision of entitlement was decided, serving of a rule 1.525 motion became a non issue. The 5th DCA agreed by stating in dicta that it would be superfluous to require such a motion since the issue of entitlement has already been decided. Hart v. City of Groveland, 919 So. 2d 665 (Fla. 5th DCA 2006). Not only is it pointless to require a party file a motion on an issue that has already been decided, it will create confusion, since it will be unclear what the motion is intended to resolve.

In Nicoletti v. Nicoletti, 902 So. 2d 215 (Fla. 2d DCA 2005) the trial court held that the wife was entitled to attorneys fees in a contempt action against her former husband and reserved jurisdiction to determine the amount. The 2d DCA held, however, that the decision on entitlement did not waive the necessity of serving the 1.525 motion in order to preserve the bright line rule. See also Caldwell v. Finochi, 909 So. 2d 976 (Fla. 2d DCA 2005).

In Gulf Shores, L.L.C. v. Riverwood Community Development District, 927 So. 2d 246 (Fla. 2d DCA 2006) the parties stipulated that the Riverwood District was entitled to attorneys fees. As a result Riverwood never served a Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525. The trial court ruled that such a motion was not necessary because Gulf Shores had conceded that Riverwood was entitled to attorneys fees. The 2d DCA reversed holding that because Gulf Shores had not agreed in the stipulation to the waiver of the rule 1.525 motion, it still required that the motion be filed in order enforce the bright line requirement created by the rule.

The result in Gulf Shores can be pointed to as an example of gotcha tactics although this sort of conduct has been universally condemned by both the Florida Supreme Court and appellate courts, including the 2d DCA. Mosher v. Anderson, 817 So. 2d 812 (Fla. 2002); Mourning v. Ballast Nedam Construction, Inc. 32 Fla. L. Weekly d2292 (Fla. 4th DCA 2007); Cuertas v. Cuertas, 951 So. 2d 980 (Fla. 3d DCA 2007); VonDrasek v. City of St. Petersburg, 777 So. 2d 989 (Fla. 2d DCA 2000); Gulf Shores, L.L.C. v. Riverwood Community Development District, 927 So. 2d 246 (Fla. 2d DCA 2006). Instead of decrying gotcha tactics, Gulf Shores could be viewed as approving them.

The 5th DCA in Reddell v. Reddell, 900 So. 2d 670 (Fla. 5th DCA 2005) has also ruled that despite the fact that the final judgment held that the wife was entitled to attorneys fees, she still needed to serve the Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 motion. It reasoned that the motion was needed to resolve any uncertainty as to when post judgment motions for attorneys fees need to be served in order to bring the case to a timely conclusion.

The 5th DCA recently went one step further in AmerUs Life Ins. Co. v. Lait, 32 Fla. L. Weekly D 2395 (Fla. 5th DCA 2007). In that case the trial court entered an amended final judgment deciding the issues of entitlement and amount as to both attorneys fees and costs. Only after the amount of both attorneys fees and costs was decided, did the losing party make an oral motion to strike the award of attorneys fees and costs, because the prevailing party had not complied with rule 1.525. The trial court granted the motion and the 5th DCA affirmed.

In AmerUs the initial final judgment stated that the plaintiff was entitled to attorneys fees. The plaintiff did not serve a rule 1.525 motion based on the final judgment. Eight months later the trial court decided the amount of attorneys fees and costs and a few weeks after that the court signed a second amended judgment to correct a few scrivener's errors. One month later the plaintiff sought to amend the final judgment yet again. It was only at this point, more than nine months after entitlement to attorneys fees and six weeks after the amount of attorneys fees had been decided, did the losing party make an oral motion to strike the award of attorneys fees and costs because the plaintiff had failed to comply with Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525. In affirming the trial court's decision to deny attorneys fees and costs, the 5th DCA did not rely upon its prior decision in Reddell or distinguish its earlier decision in Hart. The 5th DCA did not certify conflict with Chamizo v. Foreman, 933 So. 2d 1240 (Fla. 3d DCA 2006).

The AmerUs decision creates two additional important issues: AmerUs never discussed the question of whether the losing party waived its right to object to the award of attorneys fees by not timely filing a motion to strike plaintiff's entitlement to attorneys fees until ten months after the issue of entitlement was resolved. Secondly and more importantly, AmerUs creates a jurisdictional Catch-22 for practitioners. If the final judgment decides the issue of the amount of attorneys fees and costs, when is the losing party supposed to file its motion to strike attorneys fees? Any motion to strike attorneys fees and costs filed prior to 30 days after the final judgment is signed would be premature. On the other hand, because all post judgment issues have been resolved, the losing party may not file a motion to strike attorneys fees after 30 days because the trial court no longer retains jurisdiction to hear any issue.

When to File Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 Motion?

Two important filing scenarios to consider:

. Final Judgment Retains Jurisdiction to Decide Whether a Party is Entitled to Attorneys Fees -- Saia stands for the proposition that if a final judgment states that it retains jurisdiction to decide attorneys fees the party seeking attorneys fees must still serve a Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 motion. (Saia never addressed the primary issue discussed in this EC on whether the final judgment states that a party is entitled to attorneys fees.)

. Final Judgment Where Court Rules that a Party is Entitled to Attorneys Fees but Amount Undecided no rule 1.525 motion should be necessary. First, the primary reason for enacting Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 was to establish a bright line time period when the motion to decide entitlement to attorneys fees must be served. This was to correct the uncertainty created by Folta of when such a motion must be filed. Secondly, the motion informs the losing party of the basis upon which attorneys fees is being sought. Once a final judgment decides entitlement to attorneys fees, both of these policy considerations have been resolved. At that stage, the only issue remaining is for the trial court to decide the amount of attorneys fees. The service of a Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 motion will not help a trial court to resolve that issue. In fact it will only create confusion, since upon filing the motion it is unclear what issue the court is supposed to resolve. The 2nd and 5th DCAs have provided limited explanation or policy considerations for their decisions but as mentioned below prudence dictates that the attorney should file the rule 1.525 motion to preserve the right to Attorneys fees.

Practice Tips:

. Again, unless the amount of fees has been specifically decided counsel should serve Fla. R. Civ. P. 1.525 motions no later than 30 days on the opposing party out of an abundance of caution, even if the final judgment states that your client is entitled to attorneys fees.

. The motion must clearly state the basis for entitlement to attorneys fees. Gulf Landings Assn. v. Hersberger, 845 So. 2d 344 (Fla. 2d DCA 2003).

. Finally, the motion need not contain any supporting affidavits as to the amount of attorneys fees.

For Further discussion on Filing Requirements for Attorneys Fees: see, James C. Hauser, Attorneys Fees in Florida.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Hon. James C. Hauser is a recently retired Circuit Court Judge for the Ninth Judicial Circuit of the State of Florida where he had served since 1990. Previously, he was County Judge in Orange County, in which capacity he was named Jurist of the Year by the Young Lawyers Division of the Florida Bar in 1989. He is a graduate of Boston University School of Law and the Wharton School of Finance at the University of Pennsylvania. Judge Hauser lectures frequently before the bench, bar, and public on the subject of attorney's fees. He is the author for Floridas foremost authority on attorneys fees, Attorneys Fees in Florida, Second edition. He is also the author of Florida Residential Landlord-Tenant Manual. Judge Hauser is available for personal consultations or to lecture on obtaining and maximizing attorney fees and can be reached at 407-951-6685, 9012 Summit Centre Way 102, Orlando, Fla. 32810 or by email at hauserjim@gmail.com.

73 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joseph B. McDonnell on Longstreet v. Cottrell

2008 Emerging Issues 879

Joseph B. McDonnell on Longstreet v. Cottrell, Inc., 374 Ill. App. 3d 549, 871 N.E.2d 72, 312 Ill. D

By Joseph B. McDonnell

November 6, 2007

SUMMARY: Where a party to a case dies prior to trial but after his discovery deposition is taken, may all or any part of his discovery deposition be introduced in evidence? The Fifth District Appellate Court has determined that Illinois practice and procedure bars the use of a deceased partys discovery deposition as former testimony at the trial. In doing so, the Court reviews the historical distinction made in Illinois between discovery and evidence depositions and rejects the invitation to rule that the death of a party makes him unavailable as a witness and allows the use of his deposition at trial, as permitted under the Federal Rules of Evidence. This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important change.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Where a party to a case dies prior to trial but after his discovery deposition is taken, may all or any part of his discovery deposition be introduced in evidence? The Fifth District Appellate Court has determined that Illinois practice and procedure bars the use of a deceased partys discovery deposition as former testimony at the trial. In doing so, the Court reviews the historical distinction made in Illinois between discovery and evidence depositions and rejects the invitation to rule that the death of a party makes him unavailable as a witness and allows the use of his deposition at trial, as permitted under the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Background. In Longstreet v. Cottrell, Inc., 374 Ill. App. 3d 549, 871 N.E.2d 72, 312 Ill. Dec. 672 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007), the plaintiff, a truck driver hauling cars for a Missouri-based employer, claimed bodily injuries as a result of several incidents with the rigs chain ratchet system. He filed suit for his injuries in the Circuit Court of Madison County, Illinois and his wife also sued for loss of consortium.

James Longstreets discovery deposition was taken on October 27, 2004. He was subsequently diagnosed with cancer and, on May 26, 2005, James died. His attorneys then filed a suggestion of death and petitioned to have his widow, Jean Longstreet, substituted as the plaintiff in her capacity as administrator of her deceased husbands estate.

Defendant Cottrell, Inc., anticipating that the plaintiff will attempt to use the discovery deposition of Mr. Longstreet as an evidence deposition in this litigation, moved to bar the use of James Longstreets discovery deposition for that purpose. After a hearing, the trial judge granted the motion and, at the request of the plaintiffs counsel, certified the question pursuant to Supreme Court Rule 308 as involving a question of law about which there is a substantial basis for difference of opinion.

The Wording of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212. The Appellate Court granted Jean Longstreets petition for leave to appeal under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 308. The question confronting the Court was whether the estate of a deceased party may introduce the discovery deposition of the party as evidence at trial as an exception to the hearsay rule under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(3) in light of the language of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(5).

Justice Chapman, speaking for a unanimous panel, noted at the outset that it was undisputed that Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(5), considered alone, would bar the use of the decedents discovery deposition because, at the time, he was a party to the case. That portion of the rule permits the use of a discovery deposition upon notice where the court finds that the deponent is neither a controlled expert nor a party, and that the witness is unable to attend or testify because of death or infirmity.

Is a Discovery Deposition Former Testimony? The plaintiff, however, contended that another paragraph of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212, considered independently of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(5), should permit the use of her deceased husbands discovery deposition as testimony. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(3) states in substance that discovery depositions may be used under certain restricted circumstances if otherwise admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(3).

The exception applicable here, the plaintiff argued, was the exception for former testimony, as recognized in Wilkerson v. Pittsburgh Corning Corp., 276 Ill. App. 3d 1023, 659 N.E.2d 979 (1995). The test for admissibility, the plaintiff contended, was whether the defendants had competently cross-examined her husband at the time of his discovery deposition. Answering her own question in the affirmative, the plaintiff urged that, the testimony should be admissible at trial.

As to this contention, the Court acknowledged that, since the grammatical conjunction connecting the five subparagraphs of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a) is the word or there was some basis for the plaintiffs argument that each subparagraph of the rule operates independently of the others, so that, if admissible under subparagraph (3) (as contended by plaintiff), the outright prohibition contained in subparagraph (5) would be irrelevant.

Nevertheless, the Court rejected the argument. Justice Chapman, speaking for a unanimous panel, said that it was unconvinced that the Illinois Supreme Court had contemplated such an exception to the prohibition of the use of a deceased partys discovery deposition. According to the Fifth District, Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(5) very clearly and without qualification excludes the use of a deceased partys discovery deposition. In addition, Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(b)(1) speaks only of evidence depositions in providing for admissibility where the deponent is dead at the time of trial. The Court cited the Fourth Districts decision in Overcast v. Bodart, 266 Ill. App. 3d 428, 639 N.E.2d 984 (1994) in support of its position.

The Court also rejected the plaintiffs argument that the Illinois Supreme Court had impliedly adopted Fed. Rules Evid. R. 804 in People v. Johnson, 118 Ill. 2d 501, 517 N.E.2d 1070 (1987). Fed. Rules Evid. R. 804(b)(1) of the Federal Rules of Evidence permits the use of a discovery deposition at the trial if the witness is unavailable and if the opposing party had had an opportunity or motive to develop the witness testimony by direct, cross-, or redirect examination. Fed. Rules Evid. R. 804(a) includes death as a basis for finding a witness unavailable. Justice Chapman disagreed, saying that it was evident that the Supreme Court in its Johnson opinion had not adopted Fed. Rules Evid. R. 804, but had simply borrowed the definition of unavailability in determining the reach of its own Ill. Sup. Ct., R 414, governing use of evidence depositions in criminal cases. In fact, the Court said, the suggested adoption of the Federal Rule would conflict with Illinois procedural law, which distinguishes between discovery and evidence depositions. Illinois is unique in that respect and has continued to observe the distinction for over 50 years. The distinction is meaningful to practicing attorneys, said the Court, because the discovery format provides a great deal of exploratory freedom. The trade-off for that freedom is the Supreme Courts limitations on the use of discovery depositions at a trial. Again pointing to Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(5), the Court stated that that subparagraph was added in 2001 to permit a discovery deposition to be introduced in evidence at trial or hearing under specified circumstances. Those circumstances, which include the death of a witness, expressly and unambiguously exclude the deposition of a party. Given the long-standing and well-understood policy of the Illinois Supreme Court with respect to the differentiation between discovery and evidence depositions, the Court refused to interpret Ill. Sup. Ct., R 212(a)(3) to allow part or all of the deposition of the deceased husband to be admitted as former testimony.

Tips for Practitioners. The problem of the aging or chronically ill litigant is not uncommon. Illinois Code of Civil Procedure provides for preferential trial settings on motion of a party who is 70 years of age or older, or where a party demonstrates good cause for such preference. 735 ILCS 5/2-1007.1. Moreover, it is common practice in asbestos cases, where the plaintiff may suffer from mesothelioma, for example, to schedule the clients evidence deposition soon after the clients discovery deposition has been taken, in order to preserve the testimony for trial. While the Longstreet opinion does not indicate when the plaintiffs counsel became aware of his clients terminal condition, some eight months intervened between the date of the discovery deposition and the clients death. One must be careful to monitor the health of ones client (whether plaintiff or defendant) and, where the client is diagnosed with a terminal condition, take steps to preserve the clients testimony for trial by scheduling his evidence deposition at the earliest opportunity. This is particularly important for Illinois lawyers, since the distinction between discovery and evidence depositions remains an integral part of Illinois practice.

Cross References. Parness, Illinois Civil Procedure Second Edition (LexisNexis) Chapter 8, Discovery.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnells trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

74 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Lareau on USERRA's Reemployment Rights

2008 Emerging Issues 853

Lareau on USERRA's Reemployment Rights

By N. Peter Lareau

November 5, 2007

SUMMARY: Most people believe that the American soldier returning from duty in Iraq or elsewhere has an unqualified right to get back the job he or she had when leaving for military service. Generally, they are correct; but the job protection extended to members of our Uniformed Services is not without issues. This Expert Commentary, written by employment law expert, N. Peter Lareau, focuses on whether an individual returning from service has an unqualified right to be reemployed. It examines the requirements to qualify for reemployment and the factors that may lead to disqualification. A checklist that follows the Commentary will be of assistance to the returning G.I. and the employer, as well as their counsel.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: I. Introduction

Most people believe that the American soldier returning from duty in Iraq or elsewhere has an unqualified right to get back the job he or she had when leaving for military service. Generally, they are correct; but the job protection extended to members of our Uniformed Services is not without chinks. There are some affirmative requirements that must be met before the right accrues. Even if those requirements are met, there are circumstances in which the employer may deny reemployment.

This Commentary discusses only the right to reemployment under Section 4312 of Uniform Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA) (38 U.S.C. 4301-4334), which is violated even if no part of the employers motive for failing to reemploy involves discrimination against service in the military. n1 It covers only briefly discriminatory refusals to reemploy under Section 4311 of USERRA. n2 It does not discuss various perquisites of employment governed by USERRA--the escalator principle, the determination of the position in which the returning employee will be employed, seniority rights upon reemployment, compensation upon reemployment, or the statutory protection against discharge after reemployment--that obtain upon reemployment.

The Commentary focuses solely on whether an individual returning from service has an unqualified right to be reemployed. It examines the requirements to qualify for reemployment and the factors that may lead to disqualification.

A checklist that follows the Commentary will be of assistance to the returning G.I. and the employer, as well as their counsel.

II. USERRAs Right to Reemployment

No Discriminatory Denial of Reemployment: 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a)

The Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act (USERRA),ⁿ³ which was enacted in 1994, actually contains two provisions dealing with reemployment rights. Section 4311 (a) states that a person who is a member of . . . [or] has performed . . . service in a uniformed service shall not be denied . . . reemployment . . . by an employer on the basis of that membership ⁿ⁴ In other words, a returning service member may not be denied reemployment because of his membership or service in the Uniformed Services. Section 4311 (a), therefore, requires the returning service member, seeking to recover the job he once held, to establish that his former employer acted with discriminatory motive in denying reemployment.

This section will not be discussed further in this Commentary, which focuses instead on a statutory reemployment right that does not require a showing of discriminatory motive.

Right to Reemployment Even Absent a Showing of Discrimination: 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a)

Generally. Another section of USERRA, 38 U.S.C. § 4312 (a) provides simply that a person who leaves his job to serve in the Uniformed Services is entitled to the reemployment rights of USERRA if the employer has been given notice of that service, the service is for a period of five years (generally) or less, and the employee reports back to work within the time permitted by the statute.ⁿ⁵ There is nothing in the statutory text to suggest that a showing of discriminatory employer motive is a prerequisite to reemployment rights under this sectionⁿ⁶ and it is this section of USERRA that will be the subject of this Commentary.

The difference between the two sections is best demonstrated by an example. Assume that while Joe is gone from his job because he was called up to serve in Iraq, Joes employer hires Bob to fill in during Joes absence. Bob turns out to be a far more productive employee than Joe and the employer decides to hold on to him permanently. When Joe returns home and reports for work, his employer says hes sorry but Bob is such a good worker, he is not going to let him go and he has no other work for Joe. The reason Joe doesnt get his job back is not because the employer discriminates against service in the Uniformed Services; its because he likes Bob as a worker much better than Joe. Therefore, Joe has no claim under 38 U.S.C. § 4311 (a) because there has been no discrimination on account of his service in the Uniformed Services. Because 38 U.S.C. § 4312 (a), however, does not require a showing of discrimination, Joe would have an actionable claim under that section.

The Sixth Circuits Position. In Curby v. Archon,ⁿ⁷ the Sixth Circuit held that a person seeking relief under § 4312 must also meet the discrimination requirement contained in § 4311. The courts reasoning was two-fold. First, it noted that one of the goals of USERRA, as set forth in 38 U.S.C. § 4301(a)(3), is to prohibit discrimination against persons because of their service in the uniformed services. Second, the court stated, 38 U.S.C. § 4311 was enacted in response to the Supreme Courts decision in *Monroe v. Standard Oil Co.*ⁿ⁸ There, the Supreme Court held that USERRAs antecedent, the Vietnam Era Veterans Readjustment Assistance Act of 1974 (VRRRA), was enacted for the significant but limited purpose of protecting the employee-reservist against discriminations like discharge and demotion, motivated solely by reserve status.ⁿ⁹ According to the Sixth Circuit:

Congress amended the statute in 1994 to provide that a violation occurs when a persons membership in the uniformed services is a motivating factor, even if not the sole factor. Stated otherwise, Congress intended to lessen, but not eliminate, a veterans obligation to show that the employers adverse decision was related to his or her service in the armed forces. n10

Other courts have rejected this interpretation and, after examining the statutory text and the legislative history of USERRA, concluded that, in enacting 38 U.S.C. § 4312 Congress intended to legislate a right of re-employment separate from the right against discrimination enacted as part of Section 4311 and that this entitlement does not depend on proof of discrimination. n11 In the Preamble to the final USERRA regulations, the United States Department of Labor (DoL) expressly adopted this latter interpretation and stated that sections 4311 and 4312 of USERRA are separate and distinct. The final regulation specifically provides that a returning service member is not required to prove that the employer discriminated against him or her because of the employees uniformed service in order to be eligible for reemployment. n12

Although, for the time being, employer counsel in the Sixth Circuit may have an advantage over their brethren in other circuits, this Commentary posits that the position of the Sixth Circuit will not ultimately prevail. The remainder of this Commentary, therefore, will assume that proof of discrimination is not an element of a prima facie case under 38 U.S.C. § 4312.

III. Prerequisites for Reemployment under 38 U.S.C. Section 4312.

Character of Separation from Service in the Uniformed Services.

An individual returning from service in the Uniformed Services forfeits the right to reemployment if the character of his or her separation from service offends the purposes of the statute. Section 4304 of USERRA (38 U.S.C. 4304) list four types of separation from service that constitute a forfeiture of the right to reemployment. n13 They are:

- . dishonorable or bad conduct discharge n14
- . "other than honorable" discharge as characterized by the regulations of the appropriate service Secretary n15
- . dismissal of a commissioned officer by general court-martial or Presidential order during a war, n16 and,
- . removal of a commissioned officer from the rolls because of unauthorized absence from duty or imprisonment by a civil authority. n17

Requirement of Notice to Employer upon Entering Uniformed Services

Generally. As a condition of qualifying for reemployment, Section 4312 (38 U.S.C. 4312) requires that a person returning from service in the Uniformed Services must have given his or her employer advance written or verbal notice of such service. The notice may be given by the individual who is reporting for duty or by an appropriate officer of the uniformed service for which the service will be performed. n18 If the person is employed by more than one employer, notice must be given to all employers with whom reemployment might be sought. n19 The requirement applies not only when the employee holds two jobs for different employers but when the employee holds a single job but is employed by joint employers (for example, an employment agency that has referred him or her to one of its clients).

Indeed, the DoL states that, if the employment was obtained through a union hiring hall, notice must be given to both the employer and the hiring hall. n20

Form and Content of Notice. Although notice of intent to leave employment to serve in the military may be oral or written, the United States Department of Defense (DoD) suggests that, as an evidentiary matter, notice be given in writing. n21 DoD regulations include a form notice that may be used for this purpose. n22 The notice need not inform the employer whether or not the employee intends to seek reemployment upon completion of military duty. n23 Indeed, even if, when leaving, the employee tells the employer that he or she does not intend to seek reemployment upon completion of military duty, the DoL takes the position that the employee retains the right to reemployment, because an employee may not waive USERRAs right to reemployment until it has matured, i.e., until the period of service is completed. n24

Timing of Notice. USERRAs text requires no more than that the notice be given in advance. n25 Regulations issued by the DoD strongly recommend[] 30 days advance notice when it is feasible, n26 However, the DoL requires only that notice should be provided as far in advance as is reasonable under the circumstances, n27 and expressly resisted requests that the regulations adopt more specific guidelines. n28

Exceptions to Notice Requirement. Advance notice is not required if the giving of notice is either precluded by military necessity, or impossible or unreasonable under all the circumstances. n29 The determination of military necessity, which is made by the DoD, is not subject to judicial review n30 and includes a mission, operation, exercise or requirement that is classified, or a pending or ongoing mission, operation, exercise or requirement that may be compromised or otherwise adversely affected by public knowledge. n31

The giving of advance notice is deemed otherwise impossible or unreasonable if: an employer representative to whom notice could be given is unavailable; the employee is ordered to report within 48 hours of such notice; or the DoD determines that the circumstances preclude notice. n32 Unlike the determination of military necessity, whether or not notice is impossible or unreasonable under the circumstances is subject to judicial review. n33

Requirement that Cumulative Years of Service-Related Absence Not Exceed Five Years

General Rule. Generally, unless an individuals cumulative service-related absence from the employ of the employer from which he or she seeks reemployment exceeds five years, he or she has a right to reemployment upon separation from service. n34 The period of time used to calculate the five-year period of service-related absence to which the individual is entitled encompasses only the period of time spent performing services in the uniformed services. A period of absence from employment before or after performing service in the uniformed services does not count against the five-year limit. n35 For example, after the employee completes a period of service in the uniformed services, he or she is provided a certain amount of time, depending upon the length of service, to report back to work or to submit an application for reemployment. The period between completing the uniformed service and reporting back to work or seeking reemployment does not count against the five-year limit. n36 For the same reason, travel time to and from the duty station, time to prepare personal affairs before entering the service, delays in activation, and similar circumstances do not count against the five-year limit. n37 The five year leave of absence rule applies separately to each employer. n38

EXAMPLE While working for employer A, Susan is absent for a period of three years to perform services in the uniformed services. Upon separation from service, Susan briefly returns to work for employer A before accepting a job with employer B. While working for employer B, Susan again enters the uniformed services, serving for another three-year period. Upon completion of this second period of service, Susan has reemployment rights with employer B even though her cumulative period of service related absence from employment for all employers exceeds five years, because her period of absence from employer B is only three years.

Moreover, if an individual is employed by more than one employer, a separate five-year period runs as to each employer, independently, even if those employers are joint employers of the individual. n39

EXAMPLE If Jim works for ABC Construction during the day, has a part-time evening job with XYZ Hardware, and enters the uniformed services for a period of two years, upon completion of his service, he will be entitled to reemployment rights with both ABC Construction and XYZ Hardware. Similarly, if, while Melissa is employed by Tech Services (an employee leasing company) and assigned to New Designs, Inc. (which supervises her on a day-to-day basis and controls her hours of work), she enters the uniformed services for a period of two years, upon completion of that service she will enjoy a right of reemployment with respect to both Tech Services and New Designs, Inc.

Service in Uniformed Services Prior to Effective Date of USERRA. The reemployment rights provisions of USERRA govern applications for reemployment on or after December 12, 1994. n40 Whether uniformed service performed before December 12, 1994 counts against the five-year service-related absence limit in USERRA depends on whether that pre-December 12, 1994 service was counted towards the four or five-year service limitations of the VRRRA. n41 If it did, then it also counts against the service limits of USERRA. n42

Statutory Exceptions to General Rule. In calculating years of service-related absence for this purpose, certain periods of service related to military obligations beyond the individuals control are excluded, including any period of service in excess of five years necessary to complete an initial period of obligated service. n43

No Reemployment Rights after Career Military Service. Reemployment rights after service in the uniformed services are applicable only in the case of non-career military service. n44 The determination of whether service in the uniformed services is career or non-career is based on all the facts and circumstances; there is no bright line test. The Supreme Court has held that an individual did not forfeit reemployment rights under the VRRRA by military service of 3 years duration and that it would not impose a reasonable limit on the duration of military service that would still qualify for reemployment rights. n45 Other courts have held that combined military service of 14 years establishes an intention to abandon ones civilian career in favor of a career in the military service. n46

Timely Application for Reemployment

General Rule. An individual seeking reemployment after service must notify his employer in a timely fashion of his intent to return to work. The method of and deadline for such notification varies according to the circumstances of the individual seeking reemployment as discussed below. n47

Service of Less than 31 Days. For periods of service of less than 31 days, the individual may take the time necessary to safely return home plus eight hours. After that, the individual must report to the employer not later than the beginning of the first full regularly scheduled work period[,] n48 unless, through no fault of the individual, it is impossible or unreasonable to do so, n49 in which case he or she must report as soon as possible. n50

EXAMPLE [I]f the employee completes a period of service and travels home, arriving at ten o'clock in the evening, he or she cannot be required to report to the employer until the beginning of the next full regularly-scheduled work period that begins at least eight hours after arriving home, i.e., no earlier than six o'clock the next morning. If it is impossible or unreasonable for the employee to report within such time period through no fault of his or her own, he or she must report to the employer as soon as possible after the expiration of the eight-hour period. n51

Absence for Purpose of Examination to Determine Fitness for Service. An individual who is absent from a position of employment for the purposes of an examination to determine his or her fitness to perform service in the uniformed services, regardless of the length of the absence, is subject to the same rules regarding notice to the employer as the individual whose period of service in the uniformed services was less than 31 days. n52

Service of More than 30 Days But Less than 180 Days. For periods of service of more than 30 days but less than 181 days, the individual must submit an application (written or oral) for reemployment with the employer not later than 14 days after the completion of the period of service unless doing so is impossible or unreasonable through no fault of the individual. In the latter case, the individual must submit the application on the next full calendar day after it becomes possible to do so. n53

Service of More than 180 Days. For periods of service of more than 180 days, the individual must submit an application for reemployment (written or oral) with the employer not later than 90 days after the completion of the period of service. n54

Periods of Service May Not Be Combined. An individual may not add together days of service from separate but proximate periods of service in the uniformed service to create a longer period within which to apply for reemployment with the employer. n55

EXAMPLE If an individual serves in the uniformed services for a period of 20 days, returns to work and 2 days later is called to a period of service that extends for 170 days, the individual may not combine the two periods of service to create a period of service in excess of 180 days.

Extension of Time for Submission of Notice of Intent to Return to Work. For an individual who is hospitalized for, or convalescing from, an illness or injury incurred in, or aggravated during, the performance of service in the uniformed services the time for notifying an employer of intent to return to work is extended for the period of recovery, but not to exceed two years. n56 If, upon recovery, the individual is unable to report because of circumstances beyond his or her control the period is extended by the minimum time required to accommodate such circumstances. n57

An employer and an employee may also agree to extend the time within which the employee has to request reemployment. n58

Failure to Report or Submit Timely Application for Reemployment. Failure to report or apply for reemployment within the specified period specified does not constitute an automatic forfeiture of the right to reemployment. Instead, the individual is subject to the conduct rules, established policy, and general practices of the employer pertaining to explanations and discipline with respect to absence from scheduled work. n59

Employment with Another Employer Prior to Deadline for Reporting or Applying for Reemployment.

During the period of time prior to the deadline for reporting for, or submitting application for, reemployment, an individual may generally, without giving up his or USERRA reemployment rights, seek and obtain employment with another employer. n60 The rules caution, however, against accepting employment that would constitute cause for discharge by the original employer (such as accepting employment with a competitor). n61

Contents of Application for Reemployment

An application for reemployment may be oral or written and need not follow any particular format. It should indicate that the employee is a former employee returning from service in the uniformed services and that he or she seeks reemployment with the pre-service employer. It may or may not identify a particular reemployment position in which the applicant is interested. n62

To Whom the Application for Reemployment Must Be Submitted

The application for reemployment must be submitted to an employer with respect to which the individual is entitled to reemployment rights. It may be submitted to an agent or representative of the employer who has apparent responsibility for receiving employment applications. n63

Documentation of Eligibility for Reemployment Rights

If an individual is seeking reemployment under USERRA after a period of service in the uniformed service of more than 30 days or an individual is seeking reemployment after recovering from an illness or injury incurred while in the uniformed services, he or she must, upon the request of the employer from whom reemployment is sought, provide the employer with documentation to establish that:

- . his or her application is timely n64
- . his or her cumulative service-related absence from the employ of the employer does not exceed five years n65
- . his or her separation from service was not for a reason listed under the heading "Character of Separation from Service," supra. n66

The documents that satisfy this requirement are listed in the regulations issued by the DoL. n67 They vary depending on the circumstances and not all of the listed documents are available or necessary in every instance. n68

Failure to Provide Documentation

A failure to provide the requested documentation is not a basis for denying reemployment rights or delaying reemployment if the failure occurs because such documentation does not exist or is not readily available at the time the employer requests it. n69 If an individual is reemployed without having provided the documentation and documentation subsequently becomes available that establishes that he or she was not eligible for reemployment rights, the employer may terminate the employment. n70

IV. Circumstances Justifying Employers Refusal to Reemploy

Statutory Defenses Generally

There are four different circumstances, spelled out in the statute in which an employer is not required to reemploy an individual even though that individual has reemployment rights with respect to that employer. n71

Changed Circumstances

If the employers circumstances have so changed as to make reemployment impossible or unreasonable, there is no obligation to reemploy. n72 An example of changed circumstances that would make reemployment impossible or unreasonable is a reduction in force that would have included the individual seeking reemployment. The fact that the employer would be required to terminate the individuals temporary replacement, however, does not constitute changed circumstances. n73

This exception is to be construed narrowly. The change must be in the circumstances of the employer, as distinguished from the circumstances of its employees. n74 Thus, the DoL states that:

the defense of changed circumstances is available where reemployment would require the creation of a useless job or mandate reinstatement where there has been a reduction in the workforce that reasonably would have included the veteran. n75 However, an employer may not establish that it is unreasonable or impossible to reinstate the returning service member solely by showing that no opening exists at the time of the reemployment application or that another person was hired to fill the position vacated by the veteran, even if reemploying the service member would require terminating the employment of the replacement employee. n76

Inability to Perform Job

An employer is not under an obligation to reemploy an individual who, upon completion of service, is not qualified for a position due to disability or other bona fide reason. If reasonable efforts have been made by the employer to help such an individual become qualified, the employer is not required to suffer undue hardship in order to employ the individual. n77

One-time, Temporary Position

An employer is also not required to reemploy an individual who was hired for brief, nonrecurring employment with respect to which there was no reasonable expectation that such employment would continue indefinitely or for a significant period. n78 USERRA does not define significant period; however, under both USERRA and the VRRRA, a person holding a seasonal job may have reemployment rights if there is a reasonable expectation that the job will be available the next season. n79

Burden of Proof on Employer

The employer has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence each of the elements of the defenses discussed above. n80

V. Right to Prompt Reemployment

An individual entitled to reemployment under USERRA is to be promptly reemployed. n81 USERRA does not define what is meant by prompt reemployment. However, the Regulations provide:

Prompt reemployment means as soon as practicable under the circumstances of each case. Absent unusual circumstances, reemployment must occur within two weeks of the employee's application for reemployment. For example, prompt reinstatement after a weekend National Guard duty generally means the next regularly scheduled working day. On the other hand, prompt reinstatement following several years of active duty may require more time, because the employer may have to reassign or give notice to another employee who occupied the returning employee's position. n82

VI. Conclusion

Speaking of the Selective Service Act of 1940, the Supreme Court stated:

This legislation is to be liberally construed for the benefit of those who left private life to serve their country in its hour of great need. And no practice of employers . . . can cut down the service adjustment benefits which Congress has secured the veteran under the Act. Our problem is to construe the separate provisions of the Act as parts of an organic whole and give each as liberal a construction for the benefit of the veteran as a harmonious interplay of the separate provisions permits. n83

This admonition has been generally heeded by the federal courts and the DoL has stated that this interpretive maxim apply with full force and effect in construing USERRA and [its implementing] regulations. n84

USERRA also expressly provides that nothing in the statute supersedes, nullifies or diminishes any Federal or State law (including any local law or ordinance), contract, agreement, policy, plan, practice, or other matter that establishes a right or benefit that is more beneficial to, or is in addition to, a right or benefit provided for such person in [USERRA]. n85 On the other hand, USERRA supersedes any State law (including any local law or ordinance), contract, agreement, policy, plan, practice, or other matter that reduces, limits, or eliminates in any manner any right or benefit provided by [USERRA], including the establishment of additional prerequisites to the exercise of any such right or the receipt of any such benefit. n86

All of the above bodes well for the employee returning from service in the Uniformed Services. The strong statutory and judicial presumption favoring our Uniformed Service personnel is grounded in political and patriotic emotion, as well as sound policy. That fact will not be lost on counsel for the employee. Perhaps more importantly, it should remain prominent in the rendering of legal advice by counsel for the employer. Employer attempts to justify the denial of reemployment should be viewed with suspicion by their counsel (they will almost certainly be so viewed by the judiciary).

Nonetheless, there are specific circumstances in which a refusal to reemploy does not violate the law and counsel must also be aware of those situations. The checklist that follows, when used in conjunction with the discussion in this commentary will enable the advocate to focus clearly on the relative strengths and weaknesses of the client's position.

Checklist

Prerequisites for Reemployment

Character of Separation from Service in the Uniformed Services

- . Was the character of separation from service of the employee seeking reemployment of a kind that constitutes forfeiture of reemployment rights?
 - . dishonorable or bad conduct discharge
 - . other than honorable discharge
 - . dismissal of a commissioned officer by general court-martial or Presidential order during a war, or
 - . removal of a commissioned officer from the rolls because of unauthorized absence from duty or imprisonment by a civil authority..

Notice to Employer upon Entering Uniformed Services

- . Did the individual seeking reemployment give advance written or oral notice to each employer from which he or she is seeking reemployment of his intent to enter the service of the Uniformed Services?
 - . If notice was not given, was notice excused by:
 - . Military necessity?
 - . Circumstances that made the giving of notice impossible or unreasonable?

Cumulative Years of Service-Related Absence

- . Was the individual seeking reemployment absent from that employment on account of service in the Uniformed Services for a cumulative period of five years or less?
 - . If the cumulative service-related absence from employment exceeds five years may the excess period be ignored because it is related to military obligations beyond the individual's control?
 - . Are the years of service-related absence such that the individual will be deemed to have abandoned a civilian career in favor of a military career?

Timely Application for Reemployment

. If the individual seeking reemployment served in the Uniformed Services for less than 31 days, did he report for work at the beginning of the first full regularly scheduled that began more than eight hours after returning home?

. If the answer to the previous question is no, was it impossible or unreasonable for her to do so at that time and, if so, did she report as soon as possible thereafter?

. If the individual seeking reemployment served in the Uniformed Services for more than 30 days but less than 181 days, did he or she submit a written or oral application for reemployment not later than 14 days after the completion of the period of service?

. If the answer to the previous question is no, was it impossible or unreasonable for him to do so at that time and, if so, did he submit the application on the next full calendar day after it became possible to do so?

. If the individual seeking reemployment served in the Uniformed Services for more than 180 days, did he or she submit a written or oral application for reemployment not later than 90 days after the completion of the period of service?

. Was an individual's failure to give timely notice as described above excused because the individual was hospitalized for, or convalescing from, an illness or injury incurred in, or aggravated during, the performance of service in the uniformed services?

. If the answer to the previous question is yes, was timely notice given upon completion of the period of recovery (not to exceed two years after separation from service)?

. Even if the employee failed to make a timely application for reemployment, would this constitute grounds for termination under the employer's policies and procedures?

Documentation of Eligibility for Reemployment Rights

. If the individual seeking reemployment served in the Uniformed Services for more than 30 days or is seeking reemployment after recovering from an illness or injury incurred while in the uniformed services, has he or she provided documentation requested by the employer with respect to any of the following factors:

- . timeliness of application for reemployment
- . cumulative service-related absence from employment does not exceed five years
- . character of separation from service

Circumstances Justifying Employers Refusal to Reemploy Changed Circumstances

. Is the employer's denial of reemployment justified by changed circumstances that make reemployment impossible or unreasonable?

Inability to Perform Job

. Is the employers denial of reemployment justified because the individual seeking reemployment is not qualified for a position due to disability or other bona fide reason and have reasonable efforts been made by the employer to help such an individual become qualified.

One-time, Temporary Position

. Is the employers denial of reemployment justified because the job held by the individual seeking reemployment at the time he or she entered the Uniformed Services was for brief, nonrecurring employment with respect to which there was no reasonable expectation that such employment would continue indefinitely or for a significant period?

Right to Prompt Reemployment

Was the individual reemployed promptly under all the facts and circumstances?

*For text of the final USERRA regulation, see 70 FR 75346 (December 19, 2005)

*For text of USERRA, see 38 USC 4301 et seq.

*For further discussion of USERRA, see Drafting the Union Contract, Chapter 1-USERRA.

*For labor and employment content, see Labor and Employment Area of Law Page

*For up-to-date coverage of USERRA, see related news articles from the most recent two years.

*For USERRA cases, see related opinions from Labor & Employment Cases and Administrative Materials

*For law review articles on USERRA, see Labor Law Review Articles, Combined

Return to Text

n1 As discussed below (see heading The Sixth Circuits Position), the Sixth Circuit has held otherwise in an opinion which other courts and the United States Department of Labor (DoL) have concluded represents an incorrect interpretation of the statute. This Commentary assumes that the view of the other courts and the DoL is correct.

n2 See heading USERRAs Right to Reemployment/No Discriminatory Denial of Reemployment: § 4311(a), infra.

n3 38 U.S.C. § 4301-4334. For ease of reference, the various sections of USERRA will be referred to in the main text of this Commentary simply by their section numbers; viz § 4311, or Section 4311 but not 38 U.S.C. § 4311. In the footnotes the standard citation format, which includes the title number, will be used, e.g., 38 U.S.C. § 4311.

n4 38 U.S.C. § 4311(a) (emphasis supplied).

n5 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a).

n6 The Sixth Circuit, however, has held that 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a) must be read as a subsection of 38 U.S.C. § 4311 and requires a showing of discriminatory intent. That position will be discussed before this Commentary undertakes a more detailed discussion of the notice and other requirements of 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a). See The Sixth Circuits Position, infra.

n7 216 F.3d 549, 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 14181 (6th Cir. 2000).

n8 452 U.S. 549, 1981 U.S. LEXIS 114 (1981).

n9 Monroe, 452 U.S. 549 at 559 (emphasis added).

N10 Curby v. Archon, 216 F.3d 549 at 556-557 (citation omitted).

n11 Wrigglesworth v. Brumbaugh, 121 F. Supp. 2d 1126, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 17418 (W.D. Mich. 2000). See also Jordan v. Air Products & Chemicals, Inc., 225 F. Supp. 2d 1206, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18306 (C.D. Cal. 2002).

n12 20 CFR § 1002.33.

n13 That section provides:

A persons entitlement to the benefits of this chapter by reason of the service of such person in one of the uniformed services terminates upon the occurrence of any of the following events:

- (1) A separation of such person from such uniformed service with a dishonorable or bad conduct discharge.
- (2) A separation of such person from such uniformed service under other than honorable conditions, as characterized pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned.
- (3) A dismissal of such person permitted under section 1161(a) of title 10.
- (4) A dropping of such person from the rolls pursuant to section 1161(b) of title 10.

n14 38 U.S.C. § 4304(1); 20 CFR § 1002.135(a); 70 Fed. Reg. 75261 (December 19, 2005).

n15 38 U.S.C. § 4304(2); 20 CFR § 1002.135(b); 70 Fed. Reg. 75261 (December 19, 2005).

n16 38 U.S.C. § 4304(1), 10 U.S.C. § 1161 (a); 20 CFR § 1002.135(a); 70 Fed. Reg. 75261 (December 19, 2005).

n17 38 U.S.C. § 4304(1), 10 U.S.C. § 1161 (b); 20 CFR § 1002.135(a); 70 Fed. Reg. 75261 (December 19, 2005).

n18 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a)(1); 20 CFR § 1002.32(a)(1); 20 CFR § 1002.85(b); 5 CFR § 353.204. The Department of Defense defines appropriate officers to include all commissioned officers, warrant officers, and non-commissioned officers authorized by the Secretary concerned to act in this capacity. 32 CFR § 104.3.

n19 20 CFR § 1002.32(a).

n20 See 70 Fed. Reg. 7525-56 (December 19, 2005).

n21 32 CFR § 104.6(a). See also 70 Fed. Reg. 75255 (December 19, 2005).

n22 32 CFR § Part 104, Appendix B.

n23 20 CFR § 1002.88.

n24 20 CFR § 1002.88. Section 1002.88 implements the long-standing legal principle that an employee departing for service is not required to decide at that time whether he or she intends to return to the pre-service employer upon completion of the tour of duty. Rather, the employee may defer the decision until after he or she concludes the period of service, and the employer may not press the employee for any assurances about his or her plans. See H.R. Rep. No. 103-65, Pt. I, at 26 (1993) (One of the basic purposes of the reemployment statute is to maintain the service members civilian job as an unburned bridge.) and S. Rep. No. 103- 158, at 47 (1993), both of which cite Fishgold v. Sullivan Drydock and Repair Corp., 328 U.S. 275, 284 (1946). 70 Fed. Reg. 75256 (December 19, 2005).

n25 38 U.S.C. § 4312(a)(1).

n26 32 CFR § 104.6(a)(2)(i)(B).

n27 20 CFR § 1002.85(d).

n28 See 70 Fed. Reg. 75256-57 (December 19, 2005).

n29 38 U.S.C. § 4312(b); 20 CFR § 1002.86.

n30 38 U.S.C. § 4312(b); 20 CFR § 1002.86(a).

n31 32 CFR § 104.3.

n32 32 CFR § 104.3, 20 CFR § 1002.86(b).

n33 See 70 Fed. Reg. 75256 (December 19, 2005) (citing S. Rep. No. 103-158, at 47 (1993)).

n34 38 U.S.C. § 4312(c); 20 CFR § 1002.99.

n35 20 CFR § 1002.100. See 70 Fed. Reg. 75257 (December 19, 2005).

n36 20 CFR § 1002.100.

n37 70 Fed. Reg. 75257 (December 19, 2005).

n38 38 U.S.C. § 4312(c); 20 CFR § 1002.101; 70 Fed. Reg. 75257 (December 19, 2005).

n39 38 U.S.C. § 4312(c); 20 CFR § 1002.101.

n40 20 CFR § 1002.3.

n41 USERRA, Sec. 8(a)(3); 20 CFR § 1002.102. See also 70 Fed. Reg. 75257 (December 19, 2005).

n42 20 CFR § 1002.102. See also 70 Fed. Reg. 75257 (December 19, 2005).

n43 The specific excluded periods are detailed in 38 U.S.C. § 4312(c).

n44 Woodman v. OPM, 258 F.3d 1372, 1377, 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 16869 (Fed. Cir. 2001).

n45 King v. St. Vincents Hosp., 502 U.S. 215, 1991 U.S. LEXIS 7175 (1991).

n46 Paisley v. City of Minneapolis, 79 F.3d 722, 1996 U.S. App. LEXIS 5402 (1991); Woodman v. OPM, 258 F.3d 1372, 2001 U.S. App. LEXIS 16869 (Fed. Cir. 2001).

n47 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1); 20 CFR § 1002.115. For a case in which an individual lost his right to reemployment by failing to give timely notice, see McGuire v. UPS, 152 F.3d 673, 1998 U.S. App. LEXIS 18375 (7th Cir. 1998).

n48 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(A)(i); 20 CFR § 1002.115 (a); 5 CFR § 353.205(a).

n49 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(A)(ii); 20 CFR § 1002.115 (a).

n50 20 CFR § 1002.115 (a), 117 (b).

n51 20 CFR § 1002.115 (a).

n52 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(B); 20 CFR § 1002.115 (a); 5 CFR § 353.205(a).

n53 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(C); 20 CFR § 1002.115 (b), 117 (b); 5 CFR § 353.205(b).

n54 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(1)(D); 20 CFR § 1002.115 (b); 5 CFR § 353.205(c).

n55 70 Fed. Reg. 75258 (December 19, 2005).

n56 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(2)(A); 20 CFR § 1002.11 6; 5 CFR § 353.205(d).

n57 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(2)(B) ; 20 CFR § 1002.116.

n58 70 Fed. Reg. 75258 (December 19, 2005).

n59 38 U.S.C. § 4312(e)(3); 20 CFR § 1002.117(a); 5 CFR § 353.205(e); 70 Fed. Reg. 75260 (December 19, 2005).

n60 20 CFR § 1002.120.

n61 20 CFR § 1002.120.

n62 20 CFR § 1002.11 8.

n63 20 CFR § 1002.119.

n64 38 U.S.C. § 4312(f)(1)(A); 20 CFR § 1002.121(a); 5 CFR § 353.206.

n65 38 U.S.C. § 4312(f)(1)(B); 20 CFR § 1002.121(b); 5 CFR § 353.206.

n66 38 U.S.C. § 4312(f)(1)(C). n67 20 CFR § 1002.123(a).

n68 20 CFR § 1002.123(b).

n69 38 U.S.C. § 4312(f)(3)(A); 20 CFR § 1002.122.

n70 38 U.S.C. § 4312(f)(3)(A).

n71 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(1)(A-C).

n72 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(1)(A); 20 CFR § 1002.139(a).

n73 20 CFR § 1002.139(a).

n74 See 70 Fed. Reg. 75262 (December 19, 2005).

n75 70 Fed. Reg. 75262 (December 19, 2005) (quoting H.R. Rep. No. 103-65, Pt. I, at 25 (1993), which in turn cites Watkins Motor Lines v. De Galliford, 167 F.2d 274, 275, [1948 U.S. App. LEXIS 3159] (5th Cir. 1948); Davis v. Halifax County School System, 508 F. Supp. 966, 969, 1981 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11030 (E.D. N.C. 1981)).

n76 70 Fed. Reg. 75262 (December 19, 2005) (citing Davis at 968 and Cole v. Swint, 961 F.2d 58, 60, 1992 U.S. App. LEXIS 8789 (5th Cir. 1992); Fitz v. Bd. of Education of Port Huron Area Schools, 662 F. Supp. 1011, 1015, 1985 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20124 (E.D. Mich. 1985), affd, 802 F.2d 457, 1986 U.S. App. LEXIS 28775 (6th Cir. 1986); Anthony v. Basic American Foods, Inc., 600 F. Supp. 352, 357 (N.D. Cal. 1984); Goggin v. Lincoln St. Louis, 702 F.2d 698, 704, 1983 U.S. App. LEXIS 29626 (8th Cir. 1983)).

n77 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(1)(B); 20 CFR § 1002.139(b); 70 Fed. Reg. 75262 (December 19, 2005).

n78 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(1)(C); 20 CFR § 1002.21, 1002.139(c); 70 Fed. Reg. 75250 (December 19, 2005).

n79 70 Fed. Reg. 75262 (December 19, 2005) (citing Stevens v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 687 F.2d 158, 161-62, 1982 U.S. App. LEXIS 25979 (6th Cir. 1982), and cases cited therein; S. Rep. No. 103-158, at 46-47 (1993)).

n80 38 U.S.C. § 4312(d)(2); 20 CFR § 1002.139(d).

n81 38 U.S.C. § 4313(a); 20 CFR § 1002.180.

n82 20 CFR § 1002.181. Cases interpreting the prompt reemployment requirement include Vander Wal v. Sykes Enterprises, Inc., 377 F. Supp. 2d 738, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14730 (D.N.D. 2005) (even though one plaintiff was not reemployed until over one month after filing application, he was reemployed on first day that he stated he was available; second plaintiff was reemployed within seven business days of filing application); Haight v. Katch, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 43777 at *15-16 (D. Neb. Oct. 5, 2005) (under circumstances, employer not required to reemploy individual immediately upon the individual--unexpectedly and without prior notice--reporting to work; Petty v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville-Davidson, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 83787 (M.D. Nov. 16, 2006) (metropolitan police departments delay of three weeks in reemploying a veteran of the Iraq war no violation, when the individual resigned from the service in lieu of facing a court martial over charges that he had violated the Military Code of Justice)).

n83 Fishgold v. Sullivan Drydock & Repair Corp., 328 U.S. 275, 285, 1946 U.S. LEXIS 3070 (1946) (citation omitted).

n84 70 Fed. Reg. 75246 (December 19, 2005).

n85 38 U.S.C. § 4302(a).

n86 38 U.S.C. § 4302(b).

n87 38 U.S.C. § 4304(1); 20 CFR § 1002.135(a); 70 Fed. Reg. 75261 (December 19, 2005).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Peter Lareau has been engaged in the practice of labor law for the better part of four decades. Starting as a field attorney with the National Labor Relations Board in 1968, he subsequently moved to the Venable law firm where he remained for 25 years and was a partner in the firm's Baltimore, Maryland office. Since moving to England, in 1995, and then to California, Mr. Lareau's work has primarily involved researching and writing on labor law subjects. He is the author of NLRA: Law and Practice, a six volume looseleaf treatise, and Drafting the Union Contract, both of which are published by Lexis Nexis Matthew Bender. He also serves as Editor-in-Chief of Bender's monthly labor and employment law journal, the Benders Labor and Employment Bulletin.

75 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Chestek on Kho v. Pennington, 2007 Ind. LEXIS 807 (Sept. 19, 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 846

Chestek on Kho v. Pennington, 2007 Ind. LEXIS 807 (Sept. 19, 2007)

By Kenneth D. Chestek

November 5, 2007

SUMMARY: The Indiana Medical Malpractice Act (IMMA) creates substantive rights, and is not merely a procedural statute, according to a plurality of the Indiana Supreme Court. Accordingly, a law firm which fails to follow the procedures set forth in the statute may be liable in damages to the health care provider that the firm originally named as a defendant in a medical malpractice lawsuit. Kho v. Pennington, 2007 Ind. LEXIS 807 (Sept. 19, 2007). This commentary, written by Kenneth Chestek, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important change.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Indiana Medical Malpractice Act (IMMA) creates substantive rights, and is not merely a procedural statute, according to a plurality of the Indiana Supreme Court. Accordingly, a law firm which fails to follow the procedures set forth in the statute may be liable in damages to the health care provider that the firm originally named as a defendant in a medical malpractice lawsuit. Kho v. Pennington, 2007 Ind. LEXIS 807 (Sept. 19, 2007).

Background. The IMMA was enacted in 1998 (substantially revising a prior legislative scheme) to address what the legislature declared as an emergency in medical malpractice insurance coverage. 1998 Ind. PL 111, § 19. In addition to creating a Patient Compensation Fund (Ind. Code § 34-18-6-1), it also requires that all proposed medical malpractice complaints be first reviewed by a medical review panel created in the Indiana Department of Insurance (IDOI). Ind. Code § 34-18-8-4. The filing of the complaint with the IDOI tolls the statute of limitations. Ind. Code § 34-18-7-3. The opinion of the panel is admissible in subsequent litigation, and an opinion adverse to the plaintiff may be deemed sufficient to support summary judgment in favor of the health care provider. McGee v. Bonaventura, 605 N.E.2d 792, 1993 Ind. App. LEXIS 3 (Ind. App. 1993) (applying a similar provision of the former statutory scheme).

Situations may arise, however, where the statute of limitations may expire as to some defendants who are not covered by the IMMA while the proposed complaint is still under review. The IMMA therefore has a savings provision that allows a party to file a complaint in court notwithstanding the fact that the party's proposed complaint is still under review by a medical malpractice review panel. Ind. Code § 34-18-8-7. However, as one Indiana law firm recently learned, counsel should be careful not to include in the complaint any information which identifies the health care providers who have qualified for protection under that Act.

Kho v. Pennington. In Kho v. Pennington, 2007 Ind. LEXIS 807 (Sept. 19, 2007), plaintiff claimed that the negligence of a hospital and its emergency room physicians caused the death of Tracy Merle Lee. Dr. Kho had been the on-call doctor on the night that Lee was treated; accordingly, in January 2001 plaintiff filed with IDOI a proposed complaint against Dr. Lee, the hospital and another physician. One month later, plaintiff filed a separate action in the Scott Circuit Court. Dr. Lee then moved for summary judgment on the grounds that he had not actually provided any medical service to the decedent. In August 2001, plaintiffs counsel voluntarily dismissed Dr. Lee from the action.

Dr. Lee then sued plaintiff and plaintiffs counsel on a theory of malicious prosecution; he also claimed that plaintiff and her counsel violated the IMMA by filing a complaint in the Scott Circuit Court, naming him explicitly, before the medical review board proceeding had been completed. (The record of the case does not reveal why this lawsuit was filed before completion of the review process in the IDOI.) He alleged that this violated Ind. Code § 34-18-8-7, which allows a plaintiff to file an action in court against a health care provider while a medical review board proceeding is pending, but only if the complaint does not contain any information that would allow a third party to identify the defendant. Defendants moved for summary judgment on both issues, which the trial court granted.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal of the malicious prosecution claim on the basis that plaintiffs counsel had ample probable cause to include Dr. Lee as a defendant, based upon hospital records that included frequent references to him as the treating physician. Kho v. Pennington, 846 N.E.2d 1036, 1044 (Ind. Ct. App. 2006). That court also affirmed the trial court on the basis that the IMMA does not provide a private cause of action for its violation. Id. at 1048. The Court of Appeals found that the IMMA is a procedural law and provides no substantive rights; accordingly, the remedy for violation of the statute should have also been procedural: a dismissal of the complaint. Kho, 846 N.E.2d at 1048.

Procedural or substantive? The Supreme Court weighs in. The Supreme Court of Indiana granted transfer. The Court of Appeals holding on the malicious prosecution claim was affirmed. Kho v. Pennington, 2007 Ind. LEXIS 807 (Sept. 19, 2007) at *4. However, the Supreme Court found that an action for statutory negligence (also known as negligence per se) could be proven. In a fractured opinion, three justices voted to remand the matter for trial, although the basis for the remand appears to be unclear.

The malpractice plaintiff and her counsel once again argued in the Supreme Court that the IMMA was a procedural statute, and did not create any substantive rights. Their argument was based on the language of the statute, which provides in part that the complaint filed in court may not contain any information that would allow a third party to identify the defendant . . . Ind. Code § 34-18-8-7(a)(1). Accordingly, the plaintiffs argued, the remedy should be a dismissal of the complaint without prejudice to re-filing a complaint without the identification, citing Hubbard v. Columbia Womens Hosp., 807 N.E.2d 45, 51-52 (Ind. Ct. App. 2004). While two justices found that argument persuasive, Kho, 2007 Ind. LEXIS 807 at *27 (Sullivan, J., concurring and dissenting), two justices (Dickson and Boehm) held that long-standing principles of negligence per se would allow Dr. Kho to seek damages from the medical malpractice plaintiff and her counsel. They therefore voted to remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. Id. at *23. Justice Shepard wrote an opinion concurring in the result which also concurred with remanding the case for trial.

There is, however, some confusion as to what the trial court will be expected to do on remand. Justices Dickson and Boehm clearly voted to remand for trial only on the negligence per se claim, agreeing that the malicious prosecution claim failed. Justice Shepard concurred in the result, but on the ground that the malicious prosecution claim should have been submitted to the jury; his opinion does not discuss whether he believes there is a cause of action for negligence per se. Since Justice Rucker joined in Justice Sullivan's concurring and dissenting opinion (which would have affirmed the Court of Appeals on both issues), a 4-1 majority agrees with the dismissal of the malicious prosecution claim, but the vote on the negligence per se claim seems to be deadlocked at 2-2, with Justice Shepard's view unstated.

Assuming that Justice Shepard's opinion is interpreted (or later clarified) to support a remand on the negligence per se claim, another puzzling aspect of this case involves the malpractice plaintiffs claim that the inclusion of Dr. Kho's name in her complaint would not have protected his identity in any event, because that identity could easily have been obtained from other sources. For example, the proposed complaint filed with IDOI is a public record, fully identifying Dr. Kho. Likewise, in order to obtain personal jurisdiction over Dr. Kho, plaintiff had to provide instructions to the process server as to where to locate and serve Dr. Kho, which are also a public record. Justices Dickson and Boehm acknowledge that because of this, the statute may [provide] less than foolproof protection for the health care providers good name and reputation; however, they conclude that this imperfect provision serves a significant ameliorative function clearly intended by the legislature. *Id. at 21. Justice Sullivan (with Justice Rucker concurring) agreed with the malpractice plaintiff that these facts lend support to the claim that the statute is procedural and not substantive. Once again, Justice Sullivan's silence on this issue seems to leave this an open question.

To some extent, this opinion appears to be inconsistent with Schriber v. Anonymous, 848 N.E.2d 1061 (Ind. 2006). In that case, the plaintiffs asked IDOI if the proposed defendant in a medical malpractice case was a qualified health care provider. IDOI reported that it was not, so plaintiffs filed suit, naming the health care provider in the complaint. It later turned out that the health care provider was indeed a qualified provider, but due to a recent name change the IDOI had incorrectly reported the status of the provider to the malpractice plaintiff. The trial court in that case dismissed the action for failure to comply with the IMMA, but the Court of Appeals reversed, saying that the confusion about the name of the provider gave the plaintiff no reasonable means of complying with the statute; therefore, it found that the health care provider was not a qualified provider. Schriber v. Anonymous, 810 N.E.2d 1119 (Ind. Ct. App. 2004). The Supreme Court, however, disagreed with the Court of Appeals, concluding that a more appropriate alternative would be to judicially toll the expiration of the limitation period under the Act, so as to provide the plaintiff with a reasonable time after discovery of the proper entity name within which to commence an action in accordance with the Act. 848 N.E.2d at 1064. Thus, in the Schriber case, the Supreme Court applied a procedural remedy to a violation of the same section of the statute.

Practical Application. The safest course of action for a medical malpractice claimant will be to strictly adhere to the statutory language. If the need arises (to preserve a claim against a defendant for whom the statute of limitations is not tolled, for example) to file a complaint before the medical review board completes its proceeding, counsel is well advised to eliminate the names of all qualified health care providers from the complaint itself (by suing Dr. Doe, for example). However, there does not appear to be any requirement that the identity of the health care provider must be omitted from instructions to the process server, since it appears to be the opinion of four justices of the court that the inclusion of those names would not violate the statute. Counsel is also well advised to consult the IDOI prior to filing any action in court to determine whether any or all of the proposed defendants have qualified for coverage under the IMMA.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kenneth D. Chestek joined the Legal Analysis, Research and Communication (LARC) team at Indiana University School of Law in the Summer of 2003 after working as a Clinical Assistant Professor at the University of Michigan. He graduated cum laude from University of Pittsburgh School of Law where he was Editor in Chief of the Law Review. He has extensive practice experience and has worked as the managing attorney for Marshall, Dennehey, Warner, Coleman & Goggin's Erie office and as a partner in both his own firm (Chestek and Bax) and at Agresti & Agresti, in Erie, Pennsylvania. While in practice, he also served for 18 years as Chief Civil Counsel to Erie County, Pennsylvania.

He has been active in numerous capacities with the Legal Writing Institute, an organization of nearly 2000 legal writing professionals in the United States and around the world. Currently, he serves as a member of the Board of Directors and Treasurer of LWI. He also co-chairs the ALWD/LWI Annual Survey Committee, and serves as list manager for the discussion listserv (hosted at IU-Indy law school)

He has published and given lectures on a wide variety of subjects, including teaching methods, tax exemption policy, hospitals and the uses of computers in law offices.

76 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on the Attorney-Client Privilege in the Realm of Public Records Requests

2008 Emerging Issues 850

Grace V.B. Garcia on the Attorney-Client Privilege in the Realm of Public Records Requests

By Grace V. B. Garcia

November 5, 2007

SUMMARY: In Suffolk Construction Co., Inc. v. Division of Capital Asset Management, 449 Mass. 333 (2007), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court answered the question of whether by enacting the Massachusetts Public Records Law, the Legislature intended to extinguish the protection provided by the attorney-client privilege to public officers or employees and governmental entities subject to that law? By answering the question in the negative, the Court made it crystal clear that the attorney-client privilege is a fundamental privilege in both the private and public sector. Now government officials are assured that they can speak freely with their legal counsel, allowing them to obtain quality legal advice, which will not be subject to disclosure. This commentary, written by Grace Garcia, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Suffolk Construction Co., Inc. v. Division of Capital Asset Management, 449 Mass. 444 (2007), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court answered the question of whether, by enacting the Massachusetts Public Records Law, the Legislature intended to extinguish the protection provided by the attorney-client privilege to public officers or employees and governmental entities subject to that law. By answering the question in the negative, the Court made it crystal clear that the attorney-client privilege is a fundamental privilege in both the private and public sector. Now government officials are assured that they can speak freely with their legal counsel, allowing them to obtain quality legal advice, which will not be subject to disclosure.

Resolving the issue required an analysis of the state Public Records Law, the importance of the attorney-client privilege in our society, and the difference between the attorney-client privilege and the work-product doctrine.

Massachusetts Public Records Law

Massachusetts Public Records Law, Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 66, § 10, as supported by Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 4, § 7, provides that upon request, anyone is entitled to obtain copies of a broad array of public records. The primary purpose of the Public Records Law is to allow the public to have extensive access to governmental records. Thus, an individual has the right to obtain public records whether they have a vested interest or are merely curious.

Although the Public Records Law is generally broad in nature, it contains many clear exemptions to the governments obligation of disclosure. Some of the exemptions from disclosure include records related to personnel rules and practices of a government, personal notebooks, certain inter- and intra-agency policy position documents, trade secret information, and certain law enforcement investigations. See generally Cape Cod Times v. Sheriff of Barnstable County, 443 Mass. 587, 591-92, n.14 (2005) (listing various exemptions of the Public Records law). Thus, despite the fundamental mandates of open disclosure, the Law provides certain areas of protection that are often afforded to private persons and companies. Notable in the Public Records Law, however, is that there is no mention of the application of the attorney-client privilege.

Suffolk Construction Reiterates that the Attorney-Client Privilege Is Essential

The attorney-client privilege is the oldest privilege covering confidential communications known to common law. It shields from the view of third parties all confidential communications between a client and its attorney undertaken for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. Suffolk Constr., at 448. The privilege is shown if one proves the following elements:

(1) that he was or sought to be a client of the attorney; (2) that the attorney in connection with the document acted as a lawyer; (3) that the document relates to facts communicated for the purpose of securing a legal opinion, legal services or assistance in a legal proceeding; and (4) that the privilege has not been waived.

Town of Norfolk v. U.S. Army Corp of Engrs., 968 F.2d 1438, 1457 (1st Cir. 1992). As the privilege can be waived simply by an intended disclosure, critical to the claimants burden of proof is that the communication was made confidentially in the course of obtaining legal advice.

For any person or entity that asserts the attorney-client privilege, public or private, he or she bears the burden of proof that the privilege exists. Specifically, one must not only prove the existence of the attorney-client relationship, but all four elements for the privilege listed above. See, e.g., Matter of the Reorganization of Elec. Mut. Lia. Ins. Co. Ltd. (Bermuda), 425 Mass. 419, 421 (1997). At one time, once a document had become public, regardless of the circumstances, any privilege that attached to the document was deemed waived. Id. at 422. However, as the privilege rests with the client, the modern trend is to protect the privilege provided the client and attorney took reasonable measures to ensure confidentiality. Id. Thus, practitioners must be sure to advise their clients on the scope of the attorney-client privilege and the clients responsibilities in protecting the privilege.

Confusion with the Work-Product Privilege

The confusion that led to Suffolk Construction Co., Inc., that is, whether the attorney-client privilege in Massachusetts had been abrogated in the realm of public records requests, was based on the Courts prior holding in General Electric Co. v. Department of Environmental Protection, 429 Mass. 798 (1999). In General Electric, the Supreme Judicial Court held that the Public Records Law did not automatically exempt work-product documents from disclosure, unless those documents fell within one of the explicit exemptions contained in the Public Records Law.

The work-product doctrine differs from the attorney-client privilege in that it restricts the discovery of documents that are prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by or for another party or by or for that other partys representative (including his attorney). Suffolk Constr. 449 Mass. at 455 n.16. Consequently, the work-product doctrine shields an entirely different and separate category of information than that of the attorney-client privilege. The work-product doctrine gives protections to an attorneys work product, which can be discoverable upon a showing of need. In comparison, the attorney-client privilege is a privilege that belongs to the client, not the attorney, and is enforceable even after the clients death.

In deciding General Electric, the Court reiterated the Public Records Laws presumption that a record is public unless the record is proven to be exempt. The Court, without opining why, deemed that the Legislatures intent was to abolish the broad work-product privilege and replace it with the narrower deliberative process exemption. Based on the Public Record Laws failure to contain a clear exemption for the attorney-client privilege, Suffolk Construction unsuccessfully attempted to use General Electric to argue that public records should be disclosed.

The Courts Clear Answer

Based on the fundamental differences in the attorney-client privilege and the work-product doctrine, the Supreme Judicial Court distinguished General Electric in holding that public entities are entitled to assert the protection of the attorney-client privilege to the same extent as a private person or entity. In making its decision, the Court stated that there was no basis, in history or in the law, that would show any intent to abolish the privilege in the realm of public records requests. The attorney-client privilege is a basic, deep-seated, privilege that allows for the fair and effective administration of justice. Suffolk Const., 449 Mass. at 446. The privilege allows clients to tell their attorneys everything--the good, the bad, and the ugly--allowing the attorney to properly perform his or her duties and render legal advice based on the full information received from the client. By permitting candid conversation between attorneys and clients, the privilege advances the public interests in the observance of law and administration of justice. Suffolk Const., at 449. Now practitioners can counsel all clients, private and public alike, on the attorney-client privilege and the broad protection that it affords.

Cross References. Massachusetts Pleading and Practice § 26.11 -- Privileged Matter; § 26.14 The Work Product Doctrine and Rule 26(b)(3); Massachusetts Evidence From A to Z § A.42 Attorney Client Privilege.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

77 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on Rosenberg v. Metlife, Inc.

2008 Emerging Issues 847

Bisceglie on Rosenberg v. Metlife, Inc., 8 N.Y.3d 359, 866 N.E.2d 439, 834 N.Y.S. 2d 494 (2007)

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

November 5, 2007

SUMMARY: In a decision that affects securities brokers worldwide, the NY Court of Appeals held that employers statements on NASDs Form U-5 governing employee terminations receive absolute, rather than qualified, immunity. Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolofsky in New York City, analyzes the impact of this decision and provides guidance for practitioners arbitrating and litigating claims post-Rosenberg.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Absolute Immunity Applied to Brokers' Statements on NASD Form U-5

In Rosenberg v. Metlife, Inc., 8 N.Y.3d 359, 866 N.E.2d 439, 834 N.Y.S. 2d 494 (2007), a divided 4-2 Court of Appeals (in which Chief Justice Kaye did not participate) determined that a brokerage firm's statements on a National Association of Securities Dealers ("NASD") Uniform Termination Notice for Securities Industry Registration ("Form U-5") are entitled to absolute immunity from a libel claim even if made maliciously. In so doing, the Court gave greater weight to the need of securities firms and NASD's regulatory scheme to provide full and complete disclosure on the Form U-5 as to all circumstances surrounding employees' terminations than to potential damage to the defamed employees' future career prospects. Because NASD requires that a Form U-5 be filed when a registered representative is terminated and be reviewed before a representative is hired, and investigates terminations based on misconduct, this decision has far-reaching implications.

Public Policy Basis for Privilege. Public policy mandates that certain otherwise defamatory communications be given immunity from libel suit based on either a qualified or an absolute privilege. A qualified privilege extends to a statement made in good faith discharge of a private or public duty. Examples include the following:

? "qualified media privilege" (known in New York as "fair report privilege," NY Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964); Curtis v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967); Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974); Edwards v. National Audobon Society, 556 F.2d 113 (2d Cir. 1977));

? the "common interest doctrine," protecting communications made by one person on a subject in which he or she "has an interest or a legal, moral or societal duty to speak" to another person having a "corresponding legal duty or interest", (Brockman v. Frank, 149 Misc. 2d 399, 565 N.Y.S. 2d 426 (S.D.N.Y. 1991); see also Huggins v. Moore, 94

N.Y.2d 296, 704 N.Y.S.2d 904, 726 N.E.2d 456 (1999); Ferguson v. Sherman Square Realty Corp., 30 A.D.3d 288, 817 N.Y.S.2d 272 (1st Dep't 2006));

? communications by employers relating to employees or prospective employees, (Browne v. Prudden-Winslow Co., 195 A.D. 419, N.Y.S. 350 (1st Dep't 1921); Levine v. Board of Educ., 186 A.D.2d 743, 589 N.Y.S.2d 181 (2d Dep't 1992));

? the "labor dispute privilege," McGovern v. Hays, 135 A.D.2d 125, 524 N.Y.S.2d 558, app. denied 72 N.Y.2d. 803, 532 N.Y.S.2d 368, 528 N.E.2d 520 (3d Dep't 1988));

? qualified immunity to professional and fiduciary communications, McQuillan v. Kenyon & Kenyon, 705 N.Y.S.2d 671 (2d Dep't 2000); and

? immunity for physicians and health care providers, Farooq v. Coffey, 206 A.D.2d 879, 616 N.Y.S.2d 112 (4th Dep't 1994).

For a statement subject to a qualified privilege to be actionable, the plaintiff must show that the declarant acted with malice.

An absolute privilege, on the other hand, immunizes a declarant from liability regardless of malice and is generally reserved for statements "material and pertinent" to "the public function" including executive, legislative, judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings. Rosenberg, 8 N.Y.3d at 365, 866 N.E.2d at 442-43, 834 N.Y.S. 2d at 494.

Importance of Form U-5 in NASD's Quasi-judicial Function. In providing absolute immunity to employers' statements on a Form U-5, the Rosenberg Court built on its decision in Wiener v. Weintraub, 22 N.Y.2d 330, 331 (1968) where the Court provided absolute immunity for the statements in a complaint letter to the grievance committee of the bar association accusing an attorney of misconduct. Noting in Rosenberg that NASD is the largest self-regulatory organization ("SRO") subject to SEC oversight, oversees the conduct of over 5,000 brokerage firms and more than 660,000 registered securities representatives, is subject to U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission regulation and is the only "national securities association" registered under 15A of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, the Court found that the Form U-5 plays a "significant role" in discharging one of NASD's central responsibilities in the investigation and adjudication of securities violations.

The practitioner should note that, with the July, 2007, consolidation of NASD and the regulatory and enforcement functions of the New York Stock Exchange into Financial Institution Regulatory Authority ("FINRA"), NASD's role as a SRO and the role played by the Form U-5 has become even more important.

Subject to risks of penalty to the employer member firm, NASD requires that a Form U-5 be filed within 30 days of termination of a registered representative, that a member firm review a Form U-5 in the hiring process, and, of greatest significance, routinely investigates terminations for cause that involve misconduct and frequently initiates disciplinary action as a result. This was critical to the Rosenberg majority's decision to view "the compulsory Form U-5 as a preliminary or first step in the NASD's quasi-judicial process," which entitles the statements to absolute immunity. Rosenberg, 8. N.Y.3d at 367.

Unlike the statements in the attorney complaint in Weiner, the statements on the Form U-5 are, generally speaking, "public." Specifically, they are maintained on NASD's Central Registration Depository ("CRD") and must be reviewed by future member employers. Through the interplay between Form U-5 and the Uniform Application for Securities Industry Registration or Transfer ("Form U-4"), the public has access to certain information about the termination of a member employee via NASD's BrokerCheck program. The Rosenberg majority valued protection of the investing public and the integrity of the financial markets by encouraging "[a]ccurate and forthright responses" at the expense of potential abuse of the Form U-5.

Significance of Rosenberg. Rosenberg represents a marked extension by the Court of Appeals of absolute immunity to non-adjudicated public statements and puts New York out of step with how the majority of jurisdictions treat broker-dealers, see e.g., Galarneau v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith Inc., 2007 U.S. App. Lex. 23919 (1st Cir. October 12, 2007) (Maine law); Dawson v. New York Life Insurance Co., 135 F.3d 1158 (7th Cir. 1998) (Illinois law); Glenmore v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 83 F.3d 132 (6th Cir. 1996) (Tennessee law); Andrews v. Prudential Securities, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 23694 *1 (E.D. Mich. 1997); Eaton Vance Distributors, Inc. v. Ulrich, 692 So.2d 915 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2d Dist. 1997); Prudential Securities, Inc. v. Dalton, 929 F.Supp. 1411 (D. Okl. 1996); Harburjak v. Prudential Securities, Inc., 759 F. Supp. 293 (W.D.N.C. 1991), and NASD's original proposal for qualified immunity. See 2-UA Blue Sky Regulation § 507, n.2 (2006) (citing Securities Exchange Act Release 39,892,66 SEC Dock. 2473) (1998)).

Earlier Decisions Muddled. Prior to Rosenberg, there were two lines of cases in New York. A number of reported decisions flatly held that statements on a Form U-5 were absolutely privileged. Cicconi v. McGinn, Smith & Co., 2005 Slip Op. 0050, 27 A.D.3d 59, 808 N.Y.S.2d 604 (1st Dep't 2005); Herzfeld & Stern, Inc. v. Beck, 175 A.D. 689, 572 N.Y.S.2d 683 (1st Dep't 1991); Culver v. Merrill Lynch & Co., 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10017, *16 (S.D.N.Y. 1995); Hessel v. Goldman Sachs & Co., 281 A.D.2d 247, 722 N.Y.S.2d 21 (1st Dep't 2001); Dunn v. Ladenburg Thalmann & Co., 259 A.D.2d 544, 686 N.Y.S.2d 471 (2d Dep't 1999).

In contrast, the line permitting prosecution of a libel claim against broker-dealers provided only tepid support for qualified immunity. See Fahnestock v. Waltman, 935 F.2d 512 (2d Cir. 1991); Jordan v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 280 F. Supp. 2d 104, 109 (S.D.N.Y. 2003); Acciardo v. Millenium Securities Corp., 83 F. Supp.2d 413, 419 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). Specifically, both Fahnestock and Acciardo involved confirmation of an arbitration award in which the arbitrators had already applied a qualified immunity. As a result, the Fahnestock and Acciardo courts upheld the arbitrators' ruling based on a "manifest disregard of the law" standard effectively finding that the arbitrators' application of qualified immunity had some legal basis. This is very different from holding that a standard of qualified immunity applies. However, it was sufficient authority to cause confusion. In Jordan, the district court denied an employee's request for an injunction to force the employer to favorably amend the Form U-5 and noted that plaintiffs' defamation claim is subject to qualified immunity. Jordan, 280 F. Supp. at 109-110. Also, it was sufficiently unclear that it led the Second Circuit in Rosenberg to certify the question to the Court of Appeals. Rosenberg v. Metlife, Inc., 453 F.3d 122 (2d Cir. 2006); Rosenberg v. Metlife, Inc., 7 N.Y.3d 804, 854 N.E.2d 1268 (2006).

Post-Rosenberg Strategies. In light of the Court's holding, there will be more venue shopping in multi-state libel cases and more arguments over applicable choice of law. New York applies the law of the state with the greatest interest/most significant relationship with the alleged conduct and the parties, which is usually determined by the plaintiff's domicile and/or the situs of the alleged tortious conduct. Celle v. Filipino Reporter Enterprises, Inc., 209 F.3d 163, 175 (2d Cir. 2000); Lee v. Bankers Trust Company, 166 F.3d 540, 545 (2d Cir. 1999); Machleder v. Diaz, 801 F.2d 46, 51 (2d Cir. 1986). Securities industry employers should follow the law of the state where the employee works and/or resides when assessing appropriate language for the Form U-5. Plaintiffs should consider emphasizing the impact of the statement outside of New York.

The Second Circuit, in applying the certified response from the Court of Appeals in Rosenberg, did not "decide if there are circumstances in which statements on Form U-5 are not absolutely privileged" (Rosenberg v. MetLife, Inc., 493 F.3d 290, 291, n.1 (2d Cir. 2007)), but suggested that those circumstances would exist where the statements were not "material and pertinent to the issue to be resolved in the proceeding." Counsel should consider whether any statements were made beyond the Form U-5, such as remarks made to the media, socially, in emails outside the firm or in meetings. In-house counsel for brokers should vet the statement in the Form U-5 to tie it into the reasons for termination and purge any collateral statement not necessary to give an account of the reasons for the termination. Notwithstanding the immunity, depending on the circumstances, other employee claims, including retaliation, breach of contract and discrimination claims, are still viable.

At least one decision has held that Rosenberg is insufficient to obtain a stay of the arbitration and any question over the extent of the applicable immunity should be raised before the arbitral tribunal, not in a CPLR article 75 proceeding. McKim Capital, Inc. v. Stewart, 2006 NY Slip Op 52462U LEXIS 3888, *1-2 (N.Y. Misc. 2006).

Finally, practitioners should keep in mind that potential clients are often most concerned about their reputation and ability to find new gainful work in the same industry. While Rosenberg limits the availability of money damages, it does not preclude an employee from protecting his or her reputation by initiating a NASD arbitration or court action to expunge defamatory language on the Form U-5. Employment lawyers should explain this distinction to discharged employees concerned about the deleterious effect of a negative Form U-5.

For additional discussion of arbitrating and litigating statements on the Form U-5 see, New York Civil Practice: CPLR Article 75 Arbitration; Personal Injury: Actions, Defenses, Damages § 4, Defamation: Defenses and Defense Considerations; Anne H. Wright, Form U-5 Defamation, 52 Wash & Lee L. Rev. 1299 (1995) (for discussion on Form U-5 defamation and privileges); Vivek G. Bhatt, The Amended Form U-5: Two Proposals for Solving the Privilege Dilemma, 21 Whittier L. Rev. 963 (2000) (discussion of qualified and absolute privileges attributed to U-5 statements and possible solutions to the issue); Loretta A. Wise, Enforcing the Personal Trading Rules Under the Investment Company Act: Employment Law Considerations, 33 Rutgers L. J. 487 (2002) (employment law considerations in relation to defamation suits in the securities industry).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (?ADR?), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over and litigation for the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to a federal district court judge in Newark, New Jersey.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

78 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Werner v. Nebal

2008 Emerging Issues 1284

Susan M. Brazas on Werner v. Nebal, 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1175 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007).

By Susan M. Brazas

November 4, 2007

SUMMARY: The affirmative defense of provocation remains intact for Illinois Dram Shop actions, but statements about child support arrearage as the fueling provocation will be kept from the jury. In Werner v. Nebal, the First District upheld numerous evidentiary rulings of the trial court as to the provocation defense, party admissions, and ambulance records. This Emerging Issues Analysis discusses the implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: First District Affirms That Provocation Remains An Affirmative Defense To Dram Shop Actions But Keeps Intact The Act's Significant Remedy.

We don't care who started it. That seems to be the message between the lines of the First District's recent opinion affirming all of the trial court's rulings against admissibility of various evidence. The Werner v. Nebal court found that the prejudice would outweigh the probative value of the details of an argument which, allegedly, led to a fight and resulting injuries which occurred at a tavern in Crestwood, Illinois. Heated words had been exchanged among family members about the paternity and arrearage of child support, and a fight broke out during which the plaintiff was injured. Named defendants in this action, brought under the Illinois Dram Shop Act, 235 ILCS 5/6-21, were the tavern owner, the alleged attacker, and the alleged co-attacker, John Doe.

The First District affirmed all of the trial court's rulings to keep from the eyes of the jury: 1) that the argument between the two persons involved was about the attacker's having fathered a child and having child support arrearage; 2) a jury instruction on the affirmative defense of provocation; 3) a verdict form apportioning damages among all the defendants; 4) testimony by paramedics that the defendant had admitted to his prior alcohol consumption; 5) testimony by witnesses of what they overheard and what they believed the fight was about; and 6) the ambulance report.

The Appellate Court thus kept intact the formidable force of the Illinois Dram Shop Act as a tool for absolute liability of a seller of alcohol for injuries caused by an intoxicated person whose intoxication was caused by the defendant seller having provided alcohol to the intoxicated person. Cases through the years have taken varied approaches to the fine line between provocation and causation within the context of the Dram Shop Act. In order to cause intoxication under the Act, the alcohol must be a material and substantial factor in the intoxication. Mohr v. Jilg, 223 Ill. App. 3d 217, 586 N.E.2d 807 (4th Dist. 1992).

Contributory negligence is not a defense in a Dram Shop Action. Merritt v. Chonowski, 58 Ill. App. 3d 192, 373 N.E.2d 1060 (3d Dist. 1978). This is so because the Dram Shop Act creates no-fault liability and provides a substantial remedy for injured persons, although with a short (one year) statute of limitations and with a limitation on the amount of recoverable damages.

The most surprising aspect of the Werner opinion is its implicit upholding--but limiting--of the affirmative defense of provocation. The Werner trial court had explicitly confirmed that provocation is a valid defense to an Illinois Dram Shop action. The appellate decision did not express disagreement with this position, but instead agreed with the trial court's finding that insufficient evidence existed to establish provocation.

The Werner appellate court's silent accord with the viability of provocation as an affirmative defense is significant. The Illinois Supreme Court had stated that the affirmative defense of provocation as complicity is incompatible with the doctrine, as complicity is not as to the plaintiff's contribution to his injury, but only as to his contribution to the inebriate's intoxication. Nelson v. Araiza, 69 Ill. 2d 534, 543, 372 N.E.2d 637 (1978). However, the appellate courts interpreting the Nelson holding varied in their views as to whether this language was dicta or precedent and, thus, whether it condemned or upheld the viability of provocation as an affirmative defense. The Nelson court's focus was on the complicity doctrine, and limited the complicity defense so that a plaintiff is precluded from recovery only if he actively contributed to or procured the intoxication of the inebriate. This standard was confirmed by the Illinois Supreme Court several years later in Walter v. Carriage House Hotels, Ltd., 164 Ill. 2d 80, 88, 646 N.E.2d 599 (1995). In Walter the court stressed that for the defense of complicity, the active participation in the inebriate's intoxication is required, although the court declined to enumerate factors for complicity.

Medical Records Admissibility. Recently, the Third District Appellate Court, in Troyan v. Reyes, 367 Ill. App. 3d 729, 733 (2006) ruled that medical records are admissible under the business records exception to hearsay, even where medical providers are not present to testify. The Troyan court relied heavily on the trend in federal courts and in other states to readily admit medical records under the business records exception to hearsay, and reasoned that the diagnoses and opinions in medical records are inherently reliable and trustworthy because the opinions are worthless unless accurate.

However, the Werner court clarified that invoking the business records exception does not relax the foundational requirements for medical records to be admissible. In Werner, the defendant's attorney had not elicited testimony that the ambulance report was a true and accurate copy of the records. Thus, even though the ambulance personnel had testified that these records were made in the normal course of their work, the foundation was improperly laid and therefore the ambulance records were inadmissible. This is consistent with the cautions set forth in the Troyan opinion. Those same foundation essentials have been spelled out by the court in Kimble v. Jorgenson, 358 Ill. App. 3d 400, 415 (2005) to include that evidence must be presented to demonstrate that the document is what its proponent claims it to be.

Establishing Foundation for Records. The Werner case illustrates that counsel should be meticulous in laying a foundation for records or other documents, and not be lulled into a false sense of security that they will automatically be admitted under a hearsay exception. The trial court's caution could be explained by the prejudicial impact of the content of the ambulance record, namely, the inebriate's statement regarding his prior alcohol consumption. Attorneys are well advised to have a checklist attached to key documents as a reminder to obtain testimony on each foundational element. This checklist should include the point that a witness with sufficient personal knowledge must testify that the records are what their proponent claims them to be.

Strategic Implications. Defense counsel in a Dram Shop action are well advised to plead clearly all possible affirmative defenses in their answer, as per 735 ILCS 5/2-613(d). Given the Werner opinion, this should include the affirmative defense of provocation, and, if applicable, the affirmative defense of complicity. These areas should be explored in the early stages of discovery with an eye toward bringing dispositive motions on these issues.

Practical Ramifications. Counsel for both parties should make liberal use of motions in limine to clarify what evidence may be offered, especially where highly prejudicial disputes exist between the parties. The Werner opinion emphasizes the prejudicial impact of the subject of child support arrearage and allowed only limited reference to the general nature of the dispute as to paternity and child support. Thus, counsel should, in advance, craft a less-prejudicial general description of factual scenarios in anticipation of the argument against admissibility due to prejudice.

Jury Instruction Strategy. Specific jury instructions for Dram Shop Act cases are set forth in the Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction series. Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 93.50 was amended to account for the holding in Nelson as to the affirmative defense of complicity. Given the Werner holding, a modified version of § 93.50 could be offered if the affirmative defense of provocation has been pleaded. The general rule is that a party is entitled to a jury instruction on a theory of recovery if there is some evidence in the record to support it. Stift v. Lizzadro, 362 Ill. App. 3d 1019, 1026, 841 N.E.2d 126, 132 (1st Dist. 2005).

In contrast, the Werner court concluded that the trial court had not abused its discretion in refusing to give a jury instruction on the affirmative defense of provocation on the basis that there was insufficient evidence to instruct as to provocation. The Werner court concluded that the inebriate's words and gestures did not constitute provocation, and cited to Gilman v. Kessler, 192 Ill. App. 3d 630, 667, 548 N.E.2d 1371, 1381 (2d Dist. 1989) which identified the fine line between causation and provocation. (Note that Gilman concluded that evidence to be considered as to causation includes the injured person's actions before he was injured.) The lesson on this issue is that discovery and witness testimony should flesh out all of the conduct on the part of the plaintiff, not just words and gestures. Further, jury instructions should be tailored to clarify what is being claimed in the affirmative defense, and the definition of causation as including consideration of the plaintiff's own conduct.

Cross References: Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists Checklist 70.01 (Drafting Motions); C70.02 (Using Motions in Pleading Stage of Litigation); C70.03 (Using Motions to Limit or Define Discovery Issues).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and case law developments.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

79 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Pleading Scierter: Vairo on Tellabs v. Makor Issues & Rights

2008 Emerging Issues 836

Pleading Scierter: Vairo on Tellabs v. Makor Issues & Rights

By Georgene Vairo

November 1, 2007

SUMMARY: Georgene Vairo on the Supreme Courts Analysis of Pleading the Strong Inference of Scierter as Required by the PSLRA. The Supreme Court has decided several important pleading cases during the 2006-2007 term. Tellabs addresses the issue of how to plead the strong inference of scierter, as required by the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (PSLRA). This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor and author and editor of several books, including several chapters in Moores Federal Practice, focuses on Tellabs and also analyzes other current Supreme Court opinions on pleading practices in federal court.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues & Rights, Ltd., 127 S. Ct. 2499, 168 L. Ed. 2d 179, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 8270, 75 U.S.L.W. 4462 (2007) is one of several important pleadings cases decided by the United States Supreme Court during the 2006-2007 Term. A securities fraud class action case, Tellabs specifically addressed the issue of how to plead the strong inference of scierter, as required by the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act (PSLRA).

This Commentary focuses on Tellabs, and then provides an analysis of the Supreme Courts current thinking about pleading practices in federal court, explaining why the Court is taking a strict approach to pleading in some cases.

Background. Before reading Tellabs, one would not have known how important falcons are to pleading. Lets look at the hypothetical used by the Court that may or may not help us understand the debate between Justice Ginsburg, writing for the majority, and Justice Scalia, concurring in the judgment: A jade falcon is stolen from a room to which only A and B had access. May one infer from that hypothetical that there is a strong inference that B stole the Falcon?

Tellabs was a securities fraud class action against a fiber optics manufacturer, its president, and several other executives. The plaintiff class alleged that the defendants knowingly deceived the public about the true value of the company's stock. The defendants moved to dismiss on the grounds that the plaintiffs had failed to plead with the particularity required by the PSLRA. The district court dismissed. Although the district court found that the complaint satisfied the PSLRAs particularity requirement, it held that the plaintiffs failed to meet the statutes strong inference pleading requirement for scierter. The Seventh Circuit disagreed and reversed.

In evaluating whether a complaint sufficiently alleges scienter, the Seventh Circuit held that the district court must: 1) examine all the allegations in the complaint, and then 2) decide whether the allegations establish a strong inference of scienter. Although the Seventh Circuit agreed that the PSLRA unquestionably raised the bar for pleading scienter, it then ruled that the standard for deciding whether the complaint survives is: if it alleges facts from which, if true, a reasonable person could infer that the defendant acted with the required intent. In adopting this standard, the Seventh Circuit rejected the more stringent standard adopted by the Sixth Circuit. The Sixth Circuit test allows a complaint to survive only if the allegations support the most plausible of competing inferences. Fidel v. Farley, 392 F.3d 220, 227 (6th Cir. 2004). The Supreme Court entered the fray to resolve the split. While the Supreme Court itself split on the issue, it unquestionably abandoned the relatively lenient standard adopted by the Seventh Circuit.

Pleading Scienter -- Parsing the Options. Justice Ginsburg, writing for six justices, agreed with the Seventh Circuit that it is proper for the district court to assess the complaint in its entirety, as well as to consider any other sources courts typically examine when determining a motion under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), such as documents that are attached to the pleadings, and matters of which courts can may take judicial notice. She rejected the Seventh Circuits lenient test, but adopted a test that is less rigid than the Sixth Circuits test. Justice Scalia, writing for himself, concurred in the judgment, but rejected the majoritys view regarding how to evaluate the allegations in the complaint, and favored a test closer to the more stringent Sixth Circuit test. Justice Alito, agreed with Justice Scalia as to the methodology and standard, but went even further, explaining that the standard for surviving a motion to dismiss in the PSLRA context is more akin to surviving a motion for summary judgment or judgment as a matter of law. Dissenting, Justice Stevens argued for yet a different, but lenient, test.

Signaling that Tellabs is a special pleading case because it involves the Congressionally mandated PSLRA pleading standard, Justice Ginsburg began by distinguishing an ordinary civil action from the securities class action case at bar. The short and plain statement standard set forth in Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2) applies in ordinary civil actions, but in enacting the PSLRA, in addition to enacting other provisions designed to curb perceived abuses of securities fraud cases, Congress provided in 15 U.S.C. §§ 78u-4(b)(1) and (2) heightened pleading standards to apply in such cases.

All Tellabs courts agreed that the shareholder plaintiffs met the first PSLRA requirement: that they specify each misleading statement and the reason why such statement is misleading. 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(1). However, the courts differed as to whether the second provision, requiring that plaintiffs state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind was satisfied. 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2). Justice Ginsburg wrote that although Congress intended to promote greater uniformity in the circuit courts, and to heighten the pleading standard, quoting the Seventh Circuit, it failed to [T]hrow much light on what facts . . . suffice to create [a strong] inference, or on what degree of imagination courts can use in divining whether the requisite inferences exist. Thus, rather than create uniformity, Congress standard once again divided the courts of appeals.

Accordingly, Justice Ginsburg sought to provide a workable construction of the strong inference standard by balancing her notion of PSLRAs twin goals of curbing frivolous, lawyer-driven class actions against the need to preserve an investors ability to pursue compensation for meritorious claims. To accomplish her goal, Justice Ginsburg articulated three prescriptions:

1) She began by reminding us that on a Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss a securities fraud claim, the district court must accept all the plaintiffs' allegations as true.

2) More controversially, according to Justices Scalia and Alito, she stated that the district court must consider the complaint in its entirety, as well as other sources courts ordinarily examine when ruling on Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) motions.

3) Most controversially, her standard for determining whether the facts so alleged give rise to a strong inference of scienter requires the district court to take into account plausible opposing inferences.

Justice Ginsburg noted that the Seventh Circuits standard did not involve a comparative inquiry. Rather, it simply required a basis for finding scienter, rather than a strong inference of scienter. She looked to the dictionary to justify her comparative approach. Congress requires plaintiffs to plead with particularity facts that give rise to a strong -- i.e., a powerful or cogent -- inference. Such strength cannot be determined in a vacuum, necessitating a comparative approach: a complaint survives only if a reasonable person would deem the inference of scienter cogent and at least as compelling as any opposing inference one could draw from the facts alleged.

Enter the jade falcon: In his concurring opinion, Justice Scalia questions how an inference that is merely at least as compelling as any opposing inference may be characterized as a strong inference. How could it possibly be said, he asks, that there is a strong inference that B is the thief if a jade falcon were stolen from a room to which only A and B had access? In what may largely be a semantic argument, there may be a possibility that B stole the falcon, perhaps even a strong possibility, but such possibilities are not a strong inference. He finds that an inference connotes belief, and in the falcon hypothetical, it would be impossible to form a strong belief, or inference, that B was the thief, and not A, or that A was the thief, and not B.

Justice Scalia agrees with Justice Ginsburg that Congress did not intend to set the bar so high that the plaintiff must produce a smoking gun to survive a motion to dismiss, or other irrefutable proof that the defendant acted with scienter. But, by codifying a strong inference test, Congress could not have been trying to provide plaintiffs with the edge in close cases. Thus, his test is whether the inference of scienter (if any) is more plausible than the inference of innocence. His test is not quite as strict as the Sixth Circuits most plausible test. Although he concedes that Congress could have done a better job of drafting, he believes that his test is truer to the text of the statute.

In his separate concurrence, Justice Alito adopts a test similar to Justice Scalias: to satisfy the strong inference test, the plaintiff must show that the inference is more likely than not correct. He then curiously states that Justice Scalias test is preferable because it aligns the test with that used in a motion for summary judgment or judgment as a matter of law. Without any support whatsoever, he writes that Congress must have intended a test that was a known quantity, rather than a previously unknown test such as the one articulated by the majority. While Congress surely has the power to set forth pleading standards, unless and until it takes over and redrafts the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, the tests for deciding motions to dismiss -- made without the benefit of any discovery; and for summary judgment -- made after discovery but before trial; and judgment as a matter of law -- made after the close of at least the plaintiffs evidence at trial, are all different and give respect to the maturation of the case.

Justice Stevens, in his dissent, offered another test that is a known quantity -- the probable cause test. He wrote that by leaving the term strong inference undefined, Congress intended to delegate to the courts the task of giving the test content. Naturally, he was excoriated by Justice Scalia for suggesting that federal courts have such power unless expressly granted by Congress.

Tellabs is likely to generate analytic confusion in the lower courts, as they struggle with Justice Ginsburgs formulation. As both Justices Scalia and Alito point out in their respective concurring opinions, their differing formulations may not, as a practical matter, make much of a difference. However, as in any context, the more strict sounding the test, the more latitude the district court will have in ruling for a defendant, and the greater the likelihood that an opinion dismissing an action will be affirmed in a close case.

Ironically, by using the tie should go to the defendant rubric, Justice Scalia may well be setting up the majoritys test as a tie goes to the plaintiff test. As a practical matter, litigants ought to couch their arguments regarding the strength of their scienter inferences in comparative terms. Clearly, if they can show that the inference more likely than not shows scienter, the complaint will survive.

Considering Complaint in its Entirety. Justice Ginsburg and Justice Alito also battled over how the lower courts ought to scrutinize the allegations made in the complaint. Justice Ginsburg agreed with the Seventh Circuit that district courts should read the complaint in its entirety, and consider any other sources that a court normally would look to in deciding a motion to dismiss. Justice Alito disagreed. Because facts must be pleaded with particularity, vague and ambiguous allegations as well as omissions, may not be considered at all, according to him. Justice Ginsburg had noted that such allegations could count against finding scienter, but that the court should take a holistic approach to the complaint.

Although not as an important dispute on a theoretical level, on a practical level, how a district court goes about reading the complaint can make an important difference. In close cases, how the court reads the complaint and takes into account the other materials considered on a motion to dismiss, may well tip the scales and break the tie one way or the other.

Explaining Supreme Court's Recent Pleading Cases. One month before it decided Tellabs, the Supreme Court decided Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929, 2007 U.S. LEXIS 5901, 75 U.S.L.W. 4337 (May 21, 2007). In Bell Atlantic, the Court tightened up the pleading requirements for antitrust claims. Justice Stevens was in dissent in both cases. Justice Ginsburg, the author of the majority opinion in Tellabs, had joined him in the Bell Atlantic dissent. What explains her switch? Why is the Court so interested in pleading? Why do pleading issues produce a higher degree of concurrence, at least in the result, than the other notable 5-4 cases the Court decided in the 2006-2007 term?

First, just as the Court in Bell Atlantic made a point of stating that it was discussing the question of pleading antitrust claims, the Court in Tellabs stressed that the decision was dictated by the nature of the case. That may provide the basis for understanding why Justice Ginsburg appeared to change her tune. While Bell Atlantic did involve pleading in antitrust cases, the governing pleading rule was Fed. R. Civ. P. 8. The majority and dissent fought over the meaning of Rule 8, and how to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state an antitrust claim alleging parallel conduct. In Tellabs, in contrast, the governing pleading rule was an Act of Congress -- the PSLRA. Thus, she wrote: Congress, as creator of federal statutory claims, has power to prescribe what must be pleaded to state the claim, just as it has power to determine what must be proved to prevail on the merits. It is the federal lawmaker's prerogative, therefore, to allow, disallow, or shape the contours of -- including the pleading and proof requirements for -- § 10(b) private actions.

In Bell Atlantic, the Court adopted a plausibility standard for pleading antitrust conspiracy claims. There is a notable resemblance between Bell Atlantic and Matsushita Electric Industrial Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986): in both cases the Court took pains to note that the issues to be decided -- summary judgment in Matsushita, and pleading in Bell Atlantic -- were in the context of an antitrust conspiracy case. Both cases adopted a plausibility test for determining whether a district court could resolve antitrust claims without the need for a trial. There is no question that antitrust cases generally present unique challenges and complexity. Justice Alito's concurrence in Tellabs suggesting a test modeled on summary judgment standards, presents a variation on this theme and shows how important nuts and bolts procedure can be, and, perhaps, shows how Justice Ginsburg was attempting to limit the scope of her decision.

Justice Alito would essentially require a plaintiff to make a summary judgment type response to a motion to dismiss. In his view, Congress could require such a showing. The importance of this is that, just as the Matsushita summary judgment standard did, the Tellabs and Bell Atlantic standards may provide an opportunity for the lower courts to graft what ought to be reserved to antitrust and securities cases to any case.

Perhaps one pleading case does not a revolution make, but the Bell Atlantic analysis and its 7-2 majority suggests a continued erosion of the notice pleading era. Tellabs was decided by an 8-1 margin, with two justices seeking an even more stringent pleading test. Like Bell Atlantic, Tellabs shows that the ideal of notice pleading of Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 --

Conley v. Gibson and all -- lacks the force that it once did. The hope that notice pleading will lead to discovery that will turn up the evidence necessary to reach a jury, or to obtain a favorable settlement from a defendant who fears being subjected to lengthy discovery, no longer seems to be the paradigm of federal litigation. That Justice Ginsburg feels the need to overturn the relatively conservative Seventh Circuit in order to limit the erosion of the notice pleading concept speaks volumes.

Bell Atlantic and Tellabs sandwiched another pleading case -- Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S. Ct. 2197, 167 L. Ed. 2d 1081 (2007). There, the Supreme Court, in a per curiam opinion, held that a prisoners pro se complaint should not have been dismissed on the ground that it was too conclusory. How can the apparent inconsistency be explained? First, the Court probably did not want to disturb its long-standing rules on pro se pleading. Second, there are other devices available to courts for dealing with frivolous prisoners cases. Third, such cases, frivolous or not, generally do not involve the complexity or cost that antitrust or securities cases almost always present, and do not involve a plaintiffs lawyer. In other words, the Court would be less concerned about protracted litigation and huge costs in such cases.

Conclusion. What might all this mean for plaintiffs defending a motion to dismiss after Tellabs and Bell Atlantic? It would be prudent practice for a plaintiff to allege more facts in order to provide a basis for jumping the plausibility pleading standard if a district court seeks to apply it explicitly or implicitly. Indeed, amendments to the discovery rules of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure also put those who plead more facts at an advantage during the discovery process. For example, a party who pleads in greater factual detail may be able to obtain more material under Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 (b)(1)(a)'s standard that discovery may be obtained that is relevant to the claim or defense of any party.

For further analysis of pleading requirements in the PSLRA, see 2-9 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 9.03 [6][a].

For additional discussion of requirements for pleading scienter, see 7-91 Securities Law Techniques § 91.02 [1][a][ii].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs for various national and local associations and institutes.

80 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Vairo on Emerald Investors Trust v. Gaunt Parsippany Ptnrs.

2008 Emerging Issues 838

Vairo on Emerald Investors Trust v. Gaunt Parsippany Ptnrs.

By Georgene Vairo

November 1, 2007

SUMMARY: Georgene Vairo on the Third Circuits Determination of the Citizenship of a Trust for Purposes of Diversity Jurisdiction. Determination of the citizenship of a trust for purposes of diversity jurisdiction has produced a variety of approaches at the court of appeals level. The Third Circuit in Emerald Investors Trust has analyzed the approaches and adopts a different test. This commentary, written by Georgene Vairo, Professor of Law at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles and author and editor of several books, including the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice, discusses how the Third Circuits test will likely become the prevailing approach.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Emerald Investors Trust v. Gaunt Parsippany Partners, 492 F.3d 192; 2007 U.S. App. LEXIS 13820 (3d Cir. June 13, 2007) involves the question of how to determine the citizenship of a trust for diversity jurisdiction purposes. Determining the citizenship of an individual generally is doctrinally straightforward -- an intensely fact-based determination will lead to a determination of the individual's domicile, or whether the individual has changed his or her domicile. The test for citizenship is domicile. Congress has provided the test for determining the citizenship of a corporation. Under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 (c), a corporation is a citizen of any state in which it is incorporated -- which is generally easily ascertained; and of its principal place of business. Because the circuit courts have adopted different tests for determining the principal place of business, there are variations from circuit to circuit. But, application of the tests, like the test for determining domicile, is fact based. Determining the citizenship of unincorporated entities, on the other hand, has produced a variety of approaches at the court of appeals level depending on the type of entity, and has resulted in several Supreme Court opinions that provide some guidance, but not always easy answers, to questions such as: How is the citizenship of a partnership determined? A limited partnership? A syndication? A trust? Emerald Investors is a careful articulation of the Third Circuits approach to resolving the issue of the citizenship of a trust.

The black letter rule is that a trust is a citizen of the state of which the trustee is a citizen. See 15-102 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 102.57 [5]. A minority of courts of appeals have instead based citizenship on functional considerations, looking to either the trustee's or the beneficiaries' citizenship, depending on who effectively controls the trust. Other courts have looked exclusively to the citizenship of the beneficiaries. The Third Circuit analyzes each of these approaches and persuasively adopts a different test, holding that a trust is a citizen of the state or states of which the both the trustee and the beneficiary are citizens.

Facts and Procedural Background. In Emerald Investors Trust, a trust sued several partnerships seeking recovery on unpaid promissory notes and foreclosure of mortgages securing the notes. Applying a beneficiary test, the district court held that it had diversity jurisdiction because the sole beneficiary of the trust was incorporated in the British Virgin Islands and had its principal place of business there, while the defendants were citizens of states within the United States and were not citizens of the British Virgin Islands. The district court did not consider the citizenship of the trustee, who was a citizen of Florida. The Third Circuit, affirming the rule it had adopted almost 30 years before, held that the citizenship of both trustees and beneficiaries count when determining diversity jurisdiction, it remanded the case to the district court for further discovery with respect to the citizenship of the parties. First, however, the Third Circuit carefully considered the four possible approaches to determining the citizenship of a trust in light of the two relevant Supreme Court rulings on the citizenship of unincorporated entities.

Third Circuit Precedent. In Riverside Mem'l Mausoleum, Inc. v. UMET Trust, 581 F.2d 62, 65 (3d Cir. 1978), the Third Circuit held that the citizenship of both the trustees and the beneficiaries of the trust both counted in determining the citizenship of a trust for diversity purposes.

Two years after the Third Circuit decided Riverside, the United States Supreme Court considered a diversity issue in a case involving a trust. In Navarro Savings Association v. Lee, 446 U.S. 458, 100 S. Ct. 1779, 64 L. Ed. 2d 425 (1980), the Supreme Court considered whether trustees of a business trust, suing in their own names, may invoke the diversity jurisdiction of the federal courts based on their own citizenship rather than that of the trust's beneficial shareholders. The trustees had exclusive authority over the property, and the declaration of trust authorized them to take legal title to trust assets, to invest those assets for the shareholders' benefit, and to sue and be sued in their capacity as trustees. The shareholders possessed no such authority. The Court held that a trustee is a real party to the controversy for purposes of diversity jurisdiction when he possesses certain customary powers to hold, manage, and dispose of assets for the benefit of others," and that trustees who meet this standard [may] sue in their own right, without regard to the citizenship of the trust beneficiaries."

Ten years later, in Carden v. Arkoma Associates, 494 U.S. 185, 110 S. Ct. 1015, 108 L. Ed. 2d 157 (1990), a limited partnership sued over a contract dispute, relying on diversity jurisdiction. The Court refused to treat a limited partnership as a corporation, under 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c), or to determine the partnership's citizenship solely by reference to its general partners. The Court held that in a suit by or against an artificial entity other than a corporation, diversity of citizenship depends on the citizenship of all the members. The Court distinguished Navarro on the ground that it had nothing to do with the citizenship of the trust because it was a suit by the trustees in their own names.

The Third Circuit summarized the rules established by Navarro and Carden as follows: Navarro makes clear that in a suit by or against the individual trustees of a trust, if the trustees possess certain customary powers to hold, manage, and dispose of assets, their citizenship, and not that of the trust beneficiaries, controls for purposes of diversity jurisdiction. In a suit by or against an artificial entity in its own name, on the other hand, Carden suggests that diversity jurisdiction depends on the citizenship of all the members. With Navarro and Carden as the relevant Supreme Court guidance, the Third Circuit concluded that there are four alternatives for determining the citizenship of a trust: (1) consider the citizenship of the trustee only; (2) consider the citizenship of the beneficiary only; (3) consider the citizenship of either the trustee or the beneficiary depending on who is in control of the trust in the particular case; or (4) consider the citizenship of both the trustee and the beneficiary.

Trustee-Only Rule Rejected. The Third Circuit acknowledged that Navarro could be understood as suggesting that a court should look to the citizenship of the trustee to determine the trust's citizenship, without regard to the citizenship of the beneficiary, as long as the trustee has certain customary powers to hold, manage, and dispose of assets for the benefit of others. Indeed, this is currently the leading view, adopted by both the Seventh and Ninth Circuits. See Hicklin Eng'g, L.C. v. Bartell, 439 F.3d 346, 348 (7th Cir. 2006); Johnson v. Columbia Props. Anchorage, LP, 437 F.3d 894, 899 (9th Cir. 2006); May Dep't Stores Co. v. Federal Ins. Co., May Dep't Stores Co. v. Fed. Ins. Co., 305 F.3d 597 (7th Cir. 2002), 599 (7th Cir. 2002).

However, the Third Circuit rejected this reading of Navarro. Navarro was essentially a Fed. R. Civ. P. 17 real party in interest problem. As the Supreme Court emphasized in Carden, the trustees in Navarro were entitled to sue in their own names. The question was whether they could invoke diversity jurisdiction on the basis of their own citizenship rather than that of the trust's beneficial shareholders. Navarro did not address the question of the citizenship of an entity that is itself a party to the action. Additionally, the trustees-only rule seems to contradict the Carden holding that an artificial entity "should assume the citizenship of all of its members". The trust's beneficiary, whose citizenship would be disregarded under a trustee-only rule, is in a position similar to that of the limited partners in Carden.

Beneficiary-Only Rule Rejected. The Third Circuit acknowledged that a rule looking only to the citizenship of the beneficiary would be consistent with Carden, at least as long as the trustee is not a member" of the trust. It noted that this is the position of the Eleventh Circuit in Riley v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 292 F.3d 1334, 1338 (11th Cir. 2002). The Eastern District of Virginia also adopted a beneficiary-only rule as consistent with Carden. In re A. H. Robins Company, Inc., 197 B.R. 575; 1995 Bankr. LEXIS 2068 (E.D. Va. 1995). However, the Third Circuit warned that this rule could lead to an untoward result" in many cases. For example, reliance on the citizenship of a beneficiary who has delegated all control of the trust to a trustee who brings the suit would be inconsistent with the reason for diversity jurisdiction, because if the trust had a local advantage or faced a local prejudice it would be on the basis of the identification of the trustee, not the beneficiary. The Third Circuit likely is quite right that Congress is not likely to favor a rule that would invite jurisdictional manipulation of that sort. However, Congress has not spoken to this issue in the trust context, as it has in setting out the citizenship for infants, decedents, and incompetents. See 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(2) providing that the citizenship of such parties shall be their citizenship, and not the citizenship of their representatives.

Control Party Rule Rejected. A case-by-case rule depending on whether the trustee is active or passive would place a great and unnecessary burden" on the litigants and the courts, according to the Third Circuit. In every case in which a trust is a party and the plaintiff relies on diversity jurisdiction, the court would have to monitor jurisdictional discovery and make findings with respect to the roles of the trustee and beneficiary in the affairs of the trust, all in a case that might be dismissed or remanded to state court. In fact, some courts have resisted efforts to base citizenship determinations on functional considerations. See May Dep't Stores Co. v. Fed. Ins. Co., 305 F.3d 597, 599 (7th Cir. 2002); see also Kuntz v. Lamar Corp., 385 F.3d 1177, 1183 (9th Cir. 2004); SHR Ltd. P'Ship v. Braun, 888 F.2d 455, 458-459 (6th Cir. 1989); Saadeh v. Farouki, 107 F.3d 52, 57 (D.C. Cir. 1997).

Citizenship of Both Trustee and Beneficiary Rule Reaffirmed. According to the Third Circuit, looking to the citizenship of both the trustee and the beneficiary in all cases in which a trust is the party in interest is the best approach for several reasons. First, it is consistent with both Navarro or Carden. Second, it avoids the possibility of an illogical outcome under a trustee- or beneficiary-only approach in a case in which the trustee controls the trust and the beneficiary is merely passive or vice versa. Third, a bright-line rule is preferable to a case-by-case functional rule because it is the most efficient. Finally, the dual-role approach best accommodates the court's concerns of judicial economy and due respect for the principles of federalism when matters of diversity jurisdiction are implicated. Thus, the Third Circuit reaffirmed the rule of Riverside that the citizenship of both the trustee and the beneficiary control in determining the citizenship of a trust.

Trustee-Beneficiary Rule Applied. Applying the trustee-beneficiary rule, the Third Circuit could not determine whether diversity jurisdiction existed in the present case. The plaintiff was a trust whose only beneficiary was a citizen of the British Virgin Islands and whose only trustee was a citizen of Florida. The court could not definitively determine the citizenship of the defendant partnerships based on the record before it. However, it appeared that at least one limited partner resided in Florida, and more often than not an individual is a citizen of the state in which the individual resides. Expressing grave doubts" as to whether the district court had subject matter jurisdiction, the Third Circuit vacated the district court's judgment and orders from which the parties appealed and remanded the matter to the district court with instructions to allow full discovery on the issue of the parties' citizenship.

Conclusion. As the Third Circuit recognized, there is a difference between a trust and a limited partnership, and therefore Carden is not directly controlling. Obviously, a limited partner is a member of a partnership. It is not as clear that a trustee is a member of a trust. A trust is a somewhat strange legal animal in that there is a division of ownership and control, whereas in a limited partnership, all partners are owners although the limited partners have no control.

However, the Third Circuit is likely reading Carden correctly. Of paramount concern to the Supreme Court in Carden was its desire not to overstep its jurisdictional boundaries. There is no statutory authority that provides any special citizenship determination rule for partnerships, trusts or any other unincorporated entity or association with regard to diversity, as 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(1) provides for corporations, or for that matter, as 28 U.S.C. § 1332(c)(2) provides for individuals lacking capacity, such infants, decedents and incompetents. Therefore, a partnership is not a "citizen" of any state within the meaning of the statutes regulating jurisdiction, and its citizenship must be determined with reference to each of its partners. Similarly, the citizenship of a joint venture is the citizenship of each member regardless of whether the member has a specific interest in the suit. In Carden, the Supreme Court held that the citizenship of all partners in a limited partnership, rather than only the citizenship of the general partners or the state where the partnership is created, governs the determination of citizenship for jurisdictional purposes. And, it stated, any alteration of these rules must come from Congress.

The Third Circuits careful and persuasive analysis of the different alternatives is reminiscent of the recent line of cases involving the citizenship of Lloyds of London. See 15-102 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 102.57 [4]. The courts of appeals have split over how to determine the citizenship of such an entity. Just as the courts began to pay attention and develop a more nuanced approach to that issue, the Third Circuits opinion in Emerald Investors is likely to do the same for the analysis of the citizenship of a trust, and is likely to become the prevailing view.

This may well be a timely development. Until now, there have been relatively few court of appeals cases that have addressed the issue of the citizenship of a trust for diversity purposes. Given the proliferation of different types of trusts, used for investments or estate planning, to name a couple, it is important for the courts to develop a coherent rule. Additionally, although few cases address the citizenship of ERISA plans for diversity purposes, the majority view is that an employee benefit plan under ERISA is an express trust. ERISA requires that the named fiduciaries have authority to manage and control the plan and, with limited exceptions, all plan assets be held in trust. The Eleventh Circuit has held that an ERISA plan is an unincorporated association for diversity purposes, and further held that only the citizenship of the trustees count for determining diversity jurisdiction. Xaros v. U.S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 820 F.2d 1176, 1181-1182 (11th Cir. 1987). So, the Emerald Investors decision will become an important precedent as other courts of appeals deal with ERISA cases as well.

Finally, it is important to note that the Third Circuit rule is the most restrictive in terms of the availability of diversity jurisdiction. Requiring the district court to look to the trustees or trustees citizenship, plus that of the beneficiary or beneficiaries, will result in more cases in which there is a lack of complete diversity. Such a result is consistent with the typical bias against diversity jurisdiction (notwithstanding the special case of the Class Action Fairness Act). And, as the Carden court pointed out, it is up to Congress to legislate a different result.

For further analysis of citizenship of trusts, see 15-102 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 102.57 [5].

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Georgene Vairo is a Professor of Law and William M. Rains Fellow at Loyola Law School, Los Angeles. Professor Vairo received her B.A. from Sweet Briar College, and was awarded a M.Ed., with Distinction, in Social Studies from the University of Virginia. She graduated first in her class from Fordham University School of Law. She served as a law clerk to the Honorable Joseph M. McLaughlin, U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, when he sat with the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York; practiced antitrust law with Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom; and joined the faculty of the Fordham University School of Law in 1982, where she also served as Associate Dean from 1987 until 1995. She has written numerous articles on forum selection problems, mass tort litigation, federal practice and jurisdiction, and has written and edited several books, including Rule 11 Sanctions and the chapters on removal jurisdiction, venue, change of venue and multidistrict litigation in Moore's Federal Practice. From November 1988 until its closing in April 2000, Professor Vairo served on the Board of Trustees of the Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust, and since 1989 as the Chairperson. She serves on the editorial boards of several litigation and dispute resolution journals, including Moore's Federal Practice. She also is a member of the Rand Corporations Institute for Civil Justice Board of Overseers. She is a member of the American Law Institute, has participated in numerous academic conferences, and has lectured widely to the bench and bar at programs for various national and local associations and institutes.

81 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Spoliation of Evidence: Order on Doe v. Norwalk Cmty College

2008 Emerging Issues 839

Spoliation of Evidence: Order on Doe v. Norwalk Cmty College

By Richard S. Order

November 1, 2007

SUMMARY: Spoliation of evidence has taken on new meaning in the electronic age. In Norwalk, a federal district court in the District of Connecticut methodically analyzed the requirements for imposing spoliation sanctions. This commentary, written by Richard S. Order, Partner at Axinn, Veltrop & Harkrider LLP and commercial litigation expert, discusses the Norwalk case and the importance of preserving evidence in this electronic age.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: District Court Finds Spoliation of Evidence and Sanctions the Spoliator with an Adverse Inference Jury Instruction. Particularly since the Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC series of five decisions concerning electronic discovery by U.S. District Judge Shira A. Scheindlin in 2003 and 2004, 216 F.R.D. 280, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7940, 217 F.R.D. 309, and 220 F.R.D. 212 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), and 229 F.R.D. 422 (S.D.N.Y. 2004), and even more so in light of the sanctions for withholding documents threatened by U.S. District Judge Rudi Brewster of the Southern District of California against Qualcomm Inc. and its attorneys in 2007 in Qualcomm's suit against Broadcom Corp., every litigator and in-house litigation manager should by now have experienced the panic that hit corporate attorneys in the aftermath of the Enron debacle and the ensuing under-the-microscope feeling engendered by Sarbanes-Oxley regulations.

Spoliation of evidence has taken on new meaning in the electronic age. Decades ago, trial lawyers were taught that spoliation was the intentional destruction of documents that were harmful to their clients' case. Deep-sixing a bad document, we knew, could get us and our clients in trouble. We would warn our junior attorneys, paralegals, and clients against destruction of documents, but if they nevertheless discarded or withheld them, there often was no way for opposing counsel to discover the spoliation of paper documents.

Businesses, however, use very little paper nowadays. As a result, most discoveries are focused on electronically communicated and stored information. The volume of relevant information has expanded exponentially as a single email to a handful of co-workers morphs into dozens of replies to everyone else's replies compared to a few hard copy responses to a hard copy memo of years gone by. Moreover, instead of relying on the filing skills of secretaries to preserve paper documents that they barely glance at or understand and maintain them in a system that might permit a searcher to retrieve them years later in response to discovery requests, businesses now automatically save documents in searchable electronic format conducive to producing multiple gigabytes of information, including metadata, on a dozen DVDs.

The temptation to get rid of bad documents, however, survives. Only the methods of destruction and of detection have changed. By now, most people realize that simply hitting the delete button does not eradicate a document forever. Deep in the computer's hard drives, the information lurks and can be retrieved. Consequently, the electronic-age spoliator has been forced to devise more sophisticated ways to accomplish the task.

Doe v. Norwalk. In Norwalk, U.S. District Judge Janet C. Hall of the District of Connecticut granted plaintiff's motion for sanctions for discovery misconduct and spoliation of evidence, awarding her the ultimate sanction of an adverse inference jury instruction to be given after trial--if defendants do not take the obvious hint and settle before trial. The plaintiff was a student at Norwalk Community College who alleged that her teacher sexually assaulted her. She sued the teacher and the college for violations of prohibitions against teacher-student sexual harassment under Title IX of the Educational Amendments of 1972, for negligent retention and supervision of the teacher, and for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Plaintiff claimed that the college had received four previous complaints of that teacher's sexual misconduct.

To prove her claims, plaintiff had to establish the essential elements that the college was on notice of the teacher's previous sexual assaults before he assaulted the plaintiff and that the college's response was nothing more than deliberate indifference. When the college failed to produce any documents reflecting the college's prior knowledge of other sexual assaults, plaintiff moved to compel inspection of the college's electronic records, including the personal computers of certain college officials. Magistrate Judge Holly B. Fitzsimmons granted the motion, and plaintiff's forensic computer expert went to work on the college's system. Although he could not find the documents plaintiff believed existed, he detected suspicious activity and plaintiff moved for sanctions.

The court found a number of shocking circumstances warranting a harsh sanction:

- . Certain hard drives, including the defendant teacher's, had been scrubbed or wiped, rendering them devoid of data, especially in the timeframe of the alleged assault

- . The college did not adhere to the Connecticut State Librarian's document retention policy, believing the policy did not apply to normal computer usage and transitory emails

- . The college did not follow the policy of preserving the hard drives of departed faculty members

- . No litigation hold had been disseminated advising college personnel to preserve relevant information

- . The college continued the routine deletion of the backup server even after the lawsuit started because the plaintiff was a Jane Doe and it believed that it could not identify her even to ensure documents relating to her were not destroyed

- . The college misidentified the user of certain hard drives and, as a result, did not provide plaintiff's expert with the hard drive of a professor whose hard drive the expert had specifically requested

- . The expert discovered a number of improper activities shortly before and after his first inspection of the hard drives, including access and deletion of files, the sending or receiving of 122 previous emails en masse at the same time, and the copying of files into a computer

- . The computer of a key player was replaced one month after the lawsuit began, and the old computer was discarded

Relying on Residential Funding Corp. v. DeGeorge Fin. Corp., 306 F.3d 99 (2d Cir. 2002), the court methodically marshaled these findings in its analysis of the requirements for imposing sanctions for spoliation in the Second Circuit. First, the producing party must have had a duty to preserve the documents at the time they were destroyed. Second, the destruction must have occurred with a culpable mind. Third, if the destruction was merely negligent, the destroyed documents must have been relevant to and supportive of the requesting party's claim or defense.

The court held that the plaintiff had demonstrated that the college intentionally, recklessly, or through gross negligence destroyed evidence after it was under a duty to preserve it and that the destroyed documents would have tended to show the college was on notice of the teacher's history of sexual assaults prior to the incident at issue.

Duty to Preserve. The court rejected the college's argument that any duty to preserve did not arise until well after commencement of the lawsuit such as when plaintiff indicated in the Fed. R. Civ. P. 26 (f) report her intent to conduct electronic discovery.

Rather, the duty to preserve arose no later than a meeting among a dean and two teachers to discuss an incident involving the defendant teacher and the plaintiff, nine months before she filed suit. The holding of that meeting indicated to the court that the college was aware of plaintiff's allegations and should have known that any documents, including e-mails and hard drives, related to [the teacher] could potentially be relevant to future litigation. 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51084, at *11. Consequently, the court reasoned, the college should have initiated a litigation hold at the time of the meeting and should have suspended its routine document destruction policy.

While the serious nature of an accusation of a sexual assault should normally alert an employer that a civil suit may eventually follow and, therefore, trigger a duty to preserve evidence, it may be difficult for lawyers to know how to advise clients about document preservation in other circumstances. For example, employers receive complaints about employees every day. Most of these complaints are resolved or dismissed without consulting counsel. Of the complaints that employers deem worthy of incurring the cost of outside counsel or the attention of in-house counsel, many are also resolved or dismissed fairly quickly.

The increased frequency and magnitude of sanctions for spoliation, however, suggest that even when a complaint has apparently been resolved satisfactorily or viewed as groundless, lawyers must still make additional recommendations as to whether to issue litigation holds in the small chance that the complainant might someday file suit. While the chances that the complainant will file may be small, the prospect of sanctions should counsel a conservative recommendation to issue a litigation hold. Of course, the client has to be willing to issue and comply with the hold and tolerate the disruption that the hold may cause its routine system.

Culpable State of Mind. Relying on Residential Funding, the court started with the premise that ordinary negligence would establish the requisite culpable state of mind. The court went on, however, to hold that the college's failure to put a litigation hold in place and to preserve emails and hard drives constituted gross negligence and, perhaps, recklessness.

In particular, the court questioned why there was not one mention of the teacher or the plaintiff in the file of a certain college official although he had 500 communications on other topics surrounding the date of the incident. The court found this situation indicates selective destruction, evidencing intentional behavior. 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51084, at *21. Other examples of tampering that the court pointed to included access and deletion of files close to the time when plaintiff's expert was examining the files, the sending or receiving of 122 previous emails en masse at the same time, the copying of files into a computer, and the disposal of another teacher's computer a month after the lawsuit was filed.

Again, the challenge facing counsel advising a client under similar circumstances is to determine the breadth of the litigation hold and anticipate and prevent seemingly routine business practices such as replacing and discarding the computers of key players that a client may engage in without a thought as to the evidence it may be destroying.

Relevance. The court held that since the college had committed at least gross negligence in failing to preserve documents, no other proof of relevance is necessary, and [plaintiff] is entitled to an adverse inference instruction. 2007

U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51084, at *24.

The court went on, nevertheless, to analyze whether such a sanction was appropriate even if the college's conduct were deemed simply negligent, thereby virtually ensuring that the college will not be able to overturn this decision on appeal. The court stated that if the college's conduct had only been negligent, the plaintiff had to demonstrate that the destroyed evidence would have been relevant and favorable to her. 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51084, at *24*25.

This is the hardest prong of the spoliation elements to prove. Recognizing how difficult this could be, the court relied on Kronisch v. United States, 150 F.3d 112, 128 (2d Cir. 1998), which lowered the level of proof to support an inference in favor of the requesting party to less than that required to survive summary judgment on that issue.

Fortunately for the plaintiff, she was able to present an affidavit from another woman who claimed she sent one of the teachers an email complaining that the college could have prevented the assault on the plaintiff if it had acted after receiving the affiant's earlier complaint about the defendant teacher. That email had been destroyed by the college.

Thus, proving the final prong if the producing party's conduct was simply negligent may require the court to decide the credibility of witnesses or to weigh other evidence that may demonstrate the previous existence of the destroyed documents.

Adverse Inference Jury Instruction. The court repeatedly referred to and ultimately imposed the sanction of an adverse inference jury instruction with respect to the destroyed evidence, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51084 at *26, to be given at the end of trial. The court cited to authority that it could issue a sanction in its sound discretion but did not precisely describe the import or nature of the adverse inference instruction it would give the jury.

Presumably, the upshot of the instruction would state that the jury may or must find that the college had prior notice of the teacher's previous sexual assaults simply by inference. It is not clear whether the court will also inform the jury that the reason it may or must so find is because the college destroyed evidence that most likely confirmed its prior notice. The college could argue that such an explanation would be unduly prejudicial. In Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 229 F.R.D. 422, 439-440 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (Zubulake V), the court set out the adverse inference instruction it planned to give, which explained that UBS failed to produce emails that Zubulake argued were favorable to her claims and permitted the jury to find that the documents would have been unfavorable to UBS.

In any event, knowing that such an instruction is just waiting for the conclusion of trial, the college might want to begin exploring settlement possibilities. In practice, an adverse inference instruction often ends litigation--it is too difficult a hurdle for the spoliator to overcome. . . . Accordingly, the adverse inference instruction is an extreme sanction and should not be given lightly. Zubulake v. UBS Warburg LLC, 220 F.R.D. 212, 219-220 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (Zubulake IV).

Costs. The court awarded the plaintiff the costs she incurred in moving for sanctions, including the costs of her forensic computer expert. The court gave plaintiff the option of seeking reimbursement of the costs now or at the end of the case. Since the expert costs, along with the attorney's fees, are most likely very substantial and since this case may have been proceeding on a contingency fee basis, there appears to be little reason to wait until the end of trial to recoup the costs of the motion. The only apparent reason to wait until after trial might be to avoid disclosing the plaintiff's counsel's timesheets at this time, although any strategic information could be redacted.

Conclusion. Needless to say, lawyers and their clients need to remain vigilant in preventing spoliation of evidence. In this era of information explosion, it will become more and more challenging to ensure that clients implement effective litigation holds and avoid routine deletion of electronic documents and disposal of hard drives, which may someday appear suspicious to a judge who will be reviewing the circumstances without much regard to other business and activities preoccupying the clients at that time. In other words, while the prospect of possible litigation may be remote in the client's mind and, therefore, in its treatment of potential evidence, a judge will retrospectively focus on the issues in the eventual lawsuit and tend to ascribe a culpable state of mind to a client whose documents have disappeared.

From a requesting party's point of view, it is very common to believe that the opposing party has not fully produced all responsive documents. The hard call is whether to invest the time and expense of hiring a forensic computer expert in the hope of finding damning evidence of spoliation. Of course, winning an adverse inference instruction should force a prompt and favorable settlement.

For further analysis of spoliation sanctions in regard to electronically stored information, see 7-37 Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 37.121A, 7-37A Moore's Federal Practice -- Civil § 37A.5537A.57.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Richard S. Order is a partner in the law firm of Axinn Veltrop & Harkrider LLP in New York and Hartford. For over 25 years, he has been a commercial litigator, trying business disputes in federal and state courts and arbitrations throughout the country. He has served as Chairman of the Federal Practice Section of the Connecticut Bar Association and is the Co-Chairman of the Alternative Dispute Resolution Subcommittee of the ABA Section of Litigation's Committee on Corporate Counsel, a member of the American Arbitration Association's National Roster of Neutrals, and an Advisory Board Member of the Institute for Transnational Arbitration. In 1978, Mr. Order received a B.A. degree, summa cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa, from Wesleyan University and, in 1981, a J.D. degree from Columbia University School of Law, where he served as the Managing Editor of the Columbia Human Rights Law Review.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

82 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Joseph B. McDonnell on Somers v. Quinn

2008 Emerging Issues 824

Joseph B. McDonnell on Somers v. Quinn, 373 Ill.App.3d 87, 867 N.E.2d 539, 310 Ill. Dec. 848 (Ill. A

By Joseph B. McDonnell

October 31, 2007

SUMMARY: Where an expert witness in a medical malpractice case lacks a valid license at the time he testifies, is he disqualified? In Somers v. Quinn, 373 Ill. App. 3d 87, 867 N.E.2d 539, 310 Ill. Dec. 848 (Ill. App. 2d Dist. 2007), the Second District Appellate Court considered whether a doctor whose license had been suspended prior to his testimony was properly disqualified as an expert witness by the trial judge. Although the Court affirmed the order (and, as well, the courts denial of plaintiffs motion for continuance to obtain another expert), the views of the majority and concurring opinions are conflicting and may present an opportunity for the Illinois Supreme Court to clarify the issue. This commentary, written by Joseph McDonnell, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important change.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Somers v. Quinn, 373 Ill. App. 3d 87, 867 N.E.2d 539, 310 Ill. Dec. 848 (Ill. App. 2d Dist. 2007), the Second District Appellate Court considered whether a doctor whose license had been suspended prior to his testimony was properly disqualified as an expert witness by the trial judge. Although the Court affirmed the order (and, as well, the courts denial of plaintiffs motion for continuance to obtain another expert), the views of the majority and concurring opinions are conflicting and may present an opportunity for the Illinois Supreme Court to clarify the issue.

Background. In a medical malpractice case, plaintiffs attorney, three days before trial, took the evidence deposition of his medical expert. The witness had earlier testified in his discovery deposition that his medical license in Wisconsin had been suspended by the states licensing board after finding that the doctor had taken Hydrocortisone samples from his office. He had further testified that he was twice convicted of attempting to obtain prescriptions by fraud and that he had surrendered his medical license in 2002 due to vision problems caused by eye ulcerations. At his evidence deposition he testified that he had been granted a limited medical license, but that, in October 2004, the board had found that he had obtained medication by forging prescriptions. He had later surrendered his medical license effective December 15, 2004, five months before the evidence deposition was taken. While taking issue with the validity of the boards findings, the doctor admitted that he had stipulated to those findings in the boards written order accepting the surrender of his license, and that he held no medical license at the time of the evidence deposition.

The Trial Courts Ruling. On defendants motion in limine to exclude those portions of the doctors evidence deposition in which he testified to the applicable standard of care, the trial court ruled that Section 8-2501 of the Code of Civil Procedure (735 ILCS 5/8-2501) requires that an expert be licensed to practice medicine at the time he testifies to the applicable standard of care. Alternatively, the trial court held that, even if it had discretion to permit the doctors testimony, it would still exclude the testimony. Plaintiff then moved for a continuance for the purpose of retaining another expert, and the motion was denied on the basis that plaintiff had not exercised due diligence. After the parties stipulated that, in the absence of the doctors testimony, plaintiff would present no evidence on the standard of care, the defendant moved for a directed verdict which was granted.

Right Result, but Why? On appeal by plaintiff, the result was affirmed, but the majority and concurring opinions clashed over whether a valid licensure at the time of the medical experts testimony is mandatory under the statute. The statute provides:

Expert Witness Standards. In any case in which the standard of care applicable to a medical professional is at issue, the court shall apply the following standards to determine if a witness qualifies as an expert witness and can testify on the issue of the appropriate standard of care.

(a) Whether the witness is board certified or board eligible in the same specialties as the defendant and is familiar with the same medical problem or problems or the type of treatment administered in the case;

(b) Whether the witness has devoted 75% of his or her time to the practice of medicine, teaching or University based research in relation to the medical care and type of treatment at issue which gave rise to the medical problem of which the plaintiff complains;

(c) whether the witness is licensed by any state or the District of Columbia in the same profession as the defendant; and

(d) whether, in the case against a nonspecialist, the witness can demonstrate a sufficient familiarity with the standard of care practiced in this State.

735 ILCS 5/8-2501 (2004).

Writing for the majority, Justice Hutchinson held that the plain language of the statute does not impose a mandatory licensure requirement. Instead, the statute leaves the admission of the experts testimony to the determination and discretion of the trial court. Somers v. Quinn, 373 Ill. App. 3d at 91. He agreed with the plaintiffs argument that the statute simply lists factors to be applied by the trial court in determining whether a witness is qualified to testify. In doing so, the majority makes the puzzling statement that it is inappropriate to disregard statutory authority governing admission of expert testimony in medical malpractice cases and to instead decide the case based upon other common-law requirements for the competency of a medical expert. 373 Ill. App. 3d at 92. The majority then criticizes the concurring opinion of Judge OMalley for supposedly misconstruing the Illinois Supreme Courts holding in Sullivan v. Edward Hospital, 209 Ill. 2d 100, 806 N.E.2d 645, 282 Ill. Dec. 348 (2004). According to the majority, the Supreme Courts statement in Sullivan that in order to testify as an expert on the standard of care in a given school of medicine, the witness must be licensed therein, does not justify the conclusion that the existence of a license is required before a medical expert may testify. Sullivan, according to the majority, held only that a practitioner of one school of medicine may not testify regarding the standard of care in another school of medicine without holding a license in the latter. Therefore, according to the majority, the lack of a current license, although properly considered by the trial court as a factor in its determination, was not a basis for automatically disqualifying the witness as an expert.

Winning the Battle but Losing the War. Nonetheless (and somewhat strangely), the majority held that the trial judge had not abused his discretion in disqualifying the witness. The Courts rationale is rather brief. After citing authority for the proposition that a trial judges disposition of an issue within his discretion will not be disturbed unless it is arbitrary and unreasonable, the court concluded that the trial judge could have reasonably concluded that the witness was not qualified due to the surrender of his medical license and due to the other findings made by the Wisconsin Board of Medical Examiners. Under the totality of the circumstances, said the majority, it could not hold that the trial court had abused its discretion in disqualifying the witness.

The Concurrence: You're Right but for the Wrong Reason. The concurring opinion by Justice O'Malley took serious issue with the Courts construction of Section 8-2501, stating that the Illinois Supreme Court has held repeatedly and unequivocally that an expert witness in a medical malpractice case must be a licensed member of the school of medicine about which he proposes to express an opinion. Sullivan v. Edward Hospital, 209 Ill. 2d 100, 806 N.E.2d 645, 282 Ill. Dec. 348 (2004); Dolan v. Galluzzo, 77 Ill. 2d 279, 32 Ill. Dec. 900, 396 N.E.2d 13 (1979); Purtill v. Hess, 111 Ill. 2d 229, 95 Ill. Dec. 305, 489 N.E.2d 867 (1986). The concurrence stated that, under Purtill, there are two foundational requirements for the admission of expert testimony in a medical malpractice case: (1) that the witness be a licensed member of the school of medicine about which he proposes to testify; and (2) that the expert be familiar with the methods, procedures and treatments ordinarily observed by other health care providers in either the defendants community or a similar community. The Supreme Court, in Sullivan, foreclosed any notion, according to the concurrence, that the admission of opinion testimony from a witness unlicensed in the relevant school of medicine could be considered harmless error.

Moreover, added Justice O'Malley, even though the Supreme Court has not had occasion to construe Section 8-2501, both Purtill and Sullivan (decided after the enactment of the statute) held that licensure in the relevant school of medicine is an absolute requirement of a medical expert giving opinion testimony.

Tips for Practitioners. The first and most obvious lesson to be learned from this case is: Do not under any circumstances proceed to trial with an expert who has lost his license. Even if the majority's view is correct (that licensure is but a factor to be considered in determining the witness's qualifications), the downside in terms of jury appeal (should the witness be cleared) is obvious. Apart from that, there is much to be said in favor of the concurring opinion's construction of Section 8-2501. The preamble to the statute states that the court shall apply the enumerated standards in determining whether a witness qualifies as an expert and can testify as to the appropriate standard of care. The factors are listed in the conjunctive, not the disjunctive, suggesting that the trial court must find that all of them are satisfied before the witness may be permitted to testify to the standard of care. Until clarification by the Supreme Court, counsel treads on thin ice in proceeding with a witness who does not satisfy each of the statutory factors. Even a court which broadly construes the standards as only guidelines for the trial court's consideration may nonetheless (as in the case in question) find that the totality of the circumstances justifies exclusion of the witness. Where such a determination in effect ends the case, it is too great a risk to take.

Cross References. Parness, Illinois Civil Procedure, Second Edition (LexisNexis) Chapter 8, Discovery.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

83 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

David L. Ferstendig on Brill v. City of New York

2008 Emerging Issues 823

David L. Ferstendig on Brill v. City of New York, 2 N.Y.3d 648, 781 N.Y.S.2d 261, 814 N.E.2d 431 (20

By David L. Ferstendig

October 31, 2007

SUMMARY: In Brill v City of New York, 2 N.Y.3d 648, 781 N.Y.S.2d 261, 814 N.E.2d 431 (2004), the New York State Court of Appeals made it clear that the courts should not countenance late summary judgment motions, without a showing of good cause, even if it means permitting less than meritorious claims or defenses to proceed to trial. In the past three years, numerous cases following the Brill rule have denied summary judgment motions based on late motions, some even only days late. And three years later, there is still a clear divergence of opinion in the Bar as to whether the Brill decision was a good one. Unless and until there is a curative legislative amendment or rule change, the practitioner should be careful to comply with the various summary judgment motion deadlines that exist throughout the state. This commentary, written by David Ferstendig, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important change.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Continuing Shrill Over Brill

In Brill v City of New York, 2 N.Y.3d 648, 781 N.Y.S.2d 261, 814 N.E.2d 431 (2004), the New York State Court of Appeals made it clear that the courts should not countenance late summary judgment motions, without a showing of good cause, even if it means permitting less than meritorious claims or defenses to proceed to trial. In the past three years, numerous cases following the Brill rule have denied summary judgment motions based on late motions, some even only days late. And three years later, there is still a clear divergence of opinion in the Bar as to whether the Brill decision was a good one. Unless and until there is a curative legislative amendment or rule change, the practitioner should be careful to comply with the various summary judgment motion deadlines that exist throughout the state.

The 120 Day Rule. CPLR 3212(a) provides that after issue has been joined (that is, an answer is served), the court may set a deadline for service of summary judgment motions, which will be no earlier than 30 days after the filing of the note of issue. If the court does not set a date, the deadline for making summary judgment motions is no later than 120 days after filing of the note of issue, except upon leave and good cause shown.

Back in 1996, the 120 Day rule as it became known to practitioners, was passed. The primary basis for the amendment was to prevent and avoid eve of trial summary judgment motions which could have a detrimental impact on trial calendars:

The legislative history underlying this enactment highlights the practices the amendment sought to combat. Specifically, prior to the amendment of CPLR 3212(a), there was no statutory time limit for a summary judgment motion. So long as issue had been joined, a party could make a motion for summary judgment, even on the eve of trial, thereby disrupting the court's calendar and leaving an adversary little or no time to reply (Mem. of Senate in Support, 1996 McKinney's Session Laws of NY, at 2432, 2433; Kule Resources v Reliance Group, 49 NY2d 587, 591). Moreover, the belated motion, sometimes used as a dilatory tactic, was most burdensome for the court and for parties who had already prepared for trial (Mem. of Senate in Support, op. cit.). Thus, the amendment to CPLR 3212(a) was a step toward alleviating the practice of "eleventh hour" summary judgment motions.

Gonzalez v 98 Mag Leasing Corp., 95 N.Y.2d 124, 128, 711 N.Y.S.2d 131, 133-34, 733 N.E.2d 203, 205-06 (2000).

The Good Cause Standard. In interpreting the phrase good cause, some pre*Brill* courts focused on whether there was a satisfactory explanation for the delay in filing the motion. Other courts permitted a late filing where the motion had merit and there was no showing of prejudice to the adversary. Compare e.g. Carvajal v M. Madison, LLC, 297 A.D.2d 550, 747 N.Y.S.2d 93 (1st Dept 2002); Falcone v Khurana, 294 A.D.2d 535, 742 N.Y.S.2d 871 (2d Dept 2002); DiFusco v Wal-Mart Discount Cities, 255 A.D.2d 937, 680 N.Y.S.2d 377 (4th Dept 1998) and Burns v Gonzalez, 307 A.D.2d 863, 763 N.Y.S.2d 603 (1st Dept 2003) Garrison v. City of New York, 300 A.D.2d 14, 751 N.Y.S.2d 436 (1st Dept 2002); Medina v Barbaro, 279 A.D.2d 615, 720 N.Y.S.2d 165 (2d Dept 2001).

And Along Came Brill. In Brill v City of New York, 2 N.Y.3d 648, 781 N.Y.S.2d 261, 814 N.E.2d 431 (2004), the defendant City of New York waited more than one year after the filing of the note of issue before moving for summary judgment. Nevertheless, the trial court found good cause for permitting the late filing, because the motion had merit. The Appellate Division affirmed. The Court of Appeals reversed, however, in essence eliminating the second ground used by courts to permit late filing, that is, a meritorious motion. The Court found that the City of New York did not establish a reason for its delay and, thus, denied its motion:

We conclude that good cause in CPLR 3212(a) requires a showing of good cause for the delay in making the motion a satisfactory explanation for the untimeliness rather than simply permitting meritorious, non-prejudicial filings, however tardy.

2 N.Y.3d at 652, 781 N.Y.S.2d at 264, 81 N.E.2d at 434.

The Court acknowledged the consequences of its decision:

What is to happen in this case is that summary judgment will be reversed and the case returned to the trial calendar, where a motion to dismiss after plaintiff rests or a request for a directed verdict may dispose of the case during trial. Hopefully, as a result of the courts refusal to countenance the statutory violation, there will be fewer, if any, such situations in the future, both because it is now clear that good cause means good cause for the delay, and because movants will develop a habit of compliance with the statutory deadlines for summary judgment motions rather than delay until trial looms.

2 N.Y.3d at 653, 781 N.Y.S.2d at 265, 81 N.E.2d at 435.

The Pro-Brill Chorus. Shortly after the Brill decision and continuing until today, a clear divergence of opinion developed in the Bar about whether Brill was a good decision. The pro-Brill group has emphasized, among other things, that:

1. Deadlines are deadlines and must be adhered to;
2. Brill was one of a series of decisions from New York States highest court stressing the need for attorneys to follow statutory and court ordered deadlines. See, e.g., Andrea v. Arnone, Hedin, Casker, Kennedy & Drake, Architects & Landscape Architects, P.C. (Habiterra Assoc.), 5 N.Y.3d 514, 806 N.Y.S.2d 453, 840 N.E.2d 565 (2005); Kihl v. Pfeiffer, 94 N.Y.2d 118, 122-23, 700 N.Y.S.2d 87, 90, 722 N.E.2d 55, 58 (1999); and

3. If a meritorious motion is denied, a plaintiff would certainly not pursue such a claim to trial and perhaps even risk being sanctioned for asserting a meritless claim.

The Facts on the Ground. What some of the Brill proponents do not (adequately) address are the possible practical effects of the decision. First, it is imperative to understand the stated purpose of the 120 Day rule, that is, to avoid eve of trial motions that would disrupt the trial calendar. In Brill, the Court of Appeals overturned the discretion of the trial judge, the person presumably in the best position to know the vagaries of the trial schedule and the impact of a delay. Thus, Brill eviscerated that discretion. In fact, the dissent in Brill made this precise point:

What is clear from the legislative history is that the Legislature sought to give the trial court wide discretion in entertaining a motion for summary judgment. The Legislature could not have intended to grant a futile hope to a litigant or to waste the time of a number of people when the state courts are as burdened as they are.

2 N.Y.3d 648, 655 (J. Smith dissent).

Second, many courts have adopted a shorter time period, e.g. 60 days. Moreover, practice throughout the state varies dramatically. Thus, while as a general proposition, upstate courts have a more hands-on approach by the judges, many large downstate courts have clearing house type parts where motions are returnable. The result is that in many instances, deadlines, particularly in the area of disclosure, are routinely ignored with absolutely no punishment or consequences. In fact, it is not uncommon to have to get three or four orders compelling disclosure or for preclusion before one can obtain straightforward discovery responses.

In these courts, many times these disputes are handled by court personnel and contact with judges is discouraged. In short, while it is certainly laudable to enforce deadlines, selective enforcement is unfair. What makes this particular example of disclosure issues so problematic, however, is their relationship to the Brill holding.

The deadline to serve summary judgment motions is tied to the filing of the note of issue. However, it is not uncommon for that document signaling the end of discovery to be served prematurely and before critical discovery has been conducted. While the Uniform Rules provide a mechanism to strike a note of issue where discovery is not complete (see 22 N.Y.C.R.R. 202.21(e)), in practice in some downstate New York courts, for example, Kings County, the granting of such a motion, no matter how egregious the discovery violation, is a cause for a national holiday!

The more accepted practice in these courts is for the judge to leave the case on the trial calendar, not strike the note of issue, but to permit discovery to proceed. While there is case law to suggest that the summary judgment deadline might be put off in those circumstances, there are other troubling cases that suggest that there must be a connection between the discovery obtained and the basis for the summary judgment for an extension to apply. Compare e.g., Pena v. Womens Outreach Network, Inc., 35 A.D.3d 104, 824 N.Y.S.2d 3 (1st Dept 2006) and First Union Auto Finance v. Donat, 16 A.D.3d 372, 791 N.Y.S.2d 596 (2d Dept 2005), Espejo v Hiro Real Estate Co., 19 A.D.3d 360, 796 N.Y.S.2d 162 (2d Dept 2005) and Kunz v Gleeson, 9 A.D.3d 480, 781 N.Y.S.2d 50 (2d Dept 2004).

Sometimes it is not clear at all whether a particular deposition, for example, will be related or not. The practical consequence for the practitioner is to:

1. request that, if the judge does not strike the note of issue, he or she nevertheless extend the summary judgment filing deadline a request not always granted; or

2. serve the summary judgment motion in a timely fashion perhaps prematurely before discovery is complete.

Third, Brill dealt with a situation where the movant waited a year after filing of the note of issue to make the summary judgment motion. Based on the language in Brill, however, subsequent cases have interpreted it to mean that a motion even days late MUST be denied if there is no satisfactory explanation for the delay. See e.g., Milano v. George, 17 A.D.3d 644, 792 N.Y.S.2d 906 (2d Dept 2005) (one day late).

Fourth, the impact of the Brill decision is to further clog the courts by permitting some cases that should have been disposed of, to proceed to trial. See J. Smith dissent in Brill. It may be naive to believe that a plaintiff faced with one judges statement that a summary judgment motion is meritorious--even though it had to be denied as untimely--will either walk away from the case or settle for a nominal amount. Taking that argument to its logical (or illogical) conclusion, why would any plaintiff in a non-Brill situation, faced with an actual grant of summary judgment by one judge against him or her, ever appeal that decision? And yet, the reporters are packed with precisely such appellate decisions. Moreover, some courts have now, in essence, bifurcated the process, that is, they first deal with the timeliness issue. Only after the court finds the motion to be timely, does it proceeds to the merits of the motion. Furthermore, in certain areas of practice, for example, personal injury and products liability, many plaintiffs counsel could rightfully believe that their chances at trial before a jury are relatively unaffected by a judges earlier determination that their clients claim lacked merit based on the submission of papers alone without live testimony. As to the threat of sanctions, there is nothing in the Brill decision suggesting that there is any such increased risk. In fact, had this been a real possibility, the Brill court could have easily stated that denying a meritorious summary judgment motion would have no real practical ramifications because a plaintiff pursuing such a meritless claim would face sanctions. To the contrary, the Brill court acknowledged that the more realistic scenario was that the case would go to trial where a motion to dismiss after plaintiff rests or a request for a directed verdict may dispose of the case during trial (emphasis added).

Conclusion. Faced with an unforgiving court system based on the Brill decision, the practitioner first and foremost must make all efforts to meet the specified summary judgment deadline. If this requires the motion to be made prematurely in an excess of caution, so be it! In the first instance, however, when faced with a filed note of issue, outstanding discovery, and the courts refusal to strike the note of issue, the practitioner should ask the judge to extend the summary judgment deadline to 60 to 90 days after the completion of all discovery.

Perhaps the best solution is a curative legislative amendment returning discretion to the lower court judge to determine whether he or she can or should hear a late summary judgment motion. Alternatively, the courts should be required by statute or rule to strike the note of issue if discovery is outstanding, rather than to permit discovery to continue while keeping the case on the calendar. The other possibility is to establish a new starting point for the 120-day rule, other than the note of issue.

Cross-references. LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 7.08, § 7.09. Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 21.07. New York Civil Practice: CPLR § 3212.05.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David L. Ferstendig, currently a member of the Law Offices of David L. Ferstendig, LLC, New York, was a founding officer of the law firm Breindel & Ferstendig, P.C. He litigates a spectrum of civil and corporate matters, including: contract, products liability, environmental, toxic torts, reinsurance and insurance issues, and trade secrets. Mr. Ferstendig is also an adjunct law professor at New York Law School, where he teaches New York Practice. In addition to being a member of the Weinstein, Korn and Miller Editorial Board, he is the author of the LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation, the Editor of the CPLR Manual, a General Editor and author of CPLR Practice Insights in New York Consolidated Law Service, and an update author of Timetable for New York Civil Practice from LexisNexis. He is also the Chair of the Civil Practice Law and Rules Committee of the New York State Bar Association. Mr. Ferstendig has lectured on civil practice issues for bar associations, the New York State Judicial Institute, and LexisNexis.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

84 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

James J. Walsh on Trentadue v. Gorton

2008 Emerging Issues 812

James J. Walsh on Trentadue v. Gorton, 479 Mich. 378, 2007 Mich. LEXIS 1622 (2007)

By James J. Walsh

October 30, 2007

SUMMARY: The Michigan Supreme Court brought an end to the ability of Michigan courts to use the common law discovery rule to toll the accrual dates of statutory periods of limitation. This is a dramatic departure from past practice and its effects may be broad-reaching. This commentary, written by James J. Walsh, discusses the impact and implications of this significant decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Trentadue v. Gorton, 479 Mich. 378, 2007 Mich. LEXIS 1622 (2007), the Michigan Supreme Court brought an end to the ability of Michigan courts to use the common law discovery rule to toll the accrual dates of statutory periods of limitation. A 4-3 majority found that Michigans statutory scheme for periods of limitations superseded the common law pursuant to MCLS § 600.5827, and held that because the Michigan legislature did not expressly provide for a discovery rule in the applicable statute of limitations, MCLS § 600.5805(10), Michigan courts could not apply the common law discovery rule to toll the running of this period of limitation. See MCLS § 600.5805(10) (The period of limitations is 3 years after the time of the death or injury for all other actions to recover damages for the death of a person, or for injury to a person or property). This holding is in line with other recent cases that found common law doctrine inapplicable to the exclusive statutory scheme that governs periods of limitation in Michigan. See Garg v. Macomb County Community Mental Health, 696 N.W.2d 646, 472 Mich. 263 (2005) (holding that the common law continuing violations doctrine does not apply to MCLS § 600.5805(10)); Boyle v. General Motors Corp., 661 N.W.2d 557, 468 Mich. 226 (2003) (holding that the common law discovery rule does not apply to claims alleging common law fraud, pursuant to MCLS § 600.5827). With its decision, the majority in Trentadue brought an end to the ability of many plaintiffs to bring claims against defendants in cases where the plaintiffs were not aware of the identity of the defendants or of the existence of the claims until after the statutes of limitations had run.

The plaintiff in Trentadue was the personal representative of the estate of her deceased mother, who had been murdered at her rented home in 1986. The murderers identity was not discovered until 2002, when DNA evidence revealed that the murderer was a man who had serviced the propertys sprinkler system two days prior to the murder. In Trentadue, the Michigan Supreme Court noted the absence of a discovery provision in MCLS § 600.5805(10) and held that the statutes three-year period of limitations barred the plaintiff from bringing wrongful death claims against a variety of defendants, including the murderers parents, who owned the sprinkler business for which the murderer worked. The fact that the plaintiff had no way of knowing who was responsible for her mothers murder until nearly 16 years after her death was insufficient to toll the limitations period.

With its ruling in Trentadue, the Michigan Supreme Court overturned almost 44 years of precedent. Michigan courts have been applying the common law discovery rule since 1963, when Michigan followed a nationwide trend and adopted the rule in Johnson v. Caldwell, 123 N.W. 785, 371 Mich. 368 (1963). Trentadue is significant because in it the majority expressly overruled Johnson and later cases which applied its holding and rationale, and substantially altered the rules for when a plaintiff may bring his claims. Because Trentadue's holding represents a dramatic departure from past practice and its effects may be broad-reaching, it is essential for practitioners to understand the implications of its holding.

The Scope of the Courts Holding in Trentadue. Of course, the holding in Trentadue affects more than wrongful death claims. Generally, the three-year statute of limitations currently found in MCLS § 600.5805(10) applies in all cases where the claim involves damages for injury to persons or property, unless the injury was the consequence of the defendants breach of a specific provision in a contract. See Hanson v. Art Post American, 269 N.W.2d 222, 83 Mich. App. 553 (1978). This includes not only wrongful death claims, but also claims as diverse as conversion, Tillman v. Great Lakes Truck Center, Inc., 2007 Mich. App. LEXIS 2349 (October 18, 2007), nonphysical infringements of civil rights, Stringer v. Board of Trustees of Edward W. Sparrow Hospital, 233 N.W.2d 698, 62 Mich. App. 696 (1975), as well as ordinary negligence, Bryant v. Oakpointe Villa Nursing Center, Inc., 684 N.W.2d 864, 471 Mich. 411 (2004). Furthermore, although Trentadue involved MCLS § 600.5805(10), its rationale applies to all statutory claims for which the applicable statute of limitations does not expressly provide a discovery rule. Finally, in Makridakis v. Makridakis, 2007 Mich. App. LEXIS 1994 (August 23, 2007), the Michigan Court of Appeals held that Trentadue applies not only to a plaintiffs statutory claims, but also to his common law claims, pursuant to MCLS § 600.5827.

Practitioners representing potential plaintiffs in tort cases must be cautioned that the holding in Trentadue bars claims both retroactively and prospectively. The majority in Trentadue found that any reliance of a potential plaintiff on the continuing existence of a discovery rule was not an issue, noting that [a] plaintiff does not decide to postpone asserting a claim because he relies on the availability of extra-statutory discovery-based tolling. To the contrary, discovery-based tolling is a retroactive mechanism for relief to be used only when a plaintiff could not anticipate his claims.

Almost one month after the Michigan Supreme Court decided Trentadue, the Court of Appeals applied Trentadue in the context of a familial property dispute to prevent the plaintiff-father from bringing his common-law claims against the defendant-son. In Makridakis v. Makridakis, supra, the Court of Appeals recognized that retroactive application of the Trentadue holding bars the plaintiffs claims, including his claims of misrepresentation and breach of fiduciary duty. The Court of Appeals noted in a per curiam opinion that although the plaintiffs claims were timely under the law as it was when he filed his action, since the date of filing Trentadue had changed the law, the law under Trentadue applied.

Strategic Considerations and Alternatives for Plaintiffs Counsel. Unless and until either the Michigan Supreme Court overturns its decision or the Michigan legislature chooses to effectively overturn the Courts decision through statutory amendment, see, e.g., 2007 Mi. House Bill 5275 (proposing the addition of a general discovery rule to MCLS § 600.5827), the strict rule in Trentadue controls the ability of Michigan plaintiffs to bring claims against defendants after the statutory period of limitations has run.

When faced with the possibility of barred claims under Trentadue, a practitioner representing a plaintiff should carefully investigate every possible claim the plaintiff may have against a defendant. Although Trentadue may bar many claims, a plaintiff still may have viable claims remaining. Firstly, while the statute of limitations for some claims may have already run by the time the plaintiff discovers the existence of his claims or the defendants identity, the plaintiff may be able to bring other claims with longer statutory periods of limitation. For example, the general statute of limitations for a breach of contract claim is six years. MCLS § 600.5807(8). Thus, although the three-year period of limitation may bar a plaintiff's tort claim for injuries to persons or property, he may have up to an additional three years to bring his claim if those injuries arise out of the breach of an express provision in a contract. Fries v. Holland Hitch Co., 162 N.W.2d 672, 12 Mich. App. 178 (1968). Moreover, under MCLS § 600.5813, a general statute of limitations, claims for all other personal actions may be brought within six years after the claims accrue. Accordingly, a practitioner should investigate whether a plaintiff's claims could fall under the broad definition of all other personal actions. See Attorney General v. Harkins, 669 N.W.2d 296, 300, 257 Mich. App. 564 (2003) (noting definitions of personal action). Practitioners are also cautioned, however, that the more specific statute of limitations applies over the more general one, if both are applicable to a certain action. Local 1064, RWDSU, AFL-CIO v. Ernst & Young, 535 N.W.2d 187, 190, 449 Mich. 322 (1995). The six-year period of limitations pursuant to MCLS § 600.5813 has been applied successfully to claims of misrepresentation, see, e.g., Blue Cross & Blue Shield v. Folkema, 436 N.W.2d 670, 174 Mich. App. 476 (1982); certain claims involving interests in real property, see, e.g., Hart v. City of Detroit, 331 N.W.2d 438, 416 Mich. 488 (1982) (applying MCLS § 600.5813 to an inverse condemnation claim); and a claim to enforce an injunctive order issued under an environmental protection statute, see Attorney General v. Harkins, supra.

Secondly, if the Michigan legislature expressly enacted a statutory provision that allows for tolling based on a discovery rule, the holding in Trentadue will not affect a plaintiff's ability to bring claims for which these provisions apply. For example, the Legislature enacted limited statutory discovery provisions for professional and medical malpractice actions. MCLS § 600.5838(2), MCLS § 600.5838a(2); see also, e.g., Local 1064, RWDSU AFL-CIO v. Ernst & Young, supra (action alleging malpractice against accounting firm); Seebacher v. Fitzgerald, Hodgman, Cawthorne & King, P.C., 449 N.W.2d 673, 181 Mich. App. 642 (1989) (action alleging legal malpractice); Becker v. Meyer Rexall Drug Co., 367 N.W.2d 424, 141 Mich. App. 481 (1985) (action alleging malpractice against state-licensed pharmacist); Peltier v. Eldredge, 345 N.W.2d 605, 131 Mich. App. 533 (1983) (action alleging medical malpractice). The Legislature also has enacted special statutory provisions that apply to claims brought against a contractor, state-licensed architect or professional engineer for any injury to property, real or personal connected to an improvement made to real property by such as professional, MCLS § 600.5839(1), including such claims based on contract, Travelers Insurance Co. v. Guardian Alarm Co. of Michigan, 586 N.W.2d 760, 763, 231 Mich. App. 473 (1998), citing Michigan Millers Insurance Co. v. West Detroit Building Co, Inc., 494 N.W.2d 1, 196 Mich. App. 367 (1992). MCLS § 600.5839(1) provides that a plaintiff has six years after the time of occupancy of the completed improvement, use of the completed improvement, or acceptance of the completed improvement to bring such a claim. Afterwards, a discovery rule allows certain claims to be brought, provided that 1) the claims are brought within one year after the potential plaintiff discovered or should have discovered the defect; 2) the claims are for defects which were the proximate cause of the injury or damage; and 3) the defects were caused by the professionals gross negligence. This discovery rule is limited -- in no case may such a claim be brought more than 10 years after the use, acceptance or occupation of the improvement, regardless of when the alleged defect is discovered.

Thirdly, an applicable statute of limitations still may be indefinitely tolled for actions against defendants who have fraudulently concealed the existence of the claim. MCLS § 600.5855 allows actions to be brought against such a defendant at any time within 2 years after the person who is entitled to bring the action discovers, or should have discovered, the existence of the claim or the identity of the person who is liable for the claim, although the action would otherwise be barred by the period of limitations. Practitioners must be cautioned that for MCLS § 600.5855 to apply, a plaintiff must successfully establish fraudulent concealment by showing an affirmative act or misrepresentation on the part of the defendant. Doe v. Roman Catholic Archbishop of Archdiocese of Detroit, 692 N.W.2d 398, 264 Mich. App. 632 (2004); Lumber Village, Inc. v. Siegler, 355 N.W.2d 654, 135 Mich. App. 685 (1984); see also Bradley v. Gleason Works, 438 N.W.2d 330, 175 Mich. App. 459 (1989) (noting that defendants mere silence is insufficient to constitute fraudulent concealment); Draws v. Levin, 52 N.W.2d 180, 332 Mich. 447 (1952) (defining fraudulent concealment as employment of artifice, planned to prevent inquiry or escape investigation and to mislead or hinder acquirement of information disclosing right of action).

For general information on Michigan statutes of limitation see, Michigan Law & Practice STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS § 1 et seq.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

James J. Walsh is a partner in the Ann Arbor office of Bodman LLP, a Detroit based firm. Mr. Walsh is a 1975 graduate of Louisiana State University Law School and clerked for two judges on the Michigan Court of Appeals before joining Bodman in 1977. His litigation experience is quite broad, with numerous jury and bench trials and appeals in federal and state courts. He was primary litigation counsel for Michigans Commissioner of Financial and Insurance Services in the rehabilitation of the U.S. branch of Confederation Life Insurance Company, the largest and most successful insurance insolvency in North American history. He has extensive experience in class actions and also specializes in the constitutional aspects of sign regulations as counsel to the Outdoor Advertising Association of Michigan.

85 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ferstendig on CPLR 2214 & 2215 & the New Rules Governing Service of Motions

2008 Emerging Issues 814

David L. Ferstendig on CPLR 2214 & 2215 and the New Rules Governing Service of Motions and Cross Mot

By David L. Ferstendig

October 30, 2007

SUMMARY: CPLR 2215 provided that cross-motions could be served at least three days before the original motion was noticed to be heard. This presented certain logistical and timing problems, which affected whether the original moving party had sufficient time to respond. An amendment signed into law attempts to cure those problems by permitting the original moving party to demand that cross-motions be served at least 7 days before the return date. While the new law does serve a laudatory purpose, it creates a separate set of rules for the service of cross-motions (as opposed to the original motions), by mail or overnight delivery, which could create unnecessary confusion among practitioners. Moreover, it fails to address the problems associated with the service of opposing and reply papers by mail. This commentary, written by David Ferstendig, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important change.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: David L. Ferstendig on New Rules Governing Service of Motions and Cross Motions (CPLR 2214, 2215)

The timing in motion practice has always presented certain logistical problems. Under CPLR 2214(b) on a 12-7-1 motion, the party opposing the motion had only five days under the statute to respond. In addition, the opposition papers can be dropped in the mail leaving the movant a particularly short time to reply. Reply papers served one day before the motion date could arrive after submission of the motion. Similarly, a cross-motion served under CPLR 2215 three days before the return frequently provided the original moving party with insufficient time to respond. An amendment signed into law attempts to cure those problems by requiring original motion papers to be served at least 16 days before the return date, and permitting the original moving party to demand that cross-motions be served at least seven days before the return date (L. 2007, Ch. 185, effective 7/3/07). While the new law does serve a laudatory purpose, it creates a separate set of rules for the service of cross-motions (as opposed to the original motions), by mail or overnight delivery, which could create unnecessary confusion among practitioners. Moreover, it fails to address the problems associated with the service of opposition and reply papers by mail.

Significant Changes to Timing in Motion Practice

The amendment makes several significant changes in the timing of motion practice:

1. 12-7-1 motions are now 16-7-1; that is, the original movant has the option of serving the motion by hand at least 16 days in advance of the return date instead of the prior 12 day requirement under CPLR 2214(b). If served by overnight delivery, one business day is added; if served by regular mail, five days are added. See CPLR 2103(b)(2), (6).

2. A movant who serves a 16 day motion can demand not only that answering papers be served at least seven days before the return date (in accordance with prior practice), but may also make the demand applicable to any cross-motion. See CPLR 2214(b) as amended.

3. Clearing up a conflict in the law, the amendment requires that if the cross-motion is served by regular or overnight mail, additional time must be provided. Compare Perez v. Perez, 131 A.D.2d 451, 451, 516 N.Y.S.2d 236, 237 (2d Dept 1987) and concurring opinion in Guzetti v. City of New York, 32 A.D.3d 234, 820 N.Y.S.2d 29 (1st Dept 2006). However, the amendment creates its own set of timing rules: three extra days if served by regular mail and one day (not one business day) if served by overnight mail. CPLR 2215(b).

The Three-Day Cross-Motion Remains Alive and Well

Thus, the additional time required to serve a cross-motion (that is, seven days) is occasioned only if (1) the original motion is served at least 16 days before the return date and (2) the notice of motion expressly demands service of cross-motions at least seven days before the return date. Thus, if a demand is not made, or the motion is served less than 16 days, but more than eight days before the return date, the cross-motion can be served by hand up to three days before the return date.

Statute requires that additional time be added if cross-motion is served by mail

Prior to the amendment, the generally accepted (better) practice was to serve cross motions by mail at least eight days before the return date. See Perez v. Perez, 131 A.D.2d 451, 516 N.Y.S.2d 236 (2d Dept 1987) (five days added). However, a recent concurring opinion in First Department cast doubt on that position. See Guzetti v. City of New York, 323 A.D.2d 234, 237, 820 N.Y.S.2d 29 (1st Dept 2006) (no additional time). The amendment appears to require that the additional time must be added (3-1).

The Timing of Papers Served by Mail or Overnight Mail Should Have Remained Consistent

The better avenue, however, I believe, would have been to make the five day, one business day, requirements in CPLR 2103(b)(2) and (6) applicable to the service of cross-motions. This would have eliminated some of the confusion that will inevitably arise by having two sets of timing rules applicable to service of motions and cross-motions by mail.

The Legislation Leaves the Other Timing Problems for Another Day

The amendment does not deal with the timing problems associated with the service of opposition and reply papers by mail. In such a circumstance, the additional time is not added under CPLR 2103. Thus, for example, if a briefing schedule is not agreed to by counsel, reply papers served one day before the return date may not be received until after the motion is submitted. Moreover, the amendment does not address the practice of serving cross-motions for summary judgment, which require more time to prepare adequate opposition papers. Finally, certain courts and judges have rules that require the filing of all papers at least two days before the return date, which would severely hamper the movant wishing to respond to a three day motion.

When Should the Opposition to the Cross-Motion Be Served?

Although not entirely free of ambiguity, it appears that the amendment provides that on a 16-7-1 motion the original movant should serve his opposition to the cross-motion together with his reply on the original motion (that is, up to one day before the return date). The issue as to a response to a three day cross motion is not addressed.

Summary Chart

A. 16-7-1 motion

1. If original motion served by hand: at least 16 days before return date.

If original motion served by regular mail: add five days, that is, at least 21 days before return date.

If original motion served by overnight mail: add one business day, that is, at least 16 days plus one business day.

2. If original motion demands that cross-motion be served at least seven days before return date of original motion, cross-motion papers must be served:

. If by hand, at least seven days before return date.

. If by regular mail, at least 10 days before return date.

. If by overnight mail, at least eight days before return date.

B. 8-2 motion

1. If original motion served by hand: at least eight days before return date.

If original motion served by regular mail: at least 13 days before return date.

If original motion served by overnight mail: at least eight days plus one business day before return date.

2. If cross-motion served by hand: at least three days before return date.

If by regular mail: at least six days before return date.

If by overnight mail: at least four days before return date.

Conclusion

There is no question that the timing issues associated with motion and cross-motion practice needed to be addressed. This amendment, however, deals with some but not all of the issues and creates confusion by setting two different time periods for service by mail and overnight delivery with respect to a motion versus a cross-motion. It ignores the problems associated with serving opposition and reply papers by mail or the rather common practice of serving cross-motions for summary judgment three days before the return date. It places the burden on the movant to demand a seven day cross-motion (admittedly not a great burden after the Bar fully understands the law) when the amendment should not have permitted three-day cross-motions, where the original motion was served on 16 days notice. For the time being until a further curative amendment is passed movants should modify their form Notices of Motion on 16 day motions to include a requirement that cross-motions be served at least seven days before the return date. Eight day motions should be used sparingly, as they already are, avoiding the three-day cross-motion quagmire.

Cross References

New York Civil Practice: CPLR: CPLR Table II, CPLR 2214, CPLR 2215. Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual § 15.03, § 15.04. LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation Chapter 7.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David L. Ferstendig, currently a member of the Law Offices of David L. Ferstendig, LLC, New York was a founding officer of the law firm Breindel & Ferstendig, P.C. He litigates a spectrum of civil and corporate matters, including: contract, products liability, environmental toxic torts, reinsurance and insurance issues, and trade secrets. Mr. Ferstendig is also an adjunct law professor at New York Law School, where he teaches New York Practice. In addition to being a member of the Weinstein, Korn and Miller Editorial Board, he is the author of the LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation, the Editor of the CPLR Manual, a General Editor and author of the CPLR Practice Insights in New York Consolidated Law Service, and an update author of Timetable for New York Civil Practice (LexisNexis). He is also the Chair of the Civil Practice Law and Rules Committee of the New York State Bar Association. Mr. Ferstendig has lectured on civil practice issues for bar associations, the New York State Judicial Institute and Lexis Nexis.

86 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Ferstendig on 2007 CPLR Amendments Clarifying Rules Regarding Filing of Papers

2008 Emerging Issues 818

David L. Ferstendig on the 2007 CPLR Amendments Clarifying Rules Regarding Filing of Papers to Comme

By David L. Ferstendig

October 30, 2007

SUMMARY: Concerned with the effects of the decision in Mendon Ponds Neighborhood Assn v. Dehm, 98 NY 2d 745, 751 NYS 2d 819, 781 NE 2d 833 (2002), legislation was enacted in 2007 to try and clear up the ambiguities of the present filing statutes and to avoid traps for the unwary practitioner. The result is a more understandable set of rules which should reduce the possibility that initiating pleadings are not properly filed and of the consequent commencement problems. This commentary, written by David Ferstendig, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important change.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Concerned with the effects of the decision in Mendon Ponds Neighborhood Assn v. Dehm, 98 NY 2d 745, 751 NYS 2d 819, 781 NE 2d 833 (2002), legislation was enacted in 2007 to clear up ambiguities in the current filing statutes. The result is a more understandable set of rules that should increase the likelihood that initiating pleadings are properly filed and that commencement problems are avoided.

The Mendon Ponds decision. In Mendon Ponds, the New York State Court of Appeals dismissed an Article 78 proceeding because it was filed with the Chief Clerk of the Monroe Supreme and County Courts, instead of with the Monroe county clerk. See CPLR § 203, § 304, § 306-a, § 306-b. Such a dismissal can be more than an inconvenience if the statute of limitations has run because it can result in the loss of potential claims.

The amendment clarifies the filing requirements. The 2007 legislation attempts to clarify the applicable statutes so as to leave no ambiguity. Thus, for example:

1. It amends CPLR § 105(e) to define clearly who the clerk is in the supreme and county court, that is, the clerk of the county.
2. It amends CPLR § 306-a regarding the assignment of an index number, making it clear that the initiating pleadings are to be filed with the clerk of the county.
3. It amends CPLR § 2102 to reinforce the need to file with the county clerk. Significantly, CPLR § 2102 now provides that:

(b) A paper filed in accordance with the rules of the chief administrator or any local rule or practice established by the court shall be deemed filed. Where such rules or practice allow for the filing of a paper other than at the office of the clerk of the court, such paper shall be transmitted to the clerk of the court.

(c) A clerk shall not refuse to accept for filing any paper presented for that purpose except where specifically directed to do so by statute or rules promulgated by the chief administrator of the courts, or order of the court.

Effective date of statute. The amendment takes effect and applies to actions or proceedings commenced on or after January 1, 2008.

Further amendment provides the court with discretion to correct or ignore mistakes. In separate legislation, CPLR 2001 was amended (L. 2007, ch. 529, eff. 8/15/07) to provide a court with discretion to correct or ignore mistakes in the commencement process that do not prejudice the opposing party. This would bring these mistakes in line with other non-prejudicial procedural events already covered by CPLR 2001. The amended statute specifically refers to defects in filing and the failure to purchase an index number. It was offered in response to a series of Court of Appeals decisions that held that these type of defects required dismissal of the action if a timely objection was made. See Harris v. Niagara Falls Board of Education, 6 N.Y.3d 155, 811 N.Y.S.2d 299, 844 N.E.2d 753 (2006) (after successfully applying for leave to serve late notice of claim, plaintiffs failure to purchase a new index number for subsequent personal injury action was waivable defect if not timely raised, not a lack of subject matter jurisdiction); Fry v. Village of Tarrytown, 89 N.Y.2d 714, 658 N.Y.S.2d 205, 680 N.E.2d 578 (1997); Gershel v. Porr, 89 N.Y.2d 327, 653 N.Y.S.2d 85, 675 N.E.2d 836 (1996).

In the case of a failure to pay an index number fee, the court will condition the denial of a motion seeking dismissal on plaintiffs payment of the proper fee. Significantly, the sponsors memo for the legislation specifically noted that the amendment did not:

1. Excuse a complete failure to file within the statute of limitation.
2. Excuse a plaintiff or petitioner from having to actually file a summons and complaint or petition in order to properly commence an action.
3. Excuse a bare summons, because that would not constitute a filing.
4. Overrule the Court of Appeals decision in Parker v. Mack, 61 NY 2d 114, 472 NYS 2d 882, 460 NE 2d 1316 (1984). (No action is commenced by the service of a summons alone which neither contains nor has attached to it a notice of the nature of the action and of the relief sought).

Thus, the amendment is intended to clarify that a mistake in the method of filing (and not a mistake in what is filed) is a mistake that a court can now correct.

Conclusion. The 1992 commencement by filing system in New York was intended to eliminate the problems associated with commencement by service by providing a definite and easy way to interpose a claim for statute of limitations purposes. Ironically, years later and despite a series of Court of Appeals decisions, it appeared that the commencement by filing system was setting new traps for lawyers.

Both 2007 amendments serve the laudatory purpose of removing the harshness of automatic dismissal for mistakes in the method of filing.

Cross References. New York Civil Practice: CPLR: § 105, § 304, § 304.02, § 306-a, § 306-b, § 2102. LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation Ch. 1. Weinstein, Korn & Miller CPLR Manual Ch. 3.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

David L. Ferstendig, currently a member of the Law Offices of David L. Ferstendig, LLC, New York, was a founding officer of the law firm Breindel & Ferstendig, P.C. He litigates a spectrum of civil and corporate matters, including: contract, products liability, environmental, toxic torts, reinsurance and insurance issues, and trade secrets. Mr. Ferstendig is also an adjunct law professor at New York Law School, where he teaches New York Practice. In addition to being a member of the Weinstein, Korn and Miller Editorial Board, he is the author of the LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation, the Editor of the CPLR Manual, a General Editor and author of CPLR Practice Insights in New York Consolidated Law Service, and an update author of Timetable for New York Civil Practice from LexisNexis. He is also the Chair of the Civil Practice Law and Rules Committee of the New York State Bar Association. Mr. Ferstendig has lectured on civil practice issues for bar associations, the New York State Judicial Institute, and LexisNexis.

87 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Umstattd v. Centex Homes

2008 Emerging Issues 790

Sinclair and Harrison on Umstattd v. Centex Homes, 274 Va. 541, 650 S.E.2d 527, 2007 Va. LEXIS 98 (2

By Prof. Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

October 25, 2007

SUMMARY: Does Mandamus Lie to Compel Acceptance of a Subdivision Application and Preliminary Subdivision Plat Under Virginia Law, Or Do Declaratory Judgment Proceedings Afford an Adequate Remedy? Frequently, local planning, zoning, and development officials must face the issue of whether to accept subdivision plat applications and preliminary plats submitted to them by developers desirous of initiating new residential housing, mixed residential-commercial, and other types of development projects. In the recent case of Umstattd v. Centex Homes, 274 Va. 541, ___ S.E.2d ___, 2007 Va. LEXIS 98 (2007), the Supreme Court of Virginia addressed the issue of whether a developer could employ the remedy of mandamus to compel local planning officials to accept and process a subdivision plat application and preliminary plat it had submitted for a major residential development project under zoning restrictions permitting such subdivision as a matter of right. The Court also ruled on the related issue of whether this developer, which had also sought a judgment declaring that it had the right to have its application accepted and processed and that any local ordinance or regulation authorizing the locality to refuse to do so was unlawful, could employ declaratory judgment for such purposes.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Frequently, local planning, zoning, and development officials must face the issue of whether to accept subdivision plat applications and preliminary plats submitted to them by developers desirous of initiating new residential housing, mixed residential-commercial, and other types of development projects. In the recent case of Umstattd v. Centex Homes, 274 Va. 541, ___ S.E.2d ___, 2007 Va. LEXIS 98 (2007), the Supreme Court of Virginia addressed the issue of whether a developer could employ the remedy of mandamus to compel local planning officials to accept and process a subdivision plat application and preliminary plat it had submitted for a major residential development project under zoning restrictions permitting such subdivision as a matter of right. The Court also ruled on the related issue of whether this developer, which had also sought a judgment declaring that it had the right to have its application accepted and processed and that any local ordinance or regulation authorizing the locality to refuse to do so was unlawful, could employ declaratory judgment for such purposes.

Background. Following the procedure required by a towns ordinances, plaintiff a nationwide homebuilder that also was the contract purchaser of a 324-acre tract of land zoned R-1, a category permitting subdivision into one-acre lots as a matter of right submitted a subdivision application with an attached preliminary subdivision plat for 191 single-family detached homes to the appropriate planning officials for the Town of Leesburg, Virginia. The towns planning chief sent a letter rejecting the preliminary subdivision plat based on several listed "significant deficiencies" regarding both the plat and the application, despite the fact that the developer had already submitted two revised versions addressing multiple "deficiencies" previously noted by town planning officials and their employees. The developer then brought suit against the mayor, the town council, and the planning chief (collectively, the town) in two counts. The first count was a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the town planning commission to accept and process the application to a final decision. The second count was a motion for a declaratory judgment that would declare the developer's right to have its application accepted and processed by the towns officials and to declare unlawful any local ordinance or regulation that would authorize the town to refuse to do so. After an ore tenus hearing, the circuit court agreed with the developer and awarded a writ of mandamus, directing the town to accept and process the application in accordance with law. However, the circuit court did not decide the developer's claim for declaratory judgment, evidently concluding that it was rendered moot by the award of mandamus. The town appealed.

General Principles. The Court in Umstatt analyzed the issues of whether the circuit court had erred in awarding the writ of mandamus as requested by the developer and whether declaratory judgment was available by stating the following well-settled principles of Virginia law regarding the remedy of mandamus and the scope of the declaratory judgment statutes, Va. Code Ann. §§ 8.01-184 et seq.:

Limited availability of mandamus remedy: Relying on In re Horan, 271 Va. 258, 258, 634 S.E.2d 675, 676 (2006) and Hertz v. Times-World Corporation, 259 Va. 599, 607-608, 528 S.E.2d 458, 462-63 (2000), the Court observed that "[m]andamus is an extraordinary remedy that may be used to compel a public official to perform a purely ministerial duty imposed by law." The Court further explained that, as it had previously observed in those cases, "use of the remedy is limited," that it is "not awarded as a matter of right but only in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion," and that it is "not awarded in a doubtful case." The Court also specified that mandamus "is not available where the applicant has an adequate remedy at law."

Relying on Richlands Medical Ass'n v. Commonwealth, 230 Va. 384, 386-87, 337 S.E.2d 737, 739 (1985), the Court noted that "[a] significant limitation upon the use of mandamus is the requirement that the duty to be enforced must be one in which the public official must act as a matter of course, without the exercise of his own judgment or discretion." Elaborating, the Court explained the rationale underlying this limitation as follows: "Where the official duty involves the necessity on the part of the officer to make some investigation, to examine evidence and form his judgment thereon, mandamus will not be awarded to compel performance of the duty [because] [t]o do so would improperly transfer to the court the discretion the law has committed to the officer."

Purpose and availability of declaratory judgment statutes: Referring to Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-191 and its prior holdings in Hoffman Family, L.L.C. v. Mill Two Associates, 259 Va. 685, 693, 529 S.E.2d 318, 323 (2000); Cupp v. Board of Supervisors, 227 Va. 580, 592, 318 S.E.2d 407, 413 (1984); and Liberty Mutual Ins. Co. v. Bishop, 211 Va. 414, 418, 177 S.E.2d 519, 522 (1970), the Court explained that the purpose of Virginia's declaratory judgment statutes "is to provide a mechanism for resolving uncertainty in controversies over legal rights, without requiring one party to invade the asserted rights of another in order to permit an ordinary civil action for damages." The Court further noted that it had recently reaffirmed this principle in its decision in Miller v. Highland County, 274 Va. 355, ___ S.E.2d ___, 2007 Va. LEXIS 119 (2007), a case it had decided the same day as Umstatt.

Key Issue #1: Were town officials required to exercise discretion or judgment regarding acceptance and processing of the application and plat? The Court in Umstatt observed that, with respect to the developer's subdivision application and preliminary plat, the town's subdivision ordinance required the town's land development official "to decide a mixed question of law and fact," specifically, "[w]hat, if any, waivers were required in consideration of the facts of the proposed subdivision, the conditions existing on the subject land and the neighboring lands, and the mandates of the applicable statutes, ordinances and regulations?" The Court further explained that this inquiry was part of the land development official's responsibility under that ordinance to "determine whether the application was 'incomplete' and contained 'deficiencies.'" As such, the Court concluded that "[t]he official's task was not purely ministerial" because "[i]t involved the application of law to a complex set of facts and required the exercise of judgment."

Regarding the ultimate issue of whether the developer could employ mandamus to compel town officials to accept and process the subdivision application and preliminary plat, the Court concluded that it was "apparent that the decision to be made by the towns officials in deciding whether to accept the application involved considerable investigation of the submitted plans, the conditions existing on the subject land and in the surrounding area, and the exercise of discretion and judgment in applying the applicable statutes, ordinances and regulations to the conditions found to exist." As a result, the Court concluded that this decision "was . . . not subject to compulsion by mandamus."

In reaching these conclusions, the Court distinguished the facts in Umstattd from those in a prior case, Board of Supervisors v. Hylton Enterprises, 216 Va. 582, 221 S.E.2d 534 (1976). The Court explained that in Hylton, mandamus was held to be the proper remedy to compel county officials to act on site plans that had been pending before them for over two years, because the duty of the officials to take action within a reasonable time was purely ministerial. Further, the Court noted that in Hylton, what action should be taken was not determined, and the substance of the officials' decision lay in their discretion. In contrast, the Court noted that in Umstattd, the towns officials acted upon the application promptly, by rejecting it within ten working days as required by the ordinance. Further, the Court noted that, unlike the complaining party in Hylton, the developer in Umstattd "complains not of [the town officials'] failure to act, but of the substance of their action and the reasons they gave to support it."

Key Issue #2: Would declaratory judgment be an adequate remedy for the developer's claims? In addressing the issue of whether the developer's claim for declaratory judgment would afford the developer an adequate remedy with respect to its claims that the town wrongfully refused to accept and process its subdivision application and preliminary plat, the Court further distinguished Hylton from Umstattd. The Court pointed out that, in Hylton, declaratory judgment was held to not be an adequate remedy at law "because it is unavailable where the claims and rights asserted have fully matured and the alleged wrongs have already been suffered." In contrast, the Court observed that the posture of Umstattd was quite different, because "the claims and rights asserted by [the developer] have not matured, but remain to be resolved by judicial determination" because "neither [the developer] nor the town has yet taken final action in reliance on their respective contentions." Under these circumstances, the Court held that "declaratory judgment affords an adequate remedy" because "[t]he mixed questions of law and fact in controversy, as well as the resolution of the legal disputes between the parties, remain pending before the circuit court as the subject of [the developer's] still unresolved claim for declaratory judgment." Accordingly, the Court opined that "declaratory judgment will decide those disputes and guide the parties in their future courses of action."

Importance of Ruling. Given that the submission of subdivision applications and preliminary plats is such a frequent occurrence, particularly in areas of the Commonwealth proximate to major metropolitan centers, Umstattd provides much needed guidance to both developers and localities on the issue of what remedies are available to developers who become dissatisfied with a locality's handling of these materials. As the Court teaches in Umstattd, mandamus will not lie to address dissatisfaction with the validity of the substantive reasons given for a locality's refusal to accept and process a subdivision application and preliminary plat whenever that decision involves the exercise of discretion by local officials. This is so because the decision typically "involve[s] considerable investigation of the submitted plans, the conditions existing on the subject land and in the surrounding area, and the exercise of discretion and judgment in applying the applicable statutes, ordinances and regulations to the conditions found to exist." Instead, mandamus would appear to be an available remedy only under the limited circumstances previously examined by the Court in Hylton, and developers wishing to challenge the validity of the reasons given by a locality for its refusal to accept and process the aforementioned materials should do so, as the developer did in Umstattd, via Virginia's declaratory judgment statutes.

CVirginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

With respect to general issues concerning claims against local governmental bodies in Virginia, see Kent

Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.), § 2.30 (Claims Against Counties, Cities, and Similar Entities).

On the operation of declaratory relief in Virginia under the restrictive case law from our Supreme Court interpreting Article 17 of Va. Code Ann., §§8.01-184 et seq., see Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.), § 3.10 (Declaratory Relief) and Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading & Practice (2nd ed. 2006), § 30.10 (Controversies in Which Declaratory Judgments May Be Rendered). See also John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies, § 16.09 (Declaratory Judgment).

With respect to the limited situations where mandamus relief is available in Virginia, and the alternatives to this writ, see Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.), § 3.6 (Extraordinary Writs). See also Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading & Practice (2nd ed. 2006), § 33.01 (Writs).

See generally Michies Jurisprudence of Virginia and West Virginia, MANDAMUS (2007).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). Both of these treatises are published by Lexis Law Publishing. Professor Sinclair is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Mr. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and loose-leaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

88 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair and Harrison on Morency v. Commonwealth

2008 Emerging Issues 788

Sinclair and Harrison on Morency v. Commonwealth, 274 Va. 569, 649 S.E.2d 682, 2007 Va. LEXIS 114 (2

By Prof. Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

October 25, 2007

SUMMARY: Accrued Rights and Retroactive Application of Statutory Amendments under Virginia law: Ascertaining the Impact of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239 and Due Process Guarantees. The Court's resolution of the issue of whether the 2004 court order in Morency created a vested right that could not be affected by subsequent amendment of the statute authorizing the relief provided for in that order, based upon the Court's interpretation and application of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239, and its resolution of the question of whether due process guarantees preserve statutory rights accrued under a prior version of a subsequently amended statute in McCabe provide valuable guidance to courts and practitioners regarding the extent to which rights derived from court orders and statutes can remain insulated against retroactive legislation.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Morency v. Commonwealth, the Supreme Court of Virginia, in a majority opinion, affirmed a circuit court judgment denying a petition filed by a convicted violent sex offender who sought, pursuant to the terms of a 2004 court order, to have his identifying information removed from the sex offender Internet registry maintained by the Virginia State Police. In doing so, the Court addressed, applied, and clarified principles of Virginia law regarding the retroactive amendment of statutes and rights accruing to parties as the result of court orders. Additionally, in McCabe v. Commonwealth, the Court addressed substantive and procedural due process arguments regarding the impact of a retroactive amendment to Virginia's sex offender registry statutes that the Court was unable to consider in Morency due to procedural deficiencies. The Court's resolution of the issue of whether the 2004 court order in Morency created a vested right that could not be affected by subsequent amendment of the statute authorizing the relief provided for in that order, based upon the Court's interpretation and application of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239, and its resolution of the question of whether due process guarantees preserve statutory rights accrued under a prior version of a subsequently amended statute in McCabe provide valuable guidance to courts and practitioners regarding the extent to which rights derived from court orders and statutes can remain insulated against retroactive legislation.

Background. The petitioner in Morency was previously convicted of aggravated sexual battery in violation of Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-67.3 and was required to register as a sex offender and to re-register with the State Police every 90 days throughout his lifetime, under Va. Code Ann. § 9.1-901, Va. Code Ann. § 9.1-902, and Va. Code Ann. § 9.1-904. Relying on then-applicable provisions, the offender filed a petition in the circuit court for relief from the quarterly re-registration requirements and, following the required hearing, the circuit court granted the petition and entered an order in 2004 terminating his 90-day re-registration requirement. The 2004 order also commanded the clerk to notify the Virginia State Police promptly that the petitioner's registry information including name and pictures shall be removed from the Sex Offender and Crimes Against Minors Registry and the internet system associated therewith and maintained by the Virginia State Police. In 2006, the General Assembly amended Va. Code Ann. § 9.1-909 by eliminating removal of an offender's information from the Internet registry upon receipt by the State Police of an order granting relief under that section. Following this amendment, the offender received a letter from the State Police stating that the amendment applied retroactively and, as a result, his registration information would be reposted on the Internet registry. The petitioner then filed suit, seeking to enjoin the State Police from reposting the identifying information on the Internet registry. The circuit court denied his petition and he appealed.

In McCabe, the plaintiff was convicted upon a guilty plea of the crime of taking indecent liberties with a minor over whom she had a custodial or supervisory relationship in violation of Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-370.1. At that time, former Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-298.1 required her to register with the State Police as a sex offender and to re-register annually for a period of 10 years. Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-298.1 was subsequently amended, in 2001, reclassifying a violation of Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-370.1 as a sexually violent offense and changing the registration requirements such that plaintiff was required to re-register as a sex offender every 90 days for the rest of her life. Plaintiff brought suit, asserting that application of the changed registration requirements to her violated her rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The circuit court granted the Commonwealth's demurrer and entered an order dismissing the complaint, and plaintiff appealed.

General Principles. In Morency, the Court analyzed the issue of whether the 2004 court order created a vested right that could not be affected by the 2006 amendment of the statute authorizing the relief provided for in that order by stating the following long-standing principles of Virginia law:

. Applicability of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239: Opining that whether the provisions of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239 preclude the retroactive application of the 2006 amendment was the dispositive issue to be considered, the Court in Morency summarized the pertinent language of the statute as follows: No new act of the General Assembly shall be construed to repeal a former law . . . or any right accrued under . . . the former law, or in any way whatever to affect such . . . right accrued, or claim arising before the new act of the General Assembly takes effect. Relying on City of Norfolk v. Kohler, 234 Va. 341, 345, 362 S.E.2d 894, 896 (1987), the Court then explained that the statute applies to accrued rights categorized as 'substantive' or 'vested.'

The Court noted in Morency that it had not previously considered whether a final judgment creates a vested or substantive right in the holder of that judgment qualifying it as an accrued right for purposes of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239. In deciding this question, the Court relied upon its holdings in Bain v. Boykin, 180 Va. 259, 23 S.E.2d 127 (1942), Kennedy Coal Corp. v. Buckhorn Coal Corp., 140 Va. 37, 45, 124 S.E. 482, 485 (1924), the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in McCullough v. Virginia, 172 U.S. 102, 123-124 (U.S. 1898), and the opinion of the Fourth Circuit in Plyler v. Moore, 100 F.3d 365, 371, 374 (4th Cir. 1996), to conclude that a final judgment order may vest a litigant with an accrued right for purposes of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239 which cannot be abrogated by subsequent legislation under the statute. The Court was quick to note, however, that this conclusion does not end the inquiry because, as had been explained long ago in Danville v. Pace, 66 Va. 1, 11 (Va. 1874), [t]he nature of the specific 'right' embodied in the judgment order must be determined before it can be ascertained whether that right was, as a matter of law, secured against legislative invasion by operation of the statute.

. Statutory remedies and vested rights: Relying on its prior decisions in Pace, 66 Va. at 11, and Commonwealth v. Shaffer, 263 Va. 428, 432, 559 S.E.2d 623, 626 (2002), the Court showed that it was well-settled under Virginia jurisprudence that litigants do[] not have a vested or constitutional right in . . . statutory defense[s] and likewise do not have any vested interest in statutorily-derived procedural remedies, which, the Court noted, may be altered, curtailed, or repealed at the will of the legislature.

In McCabe, the Court analyzed the issue of whether the 2001 amendment to Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-298.1 reclassifying the offense of which the plaintiff had been convicted as one requiring her to re-register as a sex offender every 90 days for the rest of her life, as opposed to annually for 10 years following her conviction, violated her rights to substantive and procedural due process under the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution by stating the following long-standing principles of constitutional law:

. Validity of legislation turns on nature of affected right: Citing to Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 721 (1997) and Walton v. Commonwealth, 255 Va. 422, 427-428, 497 S.E.2d 869, 872-873 (Va. 1998), the Court stated that it was well established that one asserting a denial of substantive due process rights must first clearly describe and establish that the interest asserted is a fundamental right or liberty interest specially protected under the Due Process Clause, and that [t]o qualify for that designation, the right asserted must be a right deeply rooted in th[e] [n]ation's history and tradition or implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, such that neither liberty nor justice would exist if it was sacrificed. The Court then explained that Legislation interfering with a fundamental right or liberty interest survives constitutional scrutiny only if it is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest, and that [i]f the asserted right is not a fundamental right or liberty interest specially protected by the Due Process Clause, the legislation will survive constitutional scrutiny if it is rationally related to a legitimate governmental interest.

. No right to rely on continued existence of statutorily-prescribed remedies: Relying on its prior decisions in Board of Zoning Appeals v. CaseLin Sys., Inc., 256 Va. 206, 210, 501 S.E.2d 397, 400 (1998), Allen v. Mottley Constr. Co., 160 Va. 875, 888, 170 S.E. 412, 417 (1933), and Crawford v. Halsted & Putnam, 61 Va. 211, 220 (Va. 1871), the Court concluded that, as a general proposition, there is no right to rely on the continued existence of civil statutes.

. Curtailing convicted rights of felons more than general populace is lawful: Relying on Johnson v. Commonwealth, 259 Va. 654, 672-673, 529 S.E.2d 769, 779-780 (Va. 2000) and Doe v. Tandeske, 361 F.3d 594 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 543 U.S. 817 (2004), the Court concluded that the liberty rights of convicted felons may be curtailed more than those of the general populace. It further cited to Va. Const. Art. II, § 1, regarding a limitation on a convicted felon's right to vote, and Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-308.2, addressing the right of a convicted felon to possess a dangerous weapon, as examples of valid limitations.

Key Issue #1 (Morency): Was the relief provided for in the 2004 order a function of statutory authorization? In addressing the issue of whether the 2004 court order in Morency created a vested right that could not be affected by the 2006 amendment of the statute authorizing the relief provided for in that order, the Court began by focusing on the language of the statute at issue, Va. Code Ann. § 9.1-909, as it existed at the time that the order was issued. The Court found that [b]y the plain terms of the statute, a petition filed pursuant to [section 9.1-909] was a petition only for relief from the quarterly re-registration requirement. It likewise concluded that [t]he statute did not authorize a petition to require the removal of [sex offender r]egistry information from the Internet, and that the circuit court was thus without authority to order such action based on a petition. Continuing, the Court explained that the statute only authorized the circuit court to promptly notify the State Police of the entry of its September 30, 2004 order, and that [t]he removal duty of the State Police, upon notification of th[at] [o]rder, was self-executing. Thus, the Court concluded, removal was a function of statutory authorization, not court order, and that this was so regardless of the language of the 2004 order directing removal of the petitioner's identifying information from the Internet registry.

Key Issue #2 (Morency): Did the relief provided for in the 2004 order create a vested right protected by Va. Code Ann. § 1-239? After concluding that the relief provided for in the 2004 order was a function of statutory authorization as opposed to court order, the Court, relying on its prior opinions in Pace, 66 Va. at 11, and Shaffer, 263 Va. 428, 432, 559 S.E.2d 623, 626, held that the 2004 order did not clothe [petitioner] with a vested or substantive right to prevent his identifying information from being placed on the sex offender Internet registry. The Court explained that this was so because [r]emoval of such information from the Internet registry was solely an action directed by statute by virtue of the receipt of the . . . 2004 order by the State Police, and that [r]emoval under these circumstances, like the procedural remedy in Shaffer, could be altered 'at will' by the legislature. As a result, the Court ultimately concluded that the petitioner did not have an accrued right that was affected by the retroactive application of the 2006 amendment to Va. Code Ann. § 9.1-909 for purposes of Va. Code Ann. § 1-239.

Key Issue #3 (McCabe): Did the retroactive legislation at issue in McCabe affect a fundamental due process right? In addressing the issue of whether the right to be free from lifetime re-registration requirements was a fundamental due process right, the Court, citing Tandeske, 361 F.3d at 597, Smith, 538 U.S. at 102103, and Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997), explained that Virginia's sex offender registry requirement, like those of other states, served a legitimate nonpunitive purpose, and that the categories of crimes and corresponding length of the reporting requirement were reasonably related to the danger of recidivism and were consistent with the regulatory objective. The Court also concluded that it found no history or tradition in [American] jurisprudence elevating a convicted felon's right to be free from post-incarceration registration to a fundamental or specially protected due process right. On the contrary, it found that Virginia's jurisprudence, like that of many sister states, recognized that history and tradition viewed the curtailment of similar fundamental freedoms of convicted felons, such as the right to vote and the right to bear arms, as being constitutionally valid. As a result, the Court ultimately held that McCabe's right to be free from lifetime quarterly re-registration as a sex offender does not qualify as a liberty interest specially protected by the Due Process Clause for purposes of a substantive due process claim.

Key Issue #4 (McCabe): May a fundamental right arise from a statutorily-based expectation? After concluding that a person convicted of a violent sex offense had no fundamental right to be free from lifetime re-registration requirements imposed by Virginia's sex offender statutes, the Court focused its attention on the issue of whether such a right could arise as the result of a person's expectation that an earlier version of the registration statute, which did not impose lifetime re-registration requirements, would continue to apply regardless of any future amendment occurring subsequent to that person's conviction via a plea of guilty. In doing so, it found that the plaintiff's reliance on language appearing in the United States Supreme Court's opinion in Wilkinson v. Austin, 545 U.S. 209 (2005), was misplaced. This was so, the Court opined, because contrary to plaintiff's assertions, the Wilkinson Court did not hold that state laws or policies could form the basis of a fundamental right or liberty interest invoking substantive due process protections. It then observed that as a general proposition, there is no right to rely on the continued existence of civil statutes recognized in Virginia jurisprudence, and stated that its review of same failed to reveal any recognized fundamental right to rely on the civil legislative scheme in existence at the time of [plaintiff's] guilty plea. As a result, the Court ultimately held that the plaintiff's substantive due process claim based on the alleged fundamental right to be free from lifetime re-registration as a sex offender fails because it is not a right 'deeply rooted in this [n]ation's history and tradition' or 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,' such that 'neither liberty nor justice would exist if [it was] sacrificed.' Accordingly, the Court affirmed the circuit court's holding that plaintiff had failed to demonstrate that the reclassification affected some fundamental constitutional right and its concomitant ruling dismissing her complaint.

Importance of rulings. The questions answered by the Supreme Court of Virginia in Morency and McCabe regarding the extent to which rights and relief granted in both court orders and statutes are insulated from the retroactive effect of subsequent legislative changes provide litigants and practitioners alike with important guidance regarding the extent to which they can expect to successfully preserve those rights and relief. As the Court teaches in Morency, while Va. Code Ann. § 1-239 protects accrued, i.e., vested, rights against such changes, relief that is given as a function of statutory authorization is not protected under the statute from the retroactive effect of subsequently adopted amendments to the authorizing statute. As the Court explained, the circuit court in Morency was without authority to order the particular relief it had granted: ordering the removal of identifying information from the Internet sex offender registry. This signals that only relief derived from an exercise of conferred judicial discretion can qualify as an accrued right for purposes of the protection afforded by Va. Code Ann. § 1-239. Further, the Court teaches in McCabe that constitutional due process protections are not offended by the retroactive effect of subsequent statutory amendments unless the right or relief sought to be protected is a fundamental right--in other words, a right 'deeply rooted in this [n]ation's history and tradition' or 'implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,' such that 'neither liberty nor justice would exist if [it was] sacrificed.' In so doing, the Court has indicated that only substantive rights, which are also viewed as fundamental rights, are likely to qualify for protection against the retroactive effect of legislative changes that are adopted subsequent to the accrual of such rights.

CVirginia Cross-References. For further analysis of the topics of Virginia law addressed herein, please consult the following sources:

A general treatment of aspects of these problems may be found in Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure Chapter 2: Claims, Defenses, and Immunities. See also John L. Costello, Virginia Remedies Chapter 1: Remedies as Part of The System of Justice, § 1.07 Substantive Rights, Remedies, and Due Process.

Two classic cases in Virginia jurisprudence on these topics remain, Starnes v. Cayouette, 244 Va. 202, 419 S.E.2d 669 (1992) (on the retroactive enlargement of the period of limitations), and Harris v. DiMattina, 250 Va. 306, 462 S.E.2d 338 (1995) (discussing the direct predecessor to the statute construed in the two principal cases in this Commentary).

A range of important topics are collected in Michies Jurisprudence of Virginia and West Virginia (2007), in these sections among others: Constitutional Law, Fundamental Rights and Privileges § 76 et seq., Constitutional Law, Equal Protection of Laws § 126 et seq., Constitutional Law, Due Process of Law § 130 et seq., Statutes, Constitutionality and Validity § 27 et seq., Statutes, Amendment, Revival and Repeal § 82 et seq., and Statutes, Revision and Codification § 109 et seq.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate

Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). Both of these treatises are published by Lexis Law Publishing. Professor Sinclair is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Mr. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and loose-leaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

89 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Susan M. Brazas on Frigo v. Silver Cross Hosp. & Med. Ctr.

2008 Emerging Issues 785

Susan M. Brazas on Frigo v. Silver Cross Hosp. & Med. Ctr., 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1014 (Ill. App. Ct.

By Susan M. Brazas

October 24, 2007

SUMMARY: Negligent Credentialing: The New Cause of Action in Medical Negligence Cases. Actionable medical negligence does not start with the physician's act of medical treatment, but instead with the hospital's act of negligently granting privileges to that physician. This is the holding in the First District Appellate Court's affirming of a $7.7 million jury verdict in Frigo v. Cross, which recognizes, for the first time in Illinois, negligent credentialing as a cause of action. The Court pulls away the protective cloak of the Medical Studies Act, and even the Hospital Licensing Act, instead relying heavily on case law from other jurisdictions. This commentary, written by Susan M. Brazas, frequent author and lecturer on civil practice matters, discusses the impact and implications of this novel and ground-breaking opinion.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: First District Recognizes Negligent Credentialing As A New Cause Of Action

In a case of first impression, the First District Appellate Court of Illinois in Frigo v. Silver Cross Hosp. & Med. Ctr., 2007 Ill. App. LEXIS 1014 (Ill. App. Ct. 2007) has identified negligent credentialing as a new cause of action. Among the surprising twists to the decision is the Court's ruling on how the relation back doctrine protects allegations of this new theory from death by statute of limitations. Another is the applicability of the subsequent medical treatment IPI instruction to the negligent credentialing theory. The Frigo decision opens the door to the creation of negligence actions for staffing decisions in its reliance on the Supreme Court's landmark Darling case (Darling v. Charleston Community Memorial Hospital, 33 Ill. 2d 326, 331 (Ill. 1965)). The sanctity of a physician's staff credentials file is no longer assured, as the Frigo court denies credentialing the cloak of statutory protection of the Hospital Licensing Act (210 ILCS 85/1 et seq.) and the Medical Studies Act (735 ILCS 5/8-2101 et seq.).

In Frigo v. Silver Cross, the First District Appellate Court, in a majority opinion, held that negligent credentialing is a cause of action in Illinois. No prior Illinois court decisions have specifically ruled on this point, although the Court afforded much credence to the many jurisdictions (federal and other states) which recognize this cause of action. The Second District has touched upon this cause of action but without specifically ruling whether it is a viable cause of action. Hendricks v. Victory Mem. Hosp., 755 N.E.2d 1013, 1015 (2d Dist. 2001). Even though they are persuasive and not binding authority, the Frigo Court quoted from several other courts in adopting its reasoning. The linchpin of the Frigo decision is the landmark Darling case which first recognized hospital or institutional negligence in Illinois in 1965. Darling v. Charleston Community Memorial Hospital, 33 Ill. 2d 326, 331 (Ill. 1965).

Two holdings within the Frigo opinion address the practical ramifications of this new cause of action. First, the Court held that the initial Complaint's allegations of negligent management by the Defendant Hospital were sufficient to put the Hospital on notice of the later allegations of negligent credentialing. Thus, the Court found that these later, more detailed allegations related back to the original pleading and were thus not barred by the statute of limitations.

Second, the Frigo court found that the existing IPI Jury Instruction, No. 30.23, as to liability of a tortfeasor for injuries occurring in the course of subsequent medical care, is appropriate to use in a negligent credentialing case. IPI 30.23 states: If a defendant negligently causes an injury to the plaintiff, then the defendant is liable not only for the plaintiff's damages resulting from that injury, but is also liable for any damages sustained by the plaintiff arising from the efforts of health care providers to treat the injury caused by the defendant, even if that health care provider was negligent.

In its analysis, the Frigo court quoted from the Notes on Use to IPI 30.23 that it is intended to be used when there is evidence that a subsequent health care provider caused or aggravated the injury. Interestingly, there is no discussion (either in Frigo or in the Notes on Use) of whether this instruction is intended when the initial harm is done by a health care provider. The Frigo court noted that the physician aggravated the plaintiff's medical condition. Although this medical condition would not have been caused by the defendant, as IPI 30.23 states, nonetheless the Frigo court found it applicable. It could be concluded that instead the injury caused by the defendant was the hospital's placing the plaintiff in the hands of an unqualified physician.

Strategic Considerations. Attorneys handling medical malpractice actions are well advised to examine whether negligent credentialing allegations could be brought, either in a new case filing or via amended pleadings. If the statute of limitations has run, however, careful consideration should be made of whether sufficient allegations of negligent management have been made in existing pleadings. The Frigo court has continued the trend of a liberal standard for relation back of amendments. This trend was acknowledged by the Illinois Supreme Court in Zeh v. Wheeler, 111 Ill. 2d 266, 278, 489 N.E.2d 1342 (1986), and has been especially liberal to medical malpractice complaints, Castro v. Bellucci, 338 Ill. App. 3d 386, 391 (1st Dist. 2003), so that their actions can be heard on the merits.

Nonetheless, more than agency allegations is required to put the hospital on notice. As such, practitioners should draft allegations against hospitals or clinics that are broad enough to encompass negligent staffing decisions, to guard against statute of limitations problems. A review of current case law on this point will be important as appellate courts frequently consider relation back as, in essence, a ruling on whether the statute of limitations has expired. Porter v. Decatur Mem. Hosp., 372 Ill. App. 3d 310, 867 N.E.2d 1049 (4th Dist. 2007).

Respondent in Discovery Approach. Counsel will likely encounter significant resistance to discovery requests related to physicians' lack of qualifications. The Medical Studies Act has long protected peer review and other such documents from viewing, and the fight over them is inevitably bitterly fought. Chicago Trust Co. v. Cook Co. Hosp., 298 Ill. App. 3d 396, 698 N.E.2d 641 (1st Dist. 1998); Ekstrom v. Temple, 197 Ill. App. 3d 120, 553 N.E.2d 424 (2d Dist. 1990). Thus, counsel may find it necessary to name Respondents in Discovery as a way to force expedited discovery. Under this statute, 735 ILCS 5/2-402, a limited six-month window is allowed to convert a Respondent to a Defendant, except where the Respondent has refused to comply with discovery. The trial court has no discretion to extend this six-month deadline. Robinson v. Johnson, 346 Ill. App. 3d 895, 907 (1st Dist. 2003). Therefore, an attorney may well consider naming at least one hospital, hospital administrator, or physician as a Respondent in Discovery, quickly to obtain facts needed to determine whether a physician has been improperly credentialed.

Jury Instruction Implications. When negligent credentialing is alleged, jury instructions will need to be tailored to this theory, as at present there are no IPI instructions specifically addressing it. In keeping with the Frigo court's analysis as to aggravation, the relatively new IPI 30.23 should be offered as should the IPI damages instructions as to aggravation (IPI 30.03), and a modified version of IPI 105.03.01 as to health care institutional negligence, tailored to describe this new tort. Caution should be used to allege adequately institutional professional negligence, however, and not only ordinary negligence, to which this instruction would not apply. Owens v. Manor Health Care Corp., 159 Ill. App. 3d 684, 512 N.E.2d 820 (4th Dist. 1987).

Extension to Other Disciplines. The Frigo decision opens the way for creative reference to non-traditional citing authority to argue a point of law for which there is no clear precedent from Illinois. The Frigo reliance on, and quotation from, A.L.R. and out-of-state cases illustrates that logical extension of existing case law to a new theory can occur when ample support from various sources is offered.

As such, practitioners are advised to consider the impact of the Frigo holding on other disciplines beyond physician malpractice and hospital negligence. For example, the reviewing physician's report statute, 735 ILCS 5/2-622, applies to various providers of health care, yet has been construed to not apply to nursing home malpractice cases. Eads v. Heritage Enters., 325 Ill. App. 3d 129, 757 N.E.2d 107 (4th Dist. 2001). Attorneys should consider whether an extension of the negligent credentialing theory should be argued as to other staffing decisions, such as the hiring of nurses, technicians, and other hospital or clinic employees who lack appropriate qualifications.

Cross References. See 735 ILCS 5/2-616(b); 735 ILCS 5/2-622; Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 30.21, Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 30.23, Illinois Forms of Jury Instruction § 62.12; Illinois Litigation Forms and Checklists C6.01; Parness, Illinois Civil Procedure Chapter 3, Pleading a Cause of Action: the Content and Form of Affirmative Pleadings and § 6.04, Amendments and Time Bars: Relation Back.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan M. Brazas is with the general practice law firm of Bolgrien, Koepke & Kimes, S.C., in South Beloit, Illinois and Beloit, Wisconsin. She represents plaintiffs and defendants in all areas of civil litigation in state and federal courts in Illinois and Wisconsin. Ms. Brazas is an author of the LexisNexis Illinois Forms and Illinois Checklists. She is an active member of the Illinois State Bar Association (ISBA), where she is Vice-Chair of the Civil Practice and Procedure Section Council. She also serves on the Character and Fitness Committee for the Illinois Board of Admissions to the Bar. Ms. Brazas is a frequent lecturer at ISBA seminars on civil practice topics such as jury instructions and civil practice case law developments.

90 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Gallagher v. Lenart, 226 Ill. 2d 208, 2007 Lexis 1150 (Ill. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 786

McDonnell on Gallagher v. Lenart, 226 Ill. 2d 208, 2007 Lexis 1150 (Ill. 2007)

By Joseph B. McDonnell

October 24, 2007

SUMMARY: Where a settlement contract in a workers compensation case recites that the consideration paid is in full and final settlement of all claims under the Workers Compensation Act and fails to preserve the employers lien rights against a third party recovery, has the employer waived its lien? The Illinois Supreme Court resorted to elementary principles of contract law and confirmed that a waiver must be clear and unmistakable from the language used and may not be inferred or implied.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Illinois Supreme Court resorted to elementary principles of contract law in determining whether an employer, who had obtained from its employee a release in full and final settlement of all claims under the Workers Compensation Act, had waived its statutory lien by failing to specifically reserve its lien rights in the settlement contract. In doing so, the Court confirmed that a waiver must be clear and unmistakable from the language used and may not be inferred or implied.

In Gallagher v. Lenart, 226 Ill. 2d 208 (Ill. 2007), the Court considered the language of the settlement contract and a resignation agreement signed by the employee at the same time in determining whether waiver of the employers right of reimbursement under Section 5(b) of the Workers Compensation Act, 820 ILCS 305/5(b), had occurred.

Background. Plaintiff Gallagher had sustained work-related injuries when the truck he was driving collided with another vehicle operated by Jaroslaw Lenart for his employer, Pacella Trucking. Gallaghers medical bills and TTD (temporary total disability) benefits were paid by Rail Terminal. He then settled with his employer for an additional $150,000 and the parties executed a settlement contract which recited that the consideration paid was accepted in full and final settlement of all claims under the Workers Compensation Act for injuries sustained in the accident. At the same time, Gallagher signed a letter of resignation from his employment, the letter stating in part that it was intended to resolve in good faith any existing or potential disputes or claims arising out of Employees relationship and separation with Employer.

Third-Party Suit by Employee. At the time these documents were signed, Gallaghers suit against Lenart and his employer, Pacella, for injuries and damages sustained in the accident, was pending. Rail Terminal had been sued by the defendants for contribution in that action, but its motion for summary judgment was allowed and it was no longer a party when Gallaghers settlement with the defendants was made. Rail Terminal sought leave to intervene in order to protect its statutory lien for benefits paid to Gallagher, under Section 5(b) of the Workers Compensation Act. 820 ILCS 305/5(b). That section provides in substance for the imposition of a lien on behalf of the employer against any settlement or judgment obtained by its employee against a third party. Both Gallagher and the defendants opposed the motion on the grounds that Rail Terminal had waived its lien in connection with the settlement of the workers compensation claim. The circuit court, relying on the First District case of Borrowman v. Prastein, 356 Ill. App. 3d 546 (2005), agreed and entered an order reciting that Rail Terminal had waived its lien by failing to reserve the lien in the settlement documents. The Fourth District reversed, finding Borrowman to have been wrongly decided and at odds with general principles of contract law. Plaintiffs petition for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court was allowed.

Contract principles applied. The Supreme Courts analysis focused on the contract language, and it considered both the settlement contract and the resignation letter in determining the issue before it. That issue, said the court, was not whether the employer had forfeited its lien, as inartfully phrased by the Fourth District in Borrowman and reiterated by the First District in its disposition below, but whether, based on the language of the contract and the resignation letter, the employer had waived its lien rights under 820 ILCS 305/5(b). Nor was the issue one of whether an employer could waive its lien by appropriate language. Waiver and forfeiture, the Court said, are distinct concepts, and the appellate court, by using the terms interchangeably, had obscured the issue. Indeed, said the Court, forfeiture, defined as a failure to make timely assertion of a right, was inapplicable in the instant case, since Rail Terminal had properly asserted its lien in the employees action in accordance with the statutory procedure for protecting an employers lien rights. The real question, then, was whether waiver had occurred by the employers failure to assert or at least to reserve its lien rights in the settlement documents.

The Supreme Court found that fundamental principles of contract law compelled the conclusion that no such waiver had occurred and that Rail Terminal was entitled to a lien on the settlement proceeds. Citing Home Insurance Co. v. Cincinnati Insurance Co., 213 Ill. 2d 307, 326 (2004), the court pointed out that waiver arises from an affirmative act, is consensual, and consists of an intentional relinquishment of a known right. Gallagher, slip op. at 17. Although plaintiff correctly characterized the employers alleged lien as a claim, the Court did not agree that such claim was included in the language full and final settlement of all claims under the Workers Compensation Act. When the contract as a whole was considered, it was apparent that the claims released were those of the employee, particularly since specific language in the contract referred to temporary total compensation, permanent partial disability and medical, surgical and hospital expenses. Thus, the parties did not contemplate and the settlement contract did not describe a claim by Rail Terminal to enforce its lien rights under 820 ILCS 305/5(b).

What about the general release rule? Plaintiff argued that the settlement contract constituted a general release; that Rail Terminal was aware of its employees pending injury claim when it settled with him; and that, since a general release is a release of all claims, the employers alleged lien rights were included in the contract language. The court answered this contention by again pointing out that the settlement contract was explicitly limited to the settlement of Gallaghers claims against his employer, and was therefore not a general release of the kind described in Farm Credit Bank of St. Louis v. Whitlock, 144 Ill. 2d 440 (1991). The court noted that, even if the contract were construed as a general release, it was not sufficiently specific to justify a conclusion that Rail Terminal had waived its workers compensation lien, because waiver of a workers compensation lien must be explicitly stated. Slip op. at 24. The Court adopted the language of the appellate court below, which had stated that waiver of a workers compensation lien must be more explicitly and affirmatively stated in a settlement agreement and cannot simply be implied by a lack of any reference to that lien. Slip op. at 24.

The Court then pointed out that the adoption of the explicit-waiver rule was consistent with those decisions which emphasize the importance of protecting the employers lien rights in litigation involving the plaintiff-employee and third parties. See, e.g., In re Estate of Dierkes, 191 Ill. 2d 326 (2000), holding that an employers reimbursement of workers compensation payments from an employees third-party recovery is crucial to the workers compensation scheme. [Courts emphasis].

The Court concluded by pointing out that the Fourth District Appellate Court, in deciding Borrowman v. v. Prastein, 356 Ill. App. 3d 546 (2005), had erred in failing to apply the fundamental principles of contract construction to the settlement contract at issue in that case. Instead of considering the contract in its entirety, it focused narrowly on the language full, final and complete settlement, overlooking language following that phrase which limited the claims to those which had accrued to the employee against his employer precisely the same limitation evidenced by the language in the case under consideration. Accordingly, the decision in Borrowman was expressly overruled.

The letter of resignation. Nor did the letter of resignation compel a different conclusion. In referring to the language of intent to resolve any existing or potential disputes or claims arising out of Employees relationship and separation with employer, the letter did not specifically limit the kinds of disputes or claims referred to, but, like the settlement contract, it contained no specific reference to the employers workers compensation lien. Thus, neither the settlement contract nor the resignation letter was sufficient to evince the intentional relinquishment of a known right necessary to find a waiver of the employers statutory lien rights.

Tips for Practitioners. To foreclose any claim that a settlement contract does not encompass claims of the party released, which might include a non-employer, it may be well to insert language specifically stating that rights belonging to or which may accrue to the settling defendant (e.g., claims for contribution or indemnity) are not affected by the settlement and are not intended by the parties to be included in the settlement. And, in the employer context, even though the language used by the parties withstood the plaintiffs challenge in Gallagher, the express reservation of the employers lien rights under the Workers Compensation Act should foreclose a contest on that issue.

Cross-References. See Larson's Workers' Compensation Law Part 13 (Ch.110 et seq.): Third Party Actions.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant States Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnells trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

91 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on Suffolk Construction Co., Inc v. Division of Capital Asset Management

2008 Emerging Issues 780

Garcia on Suffolk Construction Co., Inc v. Division of Capital Asset Management, 449 Mass. 444

By Grace V. B. Garcia

October 23, 2007

SUMMARY: Suffolk Construction teaches practitioners that rulings such as General Electric, which impact the work-product doctrine, do not as a matter of course affect the application or use of the attorney-client privilege. Practitioners must recognize that the two privileges give separate protections and know the limits of each in order to best represent their clients. In today's society, government officials and employees constantly seek the legal advice of counsel to ensure that their actions and inactions are in conformity with their public roles. By allowing such public servants the ability to have candid conversations with counsel, the public benefits because it is more likely that the public servants will obtain proper legal advice, thereby allowing them to better serve the public.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In Suffolk Construction Co., Inc. v. Division of Capital Asset Management, 449 Mass. 333 (2007), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court answered the question of whether by enacting the Massachusetts Public Records Law, the Legislature intended to extinguish the protection provided by the attorney-client privilege to public officers or employees and governmental entities subject to that law? By answering the question in the negative, the Court made it crystal clear that the attorney-client privilege is a fundamental privilege in both the private and public sector. Now government officials are assured that they can speak freely with their legal counsel, allowing them to obtain quality legal advice, which will not be subject to disclosure.

Resolving the issue required an analysis of the state Public Records Law, the importance of the attorney-client privilege in our society, and the difference between the attorney-client privilege and the work-product doctrine.

Massachusetts Public Records Law. Massachusetts Public Records Law, Mass. Gen. Laws. ch. 66, § 10, as supported by Gen. Laws. ch. 4, § 7, provides that upon request, anyone is entitled to obtain copies of a broad array of public records. The primary purpose of the Public Records Law is to allow the public to have extensive access to governmental records. Thus, an individual has the right to obtain public records whether they have an invested interest or are merely curious.

Although the Public Records Law is generally broad in nature, it does contain many clear exemptions to the government's obligation of disclosure. Some of the exemptions from disclosure include records related to personnel rules and practices of a government, personal notebooks, certain inter- and intra-agency policy position documents, trade secret information, and certain law enforcement investigations. See generally Cape Cod Times v. Sheriff of Barnstable County, 443 Mass. 587, 591-92, n.14 (2005) (listing various exemptions of the Public Records law). Thus, despite the fundamental mandates of open disclosure, the Law provides certain areas of protection that are often afforded to private persons and companies. Notable in the Public Records Law, however, is that there is no mention of the application of the attorney-client privilege.

Suffolk Construction Reiterates that the Attorney-Client Privilege is Essential. The attorney-client privilege is the oldest privilege covering confidential communications known to common law. It shields from the view of third parties all confidential communications between a client and its attorney undertaken for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. 443 Mass. at 448. The privilege is shown if one proves the following elements:

(1) that he was or sought to be a client of the attorney; (2) that the attorney in connection with the document acted as a lawyer; (3) that the document relates to facts communicated for the purpose of securing a legal opinion, legal services or assistance in a legal proceeding; and (4) that the privilege has not been waived.

Town of Norfolk v. U.S. Army Corp of Engrs., 968 F.2d 1438, 1457 (1st Cir. 1992). As the privilege can be waived simply by an intended disclosure, critical to the claimants burden of proof is that the communication was made confidentially in the course of obtaining legal advice.

For any person or entity that asserts the attorney-client privilege, public or private, he or she bears the burden of proof that the privilege exists. Specifically, one must not only prove the existence of the attorney-client relationship, but all four elements for the privilege listed above. See e.g. Matter of the Reorganization of Elec. Mut. Lia. Ins. Co. Ltd. (Bermuda), 425 Mass. 419, 421 (1997). At one time, once a document had become public, regardless of the circumstances, any privilege that attached to the documents was deemed waived. 425 Mass. at 422. However, as the privilege rests with the client, the modern trend is to protect the privilege provided the client and attorney took reasonable measures to ensure confidentiality. 425 Mass. At 422. Thus, practitioners must be sure to advise their clients on the scope of the attorney-client privilege and the clients responsibilities in protecting the privilege.

Confusion with the Work-Product Privilege. The confusion that led to Suffolk Construction Co., Inc., that is, whether the attorney-client privilege in Massachusetts had been abrogated in the realm of public records requests, was based on the Courts prior holding in General Electric Co. v. Department of Environmental Protection, 429 Mass. 798 (1999). In General Electric, the Supreme Judicial Court held that the Public Records Law did not automatically exempt work-product documents from disclosure, unless those documents fell within one of the explicit exemptions contained in the Public Records Law.

The work-product doctrine differs from the attorney-client privilege in that it restricts the discovery of documents that are prepared in anticipation of litigation or for trial by or for another party or by or for that other party's representative (including his attorney). Suffolk Constr. 449 Mass. at 455 n.16. Consequently, the work-product doctrine shields an entirely different and separate category of information than that of the attorney-client privilege. The work-product doctrine gives protections to an attorneys work product, which can be discoverable upon a showing of need. In comparison, the attorney-client privilege is a privilege that belongs to the client, not the attorney, and is enforceable even after the clients death.

In deciding General Electric, the Court reiterated the Public Records Laws presumption that a record is public unless the record is proven to be exempt. The Court, without opining why, deemed that the Legislatures intent was to abolish the broad work-product privilege and replace it with the narrower deliberative process exemption. Based on the Public Record Laws failure to contain a clear exemption for the attorney-client privilege, Suffolk Construction unsuccessfully attempted to use General Electric to argue that such documents should be disclosed.

The Courts Clear Answer. Based on the fundamental differences in the attorney-client privilege and the work-product doctrine, the Supreme Judicial Court distinguished General Electric in holding that public entities are entitled to assert the protection of the attorney-client privilege to the same extent as a private person or entity. In making its decision, the Court stated that there was no basis, in history or in the law, which would show any intent to abolish the privilege in the realm of public records requests. The attorney-client privilege is a basic, deep-seated, privilege that allows for the fair and effective administration of justice. Suffolk Const., 449 Mass. at 446. The privilege allows clients to tell their attorneys everything--the good, the bad, and the ugly--allowing the attorney to properly perform his or her duties and render legal advice based on the full information received by the client. By permitting candid conversation between attorneys and clients, the privilege advances the public interests in the observance of law and administration of justice. 449 Mass. at 449. Now practitioners can counsel all clients, private and public alike, on the attorney-client privilege and the broad protection that it affords.

Suffolk Construction teaches practitioners that rulings such as General Electric, which impact the work-product doctrine, do not as a matter of course affect the application or use of the attorney-client privilege. As such, practitioners must recognize that the two privileges give separate protections and know the limits of each in order to best represent their clients.

In today's society, government officials and employees constantly seek the legal advice of counsel to ensure that their actions and inactions are in conformity with their public roles. By allowing such public servants the ability to have candid conversations with counsel, the public benefits because it is more likely that the public servants will obtain proper legal advice, thereby allowing them to better serve the public.

Cross References. MA Pleading and Practice § 26.11, § 26.12

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcia's practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star. Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003). Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year. Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

92 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Fox on Arbitration

2008 Emerging Issues 777

Fox on Arbitration

By Susan Fox

October 22, 2007

SUMMARY: The Court of Appeal of Florida, Fifth District, enforced language in an arbitration clause requiring an arbitrator to determine the scope of arbitration rather than a court. The dissent in the opinion, however, strongly criticizes the majority and contends that the arbitration clause imposed upon the consumer was unconscionable and the result of a concerted effort by Mercedes Homes to preclude personal injury suits from proceeding to trial. Susan Fox, an expert on Florida civil procedure and appellate practice, explains the Mercedes Homes case in this commentary and the impact that the decision will have on the use of arbitration clauses in Florida.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Florida's Litigation Privilege Expands to Statutory Causes of Action. Lawyers and judges enjoy a litigation privilege and immunity from suit for actions that occur in judicial proceedings. Doubts as to the applicability of that privilege and immunity as to statutory causes of action were settled by Florida's supreme court in Echevarria, McCalla, Raymer, Barrett & Frappier v. Cole, 950 So. 2d 380 (Fla. 2007), on remand sub. nom. Cole v. Echevarria, McCalla, Raymer, Barrett & Frappier, 2007 Fla. App. LEXIS 15234, ____ So. 2d ____ (Fla. 1st DCA Sept. 28, 2007).

The underlying facts involve plaintiffs who defaulted on mortgage loans and received reinstatement letters from the Echevarria law firm representing mortgage holders. Echevarria's reinstatement letters stated the mortgagor faced foreclosure unless payments were brought up to date and certain additional costs were paid. Plaintiff Cole paid the disputed amounts to reinstate his mortgage, but two other plaintiffs did not reinstate their mortgages and were foreclosed. They all sued Echevarria, alleging the firm had violated the Florida Consumer Collection Practices Act (FCCPA) (See Fla. Stat. § 559.72 on prohibited practices for collecting consumer debts) and the Florida Unfair and Deceptive Trade Practices Act (FDUPTA) (Fla. Stat. § 501.201) by claiming a debt in excess of the actual costs their client incurred in the foreclosure. Specifically, the reinstatement letters claimed costs of $325 for title search and examination, when the only actual cost was $55 for the search. Plaintiffs sought to certify a class of all persons who received reinstatement letters. The trial court limited the class to those persons such as Cole who paid the costs but who did not ultimately suffer foreclosure judgment or sale.

Cole appealed to the First District, arguing the class definition was too narrow because it excluded landowners who received a reinstatement letter but who failed to reinstate and suffered foreclosure sale. Echevarria asserted that the trial court properly limited the class because of the litigation privilege barring claimants involved in judicial mortgage foreclosure actions from suing for conduct occurring in judicial proceedings. The First District found the litigation privilege did not apply because the suit was a statutory cause of action. Echevarria, McCalla, Raymer, Barrett & Frappier v. Cole, 896 So.2d 773, 777 (Fla. 1st DCA 2004). The First District reversed and remanded for expansion of the class to all those who received a reinstatement letter regardless of whether they reinstated the mortgage or suffered foreclosure. Id.

The Supreme Court, in a majority opinion written by Justice Anstead held that the litigation privilege applies in all causes of action, whether for common-law torts or statutory violations and quashed the decision of the First District. Echevarria, McCalla, Raymer, Barrett & Frappier v. Cole, 950 So. 2d 380 (Fla. 2007). As such, the court approved a conflicting decision of the Third District in Boca Investors Group, Inc. v. Potash, 835 So.2d 273 (Fla. 3d DCA 2002) which held that the litigation privilege can be applied to statutory causes of action. The case was remanded to the First District for further consideration; concurring and dissenting opinions strongly suggested the privilege did not apply to the pre-suit letters. On remand, the First District agreed and allowed the class action to go forward as to all who received reinstatement letters.

Echevarrias Real Impact on Immunity Under the Florida Litigation Privilege. The first issue addressed by the supreme court was application of the litigation privilege to statutory causes of action. The privilege was traditionally limited to defamation actions.

In the leading case of Hoar v. Wood, 44 Mass. 193 (1841), Chief Justice Shaw expressed the reasoning behind the privilege as follows: "Subject to this restriction (of relevancy), it is, on the whole, for the public interest, and best calculated to subserve the purposes of justice, to allow counsel full freedom of speech, in conducting the causes and advocating and sustaining the rights, of their constituents; and this freedom of discussion ought not to be impaired by numerous and refined distinctions." Id. at 197-198.

The rule was adopted in Florida in Myers v. Hodges, 53 Fla. 197, 44 So. 357 (1907), in which a libel suit for statements contained in a complaint was dismissed based on qualified litigation privilege. Later, the court extended the privilege to other tortious conduct, stating "absolute immunity must be afforded to any act occurring during the course of a judicial proceeding, regardless of whether the act involves a defamatory statement or other tortious behavior . . . so long as the act has some relation to the proceeding." Levin, Middlebrooks, Mabie, Thomas, Mayes Mitchell, P.A. v. United States Fire Insurance Co., 639 So.2d 606, 608 (Fla.1994). The justification behind immunizing "other misconduct occurring during the course of a judicial proceeding" was that adequate remedies exist for such misconduct. Levin, 639 So. 2d. at 608. These remedies include the trial court's contempt power, as well as the disciplinary measures of the court system and bar.

Following these decisions, courts in Florida had applied the litigation privilege in such diverse actions as civil conspiracy and tortious conduct in interfering with custody and visitation rights. See Van Horn v. McNabb, 715 So.2d 380, 381 (Fla. 4th DCA 1998); Rushing v. Bosse, 652 So.2d 869, 875-76 (Fla. 4th DCA 1995) (affirming a dismissal for a count of civil conspiracy, holding that "absolute immunity would be afforded to any conduct occurring during the course of the adoption proceeding, regardless of whether the conduct involved a defamatory statement or other tortious behavior"). Applying Florida law, federal courts have applied the privilege to civil fraud claims for fraudulent inducement in signing settlement agreements. See Green Leaf Nursery v. E.I. DuPont De Nemours & Co., 341 F.3d 1292, 1302-03 (11th Cir.2003); Jackson v. BellSouth Telecom., 372 F.3d 1250, 1275 -1277 (11th Cir.2004).

In extending the litigation privilege to all causes of action, the supreme court stated that the policy reasons focus on the judicial nature of the proceedings, not whether they were initiated under common law or statute. Echevarria, 950 So. 2d at 384. "It is the perceived necessity for candid and unrestrained communications in those proceedings, free of the threat of legal actions predicated upon those communications, that is at the heart of the rule." Therefore, the rationale upon which the court had relied in extending the litigation immunity privilege to all tortious causes of action, likewise applied to extending it to statutory causes of action: "Just as participants in litigation must be free to engage in unhindered communication, so too must those participants be free to use their best judgment in prosecuting or defending a lawsuit without fear of having to defend their actions in a subsequent civil action for misconduct." Id. Accordingly, the court ruled the litigation privilege applies across the board to actions in Florida, and absolute immunity attaches to all acts having a reasonable relation to the proceedings.

The case was remanded to the First District, to determine whether the case should proceed despite the litigation privilege. The separate opinions gave insight into some of the issues on remand. Primarily, the firm's liability would turn on whether the reinstatement letters are covered by the litigation privilege. Justice Parientes concurring opinion, in which Justice Cantero joined, states that the threshold issue is whether the reinstatement letters were sent "in the due course of the judicial proceedings or as necessarily preliminary thereto." Justice Wells concurred in part and dissented in part with an opinion stating that the litigation privilege does not extend to the reinstatement letters. Wells reasoned that the reinstatement letters were not a required condition precedent to foreclosure and were not related to the prosecution or defense of a foreclosure suit. Justice Bell seemed to agree with Justice Wells, but concurred in part and dissented in part without opinion.

On remand, the First District held the class action should go forward as to all who received the reinstatement letters without regard to the litigation privilege. "The causes of action for unfair debt collection and unfair trade practices are based on the act of making an unlawful demand in the reinstatement letter, not the ultimate consequence of the letter." Cole v. Echevarria, McCalla, Raymer, Barrett & Frappier, 2007 Fla. App. LEXIS 15234, ____ So. 2d ____ (Fla. 1st DCA Sept. 28, 2007). The court reasoned that whether or not the individual receiving the letter actually reinstated the mortgage would be immaterial because the act of sending the letter seeking to collect the unlawful charge triggers the violation of the FCCPA. With regard to FDUTPA, the prospective class member need not show payment of the illegitimate costs to demonstrate reliance. Rather, the operative event, was the transmission of the reinstatement letter.

Caution by Attorneys is Necessary Despite Echevarria Ruling. The court's decision and the opinion on remand makes clear that attorneys can be held liable for non-courtroom conduct, specifically, for unfair debt collection and unfair trade practices based on the act of making an unlawful or fraudulent demand in a pre-suit letter.

Moreover, the Florida Supreme Court's reasoning in Echevarria and Levin, and the holdings themselves, make clear that simply "relating to" the judicial proceeding is not enough to create litigation immunity. The allegedly tortious conduct must have been taken to prosecute or defend the lawsuit. When actions giving rise to claims have nothing to do with prosecution or defense of an adversary proceeding, the attorney may be liable. Clough Marketing Services, Inc. v. Main Line Corp, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34425 (N.D.Ga.2007) (allowing tort action arising out of a bankruptcy proceeding in which party shown as receiving funds in a settlement stipulation never received payment.)

Practice Tips

§ Pre-Suit Demands. Echeverria gave relief to Florida lawyers from FCCPA (Fla. Stat. § 559.55) and FDUTPA (Fla. Stat. § 501.201) claims arising out of lawsuits, but created a huge new area of potential liability. While statutory causes of action are not exempt from the litigation privilege, FCCPA and FDUTPA do create liability for illegitimate or unlawful pre-suit demands. The extent of this potential liability is not yet well defined, but caution should be taken in drafting letters making pre-suit demands for payment. These should not demand reimbursement of exaggerated, phantom or potentially illegitimate costs or fees. Pre-suit letters that are required by law may still be protected by the litigation privilege. For example, the Fourth District explained in Pledger v. Burnup & Sims, Inc., 432 So.2d 1323, 1326 (Fla. 4th DCA 1983) that publications necessarily preliminary to judicial proceedings include pre-suit communications that are required by statute or by contract as a condition precedent to suit are entitled to the privilege. Under this reasoning, necessary preliminary statements (i.e., demand letters, notices of intent to file suit, etc.) should be protected by the litigation privilege.

§ Communications Outside Judicial Proceedings. There appears to be no protection for voluntary statements that are not "necessary." As such, a variety of other conduct outside the courtroom might be implicated by the Echeverria decisions. For example: voluntary statements made to police prior to the instigation of criminal charges or to a government official on a matter factually related to the forthcoming lawsuit may be qualifiedly privileged, while voluntary statements to private individuals are not privileged at all. Fridovich v. Fridovich, 598 So.2d 65, 69 (Fla. 1992). Another ripe area for debate is whether the litigation privilege will be extended to "litigating in the press." Statements to the media prior to the initiation of any judicial proceedings might be actionable. On the other hand, some may argue that because of public expectations, media attention becomes part of the forum of litigation, and to deny litigants protection for statements made in this "forum" would contravene the policies of the litigation privilege.

For Additional Discussion on Immunity, see Florida Torts, § 5.08 Immunity Arising From Judicial Process (1-5 Florida Torts § 5.08).

For Additional Discussion on the Florida Unfair and Deceptive Trade Practices Act, see LexisNexis Practice Guide: Florida Business Torts, Chapter 2 Unfair Trade Practices (1-2 LN Practice Guide: FL Business Torts 2.01); also for a discussion on other state consumer protection laws see Business Torts, Chapter 19 State Consumer Protection Laws (2-19 Business Torts § 19.02).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan Fox is a principal in the law firm of Fox & Loquasto, P.A., (www.flappeal.com) located in Tampa, Florida. Ms Fox is Board Certified by The Florida Bar in Appellate Practice. She is a current member and the former Chair of the Appellate Practice Section of The Florida Bar, and serves on the Bars Appellate Practice Certification Committee. She practices almost exclusively in all phases of appellate court practice and complex litigation and has argued numerous cases before the Florida Supreme and Appellate District Courts. She has also served as a lecturer and author on the subject of Florida Appellate Practice for the Florida Bar. She is also privileged to have had several articles selected for publication in the Florida Bar Journal, including Susan Fox, Citation Form: Getting it Right. She is a graduate of the University of Florida, the University of Florida School of Law and was admitted to the practice of law in Florida in 1977. She can be contacted directly by phone at 813-251-6400 or by email at susan-fox@flappeal.com.

93 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Fox on Lawyer Immunity

2008 Emerging Issues 778

Fox on Lawyer Immunity

By Susan Fox

October 22, 2007

SUMMARY: Attorneys are generally aware of the litigation privilege and the protection it affords them when engaged in litigation. The Supreme Court of Floridas recent decision in Echevarria expanded the litigation privilege from common law causes of action to statutory causes of action as well. Susan Fox, expert on civil and appellate procedure, explains the implications of Echevarria on the litigation privilege and what precautions are needed to avoid attorney liability.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Home Warranties and Tort Claims. An innocent-sounding construction contract provision for a home warranty paid for by the builder and a separate warranty booklet containing an arbitration clause resulted in a decision compelling arbitration with regard to a homebuyers personal injury claim arising from negligent construction in Mercedes Homes, Inc. v. Colon, ___So. 2d ___, 2007 Fla. App. LEXIS 12347, (Fla. 5th DCA August 10, 2007). The Fifth District reversed the denial of the builders motion to compel arbitration and held that the arbitration agreement clearly and unmistakably required the arbitrator to decide, in the first instance, the scope of the arbitration provision and the enforceability of any limitation of the right to pursue a claim for personal injuries. A dissenting opinion strongly criticizes enforcement of the broad arbitration clause in the limited warranty and argued that arbitration clauses are being used as part of a scheme to eliminate corporate liability for negligence actions.

Luis Colon bought a home from Mercedes Homes, Inc. The construction contract called for Mercedes to, among other things, install sod. Sometime after moving in, Mr. Colon fell in his yard due to allegedly improperly laid sod. He filed a personal injury claim against Mercedes, which moved to compel arbitration. The construction contract itself did not contain an arbitration provision, but a warranty provided to the buyer months later included an arbitration clause. The warranty was a limited one and excluded negligence claims ("you are waiving your right to seek damages... [for] negligence and strict liability"). After Colon filed suit, the builder moved to compel arbitration. The trial court rejected this motion and stated that the issue whether the warranty documents constituted a waiver of any personal injury claim was an issue to be determined judicially, not an arbitration issue.

The arbitration clause at issue stated: "This arbitration agreement shall be deemed to be a self-executing arbitration agreement. Any disputes concerning the interpretation or enforceability of this arbitration agreement, including without limitation, its revocability or voidability for any cause, the scope of arbitrable issues, and any defense based upon waiver, estoppel or laches, shall be decided by the arbitrator."

The Fifth District reversed and held that the arbitration agreement required the arbitrator, not the trial court, to determine the scope of arbitrable issues, and thus, the builder's motion to compel arbitration with respect to Colons personal injury claim should have been granted. The court stated its ruling was "compelled" by the case of First Options of Chicago, Inc. v. Kaplan, 514 U.S. 938, 115 S.Ct. 1920, 131 L.Ed.2d 985 (1995), in which the Supreme Court had stated that "who" should decide the arbitrability of a dispute "is simply a matter of contract between the parties." First Options, 514 U.S. at 942, 115 S.Ct. 1920.

Since the language of the arbitration agreement clearly and unmistakably requires the arbitrator to decide, in the first instance, the scope of the arbitration provision and the enforceability of any purported limitation of Mr. Colon's right to pursue a claim for personal injuries, the Fifth District held the trial court erred in denying Mercedes' motion to compel arbitration.

The court also found support for its decision in the Second District's decision in Mercedes Homes, Inc. v. Rosario, 920 So.2d 1254 (Fla. 2d DCA 2006) involving the same home warranty and arbitration agreement but in which the buyers had sued for breach of contract and fraud. The Second District held that the trial court should have compelled arbitration because the arbitration agreement "clearly states that disputes regarding the interpretation of the arbitration clause, including the scope of arbitrable issues, will be decided by the arbitrator." Rosario, 920 So.2d at 1256 .

The majority rejected the dissents suggestion that, at the least, the court should remand the case to the trial court to consider the issue of unconscionability, stating "Colon's issues on appeal did not include an argument that the provision was unconscionable."

Judge Griffins Blistering Dissent. A lengthy dissent by former Chief Judge Jacqueline R. Griffin, expresses concern that individual consumers are being deceived into signing agreements that appear to benefit them but that actually waive important legal rights, deny access to courts, obligate consumers to pay "administrative costs" (arbitration fees) equally with the corporate seller, and give the seller undue advantage in selecting and influencing the arbitrator. In Judge Griffins words the scheme is one "whose ambitious end is the elimination of personal injury claims."

Judge Griffins dissent explains that this scheme involves three documents with "seemingly innocuous component[s]" which form a lethal combination constituting waiver, but in a way that would never be apparent to an average layperson. First, the construction contract gives the buyer a limited warranty. Second, after several months of delay, the buyer is asked to fill out an application for the warranty which, in the fine print, turns out to be a contract between buyer and seller and not a warranty. Third, additional provisions are attached in a 31 page warranty booklet in which the buyer agrees to arbitration and waives personal injury claims from the warranted items. "This is a key provision whose purpose is to transmogrify a warranty exclusion into a release." The separation in time and in different documents makes it hard to connect the dots and discover the waiver effect of the documents.

"A casual examination of these documents might lead a careless reader to think that, if the claim is for a personal injury and the warranty expressly excludes any claim for personal injury, there would be nothing to arbitrate." According to Judge Griffin, however, since it is clear that the claim is not covered by the warranty, it would make no sense that the question of whether the warranty operates as a bar to any personal injury claim would be decided in arbitration by the arbitrator. She felt that the court should have followed Nunez v. Westfield Homes of Florida, Inc., 925

So.2d 1108 (Fla. 2d DCA 2006) and Grosseibl v. J. Chris Howard Builders, 739 So.2d 1255, 1257 (Fla. 5th DCA 1999) holding that arbitration agreements placed in a separate warranty agreement do not cover any non-warranty disputes or require arbitration of non-warranty claims. These decisions should have compelled a conclusion that the personal injury claim was not arbitrable, Judge Griffin said.

Another key element to the scheme is to avoid court interpretation of the terms of the arbitration agreement because it would be "nearly impossible" to convince a court to view this series of documents as a release of liability for personal injury, according to Judge Griffin. The final and most important phase of the scheme is to "[f]ind a for-profit arbitration service with a serious-sounding name suggesting expertise . . . and specify them by name in the printed form contract . . . provid[ing] the economic incentive to rule in favor of the seller that is so woefully lacking in judicial proceedings."

Judge Griffin felt the majority's initial error lay in its application of the First Options v. Kaplan case (514 U.S. 938). Since the arbitration agreement contained in the purported third-party warranty must be confined to the warranty, in her opinion, the provision relied on by the majority gave the arbitrator the power to decide what is or is not within warranty arbitration, nothing more. Since Colon's claim was not a warranty claim, there was nothing for the arbitrator to decide.

Judge Griffin further criticized the courts failure to require that there be "clear and unmistakable" language indicating an agreement to arbitrate arbitrability. She stated a more correct resolution of this case may also be found in the Florida Supreme Court's decision, Seifert v. U.S. Home Corp., 750 So.2d 633 (Fla. 1999), deciding the arbitrability of a tort claim against a home builder for the negligent design and construction of an air conditioning system that pulled in carbon monoxide from the garage into the house, causing personal injury. The duty of reasonable care at issue was a duty owed generally to anyone who might foreseeably be injured, not just the other contracting party. Thus, the tort claim was not covered by the arbitration provision in the contract for the purchase and sale of the home, according to the Seifert court.

Strategic Considerations.

. Counsel for Individual Home Buyers. If possible, counsel clients during the purchase of a new home or other big ticket items on some of the potential pitfalls of the various home warranty and other warranty documents being used. However, in most instances by the time an attorney gets involved on the consumer side it is too late to counsel a client not to sign a limited warranty containing an arbitration clause. At this stage, about the only thing a lawyer can do under Mercedes is to challenge the unconscionability of brazenly loaded warranties that denigrate the legal rights of consumers. Provisions such as allowing the seller to pick who gets to be the arbitrator; when, where, how much it costs; what claims are excluded; what damages are excluded; what statutory remedies are excluded; what discovery is allowed; what notice provisions are required; what shortened statutes of limitation apply; what prerequisites even to the right to arbitrate are all tilted in the sellers favor; and waivers and releases buried in fine print. As Judge Griffin points out, one commentator famously remarked that the complete embrace of arbitration provisions would allow "birds of prey" to "sup on workers, consumers, shippers, passengers and franchisees." This court dodged the issue of unconscionability finding it was not adequately argued on appeal, therefore, a lawyer challenging such agreements would have to make a direct challenge that could not be side-stepped.

. Counsel for Corporations and Businesses Using Arbitration Clauses. Business interests that favor the use contracts containing arbitration clauses will find a certain level of relief in the Mercedes decision. However, Judge Griffin in her dissent has clearly placed on notice her discern for contracts drafted using the broadest possible arbitration language buried in innocent or advantageous-sounding fine print in warranty or other related documents. Judge Griffins dissent in all likelihood will be favored in other corners of the judiciary as well. Needless to say, this issue should be a fertile one for future judicial and legislative action. In fact, legislative action may be on the way for consumers. United States Sen. Ted Kennedy, Sen. Russ Feingold and Rep. Hank Johnson have proposed a bill that would eliminate pre-dispute binding mandatory arbitration clauses in consumer contracts, entitled The Arbitration Fairness Act of 2007 (2007 Bill Tracking H.R. 3010 and 2007 Bill Tracking S. 1782).

. Arbitration Alternatives. Lawyers who draft arbitration provisions and those who represent consumers might also want to look at James v. Zachritz, 2006 OK CIV APP 46 (Okla. Ct. App. 2006). In this Oklahoma case, the parties had a valid arbitration agreement, apparently using the AAA commercial rules, but the plaintiff sought relief in the state small claims court under AAA commercial rules, Section R-1, stating: "Consumers are not prohibited from seeking relief in small claims court for disputes or claims within the scope of its jurisdiction, even in consumer arbitration cases by the business." The Oklahoma court held that, "the provision of the AAA allowing small claims in consumer cases is consistent with public policy favoring arbitration and we find no reason to interfere with the parties' agreement to apply the AAA rules." In Florida "small claims" are those in which the demand or value of property involved does not exceed $5,000 exclusive of costs, interest, and attorneys' fees. Fla. Sm. Cl. R. 7.010. This monetary limitation on damages may be more acceptable to both parties than a referral to arbitration. The cost of a small claims proceeding can be significantly lower than the fee of a paid arbitrator.

For Additional Information on Arbitration, see LexisNexis Practice Guide: Florida Contract Litigation, Chapter 5: Determining Whether to Pursue Alternative Dispute Resolution or Litigate, 1-5 LN Practice Guide: FL Contract Litigation 5.syn; LexisNexis Practice Guide: Florida Business Torts, Chapter 2 Unfair Trade Practices, 2.21 Evaluate Arbitration Clause, 1-2 LN Practice Guide: FL Business Torts 2.21; Florida Torts, § 26.37 Arbitration of Fraud Claims, 1-26 Florida Torts § 26.37; Murray on Contracts, Chapter 6 Abuse of Bargain, Unconscionability, Good Faith, and Illegality, 1-6 Murray on Contracts § 95.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan Fox is a principal in the law firm of Fox & Loquasto, P.A., (www.flappeal.com) located in Tampa, Florida. Ms Fox is Board Certified by The Florida Bar in Appellate Practice. She is a current member and the former Chair of the Appellate Practice Section of The Florida Bar, and serves on the Bars Appellate Practice Certification Committee. She practices almost exclusively in all phases of appellate court practice and complex litigation and has argued numerous cases before the Florida Supreme and Appellate District Courts. She has also served as a lecturer and author on the subject of Florida Appellate Practice for the Florida Bar. She is also privileged to have had several articles selected for publication in the Florida Bar Journal, including Susan Fox, Citation Form: Getting it Right. She is a graduate of the University of Florida, the University of Florida School of Law and was admitted to the practice of law in Florida in 1977. She can be contacted directly by phone at 813-251-6400 or by email at susanfox@flappeal.com.

94 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on Miller v. Highland County

2008 Emerging Issues 775

Sinclair on Miller v. Highland County, 274 Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, 2007 Va. LEXIS 119 (2007)

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

October 19, 2007

SUMMARY: In a broad-ranging decision that clarifies Virginia law considerably in the area of challenges to land use decisions of localities, the Supreme Court teaches us the ways that important canons of statutory construction should be used in analyzing who is intended under modern legislation to be the party-defendant in land use decision challenges. The limitation of declaratory judgment relief is applied in yet another context in this opinion as well, making it doubly important for practitioners. This commentary, written by Professor Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison, delves into the implications of this decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: One of the perennial traps in Virginia practice involves commencing suit against the wrong party. All too often, the result is that the suit is a nullity, or fails to toll the running of the statute of limitations. A second trap that has ensnared a number of practitioners in the last 10 years involves divining when declaratory relief may be sought in Virginia. This highly restricted form of relief, subject to narrow interpretation in Virginia, as exemplified in a series of decisions over the past decade.

In a broad-ranging decision that clarifies Virginia law considerably in the area of challenges to land use decisions of localities, the Supreme Court teaches us the ways that important canons of statutory construction should be used in analyzing who is intended under modern legislation to be the party-defendant in land use decision challenges. The limitation of declaratory judgment relief is applied in yet another context in this opinion as well, making it doubly important for practitioners.

In its 2007 decision in Miller v. Highland County, the Supreme Court heard appeals challenging a county board of supervisors' approval of a conditional land use permit. After a statutory analysis that has revealing implications for future cases, the Court holds that the county board is itself a required party defendant one that must be timely joined. The Court further holds that Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232 does not create a third-party right of action to challenge a planning commissions determination that a proposed use is in substantial accord with a comprehensive plan. The consequences were severe: The judgment in the first appeal was reversed and the case dismissed for failure to timely join the board. In the other collected appeal, the court sets forth the requirements for asserting a valid request for declaratory relief, and in a rare move in Virginia affirms the granting of summary judgment for a permit applicant and the county board because plaintiffs, who were adjoining landowners of the property being considered in the land use dispute, failed to assert a valid request for declaratory relief. Among the statutes construed in important ways in this decision are the misnomer provisions of Va. Code Ann. §8.01-6; land use provisions and procedural concepts embodied in Va. Code Ann. §§ 15.2-2232 and Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285, and the statutes governing declaratory judgments in Virginia, Va. Code Ann. §§ 8.01-184 et seq.

Factual Background. Leading to these collected appeals, a wind-power development concern applied to the county for a conditional use permit to build an electric generation substation. After conducting a public hearing, the county's governing board granted the permit, finding that it was compatible with surrounding uses, consistent with the intent of the zoning ordinance and the land use element of the comprehensive plan, and that it would be in compliance with all other statutes and ordinances.

In the Miller case, the county boards resolution conditioned the permit upon receipt of all required state and federal approvals and review pursuant to Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232. Several months later, upon application of the permit applicants, the planning commission held a public hearing and reviewed the permit under Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232, determining that it was in "substantial accord with the comprehensive plan as required by Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232.

Plaintiffs in the first two cases reviewed on appeal in Miller v. Highland County were owners of property adjoining the proposed wind turbine site. They brought suit alleging that the board acted in an arbitrary and capricious manner, and without authority, in approving the zoning height amendment. Some of the plaintiffs argued that the "substantial accord" finding must precede board action in order for the approval to be valid.

All of these plaintiffs in Miller filed pleadings in which they named Highland County, Virginia as a defendant in the bill of complaint, and one did not also name the county board as a party. All parties filed motions for summary judgment and, after conducting a hearing, the circuit court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the county and the permit applicants. After a trial the court upheld the county's action.

In a separate declaratory judgment action also reviewed in the Miller appeal, other nearby residents sued the county board, and other defendants, for declaratory relief on the theory that planning commission's decision that the application was in substantial accord with the comprehensive plan was not properly before the commission after the county board's action, and that the commission's decision was not in accord with governing law, with the comprehensive plan, and was arbitrary, capricious and void. The circuit court held a hearing and granted summary judgment in favor of the permit applicant and the county without addressing the issue of whether Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232 provided a right of action permitting the commission's decision to be challenged.

How Separate is The County from The County Board? A key issue in the Miller case was whether the circuit court erred in denying the defense plea in bar. That plea was interposed on the basis of the plaintiffs failure to name the county board itself as a party to the action within 30 days after the Boards decision as required by Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285 (F). The plea contended that the Supreme Courts well-known decision in Friends of Clark Mountain Found., Inc. v. Board of Supervisors, 242 Va. 16, 406 S.E.2d 19 (1991), essentially held that a local governing body is a required party to an action contesting a decision by that governing body. Thus the case was barred, according to the plea in bar, because the named defendant, Highland County, Virginia is not the legal equivalent of the Board of Supervisors of Highland County, because Highland County is a locality, while the Board is a governing body.

The plaintiffs in Miller argued that Highland County, Virginia is a locality as defined by Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-102, and that Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-1404 subjects a locality to being sued in its own name regarding all matters connected with its duties. On this theory, Va. Code Ann. §15.2-2285(F) would not mandate that a local governing body be named in an action challenging one of its decisions, but only requires that such an action be filed within 30 days of the local governing bodys decision.

The Court had previously held in Board of Supervisors v. Board of Zoning Appeals, 268 Va. 441, 604 S.E.2d 7 (2004), that a person aggrieved by a local governing bodys decision may, pursuant to Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-1404, contest that decision by naming the locality as the defendant.

How to Parse These Statutes. As always in Virginia appeals, the reviewing court views the interpretation of statutory provisions to be a pure question of law that the court is permitted to reconsider de novo on appeal, as the Court recently held in Budd v. Punyanitya, 273 Va. 583, 591, 643 S.E.2d 180, 184 (2007), and Boynton v. Kilgore, 271 Va. 220, 227, 623 S.E.2d 922, 925 (2006). Thus, effective arguments will turn most upon statutory construction and less on precedent.

Boilerplate case law, such as Chase v. DaimlerChrysler Corp., 266 Va. 544, 547, 587 S.E.2d 521, 522 (2003), and Halifax Corp. v. First Union National Bank, 262 Va. 91, 99, 546 S.E.2d 696, 702 (2001), has made it clear that the resolution of issues such as these will be cast in terms of a determination of the legislative intent a matter the Court bases upon the literal words used in the statute. Examples of this approach prior to Miller include Crawford v. Haddock, 270 Va. 524, 528, 621 S.E.2d 127, 129 (2005), and Woods v. Mendez, 265 Va. 68, 74, 574 S.E.2d 263, 266 (2003).

One of the most common situations involves multiple statutes that arguably apply to aspects of the same transaction. In Miller the Supreme Court reiterates its general canon of construction that when construing statutes that impact the same subject, the putatively conflicting provisions are harmonized whenever possible. This approach is well established, as Peerless Ins. Co. v. County of Fairfax, 274 Va. 236, 244, 645 S.E.2d 478, 483 (2007), Alliance to Save the Mattaponi v. Commonwealth, 270 Va. 423, 439-440, 621 S.E.2d 78, 87 (2005), and the cases therein cited demonstrate.

In Miller the Court concludes that, as employed in the statutes relevant to the land use dispute before it, the terms locality and board of supervisors are not synonymous or interchangeable. The Supreme Court noted that Title 15.2 of the Code, Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-100 et seq., which addresses the matters raised in these appeals, provides distinct definitions of the two terms. A locality, within the meaning of Title 15.2, must be construed to mean a county, city, or town as the context may require according to Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-102. In contrast, under that same section of the Code the term [b]oard of supervisors refers to the governing body of a county.

The Court in Miller demonstrated that comparison of provisions governing other topics can provide useful demonstrations of the meaning of terms under dispute. Thus the Court noted that Title 15.2 contains several additional statutes that illustrate the General Assembly's intent to recognize governing bodies as entities distinct from their respective localities. These statutes clarify that although localities are given certain powers by statute, those powers may only be exercised through the authority of the governing bodies. For example, Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-1401 provides that, generally, all powers granted to localities shall be vested in their respective governing bodies.

What is the Governing Body? The Supreme Court found that particularly applicable to the subject area of the Miller appeal, Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-1425 gives the governing body of each locality the authority to adopt, as appropriate, ordinances, resolutions and motions. Thus, while providing that [a]ny locality may, by ordinance, classify the territory under its jurisdiction for purposes of land use, Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2280, the General Assembly has vested the actual power to make such decisions in each locality's governing body.

Under these provisions, and Va. Code Ann. §§ 15.2-1401 and Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-1425, the Supreme Court concluded that the governing body of a locality is a distinct legal entity authorized in Title 15.2 to exercise the statutory powers of that locality.

On that building block, the Court turned to the question whether this distinct legal entity must be joined as a party defendant in a legal action contesting its legislative exercise of a zoning power, focusing on the language of Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F), under which the Miller litigation was filed contesting the board's decision granting the requested permission. This key statutory provision states:

Every action contesting a decision of the local governing body adopting or failing to adopt a proposed zoning ordinance or amendment thereto or granting or failing to grant a special exception shall be filed within 30 days of the decision with the circuit court having jurisdiction of the land affected by the decision. However, nothing in this subsection shall be construed to create any new right to contest the action of a local governing body.

Obviously, in drafting Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F), the General Assembly employed plain language in providing a right of appeal from various zoning decisions of a local governing body. The statute fixes a 30-day period from the date of the decision by the local governing body for filing an action in the circuit court contesting such decision. In that context the Court noted the complete absence of any language in Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F) referring to a locality as indicating a legislative intent that only the governing body, the entity that rendered the contested decision, be a required party defendant in an action challenging that decision.

In large measure, this outcome is consistent with the well-known Friends of Clark Mountain decision (construing a predecessor statute to current Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F)). Looking back on that decision, and on its intervening decision in Riverview Farm Assocs. v. Board of Supervisors, 259 Va. 419, 426, 528 S.E.2d 99, 102103 (2000), the Court in the recent Miller appeal found the precedent clear that a local governing body is a required party defendant to an action brought under Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F) contesting certain types of zoning decisions, including the type at issue here, made by the governing body.

General Versus Specific Laws Which One Controls? Alternative statutes, such as the provision in Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-1404, which details the manner in which an action may be brought against a locality, and speaks in terms of a localities power to sue or be sued in its own name in relation to all matters connected with its duties, is deemed a general provision, which must yield under the principle that more specific legislation will be applied where there are both general and specific provisions touching upon a subject. Here the general provision did not address the issue whether a board of supervisors is a required party defendant in a legal action contesting that boards exercise of its legislative power, but merely states that a locality may be a plaintiff or be named as a defendant in a legal action involving the localities duties.

A similar fate met arguments that service of process provision in Va. Code Ann. §§ 15.2-1404 and Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-300 affect this issue. The Court held that those statutes actually manifest the Legislatures intent that a locality and its governing body are not interchangeable terms but have separate legal identities that must be observed in initiating an action against either as a party defendant in a legal action.

Holding on Suing Counties. Based on our consideration of the several statutes its prior decision in Friends of Clark Mountain, the Court in Miller concluded that in an action under Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F) contesting a decision of a local governing body, that body is a required party defendant against whom suit must be initiated within the time limit specified in the statute. Thus, the Court holds that the Board was a required party defendant to Millers action.

Misnomer is No Help in Such Situations. The Court underscored the seriousness of a failure to name the correct party in Virginia, by finding that a subsequent correction to add the Board as a party to the present appeal or to correct as a misnomer the naming of Highland County, Virginia and name the Board in Highland Countys stead was unavailable. Even if such remedies could in some cases be employed on appeal which the Court expressly declined to address it found that the misnomer remedy is inappropriate here. Because the board was a required party to Millers action under Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F), the board could not be added as a party after the 30-day period from the date of the Boards decision had run. As in the leading cases where plaintiff lacks standing, such as Braddock, L.C. v. Board of Supervisors, 268 Va. 420, 426, 601 S.E.2d 552, 555 (2004) (action filed by person without standing is nullity and could not be resurrected by addition of parties after 30-day period set by Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2285(F) had expired), or Harmon v. Sadjadi, 273 Va. 184, 198, 639 S.E.2d 294, 301302 (2007) (action filed by person without standing was nullity and did not toll applicable statute of limitations), the effect here is also fatal.

The Court holds that the plaintiffs could not employ the statutory remedy provided by Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-6 for correcting a misnomer because, under traditional case law going back for a century and recently summarized in Cook v.

Radford Cmty. Hosp., Inc., 260 Va. 443, 451, 536 S.E.2d 906, 910 (2000) (citing cases), a misnomer occurs when the right person or entity is incorrectly named. In the present case, by contrast, the plaintiff neighbors did not incorrectly name the right entity, but named a different entity. Therefore, the Supreme Court holds that it was error for the circuit court to deny the plea in bar, and the appeal was dismissed.

Declaratory Relief Also Elusive. Several other landowners who own property near the wind turbine project site had filed a motion for declaratory judgment in the circuit court, and they did name the county as a party defendant. While they avoided the fatal defect of failing to name the necessary entity as a defendant, their case founders because of the narrow scope of declaratory relief in Virginia.

Here the declaratory action sought to invalidate the planning commissions determination that permission to go forward with the project was in substantial accord with Highland Countys comprehensive plan. These plaintiffs asked the circuit court to declare that the planning commission did not have jurisdiction or authority to review the conditional use permit after it was issued by the board. Alternatively, they asked the circuit court to declare, among other things, that the planning commission decision was not in accord with law, was not in accord with the existing County comprehensive plan, and was arbitrary and capricious, and void. While the defendants challenged the right of these plaintiffs to bring any such action, the trial court sidestepped the declaratory judgment arguments and granted summary judgment for the defense on the merits.

On appeal, however, the Supreme Court turned immediately to the assignment of cross-error arguing that these plaintiffs action was barred because Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232 does not create a private third-party right of action to challenge a planning commissions finding that a proposed use is in substantial accord with a comprehensive plan. The Highland County Board pointed out in its brief on appeal that under Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232(B) only a property owner who has been denied a conditional use permit may appeal a planning commissions substantial accord determination, and that this right of appeal lies only to the local governing body. These contentions rested heavily on the Courts decision three years before in Shilling v. Jimenez, 268 Va. 202, 597 S.E.2d 206 (2004).

It was conceded that there is no specific statutory right to appeal a decision by the planning commission. However, these plaintiffs used that fact to support an argument that because of the absence of other remedies a declaratory judgment action provides the only mechanism for review of the planning commission determination at issue. Thus they sought to place this case in the general pattern of prior Supreme Court decisions holding that only where there are no traditional causes of action that will provide a remedy is recourse to declaratory relief permitted in Virginia.

A circuit court has the power to issue declaratory judgments under Va. Code Ann. §§ 8.01-184 through Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-191. Pursuant to this authority, circuit courts may make binding adjudications of right in cases of actual controversy when there is antagonistic assertion and denial of right. The provisions of Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-184 and related sections have been extensively construed in recent years in leading cases that include Hoffman Family, L.L.C. v. Mill Two Assocs. Pship, 259 Va. 685, 692, 529 S.E.2d 318, 323 (2000); Blue Cross & Blue Shield v. St. Marys Hosp., 245 Va. 24, 35, 426 S.E.2d 117, 123 (1993); and Erie Ins. Group v. Hughes, 240 Va. 165, 170, 393 S.E.2d 210, 212 (1990).

Declaratory Relief in Virginia. The purpose of the declaratory judgment statutes is to provide a mechanism for resolving uncertainty in controversies over legal rights, without requiring one party to invade the asserted rights of another in order to permit an ordinary civil action for damages. A key Code provision creating this cause of action is Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-191, and it has been construed in numerous cases as creating a limited charter to obtain declaratory relief. Case law on this topic was summarized in some detail in Hoffman, 259 Va. 685, 693, 529 S.E.2d 318, 323.

In Virginia, therefore, the remedy that may be obtained in a declaratory judgment action is preventive relief, available upon assertion of an actual controversy, as illustrated in Chaffinch v. Chesapeake & Potomac Tel. Co., 227 Va. 68, 72, 313 S.E.2d 376, 378 (1984), and Williams v. Southern Bank of Norfolk, 203 Va. 657, 662, 125 S.E.2d 803, 807 (1962).

In its recent Miller decision the Supreme Court stresses that Virginias declaratory judgment statutes do not create or alter any substantive rights, or bring any other additional rights into being. The intent of the declaratory judgment statutes is not to give parties greater rights than those which they previously possessed, but to permit the declaration of those rights before they mature. In other words, the intent of the act is to have courts render declaratory judgments which may guide parties in their future conduct in relation to each other, thereby relieving them from the risk of taking undirected action incident to their rights, which action, without direction, would jeopardize their interests.

In this aspect of the appeals reviewed in Miller, the Court concluded that the pleadings filed by the second group of neighbors did not assert a valid request for declaratory relief because, among other reasons, the pleadings do not seek preventive relief but effectively attempt to create a right of appeal that does not exist by statute.

Va. Code Ann. § 15.2-2232, which addresses the planning commissions duty to render a substantial accord determination in certain cases, provides in what the Court now labels plain language that only the owner of the property at issue, or the owners agent, may appeal to the governing body from a substantial accord determination of the planning commission. Notably, the statute does not provide third parties with a right of appeal from such a determination.

Thus the Court emphasizes in Miller a general restriction on declaratory judgment in Virginia arising from the fact that the statutes creating the declaratory judgment remedy may not be used to attempt a third-party challenge to a governmental action when such a challenge is not otherwise authorized by statute. This decision was foreshadowed in Shilling, 268 Va. 202, 205206, 597 S.E.2d 206, 208, where a neighboring landowner filed a declaratory judgment action asking a circuit court to declare void the creation of a certain family subdivision approved under an ordinance permitting conveyances to members of a landowners immediate family, contending that the subdivision was wrongfully approved by local officials based on misrepresentations of fact made by the applicant. In Shilling the Court had said, 268 Va. 202, 208, 597 S.E.2d 206, 209210, that the complainants did not have a third-party right of action to enforce a countys application of its subdivision ordinance in a declaratory judgment suit when there was no specific statutory authorization allowing third parties this right.

Miller applies this same rationale, concluding that the declaratory judgment statutes are not intended to provide, and do not create, a right of appeal that does not otherwise exist. In attempting to create such a right the second group of neighbors failed to state a cause of action. Thus the circuit court erred in concluding that these parties had a right to bring an action in the circuit court challenging the planning commissions substantial accord determination.

As a result of these holdings, both sets of neighbors who attempted to sue challenging the conditional use permit at issue in Miller were barred from relief.

Cross-References Research Leads

For an overview on parties and necessary parties, see Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.) Chapter 5 (Parties) and § 5.17 (Misjoinder and Nonjoinder). See generally Virginia Benchbook Civil, Chapter 1 § V (Parties). See also Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2006), Chapter 5 (Parties) and § 5.02 (Necessary Parties).

An overview of the Virginia law of "misnomer, including the statutory embodiment of these principles in Code § 8.01-6 can be found in Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.) Chapter 5 (Parties) and § 5.8 (Misnomer). See also Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2006), Chapter 5 (Parties) and § 5.08 (Misnomer).

Background on declaratory relief in Virginia, with its unique limitations, can be found in Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.) Chapter 3 (Remedies in Virginia Practice), and § 3.10 (Declaratory Relief). See Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2006), Chapter 30 (Declaratory Judgments). See also John Costello, Virginia Remedies, Chapter 16 (Ancillary Remedies) and § 16.09 (Declaratory Judgment).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). Both are treatises on Virginia law published by Lexis Law Publishing. Professor Sinclair is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Advance Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

95 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bowman on Protecting New Clients Interests

2008 Emerging Issues 770

Bowman on Protecting New Clients Interests

By Addison M. Bowman

October 18, 2007

SUMMARY: Hawaii Rule of Professional Conduct 1.9(a) protects the confidential information of a lawyers former client. Addison M. Bowman discusses the necessity to protect a new client whose interests in a proposed representation are adverse to the current interests of the lawyers former client, who is a party in the present matter.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Summary

Hawaii Rule of Professional Conduct 1.9(a) protects the confidential information of a lawyers former client. Addison M. Bowman discusses the necessity to protect a new client whose interests in a proposed representation are adverse to the current interests of the lawyers former client, who is a party in the present matter.

Analysis

Background. The principal obligation that a lawyer owes to a former client is to protect the former clients confidential information, and this obligation informs HRPC 1.9(a): A lawyer who has formerly represented a client in a matter shall not thereafter represent another person in the same or a substantially related matter in which that persons interests are materially adverse to the interests of the former client unless the former client consents after consultation. The point of rule 1.9(a) is that the former clients confidences are likely to be relevant and potentially usable in any new litigation matter or transaction that is substantially related to the former clients matter, and the posture of the new or prospective client, who the rule assumes is now opposing the lawyers former client, creates an incentive for the lawyer to exploit the former clients confidences against the former client in the course of representing the new client. See Otaka, Inc. v. Klein, 71 Haw. 376, 386, 791 P.2d 713, 718-19 (1990) (old Canon 4, pre-HRPC analysis).

Rule 1.9(a), which codifies Otaka, forbids any such new engagement without the former clients consent. Rule 1.9, however, is devoted entirely to protection of the former client and does not address potential disadvantages to current clients in instances where lawyers obtain their former clients consent and then proceed against them.

The problem. Lawyer intends to represent New Client in a matter that is substantially related to Former Clients matter, and Former Client is an adverse party in the current proceeding or transaction. Rule 1.9(a) requires Lawyer to decline the new representation unless the former client consents after consultation. As Comment [12] to rule 1.9 points out, Disqualification from subsequent representation is for the protection of former clients and can be waived by them. Accordingly, Lawyer solicits and obtains Former Clients consent. The questions treated in this commentary all concern the necessity to protect New Client in these circumstances: Will it be necessary to obtain New Clients informed consent? What should be the content of the consultation with New Client? What is the stuff of New Clients consent?

The HRPC 1.9(a), 1.7(b) paradigm. A lawyers current client opposes that lawyers former client in a matter that is substantially related to the subject matter of the representation of the former client. Rule 1.9(a), solicitous of the former clients confidences, prohibits the new representation unless the former client consents. But if the lawyer proceeds with the new clients matter, either with the former clients consent or without consent in violation of rule 1.9, then the new client is at risk because of the lawyers continuing obligations and loyalty to the former client. See, e.g., In re Roseland Oil & Gas, Inc., 68 S.W.3d 784, 788 (Tex. App. 2001) (discussing precarious position in which [a lawyer] may be forced to make the choice between zealously representing his clients and maintaining the confidentiality of information received from his former clients); C. Wolfram, Modern Legal Ethics 362 (1986) (The threat of treachery is directed not only at former clients. . . . Most obviously, if a lawyer attempts to protect the . . . interests of the former client, the second client will receive only a hobbled representation).

The risk to the current client occasioned by loyalty to a former client triggers the application of Haw. Rule of Prof'l Conduct 1.7(b), requiring that the lawyer, at a minimum, obtain the current clients informed consent before proceeding against the former client:

A lawyer shall not represent a client if the representation of that client may be materially limited by the lawyers responsibilities to another client or to a third person, or by the lawyers own interests, unless: (1) the lawyer reasonably believes the representation will not be adversely affected; and (2) the client consents after consultation. . . .

Comment [4] to rule 1.7 explains: Loyalty to a client is also impaired when a lawyer cannot consider, recommend or carry out an appropriate course of action for the client because of the lawyers other responsibilities or interests. The conflict in effect forecloses alternatives that would otherwise be available to the client.

In the problem presented here, the anticipated material limitation that could adversely affect the representation of New Client arises from the possibility that Lawyers loyalty to her Former Client may cause her to pull her punches against Former Client, either because Former Clients consent may have been inadequately informed or because friendship with and loyalty to Former Client may adversely affect Lawyers representation of New Client in some previously unforeseen manner.

ABA and ALI approaches. ABA Model Rule of Professional Conduct 1.7(a)(2) forbids representation of a current client whenever there is a significant risk that the representation . . . will be materially limited by the lawyers responsibilities to another client, a former client or a third person unless each affected client gives informed consent, confirmed in writing. Prior to 2002, when this rule was amended by the ABA, it read just as HRPC 1.7(b) still reads. Indeed, MRPC 1.7 was the original model for HRPC 1.7, following the Hawaii drafters general practice to adopt the ABA model rule whenever feasible. That the rule 1.9(a)/1.7(b) paradigm that is the subject of this commentary was one target of the 2002 amendment to ABA model rule 1.7 is confirmed in the ABA comment: In addition to conflicts with other current clients, a lawyers duties of loyalty and independence may be materially limited by responsibilities to former clients under rule 1.9 or by the lawyers responsibilities to other persons

The American Law Institute, in its Restatement of the Law Third, The Law Governing Lawyers § 132 (2000), offers its rule 1.9 counterpart, entitled, A Representation Adverse to the Interests of a Former Client:

Unless both the affected present and former clients consent to the representation . . . a lawyer who has represented a client in a matter may not thereafter represent another client in the same or a substantially related matter in which the interests of the former client are materially adverse.

The Restatement comment explains:

[A] substantial risk of material and adverse effect . . . to the interests of the present client [can arise] because of the lawyers continuing duties to a former client The lawyers obligations to the former client might constrain the lawyer in representing the present client effectively, for example, by limiting the questions the lawyer could ask the former client in testimony.

Thus both the ABA and the ALI expressly treat the need for present client consent in any instance in which the present client is arrayed against the lawyers former client in a matter substantially related to the former representation, and both caution that the need for the present clients informed consent arises from the possibility that loyalty to the former client might adversely affect or inhibit the representation of the present client.

Resolution of the problem in Hawaii. Former Client is treated as a third person under HRPC 1.7(b), and the possibility of material limitation triggering the application of the rule and requiring New Clients consent will occur, in this authors opinion, (1) in every substantially related matter in which the former clients consent is obtained and (2) in any other matter in which the lawyers independent professional behavior could foreseeably be compromised by an instinct to pull punches against the former client.

If the matters are related to such an extent that Former Clients consent is required and obtained, notice that the consultation that necessarily informs Former Clients consent entails a conference and discussion about the former representation and the otherwise protected material that will in all likelihood be exposed and exploited in the service of New Client and to Former Clients apparent detriment. Such a discussion presents the potential (1) to evoke current gratitude and (2) to rekindle old loyalties. Indeed, Former Client may even recognize and seek to exploit the good will that is generated by her altruistic concession of consent to her former lawyers request. And even in an unrelated new matter in which the consultation and consent requirements of rule 1.9 are not triggered, Lawyer must ask herself if a residue of loyalty and trust resulting from the former engagement could conceivably skew the quality of present representation from the straight and true. In any such case, consent of New Client should be sought and obtained. It seems good practice in any event to advise New Client that her adversary is Lawyers Former Client, rather than leaving the matter to New Clients discovery at some other point in the course of the representation.

Practice Tips

Detecting the conflict of interest. Comment [1] to rule 1.7 cautions: The lawyer should adopt reasonable procedures, appropriate for the size and type of firm and practice, to determine in both litigation and non-litigation matters the parties and issues involved and to determine whether there are actual or potential conflicts of interest. As a practical matter, this means that the conflict search must be targeted to discover if any adverse or potentially adverse party in the present matter is a current or former client of Lawyer. If the matter is litigation, then the names of all parties, as well as parents and subsidiaries of entity parties, should inform the conflict search procedure. If the matter is a transaction, then all parties to the transaction, as well as parents and subsidiaries, are at least potentially adverse. Buyer and seller, borrower and lender, and various co-venturers are adverse for conflict detection and avoidance purposes. Cf. In re Horine, 661 N.E.2d 1206, 1207 (Ind. 1996) (buyer and seller were directly adverse); ABA/BNALawyers Manual on Professional Conduct 51:114 (direct adversity in transactions), 51:115 (sale of a business); Committee on Professional and Judicial Ethics, New York City Bar Assn, Formal op. 2001-2 (inherently adverse interests of borrower and lender).

Consent of Former Client. When the matters in question are substantially related, the conflict that triggers rule 1.9(a) presupposes that Lawyer has in her possession (if not in her present recollection) confidential material protected by rule 1.6 (Confidentiality of Information) that will have relevance and probative value in the current matter or proceeding. Before deciding whether or not to seek Former Clients consent, Lawyer should examine the file in Former Clients case to see what is available and potentially usable in the service of Present Client, because Former Clients acquiescence in adverse use of any such material will be a sine qua non of Former Clients consent. See Comment [12] to rule 1.9 (A waiver is effective only if there is disclosure of the circumstances, including the lawyers intended role in behalf of the new client). In order for the consent to be fully informed, the consultation should also anticipate the context or contexts in which such adverse use would be occasioned. Although not required by HRPC 1.9, the consent should be in writing because this is good practice. The ABA rule requires written consent, and written consent has the desirable effect of settling disputes about the adequacy of consultation and the validity of consent.

Consent of New Client. New Client should be apprised of the fact of Lawyers previous representation of a current adversary. As suggested above, this is good practice even in cases that do not trigger rule 1.9. In cases governed by rule 1.9, New Client should be advised about the conflict and about Lawyers intention to seek Former Clients consent. The reason for this is that, if New Client is unwilling to commit to an engagement whose validity is conditioned upon Former Clients consent, then such unwillingness might just as well be elicited at the get-go for it will surely surface when New Clients consent, informed by revelation of the rule 1.9 problem and Former Clients consent after consultation, is sought in the necessary course of events. For her consent to be valid, New Client needs to know not only that Lawyer intends to be loyal and trustworthy but also that Lawyer has met with Former Client and discussed Lawyers obligation of undivided loyalty to New Client. Here, as in the HRPC 1.9 context, written consent is not required but is, nonetheless, strongly recommended.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Addison M. Bowman is professor emeritus, Richardson School of Law, University of Hawaii at Manoa. Bowman served as reporter to a 1978/79 Hawaii Judicial Council committee that drafted evidence rules, and to a committee of the 1979 Hawaii Legislature that issued evidence rules for enactment. He wrote the commentaries to HRE. Bowman currently serves as reporter to the Hawaii Supreme Court's Standing Committee on Rules of Evidence.

Professor Bowman has served on the Hawaii State Judicial Conference, and was Project Director for the Hawaii Judicial Council Committee on Penal Code Revision and Reform. He received his LL.B. from Dickinson School of Law and LL.M. from Georgetown University Law Center. He is a member of the U.S. Supreme Court, Ninth Circuit, Hawaii, and District of Columbia Bars.

96 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

McDonnell on Vision Point of Sale, Inc. v. Ginger Haas

2008 Emerging Issues 765

McDonnell on Vision Point of Sale, Inc. v. Ginger Haas

By Joseph B. McDonnell

October 18, 2007

SUMMARY: The Illinois Supreme Court has clarified issues regarding a Rule 216 Request to Admit as a discovery device; the adequacy of a response to such a request; and the appropriate inquiry into whether good cause exists under Rule 183 for an extension of time to respond to a Request to Admit. This commentary, written by Joseph B. McDonnell, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: The Illinois Supreme Court has corrected certain misconceptions regarding requests to admit under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216, and, in addition, has clarified the procedure to be utilized by trial judges in determining whether good cause exists under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 for allowing additional time to respond to a request to admit.

In Vision Point of Sale, Inc. v. Haas, 2007 Ill. LEXIS 1159 (Ill. 2007), the Court held that, in weighing a request for additional time under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183, the trial court must focus on the plaintiffs demonstration of good cause and may not consider either the lack of prejudice to the non-moving party or any conduct of the non-moving party which is unrelated to the good cause requirement.

Background. It is not uncommon in litigation that a party responding to a Request to Admit under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216 may file a response that is deficient either in form or in substance. Or, in rare cases, the deadline (28 days under the rule) may run before the response is filed. In either situation, the requesting party will undoubtedly move, under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216(c), that the requests be deemed admitted. Since allowance of such a motion may materially affect the outcome of the litigation, it is incumbent upon the responding partys counsel (assuming the deficiency can be corrected) to convince the trial judge that additional time should be allowed to amend the partys response to comply with the provisions of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216. This entails a motion under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183, which permits the Court, for good cause shown, to extend the time for filing any pleading required by the rules to be done within a certain period. The relief may be granted either before or after the time has expired.

Nature of Requests to Admit. In an earlier case, the Supreme Court had held that Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 allows the circuit court the discretion to permit a late response to a request to admit. Bright v. Dicke, 166 Ill. 2d 204 (1995). This was at a time when there was fairly substantial support for the argument that requests to admit were evidentiary in nature, rather than a part of the discovery process, and that, since a failure to respond amounted to an admission of the facts in question, the court was without power to permit an extension of time to respond or to amend responses. Following its decision in Bright (in which the argument was rejected), the Court had amended its Ill. Sup. Ct., R 201(c) to specifically include requests to admit as part of the discovery process.

The Court had also held in Bright that, in determining whether good cause existed to allow additional time to respond, the mere absence of inconvenience or prejudice to the opposing party was irrelevant. In the wake of that decision, the appellate court had, in several cases, fashioned a rule that mistake, inadvertence, or attorney neglect would not suffice as the sole basis for establishing good cause to support an extension. Hammond v. SBC Communications, Inc., 365 Ill.App.3d 879 (2006); Robbins v. Allstate Insurance Co., 362 Ill.App.3d 549 (2005); Larson v. O'Donnell, 361 Ill.App.3d 388 (2005); Cothorn v. Thompson, 357 Ill.App.3d 279 (2005); Glasco v. Marony, 347 Ill.App.3d 1069 (2004). In addition, the appellate court, in the decision under review, had interpreted Bright to hold that the trial court, in considering an Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 motion for extension of time, could consider the totality of the circumstances presented by the record.

Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183: The Correct Focus. In addressing the issues, the Supreme Court emphasized that the moving party has the burden of demonstrating good cause for an extension of time under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183, and that that burden is not satisfied by arguing or demonstrating lack of prejudice to the opponent. The Court held that such a motion must stand on its own merits and cannot be aided by consideration of matters not pertinent to the issue, including unrelated instances of the opposing party's conduct with respect to discovery. Vision Point of Sale, Inc., slip op. at 12.

Procedural problems. The case arose as a result of what both the circuit court and the appellate court had perceived to be a procedural irregularity. Plaintiffs timely response to defendants request to admit was signed (on the final page of the answers) only by plaintiffs attorneys, but was accompanied by a certificate under 735 ILCS 5/1-109 over the signature of plaintiffs corporate representative. On defendants motion to strike the responses and deem the requests admitted, the circuit court found the responses insufficient under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216 and granted the motion. After initially denying plaintiffs oral motion for additional time under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 to file amended responses to include the representatives signature on the last page of the responses, the trial judge, exasperated over the defendants recalcitrance in complying with discovery rules, reversed its ruling. Considering the totality of the circumstances, the court then held that good cause had been demonstrated under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 for the extension sought by plaintiff. After the appellate court affirmed, the Supreme Court allowed defendants petition for leave to appeal.

The Holding. The Supreme Court first addressed the scope of the inquiry attendant to an Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 motion for extension of time. In reviewing its holding in Bright v. Dicke, 166 Ill. 2d 204 (1995), the Court pointed out that the party there seeking relief had not explained in its motion for extension of time why the deadline had not been met. Accordingly, the Court there held that good cause had not been demonstrated. In the case at bar, however, plaintiff had made a good faith argument for the application of 735 ILCS 5/1-109 as complying with the requirements of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216.

The Court then observed that a line of cases decided by the appellate court (identified above) had engrafted on its Bright decision the rule that mistake, inadvertence or attorney neglect cannot provide the sole basis for a good cause finding for an extension of time under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183. Such limitation, said the Court, had never been suggested in Bright; this after-decided rule of the appellate court had improperly limited the discretion of the circuit courts in considering objective evidence bearing on the good cause requirement. Those decisions, accordingly, were overruled. Vision Point of Sale, Inc., slip op. at 16.

Although the court thus expanded the basis for a party's demonstration of good cause for an extension of time, it does not mean that an opponents non-compliance with discovery rules or orders can be a part of the Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 inquiry. Good cause must be established by the party seeking relief; misconduct of the party's adversary, even though it may be addressed by the court in determining appropriate sanctions for discovery violations under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 219(c), is not properly considered in determining good cause for an extension of time. Vision Point of Sale, Inc., slip op. at 12.

Affidavit vs. Verification. The alternative mode of certification by verification under 735 ILCS 5/1-109 is commonly used by practitioners in filing and serving documents in litigation. The statute makes it clear that the same penalties apply to a willfully false certification as to perjury. The content of the certification is expressly set forth in the statute. In Vision Point, the Court held that both the circuit court and the appellate court had erred in their application of the statute. An earlier appellate court decision had erroneously construed the statute to require that a party responding to an Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216 request sign the responses and, in addition, provide a sworn statement attesting to their accuracy. Moy v. Ng, 341 Ill. App. 3d 984 (2003). The high court held that Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216 contains no such requirement and that a certificate under 735 ILCS 5/1-109 was sufficient to comply with the sworn statement requirement of Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216. To the extent that Moy v. Ng held otherwise, it was overruled. Vision Point of Sale, Inc., slip op. at 18.

Local Rule vs. Supreme Court Rule. In a final touch, having overruled at least half-a-dozen cases, the Court negated a local circuit court rule which required the filing with the clerk of both requests to admit and responses thereto. Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216, the Court noted, requires only the serving, not the filing, of responses (as is true of discovery generally) and any local rule which imposes additional requirements violates the general administrative and supervisory authority of the Supreme Court under the Illinois Constitution. Illinois Const., Art. VI, § 16. The local rule, therefore, was of no effect. Vision Point of Sale, Inc., slip op. at 20.

Tips for Practitioners. While Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216 serves the purpose of facilitating the trial process by eliminating matters as to which no real dispute exists, it may also prove a trap for the unwary if not properly addressed and responded to in a timely fashion. It remains good practice, if at all possible, to serve one's responses within the 28 days required by rule. Matters which are legitimately contested must be specifically denied or reasons given as to why the answering party cannot truthfully admit or deny them.

If additional time is needed (and absent a stipulation with opposing counsel), an Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183 request for extension must focus on why more time is necessary and reference to extraneous matters must be avoided. Where a mistake, either by the client or by counsel, has resulted in the deadline being missed, counsel should candidly set forth the facts to establish the good cause required by Ill. Sup. Ct., R 183. Given the courts preference for settling disputes on the merits rather than through technical violations of the rules, such an approach is preferable to one which raises issues having little or nothing to do with the party's duties under Ill. Sup. Ct., R 216.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Joseph B. McDonnell is an attorney affiliated with the Swansea, Illinois office of Greensfelder, Hemker & Gale, P.C. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Law, where he was a member of the law review. He is licensed to practice in Illinois and Missouri and in the United States Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals, as well as in the federal courts for the Southern and Central Districts of Illinois. He served as an Assistant State Attorney in St. Clair County, Illinois for over eight years and has extensive litigation experience in both civil and criminal cases. He currently serves as an adjunct professor at Southwestern Illinois College, where he teaches law courses to paralegal students.

Mr. McDonnell's trial practice has included the defense of legal malpractice suits, product liability actions, industrial accident cases and commercial litigation. He is a member of the Illinois State Bar Association, the American Bar Association, the Metropolitan Bar Association of St. Louis, and past president of the St. Clair County (IL) Bar Association. He is also a member of the Bar Association for the Central and Southern Districts of Illinois, the Seventh Circuit Bar Association and the Appellate Lawyers Association of Illinois. He serves on the board of the Lawyers Trust Fund of Illinois.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

97 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Dorsaneo on Trespass to Try Title Actions, Martin v. Amerman and H.B. 1787

2008 Emerging Issues 759

Dorsaneo on Trespass to Try Title Actions, Martin v. Amerman and H.B. 1787

By William V. Dorsaneo III

October 17, 2007

SUMMARY: The 80th Legislative Session amended section 37.004 of the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act, which may have abrogated a 2004 decision of the Texas Supreme Court concerning the availability of declaratory judgment actions to resolve boundary disputes. This commentary, written by William V. Dorsaneo, III, author of the renowned treatise Texas Litigation Guide, discuss Martin v. Amerman and the implications of H.B. 1787 on boundary disputes.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Overview Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262 (Tex. 2004); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 37.004 (c)

Recent legislation may have abrogated a 2004 decision of the Texas Supreme Court concerning the availability of declaratory judgment actions to resolve boundary disputes. This is a good thing as far as it goes. Unfortunately, however, it is past time for the abo-lition of trespass to try title actions as the exclusive method of determining land title dis-putes generally.

Analysis

Texas Supreme Courts Martin v. Amerman Decision. In Martin v. Amerman [Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 265267 (Tex. 2004)], the Texas Supreme Court deter-mined that because the Property Code provides that a trespass-to-try-title action is the sole method of determining title to real property a plaintiff cannot use the Uniform De-claratory Judgments Act to obtain relief in a boundary dispute between adjoining land-owners [Tex. Prop. Code § 22.001].

A trespass to try title action is the traditional statutory method for resolving land title dis-putes between a party claiming the legal or equitable title and another party asserting a conflicting possessory interest in the disputed land. The plaintiff must claim an owner-ship interest in real property and can prevail only by establishing that interest as a valid and superior one. An action in trespass to try title is purely statutory [Tex. Prop. Code § 22.00122.004; see Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 264265 (Tex. 2004) (noting that statutory trespass-to-try-title action replaced common-law action in ejectment)] and is governed by special pleading and proof requirements established by the Texas Rules of Civil Procedure [Tex. R. Civ. P. 783809]. Although a trespass to try title action is the method for determining title to real property [Tex. Prop. Code § 22.001(a)], it does not apply to all real property interests [see Grasty v. Wood, 230 S.W.2d 568, 571 (Tex. Civ. App. --Galveston 1950, writ rehd n.r.e.) (nonpossessory interest, such as overriding royalty interest, is not suitable for trespass to try title action)]. Success in a trespass-to-try-title action depends on the strength of the petitioner's title, not the weakness of the adversary's claim [Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 265 (Tex. 2004); Land v. Turner, 377 S.W.2d 181, 183 (Tex. 1964); Hejl v. Wirth, 161 Tex. 609, 343 S.W.2d 226 (1961)]. See Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide § 251.02 for a detailed discussion of the ways to establish title.

At the time Martin v. Amerman was decided Section 37.004 of the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act provided generally that:

[a] person interested under a deed, will, written contract or other writings constituting a contract or whose rights, status or other legal relations are affected by a statute, municipal ordinance, contract or franchise may have determined any question of construction or validity arising under the instrument, statute, ordinance, contract or franchise and obtain a declaration of rights, status, or other legal relations thereunder

[Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 37.004(a)]. In addition, Section 37.003 provides more generally that declaratory relief is available in any proceeding in which declaratory relief is sought and a judgment or decree will terminate the controversy or remove an uncertainty [Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 37.003(c) see generally Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide § 45.04]. Thus, parties to boundary disputes or other types of cases traditionally brought as trespass-to-title actions sometimes sued for declaratory relief instead because proceeding under the DJA offers the following advantages:

- . DJA procedures, particularly the pleading and proof requirements, are less technical than trespass-to-try-title action requirements;

- . Resort to usual discovery rules is as expedient or more expedient than the process of obtaining an abstract of title and survey of the land;

- . An award of additional injunctive relief might aid to enforcement of a possessory right in the disputed property; and

- . The court has the discretion to award attorneys fees [see Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 37.009] without a prerequisite claim of adverse possession.

In a pre-Martin opinion, the Texas Supreme Court stated, albeit in dicta, that a declaratory judgment was available to litigate a boundary dispute [Brainard v. State, 12 S.W.3d 6, 29 (Tex. 1999), disapproved, Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 267-268 (Tex. 2004)]. Accordingly, although a boundary dispute was traditionally litigated in an action in trespass to try title [Hunt v. Heaton, 643 S.W.2d 677, 679 (Tex. 1982) (boundary disputes may be tried by trespass-to-try-title action); Plumb v. Stuessy, 617 S.W.2d 667, 669 (Tex. 1981)], some courts of appeals permitted declaratory judgment actions seeking a declaration of the boundary, rather than a determination of title to the disputed land [see Goebel v. Brandley, 76 S.W.3d 652, 655-656 (Tex. App. --Houston [14th Dist.] 2002, no pet.) (because suit sought only declaration of location of boundary line, not determination of title, declaratory judgment suit and award of attorneys fees was proper), overruled, Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 268 (Tex. 2004)].

Other courts refused to permit a declaratory judgment action if the case involved a title determination, and if the DJA was invoked to avoid the procedural requirements and limitations of a trespass-to-try-title action [McRae Exploration & Prod., Inc. v. Reserve Petroleum Co., 962 S.W.2d 676, 685 (Tex. App.--Waco 1998, pet. denied) (because suit to determine which of competing deeds was effective did not involve question of validity or construction of deed, it could not proceed as declaratory judgment action) Ely v. Briley, 959 S.W.2d 723, 727 (Tex. App.--Austin 1998, no pet.) (because trespass to try title is exclusive remedy, award of attorneys fees is unavailable under DJA) see McNally v. Friends of WCC, Inc., 113 S.W.3d 875, 881 (Tex. App.--Dallas 2004, no pet.); Barfield v. Holland, 844 S.W.2d 759, 771 (Tex. App.--Tyler 1992, pet. denied)].

In Martin v. Amerman [Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 262267 (Tex. 2004)], the Texas Supreme Court sided with the latter group of courts, holding that the trespass-to-try-title statute is an exclusive remedy in a boundary dispute, so that the parties may not obtain attorneys fees by proceeding under the Declaratory Judgments Act. The Court reasoned that any determination of the boundary line between adjoining parcels necessarily determines title to the disputed portion of the tracts, so that a boundary dispute ultimately presents a question of title, regardless of how the issue is framed in the pleadings [Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 266267 (Tex. 2004), citing Permian Oil Co. v. Smith, 107 S.W.2d 564, 568 (Tex. 1937); Freeman v. McAninch, 87 Tex. 132, 9899 (Tex. 1894)]. Because a question of title is implicated, and a trespass-to-try-title action is the method for determining title to real property [see Tex. Prop. Code § 22.001(a)], the Court concluded that the remedy available in an action for trespass to try title is the only appropriate one in a boundary dispute or other action that necessarily involves a determination of title [Martin v. Amerman, 133 S.W.3d 262, 267 (Tex. 2004); see also Kenedy Meml Found. v. Dewhurst, 90 S.W.3d 268, 289 (Tex. 2002) (dispute over shoreline was one over title to property, so DJA did not permit fee award against government)].

Amendment of Declaratory Judgments Act. As a result of 2007 legislation, Section 37.004 of the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act was amended to allow a person described in Subsection (a) to use a declaratory judgment action to resolve a land title dispute under this chapter when the sole issue concerning title to real property is the determination of the proper boundary line between adjoining properties [Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 37.004(c) (added by Acts 2007, 80th Leg., ch. 305--effective 6/15/07)].

Hence, all of the benefits provided by the DJA should now be available in boundary litigation and, perhaps as significantly, all of the technical difficulties confronting litigants previously required to use trespass to try title actions have been ameliorated by the 2007 legislation. As the Court explained in Martin v. Amerman, the strict pleading and proof requirements applicable to trespass-to-try-title actions have sometimes produced harsh results [133 S.W.3d at 265]. What the Court did not explain, however, is the particularly onerous wrinkle described in Hejl v. Wirth, 343 S.W.2d 226, 227 (1961) which provides that under then (and now) well-settled (but nonetheless ridiculous) law that if the plaintiff fails to establish title by one of the methods for doing so, the effect of a take nothing judgment is to vest title in the defendant!

But not all boundary disputes involve the construction or validity of contracts, wills, deeds or statutes [see e.g., McRae Exploration & Prod., Inc. v. Reserve Petroleum Co., 962 S.W.2d 676, 685 (Tex. App. --Waco 1998, pet. denied, see also Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide § 280.01)], therefore, the placement of the statutory authorization to use DJA actions to resolve boundary disputes in Section 37.004 raises another issue. Can the statutory amendment be construed to include all boundary disputes? In most boundary disputes, the plaintiff will be a person interested in the land with respect to which the boundary is disputed under a deed, will, written contract or other writings constituting a contract even if no issue as to the construction or validity of the instrument is involved in the boundary dispute. Hence, it may be argued that the statutory amendment authorizes a person described by Subsection (a) of Section 37.004 . . . to obtain declaratory relief under this chapter according to Section 37.003(c)s broader provision. Under this interpretation, relief under the DJA is available to a person interested under a deed, will, written contract or other writings constituting a contract seeking to establish a boundary line under any of the theories that are available to claimants in disputed boundary cases. See Dorsaneo, Texas Litigation Guide § 280.01 (discussion of theories used to resolve boundary disputes).

Proposed Legislation Was Better. As originally proposed by Representative Will Hartnett, HB 1787 was a broader piece of legislation which permitted declaratory relief to obtain a determination under [the Declaratory Judgments Act] of title to lands, tenements, or other real property.) [H.B.1787; Com. Report (The purpose of this bill is to permit a declaratory judgment action with respect to title to real property.)] Unfortunately, the original bill ran into legislative difficulty and was amended before passage.

The original bill would have worked a much more beneficial change in Texas procedural law than the amended one. Normal pleading, discovery and proof principles applied generally under the Texas Rules of Civil Procedure, coupled with the general availability of declaratory relief provide the same benefits as trespass to try title law practice did in the nineteenth century, without all of the arcane complexity and sometimes harsh results that follow mandatory use of trespass to try title actions to resolve land title disputes. For the same reasons, the legislature should seriously consider the elimination of trespass to try title actions altogether. Only then will the technical traps inherent in trespass to try title litigation be eliminated.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William V. Dorsaneo, III is the Chief Justice John and Lena Hickman Distinguished Faculty Fellow and Professor of Law at Southern Methodist University's Dedman School of Law in Dallas, Texas, where he teaches a variety of litigation courses. He is also the principal author of the widely used and often cited twenty-six volume Texas Litigation Guide published by Matthew Bender & Company, the co-author of the five-volume Texas Civil Trial Guide, the co-author of three casebooks entitled Cases and Materials on Civil Procedure, Texas Civil Procedure: Pre-Trial Litigation, and Texas Civil Procedure: Trial and Appellate Practice, and several other volumes on Texas litigation subjects.

Professor Dorsaneo served as the Reporter to the Combined Committee appointed by the Texas Supreme Court, the Court of Criminal Appeals and the Texas Legislature to draft the Texas Rules of Appellate Procedure and for the last fifteen years he has served as the Chairman of the Appellate Rules Sub-committee of the Advisory Committee to the Texas Supreme Court. He is also the Chairman of the Texas Supreme Courts Task Force for Revision of the Texas Rules of Civil Procedure and a member of the American Law Institute.

Professor Dorsaneo is Board Certified in Civil Appellate Law.

98 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on Boots, Inc. v. Singh

2008 Emerging Issues 761

Sinclair on Boots, Inc. v. Singh, 274 Va. ___, 649 S.E.2d 695 (Va. 2007), 2007 Va. LEXIS 99 (2007)

By Prof. Kent Sinclair and Gessner H. Harrison

October 17, 2007

SUMMARY: Non-refundable deposits do not per se penalize unsuccessful purchasers. In Boots, Inc. v. Singh, the Supreme Court of Virginia provides valuable guidance to practitioners, buyers, and sellers regarding damages that are available to a seller under Virginia contract law for a prospective buyer's non-performance, addressing the circumstances under which a non-refundable deposit provision in a sales contract may be held to be an unenforceable penalty. The Court's resolution of this question in Boots, in which it held a non-refundable deposit provision to be valid and enforceable, is helpful due to the frequent inclusion of non-refundable deposit provisions in real estate and other types of sales contracts. The case has significant implications for all "liquidated damages" issues in Virginia. This commentary, written by Professor Kent Sinclair, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In its recent decision in Boots, Inc. v. Singh, 274 Va. ___, 649 S.E.2d 695 (Va. 2007), 2007 Va. LEXIS 99 (2007), the Supreme Court of Virginia provides valuable guidance to practitioners, buyers, and sellers regarding damages that are available to a seller under Virginia contract law for a prospective buyer's non-performance, addressing the circumstances under which a non-refundable deposit provision in a sales contract may be held to be an unenforceable penalty. The Court's resolution of this question in Boots, in which it held a non-refundable deposit provision to be valid and enforceable, is helpful due to the frequent inclusion of non-refundable deposit provisions in real estate and other types of sales contracts. The case has significant implications for all "liquidated damages" issues in Virginia.

Background. Pursuant to a contract for the purchase of a restaurant business and certain real estate for $1.5 million, plaintiff, as the prospective buyer, deposited $50,000 with the attorneys hired to perform the closing of the sale. The contract provided that the sale was contingent upon the purchaser's ability to obtain financing and that the deposit would become non-refundable if the purchaser did not terminate the contract in writing within 40 days, but this period was extended for an additional 22 days upon agreement of the parties so as to permit plaintiff additional time in which to secure the required financing. However, plaintiff did not obtain such financing by either the expiration of the extended termination period or by the closing date specified in the contract.

Approximately three months after the closing date had passed without the sale closing, in a letter to the closing attorneys, the seller declared the contract to be in default and demanded payment of the $50,000 deposit. A little under one month later, the seller contracted to sell the business and real estate at issue to a third party for $1.3 million. Upon learning of this sale, the plaintiff, who had just obtained a commitment letter securing the necessary financing, demanded that his deposit be refunded. Soon thereafter, the closing attorneys filed an interpleader action naming both the plaintiff and the seller as parties, and deposited the contested funds with the circuit court, which proceeded to hold that the provision making the deposit non-refundable was an impermissible penalty or forfeiture and not a valid liquidated damages clause. The seller then appealed the order directing that the funds be paid over to the plaintiff.

General Principles. The Court analyzed the issue of whether the non-refundable deposit provision of the contract constituted an unenforceable penalty by stating the following well-settled principles of Virginia contract law regarding liquidated damages provisions:

. Actual damages uncertain and liquidated damages not disproportionate to probable loss. Relying on O'Brian v. Langley School, 256 Va. 547, 551, 507 S.E.2d 363, 365 (1998); 301 Dahlgren Ltd. P'ship v. Board of Supervisors of King George County, 240 Va. 200, 202-03, 396 S.E.2d 651, 653 (1990) and Taylor v. Sanders, 233 Va. 73, 75, 353 S.E.2d 745, 746-47 (1987), the Court in Boots explained that "parties to a contract may agree in advance about the amount to be paid as compensation for loss or injury which may result from a breach of the contract when the actual damages contemplated at the time of the agreement are uncertain and difficult to determine with exactness and when the amount fixed is not out of all proportion to the probable loss." O'Brian, 256 Va. at 551, 507 S.E.2d at 365; 301 Dahlgren Ltd. P'ship, 240 Va. at 202-03, 396 S.E.2d at 653, and Taylor, 233 Va. at 75, 353 S.E.2d at 746-47. The Court further explained that "A liquidated damages clause will be construed as an unenforceable penalty when the damage resulting from a breach of contract is susceptible of definite measurement, or where the stipulated amount would be grossly in excess of actual damages." O'Brian, 256 Va. at 551, 507 S.E.2d at 365; Brooks v. Bankson, 248 Va. 197, 208, 445 S.E.2d 473, 479 (1994); and 301 Dahlgren Ltd. P'ship, 240 Va. at 203, 396 S.E.2d at 653).

. Challenger's burden. Again, relying on its prior opinion in O'Brian, the Court specified that the party challenging the validity of a liquidated damages clause has the burden of proof on the issue of whether the opposing party's damages are susceptible of definite measurement or the stipulated damages are grossly in excess of the actual damages suffered. O'Brian, 256 Va. at 551, 507 S.E.2d at 365.

. Examples of proportional liquidated damages amounts. The Court cited its holdings in two prior cases, Taylor and Brooks, as examples of liquidated damages amounts that it considered to be valid and enforceable. Significantly, it explained that the non-refundable deposit amounts in those cases amounted to 4.6 percent and 10 percent of the respective purchase prices stated in the contracts at issue. Taylor, 233 Va. at 76, 353 S.E.2d at 747, and Brooks, 248 Va. at 209, 445 S.E.2d at 480.

Key Issue: Sufficiency of purchaser's evidence. In its recent decision in Boots, the resolution of the question of whether the non-refundable deposit provision of the contract constituted an unenforceable penalty turned on the sufficiency of the evidence presented by the plaintiff in its effort to challenge the enforceability of that provision as a liquidated damages clause.

As the Court explained, because the plaintiff had failed to terminate the sales contract in writing within the 40-day period as extended by the agreement of the parties, the deposit became non-refundable under the plain language of the contract. The seller was therefore entitled to payment of the deposit unless the plaintiff could prove that the seller's damages were susceptible of definite measurement or that the deposit amount was grossly in excess of actual damages.

Attempting to meet its burden, the plaintiff argued that even though the price that the seller eventually obtained from the third party appeared to be $200,000 less than what it would have received had the plaintiff been able to close the sale by the deadline date, the profit realized by the seller in the sale to the third party was "[r]oughly, the same" because the seller would have had to pay a commission of $239,000 to a broker if the plaintiff had closed. Indeed, as the plaintiff argued, because it did not have to pay such a commission on the sale to the third party, the seller actually gained $39,000 more in profit than it otherwise would have.

In addressing the plaintiff's arguments, the Court explained that under the rule as stated in O'Brian, the non-refundable deposit provision would only be invalid if the actual damages contemplated at the time of the agreement were uncertain and difficult to determine with exactness and the amount of the non-refundable deposit was not out of all proportion to the probable loss. The Court then concluded that it would be pure speculation to say it was certain, at the time the contract was signed, that the seller would be able to obtain a sale of the restaurant more than six months later for "[r]oughly, the same" amount. The Court further found that the plaintiff had presented no evidence at all relating to damages contemplated by the parties at the time of the sales contract, and that it had failed explain how one could conclude that, at that time, the seller's damages in event of default were certain and not difficult to determine. Finally, the Court also found that the plaintiff had offered nothing to show that the amount of the non-refundable deposit would be out of all proportion to any probable loss, particularly where that amount represented a mere 3.3% of the purchase price, and that amount was less than other amounts, in terms of percentage, that the Court had previously upheld as enforceable in prior cases. See Taylor, 233 Va. at 76, 353 S.E.2d at 747 (4.6% amount upheld) and Brooks, 248 Va. at 209, 445 S.E.2d at 480 (10% amount upheld). As a result, the Court held that the trial court had erred in ruling that the non-refundable deposit constituted an unenforceable penalty as opposed to a valid and enforceable liquidated damages clause. Accordingly, it reversed the trial court's judgment and remanded the case for the entry of an order directing payment of the $50,000 deposit to the seller.

Importance of ruling. As can be gleaned from the Court's analysis in Boots, it is important for both buyers and sellers to ascertain, as best they can, what the probable damages flowing from non-performance of a contract will be. This is so because, from a buyer's perspective, it is crucial that there be some evidence that can be relied upon for the argument that a seller is actually "better off" as a result of the buyer's non-performance--in other words, evidence that the breach was an efficient one. This evidence was lacking in Boots, and contributed to the adverse ruling suffered by the plaintiff. On the other hand, sellers also have a vested interest in ascertaining such damages, to avoid the risk that the non-refundable deposit will be deemed unenforceable--particularly if the deposit amount, expressed as a percentage of the contract price, exceeds those amounts that the Court has previously held to be valid in Taylor, Brooks, and now Boots.

Cross-References Research Leads

For an overview on damages principles in Virginia generally, see Kent Sinclair & Leigh Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.) Chapter 3 (Remedies in Virginia Practice) and § 3.2 (Damages). See Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2006), Chapter 23 (Damages) and §§ 23.01 (Nature, Types and Amount of Damages) and 23.02 (Compensatory Damages). See also John Costello, Virginia Remedies, Chapter 21 (Damages) and § 21.02 (The Goals of Remedies) and § 21.04 (Measurement of the Loss); § 11.09 (Damages and Choice of Remedy: Law and Equity), and § 18.10 (Contracting Away from Remedies and Damages Rules).

Detailed analysis of liquidated damages law in Virginia can be found in Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed.) § 3.2 (E) (Liquidated Damages). See also Charles E. Friend & Kent Sinclair, Friend's Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2006), § 23.09 (Liquidated Damages). See also John Costello, Virginia Remedies, Chapter 21 (Damages) and § 1.07 (Liquidated Damages).

For a model jury instruction on liquidated damages in Virginia, with Sources & Authority notes citing cases, see Virginia Model Jury Instructions Civil, Chapter 45 (Contracts) and Civil Jury Instr. No. § 45-45 entitled "Damages: Liquidated," citing among other sources the authorities noted above, and Michie's Jurisprudence of Virginia & West Virginia, 1 M.J., Contracts, § 1 and 1 M.J., Contracts, § 98 (2004).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). Both of these treatises are published by Lexis Law Publishing. Professor Sinclair is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

Gessner H. Harrison has experience as a judicial clerk and as a practicing attorney, and presently serves as Senior Staff Attorney in the office of the Reporter of Decisions for the Supreme Court of Virginia. He holds both J.D. and M.B.A. degrees, with advanced course work in legal research and information management. Mr. Harrison plays a major role in the Model Jury Instructions program in Virginia, and is primarily responsible for the identification of all new developments in Virginia law, and the finalization of jury instructions for the electronic and looseleaf jury instructions volumes, published by Lexis Law Publishing, covering all areas of civil causes of action and criminal developments. He has collaborated with Professor Sinclair on numerous projects in diverse areas of Virginia law.

99 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Garcia on Sheehan v. Roche Bros. Supermarkets, 448 Mass. 780 (Mass. 2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 757

Garcia on Sheehan v. Roche Bros. Supermarkets, 448 Mass. 780 (Mass. 2007)

By Grace V. B. Garcia

October 16, 2007

SUMMARY: Grace V. B. Garcia on Massachusetts Adoption of Mode of Operation Approach to Analyze Premises Liability Cases The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, in Sheehan v. Roche Brothers Supermarkets, Inc., 448 Mass. 780 (2007), joined nineteen other states in adopting the mode of operation approach to analyze premises liability cases. This commentary, written by Grace V. B. Garcia, a partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP, discusses what this means for both plaintiffs and defendants in slip and fall accidents that occur in self-service stores.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: Massachusetts Adopts Mode of Operation Approach to Analyze Premises Liability

Defense practitioners in slip and fall cases against self-service stores must now think carefully before filing motions for summary judgment based on lack of notice of a hazardous condition. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, in Sheehan v. Roche Brothers Supermarkets, Inc., 448 Mass. 780 (2007), has made a major change in the way in which premises liability cases must be proven and defended, and Massachusetts is now the twentieth state to adopt the mode of operation approach to analyzing such cases. As a result of this decision, which will be applied retroactively, it is anticipated that there will be a significant increase in the number of cases based on slip and falls on store property and a significant decline in the number of potential summary judgment motions in these cases. Practitioners in this area will now be required to evaluate the case early on and to contemplate potential settlement or the need to prepare for trial.

Sheehan Follows Typical Fact Pattern in Slip and Fall Cases in Self Service Stores. The plaintiff in Sheehan slipped and fell while walking in the produce department of the defendants grocery store. After the plaintiff fell, he noticed the pulp of a grape on the floor. The store manager also testified to seeing a small piece of grape. The plaintiff sustained significant injuries, including a subdural hematoma, requiring a month of hospitalization and three weeks in a rehabilitation facility. Although the lower court granted summary judgment based on plaintiffs inability to show that the defendant store owner had actual or constructive notice of the hazard, Massachusetts highest court, the Supreme Judicial Court, reversed.

Strategy Under the Traditional Approach. Historically, Massachusetts had viewed premises liability cases using the traditional approach. That approach, which was based on the Restatement, holds as follows:

A possessor of land is subject to liability for physical harm caused to his invitees by a condition on the land if, but only if, he (a) knows or by the exercise of reasonable care would discover the condition and should realize that it involves an unreasonable risk of harm to such invitees, and (b) should expect that they will not discover or realize the danger, or will fail to protect themselves against it, and (c) fails to exercise reasonable care to protect them against the danger.

Restatement (Second) of Torts, § 343 (1965). Adhering to the Restatement, Massachusetts required that, in order to succeed in a premises liability case against a grocery store, the plaintiff show that the grocery store caused the substance to be on the floor and that the store had actual knowledge of a hazardous presence or that the substance had been on the floor for so long that the store should have been aware of the condition. This approach often caused defense practitioners to seek summary judgment based on an argument that the plaintiff could not prove that the substance had been there for a significantly long period of time, and they were often successful. See e.g. Oliveri v. Massachusetts Bay Transp. Auth., 363 Mass. 165 (1973) (acknowledging that in the majority of cases, recovery has been denied to the plaintiff where he has attempted to establish the time element by circumstantial evidence consisting for the most part of a description of the foreign substance).

New Strategies Under the Modern Approach. Massachusetts departed from the traditional approach in order to acknowledge modern merchandising techniques. Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 783, n. 3. The Supreme Judicial Court noted that grocery stores have changed from individualized clerk-assisted to self-service operations and that the modern approach to analyzing premises liability focuses on the reasonable foreseeability of a patrons carelessness as opposed to the stores actual or constructive notice of a hazard. Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 784.

The Court found that it was unjust to require a plaintiff to prove the precise hazard that caused his or her injury because often the plaintiff may not be able to conduct a prompt investigation or make a determination of the exact cause of the accident. Thus, the mode of operation approach, as adopted in Massachusetts, is as follows:

where an owners chosen mode of operation makes it reasonably foreseeable that a dangerous condition will occur, a store owner could be held liable for injuries to an invitee if the plaintiff proves that the store owner failed to take all reasonable precautions necessary to protect invitees from these foreseeable dangerous conditions.

Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 786.

While plaintiffs still must meet the burden of establishing notice of the hazard, that burden is lightened: the burden is met once the plaintiff shows that the dangerous condition was reasonably foreseeable within the scope of the defendants self-service mode of doing business. This appears to be a significantly low notice threshold in comparison to the actual or constructive notice that plaintiffs were required to prove under the traditional approach. In addition to establishing notice, the plaintiff also must prove that the store owner failed to take reasonable measures commensurate with the risks involved with self-service mode of operation to prevent injury to invitees and bears the burden of persuading the jury that the defendant acted unreasonably. Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 786 (quoting Chiara v. Frys Food Stores of Ariz., Inc., 152 Ariz. 398, 401 (1987)). This approach is not meant to impose strict liability on defendants. Rather, a self-service store owner is only liable if a plaintiff proves that a reasonably foreseeable danger existed and the owner failed to take adequate steps to prevent the injury. Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 790.

Sheehan* Is a Refinement, and Not a New Rule. Although defense practitioners may find Sheehan to be a radical departure from the traditional approach, the Supreme Judicial Court indicated that it was not rejecting the Restatement relied upon for the traditional approach, but rather was simply modifying part (a) of that analysis. Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 788. In fact, in its decision, the Court found that the Restatement supported the mode of operation approach based on Comment e to the Restatement, which requires a store owner to make far greater preparation to secure the safety of his patrons that a householder will make for his social or even his business visitors. Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 788.

Consequently, in embracing the mode of operation approach, the Supreme Judicial Court made it clear that it was not adopting a new rule, rather it was merely refining the elements of proof in premises liability cases. Therefore, this refinement is to be applied retroactively. Sheehan, 448 Mass. at 791, n.9. Practitioners must be aware that due to the three-year statute of limitation period for torts, the mode of operation approach will be used for cases that have occurred before the April 17, 2007 Sheehan ruling.

Strategic Implications of Sheehan. Based on the Sheehan decision, the plaintiffs burden of proof is significantly less when proving negligence against a self-service store. Conversely, the defendants burden is greater: the defendant must show that it had taken all of the necessary precautions in light of the potential risks.

After Sheehan, defense practitioners must carefully consider whether or not to spend the time and effort to file a summary judgment motion. Although historically summary judgment motions in negligence cases have been disfavored, the Sheehan decision has basically made all premises liability cases too fact dependent to allow for summary judgment. Indeed, in 2006, the Supreme Judicial Court stated that in negligence cases, We generally consider . . . whether a defendant exercised reasonable care, the extent of the damage caused, and whether the defendant's breach and the damage were causally related to be the special province of the jury. Jupin v. Kask, 447 Mass. 141, 147 (2006). This disfavor, together with the requirements of the mode of operation approach, make it likely that summary judgment motions will not be granted in the majority of cases.

Although the Court did not define self-service operations, the Court noted that this approach applied where an owners chosen mode of operation makes it reasonably foreseeable that a dangerous condition will occur. Thus, it should be expected that Sheehan will have a broad application, applying to all stores that are not purely clerk-assisted operations. If a practitioner represents a small store that is arguably not self-service, however, the practitioner should contend that Sheehan does not apply but rather the traditional approach should be used to access liability.

Finally, practitioners that represent all store owners should ensure that the store has performed a detailed risk assessment and has implemented all necessary precautions. This will assist with the defense of any future litigation.

For additional information about summary judgment and premises liability see, Massachusetts Pleading and Practice § 34.50 (function of motion for summary judgment); Massachusetts Pleading and Practice § 8.332 (complaint in slip and fall case); Massachusetts Pleading and Practice § 33.47.1 (sample interrogatories-negligence-slip and fall); Massachusetts Pleading and Practice § 34.50 (sample request to produce slip and fall); Premises Liability Law and Practice § 8A.04 (specific types of hazardous conditions in slip and fall accidents).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Grace V. B. Garcia is a Partner in the Boston office of Morrison Mahoney LLP. Ms. Garcias practice is concentrated in the areas of commercial litigation, construction law, product liability and premises liability. In 2005, 2006, and 2007, she was recognized by Boston Magazine and Law & Politics as a Super Lawyer Rising Star.

Ms. Garcia is admitted to the bars of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the State of New York. She is actively involved in several bar associations and serves on the Massachusetts Bar Association's Litigation Section Council. Previously, Ms. Garcia served as a member of the MBA's Business Law Section Council (2003 -- 2006), New Lawyer Section Council (2000 -- 2003), co-chair of the Boston Bar Association's New Lawyer's Section (2002 -- 2004), and the BBA's Task Force on Pro Bono and New Lawyers (2002 -- 2003).

Ms. Garcia is a part of the Massachusetts Associated General Contractors Safety Committee. Additionally, after being on the Executive Committee for several years, Ms. Garcia is the co-director for the Boston Chapter of the Downtown Women's Club for the 2007-2008 year.

Ms. Garcia is the author of the Massachusetts Litigation Blog. In addition, Ms. Garcia has authored several articles including: Fundamentals of Electronic Discovery, Boston Bar Journal (March/April 2003) and Achieving Equitable Balance: Justice Wilkins and Chapter 93A, Boston Bar Journal (Nov./Dec. 2000) (co-author). She has lectured for various continuing legal education programs on electronic discovery, document retention, and deposition techniques.

100 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Sinclair on Collins v. Shepherd

2008 Emerging Issues 696

Sinclair on Collins v. Shepherd, 649 S.E.2d 672, 2007 Virginia LEXIS 116 (Sept. 14, 2007)

By Prof. Kent Sinclair

October 9, 2007

SUMMARY: Local rules are again raising the specter of balkanized procedure in the Virginia Trial Courts. In Circuit and District Courts, aggressive docket management based on local rules is unacceptable. In Collins v. Shepherd, the circuit court sua sponte entered an order of dismissal with prejudice pursuant to a local rule providing for the dismissal of cases not served upon the defendant within one year of filing, the Supreme Court held the local rule invalid because it conflicts with Virginia Code §§ 8.01-335. Without a rule or statutory basis for its actions in dismissing a case where service of process was not completed, the circuit court was therefore without authority to dismiss the case pursuant to the local rule. In a related ruling the Court held that the plaintiff's failure to challenge the dismissal order until after the expiration of the twenty-one day limitation period in Rule 1:1 was no bar to review because the subject order was void ab initio, and thus was subject to challenge at any time. This commentary, written by Professor Kent Sinclair, discusses the import and potential extensions of this important decision.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: In a recent civil case for personal injury damages where the circuit court sua sponte entered an order of dismissal with prejudice pursuant to a local rule providing for the dismissal of cases not served upon the defendant within one year of filing, the Supreme Court held the local rule invalid because it conflicts with Virginia Code §§ 8.01-335. Without a rule or statutory basis for its actions in dismissing a case where service of process was not completed, the circuit court was therefore without authority to dismiss the case pursuant to the local rule. In a related ruling the Court held that the plaintiff's failure to challenge the dismissal order until after the expiration of the twenty-one day limitation period in Rule 1:1 was no bar to review because the subject order was void ab initio, and thus was subject to challenge at any time.

Background. One local circuit court in Virginia adopted a local rule of Court that contained a provision stating that [i]f any civil action is not served within the time provided by Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e), the Clerk shall prepare a notice of dismissal and send such notice to counsel for the plaintiff.

In the recent Collins case, a personal injury lawsuit, a bare one week after the expiration of a one-year period following the filing of the action, the circuit court, in accord with its local rule, mailed to plaintiff's attorney a Notice of Dismissal stating that the circuit court would shortly thereafter dismiss this case because the defendant had not been served with process within one year after the filing of the action, "unless the [c]ourt finds that [plaintiff] has exercised due diligence to have timely service on [the defendant]. Plaintiff's counsel did not appear on or before the date designated in the notice of dismissal, and two weeks later the court entered an order dismissing the suit with prejudice.

As often happens in instances of startling dismissals, attempts to use the nonsuit statute followed. In Collins, on ex parte motion of the plaintiff the circuit court initially vacated its prior dismissal order and reinstated the case on the docket. Then on the same day the circuit court by separate order granted the plaintiff's motion to nonsuit the case. In response to the apparent use of the nonsuit to salvage the plaintiff's case, defendant then sought reconsideration, asserting that plaintiff's motion to vacate the dismissal order was barred under Va. Sup. Ct. R. 1:1 because of plaintiff's failure to challenge the dismissal order within 21 days of its entry. Defendant argued in that application that because of the expiration of the 21-day period after its order, the circuit court was without jurisdiction or authority to enter the dismissal order.

The circuit court then vacated the order granting plaintiff a nonsuit, held a hearing and ultimately ruled that the underlying dismissal order was a valid use of a docket control procedure created to deal with moribund cases where no service has been made within a year and the plaintiff has failed to exercise due diligence to effectuate service. The circuit court concluded that this docket control procedure was not inconsistent with the provisions of Virginia Code § 8.01-4, authorizing circuit courts to adopt such docket control procedures so long as they do not abridge the substantive rights of the parties. This set the stage for the appeal in Collins.

Overview of the "Local Rules" Landscape. It may be important to note before describing the Supreme Court's assessment of this particular local rule to note that we have been in a "quiet period" concerning local rules for a few years following a flurry of protests and legislative activities in the late 1990s. Local Rules proliferated to the point that the Lawyers' Weekly ran articles about general district court "blindsiding" by local practice, and circuit court local rules were attacked as sophisticated Virginia practice became more statewide in nature. Delegate Joannou authored an amendment to Virginia Code § 8.01-4 intended to "clamp down" on local Rules. That statute which governs both district court and circuit court local rule enactments provides the authority for limited local rules, focusing on rules "necessary to promote proper order and decorum and the efficient and safe use of courthouse facilities and clerks' offices." Even this grudging charter for the creation of local rules is expressly limited by the provision that no "substantive rights" may be affected by those rules. The statute, as amended in 1999 and again in 2000, reads today as follows:

The district courts and circuit courts may, from time to time, prescribe rules for their respective districts and circuits. Such rules shall be limited to those rules necessary to promote proper order and decorum and the efficient and safe use of courthouse facilities and clerks' offices. No rule of any such court shall be prescribed or enforced which is inconsistent with this statute or any other statutory provision, or the Rules of Supreme Court or contrary to the decided cases, or which has the effect of abridging substantive rights of persons before such court. Any rule of court which violates the provisions of this section shall be invalid.

The courts may prescribe certain docket control procedures which shall not abridge the substantive rights of the parties nor deprive any party the opportunity to present its position as to the merits of a case solely due to the unfamiliarity of counsel of record with any such docket control procedures.

Obviously, "docket control procedures" come in for special scrutiny under the second paragraph of Virginia Code §8.01-4, quoted above. The evident legislative concern was for trial and motion scheduling procedures that could catch counsel from distant locales unaware, with prerequisites or limitations that do not generally apply in Virginia practice being enforced to prevent, truncate or peremptorily schedule pretrial or trial proceedings to the detriment of anyone not fully conversant with local practice.

The legislative gyrations of 1999 and 2000 threatened to outlaw or abolish all local rules, but ended up allowing such rules under a regime that stresses the importance of local procedures not affecting substantial rights (often thought to mean, among other things, dispositions affecting viability of claims, motions or defenses). Against that background the circuit court whose rule was under scrutiny in Collins created a docket-control procedure to "enforce" the one-year service provisions of the Rules and Virginia Code, Title 8.01, and the appeal in that case presented the Court with the first full-blown opportunity since the reshaping of Virginia Code §8.01-4 to address the proper role of local rules of court and the relationship between such regulations and statewide law, in the Rules of Court and in statutes.

In its decision in Collins, the Supreme Court deemed the issues respecting the validity of the local docket-weeding rule to be purely questions of law, which means that in Virginia the Court is free to engage in a ground-up or "de novo" consideration of the validity of the local procedure. In an opinion by Justice Lawrence Koontz, considered by many to be a master of Virginia procedural intricacies and entanglements, a 4-to-3 majority of the Court held the local docket-clearing rule invalid.

Norfolk's Local Rule 2(F)(3), a part of the "Civil Case Management Administrative Plan" had been originally adopted by the Circuit Court of the City of Norfolk in 1998. The plan itself had as its stated purpose, what the Supreme Court in Collins acknowledged as "the laudable goal" of concluding all civil cases, except by leave of court and in suits for divorce, within twelve months of filing. In an apparent effort to achieve that goal, the Norfolk Local Rules in Rule 2(F)(3) provided that:

If any civil action is not served within the time provided by Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e), the Clerk shall prepare a notice of dismissal and send such notice to counsel for the plaintiff.

In the Collins litigation itself, plaintiff filed a case seeking damages for personal injuries allegedly resulting from the negligent operation of a motor vehicle by the defendant, but did not serve her with process. Within days after one year transpired from the date of filing, the circuit court, in accord with its local rule, mailed to Collins attorney a Notice of Dismissal stating that the circuit court on Friday, October 7, 2005 at 9:00 a.m. . . . pursuant to Supreme Court Rule [3:5(e)] and Nelson v. Vaughan, 210 Va. 1 [168 S.E.2d 126] (1969), will dismiss this case because [Shepherd] has not been served with process within one year after the filing of the . . . Motion for Judgment . . . unless the [c]ourt finds that [Collins] has exercised due diligence to have timely service on [the defendant].

As noted above, Collins did not appear on or before the date designated in the notice of dismissal, and the dismissal, nonsuit, and enforcement of dismissal described above then followed.

Challenges to the Local Rule. On appeal, Collins argued that the local rule is invalid because it abridges his "substantive right to take a nonsuit and refile his case." Further he contended that the Norfolk local rule conflicted with the procedures for discontinuance set forth in Virginia Code § 8.01-335, and that it permits dismissal of a case that was never served on the defendant in contravention of Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e).

Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e), the current Part Three embodiment of the long-standing one-year principle, provides that [n]o order, judgment or decree shall be entered against a defendant who was served with process more than one year after the institution of the action against that defendant unless the court finds as a fact that the plaintiff exercised due diligence to have timely service on that defendant. However, unlike the local rule, Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e) does not expressly contemplate dismissal of cases not served within a year, although such cases are potentially subject to dismissal under Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e) upon motion by the defendant as the Supreme Court held over a decade ago in Gilbreath v. Brewster, 250 Va. 436, 440, 463 S.E.2d 836, 837 (1995).

Despite the local rules reference to Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e), the Supreme Court found that the critical question was whether the circuit court had the authority to adopt a local rule that essentially translated Va. Sup. Ct. R. 3:5(e) into a mode of procedure for the court dismissing unserved cases sua sponte. Collins asserted that the circuit court did not have such authority because the local rule violates the provisions of Virginia Code § 8.01-4.

The Supreme Court remarked that while Virginia Code § 8.01-4 delegates to circuit courts the authority to establish rules regarding the management of their courts and the handling of cases, "[c]learly, however, Virginia Code § 8.01-4 denotes that such authority must be carefully exercised so that local rules do not encroach upon statutes, Rules of Court, or case law."

Based in part on the language in Virginia Code § 8.01-4 expressly stating that local rules must not abridge the substantive rights of the parties or deprive any party from having a case heard on the merits, the Supreme Court found that the General Assembly's intention was that local rules govern the administration, but not become the determining factor in the ultimate outcome, of cases.

In the Collins opinion the Court noted that by operation of a procedure effectuated solely by its local rule the circuit court dismissed Collins case with prejudice without the case being heard on the merits. The Court observed that in the absence of this local rule, "Collins would have retained the right to take a nonsuit and refile his civil action beyond the one-year limitation period established by the local rule," in accord with Virginia Code § 8.01-380 and case authority such as Berry v. F&S Fin. Mktg., 271 Va. 329, 332-33, 626 S.E.2d 821, 823 (2006), Waterman v. Halverson, 261 Va. 203, 208, 540 S.E.2d 867, 869 (2001), and McManama v. Plunk, 250 Va. 27, 32, 458 S.E.2d 759, 762 (1995)). The Supreme Court therefore held in Collins that:

"The dismissal under a local rule of a case that the plaintiff would otherwise be able to pursue under the Code, case law, and Rules of Court exceeds the authority delegated to circuit courts under Virginia Code § 8.01-4.

An important part of the analysis of the validity of this local rule was the fact that it is in tension with another Title 8.01 provision one which deals directly with the power of a court to dispose of cases where they are inactive on the docket for a period of time. This provision, Virginia Code § 8.01-335, governs circuit courts authority to discontinue inactive cases, and provides, in relevant part, that:

[A]ny court in which is pending an action, wherein for more than two years there has been no order or proceeding, except to continue it, may, in its discretion, order it to be struck from its docket and the action shall thereby be discontinued. However, no case shall be discontinued if either party requests that it be continued. The court shall thereafter enter a pretrial order pursuant to Va. Sup. Ct. R. 4:13 controlling the subsequent course of the case to ensure a timely resolution of that case. If the court thereafter finds that the case has not been timely prosecuted pursuant to its pretrial order, it may strike the case from its docket. The clerk of the court shall notify the parties in interest if known, or their counsel of record at his last known address, at least fifteen days before the entry of such order of discontinuance so that all parties may have an opportunity to be heard on it. Any case discontinued under the provisions of this subsection may be reinstated, on motion, after notice to the parties in interest if known or their counsel of record, within one year from the date of such order but not after.

Any court in which is pending a case wherein for more than three years there has been no order or proceeding, except to continue it, may, in its discretion, order it to be struck from its docket and the action shall thereby be discontinued. The court may dismiss cases under this subsection without any notice to the parties. The clerk shall provide the parties with a copy of the final order discontinuing or dismissing the case. Any case discontinued or dismissed under the provisions of this subsection may be reinstated, on motion, after notice to the parties in interest, if known, or their counsel of record within one year from the date of such order but not after.

Under Virginia Code § 8.01-335(A), the earliest point at which the circuit court may discontinue a pending case is after two years of inactivity, and even then discontinuance may be ordered only if neither party requests a continuance or the parties fail to abide by a schedule set by the court following a continuance. In the Collins decision, the Supreme Court noted that a case must be inactive for three years before a circuit court may dismiss it sua sponte under Virginia Code § 8.01-335(B). Additionally, Virginia Code § 8.01-335 provides the parties to a discontinued case the opportunity to reinstate the case within one year of the discontinuance.

The Court found that, in comparison to Virginia Code § 8.01-335, Local Rule 2(F)(3) would "drastically expand the circuit courts authority to dismiss an inactive case by permitting dismissal, sua sponte, after one year rather than after two or three years." It should also be noted that unlike Virginia Code § 8.01-335 the Norfolk local rule did not provide an opportunity for revival of a discontinued case, thus the Court found that it "totally ignore[d] the statutory distinction between a discontinuance and a dismissal with prejudice."

Given the strictures of Virginia Code § 8.01-4, which among many other limitations expressly states that [n]o rule . . . shall be prescribed or enforced which is inconsistent with . . . any . . . statutory provision, the court found the inconsistency between the Norfolk Local Rule and Virginia Code § 8.01-335 to be "palpable and beyond debate." Thus the circuit court did not have the authority under Virginia Code § 8.01-4 to adopt a local rule permitting the sua sponte dismissal with prejudice of cases not served within a year of the filing date, and the local rule to that effect was simply invalid. As a consequence, the dismissal ordered in the Collins case itself was in error.

In concluding its analysis the Court rejected the argument that Collins failure to challenge the dismissal order until after the twenty-one day period set forth in Va. Sup. Ct. R. 1:1 barred relief from the dismissal. The Supreme Court, however, found that under longstanding precedent such as Evans v. Smyth-Wythe Airport Commn, 255 Va. 69, 73, 495 S.E.2d 825, 828 (1998); Lapidus v. Lapidus, 226 Va. 575, 579, 311 S.E.2d 786, 788 (1984); and Anthony v. Kasey, 83 Va. 338, 340, 5 S.E. 176, 177 (1887), an order is void ab initio, rather than merely voidable, if it is beyond the court's power. In that situation the order is a complete nullity that may be attacked directly or collaterally by all persons, anywhere, at any time, or in any manner, as the Court had explained in detail in Singh v. Mooney, 261 Va. 48, 52, 541 S.E.2d 549, 551 (2001).

In this case, the procedure utilized by the circuit court to enter the dismissal order was done pursuant to a local rule that, under Virginia Code § 8.01-4, the circuit court was not authorized to adopt. Thus the Court concluded that the mode of procedure utilized by the circuit court was one that it could not lawfully adopt. Accordingly, the dismissal order was void ab initio and subject to challenge at any time, the "21-day rule" notwithstanding.

The message for local courts in Virginia, and practitioners handling cases in the more management oriented courts, is that every statewide requirement in Rules of Court and particularly in statutes takes precedence and can invalidate a local provision that is in any material way inconsistent with the freedoms or procedures specified in the governing statewide provisions.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Sinclair, an active member of the Virginia Bar, teaches the program in Virginia Law & Practice at the University of Virginia School of Law. He is Professor of Law and served for many years as Associate Dean of the Law School. He has written more than a dozen books, and is the author of Sinclair & Middleditch, Virginia Civil Procedure (4th ed. 2003 and annual supplements), and co-author of Friend & Sinclair, Virginia Pleading and Practice (2nd ed. 2007 with annual supplements). Both are treatises on Virginia law published by Lexis Law Publishing. Professor Sinclair is Chair of the Advisory Committee on Rules of Court for Virginia, and has served as Reporter for the Virginia Model Jury Project for a number of years. He has served on the Board of Governors of the Litigation Section of the Virginia Bar Association and the Boyd-Graves Conference on Virginia Law. He edits the Virginia Court Advance Rules and Practice Service for Lexis Law Publishing and is a frequent lecturer at continuing education programs for attorneys and Virginia judges.

101 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Fox on Parker v. Parker, 950 So.2d 388

2008 Emerging Issues 661

Fox on Parker v. Parker, 950 So.2d 388

By Susan Fox

October 8, 2007

SUMMARY: The Florida Supreme Court recently clarified in Parker when relief from judgment can be obtained if fraudulent evidence is presented at trial and the time constraints in seeking such relief. Susan Fox, an expert on Florida Appellate Practice, discusses Parker and provides practical insights on what constitutes extrinsic and intrinsic fraud and how to proceed if counsel suspects material falsehoods in either testimony or documents offered at trial in a paternity suit or other civil case.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: A party has only one year to seek relief from a judgment based on deception and false testimony accord-ing to Parker v. Parker, 950 So. 2d 388 (Fla. 2007). In so ruling, the Florida high court resolved a conflict between Floridas district courts and agreed with the majority of other states which have also found that lies about paternity in a divorce action are intrinsic fraud, not extrinsic fraud, and thus an underlying di-vo-rce judgment was not subject to collateral attack.

Richard and Margaret Parker were married in 1996 and had a child two years later. In 2001, in her disso-lution petition, Margaret represented that Richard was the child's biological father. A final judgment was entered, dissolving the marriage and incorporating a marital settlement agreement acknowledging Rich-ard as the father and requiring him to pay child support. Fifteen months later, Richard had a DNA test conducted and discovered that he was not the child's biological father. Richard filed an independent civil action against Margaret claiming fraud. The trial court dismissed the action with prejudice.

On appeal, the Fourth District held that "the issue of paternity misrepresentation in marital dissolution proceedings is a matter of intrinsic fraud. It is not extrinsic fraud, or a fraud upon the court, that can form the basis for relief from judgment more than a year later." Parker v. Parker, 916 So. 2d 926 (Fla. 4th DCA 2005). The Fourth District certified conflict with M.A.F. v. G.L.K., 573 So. 2d 862 (Fla. 1st DCA 1990) which had reached the opposite result. In M.A.F., the First District held that when a wife knows that her husband is not the father of her children, and the husband does not know, concealment of that knowledge in a divorce proceeding involving child support is extrinsic fraud upon the court; as such, the husband's later attack on the judgment was not barred by the doctrine of res judicata or the one year limitation of ac-t-ions provision of FLORIDA RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE § 1.540(b).

The Importance of Defining Intrinsic or Extrinsic Fraud for Relief of Judgment. To resolve the issues, the supreme court analyzed the difference between intrinsic and extrinsic fraud for purposes of a motion for relief from judgment. This distinction is important because of the one-year limitation for filing a motion for relief from judgment under FLORIDA RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE § 1.540(b) which permits relief from judgments on grounds of fraud "whether heretofore denominated intrinsic or extrinsic." However, this rule further provides: "This rule does not limit the power of a court to entertain an independent action to relieve a party from a judgment, decree, order, or proceeding or to set aside a judgment or decree for fraud upon the court." FLORIDA RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE § 1.540(b).

The distinction between intrinsic fraud and extrinsic fraud (or fraud on the court) has been characterized as "elusive," particularly where the circumstances appear to be somewhat of a "hybrid" nature. Guerriero v. Schaub, 579 So. 2d 370, 371 (Fla. 4th DCA 1991). "Extrinsic fraud" is conduct which prevents a party from presenting his case or trying an issue before the court, and the prevention itself becomes a collateral issue to the cause; whereas "intrinsic fraud" is the presentation of misleading information on an issue before the court that was tried or could have been tried.

Margaret Parkers false misrepresentation concerning paternity was intrinsic fraud, according to the court, because it "concerned an issue that could have been raised in the dissolution proceedings, rather than an issue collateral to those proceedings." As such the court rejected the First Districts earlier reasoning that a husband had "no affirmative duty . . . to question" paternity "absent a sound basis to doubt otherwise." M.A.F. v. G.L.K. at 863 .

Extrinsic fraud or "fraud on the court" had been recognized as a difficult concept. If given a broad application so as to comprehend any type of misrepresentation by a witness or party which induced an incorrect factual determination by the trier of fact, judgments would be subject to frequent attack by independent actions, and the time for such attacks would be limited only by laches. Alexander v. First National Bank, 275 So. 2d 272 (Fla. 4th DCA 1973) (finding no extrinsic fraud when plaintiff in foreclosure and deficiency judgment case misstated amount of indebtedness). Accordingly, Florida courts had consistently rejected efforts to reopen claims based on perjury, Truitt v. Truitt, 383 So. 2d 276 (Fla. 5th DCA 1980), concealment of information, August v. August, 350 So. 2d 794 (Fla. 3d DCA 1977), fraudulent misrepresentation, Erhardt v. Erhardt, 362 So. 2d 70 (Fla. 2d DCA 1978), and the like. At the same time, the courts had allowed relief based on fraudulent inducement when a settlement agreement was based on fraudulent misrepresentations. Brown v. Brown, 432 So. 2d 704 (Fla. 3d DCA 1983).

Beware -- Court Preference is for Termination of Litigation. In its unanimous decision in Parker v. Parker, the supreme court came down strongly in favor of policy considerations that result in terminating litigation over allowing relief from judgments based on deception. Moreover, the court asserted a policy of protecting children over protecting the interests of a defrauded parent. Although the husband in Parker may have been innocently defrauded, as an adult, he was presumed aware of the high incidence of infidelity and able to act to ensure that the biological ties he deemed essential were present before entered into a settlement agreeing to pay child support. At the same time, the court noted the psychological devastation that disestablishment of paternity can have on a child. "The law should discourage adults from treating children they have parented as expendable when their adult relationships fall apart. It is the adults who can and should absorb the pain of betrayal rather than inflict additional betrayal on the involved children," the Parker court stated, quoting Theresa Glennon, Expendable Children: Defining Belonging in a Broken World, 8 Duke J. Gender L. & Pol'y 269, 275 (2001).

In so ruling, the Florida court joined Alabama, Arkansas, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Texas, and Vermont which have similarly held that a wife's misrepresentation regarding paternity in a dissolution of marriage proceeding constitutes intrinsic fraud, not extrinsic fraud. See, e.g., Anonymous v. Anonymous, 473 So. 2d 502 (Ala. Civ. App. 1984); Graves v. Stevison, 81 Ark. App. 137, 98 S.W.3d 848 (2003); Miller v. Miller, 956 P. 2d 887, 905 (Okla. 1998); Mr. G. v. Mrs. G., 320 S.C. 305, 465 S.E.2d 101, 103 (App. 1995); Temple v. Archambo, 161 S.W. 3d 217 (Tex. App. 2005); Godin v. Godin, 168 Vt. 514, 725 A.2d 904 (1998). Nevada alone is mentioned as standing "in the minority," in Love v.

Love, 114 Nev. 572, 959 P.2d 523 (1998) finding this type of fraud to be extrinsic because it prevents the husband from knowing he has a claim or defense. The Florida court resolved Nevada's concern about deceived husbands by placing a duty on the husband to question paternity or at least to discover the existence of fraud within a one-year window after the divorce or be forever barred. The court noted the recent adoption of Fla. Stat. § 742.18 (2006) which provides the means and procedures by which a male may petition the trial court to disestablish paternity and terminate a child support obligation. Moreover, the court suggested that any further relief to defrauded males should come from the legislature.

The court's resolution of this dispute provides insight into an evolving view of the nature of paternity in Florida. This issue is discussed at length in the Fourth District's opinion and approved by the supreme court. The Parker opinion suggests it is unwise to upset established parent-child relationships, because the fact that a person has stood in the position of parent in the child's eyes must be given consideration. In earlier decisions, such as, in Daniel v. Daniel, 695 So. 2d 1253 (Fla. 1997), the Supreme Court had declared it the well-settled rule of law in this state that "a person has no legal duty to provide support for a minor child who is neither his natural nor his adopted child and for whose care and support he has not contracted." In contrast, Parker suggests that standing in as a child's father and failing to question paternity does create a duty of support.

The Parker decision, while rendered in the family law context, has important ramifications in civil cases. Parker strongly suggests that neither deception, false testimony nor falsified documents that result in a judgment will be considered extrinsic fraud. Accordingly, it will be important for trial counsel to closely examine all assumptions concerning testimony or documents presented at trial. None of these types of fraud can be the basis of a motion to vacate which is filed more than one year after the judgment.

Key Strategic Considerations. In light of the Parker decision, counsel should never rely upon the truth of the opposing party's testimony or documents. If adequate time to explore these areas has not been given in advance of trial, or if new matters not previously investigated arise at trial, investigation must continue after trial to discover material falsehoods. Opposing evidence, even if outrageously false, will not be a basis for relief more than one year after the judgment. As such, the Parker case may be cited, for example, as an additional basis for objecting to surprise or last minute witnesses or documents at trial. The inability to conduct ordinary scrutiny of evidence in discovery coupled with the Parker ruling may be adequate prejudice to avoid last minute additions.

A party who discovers that a judgment was based on false testimony may be forced to take several actions simultaneously. If the judgment is appealed, it should be noted that the pendency of an appeal does not extend the one-year limit for filing a Rule § 1.540(b) motion. See, e.g., Weiss v. Berkett, 907 So. 2d 1181, 1183 (Fla. 3d DCA 2005); Flemenbaum v. Flemenbaum, 636 So. 2d 579, 580 n. 1 (Fla. 4th DCA 1994); Molinos Del S.A. v. E.I. DuPont de Nemours and Co., 947 So. 2d 521, 524 (Fla. 4th DCA 2006). As such, counsel may have to proceed on dual paths of seeking relief from a judgment and appealing it at the same time. In that instance, counsel would have to seek relinquishment of jurisdiction from the appellate court in order to obtain a hearing on the motion for relief from judgment.

If extrinsic fraud is alleged, an independent action alleging fraud on the court, not a motion on Rule § 1.540, must be filed. Parker, 950 So. 2d at 392 (explaining that allegations of extrinsic fraud must be brought as an independent action); Romero v. Romero, 959 So. 2d 333, 338 (Fla. 3d DCA 2007). If counsel is uncertain whether the fraud will be deemed intrinsic or extrinsic and the one year period has not expired, the motion under Rule § 1.540 would logically be pursued first.

In the specific example presented in Parker, DNA testing should become a more customary procedure in dissolution of marriage actions. Best practices would dictate that an attorney representing a putative father recommend testing as a standard procedure in such cases. As the court points out, such testing can be performed without drawing blood or other invasive sampling techniques. Testing hair and other materials easily collected without the knowledge or cooperation of the subject is increasingly available. At the same time, both parties may have strategic concerns that would cause them to settle without formal testing. The mother may wish to avoid testing if she harbors any doubt about paternity and does not wish to risk losing all child support. A putative father may agree to pay some support despite his doubts in order to avoid rejecting or abandoning children he has parented. The practitioner must caution the parties that these decisions are to be viewed as final and may not be revisited at a later date, except within the one-year window for relief from judgment. In effect, the Parker decision creates a one-year window after the divorce to perform any DNA testing after which questioning of paternity is forever barred.

Settlement Agreements May Provide Remedies for Misrepresentation. Parties settling civil or commercial litigation may be able to circumvent the result in Parker by careful drafting of a settlement agreement. The husband in Parker may have protected himself by including a provision in the agreement that stated his reliance on the truthfulness of the wife's representations and that he would have a right to sue in contract for any monies wrongfully paid based on such representations. A right to sue in contract would be subject to the five-year limitations period of Fla. Stat. § 95.11(2)(b). In the paternity context addressed in Parker, such a provision could be void as against public policy for the reasons discussed by the court, however, in civil and commercial cases, such a provision should be enforceable. Among other things, careful attention would have to be given to the drafting of a general release given in connection with the settlement.

For Additional Discussion on Paternity See: Florida Family Law, Chapter 90 Paternity (5-90 Florida Family Law § 90.syn). Disputed Paternity Proceedings, Chapter 3 Evidentiary and Related Issues in Paternity Proceedings (1-3 Disputed Paternity Proceedings 3.syn), Chapter 2 Paternity Proceedings, § 2.07 Postjudgment Proceedings (1-2 Disputed Paternity Proceedings § 2.07), and Chapter 4, Conducting the Paternity Trial, § 4.25 Motion for New Trial Due to Newly Discovered Evidence (1-4 Disputed Paternity Proceedings § 4.25).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Susan Fox is a principal in the law firm of Fox & Loquasto, P.A., (www.flappeal.com) located in Tampa, Florida. Ms. Fox is Board Certified by The Florida Bar in Appellate Practice. She is a current member and the former Chair of the Appellate Practice Section of The Florida Bar, and serves on the Bars Appellate Practice Certification Committee. She practices almost exclusively in all phases of appellate court practice and complex litigation and has argued numerous cases before the Florida Supreme and Appellate District Courts. She has also served as a lecturer and author on the subject of Florida Appellate Practice for the Florida Bar. She is also privileged to have had several articles selected for publication in the Florida Bar Journal, including Susan Fox, Citation Form: Getting it Right. She is a graduate of the University of Florida, the University of Florida School of Law and was admitted to the practice of law in Florida in 1977. She can be contacted directly by phone at 813-251-6400 or by email at susan-fox@flappeal.com.

102 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Becker on Plaintiffs Duty to Take Defendants Affirmative Defenses

2008 Emerging Issues 610

Becker on Plaintiffs Duty to Take Defendants Affirmative Defenses, Glozzo v. Univ. Urologists of Cleveland, Inc., 114 Ohio St. 3d 14

By Prof. Susan J. Becker

October 6, 2007

SUMMARY: Defendants commonly include a laundry list of affirmative defenses in their answers to avoid waiver. Many of these defenses are without merit and quietly fade into oblivion throughout the course of the litigation. The Supreme Court of Ohio's recent Glozzo decision, however, provides a stern reminder to plaintiffs attorneys that failure to seriously scrutinize defenses preserved in an opponent's answer, especially those related to alleged defects in service, may prove a fatal oversight. Professor Susan Becker, an expert on Ohio and federal civil procedure, explains the Glozzo case in this commentary and provides practical tips for evaluating and responding to affirmative defenses.

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: An Apparently Ordinary Lawsuit. From the filing of Frank Glozzos complaint on November 14, 2003 until the eve of trial in March 2005, the Glozzo case appeared to proceed as a medical malpractice case that was destined to reach trial on the merits, or at least settlement on the courthouse steps. On the morning of trial, however, plaintiffs counsel found themselves on the losing end of an argument over ineffective service of process. The case serves as a stern reminder of the power of affirmative defenses and the burden on counsel to take all defenses asserted in a responsive pleading seriously. Here is how the Glozzo case unfolded.

Defendants performed a medical procedure on plaintiff in June 2002. Believing that defendants had fallen below the ordinary standard of care for such procedures, plaintiff timely hand delivered a letter to defendants. This act provided the notice authorized by Ohio statute to extend the one-year statute of limitations by 180 days. See ORC Ann. 2305.113(B)(1). Plaintiff then timely filed the complaint on November 14, 2003.

The filing triggered plaintiffs obligation under Ohio Civ. R. 3(A) to perfect service within one year. Plaintiff attempted service via certified mail but that service was ineffective. The failure of service was noted on the docket and the clerks office mailed a copy of the failed notice to plaintiffs attorney. Defendants filed a timely answer that included insufficiency of service of process as one of several affirmative defenses.

The trial court set January 28, 2005 as the deadline for the parties to file dispositive motions and April 13, 2005 as the trial date. Defendants actively participated in all pretrial stages of the litigation including attending a pretrial conference, engaging in discovery, exchanging expert reports and filing motions in limine. The Supreme Court of Ohio later characterized defendants conduct as mounting a vigorous defense on the merits. Glozzo at 12.

A Fatal Flaw Revisited. Nine days before the date set for trial, and more than two months after the trial courts deadline for filing of dispositive motions, defense counsel filed a motion to dismiss based on insufficiency of service. The trial court denied the motion due to its tardiness. Undeterred, defendants renewed their motion on the day of trial. Following oral argument, the trial court granted defendants motion to dismiss. The trial court reasoned that: (1) the failure of service prohibited the case from commencing during the one-year period required by Ohio Civ. R. 3(A); (2) the defendants had properly preserved the insufficiency of service of defense in their answer; and (3) the courts own deadline for dispositive motions did not bar its consideration of defendants tardy motion.

Appeals Court Sides with Plaintiff. Plaintiffs counsel prevailed in a split decision on their initial appeal. In Glozzo v. Univ. Urologists of Cleveland, Inc., Cuyahoga App. No. 86371, 2006 Ohio 1726, 2006 Ohio App. LEXIS 1586 (April 6, 2006), Ohios Eighth District Court of Appeals relied on its own precedent to conclude that appellees voluntarily submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court and waived any objection to defective service by participating in the litigation. Id. at 13. The dissenting judge, however, opined that dismissal was not only allowed but indeed compelled by Supreme Court of Ohio precedent including First Bank of Marietta v. Cline, 12 Ohio St.3d 317, 466 N.E.2d 567 (1984). Id. at 18.

The Supreme Court of Ohio Reinstates Dismissal. The Court was unreceptive to the legal and equitable arguments plaintiff advanced to support the appellate courts restoration of the case.

Plaintiffs Legal Arguments Rejected. The Court found no ambiguity in the language of Ohio Civ. R. 12(B). This rule, the Court explained, gives a party responding to a claim the option of asserting certain defenses either in a motion to dismiss filed prior to the responsive pleading or in the pleading itself. Glozzo at 7.

The defenses of lack of personal jurisdiction, improper venue, and insufficiency of process or of service of process are only waived, the Court observed, if (1) a party elects to file motion prior to a responsive pleading and fails to include these defenses in that motion, or (2) a party declines to file a motion and then fails to include these defenses in the responsive pleading. Glozzo at 8, citing Ohio Civ. R. 12(H)(1). The Court observed that the Glozzo defendants properly utilized the second option including their insufficiency of service defense in their answer rather than immediately filing a motion to dismiss. Glozzo at 12.

In addition to the literal language of the rule, the Court agreed with the Eighth District dissenting judge that the Courts 1984 decision in First Bank of Marietta v. Cline, 12 Ohio St. 3d 317 (Ohio 1984) compelled dismissal of Glozzos lawsuit. In Cline, the defense of insufficiency of service was raised in the first responsive pleading, but the defendant did not pursue a motion to dismiss until all the evidence had been presented at trial. The Cline Court held that defendants failure to request a hearing on the service issue prior to trial did not waive the defense. Glozzo at 10. The Glozzo Court affirmed that holding: In our interpretation of the rule in Cline, we determined that a properly asserted and preserved defense may be raised even after trial has begun. Nothing in the facts here causes us to reconsider that conclusion. Glozzo at 11.

This language has application well beyond the Glozzo defendants insufficiency of service of process defense. The Glozzo language extends to all Ohio Civ. R. 12(B) defenses preserved in an answer, specifically lack of personal jurisdiction, improper venue, and insufficiency of process.

Plaintiffs Equitable Claims also Prove Unpersuasive. The Court was unsympathetic to Glozzos argument that the trial court abused its discretion by entertaining defendants motion to dismiss after the courts own deadlines for dispositive motions had passed. It is important to note that the Court did not reject this challenge to the trial courts dismissal as being per se meritless. Rather, the court rejected this particular plaintiffs abuse of discretion argument for being conclusory and failing to demonstrate how the specific facts of this case support that position. Glozzo at 11.

In theory, the Courts resolution of Glozzos abuse of discretion argument invites counsel confronted with similar situations to fashion more fact-intensive and perhaps creative arguments as to why the trial court abused its discretion by ignoring its own dispositive motion deadline. Counsel would need to emphasize how they reasonably relied on the deadline and how the trial courts decision to ignore the deadline prejudiced their case. In practice, however, it is difficult to envision exactly what facts or arguments would have proven compelling to this Court. Stated differently, the plaintiffs seemingly reasonable reliance on the passage of the dispositive motion deadline as extinguishing any potential dispositive motions in the case, paired with the extreme prejudice resulting from the trial courts unanticipated erasure of that deadline, seem to make the argument for the plaintiff. Unfortunately for Mr. Glozzo, only a single dissenting justice shared this view. Glozzo at 19-20.

Continuing with its unsympathetic assessment of plaintiffs procedural plight, the Court rejected plaintiffs equitable argument that defendants tardy filing of the motion to dismiss encourages legal gamesmanship and prevents the efficient administration of justice. Glozzo at 15. The Court again rebuffed plaintiffs argument based on the unambiguous requirements of the civil rules. In affirming the trial courts dismissal of the case, the Court opined: The obligation is upon plaintiffs to perfect service of process; defendants have no duty to assist them in fulfilling this obligation. Whether appellants' conduct constituted gamesmanship or good litigation strategy, they followed the rules. If such behavior should not be permitted in the future, the proper avenue for redress would be to seek to change those rules. Glozzo at 16-17.

Citations and Cross References. The federal rules of civil procedure on waiver of defenses are essentially identical to the Ohio rules. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(B) and (H) (USCS Fed Rules Civ Proc R 12). Federal courts are split on whether a defendant waives the right to pursue a motion to dismiss by preserving the grounds for the motion in an answer and then filing the motion after participating in the litigation. Cp., e.g., Rentz v. Swift Transportation, Co., Inc., 185 F.R.D. 693 (D. Ga. 1998) (holding that defendants did waive right to assert insufficient service in a motion to dismiss after extensive participation in the litigation), and Snodgrass v. Roberts Dairy, 82 F.R.D. 626 (D. Neb. 1979) (finding no waiver where defendant asserted motion to dismiss seven months after preserving insufficiency of service defense in answer). Anderson's Ohio Pretrial Litigation Practice: Chapter 3 Responsive Pleadings (1-3 Ohio Pretrial Litigation § 3.syn); Anderson's Ohio Pretrial Litigation Practice: Chapter 11 Pretrial Motion Practice, (2-11 Ohio Pretrial Litigation § 11.syn).

Practice Tips

- . Carefully scrutinize affirmative defenses filed in response to an original claim, counter claim or cross claim.
- . If the need for remedial measures is identified in those defenses for example effectuating proper service, amending the complaint, or adding or substituting a party -- take the necessary steps immediately.
- . If unsure about the validity of any of an opponents affirmative defenses, use contention interrogatories to force the opponent to reveal the factual and legal basis for those defenses.
- . Recognize that the passing of the courts deadline for dispositive motions is not carved in stone and the trial court has significant discretion to ignore that deadline even after it had passed.

Illustrative Examples. Although not addressed in Glozzo, attorneys should also keep in mind that a defendant can assert the defenses of failure to state a claim, failure to join an indispensable party, and lack of subject matter jurisdiction at trial, even if the defendant has not preserved those defenses in an the answer or otherwise raised them prior to trial. Ohio Civ. R. 12(H)(2) and Ohio Civ. R. 12(3). Plaintiffs counsel avoid unpleasant surprises at trial by fully investigating any information revealed during discovery or other pretrial proceedings suggesting that one or more of these defenses may prove viable.

As a general rule, the lengthy list of affirmative defenses set forth in Ohio Civ. R. 8(C) are waived if not included in a responsive pleading. Ohio attorneys should note, however, that even that rule has an escape clause. Ohio Civ. R. 15(A) allows a party to seek leave of court to amend an answer and further directs that Leave of court shall be freely given when justice so requires.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Professor Susan J. Becker graduated magna cum laude from Cleveland State University's Cleveland-Marshall College of Law in 1983. Following a two-year clerkship with the Honorable Judge Robert Krupansky of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, she worked for five years as a litigation associate at Jones, Day where her practice areas included products liability, employment law, and commercial litigation at both the trial and appellate level in state and federal courts. She joined the full-time faculty of Cleveland-Marshall College of Law in 1990 where she teaches Civil Procedure, Remedies, Contracts, Pretrial Practice, Legal Ethics, and Sexual Orientation and the Law. Her publications focus primarily on civil litigation and civil justice reform and include two books: Discovery of Current and Former Employees (ABA 2005) and The Law of Professional Conduct in Ohio (LexisNexis forthcoming fall 2007) with Lloyd Snyder and Jack Guttenberg. Since 2003 Professor Becker has served on the Supreme Court of Ohio's Commission on Rules of Practice and Procedure and currently chairs the Commission's Civil Rules Committee. She has been a member of the Advisory Group for the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Ohio since 1995 and co-chaired the Advisory Groups Committee on Professionalism from 1999 to 2005. Professor Becker also maintains a modest pro bono legal practice.

103 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2010, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Bisceglie on Williamson v. PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP

2008 Emerging Issues 496

Bisceglie on Williamson v. PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP

By Kyle C. Bisceglie

September 14, 2007

SUMMARY: The NY Ct. of Apps. found the continuous representation doctrine inapplicable to toll the three-year statute of limitations for accounting malpractice claims where the firm provided only annual audits governed by separate annual engagement letters. Kyle Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman, examines this decision and considerations that remain, including whether on-going services related to the audit would toll the statute of limitations.

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ARTICLE: Annual Audits Alone Will Not Support Application of Continuous Representation Doctrine

In Williamson v. PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, 9 N.Y.3d 1, 2007 N.Y.LEXIS 1455 (2007), the Court of Appeals addressed for the first time the continuous representation doctrine in the context of an accounting malpractice claim. By unanimous opinion, the Court found the doctrine inapplicable where the plaintiff alleged that the accountants performed only annual audit engagements. Each audit was done pursuant to a separate engagement letter "for the provision of separate and discrete audit services" for year-end financial statements, rather than there being on-going services that related back to the services in the years being challenged. The Court noted the plaintiff's fatal failure to allege "further representation regarding the audits" by reexamination audit or otherwise, and found the allegation of a "continuing professional relationship" insufficient to warrant application of the continuous representation doctrine.

The continuous representation doctrine has its origins in the continuous treatment doctrine from medical malpractice actions. Key to the application of that doctrine is the requirement that the plaintiff receive "continuous treatment for the same illness, injury or condition" which gave rise to the challenged conduct. The continuous treatment doctrine does not apply to periodic examinations or treatment of other conditions, nor does it apply where the continuing services are unrelated to the services being challenged.

As it did in its decisions in the legal malpractice area (see, e.g., Shumsky v. Eisenstein, 96 N.Y.2d 164, 750 N.E.2d 67, 726 N.Y.S.2d 365 (2001)), in Williamson the Court of Appeals applied these same principles in the accounting context. The Court looked in the pleadings for some indication of "mutual understanding" by the parties to the engagement that the auditors would provide further representation as to a past audit, or for an on-going cause or condition emanating from those past audits. Citing annual engagement letters and lack of remedial or advisory services, the Court of Appeals found "the purpose underlying the continuous representation doctrine would not be served by its application here."

This case is significant for the definitiveness and breadth of its finding that annual audits alone will not support application of the continuous representation doctrine.

Williamson in Context of Non-medical Professional Malpractice Claims. CPLR§ 214(6) provides a three-year statute of limitations for non-medical professional malpractice claims whether pled as tort claims or as contract claims. The statute applies to lawyers, accountants and architects, but not to insurance agents, brokers or actuaries. See Chase Scientific Research, Inc. v. NIA Group, Inc., 96 N.Y.2d 20, 725 N.Y.S.2d 592, 749 N.E.2d 161 (2001); Castle Oil Corp. v. Thompson Pension Employee Plans, Inc., 299 A.D.2d 513, 750 N.Y.S.2d 629 (2d Dep't 2002). A malpractice claim accrues when the malpractice is committed, not when it is discovered. See Glamm v. Allen, 57 N.Y.2d 87, 439 N.E.2d 390, 453 N.Y.S.2d 674 (1982); McDermott v. Torre, 56 N.Y.2d 399, 437 N.E.2d 1108, 452 N.Y.S.2d (1982). In the context of accounting malpractice, accrual occurs upon the client's receipt of the accountant's work. Ackerman v. Price Waterhouse, 252 A.D.2d 179, 683 N.Y.S.2d 179 (1st Dep't 1998).

The Court of Appeals first applied the continuous treatment doctrine to toll medical malpractice claims in Borgia v. City of New York, 12 N.Y.2d 151, 187 N.E.2d 777, 237 N.Y.S.2d 319 (1962). This was codified in 1975 in CPLR § 214-a. The Court of Appeals applied the continuous representation doctrine to legal malpractice claims in Greene v. Greene, 56 N.Y.2d 86, 95, 436 N.E.2d 496, 501, 451 N.Y.S.2d 46, 51 (1982); see also Glamm, 57 N.Y.2d at 93, 439 N.E.2d at 393, 453 N.Y.S.2d at 677. The Court has also made clear that the doctrine requires an expectation of continued representation on the specific subject matter supporting the malpractice claim. See McCoy v. Feinman, 99 N.Y.2d 295, 785 N.E.2d 714, 795 N.Y.S.2d 693 (2002).

Williamson squarely applies the rationale of the doctrine in unaltered form to audits. Unlike legal engagements or medical treatment, which can continue for years and may, unexpectedly, require further professional attention after substantial hiatus, auditing services are more regimented, annual engagements that end when the auditors sign and deliver the audit opinion. Refusal to apply the continuous representation doctrine to audits limits auditors' exposure to malpractice claims by eliminating the tolling of the limitations period.

How Far Does Williamson Go? Practitioners will naturally ask if there are any remaining circumstances that warrant application of the continuous representation doctrine to toll claims against auditors. The Williamson Court would permit tolling where the plaintiff challenged past audit services and the accountant was performing other on-going accounting services that relate to that audit. These are narrow circumstances. The Court of Appeals has already decided in the context of a legal malpractice claim that the continuous representation doctrine provides tolling "only where the continuing representation pertains specifically to the matter in which the attorney committed the alleged malpractice." Shumsky, 96 N.Y.2d at 168, 750 N.E.2d at 71, 726 N.Y.S.2d at 369. Just when those other on-going accounting services are related to the audits is the remaining question. In Ackerman, continuous representation was found where accountants were accused of repeatedly using an improper accounting method and were "handling" an apparently related IRS audit of partnerships in which the individual plaintiffs participated. Ackerman, 252 A.D.2d at 205, 683 N.Y.S.2d at 196. However, the rationale of Williamson brings into question the Ackerman Court's use of "repeated improper accounting" as well as what it meant by "handle" the IRS audit.

How to measure whether services are related for purposes of the continuous representation doctrine was inconclusively tested recently in the context of a legal malpractice claim pending before the NY Supreme Court in Deep v. Boies, 2007 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 5688 (August 9, 2007). The defendants pointed out that they represented the plaintiff in a copyright litigation and in "separate and distinct" transactional matters. The plaintiff argued that there was a "mutual understanding" that defendants would represent him in a "comprehensive effort" to exploit his intellectual property. The Court relied on the lack of a specific engagement letter to deny the defendants' request for summary judgment.

Strategic Considerations for Accountants, Professionals and Insurers. Williamson reemphasizes the importance of annual engagement letters for audits, compilations, and review assignments, especially those involving high risk clients.

To some extent, this is common practice and AICPA standards and professional liability policies encourage accountants to prepare engagement letters with clients annually. However, best practices dictate that any additional services should be engaged separately to further delineate between those services and the audit services. This is particularly true of services of an on-going nature, such as a dispute with the IRS that relates to an audit, or reaudit services where the accountant is re-examining prior years' work, or consulting services.

Strategic Considerations for Management and Plaintiffs. Williamson and the three-year statute of limitations in CPLR § 214(6) increase the difficulty of maintaining malpractice actions against professionals arising from long-percolating but recently discovered financial improprieties. However, where accountants are involved in fraud, the plaintiff is entitled to a statute of limitations of six years from commission of the fraud, or two years from the date the plaintiff discovered or should have discovered it. See Linden v. Moskowitz, 294 A.D.2d 114, 743 N.Y.S.2d 65 (1st Dep't 2002); Cappelli v. Berkshire, 276 A.D.2d 458, 713 N.Y.S.2d 756 (2d Dep't 2000). Additionally, a plaintiff may still have the six-year statute of limitations for contract claims that are truly independent of malpractice-related allegations, such as claims for excessive charges, indemnification (In Re: Estate of Edward Hyman, 2007 N.Y. Misc. LEXIS 5644 (July 25, 2007)), or other express breaches of the engagement letter that do not sound in malpractice.

Attorneys counseling companies that retain auditors should negotiate the engagement agreement to provide for extension of any statute of limitations to "upon discovery" rather than "accrual." The next line of defense is early engagement of forensic examiners and case theory development. The practitioner should consider use of a tolling agreement during investigation. Additionally, in every audit, accountants make substantial use of prior work that is carried forward into the most current audit engagement. This may include prior years' working papers, carry-forward or permanent files, past financial statements or auditor's reports. In particular, the carry-forward or permanent file may contain significant audit documentation from prior years. The Appellate Division opinion in Williamson barely touched on the argument that continuous representation may be shown by the auditor's use and reliance on this documentation in the current audit year's workpapers. Williamson v. PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, 32 A.D.3d 179, 184, 817 N.Y.S. 2d 61, 65 (1st Dep't 2006).

For additional discussion of the continuous representation doctrine see: New York Civil Practice: CPLR (Weinstein, Korn & Miller) P 214.25 (continuous representation doctrine and tolling limitations period in action against professional); New York Civil Practice: CPLR (Weinstein, Korn & Miller) P 214.26 (who is a "professional" and preclusion of contract statute of limitations); CPLR Manual § 2.18 (statutes of limitations for malpractice actions other than medical, dental or podiatric); LexisNexis AnswerGuide New York Civil Litigation § 4.11 (determining the applicable limitations period); Warren's Negligence in the New York Courts § 15.08 (application of the three-year statute of limitations for malpractice actions); Warren's Negligence in the New York Courts § 12.26 (overview of professional malpractice and statute of limitations); New York Practice Guide: Negligence § 6.02 (time periods for professional malpractice and when they begin to run).

PDF LINK: Click here for enhanced PDF of this Emerging Issues Analysis at no additional charge

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

Kyle C. Bisceglie, a Partner at Olshan Grundman Frome Rosenzweig & Wolosky LLP in New York City, counsels corporations, partnerships, and individuals with respect to complex commercial litigation, Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR), contracts, business advice and litigation avoidance. He has tried numerous cases without loss and has been involved in litigations, arbitrations, mediations and settlement negotiations. He also serves as general counsel to various entrepreneurial ventures and businesses in technology infrastructure, advertising, event production, dental and medical instruments, insurance, chemical distribution, fashion and consulting fields. Mr. Bisceglie has complex litigation experience in a variety of areas including commercial, financial, insurance, employment, race and sex discrimination, harassment and retaliation, copyright and trademark, defamation, and business tort. He has participated in the investigation of the worldwide derivatives trading practices of a New York based merchant bank, representation of US policyholders in the largest insurance insolvency in North American history, and coordination of negotiation over, and litigation for, the transfer of a major beverage and spirit company's most valuable brand. Mr. Bisceglie also spent five years in the litigation department of Cadwalader, Wickersham and Taft; two years trying cases as an assistant prosecutor; and one year as a law clerk to a federal district court judge in Newark, New Jersey.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.

104 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2008, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Revision of the FRCP (2007)

2008 Emerging Issues 3059

Moore's Federal Practice, Revision of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (2007)

By Moore's Federal Practice

September 1, 2007

SUMMARY: This pamphlet drawn from Moore's Federal Practice addresses the numerous Civil Rule changes scheduled to take effect on December 1, 2007, including new Rule 5.2 and extensive stylistic revisions to Rules 1 through 86. Click on the link below to see a synopsis and preface by Lee H. Rosenthal, U.S. District Judge, Southern District of Texas, as well as the rules revisions and style amendments.

RELATED LINKS: Click here for

- Moore's Federal Practice, Revision of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure \(2007\)

105 of 105 DOCUMENTS

Emerging Issues Copyright 2009, Matthew Bender & Company, Inc., a member of the LexisNexis Group. All Rights Reserved.

Goldsmith on Streamlining Collection Matters using new Cal Rule of Court 3.740

2008 Emerging Issues 488

Goldsmith on Streamlining Collection Matters using new Cal Rule of Court 3.740

By William I. Goldsmith

September 1, 2007

SUMMARY: New Rules Adopted for Simple Civil Collection Cases by California Judicial Council In a major new Rule of Court adopted by the California Judicial Council, changes in the way simple civil collection matters are processed in court will save much wasted time in needless appearances, reducing the cost of such matters and increasing the efficiencies of the courts and practioners. Under the new rules, which went into effect July 1, 2007, collection cases less than $25,000 arising from a transaction in which property, services, or money were acquired on credit from a business or person will become categorized separately and handled more efficiently under a new Rule of Court. This commentary, written by William I. Goldsmith of Goldsmith & Hull, who served on the Judicial Council committee that drafted these new procedural rules and is an editorial consultant to the new publication Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Debt Collection And Enforcement of Judgments, discusses practical applications for this new rule

PDF LINK: Click Here for Enhanced PDF of Commentary

ARTICLE: On July 1, 2007, the procedure for handling most collection cases in California changed dramatically. Simple collection matters, defined as those claims of $25,000 or less arising from a transaction in which property, services, or money was acquired on credit, suddenly became more efficient for the courts, litigants, and counsel. The California Judicial Council remedied needless appearances, judicial intervention, time, and perhaps most important of all, unjustified and ill advised monetary sanctions being levied, by eliminating the need for the vast majority of these types of matters to be processed within the fast track rules currently followed by California courts.

Prior to July 1, 2007, such straightforward collection matters were handled no differently than other civil actions, complete with multiple status conferences, case management conferences, and hearings for orders to show cause. Though arguably necessary in larger and more complex matters, in simple collection cases these protracted conferences and hearings were not only a drain on the courts' administrative staff and judicial officers, but also were costly for attorneys, plaintiffs, and defendants.

Moreover, with in excess of 95 percent of these matters being resolved by default judgment, only appearance attorneys hired by plaintiffs counsel for the day usually attended these proceedings. In most cases, the appearance attorneys spent their time merely explaining to a judicial officer what was obvious from a reading of the docket itself for example, that the defendants had skipped and thus could not be timely served, and that additional time was needed to locate and serve them, or that the Request for Entry of Default Judgment had been submitted but had not yet been acted upon by the court.

Recognizing that in the best interests of the courts, litigants, and attorneys, changes had to be made, the Judicial Council adopted California Rule of Court 3.740 to implement streamlined procedures for collection cases. For simple collections matters as defined above, litigants will now be initially exempt from the Fast Track rules for most civil cases [Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.740(c),(d)].

Often, the biggest obstacle facing practitioners in simple collection actions is actually personally serving each defendant. Acknowledging that a significant number of defendants in collection cases move, and move often, and that tracking them down is getting harder because of concerns relating to identity theft, consumers' privacy rights, and the like, litigants now will have six months from the filing date to effectuate service on all defendants. If service is not made within that time, or an order for publication has not been filed, the court will schedule a hearing to ascertain why reasonable monetary sanctions should not be imposed [Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.740(d),(e)]. This is a significant change from the prior rule mandating that service be made within 60 days from the filing date. Personally serving defendants whose address is known is not and was never the issue. Tracking down defendants who move (skip) typically takes time and effort. The new time limits set by the Judicial Council give the practitioner a fair and reasonable amount of time to accomplish this.

But a few words to the wise: Do not wait until the last minute to file your proof of service or applications for an order for publication. Court staff will not look kindly on that. In fact, under the new provisions, these documents must be filed at least 10 court days before the order to show cause hearing [Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.740(e)]. For attorneys who do a great deal of this type of work, best practice dictates that you use a five-month deadline internally, to give the court and your process servers and staff enough wiggle room for any unexpected contingencies.

Once you have accomplished personal service, the court must automatically continue the order to show cause hearing for 360 days from the date the complaint was filed [Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.740(f)].

Once served, plaintiffs will have up to almost one full year to obtain a default judgment. Though attorneys typically are not compensated until they actually collect money, and so have every incentive to move these matters along as expeditiously as possible, errors are sometimes made in submitting the forms to court. And in some cases, the court enters the default but requests either an explanation or more documents to substantiate the claim.

In these instances, counsel must take extra time to make the necessary corrections or obtain further documentation from the client. The lesson to be learned is that it is best not to wait until the last minute to submit your request for default and judgment, so as to allow yourself enough time to correct any errors or address any questions or concerns the court may have before the 360 days run.

If any defendant files a response in the case, the matter then comes back into the Fast Track system and is handled as any other civil matter [Cal. Rules of Court 3.712(d)]. The principal aim of these new rules is to address the vast majority of collection matters that proceed by default judgment.

Finally, regardless of whether or not a response is filed, the new rules recognize that settlement is a good thing and that litigants should not be punished by being forced to appear in court merely to explain that a matter has settled. Thus, the rules now provide that upon the filing of a Notice of Settlement, the court must vacate all hearings, case management conferences, and trial dates [Cal. Rules of Court, Rule 3.741].

For additional discussion and references to the debt collection rules discussed in this commentary, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Debt Collection and Enforcement of Judgments, Ch. 6, Litigation to Recover Debts<m>Selecting the Appropriate Cause of Action, § 6.19A.

For general coverage of the procedural issues in debt collection actions, see Matthew Bender Practice Guide: California Debt Collection and Enforcement of Judgment, Ch. 6, Litigation to Recover Debts Selecting the Appropriate Causes of Action, and Ch. 7, Litigation to Recover Debts Trying and Proving the Case.

For general discussion of the Trial Court Delay Reduction Act (fast track) rules, see California Forms of Pleading and Practice, Ch. 522, Trial Court Delay Reduction (Matthew Bender).

ABOUT THE AUTHOR(S):

William I Goldsmith is a partner in the firm of Goldsmith & Hull, Encino, California. He is the current president of the California Creditors Bar Association, and is a founding member of the National Association of Retail Collection Attorneys, where he has served as a vice president and member of the board of directors. He is also a member of the Los Angeles County and San Fernando Valley Bar Associations, Consumer Attorneys Association of California, and Commercial Law League of America. He has worked with the California state legislature and has been appointed by the California Judicial Council to serve on committees implementing changes in the procedural requirements effecting the way collection cases are handled. Mr. Goldsmith has been a frequent lecturer in the areas of creditors' rights, business law, debt collection, enforcement of judgments, equipment leasing, media and entertainment collection issues, and federal courts and debt collection. He has been quoted on CBS, CNN, Fox Television, the Los Angeles Times, and the Wall Street Journal.

Mr. Goldsmith has served as a judge pro tem and arbitrator with the Los Angeles County Superior Courts and the Los Angeles County Bar Association (attorney fee disputes). He received his B.A. degree cum laude from the University of California at Los Angeles in 1975, and his J.D. degree from La Verne University in 1978. He has an AV' rating from Martindale-Hubbell.

Information referenced herein is provided for educational purposes only. For legal advice applicable to the facts of your particular situation, you should obtain the services of a qualified attorney licensed to practice law in your state.